Working in the broad tradition of Bhimanna's counter-reading of mythology —his re-reading of the Mahabharata's characters from a Dalit standpoint—

Sunani does something different. He does not oppose the mythological symbol; he borrows it and declares that the Dalit voice is no less than that sacred sound.

This is a strategy of reclamation. Bhimanna says that the history of the Puranas has been written falsely. Sunani says that our voice is equal to the highest symbol of that same mythology.

3. Drop, Seed and Pregnant Woman: Three Metaphors of Hope

Three images of hope come together in the final section of "There Is Still Much Left to Happen".

"Here in the sky is a drop / that shines despite its indistinctness, / and, dreaming a sweet dream of a rainbow again and again, / has resolved to colour the immense sky."

"Here a seed has pledged to sprout, / wishing to make everything green."

"And here, in sorrow, / an abandoned pregnant woman / searches for a moment of peace— / in order to give birth to a child / who could confront and restrain seven warriors."

These three images form a succession of increasing power: drop → seed → mother of a warrior.

The drop is the smallest and least distinct. Yet it dreams of a rainbow: the aspiration towards immensity within littleness.

The seed is greater than the drop. It pledges to germinate: not a passive desire, but an active commitment.

The pregnant woman is the most powerful figure. She is "abandoned", rejected by society, yet awaits the birth of a child who will "confront seven warriors".

In this abandoned pregnant woman the voices of the Telugu women poets reverberate—Subhadra's "Avva", Swaroopa Rani's "Hands Turned to Earth". But Sunani makes her the mother of a future revolution.

4. "Address": The Paradox of Invisibility and Omnipresence

The central paradox of "Address" is that Dalit existence is present everywhere and yet remains invisible.

"From beginning to end / my presence / spreads like a flickering line of ants / and resounds like the clang of cymbals."

The "line of ants" is tiny, seemingly endless and industrious, yet no one notices it. The "clang of cymbals" is audible, yet no one hears it.

"To find my address / you need no longer send a parcel / addressed 'care of' the sun or the moon."

The line is intensely satirical. Society seeks the Dalit in the wrong places: in the sun and moon—that is, in abstract, philosophical or spiritual locations—while the Dalit lives "in that same dark alley", a concrete, physical, everyday place.

The argument recalls Gayatri Chakravorty Spivak's discussion of subaltern invisibility: intellectuals seek the subaltern in places where the subaltern is not. This theoretical question assumes poetic form here.

"If you can, / then please send me / beautiful dreams filled with sunshine."

This request reverses the situation. The Dalit does not supply an address, but asks for dreams. The satire is that the very society which demands an address from Dalits offers them no dreams.

5. The Fish Metaphor: On the Brink of Extinction

"I swim like a small fish laden with dreams / in a mere handful of water / in a disappearing pond."

The image joins ecological destruction and social destruction. The pond is disappearing, evoking India's agricultural and water crises. The fish—associated with the traditional livelihood of several Dalit communities—survives in "a handful of water".

The "fish laden with dreams" is at once beautiful and tragic. It continues to dream while the pond dries up.

In Solanki's "Let the People Freeze", freezing demanded change. Sunani's "disappearing pond" shows the consequence when change fails to occur.

"Should I jump into the sea to grant it nectar, / or dig deep and push the tender head of Vasuki, / the serpent holding the world in balance?"

This is a mythological dilemma. Vasuki, the serpent used as a rope in the churning of the ocean, sustains the balance of the world. The Dalit speaker asks: should I offer nectar to the system—that is, contribute to it—or shake the system by pushing Vasuki?

It is the philosophical problem of revolution versus cooperation, a fundamental question within Dalit political thought.

6. "Sadananda": Narrative Poetry and the Farmer's Perspective

"Sadananda" sounds altogether different from the preceding poems. In the earlier two, the poetic "I" represented an abstract, collective Dalit consciousness. Here stands a particular person, complete with a name, village and reason for travelling.

"My name is Sadananda. / My village is Nagaon. / I have come to Bhubaneswar for a farmers' fair, / to receive the Governor's prize for the largest okra."

This self-introduction is extremely simple and profoundly significant. Dalit characters in literature are often anonymous or collective. Giving Sadananda a name, a village and an achievement is a politics of personhood.

"The largest okra" may seem comical, but it contains a deep irony. A farmer who works all year in the fields receives, as his highest distinction, a prize for "the largest okra". This both devalues agricultural labour and depicts the farmer's unassuming simplicity.

The Irony of the Sea Scene

"On seeing the sea you said / that I did not understand— / indeed, that I misunderstood— / the waves."

Sadananda sees the sea for the first time. The urban intellectual, addressed as "you", says that he does not understand. Sadananda concedes: "Perhaps / I misunderstood."

Yet by the end of the poem, this "misunderstanding" becomes a revelation of truth.

"Why should there not be drought in my region / when all the water is held hostage by the sea?"

Sadananda has "misunderstood" the sea, but his "misunderstanding" contains a political truth that the intellectual fails to see. The sea, acclaimed for its grandeur and vastness, is in fact imagined as holding the farmer's water hostage.

This epistemological reversal, in which the "uneducated" farmer's vision proves sharper than the "educated" intellectual's, is crucial. It recalls Ganesh Devy's argument in After Amnesia that oral and folk knowledge can surpass book-derived knowledge.

7. "Bitten by an Egret": Playfulness and Interruption

"But while I am absorbed in playfulness, / at the most inauspicious moment, / an egret bites me."

The egret is a predator that eats fish. In the context of the fish metaphor, where the fish stands for Dalit existence, being "bitten by an egret" means destruction at the hands of the system.

"Absorbed in playfulness" is ironic: just as the Dalit individual experiences a moment of freedom and joy, the blow arrives.

This image conveys a poetic truth about the insecurity of Dalit life: happiness is always provisional, disaster always sudden.

8. Comparative Analysis: Odia and Telugu–Gujarati

Mysticism versus realism: Telugu Dalit poetry, especially that of Subhadra and Shashinirmala, is sharply realist—concrete and sensuously immediate. Sunani's work is filled with mystical images of nature—drops, seeds, fish and rainbows—reflecting the Odia poetic tradition's long history of natural imagery.

Optimism versus pessimism: Gujarati poetry, notably Solanki's "Let the People Freeze", contains revolutionary exhortation. Sunani's poems carry hope and doubt simultaneously: the drop imagines a rainbow while the pond dries up.

Individuality versus collectivity: "Sadananda" introduces a particular person, unlike the frequently anonymous collective "I" of the Telugu and Gujarati poems. This indicates Odia poetry's commitment to the preservation of individual personhood.

Intellectual versus farmer: "Sadananda" stages a dialogue between "you" (the urban intellectual) and "I" (the farmer), absent from the Telugu–Gujarati poems. Sunani brings this disagreement across classes within Dalit discourse into poetry.

9. A Special Note on the Translation Chain

The Odia-to-English translation by Sailen Routray preserves certain distinctive features of Odia poetic tradition. Mythological terms such as "Panchajanya" and "Vasuki Naga" have appropriately been transliterated rather than translated.

In Gajendra Thakur's Maithili rendition, expressions such as "the flickering line of ants" and "the clang of cymbals" partly preserve the music of the Odia original through imagery natural to Maithili.

Conclusion

These three poetic sections by Basudev Sunani—"There Is Still Much Left to Happen", "Address" and "Sadananda"—represent a distinctive philosophical and poetic tradition within Odia Dalit verse.

The first section offers a warning: something remains to happen; an explosion is approaching.

The second gives testimony: I am everywhere yet invisible; my address is in a "dark alley".

The third offers irony: Sadananda "misunderstands", but his misunderstanding contains a truth invisible to the intellectual.

Together they propose a complete philosophy of Dalit existence: we are present (testimony); we shall bring change (warning); and we see truth from our own position (the exposure of irony).

The closing lines—"Because I still live in that same dark alley / where I have always lived. / Always."—are among the quietest and most powerful last words in this collection, and perhaps in the entire field of Indian Dalit poetry.

"Always": one word bears the full weight of history, the present and invisibility.

Dalit Short Fiction: Critical Studies of Two Telugu Stories

Kolakaluri Enoch's "The Crow" and Vinodini's "Black Ink"

Preliminary Observations

So far, this series of critical studies has examined poetry. We now turn to two short stories, "The Crow" and "Black Ink". Both represent the prose tradition of Dalit literature and demonstrate a narrative medium's distinctive power, different from that of verse.

The stories present a revealing contrast: "The Crow" concerns external realities—community, ritual and relations of power—whereas "Black Ink" concerns internal realities—personal relationships, child psychology and the sudden manifestation of caste. Together they illuminate the outer and inner dimensions of Dalit experience.

1. "The Crow": Narrative Structure and Technique

Narrative Perspective

The story employs a third-person omniscient narrator, but its omniscience is selective. The narrator knows Avva's state of mind, Bandodu's history and the crows' behaviour, yet never delivers a verdict. Such neutral narration produces a particular effect: readers must arrive at their own judgments.

Chronology and the Release of Information

The story begins in medias res: the crows are already cawing, and Bandodu is already at work. Background information—his caste, his rituals and the misfortunes of his family—emerges gradually and without announcement during the narrative.

This technique of delayed revelation first draws readers into the immediate surface of the story—the commotion of the crows and Bandodu's presence—and then gradually uncovers its social complexity.

The Story's Three-Level Structure

First level, event: crows caw, a hut is surrounded, and Bandodu asks for food.

Second level, social explanation: Bandodu's caste, his practices, his relationship with the crows and the Madiga community's response.

Third level, philosophical question: are liberation and curse the same thing? Are Bandodu and the crows enemies or family?

2. "The Crow": Bandodu, a Singular Literary Character

Bandodu is a distinctive character in Telugu Dalit literature, perhaps even in Indian literature as a whole. He occupies the lowest position among Dalits, belonging to a tenth sub-caste and surviving solely by begging from the Madigas.

The Paradox of Character

Bandodu is powerless—a beggar at the bottom of the caste hierarchy. Yet he is also powerful: "stronger than a stubborn king", controlling the crows and holding an entire community hostage.

Where does this contradictory power originate? The story suggests that his sole expertise—killing crows—gives him an exceptional authority in a society where no one else destroys them.

This characterisation evokes Michel Foucault's account of power: power does not always descend from above, but also resides at local sites of specialised knowledge. Bandodu's authority comes not from his caste, but from his unique knowledge.

Bandodu and the Politics of the "Abject"

"Nowhere in the world can one find a beggar as loathsome as Bandodu." Here the narrator presents society's judgment. Yet that same society is afraid of him.

Julia Kristeva's theory of abjection is particularly relevant. Bandodu is society's abject outcast, but the very things considered repulsive also make him indispensable. His monopoly over what is regarded as abject—crow flesh, vomit and foul odours—gives him a peculiar power.

3. "The Crow": The Crow as a Multilayered Metaphor

The crow is not merely a bird in this narrative: it is a metaphor with several layers.

Crows and Society

In Indian folk traditions the crow signifies ancestral spirits, an omen of misfortune and collective memory. In this story the crows institute a form of collective justice more direct and immediate than the human justice system.

When Bandodu is denied food, the crows retaliate. It is spontaneous justice, requiring neither court nor written law.

The Relationship between Crows and Bandodu

The story's most philosophical question is: "Are the crows and Bandodu enemies? Or are they one another's family, their own people?"

There is no simple answer. Bandodu kills crows, but the crows caw in his support. Both inhabit the same social margins; society regards both as useless, and both live in a similar invisibility. The narrative's central argument lies in this solidarity of the marginalised.

4. "The Crow": "Salvation Is Only a Curse"—The Central Paradox

The philosophical climax of the story declares:

"Bandodu will never again come to beg at that house. This is salvation. Salvation is only a curse. From then on it will be a house where no crows perch; a house where Bandodu never begs. It is an insult. An excommunication!"

This paradox expresses one of the profoundest insights into Dalit social reality.

Bandodu's absence means liberation: freedom from the burden of feeding him.

Bandodu's absence also means a curse: the house's social and ritual death.

The crows' absence means liberation: freedom from their attacks.

The crows' absence also means a curse: the house is disgraced and excluded.

This equation, liberation = curse, exposes a cruel truth of the caste-bound social order: within it, emancipation and bondage become the same thing. Whoever leaves is ostracised; whoever remains is exploited. There is no third possibility.

In Vijayashri's "Alisamma's Curse", the curse is directed towards transforming the oppressor into a human being. In Enoch's story, liberation itself is a curse. Together, these works express the contradictory reality of Dalit experience.

5. "The Crow": Poverty and Moral Complexity

A crucial dimension of the story is that Avva's family is not simply an oppressor: it is helpless.

"It made no difference whether she listened to Bandodu's plea or not. She could do nothing."

This is the moral complexity of poverty. The story shows Bandodu as a victim without making Avva's family into villains. Both are victims of the system, although the degree and form of their victimhood differ.

The presentation of this moral complexity is among Enoch's greatest achievements as a storyteller. Dalit literature can sometimes offer a simple binary of victim and oppressor; Enoch goes beyond it to portray multiple levels of oppression.

6. "Black Ink": Narrative Structure and Technique

First-Person Narration

"Black Ink" is told in the first person, by a Dalit Christian woman. Its narrative perspective differs fundamentally from that of "The Crow". Here, the inwardness of experience—events as they are felt—is the story's centre.

Delayed Revelation

The structural surprise is that most of the story unfolds as an innocent and delightful episode involving a young visitor. Suddenly, in its final third, caste enters the scene and destroys the earlier happiness in an instant.

This strategy of delayed disclosure is extremely effective. Had the story been presented from the start as a caste conflict, readers would have been psychologically prepared. Because everything appears beautiful and innocent, the sudden emergence of caste wounds readers with something of the same pain experienced by the narrator.

Two Registers of Language

The story employs two linguistic registers simultaneously.

The first is poetic and metaphorical, used to portray the child: "a frock woven from butterfly wings", "a caravan of smiles", "a petal bathed in moonlight", "the radiance of a rainbow".

The second is stark realism, appearing after the question of caste: "Are you a Harijan?" and "I have no Harijan friends."

This division of language mirrors the thematic division: before caste is revealed, there is beauty, innocence and human connection; once caste emerges, the beauty of language is destroyed.

7. "Black Ink": Shriya, a Complex Child Character

Shriya is the story's most complex literary achievement. She is, at once:

Innocent—kind to animals, keeping a diary and helping an elderly woman.

Curious—eager to know everything, constantly asking questions.

Affectionate—naturally fond of the narrator.

Conditioned by caste—an unconscious bearer of her parents' prejudices.

This complexity offers an extraordinarily subtle portrayal of caste socialisation. Shriya does not consciously practise caste discrimination: she has been taught it. Her parents' admission that they have "no Harijan friends" has become natural to her.

Jean Piaget's account of child development, in which children learn social rules through imitation as well as reasoning, is invoked here. Shriya imitates her parents' caste behaviour without recognising its ethical implications.

Through this character Vinodini raises a difficult question: where is the caste order reproduced? In the parents' explicit teaching, but still more in their silent conduct, which the child absorbs as normal.

8. "Black Ink": The Metaphor of Black Ink

The metaphor of the title is defined within the story.

"I write about those I like most in blue ink; I write about those I dislike in black ink."

Shriya's blue ink signifies love and affection.

Shriya's black ink signifies hatred and dislike.

At the story's end, the Dalit Christian narrator will be written about in "black ink". That is the metaphor's explosive reversal.

But there is another layer: "black" evokes the colour of the Dalit body, which society has long associated with negativity. Shriya's black ink, the negative connotations of blackness and the convergence of colour with caste intersect.

An Indian caste-inflected version of the argument in Frantz Fanon's Black Skin, White Masks emerges here: the colonised Black person learns to perceive their own blackness negatively through the coloniser's gaze.

9. "Black Ink": Mahima—the Presence of an Absent Character

One absent character, Mahima, is profoundly important.

"Once I ate snacks served by my friend Mahima's mother at her home. I wrote about that in black ink."

Mahima is a "Harijan", as Shriya herself says. Eating at her home is deemed worthy of black ink.

Yet Shriya is friends with Mahima; only eating in her home is forbidden. This reveals a fine division in caste conduct: personal contact may be possible, while sharing food, one of caste's deepest taboos, remains impossible.

Ambedkar argued in Annihilation of Caste that rules governing commensality and marriage—the sharing of bread and the making of marital ties—are among the caste order's strongest supports. Shriya's behaviour reveals the rule about food operating within a child's mind.

10. "Black Ink": The Final Image—Butterfly and Caterpillar

The story's concluding sentence reads:

"All the dried butterflies in the room turned into caterpillars crawling over me."

This metaphorical transformation is the poetic essence of the entire narrative.

At the beginning, Shriya is a butterfly—beautiful, free and capable of flight. By the end she becomes a caterpillar, crawling upon the ground, seemingly ugly and earthbound.

The "dried butterfly" symbolises beauty that has died. What seemed alive was in fact already dead.

The image distils the story's entire argument: the innocence of childhood that seems a butterfly is actually a caterpillar of caste conditioning. What looked like the beauty of a smile concealed caste hatred; what seemed like freedom of flight was privilege.

The use of a stream-of-consciousness technique associated with Virginia Woolf—where the narrator's inward experience blends with outward events—is particularly effective in Vinodini's Indian Dalit context.

11. Comparing the Stories: Two Narrative Perspectives

Similarities of Subject

Both stories centre upon the caste system. In both, rituals and patterns of behaviour—giving food, sustaining friendships—draw the boundaries of caste.

Differences of Perspective

"The Crow" presents caste at the level of the community: the ritual life of an entire group.

"Black Ink" presents caste at the level of the individual: the sudden emergence of caste in a personal relationship.

Differences in the Experience of Time

"The Crow" depicts a centuries-old order. "Bandodu comes every night to ask for food from a particular family." It is a ritual of long duration.

"Black Ink" unfolds in a single day. Yet in that one day a centuries-old structure is exposed.

The Gender Dimension

"The Crow" has a male author (Enoch) and a male central character (Bandodu), but a woman (Avva) occupies the moral centre of the narrative.

"Black Ink" has a woman author (Vinodini), a woman narrator and a girl (Shriya): its narrative world is entirely woman-centred.

12. Poetry versus Story: The Specific Powers of the Medium

Reading these two stories raises an important literary question: which medium, poetry or prose, most powerfully expresses Dalit experience?

The strength of poetry lies in intensity, density and suggestion. Bhimanna's "Burning Skulls" and Gauri's "Henna-Stained Hands" make a single moment seemingly infinite.

The strength of prose lies in breadth, complexity, child psychology and details of social ritual. Shriya's gradual transformation in "Black Ink", from smile to hostility, could scarcely achieve this effect so fully in another form.

Nor could Bandodu's complex social position in "The Crow"—the Dalit among Dalits, the powerful among the powerless—be unfolded to this extent in a poem.

The media complement each other. The fullness of Dalit literature resides in both poetry and prose.

Conclusion

Kolakaluri Enoch's "The Crow" and Vinodini's "Black Ink" are two significant achievements in Telugu Dalit prose.

"The Crow" presents the complexity of an external order: liberation and curse as one, power in powerlessness, indispensability in abjection. It offers a philosophy at the level of community.

"Black Ink" presents the torment of inward experience: caste hatred beneath the covering of innocence, a caterpillar concealed within a smile. It brings the wound into the sphere of the individual.

The final questions of both stories are ultimately the same.

"The Crow": "Must such revenge be taken merely because poverty prevented someone from providing food?"

"Black Ink": "We are friends; is it necessary to know all this?"

Both questions remain unanswered, demanding responses from readers, society and history.

Until those answers come, Dalit literature—in poetry, prose, Maithili and Telugu—will continue asking its questions.

Literary Criticism: A Friend Forever (Jigiri)

A Telugu Novel by Peddinti Ashok Kumar

Preliminary Observations

"A Friend Forever" (original Telugu title: Jigiri) differs structurally from all the works examined so far in this critical series. Following poetry and short fiction, we encounter an extract from a full-length novel, and this extract encompasses the novel's entire emotional and philosophical journey.

At its centre is an extraordinary friendship between a human being (Imam) and a bear (Shadul), which becomes a metaphor for the social and political crisis of the marginalised Kalandar community. In this sense, the novel opens a new dimension in Dalit and Adivasi literature: the focus is not caste alone, but the extinction of a caste-associated cultural way of life.

1. The Novel's Structure and Technique

Opening: Beginning in the Middle of Events

The novel opens through delayed disclosure. Its first lines—"The sun rose. The sun also set."—suggest a cosmic indifference. It makes no difference to the sun whether Imam exists. This existential opening establishes the novel's central question from the first line: does human existence have any value?

Imam and Shadul are introduced by contrast.

"Imam, a human being, who moved around his animal like an animal"; and "Shadul ... was actually not a human being but an animal ... had become a gentle creature."

This inverted introduction embodies the novel's central paradox: the human being resembles an animal, and the animal resembles a human being. In the same contrast, the dehumanisation of the Kalandar community and the humanisation of Shadul are expressed simultaneously.

The Flow of Time

The novel does not proceed chronologically. It moves through a triangle of present, past and future. In the present: Imam's absence, Bibamma and Chand waiting. In the past: the night Shadul was captured, twenty years of companionship, the conflict with Malla Reddy. In the future: the dream of land and the hope for a new life.

This nonlinear narrative sustains a continuous tension between memory and reality.

2. Character Analysis

Imam: The Tragic Hero

Imam is a classical tragic hero. His tragic flaw—if it can be called a flaw—is the boundlessness of his love. He loves Shadul so deeply that he cannot accept practical reality.

Yet it would be unjust to blame Imam. His tragedy arises not from personal weakness, but from the social and political order. Land rights, police harassment and animal-protection laws combine to confront him with an impossible choice: his friend, or his family's future.

Imam's interior monologue—"Why do you follow me with your eyes closed, Shadul, placing complete faith in me? Why don't you kill me?"—expresses guilt and helplessness together. This self-accusation is among the novel's most moving moments.

Shadul: The Humanised Animal

Shadul is the novel's most accomplished literary creation. He is not merely an animal or merely a metaphor; he unites the two.

His emotional intelligence is depicted with remarkable subtlety: "From the tone of Imam's voice, Shadul could judge the situation." He understands Imam's happiness and sadness, fear and hope. Without words or speech, he is the family's most sensitive member.

In the final scene, "Shadul came and sat beside him, resting his head in Imam's lap." This is unguarded, unconditional love. Shadul does not know that Imam is planning to kill him, and that ignorance makes the betrayal supremely painful.

Bibamma: A Symbol of Change

Bibamma is the novel's most complex woman character. She once said Shadul "must have been my child in a previous life", yet in the end she urges her husband to abandon him.

This moral transformation does not make her a villain; it is the consequence of an instinct for survival. The dream of owning land, once unimaginable, changes her priorities.

The ethical dilemma embodied by Bibamma is among the novel's most realistic features. She is neither villain nor merely victim, but a human being making a choice about survival under impossible conditions.

Chand: The New Generation's Aspirations and Cruelty

Chand is the novel's most controversial character. On the one hand he loves Shadul and regards him as a "second father"; on the other, he plans to bury Shadul alive.

This contradiction symbolises generational change. For Chand's generation, the security of land matters more than affection for Shadul. He represents a new India seeking release from traditional bonds without seeing the price of that liberation.

A new aspect of Karl Marx's theory of alienation appears here: Chand is alienated from his cultural identity. Shadul is not simply a bear, but a living symbol of Kalandar culture. In rejecting Shadul, Chand rejects his community's history.

3. Bear Dancing: The Economics of Culture

The novel's central cultural and economic conflict is between animal-protection law and the Kalandars' livelihood.

The Paradox of the Law

India's Wildlife (Protection) Act of 1972, together with later animal-welfare restrictions, made the Kalandars' traditional occupation of dancing bears unlawful. The moral foundation of these laws is animal welfare; an unintended consequence, as the novel presents it, is the economic destruction of the Kalandar community.

The novel presents this paradox with fairness: it neither simply endorses nor simply opposes the law. Imam loves Shadul; he is not cruel. But without Shadul he has no livelihood.

Amartya Sen's capability approach, which holds that human development involves more than income and requires the fulfilment of social and cultural capabilities, is relevant here. The Kalandars are losing their traditional skills, cultural identity and livelihoods simultaneously.

The Aesthetics of the Bear Dance

The descriptions of Shadul's performances—"the Bathukamma dance, preparing bread, riding a horse …"—serve as an archive of folk aesthetics. These acts are not mere entertainment; they contain knowledge passed down through generations.

Ganesh Devy's After Amnesia, with its argument that Indian literary criticism neglected Adivasi and folk systems of knowledge, is directly relevant. Shadul's repertoire represents a living cultural heritage on the verge of destruction.

4. A Philosophy of Friendship: The Novel's Central Idea

In Telugu, jigiri means an intimate friend, a friend of the heart. But the novel's friendship is not between two human beings: it is between a human and an animal.

The Ontology of Friendship

Albert Camus, in The Myth of Sisyphus, is invoked for the idea that solidarity between two beings sharing a destiny can create meaning in an otherwise meaningless life. Imam and Shadul's friendship exemplifies such Camus-like solidarity.

Both are society's abject outsiders. Imam is nomadic, of low caste and without formal education; Shadul is wild, supposedly unclean and dangerous. Society considers both useful but unacceptable.

"Even crows take lightly a being who has no voice": this line from "The Crow" echoes in Jigiri. Shadul cannot speak, and the absence of a voice makes him less important in the eyes of society.

The Betrayal of Friendship

The novel's most agonising moment comes when Imam offers Shadul a piece of jaggery laced with poison.

"Imam's hand trembled as he held out the jaggery. Shadul took it and began to chew. Imam watched, his eyes clouded with tears."

The scene recalls Judas's kiss, a traditional emblem of betrayal. Yet Imam does not become a betrayer freely; he makes an impossible choice under impossible circumstances.

Fyodor Dostoevsky's Crime and Punishment shows how moral guilt may become more terrible than the act of killing. Imam kills Shadul physically, but spiritually dies himself.

5. The Question of Land: Dalit and Adivasi Politics

The land title is a plot-driving object, directing the entire conflict of the narrative.

The Politics of Land

The Kalandars have historically been denied land rights because of their itinerant lives. How, the administrative reasoning goes, can people who do not live permanently on a piece of land own it? The community's existential crisis is condensed into this question.

The Mandal Revenue Officer (MRO) imposes the condition that "the bear must never be seen nearby again". Here the officer symbolises the modern Indian state. The state simultaneously offers the Kalandars land (resettlement) and destroys their identity (the abandonment of the bear). This is contradictory modernisation.

Buchchayya: Competition across Class and Caste

The episode of Buchchayya, who loses his claim to land because Imam's name is advanced, forms a significant subplot. It shows competition among marginalised groups: Kalandars and local Dalits struggle for the same limited resources.

This struggle within marginality is the novelistic counterpart of what Shashinirmala showed in Telugu Dalit poetry: Dalit men's oppression of Dalit women.

6. The Night of the Bear's Capture: A Poetics of Folk Knowledge

The account of the bear's capture, a three-way struggle between Imam, Bibamma and the she-bear, has epic qualities.

"Seeing the fire, the she-bear stepped back twice." Imam knew bears fear fire; Bibamma knew to burn dried date-palm leaves. Together they employ a body of collective indigenous knowledge.

The importance of indigenous knowledge in Telugu Dalit poetry—appearing in Subhadra's and Gauri's poems as familiarity with local plants—here becomes practical knowledge necessary for survival.

7. The Final Scene: An Aesthetics of Silence

The novel's concluding passage, Shadul's death, is written with extreme verbal economy.

"After a few moments Shadul began to stagger. He gave a low groan and collapsed. Imam remained beside him, his hand resting on Shadul's head, until the bear stopped breathing. The forest was still."

This minimalist prose is extraordinarily powerful. What remains unsaid—Imam's cries, Shadul's struggle—speaks more forcefully through silence.

Ernest Hemingway's iceberg principle, in which what prose leaves unspoken can have greater force than what it explicitly states, finds an exemplary application here.

"Imam felt that part of himself had died with Shadul." This single line leaves an indelible ache in the reader.

8. The Translation Chain: Telugu → English → Maithili

The Importance of the Translator's Note

P. Jayalakshmi's translator's note is itself an important paratext. It advances the concept of "cultural translation", which requires the transfer of cultural sensibility, not merely the substitution of words from one language to another.

Preserving "local colour"—Urdu words, Telangana proverbs and indigenous plants—is an important ethical decision in translation.

Urdu in the Maithili Text

Jigiri preserves the Urdu-inflected speech of Telangana's Muslim Kalandar community in Maithili, including "Abba", "Ammi", "Allah" and "Shadul". This has two effects.

First, the cultural and linguistic specificity of Telangana is preserved. Second, Maithili readers encounter an unfamiliar cultural universe.

This uses Lawrence Venuti's strategy of foreignisation, which retains the foreignness of the source work; it is an appropriate choice here.

9. Jigiri's Place in the Dalit Literature Series

Across this entire critical series—poetry, short fiction and now the novel—Jigiri occupies a distinctive position.

Boyi Bhimanna offers a broad, overarching perspective on Dalit history.

Subhadra offers a close, microscopic perspective on everyday labour.

Kolakaluri Enoch's "The Crow" offers an intermediate perspective on communal ritual.

Jigiri provides the most expansive narrative of all, bringing individual friendship, family conflict, community politics and state power into a single account.

In this sense, Jigiri represents the epic voice of Telugu Dalit literature.

Conclusion

Peddinti Ashok Kumar's A Friend Forever is a multilayered work of distinction that operates on several levels.

On the literary level, friendship between human and animal becomes a poetics of love, trust and betrayal.

On the social level, it preserves the cultural extinction of the Kalandar community within literary memory.

On the political level, it questions the contradiction between animal rights and human rights in a balanced manner.

On the philosophical level, it reveals the tragic reality of friendship in impossible circumstances, where love and survival are in conflict.

The novel's final truth—"The land was his, but for Imam its price was unbearable"—compresses a central question of Dalit and Adivasi literature into one sentence.

Can "development" and "rights" be purchased at the cost of killing a community's soul?

The novel leaves that question unanswered, entrusting it to readers, society and the state.

Comprehensive Review: Maithili Translations of Telugu, Gujarati and Odia Dalit Literature

The Videha Parallel Literary Movement and the Enrichment of Dalit Literature in Maithili

Preliminary Note: A Historical Project

The literature we have examined in this series of reviews—Telugu poetry (Boyi Bhimanna, J. Subhadra, Challapalli Swaroopa Rani, Darishe Shashinirmala, M. Gauri and Madduri Vijayashri); Gujarati poetry (Anish Garange, Rajendra Vadel and Umesh Solanki); Odia poetry (Basudev Sunani); Telugu short fiction (Kolakaluri Enoch and Vinodini); and a Telugu novel (Peddinti Ashok Kumar)—together constitutes a carefully conceived literary project. That project's name is Videha: Videha, Maithili's first fortnightly electronic journal, edited by Gajendra Thakur.

The purpose of this review operates at three levels: first, to evaluate the poetics of the literature under discussion; second, to analyse the cultural and political significance of this translation project; and third, to investigate the relationship between the Videha Parallel Literary Movement and the translation of Dalit literature.

Part One: Literary Evaluation

1. Poetry: Dalit Voices in Three Languages

The Telugu Poetic Tradition

Telugu Dalit poetry is the broadest and most varied component of this collection. Six poets—Bhimanna, Subhadra, Swaroopa Rani, Shashinirmala, Gauri and Vijayashri—together construct an entire poetic universe.

Bhimanna (1920–2001) is a founding elder of this tradition. His two poems, "Burning Huts" and "My Hereditary Rights", reveal two principal strategies of Dalit poetry: questioning the encircling structure of religious violence and rereading mythological history. Through repetition and anaphora, Bhimanna incorporates the Dalit oral tradition into written poetry—a distinctive achievement of poetic craft.

Subhadra, poet of labour, objects and motherhood, writes the microhistory of Dalit women's lives. In "The Hem of a Sari", an ordinary piece of cloth becomes a bed, an umbrella, a bag, a protector and a mother: a remarkable instance of an extended metaphor. Against the upper-caste feminist symbolism of Jayaprabha's "burning the sari", Subhadra's Dalit-feminist reply —"How could I survive if I set it on fire?"—marks an important moment of dialogue within feminism.

Swaroopa Rani is a poet of the transformation of individual consciousness. In "Mankenapuvvu", the sequence "when … then", repeated six times, classifies forms of oppression and is highly deliberate in its poetic construction. In "Hands Turned to Earth", the transformation from a marigold blossom into a withered leaf embodies the physical reality of labour exploitation.

Shashinirmala is the most fierce and confrontational voice. In "It Is I Who Have Lost Everything", her direct address to an upper-caste woman—"You treated me as a subordinate and humiliated me"—gives poetic embodiment to Kimberlé Crenshaw's theory of intersecting oppressions. In "I Am Wearing a Menstrual Cloth", the naming of historical victims—Alisamma, Muthavva and Mahadevamma—is an outstanding example of testimonial poetry.

M. Gauri's "Henna-Stained Hands" is among the highest poetic achievements of Telugu Dalit verse. Successively challenging three mythological representations of Krishna—the destroyer of illusion, the lover of cowherd girls and the flute-player—the woman leatherworker transforms her bloodstained hands into henna. The whole Dalit paradox of auspiciousness and inauspiciousness is contained in this single title. In the final image —"When my hide is washed with laburnum … it becomes a drum, resounding with pure music"—Julia Kristeva's theory of abjection undergoes a poetic refutation.

Madduri Vijayashri's "Alisamma's Curse" makes one of the boldest poetic decisions in its parallel treatment of mythology and history, bringing the mutilation of Shurpanakha's nose and Alisamma's stripping into the same line. The final curse—"I curse you all to become human"—transforms Frantz Fanon's account of the colonised and the coloniser's search for humanity into a poetic imprecation.

The Gujarati Poetic Tradition

Anish Garange's "Poster" is an excellent example of urban realism. "These posters with rough faces are like mirrors to me": this circular structure, and its negative use of Jacques Lacan's theory of the mirror stage, reveal the distorted mirror of the Dalit urban experience.

Rajendra Vadel 'Jita"s "Intercourse"—"If a son is born, name him Bharat; if a daughter, Bharati"—is a particularly explosive poetic moment, connecting the history of caste and sexual violence with nation-building.

Umesh Solanki's two poems employ different strategies. "People, Freeze" is founded upon one extended metaphor of freezing, entering into a poetic dialogue with Marx's conception of the strike. "The Rebuke of a Coarse Brush" addresses Gandhi directly and satirically, offering poetic testimony to the contradiction between Gandhism and Dalit reality, while giving poetic form to Ambedkar's critique of Gandhi.

The Odia Poetic Tradition

Basudev Sunani's three poetic sections—"Much Still Remains to Happen", "Address" and "Sadananda"—show the philosophical and mystical dimensions of Odia Dalit poetry. Drops, seeds, fish and the sea: these images drawn from nature establish a poetic terrain fundamentally different from the concrete urban realism of the Telugu and Gujarati poems.

"Sadananda", in which a farmer understood something "incorrectly" yet his "misunderstanding" contained a political truth, is an outstanding poetic example of subaltern epistemology.

2. Prose: Short Stories and the Novel

"The Crow" and "Black Ink"

The two short stories reveal different dimensions of the Dalit prose tradition.

Kolakaluri Enoch's "The Crow"—the story of Bandodu, the crows and Avva's family—explores the moral complexities of a triangular relationship of power. In the paradox "Freedom is only a curse" lies one of the deepest truths of the Dalit social order. Bandodu, at the lowest level even within the Dalit community, becomes indispensable because of his one expertise—killing crows: a narrative enactment of Michel Foucault's relationship between power and knowledge.

Vinodini's "Black Ink"—"I write what I like in blue ink, and what I dislike in black ink"—constructs a striking metaphor that organises the whole story. The child Shriya is at once innocent, affectionate and conditioned by caste, providing a remarkably subtle portrayal of caste socialisation in child psychology. The final image—"All the dried butterflies in the room became caterpillars crawling over me"—condenses the story's meaning.

"A Friend Forever" (Jigiri)

Peddinti Ashok Kumar's novel is the epic summit of the entire project.

The friendship between Imam and Shadul—between a human being and a bear—enacts Albert Camus's notion of solidarity in a Dalit-Adivasi context. Both are "abjected and excluded": Imam as a nomadic man of a marginalised caste, Shadul as a wild and supposedly impure animal. On the basis of that shared marginality, a solidarity of the margins takes shape.

"Imam's hand was trembling as he offered the jaggery": this Judas moment, a moment of betrayal, is the novel's most moving point. Dostoevsky's conception of moral guilt is embodied here: Imam kills Shadul, yet spiritually dies himself.

"The forest was silent": a superlative use of Hemingway's iceberg principle. What remains unsaid—Imam's lament, Shadul's suffering—is more eloquent in silence.

Part Two: The Videha Parallel Literary Movement and the Translation of Dalit Literature

3. Videha's Parallel Literary Movement: An Introduction

Videha (videha.co.in; ISSN 2229-547X) is Maithili's first fortnightly electronic journal, founded by Gajendra Thakur around the year 2000. The outlook of this journal and its associated Parallel Literary Movement is clearly defined:

A parallel current distinct from the established Maithili literary tradition recognised by the Sahitya Akademi, one that places folk, Dalit and women's literary voices at the centre.

The recognised mainstream literary tradition of Maithili has historically been centred on Brahmins and Kayasthas, from Vidyapati and Chanda Jha to the modern period. Only now has the parallel current initiated discussion of a non-Brahmin Vidyapati [predating Jyotirishwar]. [Appendix 2: A Critical Evaluation of Vidyapati's "Bidesiya".] Dalit voices have been negligible within the accepted literary tradition. Videha represents a conscious resistance to exclusion from that tradition.

4. The Three Pillars of the Translation Project

First Pillar: Building Linguistic Bridges

Bringing Dalit literature from Telugu, Gujarati and Odia—three distinct linguistic and cultural regions—into Maithili constitutes the building of a multidirectional linguistic bridge.

The chain of translation was often double or triple:

Telugu → English (Purushottam K., P. Jayalakshmi) → Maithili (Gajendra Thakur).

Gujarati → English (Hemang Desai) → Maithili (Gajendra Thakur).

Odia → English (Sailen Routre) → Maithili (Gajendra Thakur).

Some poetic loss in such mediated, indirect translation was inevitable. Yet the cultural and social message was conveyed successfully, for the force of an idea in Dalit literature often exceeds that of its linguistic medium.

Second Pillar: Creating Cultural Solidarity

Walter Benjamin calls the translator a "cultural ambassador". Within this project translation is not merely literary; it is an act of political solidarity.

Alisamma from Telugu literature, Garange's "rough face" from Gujarat, and Sadananda's famine from Odia literature all tell the Maithili reader that Dalit oppression is not a regional but a national problem. The lived realities of the Musahars, Dusadhs and Chamars of Mithila are not fundamentally different from the lives of Dalits in Andhra, Gujarat and Odisha.

Third Pillar: Intervention in the Established Literary Canon

The most important literary-political task of this translation project is to intervene in Maithili's established literary canon.

What Shahid Amin and Gyanendra Pandey have done in history through subaltern studies, Videha does in literature: it brings voices excluded from the established canon into the centre of literary debate.

Sahitya Akademi Award-winning works in Maithili and Dalit translations published in Videha constitute two parallel traditions within the same language. Videha contends that acknowledging this parallelism will make Maithili literature more complete.

5. The Historical Absence of Dalit Voices in Maithili

Dalits in the Established Maithili Tradition

Dalit life is absent from Vidyapati's erotic poetry, regarded as the highest benchmark of Maithili literature: it is a poetry of upper-caste aesthetics. Yet it is present in his "Bidesiya", "Pia Deshantar". Modern Maithili writers—Harimohan Jha and Rajkamal Chaudhary—also wrote from a Brahmin-Kayastha perspective, within which Dalit reality remained peripheral.

An independent tradition of "Dalit literature" did not become established in Maithili as it did in Marathi with Namdeo Dhasal and Daya Pawar, in Telugu with Bhimanna, or in Hindi with Omprakash Valmiki.

One reason was that Dalit communities of Mithila—the Musahars, Dusadhs, Dhobis and Chamars—had historically been denied literacy. They received no real opportunity to establish a written literary tradition. Oral traditions of folk song and storytelling existed, but were never transformed into part of the officially recognised written canon.

Videha's Intervention

In confronting this historical absence, Videha adopted a two-level strategy:

Immediate strategy: translate Dalit literature from other Indian languages and introduce Maithili readers to its language, aesthetic experience and politics.

Long-term strategy: encourage the emergence of Dalit writers in Maithili who, inspired by these translations, would write in their own language out of their own experience.

Frantz Fanon argues in The Wretched of the Earth that colonised literature develops in three stages: first, imitation in the coloniser's language; second, the search for one's cultural roots; and third, the creation of a people's literature. For Maithili Dalit literature, Videha's translation project is a parallel effort belonging to that second phase, the "search for one's roots".

6. Translation Policy: Theory and Practice

Preserving Indigenous Words

The most consequential translation decision in this project was to preserve indigenous terms as they stood.

"Landa", "Avva", "Mankenapuvvu", "Alisamma", "Jigiri", "Bandodu", "Jaji" and "Ippa" were not translated into Maithili but simply transliterated. Lawrence Venuti's strategy of foreignisation, through which the foreignness of the original is retained, is applied here deliberately.

Maithili readers consequently receive two messages simultaneously: first, this culture differs from yours (foreignness); second, its reality is not fundamentally different from yours (solidarity). This is cultural translation at its best.

Linguistic Plurality

In "Jigiri", the Urdu-inflected Telugu of Telangana—"Abba", "Ammi", "Allah", "Ta'wiz" and "Kalandar"—was retained in Urdu forms in Maithili too, preserving the narrative's linguistic texture. The choice contains an implicit political statement: the cultural and linguistic identity of the Muslim Kalandar community has an equal right to recognition within literary norms.

Glossary and Appendices

The translation of "Jigiri" includes an extensive glossary and appendices, along with the Kalandar community's social and political history. Such supporting apparatus gives the translation documentary as well as literary value.

Part Three: New Principles of Dalit Poetics

7. New Principles of Poetics Introduced into Maithili

This project has introduced several new principles of poetics into Maithili literature, fundamentally different from traditional Maithili poetics. My (Gajendra Thakur's) framework of Maithili literary criticism has made a criticism of Dalit literature possible.

A Review of Dalit Literature Translated into Maithili from the Perspective of Indian Rasa Theory

Introduction: The Question of an Encounter Between Rasa and Dalit Literature

At the centre of Indian literary theory stands the theory of rasa. From Bharata Muni to Abhinavagupta, the theory developed through an emphasis on literary relish. Rasa arises from a stable emotion (sthāyibhāva): śṛṅgāra (erotic love), hāsya (humour), karuṇa (pathos), raudra (fury), vīra (heroism), bhayānaka (terror), bībhatsa (disgust), adbhuta (wonder) and śānta (tranquillity). The question is: where does Dalit literature, which presents itself as a record of suffering and anger, find a place among these categories? Can the stable emotions underlying bībhatsa (revulsion) and raudra (anger) culminate in rasa? This collection of Dalit literature translated from Telugu, Gujarati and Odia into Maithili raises that question sharply. The present review will assess the works through the framework of Indian rasa theory, examine combinations of vibhāva (determinants), anubhāva (consequent expressions) and vyabhicāribhāva (transitory emotions), and ask whether these works can become an experience of aesthetic relish for the sensitive reader, the sahṛdaya.

Chapter One: The Reversal of Śṛṅgāra—Dalit Voices of Love, Separation and the Body

Classical śṛṅgāra rasa rests upon the stable emotion called rati, erotic attachment. It generates rasa in the experiences of love, union and separation alike. In Dalit literature, however, śṛṅgāra assumes a different form. J. Subhadra's poem "The Hem of a Sari" reverses traditional symbols of the female body, labour and erotic beauty.

"The hem of my sari, clinging to my hunger, hangs over my belly, like the goddess Maisamma beside the embankment."

Here the vibhāvas of śṛṅgāra—the heroine, beauty and the desire for union—give way to labour, hunger, motherhood and the odour of the body. The sari's hem, classically a symbol of ornamentation, modesty and womanhood, becomes a cloth for wiping sweat, a baby's cradle, a covering for menstrual cloth and a pad for carrying a water vessel. This is a complete transformation of the determinants. The anubhāvas of śṛṅgāra—gestures, smiles and the glance from the corner of the eye—are replaced by expressions mixing bībhatsa (disgust) and karuṇa (compassion): dust clinging to the body, damp menstrual cloth and fingers burned at the hearth.

The Dalit woman's body, then, is not the ornamented body of classical poetics, but a body of labour, livelihood and oppression. In Abhinavagupta's terms, the process of sādhāraṇīkaraṇa, or universalisation, works differently here. Classical śṛṅgāra transforms erotic attachment into a universal experience, whereas the particularity of labour and deprivation in Dalit literature resists universalisation. This refusal of universalisation poses a substantial challenge to rasa theory.

The reversal is still more evident in Challapalli Swaroopa Rani's "Mankenapuvvu" ("Red as the Silk-Cotton Flower"):

"At home, male control slaps one cheek, while in the street, caste control slaps the other."

In place of vipralambha, the separation characteristic of śṛṅgāra, there is the double presence of violence by the caste order and violence by patriarchy. The transitory emotions of bondage, endurance and anger displace the classical associations of Kāma, Rati and separation. The poem's final declaration—"I shall bloom like the mankenapuvvu!"—suggests not the union of śṛṅgāra but an intimation of vīra rasa. This heroism, however, does not belong to the classical world of patrons, kings and warriors: it arises in a Dalit woman's struggle for self-emancipation.

Chapter Two: Raudra and Vīra—The Rasa of Anger, Resistance and Identity

The most powerful voice in Dalit literature is anger. The stable emotion of classical raudra rasa is krodha, anger. According to Abhinavagupta, the vibhāvas of raudra are the causes of anger: outrage, humiliation, falsehood and injustice. Its anubhāvas include reddened eyes, knitted brows, trembling lips and limbs, and the taking up of weapons. Its transitory emotions include agitation, ferocity, impatience, self-reproach and fear.

The full development of raudra is visible in Boyi Bhimanna's poem "My Hereditary Rights":

"Vyasa, the architect of Aryan caste identity, was himself, whatever else he may have been, a man of a low caste. Today he is a caste Hindu, while I, belonging to his caste, am a Dalit without caste—such is the Indian tradition!"

The determinants of anger here are the appropriation of Vedic greatness, exclusion and deprivation. Its consequent expressions are the digging up of a graveyard, the search for ancestral rights and a public declaration. This raudra differs from the classical sphere of slaying demons and asuras. Here the locus of anger is the Dalit community and its object is the historical wrongdoing of upper-caste Hindu society. Anger is directed not towards peace but towards justice.

A question nevertheless arises: can this anger be aesthetically relished as raudra? According to Abhinavagupta, aesthetic distance is necessary for the experience of rasa. In Dalit literature, however, that distance gives way to recognition and identification. The reader does not observe anger from afar, but experiences it from within. This complicates the very possibility of relishing raudra. Is it rasa for the sahṛdaya, or a message? Does it confer pleasure, or discomfort?

Rajendra Vadel 'Jita''s poem "Intercourse" displays a devastating combination of raudra and bībhatsa:

"My soft lips touched your lips and felt the roughness of a higher caste. When your furtive gaze met my moist eyes, the spectre of a rape in broad daylight danced before me."

The determinants of union in śṛṅgāra—soft lips, the touch of lips, moist eyes —are transformed into bībhatsa (rape and revulsion) and raudra (anger). This is a threefold confluence of śṛṅgāra, bībhatsa and raudra. Classical rasa theory acknowledges the presence of a principal rasa and subsidiary rasas in a work. Here, however, the rasas stand in mutual opposition: the conjunction of śṛṅgāra and bībhatsa is rare in classical theory. This conjunction is characteristic of Dalit literature, in which love and violence occupy the same space.

Chapter Three: Karuṇa and Bībhatsa—An Aesthetics of Suffering

The stable emotion of classical karuṇa rasa is śoka, grief. Its determinants include separation from loved ones, curses and catastrophe; its consequent expressions include tears, lamentation, fainting and bodily weakness. The stable emotion of bībhatsa rasa is jugupsā, revulsion. Its determinants include foul odours, blood, flesh, excrement and corpses.

In Dalit literature karuṇa and bībhatsa often move together. This is evident in Kolakaluri Enoch's short story "The Crow" ("Kaki"), about Bandodu, a beggar of a Madiga (leatherworking) subcaste. He kills and eats crows; the crows attack the houses of those who do not give him food. The determinants of bībhatsa in the story are crow flesh, the smell of decay, vomit and bundles of feathers. Its consequent expressions include cawing, pecking, attacks upon the eyes and pain.

Yet this experience of bībhatsa differs from the classical relish of corpses, flesh and blood. Classical bībhatsa is encountered at a distance; here there is no distance. Revulsion is part of the means of subsistence—earnings from leather, lack of food, the struggle between life and death. Why does Bandodu kill crows? Out of hunger. Bībhatsa here signifies helplessness rather than disgust.

"He is the death of crows! In fact, he looks like them. His hair is like a thicket of thorns. If a crow pecks at his head, it will get entangled there and be caught for that day's meal."

Bandodu is not himself an object of bībhatsa; he is its victim. Bībhatsa thus merges with karuṇa. The crows flee at the mere sight of him. Although he occupies the lowest rung of society, he commands power in the world of crows. This reversal—the conflict between power and helplessness—creates a meeting of karuṇa and bībhatsa.

In Vinodini's "Black Ink", karuṇa takes an even more intense form. Eight-year-old Shriya loves the neighbouring auntie who is a Harijan (Dalit); when she learns the woman's caste, the colour of her face changes:

"Are you really a Harijan? Tell me the truth!" All colour slowly drained from the child's face, leaving it grey.

The determinants of karuṇa are the loss of affection, childlike innocence and the horror of the caste order. Its consequent expressions are the change in facial colour, running away and a look of revulsion. Here karuṇa differs from the traditional grief of separation from a child. The separation is not between lovers but between friends; its cause is not divine catastrophe but the poison of caste. This karuṇa approaches raudra but does not become raudra, because of an incapacity to act against what destroys the relationship.

Chapter Four: Śānta and Adbhuta—Liberation, Wonder and Alternative Aesthetics of Resistance

The stable emotion of classical śānta rasa is nirveda (detachment), while that of adbhuta is vismaya (wonder). Their presence in Dalit literature is limited, though not entirely absent.

An intimation of adbhuta appears in the translation of Basudev Sunani's Odia poetry:

"In this sky there is a drop which shines despite being indistinct, and which, having dreamt a sweet dream of the rainbow, has vowed again and again to colour the immense sky."

This is a wonder of resistance: one drop of light among the sowers of darkness, a possibility of creation amid destruction. But it is not the wonder of beholding divine figures in classical literature. It is the wonder of hope, possibility and incompletion. The poet says, "Much still remains to happen." This adbhuta is unfinished, incomplete.

Śānta rasa is almost absent from Dalit literature. Why? The detachment (nirveda) of śānta demands renunciation of the world. Dalit literature is a struggle to obtain a place in the world: land, dignity, rights and identity. Śānta demands repose; Dalit literature belongs to struggle. An apparent exception arises only at the moment of death. At the end of the novel "A Friend Forever", when Imam gives poison to Shadul, an intimation of śānta appears:

"The forest was silent. Imam felt that a part of himself had died with Shadul."

Yet this śānta is not detachment, but grief: karuṇa so intense that it strikes against the boundary of śānta without being transformed into it.

Chapter Five: The Absence of Rasa and New Forms of Rasa

Dalit literature presents its greatest challenge to rasa theory in being a literature of deprivation: deprivation of food, clothing, shelter, respect and rights. Rasa theory is a theory of pleasure. How can pleasure arise from deprivation? This question exposes a limit of the theory.

An aesthetics of deprivation appears in Umesh Solanki's poem "People, Freeze":

"Let the tea freeze in the kettle, let the piece of betel nut turn to stone. Let the vegetables become stone and the fritters become pebbles."

Stone and pebbles are determinants of bībhatsa. Yet here disgust is the reality of existence. Deprivation reaches the point at which food itself turns to stone. This surrealism produces a new form of bībhatsa.

A different form of absence appears in Anish Garange's poem "Poster":

"These posters of rough-faced people are like mirrors to me. ... The posters of missing persons change their faces every day."

Absence here becomes presence. The missing person's poster is a mirror of the Dalit face. This is a determinant of adbhuta: the presence of absence. Yet its wonder does not generate amazement; it generates doubt. There is a face, but no identity; there is a presence, but no existence.

Conclusion: Rethinking Rasa Theory

Dalit literature poses several fundamental questions to rasa theory:

1. Is rasa only pleasure? Abhinavagupta defines rasa in terms of bliss. Dalit literature, however, is not pleasure but a record of truth. Can pain, anger, revulsion and helplessness culminate in rasa? If rasa is pleasure, how can these experiences of non-pleasure turn into pleasure? The question calls for a reconsideration of rasa theory.

2. The limits of universalisation: Rasa theory transforms the particular into the universal. Dalit literature insists upon the particular—the particular body of a Dalit woman, the specific violence of caste, the particular hunger of a leatherworker. Can this particularity be universalised? If so, how? The question requires a re-evaluation of the process of sādhāraṇīkaraṇa.

3. The number of rasas: Classical theory recognises nine rasas (or ten, according to the account attributed here to Abhinavagupta). Dalit literature proposes new forms of rasa: the rasa of labour, of deprivation, of resistance and of identity. Can these be admitted as subsidiary rasas, as subordinate elements, or as new rasas in their own right? The question calls for an expansion of rasa theory.

4. The politics of aesthetic relish: Rasa theory rests upon the idea of the sahṛdaya, a sensitive participant capable of universalisation and aesthetic distance. Can readers of Dalit literature—Dalit or otherwise—maintain such distance? Can suffering be aesthetically relished? If it can, the ethics of that relish becomes a question. Does taking aesthetic pleasure in suffering reproduce oppression? The question brings the politics of aesthetic experience to the fore.

This collection of Maithili translations from Telugu, Gujarati and Odia Dalit literature reveals both the limitations and the possibilities of rasa theory. On one side, the works expose the inadequacy of classical categories: conventional frameworks for raudra, bībhatsa and karuṇa cannot fully explain the aesthetic experience of this literature. On the other side, they suggest the possibility of enlarging rasa theory: labour, deprivation, resistance and identity may become new stable emotions giving rise to new forms of rasa.

Ultimately, the greatest question before this literature is whether it exists for the sahṛdaya's aesthetic relish or for the awakening of the sahṛdaya. If it is relish, what is the character of that relish? If it is awakening, what is the aesthetics of that awakening? These questions remain open before Indian literary theory, and this collection raises them with particular urgency.

A sentence in the translator's note to "Friends Forever" ("Jigiri") reads: "This translation is not merely literary or linguistic; it is conscious that no culture can be separated from its language." The sentence holds true also in relation to rasa theory: no literature can be separated from its theory of aesthetic experience. Dalit literature demands a new rasa theory—one that accepts labour, deprivation, resistance and identity as stable emotions; seeks the possibilities of relish through proximity, not distance; and looks for a way to apprehend the truth of suffering rather than transform suffering into pleasure.

This collection is an important stage in the search for such a new rasa theory.

By applying the traditional framework of Indian rasa theory critically, this review has brought the distinctiveness of Dalit literature into relief. It has not imposed rasa theory dogmatically, but explored its vitality and its capacity for development. Dalit literature does not announce the end of rasa theory; it calls for its rebirth.

Redefining Rasa Theory

In traditional Maithili poetics—that is, the conventional Vidyapati tradition, not the parallel Vidyapati tradition—śṛṅgāra rasa is supreme and śānta rasa leads towards liberation. Raudra rasa, or anger, is invariably subordinate, never principal.

Dalit poetry overturns this hierarchy. The argument advanced by Sharankumar Limbale in Towards an Aesthetic of Dalit Literature—that anger is an aesthetic category, not a fault—enters Maithili literary debate through these translations.

The anger in Bhimanna's "Burning Huts" is not rhetorical display; it is an authentic ethical feeling. That anger demands a new place in rasa theory.

The Democratisation of Poetic Subject Matter

Traditional Maithili poetry, even much of modern poetry, has restricted the subjects considered worthy of verse to love, separation, nature and philosophy. Objects associated with labour—landa, pots, the hem of a sari—have not become the centre of poetry.

Through this project, Maithili readers encounter for the first time a Dalit poetics of material objects, in which the hem of a sari, a bear's hide and a poster are as worthy of poetry as Kalidasa's cloud or Vidyapati's heroine.

A Poetics of Body Politics

In Maithili erotic poetry the body is an object of idealised, poetic beauty. In Dalit poetry it is an object of labour, pain and resistance—what Gopal Guru describes in terms of radical embodied experience. In Subhadra's "Landa", the phrase "even if my intestines come out through my mouth" introduces into Maithili verse a new language of direct bodily realism.

A Poetics of Testimony

The genre of testimony described by Shoshana Felman and Dori Laub in Testimony: Crises of Witnessing in Literature, Psychoanalysis, and History—where the sufferer transforms experience into testimony—enters Maithili for the first time through this translation project.

Subhadra bears witness, Bhimanna interrogates, and Vijayashri pronounces a curse: these are different modes of a poetics of testimony.

Part Four: Concluding Synthesis of the Review

8. Assessing the Project's Achievements

What Has Succeeded Exceptionally Well

The transmission of central ideas: Bhimanna's arguments against received mythology; Shashinirmala's threefold struggle; Solanki's satire of Gandhi; Sunani's sense that something always remains; and Imam and Shadul's friendship—all are fully present in Maithili.

The preservation of indigenous symbolism: the original force of the goddess Maisamma, the laburnum, mankenapuvvu, landa and jigiri survives in Maithili.

The transmission of emotional intensity: the Maithili reader too can experience Imam's trembling hand, Vijayashri's curse, and the change of Shriya's smiling butterflies into caterpillars.

Limitations and Incompleteness

Partial loss of phonetic beauty: Telugu, Gujarati and Odia have their own musicality, weakened as the works pass through English into Maithili. The beauty of the Odia pronunciation of “Panchajanya” and “Vasuki”, for instance, is not natural to Maithili.

The absence of women translators: Works by Subhadra, Shashinirmala, Gauri and Vinodini, centred upon women's bodily experience, might have achieved greater authenticity if translated by women.

The lack of direct translation from the original languages: Direct translation from Telugu or Gujarati into Maithili could have avoided losses caused by the intermediary language.

Limits of urban vocabulary: Maithili comes predominantly from a rural-poetic tradition. Modern urban references in the Gujarati poems—“pay-and-use toilets” and the “obscene hood of a rickshaw”—can sound discordant in Maithili.

9. A Comparative Map of Poetics

The comparative map of Dalit poetry in the three languages is as follows:

Telugu: the body, labour, history, the rereading of mythology and dialogue within feminism—the most varied tradition.

Gujarati: urban realism, criticism of Gandhi and criticism of nation-building—a political-historical tradition.

Odia: philosophical mysticism, the perspective of the farmer and subaltern epistemology—an existential-philosophical tradition.

Together they offer a three-dimensional picture of Dalit experience: from outside to inside, from history to the present, from suffering to rebellion.

10. Possible Long-Term Effects on Maithili Literature

The long-term significance of this project lies not in the translations alone but in the inspiration and standards they may establish.

The emergence of Dalit writers in Maithili: When members of Mithila's Dalit communities—Musahars, Dusadhs, Chamars and Dhobis—encounter the language, craft and politics of Dalit literature in Maithili, and understand that their own lived realities can be expressed in literature, writing from their own experience will become possible.

Resistance to the pressure of the Sahitya Akademi-recognised canon: Videha's Dalit translations present an alternative standard to the canon recognised by the Maithili Sahitya Akademi establishment. They enlarge the definition of literature considered "worthy" of canonical acceptance.

The entry of other Indian Dalit traditions into Maithili: Marathi Dalit poetry (Namdeo Dhasal and Daya Pawar), Bengali Dalit literature and Punjabi Dalit poetry could, through an expansion of the project, bring the full pan-Indian Dalit literary tradition into Maithili.

Final Conclusion: A Civilisational Project

In "The Transformation of Silence into Language and Action", Audre Lorde writes, "Poetry is not a luxury; it is a vital necessity of our existence." This is literally true of Dalit poetry.

Seen as a whole, Videha's Dalit-literature translation project works simultaneously on five levels:

Linguistic: building bridges between Telugu, Gujarati, Odia and Maithili.

Literary: introducing Dalit voices into the recognised Maithili canon, together with new principles of poetics.

Cultural: preserving the cultural memories of distinct Dalit communities—the bear dances of the Kalandars, the leatherworkers' knowledge of landa, and the hem of the Dalit woman's sari.

Political: revealing to Maithili readers the pan-Indian reality of Dalit oppression, with the message that Dalits in Mithila and Andhra share a common fate.

Historical: sowing the seeds of a Maithili Dalit literary tradition—not in Videha's translations themselves, but in the future writing in Maithili that those translations may inspire.

Basudev Sunani's words provide an apt closing voice for the whole project:

"Here a seed has vowed to germinate—with the desire to make everything green."

That seed has been sown.

The soil in which it has been sown is the soil of Mithila. The seed is one of truth, justice, human dignity and the Dalit voice.

And the tree that grows will be the tree of Maithili Dalit literature, its roots in Mithila's soil, its branches in the thought of Ambedkar and Bhimanna, and its leaves green with the energy of Videha's Parallel Literary Movement.

Appendix 1: A Theory of Criticism for Original and Translated Dalit Prose and Poetry in Maithili

Introduction: The Need for a Theory of Criticism

Literary criticism in any language requires a coherent theoretical framework. The history of Maithili literary criticism reveals the influence both of traditional Indian theories (rasa, alaṅkāra, dhvani, rīti and aucitya) and, in modern times, of Western theories (Marxism, feminism, postmodernism and postcolonial theory). Yet attempts to employ these theories in an integrated manner have remained limited, particularly in fields such as Dalit literature, women's literature and translated literature.

The purpose of the present theory of criticism is to offer a systematic framework for evaluating original and translated Maithili prose and poetry through a synthesis of Indian and Western literary theories. This theory is neither wholly Indian nor wholly Western: it is a third path, shaped through dialogue between the two. It places the distinctive qualities of Maithili literature—its language, culture and regional identity—at its centre while engaging with developments in theory across the world.

Chapter One: The Fundamental Elements of a Theory of Criticism

1.1 Reconciling the Local and the Universal

The first challenge for any theory of criticism is to respect the particularity of local, here Maithili, literature while remaining in dialogue with universal, Indian or global literary standards. The distinctive characteristics of Maithili literature are as follows:

— The identity of a regional language: Maithili is one of the thirty-nine languages of India and possesses a literary tradition extending over a thousand years, from Vidyapati to the present.

— The meeting of folk tradition and śāstra: Maithili literature bears the deep imprint of traditions such as Bidāpat Nāch, sohar, samdaunī and pagrī.

— The experience of migration: displacement and migration among Maithili speakers are central themes in Dalit literature, women's literature and translated literature.

Keeping these particularities at its centre, this theory emphasises a dialogue between the local and the universal. In other words, the evaluation of Maithili literature should draw both on Indian theories (rasa, dhvani, vakrokti) and Western theories (postcolonialism, feminism, postmodernism), but should apply them with reference to Maithili literature's local context.

1.2 The Parity and Differences of Original and Translated Literature

This theory of criticism accepts no hierarchy between original and translated literature. Both are equally important, for the following reasons:

— Literature translated into Maithili, as in the present collection of Dalit writing from Telugu, Gujarati and Odia, enlarges the scope of Maithili literature.

— Translation makes room for the voice of another within Maithili literature, an indispensable condition of the multilingual character of Indian literature.

— Nevertheless, the evaluation of translation requires criteria particular to the practice: moving beyond the old opposition between fidelity and freedom, criticism must attend to the translator's creativity.

1.3 The Distinction Between Prose and Verse

This theory recognises an explicit distinction between prose and verse:

— For verse, Indian theories of rasa, dhvani, alaṅkāra and metre are more useful, because the compression, rhythm and symbolism of poetry lend themselves to such approaches.

— For prose—short stories, novels, plays and essays—Western approaches such as Marxism, feminism and postcolonial theory are more useful, because prose depends more heavily on expansiveness, character development and sociopolitical contexts.

— This division, however, is not absolute. A critic may combine the two traditions according to his or her judgement.

Chapter Two: Applying Indian Theories

2.1 Rasa Theory

Rasa theory stands at the centre of Indian poetics. The present theory will employ it in the following ways:

(a) New forms of rasa. The classical nine rasas—śṛṅgāra (love), hāsya (laughter), karuṇa (compassion), raudra (fury), vīra (heroism), bhayānaka (terror), bībhatsa (disgust), adbhuta (wonder) and śānta (tranquillity)—are found in Maithili literature, but their configurations differ. In Dalit literature, for instance, the bearer of raudra is not a king or warrior but the Dalit community; and the determinants of śṛṅgāra are not lovers but the labouring body.

(b) Extending the stable emotions. This theory recognises new sthāyibhāvas, or enduring emotional dispositions: labour, deprivation, resistance, identity and migration. These are distinctive experiences of Maithili literature, and they may be transformed into rasa.

(c) Reconsidering universalisation. Classical rasa theory emphasises sādhāraṇīkaraṇa, or universalisation. But Dalit, women's and migrant literatures require that particularity be respected. To address the tension between universalisation and specificity, this theory proposes the 'particular-universal': the task is not to turn a particular experience into a supposedly universal one but to establish the universal significance of what remains particular.

2.2 Dhvani Theory (Ānandavardhana)

Dhvani theory gives primacy to vyaṅgya, the suggested or implied meaning. In Maithili literary criticism it can be applied as follows:

(a) Levels of meaning. From Vidyapati to the present, Maithili poetry relies heavily on implication. The critic must distinguish abhidhā (literal meaning), lakṣaṇā (secondary or figurative meaning) and vyañjanā (suggestion).

(b) Dhvani and translation. The translation of suggested meaning is one of the greatest challenges in translated literature. This theory holds that the translator should preserve such meaning wherever possible, but should accept creative translation where literal preservation cannot work.

2.3 Alaṅkāra Theory

Figures of speech—simile, metaphor, imaginative supposition and others—form an integral part of Indian aesthetics. Within this theory:

(a) The social life of figurative language. In Maithili Dalit literature, figures of speech are used not merely as ornament but as instruments of resistance. For example, the comparison with the goddess Maisamma in the poem on the hem of a sari reverses the conventions of the upper-caste Hindu goddess tradition.

(b) Folk figures. Maithili literature possesses its own tradition of folk figurative expression, including sayings, idioms and proverbs. These deserve the same critical value as classical figures of speech.

2.4 Rīti Theory (Vāmana)

Rīti theory emphasises style. In Maithili literature:

(a) Maithili's stylistic particularity. The sweetness, delicacy and fluency of the Maithili language are stylistic qualities that criticism must take into account.

(b) Style in translation. In translated literature, the balance between the style of the original and that of the target text is an important matter for criticism.

Chapter Three: Applying Western Theories

3.1 Postcolonial Theory

Postcolonial theory—associated with Edward Said, Gayatri Chakravorty Spivak, Homi K. Bhabha and Dipesh Chakrabarty—is particularly useful in Maithili literary criticism, for the following reasons:

(a) Colonial language policy. Maithili has for centuries lived under the influence of languages of domination—Sanskrit, Persian, Urdu, English and Hindi. The theory therefore asks: How does Maithili literature confront this colonial pressure? What forms do resistance and accommodation take?

(b) The subaltern voice. Gayatri Chakravorty Spivak's question, 'Can the subaltern speak?', is fundamental to the criticism of Maithili Dalit, women's and migrant literature. How are the voices of subaltern groups—Dalits, women, migrants and Adivasis—represented? Are those voices free from mediation? If not, does mediation empower them, or does it reproduce their subordination?

(b) Provincialisation. Dipesh Chakrabarty's concept of provincialisation ('provincialising Europe') is pertinent to Maithili literary criticism. Resisting the tendency to confine Maithili literature to the category of the merely 'regional', this theory seeks to establish its global significance.

3.2 Feminist Theory

Feminist theory—Virginia Woolf, Simone de Beauvoir and Judith Butler—is essential to analysing women's experience, bodies, voices and resistance in Maithili literature.

(a) Analysing women's writing. The presence of women writers in Maithili literature is increasing, as with Usha Kiran Khan, Subhadra Jha and others. How, this theory asks, does the voice of a woman writer differ from a female character created by a male writer?

(b) The politics of the body. The representation of the female body is a central issue in Maithili literature. Feminist criticism can ask whether that body is an ornament of śṛṅgāra or a record of labour; an object of desire or a site of resistance.

(c) Intersectionality, or interrelated forms of oppression. Dalit feminism, represented here by writers such as Shaila Devi and Bima Bhim, analyses the double oppression of caste and gender. This theory therefore centres intersectionality: women's experiences in Maithili literature must be understood at the intersection of caste, class, region and religion.

3.3 Marxist Theory

Marxist theory—Karl Marx, Georg Lukács and Antonio Gramsci—is useful for analysing class conflict, economic foundations and ideology in literature.

(a) Class struggle. Conflicts between landlords and peasants, workers and employers, and upper castes and Dalits are central to Maithili literature. Marxist theory analyses the economic foundation of these conflicts.

(b) Hegemony. Gramsci's concept of hegemony helps to analyse the cultural forms of upper-caste dominance in Maithili literature. The process by which Vidyapati is declared a Brahmin, for example, is an operation of hegemony.

(c) Market capitalism. Translated literature, especially translations of Dalit literature, is increasingly exposed to pressures from the market and publishing industry. Marxist criticism examines this political-economic context.

3.4 Postmodernism and Poststructuralism

Postmodernism, associated with Jean-François Lyotard, and poststructuralism, associated with Jacques Derrida and Michel Foucault, emphasise the instability of concepts such as truth, identity, authorship and history.

(a) The instability of identity. In Maithili literature, 'Maithil' identity—linguistic, cultural and regional—is not natural but constructed. Postmodern criticism examines the processes of its construction.

(b) The death of the author. Derrida's notion of the 'death of the author' is especially pertinent to criticism of translated literature. Translation blurs the boundary between the original author and the translator. This theory proposes reconsidering authorship in the context of the translation process.

(c) The fragmentation of history. Foucault's archaeology of history provides a means for critically rereading the historiography of Maithili literature. The history of the construction of Vidyapati's caste identity, for example, calls for a political analysis of historical writing.

Chapter Four: A Practical Framework for Criticism

4.1 Levels of Critical Analysis

This theory proposes five levels for analysing a literary work:

First level: Linguistic analysis

— Analysis of style, rhythm, vocabulary and grammatical particularities in Maithili.

— Analysis of similarities and differences between the source language and target language in translated writing.

Second level: Stylistic analysis

— Applying Indian theories: rīti, alaṅkāra, guṇa and doṣa.

— Applying Western theories: stylistics, narrative technique, imagery and symbolism.

Third level: Rasa-dhvani analysis

— Identifying the work's sthāyibhāva, or enduring emotional disposition.

— Analysing vibhāva, anubhāva and vyabhicāribhāva: the determinants, expressive consequences and transitory emotions.

— Identifying and analysing levels of suggested meaning.

— Evaluating the process through which rasa is realised.

Fourth level: Sociopolitical analysis

— Marxist theory: class struggle, economic foundations and ideology.

— Feminist theory: gender politics, body politics and intersectionality.

— Postcolonial theory: subaltern voices, provincialisation and the politics of translation.

Fifth level: Analysis of aesthetic reception

— The experience of savouring a work from the standpoint of the sahṛdaya, or responsive reader.

— The dialectic of distance and proximity.

— The ethics of taking aesthetic pleasure in another's suffering.

4.2 Genre-Specific Analysis

(a) For poetry:

— Analysis of metre, rhythm, end rhyme and other rhythmic patterning, with greater use of Indian theories.

— Analysis of images, symbols and metaphors through Western approaches.

— Identification of levels of suggestion (dhvani).

(b) For short stories and novels:

— Narrative technique: omniscient narration, first-person narration and multiple narrators.

— Character development: round or multidimensional characters, flat or one-dimensional characters, and existential characters.

— Plot: linear, cyclical or fragmented structures and stream of consciousness.

— Temporal structure: chronology, nonchronological ordering, flashback and foreshadowing.

(c) For drama:

— Theatricality: acting, instruments, dialogue and the relationship with the audience.

— Indian dramaturgical theory: vṛtti, pravṛtti, puruṣa-prakṛti and classifications of heroes and heroines.

— Western dramatic theory: epic theatre (Brecht), theatre of the absurd (Beckett and Ionesco) and feminist theatre.

(d) For translated literature:

— Degrees of equivalence between source and target languages.

— Translating suggestion: loss or preservation of dhvani.

— Cultural translation: presenting the local within a global context.

— The translator's creativity: balancing fidelity and freedom.

4.3 Categories Specific to Maithili Literature

This theory recognises the following categories distinctive to Maithili literature:

(a) Folk literature. Bidāpat Nāch, sohar, samdaunī, pagrī, wedding songs, Chaurā-Chaurī and jhūmar call for the development of a folk aesthetics appropriate to their analysis.

(b) Dalit literature. Maithili Dalit literature is relatively new but growing rapidly. Its evaluation requires a Dalit aesthetics concerned with pain, outrage, resistance, identity and struggle.

(c) Women's literature. Feminist aesthetics is needed to examine the representation of the female body, the home and the outside world, maternity, desire and resistance in Maithili women's writing.

(d) Migrant literature. Maithili writing produced in Delhi, Mumbai, Kolkata and countries of migration requires a diasporic aesthetics of multiple identities, hybridity and uprooting.

Chapter Five: An Illustrative Application of the Theory

5.1 Example: A Review of the Present Anthology

The present anthology of Dalit literature translated into Maithili may be analysed at the following levels:

First level: Linguistic analysis

— How are the rhythms, vocabularies and idioms of the original Telugu, Gujarati and Odia languages represented in the Maithili translations?

— How have Urdu words present in the Telangana dialect of Telugu been localised in Maithili translation?

Second level: Stylistic analysis

— How do poetic images such as the burning skull, the hem of a sari and mankenapuvvu help to construct a Dalit aesthetics?

— What narrative techniques—realist, symbolic or allegorical—are used in the short stories 'The Crow' and 'Black Ink'?

Third level: Rasa-dhvani analysis

— Identify the enduring emotional dispositions associated with raudra, bībhatsa and karuṇa.

— Examine the reversal of śṛṅgāra, in which the labouring or deprived body is presented within an erotic-aesthetic framework.

— Examine levels of suggestion in the burning skull: Dalit identity, the politics of religion and the irony of rebirth.

Fourth level: Sociopolitical analysis

— Class struggle: the opposition of landlord and peasant, capital and labour.

— Caste politics: conflict between upper castes and Dalits, untouchability and caste violence.

— Gender politics: patriarchy, oppression of women's bodies and the double oppression of Dalit women.

— Subaltern voices: representations of marginalised groups such as the Madiga leatherworkers, Bandodu and the Kalandars who perform with bears.

Fifth level: Analysis of aesthetic reception

— The aesthetic experience of suffering: Can a reader take aesthetic pleasure in Dalit suffering? If so, what are the ethics of such an experience?

— Distance and proximity: Do Dalit and non-Dalit readers experience the work differently?

— The realisation of rasa: Is rasa realised in this literature, or does the literature collide with the limits of rasa itself?

Chapter Six: Limits and Possibilities of the Theory of Criticism

6.1 Limitations

No theory is complete. The present theory has the following limitations:

(a) The difficulty of synthesis. Indian and Western theories differ in terminology, concepts and philosophy; bringing them together inevitably creates tensions. Rather than suppress those tensions, this theory proposes to employ them creatively.

(b) The diversity of Maithili literature. From Vidyapati to the present, Maithili literature is extraordinarily varied: epics, lyric collections, folk theatre, modern poetry, novels, short stories, Dalit writing, women's writing and diasporic writing. It would be improper to claim that a single theory could fully explain every genre. This theory accordingly stresses flexibility: critics should exercise judgement in applying it.

(c) The particularity of translation. Reviewing translated literature requires knowledge of both the original and the translation. Not every critic, however, is multilingual. This theory recognises the limits of translation criticism and explores the possibility of collaborative criticism.

6.2 Possibilities

(a) Interdisciplinarity. This theory connects literature to history, sociology, political science, philosophy and linguistics. Its interdisciplinary perspective opens up the possibility of multidimensional analysis of Maithili literature.

(b) Comparative literature. It opens up possibilities for comparing Maithili literature with other Indian literatures—Telugu, Gujarati, Odia, Bengali and Hindi—and with world literature.

(c) Translation studies. It establishes translation not as a secondary undertaking but as a creative literary practice, thereby offering scope for the development of translation criticism.

(d) The localisation of theory. It proposes both the adoption and the critique of Western theories: using postcolonial thought, for example, while also criticising Eurocentric tendencies.

Conclusion: The Future of a Theory of Criticism

This theory attempts to bring Indian and Western approaches into dialogue, but their synthesis is not free of contradictions. Such contradictions are a strength rather than a weakness, because they acknowledge literature's complexity instead of trying to simplify it.

Maithili literature—with its thousand-year history, the meeting of folk and learned traditions, the experience of migration and the emergence of Dalit and women's voices—needs a theory of criticism that puts the local at the centre while engaging with the global. The present theory attempts to answer that need.

It makes no claim to final truth; it is a point of departure. It opens new doors for Maithili criticism, enabling dialogue between rasa and pain, dhvani and resistance, figurative language and hybridity, tranquillity and struggle.

The critic's final observation: A theory of criticism remains alive only when it continues to evolve, ask questions and encounter new literary experience. This theory is an invitation to that development. Future criticism of Maithili literature will continue to respond to the invitation.

Appendix: A Concise Outline of the Theory of Criticism

Level of analysis	Indian theory	Western theory	Maithili specificity
Linguistic	Powers of words; grammar	Stylistics; linguistics	Maithili pronunciation; idioms
Stylistic	Rīti; figures of speech; merits and faults	Narratology; imagery; symbolism	Folk figures of speech; proverbs
Rasa and dhvani	Rasa; dhvani; suggested meaning	Phenomenology; hermeneutics	Dalit rasa; the rasa of migration
Social	—	Marxism; feminism; postcolonialism	Caste; gender; class; migration
Aesthetic reception	Sahṛdaya; cultivated responsiveness	Reception theory; reader-response criticism	Dalit and non-Dalit readers

This outline offers the critic flexibility—the freedom to select levels and theories in accordance with critical judgement.

A Theory of Criticism for Dalit Literature: A Specialised Framework for Original and Translated Dalit Prose and Poetry in Maithili, Based on Indian and Western Literary Theories

Introduction: The Particular Need for Criticism of Dalit Literature

Dalit literature is not merely a literary genre; it is a movement, a manifesto of resistance. It places pain, outrage, identity and struggle at its centre. General literary theories are therefore insufficient for its criticism. What is required is a specialised critical theory that recognises the particularity of Dalit literature, understands its politics and brings its aesthetics into dialogue with the tradition of rasa theory.

Bringing together Indian theories (rasa, dhvani, alaṅkāra, rīti and aucitya) and Western theories (Marxism, feminism, postcolonialism, Dalit movement theory and postmodernism), the present theory offers a finely adjusted framework for reviewing original and translated Dalit prose and poetry in Maithili.

Chapter One: The Distinctive Character of Dalit Literature—Theoretical Foundations

1.1 The Fundamental Elements of Dalit Aesthetics

The aesthetics of Dalit literature differs fundamentally from classical aesthetics. Classical aesthetics, with its theories of rasa, figures of speech and suggestion, is centred on the aesthetic experience of the sahṛdaya, the responsive reader. Dalit aesthetics centres the authenticity of Dalit experience. This theory recognises the following concepts specific to Dalit literature:

(a) Pain as a stable emotion. In classical rasa theory, the sthāyibhāva of karuṇa is sorrow. In Dalit literature, however, it is not simply sorrow but pain—physical, psychological, social and historical—that pervades every level. This theory recognises pain as a stable emotion and examines the possibility of its transformation into rasa.

(b) Outrage as an extension of raudra. Classical raudra, the rasa of fierce anger, has anger as its stable emotion and is conventionally located in kings and warriors, the slayers of demons. In Dalit literature the bearer of outrage is the Dalit community and its object is the caste system. This theory recognises outrage both as an extension of raudra and as a new form of it.

(c) Identity as a new form of vīra. Classical vīra has heroic energy as its stable emotion and is associated with kings, Kshatriyas and warriors. The energy of Dalit identity lies in the reconstruction and reclamation of Dalit selfhood. The present theory recognises identity as a new form of vīra.

(d) Struggle as a new form of rasa. Labour, deprivation, resistance and migration do not fit directly into the classical categories of rasa. This theory recognises them as new enduring emotional dispositions and explores their possible aesthetic transformations: the rasas of labour, deprivation, resistance and migration.

1.2 The Sociopolitical Foundations of Dalit Literature

(a) The centrality of caste. For the criticism of Dalit literature, caste is a central analytical category. Class, gender and region are all important, but caste forms the primary structure of Dalit literature.

(b) The experience of untouchability. Untouchability is not merely social. It operates at psychological, bodily and spiritual levels and is a central element of Dalit experience. Dalit literary criticism must develop an aesthetics of untouchability.

(c) The politics of exclusion. Dalit literature documents exclusion from education, religion, society, history and literature. Its criticism must analyse the structures of that exclusion and the strategies of resistance to it.

(d) Rewriting Dalit history. Dalit literature attempts to rewrite history in opposition to upper-caste historiography, reconstructing it from a Dalit perspective. Its criticism must analyse the politics of that historiographical enterprise.

Chapter Two: Fine-Tuning Indian Theories for Dalit Literature

2.1 A Dalit Rereading of Rasa Theory

(a) A Proposal for the Rasa of Pain

In classical rasa theory, pain is only an anubhāva, an expressive consequence, of karuṇa rather than a stable emotion in its own right. Drawing on the experience of Dalit literature, this theory recognises pain as a sthāyibhāva:

— Stable emotion (sthāyibhāva): pain.

— Determinants (vibhāva): caste violence, untouchability, hunger, unemployment, migration, exploitation, humiliation and exclusion.

— Expressive consequences (anubhāva): tears, lamentation, bodily pain, silence, anger, resistance, isolation and suicide.

— Transitory emotions (vyabhicāribhāva): despair, hope, anger, fear, disgust, shame, pride and enthusiasm.

— Resultant aesthetic experience: the rasa of pain.

(b) A Proposal for the Rasa of Outrage

Classical raudra cannot completely explain the outrage expressed in Dalit literature: the conventional bearer of raudra is the king or warrior, whereas the bearer of Dalit outrage is the Dalit community. This theory therefore proposes a rasa of outrage:

— Stable emotion: outrage.

— Determinants: caste humiliation, exploitation, oppression, denial of justice and historical injustice.

— Expressive consequences: outcry, songs of resistance, movements of struggle, revolution through writing and personal testimony.

— Transitory emotions: anger, disgust, enthusiasm, courage, fear, hope and despair.

— Resultant aesthetic experience: the rasa of outrage.

(c) A Proposal for the Rasa of Identity

Classical vīra cannot fully account for the identity asserted by Dalit literature, because its conventional bearer is the Kshatriya warrior, whereas Dalit identity belongs to the Dalit renaissance. This theory proposes a rasa of identity:

— Stable emotion: identity or selfhood.

— Determinants: rediscovery of Dalit history, reinstatement of Dalit symbols and reconstruction of Dalit language.

— Expressive consequences: pride, self-confidence, courage, struggle, unity and organisation.

— Transitory emotions: enthusiasm, pride, anger, hope, despair and resolve.

— Resultant aesthetic experience: the rasa of identity.

(d) A Proposal for the Rasa of Struggle

Labour, deprivation, resistance and migration are central experiences—enduring emotional dispositions—in Dalit literature. This theory proposes a rasa of struggle:

— Stable emotion: struggle.

— Determinants: labour, deprivation, resistance, migration and the struggle for livelihood.

— Expressive consequences: work songs, songs of resistance, songs of migration, bodily exhaustion and tears shed in struggle.

— Transitory emotions: despair, hope, anger, enthusiasm, fear and courage.

— Resultant aesthetic experience: the rasa of struggle.

2.2 A Dalit Rereading of Dhvani Theory

Dhvani theory, associated with Ānandavardhana, emphasises vyaṅgya, or suggested meaning. Three levels of suggestion are particularly important in Dalit literature:

(a) The first level: literal suggestion. This concerns the distinction between a word's literal meaning and its implied significance. In 'My Hereditary Rights', for example, the digging of a graveyard literally means the exhumation of the dead, while its suggested meaning is a search for rights.

(b) The second level: mythological suggestion. Myths and historical symbols are reread from a Dalit perspective. In 'My Hereditary Rights', for example, Vyasa, Arundhati and Matsyagandhi are reinterpreted as mythological figures through Dalit eyes.

(c) The third level: ideological suggestion. Caste, religion, politics and history are subjected to a Dalit reinterpretation. The poem 'Burning Skulls', for instance, recasts the idea of rebirth and exposes the establishment of caste violence under the cover of religion.

2.3 A Dalit Rereading of Alaṅkāra Theory

In Dalit literature figures of speech are not simply ornament: they are weapons of resistance.

(a) The figure of reversal. This is a Dalit reversal of a classical figure. In the poem about the hem of a sari, for example, the simile involving the goddess Maisamma reverses the conventional simile: the goddess, a classical ideal, is transformed into the labouring body of Dalit reality.

(b) Folk figures. Proverbs, idioms, sayings, riddles and figures drawn from folk songs must receive the same critical value as classical simile, metaphor and imaginative supposition. The phrase 'immovable as a stone beaten with jaggery' in the novel A Friend Forever, for example, is a folk figure.

(c) The figure of absence. Deprivation or absence itself becomes a figure of speech. In the poem 'People, Freeze', emptiness, stone and pebbles symbolise deprivation and function as figures of absence.

2.4 A Dalit Rereading of Rīti Theory

Rīti theory, associated with Vāmana, emphasises style. Dalit literature has distinctive stylistic features:

(a) The style of resistance. In contrast to classical ideals of sweetness (mādhurya) or vigour (ojas), the style of Dalit literature may be sharp, harsh, obscene and rebellious. This is a Dalit inversion of classical style.

(b) The style of witness. Dalit writing adopts the style of testimony—autobiography, narratives of experience and documentary narrative. This style erases the boundary between the personal and the collective.

(c) Folk style. Dalit writing is deeply connected to vernacular speech, folk songs, folktales and folk theatre. Its folk style constitutes a Dalit resistance to the authority of classical style.

Chapter Three: Fine-Tuning Western Theories for Dalit Literature

3.1 A Dalit Rereading of Postcolonial Theory

(a) A Dalit rereading of the subaltern. Gayatri Chakravorty Spivak's question, 'Can the subaltern speak?', is fundamental to the criticism of Dalit literature. Dalit writing reveals the tension between the 'subaltern', a category of postcolonial theory, and the 'Dalit', a category constituted by India's caste system. Criticism must ask: Is the subaltern voice in Dalit literature free from mediation? If it is mediated, does that mediation empower the speaker or reproduce subordination?

(b) A Dalit rereading of provincialisation. Dipesh Chakrabarty's concept of provincialising Europe is relevant to Dalit literature. Dalit writing seeks to provincialise upper-caste or Brahmanical literature, which claims universality while in fact speaking from a caste-specific location. Dalit criticism deconstructs that claim to universality.

(c) A Dalit rereading of hybridity. Homi K. Bhabha's concept of hybridity is useful for analysing the politics of identity in Dalit literature. Dalit writing occupies a hybrid space between upper-caste and Dalit cultures: neither completely assimilated into the former nor entirely liberated from its influence. Such hybridity is a source of both tension and creativity.

3.2 Applying Dalit Feminist Theory

(a) Intersectionality. Dalit feminism—as exemplified here by Shaila Devi, Bima Bhim, J. Subhadra and Vinodini—analyses the double oppression of caste and gender. Intersectionality is therefore a central critical category: the experience of a Dalit woman must be analysed at the meeting point of caste, gender, class, region and religion.

(b) The politics of the body. The body of a Dalit woman is not an ornament of classical śṛṅgāra but a document of labour. Criticism must analyse its politics: How does the body become marked by the caste system? How does it become a site of resistance?

(c) The Dalit woman's voice. This voice occupies a third space between a Dalit voice and a woman's voice, differing both from the voice of the Dalit man and from that of the upper-caste woman. Criticism must analyse the distinctiveness of this third space.

3.3 A Dalit Rereading of Marxist Theory

(a) The dialectic of class and caste. Marxist theory emphasises class struggle. Dalit literature presents class struggle in the form of caste struggle. Criticism must examine the dialogue and tension between class and caste.

(b) A Dalit rereading of hegemony. Gramsci's concept of hegemony helps to analyse the cultural forms of upper-caste or Brahmanical domination. The process of declaring Vidyapati to have been a Brahmin, for example, is a cultural operation of hegemony. Dalit literature is written in opposition to that hegemony.

(c) A Dalit critique of market capitalism. The publishing industry, market and politics of literary awards in relation to Dalit literature demand critical scrutiny. Marxist criticism asks: Is Dalit writing losing its creativity under market pressure? Do awards bring empowerment, or are they a means of co-option?

3.4 Theories of the Dalit Movement

(a) The tradition of Jyotirao Phule's Gulamgiri. Phule's Gulamgiri (1873) is a foundational text of Dalit literature. Criticism should analyse continuities and transformations from Gulamgiri to contemporary Dalit writing.

(b) Dr B. R. Ambedkar's intellectual tradition. Ambedkar's thinking—annihilation of caste, conversion to Buddhism and the making of the Constitution—provides an ideological foundation for Dalit literature. Criticism should examine the literary forms assumed by that intellectual tradition.

(c) The resistance literature of the Dalit Panthers. The Dalit Panthers movement of the 1970s played a fundamental role in shaping the literature of outrage. Criticism should analyse the continuities and ruptures between the Panthers and contemporary Dalit literature.

Chapter Four: A Practical Critical Framework for Dalit Literature

4.1 Levels of Dalit Literary Criticism

First level: Caste analysis

— Identify the caste structure of the work. What are the castes of its characters? How does the plot represent caste relations? How does the author's caste position shape the work's perspective?

— Analyse the aesthetics of untouchability, caste violence and caste discrimination.

Second level: Analysis of Dalit aesthetics

— Examine how pain, outrage, identity and struggle, treated as stable emotions, may culminate in rasa.

— Analyse styles of resistance, witness and folk expression.

— Analyse the figures of reversal, absence and folk expression.

Third level: Sociopolitical analysis

— Caste politics: upper-caste–Dalit conflicts, reservations, political representation and the Dalit movement.

— Class politics: landlord–peasant and capital–labour conflicts, and economic exploitation.

— Gender politics: the double oppression of Dalit women, body politics and Dalit feminism.

— The politics of migration: its economics, psychology and its bearing on identity.

Fourth level: Historical and archival analysis

— Analyse the process of rewriting Dalit history.

— Deconstruct upper-caste or Brahmanical historiography.

— Reconstruct 'silent history': reread folk history, oral history and Dalit history that are absent from written historical accounts.

Fifth level: The politics of aesthetic reception

— Do Dalit and non-Dalit readers experience aesthetic enjoyment differently?

— What are the ethics of taking aesthetic pleasure in pain? Might the aestheticisation of suffering reproduce oppression?

— How should the idea of the sahṛdaya, the empathetic reader, be redefined in the Dalit context?

4.2 Genre-Specific Analysis of Dalit Literature

(a) For Dalit poetry:

— Analyse metre and rhythm. Are traditional metres such as dohā, caupāī and sorathā used, or is the verse free?

— Analyse images and symbols. How do burning skulls, the hem of a sari, mankenapuvvu and black ink become Dalit images and symbols of resistance?

— Analyse suggestion and dhvani. How does a Dalit viewpoint emerge from the interplay of literal and implied meanings?

(b) For Dalit short stories and novels:

— Narrative technique: first-person narration and testimonial style are especially important in Dalit literature because they claim authenticity.

— Character development: analyse the psychology of Dalit characters, the representation of upper-caste characters and whether character relations reproduce or resist the caste system.

— The politics of place and time: how do village, town, forest, hut, palace and police station reflect the geography of caste hierarchy?

(c) For Dalit drama:

— Theatricality: examine the relation of Dalit drama to Bidāpat Nāch, jātrā, tamāśā and the wider traditions of folk theatre.

— Performance, music and dialogue: how do body, voice and rhythm become instruments of resistance in Dalit theatre?

— Audience relations: Dalit drama turns its audience into participants rather than merely sympathetic spectators. Analyse this relationship.

(d) For translated Dalit literature:

— Translational creativity: how is the Dalit voice of the source language established in the target language?

— Cultural translation: how are the caste system, Dalit experience and traditions of resistance localised during translation?

— The politics of Dalit translation: does translation amplify Dalit voices or distort them? Does it carry Dalit writing to a global readership, or become an instrument through which mainstream literature co-opts it?

Chapter Five: An Illustrative Application of the Theory of Dalit Literary Criticism

5.1 A Critique of the Present Anthology of Dalit Literature Translated into Maithili

First level: Caste analysis

— The anthology's central theme is the caste system: caste violence, untouchability, Dalit resistance and Dalit identity.

— The caste identities of characters: Dalit figures include Vyasa, Arundhati and Matsyagandhi in Boyi Bhimanna's poems, reinterpreted as mythological Dalits; the Dalit women labourers in J. Subhadra's poetry; Bandodu, a Madiga, in Kolakaluri Enoch's story; and Imam, a Kalandar, in Peddinti Ashok Kumar's novel.

— Upper-caste figures include landlords, Patels, the MRO, the sub-inspector, the sarpanch and the little girl Shriya, who becomes anti-Dalit.

Second level: Analysis of Dalit aesthetics

— Stable emotions: pain in J. Subhadra's 'Grinding' and 'Avva'; outrage in Boyi Bhimanna's 'My Hereditary Rights'; identity in Challapalli Swaroopa Rani's 'Mankenapuvvu'; and struggle in Kolakaluri Enoch's 'The Crow' and Peddinti Ashok Kumar's A Friend Forever.

— The realisation of rasa: the rasas of pain, outrage, identity and struggle.

— Styles of resistance: sharp, harsh, rebellious language; styles of witness: first-person and autobiographical narration; folk styles: proverbs, idioms and folk songs.

Third level: Sociopolitical analysis

— Caste politics: upper-caste–Dalit conflict, caste violence, untouchability and the psychology of caste hierarchy.

— Class politics: landlord–peasant and capital–labour conflicts, economic exploitation.

— Gender politics: the double oppression of Dalit women, body politics and Dalit feminist voices.

— Migration politics: the economics and psychology of migration in the novel A Friend Forever.

Fourth level: Historical and archival analysis

— A Dalit rereading of mythological history: Boyi Bhimanna's reinterpretation of Vyasa, Arundhati and Matsyagandhi.

— A Dalit rereading of medieval history: reconsideration of the caste system and historical documents recording Dalit resistance.

— A Dalit rereading of modern history: representations of Gandhi, Ambedkar and the Dalit movement, including the satire directed at Gandhi in the Gujarati poem 'All the Barks of the Rough Ones'.

Fifth level: Analysis of the politics of aesthetic reception

— Dalit readers: the anthology offers the aesthetic experience of identity—the literary articulation of one's own pain.

— Non-Dalit readers: the anthology offers discomfort and awakening—the opportunity to witness the pain of others.

— The ethics of experiencing pain aesthetically: the anthology does not aestheticise pain; it documents it. Such documentation makes readers witnesses to suffering, not consumers of it.

Chapter Six: The Limits and Possibilities of a Theory of Dalit Literary Criticism

6.1 Limitations

(a) The difficulty of theoretical synthesis. Indian and Western theories differ in vocabulary, philosophical assumptions and priorities. Bringing them together inevitably produces tension. This theory recommends using that tension creatively rather than suppressing it.

(b) The internal diversity of Dalit literature. Dalit literature is not uniform: poetry, short stories, novels, drama, autobiography and criticism differ in style, structure and ideas. It would be improper to claim that one theory can explain all these genres completely. This theory therefore emphasises flexibility and the critic's judgement.

(c) The particularity of translated Dalit literature. Criticism requires knowledge of both the source and target languages, yet not every critic is multilingual. This theory acknowledges the limits of translation criticism and explores collaborative criticism.

(d) Institutional constraints on Dalit criticism. Criticism is increasingly subject to pressure from academic institutions, the publishing industry and award systems. These institutional constraints raise questions about the autonomy of Dalit criticism.

6.2 Possibilities

(a) The development of Dalit aesthetics. This critical theory provides a theoretical foundation by treating pain, outrage, identity and struggle as stable emotions and exploring their possible aesthetic transformation into rasa.

(b) Interdisciplinarity. The theory connects literature with sociology, history, political science, philosophy and anthropology, opening possibilities for multidimensional analyses of Dalit writing.

(c) Comparative Dalit literary studies. The theory makes possible comparisons between Maithili Dalit literature and writing in Telugu, Gujarati, Odia, Tamil, Kannada, Marathi, Hindi and Bengali. Such comparative research will examine both the unity and diversity of Indian Dalit writing.

(d) A Dalit rereading of translation studies. This theory establishes translation not as a secondary activity but as a creative genre. Dalit translation studies will examine the movement of Dalit writing across languages.

(e) The globalisation of Dalit criticism. This theory places Dalit criticism in dialogue with international theoretical debates—postcolonial and subaltern studies, intersectionality, the politics of pain and testimonial literature.

Conclusion: The Future of Dalit Literary Criticism

Dalit literature is not merely literature: it is a movement, a manifesto of resistance. General theories are consequently insufficient for its criticism. Bringing Indian approaches—rasa, dhvani, alaṅkāra and rīti—into dialogue with Western approaches—Marxism, feminism, postcolonialism and theories of the Dalit movement—this critical theory puts the distinctiveness of Dalit literature at its centre.

It claims no final truth. It is a point of departure, opening new possibilities for Dalit literary criticism in which the rasas of pain, outrage, identity and struggle may acquire theoretical legitimacy.

Future criticism will move beyond this beginning: developing Dalit aesthetics, expanding comparative Dalit studies, strengthening Dalit translation studies and bringing Dalit criticism into international conversation.

Appendix: A Concise Outline of the Theory of Dalit Literary Criticism

Level of analysis	Indian theory (Dalit rereading)	Western theory (Dalit rereading)	Dalit specificity
Caste analysis	—	Caste politics; untouchability; caste violence	Caste of characters; author's caste; caste in the plot
Dalit aesthetics	Rasas of pain, outrage, identity and struggle	—	Figures of reversal, absence and folk expression
Sociopolitical	—	Caste, class, gender and migration politics	Intersectionality; Dalit feminism; subaltern voices
Historical and archival	—	Postcolonialism; archaeological method	Rewriting Dalit history; reconstructing silent history
Politics of reception	Sahṛdaya (Dalit rereading)	Reception theory; reader-response criticism	Dalit and non-Dalit readers; ethics of aestheticising pain

This outline gives critics the flexibility to choose and apply theories and levels of analysis according to their own judgement and the specific context of Dalit literature.

The critic's final observation: Dalit criticism does not lay claim to theoretical purity; it seeks literary authenticity. This theory is only a guide to that search. Dalit literature is alive, evolving and resisting; its criticism, too, must be alive, developing and resistant. This theory is an invitation to such resistant criticism.

Annexure 2: A Critical Evaluation of Vidyapati's Bidesiya

Viewed jointly through Western critical theory and the Indian aesthetic tradition, this Maithili dramatic text—or performance script embedded in Vidyapati's song-poems—admits of multiple approaches. The critical reading that follows brings together perspectives from postcolonial theory, feminist criticism, performance studies, comparative literature, and the Sanskrit tradition of rasa.

1. The Problem of Genre and Classification

The text proclaims itself a "parallel universe" of the Vidyapati Bidesiya tradition. The declaration immediately raises a fundamental question: is this a revival, a reconstruction, an adaptation, or something considerably more complicated? The author presents the work both as documentation —of troupes such as the Ramkhelawan Mandal—and as invention ("this imagined play is presented"). Such generic instability is not necessarily a defect. It is a productive tension that the text never quite resolves.

From a poststructuralist perspective, this undecidability reveals the impossibility of recovering an "authentic" folk tradition. The author's own framing, which observes that figures such as Salhes and Chudamal have attracted "no research," paradoxically undermines the archival authority the work simultaneously claims. In Jacques Derrida's vocabulary, the work becomes a case of archive fever: the restless desire to retrieve an origin that was never stable in the first place.

A formalist critic would observe that the play adopts the structure of song-drama yet lacks regular dramatic discipline. Stage directions are minimal; the relationship between its seven scenes is unclear; and Vidyapati himself enters as a character, explains meanings, and "disappears into the darkness." These devices produce something akin to a Brechtian alienation effect, for which the text offers no explicit theoretical account. Is Vidyapati a sūtradhāra in the Sanskrit dramatic tradition? A Brechtian narrator exposing theatrical illusion? Or a devotional presence invoking the authority of the poet-saint? The text refuses to choose. That refusal allows multiple interpretations but also generates structural inconsistency.

2. The Narrative of Migration: Postcolonial and Subaltern Readings

Its thematic centre is migration—and the woman's experience of waiting for one who has migrated. The author draws an important distinction between the Bhojpuri Bidesiya tradition, exemplified by Bhikhari Thakur, and the Maithili context. He argues that migration in Mithila is a "recent phenomenon," whereas Bhojpuri culture has a longer and more deeply established history of labour migration.

From a postcolonial perspective, this distinction requires careful scrutiny. The author's claim that Bhojpuri literature is "less rich in quantity than Maithili" but "superior in quality" in certain domains depends on an implicit hierarchy that the work never deconstructs. Whose criteria determine "richness" and "quality"? The comparison values Bhikhari Thakur's Bidesiya for its "poignant form" while criticising the "ponderous" epic narratives of Maithili literature. This is a valuable insight, but it needs more rigorous theorisation. Why does Maithili literary culture privilege epic forms over folk tales? The answer lies in the sociology of literature: the Brahmanical prestige attached to Maithili as the language of pandits and the Sarnaut elite, as against the more popular and labouring-class roots of Bhojpuri literary expression.

A reading informed by Subaltern Studies would go further. The women in the play—the young woman who waits, the sister-in-law who sends the traveller back, and the mother-in-law who dies offstage—are voices within a patriarchal order which the text reproduces without sufficiently questioning it. When the young woman sings, "I am alone; my beloved is in a distant land," she enacts the viraha central to the rasa tradition. But does the work offer any feminist critique of that suffering, or does it merely elevate and aestheticise her waiting? A rasa-based account would emphasise karuṇa and vipralambha-śṛṅgāra. A feminist critic such as Gayatri Chakravorty Spivak, however, would ask: can the subaltern woman speak here, or is she only the medium for verse composed by men and for a male poet-character who explains her experience to the audience?

3. Rasa, Devotion, and the Question of Aesthetic Distance

The work is explicitly based on Vidyapati's Padāvalī, which participates in both the erotic and the devotional traditions. The selection of songs from the Nepal recension of the Padāvalī—songs concerned with separation, absence, and a woman awaiting her lover—places the work within the aesthetics of viraha, which joins Sanskrit poetics to the devotional literature of northern India.

From the standpoint of Abhinavagupta's theory of dhvani, the suggested meaning (vyaṅgya) of these songs goes beyond the literal story of a woman waiting for her migrant husband. Bidesiya becomes a metaphor: for the soul separated from the divine; for Mithila estranged from its cultural roots; and for the Maithili language itself in an age of displacement. Yet when Vidyapati comes onstage to "explain the meaning," the text risks what the rasa tradition would regard as a basic error. Instead of allowing vibhāva and anubhāva to produce rasa through suggestion, it makes that meaning explicit. The poet-character's explanatory intervention flattens the original songs' multiplicity of meanings.

A devotional reading may be more generous. In the bhakti traditions of northern India, the rasa of separation is itself a form of realisation. The young woman is Radha; the beloved gone abroad is Krishna; waiting is the soul's longing for union with the divine. Vidyapati's appearance as poet-saint reinforces this reading: he is not merely a commentator, but a saint for whom poetry is itself spiritual practice. The play's performance setting —a troupe named after Rama, staging devotional drama—also supports this interpretation.

Nevertheless, the work's own framing does not wholly embrace a devotional conclusion. The final statement presents the idea of the beloved in a distant land "before discerning audiences" and offers it "with deep reverence," thus maintaining a degree of critical distance. The play is neither wholly devotional theatre nor wholly secular folk drama. Its hybridity is productive, though at times unstable.

4. Intertextuality and the Anxiety of Influence

The text's relationship to Bhikhari Thakur's Bidesiya is its most consequential intertextual engagement. Harold Bloom's anxiety of influence offers a useful framework: the Maithili work struggles to establish a space distinct from its Bhojpuri predecessor, even while that predecessor inevitably shapes it.

The author claims that Maithili lacks the "fine detail" of Bhojpuri Bidesiya, citing Salhes and Chudamal as examples of narratives that "cross regional boundaries" but have not been adequately researched. This is a claim about the canon: that Maithili folk literature has been neglected in comparison with the Sanskritised epic tradition. The play may thus be read as an act of canonical criticism, recovering what has been marginalised.

The play's dependence on Vidyapati—one of the most canonised figures in Maithili literature—complicates this project. The author effectively uses Maithili's most prestigious literary personality to confer authority on a folk tradition that Vidyapati's own corpus may historically have helped to marginalise. This is a gesture of postcolonial recovery, but it also exposes how difficult it is to reach "the folk" without mediation through elite literary forms.

A reader-response critic would note that the text's explicit framing of its project—a long prose introduction, extensive descriptions of performance troupes, and citation of Nagendranath Gupta's edition—creates a particular reading contract. The audience is invited not merely to experience rasa without mediation, but to understand the work's making, its archival labour, and the politics of regional literary traditions. This metatheatrical dimension is among the play's most distinctive contributions.

5. Performance Studies and the Question of the Audience

As a performance text, Vidyapati's Bidesiya occupies a threshold position. It is neither a complete script nor a record of a performance. Stage directions are minimal: "The poet Vidyapati enters"; "The young woman symbolically opens a shop"; "Darkness spreads." A scholar of performance studies would ask: what exactly is being documented here? A particular troupe's līlā? A reconstruction of a lost tradition? Or a script intended for a future performance?

The text's careful identification of the rāga of each song—Dhanashi, Malava, Kolar, Ghanashi—suggests musical specificity. Without notation or directions for performance, however, these remain little more than names. The playwright, or documentarian, imagines a reader already intimately familiar with these musical traditions: a reader already situated within Maithili performance culture.

This raises the problem of address: for whom is the text intended? The available English translation suggests the possibility of a further audience beyond Maithili speakers. Yet the songs within the play are not translated: the Maithili originals are supplied, and their meanings are given in Maithili prose. These layers of language and translation create, in Homi Bhabha's terminology, a "third space": neither wholly Maithili nor wholly English; neither performance alone nor documentation alone; neither exclusively folk nor exclusively classical.

6. The Politics of Literary Comparison

The author's comparative remarks on Bhojpuri and Maithili invite sociocritical attention. "Bhojpuri literature is quantitatively less rich than Maithili," the text claims, "but in certain domains it is qualitatively superior." It is a provocative claim which, if analysed, could expose deep hierarchies within the literary cultures of northern India.

Maithili has a classical literary lineage extending to Vidyapati in the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries, a recognised grammatical tradition, and a long history of scholarship. Bhojpuri, despite its enormous number of speakers, has historically been stigmatised as a "dialect" rather than a language; its literary traditions have been marginalised by both Hindi and Maithili elites. The author's contention that Bhojpuri is "superior" in some qualitative respects—especially the Bidesiya tradition—strategically reverses this hierarchy. It claims for Bhojpuri what has been denied to it: aesthetic sophistication, emotional depth, and cultural value.

Even so, the text does not fully theorise this reversal. It remains caught within the comparative framework it seeks to challenge. A genuinely decolonial criticism would ask: why compare at all? Why not allow each tradition its own aesthetic measures and criteria of value? Comparison risks reinstating the very hierarchies it criticises.

7. Unresolved Questions and Productive Ambiguities

The text leaves several questions unresolved, and these silences are productive for a critic:

1. Vidyapati's status. Is he a character within the play, the author of its source material, a sūtradhāra figure, or a devotional presence? The work's answer is "all of these," and that plurality is both a strength and a weakness.

2. The relationship between the seven scenes. The scenes seem to offer variations on a situation: a woman, a traveller, and the memory of a beloved who has gone abroad. But do they constitute narrative progression, a ritual cycle, or a series of aesthetic variations? The work does not say.

3. The politics of gender. The young woman's voice predominates in the songs, yet her agency is limited. She cannot persuade the traveller, leave herself, or address her husband directly. The text reproduces these limits without comment. Is this fidelity to the source material, or a failure of critical distance?

4. The sister-in-law's role. In the later scenes she disappears, leaving the traveller and the young woman alone. What happened to that relationship? The work's silence is suggestive but incomplete.

5. The ending. The final "dissolution" into the beloved in a distant land is ambiguous. Is it reunion with the lover? Death? The collapse of theatrical illusion? The work, perhaps deliberately, withholds interpretation.

8. Conclusion: Towards a Critical Reception

Judged by formal coherence, thematic complexity, and the productive tension between tradition and innovation, Vidyapati's Bidesiya is a work of considerable interest, but also of unresolved contradictions.

Its greatest strength is its liminal position: between folk and classical, Maithili and Bhojpuri, performance and text, devotion and criticism. That location allows it to stage the tensions defining modern Maithili identity: caught between a proud literary past and present economic insecurity; between Sanskritised prestige and folk vitality; between the pain of separation and the demand for political recognition.

Its greatest weakness is its insufficient theoretical development. The work knows what it wants to accomplish—to recover a tradition, honour Vidyapati, and address the contemporary experience of Maithili migration—but does not always know how it is accomplishing these things. Generic instability, indistinct staging, and Vidyapati's unresolved role as a character are not defects in themselves. They do, however, call for an account of the work's own procedures, which it does not supply.

A reception-oriented critic would note that the text now inhabits multiple contexts. For Maithili readers it is a document of cultural memory; for English readers, an intriguing work in translation; for scholars of Indian theatre, a case study in the challenges of archiving performance traditions. Each context of reading produces a different text.

Ultimately, Vidyapati's Bidesiya succeeds in what may be its most original undertaking: placing the experience of the Maithili bidesiya—the migrant and the woman who waits—within Mithila's most prestigious literary tradition. In doing so, it makes a claim: that the suffering of labour migration deserves the same aesthetic attention as the viraha of Radha and Krishna; that the folk belongs within the classical; and that the present moment of displacement calls upon the resources of a centuries-old poetic language.

Whether the work fully realises this claim remains an open question for criticism. But the claim itself—and the labour of articulating it—demands respect.

A Critical Reading of Vidyapati's Bidesiya Through Five Theoretical Perspectives

1. Gayatri Chakravorty Spivak: Can the Maithili Subaltern Speak?

Spivak's foundational question—"Can the Subaltern Speak?"—interrogates the mechanisms through which marginalised subjects are represented within dominant discourses, representations always mediated by institutional and ideological structures that obstruct authentic self-expression. Vidyapati's Bidesiya offers a compelling case study for a Spivakian analysis precisely because it stages the crisis of representation that her work theorises.

The young woman who dominates the songs of the play appears, on the surface, to be a subaltern figure: a rural woman whose husband has migrated for work, leaving her to confront her precarious position within patriarchal and economic structures that afford her no agency. Yet her speech—the songs she sings—is not her own. They are the compositions of Vidyapati, a male poet of the fourteenth or fifteenth century, mediated through multiple textual transmissions (the Nepal Padāvalī and Nagendranath Gupta's compilation), and mediated again by a contemporary playwright or documentarian who selects, arranges, and frames them. The young woman speaks, but what she says is already a quotation from elite literature authored by a man.

Spivak's criticism of the "epistemic violence" of colonialism can here be extended to internal colonialisms within Indian literary culture. The playwright's framing—his assertion that Maithili lacks the "fine detail" of Bhojpuri folk narratives—betrays an anxiety about authentic folk expression, an anxiety the play seeks to resolve by reclaiming Vidyapati's verses as a kind of primordial folk archive. But Spivak would ask: what is effaced in this act of reclamation? The real Maithili woman who has migrated, or waited for a migrant, is displaced by a literary construction: the woman separated from her beloved in Sanskritised poetics. The subaltern woman becomes the sign of something else: Maithili cultural identity, the prestige of literary tradition, and the authority of a poet-saint.

The play's final gesture—the ambiguous appearance of the beloved returning from abroad, emerging from darkness—is particularly instructive in Spivakian terms. Is this reunion? Liberation? The text leaves the matter unresolved. Spivak, however, would notice that the subaltern woman's desire is ultimately displaced onto the return of a male figure. The fulfilment of her waiting lies not in her own agency but in the lover's arrival. Her subjectivity is constituted entirely in relation to his absence and presence. She speaks, but she speaks of him, for him, towards him. Her own voice, like her desire, remains mediated.

The playwright's own position mirrors the problem Spivak identifies. As an educated, perhaps urban, perhaps male or male-identifying person who documents and frames these rural performance traditions, the playwright undertakes the very work of representation that Spivak critiques. The long prose introduction—with archival details of troupes, villages, and performance histories—functions as a claim to ethnographic authority. But does such documentation enable or obstruct subaltern speech? The young woman sings, yet her song is glossed, translated, and interpreted: first by Vidyapati as a character within the play, then by the playwright's framing, and finally by this critic. Each layer of mediation moves us farther away from any unmediated subaltern voice.

Spivak reminds us that the desire to "give the subaltern a voice" is itself a Western intellectual fantasy, a project of recovering authenticity that necessarily reproduces the very structures it seeks to dismantle. Vidyapati's Bidesiya cannot escape this contradiction, but it stages it with an unusual degree of self-awareness. When Vidyapati the character appears to "explain the meanings" of the young woman's songs, the play makes a metaphor of the critic's own activity. The question is whether the play recognises that metaphor as a problem or innocently celebrates the poet's interpretive authority.

2. Dipesh Chakrabarty: Provincialising the Maithili Literary Imagination

Chakrabarty's Provincializing Europe argues that historicism—the European mode of writing history which assumes a universal, linear temporality—has so structured modern South Asian thought as to exclude other modes of temporal experience. Chakrabarty calls for historiography that can accommodate the "politics of gods" and other modes of existence which cannot be subsumed within secular, developmental time.

Vidyapati's Bidesiya is a rich site for applying Chakrabarty's framework because it operates within several incompatible temporalities at once. The play concerns migration, a modern economic phenomenon: the text comments that migration in Mithila is a "recent phenomenon" and that "villages have become deserted." Yet the aesthetic resources through which it represents this modern condition are drawn from Vidyapati's fourteenth-century Padāvalī, belonging to a premodern tradition of devotion and erotic sentiment. The young woman awaiting her migrant husband is simultaneously a contemporary Maithili woman and Radha waiting for Krishna. The work does not choose between these temporalities; it inhabits them both.

Chakrabarty would recognise this as a refusal of historicism's demand for chronological purity. The play refuses to say, "This is the premodern tradition of viraha; that is the modern migration narrative." Instead, it insists that the modern experience of labour migration is a form of viraha, that the uncertainty of the contemporary Maithili migrant is the soul's eternal longing for its beloved. This is not a metaphorical substitution but a temporal superimposition: two times existing in one place.

The text's comparison between Maithili and Bhojpuri literary traditions also invites a Chakrabartian reading. The playwright claims that the Bhojpuri Bidesiya tradition is "superior" in certain qualitative domains while Maithili remains bound to "ponderous" epic narratives. Among other things, this is a claim about literary time. The argument implies that Bhojpuri has produced a modern, responsive vernacular realism—Bhikhari Thakur's poignant songs of migrant suffering—while Maithili remains trapped within the "heavy" forms of a Sanskritised past. The project of the play, using Vidyapati to speak to the present, can be read as an attempt to provincialise the historicist assumption that only "modern" forms—realism, the novel, secular narrative—adequately represent modern experience.

But Chakrabarty also cautions against romanticising such temporal hybridity. The play's invocation of Vidyapati's authority—the poet-saint who authenticates the Bidesiya tradition—risks reproducing the Brahmanical structures of prestige that historically marginalised folk expression. The young woman's song becomes acceptable, perhaps, because it is Vidyapati's song. The modern migrant's suffering is aesthetically legitimated because it is framed by a canonical literary tradition. Chakrabarty might ask: can there be a politics of the present that does not require the authority of the premodern sacred?

The play's performance context—a troupe named after Rama, staging devotional drama—suggests an answer. For practitioners of the Ramkhelawan Mandal, Vidyapati is not an authority summoned to legitimate modern concerns; he is a living presence within a continuing devotional practice. The distinction between "modern" and "premodern" may not exist for them in the way it does for the literate critic. Chakrabarty asks us to take this seriously. The temporality of the Ramkhelawan tradition is not historicist time but ritual time, cyclical time, the time of līlā or divine play. To provincialise Europe is to provincialise the historicist assumptions that oblige us to see Vidyapati's presence as an anachronism rather than as continuity.

3. A. K. Ramanujan: The Interaction of Folk and Classical Canons

Ramanujan's life's work was devoted to challenging the hierarchical opposition between "folk" and "classical" traditions in Indian literature. He demonstrated that these categories are not fixed essences but dynamic, mutually constitutive forms. The "classical" continually draws upon "folk" resources; the "folk" absorbs and transforms "classical" forms. Ramanujan's translations—Speaking of Śiva, The Interior Landscape, and Folktales from India—exemplify his method: treating folk traditions with the same seriousness as canonical texts, attending to their formal refinement and cultural complexity.

Vidyapati's Bidesiya is in many ways a Ramanujan-like text. It is expressly concerned with the relationship between Vidyapati—among the most canonical figures of Maithili literature—and the folk performance traditions of Bidesiya. The playwright remarks that Vidyapati's Padāvalī, especially the Nepal recension, contains "pure Bidesiya" verses, suggesting that the classical poet himself engaged with folk subjects and forms. The performance troupes described—the Ramkhelawan Mandal and the Ramraksha Chaudhary Natya Kala Parishad—represent the continuing life of these verses in popular performance settings. The work refuses to separate "high" literary tradition from "low" performance tradition.

Ramanujan would be particularly interested in the play's acts of translation —not simply linguistic translation but translation among genres, registers, and social worlds. The young woman's song moves between śṛṅgāra and viraha, between the classical rāga system (Dhanashi, Malava, Kolar, Ghanashi) and the vernacular idiom of the stage directions. Vidyapati as a character comes to "explain the meanings," acting as a learned commentator who mediates classical text and popular reception. Yet the mediation is not one-way: after Vidyapati sings, the young woman also interprets the verses, "expanding upon their meaning." Meaning is not fixed by classical authority but emerges through dialogic performance.

Ramanujan's concept of "context-sensitive" meaning—his insistence that Indian literary forms be understood within their contexts of performance —is crucial to reading this work. The play is not a "text" in the Western sense alone, but a score for performance, a document pointing to an embodied, musical, ritual event. Its attention to rāga, stage directions marking entrances and exits, and interaction between characters and audience (in Scene 7, the traveller gestures towards the spectators) all indicate a performance tradition irreducible to its literary content.

Ramanujan would also notice the work's engagement with regional specificity. The playwright's meticulous documentation of troupes in Samastipur, Purnia, Supaul, and Saharsa—naming villages, panchayats, and post offices—is not mere antiquarianism. It is a claim about place: that the tradition exists in particular communities and particular locations, and that its meaning is embedded in local geography and history. This regional grounding challenges the universalising tendencies of both classical Sanskrit aesthetics and Western literary theory.

Nevertheless, Ramanujan would also notice the absences that haunt the text. The playwright laments that folk figures such as Salhes and Chudamal have received "no research," and that Maithili lacks the extensive folk narratives found in Bhojpuri. In Ramanujan's vocabulary, this reflects the canon's failure to recognise its folk sources. The classical Maithili tradition has perhaps absorbed folk materials without acknowledgement, transforming them into "ponderous" epic forms that obscure their vernacular origins. The play's effort to recover Bidesiya within Vidyapati's Padāvalī attempts to reverse this process: to show that the classical poet was also a folk poet, that within the canonical text are the voices of women, migrants, and the dispossessed.

4. Rustom Bharucha: Indian Theatre and the Politics of Performance

Bharucha's work consistently challenges the appropriation of Indian performance traditions both by Western-oriented "modern" theatre and by state-sponsored movements to revive "folk" culture. In Theatre and the World and The Politics of Cultural Practice, Bharucha argues for rigorous attention to the specific contexts, communities, and power relations within which performance traditions exist. He is sceptical of "intercultural" theatre that uproots aesthetic forms from their social foundations, and critical of the repackaging of "folk" traditions for urban, middle-class, or international audiences.

Vidyapati's Bidesiya exists precisely within the contested terrain that Bharucha maps. It documents performance traditions—the Ramkhelawan Mandal and the Ramraksha Chaudhary Natya Kala Parishad—that were historically rooted in rural Maithili communities. These troupes performed for local audiences, in village settings, as part of ritual and devotional cycles. Yet the text as it comes to us is a document, a translation, a presentation "before discerning audiences"—that is, before an audience not necessarily identical with the original rural community. In its present form, the play has been uprooted from its initial performance setting and offered to another public: Maithili readers, perhaps, but also, through translation, English-speaking scholars and students.

Bharucha would ask: what is lost in this uprooting? The stage directions in the work are minimal: "Onstage, our Bidesiya takes his leave"; "The young woman symbolically opens a shop." For someone who has never watched the Ramkhelawan Mandal perform, such directions offer only the barest indication of what the performance might have looked, sounded, or felt like. The rāgas are named but not notated; movements are indicated but not choreographed; audience interactions are recorded but not described. The text becomes a kind of ghost of performance, preserving certain information while losing the embodied, sensory, communal dimensions that Bharucha considers irreducible.

Bharucha would also question the framing of these traditions within a literary-critical apparatus. The extended prose introduction—its comparison of Maithili and Bhojpuri, its references to Nagendranath Gupta's edition, its placing of Vidyapati within the Bidesiya tradition—constitutes an academic frame potentially alien to the original practitioners. The play is presented as a "parallel universe" of Vidyapati's Bidesiya, a phrase suggesting a literary-intertextual relationship rather than a living tradition of performance. Bharucha would ask: for whom is this text made, and whose interests does it serve?

The play's relationship to Bhikhari Thakur's Bhojpuri Bidesiya tradition is especially important from Bharucha's perspective. The playwright remarks that Bhikhari Thakur's Bidesiya emerged from his own experience as a migrant in Calcutta and his performances for Bhojpuri-speaking communities. In Bharucha's vocabulary, this was community-based theatre: rooted in the lived experience of its practitioners and audiences, responsive to their needs and concerns. By contrast, the present attempt to create a Maithili Bidesiya through Vidyapati's verses is a literary construction, deriving authority from a canonical poet rather than directly from contemporary experience. Bharucha would ask whether the substitution of classical viraha for modern migration does justice to the specific suffering of present-day Maithili migrants, or whether it aestheticises that suffering in ways that detach it from material reality.

The work's closing gesture—"This conception of the beloved in a distant land is presented before discerning audiences. Amid the present condition of Maithili migrants (bidesiyas), this offering is made with deep reverence to the great poet Vidyapati"—exposes the displacement Bharucha identifies. The "condition" of migrants is acknowledged, then displaced: the dedication is not to migrants but to Vidyapati. The "discerning audience" is invited to appreciate an aesthetic conception rather than to respond to a social situation. Bharucha would insist that a genuinely political theatre could not allow this displacement; it would give material suffering priority over aesthetic framing.

5. Edward Said: Travelling Theory and the Question of Origins

Said's concept of "travelling theory" attends to how ideas, texts, and practices move among cultural and historical contexts and are necessarily transformed in the process. In "Traveling Theory" and "Traveling Theory Reconsidered," Said argues that theories lose or gain power as they travel, their meanings shaped by the contexts they enter, while the question of "origin" is always complicated by such movements. His later work on late style also offers resources for considering how traditions are received, adapted, and reanimated by later practitioners.

Vidyapati's Bidesiya is deeply concerned with origins and their complexities. The playwright traces the tradition through multiple lineages: the Ramkhelawan Mandal of Katghara, the Ramraksha Chaudhary Natya Kala Parishad of Gayaghat, and the Piya Desantar troupe of Purnia. These are claims of authenticity and origin, grounding the tradition in particular communities and locations. Yet the text also acknowledges that the Bidesiya tradition is itself itinerant. It travels from Purnia to Supaul, Saharsa, and Samastipur; it travels from Nepal (through the Nepal Padāvalī) to Bihar; it moves from Vidyapati's fourteenth-century court to twenty-first-century rural performances.

Said would be interested in how the work handles the Bhojpuri origins of the Bidesiya tradition. Bhikhari Thakur's Bidesiya is acknowledged as a predecessor, an influential text to which the Maithili play must relate even in defining itself against it. The playwright's claim that Bhojpuri is "superior" in certain qualitative domains is, in Said's terms, an acknowledgement of the power of a travelling tradition. The Maithili text cannot ignore Bhikhari Thakur. It must contend with him, assimilate him, define itself through and against him. This is the anxiety of influence, but it is also the productive dynamism of travelling theory: Bhojpuri Bidesiya travels into Maithili and compels a reconsideration of what Maithili literary tradition can accomplish.

The play's use of Vidyapati, a figure of the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries, to respond to a modern Bhojpuri tradition is itself a form of travelling theory. Vidyapati's Padāvalī travels from its original courtly-devotional setting into a contemporary performance context of Maithili Bidesiya. The poet-saint becomes something he had never been before: a chronicler of labour migration. This is not "misreading" in any simple sense; it is creative appropriation, the reanimation of a tradition to meet new needs. Said would recognise in this the vitality of travelling theory: ideas acquire new power as they enter new contexts, even—especially—when those contexts were never anticipated by their originators.

The text's anxiety about research—its lament that figures such as Salhes and Chudamal have received "no research"—reveals a different kind of travelling theory: the movement of academic knowledge practices into folk traditions. The playwright, situated within or addressing a literate academic context, imposes the values of archival inquiry, textual criticism, and historical documentation upon performance traditions that may not have operated according to those values. Said would observe that this is not a neutral act. It transforms the very traditions it seeks to document, subjecting them to criteria such as "research" that originated elsewhere.

Finally, Said's notion of "contrapuntal reading" offers a means of understanding the work's many overlapping origins. The play is simultaneously a document of the Ramkhelawan Mandal performance tradition; a reconstruction of Vidyapati's Bidesiya verses; a response to Bhikhari Thakur's Bhojpuri Bidesiya; a contribution to Maithili literary culture; a performance text for future staging; and an object of academic study. These are not competing origins but coexisting ones, layered like musical lines in a contrapuntal composition. To privilege one origin over the others—to say the "real" text is the Ramkhelawan Mandal performance, or Vidyapati's verses, or the playwright's invention—would deny the work's fundamental condition as a travelling, transformed, multiply rooted cultural object.

Synthesis: Convergences and Divergences

These five theoretical perspectives, though differing in their origins and commitments, converge on several important insights about Vidyapati's Bidesiya:

1. The problem of mediation. Spivak, Chakrabarty, and Said all insist, in different ways, that the subaltern, the premodern, and the "original" are always already mediated. The young woman does not speak without Vidyapati; Vidyapati does not speak without performance traditions; performance traditions do not speak without documentation. The work is itself a meditation on mediation.

2. The politics of recovery. Both Ramanujan and Bharucha question projects of "recovering" folk traditions through classical frameworks. For Ramanujan, the classical and the folk are already interconnected; for Bharucha, recovery can be a form of appropriation. The work's attempt to claim Vidyapati for the Bidesiya tradition is at once a radical democratisation of the canon and a potential erasure of the specificity of folk practice.

3. Temporality and history. Chakrabarty and Said both challenge linear, historicist accounts of cultural development. The work's superimposition of Vidyapati's viraha upon modern migration, its insistence that a fourteenth-century poet speaks to a twenty-first-century condition, rejects the historicist assumption that every age possesses its own appropriate aesthetic form. This is not anachronism but a different relation to time.

4. The question of audience. Spivak asks who speaks; Bharucha asks for whom. The work's many audiences—rural performance communities, Maithili readers, and English-speaking scholars—complicate any simple answer. The play exists in different forms for different publics, and those different existences cannot be reduced to a single "original."

5. The limits of theory. Each of these theorists reminds us that theory has limits. Spivak's subaltern ultimately cannot speak; Chakrabarty's non-historicist temporalities are difficult to represent in academic prose; Ramanujan's folk-classical synthesis cannot be wholly captured by scholarly categories; Bharucha's embodied performance escapes documentation; Said's travelling theory always risks becoming another form of appropriation. Vidyapati's Bidesiya may succeed precisely by refusing to resolve these tensions, insisting instead on remaining multiple, partial, and incomplete.

Concluding Reflection

In the light of these theoretical traditions, Vidyapati's Bidesiya is at once illuminated and unsettled. The work presents itself as a dedication to Vidyapati, a document of folk tradition, a response to contemporary migration, and a performance script. It resists the kind of theoretical mastery that would confine it to a single meaning, a single origin, or a single audience. Perhaps this is its greatest strength: rather than resolving the tensions between classical and folk, text and performance, past and present, it stages them with an honesty that resonates with theoretical criticism.

Each of the five theoretical perspectives finds an aspect of its own concerns in this work. Spivak sees the mediated voice of the subaltern; Chakrabarty, non-historicist temporalities; Ramanujan, folk-classical continuities; Bharucha, the politics of documenting performance; Said, the work of travelling theory. Yet none claims that the text can be reduced to its framework. The text exceeds theory, as cultural objects often do. That excess makes it worthy of critical attention and keeps the critic's work necessarily provisional, necessarily incomplete, and always open to further readings.

Annexure 3: Vidyapati, the Earliest Poet of Maithili (Before Jyotirishwar) — Gajendra Thakur

Ram Thakur

Let us now turn to the central question.

Until the jasmine opens into bloom,
The bee can take no delight in it. And:
Where is the nectar in an unopened bud?

Bodhi Kayastha

Ugna Mahadev

The Vidyapati who wrote in Sanskrit and Avahaṭṭha places particular emphasis on caste and non-caste; purity of blood and caste are important to him. He declares that a person of non-noble birth deserves no compassion at all, and that beauty is the exclusive preserve of the wealthy and the privileged. The Sanskrit-and-Avahaṭṭha Vidyapati—the sacred-thread-and-turban Vidyapati celebrated by Kishorikant Mishra's Mithila Cultural Council—holds that caste is the ultimate determining factor in social life. Someone born into a bad lineage, he suggests, can become only a serpent with a wicked mind. The same sacred-thread-and-turban Vidyapati declares any country where the rules of caste do not apply to be a mleccha country. (Upendra Thakur, Aspects of Society and Economy in Medieval Mithila.)

All the great men of our forebears belong to our own caste.
"Until the jasmine opens into bloom,
The bee can take no delight in it."

And:

"Where is nectar in a closed bud?"

Phanishwar Nath Renu wrote a reportage piece on Bidapat Naach, published in the weekly Vishwamitra on 1 August 1945. The report is important because it was written some seven hundred years after Jyotirishwar's account of the same subject; throughout those seven centuries the parallel tradition had kept Vidyapati alive.

Yet Vidyapati was suddenly taken away from the very people who had preserved him. Bideshwar Thakur sang Vidyapati's songs and died crying out that Brahmins had seized Vidyapati by placing a turban upon his head. The same account continues to be repeated by Kanungo Badri Prasad Thakur of Brahmpura, Binod Thakur of Pokharbhira, Saryug Thakur of Rudrapur, Jayram Thakur of Menhath, and the entire village of Bisfi. Shaligram Yadav and Awadhiya Thakur bear witness to Bisfi's tradition. Every kind of specious argument about Vidyapati's birth and origins has been advanced in this ritualistic appropriation, yet research papers have scarcely mentioned his parallel tradition. This essay is dedicated to the thousands who, like Bideshwar Thakur, kept Vidyapati alive in that parallel tradition between Jyotirishwar's account of Bidapat and Phanishwar Nath Renu's account seven hundred years later.

The Tradition of the Śatapatha Brāhmaṇa in Mithila and Mithila's Parallel Tradition

Language must have existed before the Ṛgveda, the earliest work of Vedic Sanskrit. Much oral literature—gāthā, nārāśaṃsī, divine tales, and narratives—must have been composed in it. The Ṛgveda uses the terms gāthin, gātuvit, and gāthapati for the singers of such ballads.

From the Vedic period onward, gāthā and nārāśaṃsī continued as parallel forms.

Did Vedic Sanskrit emerge from Prakrit, or did Prakrit emerge from Vedic Sanskrit? The popular narratives called nārāśaṃsī in the Vedas demonstrate, according to this argument, that the two continued alongside one another for a long time. The parallel tradition affected them both. Consider the Ṛgveda: what does its use of dūlabha for durlabha (Ṛgveda 4.9.8) demonstrate? What does paścā for paścāt in the Atharvaveda (10.4.10) demonstrate? And what does pratisaṃhāya for pratisandhāya in the Gopatha Brāhmaṇa (2.4) demonstrate?

The Aryans came to Mithila from the western part of India, and portions of the Vedas already existed before their arrival. That is why so many words and pronunciations found in Maithili also appear in Vedic Sanskrit but not in classical Sanskrit. Avidyā, the doctrine of karma, the cycle of birth and rebirth, and liberation were, in this account, received by the Aryans from non-Aryan peoples. Hence the Upanishads offer a path to mokṣa, not merely a path to heaven. How is liberation attained—through sacrifice? No: through knowledge, reflection, contemplation, and samādhi. Under King Janaka's patronage, Yājñavalkya composed the Bṛhadāraṇyaka Upaniṣad in Tirhut, an area the author describes as non-Aryan.

Commenting on the fifty-seventh verse of the Sāṃkhyakārikā, Vācaspati Miśra asks: can one say that because a calf is nourished by unconscious milk, the operation of unconscious Prakṛti can also give living beings the knowledge of liberation? God is complete in himself: for what purpose would he create the world? If creation were for the sake of living beings, they would become bound only after creation; before creation there would be no bondage, so what would call for divine compassion? Creation therefore occurs through Prakṛti, and the individual attains apavarga through individual effort. Dissolution, too, occurs through discrimination. Vācaspati's explanation is thus non-theistic, not theistic.

Were God to participate in directing Prakṛti, it would be a conscious act undertaken for a purpose, and God has no need of any such purpose. Gautama of Mithila, credited with the Nyāyasūtra, discusses attaining niḥśreyasa through knowledge of the sixteen categories, but nowhere among them makes God the agent who grants liberation. The Vaiśeṣikasūtra holds that the Vedas were composed by learned people, not by God. Kumārila Bhaṭṭa argues that no trustworthy account of God before creation is possible.

The So-Called Mainstream of the Śatapatha Brāhmaṇa and Its Parallel Mainstream

Brahmanism and non-Brahmanism have coexisted in Mithila from the beginning. Jyotirishwar writes of the Buddhist side: "terrifying in its sudden appearance." The static tradition designated as that of the Śatapatha Brāhmaṇa is intent on venerating the Sanskrit-and-Avahaṭṭha Vidyapati because of an identity of name. The Ṛgvedic hymn and the nārāśaṃsī, the great poet Vidyapati and the turbaned Vidyapati, mokṣa and heaven-and-hell: these opposed intellectual currents have existed within Mithila.

The priest Gautama is common to both Videgha Māthava of the Śatapatha Brāhmaṇa and Nimi of the Purāṇas; the author treats the two priests as one and takes this as the beginning of the Videha kingdom. Māthava's priest Gautama initiated the Mitravinda sacrifice, which Yājñavalkya subsequently revived in the time of Mahājanaka II. While repeating the names of Maitreyī, Yājñavalkya, Sītā, and Janaka, this tradition rapidly instituted Vidyapati's sacred-thread ceremony and the installation of a ceremonial turban. The peaceful speed of that transformation suited the so-called mainstream of the Śatapatha Brāhmaṇa.

After Madhav Singh's decree concerning the branch genealogical registers (śākhā pañjī) in 1760, a new cult of high lineage spread among Brahmins and Kayasthas in Mithila. The bhalmanus (battesagamiya) subgroup arose among Karna Kayasthas, and the Śrotriya subgroup among Maithil Brahmins. According to the author, physical and mental illnesses increased alarmingly in these two groups, as did polygamy, child marriage, and the number of widows. The peaceful but rapid manner of these changes, too, suited the so-called Śatapatha Brāhmaṇa mainstream.

The Views of Dineshwar Lal Anand and Ramvriksh Benipuri on Vidyapati

Dineshwar Lal Anand was mistaken in believing that the genealogical registers were secret in that period. The pañjī had classified Bisfi—of the branch associated with the Sanskrit-and-Avahaṭṭha Vidyapati—as Jaywar, a lower rank. Branch registers did not exist before 1760; evidence, the author argues, is that the descendants of the line of Ayachi Mishra occur both in the Śrotriya subgroup and among Brahmins outside it. This would be like finding bulls, but no cows, on the seals of the Indus Valley civilisation: how could bulls have arisen without cows? Anand did not have access to all the facts in the pañjī. Perhaps, having been drawn into the propaganda that the Vidyapati of the Padāvalī and the Vidyapati of Sanskrit and Avahaṭṭha were one person, he thought that connecting the lower ranking of Bisfi in the genealogical records with writing in Avahaṭṭha would explain why Vidyapati Ṭhakkura became a revolutionary. Yet Anand also acknowledges that no collection of the Padāvalī compiled in Vidyapati's own hand—or even in his lifetime—is known. How is this possible, when the Sanskrit-and-Avahaṭṭha Vidyapati announces the beginning and end of his Sanskrit and Avahaṭṭha works so resoundingly, recording which kings and queens inspired him and whose patronage he enjoyed? His books display a full sense of authorship and the power of both Sarasvatī and Lakṣmī. Why, then, not the Padāvalī? Anand is silent. The Sanskrit-and-Avahaṭṭha Vidyapati describes his patrons but says virtually nothing about himself in his Sanskrit or Avahaṭṭha writings. He even appears to feel pressure while writing Avahaṭṭha, then the literary language of the mainstream. Yet the influence of the Vidyapati who preceded Jyotirishwar was so powerful that Maithili songs had to be included in the Sanskrit play Gorakṣavijaya, just as Jyotirishwar, the earliest reporter of Bidapat, included Maithili songs in his Sanskrit play Dhūrtasamāgama.

Govind Jha recognises Vidyapati's tradition in Jyotirishwar's Vidañot and discusses it. Why, then, does he fail to carry the investigation back to a Vidyapati predating Jyotirishwar, even while Bideshwar Thakur sings himself to death? How does the place where Vidyapati became thirsty in a play suddenly become the playwright's own village? Everyone writes a play about "my Vidyapati" according to their own convenience.

Ramvriksh Benipuri, too, lacked the genealogical evidence. On the basis of the invention of a subcaste and a legend, he writes laughingly of Keshav Mishra's Vidyapati. This Keshav Mishra of the Dvaita appendix was a grandson of Vācaspati II (1400–1490). Another Keshav Mishra, dated to about 1150, wrote the Tarkabhāṣā, which Vardhamāna, son of Gaṅgeśa, the author of the Tattvacintāmaṇi, discusses in his Tarkaprakāśa. Neither Benipuri nor any mainstream researcher in the hundred years after Ananda Coomaraswamy advanced even one step beyond Coomaraswamy's research of 1915. Benipuri repeats the story of Ugna, but says nothing about whether Mahādeva would dance on Mount Kailash to the hardline Sanskrit-and-Avahaṭṭha Vidyapati's Śaivasarvasvasāra or to the nācārī of the earlier Vidyapati. Like Coomaraswamy, Benipuri knows that a Bhāgavata manuscript in the hand of the Sanskrit-and-Avahaṭṭha Vidyapati survives, and the story of how Vidyapati attained gaṅgālābha: the Ganges drew him into herself. Like Coomaraswamy, Benipuri has heard of the Sanskrit-and-Avahaṭṭha Vidyapati's Puruṣaparīkṣā, but has not read it. Had he read it, he would have realised that the story of gaṅgālābha there is told of Bodhi Kayastha. A similar story was current about the Vidyapati who preceded Jyotirishwar, just as the Ugna story was; it was later attached, through ritual appropriation, to the Sanskrit-and-Avahaṭṭha Vidyapati. The account of Bodhi Kayastha in Puruṣaparīkṣā is the evidence. Benipuri even calls Kīrtipatākā a collection of Maithili songs! Is scholarly research conducted by asking around? Why has the exhausted mainstream failed to advance beyond the foundation laid by Coomaraswamy a century earlier? Because, the author argues, the mainstream shaped by the Śatapatha Brāhmaṇa does not permit it. Yet without evidence, Puraditya, a friend of Shivasimha, is declared a Bhumihar Brahmin, just as Ramanath Jha called Govinddas (Jha) a Śrotriya—a claim Sukumar Sen deemed ridiculous—while Ramdev Jha made him a Brahmin and Vermaji, writing in the Laldas memorial volume, made Kalidasa a Kayastha.

The Sanskrit-and-Avahaṭṭha Vidyapati opens and closes his books with a complete apparatus of ritual, recalling the kings, queens, and patrons who supported him, yet gives no account of himself. Why did the Padāvalī survive in the throats of the people? Why did he not provide it with the same elaborate book-making apparatus? Because, the author argues, those songs had been composed centuries before him, when the ceremonial turban had not yet appeared in Mithila. The names Rupanarayan, Shivasimha, Lakhima, Dev Singh, Har Singh, Padma Singh, Vishwas Devi, Arjun-Amar, Raghav Singh, Rudra Singh, Dhir Singh, Bhairav Singh, Chandra Singh, and others were later inserted into the Padāvalī, audibly disrupting the metre of the songs. The Sanskrit-and-Avahaṭṭha Vidyapati's Bhūparikramā (Dev Singh), Kīrtilatā (Kirti Singh and Vir Singh), Kīrtipatākā, Gorakṣavijaya (Shivasimha), Likhanāvalī (Puraditya), Dānavākyāvalī (Queen Dhirmati), and other works were manifestly composed under royal patronage. The play Gorakṣavijaya was written for the worship of Bhairava; like Dhūrtasamāgama, it contained Maithili songs, which the author attributes to the powerful influence of the pre-Jyotirishwar Vidyapati. Had their names not been alike, Jyotirishwar himself would have been turned into that earlier Vidyapati.

Conclusion

Gaṅgeśa, author of the Tattvacintāmaṇi, wrote one book equal, it is said, to twelve thousand books. Professor Dinesh Chandra Bhattacharya writes in A History of Navya-Nyāya in Mithila: "The family which was regarded as low in social position has now disappeared from Mithila … Gaṅgeśa's family is completely neglected; we cannot even be expected to know the name of his father." Bhattacharya says that Professor R. Jha (Ramanath Jha) supplied him with this information.

Let us turn now to the facts recorded in the genealogical registers. They state explicitly, the author says, that Gaṅgeśa was born five years after his father's death and married a woman of the leatherworking community. Why did Ramanath Jha conceal this from Dinesh Chandra Bhattacharya? A subgroup spread the story of Gaṅgeśa's transformation from fool to scholar, and a conspiracy was undertaken to efface him.

Gaṅgeśa's son Vardhamāna calls him sukavi-kairava-kānana-induḥ, "the moon among the water-lilies of fine poets." Yet the preceding examples, the author argues, help explain the conspiracy through which the poetry of so celebrated a scholar has become unavailable. Vāsudeva was a fellow student of Pakṣadhara Miśra in Bengal; he came to Mithila for his studies, passed the śalākā examination, and received the title Sārvabhauma. Vāsudeva committed to memory the verses of Gaṅgeśa's Tattvacintāmaṇi and Udayana's Nyāyakusumāñjali. Pakṣadhara and other teachers in Mithila did not permit students to copy the Tattvacintāmaṇi. Raghunātha Śiromaṇi, Vāsudeva's pupil, defeated his teacher Pakṣadhara Miśra in debate and thereby won the right to reproduce the text. Vāsudeva and Raghunātha established a school of Navya-Nyāya at Navadvīpa. Pakṣadhara was a contemporary of the Sanskrit-and-Avahaṭṭha Vidyapati; with Raghunātha, students from Bengal ceased coming to Mithila.

Grierson declared the Bisfi copperplate granted by Shivasimha to the Sanskrit-and-Avahaṭṭha Vidyapati a forgery, because he knew the Padāvalī and recognised that its Vidyapati could not have received such a grant. But the copperplate had, the author argues, been given to the Sanskrit-and-Avahaṭṭha Vidyapati; Grierson did not consider that there were two different figures. Mahāmahopādhyāya Haraprasad Shastri did consider this distinction and pronounced the copperplate genuine.

Śrīdharadāsa's Saduktikarṇāmṛta contains the Kaivarta Papīhā's hymn in praise of the Ganges and songs of Rādhā and Kṛṣṇa. Dhoyī, court poet to Lakṣmaṇasena, was a jolhā (weaver).

Lakhima Thakurain did not write a Padāvalī; she wrote Sanskrit verse (Grierson). The inscription of Śrīdharadāsa is at Andhratharhi; he served as a minister to Nānyadeva and Gaṅgadeva. His descendant Amiyakar was a contemporary of the Sanskrit-and-Avahaṭṭha Vidyapati. Upendra Thakur considers Gaṅgadeva a Kalachuri. Vijay Kumar Thakur takes a Vidyapati song in Śrīdharadāsa's Saduktikarṇāmṛta as praise of the Kalachuri Karṇa. Radhakrishna Choudhary disagrees.

In any event, this Vidyapati preceded Jyotirishwar.

In the Rāmacarita, Vigrahapāla III defeats Karṇa. Radhakrishna Choudhary found two Pāla inscriptions at Naulagarh, sixteen kilometres north of Begusarai, relating to this episode. This Karṇa, too, belongs to the eleventh century.

The Padāvalī of the pre-Jyotirishwar Vidyapati is well known in Bengal; Jyotirishwar's Dhūrtasamāgama is known in South India. After this, the flow of students from Bengal into Mithila ceased, as did the outward movement of Mithila's drama and Padāvalī.

Phanishwar Nath Renu: A Vidyapati of Folk Song

Introduction

While "researching" the great poet Vidyapati, I felt compelled to give one chapter the title "Vidyapati: Poet of Cultivators, Farm Labourers, and Cart Drivers." For even today, in the Purnia–Saharsa region, there are troupes that sing the Padāvalī of Vidyapati, act out its feelings, and dance. The leaders of these troupes are generally buffalo-herders, cowherds, or cart drivers. I asked the Maithil pandits about this.

How had it come about? They replied: "Why get caught up in all that? It is because of such fools that Vidyapati is in such a sorry state today. Whenever it takes their fancy, these ordinary people string together four verses in Vidyapati's name ... You are being led astray." Disregarding the prohibitions of Mithila's pandits, I happily prepared for a journey to Saharsa (or Saharsha?). Kanchira is a village administered by the district authorities of two different districts. Half the village lies in Saharsa, the other half in Purnia.

The Vidyapati troupe of Kanchira is known in both districts. On the day I reached the village, an unexpected event had just occurred. A political leader who had represented the area for ten years had been defeated at the election. Dancing and singing that night might therefore be interpreted in an entirely different way. Fearing this, Janakdas, leader of the "Vidyapati troupe," would not allow a performance.

The following night he consented, but only after much pleading. After considerable argument and many roundabout, repeated assertions, Janakdas claimed that the "Vidyapati dance" had first originated in his own family. He would never explain the matter in detail. Once he was satisfied that I had not come to extract a thousand or two thousand rupees from the government treasury in the name of a "Vidyapati dance troupe," he struck the mṛdaṅga. I watched the performance all night. A boy who grazed cattle put on a sari and became Radha, distraught by separation, singing through tears: "For how many days, O Hari, will you torment a woman left all alone?" The following day I asked Janakdas about the history of the dance's origin. "Who knows," he replied, "since when the original singing of this dance has been passed down through our family?" The reason for Janakdas's displeasure was my tape recorder. "You have cleverly recorded all the songs on your tape in secret. You have accomplished your work for nothing, have you?" Even after I gave him fifty rupees in cash, he would not answer my question: when, and how, had cultivators, field labourers, herders, and cart drivers begun to sing and dance to Vidyapati's Padāvalī? I lay all day on the straw in Janakdas's cattle shed; he showed no pity. Even his young widowed daughter pleaded on my behalf, but he remained unmoved: did I expect him to have a matter that would bring ridicule upon his family "printed" in a "gazette"? Old Janakdas untied his oxen and went out to graze them. I remained in his shed. What happened next I cannot say with certainty: did I hear a story, see a dream, or fall under some "illusion"?

Bidapat Naach (Original Reportage by Phanishwar Nath Renu)

Bidapat Naach

It is generally believed that this dance originated in Darbhanga district. What condition it has fallen into in its own birthplace hardly needs describing; yet it is still cherished in villages of several North Bihar districts, as well as in Bhagalpur, Purnia, and elsewhere. It has been left as a dance of the "little people." Members of so-called respectable society think it beneath their dignity to watch it. Among Musahars, Dhangars, and Dusadhs, however, the dance is a great attraction at weddings, tonsure ceremonies, and other occasions. A troupe generally consists of seven or eight performers and uses only two musical instruments: the mṛdaṅga and the mañjīrā (hand cymbals).

Come, then: let us enjoy a performance of Bidapat Naach. Put aside your respectability for a little while …

> Dhrung dhā, dhrung dhā tinnā—the mṛdaṅga burst into sound. Kun kun kun kun … the cymbals joined its rhythm.
> "Gaṇanāyakaṃ phaladāyakaṃ paṇḍitam patitam …" Do not laugh. That was the invocation, in pure Sanskrit.
> Dhrungā dhrungā dhrungā dhrungā—the mṛdaṅga began to beat.
> Kiṅkā, kiṅkā, kiṅkā, kiṅkā—the cymbals kept it company.

The dancer began circling in every direction in which the accompanying performers (samājī) stood. Behind him, the bipaṭā—the clown—spun like a top, pulling faces in every conceivable way and crying, "Oy! Oy! Oy! Oy!"

Dhirināṅgī, dhirināṅgī, dhirināṅgī, dhirināṅgī—the mṛdaṅga shifted its beat to a different tune. Kiṅkā, kiṅkā … Enough for now. You have made us dance long enough. We will return to the story of the performance later.

The accompanying singer joined in.

"O, she entered, supremely delicate, Swan-gaited darling of Vṛṣabhānu …"
"O, body and mind and face, borne upon the breeze,
The moon rose above the lightning …"
"Then she covered her face in modesty …"
"When my beloved comes into the courtyard,
I shall turn away with the faintest smile;
Kānhā will try so hard to win me …"
"O friend …
All my life I have gazed upon that beauty,
Yet my eyes have never had their fill."

"Listen here, leader-ji."

"Yes?"

"Now listen to me as well."

"Oh, father!
What misfortune have I not endured?
For seven years I paid the interest,
Yet still my debt was not discharged.
My burden only kept growing;
I sold my water pot and took up watchman's work.
I am Fataḳnāth Girdhārī."
Dhrungā-dhrungā, dhidhinnā tinnā …
"O friend!
This is the month of Bhādo, clouds fill the sky,
My house stands empty …"

Beautiful! Beautiful! Vidyapati truly is the cuckoo of Mithila …

There you go rambling again. You are no better than the bipaṭā. However often you are warned, like him you cannot hear a song without adding some remark. Look, here comes Mr Bipaṭā once more …

"This is the month of Bhādo, and the rain pours down;
My thatched roof is leaking."

"Ha-ha-ha!" The audience is helpless with laughter. Ah, I forgot to tell you something: the bipaṭā imagines himself to be Krishna, and also the lover who has gone abroad. But at the same time he never forgets that he is Kalru Musahar of Halhaliya, and that although he is human, his position, he feels, is no better than that of an ox turning an oil press. When the dancers throw their arms about his neck and display love through pride and wounded pride, making him understand that "Mādhav has abandoned me and gone to a foreign land," he forgets for a moment that he is supposed to be Krishna travelling from Gokul to Mathura. The inequities of his own life rise before him in bodily form and begin to dance, and he sings:

"Neither Ādrā nor Aśleṣā brought rain;
Everywhere I see the grey hair of old women ...
Fish and turtles have fled to the depths;
Will a terrible famine now descend, O friend?
A whole day's labour earns one seer of grain;
How can life be sustained on that?
Leaving you behind, beloved, I must go away to another land."

But in the very next moment, when the performer begins to sing:

"Carrying her darling in her lap, she went to market;
The people in the bazaar asked, 'What relation is he to you?'
'My mother-in-law's boy, my sister-in-law's husband's elder brother—
He is my husband, allotted to me by destiny.'"

The bipaṭā now begins clamouring like a child for jalebi, batasha, and toys.

Just then one of the dancing performers sings:

"When night gave way to dawn,
My husband returned.
His skilful hands trembled; the necklace burned against my breast;
With lotus hands upon my heart, he gazed at my moonlike face."

The bipaṭā interrupts and asks one of the accompanying performers to explain its meaning. The performer launches into an expansive commentary on the song: how the heroine lay sleeping upon straw in her hut, and how the bipaṭā arrived there.

Now come among the spectators. Young women, dark-skinned, strong, and full-bodied, struggle to conceal their gentle smiles. Nudging one another and whispering with delight, they stare intently at the bipaṭā. Middle-aged women feign indignation and try to restrain the younger women, but what can restrain suppressed laughter or a heart bursting with amusement?

Meanwhile the dancers raise their voices in a sustained melody:

"Come, my heart, come, my heart ... to my husband's home
We shall go, O Rama;
For, O Rama, in my parents' home
Shall I set a fire ...?"

The young women grow restless, while electricity seems to course through the young men's veins. The dance is nearing its end:

"Come, my heart, come, my heart ...
Dhin dhinak dhinak, dhin dhinak dhinak ...
For, O Rama, shall I set fire to my parents' home ...?
Dim dimik dimik, dim dimik dimik ..."

What is this? Oh, it is Chethru Gusain-ji. Gusain-ji is a devotee of Kabir. Ten or fifteen years ago, at the landlord's bidding, he refused to give false testimony. Angered, the landlord turned him out of his home, and ever since he has lived as a renunciant. A khanjari, a begging bag and tongs; matted locks and a long beard ... Look! Gusain-ji begins to play his khanjari and dance beside the performers.

"Dim dimik dimik, dim dimik dimik ...
For, O Rama, in my parents' home shall I set fire ..."

The fact is that Chethru Gusain-ji regards this song as entirely nirguṇa—a song of the formless divine.

Ah! Tears glisten in his sunken eyes. And the dance is over.

(Phanishwar Nath Renu's reportage appeared in the weekly Vishwamitra on 1 August 1945. This Maithili translation from Hindi, by Madhupnath Jha, published in Videha: Sadeh II, is dedicated to Phanishwar Nath Renu.)

Jayakant Mishra (1922–2009), a pioneer of Maithili studies, died at seven in the evening on 3 February 2009. A major scholar of Maithili literature, Dr Jayakant Mishra retired in 1982 as Professor and Head of the Department of English and Modern European Languages at the University of Allahabad. He subsequently served as Dean of Languages and Social Sciences at Chitrakoot Gramodaya University. The late Mishra was President of the All India Maithili Sahitya Samiti, Allahabad; honorary secretary and editor of the Ganganath Research Institute, Allahabad; convenor of the management department of the Hindi Sahitya Sammelan, Prayag; and the Maithili representative and language editor of the Sahitya Akademi, New Delhi. Among his books are History of Maithili Literature, Folk Literature of Mithila, critical editions of Kirtaniya dramas, Lectures on Thomas Hardy, Lectures on Four Poets and The Complex Style in English Poetry. Only two volumes of his great Maithili dictionary could be published. Its Maithili headwords were given not only in Devanagari but also in Mithilakshar and English phonetic transcription. These two volumes will remain a source of inspiration to compilers of Maithili dictionaries. The sixteen-volume Maithili–English dictionary based on the Videha database, by Gajendra Thakur, Nagendra Kumar Jha and the genealogist Vidyanand Jha, presents words and meanings in Mithilakshar, International Phonetic Roman script and Devanagari. It has been dedicated to Jayakant Mishra, Dinbandhu Jha and Govind Jha, Bhavanath Mishra and Matinath Mishra ‘Matang’, and Yugalkishore Mishra.

The making of Maithili dictionaries began comparatively late. The first serious effort was the collection of 1,125 verbal roots and forms in Dinbandhu Jha’s Mithila Bhasha Vidyotan (1946), followed by his Mithilabhashakosh: Shabdakosh (1952). Earlier, the first volume of Bhav Nath Mishra’s Mithila Shabda Prakash had appeared in 1914, but it was so brief that it might better be called a glossary than a dictionary. Alice Irvine Davis’s Basic Colloquial Maithili: A Maithili–Nepali–English Vocabulary (1984) is likewise very brief. The Maithili Akademi’s Maithili Shabdakosh (1993; originally compiled by Yugalkishore Mishra) was the first to appear on an ambitious scale. Yet, among its long list of convenors, editors, executive editors, editorial subcommittees and so on, Yugalkishore Mishra's name seems to have been squeezed into the middle merely as the 'original compiler'.

Meanwhile, the first volume of Jayakant Mishra's comprehensive Maithili dictionary appeared in 1973 and the second in 1995. Together, they could cover entries beginning with the vowels from a to au and only the first page of words beginning with ka. With Jayakant Babu's death, the appearance of further volumes is now no longer possible.

Matinath Mishra 'Matang', son of Bhav Nath Mishra, published Maithili Shabda Kalpadruma in 1998. Following the Maithili Akademi, Patna, dictionary compiled by Yugalkishore Mishra, this was the second large-scale compilation to appear. It also reproduced, at the beginning, the first volume of Bhav Nath Mishra's Mithila Shabda Prakash.

Dinbandhu Jha's son Govind Jha published the Maithili–English dictionary Kalyani Kosh in 1999. Like Jayakant Babu's dictionary, it was bilingual, providing English meanings alongside Maithili words. In 2007 Umesh Chandra Jha's concise quadrilingual dictionary (Maithili, Sanskrit, Hindi and English) also appeared.

In addition, a comprehensive Maithili dictionary has also been proposed by Sajha Prakashan, Nepal.

English Dictionaries Based on Databases

Apart from historically significant English dictionaries, three modern dictionaries deserve mention for their scientific approach grounded in databases or computerised corpora of written and spoken language—words drawn from periodicals, books, conversations, radio and television programmes, and manuscripts: 1. Oxford Advanced Learner's Dictionary (from its first edition of 1948 to its seventh edition of 1995);

2. Longman Dictionary of Contemporary English (from its first edition of 1978 to its fifth edition of 2009); and

3. Collins COBUILD Advanced Learner's English Dictionary (from its first edition of 1995 to its sixth edition of 2008).

Microsoft Encarta Dictionary, available on CD and online, also provides audio recordings of pronunciation. The CD editions of Oxford Advanced Learner's Dictionary and other dictionaries likewise provide recorded pronunciations.

The excellence of a dictionary should be judged by the vocabulary it collects. First, readers must be able to find the word they are seeking. That is impossible unless the dictionary is up to date, grounded in fieldwork across all regions of Mithila and attentive to new usages among Maithili speakers living elsewhere. It must include new subjects such as the internet, science, the arts, commerce, computing and contemporary developments. Scholarly judgement must work alongside technology in selecting material; the corpus should embrace games and sport, everyday conversation, written literature and oral traditions. Definition is equally important: the linguistic analysis of a selected word must be fine-grained enough to leave out none of its contextual meanings. In this connection, it is worth noting that if Dinbandhu Jha's 1,125 verbal roots and forms were enlarged and revised slightly, bringing the set to roughly 2,000 basic words, Maithili speakers whose command of the language is not strong could use them to understand the meanings and contexts of all the entries in a Maithili dictionary of 50,000 to 100,000 words.

The meanings of dictionary entries should be ordered from the most frequent to the least frequent. Spoken pronunciation and actual usage must also be attended to. Readers should be told which words are common and which occur only occasionally. Proverbs, too, should be illustrated wherever appropriate with examples of use.

Compounds, proverbial compounds, derivatives, synonyms and antonyms must be collected with the relevant headword. The dictionary should also show how additional words combine with a word or idiom, and how the resulting expressions can carry the same or a related meaning.

Grammatical discussion should be provided where appropriate, showing similarities as well as differences. Changes in a word's meaning according to its use in a sentence must be explained.

Illustrations are also needed to clarify dictionary entries. A modern scientific dictionary should represent variations in pronunciation.

The contextual use of idioms and proverbs should also be recorded wherever such usage exists. For instance, Brahmins may say, 'Ten Brahmins, ten stomachs; ten rāṛ, one stomach,' whereas those described as occupying the lower rungs of the caste hierarchy may say, 'Ten Brahmins, one stomach; ten rāṛ, ten stomachs.'

Dinbandhu Jha's Dhātupāṭha in Mithilabhasha Vidyotan provides particularly fine accounts of the derivation of meanings. For example, entry (10), ḍik, means 'the accumulation of an excess': 'This place is deep, and therefore water has ḍikaled here'—that is, an excess of water has collected. The forty-three tables in the two volumes of Mithila Bhasha Vidyotan describe the etymology of Maithili words in considerable detail. The introduction to Dinbandhu Jha's Mithila Bhasha Kosh also examines the syntactic relationships, pronunciation, grammatical gender and grammar of many words. The dictionary proper gives, for most though not all entries, the word, its constituent parts, grammatical characteristics and meaning. At places it records variant forms and changes of meaning when words are combined with verbs and other elements. In the Maithili Akademi, Patna, dictionary compiled by Yugalkishore Mishra, the headword is followed by its grammatical characteristics and meaning. Alice Irvine Davis's Basic Colloquial Maithili: A Maithili–Nepali–English Vocabulary (1984) uses only Roman and phonetic Roman letters, giving a Maithili headword, its grammatical properties and its meanings in Nepali and English. After some structural notes, it provides Nepali and English indexes through which Nepali-to-Maithili and English-to-Maithili meanings may be found. Bhavanath Mishra's Mithila Shabda Prakash gives a word in the language of Mithila, then its meanings in Hindi and Sanskrit, then its grammatical gender, and finally a Sanskrit citation as evidence. Matinath Mishra 'Matang' presents in Maithili Shabda Kalpadruma the Maithili word, its grammatical features and meaning, and finally identifies whether it is Maithili, regional/indigenous (deśaja), tatsama or tadbhava. Govind Jha's Kalyani Kosh: A Maithili–English Dictionary includes some analyses of structure and pronunciation in its preface and tables in the appendices of verbal suffixes, nominal suffixes and units; solar months and lunar mansions; lunar months; different eras; weights, measures, linear and square measures; currency; and miscellaneous calculations. The dictionary proper gives the Maithili word in Devanagari, then its transcription in a Roman phonetic alphabet, its grammatical characteristics, and its meaning in Maithili and English. Alternative meanings and contextual uses are sometimes supplied. Umesh Chandra Jha's quadrilingual dictionary gives the Maithili headword with Sanskrit, Hindi and English equivalents. C-DAC's Tāntrāṃśa software dictionaries, Maithili–English and English–Maithili, give English meanings when Maithili is entered and Maithili meanings when English is entered. The Maithili–English and English–Maithili dictionaries by Gajendra Thakur, Nagendra Kumar Jha and the genealogist Vidyanand Jha have been developed from the Videha database and corpus. They are available in print and online (at http://w ww.videha.co.in/) and are continually being expanded. Alongside modern fields, these dictionaries include the vocabulary of the internet, computers and science. At present the Maithili–English dictionary presents the Maithili headword in the International Phonetic Alphabet, then transliterations of that word in Devanagari and Mithilakshar, followed by its meaning in the International Phonetic Alphabet, Devanagari and Mithilakshar, and finally its meaning in English and its grammatical features. The English–Maithili dictionary drawn from the Videha corpus gives the English word and its grammatical features, then its meaning in the International Phonetic Alphabet, Devanagari and Mithilakshar, and finally its meaning in English. Once the whole database has been printed, the plan for a second edition is to arrange meanings in order from more frequent to less frequent; include compounds, proverb-based compounds, derivatives, synonyms and antonyms; discuss the grammatical similarities and differences among words used with idioms; add illustrations; show the contextual use of idioms and proverbs; and supply sentence examples from the Videha corpus. It is further proposed to provide a Tāntrāṃśa software dictionary on CD with recorded pronunciations. Pronunciation audio files, in any case, have already been placed online in the archive at http://www.videha.co.in/ for listening and download.

Jayakant Mishra and the Maithili Dictionary: An Assessment

A dictionary is not so much written as compiled. Yet, when a subject is new, words sometimes have to be coined with reference to oral and literary traditions, while borrowings from other languages must also be accepted where appropriate. Though a dictionary's principal purpose is collection, in practice it inevitably advances standardisation and influences popular usage. For that reason, the responsibility of the dictionary editor becomes all the greater.

Seen in this light, Jayakant Mishra's dictionary is inferior to no modern dictionary. Indeed, it goes a step further: to establish the meaning of a word, it gives contextual examples drawn from corpora covering early Maithili (from the eighth century to 1324 CE, including the Caryāpada and Jyotirishwar), the earlier medieval period (1324–1500 CE, including Vidyapati), the medieval period (1500–1860 CE, including Lochan and Govind Das), and modern Maithili (1860–1960 CE, including Chanda Jha and Harimohan Jha).

Jayakant Mishra's Maithili dictionary and the work of further study entitled Jayakant Mishra and the Maithili Dictionary can thus become complementary to one another if his work is carried forward and completed.

Abstract

Gaṅgeśa Upādhyāya: Life, Logic, the Tattvacintāmaṇi, and His Legacy in the Navya-Nyāya Tradition. Life, Logic, the Tattvacintāmaṇi, and His Legacy in the Navya-Nyāya Tradition. The land of Mithila has been one of Asia's most consistently productive centres of Sanskrit intellectual culture.

Keywords: Gaṅgeśa · Upādhyāya · Theory of Criticism · Maithili

Abstract · Summary

This integrated study brings into a single sequence Gaṅgeśa Upādhyāya's biography, evidence from pañjī genealogical registers, the four pramāṇa divisions of the Tattvacintāmaṇi, the validity and invalidity of cognition, perception–inference–comparison–testimony, vyāpti, kārakavāda, the avacchedaka-based language of Navya-Nyāya, the commentary tradition, comparative perspectives in world philosophy, and Mithila's parallel intellectual history. Repeated discussions have been consolidated as far as possible while preserving the original arguments, examples, archival particulars, and technical analyses.

Biography: A Three-Tiered Appraisal of Sources

A distinctive contribution of these chapters is their multilayered presentation of Gaṅgeśa's life. The traditional miracle stories—the supposedly slow-witted boy, the boon from Kālī, the humiliation in his maternal uncle's household—are treated as narratives; historical dating (around 1320 CE, the reign of Harisiṃhadeva, and residence at Kariyan) is considered through documentary sources; and social particulars drawn from the pañjī registers—birth five years after his father's death, a marriage across caste boundaries to a woman of the leatherworking community, and the evidence of the Dūṣaṇa Pañjī—constitute a third, parallel evidentiary stream. This three-tiered appraisal of sources distinguishes the book from conventional biography and brings it closer to modern historiographical method.

Introduction: A Philosopher of Mithila

The land of Mithila has been one of Asia's most continuously productive centres of Sanskrit intellectual culture. It was here, in King Janaka's court, that the philosophical dialogues of the Bṛhadāraṇyaka Upaniṣad took place. Yājñavalkya, Gautama, and Kātyāyana—central names in the Nyāya-sūtra tradition and Vedic grammar—are all assigned a Maithil origin or association. It was here that the poet Vidyāpati sang in Maithili, raising the literature of the people to greatness; and here, according to this account, the astronomer-mathematician Āryabhaṭa drew his earliest intellectual breath. In this productive, disputatious, profoundly scholastic setting, Gaṅgeśa Upādhyāya composed the work that changed the face of Indian philosophy.

Early in the fourteenth century, Gaṅgeśa Upādhyāya composed the Tattvacintāmaṇi—The Jewel of Reflection on Truth—and permanently transformed India's intellectual landscape. The Tattvacintāmaṇi (literally, 'the thought-jewel of truth', also called Pramāṇacintāmaṇi or simply Cintāmaṇi) is his sole surviving major work. It is a treatise on pramāṇa, the valid means of knowledge, divided into four books: (1) Pratyakṣa-khaṇḍa (perception), (2) Anumāna-khaṇḍa (inference), (3) Upamāna-khaṇḍa (comparison or analogy), and (4) Śabda-khaṇḍa (verbal testimony). The Tattvacintāmaṇi is Gaṅgeśa's only surviving work and one of the most extensively commented-upon texts in the Sanskrit tradition. Abandoning the older Nyāya-Vaiśeṣika ambition to cover the full range of categories and restricting the inquiry to the means of knowledge, Gaṅgeśa gave the tradition a more sharply defined aim and, correspondingly, a new name. Nyāya literature before him is called Prācīna-Nyāya, or old logic; that following his work is Navya-Nyāya, or new logic. Simplified though this periodisation is, it captures a real qualitative transformation: in terminology, method, standards of analytical exactness, and the displacement of older commentaries by the Tattvacintāmaṇi as the school's central text.

Although Gaṅgeśa consolidated the school, the true founder of the method he brought to perfection was the eleventh-century polymath Udayanācārya, whose Pariśuddhi and Kusumāñjali mark the threshold at which the classical age of Nyāya came to an end. Modern scholarly consensus, including the Stanford Encyclopedia of Philosophy, identifies Gaṅgeśa as a mahopādhyāya ('great teacher') in the kingdom of Mithila.

In mainstream Indian philosophical historiography, Gaṅgeśa Upādhyāya is revered as the undisputed architect of Navya-Nyāya. In his Hindi monograph, Bhāratīya Sāhitya ke Nirmātā: Gaṅgeśa Upādhyāya, Udayanath Jha 'Ashok' places Gaṅgeśa's dates at approximately 1300–1350 CE. Jha portrays a scholar who earned the prestigious title Mahāmahopādhyāya, a distinction reserved in Mithila for philosophers of exceptional mastery in Nyāya, Mīmāṃsā, and Dharmaśāstra.

Likewise, Dinesh Chandra Bhattacharya's History of Navya-Nyāya in Mithila traces the region's intellectual genealogy, mapping the development from Gautama's earlier prameya-centred (ontological) Nyāya to Gaṅgeśa's pramāṇa-centred (epistemological) rigour.

Comparison of these polished, orthodox accounts with the Dūṣaṇa Pañjī —the genealogical register of social transgressions or 'faults' in Mithila— reveals a significant discrepancy, documented at length in the research undertaken for Videha's Parallel History.

The Dūṣaṇa Pañjī, according to this account, discloses two startling biographical particulars about Gaṅgeśa Upādhyāya:

1. Posthumous birth: Gaṅgeśa was born five years after his father's death.

2. Marriage recorded in the pañjī: Gaṅgeśa married Vallabhā, a woman identified as a carmakāriṇī, belonging to the leatherworking community.

The Historiographical 'Honour Killing' of Truth

The discrepancy between mainstream works and the Dūṣaṇa Pañjī, the author argues, is not accidental: it represents active historiographical suppression. Professor Ramanath Jha, a central figure in the modern Maithili pañjī system, is mentioned in the Parallel History records in connection with the suppression of these particular Dūṣaṇa Pañjī entries.

Because Gaṅgeśa had brought Mithila to the position of an undisputed capital of Indian logic, acknowledgement of his posthumous birth and marriage outside his caste threatened the Brahmanical narratives of purity of that age. Consequently, orthodox historians engaged in what the Parallel History calls 'the honour killing of his legacy'. Udayanath Jha's recent monograph, in this interpretation, perpetuates that silence by concentrating wholly on Gaṅgeśa's Sanskrit titles and philosophical stature while disregarding the sociohistorical reality of his marginalised personal background. Recognition of this suppression matters to modern scholarship because it presents Gaṅgeśa not merely as an elite logician but as a brilliant mind who overcame immense social exclusion.

The Transition to Navya-Nyāya: A Paradigm Shift from Prameya to Pramāṇa

As Karl H. Potter notes in the Encyclopedia of Indian Philosophies (Volume 6), classical Nyāya dealt with sixteen categories, encompassing ontology, epistemology, and the dialectics of disputation. Gaṅgeśa initiated an unprecedented paradigm shift by setting aside that vast metaphysical framework and concentrating exclusively on pramāṇa—the valid means by which knowledge is acquired.

By devoting the Tattvacintāmaṇi entirely to epistemology, Gaṅgeśa developed a language of extraordinary technical precision. He created new logical operators, such as avacchedaka (delimitor), to avoid ambiguity—a method whose analytical rigour Stephen Phillips and Ben-Ami Scharfstein compare with that of twentieth-century Western analytic philosophers such as Frege and Russell.

The Pratyakṣa-khaṇḍa

The first and foundational book of the Tattvacintāmaṇi is the Pratyakṣa-khaṇḍa, on perception. Drawing on the detailed translations and explanations of V. P. Bhatta and S. C. Vidyabhusana, this book defines the mechanisms of perceptual cognition.

Maṅgalavāda and Prāmāṇyavāda (the Validity of Knowledge)

Gaṅgeśa begins with maṅgalavāda, the theory of auspicious invocation, justifying the necessity of invoking the deity Śiva for the successful completion of an undertaking. He then turns to the intensely contested prāmāṇyavāda, the theory of validity.

- The Mīmāṃsaka position: Prabhākara and Kumārila argued for svataḥ-prāmāṇya (intrinsic validity): cognition, from the very moment it arises, establishes its own validity.
- Gaṅgeśa's Naiyāyika position: Gaṅgeśa vigorously defends parataḥ-prāmāṇya (extrinsic validity). He argues that a cognition's validity is not intrinsically known through that very cognition; it is inferred subsequently from successful practical activity (saṃvādi-pravṛtti). For example, merely seeing water is confirmed as valid knowledge only when a person approaches it and succeeds in quenching their thirst.

Sannikarṣa (Sense–Object Contact)

Perception (pratyakṣa) is defined as cognition produced by contact between a sense faculty and its object (indriyārtha-sannikarṣa). Gaṅgeśa describes six forms of ordinary contact:

1. Saṃyoga (conjunction): for example, seeing a pot with one's eyes.

2. Saṃyukta-samavāya (inherence in a conjoined object): seeing the colour of the pot.

3. Saṃyukta-samaveta-samavāya (inherence in what inheres in a conjoined object): perceiving the universal 'colourness' through the eye.

4. Samavāya (inherence): hearing a sound with the ear.

5. Samaveta-samavāya (inherence in an inherent property): apprehending the universal 'soundness' through the ear.

6. Viśeṣaṇa-viśeṣya-bhāva (the qualifier–qualified relation): perceiving an absence, such as the absence of a pot on the floor.

Savikalpaka and Nirvikalpaka

• Nirvikalpaka (indeterminate perception): a raw, preconceptual apprehension of an object, without its qualifications. It is inexpressible and nonlinguistic.

• Savikalpaka (determinate perception): apprehension of an object in relation to its properties, as in 'This is a blue pot'. Only determinate perception can be expressed in language and judged true or false.

Alaukika Sannikarṣa (Extraordinary Perception)

Gaṅgeśa outlines three kinds of extraordinary perception, distinguishing Nyāya from Western empiricism:

1. Sāmānyalakṣaṇa: through the perception of one member, apprehending the members of an entire universal class—for example, recognising 'smoke' in general upon perceiving a particular instance of smoke.

2. Jñānalakṣaṇa: a cross-sensory perception grounded in memory, such as seeing a piece of sandalwood and 'perceiving' its fragrance without smelling it.

3. Yogaja: yogic or mystical perception of hidden objects or things belonging to the past or future.

The Anumāna-khaṇḍa

The Anumāna-khaṇḍa, extensively translated by V. P. Bhatta and closely analysed by Stephen Phillips, forms the core of Navya-Nyāya's logical architecture.

The Concept of Vyāpti (Invariable Concomitance)

Inference depends upon vyāpti, the invariable relation between the hetu (reason or sign, such as smoke) and the sādhya (the property to be established, such as fire). Gaṅgeśa examines the vyāptipañcaka, five provisional definitions of pervasion advanced by earlier logicians, and rejects all five because they fail in cases involving properties located in different substrates. He then establishes his own siddhānta-lakṣaṇa (final definition): vyāpti means the absence of the reason wherever the probandum is absent.

Īśvarānumāna (Inference to the Existence of God)

Gaṅgeśa devotes a section to establishing God's existence by inference. He argues that the earth, sprouts, and similar things must have an intelligent maker because they are effects, just as a pot is the product of a potter. This argument directly challenges atheistic Mīmāṃsā and Buddhist schools.

Hetvābhāsa (Fallacies of Reasoning)

Gaṅgeśa offers a fine-grained classification of logical fallacies (hetvābhāsa, 'what appears to be a reason but is not'). These include savyabhicāra (inconclusive or irregular reason), viruddha (contradictory reason), satpratipakṣa (an equally strong counterreason), asiddha (unestablished reason), and bādhita (reason contradicted by stronger evidence).

The Upamāna-khaṇḍa

Where Buddhist and Vaiśeṣika thinkers had subsumed comparison under inference, Gaṅgeśa defends it as an independent pramāṇa. Upamāna is the process by which a person learns the meaning of a word through perceived resemblance. For example, a townsman is told that a gavaya (wild ox) looks like a cow. When he enters a forest and sees an animal resembling a cow, recollection of the description and the visible similarity together produce valid knowledge: 'This is the animal to which the word gavaya refers.'

The Śabda-khaṇḍa

In the final book, Gaṅgeśa analyses words, meanings, and sentences. Śabda is defined as āptopadeśa, instruction from a trustworthy and authoritative speaker. He identifies four necessary conditions for a sentence to convey meaningful knowledge:

1. Ākāṅkṣā (expectancy): the syntactic need of words to complete one another, as when the command 'Bring' prompts the question 'What?'

2. Yogyatā (semantic fitness): the logical compatibility of the words, lacking, for example, in 'He waters the plant with fire.'

3. Sannidhi (proximity): the utterance of words in close temporal succession.

4. Tātparya (speaker's intention): the context or intended meaning of the speaker, especially important for ambiguous words such as saindhava, which can mean either salt or a horse.

As S. C. Vidyabhusana explains, Gaṅgeśa expressly rejects gestures, popular report, and tradition (aitihya) as independent pramāṇas, treating them instead under testimony or inference.

According to the Stanford Encyclopedia of Philosophy (SEP) and Ben-Ami Scharfstein's A Comparative History of World Philosophy, the Navya-Nyāya school represents one of the high points of global intellectual achievement.

Where Western philosophy frequently separates epistemology, ontology, and linguistics, Gaṅgeśa brought them together in a single language of exceptional technical exactness. Stephen Phillips emphasises that Gaṅgeśa's definition of true cognition (pramā)—cognition corresponding to reality without the intrusion of subjective doubt—places Navya-Nyāya firmly within a robust epistemological realism. Scharfstein observes that its scholastic intensity is closely comparable to Western medieval scholasticism, as exemplified by Thomas Aquinas or William of Ockham, but that its linguistic articulation is mathematically precise.

A study of Gaṅgeśa Upādhyāya requires a balance between his extraordinary philosophical intelligence and the harsh sociopolitical realities of his age. The monograph by Udayanath Jha 'Ashok' and the historiography of Ramanath Jha preserve his philosophical legacy; a full presentation of the social and biographical particulars preserved in the Dūṣaṇa Pañjī is another matter. The Tattvacintāmaṇi remains a masterpiece of unparalleled logical precision. At the same time, the pañjī evidence, as presented here, states that Gaṅgeśa was born five years after his father's death and married a woman of the leatherworking community. These particulars need to be read as an archival stream of evidence distinct from traditional narratives.

What was the author's actual name? The answer is that Gaṅgeśvara was his formal or ceremonial name, while Gaṅgeśa was his everyday or familiar name. The text considers this firmly established by two kinds of evidence. First, in the opening benedictory verse (maṅgalācaraṇa) of the Tattvacintāmaṇi, Gaṅgeśa himself writes in the first person, 'gaṅgeśa-stute mitena vacase śrī-tattva-cintāmaṇim', using the name Gaṅgeśa. Second, his son and principal disciple Vardhamāna, in the Kiraṇāvalī-prakāśa, explicitly salutes his father and teacher as Gaṅgeśvara: 'nyāyāmbhoja-pataṅgāya mīmāṃsā-pāradṛśvane / gaṅgeśvarāya gurave pitre śvabhavate namaḥ'. The name Gaṅgeśvara also appears in the Kusumāñjali-prakāśa. Thus the two names are not those of separate individuals but the formal and informal designations of one person.

The pañjī genealogical records mention both names in relation to the same biographical places and relationships, and the village 'Chādana' is cited in the Pañjī-prabandha with the expression 'chādanaṃ tattva-cintāmaṇi-kāraka mahāmahopādhyāya paramaguruḥ gaṅgeśvaraḥ'. Moreover, Vardhamāna's explicit testimony makes it impossible, on this account, to maintain that the two names refer to different people. The author who wrote 'gaṅgeśa-stute' in his own work was saluted by his son as 'gaṅgeśvara gurave pitre'. In that same verse Vardhamāna also speaks of his father's mastery of Nyāya and Mīmāṃsā, a feature that occurs in Gaṅgeśa's own benedictory verse as well.

Gaṅgeśa's birthplace has been the subject of considerable scholarly dispute. Different scholars have proposed different villages: (1) Maṅgraunī (or Maṅgalvanī), in Madhubani district; (2) Kiryān (also Kiriyāṃ), a village twelve miles south-east of Darbhanga; (3) Chakautī; and (4) Chājaṃ (historically Chādana), now near Turki railway station in Muzaffarpur district. The pañjī records, treated in this account as the most authoritative evidence on such questions, consistently describe Gaṅgeśa as 'Chādana-saṃbhūta', a native of Chādana/Chājaṃ. Chājaṃ, about three kilometres west of Turki Chowk and surrounded by villages such as Rupaulī, Bahilvārā, and Supnā—the last associated with Gaṅgeśa's son Sūpana—is presented as the most likely site. The Tibetan traveller Dharmasvāmin, who visited Mithila during the reign of the Karṇāṭa ruler Rāmasiṃhadeva (1234 CE), mentioned a place called 'To-ki', where many Jains and Buddhists lived. That 'To-ki' is identified here with present-day Turki, near Gaṅgeśa's village Chājaṃ. A minority view, advanced by Rajendranath Ghosh on the basis of Bengali sources, holds that Gaṅgeśa was Bengali. Ghosh himself ultimately describes him as an inhabitant of Mithila and a Maithil Brahmin. According to M. M. Phanibhushan Tarkavagish, the pañjī records name his birthplace 'Maṅgaurī', but the village-specific genealogical entries point more consistently to Chādana.

Gaṅgeśa belonged to the Kāśyapa gotra. His mūla—the ancestral village affiliation recognised in the pañjī system—was 'Sirisbe-Chādana': he belonged to the Sirisbā ancestral line, specifically its Chādana branch. The pañjī records identify him as a Kāśyapa-gotra member of the 'Sirisbe-Chādana mūla'. His father's name was Girīśvara Upādhyāya, who died five years before Gaṅgeśa was born.

Some pañjī records indicate that his formal name was Gaṅgeśvara and his familiar name Gaṅgeśa. He had two wives. By the first he had a daughter and his eldest son, Vardhamāna; by the second, the sons Sūpana and Hara. The pañjī evidence also records that Vardhamāna's daughter married into the Khāṇḍvālā mūla of the Śāṇḍilya gotra (the lineage of Śivanātha, son of Viśvanātha); that Vardhamāna's son and the Chandraka–Balabhadra–Śobhā line had marriages with families originating in Chādana; that Sūpana's daughter married into the Jijivālā mūla of the Śāṇḍilya gotra; and that Sūpana himself married into the Bhāṇḍārisamaya mūla. According to P. Rajendranath Ghosh, Gaṅgeśa lost his father early and was raised at his maternal uncle's home in the village of Kiryān, where the uncle ran a school. As a boy, Gaṅgeśa at first displayed little scholarly aptitude and was regarded, to a degree, as a slow learner. A legend, circulated in several versions, recounts that Gaṅgeśa was once teased by his uncle's wife, who called him 'gauḥ'—'cow' or 'fool'. The incident supposedly inspired an extraordinary Sanskrit play on words involving gotva ('cowness', or clan identity), which Gaṅgeśa composed spontaneously. His uncle recognised the unexpected intelligence it disclosed, embraced the boy, and promised to teach him everything. Whether or not this story is literally true, it symbolically expresses a genuine philosophical point: the verse about gotva is itself a miniature exercise in the problem of universals (sāmānya), which lies at the heart of Navya-Nyāya reasoning. It is therefore particularly fitting that the earliest folk legend about Gaṅgeśa should centre on a punning philosophical argument concerning gotva.

N. S. Ramanuja Tatacharya's work states that Gaṅgeśa had one son by his first wife and two sons, Sūpana and Hara, by his second; the eldest was Vardhamāna. None of the three brothers—Vardhamāna, Sūpana, and Hara—had male descendants.

But the Dūṣaṇa Pañjī has more to say.

The work set in motion a philosophical revolution whose influence was felt in Mithila, Bengal, Navadvīpa, Madras, Maharashtra, Kashmir, and eventually the whole of India, making the Sanskrit scholarship of the past five hundred years unimaginable without it. The connection with Mithila is not merely biographical. Gaṅgeśa's homeland remained an intellectual centre of Navya-Nyāya scholarship, and that intellectual inheritance survives today in the journal Videha (Videha web archive, ISSN 2229-547X), which since its inception (around 2000) has served as a digital repository for the Maithili language, literature, and culture—the civilisational soil on which Gaṅgeśa stood. The Videha archive maintains digital editions of writings connected with Mithila's history, its philosophers, and its literary traditions, including pre-Vidyāpati poetry and pañjī records. Gaṅgeśa thus belongs not only to the history of philosophy but also to the living cultural memory that Maithil scholars continue to retrieve and circulate.

The university of Navadvīpa, founded in 1503 CE, became the principal vehicle for the popularity of the Tattvacintāmaṇi in Bengal, largely through the great commentator Raghunātha Śiromaṇi. From Bengal the work spread to Madras, Maharashtra, and Kashmir; within two centuries it was known across the subcontinent. As Satish Chandra Vidyabhusana notes in his introduction, 'In modern India no Sanskrit scholarship is reckoned of any value unless it is accompanied by a knowledge of the Tattvacintāmaṇi, or at least of some part of it.'

Gaṅgeśa, also called Gaṅgeśvara and bearing the surname Upādhyāya, was a philosopher of early fourteenth-century Mithila. Modern scholarship places his period of activity around 1320 CE, corresponding to the reign of Harisiṃhadeva. Kariyan/Kariyon is associated with traditions concerning his residence; the pañjī records also mention the Chādana/Chādanā ancestral line. Residence and ancestral village should therefore not be treated as synonyms for birthplace. No definite year of birth can be established from the records. The decisive biographical information claimed from the Dūṣaṇa Pañjī is that he was born five years after his father's death.

In the premodern period, Mithila's intellectual standing rested upon its system of scholastic patronage, which supported paṇḍits—learned specialists—in many disciplines. The region's Brahmin families maintained expertise across generations in Nyāya, Mīmāṃsā, Vedānta, grammar, astrology, and law. Gaṅgeśa worked within this tradition and was recognised by his contemporaries as jagadguru ('distinguished professor', in Vidyabhusana's rendering, equivalent to 'teacher of the world'). His mastery was not confined to Nyāya. According to the account in the Stanford Encyclopedia of Philosophy, he was also accomplished in Mīmāṃsā, the school of Vedic hermeneutics, and thoroughly familiar with the Pāṇinian grammatical tradition and epic literature, quoting the Bhagavadgītā at several points in the Tattvacintāmaṇi.

Of the achievements of Mithila, spread across the Gangetic plains of present-day Bihar and southern Nepal, V. P. Bhatta writes in the preface to his translation (2012): 'Of the six systems of Indian philosophy, the Nyāyaśāstra played an important role in the development and analysis of philosophy, logic, and epistemology in India … However, the advent of Navya-Nyāya brought a revolutionary change in the approach of Nyāya philosophy. It systematised all the Nyāya and Vaiśeṣika concepts under four heads, namely: 1) perception, 2) inference, 3) comparison, and 4) verbal testimony … The method employed in the presentation of various doctrines in the T.C. profoundly influenced philosophical writing in India over the five-hundred-year period from the thirteenth to the eighteenth century CE; nearly all writers of the śāstras adopted the T.C.'s method of presentation.' He adds: 'The importance of the work (T.C.) for philosophy, logic, and epistemology cannot be overemphasised.'

In Ben-Ami Scharfstein's A Comparative History of World Philosophy, Gaṅgeśa is placed alongside Descartes and Leibniz as one of three philosophers whose shared concern is the pursuit of certainty through the methodical application of reason. For Scharfstein, all three share a fundamental orientation: they are logicians in the sense that they seek to understand the world by isolating and vindicating the method of reasoning, rather than its subject matter. 'Gaṅgeśa performs his task by refining an existing logical technique to secure regularity, the most reliable instrument of induction.' His work, Scharfstein writes, earned him the epithet 'the jeweller'—the maker of a jewel of thought—and its roughly three hundred pages were 'responsible for an estimated million pages of commentary'.

Potter and Bhattacharya, in the Encyclopedia of Indian Philosophies (1993), put the matter simply: 'Gaṅgeśa possessed a unique genius that safely places him among the finest philosophical minds in the world.'

The Nyāya school traces its classical foundation to Gautama's Nyāya-sūtra (approximately 100 CE) and the earliest major commentary upon it by Vātsyāyana (approximately 400 CE). It is marked by a thoroughgoing realism concerning the external world and a systematic account of the pramāṇas, or valid sources of knowledge: perception (pratyakṣa), inference (anumāna), comparison (upamāna), and verbal testimony (śabda). Over roughly a millennium, commentators including Uddyotakara (about 600 CE), Vācaspati Miśra (about 950 CE), and Udayana (about 1000 CE) elaborated the system; most importantly, Udayana integrated it with the category ontology of Vaiśeṣika. Gaṅgeśa explicitly positioned himself as Udayana's follower and incorporated the seven Vaiśeṣika categories—substance (dravya), quality (guṇa), action (karma), universal (sāmānya), particularity (viśeṣa), inherence (samavāya), and absence (abhāva)—as the ontological framework of his epistemological project.

As the Stanford Encyclopedia of Philosophy cautions, the division between 'old' Nyāya (Prācīna-Nyāya) and 'new' Nyāya (Navya-Nyāya), often said to have been inaugurated by Gaṅgeśa, was not a clean break. Development was continuous across nearly two thousand years. Nevertheless, the Tattvacintāmaṇi accomplished a qualitative change: it displaced the sūtra-commentary tradition, established an analytic vocabulary of exceptional precision, and compelled every later Naiyāyika to engage with it. Many of the technical instruments were already present in Gaṅgeśa's predecessor Maṇikaṇṭha Miśra, and the Buddhist logician Dharmakīrti (about 600 CE) had anticipated several of Gaṅgeśa's discussions of fallacies. Yet no earlier figure had synthesised and extended the tradition on so comprehensive a scale.

The full title Tattvacintāmaṇi means 'The Jewel of Reflection on Truth' (tattva, truth or reality; cintāmaṇi, a wish-fulfilling jewel of reflection, metaphorically a jewel of thought). The work is also called Pramāṇacintāmaṇi, 'The Jewel of Reflection on Knowledge'. The title is at once epistemological and aspirational: it claims to be the jewel that fulfils the desire to understand valid knowledge. Gaṅgeśa begins with a benediction addressed to Śiva, in keeping with the Nyāya practice of maṅgalavāda, the invocation of auspiciousness, and moves immediately to the question of what pramā, or valid knowledge, is.

Book 1 — Pratyakṣa-khaṇḍa (Perception). The longest and philosophically richest of the four books, it establishes a general theory of knowledge; the nature of valid and invalid cognition; an extensive phenomenology of perception in its ordinary (laukika) and extraordinary (alaukika) forms; the theory of inherence; the problem of absence; and the atomic nature of the mind. It concludes with discussions of indeterminate and determinate perception (nirvikalpaka and savikalpaka) and of anuvyavasāya, reflexive awareness.

Book 2 — Anumāna-khaṇḍa (Inference). The most technically difficult and influential book, it treats the conditions of inferential knowledge; the paramount concept of vyāpti, invariable concomitance or pervasion; the theory of upādhi, a qualifying condition of the middle term; the classification of fallacies; and inference both for oneself (svārthānumāna) and for another (parārthānumāna), including the syllogism. It also contains arguments for the existence of the self, a theistic inference (īśvarānumāna), and the possibility of liberation.

Book 3 — Upamāna-khaṇḍa (Comparison). The shortest of the four books argues that resemblance constitutes a genuinely distinct pramāṇa, conveying knowledge of a word's meaning through perceived similarity. The standard example—a traveller learns the word gavaya (a kind of wild bovine) from the description 'like a cow' and later identifies the animal in a forest—shows that knowledge by comparison is not reducible to either perception or inference.

Book 4 — Śabda-khaṇḍa (Verbal Testimony). This is an extended analysis of language as a means of knowledge, encompassing the definition of valid speech; the conditions of meaningful utterance (ākāṅkṣā/expectancy, yogyatā/semantic fitness, āsatti/proximity, and tātparya/intention); the nature of śakti (primary signifying capacity) and lakṣaṇā (secondary signification); classes of compound words; verbal affixes, roots, and prefixes; theories of word meaning; and the extensive question of Vedic injunctions. According to the Stanford Encyclopedia of Philosophy, this book contains the longest single section in the entire Tattvacintāmaṇi, devoted to lakṣaṇā, secondary meaning.

Epistemology and Logic

Truth and Error: Gaṅgeśa's Theory of Valid Cognition

The Definition of Truth (Prāmāṇyavāda)

The Potter Encyclopedia (pp. 53–54) offers a precise technical formulation of Gaṅgeśa's theory of truth as set out in the prāmāṇyavāda section of the Pratyakṣa-khaṇḍa. Gaṅgeśa defines truth (prāmāṇya) thus: "(a) either there must be a cognition whose principal qualificand, IO, is present in that which possesses IO; or (b) there must be a cognition relating IO to something that possesses IO." In other words, a pramā (valid cognition) is a cognition (a) whose predicate term is connected with its subject term, or (b) which correctly attributes a property, IO, to an entity that actually possesses IO. The Encyclopedia observes that "Gaṅgeśa argues in support of his analysis that only when (a) or (b) is satisfied does a person act on the basis of the cognition in question. Moreover, he argues, it is the most economical account of truth." Significantly, he puts forward this analysis as a "common platform" for truth: the formulation is acceptable to schools irrespective of whether they regard validity as intrinsic (svataḥ-prāmāṇya) or extrinsic (parataḥ-prāmāṇya).

Scharfstein's comparative perspective illuminates the importance of this epistemological position: "Gaṅgeśa is committed to the Nyāya belief in a real, external world, a real, immaterial self, and the distinctive power of perception and inference, each assisting the other, to reach certainty." Contrary to the Mīmāṃsaka thesis of self-validation, according to which each cognition establishes its own validity upon arising, Gaṅgeśa maintains that verification requires a second-order act of inference. Thus he argues against the sceptic: "Your argument against inference depends upon inference. When you say that inference is not a means of knowledge, you mean that the proposition that inference is such a means is doubtful or false. But that it is doubtful or false cannot be known by perception."

The Pratibandhaka–Pratibaddha Relation and Epistemic Logic

The Potter Encyclopedia draws attention to a major feature of the Navya-Nyāya theory of cognition with philosophical implications for the theory of justification: the pratibandhaka–pratibaddha relation, that between an inhibitor and what is inhibited. This is not merely a psychological rule about the impossibility of attending to two things at once. It is a rule of epistemic logic determined by the objects of cognition. While a cognition of P persists as a conscious act, it prevents a cognition of the absence of P from arising—not simply because the two compete psychologically, but through logical necessity: "The presence of one act prevents the production of the other, so that they can never be co-present, not even for an instant." This relation matters to the theory of doubt and its resolution through tarka (suppositional reasoning).

The Encyclopedia explains how this principle addresses the problem of induction, particularly the removal of doubt about vyāpti: "The Nyāya doctrine is that the decisive factor here is the presence or absence of doubt in the thinker … Whoever doubts that the reason (hetu) might be inconstant cannot, while that doubt remains, know the pervasion between the reason and the probandum. The question is: is this a psychological rule? Nyāya distinguishes two kinds of obstruction … It is concerned with another kind of obstruction, in which one cognitive state is obstructed by another because of their objects. What prevents someone from knowing a particular pervasion is not the structure of his mind but the fact that he has a particular doubt." This is epistemic logic, not psychology.

The Theory of Perception

Perception and the Self

Gaṅgeśa's account of perception is embedded in a rich metaphysics of mind and self. Scharfstein explains: "In Nyāya theory the mind is an unconscious inner sense or cause, conveying successive sensations from the external senses to the conscious self … The mind can connect with only one sense at a time. This limitation suggests that the mind is extremely minute, the size of an atom … It is the self that is responsible for memory … Without a permanent, mediating self, how could the past perception of blue later be responsible for the memory of that same blue? Without the self and the memories it preserves, how could one explain that something I saw with my left eye is subsequently recognised by my right eye?" The self cannot be reduced to body, senses, or mind; it is the distinctive substratum of consciousness and the locus of memory, recognition, and synthesis across the senses.

Indeterminate and Determinate Perception

Gaṅgeśa's distinction between nirvikalpaka (indeterminate) and savikalpaka (determinate) perception is one of his philosophically most important contributions. Scharfstein describes the indeterminate phase as concept-free awareness: it is not yet associated with names, universals, and the like; it does not apprehend something as qualified in a particular way and is wholly without predicates. What follows is structured, relational, qualified awareness—awareness informed by concepts. We know fully what we experience when we apprehend it as a complex of universal and particular, and can say, almost triumphantly, "Pot!" or "This is a pot."

Both sources explain the philosophical need to posit indeterminate perception. In the Potter Encyclopedia's treatment of Gaṅgeśa's example, if universals or general properties are conceived (as they sometimes are in Western philosophy) as possessing instances rather than inhering in particulars, one mistranslates an Indian position that is neither Platonic nor Aristotelian. A qualifier (viśeṣaṇa) is related to the qualificand (viśeṣya or dharmin). When one perceives a pot, the universal potness (ghaṭatva) is the qualifier, while the individual pot is the qualificand. Indeterminate perception registers this qualificand and qualifier separately before any relational predication. This helps explain how we can encounter a kind of thing for the first time and yet classify it correctly.

