An important distinction suggested by the source is that an object's 'meaning' and its 'function' are not the same. For example, when a vessel for holding water is used in a religious ceremony, its context of use changes even though its established name may remain the same. Conversely, similar vessels made from identical material may acquire different names because of their shapes or uses. Semantic analysis should therefore keep four markers distinct: material, form, purpose, and occasion.

Place Names and Water Transport in Water-Based Occupations

On pages 162–163 of the Mallah section, the author gives numerous local terms for rivers, ponds, deep places, canals, and reservoirs. Aquatic vocabulary does more than identify landforms: it provides a practical map for transport, fishing, setting nets, and understanding depth. Many terms differ according to size, depth, availability of water, or geographical position. Collecting this semantic diversity could document local environmental knowledge.

Types of water bodies and the tools of Mallah workers occupy different semantic fields, but they are linked in practice. The shape of a boat or net may be affected by current, depth, or the character of a bank. Special evidence of occupational practice is nevertheless needed to establish precisely which tool was used for which type of water body.

Fish Names, Sizes, Conditions, and Sale

On pages 180–181, the author discusses names of fish, dried fish or sukati, the management of water, fishing conditions, the operation of nets, the distinction between fresh and spoiled fish, and vocabulary associated with selling. Here the passage from 'living fish' to 'food' also changes the relevant meanings. A form such as sukati needs to be understood in semantic study as a name connected with a processed state of the material.

Vernacular fish names should not be treated as exact equivalents of biological species names. One local name may encompass several biological species, or one species may be known by different names in different locations. Scientific identification should not be asserted without independent biological evidence. The original book supplies linguistic evidence, not a verified inventory of biological taxonomy.

Makhana and Water Chestnuts: The Wider World of Aquatic Livelihoods

The original contents place work connected with makhana and water chestnuts inside the vocabulary of Mallah occupations. This arrangement indicates that the author's idea of 'water-based work' is not confined to boats or fishing. Food production, gathering, processing, and sale also belong to an aquatic ecology. It would nonetheless be improper to conclude that every occupational connection with water products has remained historically fixed within one community.

In the conclusion of Chapter Three (p. 194), the author particularly discusses regional variation and lexical change in the vocabulary of Mallah workers as compared with potters. This is a valuable observation for criticism: the spread and use of terms for stationary earthen vessels may differ from terms associated with mobile activity on water. Statistical testing of the observation remains a task for future work; one cannot measure the scale of the difference from a conclusory sentence alone.

7. Chapter Four: Vocabulary of Fibre and Thread Occupations (pp. 195–242)

Chapter Four comprises raw materials and tools for fibre and thread work, bar or bad, spinning wheels, spindles, the charkha, properties of twisted thread, textile construction, equipment and processes, warp and weft, the looms of Patwa workers and Julahas, finished products, other related occupational vocabulary, and a conclusion. The sequence brings together the terminology of three technical stages: preparing thread, arranging the warp and weft, and making cloth.

The distinctive feature of this chapter is its vocabulary of movement and arrangement: turning, twisting, stretching, filling, weaving, forming edges, and identifying merits and defects. Many words in textile production denote operations rather than materials. Within the same manufacturing process, names for tools, their parts, workers' actions, and types of finished cloth form an interconnected semantic network. Mapping this network demands attention to the grammatical relationships between action, instrument, and result.

The Beginning of Fibre and Thread Work: The Entire Textile Chain

On page 195, the author distinguishes the roles of Julaha weavers, Patwas, tailors, cotton carders, dyers, and washermen in fibre and thread occupations. Thus 'textile vocabulary' is not simply a technical lexicon of looms: it encompasses the stages from raw cotton or fibre through spinning, weaving, dyeing, stitching, and washing. 'Textile production' is not an isolated instant belonging to one particular worker but the outcome of a multistage social process.

The author begins with the raw material called bad and the method of preparing thread from it (p. 195). Its different conditions, fragility or size, and the twist of thread affect later results in weaving. The vocabulary of preparing thread therefore has an independent place between the names of raw materials and finished cloth. A lexicon should arrange 'fibre → thread → warp and weft → fabric → finishing' as mutually cross-referenced entries.

What Do Terms for the Parts of a Loom Tell Us Scientifically?

On pages 204–205, the author discusses the sequence of operations associated with tas, khas-khas, rachh, lardi, pachhan, and threads. These terms are unfamiliar to many outside readers because they designate not ordinary objects but particular loom parts or places and stages of work. Supplying synonyms without a diagram of the loom leaves their meanings only half explained. A new research edition should therefore accompany each original term with a labelled drawing, dimensions of the implement, and the moment at which it is used.

In linguistic terms, the words form a 'functional system'. Which part remains stationary, which revolves, which pulls the thread, which establishes the upper or lower position, and which winds up the completed fabric? Without such descriptions the technical names may be remembered while their meanings remain unclear. The author's extended explanations alleviate this difficulty to an extent.

The Language of Fabric Construction, Defects, and Correction

Pages 222–223 discuss stretching cloth to dry it, dyeing, attending to the edges, removing defects, and giving fabric its final form. The lexical collection appropriately accords importance to these finishing stages, since 'woven fabric' and 'fabric ready for use' are not the same condition of an object. Dyeing, starching, spreading, and finishing enter the vocabulary as named operations.

Families of terms derived from verbs deserve attention in this section. A root verb may be related to a name for the worker, an implement, the object resulting from an action, or an adjective expressing a quality or defect. Actual local usage is decisive in this kind of morphological analysis.

The chapter also offers an opportunity to study modern lexical change critically. Machine-spun thread and factory-produced fabric may have displaced loom-centred terms of the period. Such a possibility accords with the general changes discussed in the author's conclusion, but a list of which words have actually disappeared today would require a contemporary field survey.

8. Chapter Five: Vocabulary of Metal Occupations (pp. 243–300)

8.1 Blacksmiths

The blacksmith subsection ranges from raw materials and tools to equipment for heating, gripping, hammering, cutting, and piercing; supplementary instruments; products for general and specialized use; ornaments; and other miscellaneous objects. Technical processes involving temperature, force, form, and sharp edges are concentrated in metalwork. Failure to distinguish instruments from operations can therefore generate serious uncertainty about meanings.

8.2 Brass- and Copper-Vessel Workers

The section on kasera metalworkers is organized around raw materials, tools, implements for heating, hammering and cutting, supplementary tools, products, metal vessels, articles associated with food and drink, vessels for worship, and other words. The cultural dimension of this classification is important: metal vessels enter the domains of production, dining, and ritual. Collecting distinct names for the metal, shape, manufacturing method, and purpose of a vessel provides a basis for understanding Maithili's material vocabulary.

8.3 Goldsmiths

The goldsmith subsection includes raw materials; tools for heating, hammering, holding, cutting, and joining; other implements; products and ornaments; jewellery worn on the head, nose, ears, neck, arms, wrists, hands, and feet; terms associated with teeth; tools; and a conclusion. Beyond the naming of objects, this section makes possible a systematic examination of names derived from parts of the body and social occasions.

Processes of heating, hammering, cutting, and shaping occur in all three subsections—blacksmiths, kasera workers, and goldsmiths—yet the value of the materials, uses of products, and their social symbolism differ. A comparative vocabulary could investigate differences of sound and form for the same action among occupational communities and the extension of meaning in names for shared tools.

Principal Blacksmith's Tool Names: pp. 246–247

On pages 246–247, the author expands upon terms for blacksmiths' gripping and striking tools, solid metal plates used as bases, means of maintaining a fire, arrangements for supplying air, and operations involved in changing the shape of material. In these descriptions the names of tools also imply bodily actions: a gripping instrument protects the hand from burning, a striking tool transmits force, and the base plate resists the blow. It is important to see distinct systems of operation within the single category of 'tools'.

In the history of craftsmanship, the technical meanings of words connected with heat must be understood. Not every instrument in the blacksmith's section on 'heating' is another name for fire: some generate heat, others supply air, some grip heated materials, and others alter their shape. Without these functional distinctions, a mere translation of the words into Hindi or English would remain incomplete.

The Social Range of a Blacksmith's Products

Agricultural implements, household fittings, metal tools for woodworking, kitchen equipment, and defensive articles are among the many categories of products connecting blacksmiths with other trades. The original list does not enable every available product name to be brought under a single definition, but its classified analysis clearly shows that blacksmithing terms relate to the fundamental system of tools in the wider rural economy. The manufacture of an object and its use by a customer occupy different semantic fields.

Kasera Workers: Vessel Shapes and the Condition of Metal

On pages 274–275, the book describes finishing components of kasera work, shapes of vessels, plates and round dishes, the making of rims, and work on metal surfaces. Names appear to relate to an object's shape, metal, use, depth, or construction of its edge. A name used by an artisan cannot be assumed to be identical to the name used by someone in the household. If they differ, both kinds should be recorded.

Separating vessels according to their place in cooking, dining, worship, and decoration offers opportunities for studying cultural semantics. A single vessel may be an ordinary article for serving food while acquiring a fixed function in a specific rite. Examination of this double meaning requires contextual examples of actual usage; a picture of an object alone should not be used to assert a universal social significance.

Goldsmiths: Purity of Metal, Shaping, and Ornamentation

On page 275, the author begins to discuss metals associated with gold, jewellery, alloys, and basic materials. Goldsmiths' vocabulary covers many practical conditions of one material: metal purity, melting, drawing wire, joining, chains, linking ornaments, and wearing them on the body. To treat goldsmithing terms as no more than 'a list of jewellery' would therefore narrow the scope of the source.

On pages 294–295, the book discusses the construction of chains, links, beads or units, ornaments worn on parts of the body, and special shapes in detail. Rings and links of similar appearance may bear different names when used for different technical purposes. The abundance of terms describing minute forms on the pages devoted to goldsmiths reveals the creation of a record of the local, fine-grained knowledge of handicraft.

A Semantic Map of Body Parts and Ornament Names

The contents arrange the products of goldsmiths according to their places on the head, nose, ears, neck, arms, wrists, hands, feet, clothes, and so forth. Semantically, this is 'location-based naming'. Jewellery may take its name from the material of which it is made or from the part of the body on which it is worn. These two relationships of meaning should be examined separately.

The symbolic meanings of ornaments linked to social occasions, marriage practices, or styles of dress in particular regions form a separate topic of study. The book's vocabulary provides an important foundation in that direction; however, the cultural meaning of each ornament must be tested against its contexts and actual usage.

Comparative Features of Three Metalworking Trades

Taking the common verbs of blacksmiths', kasera workers', and goldsmiths' operations as a basis for analysis is useful. Yet the object, force, temperature, and result of the verb 'to hammer' may differ across all three trades. An identical sound, therefore, need not designate the same action. The author's separate subsections respect precisely this difference. A future comparative lexicon would be more effective if it included a category such as 'different craft meanings of the same verb' alongside 'tools' and 'products'.

9. Chapter Six: Vocabulary of Other Traditional Caste-Associated Occupations (pp. 301–362)

Chapter Six (pp. 301–362) includes vocabulary connected with Kanu, Halwai, Teli, Mochiya, Dom/Dobar, Kuredi, Barai, Pasi, Suri, Kalwar, Laheri, Chamar, Mali, and other occupational communities. The category 'other' encompasses many occupations involving different materials, tools, operations, products, and social uses. It would be inappropriate to treat them as a homogeneous group: the chapter's variety displays the book's sociolinguistic reach.

Food production, oil extraction, leather work, basket making, services, and the making of other household goods each contain distinct networks of names for materials, tools, actions, products, and practices. This chapter shows the breadth of the book's social coverage. It also raises questions of representation: which occupations receive fuller treatment, which less, and is this because of the availability of sources or their historical importance? Answering these questions would require a separate count of entries by chapter.

Rather than drawing lexical boundaries on the basis of community names, a next stage of research should ask whether the same term is used among different communities. The designation 'caste-associated' cannot necessarily be taken as implying a monopoly over a particular occupation.

Kanu and Halwai: The Technical Language of Food

Pages 302–303 describe Kanu food materials, forms of parched grain, hearths, perforated utensils, sieves, and various names for farhi or lava. Here 'food' does not refer merely to raw ingredients but to the results of heating, puffing, roasting, sifting, mixing, and serving. The form of the same grain changes as the process changes; a technical sequence of meanings is consequently essential for understanding food culture.

The discussion of names such as bhuja, lava, farhi, and mar on page 303 shows that differing processes of food preparation generate distinct names. Each term should not, however, be treated as a universally applicable synonym for one botanical species or one heating procedure. Usage may vary geographically. A lexicon of food science should record the original kind of grain, method of heating, texture of the prepared food, and occasion of consumption.

The materials associated with Halwai work include references to milk, curd, the processing of sweets, cooking methods, vessels, and terms relating to purity. On page 320, the author mentions several local names for curd and the processes by which it is set. Terms for adding a starter, setting, or different stages of the process have important operational meanings in food technology. Although the general word 'curd' may suffice in ordinary speech, the practitioner may require different states of it for different purposes.

Teli Workers: Oil Presses, Oilseeds, and Products

On pages 320–321, the Teli occupation is linked to raw materials, oilseeds, the traditional oil press or kolhu, equipment for pressing oil, and the residue left behind. Four levels form one semantic field: names for parts of the press, varieties of oilseed, operations of extraction, and uses of the finished oil. It is useful to classify seeds brought from fields and the material remaining after extraction in relation to the same original substance, but their practical uses differ.

Oil pressing connects agriculture with household manufacture. As machinery develops, both the usage and meaning of older words associated with oil pressing may change.

Pasi Workers: Terms for Working with Palmyra and Date Palms

On pages 334–335, the author gives names for palmyra and date-palm trees, cut surfaces, vessels used to collect sap, climbing implements, different parts of the trees, and the actions of extracting their juice. Here the body of a plant itself becomes the workplace. The terms used in the work cannot be understood without distinguishing the parts of the tree. Differences between palmyra, date palm, coverings, cutting operations, and arrangements of vessels constitute a combined record of local botanical knowledge and occupational expertise.

Chamar Workers: Processes of Leather Craft

On pages 344–345, the book discusses leather materials, cut or prepared hides, cleansing, dyeing, cutting, joining, stitching, and finished leather goods. It separately records the stages of treating raw biological material and transforming it into durable objects through nouns and verbs. The central feature of artisans' knowledge is the alteration of a material's properties. Leatherwork cannot be understood merely through the names of its final products.

The treatment of other tools and varieties of leather on page 345 provides linguistic evidence of fine distinctions for changes in the material within this occupation. The evidence should be read as a record of historical craft knowledge. Caste-based prejudices associated with the work may be examined critically, but the original artisans' skills must not be overlooked.

Mochiya, Kuredi, Laheri, Barai, Mali, and the Remaining Communities

The work of Mochiya, Kuredi, Laheri, Barai, and Mali communities involves different kinds of materials and products: footwear or leather, baskets or cane, articles of ornament, betel leaves, and flowers. This variety means that a single chapter includes multiple semantic fields concerned with social services, domestic use, and craftsmanship.

Within the scope defined by the original author, the section brings together the practical techniques of a range of smaller occupations. A critical question is which occupations receive detailed material and which are treated relatively briefly. Such inequality of coverage does not necessarily indicate relative importance: regional interviews, the specialists accessible when the book was written, and the ease of documenting particular crafts may also have been factors. For now, one can only conjecture about these causes.

The Principal Achievement of Chapter Six's Vocabulary

The author includes under 'other traditional occupations' many occupational names that might otherwise have been excluded from the chapters organized around major materials. This section matters because language is made not only in craft workshops but also in kitchens, fields, markets, ponds, trees, households, and festivals. Its vocabulary, formed at many centres, widens the map of everyday production in Mithila.

10. Chapter Seven: Linguistic Considerations (pp. 363–393)

Chapter Seven seeks to transform the book's collected material into linguistic analysis. Its contents include words classified by etymology, origin, and meaning; polysemous words; words with their own independent meanings; synonyms; processes of word formation; alternative forms; problems of standardization; abbreviations; prefixes and suffixes; phonetics; vowel sounds and extra-short vowels; consonants and conjuncts; the number of letters in words; sound change; semantic change; and a conclusion.

10.1 Word Origins and Semantic Relationships

Occupational vocabulary may include indigenous sounds, forms adopted through contact with neighbouring languages, altered forms of older words, and new names arising from changes in craft practice. But similarity of sound alone is insufficient to declare that a word derives from Sanskrit, Hindi, Bengali, or Persian. Historical evidence, older occurrences, and regional distribution are required. Context is equally decisive in matters of polysemy and synonymy: the same tool name may denote different objects in different regions.

Conventional, Compositional, and Conventionally Specialized Words

On page 363, the author offers a threefold classification into rudha, yaugika, and yogarudha. In general, rudha refers to a word whose meaning is established through customary social use; yaugika stresses the combined meanings of its constituent parts; and yogarudha concerns a specialized meaning arising from a compound form. This classification is particularly important for occupational words because a name originally derived from a tool's shape or function may eventually become the fixed name of one specific implement.

From a critical perspective, identifying a word as compositional does not establish its historical derivation. Whether its constituent parts are transparent to present-day Maithili speakers is another question. This is an essential precaution in lexicology: each etymology associated with the author's examples requires evidence from different periods.

Synonyms and Singleness of Meaning: pp. 374–375

On pages 374–375, the author discusses synonymy and provides examples of several lexical groups, before beginning to describe processes of word formation. It would be mistaken to call several names for one object 'perfect synonyms' without qualification, since such names can differ in context, region, technical function, and emotional nuance. The author's listing of technical synonyms supplies preliminary material; a new lexicon could classify it more effectively by adding the region, speaking community, and differences in a tool's form or use.

A practical solution would be to cross-reference every current synonym from a principal entry without silently absorbing all variant forms into a single headword. 'Synonym' and 'variant form' are not always the same: a phonetic alteration may be a variant, while a difference in material or use may challenge the proposed limits of synonymy.

Word Formation and the Extension of Technical Forms

On page 375, the author connects the formation of many terms with the shape, colour, teeth, parts, actions, or material properties of tools. The research implication is that occupational naming is not arbitrary but an aspect of human categorization and recognition. An object resembling a tooth may take a name reflecting that resemblance; a cutting implement may be named after the action it performs. The formation of any particular word, however, is not established by resemblance alone but requires independent examination of its accepted meaning.

Suffixes, Diminutives, and Variation

On pages 382–383, the author illustrates word-formation variants with lists of numerical and other multipurpose suffixes. In studying this material, one must remember that a single suffix need not carry the same sense in every word. One form may indicate smallness, another collectivity, and another may be a formation characteristic of a regional dialect. Expanding the linguistic analysis requires keeping separate accounts of proposed regularities and observed exceptions.

Phonetics and Standardization

The author examines regional pronunciation, vowels and consonants, combinations of sounds, and phonetic change in occupational terms. On page 392, semantic change is treated separately alongside examples of changes in sound. The collection contains various forms, but a drive to select a standard written term should not erase living pronunciation and thereby damage folk evidence. An appropriate dictionary would preserve the original written form with pronunciations, phonetic transcription if possible, and regional codes.

Not every regional form should be called a spelling error. Many vowel changes may reflect consistent systems within living linguistic traditions. Testing this requires more than comparing variants of one word: one must examine whether similar changes occur regularly across numerous words. The examples collected by the author furnish material for this investigation.

Semantic Broadening, Narrowing, and Shift

On pages 392–393, the author explains semantic broadening, narrowing, and shift. Occupational words are particularly rich examples of semantic change because newly designed tools, the decline of older objects, or the employment of an existing name in a new industry can alter the scope of a meaning. Where a word once covered a broad class of material but later refers only to a particular implement, semantic narrowing is possible; the reverse suggests broadening. These processes should not be imposed on every form without checking the chronology implicit in the original examples.

Chapter Seven's main achievement is to read an inventory of occupational vocabulary as a series of linguistic phenomena. Nevertheless, final decisions about many words' etymologies, multiple meanings, and standardization continue to require comparison between dated historical uses and regional evidence.

II. Conclusion (pp. 394–397)

A Close Reading of the Author's Own Conclusions

On pages 394–395, the author makes clear that the subject is exceedingly extensive and that the book has not been able to include every possible occupation or every term in full detail. Nevertheless, he considers the collection of words for the raw materials, implements, products, division of operations, and qualities and defects of various occupations important. Reading this self-assessment suggests that the book should be presented not as 'the final all-inclusive lexicon' but as 'an initial, systematically organized foundation for research'.

On page 395, the author raises the prospect of changing means of labour, mechanization, decreasing use of older tools, and the disappearance of traditional words. The arrival of new terms alongside new products in several trades points to social change. Linguistic transformation here is not a 'mistake in vocabulary'; changes in materials and suitable implements are among its causes. This conclusion raises an especially pertinent question for language history: how can older terms, disappearing along with technical knowledge, be preserved through textual evidence?

12. Appendices: Community Lists, Proverbs, and Bibliography (from p. 398)

The first appendix is a 'List of Names Associated with Traditional Occupational Castes of Mithila' (p. 398). The contents identify the second as 'Certain Proverbs Concerning Occupational Castes' (p. 402), and the third as the 'List of Works Consulted' (p. 404). The list of community names helps cross-reference the social categories discussed in the main work, while the proverbs add a different level of evidence concerning practical meanings and social evaluations.

The Sociolinguistic Importance of the Appendices: Names and Folk Sayings

On pages 398–401, the list of names associated with occupational communities shows indications of grammatical feminine forms, subcastes or local titles, principal names, and particular deities. Page 398, for instance, includes Kalwar, Kasera, Kanu, Kumhar, Kuredi, Garedi, and Chamar, while pages 400–401 list Patwa, Pasi, Barai, Barhi, Mallah, Mali, Laheri, Lohar, Suri, Sonar, Halwai, and others. Some entries record several customary alternative names for one community. These facts reveal the social range of community names, but do not establish that every name remains a universally accepted form of contemporary self-identification.

Appendix B, comprising proverbs associated with occupational communities (from p. 402), supplies verbal evidence of society's practical perceptions. Praise, satire, criticism, and stereotype may occur within the same stock of popular sayings. It would be wrong to treat a proverb uncritically as historical fact or current social policy. A statement found in folk speech may indicate an evaluation held at a particular time; it is not a legitimate basis for defining an actual community.

The 'List of Works Consulted' begins on page 404. Pages 404–405 show references concerning Sanskrit and Prakrit, Hindi, and Maithili, and the list continues afterwards. This apparatus connects the book's lexical collection with wider linguistic and literary traditions.

A Useful New Editorial Presentation of the Appendices

A future edition could supply two-way references between principal lexical entries and the community names in the appendices. From an artisan's name, for example, readers could reach associated tools, materials, actions, and products; conversely, from an implement they could reach the names of all the occupations in which it is used. Such a system would reduce the reproduction of rigid caste-centred boundaries and make the study of objects easier.

A separate critical index of the cited proverbs could record meaning, context, possible bias, figures of speech, and source. Republishing folk sayings requires a responsible approach to social dignity; derogatory utterances presented without context may mislead readers.

13. Chapter-by-Chapter Comparative Table

Chapter /Page	Principal Material or Field	Linguistic Focus
One, 55	Social and historical background	Occupations, caste, literature, classification
Two, 65	Wood and bamboo	Materials, cutting, tools, manufacture
Three, 133	Earth and water	Pottery, water transport, fish, makhana
Four, 195	Fibre and thread	Spinning wheel, warp and weft, loom, textiles
Five, 243		Blacksmiths, kasera workers, goldsmiths; craft operations
Six, 301	Various occupations	Food, oil, leather, baskets, others
Seven, 363	Linguistics	Etymology, meaning, sounds, standardization

14. Critical Evaluation of the Book

The book has three distinctive accomplishments: systematic collection of technical vocabulary from different areas of production; an attempt to relate artisans' language to its social and cultural background; and a linguistic examination of the collected terms. Its limitations also deserve consideration. The author himself acknowledges the collection's incompleteness; evidence for regional variants and their distribution is not uniformly established; and historical claims require comparisons across regions and periods. The book's value becomes clear when achievements and limitations are considered together.

Critical Questions

For which words are geographical dialect, speaker, and year of collection explicitly documented?

Does the same word retain the same meaning across different occupations, or does its meaning change?

How widely are the collected words distributed socially, and where are they only individual or local usages?

How should one understand the unequal extent of the chapters organized around major materials and the chapter on 'other occupations'?

How can contemporary occupational changes and the names for artisans' new equipment be documented?

15. Directions for Further Research

Many difficulties of interpretation could be reduced if a critical lexicon based on this book recorded, with each entry, the original word, pronunciation, alternative forms, part of speech, meaning, occupation, category as object, tool, action or product, region and informant, reference to the page in the book, and verified visual or audio evidence of the object or activity. Such a systematic format could make relationships among the collected terms clearer.

The next stage should include a comparative index organized by material, counts of entries in each chapter, field surveys of gendered divisions of labour, meanings of identical words across occupations, and independent review of evidence concerning language contact. Rather than begin with conclusions predetermined by caste, research should make artisans' own statements, direct observation of tools, and local economic history its primary evidence.

Impartial Editing of Synonyms and Variant Pronunciations

In many places the original chapters give alternatives in a 'form/form' construction. These may represent only differences of pronunciation, synonyms, differences of objects, or geographical variants. Choosing one written form and deleting the others would impoverish the language. Four questions must accompany each form: 'where', 'by whom', 'in what sense', and 'in relation to which tool or task'. Marking unclear evidence as 'unverified' is more scientific than inventing a meaning through guesswork.

Visual Records of Objects and Oral Evidence

Without seeing the construction of a carpenter's plane, a textile loom, a blacksmith's striking tool, or a Pasi worker's vessel for collecting sap, it is difficult to grasp subtle distinctions in technical meanings. An extended investigation combining measurements of objects, artisans' statements, visual records of work sequences, and sound recordings of local pronunciations would reveal the connections between words and operations more clearly.

16. Conclusion

Dr Yoganand Jha's The Vocabulary of Traditional Caste-Associated Occupations in Maithili is a notable effort to organize the specialized linguistic world that has developed among labour, materials, production, and social practice in Maithili-speaking regions. Its central strength lies in refusing to isolate words from folk life. From wood and bamboo through earth and water, thread, metal, and numerous occupations, the classification records not only meanings but also the technical structure of operations. Chapter Seven's linguistic analysis links this material to the wider study of language.

From a critical standpoint, the book should be studied as a primary source for local knowledge, while its sociolinguistic generalizations remain subject to independent verification. It provides foundational materials for the history of Maithili occupational vocabulary, traditional craftsmanship, and the development of dictionaries.

CHAPTER 09 / 2010

Stories and Folktales

A Critical Study of a Work by Dr Yoganand Jha

Stories and Folktales is a collection of Maithili prose by Dr Yoganand Jha that brings together, within a single volume, contemporary socio-political stories, brief narratives translated from literature in other Indian languages, and tales grounded in popular belief. The original publication page identifies 2010 as the year of publication, Mithila Research Society of Kabilpur–Laheriasarai, Darbhanga, as publisher, a print run of five hundred copies, a price of one hundred rupees, and Shekhar Prakashan, Patna, as printer. These details come from the book's own publication record, not from external conjecture. The author's signed statement on original p. 30 is dated 22 May 2010. [Original opening publication page; p. 30]

The book's sequence makes its classification explicit. Under 'Original' appear 'Shastra-Chinta' (p. 35), 'Faisla' (p. 41), and 'Sapanak Dak' (p. 50). Under 'Translated' are 'The Path of Self-Respect' (p. 57), 'Each One's Water' (p. 59), 'Vasudhaiva Kutumbakam' (p. 61), 'A Felicitation Volume' (p. 62), and 'The Rare Satyanarayan Worship' (p. 63). Under 'Folkloric Narratives' are 'Dhanak Haruri' (p. 65), 'Seven Sisters' (p. 70), and 'Beniram' (p. 77). Finally, 'A Brief Genealogy of Kabilpur' begins on p. 89. Thus all eleven stories in the original collection receive individual treatment here. [Original p. 31, contents]

The available original is a photographic reproduction without a searchable text layer. The present study therefore relies upon words visible in the story images, titles, footnotes, and paragraph sequence. Matters verifiable only from external evidence are kept distinct from the book's internal evidence. No facts about a character, time, event, or motive for composition have been added without support in the source. Interpretations of meaning and critical evaluations belong to the reviewer; they are not presented as direct pronouncements by the original author.

The conjunction of 'stories' and 'folktales' is itself the collection's central critical question. The original stories give form to personal experience, institutional pressures, and the conflicts of contemporary society. The translated short-short narratives have compressed structures, recognizable aims, and often aphoristic endings. Folkloric narratives depend on collective memory, vernacular ethics, and symbols of belief. It would therefore be unsound to judge all three forms by one artistic standard. Only by respecting these differences can the collection's achievements and limitations be properly assessed.

2. Introduction, Foreword, and Records of the Maithili Short-Story Movement

The volume opens with an extended essay, 'Let a Lamp Burn Through the Night of Conflict: A Quiet Revolution in Maithili Story Writing.' It would be mistaken to regard it simply as Dr Yoganand Jha's personal account of writing. It also documents the development of a programme of public meetings, story readings, and discussion among Maithili short-story writers. The essay recalls plans made at the end of 1989, the first event in 1990, the fiftieth programme in 2004, and subsequent initiatives. Its literary purpose is clearly identified: to give emerging writers opportunities to read their stories aloud, obtain immediate reactions, build literary connections, and use the language in public. [Original pp. 5–12]

The distinctive feature of this enterprise is not merely the number of authors or listeners but the listener's role in the process of literary creation. Public readings of written stories, collective responses, debate, and the possibility of revision reveal the social life of prose. The original essay, however, is predominantly appreciative of the organizers' contribution. It would not be appropriate to regard all the programme's historical effects as fully established on that basis alone. Attendance registers, original programmes, contemporary newspapers, and independent testimonies from participants could make it a firmer source for literary history. The account within the collection should be read as evidence supplied by its organizers.

The 'Foreword', published under the name of Dr Ramanand Jha 'Raman', situates the author's literary practice in the geographical and literary surroundings of Laheriasarai and Kabilpur. It illuminates ancient sites in Kabilpur, local temples, communal occasions, public memory, and a number of writers and scholars. In places it offers sequences of names and works resembling a bibliography; elsewhere it draws a social portrait from the writer's experience. Its literary significance lies in connecting the story collection with its author's literary community and institutional background. [Original pp. 13–30]

The foreword's length is both an asset and a structural incongruity. It preserves in one place numerous indications of the institutional foundations of Maithili literature, women's education, folk singing, journals, drama, translation, and village cultural activities. Yet before reaching the stories themselves, the reader must travel through a long account of regional literary activity; the book's opening momentum turns towards institutional history rather than narration. Even so, this material cannot be neglected by researchers, since it makes clearer the intellectual terrain of the author's collection and study of folklore.

Pages 24–27 refer to many local writers, journals, translations, educational institutions, and episodes in the Maithili literary movement. Independent records would be needed to verify these historical claims; nevertheless, they are significant elements in the collection's self-presentation. The book does not ask its audience merely to follow plots. It places itself within a communal effort to create, collect, circulate, and preserve Maithili prose. In this qualified sense, Stories and Folktales is a cultural document as well as a creative literary work.

3. Original Stories: From Individual Consciousness to Public Crisis

3.1 'Shastra-Chinta': Dreams, Sacred Texts, and the Conflict of National Insecurity (original pp. 35–40)

The story opens with a terrifying dream. Anxieties concerning the nation, history, society, and his own existence return repeatedly to the protagonist. The author does not confine them to the reporting of a single sudden political event. Within the dream's background, concerns about geographical borders, internal disintegration, social division, and collective security become intertwined. After the dream, the protagonist's daily life moves among books, periodicals, religious reading, national concerns, and self-examination. This psychological organization makes the piece more an idea-driven narrative than an eventful realist story. [Original pp. 35–37]

The books surrounding the protagonist, including the Gita and Ramayana, together with scriptural citations and writing materials, shape a particular intellectual personality. Distressed by violence and disorder, he finds that religious reading alone cannot quiet his agitation. The question becomes one of the relationship between scriptural learning, civic duty, and defensive resistance. The original title 'Shastra-Chinta' allows a critical connection between the study of scripture and its purpose in public life. 'Shastra' here is not simply a synonym for 'shastra' in the sense of a weapon; nevertheless, as the story develops, concern about learning turns towards measures of security and resistance.

The arrival of a young man named Ashok marks a decisive turn. Initially respectful towards his teacher, he soon raises questions about the nation's danger, weakness, the hazards of being unarmed, and resistance to injustice. The protagonist invokes nonviolence, truth, restraint, and the moral path, whereas Ashok asks whether goodwill by itself can suffice. References to the Gita and arguments about punishment, the defence of righteousness, and duty are drawn into their exchange until the narrative becomes a direct confrontation of two positions. [Original pp. 38–39]

On the final page the protagonist does not reject Ashok's reasoning unconditionally; he returns to the tension between scriptural books and questions of national security. The dream image, disturbed by the possibility of a collective assault, also returns at the end. Thus the story stops not at a fixed declaration of a solution but at a coherent representation of fear and vigilance. [Original p. 40] 'Peace' and 'security' here are not opposed slogans; they emerge as values under pressure within the narrative.

The story's strength lies in articulating an intellectually engaged person's mental perplexity through dialogue. Its limitation is that, at several points, a broad national and social crisis is described in argumentative statements rather than through specific events and fully realized characters. Ashok becomes the representative of a questioning position; little of his independent life appears. Agreement with the tale's fierce ideological concerns is not required for critical appreciation. What matters is that the writer confronts classical morality with the pressing need for social protection. A footnote mentions an earlier publication in 2002: the collection's date of 2010 must therefore not be mistaken for the story's date of composition. [Original p. 40, footnote]

3.2 'Faisla': The Office, Justice, Family, and Political Pressure (original pp. 41–49)

Faisla ('The Decision') begins with an envelope marked 'Confidential' and an official report. At once, the relationship between information and the power to decide occupies the narrative centre. Descriptions of the private residence of the government officer Raghavji, his wife Jamuni Devi, their educated children, and social standing evoke a household whose financial security and status depend upon administrative office. Although the home looks stable from outside, Raghavji is inwardly disturbed by a decision he must make. The writer places domestic conversation alongside the responsibilities of public office. [Original pp. 41–44]

Jamuni Devi is not a decorative character. Observing her husband's distraction, she asks its cause and advances arguments based on the family's needs, their children's future, and the security of his employment. Raghavji's sense of human responsibility collides with Jamuni Devi's practical concerns. It would be wrong to treat her merely as a symbol of moral ignorance: her fears arise from real familial dependence and the material conditions of earning a living. Nonetheless, the story leaves the central power of decision with the male official, whereas Jamuni's independent social perspective could have been developed further.

With the entrance of Malapur's temple, its mahant, local residents, land, and a public demonstration, the private dilemma becomes an administrative and political question. Competing land claims, rural protests, police action, injury to the crowd, and political pressure form interrelated layers. Pages 46–

49 show the circumstances in which an official report is prepared, contradictions within local dominance, and interference from different levels of authority. This is not simply the story of 'one bad officer'. The system is so constituted that the language of facts, political advantage, and anxiety about a career pull the same decision in different directions.

The title Faisla appears to promise an unambiguous moral verdict, yet the actual narrative gives greater weight to the pressures within the decision-making process. The officer's written report, his attempt to justify it, and his helplessness before political connections persist to the end. Without further evidence, therefore, the last developments cannot be proclaimed a 'reform of the system' or 'complete justice'. The distance between the questions arising in the character's mind and what he actually does is itself a critical meaning of the story. [Original pp. 45–49]

In terms of narrative craft, the confidential document, the exchanges with his wife, administrative recollection, the report, and scenes of a protesting crowd provide the principal movement. Dialogue conveys background information, although characters sometimes seem to express the author's moral reasoning more than their own spontaneous lives. Compared with the first original story, which unfolds against an abstract sense of national crisis, Faisla's social crisis is relatively concrete: offices, paperwork, land, a temple, a crowd, and the channels of power. An original footnote records an earlier publication in 2003, authentic evidence of its subsequent inclusion in the collection. [Original p. 49, footnote]

3.3 'Sapanak Dak': Land Records and Rural Insecurity (original pp. 50–54)

The central character in Sapanak Dak is Sukhlal. Economic instability, attachment to his village, and a sense of belonging to ancestral land provide the foundations of his life. The narrative shows that a community's memory of ownership and the documentary law of land can be two different things. Long possession by Sukhlal's family, or the remembered names of his forebears, may give him personal confidence, but the absence of official records makes his rights precarious. Amid village relationships, old acquaintances, and social standing, the question of land becomes steadily more difficult. [Original pp. 50–52]

Mohan's arrival brings into focus the complexities of land measurement, purchases and sales, and registered records. Names in government offices, possible fraudulent papers, oral claims of entitlement, and participants in land transactions all intensify the tension. Sukhlal fears not only the loss of money but the destruction of inherited memory and the foundation of his home. Amid this psychological pressure, the 'dream' is not a simple event of sleep: it becomes a literary form of rural insecurity. [Original pp. 52–53]

In the last section, an anxious Sukhlal is caught in the world of offices and papers as he tries to save the land. The boundary between waking and dreaming becomes blurred, and a devastating dream image involving the village finally unsettles him. Rather than providing a complete judicial resolution of the dispute, the author depicts its psychological consequences. The title's word 'dak' may be read as a metaphor for a message or warning of impending crisis; it should not be mistaken for a plot about the functioning of the postal service. [Original pp. 53–54]

Read together, Faisla and Sapanak Dak expose two faces of administrative paperwork: in one, an official decides through documents; in the other, an ordinary villager suffers through their absence. This double construction yields an informal critique of the relations between state, law, and citizen. Sapanak Dak is concise in form, turning its action distinctly towards Sukhlal's unease. Its limitation is that the intricate legal processes behind land rights are not shown in detail. The purpose is to produce literary experience, not an account of court procedure. A footnote records the story's earlier publication in 2003. [Original p. 54]

4. Translated Stories: Moral Reasoning within Brief Narratives

The translated section contains five pieces. To present all five as independently original stories by Dr Yoganand Jha would be a factual error of literary history. According to the original footnotes, 'The Path of Self-Respect' and 'Each One's Water' were translated from Dr (Mrs) Mithilesh Kumari Mishra's Hindi short-story collection Chhantta Kohra. Footnotes to the other three indicate translations from her Sanskrit collection of miniature stories. Several appeared in Maithili journals before entering this volume, as the footnotes also record. Parallel, line-by-line texts of the Hindi and Sanskrit originals were not available for this review. Accordingly, it does not claim to decide conclusively whether the translations remain faithful to, or deviate from, those sources; it examines the literary operation of the Maithili texts actually available. [Original pp. 58, 60–63, footnotes]

4.1 'The Path of Self-Respect': Convenience versus Self-Worth (original pp. 57–58)

Against the setting of an examination or selection process, a conversation between young men raises questions about opportunity, reservations, eligibility, and self-respect. One speaker points to the possibility of securing an advantage, whereas another emphasizes selection through confidence in his ability and work. The concluding statement establishes dignity and personal effort as the principal moral values. No detailed family histories are provided; the story draws its energy from brief exchanges and a decisive utterance. [Original pp. 57–58]

The literary effect comes from the opposition created between benefiting from an external provision and maintaining moral confidence in one's own labour. Yet that opposition does not amount to a complete argument about public policy. The historical reasons for reservation, structural inequalities of opportunity, and the experiences of different communities are not examined in the miniature narrative. It is therefore more reasonable to read the character's position as an expression of literary self-respect than to turn it into a definitive policy judgement on the distribution of opportunity throughout Indian society. That would extract more from the text than it supports.

The impact of the Maithili translation comes from the immediacy of dialogue, the pace of question and answer, and the brief closing statement. Without access to the Hindi original, it is impossible to compare literal with sense-based translation in detail. In the Maithili text, however, the central thought is conveyed without linguistic obscurity. Like the other aphoristic narratives in this section, it presents a short scene of moral choice.

4.2 'Each One's Water': Who Has Rights over Natural Resources? (original pp. 59–60)

The arrival of a sage, the conduct of a king, and questions surrounding the use of water supply the essentials of this miniature tale. Royal power treats water distribution as a matter for its own decision, whereas the sage distinguishes between water brought by an individual and water occurring in nature. The story thereby asks how far any particular person or ruler can legitimately claim moral authority over natural resources indispensable to human life. At the end the king's understanding changes, and he accepts the principle that natural water is available for collective use. [Original pp. 59–60]

A satisfactory critical reading must go beyond 'the king is bad, the sage is good'. The king represents the institutional power of the state; the sage, individual judgement and the public good. The king's change depicts the acceptance of a popular moral principle by political authority. Because everyone needs water, the narrative rises above any one region or caste. For all its brevity, it asks an exacting question about nature, common life, and ownership.

Dialogue, repeated reasoning, and a straightforward reversal of judgement dominate the form. The problem is not unfolded into a complex policy question; the author quickly changes the king's mind in order to communicate a direct moral understanding. This economy is a strength of the miniature tale, but it leaves room for a fuller picture of the social and economic realities of unequal water distribution.

4.3 'Vasudhaiva Kutumbakam': The World as Family, Put to the Test of Conduct (original p. 61)

This extremely brief story introduces a Bengali young man who has gone to England for higher studies, his English friend, and a family context. The dialogue addresses personal comfort, food, expenditure, the resources required for living, and duty towards others. The Sanskrit saying Vasudhaiva Kutumbakam ('the world is one family') becomes the title and offers an ideal to the reader, while the characters test its meaning in practice. [Original p. 61]

The critical centre is not simply praise of the aphorism but an examination of its application. The assertion that the whole world is a family becomes meaningful only when an ethical relation between one's own convenience and the welfare of strangers is acknowledged. In a brief exchange shaped by differences of language, country, and family, the story gestures towards a cosmopolitan sensibility; nevertheless, rather than elaborating the issue, it leaves the question open.

From the standpoint of translation, keeping a Sanskrit expression such as Vasudhaiva Kutumbakam unchanged while arranging Maithili dialogue around it exemplifies a multilingual cultural setting. The translated Maithili work thus carries ideas originating in Hindi or Sanskrit into the world of Maithili readers. No claim can be made, however, about a particular strategy of translation without comparing the exact verbal form of the source.

4.4 'A Felicitation Volume': Official Honours and Actual Writing (original p. 62)

A minister visits a school. Because of an earlier connection, teachers and students arrange to honour him. The headmaster presents an 'Abhinandan Granth', or felicitation volume; when the person being honoured asks about what has been written in it, its hollowness is exposed. The satire suggests that the splendour of a ceremony does not, by itself, prove any intellectual achievement. [Original p. 62]

For literary society, the miniature tale raises a particularly useful question. If a volume contains no genuine work or study, only a cover, welcoming remarks, and token material, there is a distance between the prestige attached to the word 'book' and what the object actually contains. The tale sharply satirizes this distance. The value of a publication issued in honour of someone who has attained office must be assessed through its actual content. The social pressure surrounding a ceremony cannot substitute for critical discrimination.

The structure rests on a comic and satirical reversal: first the ostentation of the welcome, then an examination of the volume, and finally an outcome contrary to the audience's expectation. There is little space in this miniature sequence for extensive character development. Nevertheless, the questions it raises about education, politics, and book culture also permit a critical look at the actual traditions of literary honour recorded in the collection's extended foreword. This intertextual irony contains an intriguing possibility of self-criticism within the book.

4.5 'The Rare Satyanarayan Worship': From Ritual to Truthful Conduct (original p. 63)

The story consists of a dialogue between a devotee who wishes to arrange a Satyanarayan observance and a priest. On hearing of the devotee's private troubles and desire for religious ritual, the priest stresses truth, upright conduct, and the welfare of others. Rather than simply rejecting outward ceremonial arrangements, the story asks why worship of truth should be regarded as separate from one's actual conduct of life. [Original p. 63]

This is a voice of ethical reinterpretation arising from within religious tradition itself. The priest does not restrict his vocation to collecting ritual materials and directing ceremonies; he treats the practice of truth in life as the fundamental criterion. The result is a fresh question for readers about the meaning of devotion. This is not a wholesale rejection of religious belief but a discussion of priorities between ceremonial practice and conduct.