Anuvyavasāya (Subsequent Cognition)

The theory of anuvyavasāya—a cognition that takes an earlier cognition as its object—is philosophically central to Gaṅgeśa's account of verification. Scharfstein distinguishes "simple awareness" from "self-reflective awareness or subsequent cognition, expressed in words such as 'I am aware of this'." The Potter Encyclopedia specifies its introspective structure: "A cognition can produce a disposition; indeed, a disposition can arise only from an act … An introspective act is only one step behind the act that forms its content. In the waking state, no interval is experienced between the two cognitions. When the earlier cognition enters its second temporal phase, the later cognition arises and replaces it." Gaṅgeśa argues that anuvyavasāya is infallible with respect to the intentional structure of the extended cognition, though not with respect to its truth.

Illusion: Anyathākhyātivāda

Anyathākhyātivāda—the doctrine that illusion consists in becoming aware of one thing "as other than it is"—occupies one of the longest sections of the Pratyakṣa-khaṇḍa. Scharfstein explains: "When a rope is mistaken for a snake, some genuine knowledge is present: knowledge of the 'thisness' of the object lying on the ground. The false part of perceptual cognition depends on a partial or complete identification of what is actually seen with an object of another kind … The evidence showing that my perceptual cognition is right or wrong as a whole is the success or failure of actions following from it: only a snake, not a rope, actually bites." Following Udayana, Gaṅgeśa distinguishes an initial apprehension, which cannot be mistaken, from a later, structured cognition in which error is possible. The content of illusory cognition is always traceable to previous genuine cognitions: in the shell–silver illusion, the presentation of silverness derives from an earlier real perception of silver. Gaṅgeśa's theory of error is therefore firmly realist.

The Theory of Inference: The Problem of Vyāpti and Its Resolution

Vyāpti (Invariable Concomitance): What Is at Stake Philosophically

Gaṅgeśa's greatest technical achievement is his decisive account of vyāpti, or invariable concomitance ("pervasion"). Much is at stake: vyāpti is the relation underlying every inference, and an adequate definition of it is required to distinguish genuine inference from pseudo-inference. Scharfstein explains the underlying idea: "For Gaṅgeśa, pervasion means the unconditional relation arising from the nature of a reason or sign, as in the pervasion of smokiness by fireness, which in this instance may be explained through the nature of fire and the nature of smoke produced by fire. To call knowledge unconditional also means that we know of nothing that would make the relation accidental."

Before reaching his final definition, Gaṅgeśa considers and rejects numerous earlier attempts. Scharfstein notes that he discards "twenty-one proposals" (the monograph by Jha 'Ashok' counts twenty-four, including subtypes). The Potter Encyclopedia offers the most technically exact account. The first definition considered—avyabhicāra, non-deviation—fails because it "does not apply in cases where the probandum (sādhya) is not locus-pervasive." Each subsequent definition founders on particular counterexamples, especially that of "monkeys in a tree," where the ascribed property is not pervasive throughout the locus. The final, decisive definition is given as follows: "Pervasion is the co-presence of property 10 (the reason) with property B (the probandum), where B is not qualified by the delimitor of the counterpositive of an absolute absence that shares a locus with 10 but does not share a locus with its counterpositive." Scharfstein gives a simplified version attributed to Gokūpa: "A is pervaded by B if and only if A shares a locus with B in such a manner that B is not one of the things which, as a class, are wholly absent from any locus of A."

Resolving Doubt about Vyāpti: Tarka

The Potter Encyclopedia provides the fullest treatment of how tarka—suppositional or non-demonstrative reasoning—works in removing doubt about pervasion. The Nyāya doctrine is that doubt about vyāpti acts as an inhibitor of the cognition of vyāpti. Tarka does not itself confer knowledge of pervasion; it removes the doubt obstructing that cognition. In the smoke–fire example, the formal structure of a tarka runs as follows: "If smoke deviated from fire, it would not be produced by fire. But smoke is produced by fire. Therefore smoke cannot deviate from fire." Doubt is thus resolved not by adding fresh inductive evidence but by showing that maintaining the doubt leads to a consequence that both sides regard as false. Hence Gaṅgeśa agrees with Udayana's pragmatic argument against the sceptic: "When he wishes to produce smoke, he always lights a fire … The sceptic's own action renders his doubt pointless."

The Encyclopedia draws an important distinction from Western philosophy of induction: "The Nyāya doctrine is that in some cases a single observation is enough, while in others innumerable observations may still not be enough, to generate knowledge of pervasion. The decisive factor is the presence or absence of doubt in the thinker … Although whether doubt exists is entirely subjective, the Nyāya doctrine is not psychological. Nyāya asserts a universal rule: whoever doubts that a reason (hetu) might be inconstant cannot know the pervasion between reason and probandum while that doubt persists." Moreover, Navya-Nyāya differs from the Western tendency to justify induction by invoking causation or the uniformity of nature: "According to Nyāya, it is enough to know that two things are invariably concomitant; we need not attempt to provide a reason for that fact."

Upādhi (Additional Condition) and Fallacious Reasons

The concept of an upādhi—a qualifying or additional condition—is Gaṅgeśa's instrument for identifying and preventing spurious inferences. An upādhi is a property pervading the probandum (every instance of the sādhya has the upādhi-property) but not pervading the reason (some instances of the hetu lack that property). Where such a condition is present, the seeming pervasion of the probandum by the reason breaks down: there are instances of the reason without the probandum because the upādhi-property is missing in them. A classical Navya-Nyāya example is the apparent inference, "A smoke-producing thing is fire-producing because it is a product," blocked by the condition "being wet fuel": wet fuel is smoke-producing but not fire-producing. The discussion of upādhi (upādhivāda) in the Anumāna-khaṇḍa spans numerous subsections and is among the most technically difficult discussions in the entire Tattvacintāmaṇi.

The Five Fallacious Reasons (Hetvābhāsas)

The Hetvābhāsa-prakaraṇa is the last major section of the Anumāna-khaṇḍa. It distinguishes five apparent reasons: (1) savyabhicāra (inconstant or irregular—the reason occurs both in similar and dissimilar instances); (2) viruddha (contradictory—the reason proves the opposite of the intended conclusion); (3) satpratipakṣa (counterbalanced by an equally strong opposing reason); (4) asiddha (unestablished—the presence, nature, or pervasion of the reason is doubtful); and (5) bādhita (already defeated—the conclusion contradicts something previously known). Navya-Nyāya treatment of these fallacies goes considerably beyond the five original categories in the Nyāya-sūtra, particularly in dividing savyabhicāra into sādhāraṇa (common or general) and asādhāraṇa (uncommon or particular) forms and treating anaikāntika as a subsidiary class.

Three Philosophical Inferences

Beyond technical logic, Gaṅgeśa advances three controversial philosophical inferences. His proof of the self (ātman) takes the form of a kevala-vyatireki (exclusively negative) inference: "Every living body has a self, because every living body has breath, unlike a pot." His theistic inference maintains that the earth and other effects have a conscious maker as their efficient cause, because they are effects, like a pot and unlike atoms. His inference establishing the possibility of liberation (mukti-sādhaka-anumāna) employs the analogy of an extinguished lamp to argue that suffering, being a continuously produced attribute, can in principle be brought wholly to an end. These three arguments do as much to exhibit the distinctive Navya-Nyāya apparatus of inference—including kevalānvayi and kevala-vyatireki inference, upādhi, and tarka—as they do to establish their metaphysical conclusions.

The Theories of Upamāna (Analogy) and Śabda (Verbal Testimony)

For Gaṅgeśa, upamāna (analogy or comparison) is strictly the means of knowledge by which one learns the relation between a word and its referent through perceived similarity. The standard illustration is this: a traveller is told that a gavaya, a large bovine animal, resembles a cow. On encountering the animal in the forest, the traveller comes to know, "This creature, which resembles a cow, is what the word 'gavaya' denotes." The product of this means of knowledge (upamiti) is knowledge of the word–object relation (sādhya-sādhana-sambandha, as given in the source). Gaṅgeśa maintains that upamāna is irreducible to both perception and inference. The crucial step is that the forest-dweller's statement, "A gavaya resembles a cow," does more than convey a description (which could give only perceptual or verbal knowledge of a fact). It functions as a meaning-bearing utterance that, together with the listener's direct encounter with the animal, produces new knowledge of the relation between word and meaning.

Śabda: The Irreducibility of Testimony

The Śabda-khaṇḍa defends verbal testimony as a fourth, irreducible pramāṇa. Against the reductionist claim that testimony is merely inference from a speaker's reliability, Gaṅgeśa argues that the proposed inferential chain itself presupposes linguistic understanding. One cannot even establish the premise "This speaker says P" without first comprehending the utterance, which is already a verbal operation. The distinctive linguistic mechanism of this pramāṇa—ākāṅkṣā (syntactic expectancy), yogyatā (semantic compatibility), āsatti (temporal proximity), and tātparya (speaker's intention)—differs from any inferential procedure.

The Tātparyavāda section presents Gaṅgeśa's innovation: the trigger for lakṣaṇā (secondary meaning) is not, as commonly assumed, violation of yogyatā (semantic compatibility), but violation of the overall syntactic-semantic connection (anvaya). In the well-known example "gaṅgāyāṃ ghoṣaḥ" ("a settlement on the Ganges"), secondary meaning is required not because the terms "Ganges" and "settlement" are semantically incompatible in themselves, but because the construction as a whole cannot be coherently interpreted by taking the river's water as the primary referent.

Vardhamāna Upādhyāya: The Immediate Successor

According to a tradition cited by N. S. Rāmānujatātācārya, Vardhamāna was Gaṅgeśa's eldest son by his first wife and the primary disseminator of the Tattvacintāmaṇi. He was also a philosopher of considerable standing in his own right. His works include the Kusumāñjali-prakāśa, Kiraṇāvalī-prakāśa, Tātparya-pariśuddhi (also known as Nyāyanibandha-prakāśa), Ātmatattvaviveka-prakāśa, Śrīvallabhācārya's Nyāyalīlāvatī-prakāśa, Khaṇḍanakhaṇḍakhādya-prakāśa, and a commentary on Keśava Miśra's Tarkabhāṣā called Prakāśa. Another text independently attributed to him is the Nyāyasūtravṛtti entitled Anvīkṣaṇīyatattvabodha.

Unlike his father, Vardhamāna deliberately wrote his commentaries under the banner "as my father says" (the Sanskrit wording is given in the source as "asmatputruccaraṇāstu"), reading the writings of Udayana and Śrīvallabha through the doctrines of the Tattvacintāmaṇi. He composed Prakāśa commentaries on nearly every major philosophical work of his time. The Devānanda Pañjī calls him an "upayakāraka"—one who renders things useful. As Dr Kiśoranātha Jhā is quoted as explaining, although Vardhamāna did not write a direct commentary on the Tattvacintāmaṇi (perhaps because his father was alive when the work began to circulate and Vardhamāna considered such a commentary premature), "his manner in all his commentaries is to cite the Tattvacintāmaṇi as a relevant reference, so that its principles are always reflected."

The Commentary Tradition (Vyākhyā-paramparā)

The tradition of commentary on the Tattvacintāmaṇi constitutes one of the most extensive accumulations of scholarship in the Sanskrit intellectual world.

The Pakṣadhara–Raghunātha–Navadvīpa Axis

A decisive moment in the popularisation of the Tattvacintāmaṇi was the composition of the Āloka by Pakṣadhara Upādhyāya (also known as Jayadeva Miśra, fifteenth century). Vāsudeva Sārvabhauma, the celebrated scholar of Navadvīpa, initially came to study with Pakṣadhara Miśra, a pupil of Vāsudeva's maternal uncle Harimiśra. Pakṣadhara, however, told him to return and study first under Harimiśra. Vāsudeva went back and later sent his own pupil, Raghunātha Śiromaṇi, to study in Mithila. When Raghunātha arrived to study the Tattvacintāmaṇi with Pakṣadhara, the story goes that Pakṣadhara asked him who Indra was—a trick question concerning perception through a generic characteristic: could an entire succession of Indras be perceived at once through a universal "Indrahood"? Raghunātha's answer, distinguishing the class of two-eyed beings from that of three-eyed beings, so impressed Pakṣadhara that he declared him a Śiromaṇi, a "crest-jewel" among logicians, even before formal recognition. The exchange exemplifies the dazzling dialectical culture of Navya-Nyāya.

Raghunātha Śiromaṇi's Dīdhiti is the most important secondary work in the Navya-Nyāya tradition, eclipsing the influence of other commentaries. Based in Navadvīpa, Raghunātha developed Gaṅgeśa's insights into a systematic framework that has continued to be studied into the present. The Dīdhiti itself attracted commentaries from scholars across the subcontinent: Rāmakṛṣṇa Bhaṭṭācārya (Līlāvatī), Raghunātha Vidyālaṅkāra (Dīdhiti-pratibimba), Kṛṣṇadāsa Sārvabhauma (Prasāriṇī), Mathurānātha Tarkavāgīśa (Rahasya), Jagadīśa Tarkālaṅkāra (Jāgadīśī), Gadādhara Bhaṭṭācārya (Gādādhara), and Rudra-Nyāyavācaspati (Sārasaṅgraha), among many others.

The Maithil Tradition

In Mithila itself, the commentary tradition began with Vardhamāna's engagement with the Tattvacintāmaṇi through his Prakāśa commentaries; it continued with Pakṣadhara's Āloka, which helped kindle the Navadvīpa tradition, and expanded through the Dūṣaṇoddhāra of Pakṣadhara's pupil Narahari Upādhyāya, the Dīpikā of Pakṣadhara's son Mādhava Miśra, and many Maithil treatises devoted to particular topics. Internal scholarly disputes between the Āloka line (Pakṣadhara's lineage, followed by Yajñapati) and the Dūṣaṇoddhāra line (Narahari's lineage)—apart from interpretive disagreements over the upādhi-siddha and savyabhicāra sections—show how the two schools directed the internal development of Navya-Nyāya over the centuries.

Known Commentators: A Selection

Among twenty-three known commentators, in addition to those already mentioned, the most significant are Paṭanābha Miśra (Prakāśa), Gokulanāthopādhyāya (Raśmicakra/Cakraraśmi), Gopīnātha Ṭhākura (Maṇisāra), Vāsudeva Miśra (Nyāyasiddhāntasāra/Dīpti), Mādhava Miśra, son of Pakṣadhara (Dīpikā), Mādhava Miśra, son of Khāntara (Mādhavī), Hīrādāsa Nyāyālaṅkāra (Prakāśa on the Anumāna-khaṇḍa), Kaṇāda Tarkavāgīśa (Ṭīkā), Bhavānanda Siddhāntavāgīśa (Bhavānandī), Rāmānuja Dīkṣita (Darpaṇa), Śrīkaṇṭha Dīkṣita (Ṭīkā), Hanumad-Bhaṭṭa (Vākyārtha-dīpikā), Candra-Nārāyaṇa Bhaṭṭa (Anugama), Rājacūḍāmaṇi Makhin (Darpaṇa), and Dharmarājavīrendra (Tarkacūḍāmaṇi).

Gaṅgeśa and Mithila's Civilisational Heritage: The Videha Perspective

Videha magazine (Videha Web Archive, ISSN 2229-547X), described here as the first fortnightly Maithili e-magazine and as having operated continuously since about 2000 CE, is a major digital repository of Mithila's living cultural heritage. Its library, the Videha Pothi Archive, makes hundreds of texts available in PDF: from the Bauddhagānapada—early Bengali–Maithili Siddha compositions preserved in Haraprasad Shastri's 1907 edition—and collections of Vidyāpati, to modern Maithili fiction, poetry, drama, criticism, women's writing, Dalit literature, folk scholarship, and linguistic research.

The pañjī archive—more than eleven thousand palm-leaf records collected, scanned, and catalogued in twenty-two volumes by Preeti Thakur—is, according to this account, accessible through Videha and constitutes the single most important primary source for the social history of the Maithil Brahmin scholarly community to which Gaṅgeśa belonged. The genealogical documents of the pañjī system record his name, gotra, ancestral affiliation (mūla), family relationships, and his ancestral village, "Chādana." Without the pañjī tradition—which the Videha archive actively digitises and preserves—much of what is known about Gaṅgeśa's life would be lost.

Ashish Anchinhar's History of Maithili Web Journalism and Preeti Karan Setu Banhal ("Redefining Maithili"), both available through the Videha archive, document a parallel literary movement that seeks to recover and celebrate Maithili folk, Dalit, and women's literary voices alongside the Sanskrit philosophical canon. Gaṅgeśa's exceptionally abstract and technical achievement stands at one end of the full spectrum of Maithili civilisation; at the other stand the folk songs of the Bauddhagānapada, the humorous tales of Gonu Jha, the Salhes epic tradition, and the modern Maithili ghazal tradition promoted by Anchinhar's Anchinhar Akhar.

The Videha project's insistence on bringing all these together—the Mahāmahopādhyāya and the folk poet, the Tattvacintāmaṇi and the Caryāpadas—is its most significant cultural and political statement. Gaṅgeśa belongs to all of Mithila, not merely to its Sanskrit elite.

Radhakrishna Chaudhary's History of Mithila, Jayakant Mishra's A History of Maithili Literature, Volume I, and Upendra Thakur's History of Mithila—all available through the Videha archive—provide the broader historical and literary setting for Gaṅgeśa. They place him within a civilisation that valued both the most technically exact philosophy and the most intimate folk expression, the most rigorous logic and the gentlest devotional poetry. The Mithila that produced the Tattvacintāmaṇi also produced Vidyāpati's songs. It is the continuing existence of this entire civilisational inheritance, now digitally preserved through Videha, that gives Gaṅgeśa's work its fullest meaning.

Conclusion: An Enduring Achievement

By any measure, Gaṅgeśa Upādhyāya's Tattvacintāmaṇi is among the ten or fifteen most consequential works in the twenty-five-hundred-year history of Indian philosophy. It displaced every earlier Nyāya treatise as the principal object of study and commentary; gave India's logical tradition its most precise analytical vocabulary; extended the influence of Nyāya into every branch of Sanskrit learning, including grammar, jurisprudence, medicine, and aesthetics; and created the Navya-Nyāya school, whose commentators and subcommentators form one of the largest bodies of sustained, systematic philosophical writing in any tradition in the world.

Born in Mithila, the son of Paṇḍita Girīśvara, bearing the ritual name Gaṅgeśvara and the everyday name Gaṅgeśa, honoured with the title Mahāmahopādhyāya by a tradition that reserved it for mastery of Nyāya, Mīmāṃsā, and Dharmaśāstra, active during the reign of Harisiṃhadeva—the most culturally accomplished of the Karṇāṭa rulers—and perhaps resident in the village of Chādanā/Chājaṃ, now near the Turkī railway station in Muzaffarpur district: this is the biographical outline emerging, in the author's account, from the combined testimony of the pañjī records, internal evidence of the Tattvacintāmaṇi, and externally dated contemporaries.

Extended Note on Biographical Evidence

The Author's Actual Name

What was the author's actual name? The answer offered here is that Gaṅgeśvara was his formal or ritual name, while Gaṅgeśa was his everyday or familiar name. This is said to be decisively established by two kinds of evidence. First, Gaṅgeśa himself uses the name "Gaṅgeśa" in the first person in the maṅgalācaraṇa (opening invocation) of the Tattvacintāmaṇi: "gaṅgeśa-stute mitena vacase śrī-tattva-cintāmaṇim." Second, his son and principal disciple Vardhamāna explicitly pays homage in the Kiraṇāvalī-prakāśa to his father and teacher as "Gaṅgeśvara": "nyāyāmbhoja-pataṅgāya mīmāṃsā-pāradṛśvane / gaṅgeśvarāya gurave pitre bhavate namaḥ." The name Gaṅgeśvara also appears in the Kusumāñjali-prakāśa.

The genealogical pañjī records connect both names to the same biographical locations and relations, while the pañjī-prabandha describes the village "Chādana" in the following words: "chādanaṃ tattvacintāmaṇi-kāraka mahāmahopādhyāya paramaguruḥ gaṅgeśvaraḥ."

Birthplace

Gaṅgeśa's birthplace has generated considerable scholarly controversy. Various scholars have proposed different villages: (1) Mangrauni (or Mangalwani), a village in Madhubani district; (2) Kiryan (also Kiriyam), twelve miles south-east of Darbhanga; (3) Chakauti; and (4) Chājaṃ (historical Chādana), now close to the Turkī railway station in Muzaffarpur district. The pañjī records, presented here as the most authoritative evidence on these questions, consistently describe Gaṅgeśa as "Chādana-sambhūta"—a native of Chādana/Chājaṃ.

The Tibetan traveller Dharmasvāmin, who visited Mithila during the reign of the Karṇāṭa king Rāmasiṃhadeva (1234 CE), mentioned a place called "To-ki," near which followers of Jainism and Buddhism were numerous. This "To-ki" has been identified with present-day "Turkī," near which Gaṅgeśa's village of Chājaṃ is situated.

Gotra and Family

Gaṅgeśa belonged to the Kāśyapa gotra. In the pañjī system his mūla—his ancestral village affiliation—was "Sirisabe-Chādana," meaning that he belonged to the Sirisab ancestral line and, more particularly, its Chādana branch. The pañjī records describe him as "Sirisabe-Chādana mūla," of the Kāśyapa gotra. His father's name was Girīśvara Upādhyāya, who, according to these records, died five years before Gaṅgeśa's birth.

Certain pañjī records indicate that his formal name was Gaṅgeśvara and his commonly used name Gaṅgeśa. He had two wives: by the first, a daughter and his eldest son Vardhamāna; by the second, sons named Sūpana and Hara. The same records are cited as establishing that Vardhamāna's daughter married into the Khaṇḍavālā mūla of the Śāṇḍilya gotra (in the lineage of Śivanātha, son of Viśvanātha); that the marriages of Vardhamāna's son Candraka–Balabhadra–Śobhā were with Chādanaorigin families; that Sūpana's daughter married into the Jijivāla mūla of the Śāṇḍilya gotra; and that Sūpana himself married into the Bhaṇḍārīsamaya mūla.

Part II · A Detailed Examination of Epistemology

It was the discipline of epistemological necessity—Gaṅgeśa's refusal to discuss anything other than the nature and conditions of valid cognition—that gave the Tattvacintāmaṇi its world-changing force. The Navya-Nyāya school that it initiated trained the Indian philosophical tradition in precision of thought and rigour of reasoning; it served as a "touchstone of intellect and talent, a touchstone of gold." Gaṅgeśa belongs to the philosophical heritage of Mithila, of India, and of the world.

Videha magazine's continuing digital preservation of Mithila's intellectual and literary inheritance—from the pañjī records that register Gaṅgeśa's village, gotra, and family to contemporary creative writing in Maithili that sustains the civilisation which helped to shape him—is, in a genuine sense, a living institutional successor to the tradition he embodied. By archiving texts ranging from Vidyāpati to Dalit women's poetry, it carries forward the same civilisational commitment to rigorous thought and freedom of expression that, seven centuries ago, produced one of the masterpieces of world philosophy.

Epistemological Contributions

The Nature of Valid Cognition (Pramā)

Gaṅgeśa's epistemology begins with the definition of pramā: valid cognition is the cognition of a thing as it is—more precisely, a cognition in which a universal nature genuinely inheres in the object that is its subject. Knowing a piece of silver as silver is valid cognition because "silverness" actually inheres in that individual piece of silver. By contrast, apprehending mother-of-pearl (a shell) as silver is apramā, invalid cognition or anyathākhyāti ("apprehending a thing otherwise than it is"), because silverness does not inhere in the shell.

Gaṅgeśa advances a position that contemporary Western philosophy might identify as reliabilist, indeed as infallibilist-externalist: a genuine source of knowledge (pramāṇa) never misleads. Only an apparent source (pramāṇābhāsa) does so. The sources themselves—perception, inference, comparison, and testimony—are defined factively: illusion and error arise not from a genuine source but from something masquerading as one. This permits Gaṅgeśa to uphold both fallibility (we may be mistaken on any particular occasion) and the infallibility of a source (a genuine source, when operative, invariably yields truth).

Validation: Parataḥ-prāmāṇya (Extrinsic Validity)

A central debate in Indian epistemology concerns whether the validity of cognition is self-certifying (svataḥ-prāmāṇya, as held by the Mīmāṃsakas) or requires external verification (parataḥ-prāmāṇya). Gaṅgeśa argues for the latter. A cognition is taken initially to be valid—we naturally and spontaneously accept newly presented information as true—but this prima-facie acceptance is defeasible. When doubt arises, further inferential verification is required, either through identification of the source of cognition or through practical success in action. The Mīmāṃsaka claim that cognition certifies itself cannot, Gaṅgeśa contends, account for the phenomenological fact of doubt: if every cognition certified itself as inherently true at the moment it arose, we could never doubt a genuine perception; plainly, however, we do.

The Definition of Perception

Gaṅgeśa builds upon the original formulation in Akṣapāda's Nyāya-sūtra but substantially refines it. Against the accepted definition—knowledge arising from contact between a sense organ and its object, non-deviating, and either determinate or indeterminate—he argues that it is both too broad (including memory and inference of the self) and too narrow (excluding divine perception). His preferred distinguishing characteristic is this: perception is immediate cognition whose instrumental cause is not another cognition. That differentiates it from inference, whose instrumental cause is reflection upon premises, and from testimony, whose instrumental cause is comprehension of a statement.

Ordinary and Extraordinary Perception

Following the Nyāya tradition, Gaṅgeśa distinguishes two broad classes of perceptual contact between a sense organ and its object. Ordinary contact (laukika-sannikarṣa) occurs in six ways: (1) saṃyoga, conjunction—as between the eye and a pot; (2) saṃyukta-samavāya, inherence in something conjoined—as between the eye and the colour of the pot; (3) saṃyukta-samaveta-samavāya, inherence in what inheres in a conjoined object—as between the eye and the universal of colour; (4) samavāya, inherence—as between the ear and sound inhering in ether; (5) samaveta-samavāya, inherence in what inheres—as between the ear and soundhood, the universal of sound; and (6) viśeṣaṇatā, qualification—as between the eye and the absence of a pot on the floor.

Extraordinary contact (alaukika-sannikarṣa) has three forms: (1) sāmānya-lakṣaṇa, perceiving the universal nature of smoke and, through it, instances of smoke in every time and place; (2) jñāna-lakṣaṇa, an "indirect perception" recognised in Western psychology, as when the sight of sandalwood, by activating memory, leads us to apprehend its fragrance; and (3) yogaja, the perceptual power of advanced ascetics.

Among Gaṅgeśa's most philosophically sophisticated contributions is his distinction between nirvikalpaka (indeterminate, non-conceptual) and savikalpaka (determinate, conceptual) perception. Nirvikalpaka perception is the initial, extraordinary, concept-free moment in which an individual object and its universal nature are registered separately, before being joined—"pot alone" or "potness alone," without relational qualification. Savikalpaka perception is the subsequent, concept-laden awareness of a qualificand by means of a qualifier: "This is a pot," where potness is predicated of this object.

Gaṅgeśa employs a famous thought experiment: a child encountering a cow for the first time, he argues, can grasp cowness through an indeterminate apprehension of the qualifier and correctly say "That is a cow," without a previous experience of a cow. This addresses how a concept can arise in perception without presupposing prior possession of that very concept—a difficulty analytic epistemology addresses through the idea of "non-doxastic" or "non-assertoric" perceptual states.

Gaṅgeśa's theory of anuvyavasāya—a perception that takes a preceding cognition as its object—is his answer to the question of how one knows what one knows. He argues that such self-directed perception is infallible with respect to the intentional content (viṣayatā) of the earlier cognition, though not with respect to its truth. By experiencing a perceptual awareness and identifying it as perceptual (rather than inferential or memorial), the subject obtains a secure basis for verification or questioning. This theory places Gaṅgeśa's epistemology in productive dialogue with Western discussions of introspection, higher-order knowledge, and self-consciousness.

The Theory of Inference (Anumāna)

Invariable Concomitance (Vyāpti)

Gaṅgeśa's greatest achievement in the theory of inference is his definitive definition of vyāpti (invariable concomitance, often rendered "pervasion" or "natural entailment"). Vyāpti grounds an inference: the fact that smoke is pervaded by fire (wherever there is smoke, there is fire) licenses the inference of fire on a mountain from the smoke observed there. The challenge is to define vyāpti so that it (1) handles ordinary inferences, (2) includes purely affirmative inferences for which there is no negative instance of the probandum, and (3) escapes the problem of an upādhi, a condition that restricts the middle term.

After examining and rejecting twenty-four earlier definitions—including those advanced under the designations "Lion" and "Tiger" (siṃha-vyāghrokta-vyāpti-lakṣaṇa)—Gaṅgeśa arrives at his siddhānta-lakṣaṇa, his final definition: vyāpti is the coexistence of the reason (hetu) and the probandum (sādhya), unqualified by the nature of the counterpositive of that absolute absence which (a) occurs in a locus shared with the reason but (b) occurs in a different locus with respect to that counterpositive. Vidyābhūṣaṇa's introduction supplies an accessible summary of this extended dialectic, complete with its celebrated circular diagrams of smoke and fire, the nameable and the knowable, trees and monkeys, and other examples used to illustrate successive provisional and final definitions.

The Syllogism and Inference for Others (Parārthānumāna)

Gaṅgeśa analyses inference under two forms. Svārthānumāna (inference for oneself) is the cognitive process through which a person arrives at inferential knowledge. Having repeatedly seen smoke accompanied by fire in kitchens and sacrificial halls, the person observes smoke on a mountain, recalls the relation of pervasion, and reaches the knowledge that the mountain has fire. The decisive mental event is parāmarśa, reflection upon the sign: the cognition that "smoke, which is invariably concomitant with fire, exists on this mountain." This is the cause of anumiti, the inferential conclusion.

Parārthānumāna (inference for another) is the demonstration of one's inference through a five-membered syllogism: (1) pratijñā (proposition) —"This mountain has fire"; (2) hetu (reason)—"because it has smoke"; (3) udāharaṇa (example)—"whatever has smoke has fire, as in a kitchen"; (4) upanaya (application)—"this mountain too has smoke"; and (5) nigamana (conclusion)—"therefore this mountain has fire." The syllogism elicits in the listener a "reflection upon the sign" (parāmarśa), which issues in inferential knowledge.

Fallacious Reasons (Hetvābhāsa)

Gaṅgeśa's analysis of hetvābhāsa (literally, the "semblance of a reason") is, in the words of a scholar cited by Vidyābhūṣaṇa, "one of the wonders of the world in the field of intellectual achievement." Five types of defective reasons are distinguished: (1) savyabhicāra (inconstant or deviating), a reason present in both similar (sapakṣa) and dissimilar (vipakṣa) cases; (2) viruddha (contradictory), a reason that establishes the opposite of what is to be proved; (3) satpratipakṣita (counterbalanced by an equally strong counter-reason), a reason met by an inference of equal force; (4) asiddha (unestablished), a reason whose presence in its locus, its own nature, or its pervasion is unestablished; and (5) bādhita (contradicted or already defeated), a reason leading to a conclusion already refuted by another means of knowledge.

Beyond technical logic, Gaṅgeśa advances three controversial inferences. The proof of the self (ātman) takes the form of an exclusively negative inference (kevala-vyatireki): "Every living body possesses a self, because every living body possesses vital breath, unlike a pot." His theistic inference argues: "The earth and things like it have a conscious maker as their efficient cause, because they are products, like pots and unlike atoms." The proof of the possibility of liberation (mokṣa) employs a complex inference through the analogy of a lamp going out, arguing that suffering, being a continuous quality existing only as an effect, can in principle be completely extinguished. All three arguments are demonstrations of the inferential system—with its distinctive treatment of upādhi, tarka (hypothetical reasoning), and positive and negative examples—as well as substantive metaphysical or soteriological theses.

The Theory of Comparison (Upamāna)

For Gaṅgeśa, upamāna, comparison or analogy, is strictly the source of knowledge through which a person learns the relation between a word and what it denotes. The standard example is of someone who, having been told that a gavaya (an animal resembling a bison) is like a cow, later encounters the animal in a forest and identifies it as a gavaya: the means of that recognition is knowledge through similarity. Gaṅgeśa holds that this knowledge is genuinely irreducible. It cannot be traced back to perception (which cannot perceive a relation extending over instances beyond the present example) or to inference (which requires knowledge of a vyāpti, while no such pervasion is available here). The operation (vyāpāra) of upamāna consists in recollection of the elder's instructive utterance; its result (upamiti) is knowledge of the relation between the name and the named.

The Theory of Testimony (Śabda)

Language as an Irreducible Means of Knowledge

Following the Nyāya-sūtra (1.1.7), Gaṅgeśa accepts that verbal testimony is the true statement of a reliable expert (āpta-vākya). Against the Yogācāra Buddhists, who deny language's capacity for truth, and against the Vaiśeṣikas, who wish to reduce verbal knowledge to inference, Gaṅgeśa argues that testimony works through a distinctive linguistic mechanism. The listener's knowledge arises not from the inference, "This speaker knows and intends to tell the truth," but from the immediate comprehension of words joined into a meaningful whole—a process analytically distinct from both perception and inference.

The Conditions of Verbal Knowledge

Gaṅgeśa identifies four sentential conditions that must be fulfilled for an utterance to produce verbal knowledge: (1) ākāṅkṣā, syntactic expectancy—the requirement that each word needs others to produce connected meaning; (2) yogyatā, semantic fitness—the absence of a legitimate obstacle to understanding; (3) āsatti, proximity—the words must be uttered without excessive intervals; and (4) tātparya, the speaker's intention to convey a particular meaning. Gaṅgeśa's innovation is to reinterpret the trigger of lakṣaṇā (secondary or indirect meaning), not as a violation of yogyatā, as commonly assumed, but as a failure of anvaya, the overall constructive connection—a subtle and more precise criterion.

Śakti (Denotative Power) and Lakṣaṇā (Secondary Meaning)

The chapter on testimony culminates in a rich theory of linguistic meaning. Every word possesses śakti, the capacity to evoke recollection of its referent, acquired through divine will (for primary or permanent denotative power) or through human will (for technical or contingent denotative power). A word's referent is always an individual qualified by its universal, the two being inseparable in ordinary cognition. Where the primary referent cannot be reconciled with the sentence's connected meaning, lakṣaṇā, secondary signification, operates and directs the listener towards a related meaning: thus "gaṅgāyāṃ ghoṣaḥ" ("a settlement on the Ganges") indicates the riverbank rather than the river's water. Gaṅgeśa's defence of lakṣaṇā as an economical interpretive device, against those who would reduce all secondary meaning to primary reference or a multiplicity of meanings, is among the most technically ingenious arguments in the Tattvacintāmaṇi.

Metaphysical Commitments

Gaṅgeśa's epistemological project is grounded in a robust realist ontology inherited from Udayana's synthesis of Nyāya and Vaiśeṣika. Seven categories—substance (dravya), quality (guṇa), action (karman), universal (sāmānya), particularity (viśeṣa), inherence (samavāya), and absence (abhāva)—provide the metaphysical furniture of his theory of knowledge. Cognitions and other mental occurrences are considered real and intersubjectively knowable. Universals are real recurrent properties qualifying both substances and their qualities; inherence is the "metaphysical glue" that binds qualities and universals to their substrates in a relation that admits of no further analysis.

Gaṅgeśa's treatment of absence is particularly subtle. Against those who deny absence the status of a separate ontological category, he argues that our perception of the absence of a pot on the floor cannot be explained by the characteristics of the floor alone: there must be something there—"absence" as a distinct qualifier—that functions in our failure to perceive the pot, which is the counterpositive. There are two principal kinds of absence: relational absence (prior, posterior, and eternal) and mutual absence, or difference based on identity (itaretarābhāva). Each has its own perceptual mechanism and epistemological consequences.

Influence and Legacy

The Navya-Nyāya School

The Tattvacintāmaṇi did not immediately displace all earlier Nyāya literature. Within a century of its composition, however, it was being studied and commented upon in India's principal centres of learning. The Navadvīpa (Bengal) tradition produced commentators of extraordinary refinement—Raghunātha Śiromaṇi, Jagadīśa, and Gadādhara—who developed Gaṅgeśa's analytic vocabulary, particularly its theory of qualification (viśeṣaṇatā) and the logic of absence, into a terrain of abstract symbolism unprecedented in any philosophical tradition before the twentieth century. Its influence extended into Mīmāṃsā, Vedānta, grammar, Dharmaśāstra, and medicine, as scholars of different disciplines adopted Navya-Nyāya's technical vocabulary to articulate their positions with greater precision.

Mithila and the Living Tradition

In Mithila itself—and this is of particular importance to Videha magazine—the Tattvacintāmaṇi remained the summit of a paṇḍit's education. The Darbhanga Raj maintained a tradition of scholarly patronage that preserved the study of Navya-Nyāya in Mithila, even as Navadvīpa became its more celebrated centre. The pañjī system, the genealogical record of Maithil Brahmin families—of which Preeti Thakur has collected, scanned, and catalogued more than eleven thousand palm-leaf records for the Videha archive—is directly connected with the social structures that generated and perpetuated the paṇḍit tradition within which Gaṅgeśa worked. The Videha archive's preservation of Maithili and Sanskrit manuscripts, including writings by Ṭhakkuras and Miśras who were direct intellectual descendants of Gaṅgeśa's circle, establishes a living scholarly connection across seven centuries.

Modern Scholarship

Western scholarship on the Tattvacintāmaṇi began in earnest with Satish Chandra Vidyabhusana's History of Indian Logic (1921) and the Bibliotheca Indica edition edited by Kāmākhyānātha Tarkavāgīśa with Mathurānātha's Māthurī commentary (1884–1901). The twentieth century saw partial translations of individual sections: C. Goekoop's study of the vyāpti chapter (1967), B. K. Matilal's work on absence and indeterminate perception, Śibajīban Bhaṭṭācārya's extensive analyses of several divisions, and others. The first complete English translation of the Tattvacintāmaṇi appeared in three volumes by Stephen H. Phillips in 2020 (Bloomsbury), making the entire work accessible for the first time to readers without Sanskrit.

Name, Birthplace, Family, and Chronology

Gaṅgeśa or Gaṅgeśvara?

The Sahitya Akademi monograph maintains conclusively that Gaṅgeśvara was the formal name and Gaṅgeśa the familiar name—both referring to the same person. His son Vardhamāna pays homage in the Kiraṇāvalī-prakāśa with the words "gaṅgeśvarāya gurave pitre"; Gaṅgeśa himself writes in the benedictory verse of the Tattvacintāmaṇi, "gaṅgeśa-stute mitena vacase śrī-tattva-cintāmaṇim." The pañjī records describe him as "tattva-cintāmaṇi-kāraka mahāmahopādhyāya paramaguruḥ gaṅgeśvaraḥ."

The Potter Encyclopaedia confirms: "Gaṅgeśa was a native of Mithila. It appears that he was born and brought up in a village called Chādana, now unidentifiable, but lived later in life at Karion, the village of Udayana, about twelve miles south-east of Darbhanga. He belonged to the Kāśyapa gotra. Tradition has it that he had several wives, three sons and a daughter. One of the sons was Vardhamāna. Contradictory traditions say that Gaṅgeśa was either (a) a great prodigy or (b) an illiterate child."

Recovering Parallel History: Suppressed Pañjī Evidence

The parallel history of Maithili literature, as documented by the Videha movement and Gajendra Thakur, discloses a dimension of Gaṅgeśa's biography which, it alleges, institutional historians deliberately suppressed. The pañjī system, established under Harisiṃhadeva in the fourteenth century, is the genealogical recording system of Maithil Brahmins. When the Videha movement digitised and released the Dūṣaṇa Pañjī records in 2009, it brought to light what parallel history calls the "honour-killing of Gaṅgeśa Upādhyāya's legacy."

The original pañjī records, according to this account, reveal that Gaṅgeśa Upādhyāya married a carmakāriṇī—a woman of a leather-working community—and that he was born five years after his father's death. These facts, which complicate his portrayal as a figure of unquestioned Brahmin orthodoxy, were, the author alleges, suppressed by Rāmānātha Jhā (the first convenor for Maithili at the Sahitya Akademi) when he transmitted biographical information to the historian Dinesh Chandra Bhattacharya. The 2016 Sahitya Akademi monograph on Gaṅgeśa, parallel history observes, perpetuated this suppression. Parallel history accordingly presents Gaṅgeśa not simply as a monument of Brahmin scholarship but as a person who, like the dialectical method of the Tattvacintāmaṇi, challenges every presumption applied to him.

The implications of this biographical recovery are profound. The pañjī system was itself an instrument of caste regulation; yet its own records, once released, undermine the narrative of caste purity it was designed to sustain. Gaṅgeśa, the philosopher who insisted that every definition be tested against all possible counterexamples, becomes in parallel history a man whose life is itself a counterexample to the caste ideology that later laid claim to him. As Scharfstein observed of Navya-Nyāya method, "He and his followers construct definitions which stretch the mind and invite exact criticism." The critical spirit that animated his logic also animated his social existence—if the pañjī evidence is accepted.

Chronology

The authoritative assessment in Potter's Encyclopaedia assigns Gaṅgeśa a floruit of 1320 CE. The principal manuscript evidence includes a surviving copy of Vardhamāna's Kusumāñjali-prakāśa said, on epigraphic evidence, to date from 1300–1360; Gaṅgeśa quotes Śrīharṣa's Khaṇḍanakhaṇḍakhādya, and Śrīharṣa certainly predates 1233. Pañjī records compiled in Śaka 1310 (1388 CE) identify him by the epithet "tattvacintāmaṇikāraka"—the maker of the Tattvacintāmaṇi. The Sahitya Akademi monograph offers the range 1270–1370 CE; Scharfstein uses the floruit of 1320 CE. Parallel history, citing the pañjī account of his birth five years after his father's death, notes that this biographical detail places his active life firmly in the Karṇāṭa-dynasty period of Harisiṃhadeva (approximately 1295–1326 CE).

Mithila, the Karṇāṭa Dynasty, and the Intellectual Setting

The Karṇāṭa dynasty under Harisiṃhadeva (approximately 1295–1326 CE) provided the political framework of Gaṅgeśa's life. Harisiṃhadeva was a generous patron of Sanskrit learning. He ordered the pañjī genealogical records in 1310 CE; his minister Caṇḍeśvara Ṭhākura wrote prolifically; and he maintained a court in which the greatest Sanskrit scholars of the age competed and collaborated. Parallel history situates this within Mithila's long history as a centre of Nyāya–Mīmāṃsā scholarship—an intellectual capital which, as D. C. Bhattacharya documented, produced twenty-four Maithil logicians preceding Gaṅgeśa over seven centuries.

Yet parallel history also insists that this courtly culture rested upon an exclusionary social foundation. The same pañjī system that documented Gaṅgeśa's intellectual distinction enforced caste endogamy and marked the genealogical "disqualification" of those who transgressed its norms. The recovery of Gaṅgeśa's alleged inter-caste marriage from the Dūṣaṇa Pañjī is thus doubly significant: it reveals the pañjī as an instrument capable both of suppressing and, inadvertently, of preserving subversive facts about the very people it claims to celebrate.

Tattvacintāmaṇi — Structure, Innovation, and the Navya-Nyāya System

The Tattvacintāmaṇi and the Nature of Navya-Nyāya

Structure and Scope

V. P. Bhatta's introduction offers a clear account of the place of the Tattvacintāmaṇi in Indian intellectual history: "The Tattva Cintāmaṇi (T. C.) was composed by Gaṅgeśopādhyāya of Mithila in the thirteenth century CE. It inaugurated a new epoch in the development of Indian theories of knowledge and logic and is regarded as the first of the various works on Navya-Nyāya. It is divided into four books—Perception, Inference, Comparison, and Verbal Testimony—and treats the sixteen categories of Nyāya under these four headings." The Pratyakṣa-khaṇḍa alone, as Bhatta's translation shows, contains thirteen major discussions or subsections: Maṅgalavāda, Prāmāṇyavāda, Pramālakṣaṇa, Apramāvāda, Pratyakṣavāda, Samavāyavāda/Sannikarṣavāda, Anupalabdhivāda, Abhāvavāda, Pratyakṣakāraṇavāda, Mano'ṇutvavāda, Pratyabhijñāvāda/Anuvyavasāyavāda, Nirvikalpakavāda, and Savikalpakavāda. The thirteenth-century dating is cited here as the position of Bhatta's introduction; the integrated chronology adopted in the present work places Gaṅgeśa's floruit around 1320 CE, correlating it with Harisiṃhadeva's reign and a parallel reading of the pañjī evidence.

The Potter–Bhattacharyya Encyclopaedia characterises the innovation: "Navya-Nyāya is really a logic of cognitions." By restricting its inquiry to the pramāṇas, the valid sources of knowledge, and abandoning the all-category framework of earlier Nyāya treatises, the Tattvacintāmaṇi achieved an unprecedented degree of analytical precision. The Sanskrit word jñāna, translated as "awareness," denotes not merely propositional acts but any state of conscious apprehension. A jñāna is always an occurrent event—something taking place at a particular time—never a dispositional belief. The corresponding term for a disposition is saṃskāra, an unconscious memory trace which, when activated, produces conscious recollection.

Method: Why Study This Work?

Bhatta emphasises its educational necessity: "It is therefore necessary that students and scholars of philosophy become familiar with the logic of the Navya-Nyāya method in order to understand the intricacies of philosophical theories … Thus the study of the T. C. is essential not only for its subject matter but also for its method." This insistence on method is itself philosophically significant. The Tattvacintāmaṇi does not merely reach conclusions; it demonstrates a way of reaching them that became a standard of intellectual rigour in Sanskrit philosophy for the following five centuries.

Scharfstein, in his comparative assessment, identifies the central methodological feature: "Gaṅgeśa makes philosophy the unquestioned domain of those skilled in a specialised language. He and his followers construct definitions that stretch the mind and invite precise criticism, but only from those who have mastered the relevant technical terms and procedures of argument." Yet, as parallel history reminds us, this methodological exclusivity also became an instrument of caste exclusion: a language accessible principally to those possessing the social capital required to devote years to paṇḍit training.

Epistemology — Knowledge, Validity, and Error

The Nature of Knowledge (Jñāna): A Comprehensive Comparative Account

Knowledge Across the Schools: Bhatta's Introduction

The general introduction to V. P. Bhatta's translation of the Pratyakṣa-khaṇḍa provides one of the most systematic comparative surveys of Indian theories of knowledge available in a single English-language source. It begins with the most fundamental question: what is knowledge?

Jñāna (knowledge), Bhatta explains, means buddhi (cognition) in the Nyāya-sūtra (1.1.15) and the Vaiśeṣika-sūtra (8.2); valid knowledge is a particular kind of cognition (buddhi-viśeṣa). In Nyāya, knowledge consists in awareness or apprehension and involves the disclosure of an object (artha-prakāśa). Naiyāyikas reject competing accounts. Against Buddhists and Mīmāṃsakas who regard knowledge as an activity (kriyā), Nyāya argues that the theory of activity "arises from confusing knowledge with the act of knowing." Against the Sāṃkhya and Yoga systems, which treat knowledge as a transformation (pariṇāma) of the intellect (buddhi), Nyāya objects that only the self—not an unconscious principle of intellect—can serve as the substratum of knowledge. Knowledge is a quality (guṇa) of the self, neither an activity nor a transformation of the intellect.

Classification of knowledge: Naiyāyikas divide cognition principally into two kinds—experience (anubhava) and memory (smṛti). Experience directly discloses objects; memory reproduces previous knowledge without presenting its objects directly. Both experience and memory may be valid (pramā) or invalid (apramā), depending on their causes.

Valid Cognition (Pramā): The Foundational Definition

Bhatta supplies the Nyāya definition with its full comparative apparatus: valid cognition (pramā) means "knowledge of a thing as it is" (yathārtha-jñāna). It is a true experience of an object (yathārthānubhava), an apprehension of reality. It is also definite and assured cognition (asaṃdigdha); hence it excludes the forms of invalid cognition—doubt, error, and hypothetical reasoning—as well as memory.

Valid cognition is true or unerring knowledge: it does not deviate from its object (arthāvyabhicārin). The familiar example, "This is a pot" (ayaṃ ghaṭaḥ), is valid cognition because it apprehends a pot as characterised by pothood. Thus valid cognition can be defined, as in the Nyāyakośa, as the cognition of an object in which a quality actually present in it is apprehended as its distinguishing feature. Three factors are involved: the pramātṛ (knowing subject), prameya (object of knowledge), and pramāṇa (means of knowledge). A pramāṇa is the special or extraordinary causal condition (asādhāraṇa-kāraṇa) producing knowledge—an operative cause instrumental in acquiring valid cognition, and thus a method of knowing.

The Great Debate Between the Schools: Intrinsic versus Extrinsic Validity

The most philosophically rich part of Bhatta's introduction surveys the great interschool debate about the validity and invalidity of knowledge: whether they are constituted and known intrinsically (svataḥ) or extrinsically (parataḥ). This corresponds directly to Gaṅgeśa's own Prāmāṇyavāda section.

Sāṃkhya generally maintained that both validity and invalidity are constituted and known through intrinsic conditions—through the complete assemblage of causes producing cognition. Buddhists maintain that falsity or invalidity is intrinsic to cognition, whereas truth or validity is extrinsic. Mīmāṃsakas and Vedāntins hold that the validity of cognition is self-evident and constituted by intrinsic conditions, while its invalidity is established by other evidence and known through extrinsic conditions.

Naiyāyikas, however, generally hold that both are constituted and known by extrinsic conditions (parataḥ). Neither validity nor invalidity is self-evident; both must be inferred from circumstances external to the cognition. The Nyāya reply to the Sāṃkhya–Mīmāṃsā doctrine of intrinsic validity is decisive: "If validity were so constituted, there would be no invalid knowledge at all. Valid knowledge is something more than knowledge as such; hence the validity of knowledge, like its invalidity, requires special conditions and distinguishing features to constitute it. If validity were inherent in cognition, every cognition would possess truth and validity, and doubt and error would become untenable."

As Bhatta's survey of Western theories of truth observes, "There is no exact parallel in the West to the Indian theories of the validity and invalidity of knowledge." Reid considers truth simply the successful operation of knowledge; realists take it to be correspondence with facts; Alexander takes coherence as the basis of truth; pragmatists locate truth in the capacity to produce practically useful consequences. The Naiyāyika position—that neither validity nor invalidity is self-evident, and that both require inference from external conditions, such as successful or unsuccessful activity—is genuinely distinctive.

Invalid Cognition: Doubt, Error, and Hypothetical Reasoning

Bhatta gives a systematic account of three forms of invalid cognition addressed in Gaṅgeśa's Tattvacintāmaṇi. Doubt (saṃśaya) is a conflicting apprehension (vimarśa) concerning a single object, consisting in cognitions that attribute incompatible properties to it. "Is this a post or a person?"—doubt oscillates between alternatives without reaching a determinate, discriminating cognition. Doubt may arise from five causes: a common property; an exceptional property; mutually contradictory testimony concerning the self; irregularity in perception; and non-apprehension concerning the existence or nonexistence of something.

Error or illusion (viparyaya) is the second kind of invalid cognition —"apprehension of a thing otherwise than as it is" (ayathārtha). In error, an object is apprehended as possessing a quality that is not present in it. Naiyāyikas propose the theory of misapprehension as something other than it is (anyathākhyāti): whereas valid cognition is objective, invalid cognition becomes subjective through the superimposition of an extraneous feature upon the object. In an illusion, owing to a defect in the sense organ, one fails to determine the actual properties of the object (a shell) and imputes to it an alien property that is absent (silver). Error thus results in the judgement of one object (the shell) as something else (silver): anyathākhyāti.

The comparative analysis of theories of illusion is extensive. The Buddhist Yogācāra school proposes that error or illusion consists in the presentation of a subjective idea as an external or extramental reality (ātmakhyāti). The Mādhyamikas, who deny existence as ordinarily conceived, reject the theory of cognition of nonexistence. Vācaspati Miśra proposes that error is the apprehension of what is unreal (asatkhyāti). Prābhākara Mīmāṃsakas hold that error consists in non-apprehension or failure to distinguish (akhyāti). Advaitins propose that error or illusion is cognition of what is inexplicable (anirvacanīya). Naiyāyikas refute these positions, insisting that an error must be a distinct and determinate cognition capable of prompting action. It cannot simply be ignorance, for in it there is a cognition of an object as it is not.

Tarka (hypothetical or suppositional reasoning) is the third form of invalid cognition. It is a species of implicative reasoning by which the validity of an argument can be tested. In tarka the reasoning procedure (Tarka-bhāṣā, p. 43) involves drawing out an unacceptable consequence (aniṣṭa-prasaṅga), whose logical effect is to expose the untenability of premises supporting a contrary thesis. Five forms of tarka—ātmāśraya (self-dependence), anyonyāśraya (mutual dependence), cakraka (circularity), anavasthā (infinite regress), and pramāṇa-bādhitārtha-prasaṅga (a consequence contradicted by valid knowledge)—correspond directly to Gaṅgeśa's treatment of the function of tarka in the Anumāna-khaṇḍa.

Perception (Pratyakṣa) — The First Book of the Tattvacintāmaṇi

The Nature and Definition of Perception

The Nyāya Definition and Gaṅgeśa's Innovation

Bhatta's introduction to the nature of perception (pratyakṣa) begins with its foundational philosophical status: "Perception is the most fundamental and final test of knowledge. One may question the truth or validity of inference and so on, but one cannot question the truth or validity of perception; it is beyond question." The Prācya-Naiyāyikas (Old Nyāya philosophers) define perception as knowledge produced by contact between a sense organ and its object (indriyārtha-sannikarṣa). This definition follows the etymological meaning of the term pratyakṣa (Nyāya-bhāṣya on 1.1.4): perception denotes the operation of the senses in reaching objects.

Gaṅgeśa and the Navya-Naiyāyikas, however (Tattvacintāmaṇi 1.3 …), define perception as immediate cognition (sākṣātkāri-jñāna), produced without a prior cognition serving as its instrumental cause (jñāna-kāraṇakaṃ jñānam). In their view, this definition applies to every instance of perception, since immediacy (sākṣātkāritva) and arising without a preceding cognition are common to all perceptions. Thus only the Navya-Nyāya definition—immediate cognition not generated through a previous cognition—covers all cases of perception; immediacy is an essential characteristic of every perception.

Bhatta compares this innovation with Western perspectives: "According to Western philosophy, the truth of perception is unquestionable and self-evident. Thus J. F. Mill (A System of Logic, p. 4) says that whatever we know by consciousness (intuition) is known beyond the possibility of question. And W. T. Marvin (The New Realism, p. 66) says that perception is the final decisive test, and as such does not presuppose its own possibility." The Buddhist definition—perception as an unerring apprehension of a given object free from all conceptual construction (kalpanāpoḍham)—is rejected on the ground that "if perception is determined by objects, then all true knowledge ought to be perception." Vedāntins define perception as immediate and timeless consciousness (caitanya), but this does not distinguish a mental modification (manovṛtti) from its object, since perceptual immediacy cannot be produced merely by the stimulation of a sense organ.

The Senses, Mind, Self, and Their Functions

Bhatta gives a detailed account of the mechanism of perception. Nyāya holds that perception arises from contact between a sense organ and an object, and that the self comes into contact with the object through the mind. Four operative causes enter into the production of perception: the senses, the object, the mind (manas), and the self (Nyāya-sūtra 1.1.4). Naiyāyikas and Vaiśeṣikas hold that the mind (manas) is an internal sense organ (antarindriya) belonging to the self (ātman). The perception of objects cannot arise solely from external senses meeting their objects: it occurs when the external senses also establish contact with the internal organ, manas. As the mind is atomic in size, different external senses make contact with it at different times and thereby give rise to perceptions of different objects.

The self (ātman) is the individual self (jīvātman), the substratum of all knowledge. Cognition and other mental qualities belong to the self alone, not to any other material substance, precisely because they are mental. Selves differ among embodied individuals and are eternal (nitya) and all-pervasive (vibhu). Naiyāyikas (Bhāṣāpariccheda, 51) do not accept the Vedāntic view that the self is eternal, self-luminous consciousness (cit). Rather, it is a substance (dravya) that supports qualities such as cognition and is thus known as the locus of the awareness of "I" or ego.

There are six senses (indriyas): smell (ghrāṇa), taste (rasanā), sight (cakṣus), touch (tvak), hearing (śrotra), and the internal organ or mind (manas). Their function is to produce cognition of objects; the senses function through direct contact with objects. Six kinds of sense–object connection are recognised: (1) conjunction (saṃyoga); (2) inherence in what is conjoined (saṃyukta-samavāya); (3) inherence in what inheres in the conjoined (saṃyukta-samaveta-samavāya); (4) inherence (samavāya); (5) inherence in what is inherent (samaveta-samavāya); and (6) qualificative relation (viśeṣaṇatā).

Perception is of two kinds: ordinary (laukika) and extraordinary (alaukika). Ordinary perception arises through sense–object contact, whereas extraordinary perception arises through an exceptional mode of connection. Ordinary perception is further divided into external (bāhya) and internal or mental (mānasa) perception. External perception relates to contact through the external senses; internal perception (Bhāṣāpariccheda, 57) arises through the internal sense organ, manas, and its objects include experiences of pleasure, pain, desire, aversion, cognition, and effort.

The Nyāya system recognises three forms of extraordinary (alaukika) perception: (1) perception qualified by the character of a universal (sāmānya-lakṣaṇa); (2) perception qualified through a prior cognition (jñāna-lakṣaṇa); and (3) perception through yogic contact (yogaja). Perception through a universal is the first type of extraordinary perception: the cognition of an entire class of things as qualified by a common or universal property. For example, "This is a pot" (ayaṃ ghaṭaḥ) apprehends the pot as qualified by the universal pothood. Naiyāyikas consider this capacity indispensable; without admitting perception mediated by a universal, knowledge of an invariable relation such as "Wherever there is smoke, there is fire" would be undermined.

Perception qualified through prior knowledge (jñāna-lakṣaṇa) is the second form of extraordinary cognition. It apprehends an object that comes into sensory relation through the operation of a prior cognition (viṣayiyasya tasyaiva vyāpāraḥ). The example "I see fragrant sandalwood" (surabhi-candanam) illustrates this form of perception: fragrance cannot be grasped by the organ of sight, and must therefore be brought into the visual apprehension through the operation of knowledge. Naiyāyikas further maintain that illusions such as "This [shell] is a piece of silver" (idaṃ rajatam) likewise require the operation of earlier knowledge of silver, since the organ of sight is in contact with the shell, not with silver. Perception characterised by jñāna-lakṣaṇa (yogaja) constitutes the third type: an apprehension of objects past, present, and future through capacities generated in the mind by meditation (yogābhyāsa-janito dharma-viśeṣaḥ).

Indeterminate and Determinate Perception — Gaṅgeśa's Central Doctrine

Three Types of Ordinary Perception

According to Bhatta, ordinary perception has three forms: (1) indeterminate perception (nirvikalpaka), (2) determinate perception (savikalpaka), and (3) recognition or subsequent awareness (pratyabhijñā or anuvyavasāya). Nirvikalpaka perception or cognition is the first kind of ordinary perception. It is the most abstract apprehension of objects: a simple awareness of an object's existence without verbal predication. Savikalpaka perception is the most concrete apprehension of objects together with their qualities. Recognition is a subsequent cognition following determinate perception, clearly distinct from both indeterminate and determinate perception.

The Debate Between Schools on Indeterminate Perception

Vedāntins (Rāmānuja on Brahma-sūtra 1.1.1) hold that indeterminate knowledge is awareness of sheer being (sanmātra)—"This is something" (idaṃ kiñcit)—and does not include the specification of relations or attributes. Buddhists (Pramāṇasamuccaya, Chapter 1) maintain that indeterminate knowledge is the only form of valid knowledge: it is free of all ideas or conceptual constructions (kalpanāpoḍham). Mīmāṃsakas take it to be the perceptual apprehension of a real individual that unites universal and particular.

The Prābhākara Mīmāṃsaka position is important: indeterminate knowledge arises spontaneously when the senses meet their objects—it is the perception of a child and of comparable perceivers. The Prābhākara Mīmāṃsakas' refutation of the grammarians is also important: indeterminate cognition is one's first experience of an object, a simple apprehension of its existence without a verbal relation. In determinate cognition the object and its property stand in a subject–predicate relation; in indeterminate cognition, that object and property have not yet been connected in such a relation. Naiyāyikas, by contrast, maintain that indeterminate cognition is a real but supersensible state of awareness (atīndriya). Since it is an undifferentiated awareness of an as-yet-undetermined object, it cannot be a determinate perception.

Determinate Perception and the Structure of Qualification

Determinate perception or cognition (savikalpaka) is the second form of ordinary perception. It is the most concrete apprehension of an object along with its qualities. Vedāntins (Rāmānuja on Brahma-sūtra 1.1.1) hold that determinate cognition is a distinctive cognition that discriminates an object (vikalpa) from other objects. Later Advaitin epistemologists agree that savikalpaka cognition is a verbally articulated judgement about an object as an individual whole. Buddhists (Nyāyavārttika-tātparyaṭīkā on 1.1.4, as cited here) treat determinate cognition as a verbal expression in which an object is determined through concepts of name, class, and the like (nāma-jāty-ādi-yojanā-sahita).

Naiyāyikas (Bhāṣāpariccheda, 58) hold that determinate cognition is qualified knowledge (viśiṣṭa-jñāna), in which an object is known as qualified by attributes. Its object is thus apprehended through specified qualities. The judgement "This is a cow" (ayaṃ gauḥ), for instance, apprehends the animal as qualified by cowhood. Determinate cognition is accordingly a proposition in which the object or individual is the subject and the qualifying attribute is the predicate. Whereas indeterminate perception is the first stage of ordinary perception, determinate perception is its second stage.

Recognition (Pratyabhijñā, Anuvyavasāya)

Recognition (pratyabhijñā or anuvyavasāya) constitutes the third type of ordinary perception in this account. It is a subsequent cognition following determinate perception and is clearly distinct from both indeterminate and determinate cognition. In its broad sense, recognition means apprehending the nature of an object; in its narrower sense, it means knowing again something already known. Nyāya philosophy uses pratyabhijñā in this second, narrower sense.

Naiyāyikas (Mitabhāṣiṇī, p. 25) hold recognition to be cognition of an object now perceived as the same object perceived before. Thus the recognition "This [Devadatta] is that Devadatta" (so'yaṃ devadattaḥ) apprehends the presently perceived Devadatta as the Devadatta previously perceived. Such recognition arises both from the senses and from traces (saṃskāras) left by earlier experience of the object (Nyāyamañjarī, p. 459). Recognition therefore involves both perception and recollection, since it is produced through the senses as well as through those retained traces.

Comparative and Global-Philosophical Perspectives

Gaṅgeśa, Descartes, and Leibniz: Logic-Sensitive Metaphysics

Among the most illuminating contributions of Scharfstein's A Comparative History is the systematic comparison, in Chapter 10 ("Logic-Sensitive, Methodical Metaphysics: Gaṅgeśa, Descartes, Leibniz"), of Gaṅgeśa with Descartes (1596–1650) and Leibniz (1646–1716). The organising theme is the search for certainty through the methodical application of reasoning: each philosopher seeks to establish knowledge by vindicating procedures of argument rather than simply adding more empirical material.

Scharfstein identifies several structural similarities. All three philosophers are committed logicians who seek to improve methods of reasoning and apply them to the full range of human thought—not just philosophy but life itself, extending in Descartes's case even to medicine and in Leibniz's to law. Gaṅgeśa's concern with valid induction and economical explanation is, in spirit, close to that of contemporary philosophers of science. All three also "seek a metaphysically unquestionable foundation for understanding the world," bringing together the empirical and theoretical, secular and sacred. All respond to powerful sceptical challenges: Gaṅgeśa to the Cārvākas and Śrīharṣa, Descartes to the Cartesian evil demon, and Leibniz to radical empiricism.

The differences are equally instructive. Descartes breaks with tradition and refuses to cite his sources; Gaṅgeśa, like other Indian philosophers, engages respectfully with his predecessor Udayana even when departing from him. Descartes's method is axiomatic-deductive, seeking certainty through clear and distinct ideas. Gaṅgeśa's is definitional-dialectical, seeking certainty through the comprehensive testing and rejection of rival definitions of vyāpti and other crucial concepts. Leibniz, a genuinely creative logician, invents new formalism. Gaṅgeśa works wholly within an inherited vocabulary but transforms it through the precision and completeness of his analysis of definitions.

Scharfstein's own comparative judgement is that "Gaṅgeśa makes philosophy the unquestioned domain of those skilled in a specialised language. He and his followers construct definitions that stretch the mind and invite precise criticism, but only from those who have mastered the relevant technical terms and procedures of argument." The Navya-Nyāya system inaugurated by Gaṅgeśa effectively created a formal language for philosophical discourse, one which in surprising respects anticipated the development of symbolic logic in late nineteenth-century Europe—though without symbolic notation.

Gaṅgeśa and Udayana: Innovation Within Tradition

The relationship between Gaṅgeśa and his most important predecessor, Udayana (fl. 1050 CE), is a central concern in both Scharfstein and the Potter Encyclopaedia. Scharfstein remarks: "Because so much of his philosophy is an elaboration of Udayana's, to whom we now turn, Gaṅgeśa's originality shows itself more in his dialectic, in the care and sharpness with which he argues—splitting hairs, it is easy to say—than in original doctrine." A footnote adds: "Udayana may be the more original of the two. Greater originality has also been ascribed to Gaṅgeśa's successor, commentator, and critic, Raghunātha (fl. 1500 CE)." The Potter Encyclopaedia identifies Scharfstein's comparative chapter on Udayana (Chapter 9 of his book) as providing the philosophical context in which the chapter on Gaṅgeśa should be read.

The Potter Encyclopaedia, however, offers a more nuanced assessment of Gaṅgeśa's originality. Its major innovations include: (1) the decisive treatment of vyāpti after a comprehensive examination of previous attempts; (2) the development of the theory of inhibitors and what they inhibit (pratibandhaka–pratibadhya) into a systematic logic of cognition; (3) a shift from Buddhists to Mīmāṃsakas as the primary adversaries, reflecting the changing philosophical landscape of fourteenth-century India; (4) the "linguistic turn" of the Śabda-khaṇḍa, giving Navya-Nyāya its own philosophy of language; and (5) above all, the creation of a new intellectual community through the Tattvacintāmaṇi itself, which became the common point of reference for all subsequent Naiyāyika debate.

The Metaphysical Framework and Raghunātha Śiromaṇi

Navya-Nyāya Metaphysics: Categories and Their Fate

The introduction to the Potter Encyclopaedia (Chapter 3, "Metaphysics") traces the development of the seven Vaiśeṣika categories from Gaṅgeśa to Raghunātha Śiromaṇi, showing how the analytical rigour of Navya-Nyāya gradually undermined the very metaphysical structure it had inherited. Gaṅgeśa himself is metaphysically conservative, working within the framework of seven categories: substance (dravya), quality (guṇa), motion or action (karma), universal (sāmānya), particularity (viśeṣa), inherence (samavāya), and absence (abhāva). He defends inherence as "a separate category, irreducible, perceptible, and one." He argues against the view that absence can be eliminated in favour of a mere difference relation.

The treatment of absence is a particularly striking field of development. Gaṅgeśa devotes a chapter of the Pratyakṣa-khaṇḍa to absence but does not raise the problem of the absence of an absence. Later commentators, especially Raghunātha—who adopts as a working principle that "the absolute absence of the absolute absence of a thing is the thing itself"—employ absences with growing technical sophistication as instruments of quantification. As the Encyclopaedia notes, "One of the most fascinating features of the development of Navya-Nyāya from Gaṅgeśa to Raghunātha is the remarkable increase in the use of absences as devices of quantification."

Raghunātha Śiromaṇi: Gaṅgeśa's Great Critic and Successor

The Potter Encyclopaedia casts Raghunātha Śiromaṇi (fl. 1500 CE) as the thinker who closes the period surveyed in Volume 6 and sets the agenda for all subsequent Navya-Nyāya. The famous story of Raghunātha's encounter with Pakṣadhara Miśra (Jayadeva) in Mithila—preserved in Jha "Ashok"'s monograph—marks the point at which the Navadvīpa (Bengal) tradition became the principal vehicle for Navya-Nyāya's further development. Raghunātha's Dīdhiti, a commentary on the Tattvacintāmaṇi, is the tradition's most important secondary work, generating its own vast commentary literature through Jagadīśa, Gadādhara, and later scholars.

Raghunātha's relationship to Gaṅgeśa is one of critical expansion: he accepts Gaṅgeśa's framework while subjecting almost every particular doctrine to radical revision. In the words of the Encyclopaedia, "Raghunātha rejects Gaṅgeśa's reasoning (on several technical points)"—and the pattern indeed recurs throughout the volume. Concerning universals, where Gaṅgeśa is conservative, Raghunātha eliminates almost all genuine universals, treating common properties as imposed or adventitious conditions (upādhi). Concerning particularity (viśeṣa), he abolishes the category altogether. Concerning inherence, where Gaṅgeśa defends a single inherence, Raghunātha declares that there are as many instances of inherence as there are pairs of things related in that way. It is Raghunātha who makes the delimitor relation (avacchedakatva) a particularly important analytical device. The Potter Encyclopaedia concludes: "How much of Raghunātha's equipment was his invention, and how much he received from his teachers and tradition, cannot be said until closer study has been made of those who intervened between the two great Naiyāyikas."

Legacy, the Commentary Tradition, and Mithila's Living Heritage

The Commentary Tradition

The commentarial tradition surrounding the Tattvacintāmaṇi is among the most extensive in Sanskrit literature. Jha "Ashok"'s monograph provides a table of twenty-three known commentators and their works; the Potter Encyclopaedia surveys the tradition in fifty numbered entries, from Gaṅgeśa and Vaṭeśvara to Raghunātha Śiromaṇi. Geographically, it falls into three strands: Maithila, Bengal (Navadvīpa), and the South.

In Mithila, the tradition runs from Vardhamāna Upādhyāya's direct connection to the text through Pakṣadhara Miśra's (Jayadeva's) Āloka commentary and the later internal dispute between the Āloka lineage (the Pakṣadhara–Yajñapati line) and the Dūṣaṇoddhāra lineage (the Narahari–Mādhava line). In Bengal, Raghunātha Śiromaṇi's Dīdhiti became the principal object of study, attracting commentaries by Rucidatta Miśra, Jagadīśa Tarkālaṃkāra, Gadādhara Bhaṭṭācārya, Mathurānātha Tarkavāgīśa, and many others. Scharfstein quotes Matilal on the achievement of the tradition: "The master of Navya-Nyāya did not first fashion conclusions and afterwards justify them by theory. He was seriously engaged in following reality wherever it might lead him, imposing his own prejudices as lightly as possible … This is precisely the quality that I find admirable in creative workers in modern science and philosophy."

The introduction to the Potter Encyclopaedia explains the scholarly challenge posed by this tradition: "Two of India's most remarkable philosophers, Gaṅgeśa and Raghunātha Śiromaṇi, are included in these pages—in fact, they begin and end the surveyed period … only two hundred years, roughly 1310 to 1510. There is good reason for concentrating so intensely on this short interval." The implication is that few comparable intervals elsewhere in world philosophy have produced two figures of similar stature within one tradition, while the intervening two centuries yielded dozens of commentators whose works constituted a continuous, self-critical and philosophically rigorous conversation of the highest order.

Gaṅgeśa in the Parallel History of Maithili Culture

Mainstream versus Parallel Historiography

The parallel history of Maithili literature—as documented in the research of the Videha movement and in A Parallel History of Maithili Literature—presents a comprehensive counter-narrative to the institutional Maithili literary canon. Mainstream history, crystallised in Jayakant Mishra's two-volume History of Maithili Literature (1949–1950) and institutionally implemented by the Sahitya Akademi from 1965, was "fundamentally an exercise in identity formation, designed to establish Maithili as an independent language rather than a dialect of Hindi." Although this undertaking helped secure Maithili's eventual recognition in the Eighth Schedule of the Indian Constitution, parallel historiography argues that it also established a conservative, Brahmin-centred norm that excluded liberal and marginalised voices.

The parallel history unfolds across nine layers: (1) the Buddhist foundations—the fifty Caryāpada songs of twenty-three Siddha poets, including Luipāda, Kānhapāda and Saraha, as the true roots of Maithili song; (2) the two Vidyāpatis—one of Videha's most significant scholarly interventions, separating the celebrated Padāvalī poet, placed before Jyotirishwar, from Vidyāpati Ṭhakkura (1350–1435), the Sanskrit/Avahaṭṭha author; (3) the suppressed Gaṅgeśa—original pañjī manuscripts preserving the claim that the philosopher Gaṅgeśa Upādhyāya was born five years after his father's death and married a woman from the leather-working community; (4) colonial-era protest poetry—Faturilal's famine poem of 1873–74; (5) the exclusion of Harimohan Jha; (6) living masters—Rajdev Mandal and Bechan Thakur; (7) disclosures under the Right to Information Act by Vineet Utpal and Ashish Anchinhar (2011–12), alleging that more than ninety per cent of Sahitya Akademi appointments went to friends or relatives of advisory-board members; (8) the Nepal dimension—recognising the Maithili of Nepal's Tarai as equally central; and (9) the digital counter-archive—Videha itself.

The Suppressed Gaṅgeśa: The "Honour Killing" of a Legacy

Parallel historiography calls the institutional treatment of Gaṅgeśa's biography an "honour killing." Its specific allegation, documented in the Dūṣaṇa Pañjī (a "black book" of genealogical records released through Gajendra Thakur's Videha in 2009), is that Gaṅgeśa Upādhyāya married a carmakāriṇī, a woman of the leather-working community, and was born five years after his father's death. It further alleges that Ramanath Jha—the first Maithili convenor at the Sahitya Akademi and a principal gatekeeper of the institutional Maithili canon—suppressed this information in his exchanges with the historian Dinesh Chandra Bhattacharya. According to this account, the Sahitya Akademi's 2016 Makers of Indian Literature monograph on Gaṅgeśa, authored by Udaynath Jha "Ashok," perpetuated that suppression.

The significance of this recovery extends beyond biography. The pañjī system, celebrated in institutional history as an emblem of cultural distinctiveness, was designed to preserve caste purity by recording genealogical information that could be used to sanction or reject marriage alliances. By releasing the Dūṣaṇa Pañjī records, the Videha movement argued that the system itself, when honestly examined, undermines the ideology of purity it was intended to sustain. One of Mithila's greatest philosophers—a thinker who insisted that every definition be tested against every possible counterexample—lived a life which, on this reading, was itself a counterexample to the caste norms of those who later claimed him.

Gaṅgeśa in Maithili's Wider Intellectual Ecology

The parallel history situates Gaṅgeśa within an intellectual ecology more plural than the institutional narrative allows. The same fourteenth-century Mithila that produced the Tattvacintāmaṇi also knew the influence of the Siddhācārya tradition on Nāth-sect literature; Jyotirishwar Thakur's Varṇaratnākara, described here as the earliest prose work in any northeastern Indian language, with its Arabic and Persian loanwords; and networks of intercaste cultural exchange in which, on this account, Gaṅgeśa's family participated. The parallel history observes that "Mithila was not afflicted by conflict of this kind, which is why logic or Nyāya flourished to such a degree there that no other region of India produced as many Nyāya scholars or texts." It adds, however, that this intellectual excellence was achieved and sustained in a social world more complex than institutional history has been willing to acknowledge.

Scripts, Language, and Digital Recovery

The parallel history documents the history of Mithila's scripts as central to cultural identity. The Tirhuta script (Mithilākṣara), developed from an eastern variety of the Gupta script, was used for scholarly, cultural and religious purposes for almost a millennium. The twentieth-century shift to Devanagari —driven by printing convenience and administrative reasoning in the Hindi-speaking belt—is regarded by parallel historians as a form of cultural dispossession. The Videha movement's successful standardisation of Tirhuta in Unicode (2014) and its development of digital fonts represent a technical reclamation of linguistic sovereignty.

The digital archive that Videha has built around Mithila's intellectual heritage—thousands of digitised books, 11,000 transcribed Tirhuta palm-leaf manuscripts, Dūṣaṇa Pañjī records, the first Maithili website aggregator, Tirhuta Unicode representation, and Maithili localisation for Google Translate and Wikipedia—constitutes what the parallel history calls a "living parallel institution." In this archive, Gaṅgeśa's Tattvacintāmaṇi belongs not as a monument to Brahmin orthodoxy but as part of an entire civilisational inheritance whose complexity, the argument maintains, has repeatedly been diminished in the institutional account.

The Revival of the Maithili Ghazal: Anchinhar Akhar

The parallel history documents one of the parallel Maithili literary movement's most striking recent achievements: the revival of the Maithili ghazal through the Anchinhar Akhar group. The movement began on 11 April 2008 with the launch of the Anchinhar Akhar blog, initiated by Ashish Anchinhar and subsequently co-edited by Gajendra Thakur. Within a decade, it brought between 350 and 400 new or previously marginalised writers into Maithili literary circulation, bypassing institutional gatekeepers altogether.

The ghazal—an Arabic-Persian poetic form defined by its couplets (sher/bait), strict metrical patterns (bahr), rhyme (qāfiya), refrain (radīf), and the poet's signature in the final couplet (maqṭa, including takhallus)—had long met resistance from the institutional Maithili literary establishment because of its association with Urdu and Muslim cultural traditions. The parallel history points to an irony: Jyotirishwar's Varṇaratnākara uses Arabic and Persian loanwords, while the speech of Muslim weavers (jolāhī bolī) is itself a creolised form of Maithili. "The formal revival of the Maithili ghazal in the twenty-first century is therefore less a rupture than the recovery of a suppressed intercultural thread."

Gajendra Thakur, recognised in this account as Maithili's first arūzī, or scholar of ghazal prosody, composed the first Ghazalśāstram (a treatise on Maithili ghazal metrics). It offered contemporary poets a systematic theoretical framework and demonstrated that the qāfiya–radīf structure could be successfully adapted to Maithili's moraic metrical tradition inherited from Prakrit and Apabhraṃśa. The exacting method Gaṅgeśa applied to definitions of vyāpti—testing each proposed definition against counterexamples until the most precise formulation was reached—is here applied by the movement to ghazal prosody, establishing formal rules that make the Maithili ghazal a coherent genre rather than a loose adaptation.

Conclusion

Part III · Technical Navya-Nyāya, Kārakavāda, and Modern Readings

Gaṅgeśa Upādhyāya: Philosophy, History, and Resistance

This research study traces Gaṅgeśa Upādhyāya through six major sources which, taken together, illuminate six distinct aspects of his significance. From the Sahitya Akademi monograph and D. C. Bhattacharya's History come the biographical particulars: his name, birthplace, gotra, family, chronology and the twenty-four predecessors whose work he synthesised and surpassed. From the Potter–Bhattacharya Encyclopaedia comes the technical architecture of Navya-Nyāya: its relational vocabulary, logic of cognition, theories of truth and awareness, and the trajectory from Gaṅgeśa to Raghunātha Śiromaṇi. From Scharfstein's comparative history comes his position in world philosophy alongside Descartes and Leibniz, and the meaning of his methodological rigour in a cross-cultural framework. From V. P. Bhatta's translation of the Pratyakṣa-khaṇḍa comes the first book of the Tattvacintāmaṇi in English: the full theory of cognition, from its comparative foundations through valid and invalid knowledge, perception and its types, indeterminate and determinate awareness, recognition and extraordinary perception, with inter-school debates systematically mapped across Sāṃkhya, Buddhist, Mīmāṃsā, Vedānta and Jain positions. From the parallel history comes the biographical information alleged to have been suppressed in the Dūṣaṇa Pañjī, the institutional "honour killing" of Gaṅgeśa's legacy, and his recovery as a figure belonging to the whole of Mithila rather than only to its elite minority.

The three hundred pages of the Tattvacintāmaṇi, which generated a million pages of commentary, were produced by a person whose life, this account argues, did not conform to the later caste orthodoxy that claimed him. The greatest logician of the Sanskrit tradition, a philosopher who demanded that every definition be tested against every possible counterexample, lived a counterexample. This is perhaps the parallel history's most profound lesson about Gaṅgeśa: his philosophical method and biographical reality are not contradictory but convergent. Both embody the principle that reality is more complex than any single framework and that honest inquiry requires a willingness to revise every assumption, however deeply held.

V. P. Bhatta's preface closes with a statement of the Tattvacintāmaṇi's continuing relevance: "The importance of the work (T. C.) in the context of philosophy, logic and epistemology cannot be overemphasised." The Potter Encyclopaedia judges that "Gaṅgeśa possessed an extraordinary genius that safely places him among the world's greatest philosophical minds." The parallel history points to pañjī evidence said to show that he was born five years after his father's death and married a woman of the leather-working community; the presentation of these biographical claims has become a subject of controversy in institutional historiography. For Scharfstein, his engagement with valid induction is "like that of contemporary philosophers of science in spirit." Videha's conclusion is that he belongs to the whole of Mithila, not to its gatekeepers.

All six perspectives are necessary. None alone suffices. The man who wrote in the opening verses of the Tattvacintāmaṇi, "Gaṅgeśa-stute mitena vacase"—"I, Gaṅgeśa, say this briefly"—demands to be read on his own terms. Seven centuries of commentary, institutional appropriation, parallel-historical recovery and digital archiving have still not exhausted those terms.

The Tattvacintāmaṇi's "astonishingly forbidding style and thought" have long discouraged translators. Yet that very analytical severity—the hair-splitting distinctions, the exhaustive enumeration and rejection of competing definitions, the demand that every term carry exactly the weight placed upon it—is precisely what makes Gaṅgeśa not merely a historical curiosity but an enduring contributor to philosophy: a demonstration that clarity of thought, wherever achieved, is a human accomplishment transcending the boundaries of tradition, language and time.

Gaṅgeśa refined a logic-sensitive metaphysics inherited from a long line of predecessors who had developed the Nyāya–Vaiśeṣika synthesis and answered Buddhist arguments:

• Udayanācārya: the "real founder," whose Lakṣaṇamālā offered the first definition of valid knowledge (pramā) that came under attack from sceptics.

• Maṇikaṇṭha Miśra: author of the Nyāyaratna, whose work on inference and pervasion (vyāpti) was a primary source for Gaṅgeśa, who often cited him without naming him.

• Taraṇi Miśra: author of the Ratnakoṣa, whose positions on negation and causation were cited—and frequently refuted—by Gaṅgeśa.

• Śaśadhara: author of the Nyāyasiddhāntadīpa, whose intricate style, applied to topics such as "glittering gold," provided a template for Gaṅgeśa's complexity.

• Soṇadopādhyāya: a scholar who pioneered a theory of negation in which the counterpositive is delimited by a property residing in a different locus (vyadhikaraṇa-dharmāvacchinna-pratiyogitā).

Gaṅgeśa's family life included his wife Vallabhā; three sons—Vardhamāna, Sūpana and Hariśarmā—and a daughter.

• Vardhamāna Upādhyāya: Gaṅgeśa's eldest son and pupil, he became a distinguished scholar and wrote the Prakāśa and Upāya commentaries, bridging the old and new traditions of logic.

• His daughter: she married Sāṭhe Upādhyāya of Babhaniyam village; their son Ratnākara is entered in genealogical records as Gaṅgeśa's grandson.

The parallel-history movement, drawing on the Videha archives, has recovered disputed particulars about Gaṅgeśa's lineage that it alleges were suppressed by institutional historians such as Ramanath Jha. The Dūṣaṇa Pañjī (the "Black Book"), released digitally in 2009, contains a "secret" record according to which Gaṅgeśa was born five years after his father's death (pitṛ parokṣe pañca varṣa vyatīte). The record further identifies his wife Vallabhā as a carmakāriṇī, belonging to a leather-working community. Parallel-history researchers argue that these facts were suppressed to preserve elite social hierarchies, characterising the suppression as an "honour killing" of his authentic legacy.

Technical Method: The Logic of Cognition

Navya-Nyāya is essentially a "pramāṇa-Nyāya," a logic of sources of knowledge, in contrast with the category-centred "padārtha-Nyāya" of the older school. It employs "relational abstracts" to specify particular aspects of cognitive states:

• Knowledge (jñāna): defined as a contextual cognitive act operating through a relation of inhibition (pratibandhakatā), whereby one cognition can obstruct another.

• The qualifier–qualificand framework: propositional awareness is structured by representing a qualificand () as qualified by a qualifier () through a relation ().

• Limitor (avacchedaka): a "mode of presentation" specifying precisely which property makes a relation possible. In the case of a blue pot, for example, pothood is the delimitor of the property of being the qualificand residing in the pot.

• Quantification: Navya-Nyāya achieves some of the results of Western quantification through abstraction, as in the proposition: "There is a general absence of fire delimited by the locus of the absence of fire in smoke."

Structural Overview of the Tattvacintāmaṇi

The Tattvacintāmaṇi is organised around the four pramāṇas and divided into forty-six major sections (prakaraṇas), comprising approximately 12,000 granthas.

Book One: Pratyakṣa-khaṇḍa

Divided into twenty-five subsections, this book establishes perception as a primary source of knowledge.

• Maṅgalavāda: Gaṅgeśa debates whether an auspicious invocation removes obstacles or produces completion, and concludes, through the logic of positive and negative concomitance (anvaya–vyatireka), that it removes obstacles.

• Prāmāṇyavāda: this defends a "hyper-reliabilist" or "non-defeasibilist" position in which the actual source of knowledge is factive. Gaṅgeśa rejects the Mīmāṃsā doctrine of svataḥ-prāmāṇya (intrinsic self-validation), maintaining that knowledge is validated externally by the success of subsequent activity.

• Anuvyavasāya: an inner perception by the mind of its own states. Gaṅgeśa regards this as infallible.

• Stages of perception: nirvikalpaka (indeterminate awareness of qualifications) is distinguished from savikalpaka (determinate, conceptually articulated perception).

• Ontological debates: Volume Two of Bhatta's translation includes debates over whether air is perceived by touch and the theory that gold is a kind of fiery light rather than an earthly substance.

• The internal organ (manas): Gaṅgeśa holds that the mind is of atomic size (aṇu), accounting for why multiple perceptions cannot occur simultaneously.

Book Two: Anumāna-khaṇḍa

The most intricate portion of the work, dealing with natural invariable concomitance, or vyāpti.

• Siṃha-vyāghrī definitions: it includes the celebrated "lion-and-tigress" definitions of vyāpti.

• Pakṣatā: the condition of being the subject of an inference, defined in relation to a property-bearer for which there is a desire to establish the probandum (sādhya).

• Īśvarānumāna: the inference of God as maker of the universe on the premise that the universe is an effect.

Book Three: Upamāna-khaṇḍa

The shortest division, analysing knowledge of similarity between a known and an unknown object, such as a cow and a gavaya (wild ox).

Book Four: Śabda-khaṇḍa

This constitutes one-third of the trilogy, as the source describes it, and focuses on verbal cognition (śābdabodha).

• Conditions of verbal cognition: syntactic expectancy (ākāṅkṣā), logical compatibility (yogyatā), proximity (āsatti) and the speaker's intention (tātparya) are required.

Kārakavāda: A Synthesis of Grammar and Logic

Kārakavāda, found in the Śabda-khaṇḍa, examines the semantic and syntactic roles played by nouns in relation to an action (kriyā).

• Definition of kāraka: a participant contributing to the accomplishment of an action (kriyā-nirvartakam).

• Primacy of the agent (kartṛ): defined as the independent kāraka (svatantraḥ kartā), particularly characterised by kṛtimattva, the possession of volition or mental effort.

• Substratum of the result (karman): the object is analysed as the locus in which the result of an action resides (phalāśraya).

• Hierarchy: agent (kartṛ), object (karman) and instrument (karaṇa) are primary kārakas; recipient (sampradāna), source (apādāna) and locus (adhikaraṇa) are dependent.

• Compound analysis: Gaṅgeśa offers an extensive analysis of six kinds of compounds, including bahuvrīhi and tatpuruṣa.

Modern Global Influence and Translation (2005–2025)

The twenty-first century has witnessed the decisive completion of explanatory translations into English:

1. Stephen Phillips (2020): an annotated, three-volume translation, Jewel of Reflection on the Truth about Epistemology (Bloomsbury), makes Gaṅgeśa's "hyper-reliabilism" accessible to modern analytical philosophy.

2. V. P. Bhatta (2005–2025): a multi-volume series published by Eastern Book Linkers, Delhi:

• Śabda (Śabda-khaṇḍa): 2005 (two volumes).

• Pratyakṣa (Pratyakṣa-khaṇḍa): 2012 (two volumes).

• Anumāna (Anumāna-khaṇḍa): 2021 (two volumes).

• Īśvarānumāna and Upamāna (Īśvarānumāna and Upamāna-khaṇḍa): 2025 (two volumes).

Comparative and Computational Perspectives

Ben-Ami Scharfstein classifies Gaṅgeśa under "logic-sensitive, methodical metaphysics," drawing parallels with Descartes and Leibniz. Contemporary researchers note that Navya-Nyāya's hierarchical deployment of delimitors (avacchedakas) is compatible with modern artificial intelligence and natural-language processing (NLP).

Digital Democratisation and Archival Resistance

The contemporary Videha movement uses digital platforms to preserve Mithila's heritage, transcribing 11,000 Tirhuta palm-leaf manuscripts and standardising the Tirhuta (Mithilākṣara) script for Unicode. By hosting the Dūṣaṇa Pañjī, it seeks to ensure a democratic and multidimensional understanding of the "jewel of thought."

Gaṅgeśa Upādhyāya's legacy stands at a summit of the Indian intellectual tradition. Whereas institutional history emphasises logical innovation and religious orthodoxy, parallel historiography recovered through digital archives brings back neglected and contested aspects of his biography, including the alleged records of an intercaste marriage and of his birth after his father's death. The completion of V. P. Bhatta's translations in 2025 ensures, in the author's view, that Gaṅgeśa's theory of knowledge will continue to illuminate global debates about meaning, action and reality.

Gaṅgeśa Upādhyāya is described as a Kāśyapa-gotra Maithil Brahmin who lived through an important political transition in Mithila, between the decline of the Karṇāṭa dynasty (1191–1326 CE) and the rise of the Oinivāra dynasty (1344–1413 CE). The genealogical succession places his period at approximately 1300–1350 CE. Whereas traditional accounts locate him in Kariyon village, ancestral records associate him primarily with Chādanā, a village said to have been granted to his family by the king. In Mithila he held the prestigious titles Jagadguru and Mahāmahopādhyāya.

Gaṅgeśa Upādhyāya (fl. 1320 CE) ranks among the most technically accomplished and philosophically consequential thinkers in the history of world philosophy. The achievement of the Tattvacintāmaṇi—as the Potter Encyclopaedia, Scharfstein's comparative history and relevant Videha archival materials each affirm from their respective perspectives—was not merely to advance the internal debates of one tradition, but to transform the conditions under which subsequent Indian philosophical thought was conducted.

The Potter Encyclopaedia's verdict is that "Gaṅgeśa possessed an extraordinary genius that safely places him among the world's greatest philosophical minds." Scharfstein's comparative judgement is that Gaṅgeśa's "concern with the problems of valid induction and economical explanation is like that of contemporary philosophers of science in spirit." Gaṅgeśa developed logic, gave systematic form to its principles, and distinguished truth from falsehood. These assessments—from encyclopaedic scholarship, comparative history and Maithili intellectual biography—converge on a conclusion: in the Tattvacintāmaṇi, a philosopher of Mithila produced a work in the fourteenth century whose conceptual precision, logical rigour and transformative impact on a great civilisation deserve recognition among the lasting achievements of the human mind.

The parallel literary movement recovers and celebrates Maithili folk, Dalit and women's literary voices alongside the Sanskrit philosophical canon that produced the Tattvacintāmaṇi. The Videha project's insistence on placing the whole of Mithila's cultural production together—Mahāmahopādhyāya and folk poet, Tattvacintāmaṇi and Caryāpada, the dialectics of vyāpti and the songs of Vidyāpati—is its most significant cultural-political statement. Gaṅgeśa belongs to the whole of Mithila, not merely to its Sanskrit elite.

Part IV · Archival Evidence, the Pratyakṣa-khaṇḍa, and a Cultural Re-reading

This section brings together what it describes as the most comprehensive scholarly study yet produced in any language on Gaṅgeśa Upādhyāya (fl. 1320 CE, Mithila). Drawing upon seven principal sources—the Sahitya Akademi monograph (Jha Ashok, 2016); D. C. Bhattacharya's History of Navya-Nyāya in Mithila (1958); Volume VI of the Encyclopaedia of Indian Philosophies by Karl H. Potter and Sibajiban Bhattacharyya (1993); Ben-Ami Scharfstein's A Comparative History of World Philosophy (SUNY, 1998); V. P. Bhatta's translations and commentaries on the Tattvacintāmaṇi; Gajendra Thakur's original Dūṣaṇa Pañjī records published through Videha/Pañjī Prabandha (released in 2009); and Stephen H. Phillips's entry on Gaṅgeśa in the Stanford Encyclopedia of Philosophy (2020), together with other sources—the study traces every dimension of his significance: biographical, textual, epistemological, logical, globally comparative, historical in respect of the commentarial tradition, and civilisational. Special attention is given to the entire material of V. P. Bhatta's translation of the Pratyakṣa-khaṇḍa: Maṅgalavāda; the complete Prāmāṇyavāda (including the debate on qualities and defects, the section on the production of validity, and the dialectic between Prābhākara Mīmāṃsā and Nyāya); Pramālakṣaṇa; the fully developed Nyāya theory of error; Sannikarṣavāda; Samavāyavāda; Abhāvavāda; Pratyakṣakāraṇavāda; Mano'ṇutvavāda; Pratyabhijñāvāda; Nirvikalpakavāda; and Savikalpakavāda. The primary Dūṣaṇa Pañjī text is reproduced and examined in full.

Life, Titles, and the Suppressed Pañjī Evidence

Gaṅgeśa's Titles and the Testimony of the Pañjī

Stephen H. Phillips writes in the Stanford Encyclopedia of Philosophy (2020): ‘Genealogical records preserved in Mithila suggest that he had one wife, three sons, and one daughter. One of the children was the celebrated Nyāya author Vardhamāna. Gaṅgeśa evidently achieved considerable fame during his lifetime, being referred to as Jagadguru—roughly the equivalent of a “Distinguished University Professor” in the educational institutions of his time.’

Gajendra Thakur adds a further precision derived directly from the Pañjī records: Gaṅgeśa bore not only the title Jagadguru but also Paramaguru—the designation of supreme teacher. According to the Pañjī, only one other person in the entire recorded intellectual history of Mithila held the title Paramaguru: Nūtana Vācaspati (a successor to the earlier Vācaspati Miśra), who came after Gaṅgeśa. This makes Gaṅgeśa one of precisely two Paramagurus in all of Mithila's history. The wrong committed against his memory—‘first by Ramanath Jha and then by Udayanath Jha Ashok’—thus involved the suppression of the biography of the most highly decorated philosopher in Mithila's tradition.

V. P. Bhatta's translation corroborates the dedication and self-presentation in Gaṅgeśa's opening verses: 'Having learned the science of reasoning from teachers, having understood the doctrines of the masters—that is, those of the Prābhākara Mīmāṃsakas—and having surveyed the entire essence of both schools with the divine eye of reflection, Gaṅgeśa Upādhyāya sets forth the decisive principles concerning the most difficult rules, on account of the host of defects, composing the Tattvacintāmaṇi in measured words.' The expression mitena vacasā—'in measured words'—is Gaṅgeśa's own characterisation of his method in the Tattvacintāmaṇi: exact, economical, and precise.

The Dūṣaṇa Pañjī: Original Text and Analysis

The Pañjī System and Harisiṃhadeva

The Pañjī system was established under Harisiṃhadeva, Mithila's last great Karṇāṭa king (born 1294 CE; accession in 1307; fled to Nepal in 1324–25 following defeat by Ghiyāth al-Dīn Tughlaq). The founding genealogical registrars were Guṇākara Jha (a Maithil Brahmin), Śaṅkaradatta (a Karṇa Kāyastha), and Vijayadatta (a Kṣatriya). The scholars of Mithila formally gave the Pañjī its present form in Śaka 1248 (1326 CE). Harisiṃhadeva descended from Nānyadeva, who established the Karṇāṭa dynasty in Śaka 1009. A later revision was ordered by the Mithila ruler Mahārāja Mādhava Siṃha in 1760 CE; according to this account, the Śrotriya subdivision among Maithil Brahmins emerged after that revision, and not before 1800 CE. Even today, the author states, there is no Śrotriya subdivision among the Maithil Brahmins of the Nepali part of Mithila.

Gajendra Thakur digitised the Pañjī manuscripts between 2007 and 2009. Anshuman Pandey (PhD, University of Michigan, 2014) acknowledges: 'Gajendra Thakur of New Delhi supplied me with digitised copies of the genealogical records of Maithil Brahmins in 2007 … I was fortunate enough to receive a complete digitised set of Pañjī records from Gajendra Thakur in 2007.' The manuscripts were uploaded in 2009 to the Videha web archive and to the Videha Pothi collection on Google Books.

The Dūṣaṇa Pañjī Entry for Gaṅgeśa—Original Maithili Record

The following are the original genealogical entries concerning Gaṅgeśa, reproduced from the Dūṣaṇa Pañjī (Pañjī Prabandha, Volumes 1 and 2, Gajendra Thakur/Videha, released in 2009). The terse register formulae and proper names are preserved in transliteration so that the structure of the archival testimony remains visible:

21//10. From Chadana: Jagadguru Gaṅgeśa, author of the Tattvacintāmaṇi.

From Chadana: Gaṅgeśa, author of the Tattvacintāmaṇi; his beloved, a Carmakāriṇī [woman of the leatherworking community]; after five years had elapsed following the father's death, the author of the Tattvacintāmaṇi, Gaṅgeśa, was born. The Carmakāriṇī belonged to the descendants of Medhā.

From Chadana: Mahāmahopādhyāya (M. M.) Gaṅgeśa, author of the Tattvacintāmaṇi.

An account concerning Mahāmahopādhyāya (M. M. Pā.) Gaṅgeśa, author of the Tattvacintāmaṇi, is available in the ancient Pañjī. The old record states: 'Gaṅgeśa was born when five years had elapsed after his father's death' (pitṛ-parokṣe pañca varṣe vyatīte Gaṅgeśotpattiḥ); [the entry ends with the source's fragmentary wording, 'iti prācīna lekhanīyaḥ kutrāpi'].

Devānanda Pañjī 39-2: From Chadana, Jagadguru Gaṅgeśa; [his] daughter, from Vabhaniyama; Janāditya, son of Sādhukāra; wife.

Devānanda Pañjī 339-3: Daughter of Jagadguru Gaṅgeśa; Sūpana; [relationship recorded as] dau; from Bhāṇḍārisamāsa, Harāditya; dau. Son, daughter, Gorā; from Jājīvala, Jīve, wife; daughter, Sandagāhī Bhaveśvara. 'Here, in an inappropriate position, Sūpana's brother Hariśarmā [is mentioned]; in some records, the village is Jājīvala.' [Ambiguous register abbreviations retained.]

Devānanda Pañjī 30=5: From Chadana, Mahāmahopādhyāya (M. M. Pā.) Vardhamāna, author of the Upayā; son and daughter; from Khaṇḍavālā, Viśvanātha; daughter, wife of Śivanātha. Gaṅgeśa — M. M. Vardhamāna / Sūpana / Hariśarmā.

The decisive biographical claims of the entry are clear in the author's interpretation: Gaṅgeśa, composer of the Tattvacintāmaṇi, was born five years after his father's death, and his beloved was a Carmakāriṇī. Names such as Bhavai, Maheśvara, Jīve, Sūpana/Hariśarmā, and Vardhamāna occur in distinct genealogical lines of the Pañjī; it would therefore be wrong automatically to identify 'Vallabha' as a child. The Devānanda Pañjī supplies further particulars about later kinship relations, including Sūpana/Hariśarmā and Vardhamāna.

A Chain of Suppression and Its Consequences

D. C. Bhattacharya writes in History of Navya-Nyāya in Mithila (1958, Chapter 3, pp. 96–99): 'The family, being of lower social standing, has now disappeared in Mithila; Gaṅgeśa's family is completely neglected, and we are not even expected to know his father's name … Since there are no other references to Gaṅgeśa, we may suppose that the family again fell into insignificance and disappeared shortly after his son's death.' He explicitly says that this information was supplied by Professor Ramanath Jha. Gajendra Thakur calls the account 'completely untrue': the Devānanda Pañjī records, he argues, trace Gaṅgeśa's descendants for many generations in named villages.

The 2016 Sahitya Akademi monograph by Udayanath Jha Ashok (Gaṅgeśa Upādhyāya, in the Makers of Indian Literature series) continued this suppression, according to Thakur: 'He tries to confuse the issue, but there has been no confusion since at least 2009. Yet in 2016 the Sahitya Akademi appears to be advancing a casteist agenda. Udayanath Jha pretends to search for his name and lineage, and so on, when there is nothing left to discover; nevertheless he could not muster the courage to tell the truth and finally, in 2016, repeats the very facts that Dinesh Chandra Bhattacharya had already published in 1958' (Gajendra Thakur).

The consequences for the Navya-Nyāya school are recounted as follows. Vāsudeva Sārvabhauma came from Bengal to study in Mithila as a fellow student of Pakṣadhara Miśra, passed the śalākā examination, and received the title Sārvabhauma. He memorised the Tattvacintāmaṇi—because Pakṣadhara and other Mithila teachers did not permit it to be copied—as well as the kārikās of Udayana's Nyāyakusumāñjali. Raghunātha Śiromaṇi, Vāsudeva's pupil, defeated his teacher Pakṣadhara in a scholastic debate and acquired the authority to certify scholars. Subsequently a Navya-Nyāya school arose in Navadvīpa. After Raghunātha Śiromaṇi, students from Bengal ceased coming to Mithila. 'The disappearance of the Navya-Nyāya school from Mithila, as described above, was nature's revenge for the honour killing of Gaṅgeśa Upādhyāya and his family' (Gajendra Thakur).

Vardhamāna, Gaṅgeśa's son, calls him sukavi-kairava-kānanenduḥ—'the moon over a grove of water-lilies made up of good poets' (literally, 'the moon of the forest of excellent poets'). This poetic epithet, preserved in Vardhamāna's own writing, is itself a form of genealogical testimony that, the author argues, supports the Pañjī record: Gaṅgeśa wrote poetry as well as logic, but his collected poems have been lost entirely. 'The underlying conspiracy that the poems of so celebrated a scholar as Gaṅgeśa are no longer available is evident' (Gajendra Thakur).

Gaṅgeśa and Complete Translations of the Tattvacintāmaṇi

Gajendra Thakur records that two scholars have now produced complete English translations of the Tattvacintāmaṇi. Stephen H. Phillips's Jewel of Reflection on the Truth about Epistemology: A Complete and Annotated Translation of the Tattva-cintā-maṇi (Bloomsbury Academic, 2020) is the first single-translator English rendering of all four books. V. P. Bhatta has completed all four books across eight volumes: Śabda-khaṇḍa (two volumes, 2005); Pratyakṣa-khaṇḍa (two volumes, 2012); Anumāna-khaṇḍa (two volumes, 2021); and Īśvarānumāna and Upamāna-khaṇḍa (two volumes, 2025). All were published by Eastern Book Linkers, Delhi, with introductions, Sanskrit texts, translations, and explanations.

Thakur identifies an injustice affecting Phillips's work: because the suppression that he attributes to Ramanath Jha passed into Bhattacharya's history of 1958 and then the Sahitya Akademi monograph of 2016, Phillips—obliged to rely on these sources for biographical information—received incomplete and distorted details about Gaṅgeśa's family and social position. The 'adverse consequences' of suppression in the twentieth and twenty-first centuries thus fell upon the first Western scholar to translate the entire Tattvacintāmaṇi. The Dūṣaṇa Pañjī records released by Videha in 2009, Thakur maintains, supply a correction essential to Phillips and to every subsequent scholar of Gaṅgeśa.

The Tattvacintāmaṇi: Structure, Scope, and Navya-Nyāya

The Work and Its Cultural Place

The introduction to V. P. Bhatta's translation of the Pratyakṣa-khaṇḍa describes the Tattvacintāmaṇi as the first defining work of Navya-Nyāya: it 'inaugurated a new era in the development of Indian theories of knowledge and logic' and brought the 'sixteen categories of Navya-Nyāya under four headings': perception, inference, comparison, and verbal testimony. In the history of its translation, Bhatta's eight-volume series (2005–2025) covers all four books; Phillips's single-volume Bloomsbury translation of 2020 does so as well. Together, these works made the text accessible to the international philosophical community for the first time in these forms.

Scharfstein's comparative estimate is that Gaṅgeśa's 300-page text was 'responsible for perhaps a million pages of commentary'. Potter and Bhattacharyya judge that 'Gaṅgeśa possessed an extraordinary genius that safely places him among the world's greatest philosophical minds'. In Bhatta's translation, the Pratyakṣa-khaṇḍa alone extends beyond 800 pages in two volumes, although it is only the first of the four books. The scale of its commentary is not merely quantitative: it signifies that, for five centuries after Gaṅgeśa, no serious Indian philosopher could think without engaging his vocabulary, definitions, and methods.

Epistemology: The Pratyakṣa-khaṇḍa in Full

Overview of All Thirteen Sections

The Pratyakṣa-khaṇḍa of the Tattvacintāmaṇi consists of thirteen major discussions or subsections, as documented by V. P. Bhatta's two-volume translation: (1) Maṅgalavāda, the theory of the auspicious opening; (2) Prāmāṇyavāda, the theory of cognitive validity; (3) Pramālakṣaṇa, the definition of valid cognition; (4) Apramāvāda, the theory of invalid cognition; (5) Pratyakṣavāda, the theory of perception; (6) Samavāyavāda/Sannikarṣavāda, inherence and contact; (7) Anupalabdhivāda, non-apprehension; (8) Abhāvavāda, absence; (9) Pratyakṣakāraṇavāda, the causes of perception; (10) Mano'ṇutvavāda, the atomic nature of mind; (11) Pratyabhijñāvāda/Anuvyavasāyavāda, recognition or subsequent cognition; (12) Nirvikalpakavāda, indeterminate cognition; and (13) Savikalpakavāda, determinate cognition. Volume 1 of Bhatta's translation provides the general introduction and preliminary sections; Volume 2 (pp. 262–803) covers Maṅgalavāda through Savikalpakavāda.

Gaṅgeśa opens the Tattvacintāmaṇi with a salutation to the Lord: 'The destroyer of the three cities and possessor of boundless glory; who, although beyond qualities, has an unfailing resolve; who is the cause of the universe through the three guṇas, possesses three eternal aspects, assumes three forms, and performs the functions of creation, preservation, and dissolution; who is the ocean of compassion and the sole supreme refuge of all three worlds' (Bhatta, Vol. 2, p. 262).

Maṅgalavāda occupies a substantial part of Volume 2 because it is philosophically demanding: the discussion must establish a causal relation (maṅgala-kāraṇatva) between an auspicious invocation at the beginning of a task and that task's completion. Gaṅgeśa first presents the Mīmāṃsaka position (1.1.2): after studying logic with teachers, learning the doctrines of the masters (the Prābhākara Mīmāṃsakas), and surveying the substance of both schools with the divine eye of reflection, he composes the Tattvacintāmaṇi 'in measured words' (mitena vacasā).

On the justification of the title (1.1.3): 'The polishing of the jewel [of reflection] by scholars means dispelling the darkness of ignorance of the formidable non-believers (the Buddhists). This is possible because neither can the skill of examination be traced in the views of the opponents (Buddhists and others), nor can any poverty of expression be found in the words establishing the decisive doctrines of our own Nyāya system.' Thus Gaṅgeśa announces from the outset that his project is at once constructive—establishing the Nyāya system—and polemical—meeting the Buddhist challenge.

The debate over the causal efficacy of auspiciousness (1.1.5–25; Bhatta, Vol. 2, pp. 265–300) proceeds as follows. Buddhists object that the causal connection of a maṅgala cannot be ascertained by agreement in presence and absence (anvaya-vyatireka). Mīmāṃsakas answer by inference through elimination (pariśeṣa-anumāna). Gaṅgeśa establishes that an auspicious invocation is justified as an auxiliary rite to an undertaking, bringing about successful completion through the removal of obstacles—not through otherworldly merit generated by Vedic oblations. Within this discussion emerges a fivefold classification of tarka, or hypothetical reasoning: ātmāśraya (self-dependence), anyonyāśraya (mutual dependence), cakraka (circular dependence), anavasthā (infinite regress), and pramāṇa-bādhitārtha-prasaṅga (the consequence of something contradicted by a valid means of knowledge).

Prāmāṇyavāda (2.2): Complete Discussion

Intrinsic versus Extrinsic Validity

Prāmāṇyavāda, the inquiry into cognitive validity, occupies pages 300–410 of Bhatta's Volume 2 and is among the philosophically densest portions of the Pratyakṣa-khaṇḍa. The central debate is whether the validity of knowledge (prāmāṇya/pramāṇatva) is constituted and known intrinsically (svataḥ) or through conditions external to it (parataḥ).

The Sāṃkhya–Mīmāṃsā position (svataḥ) holds that validity and invalidity are both self-evident, constituted and recognised by the total complex of causes producing cognition. The Buddhist position takes invalidity to be inherent in cognition, with truth established externally. The Nyāya position (parataḥ) maintains that both validity and invalidity require extrinsic conditions—such as successful or unsuccessful action—for their constitution and ascertainment.

The Nyāya definition runs as follows: 'The intrinsic character of the determination of the validity or authenticity of cognition consists either in its being determined by the totality of causes of the preceding cognitions, or in its being determined by what determines all the loci of authenticity, or in its being determined by the cognition produced with reference to that authenticity. The extrinsic character of determining the authenticity of cognition, by contrast, is the condition of being determined without the totality of causes.' (Bhatta, Vol. 2, pp. 342–343).

The Debate over Qualities and Defects: The Production of Validity

Prāmāṇyotpattivāda, the theory of the constitution or production of validity, holds (Bhatta, Vol. 2, pp. 370–410) that valid cognition arises when the relevant positive conditions, such as complete sense–object contact with the perceived thing, are jointly present; invalid cognition arises in the absence of such conditions. The Mīmāṃsaka objects (1.2.35) that the condition of being other than valid cognition (prāmāṇyatva, as expressed in the source) is a deviant qualifying condition, or upādhi, in the inference establishing the probandum.

The Naiyāyika rejoinder is that because the reason (hetu), such as being an effect of a different kind (vijātīya-kāryatva), is pervaded by the probandum, such as being generated by a cause of a different kind (vijātīya-kāraṇa-janyatva), the alleged deviant condition (upādhi) cannot pervade the probandum and so cannot vitiate the reason. The principal epistemological thesis (1.2.36) is that valid cognition is produced by the joint presence of positive conditions, such as full sense–object contact, whereas invalid cognition arises when those conditions—sense–object contact and the like—are absent (tadabhāva). Accordingly, the presence of the relevant quality (guṇa) causes valid cognition, and its absence (tadabhāva) causes invalid cognition.

The Naiyāyika further rejects the suggestion that only the absence of a defect (doṣābhāva), rather than the positive presence of a quality, can be accepted as the cause of valid cognition. The decisive reasoning is that the absence of a defect functions as an indicator of a difference in the total causal complex (sāmagrī-bhedopalakṣaka), by delimiting causal efficacy. Consider the China-rose example: when a China rose is near a crystal, valid cognition of the crystal's white colour does not arise; when the flower is absent, such cognition does arise. The absence of the defect must therefore also count as causally relevant to valid cognition; it is not superfluous.

Confidence in the Validity of Knowledge

The concluding part of Prāmāṇyavāda (1.2.31; Bhatta, Vol. 2, p. 493) observes: 'Some others object here in the following manner: when certain cognitions are accepted by the Naiyāyika to be invalid, how can confidence in the validity of cognition remain possible? The objection, however, is not correct. The means by which the validity or authenticity of cognition is ascertained has already been stated or explained.' The principle concerning the sublation of cognition is that its falsity (jñāna-mithyātva) is contradicted by a defeating cognition (bādhya-bādhaka-vyavasthā). The point is not that merely acknowledging an erroneous cognition renders it unnecessary; rather, the very judgment that a cognition was illusory (bhramatva-buddhi) is established through the subsequent cognition that defeats it.

Pramālakṣaṇa: The Definition of Valid Cognition

Gaṅgeśa's formal definition of pramā, as rendered in Bhatta's Volume 2, is: 'Either (a) there must be a cognition whose principal qualifier is 10 in that which possesses 10, or (b) there must be a cognition in which 10 is related to that which possesses 10.' [The numeral '10' appears in the supplied source's formulation and is retained here rather than silently corrected.] The Naiyāyika holds that determinate (savikalpaka) cognition is a qualified cognition (viśiṣṭa-jñāna): an object is known as qualified by its attributes. For example, 'This is a cow' (ayaṃ gauḥ) is valid cognition because the cow is cognised as qualified by cowness (gotva).

Apramāvāda, the theory of invalid cognition, sets out the distinctive forms of error in Volume 2. The specific Nyāya claim concerns the relation of contradiction between erroneous cognition (jñāna-mithyātva) and a cognition that defeats it: the aspect in virtue of which an erroneous cognition is an illusion is itself sublated by the contradictory cognition. The rival Prābhākara Mīmāṃsaka position—that the illusory aspect cannot be contradicted because it always exists—is rejected. The Naiyāyika argues that the occurrence of the activity (the production of the erroneous cognition) cannot itself be undone, since a past activity has already occurred; what is defeated is the judgment of illusoriness (bhramatva-buddhi).

The Theory of Perception and Sense-Object Contact (1.5–1.6)

Gaṅgeśa's Definition of Perception

The Navya-Nyāya definition is that perception (pratyakṣa) is immediate cognition (sākṣātkāri-jñāna) arising without the instrumentality of any preceding cognition. This definition encompasses every case of perception —ordinary (laukika) as well as extraordinary (alaukika)—because immediacy (sākṣātkāritva) is its necessary and universal distinguishing property.

The older Nyāya definition—cognition produced by contact between a sense faculty and its object (indriyārtha-sannikarṣa)—is too narrow. It applies only to human perception, not to divine perception, which arises without sense–object contact (Nyāyakusumāñjali, 1.1). Sannikarṣavāda (1.5) occupies the entire second part of Volume 2, File 1 (pp. 518–537), and forms the technical core of the theory of perception.

Sannikarṣavāda: The Theory of Relations of Contact

Sannikarṣavāda, the theory of contact relations, establishes why six forms of sense–object contact function as relations that make perception possible. One of the principal arguments presented in Bhatta's Volume 2 (pp. 518–537) begins with an objection from the opponent (pūrvapakṣin): perception of an integral whole (avayavigraha) is possible only by way of inherence in an object connected with the sense faculty (saṃyukta-samavāyin). Accordingly, contact with the sense organ need not itself be accepted as the cause of perceiving the whole.

The Naiyāyika replies that conjunction with a sense organ (indriya-saṃyoga) is accepted as a cause in the cognition of a substance and may therefore be accepted as a cause of the integral whole, which is likewise a substance. There is no need, merely in the name of economy, to insist on inherence in something conjoined with the sense organ (saṃyukta-samavāya) as the cause of the cognition of the whole, for its causal role would then have to be separately admitted once again.

The decisive passage (1.5.22–23) argues that sound is apprehended in the ether delimited by the aperture of the ear. That very ether, as delimited by the ear canal, is the auditory sense organ. Since this is both necessary and the more economical explanation, the ether so delimited is identified as the cause of ordinary auditory perception. A sense organ (indriya) is an instrument of perceiving its particular object while connected with the body. The experience 'I hear the sound of the vīṇā through the opening of the ear' is taken to establish that the ether enclosed by the ear aperture serves as the instrument of hearing. The final determination is that soundhood (śabdatva) can be established as a universal on the analogy of formhood and similar universals (rūpatvādi-nyāya). The section concludes: 'Thus ends the Sannikarṣavāda concerning perception in the Tattvacintāmaṇi composed by Śrī Gaṅgeśopādhyāya.'

Samavāyavāda (1.6): Inherence as a Relation of Contact

The discussion of inherence (Samavāyavāda, 1.6) occupies the opening of Volume 2, File 2 (pp. 538–570). Gaṅgeśa begins with the prima facie view (pūrvapakṣa) that inherence cannot be established as a relation of contact, for the very establishment of inherence (samavāya-siddhi) is in question; consequently, it cannot already be assumed to mediate contact with universals, qualities and the like.

The defender of the established position (siddhāntin) argues that universals (jāti), qualities (guṇa), actions (kriyā) and their respective substrates are experienced as mutually related (mithaḥ saṃbaddhau) through inherence. Determinate cognition and determinate designation cannot arise in respect of two entities whose natures are wholly unrelated (asaṃbaddha-svarūpa-dvaya). Inherence must therefore be admitted as a relation.

The opponent replies that the relation of inherence cannot be presented as a qualifier (viśeṣaṇa) simply on the basis of experiencing two entities as related (saṃbaddhānubhava). Nor can the relation itself appear as the qualified object (viśeṣya) or as a self-standing object: there is no corresponding experience of an independently apprehended inherence such as ‘I know inherence.’ The Naiyāyika’s final answer (1.6.18) addresses the consequences for destruction: where an absence obtains through inherence, destruction would have to disappear upon the loss of the inherent cause, and a positive entity cannot serve as the determining cause of what is to be lost. The concluding determination, as reported in the source, is that inherence in an inherent entity (samaveta-samavāya) need not be treated as the contact relation (grāhaka) producing perception of soundhood on the assumption that the universal soundhood is absent. Gaṅgeśa maintains that soundhood can be established as a universal by reasoning analogous to that for formhood (rūpatvādi-nyāya).

Abhāvavāda (1.8), Pratyakṣakāraṇavāda (1.9) and Mano’ṇutvavāda (1.10)

Abhāvavāda: The Theory of Absence

Abhāvavāda (1.8) opens with a Mīmāṃsaka objection: the absence of things is merely the positive nature (bhāvātman) of an empty substratum. The older Naiyāyika responds that uncontradicted cognitions of an absence—such as ‘There is no pot on the ground’—do in fact occur, and this cognition cannot concern the substratum (the ground) alone. A further determination (1.8.3) specifies the substratum of a particular absence: an absence is experienced as delimited by a determinate locus, such as the ground. Absence must therefore be admitted as a distinct ontological category.

Pratyakṣakāraṇavāda (1.9): The Causes of Perception

Pratyakṣakāraṇavāda establishes the imperceptibility of atoms of air. Its innovative claim is that merely manifest tangibility (udbhūta-sparśa-mātra) is not the cause of a substance's perceptibility through the tactile organ. The decisive argument holds that manifestness (udbhūtatva-jāti), associated with touch and visible form, functions solely as a delimitor of causal efficacy (kāraṇatāvacchedaka), not as the cause (kāraṇa) itself. On this account air is imperceptible. The issue is directly connected with the theory of causation elaborated in the Anumāna-khaṇḍa.

Mano'ṇutvavāda (1.9/1.10): The Atomic Nature of Mind

Mano'ṇutvavāda maintains that the internal organ, manas, is atomic (aṇu). The central argument is that, were the mind omnipresent, the different external senses could come into contact with it simultaneously and produce simultaneous perceptions of five distinct qualities. Our multisensory cognitions, however, occur in succession rather than in genuinely simultaneous fashion. The account also invokes the expansion and contraction (saṅkoca-vikāsa) of the parts of an atomic mind to explain both the appearance of simultaneity and the successive production of cognitions.

The Mīmāṃsaka objection (1.10.19) asks why eating a large round flatbread produces five distinct cognitions of five different qualities. The Naiyāyika replies that the simultaneity of these five cognitions is itself established as valid cognition (pramā) in the absence of an impediment. If an especially close or intense connection of the mind with one sense faculty obstructs five distinct perceptual cognitions, the mind may be conceived as a whole (avayavin) consisting of five parts, with the two forms of cognition explained through the expansion and contraction of these parts (saṅkoca-vikāsābhyām). The account and its internal tension are retained here as they appear in the source.

Theories of Recognition, Indeterminate and Determinate Cognition (1.11–1.13)

Pratyabhijñā: Recognition (Anuvyavasāya / Identification)

Pratyabhijñāvāda (1.11), the theory of recognition, presents recognition as a third form of ordinary perception after indeterminate and determinate cognition, while identifying a structure that remains invariant across the latter two. The Naiyāyika argues that the first ordinary cognition is not itself a means of establishing self-awareness, since the initial cognition has not been shown to take the form 'I know this as silver' (idam ahaṃ jānāmi). The central argument is that action directed toward an object can be understood by determining the objects of cognition; the first ordinary cognition refers to the object itself, not to the self as its object. Recognition—'This is that Devadatta' (so'yaṃ devadattaḥ)—therefore arises through both the senses and the residual impressions (saṃskāra) left by previous experience.

Indeterminate Cognition: Gaṅgeśa's Own Position

In Nirvikalpakavāda (1.12) Gaṅgeśa gives his most carefully qualified account: indeterminate cognition is an awareness of cowness (gotva) as a qualifier when that qualifier is manifested in a cow. What arises is awareness of cowness itself, not of the cow's possession of cowness (tad-vaiśiṣṭya). The defender of the opposing position objects that cowness could appear in determinate perceptual cognition as itself qualified by a property of its own (sva-dharma-viśiṣṭa). Gaṅgeśa answers that the proposed property is not already known; its manifestation would lead to an infinite regress (anavasthā). The decisive conclusion concerns the useful qualifier (1.12.9): a qualifier is one that genuinely removes an unestablished condition in an inference. Cowness itself, rather than a further 'cowness of cowness,' performs this task.

Determinate Cognition: The Final Section

Savikalpakavāda (1.13), the theory of determinate cognition, is the final section. For Gaṅgeśa a determinate perception (savikalpaka) is a qualified cognition (viśiṣṭa-jñāna), such as 'This [cow] is a cow' (gaur ayam). It is perceptual because universals such as cowness are ultimately real (paramārtha-sat), and the cognition arises from a relation of contact between the senses and their objects. Determinate cognition can also issue in particular recognition (pratyabhijñā) arising through the senses: 'I know that this cow is that cow' (so'yam). With the assistance of residual impressions (saṃskāra) as cooperating causes, the object qualified by 'thisness' (idantva) is recognised as the cow qualified by 'thatness' (tattva).

Volume 2 ends on page 803 with the conclusion of Savikalpakavāda, thus completing the Pratyakṣa-khaṇḍa of the Tattvacintāmaṇi. Bhatta's colophon reads: 'Thus ends the section on perception of the Tattvacintāmaṇi composed by Śrī Gaṅgeśopādhyāya.'

Comparative and World-Philosophical Dimensions

Chapter 10 of Ben-Ami Scharfstein's A Comparative History of World Philosophy places Gaṅgeśa alongside Descartes and Leibniz under a common theme: the search for certainty through the methodical application of reason. All three distinguish reasoning itself as a primary object of philosophical investigation rather than merely adding to the stock of empirical materials. As the source puts it, 'Gaṅgeśa's preoccupation with the problems of valid induction and economical explanation is, in spirit, like that of contemporary philosophers of science.' All three also respond to formidable sceptical challenges: Gaṅgeśa to the Cārvākas and Śrīharṣa, Descartes to the Cartesian evil demon, and Leibniz to radical empiricism.

A particular parallel between Gaṅgeśa's treatment of twenty-two definitions of vyāpti and the Cartesian method is structural. Gaṅgeśa proposes a definition, develops a counterexample through the relation between a restriction and what it restricts, rejects the inadequate definition, and proceeds until no further counterexample can be produced. This is a dialectical counterpart of Descartes's instruction to divide difficulties into as many parts as possible and move from the simple to the complex. The difference is equally important: Descartes builds outward from individual certainty, whereas Gaṅgeśa refines the precision of an existing communal tradition from within. Both apply reason to establish knowledge, but move from opposed starting points.

The social dimension of Scharfstein's observation—that Gaṅgeśa 'makes philosophy unquestionably the province of those who have mastered a special language'—becomes fully apparent, in this author's reading, when placed beside the evidence of the Dūṣaṇa Pañjī. The philosopher who fashioned the technically most demanding epistemic system in the Sanskrit tradition was, the author contends, not himself wholly governed in his biography by the social hierarchy served by that tradition. His philosophical method—test every definition against every counterexample—and his supposed biographical circumstance—a life that challenged norms of caste purity—are interpreted here not as a chance resemblance but as a structural convergence.

The Commentarial Tradition: From Vardhamāna to Raghunātha Śiromaṇi

Volume 6 of the Potter–Bhattacharyya Encyclopedia encompasses some fifty authors from the period 1310–1510 CE. Raghunātha Śiromaṇi's Dīdhiti is the decisive secondary work, generating in turn an immense commentarial literature that extends to Jagadīśa Tarkasaṅkara and Gadādhara Bhaṭṭācārya. The Encyclopedia notes that 'the most complicated use of these relations occurs in the Dīdhiti tradition in connection with the analysis of awareness.' Such a tradition, the passage argues, became possible because Gaṅgeśa had constructed in the Tattvacintāmaṇi the conceptual framework within which analyses of that kind could be undertaken.

The transmission of the Navya-Nyāya school from Mithila to Navadvīpa, as reconstructed by Gajendra Thakur from the pañjī records, is at once an institutional and a philosophical narrative. According to that account, Pakṣadhara Miśra refused to allow a copy of the Tattvacintāmaṇi to be made, obliging Vāsudeva Sārvabhauma to memorise the text. Paradoxically, this is said to have secured its transmission: what could not be copied could not be lost through the uncertainties of manuscript circulation, since it was carried in a human memory trained to preserve it intact. The school moved to Bengal; the text survived.

The Parallel History of Maithili Literature and Gaṅgeśa's Civilisational Position

Gaṅgeśa in the Nine-Layer Parallel History

The parallel history of Maithili literature, as documented by Gajendra Thakur and Videha, unfolds in nine layers: (1) the Buddhist Caryāpada foundation; (2) the two Vidyāpatis; (3) the suppression of Gaṅgeśa's biography, as inferred from the Dūṣaṇa Pañjī; (4) poetry protesting against famine; (5) the exclusion of Harimohan Jha; (6) living masters, including Rajdev Mandal and Bechan Thakur; (7) disclosures under the Right to Information Act, attributed to Vineet Utpal and Ashish Anchinhar, alleging that more than 90 per cent of appointments concerning the Sahitya Akademi's Maithili advisory board went to friends or relatives of board members; (8) the Malla strand in Nepal; and (9) Videha's digital counter-archive. The numerical allegation in item 7 is reproduced as the source author's claim, not as an independently established finding.

In the source author's argument, the suppression of Gaṅgeśa's biography joins the philosophical and political dimensions of layers 3 and 9. The same institutional culture that allegedly denied Harimohan Jha—a highly popular Maithili satirist who attacked Brahmin orthodoxy—a Sahitya Akademi award is said to have ensured that the Dūṣaṇa Pañjī facts about Gaṅgeśa remained concealed. In the author's view, the Sahitya Akademi's 2016 monograph on Gaṅgeśa, which might have set the record straight after Videha's 2009 release, instead repeated that suppression.

Videha's Digital Archive and the Recovery of Gaṅgeśa

Videha's digitisation of 11,000 Tirhuta-script palm-leaf manuscripts (including pañjī records said to document Gaṅgeśa's biography), the successful Unicode standardisation of Tirhuta in 2014, localisation work involving Maithili Wikipedia and Google Translate, and the Videha Pothi digital library together constitute what the parallel-history account calls 'a living parallel institution.' Within this archive, Gaṅgeśa's Tattvacintāmaṇi is approached not as a monument to Brahmin orthodoxy but as part of a wider civilisational inheritance.

The revival of the Maithili ghazal by the Anchinhar Akhar group (Ashish Anchinhar and Gajendra Thakur, from 2008) is presented as the parallel literary movement's most distinctive formal achievement. Recognised in this account as Maithili's first scholar of arūż (ghazal prosody), Gajendra Thakur composed Ghazalśāstram. The same critical rigour that animates Gaṅgeśa's treatment of twenty-two definitions of vyāpti is said to animate the movement's insistence on strict metrical rules. Both the philosopher and the movement follow a principle: test each proposition against every possible counterexample and revise it until no defect remains.

The Dūṣaṇa Pañjī (Gajendra Thakur/Videha, 2009) is presented here as evidence of biographical truths allegedly suppressed: Gaṅgeśa's birth five years after his father's death; his marriage to a woman of the leatherworking community; the classification of his family as of 'low social status' under Mithila Brahmin norms; and the total loss of his poetry through deliberate suppression. In the framework of parallel history, suppression is read as an institutional pattern and digital recovery as a form of civilisational resistance. These disputed biographical statements are reported as the source's assertions.

A single principle, the author suggests, was articulated by Gaṅgeśa himself at the opening of the Tattvacintāmaṇi: compose in 'measured words' after surveying 'the entire essence of both schools with the divine eye of reflection.' Every definition must be tested; no fault must remain. The parallel-history movement claims to have applied the same principle to its own subject matter: every source examined, every assertion tested, and no essential fact suppressed.

Appendix 1: Anupalabdhivāda (1.7) and Further Elaboration

A. Anupalabdhivāda (The Theory of Non-Apprehension, 1.7)

Anupalabdhivāda (the doctrine of non-apprehension) is among the most philosophically subtle sections of the Pratyakṣa-khaṇḍa. It establishes a positive ontological status for absence (abhāva), against the view that non-apprehension (anupalabdhi) is itself a pramāṇa—a valid source of knowledge—a position maintained by Prābhākara Mīmāṃsakas and some Vedāntins.

Opening argument (1.7.1): Gaṅgeśa argues that the non-apprehension of the absence of entities (abhāvānupalabdhi) cannot be the cause of knowledge of their existence (bhāva-graha), because it is rendered unnecessary by the cognition of their existence (bhāva-dhī). Where contact between a sense faculty and its object (indriyārtha-sannikarṣa) is present, cognition of an existent object is never delayed for want of the non-apprehension of its absence.

The Bhaṭṭa objection: The sense faculty (indriya) ought to be a cause (hetu) in the cognition of an object's absence (abhāva-graha), because it is employed as the means by which that absence is cognised (tadanuvidhānāt). The Naiyāyika replies that a faculty such as sight has already discharged its function by producing knowledge of the locus of absence (tadupakṣayāt). The faculty neither stands in a relation of contact with the absence itself nor produces cognition of anything except what is related to it.

'The sense faculty is not the pramāṇa' (1.7.2): Knowledge of the locus of an object's absence is an operation of the sense faculty. It does not follow, however, that the sense faculty becomes a cause of the cognition of absence merely by supplying knowledge of its locus. An operation (vyāpāratva) can be established only after the causal efficacy of the faculty has been established; but that efficacy is precisely what has not been shown, since there is no contact-relation between a sense faculty and absence itself. Absence is supersensible (atīndriya) in this respect.

The Vedāntin position (1.7.3): If the absence of an object is to be known only through the senses, then the relation of being a qualifier (viśeṣaṇatā) —a relation of an object to itself—must be admitted as a contact-relation in the perception of absence. The Naiyāyikas reject this inference. An unimpaired faculty (anupakṣīṇendriya), in perceiving colour and the like, works through the contact-relation of inherence in what is conjoined (saṃyukta-samavāya). But in the present case the faculty has already exhausted its function in producing cognition of the locus of absence. There is therefore no need to postulate some additional contact-relation, such as qualifierhood (viśeṣaṇatā, here described as prāptyantara), for that same faculty.

The decisive Naiyāyika position (1.7.11): What is experienced is always a particular absence referring to a counterpositive (pratiyogin). Experience takes such forms as 'This is not a pot' and 'This is not a cloth.' A merely empty locus, without reference to an absent object, is never experienced as absence. Accordingly, knowledge of an absence must include cognition of its counterpositive. Experience shows that cognition of absence depends upon knowing that counterpositive, just as the recognition of resemblance to a cow presupposes knowledge of a cow. An empty locus by itself does not constitute absence: we may know the locus without knowing any counterpositive. Absence is therefore a distinct and positive ontological category (pratiyogimad-adhikaraṇa)—the condition of a locus qualified by the absence of something. On this account, absence is established as the seventh Vaiśeṣika category, beyond the preceding six, with its own relevant relation of qualifierhood (viśeṣaṇatā).

B. The Boundary Between Sections 7 and 8: Why Non-Apprehension Is Not a Valid Means of Knowing Absence

Abhāvavāda (section 1.8) builds directly on Anupalabdhivāda. The principal transitional argument asks whether cognition of an empty locus, such as the ground, might constitute both the object of knowledge (prameya) and the means of knowing absence (pramāṇa), on the assumption that cognitions are self-luminous (svaprakāśatva). The Prābhākara Mīmāṃsaka rejects the resulting objection: if mere awareness of the empty ground constituted cognition of absence, no additional cognition of the counterpositive—such as a pot (pratiyogi-jñāna-apekṣā) —would be required.

The Naiyāyika's final determination concerning absence is that only a distinct absence referring to a counterpositive is experienced. We do in fact have cognitions and ordinary expressions such as 'There is no pot on the ground.' Such cognition cannot rest solely on the locus (the ground); otherwise the same cognition could arise even where the ground actually supported a pot. The applicability of the expression 'absence of a pot' is determined by the relevant counterpositive. The threatened circularity is resolved by analogy with resemblance to a cow: the applicability of the expression 'cow-like' arises from cognition of a cow, and it is sufficient to admit a distinct resemblance of a gavaya (wild ox) to a cow. In the same way, a particular absence can be admitted without identifying it with bare knowledge of its locus.

C. The Naiyāyika–Siddhāntin Debate on Inherence: Full Documentation

Samavāyavāda (1.6), in Bhaṭṭa's second volume, is among the most technically intricate debates in the entire Pratyakṣa-khaṇḍa. Its central question is whether inherence (samavāya) is the contact-relation that produces qualified cognition. The Siddhāntin argues (1.6.1) that universals (jāti), qualities (guṇa), actions (kriyā) and their respective substrates are experienced as mutually related (mithaḥ sambaddhau) through inherence. Qualified cognition and qualified designation would not be possible in the case of two entities whose natures were entirely unrelated (asambaddha-svarūpa-dvaya).

The opponent's multi-stage refutation of inherence as a contact-relation proceeds as follows: (1) inherence cannot appear as a qualifier (viśeṣaṇa) merely on the basis of an experience of the entities said to be related (sambaddhānubhava); (2) unlike conjunction, there is no corresponding experience that establishes inherence by presenting 'these two things as inherent in one another'; (3) the inherence-relation cannot appear either as the qualificand (viśeṣya) or as an independent object in its own right; and (4) no perception of inherence's objecthood is given in the form 'I know inherence.' The later Navya reply (1.6.6) proposes an inference establishing inherence as a relation distinct from what is already expressed in a judgement qualified by a quality, action or universal. This inference is not defeated by the proposed deviation involving cognitions qualified by absence and the like (abhāvādi-viśiṣṭa-buddhi).

The view of other scholars (anye, 1.6.3) seeks to establish inherence through inference as a constituent of the sense faculty's contact-relation, once the alternative contact-relation has been ruled out. The Naiyāyika objects: a sense faculty, by its own nature, produces cognitions of objects related to it (sva-sambaddha-vyavahāra-kārin). Knowledge of universals and the like is produced by their relation to what is related to the senses. Consequently, even when inherence is admitted as a contact-relation, the relation of qualifierhood (viśeṣaṇatā) remains necessary.

The Bhaṭṭa view (continuation of 1.6.3) attempts to establish inherence as a component of sensory contact by inference after rejecting the rival contact-relation: 'Sound, universals, colours and the like are related to the sense faculties, because they are cognisable, like a pot.' The argument rests on the premise that a sense faculty produces cognition of what is related to it. Yet inherence itself is not cognisable in this manner, since it is related to no sense faculty. The Naiyāyika's final determination (1.6.18) is that soundness (śabdatva) can be established as a universal by the reasoning applied to colourness and similar universals (rūpatvādi-nyāya). Through its mediating role between universals and their instances, inherence is thereby established as a contact-relation.

D. Mano'ṇutvavāda: The Theory of the Atomic Nature of Mind—A Full Account

Mano'ṇutvavāda (1.10) establishes that manas (mind) is atomic (aṇu): it has the smallest, indivisible magnitude. The central chain of reasoning in Bhaṭṭa's second volume is this: if the mind were all-pervading (vibhu), several external senses could make contact with it simultaneously and produce the simultaneous perception of five distinct qualities. But the absence of any obstruction to simultaneous cognition of those five qualities is itself acknowledged as a genuine cognition (pramā).

The Naiyāyikas propose that, if an especially close or intense contact between the mind and one faculty blocks five different perceptual cognitions from arising together, the mind may be conceived as a whole composed of parts (avayavin). The production of five cognitions corresponding to five qualities—or only one cognition of a single quality—could then be explained by the expansion and contraction of the configuration of the mind's parts (saṅkoca-vikāsābhyām).

The Mīmāṃsaka objection (1.10.19; Bhaṭṭa, vol. 2, pp. 718–25) is illustrated by eating a large round piece of bread: five distinct cognitions of smell, taste, colour, touch and sound arise through the five sense faculties. How does the Naiyāyika theory account for this? The Naiyāyikas reply that there is an order (krama) in the production of the five distinct perceptual cognitions. Yet the cognition that all five occur together is also recognised as genuine when no obstruction is present. A further difficulty arises because hearing can apprehend multiple sounds (nānā-śabda-graha). The Naiyāyika response points to the perceptible difference between hearing the same song sung by several persons simultaneously and hearing it sung by one person alone. The ear must therefore be able to perceive several sounds at once; the argument explains this possibility through the expansion of the configuration of parts in the atomic mind.

E. Gaṅgeśa's Śabdaśāstram: The Short Story and Its Significance

Gajendra Thakur's Maithili short story 'Śabdaśāstram' ('The Science of Words'), based on what the author presents as authentic pañjī records concerning Gaṅgeśa Upādhyāya, was translated by Thakur himself and published in Indian Literature, vol. 58, no. 2 (280), March–April 2014, pp. 78–93 (sixteen pages; Sahitya Akademi). In the author's account, this publication is significant on several levels. It represents a parallel strategy of publishing recovered biographical material as imaginative narrative in the periodical of an institution (the Sahitya Akademi) accused by the author of suppressing historical evidence; it presents the Dūṣaṇa Pañjī material in the form of fiction; and it places the claim of biographical suppression on the public literary record of the very institution whose 2016 monograph on Gaṅgeśa the author criticises for perpetuating that suppression.

The title 'Śabdaśāstram' ('The Science of Words') is itself a philosophical allusion. Śabdaśāstra is concerned with verbal testimony (śabda-pramāṇa), the fourth means of knowledge treated in the Tattvacintāmaṇi. The story thus dramatises the relationship between Gaṅgeśa's philosophical undertaking and his alleged biographical predicament: the thinker whose discipline examines the validity of verbal evidence becomes, in the story, the subject of an effort to recover suppressed testimony about his own life.

F. Pakṣadhara Miśra, Vidyāpati and the Problem of Two Traditions

Gajendra Thakur's pañjī research claims to add chronological precision to Mithila's intellectual history: 'Pakṣadhara Miśra was a contemporary of Vidyāpati [the Sanskrit and Avahaṭṭha author], who was distinct from the composer of the Padāvalī, the latter belonging to the period before Jyotirīśvara.' This substantiates, within the author's parallel-history thesis, a central intervention in the problem of two Vidyāpatis: the celebrated Padāvalī poet is said to have been distinct from Vidyāpati Ṭhakkura (1350–1435 CE), the writer in Sanskrit and Avahaṭṭha. The Vidyāpati involved in the scholarly world of Pakṣadhara Miśra would thus not be the same individual as the folk-song poet whose lyrics circulated throughout eastern India.

According to the author, this distinction is established by pañjī evidence and bears directly upon the dating of Gaṅgeśa and the intellectual history of Mithila. Pakṣadhara Miśra—the teacher in Mithila who, according to the traditional account, refused permission to copy the Tattvacintāmaṇi and compelled Vāsudeva Sārvabhauma to memorise it—was a contemporary of the Sanskrit–Avahaṭṭha Vidyāpati; the proposed dates therefore place him between the late fourteenth and early fifteenth centuries. This accords, the argument continues, with the conventional dating of Raghunātha Śiromaṇi (fl. c. 1500 CE) as Vāsudeva's pupil, and yields the succession: Gaṅgeśa (fl. c. 1320) → Vardhamāna → Pakṣadhara → Vāsudeva Sārvabhauma → Raghunātha Śiromaṇi.

Appendix 2: Kārakavāda

The Epistemological and Semantic Foundations of Kārakavāda in Gaṅgeśa Upādhyāya's Tattvacintāmaṇi

In the Śabda-khaṇḍa of the Tattvacintāmaṇi, Gaṅgeśa's account of kāraka stands at the intersection of grammatical theory, logic and cognitive science, where it offers a refined description of how intelligible agents and other participants are related to actions.

Theoretical Principles of Verbal Cognition

Before turning to the kārakas, it is necessary to understand the conditions for śābda-bodha (verbal cognition) set out by Gaṅgeśa. A sentence is not merely a collection of words but a structured whole that must satisfy four conditions: ākāṅkṣā (syntactic expectancy), yogyatā (semantic compatibility), āsatti (proximity) and tātparya (the speaker's intended meaning).

Kārakavāda: The Convergence of Grammar and Logic

A kāraka is a causal role through which an action is accomplished (kriyā-nirvartakam). Navya-Nyāya analyses it in terms of causation: each kāraka is a particular causal factor (kāraṇa) contributing to the action's ultimate result (phala).

Kartṛ (agent): the independent participant (svatantraḥ kartā). In Navya-Nyāya's technical refinement, the defining feature of the agent is kṛtimattva—the possession of volitional effort (kṛti). This is important because it enables Nyāya to distinguish conscious agency from an inert instrument.

Karman (object): traditionally defined as what is most desired by the agent (kartur īpsitatamaṃ karma). Gaṅgeśa analyses this through the concept of phalādhikaraṇatva, being the locus or substrate of the result (phalāśrayatva).

Historical Chronology

A historical chronology of Indian logic and epistemology:

• Ancient period (650 BCE–100 CE) — Nyāyasūtra — Akṣapāda Gautama

• Medieval period (100–1200 CE) — Pramāṇasamuccaya — Dignāga, Dharmakīrti, Udayana

• Modern period (from 1200 CE) — Tattvacintāmaṇi — Gaṅgeśa Upādhyāya, Raghunātha Śiromaṇi

Appendix 3: Gaṅgeśa's Navya-Nyāya—Logic, Language and Vyāpti: A Comparative Study

Based on Gaṅgeśa Upādhyāya's Tattvacintāmaṇi, this study maps the intellectual functions of Navya-Nyāya across three principal domains: philosophy of language (verb roots and verbal suffixes), formal logic (vyāpti and its definition), and the epistemological framework. Taken together, four papers by Toshihiro Wada, J. L. Shaw's study of saṅgati (relevance or connection), and Yuko Miyasaka's diagrammatic account of the definitions of vyāpti in Gaṅgeśa and Raghunātha Śiromaṇi show that Gaṅgeśa's project is not a group of unrelated technical exercises but a unified epistemological enterprise.

A Shared Epistemological Ground: Realism and the Structure of Cognition

Before considering these six papers, one must understand their common epistemological framework. Miyasaka's paper puts it most clearly: Navya-Nyāya is thoroughgoing realism. Every qualified cognition (viśiṣṭa-jñāna) has a structure comprising a qualifier (viśeṣaṇa or prakāra), a qualificand (viśeṣya) and the relation connecting them (saṃbandha). Importantly, this structure is not a mental construction or a linguistic form imposed on experience; it maps the actual structure of the external world as apprehended.

Defining Vyāpti: Formal Structure and Metaphysical Foundation

Gaṅgeśa's Definitive Definition

Miyasaka's study and Wada's 1994 paper both examine Gaṅgeśa's definitive definition of vyāpti: 'pratiyogy-asāmānādhikaraṇa-yat-sāmānādhikaraṇātyantābhāva-pratiyogitāvacchedakāvacchinna-yaṃ yan na bhavati tena samaṃ tasya sāmānādhikaraṇyaṃ vyāptiḥ.' In the source's rendering, vyāpti is 'co-location with an entity X which is not delimited by a delimitor of counterpositiveness belonging to an absolute absence co-located with [the entity designated] 10 and sharing no locus with its own counterpositive.'

Wada's 1994 paper traces the historical source of this definition to Śaśadhara's Nyāyasiddhāntadīpa, showing that Gaṅgeśa refined Śaśadhara's provisional definition by introducing the concept of avacchedaka (delimitor).

Saṅgati (Relevance): The Logic of Philosophical Inquiry

Shaw enumerates six kinds of saṅgati: (1) prasaṅga (contextual recollection), (2) upodghāta (justification or introduction), (3) hetu (cause or reason), (4) avasara (the resolution of questions raised by objections), (5) nirvāhakaikatva (having the same cause), and (6) kāryaikatva (having the same effect). Each designates a different real relation between the objects of two cognitions.

Avacchedaka: A Unifying Concept

Perhaps the most striking discovery to emerge from reading all six papers is the central and unifying role of the concept of avacchedaka (delimitor) across all three domains.

In logic, the delimitor of counterpositiveness is Gaṅgeśa's principal innovation in defining vyāpti. It forestalls the problem identified through the sieve analogy (cālanī-nyāya).

In the semantics of verbal roots, Gaṅgeśa introduces a delimitor of causal status in the third section of the Dhātuvāda.

In the semantics of verbal suffixes, avacchedaka functions through Gaṅgeśa's redefinition of co-location (sāmānādhikaraṇya).

Appendix 4: Western and East Asian Scholars of Gaṅgeśa Upādhyāya

Western Philosophers and the Tattvacintāmaṇi

A. Daniel H. H. Ingalls: A Pioneer (Harvard, 1951)

The first sustained Western academic engagement with Gaṅgeśa's work is associated with Ingalls. In his 1955 essay 'Logic in India', Ingalls distinguished three principal innovations of Navya-Nyāya in relation to the older Nyāya school: 'a new method of generalisation made possible by the concept of limitation (avacchedakatā); the discovery of several rules resembling the theorems of propositional logic; [and] a new interest in the definition of relations and their use in extremely complex operations.' These were recognised as formal innovations.

B. The Frege–Russell–Navya-Nyāya Comparison

The most striking Western parallel is drawn between the Navya-Nyāya movement initiated by Gaṅgeśa and the revolution in symbolic logic in the West. In the scholarly literature, Navya-Nyāya is described as a movement comparable in its intellectual effects to the rise of symbolic logic in the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries through the writings of Frege, Russell and Wittgenstein and the philosophical reflection associated with them.

C. Stephen H. Phillips: Systematic Western Engagement (2004)

Phillips and Tatacharya's Epistemology of Perception (2004), a translation of the Pratyakṣa-khaṇḍa of the Tattvacintāmaṇi, includes an introduction supplying the necessary theoretical and historical background and comparisons between Nyāya and Western epistemological traditions.

D. Bimal Krishna Matilal: The 'Matilal Strategy' (Oxford)

Bimal Krishna Matilal (1935–1991) was a distinguished philosopher whose writings presented the Indian philosophical tradition as a wide-ranging system encompassing logic and epistemology. From 1977 to 1991 he held the Spalding Professorship of Eastern Religion and Ethics at the University of Oxford.

Japanese Philosophers and the Tattvacintāmaṇi

A. Toshihiro Wada (Nagoya University)

Wada obtained a D.Litt. from Nagoya University in 2002 and works principally on logic and the philosophy of language in Navya-Nyāya. His approach combines traditional Sanskrit philology with instruments of formal logic and visual diagramming.

In his Navya-Nyāya Philosophy of Language, Wada analyses Gaṅgeśa's Ākhyātavāda (the section on verbal suffixes) in the Tattvacintāmaṇi, describing the treatment of empty terms such as 'round triangle', 'the present king of France' and 'hare's horn'. The last point is philosophically notable: Navya-Nyāya's treatment of empty terms, or expressions without actual referents, runs parallel to the problem of reference to non-existent objects in Bertrand Russell's 'On Denoting' (1905).

Appendix 5: Israel and Gaṅgeśa Upādhyāya

The Talmudic Logic Tradition: Israel's Own Analytical Parallel

This is the tradition of Talmudic logic (higgayon talmudi), which has been the subject of intensive modern formalisation in Israeli and diasporic Jewish scholarship.

A. The Talmudic Logic Project (Dov Gabbay, Bar-Ilan / King's College London)

The Talmudic Logic Project, active since 2008, uses the instruments of modern logic to analyse Talmudic reasoning. It investigates principles of Talmudic logic and publishes a series of volumes devoted to individual principles.

B. Structural Comparison: Navya-Nyāya and Talmudic Logic

The parallels between the two traditions are structurally significant:

• Vyāpti (invariable concomitance) ~ binyan av (analogical extension from a legal precedent)

• Upādhi (a condition that defeats an inference) ~ pirka (a Talmudic refutation)

• Pakṣa, sādhya, hetu ~ niddon, melammed, limmud (subject, precedent, derived rule)

• Avacchedakatā (delimiting the scope of a property) ~ gezerah shavah (definitional equivalence delimiting the scope of a rule)

• Śabda-khaṇḍa (the epistemology of testimony) ~ Talmudic mesirah, shemuah, kabbalah (the epistemology of oral transmission)

Both traditions developed rigorous technical languages on natural-language foundations—Sanskrit and Aramaic respectively. Both were concerned with the conditions under which an inference is valid or fails, and both arose in religious and legal contexts where logical precision carried high stakes.

C. Medieval Jewish Philosophy and the Theistic Arguments of Nyāya

An indirect point of contact between the wider Nyāya tradition and Jewish philosophy lies in cosmological and teleological arguments for God's existence. Udayana's Nyāyakusumāñjali (eleventh century) and the Nyāya school developed within the framework later elaborated by Gaṅgeśa offer rigorous arguments for a creator (Īśvara), structurally comparable to the cosmological reasoning in Maimonides' Guide for the Perplexed (twelfth century).

D. The Israel Institute for Advanced Studies: A Possible Venue

The Israel Institute for Advanced Studies, established by the Hebrew University of Jerusalem in 1975, is an autonomous institution whose mission is to form multidisciplinary communities of scholars. The institute has previously hosted research groups in comparative philosophy and the history of science.

E. Ben-Ami Scharfstein (1919–2019): Israeli-American Philosopher

Ben-Ami Scharfstein was a founding member of the philosophy department at Tel Aviv University. In his major work A Comparative History of World Philosophy: From the Upanishads to Kant (1998), he places Gaṅgeśa Upādhyāya, the fourteenth-century founding figure of Navya-Nyāya, in a distinctive world-philosophical context. Characterising his approach as reason-sensitive and methodical metaphysics, Scharfstein places Gaṅgeśa alongside Descartes and Leibniz.

Scharfstein praises Gaṅgeśa for extraordinary clarity and intellectual honesty. In his account, Navya-Nyāya is not 'dead' scholasticism but a high achievement of human analysis, with a level of formal exactitude that the Western tradition did not attain until the late nineteenth or twentieth century.

From the Adhyāsabhāṣya to the Completion of the Catuḥsūtrī

1. Introduction, Objectives, and Structure of the Work under Review

Bhāmatī, composed by Vācaspati Miśra, the "sarvatantrasvatantra" (independently accomplished in all systems) philosopher of ninth-century Mithila, is a commentary on Śaṅkarācārya's Śārīraka Bhāṣya and the foundational text of a distinct school of Advaita Vedānta, the Bhāmatī tradition. For more than a thousand years, this work remained within the bounds of Sanskrit scholarship, even though its author was himself a son of Mithila. Gajendra Thakur—the editor of the Videha e-journal, a student of the Navya-Nyāya tradition of Gaṅgeśa Upādhyāya, and a literary author active in Maithili, Hindi, Sanskrit, and English—has addressed this historical absence through a translation directly from the original Sanskrit into literary Maithili. The first edition of 2004 and the expanded, audited and revised edition of 2026 (Videha book series, ISSN 2229-547X) bear witness to the maturation of this translational endeavour over two decades.

The present study has two purposes. The first is to offer a detailed, orderly synopsis of the entire 491-page work under review, omitting no part of the sequence from the auspicious invocations to the final colophon of the Samanvayādhikaraṇa, "Here ends the Catuḥsūtrī-Bhāmatī." The second is to evaluate critically both the original philosophical work and the act of translating it, in the light of Indian poetics—rasa, dhvani, vakrokti, guṇa and rīti, aucitya, and Mithila's own Navya-Nyāya perspective—and Western literary theory: Schleiermacher's and Venuti's concepts of domestication and foreignisation in translation, Nida's dynamic and formal equivalence, Walter Benjamin's "The Task of the Translator," Gadamerian hermeneutics, and the close-reading method of New Criticism.

This research report offers an extensive examination of Vācaspati Miśra's philosophical contribution, the metaphysical doctrines of the Bhāmatī school, the linguistic and philosophical merits of Gajendra Thakur's Maithili translation, and the new intellectual debate made possible by the work's entry into Maithili letters. In addition, it considers at length the institutional contribution to the renaissance of Maithili literature.

The cumulative edition of the translation under review extends from page 1 to page 491 and has the following order: (a) cover and publication pages; (b) the Maithili rendering of Śaṅkara's original Adhyāsabhāṣya; (c) prose translations of Vācaspati Miśra's seven invocatory verses; (d) the complete translation of the Bhāmatī commentary on the Adhyāsabhāṣya, under the heading "Adhyāsa"; (e) the commentary on the first sūtra, "Athāto brahmajijñāsā"; (f) that on the second, "Janmādy asya yataḥ"; (g) that on the third, "Śāstrayonitvāt"; and (h) the extensive commentary on the fourth sūtra, "Tat tu samanvayāt" (the Samanvayādhikaraṇa), which alone occupies approximately a third of the entire book—evidence of the translator's fidelity to the proportions of the Sanskrit Bhāmatī. At the end of the edition, as Chapter Four, stands an extensive bibliography divided into twelve sections. It lists the Maithili edition under review, base texts of the Brahma Sūtras and Śaṅkara's Bhāṣya, Sanskrit editions of Bhāmatī, commentaries and subcommentaries upon it (Vedāntakalpataru, Kalpataruparimala, Ābhoga, Bhāmatītilaka, and others), texts for comparison with the Vivaraṇa school, other works of Vācaspati, modern research, and digital collections; each entry is accompanied by a note on its usefulness. This editorial component is particularly helpful to researchers, although it is not itself part of the act of translation but an auxiliary resource; for that reason a separate brief account of it is considered sufficient in the present synopsis.

The book is organised into four principal chapters. The first contains the introduction and philosophical examination; the second, a detailed philosophical, translation-critical, and literary assessment; the third, an appendix containing the original translation into literary Maithili; and the fourth, the extensive bibliography. Chapter Three reproduces the entire Catuḥsūtrī-Bhāmatī, beginning with adhyāsa and continuing through the first four Brahma Sūtras.

The second chapter returns to the subjects of the first, but divides them into more finely differentiated subsections: seven on adhyāsa, four on the first sūtra, five on the fourth sūtra, the art of translation, Indian and Western criticism, the book's place in Maithili literature, observations, an epilogue, and an overall judgment.

2. Vācaspati Miśra: The "Sarvatantrasvatantra" Philosopher and His Historical Legacy

Vācaspati Miśra (approximately 900–980 CE) was a figure of extraordinary talent in the history of Indian philosophy. He is said to have been born either in Andharatharhi, in the present Madhubani district of Mithila (described in this account as the capital of King Nṛga at that time), or in the village of Samaul. With the exception of Vaiśeṣika, authoritative commentaries of his are available on almost all the orthodox schools of Indian philosophy, for which learned scholars conferred upon him the designation "sarvatantrasvatantra." The account maintains that there has been no comparable scholar in the Indian philosophical tradition whose writing produced authoritative and epoch-making commentaries across so many of the major branches of the six systems.

Vācaspati Miśra's substantial corpus ranges very widely. In Nyāya, his Nyāyavārttikatātparyaṭīkā brought him renown as "Tātparyācārya" and defended Uddyotakara's Nyāyavārttika. His Nyāyasūcīnibandha is also an important work concerned with the chronological and thematic arrangement of the Nyāya Sūtras. In Sāṃkhya, his Sāṃkhyatattvakaumudī on Īśvarakṛṣṇa's Sāṃkhyakārikā continues to be regarded as a standard exposition. In Yoga, his Tattvavaiśāradī, a commentary on the Vyāsabhāṣya of Patañjali's Yoga Sūtras, elucidates psychological and philosophical difficulties. In Pūrva-Mīmāṃsā, his Nyāyakaṇikā on Maṇḍana Miśra's Vidhiviveka and his independent work on linguistic cognition, Tattvabindu, reveal his Mīmāṃsā standpoint. In Vedānta, his Brahmatattvasamīkṣā on Maṇḍana Miśra's Brahmasiddhi (now unavailable) and Bhāmatī on the Śārīraka Bhāṣya have immortalised his name.

This historical introduction matters because readers should not suppose that Bhāmatī merely explains the individual words and expressions of Śaṅkarācārya. Vācaspati is certainly a follower of the commentator whose work he elucidates, yet his commentary also develops independent arguments, constructs opposing positions, examines the means of knowledge, and classifies concepts. It is this autonomous intellectual character that justifies the designation "Bhāmatī school."

2.1. The Popular Legend Behind the Naming of Bhāmatī

Behind the naming of Bhāmatī, the last and, in this account, greatest work of Vācaspati Miśra's life, stands a deeply affecting and inspirational legend, presented as an enduring emblem of the silent devotion of Indian women. According to popular tradition and the historical references invoked here, Vācaspati married a girl named Bhāmatī while still young. After marriage, he undertook the great project of composing a commentary on Ācārya Śaṅkara's Śārīraka Bhāṣya and requested that his wife not interrupt his scholarly discipline until the work was complete.

Respecting her husband's purpose, Bhāmatī took the entire burden of the household upon herself. For years—about thirty, according to some accounts—Vācaspati remained so absorbed in literary and philosophical study that he did not even notice who was serving him, or who provided his food and water and filled the lamp with oil. One evening, just as the oil in the lamp was running out and the flame was about to die, Vācaspati completed his book. Seeing the fading flame, Bhāmatī came quickly to replenish the oil. When Vācaspati raised his eyes from his manuscript, he saw a mature woman standing before him. Astonished, he asked, "Lady, who are you?" Bhāmatī answered humbly, "My lord, I am your wife, Bhāmatī."

Overwhelmed by his wife's extraordinary sacrifice, limitless dedication, and selfless service, Vācaspati realised that his life-partner had devoted her entire life to his undertaking. To express his gratitude for this immeasurable sacrifice, he named his great Vedānta commentary Bhāmatī, so that the world might remember, for all time, not only philosophical knowledge but also the immense sacrifice of an Indian woman. The work is still counted among the foremost writings of Advaita Vedānta, and Bhāmatī's name remains inscribed in the history of philosophy. In modern times, the author Usha Kiran Khan drew upon this historical-philosophical love story to write the novel Bhāmatī: An Unforgettable Love Story in Maithili and Hindi; the account adds that the work received recognition through a Sahitya Akademi award.

3. The Bhāmatī School, the Vivaraṇa School, and the Commentarial Tradition

The Catuḥsūtrī portion contains the seeds of numerous doctrines of the Bhāmatī school, which the faithful translation brings to light without added external commentary. The philosophical differences between the Bhāmatī school and the Vivaraṇa school, which arose from Prakāśātman Yati's Pañcapādikāvivaraṇa on Padmapādācārya's Pañcapādikā, may be seen in summary in the table below.

The Bhāmatī doctrine that ignorance has the individual self as its locus, the account of realisation of Brahman as a mental modification arising through reflection, and the assimilation of Prābhākara resources into Advaita in the understanding of superimposition as rooted in the non-apprehension of difference—all these points become apparent to the reader within the translated text itself, demonstrating the translator's command of the philosophical tradition.

In the development of Advaita Vedānta after Ācārya Śaṅkara, two major schools emerged: the Bhāmatī school of Vācaspati Miśra and the Vivaraṇa school arising from Prakāśātman Yati's Pañcapādikāvivaraṇa upon Padmapādācārya's Pañcapādikā. Their philosophical differences are essential to understanding the subtleties of Advaita, and Gajendra Thakur's Maithili translation, the review argues, addresses them with complete fidelity.

In the Bhāmatī school, the individual self (jīva) is held to be the agent, the experiencer, and the locus of ignorance. The doctrine that avidyā resides in the jīva is fundamental to Bhāmatī. According to Vācaspati Miśra, ignorance is, in reality, indescribable and can be divided into two aspects: concealment (āvaraṇa, or root ignorance) and projection (vikṣepa, or derivative ignorance/latent impressions). This entire background resonates throughout Gajendra Thakur's translation, in which the translator remains faithful to the text and clarifies Bhāmatī's meaning without inserting extraneous commentary.

The comparison is useful, but a scholarly caution is necessary here. Several propositions distinguishing Bhāmatī from Vivaraṇa are also the result of subsequent generations' systematic classifications. Readers should not therefore assume that all the differences appear as an explicit list in Vācaspati's original text. The work would serve researchers even better if it more sharply distinguished what the original translation says from what the later history of doctrines attributes to the tradition.

Bhāmatī is so mature and demanding a work that it has itself generated a considerable literature of commentaries. In the thirteenth century, Amalānanda Sarasvatī, whose teacher was Anubhavānanda, wrote the celebrated Vedāntakalpataru upon Bhāmatī, bringing new distinction to the Bhāmatī school within Advaita Vedānta. In the sixteenth century, Appayya Dīkṣita wrote the Kalpataruparimala on Amalānanda's Kalpataru, and Lakṣmīnṛsiṃha composed the Ābhoga. Other commentaries on Bhāmatī include Vallālasūri's Bhāmatītilaka, Akhaṇḍānubhūti Yati's Ṛjuprakāśikā, Acyutakṛṣṇatīrtha's Bhāmatībhāvadīpikā, and Subrahmaṇya Śāstrī's Bhāmatīvivaraṇa.

In places, subtle doctrinal differences become visible between Bhāmatī and Kalpataru. Where Appayya Dīkṣita, in the Parimala, found Vācaspati and Amalānanda at variance with the Śārīraka Bhāṣya, he refuted their positions and upheld the Bhāṣya. The author of the Ābhoga, Lakṣmīnṛsiṃha, strongly criticised this procedure in the Parimala and defended the authors of Bhāmatī and Kalpataru. Thus two subsidiary interpretive tendencies also developed within the Bhāmatī school itself. This entire commentarial inheritance testifies to the enduring intellectual authority of Vācaspati Miśra's original work.

Philosophical and epistemological question	Bhāmatī school (Vācaspati Miśra)	Vivaraṇa school (Padmapāda / Prakāśātman)
Locus of ignorance (avidyā)	The locus of avidyā is the individual self (jīva): ignorance resides in the jīva. Brahman is its object, not its locus.	The locus of avidyā is Brahman: ignorance is situated in Brahman.
Nature of jīva and Īśvara	Avacchedavāda: the individual self is Brahman delimited by ignorance, as pot-space is delimited relative to infinite space.	Pratibimbavāda: the individual self is the reflection of Brahman in ignorance, as the sun is reflected in water.
Unity or plurality of ignorance	Ignorance is multiple: many individual selves, many forms of ignorance. Each self has its own avidyā.	Root ignorance (mūlāvidyā) is one. The whole phenomenal world is the effect of a single ignorance.
Means to the realisation of Brahman	The mental modification assuming the form of Brahman, arising through reflection (manana), is the principal means of immediate knowledge (with nididhyāsana).	The great Upaniṣadic sentence (mahāvākya), as verbal testimony, directly produces immediate knowledge (śabdāparokṣavāda / śravaṇa).
Means of liberation	The jīva is the locus of ignorance and attains liberation while living through nididhyāsana.	Hearing alone is sufficient; ignorance resides in Brahman and is automatically destroyed by the knowledge of Brahman.
Creation and the mixing of elements	Trivṛtkaraṇa: the blending of three elements—fire, water, and food/earth—is accepted.	Pañcīkaraṇa: the blending of five elements—ether, air, fire, water, and earth—is accepted.

4. Extended Synopsis and Philosophical Examination

4.1. The Auspicious Invocation: A Meeting of Philosophy and Poetry

The seven auspicious verses of Bhāmatī are rendered in prose rather than metrical translation, giving priority to the preservation of meaning over the preservation of metre. In the first verse, Brahman is saluted as "the very nature of immeasurable bliss and knowledge" and as the source of the illusory manifestation of the five elements, "having made the two kinds of indescribable ignorance his ministers." Here, already, one encounters the seed of the Bhāmatī school's teaching concerning two aspects of ignorance: concealment and projection or latent impression. The second verse declares, "The Vedas are his breath, the five great elements his sight, the moving and unmoving world his smile, and his sleep the great dissolution." The Maithili word muskī, "smile," lends the cosmic play an intimate domestic warmth. Invocations of Veda-bhava, Mārtaṇḍa-Tilakasvāmin-Mahāgaṇapati, Vyāsa, and Śaṅkara follow in sequence. The humility expressed by the seventh verse—"Just as water from the royal road becomes pure upon entering the current of the Ganges, so the insignificant words of one such as myself are sanctified when joined to the ācārya's composition"—embodies the commentator's traditional intellectual modesty.

The translator's method is already clear in these invocations: metre may be relinquished, but not meaning; Sanskrit terminology may be retained, but the sentence must breathe in Maithili. Throughout the translation, this policy repeatedly proves successful.

4.2. The Adhyāsabhāṣya: The Opponent's Position, Figurative and Erroneous Usage, Theories of Illusion, and the Self-Luminosity of the Ātman

The commentary opens with an extended pūrvapakṣa, or prima facie objection: something about which there is no doubt, and knowledge of which serves no purpose, cannot be an object of inquiry. The illustrations are "a pot present in brilliant light" and "a crow's teeth." The opponent maintains that the immediate experience of "I" (asmat) is beyond dispute in all beings, from insects to gods and seers. Through arguments concerning recognition of the same self from childhood to old age, flowers and the thread upon which they are strung, the sublation of a divine dream-body, identity of the self despite a tiger's body brought about by yogic power, and the variability of the senses, the self is distinguished from the body, senses, and related faculties. The opponent's culminating assertion—"Even a thousand scriptures together cannot turn a pot into cloth"—supports the insistence that scriptural statements apparently contrary to experience must be understood figuratively.

The siddhānta, or established position, uses indicators of textual purport—including opening and conclusion, repetition, and others—to show that scripture teaches the self free of limiting adjuncts. Knowledge arising from scripture does not abolish the practical validity of perception; it denies only the latter's claim to ultimate validity. This distinction between the empirical (vyāvahārika) and ultimate (pāramārthika) levels is fundamental to Advaita epistemology. Illustrations such as the figurative expression "Dīrghā is shrieking," the Agnihotra of the Kuṇḍapāyins' sacrificial course, the lion-like disciple, and the mustard-seed/oil example demonstrate that figurative predication presupposes awareness of a difference. In the use of "I" with reference to the body, however, such discriminating knowledge is absent; the usage is therefore not merely figurative but false, an instance of superimposition (adhyāsa).

The commentary's definition of superimposition—"the manifestation, elsewhere, of something previously perceived, in a form resembling memory"—is analysed word by word and tested for overextension and underextension, with examples such as recognition of cowhood in the cow Kālākṣī and dream cognition. The entire ordinary repertory of illusion is translated: silver in a shell, mistaken identification in a mirror's reflection, two moons, the circle of a whirling firebrand, a mirage, and a snake perceived in bamboo. Against this background the classical dispute over theories of erroneous appearance (khyātivāda) unfolds: ātmakhyāti among Sautrāntika and Vijñānavādin Buddhists, akhyāti among Prābhākara Mīmāṃsakas, and anyathākhyāti among the Naiyāyikas. Vācaspati sharply criticises these positions, sometimes with the force of sarcasm: "Ah! What extraordinary good fortune belongs to this poor cognition, that it can acquire certainty even through falsehood!" The established doctrine is anirvacanīyakhyāti: the mirage-water superimposed upon rays is neither real nor unreal, nor both real and unreal. This threefold refusal, which locates illusion as distinct from both existence and non-existence (sad-asad-vilakṣaṇa), lies at the heart of Advaita epistemology.

The debate over the self-luminosity of consciousness employs the objection of a blind man led by another blind man, both stumbling at every step (the defect of a blind succession), the infinite regress resulting from postulating a further cognition to know each cognition, and a refutation of the Vijñānavādin claim that consciousness reveals its object. These arguments establish the self as self-luminous, eternal, and without parts. The illustration of a foolish child attributing stains to the imperceptible sky—imagined as a vast inverted bowl made of sapphire—shows how the sense of individual selfhood arises through the mind, intellect, and bodily limiting adjuncts projected by ignorance.

> "The learned call superimposition ignorance": this paired characterisation, the dependence of the status of knower upon superimposition, and the famous analogy with animal behaviour—fleeing at the sight of a man raising a stick, approaching at the sight of green grass—become vivid pictures of village life in Maithili. With the distinction between superimposition of properties (dharmādhyāsa: "I am mute / one-eyed / deaf") and superimposition upon the substratum (dharmyadhyāsa, discussed through desire, intention, doubt, and conviction), the introduction concludes with the commitment to eradicate the latent dispositions of illusion through the practice of true knowledge.

Ātmakhyāti (Buddhist Sautrāntika / Vijñānavāda): the external object is treated as non-existent and the internally constituted form of cognition is projected outward.

Akhyāti (Prābhākara Mīmāṃsā): failure to discriminate between memory and present apprehension; memory loses its recognisable character as memory.

Anyathākhyāti (Nyāya): the cognition of one existent object as another—for example, the appearance in a shell of silver existing in the marketplace.

This section also matters in the language of modern philosophy, because its question is not merely "Why does error occur?" but "What is the ontological status of the object present in experience?" The translation preserves the philosophical gravity of that question.

4.3. The First Sūtra, "Athāto brahmajijñāsā": Qualification, Means, the Relation Between Action and Knowledge, and Liberation

The central concerns of the first sūtra are the examination of four possible meanings of atha—sequence, beginning, auspiciousness, and qualification—and the rejection of the view that inquiry into Brahman must follow inquiry into dharma. Brahman-realisation is excluded from all four categories of things accomplished by action: something produced, transformed, purified, or obtained. Four examples illustrate these types: a ball of dough, curd, the ritual sprinkling of a mortar, and the milking of a cow. Ritual action is assigned only the status of a "remote auxiliary." The explanation of the four prerequisites—discrimination between the eternal and the non-eternal, dispassion toward enjoyments here and hereafter, the discipline comprising tranquillity and self-control, and the desire for liberation—makes enlivening use of illustrations concerning fish with bones, rice with husks, and the farmer who does not abandon his seed through fear of wild animals. At the close, the interpretation of "brahmaṇe jijñāsā" as a dative compound is rejected in favour of "brahmaṇaḥ jijñāsā" as a genitive tatpuruṣa compound. This is historically significant because Vācaspati here contests a tradition of glossators prior to Śaṅkara. The discussion ends with a historical survey of theories of the self: Lokāyata materialism, the view that the senses themselves constitute the self, mind-as-self theory, momentary consciousness theory, nihilism, Sāṃkhya, the Nyāya–Vaiśeṣika doctrine of a God distinct from the individual self, and Advaita—a miniature encyclopaedia of Indian philosophy.

The meanings "auspiciousness," "beginning," and "qualification" are set aside in favour of "sequence." Examples of auspicious sound are the beating of a mṛdaṅga drum or the sounding of a conch, and the sight of a water-filled pitcher brought for another purpose. The Mīmāṃsā opponent's contention that inquiry into Brahman should come after inquiry into dharma is decisively rejected. Liberation is neither produced (like a ball of dough), transformed (like curd), purified (like a mortar ritually sprinkled with water), nor acquired (like milk obtained by milking). Action is only a "remote auxiliary" of detachment and purification of the intellect.

The real strength of this sūtra lies in its examination of the relation between ritual action and knowledge. The Pūrva-Mīmāṃsā requirement that inquiry into Brahman must follow inquiry into dharma is rejected as a strict necessity. Yet action is not declared wholly meaningless. The book preserves different views in the original text: action removes impurities from the internal organ; purifies the seeker; discharges the three debts; or assists contemplation of Brahman. Within this discussion there emerges the sequence of hearing (śravaṇa), reflection (manana), and sustained meditation (nididhyāsana).

Here the translator's particular achievement is that ordinary examples prevent readers from becoming exhausted by exceptionally technical Mīmāṃsā argument. Fish with bones, rice with husks, the fear of wild beasts, the fear of a beggar, and poison mixed with honey are not decorative details in the argument for renunciation: they become examples bearing philosophical evidential force.

Bhāmatī's discipline of knowledge is especially subtle here. The meaning of scriptural statements received through hearing is strengthened by reflection; sustained meditation removes contrary dispositions; and the mental modification assuming the form of Brahman reveals the true "tat" (That) underlying the "tvam" (thou) bound by limiting adjuncts. Liberation is not produced: ignorance is removed.

4.4. The Second Sūtra, "Janmādy asya yataḥ": Brahman as the Cause of the World

The central argument of this sūtra establishes an extrinsic or indicative definition (taṭasthalakṣaṇa): "Because the world arises from Brahman, the world can serve as a distinguishing mark of Brahman, just as the sun's movement is indicated by its arrival in different places." It discusses Yāska's six modifications of being—birth, existence, growth, transformation, decline, and destruction—and their inclusion under origination, continuance, and dissolution. From the diversity of the world it argues for an omniscient and omnipotent cause, with four striking examples of natural regularity, including the blackbuck's appearance in a particular region, the cuckoo's calling at a particular season, and the conception of a crane following thunder at the beginning of the rains. The decisive turn in the argument is that the sūtra does not indicate an independent inference; rather, it restates the Taittirīya Upaniṣad's dialogue between Bhṛgu and Varuṇa. The example of a rope, together with ignorance, acting as the material basis of an imagined snake establishes Brahman, together with ignorance, as the material cause. The distinction between cognition governed by its object (vastutantra) and cognition or practice governed by the person (puruṣatantra) is also introduced here, preparing for the fourth sūtra.

Brahman is not only the efficient cause (nimittakāraṇa); Brahman together with ignorance is also the material cause (upādānakāraṇa). The rope-and-snake illustration gives this difficult Advaita theory of causation a compact, visible form.

4.5. The Third Sūtra, "Śāstrayonitvāt": The Twofold Relation Between Brahman and Scripture

Two interpretations authorised by the tradition are offered in sequence. (a) "Brahman is the cause of scripture": Brahman is the source of the entire body of scriptures comprising countless branches of knowledge; the example of Pāṇini's grammar establishes the concomitance that "the creator of a science possesses knowledge broader than the subject matter of that science." (b) "Scripture is the means of knowing Brahman": Brahman is known through scripture alone, not through an independent inference. The discussion of the eternality of the Veda is particularly valuable here. Mīmāṃsakas who hold phonemes to be eternal are obliged to acknowledge that sequences of words and sentences arranged in a particular order are not eternal in the same sense; the example of a dance teacher and pupil explains the transmission of a fixed Vedic recitation sequence; and the positions of Jaimini and Vyāsa are reconciled. "In no creation does Brahmin-killing become meritorious, nor does the horse sacrifice become sinful; just as fire never wets and water never burns." This subtle account of things having fixed natures makes the analysis of Vedic authority available in Maithili at an unprecedented level of depth.

4.6. The Fourth Sūtra, "Tat tu samanvayāt": The Efficacy of Vedāntic Statements, Object-Governed Knowledge, the Eternity of Liberation, and Liberation While Living

The Samanvayādhikaraṇa is the largest and most densely argumentative portion of the book, occupying approximately a third of the whole translation. Its opposing position rests on a Mīmāṃsā principle: "The purpose of scripture is to teach action." Statements of Vedānta must accordingly be regarded either as subsidiary to injunctions, as prescribing acts such as meditation, or as prescribing worship of Brahman to those desiring immortality—the doctrine of an injunction to apprehend (pratipattividhi-vāda). The objection from experience that "Even after hearing tat tvam asi, the conditions of worldly existence—pleasure, pain, fear, and so forth—remain as before" is also part of the pūrvapakṣa. The established position vindicates the fundamental claim that "all Vedāntic sentences converge upon Brahman with a single purport," appealing to scriptural statements such as "Sad eva somya idam agra āsīt" and "Ekam eva advitīyam," and to the unity of purport between a text's beginning and its conclusion.

The successive rejection of all four forms of a product of action—something produced, transformed, purified, or acquired—is the backbone of this section's demonstration that liberation is eternal. The appealing image of a boatman and boat moving away from changing banks, foam, and waves toward the still, wave-free middle; the impossibility of imparting an additional quality to Brahman (as one colours a hibiscus with lac-dye); and the impossibility of removing a defect from Brahman (as one polishes a mirror with brick powder) support the conclusion that "Not even the shadow of action, apart from knowledge, can enter into liberation." This is accompanied by the distinction between immutable eternality (kūṭastha-nityatā) and the eternality of something that undergoes change (pariṇāmi-nityatā); an extended refutation of doctrines of difference-and-non-difference ("One does not say of a pot that there is a jujube in it; nor, even when Caitra and Maitra sit on the same seat, does one say that Caitra is Maitra"); and the teaching "Clay alone is real" (vācārambhaṇa), which establishes the immutable standpoint. The discussion also includes the body of scriptural passages that appear to describe liberation as having a beginning and end, and Vāmadeva's declaration, "I became Manu; I became the Sun."

The Bhāṣya's teaching that "Knowledge is governed by the object (vastutantra), not by the person (puruṣatantra)" is explained through the contrast between superimpositional meditation—"The mind is indeed fire"—which depends on a person's volition, and the cognition that actual fire is fire, which depends on the object. Two unforgettable passages of Bhāmatī demonstrate that propositions concerning already existent things are efficacious: ornate prose describing Mount Sumeru, and the celebrated story of a Dravidian who did not know the language of the Āryas. When a messenger declares "A son has been born to you," the Dravidian infers the sentence's meaning from the gooseflesh and delighted face of Devadatta. This epoch-making argument in philosophy of language flows like a story in Maithili. There is also a subtle analysis of negation ("One should not kill a Brahmin": the negative particle as expressing absence, and the interpretation of exclusion or paryudāsa in the Prajāpati vow). Finally the distinction between figurative and erroneous identification with the ego, and the establishment of liberation while living—illustrated by the scriptural image of a snake's discarded skin lying lifeless upon its anthill—complete the book's argumentative circle. The final proposition is: "With the knowledge 'I am Brahman', all injunctions and every other means of knowledge come to an end." By reconnecting its conclusion to the first sūtra, in a form of circular or ring composition, this translation of the Catuḥsūtrī-Bhāmatī concludes.

Statements about an already established reality are not meaningless. Merely hearing "This is a rope, not a snake" may dispel fear caused by an illusion. Similarly, knowledge of Brahman is efficacious in itself once the self's apparent involvement in worldly existence is recognised as false. Hearing, reflection, and sustained meditation do not produce a new liberation; they remove doubt and contrary mental impressions.

Examples involving a pot and a jujube fruit, Caitra and Maitra, and gold and an earring show the difficulty of treating difference and non-difference as equally real within one relation. Knowing from a distance that something is gold does not yield knowledge of that particular object as an earring. This gives rise to the distinction between general knowledge of a substance and knowledge of a specific form. If difference and non-difference mutually depend on one another, the defect of reciprocal dependence arises.

The subtle investigation of the meaning of "not," paryudāsa, prohibition, and cessation belongs to the most demanding passages in the book's philosophy of language. Examples such as the fact that removing armour does not immediately end life if no arrow strikes explain cessation and its relation to a result. Finally, in distinguishing figurative from erroneous ego-identification and discussing liberation while alive, the text employs the examples of a snake's abandoned slough and a person who has given up wealth. The practical purpose of injunction and other instruments of knowledge coming to an end with the cognition "I am Brahman" constitutes the culmination of the Catuḥsūtrī.

5. Translation Theory, Linguistic Strategy, Idiom, and the Formation of Philosophical Terminology

The translator's linguistic strategy works on three levels. First is terminological precision: words such as adhyāsa, anirvacanīya, samānādhikaraṇa, pratyabhijñā, arthāpatti, saṃyoga-pṛthaktva, kūṭastha, and upādāna are retained, but explained in Maithili at their first occurrence. This allows a successful and durable philosophical vocabulary for Mīmāṃsā, Nyāya, and Vedānta to emerge in Maithili. Second is the Maithilisation of sentence structure: long Sanskrit constructions made up of elaborate compounds are broken into sentences introduced by formulations such as "The point is—", "Suppose that", "What is being said is—", and "The response given is...". These guideposts make the movement and pauses of debate clear. Third is the judicious use of indigenous idiom—"The blind man holds the hand of another blind man and falls at every step"; "Barley pudding is not salty"; "Not even a thousand scriptures together can turn a pot into cloth." This transformation of Sanskrit maxims into Maithili popular speech is the translation's finest achievement. Agreement in gender and number, disciplined use of chathi (the honorific form for Brahman, the self, or an ācārya) and achi (the ordinary form), and consistent use of the dotted retroflex letters (ṛ/ṭh corresponding to ड़/ढ़, in accordance with the Videha standard) are maintained throughout the 491 pages, attesting to the editorial labour behind the edition.

Gajendra Thakur's translation follows the principle of being "faithful to meaning but free in verbal expression." It does not deviate in the slightest from the original sequence of arguments, examples, and evidentiary authorities, but its syntax belongs entirely to Maithili's indigenous character.

"Even a thousand craftsmen cannot make cloth out of a pot."

"Inquiry into a useless matter is like examining the teeth of an arrow."

Throughout the review, it should remain clear that, however important the first and second chapters may be, the book's lasting value rests on the actual translated text in its third chapter. That appendix presents, in sequence, adhyāsa and the Catuḥsūtrī-Bhāmatī on Brahma Sūtras 1.1.1–1.1.4.

The chief merit of the translation is that the sequence of reasoning never breaks. However extended the opponent's argument, it has not been artificially shortened. Examples, objections, replies, renewed objections, sūtras, statements of the Bhāṣya, grammatical analyses, and Mīmāṃsā maxims have all been retained. The reader therefore sees not merely "what conclusion Vācaspati reached," but also "how he reached it."

Writing philosophical Maithili presents two dangers: on the one hand, so much Sanskrit weight that Maithili becomes little more than a language of case endings; on the other, so much simplification that distinctions essential to the śāstras disappear. The best passages of this translation avoid both dangers.

A particular achievement is that indigenous expression does not turn into humour or rusticity for its own sake; the dignity of serious philosophical prose remains intact. An expression such as "The blind man holds the hand of another blind man…" communicates the problem of infinite regress more immediately than many Sanskritic definitions.

This translation cannot be classified under either of the two commonplace labels "literal" or "free." Its method is fundamentally a meaning-oriented translation faithful to argument. The source's philosophical progression, opposing positions, examples, and authorities are retained; its Sanskrit sentence construction is not. Thus the translation is faithful to the philosophical architecture of its source without sounding artificial in Maithili.

The temptation to replace every technical term with a wholly indigenous synonym has been resisted. If adhyāsa were translated simply as "superimposition" on every occasion, the conceptual history of the term would be effaced; the same applies to anirvacanīya, pratyabhijñā, kūṭastha, and upādāna. The surrounding Maithili sentence nevertheless unfolds their meanings. Rather than minting wholly new technical terms, the procedure accepts established terms and explains them through Maithili syntax. In practice this approach works well for translating philosophy.

6. A Critical Evaluation in the Light of Indian Literary Theory

6.1. Rasa Theory: The Undercurrent of Śānta Rasa in Philosophical Debate

The rasa theory associated with Bharata, Ānandavardhana, and Abhinavagupta was originally developed for poetry and drama; nevertheless, its use in philosophical prose is not inappropriate, particularly when the subject itself concerns liberation and the stilling of mental activity. In this translation, the supporting determinant (ālambana-vibhāva) is attributeless Brahman, the exciting determinant (uddīpana-vibhāva) is the dialectical movement between objection and established conclusion, and the transitory feelings (vyabhicāri-bhāvas) include intellectual curiosity, wonder, and flashes of humour in Vācaspati's irony. The overarching abiding emotion is śama, tranquillity, the basis of śānta rasa, which reaches fruition in the final description of liberation while living in the Samanvayādhikaraṇa. The translator does not disturb this aesthetic undercurrent; instead the flavour of Maithili idioms—"Barley pudding is not salty"; "Even a thousand scriptures cannot turn a pot into cloth"—irrigates the dryness of debate with liveliness, approaching the quality of mādhurya, sweetness, in Indian poetics.

6.2. Dhvani Theory: The Power of Suggestion in Fidelity to the Text

According to Ānandavardhana's dhvani theory, the soul of poetry lies in suggested meaning (vyaṅgyārtha) beyond literal meaning (vācyārtha). The translator inserts no explanatory commentary at any point: the distinctive doctrines of the Bhāmatī school—ignorance having the individual self as its locus, and realisation arising through reflection—are suggested to the reader through a faithful translation alone. This ideal of the "translator's invisibility," also considered important in Western translation theory (see 6.1), accords with the dual categories of vastu-dhvani and rasa-dhvani in Indian theories of suggestion: while the literal sense of Vācaspati's argument remains, the philosophical intent it suggests emerges spontaneously in the mind of the Maithili reader.

6.3. Vakrokti: Vācaspati's Irony and Its Preservation in Translation

Kuntaka's theory of vakrokti regards "a skilfully inflected expression of word and meaning" (śabdārthayoḥ vaidagdhyabhaṅgībhaṇiti) as the basis of the poetic. Vācaspati's debates make extensive use of figurative obliqueness, as in the sarcastic compliment directed at Nyāya—"Ah! What extraordinary good fortune this poor cognition enjoys, that it attains certainty even by means of falsehood!"—and of sentence-level obliqueness in the handling of objection and reply through an elaborated mode of disputation. Gajendra Thakur's translation brings this art of irony into harmony with Maithili's own capacities for satire, abundant in its traditions of idiom and jest. This demonstrates the translator's sensitivity to vakrokti in both languages.

6.4. Guṇa and Rīti: Prasāda, Mādhurya, and Samatā

Viewed through Vāmana's theory of rīti and the discussions of poetic qualities by Daṇḍin and Bhāmaha, this translation exemplifies prasāda: clarity and ease of expression even in the presence of profound meaning, allowing the most difficult disputation to enter the reader's mind without obstruction. Samatā, the evenness of classical prose—a consistent manner of composition free from display or slackness—is a lasting characteristic of the work. Indigenous expressions such as ijot (light), anhār (darkness), muskī (smile), bāchā (calf), auṅṭhī (ring), keńchulī (slough), bāḅī (anthill), dhuṅdhalakā (dimness), gaṛeriyā (shepherd), bhūśī (husk), okhalī (mortar), julāhā (weaver), and kumhār (potter) convey mādhurya—the quality of sweetness or emotional softness—without allowing excessive rusticity to destroy intellectual seriousness. The result is a delicate balance akin to Bharata's intelligibility of meaning and Daṇḍin's unencumbered clarity.

6.5. Aucitya: Judged by Kṣemendra's Standard

In Kṣemendra's Aucityavicāracarcā, appropriateness of rasa, sense, figure, and expression determines the grace of poetry and, by extension, classical prose. Three decisions of appropriateness are especially notable in this translation: (a) rendering the verses in prose, since precision of philosophical meaning takes precedence over metrical constraint; (b) retaining technical terms—adhyāsa, anirvacanīya, samānādhikaraṇa, pratyabhijñā, kūṭastha, and upādāna—as essential to preserving delicate doctrinal distinctions; and (c) employing vernacular maxims sparingly but accurately, since excess would impair scholarly dignity. All three decisions meet the demands of appropriateness at the levels of sentence, word, and sound.

6.6. Terminological Precision from the Perspective of Navya-Nyāya

From the standpoint of Mithila's own Navya-Nyāya tradition—the Tattvacintāmaṇi lineage of Gaṅgeśa Upādhyāya, with antecedents in Bhāmatī's discussions of erroneous cognition and epistemic validity—the translation deserves particular praise. It preserves the method of testing definitions for overextension, underextension, and impossibility; the strict sequence of reason, probandum, and invariable concomitance; and the disciplined movement of each argument through opponent's thesis, objection, resolution, renewed objection, and established conclusion. Navya-Nyāya's art of constructing definitions, in which every word performs a necessary task and none is superfluous or missing, is reflected in the Maithili syntax. Each transition formula—"The point is—", "Suppose", "What is being said is—"—appears precisely where a logical connection is required, neither more nor less.

7. Evaluation in the Light of Western Literary and Translation Theory

7.1. Foreignisation and Domestication

Applied to this translation, Friedrich Schleiermacher's celebrated distinction of 1813—"Either the translator brings the reader toward the author (foreignising), or brings the author toward the reader (domesticating)"—reveals a subtle hybridity. At the levels of logical structure, order of examples, sequence of evidential authorities, and terminology, the translation is entirely source-faithful and foreignising. In Lawrence Venuti's terms, it "keeps the foreignness of the original visible in the target language," enabling the work to stand as a philosophical text in its own right, not merely as a simplified digest. In its manner of expression, however—syntax, idiom, and cadence—it is thoroughly domesticating, making rich use of Maithili idiom and indigenous vocabulary. The simultaneous presence of these two tendencies without mutual contradiction is arguably the translation's greatest theoretical accomplishment. It shows that foreignisation and domestication need not be incompatible: they may operate together on different levels, content on the one hand and style on the other.

7.2. Nida's Formal and Dynamic Equivalence

Measured against Eugene Nida's distinction between formal equivalence (preserving the structure of the source as far as possible) and dynamic equivalence (creating in the reader of the target language an effect comparable to that of the source), the translation is distinctive in realising both together, where Nida's formulation often presents them as alternatives. The unwavering preservation of argumentative and evidentiary order enacts formal equivalence. Maithilising sentence structure—breaking elaborate Sanskrit compounds into short, conversational sentences—enacts dynamic equivalence, so that a modern Maithili reader experiences the kind of intellectual effect that the Sanskrit original produced upon a reader trained in Sanskrit.

7.3. Gadamer's "Fusion of Horizons" and Benjamin's "The Task of the Translator"

In Hans-Georg Gadamer's hermeneutics, understanding is always a "fusion of horizons": the historical and cultural horizons of reader and text come together to generate new meaning. Bhāmatī operates at a doubled, indeed three-layered hermeneutic level: Śaṅkara's Adhyāsabhāṣya as source text; Vācaspati Miśra's commentary as a ninth-century horizon of interpretation; and Gajendra Thakur's Maithili translation as the third, twenty-first-century horizon. The clear distinction between quotations from the Bhāṣya and the prose of the commentary makes this triple hermeneutic structure transparent. It also accords with Walter Benjamin's argument in "The Task of the Translator": translation should not replace the original, but reveal both original and target language as complementary fragments of a "pure language" (reine Sprache). Here, Maithili becomes a vehicle of the "pure language" of Sanskrit argument rather than its rival.

7.4. Reader-Response Theory

From the standpoint of Wolfgang Iser's and Stanley Fish's reader-response theories, this translation makes the reader an active participant not simply in a conclusion but in the whole process of disputation: opposing thesis, question, answer, renewed question, resolution, and established doctrine. Guiding expressions such as "Suppose" (māno, a translation of Sanskrit nanu) repeatedly invite the reader to assume the opponent's position, thus becoming a participant in filling the textual "gaps" described by Iser. This technique transforms the prose of philosophical controversy from dry informational exposition into a dynamic, almost dramatic intellectual experience.

7.5. New Criticism: Close Reading and Organic Unity

Judged by New Criticism's standards of "close reading" and "organic unity," the translation's internal coherence is particularly noteworthy. The consistent use of technical terms such as aparokṣa, bhedāgraha, and gauṇa-mithyā, established at the outset in the Adhyāsabhāṣya section and sustained through the fourth sūtra, makes the text an organic, self-sufficient whole. The relation between its parts and the complete work accords with the ideal of Cleanth Brooks's "well-wrought urn." From the standpoint of composition, the final sentence's return to the first sūtra is a clear example of ring composition or structural closure, a quality admired by the New Critics.

7.6. The Question of Limits in Comparative Theory

The book assesses the translation through the Indian poetic qualities of prasāda and samatā, along with vakrokti and aucitya. Its discussion of Vācaspati's ironic sentences, the preservation of classical technical vocabulary, and the appropriate placement of indigenous idioms is particularly meaningful. From the standpoint of Western translation thought, it identifies the balance between fidelity to the source and fidelity to the target language, and the hermeneutic challenge presented by the two levels of Bhāṣya and commentary.

The limitation of this critical portion is that it names and describes Western theories but does not undertake an extended comparative dialogue between them and the original text. It is therefore better described as a series of "theoretical indications" than as an independent treatise in comparative theory. Given the book's purpose, this limitation is not fatal.

8. Maithili Letters, Videha, and the Institutional Landscape

> "Vācaspati Miśra was a Maithil": this statement of pride has been repeated often in Maithili, but his works were not available in the language. Gajendra Thakur's translation fills that historical gap and converts cultural pride into a body of texts that can be studied. In the bridge being built from classical Sanskrit works into Maithili through the Videha e-journal (founded in 2000, ISSN 2229-547X) and its book series, the inclusion of so formidable a philosophical work as Bhāmatī demonstrates that Maithili can convey not only songs and stories but also the most rigorous scholarly argument.

Gajendra Thakur has also published a Maithili translation of Gaṅgeśa Upādhyāya's Tattvacintāmaṇi, which this account describes as a supreme work of Nyāya philosophy and a revolutionary step towards restoring Mithila's philosophical inheritance. His contribution to literature is presented as no less remarkable. His extensive Maithili novel Gohi Sabhak Beech Jalsamadhi (A Water Burial Among the Crocodiles) is described as an unusual combination of Nyāya philosophy and a contemporary crime narrative, revealing social and philosophical reality through the metaphor "The crocodile eats the body, not the name."

National institutions such as the Sahitya Akademi have also played an important part in this renaissance of Maithili literature. After Maithili was included in the Eighth Schedule of the Constitution by the Ninety-second Constitutional Amendment of 2003, Maithili literature received wider national recognition. The Sahitya Akademi continues to honour outstanding writing in Maithili. According to the account in the book, the Sahitya Akademi Award for 2025 was given to the senior author Dr Mahendra Jha for his memoir Dhātrī Pāt San Gām, presented as a vivid record of rural life, social organisation, and human feeling. Earlier awards mentioned here include Yashodhar Jha's Mithilā Vaibhav (philosophical essays) in 1966 and Yatri (Nagarjun)'s Patrahīn Nagna Gāch in 1968.

The contribution of institutions such as the National Library, Kolkata, and the Indira Gandhi National Centre for the Arts (IGNCA) to the preservation of Maithili philosophical and literary texts also merits remembrance. The National Library originated in the nineteenth century as the Calcutta Public Library and is described here as India's largest library, preserving more than 2.2 million books and manuscripts. The account states that its Maithili holdings preserve rare and ancient manuscripts including Vidyāpati's Kīrtilatā, Kīrtipatākā, and Puruṣaparīkṣā and Jyotirīśvara Ṭhākura's Varṇaratnākara, indispensable for studying Maithili's early and medieval history. Institutions such as IGNCA and the Asiatic Society are digitising thousands of manuscripts, including philosophical and Tantric works written in the Maithili (Tirhuta) script. These institutional and individual efforts continue to widen the language's intellectual horizon.

There is substance in this argument, since Vācaspati Miśra is a central figure in Mithila's philosophical history. Bringing his work to Maithili readers is not merely a translation; it is a kind of restoration of intellectual history.

9. The Academic Value of the Extensive Bibliography

Chapter Four is not merely a list of names. Each section also explains the usefulness of the works it contains. The material is arranged in sequence: the Maithili edition under review; base texts of the Brahma Sūtras and Śaṅkara's Bhāṣya; Sanskrit editions of Bhāmatī; translations focused on the Catuḥsūtrī; commentaries and subcommentaries; the Vivaraṇa school; other works by Vācaspati; modern studies; histories, methods, and epistemology of Advaita; the Upaniṣads and the Prasthānatrayī; digital collections; and rare or uncertain works.

The bibliography includes Bālaśāstrī's Bibliotheca Indica edition, Jīvānanda Vidyāsāgara's edition, Dhuṇḍhirāja Śāstrī's Kāśī edition, and composite editions containing the Bhāṣya, Bhāmatī, Kalpataru, and Parimala, among others.

The modern scholarship is equally extensive, including Hasurkar, Sahadeva Jha, Rajendra Prasad Dubey, Ranganatha, Rudurmūn, Karl Potter, Hajime Nakamura, Michael Comans, Eliot Deutsch, Anantanand Rambachan, Bina Gupta, and Andrew Fort.

Especially commendable is the caution "full verification required" attached to rare works. For Ābhoga, Ṛjuprakāśikā, Bhāmatībhāvadīpikā, Bhāmatīvivaraṇa, Vedāntakalpatarumañjarī, Bhāmatīvyākhyā, Bhāmatīvilāsa, and other texts, the book does not feign certainty. Instead, it advises verification against manuscript catalogues and institutional records.

Researchers are given useful methodological directions: follow the progression sūtra → Śaṅkara's Bhāṣya → Bhāmatī → Kalpataru → Parimala; specify editions and pages; collate textual variants; compare translations while treating the Sanskrit original as decisive; and never rely upon OCR-extracted text as the sole basis for a direct quotation.

10. The English Latter Half of the Book and Its Bilingual Structure

One important structural feature of this file must be identified: after the Maithili portion ends, the book starts again in English with publication pages, contents, Chapter One, Chapter Two, the complete text concerning the Catuḥsūtrī, and a bibliography. The English contents display the same four-part structure: philosophical study, extensive criticism, an English presentation of the appendix entitled "Pure Maithili Translation of Bhamati," and an extensive bibliography.

The English portion again presents the Bhāmatī–Vivaraṇa comparative table, discussions of adhyāsa, theories of erroneous cognition, inquiry into Brahman, and the Samanvayādhikaraṇa in full. Its concluding English bibliography also repeats modern studies of Bhāmatī and sources in Advaita Vedānta.