The word 'rare' in the title poses a question: is the occasion of ritual worship rare, or is the courage to abide by truth rare? The text guides the reader towards the second meaning. In a single page the story makes its idea clear. Yet the complexity of the devotee's family troubles has little room to develop; the moral principle dominates the scene. In this way the work exhibits both the didactic character and the formal compression of translated Maithili miniature fiction.

4.6 Shared Achievements and Research Limitations of the Translated Section

A common compositional method is visible in all five miniatures: a small incident of life is followed by arguments from two sides and concludes with an explicit value or an ironic turn. Self-respect, water, the world as family, ceremonial honour, and truthful conduct are five distinct subjects, but all attack the gap between words and actions. Maithili translation brings these thoughts into the experience of Maithili readers. The brief form swiftly carries readers to the centre of each argument; it also limits the possibility of psychological complexity and contextual development.

The original footnotes provide useful indications of the works translated, an editorial strength. For the purposes of research, however, a complete comparative register identifying the source editions, publication information in the original languages, original titles, and textual variants would make a historical critique of the translations more dependable. This study does not attempt to fill the absence with imagined quotations or unspecified source texts.

5. Folkloric Narratives: Food, Solidarity, and the Folk Memory of Deities

The designation 'folkloric narrative' is no accident. The pieces in this section have the oral manner of folktale-telling, but they do not appear to be merely verbatim transcripts of oral lore. At times the writer provides an explanatory background before the tale begins; elsewhere he appends explicit conclusions about its social meaning, or offers his own reflections on the historical possibility of a deity tradition or genealogy. It is essential, therefore, to distinguish material inherited from oral tradition from its literary reconstruction when calling these pieces 'folktales'.

5.1 'Dhanak Haruri': Grain, Hunger, and an Ethics of Coexistence (original pp. 65–69)

At the opening the writer reflects on the place of food and rice. The expectation that a Brahmin will be fed, references to the origin of paddy, and a discussion of the importance of grain establish an intellectual background drawn from popular belief. This makes clear the cultural importance of human nourishment, while the principal narrative tests human self-interest through the lives of birds. A king, a queen, and a community of bahikari birds participate in the account of 'Dhanak Haruri'. [Original pp. 65–66]

The queen repeatedly obtains food for the family and community, while the king assumes his right to consume it without question. In a few simple scenes, the story reveals dependence for nourishment, the unequal distribution of service, and the undervaluing of another's labour. The queen's dissatisfaction is not merely a private sulk; it is a response to the one-sided exploitation of work in the name of affection. The king is unable to arrange his own food and thus finds his sense of entitlement in conflict with circumstances. [Original pp. 66–67]

At a crucial turn, the king's trust in the queen, her independent decision, and his distress carry the narrative into tragedy. Resolutions to give up food, to fast, or to part company, together with compassion and regret, transform this from a simple tale of the origin of paddy into an account of mutual responsibility within marriage and communal life. In the concluding pages the author comments on the wider human implications of the folktale amid the queen's separation and the king's grief. The final paragraph also mentions a belief associated with China; it would therefore be improper, without independent regional evidence, to declare the tale exclusively indigenous to Mithila. [Original pp. 67–69]

The form mixes folkloric explanation with narrative. The initial discussion of grain determines the story's symbolic field but also delays the beginning of the dramatic action. The social behaviour of the bird characters reflects human social structures: king, queen, work, entitlement, care, and separation. The tale's chief strength is the way it brings into view both the material value of food and the otherwise invisible labour of obtaining it.

In his closing observations the writer draws attention to the folktale's compassion, altruism, and love. A critical caution is necessary here: its ethical suggestion should not be confined to an ideal of female self-sacrifice. The queen's labour, discontent, and desire for a life of her own make the story more complex. A renewed reading can distinguish women's experience, the moral meaning of work, and questions of collective food security. An original footnote records publication in an issue of Maithili Akademi Patrika in 2008. [Original p. 69]

5.2 'Seven Sisters': Female Solidarity in Adversity and the Triumph of Ingenuity (original pp. 70–76)

The first part opens with the author's short discussion of the creative nature of folktales. A folktale, he suggests, communicates the collective experiences, customs, thought, and traditions of ordinary people. On this premise he tells the story of seven sisters. In a poor family there are seven daughters. A shortage of food and domestic distress create circumstances in which the sisters must go away from their home towards the forest. The sequence of their names, their journey together, and their insistence on staying with one another have the distinctive cadence of oral storytelling. [Original pp. 70–71]

Within the forest, hunger, fear, an unfamiliar refuge, and the search for food intensify the conflict. The sisters arrive at a place that initially seems to promise nourishment and safety, but the same surroundings hold the threat of deceit and violence. The story introduces a terrifying figure resembling a witch, a dark house, a gate, and secret stratagems. The youngest sister's intelligence and the sisters' efforts to save one another become decisive. [Original pp. 72–73]

In the latter half the sisters try, one after another, to escape danger. They must jump, climb, hide, open gates, or confront obstructions. The narrative repeatedly shows that individual and collective safety cannot be separated. A sister who advances remains mindful of the one behind; cooperation continues through separation, hurt, and threatened violence. At the end the storyteller singles out the sisters' unity as the moral element of the tale. [Original pp. 73–76]

The number 'seven' shapes the folktale's form: a sequence of seven characters, recurrent danger, the different reactions of the sisters, and a shared conclusion. Their separate psychologies are not developed at great length, but their collective character is powerful. The forest becomes the place of external peril; a house may offer either security or danger; the witch personifies fear. It would be an error to treat such elements as literal history of contemporary social events. Within folktales they commonly function as instruments of symbolic meaning.

A social interpretation must attend not only to female helplessness but also to women's intelligence and collective resistance. The opening material deprivation exposes a failure of family protection, whereas in the final conflict the sisters discover their own means of defence. This change makes the work not merely a tale of pathos but a folknarrative of courage. A footnote records its publication in Mithila Darpan in 2008, evidence of its printed circulation. [Original p. 76]

5.3 'Beniram': A Village Deity, Caste Memory, and the Making of Folk History (original pp. 77–88)

Among the eleven pieces, Beniram is distinguished by its length, breadth of subject, and cultural complexity. The opening connects Beniram with the popular religious beliefs of two communities in Mithila, the Nau and Karori. His worship as a folk deity, cattle and their rearing, beliefs about magic and sorcery, and village security locate a specific field of collective memory. An opening section resembling a folk song and the subsequent narrative of events combine to create the popular voice of that belief. [Original pp. 77–79]

The original account successively introduces Raj Paraul, Lekha Thakur, Indra-Kavilas, Godhan Sati, and many events concerning Beniram's birth and life. Lekha Thakur's religious practice, the relationship between teacher and disciple, Godhan Sati's fidelity, and miraculous events must be understood as elements of folk narrative, not information confirmed by historical scholarship. Various beliefs, maxims, communal recollections, and wonders are part of the story's own world. To equate them with established modern historical facts would distort the nature of the work. [Original pp. 80–82]

Through Godhan Sati's life, hostility involving Jasiya and Barsiya, magic and counter-magic, obstacles connected with marriage, and a sequence of birth and upbringing, the story creates a structure of female existence and motherhood rooted in popular belief. Godhan Sati's sense of duty, ability to take risks, and determination to protect her son are major forces driving the plot. At the same time, women's folk religious obligations are connected with the traditional ideal of satitva, or wifely chastity. Modern criticism must ask how much this ideal recognizes women's bravery and how far it restricts their independent social agency. [Original pp. 81–85]

After Beniram's birth, scenes involving knowledge of his father, family separation, youth, forests, dangerous animals, and encounters with malign powers give the tale an increasingly heroic-ballad character. His courage is not merely a display of personal strength: it appears as action undertaken to protect the family, confront injustice, and gain standing in the village community. In several episodes, tantric forces, sorcery, recourse to deities, and miracles continue to govern the story's world. [Original pp. 84–87]

The final part turns to Beniram's identity as a folk deity, beliefs associated with Dinanath, the protection of cattle, and the collective welfare of the village. In closing, the author himself indicates that Beniram's tale discloses numerous historical and cultural aspects. The assertion can be treated as material for understanding popular belief. Definitive historical confirmation, however, would require comparative research into local worship, independently circulating versions of songs, accounts of oral narrators, and documentary records. [Original pp. 87–88]

Beniram derives its literary power from a multilayered plot. Unlike the tiny translated tales, it interweaves lineages, the worship of goddesses, sung narrative, religion, caste, gender, and the economy of livestock. Folk songs give the text the sound of oral transmission. Yet the absence of complete information about the narrator, place of collection, informants, and variant versions makes it difficult to treat this book as a definitive scholarly edition of the folktale. The soundest procedure would be to regard its text as one documented version and compare it with others.

5.4 The Comparative Significance of the Three Folkloric Narratives

Dhanak Haruri raises questions about grain and reciprocal labour; Seven Sisters portrays disruption caused by hunger and the sisters' collective self-defence; Beniram elaborates a cultural conception of a folk deity who protects his community. All three are linked by the 'preservation of life'. In the first, preservation depends on the availability of food and the just distribution of affection; in the second, on solidarity and ingenuity; in the third, on moral courage, belief in deities, and folk memory. The coexistence of these different means reveals several currents of popular life.

If these narratives are regarded as nothing but ancient and marvellous material, their present-day implications will disappear. Food scarcity, endangered girls, domestic labour, caste relations, livestock, and beliefs about village deities remain in conversation with human concerns today. Yet while drawing ethical significance from folklore, the critic must not assume that the social hierarchies, ideals of femininity, or miraculous beliefs depicted are automatically true or just. Asking appropriate questions is also part of a respectful study of popular tradition.

6. Appendix: The Form and Reliability of 'A Brief Genealogy of Kabilpur'

According to the contents, 'A Brief Genealogy of Kabilpur' begins on p. 89. The final pages of the available copy contain hand-drawn or diagrammatic family trees, branching sequences of names, and kinship connections. Placing such genealogical material immediately after the stories is unusual. It directly reflects the author's village-centred interests and his attempt to preserve caste and family memory alongside local history. [Original p. 89 and subsequent genealogical charts; reproduction pp. 46–50]

The importance of these family charts lies in the names and relationships they record, but the level of verification must be made explicit. Which name occurs on which branch is direct evidence from the book. It cannot be inferred simply by looking at a diagram that every relationship is historically verified. Oral family traditions, older surviving documents, genealogical registers, dates, and independent evidence of descent would have to be examined. Some charts and names are printed vertically or rotated; producing a verbatim transcription of every name without a legible original would be risky.

In literary terms, the appendix has a particular relationship with the three folkloric narratives. A tale such as Beniram gives meaning to a village deity and the communal memory of ancestry, while the family tree displays the documentary side of the same interest. The book, however, does not offer a sufficiently separate critical account of the relationship between story and genealogy. Introductions to each chart, source details, estimated periods, standardized names, and textual notes on illegible passages would make this appendix more useful for research in a future edited edition.

7. An Overall Examination of Language, Syntax, Dialogue, and Narrative Method

The language combines conversational Maithili, literary prose, Sanskrit-derived cultural vocabulary, and folk idioms. Shastra-Chinta concentrates words associated with religion, the nation, ethics, and philosophy. Faisla uses the language of offices, reports, employment, administration, and political connections. Sapanak Dak foregrounds fields, documents, possession, ancestral land, and village transactions. Vocabulary changes in keeping with the subject.

This is not decorative verbal abundance: it serves to identify the social domain of each fictional world. [Original pp. 35–54]

Shastra-Chinta has a questioning and abstract narrative voice. The protagonist interrogates himself; Ashok responds with ethical counter-questions. Repeated phrasing reveals a cycle of thought, although at times the narrative approaches a prolonged sermon. In Faisla the connection between inner life and marital dialogue is more natural: the wife's questions show how a crisis of office enters the home. Sapanak Dak gains intensity by combining anxiety about land with dialogue and dreams. The three original stories do not share one verbal rhythm; each adapts its form to its subject.

The translated miniatures generally follow a pattern of 'question, answer, moral consequence'. The narrator offers little extended description of setting; dialogue between two figures makes the central meaning clear. In A Felicitation Volume the satire springs from the final reversal, whereas in The Rare Satyanarayan Worship the distinction between formal ritual and truthful conduct is compressed into the closing words. The effect is swift understanding, but the critic must also ask whether the clarity of principle sometimes overpowers the characters' multidimensional psychology.

The language of the folkloric narratives moves in another direction. In Seven Sisters, repetition, numbered succession, simple warnings, and the rapid rhythm of escape create the effect of oral narration. In Dhanak Haruri, a popular conception of food determines the tale's opening framework. Beniram becomes polyphonic through songs, names of local deities, kinship relations, tantric terminology, and miracles. Reducing these differences to one uniform 'modern story style' would erase the collection's creative variety.

Literary criticism is not served by indiscriminately replacing local forms such as 'chhalah/chhalani', 'ahan/hamar', and 'kael/bhel', or their regional pronunciations, in the name of linguistic purity. Native speech, characters' expressions, and the sound of folk songs should be preserved. Certain matters of punctuation, the typesetting of titles, consistent proper names, and textual organization could be corrected in a new edition, with editorial notes. Spots and blemishes are visible in the photographic reproduction; it would be wrong to attribute them to the author's use of language.

8. Three Forms in One Collection: Story, Translation, and Folklore

The order of the collection's three sections is itself meaningful: first the individual grappling with the public crises of a new age, then translated stories offering compressed moral judgements, and finally tales of collective memory and popular belief. This is not a fixed chronology of historical periods, but it creates an order of reading experience: from abstract anxiety to social conduct, from conduct to didactic judgement, and thence to the extended memory of communities. The conjunction of 'story' and 'folktale' in the title accords with this actual compositional plan.

Characters in the original stories have relatively greater independence: Ashok disagrees with his teacher, Jamuni Devi questions her husband's inward struggle, and Sukhlal is troubled by the insecurity of documents. In translated miniatures, figures commonly embody choices between values. Folktale characters operate as collective symbols and cultural roles. Accordingly, demanding the uniform psychological portraiture of modern fiction from Beniram, or novelistic expansion over twelve pages from A Felicitation Volume, would be a critical imbalance.

The sections nevertheless have deep connections. Duty in Shastra-Chinta, self-determination in The Path of Self-Respect, the primacy of conduct in The Rare Satyanarayan Worship, and collective obligation in Seven Sisters all ask, through different literary means, about the gap between saying and doing. The uncertainty of land rights in Sapanak Dak, common rights to natural resources in Each One's Water, and the distribution of grain in Dhanak Haruri offer different forms of the question of resources and justice. Institutional pressure in Faisla and communal faith in a guardian in Beniram present contrasting visions of power and security.

One limitation concerns the editorial proportions of the book. The three original stories are comparatively expansive, the five miniatures finish in very little space, and Beniram, in the third section, is again a narrative of many pages. This is natural to their different genres but creates sharp changes in reading rhythm. The introduction is also lengthy in comparison with the principal narrative section. A scholarly edition could turn these inequalities into strengths, without deleting any original material, by providing brief explanations of genre, source notes, and an account of the sequence.

9. Women, Class, Caste, and Power: Questions within the Texts

In Faisla, Jamuni Devi struggles between the security of her household and her husband's moral choice. This makes the woman a genuine party to the family structure, but her role remains restricted when the final decision is made. The queen in Dhanak Haruri reacts to the unequal division of food-producing labour and affection. In Seven Sisters, mutual solidarity among female characters becomes a means of safety. Beniram's Godhan Sati has loyalty and extraordinary courage, yet the cultural model of the 'sati' determines the meaning of her life. These are four different situations of women; an identical mould of the 'ideal woman' should not be imposed upon them all.

Class appears at several levels. Sukhlal's inherited memory of land is endangered by the lack of paperwork; Raghavji, despite his administrative position, experiences pressure from political authority; poor residents of Malapur bear the effects of collective conflict; and hunger initially causes the family's disintegration in Seven Sisters. Poverty here is not merely an adjective intended to produce pity: it is a force shaping human relationships and social opportunity.

At its outset Beniram records the beliefs of different caste communities concerning a folk deity, important material for studying popular religion. Yet the claim that particular groups worship Beniram is a record of local belief, not a licence for sweeping assertions about their present conduct or the entire region's history. Actual research would need to hear diverse versions of the balance of caste power, rights to worship, priestly traditions, the protection of cattle, and local memories of lineage. The tale opens these questions rather than settling them.

Two kinds of authority are especially visible in the collection. State authority appears in officials, kings, ministers, and administrative decisions. Cultural authority takes the form of teachers, priests, village deities, folk songs, and genealogies. In Each One's Water, a sage teaches a king to exercise judgement; A Felicitation Volume criticizes the hollow prestige of political office; in The Rare Satyanarayan Worship a priest himself acknowledges the limitations of external ritual; and in Beniram a community creates the figure of a guardian deity. These different forms take the collection beyond entertainment alone.

10. Additional Questions for Research and Verification

The original footnotes preserve useful information about prior publication: 2002 is mentioned for Shastra-Chinta, 2003 for Faisla and Sapanak Dak, and journal publication in 2008 for the folkloric tales. Accordingly, the 2010 collection is not simply eleven new works written in a single year; it also gathers previously published pieces. The original periodical issues could be consulted to confirm pagination, textual variants, and first-publication dates. The present review does not invent unspecified variants in their absence. [Original pp. 40, 49, 54, 69, 76]

Two specific independent bibliographical details bear on the wider subject. Videha's digital book list records Katha-Lokkatha (2010) under Dr Yoganand Jha's name. The Sahitya Akademi's Maithili book list identifies Yoganand Jha as compiler and editor of Mithilak Lokkatha Sanchay, first published in 2017. The latter is bibliographic evidence of subsequent work on folktales. Because the text of that 2017 book has not been collated, the present study makes no definite claim that the two books contain identical tales or share particular textual readings.

A third external record appears in Japan's CiNii library catalogue: Maithili Katha-Sarita, edited by Madaneshwar Mishra and Yoganand Jha, is listed with a publication year of 1983. This limited verification connects Yoganand Jha with an earlier publication in the editorial culture of short fiction. It does not establish the origin of every literary feature of Stories and Folktales, or any specific equivalence of content with the 1983 collection. External evidence has been used only to this extent.

11. Conclusion: Achievements, Limitations, and Place in Maithili Short Fiction

The collection's principal achievement is not variety of subject alone but the bringing together of three ways in which literature lives: the writer's original concerns about present realities, an exchange of values through miniature narratives translated from other languages, and stories preserved in the memories of folk communities. A journey beginning in national anxiety and reflection on scripture passes through Raghavji's official dilemma and Sukhlal's fear for his land, then through common water, self-respect, truthful conduct, and a critique of public honour. It ends in the worlds of food, solidarity among seven sisters, and Beniram's popular divinity. Through this sequence the book makes individuals, institutions, and communities alike the subjects of literature.

The artistic achievement is not uniform. In the original stories, ideas sometimes outweigh characters; in the miniatures, moral endings can make the narratives excessively direct; in the folk tales, the author's introductory and concluding explanations guide meanings that oral tradition might leave more open. Nevertheless, these differences aid our understanding of the book's form. The author generally takes a moral position, yet the text preserves tensions that invite renewed reading: security versus nonviolence, justice versus family, land versus records, labour versus consumption, and belief versus historical evidence.

For students of Maithili literature the book should not be reduced to the count of 'eleven stories'. Its lengthy introduction and foreword preserve the memory of literary gatherings and local writers; the footnotes reveal a chronology of the periodical world; the translated section documents linguistic exchange; the folkloric narratives provide material for studying communal ethics and belief; and the genealogical appendix partially records the memory of local descent. The literary and cultural value of the volume is evident in this multilayered character.

A proper critical judgement of the collection is neither unqualified glorification nor general dismissal on account of its moral tone. The conclusion supported by the sources is that it offers a meeting point in Maithili between modern social narration, the translation of ethical miniature stories, and the preservation of folk narrative. Its best use combines three tasks: reading the stories, preserving their original texts through responsible editing, and independently verifying the claims of folklore and history through research.

CHAPTER 10 / 2011

Sitavataran: The Descent of Sita

A Critical Study of a Work by Dr Yoganand Jha

2. Introduction to the Book and Verified Publication Facts

Item	Publication details
Title	Sitavataran (a narrative poem)
Original poet	Kapildev Thakur “Snehalata”

Item	Publication details
Compilation and editing	Dr Yoganand Jha
First edition	2011
Publisher	Lok Kala Sanskriti Sansthan, Videhanagar, Darori, via Karua Hajparwa, Samastipur District, Bihar
Printed price	50 rupees
Original printed evidence	Title page, publication details, and editorial introduction: opening pages, especially printed pp. 3–4

The title page identifies the work as a prabandha-kavya, while the English description calls it 'Narrative Poetry'. It assigns separate credits to the author and the editor. This distinction must be preserved, because the editor himself states that the original work available to him was untitled and that he supplied the name Sitavataran. The 2011 edition, therefore, is not an unchanged facsimile publication of Snehalata's manuscript in its original form; it is a literary text reaching readers through editorial intervention.

As external corroboration, Videha's book list records 'Kapildev Thakur 'Snehalata', Sitavataran (edited), 2011' under Dr Yoganand Jha's name. This helps establish bibliographic identity, but the outside listing does not independently verify metre, textual accuracy, or the sequence of episodes.

3. The Historical Perspective of the Editor's Introduction and Its Critical Examination (pp. 3–4)

In his introduction, Dr Yoganand Jha describes Snehalata as a devotional poet of the Ramashrayi Rasik tradition from Darori village, in Mithila's Samastipur district, and gives his lifespan as 1909–1993. He attempts to place Snehalata against the background of Mithila's devotion to Rama, the song tradition surrounding the marriage of Sita and Rama, the saintly lineages, and lyric literature. The critical significance is that the poet's identity is not confined to one account of Sita's birth; it is situated within a wider world of devotional song and folk observances.

According to the introduction, Snehalata composed wedding lyrics, supplicatory lyrics, swing songs, chautavani, Shiva songs, and songs for life-cycle ceremonies throughout his life. The appendix corroborates the range of genres represented in this description by including praise of Mithila, invocation of Maithili or Sita, Krishna's divine play, and Maheshvani. Introduction and collected material thus illuminate one another. Yet this edition does not supply a complete record of the dates of composition and first publication of individual songs. The broad literary-historical assertions of the introduction are therefore treated here as the editor's statements rather than independently established findings.

The introduction reports the discovery of a narrative poem said to have remained 'unread and unexamined' until then. This statement belongs to the editor's introduction, written in December 2010; it cannot prove the absence of all subsequent academic study up to the present. Likewise, praise on an 'all-India' scale expresses the editor's critical admiration. It can become the conclusion of a separate study only after examining textual evidence in comparison with other contemporary works.

4. A Poetic Form Created through Editing: The Central Question of This Edition (p. 4)

The introduction makes its most consequential admission on p. 4: the available narrative poem 'had no title', and the editor named it Sitavataran in view of the episode of Sita's birth. He further writes that, in keeping with 'the requirements of the subject', he inserted some of Snehalata's independent lyrics at various places to clarify its narrative character. This establishes two distinct historical acts: assigning a title and incorporating songs. Neither diminishes the poet's creative contribution, but the poet's original organization and the editor's final arrangement cannot reasonably be treated as one and the same thing.

The positive aspect of this editorial experiment is that dispersed devotional lyrics and narrative passages are brought together, allowing readers to enter the wider emotional world of Mithila. A text that might have remained inaccessible perhaps acquired an organized form for reading. On the other hand, no page-by-page account identifies which songs originally belonged to the narrative, which were added later, which episodes were moved, or which manuscript served as the base text. Without such an account, the limits between the original poet's composition and the editor's structuring intervention cannot be determined. This is a significant deficiency in textual editing, especially because the edition explicitly acknowledges incorporating additional material.

Consequently, its standing as a prabandha-kavya should be assessed at two levels. Where there is a clear sequence of events and causal connections—Janaka's sacrifice, Sita's emergence from the earth, and the celebrations—the work displays the potential for an integrated narrative poem. Where the songs of Rama's birth or Shiva and Gauri stand as independent pieces for singing, there is not the uninterrupted flow of a formally divided epic, but a devotional narrative arranged with songs. This may be seen as a weakness or as an originality associated with Mithila's folk-theatrical traditions. Before reaching a decisive judgement, the limits of the editor's intervention must be established.

5. Dedication, Purpose of Composition, and the Poet's Spiritual Self-Presentation (pp. 5, 7, 9–10)

The complete handwritten passage in the available copy is not legible with certainty, and it has therefore not been treated as a source from which to reproduce an authenticated verbatim quotation. Its presence in print nevertheless offers material evidence of a relationship between the editor and the devotional circle.

The 'Words of Dedication' (p. 7) connect the volume to devotees of Sita and Rama and to the imaginative world of the Ramcharitmanas. Its language is reverential; the purpose of publication and the inner voice of the poetry meet here. The page suggests that the book is intended not only for the literary enjoyment of modern readers but also for recitation, singing, worship, congregational kirtan, and communal devotional practice.

The 'Purpose of Composition' (pp. 9–10) foregrounds Darori and Mithila, affection for the marriage of Sita and Rama, imaginings of their childhood forms, pure feeling, the devotional community, and recollection of the name 'Lalit Lata'. The poet presents himself as a humble servant, not as a historian speaking with absolute certainty. Four elements thus underlie the act of poetic composition: a locally sacred geography, loving devotion to the worshipped couple, the community's tradition of congregational singing, and the insistence upon remembering the divine name. Its beauty cannot adequately be judged by plot alone.

6. Invocation of Saraswati and the Auspicious Opening: From Humility to Poetry (pp. 11–12)

On p. 11 the poetic text begins with 'Shri Ganeshaya Namah' and a 'Saraswati Vandana'. A direct appeal such as 'Mother Saraswati, when will you remove my ignorance?' reveals the poet's humility before learning. In the sentiment 'I am your child, Mother', the bond between deity and devotee becomes that of giver of knowledge and dependent child. While connected to the classical tradition of auspicious invocations, the actual language is domestic and reminiscent of folk song.

The prayer for 'a little corner of compassion' and the removal of ignorance creates images centred on tenderness. Knowledge is not conceived as an external rank or privilege but as a human capacity received through grace. Structurally this is a threshold: a wider scene of religious crisis follows it. The poet first acknowledges his limitations and then imagines the moral authority to narrate the restoration of dharma, divine descent, and the royal household.

7. Opening Narrative: Crisis of Dharma, Divine Descent, and Mithila's Need (pp. 12–14)

Pages 12–14 speak of unrighteousness, violence, fear, distress among the people, ruined peace, and the desire for dharma to be restored. Dharma is not merely private worship here; it appears as a value capable of dispelling social disorder. At the start, the conditions for the impending incarnation are created: society is out of balance, the earth and its people are in danger, and divine power may therefore descend into the human world. In this structure Sita's emergence is not an isolated miracle but a collective necessity.

The poet interweaves Mithila's marriage traditions with the birth of Rama. A prophetic sentiment resembling 'For the wedding in Mithila, we shall go and travel together' appears on p. 14. Narrative time and the devotee's present experience are closely joined: the ancient event of incarnation returns again and again in the present of communal singing. It is more appropriate to read this conjunction of times as an organization of devotional feeling than as a linear statement of historical dates.

The opening verses combine Sanskrit-based religious diction with familiar verbs, addresses, entreaties, and patterns of folk metre. 'Adharma', 'avatar', and 'dharma's banner' occur in lines whose sound invites communal performance. More than displays of intellectual ornament, the poet's language privileges the shared carrying of emotion. At places, awkward syntax and changing metrical regularity also appear. To call them all defects, or all deliberate feats of technique, would exceed the available evidence.

8. 'Sohar for Rama's Birth': A Poetic Transformation of a Life-Cycle Song (pp. 15–21)

The heading 'Ramjanma Sohar' and a series of numbered verses begin on p. 15 and continue to p. 21. Ayodhya's palace, Dasharatha's family, queens, glad news, musical instruments, gifts, donations, and the joy of a community of women make up the principal scenes. A mythological birth celebration is transformed into a locally recognizable ceremonial song. The word sohar denotes both a literary-singing genre and a social rite; it places the lyrics within the auditory world of courtyards, congratulations, women's collective voices, and auspicious occasions.

This section does not merely praise a divine incarnation. Gold, gifts to the household, clothing, instruments, and donations express the material abundance of the birth festival. The grandeur of royalty and practices familiar from popular life appear side by side. As news of the birth spreads from kin to the city, the narrative voice becomes collective rather than merely personal. The main literary effect is that Rama, while divine, is also an infant, a son, and the centre of family delight.

The particular interest of the verses on pp. 18–21 lies in the emotional difference between those who recognize Rama's divine nature and those who perceive his earthly child-form. Scattered gems, laughing queens, and singing groups are not mere exaggeration; they are a mode of manifesting devotional rasa. The inclusion of women's voices locates the song in a social ritual framework, although its concentration upon the royal couple leaves the labour and inequalities of ordinary families almost invisible. Modern criticism should acknowledge that limitation.

The place of an extended sohar for Rama's birth within a work titled Sitavataran raises a special critical question. Before Sita descends, readers encounter the worshipped couple through an extended account of Rama's birth. Yet, given the introduction's acknowledgement of inserted songs, the original position of this section cannot be assumed. Its effect in the published poetic arrangement may be discussed; its precise state in the manuscript may not.

9. Janaka's Longing, Narada's Counsel, and the Turn to Shiva Worship (pp. 21–22)

After the account of Rama's birth, the story advances towards King Janaka's family. Pages 21–22 refer to his longing for a daughter, the gathering at his court, and advice offered by sages. Janaka asks about refuge and spiritual means after receiving assurances associated with the incarnations of Vishnu and the great divine power. Narada, Shiva, ascetic practice, and sacrificial worship become mechanisms of transition in the plot.

This transition is distinctive because Sita's birth is not represented as a merely biological continuation of a dynasty. It is an event combining divine intention, the crisis of dharma, and the welfare of the people. The land of Mithila is no mere setting; it becomes the earth from which the next incarnation is to emerge. The importance of a daughter lies at the centre of Janaka's longing. In comparison with the customary patriarchal desire for a son, the sacred hope for a daughter's birth creates a cultural reversal.

10. 'Shaiva Padavali': Shiva and Gauri in Domestic Speech and Playful Opposition (pp. 22–29)

A separate section entitled 'Shaiva Padavali' begins on p. 22. Gauri's familiar speech is heard in its first lyric. Words suggesting that 'Bambhola would keep me as a servant, Gauri', together with drinking bhang, a hut, and attendance, turn Shiva from a distant celestial deity into a character in Mithila's domestic teasing and joking. The coexistence of grandeur and humour in Shiva devotion is demonstrable from the text; it would therefore be wrong simply to label these poems 'hymns to Shiva' and stop there.

The dialogic songs on pp. 23–25 portray marriage, the bride's family, the bridegroom's unusual appearance, Gauri's apprehension, the affairs of the household, bhang, and affectionate quarrelling. Repeated forms of address such as 'He Dani' heighten the possibility of a responsive relation between performer and listeners. The poetic voice brings the universe-protecting Mahadeva into the jesting world of village weddings. This is not simply irony between an 'exalted' mythic image and 'lowly' domestic conduct: it is the inclusive poetic movement of popular devotion.

On pp. 26–29, Gauri's displeasure, Shiva's assent, the intimacy of the family, and amorous reconciliation change from song to song. Direct speech, short line breaks, and rapid emotional shifts suggest that the pieces retain the traits of separate singable compositions even when placed together in the text. One purpose of the Shiva songs within the narrative is to prepare Janaka's observances, Mahadeva's goodwill, and Sita's advent. Another may be to preserve specimens of Snehalata's Shaiva lyrics in the collection. Both readings are possible, but the original editorial ordering has not been independently established.

The strength of the songs is their plurality of voices. No single omniscient narrator recounts the mythology: Gauri, Dani, the bridegroom's people, women, and devotees speak in changing registers. Before imposing rigid metrical counts, the critic should consider the refrain, rhythmic fragments, and repetitions of folk performance. Neither original musical notation nor melodies are available, and this review therefore makes no claim to a particular raga or tala.

11. Janaka's Sacrifice, Drought, and Preparations for the Earth-Born Daughter (pp. 30–32)

After the Shiva songs, the narrative voice returns unmistakably on p. 30, describing Janaka's sacrifice, counsel from the sages, preparation of the sacrificial ground, and disturbance of the earth's balance. An imperative such as 'Now go and perform the sacrifice, O Janaka' propels the story into its next stage. The sacrifice is not merely a depiction of ritual: it symbolizes a communal religious response to the people's suffering.

Page 31 refers to the absence of rainfall and society's distress, the hoped-for completion of the sacrifice, and the date of Panchami. Mithila's land, its sacred river, and seasonal time together establish a geographical and temporal framework for Sita's birth. Janaka is presented both as a king concerned for his afflicted land and as a father awaiting the fulfilment of divine purpose.

On p. 32, Janaka ploughing the earth, the longing expressed in 'the daughter of my heart', the earth's womb, and the emergence of a girl are united within an image of nature. Field, plough, furrow, golden radiance, and an infant's cry bring Sita's birth into the centre of agrarian popular life rather than a palace. Here the title Sitavataran takes on its most concrete meaning: the incarnation is of supreme divine power, the medium is Mithila's earth, and the first witness is King Janaka.

12. Sita's Appearance, Daughterly Affection, and Public Rejoicing (pp. 32–35)

Pages 32–33 picture the golden plough, the earth, the radiant girl, and news spreading through the city. The absence of a daughter that had troubled Janaka turns into happiness at the appearance of the earth-born child. A lyric announcement on p. 34—'Mithila's earth has become blessed: Janaki is born'—compresses this transformation into a single sentiment. It joins land, domestic good fortune, the community's identity in Mithila, and the birth of a daughter in one expression.

On p. 33, the child's radiance, the glow of her face, comparisons with moon and sun, and everyone's acclamation create divine beauty. The similes are numerous, yet they also represent an attempt to understand the force of a divine body through popular perception. Janaka is happy with Sunayana at the birth of their daughter; this shared parental joy distinguishes the scene from the mere depiction of a royal miracle.

On pp. 34–35, singing, a delighted city, auspicious glimpses, gifts, and celebrations return. The collective happiness that surrounded Rama's birth in Ayodhya finds its Mithila-centred counterpart in Sita's birth. This repetition is not merely narrative redundancy; it is a poetic means of giving equal emotional value to the paired births of Rama and Sita in two different cities. The editorial organization of the two sections is not, however, separately explained. We cannot establish whether their correspondence was deliberately planned by the poet or arose from the editor's selection.

A vital caution is required in evaluating the birth of a daughter. The poet praises Sita as the ideal divine girl; this is not a manifesto proclaiming equal social rights for every girl. Nevertheless, the royal family's desire for a daughter and Mithila's public celebration create an emotional world in which a girl's birth is auspicious, desired, and a cause of communal pride. That much the literary evidence demonstrates; it does not furnish a survey of gender relations throughout historical Mithila.

13. Structure: The Tension between Continuous Narrative and Independent Songs

The text available to us has a principal sequence: invocation; the crisis of dharma and contemplation of incarnation; the sohar of Rama's birth; Janaka's longing for a daughter; Shiva worship and Shaiva lyrics; Janaka's sacrifice; Sita's emergence from the earth; and the city's celebration. This clearly marked progression allows the work to be read as a narrative. Yet the numbered verses, refrains, spoken voices, and suggestions of singing and dancing in the Ramjanma Sohar and Shaiva Padavali also make them seem like independent poetic units.

If one expects an extended traditional narrative poem always to maintain one metre, one narrator, formally divided cantos, or continuous character development, this work reveals a different nature. It is an account of divine characters constructed with the assistance of folk songs, deriving more creative energy from an emotional world than from tightly joined incidents. The publisher's description 'prabandha-kavya' is a documented fact; whether the work fully realizes that artistic form remains a critical question.

When read in the imagined setting of collective song, many breaks may be experienced as changes of scene in folk theatre. On the written page, however, signals marking the return to the narrative are limited, and the pace of scenes changes abruptly. Justice to the poetry requires acknowledging both sides: the vitality of a folk-based form and the weakness of transitions in the edited text.

14. Poetic Language: Devotional Diction, Colloquial Maithili, and Mixed Song Vocabulary

The language brings together religious words derived from Sanskrit, such as 'avatar', 'mahashakti', 'yajna', and 'Saraswati'; familiar terms of Mithila's popular life, such as 'sohar', 'baba', 'dani', 'hajir', 'bhang', and 'Gauri'; and everyday verbs. Such coexistence does not automatically indicate linguistic carelessness. The audience for devotional poetry moves between learned readers and folk performers. The sweetness of particles and verbal forms such as 'he', 're', 'nahi', 'chhathi', and 'gabathi' helps establish its audible quality.

The poet's identifying signature, or bhanita, varies within the book, taking forms such as 'Snehalata' and 'Latika Saneh'. Such differences do not necessarily invalidate common authorship; devotional poetry has different conventions for poetic signatures, affectionate names, and concluding self-reference. At the same time, normalizing all variants without checking the printed pages would risk corrupting the text. An essential distinction must be made between typographical mistakes requiring correction and the phonetic or vernacular diversity of the original songs.

In some verses, word order departs from standard prose grammar; elsewhere, Sanskrit compounds weigh down the musical rhythm, while repetitions drawn from folk practice simplify meaning. Criticism needs to ask which irregularities belong to the poet's style, which to choices in editing, and which to printing errors. Without a base manuscript, definitive textual emendations have not been proposed.

15. The Interplay of Rasas: Service, Parental Love, Humour, and Public Welfare

Devotion to Rama and Sita is the prevailing emotion, yet its expression is far from monotonous. The opening invocation is humble supplication, Rama's birth evokes parental tenderness and joy, the Shiva–Gauri episodes convey affectionate humour, Janaka's sacrifice mingles sorrow and hope, and Sita's descent brings wonder and collective rejoicing. This movement between emotions turns the lyrical arrangement into a kind of journey through feeling.

In particular, Shiva's association with bhang and Gauri's oblique domestic perspective give popular devotion a playful voice. This shows that Snehalata's faith is not confined to restrained praise of divinities: he can create a family-like divine world whose members talk, laugh, sulk, and reconcile. In contrast, the radiance, light, and acclaim of Sita's birth produce wonder. To subsume this diversity under 'erotic sentiment' or 'devotion' alone would diminish the text's multiplicity.

16. A Cultural Reading of Mithila's Geography, Agriculture, and Rites

References to Darori, Videhanagar, Mithila, Janaka, the plough, sacrificial ground, river, and earth create an intimate geography. The cry 'Mithila's earth is blessed' is not a geographical label alone; it gives the land an emotional body. In the tale of a daughter emerging from the earth, implements of agriculture—the plough, the field, and tilling—acquire religious significance.

The instruments of the sohar, words of congratulation, playful exchanges between bride and bridegroom, marriage talk, and suggestions of communal singing by women are important as written traces of Mithila's ceremonial world. But they are literary images. They cannot establish the entire anthropological reality of present practice in a specific village, its caste distribution, or women's actual ritual roles. Poetry centred on rasa offers cultural evidence, not a social census.

17. Narrative Perspective and Women's Voices: Sita, Sunayana, Gauri, and the Singing Community

Sita is the most venerated figure in the volume; her emergence is described through the sentiments of land and family. Her own direct speech, however, is very limited on the pages available, because the narrative ends with celebrations of her birth. It would be unsupported to invent here her later self-determination, mature womanhood, or subsequent moral vocation. The central subject concerning women is the longing for her appearance, not her entire life story.

By contrast, Gauri speaks with relative force in the Shiva songs. She herself raises questions about marriage, dress, food, outward appearance, quarrels, reconciliation, and domestic life. This difference is critically interesting: Sita, the great goddess, is portrayed as a divine image, while Gauri takes the form of a familiar, speaking woman. Each fulfils its literary purpose in context, yet the inequality of their voices is evident in the text.

18. The Appendix and the Poet's Wider Creative World (pp. 36–48)

The heading 'Appendix: Some Distinctive Songs by Snehalata' is printed on p. 36. It establishes that the editor identifies this section as separate from the principal narrative poem. The lyrics must not be treated in criticism as the next natural cantos of Sita's birth story. They are evidence of the poet's varied interests, and in publication terms they extend the reader's introduction to him.

18.1 'Praise of Mithila' (p. 36)

'Mithila Mahima' presents Mithila as a beloved land of nature, culture, tradition, and the child Rama. Beginning with 'in the immortal lap of the earth', the hymn forms an emotional picture of Mithila's cultural place in the world. Sacred geography becomes pride in one's native land. In the main poem Janaka's earth serves as a symbol; in the appendix the land itself becomes the subject of praise.

18.2 'Invocation of Maithili' and 'Parati' (pp. 37, 47–48)

In 'Maithili Vandana', Queen Sita is made the centre of compassion, righteousness, and surrender; the worship of the central female figure comes in the devotee's own first-person voice. The term 'Maithili' here has an immediately apparent association with the goddess and should not automatically be equated with the name of the language. The 'Parati' on p. 48 contains a call to awaken at dawn. The day's recurring cycle and the repetition of devotional observance illuminate the occasion for performing such folk songs.

18.3 'Supplication' and 'Invocation of Rama' (p. 38)

The lines of 'Vinay' chiefly express taking refuge in God, remorse, and the wish for forgiveness. Readers can discern the bond between the poet's devotional sensibility and moral self-examination. 'Ram Vandana' then praises the Lord's qualities and his compassion towards the humble. Compared with the collective rejoicing in the main narrative, these two songs belong more to private spiritual practice. The strength of the supplicatory song lies not merely in seeing the self as helpless but in awakening the possibility of refuge.

18.4 'Krishna's Play at the Water-Ghat' (pp. 39–43)

'Shri Krishna's Panghat Lila' brings together the gopis, Yamuna, the place for drawing water, water itself, Krishna's playful obstruction of passage, laughter, teasing, and reproach. With Krishna as its hero, the movement of narration shifts from Mithila's Rama worship towards the nimble folk sweetness of Vrindavan. This is not merely a specimen of a different religious allegiance: domestic voices, playful rituals, and teasing resistance create a distinct lyric form through the dialogues of female characters. The piece ends on p. 43, where the next Maheshvani begins.

18.5 'Maheshvani' (pp. 43–47)

In 'Maheshvani', Shiva's unusual appearance, Gauri's domestic complaints, Narada, ashes, ghosts, and divinity combine in amusing, seemingly incongruous ways. Its subject is close to that of the Shaiva Padavali in the main section, but no firm manuscript evidence permits us to call them two versions of the same work or separate parts of an original sequence. The available evidence allows only the conclusion that humour and worship do not obstruct one another in the poet's Shaiva folk songs.

18.6 'Warning' and 'Snehalata's Last Unfinished Composition' (p. 48)

The last surviving printed page presents, under the heading 'Warning', a message concerning life's transience, attachment, and awakening. It also bears a heading, 'Snehalata's Last Unfinished Composition'. The word 'unfinished' is itself part of the editorial presentation; the fragment must not be forced into a complete lyric, nor may a missing ending be fabricated. The adjective 'last' does not, on the strength of a heading alone, establish that this was historically the very last poem Snehalata wrote. It establishes the categorization used in this edition.

19. Why the Distinction between Appendix and Main Narrative Matters

The appendix expands our understanding of Snehalata's devotional world: Rama, Sita, Krishna, Shiva, Mithila, supplication, and warning. It is therefore useful comparative material for literary criticism. It cannot, however, change the assessment of the size and narrative distribution of Sitavataran itself, because the editor clearly distinguishes those songs from the main work. It would be factually incorrect to describe all forty-eight printed pages as pages of one continuous narrative of Sita's birth.

A further important point is that, although Snehalata belonged to a Ramashrayi Rasik tradition, he wrote with ease on Shiva and Krishna as well. This coexistence suggests the possibility of an inclusive form of devotion. There is no adequate evidence here, however, for reconstructing a historical change of sect, a fixed lineage of gurus, or a systematic list of doctrinal influences. It is more faithful to the evidence to remain with the demonstrable diversity of his poetry.