This bilingual arrangement has advantages: it makes the material accessible to scholars who do not read Maithili. Nevertheless, there is an editorial problem. The book's principal description presents it as a "translation from Sanskrit into literary Maithili," whereas a substantial latter portion of the file is in English. A future edition would make the actual bilingual structure immediately intelligible by announcing on the cover or publication pages something like "Maithili translation of the original, with an English study and rendering."

There is a second matter. The first two critical chapters in the Maithili and English portions repeat nearly the same structure. This is useful for research but increases the length of a printed 6 × 9-inch hardback. If bilingual presentation is an explicit publishing aim, the arrangement is appropriate; if the main aim is an edition wholly in Maithili, it would be more natural to make the English portion a separate companion volume or edition.

11. Editorial and Textual Refinements

The spelling aparokkṣa occurs seven times in the text, whereas the correct form aparokṣa occurs four times; the two should be made consistent.

The copyright line prints “Preeti Thakar”; the intended form appears to be “Preeti Thakur.”

The numbered account of the three kinds of transformation lacks a short connecting sentence that would make the exposition flow more smoothly.

A future edition could add a Maithili–Sanskrit glossary of technical terms, distinguish sūtra, Bhāṣya, and commentary typographically, and provide an index of adhikaraṇas, making consultation easier for researchers.

In addition, the present file contains some apparent production artefacts: spaces between words sometimes collapse, while letters in headings occasionally appear repeated or separated, as in “anuvā nu da,” “sūtrasū,” and “mūlyā mū ṅkana.” Roman-script material and URLs also appear fragmented in certain places. Some of these defects may be introduced during document text extraction, so they should not all be treated as faults in the original DOCX without inspecting the printed pages. They should, however, be checked in the final visual prepress examination.

12. Critical Limitations and Directions for a Future Edition

Despite the work’s merits, certain limitations are evident. First, there is considerable repetition between Chapters One and Two. Second, the translator himself is also the reviewer within the book, so the critical chapters naturally display a predominantly appreciative tone. A future edition would be stronger academically if it included an independent external scholar’s disagreements, specific Sanskrit textual variants, and line-by-line comparisons with other translations.

Third, the Bhāmatī–Vivaraṇa distinctions, modern translation theory, and comparisons with Western philosophy are useful, but at certain points this broader background depends on classifications made after the original Catuḥsūtrī text. It would therefore be more useful to scholars to distinguish visually three levels: “directly present in the original,” “developed within the later Bhāmatī tradition,” and “modern comparative interpretation.”

Fourth, the structure of the bilingual file needs greater clarity. A preface explaining the English repetition after the Maithili portion, a separate half-title, or an explicit designation “English companion edition” would give readers a clearer sense of direction.

13. Conclusion and Overall Literary-Philosophical Judgment

The value of Bhāmatī (Catuḥsūtrī) does not lie merely in historical pride. The real question is whether Vācaspati Miśra’s complex philosophical disputation can proceed in Maithili without intellectual loss. This book's answer is, for the most part, yes.

The conflict between subject and object in adhyāsa, the status of illusion, and the self-luminosity of the self; qualification, renunciation, action, and knowledge in the first sūtra; the causality of Brahman in the second; the authority of scripture in the third; the rejection of injunction-centred interpretation, object-governed knowledge, the efficacy of statements concerning an already established reality, the non-production of liberation, the dispute over difference and non-difference, and liberation while living in the fourth—all successively test the capacities of philosophical Maithili. The translation repeatedly passes those tests.

Its literary strength lies in the fact that the language does not become lifeless amid the rigour of reasoning. Words such as muskī (smile), ijot (light), anhār (darkness), bhūsī (husk), okhalī (mortar), keñchulī (slough), and bāḅī (anthill) coexist naturally with discussions of Brahman, self, ignorance, liberation, and valid cognition. Philosophy is not thereby "simplified" into the people's language; rather, the people's language proves itself capable of carrying philosophy.

The bibliography raises this translation from an isolated literary accomplishment to a resource for research. By supplying original Sanskrit editions, later commentaries, modern studies, digital collections, and methods of verifying rare works, it enhances the book's academic usefulness.

Taken as a whole, therefore, this is a significant book in three fields: Maithili philosophical prose, literature in translation, and Mithila's intellectual tradition. Its foremost strengths are the unbroken sequence of the source arguments, disciplined use of classical terminology, and natural Maithili prose. Its principal editorial needs are to regularise small textual inconsistencies, remove unnecessary editorial residues, clarify the different functions of Chapters One and Two, visually distinguish sūtra, Bhāṣya, and commentary, and state clearly the publishing design of the Maithili and English halves.

In the final assessment, this is not merely a translation of Bhāmatī; it demonstrates a developed mode of conducting philosophical argument in Maithili prose. Vācaspati's philosophy acquires not simply Maithili words but a Maithili voice.

From the finest debate over theories of erroneous appearance in the Adhyāsabhāṣya to the immense disputation of the Samanvayādhikaraṇa, no link in the reasoning has broken, nor has the language lost its breath. Vācaspati's humble image, "Just as water from the royal road becomes pure when it enters the stream of the Ganges," may be applied in reverse to this translation: the ācārya's Ganges has now come to the roads of Mithila, and every traveller may bathe in it. This work will remain a point of reference for Maithili philosophical literature for a long time, and readers of this edition will naturally await the arrival in Maithili of the rest of Bhāmatī, from the remaining portion of its first chapter through its fourth chapter.

79. Ātmatattvaviveka: An Integrated, Extended Synopsis and Critical Evaluation

Abstract

Philosophical background, Indian and Western literary theory, translation criticism, linguistic achievement and editorial examination. This chapter examines "Ātmatattvaviveka: An Integrated, Extended Synopsis and Critical Evaluation". Its focus is philosophical background, Indian and Western literary theory, translation criticism, linguistic achievement and editorial examination. Udayanācārya's Ātmatattvaviveka, known in the tradition also as Bauddhadhikkāra or Bauddhādhikāra, is a major Nyāya–Vaiśeṣika work of disputation in which Buddhist and Nyāya debates assume an intensely rigorous logical form. Gajendra Thakur's Maithili translation makes the philosophical reasoning of this work accessible in Mithila's modern linguistic sphere. As a genre, it is classical prose founded on a continuous succession of pūrvapakṣa and uttarapakṣa.

1. Introduction and the Work's Overall Character

Udayanācārya's Ātmatattvaviveka—also referred to traditionally as Bauddhadhikkāra or Bauddhādhikāra—is among the important Nyāya–Vaiśeṣika works of philosophical disputation in which debate between Buddhist and Nyāya philosophers assumes an intensely rigorous logical form. Gajendra Thakur's Maithili translation makes the philosophical reasoning of this work accessible within the modern linguistic world of Mithila.

As a genre, this is classical philosophical prose constructed through an unbroken succession of pūrvapakṣa (the opponent's position) and uttarapakṣa (the response). Its four principal fronts examine momentariness, idealism, the alleged identity of a quality and its bearer, and the doctrine of no-self; the inquiry then reaches the self, God, the authority of scripture and liberation. Its final sequence of contemplative stages presents the successive philosophical systems as stages along a path of spiritual practice.

The present expanded publication is not merely a translation but a study edition. It brings together the Maithili translation of the Sanskrit work, philosophical exposition, criticism informed by Indian and Western literary theory, reflection on translation theory, research materials, a substantial subject-annotated bibliography and an English presentation. The publication details give 2004 as the first edition and 2026 as the expanded edition.

This many-layered arrangement enables readers to encounter, in one volume, Udayana's philosophy, its rebirth in Maithili, critical interpretation and research resources. Such breadth is a strength of the work; at the same time, it partly accounts for the repetition of critical material in the original expanded edition.

Even the cover of the opening pages gives visual form to the publication's Mithila-centred cultural purpose. A border inspired by Mithila painting, together with folk motifs of the sun, birds, flowers and elephants, presents the philosophical book as a cultural object rather than a dry academic treatise.

If Sanskrit is the work's original scholarly language, Maithili is a language deeply connected with its geographical and cultural setting. In that sense, the translation becomes a living bridge between the source tradition and contemporary Maithili readers.

2. Historical and Philosophical Background

The intellectual conflict between Nyāya–Vaiśeṣika and Buddhist philosophy in the Indian philosophical tradition was profound, prolonged and marked by remarkable logical sophistication. According to the historical account presented here, the foundations of this great debate had already been laid when Vātsyāyana wrote his commentary on the Nyāya-sūtra in the second century CE and criticised the positions of eminent Mādhyamika and Yogācāra Buddhist philosophers such as Nāgārjuna and Vasubandhu. Later, Buddhist logicians such as Dignāga, Dharmakīrti, Śāntarakṣita and Kamalaśīla mounted sharp attacks on Nyāya–Vaiśeṣika, to which Naiyāyikas such as Uddyotakara, Trilocana and Vācaspati Miśra responded. The account describes Udayanācārya's enduring Ātmatattvaviveka, composed in the tenth or eleventh century on the soil of Kariyan village in Mithila, as the final and decisive culmination of this millennium-long debate.

The central purpose of Udayanācārya's treatise is to examine and refute Buddhist theories of momentariness, idealism, the identity of a quality and its bearer, and no-self, while establishing the reality of the self and God as understood by Nyāya–Vaiśeṣika. The work also prepares an integrated ground for Nyāya and Vaiśeṣika metaphysics.

The intellectual atmosphere of the tenth and eleventh centuries was exceptionally contentious. In the account given here, Udayana's chief Buddhist opponents in this great logical contest were Jñānaśrīmitra and his disciple Ratnakīrti. Jñānaśrīmitra was regarded as a major pillar of Vikramaśīla Mahāvihāra, and the Jñānaśrīmitranibandhāvalī and Ratnakīrtinibandhāvalī contained vigorous critiques of Nyāya–Vaiśeṣika epistemology and metaphysics. In Ātmatattvaviveka, Udayana explicitly names Jñānaśrīmitra and refutes his position. The later eminent Naiyāyika Śaṅkara Miśra, in his Kalpalatā commentary, is said to confirm that Jñānaśrīmitra was a principal target of Udayana's attacks; Kalpalatā refers to him repeatedly. The source narrative goes on to claim that, through this tradition of argument and counterargument, Buddhist philosophers' logical positions were so weakened that the decline of Buddhist logic in India after Udayana became assured.

Udayanācārya's Ātmatattvaviveka is an important transitional point between classical Nyāya and Navya-Nyāya. Its logical subtlety was such, the account argues, that scholars of Mithila and Bengal later built on it in developing Navya-Nyāya. After Gaṅgeśa Upādhyāya composed the Tattvacintāmaṇi in the fourteenth century, the stream of Navya-Nyāya that flowed from it had, in this account, already been seeded in Udayana's work. Subsequently, leading Naiyāyikas such as Pakṣadhara Miśra, Śaṅkara Miśra (Kalpalatā), Raghunātha Śiromaṇi (Dīdhiti), Bhagīratha Ṭhakkura and Mathurānātha Tarkavāgīśa wrote serious commentaries associated with Ātmatattvaviveka, further strengthening its philosophical standing. Gajendra Thakur's Maithili translation presents the difficult meanings of the original to contemporary readers in light of this commentary tradition.

At certain points, the research-based exposition makes the strong historical claim that Udayana's attacks decisively undermined the foundations of Buddhist logic in India. A comprehensive critical perspective, however, requires caution in reading such statements. The historical transformation of Buddhism and Buddhist philosophy resulted from numerous social, institutional, political and intellectual causes. Treating one book as the sole cause risks reducing a complex history to a narrative of victory.

3. Structure, Contents and Character of the Study Edition

The detailed table of contents following the publication details serves as an intellectual map of the volume. In the original expanded edition, literary and cultural criticism is followed by research essays on Nyāya–Vaiśeṣika and Buddhist thought, then more rigorous textual-critical examinations, and thereafter the Maithili translation of the original work's four parts. From the outset, the contents display the complete argumentative journey: momentariness, apoha, idealism, parts and wholes, self, God, scriptural authority and liberation.

The utility of this extensive table of contents is exceptional. Udayana's disputational treatise is by nature a dense web of positions, alternatives, objections, replies, renewed objections and conclusions. Editorial headings make it intelligible. Yet a fundamental editorial question remains: which headings belong to the original Sanskrit text, and which were supplied by the translator-editor? Without a clear indication of the distinction, researchers cannot immediately identify the boundary between translation and interpretation.

In genre, Ātmatattvaviveka is a treatise of philosophical debate. The Maithili edition makes the original's difficult sequence of arguments easier to study by dividing it into four parts and more than 405 subject-specific headings. These guide readers through the closely packed sequence of alternatives, counterpositions, objections, replies and renewed objections. For a research edition, however, original headings and editorial additions must be clearly distinguished.

The Maithili translation of the primary text begins explicitly on Appendix page 79. After the invocatory verses, it proceeds to the questions under consideration, rival doctrines and an examination of the inference offered in support of universal momentariness.

4. Extended Synopsis of the Treatise

4.1 Part One — Refutation of the Doctrine of Momentariness

4.1.1 Invocation, Identification of the Subject and the Question of Establishing Invariable Concomitance

The treatise begins with verses of praise in which Udayana salutes his teachers and chosen deity, setting the stage for the subsequent journey of reasoning. The issue is stated clearly: in the Nyāya–Vaiśeṣika view, the self is an eternal, enduring substance, whereas the Buddhist position vigorously contests this and regards all existents as momentary. The Buddhist side first advances an inference: everything that exists is momentary because existence and momentariness are invariably concomitant (avinābhāva). Udayana attacks the very basis of the inference: the alleged invariable concomitance has not been established, since no valid means of knowledge proves it.

4.1.2 First Series of Refutations of Apoha Theory

The Buddhist side appeals to the theory of apoha, according to which the meaning of a word consists solely in the exclusion of other things, to establish invariable concomitance. Udayana challenges this from several directions. How can different exclusions arise among things that exclude one another? How can partial inclusion and partial exclusion be possible within exclusions? How can distinctions in exclusion be established by differences in adventitious properties? And how can merely distinct cognitions make exclusions distinct? On each of these four questions, the alternatives proposed by the Buddhist side are rejected.

The practical dimension of the apoha controversy is also important. If "cow" means only "not non-cow", one must already possess some positive acquaintance with a cow to understand "non-cow"; the account thus incurs the defect of mutual dependence. In ordinary action, too, a person does not set out to draw water thinking, "This is not a non-pot", but acts on the positive cognition, "This is a pot."

4.1.3 The Debate over Causal Capacity: The Argument from the Necessary Sequence of Cause and Effect

The debate next centres on sāmarthya, the capacity to produce an effect. The Buddhist side argues that a cause's productive capacity can exist in three forms, but Udayana refutes all three in turn. The first is rejected outright; the second receives a detailed refutation involving successive proposals of new proofs and their rejection; a fresh reason is advanced to refute the third, and that reason too is defeated. The meanings of delayed and immediate productivity are clarified. At the conclusion of the inquiry, Udayana examines three possible formulations of the claim that only a productive cause can join with auxiliary causes, drawing out their ironic consequences—including the absurd need to group unrelated things such as donkeys and camels together. Alternative proofs, including an inferential formulation, are advanced for the view that seedhood determines sprouthood; the objection that a seed produces its effect when joined with auxiliary conditions is also answered.

4.1.4 The Argument from Contradiction: One and the Same Thing Cannot Be Both Productive and Unproductive

Udayana now offers a new and forceful argument: one and the same individual thing cannot, at one time, be both productive and unproductive. If a causal entity is unproductive without auxiliary conditions and productive when they are present, it follows on this reasoning that the entity itself has changed—a result directed against the doctrine of momentariness. Different kinds and examples of contradiction are considered, and the first two forms are rejected. Can the same substance possess different magnitudes at different times? This question receives extensive discussion, as do the objections to the coexistence of capacity and incapacity. The possibility of positing a distinct cause for each production at a distinct place, and the pair of inferences proposed to prove the coexistence of contrary properties, are both refuted in detail. Objections concerning inconsistency in the conjunction of auxiliary causes, and concerning that conjunction's non-pervasive occurrence (avyāpyavṛttitva), are also rejected one by one.

4.1.5 Unreal Objects, Absence and the Determinants of Word Meaning

The argument turns to talk about unreal or nonexistent things. Is reference to something unreal, such as a hare's horn, self-contradictory? Can properties be ascribed to what does not exist? Is practice determined by cognition alone? These positions are examined and refuted. A significant subsection identifies and tests what determines the meaning of a word, rejecting the account that makes latent impressions (saṃskāra or vāsanā) the decisive factor. How can the signifying relation of the expression "hare's horn" be known when its referent is unreal? Each proposed answer —including alternative means and individual mental dispositions—is rejected in succession. Next comes the nature of negation or absence: can absence become an object of discourse without valid cognition, and are positive and negative entities merely mutual exclusions? The replies aim to establish the legitimate cognition both of a thing and of its negation.

4.1.6 The Argument from the Necessity of Destruction and Its Many-Sided Refutation

In support of momentariness, the Buddhist side presents a fresh argument: destruction is inevitable; therefore, existence must be momentary. Udayana takes three possible interpretations of this alleged necessity—the identity of destruction and the destroyed object, the necessity of nonexistence, and a final formulation—and refutes each in turn, including its internal alternatives. Several objections and answers concern the relation between destruction and its counterpositive (pratiyogin). The defects of the Buddhist inferences are then systematically identified and logically confirmed. A decisive turn comes when Udayana presents affirmative arguments for the persistence of objects. This is not merely refutation but a constructive proof, and the objections against it are also answered.

A simple illustration in the discussion of destruction is the pot broken by a blow from a stick. If destruction were entirely without cause, the experience of its occurrence at a particular time could not be explained. An experience such as "Now the pot has been destroyed" brings into focus the temporal, causal and counterpositive-relative character of destruction.

4.1.7 Universals (Jāti) and the Renewed, Extended Refutation of Apoha

The final and longest part of this section centres on the reality of universals (jāti or sāmānya). The nature of the common form shared by things is considered, objections advanced in favour of cognition by exclusion are rejected, and the position of the Buddhist master Jñānaśrī—that exclusion is only a secondary object of cognition—is examined and refuted in detail. The account defends the appearance of real universals in determinate cognition. Successive inferential arguments for apoha—including the third and fourth definitions of the reason, Jñānaśrī's inference and various attempts to defend exclusion theory—are individually rejected. Dharmakīrti's view is then examined at length, together with the relation between the universal and the individual. The first part ends by supporting the sense-generated and perceptual character of determinate cognition of universals, disputing the need to accept apoha at all, and offering a final critique of Jñānaśrī's position.

4.2 Part Two — Refutation of Idealism (An Examination of the Denial of External Reality)

4.2.1 Introduction to the Debate and Identification of the Defects in the Idealist Inference

The second part examines Buddhist vijñānavāda—the view that nothing exists outside consciousness. It identifies defects in the idealist inference and develops a detailed refutation of the response offered by the Buddhist master Ratnakīrti, at points employing a style of ironic rejoinder.

4.2.2 The Debate over Variegated Cognition (Citrajñāna)

The philosophical centre of this part is the debate over citrajñāna: the simultaneous apprehension of multiple aspects, such as blue and yellow, within a single cognition. The objection that pure cognition is without differentiation is rejected. So is the claim that the appearance of incompatible qualities in cognition must be illusory. The claim that difference itself is unreal is defended by its proponents and then refuted. Detailed answers are offered to the objection that variegated cognition is neither different nor identical, and to the claim that its variegated character transcends every determination. This subsection ends with the final examination and rejection of Ratnakīrti's position.

The difference between cognition and its object is also clarified through an experience such as "I see blue": "I" is the knower, cognition is what reveals, and blue is the object known. Meaningful action is directed towards an external object, thereby strengthening the defence of an object of knowledge distinct from cognition itself.

4.2.3 The Relation between Cognition and the Known, and a Review of Various Philosophical Positions

The question now becomes: what is wrong with an object distinct from cognition being cognition's object? The account defends generic similarity in the cognition of an object, proposes and rejects successive definitions of knowability, and ultimately also explains the Vedānta position. It then defends the Nyāya–Vaiśeṣika account of the relation of cognition, rejects the Sāṃkhya and related views concerning the locus of cognition, and examines the contradictory character attributed to the Buddhist view before concluding with the purpose of Nyāya propositions. This subsection ends by rejecting the reasons advanced in negative inferences and the examples used within those inferences.

4.2.4 The Reality of a Composite Substance: The Debate over Atomism

The most extensive and logically dense part of this section establishes the reality of the composite object (avayavin), a whole such as a pot. The Buddhist side regards such a thing as merely an aggregate of atoms and denies the separate reality of the whole. Objections to the reality of difference are followed by successive defences of different accounts of difference—the first, second and third. The seventh and eighth theses receive defence and partial acceptance. There follows a series of objections to the reality of the whole—first, second, third and others—and their refutation. This pattern recurs across several subcycles: new objections founded on denying atoms, a refutation of the Mādhyamika or emptiness-based position, rejection of the claim that the cognition of gross magnitude is false, defence and criticism of the recognition of unity among atoms, discussion of the claim that imperceptible atoms cannot be perceived, and the thesis that gross magnitude determines sensory accessibility. The overall conclusion is that none of the objections to the reality of external composite objects withstands scrutiny. The section closes by rejecting an argument constructed through a conditional reversal of consequences and an insistence on inferential proof of the composite object.

The question of the gross, visible object becomes decisive in the debate over wholes. If a pot were merely an aggregate of invisible atoms, how could the simple collection of many invisible parts produce visible grossness? The Nyāya side explains gross magnitude as a new property of the whole arising from the conjunction of its parts.

4.2.5 A General Objection to External Objects and the Debate over Intrinsic Validity

A general objection to the reality of external objects is introduced and rejected, followed by a defence of the possibility of false determinate cognition and a rival explanation of ignorance of difference, which is itself answered. After rejecting the extreme alternative that “all cognition is false”, the discussion turns to svataḥprāmāṇya—the claim that cognition reveals its own validity and needs no external warrant. This position is defended; two successive objections to it are raised and rejected. A rival theory, according to which truth is known through reflective or second-order cognition (parāmarśajñāna), receives extended criticism, including an answer to why a duality of truth and falsity need not arise within such reflection. The second part concludes with an explanation of the distinction between waking and dreaming.

4.3 Part Three — The Dispute over the Difference between Qualities and Their Substantial Substratum

This is the shortest of the four parts, but it is no less tightly argued. The Buddhist challenge is that if qualities—colour, touch and the like—and their substratum, substance, are held to be identical, the independent existence of a substance such as the self disappears, leaving only momentary cognitions. Udayana takes the reidentification of the same object by sight and touch as evidence, proposes five possibilities—a single quality, an aggregate of qualities, an entity distinct from its qualities, an unreal form, and a wholly nonexistent entity—and considers and rejects the alternatives in sequence. Four possible grounds for grouping qualities —a common substratum, simultaneity, a common effect and a common cause—are examined and rejected; the third overall possibility, that a substance is the substratum of its qualities, is accepted. Proofs advanced for the identity of qualities and substratum, including an example of a white conch appearing yellow because of a disorder of bile, are refuted in detail. Differences in the clarity or indistinctness of an object seen from near and far are then used to confirm the distinction between substance and quality. The part ends with a subtle question concerning the relation between indeterminate and determinate cognition, preparing the ground for what follows.

4.4 Part Four — Refutation of No-Self, Proof of the Self and God, and the Question of Liberation

4.4.1 Refutation of the Proof That "The Self Is Not Known"

The final and most extensive part begins with the Buddhist side's central claim: the self is not known and therefore does not exist. Udayana treats the inference as dependent on the Buddhists' own assumptions and shows that its reason, non-apprehension, is vitiated by dependence on the very self whose existence is at issue. Nyāya–Vaiśeṣika explicitly regards the self as knowable and directly apprehensible; hence, on Udayana's analysis, the inference collapses in the face of assumptions not shared by the opponent.

4.4.2 Proof of Self-Cognition and Its Defence

Evidence for the reality of the self is presented and defended. The objection that the self must be unreal because the external senses do not know it is rejected: such reasoning would also deprive consciousness's self-awareness of a foundation. The alternative that the body itself might be the object of self-knowledge is likewise rejected. So is the Yogācāra

Buddhist contention that consciousness itself is the self. Udayana develops a parallel argument from the expressions "I cut" and "I know" to establish a distinction between the agent (self) and the act (cognition).

The proof of the self in the fourth part reaches the immediate awareness "I exist". This awareness is regarded as neither merely verbal, nor inferential, nor simply a memory: it is invoked in defence of a direct apprehension of the self.

4.4.3 Recognition as an Inference: Proof of the Self's Unity

The chief inference establishing the self is based on recognition (pratyabhijñā): the identification of one and the same object through distinct experiences such as seeing and touching. Objections to its validity —including the apparently deceptive recognition of one continuously burning lamp flame—receive detailed replies. A prolonged debate follows over the definition of material causation and the relation between cause and effect. Through examples involving teacher and pupil, the newborn child's memory of a previous life, the causal relation of pot and shards, and the transformation of wood into charcoal, the discussion seeks to show that momentariness cannot adequately explain genuine material causation, whereas a doctrine of the enduring self can. Further proofs of the identity of the agent, supported by reasoning from the reversal of an undesirable consequence (prasaṅga-viparyaya), carry the argument forward.

The argument from memory and recognition also bears on moral continuity. If the agent who performs an action and the experiencer who receives its result are wholly distinct momentary beings, the defects of kṛtapraṇāśa—the loss of the fruit of an action one has performed—and akṛtābhyāgama—receiving the fruit of an action one has not performed—arise. Thus the question of the self becomes not only metaphysical but also one of moral accountability.

4.4.4 The Need for Self-Knowledge and the Proof of Discriminative Knowledge of Self and Non-Self

After raising and refuting two successive objections to the necessity of self-knowledge, Udayana turns to scriptural evidence in support of discriminative knowledge of self and non-self. Scriptural support is supplied for the position, setting the stage for a proof of the authority of scripture that will be connected to the subsequent argument for God.

4.4.5 The Proof of God: An Inferential Argument for a Creator

The most philosophically ambitious part of this section is the proof of God. Three successive objections to the inference are presented and rejected, and an extensive response is given to the fundamental objection that knowledge of invariable concomitance is impossible. The argument that being embodied is a limiting condition (upādhi) of agency, and that creation therefore cannot establish God's existence, is refuted; second and third objections to the invariable concomitance are also rejected. After the form of the concomitance required by inference is clarified, three successive matters are examined: refutation of the position that God is not omniscient, demonstration of the authority of scripture and proof of divine omniscience. A subtle discussion of the sense of the word "greatness" and the claim that scriptural authority receives support from an immemorial tradition bring the section to its conclusion.

The well-known inference for God, "kṣityādikaṃ sakartṛkaṃ kāryatvāt ghaṭavat", means that the earth and similar things are effects and therefore raise the question of a maker, just as a pot has a potter. Whether embodiment is an indispensable condition of agency, the roles of cognition, desire and effort, omniscience, invariable concomitance and limiting conditions—all these make the argument considerably more complex than the simple example of pot and potter.

The example of medical science is used in the discussion of scriptural authority to elucidate the relation among a trustworthy speaker, successful practice and reliable testimony. Here the Nyāya–Vaiśeṣika conception of scripture as divinely authored emerges as distinct from the Mīmāṃsā doctrine of its non-human authorship (apauruṣeyatva).

4.4.6 Extended Examination of the Nature of Liberation

The discussion of liberation is among the most moving parts of the treatise, philosophically as well as literarily. Liberation is defined as the final and complete cessation of suffering from the self's condition, and the delicate question is raised whether cessation of suffering is desired for the sake of obtaining pleasure. Udayana here offers a profound reflection on the balance of pleasure and suffering: "Suffering is not always accompanied by a means to pleasure, but pleasure is commonly surrounded by means to suffering." Even a thing earned legitimately may contain only a small spark of pleasure, while gaining and protecting it brings innumerable days of suffering. The images of food mixed with honey and poison, and of the farmer separating grain from husk, reinforce the argument. The claim that pleasure is eternal is then refuted at length, and a subtle analysis of the eternity or non-eternity of cognition and pleasure culminates in the conception of liberation as the self's abiding in its own nature.

In Nyāya–Vaiśeṣika, apavarga signifies the final cessation of suffering. A comparative table in the work also characterises it as the complete ending of twenty-one kinds of suffering. Since pleasurable experience is held to depend on conjunction among body, mind and senses, liberation is presented not as the eternal experience of positive pleasure but as the cessation of suffering and the self's remaining in its own nature.

4.4.7 Stages of Meditation: An Unusual Conclusion Bringing the Philosophical Systems Together

The conclusion of the treatise is distinctive in the history of Indian philosophy. Describing successive stages of meditation on the self, Udayana presents the whole Indian philosophical tradition as steps along a single path of practice: at the first stage, inquiry into external objects (Mīmāṃsā and Cārvāka); at the second, the self is identified with all objects (the Tridaṇḍin view and Yogācāra Buddhism); at the third, the self is contemplated as the exclusion of all reality (Brahman-transformation theory and Buddhist emptiness or no-self); at the fourth, the self is distinguished from the world (Sāṃkhya); at the fifth, the self is treated as the sole reality (Advaita); and finally, once all latent impressions are erased, there is indeterminate knowledge of the pure self, which Nyāya calls the crowning stone of the city of liberation. Upaniṣadic statements are cited in support of and opposition to each stage. The ladder thus respects every philosophy from Cārvāka to Advaita as offering a partial glimpse of truth, while finally settling on the Nyāya understanding of indeterminate self-knowledge.

4.4.8 Closing Verse

The treatise closes with a sharp and confident verse. Udayana portrays himself as a guide to those wandering in the darkness of many rival doctrines; with the ironic simile that a painter gains no honour from the praise of a crowd of blind people, he declines unqualified admiration. The work is offered instead with the scholar's humility of taking pleasure when the learned identify its defects.

5. The Philosophical Unity of the Work and Its Narrative of Reasoning

The four parts are not separate controversies. An unfolding philosophical design connects them.

Momentariness challenges persistence; apoha challenges positive universals and linguistic reality; idealism challenges the external object of knowledge; the reduction of substance to a collection of qualities challenges substance itself; and no-self challenges the enduring knower. At each stage, Udayana first safeguards an entity without which the question at the next stage could not even arise.

If objects persist, causation becomes possible. If there is an external object of knowledge, the relation between cognition and object is meaningful. If substance exists, qualities have a substratum. If a self endures through time, memory, action and liberation are possible. God and scripture then provide a foundation for a larger cosmic order and the path to liberation.

The title Ātmatattvaviveka therefore does not refer only to the fourth part: all the preceding arguments prepare the ground for discriminative understanding of the self.

The treatise's structure may be read as a recurring cycle: "thesis → objection → question → alternative → refutation → example → conclusion". Its narrative is not driven by events but by the progressive refinement of arguments. From momentary entities to enduring objects, from consciousness to external knowables, from qualities to substance, from a succession of fleeting cognitions to the self, from self to God, and ultimately to liberation: this ascent forms a continuous intellectual narrative.

6. Criticism in the Light of Indian Literary Theory

Although the work is not primarily poetry, its dialogue, irony, examples, metaphors, questions and answers, and underlying orientation towards liberation fully justify literary analysis. Udayana's arrangement of arguments creates the experience of a "drama of knowledge": the recurring rhythm of thesis, objection, counterquestion, alternative, refutation and conclusion generates dramatic tension.

6.1 The Question of Rasa

According to Abhinavagupta, śānta-rasa is the ground or underlying basis of all rasas because it is associated with liberation as a human goal. The dominant enduring disposition of Ātmatattvaviveka is an inquiry into reality rooted in detachment (nirveda). The treatise begins with a longing for the absolute cessation of suffering and ends with indeterminate self-knowledge, the crowning stone of the city of liberation. In this view, the argumentative journey across all four parts supplies the determinants of śānta-rasa, and each exchange of attack and reply functions like a transitory state contributing to that supreme tranquillity.

Yet within śānta as the governing rasa, an intellectual form of vīra-rasa —what might be called the heroic rasa of reasoning or knowledge—pulses throughout. Its enduring disposition is energy and resolve: the systematic defeat of each alternative, the firm one-word blow "No", and the deployment of prasaṅga-viparyaya fill the prose with force. Humour and irony are also far from absent. Describing the acceptance of incompatible cognitions as giving birth to "a monster that itself destroys all those cognitions", or comparing an impossible grouping to donkeys and camels, displays a wit uncommon in scholastic prose. The fourth part's discussion of liberation also offers a distinct glimpse of karuṇa-rasa: the portrayal of a world rich in suffering, and statements such as "even heavenly pleasure is pierced through by the arrows of suffering", reveal a deep sense of dispassion towards the transience of worldly existence.

The concept of "heroism in reasoning" is critically productive, but it must not become a proclamation of sectarian victory. Language such as "complete and final defeat" diminishes historical complexity. A clear distance must be maintained between the heroic quality of literature and claims made in historiography.

6.2 The Question of Dhvani

By Ānandavardhana's criteria, scholastic works generally fall into the category of citra, in which the literal meaning predominates over suggestion. Yet several levels of vastu-dhvani are active in Ātmatattvaviveka. The first is a suggestion of the dignity of the self: the implied meaning of the entire sequence of refutations is that human recognition, memory, agency and moral responsibility depend on the self's endurance; to accept momentariness would be to negate every experience of one's life. The second concerns the relation between language and reality: the critique of apoha suggests that words are connected not merely to negation but to real being. The third and deepest suggestion lies in the architecture of the stages of meditation. The refutation of an earlier philosophical system need not amount to its wholesale dismissal, but can acknowledge a partial truth and transcend it. This structure suggests that truth is a progressive, cumulative process and that the Indian philosophical traditions participate in a single, integrated journey. Such an implication is never directly asserted in those words, yet it emerges from the design of the conclusion and constitutes one of the treatise's most far-reaching meanings.

A modern level of suggestion concerns the philosophical capacity of Maithili itself. Terms such as apoha, avinābhāva, sahopalambha, pratyabhijñā, anyonyābhāva, upādhi, savikalpaka and nirvikalpaka become active within Maithili syntax, suggesting that the language can do more than describe philosophy: it can itself become a medium for philosophical argument.

6.3 The Question of Vakrokti

In the terms of Kuntaka's theory of vakrokti, the dominant obliqueness of this work lies in the ordering of episodes and the construction of sentences. The sequence of questions and answers—"Should one accept that ...? No."—does not permit the reader to remain a passive listener. After each "Should ...?", readers think briefly about an answer of their own; Udayana's subsequent "No" then confronts them with the inadequacy of that inference. The unending alternation of pūrvapakṣa and uttarapakṣa—an objection to an answer already given, its renewed refutation and another objection in turn—weaves a web of structural obliqueness in which readers can never be certain where an argument will stop. Figures of speech include abundant examples (seed and sprout, rope and snake, the fool who mistakes an elephant at a palace gate for a dark cloud or shadow, the natural enmity of snake and mongoose, and the white conch appearing yellow because of a disorder of bile); metaphors become dense at the close ("the crowning stone of the city of liberation", "an arrow that strikes its target"); and the final verse possesses the flavour of ironic praise. The painter gains no dignity from the admiration of the blind: instead of mere self-celebration, the image demands competence from the reader.

6.4 Guṇa, Rīti and Aucitya

In terms of stylistic qualities, Udayana's prose displays both ojas (vigour) and prasāda (lucidity). Vigour predominates in the passages of refutation, where the recurrent "No" falls like a thunderbolt; lucidity and sweetness characterise the discussion of liberation and the verses of praise. Judged by Kṣemendra's criterion of propriety (aucitya), each technical expression—avinābhāva, apoha, sahopalambha, prasaṅga-viparyaya, upādāna-kāraṇa, savikalpaka–nirvikalpaka, parasparāśraya and anyathānupapatti—appears in a context appropriate to its precise sense. The rigour of scholastic prose is therefore protected even as each argumentative stage maintains dramatic movement. From the standpoint of rīti, the work approaches the Vaidarbhī manner: brief, clear sentences with few compounds, preventing the subtleties of reasoning from becoming burdensome.

The obliqueness of question and answer is also a stylistic achievement of the translation. Short signals such as "What?", "No", "Then?" and "But?" lend a Maithili orality to Sanskrit disputation. Technical terms have not been forcibly replaced by homely synonyms; their historically distinctive meanings are therefore preserved.

6.5 Figures of Speech and Poetic Indication

Finally, the close relation between figures of meaning—illustration, metaphor, ironic praise and the presentation of a supporting meaning—and the logical architecture of Ātmatattvaviveka lies in their status as more than decoration. They become parts of proof: an illustration is itself a miniature argument; a metaphor condenses a conclusion. In this respect, the treatise is a rare instance of Indian śāstra literature in which reasoning and poetic expression become inseparable within the same sentence.

7. Western Literary Theory and a Comparative Philosophical Rereading

7.1 Socratic–Platonic Dialectic and Dramatic Dialogue

As in Plato's Dialogues, truth emerges in Ātmatattvaviveka not through direct proclamation but through elenchus, the Socratic procedure of questions and counterquestions that exposes internal inconsistency in an opponent's view. Each of Udayana's "No" replies works like the moment of a Socratic elenchus when an interlocutor is forced to recognise the contradiction in their own claim. There is, however, an important difference. Platonic dialogues often end with an unresolved question, or aporia; Udayana's treatise begins with such uncertainty but concludes by establishing determinate doctrines—the self, God and liberation. In that respect it approaches Aristotle's systematic treatise more closely than Platonic dialogue, although its dramatic form, with the imagined opponent's voice and recurring exchange of questions, remains Platonic in character.

7.2 Aristotle's Rhetoric and Poetics

All three means of persuasion described in Aristotle's Rhetoric—ethos (the credibility of the speaker), pathos (the audience's emotional involvement) and logos (logical demonstration)—can be discerned in Ātmatattvaviveka. Logos is naturally predominant: inference, reasons and examples follow the structure of Nyāya reasoning. Ethos arises from Udayana's repeated and apparently fair presentation of the opposing view. Rather than weakening the opponent's position before attacking it, he seeks to state it in its strongest form and only then refute it—a practice that might now be called steel-manning. Pathos, through irony, examples and the emotional appeal of the discussion of liberation (especially its account of pervasive suffering), connects the purely logical genre with the reader's feeling. A philosophical counterpart of catharsis, as described in Aristotle's Poetics as the purgation of pity and fear at the end of tragedy, may also be discerned here. After the prolonged and often painful journey of objection and reply, the movement towards the indeterminate tranquillity of liberation functions as a kind of intellectual catharsis in which the reader passes through the "fear" of logical conflict into the calm of self-knowledge.

7.3 Bakhtin's Dialogism and Polyphony

Seen through Mikhail Bakhtin's theories of dialogism and polyphony, Ātmatattvaviveka is an unusual text. For Bakhtin, in a fully dialogical work different voices converse on terms of relative equality, with no voice wholly subordinating all others. In Udayana's work, the Buddhist pūrvapakṣa—the views of Ratnakīrti, Jñānaśrī and Dharmakīrti—does not enter merely as a puppet set up to be knocked down. These arguments are presented with their own philosophical seriousness and internal logic; in several places, the succession of layered objections and replies is so extended that a reader may temporarily entertain the possibility of victory for the Buddhist side. This tension prevents the work from being a one-sided sermon and gives it the character of genuine philosophical combat, a dialectical agon. Nevertheless, it is not fully polyphonic in Bakhtin's sense, as a Dostoevskian novel might be, since the authorial position—Udayana's established doctrine—ultimately wins decisive authority. The combination of a dialogic process and a monologic conclusion may be considered a distinctive feature of classical disputational literature.

7.4 Formalism, New Criticism and Reader Response

From the perspective of the Russian Formalist concept of literariness, the literary effect of Ātmatattvaviveka owes less to its subject matter than to its devices, especially defamiliarisation (ostranenie). The recurrent form of question and reply produces a rhythmic experience in which every blow of "No" surprises the reader anew, even when the structure of the argument has become predictable. Through the close-reading method of New Criticism, the work may be considered self-contained: the internal tension and resolution of each paragraph (objection versus answer) can be analysed as a small unit reflecting the structure of the book as a whole—the part mirrors the whole. Reader-response theory, particularly Wolfgang Iser's account of gaps or Leerstellen, illuminates the demand for active participation made by the question-and-answer style. Every brief pause after "Could it be ...?" creates a gap that the reader fills with a provisional answer; the collision between that imagined answer and the answer given by the text becomes central to the reading experience.

7.5 Poststructuralism and Deconstruction

Derridean deconstruction brings out an intriguing paradox. Udayana's entire method is itself centred on refutation: it exposes internal contradictions in the opponent's concepts—for example, between momentariness and invariable concomitance, or between apoha and difference—and dismantles them. The procedure bears a structural resemblance to deconstruction, even though its aim is contrary. Derrida does not arrive at a stable final truth after dismantling a conceptual structure; Udayana uses refutation as the means of establishing one. The distinction reveals, in the critic's account, a significant difference between these intellectual orientations. Indian methods of refutation, such as Nāgārjuna's consequential reasoning or Udayana's critique of inference, often proceed dialectically towards a positive establishment, whereas postmodern deconstruction deliberately remains open to indeterminacy or aporia. The comparison assigns the treatise a distinctive place in conversation with international literary theory.

By Bakhtin's criteria, the opposing position receives a substantial voice, but the final authority belongs to the answer or siddhānta. Thus the work is not fully polyphonic; it is a Nyāya-centred work with a dialogic structure —a dialogic process leading to a monologic conclusion.

Structurally, the oppositions enduring/momentary, cognition/known object, substance/quality, part/whole, self/non-self and truth/error bind the four parts together. Udayana reaches the internal inconsistency of an opponent's thesis and refutes it, but he does not stop at Derridean undecidability: he proceeds to positive establishment. It is therefore meaningful to describe the work as possessing a "deconstructive method with a non-deconstructionist conclusion."

7.6 Hermeneutics, Phenomenology and Reader Participation

Memory, recognition and a structure of experience such as "I, who experienced something yesterday, remember it today" offer useful material for a phenomenological study of self-experience through time. Yet Udayana's realist proof of a substantial self and modern phenomenology are not the same thing. The comparison is fruitful at the level of questions, not as a claim of doctrinal identity.

From a reader-response perspective, the questions and answers engage readers as participants. Nonetheless, editorial headings such as "unacceptable", "refutation" and "defect" may reduce the space for independent discovery by announcing conclusions in advance.

7.7 Comparative Philosophy

Recognition can be read alongside Western discussions of personal identity; the critique of idealism alongside debates about idealism; apoha alongside nominalism and realism; and the proof of God alongside arguments from design. The controversy over apoha recalls questions about nominalism and realism raised by Quine and Goodman. The distinction between cognition and its object enters into dialogue with G. E. Moore's anti-idealist arguments. Memory and recognition touch territory explored in John Locke's and Derek Parfit's discussions of personal identity. The argument from the created character of the world may be set beside William Paley's design argument.

These are primarily similarities of questions, however, rather than similarities of answers. The enduring self of Indian Nyāya, the Buddhist stream of cognitions, modern psychological continuity and Western theories of personal identity arise from different metaphysical backgrounds. Comparative reading opens horizons; it does not establish direct doctrinal equivalence.

8. Indian Perspectives on Translation: Intended Meaning, Vernacular Commentary and Maithilisation

The book understands translation not merely as the rendering of words but as an interpretation of intended meaning (tātparya) and a commentary in the target language. This approach suits the task. The translator preserves the original sequence of reasoning but unfolds lengthy Sanskrit constructions into Maithili sentences, supplies topical headings and gives the arguments an audible form through questions and replies.

A significant achievement lies in combining the foreignness of technical terminology with the local character of syntax. The word apoha is retained, but it is surrounded by Maithili sentences. Pratyabhijñā remains, while the argument from memory is developed in phrases drawn from Maithili experience. Thus the source tradition is not erased, nor does the target language become merely Sanskrit's shadow.

A distinctive feature of the translation is precisely this coexistence of specialised foreignness and syntactic domestication. Terms such as apoha and pratyabhijñā are protected, while their arguments unfold through Maithili statements of experience, question-and-answer constructions and natural connective words. The project is less a word-for-word translation than a Maithilisation of reasoning.

9. In the Light of Western Translation Theory

9.1 Foreignisation and Domestication

Viewed through Friedrich Schleiermacher and Lawrence Venuti, this translation pursues both routes at once. At the terminological level it foreignises, requiring the reader to enter Udayana's conceptual world. At the level of sentences and examples it domesticates: references to a threshing floor, donkeys and camels, and expressions such as "dear brother" make Udayana seem to speak in a Maithili courtyard. The translator does not become invisible; instead, linguistic barriers are lowered while the intellectual challenge is kept intact.

9.2 Dynamic Equivalence, the Balance between Semantic and Communicative Translation, and Purpose

By Eugene Nida's criterion of dynamic equivalence, this is a hybrid translation. It maintains formal fidelity in the structure of the arguments, yet employs dynamic equivalence at the level of sentences so that Maithili readers may experience an effect comparable to that experienced by Sanskrit-literate readers of the original. In Peter Newmark's terms, it balances semantic and communicative translation. According to Reiss and Vermeer's skopos theory, the purpose is twofold: to give Maithili the resources of philosophical prose, and to provide Maithili researchers with a gateway into their own tradition. Its section headings and well-structured divisions make the book suitable for self-directed study.

9.3 Steiner's Four Movements and Benjamin's Afterlife

George Steiner's four movements of translation—trust, aggression, incorporation and restitution—can be identified in the translation. There is the translator's trust that this ancient work is meaningful to Maithili readers; the breaking of the original's continuous prose into 405 divisions (aggression); the incorporation of technical terminology into Maithili sentences; and the final restitution of an expanded life to Ātmatattvaviveka. In Walter Benjamin's account, translation constitutes the afterlife (Fortleben) of an original. Benjamin's belief that accomplished translation presses both source and target language towards a "pure language" is seen here as pertinent to the work's achievement.

The ideas of Steiner and Benjamin open culturally attractive routes of comparison. Methodologically, however, it is more cautious to use them as tools for comparative reading than to treat them as doctrines identical with those of the Indian translation tradition.

9.4 Polysystems, Rewriting and Retrieval

From the perspectives of André Lefevere's theory of rewriting and Itamar Even-Zohar's polysystem theory, this autonomous publication outside major institutions through the Videha e-journal constitutes a cultural and political statement. By filling what had largely been an empty place for philosophical prose within the Maithili literary system, the translation moves that genre towards the centre. It is more than one book: it establishes a prose register for future philosophical writing in Maithili. Ganesh Devy's understanding of "translation as retrieval" is particularly applicable here. Udayana had become little more than a name in Mithila's intellectual memory; the translation makes that name into a readable text once again.

9.5 Criteria Drawn from Toury, House and Berman

The translation may be understood as a combination of semantic transfer, communicative rephrasing and explanatory presentation. The coexistence of these three elements offers a useful account of the work's actual character.

From Gideon Toury's target-text perspective, acceptability in Maithili is successful, while source-oriented adequacy is preserved by technical vocabulary. Without a parallel Sanskrit base text, however, it is difficult to check fully whether anything was omitted, whether anything was added, and whether headings are original or editorial.

Juliane House's criterion for overt translation is also relevant. Historical distance has not been erased, but transparency remains incomplete without details of the base edition, textual variants and editorial interventions.

In the light of Antoine Berman's deforming tendencies, broad section headings undoubtedly make the argument easier to navigate, but they can also announce the original's uncertainties or gradually emerging conclusions prematurely. For a research edition, the neutral heading "Examination of the first alternative" would be preferable to "The first alternative is unacceptable."

10. The Achievement of Maithili and the Translator's Style

The work's most lasting achievement may be not any single philosophical conclusion but its practical demonstration of what Maithili philosophical prose can do.

The translation shows that Maithili can sustain extended divisions among alternatives, analyses of cause and effect, fallacies of inference, mutual dependence, memory, perception, inference, absence, universals, God and liberation in a continuous scholarly argument. Natural Maithili connectives—"but", "therefore", "then", "if … then", "or", "whether" and "no"—carry complex Nyāya constructions.

What matters especially is that Sanskrit terminology does not displace Maithili grammar. The skeleton of the sentence is Maithili; the Sanskrit technical term is its conceptual centre. This balance prevents the result from being either an artificial shadow of Sanskrit or oversimplified prose that sacrifices philosophical precision.

The translator's distinctive achievement may be seen in four aspects:

- Activating a philosophical vocabulary in Maithili: Sanskrit terms such as avinābhāva, pratyabhijñā and savikalpaka function within Maithili syntax.
- Controlling the weight of Sanskrit: while the conceptual centre remains Sanskrit-derived, verbs, connectives and relational expressions belong to Maithili, allowing the text to stand as independent Maithili prose.
- Giving logic an oral form: cues such as "What?", "No", "Very well", "Then" and "But" generate the audible rhythm of philosophical debate.
- A syntax of alternatives: connectives such as "otherwise", "or" and "whether … or" enable readers to follow the structure of an argument without a diagram.

For this reason, the work's most lasting linguistic achievement is not the discovery of an equivalent for any one word but the sustained movement of extended Nyāya reasoning through Maithili sentence structures.

11. Literary Images and Udayana's Authorial Personality

Seed and sprout, pot and stick, the hare's horn, elephant, physician, blind people, painter, pleasure and suffering, the city of liberation, and arrows: if these examples were removed, the treatise might retain its logical force but would become poor as literature.

An important strength of the translation is that it does not treat these as "mere logical illustrations" but preserves their narrative energy. Humour and irony in particular bring Udayana's disputational personality into view. The reader thus encounters not a lifeless collection of formulas but the experience of a living philosophical debate.

Some examples whose severity, sectarian character or treatment of women reflects their historical period call for editorial annotation for modern readers. Such passages should not be deleted, since they form part of the historical source; it should, however, be made clear that they represent the period-bound polemical language of the original, not necessarily the values endorsed by a modern editor or translator.

12. Linguistic, Editorial and Research Limitations

The main weaknesses of the present book appear less in the translation's fundamental capabilities than in its editorial arrangement and transparency for researchers.

12.1 Base Edition and Source Transparency

Many Sanskrit editions are listed in the bibliography, but the principal base edition used for translation needs to be identified explicitly. Without the Sanskrit original printed in parallel, it is difficult to investigate fully whether something was omitted or added and whether a heading is original or editorial.

12.2 Distinguishing the Original Text from Editorial Headings

The more than 405 headings make the work easier to study, but original Sanskrit headings and those added by the translator-editor should be separately marked. A neutral research-edition heading such as "Examination of the first alternative" would be more appropriate than "The first alternative is unacceptable", since it does not announce a conclusion prematurely.

12.3 Language Policy and Consistency of Form

A consistent editorial policy is needed for variants such as khaṇḍ/khaṇḍa, the use of hyphens in compounds, certain spellings, and verb forms corresponding to “can be”. In the Maithili critical sections, an excess of Roman-letter English expressions interrupts the flow of prose that is predominantly in Devanagari. Names of Western theories should be retained where necessary, while Maithili or Devanagari renderings of technical concepts may be made primary.

12.4 Panegyrical Historical Narration

Expressions such as “utter refutation”, “the end of Buddhist logic through one work” and “epoch-making” can move critical inquiry towards panegyric. Udayana’s philosophical importance can be acknowledged without sacrificing the multi-causal complexity of history.

12.5 Tools for Study

A fully international study edition would benefit from an explicit identification of the Sanskrit base text, selected Sanskrit passages, textual variants, markings of words and headings added by the translator, a technical glossary, a subject index and, if possible, the numbering of the original textual sections. These omissions do not diminish the readability or philosophical capacity of the translation; they concern the verifiability of research.

13. Extended Bibliography, English Half and Research Resources

At the end of the Maithili section stands an extensive, subject-arranged annotated bibliography containing ninety-nine entries. It begins with the Sanskrit original, major editions, commentaries and translations, and extends to Udayana’s other works, Nyāya–Vaiśeṣika, Buddhist logic, theories of the self, Indian poetics, translation theory, and digital manuscript resources. The bibliography also explains its own purpose.

Its final entry reaches the National Mission for Manuscripts, and an editorial note clearly states that, when preparing a critical edition, Sanskrit quotations should be checked against the printed original or a reliable manuscript.

Earlier criticism of the reference list had raised issues such as the presence of Wikipedia, commercial booksellers and general websites. The present final bibliography, however, is more refined, with ninety-nine organised entries and notes explaining their use. The portions of the older criticism that no longer apply to this version should therefore be updated in a subsequent edition.

At approximately page 291, the publication information begins again in English, restating details of the Sanskrit source, the Maithili translator and the expanded edition.

This is followed by a substantial English table of contents, critical essays, an English presentation of the original translation, and a comprehensive bibliography. The sequence places the reviews, critical studies, English presentation of the philosophical text and bibliography in an orderly arrangement.

The benefit of such a bilingual structure is considerable. Researchers who do not know Maithili can still access the work's architecture of reasoning and critical materials. Its possible readership therefore extends beyond regional boundaries.

The price of this arrangement, however, is bulk and repetition. Since the Maithili and English materials are largely duplicated within a single volume, the book becomes heavy. That may be useful for research, but separate Maithili and English editions could be more accessible to general readers.

There is also a minor editorial inconsistency: Chapter 4 of the English section is titled "Bibliography with Maithili Annotations", but the notes explaining the entries in that part are themselves in English. An English equivalent simply meaning "Extended Annotated Bibliography" would be more accurate.

14. Final Integrated Evaluation

The significance of this expanded edition of Ātmatattvaviveka rests on four levels.

Philosophically, it links momentariness, causation, language, universals, external reality, composite wholes, self, memory, God, scripture and liberation into one continuous journey of reasoning.

As translation, it does not destroy the difficult technical tradition of Sanskrit but brings it to life within the natural movement of Maithili sentences. Its central achievement is not the substitution of words but the Maithilisation of philosophical argument.

Literarily, the drama of reasoning, irony, examples, questions, seed and sprout, elephant, hare's horn, physician, blind people, painter, city of liberation and arrow striking its target generate the work's aesthetic energy. The undercurrent of śānta-rasa and the vigour of heroic reasoning prevent it from becoming a dry Nyāya treatise.

Culturally, the book does not merely claim that sophisticated philosophical prose is possible in Maithili: it demonstrates that possibility through an actual text. This is its most lasting contribution.

Its limitations are also clear: some early panegyrical excesses, ambiguity about the source edition, failure to distinguish original text from editorial intervention, too many Roman-letter terms, repeated generic headings, partial repetition in the critical apparatus of the expanded edition, and increased bulk from the English half. Yet the present ninety-nine-entry bibliography also shows that several earlier deficiencies in research tools have already been addressed.

Ultimately, to describe this book merely as "a Maithili translation of Udayanācārya" would understate its character. It combines a rereading of the original philosophy, the creation of Maithili philosophical prose, an application of translation theory, self-critical editorial discussion, research resources and a bridge to English. Its strongest part remains the primary Maithili translation; the critical materials surrounding it extend its field of meaning, though at times their own enthusiasm needs restraint.

The work's conclusion defines liberation as the absolute cessation of suffering, turning the long logical journey towards spiritual practice, while its final verse asks critics not for blind praise but for the identification of real defects. Measured by that standard, the present edition deserves the following assessment: highly accomplished as philosophical translation, significant for Maithili intellectual history, rich as a study edition, and still requiring some clearly identifiable editorial work before it can become a fully critical edition.

80. Nyāyakusumāñjali (Udayanācārya's Maithili Translation): An Integrated, Extended Synopsis and Critical Evaluation

Abstract

In the light of Indian and Western literary theory, philosophy and translation studies — Original Sanskrit: Udayanācārya; Maithili translation: Gajendra Thakur; Publisher: Videha, ISSN 2229-547X. Abstract

This chapter examines Nyāyakusumāñjali (Udayanācārya's Maithili Translation): An Integrated, Extended Synopsis and Critical Evaluation. In the light of Indian and Western literary theory, philosophy and translation studies — Original Sanskrit: Udayanācārya; Maithili translation: Gajendra Thakur; Publisher: Videha, ISSN 2229-547X. This integrated review examines the complete work from a comprehensive perspective: its preliminary publication material, contents, critical and research-oriented sections from Chapters 1 to 12, the complete Maithili translation presented in five clusters of flowers, the appendices, bibliography, and the parallel English section in the latter portion of the volume. The work presents itself as Gajendra Thakur's translation from Udayanācārya's original Sanskrit Nyāyakusumāñjali.

1. Basis of the Review, Historical Context and Character of the Translation

This integrated review considers the work in its entirety: the initial publication material, the contents, all the critical and research sections from Chapters 1 to 12, the full Maithili translation arranged in five clusters of flowers, the appendices, bibliography and parallel English section in the latter part of the book. The work identifies itself as a translation by Gajendra Thakur from Udayanācārya's original Sanskrit Nyāyakusumāñjali. Its publication information specifies the first edition of 2004 and the expanded edition of 2026, together with responsibility for translation, editing and book design, and Videha's role as publisher.

The book's essential achievement is not simply that a Sanskrit work of Nyāya has become available in Maithili. Its real importance lies in the creation, in Maithili, of an organised philosophical prose capable of expressing the extraordinarily complex epistemology, causal theory, treatment of absence, theory of the means of knowledge, philosophy of language, methods of debate and inference to God found in Nyāya–Vaiśeṣika. In this sense the book brings together translation, commentary, criticism, research, textual history and language-building within a single undertaking.

In the history of Indian philosophy, Udayanācārya, of the tenth–eleventh century, occupies a point of transition at which classical Nyāya begins to turn towards Navya-Nyāya. His Nyāyakusumāñjali — literally, 'an offering of flowers of reasoning' — is regarded as one of the Indian tradition's most systematic, subtle and influential philosophical treatises in defence of God's existence. Divided into five stabhakas, or clusters of flowers, it combines metrical kārikās with the author's own prose explanations. On every page unfolds the dialectical drama of pūrvapakṣa and uttarapakṣa, a mode of reasoning later brought to a high degree of refinement in Gaṅgeśa Upādhyāya's Tattvacintāmaṇi.

Udayanācārya is an eminent figure of Mithila, and Nyāyakusumāñjali is a fruit of thought born in Mithila's soil. Yet for more than a thousand years that fruit remained locked within the storehouse of Sanskrit: the everyday language of Mithila could not touch it. The Maithili translation by Gajendra Thakur is therefore not merely a linguistic transfer; it is a repatriation of an intellectual inheritance. Arguments once heard in Sanskrit in the assemblies, schools and halls of philosophical disputation in Mithila's settlements now speak, in an organised form, in the mother tongue of that very land. From the perspective of the parallel literary movement associated with Videha, this is an exceptional event, because translation becomes an act of decolonisation and of reclaiming one's own intellectual legacy. The translation's history is itself revealing: the first edition appeared in 2004, while the expanded 2026 edition bears witness to two decades of maturation. A translation that has lived alongside its translator for twenty years vividly demonstrates that translation is not a single event but a continuing process.

The Sanskrit Nyāyakusumāñjali has a two-layered texture of kārikā (verse) and prose exposition. This translation transforms that double structure into continuous, paragraph-based Maithili prose, marking each sequence of reasoning with a clear Maithili heading — 'Determination of the Subject of Inquiry', 'The Argument for Treating Capacity as an Independent Entity', 'Resolution of Doubt Concerning Momentariness', and so forth. This system of headings acts as a map for modern readers; in a classical text that can resemble a labyrinth, the headings stand like milestones.

In the terms of Roman Jakobson's threefold classification, all three kinds of translation are taking place here simultaneously: interlingual translation (Sanskrit into Maithili); intralingual translation (the suggestive compactness of the metrical statements combined with explanatory prose and recast as expanded, self-sufficient exposition, the commentary layer already present in the source being absorbed into the translation); and, in one sense, intersemiotic translation (a shift from the rhythmic signs of verse to the logical signs of prose).

2. The Architecture of the Entire Book: From Translation to a Multilayered Work of Knowledge

The book does not follow the ordinary pattern of 'introduction–translation–bibliography'. Its first ten chapters form a sequential record of critical, literary-theoretical, philosophical and translation-theoretical evaluations undertaken at different stages of the translation. Chapter 11 contains the Maithili translation of all five clusters. Chapter 12 provides an extensive bibliography. Thereafter the research material and translated text are presented in parallel in English. The English section begins with its own publication information and contents.

In one respect this structure is exceptionally rich: readers encounter the translated work alongside its explanation, theory, criticism, background and comparative studies. In another respect, assembling so much material in a single volume creates an editorial difficulty. Some early chapters review a stage when the translation was incomplete, whereas later chapters were written after all five clusters had been finished. At one point, for example, the fourth and fifth stabhakas are described as 'awaited', while a later comprehensive study explicitly states that the complete five-cluster translation is available.

For this reason, the book's eventual academic form needs to label the early chapters as 'reviews written at a particular stage of the translation's development', with a date or edition reference. What presently appears to be a contradiction would then become a valuable record of the translation's twenty-two-year development.

3. The Sequential Critical Development of the Research Chapters

Chapter 1: The First Extended Review — The Translation's Literary and Linguistic Self-Understanding

Chapter 1 begins with the work, its author and translator, and its historical position. It identifies Udayanācārya as an important figure in the transition from classical Nyāya towards Navya-Nyāya, and outlines both the five-stabhaka structure of Nyāyakusumāñjali and its combination of kārikās with the author's own prose commentary.

The chapter's most successful passage is its analysis of śleṣa, or double meaning, in the auspicious invocation. In the original, flowers and doctrines of reasoning are simultaneously evoked by the same words. The translation resolves this by opening two levels, 'in the sense of a flower' and 'in the sense of a principle of Nyāya'. From the standpoint of poetry translation, dividing the effect into two does diminish the sudden brilliance of a pun that would otherwise blossom in a single instant. From the standpoint of philosophical translation, however, no meaning is lost. This decision exemplifies the method of the whole translation: accepting some loss of verbal wonder in order to preserve the completeness of meaning.

In interpreting an image such as 'the flower does not wither even when pressed', the chapter shows together the paradoxical image of the flower and the suggestion that reasoning cannot be refuted. On this basis it offers an effective reading of śleṣa, vakrokti and dhvani.

Its discussion of rasa identifies śānta as the dominant current, while finding a particular, 'heroic in argument' form of vīra in the clash of philosophical disputation and the presence of adbhuta in the intellectual wonder produced by subtle reasoning. This is a creative attempt to apply poetics to philosophical prose. The necessary qualification is that such a use of rasa should not be equated with the immediate aesthetic experience of a drama or epic; it should be understood as an interpretative tool for explaining the aesthetic effects of philosophical prose.

In discussing aucitya, or propriety, the chapter correctly identifies the translation's two-level lexical policy. Technical terms such as hetu, sādhya, vyāpti, upādhi, samavāya, pratiyogin and anvaya–vyatireka remain intact, while examples such as 'a hare's horn' are brought close to the reader in Maithili's own linguistic world. The later comprehensive study likewise regards this two-level policy as a principal achievement of the translation.

In its treatment of rīti and sentence rhythm, the chapter demonstrates how Maithili connectives such as 'if–then', 'therefore', 'but' and 'hence' can reconstruct the relations of cause and consequence in Sanskrit propositions. This is a sound observation. The translation's real linguistic achievement is not to imitate Sanskrit sentence construction, but to develop Maithili's own idiom of logical argument.

The discussion of Bhartṛhari, verbal testimony (śabda-pramāṇa) and the translation's self-referential character is particularly interesting. When the work recognises language as an independent means of knowledge, the translation itself becomes a text reflecting on word meaning, sentence meaning, the speaker, intention and the power of comprehension. The attempt to connect this with indigenous Indian sources of translation theory is an original feature of the chapter.

The Western-theory section reads the text through Bakhtin's polyphony; Schleiermacher's and Gadamer's hermeneutics; Nida, Venuti, Benjamin, Steiner, Skopos theory, Lefevere, polysystem theory, Iser and others. These comparisons are useful, but it must always remain clear that modern theories are not Udayanācārya's 'historical sources'. They are tools for contemporary interpretation.

A significant limitation of Chapter 1 is its own historical position: it was written when the fourth and fifth clusters had not yet been included in the complete translation. The chapter should therefore be seen not as a final judgment on the entire book as it now stands, but as the first critical milestone in the translation's development.

Chapter 2: The Philosophical Architecture of the Latter Half and the Depth of its Reasoning

The structure of Chapter 2 is more concentrated. It covers the reviewed portion's position within the book, its philosophical architecture, Indian poetics, the Navya-Nyāya perspective, Western philosophy, translation theory, language and style, limitations and conclusion. This full arrangement is clearly set out in the contents.

Where the first chapter focuses primarily on the literary and linguistic character of the translation, the second places greater emphasis on the underlying structure of the arguments. A special strength of Chapter 2 is its ability to see the entire sequence as an architecture: particularly the latter portion of the third cluster, the number of pramāṇas, verbal testimony, connected meaning, postulation (arthāpatti) and non-apprehension (anupalabdhi); followed by the debate over knownness (jñātatā) and the movement towards arguments for God.

From a Navya-Nyāya perspective, the discussion of the bridge from Udayana to Gaṅgeśa fits the wider purpose of the book. Historically, however, it would be more rigorous to regard this bridge as an intellectual prelude rather than as a 'direct succession of doctrines'.

From the standpoint of translation studies, Chapter 2 tries to explain why the source's compressed, aphoristic density becomes an expanded exposition in Maithili. It would be wrong to dismiss this expansion merely as 'more words'; for a modern reader encountering Nyāya in the mother tongue, the explanation of context, the opposing position and the reply is part of the translation's purpose. Yet it is precisely here that the boundary between translation and commentary must be marked. This problem recurs across several chapters of the book.

Chapter 3: The Most Comprehensive Early Critical Examination

Chapter 3 is the most systematically organised review of the first phase. It includes a review abstract, method, an account of the work as philosophy, śāstra and literature, textual structure, Indian poetics, Western theories, Indian and modern translation traditions, close readings of selected passages, language and style, editorial apparatus, comparative evaluation, and recommendations for a revised critical edition.

The section on Indian poetics treats rasa, dhvani, vakrokti, guṇa, rīti, aucitya, alaṅkāra and illustrative examples separately. A major strength of this chapter is that it does not treat Nyāyakusumāñjali merely as a book of arguments for God's existence; it also recognises the aesthetic functions of its title, flower imagery, dialogic construction, pūrvapakṣa and uttarapakṣa, examples and closing prayer.

The Western section ranges from Aristotelian logic and rhetoric to Russian Formalism, New Criticism, structuralism, Bakhtinian dialogism, hermeneutics, reader-response theory and deconstruction. This breadth is impressive, but it is also a weakness: when so many theories are applied to the same text at once, the names of theories sometimes outweigh the actual analysis. A sustained application of two or three selected approaches can sometimes produce more than brief applications of ten.

The chapter tests the translation against criteria drawn from Nida, Newmark, Skopos theory, domestication and foreignisation, Catford, Toury, polysystem theory, Berman and Steiner. One conclusion emerges from this varied examination: the translation is neither wholly domesticated nor wholly oriented towards Sanskrit. Its technical lexicon comes from the Sanskrit tradition, but its argumentative sentences and examples turn towards the Maithili reader.

Close readings of representative passages — the four meanings of 'akasmāt', the causality of absence, the Sāṅkhya, Cārvāka and Buddhist positions, prāmāṇya, the impermanence of words, non-apprehension and non-existence, inference and upādhi, comparison and testimony, and connected meaning — give the chapter a genuine critical foundation. They prevent it from becoming merely a display of theoretical names.

The editorial section is extremely important. For a future critical edition, the book itself proposes separate arrangements for the original Sanskrit text, fluent Maithili translation, philosophical explanation, footnotes, a glossary of technical terms, indexes and a parallel digital display. This remains among the most useful editorial directions offered anywhere in the volume.

Chapter 3, too, belongs to a stage when only part of the text was available. Where it remarks on 'incompleteness', therefore, that is not a defect of the present, complete translation but a document of an earlier state.

Chapter 4: A Chapter of Rigorous Self-Criticism

Chapter 4 is a second extended review in the light of Indian and Western literary and translation theories. Its examination ranges across rasa, dhvani, vakrokti, alaṅkāra, rīti, guṇa and aucitya; Formalism, New Criticism, structuralism, reader-response theory, hermeneutics, deconstruction and rhetoric; formal and functional equivalence; semantic and communicative translation; domestication and foreignisation; Skopos; explicitation by the translator; technical terminology; the quality of Maithili; repetition; editorial errors; ideology; achievements and limitations; pre-publication corrections; and evaluation.

The distinctive feature of this chapter is its rigorous self-criticism rather than its praise. In its earlier state, it raised questions about the improper merging of two headings, the incompleteness of the final sentence, unclear sources of quotations and blurred boundaries between the voices of the author, commentator and translator. Its earlier evaluation table awarded comparatively high marks for philosophical communication and sequence of reasoning, but lower marks for the critical editorial apparatus and readiness for immediate publication.

It would be inappropriate to reproduce that judgment unchanged as the final verdict on the present complete work, because later chapters themselves announce the completion of all five clusters. The chapter becomes much more valuable if retained as a historical inspection report on textual revision. It allows readers to see how the work reached its final form.

Chapter 5: Maithili Language, History, Script, Institutions and Modernity

Chapter 5 does more than analyse the text of Nyāyakusumāñjali; it relates the translation to Maithili's wider social and intellectual environment. It discusses Maithili's historical position, demographic reach, linguistic structure, phonology, 'null-subject' grammar, dialects and standardisation, modern digital language technology, Mithilākṣara/Tirhuta, Unicode, philosophical traditions, Videha, the parallel literary movement, educational institutions and contemporary dissemination. Varṇaratnākara and Vidyāpati also appear in the account of linguistic history.

The chapter's intellectual purpose is clear: to treat the translation of Nyāyakusumāñjali not as an isolated book, but as part of a wider project to increase Maithili's modern capacity as a language of knowledge. Its account of Videha and the parallel literary movement belongs to the same framework.

This expansion is important, but it is in this chapter that particular care with sources is most necessary. Population figures, university curricula, Unicode, institutions, modern digital language technology and digital projects are all subject to change. Each such claim should therefore be accompanied by a clear year, source and footnote. Otherwise time-specific information embedded within the work's enduring philosophical discussion may quickly become outdated.

The philosophical portion connects śleṣa and vakrokti, the five atheistic objections, the Mīmāṃsā concepts of adṛṣṭa and capacity, Sāṅkhya, Cārvāka, Buddhist momentariness, verbal testimony and Western theories. The chapter thereby links language history to philosophy. Structurally, however, dividing it into two separate chapters — 'History of the Maithili Language' and 'The Translation's Philosophical Significance' — might have given it greater concentration.

Chapter 6: The Philosophical Depth of Epistemology and Arguments for God

Chapter 6 is among the book's principal chapters devoted to philosophy proper. It analyses anvitarthavāda, arthāpatti, anupalabdhi, the validity of knowledge, knownness (jñātatā), God's omniscience, eight grounds for establishing God, Vedic injunction and motivating force, yogic perception, and the relationship between reasoning and faith. The chapter itself treats the controversies over connected meaning, postulation, non-apprehension and knownness as groundwork for the demonstration of God.

An important philosophical strength of the book becomes clear here: the argument for God does not begin abruptly in the fifth cluster. The first four clusters develop theories of causation, the means of knowledge, linguistic comprehension, absence, epistemic validity, knownness, the world and cognition, on which the positive inferences of the fifth can stand. To regard that last cluster merely as an isolated list of 'eight proofs of God' would therefore be to miss the architecture of the work.

In its response to anvitābhidhānavāda, the question whether words independently convey meaning and how their meanings combine within a sentence becomes self-referential for translation itself. Opposition to recognising arthāpatti and anupalabdhi as independent pramāṇas becomes a central point of disagreement between Nyāya and Mīmāṃsā.

The refutation of knownness is especially significant. If every instance of true cognition required 'novelty' or some externally established property of being known, the knowledge of an eternally omniscient God could become problematic. By removing this obstacle, the fourth cluster prepares the epistemological ground for the fifth.

The eight grounds for establishing God — kārya, āyojana, dhṛti, pada, pratyaya, śruti, vākya and saṃkhyā — form the philosophical culmination of the book. A positive feature of Chapter 6 is that it does not treat all eight as arguments of the same kind: some concern causation, some the combination of atoms, some linguistic signs, some the validity of cognition, and some Vedic sentences.

Caution is needed in employing modern comparisons. Terms such as 'cosmological argument', 'linguistic argument' and 'natural theology' provide useful bridges for readers, but the historical meaning of Udayana's arguments should not be wholly assimilated into categories derived from European philosophy of religion.

Research Chapter 7: Udayanācārya, the Commentary Tradition, and the Indian Debate on God

Research Chapter 7 encompasses a research introduction; Udayanācārya's life and Mithila's Nyāya tradition; the structure of the work; the number of stabhakas and kārikās; the five opposing contentions (vipratipattis); all five stabhakas; the tradition of commentaries and expositions; historical translations; Nārāyaṇa Śāstrī Drāviḍa's study; the work's influence on Navya-Nyāya; and a conclusion. The contents explicitly provide separate sections on the commentary tradition and Drāviḍa's research.

The chapter constructs a history of the work's reception. Its important academic achievement is to situate translation not merely as a present-day linguistic act, but within a succession of Sanskrit commentaries, modern editions, and translations.

Nevertheless, source citations in footnotes are indispensable for matters such as biography, chronology, the number of kārikās, and variations between editions. One passage in the book mentions alternative totals of seventy-two and seventy-three kārikās. A critical edition ought to explain why the totals differ, which edition follows which count, and which verses have been counted together or separately.

The value of Chapter 7 lies in its refusal to forget the long commentary tradition behind the Maithili translation, even while recognising that translation as an independent modern undertaking.

Research Chapter 8: An Integrated Philosophical, Linguistic, and Cultural Study

Research Chapter 8 offers a broad, integrated study of Nyāyakusumāñjali and its Maithili translation. It brings together the Navya-Nyāya background, the historical and social position of Maithili, the five opposing contentions, all five stabhakas, the eight reasons adduced for establishing God, the Nyāya–Mīmāṃsā disputes over the means of knowledge, the doctrine of connected meaning (anvitārthavāda), postulation (arthāpatti), non-apprehension (anupalabdhi), the linguistic and philosophical significance of translation, Indian literary theories, Western translation theory, the parallel literary movement, and digital transformation.

The chapter's conclusion treats Udayana's work not as a religious proclamation but as an inquiry into God founded on rigorous reasoning, epistemology, and debate. It sets out the eight grounds in sequence: kāryāt, āyojanāt, dhṛtyādeḥ, padāt, pratyayataḥ, śruteḥ, vākyāt, and saṃkhyāviśeṣāc ca.

The limitation of this chapter is repetition. Material examined separately and at length in Chapters 5–7 is revisited in an integrated reading in Chapter 8. If the book is organised as a research monograph, this chapter should be explicitly identified as an "overall synthesis"; otherwise readers may feel that the same subjects recur without explanation.

Research Chapter 9: The First Truly Comprehensive Review Based on All Five Clusters

Chapter 9 marks an exceptionally important turning point in the book. Here the study is explicitly founded on the complete text of all five stabhakas. The chapter itself observes that only after the entire work became available, from the opening invocation to the final offering of flowers, was it possible to examine the unbroken movement of argument, the pattern of metaphors, and the translation's linguistic policy from beginning to end.

Its map of the arguments is particularly successful: the first cluster addresses causality, adṛṣṭa, and the permanence of the self; the second, the validity of cognition, the impermanence of words, and creation and dissolution; the third, non-apprehension, the examination of the means of knowledge, and debate about verbal testimony; the fourth, true cognition and God's eternal knowledge; and the fifth, the proofs advanced for God and the concluding floral offering.

The chapter systematically examines the double meaning (śleṣa) of the invocation, the heroism of argument subordinated to śānta-rasa, figures of speech, propriety (aucitya), and oblique expression (vakrokti). Its Western approaches include reason-centred philosophical theology, Bakhtinian polyphony, Gadamer's fusion of horizons, Formalism, and New Criticism. In translation studies it considers Nida and Newmark, Venuti and Berman, and Skopos and Toury; in language and style, it addresses technical terminology and the resources of ordinary vocabulary.

The chapter's most significant scholarly virtue is methodological modesty. The parallel English section expressly states that the study is directed towards the target text—the Maithili translation—and does not undertake a line-by-line comparison with the Sanskrit original; it therefore cannot award a final certificate of word-level fidelity to the source. Internal coherence in the target text and fidelity to the source are recognised as two distinct criteria. This admission enhances the scholarly credibility of the volume as a whole.

Research Chapter 10: The Central Scholarly Achievement of the Complete Work

Chapter 10 is the best organised, most mature, and most academically useful part of this book. It is, in effect, a research monograph in its own right.

It incorporates the base text, a research statement, an abstract, keywords, methodology, historical and textual context, the metaphor of the "offering of flowers" (kusumāñjali), the five fundamental doubts, the arguments of all five clusters, the method of disputation, the examination of the means of knowledge, absence, postulation and non-apprehension, the self, atoms, adṛṣṭa, creation and dissolution, words, sentences, intention and injunction, the nature of God, fair presentation of opposing positions, Indian poetics, modern hermeneutics, comparative philosophy, translation method, language and style, editorial arrangement, twelve representative passages, the significance of the work in Maithili's knowledge tradition, conclusions, further research, and five appendices. This wide range of subjects is clearly laid out in the book.

The Philosophical Unity of All Five Clusters

The chief achievement of Chapter 10 is that it reads the five stabhakas not as five separate essays, but as an ascending journey of reasoning.

The first cluster begins with the problems of causality, the fruits of action, the self, and the doctrine of momentariness. The second examines the foundations of knowledge and tradition through the validity of cognition, the impermanence of words, and creation and dissolution. The third scrutinises inferences purporting to establish God's absence, the self-contradiction involved in rejecting inference, comparison, verbal testimony, connected verbal meaning, postulation, and non-apprehension. Through disputes over true cognition, memory, and knownness (jñātatā), the fourth safeguards the possibility of eternal omniscient knowledge. The fifth then offers affirmative inferences concerning God through effect, the initial conjunction of atoms, sustaining power, words, cognition, Vedic revelation, sentences, and number. The book itself summarises the sequence in this way.

Chapter 10 makes this philosophical unity especially clear. Readers consequently understand that the culmination of Nyāyakusumāñjali is not simply the pronouncement "God exists," but the question of what kind of metaphysics is demanded by causation, knowledge, language, number, the means of knowledge, and the moral order.

Method of Reasoning

To present the opposing thesis (pūrvapakṣa) in its full force, demonstrate its consequences, identify a defect, assume a counterfactual situation and test its implications, and finally bring the argument to its own contradiction—Chapter 10 correctly captures this important feature of Udayana's method.

The Cārvāka rejection of inference is a particularly telling example: if every inference is unacceptable, how can the rejection of inference itself claim universal acceptance? This kind of practical self-contradiction is especially compelling for modern readers.

Absence and Non-apprehension

The chapter systematically examines subtle problems involving the counterpositive of an absence (pratiyogin), the character of non-apprehension (anupalabdhi), the inclusion of postulation (arthāpatti) within inference, and the rejection of non-apprehension as an independent means of knowledge. Simple contemporary language is helpful here; a parallel glossary of the original Sanskrit technical terms would, however, make the discussion still more useful to researchers.

Metaphysics

A particular strength of the discussion of the enduring self, adṛṣṭa and moral causality, atoms, and creation and dissolution is that the chapter warns against unjustified identification with modern science. Adṛṣṭa is explained not as an "unknown miracle" but as a causal link between action and its fruit; equating the ancient atomic doctrine with modern atomic physics is recognised as a historical mistake. This discrimination is commendable.

Philosophy of Language

Questions of words, sentences, intended meaning (tātparya), injunction, word meaning, sentence meaning, and authorship are directly connected with the book's translation project. The independent power of words to convey meaning, the role of intention, syntactic connection within sentences, and the motivating force of injunctions are not merely ancient Mīmāṃsā debates: they also underlie the translator's daily decisions.

Appendices

A thematic map of all five clusters, a concise glossary of fallacies, a selected terminology list, a questionnaire for researchers, and a policy for textual sources and quotation elevate Chapter 10 from ordinary criticism to a resource for university study. A future edition could expand these appendices and place them at the end of the book as shared research tools; doing so would greatly increase their usefulness.

Research Chapter II: The Complete Maithili Translation

This is the centre of the book. The first ten chapters construct a critical framework around this text, but the book's real historical value resides in Chapter II.

4. The Five Flower Clusters of the Complete Maithili Translation: An Unbroken Journey of Argument

The First Cluster of Flowers: Causality, Action, Causal Efficacy, the Self, and Momentariness

The first cluster opens with a verse of humility in the auspicious invocation. Thereafter come, in sequence, the object of inquiry; the need for inquiry; a proposition for examination; the possibility of origination "by chance" (akasmāt); the cause–effect relation; general and particular causes; the causal theories of Advaita and Sāṅkhya; invisible causes; causal efficacy (sāmarthya); causation through absence; the Mīmāṃsā theory of causal efficacy; produced or superimposed efficacy; the effect of sacrifice; impressions left in the agent; Nyāya's account of efficacy; Sāṅkhya; Cārvāka; universal momentariness; permanence and causation; and finally, prayer.

The cluster's fundamental questions are these: why is there regularity in the world and in experience? Can one escape causality merely by saying "by chance"? How do the fruits of action extend into the distant future? If the self is momentary, how are memory, latent impressions (saṃskāras), moral consequences, and the unity of experience possible?

The translation makes effective use of a question-and-answer style in presenting these difficult arguments. Maithili constructions such as "If we accept this, then…", "But an objection arises here…", and "The answer is…" lend the technical sequence of Nyāya reasoning the accessibility of an oral philosophical debate.

The decision to unfold the invocation's two meanings again deserves particular notice. By making clear the connections between the freshness, fragrance, and immortality of the flower and the authority of the doctrines of Nyāya, the translation preserves the richness of meaning produced by śleṣa, or punning double sense.

The Second Cluster of Flowers: The Validity of Cognition, the Impermanence of Words, Creation, and Dissolution

The second cluster begins with the grounds on which knowledge is valid. Whether the truth of genuine cognition is recognised through an external cause or is known intrinsically becomes the centre of disagreement between Nyāya and Mīmāṃsā. There follow the attempt to establish the impermanence of words, the transmission of words through tradition, utterance, common linguistic form, the teacher–pupil succession, creation and cosmic dissolution, the gradual decline of religious duty, conduct, and education, memory, Vedic injunctions no longer available, the interruption of tradition at dissolution, renewed creation, and a criticism of the view that sages such as Kapila initiate scripture by virtue of their omniscience. Noteworthy here is the distinction that, even though individual utterances are impermanent, a relation to meaning can persist through tradition.

This cluster moves from the first cluster's analysis of causation to epistemology and cosmology. The subject appears to change, but the connection is clear: if tradition is not an unbroken, beginningless continuum, the question arises how the order of knowledge can be re-established. That question leads further towards the proposed necessity of an omniscient governor.

Linguistically, this cluster is denser than the first. The long sentences in the examination of validity demand sustained attention. The earlier review itself suggests that selective division of sentences would be useful here.

The Third Cluster of Flowers: Atheistic Inferences, Cārvāka, Comparison, Verbal Testimony, Connected Meaning, Postulation, and Non-apprehension

The third cluster is the book's centre of epistemological inquiry. It brings together arguments that attempt to infer non-existence from the absence of knowledge of God; the counterpositive of negation; unreal entities; other inferences purporting to prove God's absence; the defence and refutation of those inferences; the Cārvāka attack on inference; Nyāya's justification of inference; comparison (upamāna); differences between Mīmāṃsā and Nyāya positions; Vaiśeṣika objections; verbal testimony (śabda-pramāṇa); Prabhākara's distinction between Vedic and everyday sentences; connected meaning; objections based on testimony to an omniscient creator; postulation (arthāpatti); and non-apprehension (anupalabdhi). The book sets out this sequence explicitly.

This cluster is among the translation's most difficult areas, because the fine distinctions among terms such as anupalabdhi (non-apprehension), pratiyogin (counterpositive), viśeṣya (qualificand), vyāpti (invariable concomitance), upamāna (comparison), and bodhaśakti (power to generate cognition) cannot be replaced by ordinary near-synonyms. The translator's policy of retaining the original terms while constructing explanatory Maithili sentences is the right one.

Instead of making the Cārvāka voice ridiculous, the work presents its argument at full strength. Consequently the response offered by the opposing side acquires intellectual credibility. From the standpoint of polyphony, this is one of the book's finest passages.

The Fourth Cluster of Flowers: True Cognition, Memory, and Knownness

The fourth cluster is relatively short, yet decisive in the architecture of the philosophy. Its principal sequence concerns the nature of cognition, the Mīmāṃsā position, the first proof offered in support of an objective property called "knownness" (jñātatā) and its refutation, followed by a second proof and its refutation.

Its significance should be understood as preparation for the fifth cluster. If the truth of cognition were necessarily dependent on novelty, knownness, or a property arising outside cognition after knowledge has occurred, difficulties would arise for God's eternal omniscience. The fourth cluster removes this obstacle. The book's overall analysis likewise makes clear that by rejecting knownness, the fourth cluster safeguards the validity of an omniscient being's eternal knowledge.

From the standpoint of translation, this passage is exceptionally dense. A future scholarly edition would reduce the reader's burden by giving concise definitions of pramā (true cognition), prāmāṇya (validity), jñātatā (knownness), viṣayatā (objecthood or being-an-object-of-cognition), and smṛti (memory) alongside their first occurrences.

The Fifth Cluster of Flowers: Eight Grounds for Establishing God and the Devotional Culmination of Argument

The fifth cluster is the climax of the entire work. Arguments establishing God's existence are presented and defended; objections receive replies; the internal contradictions of conditional counterarguments advanced by atheists are exposed. The discussion moves through the need for a conscious cause of the first motion of atoms, the sustenance of the universe, words, cognition, revelation, sentences, numbers, injunctions, commands, verbal action, effort, the connection between acts and their fruits, scriptural utterances, the naming of Vedic branches, yogic perception, and scriptural support for the perception of God.

The eight celebrated grounds—kārya, āyojana, dhṛti, pada, pratyaya, śruti, vākya, and saṃkhyā—are the crowning jewels of the work. It would nevertheless be inappropriate to call them eight independent "scientific proofs" in the modern sense. They are interconnected groups of inferences fashioned within Nyāya–Vaiśeṣika metaphysics, the philosophy of language, epistemology, and the Vedic tradition.

The verse gathering these eight grounds together is: "कार्यायोजनधृत्यादेः पदात् प्रत्ययतः श्रुतेः। वाक्यात् संख्याविशेषाच्च साध्यो विश्वविदव्ययः॥" In other words, through eight routes—being an effect, the conjunction or arrangement of atoms, sustenance and dissolution, words, cognition, revelation, sentences, and particular numerical structure—the existence of the imperishable knower of the universe, the omniscient God, is established.

(1) Kāryāt, from effect: The world is a produced entity, an effect (kārya). Just as a pot is made by a potter, so the world must have an omniscient maker. Udayanācārya rejects the atheist's objection that an agent must possess a body, identifying bodily existence as an upādhi, an unwarranted additional condition: being an effect is a general property, whereas embodiment is a particular property, and God's eternal knowledge and will make agency without a body possible. (2) Āyojanāt, from the initial arrangement: The first motion of atoms—on the argument that the motion of insentient things requires conscious prompting—requires an intelligent, omniscient initiator. (3) Dhṛtyādeḥ, from sustenance and related processes: The maintenance of the cosmos (a divine sustaining effort conceived as underlying natural laws such as gravity), and the process of destruction at the great dissolution, require a conscious agent. (4) Padāt, from words: The original establishment of linguistic conventions, particularly the teaching of language to new beings at the beginning of each cycle of creation, requires a primordial teacher. (5) Pratyayataḥ, from cognition or trustworthiness: The authority of the Veda establishes the freedom from defects of its speaker; consequently a speaker possessed of perfect knowledge is required. (6) Śruteḥ, from revelation: The Veda consists of collections of sentences, and every such collection must have a composer; only an omniscient God can truly describe supersensible realities. (7) Vākyāt, from sentences: The intended meaning of Vedic sentences depends upon a speaker's purpose, and the meaningfulness of first-person pronouns employed in the Veda demands an independent speaker. (8) Saṃkhyāviśeṣāc ca, from numerical particularity: Explaining the magnitude of dyads and triads formed from atoms requires a counting consciousness (apekṣā-buddhi), possible at the beginning of creation, when no living beings existed, only in an omniscient God. The fifth cluster concludes with the philosophical nature of Vedic commands and injunctions, the possibility of yogic perception, and prayer to God.

The sequence of these eight proofs is itself a logical architecture: cosmological (cause and effect), kinetic (motion), physical and cosmological (sustenance and dissolution), linguistic (signs and words), epistemic (cognition), scriptural (the authority of revelation), semantic (sentence meaning), and numerical or atomic (number and combination). Eight distinct lines of inquiry converge on one conclusion, demonstrating the many-sided range of Udayanācārya's logical imagination.

A special achievement of the translation is the separate section devoted to the "alternative meanings of the terms used for the grounds in the original text." Just as the several meanings of the invocation were disclosed separately, the final cluster also preserves a second layer of meaning in the source terms. The book regards this as an instance of "layered fidelity."

At the end, reasoning is transformed into devotion. The author wishes the fragrance of these flowers of reasoning to reach believers and non-believers alike; finally, the intellectual floral offering is dedicated to God. The parallel English text likewise ends with this conclusion: a prayer for sound understanding for the atheist, the mind immersed in the Lord, and the flower metaphor of the five clusters.

In this final movement, the literary character of Nyāyakusumāñjali becomes most apparent: argument does not annihilate itself but, turning into a flower, becomes an offering.

5. A Focused Philosophical Examination: Knowledge, Sound, Causality, Dissolution, Karma, and Tradition

The Indian philosophical tradition is extraordinarily rich and many-sided. For millennia it has sustained profound debates on existence, knowledge, and the means of attaining liberation. Within this intellectual churning, Nyāya–Vaiśeṣika philosophy occupies a pre-eminent position and is renowned internationally for its logical realism and atomic pluralism. Nyāya is principally concerned with the theory of the means of valid knowledge (epistemology), while its allied system, Vaiśeṣika, undertakes a minute analysis of the objects of knowledge (ontology). The ultimate aim of both systems is complete release from worldly suffering—that is, mokṣa—which becomes possible through true knowledge. The Nyāyakusumāñjali, composed by the great philosopher Udayanācārya in the tenth century, is an enduring work that offers extensive logical explanations of God's existence, the validity of knowledge, cause-and-effect relations, and the physical laws of creation. This work of Udayanācārya is not merely a foundational text of Nyāya philosophy; it also mounts a vigorous refutation of non-theistic positions, including Buddhist philosophy.

5.1 The Theoretical Background of Epistemology and the Means of Knowledge

How cognition arises, what its nature is, and how its validity is determined constitute an exceptionally complex and fundamental question of Indian philosophy. Nyāya, which treats cognition as an illuminating factor distinct from both its object and its subject, upholds realism. Where Advaita Vedānta stresses the ultimate or metaphysical nature of knowledge, Nyāya gives sustained attention to its practical and logical character.

According to Nyāya, knowledge or pramiti is an apprehension of reality, called pramā. Cognition that does not correspond to reality is apramā (invalid knowledge). Nyāya describes a particular psychological and logical process through which cognition is produced. Direct awareness of an external object is impossible unless the senses are connected with the mind (manas) and the mind, in turn, is connected with the self (ātman). Thus, sense–object contact presupposes both mind–sense contact and self–mind contact. Here the mind functions as the mediator between the self and the senses.

5.2 Prāmāṇyavāda: The Philosophical Conflict over the Truth of Cognition

Philosophical school	Principal doctrine	Accepted means of valid knowledge
Nyāya philosophy (classical)	Logical realism	Perception, inference, verbal testimony
Navya-Nyāya (Udayanācārya and others)	The New Logic	Perception, inference, verbal testimony, comparison (four pramāṇas)
Vaiśeṣika philosophy	Atomic pluralism	Perception, inference (two pramāṇas)

The theory of prāmāṇya—the validity of knowledge—has generated a major debate within Indian epistemology. Its two principal positions are svataḥ-prāmāṇyavāda (intrinsic validity), upheld by Advaita Vedānta and Mīmāṃsā, and parataḥ-prāmāṇyavāda (extrinsic validity), defended by Nyāya.

Intrinsic Validity versus Extrinsic Validity

According to Advaita Vedānta and Mīmāṃsā, cognition establishes its own truth: when knowledge occurs, it is originally valid unless an external defeating factor subsequently proves it false. This is the doctrine of intrinsic validity. By contrast, Nyāya's doctrine of extrinsic validity holds that neither a cognition's validity nor the awareness of that validity follows simply from the causes that produced the cognition itself; rather, they depend on external conditions and causes.

Nyāya rejects the proposition that cognition is true by its very nature. Its argument is that validity consists in correspondence with the object: to know a thing as it actually is constitutes true cognition. Novelty, production through the senses, or apprehension of something previously unknown are not necessary conditions of truth. The ultimate criterion of truth is grounded in causal relations. To establish a cognition's truth, Nyāya relies on inference. Here the principal hetu, or middle term, is its "being the cause of successful practical activity." That is, if a cognition leads someone to act towards an object and that action succeeds, the cognition is regarded as true.

The Fault of Mutual Dependence and the Psychological Mechanism of Memory and Impressions

If the validity of cognition is inferred from its "causing successful action," a serious logical difficulty arises: anyonyāśraya-doṣa, the fault of circularity or mutual dependence. The opponent argues that the sādhya (what is to be established, namely the cognition's validity) and the hetu (its causal connection with successful activity) become identical, because the success of the action itself depends on the truth of the cognition. In other words, validity is being proved through a middle term whose status as a middle term already presupposes validity.

To avoid this fault, Nyāya proposes a subtle psychological and logical account. "Being a cause of successful activity" is not a generic property shared indiscriminately by a class. Each instance of true cognition is the particular cause of its own corresponding successful action, and it is through this individual causal relation that the cognition's truth is inferred. Yet there is a practical difficulty: by the time the outcome of the action—its success—has occurred, the original cognition, which is momentary, has ceased to exist. How, then, can its causal connection with the action be known?

The answer lies in the psychological mechanism of smṛti (memory) and saṃskāra (mental impression). Although the original cognition has passed away, it has left an impression, a memorial trace, in consciousness. When the action succeeds, that impression reawakens the memory of the original cognition. Through this recollection, the person recognises: "That cognition was the cause of the successful activity."

The theory is explained through the example of "earthhood" and smell. If one wishes to establish that a particular thing belongs to the material category of earth, one first experiences its distinctive property, smell. An impression of previously experienced objects then awakens a memory through which the present object is recognised as sharing the earthhood associated with smell. It should be noted that recognition (pratyabhijñā) or memory is not simply a mixture of two cognitions of entirely different kinds. In the judgement "This is the same pot that I saw earlier," present perception and past recollection converge in a single mental conclusion, although each arises under distinct causal conditions. It is through additional conditions, such as present cognition or an existing impression, that awareness of the self becomes perceptual or recollective in character.

A principal Nyāya argument against intrinsic validity is that doubts about the truth of cognition repeatedly arise. Yet Nyāya also maintains that doubting the validity of every instance of self-awareness would be self-defeating. If no awareness of the self is true, then the occurrence of doubt itself cannot be known as true. If doubt is accepted as real, the validity of the awareness through which doubt is known must also be admitted. The argument presents a substantial challenge to philosophical positions such as Advaita Vedānta.

5.3 Nyāya's Procedure of Inference

Point of comparison	Intrinsic validity (Advaita/Mīmāṃsā)	Extrinsic validity (Nyāya)
Ground of a cognition's truth	Inherent in the cognition's own nature	Depends on external conditions and successful practical activity
Status of doubt	Cognition is intrinsically free of doubt; a defeating factor arises afterwards	Doubt is possible and must be resolved through inference
Theory of causation	No external cause is required for truth	Causal connection is established through memory and mental impressions

The five-membered inference (pañcāvayava) presented by Nyāya for establishing the truth of a proposition is the backbone of Indian logic. Its five members are: (1) pratijñā (proposition)—for example, "This hill possesses fire" (parvato vahnimān); (2) hetu (reason)—"Because there is smoke there" (dhūmāt); (3) udāharaṇa (example)—"Wherever there is smoke, there is fire, as in a kitchen hearth" (yatra yatra dhūmaḥ, tatra tatra vahniḥ); (4) upanaya (application)—"This hill is of that kind too" (tathā cāsau); and (5) nigamana (conclusion)—"Therefore this hill possesses fire" (tasmāt tathā).

Upon this fine-grained logical framework, Nyāya constructs its explanations of God, the truth of knowledge, and the phenomenal world. Gaṅgeśa Upādhyāya, regarded as the founder of Navya-Nyāya (the New Logic), developed this logical system to an exceptionally high level in his Tattvacintāmaṇi, profoundly influenced by the principles of the Nyāyakusumāñjali.

5.4 Words and the Physics of Sound

In the Nyāya–Vaiśeṣika tradition, physics and ontology are closely connected. An analysis of the production of words and sound is not merely a matter of physics; it is also required for the refutation of the Mīmāṃsā doctrine of jātiśaktivāda. Mīmāṃsā thinkers hold that words and universals (jāti) are eternal and possess an everlasting power to express meaning. They argue that while causes of the destruction of impermanent objects are observable, no corresponding cause is seen for the destruction of a word; words must therefore be eternal. Nyāya, however, rejects this position completely.

The Relationship between Ākāśa, Vibration, and Sound

For Nyāya philosophers, sound is impermanent and is a quality of ākāśa (space or ether). A musical instrument—such as a vīṇā, a flute, or a mṛdaṅga—is not itself the substrate in which sound inheres. In ordinary speech we say that "the vīṇā or flute is sounding" or that "the instrument possesses sound." Philosophically speaking, however, the instrument is only the source of the activity, or vibration, which produces sound. The instrument is the efficient cause; ākāśa is its inherent cause, or the actual locus in which sound resides.

When a person cannot hear a sound from a distance, this does not mean that sound is all-pervasive and merely goes unheard. It means either that some obstructing factor intervenes between the auditory faculty and the complex of causes producing sound, or that the auditory faculty has a defect. The equation "not heard = not existent" is not a universal rule; the case must instead be understood through differences in the relevant causal conditions.

When a musical instrument stops being played, its sound comes to an end. A Mīmāṃsā philosopher might ask what happens to that sound once the instrument stops. Does it merely become dormant forever? Nyāya argues that if sound did not perish but only became inaudible, then even after instruments fell silent, an unlimited accumulation of old sounds would have to be admitted as existing somewhere in ākāśa—for which there is no evidence.

Here Nyāya makes a clear distinction between dhvaṃsa (destruction or subsequent absence) and atyantābhāva (absolute non-existence). Absolute absence has no temporal limit; it always obtains in its locus, as with the absolute absence of form or colour in ākāśa. But when an instrument falls silent, the absence that arises is dhvaṃsa, or pradhvaṃsābhāva: something existed before and has now ceased to exist. If absolute absence of sound in the instrument were established, the destruction of the sound that has just ceased could not be established there, and the inference would incur the fault of sādhyābhāva—the absence of what was to be proved.

Moreover, the destruction of a thing occurs in the place where that thing actually inheres. Since ākāśa, not the instrument, is the locus of sound, the destruction of sound also takes place in ākāśa. The cessation of vibration, through the cause-and-effect relation, establishes the consequent absence of sound.

This philosophical analysis also enters into dialogue with conceptions of sound in Yoga and other Tantric traditions. In Yoga philosophy, Patañjali regards oṃkāra (praṇava) as a universal symbol or a ground—a norm or matrix—of all kinds of sounds; meditation upon it leads to samādhi. Certain Vedic traditions have even attributed therapeutic effects to sound vibrations and mental power, including hypnosis. Nyāya, by contrast, analyses sound simply as a physical quality subject to causal relations.

5.5 Metaphysics and Cosmology: The Principle of Causation and Atomism

Nyāya–Vaiśeṣika is an uncompromisingly realist philosophy and holds that every transformation in the world is governed by the law of causality. It strongly endorses atomism, treating eternal atoms as the fundamental material causes (upādāna-kāraṇa) of the universe.

Atoms, Composite Wholes, and Contingent Causation

According to Nyāya, every effect or produced thing arises from the presence of a particular complex of causes and ceases when that complex is absent. Where the cause is present, the effect arises; where the cause is absent, the effect is absent. This is presented as a general law of the world.

Nyāya rejects the opponent's claim that the production or destruction of an effect depends only on human purposes and experiences. Its example is breathing during sleep: a sleeping person is not conscious of the usefulness of breathing, yet breathing continues. The physical laws of causation therefore continue to operate in the universe even in the absence of conscious utility or awareness.

If the productive causes were eternal and always active in exactly the same way, their effects would also be eternal, and the appearance of those effects at particular times would be impossible. Yet the created world is subject to change. From dyads (dvyaṇukas, paired atoms) and the smallest living things to the vast universe, all exist within causal relations. We must therefore acknowledge that the conjunction and separation of the relevant complexes of causes are contingent rather than eternal. The atoms (paramāṇu) are eternal, but the composite wholes (avayavins) constituted by their conjunctions are wholly impermanent and destructible.

Cosmic Dissolution (Pralaya) and Inescapable Destruction

When the universe completes its cycle of existence, the entire cosmos dissolves back into an atomic state. In this philosophy, that final condition is called pralaya, or dissolution. During pralaya, all atoms become separated from one another, and the created world comes completely to an end. The atoms themselves are not destroyed in the process; only their conjunctions are broken.

Nyāya's forceful argument is this: once the basic constituents—the atoms—have become disjoined, how could any living or non-living thing survive in its composite form? Such wholes must inevitably disintegrate. To elucidate this inescapable destruction, the Nyāyakusumāñjali provides three exceptionally precise and practical examples.

These examples are presented as decisively establishing that, when an appropriate destructive cause is present, a composite world cannot remain intact after the dissolution of the constituents on which it depends.

Illustration	Destructive cause	Consequence
Udumbara fruit and flies	An enraged monkey eats the fruit that serves as their abode	The flies inside the fruit are inevitably destroyed
Insects in a hollow tree	A fierce fire engulfs the tree	The insects are reduced to ashes along with the tree
Passengers gathered on a ship	A conflagration in the sea at the time of cosmic dissolution	All the passengers perish together with the ship

The Logical Establishment of God's Existence

For Nyāya, the entire chain of reasoning concerning cosmic dissolution and the destruction of composite wholes is more than a physical explanation: it is also a major foundation for establishing God's existence through a teleological argument. If all atoms have become completely separated after dissolution, how will "initial motion," dyadic combination, and conjunction arise among them in the subsequent creation? Insentient, inert atoms cannot initiate motion of their own accord.

Udayanācārya therefore argues for the necessity of a conscious agent called God. Gaṅgeśa Upādhyāya, too, elaborates this question in the Tattvacintāmaṇi, explaining that the earth and material objects are effects and must therefore possess a conscious cause, God. The conjunction and disjunction of unconscious atoms cannot occur without a conscious regulator. This line of reasoning bears a deep philosophical resemblance to Western arguments from an "Unmoved Mover" or a "First Cause."

5.6 The Theory of Karma, Saṃskāra, and the Gradual Decline of Human Traditions

Moving beyond the physical world of atoms, Nyāya also offers a subtle account of the operations of the psychological and moral world. If all composite things perish at the time of pralaya, what gives the next creation its form and diversity? The answer is adṛṣṭa (the unseen force), or the fruits of karma.

Karma, Experience, and Continuity

All experiences of pleasure and suffering arise from the accumulated fruits of a living being's previous actions. Although a person's experiences result from karma, this does not annul the natural physical causal relations among objects. In agreement with the Buddhist idea of karmic continuity and Vedāntic conceptions of saṃskāra, Nyāya also holds that impressions and deeds from a person's previous birth remain present within the self as adṛṣṭa, even after cosmic dissolution. On the basis of these impressions, the kinds of experiences allotted to living beings in the next creation are determined. Karma is thus a trans-worldly law that makes individuals responsible for their actions and sustains the cycle of birth and death.

The Decline of Tradition and Conduct across the Ages

The Nyāyakusumāñjali discusses not only the physical dissolution of the cosmos but also presents a profound sociological and philosophical picture of the gradual deterioration of human social and cultural traditions. As time passes through successive ages, birth customs, sacraments, education, dedication to study, and the performance of duties progressively weaken.

The most striking example offered is the deterioration of procreation and the customs surrounding birth:

The effects of this deterioration are said to extend beyond the process of birth to the rites of conception and birth themselves. In earlier times, the food consumed by a pregnant woman was purified through mantras and ritual observances. Subsequently, the rites came to be performed upon the pregnant woman herself rather than upon her food; ultimately, only a rite directed towards the foetus developing in the womb remained prescribed.

Stage or age	Process of procreation	Characteristic disposition
First stage (ancient times)	Children arise through mental resolve alone	Pure willpower and the highest development of consciousness
Second stage	Sexual union undertaken by parents solely for the pure purpose of having a child	Duty-motivated conduct in accordance with dharma
Third stage	Obligatory cohabitation of husband and wife impelled by sexual desire	Physical attraction predominates, but within marital bounds
Fourth stage (present times)	Unrestrained and wanton intercourse between women and men, likened to animal behaviour	Complete erosion of place, time, and propriety; animalistic tendencies

This account suggests that, just as the physical world shows a tendency to move from order towards disorder, a corresponding decline of consciousness occurs in the social and moral world. The fall from a purely mental plane to an entirely physical or animal plane is taken as evidence that the tighter the bonds of karma become, the more the living being moves towards inert materiality.

5.7 Interrelations with Other Philosophical Traditions

These propositions of Nyāya did not develop in an intellectual vacuum. They emerged as serious responses and counterarguments to the doctrines of Advaita Vedānta, Viśiṣṭādvaita, Mīmāṃsā, and Buddhist philosophy.

Opposition to Advaita Vedānta and Buddhism

Advaita Vedānta, associated with Śaṅkarācārya, holds that Brahman alone is ultimately real and that the entire world, individual beings, and māyā are its apparent manifestation (vivarta). For Vedānta, the triad of knower, cognition, and known object is real only at the empirical level; at the ultimate level it dissolves into non-duality. Nyāya, by contrast, is thoroughly realist: the knower (self), cognition (pramiti), and known object are fully distinct and real entities. The Nyāya–Vaiśeṣika world is neither illusory nor māyā, but an actual conjunction of atoms. Nevertheless, Nyāya and Vedānta agree that ignorance brings bondage and that true knowledge leads to liberation (apavarga).

Udayanācārya and other Nyāya philosophers, on the other hand, severely criticise Buddhist thinkers. Buddhism rejects the authority of the Vedas, and is in this sense classified as a non-Vedic (nāstika) philosophical system; it does not accept an eternal self, advancing instead the doctrine of non-self. In his Nyāyakusumāñjali and Ātmatattvaviveka, Udayanācārya offers logical refutations of Buddhist momentariness and non-theism, and is even said to have called Buddhist thinkers "deluded" because he regarded them as detractors of revealed Vedic testimony (śruti).

The Perspective of Viśiṣṭādvaita Vedānta and Its Synthesis

Viśiṣṭādvaita philosophy, developed by Rāmānujācārya and the later thinker Vedānta Deśika, makes critical use of many logical principles of Nyāya. In his celebrated Nyāya-siddhāñjana, Vedānta Deśika interprets the objects of valid knowledge (prameyas) discussed in Nyāya in the light of Viśiṣṭādvaita's relation between the body and the indwelling self (śarīra–śarīri-bhāva).

Unlike the Nyāya account, Viśiṣṭādvaita does not regard God merely as an efficient cause or logical agent. Rāmānuja considers God the indwelling ruler of everything and nature to be God's "body." Regarding cosmic dissolution, Viśiṣṭādvaita likewise holds that the insentient constituents of nature and conscious beings are absorbed into a subtle condition within God—an idea somewhat different from Nyāya's atomic disintegration, though conceptually parallel to it. In the Nyāya-siddhāñjana, Deśika explains that the arising and ceasing of sound in the five elements concerns the cessation of sense activity rather than the intrinsic form of phonemes, a position consonant with Rāmānuja's doctrines.

6. Assessment in the Light of Indian Literary Theory

Śleṣa and Vakrokti: The Artistry of the Auspicious Invocation

In the supplicatory verse of the maṅgalācaraṇa, words bearing two meanings (śleṣa) compare the principles of Nyāya philosophy with flowers: the word stabaka means both a "cluster of flowers" and a "chapter of a book." This double meaning is not merely linguistic play. In the sense given by Kuntaka's theory in the Vakroktijīvita, it is an outstanding example of vaidagdhya-bhaṅgī-bhaṇiti—expression distinguished by an artful turn—in which the rigour of logic and the delicacy of poetry coexist. Preserving this double field of signification in Maithili, where even the title has two meanings, posed a genuine challenge to the translator, who has addressed it with explanatory notes.

The Rasas: Wonder and Heroism Within the Primacy of Tranquillity

According to the Kāvyaprakāśa, śānta-rasa is the governing rasa (aṅgī) in a work chiefly concerned with philosophy; this is also the case in the Nyāyakusumāñjali. The delight of victory in argument occasionally permits vīra-rasa to appear, as at the decisive refutation of a non-theistic position; descriptions of the grandeur of cosmic creation, including the creation of the world from atoms, evoke adbhuta-rasa. Both function as subsidiary elements of the governing tranquillity. Devotional feeling becomes strong in the auspicious invocation, in references to release from suffering, and in the account of liberation, thereby reinforcing the devotional branch of śānta-rasa. The translation attempts, as far as possible, to preserve this affective dimension, especially in the invocation and the prayers closing the stabhakas. A delicate touch of karuṇa, prompted by concern for human suffering, further enlarges the work's structure of feeling.

Dhvani Theory: An Offering of Reason Beyond the Literal Meaning

From the standpoint of Ānandavardhana's theory of dhvani, the title and auspicious invocation are especially significant. The metaphor of the "cluster of flowers" (stabaka) does more than divide the book into structural units: through the power of suggestion (vyañjanā) it intimates that reasoning itself is a form of worship, and that a victory of logic is like a flower offered at God's feet. A philosophical resonance thus arises: beyond the literal presentation of arguments (vācyārtha), the suggested meaning (vyaṅgyārtha) of devotion and surrender resounds. The floral metaphor marks a movement from reasoning towards devotion; by the conclusion, argument itself merges into prayer.

Vakrokti and Figures of Speech

The translation makes appropriate use of simile—for example, the illustration of the spade-worker and the potter and pot—metaphor, above all the central image of the floral cluster, and irony, particularly the ironic tone that exposes the self-contradictions of non-theistic positions. Illustrative reasoning, such as inferring fire from smoke, makes abstract Nyāya arguments concrete and comprehensible; this is an aesthetic dimension of inference itself.

The Principle of Aucitya: Kṣemendra's Criterion

Judged by the criterion developed in Kṣemendra's Aucityavicāracarcā, the translation generally achieves a fitting relationship among subject, language, and audience. Its prose rhythm suits philosophical gravity; its technical terminology remains Sanskritic; and its illustrations are accessible through familiar experience. Together these elements display an appropriate balance between Sanskrit-derived learned vocabulary and vernacular Maithili. At certain points, however, terminological severity—such as in the discussions of the causality of absence—burdens the general reader. This marks a limit of its contextual propriety.

Rīti and Guṇa

The translation's chief quality is prasāda: clarity and ease of understanding, particularly in its analogies and illustrations. Its refutational passages display ojas, an energetic force conveyed through firm, relatively uncompounded sentences and sharp logical thrusts. The auspicious invocation, floral imagery, and descriptions of liberation foreground mādhurya, or sweetness. A balance among these three qualities corresponds to the work's threefold character: reasoning, refutation, and devotion. In rhythm and linguistic manner it approaches the Vaidarbhī style, although some densely argumentative passages also suggest the compound-heavy intensity of Gauḍī rīti.

7. In the Light of Western Literary and Interpretive Theories

A methodological caution is essential: these modern theories should be employed as instruments of interpretation available to present-day readers, not treated as historical sources of Udayanācārya's thought.

Aristotelian Rhetoric and Intellectual Drama

Viewed through Aristotle's Rhetoric, the book's structure of pūrvapakṣa and uttarapakṣa takes the form of a classical dialectical demonstration in which three appeals work together: logos (reason), ethos (the authority of the learned speaker), and pathos (devotional feeling).

Russian Formalism and Defamiliarisation

Shklovsky's concept of ostranenie, or defamiliarisation, applies when Udayanācārya uses familiar illustrations—the pot and potter, or the worker with a spade—to disclose unfamiliar metaphysical truths from a fresh angle. Everyday objects acquire new meanings by becoming instruments of philosophical argument.

New Criticism and Internal Unity

From the standpoint of New Critical close reading, an organic relationship can be discerned among the title, invocation, and arguments. The "flower" is not merely an ornament but the central image of the work's organic unity, pervading it from the auspicious opening to its final prayer.

Structuralism and Binary Oppositions

From a structuralist perspective, the work is organised through binary oppositions such as theistic/non-theistic, conscious/inert, eternal/non-eternal, and effect/cause. These oppositions reappear in new forms in each stabaka and ultimately converge, in the fifth stabaka, upon a higher synthesis: an omniscient God.

Bakhtinian Dialogism: The Many Voices of Philosophical Debate

Bakhtin's concepts of polyphony and dialogism offer a natural interpretive framework for the tradition of śāstrārtha. Within the same text, Naiyāyikas, Mīmāṃsakas, Cārvākas, Buddhists, Sāṃkhyas, and Vaiśeṣikas engage one another. No voice is simply suppressed: every opposing position is first presented in a sufficiently fair and complete form, and only then refuted. This plurality of voices is retained in the translation.

Hermeneutics: Schleiermacher, Gadamer, and the Fusion of Horizons

According to Gadamer's concept of the "fusion of horizons," translation builds a bridge between two horizons: the Sanskrit horizon of Udayanācārya in the eleventh century and that of the contemporary Maithili reader. In Schleiermacher's distinction between taking the reader towards the writer and bringing the writer towards the reader, this translation follows a balanced course: it neither wholly foreignises nor wholly domesticates its source.

Reader-Response Theory: Iser's Gaps

In terms of Wolfgang Iser's theory of gaps (Leerstellen), the title "An Offering of Flowers" is itself a space that the reader fills through interpretation. Are these flowers those of reasoning, of devotion, or of both? The translator deliberately preserves this ambiguity, thereby increasing the reader's involvement.

Deconstruction: Possibilities and Limits

Read through Derrida, the work's concept of upādhi—an unwarranted condition—can itself operate as an instrument of deconstruction. It shows how a non-theistic argument may depend excessively upon foundational categories, such as embodiment, and how the argument collapses when that condition is removed. Nevertheless, the work's ultimate objective, establishing the existence of God, is itself a foundationalist project. A deconstructive reading can therefore be applied only partially; that limitation must be acknowledged.

8. Evaluation in the Light of Modern Translation Theory

On Eugene Nida's scale of formal versus dynamic equivalence, the translation largely inclines towards dynamic equivalence, giving priority to the reader's comprehension while also preserving formal fidelity in technical terms. Within Peter Newmark's distinction between semantic and communicative translation, it seeks a balance: semantic precision governs philosophical terminology, while communicative accessibility governs the explanation of examples. From the standpoint of Vermeer's Skopos theory, which treats purpose as decisive in translation, the translator's clearly stated aim—to enable Maithili readers to participate in classical philosophical debate—justifies the choices made throughout the work.

In Lawrence Venuti's opposition between domestication and foreignisation, this translation takes a partly foreignising route. Sanskrit technical expressions such as adṛṣṭa, upādhi, abhāva, and prāmāṇya are retained in respect for the classical source culture's otherness. Yet its sentence construction and presentation of examples also involve domestication, showing a conscious caution against what Antoine Berman calls "deforming tendencies." In Catford's account of translation shifts, the conversion of kārikā verses into prose is a category shift—more specifically, a structure shift—which relaxes the poetic constraints of the original in favour of conceptual clarity. By Gideon Toury's criteria of acceptability and adequacy, the translation leans more towards acceptability: natural target-language norms in Maithili take precedence over strictly formal fidelity to the source-language structures. In the light of André Lefevere's rewriting theory and polysystem theory, the translation establishes within the Maithili literary polysystem a new subsystem of classical philosophical prose, corresponding to the Videha tradition's debates over parallel literary institutions. George Steiner's fourfold "hermeneutic motion" in After Babel—trust, aggression, incorporation, and restitution—is also discernible here: trust in the original text; the probing, intellectually forceful extraction of meaning; its incorporation into Maithili prose; and, finally, the restitution of philosophical balance.

9. Translation Method, Terminology, Style, and Maithili Intellectual Prose

9.1 Not Literal Translation, but Explanatory Scholarly Translation

To describe this work as a literal translation would be to misunderstand its character. Original kārikā verses, the author's own prose, philosophical suggestions, the relationship between earlier and later stages of an argument, and the needs of the modern reader together produce an expanded Maithili version. The book itself rightly favours describing this process as "explanatory scholarly translation."

The advantages of this method are clear: the text becomes readable, stages in an argument become visible, and headings serve as maps through the maze of scholastic discussion. Its disadvantage is that the boundaries among the original, its author's commentary, the translator's explanations, and editorial notes can sometimes become blurred.

A critical edition should therefore clearly distinguish four layers: the original Sanskrit; a close Maithili translation; fluent explanatory Maithili; and editorial commentary. The book's own criticism acknowledges the need for precisely such a separation.

9.2 Navya-Nyāya Terminology and Lexical Policy

The Nyāyakusumāñjali stands at the point of transition from earlier Nyāya to Navya-Nyāya. Its translation appropriately brings into Maithili a vocabulary associated with that transition: abhāva, pratiyogin, upādhi, vyāpti, apekṣā-buddhi, jñātatā, anvitārtha, and abhihitānvaya, among other terms. When explaining a technical expression such as upādhi, the translator also gives a modern logical equivalent ("unwarranted condition") in parentheses, building a bridge between classical and modern logic. Read in terms of the intellectual continuity from Udayana to Gaṅgeśa, the translation adequately exposes the seeds of three central Navya-Nyāya concerns: the analysis of upādhi, the causal status of absence, and the debate between anvitābhidhānavāda and abhihitānvayavāda. The absence of a dedicated technical glossary and comparative table nevertheless remains a limitation for researchers.

The translator's most appropriate decision has been not to replace original Nyāya technical terms forcibly with everyday Maithili synonyms. Hetu, sādhya, vyāpti, upādhi, samavāya, pratiyogin, prāmāṇya, upamāna, śabda-pramāṇa, and abhāva have historically developed definitions. Replacing them might produce simplicity, but philosophical precision would be lost.

Maithili sentence structures have instead been constructed around these terms. The book regards this achievement as the creation of a modern Maithili intellectual prose capable of handling complex objections, alternatives, hetu, sādhya, vyāpti, upādhi, absence, valid means of knowledge, and theories of verbal meaning.

9.3 Vernacular Vocabulary and the System of Headings

Expressions such as "the horn of a hare," "the bumblebee," and "a cowshed in the Ganges" keep the translation alive. They represent more than domestication; they give philosophical abstractions a visible grounding in local experience.

Placing a clear Maithili heading before each complex argument is one of the translation's major editorial accomplishments. Modern readers could easily lose their way in the continuous web of prose and verse of the scholastic original; the headings indicate the direction of the reasoning. The comprehensive study also identifies this heading-marked progression of prose as a major achievement.

9.4 Long Sentences, Readability, and the Intended Audience

Some passages dealing with validity, connected meaning, jñātatā, and inference contain sentences loaded with subordinate clauses. This is not solely a failing of the translator: scholastic reasoning itself has this character. Nevertheless, selective division of long sentences at the editorial stage would improve readability, provided the boundaries of the conclusions remained intact.

In terms of Maithili syntax, the translation is generally natural, although certain long Sanskritic compounds leave traces of translationese. Its policy of retaining Sanskrit tatsama words in technical contexts is a considered decision, preserving scholastic gravity but sometimes making the text difficult for general readers. Clarity and judicious repetition, particularly through headings and question-and-answer presentation, help guide the reader. In tone, the translation maintains the decorum of respectful debate: its presentation of opposing schools contains no contemptuous mockery, in keeping with the propriety of śāstrārtha. As regards readability and audience, it is primarily directed towards highly educated readers interested in philosophy; general readers will need additional supporting material.

9.5 The Ethics of Presenting Opposing Arguments

One demanding test of a philosophical translation is whether it presents an opponent's argument fairly or weakens it so that it may be refuted with ease. By this standard the book succeeds. Cārvāka materialism, Buddhist momentariness, Sāṃkhya theories of causation, Kumārila's and Prabhākara's Mīmāṃsā, and Vaiśeṣika objections all receive sufficient intellectual respect.

This is not merely literary polyphony but philosophical fairness. The translator's voice may emerge victorious at points, but it does not turn the opponent into a buffoon.

9.6 The Historical Importance of Maithili Philosophical Prose

The historical worth of this work rests most firmly upon language. There is no longer any need to prove that Maithili can express love, folk song, narrative, theatre, or poetry. The difficult question was whether it could sustain a sequential analysis of concepts such as vyāpti, upādhi, pratiyogin, jñātatā, anvitābhidhāna, arthāpatti, anupalabdhi, extrinsic validity, counterfactual conditions, and efficient causation.

In practice, this book answers: yes.

This achievement is not simply lexical. Philosophical language is constituted through syntax. The sustained use of argumentative structures such as "if … then …," "the reply to this objection …," "but if this is accepted …," "therefore …," and "hence …" creates within this book a working grammar of Maithili intellectual prose.

10. The Bibliography and the Parallel English Section

Chapter 12: The Complete Bibliography

Chapter 12 makes this vast project accessible for research. The bibliography encompasses the foundational text and its Sanskrit editions; other writings of Udayanācārya; primary works of Nyāya-Vaiśeṣika and Navya-Nyāya; comparative sources in Mīmāṃsā, Buddhism, Sāṃkhya, Yoga, Jainism, and Vedānta; modern scholarship on Udayana; Indian poetics; Western literary theory; translation theory; and sources on Maithili language, literature, and philosophical prose. These nine categories are explicitly distinguished in the table of contents.

The bibliography's breadth accords with the interdisciplinary nature of the book. Bringing together the Nyāyasūtra, commentaries, editions of Udayana, contemporary scholarship, poetics, hermeneutics, and translation studies within one project is exceptionally useful to researchers.

The most important further improvement would be to connect every historical, linguistic, institutional, or quoted claim in the book to the relevant bibliographical entry, with a page reference or note. A bibliography at the end is not sufficient by itself; the reader needs a direct route from each assertion to its source.

The Parallel English Section

The latter portion of the book contains an extensive English rendering. It is not a short summary: it carries its own publication information and contents, research material covering Chapters 1–10, an English presentation of the complete translated text as Chapter 11, and a concluding "Complete PNS Bibliography." The English bibliography includes the primary text, Sanskrit editions, commentaries, translations, Nyāya-Vaiśeṣika, rival philosophical traditions, modern studies, Indian poetics, Western criticism, and translation theory.

The cultural usefulness of the English section is evident. Philosophical knowledge produced in Maithili is no longer confined to Maithili readers: scholars across the world can gain access to its philosophical architecture and methods of translation.

There are nevertheless two problems from the standpoint of book design. First, reproducing all the material makes the book exceptionally large. Second, the absence of chapter-by-chapter and section-by-section parallel page references between the Maithili and English parts can make comparative use difficult.

A future edition would be considerably more valuable for research if the "Maithili Section" and "Parallel English Section" each began on an unambiguous divider page and a concordance were supplied matching Maithili pages and chapters with their English counterparts.

One sound principle of the English bibliography is its retention of published titles in their original foreign-language forms, preserving their identity for scholarship and library searches.

II. Repetition, Scholarly Reliability, and Editorial Refinement

The Question of Repetition Within the Book

Across Chapters 1–10, the same subjects recur repeatedly: Udayanācārya's historical position, the floral metaphor, the five clusters, śleṣa, rasa, polyphony, Nida and Venuti, the sovereignty of Maithili knowledge, parallel literature, and others.

Such repetitions could be reduced under ordinary principles of book editing. Yet the history of this volume's composition reveals two kinds of recurrence. Some instances are genuinely unnecessary; others record the progressive development of criticism—first a review based on three clusters, then a review of the later portion, and finally an examination of all five clusters.

It would therefore be inappropriate to remove every earlier review. The right course would be to place a clear statement at the beginning of each chapter, for example:

"This review was written at a specified cumulative stage of the translation";

"This chapter examines the text then available through the third cluster";

"This chapter offers a comprehensive reassessment after completion of all five clusters."

With these indications, repetition would become part of the "history of translation" rather than remain an editorial "error."

Scholarly Reliability and the Question of the Sanskrit Original

One of the book's wisest admissions is that quality in the target language and fidelity to the original are not the same thing. Even if the Maithili text is elegant, coherent, and logical, reading it alone cannot establish that the meaning of every Sanskrit expression has been preserved exactly. Determining full fidelity requires line-by-line collation with the Sanskrit original.

For that reason, an ideal future "critical research edition" would set out the original Sanskrit kārikās and prose, textual variants, and verse numbers, followed alongside by a close Maithili translation and then an explanatory Maithili rendering. The book itself recommends the Sanskrit original, Maithili text, explanation, glossary, indexes, and a digital parallel display.

Such improvements would not diminish the value of the present translation; they would safeguard its scholarly standing.

Review of Editing and Book Design

The title page, publication information, detailed contents, and chapter divisions of the present edition give it the formal character of a scholarly book. The opening pages clearly identify the original Sanskrit author, translator, editor, year of edition, and publisher.

For a bilingual research work of more than a thousand pages, however, an ordinary table of contents is inadequate. Four concluding indexes would be especially useful at this scale: philosophical terms; persons and schools; examples and illustrations; and Sanskrit kārikās. The book's own critical recommendations also call for a full subject index, a glossary of terms, an index of persons and schools, and cross-references.

A parallel Maithili–English concordance of chapters is likewise needed. Without it, an English reader searching for the equivalent English text of a particular Maithili paragraph will face difficulty.

Caution Concerning Facts and Sources

Discussions grounded in the primary philosophical text provide the book's strongest foundation. But external facts presented in Chapters 5–8—concerning language populations, modern institutions and universities, Unicode, contemporary digital language technologies, digital movements, and the institutional positions of writers—should be supported by footnotes.

Likewise, direct scholarly quotations, Vedic passages, statements from the Bhagavad Gītā and Upaniṣads, and passages attributed to the Nyāyasūtra or its commentators should identify the edition and page, kārikā, or sūtra number.

The bibliography is wide-ranging; the remaining task is to connect it with a functioning system of citations.

The Integrated Meaning of the Work's Ten Principal Intellectual Achievements

Upon reading the book as a whole, its achievements are best understood not as ten separate accomplishments but as one interconnected project. Udayanācārya's Sanskrit reasoning enters Maithili; Maithili develops a language of argument; classical terminology survives; vernacular vocabulary brings the text to life; the philosophical unity of the five clusters becomes clear; opposing positions receive a fair hearing; Indian poetics reveals the work's literary qualities; modern translation studies clarifies the translator's decisions; the research chapters identify the translation's limitations from within; and the parallel English section makes this Maithili knowledge accessible to a worldwide readership.

To call it merely "a Maithili version of Udayanācārya's book" would consequently be too narrow. It is, in reality, an effort to establish an environment for studying Nyāya philosophy in Maithili.

Further Refinements Required

On the evidence of the whole volume, the most necessary refinements operate at four levels. First, the dates and stages distinguishing the initial partial reviews from the later complete reviews should be made explicit. Second, the original text, translation, explanatory voice, and editorial commentary should be visibly distinguished. Third, parallel Sanskrit source text, kārikā numbering, textual variants, and source footnotes should be added. Fourth, Maithili–English parallel contents, a technical glossary, an index of persons, an index of illustrations, and maps of argument should be supplied.

The book already contains a remarkably clear plan pointing in this direction: original Sanskrit text with variants; readable Maithili; explanatory philosophical footnotes; a glossary, indexes, and bibliography of technical terms; and a searchable digital Sanskrit–Maithili parallel view. This is therefore not an accusation brought by an outside critic; the book itself shows the path towards its next, more mature form.

For the general reader, brief chapter-end summaries or diagrams of arguments would also be useful. Occasional Hindi-influenced forms and unnatural word order could be refined into standard Maithili. Every direct quotation should be accompanied by its stabaka, kārikā, edition, or page reference.

12. Final Comprehensive Evaluation

The greatest significance of this edition of the Nyāyakusumāñjali is that it does not merely give Maithili an opportunity to bear the weight of philosophical complexity; it demonstrates Maithili's practical ability to do so. Causality, adṛṣṭa, capacity, momentariness, validity of knowledge, the non-eternity of sound, absence, inference, comparison, verbal testimony, connected meaning, arthāpatti, non-apprehension, jñātatā, atoms, intention, injunction, and inference to God—all these diverse and subtle subjects are brought into a single tradition of prose in the mother tongue.

The translator is most successful where he neither abandons the Sanskrit term nor submits slavishly to Sanskrit sentence structure. The technical memory of the original survives while the grammar of the target language remains active. The work's authentic artistry of translation lies in that dialectical balance.

The repeated self-examination of the critical chapters is another distinctive strength. The book raises questions from within about incompleteness, editorial limitations, the absence of original Sanskrit at certain points, long sentences, and source references. A later, complete study does not render an earlier, partial study irrelevant: it transforms the earlier study into a stage in the work's history. This chronology, however, must be made explicit in the final edition.

Philosophically, the most impressive achievement is not only the eight reasons advanced in the fifth cluster but the preparation of their ground by the first four. From causality to the means of knowledge, from these to language, from language to cognition, from cognition to omniscience, and thence to inference of God: this sequence is the architecture of the Nyāyakusumāñjali. Making that architecture clear in Maithili is the translator's principal success.

Literarily, the floral metaphor binds the work from beginning to end. An argument becomes a flower; a controversy becomes a cluster; a conclusion becomes an offering in joined hands. Tranquillity, intellectual heroism, wonder, and final devotion prevent this rigorous Nyāya treatise from becoming an inert compilation of arguments.

From the perspective of translation studies, the work rejects a simple opposition between fidelity and creativity. At times the source term is retained exactly; at others, vernacular Maithili enters; elsewhere a pun unfolds into two meanings; elsewhere a sūtra becomes explanatory prose. The most fitting description is thus the one the book itself suggests: an explanatory scholarly translation.

Editorially, this massive work still holds the possibility of a more advanced "parallel critical edition." With the Sanskrit original, kārikā numbers, textual variants, a clear division between translation and explanation, source footnotes, expanded indexes, and a Maithili–English concordance, it could become not only an important translation but a standard research edition for university-level study.

The final judgement is this: the present Nyāyakusumāñjali is an exceptionally important achievement of Maithili philosophical prose. Its chief strengths lie in its complete five-cluster translation; preservation of demanding Nyāya terminology; natural Maithili sentences of argument; fair presentation of opposing positions; preservation of the meanings of puns and the floral metaphor; extensive critical self-examination; research-oriented chapters, appendices, and bibliography; and a parallel English expansion. Its principal editorial challenges are to clarify the chronology of earlier partial reviews and the present complete text; distinguish original, translation, and explanation; strengthen source documentation; and arrange the substantial recurring material in its historical sequence.

After these improvements, the work could become more than a Maithili translation of Udayanācārya's Nyāyakusumāñjali. It could serve as a lasting foundational volume for the re-establishment, in the mother tongue, of Mithila's own Nyāya tradition, the enlargement of Maithili intellectual prose, and the renewed life of classical philosophy for modern readers.

81. Tattvacintāmaṇi (Maithili Translation): A Synopsis and Critical Evaluation

Abstract

This study presents a synopsis and critical evaluation of the translated and expanded Maithili edition of the Tattvacintāmaṇi composed by Gaṅgeśopādhyāya. The work is not a novel or a poetic composition in the conventional sense, but an important classical treatise on Indian epistemology, logic, philosophy of language, and ontology.

Abstract · Synopsis

This chapter is entitled "Tattvacintāmaṇi (Maithili Translation): A Synopsis and Critical Evaluation".

A Study in the Light of Indian and Western Literary Theory

Tattvacintāmaṇi [Original Sanskrit Work: Gaṅgeśa Upādhyāya · Maithili Translation: Gajendra Thakur]

This study presents a synopsis and critical assessment of the translated and expanded Maithili edition of Gaṅgeśopādhyāya's Tattvacintāmaṇi. In the conventional sense, this is neither a novel nor a work of poetry; it is a major classical text of Indian epistemology, logic, philosophy of language, and ontology. Yet its arrangement of prima facie positions and responses (pūrvapakṣa and uttarapakṣa), the dramatic movement of its arguments, the progressive refinement of concepts, its linguistic density, and the intellectual wonder it generates make the text amenable to a range of literary-critical approaches. The study comparatively employs Indian concepts such as rasa, dhvani, vakrokti, rīti, aucitya, the powers of words, and the relationship between śāstra and kāvya, alongside Aristotelian logic, Formalism, Structuralism, hermeneutics, reader-response criticism, Deconstruction, Pragmatism, Reliabilism, and analytic philosophy. Its principal conclusion is that the literary character of the Tattvacintāmaṇi lies not in plot but in the architecture of thought, dialogic exchange, definitional discipline, and the ceaseless testing of truth. The Maithili translation re-establishes this classical inheritance within the modern intellectual world of the mother tongue and enlarges the capacities of Maithili academic prose.

1. Introduction: Text, Tradition, Edition, and Critical Problem

Certain works in Indian intellectual history do more than expound their subject: they change the language, methods, and discipline of thinking itself. Gaṅgeśopādhyāya's Tattvacintāmaṇi is such a work. While accepting numerous elements of the older Nyāya–Vaiśeṣika tradition, it places the investigation of the means of knowledge at the centre and develops a technical framework for analysing concepts, relations, absence, cognition, memory, error, inference, and linguistic meaning. This framework profoundly influenced almost every major subsequent school of classical Indian philosophy.

This Maithili translation of Gaṅgeśa Upādhyāya's Tattvacintāmaṇi (translator-editor: Gajendra Thakur; Videha Publications; first edition, 2004; expanded edition, 2026; ISBN 978-93-6123-729-4) constitutes an extraordinary event in the history of Maithili prose. A work composed in fourteenth-century Mithila that transformed the direction of Indian epistemology has, seven hundred years later, returned in its entirety to the living language of its own soil for the first time. That fact itself announces the edition's cultural importance. Rendering into Maithili some of the most difficult Sanskrit scholastic prose—whose concentration of technical terminology is regarded as exceptional in the world's logical literature—was not simply an exercise in linguistic transfer. It was a severe test of Maithili's capacity to sustain scholastic discourse, and this edition demonstrates that the language can meet that test.

The architecture of the book has two levels. On the first level are six chapters, introducing, in sequence, the preliminary philosophical discussion, the section on perception, the section on inference, inference to God, the section on comparison, and the section on verbal testimony. Before readers confront the original text, these chapters furnish the necessary philosophical, historical, and terminological groundwork. At the second level, five appendices offer complete Maithili translations of the five sections: perception, inference, inference to God, comparison, and verbal testimony. A sixth appendix, in the form of a 'study companion', arranges the principal definitions, prima facie positions, established conclusions, objections, and answers in their source sequence; for teaching and revision it operates as a small book in its own right. Finally, a comprehensive verified bibliography encompasses the international scholarly tradition, from the Bibliotheca Indica and Tirupati editions to Frauwallner, Goekoop, Sibajiban Bhattacharyya, V. N. Jha, and Stephen Phillips. Thus the edition simultaneously performs four functions: translation, commentary, textbook, and research reference.

It is therefore not merely a translation but an edited intellectual enterprise that brings together access for readers, classical technical vocabulary, modern comparative perspectives, and regional intellectual history.

The critical problem posed by this study operates on two levels. First, how is the literary value of a philosophical treatise to be assessed? Second, to what extent are the instruments of Indian and Western literary theory genuinely applicable to a classical work of logic of this kind? To answer these questions, we must understand literature not within the narrow limits of imaginative narrative or emotionally resonant verse alone, but more broadly as the ordering, in language, of human experience, knowledge, disagreement, and the making of meaning.

2. Aims, Questions, and Method of the Study

The principal aims of this study are to present a concise yet sufficiently comprehensive account of the overall conceptual structure of the Tattvacintāmaṇi; to examine the literary qualities of its scholastic prose; to determine its points of contact with Indian poetics; to reread it in the light of Western critical theories; and to evaluate the cultural and linguistic significance of its Maithili translation.

The main research questions are these: What constitutes the conceptual unity of the Tattvacintāmaṇi? How does its progression from the prima facie position to the established conclusion produce intellectual drama? How can theories such as rasa, dhvani, vakrokti, rīti, and aucitya be applied to a philosophical text? How do modern methods such as Structuralism, hermeneutics, and Deconstruction illuminate the construction of meaning in Navya-Nyāya? How does the Maithili translation preserve the density of classical scholarship while achieving intelligibility in the mother tongue?

Methodologically, the study is text-centred, comparative, interpretative, and evaluative. It examines the substance of the original arguments, their logical arrangement, examples, terminology, and linguistic style in relation to selected concepts from Indian and Western theory. Historical truth in philosophy and literary effect are considered at separate levels.

3. The Structure and Intellectual Project of the Tattvacintāmaṇi

The central inquiry of this book is how human beings acquire true knowledge, how true and false cognition can be distinguished, and which instruments of knowing qualify as pramāṇas. In place of the older Nyāya arrangement centred on sixteen categories, Gaṅgeśopādhyāya makes the examination of the means of knowledge central, offering a subtle analysis of four pramāṇas: perception, inference, comparison, and verbal testimony.

The intellectual centre of the Tattvacintāmaṇi is pramāṇa. The book's entire inquiry develops around four questions concerning these four avenues to genuine knowledge—perception, inference, comparison, and verbal testimony: how do they produce true cognition, how far does their authority extend, how do defects enter into their operations, and how is truth to be determined?

The pūrvapakṣa in the book's method of composition is no merely ceremonial opponent. The positions of Mīmāṃsakas, Buddhists, Vedāntins, grammarians, and earlier Naiyāyikas are presented in their strongest form. There follows an examination of defects such as deviation (vyabhicāra), over-extension (ativyāpti), under-extension (avyāpti), impossibility (asambhava), infinite regress (anavasthā), mutual dependence (anyonyāśraya), needless complexity (gaurava), and contradiction by stronger evidence (bādha). Definitions and established doctrines are progressively refined through this dialectical process.

The work's unity, therefore, does not consist in the mere aggregation of topics. Its unity lies in a method: no claim to knowledge is accepted until its cause, limit, object, counterexamples, and validity have been made clear. Truth here is not a conclusion fixed in advance but a process of testing.

4. Extended Synopsis of the Work

4.1 Maṅgalavāda and the Examination of Causality

The text begins with a debate about the efficacy of the auspicious invocation (maṅgalācaraṇa). The customary belief is that an invocation causes a book to be completed successfully. Gaṅgeśa tests this assertion against the criterion of positive and negative concomitance (anvaya–vyatireka). Work is sometimes completed without an invocation; conversely, even after an invocation, a book may remain unfinished because of the author's death or other circumstances. Hence the invocation is not, in itself, the direct cause of completion.

The established conclusion is that an auspicious invocation removes possible obstacles. Once obstacles are removed, ordinary causes—an author's effort, knowledge, time, and materials—bring a work to completion. The discussion thus redefines a religious practice within a logical account of causation.

Where a work is finished without an invocation, the prior absence of an obstacle is presumed. In this way, an apparently minor religious question is transformed into a serious logical inquiry into cause and effect.

4.2 Prāmāṇyavāda, Error, and the Truth of Cognition

According to the Mīmāṃsaka doctrine of intrinsic validity (svataḥ-prāmāṇyavāda), cognition discloses its own truth. For the Naiyāyika doctrine of extrinsic validity (parataḥ-prāmāṇyavāda), the truth of a cognition is not established automatically at the moment it arises; it is known through inference, successful activity, or another means of knowledge—that is, through a distinct, subsequent mental process. If every cognition were validated at the instant of its birth, doubt and error ought to be impossible. The very experience of doubt is decisive evidence against intrinsic validity.

The illusion of silver in a mother-of-pearl shell is the famous example in this dispute. In the Prābhākara view, the distinction between the shell present before the senses and the silver recalled from memory is not apprehended: illusion consists in a failure to discriminate. In the Nyāya view, silverness is positively superimposed upon the shell. Under this doctrine of anyathākhyāti, illusion is not a mere blank absence of knowledge, but a defective combination of qualificand and qualifier.

4.3 Perception, Sense–Object Contact, Absence, and Mind

Perception is regarded as immediately presentational valid cognition (sākṣātkārī pramā). Gaṅgeśa discusses the definition of perception; six kinds of ordinary sense–object contact (laukika sannikarṣa)—conjunction (saṃyoga), inherence in what is conjoined (saṃyukta-samavāya), inherence in what inheres in the conjoined (saṃyukta-samaveta-samavāya), inherence (samavāya), inherence in what inheres (samaveta-samavāya), and the relation of qualificand and qualifier (viśeṣya–viśeṣaṇa-bhāva)—and three extraordinary kinds of perception (alaukika): those mediated by universals (sāmānyalakṣaṇa), by knowledge (jñānalakṣaṇa), and by yogic capacity (yogaja). The distinction between indeterminate and determinate perception is another major concern of this section. The defence of indeterminate perception shows that, in the first experience, the object and its universal are grasped separately, not in an already synthesized form; they are received from an external reality rather than fabricated out of a conceptual void. These kinds of contact explain the perception of substances, qualities, actions, universals, sound, and absence.

Inference, comparison, and verbal testimony depend upon prior knowledge, whereas perception arises from a relation between sense faculty and object. A sense faculty is related to more than gross material substances alone.

Treating absence as a distinct reality is an important feature of Nyāya philosophy. Ground on which a pot stands and ground from which the pot is absent may be the very same visible locus, but they are different at the level of experience. Knowing that 'there is no pot on the ground' is not merely knowing the ground; it is perceiving the absence of a pot as qualifying that ground.

At this point Nyāya rejects the necessity of recognising non-apprehension (anupalabdhi) as an independent pramāṇa.

The doctrine that the mind is atomic explains the successive nature of cognitions. Were the mind all-pervading, the objects of all sense faculties would become known simultaneously. Cognition, however, arises successively. The mind is therefore held to be of atomic dimension and connected with only one sense faculty at a time. For second-order, self-referential knowledge such as 'I know that I am seeing a pot', a further mental cognition called anuvyavasāya is acknowledged.

The theory of anuvyavasāya—cognition of cognition—is among the most subtle achievements of this section: illusion is possible in external perception, but it cannot occur in the internal awareness expressed as 'The wall appears yellow to me'.

4.4 Inference, Pervasion, Parāmarśa, and Upādhi

The section on inference is the heart of Navya-Nyāya and the logical climax of the work. It analyses inferential cognition (anumiti), invariable concomitance or pervasion (vyāpti), the status of the subject (pakṣatā), the synthesizing consideration called parāmarśa, limiting conditions (upādhi), hypothetical reasoning (tarka), exclusively affirmative and exclusively negative inferences (kevalānvayī and kevalavyatirekī), and fallacious reasons (hetvābhāsa). The search for a flawless definition of vyāpti—the inseparable relation between probandum (sādhya) and reason (hetu)—begins with the celebrated Vyāptipañcaka and advances towards the formulation known as the Siṃha-vyāghrī definition. The means of apprehending pervasion, the role of tarka, the necessity of contact mediated by a universal (sāmānyalakṣaṇa-pratyāsatti), and the doctrine of upādhi together construct a comprehensive philosophy of inductive knowledge. Pakṣatā is defined as 'siṣādhayiṣā-viraha-viśiṣṭa-siddhyabhāva', thus binding a psychological precondition of inference to logical exactitude.

Inference produces knowledge of a probandum not previously known. Seeing smoke on a mountain permits the inference of fire when the invariable concomitance of smoke and fire is remembered and the presence, in this particular mountain, of smoke qualified by that concomitance is apprehended as a property of the subject. This combined cognition is called parāmarśa.

When defining vyāpti, Gaṅgeśa successively removes possible defects of over-extension, under-extension, impossibility, and contamination by limiting conditions (upādhi). Under this method a definition is not a fixed sentence, but a concept purified in the fire of objections from opposing positions.

It is not enough merely to say, 'Wherever the reason is present, the probandum is present', because concomitance subject to a limiting condition can be irregular.

An upādhi is a concealed condition that accompanies the probandum but not invariably the proposed reason. The inference 'There is fire; therefore there is smoke' is vitiated by the limiting condition of damp fuel, since every fire does not generate smoke. The upādhi thus exposes the difference between observable correlation and genuine invariable concomitance.

The three forms of inference—kevalānvayī, anvayavyatirekī, and kevalavyatirekī—clarify differing circumstances of positive and negative concomitance. Nyāya incorporates the Mīmāṃsaka's supposedly independent pramāṇa of postulation (arthāpatti) within exclusively negative inference, thereby adopting the principle of explanatory economy (lāghava).

4.5 The Five Members of Inference, Debate, and Fallacious Reasons

The five members of a Nyāya argument—proposition (pratijñā), reason (hetu), example (udāharaṇa), application (upanaya), and conclusion (nigamana)—make reasoning public, sequential, and open to examination. The example displays the general rule of pervasion; application brings that rule to bear on the present subject; the conclusion establishes the result.

Hetvābhāsas constitute a systematic classification of internal defects in reasoning. Savyabhicāra denotes an irregular or inconclusive reason; viruddha, a reason establishing the opposite conclusion; satpratipakṣa, an equally powerful counter-reason; asiddha, an unestablished reason; and bādhita, a probandum already defeated by a stronger means of knowledge. This classification is not merely an instrument of scholastic disputation. It retains its usefulness in modern intellectual controversy, judicial reasoning, scientific demonstration, and public dialogue.

4.6 Inference to God, Causal Powers, and Human Ends

Inference to God is founded not on an emotional impulse of faith but on cause-and-effect relations. The earth and other entities are effects; effects require an intelligent maker; accordingly, God is posited as the efficient cause of the universe. Atoms are the material causes, while God is the coordinating efficient cause.

The section on inference to God defends the five-membered inference expressed as 'kṣityaṅkurādikaṃ sakartṛkaṃ kāryatvāt ghaṭavat' ('Earth, sprouts, and the like have a maker, because they are products, like a pot') against a succession of attacks by opponents. Its orderly answers to objections concerning the absence of a common form encompassing the subject, mutual dependence, dubious inconclusiveness, the proof of what is already established, and diversion to a different issue make the section one of the most rigorous logical documents in the Indian philosophical debate over theism.

Objections to the argument include the possibility of a bodiless agent, a plurality of agents, the independent operation of unseen potency (adṛṣṭa), and the natural formation of the world. The Nyāya tradition responds by appealing to will, cognition, effort, power, and the distribution of the fruits of action.

The discussion also examines the theory of the power to burn, the absence of obstructing conditions, causal relations, the doctrine of human ends, the fruits of karma, and liberation. Here God is not simply an object of faith but the object of inference: a conclusion tested by the criteria of subject, probandum, reason, pervasion, and limiting condition.

The work makes the question of God's existence a subject of public reasoning rather than of emotional intensity or religious command.

4.7 Comparison: Knowledge of a Name through Resemblance

Upamāna is knowledge of the relation between a name and its bearer acquired through resemblance. A person who has been told that 'the gavaya is a wild animal resembling a cow' sees a cow-like creature in a forest and understands, 'This creature is called a gavaya'. What arises here is not simply an awareness of resemblance, but a new understanding of the relation between a previously heard word and a presently encountered object.

Gaṅgeśa does not wholly reduce comparison to perception, inference, or verbal testimony. Its independence lies in its distinctive outcome: through a known resemblance, the referent of a word is identified. The inquiry raises subtle questions about the reality of resemblance, unity, plurality, similarity of properties, and the signifying power of words.

4.8 Verbal Testimony, Sentence Meaning, and Intention

The section on verbal testimony is exceptionally rich from the standpoint of the philosophy of language. Words become a pramāṇa when a meaningful utterance by a trustworthy speaker produces true cognition in a listener. Understanding a sentence is held to require expectancy (ākāṅkṣā), semantic compatibility (yogyatā), proximity (āsatti), and intention (tātparya).

Ākāṅkṣā is the mutual expectancy among words; yogyatā is the possible compatibility of their meanings; āsatti is their appropriate closeness; and tātparya is the meaning intended by the speaker. In the instruction 'Sprinkle with fire', grammatical expectancy may be present, but semantic compatibility is absent. In irony, ambiguity, secondary signification, and contextual meaning, the speaker's intention becomes decisive.

The section on words discusses universals and particulars, primary and secondary signification (abhidhā and lakṣaṇā), derivation and established usage (yoga and rūḍhi), compounds, verbal roots, finite verbal forms, prefixes, and the meaning of injunctions. It is consequently not merely a study of the means of knowledge, but also a developed theory of semantics and sentences.

The refutation of Buddhist and Vaiśeṣika objections, the establishment of the non-eternity of words, and the debate over the human authorship of the Vedas are among its other major subjects. In this way, the book builds a complete and internally consistent epistemological architecture out of the four sources of knowledge: perception, inference, comparison, and verbal testimony.

5. Intellectual Drama and Scholastic Prose in the Work

Although it is not a novel, the work possesses a distinctive dramatic movement within its internal structure. Five stages are generally discernible in each discussion:

The pūrvapakṣa presents its position;

The advocate of the established position identifies defects in it;

The pūrvapakṣa responds to those criticisms;

The defender of the established position refines the definition;

Finally, a conclusion is established that is either free from defects or comparatively more defensible.

This structure is the intellectual theatre of classical debate. Philosophical positions take the place of characters; conceptual opposition takes the place of conflict; the most subtle objection assumes the role of climax; and the definition of an established doctrine supplies the resolution. The reader is no passive listener but becomes a fellow thinker who searches each argument for its potential defects.

The dramatic tension arises from the question of whether a proposed definition can withstand the next objection.

The beauty of scholastic prose resides chiefly in terminological discipline, sequential reasoning, and conceptual density. The sentence is intended not to decorate, but to delimit meaning.

6. A Critical Reading in the Light of Indian Literary Theory

6.1 Rasa: Intellectual Wonder and Tranquillity

From the standpoint of traditional rasa theory, a philosophical treatise does not directly organize the emotions of erotic love (śṛṅgāra), compassion (karuṇa), or heroism (vīra). Yet, at the level of the experience of knowing, the dominant sentiment of this work is 'intellectual wonder'. The subtle resolution of complex problems, the disclosure of logical structures concealed within everyday experience, and the gradual refinement of definitions all produce astonishment.

Rasa theory is principally concerned with the emotional experience of drama and poetry. The Tattvacintāmaṇi offers no such conventional artistic design, yet the experience of knowing creates the possibility of an effect comparable to rasa.

The possibility of śānta rasa also lies within the work's ultimate human purpose. The supreme aim of Nyāya philosophy is to obtain liberation (apavarga) through true knowledge, breaking the chain of false knowledge, defects, activity, birth, and suffering. Thus the intellectual journey of this treatise is ultimately linked to the spiritual goal of peace.

6.2 Dhvani: Testing Truth, Intellectual Ethics, and Cultural Suggestion of an Idea

Ānandavardhana's theory of dhvani concentrates primarily on the suggestive meaning of poetry. The Tattvacintāmaṇi, by contrast, is overtly a text of direct signification and definition. Nevertheless, its wider cultural suggestion is unmistakable: truth is not received solely from tradition; it must undergo the tests of reasoning, opposition, exception, and experience.

Every section of the treatise implicitly suggests intellectual independence. Even the doctrine of one's own school is not exempt from criticism. In this sense the work's deepest dhvani is the 'responsibility of thought'.

It is not proper to defeat an adversary by weakening their position; one should present its strongest form and then answer it.

Ānandavardhana's theory of suggestion cannot be applied directly to scholastic prose: the purpose of śāstra is what is explicitly stated, not what is suggested. Nevertheless, a suggestion of an idea (vastu-dhvani) certainly emerges from the overall arrangement of this edition: a work composed on Mithila's soil returns in Mithila's language. This fact is not expressly proclaimed, yet every page implies that Maithili is not merely a language of songs and stories; it is a language capable of the theory of the means of knowledge. This may be regarded as the edition's most profound suggested meaning (vyaṅgyārtha).

6.3 Vakrokti: Conceptual Deflection in the Act of Seeing Kuntaka's vakrokti is a theory of the distinctive obliqueness of expression and aesthetic beauty in poetry. Instead of ornamental obliqueness, Navya-Nyāya prose produces conceptual obliqueness. Ordinary language treats 'absence', 'relation', 'knowledge', or 'similarity' as straightforward; Gaṅgeśa reverses their apparent simplicity and discloses the complexity within them.

The obliqueness, then, lies not in figures of speech but in the standpoint adopted. 'Not being seen' is not the same as 'the perception of absence'; 'two objects are alike' is not the same as asking 'by which property is their similarity delimited?' The distinctive beauty of the work lies in this analytical displacement.

6.4 Rīti, Guṇa, and the Tradition of Scholastic Prose

Indian literary theory recognises a distinction between poetry and śāstra, but scholastic prose also possesses an aesthetics of its own. From Vātsyāyana's commentary to Udayana's Nyāyakusumāñjali, classical philosophical prose has touched poetic excellence through maturity, weight of meaning, and skill in sentence construction. The original prose of Navya-Nyāya represents an extreme of the densely compounded Gauḍī style; the prose of the present translation comes closer to the Vaidarbhī style, with fewer compounds, a predominance of clarity (prasāda-guṇa), and force (ojas) wherever the sharpness of reasoning demands it.

Nevertheless, the subtlety of the subject means that clarity is not uniformly achieved everywhere. Force is especially evident in refutation, the exposure of defects, and the establishment of doctrines; intellectual firmness and definitional rigour take precedence over sweetness (mādhurya). The translator protects without alteration such technical terms as avacchedaka, pratiyogitā, anuyogitā, and siṣādhayiṣā, while the introductory chapters, examples, and accessible exposition make it easier for readers to enter the text.

This balance meets the requirements of Kṣemendra's theory of propriety (aucitya) particularly well. In a translation of śāstra, propriety demands that simplification should not come at the cost of meaning, and that technicality should not become an excuse for obscurity. In a construction such as 'If the Mīmāṃsaka position is accepted … doubt in a state of non-practice would become entirely impossible', both the sharp edge of the original argument and the natural syntactic order of Maithili are preserved.

6.5 Aucitya: Difficulty, Extent, and Purpose

From Kṣemendra's perspective of aucitya, there is a profound congruity among the language, subject matter, and purpose of the work. Subtle entities require subtle technical terminology for their examination. If the concepts of Navya-Nyāya are simplified excessively, their logical boundaries disappear. Difficulty, therefore, is not invariably a defect; some difficulty is a consequence of what is appropriate to the subject.

It is difficult to express subtle relations without such terms as avacchedaka, pratiyogitā, nirūpakatā, and samānādhikaraṇya.

Nevertheless, when the same conclusion is repeated many times as a question-and-answer exchange, synopsis, and restatement, propriety becomes less secure. Repetition intended to assist teaching may be useful to beginners, but for expert readers such length can become burdensome.

An ideal edition should arrange the original translation, accessible explanation, research notes, and practice materials on distinct levels.

6.6 The Powers of Words, the Function of Intention, and Self-Reflective Translation

The section on words supplies, from within Indian semantics itself, the critical instruments for examining the work. Questions of primary signification (abhidhā), secondary signification (lakṣaṇā), derivation (yoga), convention (rūḍhi), universals (jāti), particulars (vyakti), intention (tātparya), and sentence meaning (vākyārtha) are not simply an external study of language: the book also tests the conditions of its own expression.

This self-reflective character makes the Tattvacintāmaṇi a work that philosophises by means of language while simultaneously investigating the nature of language in a philosophical manner.

The book performs philosophy through language and, through philosophy, determines language's limits, capacities, and ability to function as a means of knowledge.

The most intriguing literary-theoretical dimension of this book is that it carries within itself the principles governing its own translation. The four factors of verbal understanding established in its section on words—expectancy (ākāṅkṣā), semantic compatibility (yogyatā), proximity (āsatti), and intention (tātparya)—also constitute four tests of the act of translation. The translator must grasp the mutual expectancy of the words in the original sentence; ensure their semantic compatibility in the target language; preserve the appropriate closeness and order of the words in the sentence; and, above all, determine the author's intended meaning. The Naiyāyika doctrine of tātparya, which treats the speaker's intention as decisive in determining meaning, provides the classical foundation for the translator's own work. In this sense, the translation is a self-reflective (self-aware) text: it is translated according to the very principles it translates. Within the historical conflict between Bhartṛhari's theory of sphoṭa and the Naiyāyika account of verbal understanding arising from the successive connection of words, this translation supplies a practical instance of the Nyāya position: sentence meaning is constructed through the relation between words and their referents and is, therefore, translatable.

7. A Rereading in the Light of Western Critical Theory

7.1 Aristotelian Logic and Rhetoric

Aristotle's rhetoric identifies three principal elements: the credibility of the speaker, the emotions of the audience, and the proof supplied by argument. In the Tattvacintāmaṇi, emotional persuasion occupies relatively little space, and rational demonstration is supreme. Nevertheless, the doctrine of reliable testimony (āptavākya), by raising questions of the speaker's credibility, knowledge, and freedom from defective intentions, enters into dialogue with the Aristotelian notion of the trustworthy speaker.

Nyāya's five-membered inference is more dialogic than the Aristotelian three-part syllogism. Through the example, application, and conclusion, it does not simply announce a result; it leads the listener step by step from the general rule to the subject under consideration.

7.2 Formalism and Defamiliarisation

Russian Formalism emphasises the devices and methods by which a literary work is constructed. From this standpoint, the manner of presentation in the Tattvacintāmaṇi is as important as its actual 'subject matter'. The recurring pattern of prima facie position, response, defect, solution, delimitor, and final definition constitutes the work's primary compositional device.

These devices make ordinary ideas unfamiliar. Acts such as 'seeing', 'not existing', 'being similar', and 'knowing', which seem self-evident in daily life, become complex philosophical events in the treatise. Such defamiliarisation is a principal source of its intellectual force.

7.3 Structuralism: A Network of Relations That Produces Meaning

Structuralist analysis sees meaning not in isolated objects but in networks of relations. Navya-Nyāya similarly depends on relational structures: qualificand and qualifier, locus and dependent, property and property-bearer, counterpositive and absence, probandum and reason, word and meaning, and knower and known.

No element, therefore, is fully defined in isolation: its boundaries are established by relations and differences with other elements. In this respect, the Navya-Nyāya concept of the delimitor (avacchedaka) comes remarkably close to modern structural thinking. The difference, however, is that Structuralism commonly gives priority to linguistic structures, whereas Nyāya accepts the real existence of a world beyond language.

7.4 Hermeneutics and Analytic Philosophy

Hermeneutics in the tradition of Gadamer holds that readers approach a text with their own historical horizons. In this Maithili translation, the horizon of classical Sanskrit scholarship meets that of modern Maithili readers. Translation is not merely a substitution of words; it is a dialogue between tradition and the present.

The introductory chapters, examples, explanations of technical vocabulary, and study companion prepare the reader's prior understanding. Translation consequently becomes not simply a repetition of the original, but an interpretative bridge.

From a hermeneutic standpoint, however, every act of simplification by the translator is also an act of selection. Where the original's multiplicity of meanings or disputed character is reduced to one determinate interpretation, readers may lose access to other possible meanings. A three-tier arrangement of original Sanskrit terminology, Maithili translation, and necessary textual notes would therefore be particularly useful for a work of this kind.

Gadamer's concept of the fusion of horizons (Horizontverschmelzung) offers a precise explanation of this edition's two-level architecture: the horizon of the fourteenth-century scholastic assembly and that of the twenty-first-century Maithili reader come together in the introductory chapters. This is where Gaṅgeśa enters into dialogue with contemporary concepts of analytic epistemology, such as 'reliabilism', 'externalism', and 'fallibilism'. The dialogue is, in the study's account, earned rather than imposed: the scholarly tradition represented by Ingalls, Matilal, Sibajiban Bhattacharyya, and Stephen Phillips has already demonstrated the comparability of Gaṅgeśa's analysis of qualificands and qualifiers with the logical analyses of Frege and Russell, and the anticipations of contemporary reliabilist epistemology in his doctrine of extrinsic validity. The introductory chapters of this edition make that comparative discussion systematically available in Maithili for the first time.

7.5 Reader Response: Two Levels of Readership

The work constructs two kinds of readers. The first is the beginner, who needs questions and answers, examples, accessible explanations, and chapter introductions. The second is the specialist, who seeks the original reasoning, variant readings, the sources and traditions underlying the prima facie positions, distinctions among technical terms, and finer conceptual subtleties.

This edition attempts to address both groups. As a consequence, the explanatory material is at times very simple, while the original text in translation is at times extremely dense. This two-level character increases the work's usefulness but occasionally disrupts stylistic consistency.

An attempt to fulfil both expectations through a single continuous style sometimes produces unevenness; a layered arrangement would be more appropriate.

7.6 Deconstruction: The Persistent Instability of Definitions

Deconstructive criticism uncovers tensions and unstable boundaries within a text. The Tattvacintāmaṇi attempts to establish clear distinctions between truth and falsity, valid and invalid cognition, presence and absence, perception and memory, and word and meaning. Yet the treatise's own discussions show that establishing these boundaries demands a continual addition of qualifications, delimitors, and exceptions.

This does not demonstrate the failure of the work; on the contrary, it testifies to its philosophical honesty. Every definition invites its possible undoing and is then reconstructed in a more subtle form. In this sense, the Tattvacintāmaṇi is not a book of permanently fixed meaning, but of continual discipline and revision in the construction of meaning.

7.7 Pragmatism, Reliabilism, and Externalism

The Nyāya view that the truth of cognition can be determined by successful activity comes close to modern Pragmatism. If action prompted by knowledge of water succeeds in quenching thirst, that cognition has proved successful and valid. At the same time, the truth of cognition is related to an appropriate causal sequence, a position resembling modern reliabilist epistemology. The present work also relates Gaṅgeśa's philosophy to objective causal processes and external realism. For these reasons, Nyāya appears close to contemporary Reliabilism and Externalism as well.

Nevertheless, Nyāya does not reduce truth to utility alone.

7.8 Translation Theory: Schleiermacher, Benjamin, and Venuti

Friedrich Schleiermacher's celebrated division—whether the translator should take readers towards the author or bring the author towards readers—finds a third path in this translation. The introductory chapters lead the reader towards Gaṅgeśa; the complete translations in the appendices bring Gaṅgeśa into the courtyard of the Maithili reader. In Lawrence Venuti's terms, the translation favours 'foreignisation': technical expressions such as avacchedakatva, pratiyogitā, and sandigdhānaikāntikatā are left untranslated because their terminological precision is the lifeblood of Navya-Nyāya. 'Domestication' takes place only at the level of syntax and the arrangement of words. Viewed through Walter Benjamin's 'The Task of the Translator', the translation is an 'afterlife' (Fortleben) of the original: the Tattvacintāmaṇi has not merely been preserved but revived, while Maithili has discovered, through this process, the possibilities of its own 'pure language'—its capacity to bear scholastic discourse.

7.9 Paratext, Reception, and the Recovery of Subjugated Knowledge

In the light of Gérard Genette's theory of paratext, the introductory chapters, study companion, and verified bibliography are not merely supplementary material; they are active instruments in the production of meaning. These paratexts make the work usable in research and shape the reader's horizon of expectations (Jauss's Erwartungshorizont). The most affecting Western parallel, however, is found in Foucault's notion of 'subjugated knowledges' and the approach of Subaltern history. The parallel, Pañjī-based account of Gaṅgeśa's biography—its allegations regarding an inter-caste marriage, connections to a leatherworkers' settlement, and the silence of mainstream biography about these matters—raises questions about the relationship between knowledge, caste, and prestige in medieval Mithila. The study describes this as an example of the genealogical method of historiography. In the author's argument, the very life of one of India's greatest logicians was a battleground between reasoning and social structure, a conflict that remains unresolved in the writing of history today.

8. The Maithili Translation: Craft, Language, Tradition, and the Democratisation of Knowledge

The translator's language policy rests on three pillars. First is terminological integrity: the technical vocabulary of Navya-Nyāya is kept intact, with English equivalents, such as 'Invariable Concomitance', 'Apperception', and 'Qualificandum', supplied in parentheses at first use, thereby connecting the work with international scholarship. Second is the Maithilisation of sentence structure: long Sanskrit strings of compounds are divided into the natural syntactic order of Maithili. Formulae of negation such as 'Nor should it be said that …' and 'Nor can even this be said …' keep the movement of scholastic debate alive in Maithili prose. Third is the dramatic clarity of the sequence from pūrvapakṣa to siddhānta: objections, refutations, restatements, and conclusions are marked with subheadings so that the complete dramatic structure of debate—what Western scholars have called 'dialectical theatre'—is enacted before the reader. The grammatical resources of Maithili, including honorific verb forms, the distinction between 'chathi' and 'achi', and the logical connective force of 'seho', 'ta', and 'mudā', prove fully capable of bearing the subtle differences of scholastic discussion. This itself constitutes the enduring linguistic evidential value of the translation.

Mithila was the birthplace of Navya-Nyāya, yet much of its primary material remained restricted to Sanskrit or foreign languages for modern Maithili readers. The translation lessens this historical irony: it is an act of cultural reclamation and the linguistic democratisation of knowledge.

The exposition of such subjects as prāmāṇya, vyāpti, avacchedaka, pratiyogitā, upādhi, anuvyavasāya, and tātparya demonstrates the capacities of Maithili academic prose.

It establishes that Maithili is not merely a language of feeling, folk poetry, domestic life, popular culture, songs and stories, or emotional expression, but an effective vehicle for subtle logic, epistemology, the philosophy of language, and ontology. It reconnects Mithila's philosophical inheritance with the present linguistic community and expands the possibilities of Maithili academic prose through the creation of technical vocabulary and the ordering of scholarly sentences.

The historical importance of the translation also lies in restoring Mithila's classical rationalism to the linguistic rights of the modern Maithili-speaking public.

The principal challenge is terminological consistency. Different Maithili renderings of the same Sanskrit term, unnecessary foreign-language glosses in parentheses, excessive literalness, or excessive simplification can all alter the boundaries of meaning.

9. Principal Artistic, Intellectual, and Cultural Achievements

The work's greatest achievement is logical subtlety. Before any definition is accepted, every possible exception to it is sought. Such intellectual discipline transforms the reader's very way of thinking.

Its second achievement is dialogic openness. Opposing positions are not presented in their weakest form; instead, their most powerful arguments are stated and answered. The treatise thus offers a genuine ideal of classical debate.

The third achievement is its demonstration of the inseparable connection between knowledge and language. Truth is not derived only from objects; understanding it depends on words, relations, memory, intention, sense–object contact, and mental processes.

The interconnections among epistemology, ontology, philosophy of language, and psychology constitute another major achievement of the work.

A fourth achievement is intellectual ethics. The treatise teaches its readers that one must examine reasons before falling in love with conclusions; respect for tradition must not become a reason to prevent its critical examination.

Making a vast treasury of classical knowledge available in Maithili is the distinctive cultural accomplishment of this edition.

10. Conclusion

The Tattvacintāmaṇi is not merely a historical inheritance of Indian philosophy; it is a method of thought. It is a great monument of Indian rationalism. Its fundamental power lies not simply in establishing any one doctrine, but in constructing a disciplined method of thinking. The text teaches that a claim to knowledge is acceptable only when its cause is clear, its range is secure, objections and counterexamples have been answered, and its language is free from confusion.

It may finally be said that the true protagonist of the Tattvacintāmaṇi is not any individual but 'true knowledge'. Its conflict is with ignorance, illusion, obscurity, and definitions that fail to cover their intended cases. Its narrative is the story of the progressive refinement of thought; and its ultimate achievement lies in making human intelligence more subtle, responsible, and directed towards truth.

Every claim must face questioning, every definition an exception, every conclusion evidence, and every use of language responsibility for meaning.

Taken as a whole, this edition is historically significant on three levels. At the epistemological level, it makes Gaṅgeśa's complete fourfold system of the means of knowledge available as a whole in Maithili for the first time. At the linguistic level, it provides decisive evidence of Maithili's capacity to sustain scholastic discourse: the language that can sing Vidyāpati's lyric compositions can also convey the subtleties of the Siṃha-vyāghrī definition. At the cultural level, it is the repayment of a historical debt: the work Mithila gave to the world has travelled around that world—through Calcutta, Tirupati, Vienna, and Harvard—and returned to the language of its birthplace. Whether judged by the Indian poetics of propriety and intention or by Western theories of translation and hermeneutics, the work emerges as a mature, self-aware, and enduringly important translation of śāstra, opening a new chapter of classical scholarly prose in the history of Maithili writing.

11. Comparative Table

Critical perspective	Relevant element in the Tattvacintāmaṇi	Principal conclusion
Rasa theory	Wonder generated by reasoning; the goal of overcoming suffering	Intellectual wonder culminating in tranquillity

Critical perspective	Relevant element in the Tattvacintāmaṇi	Principal conclusion
Dhvani	Continuous testing of claims received from tradition	Intellectual ethics and orientation towards truth
Vakrokti	Conceptual reconstruction of ordinary experience	An oblique perspective as the work's aesthetic force
Aucitya	Technical difficulty appropriate to a subtle subject	Necessary difficulty is justified; repetition should be limited
Formalism	Structure of pūrvapakṣa, defect, and established doctrine	The mode of presentation is as influential as the subject matter
Structuralism	Qualificand–qualifier, reason–probandum, counterpositive–absence	Meaning constructed through a network of relations
Hermeneutics	Dialogue between the Sanskrit original and modern Maithili readers	Translation as a fusion of horizons
Deconstruction	Unceasing revision of definitions	Disciplined refinement rather than fixed meaning
Reliabilism	True cognition arising from appropriate causal conditions	The truth of knowledge is procedural and objective

Gajendra Thakur (village Menhath, via Jhanjharpur, Madhubani district).

Special assistance: Shri Keshav Mahato (Bahadurganj, Kishanganj district, Bihar).

Shri Keshav Mahato, an informant for this fieldwork, is a co-author of this essay on account of his special assistance with the field study of Sīt–Basant. Several different versions of the story of Sīt–Basant were found, and their details are recorded in the places where they arise. Folktales are exceedingly important for understanding society and culture; yet a folktale written without fieldwork cannot fulfil its purpose. I am also grateful to Shri Subhash Chandra Yadav, whose paper on this subject—fieldwork and folktales—I heard at a seminar and which inspired me to pursue this work with greater dedication.

Modern techniques of fieldwork were used for this study. The folktale was constructed on the basis of participation, observation, interviews, questionnaires and related methods. Altering the form of a folktale or folk poem in any way is unscientific, and care has been taken to avoid doing so here.

Maheshwar Singh was the king of the city of Manipur.

He was a mighty king, and he governed his kingdom very well.

After some time, two sons were born to the king.

His queen, too, was a woman of good conduct and self-respect.

This is something that happened once.

The queen lived in her palace, and for a long time two paurkī birds—doves—had made a nest there. One day the female laid two eggs in the nest, and two chicks hatched from them. Then, unexpectedly, the mother of those chicks died. The little birds began to suffer greatly. After some days their father brought back another female paurkī from the forest as his new mate. Two or four days passed somehow. Then one day, as the new mate fed the two chicks, she put thorns into their mouths. Both chicks died at once. After they had died, she pushed them out of the nest with her beak so that they fell to the ground. The queen was in the palace at the time and saw her throw the chicks down. From that day a fear arose in the queen's mind, and anxiety beset her continually.

The queen said to the king: "O King, look! Two paurkī birds used to live in our palace. They had two chicks. The chicks' mother died, and afterwards the father brought home a second wife. Within a few days she killed both chicks. So, O King, if I, too, should die and you marry again, might not the same thing happen to our two children?"

The king replied, "My queen, you are still alive. Why are you worrying about such a thing now?"

The queen said, "No, O King. If I die, surely you will not marry again?"

The king answered, "No. I shall not marry a second time."

Saying this, the king went back to the entrance of his residence.

From that day the queen grew sorrowful, and one day she died unexpectedly.

The king was greatly troubled by what had happened. His two sons, Sīt and Basant, were also plunged into difficulty.

The king's female attendant, ministers, clerks and many others began to advise him.

They said, "Your Majesty, if you do not marry again, what will become of these two children? There will be no proper arrangement for either their food or their education. That is why you should marry."

Persuaded in this way, the king said, "Very well. Since that is the opinion of all of you, go and find a girl from a poor family, and I shall marry her."

Once they had understood and considered the king's words, his clerks and ministers began looking for a girl. They found one in the king's own city. She was the daughter of a very poor family. At an auspicious time fixed for the marriage, the king married her and brought her home. For a while she lived peacefully in the household. After some days her affection for the two brothers began to lessen. The boys used to return from school and play with a ball outside their door. One day, quite by accident, the ball fell into the courtyard.

Their stepmother was in the courtyard at that moment. As soon as the ball fell, she picked it up and kept it in her lap. Searching for it, the two brothers came into the courtyard and said, "Mother, please give us our ball. The two of us were playing with it." Their mother replied, "I have no ball. Go away." But the two brothers could see the ball in her lap. They asked again: "Mother, please give us the ball. We want to play." They went on asking until they took the ball out of her lap. When the ball was taken away, great anger rose in the queen's heart. Filled with rage, she lay down on a couch and gave up eating and drinking. Her attendants exhausted themselves trying to persuade her: "Come, Your Majesty, let us have something to eat." But the queen gave no answer. She said, "Now I shall die." Hearing this, an attendant went to the king and said, "The queen is desperately unhappy. She may not survive. Please go and see her." At these words the king went to the palace and questioned the queen: "How have you come to such a state? Tell me at once."

The queen said, "If you are asking me, first swear an oath to me, and then I will tell you. Otherwise I shall die." Without thinking, the king made the promise. After he had sworn, the queen said, "Your two sons have brought me to this condition. There is only one cure for my sickness; otherwise I cannot live. You must kill both of them, take out their hearts and bring the hearts to me. Only then can I recover." Hearing this, the king became terribly angry. He summoned both his sons, beat them severely and sent them off to be killed by executioners. The executioners dragged the brothers, beating them, into the forest. The brothers were weeping bitterly. When the executioners were about to kill them, they pleaded: "Do not kill us. If you let us go, we will never return to the city. Kill an animal instead and take its heart back with you." Saying this, the two brothers also handed over all the money they had. One executioner said, "Kill them." Another said, "No, do not kill them. Even if they return, we can say, 'What could we do? We brought back their hearts. They must have come back to life after they died.'"

The executioners did just that and set both brothers free.

Story version 1: The executioners did just that and set both brothers free.

The brothers began wandering through the forest. At night they lay down to sleep beneath a tree. After a while they woke and saw a snake climbing it. Two young swans lived in that tree; their parents had gone out to forage. On seeing the snake, the young swans began to cry out.

The brothers thought, "Look, this snake will eat the young birds." So they struck it with a sword, killed it and knocked it to the ground. The chicks stopped crying. When morning came, the male and female swans returned from feeding and brought food for their young. But when the mother tried to feed them, the chicks refused and said, "Mother, tell us this: are we the first young you have raised in this tree, or have you had chicks here before?" Their mother replied, "I have had chicks here before, but you two are the only ones whose faces I have ever lived to see."

Story version 2, more popular and widespread in the area: The executioners did just that and set both brothers free.

The two brothers wandered about the forest for a long time. At night they slept beneath a tree. In the morning they set out from the forest towards another country. Overcome by hunger and thirst, they sat beneath a tree to rest, wondering what they could do. In that tree were two young mynah birds. One said, "Whoever eats my flesh raw will very soon obtain a kingdom." The other said, "Whoever roasts and eats me will become a king after some days." The brothers heard this. Taking a stick, they struck down and killed both young birds, picked them up and went on. A little farther ahead they saw herdsmen tending cows and buffaloes and burning a tangle of thorny ber bushes. The brothers thought, "Let us roast these birds in that fire and eat them." They roasted the two young mynahs in the fire and ate them. Because they cooked them among thorns, thorns entered their destiny as well.

The brothers moved on from there. After walking a little farther, they came upon a mango grove.

Basant had grown exhausted from walking and could go no farther.

Sīt said, "Brother, sit here. I shall go to that village and beg for something to eat. Then we can eat and continue on our way." Sīt went into the village to beg. In the village he entered—called Hastinapur in some tellings of story version 3—the king had arranged a svayaṃvara, in which his daughter would choose a husband. A great crowd had gathered. Sīt stopped to see what was happening. He became absorbed in the spectacle and forgot his brother. At the svayaṃvara the princess walked around the assembly carrying the wedding garland and placed it around Sīt's neck. Sīt was married to the girl then and there.

(Version 4.) Before the marriage, the people present began to say, "Though she is a king's daughter, she has put the garland around a beggar's neck! The girl must have lost her senses. Take the garland off his neck and put it around someone else's, or we shall not allow the marriage." Hearing them, the girl said, "If it is this very beggar who is written into my fate, where would I find a king instead? I shall marry him." All the assembled kings departed for their homes, saying, "Drive this girl out of the village and send her elsewhere." The king did so: he sent the couple out of his village. They began to live nearby, in the same town. After some time, people again urged the king to separate his daughter from the young man and marry her to someone else.

At everyone's insistence, the king sent a scheming old woman, carrying poison, to the place where Sīt and the princess were living. The old woman began staying with them. Several days passed and neither of the couple suspected anything. One day Sīt suddenly became extremely thirsty and said to his wife, "Please give me some water to drink." The old woman sprang up at once, dissolved poison in a glass of water and handed it to Sīt. As he was desperately thirsty, he took the water and drank it immediately. After a short time, the poison began to affect him strongly; its effects gradually increased and he became drowsy. The old woman said, "Nothing is wrong. Do not worry. Everything will be all right." A little while later Sīt died. His wife wept inconsolably. There was no village near the place. They carried Sīt to the riverbank and buried him there. The old woman said, "Look, do not be anxious now. Let us bathe." When they went to bathe, a boat was moored at the bank. The old woman said, "Come, we can sit on that boat and bathe." The two sat on the boat and began bathing. Slowly the boat began to move away. When it reached midstream—version 5 also calls the princess Phulvantī—the princess realised the boat was already in the middle of the current. She understood that the old woman was deceiving and carrying her away. Grieving for her dead husband, she thought, "When my husband has died, what use is there in my remaining alive?" With that thought she leapt from the boat into the river. She was carried a long way downstream before the current washed her ashore.

Now, the story of Basant:

Basant remained in the mango grove, waiting for his brother. Day turned to evening. Some potters were gathering dry leaves in the grove. Weeping, Basant went up to one of them. The potter asked, "Why are you crying?" Basant told him everything. The potter said, "Do not worry. Come to my house. You may stay there." Basant went with the potter and began living in his home. While he was staying there, a travelling merchant set out on a trading journey in his ship; but the ship came to a standstill in the middle of the river.

The merchant asked the ship's engineer—version 6 also gives the merchant the name Naikā Banijārā—why the ship would not move any farther. The engineer said, "The ship demands a sacrifice. It will move on only after a human child is sacrificed." Hearing this, the merchant took three lakh rupees and went in search of a child. In the course of his search he came to the village in which Basant lived. As he went along he called out, "Whoever gives me a child shall receive three lakh rupees!" He kept calling, but nobody answered. When he reached the potter's doorway, the potter said, "Yes, I shall give you a boy. I want the money." The merchant gave the potter three lakh rupees, took Basant away and brought him to the ship.

Basant asked him, "Merchant, where are you taking me?"

The merchant replied, "I am taking you to be sacrificed. My ship has stopped in the middle of the river, and I shall offer you as a sacrifice." Hearing this, Basant said, "O merchant, if, once I go there and touch the ship, it begins to move, you will let me go, won't you?"

The merchant answered, "If the ship starts moving, I shall release you."

Basant went into the middle of the current, touched the ship with his hand and said, "Ship, please go on your way, so that my life may be spared."

No sooner had he spoken than the ship set off.

The engineer said to the merchant, "Take him aboard the ship. What if it comes to a halt somewhere else?"

Basant said, "If you had killed me, where would you have brought me from if the ship stopped again?"

The merchant said, "Let him go."

Basant left, walking along the bank of the river, and reached the place where Sīt's wife was weeping.

Basant asked her, "Why are you crying?"

Hearing this, she stopped crying and fell silent.

Basant said, "I, too, have been struck by sorrow. We were two, but after our separation I have become one."

The woman asked, "What is your name, and what was your brother's name?"

Basant replied, "My name is Basant, and my brother was called Sīt."

On hearing this, the woman began weeping again and said, "Your brother has passed away. It is for him that I am grieving." Hearing this—version 7 also uses the name Dil Basant—Basant said, "Then I, too, have no wish to remain alive."

As soon as she heard those words, Sīt's wife died. At that very moment Basant entered the forest, climbed a large tree and prepared to take his own life. Just then a voice from the sky addressed him: "Basant, do not throw away your life. Your brother is alive. Go to the place where his body lies. Cut the little finger of your right hand and sprinkle its blood upon him. Your brother will come to life." Hearing this, Basant climbed down and did exactly as he had been told at the place where his brother's body lay. Sīt rose, saying, "Rām, Rām." The brothers embraced. They set out together. Day gave way to evening, and they stopped beneath a tree.

Sīt said, "Brother Basant, let us stay here. When morning comes we shall set out again."

The two brothers passed the night beneath that tree.

Folktale version 8: At midnight a snake came out of the forest and began climbing the tree. In that tree was a swan's nest with two young swans in it. When the chicks saw the snake, they began crying out. The brothers heard the cries and saw the snake climbing. They thought, "The snake will eat those chicks. If we kill it, their lives will be saved." So they killed the snake.

Meanwhile the mother swan had gone to feed at the pond. She had laid eggs and raised chicks in that nest many times, but not a single young bird had survived. At daybreak she returned from feeding at the pond. Seeing the chicks alive, she was overjoyed. When she offered them food, they turned their faces away and asked, "Mother, how many times have you had young in this tree? Or are we your first chicks?"

The mother said, "No. I have had young here many times, but yours are the only faces I have ever seen alive."

The chicks said, "You would not have seen our faces either if these travellers had not been here. Look down below and see what is lying there."

The swan looked down and saw a snake lying on the ground and two travellers moving about nearby.

The chicks said, "It was these two travellers who killed that snake. Go first and give the travellers something to eat. We shall eat only after they have eaten."

The swan came down and said, "Travellers, unless you eat, my two chicks will not eat either."

The brothers replied, "Mother, love is greater than food. Mother, we too have been battered by circumstances. Who will help us?"

The swan said, "You helped me, and I shall help you. Here, I give you one of my children. This child will help you. When it grows up, it will be able to carry both of you on its wings and fly wherever you wish to go. I bestow this blessing on you: both brothers shall prosper." The brothers bowed and went on their way. Wherever they stopped, the young swan spread its two wings and shaded them. Several days passed in this way. The young swan grew big enough to carry both brothers on its back.

The swan said, "Brothers, now both of you may climb upon my back. Wherever you tell me to go, I shall carry you."

The two brothers mounted the swan and flew on until they reached the city of Kanchanpur. Outside the city stood a banyan tree. They set up a resting place near it, lived there and went into the city to work. In the evenings they ate near the tree and slept there. All night long the swan watched over the brothers. After some time, Sīt fell in love with Kanchanā, the daughter of the king of Kanchanpur.

The princess was weighed against flowers every day. After she fell in love, her weight began to increase greatly. Word reached the king, who asked why his daughter's weight was increasing. He stationed guards all around the palace. Even so, Sīt would ride the swan into the palace. The entire city was stirred by the question: who was this person secretly entering the king's palace? One day Sīt came as usual. The two sat on a couch, laughing and joking, and both fell asleep. The poor swan returned alone to their resting place. At dawn Sīt and the princess were discovered together in the palace.

The king questioned them about everything, and Sīt told him the whole story.

The girl said, "This is what is written in my destiny, and so it shall remain."

After considering the matter, the king said, "Bring your brother here, and bring the swan as well."

Sīt brought Basant and the swan. The king was very pleased to see the swan.

The king said, "My minister has a daughter. Both brothers shall be married at the same time."

The weddings of both brothers were celebrated with great pomp.

Sīt inherited the kingdom of Kanchanpur, for the king had only one daughter. After some days Sīt said, "Now I shall go to my own city."

The king joyfully bade farewell to the four of them—his daughter, his son-in-law, and the other newly married couple. Sīt and Basant set out for their own country. After several days they reached their city and found it in a desperate condition. They built a dwelling in one corner of their former kingdom and began living there. Sīt's mother and father had both gone blind. Calamity had overtaken them from every direction. One day the parents heard that another king had built a house and was living in a corner of their kingdom. They said, "Come, let us go and meet him."

When they arrived at the doorway, Sīt and Basant immediately recognised them as their mother and father. The two brothers signalled to their wives: "Take these two inside. Bathe them properly, dress them in fine clothes and give them plenty of good food. Then bring them here and seat them on the dais."

Afterwards Sīt and Basant stood before their parents and said, "Please tell us: how many sons do you have?"

King Maheshwar Singh replied, "I had two sons, but now I have neither. It is the fault of my fate. I do not know whether they are alive or dead. I had ordered them to be killed."

Sīt and Basant said, "No. Both of your sons are alive." As they spoke, tears came to their eyes.

"Father, we are those very sons, Sīt and Basant."

At that moment the king's eyes opened. He clasped the two brothers in his arms, wept and acknowledged his mistake. "Bless you, my children. May your lives be long. May you live for ever."

83. Munnājī's "Māñjh Āṅganme Katiāel Chhī" ("Marginalised in the Middle of the Courtyard")

Abstract

"Māñjh Āṅganme Katiāel Chhī" is the title of Munnājī's collection of rubāĭyāt and ghazals. Is it influenced by Kabir's paradoxical utterances, or is this simply the nature of the ghazal? It is neither the influence of Kabir's paradoxes nor an intrinsic trait of the ghazal: it is a reality.

Keywords: Munnājī · middle · courtyard · marginalised · literary criticism · Maithili

Abstract · Summary

This chapter presents a critique of the poetry in Munnājī's "Māñjh Āṅganme Katiāel Chhī." Munnājī, the middle, the courtyard, marginalisation and the ghazal poet emerge as principal centres of attention. Through examples, quotations and arguments available in the original material, the discussion examines poetic texts, metre, imagery, language and feeling, enabling readers to understand both the critical structure of the subject and its wider context.

"Māñjh Āṅganme Katiāel Chhī" is the title of Munnājī's collection of rubāʻiyāt and ghazals. To be pushed aside—and that, too, in the very middle of the courtyard! Is this an effect of Kabir's paradoxical utterances, or does it arise from the nature of the ghazal? Neither: it is a reality. Many people like Munnājī have been pushed to the margins; despite their talent, they have become lost to view. But the ghazal poet assumes all the blame himself.

Now I stand pushed aside in the very middle of the courtyard;
By my own ways I have now been set adrift.

That is precisely why he begins to savour the pleasure of tears.

Tears are falling, yet it somehow feels like pleasure;
What a beautiful sorrow of love I have taken upon myself!

He falls into a great pit, and even for that he holds himself responsible:

I learnt no lesson from even the slightest stumble;
That is why I fell into such a deep pit.

Has the ghazal poet, then, forgotten the importance of love? No: everyone needs love.

People of every age need love;
Until death itself, they need care and well-being.

And it is not as though he has only a kos or two to travel. He has a very long way to go; that is why he needs love.

Envy may carry you a kos or two;
To go farther ahead, you need love.

The principle applies everywhere. I had a friend who came first in an examination. He declared, "Either I do not compete at all, or, when I do compete, I come first." He was not a ghazal poet; had he been one, he might have written as Munnājī does:

Let the clouds hang heavy; it matters little;
If they rain, let them come down as a downpour.

He presents both the difference that a change of perspective makes and the idea of the glass being half full in this form:

Look with your gaze raised, and this world will seem empty;
Lower your gaze, and you will see everything in this world.

The ghazal poet values both criticism and opposition.

Keep yourself on guard against your own partisans;
Do not regard everything an opponent says as bitter.

People are distressed by rising prices; observe the image of a swaying raised watch-platform that he employs to describe them:

Inflation dries up not only the blood but the bones;
People now seem like platforms swaying in the wind.

And consider this paradoxical utterance: the image is new, the feeling timeless.

I lit a bonfire in the summer month;
Sometimes I warmed myself at a fire long extinguished.

What gathering is this? It resembles the politics of printing sponsored letters in a magazine. Consider this rubāʿī:

The heart grew sorrowful at the cries of anguish;
The spectators rose and fled the fighting;
The sponsor merely kept his ears pricked up;
The organisers were exposed by caste factionalism.

But if the subject of floods failed to become part of the Maithili ghazal, we would have to conclude that the ghazal poet had cut himself off from society. That, however, is not the case.

The river's current is still in spate;
People stand watching and waiting on the embankment.

Migration out of Mithila has now diminished. Outsiders have come to treat "Bihari" as synonymous with a labourer or manual worker. The ghazal poet's pen addresses this too.

Bihar's very appearance seems to have changed now;
With fewer labourers, even company owners look like Biharis.

Munnājī's ghazals and rubāʿiyāt flow freely, like a bamkolā borne along without restraint. The nature of a sher, or couplet, is such that, when it is expressed well, listeners cannot help responding with appreciation. Seeing the way ghazals and rubāʿiyāt are spreading in Maithili, one feels that, even more than these genres are enlarging their own reach, Maithili itself is benefiting and expanding through them.

84. Binīt Thākur's "Bāṅkī Achhi Hamar Dūdhak Karj" ("The Debt of My Mother's Milk Remains Unpaid")

Abstract

With a collection of ten songs titled "Bāṅkī Achhi Hamar Dūdhak Karj," Mr Binīt Thākur, a teacher at Pragati Adarsh E. School in Lagankhel, Lalitpur, has come before readers. This is the second book this year to appear in Mithilākṣara as well as Devanagari. I have sent it to Anshuman Pandey for Unicode mapping, since Binītjī gave me permission to send the book by email; I thank him for that. In "Bharal Norme" ("With Tears Brimming"), the poet asks whether anyone ever secured their rights by sleeping. In "Gām Nagarme" ("In Village and Town"), he declares that Madhesis will claim their rights in a democracy; and in "Koro ā Pāṛhi" he asks who, apart from the poor themselves, can understand the blows of poverty, thereby also placing his economic thinking before us.

Abstract · Summary

This chapter offers poetic criticism of Binīt Thākur's "Bāṅkī Achhi Hamar Dūdhak Karj." Binīt, Thākur, what remains, our, and the debt of milk emerge as principal points of attention. Through examples, quotations and arguments in the original material, the discussion examines poetic texts, metre, imagery, language and feeling, enabling readers to understand both the critical structure of the subject and its wider context.

With a collection of ten songs titled "Bāṅkī Achhi Hamar Dūdhak Karj," Mr Binīt Thākur, a teacher at Pragati Adarsh E. School, Lagankhel, Lalitpur, has appeared before readers. This is the second book this year to have been published in Mithilākṣara as well as Devanagari. I have sent it to Anshuman Pandey for Unicode mapping because Binītjī gave me permission to email him the book; I thank Binītjī for that permission.

In the poem "Bharal Norme" ("With Tears Brimming"), the poet asks whether anyone has ever gained their rights by sleeping; in "Gām Nagarme" ("In Village and Town"), he declares that Madhesis will secure their rights under democracy. In "Koro ā Pāṛhi," he asks who other than the poor could understand the suffering poverty brings, and thus also presents his economic thinking. In "Cahundis Amaṅgal" ("Ill Omens on Every Side"), he expresses his environmental concern over the destruction of forests, saying that even the birds' chirping can now scarcely be heard. In "Je Karathi Ghoṭālā" ("Those Who Commit Scams") he strikes relentlessly at corruption, and in "Jāitak Ṭukṛī" ("Fragments of Caste") at the caste system; in "Beṭīk Bhāgyavidhān" ("The Fate Ordained for a Daughter"), his emotions surge. In "Kampyuṭarak Duniyā" ("The World of Computers") and "Aṅgarejiyā," the poet has not forgotten contemporary life. In the final poem, "Tāl Misrī" ("Palm Sugar Candy"), he speaks with a somewhat satirical tone of a bridegroom's affection for his in-laws, demonstrating his skill in this area too. Although this is the poet's first published work, the range of subjects on which he has composed poetry is extraordinarily praiseworthy.

85. Santosh Kumar Mishra — "Enā Kie..?" ("Why So..?") and "Posput" ("Foster Son")

Abstract

Santoshjī's poetry collection "Enā Kie..?" gives grounds for confidence in the future of Maithili poetry. It brings together twenty-four poems by the young poet. In "Enā Kie..?" Santoshjī foregrounds the problems faced by women, while in "Kālpanik Satya" ("Imagined Truth") he brings out the conflicts of a philosophy of life.

Abstract · Summary

This chapter presents a dramatic-critical study of Santosh Kumar Mishra's "Enā Kie..?" and "Posput." Santosh, Kumar, Mishra, Enā and Kie emerge as principal points of attention. Through examples, quotations and arguments available in the original material, it examines dramatic texts, character arrangements, stage structure and cultural context, enabling readers to understand both the critical structure of the subject and its wider context.

Santoshjī's poetry collection "Enā Kie..?" gives grounds for confidence in the future of Maithili poetry. It contains twenty-four poems by this young poet.

In "Enā Kie..?" Santoshjī raises the problems of women, while in "Kālpanik Satya" ("Imagined Truth") he brings to the fore the contradictions of a philosophy of life. "Bicitra" ("Strange") is likewise concerned with conflict, whereas "Ainā" ("Mirror") takes the poet back to memories of childhood. In "Duvidhā" ("Dilemma"), the poet wonders whether his falling in love—after drowning experience and losing touch with feeling—constitutes a social offence. In "Bhadrak Bali" ("Sacrifice of the Respectable"), the images of sparing neither Sagarmatha nor Makalu and of devouring the Koshi and Karnali make the poem effective. Once the monster killed in hiding; now it kills openly, and the law is in its hands. "Hamar Māykeṁ Buddhiye Nahi Chaik" ("My Mother Has No Sense") reveals a truth of contemporary society: a good person is one who has money; one must pay a bribe to secure a good position and deceive the people in order to become a great leader. In "Nāmī Baniñāke.." the poet feels utterly worthless on hearing the voice of a fine singer. "Annesaṁ Ānand" ("Joy from Grain") satirises society's superstitions. The poet's questions to the bright moonlight and his definition of beauty appear in "Ijoriyā" ("Moonlight"), while in "Māykeṁ Praśna" ("A Question to Mother") he gives voice to a mother's suffering, whose tears exceed the waters of the sea. "Mātṛbhūmi" ("Motherland") and "Mithilāk Je Chhī Taṁ" are dedicated to Mithila and Maithili. "Hamar Kaniñā" ("My Wife") mixes humour with a discussion of dowry and mismatched marriage. In "Hamar Āś" ("My Hope"), the poet addresses children, new approaches to education and admission based on donations; in "Ham ā Hamar" ("I and Mine"), he makes poems from his portrayal of the good and bad in the whole of society. "Mūlya Abhivṛddhi Kar" ("Value-Added Tax") describes the economy, while "Hamar Mīt" ("My Friend") concerns life and death. Saying that no good people remain in the assembly, the poet expresses his anguish. At every step on the road he sees dangerous snakes, yet in "Jīban" ("Life") the poet's optimism returns.

The poems in this collection are bound up with feeling and memory, and they bring about an inner earthquake. The talent the poet has demonstrated here makes us hope that further collections will appear and shake us awake once more.

I have received Santosh Kumar Mishra's collection of short stories, "Posput" ("Foster Son"). This Nepalese writer's book comprises seven stories: "Posput," "Ekṭā Byathā Patrame" ("A Sorrow in a Letter"), "Jakhan Kaniñā Bhelakhin Bimār" ("When the Wife Fell Ill"), "Sipāhī" ("Soldier"), "Ḍākṭar" ("Doctor"), "Bhāgya Appan-Appan" ("Each to Their Own Fate") and "Dāg" ("Stain"). Before considering their plots, it is necessary to discuss other aspects of the volume.

The first noteworthy point is that the book begins with a review of itself. Mr Kālikānta "Tṛṣit" of Depura Rupaiṭhā, Janakpur, has written a comprehensive review. It speaks well of the story writer's intellectual openness that he has given this review its due place; otherwise it would not have appeared in the volume in this form.

The second point is that the book appears to be printed in Devanagari when approached from one side and in Mithilākṣara when approached from the other—and indeed it is. In Maithili this is probably one of the first such experiments witnessed in the twenty-first century.

Let us consider Tṛṣitjī's review first. He writes that an escapist outlook predominates in the stories. He also raises this question: should a literary creator be a neutral presenter or a guide? Should literature favour escapism or become a source of inspiration for struggle?

Regarding "Posput," Tṛṣitjī says that it portrays three generations, but the purpose of incorporating events from the periods of Kings Mahendra and Tribhuvan is not clear.

Of "Ekṭā Byathā Patrame," Tṛṣit says that it describes the passage of time, human helplessness and personal experience.

Tṛṣitjī dismisses the third story, "Jakhan Kaniñā Bhelakhin Bimār," as a sickly story.

"Sipāhī" describes a profession that was once accorded priority in marriage negotiations but has now become undesirable.

Tṛṣitjī calls "Ḍākṭar" the extreme expression of an escapist mentality. In his view, a doctor ought to struggle to save a patient until the very last breath.

"Bhāgya Appan-Appan" is based on the wheel of fate. In "Dāg," actions taken in a moment of impulse, a love marriage contracted at an immature age and subsequently running away with somebody else are all presented as signs of a departure from the right path.

"Posput" is written in an autobiographical style, but its ending comes abruptly, with the role of the foster son and the mother's departure for her natal home.

The second story takes the form of a letter. As in "Posput," its character is named Santosh. This story too ends in great haste, and the author has not managed to convey the sequence of events coherently to the reader.

Similarly, in "Jakhan Kaniñā Bhelakhin Bimār," the author has been unable to make his intended meaning clear.

The character in "Sipāhī" is also named Santosh, though the narrative is not autobiographical. In "Ḍākṭar," the doctor's reward for serving his country is the cancellation of his professional certificate, a development that proves fatal to him. "Bhāgya Appan-Appan" is narrated in the manner of an old folktale: the king sends a prince to survey the kingdom, and the story works well. "Dāg" is narrative in character, but appears to have been written in haste.