20. Printing and Textual Editing: Responsibility towards the Reader

On p. 4 the editor asks forgiveness for possible errors arising in collection, editing, and printing. Acknowledging errors is not an invitation to alter the poet's text without restraint. On the contrary, it makes it more necessary for scholarship to compare the available edition with the original manuscript. Modernization without preserving the original refrain, line division, poetic signature, any details of melody or rhythm, and the form of the metre would be dangerous.

In the course of this study, handwriting on p. 5 and the poor quality of a few reproduced portions prevent absolutely certain readings of every letter. This review therefore does not invent line-by-line etymologies, disputes of authorship, or grammatical theories based on unclear words. The next stage of responsible textual editing requires access to the original manuscript, a line-by-line record of variants, and comparison with other published works by the poet.

21. Evaluation: Achievements and Limitations on Four Interconnected Criteria

21.1 Thematic Achievement

The poet's most important achievement is to connect Sita's emergence from the earth with Mithila's everyday life, the agrarian image of the plough, and communal joy at a daughter's birth. She is divine power, but a father's longing, a mother's happiness, and the city's singing make her an intimate child of the household. The union of familiarization and glorification is central to this poetry.

21.2 Achievement of Form

Snehalata's language is suited to being heard. Refrains, direct address, repetition, the rhythmic pulse of the sohar, humorous conversation, and words from folk observances combine to create poetry capable of performance. The energy of Shaiva Padavali and Ramjanma Sohar draws the reader beyond the printed page towards imagined singing. Their achievement is to preserve a predominantly auditory experience in written verse.

21.3 Narrative Limitation

Transitions between the central story and independent lyrics are often abrupt. Despite the title Sitavataran, the extensive treatment of Rama's birth and Shiva–Gauri episodes creates uneven proportions for a reader seeking a closely concentrated story. Yet it would be unfair to assign all responsibility for this to the original poet, for the editor acknowledges inserting independent lyrics. The precise critical statement is that 'the transitions are insufficiently clear in the edited edition available to us'.

21.4 Research Value and Editorial Limitation

The volume preserves in print poetic material in danger of being lost and introduces Snehalata's diverse lyric traditions. It does not, however, provide photographic plates of the original manuscript, a complete collation of variants, a table recording where each added song was placed, dates of song collection, or a detailed account of metre and sound. This does not make the editor's contribution unimportant; it establishes the need for a future authoritative critical edition.

22. Testing against Independent External Sources: What Is and Is Not Confirmed

Videha's book list mentions the edited volume published in 2011. The library list of Maithil Manch records a book titled Vaidehi Vivah Sankirtan under Kapildev Thakur 'Snehalata'. Taken together, these establish the public existence of a volume edited in 2011 and a body of writing centred on Rama and Sita. No line-by-line collation with Vaidehi Vivah Sankirtan has been undertaken here; guessing how many compositions are identical or different would therefore be unwarranted.

A 2021 news item in Maithil Manch refers to a proposed documentary on Snehalata and his connection with Darori village. Such a report can be viewed as a contemporary indication of efforts to preserve the poet's memory. It does not establish that the film was completed or released, or that its research claims were verified. The book's own introduction remains the principal biographical source for this study; external sources provide supporting context only.

Printed location	Contents
Cover–printed p. 4	Cover, title, publication details, and editorial introduction
Printed pp. 5–10	Facsimile of handwritten message, words of dedication, and “Purpose of Composition”
Printed pp. 11–14	Invocation of Ganesha, invocation of Saraswati, crisis of dharma, and introduction to incarnation
Printed pp. 15–21	“Ramjanma Sohar”: numbered songs and festivities in Ayodhya

Printed location	Contents
Printed pp. 22–29	Transition to Janaka's desire and "Shaiva Padavali": lyrics on Shiva and Gauri
Printed pp. 30–35	Janaka's sacrifice, birth of the earth-born girl, Sunayana, and Mithila's celebration
Printed pp. 36–38	Appendix: Mithila Mahima, Maithili Vandana, opening of Parati, Vinay, and Ram Vandana
Printed pp. 39–43	Appendix: Krishna's Panghat Lila
Printed pp. 43–47	Appendix: Maheshvani and lyrics concerning Shiva and Gauri
Printed p. 48	Parati/Warning and "Snehalata's Last Unfinished Composition"

24. Consolidated Critical Conclusion

Sitavataran is an edited publication in which Kapildev Thakur 'Snehalata's' capacity for devotional narrative, a sensibility centred on Rama and Sita, and the living sound of Maithili folk song converge. Its central scene is the earth-born appearance of Sita. The story moves from a crisis of dharma through Janaka's longing for a daughter, a sacrifice, the womb of the earth, and a city's celebration. Mithila's agrarian culture, affection for a daughter's birth, and a family's intimacy with divinity give this scene its force.

The poetic organization must be seen clearly. It is not one uninterrupted canto-like narrative, but an edited narrative text sustained by folk singing. The relative independence of the sohar for Rama's birth and the Shaiva songs, the distinct appendix devoted to Krishna and Shiva, and the varying poetic signatures are valuable historical material. Its achievement is not conformity to a 'pure' epic model but the written preservation of popular sound and devotional experience.

The editorial conclusion is equally clear. Dr Yoganand Jha's 2011 publication has significant value as a collection and preservation of texts, but his acknowledged acts of naming and incorporating lyrics require critics to distinguish the responsibilities of composer and editor. Without this distinction, final pronouncements on the metre, original sequence, poet's intentions, or structural merits and defects would violate the evidence. The edition is valuable partly because it reveals something of its own making.

Ultimately, the volume helps the study of modern Maithili literary history in two ways: it makes available a relatively little-known body of Rama devotion centred on Mithila, and it offers a rare opportunity to examine exchanges between congregational song, ceremonial folk genres, and written poetry. The most productive future research would compare this edition, on an evidentiary basis, with the original manuscript, Snehalata's other song collections, and living oral performance traditions—without replacing missing evidence with speculation.

CHAPTER II / 2013

Mangal-Prabhat: An Auspicious Morning

A Critical Study of a Work by Dr Yoganand Jha

1. Introduction to the Book and Research Method

Mangal-Prabhat is a Maithili translation of Mahatma Gandhi's explanations of rules of life written for residents of his ashram. The English publication details on the opening pages make clear that Dr Yoganand Jha presented the material in Maithili on the basis of a Hindi translation. The title page, publication information, and permission letter establish that it appeared in 2013 from the Mithila Research Society, Darbhanga, with permission from the Navajivan Trust. Its study is therefore not merely a summary of Gandhian philosophy but a combined examination of ideas, translation, Maithili readership, and publication history. (Printed pp. 1–3, 13–14, 67–68)

The explanations of the ashram vows are not ordinary paragraphs of exhortation. The opening essay discusses the reason for the title Mangal-Prabhat, the decision to speak on one vow after Tuesday morning prayers, and the publication of the resulting reflections. Dates attached to the individual essays, from 22 July to 14 October 1930, demonstrate their serial composition. Reading them in this historical order reveals that Gandhi discusses each vow as a distinct subject while repeatedly connecting it to truth, nonviolence, and collective life. (Pp. 17–18; dates at the heads of the essays)

A second source is the English edition of From Yeravda Mandir available through Sevagram Ashram, together with original or institutional material concerning the ashram vows. The English book is used to compare the larger textual tradition of Gandhian thought and the ordering of chapters, not to certify the Maithili translation word for word. Without a line-by-line comparison with the intervening Hindi text, it would be improper to declare a particular Maithili rendering an 'error'.

2. Publishing Tradition, Preliminary Matter, and the Translator's Introduction

The book opens with a dedication, a blessing, an introductory statement about the importance of Gandhian literature, 'From the Translator', and Kaka Kalelkar's 'Submission'. These provide different points of entry for readers. On one side they emphasize Gandhi's ideals and the need for intellectual literature in Maithili; on another, the translator explains his aim of making Gandhi's original ideas available in the language. Kaka Kalelkar raises the question of linguistic circulation and expresses the wish that those ideas should reach India's multilingual public. (Pp. 5–15)

'From the Translator' (pp. 13–14) is particularly important. Here the translator explains his literary motivation and practical difficulties of translation and publication: obtaining permission, arranging Maithili publication, and expanding readership. The book thereby becomes more than the importation of ideas; it represents a deliberate attempt to enlarge Maithili's resources for philosophical and ethical prose. Kaka Kalelkar's 'Submission' on p. 15 bears the date 6 June 1958. To mistake that date for the publication date of the Maithili volume in 2013 would be an error: it belongs to an earlier prefatory statement.

According to the publication details, the Hindi intermediary is attributed to Amritlal Thakordas Manavati. The probable chain of transmission is therefore 'Gandhi's original writing → Hindi translation → Maithili translation'. To call the Maithili a direct rendering of an English edition would contradict the evidence supplied by the book itself. The complete Hindi intermediary was not available among the primary materials examined here, however, so claims about subtle differences between translations are deliberately withheld.

3. Fifteen Principal Essays: Text, Argument, and Critical Assessment

3.1 Truth

Original text: printed pp. 19–21; essay dated 22 July 1930.

In the opening essay, truth extends beyond the virtue of speaking honestly to questions of existence and God. The text connects sat with being, presence, and the real existence of a thing; satya is contemplated as a name of God. The reasoning establishes an inseparable relation between Gandhi's ethical life and spirituality. The insistence is that human beings should seek a more encompassing truth through their practice of truthfulness in everyday affairs. The essay thus becomes the foundational text for the vows that follow.

Especially noteworthy is that truth is not restricted to speech. Thought, behaviour, and an honest endeavour within the mind are also part of it. The search requires self-scrutiny, the review of one's decisions, and efforts to overcome greed and fear. In this view truth is less an immovable pronouncement than a continuous method of moral self-examination. Spiritual idiom supplies its philosophical foundation, but contact with social action makes the idea active.

A critical question follows: how should private experience of truth be distinguished from public evidence? Without diminishing Gandhi's ethical search for truth, one must recognize that personal conviction does not automatically establish a historical or scientific fact. A commitment to truth in modern public life must be accompanied by documents, inquiry, and rational verification. The strength of this account is moral integrity, not a final verdict on every factual dispute.

3.2 Nonviolence

Original text: printed pp. 22–24; essay dated 29 July 1930.

The essay on ahimsa treats truth and nonviolence as two connected aspects of a single discipline. Complete apprehension of truth is difficult, it says, and therefore requires the discipline of love and nonviolent means. Nonviolence is not merely refraining from killing; it resists the inner forms of hatred, anger, jealousy, and revenge. It does not require abandoning opposition to oppression. Rather, its demanding condition is to oppose injustice without nurturing hatred for the person who commits it.

The example of a thief is important. Instead of simply classifying the offender as an enemy, it urges recognition of that person's remaining human possibilities. In contrast with a narrowly punitive culture, the example opens questions about the causes of wrongdoing, treatment, and possible reform. Nonviolence, in this sense, is not passive tolerance; it sets an ethical limit on the exercise of force. Its concerns extend to physical, verbal, and mental behaviour.

One caution is required in applying these ideas. Demanding 'love' or 'forgiveness' from a person who has suffered harm cannot justify denying that person's right to safety or justice. Oppression, domestic violence, and discrimination demand legal protection and substantive institutional resistance. Gandhi's rejection of retaliatory hatred may be valuable, but to turn it into silent acquiescence by the victim would diminish the idea's social force.

3.3 Brahmacharya

Original text: printed pp. 25–28; essay dated 5 August 1930.

The essay presents restraint as a discipline that supports all the other vows. Brahmacharya here is not simply outward sexual abstinence, but the regulation of mind, senses, attachment, and conduct. At the outset it asks how someone aspiring to truth, nonviolence, and self-surrender can justify uncontrolled desire and private indulgence. This question highlights the place of self-restraint within the shared life of the ashram.

An essential feature is the relation between personal discipline and the wider impulse to serve. Affection may, if reduced to an excessively narrow form of possessiveness, hinder a person's ability to work for others. For this reason the writer calls for the control of both body and mind. Discussion of food, sensory desires, and appetite provides a logical link with the next essay, 'Control of the Palate'.

Modern analysis should not impose brahmacharya as a single obligatory way of life on everyone. Consent, bodily autonomy, equality within marriage, and gender justice are essential aspects of dignity. The chapter must therefore be studied in the historical setting of ashram discipline. The positive meanings of restraint—responsibility, respect within relationships, and freedom from possessiveness—must be considered separately from the possible limits of strict moral control over private lives.

3.4 Control of the Palate

Original text: printed pp. 29–32; essay dated 12 August 1930.

The title asvad does not deny the existence of pleasure in food; it cautions against making the pursuit of taste the principal goal of life. Food sustains the body, the writer explains, while eating only for the tongue's pleasure may obstruct self-control. The essay connects restraint of taste with brahmacharya: discipline over the tongue serves as practice in governing the senses. It argues against unnecessary overeating, craving for flavours, and enjoyment beyond genuine need.

The text compares eating according to need and usefulness with taking medicine. In this way Gandhi's ethics reaches into the body's ordinary daily activities. Someone may speak publicly of truth and nonviolence, but if unable to restrain personal consumption, the order of vows remains incomplete. This is the essay's central connection.

Contemporary analysis must take account of nutrition, age, physical work, health, and the cultural significance of meals. Mindfulness about taste and criticism of excess are useful; strict prohibition, however, must not be presented as a universal law of medicine. In a society living with malnutrition, moral commands to 'eat less' can be detached from material reality. The text argues for discrimination in consumption, not the glorification of hunger.

3.5 Non-Stealing

Original text: printed pp. 33–35; essay dated 19 August 1930.

The essay on asteya extends the notion of stealing far beyond the narrow act of taking something contrary to law. Taking unnecessary objects, misusing things meant for others, or accumulating more than one's needs may also approach theft in the ethical sense. Gandhi thus moves beyond the formal legal ownership of property to raise questions about necessity and just consumption.

The tension between 'need' and 'right' is a special feature of the chapter. Even an item legally purchased may, when used needlessly, put pressure on common resources. That argument remains pertinent to the contemporary scarcity of resources. Non-stealing is presented in relation to truth and nonviolence: mutual trust, nonviolent conduct, and limited consumption are mutually dependent.

This reasoning also has limits. What counts as 'necessary' varies with class, illness, disability, childhood, kinds of labour, and social circumstances. Ethical non-stealing must not become an instrument for harsh surveillance of the modest desires of the poor. It has greater significance when applied to waste, exploitation, and unequal access to resources among dominant social groups.

3.6 Non-Possession

Original text: printed pp. 36–38; essay dated 26 August 1930.

Aparigraha is the next logical step after non-stealing. The chapter urges people not to accumulate things beyond need, to reduce acquisitiveness, and to limit everyday consumption. In the writer's view, accumulated property cannot guarantee security or satisfaction. The fitting use of necessary things and the capacity to serve others are more meaningful measures of an ethical life.

The text poses a moving question: when innumerable people lack the basic means of life, why is excessive accumulation by those who are prosperous treated as normal? Through this question non-possession expands from religious asceticism into the debate about distributive justice. Giving up hoarding does not mean complete inactivity; the ideal is to retain the ability to meet legitimate needs and to employ the resources remaining for the service of society.

The value of non-possession becomes clearer when voluntary moral renunciation is distinguished from involuntary deprivation. It would be irrational to call the modest safety reserves of people struggling to survive 'greed'. The concept is relevant to unequal distribution, consumerism, and responsible public expenditure; to imagine poverty as sacred in itself would not be a just application of it.

3.7 Fearlessness

Original text: printed pp. 39–40; essay dated 2 September 1930.

The essay on abhaya treats inner fearlessness as a necessary precondition of truth and nonviolence. It identifies many external sources of fear: death, livelihood, reputation, family members, the state, and social persecution. If the fear of consequences breaks one's commitment to truth, the moral pledge cannot endure. Fearlessness is therefore not only a heroic emotion but the difficult capacity to make just decisions.

One important quality is the distinction between fearlessness and violent recklessness. Courage, self-surrender, the search for truth, and self-correction constitute a disciplined disposition. The preparation to withstand external harm and loyalty to one's conscience are presented as necessary to effective nonviolent resistance.

Fearlessness and blind acceptance of danger are not the same. When calling on vulnerable citizens, oppressed groups, or survivors of violence to be fearless, society must also provide real protection, shelter, and institutional support. The finest social meaning of abhaya is to change structures that generate fear. Blaming only the frightened individual obscures the responsibilities of the state and society.

3.8 The Removal of Untouchability

Original text: printed pp. 41–43; essay dated 9 September 1930.

This essay views untouchability as a religious and social distortion and demands its abolition. Its opening directly rejects the ideas of 'untouchability' and the 'untouchable' as incompatible with human equality. The author criticizes divisions established through food, touch, labour, and ordinary social contact. The strength of the essay is that it recognizes social injustice not as a mere lack of courtesy but as a deeply rooted defect in collective practice.

The religious reasoning challenges attempts to legitimize discrimination in the name of faith. Such a challenge was particularly important for readers who had come to accept exclusion on caste grounds as an unquestioned tradition. The removal of untouchability thus becomes a concrete social test of truth and nonviolence. A claim to love others has meaning only when their dignity and equality are honoured in practice.

A tension emerges, however, in a critical reading. The main text mounts a strong case against discrimination, whereas p. 66 of the appendix also comments on the varna system and ashram life. Read together, these sections suggest possible discomfort between the declared aim of eliminating caste exclusion and discussions retaining elements of the traditional varna order. By modern standards of equality, rejecting untouchability must also mean an unequivocal rejection of caste hierarchy, hereditary restrictions on work, and unequal social opportunities.

3.9 Bread Labour and Livelihood

Original text: printed pp. 44–46; essay dated 16 September 1930.

This chapter treats work and livelihood as interdependent moral responsibilities. It introduces the idea of 'bread labour': anyone who eats should, according to ability, also undertake productive physical work. The principle challenges both the employer's privilege and the labourer's humiliation. Work becomes a way of developing character and promoting social equality.

An important turn occurs when the right to food of those who do no physical work is questioned morally, even as the duty to care for the elderly, the incapacitated, and dependants is also recognized. The essential concern is to increase respect for the hands that produce the necessities of life and to lessen distinctions of high and low founded upon occupations. The writer establishes the dignity of work partly through the example of doing physical labour himself.

Applying the premise unchanged in today's economy is difficult, since care work, teaching, intellectual labour, technological services, and employment suited to people with disabilities take many forms. Yet the arguments for the dignity of labour, workers' rights, the relation of production to consumption, and mutual service remain substantial. Moral duty must never justify low wages or exploitation. The dignity of labour demands fair pay and security as well.

3.10 Equal Regard for All Religions—I

Original text: printed pp. 47–49; essay dated 23 September 1930.

The first essay on sarva-dharma-samabhava examines the meaning and moral limits of 'tolerance'. It moves beyond mere tolerance towards an attitude of equal regard. The central demand is that one abandon the assumption that one's own religion is without error and that another is necessarily inferior. Human understanding is limited; hence the human interpretations of religion may be incomplete.

The essay's strength is self-criticism. Respect for others is not merely a strategy for social peace; it emerges from awareness of the limits of one's own knowledge. Commitment to a faith and humility about religious claims are not treated as mutually exclusive. To say that human formulations of religions are incomplete does not mean that faith is meaningless. It means that human interpretations do not possess a monopoly on final truth.

Critically, one must distinguish equal regard from substantive freedom of religion. The ideal becomes powerful when legal rights of worship, nonbelief, departure from religion, dissent, and conversion are protected. Sentimental goodwill alone is inadequate: equal citizenship for minorities and those with divergent beliefs is essential. It is productive to relate the essay's moral purpose to modern discussions of rights.

3.11 Equal Regard for All Religions—II

Original text: printed pp. 50–52; essay dated 30 September 1930.

The second essay puts the principle into the practice of multireligious prayer in the ashram. It mentions praise and scriptural recitation from different religious traditions. The author sees opportunities for fellow feeling, education, and mutual respect. The earlier theoretical demand now becomes a direct experiment in social life.

A distinctive point is the insistence upon listening to the language of other faiths while retaining one's own understanding of religious truth. The purpose of dialogue is not to defeat the other but to lessen narrowness within oneself. This conception of religious plurality does not demand undisputed uniformity; it seeks an atmosphere of mutual discipline and respect within a community.

A critical issue is how adequately voluntary participation, the right to disagree, and the place of nonreligious persons are protected in shared prayer. Speaking the religious languages of different communities together can create solidarity, but religious participation must not become compulsory if all citizens are to be respected. On these terms, the Gandhian proposal for reducing communal division can enter a constructive dialogue with democratic pluralism.

3.12 Humility

Original text: printed pp. 53–54; essay dated 7 October 1930.

The essay reflects on the difficulty of treating humility as a separate vow. Humility, it suggests, does not arise from a written pledge but from the gradual reduction of inward pride. It is therefore regarded as a quality running through all the vows. Someone who grows proud of keeping the truth and looks down upon others may lose the very spirit of that moral practice.

The spiritual element of the essay is closely connected to service. A person who understands the limits of the self moves away from boasting of personal achievements and towards responsibility for the wider life of society. Humility in this sense is not servility, but cooperation without arrogance. The essay's figurative language makes the difficulty of self-cultivation easier to grasp.

Humility is particularly useful in present-day public debate, where argument too often degenerates into the veneration of personalities. Yet it would be harmful to turn the ideal into an order for disadvantaged groups to remain silent. Asking questions, resisting injustice, and asserting one's rights do not contradict humility. Proper humility limits the arrogance associated with power; it does not erase self-respect.

3.13 Swadeshi: A Preliminary Note

Original text: printed p. 55; numbered separately as item 13 in the contents.

In this short piece Gandhi explains that a fuller account of swadeshi may naturally involve political meanings, but his principal attention is upon its moral and religious dimension. It introduces the ensuing discussion of the vow of swadeshi. Although brief, its critical importance is considerable: if swadeshi is understood only as a programme for boycotting foreign goods, half its meaning is lost.

The passage also clarifies the intended audience. It lays the ground for linking swadeshi with service to those nearby, self-discipline, and responsibility. That is why assigning this brief note a separate place in the contents is meaningful. Absorbing it without comment into the following 'Swadeshi Vow' would obscure the book's editorial organization.

The appropriate method of reading the note is to distinguish political nationalism, economic localism, and ethical responsibility to those close to us. This distinction clarifies the assessment of the merits and problems of the writer's treatment of swadeshi.

3.14 The Swadeshi Vow

Original text: printed pp. 56–59.

Swadeshi is understood here as a primary responsibility towards one's neighbours and nearby communities. The writer argues that a lofty intention to serve distant people may leave genuine obligations unfulfilled if one's immediate neighbours are neglected. Service beginning in local relationships can ultimately reach the wider human family. Swadeshi thus appears not as a geographical prison but as a progressively widening circle of responsibility.

An important feature of the essay is the meeting of religious, social, and economic concerns. Being attentive to a neighbour's labour, products, and difficulties is part of swadeshi, but it must not become hatred towards people of another country or religion. By joining swadeshi to service and reciprocity, the writer distinguishes it from obstinate exclusion. Respect for local production, language, and cultural foundations can follow from this wider ethical impulse; these are potential modern applications, not a directly enumerated policy programme in the original text.

Contemporary assessment needs a balance between swadeshi and global interdependence. Medicines, science, education, trade, and assistance to migrant communities sometimes rely on international networks. Supporting local economies, environmental responsibility, and trade free of exploitation matters greatly, but the moral worth of a product or person cannot be judged solely by place of origin. The most fertile application of Gandhi's ethic of nearby service is to connect local responsibility with universal human dignity.

3.15 The Necessity of Vows

Original text: printed pp. 60–62; essay dated 14 October 1930.

The final principal essay examines the foundations of the entire book. It raises objections to vows: why is following a rule not enough, and why should a vow remain strict when conditions are difficult? The reply is that goodwill alone is insufficient; ethical decisions require firmness of resolve. A vow thereby becomes a public declaration of long-term discipline rather than a passing emotion.

The essay criticizes the uncertainty of saying 'as far as possible'. A vow is not cleverness in finding exceptions; it gives the strength to stand before temptation. The example of giving up alcohol, the comparison with the sun's predictable movement, and questions about keeping one's word illuminate the relation between principle and character. The essay brings the argument full circle to the opening discussion of truth.

In critical terms, resolve must be distinguished from rigidity. Decisions should be revised when new evidence reveals error or shows that other people are being harmed. The available English text from 1932 likewise recognizes that a vow later demonstrated to be wrong may need to be abandoned, although the Maithili essay emphasizes firm determination. Continually testing strict vows against judgement, medical exceptions, and just outcomes offers a prudent contemporary reading.

4. Independent Assessment of the Appendix: Eleven Ashram Vows

Printed pp. 63–66 contain an appendix with brief explanations of eleven ashram vows. The fifteen principal essays and eleven vows in the appendix must not be counted as the same set. In the principal section, the introduction to swadeshi, the swadeshi vow, and two essays on equal regard for religions are counted separately, while humility and the need for vows also receive independent treatments. The appendix offers a concise practical scheme for life; the principal essays develop the vows' ethical justification.

The appendix follows this order: (1) truth, (2) nonviolence, (3) brahmacharya, (4) control of the palate, (5) non-stealing, (6) non-possession, (7) bread labour and livelihood, (8) swadeshi, (9) fearlessness, (10) the removal of untouchability, and (11) tolerance or the capacity to endure. (Printed pp. 63–66)

The appendix matters because philosophical concepts become a concrete list of practices. Non-stealing counsels against unnecessary acquisition, while non-possession discourages the hoarding of surplus property. Bread labour specifies a responsibility for bodily work; swadeshi gives priority to serving neighbours; and nonviolence demands opposition without hatred for one's adversary. These practical rules are necessary for understanding the collective discipline of the ashram.

Page 66 includes, alongside the rejection of untouchability, comments about the varna system. Contemporary readers should understand the historical wording without surrendering critical distance. The demand to abolish untouchability is ethically significant, but a modern understanding of social equality requires ending all forms of caste-based occupational confinement, hierarchy, and exclusion. This contradiction has not been concealed in the present review.

5. The Translator's Linguistic Sensibility and the Texture of Maithili Prose

The clearest feature of the Maithili rendering is its reader-directed prose, close to ordinary speech. Arguments appear in expressions such as 'hamaralokani', 'aor', 'thik', 'karait chhi', 'hoit achhi', and 'kahbak chahi'. The language brings the text nearer to its audience while attempting to avoid both forbiddingly Sanskritized literary prose and incoherence produced by excessively unstructured colloquial speech. Sentences often advance through questions, examples, doubts, and replies. In discussions of truth, nonviolence, and the necessity of vows, this conversational quality allows the reader to participate in the argument.

The translator places philosophical vocabulary within accessible Maithili sentences: satya, ahimsa, brahmacharya, asvad, asteya, aparigraha, abhaya, asprishyata-nivaran, sarva-dharma-samabhava, namrata, and swadeshi. Many terms have Sanskrit origins, but their meanings are developed through concrete examples of food, objects, neighbours, thieves, work, fear, and religion. The explanation of 'bread labour' alongside 'shramavyayi ajivika' provides a particularly useful conceptual bridge. Translation is thus not merely the substitution of words but the presentation of an ordered argument to Maithili readers.

Certain distinctions between terms are important for research. Sarva-dharma-samabhava is not identical in meaning to 'tolerance' or even to the equal honouring of religions: tolerating, regarding equally, and protecting religious rights each raise different questions. Likewise, reducing brahmacharya to sexual abstinence alone would lose its broader sense of governing mind and senses. Comparative study must attend not only to dictionary equivalence but also to ethical meaning in context.

The forms of Maithili spelling in the printed edition have not automatically been treated as errors in the name of modernization. This review analyzes language; it does not manufacture a 'corrected' edition of the source text. Some printed passages show faint marks and blurred letters, so lengthy verbatim quotations have been avoided. That procedure reduces the risk of unverified reconstruction or misquotation.

6. Original and Translation: Evidence and Its Limits

The preface of the English edition mentions letters written from Yeravda prison in 1930 to members of the ashram. This helps establish the historical context of the Maithili book's title Mangal-Prabhat. (Sevagram Ashram, From Yeravda Mandir, title and preface pages)

The published tables of contents broadly overlap in subject: Truth/satya; Ahimsa/nonviolence; Brahmacharya; Control of the Palate/asvad; Non-stealing/asteya; Non-possession/aparigraha; Fearlessness/abhaya; Removal of Untouchability; Bread Labour/shramavyayi ajivika; Equality of Religions/sarva-dharma-samabhava; Humility/namrata; Importance of Vows; and Swadeshi. Some topics occupy different positions or have separate presentations. The English contents also list chapters called 'Yajna or Sacrifice' and 'More About Yajna', without correspondingly titled chapters in the principal Maithili contents. This is a demonstrable difference between their structures. Without seeing the intermediary Hindi edition, however, it would be groundless to assert that 'the Maithili translator removed chapters'.

The comparison points towards further research: the relevant Gujarati original, Amritlal Thakordas Manavati's Hindi translation, and the 2013 Maithili edition should be collated line by line for the number and order of writings, meaning of terms, and examples. The present study has not substituted conjecture for the unavailable intermediary. The boundary of the evidence therefore remains clear.

7. Philosophical and Social Evaluation

The overall philosophical organization can be understood on three levels. First comes personal cultivation: truth, brahmacharya, control of the palate, and humility. Second is an ethics of social resources: non-stealing, non-possession, bread labour, and swadeshi. Third comes coexistence without fear or discrimination: nonviolence, fearlessness, the removal of untouchability, and equal regard for all religions. This threefold scheme is the reviewer's analytical convenience, not an organization of chapters supplied by Gandhi. It shows how the vows form an interdependent network of practices rather than unrelated moral lectures.

The book's essential strength is its insistence upon testing moral instruction in the conduct of life. Truth is not merely a subject for speeches; nonviolence is not simply opposition to war; brahmacharya is not only a formal oath; non-possession is not just the abandonment of riches; swadeshi is not merely a political slogan. Each concept enters daily choices about meals, acquiring objects, distributing work, community relations, and religion. Gandhian philosophy becomes an ethics of practical experiment rather than a body of abstract principles.

A limitation is its relatively restricted direct analysis of social structures. Personal control over greed, fear, and hatred is essential, but caste, labour markets, landlessness, gender inequality, and violent structures of state authority cannot be eliminated by individual goodness alone. The argument against untouchability, for example, may arouse social conscience, but genuine equality also requires attention to resources, education, representation, and institutional rights. The book offers moral inspiration; modern ethics and the study of social justice provide its critical complement.

At the same time, room must remain for judgement when interpreting the strict form of any vow. Diet according to health, mutual consent in family relationships, work suited to disability, freedom of religious disagreement, and protection of life and property are essential standards when applying Gandhian ethics today. Differences from the text need not be concealed; serious criticism makes respect and disagreement possible together.

8. The Book's Contribution to Maithili Literature

Critical studies of Maithili literature should not be confined to poetry, stories, drama, and folklore. This translation of Gandhi's thinking on conduct contributes to the vocabulary of philosophical prose, social reform, reflection on religion, and public ethics. Concepts such as possession, non-stealing, equal regard, and swadeshi are discussed in familiar Maithili sentence patterns. The language's intellectual capacity is thereby demonstrated not merely in theory but in an actual published text.

The translator's introduction and the documents concerning permission also reveal a cultural fact: bringing the writings of an Indian thinker into Maithili demands linguistic labour, publishing cooperation, and institutional approval. The 2013 edition documents this work. Translation can be a means of democratizing ideas, because readers need not always rely upon Hindi or English mediation to understand them.

This achievement must be evaluated with care. The book does not represent every discussion of Gandhism in Maithili; it is a particular text on the vows of ashram life. A complete history of Gandhian literature in Maithili would require independent study of other journals, books, translations, dates, and modes of publication. The evidentiary reach of this review is limited to this book and the known source tradition.

9. Consolidated Conclusion

The central understanding gained from Mangal-Prabhat is that morality cannot be completed by memorizing the separate headings of a book. Without truth, nonviolence can lose its direction; without nonviolence, a quest for truth may become cruel; without non-stealing, non-possession remains incomplete; without respect for work, swadeshi may become only a slogan about consumption; and without abolishing untouchability and embracing equal regard for religions, personal purification may remain divorced from social justice. Their interdependence is the text's conceptual centre.

The significance of Dr Yoganand Jha's Maithili translation is that ethical reflections written for ashram residents reach a new readership through Maithili prose. Its fifteen principal essays, appendix of eleven vows, introductions, and permission documents together make it an accessible intellectual and publishing record. Its best use lies not in uncritical imitation but as a substantial beginning for reflection on self-discipline, equality, respect for labour, and nonviolent public conduct.

In the final assessment, the book both inspires and generates questions. What form of restraint can respect bodily autonomy? How is religious equal regard connected with equality of rights? How can respect for labour become justice for actual workers? How can opposition to untouchability extend to ending caste hierarchy altogether? How can swadeshi serve neighbours without separating itself from the welfare of humanity? Such questions arise from the book's own ideas. The translation can therefore become not merely an introduction to Gandhian thought in Maithili but a living basis for critical dialogue.

CHAPTER 12 / 2014

Bhore-Bhor: Early in the Morning

A Critical Study of a Work by Dr Yoganand Jha

Central Argument of the Review

Bhore-Bhor is not simply a poem about the benefits of waking early. It attempts to connect a child's daily experience with the observation of nature, family relationships, discipline, the acquisition of knowledge, health, love of country, and altruism. The book contains two compositions: 'Bhore-Bhor' (printed pp. 4–11) and 'Prarthana' ('Prayer', pp. 12–16). The first unfolds the morning and the daily routine across eight sections; in the second, divided into five sections, a child asks for blessings to shape character and social conduct. The arrangement of eight lines on each printed page, accompanied by an illustration, creates a distinct visual route to understanding.

From a literary perspective, the book is notable for the unity between its child-friendly visual presentation and its practical moral instruction. This unity has limits, however: there is little room for the child's own questions, disagreement, freedom in play, or experiences beyond the prescribed pattern. The child appears chiefly as a learner rather than as someone who creates an independent imaginative world. This criticism arises from the text itself; it is not an unsupported assumption about the intentions of its author or translator.

In examining the translation, the present review concentrates on the available Maithili text: its vocabulary, voice, ordering of lines, repetitions, and ways of addressing children. Because a complete authenticated text of the Hindi original was unavailable, no claim is made about the exact verbal equivalence or divergence of every line. A contemporary published review of the Hindi original, Subah Savere, permits only limited corroboration of the structure and thematic similarities.

1.1 Bibliographic Identification

The inner title page prints 'Translation: Yoganand Jha' and 'Original Hindi: Dr A. Kirtivardhan' beneath the title Bhore-Bhor. The publisher is Vidyalakshmi Prakashan, Muzaffarnagar, Uttar Pradesh. The publication details specify 'First Edition, 2014', name Indian Printing Press as printer, and give the price as 20.00 rupees. In his introductory 'Du Shabd' ('A Few Words'), the translator himself discusses this Maithili rendering of the Hindi children's poetry collection Subah Savere. Together these particulars establish the work's status as a translation.

As external evidence, Videha's book list records this translation as a work of 2014; the Maithil Manch library catalogue likewise identifies the original author, translator, publisher, and year. These two catalogues are used chiefly to verify the book's identity, not as substitutes for reading its text critically. [References 2–3]

The principal evidence for this review consists of the poetic lines, the page-by-page progression of subjects, poetic repetition, the visible details of the illustrations, the texture of the language, and the two introductory texts. Each interpretation is connected to the relevant printed page. The standpoint of the original author is distinguished from that of the translator, while the critic's conclusions form a clearly identified third level. The precise wording of the original Hindi, variant editions of the poems, and direct empirical evidence of readers' responses are unavailable; accordingly no categorical claims about them are made.

2. 'Du Shabd' and 'Nenalokani!': Two Ways of Addressing Readers

2.1 The Translator's Intellectual Preface

'Du Shabd' is more than a conventional preface. The translator connects folklore, children's literature, the mother tongue, linguistic dominance, and the social need for translation. His argument understands children's folk literature as both a form of linguistic expression and a living cultural tradition. He voices concern that linguistic pressures weaken education in the mother tongue and calls, in particular, for greater activity in writing and reading children's literature in Maithili.

In this preface, translation is understood not as replacing words but as a creative process establishing a relationship between two languages. The translator invokes the term 'loss of translation', acknowledging that some aspect of the original meaning or expression may be lost in transfer. This caution is useful to the critic: a song may sound natural in the target language without its complete equivalence to the source text thereby being established.

The preface also touches on Vedic literature, linguistic history, cultural contact, and translation studies. These broad propositions cannot, however, be independently verified within the book; they are treated here as the translator's intellectual proposals, not as historical findings authenticated by research. Another noteworthy contrast is the change in linguistic difficulty between the preface and the poems: a conceptual, heavily Sanskrit-derived introduction gives way to comparatively short and sonorous poetic lines.

2.2 The Original Poet's Address to Children

In the address headed 'Nenalokani!' ('Children!'; right-hand section), the poet encourages children through short poems to remain cheerful, smiling, and inclined to sing. Birdsong is related to human happiness. The address ends on that page with the original writer's name, 'Kirtivardhan'; it must therefore not be mistaken for the continuation of the translator's 'Du Shabd'.

These two introductory texts have different centres of attention. The translator raises questions of language, culture, and literary transfer; the original poet addresses children's laughter, songs, and well-being. In the poems themselves, the two strands converge: the ease of reading and singing coexists with a dense presence of social and cultural values.

3. 'Bhore-Bhor': A Sequential Reading of Eight Sections (pp. 4–11)

3.1 Page 4: Making Dawn the Beginning of the Daily Routine

The opening line, 'Bhore-sabere jagab sikhu' ('Learn to rise early in the morning'), delivers a direct practical instruction. Expressions such as 'matu-pitake ka pranam' ('offer salutations to your parents') and 'niyat kajme lagab sikhu' ('learn to begin your appointed tasks') link society's behavioural discipline to the child's own routine. The poem does not begin with an abstract ideal; it starts from waking, greeting one's parents, and beginning work. The picture shows a child awakening in bed, dawn at a window, and a clock. Thus the reader experiences 'time' visually as well as verbally.

A critical limitation emerges at the outset: the recurring imperative 'sikhu' ('learn') expects obedience but gives the child no voice with which to express sleepiness, curiosity, or a choice of activity. This may be a familiar technique in the didactic tradition of children's literature, but a modern, participatory classroom would need to pair the instruction with questions and discussion.

3.2 Page 5: The Coexistence of Birds and Children

The second section celebrates the birds' chirping and calls, their singing, movement around the house and courtyard, the offering of water and grain, and the pleasure of seeing them bathe. The illustration depicts two birds on a flowering branch and a child holding a railing. The first page's instruction about 'doing' becomes an enjoyment of 'seeing'. Providing food and water encourages responsibility towards nonhuman life: the child may become not simply a consumer of nature but a companion who cares for it.

This passage seems particularly child-centred, since the birds' movements, sounds, and bathing excite both visual and aural curiosity. Illustration and lines complement the same experience. Yet the depiction of birds as invariably happy and singing is an affectionate poetic personification, not a factual account of avian behaviour.

3.3 Page 6: Air, Bells, and the Practice of Listening

The third section introduces attention to the sky, the enjoyment of fresh air, temple bells, devotional singing, and listening to words of knowledge. The illustration shows a child at a table, a hand cupped to the ear, with a bell and musical symbols in the child's imagination. The focus thus moves from visual description to the practice of listening: the child takes in not only nature's appearance but also the sounds of the surroundings.

The literary complexity lies in the poem's rapid progression from the bodily pleasure of 'pure air' to temple sounds and the ethical idea of 'knowledge'. The section is unified by the 'morning atmosphere', yet brings together three distinct experiences—nature, religion, and learning. Explaining those differences explicitly would make classroom teaching more productive.

3.4 Page 7: The Garden as a Place of Discovery

The fourth section describes walking through a garden with one's father, green trees and plants, the cuckoo's call, the humming of bees, flowers, leaves, and butterflies. The injunction to rise early opens out into a world of sights, sounds, and scents. The illustration places adult and child together; the child's gaze turns towards flowers and flying insects. From the standpoint of young children's experience, this is a particularly effective section: curiosity grows from direct observation rather than moral advice alone.

Walking with one's father represents one particular model of family life. The text does not bring into view the possibility of exploring nature with a grandmother, mother, sister, teacher, or friend. This is a limit of the available poem; it has not been demonstrated to be a difference introduced by the translator.

3.5 Page 8: Moonset and the Expectation of Sunrise

The fifth section describes 'Chanda Mama' (the affectionate 'Uncle Moon'), the blue sky, the moon shining in the west, and the awaited sun in the east. This moment at daybreak lets a child observe temporal change within a single sky. In the picture, the moon appears among mountains and clouds together with an indication of the rising sun. Both poem and illustration turn the passage from night to day into a playful experience.

The intimacy of 'Chanda Mama' creates an image readily recognizable in Mithila's language addressed to children. Watching the moon become less visible as night turns into day can provide an entry point for elementary scientific learning, but the poem does not expound astronomical principles; its value lies in experiential observation.

3.6 Page 9: Redness in the Sky and the Personification of the Sun

The sixth section describes the reddish eastern sky, sunrise, and the beauty of the heavens. In the illustration, a smiling sun is given a human face, making the vast or unfamiliar celestial body seem like a familiar companion to the child. The sun's gradual ascent provides a natural clock for the entire day, distinct from the motion of leaving one's bed on the opening page.

The poem takes the reader from 'waking' to 'watching the sunrise'. Because of this visual pause amid its instructions, the book becomes more than a list of regular activities. Reading this particular section without its picture would risk losing part of its effect upon a child.

3.7 Page 10: Saluting the Sun and Disciplining the Body

In the seventh section the child salutes the sun. Expressions such as 'ka pranam, da dhyan magan man' (offering salutations with a mind absorbed in meditation) and 'rashmi deh par' (rays upon the body) unite physical, mental, and spiritual practices. The picture depicts a child with folded hands and the sun rising between mountains. Morning nature is now transformed into social and ritual conduct.

The poem associates sunlight with the development of strength and intelligence. This ought to be read as an optimistic, symbolic expression, not as a measured health outcome or a medical claim. The poet relates the experience of light to enthusiasm, alertness, and discipline; scientific or medical evidence is a separate matter.

3.8 Page 11: A Return to the Opening Lesson

The eighth section returns to rising early, clean air, birdsong, protection from illness, saluting one's parents, purity of body and mind, and success in daily tasks. The illustration shows the child greeting the parents respectfully. The concluding section thus brings the first page's message back in a circular pattern: salutations and work at the beginning, salutations and work again at the end. The recurrence makes the poem memorable, although it reinforces familiar instruction rather than presenting a new scene.

A line such as 'rog kono nahi sakat daba' ('no illness can overwhelm [one]') should be treated in textual criticism as rhetorical reassurance, not as a literal, universal guarantee of health. Teaching children's literature responsibly requires making this distinction clear.

4. 'Prarthana': An Extended Reading of Five Sections (pp. 12–16)

4.1 Page 12: Supplication, Knowledge, and Compassion

The second poem, entitled 'Prarthana' ('Prayer'), begins on printed page 12. It opens 'Vinati hamar sunu Bhagavan' ('Hear my supplication, O God'); the child seeks learning, understanding, love for fellow human beings, compassion, and a willingness to help others. The picture shows a child with folded hands facing the figure of a goddess holding a veena. The poem thus presents its ethical values as aspirations for grace, rather than merely as a series of commands.

Here the first poem's external injunction, 'sikhu' ('learn'), becomes a supplication expressed through forms such as 'diah' ('grant'). Both seek ideal behaviour, but the narrative viewpoint changes: in the first poem an adult voice instructs a child; in the prayer the child personally seeks strength and understanding.

4.2 Page 13: The Teacher, Education, and Service to the Family

The second section refers to devotion to one's parents, Ekalavya's devotion to his teacher, the lamp of education, grace, intelligence, love, and compassion. The illustration expresses the child's reverence against a scene resembling a lamp or an arati ritual. Reverence and education occupy the same moral sequence; invoking Ekalavya presupposes some prior acquaintance with his story.