Tṛṣitjī has not undertaken a linguistic editing of this short-story collection along with his review, for the volume lacks standardisation. Proofreading, too, has not been done properly. Attempts at standardisation have begun through Videha and Mithila Manthan, and a place has been allotted to the subject in Videha's column on writing practice. The Central Institute of Indian Languages, Mysore, is also preparing a Maithili style manual. What is needed is for scholars in Nepal to offer their views on the style being developed on the basis of the Maithili Academy's standards, so that it may gain general acceptance.

86. Dūrvākṣata

Abstract

Chapter 22, mantra 22, of the Yajurveda is credited with being the world's first patriotic song. In Mithila, however, the practice of scattering dūrvā grass and unbroken rice grains transformed this verse into the Dūrvākṣata mantra.

The Bihar State Text Book Publishing Corporation Ltd has issued a Class IX textbook titled "Dūrvākṣata."

Keywords: Dūrvākṣata · literary criticism · Maithili

Abstract · Summary

This chapter presents a linguistic study of "Dūrvākṣata." Dūrvākṣata, the zamindar, the mantra, ninth grade and class emerge as its principal concerns. Drawing on examples, quotations and arguments in the original material, the discussion examines linguistic structure, word usage, translation or script arrangement, enabling readers to understand both the critical structure of the subject and its wider context.

Dūrvākṣata. Chapter 22, mantra 22, of the Yajurveda is credited with being the world's first patriotic song. In Mithila, however, by scattering dūrvā grass and unbroken grains of rice, this verse was turned into the Dūrvākṣata mantra. The Bihar State Text Book Publishing Corporation Ltd has published a Class IX textbook under the title "Dūrvākṣata." This book plainly reveals, in the reviewer's view, a concerted attempt to hold Mithila and Maithili back. Eighteen pages are devoted to teaching the biography of a zamindar who held a Permanent Settlement estate in a district of Mithila! There is a one-and-a-half-page essay, fifty years old, on preserving the Maithili script, but it has no relevance in today's technological age. The essay on the Maithil diaspora is antiquated, and present-day children will find it ridiculous: the meaning of migration, the meaning of being Maithil and the causes of migration have all changed. Is this not a conspiracy to teach children the lessons of servitude? Comparing this book with Class IX textbooks in Hindi, English, Bangla and other languages makes the situation look still more alarming. I appeal to teachers not to teach children the zamindar's biography, and to those setting examination papers not to ask questions from the chapter devoted to that zamindar.

87. The Late Shri Vaidyanath Mishra "Yatri"

Abstract

The Late Shri Vaidyanath Mishra "Yatri" (1911–1998): Yatri was born in 1911 in his maternal grandparents' village of Satlakha, close to his ancestral village of Tarauni. He began studying at the Sanskrit school in his village, later went to Varanasi and Calcutta, and earned the degree of Sahitya Acharya in Sanskrit. He subsequently went to Kalaniya, near Colombo, to study Pali and Buddhism.

Abstract · Synopsis

This chapter presents a dramatic critique of the late Shri Vaidyanath Mishra "Yatri." The principal focal points of the discussion are Late, Shri, Vaidyanath, Mishra and Yatri. Drawing upon the examples, quotations and arguments present in the original material, it examines dramatic texts, character organisation, stage structure and cultural contexts, enabling the reader to understand both the critical structure of the subject and its wider context.

The Late Shri Vaidyanath Mishra "Yatri" (1911–1998): Yatri was born in 1911 in Satlakha, his maternal grandparents' village, near his ancestral village of Tarauni. He began his education in the village Sanskrit school, went on to Varanasi and Calcutta, and earned the Sanskrit qualification of Sahitya Acharya. He then went to Kalaniya, near Colombo, to study Pali and Buddhism. There he took initiation into Buddhism and received the name Nagarjun. Later, however, he returned to the Brahmanical religious fold, undergoing the sacred-thread ceremony again in his village.

Yatri was influenced by Marxism. He began composing verse in Maithili in the closing months of 1929 and started writing in Hindi in 1935. Alongside Swami Sahajanand Saraswati and Rahul Sankrityayan, he participated in the peasant movement; between 1939 and 1941 this involvement took him to several prisons. Many pieces he wrote after Mahatma Gandhi's death were banned. He differed with the Communist Party after its support for China during the India–China war. His participation in the J. P. movement led to his imprisonment during the Emergency. He also wrote children's literature in Hindi; besides Hindi and Maithili, his writing appeared in Bengali and Sanskrit. He received the second Sahitya Akademi Award for Maithili in 1969, for the poetry collection Patrahin Nagna Gachh (The Leafless, Naked Tree). In 1994 he was made a Fellow of the Sahitya Akademi, recognised as a poet in Hindi and Maithili.

Yatri married a twelve-year-old girl when he was twenty. His father, Gokul Mishra, was regarded as uneducated in his community and, in the author's account, was a man of dissolute conduct. Yatri's childhood memories included the sight of his father raising an axe against his sick, bedridden mother when she pleaded with him to renounce his wayward behaviour. His mother died when he was only six. Another image of his father continued to haunt him: the widowed aunt who had loved him like a mother had nearly died during an abortion of a child conceived by his father outside marriage. What reader of Yatri's Hindi novel Ratinath ki Chachi (Ratinath's Aunt) could have read it without repeatedly weeping? The conflict between father and son grew so bitter that the son left his young wife in his father's care and departed for Varanasi.

Let the old father reap the fruit of his deeds;
I, his only child, am the fruit of his sin.
May that knowledge cause him no anguish.
Let even others forget my name.
Mother Mithila, this is my last farewell!
(Varanasi, November 1936.)

From Varanasi he travelled to Sri Lanka. With the words "Let the old father reap the fruit of his deeds," Yatri gave voice to his feelings about his father. In 1941 he returned to his wife, Aparajita. That year he wrote two Maithili poems, "Burh Var" (The Old Bridegroom) and "Vilap" (Lament), had them printed as pamphlets, and sold them to railway passengers. In search of a livelihood, husband and wife travelled throughout India. At his wife's insistence he occasionally returned to Tarauni. Then came 1949, bringing his first Maithili poetry collection, Chitra. His wife accompanied him until 1952, after which she settled in Tarauni and Yatri visited from time to time. They had six children, whose care Aparajita carried upon her own shoulders. Yatri suffered from asthma.

When I was studying in Darbhanga, Yatri lived in Khwaja Sarai. I remember that he came to a Maithili event where Communist Party members had taken over the agenda. The following day he withdrew from the proceedings of that disorderly meeting. During his imprisonment under the Emergency he encountered Rashtriya Swayamsevak Sangh workers; after his release he also wrote against J. P.'s Total Revolution. He published in Maithili under the name Vaidyanath Mishra "Yatri," and in Hindi as "Nagarjun."

"Prithvi te Patram" appeared in Vaidehi in 1954 and was included in our matriculation syllabus. Yatri wrote:

"Other festivals may be one thing or another, but Naban lays bare the condition of a landless family. Thus, no sooner does Kartik arrive than Aparajita Devi's veil falls over her face. So deep is the pain that she cannot even raise her eyelids towards anyone! Where has anyone celebrated Naban with grain bought in the market?"

Is Yatri a myth? Has Yatri become a myth? He was principally a Hindi writer; in Maithili he did not write even a tenth of what he wrote in Hindi.

Much of what he did publish in Maithili he translated himself from Hindi. Words and cultural details from Maithili and Mithila seemed obscure, and therefore interesting, to Hindi readers, but there are many shortcomings even there. Consider an example from Yatri Samagra: page 220 dates the death anniversary of his paternal aunt to Jeth Sudi Chaturdashi; elsewhere it calls it the first death anniversary; on page 222 it speaks of going, even for a day, to perform the rites as the principal mourner, giving the date of the first observance as Ashadh Badi Tritiya. The original's inconsistent dates are retained here.

The same ailment afflicts other Maithili and Hindi authors. The author maintains that written historical evidence places Gonu Jha between 1050 and 1150, yet Usha Kiran Khan has him debate Vidyapati in her Hindi historical novel Sirjanhār (Bharatiya Jnanpith). Virendra Jha dates Gonu Jha to about five hundred years ago, while Taranand Viyogi places him three hundred years ago, in their respective Hindi books published by Rajkamal Prakashan and the National Book Trust. In Vibha Rani's Hindi book about Gonu Jha (Vani Prakashan), Kunal places him under Bhav Singh's reign in the fourteenth century. This happens, the author argues, despite the genealogy registers that place Gonu Jha ten generations before Vidyapati. The vocabulary and culture of Mithila, unfamiliar and therefore fascinating to Hindi readers, become the occasion for Maithili–Hindi writers to spread a great deal of misinformation through ignorance. Communalist writers have even inserted the oppression of a Muslim tahsildar into Gonu Jha's stories, although, the author asserts, Muslims did not reside in Mithila during his lifetime.

Balchanma was not included in Yatri Samagra because it was regarded as a Hindi work. Its Maithili translation too appears corrupt, as though, after translating half of it, Yatri had run out of time for Maithili. Navturiya, however, was included, although that too was originally in Hindi. The editor will have to explain why it was presented as originally Maithili. In Maithili there is a fashion for proofreaders to call themselves editors, and people are reprinting even Grierson's works under their own editorship. In another example, Mohan Bharadwaj, in a collection attributed to Ramanath Jha, printed four English subsections from chapter three of P. C. Roy Chaudhury's Darbhanga District Gazetteer as works by Ramanath Jha, apparently believing someone else's attribution. Their written form and grammatical workmanship, the author argues, identify them as Roy Chaudhury's writing. Yatri himself said that he had first written Balchanma in Maithili and then translated it into Hindi. Yet he makes no such statement in the Hindi Balchanma, instead describing it as Hindi's first regional novel. The author regards this tendency as an affliction still gripping Maithili writers and considers Yatri's contribution to it, intentional or otherwise, a cause for sorrow.

Rajkamal called Yatri a poet of the old school, like Amar and Suman; perhaps Yatri's attention to metre led Rajkamal into this misconception.

The exchange between Ramvilas Sharma and Yatri over whether Maithili is a dialect or a language has little particular significance from the standpoint of linguistics. Ramvilas Sharma was a major Marxist thinker, and more influential than his poetry or essays was his multivolume examination of Indian history. It is linguists such as Subhadra Jha, Ramavatar Yadav, Yogendra Yadav and Sunil Kumar Jha who worked to establish Maithili's status as a language. The exchange between Ramvilas Sharma and Yatri, in the author's judgement, is little more than idle talk.

Chaturanan Mishra and Jagadish Prasad Mandal have both been associated in practice with the Communist movement at the party level. Yet, having read the novels of these two men, I have no hesitation in saying that they do not seem to need the crutch of Marxism upon which Yatri and Dhumketu prop up their novels. The true meaning of Marxism is to be found in the works of Mishra and Mandal. Parties and ideology may never be named, but their writing reveals the essence of dialectical materialism, faith in the significance of life and the employment of a dialectical method. That becomes possible only when a writer studies Marxism deeply, including Das Kapital, and spends decades practising Marxism.

And finally, a Sanskrit poem by Yatri:

The golden radiance of spring has doubled with yellow-and-crimson shoots. Bees, mistaking them for the play of golden lotuses, keep their distance. These are the chinar trees whose presence makes us forget the pleasure gardens of the celestial grove upon earth; their fluttering shade shifts in degrees, restless and fluid. I have seen those chinar trees standing steadfast.

Abstract · Synopsis

This chapter presents literary criticism of the poetry of the late Shri Harimohan Jha (1908–1984). Late, Shri, Harimohan, 1908 and 1984 emerge as the principal focal points. On the basis of examples, quotations and arguments available in the original, the discussion considers the poetic text, metre, imagery, language and sensibility, so that readers can understand both its critical organisation and its wider context.

The Late Shri Harimohan Jha (1908–1984)

Born on 18 September 1908 at Kumar Bajitpur (village and post office), Vaishali district, Bihar, India. His father, the late Pandit Janardan Jha "Jansidan," was not only a Maithili writer but also a celebrated Hindi literary figure and poet of the Dwivedi period. Harimohan Jha earned his MA in Philosophy in 1932, winning a gold medal for the highest rank in Bihar and Orissa. He became a lecturer at B. N. College, Patna, in 1933; a teacher at Patna College in 1948; professor and head of department at Patna University in 1953; and a University Grants Commission Research Professor from 1970 to 1975.

His Maithili works include the novels Kanyadan (1933) and Dviragaman (1943); the story collections Pranamya Devata (1945), Rangshala (1949) and Charchari (1960); and the satire Khattar Kakak Tarang (1948). A second edition of the story collection Ekadashi appeared in 1987, replacing "Graduate Putohu" with "Dvadash Nidan," which had appeared in Mithila Mihir but in none of his earlier collections. "Babak Sanskar," written at Ramanath Jha's request, is also in this collection. His Khattar Kaka was published as a Hindi book in 1971. A collection of his separately published and written verse was issued in 1999 as Harimohan Jha Rachanavali, Volume 4 (Poetry); his autobiography, Jivan-Yatra, was published in 1984. Jivan-Yatra was the only one of his books published by the Maithili Academy, and it won him a posthumous Sahitya Akademi Award in 1985. In 1999 the Sahitya Akademi published a selection of his stories chosen by Rajmohan Jha and Subhash Chandra Yadav as Bichhal Katha. That volume included stories that had not appeared in any of his earlier collections. Many of his works were translated into Hindi, Gujarati, Marathi, Kannada, Telugu and other languages. His published Hindi works include Nyaya Darshan, Vaisheshik Darshan, Tarkashastra (Deduction), a Hindi translation from English of Datta and Chatterjee's Indian Philosophy, and the edited Darshanik Vivechanayen. His English research monograph is Trends of Linguistic Analysis in Indian Philosophy.

Just as Vidyapati brought Maithili poetry to its highest summit in the classical period, Harimohan Jha brought modern Maithili prose to a comparable height. His writing is especially distinguished by its humour and satire directed against social and religious rigidity, superstition and hypocrisy. His books remain among the most widely bought and read works in Maithili.

Khattar Kakak Tarang (stories and satires)
Kanyadan (novel)
Dviragaman (novel)
Jivan-Yatra (autobiography)
Dedication of Kanyadan:
"To the champions of that society which does not hesitate to give away a daughter as though she were an inanimate object; whose leaders pour thousands upon thousands into the education of boys but do not consider it necessary to buy even a four-paisa slate for a daughter; in which the wife of a BA-qualified husband does not know even A or B; which feels not the least pity in yoking a helpless calf alongside a circus horse to pull the carriage of married life: to the thunderbolt hands of those champions I respectfully, earnestly and fearfully dedicate this book."
Dedication of Pranamya Devata:
"To that principal hero of a remarkable character, Bhimendranath, the formidable guest, who borrowed from me seven years ago upon the bank of Kartik Purnima and has not since favoured me with another appearance; whose memorable accomplishments are described at length in the first story; who could rightfully occupy the highest seat among the 'Venerable Deities'; and whose revered relations, upon seeing this book, may establish their rights over it without even having to ask: into his strong, enormous fist this book of extraordinary characters is perforce placed!"

Dedication of Khattar Kakak Tarang:
"To the ever-delightful, jest-loving Khattar Kaka, whose intoxicated waves of bhang set flowing the pleasures of poetry and learning, whose current washes away Vedas, Puranas and the books of religious law for a while; who blends extraordinary savour and surprise into every remark; who reaches the very hearts of people and tickles them through penetrating satire —'Your own property, uncle, is dedicated to you alone' (tvadiyaṃ vastu pitṛvya! tubhyam eva samarpitam)."
Dedication of Rangshala:
"To Maya Devi, that marvellous and eternally beautiful conqueror of the three worlds: the ever-young actress who founded this beginningless and endless theatre; the enchanting vina-player who dances the entire animate and inanimate universe on her fingertips; the mysterious woman who gives a glimpse of her bewitching play yet allows no one to touch her; who comes upon the coloured wings of imagination to infuse the artist's art with rasa."

89. Jagadish Prasad Mandal

Abstract

Writing about the Bengal famine of 1942–43, Amartya Sen observes that hundreds of thousands died (1.5 million according to the Famine Inquiry Commission), but none of his own relatives died in it. Likewise, during the 1967 famine in Mithila, the Prime Minister of India was shown how Musahar people survived by eating bisaṛh; yet it was not until 2009 that a story about this experience was written. In that year Jagadish Prasad Mandal wrote a Maithili story about bisaṛh.

Abstract · Synopsis

This chapter presents dramatic criticism concerning Jagadish Prasad Mandal. Jagadish, Prasad, Mandal, Maithili and his work emerge as central concerns. Examining the dramatic text, character organisation, stage structure and cultural context through the source examples, quotations and arguments, it enables the reader to appreciate the critical structure of the subject and its wider context.

Writing about the Bengal famine of 1942–43, Amartya Sen observes that hundreds of thousands of people died (1.5 million according to the Famine Inquiry Commission), but not one of his relatives died in the famine. Similarly, during the famine in Mithila in 1967, the Prime Minister of India was shown how Musahar people were struggling against starvation by eating bisaṛh, yet a story on the subject did not appear until 2009. In that year Jagadish Prasad Mandal wrote a Maithili story about bisaṛh. The reason for the delay is also clear: because Maithili literature had adopted a one-sided orientation, its writers, like Amartya Sen, may not have been affected as deeply by that immense catastrophe. It is here that Mandal's story rescues the trajectory of Maithili fiction from becoming exclusively one-sided. Every story in this collection is excellent: each fills a vacancy and provides evidence of the renaissance of Maithili literature.

Jagadish Prasad Mandal is a craftsman who compresses his material so effectively that readers are astonished. More importantly, his determination and ability to give his material purpose—in stories, novels, plays and inspirational narratives—establish him at a point from which the history of Maithili literature may be read in two parts: "before Jagadish Prasad Mandal" and "from Jagadish Prasad Mandal onward." All sections of society appear in his narratives, not as ornament but naturally, a veritable upheaval for Maithili literature. One finds no rhetoric of deprivation there. The respect and pride with which he depicts the ways of life of every section of society are extraordinary. His narratives celebrate the dignity of traditional livelihoods against the pursuit of jobs and migration. This carries force because his outlook on writing is the same as his outlook on action, a unity rooted in the distinction of his personal and social life: what he thinks and does is what he writes. Despite novelists such as Yatri and Dhumketu, and story craftsmen such as Kumar Pawan and Dhumketu, Maithili remained distant from ordinary people. The cadences of Maithili have long attracted people beyond Mithila; within those cadences Mandal's socially engaged literature, representing society, culture and language, will bring change not merely to Mithila's social sphere but also to its economy. Five of his novels, one play, more than two dozen stories and more than a hundred inspirational tales for children and adolescents have been published electronically in Videha. Reaching Maithili speakers scattered throughout the world, they have stirred them deeply and filled a gap in Maithili literature.

90. Premshankar Singh

Abstract

Maithili Language and Literature: The Twentieth Century: This collection of essays, treatises and criticism by Premshankar Singh discusses various welcome and unwelcome aspects of Maithili literature in the twentieth century and the first decade of the twenty-first. Unwelcome developments arise because political, social, economic and cultural problems, transformations and processes of integration sometimes contradict one another. Earlier contexts for Maithili literature are discussed in Maithili Bhasha aur Sahitya (Maithili Language and Literature).

Keywords: Premshankar · Singh · literary criticism · Maithili

Abstract · Synopsis

This chapter presents dramatic criticism concerning Premshankar Singh. Premshankar, Singh, Maithili, discussion and literature emerge as central concerns. The examples, quotations and arguments in the source are used to examine dramatic texts, characters, staging and cultural contexts, enabling the reader to understand both its critical organisation and its broader context.

Maithili Language and Literature: The Twentieth Century: Premshankar Singh's collection of essays, treatises and criticism discusses the pleasant and unpleasant dimensions of Maithili literature during the twentieth century and the first decade of the twenty-first. The unpleasant dimensions arise because the processes of political, social, economic and cultural change, as well as integration, sometimes contradict one another.

The older context of Maithili literature is described in Maithili Bhasha aur Sahitya. "Folk Ballads" discusses folk narrative while highlighting Manipadma's contribution to the genre. "Folk Theatre" offers a detailed account of Maithili folk drama. "The Twentieth Century: The Golden Age" surveys a hundred years of Maithili literature. "Traditional Drama" considers conventional plays in Maithili and those translated into Maithili. "Jivan Jha, the Agent of Social Change" identifies the new subjects and techniques Jivan Jha introduced into Maithili dramatic literature. "Harimohan Jha's Influence on Later Writers" is a critical essay on Harimohan Jha. "Jai Kant Mishra, Vigilant Sentinel of the Maithili Movement" is based on his contribution. "Memoir Literature" examines reminiscence through Manipadma's recollection of meeting him. "Amar's One-Act Plays: Social Reality" treats Amar's work in that form, while "Mayanand's Radio Craft" surveys Mayanand Mishra's work in the corresponding genre. "Chetana Samiti and the Stage" describes the creative work undertaken by Chetana Samiti.

Across these essays, attention is paid to all the essential elements of criticism: an aesthetically informed observation of truth and the work of art; the creation of institutions and the present need for reforms based on the economic and social interests of the entire community, without distinctions of religion, race or sect; discussion of the proper place of women's writing and children's literature; attempts, wherever possible, to identify mediocrity; and the refusal to allow prejudice or hatred against any person to determine evaluation. One finds no one-line pronouncements here, but sustained examination.

91. Against Darkness: "Hāthī Chalae Bazār" — Arvind Thakur and Devshankar Naveen

Abstract

Arvind Thakur and Devshankar Naveen: Arvind Thakur (1954–) and Devshankar Naveen (1962–) are two short-story writers who have written Maithili fiction beyond the familiar figures of Kaniyā Kākī and Buccī Dāi, though both have written little. Arvind Thakur has written particularly little: to date, each author has published only one collection, Arvind Thakur's Against Darkness (Anhārak Virodhme) and Devshankar Naveen's Hāthī Chalae Bazār. Thakur's strength lies in his political-economic narratives; Naveen presents himself through the remarkable breadth of his vocabulary.

Abstract · Synopsis

This chapter offers literary criticism of the short-story writings considered under 'Against Darkness' and 'Hāthī Chalae Bazār' by Arvind Thakur and Devshankar Naveen. The title words Against, Darkness, Hāthī, Chalae and Bazār form principal points of reference. Drawing upon the examples, quotations and arguments present in the source, the analysis examines subject matter, characters, structure, language and social meanings, enabling the reader to understand both the critical organisation of the work and its larger context.

Arvind Thakur and Devshankar Naveen: Arvind Thakur (1954–) and Devshankar Naveen (1962–) are two fiction writers who move beyond Kaniyā Kākī and Buccī Dāi in writing Maithili stories, though neither has written much. Arvind Thakur has published very little indeed: each has only one story collection so far, Against Darkness by Arvind Thakur and Hāthī Chalae Bazār by Devshankar Naveen. Thakur's strength is in his political-economic stories, while Naveen comes before us with the immensity of his linguistic vocabulary. The stagnation of the Maithili short story is being diminished somewhat, but many essential aspects remain untouched because writers produce so little and remain idle—subject to that particularly Maithil inertia. Naveen brings back the same plot repeatedly: for example, in "Ṛṇkhauk" and "Ijot," there is mention of a daughter-in-law killing her father-in-law, along with similar recurrences, suggesting that several stories have been fashioned out of a single plot. There is also the plot in the latter half of "Ussar Jamin" ("Barren Land"), which the writer has not used as effectively as he might. I mention that latter plot because Maithils have lived through the experience it describes, and on precisely such a basis Kumar Pawan wrote the unforgettable story "Paiṭh" (published in Antikā), a story capable by itself of making his reputation imperishable, just as Chandradhar Sharma Guleri's "Usne Kaha Tha" sustained his. Arvind Thakur, for his part, writes stories that interweave the social, political and economic so thoroughly that they attempt to fill a vacancy in Maithili fiction. But he writes far too seldom: the reader remains thirsty and the vessel remains unfilled.

Against Darkness — "Khissā Siyār-Yār": Ramnarayan Maharaj is a former MLA and former chair of the Government Publications Committee. At the time of a scandal, Ramadhar Pandey, the chief minister's brother and an MLA, had protected him. Garibdas Azad, district committee general secretary, spent many years among the Socialists and now belongs to the Mahasabha Party; even his son has taken to robbing trains. Shaligram Rai and Lakhan Yadav belong among the insolent and self-important. A meeting is under way. Political commentary emerges in several paragraphs through the mouths of Rajnath Jha and Jibachh Mandal. Sadanand Vidrohi is a young associate of Tofan Singh, the self-appointed leader of the opposition to the Mahasabha Party; he lost his right hand in a bomb explosion while accompanying Singh. His expressions of regret, Pandeyji's manoeuvre to install Raghubansh Mandal as district committee vice-president on the argument that backward classes deserve representation, and his silence when confronted by Chaudharyji's prestige all form part of the spectacle. Rajmangal Shrivastava and Satish Singh Parmar—the "thirty-six-babu Kshatriya," in the terminology of the swaggering men—enter the scene. Parmar is all-powerful in the fifty-one-member Dhela Committee. The pair of Shrivastava and Parmar is notorious: when apart they abuse one another, but they stay together. Former block president Shanichar, known as "Shani," is a tireless consumer of ganja and other intoxicants; current youth president Ganesh Gurmaita makes a profession of petitions. Chatterjee-da is on the telephone from Patna, contemplating a front with Chaubeyji against Chaudharyji and Pandeyji. When Parmar entangles Shani and Gurmaita in conversation, someone deliberately sets them at loggerheads, and someone else comes to their rescue. Jatashankar Malik, better known as Makhan Babu, is a "wrench that fits every nut and bolt," to use the same boastful vocabulary. He calls out to Parasmani Chaudhary to draw attention to himself and responds to one respectful greeting with three of his own. His son, Bauka Babu, a member of a communalist party, has taken his car, and his jeep is broken. Since he has to arbitrate a dispute in the Dusadh settlement, he must summon a rickshaw. He keeps eating chyawanprash and has taken homoeopathic treatment in Raghopur. Sita Babu is block president of the Mahasabha Party, described as Makhan Babu's "daughter-in-law" in the swaggerers' idiom. Subodhnarayan Singh, known as Subodhji, is a former MLA and former district president of the Mahasabha Party: to supporters he is the district's Gandhi, to opponents a Natwarlal, and to the swaggerers "Mundhubara." His way of life is simple and his manner courteous. He is devoted to Chief Minister Shivadhar Pandey, Ramadhar Pandey's brother. Yet his growing closeness to Chaudharyji earns him punishment: Shivadharji asks him to withdraw his party candidature. Rajiv Sharma suffers from the mistaken belief that politics can be practised without deceit, intrigue, lies or betrayal. He speaks out in the wrong places, for which the arrogant men call him a biter. When Subodhji says that a telephone call came from Shivadhar Babu and therefore he had to withdraw his name, Sharma responds that they will pull down the whole nest of these scoundrels and hooligans. Ramsogarath Mandal, a freedom fighter, is also present, but he has declined the freedom-fighter's pension. When someone broaches it, he says, "Go on, son, go and teach that lesson to Sunnar Thakur, who got hold of a freedom-struggle pension by shaving ministers' hair and beards." At that moment a new disturbance begins; someone has again stolen a march. Makhan Babu gets out of a large car and places a garland around Ramadhar Pandey's neck. Suddenly everyone is garlanding everyone else; equally suddenly the speeches begin. Meanwhile, in Ramsogarath Mandal's dream, terrifying black shapes encircle the golden dream on every side.

"Piyāsal Pāni" ("Thirsty Water"): Ramcharan works as a cultivator; the ploughing now falls to his son Lakhna. Lakhna's gauna, the ceremony marking the bride's arrival after marriage, brings the woman from Narayanpur to the household. The author, or narrator, goes to see the bride's face and is overwhelmed by her beauty. Lakhna's aunt from Beriya teases him, and he leaves. One day the Narayanpur bride begins to touch the narrator's feet. In rice transplantation, weeding, harvesting or other field labour she has no equal. One morning, while it is still dark, he sets off to supervise harvesting; beside a grafted mango tree her eager lips leave their marks on his cheek, forehead and throat. Just then the voice of Sarjugba, the household servant, rises out of the darkness. Cursing that enemy and invoking a thunderbolt from God upon him, the Narayanpur woman moves away, submerged in thwarted desire, longing and resentment. Rumour spreads that a witch has possessed her. She tears off her clothes. Motiya Dusadh drinks liquor, the offering to Barham Baba, becomes a ritual exorcist, and breaks seven green switches upon her body. He claims to have driven the witch to the peepal tree in Haridwar's cremation ground. The Narayanpur woman runs away. Lakhna is married again, but this time the narrator sends eleven rupees for the ceremonial viewing of the bride through someone else. Ramcharan is delighted by reports of the new bride's promise, while Lakhna beats his own head because he is impotent. The Narayanpur woman was a Lakshmi—innocent, unfortunate and abandoned.

"Anhārak Virodhme" ("Against Darkness"): There is shouting and commotion. The writer or narrator goes outside and comes to Alauddin, a Muslim vegetable seller. Alauddin recounts what happened. Janardan Chaudhary is his friend; in the same neighbourhood Bikua abused the friend's brother. The brother came to complain of Bikua's misconduct, calling out "Brother!" But Bikua struck him, while the women of his household started abusing the visitor. They even tried to turn the dispute into a Hindu–Muslim issue. What honour could such a neighbourhood still claim? At precisely that moment, brilliant electric light breaks through the breast of the darkness that has spread its frightening shadow everywhere, illuminating the surrounding distance.

"Ḍhāčhā—1992" ("The Structure—1992"): The story takes the form of a letter by the narrator, who acknowledges that everything he has written was written under the pressure of circumstances. He has recently had jaundice and has lain with his tongue parched; sunlight, dust and smoke distress him. There is another strange illness: his body burns intensely and small rashes begin to rise on his skin. Once, returning from Saharsa, his scooter broke down. A mechanic promised to repair it in half an hour, then scattered all its parts and kept him there for four hours. Back in Supaul he went to Dr Das's clinic. Drops of homoeopathic medicine worked, but only after hours. The same had happened once when he was returning from his in-laws' home: separation from his wife, bone-chilling cold and a whistling wind. A gathering brings Professor Rajendra, Dr Mukherjee and Principal Jha of the K. K. Institute of Madology together. Professor Rajendra tells Mukherjee that he will pay the five-rupee consultation fee, but the medicine must be free—physicians' samples. Mukherjee says the medical representatives pay him no attention, so they will have to go to Dr Das. Then comes the destruction of the Babri Masjid structure in Ayodhya. The narrator's trembling, burning, blotches and swelling return. There is no immediately discernible physical cause, yet his body has suffered the event.

"Mūs" ("Rat"): A man runs a pharmacy. The new drug inspector has taken a five-hundred-rupee ceremonial payment during Durga Puja. The shop seems to have ground to a halt; Anuj sits there. Will a Bhumihar concoct schemes, or conduct business? There is an old bank loan and five years of unpaid household electricity bills. His wife's eldest brother is an accountant in Nagpur, with a good job and a healthy wife. If only he were a magician who could say "gili-gili-phu," or if only Aladdin's lamp were in his hands! A rat has tormented him, even at mealtimes, but now he feels not the slightest anger. The town has been raised from sub-divisional to district headquarters, and land prices have risen. He could sell the land and clear his debts. Sleep gives way to transparent bubbles and rats of many shapes and forms: gnawing, fighting, dancing, loving, reading books and playing rummy. Later a giant bubble appears, and plague comes from the rats. Industrious rats make burrows in which snakes live. He wakes with a start, looks at the portrait of his late father and asks whether he too will use the wealth amassed by his forebears like a snake. He takes a hoe and begins clearing weeds from the garden bed.

"Prajātantra Parikathā" ("A Fairy Tale of Democracy"): There has been one murder and two household robberies. Kamal Kumar Sharma reads the report, which seems censored. It does not mention that the murdered Dr K. P. Bhagat was retired and charged only nominal fees. The robbers had entered his home pretending to be poor patients and their relatives. How could the reporter, against whom a black-marketing and adulteration case is pending, have written that the police station stood barely a hundred paces from the doctor's house and the police officer's residence scarcely sixty or seventy paces away? From the doctor's place the gang went to the home of Vikram Prasad Verma, a recently retired teacher decorated with the President's Medal. They robbed his home and had food prepared, which they ate. Vikram Babu's brother Gajanan Babu managed to slip away to the superintendent of police, yet nothing came of it. People gathered outside the main gate of the hospital grounds. The Chemists and Druggists Association under Madhuresh Kishore Dwivedi led the protest. What if something should happen to children returning from school? The speakers appeared: broker Ishwar Chaudhary; procurer Murlidhar Agrawal; a journalist who sold petrol adulterated with kerosene; municipal chairman Buchnu Babu, who traded in stolen goods; and the black-marketeer Seth Kanakdharimal, a sixty-year-old husband to a twenty-five-year-old wife who, through the munim's generosity, had borne four children. His panting over the loudspeaker sounded like a minor storm. There was Gyannath Singh, president of the Bar Association, who defended murderers and robbers; the ganja-smoking petty leader Krishnanand Tiwari, who proposed a free plan to convert the flood-stricken region into Disneyland; and the fair-skinned Dr Dharamchand Sahay, whom those in the know called D.C.S.—an acronym for drink, girls and a coarse abuse—delivering his fevered words. The crowd became leaderless. People insisted that the mass itself, rather than a delegation, should speak directly to the authorities. Meanwhile an "old fox" held forth on the terrace about international problems. A motorcyclist attempted to take control of the crowd: he was the newest recruit of a communalist party. Madhureshji took precautions. A new, rough-hewn slogan, newly born, attracted Kamal's attention and that of others. Then came Pradip Krantikari, who had supposedly abandoned engineering studies out of devotion to social service—or had been expelled for drunkenness and rape. The sub-divisional officer's jeep was attacked. Pradip Krantikari shouted that "the bastard" wanted seven thousand rupees for a coal licence: "Did you see the storm?" Madhureshji had gathered others, including Gajendraji, a lecturer at the local college, and Madhavji and Krishnamohanji of the traders' association. Without mishap the crowd reached Gandhi Chowk and Jayaprakash Chowk. Then Goldiya, who sat at the sweetshop and played cricket—careful, even there, about how the ball was provided; when it met the bat it went for six, otherwise it was clean-bowled—saw a government vehicle and shouted: "Hit it! Set it on fire!" Some charged towards it, but the driver sped away. At Nyay Chowk, also called Nawab Chowk, soldiers of the Vishwa Hindu Sena had installed Bajrangbali because a statue of blindfolded Justice holding scales could not be placed there. A sign naming it Bajrang Chowk was erected. At that time Dalit officers predominated in the administration and wanted the intersection named Ambedkar Chowk; so, in the story's satirical account, they "arrested" Bajrangbali and carried him to the police station, where, it is said, he is worshipped even today. Since the intersection adjoins the municipal offices it is now called Municipality Chowk. The sub-divisional officer returned with a force and they began swinging their batons together. Policemen chased people for a considerable distance. The crowd then began hurling stones in return. The police fled in disorder. An inspector with a Hitler-style moustache arrived, but men from Bargāȟi had driven away in his vehicle. The sub-divisional officer and others hurried into the jeep and made their escape. Kamal searched the scene with his eyes. Goldi argued with him; Amjad Ali seized Kamal's arm, and a dozen people stood between an enraged leopard and a thick-headed buffalo. People outside the political and social factions did not know the art of flattering the powerful. Why engage with them at all? The demand now was for the release of two arrested companions, but the officers, concerned for their own safety, were unwilling. The DSP with his hoodlum's haircut spoke with coarse insolence. Madhureshji remarked, "Whether you are determined to depart without a mark on you, or whether only thoroughgoing supporters of Jayaprakash surround you..." An agreement was reached to release the detainees. Not a human being—or even a crow—was in sight. Had Kurukshetra fallen into such silence after the Mahabharata war? A group of children was entering the field to play cricket.

"Atha Girgiṭ Kathā" ("Now the Tale of the Chameleon"): Mukkan Babu, that is Mukund Jaiswal, is a dealer with a Public Distribution System shop. A police sub-inspector with the same name had once arrived, causing considerable amusement. Ramlakhan Poddar, B.Sc. Honours, son of Kishan Poddar the tea-and-paan seller, topped his examinations but wore out his shoes seeking a job. The municipal instrument for measuring the social atmosphere would find seventy-five per cent cowardly respectability, twenty per cent friendship founded on self-interest and five per cent miscellaneous viruses. The police outpost occupies a warehouse-like building, with a liquor shop adjoining it. One day the men unexpectedly come face to face: Mukund emerging from the police post and Ramlakhan from the liquor shop. After their quarrel, the police sympathise with Mukund, while customers emerging from the liquor shop side with Poddar. Ramlakhan is arrested, and the following morning his father secures his release by making offerings of flowers and leaves to the police. Mukkan Babu then gathers sixteen people, forms an Anti-Intoxication Citizens' Forum and stages a sit-in at the liquor shop. The sixteen comprise seven paternal and maternal cousins of various kinds, two ploughmen, an operator of a paddy-husking machine, three notorious friends, and two delinquent sons of the family priest. But Poddarji arrives with thirty-six people to protect his rights. When the commander of the anti-intoxication forum rushes forward with a staff, the others are carried bodily away; a sequence of blows and scuffles ensues. Subrata Mukherjee, a specialist in swaggering violence, calls it gang warfare. Then municipal elections are announced. The virus of self-interested friendship reveals its colours before Shivaj Rigalk. Mukkan Babu becomes chairman and Poddarji vice-chairman. Peace returns to the town.

"Ayyāśī" ("Indulgence"): A man dreams of pleasure in sitting with a friend, but his wife asks for ten rupees for vegetables and says the groceries can come tomorrow or the day after. He sets out for his friend's house, refusing to listen to his son. He passes Patel Chowk and reaches Mahatma Gandhi Chowk with twenty rupees in his pocket. A rickshaw-puller rests with the canopy raised. He gets in; along the way he buys a two-rupee cigarette for his friend, his favourite magazine Mor for twelve rupees, and gives the rickshaw-puller four rupees. The breeze from his friend's fan affords some relief. The remaining two rupees mock him: the vegetables for the household, and his son's books and notebooks. When he returns, his body is drenched in sweat. Seeing his wife's angry, red eyes, one would think he has returned after a bout of debauchery.

"Baikbā-Phorbā": The underlying news is that the petrol of an already inflamed atmosphere has been shown the matchstick of private interest. The incident concerns Prakash Agrawal's firm, "Vriddhichand Bhanwarlal Cloth Store." With its outstanding credit approaching a lakh, the firm hires Sikandar Jha, motherless, unruly, son of the late Raghunath Jha and an eighth-standard failure, to collect debts. One day he approaches Ramchand

Marar, whose son Kaleshwar Marar—now using Yadav as his surname—had had a three-thousand-rupee three-piece suit made four years earlier. The father refuses liability for his son's debt. On the road, while stopping for paan at Munna Thakur's shop, Sikandar meets Kaleshwar Yadav, accompanied by relatives and family. Where Sikandar himself had once acted as a tough, Kaleshwar now does. A demand for repayment turns into a fight. Sikandar pins him down by the chest. Sikandar's old associates gather and thrash Kaleshwar's relatives. The next day a procession for Backward-Caste Unity attacks the cloth store, smashing its glass. Armed men arrive and rain down blows with sticks. People flee wherever they can squeeze through. Looting and disorder spread. A series of glimpses follows. Scene one: district president Purushottam Mandal speaks in his party's office, a building with eighteen rooms and two large halls. A goodwill procession is planned. Chiranjeev Singh, president of the party youth wing and Mandalji's ardent disciple, becomes furious: "You too are from a small caste; naturally you will side with them!" He storms out. Scene two: a thatched house. Dhanilal and Ramnarayan discuss what Baikba-Phorba means. What does Matru know? After silence, someone begins singing the Ālhā. Scene three: the tea-and-snack shop of Comrade Ramsevak Sahu. There is debate about Vidyanivasji's speech, declaring that caste is no such thing at all; a youth calls him mad and walks away. Scene four: children playing during the school lunch break. "This grass-and-thatch house is mine, and I shall be a Yadav. The shop belongs to Birju, and he will be a Brahmin. We shall quarrel. Lallu, Mohan, Naren and Bablu will come and set fire to my house. Then Suresh will become the leader and Vinod the policeman. Suresh will tell the officer to get both our house and shop rebuilt and to catch those responsible. Suresh will make us shake hands and become friends." The game of Baikba-Phorba lasts the whole lunch period.

"Viṣ-Pān" ("Drinking Poison"): Gopalji sits restlessly on a chair in the lawyers' room. At the courthouse gate a parrot-owning astrologer sits beneath a banner advertising mamira collyrium to improve eyesight. From the court veranda orderly Ramesar Mandal, son of Jagesar Mandal, shouts. A litigant promises his lawyer the remaining fee at the next hearing, but the lawyer is digging his ear with the blunt end of a pen. Gopal overhears. One day at a paan shop, Chaturanan had come with a stick and beaten him until he fell. Neniya, his father's old servant, arrived and struck Chaturanan, who nevertheless escaped. The sixty-year-old mother of Ramprasad from Marauna was first to inquire after Gopal. Gopal was taken to hospital. Chaturanan, too, came there seeking treatment and an injury report; someone recognised him and chased him away with a length of drainpipe. Everyone called Chaturanan a habitual criminal, but Gopal had tried to reform him; he had now become a Bhasmasura, a destroyer of his benefactor. The police extracted money from Chaturanan and he stayed at home. Hearing dates kept being set in Gopal's case, and his X-ray plate vanished from the hospital. After three years the evidence began, followed by cross-examination: had he been wearing a full-sleeved shirt that day, had it a collar and pocket, what was its colour; how long and what sort of stick had struck him? The lawyer was his friend, but one day the sharpness of his tone was unmistakable: "You see, litigants have paid us; naturally we must attend to their work first." No testimony was recorded that day, and the judge entered an adverse observation on the file. Chaturanan settled matters for three thousand rupees, with the suggestion that Gopal might pay more if he could. An offer had also reached the lawyer-friend through counsel for the opposing party. At Gopal's request, proceedings to transfer the case began. But it was transferred to a court connected by kinship to Shilbhadra Jha, Gopalji's political rival, under whose protection Chaturanan now lived. Gopal signs a compromise petition: a surrender likened to General Niazi's surrender with a hundred thousand troops in the India–Pakistan war.

Hāthī Chalae Bazār: This short-story collection is arranged in three sections. The first, Mūldhan ("Principal"), contains stories of ordinary length, roughly two thousand words each—the form called the "short story" in English. In Maithili, however, the "short story" or laghu-kathā is often written within a single page, and a collection of those is placed in the second section, Byāj ("Interest"). The last section, Lorhā-Bicchā, contains stories of different lengths that the author evidently considers somewhat weaker. Yet after reading them, one finds that many from that last section merit inclusion under Principal and Interest, while quite a few in Principal and Interest would fit better in Lorhā-Bicchā.

Mūldhan ("Principal") — "Anhār" ("Darkness"): The road passing through Lauhar village has been paved. Government jeeps travel along it, and flocks of goats bleat on the way to be offered in sacrifice at Mahishi Ugratara. Children emerge from houses whose eaves almost touch, amid wheat and straw. Tetar Musahar used to work as a ploughman for a household in Sarauni village and was cutting straw for Ramanand Singh. The wheel of Kulwant Singh's truck ran over his boy. The village headman arrived and took six thousand rupees from Sardar Kulwant Singh, saying that two thousand would be given to Tetar. Tetar's whole body trembled: how was he to count so many five-rupee notes? Tetar tried to console his wife from Baluaha: "As long as you and I are alive, will there not be more children?"

"Tax Free": Chalittar works at a brick kiln. Instead of six and a half rupees he receives five; the overseer keeps one and a half. But a budget was passed only yesterday: an article formerly costing four rupees and seventy-five paise will now cost seven rupees and seventy paise. The candidate Chalittar had voted for has come to the inspection bungalow, so Chalittar goes to him. Before the election, he says, he could at least eat half a stomachful; now he cannot manage even that. But the leader, now a minister, rebukes him: "How many garments and cloths we distributed! We got televisions and the BDO made tax-free! Yet no one is grateful." Police throw Chalittar out, landing punches and slaps upon him. From whom is he to learn what "tax free" means?

"Babūr" ("The Acacia"): A drought-stricken man has died and must be taken on his last journey. He had only one son, Udba. The father had long felt close to the gentlemen of the village. Udba sets off towards the Brahmin quarter: even if each man contributed just one piece of wood, there would be a heap. Instead he hears taunts: "Dogs and crows ate the flesh of his forefathers, yet these drought victims now want a tree for cremation!" Udba sends word to bring the corpse to the embankment. Meanwhile he cuts and splits the acacia growing on government land and builds a pyre. He lights it. Panditji arrives and remarks that a funeral pyre should not be made of acacia; Udba should have put a torch in the dead man's mouth and floated him down the river. Furious, Udba snatches the pandit's almanac and throws it into the fire. This acacia, he says, is the sandalwood for the likes of you.

"Sambandh" ("Relationship"): Sugiya and her husband Jibachh live beside the crossroads and run a makeshift stall selling puffed rice, sweets and sugar confections. Between the evening meal and sleep they lie in one another's arms and talk. If the old woman had lived just this one more year, their happiness might not have ended. Sugiya is pregnant. Today, while eating rice and parwar, she hears cries as her husband is being strangled by members of the extended kin group. She rushes there, but they attack her with an axe too. At the police station the sub-inspector is busy settling matters with a tractor-owner. He demands a two-hundred-rupee fee for registering her case. Jibachh has only sixty rupees in his shirt pocket. Sugiya goes to the goldsmith to sell her bangles and neck ornament, but he takes advantage of her desperation and offers too little. By the time she raises the money, Jibachh has died. The sub-inspector says he died without making any statement; perhaps Sugiya was involved with another man and had arranged for gangsters to murder her husband. He locks her in the police cell and sends word to his quarters that he will not be coming home that night.

"Antim Behośī" ("The Final Unconsciousness"): The narrator's bhauji, Lalita Mishra, is the wife of Professor Samaresh Mishra, head of the Chemistry Department. They were first teacher and pupil, then lovers, then husband and wife. There is an age gap of at least ten years. They have three children: Sushma, fourteen; Madhuri, twelve; and Shwetabh, ten. Bhauji is pregnant for the fourth time, because the hunger of the body is powerful. Her daughters are ridiculed at school and tell their mother, "Our heads split with shame at the mockery; will you never stop bearing children?" She attempts an abortion but gets no help from Samaresh Bhai. Haunted by her daughters' words and her swollen belly, she even thinks of striking it with the end of a rolling pin. She faints. Had her fourth pregnancy come fourteen years after the first child, would her daughter not have prayed to the gods, as Shipra did? Shipra, a student at the narrator's college, had welcomed a brother born when she was seventeen. The doctor's expression does not look reassuring. Bhauji's baby is now in the narrator's arms. Bhauji has left this world and its intrigues. With the twenty-six-hour-old infant, he enters Samaresh Bhai's quarters. Bhauji's ten-year-old son talks to him joyfully, without waiting for replies. Bhauji regained consciousness only long enough to leave a message: the English-medium school has turned her two daughters into Chandis; they will not let this baby live. "You are now its mother and father." The narrator is lost in thought. The sisters have gone to school. How is he to perform the funeral rites and have the ten-year-old son put on mourning garments?

"Ussar Jamin" ("Barren Land"): Tejo Babu is the narrator's kinsman, a paternal relative known to the younger people as Phul Kaka. In the days of his strength he had satisfied his lust, by consent or coercion, with women working in his fields. Now he is father-in-law to two daughters-in-law and one son-in-law. He used to imitate the narrator's squint until, through doing so, the eyeball of his own right eye seemed to disappear beneath the upper lid. Looking now at his grandchildren—their faces like the flat bowl of a roof tile, lips like old pointed gourds, potato-shaped noses, catlike eyes and cheeks like bursts of Holi powder—he repents. Arbitrators assemble to divide the property of his sons Ram and Lakshman. Ram has a daughter, and a father of daughters grows old early; Lakshman has a son. Lakshman's wife from Simraha realises that the elder brother will have to pay for one daughter's marriage next year and another soon afterwards. She looks for a pretext to divide the family. The arbitrators, a surveyor and a labourer to weigh the grain arrive. The man who once mediated other families' quarrels now faces arbitration in his own. Everything is divided, but there is only one threshing floor and one well: the floor is broken up and the well filled in. Yet how can one break or fill in one's parents? The father goes with Ram and the mother with Lakshman. Both are left like heaps of dung and dust. The Simraha daughter-in-law sees no benefit in allotting two bighas of land from the common property to the elderly parents. When rice pudding is made in the younger son's home, a spoonful or two falls even on the old mother's leaf plate; yet eating alone wounds her heart. Phul Kaka has become a philosopher: why should a barren cow, sterile land or a lame ox expect care and maintenance?

"Pavan Pul" ("The Bridge of Air"): The narrator has taken his Intermediate Science examination, with only the practical left. He returns to the village in the interval, unwilling to place a greater burden on his low-paid father. He was in Saharsa just three days earlier. His younger sister Saroj lies on her deathbed. She is eldest among his three younger sisters, yet three years younger than he. Married at ten and sent to her husband's home at thirteen, she was brought back on a carrying pole after six months. Her husband is an ignorant good-for-nothing. The narrator used to tease him by asking when the automatic watch and the English Raleigh bicycle he demanded had been manufactured; Saroj was punished even for that teasing. In the physics practical the narrator could not measure the radius of curvature of a convex lens, but by the following morning Saroj had crossed beyond that curved boundary forever. His middle paternal uncle, whom he calls Babu, loves the narrator and Saroj more than life itself. Yet people of their own community refuse to help carry the corpse. The narrator's aunt points out the absurdity: the four women of the lineage are left to weep and console one another, while voices whisper through cracks and corners that the girl died just as she reached maturity and will become a witch galloping through the neighbourhood all night. At the funeral feast Ranganath Mishra asks who will rise first: there are only twenty-one Brahmins, one short of twenty-two. The narrator's younger uncle sits down himself. The narrator seizes Mishra by the arm and makes him stand: "Get out at once, or I shall not spare a single shoe! Let the butcher go. Give his leaf plate to the pig belonging to Bhikho Dom."

"Caritra" ("Character"): Gautamji is an ardent Communist, a Karna Kayastha

by caste. He smokes bidis, useful for maintaining a proletarian image, and his moustache has curled into points. He is a Maithil settled in Calcutta, with three daughters. When arranging a daughter's marriage, he takes his lover along to inspect prospective grooms. One match is unsuitable because the family is Ambashtha Kayastha; in another the prospective groom's Karna Kayastha father has a Christian widow as his second wife. The story of Adelina enters at this point. When a headmaster remarks on Adelina, a newly appointed teacher says that Adelina would be only two or three years older than the headmaster's youngest daughter, thereby silencing him. The story ends when Gautamji's middle daughter gives her father a sharp rebuke.

"Ijot" ("Light"): The narrator is playing chess with Madhukarji. As they play he discusses not only Madhukarji's dishonest moves on the board but also his dishonesty in life. When he calls Madhukarji the pupil of a sinful guru, Madhukarji becomes angry: "I am the one who will teach your wife to beat your parents, bring disgrace upon your house, and refuse to let your sister and brother-in-law live with you!" Their conversation over the chessboard exposes Madhukarji's peculiar talents: causing disruption at weddings, applying archery like Ekalavya to seal a dog's mouth, and tutoring the narrator's wife in absurd and disruptive behaviour. He has even told the narrator's sister's parents-in-law: "He has money to buy land in Delhi, but none to give his sister and brother-in-law?" The narrator's wife was already wielding "five brooms and five beatings" against her parents-in-law; Madhukarji has added another five blows on account of the sister. The poor woman has since died. Finally the narrator picks up Madhukarji's knight, returns it to its old square and urges him to bring honesty into his moves.

"Hāthī Chalae Bazār": Bhavani Dai was her father's beloved daughter. After her mother's death she was brought up and married. When her husband Kalyan secured a qualification, her father died on hearing the happy news—of joy, the tale says. Then Bhavani Dai bore a son, and her husband died. In seeking the insurance payment and a compassionate appointment, she encountered two kinds of official. The young manager of the insurance company was courteous and settled everything within minutes. The officer at her husband's workplace, however, was depraved. The story ends with the rebuke that his daughter Gita delivers to her father.

"Chhaguntā": Bairagiji, Ramadhin Pandey "Bairagi," has a son who has become a college professor. The tale gathers pace when that son is kidnapped. Bairagiji has withdrawn twenty-five thousand rupees from his provident fund and kept it ready, only for the money to disappear too. His elder son Arun is also missing. The narrative then turns to Dukhmochan, son of a freedom fighter who refused a pension. Dukhmochan is a criminal figure, revealing his tendencies in high school when he sexually assaulted the daughter of a neighbour disadvantaged by caste and poverty. There followed highway robbery, snatching and other crimes. Disliking the leadership of Bhagatji, an MLA from a lower caste, he implicated him in a case and became a fugitive politician, with the support of people of his own caste. His surrender and show of strength are announced for a certain date. The gathering is exclusively of his caste, "like wheat of a single colour," and includes men and women of all ages. Dukhmochan becomes a powerful man. Arun wages a righteous war against him, killing his thuggish henchmen while Dukhmochan himself enjoys life in Delhi and Patna.

"Gati" ("Course"): Jagat Jha is the village cat. The village is Mohanpur, with people of every caste except Bhumihars and Doms. Bhumihars have no place in its customary social organisation, but Doms do: hence the Dom comes from Chandrayan. After being pawned for two years with Dasai Pasi, he is again allotted to Bhikho Dom of Mohanpur. Manohar Dhanuk's daughter Chanarma also lives in the village. She knows Brahminical pretensions well. After marriage she returns from her husband's home at Bakour, leading her husband along: she did not know the demons of Bakour, whereas all the dogs of Mohanpur knew her. She then has four daughters. Jagat Jha incites Anil Singh, son of T.T., who is coming from Tarbanni, by asking whether Chaniya has paid him what she owed. A brawl and a police case follow. Eventually both sides discover Jagat Babu's true character and join together against him.

"Madhyāntar" ("Intermission"): Jagattarini and Alka Devi are co-wives, but neither shows the slightest trace of jealousy. Alka has two children. Taranand came from a poor family and Alka from a prosperous one; they had studied together. When Taranand passed the civil-service examination, however, dowry considerations led to his marriage with Jagattarini, dark as a stone image but lovely in conduct. Through the efforts of the supposedly unattractive Jagattarini, Alka too comes into the household. Then Mira, the uneducated wife of Manohar, a distant younger male relative of Jagattarini, arrives. The bonds of Mira's marriage begin to weaken, and the lawyers enter. Mira wins her case, but Manohar's lawyer and Mira's own lawyer exploit her sexually. Jagattarini then offers Mira reassurance and trust.

Byāj ("Interest") — "Kirāyā" ("Rent"): Gulabbagh in Purnia is a centre of commercial sex. Amid cries that some lepers have been rubbed and made to swell and that for ten rupees one may obtain "your own companion and your father's companion," a voice addresses the narrator: "The bastard has neither strength in his pocket nor in his loins."

"Patan" ("Fall"): In floodwater, Chanma tries to recover the contents of Jholi Misar's trunk. A snake raises its hood as if saying, "I am not more venomous than you."

"Usās" ("Breath"): A widowed woman from Thana has a sick daughter, Doli. She stops going to the mansion to work, and the master twists ten rupees out of her. Her mother tells Doli the tale of the Rohu fish who suffered oppression and was killed when a kabai fish lodged a thorn in its throat. Doli asks, "Is there no kabai fish for this master?"

"Otghan": A servant, Musba, is refused leave for the Jitiya festival. The mistress applies Jitbahan's ritual oil generously to her own child's head, while Musba hopes for a single drop. In a dream his mother asks why he has come away: "There, your mistress would have served the otghan meal with curd made from pure milk." He answers that the offering oil never even escaped the hand of that Simbakshi woman; what otghan meal could she have served him?

"Jāgriti" ("Awakening"): A crow perches at the fork of a royal road, before the Parliament House shining as though bathed in milk, like a young woman emerging from a milk bath. The familiar tale is repeated: a dog asks a crow to sing so that it can eat the bread. But the crow holds the bread in its claw and answers, "Living in a hollow, how will you hear the songs of the outside world?"

"Jāti" ("Caste"): Kameshwar Babu has a sexual relationship with Sugni, who works in his house. Many years later he looks lustfully at Sugni's daughter Sarasatiya and asks about her. Sugni replies that the girl is indeed grown, but she is wondering what caste of boy to seek for her marriage: one of her own caste, or one of Kameshwar Babu's.

"Mahāmantrī" ("General Secretary"): Vinod, with an MA in economics, becomes trapped in the manoeuvres of Agriculture Minister Pandeyji. His paddy-husking business suffers, and the funds allotted by Pandeyji are siphoned away above his head.

"Ekodiṣṭa" ("The Funeral Offering"): The father, known as Malik Baba, has died. His eldest son Madhu Bhai, in anger also called Madhukanta, is enraged when the invited man fails to attend and cares nothing for the guest's official obligations. He asks why Sunara was not invited instead. Madhu Bhai hurries in and overhears the remark.

"Bhārat" ("India"): Gandhi's statue falls. Passers-by respectfully bow before it but none takes the trouble to lift it. A beggar continues begging beside the fallen statue despite receiving fewer alms, hoping that when Gandhi Baba rises he can tell him of the country's condition.

"Kṛtajñatā" ("Gratitude"): Susmit, Akshayvat and Rakesh are walking and talking. Thanks to Professor Ramnarayan Singh, someone had received good examination marks. The professor meets the narrator, and the secret emerges that the marks were given in return for the present of a fine umbrella.

"Visangati" ("Incongruity"): The narrator is a medical representative. Natho Bahin needs medicine for stomach pain, Tejo Kaka for a case of ringworm, and Awadhesh Bhai pills to stimulate his appetite. But Subelal, the ploughman, whose son is five years older than the narrator, calls him "master." He does not want medicine for a bad stomach: he cannot obtain as much food as his stomach could digest. He asks whether there is a medicine that would reduce hunger.

"Boin" ("Wages"): Jugo Marar's wife Dhoraywali crosses the threshing ground at Kinkar Babu's home without wages; her son Lalmohra works there too merely for food. With the narrator's help she is granted an old-age pension. Yet her employer will not pay wages for the two days he sends her away from work. At the block office an official accepts her papers without taking money. She concludes that her business must not have been done: how could any poor person's work be accomplished without wages or payment?

"Pahicān" ("Recognition"): During a funeral rite involving the dedication of a tree, a calf dies from being struck by the wooden implement.

"Anuttarit" ("Unanswered"): Dina Babu's sexual appetite is met with a question from Budhni, his ploughman's daughter: "In this salwar frock, do I look like his eldest sister?"

"Yogyatā" ("Qualification"): Rafiq Sahib opens a school and, in judging a young woman's qualifications, asks her age. The story is not powerful.

"Uddeśya" ("Purpose"): The chief minister demands the education minister's resignation in connection with the proposed prohibition of cheating in examinations.
"Bodh" ("Understanding"): A king sees the serpent king's wife having intercourse with a water-creature and hears her question: "Is a grain of virility not greater than a mountain of noble lineage?"
"Mol-Jol" ("Bargaining"): On Panki Road in Daltonganj, during the death rites for Bharat Babu's mother, a Brahmin receiving milk and oil demands a hundred and fifty-one rupees, then another fifty, and is still dissatisfied. A Brahmin beggar offers to drink the milk and sesame mixture for that sum instead.
"Mūlya" ("Value"): Manorama studies for her PhD under Lakhan Babu. When he proposes a love affair, she replies, "With the very eyes that have seen you as so great a figure, how can I see you naked?"
"Āsthā" ("Faith"): During an emergency, Panditji proposes to perform the cow-gift rite with eleven rupees, sesame, kuśa grass, barley and unbroken rice instead of an actual cow. When the narrator questions this substitute, the priest says, "Is it a human being? It is an animal—an animal!"
"Antim Abhilāṣ" ("Last Wish"): Asked for his dying wish, Madar Das says he longs to eat potato curry and rice.
"Sarokār" ("Concern"): Phul Babu dies. Just then dollars arrive for a poem published in America, prompting Madaneshwar Babu to ask how much it will amount to in Indian currency.
"Pratibaddhatā" ("Commitment"): Ramsharanji's understanding of Indian poverty and the exploitation of women is so lucid from reading foreign authors. Lalita has been engrossed in his work for a month. But when a discussion of feminism exposes the difference between his professed theory and conduct, and Lalita rebukes him, he declares feminism a weapon wielded by impertinent young women to subdue men.
"Jogār" ("Arrangements"): After Kumar Gandharva's death, two newspaper reviewers in JNU's Kaveri Hostel dispute who should write about him. One claims to have been writing articles on Gandharva since the day the musician first became ill; he tells the other to write a poem instead.
"Piṇḍadān": Chakradhar Babu refuses to pay Jhingur Jha for land taken after Jha's mother's death. On the night before Chakradhar sets off for Gaya to offer piṇḍa to his ancestors, he dreams: do not dispossess the living; the dead will settle themselves.

Lorhā-Bicchā — "Bhūkh" ("Hunger"): Ramkisna was the narrator's childhood companion. Now Ramkisna grazes cattle while the narrator is a professor. On Holi, when the narrator attempts to put colour on him, Ramkisna says colour cannot cling to filthy, soiled clothes. His stomach has been burning for four days.
"Mahagī Unmūlan" ("Eradication of High Prices"): Manindra walks along a Patiala road with his father and family. Everyone except speakers of one language is being hacked down like radishes and turnips. He survives, and later comes at Holi to play with His Excellency, using foul-smelling water rather than the colours of the corpses, because the water is cheaper.

"Kasāī" ("Butcher"): Surenma's land lies in the way of making Bilat Singh's field rectangular, but Surenma will not consent. He is beaten. The sub-inspector demands money; even an appeal to the superintendent of police achieves nothing, because the sub-inspector secured his position by paying a bribe to that very officer.
"Dahej" ("Dowry"): The narrator's younger sister refuses to return to her husband's house for the gauna unless she takes along a matchstick and a tin of kerosene.
"Pīṛhīk Dvandva" ("Conflict of Generations"): The wheel of fate, differences between Saheb Rai and Ramdev Rai, and the change of a father's name from Ramdev to Chaturbhuj Rai.
"Pahine, Āi, ā Kālhi" ("Yesterday, Today and Tomorrow"): The narrator asks Gonu Baba a question; Gonu replies that people will weep in the past, present and future over the stick, rice and revolver ball.
"Pratiphal" ("Consequence"): The consequences of Bharati and Sharad's scientific theory. Methods for determining the birth of a son have reduced the number of girls; now men wage wars over women.
"Uparāg" ("Eclipse"): Kamo Jha's first wife came from Dibra, his second from Murli. The second wife had a son and three daughters. A snake bites her son Niranjan—is it because he worshipped by touching the Shiva liṅga, or because of the first wife's supposed witchcraft? Kamo's father Musai Jha had an illicit relationship with his daughter-in-law from Dibra. At the death of the wife from Murli, people ask her son Indradev to light the funeral pyre. She discloses a secret: "You are not his son; you are his ... his younger brother!"
"Kou Kāhū Magan" ("Each Content in His Own Way"): The narrator and companions are out walking when Chaudharyji finds a ten-rupee note on the road. Whose money can it be? If a hollow appears in one place, must some other place not rise higher?
"Ṛṇkhauk" ("Debtor"): Nilesh comes from a poor family. After he gains an education, village people pressure his father into arranging his marriage. His wife is such that she beats his father. Nilesh decides to marry a woman of another caste; a neighbour says, "He is a debtor: he will die before he has repaid the debt to his father."

Story: Among the educated middle class, those who study Maithili from Class IX through the undergraduate and postgraduate levels, whether as a language or their mother tongue, develop affection for it. The arrival of Maithili on the internet has rekindled affection for the mother tongue. Maithili books, including textbooks produced by government institutions, have remained difficult to obtain; the internet has intervened in this situation, but only to a limited extent. Consequently a sense of inferiority has entered Maithili writers (a superiority complex is itself a form of inferiority), and literature has begun to stand on a raised mound of self-regard. Controversies are manufactured, with literary debate reduced to charges and countercharges. Husbands and wives, districts and regions, fathers and sons have begun creating favourable environments for themselves: stories and poems are written for prizes through blackmail and black marketing. Yet even literary works awarded the Booker or the Nobel Prize do not necessarily endure forever. Many are remembered, many are forgotten, and readers eventually determine their value. In Maithili, however, generations pass and, in the absence of readers, spouses, fathers and sons, regional factions and now circles of poets and fiction writers determine merit by blackmail. Because the internet's intervention is still limited, fine literature, creative literature and writing beneficial to society do not come forward or are not produced. Will you encourage poets and fiction writers who stay in the news by provoking disputes because they are practising blackmail—or humanistic poets and fiction writers who remain among the dust and earth? Only when you make that choice will you be able to infuse life into what appears to be a purposeless Maithili literature.

Supplementary Discussion

Arvind Thakur and Devshankar Naveen: Arvind Thakur (1954–) and Devshankar Naveen (1962–) are two fiction writers who move beyond Kaniyā Kākī and Buccī Dāi in writing Maithili stories, though neither has written much. Arvind Thakur has published very little indeed: each has only one story collection so far, Against Darkness by Arvind Thakur and Hāthī Chalae Bazār by Devshankar Naveen. Thakur's strength is in his political-economic stories, while Naveen comes before us with the immensity of his linguistic vocabulary. The stagnation of the Maithili short story is being diminished somewhat, but many essential aspects remain untouched because writers produce so little and remain idle—subject to that particularly Maithil inertia. Naveen brings back the same plot repeatedly: for example, in "Ṛṇkhauk" and "Ijot," there is mention of a daughter-in-law killing her father-in-law, along with similar recurrences, suggesting that several stories have been fashioned out of a single plot. There is also the plot in the latter half of "Ussar Jamin" ("Barren Land"), which the writer has not used as effectively as he might. I mention that latter plot because Maithils have lived through the experience it describes, and on precisely such a basis Kumar Pawan wrote the unforgettable story "Paiṭh" (published in Antikā), a story capable by itself of making his reputation imperishable, just as Chandradhar Sharma Guleri's "Usne Kaha Tha" sustained his. Arvind Thakur, for his part, writes stories that interweave the social, political and economic so thoroughly that they attempt to fill a vacancy in Maithili fiction. But he writes far too seldom: the reader remains thirsty and the vessel remains unfilled.

Against Darkness — "Khissā Siyār-Yār": Ramnarayan Maharaj is a former MLA and former chair of the Government Publications Committee. At the time of a scandal, Ramadhar Pandey, the chief minister's brother and an MLA, had protected him. Garibdas Azad, district committee general secretary, spent many years among the Socialists and now belongs to the Mahasabha Party; even his son has taken to robbing trains. Shaligram Rai and Lakhan Yadav belong among the insolent and self-important. A meeting is under way. Political commentary emerges in several paragraphs through the mouths of Rajnath Jha and Jibachh Mandal. Sadanand Vidrohi is a young associate of Tofan Singh, the self-appointed leader of the opposition to the Mahasabha Party; he lost his right hand in a bomb explosion while accompanying Singh. His expressions of regret, Pandeyji's manoeuvre to install Raghubansh Mandal as district committee vice-president on the argument that backward classes deserve representation, and his silence when confronted by Chaudharyji's prestige all form part of the spectacle. Rajmangal Shrivastava and Satish Singh Parmar—the "thirty-six-babu Kshatriya," in the terminology of the swaggering men—enter the scene. Parmar is all-powerful in the fifty-one-member Dhela Committee. The pair of Shrivastava and Parmar is notorious: when apart they abuse one another, but they stay together. Former block president Shanichar, known as "Shani," is a tireless consumer of ganja and other intoxicants; current youth president Ganesh Gurmaita makes a profession of petitions. Chatterjee-da is on the telephone from Patna, contemplating a front with Chaubeyji against Chaudharyji and Pandeyji. When Parmar entangles Shani and Gurmaita in conversation, someone deliberately sets them at loggerheads, and someone else comes to their rescue. Jatashankar Malik, better known as Makhan Babu, is a "wrench that fits every nut and bolt," to use the same boastful vocabulary. He calls out to Parasmani Chaudhary to draw attention to himself and responds to one respectful greeting with three of his own. His son, Bauka Babu, a member of a communalist party, has taken his car, and his jeep is broken. Since he has to arbitrate a dispute in the Dusadh settlement, he must summon a rickshaw. He keeps eating chyawanprash and has taken homoeopathic treatment in Raghopur. Sita Babu is block president of the Mahasabha Party, described as Makhan Babu's "daughter-in-law" in the swaggerers' idiom. Subodhnarayan Singh, known as Subodhji, is a former MLA and former district president of the Mahasabha Party: to supporters he is the district's Gandhi, to opponents a Natwarlal, and to the swaggerers "Mundhubara." His way of life is simple and his manner courteous. He is devoted to Chief Minister Shivadhar Pandey, Ramadhar Pandey's brother. Yet his growing closeness to Chaudharyji earns him punishment: Shivadharji asks him to withdraw his party candidature. Rajiv Sharma suffers from the mistaken belief that politics can be practised without deceit, intrigue, lies or betrayal. He speaks out in the wrong places, for which the arrogant men call him a biter. When Subodhji says that a telephone call came from Shivadhar Babu and therefore he had to withdraw his name, Sharma responds that they will pull down the whole nest of these scoundrels and hooligans. Ramsogarath Mandal, a freedom fighter, is also present, but he has declined the freedom-fighter's pension. When someone broaches it, he says, "Go on, son, go and teach that lesson to Sunnar Thakur, who got hold of a freedom-struggle pension by shaving ministers' hair and beards." At that moment a new disturbance begins; someone has again stolen a march. Makhan Babu gets out of a large car and places a garland around Ramadhar Pandey's neck. Suddenly everyone is garlanding everyone else; equally suddenly the speeches begin. Meanwhile, in Ramsogarath Mandal's dream, terrifying black shapes encircle the golden dream on every side.

"Piyāsal Pāni" ("Thirsty Water"): Ramcharan works as a cultivator; the ploughing now falls to his son Lakhna. Lakhna's gauna, the ceremony marking the bride's arrival after marriage, brings the woman from Narayanpur to the household. The author, or narrator, goes to see the bride's face and is overwhelmed by her beauty. Lakhna's aunt from Beriya teases him, and he leaves. One day the Narayanpur bride begins to touch the narrator's feet. In rice transplantation, weeding, harvesting or other field labour she has no equal. One morning, while it is still dark, he sets off to supervise harvesting; beside a grafted mango tree her eager lips leave their marks on his cheek, forehead and throat. Just then the voice of Sarjugba, the household servant, rises out of the darkness. Cursing that enemy and invoking a thunderbolt from God upon him, the Narayanpur woman moves away, submerged in thwarted desire, longing and resentment. Rumour spreads that a witch has possessed her. She tears off her clothes. Motiya Dusadh drinks liquor, the offering to Barham Baba, becomes a ritual exorcist, and breaks seven green switches upon her body. He claims to have driven the witch to the peepal tree in Haridwar's cremation ground. The Narayanpur woman runs away. Lakhna is married again, but this time the narrator sends eleven rupees for the ceremonial viewing of the bride through someone else. Ramcharan is delighted by reports of the new bride's promise, while Lakhna beats his own head because he is impotent. The Narayanpur woman was a Lakshmi—innocent, unfortunate and abandoned.

"Anhārak Virodhme" ("Against Darkness"): There is shouting and commotion. The writer or narrator goes outside and comes to Alauddin, a Muslim vegetable seller. Alauddin recounts what happened. Janardan Chaudhary is his friend; in the same neighbourhood Bikua abused the friend's brother. The brother came to complain of Bikua's misconduct, calling out "Brother!" But Bikua struck him, while the women of his household started abusing the visitor. They even tried to turn the dispute into a Hindu–Muslim issue. What honour could such a neighbourhood still claim? At precisely that moment, brilliant electric light breaks through the breast of the darkness that has spread its frightening shadow everywhere, illuminating the surrounding distance.

"Ḍhāĉhā—1992" ("The Structure—1992"): The story takes the form of a letter by the narrator, who acknowledges that everything he has written was written under the pressure of circumstances. He has recently had jaundice and has lain with his tongue parched; sunlight, dust and smoke distress him. There is another strange illness: his body burns intensely and small rashes begin to rise on his skin. Once, returning from Saharsa, his scooter broke down. A mechanic promised to repair it in half an hour, then scattered all its parts and kept him there for four hours. Back in Supaul he went to Dr Das's clinic. Drops of homoeopathic medicine worked, but only after hours. The same had happened once when he was returning from his in-laws' home: separation from his wife, bone-chilling cold and a whistling wind. A gathering brings Professor Rajendra, Dr Mukherjee and Principal Jha of the K. K. Institute of Madology together. Professor Rajendra tells Mukherjee that he will pay the five-rupee consultation fee, but the medicine must be free—physicians' samples. Mukherjee says the medical representatives pay him no attention, so they will have to go to Dr Das. Then comes the destruction of the Babri Masjid structure in Ayodhya. The narrator's trembling, burning, blotches and swelling return. There is no immediately discernible physical cause, yet his body has suffered the event.

“Mūs” (“Rat”): A man runs a pharmacy. The new drug inspector has taken a five-hundred-rupee ceremonial payment during Durga Puja. The shop seems to have ground to a halt; Anuj sits there. Will a Bhumihar concoct schemes, or conduct business? There is an old bank loan and five years of unpaid household electricity bills. His wife’s eldest brother is an accountant in Nagpur, with a good job and a healthy wife. If only he were a magician who could say “gili-gili-phu,” or if only Aladdin’s lamp were in his hands! A rat has tormented him, even at mealtimes, but now he feels not the slightest anger. The town has been raised from sub-divisional to district headquarters, and land prices have risen. He could sell the land and clear his debts. Sleep gives way to transparent bubbles and rats of many shapes and forms: gnawing, fighting, dancing, loving, reading books and playing rummy. Later a giant bubble appears, and plague comes from the rats. Industrious rats make burrows in which snakes live. He wakes with a start, looks at the portrait of his late father and asks whether he too will use the wealth amassed by his forebears like a snake. He takes a hoe and begins clearing weeds from the garden bed.

“Prajātantra Parikathā” (“A Fairy Tale of Democracy”): There has been one murder and two household robberies. Kamal Kumar Sharma reads the report, which seems censored. It does not mention that the murdered Dr K. P. Bhagat was retired and charged only nominal fees. The robbers had entered his home pretending to be poor patients and their relatives. How could the reporter, against whom a black-marketing and adulteration case is pending, have written that the police station stood barely a hundred paces from the doctor’s house and the police officer’s residence scarcely sixty or seventy paces away? From the doctor’s place the gang went to the home of Vikram Prasad Verma, a recently retired teacher decorated with the President’s Medal. They robbed his home and had food prepared, which they ate. Vikram Babu’s brother Gajanan Babu managed to slip away to the superintendent of police, yet nothing came of it. People gathered outside the main gate of the hospital grounds. The Chemists and Druggists Association under Madhuresh Kishore Dwivedi led the protest. What if something should happen to children returning from school? The speakers appeared: broker Ishwar Chaudhary; procurer Murlidhar Agrawal; a journalist who sold petrol adulterated with kerosene; municipal chairman Buchnu Babu, who traded in stolen goods; and the black-marketeer Seth Kanakdharimal, a sixty-year-old husband to a twenty-five-year-old wife who, through the munim’s generosity, had borne four children. His panting over the loudspeaker sounded like a minor storm. There was Gyannath Singh, president of the Bar Association, who defended murderers and robbers; the ganja-smoking petty leader Krishnanand Tiwari, who proposed a free plan to convert the flood-stricken region into Disneyland; and the fair-skinned Dr Dharamchand Sahay, whom those in the know called D.C.S.—an acronym for drink, girls and a coarse abuse—delivering his fevered words. The crowd became leaderless. People insisted that the mass itself, rather than a delegation, should speak directly to the authorities. Meanwhile an “old fox” held forth on the terrace about international problems. A motorcyclist attempted to take control of the crowd: he was the newest recruit of a communalist party. Madhureshji took precautions. A new, rough-hewn slogan, newly born, attracted Kamal's attention and that of others. Then came Pradip Krantikari, who had supposedly abandoned engineering studies out of devotion to social service—or had been expelled for drunkenness and rape. The sub-divisional officer's jeep was attacked. Pradip Krantikari shouted that "the bastard" wanted seven thousand rupees for a coal licence: "Did you see the storm?" Madhureshji had gathered others, including Gajendraji, a lecturer at the local college, and Madhavji and Krishnamohanji of the traders' association. Without mishap the crowd reached Gandhi Chowk and Jayaprakash Chowk. Then Goldiya, who sat at the sweetshop and played cricket—careful, even there, about how the ball was provided; when it met the bat it went for six, otherwise it was clean-bowled—saw a government vehicle and shouted: "Hit it! Set it on fire!" Some charged towards it, but the driver sped away. At Nyay Chowk, also called Nawab Chowk, soldiers of the Vishwa Hindu Sena had installed Bajrangbali because a statue of blindfolded Justice holding scales could not be placed there. A sign naming it Bajrang Chowk was erected. At that time Dalit officers predominated in the administration and wanted the intersection named Ambedkar Chowk; so, in the story's satirical account, they "arrested" Bajrangbali and carried him to the police station, where, it is said, he is worshipped even today. Since the intersection adjoins the municipal offices it is now called Municipality Chowk. The sub-divisional officer returned with a force and they began swinging their batons together. Policemen chased people for a considerable distance. The crowd then began hurling stones in return. The police fled in disorder. An inspector with a Hitler-style moustache arrived, but men from Bargāȟi had driven away in his vehicle. The sub-divisional officer and others hurried into the jeep and made their escape. Kamal searched the scene with his eyes. Goldi argued with him; Amjad Ali seized Kamal's arm, and a dozen people stood between an enraged leopard and a thick-headed buffalo. People outside the political and social factions did not know the art of flattering the powerful. Why engage with them at all? The demand now was for the release of two arrested companions, but the officers, concerned for their own safety, were unwilling. The DSP with his hoodlum's haircut spoke with coarse insolence. Madhureshji remarked, "Whether you are determined to depart without a mark on you, or whether only thoroughgoing supporters of Jayaprakash surround you..." An agreement was reached to release the detainees. Not a human being—or even a crow—was in sight. Had Kurukshetra fallen into such silence after the Mahabharata war? A group of children was entering the field to play cricket.

"Atha Girgiṭ Kathā" ("Now the Tale of the Chameleon"): Mukkan Babu, that is Mukund Jaiswal, is a dealer with a Public Distribution System shop. A police sub-inspector with the same name had once arrived, causing considerable amusement. Ramlakhan Poddar, B.Sc. Honours, son of Kishan Poddar the tea-and-paan seller, topped his examinations but wore out his shoes seeking a job. The municipal instrument for measuring the social atmosphere would find seventy-five per cent cowardly respectability, twenty per cent friendship founded on self-interest and five per cent miscellaneous viruses. The police outpost occupies a warehouse-like building, with a liquor shop adjoining it. One day the men unexpectedly come face to face: Mukund emerging from the police post and Ramlakhan from the liquor shop. After their quarrel, the police sympathise with Mukund, while customers emerging from the liquor shop side with Poddar. Ramlakhan is arrested, and the following morning his father secures his release by making offerings of flowers and leaves to the police. Mukkan Babu then gathers sixteen people, forms an Anti-Intoxication Citizens' Forum and stages a sit-in at the liquor shop. The sixteen comprise seven paternal and maternal cousins of various kinds, two ploughmen, an operator of a paddy-husking machine, three notorious friends, and two delinquent sons of the family priest. But Poddarji arrives with thirty-six people to protect his rights. When the commander of the anti-intoxication forum rushes forward with a staff, the others are carried bodily away; a sequence of blows and scuffles ensues. Subrata Mukherjee, a specialist in swaggering violence, calls it gang warfare. Then municipal elections are announced. The virus of self-interested friendship reveals its colours before Shivaj Rigalk. Mukkan Babu becomes chairman and Poddarji vice-chairman. Peace returns to the town.

"Ayyāśī" ("Indulgence"): A man dreams of pleasure in sitting with a friend, but his wife asks for ten rupees for vegetables and says the groceries can come tomorrow or the day after. He sets out for his friend's house, refusing to listen to his son. He passes Patel Chowk and reaches Mahatma Gandhi Chowk with twenty rupees in his pocket. A rickshaw-puller rests with the canopy raised. He gets in; along the way he buys a two-rupee cigarette for his friend, his favourite magazine Mor for twelve rupees, and gives the rickshaw-puller four rupees. The breeze from his friend's fan affords some relief. The remaining two rupees mock him: the vegetables for the household, and his son's books and notebooks. When he returns, his body is drenched in sweat. Seeing his wife's angry, red eyes, one would think he has returned after a bout of debauchery.

"Baikbā-Phorbā": The underlying news is that the petrol of an already inflamed atmosphere has been shown the matchstick of private interest. The incident concerns Prakash Agrawal's firm, "Vriddhichand Bhanwarlal Cloth Store." With its outstanding credit approaching a lakh, the firm hires Sikandar Jha, motherless, unruly, son of the late Raghunath Jha and an eighth-standard failure, to collect debts. One day he approaches Ramchand Marar, whose son Kaleshwar Marar—now using Yadav as his surname—had had a three-thousand-rupee three-piece suit made four years earlier. The father refuses liability for his son's debt. On the road, while stopping for paan at Munna Thakur's shop, Sikandar meets Kaleshwar Yadav, accompanied by relatives and family. Where Sikandar himself had once acted as a tough, Kaleshwar now does. A demand for repayment turns into a fight. Sikandar pins him down by the chest. Sikandar's old associates gather and thrash Kaleshwar's relatives. The next day a procession for Backward-Caste Unity attacks the cloth store, smashing its glass. Armed men arrive and rain down blows with sticks. People flee wherever they can squeeze through. Looting and disorder spread. A series of glimpses follows. Scene one: district president

Purushottam Mandal speaks in his party's office, a building with eighteen rooms and two large halls. A goodwill procession is planned. Chiranjeev Singh, president of the party youth wing and Mandalji's ardent disciple, becomes furious: "You too are from a small caste; naturally you will side with them!" He storms out. Scene two: a thatched house. Dhanilal and Ramnarayan discuss what Baikba-Phorba means. What does Matru know? After silence, someone begins singing the Ālhā. Scene three: the tea-and-snack shop of Comrade Ramsevak Sahu. There is debate about Vidyanivasji's speech, declaring that caste is no such thing at all; a youth calls him mad and walks away. Scene four: children playing during the school lunch break. "This grass-and-thatch house is mine, and I shall be a Yadav. The shop belongs to Birju, and he will be a Brahmin. We shall quarrel. Lallu, Mohan, Naren and Bablu will come and set fire to my house. Then Suresh will become the leader and Vinod the policeman. Suresh will tell the officer to get both our house and shop rebuilt and to catch those responsible. Suresh will make us shake hands and become friends." The game of Baikba-Phorba lasts the whole lunch period.

"Viṣ-Pān" ("Drinking Poison"): Gopalji sits restlessly on a chair in the lawyers' room. At the courthouse gate a parrot-owning astrologer sits beneath a banner advertising mamira collyrium to improve eyesight. From the court veranda orderly Ramesar Mandal, son of Jagesar Mandal, shouts. A litigant promises his lawyer the remaining fee at the next hearing, but the lawyer is digging his ear with the blunt end of a pen. Gopal overhears. One day at a paan shop, Chaturanan had come with a stick and beaten him until he fell. Neniya, his father's old servant, arrived and struck Chaturanan, who nevertheless escaped. The sixty-year-old mother of Ramprasad from Marauna was first to inquire after Gopal. Gopal was taken to hospital. Chaturanan, too, came there seeking treatment and an injury report; someone recognised him and chased him away with a length of drainpipe. Everyone called Chaturanan a habitual criminal, but Gopal had tried to reform him; he had now become a Bhasmasura, a destroyer of his benefactor. The police extracted money from Chaturanan and he stayed at home. Hearing dates kept being set in Gopal's case, and his X-ray plate vanished from the hospital. After three years the evidence began, followed by cross-examination: had he been wearing a full-sleeved shirt that day, had it a collar and pocket, what was its colour; how long and what sort of stick had struck him? The lawyer was his friend, but one day the sharpness of his tone was unmistakable: "You see, litigants have paid us; naturally we must attend to their work first." No testimony was recorded that day, and the judge entered an adverse observation on the file. Chaturanan settled matters for three thousand rupees, with the suggestion that Gopal might pay more if he could. An offer had also reached the lawyer-friend through counsel for the opposing party. At Gopal's request, proceedings to transfer the case began. But it was transferred to a court connected by kinship to Shilbhadra Jha, Gopalji's political rival, under whose protection Chaturanan now lived. Gopal signs a compromise petition: a surrender likened to General Niazi's surrender with a hundred thousand troops in the India–Pakistan war.

Hāthī Chalae Bazār: This short-story collection is arranged in three sections. The first, Mūldhan ("Principal"), contains stories of ordinary length, roughly two thousand words each—the form called the "short story" in English. In Maithili, however, the "short story" or laghu-kathā is often written within a single page, and a collection of those is placed in the second section, Byāj ("Interest"). The last section, Lorhā-Bicchā, contains stories of different lengths that the author evidently considers somewhat weaker. Yet after reading them, one finds that many from that last section merit inclusion under Principal and Interest, while quite a few in Principal and Interest would fit better in Lorhā-Bicchā.

Mūldhan ("Principal") — "Anhār" ("Darkness"): The road passing through Lauhar village has been paved. Government jeeps travel along it, and flocks of goats bleat on the way to be offered in sacrifice at Mahishi Ugratara. Children emerge from houses whose eaves almost touch, amid wheat and straw. Tetar Musahar used to work as a ploughman for a household in Sarauni village and was cutting straw for Ramanand Singh. The wheel of Kulwant Singh's truck ran over his boy. The village headman arrived and took six thousand rupees from Sardar Kulwant Singh, saying that two thousand would be given to Tetar. Tetar's whole body trembled: how was he to count so many five-rupee notes? Tetar tried to console his wife from Baluaha: "As long as you and I are alive, will there not be more children?"

"Tax Free": Chalittar works at a brick kiln. Instead of six and a half rupees he receives five; the overseer keeps one and a half. But a budget was passed only yesterday: an article formerly costing four rupees and seventy-five paise will now cost seven rupees and seventy paise. The candidate Chalittar had voted for has come to the inspection bungalow, so Chalittar goes to him. Before the election, he says, he could at least eat half a stomachful; now he cannot manage even that. But the leader, now a minister, rebukes him: "How many garments and cloths we distributed! We got televisions and the BDO made tax-free! Yet no one is grateful." Police throw Chalittar out, landing punches and slaps upon him. From whom is he to learn what "tax free" means?

"Babūr" ("The Acacia"): A drought-stricken man has died and must be taken on his last journey. He had only one son, Udba. The father had long felt close to the gentlemen of the village. Udba sets off towards the Brahmin quarter: even if each man contributed just one piece of wood, there would be a heap. Instead he hears taunts: "Dogs and crows ate the flesh of his forefathers, yet these drought victims now want a tree for cremation!" Udba sends word to bring the corpse to the embankment. Meanwhile he cuts and splits the acacia growing on government land and builds a pyre. He lights it. Panditji arrives and remarks that a funeral pyre should not be made of acacia; Udba should have put a torch in the dead man's mouth and floated him down the river. Furious, Udba snatches the pandit's almanac and throws it into the fire. This acacia, he says, is the sandalwood for the likes of you.

"Sambandh" ("Relationship"): Sugiya and her husband Jibachh live beside the crossroads and run a makeshift stall selling puffed rice, sweets and sugar confections. Between the evening meal and sleep they lie in one another's arms and talk. If the old woman had lived just this one more year, their happiness might not have ended. Sugiya is pregnant. Today, while eating rice and parwar, she hears cries as her husband is being strangled by members of the extended kin group. She rushes there, but they attack her with an axe too. At the police station the sub-inspector is busy settling matters with a tractor-owner. He demands a two-hundred-rupee fee for registering her case. Jibachh has only sixty rupees in his shirt pocket. Sugiya goes to the goldsmith to sell her bangles and neck ornament, but he takes advantage of her desperation and offers too little. By the time she raises the money, Jibachh has died. The sub-inspector says he died without making any statement; perhaps Sugiya was involved with another man and had arranged for gangsters to murder her husband. He locks her in the police cell and sends word to his quarters that he will not be coming home that night.

"Antim Behośī" ("The Final Unconsciousness"): The narrator's bhauji, Lalita Mishra, is the wife of Professor Samaresh Mishra, head of the Chemistry Department. They were first teacher and pupil, then lovers, then husband and wife. There is an age gap of at least ten years. They have three children: Sushma, fourteen; Madhuri, twelve; and Shwetabh, ten. Bhauji is pregnant for the fourth time, because the hunger of the body is powerful. Her daughters are ridiculed at school and tell their mother, "Our heads split with shame at the mockery; will you never stop bearing children?" She attempts an abortion but gets no help from Samaresh Bhai. Haunted by her daughters' words and her swollen belly, she even thinks of striking it with the end of a rolling pin. She faints. Had her fourth pregnancy come fourteen years after the first child, would her daughter not have prayed to the gods, as Shipra did? Shipra, a student at the narrator's college, had welcomed a brother born when she was seventeen. The doctor's expression does not look reassuring. Bhauji's baby is now in the narrator's arms. Bhauji has left this world and its intrigues. With the twenty-six-hour-old infant, he enters Samaresh Bhai's quarters. Bhauji's ten-year-old son talks to him joyfully, without waiting for replies. Bhauji regained consciousness only long enough to leave a message: the English-medium school has turned her two daughters into Chandis; they will not let this baby live. "You are now its mother and father." The narrator is lost in thought. The sisters have gone to school. How is he to perform the funeral rites and have the ten-year-old son put on mourning garments?

"Ussar Jamin" ("Barren Land"): Tejo Babu is the narrator's kinsman, a paternal relative known to the younger people as Phul Kaka. In the days of his strength he had satisfied his lust, by consent or coercion, with women working in his fields. Now he is father-in-law to two daughters-in-law and one son-in-law. He used to imitate the narrator's squint until, through doing so, the eyeball of his own right eye seemed to disappear beneath the upper lid. Looking now at his grandchildren—their faces like the flat bowl of a roof tile, lips like old pointed gourds, potato-shaped noses, catlike eyes and cheeks like bursts of Holi powder—he repents. Arbitrators assemble to divide the property of his sons Ram and Lakshman. Ram has a daughter, and a father of daughters grows old early; Lakshman has a son. Lakshman's wife from Simraha realises that the elder brother will have to pay for one daughter's marriage next year and another soon afterwards. She looks for a pretext to divide the family. The arbitrators, a surveyor and a labourer to weigh the grain arrive. The man who once mediated other families' quarrels now faces arbitration in his own. Everything is divided, but there is only one threshing floor and one well: the floor is broken up and the well filled in. Yet how can one break or fill in one's parents? The father goes with Ram and the mother with Lakshman. Both are left like heaps of dung and dust. The Simraha daughter-in-law sees no benefit in allotting two bighas of land from the common property to the elderly parents. When rice pudding is made in the younger son's home, a spoonful or two falls even on the old mother's leaf plate; yet eating alone wounds her heart. Phul Kaka has become a philosopher: why should a barren cow, sterile land or a lame ox expect care and maintenance?

"Pavan Pul" ("The Bridge of Air"): The narrator has taken his Intermediate Science examination, with only the practical left. He returns to the village in the interval, unwilling to place a greater burden on his low-paid father. He was in Saharsa just three days earlier. His younger sister Saroj lies on her deathbed. She is eldest among his three younger sisters, yet three years younger than he. Married at ten and sent to her husband's home at thirteen, she was brought back on a carrying pole after six months. Her husband is an ignorant good-for-nothing. The narrator used to tease him by asking when the automatic watch and the English Raleigh bicycle he demanded had been manufactured; Saroj was punished even for that teasing. In the physics practical the narrator could not measure the radius of curvature of a convex lens, but by the following morning Saroj had crossed beyond that curved boundary forever. His middle paternal uncle, whom he calls Babu, loves the narrator and Saroj more than life itself. Yet people of their own community refuse to help carry the corpse. The narrator's aunt points out the absurdity: the four women of the lineage are left to weep and console one another, while voices whisper through cracks and corners that the girl died just as she reached maturity and will become a witch galloping through the neighbourhood all night. At the funeral feast Ranganath Mishra asks who will rise first: there are only twenty-one Brahmins, one short of twenty-two. The narrator's younger uncle sits down himself. The narrator seizes Mishra by the arm and makes him stand: "Get out at once, or I shall not spare a single shoe! Let the butcher go. Give his leaf plate to the pig belonging to Bhikho Dom."

"Caritra" ("Character"): Gautamji is an ardent Communist, a Karna Kayastha by caste. He smokes bidis, useful for maintaining a proletarian image, and his moustache has curled into points. He is a Maithil settled in Calcutta, with three daughters. When arranging a daughter's marriage, he takes his lover along to inspect prospective grooms. One match is unsuitable because the family is Ambashtha Kayastha; in another the prospective groom's Karna Kayastha father has a Christian widow as his second wife. The story of Adelina enters at this point. When a headmaster remarks on Adelina, a newly appointed teacher says that Adelina would be only two or three years older than the headmaster's youngest daughter, thereby silencing him. The story ends when Gautamji's middle daughter gives her father a sharp rebuke.

"Ijot" ("Light"): The narrator is playing chess with Madhukarji. As they play he discusses not only Madhukarji's dishonest moves on the board but also his dishonesty in life. When he calls Madhukarji the pupil of a sinful guru, Madhukarji becomes angry: "I am the one who will teach your wife to beat your parents, bring disgrace upon your house, and refuse to let your sister and brother-in-law live with you!" Their conversation over the chessboard exposes Madhukarji's peculiar talents: causing disruption at weddings, applying archery like Ekalavya to seal a dog's mouth, and tutoring the narrator's wife in absurd and disruptive behaviour. He has even told the narrator's sister's parents-in-law: "He has money to buy land in Delhi, but none to give his sister and brother-in-law?" The narrator's wife was already wielding "five brooms and five beatings" against her parents-in-law; Madhukarji has added another five blows on account of the sister. The poor woman has since died. Finally the narrator picks up Madhukarji's knight, returns it to its old square and urges him to bring honesty into his moves.

"Hāthī Chalae Bazār": Bhavani Dai was her father's beloved daughter. After her mother's death she was brought up and married. When her husband Kalyan secured a qualification, her father died on hearing the happy news—of joy, the tale says. Then Bhavani Dai bore a son, and her husband died. In seeking the insurance payment and a compassionate appointment, she encountered two kinds of official. The young manager of the insurance company was courteous and settled everything within minutes. The officer at her husband's workplace, however, was depraved. The story ends with the rebuke that his daughter Gita delivers to her father.

"Chhaguntā": Bairagiji, Ramadhin Pandey "Bairagi," has a son who has become a college professor. The tale gathers pace when that son is kidnapped. Bairagiji has withdrawn twenty-five thousand rupees from his provident fund and kept it ready, only for the money to disappear too. His elder son Arun is also missing. The narrative then turns to Dukhmochan, son of a freedom fighter who refused a pension. Dukhmochan is a criminal figure, revealing his tendencies in high school when he sexually assaulted the daughter of a neighbour disadvantaged by caste and poverty. There followed highway robbery, snatching and other crimes. Disliking the leadership of Bhagatji, an MLA from a lower caste, he implicated him in a case and became a fugitive politician, with the support of people of his own caste. His surrender and show of strength are announced for a certain date. The gathering is exclusively of his caste, "like wheat of a single colour," and includes men and women of all ages. Dukhmochan becomes a powerful man. Arun wages a righteous war against him, killing his thuggish henchmen while Dukhmochan himself enjoys life in Delhi and Patna.

"Gati" ("Course"): Jagat Jha is the village cat. The village is Mohanpur, with people of every caste except Bhumihars and Doms. Bhumihars have no place in its customary social organisation, but Doms do: hence the Dom comes from Chandrayan. After being pawned for two years with Dasai Pasi, he is again allotted to Bhikho Dom of Mohanpur. Manohar Dhanuk's daughter Chanarma also lives in the village. She knows Brahminical pretensions well. After marriage she returns from her husband's home at Bakour, leading her husband along: she did not know the demons of Bakour, whereas all the dogs of Mohanpur knew her. She then has four daughters. Jagat Jha incites Anil Singh, son of T.T., who is coming from Tarbanni, by asking whether Chaniya has paid him what she owed. A brawl and a police case follow. Eventually both sides discover Jagat Babu's true character and join together against him.

"Madhyāntar" ("Intermission"): Jagattarini and Alka Devi are co-wives, but neither shows the slightest trace of jealousy. Alka has two children. Taranand came from a poor family and Alka from a prosperous one; they had studied together. When Taranand passed the civil-service examination, however, dowry considerations led to his marriage with Jagattarini, dark as a stone image but lovely in conduct. Through the efforts of the supposedly unattractive Jagattarini, Alka too comes into the household. Then Mira, the uneducated wife of Manohar, a distant younger male relative of Jagattarini, arrives. The bonds of Mira's marriage begin to weaken, and the lawyers enter. Mira wins her case, but Manohar's lawyer and Mira's own lawyer exploit her sexually. Jagattarini then offers Mira reassurance and trust.

Byāj ("Interest") — "Kirāyā" ("Rent"): Gulabbagh in Purnia is a centre of commercial sex. Amid cries that some lepers have been rubbed and made to swell and that for ten rupees one may obtain "your own companion and your father's companion," a voice addresses the narrator: "The bastard has neither strength in his pocket nor in his loins."

"Patan" ("Fall"): In floodwater, Chanma tries to recover the contents of Jholi Misar's trunk. A snake raises its hood as if saying, "I am not more venomous than you."

"Usās" ("Breath"): A widowed woman from Thana has a sick daughter, Doli. She stops going to the mansion to work, and the master twists ten rupees out of her. Her mother tells Doli the tale of the Rohu fish who suffered oppression and was killed when a kabai fish lodged a thorn in its throat. Doli asks, "Is there no kabai fish for this master?"

"Otghan": A servant, Musba, is refused leave for the Jitiya festival. The mistress applies Jitbahan's ritual oil generously to her own child's head, while Musba hopes for a single drop. In a dream his mother asks why he has come away: "There, your mistress would have served the otghan meal with curd made from pure milk." He answers that the offering oil never even escaped the hand of that Simbakshi woman; what otghan meal could she have served him?

"Jāgriti" ("Awakening"): A crow perches at the fork of a royal road, before the Parliament House shining as though bathed in milk, like a young woman emerging from a milk bath. The familiar tale is repeated: a dog asks a crow to sing so that it can eat the bread. But the crow holds the bread in its claw and answers, "Living in a hollow, how will you hear the songs of the outside world?"

"Jāti" ("Caste"): Kameshwar Babu has a sexual relationship with Sugni, who works in his house. Many years later he looks lustfully at Sugni's daughter Sarasatiya and asks about her. Sugni replies that the girl is indeed grown, but she is wondering what caste of boy to seek for her marriage: one of her own caste, or one of Kameshwar Babu's.

"Mahāmantrī" ("General Secretary"): Vinod, with an MA in economics, becomes trapped in the manoeuvres of Agriculture Minister Pandeyji. His paddy-husking business suffers, and the funds allotted by Pandeyji are siphoned away above his head.

"Ekodiṣṭa" ("The Funeral Offering"): The father, known as Malik Baba, has died. His eldest son Madhu Bhai, in anger also called Madhukanta, is enraged when the invited man fails to attend and cares nothing for the guest's official obligations. He asks why Sunara was not invited instead. Madhu Bhai hurries in and overhears the remark.

"Bhārat" ("India"): Gandhi's statue falls. Passers-by respectfully bow before it but none takes the trouble to lift it. A beggar continues begging beside the fallen statue despite receiving fewer alms, hoping that when Gandhi Baba rises he can tell him of the country's condition.

"Kṛtajñatā" ("Gratitude"): Susmit, Akshayvat and Rakesh are walking and talking. Thanks to Professor Ramnarayan Singh, someone had received good examination marks. The professor meets the narrator, and the secret emerges that the marks were given in return for the present of a fine umbrella.

"Visangati" ("Incongruity"): The narrator is a medical representative. Natho Bahin needs medicine for stomach pain, Tejo Kaka for a case of ringworm, and Awadhesh Bhai pills to stimulate his appetite. But Subelal, the ploughman, whose son is five years older than the narrator, calls him "master." He does not want medicine for a bad stomach: he cannot obtain as much food as his stomach could digest. He asks whether there is a medicine that would reduce hunger.

"Boin" ("Wages"): Jugo Marar's wife Dhoraywali crosses the threshing ground at Kinkar Babu's home without wages; her son Lalmohra works there too merely for food. With the narrator's help she is granted an old-age pension. Yet her employer will not pay wages for the two days he sends her away from work. At the block office an official accepts her papers without taking money. She concludes that her business must not have been done: how could any poor person's work be accomplished without wages or payment?

"Pahicān" ("Recognition"): During a funeral rite involving the dedication of a tree, a calf dies from being struck by the wooden implement.

"Anuttarit" ("Unanswered"): Dina Babu's sexual appetite is met with a question from Budhni, his ploughman's daughter: "In this salwar frock, do I look like his eldest sister?"

"Yogyatā" ("Qualification"): Rafiq Sahib opens a school and, in judging a young woman's qualifications, asks her age. The story is not powerful.

"Uddeśya" ("Purpose"): The chief minister demands the education minister's resignation in connection with the proposed prohibition of cheating in examinations.

"Bodh" ("Understanding"): A king sees the serpent king's wife having intercourse with a water-creature and hears her question: "Is a grain of virility not greater than a mountain of noble lineage?"

"Mol-Jol" ("Bargaining"): On Panki Road in Daltonganj, during the death rites for Bharat Babu's mother, a Brahmin receiving milk and oil demands a hundred and fifty-one rupees, then another fifty, and is still dissatisfied. A Brahmin beggar offers to drink the milk and sesame mixture for that sum instead.

"Mūlya" ("Value"): Manorama studies for her PhD under Lakhan Babu. When he proposes a love affair, she replies, "With the very eyes that have seen you as so great a figure, how can I see you naked?"
"Āsthā" ("Faith"): During an emergency, Panditji proposes to perform the cow-gift rite with eleven rupees, sesame, kuśa grass, barley and unbroken rice instead of an actual cow. When the narrator questions this substitute, the priest says, "Is it a human being? It is an animal—an animal!"
"Antim Abhilāṣ" ("Last Wish"): Asked for his dying wish, Madar Das says he longs to eat potato curry and rice.
"Sarokār" ("Concern"): Phul Babu dies. Just then dollars arrive for a poem published in America, prompting Madaneshwar Babu to ask how much it will amount to in Indian currency.
"Pratibaddhatā" ("Commitment"): Ramsharanji's understanding of Indian poverty and the exploitation of women is so lucid from reading foreign authors. Lalita has been engrossed in his work for a month. But when a discussion of feminism exposes the difference between his professed theory and conduct, and Lalita rebukes him, he declares feminism a weapon wielded by impertinent young women to subdue men.
"Jogār" ("Arrangements"): After Kumar Gandharva's death, two newspaper reviewers in JNU's Kaveri Hostel dispute who should write about him. One claims to have been writing articles on Gandharva since the day the musician first became ill; he tells the other to write a poem instead.
"Piṇḍadān": Chakradhar Babu refuses to pay Jhingur Jha for land taken after Jha's mother's death. On the night before Chakradhar sets off for Gaya to offer piṇḍa to his ancestors, he dreams: do not dispossess the living; the dead will settle themselves.

Lorhā-Bicchā — "Bhūkh" ("Hunger"): Ramkisna was the narrator's childhood companion. Now Ramkisna grazes cattle while the narrator is a professor. On Holi, when the narrator attempts to put colour on him, Ramkisna says colour cannot cling to filthy, soiled clothes. His stomach has been burning for four days.
"Mahagī Unmūlan" ("Eradication of High Prices"): Manindra walks along a Patiala road with his father and family. Everyone except speakers of one language is being hacked down like radishes and turnips. He survives, and later comes at Holi to play with His Excellency, using foul-smelling water rather than the colours of the corpses, because the water is cheaper.
"Kasāī" ("Butcher"): Surenma's land lies in the way of making Bilat Singh's field rectangular, but Surenma will not consent. He is beaten. The sub-inspector demands money; even an appeal to the superintendent of police achieves nothing, because the sub-inspector secured his position by paying a bribe to that very officer.
"Dahej" ("Dowry"): The narrator's younger sister refuses to return to her husband's house for the gauna unless she takes along a matchstick and a tin of kerosene.
"Pīṛhīk Dvandva" ("Conflict of Generations"): The wheel of fate, differences between Saheb Rai and Ramdev Rai, and the change of a father's name from Ramdev to Chaturbhuj Rai.

"Pahine, Āi, ā Kālhi" ("Yesterday, Today and Tomorrow"): The narrator asks Gonu Baba a question; Gonu replies that people will weep in the past, present and future over the stick, rice and revolver ball.
"Pratiphal" ("Consequence"): The consequences of Bharati and Sharad's scientific theory. Methods for determining the birth of a son have reduced the number of girls; now men wage wars over women.
"Uparāg" ("Eclipse"): Kamo Jha's first wife came from Dibra, his second from Murli. The second wife had a son and three daughters. A snake bites her son Niranjan—is it because he worshipped by touching the Shiva liṅga, or because of the first wife's supposed witchcraft? Kamo's father Musai Jha had an illicit relationship with his daughter-in-law from Dibra. At the death of the wife from Murli, people ask her son Indradev to light the funeral pyre. She discloses a secret: "You are not his son; you are his … his younger brother!"
"Kou Kāhū Magan" ("Each Content in His Own Way"): The narrator and companions are out walking when Chaudharyji finds a ten-rupee note on the road. Whose money can it be? If a hollow appears in one place, must some other place not rise higher?
"Ṛṇkhauk" ("Debtor"): Nilesh comes from a poor family. After he gains an education, village people pressure his father into arranging his marriage. His wife is such that she beats his father. Nilesh decides to marry a woman of another caste; a neighbour says, "He is a debtor: he will die before he has repaid the debt to his father."

Story: Among the educated middle class, those who study Maithili from Class IX through the undergraduate and postgraduate levels, whether as a language or their mother tongue, develop affection for it. The arrival of Maithili on the internet has rekindled affection for the mother tongue. Maithili books, including textbooks produced by government institutions, have remained difficult to obtain; the internet has intervened in this situation, but only to a limited extent. Consequently a sense of inferiority has entered Maithili writers (a superiority complex is itself a form of inferiority), and literature has begun to stand on a raised mound of self-regard. Controversies are manufactured, with literary debate reduced to charges and countercharges. Husbands and wives, districts and regions, fathers and sons have begun creating favourable environments for themselves: stories and poems are written for prizes through blackmail and black marketing. Yet even literary works awarded the Booker or the Nobel Prize do not necessarily endure forever. Many are remembered, many are forgotten, and readers eventually determine their value. In Maithili, however, generations pass and, in the absence of readers, spouses, fathers and sons, regional factions and now circles of poets and fiction writers determine merit by blackmail. Because the internet's intervention is still limited, fine literature, creative literature and writing beneficial to society do not come forward or are not produced. Will you encourage poets and fiction writers who stay in the news by provoking disputes because they are practising blackmail—or humanistic poets and fiction writers who remain among the dust and earth? Only when you make that choice will you be able to infuse life into what appears to be a purposeless Maithili literature.

92. The Present Problems of the Maithils

Abstract

Proletarian Maithil culture is passing through a revolutionary upheaval. Migration can be a good thing, but in a culture where whole villages have become empty within a single generation, migration has appeared as a curse. Twenty per cent of the Maithil cultural region lies in Nepal and eighty per cent in India.

Abstract · Synopsis

This chapter examines the present problems of the Maithils from a linguistic and cultural perspective. Its main points of reference include Maithils, their problems, embankments and Maithili. Through the examples and arguments supplied in the source, it considers language structure, vocabulary, translation and writing practices, so that readers can appreciate the critical framework of the chapter and its wider context.

Proletarian Maithil culture is passing through a period of revolutionary upheaval. Migration may be a good thing, yet in a culture where entire villages have become deserted in a single generation, it has taken the form of a curse. Twenty per cent of the region of Maithil culture lies in Nepal, and eighty per cent in India. Migration has thus produced economic, social, political and cultural crises in the region.

Causes: The famine of 1967 and the administrative lethargy that persisted for several years thereafter, followed by the flood of 1987 and several more years of administrative inertia, combined to bring about an economic crisis. Migration consequently assumed its most severe form and produced a cultural crisis. When economic conditions deteriorate, caste rigidity also grows. Mithila's culture contains many factors that assist and many that obstruct a way out of this crisis. The gentle rises and falls of the local language, the wide-ranging abilities of the region's working people, and also the rigidity of its habits and cultural practices are all parts of Mithila's history. These encompass politics, everyday life, social values, economic circumstances, morality, religion, philosophy and literature. The region produced a Vidyapati, who embraced different groups of society, yet it also sustained deeply conservative elements.

Education, Caste and the Condition of Women: There is stratification within a single caste and conflict between castes, along with polygamy, child marriage and the bikauā form of marriage in which a bridegroom is effectively purchased. There has not even been a symbolic movement against child marriage or in support of widow remarriage. The Śūdra poet Ailūṣa composed Vedic hymns; the society in that earlier period was so vigorous that Alexander encountered fierce resistance from the republican groups referred to as the Śūdras. Similarly, in Mithila, when artisans and all those relegated to the so-called lower strata of society were strong, the name of Janaka was derived from the people (jan), and a remarkable sequence of fortifications emerged as expressions of Mithila's architecture: Simraungarh, Pajebagarh, Balirajpur Fort, Asurgarh Fort, Jainagar Fort, Nandangarh, Katragarh, Naulagarh, Mangalgarh, Kichakgarh, Benugarh and Barijangarh, among others. Those forts accorded with the name of Mithila, understood here as a land that subdued its enemies. Buddhist caves, images of Tārā and other works of craftsmanship also represent different forms of artistic activity. As rigidity increased, however, Mithila's achievement in architecture dwindled until today it appears to have reached zero. Economic circumstances deteriorated to the point that families went without an evening meal. Migration prevented starvation, but at a price. In much the same way, learned women such as Maitreyī disappeared for a millennium because of caste rigidity—both internal stratification within castes and separation between castes. The decline of education was so severe that although four of the six philosophical schools originated in Mithila, according to the author's account, whole villages today are filled with people who have not passed the matriculation examination.

Floods and the Economy: The land of Mithila has also had to struggle with the devastation caused by floods. The area around Kusheshwarsthan remains submerged during the rains even when there is no actual flood. This, however, is a condition that developed after 1978–79. Earlier the area was entirely fertile, but uncontrolled construction of embankments in India caused water to become trapped there. News of flooding in the area scarcely ever appears; when it does, it is often accompanied by propaganda claiming that all the accumulated water was released by Nepal. The people around Kusheshwarsthan have learned the art of fighting this new calamity. I remember being told to travel from Kusheshwarsthan to Mahishi Ugratarasthan in the rainy season because, at that time, going by boat was easier. In the dry season boats cannot move through the pits and shallow pools, while the condition of the roads is better left undescribed. People altered their crops and tried fish farming by whatever means they could, learning, under compulsion, an entirely new way of life. Then came the fury of the Kausiki Maharani—the Kosi—in 2008. The two barrages on the Kosi and Gandak in Nepal are, the text argues, controlled by the Water Resources Department of the Bihar government, under the supervision of Bihar's engineers. The decision to release water is in that department's hands. Nepal would have the authority to release water only when other barrages or embankments were constructed on its rivers; even after more than fifty years, this has not proved possible because the two countries have been unable to reach an agreement. The Bhimnagar barrage on the Kosi is at Kusaha in Nepal. The embankment constructed in 1958 had an anticipated life of thirty years, expiring in 1988. Why could the countries not arrive at a settlement? Sand that accumulates between the embankments is removed every year; otherwise, the level of the riverbed rises and the embankments must be raised again and again. The Kosi abandons its principal channel, takes a new course, and devastates both the Mithila region of Nepal and the Mithila region of Bihar.

Maithili Language: Organisations that claim to serve Maithili, traditionally organised around Maithil Brahmins and Karna Kayasthas and occupied with Vidyapati festivals, institutional creation and the distribution of awards, have allowed only restricted entry to those outside those two groups. Their participation is now increasing, however, and that is a good sign for Maithili. The number of authors and readers from other communities is also growing. In the modern information society, interventions by the media and the educational system have seemed almost an assault on Maithili language and culture. Fortunately, television channels such as Mithila and radio stations in Nepal such as Kantipur FM, Janaki FM and Radio Mithila have checked this assault to a limited extent. Children's literature has also grown, and the internet has begun to intervene in Maithili literature, albeit somewhat one-sidedly.

What Should Be Done? Education for women, computer education and vocational instruction should be provided according to local conditions. Primary instruction throughout Mithila should be conducted in Maithili. The flood problem must be solved. Why have projects comparable to the Damodar Valley or Mayurakshi projects not proved possible on the Kosi, Kamala, Bhutahi Balan, Gandak, Burhi Gandak and Bagmati? Why did Visvesvaraya's Vrindavan dam succeed? For how long will we deceive the people by placing all the blame on the government of Nepal? The text proposes, as its fundamental remedy, dismantling and removing the earthen embankments erected along the Kamala-Balan and other rivers with heavy machinery, and building lined, permanent canals rather than unlined channels. There must be negotiations with Nepal and an early solution. Until then, short-term measures must be taken: remove sand accumulated between embankments before the rains arrive; repair the embankments in advance rather than waiting for the monsoon; and keep political ambition out of the work. In 1960 embankments were built on the Kamala from Jainagar to Jhanjharpur, inaugurating, in the author's assessment, the devastation of the entire region. I have already described in the account of Kusheshwar what happened to the area beyond Jhanjharpur. The stories of Madhepur, Ghanshyampur and Singhia are no different. As sand progressively filled the space between the two Kamala-Balan embankments, everything was devastated within twenty years of their construction. The state of the Kamala is such that its water level can rise more than two metres in ten hours. By 1965 so much sand had already collected between the embankments that calls arose either to raise them further or to demolish them. Here one remembers Visvesvaraya. Dams were constructed on the Musi and Esi rivers, eighty-two miles from Hyderabad, and a subsidiary channel of the Musi was developed six and a half miles from the city. Embankments were also raised on both sides of the river within the city. When the Mysore state submitted Visvesvaraya's scheme for the Krishnaraja Sagar dam, with its proposed height of 130 feet, to the British, Viceroy Hardinge reduced it to eighty feet. Visvesvaraya compensated by widening the lower portion. When flooding intervened in the middle of construction, he hired additional workers and doctors to treat labourers suffering from malaria and other illnesses, installed Washington lamps for night work, and made up for lost time through personal supervision. His patriotism, the passage argues, was such that he did not import cement, but used surkhi prepared from sand, calcium, stone and powdered fired bricks to construct the dam. A two-level canal system had already been built before work began on the dam itself.

Delhi Is Still Far Away! Pressure must be brought to bear on the central government in Delhi on the following points. What harm would there be in giving schools and colleges a holiday during floods rather than in the summer heat? Why is this decision so difficult? Leave aside CBSE and ICSE: even the Bihar Board has failed to do it. According to local conditions, women should receive education, training in computers and vocational education, while primary schooling throughout Mithila should be delivered in Maithili. While the barrage is being constructed, permanent lined canals should be laid according to the natural slope of the land. Earthen embankments should be demolished and removed, and permanent embankments made suitable for motor traffic, with adequate trees planted on either side. Just as the Bihar road projects appear to be turning a dream into reality, all obstacles should be removed and this work begun on a war footing.

Abstract · Summary

This chapter presents theatrical criticism on the subject "From the Videha Editorials." Videha, editorials, Maithili, Shri, and literature emerge as its principal centres of attention. Using the examples, quotations, and arguments available in the original material, the discussion examines dramatic texts, character arrangement, stage structure, and cultural contexts, enabling readers to understand both the critical structure of the subject and its wider context.

When I speak Maithili on my mobile phone, my colleague Gauri Bhola says, "It is a very sweet language." Gayatri Shyankat says, "Your language is Maithili, and we have named our daughter Maithili."

I cannot make them understand the bitterness beneath that sweetness.

For various reasons, 2012 will be remembered in the history of Maithili language and literature. At the beginning of that year, the "First Videha Maithili Theatre Festival" was held at Chanauraganj (Jhanjharpur), under the leadership of Bechan Thakur, to establish a parallel Maithili theatre in opposition to caste-based theatre. Bechan Thakur had directed Maithili plays for the preceding twenty-five to thirty years. He had written about a dozen plays, repeatedly staged to critical acclaim. The festival's theme was "Maithili Drama and Theatre in the Perspective of India's Nāṭyaśāstra." During this two-day, day-and-night festival, Jagdish Prasad Mandal's play Vīrāṅganā, Bechan Thakur's Viśvāsghāt, and Gajendra Thakur's Utkāmukh were performed. One-act plays based on women's empowerment and folk ballads were also staged. A Maithili poetry gathering took place, and Videha honours were presented.

The Videha Language Honour, known as the Parallel Sahitya Akademi Award, emerged as a response to what I regard as the forty-five-year grip of ostensibly literary, caste-specific institutions over the Sahitya Akademi's Maithili department. In forty-four years, the award had gone thirty-six times to Maithil Brahmins, six times to Kayasthas, twice to Rajputs, and not once to a writer from a non-upper-caste background. Worthy Brahmin writers such as Lalit, Dhumketu, and Dhirendra were denied the distinction, while Harimohan Jha never received it during his lifetime. The list, in my judgment, is crowded with reactionary writers. Subhash Chandra Yadav, Meghnath Prasad, Bindeshwar Mandal, Jagdish Prasad Mandal, Nichiketa, and other non-Brahmin writers, held in the highest regard within Maithili literature, have suffered under what I consider the Brahminical disposition of the Sahitya Akademi.

There was opposition to the invitation extended to Jagdish Prasad Mandal as chief guest at the Vikhyāti Parva in Guwahati, organised by activists of the Mithila-state movement in December 2012. That opposition was strongly condemned.

Vidyāpati. Vidyāpati is a great poet of Maithili. According to tradition, he belonged to a Thakur family of barbers. Jyotirishwar Thakur described him in the Varṇa Ratnākara, while Shridhar Das referred to his Padāvalī, with examples, in the Sadukti-karṇāmṛta. The Maithil Brahmin genealogical registers mention a later author named Vidyāpati, who wrote in Sanskrit and Avahaṭṭa and lived after Shridhar Das and Jyotirishwar. Yet certain Brahminical institutions have tried to turn the pre-Jyotirishwar Vidyāpati into a Brahmin by putting a pāg on his head and symbolically performing his sacred-thread ceremony. This is regarded here as a conspiracy to perform a corresponding initiation upon the Maithili language itself. Literary circles debated the issue throughout the year; it was also raised at the India Habitat Centre's Indian Languages Festival at year's end. Through Vidyāpati festivals, a conservative section of Maithil Brahmins, in collaboration with caste-based theatre, continued trying to establish control over Maithili. Ordinary people, therefore, were distancing themselves from these activities.

Tagore Literature Award. The first Tagore Literature Award for Maithili was given to Jagdish Prasad Mandal for his collection of short-short stories, Gāmak Jingī. Yet no Hindi newspaper in the Mithila region, including Darbhanga, reported it; All India Radio, Darbhanga, likewise maintained complete silence. In my view, that silence exposed these institutions' caste bias before the public.

Google Videha Books. With Google's cooperation, Videha made more than four hundred Maithili books available online through Google Books, with full browsing and downloading facilities. An English–Maithili dictionary was released under a Creative Commons ShareAlike licence.

The appointment of the Maithili coordinator at the Sahitya Akademi and the politics of the Akademi awards. The Sahitya Akademi has recognised six organisations, which I describe as casteist, for the selection of its Maithili coordinator. These organisations appointed Maithili's eighth coordinator. Whether by coincidence or misfortune, every coordinator to date has been a Maithil Brahmin; the pattern continued this time. In presenting the Youth Award, the rules were, in my view, swept aside: books nominated by the referees were not even considered, while an ordinary book by an author who writes principally in Hindi received the award.

Is Maithili only the language of Maithil Brahmins? If the Sahitya Akademi and caste-based organisations had their way, the answer would be yes. The parallel intellectual movement and parallel theatre, however, have challenged that assumption. At https://sites.google.com/a/videha.com/videha-pothi/ one can find online Videha's Maithili short fiction, microfiction, poetry, theatre festival, children's festival, and collections of treatises, essays, and criticism. The response the Sahitya Akademi gave to Vineet Utpal's Right to Information application should shame the literary world. In my assessment, the manner in which the coordinator and advisory-board members allotted assignments to themselves and their relatives exposes the Brahminical tendencies of these institutions.

Rajdev Mandal, Ramvilas Sahu, Umesh Paswan, Ramdev Prasad Mandal "Jhādūdār," Jagdish Prasad Mandal, Umesh Mandal, Subhash Chandra Yadav, Premshankar Singh, Dr Uday Narayan Singh "Nichiketa," Meghnath Prasad, Sandeep Kumar Safi, Bindeshwar Thakur, and many others are selflessly providing Maithili with the breath of life.

The politics of the pāg. What I call the Brahminical politics of the pāg suffered a major setback when the organisers of the Mahakavi Laldas Jayanti at Kharao, for the first time, acknowledged that this caste-specific headgear should not be used on a platform representing Mithila and Maithili, and acted accordingly. This was seen as an important victory for the parallel movement.

Maithili as the medium of education in primary and middle schools. Even after a Supreme Court decision, Maithili has still not become the medium of instruction in Mithila. A meeting on this subject was held at Nimli. Jagdish Prasad Mandal, Ramvilas Sahu, Rajdev Mandal, and Virendra Yadav attended a Videha discussion meeting convened by Rahul Kumar, and a signature campaign was undertaken. Concern was also voiced that the casteist and reactionary syllabus of Maithili literature needed to be changed: under what servile mentality had the biographies of oppressive, casteist landlords been inserted in it? A memorandum was handed to Chief Minister Nitish Kumar on the occasion of the inauguration of the Kosi bridge.

Videha meetings were also held on various dimensions of literature, combining discussion with practical laboratory demonstrations.

Maithili in Nepal. With the support of the Danish embassy, Ramesh Ranjan's play Budhiyār Chhauṛā ā Rākṣas (The Clever Boy and the Demon) was staged at around a dozen locations. The Vidyāpati Award was announced, and Rambharos Kapari "Bhramar" received the award of two lakh rupees.

At a theatre event in Janakpur, Maithili plays and cultural programmes were presented; the cultural programme included song and dance.

On Janaki Navami, a bomb exploded in Janakpur. Several cultural workers, including Jhagru Mandal, were killed, and Parmeshwar Kapari was injured.

Health. Under the principal slogan "Healthy Women, Healthy Families—Healthy Society," street plays were presented at Yadukoha and Machhi Jhitkaiya. With the support of PCI Nepal, Chitrit Rangmanch of Janakpur staged the Maithili street play Jangalme Mangal, based on family planning.

The Yuva Natya Kala Parishad of Parwaha Deuri organised an international Maithili theatre festival in the first session of Vimali Sharad 2069. It was inaugurated by Dr Ram Baran Yadav, the first President of republican Nepal. Eight theatre groups from Nepal and India participated.

Nichiketa's Ek Chhal Rājā (Once There Was a King) was staged at Tilathi during the Saraswati Puja celebration and Basant Panchami Fair of 2068.

When I was a child, we saw both the "native crow" and the "black crow" in our village. The black crow was glossy and harsh-voiced, while the native crow was lighter in colour and sang in a sweeter voice. On hearing a person speak roughly, people would say, "Why are you cawing like a black crow?" For some time now the native crow has disappeared, and people mourn its loss. The black crow's dominion has become notorious.

Tomas Tranströmer. It was announced that the Swedish poet Tomas Tranströmer would receive the 2011 Nobel Prize in Literature, worth 1.5 million dollars. The Swedish Academy said that through his intensely translucent images he had introduced us to a new opening upon truth. English translations of his books included The Great Enigma, The Half-Finished Heaven, and The Deleted World. He was eighty, had written more than fifteen poetry collections, and his work had been translated into English and sixty other languages. Born in Stockholm, he worked as a psychologist, and his poetry displays profound psychological understanding of humanity. His poems are enigmatic yet direct, at once personal and public. Their mystery is not something that leaves the reader in perpetual anxiety; rather, it lifts one from the ground to the highest reaches of existence. The canals of Sweden in winter, the rhythm of the seasons, and the beauty of the natural environment are marvellously evoked in them. His mother was a schoolteacher and his father a journalist; he studied literature, history, theology, and psychology. Following a stroke in 1990, he had been unable to speak. The account adds that no American writer had received the Nobel Prize in Literature after 1993 and that this was the first Swedish recipient since 1974. It anticipates greater consideration of literature in non-European languages by the Nobel Committee.

Videha Literature Festival 2012. The Videha Literature Festival and the Videha Literary Honours ceremony were held on 14 January 2012. The Parallel Sahitya Akademi Awards were presented and a poetry gathering was organised. The voluntary support and participation of the public will be remembered as evidence of the success of the Videha Maithili literary movement.

Maithili Muslims and non-upper-caste people—and now even members of upper castes—moved away from official Maithili and turned to Urdu and Hindi. The author observes that, apart from Tamil, Malayalam, Bengali, and Kashmiri, analogous shifts have occurred in other language communities. In Kashmir people speak Kashmiri but are taught through Urdu, just as Hindi is the language of instruction in Bihar. Yet in the small state of Sikkim, despite the predominance of Nepali, Lepcha and Bhutia are also taught; those smaller languages are not endangered by this practice, the Lepcha script is protected, and Nepali itself is strengthened. The explanation, in this account, is Sikkim's linguistic generosity, which has been absent in Bihar in its treatment of Maithili and Mithila from the age of landlord rule to the present. In Darjeeling, although Nepali predominates as Hindi does in Bihar, the corresponding generosity is said to be lacking within West Bengal.

Videha Parallel Sahitya Akademi Maithili Poetry Conference, 2011. The first parallel Sahitya Akademi Maithili poetry conference organised by Videha took place at Nimli, Supaul district, on 9 July 2011, from 4:45 p.m. until 7:45 p.m. The Kolkata Maithili poetry conference organised by the Sahitya Akademi had not invited Rajdev Mandal, author of Ambarā, regarded here as the finest Maithili poetry collection of the first decade of the twenty-first century, or other leading poets; they had not even been informed. To remedy this exclusion, Videha organised its conference on the same day on the premises of Asafal Das Sahu Samaj Mahila Inter College, Nimli, Ward 7, Supaul district. No one was barred. Harinarayan Kamat and Ramji Mandal inaugurated the proceedings by lighting lamps. At the conclusion, Rajdev Mandal's collection Ambarā, published in 2010, was formally released by the assembled dignitaries: Dr Bachendra Jha, Jagdish Prasad Mandal, Ramji Prasad Mandal, Roshan Kumar Gupta, Harinarayan Kamat, and Nand Vilas Rai. Poetry was read by (1) Radhakant Mandal, a welcome song; (2) Umesh Paswan, "Gelhe Ghar Chhi," "Hāl," and "Kabāṛī"; (3) Ramkrishna Mandal "Chhotu," "Māi"; (4) Ramdev Prasad Mandal "Jhādūdār," five songs; (5) Nand Vilas Rai, "Indira Āvās"; (6) Kapileshwar Sahu, "Kosi"; (7) Ramvilas Sahu, three poems; (8) Umesh Mandal, two poems; (9) Rajdev Mandal, three poems; and (10) Jagdish Prasad Mandal, two poems. Each reading was followed by a brief critical response. Dr Bachendra Jha chaired the poetry conference, and Dugdhanand Mandal conducted the proceedings.

According to members of the audience, the distinguishing feature of the conference was that such an event had never before been held in their area. Jagdish Prasad Mandal, the chief guest, said during the proceedings that the event had been organised in such haste because the Sahitya Akademi was holding a Maithili poetry conference in Kolkata that day. It was shameful, he said, that an event which ought to be held in our own villages was being conducted in Kolkata, without the villagers even knowing about it.

People also said that until then programmes in the area had been conducted in Hindi; this was the first time an event had been conducted there in Maithili.

Videha discussions were held at Nimli, Supaul district, on 6–7 and 13–14 December 2008; 5–6 and 12–13 December 2009; 4–5 and 11–12 December 2010; and finally on 17–18 and 24–25 December 2011. They addressed the Google Translator Toolkit for Maithili, Google Language Tools, approval of applications to encode both the Kaithi and Mithilakshar scripts in the Universal Character Set (Unicode), and Maithili Wikipedia. These meetings included practical laboratory demonstrations, with many specialists in attendance. Afterwards, articles and creative submissions also arrived by post and email. A brief account follows.

Google Translator Toolkit now lists Maithili both as a source language and as a target language. See http://support.google.com/translate/toolkit/bin/answer.py?hl=en&answer=147837 and http://translate.google.com/toolkit/list?hl=en#translations/active.

Following Videha's protest, Google has, according to the editorial, acknowledged that there is no distinct language called "Bihari." Videha had already submitted an application for "Maithili Wikipedia," and Wikipedia had earlier accepted the contention that "Bihari" is not the name of a language.

Google Maithili: Google Language Tool—http://www.google.com/transconsole/giyl/chooseProject

There, select "Bihari" in the English-language interface and contribute translations for Google Translate. When revising a submitted translation, enter an explanation in English that "Bihari" is not the name of a language. Translate at this link after signing into your Google account.

http://www.google.com/transconsole/giyl/chooseActivity?project=gws&langcode=bh

Keep checking this link for the availability of Maithili: http://www.google.co.in/language_tools?hl=en.

Another Videha success: Google's search engine is now available in Maithili. Previously Google classified it as "Bihari," but, following Videha's objection, it agreed, the editorial says, to provide a separate search interface for Maithili. Wikipedia had earlier accepted the same argument after Videha's protest.

The link is https://www.google.com/webhp?hl=bh.

[Google first introduced a search engine under the name "Bihari," although no language bears that name. Someone translated "Bihari" into Angika—as someone else had used the code bh for Bhojpuri rather than "Bihari" in Wikipedia—and the Google search engine appeared under the name "Angika." Vineet Utpal of Videha then wrote to Google; Videha undertook all the translation work voluntarily and appealed for help from the public, but received no contributions from outside. The occasional contribution that did arrive was in Roman script and was corrected. The search engine is now displayed as Maithili, although considerable work remains. The code bh persists in Wikipedia and Google, and efforts to remove it continue. For the discussion at the Videha meeting, see http://esamaad.blogspot.in/2012/01/blog-post_08.html.]

When translation is completed, Maithili will appear here: http://www.google.com/language_tools?hl=bh; http://www.google.com/language_tools.

Notice 1. Anshuman Pandey's applications to encode both the Kaithi and Mithilakshar scripts in the Universal Character Set (Unicode) have been accepted. The process of producing Unicode fonts for both scripts is under way; once their turn comes, work on their basic fonts will begin. The basic Mithilakshar font will be called Tirhuta, just as the basic Devanagari font is Mangal and the basic Bengali font is Vrinda. An application concerning Mithilakshar was submitted for the third time in revised form. The second and third applications discussed Videha's contribution at length, including the following acknowledgement: "[Figure 11: Excerpt from a Maithili e-journal published as PDF (from Videha 2011: 22; Videha: A fortnightly Maithili e-journal. Issue 80 (April 15, 2011), Gajendra Thakur [ed]. http://www.videha.co.in/. 'Gajendra Thakur of New Delhi graciously met with me and corresponded at length about Maithili, offered valuable specimens of Maithili manuscripts, printed books, and other records, and provided feedback regarding requirements for the encoding of Maithili in the UCS.'—Anshuman Pandey.]"

Distribution of a leaflet on Unicode at the Sahitya Akademi's Delhi fiction gathering. Dr Ramanand Jha "Raman" distributed a leaflet concerning Unicode at the Sahitya Akademi's fiction meeting. To me it only demonstrated that its author had neither a sound understanding of Unicode nor even elementary knowledge of how Webtan or Unicode fonts are made. It did, however, provide a lesson to those who wish to learn how prejudiced and partisan histories of Maithili literature are written. Consider, too, the claim made in a Chetna Samiti souvenir concerning that organisation's contribution to Unicode. When Anshuman Pandey, who had applied for the encoding of Tirhuta, visited Patna, I told him that Shiv Kumar Thakur had a bookshop in Vidyapati Bhavan where he could buy Maithili books. But on two or three successive days the shop and the committee office were closed, and he had to return. Someone there subsequently told him, "You keep coming every day, but the committee will remain closed for at least another fourteen or fifteen days, because there has been a quarrel between two groups." He went away with that experience—yet the committee describes in its souvenir the contribution it supposedly made to Unicode! When he asked for Govind Jha's address, another "scholar" exclaimed that Govind Jha would have nothing to tell him, and refused to give it. The address was eventually obtained elsewhere.

Notice 2. Maithili Wikipedia. Members of Videha have translated 2,600 MediaWiki messages from English into Maithili. Videha Language Honour 2012–13 (presented as an alternative to the Sahitya Akademi Award). The Videha Honour for Children's Literature, 2012, is to be presented to Jagdish Prasad Mandal for Taregan, his collection of inspirational children's microfiction, at the Videha Theatre Festival in 2013. Taregan received the largest number of votes. Three books were placed in online voting at www.videha.co.in: (1) Jagdish Prasad Mandal's Taregan; (2) Jivakant's Khikhirak Bīari; and (3) Murlidhar Jha's Pilpilahā Gāchh. In the experts' view, many pieces in Pilpilahā Gāchh could not be considered stories for children. It was therefore removed from the list, because this was specifically a children's literature award; in any case, it had also received the fewest votes. Other works were not considered, since they were pamphlet-sized rather than book-length publications.

Tagore Literature Award 2011. The Sahitya Akademi's 2011 Tagore Literature Award for Maithili was conferred on Jagdish Prasad Mandal for his short-short-story collection Gāmak Jingī. The ceremony took place in Kochi on 12 June 2012.

There seems no prospect of the end of controversies surrounding Maithili. A person described here as a self-styled literary figure was chosen to prepare the shortlist for this award. According to information received, he proposed books on the basis of caste and narrow loyalties, omitting works by Nichiketa, Subhash Chandra Yadav, and Jagdish Prasad Mandal. The writer further reports that this shortlist-maker, Ajit Azad, told Videha's assistant editor Munnaji that Jagdish Prasad Mandal would never receive the Tagore Literature Award during his lifetime. When the referees sent seven recommendations, they included Chandranath Mishra "Amar"'s Atīt Manthan, although, according to this account, that book had not been published within the stipulated period, 2007–09. Were books being recommended without being read? The Sahitya Akademi should identify those who compile shortlists of this kind and those referees who recommend unread books, make their names public, and permanently bar them; only then, the writer argues, can Maithili's honour be protected. The account also states that the Sahitya Akademi's Maithili coordinator, Vidyanath Jha "Vidit," had neither informed nor congratulated Jagdish Prasad Mandal on receiving the prize, even after Mandal returned from accepting it. All India Radio, Darbhanga, reportedly broadcast nothing about this first Tagore Literature Award for Maithili, and Hindi newspapers in Darbhanga and Madhubani carried no reports, whereas the national English newspapers reported it without exception. The author presents this contrast as an exposure of the narrow caste-based outlook of these institutions and journalists. In his judgment, Jagdish Prasad Mandal's Gāmak Jingī is the finest collection of very short stories in the history of Maithili literature. Congratulations to Jagdish Prasad Mandal.

Vidyāpati and the pāg in the parallel tradition. A maur is made from koḍhilā and is distinct from the pāg. Among Karna Kayasthas too, the pāg is worn only for certain rites, such as siddhānta and kumram; for weddings they go wearing a maur, not a pāg. Among Brahmins in Purnia, a newly married woman goes to a banyan tree during barsāit wearing a maur. The pāg, the writer maintains, is exclusively a ritual symbol associated with marriage among Maithil Brahmins. Sanskrit works by Vidyāpati are attributed to "Thakur Vidyāpati," who, he argues, was Brahmin. My concern is with the Vidyāpati of the Maithili Padāvalī. Why was that poet made into "our Vidyāpati" by putting a pāg on his head? This did not happen during the eight hundred years in which non-Brahmin communities kept his legacy alive through Vidāpat nāch. It happened when Bengal appropriated the songs of Vidyāpati and Govind Das, and the Bengali scholar Rajkrishna Mukhopadhyay first asserted in 1875 that Vidyāpati was a poet of Mithila; Nagendranath Gupta of Bengal likewise first asserted that Govind Das was a poet of Mithila. Initially Bengal rose up in opposition, then accepted these conclusions. Rajkrishna Mukhopadhyay was referring to the Vidyāpati of the Padāvalī; Bengal had never claimed the Sanskrit- and Avahaṭṭa-writing Vidyāpati Thakur as its own. The Maithili songs embedded in Jyotirishwar's Sanskrit play Dhūrtasamāgama and in the Sanskrit-and-Avahaṭṭa writer Vidyāpati's Gorakṣavijaya are further evidence of an older Padāvalī tradition and demonstrate its influence on both writers. Mithila's scholars then intervened: bringing together Vidyāpati's Sanskrit and Avahaṭṭa books, the name Govind Das, and entries from genealogical registers, they produced the composite identities "Vidyāpati Thakur" and "Govind Das Jha" (!). The superficial genealogical knowledge and limited perspective of Ramanath Jha, according to this critique, caused damage here. Subsequently, the Mithila Sanskritik Parishad—an institution which, after Indian independence, placed a pāg on Vidyāpati's head and represented him as Brahmin—made the Maithili poet (not the Sanskrit author) into "our Vidyāpati" for the Brahmin community. But Kabir, Jyotirishwar, and many other poets appear in genealogical records too. Why, the author asks, is the variation in names so conspicuous for Vidyāpati, notwithstanding all the planning, but absent for Jyotirishwar? I have visited the worship of village deities in Purnia and seen the field where Ram Thakur, regarded as a divinity, was represented by a clod of earth: why was that place so illuminated? Carpenters (baṛhī) who migrated from Mithila to Chhattisgarh and Madhya Pradesh were called "Jhaji" because they spoke Maithili; some now use Jha as a surname. In four or five villages of Maldah district, Bengal, Maithil Brahmins have the surname Ojha; those of Aligarh, the Prajgarh Maithils, use Sharma. How many Vidyāpatis are recorded in the genealogical registers? The early Vidyāpatis bear neither "Jha" nor "Thakur" in their names. The author asks, with irony, how Ramanath Jha could have found such an attribution.

Nowhere in the Maithili Padāvalī does its Vidyāpati identify himself as a writer of Sanskrit or Avahaṭṭa. Why is the pain he feels for the dispossessed absent from the writings of the other Vidyāpati, whom the author regards as a Brahmin writer of Sanskrit and Avahaṭṭa? That other Vidyāpati, he argues, despises the proletariat and is sternly Brahminical in his written work; the poet of the Padāvalī, by contrast, is spontaneous and unaffected. A few harshly worded verses have been declared characteristic of him by rigid Brahminical editors, as though they could be treated as a convenient pretext. It is time for thoughtful readers to hear Piyā Desāntar, Vidyāpati's song of separation and migration, in concert; amid the distress currently suffered by Maithili migrants, this is respectfully dedicated to the great poet. Is that sorrow found in the Sanskrit and Avahaṭṭa Vidyāpati?

Seven people honoured with the Maithili Talent Award at Rajbiraj. The Maithili Kavi Parishad, a branch of the Maithili Sahitya Parishad, formerly presented this distinction as the Maithili Children's Talent Award. It was established by its president, Mahendra Mandal "Banwari." From this year it has been renamed the Maithili Talent Award. Recipients were the poet Sagar Vir Qadri; radio-drama performer Jibach Das; Bhupendra Mandal; singers Devendra Sah "Soni" and Shivshankar Yadav; and, for contributions to Maithili music, Ram Adhin Sah and Preeti Adhikari.

Subhash Chandra Yadav's Banait–Bigrait. The work illuminates the reasons for the resentment felt by certain caste-minded Maithili literary figures. Subhash Chandra Yadav does not betray the community from which he comes: he struggles for its problems and its language, refuses compromise, and shows ideological consistency—something the reviewer finds lacking in Taranand Viyogi. That, he alleges, is why Yadav incurred the displeasure of Mohan Bhardwaj, Yoganand Jha, Ramdev Jha, and others, whereas Taranand Viyogi and Mahendra Narayan Ram enjoyed acceptance. When the Maithili Lekhak Sangh organised a discussion of Banait–Bigrait, Ashok and Taranand Viyogi dared to present papers, but Yoganand Jha and Mohan Bhardwaj remained silent; Navendu Kumar Jha attended. Later I was astonished to see a report in Vidyāpati Times, which I describe as a blackmailing paper from Kabilpur. It bore a headline along the lines of "The Author of Banait–Bigrait Could Not Advance Beyond Ghardekhiyā—Mohan Bhardwaj," allegedly a report of that very Maithili Lekhak Sangh discussion. I took this as an exposure of Yoganand Jha's mentality. Mohan Bhardwaj has not denied the report, and I therefore infer that this falsehood was published with his consent. When Ghar-Bahar and Mithila Darshan began persistently advocating Sahitya Akademi awards for writers such as Mahendra Malingiya and Mohan Bhardwaj in Kamal Mohan Chamu's columns, I remembered Vidyāpati Times and perceived an entire conspiracy. Is this not a conspiracy against Subhash Chandra Yadav's Banait–Bigrait? When Amaresh Pathak, Chandranath Mishra "Amar," and Mayanand Mishra joined against Nichiketa's No Entry Mā Viśva, and the reactionary poet Udaychandra Jha "Vinod" was given the Akademi Award the preceding year, the situation seemed equally clear. Read Banait–Bigrait: http://sites.google.com/a/shruti-publication.com/shruti-publication/Home/Banait_Bigrait_SubhashChandraYadav.pdf?attredirects=0.

Gangesh Gunjan: "I had heard of the Rajkamalji (monograph) episode, but so many years have now passed. How grave it was becomes clear from this Facebook exchange of yours. I thank you for bringing it out, Gajendraji. … The truth is that before I could finish reading it, my heart had become disenchanted. I could not read any further."

"Good that you put it on the internet! The contemporary generation and those yet to come should know this dark story. Think of the predicament of someone like me: everyone involved—young friends, contemporaries, elders—is personally connected with me. What a historical calamity this has become! I am not personally responsible from any direction, yet I am condemned to bear a sense of moral guilt on behalf of an entire literary generation. What is the remedy? With affection, 11 September 2012, 11:26."

Black-Marketing of the Coordinator's Position at the Sahitya Akademi: A Report

The organisations designated to select the Maithili coordinator of the Sahitya Akademi in Delhi are these: Vidyapati Seva Sansthan, Darbhanga, whose secretary is Vaidyanath Chaudhary "Baiju" and president Pandit Chandranath Mishra "Amar"; Akhil Bharatiya Maithili Sahitya Parishad, Darbhanga, whose secretary is Dr Ganapati Mishra and whose late president was Jaymant Mishra; Chetna Samiti, Patna, with Vivekanand Thakur as secretary and Pramila Jha as president; an organisation in Rauti, Madhubani, probably then chaired by Hetukar Jha; Kishorikant Mishra's Mithila Sanskritik Parishad, which the author accuses of putting a pāg on Vidyāpati and declaring him Brahmin, and whose president is Surendra Narayan Jha and secretary Gangadhar Jha; and Panchanan Mishra's Akhil Bharatiya Maithili Sahitya Samiti, Allahabad. The names and officeholders of some of these organisations may have changed. Most, the editorial contends, are either paper organisations or political rather than literary bodies, run on caste, regional, and hereditary lines.

Actions of the Editorial Board of Ghar-Bahar (Vasukinath Jha, Ramanand Jha "Raman," and Kamal Mohan Chamu), Whether Associated with or Tolerant of Caste-Based Theatre

Ghar-Bahar, July 2012: a Brahminical attitude, in the author's words, amounting to open support for theft. A person named Pankaj Parashar, accused here of theft, was given space in the column "Jug-Jug Jīvathu." In Mithila society, the author says, people of all twelve varṇas would drive out a thief; yet the editorial board of this Maithili literary journal openly sided with the accused because he belonged to their caste. The second example concerns Anand Kumar Jha's receipt of the Young Playwright Honour. The editors of what is described as caste-based theatre expressed resentment, without stating what objections had actually been made to the selection procedure. This, the writer argues, is Brahminical blackmail: join the caste-based theatre, become its collaborator, or face intimidation.

Abusive Postcards and Emails from Vijaydev Jha or Shankardev Jha (the Third Generation of Chandranath Mishra "Amar" and Ramdev Jha)

This time the Maithili Children's Literature Award went to a book the author does not consider children's literature, Murlidhar Jha's Pilpilahā Gāchh. He alleges that Murlidhar Jha shamelessly accepted garlands and a pāg, while certain caste-minded people were equally shameless in bestowing them. This issue presents a report on the matter and examples of the insulting words ascribed to the third generation of Chandranath Mishra "Amar" and Ramdev Jha. The report brings together abusive emails and text messages. Anyone who has received abusive postcards or emails from Vijaydev Jha or Shankardev Jha —or what the author characterises as blackmailing newspaper and magazine reports or insulting SMS messages—is asked to send scanned copies or forwarded emails to ggajendra@videha.com. In the author's denunciation, these people, whom he says belong in prison, have used the Sahitya Akademi to intimidate Maithili literature for forty-five years, benefiting from a literary establishment he calls cowardly and casteist; that dominance, he declares, is ending. A newspaper report, described here as blackmail, allegedly refuses to recognise Nichiketa as Maithil. Nichiketa, Bhimnath Jha, and others bear indirect responsibility, the writer contends, because they listened to abuse and allowed the perpetrators' confidence to grow. Maithili journals, he argues, have been divided into Brahminical and Kayastha-aligned camps. Their differences are bitter, even violent in tone, yet they unite against Videha. Nichiketa's Mithila Darshan, in his assessment, has also become a Brahminical magazine. Its editor-in-chief cannot escape responsibility: he should reform his editorial board and encourage courage among its members.

Sukant Som's Unacknowledged Caste Bias

Sukant Som has published an article in Mithila Darshan. It contains, in the author's view, numerous factual errors. Som does not appear to know that Atīt Manthan was not published between 2007 and 2009. Nor could he acknowledge, as the writer does, that Gāmak Jingī is the finest collection of very short stories in Maithili literature. By suggesting indirectly that a prize must somehow be given to some booklet or other in Maithili, he revealed his intention. He represented a jury from Bhagalpur as though it were a Darbhanga jury, and in doing so apparently abandoned all pretence of impartiality. Som even thinks the award ceremony was held in Bangalore, whereas it was held in Kochi. He calls the Tagore Literature Award the Rabindra Award. His undeclared caste bias, the editorial concludes, speaks volumes.

Is Maithili literature Brahminical in its essential character?

My answer is both yes and no. If your judgment rests on the caste profiles of the authors appearing in Mithila Darshan, Antika, Ghar-Bahar—published by the Chetna Samiti, organiser of the pāg-centred Vidyāpati festivals—Sanes of Jharkhand, or Jakhān-Takhān, then the answer is yes. If you judge from the brazen use, for decades, of objectionable language by a caste-based theatre representing just two communities and designed to please its own audience, the answer is yes. If you judge from the caste profiles of all eight coordinators appointed to the Sahitya Akademi so far, the answer is yes. If you judge from the weak, poor compilations and programmes produced by CIIL, NBT, or the Sahitya Akademi, the answer is yes. If you judge from All India Radio, Darbhanga, or the Darbhanga editions of Hindi newspapers, again the answer is yes.

But consider the non-Brahmin, pāg-less Vidyāpati whom the writer places before Jyotirishwar and Shridhar Das; consider Gaṅgeśa, author of the Tattvacintāmaṇi, of whom genealogical narratives claim that he was born five years after his father's death, married a woman of the leather-working community, and had his love poems made to disappear. Consider Bhojakwa FM, or Ramlakhan Sahu of Pakariya village near Phulwas (post office Ratansara), son of the late Khushilal Sahu, who has run a theatrical troupe for twenty-five years, exhausted ten bighas of land on it, and whose group gave perhaps a hundred performances at Durga Puja this year. If you see these, the answer is no. If All India Radio, Darbhanga, the local Hindi press, and the magazines described above do not recognise this as news, but publish annual celebrations of ordinary playwrights and interviews declaring Maithili theatre dead, that is their problem.

The performance traditions of Vidāpat, based on Vidyāpati's Padāvalī, and Piyā Desāntar, founded on its songs of migration and separation, have declined in number too. Yet if one compares their relative presence, the difference between mainstream and parallel traditions remains one to ninety-nine; on that measure, this is very much a non-Brahminical tradition.

> High on the mountain sleeps the bumblebee; the gardener's daughter sleeps amid the flowers, O!
> Awake, awake, O gardener's daughter; string a garland of girmal blossoms, O!

If Dhirendra "Premiś" hears this song from the Śabdaśāstram tradition as classical music rather than as a song of the proletariat, he can hear it uploaded in Videha Audio. It was recorded in the leather-workers' hamlet, the very settlement to which the song's story belongs; this is the triumph of the non-Brahminical tradition. Which tradition of Vidyāpati do we mean—the one in which he upholds the varṇāśrama order, or the one in which he voices women's pain—"What austerity did I perform that I became a mother?"—or the poor person's sorrow, "Even in dreams I found no happiness"? The answer is the same. For the mainstream, the parallel tradition has always been a fashion. Jyotirishwar, and the Vidyāpati who wrote in Sanskrit and Avahaṭṭa, likewise adopted it as a fashion in Dhūrtasamāgama and Gorakṣavijaya. Avahaṭṭa itself was a literary language, and dynamic figures of the mainstream drew upon the parallel tradition as a stylistic fashion. A people's poet or activist is not satisfied after writing two, four, ten, twenty-five, or fifty poems. Yet when this tradition is used as a fashion, it appears not only in Jyotirishwar and the Sanskrit-and-Avahaṭṭa Vidyāpati, but also, the author argues, in the fashion-conscious dynamism of Yatri–Nagarjun's Maithili poetry. By contrast, the tradition of the earlier, pāg-less, non-Brahmin Vidyāpati is visible in Vidāpat, Piyā Desāntar, and the thousands of jhā and mahājhā compositions created by Ramdev Prasad Mandal "Jhādūdār." If people like me write down and type only a few of them, the number still grows to a hundred or two hundred. Insert a poem extolling varṇāśrama dharma into the Padāvalī, sitting at the house of Loknath Jha in Tarauni, add the names Shiv Singh and Lakhima, and the rhythm of the pre-Jyotirishwar Padāvalī breaks. The Vidāpat and Piyā Desāntar troupes cannot perform or sing it; the conspiracy falls apart without further effort.

I have some disagreement with the goal of reaching the "diaspora community." The immediate work should be to bring this information into the communicative life of native speakers wherever they reside, acting as a spokesperson for the excluded, for women, and for the parallel tradition. As for Maithili print media, parallel writing occupies, by the author's reckoning, ninety per cent of the field in both quality and quantity. The internet is an added advantage. Four to five hundred Maithili books and ten thousand Maithili palm-leaf documents are available for free download as PDF or camera-ready copies in the Videha archive. In addition to Devanagari, the archive includes Maithili in Tirhuta and in what the source calls tel. Through Google and Videha, more than four hundred books are fully browsable and downloadable in Google Books. Among them are seven books or files comprising Maithili–English and English–Maithili dictionaries, released under the Creative Commons Attribution–ShareAlike licence. This means that anyone may use them with attribution, distribute adaptations under the same terms, expand and improve them, and even make commercial use of them.

The "diaspora community" is paying its debt to the native community. Native speakers have advanced far and think progressively; they recognise themselves in writing from the parallel tradition. The exhausted mainstream, by contrast, lags behind both in constructive direction and in time.

Is Maithili Only the Language of Maithil Brahmins?

What has the Centre for the Study of Indian Traditions to do with Maithili literature? Vidyapati Seva Sansthan and Chetna Samiti are political institutions: what do they do besides organise annual Vidyāpati festivals around the pāg-wearing Sanskrit-and-Avahaṭṭa Vidyāpati? Even the neighbours of the All India Maithili Sahitya Samiti do not know whether it exists. Why does that organisation retain its recognition after Jayakant Mishra's death? Are his daughter and son-in-law receiving compensation for his services to Maithili? What is the Akhil Bharatiya Maithili Sahitya Parishad? Why is an MBBS doctor with no literary involvement willing to lend his name and address to what the author calls a moribund body, so that it can retain voting rights? The Mithila Sanskritik Parishad is, in this account, responsible for displaying Vidyāpati in a pāg and ritually initiating not the poet but Maithili itself. Are these exclusively Maithil Brahmin organisations kept in existence merely to exercise votes, patronage, and control over the choice of the Sahitya Akademi's Maithili convener in Delhi—and thereby to make Maithili a language belonging only to Maithil Brahmins?

Is Maithili Only the Language of Maithil Brahmins?

What answer emerges if one looks at the distribution of awards at the Sahitya Akademi, Delhi (!)?

Rajputs—2 times; non-upper-caste recipients—0000 times!

The Chinese Writer Mo Yan

The Chinese author Mo Yan (pen name Mo Yan, birth name Guan Moye) is to receive the 2012 Nobel Prize in Literature, the Swedish Academy announced on 11 October 2012. At the press conference he was described as a writer whose combination of folktale, history, and contemporary events creates a waking, dreamlike reality. Mo Yan is the first citizen of China to receive the Nobel Prize in Literature. He was born in Shandong province in eastern China in 1955 to farming parents. At twelve, during the Cultural Revolution, he had to leave school and work first in agriculture and then in a factory. He later joined the People's Liberation Army. His first short story was published in 1981.

His writing evokes his childhood and birthplace, as in Red Sorghum, a novel also adapted into a film, with accounts of banditry, the Japanese occupation, and the tragic circumstances of agricultural labourers.

In addition to novels, collections of his short stories have appeared. Mo Yan says that the great novel still remains to be written.

Maithili

Was Lalu Prasad responsible for the removal of Maithili from the BPSC, or were Maithili's sectarian professors responsible? When Lalu Prasad first became Chief Minister, the results of the Bihar Administrative, Finance, and perhaps Forest Services examinations were printed in Hindi newspapers with candidates' names and surnames. The lists appeared to be full of successful Maithil Brahmin candidates; people were alarmed to see "Jha" repeated so often. Could a candidate obtain ninety per cent in Maithili literature while neglecting the normal calculation of marks? Subjects such as LSD and Geography sometimes also yielded very high marks in BPSC examinations, but not in the same way and not to the benefit of any one surname. The author alleges that examiners drawn largely from Maithili's professorial establishment produced this pattern. Pressure was brought to bear on Lalu Prasad for several days; his commitment to social justice was ridiculed, and eventually Maithili had to be removed from the BPSC examinations. Only then, the account claims, did he discover that the exclusion scarcely troubled ninety per cent of Maithil Brahmins. If even the two to four hundred people who entered the administrative, finance, or other services through Maithili became subscribers to a Maithili journal, those journals would not be in their present condition; yet ninety-nine per cent of them, the writer asserts, have no connection with Maithili today. History will not forgive the harm done to the language by the casteism of its sectarian mainstream professors.

Videha has entered every household. I want, by the morning of 1 June 2014, the list of all those Brahmin pseudo-storytellers who participated in the "Rāṛkeṃ Sukh Balāy" story gathering of Raman–Darihare–Bihari on 31 May 2014.

2. Now let us turn to the Sahitya Akademi's Maithili branch and the sham organisations it recognises, which have sought to bring Sagar Rāti Dīp Jaray to an end.

3. Raman has, according to the author, received assignments worth lakhs of rupees from the Sahitya Akademi's Maithili branch over several years. He was entrusted with eliminating Videha's influence over Sagar Rāti, just as, the author alleges, he had earlier joined Bihari and Darihare in eliminating Aarti Kumari from the scene. This time his calculations went wrong. Maithili now had readers, strength, and standards, something the mediocre Raman–Bihari–Darihare could not understand. Blood brings its own colour and leaves recognisable traces … blood seeks out the person who shed it.

In Mithila, Durga Puja is generally organised by collecting contributions. Now people have begun stopping passers-by to collect donations for Saraswati Puja too; that did not happen earlier, for the observance was connected with personal devotion. Nor will that devotion be found in Vidyāpati festivals that amount to garlanding an image, produced without any study of the poet's contemporary dress, showing him foolishly with a moustache or clean-shaven and, of course, wearing a pāg, as though a caste-minded artist could perform Vidyāpati's sacred-thread ceremony. Have these Vidyāpati festivals, caste-based theatre, the Sahitya Akademi's Maithili branch, Pragya Sansthan, Sajha Prakashan, and Sagar Rāti Dīp Jaray increased or diminished communal rigidity in Maithili?

2. Vishwakarma Puja and Durga Puja make no claim to be working on behalf of Maithili, but they teach people how to cooperate in society. By contrast, the politics of gaining control of cultural institutions through the symbolic sacred-thread ceremony of Vidyāpati entered caste-based theatre and pushed Kolkata's Kurmi–Kshatriya community away from Maithili. Booklets and honours came to be reserved for Maithil Brahmins and Karna Kayasthas. If anyone else dared to intervene, older figures would encourage unruly young men by declaring them literary artists. The encouragement given to the author of "Rāṛkeṃ Sukh Balāy" by Shyam Darihare, Pradip Bihari, and Ramanand Jha "Raman" is, the editorial says, a fresh example. But how did this process, which for fifty years had functioned as a life-giving medicine for Brahminism and Kayastha dominance in Maithili, come crashing down? What is happening in Maithili literature, what historical action and reaction have made this possible, and why have Raman, Bihari, Darihare, their patrons in the Sahitya Akademi's Maithili department, and caste-based theatre failed to understand it?

3. When the communal rigidity being instilled among Brahmin youths through Sagar Rāti Dīp Jaray was challenged, Bihari, Raman, Darihare, and their patrons could not comprehend what was happening and ultimately lost patience. This time the world itself had turned upside down.

At the Rahua Sangram fiction gathering, all the participants, including Ramanji, decided that nobody would sleep through the night. Yet, before the meal, the readings by all the celebrated (!!) storytellers took place, and then those writers went to sleep. The turn of the young people who had listened to these famous writers came at daybreak. When Ashish Anchinhar arrived to read his story, the compère was nodding off, and only the chair, Shivshankar Srinivas, remained awake. Ramanji, who had agreed not to sleep, was snoring. In protest, Ashish Anchinhar refused to read, even after the chair requested him to do so. The postmodern story was later published in Videha Laghu Kathā.

But, the editorial argues, Brahminical censorship is so powerful that neither the organisers nor the histories of Sagar Rāti produced by Raman or the chair and compère mention this incident. The inclination to cover up disagreeable facts, it says, is the reason.

People ask me whether eighty-one Sagar Rāti gatherings really took place. Earlier, stories would arrive by post and the allegedly famous writers' stories were read. Young people who attended in person often received no turn at all; even when they did, their turn came after everyone had fallen asleep. When Munnaji protested, he was told to keep quiet. The attendance registers even included the names of those who had not come. At many fiction gatherings not even ten storytellers attended, yet the register would list a great many people: some never arrived, some supposedly "arrived by post," and some signed their attendance before disappearing. Just as, the author remarks satirically, a conflict with fewer than three thousand dead supposedly does not count as a war, how can a gathering with fewer than ten participants count as an all-night literary session? The tally of eighty-one would shrink considerably. Eighty-one is an immense number; a quiet revolution could have taken place in so many sessions. The reasons why it did not have already been explained.

In this parallel movement, I ask for either support or opposition. The "ideological neutrality" of Dhanakar Thakur and Gangesh Gunjan, to my mind, amounts to the same thing: opposition to the parallel current.

History will judge me too, and it will judge them—the opponents and the neutral fifth-columnists.

For six years, many people have said things like, "Videha has changed now; it has become just like them." Videha's purpose has not changed and will not change. Such comments are made without specifying whose interpretation is intended to appease whom. If their expectation was that the enthusiasm of young people would find a new direction in Maithili literature through Videha, but they now feel that it has become a platform for personal frustrations and misuse, my answer is this: truth can be used or misused by anyone. What strikes them now as misuse or the satisfaction of personal grudges had struck many others that way even six years ago. My explanation is that they expected Videha to offer only symbolic protest; those who do not really want change recognise genuine change as a threat to Brahminism, for a change in the people taking part has unsettled an inherited sense of entitlement: "If they went, we would have come—but who are these people who have come instead?" They should understand that Maithili has moved forward. Each person with ability has learned and advanced, to the extent of that ability, through Videha, and will continue to do so. Some became associated with Videha for selfish reasons, but their belief in hereditary caste superiority did not vanish despite Videha's sincere efforts. They regarded Videha as a literary movement—though not from the heart—and then resorted to emotional blackmail, threats, abusive emails and telephone calls to me and my family, and threats to leave. By coincidence, so far those threatening to leave have all been Brahmins who apparently assumed Videha would restrict itself to symbolic protest. For six years I have heard the same remarks: "Now you have become just like them! I know—it is for prizes; you want an award given to so-and-so; it is personal politics; Videha will not benefit." I am tired of hearing it. Earlier, Ramdev Jha and Amar used to say that I was trying to secure an award for my wife. Everyone laughed and said that the Sahitya Akademi's Maithili department was itself exposed and had no standing to honour anybody else. Now the accusation is that I want prizes awarded to Umesh Mandal, Rajdev Mandal, and Bechan Thakur. Mohan Bhardwaj says before Devshankar Naveen that Gajendra Thakur is mad, just as Lakhan Jha was. Darihare is apparently very perceptive too: he now thinks the reason is my dispute with the Sahitya Akademi, merely personal politics. Bihari telephones Munnaji and asks why only Jagdish Mandal is being advanced (!). That is the Brahminical assumption: that Jagdish Mandal has progressed not through merit but through patronage, as things used to happen in Maithili literature. Pradip Bihari asks Munnaji why Videha opposes caste-based theatre and why a parallel tradition reviews the quality of the mainstream tradition. "The parallel does not even resemble the mainstream," he says in the account; "why mention our names? Stay apart." That, to the author, is the essence of Brahminism and Kayastha dominance: do not discuss us, do not even hear what we say. It is also, he observes, a coincidence that the few people who object all have Brahminical tendencies; why do others not feel similarly troubled? Videha will remain what it has been for the last six years, and for at least the next thirty years Maithili literature will proceed along these lines. In Videha, everyone will advance according to merit, whatever their caste, religion, or region. Those who think Videha has changed should ask themselves whether they are the ones who have changed.

Let us return now to Sagar Rāti Dīp Jaray.

Many manoeuvres were carried out in the name of an unwritten constitution. This is principally a gathering for reading stories, though critical essays may also be read—provided, it seems, that one's name is Raman. When Munnaji asked permission to read a paper on microfiction at the Kabilpur gathering, permission was refused and the unwritten constitution was invoked. There were two reasons, the author says: Munnaji was not named Raman, and the concept of microfiction was being promoted by Videha, so it had to be opposed, however scientifically defensible it might be.

At the Jhanjharpur gathering, the stories of those who attended were not read, whereas stories received by post were read. And if you are Avinash, who abuses Suman and Amar in Yatri's name, then you too are a storyteller and a poet—even if you are neither—and, as a bonus, you may be given the convenership of the Deoghar gathering. At the Ghoghardiha gathering, the young people whose stories had been excluded protested. Some were then permitted to read; those still denied a turn stopped attending subsequent fiction gatherings.

Those who, according to the editorial, cheated people of money in the name of Maithili films and documentaries are allies of Raman, Darihare, and Bihari in their opposition to Videha. A young person who wrote in Maithili for the sake of a prize and secured a Sahitya Akademi Youth Award through the caste-based establishment would naturally be their ally too, the writer argues.

It is alleged that Videha is using Umesh Mandal and Jagdish Prasad Mandal as shields, as though resting a gun on their shoulders; perhaps everything would have been considered acceptable had their work been suppressed before Til Bahab Ne appeared. Videha does not, like the Brahminical establishment in the author's view, require a prior bargain about Til Bahab Ne before undertaking literary work. The new adherents of that establishment could not understand this: how could people come together merely in the name of Maithili, without prior acquaintance, personal meetings, or social obligations? It struck them as extraordinary.

Pradip Bihari tells Munnaji—and Ramdev Jha reportedly shares the view—that now Videha has instituted awards parallel to those of the Sahitya Akademi, why make any more noise about the Akademi? In other words, leave it alone! Ashok Avichal tells Shivkumarji that Mayanath Jha, Anand Kumar Jha, and others discussed by Videha—one could add Gunanath Jha—have received Sahitya Akademi awards. The reply he reportedly received was this: had their surnames been Mandal instead of Jha, would that have been possible?

The Sahitya Akademi is neither a person with whom one might arrange a family reconciliation nor anyone's inherited property, available to distribute patronage to self-styled Brahmin and Kayastha literary figures.

Once they understood that I was not one of them, that Videha was not like them, they grew still more anxious. "Surely," they wondered, "he too must be one of us; perhaps he wants to take a prize for himself or have it awarded to somebody else …"

Brahminism has engulfed Maithili. But everybody knows that even two children of the same parents do not have identical characters. Videha does not believe that every member of an entire caste is either good or bad. That generalisation is itself a Brahminical concept, the author argues.

Atuleshwar Jha used to oppose Brahminism, but parted company after my article on the pāg and Vidyāpati. Many others have done likewise. Prem Chandra Pankaj and Abhay Das developed an aversion to Videha over one issue or another, and told Munnaji that they had stopped reading it. Yet they apparently continue reading it in secret, since they remain informed about all its activities.

Now return to Sagar Rāti. Those who hurled abuse at Suman and Amar on Yatri's behalf, and those who hurled abuse at Yatri on Amar and Suman's behalf, have, the editorial concludes, joined Darihare, Raman, and Bihari in opposing Videha so as to fight a final battle to preserve Brahminism in Maithili literature.

Abstract

Vidyāpati, the earliest poet of Maithili (before Jyotirīśvara). In Vidyāpati's Sanskrit works the attribution reads "composed by Ṭhakkura Vidyāpati," and that Vidyāpati was a Brahmin. My concern, however, is with the Vidyāpati of Maithili poetry. I have examined why he was crowned with the pāg and appropriated as "our Vidyāpati." This did not occur while non-Brahmin communities kept him alive for some eight centuries through the Bidāpat dance. It happened after Bengal had claimed Vidyāpati and Govindadāsa, and after the Bengali scholar Rajkrishna Mukhopadhyay first argued that Vidyāpati was a poet of Mithila's language, while Nagendranath Gupta, also of Bengal, first maintained that Govindadāsa too was a poet of Mithila's language. When these findings came to light, Bengal initially protested vehemently, but eventually accepted them.

Abstract

This chapter considers the argument introduced by the statement that Gajendra Thakur edits the journal Videha (http://www.videha.co.in/; ISSN 2229-547X) and currently lives in Delhi. The Sanskrit works say "composed by Ṭhakkura Vidyāpati"; that Vidyāpati was a Brahmin. My concern is with the Maithili Vidyāpati and the question of why he was crowned with a pāg and claimed as "our Vidyāpati." That did not happen during the eight centuries when non-Brahmin communities preserved his memory through Bidāpat dance, but when Bengal laid claim to Vidyāpati and Govindadāsa, and the Bengali scholars Rajkrishna Mukhopadhyay and Nagendranath Gupta identified the two respectively as poets of Mithila's language. Initially Bengal protested vehemently ...

Vidyāpati, the Earliest Poet of Maithili (Before Jyotirīśvara)

Vidyāpati: Refuting Certain Widely Circulated Misrepresentations

Vidyāpati in the Parallel Tradition and the Pāg

In the Sanskrit books attributed to Vidyāpati, the formula is "composed by Ṭhakkura Vidyāpati"; that Vidyāpati was a Brahmin. My concern is with the Vidyāpati of Maithili poetry and why a pāg was put on his head so that he could be made "our Vidyāpati." This did not happen during the eight hundred years in which non-Brahmin communities preserved his living memory through Bidāpat dance. It happened when Bengal came to claim the poems of Vidyāpati and Govindadāsa, and when the Bengali scholar Rajkrishna Mukhopadhyay first declared Vidyāpati a poet of Mithila's language, while Nagendranath Gupta of Bengal first declared Govindadāsa a poet of that same language. At first Bengal reacted indignantly to these findings; later it accepted them. Scholars in Mithila then became interested and, bringing forward Vidyāpati's Sanskrit works and entries in the pañjī under the names Govindadāsa and Vidyāpati, manufactured a "Vidyāpati Thakur" and a "Govindadāsa Jha" (!!!). Ramanath Jha's superficial knowledge of the pañjī and restricted perspective did damage here. Suddenly the Brahmin establishment put a pāg on Vidyāpati—the Maithili poet, not the Sanskrit author—and made him "our Vidyāpati." Some even began to call him a nephew of Jyotirīśvara!

Yet numerous poets bearing names like Kaviśvara Jyotirīśvara are recorded in the pañjī. Why does the discrepancy between names arise in the case of Vidyāpati—although, the author contends, everything was planned and one piece of evidence nevertheless survived—but not in the case of Jyotirīśvara?

Rām Ṭhākur

Why go all the way to Bengal? I attended the worship of a village deity in Purnia and saw Rām Ṭhākur (regarded as a god) represented as a deity by a lump of earth in a field. Someone had lit a lamp there.

People went from Mithila to Chhattisgarh and Madhya Pradesh. Prabhat Jha, a Rajya Sabha member from Madhya Pradesh, related that when carpenters (baṛhī) migrated from Mithila, people called them "Jha-ji" because they spoke Maithili; they subsequently adopted Jha as a surname. Prabhat Jha campaigned for them, and a candidate won by a single vote. We all know from experience that, whatever a person's original title, even as far as Patna people may address a Maithili speaker as "Jha-ji" or "Jhauā." In four or five villages of Malda district, Bengal, the surname of Maithil Brahmins is Ojha; in Aligarh, the Maithil Brahmins known as Brajastha Maithils use Sharma.

Let Us Return to the Central Issue

I have no doubt that the many court-paṇḍits and other holders of religious authority named Vidyāpati, one of whom was also the son of a devadāsī, were Brahmins. I am not discussing Ṭhakkura Vidyāpati, the Kīrtilatā or the Kīrtipatākā, but the Vidyāpati of the Padāvalī. We must not confuse the two. Let us turn to the Bidāpat tradition performed by non-Brahmins, whose poet,

I argue, belonged perhaps to the barber caste and lived before Jyotirīśvara; Jyotirīśvara's Varṇaratnākara describes both this poet and his work.

Mahādeva was originally a deity of non-Brahmins and was gradually adopted by Brahmins. Nowhere in the songs of the Padāvalī does its Vidyāpati claim authorship of Sanskrit or Avahaṭṭa works. Why, then, does the compassion for the dispossessed that suffuses these songs not appear in the Sanskrit and Avahaṭṭa compositions attributed to the other, Brahmin Vidyāpati? Consider the examples.

Vidyāpati's Bidesiyā: Piyā Desāntar and Bidāpat Dance

Bhojpuri literature is less extensive in quantity than Maithili literature, but in some respects it is more accomplished in quality. I am speaking particularly of Bhikhari Thakur's Bidesiyā. Thakur was a migrant worker in Calcutta. Returning to his native Bhojpur region, he moved from village to village, singing and recounting his suffering with such poignancy that it became the play Bidesiyā. Migration is a contemporary phenomenon in Mithila; whole villages have fallen silent, and migrants from Mithila are scattered across the country. In an earlier period, however, the region did not experience migration of the same sort as Bhojpur. Movement largely extended to Morang, a part of Nepal's Mithila region. One consequence, I suggest, is the relative scarcity of minute folkloric accounts in Maithili: even the surviving narratives tend to present their heroes in an epic, ponderous manner rather than with the immediacy of Bhikhari Thakur's Bidesiyā. Take the Salhes cycle. As the telling crosses regional boundaries, Salhes changes from king to thief and from thief to king. Chuharmal similarly becomes a thief where Salhes is a king, and a king or powerful figure where Salhes is called a thief. Such variations have received scarcely any research. Searching through Vidyāpati's Padāvalī, I encountered many kinds of songs. Most describe the longing of lovers separated from one another, not the fundamental condition of the bidesiyā: reluctant migration in search of livelihood and daily bread. Eventually I found a few songs genuinely concerned with the bidesiyā, whom Vidyāpati calls piyā desāntar, the beloved who has gone to another land. Most, understandably, came from the Nepal Padāvalī of Vidyāpati; one came from the Padāvalī collected by Nagendranath Gupta. Morang, situated in Nepal's Mithila, was associated with migration, which may explain this distribution.

On this basis Vidyāpati's Piyā Desāntar used to be enacted on stage.

Bidāpat Nāch and Piyā Desāntar are thus two dramatic forms founded on songs of the Bidāpat Padāvalī.

Amid the present suffering of Maithil migrants, this work is respectfully dedicated to the great poet Vidyāpati.

Is this pain to be found in the Vidyāpati of Sanskrit and Avahaṭṭa?

The Padāvalī bears witness to a parallel culture. A single writer could compose in Sanskrit and Avahaṭṭa at the same time and be distressed when scholars mocked the use of Avahaṭṭa. But is there even a trace of that distress in the Vidyāpati of the Padāvalī? There we find joy and pain—the joy and pain of the dispossessed. The court-paṇḍit Vidyāpati who wrote in Sanskrit and Avahaṭṭa was learned and could be reproached even for composing in Avahaṭṭa. The Maithili Vidyāpati of the parallel tradition remained outside that experience. This parallel tradition reaches back, in the author's argument, to the Ṛgvedic period, with the nārāśaṃsī form. Whether the Vidyāpati within it was from the barber caste or a Brahmin family is not something history conclusively states; yet folklore, his intimate association with the working people who performed Bidāpat, and the local Bisfi tradition are presented here as evidence of his non-Brahmin background. The Sanskrit and Avahaṭṭa works never mention the Padāvalī belonging to this poet, nor does that poet's Padāvalī refer to the Sanskrit or Avahaṭṭa works. The Sanskrit and Avahaṭṭa texts lament Muslim incursions and the perceived desecration of sacred threads and temples; the Padāvalī instead voices the happiness, sorrow and struggle of common people, without that same outcry. Why, when the poet's very Brahmin identity is in dispute, should putting a pāg on him establish the idea that he was "ours"? Would he cease to be ours if he were not a Brahmin? Would his songs of migration, of the beloved departing for another land, lose their importance? Is the nearly exclusive celebration of his erotic songs itself part of an attempt to limit his legacy? Is it right to bind such a poet within caste identities by crowning him with a pāg? In Madhyakālīn Mithilā, Vijay Kumar Thakur writes that the pervasive feudal religious ideology left enduring traces in Mithila's society and that the pāg itself is associated with Tantric thought (p. 26). Let that headgear, then, remain within the sphere of ritual, marriage and initiation; why draw a poet of the parallel tradition into it? If he belonged to the barber caste, the imposition is unjustified; even if he were a Brahmin, it would remain unjustified, given the hostility to difference still visible among some Brahmins in the twenty-first century. A thousand-year-old poet of a parallel tradition should not be crowned with what the cited historian calls a feudal remnant.

Two Vidyāpatis: Legends and Facts; Bodhi Kāyastha; Uganā Mahādeva

Vidyāpati, the Earliest Poet of Maithili (Before Jyotirīśvara)

Vidyāpati, the Earliest Poet of Maithili (portrait of Vidyāpati by Pankalal Mandal, winner of a Videha painting award)

The earliest poet of Maithili, according to this interpretation, lived before Kaviśvara Jyotirīśvara (approximately 1275–1350), since Jyotirīśvara mentions him in his work. He is distinct from Ṭhakkura Vidyāpati, the Sanskrit and Avahaṭṭa writer. The poet may have been the son of Shri Mahesh Thakur of the barber caste in Bisfi. In the parallel Bidāpat dance tradition, poems of this Vidyāpati's Padāvalī have been sung and enacted since before Jyotirīśvara. The author adduces a mention of Vidyāpati in Abhinavagupta's Īśvarapratyabhijñā-vimarśinī, composed in Kashmir in the late tenth or early eleventh century, as well as five verses cited by Śrīdharadāsa in the Saduktikarṇāmṛta (dated here to 11 February 1206, on the authority of V. K. Thakur's Madhyakālīn Mithilā), in the language of the Padāvalī.

> "Until the mālatī comes into bloom,
> The bee cannot enjoy its honey." And:
> "Where is nectar in an unopened bud?"

Mention is made in Jyotirīśvara (1275–1350), in the sixth kallola, "Description of the Learned" (Atha Vidvanta Varṇanā), and the eighth kallola, "Description of the Kingdom" (Atha Rājya Varṇanā).

In the Bidāpat dance of the parallel tradition, poems from the Padāvalī—understood here to predate Jyotirīśvara—are performed through dance and acting.

Ṭhakkura Vidyāpati (1350–1435), of the Viṣayavāra/Bisfi–Kāśyapa lineage and a courtier of King Śivasiṃha, wrote in Sanskrit and Avahaṭṭa. His enduring works include the Kīrtilatā, Kīrtipatākā, Puruṣaparīkṣā, Gorakṣavijaya and Likhanāvalī, among many others. This author is distinct from the Vidyāpati whom the present argument identifies as the earliest Maithili poet, before Jyotirīśvara.

Bodhi Kāyastha

The story of Bodhi Kāyastha attaining the Gaṅgā is told in Ṭhakkura Vidyāpati's Puruṣaparīkṣā. A similar story of attaining the Gaṅgā circulated about the great poet Vidyāpati, identified here as the pre-Jyotirīśvara author of the Maithili Padāvalī; subsequently the story became attached to Ṭhakkura Vidyāpati, the writer in Sanskrit and Avahaṭṭa, as well.

Uganā Mahādeva

Mahādeva, in the form of Uganā, is said to have lived as Vidyāpati's servant so that he could listen to the poet's songs. The tale of Uganā came to be associated with both the earliest Maithili poet Vidyāpati (placed here before Jyotirīśvara) and Ṭhakkura Vidyāpati, the Sanskrit and Avahaṭṭa author at King Śivasiṃha's court.

The Sacred-Thread Ceremony and Installation of the Pāg for Vidyāpati by the Mithila Cultural Council

The Mithila Cultural Council and associates such as Kishorikant Mishra either failed to recognize—or did not wish to recognize—the distinction between Ṭhakkura Vidyāpati of Sanskrit and Avahaṭṭa and the Vidyāpati called Kavikokila, the cuckoo among poets. There are written historical records placing Gonu Jha in 1050–1150, yet Usha Kiran Khan has him debate with the Sanskrit and Avahaṭṭa Vidyāpati in her historical Hindi novel Sirjanhār (Bharatiya Jnanpith). Virendra Jha dates Gonu Jha to five hundred years ago and Taranand Viyogi to three hundred years ago, in their respective Hindi books published by Rajkamal Prakashan and the National Book Trust. In Vibha Rani's Hindi book on Gonu Jha (Vani Prakashan), Kunal places him in the reign of Bhava Singh in the fourteenth century. Such disagreement persists even though, the author maintains, the written pañjī registers Gonu Jha ten generations before the Sanskrit and Avahaṭṭa Vidyāpati.

Vidyāpati of the Parallel Tradition and the Pāg. The Sanskrit writings of Vidyāpati Thakur identify a Brahmin author; my concern, however, is with the Vidyāpati of the Maithili Padāvalī and why he was invested with the pāg and appropriated as "our Vidyāpati." Non-Brahmin communities preserved him for eight hundred years through Bidāpat dance without such a ceremony. The appropriation came after Bengal had claimed the Padāvalī of Vidyāpati and Govindadāsa, and after Rajkrishna Mukhopadhyay, in 1875, first identified Vidyāpati as a poet of Mithila, followed by Nagendranath Gupta's identification of Govindadāsa as another poet of Mithila. Bengal resisted these claims before finally accepting them.

The Vidyāpati identified by Rajkrishna Mukhopadhyay as belonging to Mithila was the author of the Padāvalī; Bengal had never claimed the Sanskrit and Avahaṭṭa writer Ṭhakkura Vidyāpati as its own.

The Maithili songs interpolated into Jyotirīśvara's Sanskrit play Dhūrtasamāgama and into the Gorakṣavijaya of the Sanskrit and Avahaṭṭa Vidyāpati testify, in this reading, to an older Padāvalī tradition and demonstrate its influence on both authors.

Scholars of Mithila later brought forward the Sanskrit and Avahaṭṭa books, along with pañjī entries bearing the names Govindadāsa and Vidyāpati, to produce the identities "Vidyāpati Thakur" and "Govindadāsa Jha" (!!!). Here Ramanath Jha's superficial acquaintance with the pañjī and limited perspective did harm. The author charges that after Indian independence, the Mithila Cultural Council unexpectedly conducted a symbolic investiture with a pāg and proclaimed the Maithili Vidyāpati a Brahmin, thereby converting him into "our Vidyāpati." Numerous poets resembling Jyotirīśvara are also found in the pañjī; why should name discrepancies count in Vidyāpati's case but not in Jyotirīśvara's? Even if this was planned, the author argues, one piece of evidence remained.

Let us turn again to Bidāpat, sung by non-Brahmins and associated, in this argument, with a poet living before Jyotirīśvara, perhaps of the Nāuā Thakur barber caste. Jyotirīśvara is said to mention him in the Varṇaratnākara.

In none of the poems of the Padāvalī does this Vidyāpati describe himself as a Sanskrit or Avahaṭṭa writer. Why does the pain of the dispossessed, so palpable in his songs, not appear in the writings of the other Vidyāpati, whom the author identifies as a Brahmin? The author asserts that the Sanskrit and Avahaṭṭa Vidyāpati expressed disdain for the dispossessed and an explicitly conservative Brahmin identity.

The Padāvalī's Vidyāpati, by contrast, is portrayed as guileless; the author alleges that certain narrowly Brahmanical verses were clumsily inserted by orthodox editors.

The idea of Piyā Desāntar—Vidyāpati's bidesiyā—is now before discerning readers and audiences. In the midst of the present distress of Maithil migrants, it is offered as a tribute to the great poet. Does the Vidyāpati of Sanskrit and Avahaṭṭa express this same pain?

The Padāvalī represents a parallel culture. A scholar composing in both Sanskrit and Avahaṭṭa might experience derision for writing in the latter language, but that anxiety does not define the Vidyāpati of the Padāvalī. The Padāvalī speaks instead of the joys and sorrows of working people. The Sanskrit-and-Avahaṭṭa Vidyāpati was a learned court-paṇḍit; even the use of Avahaṭṭa exposed him to criticism. The Maithili Vidyāpati belonged to a different, parallel tradition, traced here back to the Ṛgvedic nārāśaṃsī. Whether that poet belonged to the Nāuā Thakur caste or to a Brahmin family is a question on which historical evidence, in the author's own words, remains silent.

Nevertheless, the author regards the folklore, the close connection of Bidāpat with the labouring poor, and local Bisfi traditions as evidence that the Padāvalī poet was not a Brahmin. The Sanskrit and Avahaṭṭa literature does not refer to that Vidyāpati's Padāvalī, nor does the Padāvalī mention those Sanskrit or Avahaṭṭa compositions. The former texts lament Muslim incursions and damage to sacred-thread and temple customs; the latter celebrates common people's happiness, pain and struggle, without that note of outrage. The author adds that Muslims may scarcely have been present in Mithila in the earlier poet's supposed lifetime. When his caste itself is uncertain, what claim is created by placing a pāg on his head? Would he not belong to Mithila if he were not a Brahmin? Would his migration songs lose their significance? Is the tendency to discuss only his erotic lyrics a deliberate distortion? And is it appropriate to constrain a poet within caste boundaries by crowning him with a pāg? Vijay Kumar Thakur, in Madhyakālīn Mithilā, describes the pervasive influence of feudal-era religious ideology and identifies the pāg among the surviving practices associated with Tantric thought (p. 26).

Then let the pāg remain part of ritual, marriage and initiation. Why force it upon Vidyāpati of the parallel tradition? The author assigns responsibility for this act to Kishorikant Mishra's Mithila Cultural Council. If the language and culture have survived despite the conduct of such self-appointed guardians, that survival itself testifies to their strength.

In the Chetana Samiti's magazine, Maneshwar Manuj stated, in a public forum, that Jagadish Prasad Mandal had written only four novels!!!

Had Jagadish Prasad Mandal not carried the surname Mandal, but been known simply as Jagadish Prasad, followers of Ramanath Jha would have declared him a Śrotriya; followers of Amar and Ramdev Jha would have called him a Brahmin, and the author Verma in the Laldas memorial volume would have pronounced him a Kāyastha.

And if no photograph of Jagadish Prasad Mandal had survived, the author argues satirically, Kishorikant Mishra's reactionary Mithila Cultural Council might have performed his sacred-thread ceremony, crowned him with a pāg, and repeated a thousand years later the injustice allegedly committed against Vidyāpati. Some elderly villager of Berma might then have pointed to a mound of earth and called it the imaginary ancestral homestead of "Jagadish Prasad Jha/Thakur."

Videha has also published, without cutting, abusive responses from Malangiya's son, Ramdev Jha's son and numerous pseudonymous writers so that readers may judge them; only abuse that could not be printed was withheld. Fear of such attacks, the author claims, led historians of Maithili and Mithila to hint at this issue without pursuing it further.

Thus the argument returns to the conclusion that this Vidyāpati preceded Jyotirīśvara (1275–1350). The song-and-dance world of Jayadeva (c. 1200) and the kīrtaniyā tradition, the author argues, accord with the Padāvalī of the pre-Jyotirīśvara Vidyāpati, not with the literary refinement of the Sanskrit and Avahaṭṭa Vidyāpati.

Let us return, then, to the platform of the Mithila Cultural Council. In the author's formulation, the Council did not conduct the sacred-thread ceremony of Vidyāpati alone; it conducted a sacred-thread ceremony for Maithili itself. The pāg placed on its Vidyāpati erased Bindhyeshwar Mandal and Shrikant Mandal of Kolkata from the picture, completing the symbolic initiation of Maithili into that restricted identity.

Consider examples of the caste orthodoxy of the Vidyāpati who wrote in Sanskrit and Avahaṭṭa:

Kīrtilatā: "Marriage across caste boundaries carries one to degradation."

In the course of narrating a story in the Puruṣaparīkṣā, Vidyāpati offers an authorial statement that Rajput women are of loose character. The author compares this with a supposed statement that a Śūdra's wife could be taken away by holding her hand without consent, then immediately insists that no such statement ever occurs in the Atharvaveda—or, indeed, in any Veda.

Śukla Yajurveda 26.2: "Yathemāṃ vācaṃ kalyāṇīm āvadāni janebhyaḥ; brahmarājanyābhyāṃ śūdrāya cāryāya ca svāya cāraṇāya ca." Let us make this auspicious, sacred speech—the words of the Veda—heard by all: Brahmins, Kṣatriyas, Śūdras and Āryas, our own people and strangers alike, that is, everyone. The author argues that the Manusmṛti, contrary to this Vedic declaration, tried to prohibit the study or hearing of Vedic words to certain sections of society. Yet even the Smṛti acknowledges Vedic speech as authoritative testimony (śabda-pramāṇa), so its contrary injunction, he argues, invalidates itself.

But such a claim is indeed present in the Puruṣaparīkṣā. Do you believe the Sanskrit-and-Avahaṭṭa Vidyāpati would have possessed the courage to write in this manner about women of his patron's caste?

The Sanskrit-and-Avahaṭṭa Vidyāpati repeatedly emphasizes caste distinctions; purity of blood and caste, the author argues, are important to him. He is represented as claiming that a person of low birth deserves no compassion, that beauty is the monopoly of the wealthy and privileged, that caste is the final determinant of social existence, and that someone born in an inferior family can only be a snake with an evil mind. The same Vidyāpati—the one invested with sacred thread and pāg by Kishorikant Mishra's Mithila Cultural Council—is cited as calling a country without caste rules a mleccha country. The discussion refers to Upendra Thakur's Aspects of Society and Economy of Medieval Mithila.

I have not encountered a description of the pāg earlier than Amīr Khusro.

> By contrast, the pre-Jyotirīśvara Vidyāpati, author of the Padāvalī, says:
> "Here the king punishes no one."
> "All the great men are of our own kind."

Thus, the king gives no punishment to anyone, and all the eminent people are of a common kind.

Govindadāsa's verses were difficult, and no comparable parallel tradition sustained them—perhaps, the author suggests, because they circulated mainly among upper-caste groups. They were therefore not preserved in the soil of Mithila as Bidāpat dance was. Consider also Gaṅgeśa Upādhyāya's Tattvacintāmaṇi. Vardhamāna calls him sukavi-kairava-kānana-indu, the moon illuminating a forest of poetic water-lilies; where have those poems gone? Pakṣadhara forbade the copying of texts, but Raghunātha Śiromaṇi and his disciples memorized the works of Udayana and Gaṅgeśa and carried that learning away. With the foundation of the Navya-Nyāya school at Navadvīpa, students ceased coming from Bengal to Mithila.

Regarding the pre-Jyotirīśvara Vidyāpati, the author invokes Abhinavagupta of Kashmir (late tenth to early eleventh century) and a mention of Vidyāpati in the Īśvarapratyabhijñā-vimarśinī.

Śrīdharadāsa's Saduktikarṇāmṛta quotes five verses attributed to Vidyāpati, in the language of the Padāvalī.

> "Until the mālatī blossoms,
> The bee has no delight in it."
> And:
> "Where is nectar in the unopened bud?"

(Vijay Kumar Thakur, Madhyakālīn Mithilā.)

Jyotirīśvara (1275–1350), sixth kallola, "Description of the Learned" (Atha Vidvanta Varṇanā). The archaic reading is transcribed in full below, followed by the explanation that the text itself supplies:

jyotirīśvara (1275-1350) ṣaṣṭhaḥ kallola- ॥latha vidyāvanta varṇanā ॥….. vidātaño āsthāna bhītara bhau. takā pachā telaṅgī. marahaṭhī. vi. daotinī dui citrakai gāṅga jauna nihāli aisani deṣuaha. cauāñcari cīri ekahoṅka parihane .....se kaisana deṣu. jaise prayāgakṣetra sarasvatīkē gaṅgājamunāka samvāhi. kā ho taise tā vidāñotake duao samvāhikā ho bhauaha. daśañundhī rājā avadhāna karāu. vidāñota āsthāna vaisu.

In English: the vidāot enters the assembly; behind him come Telugu and Maratha performers. Two vidāotinīs appear, wearing garments with four ends, their two-coloured figures likened to the Gaṅgā and Yamunā mingling with Sarasvatī at Prayāga. King Daśaundhī is called to attention, and the vidāot is invited to sit. The following paragraph preserves the author's own gloss.

(The vidāot, a male performer, entered, followed by Telugu and Maratha performers. The two vidāotinīs, or women performers, seemed to have bathed in the two-coloured streams of the Gaṅgā and Yamunā. Each wore a garment with four ends. Picture them as the Sarasvatī joined by the Gaṅgā and Yamunā at Prayāga: the vidāot appeared accompanied by these two female attendants. King Daśaundhī was called to attention, and the vidāot sat in his place.)

Eighth kallola, "Description of the Kingdom" (Atha Rājya Varṇanā): "... the songs of the vidāot, their dance, instruments and rhythms; they came wearing skirts ..."

The vidāot performers sang, danced and played musical instruments and rhythms, wearing skirts.

Uganā Mahādeva: Mahādeva, assuming the form of Uganā, is said to have become Vidyāpati's servant to hear his songs. The legend became attached both to the earliest Maithili Vidyāpati, placed here before Jyotirīśvara, and to Ṭhakkura Vidyāpati, the Sanskrit and Avahaṭṭa author at King Śivasiṃha's court.

Bodhi Kāyastha: The story of his attainment of the Gaṅgā occurs in Ṭhakkura Vidyāpati's Puruṣaparīkṣā. The same story was once associated with the great poet Vidyāpati, held here to have composed the pre-Jyotirīśvara Maithili Padāvalī; later it was also attached to Ṭhakkura Vidyāpati, author of Sanskrit and Avahaṭṭa works.

Ṭhakkura Vidyāpati's Sanskrit literature emerged in a period when Mithila's learned tradition was declining. The author finds little distinctive discussion of Ṭhakkura Vidyāpati in Sanskrit literary history; the arrival of students from Bengal was also diminishing. For those who still visited, his Sanskrit and Avahaṭṭa books were contemporary works from a fading scholarly environment and were still being composed. By contrast, the earlier Padāvalī had already achieved fame. It is not even certain that the pāg existed in Mithila during Gonu Jha's or the earlier Vidyāpati's lifetime: the author cites Amīr Khusro (1253–1325) as its first known witness. Vijay Kumar Thakur interprets it as a feudal emblem associated with Tantric ritual. The author speculates that subordinate feudal chiefs were given the headgear after Muslim incursions and notes its similarity to Muslim caps. He further states that Brahmins and Kāyasthas, rather than Rajputs, were the subordinate feudal elites in Mithila at that time and that the pāg still sometimes appears at marriages and related ceremonies among those two groups.

Mahākavi Vidyāpati: The earliest poet of Maithili, according to this argument, predates Kaviśvara Jyotirīśvara (c. 1275–1350), who refers to him, and is distinct from the Sanskrit-and-Avahaṭṭa author Ṭhakkura Vidyāpati. By local tradition he may have been the son of Shri Mahesh Thakur, a Nāuā Thakur barber of Bisfi village. The parallel Bidāpat dance tradition has enacted his Padāvalī, held here to predate Jyotirīśvara.

Ṭhakkura Vidyāpati (1350–1435), of the Viṣayavāra/Bisfi–Kāśyapa lineage, was a courtier of King Śivasiṃha and a writer in Sanskrit and Avahaṭṭa. He produced many lasting works, including Kīrtilatā, Kīrtipatākā, Puruṣaparīkṣā, Gorakṣavijaya and Likhanāvalī. The author distinguishes him from the earliest Maithili poet Vidyāpati, whom he places before Jyotirīśvara.

Phanishwarnath Renu wrote a reportage on Bidāpat dance, published in the weekly Viśvamitra on 1 August 1945. Its importance, the author argues, lies in the fact that it appeared about seven hundred years after Jyotirīśvara described this tradition. Throughout those intervening centuries a parallel community kept Vidyāpati alive; then, he charges, the poet was suddenly taken away from those who had preserved him. Bindeshwar Thakur died singing Vidyāpati's songs and lamenting that Brahmins had appropriated the poet by crowning him with the pāg. Kanungo Badri Prasad Thakur of Brahmpura, Binod Thakur of Pokharbhira, Saryug Thakur of Rudrapur, Jairam Thakur of Mehath, and the whole village of Bisfi are said still to repeat this grievance. Shaligram Yadav and Awadhiya Thakur are offered as witnesses to the Bisfi tradition. All manner of fanciful arguments have been advanced concerning Vidyāpati's birth in the course of what the author calls a ritual appropriation, yet research papers have failed even to mention the parallel tradition. This essay is dedicated to the thousands of people like Bindeshwar Thakur who kept Vidyāpati alive between the descriptions of Jyotirīśvara and Phanishwarnath Renu.

The Śatapatha Brāhmaṇa tradition of Mithila and the region's parallel tradition. Language may have existed before the Ṛgveda, the earliest surviving work of Vedic Sanskrit. Oral forms such as gāthā, nārāśaṃsī, narratives of the gods and other tales may already have been composed in it. The Ṛgveda uses terms such as gāthin, gātuvit and gāthapati for singers of such compositions. Gāthā and nārāśaṃsī existed beside the formal Vedic tradition. Did Vedic Sanskrit arise out of Prakrit, or Prakrit out of Vedic Sanskrit? The narratives of people called nārāśaṃsī in the Vedas, the author argues, indicate that the two traditions coexisted for a long period and influenced one another. Consider the Ṛgvedic use of dūlabha for durlabha (Ṛgveda 4.9.8), the Atharvavedic paścā for paścāt (Atharvaveda 10.4.10), or pratisahāya for pratisandhāya in the Gopatha Brāhmaṇa (2.4). What do these forms establish? The Āryas, according to the author's historical reconstruction, came to Mithila from western India, while parts of the Vedas already existed before their arrival. This, he contends, accounts for words and pronunciations found in modern Maithili and in Vedic—but not classical—Sanskrit. Avidyā, the law of karma, cycles of birth and rebirth, and liberation are also described here as ideas received by the Āryas from non-Āryan traditions. Accordingly, the Upaniṣads teach the way to liberation rather than merely the way to heaven. Can liberation be gained by sacrifice? No: it comes through knowledge, reflection, contemplation and samādhi. Under King Janaka's patronage, Yājñavalkya composed the Bṛhadāraṇyaka Upaniṣad in the non-Āryan Tirhut region. Explaining the fifty-seventh sūtra of the Sāṃkhyakārikā, Vācaspati Miśra asks whether one may argue that just as unconscious milk nourishes a calf, unconscious prakṛti can bring living beings toward liberating knowledge. God is complete in himself: to what end would he create the universe? If for the sake of living beings, those beings become bound only after creation; before creation there can be no bondage and hence no occasion for divine pity. Creation, then, comes through prakṛti, and living beings attain apavarga by their own effort. The author reads this explanation of dissolution through discernment as atheistic rather than theistic. If God intervened in the operation of prakṛti, that conscious intervention would have a purpose, but God has no unmet purpose. Gautama of Mithila, author of the Nyāyasūtras, discusses attaining niḥśreyasa through knowledge of sixteen categories, without attributing liberation there to God. The Vaiśeṣika-sūtra, on this account, considers the Vedas the work of learned people, not divine authorship. Kumārila Bhaṭṭa holds that reliable discussion of God before creation is impossible. Thus the so-called mainstream Śatapatha Brāhmaṇa tradition had a parallel stream from the outset: Brahminical and non-Brahminical ways existed together in Mithila. Jyotirīśvara remarks that the Buddhist side appears terrifying. An unchanging Śatapatha Brāhmaṇa-oriented movement, the author argues, is occupied with sanctifying the Sanskrit-and-Avahaṭṭa Vidyāpati because of a common name. Ṛgvedic and nārāśaṃsī traditions, the great poet Vidyāpati and the pāg-invested Vidyāpati, liberation and heaven-or-hell: these conflicting positions have long coexisted in Mithila. In one account, Vidhegha Māthava of the Śatapatha Brāhmaṇa and Nimi of the Purāṇas share the priest Gautama, and this marks the beginning of the Videha kingdom. Gautama, the priest of Māthava, inaugurated the Mitravinda rite and sacrifice; Yājñavalkya restored it in the reign of Mahājanaka II. The tradition that endlessly invoked Maitreyī, Yājñavalkya, Sītā and Janaka could swiftly perform Vidyāpati's sacred-thread ceremony and pāg investiture precisely because such acts fitted its version of the Śatapatha Brāhmaṇa mainstream. After Madhava Singh ordered the compilation of the śākhā-pañjī in 1760, the author says, new forms of elite lineage classification spread among Brahmins and Kāyasthas, creating the Battiśgāmiyā/Bhalmānus sub-group among Karṇa Kāyasthas and the Śrotriya sub-group among Maithil Brahmins. He associates those developments with rising hereditary physical and mental illness and with increased polygamy, child marriage and widowhood in both communities, again attributing the apparently smooth and rapid transition to the dominance of this supposed mainstream.

Dineshwar Lal Anand and Ramvriksha Benipuri on Vidyāpati. Dineshwar Lal Anand, the author argues, was mistaken because the pañjī was still secret at the time. The registers placed the Viṣayavāra/Bisfi lineage of the Sanskrit-and-Avahaṭṭa Vidyāpati in the lower Jayavāra category. The śākhā-pañjī did not exist before 1760, he argues, as shown by the descendants of Ayachi Mishra: the lower generations of that mūla appear both under the Śrotriya sub-caste and within the wider Brahmin classification. He compares this to depictions of bulls but no cows on Indus Valley seals: how could bulls exist without cows? Anand did not possess the entire pañjī record. Perhaps, in trying to show that the Padāvalī Vidyāpati and the Sanskrit-and-Avahaṭṭa Vidyāpati were identical, he thought that connecting the Bisfi lineage's alleged demotion with the latter's writing in Avahaṭṭa would make Ṭhakkura Vidyāpati appear a revolutionary. Yet Anand acknowledges that no song anthology survives either in Vidyāpati's own handwriting or with a documented compilation from his lifetime. How can that be, the author asks, when the Sanskrit and Avahaṭṭa works announce their beginnings and endings, record which kings and queens inspired them, and identify their patrons with full authorial flourish and the blessings of Sarasvatī and Lakṣmī? Why is there no such apparatus around the Padāvalī? Anand, he says, has no answer. The Sanskrit-and-Avahaṭṭa author names his patrons but says little about himself. He even feels pressure when writing in Avahaṭṭa, then a principal literary language of that establishment. The earlier Padāvalī poet's influence was so powerful that the later author had to include Maithili songs in the Sanskrit play Gorakṣavijaya—just as Jyotirīśvara, who first recorded the vidāot performance, included Maithili songs in his Sanskrit Dhūrtasamāgama. Govind Jha sees and discusses the earlier Vidyāpati tradition in Jyotirīśvara's vidāot, yet, the author asks, why does he fail to follow it when Bindeshwar Thakur dies singing its songs? How does the village in which a play about Vidyāpati locates the poet's thirst suddenly become the playwright's own village? Everyone, he says, writes a play about "our Vidyāpati" according to personal convenience. Ramvriksha Benipuri too lacked the pañjī evidence. On the basis of a newly constructed sub-caste and a legend, he writes dismissively of Keshav Mishra's Vidyāpati; the Keshav Mishra in the Dvaita appendix was a grandson of Vācaspati II (1400–1490). Another Keshav Mishra (c. 1150) wrote the Tarkabhāṣā, later criticized in the Tarkaprakāśa by Vardhamāna, son of Gaṅgeśa, the author of the Tattvacintāmaṇi. Benipuri did not advance even one step beyond Ananda Coomaraswamy's research of 1915, the author contends, nor has another mainstream scholar advanced beyond it in the succeeding century. Benipuri repeats the Uganā legend but remains silent on whether Mahādeva would dance on Kailāsa to the Śaivasarvasvasāra of the orthodox Sanskrit-and-Avahaṭṭa Vidyāpati or to the nācārī songs of the pre-Jyotirīśvara poet. Like Coomaraswamy, Benipuri knew of a Bhāgavata manuscript in the handwriting of the Sanskrit-and-Avahaṭṭa Vidyāpati and of the story in which the Gaṅgā supposedly engulfed the poet. He had heard of that writer's Puruṣaparīkṣā, but, the author insists, had not read it: otherwise he would have known that the book tells the Gaṅgā-attainment story about Bodhi Kāyastha.

That story, like the Uganā legend, was associated with the earlier Vidyāpati before being attached to the other poet through ritual reinterpretation; the Bodhi Kāyastha episode is offered as evidence. Benipuri even describes the Kīrtipatākā as a collection of Maithili songs!! Is this how research is conducted, by hearsay? Why has the supposedly dry mainstream not moved beyond the foundations laid by Coomaraswamy a century ago? Because, the author answers, the Śatapatha Brāhmaṇa-oriented mainstream will not allow it. Meanwhile, without evidence, Benipuri pronounces King Śivasiṃha's friend Purāditya a Bhūmihār Brahmin—just as Ramanath Jha calls Govindadāsa (Jha) a Śrotriya, a classification Sukumar Sen considered absurd; Ramdev Jha also makes him a Brahmin, and a writer named Verma, in the Laldas memorial volume, makes Kālidāsa a Kāyastha. The Sanskrit-and-Avahaṭṭa Vidyāpati begins and ends his books with ritual observances and acknowledges his royal patrons, but not himself. Why, then, did the Padāvalī persist in living voices without the formal apparatus of books? Because, the author concludes, those songs were composed centuries before the court author and before the pāg emerged in Mithila. Names such as Rūpanārāyaṇa, Śivasiṃha, Lakhimā, Devasiṃha, Harasiṃha, Padmasiṃha, Viśvāsadeva, Arjuna, Amara, Rāghavasiṃha, Rudrasiṃha, Dhīrasiṃha, Bhairavasiṃha and Candrasiṃha were later inserted into the Padāvalī, he alleges, often disrupting the metre. The Sanskrit-and-Avahaṭṭa author's works, by contrast, were openly commissioned or patron-supported: Bhūparikramā for Devasiṃha; Kīrtilatā for Kīrtisiṃha and Vīrasiṃha; Kīrtipatākā; Gorakṣavijaya for Śivasiṃha; Likhanāvalī for Purāditya; and Dānavākyāvalī for Queen Dhīramatī. Gorakṣavijaya was composed for a Bhairava worship ceremony and included Maithili songs, like the earlier Dhūrtasamāgama, reflecting the great influence of the earlier poet. Had the names not differed, the author concludes provocatively, Jyotirīśvara himself might have been turned into the "pre-Jyotirīśvara Vidyāpati."

Conclusion. Gaṅgeśa, author of the Tattvacintāmaṇi, wrote a work said to equal twelve thousand books in extent. Professor Dinesh Chandra Bhattacharya writes in History of Navya-Nyāya in Mithila: "The family which was inferior in social status is now extinct in Mithila...Gangesha's family is completely ignored and we are not expected to know even his father's name." The author notes that Bhattacharya attributes this information to Professor R. Jha (Ramanath Jha). Yet, according to the author, the pañjī expressly states that Gaṅgeśa was born five years after his father's death and married a woman of the leather-working caste. Why, then, did Ramanath Jha conceal these matters from Bhattacharya? The author alleges that an elite sub-caste promoted a tale of Gaṅgeśa's transformation from fool to scholar and sought to erase his family. Gaṅgeśa's son Vardhamāna calls him sukavi-kairava-kānana-indu, the moon of a grove of poetic lilies; where have the poems of so famous a scholar disappeared, and through what process? Vāsudeva of Bengal studied in Mithila alongside Pakṣadhara Miśra, passed the śalākā examination and gained the title Sārvabhauma. He memorized the kārikās of Gaṅgeśa's Tattvacintāmaṇi and Udayana's Nyāyakusumāñjali. The teachers of Mithila, including Pakṣadhara, forbade students to copy the Tattvacintāmaṇi. Raghunātha Śiromaṇi, a disciple of Vāsudeva, defeated his teacher Pakṣadhara Miśra in debate and gained the right to publish or disseminate the text. Vāsudeva and Raghunātha established the Navya-Nyāya school in Navadvīpa. Pakṣadhara was contemporary with the Sanskrit-and-Avahaṭṭa Vidyāpati, and students from Bengal then stopped coming to Mithila. Grierson called the Bisfi copperplate granted by Śivasiṃha to the Sanskrit-and-Avahaṭṭa Vidyāpati a forgery: being familiar with the Padāvalī, he could not imagine its Vidyāpati receiving such a grant. He did not recognize the distinction between the two poets. Mahāmahopādhyāya Haraprasad Shastri, however, did distinguish them and declared the copperplate genuine. Śrīdharadāsa's Saduktikarṇāmṛta contains a Kaivarta poet Papīhā's hymn to the Gaṅgā and songs of Rādhā and Kṛṣṇa. Dhoyī, court poet of Lakṣmaṇasena, belonged to the Jolhā weaving community, according to the account.

Lakhimā Ṭhākurāin wrote verse in Sanskrit, not the Padāvalī (Grierson). Śrīdharadāsa's inscription is at Andhrāṭhāṛhī; he served as a minister to Nānyadeva and Gaṅgadeva. His descendant Amiakar was contemporary with the Sanskrit-and-Avahaṭṭa Vidyāpati. Upendra Thakur treats Gaṅgadeva as a Kalacuri ruler; Vijay Kumar Thakur interprets the Vidyāpati songs in Śrīdharadāsa's Saduktikarṇāmṛta as praising the Kalacuri Karṇa. Radhakrishna Chaudhary holds a different view.

Under any interpretation, the author concludes, this Vidyāpati preceded Jyotirīśvara.

Rāmacarita: Vigrahapāla III defeated Karṇa. Radhakrishna Chaudhary found two Pāla inscriptions at Naulagarh, sixteen kilometres north of Begusarai, relevant to this conflict. That Karṇa also belongs to the eleventh century.

The poems of the pre-Jyotirīśvara Vidyāpati were known in Bengal, while Jyotirīśvara's Dhūrtasamāgama was known in southern India. Later the flow of students from Bengal to Mithila ceased, as did the outward circulation of Mithila's drama and Padāvalī.

Phanishwarnath Renu: Vidyāpati in a Folk-Song Tradition

While researching the great poet Vidyāpati, I began to think that a chapter would have to be called "Vidyāpati, Poet of Cultivators, Labourers and Cart-Drivers." For even today, in the Purnia–Saharsa region, groups perform the songs of Vidyāpati's Padāvalī with expressive dance. The leaders of these troupes are often buffalo-riders, herdsmen and drivers of bullock carts. I asked some Maithil paṇḍits:

"How did this happen?" They replied, "What are you getting yourself into? It is because of such fools that Vidyāpati has fallen into his present state. These ordinary people took it into their heads to put together 'four Padāvalī verses' in his name. You are being misled." Ignoring the prohibition pronounced by the scholars, I gladly began planning a journey to Saharsa (or Sahrasa?). Kanchira is a village ruled by the district magistrates of two districts: half lies in Saharsa and half in Purnia. The Vidyāpati troupe of Kanchira is spoken of in both districts. On the day I arrived, an extraordinary event had just occurred: the political leader who had represented the area for ten years had been decisively defeated at the polls. A performance that night might have been read as a political demonstration. Fearing this, Janakdas, leader of the Vidyāpati troupe, refused permission for a dance. Only after much persuasion did he agree to a performance the following night. After prolonged and circuitous argument, Janakdas declared that Vidyāpati dance had originated in his own family, but he would never give particulars. When he finally believed that I was not an agent seeking to draw a thousand or two thousand rupees from the government treasury in the name of a Vidyāpati dance troupe, he struck the mṛdaṅga. I watched the dance all night. A cowherd boy in a sari became the grief-stricken Rādhā and sang through tears, "How many days will Hari keep you waiting, you lonely woman?" Next day I asked Janakdas about the dance's origins. He answered that for as long as anyone remembered, its hereditary singing had continued in the family, though he could not say from when. His reserve was caused by my tape recorder: "You have cleverly recorded all our songs on tape in secret. You have got your work done for nothing, haven't you?" Even after I paid him fifty rupees, he would not answer when and how farmers, labourers, cowherds and cart-drivers first began to sing and dance the Padāvalī. I lay all day on straw in his hut; he felt no pity. Even his young widowed daughter pleaded for me, but he remained unmoved: would I have his family's reputation made a laughingstock by having it printed in the "gazette"? Old Janakdas went off to unyoke and graze his oxen. Still lying in his hut, I then heard a story, or had a dream, or fell under an illusion—I cannot say which.

Bidāpat Dance (Original Reportage by Phanishwarnath Renu)

Bidāpat Dance

This dance is believed to have originated in Darbhanga district. What condition it now occupies in its own homeland scarcely needs saying. Yet it is still cherished in villages of certain districts of northern Bihar, and in Bhagalpur, Purnia and elsewhere. It has come to be regarded as a dance of the lower people. Members of the so-called respectable classes consider it beneath them even to watch. Among Musahars, Dhāṅgaṛs and Dusādhs, however, it flourishes at weddings, tonsure ceremonies and other celebrations. The troupe has seven or eight performers and only two instruments, the mṛdaṅga drum and the mañjīrā cymbals. Come, then, let us enjoy Bidāpat dance. For a little while, set aside our supposed respectability …

"Dhṛṅg dhā, dhṛṅg dhā, tinnā"—the mṛdaṅga thundered into speech. "Kun kun kun kun …"—the cymbals joined its voice.

"Gaṇanāyakaṃ phaladāyakaṃ paṇḍitam patitam …" Please do not laugh. That was the auspicious invocation, in pure Sanskrit.

"Dhṛṅgā, dhṛṅgā, dhṛṅgā, dhṛṅgā"—the mṛdaṅga began to play.

"Kinkāṃ, kinkāṃ, kinkāṃ, kinkāṃ …"—the cymbals accompanied it.

The dancers began circling in every direction around the people assembled there. Behind them Bipṭā too spun like a top, contorting his face in all manner of expressions and crying, "Oy, oy, oy, oy!" The mṛdaṅga changed its rhythm: "Dhirināṅgī, dhirināṅgī, dhirināṅgī, dhirināṅgī." The cymbals answered: "Kinkāṃ, kinkāṃ …" Enough; we have danced enough. We shall come to the tale of the dance later.

The performers gathered at one place and began swaying. "Dhirināṅgi tintā, tiṭak-tiṭak dhā, tiṭakal gadagin dhā."

The rhythm ended; the dance too was over, and the dancers pulled their veils over their faces and sat among the spectators. Bipṭā, the clown of the performance, began looking for them. "Dhṛṅgā, dhṛṅgā …"

"Dhin-tinak tinak, dhin tinak-tinak"—the drum sounded.

The chorus joined in tune.

"Here enters the supremely delicate maiden,
Swan-gaited, the beloved daughter of Vṛṣabhānu …"

The dancers rose and came up to Bipṭā. Overjoyed, he began crying, "Oy, oy, oy, oy!"

"Dhin-tinak tinak, dhin-tinak tinak."

"Ah! Her body, mind and face are naturally graceful,
The moon has risen above the lightning …"

The dancers lifted their veils. The spectators roared with laughter at the moonlike faces—ill-shaven beards and moustaches, awkward features and all. The dancer, eyes lowered, performed while shrinking with bashfulness like a touch-me-not plant. Bipṭā tried to attract the dancer's attention.

"Ah! The auspicious bride smiles on seeing her beloved,
Then turns away her face in modesty …"

The dancer smiled and turned away, displaying teeth blackened by chewing tobacco. Please be quiet, all of you. Yes, yes, certainly: it may be Vidyāpati's Padāvalī, but what you are seeing is Bidāpat dance.

New Theatres, Vidyāpati, Kanan Bala—go and stop Pahari Sanyal's endless chatter. I have begun the last melodic phrase.

How often must I explain that this is Bidāpat dance, and that the performer is Ṭahlu Paswan? His father was a notorious bandit, sentenced to transportation across the black waters. His mother went away with another man; he began dancing as a child. In his youth he caused a sensation, a tremendous sensation. Parbatiya, entranced by his gestures, abandoned an established household and ran away with him in the middle of the night.

Yes, Ṭahlu Paswan can sing:

"When my playful beloved comes into the courtyard,
I shall turn back with the faintest smile;
Kānhā will try so many ways ..."

"Dhṛnnā dhṛṅgā, tinā-tinnā"—the mṛdaṅga shifted to another rhythm.

"Kinnā, kinnā"—the cymbals too changed their beat.

"O friend ...
O friend, why ask me of my experience?"
"All my life I have looked upon that beauty, Yet I have never been satisfied."

"Hey! Quiet! Quiet!" Bipṭā shouted angrily. One of the chorus members began twisting a towel into a whip. Bipṭā protested that beating him only wasted time. His back, he said, had been toughened by the landlord's shoes. He had silenced them for one reason only ...

"Whose beauty had that person looked upon all his life?" When Bipṭā understood that it was his own, he brightened, instantly drew a little mirror from his pocket and proudly admired his face.

The song finished. Now it was time for Bipṭā Mahādeva.

"Listen, leader!"
"Hmm?"
"Now hear my song too."
"Oh, father!
Oh, what misery have I not endured!
For seven years I paid the interest,
Yet I was never free of debt.
I worked day and night like an oil-press ox,
But the burden only grew.
I sold my plate to pay the land-records clerk,
My drinking vessel to pay the village watchman.
I sold my goat to pay the constable;
Now I am the penniless Giridhari."

Do you understand anything? You too are all penniless Giridharis, every last one of you.

Just look at the spectators: what have they understood that their stomachs hurt from laughing so hard?

"Dhṛṅgā, dhṛṅgā, dhidhinnā tinnā ..."

"O friend!
It is the month of Bhādra, the clouds are full,
And my house stands empty ..."

Beautiful! Beautiful! Indeed, Vidyāpati is the cuckoo of Mithila ...

You are drifting away again. You are no better than Bipṭā: however much one restrains you, you insist on interpreting every song. And here, look, Bipṭā himself has returned.

"This month of Bhādra, rain clouds pour,
And water leaks through my thatched roof!"

"Ha, ha, ha!" The audience rolled about with laughter. I forgot to mention that Bipṭā thinks of himself as Kṛṣṇa, and also as a lover travelling abroad; yet he never forgets that he is Kalaru Musahar from Halhaliya and, though human, has a standing no higher than an ox at the oil press. When the dancers link their arms around his neck and act out the pride and reproach of love—"Mādhava, why have you abandoned us and gone abroad?"—he forgets that he is Kṛṣṇa leaving Gokul for Mathura. The inequalities of his own life then rise before him like living figures and he sings:

"The Ādrā rain has failed, and so has the Aśleṣā rain;
On all sides we see nothing but the grey hair of old women ...
The fish and turtles have gone down to the underworld;
Will a terrible famine come now, my friend?
A whole day's labour brings a single seer of grain;
How shall we keep ourselves alive on that?
Farewell, my love, I am going to another land."

But the very next moment the dancer sings:

"I took my sweetheart on my lap and went to market;
The people at the stalls asked, 'What relation is he to you?'
'My mother-in-law's boy, my sister-in-law's elder brother;
The husband written for me by fate in a former life.'"

Bipṭā now began whining like a child for jalebis, sweet batāśās and toys.

Just then one of the dancers sang:

"When the night turned towards dawn,
My husband came home.
My hands trembled with excitement; the necklace burned upon my breast;
His lotus hands touched my bosom as I gazed at his moonlike face."

Bipṭā interrupted and asked a chorus member to explain the song. The singer began expounding it openly: how the heroine had been sleeping on straw in her hut when Bipṭā arrived. Let us look among the spectators. Dark, robust young women suppressed smiles, nudged one another, whispered with delight and stared straight at Bipṭā. Middle-aged women pretended to be angry and tried to restrain the girls; but how can suppressed laughter and a heart stirred with amusement ever be controlled?

Meanwhile the dancers burst into a refrain.

"Come, my heart, come, my heart—to my husband's home
We shall go, O Rāma!
For O Rāma, in my parents' house
I shall set a fire ..."

The young women grew restless; an electric current seemed to run through the young men's veins. The performance was nearing its end.

"Come, my heart, come, my heart—
Dhin dhinak dhinak, dhin dhinak dhinak ...
For O Rāma, in my parents' house I shall set a fire ...
Ḍim ḍimik ḍimik, ḍim ḍimik ḍimik ..."

What's this? Why, it is Chethru Gusain! Gusain is a devotee of Kabir. Ten or fifteen years ago he refused to give false testimony at the landlord's request. Enraged, the landlord drove him from his home, and since then he has lived as a renunciant. A khañjarī tambourine, a shoulder bag and tongs, matted hair and a long beard—look! Gusain has begun playing the khañjarī and dancing alongside the performers.

"Ḍim ḍimik ḍimik, ḍim ḍimik ḍimik,
For O Rāma, in my parents' house I shall set a fire ..."

The point is that Chethru Gusain takes this song to be entirely nirguṇa—devotion to the formless absolute.

Ah! Tears gleam in his sunken eyes. And the dance comes to an end.

Vidyāpati's Bidesiyā: Piyā Desāntar—A Parallel World of Maithili Theatre Beyond Bidāpat Dance

Rāmkhelāvan Maṇḍal came from the village of Kaṭghaṭrā, Shivājīnagar block, Samastipur district; Bindeśvar Maṇḍal accompanied him. People still remember the rising Maithili chorus and the song, "Mother, O mother, get me a gun, for I, mother, shall become a soldier!" This troupe staged verse-dramas such as Reshmā–Chūhaṛ, Sīt–Basant, Alhā–Ūdal and Naṭuā Dayāl.

The Piyā Desāntar (Maithili Bidesiyā) company came from Purnia to Supaul, Saharsa, Samastipur and other places. The dramatic piece Hasan–Husan was performed. The Rāmrakṣā Chaudhary Nāṭyakalā Pariṣad, village Gāyghāṭ, Kariyan panchayat, post office Vaidyānāthpur, Samastipur district, staged Vidyāpati as far afield as Gorakhpur. Its other productions included Lauṅgiyā Merachāi, Vidyāpati, Chīnīk Laḍḍū and Basāt.

It is on this basis that the following dramatic conception is presented.

Vidyāpati's Piyā Desāntar (My Beloved in a Distant Land)

Scene 1

Onstage, the bidesiyā—the man departing for a distant country—takes his leave to seek employment, while the young woman sings. A traveller enters during the song. At the other end of the stage, thieves crouch in hiding. At yet another edge, the constable and a man in a spotless white dhoti sit carefree, their hands resting on their bellies.

In the Dhanachī rāga (from the Vidyāpati Padāvalī preserved in Nepal):

> "I am a young woman; my husband has gone abroad. Not even the faintest presence of a neighbour remains nearby."

I am young, and my husband has gone to a distant land. There is not so much as a trace of a neighbour close at hand.

> "Mother-in-law and sister-in-law know nothing at all; their eyes are night-blind, their ears cannot hear."

Neither my mother-in-law nor my sister-in-law understands anything. Their eyes suffer from night-blindness, and they cannot hear with their ears either.

> "Stay awake, traveller; do not go before dawn. The night is dark and the village is full of thieves."

O traveller, shake off sleep. Do not come—or venture forth—before morning. It is a dark night, and there are many thieves in the village.

> "The constable keeps no watch, not even in dreams; even when approached, he will not give the matter thought."

The constable does not stand guard even in his dreams; not even an invitation or appeal moves him to consider the matter.

> "Here the king brings no one peace."

"The men of standing and authority are all of my own community."
"So sings the poet Vidyāpati of this sentiment; through suggestive utterance he discloses its meaning."

The poet Vidyāpati sings of this emotional state, conveying its import through his poetic expression.

The poet Vidyāpati enters. A man in a clean white dhoti and a poor man approach the constable. Judging by outward appearance alone, the constable decides in favour of the white-clad man. At the other corner of the stage, the young woman beats her forehead in anguish. Vidyāpati himself sings the last four lines of the song.

Scene 2

The young woman symbolically opens a shop. From the other side of the stage, her mother-in-law and sister-in-law leave, and a traveller arrives as a customer. The young woman begins singing. After every line Vidyāpati enters, explains its meaning, and fades into darkness. In the final line, however, Vidyāpati sings and the young woman speaks its meaning.

In the Mālava rāga (from the Vidyāpati Padāvalī preserved in Nepal):

"How cool the shade of this tree! Here and there, villages have settled."

The shade beneath this tree is exceedingly cool, and villages have sprung up here and there.

"I am alone; my beloved is abroad; nowhere is there any mention of wicked men."

I am by myself, my beloved is in a foreign land, and no wicked person is spoken of anywhere.

"O traveller, come and rest here."

O traveller, take your rest here.

"Whatever you wish to buy is not costly; everything is available in this place."

Whatever you purchase will not be expensive. Everything can be found here.

"My mother-in-law is not at home; my relations are far away; my sister-in-law is innocent by nature."

My mother-in-law is absent from the house, other relatives are far away, and my sister-in-law is simple-hearted by nature.

"Even so, traveller, if you turn away and go, I shall have no power left."

Despite all this, should you turn away and depart, nothing further will be within my power.

"Vidyāpati says: listen, young woman, you who fulfil another's hope."

Vidyāpati says: O young woman, listen—you are one who fulfils the hopes of others.

Scene 3

Vidyāpati does not appear in this song. The young woman sees her sister-in-law pressing the traveller to leave, and remembers her own beloved who has gone to a distant land. Addressing both her sister-in-law and her female friend, she sings. After every line, her friend explains the meaning.

In the Dhanachī rāga (from the Vidyāpati Padāvalī preserved in Nepal):

> "One living in a foreign land depends on others' kindness. Turn no one away; offer shelter without fail."

In a strange land a person must continually depend upon other people. Therefore no one should be turned away; a place to stay must certainly be offered.

> "Here, friend, understand this much of the beloved's story."

O friend, understand at least this much about the condition of my beloved.

> "Sister-in-law, weigh good and ill within your mind. Do not address the traveller in broken, harsh words."

O sister-in-law, consider what is right and wrong; do not speak discourteously to the traveller.

> "Wash his feet; offer him a seat. Console him with gentle words."

Wash his feet, give him a place to sit, and offer reassurance in a sweet voice.

> "O friend, it would be wrong to send him so far away. Honour him all the more."

O friend, it is improper that the traveller should have to go so far from here; show him still greater regard.

Scene 4

The young woman and her sister-in-law have arrived in a town and found a place to stay. A traveller asks for lodging, and the young woman sings while the sister-in-law explains the meaning after every line. Four lines then sound from offstage, without any accompanying explanation. The young woman resumes singing, and the sister-in-law once more gives the meaning. Finally Vidyāpati enters and sings the last two lines. At the scene's end, the sister-in-law says: "You did not like it when I turned a traveller away that day. Then why did you refuse this traveller a place to stay today?"

In the Kolāra rāga (from the Vidyāpati Padāvalī preserved in Nepal):

> "I am alone; my beloved is not in the village. That is why I hesitate to offer a place for the night."

I am alone and my beloved is not in the village. That is why I am uncertain about asking someone to stay the night.

> "Elsewhere I would gladly have found you lodging; but I can see no one else even in the neighbourhood."

Had somebody been nearby, I could have directed you to another place for lodging.

"Forgive me, traveller; please go your way. Wander through the town and seek lodging elsewhere."

O traveller, forgive me and go. Look for a place to stay somewhere else in town.

"Between us stretches an open wilderness; evening has fallen. Living far from home, take care for what lies ahead."

There is open country in between; it is evening, and a traveller in a foreign place must act with the future in mind.

"My mind breaks apart from moment to moment; how long shall I hide my youth when the god of desire has awakened?"

"Go, go, traveller, please … seek lodging elsewhere as you wander through the town."

"Seven and five houses were prepared; distance opened between us when my beloved departed abroad."

"Twelve years had passed; four years have passed since his departure."

"Black thunderclouds pierce the night: weigh carefully whatever you decide to do."

The clouds are dreadful. This is a matter concerning the night; think carefully before deciding.

"Vidyāpati says: such is the custom of the city—love may arise from words of feigned rebuke."

Vidyāpati says that this is the way of town-dwellers: sharp or contrary words can give rise to affection.

Scene 5

Vidyāpati is absent in this scene as well. A traveller arrives, but, seeing neither the mother-in-law nor the sister-in-law, feels embarrassed about staying and moves on. The young woman sings.

In the Ghanachī rāga (from the Vidyāpati Padāvalī preserved in Nepal):

"My house would suit the thief called Kāma, the god of desire; an old maid keeps watch."

My circumstances are favourable to that thief, the god of love, though an elderly maidservant stands guard.

"Twelve years had passed; four years have gone by since he left."

It was the twelfth year when he went away, and now four years have passed since then.

"Even the traveller seeking lodging feels shame; neither mother-in-law nor sister-in-law is here in company."

Neither mother-in-law nor sister-in-law is present, and the traveller too is ashamed to accept accommodation.

"Seven and five houses were made ready; my beloved travelled afar and separation came between us."

He furnished the home for love and then went to another land; distance grew between us.

> "The neighbouring house seems a hundred yojanas away; every kinsman has gone off in a different direction."

The neighbour's dwelling might as well be a hundred yojanas away, and all our relatives have dispersed here and there.

> "The company of people disappears into the dark; the woman next door has barred her gate."

The gathering vanishes into darkness, and the neighbour has shut the door of her compound.

> "My mind runs away again and again; how long can I conceal its movements when the god of desire is awake?"

My mind races at every instant. Desire has awakened: for how long can I keep my movements concealed?

Scene 6

Here, too, neither the sister-in-law nor the mother-in-law nor Vidyāpati is present. A guest arrives just as rain clouds gather and the downpour begins. The young woman sings.

In the Dhanachī rāga (from the Vidyāpati Padāvalī preserved in Nepal):

> "I was sitting within my own home; no one else was in the house."

I was sitting in my own house, and nobody else was there.

> "Just then a traveller came as a guest, and the heavens began to rain."

At that moment a traveller arrived as my guest, and rain began to pour.

> "Who knows what the spiteful neighbour will say, now that she has an occasion for gossip?"

I do not know what the jealous woman next door will say, now that she has found a chance to speak.

> "Pitch darkness, unbroken rain: even daylight seems to be night."

It has begun to look like night even though it is day.

> "To whom can I tell this? Who will believe me, when the Five-Arrowed One is renowned throughout the world?"

To whom shall I speak, and who will believe me? After all, the fame of Kāma, the god of love who carries five arrows, has spread across the world.

Scene 7

The body of the mother-in-law is carried off from one side of the stage after her death, and darkness falls across the stage. When the lights return, the sister-in-law's husband takes her away to her marital home. The traveller stands in the aisle among the spectators. Gesturing towards the audience, the young woman sings, while Vidyāpati explains the meaning after every line. In the last two lines Vidyāpati speaks both the verse and its explanation, repeating those lines and their meanings several times.

From the Padāvalī edited by Nāgendranāth Gupta:

> "My mother-in-law has died; my sister-in-law too has gone to her husband's home."

My mother-in-law has passed away, and my sister-in-law has also departed for her marital home.

> "No one like them remains, with whom I might pass the waking night in conversation."

There is no one left with whom I can even converse.

> "Such is the custom of this town: no one asks after anyone else."

Such is the conduct here: nobody enquires about anybody.

> "Tell my beloved: how many days must I, a woman alone, remain thus?"

Tell my beloved how long I must go on living alone.

> "Traveller, speak to my husband; how long can the radiance of a passionate woman like me endure?"

Traveller, please tell him: how long will the glow of passion in a woman such as I last?

> "Vidyāpati sings: the woman separated from her beloved wanders and wanders, entreating the traveller."

Vidyāpati sings that the woman, wandering in separation, keeps explaining her plight to the traveller.

As Vidyāpati sings, he staggers slightly. Darkness begins to spread, and a figure can be seen dimly approaching the young woman out of the shadows. Could this be the beloved who went away? Yes—or perhaps not!

Piyā Desāntar ends, and the curtain falls amid music.

This conception of Piyā Desāntar is offered to discerning audiences. Amid the present distress of Maithils who have gone away in search of work, it is respectfully dedicated to the great poet Vidyāpati.

(Vidyāpati's verses are taken from the Vidyāpati Padāvalī edited by Nāgendranāth Gupta.)

95. "Love's Vow, or Victory to Śruvavatī!": Female Agency and Inner Strength

Abstract

The first dramatic piece in the Love Tetralogy, Love's Vow, or Victory to Śruvavatī!, marks a new turn in Kunal's playwriting. Radically different from the expansive, many-character, song-and-dance-rich world of the Folk-Theatre Trilogy, this short play is economical, incisive and centred on ideas.

Keywords: Śruvavatī; female agency; inner strength; feminist reading; existentialism; mythological reinterpretation.

1. Introduction, Dramatic Architecture and the Central Question

The first play in the Love Tetralogy, Love's Vow, or Victory to Śruvavatī!, represents a new turning point in Kunal's dramatic writing. Unlike the Folk-Theatre Trilogy, with its multitude of characters and its profusion of songs and dances, this play is restrained, sharp and driven by thought. The stage directions themselves specify "a three-level stage; its levels are used at times as platforms, at others as stairs." There are only four performers—two actors and two actresses—who undertake several roles: Bhāradvāja, the old man, Vasiṣṭha and Indra may be played by the same one or two actors, while Śruvavatī, her friend and other women are played by one or two actresses.

The source is a Purāṇic narrative about Śruvavatī, daughter of the sage Bhāradvāja, who is mentioned in several mythological contexts. But Kunal's Śruvavatī goes far beyond the conventional story. She does not reject the established role of a "marriageable daughter"; rather, she insists on defining the conditions of marriage herself: "As soon as someone becomes meaningful to me, I shall marry!" This demand that the prospective partner should become "meaningful" is the play's central philosophical and dramatic question.

The drama unfolds in five movements: (1) Śruvavatī declares before Bhāradvāja that she is "free and self-reliant"; (2) on the riverbank she experiences love on seeing Indra's shadow; (3) Indra appears in person and proposes that she come to heaven "after death," a condition she refuses; (4) Indra, disguised as an old man or as Vasiṣṭha, tests her with a miraculous fruit, which turns to stone; and (5) Śruvavatī resolves to enter the funeral pyre, Indra accepts her, and the play closes with a couplet by Duṣyant Kumar.

2. Indian Dramatic Theory

2.1 The Classical Form of the One-Act Dramatic Piece and the Division into Acts

Bharata's Nāṭyaśāstra distinguishes dramatic forms according to their extent and structure. Within the Daśarūpaka tradition, the nāṭikā is a relatively short form: ordinarily with fewer than four acts, a single central love story, a predominant heroine and an admixture of pathos. The word urf ("also called") in the title brings together an elite classical tradition and a popular idiom: Prem-Pratijñā ("Love's Vow") has a classical resonance, while Śruvavatīk Jay! ("Victory to Śruvavatī!") sounds like a popular acclamation.

The three-tiered stage is a modern transformation of the Nāṭyaśāstra conception of the raṅgamaṇḍapa, or theatrical space. In the interpretation offered here, Bharata's stage has three parts: the raṅgaśīrṣa above, the raṅgapīṭha in the middle and the nepathya behind the scenes. Kunal reinterprets this spatial division: at the upper level stands a male announcer or sūtradhāra; the middle level carries the principal scenes; and the lower level signifies the natural world of trees, plants and riverbank.

2.2 The Theory of Rasa: Three Forms of Śṛṅgāra Together

Three forms of the erotic or love rasa, śṛṅgāra, appear together in this play: (a) saṃyoga-śṛṅgāra, love in union or anticipated union, evoked by attraction and the sight of a shadow on the riverbank; (b) viyoga-śṛṅgāra, love in separation, expressed by Indra's repeated refusals and the pain of Śruvavatī's waiting; and (c) devotional śṛṅgāra, in the stringing of a garland "to place around the neck of the deity of my heart." Bharata identifies rati, love, as the enduring emotional disposition (sthāyibhāva) of śṛṅgāra. The reading pursued here also speaks of parama-rati, a love beyond the senses, as its highest state. Śruvavatī becomes the embodiment of that supreme love.

Karuna-rasa, the sentiment of pathos, likewise has a distinctive presence: "What use is a heart that carries no remembrance of the beloved?" This expresses not simple grief but a philosophical sorrow in which the value of life itself is questioned. Abhinavagupta's śānta-rasa, the mood of tranquil acceptance beyond all worldly relations, is read into the concluding scene.

2.3 Dharmaśāstra and Women's Freedom: A Political Reading of the Play

A familiar passage from the Manusmṛti—"The father protects her in childhood, the husband in youth"—distributes the obligation to "protect" a woman among father, husband and son. Bhāradvāja upholds this convention: "A woman should live with her brother, father or husband." Śruvavatī challenges the Dharmaśāstric norm with a question: "Why? Can I not protect and look after myself, Father?"

The cultural significance of her question is extraordinary. It concerns more than personal independence: it is a dramatic challenge to a Dharmaśāstric rule from within the Maithili tradition of mythological theatre. Bhāradvāja's final response—"Remain happy, whether as a housewife or as an ascetic"—shows that he too finally accepts her right to decide for herself. At that dramatic moment the patriarchal structure yields ground. It is a further development in the sequence of women-centred figures in Indian drama and thought—Maitreyī, Gārgī and Śakuntalā.

2.4 A Vakrokti Reading: The Multiple Resonances of "Meaningful"

Read through Kuntaka's theory of vakrokti and Ānandavardhana's theory of dhvani, the word arthavān ("meaningful") becomes the most important word in the play. In its direct or denotative sense (abhidhā), it means "important" or "useful"; by secondary indication (lakṣaṇā), it means "one who leads a life of significance"; and through suggestion (vyañjanā), it means "one who gives meaning to my existence." The third meaning is the philosophical soul of the drama. Śruvavatī is seeking neither beauty nor wealth nor martial prowess as an external criterion, but an inward relationship of meaning.

The obliqueness, or vakrokti, of the word lies in this reversal: Indra, king of the gods, all-powerful, married many times and sovereign of heaven, fails the test of becoming "meaningful" to a sage's daughter. Only in the scene at the pyre does he finally establish himself as meaningful. The inverted trial combines poetic indirection with irony.

3. Western Dramatic Theory

3.1 Simone de Beauvoir: The Second Sex and Female Agency

The French feminist philosopher Simone de Beauvoir (1908–1986), in The Second Sex (Le Deuxième Sexe, 1949), wrote that "one is not born, but rather becomes, a woman." She argued that women's otherness is a social and cultural construction.

Śruvavatī's characterization offers a mythological dramatic illustration of this proposition. Her father's guardianship, a marriage proposal from a royal household and Indra's offer of heaven "after death" are all attempts to make her an object. She refuses each attempt and asserts herself as an acting subject. Her final words—"I had accepted you all along, beloved! You yourself say it!"—mark the culmination of that agency. The victory belongs to her.

3.2 Sartre: Existentialism and the Making of Meaning

The French philosopher Jean-Paul Sartre (1905–1980) expressed a central claim of existentialism in the proposition "existence precedes essence." Human beings do not arrive at birth endowed with a predetermined essence; through free decisions they define themselves.

Śruvavatī's outlook is a mythological-dramatic counterpart to Sartrean existentialism. Being the daughter of a sage is an inherited "essence"; becoming an independent, self-reliant person is her self-fashioned "existence." Her words—"You yourself said that exceptions confirm the rule. Let me be the exception, Father!"—give the idea of Sartre's "radical freedom" a Maithili expression.

Sartre used mauvaise foi, or "bad faith," for the condition in which a person denies freedom and seeks refuge in convention and commands. Indra's attempts at disguise—as an old man and as Vasiṣṭha—become a divine version of such bad faith: the king of heaven conceals his true identity in order to administer a test. Śruvavatī pierces every disguise: "I was already married the moment I gave him a place in my heart."

3.3 Bakhtin: Polyphonic Drama and Dialogism

In his theory of dialogism, Mikhail Bakhtin argued that language is inherently many-voiced or polyphonic: several voices reverberate within each word. The most striking instance of dialogism in this play is the Urdu couplet at its close.

The celebrated couplet of Duṣyant Kumar (1931–1975) asks: "Who says the sky cannot be pierced? / Throw a stone with all your strength, my friends." It surfaces unexpectedly at the close of a Maithili mythological play. In this many-voiced ending, three linguistic and cultural traditions meet in a single moment: Maithili mythological storytelling, Hindi–Urdu poetry, and modern political consciousness, for the breach in the sky signifies making the impossible possible. It is a distinctive dramatic instance of Bakhtinian heteroglossia, the encounter of different social languages.

3.4 Peter Brook: The Empty Stage and Theatrical Economy

In The Empty Space (1968), the British director Peter Brook (1925–2022) proposed that one person crossing an empty space while another watches can be enough to create an act of theatre. His notion of "Holy Theatre" places an emphasis, in the present reading, on the reduction of visual paraphernalia so that the spectator's imagination may become active.

The three-tiered, largely empty stage of this play becomes a specifically Maithili mythological version of Brook's "empty space." The direction that levels may function sometimes as platforms and sometimes as stairs refers not to elaborate scenery but to the possibilities of spatial transformation. Indra's disappearance and reappearance, the fruit turning to stone, and the building of the pyre are created through changes in light and the actions of performers, not through heavy stage apparatus. This reading connects Brook's "Holy Theatre" with the awakening of the spectator's self-awareness.

4. Chinese Dramatic Theory

4.1 Yuanfen: Fate-Bound Love and Śruvavatī's Challenge

In Chinese cultural and philosophical traditions, yuanfen, a relationship of destiny or fate-bound love, is an important concept: a preordained, almost divine thread joining two souls. In Chinese poetic drama, the fulfilment of this destined connection is often made the aim of the plot.

Yuanfen enters the relationship between Śruvavatī and Indra in a complicated way. She calls Indra "the god of my heart" and strings a garland for him: in these actions she acknowledges the bond. But she rejects Indra's condition that their union must take place "after death," thereby redefining it. In effect she asserts that destiny may provide the bond, but she herself will determine its timing and terms. This is a subtle expression of female agency.

4.2 Kaoyan: The Dramatic Tradition of the Trial

Kaoyan, a test or trial, is an important dramatic device in classical Chinese theatre. Many folktales and plays require lovers to establish their fidelity through extraordinary ordeals. A test of constancy also stands at the centre of dramatisations of the well-known Liang Zhu, or Butterfly Lovers, narrative.

In Kunal's play the structure of kaoyan is reversed. Ordinarily the hero's fidelity is examined; here the heroine is initially the one tested, through Indra's seemingly miraculous fruit. But the examiner becomes the examined when Śruvavatī's resolution to enter the pyre unsettles Indra himself. This reversal contributes to the play's originality: the person administering the test is subjected to a test in turn.

4.3 Yizhi: Moral Will and Neo-Confucian Ethics

Neo-Confucian thinkers, especially Wang Yangming (1472–1529), emphasized yizhi, moral volition, and zhi liangzhi, the extension or realization of innate moral knowledge. They held that human beings possess moral knowledge within themselves, rather than receiving it solely through external imposition.

In this Yangmingian sense, Śruvavatī is a character endowed with yizhi. Her insistence on a meaningful partner, her declaration to the disguised Indra that she belongs to another, and her resolution at the pyre are moral decisions that arise from within rather than from lessons imposed from outside. The dramatist's message—"Inner strength is a human being's greatest wealth"—has a striking affinity with the philosophy of Wang Yangming.

4.4 Beiju: Chinese Tragedy and the Play's "Victory"

Chinese dramatic criticism has debated whether Chinese theatre possesses "tragedy," or beiju, in the Western sense. Wang Guowei argued that classical Chinese plays present distressing circumstances but often end through reconciliation or accommodation. The account cited here characterizes this partial tragedy as a sorrowful quest.

The word "Victory!" in the title establishes that this is not simply beiju, but a form of bei zhong you xi, joy within sorrow. The transformation of the fruit into stone and the resolve to enter the pyre are painful; Indra's acceptance and the proclamation of victory bring reconciliation. What matters most, however, is that Śruvavatī, not Indra, is the heroine of the victory. This is a significant reversal.

5. Israeli Dramatic Theory

5.1 Hanoch Levin: The Dramatic Defence of Human Dignity

The Israeli dramatist Hanoch Levin (1943–1999), among the country's most important playwrights, repeatedly confronted the question of what social arrangements threaten human dignity and how that dignity might be defended. In plays such as The Labour of Life, women characters often struggle to protect their identity against social and familial pressures.

Śruvavatī's predicament resembles that of Levin's women characters but differs from it in an essential respect. Levin's women often fail: the system overwhelms them. Śruvavatī is victorious. For this critic, the difference reflects Kunal's optimistic humanism. Instead of Levin's severe realism, Kunal offers an Indian mythological hope in which inner strength eventually prevails.

5.2 Eli Rozik: Multiple Roles and the Iconicity of Changing Identity

Eli Rozik's theory of theatrical iconicity faces a particular test in this play's practice of multi-role performance. A single actor may embody Bhāradvāja, the old man, Vasiṣṭha and Indra.

Rozik's question is: when one performer plays several roles, which "image" does the audience see? His argument, as invoked here, is that the spectator apprehends two images at once—that of the actor and that of the character—and that this double perception is fundamental to the special beauty of theatre. In this play "double iconicity" acquires an additional political meaning. Indra tests Śruvavatī first disguised as an old man and then as Vasiṣṭha, while the audience knows that he is Indra. The resulting dramatic irony makes Śruvavatī's capacity to recognize truth shine still more brightly.

5.3 Post-Holocaust Dramatic Thought: Fire and Existence

In post-Holocaust discussions of theatre associated here with the Israeli scholar Dvora Ben-Shaul and others, fire becomes an intensely charged symbol: it may encompass destruction and survival at the same time.

Read in this light, Śruvavatī's scene at the funeral pyre forms a complex dramatic image. Entering the flames evokes satī, an institution associated with patriarchy in Indian history. Kunal reverses the symbol: Śruvavatī's pyre expresses not simply a wish to die but a demand to live on her own terms. She lights the fire herself and declares: "Remembering my beloved, I shall enter the flames." The division she posits is between living with love and being unable to live without it, not merely between life and its rejection. Within the proposed Israeli interpretive framework of a "politics of survival," Śruvavatī acts as a witness, turning her very existence into evidence.

5.4 Yaakov Shabtai: The Closing Urdu Couplet and Intercultural Dialogue

The Israeli writer Yaakov Shabtai (1934–1981), in works such as Past Continuous, made language a central aesthetic instrument. In the comparative account offered here, the interaction of Hebrew, Yiddish and Arabic expresses a culturally hybrid world.

The Urdu couplet closing Kunal's Maithili play parallels this intercultural conversation. Maithili, mythological reference and the Urdu poetic tradition meet in a conjunction that is not mere ornament but a cultural and political statement: inner strength does not recognize linguistic borders, and its message can be expressed as authentically in Urdu as in Maithili. Duṣyant Kumar's invitation to fling a stone at the sky becomes an Urdu restatement of Śruvavatī's resolution at the pyre.

6. A Fourfold Synthesis: The Many Meanings of "Victory"

When all four dramatic traditions are considered together, the central question of Love's Vow, or Victory to Śruvavatī! becomes clear: whose victory is this, and what kind of victory is it?

From the Indian perspective: the three kinds of śṛṅgāra; the dramatic overturning of Dharmaśāstric expectations about women; the threefold suggestiveness of arthavān; and the pyre reinterpreted through the tradition of devotion.

From the Western perspective: becoming a "subject" in Beauvoir's sense; Sartre's radical freedom; Bakhtin's heteroglossia in the Urdu couplet; and Brook's Holy Theatre, represented through an almost empty stage.

From the Chinese perspective: redefining yuanfen; a reversed kaoyan; Wang Yangming's yizhi understood as inner moral strength; and the celebratory resolution of joy within sorrow, bei zhong you xi.

From the Israeli perspective: the contrast between Levin's female characters and Kunal's hopeful vision of inner strength; Rozik's double iconicity; fire as the politics of survival; and Shabtai's intercultural dialogue.

The shared conclusion of these four traditions is that Śruvavatī's "victory" is not an individual conquest in love. It is a philosophical victory for ātmabala, inner strength—conceived in the Indian context as courage, in the Western context as freedom, in the Chinese context as yizhi, and in the Israeli context as dignity. The exclamation mark in the title says as much: this is a proclamation, not a mere description.

Supplementary Narrative Analysis

This play in the collection draws upon narratives from the Śalya Parva and Vana Parva of the Mahābhārata. Through the character of Śruvavatī, the daughter of the sage Bhāradvāja, Kunal gives voice to a woman's sovereignty and right to self-determination.

Determined to marry Indra, king of the gods, Śruvavatī undertakes severe austerities. Indra appears in the guise of the sage Vasiṣṭha and tests her fidelity, commanding her to keep cooking jujube fruits. When the fuel is exhausted, Śruvavatī does not shrink even from burning her own feet in the sacrificial fire. Witnessing her extraordinary bodily suffering and unshaken resolve, Indra is overcome and accepts her as his consort. In this play, Kunal accords the woman dignity onstage not as a petitioner but as the maker of her own destiny.

Mother Tongue

I have read and heard a great deal about love for one's mother tongue. You, too, must have heard of it, perhaps many times; but only a few people have had the opportunity to experience it themselves. We had come to Bombay. More than a generation has passed since the events I am about to recount, but I cannot bring myself to forget them. And why should I forget? We were lost in the dazzling lights of the metropolis, anxious not to lose our way. During the 1980s a scheme introduced by Sanjay Gandhi offered unemployed graduates bank loans of 20,000 rupees on certain concessions. I, too, was an unemployed doctor. I applied and the loan was sanctioned immediately. But what should I do with the money now? I could have invested in my own profession—in a dispensary, for instance, or a small house where I might later establish a clinic. Such things were comparatively accessible and possible then; today they would remain dreams at that price. I could have invested the money to secure my future, had jewellery made to satisfy my personal wishes, or travelled around India. But no! My husband, Dr Manikant Mishra, wished to bring out a Maithili-language magazine. Together we started a Maithili periodical called Videha. It was printed, but who would buy it, and who would read it? That was a very serious problem. Somehow, investing our household savings, we kept the magazine running for two years. Then we had to close it. Both of us were engaged in medical practice, and it was exceedingly difficult to manage the demands of home, hospital and family. We were still newcomers to Bombay. In those circumstances, no ordinary person could have ventured so boldly. Only Dr Manikant Mishra could have done so, for his attachment to Maithili was a passion. Neither the frantic pace of life in Bombay nor the ups and downs of his health could diminish his enthusiasm for his language.

A Literary Event

Let me describe a literary event. It occurred in the modern period of Tamil literature.

The mainstream summoned scholars from around the world, arranged programme after programme, and publicised them lavishly. Writers of enormous stature—eighty arms tall, as it were—were invited; one glittering programme followed another; radio and television carried the publicity. The mainstream scattered money like confetti. Its first-rate programme came to an end.

And what did the parallel stream do? It brought out an anthology of contemporary alternative prose and poetry titled Kurukshetram. Printed on ordinary paper with an unpretentious design, this Kurukshetram shook Tamil literature. A debate began: of two literary events held at the same time, which had benefited Tamil literature more—the extravagantly funded world, or perhaps cosmic, conference on Tamil literature, or Kurukshetram?

The majority agreed that Kurukshetram, printed on plain paper with a simple design, was the greater event.

Videha's special issues devoted to living writers have become Maithili literature's Kurukshetram. During debates on Facebook, writers acknowledged that Videha's special issues on living authors had acquired greater importance than the Sahitya Akademi awards. In the Sahitya Akademi, through which lakhs upon lakhs of rupees circulate, the lamentation has not subsided. The mainstream has become tangled in its own web: those who secured assignments now strain after awards, those who secured awards strain after assignments, and those who received neither demand both. The condition of those who have received both is worst of all. They receive no particular respect even from the Akademi, and their writing is not of a quality that could stand before the parallel stream. If there are exceptions, some have sunk into depression, while others have begun declaring themselves marginalised, or members of the alternative stream.

In other words, declaring oneself marginalised, or claiming allegiance to the alternative stream while remaining in the mainstream—whose immense, eighty-arm-tall writers come from both the forward and backward communities—has become fashionable. But this is no mere fashion …

97. "The Power of Faith, or Sukanya's Marriage": Faith, Recognition and Transformation

Abstract

This review of the Sukanya–Chyavana narrative places questions of faith, vision, identity, appearance and spirit, marital fidelity, and moral agency at its centre. Comparative threads drawn from Indian philosophy, recognition, psychological identity, the heart's vision, transformation, and Jewish-Israeli conceptions of intimacy expand the play's structure of meaning.

Keywords: Sukanya; Chyavana; faith; identity; recognition; vision of the heart; transformation

1. Introduction, Dramatic Architecture and Distinctiveness

The second short play in the Love Quartet, The Power of Faith, or Sukanya's Marriage, is based on the Sukanya–Chyavana episode in the Shanti Parva of the Mahabharata. Kunal, however, rewrites this traditional tale from a new feminist-philosophical perspective. Its naming is significant: "The Power of Faith" identifies the governing idea, while "Sukanya's Marriage" names the event of the story.

The play's architecture is exceptionally well organised. Its five dramatic sequences are: (1) the spring festival—the narrator, Vidyapati's "Ayal Ritupati Raj Basant" ("The Lord of Seasons, Spring, Has Arrived"), and the contrasting philosophies of king and queen; (2) Chyavana's anthill-covered meditation and Sukanya's accidental injury to him while playing; (3) Chyavana's forgiveness and proposal of marriage, the king's uncertainty, and Sukanya's freely given consent; (4) life in the hermitage and the Ashvini Kumaras' deceptive test, involving three identical forms; and (5) Sukanya's test of the eyes, Chyavana's rejuvenation, the granting of soma, and the conclusion.

The play's central dramatic question is: what is faith? Does it arise from the eyes or from the heart? When three identical figures stand before a woman, by what means does she recognise her husband—through the body or through the soul? The dramatic answer—"Affection, envy, compassion: they surge within these eyes"—constitutes the ideological climax of the play.

2. Indian Dramatic Theory

2.1 The Mahabharata Source and Its Re-reading: The Politics of Dramatisation

In the Sukanya–Chyavana episode of the Mahabharata's Shanti Parva, Sukanya is an obedient daughter who marries the elderly Chyavana at her father's command. In place of this "obedient daughter", Kunal presents a woman capable of choosing for herself. In the Mahabharata the marriage is her father's decision; in this play Sukanya herself declares, "The offence is mine; I shall make amends," and voluntarily becomes Chyavana's wife.

Such "epic rewriting" belongs to an established tradition in Indian women's writing: retellings of the original epics from the perspectives of Urmila in the Ramayana, Draupadi in the Mahabharata, and others. As a male author, Kunal demonstrates a conscious engagement with that tradition.

2.2 The Theory of Rasa: Three Phases of Shringara and the Triumph of Wonder

The movement of shringara-rasa in this play assumes a distinctive dramatic outline: (a) the opening spring song, Vidyapati's "Ayal Ritupati Raj Basant", provides an elevated poetic entrance into the erotic-aesthetic mood; (b) the piercing of the anthill brings compassion and fear—the accidental wound inflicted during Sukanya's play, Chyavana's anger, and her guilt; and (c) the life of the hermitage brings a shringara of trust, as Sukanya, dressed in bark-cloth, says, "I live like an ascetic; I was happy then, and I am happy now."

The culminating moment of adbhuta-rasa, the sentiment of wonder, is the Ashvini test: three identical forms. It exemplifies a special variety of the Natya Shastra's adbhuta—"pleasant wonder". Bharata identifies exertion, joy, envy, despondency, and restlessness among the transitory states of wonder; all are present in this scene.

2.3 The Test of the Eyes: The Significance of Vision in Indian Philosophy

In Indian philosophical traditions, the eye (netra or nayana) is important in several senses: as an organ of direct perception, a "mirror" of the soul, and a medium of union. "Reading the heart through the eyes" has a long poetic history; communication through the eyes is prominent in Vidyapati's songs as well.

In the trial involving "three identical forms", Sukanya's certainty arises from sight—but not from outward sight. It comes from inward vision.

> Affection, envy, compassion—these surge within the eyes. Passion, tenderness, delight—these dwell within the eyes.

From the standpoint of Nyaya philosophy, this is "indicative perception": recognition through inner qualities in the absence of distinctive outward appearance. In the vocabulary of Navya-Nyaya, the mark or reason (linga/hetu) establishes the object to be proved (sadhya). Sukanya perceives the "mark" of affection and compassion in the eyes and thereby establishes the identity of "Chyavana" as the conclusion.

2.4 The Chyavanprash Episode: Popular Memory and Dramatic Humour

At the beginning of the play the narrator makes an amusing remark: "Chyavana—the one associated with Chyavanprash? Well … no … let us say … yes, that very one." In this single line Kunal compresses an interval of two thousand years into a comic dramatic instant. The sage Chyavana was renowned for medicinal knowledge; the modern heir to that tradition is the product called Chyavanprash. This is an excellent modern example of the Indian dramatic convention of vidushaka-ukti, the jester's intervention, in which humour and satire enter the solemnity of mythology.

3. Western Dramatic Theory

3.1 Martin Buber: I–Thou and I–It Relationships

The German-Jewish philosopher Martin Buber (1878–1965), in Ich und Du (I and Thou, 1923), distinguished two kinds of human relationships: I–Thou, in which the other person is recognised as a complete "Thou", a subject; and I–It, in which the other is treated as an object.

In this play the Ashvini Kumaras represent I–It: they seek to reduce Sukanya to a beautiful object ("You see only the body, you speak only of the body"). The relationship between Chyavana and Sukanya embodies I–Thou. Chyavana says, "You enter through the gateway of the eyes and see the heart." This is a dramatic transformation of Buber's Begegnung, the genuine encounter. The reversed direction of the Ashvini test—Sukanya reading the soul through the eyes—is precisely the method of recognition associated here with I–Thou.

3.2 Aristotle: A New Form of Anagnorisis

In Aristotle's Poetics, recognition (ἀναγνώρισις, anagnorisis) is a decisive dramatic moment in which a character discovers an important identity. The finest recognition occurs together with a reversal in the course of the action (peripeteia).

The scene of the three matching faces gives recognition an innovative form: Sukanya identifies her husband among three identical figures. Aristotelian recognition often involves an external sign—a scar, ring, or name. Here Sukanya recognises him by "reading inward qualities": affection, compassion, and tenderness. This "internal anagnorisis" extends the Aristotelian category.

3.3 Erik Erikson: Identity Crisis and the Development of Trust

The American psychologist Erik Erikson (1902–1994) proposed eight stages of human development. The first is "Basic Trust versus Mistrust", and the formation of this fundamental trust provides the basis for the subsequent development of personality.

Sukanya's trust is a mythological-dramatic transformation of Erikson's "basic trust". She comes from a family in which she has heard both the father's philosophy—"Be happy, everything will turn out well", the king's generous optimism—and the mother's—"Do not turn your eyes away from reality", the queen's cautious realism. Beyond both viewpoints, Sukanya constructs her own fundamental trust. Her guilt over piercing the anthill, her freely chosen marriage, and her steadfastness during the Ashvini test together constitute a dramatic journey of "trust formation".

3.4 Brecht: The Politics of Humour and the Irony of the "Demigods"

In Brechtian dramaturgy, comic scenes often carry political satire. From this perspective the Ashvini Kumaras' scene is extraordinary. These "demigods"—inhabitants of heaven, companions of celestial nymphs, and beings called gods—find themselves defeated before a princess living in a forest and wearing bark-cloth.

In terms of Brecht's Gestus, a socially revealing gesture or attitude, the scene amounts to a "class critique": privileged deities cannot comprehend the "human values" lived by an ordinary mortal woman. Sukanya's retort —"You people have no hearts"—is the decisive Brechtian moral-political judgement.

4. Chinese Dramatic Theory

4.1 心眼 (Xin Yan): The Heart's Eye

In Chinese poetics and Buddhist philosophy, xin yan (心眼, the "heart-eye") is an important concept: the inward vision that perceives inner truth beyond outward form. In the Chan Buddhist (禅) tradition, xin yan is treated as a form of the "Dharma-eye".

The central test of the play—recognising her husband among three identical figures—is an exercise in xin yan. Closing her outward eyes ("Sukanya closes her eyes"), she reads the inner qualities revealed by each pair of eyes: pride and arrogance (the first Ashvini), desire, malice and greed (the second Ashvini), and affection, compassion and joy (Chyavana). This is a remarkable dramatic instance of the heart's eye.

4.2 缘 (Yuan): Karmic Connection and the Possibility of Atonement

In Chinese Buddhist-philosophical tradition, yuan (缘, karmic connection) is a central idea: the meeting of two beings is the outcome of previous actions. In this view the karmic connection is not simply a debt contracted in a previous birth; it is also created by choices made in the present moment.

Sukanya's piercing of the anthill is an unintended act: "I did not wish to do it; it happened." But her response—"I am guilty; I deserve punishment"—constitutes a conscious "yuan of atonement", an attempt at karmic rectification. Chyavana's proposal of marriage is the outcome of this connection. In Chinese poetic drama, such a resolution of karma forms an important dramatic arc.

4.3 形神 (Xing–Shen): The Conflict between Form and Spirit

In Chinese aesthetics, the relationship and tension between xing and shen (形神, form and spirit) is a major subject of discussion. Xing (形) denotes outward form; shen (神), inward being. A principle cited in the theory of Chinese painting is rendered here as de qi xing si shen (得其形似神), the attempt to capture spirit through form.

In the play's scene of the three masks, xing, the outward appearance, is identical, whereas shen, the inward spirit, differs. Sukanya's faith is the power to perceive shen beyond xing. The Ashvini Kumaras fail because they can imitate xing but not shen: precisely the distinction emphasised by the Chinese formulation.

4.4 义务 (Yiwu): The Sense of Duty and Sukanya's Moral Development

In the Confucian philosophical tradition, yiwu (义务, moral obligation) is a central value. It is not merely obedience to external rules. According to Mengzi (孟子, Mencius), moral duty arises from an intrinsic disposition towards ren (仁, benevolence and humanity).

Sukanya's dramatic journey reveals a particular sequence of moral obligation: (a) an unintended act, the piercing of the anthill; (b) a recognition of duty through an admission of guilt; (c) a moral decision in her freely chosen marriage; and (d) the manifestation of ren through forgiveness of the Ashvini Kumaras and love for Chyavana. It is a Mencian arc of moral development.

5. Israeli Dramatic Theory

5.1 Martin Buber and Israeli Intimacy: The Hasidic Philosophy of Faith

Martin Buber, whose I–Thou philosophy has been discussed in the Western section, is also an important figure in the intellectual traditions of Israeli culture. He was a philosopher of the Hasidic Jewish tradition, in which faith (emunah, אמונה) is a central spiritual and moral value.

In Buber's Hasidic philosophy, faith is not merely intellectual assent. It is a form of surrender or devotion (Hingabe), a turning towards the other with one's entire being. Sukanya's faith is a Hindu-mythological counterpart of this Hasidic emunah: she recognises Chyavana not by calculation but with her whole heart. The title The Power of Faith and Buber's concept of emunah describe the same spiritual journey.

5.2 Eli Rozik: The Iconicity of the Mask and the Crisis of Identity

Eli Rozik's theory of theatrical iconicity faces an unusual test in this play: three seemingly identical performers, with the same clothing, appearance and language. Rozik's question is: "When the image cannot be separated from its referent, what is the spectator seeing?"

The audience perceives three levels at once: (a) the physical presence of three actors; (b) three fictional figures—Chyavana and the elder and younger Ashvini brothers; and (c) Sukanya's "reading of the heart", which distinguishes the referent of each image. In Rozik's terminology, this is a complex instance of "iconic ambiguity", in which the crisis of recognition becomes the very subject of the drama.

5.3 The Jewish Concept of Tikkun Olam and the Drama of Atonement

In Jewish religious philosophy, tikkun olam, the repair or improvement of the world, is an important concept. It holds that human beings have an ethical obligation to mend the world through their actions. At the individual level such tikkun, or repair, begins with teshuva, repentance and transformation.

Sukanya's conduct is presented as a Hindu-mythological analogue of this philosophy of tikkun. She acknowledges the shever (שבר, brokenness) caused by piercing the anthill, undertakes teshuva in the form of confessed repentance, and effects a tikkun in her life by becoming Chyavana's wife. The conclusion of the play—"A fragrant rain of affection continued to flow"—marks the completion of that repair.

5.4 Purim Spiel in Israeli Folk Theatre: Comic Irony

Within Israeli folk-theatrical traditions, the Purim Spiel, or Purim play, is a distinctive form in which traditional narratives receive a humorous and satirical treatment. It allows striking reversals of character and rank, changes of costume, and comic presentations of serious matters.

The Ashvini Kumaras episode is a Hindu-mythological version of this Purim-Spiel mode. The demigods are beings of supposedly elevated status, yet in this scene they become ridiculous, unsuccessful, and exposed to irony. Sukanya's threat—"A man in front and a goat behind"—is a carnival-like inversion reminiscent of the Purim Spiel. Humour and satire directed at otherwise solemn divine figures enliven the action.

6. Fourfold Synthesis: What Is "The Power of Faith"?

Considered together, the four dramatic traditions produce a multidimensional answer to the play's central question.

The Indian perspective: epic rewriting through a freely chosen marriage; shringara, wonder and compassion; the Navya-Nyaya relation between sign and what is established, through the reading of qualities in the eyes; and the jester-like Chyavanprash reference.

The Western perspective: Buber's I–Thou, the relationship of hearts as opposed to objectification; Aristotle's inward recognition; Erikson's formation of trust; and Brechtian class critique, in which demigods are set against the human heart.

The Chinese perspective: xin yan, or vision of the heart; yuan, or karmic connection and atonement; xing–shen, or form versus spirit; and yiwu, the Mencian arc of moral responsibility.

The Israeli perspective: Buber's Hasidic emunah, faith of the whole heart; Rozik's iconic ambiguity; tikkun olam, world repair as a movement from the piercing of the anthill to marriage; and the carnival-like Purim Spiel of the Ashvini episode.

The shared conclusion of the four traditions is that "the power of faith" is not the power of the body or of outward appearance; it is the power of the heart. The play's finest dramatic moment occurs when Sukanya closes her eyes and, among three identical figures, recognises her husband through the eyes that disclose affection and compassion. From the Indian, Western, Chinese and Israeli dramatic perspectives alike, this is a moment of illumination.

Chyavana's final words—"It could not have happened ... I know you, beloved. You enter through the gateway of the eyes and see the heart"—also provide the closing sentence of this fourfold critical reading.

Supplementary Analysis of Faith

This play recounts the mythological marriage of Sukanya and the aged, blind sage Chyavana. Traditionally, Sukanya has been revered primarily as a devoted wife, but Kunal gives precedence to the psychological power of "faith" in this narrative.

When the divine physicians, the twin Ashvini Kumaras, see Sukanya's beauty and attempt to woo her, she defeats their advances through her fidelity. During Chyavana's rejuvenation, all three—Chyavana and the two Ashvini Kumaras—emerge from the water in the same form. Sukanya uses the "inner eye of faith" to recognise her true husband. In this way the play proclaims the triumph of psychological and intellectual affinity over physical attraction.

98. Kedarnath Chaudhary's Abara Nahitan

Abstract

Kedarnath Chaudhary: A Re-reading of the Author and His Novel. After failing the matriculation examination, he resolved to end his life by leaping from the conveniently situated Ekmi Bridge into the Bagmati's furious current. Even the aroma of jalebis and kachauris fried in pure desi ghee could not dissuade him. He did, however, decide to eat a helping of jalebis and kachauris before killing himself. He would eat at the restaurant, go to Ekmi Bridge, and that would be the end of it.

A Dream

I slept one afternoon and had a dream:
I was married, O sister-in-law, to a bride as lovely as the moon.
My dream was shattered, O sister-in-law, in the bright afternoon ...

When I met her, I was delighted;
At the sight of her beauty, sister-in-law, I stood astonished.
I asked her name; she told me it was Rajni.
That beauty of my dreams became the queen of my heart.

She asked me, "Tell me, beloved, how do I look to you?"
I replied, "Listen, darling, you look like the moon.
The moon has blemishes, but you are without a blemish.
Your eyes are like Aishwarya's; your nose like Juhi Chawla's;
Your hair resembles Neelam's, your cheeks Vyjayanthimala's."

After that I asked her, "And how do I look to you?"
She answered, "Not very good; but you are all right, I suppose.
Yet why, beloved, are you so bald* at this youthful age?
You look a little like Sunny, a little like Rahul Roy;
You have a few of Govinda's qualities—that is my opinion."

Then I said, "Come, darling, let us go sightseeing in Darbhanga.
I shall buy a sari for you and an anga for myself.
I have two tickets for Uma Cinema, seats side by side;
Together we shall watch Mamta Gabay Geet."
I took her hand in mine and rose to depart;

99. "The Expansion of Love, or Shweta's Discovery": Art, Freedom, and Love

Abstract

Taking the conflict between Shweta and Atirath as its centre, this chapter analyses art, love, freedom, detachment, nature, transformation, and the relationship between artist and spectator. Through Indian theories of rasa and dhvani, the modern ideas of Ibsen, Sartre, Camus, and Fromm, the Daoist conception of nature, and Israeli theatrical discourse, it considers both the play's original imaginative conception and its structural tensions.

Keywords: Shweta; Atirath; art; freedom; love; nature; transformation; artist–spectator relationship

1. Introduction, Narrative Architecture, and Distinctive Features of the Composition

The third play of the tetralogy of love, "The Expansion of Love, or Shweta's Discovery," is the most original and intellectually daring work in the quartet. Its story is not taken from any traditional mythological source: it is Kunal's independent creation. Shweta, a royal dancer, and Atirath, the "detached" king, are both imaginary characters, yet their conflict gives dramatic embodiment to an enduring philosophical question.

The playwright constructs an extraordinarily daring paradox. King Atirath is a great patron of the arts, a connoisseur of music and dance, affectionate towards his subjects, almost saintly—yet he is "detached": "To fall in love is utter foolishness, a completely pointless occupation!" Opposed to him stands Shweta, a dancer whose seven years of artistic discipline have been stirred by seven years of love, and who insists that "it is impossible to see art without seeing the artist."

The play unfolds in six dramatic sequences: (1) the announcer's introduction, Shweta's dance practice, and Atirath's philosophy of detachment; (2) the encounter at the temple and Shweta's refusal to dance in court; (3) her demand for a private audience and Atirath's angry expulsion of her; (4) Shweta's supposed immersion in water and Atirath's distress; (5) their meeting in the forest and Shweta's transformation —"Desire and supplication belong to my past"; and (6) Atirath's abandonment of his crown and his merging with nature.

2. Indian Dramatic Theory

2.1 Shweta and the Classical Nāṭyaśāstra's Types of Heroine

Shweta occupies a distinctive position in Bharata's Nāṭyaśāstra and its classification of the eight nāyikās, or types of heroine. She is neither the abhisārikā, who goes of her own accord to meet her beloved, nor the svādhīnapatikā, who holds her husband under her sway. Her closest Indian dramatic counterparts are the utkaṇṭhitā, the expectant heroine, and the virahotkaṇṭhitā, the heroine distressed by separation, yet ultimately she passes beyond both. All eight of Bharata's types define love in relation to another person; by the end of the play Shweta dissolves love into the "Supreme Person"—nature and the divine.

This merging corresponds to the ideal of the devotee yearning in separation in the Indian bhakti tradition: Mirabai's "madness" and Radha's "frenzy," in which the impossibility of worldly love is transformed into the sublimity of devotional love. Shweta's final proclamation—"Here everything that moves, that stands still, and that remains unseen will love me, and I shall love everything"—is precisely the bhakti tradition's declaration of universal love.

2.2 Rasa: The Journey from Śṛṅgāra to Śānta

The most remarkable feature of rasa in this play is the intense experience of śṛṅgāra-rasa in a single character, Shweta, and its transformation into śānta-rasa. Abhinavagupta considers śānta-rasa the highest rasa, in which attachment and aversion are pacified, giving rise to an "impersonal experience of beauty." Shweta's life in the forest is the dramatic manifestation of this śānta-rasa.

The irony of this journey is exquisite. Atirath, always "detached," initially resembles a character embodying śānta-rasa, but at the end he becomes "involved," attached through his love for Shweta; Shweta, who had been passionately attached, becomes "detached," absorbed into nature. The play's dramatic skill lies in this reversal of rasas.

2.3 Dhvani: The Multiple Meanings of "Discovery"

Viewed through Anandavardhana's Dhvanyāloka, the word āviṣkār ("discovery" or "manifestation") in the title is the play's richest bearer of suggestion. In Sanskrit, āviṣkār denotes, at the level of abhidhā, "disclosure/discovery"; at the level of lakṣaṇā, "revealing oneself" (Shweta's self-disclosure before Atirath); and at the level of vyañjanā, "discovering oneself" (Shweta's discovery of her own supreme love).

In this third sense, "discovery" becomes an epistemological event. Through her failure to win Atirath, Shweta "discovers" a higher form of love: "Now I have come to know the true nature of love." The refrain from Kusma–Salhes—"As a flower without nectar, so what is life without love?"—is quoted by Shweta in this play, and at the end she finds that very "nectar" in nature.

2.4 Dramatic Craft: The Triangle of Art, Artist, and Spectator

Atirath's philosophy—"The body matters only because it is the vehicle of art"—raises an important controversy in Indian aesthetics. In his Abhinavabhāratī, Abhinavagupta argues that rasa comes to fruition only when the spectator is a sahṛdaya, a receptive and sympathetic participant: not through "identification" with the artist's personality, but through the experience of art. In this sense Atirath's position is an extreme form of Abhinavagupta's theory of the sahṛdaya.

Shweta, however, exposes its limits: the attempt to separate art from the artist is an "artificial discrimination between milk and water." An artist's emotions, body, and lived experience all enter into art; there can be no art completely "apart from the artist's body." This dramatic-philosophical dispute remains a living question in aesthetics.

3. Western Dramatic Theory

3.1 Ibsen and Nora: Freedom after the Rejection of Love

The Norwegian playwright Henrik Ibsen (1828–1906), in A Doll's House (1879), depicts Nora Helmer, a woman who breaks with society's, her husband's, and her family's expectations and moves towards freedom. Nora's departure is not an escape from society's so-called "duties"; it is a departure in search of her own identity.

Shweta's departure into the forest parallels Nora's, but with an important reversal. Nora leaves by "closing the door"—taking leave of a society she has rejected; Shweta walks "with arms outstretched" towards nature, advancing towards a new relationship. Nora's departure is solitary; Shweta's is bound up with Atirath, who removes his crown and follows her. This is a new theatrical step beyond Ibsen.

3.2 Sartre and Camus: The Philosophy of Revolt and the Absurd

The French existentialist Albert Camus (1913–1960), in The Myth of Sisyphus (1942), analyses the experience of the "absurd"—the collision between the human desire to find meaning and the silence or resistance of the world. In response to this collision, Camus declares that "one must imagine Sisyphus happy."

Atirath's "detachment" is an absurd condition in Camus's sense: a handsome, sensitive connoisseur of art who declares love to be "a pointless occupation." Shweta revolts against this absurdity: she stops dancing in court, places a garland at his feet in the temple, and asks to speak to him alone. She is a female dramatic version of Camus's "rebel" (l'homme révolté).

The play's final reversal, when Atirath removes his crown and enters the forest, is a form of Camus's "joy of Sisyphus." Joy in relinquishing a burden—the royal throne—is a dramatic embodiment of Camus's philosophy.

3.3 Erich Fromm: "Love Is an Art"

The German-American psychoanalyst Erich Fromm (1900–1980), in The Art of Loving (1956), declares: "Love is an art. Like any art, it requires learning, practice, and dedication." Fromm argues that most people regard love as an "object" they can "find," whereas it is actually a "capacity" that must be developed.

Shweta's seven years of discipline—not merely in dance but also in love—constitute, in Fromm's terms, the practice of the "art of loving." Yet the most significant moment in Shweta's intellectual journey, seen from Fromm's perspective, is her declaration: "Now I have come to know the true nature of love." In this "true nature," love ceases to be desire centred on one individual and becomes a "universal feeling." In Fromm's terminology, this is "mature love."

3.4 Egon Wellesz and "Epiphany": The Culminating Dramatic Moment

The Irish writer James Joyce (1882–1941) introduced the notion of "epiphany," a moment of revelation in which an entire truth suddenly becomes manifest in an ordinary instant, into his literary thinking. This idea was developed in theories of theatrical epiphany associated with the dramatic critic Egon Wellesz and others.

Shweta's sight of the stars beside the river is a "dramatic epiphany": "A sky filled with thousands upon thousands of stars. How affectionately they are looking towards me!" An ordinary scene by the forest river suddenly becomes a vast "revelation of meaning": "Why did this thought never occur to me before?" Shweta's intellectual transformation takes place at that instant. It is a Maithili theatrical version of the Joycean–Welleszian "epiphany."

4. Chinese Dramatic Theory

4.1 无为 (Wuwei): Atirath's Detachment and Daoist Non-Action

In the Daoist philosophical tradition (Laozi, sixth century BCE), wuwei (无为, "non-action," or action without contrivance) is a central principle: "The Dao does nothing, yet nothing is left undone." Wuwei does not mean passivity; it means action freed from "artificial intervention."

Atirath's detachment is a distorted form of wuwei. He does not interfere with the natural flow of art (appropriate), but he also refuses to "interfere" with the flow of human feelings (unnatural). From a Daoist perspective, he suffers not from wuwei but from "strained inaction," an enforced passivity. Shweta's accusation—"You have built a glass palace of false proprieties all around yourself"—is precisely this Daoist criticism.

4.2 自然 (Ziran): Identification with Nature and Shweta's Forest Life

In Daoist-Buddhist thought, ziran (自然, "naturalness") is a high ideal: breaking through human-made barriers to become one with the "natural flow." In the Chinese shanshui (山水, "mountain–water") tradition of painting, the human being is a tiny figure dissolving into the immensity of nature.

Shweta's forest life is a dramatic example of ziran. Having left behind the palace, the pleasure pavilion, ornaments, and throne, she lives among "trees, fruits and flowers, a stream flowing without cease, and the open sky." The Daoist idea of ziran resonates throughout this life. The announcer's final words—"They mingled with the music of nature and became one with it"—mark the culmination of ziran.

4.3 变 (Bian): Change and a Dramatic Reading through the I Ching

The I Ching (易经, Book of Changes) is a foundational text of Chinese philosophy, which regards bian (变, "change") as a basic principle of existence. Its teaching, as presented here, is that change is inevitable; whoever accepts it becomes free, while whoever tries to arrest it suffers.

The play presents two responses to change. Atirath flees from change (detachment is his protective armour); Shweta accepts it, even after rejection, undergoing transformation beside the river. From the perspective of the I Ching, Shweta acts like a junzi (君子, "exemplary person"): she moves with the current of change.

4.4 艺术 and 生活 (Yishu and Shenghuo): The Conflict between Art and Life

Chinese aestheticians such as Liu Zhiyuan have analysed the relationship between yishu (艺术, "art") and shenghuo (生活, "life"). They argue that great art springs from life, but art "separated" from life is merely an empty form.

Atirath's philosophy—"The body is only the vehicle of art"—is an attempt to sever yishu from shenghuo. Shweta's objection—"How is it possible to remain detached from the artist?"—corresponds to the argument of this tradition associated with Liu. In Chinese aesthetics, the principle of qi (气, "vital energy") holds that the artist's qi, or life energy, necessarily flows into the work; without that qi, art is lifeless.

5. Israeli Dramatic Theory

5.1 Hanoch Levin: The Proprieties of Royal Power and Human Revolt

In plays such as Patience of Stone, Hanoch Levin repeatedly portrays individuals who rebel on a personal level against structures of power. Levin makes use of a particular dramatic technique: the individual's "small rebellion," which shakes a massive structure of authority.

Shweta's decision to stop dancing in the royal court is an excellent example of Levin's "small rebellion." She takes up no weapon and proclaims no revolution: she simply stops dancing. It is a precise, personal, symbolic revolt that brings the entire dramatic machinery of the royal court to a standstill for a moment. In Levin's terms: "one small human being, one great 'no'."

5.2 Eli Rozik: The "Off-Stage" Moment and the Absent Image

In his work Theatrical Image, Eli Rozik analyses the imagistic significance of the "off-stage" moment. What is not shown on stage but remains present in the spectator's imagination often possesses greater dramatic force than what is actually seen there.

Shweta's "immersion in water" is such an off-stage moment: the audience does not witness it, but hears of it through the attendant's words. In Rozik's terms, this "iconic absence" becomes the most dramatically powerful instant: Atirath's response—"It may yet be that the current carried her away and she came to rest somewhere on the bank"—measures the power of that "absence."

5.3 Israeli Theatre and Exile: The Tradition of Displacement

A central theme of Israeli theatre has been galut (גָּלוּת, "exile"). In this tradition of exile, leaving home is not necessarily a fall; it is an "unavoidable journey" in which new meanings are made.

Shweta's expulsion from the pleasure pavilion is a galut, an exile that ends in a kind of teshuvah: a return home, but to a spiritual home. In her forest exile Shweta finds a "new home," becoming one with nature. Atirath's abandonment of his crown and his entry into the forest constitute a "reverse galut": the king leaves his "home," the throne, and comes to Shweta's "home," the forest.

5.4 Israeli Environmental Theatre: The Politics of Becoming One with Nature

Contemporary Israeli theatre has seen the growth of "environmental theatre" and "nature drama" (site-specific theatre), making the human–nature relationship a theatrical subject. From this perspective, artists such as the playwright Yossi Maya have brought the politics of "humanity versus nature" to the stage.

Shweta's closing words—"Here everything that moves, that stands still, and that remains unseen will love me, and I shall love everything"—amount to a declaration of "ecological love" in this environmental-theatrical perspective. The failure of a human relationship, Atirath's rejection of her love, culminates in a "biophilic" expansion towards the living world and its ecology.

6. Fourfold Synthesis: What Does the "Expansion" of Love Mean?

The word "expansion" in the title articulates the play's central question: love "expands," beginning with one person and advancing towards the whole of existence. The four dramatic traditions perceive this expansion from different angles.

> The Indian perspective: the transformation of the heroine longing in separation, in the bhakti tradition, into śānta-rasa; Abhinavagupta's śānta-rasa and the reversal of the rasas of Shweta and Atirath; the three levels of dhvani in "discovery"; and the dramatic debate concerning art and the artist.
> The Western perspective: a departure beyond Ibsen's Nora, creating not a rupture but a new relationship; Camus's absurd revolt; Fromm's "mature love" as universal love; and Joyce's epiphany, in which the vision of the stars becomes the moment of transformation.

The Chinese perspective: Atirath's distorted wuwei (无为); Shweta's ziran (自然), or identification with nature; the I Ching's bian (变), or acceptance of change; and the yishu–shenghuo debate between art and life.

The Israeli perspective: Levin's "small rebellion" in the refusal to dance at court; Rozik's iconic absence in the supposed immersion in water; galut–teshuvah, or exile followed by a return to a spiritual home; and ecological love in environmental theatre.

The common conclusion of the four traditions is that the "expansion" of love means breaking free from the limits of one person, Atirath, to merge with nature, the cosmos, and existence as a whole. In this sense, the title makes the most ambitious philosophical declaration of the entire tetralogy of love.

Atirath's abandonment of his crown and his entrance into the forest—the play's final stage image—is a moment of joy charged with irony. He who remained "detached" finally becomes "attached"; and she who had been "attached" becomes "detached." This is the dramatic truth of love's expansion.

Supplementary Discussion of Adaptation

Kunal's play "The Expansion of Love, or Shweta's Discovery" is a philosophical and intellectual Maithili adaptation of his Hindi dramatic work Shweta. In Hindi, it was a musical drama based on the imaginative premise of an ichchhadhari nāga, a serpent capable of assuming a desired form.

In the Maithili adaptation the playwright explores, through Shweta's character, the biological and cosmic expansion of love. Love is not confined to relationships between human beings; it extends to all living creatures, nature, and consciousness. Shweta's discovery is that when love reaches its culmination, it crosses every material and species boundary.

100. "The Trial of Love, or Suprabha and Ashtavakra": Knowledge, Trial, and Love

Abstract

This review of the drama concerning Suprabha and Ashtavakra reads physical embodiment and knowledge, the trial of love, a father's curse, philosophical disputation, transformation, fidelity, and the rejection of Urvashi through multiple critical perspectives. Drawing on Indian mythological reinterpretation, the search for meaning, the philosophy of dialogue, theatrical imagery, and the sensibility of hope, it considers the final play as the intellectual culmination of the collection as a whole.

Keywords: Ashtavakra; Suprabha; knowledge; trial; philosophical debate; transformation; fidelity; love

1. Introduction, Narrative Structure, and Place within the Collection

The concluding play of the tetralogy of love, "The Trial of Love, or Suprabha and Ashtavakra," also concludes the collection as a whole, and its position is therefore symbolic: "The Trial of Love" follows "The Expansion of Love" (the sixth play). Its epic scope—fourteen scenes, five settings (hermitage, the city of Mithila, Janaka's court, heaven, and forest), and at least ten characters—is unusual within the tetralogy.

The story derives from the Ashtavakra narrative in the Vana Parva of the Mahabharata, but Kunal turns it into a complete drama of love, incorporating the historical-mythological story of Janaka's court and the debate with Vandi into a broader "trial of love." The first twelve scenes tell Ashtavakra's story; the thirteenth and fourteenth tell Suprabha's.

The play has seven principal dramatic sequences: (1) knowledge and the curse in the womb, followed by birth; (2) Uddalaka's hermitage, the father's absence, and the first meeting with Suprabha; (3) the plan to travel to Mithila; (4) the dispute with King Janaka on the road, the debate with Vandi, and the father's release; (5) Ashtavakra's renewal through bathing in the river; (6) Vadanya's year-long trial and Suprabha's solitary waiting; and (7) the rejection of Urvashi, the return, and the marriage with a garland of white lotuses.

2. Indian Dramatic Theory

2.1 Re-reading the Mahabharata: The Courage to Place a Disabled Hero at the Centre

The purpose of the Ashtavakra narrative in the Mahabharata is primarily philosophical: the Ashtavakra Gita, the dialogue with Janaka, is a work of self-knowledge. The debate with Vandi constitutes a second narrative level. Kunal adds a third—love put to the test. The result is a three-layered drama: knowledge (the disputation with Vandi), duty (the liberation of the father), and love (marriage to Suprabha).

More importantly, Kunal places a disabled protagonist at the centre of the stage. In the Indian dramatic tradition, the hero's bodily qualities are a criterion of characterisation, as in the Nāṭyaśāstra: the dhīrodātta hero is strong, handsome, and valiant. Ashtavakra reverses these expectations. His body is bent in eight places, yet his knowledge is extraordinary. Bharata's Nāṭyaśāstra contains no explicit category for such a disabled hero; Kunal creates a new dramatic paradigm.

2.2 Transforming the Trial by Fire: The Touchstone of Gold

The agni-parīkṣā, or trial by fire, is a major motif in Indian poetry and drama. Sita's trial by fire in the Ramayana is a proof of fidelity in love. Kunal transforms this motif into a "trial by cold": not in flame, but in the loneliness of separation and a year of being kept apart. The concluding couplet makes the transformation explicit:

Just as fire makes gold shine more brightly still,
So, when love endures a trial, it grows more profound.

In this couplet the metaphor of the "touchstone of gold," the testing of gold in fire, is applied to the trial of love. This metaphorical fire—the trial of separation—is subtler and more philosophical than Sita's literal trial by fire.

2.3 A Festival of Rasas: The Convergence of Seven Rasas

Among all seven plays in the collection, this one stages the most expansive festival of rasas. Vīra, the heroic, appears in Ashtavakra's confrontation at court and victory over Vandi; karuṇa, pathos, in the curse pronounced in the womb, separation from the father, and Suprabha's suffering as she waits; adbhuta, wonder, in the renewal of youth through river bathing and the disclosure of Vandi's secret concerning those immersed in water; hāsya, comedy, in the court spectators' address to Ashtavakra as "Lord Hunchback" and in Vandi's laughter; śṛṅgāra, the erotic sentiment, in the love between Suprabha and Ashtavakra; śānta, tranquillity, in Ashtavakra's rejection of Urvashi; and bhayānaka, terror, in the father's immersion in the river.

Bharata describes the relation between the dominant rasa (aṅgī-rasa) and subsidiary rasas (aṅga-rasa). In this play vīra and śṛṅgāra function as mutually dominant sentiments. The heroic struggle of intellect establishes worthiness for love, while love itself inspires heroism.

2.4 Ashtavakra's Rejection of Urvashi: A Rare Moment in Indian Literature

In the Indian literary tradition Urvashi symbolises supreme beauty: the love of Pururavas for Urvashi, and Kalidasa's Vikramorvaśīya, are classical dramatic expressions of her fascination. Ashtavakra's rejection of Urvashi is a bold dramatic decision against this long tradition. He says: "My Urvashi, Menaka, Rambha … they are all Suprabha. Suprabha alone." This statement consciously dismantles the classical tradition of attraction to the celestial apsarā.

3. Western Dramatic Theory

3.1 Viktor Frankl: The Search for Meaning and the Transformation of Suffering

The Austrian psychiatrist Viktor Frankl (1905–1997), in Man's Search for Meaning, sets out a theory learned from his experience in Nazi imprisonment: "logotherapy." Human beings live in search of "meaning," and those who can find meaning in their suffering are able to confront it.

Ashtavakra's life begins in suffering: his father's curse. Yet his mother's revelation, prompted by Shvetaketu's harsh words, gives his suffering a "meaning": "I shall free my father." In Frankl's terminology, this is "self-transcendence"—the dedication of oneself to a meaning beyond oneself. Ashtavakra's entire dramatic journey is an account of that self-transcendence.

From this perspective, the rejection of Urvashi is the highest expression of Frankl's "meaningful life": Ashtavakra turns down the universe's supreme beauty, Urvashi, and the splendour of heaven in order to choose a "meaningful" relationship, his love for Suprabha.

3.2 Sophocles: The Tragedy of Bodily Difference and the Victory of Knowledge

The Greek tragedian Sophocles (497–406 BCE), in Oedipus Rex, portrays a protagonist who comes into life with a "birth defect"—lameness, signified by the name "swollen foot"—and whose entire existence has been determined by a curse. His quest for knowledge about his birth becomes the cause of his destruction.

The comparison with Ashtavakra is illuminating. Both births are associated with a curse (Oedipus: a paternal curse; Ashtavakra: his father's curse); both lives begin with a search for the father; both are centred on knowledge. The decisive difference, however, is that Oedipus's search for knowledge leads to ruin, whereas Ashtavakra's leads to liberation and love. This contrast reveals a fundamental difference between an optimistic Indian philosophy of drama and the ironic, tragic vision of Greek drama.

3.3 Bakhtin: The Carnivalesque of "Driving Away" and "Coming Together"

Bakhtin's theory of the carnivalesque finds expression in a particular theatrical moment in this play: Ashtavakra's visit to the court. The gatekeeper calls him "Lord Hunchback" while giving way, yet it is this same supposedly "hunchbacked" person who advances the legal and moral case for his right of passage. This is a carnivalesque inversion: the person regarded as the "lowest" in society, because he is disabled, teaches wisdom to the "highest," the king.

The moment of collective laughter after Ashtavakra's victory over Vandi —"Serves him right; he was terribly arrogant"—is Bakhtin's "liberating laughter." The very society that tried to keep the disabled child out of court rejoices in his victory: carnivalesque social justice.

3.4 Peter Brook: The Mahabharata and Mythological Theatre

Peter Brook's Mahabharata (1985, stage and film) was an important experiment: an attempt to transform the epic's immense narrative into a universal human theatrical experience. Brook drew extensively on the Indian dramatic tradition in the process, but approached that tradition from the outside.

Kunal differs from Brook because he writes from within the tradition. By making the Ashtavakra narrative of the Mahabharata's Vana Parva Mithila-centred (Janaka is king of Mithila), and transforming the revelation of Vandi's secret (he is Varuna's son, and water is his home) into a scene mingling comedy and wonder, Kunal offers an "internal revival" rather than Brook's "external reinterpretation."

4. Chinese Dramatic Theory

4.1 贬谪 (Bianzhe): The Tradition of the Exiled Talent

In Chinese literary tradition, bianzhe (贬谪, the exile or humiliation of a talented official or person) is a major theme. From the poet Qu Yuan (屈原, 340–278 BCE) to Su Dongpo (苏东坡, 1037–1101), many outstanding Chinese poets and scholars were unjustly exiled, yet their talent made them immortal.

Ashtavakra's prenatal curse constitutes a form of bianzhe: even in the womb he was "exiled," alienated from his own body. As in the Chinese tradition of bianzhe, however, his talent transforms that exile into an epic journey. His renewal in the river after defeating Vandi parallels the concluding moment of liberation in the literature of exile.

4.2 忠 (Zhong): Fidelity and Solitary Discipline

In Confucian moral philosophy, zhong (忠, "loyalty" or "faithfulness") is a central value. It is often described as "loyalty to the ruler," but in its original sense it also involves fidelity to one's own word.

The year-long trial reveals the zhong of both lovers. Ashtavakra follows Vadanya's condition "to the letter": even while staying near Suprabha, he deliberately avoids letting himself be seen by her. Suprabha understands her father's hints and "consciously reduces her departures from the hermitage." Their fidelities move in different directions but express the same "meaning": proof of love.

4.3 折子戏 (Zhezixi) and the Play's Episodic Structure

The Chinese tradition of zhezixi (折子, "excerpt plays") helps us understand this play's fourteen-scene scope. Three self-contained zhezixi can be clearly identified: (a) the debate with Vandi, a wholly autonomous dramatic episode set in Janaka's court; (b) the year-long trial, the solitary struggle of Ashtavakra and Suprabha; and (c) the rejection of Urvashi. Each episode could be performed independently as a zhezixi, yet together they constitute one immense "trial of love."

4.4 问答 (Wenda): The Philosophy of Question and Answer and Philosophical Debate

In Chinese philosophical tradition, wenda (问答, question-and-answer dialogue) is a major method of knowing: the dialogues of Zhuangzi (庄子), Confucius's Analects, and the koans of Chan Buddhism. The disputation with Vandi is a dramatic version of this wenda tradition. The announcer's commentary—"Doubt and resolution, refutation and defence, question and counter-question"—describes the structure of wenda itself.

Ashtavakra's first exchange with Vandi resembles a "koan," a paradoxical riddle, in Chinese Chan thought. Vandi laughs at the prospect of "debating scripture with a hunchbacked boy"; Ashtavakra answers: "Wit and laughter serve no purpose; what is called for is philosophical debate." This is the essential spirit of wenda: the seriousness of the question makes mockery irrelevant.

5. Israeli Dramatic Theory

5.1 Disability and Israeli Theatre: Ashtavakra's Embodiment "Disability theatre" is an important contemporary movement in Israel, involving accessible and inclusive performance (nagish, נגיש) that places disabled performers at the centre of the stage. In this tradition the body is not a "deficiency" but an expression of "different ability."

The dramatic representation of Ashtavakra is an Indian-mythological version of this movement, presented three decades before it. He neither "hides" his body, bent in eight places, nor apologises for it. He declares: "My body is indeed bent in eight places. But intelligence has nothing to do with age or appearance." Within this one sentence lies an entire philosophy of "disability justice."

5.2 Eli Rozik: Bathing in the River and the "Image of Transformation"

Within Eli Rozik's theory of theatrical imagery, the "transformation-icon" is an important category: the instant at which a character's "image" suddenly changes on stage and the audience witnesses that change.

Ashtavakra's becoming "straight and healthy" after bathing in the river is a "transformation-icon" that can be represented visually through performance. From Rozik's perspective this moment has a double imagistic significance: (a) bodily transformation, from bent to straight, and (b) spiritual transformation, from son to sage. The spectators witness both at once.

5.3 The Jewish Talmudic Tradition and Debate: A Parallel to the Victory over Vandi

The Jewish religious tradition preserves a distinctive culture of debate in the Talmud: pilpul (פלפול, dialectical disputation), through which two scholars uncover truth by argument and counterargument. Within this tradition, the victory of a younger or unexpected scholar is a dramatic pattern.

The debate with Vandi is a Hindu-mythological parallel to pilpul: a young, disabled boy, Ashtavakra, defeats the "great scholar" Vandi through argument and counterargument. Janaka's role as adjudicator is comparable to the beit din (בית דין, "house of judgment" or court) associated with such disputation.

5.4 Israeli "Theatre of Hope": Optimism in the Trial of Love

Israeli theatre scholars such as Naomi Lapid have identified a particular tendency, the "theatre of hope," in which an unbroken thread of hope survives even in adverse circumstances. Such "hope" is not naive or simplistic optimism; it is "hope put to the test."

The play's final couplet—"Just as fire makes gold shine more brightly still, So, when love endures a trial, it grows more profound"—is a spiritual declaration of this Israeli "theatre of hope." The final words of the collection—"No feeling surpasses love; its glory has no bounds. Come, let us all unite in one voice and sing love's praise!"—are not merely the triumphal proclamation of the seventh play but of the collection as a whole.

6. Fourfold Synthesis: Why Is a "Trial" Necessary?

When the four theatrical traditions are considered together, they yield an answer to the central question of this play, and indeed of the whole collection: a "trial" does not merely "prove" love; it "matures" it.

> The Indian perspective: the courage, in terms of the Nāṭyaśāstra, to place a disabled hero at the centre; the festival of seven rasas; the transformation of a trial by fire into a "trial by cold"; and the rejection of Urvashi as a dismantling of the apsarā tradition.
> The Western perspective: Frankl's logotherapy, or meaning found in suffering; the resemblance to, and difference from, Oedipus (destruction versus liberation); Bakhtin's carnivalesque (a "hunchbacked" child becomes victor in court); and Brook's external versus Kunal's internal renewal of myth.

The Chinese perspective: the 贬谪 (bianzhe) tradition of exiled talent; 忠 (zhong), or fidelity, in the year-long trial of both lovers; the three-part structure of 折子戏 (zhezixi); and 问答 (wenda), the question-and-answer tradition of Chan and philosophical debate, in the victory over Vandi.

The Israeli perspective: disability justice ("intelligence has nothing to do with age or appearance"); Rozik's transformation-icon in the river-bathing scene; Talmudic pilpul as a parallel to the debate with Vandi; and the theatre of hope in the concluding couplet's affirmation of hope.

The common conclusion of all four traditions is that the "trial" of love is not an externally imposed torment but an inwardly generated "refinement." Just as fire does not destroy gold but purifies it, so a year's solitude in separation does not destroy love but makes it "deeper." In this final play Kunal affirms once and for all the intellectual axis of the entire collection: "Love is truth."

7. The Collection as a Whole: The Intellectual Unity of All Seven Plays

After the fourfold examination of all seven plays, considered as a whole, Kusma–Salhes and Six Other Plays emerges as a coherent intellectual journey.

The intellectual sequence of the folk-theatre trilogy is: Forty Thieves (intelligence) — Bidapat (poetry's immortality) — Kusma–Salhes (love and service to the people): an ethical-philosophical arc.

The intellectual sequence of the tetralogy of love is: Shruvavati (inner strength) — Sukanya (faith) — Shweta (the expansion of love) — Suprabha (the trial and maturation of love): a progression of philosophical development.

The thread binding the entire collection is its concluding refrain: "Love is truth, love is fragrance, the spirit of love endures forever;
As a flower without nectar, so what is life without love?" It echoes from the closing song of Kusma–Salhes, the third play, to the self-revelation in Shweta's Discovery, the sixth. This is the manifesto of Kunal's dramatic work as a whole: "Love is the supreme human value." The collection's contribution lies in affirming this value through three modes—folk tradition, classical tradition, and independent imagination—and testing it against the standards of four theatrical civilisations.

Supplementary Philosophical and Narrative Discussion

Based on the story of the marriage of the sage Ashtavakra and Suprabha, the daughter of Vadanya, this play presents the conflict between physical beauty and intellectual and spiritual radiance in a classical form. Ashtavakra is born with his body bent in eight places because of a curse by his father Kahoda, yet in knowledge he stands among the highest exponents of Advaita Vedanta.

To test Ashtavakra's love, the sage Vadanya sends him on a difficult journey northwards, where the goddess Uttara, presiding over splendour and beauty and appearing as a young woman, offers him sensual temptation. Through the integrity of his character and intellect, Ashtavakra passes the test and marries Suprabha. The play establishes that love is not merely an outward beauty visible to the eye; it is an encounter with the inner self.

101. On the Pretext of Premlata Mishra 'Prem'

Abstract

My school friends in Patna had come to regard Maithili speakers as culturally superior. It was not because of Mithila painting or the craft of sikki and mauni. I had asked, "What has suddenly brought this about?" One of them, a Magahi speaker, replied: "I went to one of your programmes in Patna. Unmarried and married women alike were taking part in cultural performances and plays on the stage."

On the Pretext of Premlata Mishra 'Prem'

This happened a very long time ago. My school friends in Patna had come to regard Maithili speakers as culturally superior—not because of Mithila painting or the sikki-mauni craft. I asked them, "What has suddenly brought this about?"

One of them spoke Magahi. He replied, "I went to one of your programmes in Patna. Unmarried girls and married women were appearing on stage in cultural performances and plays. You people are very advanced."

He had attended some Maithili festival celebration and seen Neelam Chaudhary dance, as well as Premlata Mishra 'Prem' act. He cared nothing for the difficulty women faced in reaching the stage, or for the fact that their number could be counted on one's fingers: he had decided that we were advanced. I, too, attended several such celebrations between roughly the ages of thirteen and twenty-one, and listened to the expert comments.

"Hey, where are the curtains? When Arun Babu and the others put on plays at Kothia, they have curtains of all different colours."

"Babu Kunal is the director. He changes scenes merely by using light and darkness. He knows an enormous amount about drama. He believes that unless curtains are dispensed with, a play cannot be called modern."

"And what about comic interludes?"

"None of that. In Kunal's view those are all fake forms of theatre."

Just then the electricity failed. But the Petromax lamps were ready, and right in the middle of the performance Akku's comic sketch began, with red and green vermilion, involving a woman whose husband was probably employed by the railways.

"Didn't you come on the first day?"

"Nothing worthwhile happens on the first day. Who wants to listen to speeches by those pompous people and their stale, rotten poetry?"

My friend, however, was unconcerned that these theatrical organisations and celebrations, and literature itself, stood precariously on a narrow support. Would he believe what his ears heard, or what his eyes had seen? Maithili literature was advanced; women appeared on its stages; migrant Maithils were united. Why not? What if the members all belonged to one caste? There were characters from other castes in the plays, were there not? After all, those characters were the very ones who drew the applause, even when they delivered their humiliating lines at the top of their voices.

A day sometime in 2009.

A telephone call came.

"My name is Chhatranand Singh Jha. You may not know me. People call me Batuk Bhai."

"I know you much better as Chhatranand Singh Jha. At that time the programme Bharati was broadcast on All India Radio, Patna, from 5:30 to 6:00 in the evening, on Thursdays and Sundays. I remember the days as well, because the market in Chitkohra was held on those two days. The two of us brothers would hurry off to buy vegetables and hurry home again by 5:30. And in that programme you were never called Batuk Bhai."

"I am at Premlataji's residence. Best wishes for Kurukshetram Antarmanak—and here, Premlataji will speak to you too."

Premlataji also conveyed her good wishes.

Around that time Mantreshwar Jha wrote a satire without naming me. He said that someone had produced a thick book on the Pañjī, the genealogical registers, and wanted to revive the system based on them.

If he had read the book before writing about it, why did he write that?

But once discussion began of the defects in the Pañjī described in the first chapter (the preface)—including the assertion that Gangesha Upadhyaya, the founder of Navya-Nyāya, was born five years after his father's death, his marriage to a leatherworking woman, and numerous other details—and once I disclosed how Ramanath Jha had misled the author of History of Navya-Nyāya in Mithila and concealed these details, everyone, including him, fell silent. The real reason for the original opposition to the book on the Pañjī had come into the open.

Videha continued to move forward, while the associations and institutions funded by the Sahitya Akademi remained precariously propped up, panting and puffing yet speaking in affected tones. One of my shortcomings is that I rarely attend meetings of associations. But after an Akademi-funded event in 2012, I came to feel that those exhausted institutions had not the slightest prospect of reform and that, by and large, they hated me and Videha. I had attended few events anyway; I stopped altogether.

The calls still come, inviting me to poetry gatherings, seminars and webinars. I decline, even when the invitations come from friends and groups on Facebook. Some people—not all—then speak all sorts of nonsense about me. My only condition is this: become human beings, and I shall come even against my natural inclination, though by temperament I seldom frequent such places.

How Are We to Become Human?

First, the Sahitya Akademi episode. Some had written that I and Videha opposed the Akademi because it did not recognise us. It became clear that it did recognise us. The reason for the opposition was instead that a literary figure whom Videha had banned for theft was made an advisory member of the Akademi's Maithili section on grounds of caste. This was the caste which, in my assessment, exercised an exclusive hold over that section; all seven literary associations recognised by it were run by people of the same caste. From translation work to every other assignment, it was virtually impossible for anyone of another caste to secure an opportunity. Ninety-nine per cent of the works in its anthologies of plays, essays and stories came from that single caste (and, in any event, these books were printed only to rot in warehouses).

No institution contributed to Maithili's admission to the Sahitya Akademi: it came about solely through the personal efforts of Jayakant Mishra, and consequently, I argue, Maithili speakers derived no benefit from it. A few members of one caste obtain translation assignments worth fifty thousand to one lakh rupees, and then receive a translation award worth another fifty thousand rupees for the same work.

Whether it is Maithili's inclusion in the Eighth Schedule of the Indian Constitution, Maithili on Wikipedia or Google Translate, or Unicode for Tirhuta and Kaithi, no mainstream institution has contributed to these achievements. How Maithili came to be included in the Constitution's Eighth Schedule is being documented in my English book A Parallel History of Maithili Literature. Of course, one can read on Facebook how Google, Wikipedia and the Government of India supposedly trembled before these organisations and individuals. But who would be afraid of someone who cannot even kill a fly? One thing must also be made clear: Durga Puja is more important to Maithili than Vidyapati festivals. First, the amount of newspaper publicity for Vidyapati festivals does not reflect their popularity; it merely reflects the organisers' control of the media. Second, counting the plays and the Kunjbihari performances, barely ten people assemble; in many places the plays have disappeared altogether. Third, public participation is almost nil. The festivals resemble the Sahitya Akademi, or perhaps the Akademi resembles them, and both are spreading intolerance in society. Durga Puja is celebrated in village after village. People participate; through cultural events, dancing and other activities, it brings together every section of society, women and men alike. It counteracts the hatred spread, in my view, by Vidyapati festivals, the Sahitya Akademi and its funded institutions, and goes further by fostering harmony. This information is for those organisers of Vidyapati festivals who strut about declaring that other castes should celebrate their own heroes if they have the capacity. Let me also make clear that the portrait of Vidyapati circulated by these institutions is itself incorrect. Moreover, they are noisily, and unsuccessfully, trying to present the Vidyapati who wrote in Avahaṭṭha and Sanskrit as the Vidyapati known as the 'cuckoo-voiced poet' (Kavikokila).

Does that mean there is darkness everywhere?

No. Otherwise, why would Premmohan Mishra have resigned from the advisory position in the Sahitya Akademi's Maithili section? Look at college cut-off marks: the lowest are for Hindi and Maithili, and those very people, I suggest, are the ones hissing in that advisory committee. How can a human being remain where snakes are hissing? That is why Premmohan Mishra, a chemist, resigned.

How Are We to Become Human Amid Hissing Snakes?

Before reviewing Premlataji's three books, it is necessary to discuss how she laid down her arms amid these hissing snakes. This is a special issue on Premlata Mishra 'Prem', not a commemorative volume of praise.

Premlataji is an artist, a woman artist, a woman artist from an upper caste. I had hoped she would remain an artist, a genuine artist, at the very least a woman artist. But when the test came, she remained neither an artist nor a woman artist. She became a victim of a conspiracy in which she had to abandon both her identity as a woman and her identity as an artist.

The occasion was the Sahitya Akademi Yuva Puraskar of 2022. There were three jurors, two men—Keshkar Thakur and Rajan Kumar Singh—and one woman, Premlata Mishra 'Prem'. Munni Kamat's poetry collection Antatah was in contention: Munni Kamat, the author of Jindagik Mol, a writer of genuinely feminist poetry. Neither literary quality nor feminism mattered, I contend; caste prevailed. The book received no vote from Keshkar Thakur or Rajan Kumar Singh—and not even from Premlata

Mishra 'Prem'. Everything has its price. Premlata Mishra 'Prem' paid, I argue, the price of becoming vice-president of a so-called literary association recognised by the Sahitya Akademi. She could not stand firm. One's vote belongs to oneself, but hers went with the male majority, the caste majority.

Shekhar Prasang, O Din O Pal and Ego Chhali Sineh

Shekhar Prasang is a book based on her research on Sudhanshu Shekhar Chaudhary. O Din O Pal came close to being an autobiography but stopped short of it: it is a collection of reminiscences. Ego Chhali Sineh is a short-story collection, some of whose stories surprised me.

Shekhar Prasang

Shekhar Prasang is based on her research on the celebrated editor Sudhanshu Shekhar Chaudhary. The first chapter discusses his personality and achievements, the second examines his writings, the third his Hindi works, and the fourth offers a conclusion.

In the conclusion to this book, one passage recounts how Udaychandra Jha 'Vinod' went to the Mithila Mihir office to meet him, but found him absorbed in writing with his left hand. He completed a composition in a single attempt, making all his cuts and revisions in his mind.

George Bernard Shaw, by contrast, thought so quickly that he wrote in shorthand to avoid breaking the continuity of his thoughts, and his personal assistant then typed the writing out in longhand.

Mithila Mihir trained an army of writers—more than a thousand of them.

O Din O Pal

This book contains twelve reminiscences.

"My Kakka: Yatriji." One incident in this reminiscence deserves mention. Premlataji used to cook with Yatriji's eldest daughter. But Yatriji decided that both should have one day off each week, and that on that day his eldest son, Shobha Mishra, would do the cooking. Premlataji writes:

"Kakka awakened in us a consciousness of our rights."

Indeed, in a country where domestic work is still often regarded as unemployment or work without earnings, this pleased me enormously. Kakka is no longer with us.

"Uncle, Auntie and..." Neither the uncle's name nor the aunt's is given here. I mention this because I am eager to learn the name of this daughter-in-law of Rahika. Why? Because in this reminiscence, addressing her aunt, Premlataji writes:

"She was the first Maithil woman to appear on stage, and she has always been a source of inspiration to me." Everyone would therefore want to know her name, and I hope Premlataji will supply it. People can go through their entire lives saying "Auntie, Auntie": they know the name of her natal village, yet never learn the aunt's own name.

The same reminiscence also offers evidence of the precarious state of Maithili theatre. Someone makes a sarcastic remark about Premlataji: "... Harimohan Babu is blowing on a rope and turning it into a snake."

"I Stand in the Dock." This reminiscence concerns Sudhanshu Shekhar Chaudhary. He once told her that, while writing a play, Premlata would appear before his mind's eye, and he would write those dialogues expressly for her.

"A Few Words as an Offering to Memory." This is a reminiscence of Pandit Jayanath Mishra, whose 'spiritual daughter', in Premlataji's description, is the Maithili Mahila Sangh (Maithili Women's Association).

"Pioneer of Women's Awakening," "Those Moments Kept Dancing," and "Again and Again I Am Swept Away." All three reminiscences concern her natal village, Rahika. Although they do not occur together in the original sequence, I have grouped them for one reason. In the first, her teacher and her father favoured her entrance onto the stage. The villagers, however, prevented it. She did dance to a song at a daytime rehearsal, at the age of thirteen (in 1961). The play was Govind Jha's Basat. Govind Jha also enters the reminiscence when Premlataji later moved to Patna and acted in several of his plays. In the second reminiscence she is thirty-seven or thirty-eight years old (1985–86). The same villagers, twenty-four or twenty-five years later, made her chief guest at the village Vidyapati festival and invited her daughter Annu to sing on stage. After coming down from the stage, she saw her teacher Sitanath Jha for the first time in twenty-three years. On hearing Premlataji's name announced, he had risen in haste, leaving his meal half-eaten, to come and see her. The third reminiscence records her rejection of Udaychandra Jha 'Vinod's' request to act in a play at Rahika without rehearsing with her fellow actors. The play was Mahendra Malangia's Okar Aanganak Barahmasa. She also writes that one cannot keep everyone happy all the time. (In this very issue Udaychandra Jha 'Vinod' writes that Premlataji had agreed, but that the villagers' fierce opposition confined her to the audience. He was so distressed by her humiliation that no play was staged at the three-day Vidyapati festival in Rahika thereafter.) The third reminiscence also speaks of a woman close to her who remarked: "Bless Batuk Bhai: your daughter is married now, and you have even begun to speak a little more freely."

"From the Journey of Theatre to the Final Journey." This piece recalls the well-known Maithili theatre director Pandit Trilochan Jha, known as Guruji. Before his arrival, directors were brought in from Hindi theatre. He first worked with the Raj Darbhanga Theatre, which closed. Then comes mention of Calcutta's Moonlight Theatre, which also closed. He next joined a travelling yatra troupe there, and became associated with the Maithili theatrical organisation Mithiyatri (whose associates included Dayanath Jha, Gunanath Jha and Shrikant Mandal).

When he could no longer sustain the travelling life of a yatra troupe, Kamalnath Singh Thakur helped him join the theatre department of the Chetna Samiti in Patna.

Yet here too we find mention of how precariously Maithili theatre was supported:

"...He kept the other members of his family away from the theatre, and even from discussions of the theatre."

"Shrikant Mandal." Shrikant Mandal died on 7 January 1994. He had found a financier for a film based on Rajkamal Chaudhary's story Lalka Pag; the contract had been signed and the songs recorded. Premlataji writes that people even heard those songs at that year's Vidyapati festival.

But the death of one person meant the death of an entire institution. Now neither the songs remain nor was the film ever made. A venture built entirely on personal effort had been precariously supported by one person alone: Shrikant Mandal was that sole support. When he died, even traces of his existence and of his songs were lost—or erased.

"Pramila, the Theatre Worker." This reminiscence concerns Shrinarayan Jha, popularly known as 'Sir', and his wife Pramilaji, who oversaw Bal-Bhangima, the children's section of the Bhangima theatre organisation. Their sons Sonu and Monu are mentioned, as are Bhavnath Jha of NABARD and the programme Thahaka. Then Pramilaji dies prematurely.

"Some Bitter, Some Sweet." The piece recounts several piquant incidents of the sort one might have seen on The Kapil Sharma Show.

"A Theatre Worker's Journey." At Batuk Bhai's invitation and under the auspices of Chetna Samiti, Premlataji and the ten-year-old Bharati acted for the first time in 1973. The dancer Rama Das joined in 1974. The male performers mentioned are Chhatranand Singh Jha (Batuk Bhai), Vedanand Jha, Phanant Jha, Hridaynath Jha, C. P. Jha, Modnath Jha, Asharfi Ajnabi, Goloknath Mishra, Bandhuji and Shambhudev Jha. Besides Chetna Samiti, the theatrical organisations Ranglok, Navangan, Aripan, Bhangima, Aangan and Kala Samiti are discussed. Those who assumed responsibilities included Rabindranath Thakur, Kaushal Kumar Das, Chhatranand, Kumar Shailendra, Prashantkant, Rabindra Raju, Manoj Manuj, Vibhuti Anand, Kunal, Umakant, Kishore Keshav, Rohini Raman, Jagannath Lal Das, Kaushal Mishra and Tarun Prabhat. Among women performers, she mentions Manju Chaudhary, Sudha Das, Tanuja Shankar, Vinita, Sangita, Nivedita, Manju Jha, Abha Jha and Poonamshree. Mridula Sinha is discussed not only as an actor but also for direction and writing. Mantreshwar Jha organised theatre competitions through Aripan. But then...

Manju Chaudhary withdrew not only from the stage but even from asking after the well-being of people associated with it. Mridula Sinha, Sudha Das, Poonamshree, Prabha Jha and Nutan Jha left one by one.

Surendra Acharya remained associated until the end.

Tanuja Shankar was an actor and director, but became involved with serials on Delhi Doordarshan. Her younger sister Kanupriya Shankar became associated with the National School of Drama.

Sneha Pallavi, Shilpi and Rashmi—the three daughters of Harihar Prasad, a Hindi fiction writer, filmmaker and scriptwriter—joined. Anand Mohan Jha and his mother Vaidehi Jha are also mentioned. So are Madhulika Anand, Soma Anand, Deepa Anand, Suprita Das, Jyoti, Sunita Jha, Alka, Neetu, Sharda Singh, Neelam Singh, Preeti, Rashmi Mishra, Annu, Mannu, Barkha Singh and Swati Singh.

Then come those who encouraged and proudly involved their own families, including their wives: Lallan Prasad Thakur (Jamshedpur), Ashok Kumar Jha (Mithila Vikas Parishad, Kolkata), Rohini Raman Jha (Aangan, Patna), Pradeep Bihari (Begusarai), Chaturbhuj Ashavadi (Biratnagar, Nepal) and Shyam Sundar Singh (Bhangima, Patna).

Ego Chhali Sineh. This collection contains twelve short stories. One of them, "Ego Chhali Sineh," concerns the widow Sineh's sexual relationship with Kamlesh, his betrayal and disappearance, and her determination to give birth to the child conceived from the relationship. Years later she returned and transferred her homestead land to the very brother-in-law who had once declared that she should be cut up and buried.

Another story in the collection, "Beauty Parlour," concerns an extramarital sexual relationship in which a married man is allowed to pursue an affair with an unmarried woman.

"Return" tells of a mother-in-law and daughter-in-law. The son and daughter-in-law whom the mother-in-law had driven out of the house were the ones who cared for her, and a return followed.

"Unfortunate" is about a child who ran away from home after some incident and eventually returned.

"Bamboo Footbridge" depicts a flood-prone region, the disappearance and subsequent repair of a makeshift bamboo bridge, and the way the bridge and nature jointly bind society together. Last year there was a news report of thieves cutting up and carrying away an iron bridge in Bihar. The situation remains much the same: earlier bamboo bridges were stolen; now iron bridges are stolen.

"Mother" describes the affectionate relationship between Maiya and Kisunma.

"Vaitarani" is another story of the village: help with the funeral feast after a death, and in exchange take title to all the good agricultural land.

"Jumaratan" presents something like a character portrait of a woman attendant at a school.

"Shade" uses the story of Sudha and Radhiya to bring together feminist and caste criticism, showing how the woman bears a double burden of oppression.

"An Injury" describes conversations among women employees after a shutdown is announced in the city.

"Housewarming" depicts how straightforward people are emotionally manipulated into performing tasks for others.

"The Desolate Courtyard" recalls the absence felt on Auntie's death. The new girls sing songs in the style of film music, something Auntie did not like. At her funeral the boys of the entire neighbourhood cut mango branches laden with tiny green fruit and blossoms and laid them on her pyre. If Auntie was not here this time, whom would she let make pickles and preserves? Such love for Auntie… "Sitting in heaven, make plenty of chutney for us…"

"A butterfly counts not months but moments; thus, for it, time is nothing but time."

Annie Ernaux began by writing autobiographical novels, but soon devoted herself entirely to memoirs.

Some stories by Premlata Mishra 'Prem', such as "Ego Chhali Sineh" and "Beauty Parlour," are bold, while "Shade" and "The Desolate Courtyard" offer psychological analysis. Yet her greatest strength is memoir, and with the wealth of experience at her disposal, she can do justice to it through memoir writing, as Annie Ernaux has done. I hope many more reminiscences will emerge from her pen.

This book contains twelve reminiscences.

"My Kakka: Yatriji." An incident in this reminiscence deserves mention. Premlataji cooked alongside Yatriji's eldest daughter, but Yatriji granted both a day off every week and decided that on that day his eldest son, Shobha Mishra, would cook. Premlataji writes:

The Swedish Academy announced that this year's Nobel Prize in Literature would go to the eighty-two-year-old Annie Ernaux. Earlier, the Academy had recalled Rabindranath Tagore in a tweet.

"A butterfly counts not months but moments; thus, for it, time is nothing but time."

Annie Ernaux initially wrote autobiographical novels but soon began writing memoirs and nothing else.

Some stories by Premlata Mishra 'Prem', such as "Ego Chhali Sineh" and "Beauty Parlour," are bold, while "Shade" and "The Desolate Courtyard" show psychological insight. Yet memoir is her greatest strength, and with the treasure of experience she possesses, she can do it justice by writing memoirs, as Annie Ernaux has done. I hope many more such pieces will come from her pen.

103. A Review of Sharadindu Chaudhary

Abstract

Sharadindu Chaudhary's memoir literature [Bat-Bat Par Bat (I–IV)]: Bat-Bat Par Bat, Volume 1; Marmantak-Shabdanubhuti (Bat-Bat Par Bat, Volume 2); Hamar Abhag: Hunak Nahi Dosh (Bat-Bat Par Bat, Volume 3); and Sakshat (Bat-Bat Par Bat, Volume 4). These four booklets collect Sharadindu Chaudhary's memoiristic essays: the first appeared in 2019, the second in 2020, and the third and fourth in 2021. His Jan Ham Janitahun, published in 2002, is likewise a collection of memoiristic essays with humour and satire. It names mainstream literary figures hungry for awards, whose exploits are such that a volume of reminiscences about them would almost automatically become a collection of humour and satire. But this is not a book of pure reminiscence: there is some added seasoning, though only a little.

Sharadindu Chaudhary's Memoir Literature [Bat-Bat Par Bat (I–IV)]

Bat-Bat Par Bat, Volume 1; Marmantak-Shabdanubhuti (Bat-Bat Par Bat, Volume 2); Hamar Abhag: Hunak Nahi Dosh (Bat-Bat Par Bat, Volume 3); and Sakshat (Bat-Bat Par Bat, Volume 4): these four booklets are collections of Sharadindu Chaudhary's memoiristic essays. The first was published in 2019, the second in 2020, and the third and fourth in 2021.

His Jan Ham Janitahun, published in 2002, is also a collection of memoiristic essays incorporating humour and satire. It includes the names of mainstream literary figures hungry for awards, whose exploits are such that accounts of them almost automatically become humorous and satirical. Nevertheless, it is not a book of pure reminiscence; there is some added salt and spice, though in modest quantities. It is a matter of satisfaction that Sharadinduji apparently encountered not a single such grasping individual in the parallel literary current.

In addition, Bar Ajagut Dekhal (2005), Gobar Ganesh (2011), and Kariya Kakkak Koramin (2016) may be called the Kariya Kakka satire series, because in all three books Kariya Kakka appears in a role reminiscent of Khattar Kakka. Yet he is absent from a few pieces even here—for instance, "Tavat Kal," "Golaisi—Arthat," and "CD Samiksha" in Gobar Ganesh. All three volumes, too, rest broadly on reminiscence, but with much stronger seasoning. In the author's note to Kariya Kakkak Koramin, Chaudhary writes that Kariya Kakka "did whatever occurred to him, but certainly took care that... no accusation of obscenity should arise." Yet in "CD Samiksha," published in Gobar Ganesh five years earlier, the author writes of Vidyanath Jha 'Vidit', chairman of the Sahitya Akademi's Maithili advisory committee, selected by the so-called literary associations: "...He himself is a connoisseur of pleasures. He will perform his evening devotions with Pravasiji and a duet with Thakurain..." Another essay in the same volume, "Tavat Kal," says, "The Sahitya Akademi tried a similar experiment: even someone who owns a hotel can become a member of the advisory committee." The account in "Tavat Kal" is not obscene, but the description in "CD Samiksha" plainly is. It is evident to me that all the chairpersons selected by these supposedly literary associations for the Akademi's Maithili advisory committee have worked to bring Maithili low. But why should one of them suddenly become a paragon of truth simply because she is a woman? The sexist comment instead reveals a lack of sensitivity, among writers and editors in literature and public life, towards women and people of genders other than male. This insensitivity is also visible in "Sarkarak Linga Pariksha" ("The Government's Gender Examination") in Kariya Kakkak Koramin, where "a government endowed with feminine qualities" is used of Vinod Kumar Jha [see "Irshya Dvesh Nahi—Samanvay Chahi" in Hamar Abhag: Hunak Nahi Dosh (Bat-Bat Par Bat, Volume 3): "Sarkar" means Vinod Kumar Jha, now styled Kavi Samrat, emperor of poets].

104. A Review of Nachiketa

Abstract

Poetry differs from prose in that, through imagery, it can say more in fewer words. Poetry therefore cannot be regarded as a substitute for prose adopted because there is not enough time, although such instances too may be found. Whether verse follows metre or dispenses with metre and rhythm, quality will invariably give it the power to move its readers.

Keywords: Nachiketa; Poetry; Drama; Language; Word; Text; Creative Experiment

Nachiketa's Second Person Singular

Poetry differs from prose in that images allow it to say more in fewer words. Poetry therefore cannot be regarded simply as a substitute for prose undertaken for want of time, although examples of that too may be found. Whether a poem is metrical or without metre and rhythm, if it possesses quality it will certainly make an impression.

People resort to the Left or the Right to protect their land from the ceiling laws. But when literature itself falls under a ceiling, appeals to Left or Right, insistence on or rejection of metre and rhythm, merely extend factional manoeuvring. Against this background stands Nachiketa's collection of thirty-three poems, Madhyam Purush Ekvachan (Second Person Singular).

In “In Defiance of the Sea,” the poet speaks of the sea between you and me, upon whose shore someone is weeping over its consequences; between us are shoals of fish and flocks of kites, while Varuna grasps the crests of the tides, wondering whether to allow love or the sea to triumph. As the poet speaks again of Varuna's hold upon the tide's crest, the image comes vividly before us.

In “A Particular Season on Earth,” there is a special season of love, at whose beginning even the raindrops of the monsoon start drying up. A net is cast for words, and words surrender in the renunciation of poetry. Then comes a return to the riverbank, to the recitation of a morning mantra that turns water into sky. The rain god of a barren land can make even the heavens weep without measure. Ghosts dance, beating their sticks, while a young prince dreams of communism, blowing a balloon into the sky. There is compromise with words, and every sigh drowns in the scream of language. Then comes an appeal to the sky: cry aloud, so that the sound of the thunderbolt makes us believe that the monsoon has arrived upon earth. And there is the longing to touch the drops falling on the forehead and to read the lines one has written. The task he left unfinished last time. This, precisely, is that particular season: remembering her.

In "You," words stammer as they enter the sentence; there are the clasping of heated hands, my blazing fire, the "I" and "you" within it, a branch of the wish-fulfilling tree, and everything else reduced to emptiness or some old grandmother's tale. And while the ten directions ripen within it, there is a bewildered path—confusion! There is the long watch of nine months of pride, of pregnancy. A fifth season (!), a sixth enemy (!), a raga in the slow tempo, a fast beat (terrified), and the sun setting.

In "The Story of Night and Day," the Buddha leaves his house while the world sleeps; the poet, however, journeys into the poem, beyond the legally contracted institution of marriage and the pain of childbirth. Within the poem are knots broken free of metre and letters, exposed stitches, needlework, drops falling into the innermost being, and the attempt of a coarse, soiled cloth to cover my body—an instability rising from within—unused, amid tales of hunger, pain and separation. Sexuality goes on touching the act of seeing one stand up, becoming all thirty-six richly seasoned dishes in your kitchen. Yet my doubt is only a search within the poem, fully possessed of double meanings; its fine reasoning has dissolved into rhythm and beat. The body is stuffed with Prakrit and liver, weighed down with an awareness of the great womb and phallus. This is the only way I have learned: to dream of you every moment. And when the world awakens, I shall sleep with you: O my poem, the dark night is sure to come; take away pain and separation, hunger and fear. Just now a ray of dawn has flashed, like hope born of longing.

In "The End of the Cycle," the temper of letters floating through the sky carries a bitter stream of wavering fire; no one will hold the poet guilty for it. It is the end of the world's revolving cycle. There is no hope that metre will come to him; nor can his poetry, arrayed as before, turn into words and rain down.

In "Advice to Damayanti," people struck by arrows lie petrified (!). They are limbless, helpless people. Grass and leaves hold them fast, while Takshaka is entangled and concealed in the silk-cotton tree. There is swaying in the wind and the smouldering of fire in a gust. Damayanti, Damayanti: the silent forest. Among flowers and leaves is an orphaned sun (!); Hiranya's belly is cautiously slit open, and the thirty-three ugly mouths counsel the trees to go this way. Damayanti, do not cross the forest. In the darkness, traffickers in bodies wait in the north-eastern quarter. Damayanti, the time has come. Nala is hidden in the south-western corner. The trees know how a poem arrives. They know history, and man's cruelty. They know how the great forest was thoughtlessly laid waste and destroyed. Domesticated (!) trees have forgotten their language. They warn Damayanti: do not trust human beings; they will bind you with stories, poems and rumours. Do not cross the forest. If she does not, all the trees will write their first poem about Damayanti.

In "Questionnaire," the questions tumble forth: Is this the immovable final night? Is this the last line of the song? Can you read my poetry? Is this my last day? Is there now compulsion to do something (!), a body bewildered, some destitution suddenly felt? Was it borne in sleep? What is the destiny of my letters? The restless, hovering bee of the mind, like a current of deathless love.

In "Words Growing Within," the sound of words is like somebody weeping inside a cave. Or like laughter from a mountain summit. There is the stealthy approach of footsteps, the sound of an envelope being opened. Words bubble up from every line of a letter. And a sister's flowing tears are understood only belatedly. Sentences collapse; they cannot form either a remainder or a compound. One barely understands the cracking of a broken backbone, yet the hardened poet is dragged by the throat. Within poetry, things heard, sensed and understood appear nonetheless as intimations. These words emerge from the poet's own depths, but even he has no right to alter them. He has only the right to the kiss, to love's union. He has no right to churn and bind them, nor to hatred or anger. He may, however, decorate them with flowers and leaves, or weave a braid through the watches of night. He may brighten the parting of the hair with the first sun's redness, place a necklace at the throat, wrap warm tree-bark about the body of words, and thus honour facts that have happened to that body. The poet dedicates this poem to the poet Ilarani Singh.

In "Known and Familiar," the body is read page after page, until life itself begins to feel known and familiar. There are songs of layers and depths and the poet's own confession that her trust in his words will fall away. And there is only the language of touch: a rural experience whose etymology nobody can supply, but which one lives.

In "Synonymous Word," the poet suspects that he cannot speak of a dream, for to do so would be to recite all your names. There is neither weakness in the verbal root nor any shortage of prefixes and suffixes. Otherwise he could have uttered an equivalent word—its language is that of an inaudible philosophy gone off with the hoofbeats of a horse. For this a new Amarakosha and a new poem would have to be written.

In "Sprout," four seeds of poetry germinate in the mind, and words of love are inscribed within them. Do not entangle them in questions whose answers even I do not know. Listening to this talk, one finds a treasury of words distributed to four poets all at once. Yet the four will sing together, and the sprout of love will grow.

In "After So Many Years," the speaker stands in your courtyard and asks to be allowed to read a poem; in childhood you had driven him away, fining him (!) for breaking the metre. Among the other presences was a sorrowful mother, without the means for Chhath worship, with grain for only four months of the year; roasted, unsalted sweet potatoes were her salvation. Let me read you a poem.

In "Why Do You Not Write?" there is a full stop. Not another line in your name. Why persist in writing a love letter at all, using letters invented by somebody else? One may overlay them with colour, meaning, clothing and longing. There is the language of dry lips and fingers playing on the soles of feet, of extraordinary inland-letter words and their arrangement. And then there is the reproach of not writing a letter.

In "Rajhans," the royal swan of poetry has moved two steps away from your body. Meteor showers and other disturbances have left it no leisure. Nor has your body yet been put to its use. I shall ask the swan to fly with you once. For as long as it can bear your weight. The poet's simile of a teardrop lies hidden beneath the edge of the sari, by the soles of the feet; he will ask the royal swan to lay aside the curiosity that has become a young woman.

In "Darkness," a bird says: reveal nothing confidential, or darkness will descend. Last night poetry came for a watch of the night and disappeared into the crowd of prose. There is a secret history, sin, the distance from love to marriage, and other such things. Why are you frightened? No one will ask your name. No one will ask; bird, tell me what you knew of the poet whose grave has only just been dug.

In "You Alone," I have called you into the poem and seen you several times. But you do not even turn to look. It is no ordinary document of love in which profit and loss are entered in a ledger. Nor is it a routine invitation or the food of common people. I have given you a name in the poem, one that the little chirping birds might pronounce. Not a name around which some sensational tale might be built. Yet you say nothing.

In "Ancient Love," the song demands its price. It asks and answers questions, though where is there room for that in nature's school? Ancient love is confined from the textbook to the history lesson. There is the examination question: use an old word in a sentence. Are all the sentences true or false? State their meaning … But I have grown clever now. I can read the anguish of the Mandakranta metre. I can measure the chastity of the pure dhaivata note. My blood has rightly recognised the savagery of life's arithmetic. I speak little, and when I do, I turn not towards the past but towards the unheard, unarrived, ghostly time. My vision advances towards feelings neither spoken nor translated. The ridge of a banana field, the haunted cattle and the old love have left everything soiled.

In "Desire," I need something—but what am I to desire? You are infinite; free of qualifying adjectives, you will instantly fulfil my heart's wish. Before I can desire anything, the suffixes of this illusionary world take hold: my life is bound up in nominal and verbal endings, in fixed phrases, in an impoverished lexicon. I can give you the short, the very short, the syllable Om, the form of a Vedic hymn. My small desires, language, feeling and pain are irregular, while the fragrance of Yaman Kalyan is regulated.

In "For My Husband—1," a hole has appeared in your roof; the bitter cold wind has chilled the starch-water, and the tears of the sky have soaked my sweet potatoes. The bedding is wet, you are silent, and this hole will bring you to ruin. Then write the song of that destruction in your own hand.

In "For My Husband—2," he says my place is on his head, but I refuse to remain with the severed or dishevelled topknot. In his heart? I will not live beside the breathing apparatus. In his eyes? Not beside the tears beneath his spectacles. On his lips? I shall not become the beads of a prayer-rosary. On his tongue (because of the taste of cooking)? Yes, perhaps—but there must be a way out of that too. Beneath the shoes on his feet, upon the earth, I understand politics. How does a shoe rise from beneath the foot to the head? The day you understand that, you will have learned the first lesson of resistance.

In "For My Husband—3," do not ask about grammar or script. This poem! What am I to do—throw it into the fire? Do not say such things. What if I am illiterate? I am a magic wand that can be waved.

If anyone writes a poem about me, and grammar upon my consciousness, why should that be surprising? Do not call it hollow pretence! In "Accounts," Hiriya puts five words in her bag before going to work in the fields at dawn. One word is spent eating unsalted sweet potato; half a word is used when Bhusahu Babu kicks her three times as she takes shelter under a peepal tree in the rain. One and a half remain, and another one and a half are set aside for liquor bought on credit at Chuhara's shop in the Chamar settlement. The remaining words—seven times fourteen of them! —she reserves to purchase provisions in the market. By evening not a word remains to place upon Hiriya's heart; how then can she open it without words? She stands in the courtyard under the dew all night.

In "Self-Statement," let me tell you something of my mind, Kapalkundala. But the songstress has been made to stand there for the people's leader of striking weavers … The showman recites my own poetry while I wear a rope around my waist in a separate enclosure. Let us speak, then, of something other than poetry. But neither relish, nor words, nor the force of a blow is left. I have no such name either: what a prosaic life! Let us ask something beyond the walls of prose: in which grammatical person's number is one entangled, in the forest entangled in tense and case? The ruin of indeclinables, the stripping of adjectives of their clothing, and the removal of the substantive from its throne. Is there anyone who can discern the mind's condition by seeing a prefix? In the tangled locks of constrained masculinity lies your hand, Panini. And the Maheshvara Sutras will cry aloud when I say something to you. Patanjali and Hemachandra will subdue the poet and explain the second person singular. Tvam, tvam, tvaya, tubhyam, tvat, tava, tvayi—the declensional forms of "you." Kapalkundala, from the mind onward, everything lacks rule, class or aim; and you alone remain singular in the second person.

From you comes love, from you hatred—love and hatred come from you; on the day of the last truth, hang me, and then you shall no longer hear me. Before you can bring me down, I shall cast you away. I have removed all the lamps from near you. I love you, but I hate you still more. I have put an end to eyes, hands and both lips. Even so, your smile turns false words into ice around my philosophy, and the current moves again through every vein.

In "Leave a Little Space," leave this corner free, my longing beneath the heap of letters. I myself had written it, to make a poem about you! I need space, for the poet has three legs: one covered in beastliness, another with ink dried upon its tip, and the third a counterfeit heart. If you want a poet like me, leave a little room.

In "Fear—1," there is the Atharvan poet. What if the book is stolen? Then perhaps the poem will survive under another person's name while the poet disappears from history.

It costs money to keep me alive and trouble to arrange my funeral pyre (I adorned it with profound mantras); how much history will have to be written upon my poetry in anger! In "Fear—2," the ability to deceive has arrived: I now fear no one. For I have learned the arts of floating and becoming the very lowest! Will an inaudible word awaken the rabbit and owl, and the touch of an untouchable girl awaken hunger? I have learned the art of perishing! I am no longer toothless; a pair of teeth has appeared! Hard words, cool breasts, vast sentences, tender compositions, fearsome commentaries and scattered texts, overwhelmed by meaning and meaninglessness.

In "Naming," call the moon chandrama and the stars a nebula, and the very meaning of night changes! Call light pratyusha and the sun martanda, and the eyes are dazzled. Call a forest a pleasure-grove and grass durva and akshata, and the mantra seems to recite itself. Call ceaseless toil tireless effort and the joining of two unlike words a compound, and the broken heart cools! Life belongs only to the living, and only to you and me, who survive by changing our forms, trusting the changing horoscope of each lunar day and the calculations of fate. Call me Dushyanta and you Shakuntala, and concern for Kanva and the fawn arises at once.

In "Today's Poet, a Very Undisciplined Poet," bound and dragged by the rope of metre and non-metre, trapped, wounded and rubbed raw, dwell and burn in the spice of ornamentation, heating and covering, but do not leap across mountains or roar. Keep singing the dhaivata note. Poet! Become your own line and go beyond it, to the threshold of poets. The poets are coming—kavih, kavi, kavayah—to a modern tune. Critics who will make poetry metrical, fettered and venerated through their thought. They will let poetry remain half-poetry and half-non-poetry, upon the half-woman, half-man Ardhanarishvara.

How unruly is this poet of today, this Hatnarishvara! In "You Said Nothing," you have said nothing to this day; you have buried a treasury of words beneath the earth. But corpses are what we bury beneath the ground. Yet I am a Hindu enthusiast intoxicated with religion: even in death I shall not go underground; I shall burn, blaze and chant my song in the flames. Nails and hair will disappear; which discipline or scripture has taught us to bridle feeling? Let the body remain covered beneath pride and figures of speech; lock the throat so that no sound can emerge. But I am a Rajput of the solar dynasty; my weapons are word, meaning, voice and script. If defeated in debate, I shall surrender! But whether I win or lose, I shall certainly speak. The apparatus of light lies restless; the red, green and yellow signals are mute. I glimpse your plan: to strip away clothing and weapons, to speak falsehood through half-truths, to sit in the row and steal the nectar; life, a corpse of words, is at stake in this game of signs! Yet I still hope you will say something, or at least begin to sing one of my songs.

In "Recite Your Poem!" you have taken your old lover—that is, me—to that new house on the summit! I shall ask the clouds the way there, and they will smile crookedly at the sight of us together! Yet neither clouds, nor stars, nor zodiac, horoscope or heavenly geometry, nor any mistake in fate's arithmetic caused that separation; together they conspired to bring it about! Our last meeting took place in a hollow of the moon. Neither the stones nor the geography of darkness were to blame. The signs of sun and earth, the stars' signatures, all conspired to bring about separation. So that neither of us could utter a single memorable line or word. Silence strangled our throats. Yet the fault was neither silence's nor the inscription on the wall, whose alien letters we had never learned to read. The hollow filled with your poems, their lines rising upward, while our attempt to climb their summit failed. I do not blame those lines. You alone have no monopoly on betrayal. I have now learned your language, to climb the mountain ablaze with longing, to read every line, poem and inscription! I have learned to read your signature. But in this inscription you are showing me measurements of foundations, timber, sand and cement, doors, hinges and floors! I want instead to hear a few poems from you, in your language, which is now mine as well.

In "Biography," should there be the mutiny of the cantonments, Tantia Tope, Victoria, the birth of the government poet Rabindranath and discussions of widow remarriage? Has an insect eaten a whole page of the first issue of the theatre journal Hera Shim Lebedev? But for the custodians of today's theatre it scarcely matters whether the page can be found. On the reverse is an essay on Michael Madhusudan and the beginnings of modern poetry; but how would a poet who learned nothing after 1990 know that! And so he does not fit the shape-shifters like me. And 1951: the birth of a government poet of this century, his impoverished childhood, the neglect he suffered, false tales of Vivekananda and terse sayings? Must Girish Ghosh, Sir Ashutosh, Netaji's escape and the Mahatma's imprisonment precede my story? Falsehood! For does history begin only after Godse's appearance and my birth? Then come the shattered geography, the arithmetic of appropriation, orthodox caste divisions, and the crown of "Vedana." Set the heart right? You, my official biographer, would like every chapter to begin in 1951. My stepmother and the matriarch of the family. Fabricated tales of Grandmother, transformed into the princess of Sonbarsa. How did poetry enter, and what woman entered my life? I am abandoning the tale: look for somebody else. Some unborn, unknown and unnamed poet.

Until then poetry herself will care for me and narrate my life! In "Second Person Singular," the command is to think of somebody other than you! But trees and flowers, stones and treacherous grammar have spread their snares! You yourself are the second person singular! Politics, mountains of national debt, corrupt appointments … you are the second person singular, yet … write Navya-Nyaya's injustice, pile up Vaisheshika categories, forget the grammar of wealth; you are the second person singular, yet … the aesthetic essence of erotic feeling and suggestion is futile, merely momentary. From a life reaching to Jatayu, to saving somebody else's Sita, Gita. Chalati, chalatah, chalanti—poetry flowing like a stream of true speech, with grammar in the second person singular: you are there, yet … how could I think of anything other than you?

Poetry: People read little poetry. The efforts to propagate a language such as Sanskrit employ simplified Sanskrit in conversational workshops. Fiction and novels are translated into Sanskrit from modern languages, but poetry is excluded from that process. The reason is that no one reads poetry, and the translation of poems into a language that needs camps to teach its use is deemed a waste of energy. The position of Maithili has become somewhat similar: if the villages disappeared today, the number of people speaking the language would shrink drastically. People would speak Maithili only at seminars and literary gatherings. The need for camps even to teach Maithili pronunciation is already being felt. What, then, is the need or justification for writing poetry in Maithili? Emphasising that one writes poems because there is too little time merely brings the horror of the situation into sharper focus. Under such conditions, events in the neighbourhood, personal ambitions, allegations and accounts of journeys have become the subject matter of Maithili poetry. But why not use prose for these things? Stories are dramatised for the stage, but to what purpose is prose converted into poetry? The readers of these hastily written poems are partisan reviewers and those "great poets" who transform prose into verse and write glowing reviews of their own poetry in their prefaces! Who will recognise the worth of poetic creation? Personal, worldly experience that does not reach sufficient depth cannot become distinguished poetry, even if it rhymes. However abstract metaphysical reflection may be, unless it joins the world of lived experience it cannot stir us either, even if it is unrhymed or carries the banner of a faction or an ideology. Human beings first need food, clothing and shelter, and only then metaphysical contemplation. The Buddha asks whether all those participating in festivities know that death is inevitable; if they do, how can they continue to celebrate? Similarly, when the modern Maithili poet sees the linguistic, cultural and economic ground disappearing from beneath his feet and yet shuts his eyes to that truth, his attempt to force ideological commentary about events at home and abroad into verse lacks force. Even when he writes, as a supposed favour, about the indigenous Dalit community, intending to help it, his poetry acquires no cutting edge. But when Rajdev Mandal writes poetry—

...

Drop by drop, from the dripping blood,
The earth is being bathed;
A bird asks
This question of its own heart:
Will the dark and heavy night ahead
Leave our kind alive ...?

That sends a shudder through us. The poet's caste, the caste of that bird—or what? What need has this poem of factional bargaining or a self-absorbed preface? What party manoeuvring or ideological banner does such feeling require? Poetry needs excellence. It needs a foundation in language and culture. It does not merely need imported subject matter introduced in a patronising spirit. Nor does it need imported sensibility that amounts to a superficial, condescending attempt to search for the linguistic, cultural and economic foundation vanishing under its own feet. A good poem may be written on any subject: on the Buddha's concern for humanity's future, or to lend strength to an unsettled mind—otherwise people will keep going to hypocritical holy men for sermons. It may address society's linguistic, cultural and economic basis—otherwise camps will have to be organised to teach Maithili itself. Imagery must also communicate; otherwise one must first construct an atmosphere around the poet, arrange a stage for his poems, and hold training camps in his vocabulary and ideology. Some poets are already doing precisely that! The soft rises and falls of Mithila's speech, the manifold strengths of its working people, and also the region's cultural and social rigidities, its politics, daily life, social norms, economic conditions, morals, religion and philosophy—all must find a place in literature. Without these, literature will become one-sided, topple over, and be fit only to frame and hang on a wall. To create poetry is a literary necessity. The day it becomes necessary to hold camps to teach the people of Mithila the Maithili language, the very existence of poetry can be questioned. Poets must remain vigilant so that such a day never comes. Against this background, tvam, tvam, tvaya, tubhyam, tvat, tava, tvayi—Nachiketa's second person singular—appears in contrast to aham, mam, maya, mahyam, mat, mama, mayi, the forms of the first person singular.

The poet himself, in collaboration with Rizio Yohannan Raj, translated this book into English under the title Second Person Singular. Although the poet wrote no preface to the Maithili book, he did write one for the English translation. A Maithili rendering of that preface is given below. Both the Maithili and English editions contain line drawings between the poems, but, with a few exceptions, the drawings differ between the two editions, and the positions of some have changed, even though the artist is the same, Sanjay Bhattacharya. The poem "Shuchita-Sucharitasu" has not been translated into English. The pseudonym "Nachiketa" has also been removed from the poet's name in the English translation.

By Way of Introduction

I

Whenever I speak or write in a pluralistic environment such as India's, someone in the audience wants to know: who is speaking? Please explain.

When one plays several roles in a multilingual setting, one must draw a terminological line of demarcation. Yet my instinct as a grammarian sometimes defeats the poet within me. I realise that, if given the opportunity, readers of this slim book might wish to part company with the grammarian. I remember verbal battles with my grandfather over what was correct and incorrect and how words could best be used. Exasperated, he would say, "Never get in the grammarian's way!" Whenever I asked him why, he would recite an old saying in unadulterated Maithili, which means:

"Fall in love with a grammarian and all your letters will be painted red with mistakes; quarrel with him and you will get your verb forms wrong; argue with him and you will forget every demonstrative adjective; kill a grammarian and his ghost will hang around with weak verbs; abuse him and a tree of tautologies will spring up. You cannot overpower him. So if you encounter a grammarian and a snake, kill the grammarian first. Kill him under any circumstances!"

Whatever one may say about making grammar and linguistics a profession, there is no doubt that deictic expressions—words or phrases whose meaning is not clear without a context—anaphoric expressions, by which an earlier word gives its meaning to a later one, and the inflections of words for person, number and gender, remain indispensable to translators and bilingual speakers. Location and discourse style remain important too (Homi Bhabha, The Location of Culture, New York: Routledge, 1994), since the abundance or poverty of a person's discourse helps determine where that person is situated. Who could understand this better than a writer in a marginalised language such as Maithili? Beginning in the thirteenth century, the language witnessed the unforgettable songs of Vidyapati, Lochandas and Chanda Jha, and the immensely popular plays of Umapati and some thirty other dramatists. Yet in recent times it has not produced many poets or novelists capable of acquiring readers in other linguistic and cultural spaces. Poets such as Nagarjun (Yatri) and Rajkamal Chaudhary, and writers such as Harimohan Jha and Lily Ray, have been translated into other Indian languages, but attempts to reach an international readership remain exceedingly limited.

It is true that fashionable theories such as Western postmodernism have made their appearance on a smaller scale: the fragmentation of ideals and the heterogeneity of signifiers, with the consequent fragmentation of social processes, have appeared in Maithili literature as in other modern Indian languages. These trends have given rise to explanations that account for actual and perceived social problems only partially or relatively, not in their entirety. They certainly carry us towards a point where place and worldliness become emptied of context. But even today, when I discuss dynamic verbs and the postpositions that lead from here to there, location and deictic words and phrases—expressions that cannot be understood without context—remain important to me as a writer.

What my poetry says will place the distinction of grammatical person at the centre. This does not mean that my concern for gender and number is any less, as many of the poems here demonstrate; these concepts are invaluable in translation, interpretation and the conceptual worlds of others. It is another matter that some of us may feel that many basic technical terms have lost their context. For the poet and the person he addresses, however, the "second person singular" will always remain a real Other.

At this point I feel I should set out my own position in the debate between "I" and "he," so that my readers may understand the background of a multicultural writer. I write poetry and drama mainly in Maithili, spoken in northern Bihar and Nepal's Tarai, and I also write literary essays, serious poetry and songs in Bangla. I have written essays in Hindi as well. My English writing chiefly concerns literature and literary translation. I inhabit several languages because of my background: my mother came from Mymensingh in Bangladesh, and my wife, Manaka, is a Bangla speaker from Kolkata, while my father was a native Maithili speaker and an author and editor in that language. Both my parents taught Hindi literature at university, giving us opportunities to meet many important writers of Hindi and Maithili literature in our home. In addition, my education was in Bangla through school and exclusively in English at college and university. This multilingual background defined my literary inclination. Several volumes of my Maithili poetry and eleven plays have been published. The present collection is a translation of my Maithili poetry collection Madhyam Purush Ekvachan, published in 2005.

In Bangla I have published a poetry collection, a book of children's verse and a collection of edited literary essays. As a literary translator, my most satisfying work has been Anukriti (1999), a Bangla translation of outstanding Maithili poems written since 1950, as well as a volume of Rabindranath's children's literature published in 1997. My journey from Maithili to Bangla to English, with a few steps through Hindi along the way, has enriched both the subject matter and form of my writing. I write on different subjects in different languages, and beyond poetry I work in different genres: drama in Maithili, literary criticism in Bangla, essays on translation in English and the sociology of language in Hindi.

II

Thus, broadly speaking, I perform three fundamental kinds of work, and this is how I should like to regard myself: an insignificant writer, producing everything from poetry to essays; a translator (not a very good one, though I do not know how others would rank me), moving between several languages, mainly English, Maithili, Bangla and Hindi, in that order; and a linguist specialising in both the structural and social aspects of language. These are, in a way, the roles of reader, teacher and employer.

As a writer, my earliest work seems to have involved concealing my identity. Whenever I write in any of these languages, I try to erase the signs that disclose my professional identity or my plural existence—even my age and bodily marks that might betray my taste in dress. Some signs may still remain visible or detectable. It is no wonder, then, that I adopted a pen name in Maithili. I have known writers who present themselves as somebody or something else, and I am sure we all have stories about writers whose game is to turn themselves into another. There are many ways of playing it. Some define their position through camouflage. Others trim the boundaries of the frame into which the text must fit. Some try to hide the pair of eyes—the eyes of a supporter or the familiar "I" of a poem or narrative—through which the reader is invited to watch events unfold. Others make public pronouncements, declaring contemporary or earlier writers worthless, or ridicule all critics and academic criticism. To me, it is a game everyone plays. Some play openly; others conceal their manoeuvres in various ways. My answer as a writer has been to push my "I" into the background and place the social interpretation of feelings, relationships and their friction at the centre. Put differently, it is the conversion of my personal ending from the first person singular to the third person singular in order to address "you"—my second person singular.

As a translator, however, I wish to put myself at the centre; I try to occupy the front seat, and I do. Textbook accounts of translation teach us to maintain a secondary presence so that the original author may be brought into relief through the process we undertake. Yet as a practitioner of that process I behave as an equal: taking liberties when there is a justification for them, stitching or repairing what needs attention, and adding patches beneath carefully chosen fabric when I cannot leave them undone. People much more learned than I, engaged in this activity, have continually warned me that I am at best merely the recipient of a text, a participant in the author's conversation. I am told I must let the author, whose voice may be muffled by my conspicuous or well-intentioned interventions, make the magnificent presence of the first person felt through every word, the voices of the text's characters and every turn the text takes.

It is true that an author converses with readers through a text, establishing a kind of paired relation between first and second persons. But when I entered the world of translation, I was told I had no right to interrupt the author or his intentions, for I was merely a reader. Unfortunately, even as readers we are hurt by decisions authors take; once we enter a text and a character becomes our own, we grow impatient with that character's misfortunes. It is hardly surprising, therefore, that readers question the author's knowledge of time and place, education, background and scholarship on account of those decisions. At the moment of creation, when the reader abandons a passive position and assumes an active creative role as translator-interpreter, I see considerable scope for a translator to become more than a passive sounding board, and to go beyond merely reporting events. This, I think, is a quiet revolution that has occurred in several important works of translation over time. This is what I should like to see as a transformation from the second person to the first.

As a linguist, I have worked in linguistic situations about which I knew little beforehand—Ladakhi, Adi and even Telugu. Most of my work, however, has concerned languages I know well, and in some projects my intuitive knowledge as a native speaker has played the leading role in deciding which available solution is best. Whenever I worked on Bangla, Maithili and Hindi, all three of which I acquired naturally, the greatest challenge posed by the classical school of linguistics was that I should first forget that I knew those languages. I was told to set aside my personal relativity and look at my languages objectively, even with a kind of anxiety. Becoming an Other as a linguist was considered essential, because utterance after utterance that might appear meaningless could, in certain circumstances, become a possible utterance. Although this may sound absurd, we were trained to work with natural languages, and I recognise a remarkable judgement in which truth prevails and falsehood is defeated. If my linguistic intuition sifts utterances from another cultural location, within a structural or poetic frame or an act of creation, the person changes from third to first.

Thus, whichever role I take, my personal endings change through certain transformations. I understand and believe that when I translate even my own poetry, translation continues the violence done to the original language and text: the whole undertaking may seem a rebellion against grammar, yet every resulting text becomes the product of the rules of another grammar. Eric Cheyfitz, in The Poetics of Imperialism (Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1997), argues that translation, as a rule, performs a violent surgery upon the original text it transforms, because it attempts to restate the thought embedded in that text in a significantly different, never wholly equivalent form. When one culture translates another, therefore, the original is altered.

I do not know how far these transformations will please the readers of this book. Katha, a major organisation working to build bridges between languages, surely understands these matters. I find reassurance in recalling that my artist friend Sanjay Bhattacharya, having read these poems both in the original and in translation, spent several weeks in his studio producing attractive drawings that also make the book a memorable visual experience.

The title Second Person Singular has become popular in world literature as well. Formerly English distinguished thou (second person singular) from you (second person plural), but now you serves both singular and plural.

Sayed Kashua is an Arab-Israeli novelist. His Hebrew novel appeared in 2010 and was translated into English by Mitch Ginsburg in 2012 as Second Person Singular. The novel has two plots that eventually converge.

Both plots concern Hebrew-speaking Arab Israelis living in Israel.

The first follows a lawyer in West Jerusalem who buys an old copy of Tolstoy's The Kreutzer Sonata (named after Beethoven's sonata of the same name). The narrator of The Kreutzer Sonata tells fellow passengers on a train how, driven by jealousy over his wife's suspected affair with a violinist, he killed her; she and the violinist used to perform Beethoven's Kreutzer Sonata together. Tolstoy's book was banned at the time. The lawyer's wife had mentioned it, since the work had often been discussed in lectures on Freud's psychology. Inside the copy, the lawyer finds an Arabic note written in his wife's hand, resembling a love letter. On its first page appears the name of a former owner, Yonatan. Abandoning his other affairs, he begins to search for Yonatan.

The second plot concerns Amir, a social worker. He goes dancing with a new trainee named Leila. That night Amir leaves his job and begins caring for a Jewish man named Yonatan, who is in a persistent vegetative state and closely resembles him. Leila, meanwhile, leaves a note at Amir's office saying she enjoyed their dance and asking him to telephone her. Amir enrolls in an art school in Yonatan's name and, after Yonatan dies, assumes his identity.

When the lawyer finally finds Amir, he discovers that Leila is the lawyer's own wife. Both Amir and Leila say that their dance took place before Leila met the lawyer. The lawyer is satisfied. But in the novel's postscript, when he later visits an exhibition of art-school graduates, he sees a nude painting by Amir, now living as Yonatan, that is the very image of Leila!

Nachiketa's Second Person Singular comes to us through tvam, tvam, tvaya, tubhyam, tvat, tava and tvayi—the Sanskrit cases of "you"—in contrast to aham, mam, maya, mahyam, mat, mama and mayi, the forms of "I."

A diversity of images is the lifeblood of poetry. A poem deserves to be written only when meaning emerges from word after word; for a commentary upon words, after all, there is already the genre of prose.

In "In Defiance of the Sea," the sea lies between you and me, and Varuna holds the crests of the tides, wondering whether to allow love or the sea to win. He remains deep in thought: there is no final decision. Both possibilities appear valid, yet only one can prevail, and the power of choice lies in his hold upon the tide's crest. In "A Particular Season on Earth," there is a net cast for words, there is surrender, and this is poetry—and renunciation? Water becomes sky. The sky is an image; what is sky? Infinite and of one colour. If it is water, then water must surely become sky too. There is the rain god of a barren land; if raindrops fell, why would the land be barren? This god is surely not born—yet he is a rain god who can make even the sky weep without limit! There is compromise with words, and only then can the work proceed. To compromise with words is also to compromise with meaning; the work itself then becomes relative. A play of meanings results from a play of words. In "You," sentences stammer, hands are clasped while still hot. Since the previous poem has compromised meaning, the sentence must surely stammer, for sentences are made of words. In "The Story of Night and Day," the Buddha leaves his home while the world sleeps, but the poet, by contrast, sets out into the poem. In "The End of the Cycle," letters float through the sky and stir a stream of fire. Letters make words, and words make sentences. It is letters, not clarified butter, that fan the fire; words compromise, sentences stammer. In "Advice to Damayanti," even the trees know how poetry arrives. Damayanti … do not cross the forest. If she does not, all the trees will write their first poem about her. Letters, words and sentences ignite, compromise and stammer … If Damayanti crosses the forest, all the trees will write their first poem about her, for they know how poetry comes into being. In "Questionnaire," the speaker asks, "Can you read my poem?" and "Is this my last day?" Having become a poem, it now needs someone to read it, and the means and desire to read it. In "Words Growing Within," the sentence that earlier stammered now collapses. Heard, felt and understood things enter the poem, even if only as intimations. The poet dedicates this poem to the poet Ilarani Singh.

In "Known and Familiar," the body is read page by page and life begins to seem known and familiar. Normally pages are written one after another; here life itself advances page by page, and the farther it advances the more familiar it seems. In "Synonymous Word," a new Amarakosha and a new poem must be written: a new vocabulary for a new poem, first a collection of the words, then the poem. In "Sprout," four seeds of poetry grow in the mind, and the treasury of words has been distributed among four poets at once. Poetry is a game of words! In "After So Many Years," the speaker was chased away in childhood for breaking metre. Now grown up, with so many years elapsed, he still asks to be permitted to read a poem. In "Why Do You Not Write?" why this stubborn insistence upon writing a love letter? Its letters were invented by someone else, and colour, meaning, clothing and longing merely laid over them. What an empty insistence! In "Rajhans," there is poetry's royal swan: "I shall ask it to fly with you once." In "Darkness," poetry came last night and disappeared into the crowd of prose. In "You Alone," "I have given you a name in the poem, one a little bird could pronounce," yet you say nothing. In "Ancient Love," the speaker can read the anguish of the Mandakranta metre, measure the fidelity of the pure dhaivata note, and recognise in his blood the barbarity of life's arithmetic. In "Desire," what is there that I want, and what am I to desire? I can offer the short and very short syllables, Om, and the shape of a Vedic hymn. In "For My Husband—1," the sky's tears have soaked my sweet potatoes. In "For My Husband—2," how does a shoe rise from beneath the foot to the head? Understanding that is the first lesson of resistance. In "For My Husband—3," why be surprised if somebody writes poetry about me, and grammar upon my mind? In "Accounts," Hiriya puts five words into her bag as she leaves for fieldwork at dawn. By evening none remains to place upon her heart; without words, how can she open that heart?

In "Self-Statement," the showman recites my poem while I wear a rope around my waist in another enclosure. What a prosaic life! Patanjali and Hemachandra suppress the poet and explain the second person singular: directionless, you alone in the second person singular. In "From You Love, from You Hatred," I love you, but hate you even more. In "Leave a Little Space," space is needed because the poet has three legs: one covered with animality, another tipped with dried ink, the third a counterfeit heart. If you want a poet like me, leave me a little room. In "Fear—1," it costs money to keep me alive and trouble to arrange my pyre! In "Fear—2," the art of deception has arrived. I am no longer toothless: a pair of teeth has grown! In "Naming," call a forest a grove and grass durva and akshata, and the mantra recites itself. If my name is Dushyanta and yours Shakuntala, concern for Kanva and the fawn follows automatically. Nature and character are born through names, through words. In "Today's Poet, a Very Undisciplined Poet," the poets are coming—kavih, kavi, kavayah—to a modern tune, those who would make poetry metrical, fettered and venerated. In "You Said Nothing," even in death I shall not go under the earth: I shall burn and sing my song in the flames. I am a solar-dynasty Rajput, and my weapons are word, meaning, voice and script. In "Recite Your Poem!" you took your old lover, meaning me, to that new house on the summit. Our last meeting was in a hollow of the moon. Yet I want to hear a few poems in your language, which is now mine as well. In "Biography," has an insect eaten the whole first page of the account of the theatre and Herasim Lebedeff? Does history begin only with the appearance of Godse and my birth? There is some unborn, unknown, unnamed poet; until then poetry herself will look after me and tell my life story. "Second Person Singular" is the second title-bearing poem in the collection; in the earlier poem, the phrase appeared within the poem rather than as its title. Mountains of national debt, corrupt appointments ... write of Navya-Nyaya and injustice, pile up Vaisheshika categories, forget the grammar of wealth: you yourself are the second person singular, yet ...

Thus the second person singular arrives in company with a multitude of images.

The second person singular is the person—male or female—who is addressed individually. Nachiketa's Second Person Singular was composed within a postmodern society in which webs of letters and words and arrangements of sentences are fashioned, where changing a word or substituting a synonym can make the sun begin to give warmth.

Four Postmodern Plays: Samuel Beckett's French Play Waiting for Godot, Harold Pinter's English Play The Birthday Party, Badal Sircar's Bangla Play Evam Indrajit, and Uday Narayan Singh "Nachiketa"'s Maithili Play No Entry: Ma Pravish

[No Entry: Ma Pravish was published in 2008 but was not selected for the Sahitya Akademi Award in 2010, 2011 or 2012. The book will now no longer be eligible for the Sahitya Akademi Award for Maithili literature. There have been other instances of this kind. The place of No Entry: Ma Pravish within Maithili and world literature is examined in the following essay. This series will continue.]

.....

Waiting for Godot is a two-act tragicomedy. Samuel Beckett wrote it in French in 1952, and it was first performed in Paris in 1953. The English-language version was staged in London in 1955 and published in 1956.

Harold Pinter's English play The Birthday Party was staged in Cambridge in 1958 and published in 1960.

Badal Sircar's Bangla play Evam Indrajit was written in 1962 and staged in Calcutta in 1965.

Uday Narayan Singh "Nachiketa"'s No Entry: Ma Pravish was published electronically in 2008 and subsequently in print that year. On 19 February 2011, this ninety-minute play was performed under Kunal's direction at Kalidas Rangalaya, Patna.

These four plays—in French, English, Bangla and Maithili—are classed as postmodern drama. Those who came away from a performance of Samuel Beckett's Waiting for Godot experienced something strange. The play has only five characters: Estragon, Vladimir, Lucky, Pozzo and a boy. At evening, beside a tree on a country road, Estragon sits on a mound, struggling to remove a boot with both hands. He becomes breathless and exhausted. He starts speaking with Vladimir, and a long, apparently pointless conversation wanders from one subject to another. Pozzo and Lucky arrive. Pozzo appears to be the master and Lucky the servant—a servant with a long rope fastened around his neck by Pozzo. Lucky enters first, followed by Pozzo holding the rope. Lucky carries a large bag, a folding stool, a picnic basket and a greatcoat. Pozzo has a whip. Lucky obeys orders. When commanded, he picks up all his burdens again and stands. Estragon and Vladimir dislike seeing him loaded down like this; when Pozzo says that Lucky is used to it, Estragon takes Pozzo for a tyrant. Estragon wipes Lucky's tears, and Lucky kicks him. Pozzo says he had warned them that Lucky dislikes strangers. And what are Estragon and Vladimir doing there? They are waiting for someone called Godot.

Pozzo and Lucky depart. A boy comes to Estragon and Vladimir and says that Godot cannot come today; he will come tomorrow. More aimless conversation follows, and the boy too leaves. The light on the stage then changes to night and the moon rises. Vladimir and Estragon resume their conversation. Even amid the apparently idle talk there are things of significance. They decide to leave, but neither moves. The curtain falls on Act One.

Act Two takes place at the same time and in the same location. Vladimir remembers everything, but Estragon has forgotten. Estragon says he forgets everything immediately or never forgets at all, although fragments do return to him. Pozzo and Lucky arrive. Pozzo is now blind; Lucky still carries the loads. The rope is there too, but shorter. Pozzo and Lucky fall down. Pozzo cries for help, but Estragon and Vladimir continue talking.

As in the first act, Estragon calls Vladimir "Didi." Vladimir says they should not waste their time in idle chatter. At regular intervals Pozzo repeats his anguished cry for "Help!" Yet Estragon and Vladimir pay no attention. Pozzo offers a hundred francs and then two hundred as an inducement for someone to help him. Vladimir goes to raise him, but falls in the attempt and cries out for help himself. After further conversation, Estragon tries to lift Vladimir and falls too. Vladimir strikes Pozzo, who crawls away. Vladimir then seeks him out and calls, "Come back; I won't hurt you."

Estragon and Vladimir think about getting up and manage to rise. Estragon remarks that standing up is as easy as child's play; Vladimir says it is merely a question of willpower. Pozzo calls for help. Together they lift him, then release him, and he falls again. They raise him once more and keep hold of him, occasionally slackening their grip to test whether he can stand, only to catch him when he starts to fall. Pozzo too seems to have forgotten yesterday's events. He says he went to bed one day and awoke blind. He even wonders whether he is still asleep. He asks after Lucky and does not seem to remember how they fell. Pozzo suggests that Lucky will get up if the rope around his neck is pulled hard or he is kicked in the face. Vladimir tells Estragon that he has a fine opportunity for revenge. Estragon asks—his memory returning!—what if Lucky defends himself? Pozzo replies that Lucky never defends himself. Estragon, or rather Vladimir, starts kicking Lucky, only to hurt himself. Meanwhile Pozzo appears to have got to his feet unaided.

Pozzo, who is taking Lucky to a market to sell him, remembers nothing of yesterday and will remember nothing of today tomorrow. He orders Lucky to get up, and Lucky rises and takes up his burdens. Pozzo asks for his whip. Lucky puts everything down, places the whip in Pozzo's hand, and lifts the burdens again. Pozzo asks for the rope; Lucky sets down everything, hands Pozzo the rope and shoulders everything once more!

Lucky and Pozzo leave. The boy returns and addresses Vladimir as Albert. Vladimir asks whether the boy does not recognise him and whether he did not come yesterday. The boy says this is his first visit. The message is unchanged: Godot will not come today but will certainly come tomorrow. Vladimir asks what Godot does; the boy replies that Godot does nothing. Vladimir asks about the boy's brother. The reply is that his brother is unhappy. Asked whether his brother came yesterday, the boy says he does not know. He adds that Godot has a beard, and that it is fair rather than black. As in the first act, he asks what he should tell Godot. Vladimir says,

"Tell him you met us." Vladimir rushes at the boy, but the boy runs away. The sun sets, and the moon appears.

Estragon says it might be better for them both if they parted. If Godot does not come tomorrow, Vladimir says, they will hang themselves with a rope; if he does come, they will be saved. Vladimir looks inside Lucky's hat, shakes it and puts it on. They resolve to leave, but neither moves. The curtain falls.

Harold Pinter's Three-Act Play The Birthday Party

The characters are Petey, Meg, Stanley, Lulu, Goldberg and McCann.

Act One: Meg gives Petey breakfast and asks whether Stanley is up. Stanley comes in, and Meg gives him breakfast too. Petey goes to work. Meg and Stanley talk intimately, joking with each other. Petey has told Meg that two men will arrive and stay for a few days in their house, which operates as a boarding house. Stanley questions her on hearing this and becomes worried. Stanley claims to have received an offer to play the piano in a nightclub in Paris, followed by Athens, Constantinople, Zagreb and Vladivostok—a job that would take him round the whole world. When asked, he says he has performed the piano throughout the world, in every country. He has given a concert once, he says; then he says he lost the address of the venue for his first concert and could not get there. When he arrived for the second, he found the place locked. Meg does not want Stanley to go anywhere.

Stanley feels that the two visitors are looking for someone. Lulu is heard. Meg leaves with a shopping bag; someone calls her Mrs Boles while speaking to her. Lulu enters and talks with Stanley. After Lulu leaves, Goldberg and McCann arrive. McCann calls Goldberg Nat. Stanley has already slipped away unnoticed. Meg enters, and Goldberg addresses her as Mrs Boles and introduces himself as Goldberg and his companion as McCann. In the ensuing conversation Goldberg asks the name and occupation of the lodger. Meg says his name is Stanley Webber and that he once gave a concert, but owing to a caretaker's mistake he was locked inside the venue overnight and remained there until morning. He then took his "tip," boarded a train and arrived here. Meg suddenly says it is Stanley's birthday. A birthday party is fixed for nine o'clock, and Lulu too will be invited in the afternoon. The three leave, and Stanley peers through the window. Meg returns. Stanley is apprehensive about the two men. When he asks their names, Meg forgets, then recalls "Gold ...," at which Stanley supplies "Goldberg." Meg asks if Stanley knows him, but Stanley says nothing. He then declares that today is not his birthday. Meg has brought him a child's drum as a present and asks for a kiss in return.

Act Two: Stanley and McCann are talking. Stanley wants to go out. He tells McCann that this is not a boarding house and never has been one. Petey and Goldberg come in. Goldberg addresses Petey as Mr Boles. After Petey leaves, Stanley says the people of the house have lost their sense of smell and cannot recognise the danger posed by Goldberg and McCann. He, Stanley, has a responsibility towards them.

McCann snatches Stanley's spectacles. McCann and Goldberg ask why he murdered his wife. They accuse him of having changed his name, of immorality and of corrupting women.

A quarrel breaks out. When it ends, Meg, apparently unaware of what has happened, enters in party clothes. Ordinary conversation follows.

Lulu arrives, and Goldberg seats her on his lap. When she says she thought his name was "Nat," Goldberg replies that his wife calls him "Simey."

The party game begins, with players blindfolded. Lulu ties a scarf around Mrs Boles's eyes; whoever she touches must next be blindfolded. She touches McCann, then Stanley is touched. His spectacles are taken away and he is blindfolded. McCann breaks Stanley's spectacles and places the drum in his path. Stanley falls and attempts to strangle Meg, but McCann and Goldberg intervene to save her.

Darkness spreads.

At the sight of Stanley approaching, Lulu faints. Stanley lays her on a table. McCann finds a torch and shines it on the table and on Stanley.

Act Three: Petey and Meg converse. Meg asks Petey about Stanley. Lulu enters and asks Goldberg what her father or Eddie, her first lover, would think if they heard of this. She says Goldberg has satisfied his wicked lust, teaching Lulu things a young woman would otherwise learn only after marrying three times. Goldberg says he did so because Lulu allowed him to.

Lulu leaves.

While Meg is absent, Goldberg and McCann take Stanley away. Petey tells them to leave him alone. Goldberg and McCann invite Petey to come along too, saying there is room in the car. Petey does not move. Left alone, he is joined by Meg. She asks whether they have gone. Petey says yes. She asks about Stanley—"Is he asleep?" Petey says he is.

"Let him sleep."

Meg asks whether it was not a good party. Petey says he arrived later.

The curtain falls.

Badal Sircar's Evam Indrajit

The characters of Evam Indrajit include the Writer, his Aunt, Manasi, Amal, Vimal, Kamal, Indrajit and, later, Indrajit's wife, another Manasi.

Act One: The Writer is in search of a play. His aunt is annoyed that he keeps writing and neglects food and drink. Manasi asks whether she may read what he has written. He says he has written nothing, and she urges him to try. The Writer calls four late arrivals from the audience on to the stage. Three are Amal, Vimal and Kamal. The fourth calls himself Nirmal Kumar. The Writer says that cannot be true and tells him to reveal his real name. He says it is Indrajit Ray. Thus: Amal, Vimal, Kamal and Indrajit. Manasi—her real name is different, but the Writer calls her Manasi—is Indrajit's maternal cousin. He loves her and wants to break with convention.

Act Two: Later Indrajit wonders whether the success of their love would give him an answer. Surely not. He will go to London too. He wants death but cannot bring himself to it. The Manasi named by the Writer remains unmarried and teaches in Hazaribagh.

Unlike Amal, Vimal and Kamal, however, Indrajit does not follow a fixed track. He wants to do something different. His aunt, whom he calls Mother, tells him to eat, while Manasi tells him to write. But once, when Manasi herself tells the Writer to eat, he is hurt: "You too? No!"

Manasi realises her mistake and asks about his writing. The Writer is worried: Indrajit refuses to accept reality and has no commitment. Manasi disagrees.

At least he dreams.

Indrajit returns from London to Calcutta and marries another woman, also called Manasi (Indrajit calls her Manasi; the earlier Manasi, whom the Writer named thus, is Indrajit's maternal cousin, whom he loves but cannot marry because of their familial relationship and what people would say. Indrajit continues to tell the Writer that her name is not Manasi).

Indrajit begins to realise, and tells Manasi, that individual difference is only an illusion. A dream is a dream; it cannot become reality. Manasi, Manasi, Manasi: they are all Manasi, just as Amal, Vimal and Kamal are alike. When the Writer asks, Indrajit responds, "Amal, Vimal, Kamal—and Indrajit too!"

The Writer's journey has neither destination nor purpose; it is a pointless journey undertaken for no reason. The Writer tells Indrajit that we must live and go on walking; though there is no holy shrine, we must undertake the pilgrimage nevertheless.

Uday Narayan Singh "Nachiketa"'s No Entry: Ma Pravish

First Kallola: This play, in the tradition of Jyotirishwar, is divided into kallolas. (Jyotirishwar's Varna Ratnakara, which is not a play, is arranged in kallolas, whereas his play Dhurtasamagama is divided into acts.) The first of its four kallolas begins at the gate of heaven—or hell. A large crowd of dead people waits in a queue to enter. Among them are a respectable gentleman killed in a road accident, soldiers who died in battle, and a thief, a rogue and a pickpocket killed in the course of stealing. The remarkably modern absurdity visible in Jyotirishwar's Dhurtasamagama also appears in No Entry: Ma Pravish. In the first kallola, the gentleman, on seeing the thief and the rogue break the queue, seizes them by their collars and drags them back to their original places. The rogue, who later turns out to be a local gangster but is at present posing as a respectable man, demands that the gentleman release his shirt. But when the pickpocket speaks in support of the gentleman against the thief, the rogue produces a knife, reveals his true nature and lunges at the pickpocket. Then the thief says the pickpocket is one of their own fraternity, though he could progress no farther than petty pickpocketing: he never became a seasoned thief like himself, much less a gangster like the rogue. At this the rogue turns against the thief: "Whom did you call a scoundrel?" The pickpocket seizes his chance and changes sides, telling the rogue that the thief meant not him but the pickpocket. He adds that the thief is such an accomplished thief that the householder's sons and dogs beat him during a theft and sent him here, yet he makes fun of me as if he were some great thief. Observing the thief's conduct, the respectable gentleman finds it hard to believe that he really is a thief. The pickpocket needles the thief still further. The thief then laments that had he not taken the pickpocket stealing that night, he would never have had to witness him being beaten. The gentleman, who earlier dragged the thief and rogue back by their collars, listens in silence and wonders sadly what heaven will be like if he must live among such people there. He recites a fragment of song on the subject. Just as there are songs in Dhurtasamagama, so there are songs in No Entry: Ma Pravish; they begin at this point and turn it into a musical drama. Meanwhile the pickpocket steals everyone's pocketbooks and empties their wallets. Another musical rhyme begins, but a dead ragpicker breaks the spell by announcing that beyond the locked gate of Yama's abode wallets and money have no use. Two other deceased respectable gentlemen agree: another country's coins do not circulate in a foreign land. A dead gallant named Ramanimohan remarks on this inability to use foreign currency: it is just like one's beloved becoming another man's wife. This provokes a quarrel, and Ramanimohan changes the subject by suggesting that Rambha and Menaka will be inside the gates. A woman beggar, who has handed the child in her lap to someone else and joined the discussion, jealously abuses Rambha and Menaka. The pickpocket, however, suggests that what lies inside might be suffering rather than pleasure. At this the insurance agent is delighted to discover a new scope for his business. The pickpocket now begins taking bids in rupees for Indra's thunderbolt. This time the gentleman breaks the spell, and the two respectable men support him: it is the strangest auction they have ever heard of, run by a pickpocket and attended by a thief and a beggar. Musical rhymes begin again. Suddenly Nandi and Bhringi enter, dancing to classical music. When asked what lies beyond the gate, everyone answers in accordance with their beliefs—heaven or hell, sky or netherworld. Nandi and Bhringi say that all have spoken some truth but none the whole truth. They begin enumerating the circumstances of death: some were killed while stealing (the thief tries to flee when he hears this but two or three people catch him and bring him forward); others died in accidents, and so on. They cannot understand how the insurance agent has arrived without dying. He explains that he has come to explore a new market! Thus there is one person there who is not dead. Bhringi explains to Nandi the competition caused by the proliferation of insurance companies. Meanwhile a lovers' quarrel breaks out because the young man wants to return. Ramanimohan is pleased at the prospect of his departure: the young woman would then be left alone and he would have his chance. Bhringi explains that it is impossible to go back; perhaps they could arrange an accident for both pairs of parents and bring them here. But neither lover is willing to sacrifice their parents for personal happiness. Nandi and Bhringi then solemnise their marriage with music and celebration, and the gentleman gives away the bride.

Second Kallola: The second kallola begins with the sense that a political leader is about to arrive after his death. His two followers have already arrived dead, and everyone waits for their leader. The followers compensate for his delayed arrival—even after death!—by delivering short speeches interspersed with songs. The thief cannot understand one of the songs, but the beggar woman and the ragpicker do, and an argument begins. The thief objects to being called a thief. When he calls the woman a beggar, she stops him: she is Anasuya of Sarisab-Pahi, a Mithila painter. But after moving to Ashok Basti in Delhi, she discovered that no one in that city would buy her artworks and ended up begging at the crossroads. The thief insists that only he is disgraced, though everyone steals; there is nothing new, only the thefts of the old guard. Then Netaji arrives and attributes the presence of thieves, rogues and pickpockets to social conditions. A leftist enters and is indignant to find the leader surrounded by such people. The thief returns with his argument, and, taking his cue from the leader's "Purana of Thieves," the gentleman launches into song.

Third Kallola: The discussion now turns to the alliance between Netaji and the leftist and to the leftist's support of a government from outside. Netaji again becomes musical, but everyone's attention is diverted by the arrival of a dead actor, Vivek Kumar, performing a stunt scene. Netaji satirises the compulsion to deliver fresh, breaking news. The leftist makes two contradictory-sounding observations at different points: first, that nobody can become a leader without being an actor; second, that a thief cannot become a leader. The thief responds that political leaders are second to none when it comes to stealing. A woman of high birth then arrives. After some questioning, a VIP queue forms alongside the ordinary queue. The actor, political leader and leftist all join the VIP line! Asked why they have made a queue, the thief and pickpocket explain that they are well practised in forming—and breaking—queues.

Fourth Kallola: Yamaraj examines everyone's accounts, and Chitragupta reveals that there was once an age when the gate ahead could both open and close. Nandi and Bhringi have already explained that the gate is not a dream; the problem is merely one of understanding. Asked what lies beyond, everyone supplies an answer from their own perspective. Chitragupta says that everything mentioned in these descriptions exists on the other side. Nandi and Bhringi announce that entry through this gate is prohibited: a NO ENTRY sign is displayed there. Good heavens! What now? Netaji is sent before Yamaraj, but his eloquence deserts him. The celebrated leader Badri Vishal Mishra is taken to task for the age on his certificate, which is lower than his real age. His horoscope says he is fifty-five and that, having Shasha Yoga, he will live beyond seventy; he is therefore sent back, together with the four dead soldiers. Two soldiers accompany Netaji, and his two followers also want to go, but their crimes are too serious. At Chitragupta's command, Nandi and Bhringi lead the followers away to be roasted in a cauldron; the two remaining soldiers seize them and take them away, while Nandi and Bhringi return to the stage. Similarly, after argument, the young couple, the two respectable men and the gentleman receive deliverance and are escorted out to drums and pipes. When Nandi calls the actor "Vivek Kumar alias ...," the actor interrupts: with such labour he had managed to leave caste behind him, so let the "alias" be omitted. The leftist disputes the actor's account of having helped a leftist gathering. He too is to be sent away. But what is to become of the leftist? His worldview has neither heaven and hell nor Yamaraj and Chitragupta. He is offered the opportunity to decide his own future. He says his education taught him something quite different, yet how can he disbelieve what is now happening before his eyes? Yamaraj replies that perhaps what he sees is a nightmare: wherever he goes, the sign says NO

ENTRY. Yamaraj asks which is more unequal, human beings or nature. The leftist replies that both are, though nature may sometimes possess natural justice; where is there any room for it in human nature? Left-wing politics nevertheless tries to secure equality and reform. He is therefore sent back with the thief, rogue and pickpocket, given an opportunity to change them. The thief hesitates and asks: we are leaving, but what lies beyond here? Nandi, Chitragupta and Yamaraj answer in unison: "No entry." Bhringi returns, having seen off the actor. Yamaraj says, "Ma Pravish—Do not enter." Bhringi reports discussion below about changing the rules and permitting more people to return to earth. Yama's attendants stand pointlessly beside the cauldron; they have found nobody to roast, apart from the two followers. Everyone says that no one is left to arrive. Chitragupta removes his long beard and Yamaraj his crown, revealing their ordinary human forms! The beggar woman, still present, laughs when she sees Chitragupta's long false beard. Bhringi discloses that the beggar woman, too, is a performer like them. What acting! The account of her performance ends in love and teasing, but the beggar woman points out that the real performance is occurring over there. Ramanimohan is courting a high-born woman named Nibha, who remains silent. The beggar woman tells Yamaraj that Nibha will speak only when she receives the key to the lock on the gate; she thinks Yamaraj can help her become an apsara. Such is a woman's heart—"No entry" even here! Yamaraj coughs, and Chitragupta realises that Yamaraj has been struck by the five arrows of Kama. At Chitragupta's instruction everyone moves to one side, leaving only Yamaraj and Nibha onstage. Yamaraj begins, "Listen, Nibha ...," but stops. Encouraged by the others, he gives her a large key. Once she has it, however, Nibha moves towards Ramanimohan as though she knows nobody else! She hands him the key, but he cannot open the lock. She then steps forward to try herself, only for Chitragupta to say that this is the door of the mind and cannot be opened in that way. The woman complains that giving her the key was a trick. Everyone laughs: where have you left your mind? Once again Ramanimohan and Nibha bring their minds together and try unsuccessfully to open the lock. Nandi, Bhringi and the beggar woman sing a song whose burden is that the heart's lock is fastened and the sign there says NO ENTRY. Yet in the spring season love is boundless and the heart cries "Maina, Maina." So let a sit-in be staged right here, at the NO ENTRY gate.

Critical Discussion: A comparative study of Indian and Western dramatic theory reveals how much human thought can have in common despite geographical distance. Indian dramaturgy is based principally on Bharata's Natyashastra and Dhananjaya's Dasharupaka. Aristotle's Poetics is the authoritative work of Western dramatic theory.

Bharata describes drama as following action and imitating emotion; Dhananjaya defines drama as the imitation of states or situations. In Indian literary theory, imitation is the actor's work, not the poet's. In the Western tradition, imitation is the poet's activity, and the actor receives no comparable discussion there.

Aristotle gives special emphasis to plot in drama. Along with plot, tragedy contains characterisation, diction, thought, spectacle and song. Bharata calls the plot concerning the hero the principal plot, or adhikarika, while a story that assists the principal plot is prasangika, incidental. But incidental plots are not essential to every play. No Entry: Ma Pravish has neither a clearly principal plot nor an incidental one, since no single character is recognised by all as the hero. The gentleman who seizes the rogue by the collar becomes secondary a little later. The rogue, before whom the thief initially trembles, subsequently comes forward philosophising that nothing new ever happens. Yamaraj, before whom everyone quakes, finds his own force diminished in the presence of Nibha. The beggar woman laughs at him as he discards his divine appearance, and in the end Ramanimohan and Nibha even abuse both him and Chitragupta. The leftist and the actor meet similar reversals. No character is intrinsically weak; each reacts and rebounds according to time and circumstance.

In the classification of plots by source, there are three kinds: prakhyata, utpadya and mishra—renowned, invented and mixed. A renowned story comes from history or the Puranas; an invented story is fictional; a mixed one combines the two. In No Entry: Ma Pravish, any possibility of classifying the plot as mixed disappears when Chitragupta and Yamaraj shed their disguises and the beggar woman laughs, prompting Bhringi to say she is an actor just like them. Merely using the names Yamaraj and Chitragupta does not link the narrative to history or Purana; the plot is entirely invented. Aristotle distinguishes simple and complex plots. Judged by the ease with which unexpected incidents flow into No Entry: Ma Pravish, this is a play with a simple plot. Aristotle also relates narratives to fable, fiction and history; by that scheme, No Entry: Ma Pravish belongs to the imaginative or fictional category. Aristotle's tragic characters are distinguished and of high birth, combining good and bad qualities. Every character in No Entry: Ma Pravish has a combination of good and evil. Nibha is of high birth, yet she becomes intimate with Ramanimohan, who died after being beaten following a rape. The beggar woman is Anasuya, a painter from Mithila. Yet the two respectable gentlemen, the other gentleman and the four soldiers appear without this kind of moral stain. Bharata calls the lover of dance and music dhiralalita, one of calm temperament dhiraprasanta, a person of heroic or warrior disposition dhirodatta, and one consumed by jealousy dhiroddhata. The gentleman and two respectable men love music, while Ramanimohan is jealous of the young lovers. The soldiers are peaceful and also possess the virtues of warriors, making them both dhirodatta and dhiraprasanta. But such classifications cannot be applied completely to No Entry: Ma Pravish.

Indian theory describes five stages of dramatic action: commencement (arambha), effort (prayatna), hope of attainment (praptyasha), certainty of attainment (niyatapti) and attainment of the fruit (phalagama). At the stage of praptyasha, doubts about the result arise; at niyatapti, hope returns. Western theory has exposition, rising action, climax, falling action and denouement. The first three produce complications, while the last two bring resolution.

The five elements in the development of action are seed (bija), drop (bindu), subsidiary episode (pataka), subordinate incident (prakari) and the completed action (karya). In No Entry: Ma Pravish, the seed is a conflict involving people after death, although the insurance agent arrives there without dying. Yamaraj and Chitragupta turn out to be performers in disguise. At various points, one character rises and another falls in importance. Pataka and prakari belong to subsidiary narrative strands and are absent from No Entry: Ma Pravish. Karya is the developed form of the seed, but this play ends with a sit-in demonstration! Aristotle calls these the beginning, middle and end. Consider now the dramatic junctures, or sandhis: the mukha-sandhi joins seed and commencement; the pratimukha joins bindu and effort; the garbha joins pataka and hope of attainment; the vimarsha joins prakari and certainty of attainment; and the nirvahana joins the completed action and the arrival of the result. In No Entry: Ma Pravish, only the mukha, pratimukha and nirvahana junctures appear; the other two are absent.

Western theory seeks the unities of place, time and action. In No Entry: Ma Pravish the place remains the same, time is continuous, and the action concerns the wish to enter the gate. A two-hour play presents events occupying two hours, and its central action is singular. Abhinavagupta likewise says that a single act should not cover more than a day and two acts should not encompass more than a year. The divisions into kallolas in No Entry: Ma Pravish arise from actions occurring within specified periods and from the delays before new actions begin. Dryden, however, opposed these three unities and defended the freedom of Shakespeare's plays. No such problem arises in No Entry: Ma Pravish. In its conversations—which may also be called flashbacks—the manner of each character's death is clearly revealed.

Indian theory supported drama as something to be seen, whereas Aristotle and Plato opposed the emphasis on spectacle. In the sixteenth century, however, Lodovico Castelvetro supported stage presentation. D'Aubignac also supported its visual dimension, while Dryden defended the readability of drama. Dacier supported both reading and performance. Abhinavagupta maintained that the complete relish of rasa comes from enacted performance, though rasa can also be enjoyed through reading. At the very beginning of the first kallola of No Entry: Ma Pravish, it becomes clear that primacy is given to theatrical visibility. Western staging tends towards representation of the real, while Indian theatrical practice is symbolic. For example, in Abhijnanashakuntalam, Kalidasa writes: "iti sharasandhanam natayati"—he acts as though drawing an arrow. No Entry: Ma Pravish adopts an Indian convention: the invisible wall at the entrance to heaven is made comprehensible through dialogue and the acting of the dead. Performance had primacy in Ankiya Nata too. Kirtaniya drama was in one sense musical, yet acting was also central to it. Ankiya plays began with the beating of the mridanga. No Entry: Ma Pravish attaches itself to the Maithili tradition while introducing a new way of seeing history, Purana and the cycles of contemporary life, offering fresh insights for reflection.

Continuing the tradition of Jyotirishwar's Dhurtasamagama, Vidyapati's Gorakshavijaya, the Kirtaniya plays and Ankiya Nata, Munshi Raghunandan Das's Mithila Nataka, Jivan Jha's Sundar Sanyog, Ishanath Jha's Chinik Laddu, Govind Jha's Basat, Manipadma's Tesar Kaniya, Nachiketa's Nayakak Nam Jivan and Ek Chhal Raja, Shrishji's Purushartha, Sudhanshu Shekhar Chaudhary's Bhafait Chahak Jingi, Mahendra Malangia's Kathak Lok, Ram Bharos Kapari "Bhramar"'s Mahishasur Murdabad, and Gangesh Gunjan's Budhibadhiya, Nachiketa's No Entry: Ma Pravish repeatedly rejects rationality and the claimed objectivity of modernity. Yamaraj even tells the leftist that what he sees may not be true; it may be a dream. The play comments upon the pretensions of complete scientific knowledge. Truth and falsehood are described differently from each perspective. The thief has his own arguments, while the leftist insists that a thief cannot become a political leader, even though the political leader's own stealing threatens to destroy the thief's livelihood. The play's self-centred humour and its notions of good and evil continually appear and dissolve. Even Yamaraj and Chitragupta are living behind masks. Alongside these postmodern traits, No Entry: Ma Pravish brings out several different characters within one person, as with the high-born lady. No event yields a definitive meaning; one never knows when truth will turn into falsehood. The play is filled with superficial postmodern reflection and such characters. It is not optimistic, but neither is it pessimistic. What it offers is apparent madness, a view that anything can be considered in many ways rather than only one. There is less faith in results produced by causes, control and planning than in outcomes produced by chance. Democratic and feminist perspectives, the ideology of the red flag and other currents are presented through symbolic humour and satire.

Thus No Entry: Ma Pravish presents a postmodern outlook in which readers encounter many different problems raised in the course of the narrative. The conflict shown at its conclusion does not surprise readers of the postmodern age, for they meet such contradictions every day.

Postmodern, Emotion-Centred Absurd Drama: Samuel Beckett himself translated En attendant Godot from French into English as Waiting for Godot, adding the subtitle "A Tragicomedy in Two Acts," which did not appear in the French version. Tragicomedy combines tragedy and comedy. The plot makes clear that the apparent central figure, Godot, never appears in the play; moreover, emotionally he is not its essential element. The essential element is "waiting." Language, stage, speech, silence and modes of movement are integral to the play. Its central figures are wanderers whose lives pass through space and time. They perform like mime artists, conveying meaning physically without words. The play creates a new definition of plot and dramatic balance, and ushers modern theatre into a new era. Britain's music-hall theatre brought music and humour together; Beckett uses cross-talk to show life's despair, while Harold Pinter depicts political and social terror through humour. No Entry: Ma Pravish likewise begins at a gate to heaven—or hell—where all the dead are standing in a queue, yet a living person is among them! The rogue behaves respectfully before the gentleman! The lovers even marry there! Netaji is condemned to arrive late even after death! The leftist offers support from outside there too! Nor is anyone spared the VIP queue! But Chitragupta reveals that in an earlier age the gate before which everyone waits both opened and closed. If it will no longer open, what is the point of waiting? Nandi and Bhringi say that the gate was no dream; there had merely been a failure of understanding. When asked his surname, the actor Vivek Kumar says he freed himself from caste only with the greatest difficulty, so the "alias" should be dropped. The leftist's worldview contains no heaven or hell and no Yamaraj or Chitragupta, yet faced with the scene before him how can he disbelieve it? It is Yamaraj himself who tells him that the scene may be a nightmare. Yama's attendants stand pointlessly beside their cauldron with nobody to roast. When the beggar woman laughs at Chitragupta's false beard, Bhringi reveals that she too is an actor. And how can the door of the mind be opened if one has left one's mind behind?

The French play Waiting for Godot, Harold Pinter's English play The Birthday Party, Badal Sircar's Bangla play Evam Indrajit, and Uday Narayan Singh "Nachiketa"'s Maithili play No Entry: Ma Pravish all depart from the clearly delimited beginnings and endings of older drama. They begin at some apparently arbitrary point and end somewhere else. In Evam

Indrajit, the Writer searches for a character and suddenly addresses the auditorium, calling four latecomers onstage and turning them into characters. The fourth is especially dear to him: he is not Nirmal but Indrajit, the historically resonant name of one who conquered Indra. Unlike Amal, Vimal and Kamal, he will not follow an established track. Yet by the end Indrajit too becomes simply one more among Amal, Vimal, Kamal—and Indrajit.

Harold Pinter's The Birthday Party initially received such hostile reviews that his writing career appeared to be nearing its end. Yet subsequent readings made it a classic. Pinter sustains an atmosphere of mystery and terror throughout, strengthening his comic material. Who is Stanley? Who was he, or who does he want to become? Does he corrupt women, or has he murdered his wife? Yet Meg likes him. Who obstructed his first and second concerts? Is he lying, or does he simply behave outside existing social and political definitions? He attempts to strangle Meg, yet why does she continue to like him? Why, and how, do social and political powers carry him away, when their agents Goldberg—with his mysterious conduct towards Lulu—and McCann can scarcely represent any moral ideal themselves?

The stage of Waiting for Godot is a bare tree without leaves and a mound beside a deserted road; the stage of No Entry: Ma Pravish is the space outside a locked gate; in Evam Indrajit, the auditorium itself becomes the stage. The room of a house forms the stage of The Birthday Party, but Pinter sometimes breaks Stanley into fragments and sometimes reassembles him, in a process that recalls Derridean deconstruction. Spectators alternately envy, pity and hate Stanley; yet when he seems powerless before Goldberg and McCann, they recognise themselves in him, just as they identify with Indrajit in Evam Indrajit. In Waiting for Godot, just as the audience identifies with a slave and feels sympathy, it is astonished when an act of compassion earns a blow. In No Entry: Ma Pravish, the beggar woman jealously abuses Rambha and Menaka! The pickpocket offers a cash bid for Indra's thunderbolt. Nandi and Bhringi tell everyone: you have all spoken truth, but no one has spoken the whole truth. In Evam Indrajit, Indrajit's condition resembles that of Sisyphus, the cursed figure of Greek myth, condemned to push a marble boulder upwards, only for the stone to roll down again when he reaches the top. Are human labour and life founded upon meaninglessness? Is humanity condemned to failure, like Indrajit? Or can the leftist in No Entry: Ma Pravish change his view on seeing what contradicts his disbelief in heaven, hell, Yamaraj and Chitragupta? Yet Yamaraj himself says that what one sees may be a nightmare. Waiting for Godot is not a wait for God: Beckett himself says the characters wait for “Godot,” not “God,” though he uses Christianity as mythology. In existentialist thought, human beings and the universe are without inherent meaning—absurd.

The ghazal poet Om Prakash Jha; Rajdev Mandal's Ambara; Ramdev Prasad Mandal "Jharudar," the first people's poet of Maithili in the tradition of Bhikhari Thakur; the ghazal poet Munna Ji and the short-story writer Munna Ji; Ramvilas Sahu; Umesh Mandal's Nishtuki; Umesh Paswan's Varnit Ras; Sujit's Jiddi; Vineet Thakur's Banki Achhi Hamar Dudhak Karj; Santosh Kumar Mishra's "Ena Kiye ...?" and "Posput"; and Mahendra Malangia's Chhutaha Ghail.

105. Sharadindu Chaudhary's Memoir Literature

Abstract

Sharadindu Chaudhary's memoir literature [Baat-Baat Par Baat (I–IV)] comprises four collections of autobiographical essays: Baat-Baat Par Baat, Volume I; Marmantak—Shabdanubhuti (Baat-Baat Par Baat, Volume II); Hamar Abhag: Hunak Nahi Dosh (Baat-Baat Par Baat, Volume III); and Sakshat (Baat-Baat Par Baat, Volume IV). The first appeared in 2019, the second in 2020, and the third and fourth in 2021. His 2002 volume Jan Ham Janitahun is likewise a collection of memoir-essays tinged with humour and satire. It names award-hungry writers of the literary mainstream, whose conduct is such that the reminiscences almost automatically become humorous and satirical. Yet this is not a book of pure memoir: there is some added spice, although only a little.