The story of Ekalavya has a complex literary and social background. Reading it merely as an ideal of devotion to the teacher can leave untouched its troubling questions of rights, opportunity, and power relations between teacher and pupil. Retelling the story at an appropriate age, inviting questions, and presenting more than one perspective would provide a more discerning way to teach this verse.

4.3 Page 14: Nation, Durga, and the Metaphor of Knowledge

The third section mentions respect for parents, patriotism, the strength of peace, becoming a worthy child of one's motherland, Durga's power, a blow or collision with a support, and Krishna as an image of knowledge. The illustration depicts a smiling child holding the Indian flag and a book. 'Country' and 'study' therefore become two responsibilities of one child, not separate subjects.

This section contains a plurality of values: devotion, peace, strength, and knowledge. Nevertheless, so many symbolic names condensed into a handful of lines can make the meanings difficult for infants or children in the first school years. Explaining the relation between peace and strength becomes an essential part of interpretation.

4.4 Page 15: Compassion towards Living Beings and Historical Exemplars

In the fourth section lines such as 'Mahavir san bani ahimsak' ('May I become nonviolent like Mahavira') and 'jar-chetan san prem kari' ('May I love the animate and inanimate') explicitly emphasize nonviolence and compassion. Subsequent lines invoke the Buddha's path of peace, the ideals of Rana and Shivaji, and freedom from fear of enemies. In the illustration a bird-like creature appears close to the child's hand or chest, visually suggesting tenderness towards living beings.

The ideas placed side by side are striking: on one side, nonviolence and love of life; on the other, valour and fearlessness. These need not be dismissed immediately as mutually contradictory, for nonviolence and courage can coexist. Without context, however, a list of exemplars does not explain their differences to children. The passage is therefore a productive starting point for discussing values, but a less self-evident collection of moral maxims.

4.5 Page 16: Karma-Yoga, Service, and a Life without Attachment to Rewards

The concluding section wishes to raise the flag of victory over earth, sky, and the netherworld; to fulfil the dreams of parents, teachers, and kin; to remain constantly engaged in 'karma-yoga'; to work without desire for results; and to lead life with intelligence, strength, and a spirit of service. The picture shows a child holding a flag on mountainous ground. The final image transforms the child awakening in bed at the beginning of the book into an active, nationally conscious, goal-directed figure.

The ethical message of the closing lines goes beyond ordinary 'success' to affirm the importance of service. Yet the combined significance of the 'flag of victory' and 'not desiring the fruits' calls for reflection: the first image represents achievement, while the second denotes detachment from results. Rather than simply identifying this tension as a defect, we should recognize it as an attempt to bring different traditions of moral vocabulary together in one poem for children.

5. Thematic Progression: From the Light of Dawn to the Social Human Being

5.1 The Expansion of Time and Space

The first poem begins with a bed and clock at home, moves through courtyard, garden, sky, and sunrise, and returns to family relationships in the house. The second begins at a place of worship and extends to teachers, nation, exemplary historical figures, and service embracing the whole world. This sequence may be described as a movement 'from the private to the social'. It is an interpretation drawn from the sequence of subjects, not evidence of a plan predetermined by the author.

5.2 The Tension between Sensibility and Discipline

The two poems instruct in different ways. In 'Bhore-Bhor', a speaking voice wakes the child, shows and makes the child hear and offer salutations; in 'Prarthana', the child asks for desirable qualities of mind. The active verbs of the former are a practical strength from the perspective of modern children's literature, but constant instruction may restrict independent imaginative space. When flowers, butterflies, and birds appear, the poem approaches free delight; when the list of exemplary names becomes dense, information and moral precepts threaten to outweigh song.

5.3 Cultural Pluralism versus a Single Religious Setting

The translator's 'Du Shabd' respects Indian multilingualism and the diversity of forms within folk literature. Yet temple, an image of Saraswati, Durga, Krishna, and salutation to the sun recur in the poems. Recording these religious and cultural symbols describes what is present in the book; it does not authorize assumptions about the religious identities of all its readers. In a classroom containing children of different faiths or secular outlooks, it would be useful to discuss separately the prayer's broadly human values—learning, compassion, nonviolence, and service.

5.4 The Child's Social Position

The illustrations generally foreground a boy; the mother and father appear within the family, while teachers and ideals of nationhood are invoked. Girls' experiences, children with disabilities, children from different social backgrounds, and scenes of collective play receive little emphasis. Recognizing these absences matters not simply as a way of condemning a work from another period, but as a starting point for discussing representation in contemporary children's books.

6. A Critique of Maithili Language, Sound, and Translational Technique

6.1 From 'Subah Savere' to 'Bhore-Bhor'

The published Hindi title is Subah Savere, while the Maithili title is Bhore-Bhor. This change is not merely the exchange of lexical meanings: the repetition of 'bhor' produces a natural rhythm and an intimate sense of time in Maithili oral practice. The repeated 'bhore-sabere' within the poem recalls the title. On these grounds, the translator's choice may be regarded as effective for the target language's sound and the reader's memory. A full comparison of the original title's semantic overtones requires the bibliographic particulars and verified text of the Hindi original.

6.2 Verbal Energy in Maithili and Dialogue with Children

Forms such as 'jagab sikhu' (learn to wake), 'lagab sikhu' (learn to begin), 'dekhab' (to see), 'sunab' (to hear), 'pranam' (salutation), 'kari' (let us do), and 'rahay' (to remain) create movement in the text. This density of verbs gives children a tangible experience: the poem does not merely name objects but urges action or observation. Its suitability for reading aloud to children is enhanced by this verbal dynamism. At the same time, the repetition of 'sikhu' strengthens the instructive voice, making the close relationship between poetry and discipline evident.

6.3 The Coexistence of Familiar Speech and Sanskrit-Derived Vocabulary

Expressions such as 'babuji', 'matu-pita', 'Chanda Mama', 'gachh-birichh', 'chirai', 'pani', 'kaj', and 'bhore-sabere' evoke the intimacy of the local home and courtyard. Alongside them, 'vishuddha', 'pranam', 'karmayoga', 'ahimsak', 'dayanidhan', 'par-upkarak', and 'matribhumi' introduce Sanskrit-derived ethical vocabulary. The opening lines of the first poem favour everyday speech; the latter parts of the prayer contain denser Sanskritic diction and more exemplary names. This distribution is significant: the language of pleasure in nature is predominantly visual, while the language of moral blessings becomes increasingly conceptual.

6.4 Orality, Repetition, and Memorization

Each printed page of the two poems has the same visual arrangement of eight lines. That fact alone does not justify declaring the verses to follow a particular classical metre or identical quantitative rhythms; such a claim would require systematic phonetic examination of reading aloud, syllabic duration, and pauses at line endings. Nevertheless, their short lines, synonymous pairs, sound-evoking terms, and repetition of 'bhore' lend themselves to memorization. Their usefulness in collective recitation or singing is plausible, not a result established by direct experimental testing.

6.5 The Advantages and Limits of Localization

The Maithili version uses domestic objects, direct address to children, and local nature terms to make the poems readily familiar to speakers of the target language. But a translation's success requires two different assessments: (1) fluency and suitability for children in Maithili, and (2) direct correspondence with the Hindi original in meaning, rhythm, and imagery. The illustrated Maithili text permits substantial criticism by the first standard; the complete Hindi original has not been available for bilingual collation according to the second. Accordingly, this review commends the 'natural Maithili' without awarding an unsupported certificate of 'faithful translation of every line'.

6.6 Specific Questions of Language Editing

The text displays variation in line breaks, punctuation, compounds, and signs indicating pronunciation. Such differences in the printed text should not automatically be classified as errors, especially when children's speech, regional usage, or singability is involved. The title 'Bhore-Bhor' and the song's 'bhore-sabere' perform different functions; mechanically standardizing them could diminish the poetic rhythm. Some characters are uncertain because of faint print or poor reproduction. At those points the original copy must be collated rather than corrections asserted without evidence.

7. Line Drawings: The Joint Creation of Meaning

Nearly every page of verse from pages 4 to 16 contains a prominent illustration. These drawings are not merely ornaments: they offer young readers 'visual sentences' with which to recognize situations. The clock on the first page conveys time; the picture of birds makes seeing and listening concrete; the human faces of moon and sun render unfamiliar celestial bodies familiar; the child's folded hands before the sun give physical form to a practice; the goddess in the prayer establishes the cultural setting of reverence; and the flag beside a book links service to the nation with study.

Some pictures convey clearer narrative information than the poems. On page 7, for example, the drawing distinctly shows a father and child attentively watching flowers and butterflies; on page 14 the child holds both a book and a flag, whereas the verses range across several values. The visual thus becomes an entrance to ideas for young readers. The near-exclusive depiction of one type of child, however, is also a limitation in representation.

The illustrator could not be clearly identified from the publication details available for inspection; accordingly, no particular drawing has been attributed to a named artist. Nor is an unsupported connection made between the illustrations and any specific artistic school or chronological period.

8. The Limited Use of External Evidence in Reviewing a Translation

A Hindi review of Subah Savere published by Dr Kaushlendra Pandey in 2009 describes a roughly sixteen-page booklet for children containing a long morning song and a second poem of prayer, with illustrations playing a supporting role. It also mentions birdsong, dawn, sky, a garden, filial devotion, Ekalavya, Mahavira, Buddha, Shivaji, and altruism. This thematic sequence corresponds to the material directly visible in the Maithili edition. It confirms that the two texts broadly retain their principal themes, not that their wording or numbers of lines are identical, nor the history of any revisions made in translation. [Reference 4]

An author profile in Sahitya Kunj mentions Subah Savere among Dr A. Kirtivardhan's publications and refers to its Maithili translation. A published literary account from 2019 likewise identifies Subah Savere as an earlier work by the writer. Such evidence helps verify the author's bibliography; it has not been used to invent quotations from inaccessible lines. [References 5–6]

The external review also reveals an interesting difference in critical emphasis: the Hindi reviewer concentrates on praising moral instruction, accessibility, and illustration. The present Maithili study recognizes these qualities but also examines the child's independent voice, gender representation, cultural diversity, the excessive accumulation of exemplars, and the limitations of assertions that sound scientific. The comparison expands the range of critical questions; it does not distort another reviewer's argument.

9. Critical Evaluation: Achievements, Contradictions, and Uses for Readers

9.1 Achievements

The first achievement is the clarity of the poetic purpose: encouraging children to rise early becomes a means of introducing observation, cleanliness, respect within the family, and social compassion. The second is the visual and aural arrangement: morning light, birdsong, bells, the garden's activity, and pictures each make the poems memorable in their own medium. The third is the accessibility of the Maithili target language: colloquial words and repetitive rhythms open a direct path for ordinary readers. The fourth is the creative relationship between the two poems, which move from practical daily habits towards a desire to serve others.

9.2 Limitations

The first limitation is the commanding voice. Many lines tell children what they ought to do, leaving little room for unexpected discoveries within their own experience. The second is the density of exemplary names: the appearance of Ekalavya, Durga, Krishna, Buddha, Mahavira, Rana, Shivaji, and others within a few lines may fragment the meaning for younger readers. The third is the cultural range of the chosen models: although their values are humanistic, the visual and religious references are concentrated within a comparatively single tradition. The fourth is the exaggeration of certain promises concerning well-being; these should not be mistaken for factual theories of health.

9.3 Concrete Possibilities for Critical Reading in a Children's Classroom

One might work through the illustrations on pages 4–11 by asking, 'What do we see in the morning?' Page 5's passage about birds may lead to conversation about kindness and care towards living beings; pages 8–9 invite comparison of the visible moon and sun; pages 10–11 provide opportunities to distinguish poetic statements from facts about the body, discipline, and health. In 'Prarthana', the compassion of page 12 and the pairing of nonviolence with bravery on page 15 allow children to discuss questions such as, 'Does courage mean violence?' These are educational activities proposed by this review, not exercises printed in the original book.

Especially when reading devotional or dedicatory verses, a school must respect differences of belief and family background. Religious symbols can be studied as part of a cultural text, while broad human qualities such as learning, equal respect, compassion, and service can become grounds of agreement. Such an approach does not suppress the historical voice of the original poem; it enlarges the experience of contemporary readers.

The conclusions of this study fall into three categories. Facts directly supported by the text: the Maithili translation published in 2014, its two poems, the poetic arrangement on printed pages 4–16, thirteen pages with eight lines apiece, the opening linguistic preface, the illustrations, and the analysis of individual lines. Facts supported by external sources: the bibliographic identity of the Hindi original Subah Savere and the thematic correspondence of its two poems as described in the review from 2009. Analytical conclusions: the tension between instruction and pleasure, the collaboration between image and poem, the dense listing of moral exemplars, the question of plurality, and the effect of local Maithili words.

A full test of the linguistic fidelity of the poetic translation would require matching every printed Maithili line to the authenticated first edition of the Hindi Subah Savere. Such a collation should examine lexical meaning, rhythm, sequence, images, cultural symbolism, the names of exemplary figures, correspondence between pictures, and changes of naming. Without the Hindi original, declaring that a given Maithili line 'departs from Hindi' or 'surpasses the original' would violate scholarly caution.

II. Conclusion: The Literary Place of 'Bhore-Bhor'

At the heart of Bhore-Bhor is not merely the spectacle of darkness lifting at dawn but the transformation of light into a metaphor for the child's mind and conduct. In the first poem, light leads the child from the clock to the sky, from sky to birdsong, and from song to familial affection. In the second, the same child is offered a framework for becoming a person who desires learning, compassion, fearlessness, and service. The poetry is most delicate in scenes of the garden and companionship with living creatures; its didactic urgency becomes most concentrated where exemplary names accumulate. An objective reading must attend to both poles simultaneously.

Dr Yoganand Jha's Maithili translation makes a Hindi children's poetry booklet available to young Maithili readers, and this linguistic accessibility is valuable in itself. Yet praise of the translation cannot conceal the absence of the complete Hindi source text. On the basis of the material actually inspected, Bhore-Bhor may be described as an illustrated booklet of two poems for children, oriented towards moral formation and potentially suitable for singing, in which the values of its own period coexist with questions of continuing relevance to child-centred criticism today.

Visible material	Use in the review
Front and back covers	Title, original author, and translator
Inner title page	Original Hindi author, translator, and publisher
Publication details; opening of “Du Shabd”	2014 edition; arguments on language and children’s literature
Main part of the translator’s “Du Shabd”	Folklore, translation theory, mother tongue
End of “Du Shabd”; “Nenalokani!”	Date of the 2013 preface; address by the original poet
Printed pp. 4–5	Waking and the daily routine; birds and courtyard
Printed pp. 6–7	Fresh air, bells; garden, bees, butterflies
Printed pp. 8–9	Moon and dawn; rising sun
Printed pp. 10–11	Salutation to the sun; respect for parents
Printed pp. 12–13	“Prarthana”: learning, altruism,

Visible material	Use in the review
	respect for teacher
Printed pp. 14–15	Nation, peace, nonviolence, historical exemplars
Printed p. 16; facing page blank	Karma-yoga, service, and conclusion

CHAPTER 13 / 2023

Chaturdash Sutra: Fourteen Critical Threads

A Critical Study of a Work by Dr Yoganand Jha

The Collection's Arrangement and Its Critical Significance

The book is organized into three divisions: six essays under 'Poetic Criticism', three under 'Analysis of Prose', and five under 'Evaluation of Contributions'. The first division chiefly examines hymns to the Ganges, narrative poetry, devotional verse, songs, the portrayal of seasons, and modern reinterpretations of the Ramayana. The second considers a fiction writer's travel writing, the essay as a literary form, and a novel concerned with social philosophy. The third moves beyond individual works to assess the institutional importance of journalism, the scientific structure of language, literary history, biographically informed criticism, and research into folk ballads.

The sequence matters. The first division introduces readers to poetic feeling, imagery, metre, and social consciousness; the second raises questions of theme, technique, milieu, and social transformation; the third turns towards the fundamental instruments of Maithili's modern knowledge system: daily newspapers, grammar, history, the editing of older texts, and preservation of oral traditions. The book's 'threads' thus become not merely the names of fourteen separate writers but fourteen entrances into the character and existence of Maithili literature.

The Philosophy of Criticism in the Preface

In the preface, the writer understands criticism as the integrated work of explication, analysis, and evaluation. For him, the critic is a bridge between reader and creative writer and should consider, as relevant, the work's period and creative process, the author's personality, sociology, linguistics, aesthetics, psychology, and anthropology. He finds both blind praise and fault-finding for its own sake unproductive. This declaration supplies a measure for just criticism; the real test is how far the following fourteen essays sustain such balance.

In many essays the writer brings together a work's basic narrative, lines of poetry, episodes from an author's life, and earlier scholarship. Interpretations gain credibility when the discussion remains close to the original text. Where a previous writer's opinions, historical possibilities, and the critic's approval merge, there is a particular need to distinguish levels of evidence. The present study tests this methodological question in relation to each subject.

01 | The Tradition of Hymns to the Ganges and Madhup

Original book, printed pp. 17–26

From a River to a Cultural Symbol

The first notable feature of this essay is its extensive historical and cultural introduction. The writer recognizes the Ganges as a river flowing from the Himalayas to the Bay of Bengal, but immediately shows that, for the Indian and Mithila imagination, it is more than a geographical entity. The Ganges has become a foundation of purity, reverence, pilgrimage, funerary rites, and collective memory. References such as 'Ganga Himavatormadhye', Mithila's connection with the southern boundary of the Ganges, Kartik observances on its banks, and Maithili folk songs establish a cultural geography (original work, pp. 17–19).

The writer then seeks the foundations of nature worship, the imagining of the river as mother, and the personification of the Ganges in Indian literature. The passage from practical usefulness to devotional feeling is the essay's underlying argument. Nevertheless, supposing an uninterrupted development from early societies to modern worship is an extremely broad generalization: it is better described as a cultural interpretation than as a historically universal theory. The river's sacred standing is a genuine belief for many communities; miracles and doctrines of salvation associated with that faith should not thereby be treated as historically established facts.

A Sequential Examination of the Literary Tradition

By discussing Valmiki, Vyasa, Kalidasa, Shankaracharya, Panditaraja Jagannatha, and other figures of the Sanskrit tradition, the writer constructs an extensive genealogy of hymns to the Ganges. Turning to Maithili writers—Laldas, Sitaram Jha, Surendra Jha 'Suman', and Kashikant Mishra 'Madhup'—he distinguishes inherited conventions from innovation. Following references to Sitaram Jha's Ambcharit and Suman's Gangatarangini, he examines metaphor, suggestion, extended allegory, and mature imagination in Madhup's Gangatarangavali (pp. 20–26).

Discussing Madhup's verses, the writer considers poetic imaginings of the Ganges as thief, farmer, child, and consort of the ocean, among other figures. Here the centre of criticism comes into focus: not simply the greatness of the Ganges but the poetic devices through which that greatness is expressed. Simile, metaphor, inherited imagery, and a classical lexicon turn a familiar subject into an extraordinary poetic experience. The use of examples accompanied by page references is a strength of the essay's close reading.

Historical Episodes and Evidentiary Caution

The essay also recalls a controversy concerning the river's course in the colonial period. An account of resistance by the then Maharaja of Darbhanga is presented with reference to the 8 May 1915 issue of Mithila Mihir and to Yogmaya Jha's 'Ganga in Maithili Literature' (p. 20). This reference lends Mithila's attachment to the Ganges a political and cultural dimension. Yet a historical examination would require separate inspection of the original news report, government archives, and records of river projects. The resistance described in the book may be regarded as a lead for research, not a fully authenticated history in its own right.

The Essay's New Meaning in the Light of Environmental Questions

In the final portion, the writer depicts modern pollution of the Ganges, alterations to its flow caused by dams and bridges, and an accompanying image of social and political contamination, asking whether a new hymn to the Ganges is needed. This self-questioning turns a historical survey into a contemporary creative challenge. The metaphor of the river's purity becomes connected with moral questions about social life. The idea is powerful, although the scientific condition of water pollution and moral 'pollution' are different orders of assertion and should be connected only through poetic analogy.

In sum, the essay's achievement is to situate Madhup's poetry within a living and long-standing tradition of devotion to the Ganges. Its possible limitation is the tendency in several places to take the river's cultural glory as the primary premise; alternative religious, social, and environmental perspectives receive less attention. Nevertheless, the closing environmental question gives the entire essay a thought-provoking contemporary relevance.

02 | Harimohan Jha's Narrative Poetry

Original book, printed pp. 27–32

Satire in Verse and Its Narrative Significance

Most readers know Harimohan Jha as a writer of humorous and satirical prose. In this essay, Yoganand Jha brings the narrative dimensions of his verse into focus. He discusses seven narrative poems. Each has its own social target, but all share an impulse to expose, through humour, custom, hypocrisy, and inequalities perpetuated in the name of prestige (pp. 27–32).

The writer's first extended example is 'Dhala Jha'. The elderly bridegroom's journey to his in-laws' house, his clothes and manner, linguistic conceit, anger over food, and demand for money at his departure expose mismatched marriage, the bride's helplessness, and the financial exploitation of wedding customs. The humour arises not only from Dhala Jha's eccentric behaviour but from the contradictions of the social order that honours him. It is especially meaningful that the critic looks beyond the caricature of the elderly groom to the bride's family's vulnerability.

Different Forms, One Social Purpose

The analysis moves from 'Tea Party', a satire of the educated community's blind imitation of foreign fashions, to 'Buchkun Baba', concerning women's changing position; 'Nirasan Mama', concerning food taboos and caste difference; 'Salgamak Khand', concerning superstition; and 'Ghutar Kaka', concerning men's psychological resistance to an educated daughter-in-law. 'Buchkun Baba's Dream' also raises the question of family planning. These examples make clear that Harimohan Jha's humour is not detached from reformist values; narrative becomes an instrument of social education.

In 'Nirasan Mama', someone who preaches rigid religious purity violates the rules of civic courtesy; in 'Salgamak Khand', fear of imaginary impurity turns an ordinary meal into a collective crisis. Such episodes derive their satire from the distance between what characters say and what they do. By explaining this mechanism, the writer supplies grounds for understanding Maithili humour as an intellectual form of social criticism rather than merely pleasant entertainment.