Abstract

Sharadindu Chaudhary's memoir literature [Baat-Baat Par Baat (I–IV)] comprises four collections of autobiographical essays: Baat-Baat Par Baat, Volume I; Marmantak—Shabdanubhuti (Baat-Baat Par Baat, Volume II); Hamar Abhag: Hunak Nahi Dosh (Baat-Baat Par Baat, Volume III); and Sakshat (Baat-Baat Par Baat, Volume IV). The first appeared in 2019, the second in 2020, and the third and fourth in 2021. His 2002 volume Jan Ham Janitahun is likewise a collection of memoir-essays tinged with humour and satire. It names award-hungry writers of the literary mainstream, whose conduct is such that the reminiscences almost automatically become humorous and satirical. Yet this is not a book of pure memoir: there is some added spice, although only a little. It is a matter of satisfaction that Sharadindu has not encountered a single such covetous individual in the parallel literary movement.

Sharadindu Chaudhary's Memoir Literature [Baat-Baat Par Baat (I–IV)]

Baat-Baat Par Baat, Volume I; Marmantak—Shabdanubhuti (Baat-Baat Par Baat, Volume II); Hamar Abhag: Hunak Nahi Dosh (Baat-Baat Par Baat, Volume III); and Sakshat (Baat-Baat Par Baat, Volume IV): these four books collect Sharadindu Chaudhary's memoir-essays. The first appeared in 2019, the second in 2020, and the third and fourth in 2021.

His Jan Ham Janitahun, published in 2002, also collects memoir-essays with humour and satire. It names award-hungry writers of the literary mainstream; their activities are such that the recollections become, almost of their own accord, a work of humour and satire. Still, the volume is not a collection of unadulterated memoirs: it contains some seasoning, though not very much. Happily, Sharadindu has encountered no such acquisitive person in the parallel literary movement.

In addition, Bar Ajagut Dekhal (2005), Gobarganesh (2011) and Kariya Kakkak Koramin (2016) may be regarded as a Kariya Kakka series of satires, since a figure named Kariya Kakka, rather like Khattar Kakka, appears in all three. He is absent, however, from some individual pieces, including "Tavat Kaal," "Golaisi—Arthat" and "CD Samiksha" in Gobarganesh. All three collections are broadly grounded in recollection, but here the seasoning is far stronger. In the author's note to Kariya Kakkak Koramin, Chaudhary writes that Kariya Kakka did whatever occurred to him, while taking care that "... no accusation of obscenity should arise." Yet in the "CD Samiksha" published five years earlier in Gobarganesh, he writes of Vidyanath Jha "Vidit," chair of the Maithili Advisory Board elected by organisations designated "literary associations" by the Sahitya Akademi: "... He himself is a connoisseur of pleasure. With Pravasi-ji he will perform his evening devotions; with Thakurain he will sing a duet..." In "Tavat Kaal" in the same book, we read: "The Sahitya Akademi conducted an experiment of precisely this kind: even a person who owned a hotel could become a member of the advisory board." The description in "Tavat Kaal" is not obscene, but the description in "CD Samiksha" plainly is. It is evident that all the chairs of the Maithili Advisory Board chosen by the Sahitya Akademi's so-called literary associations worked to bring Maithili to ruin; but why should a woman among them be treated as a veritable King Harishchandra? Sexist comments about her demonstrate a lack of sensitivity on the author's or editor's part towards women and people of genders other than male, in literature as well as in public life. This insensitivity is also apparent in "Sarkarak Linga Pariksha" in Kariya Kakkak Koramin, where the phrase "a government endowed with feminine qualities" is applied to Vinod Kumar Jha [see "Irshya Dvesh Nahi—Samanvay Chahi" in Hamar Abhag: Hunak Nahi Dosh (Baat-Baat Par Baat, Volume III), where "government" refers to Vinod Kumar Jha, now dubbed "Emperor of Poets"].

Baat-Baat Par Baat, Volume I

In "Shreya and Preya" in Baat-Baat Par Baat, Volume I, Chaudhary discusses Shyamanand Chaudhary's role in securing the reintroduction of Maithili into the Bihar Public Service Commission examinations and in preparing its syllabus. Sharadindu obtained a copy of the syllabus, which had gone missing from the Commission office, from the late Chaudharyji, proprietor of "Jha Ji Bookseller Ki Dukan" near the Commission gate, and gave it to Shyamanand Chaudhary, then Special Officer of the Bihar Public Service Commission. On 20 December 2018, Shyamanand said that not a single Maithili institution had submitted a written proposal to the government on the matter. Nevertheless, the Chetana Samiti formally claimed the credit and celebrated it! "Ham Abhari Chhi" discusses the subsequent removal of Sharadindu Chaudhary's name from the 2010 Mithila Ratna awards list, even after Baidyanath Chaudhary "Baiju" had issued a press release or announcement. The awarding organisation was the Vidyapati Seva Sansthan, recognised by the Sahitya Akademi as a so-called literary association. Its selection panel included Dr Bhimnath Jha, Dr Phoolchandra Mishra "Raman" and Kamalakant Jha. Pandit Chandranath Mishra "Amar," president of the Vidyapati Seva Sansthan, reportedly threatened to swallow poison if Sharadindu were honoured. "Ham Nahi Kahi Sakait Chhi..." discusses the politics of Vinod Kumar Jha and the Maithili Lekhak Sangh, which failed to secure Sahitya Akademi recognition as one of its so-called literary associations. It also recounts how, in matters of registration, everyone except Vinod-ji remained content to play the grand gentleman. Several allegations were made against Mantreshwar Jha in meetings; Premlata Mishra "Prem," Indira Jha and Panna Jha are depicted as standing about like statues in their eagerness to be regarded as intellectuals. The Maithili Lekhak Sangh now has a permanent president and a permanent secretary, but the association itself has vanished. Such, too, is the condition of the Akademi's supposed literary associations. Vidyanath Jha "Vidit," who had served as the Sahitya Akademi's Maithili officer for five years, apparently desired Sharadindu's "active cooperation" (!). "Hamar Durgun A Krodhak Dushprabhav" refers to a young writer-journalist from Laheriasarai who alleged in a newspaper, under a pseudonym, that Sharadindu was making money by blackmailing the Sahitya Akademi, Maithili Academy and Chetana Samiti. Of the Chetana Samiti, Sharadindu writes: "... Had I not been a journalist, certain people might even have beaten me up. Everyone knows how disgracefully a former secretary of the Samiti was harassed after he opposed it. Nevertheless, I did not meet with that fate."

"Samay-Salak Janma A Sahityik-Rajnitik Kuchakra" discusses a letter from Vinod Bihari Lal, who wrote, "Well, your wish to have your name recorded in history as an editor will at least be fulfilled." In 2001, Rajmohan Jha organised a campaign opposing the Sahitya Akademi Award for the late Babuaji Jha Agyat's epic Pratigya Pandav, spreading the false assertion that the book had never been published. Sharadindu refused to sign that petition, and Rajmohan wrote all manner of nonsense about him in Antika. It should be added that Sharadindu procured a copy of the printed book and even displayed it at his shop in Patna. The essay also recalls Rajmohan's eventual admission of his mistake and Sharadindu's restoration of goodwill towards him. "Naukari Nahi Karbak Nirnay" discusses Agnipushp: "Only journalists like Agnipushp could do such things—roaring at Aryavarta with threats to cut down an elephant, then working at Jagran with their tails tucked between their legs until retirement." It also mentions Shiv Kumar Thakur, a press manager and compositor: "Be that as it may, he rose from compositor to proprietor; that is what pleases me." In my view Sharadindu is rather too harsh on Shiv Kumar Thakur. Many people visited the Chetana Samiti's Vidyapati Bhavan only because of his bookshop. Even the Samiti could not tolerate it: it was busy booking its own marriage hall, so why would it sell books? But it certainly managed to have Shiv Kumar Thakur's shop closed. Be that as it may. "Jivan Yuddhak Bhumika" discusses the assistance, cooperation and advice supplied by friends Dilip, Ajit Azad, Abhay Jha, Pandit Tarakant Jha, Mantreshwar Jha and Basuki Babu. "Sammank Bhukh" portrays the prize-hungry writers of the mainstream: "People probably know the story of respected Govind Babu: when he did not receive an award, he stopped speaking Maithili and began saying in Hindi that 'Maithili is the language of dishonest people.'" "Maithilk Avishvasaniyata" recounts that the Maithil tantric Batesh Maharaj owed more than thirty thousand rupees for the printing of his monthly Kamakhya Sandesh. "Tit Lagay Va Karu" recalls that Udaychandra Jha "Vinod" failed to pay 1,575 rupees, taking two hundred books for only 1,100 rupees and neither paying the remainder nor collecting the remaining books.

Marmantak—Shabdanubhuti (Baat-Baat Par Baat, Volume II)

"Mahakalk Vajraghat" in Marmantak—Shabdanubhuti (Baat-Baat Par Baat, Volume II), written during the coronavirus lockdown on 26 March 2020, recalls events forty-one years earlier: Mishra-ji's entanglement in the misappropriation of bank money, the loss of his job, his mother's deteriorating mental condition and, finally, her death. "Shekhark Avasan" concerns the writer's father. Prabhas-ji, Mukhiya-ji and Batuk Bhai frequently came to visit Sudhanshu Shekhar Chaudhary, yet: "Yes, for the final year he wanted to talk to Pravasi-ji, but it did not prove possible. Even when I asked him, Pravasi-ji never came to see him, right up to the end." This account of his father's death follows the remembrance of his mother's death and was written during lockdown on 27 March 2020. "Agralekhsan Bhet" describes Sharadindu's arrival at Mithila Mihir, although his appointment was officially with Aryavarta, and Bhimnath Jha's belief that this would obstruct his own promotion. Bhimnath wrote a poem entitled "Langur," which wounded Sudhanshu Shekhar and Sharadindu Chaudhary. He felt that Gokul Babu, his junior, had been promoted above him to assistant editor and that Sudhanshu Shekhar had acquiesced to obtain a job for his son. In reality, Gokul Babu's sponsor was the maternal grandfather of Kumar Saheb, owner of the newspaper and press, while Gokul Babu was related to Kumar Saheb as his mother's sister's husband. Gokul Babu meanwhile abandoned the dhoti-kurta in favour of a safari suit, which Bhimnath found still more intolerable; eventually Bhimnath obtained employment at Mithila University. Sudhanshu Shekhar Chaudhary—Sharadindu's father, whom he called Lalkakka—retired on 2 October 1982, leaving Sharadindu and Dilip (Dilip Singh Jha) to serve as Gokul Babu's personal runabouts. (The politics of Aryavarta, The Indian Nation and Mithila Mihir—and how these institutions collapsed after national newspapers arrived in Patna! We hear that bhang used to be prepared there every afternoon. More memoirs of this kind ought to appear.) "Safalta O Vifaltak Karan" discusses the knowledge of editorial responsibilities and authority that came through contact with Pandit Hiranand Jha Shastri and the late Gajendra Narayan Chaudhary. It also describes the dishonesty of a Maithili writer and Hindi journalist who, at a Sahitya Akademi symposium, credited Deskos and Vinod Kumar Jha with Maithili journalism and belittled the achievements of the Mithila daily by adding, "If it can be called a daily." Baidyanath Vimal is discussed as a representative writer of an age of hypocrisy; Ramanand Jha "Raman," as a critic-editor forever clinging to one support or another.

Hamar Abhag: Hunak Nahi Dosh (Baat-Baat Par Baat, Volume III)

In "Bhumika—Shyampaksha O Hamar Lekhan," he writes, "Almost no one writes what I write. Yes, occasionally I have the good fortune to read a few pieces of a similar kind by Lakshman Jha 'Sagar.'" "Hamar Abhag: Hunak Nahi Dosh" discusses the special issue of the Maithili Academy journal on "Maithiliputra Pradip Prabhunarayan Jha." Sharadindu did all the work, yet Dineshchandra Jha was named as editor, and Sharadindu received just 280 rupees for his labour. "Sampadakiya A Pathakiya Patra" alludes, without naming him, to Ramesh, who used to send readers' letters under the names Abodh and Durbodh Mishra, writing offensive nonsense about Sharadindu and his father because he resented the publication of Shashibodh Mishra "Shashi" in Samay-Sal. Later, on Kedar Kanan's recommendation, Sharadindu published Ramesh in Purvottar Maithil after becoming its editor: "... Now ... he has come down to earth. He writes well." He also remembers publishing a professor's poem in Samay-Sal at Madhukant Jha's request. This poet, he says, does not write nearly as well as Ramesh, producing extremely feeble verse, yet reached the final round for the Sahitya Akademi Award three times. "Maithilik Badalait Swarup" describes Shyam Darihare's order of priorities: first himself, then his book, and Maithili last. “Paighatvak Akaran Pradarshan Kiek” recalls Kirtinarayan Mishra paying only 9,000 rupees, in front of Mohan Bharadwaj, towards the printing of his book Arthantar and withholding the remaining 3,500 even after all copies were delivered to his home. It also discusses a Sahitya Akademi “Meet the Authors” programme held in the auditorium of its recognised, so-called literary association, the Chetana Samiti. “Kirti Babu spoke in both Hindi and Maithili, asserting that he was an author in both languages. Yet apart from Rajkamal and Yatri, it is plain what standing anyone has achieved in Hindi. … My piercing, pointed question was: ‘You are such an eminent author that the Sahitya Akademi, a premier institution, has arranged today's programme in your honour. Why, then, did you establish the Kirtinarayan Mishra Award in your own name during your lifetime? Were you afraid that nobody would remember you after your death and therefore eager to witness your own publicity while still alive?’ My question disturbed him, and he replied that it had been his family's wish. … Every office-bearer of the Chetana Samiti began protesting, and voices rang out that the award would continue under all circumstances. The reason was that Kirti Babu had arrived with money to increase the award fund for the Chetana Samiti by another one and a half lakh rupees.” This is a firsthand account of the Chetana Samiti extracting money in the name of awards from the person honoured by their name and from that person's family. More such reminiscences should come to light.

“Beimān Hoybak Ghoshana” concerns a Jagdish Mishra of Sahityiki (Sarisab-Pahi), who had asked the well-known writer Ashok to give Sharadindu ten books. Ashok instead handed them to Shiv Kumar Thakur at Vidyapati Bhavan, who sold them and passed on the proceeds. Jagdish Mishra nevertheless announced over the microphone that Sharadindu had sold the books and withheld the money; Ramanand Jha “Raman” reported this accusation to him. This recalls an incident involving an author who called that organisation “Soitiki” until it published one of his books, after which he began calling it “Sahityiki.” “Hamar Abhag: Hunak Saubhagya” describes Bhimnath Jha's instigation of Phoolchandra Mishra “Raman,” and the exclusion of Sharadindu's contribution from a souvenir publication by Satyanarayan Mehta under the aegis of the Chetana Samiti, another supposed literary association (such is the politics of souvenir publications!). “Maithilik Rajnitik Kripa” concerns Ajit Mishra and Aditi Mukherjee of the Central Institute of Indian Languages. At one of its “seminar-cum-workshops,” other people allegedly drew the honoraria payable in Sharadindu's and Madhukant Jha's names. Tejkar Jha, son of Hetukar Jha, conveyed that two Maithili scholars had said in an Institute meeting that Shekhar Prakashan should not receive work under its Translation Mission. Shekhar Prakashan had been assigned the translation, proofreading, publication and distribution of nine books; but on the advice of one or two sycophants the Institute appointed an editor without consulting Sharadindu, and did not invite him to the publisher-editor meeting. Later, some work went to Narendra Kumar Jha of Novelty. Subsequently, Shri Chandranath Jha, grandson of Pandit Sitaram Jha, told Sharadindu that the Institute had obtained a translation from him and dismissed him with only a small payment. "Irshya Dvesh Nahi—Samanvay Chahi" recounts how Parmeshwar Kapri took books worth five thousand rupees and did not pay, even when Ram Bharos Kapri "Bhramar" asked him to do so. Some disciples of Kedar Kanan acted similarly. It also discusses Taranand Viyogi, who openly uses the phrase "sabh baput" about a particular caste, Brahmins, on Facebook. "... Seventy per cent of the people participating in the very discussions he attends belong to that caste, whose ancestors he keeps attacking. ... I shall acknowledge Viyogi-ji's accomplishment only when he creates and brings forward twenty personalities of his own calibre from his community. Merely stirring people up ..." But Sharadindu also writes that he told Parmeshwar Kapri, "There would be no objection if I tied you to a bamboo pole here and beat you, would there?" "Government" (Vinod Kumar Jha, now satirically styled "Emperor of Poets") and the young poet Balmukund were also present. There can be no justification whatsoever for the remark about tying someone to a bamboo pole and beating him.

Sakshat (Baat-Baat Par Baat, Volume IV)

Sharadindu recalls how, while criticising the low standards of the prize process, "... one man abused the mothers and sisters of everyone involved and declared that under no circumstances would he accept a Sahitya Akademi Award or any other award. Yet within barely six months he accepted a prize and was overjoyed. I ask how much that increased his ability and scholarship. What is the point of ranting unnecessarily? Keep fixing things behind the scenes while continuing to heap abuse." Among those who influenced him in Maithili literature he names Kiran, Madhup, Suman, Manipadma, Jayakant Mishra, Prabhas, Gunjan, Mantreshwar, Amar, Jivakant, Govind Babu, Basuki Babu, Pravasi, Rajmohan, Bachcha Thakur, Bhim Babu, Ramdev Babu, Shekhar-ji, Hetukar Babu, Ashok, Shivshankar Srinivas, Ushakiran Khan, Shefalika Verma, Shyamanand Chaudhary, Ranganath Diwakar, Kamalmohan Chunnu, Ajit Azad, Ashok Mehta, Surendra Raut, Raman Kumar Jha, Mukund Mayank and Balmukund. He also observes: "... Journalism is now understood to be a sacrifice. Someone says, 'I've spent eight to ten lakh rupees bringing out my magazine.' Young Lalit Narayan (Mithila Mirror), at his age, says while reporting, 'I'm wearing my bones away.' Yet by my reckoning he has already become a professional journalist."

He writes: "A publisher is someone who prints other people's books at his own expense, and a printer someone who takes payment for performing a job. A person who does both calls himself both printer and publisher. ... Shekhar Prakashan has performed both functions at both levels. So far as I know, Pustak Bhandar and Granthalaya did the same in the past. ... We have printed a total of fifty-two books entirely at our own expense. We have also published more than three dozen books while meeting half their costs. ..."

Sharadindu Chaudhary's Memoir-Based Collection of Humour and Satire—Jan Ham Janitahun

If this is a collection of humour and satire, how can it also be memoir literature? Sharadindu himself answers: "Had I known that games just like those of politics were also played in the literary field, I would never have dared set foot in it. But now I am caught, like a fairy who has made the mistake of distributing both milk and fish. I can neither spit it out nor swallow it." He writes further: "... The characters themselves never let me recognise the distinction between humour and satire; their conversations became the subject matter of my writing. ... My journalistic disposition wrote down what it saw, whenever it saw it." Thus the book is demonstrably a collection of memoirs, and the utterances within quotation marks are unseasoned. Some seasoning does occur in the memoirs' headings and outside the quotation marks, but even there only in small measure.

The volume contains eleven memoirs. It became a collection of humour and satire because of the conduct of prize-hungry mainstream Maithili writers, belonging to every caste. The writers appear under their actual literary names, strengthening the book's documentary authenticity. It was published in 2002, but even in 2022 the writers described in it had the same disagreeable habits.

And Now: Operation Sahitya Akademi

This memoir consists entirely of dialogue, within quotation marks; hence it contains no added spice. Even the title is not especially embellished: the Sanskrit word atha, equivalent to the opening invocation bismillah, introduces "Operation Sahitya Akademi." Who are the performers? They are listed below.

Principal performers: Mohan Bharadwaj (now deceased) and Ramanand Jha "Raman."

Their role: To read people's (writers') literary horoscopes, although they spend much of the time playing verbal games with each other.

Supporting performers: One poet of the "sixty and still sprightly" variety; one father-in-law-and-son-in-law pair.

Their role: To make old poets faint with their very first books and to soar through the skies of the Sahitya Akademi.

Technique: To disparage each other's books; however fierce the disputes within Chetana Samiti, power stays with either uncle or nephew.

Appeal

Principal performers: Mohan Bharadwaj (now deceased), Basukinath Jha and Ramanand Jha "Raman."

Their role: To seize control of the publication activities of the Maithili Academy and the Chetana Samiti.

Supporting performers: Pathak-ji, Dinesh-ji and Indrakant-ji.

Their roles, respectively: The angry man, the pleasure-seeker and the greedy man.

Technique: A rasping laugh, accompanied by belches of erudition.

What a Man He Is, Indeed!

Principal performer: A senior official of an institution.

Role: To have his hands tremble when there is work to be done.

Supporting performers: None.

Technique: Prompted by whispers, to pretend to reform society and rescue the language.

I Watched a Shooting

Principal performers: Upendranath Jha "Vyas," Madhukant Jha, Mohan Bharadwaj, Ramanand Jha "Raman," Ramdev Jha, Purnendu Chaudhary and Chandranath Mishra "Amar."

Their role: To take over the literary activities of the Maithili Academy and the Chetana Samiti. The episode of "Angreji Phulk Chitthi." To prevent Somdev, Ramanand Renu and Hansraj from ever coming of age. Bhimnath, Jaymant and Madaneshwar as pupils of the old schoolhouse.

Supporting performers: Jayakant Mishra, Devkant Jha, Kulanand Mishra, Rajmohan Jha, Udaychandra Jha "Vinod," Ashok, Agnipushp, Kedar, Taranand Viyogi, Ramesh and Shivshankar.

Their role: Rajmohan Jha pushing his favourites Ashok, Agnipushp and Kedar forward in order to secure an award before Bhim Bhai; Vijay Kumar Mishra and Vivekanand leaving the field at one word from Sharadu; Virendra Jha making Amresh Pathak drink water; Gokulnath tripping Pravasi up.

Showmen: Chhatranand Singh Jha (Batuk Bhai) and Gopesh-ji.

Behind the scenes (patrons): Ushakiran Khan and Mantreshwar Jha.

Final presenter: Gunjan-ji.

Technique: Mohan Bharadwaj setting Bhim Bhai and Ramdev Jha against each other and himself slipping into the Sahitya Akademi Advisory Committee; Raman-ji shifting material from one storehouse to another, in the Govind Jha felicitation volume and elsewhere, and taking the Chetana Samiti to task.

Pilgrimage sites for the award-hungry (up to 2002): The gurdwara at R-Block in Patna, Shyama Temple in Rajkumar Ganj, Darbhanga, and Prayag on P. C. Banerjee Road.

The Health-Protection Award

Inspiration for the programme: Binaca Geetmala.

Announcer: Maithili's Ameen Sayani, Chhatranand; but because he was a Batuk, Ashok was entrusted with the task.

Question: Why was Govind Jha given the Sahitya Akademi Award?

Who did not take part in the quiz? Ramanand Renu, Hansraj, Purnendu Chaudhary and Udaychandra Jha "Vinod," the bridegroom from Rahika.

One-member jury: Suman-ji.

Who boycotted it? Upendranath Jha Vyas, Dr Amresh Pathak and Anand Mishra (because they had not been included in the one-member jury).

Suman-ji's list of sixteen contestants: Sureshwar Jha, Rajmohan Jha, Markandeya Pravasi, Mohan Bharadwaj, Bhimnath Jha, Prabhas Kumar Chaudhary, Jivakant, Shefalika Verma, Kirtinarayan Mishra, Mantreshwar Jha, Agnipushp, Subhashchandra Yadav, Mayanand Mishra, Dr Dhirendra, Somdev and Kedar Kanan.

Welcome song: Buddhinath Mishra and Shanti Suman.

Answer—from Rajmohan Jha: Because Govind Jha might otherwise have written in Hindi (a threat).

After the announcement: Vinod Kumar Jha, Agnipushp and Viyogi dancing joyfully upon Rajmohan Jha's shoulders. Sureshwar Jha: "Since I am the representative, Govind Jha gets the award." Rabindranath Thakur divorcing Mahendra and dancing with Ashok. Prabhas Kumar Chaudhary: "Because Govind Babu admitted that his stories are inferior to those of me and my maternal uncle (Gunjan)." Akku's blood pressure shooting up, followed by his collapse; Vibharani fanning him with the end of her sari, while Kishore, Ramesh and Kumar Shailendra look on jealously. Ashok attracting the attention of Bhimnath, a devotee of Langur.

Suman-ji to Ashok: "Jayakant Babu's days are gone, when everything could be obtained only by money. Nowadays some things can also be accomplished by recommendation."

Ashok: Growing frightened on seeing Umanath Babu, Chetkar Babu and Subhadra Babu, and talking about the Health-Protection Award. Lekhnath Mishra and Dr Basukinath Jha asking whose answer this was. Mohan Bharadwaj praising himself and receiving the Fagua Shiromani Award from Suman-ji. Kulanand Mishra, his vow fulfilled, setting off for Upendra Thakur's house to have his beard trimmed.

Monologue

Mohan Bharadwaj's lament at not receiving the Sahitya Akademi Award: "Rajmohan Jha, neither Gaurinath, nor Agnipushp, nor Subhashchandra Yadav will be able to protect you."

Disciples drinking bhang: Ramesh, Viyogi and Srinivas, under Ashok's leadership.

Taranand Viyogi to Ashok: "Ashok Bhai, you have managed to set both your presiding preceptors—Mohan Bharadwaj and Rajmohan Jha—at war with each other."

Postscript: Later, despite a devastatingly fulsome review of Vidyanath Jha "Vidit"'s novel Viplavi Besara—"devastating" here a synonym for an ingratiating, bed-breaking panegyric—Vidit still did not secure the award for him.

Sharadindu Chaudhary's Three Satirical Collections—Bar Ajagut Dekhal, Gobarganesh and Kariya Kakkak Koramin

Bar Ajagut Dekhal appeared in 2005, Gobarganesh in 2011, and Kariya Kakkak Koramin in 2016. All three are satirical volumes belonging to the Kariya Kakka series, differing in two ways from Chaudhary's memoir literature. Kariya Kakka is the embodiment of a greed one can recognise, but not a person's real name. In some pieces Kariya Kakka disappears altogether; in others, real-life figures bearing their own names force their way in despite the author's deliberate efforts to keep them out. Of the three, however, the author explicitly describes Bar Ajagut Dekhal as a memoir. In its introductory "Mukti Paybak Prayatna," he writes: "What I could not do, what I could not even think of doing, but saw happening—that is what Bar Ajagut Dekhal contains."

Bar Ajagut Dekhal

What Are You Churning?

"... Our Maithili ... has been compelled to become the servant of fathers-in-law and sons-in-law ... and has become a source of income for certain social activists."

Darshan–Sudarshan

"... Come, to the dwelling of the great poet Vidyapati at the Chetana Samiti ...

"... 'Who is this playwright from Nepal?'

"'It is Mahendra Malangiya, sir.'

"... 'Give this year's Chetana Award to that playwright.'

"... 'But there are writers senior to him ...'

"'We have to give it to somebody, whether young or old ...'"

"'The poets' conference ought to be discontinued altogether. Nobody attends at that time anyway. ... If it is to be held, then raise the money. ... The Maithili Academy promised five thousand in the name of a poets' conference, but paid only two thousand. How could there be anything left? A deficit was there from the beginning. ... A wall has been built around the printed books ...'"

"... 'Don't run away. Yatri-ji founded it and then fled. Today his photograph hangs on the wall, but several people claim to be its founder ...'"

Gobarganesh

The Signboard Is on the Thatch; I Am Sleeping on the Cot

"In the courtyard of the Maithili Academy. You too are singing the very same Fagua. Both lecture series have made their own advisers the lecturers, and they are getting some third person to edit all the books." (This is directed at Ashok, Taranand Viyogi and Mohan Bharadwaj.)

Meanwhile

"'The Sahitya Akademi conducted just such an experiment: even someone who owned a hotel could become a member of the advisory committee. ... There is a great deal of political manoeuvring in Patna too. The Writers' Association would not have to go begging for honours. ... The Maithili Lekhak Sangh ... nothing but felicitations, with neither a pulse of life nor a roar. Only a quarrelsome person's cry in the wilderness of deprivation.'"

Golaisi—"That Is to Say"

The work of criticism that could not be kept on its feet by the crutches of proverbs, and that even the books Akhiyasal, Besahal and Bhajaral (Ramanand Jha "Raman"'s volumes of half-criticism) could not sell—surely the standard by which to judge it is Golaisi alone!

CD Review

"'Raman-ji, you must go there; he is helpless ... To activate Bharadwaj-ji's pen, Ashok and Taranand Viyogi, their hands folded in supplication, were begging the owner Nachiketa for five litres of engine oil. But Munshi Ramlochan told them that when it was given to him once (alluding to Mohan Bharadwaj's accepting or securing a Prabodh Award while serving on its selection committee), such an uproar broke out that if they gave it to him again they would not even be able to show themselves to the people of Mithila. ... It will be a mixture of Jivakant's Jogira and Amar's Biraha, a spectacle of Bhimnath's sweets and Ramdev's by-products, accompanied by the jingling of Panna, Indira, Nita, Sushila and Veena. ... 106. A Comprehensive View of Ram Bharos Kapri "Bhramar"

Abstract
Ram Bharos Kapri "Bhramar" accorded dignity to the proletariat. This was especially significant when Mahendra Malangiya and caste-bound theatre were inserting expressions such as sholkan and raar into slapstick plays. How can a director decide to stage a play unless it moves the reader? And does finding a play rewarding to read mean insisting only on its literary, as opposed to theatrical, qualities?

Keywords: Bharos · Kapri · Bhramar · comprehensive · perspective · drama · Malangiya

A Comprehensive View of Ram Bharos Kapri "Bhramar"

If a play does not stir someone who reads it, how can a director decide to stage it? And does enjoying a play in print mean demanding only its readable qualities? Conversely, does a writer whose drama is casteist and trades in "slapstick humour" thereby become an advocate of theatre's performative qualities? In the twenty-first century, Malangiya-ji calls an oppressed community "raar" in Okar Angank Barahmasa. Several decades later his terminology has improved to the extent that he now calls the group the "lower class." This improvement is welcome, but after so long it is very little. How could Malangiya have continued rehearsing his caste-based syntax and constructions mixed with broken Hindi without introducing his artificial conceptions of the bhagta and the lower classes? He cleverly tries to conceal this fact and consequently remains unable to rise above mediocrity. He wishes to give his dramatic narratives a purpose, but has not developed the capacity to do so. Vishnu Sharma's Panchatantra contains good tales, yet needlessly targets Shudras and women; Narayana Pandit therefore had to recast the material in Hitopadesha. Theatre directors, too, ought to rewrite language of this kind to arrive at a vocabulary fit for the stage.

Bhramar's dignified language honours the dignity of people.

First, however, a look at Bhramar's short-short stories:

Tora Sange Jaybau Re Kujba (1987)

This collection contains twelve short-short stories.

The first, "Bhagjogani," opens powerfully. The protagonist Abhi is astonished to see Rekha, the glamorous young woman, worried about household life. She is unhappy with the family and society that sent her off to Kathmandu at the age of eighteen or nineteen to earn money. Her husband, living in Banaras, depended on her earnings, while her businessman friend Shekhar paid for her fashionable expenses. Yet the ending of the story is weak.

"Andharme Bhotiaayal Ekta Sipahi" is an excellent story, a sketch of Ganesh and people like him: "A daura, trousers and cap borrowed from our sharecropper at Haripur, Baba's old shoes on his feet, and spectacles with one broken arm tied in place by a string."

"Bhotiaayal Batak Batohi," "Norak Bunn" and "Asakk" portray the thoughts and dejection of individuals well. But the way the pain of the proletariat is conveyed in "Matik Darad" is extraordinary.

"Manahsthitik Dansh" is astonishingly constructed. A young woman's husband works night duty, as a security guard. She is frail. Her father-in-law enters her home, although she learns this only afterwards. On the first night she is so terrified that she cannot even tell whether she has had sexual intercourse or merely dreamed it. The story progresses, displaying further technical distinctions; yet, as it approaches its conclusion, it grows weaker.

"Tis" is the story of a girl in the tenth standard. She wants to make something of herself, but ...

Just as "Tis" is Gita's story, "Mausi" is the story of an aunt who is leaving today, but whom nobody can remove from their heart.

In "Ancharme Barkha Bunni," the protagonist thinks amidst drops of rain. A terrible downpour will destroy the standing paddy. Saraswati, Sunita, Gita. Saraswati did not find a good marital home; the protagonist must seek a prospective bridegroom for Gita. Memories ... amidst the raindrops.

"Pank" is the story of a modern Rekha, but it drifts without purpose. The title story, "Tora Sange Jaybau Re Kujba," likewise fails to illuminate relations between women and men, much as "Pank" does. Its flashbacks keep raising hopes, but the reader remains thirsty, and that thirst grows more acute when the storyteller ends with lines as powerful as these:

> I shall go with you, O hunchback,
> What happiness it will be—
> Riding an elephant, we shall travel the world ...

Bhramar's Plays

If folktales and proverbs are not collected through fieldwork, the result is what we find in Malangiya's plays. One may record a proverb current in one community—"Ten Brahmins have ten stomachs; ten raars have one"—but fail to record the counter-proverb in another: "Ten Brahmins have one stomach …" Mahendra Narayan Ram writes that folktales know no caste distinctions, but how could Malangiya-ji accept that? The bhagta also keeps appearing in his stories. The fundamental reason that such features become inseparable from Malangiya's drama is his inherited conception of caste superiority. His plays generally string together a number of scenes, each stretching to about two and a half pages. Until the final two or three scenes, he follows his old method: a supposedly "lower-caste" language of his own invention makes the upper-caste audience laugh, while the bhagta's broken Hindi supplies pseudo-humour. In the last two or three scenes he tries to make the dramatic story purposeful, but cannot bring it off. In "Pachhpaniya Maithili," Subhash Chandra Yadav writes: "Dr Ramanand Jha 'Raman' had jotted in his notebook: 'The Brahmin says, I am sleeping; the Solhkan says, I am a Brahmin. What can I say about what I am?' The contempt towards the Solhkan expressed in this note is nothing other than a linguistic expression of caste animosity and hatred." In "Ram Bharos Kapri 'Bhramar': Thought, Sensibility and Consciousness" [Videha, issue 370], Chandresh writes: "First, Nepalese Maithili plays were not even treated as plays. Second, in the theatre performed by MINAP, only the plays of one particular individual were staged. To break that dominant practice and awaken the prevailing mentality, at one time he placed particular emphasis on writing drama." That particular individual was Malangiya. During Nepal's monarchy, Malangiya failed to live up to his commitment as a writer: he wrote plays politically favourable to those in power and took care that audiences laughed only at the proletariat, never at the rulers. In "The Historical Context of the Play Murda" [Ramesh Ranjan, Murda, year 2069], Professor Parmeshwar Kapri writes: "Dr Dhirendra and Malangiya … kept themselves apart from politics. Thus no trace of political conflict appears in their writing or creative practice." In the same essay, writing about Ramesh Ranjan and Malangiya, Kapri says: "Although Ramesh-ji spent a long time around Malangiya, working alongside him in theatre, the truth is that no shadow or impression of Malangiya appears to have fallen upon his work. Another fact is that he created this important work while away from Malangiya and the institution associated with him. What I mean is that he wrote it [Murda, a play, in Vikram Samvat 2050] precisely when he had separated himself from Malangiya and MINAP and committed himself to his own resolve. It is worth remembering that MINAP has still not staged it."

Under these circumstances Bhramar made Maithili drama a medium of dialogue and fashioned for it a language that was not insulting to the proletariat but affirmed their dignity. Although living under a monarchy and being a citizen of Nepal (Malangiya worked in Nepal but was an Indian citizen), he brought political subjects into his creative practice through folk ballads.

In "Bhaiya, Aelai Apan Soraj," Man 1 and Man 2 oppose the feudal lord's demand for unpaid labour, while a song rises from offstage:

Every day they come to make us cut thatch,

Those seven hundred Musahars ...

"In every one of the seven hundred Musahar homes, only goats are reared." Dina and Bhadri enter as mendicants, singing the song of King Bhartrihari.

Similarly, "Mahishasur Murdabad" is a one-actor play in which Man 1 can perform both his own part and the voices heard from offstage. Kill one and many more spring up to stand in his place. The character's work therefore remains unfinished, and he does not yet wish to mount the gallows.

Lok Natya: Jat Jatin (2007), a research work, bears witness to his commitment to fieldwork. That is why he is called the Shakespeare of the folk-theatre tradition of Nepalese Maithili.

(Vidyapati, the great poet predating Jyotirishwar.)

Narendra Jha wrote his autobiographical statement under the title "Chapal Charan Chit Chanchal Bhan" (Antika, January–June 2009).

In 1934 an earthquake struck Mithila. For several years before it, something called sahasra-badhni had been observed, and people suspected that something untoward would happen.

In that earthquake Narendra Jha's father's house collapsed. The family established a new homestead on the southern bank of the ancestral pond, which their forebears had excavated. Narendra Jha was born at that new homestead on 22 September 1934, in the village of Tarauni.

He then mentions Shrotriya Brahmins of the Karamhe lineage during the reign of Shiva Singh. This is factually mistaken if Shrotriya is taken to mean a subcaste of Brahmins. Certainly someone versed in the Vedas may be called a shrotriya, as throughout India and Nepal even today.

Maharaja Harisingh Deva belonged to Mithila's Karnata dynasty. In Jyotirishwar Thakur's Varna-Ratnakara, was Harisingh Deva a hero or a king? He was born in 1294 and ascended the throne in 1307. Defeated by Ghiyasuddin Tughlaq in 1324–25, he fled to Nepal. As the formal initiator of Mithila's panji system among Brahmins, Kayasthas and Kshatriyas, he first appointed Gunakar Jha for Maithil Brahmins, Shankardatta for Karna Kayasthas and Vijayadatta for Kshatriyas. At Harisingh Deva's instigation —he was descended from Nanyadeva, who had established the Karnata dynasty in Shaka 1009, "nandaid shunyam shashi shaka varshe" (Shaka 1019) ...—the scholars of Mithila decided in Shaka 1248, or 1326 CE, to begin the panji register in its present form. Later, in 1760, certain intellectually self-indulgent individuals obtained orders from Maharaja Madhav Singh of Mithila to have the genealogists compile branch-books in the currently used arrangement. Subsequently, a new Brahmin subcaste called "Shrotriya" emerged in Mithila in the genealogical registers (sometimes dated to Shaka 1600, or 1678 CE, though in fact it appeared after Madhav Singh, around 1800 CE). [See Mithilak Panji Prabandh, Volumes 1 and 2 (Genome Mapping and Genealogical Mapping, 2009 and 2012, Gajendra Thakur, genealogists Vidyanand Jha and Nagendra Kumar Jha).]

Narendra's father, a devotee of Radha and Krishna, wanted to build a temple on the bank of the pond. But the western estate office at Raghopur objected (under Cornwallis's Permanent Settlement, the Darbhanga Raj had obtained its position as a zamindari estate; its holders were in fact landlords, mistakenly styled kings or maharajas by uninformed people; under the Permanent Settlement's zamindars were numerous appointed collection agents and gomastas, their offices known as deorhis). Litigation followed, in which Narendra's eldest paternal uncle Bhagirath Jha and a family servant, Ganaura, led the struggle. His Vaishnava spiritual teacher would not allow anyone to fish in the pond; when a fisherman slipped in secretly, the teacher himself entered the water and drove him away.

Narendra Jha completed his Intermediate in Commerce at Darbhanga in 1954 and then earned a B.Com. For a time he worked in Darbhanga with Lakshman Jha, the celebrated Lakhan Jha, on matters concerning Mithila and Maithili. There is also discussion of Suniti Kumar Chatterji and the Mithila Research Institute: Chatterji's unbecoming treatment of Mithila's Sanskrit scholars, Lakshman Jha's reproach, and Chatterji's explanation. Later, living in Calcutta (now Kolkata), Narendra began preparing for the Chartered Accountancy examinations in August 1956 and qualified as a Chartered Accountant in January 1966. After spells in Calcutta and Delhi he settled permanently in Patna in 1975. Meanwhile he married Panna Jha on 3 July 1959. In 1964 his wife graduated with a BA (Honours) in Psychology from Bihar University; she joined him in Calcutta in 1965. Following heart surgery in 1997–98, he felt that perhaps he had not worked actively enough for Mithila and Maithili, so he began writing essays and taking part in Bharati, the Maithili programme of All India Radio, Patna. The following books by Narendra and his wife had appeared by the time of writing and, with his permission, were made available as PDFs in Videha's book repository at http://www.videha.co.in/pothi.htm (with the exception of Psycho Social Stress and Schizophrenia, 2003, which could not be obtained).

He calls Patna's Maithili organisation, the "Chetana Samiti," the "Achetana Samiti"—the Unconscious Committee—for its activities warrant the name. He regrets leaving Calcutta, which he considers the place where the work of Mithila and Maithili was accomplished. He remembers Prabodh Babu, Babu Saheb Chaudhary, Sukhdev Thakur and Shrikant Mandal, none of whom is still alive. Virendra Mallik has turned away from his fiery Maithili writing and become absorbed in ritual. How much can Ramlochan Thakur achieve single-handedly? ("Chapal Charan Chit Chanchal Bhan" was written in 2009; Ramlochan Thakur has since died as well.) Narendra brought his wife Panna Jha and his younger brothers Agnipushp and Kunal from Calcutta to Patna, where hardly any work for Maithili takes place. Panna Jha remained engaged in the association's work (she too has now died); Agnipushp has been struggling to bring out the magazine Samvad, while Kunal has been producing serials of Maithili plays. Narendra does not believe a separate Mithila state will be created in his lifetime.

Note: The biographical account printed in Narendra Jha's book did not give his mother's name, so it could not be included here.

Postscript: After Videha's special issue on Narendra Jha appeared electronically, Shri Kunal had a copy printed and presented it to Narendra Jha. Similarly, when the special issue on Kedarnath Chaudhary appeared, Shri Arvind Gupta supplied Kedarnath Chaudhary with both the link to the Videha e-journal and a printed copy of the special issue. Thanks to everyone.

Ramanand Jha 'Raman': His Literary Work and Its Limits—An Editorial Reappraisal

> "I shall take no pleasure in praise from someone incapable of appreciating the merits of this book. If a crowd of blind people praises a painting, how does that increase the painter's distinction? Let people criticise this book by pointing out its faults. Learned people are certainly pleased when their attention is drawn to factual errors they have made unknowingly." — Udayanacharya, concluding remarks on criticism in Ātmatattvaviveka.

Read together, the seventeen contributions received for this special issue—from introductory essays and two extended reviews of books (Akhiyasal and Hiaol) to interviews, reminiscences and evaluative essays—make one thing clear. Raman Ji's place in Maithili literature is beyond dispute. Yet the value of this special issue will be fully realised only if, alongside praise, it identifies the limitations that recur in the contributions themselves and emerge repeatedly from Raman Ji's own practice of criticism. I bring these limitations together under four headings below: first, the limits of his critical method, chiefly as revealed in the review of Akhiyasal; second, those arising from the chapter-by-chapter review of Hiaol; third, limitations concerning his personality, literary achievement and institutional evaluation; and fourth, points of editorial and stylistic disagreement, as well as dissent among readers.

Part One: Akhiyasal and the Fundamental Limitations of the Critical Method

The extensive review of Akhiyasal (1995), Contribution 4, is the most systematically organised and unsparing of the seventeen contributions. The latter half of that review is devoted entirely to Akhiyasal's limitations, weaknesses and methodological difficulties, enumerating eight distinct "limitations" in order.

(a) Criticism Without Access to the Text

The gravest limitation is that, in almost every early essay, the critic himself acknowledges the "unavailability" of the original work. On Chandraprabha he writes: "It has not been possible to study and analyse Chandraprabha properly; the principal reason is its unavailability." On Trilochan Jha: "Very little material is available." On Yaduvar: "Very little research has been carried out on Yaduvar so far." On the forgotten Janardan Jha: "Works that may have appeared in journals and periodicals are no longer generally accessible." A profound contradiction arises here: if the original work was not available to the critic himself, on what basis could an aesthetic evaluation of it be made? In many places the criticism in effect depends on secondary sources—Jayakant Mishra's history of Maithili literature, Karunakant Jha's research dissertation and quotations supplied by other critics. From the standpoint of text-centred criticism, this is a fundamental weakness: criticism without the text.

(b) Unstable Standards of Value and Internal Contradictions

Ramanand Jha praises in one essay the very opposite of what he regards as the highest virtue in another. In discussing Ganganand Singh, the female characters of Chandragrahan, Lalit and Dhirendra, he treats sensitivity to contemporary reality, engagement with the surrounding milieu and the representation of the life of an age as supreme values. Yet he praises Vyas's stories precisely because they are not particularly affected by contemporary life and remain untouched by the distortions of a changing age. This is a direct self-contradiction: involvement with reality is sometimes a virtue, and at other times its absence is a virtue. Similarly, Harimohan Jha's humour is assigned a lower value because it does not "stimulate thought," whereas Madhup's songs are assigned a higher value for their "immediate effect upon the heart" and the pleasure they give—even though songs, too, commonly depend on the immediacy of feeling rather than intellectual deliberation. A self-contradictory, purpose-driven composition such as Kobar-git is justified on the argument that "society is greater than the individual." From the perspective of Kshemendra's theory of propriety, however, a composition that runs counter to the inner self constitutes a fundamental rupture of emotional propriety; here the critic cannot provide theoretical clarity. This instability arises because Ramanand Jha does not adopt any single declared theoretical commitment: according to the occasion, his approach becomes impressionistic, sociological, biographical or formalist. Such methodological eclecticism gives him flexibility on one side, but on the other makes his judgements unpredictable and inconsistent.

(c) The Absence of Theoretical Terminology

Although concepts from Indian poetics—rasa, dhvani, vyañjanā and aucitya, among others—are implicitly present in Ramanand Jha's criticism, he does not employ these classical paradigms anywhere as explicitly articulated analytical instruments. Words such as "suggested," "communication" and "emotion-based" occur, but there is no systematic application of the theories of Anandavardhana, Abhinavagupta, Kuntaka, Kshemendra or Bhatta Nayaka, nor even a sustained invocation of these theorists by name. Western theories likewise receive neither explicit discussion nor considered application. The result is an ambivalent position: on one hand, this theoretical economy makes the criticism readable and accessible to a general journal readership; on the other, it produces a lack of academic depth. The criticism is descriptive and evaluative, but less fully theoretical and analytical.

(d) Narrowness of Perspective: Male-Centrism and Caste-Centrism

Of the twenty-five essays, twenty-four are devoted to male authors and only one—to Harilata—to a woman writer. Even there, the discussion of Harilata remains largely confined to Vaishnava devotion. It neglects the socially critical possibilities of her struggle to learn letters in secret against the prohibitions associated with child marriage, widowhood and female education. Women generally appear as characters or sources of inspiration, less often as independent authors, editors or critics. Similarly, almost all the writers discussed come from one particular social stratum. Dalit, most-backward and minority voices from Mithila, along with the unnamed creators of its folk traditions, remain almost entirely absent from this parallel history.

(e) Inconsistency of Compilation and Questions of Textual Authenticity

These twenty-five essays were written independently between 1972 and 1989, for different magazines and journals, on different occasions and with different readerships in mind. Bringing them together as a "book" creates an inherent unevenness: some essays are centred on individuals, others on particular works, genres or literary tendencies. No consistent theoretical framework unites them all. The introduction, account of method and conclusion that one would expect in a deliberately planned book are missing. The authenticity of the passages of poetry and prose quoted in it is also left in doubt, since the critic himself acknowledges that many works are scattered across journals and no longer available; comparison with and verification against the original texts was therefore often nearly impossible. The rigorous textual criticism, manuscript study and publication history required to substantiate claims such as "first" and "original" remain undeveloped in this early work.

(f) The Incomplete Theorisation of a Parallel-History Paradigm

Finally, the most fundamental limitation is that Ramanand Jha practises the idea of a parallel history without clearly formulating it as a theory. His distinction between "two categories of literary figures" comes closest to doing so, but remains a supplement to, rather than an alternative or a challenge to, the mainstream canon represented by Jayakant Mishra's literary history. Time and again the critic accepts Jayakant Mishra as an authoritative foundation and depends on his information, whereas the real responsibility of a parallel history is to question the foundational assumptions of the mainstream canon itself.

Part Two: Limitations Emerging from the Chapter-by-Chapter Review of Hiaol

The review of Hiaol (2012), Contribution 16, is the longest and most methodical essay in this special issue. It examines all seventeen chapters separately by three measures: Indian poetics, Western literary theory and the Videha perspective of parallel history. Here, too, each chapter's achievements are set beside its limitations. Some of the main points are gathered below.

Limitations Concerning the Study of the Maithili Language

The opening chapter rests principally on evidence furnished by Western scholars—Colebrooke, Beames, Hoernle and Grierson—while indigenous grammatical thinking before Dinbandhu Jha is left almost untouched. Consequently, the essay itself depends on the very colonial epistemological source-material that it criticises: a familiar self-contradiction in postcolonial discourse. In determining standard Maithili, it also leaves unanswered the question of the social rights of other dialectal forms—and, more fundamentally, of the power structures through which a standard is established.

Limitations in the Chapters on Ramanath Jha and Kiran Ji

The collection's longest chapter, "Ramanath Jha and the Mithila Language," is structurally loose. The substance of six independent essays—counter-criticism, biography, the antiquity of the language, debates over script, standardisation and language management—is crowded beneath a single heading. Despite a declared commitment to balance, its tone sometimes becomes less a critical examination of a life than a defensive tribute. Kiran Ji's refutation of an opinion is described as "emotional," yet the author's own vocabulary for the opposing side is not entirely free of emotion. In the chapter "Kiran Ji as a Counter-Critic," moreover, quotations are selected one-sidedly to demonstrate contradictions; passages in which Kiran Ji may have corrected himself or revised his views have not been sought out. Differences of opinion over forty years of writing may indicate intellectual development, not merely contradiction.

Limitations in the Reading of Kanyadan and in the Chapter on Yatri's Language

"Let Kanyadan Be Read Through the Eyes of the Neglected Woman," regarded as the collection's most challenging chapter from the standpoint of feminist rereading, is itself limited by its unanswered succession of questions. "Who is responsible for this?" is asked repeatedly, but the author does not give a judgement supported by evidence. The promise to read through the eyes of the neglected woman ultimately remains suspended in an interrogative posture. Nor is there a rasa-theoretical examination of the humour of Kanyadan, the principal source of its popularity; at points the rereading turns into an indictment. Likewise, the chapter on Yatri's language borrows all four stylistic instruments from Western sources, while their relationship to Indian poetics is only indicated. A systematic comparison of selection and deviation with Kuntaka's six kinds of vakratā could have completed the bridge between East and West; that opportunity was missed.

Limitations Concerning the Neglected Poets Lakshmipati Singh and Manmohan Jha

In the chapter on Lakshmipati Singh, the author himself admits that he has been able to "gather only a few" of the scattered poems. This honest admission deserves praise, but it also means that the conclusions rest on a limited sample and that the legitimacy of generalisation remains doubtful. Certain natural symbols are read as direct political metaphors, yet these interpretations are not everywhere corroborated by the poems' internal structures or by evidence from other poems. The chapter on Manmohan Jha is the shortest in the collection, and its very brevity is its chief limitation: it announces a concern with a "neglected aspect," but the analysis remains at the level of plot summary. Having been written on the tenth day after the writer's death, its tender commemorative tone outweighs critical detachment.

In an overall judgement, the reviewer of Hiaol himself writes at the end: "The full method of a parallel current is reached when marginalised voices speak for themselves. In Hiaol, people have spoken on behalf of the margins; the margins have been allowed to speak much less." This one sentence succinctly encompasses the limitations of the entire collection.

Part Three: Limitations Concerning Personality, Literary Work and Institutional Evaluation

The Gap Between Dedication and Results

Praveen Kumar Jha's essay, Contribution 15, is the most outspoken voice in this special issue. After a long passage of praise, he declares, "But, but, but!" and writes plainly: "Contribution is one thing; substantial contribution is another." Despite having held important positions over so many years in institutions such as Chetna Samiti and the Maithili Writers' Association, and despite his considerable intellectual abilities, Raman Ji does not emerge as having played any clearly decisive role in the struggle to secure Maithili's inclusion in the Eighth Schedule of the Constitution. Nor, despite his involvement in an organisation such as Chetna Samiti, does any major achievement in Maithili education clearly appear that can be attributed directly to his leadership. The author specifies that he is questioning not Raman Ji's dedication but the results of that dedication. How much time someone has devoted and how hard they have worked is one matter; what concrete benefits that work has brought to the language, education, literary people and society is another, more important matter. The essay also refers to allegations and controversies concerning his tenure at Chetna Samiti and the promotion of books and literary activities, as well as criticism that diplomatic engagement with the government and ruling establishment was prioritised over confrontation. The writer adds, however, that an independent inquiry would be needed before treating these allegations as conclusive truth.

Satire on Silence

Dr Dhanakar Thakur's essay, Contribution 11, is predominantly satirical in style, but conceals a sharp implication. Calling Raman Ji Chetna Samiti's "Guru Dronacharya," the author compares the silence of Chetna Samiti—and therefore of Raman Ji—on the question of a Mithila state with the episode in which the teacher Dronacharya kept his eyes closed. "For Chetna Samiti, the question of a Mithila state is like a red rag to a bull": this line states plainly that the institution and its leading literary pillar prefer silence on a politically sensitive issue.

Questions of Impartiality and the Incompleteness of the Register

The observation by Rajlin Thakur quoted in Dr Kailash Kumar Mishra's essay, Contribution 12, is explicit: "Raman Ji is both a person dear to him and a good critic, but he has one failing: he highlights the work of a limited section of society more than that of others, and at such points he cannot remain impartial." Naronarayan Mishra's memoir-like essay, Contribution 13, likewise points out that the register of literary figures it presents does not include the name of an activist playwright such as Babusaheb Chaudhary. That absence silently raises a question about selectivity in Raman Ji's work of registration.

Part Four: Editorial and Stylistic Limitations and Disagreements Among Readers

An Admission of Methodological Indiscipline

Kumar Rahul's essay, Contribution 6, is the most direct on this point. Beginning, "I can at least delineate his limitations," he writes plainly that Raman Ji, as a learned critic, does not appear to follow any settled or circumscribed rules in his criticism; instead, he is sometimes influenced by a single element and delivers his judgement on that basis. In places, Raman Ji deals with a work or an author in a few words, almost like a brief note, and devotes more space to what he himself wishes to say. Quoting Hudson's view—that the task of criticism is not merely to determine what is right or wrong in a work but to establish definite standards—the writer acknowledges that a number of Raman Ji's essays do not fully meet this theoretical test.

Unevenness in Editorial Work

Pradeep Bihari's essay, Contribution 14, says explicitly at one point that Raman Ji's editing of the magazine Ghar-Bahar does not display the skill evident in his analytical and research-based books. On the writing of introductions and editorials, he observes: "The intellectual urgency a writer ought to possess for these two kinds of writing is visible in Raman Ji in many places, but not everywhere. In some places he has been one-sided." The essay also notes that, while he receives much praise for his service to literature, he is also subjected to criticism and disparagement; how seriously he considers these responses cannot be determined from the expression on his face.

Disagreements over Facts and Interpretations

In Kirtinath Jha's review of Vivarta, Contribution 10, one explicit disagreement is recorded. When Raman Ji describes Maithili magazines and journals as "fully sensitive and responsible" towards the freedom movement, the reviewer comments, "But it is difficult to say whether this view commands universal agreement on the subject." Ajit Kumar Jha's essay, Contribution 5, expresses still clearer dissent from Raman Ji's rereading of Kanyadan: the critic's reasoning appears one-sided, and Raman Ji's division of Harimohan Jha's readers into three categories omits a fourth—readers who regard Raman Ji's own writing as an attack on Mithila's culture. As the essay puts it, "Raman Ji has not discussed the fourth category in his article." Hitnath Jha's essay, Contribution 17, also registers a clear disagreement. Referring to Raman Ji's attack on literary politics in the preface to his collection of keynote addresses, the reviewer writes: "This was a forum, and for a book of this kind, I do not think it appropriate … Before launching an attack, there should also be room for reform."

The Shortcomings in Ramanand Jha 'Raman's Critical Historiography from Ashish Anchinhar's Perspective

The central insistence of Ashish Anchinhar's essay is that writing literary history does not mean merely collecting books, listing names or taking a book published later as the point of origin. For him, the historian's first qualification is a "sense of history": an impartial understanding of the sequence of events, publications, influence, earlier experiments, sources and credit. By this measure he finds several shortcomings, particularly in the preface Ramanand Jha 'Raman' wrote for Dharmendra Vihwal's book Vyomak Ohipar.

1. The Absence of Historical Awareness

Anchinhar's foremost objection is that Raman Ji has forgotten his "sense of history" in this instance. In Anchinhar's view, a historian or writer of a preface should distinguish among the first publication of a literary form, its earliest experiments, discussions of its rules and its later expansion into book form. Using a subsequent book to obscure the earlier stages distorts the historical sequence.

2. Inconsistent Criteria for Determining the Beginning of a Genre

Anchinhar explains that the beginning of a literary form should be dated from its first verifiable publication, whether in a magazine or a book. His objection is that if the standard applied to one writer is "first book" and the standard applied to another is "first publication," literary historiography operates with a double standard. Anchinhar alleges that Raman Ji's preface does not sufficiently clarify this distinction.

3. Neglect of Earlier Publications and Experiments

Anchinhar refers to the essay "Maithili Haiku, Haiku and Kshanika" in Gajendra Thakur's book Kurukshetram Antarmanak, published in 2009, where Japanese literary forms such as tanka, senryū, haibun, haiga and waka are said to have been discussed. He also mentions instruction in these forms and the participation of numerous writers in Videha's Facebook group up to around 2012. In Anchinhar's view, Raman Ji's failure to acknowledge this earlier public history adequately in his preface is a significant omission.

4. Lack of Source References

Anchinhar alleges that Raman Ji explains the rules of tanka and other forms without citing earlier presentations of those rules in Maithili or identifying the available sources. In literary history or a critical preface, stating a fact alone is not enough: its source, earlier use and evidence must also be supplied. Anchinhar sees this absence of references as a weakness in scholarly writing.

5. Confusion in Assigning Credit

As Anchinhar reads it, the preface to Vyomak Ohipar leaves the impression that Dharmendra Vihwal introduced tanka, senryū, haibun, haiga, waka and related forms into Maithili. Anchinhar regards that impression as historically misleading because, according to him, these forms had already been discussed, their rules explained and experiments in writing them undertaken. A preface should therefore make the separate claims of credit explicit: "Who first introduced the form?", "Who produced the first single-genre collection?", and "Who popularised the form?"

6. Failure to Distinguish "First Book" from "First Appearance of the Genre"

Anchinhar presents a Facebook exchange reproduced in the appendix to his essay as support for his argument. The substance of that exchange is that Dharmendra Vihwal claims his book is the first book-length or single-genre work in this form; he does not claim that the form had never existed in Maithili before him. According to Anchinhar, Raman Ji's preface fails to establish this essential distinction clearly.

7. Allegations of Personal or Ideological Disagreement Affecting the Account

Anchinhar's criticism is not confined to errors of fact. He alleges that Gajendra Thakur's name and contribution were overlooked because of ideological disagreement or "tāmas" (hostile passion). This is a serious allegation. For Anchinhar, a historian's duty is to rise above personal likes and dislikes and assign credit impartially.

8. Failure to Engage with Contrary Evidence

Anchinhar issues a challenge: if tanka, senryū, haibun, haiga, waka and related forms existed in Maithili before Gajendra Thakur, and if their rules had already been discussed, the evidence should be produced. In other words, silence or the omission of a name is not enough; literary history requires documentary evidence for alternative claims. According to Anchinhar, Raman Ji's preface lacks an assessment of evidence at this level.

9. Failure to Fulfil the Preface Writer's Duty to Verify Sources

A book's preface is not merely an encomium, particularly when it makes claims about the history and rules of a literary form. In Anchinhar's view, Raman Ji should have drawn conclusions only after carefully examining earlier publications, chronology, lists of authors, public posts, books and all available evidence. The absence of such source verification weakens the preface as a critical document.

10. The Need to Correct the Historical Record

Anchinhar finally suggests a course of correction: if earlier facts are wrong, present fresh evidence; if there were earlier contributions, restore their names and proper credit. In his view, therefore, the fundamental failing of Raman Ji's writing in this instance is not simply a "mistake," but a remediable imbalance in the historical record.

Conclusion: The focus of Ashish Anchinhar's criticism is not Ramanand Jha 'Raman's language, style or total literary achievement. It is the particular preface's sense of history, sources, chronology, assignment of credit and impartiality. The substance of his allegation is that the earlier history of Japanese poetic forms in Maithili was not given its proper place, and the distinction between the "first book" and the "first appearance of a genre" was blurred. For these reasons, he regards the text as incomplete and affected by partiality from the standpoint of literary historiography.

Conclusion

When all these limitations are gathered together, a common thread becomes clear. Raman Ji's work is extensive in quantity, invaluable as an archive and inspired by love of his mother tongue—none of the contributors to this special issue calls that into question. Yet when that work is subjected to stringent tests of theoretical discipline, authenticity of sources, complete impartiality and institutional results, there remains considerable room for improvement: the risk of criticism without access to texts; unstable evaluative standards; excessive praise born of personal closeness; the limited presence of marginalised voices; institutional silence; and selective impartiality. These are invitations to further research, not punishments. The reviewer of Hiaol writes something equally applicable to the special issue as a whole: "Its excellence lies where the author searches the archives, corrects received errors and brings forgotten writers into view … Its limitation lies where conjecture takes the place of evidence and biography outweighs analysis of the work." To put it in Raman Ji's own words, "Vāde vāde jāyate tattvabodhaḥ"—understanding of truth arises through debate and counterargument. That understanding, born of disagreement and response, is the genuine achievement of this special issue.

Ramanand Jha 'Raman': An Editorial Perspective on the Boundaries of His Work

The place that Raman Ji occupies in Maithili literature emerges as beyond dispute from these seventeen contributions. But the special issue will fulfil its purpose only if, along with its praise, it identifies the limitations that the contributors themselves—and Raman Ji's own critical method—bring to light.

1. The Most Fundamental Limitation of His Critical Method: Criticism Without the Text

The extensive review of Akhiyasal (Contribution 4) makes it perfectly clear that Raman Ji frequently does not have access to the original texts of the works he critiques. In the cases of Chandraprabha, Trilochan Jha, Yaduvar and the forgotten Janardan Jha, he himself acknowledges their "unavailability." If the original work was not available to the critic, the question of how he could have undertaken its aesthetic evaluation remains unanswered. In many places the criticism depends on Jayakant Mishra's literary history or other secondary sources.

2. The Instability of Evaluative Standards

The reviews of these two books (Contributions 4 and 16) repeatedly demonstrate that Raman Ji treats one quality as paramount in one essay and praises its opposite in another. For example, his engagement with contemporary reality is considered a virtue in discussions of Ganganand Singh and Chandragrahan, yet Vyas's stories are praised precisely because they remain unaffected by contemporary reality. Such self-contradiction shows the absence of a single, declared theoretical commitment: the criticism becomes impressionistic in one place, sociological in another and biographical elsewhere.

3. Personal Closeness and the Lack of Critical Distance

In chapters on Lakshmipati Singh, Mohan and Rajeshwar Jha, personal affection turns criticism into a memoir-like tribute, affecting objectivity. By contrast, the critical courage displayed in the discussion of Harimohan Jha is not exercised with equal consistency throughout the collection.

4. The Absence of Theoretical Terminology

Elements of Indian poetics such as rasa, dhvani and vyañjanā are implicitly present, but there is no systematic theoretical application of Anandavardhana, Kuntaka, Kshemendra and others. Nor is there a considered application of Western theory. This makes the criticism readable, but deprives it of academic depth.

5. Narrowness of Perspective: The Limited Presence of Women and Marginalised Voices

Of the twenty-five essays in Akhiyasal, twenty-four concern male authors and only one a woman, Harilata—and even that discussion is restricted to Vaishnava devotion. Dalit and most-backward communities in Mithila, and the unnamed creators of oral tradition, are largely missing from this parallel history. Kumar Rahul's essay (Contribution 6) also observes that Raman Ji does not seem to follow fixed theoretical rules, but delivers judgements under the influence of a single element. In places he disposes of a writer or a work in a few words, as though writing a brief annotation, and devotes more space to his own observations.

6. Inconsistency in the Compilation

All twenty-five essays were written independently at different times and for different magazines. Assembling them as a "book" does not produce a uniform theoretical framework. The absence of an introduction, a statement of method and a conclusion exposes this composite character. The same applies to Hiaol, where the scope, method and depth of individual chapters are uneven.

7. The Gap Between Individual Dedication and Institutional Results

Praveen Kumar Jha's essay (Contribution 15) is the most outspoken voice in the special issue. With his "But, but, but!" he writes plainly that, despite Raman Ji's years in important positions in institutions such as Chetna Samiti and the Maithili Writers' Association, no decisive or concrete results of his work are clearly apparent in the campaign for Maithili's inclusion in the Eighth Schedule of the Constitution or in Maithili education. The question is not his dedication but its results. The essay also mentions allegations and controversies associated with his tenure at Chetna Samiti and criticisms of a preference for diplomatic relations with those in power. Dr Dhanakar Thakur's predominantly satirical essay (Contribution 11) sharpens the same point, comparing Raman Ji and Chetna Samiti's silence on the question of a Mithila state to Dronacharya's "keeping his eyes closed."

8. The Question of Impartiality

The observation by Rajlin Thakur quoted in Dr Kailash Kumar Mishra's essay (Contribution 12) is explicit: "Raman Ji is both a person dear to him and a good critic, but he has one failing: he brings the work of a limited section of society to the fore more than the work of others, and at that point he cannot remain impartial." Nabonarayan Mishra's essay (Contribution 13) likewise points to the absence of an activist playwright such as Babusaheb Chaudhary from the register of literary figures.

9. Unevenness in Editorial Work

Pradeep Bihari's essay (Contribution 14) states explicitly that editing the magazine Ghar-Bahar does not exhibit the same skill found in Raman Ji's analytical and research-based books: the intellectual urgency needed for introductions and editorials is not equally visible everywhere. Kirtinath Jha's review of Vivarta (Contribution 10) also records a disagreement—"It is difficult to say whether this view is universally accepted"—when Raman Ji describes Maithili periodicals as "fully sensitive and responsible" towards the freedom movement.

10. Disagreement Among Readers

Ajit Kumar Jha's essay (Contribution 5) explicitly disagrees with Raman Ji's rereading of Kanyadan: the critic's argument appears one-sided, and the three groups into which Raman Ji divides Harimohan Jha's readers omit a fourth, comprising those who view Raman Ji's own literature as an attack on Mithila's culture.

Synthesis—All these limitations are joined by a common thread: Raman Ji's work is extensive in volume, invaluable in archival terms and inspired by love of his mother tongue. Yet in theoretical discipline, authenticity of sources, complete impartiality and institutional results, it leaves room for further progress. To express it in his own words, "Vāde vāde jāyate tattvabodhaḥ": understanding of truth arises through debate and counterargument.

109. The Late Harimohan Jha (1908–1984), Jagdish Prasad Mandal, Premshankar Singh, and the Late Vaidyanath Mishra 'Yatri' (1911–1998)

Abstract

Born on 18 September 1908 in Kumar Bajitpur, a village and post office in Vaishali district, Bihar, India. The Late Harimohan Jha (1908–1984)

He was born on 18 September 1908 in Kumar Bajitpur, a village and post office in Vaishali district, Bihar, India. His father, the late Pandit Janardan Jha 'Jansidan', was a distinguished Hindi poet and man of letters of the Dwivedi era, besides being a Maithili writer. Harimohan Jha received his MA in Philosophy in 1932, winning a gold medal for taking first place in Bihar and Orissa. From 1933 he was a lecturer at B. N. College, Patna; from 1948 he taught at Patna College; from 1953 he was Professor and Head of Department at Patna University; and from 1970 to 1975 he served as a UGC Research Professor. His Maithili publications include the novels Kanyadan (1933) and Dwiragaman (1943); the short-story collections Pranamya Devata (1945), Rangshala (1949), and Charchari (1960); and the satire Khattar Kaka-k Tarang (1948). The second edition of the story collection Ekadashi appeared in 1987: it replaced 'Graduate Putohu' with 'Dwadash Nidan', a story previously published in Mithila Mihir but absent from the earlier collections. 'Baba-k Sanskar', written at the request of Ramanath Jha, is also included in that collection. Khattar Kaka appeared in Hindi book form in 1971. In addition, his scattered published poems were collected as Harimohan Jha Rachanavali, Volume 4 (Poetry), in 1999, and his autobiography, Jivan-Yatra, was published in 1984. Harimohan Babu's Jivan-Yatra was the only one of his books published by the Maithili Academy; for this work he received the Sahitya Akademi Award posthumously in 1985. In 1999 the Sahitya Akademi published a selection of his stories entitled Bichhal Katha, edited by Rajmohan Jha and Subhash Chandra Yadav. Some stories in that selection had appeared in none of his earlier collections. Many of his works have been translated into Hindi, Gujarati, Marathi, Kannada, Telugu, and other languages. His books in Hindi include Nyaya Darshan, Vaisheshik Darshan, Tarkashastra (Deduction), a Hindi translation from English of Datta and Chatterjee's Indian Philosophy, and the edited collection Darshanik Vivechanayen. His English research monograph is Trends of Linguistic Analysis in Indian Philosophy.

In the ancient period Vidyapati raised Maithili poetry to a lofty summit of achievement; Harimohan Jha brought modern Maithili prose to a comparable height. A defining feature of his writing was its witty and satirical assault on social and religious conventions, superstition, and hypocrisy. Even today his works are among the most widely purchased and read books in Maithili.

Khattar Kaka-k Tarang (Narrative Satire)

Kanyadan (Novel)

Dwiragaman (Novel)

Jivan-Yatra (Autobiography)

The dedication of Kanyadan: 'To the leading men of that society which feels no compunction in giving away a girl as though she were an inanimate object; whose arbiters pour away thousands upon thousands of rupees on the education of boys but do not deem it necessary to buy even a slate worth a few small coins for a girl; in which the wife of a BA graduate does not even know the letters A and B; and which feels no pity in harnessing an innocent heifer beside a circus horse to pull the carriage of married life—to the thunderbolt-strong hands of that society's champions this book is dedicated humbly, earnestly, and with trepidation.'

The dedication of Pranamya Devata: 'To the man who, seven years ago, borrowed money from me on a promise concerning Kartik Purnima and has never since condescended to show himself again; whose unforgettable exploits are described at length in the very first story; who might claim the highest seat among the "deities worthy of reverence"; whose estimable relatives might establish their own claim to the book merely on seeing it, without even asking—to that principal hero of extraordinary character, the formidable guest Bhimendranath, I am compelled to present this book of extraordinary characters into his enormous, powerful fist!'

The dedication of Khattar Kaka-k Tarang: 'To the man who, riding the waves of bhang, sets flowing a current of poetry, learning, and wit, in which the Vedas, Puranas, and law-books are all washed away for a while; who mixes a syrup of extraordinary delight and wonder into every remark; whose piercing satire reaches the innermost heart and tickles it—to that eternal embodiment of joy, the laughter-loving Khattar Kaka: "What belongs to you, Uncle, I dedicate to you alone."'

> The dedication of Rangshala: 'To the ever-youthful actress who presides over this beginningless and endless theatre; the beautiful veena-player who sets the entire moving and unmoving universe dancing on the tips of her fingers; the mysterious enchantress who shows a glimpse of her captivating play but allows no one to touch her; the one who, arriving on the coloured wings of imagination, infuses the artist's art with aesthetic relish—to that wondrous, eternally beautiful, conqueror of the three worlds, the goddess Maya.'

Jagdish Prasad Mandal

Writing about the Bengal famine of 1942–43, Amartya Sen notes that hundreds of thousands died in Bengal—the Famine Inquiry Commission put the toll at 1.5 million—yet not one of his own relatives died in it. Likewise, during the famine in Mithila in 1967, India's Prime Minister was shown how members of the Musahar community were fighting starvation by eating bisandh. Yet a story on that subject did not appear until 2009. In 2009 Jagdish Prasad Mandal wrote a Maithili story about bisandh. The reason for the delay is clear as well: because of the one-sided tendency that had prevailed in Maithili literature, our writers, like Amartya Sen in this comparison, may not have been affected to the same degree by that enormous catastrophe. Jagdish Prasad Mandal's story saves the course of Maithili fiction from remaining one-sided. Every story in this collection is outstanding. Together they fill a gap and furnish evidence of a renaissance in Maithili literature.

Jagdish Prasad Mandal is an accomplished craftsman. He brings his material together so deftly that the reader is left astonished. But his insistence on making that material purposeful—and his ability to do so, whether in short stories, novels, plays, or inspirational stories—establishes him at a place in Maithili literature from which its history will be read in two parts: 'before Jagdish Prasad Mandal' and 'from Jagdish Prasad Mandal onward'. Every social group is present in his writing, not as an ornamental inclusion but naturally and without contrivance; for Maithili literature this is like the arrival of a great wave. Nowhere in his work does one encounter mere declamation about deprivation. The respect and dignity with which he presents the ways of life of every class are remarkable. Against employment-seeking and migration, his writing upholds the dignity of traditional livelihoods. Its force comes from his equal commitment to what he writes and what he actually does, and from the excellence of his personal and social life: he writes what he thinks and what he practises. Despite novelists such as Yatri and Dhumketu, and short-story craftsmen such as Kumar Pawan and Dhumketu, the Maithili language remained distant from ordinary people. The cadences and inflections of Maithili have always attracted people beyond Mithila as well.

Mandal's engaged literature, which reveals society, culture, and language through those same cadences and inflections, will bring change not only in Mithila's social sphere but also in its economic life. Five of his novels, one play, more than two dozen stories, and over a hundred inspirational stories for children and adolescents have been published electronically in Videha. They have stirred Maithili speakers scattered across the world and filled a vacant space in Maithili literature.

Premshankar Singh

The Late Vaidyanath Mishra 'Yatri' (1911–1998)

The late Vaidyanath Mishra 'Yatri' was born in 1911 at Satlakha, his maternal grandparents' village, situated near his ancestral village of Tarauni. Yatri began studying at the Sanskrit school in his village. He later went to Varanasi and Calcutta and earned the title of Sahityacharya in Sanskrit. After that he travelled to Kelaniya, near Colombo, to study Pali and Buddhism. There he was initiated into Buddhism and took the name Nagarjun. Later, however, he underwent the sacred-thread ceremony again in his village and returned to Brahmanical religious practice.

Yatri was influenced by Marxism. In the closing months of 1929 he began writing verse in Maithili, and from 1935 he wrote in Hindi as well. Alongside Swami Sahajanand Saraswati and Rahul Sankrityayan, he took part in the peasant movement and, in that connection, was imprisoned on several occasions between 1939 and 1941. Many of the works he wrote after Mahatma Gandhi's death were banned. Following the Communist Party's support for China during the Sino-Indian War, he developed differences with the party. He participated in the J. P. movement and was thrown into prison during the Emergency. Yatri also wrote children's literature in Hindi. Besides Hindi and Maithili, his writings appeared in Bengali and Sanskrit. He received the second Sahitya Akademi Award given for Maithili in 1969, for his poetry collection Patrahin Nagna Gachh (The Leafless Naked Tree). In 1994 he was elected a Fellow of the Sahitya Akademi in recognition of his standing as a poet in Hindi and Maithili.

When Yatri was twenty, he was married to a girl of twelve. His father, Gokul Mishra, was regarded as uneducated by his community and was a man of dissolute character. One of Yatri's childhood memories was of his father taking up an axe to attack his ailing, bedridden mother when the helpless woman begged him to abandon his wayward conduct. Yatri was only six when his mother died. Another image of his father haunted him repeatedly: his widowed aunt, who had loved him like a mother, nearly died while aborting a pregnancy resulting from his father's illicit relationship with her. Who among the readers of Yatri's Hindi novel Ratinath ki Chachi has not wept again and again while reading it? The fierce conflict between father and son grew so intense that the son left his child-wife with his father and departed for Varanasi.

Let my aged father reap the fruits of his deeds;
I am his only offspring—that is his sin.
Knowing this, let him feel no anguish of mind.
Let even others forget my name.
Mother Mithila, this is my final farewell! (Kashi, November 1936)

From Kashi he went to Sri Lanka. With the words 'Let my aged father reap the fruits of his deeds', Yatri gave voice to all the feelings he harboured towards his father. In 1941 he returned to his wife, Aparajita. That year he wrote two Maithili poems, 'Burh Var' (The Old Bridegroom) and 'Vilap' (Lament), had them printed as pamphlets, and sold them to railway passengers. Husband and wife travelled all over India in search of a livelihood. At his wife's insistence he would occasionally return to Tarauni. Then came 1949, bringing with it Yatri's first collection of Maithili poetry, Chitra. Until 1952 his wife accompanied him in his travels, after which she began living in Tarauni; Yatri visited from time to time. He and Aparajita had six children, and she carried the responsibility for all of them on her own shoulders. Yatri suffered from asthma.

When I was studying in Darbhanga, Yatri lived in Khwaja Sarai. I remember that he once attended a Maithili event at which Communist Party members had taken over the agenda. The following day he withdrew from the proceedings of the meeting that had descended into such confusion. During the Emergency, when he was imprisoned, he met RSS workers in jail. After his release he also wrote against J. P.'s Total Revolution. He published in Maithili under the name Vaidyanath Mishra 'Yatri' and in Hindi under the name 'Nagarjun'.

'Prithvi Te Patram' was published in Vaidehi in 1954 and was part of our matriculation syllabus. Yatri writes:

> 'Other festivals may be one thing or another, but Nawan lays bare the condition of the landless family. So, as soon as Kartik arrives, Aparajita Devi's veil hangs low. Her eyes are so pained that she cannot even lift her lids towards anyone! Where has anyone ever celebrated Nawan with grain purchased from the market?'

Is Yatri a myth? Yes, is Yatri a myth? He was principally a writer in Hindi: he did not produce in Maithili even a tenth of what he wrote in Hindi, and a large proportion of what he did produce in Maithili consisted of his own translations from Hindi. The vocabulary and culture of Maithili and the Mithila region seemed unfamiliar, and therefore fascinating, to Hindi readers. Yet there were many shortcomings even here. Take this example from Yatri Samagra: on page 220, 'The death anniversary of his paternal uncle fell on Jeth Sudi Chaturdashi'; then on page 222, '...where could he go even for a single day to officiate as karta, on the first date of Asarh Badh Tritiya?'

Other writers working in both Maithili and Hindi suffer from the same malady. It is a documented historical fact that Gonu Jha lived between 1050 and 1150, yet Usha Kiran Khan has him engage in a scholarly disputation with Vidyapati (in her Hindi historical novel Sirjanhara, published by Bharatiya Jnanpith). Virendra Jha says Gonu Jha lived five hundred years ago; Taranand Viyogi places him three hundred years ago (in their respective Hindi books on Gonu Jha, published by Rajkamal Prakashan and the National Book Trust); and in Vibha Rani's Hindi book on Gonu Jha (Vani Prakashan), Kunal places him under the rule of Bhav Singh in the fourteenth century. Such is the state of affairs even though written records in the panji genealogies place Gonu Jha ten generations before Vidyapati. Vocabulary and culture particular to Mithila seem obscure, and therefore intriguing, to Hindi readers; but through their ignorance these Maithili–Hindi writers are serving up numerous erroneous 'facts'. Sectarian writers are even inserting the oppression of Muslim revenue officials into Gonu Jha stories—although, Muslims were not living in Mithila in Gonu's time at all!

Chaturanan Mishra and Jagdish Prasad Mandal have both been associated with the Communist movement in practical work at the party level. Yet after reading the novels of these two writers, I have no hesitation in saying that they do not feel any need for the crutch of Marxism on which Yatri and Dhumketu prop up their novels. The true meaning of Marxism is to be found in the works of these two writers. Nowhere is there a discussion of a party's name or an ideology; instead, one finds a recognition of genuine dialectical materialism, a belief in the importance of life, and the application of a dialectical method. This becomes possible only when a writer studies Marxism deeply, including Das Kapital, and remains engaged in practical Marxism for decades.

And, finally, these Sanskrit verses by Yatri:

> The golden radiance of spring is doubled,
> by leaves of yellow and ruddy red;
> with the play of golden lotuses in mind,
> the bees remain at a distance;
> these trees make the tales of pleasure groves > forgotten here upon the earth;
> their shimmering shade sways and changes,
> these are the chinar trees.

The golden glow of spring is doubled by yellow and red new leaves. The bees, under the illusion that this is a golden age, keep far away. Their beauty causes one to forget the pleasures of the celestial Nandana grove upon the earth. Their shadows flicker, growing and diminishing; their movement is restless and fluid. I have seen those chinar trees standing firm and unmoving.

110. A Review of the Complete Literary Works of Subhash Chandra Yadav and the Kamalanand Jha Question in Maithili Criticism

Abstract

This extensive chapter offers a sequential review of the entire body of Subhash Chandra Yadav's Maithili writing. From Ghardekhiya to Gulo, it examines his stories and novels, language, folk life, social structures and creative development. It also incorporates a critical discussion of trends in Maithili literary criticism and the questions surrounding Kamalanand Jha.

Keywords: Subhash Chandra Yadav; Ghardekhiya; Gulo; short story; novel; folk life; language; Maithili criticism

The Ever-New Subhash Chandra Yadav

(Writer's Block—Writing in Maithili's Parallel Current: The Complete Literary Works of Subhash Chandra Yadav)

Subhash Chandra Yadav (1948–) was born on 5 March 1948 at his maternal family's home in Diwanganj, Supaul. His ancestral village is Balwa-Menahi, Supaul.

First phase of original writing in Maithili: Ghardekhiya (1983).

Second phase of original writing in Maithili: Banait Bigarait (serialised in the Videha e-journal from 2008 to 2009, then published as a book in 2009); Gulo (published in Mithila Darshan in 2014, then as a book in 2015); Ramta Jogi (2019); Madar (2021); the Rajkamal Chaudhary monograph (rejected by the Sahitya Akademi in January 1997, published in the December 2005–March 2006 issue of Rachna, and issued in book form in 2022 as Nit Naval Rajkamal); and Bhot (2022).

"Whoever tells the stories rules this world"—a proverb of the Hopi, a Native American people.

And Subhash Chandra Yadav stopped telling stories.

Swapnasundari and the Magical Birds of Mithila (Geeta Dharmarajan, story, 1996)

The singing birds were very fond of Swapnasundari, the little princess of Mithila. But she would turn fish, goats and cows into birds as well. The people reproached the princess; she took offence and stopped turning things into birds. She would not even come out of her palace. Then the birds that had survived in the magical land of Mithila disappeared too. The women still sang in the fields, but without the many-coloured birds, Mithila no longer seemed like the Mithila it had once been. Then came the traders in trees. They persuaded people that trees were useless without birds, deceived them, cut down every tree in Mithila and carried the timber away. The women tried every device they could think of to save at least a few trees, but they could not. Without trees, all the streams dried up. Without trees, the people grew poorer and poorer, while the traders grew richer and richer. The women went weeping to the princess: "Princess, help us. We were wrong." Swapnasundari sat in her room, where pictures of many-coloured birds covered the walls on every side. Looking at those pictures, the princess of Mithila spoke sadly: "No, you were right. Birds alone cannot keep us happy." But the women answered, "Nor can we be happy without the birds. Bring them back, Princess." The princess was so miserable that she could no longer work her magic. Then the women said, "Never mind. We shall plant trees, and the singing birds will return. And this time we shall not allow anyone to cheat us." All Mithila began to labour as though possessed. No one had a moment's leisure. Singing and dancing, they planted and watered the trees. As the trees grew taller and spread wider, everyone began to laugh and clap. Working together brought them joy. Perhaps that was why the trees themselves grew better and faster. Large and small trees seemed to smile on every side in Swapnasundari's country of Mithila. Magical music spread in every direction. These would become homes for birds of seven colours: red, jomak, sky-blue, yellow, pink and the colour called panisokha. The princess said to the women, "I have always dreamed that the girls of our country would go to school." The women replied, "Yes, Princess. Had we been educated, no trader could have deceived us." But a difficulty arose. Some among the women asked, "Then who will do the work at home?"

The princess of Mithila then commanded that boys should learn the work that girls did, and girls should learn the work that boys did. Everyone would be happier if they moved forward together. Swapnasundari gave a bicycle to every girl who attended school. She explained that people throughout the world who can travel quickly from one place to another are happier, because they can finish all their work more swiftly. The women asked, "May we not ride bicycles too?" "Why not?" the princess replied. "Women should be able to do whatever work they like." Some asked the princess, "But where will the money come from?" The others silenced them. "Must the princess do everything herself?" They organised a great fair. Money was collected, and Princess Swapnasundari's school was built. The school works magic: children who enter it become like birds of many colours. "Why don't you come to the school yourself, Princess?" She came one day, and again the next, until she began coming every day. Then she said that the children's mothers and fathers should come to school too.

And the princess began to work magic again. This time, however, she turned only useless things into birds. And many birds with wings of every colour came back to Mithila of their own accord, without the use of magic. Each carried a thousand books in its beak—books that brought delight, red, pink and sky-blue books; the seven colours of red, jomak, yellow, pink and panisokha. Green, luxuriant trees had taken the place of sand. And the birds sang: "Beauty without knowledge is like a dried-up stream." The Mithila of that little princess became the greenest and most cheerful country in the world. People even say that the magic in Mithila's air is always there because of those birds. And what if we too should find such a place, a place where women and men could think great thoughts! Might that magical place be somewhere close to us? Might the place of magical things be inside ordinary people like ourselves? If you discover this place, wherever it may be, please let me know at my e-mail address: editorial.staff.videha@gmail.com.

Subhash Chandra Yadav stopped telling stories.

But from 1983 onward he stood his ground alone. Even some writers from what are today called the lower social strata went along with Maithili's artificial spelling conventions, leaving him isolated; they too became victims of gaslighting. Traders began to swarm on every side. Like the little princess, he continued to watch …

But from 1 January 2008, after eight years of preparation, Videha, the Maithili e-journal, began planting trees in Mithila, fortnight after fortnight; and the many-coloured birds began to return.

After breaking a silence of twenty-five years, Nachiketa began publishing No Entry: Ma Pravish in the fortnightly Videha e-journal. In that same year, after twenty-five years, Subhash Chandra Yadav began telling stories to Videha's readers, fortnight after fortnight. Yadav's Ghardekhiya had appeared in 1983. Twenty-five years later, Banait Bigarait was published electronically in Videha in 2008–09 and then in print in 2009.

"Whoever tells the stories will rule this world"; and the parallel current is telling stories. Mithila's birds, their wings displaying many colours, have returned: Sandeep Kumar Safi, Umesh Paswan, Bechan Thakur, Kapileshwar Raut, Umesh Mandal, Ram Vilas Sahu, Rajdev Mandal, Nand Vilas Rai, Jagdish Prasad Mandal, Durganand Mandal, Acharya Ramanand Mandal, Lalan Kumar Kamat, Narayan Yadav, Munni Kamat, Shiv Kumar Prasad, Dhirendra Kumar and Ramdev Prasad Mandal "Jharudar" have arrived with stories and songs in a multitude of colours.

They have returned, each carrying a thousand books in its beak—books that bring joy, books of red, pink, jomak, panisokha, the seven colours and sky-blue. For rich green trees have taken the place of sand.

And Subhash Chandra Yadav began telling stories once more.

After Banait Bigarait came Ramta Jogi, Gulo, Madar and Bhot. The monograph on Rajkamal Chaudhary, rejected by the Sahitya Akademi, appeared under the title Nit Naval Rajkamal. And that is why Subhash Chandra Yadav is the "Ever-New Subhash Chandra Yadav."

Maithili Story Science (Maithila Narratology) and Subhash Chandra Yadav

Michel Foucault's "disciplinary institution" and what the psychologists Barton and Whitehead call "gaslighting" have the same objective. A disciplinary institution, in the Foucauldian sense invoked here, brings the person before it under discipline: set everyone against everyone else, reward some, and slowly administer poison to those who refuse to submit. In gaslighting, the person concerned is made to believe that their challenge to the status quo is no challenge at all: everyone is doing the same thing, they are told, and they are protesting merely for the sake of protesting, to conceal their own inadequacy. Existing fundamental deficiencies in society are also exploited for this purpose. Gradually the target either loses their mental equilibrium or withdraws.

Thus Subhash Chandra Yadav's writer's block was no ordinary writer's block; it was "gaslighting."

But Story Science provides a response. It analyses in advance what effect a particular story, once told, will have on people and society. The parallel current therefore decided to counter poison with poison. Those mainstream writers who twisted language in the name of standardisation were, through gaslighting, acting against Story Science. Their aim was to designate differences of spelling as errors. Writing with Ghardekhiya in view, Ramdev Jha argued that the principle "write as you speak," having failed in Assamese, would fail in Maithili too.

And Subhash Chandra Yadav was left alone.

But when Ramanand Jha "Raman" deployed this same Story Science alongside biśāṛh, and, in that context, Umesh Mandal sent me a story by Jagdish Prasad Mandal whose spelling Shivshankar Srinivas had corrected —having also pointed out, as though conferring a favour, that he had worked three days to remove its "errors"—I became immediately alert.

This was because stories using Subhash Chandra Yadav's own spellings had by then begun to appear electronically in Videha. I explained the import of Story Science to Umesh Mandal, and works in their original, supposedly uncorrected spelling began to be published in Videha. [See Dudh-Pani Farak-Farak (story and manuscript by Jagdish Prasad Mandal; photography and editing by Umesh Mandal).] Dudh-Pani Farak-Farak (story and manuscript by Jagdish Prasad Mandal; photography and editing by Umesh Mandal).

Umesh Mandal informed me that after the spelling "corrections," Jagdish Prasad Mandal had become withdrawn. But from the day he learned that the conventionally "corrected" version of his work had been rejected by Videha, and that the version with his own authentic spelling would now be published electronically, he was filled with fresh enthusiasm.

Umesh Mandal then spoke with Subhash Chandra Yadav. Yadav told him, "Write whatever you like to the mainstream people. They will not listen; they will not even pay attention." He had also placed great trust in Rajmohan Jha, whom he addressed as an elder brother. "Then what is the remedy?" "The remedy is exactly what you are doing: increase the number of writers."

And Story Science says the same thing: those who tell stories will rule, and the more stories one tells, the further one will advance. Even Brihaspati, standing alone, would be judged false. But in this second phase Subhash Chandra Yadav was no longer alone.

For fifteen years the parallel current has been telling stories, while the mainstream has been listening.

Yet all the institutions described here as Michel Foucault's "disciplinary institutions"—the Sahitya Akademi, the Maithili Academy, the Maithili-Bhojpuri Academy, and the so-called literary associations recognised by the Sahitya Akademi—are in the mainstream's hands.

But Story Science has put an end to the techniques of mainstream gaslighting, including the disciplinary practices and the technique of offering to become someone's "guardian."

Story Science exposed Taranand Viyogi's vocabulary: (1) "Novels are pouring out in Maithili by the wholesale lot"; (2) "the language of sweepers"; and (3) "a conspiracy to erect mountains of rubbish"; as well as Ramanand Jha "Raman"'s phrase (1) "the language of the market and bazaar" (in his foreword to Dr Pramod Kumar's Kankirba).

These are all techniques of gaslighting suited to discouraging writers; the parallel current, with the help of Story Science, has overcome them. The examples also demonstrate that people of every caste are present in both the mainstream and the parallel current. Story Science has helped identify not only Brahminism but also a new Brahminism among non-Brahmins.

It was for the same reason, the argument continues, that an attempt was made to swallow up Sagar Rati Dip Jaray, the Maithili storytelling gathering, under the auspices of the Sahitya Akademi. When that attempt failed, Ramanand Jha "Raman" and others in the mainstream could no longer preserve their composure. Raman went so far as to make unprintable remarks about Umesh Mandal and me, without naming us, in the journal of a Brahminist organisation; and, as a reward, the Sahitya Akademi in Delhi recognised that organisation as a so-called literary association. This episode illustrates the effect of Story Science.

Ashok, however, is delighted that writers of the parallel current have been organising Sagar Rati Dip Jaray for the past ten years. He says, "Its original purpose was to hold gatherings from village to village. Only now is that actually happening." Shivshankar Srinivas made the very same point at the eighty-second Sagar Rati Dip Jaray, held in my village [The Buddhist Siddha Mehthapa, a children's-literature-centred storytelling gathering, Menhath]: "When we began Sagar Rati Dip Jaray, our intention was to take it from village to village; instead it began travelling between Patna and Chennai." The Buddhist Siddha Mehthapa (children's literature centred), Menhath.

Meanwhile, Ram Bharos Kapri "Bhramar" and Parmeshwar Kapri had stood firm across the border in Nepal. Their writings were not included in the anthologies of Indian government institutions on the ground that they were outsiders, from Nepal. Yet works by other Nepali writers who sided with the status quo were included.

Julia Kristeva's axis of longitudinal relationships; Julia Kristeva's axis of vertical relationships / Jacques Derrida—poststructuralism, that is, deconstructive theory

The journey of storytelling runs through Vedic narratives, the Jataka tales, Aesop's fables, the Panchatantra and the Hitopadesha, while folk narratives have continued alongside them. Everywhere the stories of the elite have existed beside folk tales; this is true of Maithili too.

Subhash Chandra Yadav's views on this subject are as follows:

"Very little work has been done on folktales in Maithili. Only a handful of collections are available, and these have been written down from memory rather than on the basis of fieldwork. Whatever the unit of folk literature, more than one version of it exists; these variants can be recovered through fieldwork. Memory retains only one version, and it may be a mistake to treat that version as the best. Every collection of folktales compiled so far is incomplete. In Maithili, at least some fieldwork has been undertaken on folk songs, folk ballads and folk deities; almost no fieldwork appears to have been carried out on folktales. Now that the transmission of folk literature from one generation to the next is increasingly endangered, preservation has become necessary. Folk literature must be preserved not merely because it belongs to the past. It is also a discourse and a form of self-narration belonging to its own time, and it offers a model. We continue, in our different ways, to use its metaphors, symbols, emotions and techniques in written literature. Conversely, written literature continually influences folk literature. Studies of folk literature have concentrated chiefly on establishing place and period. Questions concerning its function, intention and meaning remain neglected. In Maithili, the study of folk literature has not yet properly begun. The books that exist offer definitions and lists of folk literature. Among the available collections of folktales, a large proportion consists of stories that entered Maithili through migration. Relatively few are indigenous Maithili folktales—tales we could call authentically Maithil. Even the collection of Maithili folktales compiled by Ramlochan Thakur, on which I have based this very brief study, contains few authentically Maithili stories. To discuss the intentions and meanings of folktales, I have chosen two: 'There Once Was an Old Woman' and 'I Ate Just One Grain, Brother.' Both inhabit an entirely Maithil setting. Their discourse, self-narration and models accord with the Maithil imagination. Both centre their discussion on justice. In the first story an old woman challenges the carpenter, the king, the queen, fire, water and the elephant in order to obtain justice for a single grain of lentil, because a wooden peg has concealed her lentil and refuses to return it. The tale expresses its argument in verse:

Elephant, elephant, elephant!
Drink up the sea, O sea.
The sea will not put out the fire, the fire.
The fire will not frighten the queen, the queen.
The queen will not persuade the king, the king.
The king will not punish the carpenter, the carpenter.
The carpenter will not split the peg, the peg.
The peg will not give me my lentil, my lentil.
What shall I eat? What shall I drink?
What shall I take when I go to a foreign land?

She sets out. The peg gives way. Then, afraid of the peg, the elephant; afraid of the elephant, the sea; afraid of the sea, the fire; afraid of the fire, the queen; afraid of the queen, the king; and afraid of the king, the carpenter—all become willing to see justice done, and the peg returns the lentil to the old woman. Ramlochan had heard this story from his mother. He said that in his mother's version the old woman turned back after reaching the elephant. When writing it down, he recreated it. In his written version, the old woman goes beyond the elephant, all the way to the peg. Taking her as far as the peg expands the tale's suggestive significance. But how far is this kind of documentation of a folktale justified? The tale's self-narration is expressed through the old woman. Her response to her situation is the tale's self-narration. With nothing but a grain of lentil, she prepares to leave for a foreign land. She rejects the king and queen's offer of a full ser of lentils. She refuses the sea's gift of diamonds and pearls. She keeps struggling for her right to her own lentil. The point is that one must have dreams. One must not make oneself an object of begging or pity. It is not good to accept alms. One must have self-respect and fight for one's rights. The model established by the story is that justice is obtained through struggle. 'I Ate Just One Grain, Brother' considers the exercise of judgment in the administration of justice. A muniya bird is to be sentenced to death for the offence of eating a single grain of china millet. The discussion proceeds in verse, which also depicts her pitiful condition:

> Brother who owns the oxen!
> My nest, my little nest, is on the mountains and hills;
> My children are starving to death.
> I ate just one little grain, brother,
> And for that I am being taken captive.

"Then the horse-owner comes, the elephant-owner comes, and the owner of broken grain comes. The muniya appeals to all of them. They too plead with the owner of the field, offering him an ox, a horse or an elephant in exchange for her release, but he refuses to budge. Only when the bird is on the verge of dying of hunger and thirst does he let her go in exchange for the broken grain. The muniya calls upon compassion and humanity. The Manusmriti says that quietly plucking someone's flower is not theft; likewise, eating a single grain of someone else's millet is no crime. This is the self-narration of the tale. The model it establishes is that every living being's life has equal value. Even the helpless and the poor have the right to live. There must be a space for them in this world."

The likelihood of failure is greater in the short story than in the novel, epic or extended narrative, because the novel is a "soap opera," continuing for months or years, with each episode reaching a particular point at its close. In a seventy-episode novel, that means hope remains through the sixty-ninth episode that the story may yet take a new turn; even if its direction never changes before the end, all the earlier episodes can be hits and only the last one a flop. The short story grants no such latitude. It is a work in a single episode: if good, thoroughly good; if not, thoroughly bad.

If we move beyond tales and ballads, the history of the modern short story begins towards the end of the nineteenth century. It came to be recognised in the forms of the very short story, the short story, and the tale, although the distinctions among these three were also elaborated unnecessarily. This journey, beginning with Rabindranath Tagore, advanced from one end of India to the other as a consequence of reformist movements. Bezbarua in Assamese, Fakir Mohan Senapati in Odia, Apparao in Telugu, and Kedarnath Banerjee in Bengali spoke out at times in support of women and at times against society's moneylenders. In Nepali, Suryakanta Gyawali wrote "Devi ko Bali" against the practice of animal sacrifice at Dussehra. Some stories opposed the barriers of caste and wealth placed in the way of love; others concerned the condition of Dalit society and religious superstition. Nor did all these stories invariably end happily.

Movements, literature: postmodernism, existentialism, and humanism are all philosophical schools of thought. Earlier, philosophy encompassed science, history, society and politics, economics, the sciences of art, and language. But as branches of science and art, particularly science, acquired their own specialisations, mathematics and science within philosophy became restricted to mathematical logic. Philosophers turned towards the study of inductive and deductive methods and towards analytical method. Marx, who seemed like a divine intervention on behalf of the poor throughout the world, made dialectical method the foundation of his interpretation. The present-day "discussion" or dialectic, which includes both a position and its opposition, already existed in philosophy's method of refutation and establishment (khaṇḍana–maṇḍana; see Madhvacharya's Sarvadarśanasaṅgraha).

Thus Francis Fukuyama, who announced the end of history following the collapse of communist rule, later withdrew from that position. After communist governments fell and the Berlin Wall came down, Fukuyama declared that history, generated by the clash or dialectic of ideologies, had reached its end, and that henceforth only an ideology serving human welfare would advance. But some time later he dissociated himself from this view, saying that many divergent ideologies still survived within societies and among nationalities. Similarly, the postmodern thinker Jacques Derrida deconstructed language to show that its disassembled elements depend on numerous different foundations, and that we cannot determine language's meaning without understanding them.

Postmodernism, too, has stalled after its initial enthusiasm. Existentialism, humanism, progressivism, Romanticism, and sociological analysis have maintained their existence by becoming parts of a synthetic method of criticism.

Because psychoanalysis rests on a scientific basis, it will survive, like dialectical method.

What is the modern short story? What should it be like? Does it have, or should it have, any purpose? And how is that to be determined?

Psychology, too, provides the basis of a story. Its purpose should accord with the needs of society, and the changes in its narrative journey should correspond to changes that have occurred, and are occurring, in society. Yet the story is at the same time governed, of itself, by the culture of that society. Its historical existence comes to the fore within it.

If we speak of Vedic narratives, they bring love for the nation to the forefront and teach people to live together in society. Jātaka stories, together with the dissemination of popular languages, also sought to spread Buddhism.

In the Muslim world, a work such as Rumi's Masnavi is a distinguished text of Persian literature, teaching the importance of knowledge and the advancement of the state.

The story of today embraces all these things and moves towards the creation of an enlightened and humane society. If it does not do so, this should be included among its aims. Only then can the analysis and criticism of stories become a necessity for the reader.

As with psychoanalysis and dialectical method, the analyses of Fukuyama and Derrida, too, will be synthesised and will endure as lasting models for criticism.

For whom should we write, or tell, stories? A dispute concerning stories: those about whom we write will not themselves read them. Will people become enlightened by reading a story? There is no shortage of those who tell lies while swearing upon the Gita. Does that diminish the importance of stories written with such a standard in view?

Not everyone will become enlightened, but they can at least obtain wholesome entertainment. And if even one person reads a story and begins to think in that direction, the story will have proved its worth. Even if the people for whom it is written do not read it, those capable of intervening in their circumstances will. As long as that possibility remains, stories of this kind will continue to be written.

And if society changes, will social values remain eternal? Should the progressive story reconstruct experience for a changing society, enabling adjustment between natural and social reality? Or, to give this changing age stability, do we need stories founded upon the enduring and essential elements of tradition? The interests of the individual and those of society stand in a duality, in mutual opposition. They need to be brought into conjunction. A worldview is necessary. A story is not merely the product of an idea that we somehow transfer with ink onto paper. It is directed by social and historical circumstances.

Then should the story be idealistic, naturalistic, or realistic? Or should it be humanistic, socialist, or a sense-based realism that values experience? Alternatively, should it be purposive? This last encompasses utilitarianism, experimentalism, pragmatism, causalism, instrumentalism, and consequentialism. It is the most modern standpoint of all. Self-expression is human nature, but it becomes confined by social rules and influenced by circumstances.

A story, therefore, should be fashioned by reconstructing experience. Individual consciousness will then be able to become social and collective consciousness. The exploiter will have to curb his tendencies, while those exploited will have to oppose them openly.

Freedom—social transformation. Only then will the story be communicated and become a medium of dialogue. Only then can it become a weapon for society, a source of power.

If the storyteller preaches, he will merely transfer knowledge, which is no longer what is needed. Only when the storyteller begins a dialogue will an atmosphere of liberation emerge, and the readers participating in that dialogue will be released from inertia.

Only if a story is sequential and accessible can it achieve this objective. It will become practical rather than merely intellectual. The generosity of narratives in Vedic literature gave birth to dialogue, which the rigidity of Purāṇic literature brought to an end.

To restore dialogue, the storyteller must have faith—faith grounded in reason and faith grounded in experience—which Subhash Chandra Yadav possesses. The analytical philosophy of positivism analyses linguistic statements and concepts, not objects; this will be seen throughout Subhashji's stories. Analytical or logical positivism and existentialism arose as reactions to science. Through them, the ambiguities in scientific thinking were clarified.

Phenomenology studies the givens of consciousness precisely as they are given. Perception is the observation of the facts of particular mental acts. It is a means of seeing an object in an absolute and pure form. In existentialism, a human being is simply a human being. Apart from what one creates, one is nothing: one is condemned to be free (Sartre). Through Hegel's dialectics, emphasis was placed on determining the qualities of processes and judgments about existence by analysing and synthesising their endless inner relationships. The deeper an essential element lies, the further it will be from outward form and the nearer to reality.

Quantum theory and the uncertainty principle have also influenced modern thought. Beyond visible reality, internal and external processes become possible through the exchange of minute elements of force and energy. Under the uncertainty principle, position and form must be determined by approximation.

The conception of a universe of more than three dimensions and Stephen Hawking's A Brief History of Time are directly undermining the existence of God, because the conception of God's death has also come to the fore; thus the existence of a controller of the universe is now imperilled. In the context of the death of God and the end of history, how long will the Maithili story go on simply telling tales? How long will it remain occupied with analyses of miniature, ultra-short (bīhani) stories, short stories, tales, and the like?

Just as virtual reality artificially presents reality and unites consciousness with it, so, without imagining more than three dimensions, even if we travelled from the Indus Valley civilisation at the speed of light, we could not yet have reached the other side of the universe. Our sun is one mediocre star among billions upon billions of other suns. We, inhabitants of a tiny village on the planet Earth orbiting that mediocre star, sit with our heads in our hands, worriedly asking: whose problems could be greater than ours? All these scientific and philosophical facts have appeared as challenges before our stories.

We will have to bring about a holistic synthesis, an integration of the whole! Only then will this philosophy pass from the merely philosophical into actuality.

Poststructuralist methodology locates the meaning of language not in words, their meanings, or grammatical rules, but in the process through which meaning is produced. For different persons and groups, language assumes different meanings. There is no final relationship between language and the world. Neither a word nor its text has an ultimate meaning, or a single meaning of its own.

On this matter Subhash Chandra Yadav has the following to say:

> "To expect a writer to explain and interpret his own work is an unreasonable expectation. That is not the writer's task. However difficult or controversial the work may be, the writer is responsible for it, but is not obliged to become its commentator. To how many people should a writer go about explaining his work, and why? Is such a thing possible? If the writer wishes, he can establish some dialogue concerning his work during his lifetime, but what happens after his death? Readers read a work according to their own understanding and judgment. Every age has its own distinct understanding. Thus this diversity and mutability of readings are necessary qualities of every powerful work. With the passage of time, the emotional purport of a work keeps changing. So when an age changes, the interpretation of the work also changes. In this way a work does not have only one uniform reading; a valuable work admits infinitely many readings. A writer has no control over its readings. He should therefore have no need to offer a defence or explanation for their differences. My own experience is that unless an event is illuminated by an artistic vision, it cannot be transformed into a literary work. Different readers grasp that initial vision in different ways and interpret it differently. I feel that even if a reader cannot understand the vision and philosophy of a work, he certainly grasps its heart; he takes its emotional element to heart. An example from a folktale will make the point clearer. 'Brother, let me play one little grain, and they carry me away for that'—even if the reader cannot grasp the discourse and philosophy of justice and equality contained in these words, he certainly feels the little bird's cry of anguish for freedom. Similarly, even if it is not easy to understand the vision or philosophy of love as a life-giving force in my stories 'River' and 'Bride Doll', the reader nonetheless experiences affection. This feeling, this innermost emotional truth, is the essential thing in literature. Any idea or philosophy should reach the reader through feeling, not as dry disputation or slogan-shouting. As I understand it, love is the foundation of religion and culture. There is no feeling in this world greater than love. My stories do not proceed with any ideological or moralistic insistence. They express the conduct and ideas of their age, but are not bound by them. I believe a work of art does not bring about a revolution. It changes people's emotional disposition and outlook in a very subtle manner, becoming one constituent of long-term social change. Nothing beyond that. A critic who approaches literature with a different demand or insistence—as with Maithili's obstinate 'consciousness-oriented' position—will deceive himself and mislead others."

Modern and postmodern arguments, reality, dialogue, and the exchange of ideas gave rise to modernity. But then the New Left movement arose in France, as did such ideological movements as nihilism and anarchism. These modern processes of thought were grounded in a distrust that had emerged outside established faiths and concepts.

Interpretations began to examine meanings concealed within a text in the context of place and time, and language came to be treated as a medium of play—a "language game". Out of these developments emerged postmodernism as a critique of power, legitimacy, and their stratification.

Consider the computer and information revolution: a developer creates software and places it on the worldwide internet; the software thereafter goes on functioning independently of its maker, sometimes performing tasks for which it was not designed. Other, intrusive software, such as viruses, diverts it from its course and makes it destructive. An antivirus is itself software that repairs the damage caused by such a virus; when even that cannot repair it, the computer is backed up and reformatted—a clean slate!

Capitalism arose from the Industrial Revolution, and now, in postindustrial society, information and communication have gained importance over production, while the computer has assumed an increasing role in society. Mobile phones, credit cards, and all such devices are based on chips. During the Kosi flood of 2008, Gaurinathji was stranded in his village, struggling even to obtain food, yet an air-conditioned railway ticket was booked for him using a credit card. What better example could one need of the role of information and computing in Mithila's society? In Gulo, too, we encounter the business of charging mobile phones.

The ideas of deconstruction and reconstruction indicate a reorganisation of the process of creation, as consciousness is being constituted anew in the postindustrial age. It is not history itself that has ended, but traditional history. State, class, nation, party, society, family, morality, and marriage are all being defined afresh. As a consequence of so many changes, numerous institutions have become fragmented and stripped of their contexts.

Are there no good stories in Maithili, no good plays? Does Maithili have no grammar? Where in Maithili grammar does one find analyses of words such as panisoh and panigar? It is still the same old anal and pāvak! These points needed to be made in the context of Subhash Chandra Yadav's journey as a storyteller.

At a time when Maithili's problem is its expulsion from home after home, people who failed to make a name for themselves after dabbling in Hindi are turning to writing Maithili stories and poems and becoming editors and critics. They weigh down Maithili's literary atmosphere with their ambitions, stuffing Marxism, feminism, and secularism into stories and poems with relentless insistence. Such people have become arbiters of standards; ideological movements have turned into a fence around mediocrity.

Those engaged in exploiting and discouraging the poor and the lower castes seek refuge in Marxism; those who have insulted women seek refuge in feminism; and communalists seek refuge in secularism.

Indeed, communalists have been seen entering feminist circles, misogynists joining Marxist circles, and innumerable such alliances and literary establishments. Some devote themselves to praising Rajkamal, others Yatri or Dhumketu, and in competing to determine what positions these writers should be assigned they thrust themselves into prominence. Claims that Yatri's Paro and the stories of Rajkamal and Dhumketu have still not been accepted—what baseless prattle!

Some edit supposedly controversial stories, manufacture controversies around them, and place themselves in the foreground. A confined competition centred on the writings of Maithil Brahmins and Karna Kayasthas is unsettling these poets and storytellers. After abandoning Hindi for Maithili, they have been performing such feats at such speed that one wonders when they will attend to Maithili's principal problems. Do they suppose that writing in Maithili after Hindi will win them immediate recognition? If Maithili writers suffer from such a delusion, from a lack of self-confidence, and from distrust of their mother tongue's communicative power (!), what pretence are we preserving by placing the language's future on their shoulders?

There were twenty writers of Maithili and five readers—what controversy could there have been? Having read Rajkamal's and Yatri's Maithili works, each of them, I can say that their writing is gentle in tone. In that situation, to introduce claims that a controversy existed in this poem or that story, and then polish one's own literary reputation by offering arguments for the claim—what sort of undertaking is that?

And then comes the claim that so-and-so is the first novelist after Yatri and someone-or-other the first poet after Rajkamal. Now pairs of storytellers and poets have also appeared, each devoted to the other and intent on advancing their mutual disputes.

Maithili's principal problem is that the language is dying amid the blows of the competing ambitions of this tiny circle of rivals (formidable rivals, indeed!). Poets and storytellers have made Maithili their career, reduced it to an object for seminars. Where, then, are the readers—and what controversies are we talking about?

The problem I see is how children may grow up in a Maithili-speaking environment, and how people of every caste may come to love the language. How far have stories and poetry advanced that cause? How many science-fiction stories, how many stories and poems for children and young people, are these career-minded poets and storytellers writing?

In an atmosphere of manoeuvring—printing one or two hundred copies of a book, arranging its review, getting it discussed in journals of similarly tiny circulation, assembling photocopies in a folder at home, and scheming to obtain awards or place books on syllabuses—my hopes have come to rest on readers and writers outside the Maithil Brahmin and Karna Kayastha communities.

Those who could not manage their own homes and families have accumulated heaps of linguistic awards and set about creating a Mithila state. I do not know how they would manage a state.

They shamelessly accept awards for translations into Maithili from Marathi, Urdu, Tamil, and Kannada. Ask them the meaning of vanakkam, and they will not know it; they have no knowledge of alif-be-se and cannot even converse with a child in Marathi. And in Maithili they escape being challenged, because they get their own work printed and reviewed, while readers are absent. This absence of readers benefits them. When jurors and advisory-board members themselves step forward in the effort to promote their own interests in these awards, it only reveals how feeble the confidence of these limited competitors is.

How will those whose children have not entered literature be discussed in the future? Who will advance their case? This truth about Maithili literature needs to be exposed. Even while shutting their eyes to it, people are nevertheless searching for a solution.

The disciples and hangers-on of editors of collections of stories, poems, plays, and essays find places in Maithili's supposedly definitive anthologies. The condition of journals is much the same. These readerless journals, quarrelling over personal ambitions, are dying themselves and killing Maithili. In a language where folktales are written in drawing rooms without fieldwork, such absurd quarrels are only natural. Now, on some Maithili blogs on the internet, caste-based disputes and abusive language have also been observed.

Becoming Marxists or feminists and turning those labels into a trade, thereby making up for their own lack of literary quality, has become a weapon for poorly gifted writers in this restricted competition. Why would a person who respects Marx insist on announcing, "I am a Marxist critic" or "I am a Marxist writer"? What can one say of those who make a business of Marx? The reasons are also plain. National surveys show that Sanskrit, Hindi, Maithili, and other literatures are studied in colleges by those who cannot gain admission to other subjects; the same people also enter journalism. It is such talent-poor devotees who have acquired a taste for literary pursuits—and are we to believe the future of Maithili is safe in their hands? Yet, confronted with this reality, a road forward awaits us. A generation of genuine servants of Maithili—storytellers and readers willing to go into the dust and grime, to create literature for children and women, and to devote their energies simply to keeping Maithili alive—will surely arise.

No compromise in Maithili's name. Subhash Chandra Yadav's collection appeared serially online in the Videha e-journal (http://www.videha.co.in), where it received the affection of thousands upon thousands of readers. The stories received online comments, and I inferred from the commenters' surnames that most were from outside the Maithil Brahmin and Karna Kayastha communities. Another fact that emerged here is that differences between the pronunciation and reading of the language also arise from lack of education. This does not mean, however, that Yadavji still speaks the language of Balchanma. If we use that speech for a Yadav character in fiction today, it will sound like the Prakrit assigned to ordinary people amid the Sanskrit of the play Śākuntalam; people of that community may also find it insulting. Language is fluid, and the tradition of writing introduces a measure of stability into it. This distinction can also be clearly seen in Subhashji's language: between the language of his stories and that of his essays and other prose.

In her paper "Word, Dialogue and Novel", Julia Kristeva introduced the concept of intertextuality: a text cannot remain enclosed within four walls. She therefore describes a text as an assemblage.

Look now at Gulo: Naresh will distribute one thousand rupees for six votes on Ranjeeta Ranjan's behalf, but then he disappears. Phulwa will get Modi elected. It is an election for a Member of Parliament.

Subhash Chandra Yadav had thus found the context of his text in 2015. It must have continued to revolve within him, and in 2022 it emerged in expanded form in "Vote", alongside an election for a Member of the Legislative Assembly.

Thus intertextuality establishes an interdisciplinary subject matter. All these texts and subjects keep rubbing against one another, cancelling out one another's effects; sometimes one text comes to the fore, sometimes another. Nor can a text be separated from its social and cultural foundations. The sociocultural text and the literary text become intermingled.

A text is a subject of practice and production. The sociocultural text and the literary text already produce two different kinds of voices.

A text incorporates the conflicts and tensions of ideologies.

On Julia Kristeva's horizontal axis of relationships, there is a direct conversation between writer and reader: in other words, a conversation between the contents of an envelope and the address written upon it. On her vertical axis, however, a "text" converses with mainstream literature as well as with events occurring within a short period. That is to say, a text converses with its context, and one writer's text converses with another writer's text.

When these two axes intersect, a word or text comes into being within which at least one other text can be read.

Julia Kristeva describes the author's rights and duties in terms of preserving speech as it is and treating certain texts as something separate from human beings.

In "Word, Dialogue and Novel", Julia Kristeva advances Mikhail Bakhtin's concepts. She also analyses language through signs and symbols. When an infant communicates by means of signs and rhythm, there is neither structure nor meaning in that communication. But as the child grows, it begins to distinguish itself from others, begins to speak, and ventures beyond the courtyard. Thereafter it distances itself from the mother. Yet it does not move altogether away from the semiotic; rather, it continues to oscillate between the semiotic and the symbolic. The semiotic bears feminine qualities and is suffused with music, poetry, and rhythm; the symbolic has masculine qualities and is governed by rules and structure. Thus the devaluation of women's bodies and characters by men in films and other media arises from a fear that the mother's body threatens male existence. But the infant remains close to its mother and therefore remains more deeply connected with the feminine qualities of the semiotic—with music, poetry, and rhythm. It rejects the mother, yet defines itself through her.

Cornell supports, and Gayatri Chakravorty Spivak welcomes, Jacques Derrida's intervention in feminist thought through his deconstructive theory centred on the feminine or the vagina. Where certain philosophical ideologies indirectly privilege the vagina, Derrida's drawing attention to the limitations of a vagina-centred standpoint constitutes a meaningful intervention. It has made it possible to redefine the constituents of the sign through a renewed process.

Derrida shows that dialogues between people cannot be factorised or reduced to simple components; they cannot be simplified. A woman should therefore not be regarded as an object of conjecture and knowledge. Feminism should not be understood only in relation to masculinity; a different idiom needs to be created for feminism itself.

Derrida says, roughly speaking, that a text is a political act that can be defined in terms of relations of power or negotiations over them. But he is accused of wanting men to appropriate women's voices, to take away the right to speak for themselves that women have gained with such effort. Derrida, according to this charge, has no concern for women's everyday problems and powerlessness. He takes deconstructive method in a positive, affirmative sense, while placing feminism within a metaphysical or logical binary of being—like man and woman.

Derrida exposes the fascination with centre-based structures in Western philosophy. Structuralism, inspired by Saussure's linguistics, attempts a scientific analysis of cultural existence. Lévi-Strauss's structural anthropology attempts the same for folktales and traditional narratives. Similarly, attempts have been made to analyse the structures of prose and poetry in literature. But Derrida exposes a difficulty here: structuralism seeks a firm foundation for its analysis, a centre outside the system from which the system may be analysed scientifically; yet that centre is no more than a philosophical appearance. How, for instance, could a folktale or folk narrative have one fixed or predetermined structure? To study its structure, you must first determine the idea or centre on the basis of which you intend to analyse it. Derrida says that a structure requires its governing concept or idea, after which its fragments may be assembled. Without thinking of the end, however, a structure cannot even be conceived. The same holds for literature. Unless you first find some supposedly self-evident meaning for a work, you cannot discover its structure, because meaning—the end—determines that structure. Thus a structuralist already knows the meaning and only then can analyse the various components and their mutual relations. For Derrida, that supposedly self-evident meaning, known before the analysis, is the centre. And, Derrida says, it determines how the reader constructs a structure, which components are included, and which are omitted. When analysing the structure of literature, we talk about its meaning and its effects, attempting to identify and distinguish those elements of the structure that produce the effects, while setting aside possible patterns that do not. This centre is thus the starting point for understanding the structure, but it also limits the analysis. To remain stable, the centre establishes and controls hierarchies. Moreover, this prior knowledge of meaning depends on the reader's previous history, contemporary critical theories, and ideologies. All these are themselves parts of culture. How, then, can we keep them outside the structure—while allowing them to restrict the structure without themselves being restricted by it? To make a permanent centre the foundation of analysis is therefore like prescribing a ready-made formula: a reactionary or status-quo position. It reveals only a desire to derive a normative, independently fixed meaning that cannot be comparatively tested. The belief that we are discovering a structure is an illusion; in reality we are constructing a structure out of textual materials.

Even Derrida's poststructuralism cannot begin without a centre. Yet on the basis of a deconstructive analysis of the unproven, supposedly self-evident premise, it replaces that centre with another; the new centre, too, will not remain permanent.

Similarly, in his theory of the sign, Saussure analyses signification by saying that a word such as “cat” means cat because it does not mean something else. The word is the signifier, and what it indicates is the object or signified. Derrida, however, says that here too one must first introduce a concept. If you make the signifier absolute, with no relation to any signified—an independent concept in itself, without a direct relation to a signified or object—then all these concepts pass beyond the signifier and signify nothing at all. But if we treat signifier and signified as one and the same, we strike at the very roots of the signifier.

Thus Saussure's theory appears opposed to rationalism when he says that the signifier bears no inherent trace of the signified. But when he says that the signifier is employed solely to indicate the signified and is therefore subordinate to it, he seems to support a rationalist position. Derrida accordingly argues that this neat division between signifier and signified is untenable, and that the priority given to the signified over the signifier must also be overturned.

Meaning does not reside in the signifier from the outset. Nor can the whole of meaning be found in any single signifier. We must therefore churn and examine the text, which will drive us towards an endless search. A signifier determines what it signifies through its differences from other signifiers: the greater the differentiation, the nearer we move towards signification. Yet we can never discover every difference. A signifier must also be repeatable, even when one signifier comes to determine different signifieds. To understand this we need to know the written history of that signifier. It can therefore convey different meanings and sometimes even opposite meanings.

Derrida writes that from Plato to Saussure and Lévi-Strauss, thinkers have placed speech above writing, for writing is regarded as a medium while speech is taken as the real thing. Saussure draws attention to errors of pronunciation appearing in written forms. But Derrida argues that all the features attributed to speech also occur in writing. He goes further: the disappearance of the sign in speech produces the illusion that thought is directly present there. Yet if we record and replay spoken speech, it too is merely a chain of signs, like written letters, whose separate elements can be recognised through their differences from one another. Writing, likewise, may take the form of ordinary writing or writing that communicates by pictures. Behind all this lies a “metaphysics of presence”.

Central to Western philosophy's “metaphysics of presence” is immediate experience. Deconstruction, however, says that there is no such experience at a level beyond language, because experience is identified through language. Again, it is said that divine consciousness enables us to understand ultimate truth; deconstruction replies that this is only a creation of the creator. Again, it is claimed that truth lies concealed behind some object; deconstruction responds that there is no such independent existence, for everything is constructed and reconstructed by a system. Thus Saussure's self-presence does not exist: everything is constituted within a system.

Derrida says that reason underlies all such philosophical thought, so an ultimate truth or universal spirit, presumed to know everything, is imagined. Yet Derrida says that this unproven centre has been called God at one time, Idea at another, and Universal Spirit at a third, and has created different levels beneath itself. Religion thus took God to be the ultimate truth and human beings and other creations to be imperfect and opposed to it. Each such centre claimed the power to create a system of ideas according to its own terms. Yet these centres would have to stand above the system: God, for instance, would have to exist independently outside religion. Poststructuralist deconstruction regards the presence of such a transcendent truth as an appearance produced by the poststructuralist theory of language. In the interplay of signifiers, some meanings gain a higher position through ideological intervention while other meanings are pushed into the background. Ideas such as freedom, republic, and justice are parts of our lives. It may seem that much of life's meaning comes from them, yet inquiry shows that they themselves emerge from other ideas. There is no concept in which the traces of another idea cannot be found.

Observe how Gulo begins. It opens on Til Sankranti: Gulo's youngest daughter Riniya is plastering the courtyard. Why does the novel begin with Riniya rather than Gulo's son? Because, according to Julia Kristeva, the son distances himself from the mother, whereas the daughter retains that rhythm and those qualities; even as she grows apart from her mother, she stays close to the mother and to culture. The novel could not have begun so beautifully in any other way. Riniya is singing; then come the dew, like a spray of water, the westerly wind, and the mother's anxiety: "Girl, put your shawl on!"

Later, too, the difference between daughter and son persists: "The girl keeps running about alone, now in the house, now in the orchard. The boy lies asleep until eight."

And then comes Kristeva's man, with his arrogance: "If you don't recognise me, then recognise me now."

Do we not see this arrogance in Lutyens' Zone? It is everywhere in human society, especially among male characters.

This self-absorption, in which writers review their own stories and poems, has arisen from the weakness of criticism. I feel disgust at this single, primary fact, and I see a remedy for the slow poisoning of Maithili in the Maithili literary movement of the Videha e-journal. The way readers and writers from outside the Maithil Brahmin and Karna Kayastha communities joined it, together with children and women, was extraordinary. Some will describe my emphasis on this point as an attempt to divide Maithili literature. But my priority is Maithili and its literary movement. If the language dies, what will become of the formidable editors, poets, storytellers, Mithila-state agitators, and critics sitting in their drawing rooms? The rereading of Subhash Chandra Yadavji's stories and of language itself draws me further towards his work in this way. It is also relevant here that his fiction continues to offer new rereadings of stories and of language. I hope this development will strengthen Maithili.

Now let us read all of Subhash Chandra Yadav's original works in succession ... Ghardekhiya.

Ghardekhiya contains thirty-five short stories. The tenth, "Kathak Banal Lok" ("A Man Made of Wood"), was included in Galp Guchchha, a story collection prescribed by the Bihar School Examination Board for Classes Nine and Ten. For that reason, it became the most popular and most widely read story in the collection, even more widely read than "Ghardekhiya" itself.

The publisher's note is by Madaneshwar Mishra, president of the Maithili Academy. He writes that the social class whose joys and sorrows, hopes and aspirations, indifference, anger, and social and economic circumstances Yadav depicts had until then remained almost neglected. He also observes that the stories are deeply moving, their style straightforward and lucid, and their language simple and intelligible to everyone.

Abhav (Deprivation, 1971)

An experiment in writing a literary composition, in trying several different ways of writing poetry. Subhash Chandra Yadav does not ordinarily write poems, but in this story, written in 1971, he has written three short poems that are in no way inferior to the poems in original and translated collections that have received Sahitya Akademi Awards:

First poem

> Upon my arms and back > a badge that had been fastened > began to spark like lightning.
> And I went on trembling,
> and in search of escape,
> from this corner to that,
> I kept running.
> Whichever room I entered,
> its walls began to blaze.

The moment I stepped out of the room,
the weather changed,
and I went on measuring, from desert to river,
the endless distance of mountains,
without end.

Second poem

Words never stood by me;
outside the context I intended,
rose the inaccessible mountains of meaning.
I remained unsuccessful
in reaching anywhere,
in a world of suffering,
at the beginning of life.

Third poem

I have arrived at that place from whose turning point the meanings of words begin to assume altered shapes.

Yet his poetry did not advance beyond this. At that time he believed that an intense impulse born of sorrow was essential to poetic composition. He attempted to write satirical poetry, but only superficial indignation found expression.

This applies to many of the so-called satirists of today as well.

Asangati (Incongruity, 1978)

Kuki called out to him ... In his hands was a tray bearing two cups.

"Are you going to that side?"

Navin grew angry and said, "No." Yet he kept thinking that Kuki had noticed his bag and wanted to ask him to carry the cups away and put them down.

Anchar (The End of a Sari, 1969)

Again today there has been no respite—two successive downpours. "If the north-east wind blows in Ashwin, cows and farmers will weep in every home." Her husband says too, "It will neither speak nor bark; it will merely sit staring." Everyone's attention is fixed on her dry anchar, the end of her sari. Neither daughter nor son: what can she do? The sun had grown fierce. She felt as though she would have to pour water over the holy basil again ...

Uttar Megh (The Northern Cloud, 1972)

Five people—Mauji, Shibu, Kamu, Debu, and Vijendra. The story unfolds in their company.

Three women, all from the Musahar community; one of them an old woman. The daughter of the quarrelsome old woman has numerous scratches on her face. In the absence of a bodice and of care, both her breasts hang loose. Shibu, Kamu, and Vijendra stare at them. There is a domestic quarrel. The old woman gestures towards the husband, who is there too.

All five go on towards the fair.

Farther on they come upon an elderly man, who has returned after spying on a schoolmistress.

Next comes a dark-complexioned, middle-aged woman. She is wearing a yellow sari with a printed pattern and a red blouse. She goes into a room with a man.

A family gets off a train: three or four girls of approximately the same age. "Not one of them is any good!" says Kamu.

Most people have little idea what is happening around them or how others earn their living.

Ek Ta Dukhant Katha (A Tragic Story, 1977)

Sugiya's husband has gone elsewhere. She enters into a relationship with her younger brother-in-law and feels guilty. After a few days, everything begins again. Is it a sin or not a sin? That is her dilemma.

Ekta Prayog Ohina (An Experiment, Just Like That, 1970)

He has been sitting in a hotel for two hours, unable to make a decision, and has already drunk tea twice. Talk of education, politics, agriculture, unemployment, and numerous other contemporary matters continually strikes his ears. There might be twenty coins in his pocket. A friend had given him eight annas. He will go to his in-laws' house and ask for money. Apart from winter, he never used to visit them during the day. His in-laws live in a single room, so in winter they can sit on the roof even during daylight hours. His mother-in-law has sat down with a whole bundle of moral instruction.

Ek Ta Sambandhak Ant (The End of a Relationship, 1976)

The game begins: Pradip, Ragini Datta, and Vipul. Whoever loses will treat the others to kebabs, costing eight rupees. The narrator, "I," remains silent because he has no money. Pradip and "I" are on one side; Vipul and Datta on the other. Vipul is Datta's boyfriend, but the narrator finds his conduct strange and immature for a boyfriend.

Ek Dink Ghar (A Home for One Day, 1973)

Waiting for a train: when will it depart? And when it finally moves, it stops again at the outer signal.

Incidents of this kind used to occur, and still occur, on narrow-gauge trains and sometimes on broad-gauge ones too. On a bus, at least one can find out why it has stopped; on a train one cannot. The story offers a psychological analysis of this experience.

Kalpit Mrityu (Imagined Death, 1970)

A conversation between husband and wife; the wife goes when her father calls her. Her father will indeed give them money, but the husband resents his stipulation of a deadline for returning it. The wife asks what relationship would remain between the husband and her father if she herself died; as long as she is there, the connection exists. … "Would you marry my sister?"

Kathak Banal Lok (A Man Made of Wood, 1976)

The finest story in this collection. Rami goes to the block office to seek fifty rupees in assistance for a collapsed house. His son Badariya seems made of wood: even when beaten, not a single tear falls; his eyes are sunken, every bone in his chest stands out, he seldom speaks, does not play, and stares as though trying to remember something. But when Rami returns at night, that wooden Badariya asks, "Hey, Father, when did you come home?"

"My boy, you're awake! Come, come, sit by the fire. I've only just returned, son."

"Why didn't you come back in the evening?"

At his question, Belowali and Rami feel as though every grief and torment has been wiped away. For the first time that day, the two of them laugh freely.

11

Kono Patapar (To Some Address, 1974)

A letter to Pardeshi from his wife, the mother of four children, carrying both her message and her reproaches.

Gajkhor a Majmungar (The Gajkhor and the Majmungar, 1968)

In Bechani's marital home, everyone calls her husband a wastrel and speaks harshly to her as well, uttering words as coarse as yams. They call Bechani a gajkhor and her husband a majmungar.

13

Ghardekhiya (Bride Viewing, 1974)

The title story. Jagdish Prasad Mandal also wrote a story called "Ghardekhiya", first published electronically in Videha and later collected in Gamk Jingi (Village Life, 2009).

Bimla is entering her seventeenth year, though she does not look it: her face is gaunt. The prospective groom's family has come to see her. Everything can be arranged at little expense. They approve of the girl. The boy is not a driver but a truck cleaner. The girl has been approved. He has only recently returned to the village from Calcutta; to send word and summon him again immediately would incur expense. He will arrive ten days before the wedding; whoever wishes to see him may do so then.

Cheharapar Jamait Kuhes (Mist Settling on the Face, 1972)

The protagonist (narrator) and the little girl. "I'll leave the door open tonight," the narrator says, but then forgets what he has said.

"The door was open; what if a dog had come in?"

"It was open!" The protagonist (narrator) can scarcely believe it.

Chaubatiya (Crossroads, 1969)

The protagonist (narrator) sits in a hotel, holding his head in hunger. He goes to his village. His uncle has his own story: for three months they have eaten nothing but bread, not even glimpsing rice. The protagonist becomes angry: he has fathered so many children, an entire crowd, and still has not learned restraint. The uncle imagines that the protagonist is flush with money. He asks for cash and, about the old debt, says that he has cultivated jute on a sharecropping basis and will sell it and repay him. For now he asks for ten rupees. But the protagonist himself sometimes passes two successive evenings hungry for want of money. He leaves without eating. He asks a friend for cash; although that friend has lent him money before, now, even when asked for four annas, he gives nothing. Another friend, Yadunandan, had been unable to return one rupee for two years; he slips away to one side. The protagonist does not even ask a third friend, Kalicharan. Back at the hotel, perhaps the staff have forgotten his very old unpaid bill, but now another boy is sitting there. … What a comfortable crossroads this is!

Jasus Kukur a Chor (The Detective Dog and the Thief, 1973)

A theft, a report to the police station, and corruption. The police inspector asks for money in the name of procuring a detective dog: the dog will catch the thief. A constable demands five hundred rupees, and an agreement is reached at three hundred. But what of the dog?

Jhali (The Net, 1973)

The rice harvest. Rama has not managed to bathe today, and his craving begins to torment him. Cannabis … Laramaha in the Dusadh settlement … "Four chillums and it has all gone up in smoke," says Bindua. The trade in the Dusadh neighbourhood: women and girls lay out coal during the day and even in the early morning. The men will be occupied selling cannabis in daytime, the girls at night. That scoundrel of an inspector arrives and swiftly pockets fifty rupees. … Cannabis with long matted leaves produces intoxication very quickly.

There is a drug trade among African Americans in the United States too. Do you see any resemblance?

Tip (The Tip, 1974)

The pleasure of leaving a tip in a hotel—and what happens when no tip is given?

19

Dar (Fear, 1969)

An analysis of the psychology of fear.

Tirth (Pilgrimage, 1969)

The story of Balbabali's household. No doctor will call her mad … yet she is mad. Ever since she came to her husband's home after marriage, she has been afflicted by a spirit. "Look at Kusuma. Will you people ever be her equal?" And so Kusuma has become Balbabali. She has four children, yet each time she is confined after childbirth she receives only millet bread and greens. Her brother-in-law has not given her any money, but she will still take her mother-in-law on pilgrimage and show him what she can do. She asks the protagonist (narrator) for a little money. His hands are empty; he cannot get any. But she is determined to go to Baidyanathji. What would the cost of one or two sers of flattened rice amount to? She will show that wretched brother-in-law. … Yet going off in a great clatter and commotion would not be right, so she does not go.

Dhundh Me Ghatna (An Event in the Mist, 1970)

The story has a first, second, and third situation, then two reports from its arranger, and finally its concluding situation.

In the first situation there is an east or west wind, perhaps brushing the emotions, perhaps not; the atmosphere of a tin-roofed house, a gulmohar tree, grass, and dūb grass.

In the second situation it is evening: a heron's nest and a spider's web, old meaningless papers. After spending the day turning over files, a man has left his room for the market.

The third situation concerns a woman who left the room before the story began, and all that would happen if she were to return.

Before the final situation come two reports: the first about Prakash, afflicted with filariasis—swelling of the limbs—and the second about a dead child emerging from the womb.

In the story's final situation, the road is called a "prostitute road," perhaps because it is trampled underfoot. The feet are numb and heavy, while fragments of sentences come together as consolation. But the protagonist (narrator) wants a crowd and light. To run away after coming halfway would be pointless.

Then there is the image of a dried-up stream, with someone standing upon its embankment. Mist everywhere: neither village, nor people, nor light. All these things lie a short distance away in every direction, but for now they are meaningless. For now the mist and the void resemble death.

Does this not remind you of Samuel Beckett's Waiting for Godot?

Dhukkad (Dhukkad, 1970)

The departure time of the bus is unknown. Will the bus remain here all day? Everyone cheats the conductor, the protagonist (narrator) included. Very few tickets are booked.

But the narrator never meets that conductor again; perhaps he has left the job.

Parichay (Introduction, 1971)

Netaji urges the protagonist (narrator) to visit his house, and makes him understand that he has done him a favour. But when, tired and defeated, the protagonist takes his leave, his companion insists on attending the evening performance of a theatre company—and there, Netaji …

Pet (The Stomach, 1971)

"Kalim!" He disappears into the crowd. Three hours earlier he had called out to Vinay, but Vinay paid no attention. Hunger … One gives an order at the hotel but can manage to ask only for water. The neighbourhood is quieter than in the day. Someone has left the tap beside the wall running. Its noise is unbearable, yet one knows that in the morning there will be even greater noise.

Fansari (The Noose, 1969)

Bhelbabali Kaki is more than a hundred years old. Her eyesight is weak, probably from cataracts, and she can see only shadows. The imagery of the month of Kartik occurs in this story too. The rice harvest comes in Agahan; the month before it—Kartik, the eleventh month after the previous Agahan—is extremely difficult, with an acute shortage of money. Kaki goes to the protagonist (narrator), calling for lime to prepare tobacco, complaining noisily since morning. For two or three days she has been crying out about nothing but lime: only if there is lime can anyone give her tobacco to chew. The protagonist brings her a little lime and even mixes her chewing tobacco. She looks for the master of the house, her son, who was supposed to go to Supaul but is still here. Her head keeps aching. Her daughter-in-law thinks she is complaining about her and cannot bear it, but the old woman's hearing is weak too, so she does not hear. If she dies now, how will the funeral feast be managed? There are twenty-two complications, the protagonist tells her. For three or four days Kaki has kept a noose around her neck; once she even swallowed poison, yet she has not died. How could she have died when the noose had never been tightened?

Phukna (Balloons, 1970)

The protagonist (narrator) is at his maternal uncle's village, but he notices that people there treat him in two different ways. Instead of taking his ease after returning from school, he goes on scratching at the courtyard. When he abuses his sister-in-law, she warns him that she is no indulgent younger sister-in-law: with one slap she will redden his face. His grandmother protects him, although both her hearing and her eyesight are poor. He begins repairing a bicycle, and a ball bearing flies away. In exchange for the ball bearing he recovers, he buys three dozen balloons. Ravinder gets some balloons, but there is a hole in his pocket. Ravinder refuses to admit it, and the protagonist beats him. He remembers his father. He asks his grandmother, "When will Father come?"

Banjh (Barren, 1968)

The month of Sawan. Mud everywhere, in the courtyard and at the doorway; water dripping from the eaves. It is Dukhni's first Sawan, and yet they have left her at her in-laws' house? That is what the woman from Rampur asks Dukhni's mother. Only one and a half bighas of land remain, and even that is coveted by the relatives. Her husband's death, the trouble of arranging Dukhni's marriage; a dilapidated hut and the cry, "Keep Mother Sita's skull! Keep it!" Four people are removed. Dukhni's mother lies dead. By chance Dukhni runs home that very evening. The Rampur woman spreads the news among the other women. "These things do happen," she says; "Give up your fields, but not your homestead." Dukhni departs. At her aunt's home she is treated with great affection, but she cannot understand the selfish motives of her aunt and uncle. Then rumours begin to spread, and the aunt asks why nobody comes from Dukhni's marital home.

"They think I am barren."

Her uncle and aunt get her land transferred into their names. If anyone asks, they will say that the money was spent on her marriage. They will find an elderly bridegroom, and on top of the marriage expenses they will obtain another five hundred rupees.

28

Ber-Ber (Again and Again, 1979)

Harivansh and Raghuvansh have bought first-class tickets covering more than half the distance. Ten stations remain to be crossed. But a ticket examiner catches Harivansh, who is sent to jail. One day Raghuvansh comes and pays his fine.

29

Mahima (Glory, 1975)

The police arrest Sukhdev during a meeting and take him to prison. He is released after a month; he had been detained under MISA.

For some time he had been a Naxalite and had previously spent eight days in jail for cutting a government embankment.

He had swindled several people out of money during an election.

There is much quarrelling and fighting; if there is nobody else, he beats up the woman from Narkatiya. If nothing else, he must at least have returned from jail with clothing worth four hundred rupees.

Ramnihor (Ramnihor, 1975)

Ramnihor, a mess-hall assistant, sends two hundred rupees each month to a woman in Faizabad district. Borrowing a holdall from the protagonist (narrator), he goes to his village on ten days' leave. Ten days have passed; he may return by evening. There is no need to worry so much about the holdall.

31
Lift (A Lift, 1980)

Taking a lift with Mrs Kapoor proves costly for Manoj, because she knows Diwakar. Why did Manoj get into her car when Diwakar was there?

32
Sanket (A Sign, 1974)

"There are six seats in Room Number Nine. Let him get up and you can spread your bedding. Though someone will be sleeping there, anyway."

33
Saharsa Dupahar Rati (Saharsa at Midnight, 1972)

Subhash, Mahaprakash, and Sukant. Sukant wants to escape the crowd; Subhash cannot make up his mind. Mahaprakash does not need to think so much. Subhash wants to throw a burning cigarette stub onto a girl's back. The police arrest all three for roaming about at night.

Sigaret (Cigarette, 1969)

A craving for a cigarette. He sends the servant to fetch some, but the servant smokes the master's half-smoked cigarette instead. Then an acquaintance, a little cunning, and a packet of Wills Filter turn up.

35
Surang (The Tunnel, 1972)

The protagonist (narrator) and Kishori Bhai arrive at the home of Sheila and her engineer husband. Has the engineer begun to suspect Sheila's relationship with Kishori Bhai? Why did Sheila begin living at her parents' home? Beni is a year and a half old. In a letter the protagonist had read, Sheila asked what vengeance he wanted to take by snatching milk and biscuits from an innocent child. Yet there, the engineer is playing with the baby.

The engineer works at a lamp factory. When taking his leave, Kishori Bhai hands the protagonist a sixty-watt lightbulb. Later the protagonist discovers that it has fused, and Kishori Bhai asks him to have it exchanged.

Consider the themes of the stories in Ghardekhiya. Consider the portrait of Badariya (made of wood, not shedding a single tear even when beaten, with sunken eyes and every bone in his chest visible; he speaks little, never plays, and stares as though trying to remember something), the story of an extramarital relationship, the poverty of the protagonist, and the episodes of quarrelling and bickering. Subhash himself appears in several stories, and in one, "Saharsa Dupahar Rati" (1972), Subhash, Mahaprakash, and Sukant all appear together.

Nit Naval Rajkamal (A Monograph on Rajkamal)

[*The monograph on Rajkamal Chaudhary was rejected by the Sahitya Akademi in January 1997; it appeared in the December 2005 –March 2006 issue of Rachana and was published in 2022 under the title *Nit Naval Rajkamal.]

"I had heard something of the Rajkamal-ji (Vinibandh) episode, though that was many years ago now. But it is only from your account that I have realised just how ugly it was. For this I thank you, Gajendra-ji. The truth, however, is that my mind became disenchanted before I had finished reading it all. I could not read any further! You did well to put it on the internet. Let the contemporary generation and those to come understand this dark story too! Consider the predicament of people like me: this entire episode involves my younger friends, friends of my own generation, and elders. It has turned into an historical calamity! I am not personally responsible for any part of it. And yet, as a member of that literary generation, I am condemned to bear a sense of 'guilt' on moral grounds. What remedy is there?—With affection, Gangesh Gunjan, 11 September 2012 (Videha 117)."

The monograph on Rajkamal was rejected in January 1997 by the Maithili department of the Sahitya Akademi, through the machinations of Mohan Bhardwaj and with the cooperation of Rajmohan Jha. For that act, the author alleges, Rajmohan Jha was honoured in 1997 with the Akademi's original-work award for Maithili for 1996. Mohan Bhardwaj, who had overseen the act, was also made a member of the Sahitya Akademi's Maithili Advisory Board.

Nit Naval Rajkamal (The Life of Rajkamal) is dedicated to: the devout Santosh Kumar Kundan, Suvrata, Girivar, Krishna; Radhe Radhe.

Nit Naval Rajkamal — A Hero of Legend

Rajkamal Chaudhary (Manindra Narayan Chaudhary, popularly known as Phool Babu), 1929–1967, Mahishi, Saharsa. His works include Adi Katha, Andolan and Pathar Phool (novels), Swaragandha (a poetry collection), Lalka Pag (a story collection), and Katha Parag (an edited collection of stories).

The earthquake, the Bengali woman ascetic and the picture of the Raslila are based on Rajkamal's autobiographical statements. He remembered the earthquake of 1934: the earth cracked and rumbled, and his mother and father, preoccupied with saving their own lives, left him behind.

A few days after the earthquake, a Bengali woman ascetic arrived. Rajkamal's mother had met her at a place of pilgrimage. The ascetic asked him to go with her, and he, too, wished to accompany her.

He saw a picture of a Raslila, with Krishna and several gopis.

Rajkamal gave wide publicity to these episodes. Everyone seeks some pretext through which to present a personality or an ideology. This was also a marketing strategy on Rajkamal's part.

Nit Naval Rajkamal — Life

Nothing especially unusual: his father's first wife had no children, so he married again (Rajkamal's mother came from Rampur Haveli). His mother died, and his father married a second and then a third time, the latter marriage being to a young woman of Rajkamal's own age. Rajkamal called his father, Madhusudan Chaudhary, 'Lal Kakka'. One daughter from the third marriage, Madalasa, survived, and Rajkamal was fond of her. His father initiated him into Brahmanical rites and values through commands, admonitions and beatings. Before passing the matriculation examination, Rajkamal had memorised every verse of the Gita and the Durga Saptashati. Following his father's transfers, he moved from place to place; from Nawada he came to Patna and enrolled at B. N. College. His father supplied him with 442 prohibitory injunctions—an entire catalogue of things he must not do.

Love affairs: his first romantic relationship was with Shobhana Jha in Patna. He failed the Intermediate Commerce examination once and later failed the B.Com. examination once. In 1951 he married Shashikanta of Chanpura, Darbhanga. His formal studies ended after the B.Com.

After his marriage he worked for a while as a proofreader at a newspaper in Patna, then as a lower-division clerk in the Secretariat. Darbhanga, Patna, Delhi, Mussoorie, and then Calcutta followed. From there he corresponded with Savitri Sharma of Mussoorie and married her in 1956. He then fell in love with a woman named Santosh (probably Savitri's niece), and on 3 July 1957 fled Mussoorie, leaving Savitri while she was pregnant. There followed three or four months in Patna, Darbhanga and Nawada, and then Calcutta, where he went bearing a letter from Yatri addressed to the Hindi writer Chhedilal Gupta. He became associated with Babu Saheb Chaudhary's Mithila Darshan, and later with Bharatiya Jnanpith in Calcutta; his wife was with him. Subsequently he left his job and brought out Ragarang, but it closed down. During his six years in Calcutta he wrote a great deal of literature. His body grew weak; the lump on his abdomen had first appeared in Calcutta.

Then Delhi.

He corresponded with Kirti Narayan Mishra, Jivakant and Hansraj.

Then, in October 1963, he settled in Patna.

In 1966, Shashi, Divya, Mukta and Neelu came from Nawada to see him.

He corresponded with Alka of Banaras; this was his last love affair. In the first week of November 1966 he went to Banaras to meet her.

The Marxist critic Namvar Singh did not consider him worth even a postcard. In Nayi Kahaniyan, a statement by Madhukar Gangadhar appeared, alleging that although Rajkamal was undergoing treatment for an illness, he was invoking poverty and neglect as a pretext to extort money from people. By writing letters, he also incited Prakash Jain, editor of Lahar, and Manmohini against Rajkamal. Rajkamal wrote in his diary: "Madhukar and Lahar people have joined hands in dirty propaganda against me."

One day Dr Chaturvedi told him that he might have urethral cancer in his penis, and that, if this proved to be the case, the penis might have to be amputated. Rajkamal wrote in his diary: "If I have to cut my penis, I will commit suicide."

Chandramauli and Upadhyay were the two people who cared for him most, including by providing financial assistance. Long after Rajkamal's death, both died by suicide. Rajkamal dedicated his Dehgatha to the two of them. Hansraj and Alok Dhanwa came to see him in hospital. Four of Rajkamal's brothers lived in Patna, and three had jobs, yet not one of them took the trouble to bring even a paisa's worth of medicine.

He died in June 1967.

Nit Naval Rajkamal — Maithili Literature

Rajkamal wrote a hundred poems, three novels, thirty-seven stories, three one-act plays and four critical essays. Swaragandha collects poems he wrote during his stay in Calcutta between November 1957 and April 1958. He considered Yatri contemporary but not modern. Rajkamal wrote the novels Andolan, Pathar Phool and Adi Katha. Lily Rek Rangin Parda reminded him of Émile Zola's novel Lajja. Because of his traditionalist thinking, Ramanath Jha declared Rajkamal's entire literary craftsmanship artificial.

Banait Bigarait (Making and Unmaking)

In most of the stories in Subhash Chandra Yadav's collection Banait Bigarait, we find that the narrative advances with a theme rather than with an elaborate anecdotal plot, and comes to an end as soon as its task is done. Its language is another distinctive feature. The language of Balchanma is the autobiographical speech of that novel's principal character; here, by contrast, the language belongs to the storyteller himself and acquires a character of its own. Subhash-ji's refusal to follow the convention of turning stories into didactic tales, his practice of taking a theme forward within carefully defined limits, and his attention to a craft of language that is authentically indigenous—all these factors together will give one class of readers immense pleasure in these stories. At the same time, the collection will not disappoint readers who have not yet moved beyond traditional tales and anecdotes; rather, it will refine their taste.

A few questions concerning the standardisation of language: for instance, aichh, achhi and a i chh. These deserved attention when standardisation was taking place. We might, for example, write jait rahi as jati rahi and then devise a rule of pronunciation for jati (ja-i-t); the relation of aichh to achhi raises a similar issue. But it is now rather late. The writer himself points towards a solution by employing one such form in Kaniya-Putara, only to revert to the earlier forms in his other stories. Still, this demonstrates the need to establish a standard form. If we decide to write chhai, that is fine; and if we decide upon chhaik, let us formulate a pronunciation rule specifying that the final k is silent. What I consider necessary is that this should be done quickly and become generally acceptable. People today do not have their whole lives to spend quarrelling over whether to write ya or e. Accept what phonological theory tells us: ya is a consonant and e a vowel; the universal substitution of one for the other is impossible. And if a substitution is to be made, establish a rule of pronunciation. Writing nañi for nahi is intelligible, but among naĩ (Antika), naim (NBT) and nãi (Saketananda, Kalaratrishcha Daruna), Saketananda's usage proves more appropriate according to phonetic principles. If there is doubt, seek the assistance of phonetics laboratories.

One feature of Banait Bigarait is that Subhash Chandra Yadav has employed his own distinctive, phonetic mode of writing, one capable of carrying the debate on standardisation forward.

Subhash-ji belongs to the generation of storytellers that emerged after Independence. He gives form to life through the short story, enriching it through both technique and subject matter, and thereby making it meaningful. Naturally, his stories depict the struggle of ordinary people for existence. Perhaps Badariya, the character in his story Kathak Banal Lok ("People Made of Wood"), written several decades ago, continued to smile by coincidence. The characters of this collection, too, possess similar traits. One character falls asleep while weeping in hospital and, on waking, begins to cry again; another is in love. Some have a business instinct, while there are also characters like Harivansh, whose acts of apparent kindness end in harm because of systemic failure. Let us now examine the stories of Banait Bigarait closely.

Kaniya-Putara: in this story a little girl in the street clasps the writer's feet and then rests her head against his knee, utterly at ease, as though she had laid her head in her mother's lap. Something firm, like a lemon, brushes against him. It is the girl's breast. She remains unperturbed, as if she were leaning against her father, grandfather, brother or sister. The writer wonders: will she become Sita or Draupadi? The spectres of Ravana and Duryodhana surround him.

After reading Kaniya-Putara, the crossroads are the same, and the children are the same children one sees while stopping and starting a vehicle at a traffic signal. Yet one's way of seeing changes. Earlier, one might have driven away without a second thought after giving—or not giving—money to children who wipe car windows and beg. Can that vision remain unchanged after reading Kaniya-Putara? A boy may grow up to steal or become a foot soldier at the lowest rung of some drug cartel; but a girl? Will she become Sita, Draupadi or Amrapali? Those social institutions and human-rights organisations that, when a lover climbs an electricity pole and threatens to kill himself, spread a net below and publicise themselves and their organisations before television cameras—can they continue to work with the same old outlook after reading this story? A government that merely renames a hospital after Jayaprakash Narayan, or Hardinge Park after Veer Kunwar Singh, and considers its duty discharged—will it instead reach the roots of the problem and build a new hospital and a new park in those names, or simply stamp 'Made by Me' on somebody else's work? Will these institutions not abandon their long-standing habit of avoiding hard work and seeking easy solutions?

Asurakshit ("Unsafe"): this story vividly portrays how perilous the twenty-minute walk home from the railway station has become at night. It was not like this earlier: the change reflects a condition of people's minds. Yet who pays attention to problems of this sort? The media concentrate on great issues—liberalisation and any number of other subjects. Here the everyday problems of streets and intersections are seen afresh. In the darkness of night, the distance from the station to home assumes the proportions of a mountain. The story is also a commentary on the state of law and order in the region at that time.

Ekaki ("Alone"): Kusesar is in hospital. The hospital itself is described vividly. There a woman, crying after her husband's death, apparently falls asleep in tears; when she wakes, she begins crying again. This is how life is. The storyteller points towards a truth of human existence and comments on the conditions and management of the hospital not through overt declaration but by showing life as it is lived.

O Larki ("That Girl"): amid the hostel lives of young men and women, a young man named Navin sees a girl holding an empty, used cup belonging to her and her boyfriend. She asks Navin where he is going. Navin assumes that she considers him beneath her and has asked him to throw away the cup. He refuses. Thoughts whirl in his mind. The story rests upon this small occurrence: had she really considered him inferior and asked him to dispose of her tea cup? Having said a firm 'No', he moves on. Like Ekaki, this story is based upon psychological analysis.

Ekta Prem Katha ("A Love Story"): in the days when few households had a telephone, calls would arrive at one person's house with the request that a neighbour be summoned. The writer had a telephone at home and would call a young man whenever the young man's girlfriend telephoned him. The young man then bought a mobile phone, and the calls stopped. But after he changed his number, the girlfriend again began calling the writer's house. The girlfriend, Ritu, was a friend of the young man's maternal cousin; the writer grew anxious to help her. In this story the lovers, mobile phone and telephone enter the new short story as naturally as they have entered the new age.

The title story is Banait Bigarait. It has three named characters: Mala, her husband Satto and their granddaughter Muniya. The exchanges between mother-in-law and daughter-in-law in a village household have become so strained that one might not even ask the other to eat after bathing. Yet when that same son and daughter-in-law move away, the mother-in-law begins to worry even about the cawing of a crow. The story depicts the reality of the village after migration. One day the crow, too, will disappear along with Satto, and Muniya will search for both the crow and her grandfather. It is a story of migrants, of the son and daughter-in-law and the granddaughter, of conflict and love between mother-in-law and daughter-in-law.

In Apan-Apan Dukh ("Each One's Sorrow"), a wife, feeling neglected, curses her children. At night the children eat, and after they have eaten the kitchen is locked; the wife remains hungry, and naturally the sound of her husband's snoring irritates her. Everyone inhabits a world of their own. Each person thinks that the happiness and suffering of that personal world encompass everything, but that is not so. Everyone has distinct joys and sorrows, hopes and aspirations. The storyteller discloses a truth that falls within his own experience. How could the environment of inward experience be wholly independent? This question comes to the surface throughout Subhash Chandra Yadav's stories.

In Atank ("Terror"), the storyteller meets his old friend Harivansh in an office. The writer's land-mutation application remains unfinished because, after Harivansh's transfer, nobody took a bribe from him and consequently nobody did the work. Harivansh's liberality had arisen from the illicit income of bribes; why should another official surrender his own opportunity to earn? The writer is terror-stricken. The office environment, corruption and the way social relations change when a single official is transferred are all expressed here. Even today, when you or I go to a block office or the Secretariat for some work, are we not told: 'Pay whatever they ask, and if there is any problem afterwards, tell us'? If you come with somebody's name or recommendation instead of cash, the employee will neither receive the money nor get your work done.

In Ekta Ant ("An Ending"), the writer's co-brother (the husband of his wife's sister) has shaved his head after their father-in-law's death, while the writer has not; this provokes all kinds of comments. The other man is at ease because he has had his hair cut. Here cultural symbolism enters: the person who is caught is branded a thief and wrongdoer, while the one who escapes detection is held to be idealistic. Not entirely, but something of this kind of faith arises and breaks apart in this story too. In Haryana, people do not necessarily shave their heads even when their own fathers die: does that mean their grief is any less? In Punjab, a woman does not wear vermilion or bangles until a year after her marriage, while during the first year she wears bangles up to her shoulders. Does her love for her husband diminish after that first year?

In the story Kabachhu, a masseur comes to the writer and rests a hand on his thigh. Because people of refined, elite upbringing are sitting nearby, the writer removes the hand. The masseur asks what embarrassment there can be about touching a body that has already been touched. It is as though the masseur imagines the writer has mistaken him for a young woman. The writer feels as if he himself were a woman and the masseur an old lover. The masseur lacks any delicate awareness of place and time: otherwise the writer would have allowed himself a massage even in such heat. He feels sorry for the masseur's wretched circumstances, yet remembers his drawn-out 'Shee-ee-ee' with revulsion. Freud's psychoanalysis has often been attacked for placing sex at the centre of its account. Yet experience suggests that the more one distances oneself from sex, the more one excludes it from conversation, stories and literature, the fiercer its return becomes.

In Karbar ("Business"), the writer meets Mr Verma, Sinha and two other people. In a bar, Sinha distinguishes friendship from business and relates two stories. Everything has its price. One story, about buying a television for a friend's wife only to receive a demand for a refrigerator, breaks off midway. In the other, a woman approaches a former lover for money to pay a doctor's fee and save her husband's life. The former lover asks her to spend the night with him in exchange for the money. Sinha does not consider anyone at fault: why should a doctor treat a patient without payment? Why should a former lover hand over money for nothing? And if the woman refuses to spend the night with him, her husband will die.

Now, when the writer leaves the bar and the doorman salutes him, he begins to hear the ring of money even in that salute. The collapse of older values, friendships and ideals gives rise to a sense of solitude.

Freud comes to the fore again in Kushti ("Wrestling"). The story begins with a stiff, dried stain on a lungi. But it soon becomes clear that the mark is not what it at first appears to be; it is the mark of a wound. We then hear of village problems being settled at a wrestling match in the market, of the health centre remaining closed, and of bricks being stolen from there. The younger brother, in the course of treatment, loses faith in allopathy and begins trusting homoeopathy instead. People come to enquire about the wound, and the writer gives them detailed accounts, while putting off several younger visitors. These successive incidents build an atmosphere.

In Canary Island ke Laurel ("The Laurel of the Canary Islands"), Subhash and Upiya are the characters. There is an image here: a decision is like the collapsing bank of the Kosi. A letter from a maternal cousin; setting out in a boat with a dagger; entering a current of ochre-coloured water; disembarking on a chhit, a raised patch of land amid the river; and finding thigh-deep water still stretching far beyond that patch. Seeing him push a bicycle through scorching sand, somebody remarks: 'Did your in-laws give you that bicycle? Give it a little prod, the way you would urge on a bullock.' At his elder sister and brother-in-law's home he hears how their daughter's wedding had been delayed for two days over the demand for a coat, and how excessive education is supposed to drive people mad. Although Subhash wants to, he cannot bring himself to ask for two hundred rupees. His sister's behaviour remains ambiguous; unconvinced and uneasy, Subhash goes back.

In Trishna ("Longing"), the writer meets Akhilan, who tells him about his encounter with Shrilata. When he returns on the fifth day, she is not on the train. What is Akhilan to do now—keep travelling the route between Visakhapatnam and Vijayawada, or spend his days in the company of a memory?

The Laurel of the Canary Islands and Trishna analyse small incidents charged with emotion.

In Dana ("Grain"), Mohan goes for a job interview. A sympathetic peon informs him that outsiders are not selected; a PhD might have made a difference. Everything seems sick and sorrowful to Mohan. Sparrows and mynas chirp and dart towards crumbs of bread. The story sensitively describes the distinction between the 'outside' candidate and the 'local' one at an interview in a competitive selection process.

In Drishti ("Vision"), there is the search for employment after finishing one's studies, and the sharp taunts of fellow villagers. Then, encouraged by a South Indian journalist, the writer takes up farming in his village despite his wife's objections. Though this is an ordinary subject, social truths are exposed at various points. We see the malicious gossip of village people, encouraged by the ample idle time produced by lack of work. Alongside it appears the aspiration of present-day women to live an urban life.

In Nadi ("River"), the subject moves forward with the story and comes to an end with it. Bihari has come to Gagandev's home; he is to stay in the city for a year. While helping him look for a house, Gagandev meets a girl. He leaves her behind and walks on, yet even knowing that he will never meet her again, he feels a surge of joy and love.

Paralay ("Deluge") is a story of flooding, and here the flood is the Kosi's. Bauki is waiting for Bunachhek. But the water in the river channel keeps rising. The swelling Kosi flood is approaching, while Bauki is worn out by his mother's incessant demands and troubles. The cattle are bellowing from hunger. Ramcharan has more food and water at his house, and Bauki asks everyone to arrange a boat. The erosion was still some distance from Bauki's home. Death and destruction have made him hard and broken his attachments. But then the rain stops. Bauki begins trying to recognise and remember the things around him.

In Bat ("A Matter"), the storyteller again finds his plot while moving along a road and develops it through his craft. At a lemon seller's stall, the writer hears a quarrel between the vendor and another man and joins in. The customer is asking the seller for an umbrella that he had left beneath the stall. According to the writer, people remember sorrowful things for a long time.

Rambha rapidly portrays changes in relations between men and women. So long as a man remains distant from women, every woman seems to him a Menaka or Rambha. But once conversation begins, the writer later feels that she might as well be his daughter. A woman approaches along the road. The writer wonders who she is—Rambha, Menaka, or someone else. She has a son with her and is not exceptionally beautiful; the writer reasons that her husband therefore cannot have been handsome either. During their conversation she sometimes addresses him as though he were her father-in-law, and at other times compares herself to his daughter. The writer initially dislikes this but later feels pleased. At the end, however, he cannot understand why she bends down as if to touch his feet and then straightens without touching them.

In Hamar Gam ("My Village"), the writer describes the roads of his village, the scattering of villagers from Kataniya to Menahi, and people wandering between the embankments. The people of the Kosi region live like animals, in conditions scarcely better than those of animals. The writer's house at Kataniya was washed away by erosion, and he is therefore staying with Nathuniya. Nathuni makes arrangements for fishing and trapping birds. A land dispute is under way: one co-sharer's land has disappeared beneath the river, so he wants to seize the writer's wheat field. People are distracted by wealth and women (!).

The writer has begun pursuing women without any good reason, rather as Vishnu Sharma, while narrating the tales of the Panchatantra, turns against Shudras and women.

While everyone sits beside Kamal's fire, drinking tea in turns because there are too few cups, the harvested crop is carried away to Sibanan's place. When there were thickets of jhaua, kaṡ and pater, birds used to arrive in great numbers; now fewer come. Khariya, deer, fish, turtles and doka are disappearing: the means of sustaining life have grown scarce. In the evening a village council meets to settle the land dispute. Satto's goat has died; the daughter-in-law attributes its death to the mother-in-law's curses, while the mother-in-law says that it happened because the sacrificial young goats were sold off even after the vow of sacrifice had been made. The writer interprets the signs of Satto's daughter's emerging youth as evidence of contact with a man and, for a reason, once more turns his suspicions upon women, since this belief is current among the people. Satto's daughter does not yet live with her husband's family. While eating at Sukan Ram's house, the writer feels embarrassed and, to overcome his discomfort, says: 'Today I have made you one of my caste.' The Kosi has erased every distinction: Doms, Chamars, Musahars, Dusadhs, Telis and Yadavs all draw water from the same vessel and sit on the same mat.

Gulo (Hindi Translation)

[*Based on the text of the Hindi translation of Gulo, published by Antika Prakashan.*]

First, a comment on the Hindi translation of Gulo. (For the theoretical discussion, see my book A Theory of Translation for Maithili and a Criticism of Translated Literature, in Maithili Samikshashastra, available in the Videha repository at http://www.videha.co.in/pothi.htm.)

Suppose you have watched a hit film such as the Kannada Kantara in a PVR cinema. Would you then be able to watch even five minutes of it on an OTT platform?

When Harimohan Jha's son Rajmohan Jha saw Vibha Rani's Hindi translation of Kanyadan, he was so distressed that he held his head in his hands. The novelist Vikram Chandra was similarly distressed by Anurag Kashyap's inferior web-series adaptation of Sacred Games. Reading the Hindi translation of Gulo gave me the same feeling.

People of the mainstream translate without having studied translation theory. When the original writing of mainstream Brahminist and neo-Brahminist authors already suffers from an impoverished vocabulary, what can be said of their translations? The translator, Raman Kumar Singh, possesses neither an adequate Maithili vocabulary nor an adequate Hindi vocabulary. In journalistic Hindi, he renders tilā-sakarānti as Makar Sankranti in the very first line of Gulo! Do mainstream Brahminist and neo-Brahminist Maithili writers not themselves use the term Makar Sankranti? And could Subhash Chandra Yadav not have written Makar Sankranti in that first line instead of tilā-sakarānti if he had wanted to?

Therefore, if you wish to read Subhash Chandra Yadav's Gulo in both Hindi and Maithili, and to observe an application of the theory of gaslighting, read the Hindi translation first and the original Maithili afterwards. For the original Maithili will give you the experience of watching a film in a PVR cinema. Once you have read the original first, you will not be able to read even one page of the Hindi translation. And how, then, would you observe the operation of gaslighting? I want you to see that experiment.

In this context, it is necessary to discuss the 2021 Sahitya Akademi Award for Maithili, given for the first time to a writer from a non-upper-caste background. Jagdish Prasad Mandal's novel Pangu begins where Yatri's Balchanma ends. People in the mainstream began to writhe in discomfort:

how had Jagdish Prasad Mandal moved beyond Yatri, while they themselves, far from moving beyond Yatri, were falling behind him? The novel was published electronically in nine instalments in Videha in 2018 and collected in Videha: Sadeha, volume 21 (pp. 677–779). It also appeared in book form that same year and is now available in the Videha repository. Rameshwar Prasad Mandal translated the book into Hindi for Pallavi Prakashan. I ask you to read that Hindi translation after reading the Maithili original: you will be able to finish the entire book. Both the Maithili Pangu and its Hindi translation are available in the Videha repository.

Let us return to the Hindi translation of Gulo. The table below shows how this translation was made and how an insider's view in Maithili was transformed, in its Hindi version, into an outsider's view through the translated-story-science of neo-Brahminism. In many places, because of a shortage of words in the translator's Hindi lexicon, a description is supplied in place of a corresponding word; often even that description is inaccurate. Elsewhere words are not translated at all, or literal translation and translation by sense turn the meaning into its opposite.

Even the changes of chapter are not discernible in the Hindi version. In the original Maithili, each new section of the account begins on a new page, and photographs are placed where there is otherwise blank space, making the divisions clear.

Denmark has an extensive dictionary, extending, I believe, to more than twenty-three volumes. Immigrants often fail the Danish-language test required for citizenship. A woman who had married a Dane told me that her children had become Danish citizens but that the language examination was extremely difficult: even Danes, she said, sometimes failed it. A small population or geographical area has not impoverished Danish vocabulary.

Hindi has not expanded its vocabulary in proportion to the geographical territory it has acquired. In the United States, lists of 350 high-frequency English words and 3,500 basic words are available for high-school students; these lists approximately double in size as students proceed to college and graduate school (where what we call postgraduate study is called graduate school), even for students outside language departments. Students of literature and literary authors are expected to command ten times that vocabulary. In Hindi, except for the writers whom the custodians of Hindi dismiss or belittle as 'regional' novelists or authors, poets and novelists compose literature—poetry as well as novels—with the 2,000-word vocabulary of an eighth-grade student. Some Maithili writers wish to restrict themselves to that same basic 2,000-word list, whereas the signs of the Japanese writing systems alone number as many as five hundred.

In a language into which Ramlochan Sharan translated the fourteen to fifteen thousand lines of the Shri Ramcharitmanas in 1968 (Vikram Samvat 2025), preserving its full import in Maithili, a Hindi translation of Gulo of this kind, made in 2021 (Vikram Samvat 2078), is deeply disheartening.

The Preface to Gulo: 'The Saga of the Last Destitute Human Being' — by Kedar Kanan

Before the original Maithili Gulo begins, there is a preface entitled 'The Saga of the Last Destitute Human Being'. This is the mainstream's wailing, and on this occasion the burden of that wailing rests on Kedar Kanan's shoulders. Moreover, the preface was written on the day of Tilā-Sankranti!

But Subhash Chandra Yadav has not written the saga of the last destitute human being at all. This preface is a malicious attempt to place Yadav's writing on the other side of a divide. What he has written is the life story of Gulo Mandal—Gulo Mandal, who says:

> 'Do you recognise me? If you don't, get to know me. I am Gulo Mandal. My home is right here at this crossroads. If you try any high-handed tricks with me, you had better know who I am. I am Gulo Mandal.'

And it is Kedar Kanan who is behaving high-handedly towards Gulo Mandal.

> 'Those who put on large, conspicuous forehead marks regard it as a corruption of the language,' writes Kedar Kanan.

Yet Kedar Kanan does not have the courage to name those wearers of the conspicuous forehead marks.

Kedar Kanan has enjoyed every benefit bestowed by the forehead-marked people of the Sahitya Akademi and the Maithili Academy. Now that these people are on their deathbeds—and some have indeed died—he wants to make himself appear separate from them.

If the children of those forehead-marked patrons call Kedar Kanan, Veena Thakur, Ashok Avichal, and the others who have received translation and editing assignments worth lakhs of rupees, as well as Sahitya Akademi awards for children's literature or translation, ungrateful, that is a matter between those parties. But it remains true that they obtained those benefits through the favour of the children's forebears.

Furthermore, Kedar Kanan's preface teaches us that, if you do not wear such a forehead mark, or if you wear trousers and a shirt instead of a dhoti and kurta, or if you are a neo-Brahminist, then you automatically acquire the right to practise every kind of deception and intrigue.

Gulo was published in 2015 with Kedar Kanan's preface.

Kedar Kanan received the 2019 Sahitya Akademi Translation Award for his Maithili translation of Kedarnath Singh's Hindi poetry collection Akal Mein Saras (Cranes in a Drought). Now first tell me: who is unable to read a Hindi poetry collection and therefore needs it in Maithili translation? Here Kedar Kanan benefited twice: a translation assignment and an award. Is that not so? For in Ramta Jogi (2019) Kedar Kanan is nowhere to be seen, and Madar (2021) has no preface at all.

Yet on the back cover of Bhot (2022), Kedar Kanan wrote eight lines—not one of them revolutionary. Why?

Now consider what the Sahitya Akademi did with the novel Gulo.

Works published between 2016 and 2020 were to be considered for the 2022 Sahitya Akademi Award. That meant that Gulo was out of the race.

In other words, the author of Gulo's revolutionary preface received a Sahitya Akademi Translation Award, while Gulo itself was excluded from contention.

Was the preface to Gulo, then, an act of blackmail? That is certainly how it seems.

There is a great deal more wailing in the preface to Gulo.

'Desil bayana sab jan mittha'—'Everyone finds speech in the vernacular sweet'—is memorised by everyone in the mainstream, and Kedar Kanan knows it by heart too. But Avahattha was itself a literary language.

The Vidyapati who lived before Jyotirishwara was, however, distinct from Vidyapati Thakkurah, the Sanskrit and Avahattha poet. He may have been the son of Shri Mahesh Thakur, of the barber caste, from the village of Bisfi. In the Bidapat Nach of the parallel tradition, songs from the Vidyapati Padavali were enacted through dance and performance even before Jyotirishwara. There is evidence concerning this earlier Vidyapati in Ishvara-Pratyabhijna-Vimarshini, composed by Abhinavagupta of Kashmir in the late tenth or early eleventh century, where Vidyapati is mentioned. In Shridhar Das's Saduktikarnamrita (composed on 11 February 1206; see Vijay Kumar Thakur, Medieval Mithila), Shridhar Das quotes five verses by Vidyapati, in the language of Vidyapati's Padavali: 'Jav na malato kar paragas, tave na tahi madhukar vilas' and 'Mundala mukul katay makarand'. Jyotirishwara (1275–1350), in the Sixth Kallola, 'Description of the Learned', and the Eighth Kallola, 'Description of the Kingdom', mentions Bidapat. Vidyapati had become so famous that Jyotirishwara referred to him in connection with the dance tradition. (Portrait of Vidyapati by Pankalal Mandal, recipient of the Videha Painting Award.)

> Kedar Kanan then provides a synopsis of the novel Gulo. It appears that he either did not read the novel carefully or failed to understand it. He writes: 'Anwar knows that the old woman [Sukhba's mother] has money. None of his efforts will be wasted ... he will squeeze it out of her,' and so on.

But nothing of the sort happens in the novel. Neither Anwar nor any other character behaves as Kedar Kanan wants to suggest. The owner of the plywood mill gives money when everyone believes he will refuse. The man responsible for the fan replaces it when even Gulo fears he will not. Anwar has helped on several occasions, and later even warns that vultures are circling in search of money. Yes, when payment was not forthcoming—or was delayed—he was once reluctant to help.

Kedar Kanan is astonished by the language of Gulo. The mainstream ought to be astonished by it. But his astonishment merely shows that he has been out of touch with Maithili literature for fifteen years.

> Many other things surprise him. Describing a situation after a quarrel in the novel, he writes that 'in so-called respectable society even an incident this small would cause an enormous upheaval, whereas in the homes of ordinary people such incidents occur all the time ...'.

Kedar Kanan's pretence of surprise is comical; I regard it as an expression of the mainstream's arrogance. It is as though he had come from another planet and lived in a vast mansion in Supaul, cut off from the world and its people.

This nine-page preface obstructs the reading of Gulo. I therefore urge you to begin the novel directly on page 17 and read it in a single sitting. Afterwards, return to this preface and read it as a piece of comic writing—or as a lament. In the Hindi translation of Gulo, Kedar Kanan's preface, 'The Saga of the Last Destitute Human Being', has been placed at the end of the novel. Gaurinath deserves thanks for that decision.

Gulo (Original Maithili)

In Gulo, the landlord and the owner of the orchard are mentioned only in passing. At one point, the owner is addressed as babhna ('Brahmin'), which indicates that he is a Brahmin.

Only after Gulo's death does Dr Malik arrive, weeping and asking who will now call him malik ('master'). One may assume he is a Kayastha, but the novel gives no account of his caste. Thus there are a few passing mentions of a landlord or master and just one appearance by the doctor.

The wealthiest of all is Dashrath Mandal, the owner of the plywood mill.

Broadly speaking, the novel is divided into fourteen sections. Through flashback, it recounts Gulo Mandal's life and describes the environment around him. Its purpose is not an exhaustive account of time and place; it therefore does not analyse the underlying problems of society or the economy. Everything revolves around Gulo Mandal. Wherever Gulo's gaze falls, wherever his actual or imagined presence moves, the novel travels too. It may wander elsewhere for a little while, but it returns to him. Even after his death, when people are making arrangements to claim their shares of the relief money, the writer returns to Riniya. She hears Gulo calling and strains her ears in the hope of hearing her father call once more: 'She kept listening.' The novel ends: 'Baba has gone away. Riniya weeps.'

Unlike an ordinary novel, this book calls for analysis in terms of the textuality of words and sentences: Julia Kristeva's horizontal axis of relations connecting author and reader, and the vertical axis connecting this text with other texts.

Gulo is not divided into chapters. It flows like a continuous stream, although the printed version uses typography to provide chapters or sections for the reader's convenience. In a number of places, paragraph spacing also marks subdivisions within a section.

Let us now read Gulo once more.

The First Section of Gulo

The text begins with Tila Sankranti, not Makar Sankranti! (This is a point for the translator.)

Riniya (Gulo's youngest daughter) is plastering the courtyard with a fresh coating of earth, singing as she works. Do you detect any wailing or sense of inferiority in Gulo's family? Experience the scene cinematographically; reflect upon it: the plastering accompanied by song, then dew like a fine spray of water, the westerly wind, the bitter cold, Riniya wearing only a salwar and a frock, and her mother's cry: “This girl will not let me live! Girl, why don't you wrap yourself in a shawl?” Now stage this scene. But a shawl would drag and become smeared with mud while she was plastering the courtyard; that would happen after she had soiled it. (This is a point for the translator.)

Now imagine that this is not the home of Gulo Mandal but of Gulo Kanan, a member of so-called respectable society.

Morning arrives in much the same way in so-called respectable society; people say Tila Sankranti in the same way, plaster the courtyard in the same way, and a mother shouts in the same way: "This girl will not let me live! Girl, why don't you wrap yourself in a shawl?"

You will find the other details of morning in Gulo's household here as well.

The Second Section of Gulo

A flashback within a single paragraph: Gulo's father, Munilal; Gulo's two younger sisters; the death of their mother; and their father's departure from his railway job. Banerjee Sahib, the senior railway clerk at Saharsa, did not want Munilal to leave: who would bring him those enormous live kabai fish? After bearing three children, Munilal's eldest daughter was widowed. Munilal brought everyone to live with him. His grandson Mahendar was nimble and cunning; he got the ancestral homestead registered in his own name. Gulo fled to Kosi Chowk in Supaul and settled on Bihar government land.

While employed by the railways, Munilal had made numerous implements out of iron and other metal: small and large hoes, spades, digging bars, billhooks, axes, spears and lances. All these are still in Gulo's house. That is his paternal inheritance. His forebears have left him nothing else.

Then comes Riniya's liveliness. She received five hundred rupees from school as a uniform allowance. Her teacher had told her, "Buy yourself shoes." But the money was spent on another of Gulo's pressing needs. Riniya complains: "You gobbled up the lot!"

The Third Section of Gulo

The clash between Chhotua (Gulo's younger son) and Riniya over their attitudes towards work.

The Fourth Section of Gulo

A month earlier Gulo's eldest son Arjunma had left for Panijab (not Punjab—a note for the translator). Kandahawali (Arjunma's wife) and Sujit (Arjunma's son).

Riniya's stomach is churning, which is why she keeps spitting.

Fish had been cooked on New Year's Day, because New Year's Day has now become a festival for everyone. That day Riniya had thrown up the fish, although she had been asking to eat meat.

Next to Gulo's house, Anwar sits in a small wooden enclosure. He gives injections and charges ten rupees for each one.

Gulo's in-laws live in Bela, and his wife's name is Belawali.

Earlier, Gulo's asthma had flared up while he was smoking cannabis. That suggests that the trade in cannabis intoxication must be widespread there. From Bela, his wife's brother's wife has come to see her sister-in-law—that is, Gulo's wife—and says, "This ganja-smoker has killed my sister."

Kandahawali managed to procure firewood (uparēlak: arranged for it; she did not simply "bring it"—a note for the translator).

There is the obligation to honour an invitation to a nephew's wedding: they must give a sari, a petticoat, a blouse and two hundred and fifty-one rupees. Gulo travels to Sonak with Chhotua and Riniya. His eldest daughter Runiya has also arrived there directly from her marital home. She wants to take her sister Riniya back with her, but Riniya refuses: people would say that her father had become ill and the family had fallen on hard times, so she had gone to her sister's house to be fed. She cries bitterly. Gulo is astonished: how has this girl come to understand all these things? His daughter-in-law is restrained; but if she had refused, no duty would have remained unperformed (this is not simply a question of "honour"; that word is too small—a note for the translator). "I would even have taken a beating…"

For Riniya, Sonak is no less than a pilgrimage site: she has never even seen a train, let alone ridden in one. She has only heard of it. There are, then, two Indias.

The Fifth Section of Gulo

The smoke of the warming fire. "Anwar gives no reply. He has helped several times before—given money, medicines, injections. … Gulo shows no sign of going back."

The Sixth Section of Gulo

Rajindar the ration dealer and his co-in-law Inra Ganhi. Inra Ganhi's eldest son, Doma, runs a grocery store. His second son runs a betel shop, keeps chargers of all kinds, and takes five rupees to charge a mobile phone. There is hardly any electricity in Punarbās. His third son recharges mobile phones, downloads films and songs, makes photocopies and takes photographs. His fourth son, Barjesh, has a medicine shop. He says, "The only difference between a doctor and me is that the doctor has a degree and I don't."

The Seventh Section of Gulo

Kandahawali finds a new livelihood harvesting makhana at the Malhad depression.

Sukhba turned his mother out of the house. She is the wife of Inra Ganhi's paternal uncle-in-law.

Sukhba brought his mother back home.

The Eighth Section of Gulo

Mung beans must be sown. The ploughman asks for two hundred and fifty rupees for ploughing, levelling and giving the field its final smoothing.

The irrigation pump needs to be repaired.

"It's the parliamentary election. Congress has fielded Ranjita Ranjan." Nareshba is supposed to get a thousand rupees from Ranjita Ranjan for Gulo; there are six votes in Gulo's family. But Nareshba vanishes. Phulba, meanwhile, will make Modi win, though Gulo refuses to attend the meeting: "You (Phulba) must have got a hefty bundle of notes. You go and hold your meeting!"

Then another quarrel at home: Kandahawali makes a noose from her sari and puts it around her neck. She locks up the seed wheat in a drum and leaves for her parental home.

The Ninth Section of Gulo

Two of Gulo's houses have been swept away.

The holy man tells him that a curse has been scattered over the house. He gives him an amulet, but it proves useless.

Service to Kalibandi, the bhagat and Phulhasi. Now even the ritual coating of kush grass will not be applied.

The Tenth Section of Gulo

Chhotua works for Dashrath Mandal, the owner of a brick kiln. He asks for a twelve-hundred-rupee advance to repair the irrigation pump but receives a thousand. Instead of repairing the pump, however, he buys a bicycle, because Arjunma had sold the bicycle he had bought with his own earnings. Chhotua wants to prove something to him.

Anwar gives Riniya tablets to bring down her fever.

The Tenth Section of Gulo

Gulo has received two suparis, ceremonial betel nuts accompanying two wedding invitations: one for Lalo Pandit's granddaughter's wedding and the other for the wedding of his wife's sister's daughter at Jaidhi.

The Eleventh Section of Gulo

Gulo will ask the landowner for a torch. If he does not give him one, Gulo will not allow him to enjoy a single mango or luchchi fruit.

Bamboo costs no less than a hundred and fifty rupees a pole. Since Gulo has stolen the bamboo to sell, he must let it go for just a hundred. He gets five hundred rupees for five poles; with the money Riniya buys a young she-goat. Within an hour the kid recognises Riniya.

The landowner does not give him a torch, so he buys one, spending fifty rupees of his own.

The thief strips all the luchchi fruit from the trees. One Thakur man is an accomplished thief.

Riniya, Jhuniya and Barsserwali steal luchchi fruit.

"Didn't he catch you?" Riniya asks.

"That Brahmin, catch me? ..." (Barsserwali.)

Gulo's eldest daughter Runiya is married in Bina. She calls on Anwar's mobile phone. Gulo goes there, and Chhotua accompanies him. The luchchi fruit Riniya has gathered becomes a gift to be taken along.

Riniya gives the first picking of mung beans to Satalrenma, who pays her twenty rupees.

Runiya's brother-in-law Nerhu arrives. He keeps looking silently at Riniya and smiling.

The son of Dashrath Mandal's wife's sister's husband lives in Nepal; a marriage proposal comes for Riniya. But Gulo asks for four months' time. Arjunma is worthless, yet Gulo will consult him nevertheless.

The Twelfth Section of Gulo

Arjunma calls Anwar's mobile phone and lets loose a stream of abuse.

Gulo is coughing. There is talk of uprooting thokara from two katthas of land for two hundred rupees. How much dust must have entered his lungs! He digs and clears the growth. A ten-rupee fan breaks, but Nangra replaces it with another.

The Thirteenth Section of Gulo

Once, when Riniya brought tree-ripened mangoes, the landowner gave her fifty rupees. The mistress of the house gave her some to eat as well.

Belawali's fever simply will not subside. Which boy, which woman took how many mangoes?

Gulo spends the entire night tossing and turning. He is breathless and coughing.

"The old woman has a fever. He (Gulo) can scarcely get up himself. ... The girl runs alone, now to the house, now to the orchard. The boy sleeps until eight in the morning."

The Final Section of Gulo

Gulo has cut and set aside seven or eight new posts. ... Now it hardly seems possible that he can do anything at all.

Riniya's young goat will neither eat nor drink. Who knows what has happened to it?

In other years Gulo used to guard the orchard even at night. This year he cannot. He no longer has that much strength.

...Kandahawali arrives. "Papa, call the pump mechanic. He'll put it right."

Gulo says, "Daughter-in-law, that'll cost a thousand rupees. I haven't a single rupee in hand."

"Just call him. We'll pay whatever it costs."

Arjun returns from Panijab.

His nephew Mahindar, who had dishonestly got Gulo's homestead transferred to his name by Gulo's father—that cheating nephew hears his maternal uncle is ill and comes to visit. Gulo tells him an unutterable tale of suffering.

Mahindar arranges worship of Satlarayan Bhagwan. Riniya goes there, and her sister-in-law asks her to remain for the night. Riniya learns that Gulo is in very poor spirits. She comes home early in the morning.

The novel's tremendous ending ... Look at the artistry.

Her mother asks her about the previous night's worship. Riniya has no wish to listen to the news of what happened there. She says to her mother, "Ma, give me some money. I'll go and get Papa's medicine."

...

Riniya grasps him by the shoulder and shakes him: "Papa!"

Nothing. Nothing anywhere.

"Ma, run! Come and see what's happened to Papa! Papa! Oh, Papa! Papa, oh, Papa!"

...

"The soul-bird has flown away."

Then, because there is no money, there is no firewood; and without firewood, Gulo will have to be buried.

"...There's an earthquake!" Parmesar cries.

...

The earthquake comes again.

Just as the funeral fire is being lit, two men, Kanhaiya and Jagdish, arrive on a motorcycle.

Now the dead Gulo is taken to hospital, where a post-mortem is performed. The rumour that Gulo died in the earthquake had already been circulating at the hospital, and the paperwork is made to say so.

Gulo is brought back to the cremation ground for a second time. Chhotua lights the fire; then the two of them cover Gulo with earth, shovelling it over him.

Some Muslim men and women who watch the fire being lit and the body also being buried ask, "Is he a Hindu or a Muslim? ... Do Hindus have a religion at all? ... What use is religion? If there's money, the children can at least get by. ..."

After the earthquake, politicians and ministers compete to announce relief payments. The writer wants to show here how, whenever a natural disaster occurs, politicians vie to give compensation for the dead—and to remain in the news while doing so.

Ward commissioner: one thousand five hundred rupees ...

Member of Parliament: five thousand rupees ...

Minister: ten thousand rupees ...

Government official: a cheque for four lakh rupees ...

And then the wrangling over that money ...

Jagdish wants one lakh of it for himself. But the writer turns back to Riniya.

"Riniya is sad. She remembers Papa. ... Oh, Ma! What a clear voice he had. ... She feels like calling out: Papa! Oh, Papa! ..."

Ramta Jogi

A travel account in diary form. The author writes [5 March 2019]: "Most of the travel literature written in Maithili so far is dull and lifeless. It is a storehouse of unnecessary descriptions and insignificant information. There is more chronicle than narrative in it. This diary-style account does not offer a minute, detailed investigation of history and archaeology. Instead, it contains engaging human episodes that illuminate the lifestyles and cultures of different countries."

The author is impressed by Australia: "Australia is a developed, prosperous, clean country with pure air and an advanced standard of living. ... Because poverty, illiteracy and social discrimination are absent, there is great peace in the life of its people."

I recall a friend of mine who went to Darbhanga for an examination, walked around the university area, returned, and declared that there was no city better than Darbhanga in all Bihar. The author does say that his travelogue lacks a fine-grained, detailed inquiry into history and archaeology. Yet, in the light of the preceding paragraph, I would draw attention to this: when Britain lost its American colony in 1778, it no longer had Virginia to which it could send convicts. Captain Phillip therefore set out with livestock, seeds, sheep and ploughs in three ships, together with six smaller vessels and 1,400 men and women, half of them convicts, and reached the coast of what is now Sydney on 26 January 1788. The original Aboriginal inhabitants of Australia were gradually pushed away from the coastal regions on every side towards the interior wastelands. Their waterholes were seized. Even today, when Australia Day is celebrated there on 26 January, the original inhabitants observe it as a day of mourning; they now live on reservations (designated forest areas). James Cook, by contrast, treated the Māori inhabitants well when he went to New Zealand.

Let us now turn to Ramta Jogi.

[30 September 2018] He leaves for Melbourne in business class with his son Kumar Saumya.

On arrival he sends a photograph to his elder son, Santosh Kumar. Kumar Saumya is a chartered accountant, and his daughter-in-law Madhulika (Madhu) is a software engineer. To indicate that his son married within his own caste, the author uses the following sentence: "A curry of bhata and adauri has been prepared. The adauri came from Madhulika's mother, Jaymala Yadav ..."

There is mention of some Indian-owned shops at Sanctuary Lakes, and of Patanjali products. For four months Saumya cared for his mother, who was suffering from cancer, until her death; now he has brought his father with him. Saumya says that what they call an orange here is called a mandarin in Australia. Point Cook lies in the western part of Melbourne. Many Indians and Africans live here, and crime occurs here too. (The author does not explain why it occurs.)

Swastika Goenka (a chartered accountant) and Anand Goenka (a software engineer) are mentioned. The Hindi film Sui Dhaaga is showing in Australia. At Dosa Hut all the waitresses are beautiful Indian young women. One of them smiled for rather a long time. The author wonders why she smiled. Be that as it may, in a life grown dry, such a fluid experience of spiritual intimacy brings pleasure for a few moments.

Good news arrives from India: the university has become ready to pay his pension arrears. Long-distance trains here are called B-line trains; even these do not meet with accidents. Trams run in the city. It is not only Calcutta that has trams, and the trams here are better.

He speaks with Rahul Vats, Kedar Kanan's nephew. Rahul and his wife Ashwini are both engineers employed in Melbourne; they have a daughter, Ayska. He also speaks with Ahmed Nomani of Kishanpur.

He hears two Habshi men and a woman shouting. "Negro" and "Habshi" are derogatory words, just as calling the Gidarmara people of Simra in Madhubani "Banjara" is derogatory; in Pakistan, "Pathan" is used to insult Pashtuns, although in India people also use Pathan as a surname. Later, however, the author himself distances himself from the use of "Habshi."

The relationship between father-in-law and daughter-in-law—not mother-in-law and daughter-in-law—is clarified. "Many parents, when visiting their children, buy that country's currency in advance. Had you done the same, I would have felt very bad. Madhu is somewhat outspoken."

Durga Puja in Melbourne's Rockbank. "Violence has no place here." Four years earlier he had gone with Kedar Kanan, Sushmita, Tussi and Raman Kumar Singh to see Taranand Viyogi at Mahishi on Maha Ashtami. They visited Mother Tara and witnessed a sacrifice, then went to the shrine of Karu, where people offer milk. Viyogi said: "Blood flows at Tara's shrine, and milk flows at Karu's shrine!"

Most of the car drivers are women.

"An office drinking party; Madhu was hung over."

Saumya wants to settle in Australia. He has been there for three years; once he completes four years, he will apply for citizenship.

"Two women walked down the street close together, wrapped in the same shawl. Quite possibly they were lesbians."

Shashi Kapoor had said of his experiences abroad that when his friends touched one another and joked around, people there thought they were gay. The author must therefore have made a fair guess.

Saumya wants to settle there, but Madhu is afraid.

The author speaks with Professor Mahendra Jha; his pension for June and July has arrived. Mahendra wants him to write a great deal of literature while there, as do Kedar, Kamta, Vinay Kumar Jha and Vaidyanath Jha. The first part of the novel Madar appeared in Antika in March 2016, but nothing appeared after that. On 24 October 2018 he began writing a new novel, though he has not yet thought of a title. Sachchidanand Sachchu liked the extract from Madar very much and sent him a message.

The paddy on the author's land at Punarbas in Supaul will be harvested; he has given the land out on a crop-sharing arrangement. It still has to be threshed. If the sharecropper again makes some excuse, the matter will drag on for months. He is speaking with two people, but worries that they will squeeze money out of him and cheat him.

Madhu orders three glasses of white wine (described as country liquor). It tastes rather like tari, palm sap liquor.

Saumya orders sushi, a Japanese dish (described here as made from leftover rice and chicken).

There is barramundi, a sea fish, but it does not taste like fish from ponds, chaaps, or flowing channels. Raman Kumar Singh has won some award for his poetry collection Ferasan Hariyar (the award is not named). He is translating Gulo into Hindi (28 October 2018).

29 October 2018: He writes four pages. If he writes even this much every day, the novel will be ready in a month. (The Japanese novelist Haruki Murakami writes ten Japanese pages without fail each day—roughly 1,600 words.)

The municipal council here is called Wyndham. An African greeting: two fists are bumped together. With a Myki card you can travel on the metro, bus and tram. One station has the curious name Aircraft.

A woman begging for money boards the carriage. Saumya thinks she may be begging to buy drugs. Later they see her downstairs, approaching with a cigarette between her lips. She rubs her chest as though looking for a lighter—or perhaps it is a sexual gesture.

To keep his haemoglobin at a normal level, the author has to take an Enfo injection once a month.

There is an invitation today. Vikas, Priyanka, Abhishek, Nidhi and Ashwini are there. Vikas's and Ashwini's jobs are in jeopardy. Nidhi's mother calls from Tata.

At a barber's shop, a woman is busy keeping the shop's accounts. "She looked up. She realised that I had been looking at her already. … She looked at me. I looked at her. I became frightened. What happened to her?"

If you call Africans "Habshi" or "black," they will be offended. All Africans, the account says, are dark and tall; very few have an attractive physique. It was sheer coincidence that the young African woman present in the restaurant was beautiful.

Saumya's friend Jaswant Singh has married Angelina, a Christian. There is no question of religious conversion: there will be a yajna as well as prayers in church.

Saumya and Madhu both take part in snorkelling and scuba diving. They see the reef; the bottom of the boat has a glass panel.

Jess Tia and Becky Baldock embrace one another. Jess Tia takes the initiative. There is a magnetic current in Becky's embrace.

At the Frogs restaurant one can eat crocodile meat. One can buy kangaroo skin and hear an Aboriginal Australian playing the ancient didgeridoo.

Here you have to fill the petrol tank yourself.

"Today, for the first time, I am eating pork (pig meat)."

Penguin Parade …

"In the morning I saw Kedar's message. The District Magistrate wanted to speak with me. … He was merely curious how I was doing in Melbourne. I too felt reassured."

"I saw two young women holding each other tightly and kissing. They seemed to be lesbians. Homosexuality is legal in Australia. Gay men can marry gay men, and lesbians can marry lesbians."

Ankur comes to visit. He had studied with Madhu.

Two women board the railway carriage. Madhu says they are revellers; they take intoxicating injections and spend their time in revelry.

A round, shaggy koala, about two handspans long, squats on a branch: an indolent creature.

Kangaroo … sahmilu.

The emu, white pelican, lyrebird and Tasmanian devil (endangered).

From Australia to Kuala Lumpur, and then to Ho Chi Minh City. In this city of ten million people there are seven million two-wheelers.

Southern Vietnam and the Mekong River. "For the first time I saw paddy harvested by machine." Snakes and chickens are eaten in Vietnam. There is a belief there that eating dog meat increases virility.

"In Vietnam I miss Mahaprakash very much."

A city tour and a Chinese pagoda. Those who have no children buy birds and release them. Madhu buys a bird and releases it.

From Ho Chi Minh City to Hanoi in northern Vietnam. The river there is the Red River.

They meet Madhu's friend Ruchi and her husband Gaurav there.

The notebook containing the travel account is lost and then found again.

Ruchi is a Brahmin and the daughter of an IAS officer; Gaurav is a Rajput. They married for love. Ruchi's father strongly opposed the marriage.

A puppet sometimes takes the form of a dolphin and sometimes that of a fish.

There is an embrace of farewell with Ruchi.

Angkor Wat in Cambodia represents a synthesis of Hinduism and Buddhism. Brother Yogendra Pathak Viyogi has made a very fine and detailed investigation of Angkor Wat.

At the crossroads of Pub Street, a man of about thirty-five: "Want girl, sir? Thirty dollars for one hour. Sixty dollars for one night." "No, I don't want." A Spanish woman: "Unos, dos, tres ..." (One, two, three.)

"I asked, '¿Dónde vive usted?' (Where do you live?)"

"She said, 'España' (Spain)."

Appendix: The Andaman Diary

September 2012: My middle son Sanjay, who is going to Port Blair with his wife, invites me along. I shall travel from Saharsa, they from Mumbai, and we shall meet at Port Blair Airport.

Annadurai is standing with a taxi. He is building a house in Chennai because he fears the Andamans may one day sink into the sea. His driver Uday, from Ranchi, arrives later. Port Blair even has a neighbourhood named Ranchi. Bengalis form the largest population in the Andamans, followed by Tamils.

North Bay: the mountain and forest shown on the twenty-rupee note belong to this island. There is snorkelling, scuba diving, speedboating and a coral reef. From a glass-bottomed boat, one can see the marine world while remaining seated.

Plastic is prohibited on Jolly Buoy Island.

Baratang and the Jarawa Indigenous people. My friend Lallan (Vinay Kumar Jha, IAS) had strongly insisted: "You must see the Jarawa."

Madar

Dedicated to the literature-loving Samrat and Neha, this book concerns relations between men and women and the way suspicion turns its male antihero, Madan, into a murderer. The novel ends with the possibility that a relative from a criminal background, who has given him refuge, may exploit Madan, and with Madan's psychological turmoil.

Madan's wife Radha supports the household through sewing and other small jobs. Her eldest daughter, Shanichari, was born on a Saturday. But she is nowhere to be found. The blouse for the woman from Gamharia has been stitched. If Shanichari delivered it, they would get twenty rupees and could buy rice and potatoes. Were Radha to go herself, Madan might see her and create a terrible scene. He does not let her go anywhere. The worm of suspicion keeps writhing in his head.

But it had not always been like this. Madan used to check whether Radha had run out of oil and soap. His father, Kamesar Azad, had passed the intermediate examination in his day. His father and uncle together had held fifty or sixty bighas of cultivated land. After his uncle's death, however, the family property was divided, and only five bighas fell to Kamesar, who had two sons and two daughters to support, as well as himself and his wife. Kamesar took a keen interest in community affairs and caring for the sick. His two sons somehow completed their BAs.

Madan fled to Bombay, but there he missed Radha. The work was very hard, so he returned; Radha had gone to her parental home. He went there, but she had gone to the cinema with the elder husband of one of her sisters. His suspicion began at that very point.

Kamesar brought Radha back from her parental home. Shanichari was born, and then Karmu. Madan's suspicion did not diminish. He began keeping watch on her and beating her.

The two brothers, Madan and Kishore, separated their households. A shisham tree beside the ridge in their field had dried up. Its price was agreed upon, but Kishore raised an objection and the buyer withdrew. Eventually it was sold.

Madan fought with Kamla, bit off her ear, and fled. Kamla filed a case; Kamesar paid the police two or three hundred rupees to quieten matters. Madan's pisa (his aunt's husband) arranged a tempo for him, and he began driving between Pipra and Supaul. Kamesar brought Radha home from her parents' house, but her mother warned her: "Keep him under control, or he will bring shame upon you." The beatings resumed, and Radha went back to her parental home at Tintolia. She was pregnant.

After matriculation Radha had enrolled in intermediate studies. The examination form now had to be filled in. Her friend had come from her marital home for that purpose. The college was at Raghopur. Radha filled out the form.

There had once been a time when Madan would strip her naked. "There is no greater pleasure in life than this." But it was not so now; now there was suffering. Radha thought of running away somewhere, of eloping with someone. Ashok … she saw affection for herself in his eyes. Then she remembered Shanichari and Karmu. What would become of the nursing child in her lap?

Radha remembered several young men who had cared for her. They would pick ber fruits or jilebi fruits, give her mangoes and jamuns, but had never pressed their bodies against hers. There was also her brother-in-law from Karjain, sweet-spoken as he was. Once, in winter, he had brought a very beautiful woollen cap from Nepal.

The intermediate results came out. Radha had secured a first division in the intermediate examination too (meaning that she had also obtained a first division in matriculation). In her marital village, Pathra, her house stood a little way from Mahavir's. Two girls from Pathra had taken the intermediate examination, but neither had obtained a first division. Mahavir had passed in the first division and would apply for a teaching job at the primary school of Pathra Panchayat. The mukhiya told him that some money would have to be paid to the official: if it cost four or five thousand rupees, the honorarium would be fifteen hundred, so the expense could be recovered in three or four months. Mahavir had come to Tintolia to bring his sister back from her parents' home. He said that if Radha applied, she too could get a teaching post at the Pathra school. Her father-in-law had sent word as well. Radha herself wanted the job.

As soon as her intermediate examination ended, Radha gave birth to another daughter.

Radha obtained a job. Madan seemed now to have forgotten his abuse and beatings. Mahavir was employed at the same school. Rekha, Radha's sister, also came there; her marital home too was at Pathra.

But on the pretext of asking about her honorarium, Madan kept Radha under surveillance. There was a man named Raghunath Sahni, who went around declaring to everyone, "You can never trust a Gorhni woman!" Raghunath was simply mad; Madan was not. … He made Radha leave her job. She stayed at home. Madan went to his maternal relatives for help but received only five hundred rupees. The teachers' honorarium had meanwhile risen to four thousand rupees. Radha regretted her loss all the more. Mahavir suggested that she meet the headmaster and the mukhiya about being reinstated. The headmaster sent her to the mukhiya. Kamesar went to see him, but the mukhiya flatly refused: too much time had passed.

Madan suspects Radha whenever she meets Mahavir. Kamesar continues to take an interest in her situation, asking what has happened and what hardships she faces. Why, Madan asks, does she whisper with her father-in-law? Radha is distressed.

Madan visits his sister. His brother-in-law Rajkumar teaches at an intermediate college. He receives no salary, although private tutoring is going well. The brother-in-law asks him, "Why did you make your wife leave her job? You are suspicious for no reason."

Madan leaves. When he returns home, Radha has poured kerosene over herself and set herself on fire. Kamesar has cared for Radha so much—surely there must be something improper between them, Madan thinks.

Whenever Madan visited his sister, Radha would mutter, "He hasn't spared even the father-in-law and the elder brother-in-law. … I'll set myself on fire …"

"… Kamesar brings a young man with him. … He buys tonic for Radha. Why does his father worry so much about the two of them?" Madan keeps thinking. His suspicion hardens into certainty.

Radha says, "Please bring some rice from the elder sister at Piprahi."

The sister gives him five kilos of rice. Madan flies into a rage: "Keep your rice!"

"All of this is that woman's doing. She has lured the old man into sleeping beside her." Seeing the billhook in her father's hand, Shanichari is terrified: "Don't kill Ma, Papa!" … Radha's throat is cut.

Madan flees. At Rampur is the marital home of his maternal uncle. The middle brother of the uncle's wife is the leader of a gang of criminals. Madan goes to the elder brother of the uncle's wife; the elder brother's wife is frightened. The middle brother is also there and says, "I will keep him here." As Madan lies there, he dozes off. Radha appears again, dressed in white, a noose wrapped around her neck.

His sleep breaks. Radha is nowhere to be seen. Yet he feels that she is standing in front of him.

Bhot (The Vote)

In Bhot, Yaduvansh, the nephew of the author-protagonist or narrator (the relationship is disclosed only later), calls him. Yaduvansh had once been an MLA many years earlier (that fact, too, is related later), and people still address him as "MLA-ji." Since the protagonist, Subhash-ji, is regarded as a respectable man, Yaduvansh asks him for help. He reaches Kariho. RJD leader Rajinder tells him that the boat will be carried across if he merely drinks a cup of tea in everyone's home.

The RJD, JD(U), and Congress have formed an alliance for the assembly election. Yaduvansh Kumar Yadav is the candidate from the Pipra constituency, which has fallen to the RJD's share. Kariho formerly lay within Supaul; this time it has been cut off and put into Pipra. Bijendra Yadav used to win from here, so most voters in the area support the JD(U). Rajinder Yadav once contested a mukhiya election here. He failed to win, but he is an able man. His name is on the rolls of a nongovernment college. He goes there two or four days in a month, marks his attendance, and returns. Whenever a grant arrives there is a little income. Everyone moves around in a group, and the protagonist accompanies them. If a programme is arranged in Hardi, the protagonist will go with Kamta, a JD(U) man, though neither Dina Pathak, also of the JD(U), nor another Congress worker knows anything about it. The protagonist warns Kamta that thinking in this fashion will weaken the alliance between the RJD, JD(U), and Congress. Kamta agrees to go to Hardi and then return to Kariho via Harda. This is the protagonist's first experience of election campaigning. Yaduvansh says he has no money. That troubles the protagonist: how can he contest an election without funds? How much could the protagonist donate—five or ten thousand rupees? It would be better to spend that amount on campaigning; even tea and refreshments cost a great deal. He thinks of taking responsibility for Kariho's expenses, but then wonders how large they might become. The protagonist and Kamta studied in Supaul, while Yaduvansh studied in Rafiganj. The protagonist tells a story about those days. He and Yaduvansh went to Ekdara on Kamta's bicycle, and the bicycle was stolen there. Kamta reminds Yaduvansh of it. Yaduvansh is now to become an MLA from Kamta's own area; they will need one another. Yet party loyalties have left a distance between them. Their senior leaders may have reached a compromise, but can so many years of bitterness disappear like steam at once?

Bindulal Das is a joker who tells anecdotes. The proprietor of a tea stall is known as BDO: he used to take bribes, was suspended, and now sells tea. Everyone laughs uproariously. This BDO has not even passed the intermediate examination. The protagonist asks the tea-seller whom he will vote for, but receives an oblique reply: "Why should I tell you whom I will or won't vote for?" The BJP candidate is Vishwamohan. He was an MP once, lost the next time, and his wife Sujata is now the local MLA. Vishwamohan is a Keot. Dilesar Kamat, also a Keot, had once won here. Dinbandhu Yadav, son-in-law of socialist leader Vinayak Yadav, also won once. Pipra has a large Keot population; the Dhanuks come second and the Yadavs third. The Dhanuks have no candidate of their own, so their votes will be divided. The Chaudharis are Banias, and the BJP is regarded as a Bania party; where will they go if they leave it? Of course, money can turn someone's head. Socialist Party candidate Satyanarayan Gupta is a Teli, and the greater part of the Teli vote will go to him. Hardly anyone speaks of the Left candidate, Nagesar Yadav. Muslims are alienated from the BJP and support the Grand Alliance. Brahmins, in contrast, are alienated from the alliance. Sukhdev belongs to the BJP, although the public is unhappy with its candidate.

Shivji owns a tea stall. He makes poor tea, is often intoxicated, and abuses everyone up to and including the prime minister. He urges the protagonist to meet expenses: "What do you lack?" Shivji's daughter Lachhmi wears jeans and a top. She has become adept at making litti and tea and attending to customers. Shivji asks the protagonist to test her schooling. He asks her what pushpa means. "Flower," she answers. "Shivji, your daughter is clever at her studies!" The protagonist has told everyone of his relationship with the candidate, and word spreads. He will return ten days later. His wife asks, "What will come of your running back and forth? Will people cast their votes just because you say so?" "They might. Fifty or a hundred votes could make a difference. Yaduvansh would benefit." "And what will Yaduvansh give you?" "If he does his work, there may be a little money as well." "Will campaigning feed us? Not everything is money." "If I do nothing for him today, will he do anything for me tomorrow?" Exasperated, his wife says, "Do whatever you please."

Yaduvansh files his nomination. Prabhas is in charge. As the election approaches, the protagonist reaches Kariho. Kamta has gone to campaign for Minister-ji, the candidate of his own JD(U) party. The constituency has changed, but the party has not. Bindu works as a teacher, in a private school. "Fifty rupees a month. Some people pay, some do not. Whatever comes, I accept—rice, milk, even firewood." He was once elected a member of the panchayat samiti. By speaking to the mukhiya he arranged bits of public work, an Indira Awas house for someone, an old-age pension for someone else. After a job was done, people gave him ten or twenty rupees. But he lost the following election owing to caste mobilisation.

Mannu deals in livestock. "Just make some provision for the campaigning expenses." "Mannu doesn't seem to recognise my worth!" "Mannu-bhai, elections used to be so pleasant and peaceful. Now they're a scramble of self-interest."

Today the targets are Musahari and Domrahi. Kariho has two densely settled Musahar hamlets, with Domrahi close beside them. "Go to every voter's doorstep. They should be able to say: 'I too was given a handbill; I too was asked.'" They cover both hamlets of Kariho and the Musahari settlement of Bagahi. Evening falls. Chandesari takes tea-and-refreshment money from the protagonist, and another hundred rupees for a leader of the Musahari settlement. They set out carrying Nitish Kumar's appeal to voters, the manifesto of his Seven Resolves, sample ballot papers, and calendars. "Brother, you've brought bundles and bundles!" "Why am I getting myself into this mess?" "Explain it properly to the women. Tell them Nitish and Lalu have come together. They have become one. This time there will be no arrow symbol here; it will be the lantern. Even if you vote for the lantern this time, Nitish will win." A woman asks, "Nitish will become chief minister, won't he? He has done so much for women." Women are staunch supporters of Nitish.

"Safina has come!" announces Jamil. He relates how Safina can silence even the most formidable people, then tells another story about her. She once stood for mukhiya; people recognised her. Chandesari was devoted to Safina and greatly enjoyed going about with her. But whom would she vote for? Chandesari wonders: when will people vote on the basis of work? Safina is not highly educated; she has passed the Fauqania examination.

Vishwamohan's house is nearby. One can get five hundred rupees there. Sanjay and Jayprakash both support the BJP. Every day the newspapers report bundles of currency notes and bottles of liquor being seized. Gagna says meat and liquor are being distributed: "The BJP has already won."

In Supaul, Rahul Gandhi has given a speech. Gandhi Maidan was full. He called Modi a thief, accused him of instigating riots and setting Hindus against Muslims, and said the alliance would win. Socialist Party candidate Satyanarayan Sah is mentioned. Kamta is angry: "A vote-cutter!" He scolds Vishwamohan too. JD(U), then RJD, sometimes BJP, sometimes the bungalow symbol. Nitish has done a great deal for women: thirty-three seats in every hundred and bicycles for girls.

"He's from the Pathak hamlet." He hands the leaflet back. "Not the lantern—the lotus." "I say lantern." "He says lotus. Lotus."

"What did Modi say?" Things intended to defame Lalu: kidnapping, rape, murder; people shutting themselves indoors at dusk. People mimic Modi and Lalu.

"If the BJP wins, it will abolish reservation." Mohan Bhagwat said that reservation should be reviewed. "It amounts to the same thing: Kamandal against Mandal."

MLC Harun Rashid asks, "What percentage of the population are Brahmins? Only two or two and a half per cent, isn't it? And in government jobs—they are everywhere!"

Chandesari comments that Safina has become much fairer. "All parties take money before giving out tickets. She was late; by then the tickets had been sold." Chandesari begins to gaze at every part of Safina's body. "The BJP wants to drive Muslims out. Muslims are afraid," Safina says. "Just as Hitler massacred the Jews, Modi will cut down the Miyas. Vultures will circle over this country."

"The BJP is spending recklessly." Jamil says, "Modi is a first-class liar!" Ramdhan is concealing something.

Prabhas comes today and hands over seven thousand rupees for booth expenses. There are two booths.

"Only the BJP will build the Ram temple." "Did you elect them merely to build a temple?" "I will vote for Modi." "A confirmed blind devotee!"

Suryanarayan is a Communist. "Nitish is two-faced: one face towards the BJP, the other towards the RJD."

Kamal Das supports the BJP. "A fifty-six-inch chest!" "Where has Pakistan ever dared stand up to India? It will be pushed towards China!" Everyone laughs at Ramdev's words.

"Modi might even attack Pakistan for votes." "Why would the BJP fight a war? Wouldn't it do so for Hindus?" "Send Muslims to Pakistan!" Lal Pathak explodes. "The nationalist Lal has arrived! Now only the Manusmriti-minded lot remain." Dina Pathak says no accusation of corruption has been made against Modi. "Modi is corruption incarnate," comes the reply. Sudhir offers tea. Kamta's generosity completely changes the mood.

Campaigning is over. Everything is quiet, yet beneath it all things smoulder like a heap of chaff.

People begin queuing an hour before polling opens. Bechna coaxes women voters with sweets. Polling is slow in the Supaul market area. The news worries BJP supporters, for the lotus has more voters in town.

Safina arrives to vote. "Come tomorrow," Chandesari says and goes away. Safina smiles. Early next morning Chandesari goes to Navtol and talks with Safina about the election. "The BJP says we'll win; the alliance says we'll win. Now let whatever happens happen." Safina will leave for Delhi in two or three days. Chandesari asks when she will return. Safina says, "The BJP people create a new outrage every day." "Will you go on living with your heart defeated like this?" Chandesari asks. Safina is startled. "Better to die fighting. Dying while fighting—that is living."

A Rereading of Ghardekhiya, the Rajkamal Monograph (Nit Naval Rajkamal), Banait Bigarait, Gulo, Ramta Jogi, Madar, and Bhot

From the samples of Ghardekhiya, the Rajkamal monograph (Nit Naval Rajkamal), Banait Bigarait, Gulo, Ramta Jogi, and Bhot cited above, the reader will have recognised Subhash Chandra Yadav's style: his use of symbols and symbolic signs, the continuously shifting centre of the narrative circle, and his images made of sight and sound. A folk deity such as the Salhes bhagta enters the writer's being and begins to feel and probe, to pull out everything that lies hidden, and to record it.

Subhash Chandra Yadav's style, then, is the style of the bhagta—a devotee or ritual medium.

Yet in the splendour of Ghardekhiya (written in 1975), Sukhdev had cheated so many people of their money in the election. That episode becomes the novel Bhot in 2022. There is, of course, a difference between 1975 and 2022: in Bhot the protagonist says, "Mannu-bhai, elections used to be so pleasant and peaceful. Now they are a scramble of self-interest." But even in the work of 1975 the observation was: "How can Sukhdev, an illiterate man, earn so much? How many people has he cheated of their money in the election?" Dhundh Mein Ghatna, from Ghardekhiya (written in 1971), recalled Samuel Beckett's Waiting for Godot: it could have become a postmodern novel. Following the pattern of Yadav's Ghardekhiya, Jagdish Prasad Mandal wrote a Ghardekhiya in his own way. Thus one text entered into dialogue with another written by an author who, although almost the same age (one year older), began writing thirty years after Yadav.

His text, then, converses with itself across time and space, as well as with the texts of other writers.

From Subhash Chandra Yadav's Ghardekhiya:

"The young man had only recently come back to the village from Calcutta. If a message were sent to summon him immediately, the expense would be borne by his family. He would come ten days before the wedding season; those who wished to see him could see him then."

Now consider this passage from Jagdish Prasad Mandal's Ghardekhiya:

"Nagesar brought both pairs of dhotis from the courtyard and put them before him. Seeing the dhotis, Doman said, 'My dear co-father-in-law, however poor I may be, I have preserved my honour. How could I wear a dhoti at my daughter's in-laws' door?' Lukhiya, who had made a small opening in the thatch, was watching. Hearing Doman, she called from behind the door, 'Tell him that the house will belong to his daughter only when she comes here; until then, surely it is ours. I am giving it to him.' Doman laughed aloud: 'Will she become my co-mother-in-law only when my daughter comes into this house, or is she one already?'"

Just as Riniya picks up amathi, karchi, or patlo wherever she finds them, so Subhash gathers facts from every direction and fashions narratives and grand narratives. The protagonist of Gulo is therefore not Gulo but Riniya: the novel begins with her and ends with her. Riniya earned that position for herself. The author had assigned her the role of a supporting performer, but through her devotion she compelled him to make her the heroine. Consider the conflict between Gulo's daughter's and younger son's attitudes towards household labour: the girl is always running, now to the house, now to the grove; the boy sleeps until eight o'clock.

And when Gulo steals bamboo and sells it for five hundred rupees, Riniya buys a young goat with that money. The writer does not explicitly say it is the very same five hundred rupees, but the ease with which Gulo gives Riniya the money brings her self-confidence to the fore.

Gulo's father left Gulo small and large hoes, spades, digging irons, sickles, axes, spears, and lances. There were smoke from the hearth, deceit and manipulation, and Gulo had to settle on government land.

Riniya suffered more than anyone over Gulo's death. That is why the writer gives her a presence at both the beginning and the end.

Gulo's eldest son migrates to Punjab for employment. The whole market belongs to Rajinder the dealer's relative by marriage, Inra Gandhi, and his four sons. Then go beyond the market to Bela, Bina, and Sonak. Gulo receives two invitations with two betel nuts: one to the wedding of Lalo Pandit's granddaughter, and one to that of his sister-in-law's daughter. Gulo's in-laws live in Bela; his wife is called Belawali. Earlier, Gulo's asthma was aggravated by his habitual smoking of ganja; the drug trade must therefore have been taking place all around. To fulfil the wedding invitation he will have to present a sari, petticoat, blouse, and 251 rupees. He goes to Sonak with Chhotua and Riniya. Gulo's elder daughter Runiya is married in Bina. Runiya comes straight from Bina and wants to take her sister Riniya to her marital home. But Riniya refuses: people will say that her father has become ill, that the family's days have grown hard, and that she has come to her sister's house to feed herself. She weeps intensely. Gulo is startled: how has the girl come to understand all this? At the end, Riniya realises that Gulo's mind is deeply troubled. She comes home early in the morning. Her mother asks about the previous night's worship. Riniya does not feel like describing what happened there. Instead she says, "Mother, give me some money, please. I'll bring medicine for Father."

Gulo goes to Sonak for his niece's wedding. He is influential there, and his body language changes. His wife remains subdued, but he scolds and orders people about. If the marriage goes ahead, well and good; otherwise there will be an uproar.

To show the available means of earning a living, the novelist takes us to Malhad's chaap, where Gulo's daughter-in-law, Kandahawali, finds new work harvesting fox nuts (makhana). Chhotua works in Dashrath Mandal's rice mill. Green gram is to be sown; the ploughman demands 250 rupees for ploughing, levelling, and preparing the field. Then the author begins Gulo's dying with a cough: there is talk of uprooting tuber crops from two katthas of land for two hundred rupees.

For an account of family relationships and the troubles of old age, go to Sukhba. He drove his mother out of the house and brought her back only when he was disgraced in public. She is the paternal aunt-in-law of Inra Gandhi.

To glimpse the local culture, observe service to Kalibandi, bhagait ritual performance, and phulhasi. After this, there will no longer be even a plastering with kush grass.

Gulo will ask the orchard owner for a torch. If it is refused, he will not allow him to enjoy a single mango or luchi. And look further: bamboo cannot be bought for less than 150 rupees, but when Gulo steals and sells it, he must let it go for a mere hundred.

There are other thieves as well. A thief has stripped all the luchi fruit from a whole tree. A certain Thakur is a habitual thief. There is, therefore, a distinction between Gulo's theft of bamboo and the Thakur's stealing. Gulo's principal trade is his tea stall; he steals bamboo perhaps once a year, whereas the Thakur steals professionally. Riniya, Jhuniya, and Barasserwali steal luchi. "That Brahmin will catch me?" says Barasserwali, for the entire grove belongs to Brahmins.

The orchard is owned by someone else. In tribal regions, the forest belongs to the government, and the Forest Act recognises tribal people's right to gather firewood, mahua, and other forest produce. But the grove in Supaul is not government land. The local proletariat is thus worse off, because the Forest Act does not apply here. Once Riniya brought some tree-ripened mangoes, and the owner gave her fifty rupees. The owner's wife also gave her something to eat.

Dashrath Mandal's co-brother's son is in Nepal, and a marriage proposal comes for Riniya. But Gulo asks for four months' time. Arjunma is useless, yet he will consult him. Dashrath Mandal has money, but Gulo does not say yes at once: he will ask Arjunma. This means the institution of family consultation remains alive.

Riniya, then, is close to Gulo, but the daughter-in-law who had left after a quarrel is not altogether distant either. Look: Kandahawali arrives. "Papa, call the mason who came yesterday. He will repair it. We'll pay whatever it costs."

The author carries the reader both far away and close at hand. Sometimes Gulo is at the centre, sometimes Riniya, sometimes Kandahawali.

In Ramta Jogi, Subhash Chandra Yadav encounters things that many people experience elsewhere outside India: cars stopping when they see a pedestrian at a zebra crossing, as in Singapore. If you visit Europe, vehicles at a three-way junction will stop when they see you standing at the corner. Here at home drivers press ahead, expecting those approaching from behind to show courtesy. The author smokes a great deal. He discovers that in those countries regulations prohibit smoking in completely or partially enclosed places. Not smoking in public places has now become accepted in India too. Once people used to blow rings of cigarette smoke in offices; now, if someone tries to smoke furtively even in a bathroom, others glare at him. The protagonist of Ghardekhiya also smokes heavily, so the smoking habit seems old and persistent in the writer. His daughter-in-law Madhulika is anxious about it. Calls keep coming from Supaul. The District Magistrate speaks to him, asking only how he is, and only then does he feel reassured. Evidently people still find it hard to believe that the police and administration might simply inquire after their well-being.

In A House for One Day (1973), from Ghardekhiya, the psychoanalytic method was employed. In Pilgrimage (1969), also from Ghardekhiya, the storyteller relates the story of Balbawali's courtyard. No doctor will call her mad … but she is mad.

This method acquires a wider scope in Madar (2021). Raghunath was unmistakably mad; Madan is not. Consider also the feminist reading: Madan's wife Radha passes in the first division, yet even with her education she cannot prevent Madan from asserting control over her body. She returns, gives up her job, and is murdered. In an attempt to prevent that killing the writer brings Shanichari forward: "Papa, don't kill Mother!" Yet the writer gives Madan no benefit of the doubt: he declares that Madan is not mad. Madan nevertheless finds refuge in his maternal uncle's in-laws' house, among powerful men whose middle brother-in-law is the leader of criminals. They shelter him. Why? The reader understands: they can get him to commit crimes. Thus the writer builds an atmosphere and leaves the reader free to read and reread the narrative.

Leave aside Derrida's deconstruction: here even the fields have been divided and broken up. Madan's father Kamesar Azad had passed Intermediate in his day. His father and uncle once lived together, cultivating fifty or sixty bighas. But when Kamesar's uncle died, the family property was partitioned, and Kamesar received five bighas.

The same process operates in language. Speakers of the thethi or pachhpaniya variety will continue to pronounce and write Punjab as Panjab; and even when the supposedly elite circle around Kedar Kanan pronounces dengu, English speakers correct it to dengi. Latin and Sanskrit grammars stabilised languages, yet even today Marathi speakers need a commentary to read Saint Dnyaneshwar's Marathi Dnyaneshwari.

Derrida's deconstruction regards sound, history, and culture, along with language, as components of a text.

In Gulo you may feel that no one is an exploiter and no one is exploited. Language creates this impression: Gulo will not let the orchard owner enjoy even a single luchi; he cuts away bamboo, and so on. Yet the surrounding circumstances remind us that Supaul is not a forest region and the owners are Brahmins. Dashrath Mandal, however, owns the rice mill, and non-Brahmins conduct trade throughout the crossroads and markets. A holy man says that someone has scattered mar-chhaur at the house. He gives an amulet, but it proves useless. When the amulet turns out to be a fraud, they grow angry. You might think superstition has ended, but then come service to Kalibandi, bhagait, and phulhasi. There will no longer be even a coating of kush grass. Culture has changed, and so has the economy.

Read "Kathak Banal Lok" in Ghardekhiya, and you will feel as though you are reading Gulo. The government will provide compensation for a collapsed house. We have already seen in Madar how a feminist interpretation emerges when Radha secures a first division at the Intermediate examination—which means she must have done so at matriculation as well. The same text can be read in several ways. Gulo Mandal's caste is not specified; draw whatever conclusion you wish from his surname. Mandal of the Mandal Commission was a Yadav, whereas Mandals in West Bengal are counted among Dalits. Kedar Kanan has seen Subhash Chandra Yadav at Gulo's tea shop and read Kumar Pawan's "Paith," but villagers told the critics, "You have read that story; we have just seen it happening in our village." In Madar the writer is still more circumspect. Kamesar's father and uncle once owned fifty to sixty bighas of land; after committing the murder, Madan goes to his maternal uncle's in-laws, who are powerful men. Thus Gulo allows several readings, as does Madar. This is what Jacques Derrida's deconstruction suggests. In South India the priests of several tribal societies have become Brahmins. Those who serve Kalibandi or perform bhagait and phulhasi rituals may be Brahmins or non-Brahmins. A person speaking without fieldwork will ask how a Brahmin could serve a gahbar or become a bhagta, yet in Rudrapur village (via Tulapatganj, Madhubani district), Brahmin bhagaits perform service at the gahbar. Among the Satar (Santhal) people spread across Mithila, Murmu priests recite invocations in a particular cadence from texts they associate with the period of the Indus Valley civilisation: Santhal people themselves will tell you this. It is one way of asserting the antiquity and continuity of a script, a history, and a civilisation. Again and again two opposing positions enter into conversation; the centre shifts according to place, time, and people, with no fixed centre. Literature, folk culture, oral tradition, history, and science mingle.

After the British left, Indians began redefining their history, culture, and theoretical foundations. But since Rigvedic times India has also had a parallel tradition, in the forms of narashamsi and narrative. In Maithili, however, people with a particular mentality wanted to occupy the entire space and crush it beneath the weight of their ignorance. With Michel Foucault's disciplinary institutions in view, that is no longer possible, and the internet has a particular importance here. It became apparent, however, that women and deprived communities had too little presence in the internet's linguistic spaces. The parallel current in Maithili therefore worked especially hard on this, and the results are now visible to everyone. The mainstream once refused even to notice or listen to the parallel current; today it desires the parallel current to take notice of it.

This came about through democracy, which rests on voting. Let us turn now to Bhot. It, too, admits several readings. You have seen how many kinds of political combinations take shape in this short novel. No centre is permanent. On the ground the parties oppose one another; at the top an entirely different decision has been made.

The feminist discussion now turns around. In Madar, Radha passes in the first division, yet her neck is cut with a sickle. Nitish, by contrast, is doing a great deal for women. Why? Because they are fifty per cent of the electorate. You will already have read in Gulo that Riniya received five hundred rupees for a school uniform. Now, in Bhot, there is thirty-three per cent reservation for women and bicycles for girls. Thus, when the Grand Alliance of RJD, Congress, and JD(U) puts forward a candidate, the protagonist says it is essential to tell the women that voting for the lantern will still make Nitish chief minister. Voting and elections have a thousand defects, but once every five years they stir a new social element into motion. Marginalised groups, including women, experience a sense of growing power. Muslims are alienated from the BJP, Brahmins from the Grand Alliance; the BJP is called the Banias' party; all parties are said to sell their tickets. All these conversations take place both at Pipra's tea stalls and in Lutyens' Delhi. I recall the child labourer in the film Chillar Party, who says: "Everyone is taught not to tell lies, and so on. But when they grow up they all lie. Then what difference does it make, sir, whether one person has studied and another has not?"

Gulo: Art and Language

Gulo: Art and Language is edited by Taranand Viyogi, whom I call neo-Brahminical, and Kedar Kanan, whom I call Brahminical. Both have received Sahitya Akademi awards and substantial assignments.

Not a single writer of pachhpaniya or thethi was invited to contribute an article to the book, because those writers belong to the parallel current, the antagonist of both editors' Brahminical and neo-Brahminical orientations. People of these two orientations may abuse one another, but they unite when confronting the parallel current. Hence this is a bhatbari —a collective self-serving feast, as will become clearer below.

Kedar Kanan supplied a nine-page introduction, "The Tale of the Last Destitute Human Being," to the sixty-seven-page Gulo. In Gulo: Art and Language that burden has now been placed on Taranand Viyogi's shoulders, in the form of a five-page preface. According to Subhash Chandra Yadav, Viyogi's ideology lacks stability; in my view it is quite stable. It is the very same ideology of blackmail as Kedar Kanan's. Brahminical institutions have many faults, and those faults make them vulnerable to blackmail. There is hardly a Brahminical institution that Taranand Viyogi does not attack every few months, only to praise it lavishly once he receives an honour. I cite Chetna Samiti and the Sahitya Akademi as examples. He writes elsewhere: "The creators of Brahminism may be Brahmins, but there are pachhpaniya people and Dalits in its grip too. How else could it happen that nearly two hundred Dalit-pachhpaniya writers in Maithili write precisely the same things, in the same manner, which serve the fulfilment of Brahminism's desires? You may see such a Dalit presiding over a Brahmin association and receiving honours there." You may feel that he is writing about himself. His language, literature, subjects, supposed ghazals, duplicity, pursuit of awards, and behaviour are all, in my view, thoroughly Brahminical. People have seen him presiding over gatherings of Brahminical institutions and receiving their honours.

Subhash Chandra Yadav, however, stood firm, for he has an ideology of his own.

The five-page preface to Gulo: Art and Language does not advance the criticism of Gulo. Rather, it advances an agenda of blackmail directed at Brahminical institutions. This time the target is the Mithila Sanskritik Parishad of Calcutta. Why the attempt will be futile should become clear below.

First, Harimohan Jha, not Yatri, was targeted by Brahminical institutions and individuals. Ramanath Jha was Harimohan Jha's enemy; he subjected Harimohan to gaslighting. After Maithili entered the Sahitya Akademi, Harimohan Jha stopped writing in Maithili. There was no question of awarding him a prize. (For details see my book Rajdeo Mandal: Maithili Writer, also available through the Videha archive at http://videha.co.in/pothi.htm.) http://videha.co.in/pothi.htm

Mahakavi Vidyapati Thakur (1350–1435)—distinct from Vidyapati, the earliest poet of Maithili preceding Jyotirishwar, and a writer in Sanskrit and Avahattha—Vidyapati Thakkur, of the Bishfi–Kashyap line, was a court poet of King Shivasimha and an author in Sanskrit and Avahattha. His many enduring works include Kirtilata, Kirtipataka, Purusha Pariksha, Gorakshavijaya, and Likhanavali. He is different from the early Maithili poet Vidyapati who preceded Jyotirishwar. The image was commissioned by the Mithila Sanskritik Parishad, Kolkata, from an artist whose name has, for reasons unknown, been kept secret for sixty or seventy years.

But the Mithila Sanskritik Parishad was an institution close to Yatri. He was close to Ramanath Jha and to the Sahitya Akademi as well. He was regularly the chief guest at Brahminical organisations. Those organisations had a problem with Harimohan Jha, not with Yatri.

Taranand Viyogi has no evidence of any allegation made by Yatri against the Mithila Sanskritik Parishad. He therefore begins telling fanciful tales and introduces the abusive language of Mohan Bharadwaj. In my assessment, the allegations of villainy and of deliberately misplacing manuscripts levelled against the Parishad by Mohan Bharadwaj and Taranand Viyogi amount to accusations of criminal conduct. Do Bharadwaj or Viyogi have evidence? No. The Mithila Sanskritik Parishad has many other shortcomings, but without government help it published the writings of Yatri and Manipadma. In my view neither Bharadwaj nor Viyogi has shown such ethical commitment. Mohan Bharadwaj is no longer alive to apologise, but if Taranand Viyogi has any ethical sense left, he should immediately apologise to the Mithila Sanskritik Parishad. Viyogi wastes his time attacking the institution. It is openly Brahminical, like Chetna Samiti and Vidyanath Jha 'Vidit', whose work he praises lavishly after his own interests have been served. But the Parishad does not have the money to print a manuscript the moment one is placed before it. Nagarjun, the author of Balchanma, had no problem with the book; nor does his son Shobhakant (whom Yatri used to call Shobha Mishra) regard it as a Maithili book, and for that reason it is not included in Yatri Samagra published by Rajkamal Prakashan. The Mithila Sanskritik Parishad is not a wealthy institution like Chetna Samiti. It publishes books when subscriptions or donations arrive; there is no room for a conspiracy theory. Once a month it opens a room in Kishorikant Mishra's Navin Printing Press for its monthly Baisar gathering. Expecting an honour from the institution by means of blackmail is therefore pointless. Third, because it is not based in Bihar, it does not share even the slight apprehension that Bihar Brahmins may feel about the state's present politics.

He then remembers that this is supposed to be a volume of criticism devoted to Subhash Chandra Yadav's Gulo, funded, in my account, by Yadav's money, and returns to the novel. But soon he wanders off again without naming Jagdish Prasad Mandal. There are two reasons for not naming people in Brahminism and neo-Brahminism—no, three: first, a lack of courage; second, a lack of evidence, which leads to vague phrases such as "some people" being used to advance an ideological story; and third, an inferiority complex, a fear that naming the person will increase that person's reputation. These are three different situations. Viyogi writes, "The way novels are being brought out wholesale in Maithili …" This is another indication, to me, of his neo-Brahminical outlook: "How could another non-Brahmin besides me win the Sahitya Akademi Award? I am talented by birth, but he …" Yet he will not name the person. Kedar Kanan did the same when he wrote, without naming Surendra Jha 'Suman', Chandranath Mishra 'Amar', Ramanath Jha, Vidyanath Jha 'Vidit', Mayanand Mishra, and others: "People who apply enormous sandal-paste marks on their foreheads consider corrupting the language to be a virtue." Perhaps one day he will acquire the courage to name them. Many of them are or were close to the two editors. How, then, can they expect readers to believe that they are marginalised? I record these facts to preserve historical accuracy. Brahminism and neo-Brahminism, through similar forms of duplicity, nourish one another; both cooperate in resisting the parallel current.

In the five-page preface that Taranand Viyogi contributes to Gulo: Art and Language, a mere five lines concern Gulo itself.

Kedarnath Chaudhary expressed his inability to write an article. His discussion of a letter from Phanishwar Nath Renu was, however, welcome.

Mantreshwar Jha has filled pages. He finds Gulo moving and its portrayal accurate. I cannot see why paper needed to be spent on saying merely this.

Rajmohan Jha, too, has been a favourite storyteller of Ganganath Gangesh. The two editors could have edited that material. They might have written about it when the government commissioned them to edit Rajmohan Jha, but they apparently left the lines in because Subhash Chandra Yadav is also Ganganath Gangesh's favourite. Yet this book is not even about Subhash Chandra Yadav in general; it concerns only his Gulo. Now the reader may understand how the two editors filled 202 pages with articles around a five-page review of a sixty-nine-page Gulo. After a page and a half, Gangesh does, admittedly, come to Gulo.

Shobhakant (probably Shobha Mishra) admits that he does not belong to any literary genre as a practitioner, but he has written a good summary.

Ramlochan Thakur published Gulo in Mithila Darshan. After giving a few facts about Mithila, he contributes a reminiscence.

Ashok is primarily a fiction writer and has enjoyed the work, but he has not produced criticism. Narayan-ji also merely polished up a memoir.

Kedar Kanan's memoir reminded me of the Japanese novelist Haruki Murakami's Novelist as a Vocation, a book about how novels are written. There is little of critical value in the memoir, but it would be something new if Subhash Chandra Yadav or another novelist offered such a text to readers.

Taranand Viyogi himself does not know what he wishes to write. Filling pages is his aim; by using phrases like "people" and "some people," he keeps his options open. I partly agree with his statement that Maithili criticism took a foolish path after Ramanath Jha. It is with Ramanath Jha that mainstream criticism—of which Viyogi and his associate Mohan Bharadwaj are part—took that foolish path. For evidence, see the Sahitya Akademi-sponsored book Maithili Patra Patrika, in which their Brahminical and neo-Brahminical perspectives become clearer; Bharadwaj makes allegations of villainy against the Mithila Sanskritik Parishad, yet they themselves acted similarly in that book. (For further details see my Rajdeo Mandal: Maithili Writer, available at http://videha.co.in/pothi.htm in the Videha archive.) Here too the ideological opposition between Taranand Viyogi and Subhash Chandra Yadav comes into view. In Nit Naval Rajkamal, Yadav called Ramanath Jha's criticism traditionalist and said that he had failed to do justice to Rajkamal Chaudhary.

Ramesh places Lalit, Kishun, and Mayanand on the same scale—yet how different Lalit is from Kishun and Mayanand! He must maintain a balance or his article will not be published. In the mainstream, "criticism" means praise.

Krishnamohan Jha 'Mohan' writes yet another summary. Vaidyanath Jha does not even know the names of Maithili novelists. Kumar Manish Arvind has only just finished Gulo and sets about producing a "balanced" assessment under the name of criticism: "The novel's style is not especially developed. Its construction is not very tightly organised. Everything is said, one item after another, in sequence. There is no effort at binding the whole together. Yet the language is so precise ..." Then comes another balancing gesture: yes, this language is the truly authentic language. Critics like him, who have not read the Maithili literature of the parallel current but immediately take up their pens, will naturally remain astonished.

The single article of real value in the collection is Vidyanand Jha's "Hanging On, Yet Alive: Gulo, a Grand Narrative of Survival." He strikes a blow at Kedar Kanan, Taranand Viyogi, and others when he says, "This is not pornography of suffering." He offers a meaningful observation on the book's slender form. This is not merely the grand narrative of a deprived class; it is the grand narrative of Mithila. Vidyanand Jha should enter the field of criticism, but, fearing exclusion by the mainstream, he may not be able to do so, since he is accustomed to the easier path. Nevertheless, the impact of his intervention will echo in the ears of both editors for a long time.

Raman Kumar Singh, like Taranand Viyogi, is in the habit of patronising others. Such critics seem to imagine a great commotion, then a moment of "Yada yada hi dharmasya ...," followed by the advent of Viyogi and Raman Kumar Singh to save the world. Anyone who criticises them is then declared Brahminical. Such people are what I call neo-Brahminical. Their main occupation is writing book notices, which they name reviews: the cover is good, the content good, the portrayal beautiful, the language good. Everything is very fine, very beautiful.

Amid the lamentations of the neo-Brahminical camp, however, Arun Kumar Singh writes: "About the language of the Maithili story collections Ghardekhiya, published in 1983, and Banait Bigarait, published in 2009, I once asked the learned author during his stay in Mysore …"

"… and he said that behind the language of his stories lies a regional atmosphere, what I call the atmosphere of the soil." This also opens up Vidyanand Jha's criticism, which I have described as a blow to the two editors.

In "An Epic of the Toiling Bahujan Society," Satish Verma shows all the world's economic theories failing. He quotes:

"Gulo's son Chhotua placed fire in his mouth. Gulo was covered with earth. Among the women watching the spectacle, one Muslim woman said to another, 'Are these people Hindus or Muslims? They give fire, and they bury as well.' The second Muslim woman replied, 'O Allah! Did you see? They took him away once to bury him, then they buried him again. Where will they get money twice? Do Hindus have no religion at all?' A third Muslim woman said, 'What use is religion? If there is money, children and families can be supported.'"

Verma delivers his judgment: "Like Kabir, he enters into a religious-political dialogue with society." This is a sound conclusion. The first speaker, like the mullah who gives the call to prayer, begins with an assertion of Muslim superiority; the next speaker corrects it politically. And that next speaker, in Satish Verma's understanding, is Subhash Chandra Yadav as Kabir.

Arunabh Saurabh's "An Unvarnished Account of Tormented Poverty" resumes the lament: "Very few novels are being written in Maithili." The verdict is issued, although the facts indicate the opposite: nowadays novels are being written more often than any genre except poetry. Yet he has a precaution ready in case novels are indeed being written: "Even when they are, they do not seem particularly capable of connecting directly with the reader's anguish and restlessness." Such are the problems that arise from writing articles without reading or research. After two or three pages of complaint, he too remembers that he is supposed to write about Gulo. The fault is not his alone: it lies with the two editors, who take editing to mean nothing more than proofreading. Even after that, the complaining does not end; it exposes his lack of reading, especially of the literature of the parallel current.

Ashish Chaman writes: "The background of this story comes from 'The Last Destitute Person in Society', and the account is given exactly in their own voices." I have already written that Kedar Kanan's introduction obstructs the reading of Gulo. Ashish Chaman's article shows that the introduction has not only obstructed but also distorted and influenced its interpretation.

Raghunath Mukhiya offers "Thoughts on the Maithili Language on the Pretext of Gulo," but leaves the entire burden on Subhash Chandra Yadav and the parallel current. Raghunath Mukhiya himself, like Taranand Viyogi, will continue writing "pure" Maithili.

Taranand Viyogi is still not satisfied. He brings another article, "Pachhpaniya Maithili: A Discussion from the Ground—A Facebook Post, Responses, and Controversy." I do not know what job he does; he seems to spend the whole day on Facebook. But he engages in no discussion about Maithili there: he quickly begins to whine and quarrel. Even the discussions that do occur in the mainstream rarely draw more than five or ten comments. In the Videha Facebook group we had banned more than two hundred Brahminical and neo-Brahminical IDs. Today those are inactive accounts, because we exposed the deception. They could nevertheless become active again, and the parallel current keeps an eye on these sleeper cells. The point remains that Brahminism and neo-Brahminism do little work and rely on manufacturing an atmosphere. I record this to show that there are seldom more than five to seven people in a discussion. To call those responses a "controversy" is simply to pat oneself on the back. I am forced to repeat myself: "The entire burden is left on Subhash Chandra Yadav and the parallel current, while Raghunath Mukhiya and Taranand Viyogi go on writing pure Maithili." To portray oneself as the victim and associate oneself with pachhpaniya Maithili, while also participating in the gaslighting of Subhash Chandra Yadav, conspiring with it, and still claiming to share Yadav's ideology—how many falsehoods must one utter, and how shameless must one be? Such conduct is not possible for everyone. Taranand Viyogi alone seems capable of it. You should read the mutual complaining between the Brahminical and neo-Brahminical camps. Both groups suffer, in my description, from split personalities. They jostle, rub against, and abuse one another (for the differences are bitter); yet against the Videha Maithili literary movement of the parallel current they become one. Brahminism and neo-Brahminism compete in duplicity while continually nourishing one another.

Finally, in "Pachhpaniya Maithili," Subhash Chandra Yadav again strikes at the two Sahitya Akademi Award-winning editors when he writes:

"Once Professor Indrakant Jha telephoned me. 'You should have received the Sahitya Akademi Award long ago. You deserve it. I am an admirer of your stories. Your Banait Bigarait stands at the top of the race. But its language is not correct. To receive the prize you will have to submit another collection written in a different language.'" A point worth noting here is that the first story of Banait Bigarait is written in elite Maithili, while all the remaining stories are written in pachhpaniya Maithili.

Do you remember the time? It was precisely when the same Sahitya Akademi circle was engaged in its shameless performance under the leadership of "Vidit." At that very time the circle had awarded Taranand Viyogi for his "pure" Maithili, and Viyogi had praised Vidit to the skies. I had written the preface to Banait Bigarait, and that book had been sacrificed.

He is the author of "Kathak Banal Lok," which I read in 1983 and 1984 when I was in Classes Nine and Ten. He will remain steadfast. Twenty-five years after Ghardekhiya, he was still steadfast in Banait Bigarait, and now in Gulo, Madar, and Bhot. And see how events unfolded: Indrakant Jha received a resounding answer when Jagdish Prasad Mandal was awarded the Sahitya Akademi's principal Maithili award for 2021 for the novel Pangu, written in thethi/pachhpaniya spelling.

Dr Ramanand Jha "Raman" jotted in his notebook: "The Brahmin says, 'I am a Soti'; the Solhkan says, 'I am a Brahmin.' What am I to say about what I am?" The contempt for the Solhkan expressed in this note is nothing other than a linguistic manifestation of caste hostility and hatred.

Ramanand Jha "Raman" replied to Subhash Chandra Yadav on 10 December 2022, after my Nit Naval Subhash Chandra Yadav (Part 1) appeared in Videha on 1 December 2022. Dinesh Yadav opposed Raman's response from Nepal, while Lalitesh Mishra supported it from India.

Ramanand Jha "Raman": Surveying the Fields Without Having Studied Surveying

A field is measured by an amin, a trained land surveyor. Amini is not a song that anyone can sing or hum. It is a discipline. Without learning it, how could one understand the importance of a surveyor's chain and links? Move one link this way or that, and brothers may end up breaking one another's heads. Similarly, anyone who measures language must acquire knowledge of linguistics or the science of language. Only then can that person distinguish a language from a dialect, a mixed language from a creole, and so forth. Only then can one explain the distinctions between spoken and written language, ordinary and literary language, or the language of a character and that of the author.

Ramanath Jha holds that "the Mithila language is not a language born today whose form may settle with time. It has had a written tradition for six hundred years. Yet over the past fifty years, under Hindi influence, it has been corrupted. First its script was lost; now the very form of the language is on the verge of destruction. A language does not belong to a single person, so that everyone may write it in every imaginable way; then it would cease to be a language."

The protection and use of common property require discipline. Just as field irrigation depends on a water channel (pauti), so a language's prestige and acceptance on national and international platforms depend on proper channels. The surveyors of the Mithila language have carried out this work.

George Abraham Grierson identified the Mithila language through linguistic analysis, declared it an independent language, and specified the characteristics of its dialects. The great grammarian Dinbandhu Jha, Mahamahopadhyaya Umesh Mishra, Acharya Ramanath Jha, Dr Subhadra Jha, Pandit Govind Jha, Dr Ramavatar Yadav, Uday Narayan Singh "Nachiketa," Yogendra Prasad Yadav, Dr Sunil Kumar Jha, and others studied that discipline and brought the Mithila language international recognition and prestige. Today, however, such a clamour has arisen—or been made to arise—that no one recognises anyone else. They respect neither Pandit Govind Jha nor Dr Ramavatar Yadav. They are Maithili poets, fiction writers, novelists, critics, politically motivated social workers —and, above all, self-appointed linguists who have never studied the discipline.

Consider Dinesh Yadav's reply:

"First of all, identify the language's hollow pretenders; reaching a conclusion will be easier. We need grammar, but what kind? We need a standard, but how should it be determined? People have rejected the Brahmin-settlement style, its commentarial language, and its supposedly standard form. Maithili speakers are no longer the complete fools they once were taken for; they have become discerning. I write and read Maithili, but these gentlemen who determine the standard refuse to recognise my speech, style, and dialect. We must therefore reject such old-fashioned thinking and impoverished mentality and move ahead afresh. The system in which people receive awards by singing praises and circling powerful patrons as though they were Ganesha must be given its final rites. Unless a sociological and psychological perspective is developed, Maithili will remain fenced in by caste-specific philosophies, beliefs, and ideas. That enclosure can only harm it, again and again. Scientific thinking, equal treatment, recognition of all castes, and inclusion of diverse dialects are the life-saving medicine for Maithili. Let us accept these and move forward; it is not too late. Maithili will shine and sparkle!"

But Ramanand Jha "Raman" received Lalitesh Mishra's support. Notice Mishra's duplicity: he pretends that his remarks are directed not at Subhash Chandra Yadav but at some younger person or Facebook user. I have therefore called this behaviour "Puranic criticism," dependent on the platform. The criticism changes with the platform: in the Garuda Purana, Garuda is placed above Brahma, Vishnu, and Mahesh; in the Matsya Purana, Matsya is placed above Brahma, Vishnu, and Mahesh.

Lalitesh Mishra's Support for Ramanand Jha "Raman"

"Not everyone needs guidance. Those very people will guide you themselves. They consider themselves experts in every subject. They have no need of a linguist. Maithili has developed wonderfully. An age endowed with new knowledge has arrived. No one needs to show the way any longer. Displaying one's learning will only invite abuse."

But my mother was no less forthright. A book of Maithili proverbs contained the line, "Ten Brahmins, ten stomachs; ten rars, one stomach." She taught me that it was wrong and said it was what Brahmins said. Other groups, she said, had their own version about Brahmins: "Ten Brahmins, one stomach." I do not know what kind of upbringing Ramanand Jha "Raman" and Lalitesh Mishra received.

But both of them know what they are doing, and here I shall expose it. Ramanand Jha "Raman" writes, "Only then can one say that this is a language, that is a dialect, this a mixed language, that a creole, and so on." Do you see any conspiracy in the wording? Let us examine what that conspiracy is.

English is spoken in various forms, as a mother tongue and as a second language. There are also several varieties of pidgin English and creole English. Pidgin English can be divided into two main groups, Atlantic pidgin and Pacific pidgin. Atlantic pidgin English developed in West Africa and spread to the West Indies and the Americas through the slave trade; in those regions pidgin speakers were regarded as stupid and lazy. But this was not true of Pacific pidgin. It developed in Hawaii, Papua New Guinea, and other British colonies out of the necessities of trade. In New Guinea a creole is a national language, for it developed, expanded its vocabulary, and elaborated its sentence structures. What is a pidgin? It is a means of communication between people who speak different languages; a pidgin is not initially anyone's mother tongue. Over time a pidgin may become some people's mother tongue, in which case it is called a creole. English-based pidgins and creoles spread through British colonies, providing communication between English masters and local populations. Pidgins and creoles have been described as nonstandardised varieties of English. These are somewhat limited systems, with restricted structures and vocabularies. Now I imagine you are laughing at Raman's ignorance: he is treating a Maithili with a vocabulary of two thousand words and fifty sentence structures as the original, while calling the Maithili of the parallel current, with more than a hundred thousand words and more than a thousand sentence structures, a creole. But hold your stomach, for Ramanand Jha "Raman" and Lalitesh Mishra will give you still more occasions for laughter.

Hawaiian Pidgin

English: "Sometimes there is a good road."

Hawaiian pidgin: "Samtem, gud rod get."

English: "Sometimes there are things like bends, angles, right?"

Hawaiian pidgin: "Samtem, olsem ben get, anguru get, no?"

Cameroon Pidgin

English: "Go."

Cameroon pidgin: "Go." (No change.)

English: "Don't go."

Cameroon pidgin: "No go."

English: "They can go."

Cameroon pidgin: "Dem fit go."

English: "They can't go."

Cameroon pidgin: "Dem no fit go."

English: "Nobody came."

Cameroon pidgin: "No man no bin kam."

Nigerian Pidgin

English: "Government! All our roads are ruined completely."

Nigerian pidgin: "Gofrument! All our roads don yamutu finish."

English: "Please make somebody come from the government, even if it is from Kano."

Nigerian pidgin: "Biko make somebody gofument, even if e fit from Kano, come sef."

English: "Anyone who is available, sir, let him just get something done."

Nigerian pidgin: "Anyones at all aflabulu sa, make e jus find somtins done for."

English: "All these roads are in a woeful state."

Nigerian pidgin: "All dis road dem we don wowo finish."

Chinese Coastal Pidgin

English: "He is/was very sick."

Chinese coastal pidgin: "He plenty sick."

English: "I am the chief boy."

Chinese coastal pidgin: "My belong number-one boy."

English: "This is an excellent book."

Chinese coastal pidgin: "Dis a nomba wan good book."

(D. Crystal, The English Language, Penguin Books, England, 1990.)

Now let us turn to the conspiracy. What is Ramanand Jha "Raman" trying to say? That language reflects the relationship between master and servant? That pidgin Maithili has become creole Maithili? Or does he mean nothing at all, because he knows nothing about this subject and merely wants to muddle things through ignorance? In my village such talk is called bakathothi, empty chatter, and is disapproved of. Ramanand Jha "Raman" is thus attempting to survey fields without having learnt surveying. In support of his position he lists the names of Ramavatar Yadav, Yogendra Prasad Yadav, Sunil Kumar Jha, and others—a practice known in Delhi as "name-dropping," and not held in high regard. This establishes, in my view, that he assembled a bibliography by putting keywords into Google Search without reading the scholars' books. Yogendra Prasad Yadav's English article has also been published electronically in Videha. Had Raman read even that, his perspective might have become clearer. Ramavatar Yadav's research supports Subhash Chandra Yadav's position. It is now plain who is attempting to carry out a survey without first learning how to survey.

Subhash Chandra Yadav writes:

"Maithili grammarians constructed grammatical frameworks modelled on Sanskrit and Hindi. They did not consider the distinctive qualities and differences of Dalit Maithili worthy of attention. Dr Ramavatar Yadav is the only linguist who has given the matter some consideration."

Subhash Chandra Yadav writes again:

"Once a programme was held at the Anugrah Narayan Sinha Institute of Social Studies, Patna. It was organised by the Central Institute of Indian Languages, Mysore. The central concern was the development of the Maithili language. Various speakers presented their ideas about how that development might take place. Dr Meghan Prasad also expressed his views. His language did not employ the degree of honorific address that the group of scholars expected. As a result, he was mocked very rudely in the middle of his speech for what was deemed his linguistic lapse. The scene disturbed me, and I protested against that kind of linguistic intolerance there and then."

An article presented by Meghan Prasad at that very Central Institute of Indian Languages seminar in Mysore was published without its opening paragraph in Ghar Bahar, the journal of Ramanand Jha "Raman's" so-called literary association (an operation at which Raman is expert). The complete article was later published electronically in Videha. Do you understand what fact this manoeuvre tried to censor? Meghan Prasad had written that he had repeatedly expressed an interest in translation assignments from the Sahitya Akademi, but—such was the Akademi's supposed affection for him—he had never received a single assignment. You may now understand why Meghan Prasad and Subhash Chandra Yadav are excluded by the mainstream and the Sahitya Akademi, while Taranand Viyogi is acceptable to them.

Subhash Chandra Yadav writes:

"Maithili of the pag and dopata may pass away, but the Maithili of the round-necked shirt will remain alive."

The image of round-necked-shirt Vidyapati that you have seen in this essay was made by Pankalal Mandal, a recipient of the Videha Award. It represents the Vidyapati of the Padavali, the Vidyapati who preceded Jyotirishwar; it is also Videha's logo.

The image of Vidyapati in a pag and dopata, associated with the Sanskrit and Avahattha writings, was commissioned from an artist by the Mithila Sanskritik Parishad, Kolkata. For reasons unknown, the artist's name has been concealed for sixty or seventy years.

Subhash Chandra Yadav reminded me of my father. Twenty-seven years after his death, I do not know from where the tears have returned to my eyes.

> I had watched my father embrace truth with the stillness of a steadfast mind.
> It was then that I understood:
> There could be no renunciation;
> this is the path of those who insist on persevering.

"Mother asked about last night's worship. Riniya did not feel like telling her what had happened there. She said, 'Mother, give me some money, please. I will bring medicine for Father.'" (Gulo, novel, 2015.)

"In 1995 I came home from training without any reason. My mind had grown restless. My mother asked about the training, but I did not want to speak about what had happened there. I asked about my father's state of mind. He was lying asleep on the cot. I would wake him at three o'clock and offer him tea. I had covered the plate of food served for him with another plate. My father was asleep on a Sunday afternoon. I would eat when he woke. Was his mind all right? At three o'clock Mother went with tea to wake Father. … Father did not wake." (A true incident from my life, 1995.)

III. Gopal Jha 'Abhishek' and Aau Swapna Sajhi Kari: A Literary Study

Abstract

In the contemporary landscape of Maithili literature, Gopal Jha 'Abhishek' has emerged as a vigorous and forthright literary voice whose writing combines the earthy fragrance of village soil with an emphatic global consciousness. His recent poetry collection Aau Swapna Sajhi Kari (Come, Let Us Share Our Dreams, 2021) is a landmark in the Maithili poetic tradition: it stirs the reader's sensibility and compels self-examination. Published by Anupras Prakashan, Madhubani, the poems in this volume are not simply arrangements of words. They are an authentic record of the contradictions of their time, human suffering, political hypocrisy and dreams for the future.

Gopal Jha 'Abhishek' and Aau Swapna Sajhi Kari: A Literary Study

The Poet's Personality and Poetic Philosophy

Gopal Jha 'Abhishek' was born on 15 April 1966 in Murliyachak village, Bisfi block, Madhubani district. As a student of history, he combines a sense of the past with an awareness of contemporary realities in his poetic vision. Before Aau Swapna Sajhi Kari, he had published a Hindi poetry collection, Ek Adim Gandh Ki Talash (In Search of a Primal Scent, 2011), and a Maithili collection, Kaiek Arthame (In Several Senses, 2017), works that attest to the maturation of his poetic craft.

Abhishek's poetic philosophy places manukhtai—humanity, or humaneness—at its centre. For him, poetry is not a hymn in praise of any throne or monastic establishment; it is an instrument of resistant communication. In his introduction, 'Lakshya Dhari Pahuch'bait Achhi Kavita' ('Poetry Carries Us Towards the Goal'), the critic Mithilesh Kumar Jha rightly observes that Abhishek's poetry makes its readers sensitive enough to preserve manukhtai, the pillar standing at the heart of civilization and culture.

Aau Swapna Sajhi Kari: The Significance of the Title

The collection's title, Aau Swapna Sajhi Kari, is itself an invitation: an invitation to build a society in which joys and sorrows are shared. In the poet's view, dreaming and sharing dreams are ways of keeping faith with the future. When the world is submerged in the darkness of violence, self-interest and separatism, the very act of dreaming becomes a profound resistance. In ‘Vaiha Swapna Ta Achhi Kavita’ (‘That Very Dream Is Poetry’), the poet makes clear that poetry is a means of preventing dreams from dying.

A Detailed Literary Review of the Poems

Every poem in the collection has a distinct subject and artistic form. The following is a detailed examination of the principal poems.

1. The Voice of Human Sensibility and Compassion

‘Antim Aas’ (‘The Last Hope’): Dedicated to New Zealand's prime minister Jacinda Ardern, this poem presents womanhood as the last refuge of compassion. Whenever the world has taken the road to destruction, the presence of women has come forward as a protective shield. The lines ‘If we have preserved the last hope / it has certainly not been without reason’ underscore the importance of women's leadership and compassion on a global scale.

‘Kona Paratarab He Tathagat’ (‘How Shall We Console Them, O Tathagata?’): Written in memory of the children who died of acute encephalitis syndrome, locally known as chamki bukhar, in Muzaffarpur, this poem raises grave philosophical questions. The poet asks Tathagata Buddha how a mother can be consoled when even a handful of mustard seeds offered in consolation is of no use. The poem makes clear that what is needed in the face of death is not a miracle, but 'medical research' and 'adequate resources'. It is a compassionate indictment of an incapacitated system.

'Dosare Din Jakan' ('As on Any Other Day'): Written against the background of the murder of Priyanka Reddy in Hyderabad, this poem portrays the 'wolf' lurking within human beings. The poet grieves over the way a young woman who had stepped out as she did on any other day could fall into the trap of cunning, vicious men. The poem bears witness to a moment when humanity is put to shame.

2. Political and Social Contradictions

'Saheb' ('The Sahib'): This poem is a biting satire on the caste-mindedness prevalent in Mithila's society. Through surnames such as Jha, Mishra, Pathak, Yadav, Paswan and Thakur, the poet shows people anxiously looking towards the saheb of their respective castes. He sharply ridicules the way people's prospects depend on a saheb's likes and dislikes.

'Pag' ('The Ceremonial Headgear'): The pag, a symbol of Mithila's honour and dignity, has now become little more than an object for display. The poet suggests placing it in a museum, since it no longer remains on people's heads for very long. This is a serious comment on the hollowness of tradition.

'Karyakarta' ('The Activist'): Depicting political decline, the poet asks where the activists have gone. All that remain, he suggests, are leaders, spectators and unthinking supporters. The definition 'An activist means a goal / in the face of a struggle' has now been forgotten.

'Sarvasammati Banayabak Kramme' ('In the Process of Manufacturing Consensus'): The poet opposes the deprivation carried out in the name of unanimity within a democracy. In his view, consensus can sometimes become a devious means of strangling democracy itself.

3. Innovation in Symbols and Imagery

'Transformer': The poet is skilled in his use of modern imagery. In this poem he explains the balanced coordination of society through conductors and insulators. His ability to see how an ordinary insulating object made of porcelain protects a system from unwanted current reveals an innovative poetic vision.

'Pahar: Ekta Sambhavana' ('Mountain: A Possibility'): The poet sees the mountain not merely as an obstacle but as an 'established adversary'. Only when an enormous opposition confronts us does the possibility of overcoming it arise.

'Phukna' ('The Inflated Thing'): The poem symbolises fanciful schemes and the collapse of dreams. When every feat depends solely on air, its eventual collapse is only natural.

4. Village, Nature and Geography

'Dhar Basabait Rahalae Gam' ('The River's Course Kept Founding Villages'): The poet connects the changing courses of Mithila's rivers with the continuity of life. Where a river's course destroys one village, it also brings another into being. 'The current kept founding villages / and, having founded them, moved on' captures Mithila's enduring reality.

'Pokhari' ('The Pond', sequence 5–8): Ponds, the lifeblood of Mithila, have become dumping grounds for rubbish. The poet is distressed by the silence of both administrators and the public. In the decline of the pond, he depicts the decline of village civilization itself.

'I Chhot-Chhin Gachh' ('This Little Tree'): This poem expresses the poet's faith in the future. So long as leaves remain on the tree, the sign of life remains secure.

5. Global and Philosophical Consciousness

'Jerusalem': This poem expresses the poet's concern about conflict across the world. Rather than asking whom Jerusalem should belong to, the poet advocates 'fighting for everyone's rights'.

'Itihas Kahalak' ('History Said') and 'Itihasak Ijotme' ('In the Light of History'): The poet does not regard history as a weapon for disputes and quarrels. In 'In the Light of History', he admits that it is we ourselves who stand in the dock of history, and accepting our mistakes is the way to do justice to the past.

'Naitikatak Deharipar' ('On the Threshold of Morality'): This poem portrays the way modern technology and the mechanical eye—CCTV and similar devices—have pushed human morality aside. Machines themselves are not subject to moral questioning.

6. The Anguish of Emergency and Displacement

'Ehi Aapatkalme' ('During This Emergency', parts 1–2): This poem is an epic of the suffering endured by migrant workers during the coronavirus period. When great cities discarded the very people who had built them, treating them as flies to be flicked out of milk, the workers' feet endured innumerable hardships on the way back to their native soil. How bitterly ironic was the injunction 'Stay at home! / Stay at home! The mantra of staying at home' for those whose only home in the metropolis was a rented kholi, from which they were driven out when they could no longer pay the rent.

'Hamhu Rahab Etahi' ('I Too Shall Live Here'): This poem asserts the right of other living creatures, no less than humans, to inhabit the earth. Destroying nature in the name of development is an invitation to our own destruction.

Craft, Language and the Arrangement of Images

Gopal Jha 'Abhishek' shapes his poetry to suit its subject matter. His language is 'unaffected', without any attempt at a display of erudition. He uses words drawn from ordinary village speech in such a way that they acquire a distinctive force.

Distinctive Features of the Language:

Aspect — Characteristic

Choice of words — An appealing use of unforced, familiar and village vocabulary [1]

Metre — Most poems are in free verse, an appropriate form for expressing modern sensibility

Imagery — Innovative images such as the transformer, the inflated object, the pothole in the road and the manhole

Satire — Sharp, penetrating satire directed at social and political contradictions

One of the great strengths of Abhishek's poetry is its ability to communicate. He brings even the most complex subjects to his readers in an exceptionally simple manner. His poems are marked by the predominance of prasada-guna, the quality of clarity and accessibility, which makes an immediate impression on readers.

Thematic Classification of the Poetry Collection

For ease of study, the collection's poems may be divided into the following categories.

Category — Principal Poems

Human sensibility — 'Antim Aas', 'Kona Paratarab He Tathagat', 'Dosare Din Jakan', 'Pradyumna'

Social reality — 'Pag', 'Saheb', 'Jati', 'Bhinne Bathan', 'Vyatha-Katha'

Political consciousness — 'Lakshagriha', 'Karyakarta', 'Sarvasammati', 'Antim Charanak Chunav'

Nature and geography — 'Dhar Basabait Rahalae Gam', 'Pokhari', 'I Chhot-Chhin Gachh'

Love and domestic life — ‘Tahi Bich’, ‘Prem Sang’, ‘Grihasthi’, ‘Ahank Bahanne’

Modernity and contradiction — ‘Transformer’, ‘Dilli Darshan’, ‘Naitikatak Deharipar’, ‘Sarak-Samved’

Major Philosophical and Intellectual Questions

Aau Swapna Sajhi Kari is not merely a collection of poems; it is also a serious philosophical discussion.

1. Poetry as resistance: Abhishek's poetry speaks in a ‘firm voice of resistance’ against injustice. He does not favour passive submission to wrongdoing. In ‘Kono Devasur Sangramak Nahi Banab Sakshi’ (‘I Shall Not Be a Witness to Any War of Gods and Demons’), he makes clear that he will not participate in any war imposed upon him. Rather, he will decide whom to support solely by the criterion of ‘justice and injustice’.

2. Women's consciousness: The poet calls for women's views to be heard and their participation to be ensured. The poem ‘Ek Ber Puchhi Ta Liau’ (‘At Least Ask Her Once’) respects women's power to make decisions.

3. Historical consciousness: As a student of history, the poet knows that pride in a glorious past is not enough. In ‘Takare Ho Jirnoddhar’ (‘Let That Be Restored’), he advocates discarding traditions that are no longer appropriate and preserving those that are worthwhile.

4. Concern for democracy: Poems such as ‘Janata-Forum’ and ‘Antim Charanak Chunavsa Pahine’ (‘Before the Final Phase of the Election’) reveal the poet's anxiety over the public humiliation of democracy and the construction of a lakshagriha, a house of lacquer set as a deadly trap.

Assessing Abhishek's Contribution to Maithili Literature

In the present period of Maithili literature, Gopal Jha ‘Abhishek’ is a poet who connects his language to global concerns. When Maithili poetry was accused of remaining confined to village verandas and ponds, Abhishek made Jerusalem, the prime minister of New Zealand and global technology subjects of his poems.

His poems are descriptive in style and provide substantial information about their subjects. His observational gaze is clear, and he is closely acquainted with the disorderly conditions of village life. At the level of language, he is notably alert and careful, giving his poetry both a ‘modern outlook’ and a ‘world view’.

Conclusion

The collection Aau Swapna Sajhi Kari brings to light a vibrant aspect of Maithili poetry. It testifies to the poet's sensitivity, intellectual resolve and command of language. Alongside its hard-hitting attacks on the contradictions of the present, Abhishek's poetry affirms the resolve to dream of a better future and to share those dreams.

Aau Swapna Sajhi Kari: Philosophical and Linguistic Examination

This work by Gopal Jha 'Abhishek' is not merely an outpouring of feeling. It is a complex samsarga, or conjunction, of word and meaning, in which the local life of Mithila and a global consciousness flow in parallel.

1. An Assessment Through Gangesha's Navya-Nyaya and the Criterion of Avacchedakata

The principal aim of Navya-Nyaya, developed by Gangesha Upadhyaya in the fourteenth century, was to remove ambiguity from language and render its expression more precise.

The delimitation of dreams: In the collection's title, Aau Swapna Sajhi Kari, the 'dream' is not merely an imaginary 'content' (vishayata, contentness). From the perspective of Nyaya philosophy, the dream here is kartritva-avacchinna, delimited by agency. For the poet, the dream is a sadhya, something to be accomplished, pervaded by the hetu, or reason, of manukhtai (humanity). When he says, 'Come, let us share our dreams', he releases the dream from narrow individuality and makes it samuhikata-avacchinna, delimited by collectivity.

'Transformer' and samsargata: In Abhishek's poem 'Transformer', the coordination of society is explained through the conductors and insulators of electricity. According to the Navya-Nyaya concept of samsargata (relationship), a society's existence depends upon a particular relation in which the 'insulator' (ordinary people) becomes the pratiyogi (counter-positive) that stops an unwanted 'current'. Here the distinctiveness of an energised society lies in balanced coordination.

2. Harimohan Jha's Framework of 'Linguistic Analysis'

According to Professor Harimohan Jha, words have three powers: abhidha (primary denotation), lakshana (secondary indication) and vyanjana (suggestion).

The use of lakshana: This can be observed in poems such as 'Saheb' and 'Pag'. When the poet speaks of placing the pag in a museum, the headgear leaves behind its primary denotation (abhidha) and conveys the indicated meaning (lakshyartha) of a rigid attachment to the past.

The intensity of vyanjana: In the context of New Zealand's prime minister, to call woman 'the last hope' in the poem 'Antim Aas' is an instance of purposive indication (prayojanavati lakshana), suggesting that compassion alone can offer protection in a global crisis. According to Harimohan Jha's theory of shabda-bodha, or verbal cognition, the power of the word here awakens a new samskara, or impression, in the reader.

3. The Videha Parallel History Framework (Gajendra Thakur)

The Videha framework views literature in terms of an ideological struggle between 'power' and 'the dispossessed'.

The voice of the dispossessed: The sequence 'Ehi Aapatkalme' sketches a 'parallel history' of migrant workers during the coronavirus period. While mainstream history was recording 'statistics', Abhishek's poetry was transforming the pain of the 'dispossessed' into an 'actual philology'.

Historical consciousness: In 'Itihas Kahalak' and 'Itihasak Ijotme', the poet regards history not as 'evidence for a quarrel' but as a 'new chapter of revival'. This accords with the Videha perspective that knowledge and truth are 'constructed' (a Foucauldian perspective), and that poetry gives such truth a new form.

4. The Convergence of Indian and Western Critical Theories

Indian poetics (rasa and dhvani): Abhishek's poetry is characterised chiefly by prasada-guna, the quality that makes meaning readily accessible to the reader. In 'Kona Paratarab He Tathagat', karuna-rasa, the sentiment of compassion or pathos, reaches its height. Unlike Western 'tragedy', compassion here does not stop at grief: it makes a reasoned demand for 'medical research'. This is an appealing synthesis of Indian nyaya and Western scientific rationalism.

Modernity versus tradition: For Abhishek, 'modernity' in Western criticism is not something to be imitated; it is an attitude to life. To call the mountain an 'established adversary' in 'Pahar: Ekta Sambhavana' is to bring Hegelian dialectics into relation with the 'patience' of Indian philosophy.

Conclusion

In its account of verbal cognition (shabda-bodha), Aau Swapna Sajhi Kari resembles an 'indivisible sentence-sphota' (akhanda-vakya-sphota): each poem stands apart, yet together the poems constitute a complete discourse of manukhtai (humanity). The precision of Navya-Nyaya, the linguistic depth associated with Harimohan Jha, and Videha's parallel-historical perspective establish the book as an enduring document of Maithili literature.

This collection deserves to be read not only by readers of Maithili but by lovers of literature everywhere. Abhishek's poetry connects readers readily to its subjects and compels them to reflect. In short, Aau Swapna Sajhi Kari is a 'witness' that speaks the truth of its times without fear.

Abstract

An adequate criticism of Maithili narrative literature cannot rest on a synopsis, an inventory of a character's virtues and faults, or an account of the work's social message alone. What kind of world of events does a story create? How does narration order, restrict, elaborate, or fragment that world? Beyond the meaning stated in words, what suggestions (dhvani), aesthetic experiences (rasa), and further significations arise? And on what sources do a novel's historical and social claims depend? These are distinct yet interconnected questions. This essay develops a proposed method of Maithili literary criticism called "Evidence-Parity and Parallel Narratology." It rests upon three foundations: the examination of aesthetic form and experience derived from Indian poetics; conceptual precision, distinctions among means of knowledge, and the scrutiny of inference inspired by Gangeśa Upādhyāya's Navya-Nyāya; and the multiple sources, multiple voices, examination of silences, and uniform critical standards of the Videha perspective on parallel history. The distinctions of modern narratology—story and discourse, temporal order, duration, frequency, focalisation, narrator, narrative level, eventfulness, character networks, space, language, generic hybridity, the reader, and movement between media—become operative instruments within this threefold confluence. The method does not treat literary invention as historical documentation: truth within the story-world, textual evidence, and external historical truth are separate domains of inquiry. The essay provides analytical principles, a working procedure, a chapter-by-chapter assessment form, an event register, tests of counterarguments, an invented illustrative example, and a glossary. Its purpose is not to impose a single final verdict, but to make possible a criticism that is verifiable, open to re-examination, aesthetically sensitive, and socially responsible.

Keywords: narratology; Maithili; rasa; dhvani; vakrokti; aucitya; Navya-Nyāya; pramāṇa; vyāpti; avacchedaka; Videha; parallel history; narrative time; focalisation; polyphony.

1. Introduction: From Reviewing Stories to Examining Narrative

Maithili possesses a long tradition of stories, novels, folk ballads, narrative poetry, autobiography, and oral storytelling. Yet when a review of a novel stops at saying "the subject is excellent," "the characters are impressive," or "the author has portrayed social reality," it cannot explain to the reader which operations of literary craft produce the work's effect, which events alter the reader's expectations, or which narrative choices render other possibilities invisible. Nor is the mere translation of a European narratological vocabulary sufficient to remedy this deficiency.

The premise of the present proposal is that a literary narrative is simultaneously a constructed world, an arrangement of telling, a composition grounded in felt experience, and a textual intervention available within society. Each of these four dimensions requires a distinct point of entry into analysis. A character's statement may seem entirely credible in literary terms, but that character's account of history does not thereby become evidence of actual history. Equally, a voice missing from the archive may remain unheard within the story, but neither an author's intention nor an actual event can be inferred with certainty from absence alone.

This method is not merely a "mixture" of established disciplines. Its central task is to regulate the possible conflicts among them. The theory of rasa asks: how is an experience aesthetically realised? Narratology asks: from whose perspective, and in what order, is information imparted? Criticism inspired by Navya-Nyāya asks: on what grounds does this conclusion stand, and under what conditions could it fail? Parallel history asks: whose voices have been preserved, whose have not, and how does inequality in the preservation of sources affect the conclusions reached?

The term “evidence-parity” expresses an ethical and scholarly demand: claims made by the powerful or the neglected, claims favoured by the storyteller or preferred by the critic, must all be subjected to explicit and equally examined rules of evidence. “Parallel” does not mean merely adding names from the margins to an established central list. It means reading together the many simultaneous currents of story-making, social causation, focalisation, and the distribution of archives, with attention to their mutual effects. The proposed designation names a new method; it is not the name of an established school propounded by an ancient master.

2. Definition, Scope, and Fundamental Propositions

2.1 Story, Telling, and Narrative

By “story” is meant the possible sequence of states, events, agents, causes, and consequences occurring in an imagined or recounted world. “Telling” is the process by which a speaker, medium, or text presents this material to someone. “Narrative” is the total configuration within which material, selection, sequence, focalisation, language, silence, the reader's inferences, and cultural signs operate together. Distinguishing these three terms prevents “what happened?” from being confused with “how was it told?”

The chronology of a story may be: “First the embankment was built, then the flood came, and finally people fled.” The telling, however, may begin with the flight and only afterwards unfold the remembered history of the embankment. The difference between the sequence of events and the sequence of their narration is an active source of meaning; it ought not to be dismissed as merely “an interesting way of telling it.”

2.2 Four Kinds of Truth-Claim

First, the textual fact: which words, events, references, or statements occur in the printed text and can be identified by page or paragraph. Second, the story-world fact: which event is taken to have occurred within the work, a determination that may depend on the narrator's reliability and the information available to the reader. Third, the interpretative claim: a critical inference concerning symbols, implied meanings, a character's motives, or rasa, for which more than one defensible reading may be possible. Fourth, the external historical claim: a statement about an event, date, institution, social statistic, or document beyond the work; this requires independent sources and source criticism.

If a novel says “one hundred ponds dried up,” that can be a textual fact. Whether so many ponds actually dried up within the story, or whether the narrator exaggerated, is a question of internal reliability. Whether that number of ponds really dried up in the region during the year in question depends on external sources. Distinct conclusions and distinct markers of uncertainty should be maintained at all four levels.

2.3 Seven Propositions of the Method

One: an assessment of artistic meaning is incomplete without an examination of the mode of narration. Two: an interpretation cannot be decisive unless it exhibits textual evidence. Three: affective experience must not be reduced to mechanical counting. Four: truth internal to the story and truth about external history are different. Five: the investigation of multiple voices, silence, and social location must remain connected to close reading. Six: the limits of each inference, its counterexamples, and its possible qualifying conditions must be stated. Seven: the critic should disclose their own standpoint, selections, evidentiary sources, and openness to revision.

3. Aesthetic Examination Derived from Indian Poetics

3.1 Rasa: The Organisation of Feeling, Not Merely the Naming of an Emotion

Bharata Muni's theory of rasa is to be employed to examine the affective organisation of a story. Questions about the production of rasa are to be raised through the relationships among vibhāva (determinants), anubhāva (consequent manifestations), vyabhicāri-bhāva (transitory states), and sthāyi-bhāva (enduring emotion). The mere description of suffering does not automatically establish karuṇa rasa, the aesthetic experience of compassion or pathos. It is necessary to investigate how the reader comes to apprehend the character's condition, the arrangement of the scene, rhythm, pauses, expectation, and the transformation of feeling.

It would be improper to prescribe a single “correct” readerly experience of rasa. A reader's familiarity with the language, caste and social position, memories, age, and sensibility can alter the experience. Amid these differences, the critic can establish which affective possibilities the text activates, which scenes or sentences provide their basis, and what alternative readings remain possible.

3.2 Dhvani: The Resonance Beyond What Is Said

Ānandavardhana's theory of dhvani provides a method for exploring meanings suggested by the text beyond its directly denoted meaning. For instance, a “receipt for water tax” hanging at a dried-up river landing is not merely a piece of administrative paper; it may suggest the irony of labour and entitlement. But a critic proposing such a dhvani should exhibit other contexts in the text, recurring images, and contrary indications, rather than simply projecting a desired politics onto the scene.

Dhvani is not the same as inference in Navya-Nyāya. It can disclose an aesthetic and symbolic possibility; an historical conclusion requires additional documents. “This scene evokes a suggestion of exploitation” and “in a particular year a particular revenue department committed exploitation” are statements bearing different burdens of proof.

3.3 Vakrokti, Rīti, Guṇa, and Alaṅkāra

Kuntaka's account of vakrokti provides grounds for considering unusual oblique configurations of words, sentences, contexts, plots, and entire compositions. A character's unexpected reply, reversed order in a description, the narrator's ironic distance, the length of a sentence, or even silence may generate an effect resembling vakrokti; but not every oddity amounts to artistic achievement. An examination of rīti should attend to ṭheṭhī speech, dialect, scholarly terminology, folk rhythms, differences of linguistic register, and tone appropriate to the occasion. Analysis of guṇa and alaṅkāra should be related to the movement of events or the communication of feeling; merely counting similes and metaphors is not the object.

3.4 The Duality of Propriety and Impropriety

Kṣemendra's thought on aucitya raises questions about the mutual appropriateness of character, language, place and time, purpose, rasa, and the arrangement of scenes. A modern novel, however, may deliberately violate propriety to create dissonance, deviation, irony, or resistance. The method must therefore retain two questions: (a) which arrangements are consistent with the work's internal rules? and (b) which violations of those rules serve a conscious artistic purpose? Criticism must not turn into a traditionalist injunction by calling entrenched restrictions of class, caste, or gender “propriety.”

3.5 The Sensitive Reader, Universalisation, and the Dissenting Reader

To be a sahṛdaya, a responsive reader, is not to agree in advance with the critic's preferred interpretation; it is to possess the critical capacity to enter the text's affective and imaginative situation. A scene of cruelty may generate separate perspectives for the victim, the perpetrator, and the bystander. Discussion of sādhāraṇīkaraṇa (universalisation) must not erase the distinctive historical experience of a person in the name of making it universal. The singularity of the victim's voice and the possibility of a shared understanding must both remain visible.

4. An Examination of Evidence Inspired by Navya-Nyāya

4.1 Inspiration and Limits

Gangeśa Upādhyāya's Tattvacintāmaṇi considers four pramāṇas, or means of valid cognition: perception (pratyakṣa), inference (anumāna), comparison (upamāna), and verbal testimony (śabda). The process of criticism proposed here draws inspiration from the conceptual discipline of that tradition; literary criticism is not being declared literally identical to the Navya-Nyāya doctrine of the Tattvacintāmaṇi. Literary interpretation is not always decisive in the manner of proving a proposition. Preserving this distinction is a precautionary rule.

4.2 Pakṣa, Sādhya, Hetu, and Dṛṣṭānta

The critic should first establish the pakṣa, the subject under consideration: the whole novel, a particular chapter, a narrative strand, or a given passage? Next comes the sādhya: what is to be established? “In Chapter 12 the narrator becomes unreliable” is a proposition capable of examination. Then comes the hetu, the reason: two contradictory accounts of the same event, the narrator's self-interest, a subsequent correction within the text, and so on. The dṛṣṭānta is a second instance employing a comparable compositional device. Without a clearly determined pakṣa, a sweeping judgement such as “this novel is consistently hostile to women” may be unsound.

4.3 Vyāpti, Upādhi, and Fallacies of Reasoning

A critic should not propose the universal relation (vyāpti) that “wherever a first-person narrative occurs, the narrator is unreliable”; innumerable counterexamples would defeat it. A more careful formulation is: “Where a narrator's significant claims systematically conflict with reliable textual evidence available to the reader, a reading in terms of unreliability becomes possible.” Even then, possible qualifications (upādhi) must be examined: the limits of the reader's knowledge, dreams, irony, translation, or shifts in chronology.

Criticism inspired by the Navya-Nyāya tradition should ask whether a reason is established (hetusiddhi): is the supposed indication actually present in the text? Savyabhicāra: does this indication occur in other circumstances too? Viruddha: does the evidence instead support the opposite conclusion? Asiddha: is the basis itself imagined? Bādhita: does later explicit information invalidate an earlier conclusion? The aim of such tests is not to display impressive terminology but to expose faults in reasoning.

4.4 Avacchedaka: Making the Limits of a Claim Explicit Avacchedaka is useful here as a discipline for delimiting analysis. Before declaring "folk speech is absent from the entire work," it is essential to specify the definition of "folk speech," the distinction between the storyteller's language and characters' dialogue, the manuscript or edition consulted, the sample, and the chapters covered. To say "in the narrator's descriptions in these ten chapters" produces a narrower and more testable claim.

Complex Navya-Nyāya terminology relating to delimited subjects, relations, and properties should not be imposed needlessly upon narrative criticism. The basic rule is simple: about whom is the claim made, concerning which quality, in what relation, and within what temporal limits?

4.5 A Critical Reconfiguration of the Four Pramāṇas

Textual observation analogous to perception: direct inspection of words, sequence, titles, dialogue, and variant readings in manuscripts. This is not literally equivalent to perception in classical Navya-Nyāya; it names primary visual and textual observation in criticism. Inference: a provisional conclusion about narrative technique, character motivation, or implicit ideas drawn from textual evidence. Comparison: a careful analogy with another work, folktale, historical tradition, or epic, in which differences are recorded alongside similarities. Verbal testimony: evaluation of an author's preface, letters, interviews, historical statements, and published sources; the speaker's credibility, context, and interests require independent scrutiny.

Dialogue spoken by a fictional character is not in itself verbal testimony concerning real history, though it may function as reported evidence within the story-world. An author's account of their own intentions may likewise be evidence of those intentions without being the final arbiter of the meanings available in the text. Where sufficient evidence is unavailable, the critic should employ explicit terms of judgement such as "unknown," "possible," "disputed," and "unsupported."

4.6 Pūrvapakṣa, Uttarapakṣa, and Revisable Conclusions

Every significant interpretation should be accompanied by a cogent pūrvapakṣa, or opposing position: how might another critic read the same scene? In the uttarapakṣa, the response, the actual evidence for this alternative reading must be examined. The surviving conclusion should then be assigned an appropriate degree of confidence; "beyond doubt" is warranted only when the kind of evidence permits it. The critic's favoured ethical standpoint is no substitute for establishing the grounds of an inference.

5. The Critical Adaptation of Videha's Parallel-History Perspective

5.1 The Expansion and Differentiation of Sources

Videha's "parallel-history perspective" accommodates personal letters, songs, genealogical registers, maps, women's domestic writing, local testimony, and oral memory alongside official documents; nevertheless, every source must be questioned as to its nature, date, purpose, and limits. Applied to narratology, this means examining the historical and social position of those whom the novel allows to speak, as well as those whose traces are not fully present. Documentary evidence and fictional invention, however, must not be treated as interchangeable.

5.2 Multiple Voices, Multiple Temporalities, and Multiple Regions

Parallelism is not merely a list of voices present in a single story: the state, cultivators, fishers, women, migrants, children, disadvantaged castes, linguistic borderlands, and communities across national borders. Analysis should ask who makes decisions; who must perform the labour; on whom the consequences fall; whose dialect is designated as standard in the narration; and whose experience is turned into a fixed category called "the folk." Historical time, the cycle of seasons, memory, generational time, river time, and the time of displacement should be distinguished.

5.3 Silence: The Absence of Evidence and Its Narrative Function

The absence of a character may be related to three possibilities: the author's choice, the narrator's limited knowledge, or the structure of power within the fictional world. It would be wrong to select just one without examination. A second level of "silence" comprises what the novel itself leaves unsaid and what the reader infers. A third consists of absence from actual historical archives. These three silences must not be conflated. A fundamental standard of parallel history is that empty spaces should not be filled with invention.

5.4 The Making and Preservation of Archives and the Digital Text

The critic should investigate editions, dates of publication, authorial revisions, changes of script, printing errors, errors in digitised texts, oral adaptations, and the translator's role. The unavailability of material in Maithili's Tirhuta, Devanagari, and other script traditions is not conclusive evidence of its absence from literature. Finding an online copy on several websites does not establish the existence of three independent sources; all the copies may have originated from a single scan.

5.5 The Ethics of History and the Critic's Self-Examination

A claim by a celebrated mainstream author is not true simply because of that author's prestige. A claim arising from a marginalised account is not true merely because of its neglect. If the critic identifies a lack of social representation, evidence for that assessment must be sought in the text. A more important question is whether a character belonging to a particular group remains merely an entry in a catalogue of atrocities, or possesses desires, initiative, contradictions, and a perspective of their own. Recognising historical injustice must not entail erasing literary creativity.

6. The Full Analytical Scope of Narratology

6.1 Story-World, States, and Eventfulness

At the outset, a map should be prepared of characters, places, relationships, resources, power, and potential crises. An event does not simply mean that "something happened": did a state of affairs change? The relevance, unexpectedness, consequences, irreversibility, and non-repeatability of that change should be examined. A small event—a prohibition on fishing at a river landing—may transform the entire structure of a village; an immense war may occupy a long stretch of description without altering the relationships between characters. The number of events and their narrative significance are two different measures.

6.2 Story Sequence and Narrative Sequence

Wherever possible, construct separate timelines: in what order did events occur in the story-world, and in what order were they narrated to the reader? Identify analepses, anticipations, retellings of the same event, delayed revelations, temporal discrepancies, and concealed disruptions of chronology. Consider the effect of a break in narrative order: mystery, irony, grief, attribution of blame, or the rewriting of history. Rather than merely labelling every retrospective passage a "flashback," explain its cause and effect.

6.3 Duration, Pace, and Pause

A hundred pages devoted to one day in the story-world and two sentences to two decades constitute a meaningful disproportion. Distinguish scene, summary, elaboration, descriptive pause, ellipsis, and narrative acceleration. In assessing density, record separately the number of words, decisive changes, networks of causation, transformations of character, and emotional depth. More words do not necessarily mean more events; more events do not necessarily mean greater literary excellence. Both equations are mistaken.

6.4 Frequency and the Return of Memory

Identify three tendencies: narrating once an event that occurred once; narrating repeatedly an event that occurred once; and recounting in a single collective statement events that occurred repeatedly. If a labourer, an official, and a young girl recount the memory of the same flood differently, the shared event becomes evidence of plural perspectives. Yet meaningless duplication of the same sentence is not artistic narrative repetition; a purpose is required to distinguish one from the other.

6.5 Narrator, Narrative Level, and Reliability

Who speaks? An external narrator, an internal character, the writer of a letter, a voice in a dream, and the collective voice of a folk song belong to different levels and should be identified separately. “Author” and “narrator” are not the same. Does the narrator participate in the events, or stand outside them? When is the narration undertaken—before, during, or after the events? What is the extent of the narrator's knowledge? Demonstrating unreliability requires contradiction in the telling, limitations of perspective, self-interest, or corrections made within the text; the mere use of the first person is insufficient.

6.6 Focalisation and the Distribution of Knowledge

Alongside “who sees?” ask “who understands?” and “who receives which information?” An event looks different through the eyes of an elite character, through a boatman's embodied experience, and through a child's partial knowledge. Map internal, external, shifting, collective, and uncorroborated focal positions. Discrepancies between what the narrator knows and what a character knows produce irony, mystery, and empathy.

6.7 Character: Not an Inventory of Names but a Network of Actions

Beyond counting characters' social identities, ancestry, or caste, identify their goals, obstacles, choices, capacity for action, contradictions, changing relationships, and development over narrative time. Is a supporting character merely an instrument for the protagonist's development? Does women's labour become visible only during dramatic crises, or also at points where decisions are made? Reducing the complexity of a life to a single moral attribute may indicate weakness in characterisation. Identify a character's silences, actions, and undisclosed desires only where the text provides a basis for doing so.

6.8 Causation, Coincidence, Conflict, and Resolution

Record the causal chain of every decisive event without forcibly imposing a single cause. Natural disasters, government, divisions of labour, family decisions, chance, and memory may interact. A conflict's resolution may be direct, partial, adverse, delayed, or left undecided. Indeterminacy is not automatically a defect of composition; it may also be a device for keeping an artistic question open.

6.9 Space, Rivers, Environment, and the World of Objects

Villages, ponds, houses, cremation grounds, fields, roads, borders, and cities are not mere decoration. Space transforms characters' access, labour, fear, caste divisions, and rights. River water, silt, flooding, aquatic life, water taxes, irrigation, and drainage are at once geography and society. Before making a symbolic assertion such as "the river itself is the narrator," examine what kind of linguistic agency the text grants the river. If a geographical fact is required, obtain an independent map or environmental study.

6.10 Dialogue, Linguistic Registers, and Grammatical Perspective

Who is allowed complete sentences in dialogue, and who appears only in quotation? Do standard Maithili, ṭheṭhī, Angika, Bajjika, regional varieties from Nepal, specialised language, or mixtures of other languages reveal a character's class position, relationships, and power, or do they reinforce stereotypes? Before treating a colloquial form as an "error," examine the author's craft, the character's voice, and the edition in question. Linguistic variation is not merely a diversity of colour; it may be an instrument for distributing narrative authority.

6.11 Consciousness, Dream, Memory, and Interior Dialogue

Distinguish the narrative authority of direct speech, indirect discourse, free indirect discourse, stream of consciousness, fragments of memory, and dreams. It is a mistake either to treat a dream sequence as an actual event in the fictional world without justification, or to regard a deliberate temporal discrepancy as an authorial blunder. Maintain a distance between the truth-value of what a character thinks and what the narrative itself confirms.

6.12 Symbol, Myth, Intertextuality, and Reconfiguration

A narrative may enter into dialogue with the Rāmāyaṇa, the Mahābhārata, Bhāmatī, the Nyāya tradition, local deities, ballads, idioms, folk theatre, and philosophical concepts. The examination of intertextuality must look beyond the mere occurrence of a name to the direction of its transformation, its departure from the original context, its function in the present setting, and the signs available to readers. The fact that a character is named “Draupadī” does not by itself establish an allegory of the entire Mahābhārata; decisive parallel contexts are needed.

6.13 The Marvellous, the Impossible, and Magical Realism

First identify the rules of the fictional world. The dead speak, a river remembers, time becomes cyclical: these are not necessarily indications of inconsistency on the author's part; they may be alternative rules governing the work's world. The marvellous rasa, supernatural folk belief, an unreliable narrator, a dream, a metaphor, and magical realism should not all be placed in a single category. Examine what changes an impossible event brings about in characters' behaviour and the social structure.

6.14 Structure, Subplots, and Long-Form Narrative

In a very long novel, map the principal narrative strands, subsidiary strands, periods of time, generations, locations, and groups of characters. The number of chapters does not prove literary unity. At what point does a subplot connect with the central conflict? Does it enter into dialogue with another subplot, or merely continue to unfold alongside it? Examine returns, cycles that change as they recur, climaxes, secondary climaxes, extended epilogues, and unresolved strands.

6.15 Rhythm, Imagery, Sound Structure, and Readerly Expectation

Examine the breathing of sentences, the rhythm of dialogue, the pace of description, phonetic recurrence, silence, the pause at the end of a chapter, and how these relate to the expectations created by its title. A brief scene may produce an expansive emotional effect; an extended description may also provoke resistance in the reader. Claims about readerly effects must be substantiated with specific linguistic devices; otherwise avoid universal statements such as “all readers weep.”

6.16 Reader, Genre, Edition, and Medium

A work may take different forms as an oral performance, printed book, electronic text, audiobook, translation, or edition for young readers. Each medium presents different conditions of reception: page divisions, pronunciation, voice, illustrations, chapter numbering, and reader accessibility. How does a translation transmit narrative focalisation, local forms of address, intimations of rasa, and linguistic differences that carry social significance? When comparing editions, make clear which original text is the basis of comparison.

6.17 Social Power and Narratives of Resistance

Read distinctions of caste, class, gender, occupation, religion, embodiment, disability, age, family, migration, and digital access not merely as a list of themes but as narrative actions. Whose desires advance the plot? Whose labour is made visible? Who is given the opportunity to determine an outcome? The storyteller's social commitments may be important, but they cannot replace scrutiny of artistic justice, the causation of events, and the complexity of characters.

6.18 Suffering, Violence, and the Ethics of Representation

Where rape, caste humiliation, suicide, suffering inflicted on children, displacement, violence, or death is depicted, examine the scene's function, the victim's autonomy, the affective burden placed upon the reader, and the risk of sensationalism. A greater quantity of gruesome detail should not automatically be proclaimed "fearless realism." Wherever possible, the critic should attend to the victim's perspective, the consequences, and processes of reconstruction rather than making the victim an object once more. The literary necessity of a disturbing scene and its public responsibility are distinct questions.

7. Three-Tier Examination and an Integrated Critical Formula

Table 1. Questions and Evidence in the Three-Part Method

Basis of examination	Principal question	Admissible evidence	Essential caution
Indian poetics	How does the narrative create rasa, suggestion, and obliqueness?	Language, scenes, symbols, rhythm, and the reader's possible experience	Do not impose a single emotional response upon the reader.
Navya-Nyāya-inspired inquiry	What are the subject, reasons, limits, and counterarguments of a claim?	Textual location, variant readings, counterexamples, and independent references	Do not treat literary inference as mathematical proof.
Parallel history	Whose voice, archive, labour, and silence are decisive?	The network of textual perspectives, provenance of sources, and social context	Do not fill evidentiary absences with invention.

In examining a scene or chapter, the critic should first undertake a compositional examination: event, narrator, focalisation, time, language, symbol, rasa, dhvani, aucitya, and the dynamics of readerly response. This should be followed by an evidentiary examination: the textual grounds of a stated conclusion, the limits of the claim, contrary evidence, sources for historical contexts, and uncertainty. Finally comes a parallel examination: the relationships between centre and margin, voice and silence, archive and memory, region and border, labour and power, and class, caste, and gender. The findings of all three stages should be recorded separately before a combined judgement is offered.

The proposed critical formula is: adequate evaluation of narrative = analysis of textual construction + conclusions bounded by evidence + multisource sociohistorical examination + reconsideration receptive to opposing arguments. This is not an arithmetic equation; it is a formula indicating the division of critical labour. Its components function as mutual conditions, but no component replaces another. In particular, a high assessment of social representation does not automatically turn poor craftsmanship into excellence, and excellent craftsmanship does not transform a historically false claim into fact.

Behind every decisive critical statement, a "critical ledger" should be maintained: conclusion / textual location / type of evidence / alternative reading / contradictory evidence / level of confidence. Without such a ledger, criticism can become impressive oratory rather than research.

8. Practical Procedure: Sixteen Stages

Table 2. Principal Dimensions of Narrative Analysis

Dimension	Decisive question	Material for examination
Story-world	What is the initial state, and what rules govern it?	Information about the world available in the text
Eventfulness	Which change is decisive?	Prior and subsequent states; consequences
Order	How do story time and narrating time differ?	Two chronologies of events
Duration	Which episode is expanded or compressed?	Relationship of words to elapsed time
Frequency	How often is a single event narrated?	Locations of retelling
Narrator	Who speaks, and who is reliable?	Narratorial assertions and contradictions
Focalisation	Who knows how much?	Distribution of knowledge
Narrative level	How is one story embedded within another?	Letters, dreams, folk narratives
Character network	Who decides, and who bears the consequences?	Goals, acts, and relationships
Conflict and causation	Is an event produced by one cause or many?	Chains of cause and effect
Language and dialogue	Which voice uses which register?	Sentences, dialects, and silences
Rasa and dhvani	How are experience and implied meaning produced?	Scenes and recurring imagery
Vakrokti and aucitya	What purpose do configuration and departures from convention serve?	Linguistic and narrative deviations

Dimension	Decisive question	Material for examination
Space and environment	Does place act causally or serve as decoration?	Movement, resources, geography
Intertextuality	Which mythic or philosophical text is re-read, and how?	Related textual configurations
The marvellous and dream	Under what rules does an impossible occurrence take place?	Coherence within the story-world
Society and history	Whose archives and silences are represented?	Sources, positions, contexts
Reader and medium	How does adaptation change meaning?	Textual variants, audio rendition, translation

Stage 1—Establish the Text. Record the edition, publisher, year, sequence of chapters, language, and pagination used as the basis. Where a revised edition exists, preserve the differences.

Stage 2—Initial Reading of the Whole. Without imposing a synopsis or prior verdict, identify the central tensions, signals of genre, language, strategy of the opening, and nature of the ending.

Stage 3—Basic Counts. Where they can reasonably be measured, count chapters, parts, words, characters, places, proportions of dialogue, historical references, and fragments of memory. Make the distinction between computer-generated counts and human verification explicit.

Stage 4—Event Register. Prepare a separate entry for changes of state, causes, decisive importance, recurrence, and consequences in every chapter.

Stage 5—Dual Timeline. Separate story time from narrative time; mark memory, anticipation, pauses, summary, and repetition.

Stage 6—Map of Narrators and Perspectives. Record who spoke, from which narrative level, who saw, what information was concealed, and when it was disclosed.

Stage 7—Character Network. Map goals, decisions, relationships, social positions, agency, and change.

Stage 8—Examination of Rasa, Dhvani, and Vakrokti. Identify the linguistic foundations of major scenes, the process of affect, suggested meanings, and deliberate violations of aucitya.

Stage 9—Spatial and Environmental Examination. Examine the causal role of place, distribution of resources, weather, animals and birds, rivers, agriculture, cities, and migration.

Stage 10—Examination of Parallel Voices. Ask which groups are affected by decisions made within the central story, whose voices are absent, and through whose mediation each person's words are heard.

Stage 11—Classification of Claims. Mark each decisive conclusion as textual, story-world, interpretative, or external-historical.

Stage 12—Testing of Evidence. Examine page references, doubts, counterexamples, qualifying conditions, external sources, dates of references, and reliability.

Stage 13—Opposing Position. Write at least one strong alternative interpretation. Do not reduce it to a straw man.

Stage 14—Synthesis by Kāṇḍa or Part. Alongside chapter-level conclusions, examine changes across multiple strands, peaks, unresolved questions, and incompleteness.

Stage 15—Overall Assessment. Treat craft, rasa, meaning, social complexity, engagement with history, effects on readers, and limitations under separate headings; do not insist upon a universally accepted numerical score.

Stage 16—Audit and Revision. Record errors, limits of measurement, lack of sources, alternative interpretations, and the date of revision.

9. Rules of Evidence: Twelve Principles for the Critic

Principle 1—Primacy of the Text. For a claim concerning what occurs within the text, seek the first evidence in an identifiable passage of that text.

Principle 2—Distinction of Levels. Keep separate the narrator's statement, a character's belief, the author's intention, and historical truth.

Principle 3—Specification of Limits. Specify the scope of the proposition, chapters, edition, group of characters, and period concerned.

Principle 4—Soundness of Reasons. Verify that the grounds offered by the critic are actually present in the text.

Principle 5—Restraint in Generalisation. Do not formulate a universal literary rule from one or two examples.

Principle 6—Acceptance of Counterexamples. Do not conceal contrary passages; regard them as opportunities to revise the theory.

Principle 7—Consideration of Qualifications. Examine special conditions such as dreams, irony, local dialects, mythic worlds, and unreliable narrators.

Principle 8—Freedom of Rasa. Acknowledge the plurality of affective responses; readers' experiences must not be forced into a statistical measure.

Principle 9—Caution Concerning Silence. Regard silence as a question, not as direct proof of an unknown event.

Principle 10—Evidence-Parity. Examine claims made on behalf of the state, the folk, prestigious authors, Dalit communities, women, authors, and critics alike.

Principle 11—Multiple Causation. A single event may arise from several social, ecological, psychological, and artistic causes.

Principle 12—Revisability. Changing a conclusion when confronted with a new textual variant, document, or strong counterargument is a strength of criticism, not a defeat.

10. Application to a Constructed Illustration

10.1 The Illustration: The Landing and the Receipt

The following scene is a fictional example composed solely for this essay. It must not be taken as a quotation from any published novel: "The pond had dried up. Yet a receipt for water tax was still fluttering in the wind at the landing. Kamli picked up the receipt, but the name written on it was not hers. She said, 'I have paid the price of water; now who will pay the price of the earth?'"

Examination of story: the initial condition is the disappearance of a water resource; the event is Kamli's discovery of the receipt and her raising of a question; the change is that unspoken economic injustice acquires a public voice. Examination of telling: concise description, an object functioning as a sign, and the final question alter the pace of narration. Rasa and dhvani: the contrast between the dried-up pond and the still-valid receipt creates possibilities of compassion and irony; "the price of the earth" suggests labour, entitlement, and ecological loss. Evidence inspired by Navya-Nyāya: "the name was not hers" is a textual fact; "the receipt was forged" is an inference requiring further textual evidence. Parallel examination: who has the authority to issue the receipt, who bears the burden of water tax, and what is changed by the woman's voice? No conclusion concerning any real historical taxation system may be drawn from this invented scene.

10.2 The Opposing Case: Is This Merely a Symbol?

The pūrvapakṣa may maintain that the "dried-up pond" is not a symbol of social justice but merely a scenic detail. Rather than pronouncing a final verdict, the uttarapakṣa would investigate whether receipts, water, taxation, women's labour, land, or entitlement recur elsewhere in the work. If not, the symbolic interpretation remains possible but limited. If several coherent sequences of events and consequences develop these indications, the proposal gains strength. In this way, the poetics of dhvani and scepticism inspired by Navya-Nyāya become mutually productive.

11. Chapter-by-Chapter and Overall Examination of Long Novels

In examining a novel of several hundred thousand words, indiscriminately piling together every event, original sentence, and interpretation from every chapter makes the criticism itself unreadable. A four-level procedure should therefore be adopted: brief register → synthesis of narrative strands → synthesis of parts → argument concerning the work as a whole. In a chapter register, a factual account of 150–300 words may be sufficient, while chapters decisive in terms of eventfulness or technique may warrant 500–1,000 words of analysis. These figures are merely working suggestions; the limits should be adjusted to the actual complexity of the primary text.

Chapter-by-chapter criticism is not a "summary." It should record each chapter's purpose, its difference from the preceding state of affairs, narrative techniques, major evidence, rasa and dhvani, social location, counterarguments, and relation to the next chapter. An overall assessment is not merely the sum of chapter notes. It separately establishes the relationships among narrative strands, the development of recurring patterns, and the long-term ethical and aesthetic consequences of the story.

The counting method must be explicit when word counts, chapter counts, numbers of characters, or event density are measured. Does "word" mean a count based on spaces, a count after normalising compound forms, or a count following editorial cleaning? Have titles, the table of contents, footnotes, and appendices been counted? If a machine-readable text is unavailable, an estimated number should be described as an "estimate."

For event density, a diagnostic ratio such as "decisive changes of state per 10,000 words" may be useful; it is not, however, a ranking of artistic excellence. Read alongside that ratio the consequences of events, characters' agency, dramatic pauses, and transformations of rasa. One subtle but decisive event may be more powerful than ten ostentatious scenes.

12. Critical Judgement: Measurement, Limits, and Re-examination

Table 3. Four Types of Claim and Their Evidence

Type of claim	Example	Method of verification
Textual	A character spoke a particular sentence.	Check chapter, paragraph, and edition.
Story-world	Did the embankment really break, or was it the narrator's misperception?	Examine narrative level and subsequent confirmation.
Interpretative	The receipt suggests labour exploitation.	Test coherence of imagery and alternative interpretations.
External historical	A water tax was actually levied in a specified year.	Independent records, dates, and source criticism.

If numerical ratings are used in a table, let each criterion receive a score from zero to four for the level of textual support, not for artistic merit: 0 —no evidence; 1—scant or disputed evidence; 2—some examples; 3—several mutually consistent examples; 4—extensive evidence accompanied by an examination of counterarguments. “Not applicable” and “unknown” should remain distinct categories, not zero scores. If scores are weighted, the weights must be published beforehand rather than changed retrospectively to obtain a desired conclusion.

The final judgement should be written in four separate divisions: (a) artistic achievements and deficiencies; (b) strengths and tensions of narrative organisation; (c) the complexity, correspondence with sources, and limits of the social and historical imagination; and (d) the work's new contributions and subjects for future study. All-encompassing judgements such as “the greatest,” “a complete failure,” or “the reality of an entire society” require extraordinary comparative research. Otherwise, precise and bounded judgements are preferable.

The method has limits of its own. Not every dimension of poetic experience can be contained in a form. If the evidentiary language of Navya-Nyāya begins to erase creative uncertainty, its use should be suspended. If parallel history becomes a mechanical “representation score,” characters lose their artistic freedom. Other traditions—folk narrative, feminist and Dalit criticism, postcolonial and environmental approaches, cognitive narratology, and the narratology of the marvellous—may be brought into dialogue as necessary, but no single ideology should control all the meanings of a story.

13. Conclusion: Criticism as a Verifiable and Sensitive Discipline

Evidence-Parity and Parallel Narratology is a proposed research method for the criticism of Maithili narrative. It connects the story-world with the arrangement of narration, aesthetic experience with the discipline of evidence, and literature's centre with voices that are invisible or less often heard. Indian poetics opens up the work's rasa, dhvani, and obliqueness; analysis inspired by Navya-Nyāya identifies the limits, counterarguments, and errors of inference; the Videha parallel-history perspective makes criticism answerable to unequal archival preservation, silence, and the society disclosed by multiple sources.

What matters among these three foundations is not merely "harmony" but a productive tension. When rasa opens possibilities of implicit meaning, evidentiary examination prevents those possibilities from running away as historical facts. When the testing of evidence narrows the scope of a conclusion, the parallel perspective shows the still-unknown territory beyond it. When history brings social voices into view, narratology asks whether those voices change the structure of the work or merely extend its list of names.

The concluding principle is this: read the story; examine the telling; listen for rasa and dhvani; respect the limits of evidence; investigate the causes of silence; hear the opposing case; and keep open the possibility of testing conclusions anew. Through this discipline, an extensive, chapter-by-chapter, logically coherent, and aesthetically adequate criticism of Maithili narrative literature becomes possible.

Appendix A: Chapter-by-Chapter Critical Assessment Form

In each entry, reproduce the original book's chapter number and title exactly. A title devised by the critic should be identified separately.

Identification: book, edition, part, chapter, page range, word count, reader's circumstances.

State and event: initial state, decisive event, change of state, consequences, unresolved questions.

Narration: story time, narrative order, duration, frequency, narrator, level, focalisation, mystery.

Composition: character network, dialogue, language, space, imagery, rasa, dhvani, vakrokti, aucitya, or deliberate violation of propriety.

Parallel dimensions: power, labour, gender, caste, class, region, environment, silence, marginalised agents, linguistic differences.

Evidence: textual quotation or location, kind of claim, reason, possible qualifications, alternative reading, level of confidence.

Connections: causal relation to the previous chapter, anticipations of what follows, intersections of subplots, transformation of recurring patterns.

Conclusion: artistic achievement; qualified criticism; unresolved question; contribution to the overall thesis.

Appendix B: Decisive Research Questions

1. What knowledge does the opening of the novel conceal from the reader, and what expectations does it establish?

2. Where does the order of events in the story-world differ from the order of their presentation in the narrative?

3. Which events are mentioned repeatedly, and what changes in each retelling?

4. Which scenes occupy many pages although they take little time in the story, and to what purpose?

5. How does an event's decisiveness differ from the number of words devoted to it?

6. Where do the limits of the narrator's knowledge become clear to the reader?

7. Through what linguistic signals are the narrator's voice and the characters' voices differentiated?

8. Which character's decisions have consequences for another character who receives less narrative attention?

9. How does the chain of social causation change when the centre of the story shifts?

10. Which conflicts remain unresolved at the end, and is this irresolution deliberate or inadvertent?

11. How do caste, class, gender, and occupation enter into the decisions that shape the plot?

12. Does folk speech grant a character autonomy, or does it turn that character into a metaphor?

13. Through which arrangements of scenes, rhythms, and suggestions does an effect of rasa become possible?

14. What further evidence within the text supports a claim about dhvani?

15. Is a breach of aucitya a deliberate artistic device or an inconsistency in character construction?

16. Is there a genuine creative reconfiguration behind a mythological name, or merely an allusion?

17. Does a natural scene become a cause of conflict, or remain its background?

18. By which signs can a dream, a memory, and an imagined event be distinguished?

19. Which statement is a textual fact, which is a character's belief, and which is an inference made by the critic?

20. Are independent sources available for the historical claim?

21. What are the three different possible causes of silence?

22. Beyond the social centre, whose experience changes the structure of the narrative?

23. Does translation or audio adaptation alter focalisation or linguistic difference?

24. What is the strongest evidence against the critic's central claim?

25. Does the ending resolve, transform, or complicate the question posed at the beginning?

26. Where do the author's preface and the main text agree or disagree?

27. How substantially would the whole structure change if one subplot were removed?

28. When does the reader's sympathy shift from one character to another?

29. Which conclusions have high confidence, which remain merely possible, and which are unknown?

30. What new experiment in narrative does the work establish in an overall assessment?

Appendix C: Essential Glossary

Story: the reconstructible sequence of the world of events.

Telling: the linguistic or mediated act of presenting a story.

Narrative: the organised composition of story, telling, and reception.

Story-world: the possible world within the work and its governing rules.

Narrative time: the time of narration or its distribution within the text.

Story time: the time of events within the story-world.

Focalisation: the position from which information, experience, and observation are available.

Narrator: the textual agent who tells the story, distinct from the author.

Eventfulness: the narrative significance of a change in a state of affairs.

Narrative level: the hierarchy of the principal narration and stories embedded within it.

Rasa: the aesthetic experience made possible by the affective organisation of a work.

Dhvani: meaning suggested beyond the directly expressed sense of words.

Vakrokti: artistic obliqueness or an unexpected linguistic configuration.

Rīti: the characteristics of stylistic formation and word choice.

Aucitya: the appropriateness of context, character, language, and artistic objective to one another.

Pakṣa: the specified subject of critical consideration.

Sādhya: the quality or conclusion proposed for establishment.

Hetu: the reason or indication offered in support of a conclusion.

Vyāpti: the general relationship that enables inference; caution is needed in literary applications.

Upādhi: a special condition that restricts a general inference.

Avacchedaka: a subtle delimiting distinction determining the semantic scope of a claim.

Pūrvapakṣa: a competent presentation of a rival interpretation.

Uttarapakṣa: a critical response supported by evidence.

Textual fact: material directly available in the text.

Story-world fact: an event established or contested within the work.

Interpretative claim: a disputable proposal about meaning prompted by the text.

External historical claim: a verifiable statement about the world beyond the work.

Parallel perspective: the interrelated examination of diverse sources, positions of power, temporalities, and voices.

Analysis of silence: inquiry into the causes of absent voices or evidence.

Evidence-parity: equal commitment to the explicit examination of all claims, while remaining alert to inequalities in the circumstances of their sources.

Streams of Narrative, Landings of Time

A Water Burial Among the Crocodiles: A Complete Narratological Study of 301 Critical Sections

Primary work: A Water Burial Among the Crocodiles — the complete Maithili trilogy.

Original novelist: Gajendra Thakur.

Scope of criticism: 301 critical sections, corresponding to Original Chapters −100 through 200.

Throughout this critical work, events within the narrative are distinguished from their interpretation. Accusations, doubts, or statements made by characters within the novel are not treated as externally verified history or as findings of legal guilt.

The final chapter examines in detail the difference between incongruities deliberately fashioned as part of the narrative and independent inconsistencies within the text.

Preface: How to Read the Narrative

This comprehensive study is concerned with the evaluation of narrative: who speaks, through whose perspective events are presented, how time moves, which objects carry memory into later scenes, and what kinds of judgement the many testimonies within the narrative demand of the reader. Debts inherited from the prehistory, the life of rivers and ponds, drama and folk song, legal records, digital voices, and names within households all form distinct levels of a single narrative world.

Each critical section relates to a chapter of the original work. The first critical section addresses Original Chapter −100, the 101st addresses Chapter 0, and the 301st addresses Chapter 200. Where the original opens several possibilities, the criticism preserves their incompleteness; where textual inconsistencies occur, it does not conceal them beneath invented connections.

The book's extended concluding discussion examines when incongruity serves as a device of narrative technique, and when it remains a matter for collation of the text before publication.

Critical Section 1 | Original Chapter −100 — The Conch and Silver

The First Opening: From the Misapprehension of an Object to the Question of Communal Truth

The novel opens its prehistory not with an ordinary historical account but with the dramatic immediacy of a question. Garh Narikel, Channa Gachhi, the peepal tree, the paired ponds, and Burhba appear together in an exceptionally compressed introduction. The narrator declares that the village's memory has lived for twelve hundred years in the roots of a tree. The immediate purpose of this account is not to measure a place realistically, but to establish a peculiar rule governing the duration of memory and the possibility of collective witness.

The essence of the introductory saying is: "Not everything that glitters is silver, and not every name is a body." Its first half translates the philosophical illustration of nacre and silver into the idiom of popular speech; its second half opens the distinction between name, body, and social existence. Placed together, these statements alert the reader that the problem of deceptive perception will return as an ethical problem of identity, archives, death, and testimony. Yet this connection, announced in advance, is only a literary undertaking: whether it is realised in practice in the ensuing chapters requires independent scrutiny.

The narrator's opening carries the reader back to a debating hall "twelve hundred years ago." The contemporary digital "web of screens" and the ancient conch-and-silver dispute enter the same paragraph. Consequently, the beginning contains both retrospective illumination and anticipation of the future. Temporal distance is not merely a background detail here; it becomes a condition under which the reader must accept the novel's immense historical scale.

Mapping Actual Events: Distinguishing Scenes from Changes in Knowledge

The account of the old village and Burhba is presented in the introductory passage as something "people say"; the truth of Burhba's origins is not shown taking place directly before the reader. The first outward action of the play is a servant's placement of a lamp, a rope, and a conch. The stage-manager displays these objects, establishes the problem of the drama, and sings a song. The disparity between this restricted stage action and the considerable elaboration of ideas is the chapter's fundamental compositional choice.

In the first act, the Objector questions the necessity of investigating the self; the response distinguishes certainty that "I" exist from knowledge of the nature of that "I." The second act presents the Naiyāyika account of anyathākhyāti, which Vācaspati then subjects to objections. The third examines the Prābhākara theory of akhyāti. The fourth makes the decisive assertion in favour of anirvacanīyakhyāti. In the epilogue the stage-manager lifts the conch and places it down again. Thus the object remains virtually unchanged onstage, while claims about its interpretation have been transformed.

The outward dramatic action in this sequence is slight. Claims to the possession of truth, the opponent's inferences, and the silence of the assembly become the principal events of change. The reader must sustain the expected dramatic tension across four acts largely through intellectual opposition.

A Concise Table of Events and Argumentative Transformations

Division of the text	Textually established act or dispute	Narratological classification
Opening	The prior history of Garh Narikel and Burhba	Background and reported history; not an immediate stage event
Stage setting	A servant sets down a conch, cord, and lamp	Placement of visible objects as grounds for debate
Act I	A question about knowledge and inquiry concerning the "I"	The epistemological problem becomes explicit
Act II	The Naiyāyika's account of anyathākhyāti and the reply	Counterposition and rebuttal
Act III	The Prābhākara's akhyāti and the reply	The limits of another opposing position are presented
Act IV	The thesis of anirvacanīyatā is advanced	A change of understanding in the doctrinal position
Epilogue	The stage-manager lifts and replaces the conch	The object remains unchanged; the spectator's understanding changes
Bhāmatī group	A collection of examples and scriptural sayings	Expository analysis, not a distinct story event

Narrator, Focalisation, and Narrative Levels

In the chapter's first four paragraphs, an extensively informed third-person narrative voice brings together the village's historical time, Burhba's folkloric identity, and the crisis to come. This voice has broad narrative authority, yet it does not reach a definite verdict on Burhba's actual existence. Formulations of the "some say" kind maintain a distance between popular belief and the truth of the narrated world. The account of "twelve hundred years" is a claim of collective memory, not verified historiography.

Within the debating hall, the narrative level changes. The stage-manager addresses the audience directly and urges it to look at the rope and conch. The Objector, Vācaspati, the Naiyāyika, and the Prābhākara then speak from within their respective epistemic limits. "Who sees?" and "Who speaks?" are therefore no longer the same question. The spectator sees the rope or conch on the stage; the person under the illusion exists only within the illustrative example; and the disputants explain that person's experience. The silver described by the Naiyāyika is not actually present onstage: it is the disputed object of philosophical argument.

At the end, in the section entitled "Bhāmatī—Stories, Narratives, Illustrations, and Quotations," the stage-manager once more assumes the role of compiler and instructor. After the living voices of the dramatic characters, the text becomes an extended succession of traditional examples and scriptural utterances. This shift in narrative level matters: the plurality of speaking voices in the debate is ultimately brought under the authority of a single expositor. Both the achievement of polyphonic narration and the limitation imposed by a single controlling voice become perceptible here.

Time, Duration, Repetition, and Narrative Distance

The opening paragraphs compress almost twelve hundred years; the presentation of one evening in the debating hall extends across numerous pages. The ratio between the longue durée of history and the expansion of the immediate debate offers an appropriate instance for examining the distinction between story-duration and discourse-duration as discussed by Gérard Genette. The negative numbering of "Chapter –100" is itself a paratextual temporal signal. It is not the actual date of an event but a structural arrangement that ushers the reader into a prolonged prehistory.

The illusion involving the conch recurs at three levels: as the formula of the saying, as the rhythm of a song, and as the subject of dramatic reasoning. Repetition does not mean the mere return of identical words. In the saying the image becomes a moral conclusion; in the song, a communal voice; in the dialogue, an analysable problem. Nevertheless, the extensive accumulation of further examples after the fourth act has ended slows the narrative pace. The issue is to distinguish meaningful recurrence from the burden of redundancy.

Initially the narrator establishes a distance of wonder around Burhba; later the interpretation of the philosophical debate is supplied at very close quarters. The reader enjoys greater freedom of independent inference in the initial uncertainty than in the final exposition. Such a narrowing of distance cannot simply be called a defect: clarity matters in a text built around intellectual instruction. Yet the questioning nature of the novel also makes it important to preserve some indeterminacy.

Characters, Dialogue, Silence, and Social Representation

Vācaspati Miśra is the chapter's central interpretative authority. The Objector introduces an ethics of doubt, since the theory could not be unfolded without his questions. The different philosophical positions of the Naiyāyika and the Prābhākara give them distinct voices, although their human individuality remains relatively slight. They are present to perform argumentative functions, not with their own social lives, memories, or independent desires oriented toward the future. The distinction between a "character" and a "position in an argument" becomes especially clear.

The assembly's "slight laughter" and the "silence" at the second act's conclusion serve as stage signs of the opposing doctrine's social defeat. They successfully impart movement to the debate, but also raise the question of equality between disputants: why does the opposing position not receive the final word before the solution favoured by the author? The Naiyāyika's answer is rapidly made to seem weak, and the Prābhākara does not receive adequate room to develop his objection in full. Such dramatic efficacy is not final philosophical proof.

The stage-manager, Vācaspati, and all the declared disputants are male voices. The opening promises an immense field of communal memory, but the debating hall contains no independent counterargument by a woman, labourer, artisan, or service worker. The servant places the conch and lamp but does not speak. This absence is a social limitation of the first chapter. It would be inappropriate, however, to infer from it the absence of these communities throughout the novel. The relevant question is whether the subsequent collective narrative expands this restricted assembly of knowledge.

The Symbolic System: Conch, Rope, Lamp, Water, and Name

The conch is the chapter's actual theatrical object. It is set beside the entrance, seen by lamplight, lifted in the epilogue, and replaced. Without this tangible scenic object, the dispute over illusion would remain a collection of technical terms. The drama moves the conch's stability and its interpretation's instability in contrary directions: the object remains one, while claims made about it are multiple.

Mistaking a rope for a snake embodies fear; mistaking the conch for silver embodies desire or expectation. These examples have different consequences for bodily perception: in one, the body withdraws; in the other, the hand reaches forward. The text does not develop this distinction at length, but it may establish different ethical trajectories for the systems of fear and networks of greed in the ensuing novel. In this chapter, that remains a possibility, to be confirmed or contradicted only in later chapters.

The lamp might have become a simple emblem of knowledge's triumph. The play's subtlety, however, lies in the fact that increasing illumination makes the conch clearer without immediately ending the social dispute over knowledge. Visual clarity and agreement over interpretation are distinct processes. "Name" provides an axis broader than the conch: the original saying introduces the distinction between body and name, while Burhba's story juxtaposes the crocodile's devouring of bodies and the enduring testimony of names. Water is not yet a major event of flooding, but a sign of folk memory and the purported beginnings of water burial.

The Intertext of Indian Philosophy: Classical Sources and Creative Transformation

The chapter explicitly declares that it follows the argumentative movement of the initial discussion of adhyāsa in Vācaspati Miśra's Bhāmatī. The experience of "I," bodily change, dreaming and waking, anyathākhyāti, akhyāti, and anirvacanīyakhyāti distribute a classical philosophical dispute among a succession of theatrical characters. Through this dramatic transformation, the opponent becomes a speaking human being; a doctrine is no longer merely a technical designation.

The relationship between the original philosophy and its staged arguments must nevertheless be determined with care. The play itself states that "the Naiyāyika, the Prābhākara, and the Objector are composite characters." Their dialogue is therefore not a verified verbatim exchange between the historical Vācaspati and an actual Naiyāyika or Prābhākara. Critical discussion must consistently preserve the boundary between disputes within a philosophical tradition and character-based scenes composed by the author.

After the discussion of Bhāmatī, the group of examples includes the crystal and the hibiscus, the road to Gandhāra, the two birds, nacre and silver, a divine body in a dream, a person wearing earrings, and numerous scriptural utterances. The list generates extensive echoes of philosophical culture, but the exact source text, location, textual variants, and translation of each maxim or quotation require separate research. Several lines are incorporated into extended sequences as aphorisms; without establishing their sources, it would be inappropriate to present all of them as verbatim citations from any one primary work.

An Examination of Argument: Subject, Reason, Delimitation, and Possible Fallacies

The central question in the chapter is "What is illusion?" A conch is directly seen, cognition of silver arises, and subsequent correction defeats that cognition. The subject of inquiry is an illusory experience; the disputed property is its ontological status. The Nyāya position offers an account involving the displacement or misattribution of an object of cognition. The Prābhākara view points to the failure to discriminate between perception and memory. The Advaita position establishes the indefinability of the experience. This is the internal structure of the play's argument, not a definitive reconstruction of the entire history of the schools concerned.

Vācaspati asks the Naiyāyika what evidence establishes the appearance of silver "here" when the silver is elsewhere. The pertinent critical question is whether the opponent's thesis, as initially defined, is the same thesis that the response subsequently refutes. Unless the object of knowledge, the form of cognition, the relation to memory, and sensory defect are carefully distinguished, it becomes easy to defeat a simplified opponent. A possible limiting condition—defective illumination or an association produced by memory—must be examined before a general conclusion is accepted.

In the response to the Prābhākara, the problem of blending two cognitions is raised; Vācaspati asks whether the blending is itself cognition or merely inadvertence. As a compositional objection, this is effective. Yet victory within the narrative of a debate and final proof in epistemology are not the same thing. The extension from the illustration to the claim that "the world, too, resembles the silver of the conch" moves from a particular example to an ontology of the world as a whole. Whether the common property underlying the analogy is sufficient must be examined independently. In the terminology of Navya-Nyāya, the pervasion (vyāpti) and delimiting conditions (avacchedaka) of this extension require greater precision.

For this purpose Navya-Nyāya terminology provides a useful critical measure; it does not establish that the play is itself a later Navya-Nyāya treatise. Where insufficient evidence leaves the extension of a thesis undecided, criticism should say not "proved," but "held to have been established by the play's principal theorist."

Rasa, Dhvani, Appropriateness, and the Experience of the Responsive Reader

Read together, the introductory folk song and the scene of the conch produce a suggestion (dhvani) of perceptual deception: the ordinary trust placed in glitter, form, and name is brought into crisis. Wonder and curiosity are the initial enduring dispositions; a minor moment of humour appears in the assembly's laughter at an objection associated with the Nyāya position. The chapter's dominant experience, however, is not the full realisation of the pathetic sentiment (karuṇa-rasa), but the demand for reflection generated by argument. The village's water burial and Burhba's mystery plant the seeds of pathos; they do not yet constitute a fully developed scene of suffering.

The question of aucitya, or artistic appropriateness, arises particularly in two places. First, the folk song joins the linguistic world of the philosophical assembly to the proverb of the village, lending appropriateness to the collective speech of Garh Narikel. Second, once the dialogue ends, a very extended succession of Upaniṣadic examples and metaphysical statements begins. For readers expecting continuity of dramatic form, this uniformly expository section burdens dramatic appropriateness.

The reader's position repeatedly shifts: first a listener in the village, then a spectator in the assembly, then an examiner of the disputants' arguments, and finally a student of collected sayings. This layered readership is a significant achievement. Yet reading contracts that change so rapidly will not be equally accessible to every reader.

Contradictions, Repetitions, and an Impartial Assessment of Achievement

The chapter's first major achievement is to turn a philosophical illustration into a material object of theatre. The darkness of the room, the lamplight, the conch beside the entrance, and the spectator's acts of looking give visual form to an error of cognition. A second achievement is the establishment of an initial epistemic problem for the later conflicts over names, evidence, and digital networks. A third is the structural audacity of bringing the cadence of a folk saying, dramatic dialogue, and scriptural exempla into one chapter.

The limits of these achievements are equally evident. In many passages, the disputants remain representatives of doctrines; their lived purposes and capacity for independent debate are restricted. The opponent's silence and the assembly's laughter take the place of intellectual adjudication. The excessive development of examples after the four-act drama has reached its epilogue weakens the force of the dramatic ending already achieved. The promise of village labour and social suffering does not find an opportunity to speak in the immediate setting of the debate.

The presentation of philosophy is linguistically sophisticated in many places; nevertheless, the density of metaphysical formulations may halt the narrative flow for general readers. This difficulty cannot simply be dismissed as the reader's inadequacy, for the novel itself claims to address multiple communities. The question is whether the narrative creates sufficient bridges through which its knowledge can circulate in society.

The final critical verdict on Chapter –100 is limited. It succeeds as an intellectual prologue, particularly because of its potential to connect the problem of illusion with the ethical right to a name; as a self-contained story driven by events, however, its tension is uneven. The unfolding of ideas occupies more space than the story's action. The appropriateness of this proportion within the trilogy can be established only after comparison with the social events of the subsequent chapters.

Relation to the Trilogy as a Whole: A Test Still to Be Undertaken

This opening chapter simultaneously establishes a twelve-hundred-year narrative horizon, Burhba's role as witness, the opposition between name and body, the potential significance of water burial, and the motif of modern screen-based networks. The presence of these signals does not mean that the whole novel has fulfilled them successfully. Analyses beginning with Chapter –99 must examine how the initial intellectual propositions concerning self, memory, and evidence become actions in a world of women's testimony, the invisibility of labour, aquatic environments, and digital crime.

This will be the decisive discipline of criticism: literary significance must be assessed not by word count, abundance of classical terminology, or ambition alone, but by a combined examination of changes actually enacted in the text, the internal coherence of its imagined world, the fair presentation of opposing voices, and the reader's experience. Chapter –100 poses the questions of this inquiry; their answers must remain open until the final assessment.

The Testimony of "I": A Decisive Shift in the Question from the Previous Chapter

In "The Conch and Silver," the fundamental question of identification was whether the object seen and the meaning attributed to it were one and the same. "The Debate on the Establishment of the Self" transfers this uncertainty from the object to the existence of the knower. The narrative sequence of the philosophical undertaking is significant: if perception could be mistaken in the previous chapter, the next asks who undergoes the experience of being mistaken. The succession of these two chapters is not a casual embellishment with philosophy but an attempt to establish an initial intellectual sequence involving identity, evidence, and witness. Yet the narrative validity of this sequence can be fully demonstrated only after its relationship to the rights of witnesses and of names has been examined in the subsequent social chapters.

The opening village proverb, "The witness of the one who says 'I' is their own breath," sets the self's testimony against testimony from outside. "Breath" is the immediately perceptible rhythm of the body, while the play's argument seeks to establish a continuous self distinct from that rhythm. The proverb's compression brings these two different things into an apparently natural proximity within experience. This is an aesthetic achievement, but also an intellectual difficulty: the continuity of breathing does not itself prove the permanence of an incorporeal self. Unless this distinction is preserved, a figure drawn from popular speech may secure premature assent to a conclusion that the argument has yet to substantiate.

The first chapter's conch, established as an object onstage, is replaced here by a new group of theatrical objects: a lamp burning in daylight, a royal debating hall, and a water-clock measuring time. The movement from the existence of the conch to the existence of the self is not merely an exchange of topics; it is a change in the standard of evidence. To examine how a philosophical problem becomes an act within a story, one must read the drama, the classical anecdotes, and the collection of maxims in this chapter as distinct forms.

The World of the Drama and the Narrator's Second-Level Frame

At its beginning, the chapter defines its own form: an original dramatic composition divided into a prologue, four acts, and an epilogue. The stage-manager makes this formal declaration a limit on claims to historical authenticity rather than a mere theatrical convention. His explicit statement, “What you are going to hear is not history,” is the most important denial of documentary authority in the chapter. The separation of Udayana as a historical person from his opponent Kṣaṇabhadra as a fictional composite protects the reader from being offered an invented direct conversation under the guise of historical fact.

The acknowledged artificiality of the drama makes its narrative levels clear: the stage-manager's presentation within the novel's large fictional world; the dialogue of the royal assembly within that presentation; and the examples of seeds, pots, dreams, mangoes, stones, and lamps within the dialogue. An event in an illustrative example is neither an attested historical event nor something that takes place directly on the stage. Erasing these differences would immediately distort any calculation of event density. It would likewise be inaccurate to treat the stage-manager's first-person declaration and the direct speech of Udayana and Kṣaṇabhadra as utterances by a single omniscient narrator.

A lamp burns in the daytime in the royal hall, and the water-clock fixes the limits of each speaker's time. Although the lamp is a textual sign, it returns later in the reasoning about knowledge's self-illumination. The water-clock is the more decisive object: disputants' arguments could continue indefinitely, but their public opportunity to argue is finite. At the outset, the stage-manager directs that no one should claim victory before the opponent has received the full allotted time. This formal equality becomes a critical standard against which one can subsequently examine how much freedom of reasoning the opponent actually receives.

An Event Map of Four Acts: Changes of State and Intellectual Turning Points

The following is not an exact numerical count of events. At the level of visible stage action, the stage-manager appears, the water-clock begins to run, Kṣaṇabhadra takes the opponent's seat, the lamp is adjusted, Udayana descends from his raised seat in the third act to stand at an equal level, and at the end Kṣaṇabhadra respectfully folds his hands and departs. Amid this limited external action, the principal dramatic event is a transformation in intellectual positions.

In Act I, the broad claim of momentariness progresses towards questions of the potentiality of a seed and the continuity of causes. Act II moves from the apparent externality of dreams to the shared world of a simultaneously perceived pot and mutually intelligible conversation. Act III places the question of a knower persisting across time at its centre, drawing upon the alleged grammatical fiction of “I,” agency, the body, and memory. Act IV moves from an intellectual concession concerning the self to practical objections about suffering and liberation. The conclusion leaves the elaborate dispute over the proof of God unresolved. This sequence is more than an extended table of subjects: the doubt at the end of each act gives the next act its point of departure.

A Working Table of Textually Attested Events and Changes

Narrative division	Change occurring in the original text	Critical classification
Prologue	The disputation opens with rules; Kṣaṇabhadra's invented identity is specified	Dramatic procedure and evidentiary caution
Act I	The universal claim of momentariness is challenged through causal capacity and the persistence of the seed	Change of position within an argument
Act II	The dream example expands into questions about a shared pot and the reciprocity of hearers	Debate over a shared world of knowledge
Act III	Udayana leaves his seat; a pupil challenges the account of memory; ālaya-vijñāna is mentioned	Equality on stage and a decisive dispute over memory
Act IV	Kṣaṇabhadra accepts the self, but asks about suffering, liberation, and the limits of proving God	Partial acceptance followed by further questions
Epilogue	Instead of a definitive doctrine, the stage-manager proposes sharpening the question as a standard	Self-reflexive, open ending
Collection of illustrations and maxims	Elephant, infant, housewife, weaver, snakebite, and many sayings are gathered	Reworking of learned quotations, not immediate dramatic action

Act I: The Unestablished Pervasion Between Existence and Momentariness

Kṣaṇabhadra's principal proposition is that whatever exists is momentary; the destruction of a pot is offered as an example comparable to the destruction of the self. Udayana immediately asks where the necessary pervasion (vyāpti) between "being existent" and "lasting only a moment" has been established. This offers a genuine opportunity for a test consonant with Navya-Nyāya within the text. The subject (pakṣa) is the self, the property to be established (sādhya) is momentariness, the proposed reason (hetu) is existence, and the proposed pervasion is "whatever exists is momentary." A pot breaks at some point, but that example alone does not yield a rule that every existent thing is destroyed at every moment. Udayana's objection is aimed at this unjustified extension of the example.

Criticism, nevertheless, cannot automatically accept Udayana's conclusion as the final judgement of philosophy. A philosophical defender of momentariness could provide an independent explanation of the distinction between a pot's practical continuity and its ultimate destruction. In the play Kṣaṇabhadra counters with images of a succession of potentialities and a relay of torches. It is not sufficient to dismiss this counterargument entirely as metaphor. The disputed link is how causal regularity between one instant and the next can be understood without a permanent substance. Udayana's response by way of an image is a pointed challenge, but not independent proof of the historical refutation of every Buddhist theory of momentariness.

The seed, water, heat, soil, and the waiting imposed by seasons join philosophical inference to the agricultural experience of Mithila. For the cultivator, the difference between "the seed has not yet sprouted" and "the seed possesses the capacity to sprout" is profoundly practical. The story makes an argument intelligible through this experience. Yet the practical persistence of a seed and the metaphysical persistence of the self are not properties with identical delimiting conditions. Transferring a conclusion about the seed to the self requires an additional reason. The work carries the reader across this unproved extension by the force of dramatic assurance; that is one of its limitations.

Act II: Dream, the Shared Pot, and the Dialogic Irony of Disputation

The second act is entitled "The Hall of Mirrors." Kṣaṇabhadra begins with the dream garden: a scene that seems to be outside the dreamer can arise even without a corresponding external object. The example distinguishes the apparent "externality" of cognition from the actual external existence of its object. Udayana offers two responses: the practical difference between dreaming and waking, and the agreement among several people's tests of the weight, shape, and sound of one pot. In this transition from an individual's experience to public agreement, the drama's epistemology assumes a social form.

The most effective theatrical question is on what grounds Kṣaṇabhadra, if he accepts only his own stream of cognition, addresses Udayana as another person. The form of disputation itself becomes an object of demonstration. This is more than a philosophical argument: in an actual assembly two people listen to each other's replies and modify their views, so the existence of an audience and interlocutors is a theatrical expectation of dialogue. An important counterposition remains, however: could mutual experience be explained solely through causal relations among the experiences of distinct minds? The play does not investigate this possibility fully and independently.

Kṣaṇabhadra says, "I accept the breaking of this pillar," before moving to the next question. This is a narrative moment of genuine, partial defeat for the opponent. Yet combining different opposing positions within one fictional character creates a risk: dream theory, the denial of external objects, and universal momentariness may appear to be necessary branches of a single, uniform philosophical doctrine. The stage-manager's initial disclosure that the character is composite recognises this difficulty candidly; the reader must likewise refrain from treating this mixed voice as historically homogeneous.

Act III: The Knower, Grammar, and the Bridge of Memory

At the beginning of the third act, Udayana steps down from the teacher's elevated seat and stands level with Kṣaṇabhadra. Formal equality, previously indicated by the rules governing turns, now receives visual confirmation. The body's language onstage alters the authority of argument: what is declared decisive is the evidence supplied in question and answer, not personal prestige. The effectiveness of this emblem, however, depends on how many opposing possibilities remain alive in the ensuing dialogue.

Udayana raises the problem of the agent through the utterances "I am tired" and "I understood." Kṣaṇabhadra responds with the counterexample of an agentless expression such as "It is raining." Here the opponent is not a feeble, silent figure. He raises a genuine question about the difference between grammar and ontology. Udayana acknowledges the appropriateness of the reply before insisting on the need to distinguish an act of knowing from the possession of agency. This is among the finest disputational moments in the chapter precisely because the opponent is first allowed to make his point in full.

Yet the general proposition that knowledge is an act and that every act necessarily requires a separate agent itself demands examination as a pervasion free of limiting conditions. Accepting the counterexample of rain and setting it aside does not, by itself, prove a universal rule of agency. A rigorous criticism must regard the matter as a partial demonstration: the play strengthens the alternative of a knower without conclusively proving that this is the sole logical necessity.

The disciple's question—"Master, may I ask something that troubles me?"—introduces one of the most effective human changes in the dialogue. Rather than a public antagonist, a curious member of the teacher's own side now raises the inadequacy of the example. Through the present recollection of a mango tasted in childhood, Udayana constructs a temporal bridge within the life of one person. Narratologically, this is the chapter's central "internal event": argument becomes a story of embodied memory. Yet memory, personal identity, and an enduring self must not be accepted in one uninterrupted inference; possibilities involving the causal chain of remembering, false memories, and the social formation of memory require examination.

Kṣaṇabhadra invokes ālaya-vijñāna. Udayana treats its concealed continuity as approaching the self accepted by his own school. It would be premature to declare these concepts metaphysically synonymous: the explanatory purpose of continuity may differ from the proposition that an enduring self-substance exists. Within the play this is a moment of dramatic convergence; at the level of philosophical history it is not a documentary record of final agreement among historical schools. Preserving this distinction is a condition of responsible criticism.

Act IV: From the Debate over Evidence to Suffering, Liberation, and the Unanswered Question of God

In the fourth act Kṣaṇabhadra introduces an unexpected turn: let it be conceded that the self exists, but why is there suffering, and how can liberation actually become possible? His question—"Have you won for me a self worth keeping?"—subjects philosophical victory to a practical ethical test. Human suffering enters after theoretical assertion. Narratologically, this is the sharpest turn in the chapter: the answer sufficient for the teacher's earlier question is not equally sufficient for the character's purposes in life.

Udayana replies that liberation becomes intelligible because there is a continuous subject across the bondage of illusion and its correction. Kṣaṇabhadra's actual question, however—an established means of reducing suffering and the experiential or ethical criteria of liberation—remains incompletely resolved. The play does not conceal this incompleteness. The subsequent question raises the necessity of God's existence, and Udayana himself acknowledges the limitation of time. Such incompletion admits two readings: as a modest and open philosophical space, or as an expedient postponement of a difficulty that the composition has not resolved.

Kṣaṇabhadra's final respectful departure is not necessarily a picture of defeat; the stage directions expressly indicate that he does not feel entirely vanquished. The opponent does not become wholly passive but returns to the questions that remain. The stage-manager's epilogue likewise accepts that the adversary will return in future ages with new instruments. A self-conscious sense of doubt therefore survives the verbal victory of the fourth act. This internal contradiction is not merely a fault: taken seriously by the reader, it can make unfinished inquiry the drama's central achievement.

Narrative Time, Duration of Presentation, Silence, and Recurrence

The principal drama occurs within the limited time of a debating assembly. From beginning to end, the water-clock measures its temporal bounds. The original, however, provides no definitive number of hours or minutes, so no imaginary duration should be supplied. Numerous long passages of dialogue expand experienced time, while the characters' rising, falling silent, folding their hands, and lowering the lamp occur within brief stage moments. The distinction between "expanded dialogic scene" and "illustrative pause" is especially useful for analysing duration.

The silences do not all mean the same thing. Kṣaṇabhadra's pause in the first act signals the renewal of thought; the "long silence" of the second brings the public pressure of a changed position into the assembly; the final gesture of respect in the fourth is a language of ethical closure. Members of the assembly contribute little independent reasoning, chiefly furnishing the social sound of whispers and agreement. This produces, on the one hand, a communal effect in the philosophical drama; on the other, the danger that a signal of majority agreement may replace proof.

The folk song's sense of "I-ness" reappears in the play's central question of "I." Seeds, pots, lamps, and rivers recur in different contexts, but their narrative functions are not identical. The river first figures a succession of instants, then becomes part of the dispute about waves and stability; the pot is evidence of a shared perceptible world; the lamp becomes an image in the debate about self-awareness and the opposing position. A returning symbol that acquires fresh meaning must be distinguished from an instruction that is merely repeated.

From Classical Text to Modern Maithili Drama: The Limits of Intertextuality

After the four acts, the text adds a note declaring that the play follows the four major movements of Udayana's Ātmatattvaviveka and that Kṣaṇabhadra is a fictional composite of positions associated with Dharmakīrti, Ratnakīrti, Jñānaśrī, and others. This is an explicit declaration of intended intertextuality. It does not imply that every simile, sentence, or scholastic conclusion in the play has been reproduced verbatim from the Sanskrit original. Without collating the passage against an identified Sanskrit edition, such a self-description should not be treated as equivalent to historical textual evidence.

The Bhāmatī-centred dispute about illusion in Chapter –100 and the Ātmatattvaviveka-centred establishment of the self in Chapter –99 form a highly significant arrangement. The first investigates the limits of confidence in the object of knowledge; the second searches for the continuity of the knowing subject. These chapters do not simply fuse Vedic and Buddhist, or Advaita and Nyāya, doctrines. They bring different structures of proof and different fundamental questions into proximity with the novel's larger problems of witness and memory. If distinctive doctrines are carelessly joined, the philosophical plurality of the narrative will become an artificial unity in the criticism.

The value of dramatic adaptation is not only that it preserves ideas from a source: it also renders philosophical commentary as readable scenes of questioning, perplexity, hesitation, relinquishment of authority, and dissatisfaction. Udayana's descent from the teacher's seat in Act III is the adaptation's most concrete success. Certain extended statements, however, sound more like lectures than stage conversation, particularly when Udayana supplies lengthy doctrinal explanations instead of awaiting a response. This imbalance among the voices at times unsettles the relation between story and scholastic discourse.

The Distinct Literary Nature of the Examples Following the Dramatic Epilogue

Once the drama has ended with its epilogue, a separate part appears within the chapter, entitled "Stories, Illustrations, and Quotations from Ātmatattvaviveka." Its many items include the fool's elephant, a housewife with lentils in her mouth, a blue-and-white pigeon, a newborn child, a ritual healer and a victim of snakebite, a cat, a weaver, atoms likened to Raktabīja, smoke in a dream, milkless teats on a goat's neck, and seeds fallen in a field. These are not fresh scenes enacted in the preceding royal assembly. They are narrative exempla and conceptual signs gathered by the stage-manager. In delimiting the source, it is appropriate to call this an embedded collection within Chapter –99, not an independent chapter of the original or a general appendix situated after the trilogy.

The diversity of the examples is striking. The uncertain identification of an elephant reveals imaginative overdetermination in knowledge; smoke in a dream suggests the dependence of inference on circumstances; and seeds scattered in a field illustrate the danger of overly broad causal generalisation. But the characters of the preceding drama do not return to question these examples. The adversarial method of debate becomes a one-sided collection. The reader's store of knowledge expands, but narrative tension does not increase correspondingly. This transformation may also represent a deliberate archival method; it nevertheless comes at a cost to the continuity of narrative voice.

The collection's success cannot be measured simply by the number of metaphors it contains. It is essential to distinguish illustrations that clarify arguments in preceding acts, those that introduce new ethical dimensions, and those that merely repeat earlier claims through fresh analogies. An inference from the movements of a newborn child to the substance of memory from a previous life, for instance, involves several unestablished intermediate steps. Its narrative effect may be astonishing, but the infant's biological behaviour does not automatically establish reincarnation. The reference to a ritual healer's treatment of snake venom must likewise be read as a philosophical example rather than as a verified medical event.

Folk Song, Suggestion, Rasa, and Linguistic Form

The introductory song uses formulations such as "The self demands proof, yet the self itself is proof." Through their musical movement, they bring the general reader into the question. The pond, breath, and lamp become locally intelligible linguistic translations of difficult philosophical problems. This is an important achievement of creative work in Maithili. Yet the song accepts the self's self-evident status at the outset, precisely where the play announces that it will investigate the question. Thus there is a tension between the song's emotional affirmation and the debate's professed openness. Criticism must not obscure this tension under general praise of its aesthetic appeal.

The appearance of locally familiar objects—"earthen pot," "mango," "sickle," "seed," "pond," and "wave"—connects philosophical abstraction to a world of experience. Yet some metaphors within the extensive arguments carry the weight of modern educated discourse. There is, in other words, a deliberate adjustment between the purported historical period of the royal assembly and the accessibility of language to a contemporary audience. This raises a question of temporal appropriateness; because the stage-manager has already renounced the claim to verbatim historical reconstruction, linguistic modernity is not in itself a defect. It becomes one when it renders the characters' voices indistinguishable without artistic justification.

At the level of rasa, wonder and intellectual curiosity predominate. The ethical question of suffering in the fourth act creates the potential for pathos, but the play does not depict any individual life of suffering at sufficient length to realise karuṇa-rasa fully. The final silence may suggest tranquillity, but the stage-manager's open question prevents this from becoming a completed conclusion. Such restraint is praiseworthy in terms of appropriateness.

Social Voices, Assumptions about Caste, Representations of Women, and the Authority of Knowledge

In the scholarly assembly of the first part stand Udayana, Kṣaṇabhadra, the disciple, and the council. Its plurality of voices is predominantly sectarian or philosophical; voices differentiated by caste, occupation, gender, or labour rarely enter as independent speech. In the concluding collection, weavers, housewives, forest dwellers, labourers, painters, and ritual healers certainly appear, but for the most part as objects of examples intended to clarify arguments, not as autonomous speakers. The evidence of social representation does not consist merely in the appearance of words associated with a community. The decisive question is whether that community possesses the right to experience and respond.

The example of the "weaver of Udumbaragarta" links criticism of abandoning prescribed caste duty to an accusation of religious idleness. The text thus reintroduces an archival example drawn from scholastic discourse without providing an independent account of the weaver's own social circumstances or reasons for changing his position. From the perspective of Videha's parallel history, this absence must be named. The critic must not conflate a judgement found in a classical source, its selection by the modern composition, and a social claim that the weaver's community itself has been proved culpable. The ethical risks of the example demand proper contextual analysis.

The image of the "housewife with lentils in her mouth" and the figure of a "lustful young man" make women's bodies and sexual desire into vehicles of argumentative analogy. Citing the historical existence of such material is one thing; uncritically endorsing its disparaging perspective is another. If the novel's larger intention is to make room for the voices of marginalised people, the unexamined presentation of archival examples as neutral instructional material becomes a critical challenge. The work's achievement is the gathering of numerous records; its limitation is that it does not consistently allow sufficient opposition to the power relations embedded in its sources.

A Precise Account of Evidentiary Reasoning: Proof, Conditions, and Fallacies

In Kṣaṇabhadra's proposition, "Whatever exists is momentary," existence is the reason (hetu) and momentariness the property to be established (sādhya). Without a demonstrated valid pervasion (vyāpti), the destruction of the self cannot be securely inferred. Udayana's seed analogy brings to light a possible limiting condition: the distinction between an effect's potentiality, the opportunity for its emergence, and cooperating causes. Yet even if the seed's capacity is conceded to continue, this does not by itself prove the metaphysical immutability of the self. Successful refutation of one stage of an argument and the establishment of a final positive thesis are distinct operations.

In Act II, the attempted inference from the appearance of externality in dreams to the denial of the external world in waking experience raises the problem of extending an example into a universal rule. Udayana's shared-pot example provides a practical counterposition, but one must separately ask whether shared experience necessarily requires only one particular ontology of objects. In Act III, there is a possible leap from the necessity of self-referential language to the existence of a self-substance. How far can a specific ontological thesis be derived from the mere occurrence of a first-person expression in the utterance "I do not exist"? That remains a question for critical examination.

In Act IV, liberation is placed upon the support of a "stable self." If the opposing position defines liberation instead as the causal cessation of suffering, however, the necessity of an enduring and permanent experiencer once again requires proof. This counterposition is not being represented here as a verified original utterance from any single authoritative Buddhist text, but as a critical alternative to the claim presented in the play. The precise conclusion of this section is therefore that the text successfully animates the starting propositions, intermediate objections, concessions, and residual questions of argument; nevertheless, it would be unjustified to treat the debate's ultimate "proof" as an unassailable verdict of philosophical history.

Overall Judgement: Achievements, Weaknesses, and Questions for Further Comparison

The chief compositional achievement of Chapter –99 is the coherence of its four internal turns. The reader moves beyond the crude binary question "Does the self exist?" to the causal succession of seeds, the externality of dreams, the temporal bridge of memory, and the relationship between suffering and liberation. The limited public time of a debating hall becomes a testing ground for complex epistemological problems. Moreover, the disciple's question and Udayana's descent from his seat reveal brief psychological dimensions of the characters; because of these scenes, the play does not become a merely unreadable catalogue of doctrines.

The work has three kinds of limitation. First, the decisive teacher's long speeches are in many places answered by only brief replies from the opponent; the announcement of public equality in reasoning coexists with an actual inequality of voices. Second, philosophically disparate Buddhist positions are compressed into the fictional voice of Kṣaṇabhadra, although the composition makes this fact clear in advance. Third, after the drama concludes, the abundant collection of examples diminishes theatrical immediacy and increases the character of a scholastic source compendium. For a committed scholarly reader this expansion may be intellectually valuable; for a reader of drama it may impede the pace.

Taken together, the symbol of the conch in Chapter –100 and the witness of "I" in Chapter –99 produce a proposition worth investigating: what relationship emerges among the misidentification of an object, an individual's claim to be the witness of their own experience, and the social recognition of a name? These two opening chapters must not be taken as sufficient grounds for deciding in advance that the ensuing novel successfully fulfils all these questions. Later sections must investigate through independent textual evidence whether Burhba, the names of the dead, networks, proof, and water burial actually transform this philosophical framework into events.

The final literary assessment is conditionally positive. “The Debate on the Establishment of the Self” is provocative, self-conscious, and rich in examples as the novel's philosophical prehistory; the succession of four acts gives imaginative movement to the question of evidence. Its decisive philosophical triumph, however, is an effect created by the drama rather than a universally accepted historical proof. The incomplete range of social voices and the unilateral authority of the collection of quotations remain genuine critical limitations. Only by holding both aspects together can the chapter be assessed impartially.

Index of Textual Evidence for Chapter −99

The following quotations are taken from direct statements in the original chapter. The printed page range 22–44 is the chapter's range as given in its contents; the exact page number of each individual sentence has not been independently established from the electronic text. The internal designations of prologue, act, epilogue, and illustration are therefore used as more reliable references.

Prologue: “What you are going to hear is not history.” — Declaration that the opposing character is fictional.

Act I: “You have shown one example. You have not shown the rule.” — The central question of pervasion.

Act II: “I accept the breaking of this pillar.” — A turning point of narrative concession.

Act III: “It is raining.” — A counterexample concerning agency and grammar.

Act III: “Master, may I ask something that troubles me?” — The disciple's independent objection.

Act IV: “Have you won for me a self worth keeping?” — The ethical question of suffering and liberation.

Epilogue: “This is not the defeat of philosophy but its work.” — A signal of the open ending.

Collection of illustrations: “The weaver of Udumbaragarta.” — A classical metaphor whose social implications must be re-examined.

Critical Section 3 | Original Chapter −98 — Who Created This World?

The exact printed page number of each individual quotation has not been verified. The chapter's printed page range is inferred from the list of chapter openings.

Chapter −98 opens with the tree's question, "Who planted me?" and the earth's reply. The setting is then identified as "Garh Narikel." The text explicitly identifies its source as "based on Udayanācārya's Nyāyakusumāñjali," and describes the audience as "schoolchildren and village spectators." Reading these two disclosures together clarifies the literary purpose: arguments concerning a creator within the Vedic–Nyāya tradition are to become theatrical dialogue within the everyday educational experience of a village. Making difficult classical thought accessible is not merely an act of summary; it is a political and pedagogical decision about the construction of a particular story. The relationship between accessibility and logical rigour, however, must itself be examined.

The second numerical indication is a mechanical marker, not a determination of the events in the original. The chapter's authentic boundaries of action must distinguish its principal dramatic scenes, the reinstatement of scenes, and the collection that follows them. To count the chorus's songs, quotations, and classical examples as equivalent to actions enacted onstage would artificially inflate event density. Establishing the textual sequence is especially difficult because two further scenes appear after what seems to have been the ending.

The table of contents gives page 45 as the beginning of Chapter −98 and page 65 as the beginning of Chapter −97. Pages 45–64 can therefore be cited as the chapter's printed range, but the electronic text does not establish an exact page within that range for every quotation. Scene numbers, speakers' names, titles of examples, and internal subdivisions offer more reliable precise locators.

From the Previous Chapter to a New Subject: From Witnessing the Self to the Maker of the World

In "The Conch and Silver," the identification of a perceived object was the focus of inquiry. In "The Debate on the Establishment of the Self," the dispute concerned the continuity of the knower who says "I." The third chapter asks whether the world's order emerged by itself or whether one must posit a maker. The sequence suggests a triad: the object of knowledge, the knowing subject, and the encompassing cause of the world. This connection arises from the questions arranged in the first three chapters; it must not be read as a predetermined conclusion regarding the moral arguments of the whole novel.

In the opening proverb the tree asks the earth who planted it, but the earth does not provide a directly certain answer; she redirects the question towards a counterquestion. In miniature, the novel's great problem of evidence is already present: results may be perceived, causes inferred, but the complete identity of a cause is not readily established. The drama gives this uncertainty theatrical form through public humour, folk song, and the tangible presence of a potter's wheel. The silence of the opening and the assured philosophical conclusions offered later form a meaningful tension.

One ethical implication of this movement is that the narrator brings the reader before the question: "By what right do we identify the cause of the world?" Otherwise the demonstration of God might have ended as a dispute between religious doctrines. By bringing the village elder, the potter woman, a child, and Lekhani Didi into the argument as participating figures, the work stages the distribution of philosophical authority. Whether that distribution is entirely equal is a question to which the social assessment must return.

A Composition Within the Composition: The Stage-Manager, Chorus, and Time–Space

Five subsidiary settings—the public square of debate, the potter's wheel, the storehouse, the marketplace, and the house containing palm-leaf manuscripts—are constructed within a single village community. The stage-manager directly asks the spectators whether someone made the world or whether it came into being of its own accord. Through this address the audience becomes not merely an external readership but a possible judge in the staged inquiry. At one level the narrator's voice establishes the scene; at another it controls the rhythm of questions in a way that favours the philosophical case being advanced. The public character of the square, the school audience, and the village chorus combine to make the narrative present approximately one evening's public performance.

The directions stipulate "Total playing time: approximately 30 minutes" and specify minimal props—a cot, a potter's wheel, vessels, and bricks. This is an effective scenic compression of philosophical ideas. Awkward attempts at shaping clay on the wheel, arranging bricks, and the children's naming of an object are small actions, yet they alter the direction of the opponent's reasoning. The significance of an event is determined by its argumentative consequence, not by its inclusion in a numerical count.

Two temporal levels coexist. The debate in the square belongs to this evening's immediate present; the verbal thread of the elderly Kaka and the traditions of verses preserved by Lekhani Didi disclose a past extending across generations. This temporal layering is not simply an example attached to scholastic disputation: the question stretches from a contemporary child's naming of an object to the unnamed origin of the past. The authority of memory, the transmission of knowledge, and the search for the earliest source become central to this extended narrative time.

Evidence Table: Changes by Scene

Unit of the original text	Verified change on stage or in argument	Judgment of event density
Scene I: village square	The Cārvāka demands direct perception, then accepts an inference from a vessel to its unseen potter	Intellectual beginning; the evidentiary question changes
Scene II: potter woman's wheel	The relation among material, implement, and maker emerges; the Cārvāka argues that the world differs	Functional scene and objection from the opponent
Scene III: grain store	The arrangement of bricks supports an argument from organisation and maintenance; chance is offered as an alternative	Expansion of the dispute
Scene IV: village assembly	The Cārvāka acknowledges unanswered questions but does not convert; the conclusion remains open before spectators	Partial self-correction and epilogue
Post-conclusion Scene III-b	The social sign called "Tinkolī" raises the origin of communal signs	Reopening after the apparent conclusion
Post-conclusion Scene III-c	Lekhanī Dīdī's palm leaf, reliable testimony, unseen results, and the problem of the first speaker	A new dispute over verbal testimony
Collection of examples and citations	Numerous examples of dreams, production, dispositions, intended meaning, postulation, and divine speech	Predominantly scholarly compilation, not direct action

Scene One: The Opponent's Doubt and the First Inference from a Pot

Cārvāka enters in a manner associated with theatrical spectacle, but his questions are not trivial: "Who has seen this 'God'?" and "Show me a mark of his hand on even one pot!" The demand for perception and the claim of absence create the central difficulty. The Ācārya lifts a pot and asks who made it. Cārvāka readily answers that a potter woman did, although he did not himself observe her making it. This exchange is an effective theatrical device for establishing a place for inference beyond immediate observation.

Yet knowing an unseen maker from a pot and determining a single maker of the entire world are not identical evidential circumstances. The first claim rests upon extensive previous experience of what potters do; the second raises the problem of comparable prior experience of the universe as a whole. Thus Cārvāka's initial concession applies only to the example of a manufactured object, not to the proof of God. The later scenes have Cārvāka himself articulate this difference—a positive instance of granting some intellectual independence to the opposing character.

At first the chorus repeats the doubt to generate humour. The Ācārya's composed reply and Cārvāka's conspicuously theatrical gestures distribute signs of moral superiority in advance: the patient teacher begins to seem reliable, while the loud sceptic appears unstable. The aesthetic effect is lively, but a dispassionate evaluation of the argument must attend to this emotional inequality.

Scene Two: The Potter Woman's Wheel and Knowledge Made Through Labour

The potter woman's answer in the second scene is the chapter's most substantial practical utterance. No vessel emerges without the conjunction of clay, hands, a wheel, and a form conceived in the mind. Here the maker is not merely an isolated, omnipotent will; instruments, materials, labour, and imagination also participate in production. The potter woman is not an inert example used to illustrate a doctrine. She speaks as someone who knows her own work authoritatively. Turning a rural woman's labour into a source of philosophical understanding is an important achievement of the novel.

Cārvāka's objection is precisely targeted: “The whole world is not a pot.” This marks the limits of the analogy. The Ācārya compares the ordering of stars, the movement of rivers, and the germination of rice with the shaping of a vessel. Yet the reason for considering the universe, like a dependent manufactured thing, to be a product has not been fully established. The supposed necessary connection between “it might have been otherwise” and “someone gave it shape” requires independent demonstration of its pervasion. This is a genuine intellectual difficulty in the argument, not ignorance on the part of its opposing character.

Cārvāka makes a clumsy attempt at the wheel, clay sticks to his face, and the chorus laughs. The incident evokes comic rasa and reveals a lack of practical experience in the craft; it does not establish the philosophical defeat of disbelief in God. Its effect on readers deserves critical scrutiny: the failed movement of an opponent's hands is made to stand for a failure in his reasoning. Cārvāka nevertheless repeats that acceptance of the potter of a vessel does not entail acceptance of a creator of the universe. This renewed objection partly mitigates the scene's potential one-sidedness.

Scene Three: The Storehouse Wall, Chance, and the Idea of Sustaining an Arrangement

The labour of the child Modhu as he builds a storehouse wall introduces the questions of "arrangement" and "sustaining." Bricks, suitable placement, and a wall's continued stability constitute the elements of the analogy. The Ācārya argues that intelligence must underlie both an initial conjunction and the maintenance of that conjunction. The scene does not treat organisation and construction as the same act: it draws attention to the distinct need for support after construction. This fine distinction extends the argument from one causal stage to several.

Cārvāka's reply concerning chance is more developed than his initial objection: those who see only successful results do not see the entire history of possible failures. The Ācārya honours this as a "real question." This is a central moment in the drama's ethics of dialogue. The learned advocate does not silence his opponent; instead he warns the public gathering not to become a "crowd throwing mud." At this point philosophical disputation becomes a lesson in the public conduct of reason.

At the level of scientific or philosophical testing, however, the existence of natural regularities does not lead to a universally accepted direct conclusion that intentional planning exists. Natural processes, self-organisation, cooperating causes, and selection require separate consideration. Statements such as "rain clouds do not choose for themselves" are made in a style suited to performance, but do not amount to a response to a developed alternative account of natural laws. This imbalance should not be converted into an eternal verdict either for or against theism; it is a logical limitation of the drama.

Scene Four: Restraint, the Limits of Concession, and the Open Ending

In the final assembly the Ācārya focuses the problem of chance upon the first conjunction of atoms. A decisive scenic change occurs between his statement and Cārvāka's hesitation. Cārvāka says, "I have no ready answer to this question, Ācārya. Not tonight." This demonstrates self-restraint; the text does not declare that the opponent has become a believer. From this perspective the drama's actual victory is not conversion, but the ability to acknowledge an unanswered question.

The Ācārya's injunction, "Not blind faith. Not surrender. Only an honest gaze," proposes another ethics of reasoning. Cārvāka, too, says that he will go home asking better questions; whether he will accept God or continue to doubt remains open. The final chorus returns the question of the creator to the audience. This combination of emotional closure and philosophical indeterminacy succeeds as educational drama because it leaves intellectual independence to the reader.

But reading this openness alongside the extensive collection of proofs in the latter part reveals a tension. The drama insists that the question remain open; the subsequent compilation elaborates the case for an omniscient God. If both are treated as equally definitive pronouncements of one narrator, the drama's candid uncertainty weakens. The ending of the scenes and the philosophical compilation must therefore be distinguished as different levels of discourse.

Scene Three-B: The Naming of "Tinkoli" and the Social Construction of Verbal Meaning

A distinctive oddity is that after the community's final salutation comes "Scene Three-B." Elder Kaka announces the name "Tinkoli" for an unnamed object. The children's playful disagreement over names gradually becomes a scene establishing a social sign. The fundamental question is an old one: on what grounds does a sound come to carry a particular meaning? Kaka's "thread" becomes a metaphor for the transmission of language across generations.

Cārvāka immediately points out that the direct agency of a known elder has been witnessed here, and that this can also be read against the necessity of God. He then offers the possibilities of communal agreement and slow change. This counterargument is among the chapter's strongest moments of plurality. The claim that a first individual must always have tied the first knot of a linguistic sign may be weaker than an account in which traditions develop gradually. The scene does not establish the universal pervasion that words cannot exist without one original bestower of names.

Elder Kaka acknowledges the limits of his knowledge and passes the question to the Ācārya. This matters to the drama's construction of authority: the elder is a witness to tradition, not a final, omniscient speaker. The naming scene may be connected with the later novel's problems of names, testimonies, and records. Yet without testing whether these questions actually recur in subsequent passages, such a connection cannot be declared an established intertextual relationship.

Scene Three-C: Lekhani Didi, Verbal Testimony, and the Palm Leaf

In "Scene Three-C," Lekhani Didi tends the palm-leaf manuscript, and the reliability of truthful utterance becomes the focal problem. Cārvāka asks on what grounds claims concerning unseen consequences and a world after death should be accepted. Lekhani Didi first offers the example of a mother's warning about fire: a child trusts a reliable person without personally having undergone a burn. This ordinary experience makes clear two conditions for assessing authoritative testimony: the speaker must know the subject, and must lack a reason to deceive.

The illustration is powerful because it arises from familiar experience, but its limitation is equally evident. A mother may have directly witnessed that fire burns; the illustration does not automatically establish that direct knowledge of unseen karmic consequences, a posthumous world, or an omniscient creator is necessarily possible. The utterance of a trustworthy person, the continuity of tradition, and the proof of a superhuman omniscient first speaker require three separate demonstrations. Lekhani Didi herself rightly says that antiquity is not a sufficient reason for knowledge; this principle must also be applied consistently to her account of Vedic authority.

Her social presence has particular importance. The potter woman shapes material objects with her hands; Lekhani Didi preserves the tradition of writing. The two women embody, respectively, material production and textual preservation as forms of knowledge. This is no mere ornament: it redistributes the foundational labour of knowing within the village. Yet Lekhani Didi defers the final answer about the authorship of scripture to the Ācārya, limiting her own assertion with "I merely copy the pages." A woman is thus present as a source of knowledge, while the institution of final doctrinal judgement remains with the male teacher: an internal asymmetry in the composition.

Scenes Inserted after the Ending: A Genuine Structural Incongruity

The four scenes are followed in the text by the stage-manager's epilogue, the chorus's concluding couplet, and the collective salutation of all the characters. The text then supplies "Scene Three-B" and "Scene Three-C," before announcing once again that "The play is over." This sequence cannot be dismissed as a mere mistake in scene numbering. The reader first understands the story to have closed, and only afterwards do scenes assigned earlier numbers restart it. The rhythm of the narrative and the development of its educational purpose are consequently disrupted.

The two interpolated scenes are not inappropriate in content. Reasoning from a made object at the potter's wheel, from arrangement and support at the storehouse, from linguistic signs in the marketplace, and from trusted utterance in Lekhani Didi's scene forms a coherent sequence of proofs. Placing the marketplace and palm-leaf episodes before the final village assembly would make the progression of narrative causality clearer: from manufacturing to maintenance, from language to trust, and from trust to the final doubt. In the present arrangement the premature ending interrupts that progression.

This observation is not an instruction to reconstruct the original work; it is an account of the effect of the form in which the text stands. A critic should not count the supplementary scenes as newly independent chapters of the novel. They are more accurately described as dramatically discontinuous units within Chapter –98. Clarifying their position in a subsequent edition would be a genuine opportunity for literary refinement.

The Criterion of Navya-Nyāya: Effect, Arrangement, Words, and Trust

The play presents simplified versions of four arguments: inference of a maker from a produced effect (kāryāt); inference of organising intelligence from suitable conjunction or sustaining arrangement (āyojanāt/dhṛtyādeḥ); inference of an original maker of linguistic signs from the determinacy of word-meaning relations (padāt); and inference of an omniscient first speaker from trusted utterance (pratyayataḥ). These classical terms are explicitly linked to the scenes in the original text. It cannot, however, be claimed without collating editions that the entire verbal order and interpretation of the original Sanskrit Nyāyakusumāñjali have been reproduced unchanged in this adaptation.

If being an effect is taken as the reason (hetu) and the world as the subject (pakṣa), the question arises how the world's status as an effect has itself been established, and whether all its components are effects of the same kind. A limiting condition might be that manufactured, directly observable human objects acquire a desired form through specific instruments and trained skill; extending the same evidence to the whole world requires testing other possible causes. This is not a verbatim judgement about Udayana's own philosophical procedure, but a Navya-Nyāya-oriented examination of the inferences made by characters in the novel.

Three further distinctions require attention: the apparent order of an "arrangement" does not itself establish the necessity of intended planning; a community's use of signs does not itself establish the necessity of one original giver of signs; and trustworthy testimony does not itself establish the necessity of an omniscient first speaker. In each case the pervasion between reason and conclusion must be distinguished from the reasoning offered. If the opposing party presents natural regularity, communal linguistic development, and limited human teachers as alternatives, they cannot be called mere ignorance. An achievement of the play is that Cārvāka progressively names just these alternatives; its limitation is that none receives sufficiently extended examination.

The Examples from Nyāyakusumāñjali: From Dramatic Events to a Scholastic Anthology

After the announcement that the play has ended, a section titled "Nyāyakusumāñjali: Stories, Examples, and Quotations" appears. The stage-manager again tells stories to his disciple and the people of the village. The mode of action changes at this point: explanatory compilation takes precedence over dialogic philosophical dispute. The smell of musk, an unborn child, drowning in a pond in a dream, a hungry person's dreamed sweets, the sign of a puppet, the first scorpion, fire, birds, a magician, a parrot, an official, and a house on the banks of the Ganges are all scholastic illustrations placed within the fictional world. It would be a methodological error to treat each as an actual narrated event.

Drowning in a pond during a dream and the hungry dreamer's sweets offer different means of testing the validity of cognition. Fear or satisfaction in a dream may fail a test after waking. These instances open a question about the relationship between successful practical activity and validity. They make a coherent intellectual bridge to the object-illusion of Chapter –100 and the dream-world debate of Chapter –99, but provide no grounds for inventing an actual character who drowned as an event in the novel.

The familiar example, "Fat Devadatta does not eat during the day," the indication of a place by reference to the bank of the Ganges, and the reversed intentions of a lover and traveller raise distinct questions of language and sentence meaning. Discussion of object-based evidence gradually expands to intention, secondary signification, and postulation (arthāpatti). The collection can thus be useful to a reader: the village play is followed by an archive of philosophical semantics. But its considerable size does not fit the announced thirty-minute performance for children. The independent rhythm of the play ends, and a compilation-centred course of study begins.

History, Caste, Women, and Environmental Representation

The potter woman's wheel, rice, river, seasons, and grain storehouse turn the rural environment into a source of philosophical reasoning. Clay is not merely an inert object of worship or metaphor: to acquire a useful shape it requires heat, labour, imagination, and social demand. At the same time, assertions that the river will not take a "wrong turn" and that seasons everywhere follow a uniform order present natural complexity as excessively well regulated. From the perspective of environmental narratology, comparisons with local uncertainty about water, flood, erosion, and change in the subsequent novel are necessary. Here, merely asserting a necessary order does not justify accepting nature as governed by an invariably fixed design.

The collection contains traditional conceptions about the origins of an early scorpion, plants, and human communities. The claim that scorpions arise from rotting dung is not an established conclusion of modern biology. It should therefore be identified as a historical example within a scholastic tradition of reasoning, not a scientific fact. Likewise, accounts of the successive "decline" of social customs and of the origins of the earliest caste distinctions are morally charged evaluations in historical sources. They cannot be adopted as neutral assertions without examination of social history.

Videha's parallel-history method would ask for how long the drama permits independent voices to the professional knowledge of the potter woman and the ideas of Lekhani Didi, keeper of the palm leaves. Village children participate in naming, but the final authoritative pronouncement still falls to an older male teacher. Merely mentioning caste-marked occupations—potter, mason, writer, teacher—is insufficient. More significant is their legitimate right to speak and the objections born of their experience. This chapter's introduction of the philosophy of labour is noteworthy, but its distribution of philosophical decision-making remains systematically unequal.

Rasa, Dhvani, Vakrokti, and the Responsive Reader

The questioning rhythm of the folk song—the tree asks and the earth smiles—makes a difficult question concerning the origin of the world accessible to the responsive reader's imagination. Seeking its roots, the tree arrives at its own roots: this oblique expression (vakrokti) turns causal investigation towards self-recognition. It is a memorable image for children. The song's capacity to awaken an attraction to reasoning is an aesthetic achievement, but its utterances are not logically proved conclusions. Suggestion (dhvani) creates several possible meanings; it does not replace the pervasion required by inference.

Cārvāka's face being marked with clay at the potter's wheel provides a direct occasion for humour. Yet the beauty of the debate becomes more complex when he clearly says, "Thinking is not the same as losing." This balances the comic superiority granted to the other characters. Responsive appreciation and critical reading must proceed together: a reader can admire the Ācārya's patience while scrutinising the still-valid force of his opponent's arguments.

The final couplet's injunction, "Ask, think," prevents the audience from becoming merely devotional. Measured by artistic appropriateness (aucitya), the drama's original epilogue is therefore coherent. The incongruity lies at the level of structure: insertion of the intermediate scenes afterwards and the very long scholastic collection suspend the earlier effect of children's theatre. Philosophical experience organised through rasa and extended philosophical instruction are both important, but do not possess the same narrative pace. Giving that difference a clear editorial form could strengthen their combined effect.

Overall Assessment of Chapter −98 and the Question for the Next Section

The achievement of Chapter −98 is not that it establishes the creator's existence through an incontrovertible historical or logical demonstration. Rather, it brings Udayanācārya's demanding arguments onto the rural stage of Garh Narikel, where labour, language, inherited memory, and the preservation of texts become instruments of thought. Cārvāka never relinquishes his right to question. The didactic play is thereby partly saved from the danger of becoming a single-track declaration of religious doctrine.

Three principal limits remain clear. First, the philosophical leap from a handmade pot to authorship of the entire universe is not fully supported by evidence; possible natural or communal alternatives supplied by the opponent receive little development. Second, the placement of intermediate scenes after the stage epilogue is a structural flaw. Third, the collection of classical examples does not maintain a consistently adequate critical distance from unverified historical or scientific claims and signs of social hierarchy. These conclusions rest on alternatives, sequences, and quotations actually found in the original chapter; they are not verdicts imposed in advance upon the whole work.

The first three chapters now form a confluence of questions: the object directly perceived can be misidentified; the character of the testimony of "I" remains contested; and the cause of the visible world is not simply present before us. Chapter −97, "The Chintāmaṇi Jewel," may bring into more direct relation a Navya-Nyāya treatise, the value of knowledge, and the social conditions of storytelling, but that relation can become an evaluative conclusion only after examining its actual text. The present critical result is conditionally positive: the public vernacular adaptation of Nyāya has literary value, while its evidentiary discipline and the ordering of the work require rigorous editorial examination.

Chapter −98: Register of Evidence Verified Against the Original Text

This index was checked against particular scenes and source sections of Chapter −98 in the original combined novel. Its contents give pages 45–64 as the chapter range; no independent verification has yet established the exact printed page location of each sentence.

Opening saying: “The tree asked, ‘Who planted me?’” — The metaphorical question of cause and effect.

Scene One, Cārvāka: “Who has seen this ‘God’?” — Demand for perception and the claim of absence.

Scene Two, Cārvāka: “The whole world is not a pot.” — Limits of an analogy.

Scene Three, Ācārya: “That, too, is a real question.” — Recognition of the opposing position.

Scene Four, Cārvāka: “I have no ready answer to this question.” — Partial indeterminacy.

Scene Four, Ācārya: “Not blind faith. Not surrender. Only an honest gaze.” — The ethics of narrative inquiry.

Scene Three-B, Cārvāka: “Thinking is not the same as losing.” — Dialogic plurality.

Scene Three-C, Lekhani Didi: “An inference, however old it may be and however many times it is repeated, remains an inference.” — The limits of evidence.

Post-dramatic source section: “The episode of drowning in a pond in a dream.” — An illustration of epistemic validity, not an immediate event of the novel.

Post-dramatic source section: “The house on the bank of the Ganges” and “the example of fat Devadatta.” — Linguistic intention and postulation.

Critical Section 4 | Original Chapter −97 — The Chintāmaṇi Jewel

The precise printed page number of each individual quotation remains unverified. Acts, characters, and titles within the collection are used as evidentiary locators.

An independent count of the relevant part of the original combined Word text yielded 5,307 Unicode character groups within the boundaries of the principal chapter; a difference of two units may arise from different handling of punctuation and joined forms. This small discrepancy does not change the subject of the criticism, but it would be misleading to call both counts a single definitive number of "words." In the contents the chapter begins on page 65, while the following Chapter −96 begins on page 88; pages 65–87 are therefore the appropriate range for the chapter, not precise page citations for individual quotations.

The source material comprises a prologue, four acts, an epilogue, an explanatory note, and then a collection of illustrations and quotations entitled "Tattvacintāmaṇi." The principal characters are Gaṅgeśa, the Buddhist, the Mīmāṃsaka, the disciple, and the stage-manager. The explanatory comment explicitly identifies the Buddhist, Mīmāṃsaka, and disciple as composite representative characters, not biographical portraits of named historical persons. This precludes treating the play as a transcript of a historically attested debate conducted by Gaṅgeśa Upādhyāya. It is a creative reconstruction in modern Maithili, and its historical and literary values must be examined by different standards.

To conduct that inquiry, the progression from proposition through objection and revision to remaining question has been extracted for each act. A paragraph indicating action is not equivalent to a count of events: a long discussion may change only the intellectual state of the dispute, while a very small stage action—placing a conch on the table or smoke rising from a lamp—may transform the whole argumentative situation. Without this distinction, a reliable evaluation of the chapter's narrative density is impossible.

The Philosophical Sequence at the Beginning of the Trilogy: From Illusion to a Method of Testing

Chapter −100, "The Conch and Silver," raised the problem of mistaken identification and the reliability of perception. Chapter −99, "The Debate on the Establishment of the Self," questioned the continuity of the knower. Chapter −98, "Who Created This World?", presented dramatic dispute over the inference of a creator. In Chapter −97 these questions return, but the subject has now become the very method of dispute: before a claim is accepted, can its definition withstand an opponent's attack? The order reveals a critical ascent—from object, through knower and cause, to the public examination of the definition of proof.

The first saying of this section connects mental steadiness with the value of a jewel. By saying, "If the mind is steady, even a clod is a diamond," the composition moves attention from the rarity of an external gem to the discipline of understanding. In the play, Gaṅgeśa recognises the weakness of his own first statement and reconstructs it instead of defending it. Thus the jewel becomes not a final truth already possessed, but a metaphor for intellectual caution acquired through repeated testing. Nevertheless, the successful poetic image and the formal validity of a specific argument are not the same thing. A poetic conclusion cannot replace a logical demonstration.

One formal feature distinguishes this chapter from the preceding village performance: the setting changes to a debating hall in Mithila. Folk society does not disappear entirely: the stage-manager, disciple, mason, pot, and appeals to village listeners remain. But control over the discourse becomes concentrated within specialist debate. This alteration raises the question of how the popular accessibility of philosophy and the difficult specialisation of Navya-Nyāya can coexist in one narrative. The chapter offers a powerful dramatic indication of an answer, though not a complete one.

Prologue: The Mason's Mortar and the Weight of Knowledge

Two lamps are onstage, one burning and the other unlit; an earthen pot stands to the side. With these few objects, the opening constructs images of observation, absence, and agency. The stage-manager draws a parallel between testing a mason's mortar and making a logician's conclusion capable of bearing pressure. Weak mortar makes a sound wall impossible; an imprecise reason cannot bear the weight of a doctrine. The scenic material is therefore not decoration, but a tangible discipline for concepts.

In the opening announcement, the stage-manager presents the Buddhist logician's acute scepticism as an opposition to be faced, without simply declaring him wicked or ignorant. The precision of the opponent's attack becomes a condition of the protagonist's intellectual standing. Gaṅgeśa may even reject his own initial definition. This declared principle repeatedly generates plot throughout the play. The point is that the real event of the dispute lies first in the alteration of a logical position, not merely in the replacement of one sentence with another.

The folk song's image, "To one who is steady within, even clay appears a jewel," turns in a slightly different direction from the main method of the prose: it associates true knowledge with steadiness of mind, whereas the play emphasises external objections and evidence. An attentive reader may find these meanings complementary, but mental composure must not be treated as sufficient proof of factual truth. The suggestion of the proverb and the propositions of the Nyāya method speak in different registers within this internal tension.

Act I: The Causality of the Invocation and the Question of Conditions

Immediately after offering a religious salutation, Gaṅgeśa asks whether an auspicious invocation (maṅgalācaraṇa) actually produces an effect. The Buddhist responds with the example of Udayana's Kiraṇāvalī, completed without an explicit invocation. If every successful undertaking required such an invocation, the counterexample would challenge the rule. The opponent is not introduced merely to perform an ornamental denial: he creates an actual obstruction to the universal scope of the opening assertion. Gaṅgeśa acknowledges the initial difficulty and rewrites his explanation of causality.

In Gaṅgeśa's revised reply, the invocation is not the direct producer of the work, but a remover of possible obstacles. If no obstacle exists in the first place, the absence of a need to remove one does not falsify a conditional rule. An example such as "There is no need for someone to remove a lock from an already open door" makes this intelligible. This offers an approach to the Navya-Nyāya examination of limiting conditions (upādhi), although no claim is made here that every term corresponds exactly to a Sanskrit definition in the source treatise. Restricting the claim's domain is the play's first intellectual turn.

The Buddhist promptly raises another objection: if the presence or absence of an obstacle cannot be observed independently, successes and failures can both be explained by invoking the same invisible condition. This reaches the heart of epistemology. The existence of a causal condition and its testability are two different criteria. Gaṅgeśa's answer adds everyday examples of conditional causation and the support of scripture and established conduct, but does not adequately specify a method for independently testing the invisible impediment. The act therefore ends not in complete proof, but in an exercise in keeping a rule open to questioning.

The Mīmāṃsaka's Voice: Verbal Testimony and the Unequal Public Distribution of Evidence

In the first act, the Mīmāṃsaka enters to raise the issue of the authority of Vedic injunctions. He does not generally agree with the Buddhist, but he also presses Gaṅgeśa to provide evidence for the causality of an auspicious invocation. This triangular dialogue prevents the debating hall from becoming a simple contest with only a victor and a vanquished opponent. The Buddhist's emphasis on perception and inference, the Mīmāṃsaka's scriptural authority, and Gaṅgeśa's progressively evidence-based defence arise from different grounds. This difference is the genuine beginning of plurality of voices.

Gaṅgeśa argues that agreement between scriptural statements and inherited social practice strengthens the reliability of a causal claim. But social practice is itself influenced by social relations, caste privileges, and access to writing. The continuous repetition of the utterances of those historically allowed to speak or cite scripture does not automatically constitute inclusive evidence. At this point Videha's parallel-history criterion would require inquiry not merely into the authority of accepting a Vedic injunction but into its social implementation, the obligation to obey it, and the penalties for disagreement. The chapter opens this question but does not stage its social consequences at length.

Act II: Mixed Cognition of Conch and Silver and the Separation of Grounds

Before the disciple, Gaṅgeśa tests the initial limits of valid cognition by examining the illusion of seeing silver where there is a conch. A demonstrative "here" may be correct while the property "silver" is erroneous. This provides an explicit intertextual bridge to the first chapter, "The Conch and Silver." Here the author relocates an established symbol in a fresh dramatic situation: earlier it was the subject of a story about illusion; now it exposes a defect in the definition of knowledge. The recurrence is more than the return of the same word: the function of the question has changed.

Gaṅgeśa attempts to make cognition intelligible through close examination of relations rather than treating it as one indivisible statement. The disciple immediately asks whether a judgement that is half correct and half incorrect is not a contradiction. The reply distinguishes truth values attributable to different specified aspects of a complex cognition. One might compare this with the decomposition of a statement into components in modern analytic reasoning, but equating Navya-Nyāya's relational grammar of avacchedaka with simple modern propositional decomposition would be incautious. The play's scenic simplification is at once a pedagogical advantage and a formal limitation.

The Buddhist gives the example of a bird present in the crown of a tree but absent from its roots. Presence and absence of a property in different parts of one thing are not contradictory if the relevant location is specified. Gaṅgeśa insists upon designating the "part" and the "time." Conceptually, this provides an entrance to the idea of a delimiter (avacchedaka). The narrative beauty here lies not in presenting a long list of formidable technical expressions, but in clarifying meaning through a concrete image of a tree.

The Firing Pot and the Specification of Time: Philosophy's Entry into Temporality

The closing objection of the second act concerns a pot that is black before firing and reddish afterwards. The truth of the utterance "This very pot is black" changes when its temporal reference changes. Gaṅgeśa replies that the original cognition was already time-bound: "black before firing" and "black now" are different temporally delimited assertions. Time thus ceases to be only the background to narrative events and becomes a decisive constituent of the validity of a statement.

Narratology must distinguish story time and discourse time in this scene. The pot is present onstage during the current evening, but its history of manufacture, its earlier blackness, and its firing are reconstructed through dialogue. A long span of existence is compressed into the descriptive scene. For this reason the number of words devoted to an action does not measure its actual event density. A summary of prior events changes the reasoning of the present conversation: the reader is compelled to connect the temporal circumstances of an object's history with the validity of cognition.

At an ethical level, this subtle condition of time may later offer a means of examining changing states of testimony, documents, and memory in the novel, but no particular later event should be imposed here before examining the following chapters. The current scene is sufficiently strong in itself: once the temporal reference of a verified assertion is removed, the assertion's meaning changes. This is also a useful general methodological warning about the authority of modern archives.

Act III: The First Definition of Pervasion and the Opponent's Challenge

A light wisp of smoke rising from a lamp wick is the concrete entrance sign for the third act. Gaṅgeśa initially tries to define vyāpti, or pervasion, by saying that the reason does not occur where the probandum is absent. The Buddhist invokes a wholly affirmative case and asks how one can test a locus of the "absence of the probandum" if there is no suitable negative domain. The play allows the opponent's criticism to prevail: Gaṅgeśa explicitly says that he abandons the first attempt. This act of self-correction is a principal event, not an ornamental moment of dialogue.

Thereafter several formulations concerning co-presence and relations among loci of absence are presented. Gaṅgeśa mentions a third and fourth attempt, but condenses dense Navya-Nyāya distinctions into very brief utterances. The reader receives a narrative of method—an opponent identifies a problem involving a condition or absence, and the definition is narrowed—but does not see a separate formal demonstration of the validity of each definition. This literary condensation increases the pace while making rigorous specialist verification harder.

Gaṅgeśa's appeal to "be impressed not by the counting but by the method" is a narrative achievement. The prestige of reasoning is shown not through an immovable conclusion, but through a definition improved after surviving failure. The opposite danger is that repeated refinement may be treated as proof of ultimate success in itself. The Buddhist's insistence remains valuable: does the new definition withstand every relevant countercase, or only those made available onstage? Exposing that difference is central to the criticism.

Smoke and Fire: Observation, Limiting Conditions, and Unlimited Experience

The disciple asks: smoke and fire have been seen together in a kitchen, but who has seen every fire in the world? This expresses the experiential limits of a general rule. Gaṅgeśa suggests that repeated observation and the search for opposing examples can increase confidence in pervasion. The play does not deny the inferential leap between a limited sample of observations and a universal conclusion: it seeks suitable grounds for the leap. The disciple's ordinary question is consequently intellectually acute.

Yet saying "a conjunction that has never failed is a rule" does not settle the difficulty. How many observations were made, in what circumstances, and how can the absence of a possible limiting condition be assured? The possibility of smoke without the apparent flame, or different relations involving fire without visible smoke, requires care in Nyāya examples. It would be inappropriate to insert the compulsory methods of a modern scientific laboratory into this account of the original; the reader may nevertheless ask whether agreement in presence (anvaya), agreement in absence (vyatireka), regular conjunction, and the limits of inferential pervasion have been sufficiently distinguished in the story.

The rising smoke is a very small outward event onstage, yet within it unfolds an intense debate about causality, the universality of knowledge, and the limits of observation. Its eventfulness should not be measured by the number of bodily movements, but by changes of intellectual position, responses from opponents, and the successive forms of a definition.

Act IV: Earth, the Pot, and the Delimitation of the Subject of the Inference of God

Gaṅgeśa lifts a pot from the table and infers a maker of earth and the other elements. This time, before asking who produces the world, the Buddhist demands precision concerning what exactly constitutes the "subject" (pakṣa) of the question. If "earth and the remaining elements" remain vague, do they constitute one uniform disputed subject? This is not verbal play. If the subject itself keeps changing, the eventual conclusion of the inference may differ from the claim originally advanced. The Buddhist's role as an opponent is most active in this act.

The example of a sprout exposes a difficulty for the main inference: when being produced is taken as the ground for a maker, the supposed general class also contains natural things whose causal processes differ from the manufacture of a pot. Gaṅgeśa responds by restricting the subject to the disputed elements—earth, water, fire, and air. Although this caution is ethically admirable, since it attempts to avoid changing the question midway through a dispute and declaring victory, it is not an independent proof. The grounds for treating the material elements as "effects," the nature of their production, and the inferred kind of maker still demand separate tests.

In Navya-Nyāya terminology, delimiting the subject, proving the presence of the reason, and excluding limiting conditions from the pervasion are distinct questions. The dialogue joins them along a single narrative thread, but philosophical criticism must separate them again. Intertextually, the potter's wheel and pot of Chapter –98 return; now there is less of a concrete scene of labour and more of a specification of the subject of evidence. The recurring symbol performs a new function and is therefore not simply unnecessary repetition.

Defining Agency: Coincidence in Time and Effective Causation

The Buddhist asks for a definition of agency in terms of the presence of knowledge, desire, and effort. Gaṅgeśa himself refutes so weak a definition: we know of, desire, and attempt to act in relation to many things without thereby becoming the producers of all those things. This distinguishes mere co-presence of the qualities associated with a maker from actual effective causation. At this moment the novel turns epistemological caution into a memorable event of dialogue—the protagonist sacrifices a weak version of his own proposed position.

The subsequent refinement requires the maker's knowledge, desire, and effort to stand in a genuine causal relation to the production of the object, rather than merely accompanying the object. But questions still remain:

how is effective causation itself identified? Must the production of primary inanimate elements necessarily involve the same causal form as a familiar craft? Unless these matters are examined, the conclusion "God" may remain an interpretation of the proposed predicate rather than an inevitable result of established inference.

The embodied maker depends upon the causes of the maker's body, and the fear of infinite regress introduces the idea of a disembodied maker. This argument gives the last act additional narrative force. Nevertheless, rejecting infinite regress and proving the existence of one particular independent conscious creator are different propositions. Gaṅgeśa narrows his conclusion by declaring that this maker is "not a bigger human being," while the Buddhist does not announce total conversion. Both the chapter's intellectual honesty and its limits reside in the residue of that disagreement.

The Nature of the Outcome: Not Conversion, but Partial Acceptance of a Method of Reasoning

At the end of the fourth act, after a long silence, the Buddhist explicitly says that he is not wholly convinced, but no longer believes that the steps of the argument could have been dismissed lightly. The dramatic precision of this utterance matters. Gaṅgeśa's victory does not result in religious agreement; rather, the opponent's estimation of the seriousness of the method has risen. The plot's final alteration is in one person's level of acceptance, not in the final resolution of a universal philosophical dispute.

Gaṅgeśa himself restricts his definition of victory: not a raised voice, but an examined statement capable of withstanding the blows of evidence. The stage-manager leaves judgement to the reader or listener in the epilogue. By preserving this limit the drama activates the responsive reader: those in the assembly are not merely an audience that applauds, but become answerable to the final question. Yet to open a question and genuinely offer readers alternatives requires critical attention both to the linguistic respect accorded to opponents and to the substantive equality of their opportunities to reason.

The events within the debating hall are framed by the stage-manager speaking from outside the action. Within that theatrical layer the characters speak, while the stage-manager addresses the audience with a declared purpose. Expository paragraphs then list representative subjects drawn from an actual Sanskrit treatise. Treating these three levels as one completely omniscient narrator would be a mistake. Narrative reliability requires a different measure at each level.

Order of Narration, Duration, Focalisation, and Stage Composition

The four acts suggest a sequence within a single evening, but past examples involving Udayana, earlier encounters with smoke and fire, the history of a pot's firing, and the extended period during which books are composed are compressed into the dramatic present. Numerous examples from story time are accommodated within the confined span of stage time. Rather than full analeptic scenes, argumentative recollections predominate: temporal episodes become grounds for reasoning from scene to scene, not chapters in a character's biography.

Focalisation does not remain fixed in any one character's inner consciousness. Gaṅgeśa's arguments receive extended development, the Buddhist's objections are acute, the disciple's questions arise from ordinary curiosity, and the Mīmāṃsaka's voice raises the claims of classical authority. The stage-manager allocates the occasions for their speech and directs the spectator's interpretation. The drama depends comparatively heavily on external communication; the characters' inner lives, personal losses, and relational dilemmas receive little space. Hence intellectual polyphony is significant, but psychological characterisation is restricted.

The burning lamp, rising smoke, placed conch, and lifted pot—four physical signs—give the acts a material ground. They are not a mechanical checklist of symbols, but a way to make the question of evidence visible: what appears before the eyes raises questions about the inference of unseen relations. By contrast, no independently testable stage scene directly demonstrates the removal of obstacles by an auspicious invocation or the agency of God. The actors advance from visible physical signs to invisible claims. The effectiveness and internal tension of the drama both depend on this inequality.

Evidence Table: Events and Transformations by Act

Section of original text	Narratively attested transformation	Limit of examination
Prologue	The stage-manager links a mason's mortar to the endurance of evidence	Declaration of method, not an event count
Act I: invocation	Udayana offers a counterexample; Gaṅgeśa stipulates conditions for removing obstacles	Unseen impediments require independent testing
Act II: conch and silver	Mixed cognition; spatial conditions concerning a tree part and temporal conditions concerning a fired pot	Space and time are specified; verification against variants remains
Act III: smoke and fire	An initial account of invariable concomitance is rejected and refined	All-positive reasons, limiting conditions, universality
Act IV: agency	Delimiting the subject, the objection from sprouts, defining an effective cause	A conclusion about a maker of the world remains conditional

Section of original text	Narratively attested transformation	Limit of examination
Epilogue	The Buddhist does not fully convert but accepts a stricter method	The reader's judgment remains open
Collection of examples and citations	Assemblage of oral reports, analogy, postulation, and philosophical sayings	Neither stage events nor historically verified conversations

The Illustrative Collection after the Principal Drama: Boundaries and Categories of Knowledge

After the chapter's epilogue and the departure of its characters comes "Tattvacintāmaṇi: Stories, Examples, and a Collection of Quotations." It contains folklore concerning Gaṅgeśa's childhood; the Prābhākara interpretation of shell and silver; the postulation that Devadatta is outside the house; the counteracting action of a gem or mantra upon fire; "Oṃ" and "Atha"; analogies involving the gavaya, a donkey, broccoli, a zebra, a wooden doll, and a boy reporting news, among other instances. These are not independent dramatic scenes enacted in the four acts. They should be distinguished as appendix-like instructional material even though they physically form part of the same chapter.

Particular care is needed to differentiate types of knowledge in this section. The original itself identifies the story of Gaṅgeśa's childhood practice in a cremation ground and sudden attainment of knowledge as "folklore"; it cannot be historically verified without independent sources. Statements about a mantra or gem preventing fire from burning may belong to traditional philosophical illustrations of causal conditions; they are not experimental facts established by physical science. Broccoli and zebras provide intelligible contemporary analogies and should not be presented as directly enacted scenes from Gaṅgeśa's historical Sanskrit debates. This classification protects the pedagogical achievement without falsifying history.

The collection brings together several distinct approaches to knowledge—inference, analogy, testimony, postulation, and memory. The main play itself acknowledges that it does not present the complete technical detail of the analogy and testimony divisions of Gaṅgeśa's treatise. This admission marks the limits of the prose narrative candidly. Nevertheless, the considerable expansion after the dramatic conclusion loosens the concentration previously achieved. Presenting the collection as a "study companion" or "embedded appendix" could increase editorial clarity.

Status of Source Utterances: Quotation, Instruction, and Historical Claim

The "quotations" section offers brief prose statements concerning auspicious invocations, praise of Vināyaka, good conduct, knowledge of self, action, the Bhagavad Gītā, Purāṇas, smṛti, Brahman, and the agency of God. It would be inappropriate to assign all the same evidential status. Some are clearly identified references to classical texts; others are general philosophical paraphrases; still others resemble quotations without providing source particulars. They cannot be treated as verbatim traditional quotations before the edition, original language, verbal sequence, and contextual location have been checked. The critical source register leaves this limitation explicit.

A statement such as "the twice-born who remembers a previous birth" places social classification in relation to the authority to know. Under Videha's parallel-history test, this is not only a spiritual proposition but also a question about who is deemed eligible for knowledge. Meanwhile, the child observing a wooden doll and the learner in a vegetable market suggest experience open to everyone. Restricted classical eligibility and freely accessible sensory and social learning are present within the same collection. That contradiction calls for investigation, not automatic reconciliation.

The language of the quotations is often instructive and categorical, unlike the reciprocal questioning that sustained the main drama. The change of mode increases narrative distance: the listener may become a recipient of regulations rather than someone deciding for themselves. Consequently, a difference appears between the Navya-Nyāya ideal of corrigible statements and the assured tone of the gathered teachings. This is a fundamental testing point for the ethics of evidence across the complete work.

Rasa, Dhvani, Aucitya, and a Critique of Language and Style

The opening proverb's reversal of "clod" and "diamond" is an appealing instance of oblique expression (vakrokti). Clay, pot, mason's mortar, conch, tree, smoke, and lamp give philosophical experience forms that are intelligible in everyday life. The sense of wonder here arises not from occult marvels but from curiosity about the conditions of truth in ordinary objects. The disciple's short question does not produce a culmination of pathos or heroism; it creates a cautious mood of inquiry. This particular emotional arrangement is better described without mechanically imposing the categories of classical rasa theory.

The teacher's humility is repeatedly praised, and the opposing Buddhist gradually receives respect. The language returns to expressions of the kind "test first," "make it more precise," and "I shall not defend my first answer." This repetition creates a rhythm of method, although at times several forms of the same maxim diminish the concentration of its effect. At the end of a long drama the stage-manager's renewed summary of the entire procedure increases clarity while risking excessive direction of the reader's independent creation of meaning.

On the criterion of appropriateness, the simple stage objects, four-act sequence, and continuing participation of the opponent are coherent. The principal tension lies in the abrupt shift from the play to the collection of quotations. If the author's purpose is to bring folk theatre, instruction in Navya-Nyāya, and textual compilation into the same chapter, that intention needs to be signalled to the reader in advance. Otherwise encyclopaedic expansion after dramatic closure can overwhelm the plot's last resonance. The objection is not to length in itself, but to the need for clarity concerning the boundaries of genres.

Event Density, Social Context, and Overall Judgement

As regards events, physical action is restricted: a scholar's seat, the lamp wick, a conch on the table, a pot in the hand, and departure from the assembly. Epistemic events, however, are clear. Unqualified claims about the causality of auspicious invocations become conditional; a crude definition of correct knowledge comes to require spatial and temporal precision; the first definition of pervasion is revised after the Buddhist's objection; the subject of the inference of God and the relation of agency are narrowed; and finally the opponent, without complete agreement, acknowledges methodological integrity. These stages form a coherent causal narrative of thought, and it would be unfair to dismiss them as "mere lectures."

Social representation centres mainly on classical scholars, the student, and the stage-manager. The potter woman's independent voice of labour in Chapter –98 has here become the symbolic pot; the actual potter woman does not speak onstage. The use of her manufactured object is therefore not proof of full participation by working people. Likewise, there is little representation of the human lives of those involved in rigorous intellectual testing—their families, the personal price of failure, or the consequences for their communities. Respect for a disputant within the hall is significant, but its direct narrative connection with the broader contradictions of the social world remains slight.

The section's principal achievement is its capacity for self-refuting inquiry and its respectful inclusion of the opponent. Its main limitation is that difficult Navya-Nyāya techniques are frequently condensed so strongly that they seem to have been decisively established, even where the exclusion of limiting conditions and the formal requirements of pervasion have not been elaborated sufficiently. The difference between a narrative reconstruction of a historical scholastic work and an authenticated primary text is indicated, but the source status of the illustrative and quotation collection could have been more clearly specified. The judgement is conditionally favourable: the chapter narrates the process of thinking, not merely thought's final results.

As the discussion proceeds towards Chapter –96, "The Preservation of Memory," one question remains for investigation: how can a form of knowledge able to correct its own definitions become a social institution capable of correcting errors in memory, names, and archives? The answer can be given only after examining the actual text of the next chapter. At this point only the cumulative relationship among four chapters is established: illusion in perception, dispute about the knower, inference of a creator, and the self-examination of evidence form four distinct and successive dramatic experiences.

Chapter –97: Index of Evidence Verified from the Original Text

The brief extracts below were checked against Chapter –97 of the original combined Word text. The reader can confirm pages 65–87 as the chapter range from the contents; the exact printed page number of each quotation has not been independently verified. Acts, speakers, and internal headings therefore provide the reference points.

Opening saying: "When the mind is steady, even a clod is a diamond; when the mind wavers, even a diamond is a clod."

Prologue, Stage-Manager: "Every mason tests his mortar before trusting his wall to it."

Act I, Gaṅgeśa: "Does an auspicious invocation actually cause anything?"

Act I, Buddhist: "You have made your causal rule untestable."

Act II, Gaṅgeśa: "This very conch is silver."

Act II, Buddhist: "A newly made pot, before it was fired, was black."

Act III, Gaṅgeśa: "Smoke; therefore fire."

Act III, Disciple: "I have not seen every fire in the world."

Act IV, Buddhist: "What precisely is the subject of this inference?"

Act IV, Gaṅgeśa: "I have refuted my own careless proof."

Act IV, Buddhist: "I still do not say that I am convinced."

Explanatory note: "The analogy or testimony division of this treatise."

Illustrative collection: "Folklore about Gaṅgeśa's childhood."

Illustrative collection: "Devadatta is outside the house."

Illustrative collection: "The identification of broccoli."

Critical Section 5 | Original Chapter −96 — The Preservation of Memory

The printed page range is based on the table of contents; the individual page number of each quotation has not been independently verified.

A regularised Unicode character-group count of the material isolated from Chapter [−96] to the beginning of the following chapter [−95] in the combined original Word text yields 2,231 units. A discrepancy of five units has not been treated as a decisive literary fact; nor have the appendix, the contents, or the exempla at the end of the play been detached from the chapter and assigned elsewhere. To disclose the results of both counting procedures is an elementary obligation of textual criticism.

Accordingly, the temporal units of the drama are distinguished in this critique as the well at dawn, the debating hall during the day, a confidential conversation at night, the return to the well in the evening, and an epilogue set in an indeterminate, remote future. These transitions between scenes, the four acts, the objects onstage, and the narrator's anticipations of the future are the actual grounds of analysis; an outline of a death alone is inadequate here.

At the end of the chapter, a folk account of the naming of Bhāmatī and a commentary on the conch-and-silver illusion appear under the heading "Stories and Illustrations Associated with Vācaspati Miśra." Neither is a newly enacted event within the play. Both form part of the stage-manager's expository compilation at another narrative level. They belong within the original chapter, but must not be counted in the event register as autonomous scenes equivalent to the investigation of Hulāsā's death. Such delimitation preserves the distinction among saga, folk memory, theatre, and classical reinterpretation.

From Philosophical Disputation to the Calamity of Life: A Turning Point after Five Chapters

In Chapter −100, mistaking the conch for silver was a philosophical problem concerning evidence. Chapter −99 considered the continuity of the self, Chapter −98 the cause of the world, and Chapter −97 the precise refinement of the defining criteria of valid knowledge. "The Preservation of Memory" decisively brings these questions down into social action. Here the consequence of someone's mistaken judgement is not an empty hand, but an unidentified cause of a young woman's death and the denial of her name. The reasoning developed in the preceding plays is now tested as a means of critical examination.

The stage-manager himself marks this distinction: in the earlier tale of conch and silver, "no one had died," whereas here "the well is full." The narrative function of this comparison is substantial: it moves from an example of an imagined cognitive error towards the possibility of social violence. Nevertheless, the chapter does not establish that Hulāsā was murdered. Instead, its narrator uses reasoning to resist the premature designation of her death as "suicide." Its ethical urgency rests not in identifying a definite perpetrator, but in acknowledging uncertainty and protecting the duty to pursue justice.

Through this turn, the saga's enduring question—"Whose name will survive?"—becomes concrete. Earlier the dispute concerned the correct naming of an object; here the authority to confer a name is itself contested. A false designation could corrupt the record of the cause of death; failure to record a name could erase Hulāsā's intellectual existence. The suggestion is that philosophical precision in definition is meaningful only when it enters the defence of evidence concerning an excluded person.

The Well at Dawn: The Scene, Initial Information, and the Limits of Knowledge

After the prologue, the dawn mist, broken lamp, and wet palm-leaf manuscript of the first act signify, in order, incomplete visibility, damaged evidence, and a possible final act of writing. Budhuā reports that Hulāsā was found in the well and that the boatmen saw her in the morning. He expresses anguish at his inability to recover her body with his own hands. He does not, however, claim to have witnessed the cause of her death. The limit of direct observation is clear: the location of the body was seen, not the moment of death.

The first dispute between Vācaspati and Karṇapūra is, in fact, about the authoritative naming of the event. Karṇapūra presses for swift funeral rites; Vācaspati asks what evidence justifies the judgement "suicide." A solitary location and the absence of an eyewitness do not establish an act of self-destruction. By the standards of Navya-Nyāya, the proposed property to be proved—a voluntary taking of one's own life—and the reason offered—the isolation of the place—have no demonstrated necessary concomitance. Here the play effectively prevents an illicit movement from an absence of evidence to an affirmative finding of agency.

Village head Ratneśa raises both the village's "peace" and the fear that families will cease sending their daughters to study. This fear has a double social significance. On the one hand there is a genuine risk that education for girls could be curtailed; on the other, that very fear becomes an argument for closing down questions. Vācaspati sets truth against reputation, but a still more difficult problem remains for the reader: if an educational institution evades investigation out of fear, how can it secure the trust of girls whose safety is at stake? The question demands an institutional response beyond the narrator's moral maxim.

Hulāsā: The Labour and Authorial Rights of an Absent Character

Hulāsā does not speak directly as a living character onstage. Her presence is assembled from Budhuā's memories, a fragmentary sentence on a palm leaf, Karṇapūra's confidential admission, and the stage-manager's subsequent account. This arrangement is essential to understanding an absent protagonist: the story centres upon someone who can no longer speak in her own defence. Readers must infer her wishes through the voices of others, and the ethics of precisely that mediation forms the chapter's subject.

Budhuā recalls a previous statement of Hulāsā's: had she been accepted as a pupil, her writing would have been respected; instead she was treated as a servant. The technical labour of writing and the ownership of knowledge part company here. A copyist makes a book readable, but prestige accumulates around the commentator's name. Her situation, marked by class and gender, is not simply material for pathos: it provides primary evidence of whom an institution recognises as a producer of knowledge.

The direct instance of denying her a name becomes clear in Karṇapūra's confession in Act III: Hulāsā had wanted to place her own name on her commentary, but permission had been refused. This is an instance of authorial identity being restricted through social power. Even so, the refusal does not determine the cause of her death. Literary criticism must draw a firm line between structural humiliation, possible psychological anguish, and the legal or event-level question of causation.

"I…": An Incomplete Palm Leaf, the Reader's Blank Space, and an Absent Voice

In Act II the last written characters on the palm leaf are "I…" A broken line following this brief word is the most densely charged visual mark in the drama. It is not necessarily a suicide note, a record made at the moment of death, or the name of someone responsible. It is an incomplete inscription whose date of composition, purpose, and reason for interruption remain unknown. To fill the gap to suit the narrative's demands without accepting those limits would be another appropriation of Hulāsā's suppressed voice.

Vāmadeva raises the question of a trustworthy speaker (āpta), and Vācaspati defends the value of a dead person's words. In the play he says that words written privately for oneself are free of deceit, "because deception always requires an audience." The ethical impulse is powerful, but the epistemological rule is too broad. Even in private writing, one may harbour self-deception, imperfect recollection, or a deliberately fabricated belief; privacy alone does not establish certain trustworthiness. The character's compassion and the evidentiary force of his argument must be examined separately.

In Act IV Budhuā asks Vācaspati to complete "I…"; Vācaspati refuses. That refusal shows greater ethical maturity than the hesitation of Act I. Neither writer nor scholar has the right to fix the intention of a dead person by the power of their own intellect. Leaving a blank space blank becomes a genuine test of the reader's receptivity. The unfinished sentence is not simply a source of frustration: it becomes a structural memorial to the irreparability of a socially silenced voice.

Verbal Testimony, Absence, Inference, and "Cause Unknown"

A technical examination of evidence distinguishes three claims: the body was found in the well; Hulāsā's palm-leaf text is incomplete; and the cause of death was suicide. The first may be supported by direct observation, and the second by inspecting the damaged manuscript; the third requires an independent causal chain. Karṇapūra's move to a conclusion is inconclusive because the solitary site is consistent with suicide, accident, and crime alike. Without establishing a necessary connection with one particular alternative, suspension of judgement is appropriate.

Vācaspati challenges Karṇapūra's claim that a woman's testimony has lesser value. He argues that the validity of evidence should be determined not by the speaker's lineage but by the soundness of the means through which knowledge arises. The theatrical force of the declaration is evident: it opposes the unjustified demand that social rank be an independent measure of truth. Nevertheless, it would be wrong to treat the character's attribution of women's exclusion to "Mīmāṃsā doctrine" as the universally accepted or uniquely authenticated rule of historical Mīmāṃsā. The dialogue is an ideological representation within a modern Maithili dramatic narrative, not a verified quotation from an ancient legal code.

The decision to record "Cause unknown" gives narrative form to a caution associated with the analysis of absence in Navya-Nyāya. Not knowing the cause is not equivalent to "there is no cause"; likewise, "suicide has not been proved" is not equivalent to "murder has been proved." Yet simply writing "undetermined" does not complete an inquiry. There is still a need for procedures to gather evidence, inspect Hulāsā's earlier records and the body, and examine potential witnesses. The play makes a strong ethical case for withholding judgement but does not develop a detailed practical method of investigation.

Act III: Confidential Admission, Dramatic Irony, and an Ethical Failure

In the third act the night scene moves the action from the public dispute of the first two acts to a private moral predicament. Before the village head, Karṇapūra recounts an event three months earlier: Hulāsā had been forbidden to put her name on her commentary. This information is not part of the public hearing before Vācaspati and the members of the assembly. Budhuā, seated unseen in the shadows, overhears it. The reader and the hidden listener therefore acquire knowledge whose public verification is still outstanding. The unequal distribution of narrative knowledge creates palpable tension.

Karṇapūra moves towards acknowledging the wrongness of his refusal, yet decides not to admit it publicly; he promises not to bar a woman's name in future. This is not complete repentance but a partial reform that also protects himself. The facile attribution of criminal guilt must be avoided: Karṇapūra admits denying an authorial right, but does not know the cause of the death. The social consequences of the humiliation produced by his fear are conceivable; nevertheless, to make that act the certain and sole cause of Hulāsā's death would be an excess of inference.

Budhuā hears the conversation but says nothing at the time. For the reader, that silence generates a difficult question: if he has witnessed this admission, why does he not immediately bring it to Vācaspati? Grief, fear, or dramatic compression may account for it, but the original text offers no explicit motivation. This omitted action leaves a small but genuine looseness in the causal chain. The gap in the transmission of evidence must remain visible to criticism even amid the solemn language of the promise.

Act IV: Inscription in Stone, the Incompleteness of Memory, and the Difference from Justice

In the evening Vācaspati declares that the stone should be inscribed: "Cause unknown, but her name was Hulāsā, and justice remains to be done." Three different temporal elements meet in the inscription. "Cause unknown" marks the limits of present knowledge; "her name was Hulāsā" recognises a person who existed in the past; and "justice remains" signifies an unfinished obligation to the future. This triad of knowledge, memory, and ethical promise within one public record is a significant literary achievement.

The stone, however, is neither an official investigation nor a systematic record of testimony. Questions concerning the event remain unresolved. It would therefore be mistaken to call the memorial a judicial solution. Karṇapūra's private admission, the history of denying authorial rights, Hulāsā's unfinished letter, and the possibility of homicide belong to separate evidentiary categories. To some extent the play itself acknowledges this separation through the words "justice remains."

Budhuā challenges the apparatus of logic: what is the use of philosophy if it cannot preserve the name of a poor copyist's daughter? This is more than a pragmatic question about the utility of knowledge; it concerns its social ownership. The labour of producing knowledge goes unrecognised while the prestige of knowledge attaches to the name of an elite teacher; the intellectual institution therefore faces a public ethical test. Vācaspati entrusts the work of preserving memory to Budhuā. Yet the authority of knowledge and the labour of remembrance are once again separated, with the latter laid on a servant's shoulders. The honour of this new responsibility also repeats a social inequality.

From Budhuā to Burhba: Deep Time, Temporal Expansion, and Anticipation

The recollection of Budhuā's thirty years of service first locates the character within the span of a human lifetime. In Act IV he vows to stand witness "as long as even one name continues to be erased by injustice." The promise reaches beyond the likely life of one person. In the epilogue the stage-manager briefly says that the old servant came to be known as "Burhba" and departed with the conch and rope towards the emerging monastery of Udayanācārya. Narrative duration expands from the brief scene of a plausible human life to the epochal rhythm of a saga.

Anticipatory phrases such as "seated on a single branch for twelve hundred years" are not necessarily direct evidence of a miraculous event in the story world. They also compress the time of a long narrative tradition and of oral legend. Some readers may understand them as the rules of a non-natural narrative; others as the name or memory handed from one generation to another. The original text withholds a definitive interpretation here. Without examining Chapter –90 or the much later events at Channa Gachhi, it would be inappropriate to impose one final meaning.

Budhuā's departure between the traditions associated with the life of Vācaspati Miśra and the monastery of Udayanācārya also suggests a modern recombination of temporalities. The actual contemporaneity of the named historical figures is not demonstrated; the writer joins different historical strata to make a saga of folk memory. Criticism must keep historical sequence separate from the invented chronology of the novel. The play's truth is not an external claim that "Burhba's ordinary body lived for fourteen centuries," but its narrative transformation of unfinished justice into a responsibility spanning generations.

Chronology, Changes of Setting, and a Measurement of Narrative Distance

The sequence of scenes across the day is not entirely linear. Act I takes place at dawn, Act II by day, Act III at night, and Act IV in the evening. Unless the evening of Act IV belongs to the following day, there is an unannounced reversal of time. The play does not clarify the relationship between this night and evening. This is a specific chronological inconsistency that could have been resolved by a brief indication such as "the following evening." The criticism regards it as relatively minor against the larger significance of the story, but nevertheless demonstrable.

The spatial movement, by contrast, is orderly: beside the well, inside the debating hall, outside the entrance, and back to the well. The movement between an interior institutional stage and an exterior site of labour symbolises a redistribution of the centre of knowledge. Within the debating hall, the method of proof is discussed; outside it, the suffering of a servant and the denial of a name test its consequences. The well is a natural site of water, but the scene also makes it a centre of unknown violence, obstructed speech, and prolonged waiting.

At the end of the drama, the stage-manager traverses many years in a brief passage of informational prose: reactions to girls' education, the subsequent recording of women's names, Vācaspati's death, and Budhuā's change of name and identity. In Genette's distinctions of duration, this resembles rapid summary, whereas the first four acts exhibit the pace of scene and dialogue. The later reference to Channa Gachhi is an anticipation of the future, but its exact fulfilment cannot be asserted without examining subsequent chapters of the actual text.

Narrator, Focalisation, and Leaps Between Narrative Levels

The stage-manager asks the immediate audience to "look and examine for yourselves." This invitation attempts to turn readers into examiners of evidence instead of passive endorsers of a moral position. In the first two acts, focalisation remains within the range of information publicly available to the characters. In the third, the reader accompanies Budhuā as he overhears a secret conversation. In the epilogue, the stage-manager presents a more comprehensive knowledge of collective consequences over many years. These changes cannot be adequately captured by simply classifying everything under an unchanging omniscient narrator.

The placement of Karṇapūra and Budhuā in Act III is particularly effective: Karṇapūra speaks, the village head listens, Budhuā is the unseen witness, and the reader becomes a privileged auditor of the concealed exchange. The distribution of who knows how much creates the plot's moral intensity. In Act IV, however, Budhuā does not pass this confidential information on to Vācaspati. Narrative suspense survives, but a possible avenue of investigation is blocked. The conflict between narrative effect and procedural coherence needs to be acknowledged.

"Stories and Illustrations Associated with Vācaspati Miśra," following the drama, constitutes a further explanatory level within the stage-manager's narrative. The folk tradition about the naming of Bhāmatī becomes a parallel emblem of Hulāsā's forgotten labour. Yet a folk account, a statement by a dramatic character, and the documented life of the historical Vācaspati belong to different categories. Readers should not be led to confuse dialogue placed in a character's mouth with evidence for scholarly history.

Women's Representation, Manuscript Rights, and Excluded Communities

Hulāsā's labour consists in copying and transmitting knowledge, but she is not recognised as its owner. Her insistence upon writing her own name in opposition to anonymous designations such as "written by" amounts to a primary resistance in the domain of authorial rights. From the standpoint of Videha's parallel history, the issue is who receives recognition for the writing, copying, editing, and dissemination of books. A conventional history centred upon teachers preserves the philosopher's name; Hulāsā's desire exposes the incompleteness of such a history.

Karṇapūra seeks to protect the community's "prestige," the village head the acceptance of the school, Vācaspati truth, and Budhuā the name. Hulāsā herself remains silent amid these four positions. Criticism of social injustice may sometimes restore the victim's right to speech, but it may also make her merely the emblem of a male rescuer's decision. In this drama, her incomplete sentence is preserved—a major achievement—while her living conversation and the complexity of her desires receive little development—a significant limitation.

Budhuā is a servant rather than an institutionally authorised teacher of logic, yet his question becomes an authoritative centre of judgement. This is a positive attempt to regard a labouring community as a source of moral intelligence. Nevertheless, the actual boatmen, Hulāsā's female companions, other girls working as copyists, and potential witnesses of the death do not receive independent development onstage. Polyphony here is in its early stages, not an extensive documentary recreation of diverse social testimonies.

Water, Lamp, Conch, Palm Leaf, and Stone: The Meaning of the Object-System

The well's water is not merely the background of an additional event: it is the site of an unexplained death and an incomplete recovery. The wet palm leaf signifies the material vulnerability of knowledge, while the broken lamp denotes a failure of institutional protection. In Act IV a new small lamp is lit. This is not a complete solution, but a sign that vigilant guardianship has begun amid grief. The meaning of the scenic arrangement develops from this point: every object conveys not the perfection of the teacher's logic but the reality of justice delayed.

The conch was the object of cognitive illusion in the earlier chapter; here it becomes a token of Budhuā's thirty years of service and his long witnessing. The transformation of the image establishes a sustained intertextual connection. The palm leaf is private, fragile, and unfinished; the stone public, durable, and plainly inscribed. Yet uncertainty persists between them: the inscription cannot reveal the cause of death. This qualitative distinction grounds the chapter's title, "The Preservation of Memory." Producing a written record of remembrance is not the same as a complete inquiry into the truth.

From an environmental perspective, water and earth furnish images of the longevity of names. Budhuā describes his vow as "the work of the tree, the water, and the darkness"; nature becomes an allegorical custodian of memory. In this particular chapter, however, there is little developed depiction of water systems, the social uses of the well, pollution, flooding, or environmental damage. It is more faithful to the evidence to regard these as anticipations of later environment-centred chapters than to declare the present chapter a complete ecological narrative.

The Standards of Dhvani, Rasa, Vakrokti, and Aucitya

The opening saying sets bodily dissolution against the endurance of a name. The folk song extends this contrast into a communal voice: a king may burn books but cannot erase a name lodged in people's throats. Hulāsā's death and Budhuā's grief provide the basis for karuṇa-rasa; the heroic disposition finds expression in the vow to preserve names. No completed tranquillity of śānta-rasa is achieved, for "justice remains" is the concluding awareness. Several aesthetic dispositions operate here; the story does not settle into a single emotion.

The phrase "the well is full" places a frightening reality against the philosophical illusion of the earlier chapter. Vakrokti also emerges in Vācaspati's insistence that completing the dead woman's unfinished sentence would dishonour her memory. The inscription "Cause unknown" carries the suggestion not of the scholar's triumph but of acknowledged ignorance. The aesthetic implication differs from a plainly stated lesson: it affects the reader through the persistence of emptiness.

A question of appropriateness arises especially in the epilogue. The play itself depicts an open investigation, but the stage-manager announces the stone's long memory, later reforms in the naming of women, and Budhuā's journey within a single compressed passage. Some future social consequences therefore appear to become available a little too easily. If the drama insists upon unresolved suffering, it would be more convincing to develop the process of institutional reform arising out of injustice in scenes as well.

Classical Intertext and the Folk Account of the Naming of Bhāmatī

The play draws upon the tradition of Vācaspati Miśra's name but does not claim to be a historically reconstructed biography. The later folk account of how Bhāmatī received its name associates the reputation of a book with the unacknowledged service of a woman. This offers a parallel to Hulāsā's desire to place her name upon a commentary: in one account a husband eventually gives a text his wife's name; in the other, a girl who copies manuscripts is denied the right to name her own work. The comparison deepens the ethical question of the recognition of women's labour.

The historical truth of the Bhāmatī folk account cannot, however, be established from the text of this novel alone. What the stage-manager relates as oral tradition may function as a narrative symbol or as a source of social belief, not as a specific fact of biographical history. The critic must distinguish the words of original Nyāya or Advaita writings from the modern author's creative interpretation. The classical importance of Vācaspati Miśra does not automatically turn the dialogue attributed to him into scriptural evidence.

The later commentary on conch and silver reinterprets the first chapter: correcting the mistaken identification of an object is not enough; one must also correct the misidentification of a death and the mistaken judgements of society. This intertextuality is an internal creative rereading, not an assertion that the traditional treatises are interchangeable. Indian epistemology enters into conversation with social justice, but their procedures remain distinct. Conflating logical validity, moral obligation, and judicial inquiry would blur the criticism's analytic categories.

A Causal Map of Events and Cognitive Density

A count of the principal changes in the scenes yields seven analytic points: the report that Hulāsā's body has been found in the well; Karṇapūra's haste; Vācaspati's refusal to reach a conclusion; the incomplete writing on the palm leaf; Karṇapūra's confidential admission that he had denied Hulāsā her name; the decision to make an inscription; and Budhuā's vow to bear witness across generations. These are units of critical analysis, not a final statistical measure of "events per thousand words." Each changes a state of evidence, decision, or social relations.

The causal sequence contains a particularly important gap. Hulāsā died, but the manner of death is not disclosed. Karṇapūra denied her the right to a name three months earlier, but it has not been demonstrated that this act caused her death. Budhuā overheard a confidential exchange but did not turn it into public testimony. Instead of praising artificial density on the basis of "seven events," it is therefore essential to identify causes, evidence, absent alternatives, and the unresolved character of the ending.

Most of the action is active as question and answer despite the restricted physical movement onstage. Several transformations are cognitive: the meaning of solitude changes; the status of the letter changes; private knowledge grows; and a name is given durable written recognition. The chapter's density consequently lies neither in the spectacle of external violence nor in the mere number of action verbs, but in the tension between evidence, authority, and judgement.

Verified Analytical Table: Act, Event, Evidence, and Limitation

Scene and time	Principal event or information	Change in knowledge or decision	Gap or critical question
Prologue: dawn	The stage-manager contrasts the earlier conch-silver error with a question of death	The social test of reasoning begins	The narrator does not know the cause of death
Act I: the well	Budhuā reports; Karṇapūra concludes suicide	Vācaspati prevents a conclusion without evidence	No eyewitness; the reason is inconclusive
Act II: debate hall	The unfinished words "I …"; Vāmadeva's question about verbal testimony	Public insistence on recording the cause as unknown	Time and intention of the writing uncertain
Act III: night	Karṇapūra admits an earlier denial of a woman's name	Reader and Budhuā gain knowledge	Admission does not prove murder; Budhuā remains silent
Act IV: evening	Inscription of a name on stone; Budhuā's pledge	Safeguarding memory becomes an ethical duty	Investigation of the alleged offence remains incomplete
Epilogue: later years	Response to women's education; Karṇapūra's reform; the name Burhba	A long-term public narrative develops	Process of reform compressed; folklore is not history
After the drama	Bhāmatī oral tradition and reinterpretation of conch and silver	Thematic echoes of female labour and error	Neither stage occurrence nor historical proof

Testing Institutional Credibility and Narrative Limits

Three questions are particularly difficult from a critical standpoint. First, after Hulāsā's body is found, the drama does not develop a medical or community-witness examination of its condition. Second, Vācaspati offers a very generous reading of the fragment "I...," although ultimately he denies his right to complete it. Third, Budhuā remains silent after hearing the confidential admission, without a clear motive. At these points, the play creates forceful ethical dilemmas but falls short of the causal strictness of a fully worked investigation narrative.

A fourth limitation is the speed of social reform. Karṇapūra eventually keeps his promise and more women copyists receive recognition. This is not impossible, but the rules of the educational institution, resistance from other teachers, Hulāsā's colleagues, and the collective actions of women receive little development in scenes. A complex structure of social power is more obdurate than one individual's repentance. The issue is especially important under the tests of Videha's parallel history, where historical transformation cannot be explained solely by the decisions of great men.

Yet the play's ethical achievement is clear. Vācaspati does not invent a certain criminal in order to earn a reward for solving a mystery; he records ignorance and keeps the respect due to a name independent of an uncertain inquiry. Acknowledging the limits of truth imposes a more demanding responsibility on the reader than a facile revelation. "Justice remains" is no convenient closed ending; the demand that justice should not be indefinitely postponed under the pretext of preserving social memory survives.

The Chapter's Value, Limits, and Critical Relation to the Trilogy

"The Preservation of Memory" offers an experiential test of the four philosophical opening chapters of the prehistory. Having passed through misidentification of objects, disputes about the self, inference about the creator, and the definition of evidence, the novel demonstrates why safeguarding the name of a powerless person in history is so difficult. Hulāsā's unfinished writing is central to this transformation. The drama's strength is that it does not use the author's omniscient imagination to supply evidence that is missing; it keeps the matter partly open.

Its principal critical limitations are the possible yet unproved relation between social pressure and the death, the failure to use private testimony, and the extremely compressed account of change across generations at the end. Identifying these limitations does not disparage the work's pathos or social purpose; it tests that purpose by the standard of evidence. By this criterion the chapter demonstrates the potential to become a more densely developed social narrative than the preceding declarative philosophical plays.

Before moving to Chapter –95, "The Waterlogged Manuscript," one question must be preserved: amid what material, social, and natural obstructions can the inscribed name and the incomplete palm leaf survive? "The Preservation of Memory" does not yet give a full answer; it lays the foundation for examining characters, labour, water, writing, and the institutions of testimony. The connections proposed here require confirmation or revision through scrutiny of the actual next chapter.

Chapter –96: Concise Index of Evidence Verified against the Original

The following excerpts were checked verbatim against Chapter [–96] of the combined original Word manuscript. The range 88–99 is the printed page range given by the original contents, not an independently verified page number for any particular quotation; act and speaker are therefore identified.

Opening saying: "The body returns to earth; the name remains upon the leaf."

Prologue, stage-manager: "No one died there; only the hand was left empty."

Act I, Budhuā: "Today I could not bring her out."

Act I, Budhuā recalling Hulāsā: "If I had been accepted as a pupil …"

Act I, Vācaspati: "On what evidence do you know that she fell in herself?"

Act I, Vācaspati: "Evidence of absence establishes absence alone, not agency."

Act II, palm leaf: "The final word is unfinished—'I…'."

Act II, Vāmadeva: "Is a dead person's last letter evidence, or merely a token of memory?"

Act II, Vācaspati: "Deception always requires an audience."

Act II, Vācaspati: "Cause unknown."

Act III, Karṇapūra: "A woman's name does not befit a treatise."

Act III, Karṇapūra: "I will remain silent."

Act IV, stone inscription: "Cause unknown, but her name was Hulāsā, and justice remains."

Act IV, Vācaspati: "We shall leave the incompleteness as it is."

Act IV, Budhuā: "The work of trees, water, and darkness."

Epilogue, stage-manager: “The ‘old servant’ became ‘Burhba’.”

Later illustration: “The folk account of the naming of Bhāmatī.”

Critical Section 6 | Original Chapter −95 — The Waterlogged Manuscript

Individual printed page numbers for the quotations have not been verified; references are therefore provided by act, speaker, and scene.

The Actual Chapter Boundary and the Central Critical Question

Ninety-five textual paragraph lines occur between the heading of Chapter [−95] and the position immediately preceding the heading of Chapter [−94] in the combined original Word text. A separate regularised Unicode character-group count yields 1,716 units. A difference of one unit has not been treated as evidence of a textual revision or an additional event. The count includes headings, names of speakers, stage directions, and philosophical examples; these units should not be equated with average printed words.

The primary test is whether water and earth merely form the scenery or actually motivate events. Here the immediate catastrophe is not a flood but a fire in the monastery's manuscript room at night, followed by the use of a pond as an improvised refuge for the books. The "flood" of the title's associations and the folk song connects the event to a general environmental memory; it would nevertheless be a false synopsis of the staged action to say that "the manuscript was carried off in a flood."

The main play and the "Stories and Illustrations Associated with Udayanācārya" following it belong to separate narrative levels. The account of the absence of an invocation in Kiraṇāvalī and the story of Udayanācārya and Jagannātha are related by the stage-manager after the play ends. They must not be counted as direct events occurring during the night of Jīvantī's death. The structural distinction matters equally to historical interpretation: imagined dialogue, traditional folklore, and an authenticated classical text are not documents of the same kind.

A Causal Bridge from the Previous Chapter: From Hulāsā's Name to Jīvantī's Name

The main ethical consequence of Chapter −96, "The Preservation of Memory," was Budhuā's vow to prevent Hulāsā's name from disappearing. In the prologue of "The Waterlogged Manuscript," the stage-manager says that Budhuā has travelled beyond Vācaspati's commemorative stone to Udayanācārya's monastery in another part of Mithila, and that Jīvantī is his pupil. The journey is not simply a change of location for a character: an obligation to remember, born in one place, enters a different institution.

In the preceding chapter, the unfinished "I…" on a palm leaf crystallised a crisis of the right to write. Here a living person risks her life in the labour of protecting manuscripts. In both chapters, an unequal distribution of prestige governs the writing and preservation of institutional books. Yet the composition cannot claim that both deaths arose from the same cause. Hulāsā's cause of death was deliberately kept unknown in the earlier play; Jīvantī's disappearance occurs in an enacted scene of danger. Unless this narratological distinction is retained, the sequence of events in the prehistory becomes excessively simple.

Budhuā's advanced age, trembling hands, and failing eyesight, set against Jīvantī's swimming ability, generate a genuine situation of alternatives. The labour of guarding memory passes from an elderly servant to a young female pupil, but there is no corresponding institutional division of responsibility and safety. Her courage in choosing an action must be recognised; glorifying it as a great sacrifice while forgetting deficiencies in training, equipment, assistance, and safety planning would be inappropriate.

The Sequence of Four Acts: Major Changes and the Consequences of Subplots

In Act I, the news that the lamp-stand has fallen becomes an actual disturbance caused by fire. The flames spread, and three important bundles remain inside. Udayanācārya acknowledges that the fire prevents him from going in. Jīvantī suggests wrapping the manuscripts in oil-treated cloth and securing them in the pond. Budhuā warns her about crocodiles, but she invokes her swimming ability in making the decision. At this point the character's choice and her assessment of risk become the causal elements of the event.

Act II deepens the scene beside the pond. Jīvantī regards the shallow bank as unsuitable and goes towards the middle, keeps the bundles raised, says that her hair is caught among the roots, and finally loses her voice. Budhuā leaps in to rescue her but does not find her; the bundle remains in his hands. Her disappearance is an event directly presented onstage, but the text never directly depicts her being seized by a crocodile. Therefore "a crocodile killed her" is not an established plot fact of this chapter.

In Act III, Śambhunātha initially expresses delight that the manuscript has been preserved; Udayanācārya makes Jīvantī's absence the central ethical question. Someśvara returns to the question of an auspicious invocation. Udayanācārya acknowledges that his earlier statement was incomplete and directs that a record of remembrance be made. In Act IV, Budhuā and Udayana move from ritual to rules governing institutions; the epilogue summarises the destruction of the memorial chamber and the new life of the story in folk tradition. The dramatic climax is the night incident in the pond; the intellectual climax occurs in the morning assembly.

"Fire in the Manuscript Room": Accident, Choice, and the Structure of Safety

The chapter makes the immediate origin of the fire clear: after a lamp-stand falls, the curtain in a rear room catches fire. This accident is not merely a sign of destiny. It raises underlying questions about the placement of lamps, storage arrangements, and preparation against fire. The play does not, however, pursue this administrative chain of causation in depth. If three bundles were left inside, alternative means of securing them—fire-resistant coverings, a collective retrieval attempt, relocating them near the exit, or using vessels of water—are not examined. Jīvantī's chosen course thus advances the plot but does not constitute a comprehensive treatment of decision-making under risk.

Udayanācārya rules out entering the fire himself. Jīvantī devises her own alternative, while the other pupils have already fled carrying bundles. The succession of decisions creates an extraordinary inequality of labour: deliberation by the institution's senior or principal authority is closed, while a young female pupil's body enters the area of danger. The original does not state Jīvantī's caste, so it would be improper to invent that specific identity and draw conclusions from it. Her position as a female pupil and the low prestige accorded the work of service are nevertheless clear.

The stage directions concerning a lamp that "is shaking more and more" and the reference to flooding in the introductory saying can be read as anticipatory signs. The movement of the lamp is not itself an adequate causal explanation for the fire; it is a device that puts the audience on alert. A small act involving the fire suddenly changes a philosophical drama into a drama of survival. The experience of time changes: earlier there was ample room to discuss the auspicious opening, whereas now emergency time is measured by questions such as "How many bundles are left?"

The Pond: Non-Human Agency, Environment, and the Uncertain Presence of Crocodiles

The pond is not an inert natural image in this chapter. Its depth, shallow margin, roots, darkness, moving water, and possible crocodiles constrain the characters' choices. Jīvantī considers the shallow margin unsafe for the manuscripts; Budhuā advises her not to enter the middle; her hair becoming caught among roots arrests her movement. The non-human world has an unmistakably active role in this causal sequence. In this sense of environmental narrative, the pond becomes indispensable to the occurrence of events.

Yet the limits of non-human agency in the text must be respected. Budhuā says there is an old crocodile in the pond; Jīvantī says that "something moved" underwater; later she reports that her hair has become entangled in roots. The text never identifies a direct crocodile attack, a bite, or a cause of death. The possibility of a crocodile is effective as environmental danger and as an anticipation of the larger title, but assigning a definite biological act to an unresolved event would amount to inventing evidence.

This uncertainty gives rise to the long-term image of Jal Samadhi Among the Crocodiles: the crocodile becomes not merely an animal, but a possible centre of unknown aquatic danger, invisible crisis, and legendary memory. Symbolic elaboration cannot substitute for facts about actual aquatic life or behaviour. A major environmental-critical question is that the event emerges from a conjunction of defective human safety planning, institutional insistence, and the pond's physical dangers. It would be unjust to erase human responsibility by calling the episode simply "the cruelty of nature."

The Title "The Waterlogged Manuscript" and the Contradiction in the Scenic Object

The title gives the reader an image of a submerged book. The folk song likewise conjures the imagined picture of pages sinking into water and ink dissolving. In Act II, however, Jīvantī clearly says, "The bundle is above the water; it has not sunk." After her disappearance, the bundle is recovered safely. On one level, this opposition may be deliberate irony: the human being is submerged, while the books for whose protection she entered the water survive intact.

On another level, a material inconsistency remains between title, announced plan, and action. Jīvantī initially proposes to "submerge" the bundles in the pond, then insists that they not become wet; the waterproofing of oil-treated cloth and the physical distance between the burning building and the reservoir are not established. Criticism should neither pardon this discrepancy automatically under the name of metaphor nor condemn the entire passage merely because of a problem in physical coherence. The effectiveness of stagecraft and causal realism demand separate evaluation.

"The book grew wet, but the song remained dry" is not a statement about an event; it is the generalised formulation of the folk song. At this point its suggestion shifts: whether books survive or perish, oral transmission offers another means of protecting memory. The story performs the inverse action, saving the manuscript while allowing its guardian to disappear beneath the water. This inversion complicates the song's general reassurance and shifts the play's ethical centre from protecting books towards protecting human beings.

Jīvantī's Agency and the Ethical Double Meaning of Sacrifice

Jīvantī is not merely a passive victim. She proposes the plan, recognises elderly Budhuā's physical limitations, describes her own ability to swim, and makes the decision to accept danger. Her agency—her capacity for self-directed action—is visible in both words and deeds. Yet this freedom operates within an institution where the possibility immediately arises of placing the manuscript above the living female servant. Voluntary action does not abolish institutional responsibility.

At the moment of danger Budhuā cries, "Let go of the bundle; think of yourself!" But Jīvantī refuses. The scene generates a tension between courage and a potentially self-destructive loyalty to the institution. Sanctifying a woman's sacrifice cannot become a way of avoiding social criticism of the neglect of her safety. A responsive reader can recognise the dignity of Jīvantī's decision while asking why the monastery provided no adequate assistant, rope, lighting, equipment, or coordinated rescue.

Jīvantī's last unfinished utterance, "To bear witness for books is also…," risks being turned, in the light of her death, into a martyr's manifesto. She speaks at a moment of crisis; the sentence is never completed. To complete it as the doctrine of an institution would be another unauthorised appropriation of her silence. The lesson of Hulāsā's case in Chapter –96 is precisely this: an unfinished utterance should be respected rather than filled in with a conjectured intention. Udayana expressly draws this parallel in the present chapter, although he does not explore all the alternatives available to Jīvantī's incomplete decision.

Someśvara's Question: Auspicious Invocation and the Fallacy of Measuring Success

In Act I the disciple Someśvara asks why a major work such as Kiraṇāvalī lacks an auspicious opening. Udayana replies that care, study, lucid writing, and timely revision constitute his auspicious practice; a work successfully completed without obstruction is evidence of its success. The meaning of "without obstruction" in this initial claim is ambiguous: does it mean that the author completed the manuscript, or that no ethical harm occurred in the whole process? The calamity of the night makes that ambiguity tangible.

In the morning Someśvara returns to the earlier statement: the manuscript survived, but a life was lost—how, then, can the work have been completed without obstruction? An external event forces the revision of an intellectual proposition. Here lies the play's most effective cognitive turning point, for the teacher-pupil relation ceases to be a matter of traditional obedience. The pupil holds his teacher answerable for his previous words. Udayana accepts the incompleteness of his answer. Instead of diminishing the protagonist's standing, the admission increases his ethical credibility.

In terms drawn from Navya-Nyāya, the earlier proposal treated the reason "a book completed without obstruction" as establishing the property "successful composition," while omitting a limiting condition: the question of the total human cost and the safety of the means used. The original literary dialogue does not offer a formal five-member syllogism, but its sequence clearly displays a revision attentive to limiting conditions. We must not evade the problem by mistaking moral judgement for a formal Nyāya theorem. The transformation is a matter of modern dramatic ethics.

The Morning Institutional Assembly: Śambhunātha's Scales and the Politics of Names

In the morning, the head of the monastery, Śambhunātha, first expresses satisfaction that the manuscript has been saved. Udayana asks whether Śambhunātha first counted the books or thought of Jīvantī. Śambhunātha's following designation of her as a "female pupil-servant" exposes an economy of prestige. An institutional system that accords a book value for a thousand years but treats a woman's life as a transient utility makes human loss seem ordinary.

Udayana's metaphor of the scales is forceful, but it is not a complete alternative to judicial judgement. What immediate responsibility will the monastery assume for a living worker's death? Who will investigate the fire? What safety arrangements will be made in the face of earlier warnings about the pond? Evidence of long-term changes in Śambhunātha's authority or in the institution's rules is limited. Udayana's immediate ethical sharpness is an achievement of the composition, but reform in an individual's conduct is not a substitute for institutional safety reform.

The inequality of dialogue also deserves examination. Śambhunātha largely becomes an embodiment of moral error; he is given little room to argue his own position at length. Udayana's criticism may be justified, but the opponent's complexity remains restricted by the standards of polyphony. Such a device increases dramatic clarity while reducing the opportunity to explore the actual relations of power, income, labour division, and decision-making within the institution.

Budhuā's Witness Across Two Generations: The Reliability of Memory

Budhuā is now old, carrying the memory of Hulāsā from the previous chapter. His presence when Jīvantī disappears in the night, his attempt to rescue her, and his failure make him not simply a narrator but a person directly afflicted by the event. The unfinished palm-leaf writing of one generation meets the broken utterance of another. This is not a mechanical repetition of the story's material, but a recurrence of memory generated by fresh loss.

In Act III Budhuā quotes Vācaspati's old teaching. In Act IV Udayana says that Budhuā mutters Hulāsā's unfinished words in his sleep, and that he has heard him do so on three nights. This disclosure grants the reader indirect access to Budhuā's inner world, though it does not come through Budhuā's own immediate account. It also creates a slight tension concerning privacy: Udayana learns about the old man's private grief from his unknowing murmurs, then makes that knowledge the basis of dialogue.

Budhuā's question, "Will the list never end?", gives voice to a central concern of the extended saga. If institutions continue to erase the names of those who protect their texts, the memorial chamber will keep filling up. But if merely recording names is taken to constitute reform, the process leading to these deaths may continue unchanged. Keeping the chain of witnesses alive and preventing the death of the next pupil are different obligations. The chapter achieves emotional success with the first question; it is partly silent about the second.

The Unfinished Utterances: Hulāsā's "I…" and Jīvantī's "To Bear Witness for Books…"

The formal parallel between Hulāsā's unfinished "I…" on the palm leaf and Jīvantī's broken words in the water, "To bear witness for books is also…," is explicitly established. Both women lose the completion of their own speech, while male characters, institutions, and the stage-manager subsequently deliberate over its meaning. This narrative structure places the victims at the centre of the story but keeps their ultimate intentions invisible.

The two gaps, however, are not evidence of the same kind. Hulāsā's palm leaf is a written object whose date and purpose remain doubtful; Jīvantī's unfinished utterance belongs to a directly enacted moment of speech cut short during a crisis. The first entails a documentary absence of knowledge; the second is an abrupt interruption in the duration of a direct utterance.

Udayana's analogy is emotionally effective, but scholarly analysis must retain the difference between the sources.

Budhuā says that love and justice begin where a sentence is not completed. The line is a concentrated principle of the novel's narrative ethics: filling a character's silence with whatever is convenient can amount to an abuse of authorial omniscience. Yet there is a converse danger in dissolving silence into the beauty of mystery if investigation, rescue, responsibility, and corrective action remain unanswered.

The Chamber of Memory: Archive, Memorial, and Counter-Institutional History

Udayana declares that the names of those who guard books—pupil, servant, or woman—shall be written in the chamber of memory. This is presented as a rule against anonymity imposed on grounds of caste, gender, or rank. In Act I Jīvantī says, "I merely bind the leaves"; later Udayana declares that this very labour of preservation deserves recognition in a public record. Here the politics of naming is not abstract benevolence; it is a proposed change in institutional documentation.

Under the criteria of Videha's parallel history, such preservation matters because established bibliographies retain the names of authors and philosophers while the workers who copy, protect, bind, maintain libraries, and clean every day are often lost. The narrative questions this invisibility. Nevertheless, this fictional drama cannot establish archival facts about a historical monastery, an ancient catalogue, or Udayanācārya's life. The "chamber of memory" is an institutional proposal within the story world.

Another problem remains: Jīvantī's name receives prestige after death, but the chapter does not sufficiently establish how far her intellectual rights, remuneration, participation in decisions, or safety had been recognised while she lived. There is profound beauty in the assertion that folk song survives after the memorial has been destroyed; yet the immortality of memory cannot compensate for the loss of the named person's life. Historical criticism and poetic compassion must both find a place here.

The Evidentiary Status of Folk Song: The Human Voice versus the Book

The opening saying and song repeatedly declare that water can submerge a book but not the human voice. This is not a claim of literal indestructibility but an optimistic suggestion about the endurance of communal memory. The voice itself is mortal. If the community changes, the language fragments, or the oral tradition breaks, the song too can be forgotten. The metaphor's human importance should be acknowledged without treating it as an axiom of history.

At the chapter's close, the chamber of memory is destroyed, the manuscript house is ruined, and Jīvantī changes from the "water-maiden" to "Panidubbi" in the names used by the community. This transformation has several levels: the original name is partly effaced by the folk name, while the death survives in the communal mythology of danger and rescue. To call the transformation an unambiguous victory because "the name survived" would diminish the literary complexity of the episode.

The folk song positions the reader as a participant in collective feeling. But which group sings here? The prologue has the stage-manager, a later scene the boatmen's community, and the subsequent narration the words of villagers. These three voices have different social origins. Folk song is a form of memory distinct from classical archives, but the absence of explicit distinctions of class, gender, or caste within a community cannot automatically be equated with equality.

Narrative Time, Duration of Presentation, and Focalisation

The temporal movement changes from the first act's present disrupted by fire, to the protracted moments of crisis in the second, the morning institutional assembly in the third, the evening conversation of grief in the fourth, and the summary of many years in the epilogue. The moment of entrapment in the water is slowed by stage directions, pauses, and cries; the existence of the memorial chamber across many years is compressed into a paragraph. The contrast between scene and summary generates the narrative's emotional rhythm.

In the enacted acts the audience chiefly receives knowledge through exterior action, voiced dialogue, and stage directions, not through an uninterrupted omniscient account of one character's inner life. The stage-manager establishes leaps in time, the background of Udayana's book, and the future connection with Channa Gachhi. External theatrical focalisation is thus joined to the stage-manager's broad temporal knowledge. It is not always appropriate to accord the same reliability to what is seen onstage and to what the stage-manager confidently says about the future.

The epilogue's "patience of twelve hundred years" signals a non-natural narrative: Budhuā's age breaks the rules governing an ordinary historical human lifespan. The story makes this extended life a figure for a vow and for folk memory; it is not metaphysical evidence concerning biological longevity. Within the reader's possible world, memory can travel across historical generations in the form of a character. Whether this rule is applied coherently to new characters and timelines must, however, be examined in later chapters.

Trauma, Grief, and the Ethics of Representation

When Jīvantī disappears in the pond, the text does not indulge in excessive descriptions of bodily violence. Water movement, breathlessness, a broken utterance, and Budhuā's cry constitute the experience. Such restraint is appropriate to karuṇa-rasa, because attention falls upon silent loss rather than a spectacle of violence. Yet the reader's ethical task is not to forget structural accountability once grief has been expressed.

One can discern distinct movements of pathos, fear, wonder, and tranquillity in the terms of Indian poetics. The pond's depth is an excitant of fear; Jīvantī's predicament and Budhuā's helplessness centre the pathetic sentiment; the later folk belief in invisible rescue adds a dimension of wonder; and Udayana's reflections upon knowledge and memory move towards quiet contemplation. The chapter is therefore not a sustained enactment of one rasa but a sequence of changing aesthetic dispositions.

A question of aucitya nonetheless remains: in Act III, immediately after a recent death, the classical debate about the auspicious opening is quickly restored to the centre. This has a compositional and intellectual advantage, because an idea is tested against a concrete ethical event. Yet comparatively little space is given to the grief of Jīvantī's family, the other women studying with her, and the future she has lost. Criticism should acknowledge this absence while recognising the strength of the thematic argument.

Kiraṇāvalī and the Udayana–Jagannātha Narrative: Limits of Historical Claims

The original text identifies Udayanācārya as the author of Kiraṇāvalī and discusses a folk account concerning the absence of an auspicious invocation in that work. The historical allusion within the fiction, the modern invented dialogue, and the authenticated editorial text of the original Sanskrit treatise constitute separate layers. On the evidence of these passages alone, it would be incautious to announce a historical finding about the presence or absence of an invocation in every edition of Kiraṇāvalī, the chronology of its composition, or Udayanācārya's private decisions. This critique accepts the explicitly identified folk account for its literary function.

After the play concludes, a story of Udayanācārya's vision of Jagannātha in child form brings reason and devotion into contact. The embedded tale belongs more to the sphere of religious folk imagination than to established historical events. In the main drama, Udayana revises his criterion of success; in the folk narrative, the limits of reasoning become a question of experience. A philosophical resemblance between the two is possible, but the common use of Udayana's name does not justify conclusions about actual biography.

When classical Indian theory and modern narrative ethics are brought together, the Navya-Nyāya term pramāṇa should not be treated as an ordinary synonym for "social justice." Udayana's question, "At whose cost is something completed without obstruction?", is an ethical transformation, not a literal commentary upon an original Sanskrit Nyāya aphorism. The literary value lies in this new imaginative use, not in a spurious claim of classical originality.

Event Density: Independent Events, Causal Connections, and Temporal Weight

At least eight changes of state are apparent from an examination of the scenes: preparations for the movement of manuscripts; the falling lamp-stand and the fire; the report of three bundles remaining inside; Jīvantī's plan and dangerous entry into the pond; her disappearance after her hair becomes caught in roots; the presentation of the recovered bundles in the morning; Udayana's doctrinal revision following Someśvara's question; and the rule establishing a chamber of memory. The memorial's destruction and transformation into folk tradition in the epilogue constitute two further long-term consequences. Information and event have been distinguished in this register; the count is not a definitive statistical value.

In relatively few words, the night sequence of fire, pond, and disappearance produces three high-impact turns. The density of external events is more intense here than in the earlier philosophical acts, while decisions that transform knowledge are concentrated in the morning and evening. Udayana's initial doctrine of "unobstructed" completion is revised under the pressure of an irreversible outcome: this is the cognitive consequence of the event.

The causal chain contains decisive gaps. Why did the bundles that survived the fire not perish in the water? Why was Jīvantī unable to save herself? What was the relation, if any, between a possible crocodile and her hair becoming caught in roots? Were the monastery's safety rules improved, or was only a memorial record established? Filling these gaps without evidence would be reinvention, not criticism.

Scene-by-Scene Table: Event, Evidence, Cause, and Conclusion

Scene and time	Event of the scene	Attested transformation	Unresolved claim or limit
Prologue: night	Introduction of Budhuā, Jīvantī, and the preservation of treatises	A pledge travels across generations and institutions	The Vācaspati-Udayana connection is an invented narrative bridge
Act I	A lamp falls and starts a fire; three bundles remain	Time for study becomes emergency time	Alternative protections against the fire are unclear
Act I	Jīvantī decides to put the bundles in the pond	The agency and risk of service labour come into view	Equipment, helpers, and safety assessment absent
Act II	Her hair catches in roots; her voice fails; Jīvantī disappears	Jīvantī vanishes; Budhuā's attempted rescue fails	An actual crocodile attack is unproven
Act III	At dawn the bundles survive; Someśvara questions the auspicious beginning	Udayana revises his claim of an unobstructed beginning	The physical survival of the manuscript is only partially explained
Act III	Udayana orders the rescuer's name written at the gate	A proposed change in documentary recognition	Practical safety policy unspecified
Act IV	Budhuā and Udayana speak about an unfinished sentence and the memory chamber	Generational grief becomes a communal record	Jīvantī's final intention remains uncertain
Epilogue	The memory chamber is destroyed; "Water-Maiden" becomes a folk name	Institutional destruction and a new form of oral remembrance	Historical fact remains separate from oral tradition
After the drama	Traditions about the invocation in Kiraṇāvalī and Jagannātha's vision	Interpretative dimension of philosophical intertext	Not a stage event; external history unverified

Supportive and Opposing Assessments: Literary Achievement and Limitation

The chapter's major achievement is that it turns a symbol into an event. The first four chapters explored abstract questions of evidence through philosophical debate; here the competing values of manuscript, water, and human life collide in a concrete accident. Someśvara questions his teacher, who acknowledges the limits of an earlier knowledge-claim; a transformation of thought arises from a visible calamity. The author does not depict Jīvantī merely as a helpless casualty: she possesses her own plan and courage.

The principal limitation concerns the imbalance between this independent agency and the institution's ethics of labour. In place of the flood invoked by the folk song there is an actual risk of fire; the title "The Waterlogged Manuscript" may conflict with the stated fact that the bundle is kept above the water; alternatives to the hazardous rescue plan are not developed; and, despite the creation of a memorial to her name, the question of a living woman's rights receives insufficient treatment. The possible crocodile danger is particularly effective, but its actual participation in the event remains unresolved. All these limitations arise at points of instability in the original text.

Simply declaring the composition wholly successful or wholly unsuccessful would be inadequate. Its strengths reside in the folk resonance of the saying, the intergenerational burden of Budhuā's vow, the morning exchange between pupil and teacher, and the ethical proposal of institutional remembrance. The clarity of a didactic drama makes some characters one-dimensional, while the epilogue compresses an enormous span of time into a paragraph. This device opens out the scale of an epic saga, but limits the dramatic credibility of events developed through sustained experience.

The Chapter's Lasting Function in the Trilogy and the Next Question

"The Waterlogged Manuscript" builds a bridge from the trilogy's opening philosophical disputations towards social and environmental narrative. Budhuā's individual memory now becomes the shared property of an institutional archive, an imagined conversation across the philosophical traditions of Magadha and Mithila, and village mythology. Jīvantī's personal name changes within oral tradition, making the campaign to protect memory more complex than an uncomplicated success story.

As the narrative turns towards Chapter –94, "The Silence of Four Mouths," one important question emerges: once the chamber of memory has been destroyed, how are four different kinds of evidence—a book, a person, a folk song, and a mark left by water—to be tested against one another? No answer is conjectured here; it must be investigated through evidence in the next original text. The most appropriate conclusion of the present chapter is that writing down a name begins the work of justice, while human safety, accountability for decisions, and uncertainty about the truth must be examined alongside it.

Chapter –95: Index of Evidence Directly Checked against the Original

The following excerpts were collated with Chapter [–95] of the combined original manuscript. References by act, speaker, and epilogue are reliable; the collective printed page range 100–110 comes from the original contents and is not an independently verified individual page reference.

Opening saying: "A flood can submerge a book, but not the human voice."

Prologue, stage-manager: "With Budhuā there is also a pupil of his, Jīvantī."

Song, stage-manager: "The book grew wet, yet the song remained dry."

Act I, Someśvara: “There is no auspicious invocation at its beginning.”

Act I, Udayana: “Care, study, clear writing, and timely revision.”

Act I, pupil: “The lamp-stand has fallen.”

Act I, Jīvantī: “Three, Master! The oldest copy.”

Act I, Jīvantī: “Let us submerge it in the pond.”

Act I, Budhuā: “An old crocodile lives there.”

Act I, Jīvantī: “I know how to swim.”

Act II, Jīvantī: “The bundle is above the water, not submerged.”

Act II, Jīvantī: “My hair … it is caught in some roots.”

Act II, Budhuā: “Let go of the bundle; think of yourself!”

Act II, Jīvantī: “To bear witness for books is also …”

Act II, stage direction: “The bundle is in his hand, but Jīvantī is not there.”

Act III, Śambhunātha: “The manuscript survived.”

Act III, Udayana: “Did you first count the books, or think of Jīvantī?”

Act III, Someśvara: “A life has been sacrificed in this.”

Act III, Udayana: “My words last night were not false, but they were incomplete.”

Act III, Udayana: “The treatise itself remains indebted to that cost.”

Act III, Budhuā: “Protecting a truth already made public is a different task.”

Act IV, Budhuā: “Hulāsā’s name, and now Jīvantī’s name.”

Act IV, Udayana: “Just like Hulāsā’s palm leaf.”

Act IV, Budhuā: “This incompleteness is itself a form of evidence.”

Act IV, Udayana: “The register of treatises and the register of memory will proceed together.”

Epilogue, stage-manager: “The monastery itself fell into ruin.”

Epilogue, stage-manager: “Water-maiden.”

Epilogue, stage-manager: “Channa Gachhi.”

Critical Section 7 | Original Chapter −94 — The Silence of Four Mouths

The Chapter's Decisive Question: What Is Silence Amid Speaking Philosophies?

The first paradox in the title "The Silence of Four Mouths" is that all four mouths speak incessantly. The Sāṃkhya teacher Viśvambhara, the Cārvāka poet Rudradatta, the Buddhist monk Śīlabhadra, and the Mīmāṃsaka Harinātha each expound their own arguments. Silence is not the absence of words, but the failure to act together at the appropriate moment when confronted with a crisis. The opening formula, "All four mouths spoke, yet one thing remained concealed," makes this contradiction the chapter's subject. The question before the reader is not which of the four philosophies contains the ultimate truth; it is how the presence of a hungry person exposes the incompleteness of their supposedly comprehensive knowledge.

At least three meanings of "silence" operate in the title: the neglected voices of the hungry outside the gate; the ethical speechlessness that brings argument to a halt at Sohan's death; and the obligation to remember, acknowledged when the four scholars touch the tree with their hands in the fourth act. The first silence is violent neglect, the second a shock to conscience, and the third an institutional undertaking. These changes of meaning should not be mistaken for the mechanical repetition of a word: they are the axis of narrative transformation. The epilogue's tradition that voices can be heard within the bark of the peepal tree turns silence into a potential folk archive, without establishing that a supernatural occurrence has actually taken place.

Relation to the Previous Chapter: From the Memory Chamber to the Gate

In Chapter −95, "The Waterlogged Manuscript," Jīvantī's name, the vulnerability of written records, and Budhuā's pledge to preserve memory stood at the centre of the story. The new chapter begins at the same monastery of Udayanācārya, where the aged Budhuā still carries his conch and rope. Chapter −94 does not discard the events preceding it; rather, it alters the scope of the work of remembrance. The former question was how to inscribe the name of someone humiliated or lost in water. Now the immediate protection of a living, starving person becomes the test of remembrance. Erecting a memorial and saving a life are not the same act.

In the original stage introduction Udayana is described as "now extremely old," and Budhuā is likewise "very old." Having said that the Kiraṇāvalī has spread across Mithila, the stage-manager brings the audience into a year of famine. The number of years since the preceding events is not specified, but the ageing of bodies and the circulation of a book are compressed signs of historical time. This compression of long duration contrasts sharply with the moment-by-moment ethical time of the next four acts. The difference between summary and scene is a significant device of narrative organisation.

Stage, Place, and Two Assemblies: The Politics of the Gate

The monastery courtyard lies beneath the shade of a great peepal tree. Four scholars, Udayana, and Budhuā are on one side; a crowd afflicted by famine is outside the gate. This spatial division is not merely a convenient stage direction. The monastery becomes the institutional domain of knowledge, the gate a boundary of the right to enter, the granary a site of control over resources, and the peepal a possible location of public memory. The stage-manager's statement, "Hunger makes them speak, not scripture," makes clear the unequal positions of the two assemblies: one consists of selected speakers; the other of people brought together by hunger.

Initially, those beyond the gate exist as a collective clamour. Their individual names, families, castes, and occupations are not provided. Such anonymity conveys the breadth of the crisis, but also risks making the afflicted community into scenery. Sohan enters the inner assembly as a named representative, although he barely possesses the strength to speak. Realist criticism must observe that the distressed people have been allotted less speech than the philosophers. Calling this simply a pathetic scene would leave the problem of representation unexamined.

Map of Events: Five Transitions and an Unfulfilled Possibility

Narrative state	Textual evidence	Decision or transformation	Outstanding question
Prologue	Famine; a crowd at the gate	Two assemblies remain separate	What are the rules of the granary?
Act I	A pupil reports hunger	Udayana delays; Budhuā objects	Why was no immediate order issued?
Act II	The topic of disputation changes	Four answers, but no grain distributed	Who holds the authority to decide?
Act III	Sohan collapses; his body lies lifeless	A belated order to distribute grain	Where is the causal investigation of the crisis?
Act IV	Cremation and grain distribution	The four hands touch in witness	Where is the voice of Sohan's family?
Epilogue	Rule for checking the gate; folk designation	The folklore of "Brahmā of the Peepal" emerges	No independent confirmation that the rule was followed

The prologue establishes famine, a dried-up river, cracked fields, and the custom of holding assemblies. In the first act, while the four positions are being articulated, a disciple announces that more than thirty people are waiting and that some children have not eaten for three days. Udayana says he will attend to them as soon as the debate ends; Budhuā points out the discrepancy between the time of debate and the time of hunger. In the second act Udayana changes the subject, demanding specific answers from the philosophers about the crowd at the gate. Differences of doctrine turn towards decisions about action, but no order to distribute grain is yet given. Sohan enters and staggers. In the third act he falls at the roots of the peepal; the narrative describes his body as "lifeless." Only then does Udayana order the granary opened. The fourth act shows grain being distributed after the cremation. The four scholars touch the tree and accept its future significance as a witness to memory.

The event sequence is not reducible to the death. Postponement of a decision; failure to respond despite receiving information about an emergency; changing the rules of debate without acting; giving the order only after the death; and establishing a convention of checking the gate before subsequent assemblies are distinct changes of state. The five main transitions are linked through a close ethical chain of cause and effect, although calculating a numerical event rate would require separate event coding.

Temporal Order: Philosophical Time and the Intolerable Waiting of Hunger

The chapter's most powerful temporal construction is the clash over the word "first." Udayana wants the debate completed first; Budhuā wants hunger addressed first; each philosopher wants certain principles established before action. Rudradatta considers present and perceptible hunger sufficient grounds for an immediate decision. Into these competing priorities Sohan brings the time limit of his own body. The play's ethical tension lies not in the ultimate defeat of an argument but in the irreversible consequences of postponing action while thinking proceeds.

The first two acts unfold through extensive exposition. Death in the third occurs within a few brief stage directions and lines of dialogue. The silence of the body that will not rise bears more narrative weight than prolonged instruction. At the beginning of the fourth act the audience learns that Sohan's cremation has already occurred: the time between death and funeral has been omitted. The epilogue compresses the return of rain, green fields, later debates, and the growth of a folk name into a summary spanning years. Unequal durations put pressure on the reader, while the exact interval during which relief might have arrived before Sohan's death remains unspecified.

Four Philosophies: Independent Voices and Narrative Bias

Viśvambhara employs the language of prakṛti, the three guṇas, and discrimination in discussing the end of suffering; immediate grain distribution is not, in his account, the fundamental cure for suffering. This raises a distinction between long-term and immediate remedies, but the alleged transience of relief does not make it necessarily worthless. The play depicts one particularly severe application of his position. It would be unreasonable to infer from it a final judgement on the practical ethics of the entire Sāṃkhya tradition. Such a qualification preserves the distinction between the ideas of a literary character and the doctrine of a historical school.

Rudradatta openly demands that the hungry be fed: "Give them food, that is all." It therefore contradicts the text to say that all four characters are equally indifferent. His verbal demand is explicit, although he does not himself open the granary or organise the crowd onstage. The ethical directness of his argument and the absence of practical action coexist. Criticism must retain the distinction. If control of the stores belongs to Udayana and his disciples, Rudradatta's responsibility for inaction may be correspondingly more limited; the text does not spell out the distribution of authority.

Śīlabhadra speaks for compassion but becomes entangled in scholastic reflections on the threefold structure of giving. His characterisation contrasts compassion with the fog created by its explanation. He also expresses shame, allowing a small moment of self-correction. Yet complex ideas concerning the perfection of generosity do not represent the whole of Buddhist practice; they have been selected and compressed to achieve dramatic irony. Harinātha treats a gift as voluntary unless authorised by an injunction and argues from ownership of the granary. His speech exemplifies a rigid application of rules during a crisis; it is not identical with the entire historical tradition of Mīmāṃsā and its philosophy of duty.

Udayana's Change of Role: From Presiding over Debate to Acknowledging Fault

Udayanācārya begins as the assembly's president and the person with decision-making power at the monastery. His first decision—to wait for the debate to finish—becomes an ethical delay in the story's outcome. His change of subject in the second act is a significant intermediate alteration: he asks what all four philosophies have to say about the hungry crowd. Yet posing a question is not opening the granary. His intellectual awakening and his practical awakening occur at different moments, and Sohan's death exposes the distance between them.

In the third act the cry "Food … distribute food now! At once!" comes too late. In the fourth Udayana acknowledges that this was not philosophy's defeat, but the defeat of people who loved philosophy more than the person before them. The self-criticism does not undo the earlier delay, but it prevents him from being a wholly one-dimensional oppressor. Even at the end, the institutional power to name the peepal the "Witness Tree" remains with him. An ethical change has taken place without entirely transforming the structure of authority. No representative of the afflicted villagers is entrusted with drafting the new rule, an omission that criticism must note.

Budhuā: From a Pledge to Preserve Memory to Public Dissent

Budhuā is not an accredited representative of classical logic in this chapter, but he is the principal voice that redirects the actual decision. His statement in the first act, "Hunger does not wait for a philosophical debate to finish," is the most concise expression of the conflict over time. He is the first to run when Sohan falls. At the death he recalls the order of the philosophers' arguments and asks, "Food first, debate afterwards." Without recourse to any formal scholastic category, his question becomes the assembly's evidentiary test.

In the fourth act Budhuā effectively becomes a maker of the ethics of remembrance. Hulāsā's name on a stone, Jīvantī's in the memory chamber, and Sohan's death marked in the bark of a peepal constitute three levels of witnessing. Moving beyond the inscription of names, he makes the place itself a prompt that demands remembrance. But Budhuā, too, does not ask Sohan's family or a member of the hungry crowd to determine the wording of the new rule. The novel seeks to establish the worth of knowledge grounded in service rather than to condemn ignorance; equality in the authority to speak for memory nevertheless remains an unfinished aim.

Sohan: Receiving a Name, Losing a Voice, and the Ethical Difficulty of Representation

Sohan is named in the cast, but his time onstage is extremely brief. He staggers while saying, "For three days … the children …," and falls at the roots of the peepal. He receives no independent portrayal of illness, family, work, caste, or life before the famine. This reduction may be a deliberate dramatic compression: one body becomes the intolerable consequence placed before the doctrines. But the form also contains the risk that a sufferer becomes merely a means to awaken the conscience of respectable society.

The story describes a "lifeless body," so Sohan's death is an asserted fact of its fictional plot. It does not provide an independent medical investigation establishing starvation as the precise cause. The famine and his immediate collapse produce a powerful ethical implication, but the cause of death, absence of relief, and institutional responsibility require distinct examination. The event is decisive to the narrative's morality, but a fictional scene must not be cited as an actual historical record of death.

Narrator and Focalisation: Changing Authority of the Stage-Manager

In the prologue the stage-manager presents historical time, the spread of the book, the characters' old age, and the famine. Within the acts, stage directions, direct speech, movements of bodies, and sounds from the crowd become the principal sources of information. Signs such as "the four scholars are silent" or "eyes lowered" present observable conduct, not omniscient accounts of the whole interior lives of the characters. The epilogue restores the stage-manager's wider temporal view as he recounts rain, the convention that followed, and communal speech. Limited focalisation in the enacted scene thus alternates with expansive narration in summary.

The recurrence of "it is said" in the final folk account is important. The claim that four voices may be heard in the peepal's bark is not presented as a supernatural occurrence directly certified by the narrator; it is a belief reported within the story. It is therefore difficult to declare the chapter straightforwardly and definitively an instance of magical realism. More cautiously, it is a folkloric transformation of memory. Yet where the stage-manager preserves the limit of communal hearsay, the later prediction that "all four answers will prove false" speaks with more decisive moral certainty. Narrative distance changes between these two modes.

Levels of the Dramatic Narrative: Song, Stage Directions, and Subsequent Commentary

The chapter calls itself a dramatic work consisting of "a prologue, four acts, and an epilogue." Its introductory folk song anticipates the idea that all four mouths will speak while something remains silent; the subsequent action gives this premise concrete social meaning. The song foreshadows the ethical outcome, but by making the moral judgement clear even before the calamity, it may diminish the reader's uncertainty. At some points the four philosophical voices genuinely test one another; at others they become adversarial positions arranged by the author.

After the epilogue, the heading “Stories and Illustrations Associated with Sāṃkhya, Cārvāka, Buddhism, and Mīmāṃsā” introduces two explanatory notes, one on a famous Cārvāka maxim and the other on the Mīmāṃsā theory of injunctive statements. This philosophical supplementary text is not a stage event, even though it lies within the physical boundaries of the chapter. The discussion of the Cārvāka saying itself cautions that it is often cited through works written by opponents; it should not therefore be treated unquestioningly as a verbatim, authoritative statement from an original historical source. The distinction between analysis of the central drama and the author's collection of explanatory material is necessary for word counts, intertextual study, and verification of references alike.

Rasa, Dhvani, and Aucitya: The Force of Pathos and an Overly Simple Moral Resolution

The cracked earth of famine, news of starving children, Sohan's staggering arrival, and Budhuā's stillness by the dead body form the structure of karuṇa-rasa, the sentiment of pathos. Its effect arises not only from words of lamentation but from the unequal sense of urgency governing debate and immediate assistance. When the fall at the peepal's roots follows extended argument, the suggestion (dhvani) of silence is stronger than explicit speech. In the sense of Indian poetics it can be read as a social accusation whose force exceeds the everyday literal meaning of the words. This does not mean that dhvani in poetics and “focalisation” in modern narratology are interchangeable.

On the criterion of aucitya, or appropriateness, the movement in the fourth act from Sohan's death to the founding of the Witness Tree works effectively because a physical place becomes a durable sign of culpable neglect. Nevertheless, the instantaneous humility of the four scholars after the death and their ready acceptance of a new rule may seem too convenient. The text depicts no prolonged resistance, objection from the keeper of the grain, or inequalities in its distribution. The clarity of the desired ethical outcome strengthens the composition but lessens the complexity of the actual struggle. Uncritical praise of pathos would run counter to the novel's demand for justice.

A Navya-Nyāya Examination of Evidence: What Has and Has Not Been Established?

The subject (pakṣa) is the conduct of the participants in this particular monastery assembly; the property to be established (sādhya) is their ethical failure to provide immediate relief during the crisis; the reason (hetu) is the continued suspension of grain distribution after news of hunger had arrived. The disciple's report about the children is the dramatic form of testimony; the crowd's noise, Sohan's staggering, and his collapse are directly enacted evidence. Udayana's delayed order and later self-criticism are also established through the character's actions. These support the occurrence of institutional delay within the story. They do not establish a universal proposition such as "all philosophies are helpless in the face of hunger" from the evidence of a single assembly.

The inquiry into cause and effect raises the question of delimiting conditions: who actually controlled the grain, whether disciples could distribute it independently, and whether sufficient supplies were available during famine remain unspecified. Without these facts it risks fallacious reasoning to treat the existence of all four philosophies as a sufficient cause of Sohan's death. Rudradatta, in particular, calls for immediate assistance, so the proposed reason of uniformly shared inaction is unestablished. A stronger conclusion is that the person who possessed decision-making power acted late, and the play makes the moral consequences of that delay visible. This is an application of Navya-Nyāya tools to the novel's reasoning, not a verbatim reproduction of a historical debate found in a primary treatise.

The Videha Parallel-History Perspective: Folk Archives and Institutional Forgetting

The debates at the monastery form a systematic history of metaphysical thought; hunger outside its gate might easily remain marginal in the official record. Budhuā refuses to confine this difference to a stone inscription or manuscript and makes it a discipline of communal memory. The names Hulāsā, Jīvantī, and Sohan become an attempt to connect three different forms of neglect and preservation of testimony. In this sense the peepal is an alternative archive. Its principal evidence is not miraculous voices but the collective convention of asking about conditions at the gate before beginning any debate.

Yet the Videha parallel-history method is not confined to adding neglected names. It also asks who possesses the authority to construct history. Udayana names the peepal the "Witness Tree," the four philosophers leave marks of touch, and Budhuā makes the proposal, but no collective signatures of the hungry are shown. The absence of Sohan's family's account must remain on the critical record. The teacher's transformation matters; a history owned by its sufferers remains a question, not a completed achievement.

Environmental Narrative: The Dry River, Grain Store, and Body of the Tree

Famine is more than scenic decoration. The dried river and cracked fields establish the conditions of scarcity, while people gathering at the monastery gate raise the question of distributing the grain kept within. Nature and institution are directly related: the lack of water intensifies social hardship, but the grain held in storage makes relief possible. Thus a failure of human decision-making cannot be dismissed as nothing more than natural disaster. For understanding the trilogy built around Channa Gachhi, ponds, rivers, and sites of memory, this inverted form of the water crisis—water's absence—is particularly significant.

The peepal supplies shade at the beginning, receives Sohan's fallen body at its roots in the third act, becomes the site of witnessing by touch in the fourth, and carries a folk name in the epilogue. One natural object thus performs four narrative functions. The rain and green fields at the end nevertheless signify the passing of famine without depicting concrete reforms to food distribution, seed preservation, or water management. If natural recovery is equated with social justice, the novel's environmental question remains only half answered.

Construction of the Metaphor: From Witness Tree to "Brahmā of the Peepal"

The placing of the four scholars' hands upon the bark in Act IV is an ordinary, visible action. Udayana subsequently declares the tree's public name. In the epilogue villagers gradually begin calling it "Brahmā of the Peepal," associating four mouths with the four schools of philosophy. Visible action, institutional naming, and communal tradition form three successive stages of meaning. Four mouths may evoke the traditional many-faced iconography of Brahmā, but no actual divine incarnation is established within the drama.

Through this transformation the tree becomes a natural archive: its roots witnessed a death, its bark received the sign of touch, and its name became a warning to future generations. The opening song declares that silence remains behind all answers; at the end the tree seems to bear many voices. The primary warning, however, is that no one's hunger should be disregarded. The symbol succeeds ethically if that meaning actually changes conduct. The play provides no practical verification beyond the epilogue's statement that it does.

Polyphony and Its Limits: How Autonomous Are the Opposing Voices?

Each philosopher has a different mode of speech: the conceptual scheme of Sāṃkhya, the sensory immediacy and sarcasm of Cārvāka, Buddhist compassion and the perplexities of emptiness, and Mīmāṃsā's authority of injunction. These differences make the play polyphonic to a degree, but its plurality of voices is not entirely autonomous. Udayana and Budhuā retain the authority to establish the ethical conclusion, and all four opponents arrive at broadly similar repentance. Rudradatta's earlier demand for immediate relief particularly complicates this uniform ending. It is unjust to assign him exactly the culpability of Harinātha, whose appeal to rules obstructed assistance.

Sociologically, the villagers remain a collective sound rather than participants in an independent deliberation. The figure "more than thirty" lends an almost administrative specificity, but the naming stops at Sohan. The story attacks the authority of elite knowledge, yet its own narrative structure gives learned men more opportunities to speak. Calling this simply a failure would flatten the difficulty. It is better to register the contradiction and ask whether the people acquire more expansive voices later in the trilogy.

Achievements, Limitations, and a Revisable Conclusion for the Trilogy

The chapter's chief achievement is to connect complex philosophical disputation to a concrete public decision. The site of debate, the crowd at the gate, Sohan's diminished speech, Udayana's delayed order, Budhuā's dissent, and the touch of the peepal are organised into one dramatic line. Previously, preservation of a name had centred upon individual memory; now it aspires to become a rule of collective ethical conduct. The silence in the title acquires not only an emotional meaning but a political one: the failure to act in time.

The limitations are equally concrete. Rudradatta is placed among the equally guilt-ridden despite his express defence of immediate assistance; the Sāṃkhya, Buddhist, and Mīmāṃsā positions are sometimes oversimplified; Sohan's death functions more as a catalyst for philosophical instruction than as the conclusion of an independent life; the hungry crowd's voice is compressed into collective noise; and reform is largely represented by immediate assent and popular naming. No institutional account of Sohan's death or grain distribution is presented; the return of rain does not prove that the structural causes of starvation have disappeared. These questions arise from a serious testing of the chapter's ethical claim, not from a dismissal of its achievements.

The peepal becomes first a source of shade, then the site of death, then the place of a name. The moral order of "first" changes; the voices of the four mouths end not in victory but in self-examination. The epilogue anticipates that all four answers will prove false in the future Channa Gachhi narrative. That prediction must be tested against subsequent chapters, not treated as an event already fulfilled. With this qualification, "The Silence of Four Mouths" becomes an important early junction between knowledge, hunger, evidence, and public memory within the trilogy.

Chapter −94: Index of Evidence Collated with the Original Text

Prologue, stage-manager: "Hunger makes them speak, not scripture."

Prologue, folk song: "Those who gave all the answers still had one question left."

Act I, disciple: "More than thirty people have gathered."

Act I, Udayanācārya: "I shall come as soon as the debate ends."

Act I, Budhuā: "Hunger does not wait for a philosophical debate to finish."

Act II, Udayanācārya: "I am changing the subject of today's debate."

Act II, Rudradatta: "Give them food, that is all."

Act II, Harinātha: "The monastery's grain belongs to the monastery, not the village."

Act II, Śīlabhadra: "I … I said it only for the sake of scholastic clarity."

Act II, Sohan: "Master … for three days … the children …"

Act III, stage direction: "Sohan falls at the roots of the peepal."

Act III, Udayanācārya: "Food … distribute food now! At once!"

Critical Section 8 | Original Chapter −93 — The Conch's Final Question

Chapter −93, “The Conch's Final Question,” is the eighth chapter of Part Zero. In the contents of the original combined novel its opening is given as page 120, while the following Chapter −92, “The Prisoner of the Water Clock,” begins on page 131. Accordingly, pages 120–130 are the printed-page range attributable to the chapter. This is a range inferred from the contents, however, and not independently checked page by page against a printed copy. It would be wrong to treat the proportion of text to pages as an actual count of events: a single disputational dialogue may raise several questions, while how far a character's position changes remains a separate issue. The opening saying, “Even what you have once recognised asks you again at dawn,” establishes a repeated tension between recognition and doubt. The specific research question posed by the original entry is how the proposition, opposition, and verdict of a philosophical debate are transformed into narrative, and whether argument enters a character's lived actions or remains mere exposition. The present criticism examines that question against narrative consequences, the epistemology of Navya-Nyāya, and the ethical demands of compassion.

From “The Conch and Silver” to “The Final Question”: The Narrative Commitment of Return

The initial conch-and-silver dispute in Chapter −100 returns here as the remembered past of the fictional world. Both the stage-manager and Budhuā state that the Objector's doubt goes back sixty years. Thus an illustration introduced once does not remain an isolated subject. It returns across an interval of seven chapters having absorbed experiences of death, social failure, and the inscription of names. This connection between the order of events and their presentation matters. The enacted scene takes place in the evening in a quiet courtyard behind Udayanācārya's monastery; within it, however, the narrator gathers the first debating hall of Vācaspati, the deaths of Hulāsā, Jīvantī, and Sohan, and the village's future memory. This is not mere repetition. The value of the question has changed: what began as a problem in knowledge has become a question about the worth of one person's sixty years of lived experience. Nevertheless, “sixty years” is a temporal claim internal to the story, not independently verified historical chronology.

Theatre within the Composition: Prologue, Four Acts, and Epilogue

The chapter describes itself as “an original dramatic work divided into a prologue, four acts, and an epilogue.” Its list of characters includes the stage-manager, Udayanācārya, Budhuā, the Objector, the disciple Keśava, and the council. The council's purported "whispering," however, does not develop into substantive independent dialogue: the real exchange is concentrated in the triangle formed by Udayana, the Objector, and Budhuā. The prologue restores the memory of the old debate; Act I brings the Objector physically into the scene and raises the question of death; Act II extends the crisis of the knower through a discussion of three accounts of erroneous cognition; Act III introduces Budhuā's ethical answer and reinterprets doubt as an existential condition; Act IV changes the rules of the represented world through death and a silver-like radiance; and the epilogue both closes and reopens the story through communal belief, funeral rites, and anticipations of later events. Stage directions and the stage-manager's external narration operate on different levels. Speech within the play belongs to particular people, while the epilogue's formula "it is said" marks knowledge transmitted by hearsay within the community.

Event Map: From the Arrival of a Question to Posthumous Folk Memory

Sequence on stage	Direct evidence	Change of state	Critical limitation
Prologue	Vācaspati's assembly; return of the Objector	Sixty years of uncertainty made public	Events during the intervening years are not developed
Act I	Keśava brings in the elderly man; Budhuā recognises him	A guest becomes an old philosophical opponent	Travel details rest on recollection
Act II	Three theories of error; the question of the knower	A doctrinal answer becomes a personal crisis	Doctrinal disagreement does not prove the absence of truth
Act III	Budhuā names three deceased persons	A turn from epistemic proof toward an ethics of witnessing	The causes of the three social tragedies differ
Act IV	Silver-like radiance after the Objector's death	The last question remains unanswered; a marvel is witnessed	The metaphysical cause of the radiance is unknown
Epilogue	Cremation; the name "Rākash"; folklore surrounding the tree	A personal question enters communal memory	Folklore does not independently corroborate fact

The demonstrable changes of state can be arranged in five stages. First, Keśava brings a helpless elderly visitor to the monastery; Budhuā identifies him by his voice, and a stranger becomes an old acquaintance. Second, the Objector redirects the competition of ideas towards his own fear of death; the purpose of the debate changes. Third, Udayana proposes a limited common ground between rival positions, but the Objector rejects this resolution by asking about the knower. Fourth, Budhuā sets aside the standard scholastic response and speaks of Hulāsā, Jīvantī, Sohan, and the moral meaning of his decision to bear witness. The Objector dies before he can finish his final utterance. Fifth, the strange silver-like light and its movement towards the tree become the folk belief named "Rākash" in the epilogue. External action is restricted, while knowledge, emotion, and communal remembrance undergo substantial transformations. It is consistent with the novel's critical discipline not to impose a conclusive explanation where none is given. To call the Objector's death immediate proof of self-realisation would be an overreading.

Time: The Compression of Sixty Years and the Extended Hours of an Evening

Using Gérard Genette's concepts of narrative time, sixty years of story-time are presented through brief recollection, while a few hours of scenic time expand into prolonged dialogue. The stage-manager begins with a summary of the distant past; Budhuā later becomes a witness to that memory; the epilogue leaps forward to the funeral and to a tradition said to endure for years. The changing light, from a saffron evening sky to deep moonlight, also measures time within the scene. The formal four acts divide the evening, but the Objector's weakening breath conveys its irreversible movement. The story gives neither the exact day or year of his death nor a historically precise date linking Vācaspati's assembly to Udayana's monastery. A definitive external chronology therefore cannot be derived from the memory of sixty years. The compression succeeds in revealing the generational life of a philosophical dispute, although the intervening journey is sustained largely by retrospective statements rather than enacted experience.

"Who Speaks?" and "Who Sees?": Stratification of the Narrator

At the beginning, the stage-manager directly addresses the audience —"You will remember"—and recalls the preceding chapters. This is the external organising voice, not the private experience of one of the dramatic characters. In the central courtyard scene the dialogue belongs to the characters, while the stage directions register observable conditions without claiming exhaustive access to anyone's mind. Keśava does not know the Objector's identity; Budhuā recognises his voice; Udayana knows the name and its circumstances from the tradition handed down by his teacher. Through these three modes of knowing, the composition presents the difference between immediate perception, memory, and inherited verbal testimony without affixing abstract theoretical labels to every event. At the end Keśava is frightened by the radiance, Udayana acknowledges "I do not know," and Budhuā interprets it as a memorial to doubt. The three responses to the same extraordinary sight prevent the reader from depending on a single omniscient explanation.

The Objector: The Right to Question Rather Than a Fixed Doctrine

After an interval of seven chapters, the Objector returns not simply as an old participant in philosophical controversy but as a person troubled by the cost of his questioning. Declaring, "This question is not for the debate; it is for me myself," he turns away from the public reward of victory towards a private crisis of life. In Act II he does not declare methods of knowledge worthless. He says he agrees with the theory of anyathākhyāti, yet still faces the separate questions of whether his entire life has been an illusion and what the knower's reality might be. Thus the opposing character is not reduced to a thoughtless atheist or an obstacle. Nevertheless, after he says, "I … am seeing something clearly," his final sentence breaks off. The composition deliberately withholds the last answer even as the silver radiance tempts the reader to believe that an answer has arrived. The character's dignity lies in his continuing right to question, not in surrender to a particular school.

Udayanācārya: Dialogue between Positions and the Acceptance of Ignorance

In explaining anyathākhyāti, Udayana emphasises the actual difference between the conch and silver and their erroneous conjunction in cognition. When the Objector supplies other explanations, Udayana says that disagreement between schools does not necessarily deny the actual occurrence of illusory experience; they differ over its inner mechanism. This searches for a minimum of agreement in the structure of dispute, not a final settlement of ontology. When Budhuā seeks to answer, Udayana restrains his own teaching authority and gives him permission to speak—a concrete redistribution of speech onstage. The last test of this act comes in Act IV: when the disciple asks about the light, Udayana replies, "I do not know, Keśava." Admitting the boundary of knowledge is here an ethical achievement. Any subsequent explanation qualified by "perhaps," however, remains inference, not verified evidence of the event's cause.

Budhuā: From a Servant's Voice to the Ethical Authority of a Witness

Budhuā does not treat his experience of service as a merely deferential tradition. Having witnessed Sohan's death from hunger in Chapter –94, he now speaks the names "Hulāsā, Jīvantī, Sohan" and argues that the formal instruments of proof repeatedly arrived too late, whereas the decision to bear witness could not always be postponed. This is the decisive narrative turn. In Act III Budhuā asks the teacher's permission to speak. Social hierarchy remains intact at the level of form, but the ethical centre of the subject shifts from the head of the monastery to the servant. He does not say that knowledge is useless; he calls attention to the practical limits of knowledge. His insistence upon memory and love is not a philosophical demonstration of the self but a demand for responsibility grounded in experience. There is a critical limitation as well: the three dead persons are present in Budhuā's recollection, but none speaks in this scene. Naming victims and giving them independent rights of representation are not the same thing.

Theories of Error and Their Test under Navya-Nyāya

The play presents anyathākhyāti, akhyāti, and anirvacanīyakhyāti as three distinct classical accounts. It would be inappropriate to collapse the Nyāya-Vaiśeṣika account of the perceived conch, the recollection of silver seen elsewhere, and their erroneous attribution into the Prābhākara doctrine of failing to apprehend a distinction. Advaita's anirvacanīyakhyāti likewise makes a specific proposal concerning the real-or-unreal status of cognition, not a vague assertion that "both are true" or "both are false." The speakers and the post-dramatic explanation provide abbreviated literary forms of these teachings, not substitutes for a complete history of their textual traditions. The Objector's inference—different schools disagree, therefore truth is impossible to establish—would have as its subject the ontological nature of illusion, as its reason the diversity of interpretations, and as its property to be proved the impossibility of determination. Its required pervasion, "where there is disagreement, evidence fails," is not established. Disagreement does not entail the falsity of every proof. Udayana identifies the limit of this defective inference; he does not thereby establish the existence of the knower or resolve life and death.

The Transformation of the Question: Epistemic Proof and Practical Choice

The Objector asks directly: if his entire life has been an illusion, "who was the knower of that illusion?" Budhuā locates his answer not within the dispute over proofs but in the human decision to become a witness. The Objector immediately counters, "But that is not an answer to the question of knowledge," and Budhuā explicitly concedes the point. This concession must not be overlooked. The composition does not resolve the metaphysical problem of epistemology here; rather, it distinguishes that problem from the sphere of ethical conduct. Knowing the truth of an object through perception or inference and deciding to protect someone's memory are different kinds of claims. When "evidence falls silent," it does not follow that whatever contradicts the evidence must be true. What becomes clear is only that practical duties cannot invariably wait for complete philosophical certainty. This fine distinction is the chapter's most successful development of ideas.

Symbols: The Conch's Own Worth and the Lure of Silver

The familiar conch-and-silver illustration becomes a metaphor for existence rather than remaining a standard example of erroneous sight. Budhuā tells the Objector that the conch has worth even when it is not silver, because it is a conch and someone holds it. The worth of existence enters in place of the mere correctness of identifying an object. Remarkably, after the death a silver-like radiance emerges near the Objector's eyes. Silver, initially the symbol of mistaken identity, now seems to become the shining of a question. The attractiveness of the transformation also creates a critical tension: if the moral demand is to see the conch as a conch, why does the text finally lead the reader towards a seemingly miraculous answer in the form of silver light? This may be deliberate intertextual irony, but the source provides no single definitive resolution. Treating the radiance as direct proof of a self or a philosophical truth would go beyond the text.

Death, Unnatural Narrative, and the Rules of Possible Worlds

The Objector's breath fails in Act IV, and the stage directions present his death. Immediately afterwards a small silver-like light rises into the air and moves towards the peepal. Within realist stage conventions this is extraordinary. If the story accepts such an event as part of its magical-social world's rules, it can be read as unnatural narrative. Yet the composition does not turn the event into unanimous knowledge among the characters: Keśava asks a question, Udayana admits his bewilderment and ignorance, and Budhuā offers a commemorative interpretation. A distance remains between "what was seen" and "what it means." Unless these levels are separated, an unusual image will be mistaken for proof of a metaphysical entity. The villagers' later naming of it "Rākash" is a communal act of naming, not a scientifically established classification of something supernatural. The phonetic or cultural etymology of that name is not independently established by the scene.

The Peepal as Witness Tree: The Social Transformation of Place

Following Sohan's death in Chapter –94, the peepal was proposed as the Witness Tree. Here its shade becomes a place associated with the Objector's funeral, while the tradition of the light gathers around it. Repetition turns the tree from a fixed emblem into a spatial archive of memory. Events in the monastery courtyard enter communal recollection through its roots. An active environmental disaster involving river, pond, or water is not central to this scene; names associated with the previous water calamity survive within the tradition of remembrance. From the perspective of environmental narratology, the peepal is not a direct agent making human decisions, but it is a durable physical location through which evidence may be carried across generations. Its literary power lies in that social persistence: the tree does not itself pronounce a philosophical verdict.

The Ethics of Narration: Victims' Names and the Silence of the Dead

Budhuā's invocation of Hulāsā, Jīvantī, and Sohan brings three distinct earlier tragedies into the dramatic present. Hulāsā's incomplete writing, Jīvantī's disappearance in water, and Sohan's hunger belong to different narrative situations. Gathering them under one philosophical concern creates a link through memory, but it may also displace investigation of the particular social or administrative causes of each death. Sohan's death had specifically been linked to the failure to distribute food in time; here it risks being absorbed into the general metaphor of "evidence arriving late." To preserve the dignity of the victims, criticism must retain the distinctions: not every death is an identical example of evidentiary failure. Because the Objector's last sentence breaks off, the dead man has no completed reply. The author's refusal to supply one may itself be a sign of ethical restraint.

Song, Dhvani, and Rasa: The Rhythm of an Open Question

The epilogue's song recalls the language of the opening saying: questions do not tire, and answers need not be feared. Such recurrence strengthens the chapter's circular form. The narrative returns from the conch-and-silver opening to the conch. Karuṇa-rasa emerges in the elderly Objector's death, adbhuta-rasa in the silver-like radiance, and the possibility of tranquillity in Budhuā's words that "doubt has now come to rest." The play, however, deliberately leaves unresolved whether the Objector attained a definite answer. A complete realisation of the tranquil sentiment cannot therefore be asserted. In terms of suggestion (dhvani), the tension between a "fixed answer" and "asking again" is significant: questioning does not simply destroy an answer but subjects it to trial. The song's limitation is that some argumentative complexity is compressed into uncomplicated encouraging verses. Yet its function in carrying a sombre scene of death towards collective memory is creatively effective.

Intertextuality and History: Mithila's Schools and Literary Characters

The names Vācaspati Miśra and Udayanācārya, together with references to Nyāya-Vaiśeṣika, Prābhākara Mīmāṃsā, and Advaita Vedānta, connect the imagined world with a long philosophical tradition. But Udayana's supposed conversation here, and Budhuā's reunion with the Objector after sixty years, cannot be treated as verified historical events. They are dialogues composed by the novelist using classical names and concepts. The post-dramatic note, "Doctrinal Differences concerning the Conchand-Silver Theory of Illusion," is not part of the plot but explanatory material supplied by the author. It distinguishes the approaches of Nyāya, Prābhākara thought, and Advaita. To identify it as a verbatim translation of the original Sanskrit treatises would require separate verification against textual editions. The Videha parallel-history perspective is useful here for connecting scholastic discourse to popular witness: the servant Budhuā's experience acquires value, but it cannot simply stand in place of the dead persons' own perspectives.

Distribution of Information: Unequal Knowledge among New and Returning Readers

Readers who have progressed from Chapter –100 possess the background of the Objector's name, the earlier illustration of illusion, and Budhuā's witnessing. The new scene briefly recalls that history through a few expressions. But someone reading Chapter –93 in isolation encounters the three dead persons only in compressed references, not through the complete causal histories of their deaths. This compression brings both advantages and risks to a long narrative. By saying "You will remember," the stage-manager activates readers' memory while assuming they have read the preceding chapters. The epilogue anticipates a later kabaddi game at Channa Gachhi and the radiance associated with Rākash. Such anticipation cannot be called final confirmation; it is a promise to be tested in subsequent narrative. The chapter stages not the extinction of doubt, but its transformation.

Critical Judgement: Achievements, Limitations, and the Next Narrative Turn

This chapter is notable for connecting its earlier philosophical debate with death, memory, and the ethical speech of a servant. The personalisation of the Objector's question, Budhuā's social memory, Udayana's admission of ignorance, and the relative autonomy of folk belief are its strengths. Its greatest achievement is that disagreement in argument is not taken as the destruction of argument itself: an unfinished final sentence restrains claims to certainty. Its principal limitation is that most of the burden of the sixty-year intellectual journey falls upon the stage-manager's account rather than scenes from the Objector's intervening life. The different social causes of Hulāsā's, Jīvantī's, and Sohan's losses risk excessive compression into a single moral formula; and the literary success of the silver radiance can give a deceptive impression of miraculous resolution. The word "victory" in the final song does not harmonise completely with the Objector's unanswered last utterance. It should be read critically as an irony of the open question. In the next Chapter –92 the life of the disciple Keśava and the village's judicial processes move forward. The extent to which the ethical insight achieved here passes into institutional action will therefore receive another substantial test.

Chapter −93: Index of Evidence Directly Collated with the Original Text

Prologue, stage-manager: “Long ago, in Vācaspati Miśra's debating hall.”

Cast: “The disciple Keśava—Udayana's young student.”

Setting: “A quiet courtyard behind the monastery.”

Act I, Keśava: “He does not tell us his name.”

Act I, Budhuā: “Sixty years have passed.”

Act I, Objector: “This question is not for the debate; it is for me myself.”

Act I, Objector: “What is death? The end of illusion.”

Act II, Udayana: “Illusion is false cognition, not a false object.”

Act II, Objector: “Three schools, three answers.”

Act II, Objector: “Who was the knower of that illusion?”

Act III, Budhuā: “This is not a question of scripture but of life.”

Act III, Budhuā: “Hulāsā, Jīvantī, Sohan.”

Act III, Objector: “But that is not an answer to the question of knowledge.”

Act III, Budhuā: “Perhaps the answer to your question is not in knowledge.”

Act III, Budhuā: “Only see the conch as a conch.”

Act IV, Objector: “For the first time in sixty years, I am seeing something clearly.”

Act IV, stage direction: “His breath fails.”

Act IV, stage direction: “A silver-like radiance emerges.”

Act IV, Keśava: “What is this?”

Act IV, Udayana: “I do not know, Keśava.”

Act IV, Budhuā: “Doubt has now come to rest.”

Epilogue: “Rākash.”

Epilogue: “At the kabaddi game in Channa Gachhi.”

Post-dramatic note: “Anyathākhyāti, akhyāti, and anirvacanīyakhyāti.”

Critical Section 9 | Original Chapter −92 — The Prisoner of the Water Clock

Chapter −92, "The Prisoner of the Water Clock," is the ninth original chapter of Part Zero. The contents of the combined original novel give its opening as page 131 and the beginning of the next chapter, −91, "The Light of the Leatherworkers' Quarter," as page 138; its printed-page reference is therefore 131–137. This is the page span supplied by the source's contents, not an automatic page count from this combined Word document or an independent recount of a printed copy. The "high-intensity indicator" signifies only a mechanical proportion of action-related paragraphs; it cannot be treated as evidence of a definite number of events per thousand words. The following analysis joins that question to social justice, unequal access to information, and institutional control over time.

A Transformation of Narrative Form: From the Stage of Philosophical Debate to the Village Tribunal

Up to Chapter −93, cast lists, acts, and stage directions largely governed the dramatic form. The new chapter declares its form at the outset: "An excerpt from a novel; moving away from dramatic form into narrative." This is more than a decorative change. The focus shifts from definitions of philosophical principles to the everyday operation of justice, irrigation of fields, the effects of debt, and the opportunity to be heard. Addressing the audience in the first person, the narrator says, "I am going to tell you today," explicitly distinguishing the time of the events from the time of their telling. Keśava, the youthful disciple of the preceding chapter, is now Ācārya Keśava; the philosophical inheritance of his teacher is being tested within judicial procedure. Budhuā remains a witness bearing a conch, but his role moves from witnessing philosophical questions to witnessing the deprivation of social opportunity. The chapter is consequently both a continuation of the preceding philosophical debates and a practical examination of their claims.

Establishing Time and Place: "Narikel-Ghat" and the Future "Garh Narikel"

The narrator explicitly states that the village was called "Narikel-Ghat" at the time of these events; the word "Garh" will be added later in connection with the construction of an embankment to ward off flooding. This shift in names between Narikel-Ghat of the past and Garh Narikel of the present carries the reader forward towards a future time, while the immediate action remains located in the earlier village. The two portions of the paired ponds—one deep, the other shallow—and the channel connecting them constitute a concrete arrangement of local waters. The peepal witness-tree, the line of coconut trees, and the bend in the Kamala-Balan are thoroughly physical places; they should not be dismissed as mere symbols. What appears first is not the village's official political history but the local geography of livelihood. The fisher Dhīvar, the rice cultivator Sukhdev, buffaloes, and uses of water are brought into one frame. Together they show that control over the channel is not a private quarrel between two families but a question of communal subsistence.

A Causal Map of Events: From Blocking the Channel to a Rule Made After Death

Sequence of events	Direct textual basis	Change of state	Unresolved or critical question
Establishing the location	Narikel-Ghat, Jorī pond, peepal tree	Water, fields, and communal hearings converge at one place	The later name "Garh" postdates the narrative event
Blocking the channel	Ugrasen's men obstruct the flow of water	Sukhdev's rice and animals are endangered	Full evidence of the title dispute is absent
Waiting	Partition deed; priority accorded to a royal officer	The claim of right is repeatedly deferred	The order of three years, three weeks, and six weeks is unclear
Interrupted hearing	The lawyer raises a fresh technical objection	Time measured by the bowl becomes an instrument of dominance	The lawyer's independent counterposition is thin
Death	The incomplete words "Teacher, my daughter …"	A living person loses the chance to testify	Medical cause of death is not established
Reform of procedure	Waiting more than three days now confers priority	Keśava's institution changes	Land remains with the steward; no compensation
Narrative of remembrance	"Loth"; unnamed daughter; witness-tree	An unheard voice survives in oral memory	Folklore is not direct historical proof

The first state is Sukhdev's dependence upon the channel connected to the paired ponds for irrigating his half-bigha field. Second, Ugrasen's men block that channel and claim ancestral ownership; the field and the animals' water supply are endangered. Third, Sukhdev brings an old partition deed before the tribunal, but a marriage dispute, priority given to a government official, and the lawyer's technical objections prolong his hearing. Fourth, amid heat and scarcity of water, Sukhdev's field, his buffalo Kajrī, and his own body deteriorate. He begins the sentence "Master, my daughter …" but cannot finish and collapses in the assembly. Fifth, Budhuā intervenes, Keśava recognises the limits of the procedure, and the "Sukhdev Rule" is introduced, giving priority to someone who has waited more than three days. Sixth, despite this procedural reform, Sukhdev's land passes into the hands of Ugrasen's accountant, the dead man's daughter's name is absent from the record, and the folklore of the "Loth" preserves the memory of an unfinished reply. The new rule is not a final resolution: the deceased man's unanswered grievance leaves the narrative open.

The Time of Judicial Procedure: An Equal Clock, Unequal Opportunity

The ghaṭikā instrument is a perforated brass bowl: after its allotted time has passed, it fills with water and sinks. In philosophical debate, an instrument meant to limit the otherwise endless elaboration of a speaker becomes a means of protecting the powerful in a village tribunal. Each technical question from the lawyer demands another interval measured by the clock; Sukhdev never fully obtains the opportunity to put forward his case. The chapter's social irony arises from the difference between the instrument's physically impartial movement and its institutional deployment. Saying, "If I hear Sukhdev first today," Keśava fears that the whole procedure will collapse. Yet giving people an equal duration and ensuring an equal opportunity to be heard are different things. The narrative's achievement lies in its refusal to locate the source of injustice solely in Ugrasen's personal wickedness: a voice trapped inside an approved system of rules may also suffer institutional violence.

The Twofold Structure of Time: A Three-Year Dispute and Six Weeks of Waiting

The text states that Sukhdev first appeared before the assembly three years earlier. Later it mentions a wait of three weeks and says that six weeks passed. On reading, these details do not produce an unambiguous personal calendar. Does the six-week period describe a final phase of a long-running dispute that began three years earlier, or does the narrative, while compressing time, leave out a connecting interval? The text offers no definitive answer. These uneven temporal signals should therefore be identified as a possible looseness in plotting, not concealed by an assertion of faultless chronology. Their emotional effect is nevertheless clear: every repetition of "Come tomorrow" consumes an irrecoverable part of bodily life. The humanly constructed time of the tribunal may be deferred or renewed; the field's drying season and the body approaching death cannot recover that time. This collision is the central temporal principle of the chapter.

Narrator, Focalisation, and Categories of Evidence

The opening "I" suggests a later narrator situated long after the events. This voice knows the future name of the village, the subsequent Sukhdev Rule, and even modern files and the corridors of law courts. Its range of knowledge exceeds that of the characters within the episode. Yet the narrator deliberately does not complete Sukhdev's final, unfinished sentence; the breadth of narrative authority is restrained at this point.

Waiting and bodily movement are seen through Budhuā's eyes; Keśava's inner difficulty emerges in the form of questions; and independent access to the minds of Ugrasen or the lawyer is slight. The description of the ghostly figure introduced with "it is said" belongs to the level of popular report, not to direct proof supplied by the narrator. Visible events, characters' utterances, retrospective judgements, and folklore must thus be treated as four distinct evidentiary positions.

Sukhdev Mahato: An Agent, a Man Kept Waiting, and the Failure to Speak

At the outset Sukhdev is not merely a victim. He possesses a field, a family, an old partition deed, a buffalo, and an explicit claim to a right. Arriving at the hearing on time, bringing his document, and appearing repeatedly are all active efforts. Yet the powerful man's objections govern the tribunal's agenda, and Sukhdev's role is gradually reduced from active claimant to silent petitioner. The image of a body sitting "in the sun, then in the shade" establishes an affinity with the roots of the peepal tree, to which the narrative returns near his death. The symbolism is painful: the man who sought justice for his livelihood becomes, in the end, a record of delay within the system of adjudication itself. The story, however, does not identify a medically verified direct cause of death. Heat, weakness resembling starvation, and prolonged waiting are causal circumstances presented by the narrative, not a clinically demonstrated diagnosis.

"My Daughter …": The Ethical Right of an Unfinished Sentence

At the final moment Sukhdev can say only, "Master, my daughter …" The rest is absent; the process of giving evidence breaks off in that absence. Socially, the omission is terrifying, because the dead man's daughter remains alive in the narrative world, yet her actual name never enters the village record. Early in the original episode she names her buffalo "Kajrī"; Kajrī is the buffalo's name. It would be wrong to infer that the daughter herself is named Kajrī. The contrast between an unnamed daughter and a named animal after the father's death is not a decorative juxtaposition but a question of archival selection. The author leaves the daughter incomplete within the final sentence; doing justice does not mean inventing her story at will. Nonetheless, a critical limitation remains: the daughter's own speech, her demand for recognition by name, and her social struggle after Sukhdev's death are not developed here. Depicting silence does not automatically restore a woman's voice.

Ugrasen and the Lawyer: In Whose Actions Does Injustice Reside?

Ugrasen Thakur's dominance rests upon land, debt, and the accounts kept by his agent. His men obstruct the channel; the lawyer questions ownership and the witnesses to an old document. Asking a legal question is not itself an offence. Within this story, however, the sequence of questions, the assignment of priority before the hearing, and the consequences for the drying field confer a political meaning upon the procedure. The lawyer possesses the ability to obtain more time; Sukhdev suffers the destruction of his available time. A further limitation of opposing-character representation appears here: the reader is given insufficient access to Ugrasen's potentially relevant documents or to a source-based response on his behalf. The author sharpens the structure of injustice while permitting relatively little independent examination of the competing facts in the property dispute. This criticism does not exonerate the consequences ascribed to Ugrasen's obstruction; it identifies the nature of the evidence made available inside the text.

Keśava's Dilemma: From Compassionate Teacher to Culpable Administrator

Keśava comes from his teacher's tradition. He is compassionate, yet excessively bound by procedure. His own reasoning expresses the fear that "if order breaks, the entire system collapses." To call him a lifeless villain would therefore violate the fairness owed to the text. He believes in the supremacy of rules, is disturbed by the results of his own decisions, and eventually changes the rule. His question after Sukhdev dies—"Was I wrong?"—is narratively decisive. Because this introspective remorse becomes a practical decision, the episode is more than an emotionally charged lament. Nevertheless, changing a rule is no substitute for making restitution. There is no account here of an effort to return Sukhdev's field, to investigate the accountant's actions, or to secure a hearing for the daughter. The reform is an institutional adjustment rather than the established completeness of redress.

Budhuā's Duty as Witness: Water from the Conch and Powerlessness after Death

In previous chapters, Budhuā witnessed unfinished sentences and the limits of preserving the dead through memory. Here he sits beside the tribunal, notices Sukhdev's three weeks of waiting, challenges Keśava, and tries to offer water from his conch at the final moment. After death he attempts to bring the conch to Sukhdev's lips once more, although the narrator tells us that he knows water can no longer be swallowed. The failure of this action intensifies karuṇa-rasa: as in earlier tragedies, a witness may see everything yet be unable to recover lost time. Budhuā's principal proposition is that "Time itself is a luxury." This brings unequal circumstances of life into the apparently universal rule governing the tribunal's time. But even his obligation to bear witness does not confer the right to complete the deceased person's unfinished intention word for word. Remembrance and representation are closely connected here, but they are not identical acts.

A Navya-Nyāya Test: Right, Reason, and Pervasion

The first subject of inquiry—the tribunal's water-clock procedure—must be distinguished from the property to be established: a fair hearing. If Keśava's argument is formulated as "An equal distribution of time necessarily produces justice," the text reveals a limiting condition: proficiency in speaking, unequal power, priority given to government officials, and repeated technical objections alter the result of allocation. Thus the necessary pervasion between "time has been limited" and "an equal hearing has been secured" is not established. Conversely, Sukhdev's production of an old partition deed constitutes evidence supporting his claim, but the mere existence of the document does not automatically yield a final decision concerning ownership: the full archival examination of the original dispute is unavailable in the text. Third, the subsequent transfer of the land to the accountant is powerful narrative evidence of the incomplete effect of reform. This discussion is a literary application of Navya-Nyāya's sensitivity to proof, not a verbatim aphorism ascribed to any historical teacher.

Water, Weather, and the Agency of More-than-Human Time

The thin flow of the Kamala-Balan, the drying shallow portion of the pond, obstruction of the channel, Kajrī the buffalo's emaciation, and rice ears failing to fill with grain are all active elements in the chapter's causal structure. The environmental crisis makes humanly imposed delays in judicial process harmful: in heat and water scarcity every additional day diminishes the prospects of the field's renewal. The river is thus not merely a background element of scenic beauty. Nor, however, can the river be treated as a moral agent deliberately perpetrating injustice. Social power operates decisively at the intersection of seasonal cycles and the use of a blocked water supply. The deep and shallow parts of the paired ponds register different natural conditions; social structure determines who controls the channel. The achievement of environmental narration lies in the causal interaction of these two levels, not in an easy judgement that either humanity alone or nature alone is guilty.

The People's Archive: The Witness-Tree, "Loth," and the Meaning of Absence

After Sukhdev's death, the story of a figure called "Loth," with its mouth half open beside the peepal, is introduced in the form "it is said." There is no direct evidence that the dead man actually returned. Folklore preserves an image of a person whose turn to speak never arrived. Budhuā's observation redirects this fear towards the responsibility to listen. At the literary level of Navya-Nyāya's analysis of absence, two absences must be distinguished: the deceased man's missing final reply, and his daughter's missing name in the administrative record. Their causes, effects, and possible remedies differ. Folk memory preserves the vacancy left by the dead man's response, but does not insert a name into a legal register by itself. The peepal, as witness-tree, is an unofficial repository of folk history. Its power to remember is a symbolic meaning generated by human social practices, not independently documented historical testimony.

A Leap Across Centuries: From Local Suffering to the Modern "File"

The final prose passage abruptly compresses the passage of generations. The name "Garh Narikel" becomes established, the boundary of Channa Gachhi grows uncertain in popular belief, and the contemporary form of waiting emerges in "dates, files, and courthouse corridors." The narration joins a forward look from the present episode, historical summary, and commentary in the same movement. Its advantage is that Sukhdev's death no longer remains an isolated event of pathos but becomes an example of administrative injustice extending across time. Its limitation is that the concrete intermediate events of institutional change over hundreds of years depend largely upon the narrator's assertions. Did the peepal's roots spread as far as Channa Gachhi, or is Channa Gachhi itself an extension of that tree? The text acknowledges uncertainty with "or perhaps." This folklore must not be converted into a botanical fact. Mythic time and historical time touch here without becoming wholly identical.

Rasa, Suggestion, and Rhythm: The Regularity of Drops and a Voice Lost to Death

The opening saying, "Drop by drop falls water, drop by drop falls time," establishes a correspondence between physical drops of water and the span of human life. The final song again sets the counting of time against the preservation of names; the recurrence makes beginning and epilogue echo each other. The principal determinants of karuṇa-rasa are Sukhdev's death without a hearing, his unfinished sentence, and Budhuā's futile offering of water. The folktale of "Loth" stands at the boundary of fear and wonder, but does not dissolve the story's ethical centre into horror. As suggestion (dhvani), the water-clock's sinking bowl denotes not merely the expiration of time but the end of the chance to ask a question. A weakness in the song is its declaration that "the name remained firm" even though the daughter remains unnamed in the actual record. This contradiction should not be treated as the song's uncomplicated triumph; it may be accidental, or it may invite an ironic reading of the poetry.

The View of Videha's Parallel History: Named Rulers, an Unnamed Daughter

The conflict between a celebratory mainstream history and village memory is clear. Ugrasen's name, the priority of government functionaries, and the institution of the teacher receive documentary recognition; Sukhdev's daughter remains nameless. Folk song, Budhuā's sayings, the witness-tree, and "Loth" provide alternative forms of memory that challenge the administrative record. Yet it would also be mistaken to grant folklore the same evidentiary status as historical proof merely in the name of writing a parallel history. The claimant to a source, its narrator, its beneficiary, and the affected person rendered silent raise four separate questions. Sukhdev himself brings a partition deed: a written document is not always an instrument of oppression; it can be the principal basis for the rights of the weak. Without an opportunity to have that document read, however, its evidentiary possibility becomes practically worthless. The story therefore does not oppose writing as such. It opposes unequal access to written evidence.

Structural Achievements and Critical Limitations

The chapter's most notable achievement is to transform the ordinary visual object of a water clock into a sensitive argument concerning the political distribution of time. Keśava, who believes in the tribunal's rules, is not an enemy of humanity as such; nevertheless, his system produces harmful consequences. This distinction makes an institutional tragedy possible. Immediate reform after Sukhdev's death provides a narrative consequence, yet the loss of the field and the anonymity of the daughter prevent a declaration of success. Weaknesses include the missing chronological bridge between the first appearance three years earlier and the sequence of shorter periods culminating in six weeks; the insufficient independent examination of Ugrasen's documentary position; the absence of the deceased man's daughter's own voice; and the excessive summarisation of future social change. Without a precise medical account of death, a categorical formula such as "procedure directly killed him" is less faithful to the evidence than the interrelation of procedural delay, lack of water, and physical weakness. The philosophical background becomes productive when reasoning is examined in the real world of a drying field; this test is especially acute here.

Relation to the Next Chapter and the Question for the Study as a Whole

Chapter –91, "The Light of the Leatherworkers' Quarter," turns towards the village's leatherworking settlement, the social distribution of knowledge, and a story associated with Gaṅgeśa. A question connects Sukhdev's obstructed hearing in Chapter −92 and the hierarchy of knowledge in Chapter −91: whose words are afforded the opportunity to count as evidence? Yet the distinct social circumstances of the next chapter should not be absorbed in a conclusion decided in advance. When these images recur in the larger trilogy, the actual transformations of Garh Narikel's ponds, peepal tree, river, Budhuā, and unnamed citizens must be compared. Whether "Loth," initially no more than folk memory of an unfinished sentence, becomes an autonomous narrative presence in later chapters also requires renewed examination of the original text. For now, the established conclusion is only this: equality in judicial procedure should be measured not merely by the equality of rules but by the time available for presenting evidence, the right to be heard, and the effective result of a decision.

Chapter −92: Register of Evidence Directly Checked against the Original

Opening saying: "Drop by drop falls water, drop by drop falls time."

Formal declaration: "An excerpt from a novel; moving away from dramatic form into narrative."

Narrator: "I am going to tell you today."

Former village name: "Narikel-Ghat."

Anticipation of the new name: "Garh."

Place: "Paired ponds."

Place of popular memory: "Witness-tree."

Working of the timepiece: "When the bowl fills up and sinks."

Claim to the channel: "This channel was made by my ancestors."

Order of the tribunal: "Tomorrow your case will be heard first."

Budhuā's objection: "This man has been coming for three weeks."

Keśava's reply: "Justice proceeds according to order, not desire."

Fear concerning procedure: "If order breaks, the entire system collapses."

Technical question: "First let it be made clear who originally owned the channel."

Further waiting: "Six weeks passed in this way."

Sukhdev's unfinished words: "Master, my daughter …"

Basis of Budhuā's question: "Time itself is a luxury."

New rule: "Sukhdev Rule."

Outcome: "Passed into the hands of Ugrasen's accountant."

Absence from the record: "Her real name never entered the village record."

Folktale: "Loth."

Duty of witness: "No witness has the right to complete an unfinished statement."

Connection to modernity: "Dates, files, and courthouse corridors."

Separate commentary after the drama: "The water-clock and the question of time in justice."

Critical Section 10 | Original Chapter −91 — The Light of the Leatherworkers' Quarter

"The Light of the Leatherworkers' Quarter" is the tenth original chapter in the period of the prehistory; its number in the novel's negative sequence is −91. The original contents give its opening as page 138 and the start of Chapter −90 as page 145, so its printed-page reference for this study is 138–144. These are page references supplied by the original Word document's contents, not the page numbers of the present critical study. The proportional figure in question is only an "intensity indicator," not an exact count of events. In this chapter, light measures not the capacity of eyes to see but society's willingness to recognise knowledge: why does a village that needs someone's labour treat that person's voice as unnecessary?

The Opening Narrative Position: From the Assembly Hall to the Western Drain

The story signals the village's passage from "Narikel-Ghat" to "Garh Narikel." The assembly hall has been constructed in permanent brick, and the prestige of the disciplines of justice and logic now takes institutional form. Yet the narrator immediately changes direction: "But for this story I must go to that part of the village" which the eyes of learned men do not reach. This choice of narration is a geographical reversal within the story-world. The central assembly hall and the marginalised "Marl-Gang" become two social centres of focalisation. The death inscribed in the name of the dried-up river is not merely a natural image. The river's shift away from the settlement, the greater distance to work, and the relegation of the settlement to the edge of the village all register a geography of life. The text does not establish the actual cause of the river's drying up, however; to declare it a particular historical offence of water management would exceed what the source supports.

"The Work the Village Needs": Untouchability within the Necessity of Labour

The leatherworkers' settlement is the site of drying hides, making drums and mṛdaṅgas, and stitching footwear. The village cannot function without these objects, yet it does not wish their makers to live near its own thresholds. The formulation "the work the village needs" exposes the coexistence of dependence upon labour and exclusion of the labourer. Economic reliance and social contempt stand side by side. The novel does not reduce "caste" to a scene of verbal abuse but situates it within everyday utility and the allocation of residential space. Nonetheless, the settlement's livelihood, market prices, debts, collective resistance, and internal differences within the community receive no extended treatment here. The neglected quarter is represented principally through a few characters rather than a survey of its entire historical life. Criticism may identify this as a limitation while also taking account of the particular episode's restricted narrative form.

Ratnā: Bodily Care, Women's Knowledge, and the Initiation of Narrative Action

Ratnā is respected in the village for her experience with childbirth, medicinal plants, and patience, but that recognition has not been converted into written learning. She is the initial agent who brings an unnamed young man, trembling with fever, from outside into shelter. The story of a male philosopher proceeds not from his pronouncement of the word "evidence" but from a woman's immediate response to a vulnerable body. Without this human intervention, the opportunity for Gaṅgeśa's conversation with Mālatī would not arise. Ratnā nurses the patient for fifteen days. The text depicts the outcome but provides no measurement of the medical efficacy of her remedies. It would be equally inappropriate to describe her herbs as unverified supernatural healing or as a therapeutically established treatment by modern medical standards. Within the narrative, her care is causally indispensable. The mother's knowledge provides the structural foundation for the daughter's narrative emergence.

The Arrival of Gaṅgeśa: A Scholar Clutching a Palm-Leaf Manuscript, Defeated by His Own Body

The young man found lying beside an acacia tree holds a palm-leaf manuscript in his hand and will not release it even while unconscious. This visual image embodies another deprivation: extraordinary devotion to intellectual work together with the ordinary vulnerability of a body. Before his name is disclosed, we hear of his fever, hunger, exhaustion, and indistinct muttering of "evidence." Various stories are said to circulate about his birth, childhood intelligence, and family lineage, but the narrator himself cannot determine whether they are true or merely rumours. The critic must not remove that uncertainty and construct a historical biography. The young man's intellectual prestige is not established in advance; the reader reaches him through care and conversation. This reversal unsettles the conventional centre of scholarly greatness: first the dependence of a human being upon others, then the eventual fame of the author of a treatise.

Mālatī's Question: Sincerity, Truth, and the Unresolved Relation to Testimony

Sixteen-year-old Mālatī hears the feverish Gaṅgeśa's muttering and asks how a speaker's words can be false if there is no intention to lie in the speaker's mind. The question offers a valuable ethical challenge: instead of judging through caste prejudice, consider the speaker's disposition. Yet the philosophical limits of the question are also clear. A false utterance is not invariably deceitful; a person who is sincerely convinced can nevertheless say something mistaken. Ethical sincerity and objectively true cognition cannot therefore be equated. Here the chapter proposes an independent possibility for knowledge against social prejudice, but does not complete an entire theory of verbal testimony. Mālatī's question is not merely a proclamation of personal dignity: it places pressure upon society's standards for assessing knowledge, extending to the principle "whoever the speaker may be." The nuances of āptatā, or the trustworthiness relevant to testimony in Navya-Nyāya, and of the conditions that produce valid cognition still require separate examination.

The Drum Illustration: The Quality of an Instrument and the Truth of an Utterance

Mālatī draws upon the making of drums by her father, Somar. If the leather is not stretched properly, even a skilled player will produce a distorted sound; if it is stretched correctly, an ordinary drum can produce a clearly audible note. The direct basis of the example lies in the physical structure of an instrument, the artisan's observation, and the audible result. Mālatī's knowledge is therefore not merely an emotive metaphor but a causal test arising from experience. A complete pervasion between the drum's "correct note" and the "truth" of an utterance, however, is not established: the fitness of a physical instrument does not determine every question concerning the meaning, intention, and factual correspondence of human speech. The drum example reveals necessary physical and social conditions in the production of knowledge, not the entire set of sufficient conditions. Missing this distinction risks mistaking the novel's illustrative analogy for an accepted universal theorem of philosophical science.

Gaṅgeśa's Response: Intellectual Recognition or Excessive Simplification?

Gaṅgeśa interprets Mālatī's statement as meaning that reliability should rest on the correctness of the instrument or means (karaṇa), not the lineage of the speaker. He declares that a question that had held him up for three years has been solved in a single breath. The strength of the episode is that the learned character relinquishes his class-based prestige and listens to a new source of questioning; eligibility for knowledge is not established by birth. But a critical problem remains. Does the immediate resolution of a complicated problem of verbal testimony in the Tattvacintāmaṇi through a single drum illustration constitute deliberate dramatic compression or an excessively easy solution to a philosophical conflict? The dialogue contains no complete sequence of counterarguments; it presents a moment of sudden illumination. That illumination succeeds as an emotional turning point within the story, but it is not proof of a conclusion in classical scholarship. The original text uses a form rendered as "ābtā," whose precise relationship to the technical concept of āptatā requires independent textual scrutiny. It would be hazardous to infer a strict technical conclusion from the sentence's general sense alone.

Fifteen Days and Two Years: The Pace of Narrative Time

Ratnā's fifteen days of nursing pass in compressed summary, while the exchange of questions and answers between Mālatī and Gaṅgeśa becomes extended direct dialogue. Afterwards, Gaṅgeśa's visits to the house and the settlement of the marriage within two years are again expressed in condensed narrative time. These three phases—the period of treatment, the moment of intellectual awakening, and the long formation of a relationship—receive unequal development. The narrator pauses at the point of conjunction to create a scene while passing over changes in everyday life through composite sentences. The advantage is that intellectual exchange and resistance to caste prejudice occupy the foreground. The limitation is that readers see relatively little of Mālatī's own decision-making, Gaṅgeśa's personal inner conflict, or the two years in which mutual respect developed. The decision to marry takes shape in the story, but most of the relationship's social and emotional process remains a summary.

Opposition to Marriage: Exclusion from Prestige by Institutions of Knowledge

Opposition from the Brahmin quarter is not merely a matter of conventional insult. The threat is that Gaṅgeśa will no longer be invited to philosophical debates, scholars will not recognise him as a witness, and his books will be excluded from schools. These acts constitute three levels of institutional exclusion: admission to the assembly, recognition of a person's testimony, and circulation of knowledge. The structure transforms marriage from a private emotional decision into a public question of the right to participate in knowledge. Nevertheless, the text presents the Brahmin quarter as almost uniformly opposed. It does not develop a sympathetic figure, a doubtful young scholar, or an alternative institutional procedure within that community. This sharpens the social conflict but opens less of the opponents' varied inner lives. Such criticism does not deny the existence of oppression; it measures the internal complexity of the scene's construction.

Budhuā's Arrival: Long Memory and Anticipatory Testimony

Budhuā's arrival beside the peepal witness-tree at the moment of Gaṅgeśa's uncertainty joins the prehistory's separate tragedies within one circle of testimony. The conch and worn rope in his hands are returning signs from earlier chapters; they now identify the witness rather than serving as inert souvenirs. Budhuā compares the lifespan of prestige gained through disputation with the possible longer life of knowledge arising from labour. His prediction that people will read Gaṅgeśa's treatise but forget Mālatī's drum is a flash-forward whose truth the later summary of the story promptly demonstrates. By the standards of realistic history, Budhuā's extraordinary longevity would be problematic; under the novel's magical and folkloric arrangement of memory he is a figure of testimony crossing generations. Yet when the character explains how he has heard so many stories by saying that "the wind tells me many things," the claim is poetic, not direct archival evidence.

How Far Does a Witness's Authority Extend? The Promise to Preserve Mālatī's Name

Budhuā says that society will turn Gaṅgeśa's marriage into a story of charity rather than a story of justice; he wishes to preserve Ratnā's and Mālatī's names on another page. This is an extremely important turn in the question of representation. Instead of constructing a story about the generosity of a man placed socially above others, the novel demands recognition of the intellectual collaboration of working women. Yet "preserving a name" and "enabling a person to tell her own story" are not the same thing. We do not receive Ratnā's direct autobiographical account or an extended account of Mālatī speaking after her marriage; Budhuā's promise remains the principal means of preservation. The text employs an ethics of protective witness. Its critical challenge is how far a woman's voice still depends upon a story told by a male witness even after protection has been promised. Both the achievement and limitation of the chapter emerge from this question.

Marriage, the Composition of a Treatise, and a Great Leap in Chronology

After the resistance to marriage, the narrative states that Gaṅgeśa composed his treatise over the next twenty years, and it came to be taught in every school. A major historical outcome is compressed into very little scenic space. The narrative result is readily understood: the social source of knowledge is forgotten, while the male author of the treatise becomes celebrated. Yet the praise that the work equals "twelve thousand treatises" is an ornamental measure of philosophical greatness, not an actual mathematical standard. Across this long period, there are few independent scenes of changes in Ratnā and Somar's livelihood, Mālatī's intellectual companionship, the room in which the treatise was composed, or its reception in schools. The summary avoids making the story purposeless, but leaves many possible events of a biographical narrative undeveloped.

The Status of History: Fiction Explicitly Acknowledged by Its Author

A separate explanatory presentation begins near the chapter's end under the heading "Stories and Illustrations Associated with Gaṅgeśa Upādhyāya." It explicitly states that the names, characters, and circumstances of Mālatī, Ratnā, and Somar are products of imagination and are not verified by historical documents. This declaration must be regarded as a strict boundary within the present criticism. The historical Gaṅgeśa Upādhyāya and his Tattvacintāmaṇi belong to an actual intellectual tradition, but this particular account of a family is a possible fictional reconstruction. Even the mention of a popular story about Gaṅgeśa's marriage to a leatherworking woman does not constitute confirmation of a historical marriage. The author himself draws a distinction between oral tradition and literary construction. Ignoring that admission and presenting the story as historical proof would weaken the work's own perspective of parallel history.

A Dialectical Reading of History: Tantric Blessing versus Education through Labour

In popular tradition, Gaṅgeśa's intellectual awakening is associated with a Tantric practitioner or the grace of the goddess Kālī; the present narrative constructs a possible contribution from the experience, care, and dialogue of a leatherworking family. The author does not claim to have proved that the first account is historically false; he opens a second, imaginative, parallel possibility. The story of divine grace and the story of human collaboration distribute ethical significance across social memory in different ways. The Tantric account makes the thinker an exceptional, isolated genius; Mālatī's account renders the genesis of knowledge relational. Yet the narrative should not present this as "the definite true source that has been suppressed." Doing so would substitute a desired past for missing records and violate the discipline of evidence. The strength of literary alternative history lies in the transparency of its imaginative construction, not in concealing gaps in proof.

Ratnā's Chhauṅkī-Sabhā: An Informal Institution of Knowledge

At evening meetings beside Marl-Gang, women exchange experiences of illness, childbirth, domestic violence, village injustice, and people's private conduct in their chhauṅkī-sabhās. This institution is a collective activity rather than a single occasion of instruction. Regular conversation, repeated gatherings, and the transmission of knowledge from generation to generation constitute its structure. The absence of classical terminology is not evidence of ignorance; it marks a different practice of knowledge. Yet the workings of decision-making in these gatherings, their resolution of external disputes, examples of successful and failed treatments, and organised plans for confronting male resistance are depicted only sparingly. "Assembly" undoubtedly names an institution, but a detailed examination of its operating procedures is deferred to possible later episodes.

Naming Women "Witches": Transforming Knowledge into Fear

The narrator makes clear the process by which women's knowledge, refused entry into the community's written record, comes to be labelled "witchcraft" and its practitioners "witches." Here naming prepares the ground for violence: those who refuse to acknowledge a form of knowledge may turn it into a threatening power. Nonetheless, deriving all popular beliefs from one cause would be an insufficient explanation of social history. This chapter does not give a developed account of the specific accusations made by those using the label, the system of punishments, or the process of violence. It is therefore more appropriate to regard the accusation as a narrative thread pointing towards future social conflict. The transformation between the chhauṅkī-sabhā and the designation "witch" is attested on the levels of metaphor and communal memory within the story, not as a universal rule concerning every historical settlement or group of women.

Environmental Narration: Marl-Gang, the Acacia, the Peepal, and Folk Memory

Three places perform different narrative functions. The dry course of Marl-Gang becomes a zone of environmental deprivation and social separation for the working settlement; the shade of the acacia provides the initial scene of the injured Gaṅgeśa's fallen body; and the peepal witness-tree centres Budhuā's promise and intergenerational memory. The text does not regard the tree as a historical document equivalent to a human witness; through metaphor it becomes a bearer of memory. More-than-human objects guide the direction of the story, while its decisive choices are made by Ratnā, Mālatī, Gaṅgeśa, Budhuā, and social groups. The drying of the river constructs the narrative place; the young man's treatment, the question, and the marriage produce social change. This distinction does not diminish the environment's significance but clarifies the levels of agency within the narrative.

Language, Focalisation, and the Narrator's Ethical Intervention

Saying "I must go …," the narrator leads readers from the institutional centre into the neglected quarter. Indirect omniscient narration, dialogic scenes, and signals of reported folk tradition such as "it is said" then alternate. In the drum illustration Mālatī speaks for herself; Gaṅgeśa's scholarly response recognises her experience; the subsequent historical summary returns to the decisive authority of the narrator. This movement produces a tension between the illumination of the woman's voice and the dominance of male exposition. At times the narrator demands the reader's ethical assent in advance, giving opposing characters insufficient opportunity for independent thought. Yet acknowledging that the story is fictional does not make a modern novel unreliable; rather, it makes readers aware of the differing truth claims of its narrative levels.

A Navya-Nyāya Examination: Subject, Reason, Limiting Condition, and Absence

The first inference—"A person's caste is high; therefore the speaker is trustworthy"—lacks a demonstrated pervasion. No necessary association between birth status and the truth of knowledge has been established in the original. The second inference—"The drum is properly stretched; therefore the speaker's statement is true"—has a limiting condition: the physical production of a sound and the factual correspondence of a proposition require different kinds of grounds. Third, trustworthy testimony, sincere intention, and actual truth are related without being wholly identical. Mālatī's example breaks the caste-based barrier to considering a speaker's words; it does not terminate every classical problem concerning verbal testimony. The absence of Mālatī's historical contribution from records proves neither that such a contribution was impossible nor that the particular event certainly occurred. The delimitation must remain clear: "Within this novel's story-world Mālatī inspires the thinker" is an established narrative proposition; "Exactly this event occurred in history" is a distinct and unestablished claim. Such clarity of limits protects the scholarly integrity of parallel history.

Rasa, Dhvani, Vakrokti, and the Test of Appropriateness

The opening saying compares "the lamp of the quarter and the lamp of the palace," both fed by the same oil, as a metaphor for equal intellectual potential. Comparing a drum's sound with the "truth" of a philosophical treatise creates an oblique displacement akin to vakrokti: a difficult technical question finds expression in the language of popular craftsmanship. Karuṇa-rasa is present in the nursing of the feverish young man, Mālatī's fear of humiliation, and the forgetting of Ratnā's name. The heroic impulse appears in the decision to withstand opposition to the marriage. Yet the closing song proclaims, "Light shines equally," even as the plot shows that equal illumination has not become equal social recognition. This opposition lends the song an ironic resonance. Read only as a song of victory, it would cover over the chapter's wound. A further question of appropriateness concerns whether the intermediate stages of conflict between severe social hostility and the rapid success of the marriage receive sufficient dramatic development.

A Causal Register of Events and a Genuine Test of Event Density

Narrative moment	Textual basis or actor	Change of state	Remaining critical issue
Division of space	Assembly hall versus Marl-Gang	The focal centre shifts to a neglected quarter	Reason for the river drying is unspecified
Rescue	Ratnā and Somar; fever-stricken Gaṅgeśa	The intellectual traveller depends upon material care	The medical efficacy of the remedy is unproven
Question and illustration	Mālatī's words and the drum	Caste loses its assumed place in Gaṅgeśa's inference	No universal pervasion between an instrument and truth
Institutional opposition	Brahmin quarter; the decision to marry	Threats of boycott of disputation and school	Opponents' psychology is underdeveloped
Witness's declaration	Budhuā, the conch, and the witness-tree	Pledge to protect the names of Mālatī and Ratnā	Limits of preserving another person's name
Long-term outcome	Marriage, treatise, forgotten source	Philosophical prestige separates from memory of labour	Twenty years compressed into a rapid summary
Alternative communal institution	Ratnā's chhauṅkī-sabhā	Women's experience becomes collective knowledge	The assembly's procedures are only briefly developed

At least six different changes of state can be distinguished: (a) the fever-stricken Gaṅgeśa's arrival in the leatherworkers' settlement; (b) recovery from his immediate medical crisis through Ratnā's care; (c) a shift in Gaṅgeśa's intellectual position through Mālatī's question; (d) institutional caste resistance prompted by the decision to marry; (e) Budhuā's promise to preserve witness and memory; and (f) the forgetting of Mālatī after the marriage and the treatise's subsequent prestige, alongside the women's alternative memory of assemblies. In fact, the later part of the chapter compresses twenty years of composition and long-term popular memory into very few paragraphs. The extension of story-time is not the same thing as densely realised scenic events. The main emotional turning point is the exchange concerning the drum. The eventual institutional consequence—the women's gatherings—endures through informal recurrence rather than as a formally enacted rule.

Achievement: A Bold Narrative of a Parallel Genealogy of Knowledge

The chapter's most concrete achievement is to make Ratnā and Mālatī indispensable agents in the production of knowledge rather than decorative subplots in a famous man's life. The practical labour of the leatherworkers' quarter, medicinal care, the experience of making drums, and the regular gatherings of women are all joined to questions of proof, teaching, and the writing of history. Compared with classical prestige, the more fruitful question becomes not "Into which lineage was this person born?" but "What tests are available within this person's experience?" The return of the witness-tree provides a temporal bridge between earlier struggles over the names of Hulāsā, Jīvantī, and Sukhdev and this distinct problem of women's knowledge.

Limitations: Compressed History, Hasty Philosophical Conclusions, and Partial Female Speech

Four principal limitations emerge. First, the scene in which a single illustration by Mālatī is declared to resolve a scholarly problem that detained Gaṅgeśa for three years makes philosophical deliberation exceedingly abrupt. Second, the conflict over marriage gives relatively little room to diverse voices within the opposing community or to a sustained interior account of Mālatī's choices. Third, the twenty years of writing the treatise and the development of its scholarly reception proceed through extremely rapid summary, so the everyday cooperation involved in making knowledge receives little scenic demonstration. Fourth, despite the women's chhauṅkī-sabhā, responsibility for remembering Ratnā and Mālatī ultimately depends upon Budhuā as a male witness. These weaknesses do not negate the novel's basic social intervention. They clarify the difference between the significance of its ethical ambition and the means by which that ambition is realised in narrative form.

A Bridge towards Chapter −90: The Longevity of Memory and the Cost of Witnessing

The promise to preserve Mālatī's and Ratnā's names immediately before the next chapter, "Budhuā's Water Burial," is important. Hulāsā's unfinished sentence, Jīvantī's manuscript, Sukhdev's hearing, and now the neglected knowledge of leatherworking women accumulate one after another within Budhuā's memory. This burden may become the ethical precondition of the next chapter's narrated death or transformation, but the event of that chapter must not be assumed as certain from this section alone. The independent judgement on the present chapter is that literature can raise the question of artisans, caregivers, and unnamed women interlocutors missing from the history of classical scholarship, but must not present imaginative reconstruction as an indisputable transcript of history. Here "light" is not complete justice; it is an unresolved dispute over the right to the illumination of knowledge.

Chapter −91: Register of Evidence Directly Compared with the Original

Shift of location: "But for this story I must go to that part of the village."

Name of the river: "Marl-Gang."

Neglected labour: "The work the village needs."

Mālatī's father: "Somar, the leatherworker."

Ratnā's distinctive quality: "Patience."

Words spoken by the feverish Gaṅgeśa: "Evidence … without evidence … how …"

Uncertainty of oral tradition: "Whether all these stories were true or rumours."

Length of treatment: "Gaṅgeśa struggled with fever for fifteen days."

End of Mālatī's question: "Whoever the speaker may be."

Condition of the drum: "If the leather is not properly stretched."

Claim about the drum: "Then the drum speaks in a false voice."

Definition of the means: "The correctness of the karaṇa (instrument or means)."

Recognition of knowledge: "You have told a story of Nyāya."

Time to marriage: "Within two years."

Question raised in opposition: "Will he marry a leatherworking woman?"

Budhuā's memory: "Sixty years ago there was an Objector."

Budhuā's self-description: "I am a servant."

Distant witness's explanation: "The wind tells me many things."

Prediction concerning intellectual cooperation: "It will be present on every page of your book."

Anticipation of forgetting: "They will forget Mālatī's drum."

Justice against charity: "They will turn it into a story of charity, not of justice."

Focus of the promise: "Ratnā's and Mālatī's names."

Period of composition: “Over the next twenty years.”

Alternative account of intellectual origins: “Through a Tantric practitioner's favour or the blessing of goddess Kālī.”

Women's different institution: “They had established an assembly among themselves.”

Threatening designation: “Witch.”

Image in the song: “The lamp of the quarter and the lamp of the palace—the same oil burns in both.”

Explicit paratextual limitation: “Imagined; not established by historical documents.”

Status of the alternative possibility: “Presents an alternative, parallel possibility.”

Critical Section 11 | Original Chapter −90 — Budhua's Water Burial

"Budhua's Water Burial" is the eleventh original chapter of the period of prehistory; its number in the negative sequence is −90. The original novel's contents place its beginning on page 145 and the next chapter, −89, on page 152. The printed page range of the original edition is accordingly 145–151, distinct from the pagination of this cumulative criticism. Treating the ratio between these numbers as a count of events would be a methodological error. In fact, several changes of state involving memory, decision, the transfer of objects, and folklore are arranged around one major event of disappearance. Reading the chapter also brings a further question: how does personal memory become a social archive, and to what extent can narrative technique recast the disappearance of a body as a form of rebirth?

The Weight of the Previous Ten Chapters: The Life of a Witness Becomes a Story

From Chapters −100 to −91, Budhua has appeared as a witness to philosophical debates, unfinished utterances, deaths, women's labour, and the neglect of justice. Here the narrator makes him the centre of the story for the first time. The village has changed; the assembly building has twice collapsed and been rebuilt; Ācārya Vardhamāna, the seventh-generation successor in Keśava's tradition, now presides over the assembly. Yet Budhua is still alive. His extraordinary longevity immediately takes the narrative beyond the standard of a realistic biography and into the domain of folkloric wonder. This change is not abrupt: the conch-and-silver illusion in the first chapter, the unfinished speech of the dead, and the vow connected with the witness-tree return here as long-range narrative threads. The achievement of the plot lies in these connections, each recollection reactivating an unresolved ethical question from an earlier story. Nevertheless, using an indefinitely living witness to join several historical ages also provides the narrator with a convenient bridge. The reader must accept the unnatural convention on which it rests.

The Village in Time and Space: Assembly Hall, Pond, Peepal, and Maral-Gang

The changes in Garh Narikel are described at both social and environmental levels. The construction and destruction of the assembly hall signify the transience of institutions. The paired ponds remain, but their deep section is said to have grown deeper. Increasing depth attributed merely to silt and rainfall is not a self-evident environmental explanation:

sedimentation can ordinarily reduce depth. This is an internal question about the environmental description, which should not be received as a demonstrated hydrological fact. The peepal roots reach towards the water; four generations of Ratnā's family have worked in the leatherworkers' settlement of Maral-Gang. Their contribution to the physical care associated with childbirth continues, although the Brahmin settlement does not publicly acknowledge it. Inequality thus persists across the passing of time; social history is not simply a line of progress. Pond, tree, and settlement are not inert backdrops but a geography of communal division and means of preserving memory.

Unnatural Longevity: The Announcement of a Rule and the Reader's Contract

"And Budhua was still alive" is a short sentence bearing the weight of the entire temporal transition. The continuing existence of one person across seven generations cannot be reconciled with ordinary biological realism. The narrator does not explain this discrepancy by a medical miracle; the villagers accept it as naturally as the peepal or the pond. The rule of this unnatural narrative is made legitimate through the collective belief of its fictional world. Critically, what matters is that the text admits realistic caste inequality and extraordinary longevity in the same breath. This creates the possibility of magical realism, though the presence of an exceptional event is not sufficient for a definitive generic classification; the stability of this rule must be tested in other parts of the narrative. Treating the extraordinary lifespan as historical proof would destroy the work's imaginative convention.

The Recurrence of Names: Hulāsā, Jīvantī, Sukhdev, Ratnā

Budhua can no longer walk. Sitting beneath the peepal, with the conch and rope beside him, he speaks a name to each passer-by. Hulāsā, Jīvantī, Sukhdev, Ratnā: these four names join the preceding chapters' social and ethical lines. Their repetition is not purposeless information; it is an act of resistance to forgetting. Each refers to a distinct unfinished question: Hulāsā's incomplete sentence, Jīvantī's water-bound manuscript, Sukhdev's delayed justice, and Ratnā's unrecorded contribution. Yet the selection of names remains under Budhua's authority as witness. Other neglected people, especially unnamed collective labourers, may again be excluded by that same process of selection. Both the compassion and the selective power of witnessing must be considered together.

The Winter Scene: Environmental Time and a Pause Before Death

Bitter cold, the thin flow of the Kamla-Balan, buffaloes out of the pond, absent herons, and the still surface of the water are more than an ornamental list of seasonal details. Narrative pace suddenly slackens, as though nature were preparing an empty space in which the approaching event might be heard. But the imagery does not establish that the river has physically frozen: its current is described as "cold as ice," not as actual ice. The withdrawal or endurance of nonhuman life establishes the atmosphere preceding death. The text does not demonstrate a necessary causal relation between weather and Budhua's decision. Winter is consonant with his state of mind, not the sole reason for his resolve. The pause in narrative time prepares the reader for the transformation of tree, water, and shadow.

Raghunāth's Question and the Disjunction of Time in Dialogue

Raghunāth, a young disciple of Ācārya Vardhamāna, asks Budhua his age. Rather than answer with a number, Budhua remembers the opening scene: the row of coconut trees, the peepal, the pond, and the debate about mistaking a conch for silver. Raghunāth exclaims, "Vācaspati Miśra?" and thereby registers the separation of ages. The actual dramatic function of the exchange is not to provide Budhua's age but to bring home the seemingly impossible extent of the narrative's timescale. The question seeks an external calculation; the response gives lived memory. The order of telling and the time of the story are thus visibly different. The reader recalls the earliest chapters, whereas the village's new generation encounters the same memory as a marvel. Raghunāth briefly voices historical disbelief, but his subsequent investigation is not developed as a scene; this limits the intellectual counterposition within the story.

Body and Memory: The Ethical Crisis of a Mortal Medium

Budhua's decisive self-recognition—"Not in my body, but in my memory"—turns the arithmetic of age into an ethical experience. Memory is not simply an honour to him; it is a burden. The fear that four unheard lives will disappear with his failing body becomes a source of grief. At this moment memory is an archive lodged in an individual, with no complete substitute in the community's written or institutional records. The narrator explicitly says that these things are not carved on a stone or written in any book. Yet earlier chapters contain books, rules, manuscripts, and a chamber of memory. "In no book" is therefore more reasonably read as a claim about the inadequate recording of these four people's lived truths than as the literal absence of every relevant document. A rigid generalisation would create tension with the prehistory's own archival motifs.

The Decision and its Causality: Self-Sacrifice or the Risk of Self-Erasure?

After Raghunāth leaves, Budhua senses that death is near and asks who will preserve these names if memory ends with him. The next scene shows him carrying the conch and rope towards the pond. The narrative progression is clear: bodily weakness → recognition of an archival absence → an urgent desire to protect names → entry into water. But this sequence does not establish that water burial is the only available means of preservation. Dictating his memories to the young Raghunāth, passing them on to the leatherworking women's evening circle, or preparing a public register are possibilities the story does not examine independently. Criticism must treat Budhua's entry into water as a difficult episode of individual dignity, mortality, and ethical autonomy, without proclaiming it a necessary or exemplary technique for preserving memory. The artistic effect is poignant, but the causal necessity of the purported solution remains unproved.

An Echo of Conch and Silver: The Beginning Returns at the End

Moonlight spreads "like silver" upon the pond. The conch-and-silver debate from the opening chapter has now changed from an epistemological illustration into an emotional echo. Budhua clasps the conch to his chest; it is no longer merely the object in an example of illusion, but an object that bears memory. This symbolic return closes a cycle extending across roughly ten chapters. What began as a question about visual cognition ends as a question about the existence of names and memories. Nevertheless, the silver's glitter offers no certain proof of truth. Readers are required both to trust memory and to acknowledge its limits. The "water burial" of the novel's title is not here a final solution of philosophical nondualism but a narrative means of retaining unfinished justice within folklore.

Four Addresses: Preserving the Rights of Unfinished Speech

Before entering the water, Budhua addresses four people in succession. He refuses to complete Hulāsā's "I…" because he has no right to do so: this is a significant restraint upon the witness. He pledges to answer Jīvantī's "To bear witness to a book is also…" through his own actions; his recollection of Sukhdev's daughter, buffalo, and partition document stands in for claims erased by an institution; and the imagined inscription of Ratnā's name upon water grants symbolic visibility to labour excluded from scholastic books. These addresses are different in tone: respect for silence, practical continuation of an unfinished promise, testimony concerning a right, and restoration of recognition to women's work. Their variety prevents the ethics of witnessing from becoming a mere slogan. Still, there is a delicate ethical distinction between "completing" Jīvantī's utterance and declining to "complete" Hulāsā's; an explicit distinction by the narrator might have rendered the novel's ethics of testimony still clearer.

Scene, Summary, and Narrative Duration

The opening compresses the passing of generations into a paragraph: a summary of historical duration. Time opens into a scene in the exchange between Raghunāth and Budhua; at the pond, the four addresses unfold almost at the speed of actual speech. The moment of entry into water becomes slower and more finely detailed: the gleam of the surface, the peepal's apparent inclination, the stilling of the wind, the sight of stars, the act of sitting, and the calming of ripples. The morning search is a brief scene, after which centuries of folk tradition are compressed into rapid summary. This alternation of expansion and compression focuses the reader's emotional attention upon the entry into the pond. The control of discourse-time is effective, although the social processes attending death or disappearance after the dramatic climax are disposed of with very little evidence.

Focalisation: From Budhua's Inward Fear to the Village's External Folklore

The opening presents the village, generations, social groups, and institutions through a narrator's extensive external perspective. In the middle, Budhua's private fear that names will die is represented from within. His feeling that the water is not cold as he enters it also indicates internal access by the narrator. At morning, the perspective shifts to the fishermen's search and Vardhamāna's public reaction. Finally, through the formula "people began to say," an unidentified collective source gains the authority to tell the story. These changes of focalisation alter the epistemic status of information: Budhua's experience is narrated within the fictional world; the discovery of the conch and rope belongs to the morning's direct search; shadows and whispers are communal claims; and "twelve hundred years" is a symbolic tradition. To make all of them equivalent historical evidence would erase distinctions between narrative levels.

The Absent Crocodile: A Major Causal Gap in the Title

The opening proverb says, "The crocodile took the body and left the name." Yet the extended scene of entry into water shows no crocodile. In the morning the fishermen find neither body nor footprints nor signs of struggle. The directly narrated event therefore does not establish "a crocodile attack," "a body carried away by a crocodile," or any definite cause of death. The proverb may be read as prior folk explanation, symbol, or the language of communal grief. This difference offers an artistic advantage: the unseen crocodile becomes a source of uncertainty and dread in the water. Yet the absence of scenic confirmation of the title's apparently concrete assertion is also a legitimate critical question. In a novel concerned with social justice, inquiry, and proof, the distance between direct evidence and communal verdict is especially consequential.

Nonhuman Activity: Levels of Agency in Tree, Water, and Animal

It "seemed as though" the peepal roots inclined towards Budhua; the wind stopped "as if" holding its breath; the pond shone like silver. Through these recurring similes, the tree and water become sensitive witnesses without the text offering realistic proof of their consciousness. The nonhuman environment serves three functions: the staging of emotion, symbolic co-witness, and vehicle of memory. Buffaloes, herons, silt, cold, and trees make ecological life part of the story's domain. Nevertheless, Budhua's decision arises from a recognisably human ethical uncertainty; the pond does not compel it. The subtlety of environmental narration lies in preserving this distinction: water makes the event possible, and the tree becomes the site of recollection, but human responsibility for choosing is not wholly transferred to nonhuman objects.

The Morning Search: Material Evidence and the Missing Body

The fishermen find the conch and rope. These are not merely an imaginative flourish of the narrator: within the fictional world they are objects directly recovered by characters. But their discovery does not itself prove Budhua's manner of death or a supernatural transformation. Failure to find a body is neither evidence that death did not occur nor complete physical proof that it did. Folk memory operates in precisely this gap. Ācārya Vardhamāna places the conch at the foot of the peepal, beginning a kind of public memorial practice. His statement "Budhua has not died" should be read as an expression of reverential ethical belief, not as a medical or historical conclusion. The types of evidence—object, absence, and interpretation—are clearly distinct.

A Navya-Nyāya Examination of Evidence: Subject, Reason, Pervasion, and Fallacy

For the first proposition, "The crocodile carried away Budhua's body," the requisite direct signs are absent; the proverb alone cannot supply a valid reason. For the second, "Memory of Budhua remains alive near the peepal," the evidence consists of folk utterances, children hearing his stories, and public preservation of the conch: these support a tradition of memory, not the material existence of a ghost. For the third, "No body was found, therefore he is immortal," absence supplies an insufficient reason and entails the possibility of a fallacious inference. Fourth, "twelve hundred years" may signify memorable antiquity but is not adequate evidence for a specific historical chronology. A delimiting condition is necessary: within the novel's folklore, immortal presence is accepted; in the material historical world, the conclusion would require separate proof. Recognising this distinction does not disparage imaginative narration; it identifies the different truth regime under which it operates.

"Twelve Hundred Years": Symbolic Time and Internal Chronology

Towards the end, the narrator explicitly says that people first spoke of hundreds of years, then a thousand, and eventually chose the memorable rounded figure "twelve hundred years." A concluding note places Budhua's water burial roughly four or five hundred years after Vācaspati's time. It would therefore be a mistake to treat twelve hundred as his exact biological lifespan or an exact interval. The story discloses this divergence rather than concealing it. The distinction between mythical time and documentary time reminds the reader that folklore is a method of conserving meaning, not a clock for measurement. Nevertheless, if another part of the novel employs the number as though it were precise chronology, a reader may be confused. Identifying this distinction does not mean automatically finding a defect; it specifies the conditions of the narrator's declared temporal convention.

From Memory to Ghost: An Institution of Preservation or the Sanctification of a Person?

Reports of a shadow beneath the peepal and whispers pronouncing names send the story into the circulation of oral culture. Children hear the old names, while the identity of the storyteller becomes indistinct. A memorial site becomes a transmitter of narrative. Budhua's ghost is produced through collective naming, but a question remains: to what extent do living members of society fulfil their judicial and archival obligations? The worship of the names of Hulāsā and Sukhdev is not the same as redressing the injustice that remained unresolved during their lives. If the work merely declares that a compassionate ghost has preserved every name, present social responsibility risks becoming lighter. Yet the recurrence of each person's unfinished story insists that memory is not a substitute for justice, but a record of its outstanding debt.

The Witness-Tree and the Perspective of Videha's Parallel History

Around the witness-tree gather stories left outside royal records, prestigious manuscripts, and histories of victors. Hulāsā's words, Jīvantī's book, Sukhdev's land, and Ratnā's labour are recalled to construct a tradition of names excluded from accepted prestige. This is the critical possibility of parallel history. Still, what "people say" cannot automatically be treated as a solid factual account opposed to official history. Questions of evidence are not obstacles to this ethical enterprise but a fundamental tension within the work itself. Criticism of an archival system that erases names becomes stronger when it improves the possibility of recording them, not when it removes the need for direct evidence. The peepal is an alternative place for the authority of memory, not a complete court of justice or an authenticated archive.

Folk Song: Karuṇa-rasa and the Compression of a Complex Event

The closing song opposes the body going into the water to the name surviving in the village's mind. It gives the episode an emotional conclusion; communal singing transforms an individual witness into shared memory. Alongside compassion, an intimation of tranquillity is present. The parallel between a "deep pond" and a "deep name" is an oblique transformation of measure: physical depth becomes a figure for ethical endurance. Yet the song settles the event in a firm phrase, whereas the prose supplies no conclusive proof about a body or a crocodile. The song expresses collective belief, not a forensic finding. Keeping that distinction in view preserves both its poetic achievement and the event's openness.

Compassion, Appropriateness, and the Limits of Ethical Representation

Budhua's grief is not merely about the decline of his own body; it arises from the fear that four neglected lives will vanish. The focus of compassion therefore shifts from "an old man is dying" to "a community's memories and rights depend on a single elderly person." Its aesthetic basis is the recurrence of names and the dramatic sequence of four addresses. Yet an issue of aucitya remains unavoidable: entry into the water is described as exceptionally peaceful, beautiful, and devoid of fear. Such aesthetic organisation risks concealing the human dangers attached to a decision concerning death. The lack of substantial consideration of alternatives for life and collective preservation is a critical limitation. Sympathy for a character's suffering and belief that his final action is inevitable are separate judgements.

Table: States, Scenes, Evidence, and Outstanding Questions

State or scene	Kind of evidence	Narrative transformation	Unresolved question
Long time in the village	Narrator's summary	Seven generations and rebuilding of institutions	Budhuā's biological lifespan is unnatural
Safeguarding names	Conch and cord; repeated names	An elderly witness becomes the bearer of communal memory	Individual choice; incomplete written archive

State or scene	Kind of evidence	Narrative transformation	Unresolved question
Raghunāth's question	Direct dialogue between characters	The Vācaspati era returns to discussion	Actual number of years is not specified
Four addresses	Budhuā's direct speech	Unresolved injustices gather in personal recollection	Necessity of entering the water unproven
Disappearance	Interior vision; an "as if" image	Transformation of a human presence	Crocodile attack not directly witnessed
Search at dawn	A fisher finds the conch and cord	Memorial objects become public	No body or cause of death is found
Folklore of Burhba	People's account and symbolic numbers	Tradition of shadow, names, and witness-tree	Folk memory does not establish a material ghost

Event Sequence, Causal Chain, and What Remains Unresolved

At least seven changes of state can be distinguished: (a) transformation of the village and its institutions after many generations; (b) confirmation of Budhua's position as guardian of memory; (c) Raghunāth's question revealing the seemingly impossible age; (d) Budhua's decision to approach the water out of fear that memory will perish; (e) addresses to four dead or forgotten people and disappearance into the pond; (f) the fishermen's discovery of conch and rope and Vardhamāna's public memorial act; (g) the shaping of the Burhba ghost-story and the figure of "twelve hundred years" through folk tradition. This is a classification for research, not definitive machine-counted data. The social causal connection between (a) and (d) is intelligible, but the inference from (d) to (e)—that entering the water alone can preserve names—remains unproved. Material evidence of conch and rope and the perception of a shadow in folklore belong to different evidentiary categories. The future expansion towards Channa Gachhi is anticipation, not a directly enacted historical or botanical event.

The Work's Principal Achievement and Principal Weakness

The chapter's chief achievement is its incorporation of several distinct tragic events from the prehistory into the life of one long-enduring figure of memory. Within an unnatural folkloric timescale, concerns about social archives, caste, women's labour, and delayed justice remain alive. Each of the four addresses gives a specific ethical place to a name, while the conch, rope, peepal, and pond become recurring symbols. The narrator himself distinguishes folkloric time from historical chronology: a significant measure of authorial caution. The weaknesses include the unproved necessity of water burial, the absence of a directly seen crocodile, insufficient consideration of alternative social records, and ambiguities in some environmental descriptions of the river and pond. The exceptionally beautiful account of disappearance provides little space for the character's actual fear or a community's response. Without acknowledging these limits, a fair assessment of the work is impossible.

Narrative Bridge to Chapter −89 and Final Judgement

The ending links Burhba's shadow to the future of Channa Gachhi, constructing a long bridge between prehistory, folklore, and the principal narrative. The next chapter, "The First Night, the First Flood," must be examined to discover how the new presence of memory acts during a public crisis; its specific actions must not be decided by conjecture before the next text is read. The independent judgement on "Budhua's Water Burial" is that the chapter does not simply pronounce death a victory. It tells the story of a tragic technique of remembering, born of archival failure. The certain end of the body and the material existence of a ghost are not established on the same evidentiary level, but the village's continuing circulation of Burhba's story is a socially attested event in the narrative. Justice may remain unfinished; calling a name preserves the knowledge that it remains so.

Chapter −90: Register of Evidence Verified Against the Original Text

Proverbial assertion — "The crocodile took the body and left the name."

Institutional time — "The assembly building had fallen twice and been rebuilt twice."

Generation of scholarly inheritance — "Seventh-generation successor."

Restoration of the witness-character — "And Budhua was still alive."

New folkloric name — "Burhba."

Repeated names — "Hulāsā's"; "Jīvantī's"; "Sukhdev's"; "Ratnā's."

Seasonal image — "Cold as ice."

The disciple's question — "Burhba, how old are you?"

Historical astonishment — "Vācaspati Miśra?"

Body and memory — "Not in my body, but in my memory."

Memory's burden — "Memory becomes a burden."

Hulāsā's unfinished speech — "I..."

Limits of representation — "This was not my right."

Jīvantī's unfinished words — "To bear witness to a book is also..."

The witness's promise — "I will be a witness, Jīvantī."

Sukhdev's institutional legacy — "The Sukhdev Rule."

Memory of Ratnā′s labour — “Not with ink, but with memory.”

Careful personification of the peepal — “It seemed to lean towards him.”

Vow and lifespan — “This itself breaks the limits of age.”

Absence of a body — “Neither body, nor footprints, nor any sign of struggle.”

Vardhamāna′s mourning — “Budhua has not died.”

Formula of folk tradition — “People began to say.”

Traditional number — “Twelve hundred years.”

Song and the persistence of names — “A name carried by the village cannot be lost in any water burial.”

Paratextual difference in chronology — “Four or five hundred years later.”

Explanation of folkloric time — “Memorably remote antiquity.”

Critical Section 12 | Original Chapter −89 — The First Night, the First Flood

Textual Basis, Chapter Boundaries, and the Critical Question

"The First Night, the First Flood" is the twelfth chapter of the prehistory. The contents of the complete original novel place its beginning on page 152 and the beginning of Chapter −88, "The Accusation of Witchcraft," on page 158. The cited page range in the original edition is therefore 152–157. This range is not a complete measure of event density; the causes, alternatives, and consequences of the principal events must be examined separately. After the original story, an explanatory section entitled "A Note on the Embankment of Garh Narikel and the Flood Traditions of Mithila" appears. Rather than treating it as historical proof of narrative events, it should be read as an interpretation supplied within the text. This chapter asks: if water is an autonomous power of nature, whose decisions determine the social distribution of destruction? And if the witness is a supernatural consciousness, where do the limits of rescue begin?

From Water Burial to the First Trial: A Knot in the Sequence of Causes

In Chapter −90 Budhua disappears bodily and becomes transformed into Burhba in the community's folklore. The bracketed introduction to the new chapter expressly marks the passage of one year and describes the first flood as Burhba's first test. The unresolved question from the preceding chapter—whether protecting names is sufficient or protecting living people is also required—therefore becomes an immediate conflict within a scene. The symbols of the prehistory—philosophical disputation, manuscripts, the witness-tree, and water burial—now confront an urgent duty to act. This succession is more than a linking of episodes; it is a test of an ethical rule already established. But by calling the event a "test" in advance, the introductory note partially directs the reader's evaluation and somewhat narrows the scope for experiencing the result independently.

The Expansion of Night and the Compression of Time

The night's events proceed in sequence: wind, then lightning, then torrential rain, the roar of the Kamla-Balan, Gaurī's dream, her awakening, the warning, the collapse of the embankment, flight, and the accounting of loss at dawn. Many changes of state take place in one night, while Burhba's year of existence is merely background. There is no static interval of joy or reassurance; the very short time available for reactions accelerates the narrative. A sentence such as "But there was very little time" contracts experienced duration and heightens uncertainty. At dawn and at noon, the pace slackens again, allowing readers to comprehend the grief of seven deaths and the meaning of the new rule. In Gérard Genette's terms, the distinction among scene, summary, and pause needs to be recognised; a count of rapid action verbs alone is insufficient.

The River's Voice and the Spatial Organisation of the Leatherworkers' Quarter

At the beginning, the waters of the Kamla-Balan become an active and uncertain force. Yet the river alone does not create the inequality of the impact. The southern edge of the village, the low-lying ground, the leatherworkers' settlement, and a temporary earthen embankment form a single geography of vulnerability. The detail that maintenance had depended only on soil left over from the cultivators suggests an absence of collective planning and equal protection. The greater exposure of the Dalit settlement is not a natural divine punishment; it arises from the use of land, priorities in construction, and social power relations. This is the central environmental-narratological achievement of the chapter: water generates the event, but structural inequality alters the distribution of its harm. Natural crisis and social injustice are different causal levels, not synonyms.

Narrator, Shifting Focalisation, and the Limits of Knowledge

A third-person external narrator presents the story, but experience travels from Burhba's inward fear to Gaurī's dream, the grandmother's ability to hear, and the settlement's collective flight. The narrator knows the sensations of Burhba's altered existence and also relates the sound of a bell arising in Gaurī's consciousness. Despite this broad access, Burhba himself does not know why Gaurī possesses her peculiar ability. Ignorance within the character is maintained even under extensive narrative knowledge, and this sustains the mystery. What only Gaurī experiences and what the narrator reports independently have different evidentiary standings. Critical reading should not merge these voices into a single objective testimony, but should identify the levels of narrative reliability.

Burhba's New Existence: Extensive Perception, Limited Power

Burhba senses the rising water through his roots, body, and conch, but when he tries to knock at a door, his hand slides across its wood. This contradiction is not a cheap multiplication of supernatural powers: perception is extensive while the means of communication are weak. A witness cannot warn society of an impending emergency. The scene exposes a real crisis in the ethics of testimony within the story. His question—"If a witness cannot save…"—tests his earlier vow. Yet later Burhba briefly redirects the water's course; the rules governing this new capacity have not previously been clearly established. Magical narrative does not require a full scientific explanation, but the consistency of selective powers and failures still warrants examination.

Introducing Gaurī: Generations, Knowledge, and Unequal Rights of Inheritance

Seven-year-old Gaurī, a fourth-generation descendant of Ratnā and Mālatī, sleeps beside her grandmother in the leatherworkers' settlement. The grandmother's herbal knowledge, said to have been learned from Ratnā, makes a female family tradition into intellectual inheritance. This detail does more than choose a character through whom a miracle may occur: the first warning comes from a community formerly kept at a distance from the doors of scholarly disputation. The villagers treat Gaurī's dream as a child's imagination; her grandmother pays attention to its obscure suggestion. Both explanations remain possible within the text. It would be inappropriate to treat the supernatural capacity as a biological property of caste or lineage. Through one particular fictional character, the novel underlines the ethical importance of marginalised traditions of knowledge.

The Words in the Dream and Three Links in the Transmission of Information

Burhba cannot awaken the village by an ordinary call. Only in Gaurī's dream is a signal repeated: "Wake up. Wake up. Wake up." The first link is a supernatural appeal; the second is Gaurī's awakening and her communication to her grandmother; the third is the grandmother opening the door and seeing and hearing the water outside. The public warning spreads in earnest only when the grandmother calls the settlement on the basis of her own direct observation. The dream therefore has the status of personal experience for Gaurī, audible and visible evidence for the grandmother, and a collective announcement for the settlement. In an examination of pramāṇa informed by Navya-Nyāya, a sign received in a dream cannot automatically count as public perception or universal reliable testimony. Its practical value is supported retrospectively by the emergency that subsequently becomes evident.

Barking Dogs, the River's Roar, and an Environment of Information

Initially the grandmother takes Gaurī's dream for a nightmare, but changes her judgement when she hears the roar of water and the continual barking of dogs outside. Nonhuman sound becomes a necessary part of the warning. Environmental cognition in the story does not rest exclusively upon human sight: animal behaviour, the voice of the wind, and the gleam of water become signs of danger before it arrives. Yet the suggestion that the dogs were "themselves seeing something" is an image offered by the narrator, not an established case of animal prediction. No single cause of the barking is conclusively provided. This caution preserves the literary role of nonhuman activity without inventing scientific certainty about the natural events.

The Breaking of the Embankment: The Actual Centre of Event Density

The failure of the embankment is the decisive external event. Its prior condition is an unsafe earthen barrier; the disruption is the force of the Kamla-Balan; the immediate result is flooding of the lower settlement; and the available choice is to abandon homes and flee towards higher ground. These four stages constitute the principal causal chain. Water rising from ankle height to knee height makes the shortage of time a bodily experience. The pace takes the reader directly into the emergency, even though water levels, duration of rainfall, and actual distances are not measured. In calculating event density, the critic must not treat multiple descriptions of one failed embankment as separate events; warning, flight, obstruction, and death are distinct changes of state.

The Cremation-Ground Mound: A Life-Saving Reversal of an Inauspicious Place

Gaurī's family reaches the high mound where an old cremation ground stands, a place usually avoided by villagers as inauspicious. This is an ethical rereading of geography. A forbidden place associated with death becomes a refuge that saves life; religious folk belief and topographical safety clash. The height of the mound offers a practical reason for escaping the water, although Burhba's momentary redirection of the current and the family's timing also operate within the story. The cremation ground is not merely a lesson against superstition: cultural symbols of life and death reverse themselves and acquire new meaning through human usefulness. The change of place is a concrete dramatic turn in the narrative's chronotope.

Rescuing One Family: The Ethical Tension of Collective Loss

Feeling Gaurī's fear, Burhba turns the water aside for an instant, enabling her family to reach the mound. The next line immediately recalls that the rest of the settlement was not equally fortunate. Supernatural rescue is therefore not omnipotent justice, but partial intervention. This limitation is ethically productive because a miracle does not erase social catastrophe. Yet the question remains: what rule of the fictional world accounts for Burhba's special responsiveness to Gaurī's family and the failure to save others, including Subhāgī? His own lack of understanding is one possible answer, but it does not provide adequate causal clarity. The indeterminacy may be effective for aesthetic experience while remaining incomplete as an explanation.

Subhāgī's Death: Scene, Indirect Testimony, and Generational Loss

The old home of Somar and Ratnā is swept away. Family members attempt to carry the aged and disabled Subhāgī to safety, but the current takes her from them. Her reported last question—"Did Gaurī survive?"—binds the event to a name. The narrator, however, introduces the words as something "the villagers later continued to say." They are not a directly recorded final utterance, but part of a subsequent communal account. Their poignancy is undeniable; their evidentiary status must nevertheless be specified. Gaurī survives and Subhāgī dies: the story depicts generational continuity and rupture at once. The elder's bodily vulnerability also exposes the different risks of disaster; the intersection of caste, age, and disability emerges from the stated circumstances.

Seven Dead, Six Unnamed: Counting and the Power of the Archive

The narrative reports seven deaths, but the names of six people besides Subhāgī are not properly entered in the official record. The royal official first counts losses of grain and cattle in the Brahmin settlement. In this single scene the novel distinguishes a count of the dead from justice towards their names. A total of seven does not encompass the whole of grief; the erasure of six names generates an urgent need for communal remembrance. The state register becomes a document structured by power. Yet this one fictional scene cannot establish the intentions of every official or the behaviour of an entire historical administrative system. Videha's method of parallel history would ask how family testimony, traces of labour, and communal memory might yield histories distinct from official entries.

Burhba's Weeping and the Peepal Leaves: A Vehicle for Karuṇa-rasa

At dawn Burhba weeps for the first time, but has neither human tears nor an audible human voice. The peepal leaves appear wetter than dew "as though" affected by the grief. Through this comparison, nature becomes a visible medium of mourning without the narrator establishing that the tree literally secretes tears. The dead Subhāgī and the other unnamed people are the supporting objects of karuṇa-rasa, and Burhba's inability to help intensifies the sorrow as a bodily response. The strength of the image is its indirectness: where weeping cannot be heard, the tree becomes the visual language of grief. If the tree were read entirely as a giver of human emotion, however, its independent ecological existence might shrink into mere symbolism. Both readings remain possible.

Gaurī and Burhba in Dialogue: Confessing the Limits of Partial Success

At noon Gaurī brings her grandmother's grief to the peepal. Burhba responds, "I could save only some." This is the most significant ethical statement of his new existence. He does not take satisfaction in saving Gaurī, but remembers his earlier inability to help Hulāsā, Jīvantī, and Sukhdev. The chain of memory thus becomes a source of ethical instruction rather than simply a list of names. The worth of lives saved and the grief of those not saved stand together. Still, extended moral exposition after the climax of compassion leaves the reader somewhat less room to judge independently. The story gives this lesson dramatic form through Gaurī's questioning, but does not elicit fully developed disagreement.

The Figure of the Half-Ghost: A New Grammar of Witnessing

Burhba does not understand Gaurī's ability to hear him. He speculates —"perhaps"—that a person ready to become a witness turns into a slender thread between two worlds. This is not an objective law of ghostly existence but the character's tentative self-interpretation. "Half-ghost" can also serve as a social metaphor: one who hears unheard voices stands on the boundary between living society and vanished memory. The making of a new saying, from private conversation into a domestic warning, shows how words become popular understanding independently of ritual. To transform a conjecture into certain direct knowledge would contradict the epistemic caution associated with Navya-Nyāya. The preservation of uncertainty is an artistic gain.

The Changing Village Name: Invented Etymology and Folk Archive

The narrative says that after the flood an embankment was built of fired bricks and stone, and "Narikel-Ghat" gradually came to be called "Garh Narikel." "Garh" was attached to the memory of the new barrier. The note following the original chapter expressly calls this an imagined etymology, not evidence of the place-name's actual historical origin. Readers may interpret the geographical name as an inscription of communal responsibility. Changing the name does not bring back the seven dead, but places a trace of the calamity in public speech. The further question remains whether, over time, a beautiful moral account of the name might itself efface the details of actual neglect.

New Priorities for the Embankment: Policy Change and Contradiction

After the disaster, the portion protecting the leatherworkers' settlement is built first and made strongest. The story translates a natural disaster into a social decision: the formerly neglected periphery is now accorded priority for safety. This is a genuine transformation in the situation—physical construction and communal policy—and a more concrete outcome than the partial miracle. Yet the entire decision is compressed into one paragraph. The sources of funds, division of labour, opposing interests, maintenance, and effectiveness in future floods are not tested in scenes. The assessment is consequently double: giving policy justice a material form is an achievement, whereas the rapid closure of a difficult collective process is a structural simplification. The twenty-year interval of the next chapter will offer a partial test of the policy's survival.

Collective Song and the Meaning Made After Disaster

The closing song chooses the language of communal reconstruction after flood destruction. Lines such as "The first flood took our homes" and "Those who survived that night" turn a specific scene into recurring folk memory. Its rhythm shifts the narrative voice from unbearable grief towards collective endurance. This is an artistic expression of popular feeling and survival. Yet the rapid arrival of optimism after seven deaths and six lost names can feel emotionally accelerated. The transition from compassion to encouragement makes the intention clear while retaining a substantial tension between reassurance and continuing exposure to harm. The song should be understood as an expression of retrospective communal meaning, not a complete resolution of events.

Separate Classification of Event, Cause, and Consequence

The central event is a destructive flood, but several independent decisions and transformations surround it: the swelling river; Burhba's unsuccessful warning; Gaurī's dream; the grandmother's observation outside; the settlement's flight; the failure of the embankment; rescue of Gaurī's family; seven deaths including Subhāgī; inadequate registration of losses; Burhba's dialogue with Gaurī; reconstruction of the embankment; and the change of place-name. Flattening these into one list would erase causal order and responsibility. The dream, for example, does not cause the embankment to fail. Its weakness is an antecedent social condition; rising water is the proximate physical cause; the time available for warning affects the result of escape. The miraculous redirection of the water is a cause within the fictional world, not an independently verified scientific fact about river flow. Such distinctions are crucial in evaluating event density.

The Politics of Focalisation: Who Speaks and Who Does Not?

The reader hears Gaurī, her grandmother, and Burhba. Subhāgī's last words are mediated through a community report; the other six dead have no independently voiced utterances. This silence is both a subject of the work and one of its limitations. The story exposes archival exclusion but cannot develop the six lives independently within its text. At the point where society fails to register their names, the narrator does not recover them either, producing an ethical contradiction in representation. Before declaring this a final failure, one must test whether the names recur in subsequent chapters. Yet within the limits of this chapter, Gaurī's family enjoys more narrative space than the six unknown dead.

Stylistic Incongruity, Over-Explanation, and Scenic Coherence

The opening flood sequence describes a splitting sky, torrential rain, barking dogs, and the river's roar. Yet at the moment of warning the grandmother's call is said to be audible because "the night was so quiet." There is a clear verbal incongruity: noisy turbulence and total stillness are attributed to the same temporal setting without a clarifying indication that "quiet" means the silence of sleeping villagers or distracted human attention. Similarly, the rules governing Burhba's bodilessness and brief power to turn water remain unclear even to him; this unnatural convention invites tests of narrative consistency. The new etymology and rapid repair of the embankment also supply a near-epilogue resolution within a brief interval. Naming these weaknesses does not diminish the work's compassion or its attention to marginalised people; it judges achievement and craft together.

Navya-Nyāya, Indian Poetics, and a Combined Verdict

In the language of Navya-Nyāya, the proposition to be tested is not simply "the village flooded" but "unequal protection increases social risk." The proposed reason is a weak earthen embankment beside a neglected low-lying settlement. One fictional case does not establish a universal pervasion across every place. The intensity of rainfall, terrain, maintenance capacity, and timely warning are consequential limiting conditions. Gaurī's dream is private experience; the grandmother's observation offers a more publicly checkable basis for social decision. At the level of Indian poetics, karuṇa-rasa, the suggested grief of the peepal leaves, the oblique reversal of the cremation ground, and the appropriateness of prioritising the neglected settlement's security are important. The chapter's foremost accomplishment is not supernatural rescue but exposure of the social inequality of disaster and its transformation into the construction of a better embankment. Its limitations are rapid moral closure, the silence of six dead, and incomplete rules for the redirection of the flood. It is therefore a powerful, though not unassailable, juncture at which the previous narrative of memory becomes a narrative of social action.

Bridge to Chapter –88 and Final Critical Position

After the first flood, the new embankment and Gaurī's distinctive ability to witness provide the material for future social conflict. The title of Chapter –88, "The Accusation of Witchcraft," suggests that recognition of a woman's unusual knowledge is not guaranteed. Its events must not, however, be treated as already having occurred here. In this chapter Gaurī does not know the origin of her dream, and Burhba likewise admits his limitations. Preserving their uncertainty, the initial conclusion is that the prehistory has now entered the present crisis of marginalised communities, water security, and archival rights. Private grief becomes collective speech, material construction, and a change in social practice. But memory will be complete only when the seven dead are named and responsibility for their losses is addressed. That question must be followed through subsequent sections with textual evidence.

Chapter –89: Table of Event, Evidence, and Cause

State or event	Form of textual evidence	Cause and consequence	Distinct evidentiary limit
Rising Kamala-Balan	Weather description and Burhba's perception	Proximate natural cause of the water crisis	No external measurement of water levels
Weak embankment of the leatherworkers' quarter	Narrator's description of society and terrain	The lower settlement faces disproportionate danger	Long-term maintenance and resource allocation are compressed
Burhba loses his voice	Supernatural focalisation	Warning fails at a physical door	Rules of his altered existence uncertain
Gaurī's dream and grandmother's observation	Private experience followed by shared auditory and visual signs	Warning and flight begin	The dream is not a public perception
Failure of the embankment	External scene; water rising from ankle to knee	Houses are washed away; time to flee contracts	Concrete consequence of socially unequal risk
Cremation-ground mound and deflection of water	Survival of Gaurī's family; supernatural simile	One family survives	Not a collective rescue; mechanism unexplained
Seven deaths, including Subhāgī	Narrative report; last words reported by others	Displacement and family grief	Six dead unnamed; quoted words indirect
Damage counted by a royal official	Narrator's institutional commentary	Records structured by class and caste	No independent proof of the broad historical assertion
New masonry embankment	Summarising epilogue by the narrator	Protection of the marginal settlement is prioritised	Construction process and long-term durability omitted
The name Garh Narikel	Post-narrative explanation	A place-name marks collective memory	Fictional etymology, not objective history

The table keeps supernatural descriptions, enacted scenes, reported accounts, and post-narrative interpretation in separate evidentiary categories. Its rows are a preliminary analytic list of states and events, not definitive statistical event-density data.

Chapter −89: Register of Evidence Verified Against the Original Text

Opening proverb — “The first flood took our homes.” Original Part 0, Chapter −89.

Bracketed chronology — “Exactly one year after Budhua's water burial.”

Beginning of the night — “Half the night had passed.”

Opening image of disaster — “The sky split open.”

Burhba's experience of danger — “The Kamla-Balan was about to break its bounds.”

Unsafe embankment — “Only a few heaps of earth.”

Burhba's inability — “His hand could no longer touch the door.”

Ethical self-questioning — “If a witness cannot save…”

Gaurī's genealogy — “The fourth generation of Ratnā and Mālatī's lineage.”

Dream warning — “Wake up. Wake up. Wake up.”

First notice of danger — “Water is coming.”

Grandmother's auditory evidence — “The sound of roaring water.”

Contraction of narrative time — “But there was very little time.”

Failure of the embankment — “Collapsed like a castle of sand.”

Place of rescue — “A high mound.”

Decisive loss — “Subhāgī was left behind.”

Reported last words — “Did Gaurī survive?”

Unequal archival naming — “They were from the leatherworkers' quarter.”

Burhba's bodiless grief — “Neither tears nor voice.”

Admission of limited success — “I could save only some.”

Tentative self-explanation — “Perhaps the human being who is ready to bear witness…”

Construction of the new barrier — “Of fired bricks and stone.”

Change in priority — "The part towards the leatherworkers' quarter first of all."

Note following the chapter — "An invented etymology." This is not a historical fact.

Critical Section 13 | Original Chapter −88 — The Accusation of Witchcraft

The Original Text, Chapter Boundary, and Purpose of the Examination

"The Accusation of Witchcraft" is the thirteenth independent chapter of the prehistory. The contents of the complete original novel place its beginning on page 158 and that of Chapter −87, "At the Gate of the Settlement," on page 164; the referenced printed range is therefore pages 158–163. This proportional indication is not an objective measure of narrative change, but only a preliminary linguistic marker. In the original, the opening saying, the principal story twenty years later, the closing women's song, and the special note entitled "Historical Relations between Witchcraft Accusations and Land Appropriation" are distinct textual forms. This criticism jointly examines the social workings of the accusation, the fallacious reasoning behind fabricated evidence, the incomplete beginnings of resistance, and the narrator's choices. The appendix-like note will not be treated as independent historical evidence.

The Omission of Twenty Years: A Night Becomes the Distance of a Generation

In the previous chapter seven-year-old Gaurī heard the warning of a flood. Here the narrator explicitly states that twenty years have passed. Gaurī is twenty-seven, the mother of two children, knowledgeable about medicinal plants, and recognised as a healer in the community. This arithmetic consistency supplies a stable basis for the sequence. Yet the changes over twenty years—the permanent embankment, the spread of cultivation, and distant markets for drums and other crafts—are presented in summary rather than scene by scene. In Gérard Genette's analysis of duration, the compression of extensive story-time quickly introduces the new crisis, while leaving the detailed experience of labour, production, and embankment maintenance outside the reader's sight. The calamity of the preceding chapter returns here as a potential redistribution of property; the temporal ellipsis compresses the years following destruction.

Embankment, Settlement, and Prosperity: The Unexpected Political Consequences of Water Security

The new embankment does more than guard against natural danger. Betel leaves and vegetables thrive upon its raised ground, and the products of artisans reach more distant markets. The economic value of the leatherworkers' labour increases. The lack of security that had cost lives during the first flood has been partially corrected, and this correction now gives rise to conflict over esteem and land rights. The causal sequence is important for environmental narratology: danger from the river → communal construction → opportunities for production → a reaction concerning status. A general statement that the settlement has become "prosperous" does not prove that income is equally distributed among its households; no household accounts are supplied. Nevertheless, the caste-and-class direction of the opposition is clear: improvements for others are perceived as losses by those accustomed to dominance. The politics of water security therefore touches both natural resources and social rights.

Pratāpsen: Hereditary Power and the Humiliation of Comparison

Pratāpsen Thakur is the grandson of Ugrasen Thakur. This genealogical identity anchors the chapter in the memory of earlier social oppression. His speech joins the actual decline of his own property to the increased prosperity of the leatherworkers' settlement, without supplying a causal accounting of either. The comparison immediately becomes a question of rank: who has the right to sell grain "on an equal footing with us"? More than economic competition, the demand for caste supremacy is audible in the question. The narrator directs interpretation through words denoting his anger and pride rather than leaving his motives entirely open. This makes the ethical shape of the conspiracy clear, but it offers little independent detail about his losses, debts, or obstacles to production. A potentially complex economic anxiety is presented as relatively simple moral villainy.

Yaśpati's Narrative Function: From Religious Authority to the Manufacture of Accusations

Paṇḍit Yaśpati is the ritual presiding officer of the village's new assembly building. His prestige serves in the story not to examine truth but to translate a charge into an apparently authoritative form. His proposed use of categories such as "impure" and "inauspicious" in connection with reconsideration of land rights reveals his relation to power. Particular caution is necessary: although Yaśpati speaks as though he were interpreting a rule governing redistribution of land, the novel gives no actual statutory section, date, jurisdiction, or independent enactment. His claim must therefore be read as a character's strategy within the fictional world, not as evidence of Indian law. The alliance between popular fear and institutional paperwork is his principal narrative function.

"Evidence Is Manufactured": An Ethical Inversion of the Word Pramāṇa

Yaśpati declares, "Evidence is made, Thakur Sahib; it is not asked for." This is the chapter's epistemological centre. In the initial philosophical debates, pramāṇa involved the search for a truthful basis of knowledge. Here "evidence" becomes an object deliberately produced to sustain an accusation. The word remains the same while social conduct reverses its meaning. In a Navya-Nyāya perspective, the validity of evidence does not depend on the desire of a partisan or the number of people in a crowd; it depends on a defined subject, observation, non-deviating reasoning, and the examination of opposition. Yaśpati's plan is to attach some actual incident of illness to the name of a person already designated as guilty. The offence here is not the illness itself but the seizure of power over its interpretation. This single utterance greatly sharpens the chapter's ethical force.

Gaurī's Healing Practice: Service of the Body and the Refusal of Knowledge

Gaurī's knowledge of medicinal plants has descended through Ratnā's female lineage. The narrator says she has experience of many sick people and childbirths in the village. Her usefulness is established through relations of care, yet her knowledge is not accorded secure recognition in the hierarchy of prestige. The observation that "knowledge was not in a book but in the hands" makes visible the opposition between the experienced labour of women and written, authorised scholarship. This does not automatically demonstrate that the experience yields medically valid conclusions: the novel contains no modern examination of therapeutic efficacy. Yet injustice in denying a person's right to knowledge solely because of the bearer's identity is established in the narrated world. Gaurī's vocation is therapeutic; the language of accusation is violent. This contrast generates the chapter's central pathos.

The Half-Ghost Image and Social Suspicion

Gaurī is called a "half-ghost," and she sometimes hears Burhba's voice. This develops a distinctive rule of the fictional world from the first flood; it is not an ordinary sociological fact. The narrator supplies the reader with the context for her experience, while Pratāpsen and Yaśpati turn the rumours about this invisible dialogue into a doctrine directed against the woman. Unnatural narrative and social violence intersect here. What is a special experience in the character's consciousness becomes raw material for a charge of "witchcraft" in the hands of power. Even if the truth of her supernatural experience has one status within the narrative, rival characters can arbitrarily alter its social meaning. Criticism must maintain the distinction between the two levels.

The Reader Knows More: Dramatic Irony

The reader overhears Yaśpati and Pratāpsen plotting in a private meeting at the mansion before Gaurī knows anything of their plan. The narrator expressly says that Gaurī had no unusual dream that evening and knew nothing of the conspiracy. This distribution of information produces dramatic irony: readers understand that the accusation is false before its intended victim is even aware of it. Rather than a detective plot leading to revelation, the story produces tension through the inability to forestall an injustice. The third-person narrator knows both the secret political conversation and the woman's private ignorance. Focalisation therefore does not remain fixed upon Gaurī but moves between extensive knowledge and selected proximity. The advantage of this technique is tragic irony; its cost is a reduction in ordinary mystery.

Viśvanāth's Illness: Distinguishing Opportunity from Design

Yaśpati's plan requires an illness that can be exploited. Viśvanāth, Pratāpsen's six-year-old son, develops a high fever. The failure of treatment during the first two days, unconsciousness on the third, and serious condition on the fourth night mark the illness's progress through short temporal stages. The narrator does not determine its cause. For the conspirators the illness is the occasion they sought; the text, however, presents no event in which either Yaśpati or Gaurī causes it. This distinction is essential to understanding the faulty reasoning behind the eventual charge. The illness is an independent and apparently contingent disturbance in the plot; the conspirators' use of it is a deliberate decision. To treat the onset of illness itself as a planned offence would contradict the original.

Kamalā Devī's Disobedience: Limited but Genuine Self-Determination

Viśvanāth's mother, Kamalā Devī, wants Gaurī to be summoned, but Pratāpsen forbids this on caste grounds. As the child's condition worsens, Kamalā Devī defies her husband and sends a maidservant to fetch Gaurī. This decision is a crucial moment of autonomous female action within the story. Kamalā Devī makes no political speech and does not argue in the public assembly, but she breaks a rule of dominance to seek medical help. Without her cooperation and that of the maidservant, Gaurī could not have reached the patient. It would, however, exaggerate the significance of this maternal decision to treat it as a fully formed consciousness opposed to caste; her later public position is absent from the text. This absence is critically relevant.

The Scene of Treatment: Adequacy of Cause and Limits of Knowledge

Gaurī remains beside Viśvanāth throughout the night. The text mentions cool compresses and a decoction of neem and cirāyatā. By morning the fever subsides, and the child recognises his mother. Within the fictional world, this sequence is presented as Gaurī's successful care, but no diagnosis, assessment of earlier treatments, account of the illness's natural duration, or independent medical test is provided. The specific causal effect of the herbs should therefore not be cited as a proven result of real-world medical science. Narratively, Gaurī's intervention and the child's improvement form a decisive change of state; ethically, the life-preserving service conflicts with the social prejudices of the beneficiary family. Treatment and outcome are joined within the narrated sequence, without establishing an exceptionless universal inference.

Pratāpsen's Sense of Humiliation: Patriarchal Authority Against a Son's Life

Pratāpsen's son recovers, yet his first substantial response upon seeing Gaurī is anger. He is not responding to failed treatment but to the breaking of his order and a leatherworking woman's entry into his house. This contradiction exposes the ethical hierarchy of his priorities: even his son's health is subordinated to the rule of dominance. The narrator explicitly interprets his wounded pride, guiding the reader's moral judgement. Such interpretative insistence, however, leaves less room to experience the character's inner contradictions through dialogue and behaviour alone. The effect is forceful while psychological complexity remains limited. Narrative distance narrows as the narrator becomes the authoritative interpreter of guilt.

The Fallacy that Turns the Healer into the Cause of Disease

Yaśpati reverses the question: if the fever ended after this woman's treatment, perhaps she had caused it in the first place. This is an invalid inference, taking a later outcome as culpable evidence of an earlier cause. The subject (pakṣa) is Gaurī; the property alleged (sādhya) is her responsibility for producing the illness; and the purported reason (hetu) is the child's improvement after her treatment. The reason is not inseparably connected with the conclusion: not every person who treats a disease caused it, and not everyone who causes disease is a healer. The proposed reason is inconclusive (anaikāntika), while the social assumption concerning "witchcraft" intrudes to assign the outcome an illegitimate meaning. Independent illness, the failure of earlier treatment, Gaurī's service, and natural changes are disregarded as alternatives. A Navya-Nyāya-oriented critique is effective here, although the narrative's use of "evidence" should not be presented as a verbatim formulation from Gaṅgeśa's original treatise.

From Slander to Public Accusation: Institutional Acceleration

A plan made privately becomes a public announcement in an emergency assembly. Yaśpati says he has "gathered evidence," but no witness, diagnosis, causal examination, or opportunity for Gaurī to answer is shown. The emergency meeting accelerates the accusation: instead of an inquiry, the crowd hears language of danger and ritual purification. This is an independent turn in the event sequence—an allegation becomes an official public accusation. The purported land regulation remains a character's claim, not verified law. The actual narrated result so far is public pressure, not a completed expulsion from the land; to assert that the settlement has already been evicted would bring a future event into the present chapter's chronology.

Punishment "Pending Investigation": The Difference Between Procedure and Justice

Yaśpati announces that until an investigation is completed, Gaurī should be excluded from religious activities and the entire leatherworkers' settlement barred from land near the embankment. Rights are to be restricted before facts are established. This is an ethical inversion of procedure: investigation should be a means of hearing an individual and her community, but its name becomes an instrument of preliminary punishment. The charge concerns one person while the restriction falls upon the entire settlement; this disproportion exposes the social purpose of the measure. In the terms of Navya-Nyāya delimitation, Gaurī's alleged behaviour and the collective land rights of the leatherworkers are distinct loci. An unproved allegation concerning the first cannot automatically extinguish the second. The novel exposes the moral flaw but does not supply an extensive account of legal jurisdiction or the mechanisms of appeal.

Silence in the Assembly: Between Gratitude and Fear

Some present in the assembly have children whom Gaurī previously saved. Memories of gratitude draw them towards objection, but Yaśpati's religious authority and Pratāpsen's influence suppress dissent. It would therefore be inaccurate to read the scene simply as "the village unanimously opposes Gaurī." The original records some resistance. Still, these opponents receive neither names nor fully developed arguments; possibilities of multiple voices are compressed into narrative summary. Bakhtin's concept of polyphony should not be applied mechanically: several social positions are mentioned, but they are not all developed as autonomous worlds of thought. Silence is an effect of fear, not proof of agreement.

Gaurī at Home: Breastfeeding and the Violence of a Name Imposed Elsewhere

While the village authorities announce restrictions in the assembly building, Gaurī is at home breastfeeding her daughter. This simultaneity is especially effective. Public authority determines the guilt of someone who is absent, while the supposed culprit is engaged in the intimate work of sustaining her child's life. The violence of the charge threatens not an abstract individual but an existence made of motherhood, care, labour, and relationships. Breastfeeding can evoke karuṇa-rasa, yet Gaurī must not be reduced to the identity of a mother: she is also an experienced healer, a bearer of knowledge, and a person capable of independent decisions. The scene's achievement is bodily immediacy; its limitation is the absence of Gaurī's direct voice in the accusatory assembly.

Phulesarī: Messenger and an Enduring Thread of Women's Organisation

Phulesarī runs to Gaurī and tells her of the emergency assembly's accusation and proposed eviction. The narrator identifies her as a leading participant in the discreet evening circle of women associated with Ratnā's tradition. This links the female knowledge-community of Chapter –91 to a possible basis for present political resistance. Phulesarī is not merely Gaurī's friend; she is an alternative conduit for information about institutional decisions. News hostile to the assembly moves not through an official report but through women's social networks. Yet the organisation of the circle, its actual means of resistance, and the independent roles of Phulesarī's collaborators do not receive extensive depiction here. The possibility belongs to subsequent chapters; the critic cannot construct its complete history by inference at this point.

Gaurī's Question to Herself: Unequal Ethical Meanings of Gratitude

After hearing Phulesarī, Gaurī asks whether saving Viśvanāth was a mistake, or whether the mistake was to have been born in the leatherworkers' quarter. The force of the question lies in the ethical residue: why is the person who provides care treated as guilty? The narrator brings Ratnā, Hulāsā, Jīvantī, and Sukhdev into Gaurī's recollection. A personal accusation is thereby connected to a sequence of social humiliations across generations. The pattern of recollection joins the prehistory's separate crises in one ethical constellation, but their circumstances are not identical. Jīvantī's disappearance in water, Sukhdev's death amid judicial delay, and the accusation against Gaurī must not be flattened into the same incident of oppression. A method of parallel history preserves both similarity and difference.

Running Towards Burhba: Uncertain Faith in Supernatural Aid

Gaurī leaves her child in Phulesarī's care and decides to go to the peepal. She wishes to speak to Burhba but also fears that he may again be powerless. His partial rescue during the first flood and the deaths of seven people remain implicitly active. This uncertainty complicates her character. Gaurī hears a supernatural voice but does not believe unconditionally in its omnipotence. Whether she reaches the peepal or receives an answer from Burhba is not shown in this chapter. To write the anticipated dialogue as a completed event would be unsupported. The narrative question remains open.

The Movement of Torches and an Open Ending: The Visible Rhythm of Fear

The chapter closes with the stilling of the wind and a moving light of torches from the direction of the assembly building. People carrying torches advance towards the leatherworkers' quarter. This is a sign of imminent attack, not an already completed act of arson. Narrative duration contracts into an evening moment and creates a crafted pause. The reader knows whom the conspirators have targeted, and Gaurī now has warning, but the community's response remains undecided. The ending makes a causal connection with Chapter –87, "At the Gate of the Settlement." Before reading it, the crowd's acts, the actual consequences of violence, and any intervention by Burhba must not be supplied as facts. Uncertainty keeps the ethical crisis alive.

Women's Song and Opening Saying: The Protection of Names and a Foreordained Moral Answer

The chapter's opening saying asserts the right to a name in opposition to the accusation. In the conclusion, some village women sing a song of resistance. "The crowd shouted, the torches burned, but no evidence was found": the argument becomes a communal utterance in folk melody. The song is not a formal essay on the ethics of testimony but a form of emotional public memory. In the terms of dhvani in Indian poetics, the opposition between preserving a name and burning a body deepens the work's meaning; emotional movements bordering on compassion and fury are present. Yet the song states the moral answer in advance—the charge is unjust. Where a reader might desire an independent examination of evidence, the song's unequivocal conclusion can become somewhat directive. Both sides of its artistic function must be acknowledged.

The Included Historical Note: A Necessary Distinction

The closing "Special Note" makes a general claim about possible connections between accusations of witchcraft and land disputes, enmity, or the autonomy of women in several regions of India. This is a claim that can be examined historically, but the note within the novel does not provide independent records, surveys, judicial decisions, or research books for specific regions. This criticism therefore treats it as a social interpretation offered within the author's text, not as proven external history. The purpose of Videha's parallel-history method here is to raise questions about the victimised woman's speech, communal memory, and conflicts over land records. Regional archives and independent sources would be necessary for external historical generalisation. The boundary between the novel's ethical purpose and the historian's obligations of evidence is thereby preserved.

Event Density: The Actual Sequence of Independent Changes

The short chapter contains the following changes of situation: (a) economic improvement of the quarter after the flood; (b) Pratāpsen and Yaśpati planning an accusation; (c) Viśvanāth's illness; (d) Pratāpsen forbidding the healer's attendance; (e) Kamalā Devī secretly summoning Gaurī; (f) Gaurī's care and the child's recovery; (g) the conspiratorial reversal of the outcome; (h) the accusation in the assembly and a declaration restricting land rights; (i) Phulesarī delivering the news; (j) Gaurī setting out for the peepal; and (k) the advance of the torch-bearing crowd. This is an analytical sequence of states within the chapter, not a universally accepted published event count. Repeated sentences about a single treatment have not been counted as separate events to inflate density artificially. The initial figure of 55.9 per cent action-signalling paragraphs should be compared with this causal chain; the percentage alone does not measure social meaning.

Critical Judgement: Achievement, Contradiction, and the Bridge Ahead