The More Subtle Meaning of the Woman Question

Readings of 'Buchkun Baba' and 'Ghutar Kaka' raise questions of women's education, professional independence, marriages without dowry, and a changing balance of power within the family. The writer presents conservative male characters' responses with comic irony. At a deeper analytical level, one must ask whether the target of the humour is not the educated woman but a mentality of authority frightened by her autonomy. Clarifying that distinction is necessary for a modern feminist reading. The essay's evidence permits such an interpretation, though it leaves room to develop it further.

The Strength of the Criticism and Its Formal Limits

A particular strength of this essay is the clear presentation of narrative episodes. It would have been easy to call Harimohan Jha a 'satirical poet' without substantiation; instead, the writer connects events, characters' speech, and social setting. A fuller comparative study of syllabic weight, metre, dramatic dialogue, narratorial position, and emotional movement from humour to pathos across all seven poems would, however, have sharpened our understanding of the form.

The conclusion is not that Harimohan Jha merely mocks social failings. His narrative verse teaches readers to recognize inequalities that violate humanity and arise from rigid convention. The essay makes an important attempt to add the social history of his poetry to a reputation predominantly centred on his prose.

03 | The Poet as Devoted Practitioner: Upendra Thakur 'Mohan'

Original book, printed pp. 33–46

The Poet's Life and the Available Works

This substantial essay surveys the wider field of Upendra Thakur 'Mohan's poetry. Mentioning his village of Chataria, Sanskrit education, and editorial associations with Aryavarta and Mithila Mihir, the writer describes three collections: Phuldali (1942), Baji Uthal Murali (1977), and Itishri (1982). The book also records that Baji Uthal Murali received the Sahitya Akademi award in 1978 (pp. 33–34). Such historical information helps establish the chronology of the works.

Love, Revolution, and the Other Meaning of Song

By discussing the two divisions of Phuldali, 'Shringarkusum' and 'Krantikusum', the writer identifies two emotional territories of creation. The passion of romantic love and the call for revolution need not be opposed: both possess intense emotional energy. Mohan's songs contain appeals for national regeneration, awakening, youth responsibility, and collective welfare. Discussing his image of the 'navgachhuli' (new sapling), the writer connects reconstruction with nature's vital power. Here musical rhythm and social proclamation reinforce one another.

Mohan's Sanskrit learning influences his metre, rasa, syntax, and inherited symbols; it does not follow that his poetry is withdrawn from contemporary life. The essay examines his responses to social decline, national crisis, ethical responsibility, the suffering of the poor, and the contradictions of modernization. In this sense the poet is a 'sadhak'—not merely a spiritual ascetic but a writer who seeks the values of life through disciplined language.

Fidelity to Metre and the Changes of an Era

The writer emphasizes that Mohan chiefly composed lyrical verse intended for singing. Attention to quantitative and syllabic metres, pauses, terminal rhyme, and the voice of recitation is a lasting feature of his work. Some unmetered compositions reflecting the times are also noted. This raises a fundamental critical question: does innovation necessarily arise from abandoning metre? The evidence of the essay suggests that it does not. Language, symbolism, and social questions can be innovative even where the metre remains traditional.

Evaluating a Poetic Personality

From Mohan's poems, the writer brings out the coexistence of classical cultivation and reformist consciousness. Criticism of social rigidity, hypocrisy, and incongruity, appeals to youth, and hopeful statements are important textual evidence for the assessment. Even so, judging the quality of the verse would have benefited from closer comparative investigation of musical performance, sound patterning, and changes in diction across poems of different periods.

The essay's contribution is to examine Mohan's creative development through three collections rather than merely introducing him as an award-winning poet. Its implicit critical lesson is that poetry cannot be understood by automatically treating traditional form as conservative or new metre as progressive.

04 | Snehalata's Love of Mithila and Maithili

Original book, printed pp. 47–53

Devotion and Attachment to a Cultural Geography

'Snehalata's Love of Mithila and Maithili' is not merely an appreciative reading of devotional verses; it makes Mithila's cultural geography the centre of the poetry. Placing Snehalata within the traditions of devotion to Rama and madhurya-upasana (devotional worship conceived through sweetness and intimacy), the writer discusses works such as Vaidehi Vivah Sankirtan, Vinay Padavali, Sneh Shatak, Sneh Vatika, Jhula Sankirtan, Maheshvani Sangrah, Chetavani Sankirtan, and Sitavataran (pp. 47–49). This introduces both the range of the writer's compositions and the religious-social practices surrounding the poetry.

The Idealization of Mithila in Maithili Devotional Lyrics

In Snehalata's verses Mithila is the land of Janaka and Janaki. Its soil, customs, seasons, language, memories of marriage, and intimate relationships together create an image of sacred homeland. Through cited verses the writer shows that celebration of Mithila involves not simply place names but cultural feeling and linguistic intimacy. Devotional lyrics become the language of regional identity through this form of love for the motherland.

The discussion of a line expressing the feeling 'I shall pass my days gathering greens and leaves' is especially revealing. Even amid poverty it insists upon not abandoning the land of birth. This is a tension between social reality and a devotional ideal. The poet does not present Mithila as wholly prosperous; rather, deprivation cannot persuade him to sever his cultural attachment. Here devout and emotive poetry touches a real social question.

A Sense of Language and Other Linguistic Influences

The writer shows that, although Snehalata drew inspiration from traditions of Hindi Rama devotion, Tulsidas's poetry, and various devotional lyric traditions, the fundamental medium of expression remained Maithili. The relation between acknowledging sources and creatively transforming them in one's own language is not merely imitation but cultural reconstruction. The writer reads lyrics about the sweetness of Maithili as evidence of regional self-respect. Linguistic consciousness does not stand apart from religious devotion; it becomes an intimate part of it.

Room for Critical Debate

The principal tone of the essay is affirmative. The writer's sympathy for Snehalata's devotion, attachment to the mother tongue, and ideal image of Mithila is evident. Yet more could have been said about the classical foundations of madhurya-upasana, intertextual parallels with the Tulsidas tradition, the voices of women, and differences within actual social hierarchies. Verses celebrating Mithila's cultural excellence should be read as a poetic construction of regional ideals, not as an exact picture of society in every period.

Despite this limitation, the essay establishes that, in studying a devotional poet's 'love of Mithila', language is not merely a medium but also a subject. The poet's attachment to the mother tongue and devotion to Sita mutually confer dignity upon one another.

05 | Lyricist Pradeep's 'Swayamprabha'

Original book, printed pp. 54–62

Selecting a Little-Known Episode of the Ramayana

The essay situates Prabhunarayan Jha 'Pradeep's Swayamprabha within the development of Maithili Ramayana poetry and narrative verse. The writer first discusses earlier Maithili traditions of the Rama story—Jyotirishwar, Vidyapati, Chanda Jha, Laldas, and various folk songs. This history aims to show that the Ramayana is not a single unchanging work, but a shared cultural resource acquiring fresh meanings across different periods (pp. 54–57).

Swayamprabha is a character from the Rama narrative whose episode is identified with the Kishkindha Kanda of the Adhyatma Ramayana. The search for Sita, a band of monkeys, a dark cave, thirst, their meeting with the yogini Swayamprabha, and the assistance she provides form the narrative foundation. Pradeep adopts the story, but, according to the critic, his final creative purpose is not merely to repeat an ancient tale.

Modern Social Questions Raised through a Mythological Source

The innovative turn comes when Swayamprabha is called upon to become a luminous force against the plight of women in modern Mithila, the demon of dowry, and oppression within marriage. The mythic yogini thereby becomes an emblem of social resistance. This conjunction of the Ramayana's inherited moral dignity with contemporary women's suffering is a central artistic device of the work. To show the change, the writer compares the older narrative with the poet's imaginative extension (pp. 58–62).

In considering originality, it is essential to distinguish an inherited plot from the distinct artistic act of using it for a modern problem. From this perspective, Swayamprabha is not imitation but reinterpretation. The work deploys a figure of religious authority in the cause of social reform; the effectiveness of that authority for human equality must, however, be evaluated through the character's actual agency.

The Work of Language, Rasa, and Metre

The writer judges the narrative poem's language simple, intelligible, and characterized by the classical quality of clarity known as prasada-guna. He regards the use of Sanskrit-derived words alongside inherited and indigenous forms as evidence of natural Maithili writing. Devotion remains part of the story's background, but does not simply become preaching; it supports the desire to educate the public. Discussing several quantitative metres and terminal rhymes, the writer also identifies some instances of irregular rhythm. This qualification prevents the review from becoming uncritical praise.

Achievement of Form and Outstanding Questions

The essay maps a comparative route from the Ramayana poetic tradition to the modernity of narrative verse. A verse-by-verse comparison between the source text, Pradeep's poem, and possible other Ramayana versions would, however, better establish the boundaries of his innovations. Feminist study could also illuminate the representation of women, Mithila's social reality, and the capacity of its symbolism to sustain resistance.

The essay's lasting significance is its identification of a creative process that connects a mythic source with a modern problem. Swayamprabha's divine 'radiance' becomes, in this sense, a social metaphor for dispelling the darkness of dowry.

06 | Dr Jayamant Mishra's 'Kavita Kusumanjali'

Original book, printed pp. 63–78

Sanskrit Scholarship and Creation in the Mother Tongue

The writer opens this essay by examining the historical relationship between Sanskrit and Maithili literature. Sanskrit scholars writing in Maithili have often been charged with conservatism. Challenging that generalization, he regards Jayamant Mishra's editorial scholarship, classical training, and love for his mother tongue as two expressions of a single intellectual life. Listing Sanskrit works edited by Mishra, he seeks to establish the scholar's commitment to research (pp. 63–66).

From Devotional Cultivation to the Sensibility of the Seasons

Kavita Kusumanjali contains invocations to Saraswati, hymns to Krishna, classical images, songs drawing on ragas, and poems depicting the seasons. The critic suggests comparisons between Mishra's poetry of Krishna's sweetness and the devotional current of Vallabhacharya's Madhurashtakam. This approach seeks originality not only in unprecedented subject matter, but also in a linguistic recreation of previously established devotional feeling.

The poems devoted to six seasons extend the sensuous range of the collection through clouds, summer, autumn, the early and late winter seasons, and spring. References to Nag Panchami, Madhushravani, and Mithila's festivals make the seasons more than natural conditions: they become social time. When the writer discusses a line that raises compassion for people suffering from winter's cold, he reveals the entrance of social sympathy into the personification of nature (pp. 69–72).

The Central Dispute about Innovation

The writer pays special attention to the modern uncertainty suggested by a line such as 'Where am I continually going?' He connects this poetic self to questions of progress, loss of self-awareness, and selfishness in an era. Poetry in classical metres can also express modern doubt, social contradictions, and tensions between individual and collective existence. The essay's principal argument becomes clear here: the history of form must be distinguished from the history of ideas.

Critical Considerations

The writer's argument is strongest where poetic examples are used to re-examine the easy accusation of 'conservatism'. The range of devotion, nature, and social consciousness prevents a one-dimensional interpretation of the book. Still, the chronology of publication, the limits of imitation of Sanskrit verses, actual metrical scansions, and variants of seasonal imagery offer further scope for research. Skill in classical metres and poetic excellence are not identical: each requires its own standard of judgement.

This essay's valuable achievement is its refusal to equate classical cultivation in Maithili with hostility to innovation. The study of Jayamant Mishra's poems thereby becomes a shared field embracing language, scholarship, folk life, and historical consciousness.

07 | Fiction Writer Nagendra Kumar's 'Shyamali'

Original book, printed pp. 79–89

From the Tradition of Fiction to Travel Writing

Although 'fiction writer' appears in the essay's title, the author understands Shyamali primarily as a literary account connected with a journey to Ireland. The opening discusses the development of Maithili fiction, its progression from social reform to realism, and Harimohan Jha's influence. This broad introduction is intended to establish Nagendra Kumar's literary position, although the reader must wait some time before discovering the precise genre of Shyamali (pp. 79–82).

The listing of Nagendra Kumar's story collections Sasarfani, Drishtikon, Shikar, and Falena Jamun, together with Yoganand Jha's disagreement with an earlier critic who denied him the status of an 'original short-story writer', turns the essay into a debate within the history of criticism. The author does not equate influence with imitation. A writer may draw inspiration from another and still be original in experience, presentation, and subject. This is reasonable, though the ultimate evidence would be stronger with direct story-by-story comparisons.

The Distinctive Range of 'Shyamali'

According to the author, Shyamali is a literary record of a visit to Ireland during the writer's stay in England, said to have been published by the Maithili Akademi, Patna, in 1981. He proposes a possible relationship with the Hindi travel narrative Pathchari as a conjecture; it would be improper to treat that possibility as a proven textual connection. The work's social, political, cultural, and educational observations are important to the discourse of travel literature: women's public participation, Irish aspirations for independence, correspondences with India's independence movement, and concerns about the future of the mother tongue (pp. 83–89).

The experience of Ireland leads the writer to question the future of Maithili. Abandoning one's language for another deemed more prestigious, the small readership for literature, and the need to protect one's mother tongue become sharper through comparison with the country visited, not separately from it. One country's experience becomes a means of linguistic self-examination for another. A reading of Shyamali is consequently also a study of self-critical Maithili consciousness within travel writing.

Narrative Style and the Structure of the Account

The critic identifies compact dialogue, rich information, and the power to create scenes as qualities of Shyamali. He also notes that descriptive passages sometimes become excessively long, while arguing that their informative content sustains interest. This judgement exposes the tension between information and aesthetic experience: how much documented detail belongs in travel literature, and how much imaginative reconstruction may a historical account accommodate?

A Balanced Judgement

The essay's strength is its recognition of Shyamali's generic independence beyond its author's established reputation as a fiction writer. Its weakness is that a more detailed analysis was possible of the relations among travel diary, dialogue, memoir, and creative reconstruction. Verifying the historical information about Ireland against independent sources and establishing actual textual parallels with Pathchari would be productive directions for further research.

08 | Mayanand Mishra's Essays

Original book, printed pp. 90–101

The Essayistic Personality of a Fiction Writer

Mayanand Mishra is generally introduced as a writer of stories and novels; here Yoganand Jha retrieves his relatively neglected identity as an essayist. He relates Mayababu's Maithili broadcasts, editorial work, public cultural life, and activities in the literary movement to his prose. The critic observes that the available essays are dispersed among magazines and journals. Organizing them by subject and thereby giving readers the framework of a possible collected volume is a concrete achievement of the essay's research (pp. 90–95).

The Intellectual Concerns of the Critical Essays

The writer considers essays including 'The Condition and Consequences of Maithili Fiction', 'Schools of Thought in Modern Maithili Poetry', 'Modern Maithili Poetry: Driving Forces and Trends', 'Awareness of the Responsibility of Criticism', 'Searching the Ground of Maithili Fiction', and essays on Vidyapati. Mayababu's central concern is with new subject matter, human values, symbols, and techniques of expression. An idea quoted from an early editorial in the magazine Abhivyanjana becomes important evidence of his poetics.

An essay on schools of thought in modern Maithili poetry questions the mechanical adoption of categories from Hindi criticism. Drawing upon Maithili's own experience, Mayababu proposes categories such as maryadavada, sanskritivada, prakritivada, and abhivyanjanavada (pp. 96). Their intellectual significance lies in the ambition to write literary history through concepts grounded in the language's own traditions. Yet without directly examining the boundaries, historical utility, and groupings of writers under these four categories, they should not be accepted as a conclusively proven system.

The Prose of Memoir and Movement

The writer moves beyond literary criticism to examine Mayababu's memoirs, writing on movements, prefaces, and congratulatory prose. 'My Journey on the Stage' combines literary performance spaces, employment, public life, and autobiographical feeling. An essay on the 'Maithili Struggle Campaign' conveys a participant's view of the language movement. 'The Library Movement' proposes redirecting spending on ceremonies towards libraries and publishing infrastructure. In these works, the essay is not simply an aesthetic object but a practical instrument of the linguistic public sphere (pp. 98–100).

Discussing an essay commemorating a political figure of Mithila, the critic notes figurative language, energetic sentences, and praise of a historical individual. The critic's responsibility here also includes distinguishing encomium from authenticated history. Yoganand Jha gives appropriate place to the prose's aesthetic qualities, but the need for critical distance in judging a person remains.

A list of essays containing references to their journals, years, and pages could form the basis for future textual editing. The writer himself calls for a comprehensive collection of Mayababu's scattered essays. This demand is extremely important for scholarship: without the original essays, the history of the fiction writer's intellectual development will remain incomplete.

The essay's strength is its refusal to neglect a supposedly 'minor' genre and its connection of the writing to the author's intellectual and social activities. Its limitation is that the predominantly affirmative statements call for more textual criticism of weaknesses in reasoning, inner contradictions, repetition, and linguistic change. Nevertheless, the essay provides a solid beginning for collecting and classifying the materials of the Maithili essay tradition.

09 | Social Philosophy in Viditji's 'Gram-Ganarajya'

Original book, printed pp. 102–136

The Novel between Realism and Idealism

The essay on Gram-Ganarajya is the longest in the collection's prose division. The critic begins by distinguishing realism's unvarnished observation of society from idealism's ethical aspirations. Vidyanath Jha 'Vidit's novel is placed among works that expose Mithila's shortcomings without reservation while ultimately seeking possibilities for public welfare. According to the critic, Gram-Ganarajya is Viditji's fifteenth novel, published in January 2013; the earlier course of his novel-writing is also described (pp. 102–104).

The Creative Arrangement of Seventeen 'Ullas'

The novel's seventeen divisions are called 'ullas'. The first three establish the main plot and the basis for the journey. In subsequent episodes, various living souls observe and experience Mithila's society; the seventeenth and final ullas moves towards a synthesis of these experiences (pp. 104–107). The writer analyses this extensive structure in sequence. Each ullas becomes at once an independent episode, a social case study, and a piece of the larger picture of Mithila.

The use of an outsider's perspective for society's self-examination is an important narrative device. Through the experiences of souls associated with Arunachal, Kinnaur, Kerala, Punjab, Kashmir, Bengal, and other regions, Mithila's everyday life is measured against life elsewhere. Travel and dialogue become tools for listing social maladies. Yet whenever exposition of ideas takes precedence over the movement of the plot, the novel risks turning essayistic. The tension between literary form and social instruction is therefore a central critical question.

Women, Family, and Social Resistance

The discussion of the fourth ullas recounts women creating arrangements for shelter, conversation, and reconciliation for other women estranged from their families. This episode makes domestic anger, insult, and impulses towards self-destruction matters for collective resolution. The fifth ullas discusses contradictions arising from marriage arrangements and dowry. An important possibility here is to read women's dignity as a matter of social justice and independent life rather than confining it within the family's code of honour.

Some episodes praise educated or active women. Even so, it would not suffice to limit women's concerns to restoring harmony at home. Social security, freedom in decision-making, and control over economic resources are implicitly raised; examining all three more fully would clarify the strengths and limits of the novel's social philosophy.

'Budbak Hotel': Business, Advertising, and Irony

In the sixth ullas, the story of Vaikuntha's 'Budbak Hotel' becomes a particularly pointed satirical image. His earlier period as a driver, meeting the celebrated dancer Mallika, starting a business, naming the hotel, growing competition, dividing the hotel among his sons, and attracting customers through advertising reflect a changing economic world. Around pages 114–118, the critic considers the story in relation to entrepreneurship, commercial ingenuity, capital investment, and the influence of publicity in Mithila.

The transformation of 'budbak', a term of disparagement, into a commercial brand is interesting from the perspective of sociolinguistics. A comic name acquires market value. Further analysis could raise questions about the worth of labour, informal employment, and the changing ethics of an advertising-driven society.

Migration, Consumerism, and Communal Divisions

Later ullas depict the exploitation of migrant workers, the departure of young people from Mithila, religious pretension, administrative malpractice, consumerist lifestyles, selfishness within families, caste divisions, and political greed. At suitable points, the critic recalls Mithila's ancient learning, Udayanacharya, Kumarila Bhatta, Vachaspati Mishra, and the figures of Janaka and Sita. This becomes a moral measure against which present failings are judged; nevertheless, celebrating past glory cannot substitute for practical solutions to contemporary problems.

The dignity of labour is an important thread in the novel. The writer connects Janaka's discovery of Sita with the ethical worth of agricultural work. The underlying sentiment is that Mithila should stand upon its own labour rather than anyone else's favour. The need to abandon self-interest, inertia, false prestige, and inactivity for collective progress is emphasized in different episodes.

The Mother Tongue and the Ideal of a Village Republic

Towards the ending, caste, religion, varna, jealousy, false pride, deception, wastefulness, and lack of fellow-feeling are depicted as constraints upon Mithila's future. In the critic's conclusion, the development of Maithili language and literature and social harmony define the novel's horizon of possible solutions (pp. 132–136). This binds its multifaceted narrative world into a cultural and moral proposal.

A critical question is essential here: will the advancement of the mother tongue alone eliminate social and economic injustice? Language is certainly the basis for collective self-respect and communication, but land, employment, education, caste power, and government accountability have institutional dimensions of their own. Debate is needed about how closely the novel connects love of language to political and economic programmes.

Evaluating the Long Essay

The writer recounts the plot of each ullas at length, enabling readers who have not read the novel to gain an extensive understanding of its social episodes. This is useful, but descriptive detail sometimes pushes the critical argument into the background. The review could have been more analytical through independent discussion of novelistic time, narrator, characterization, the naturalness of dialogue, registers of language, the credibility of the final ideal as literature, and formal discipline in managing the novel's length.

Nevertheless, the essay can be regarded as an important exercise in Mithila's self-criticism. The critic reads Gram-Ganarajya as something like a moral X-ray of Mithila's society; the most important lesson is that attachment to one's region does not require silence about its failings.

10 | Acharya 'Suman's Daily Newspaper 'Swadesh'

Original book, printed pp. 137–147

A Significant Episode in the History of Maithili Daily Newspapers

This essay shifts from evaluating literary figures to the institutional history of journalism. Discussing the scarce tradition of daily newspapers in Maithili, Yoganand Jha regards Acharya Surendra Jha 'Suman's Swadesh as a courageous experiment in the public potential of the mother tongue. The writer's comments on contemporary Maithili dailies belong to the period in which the original essay was composed; they cannot be treated as a complete list of newspapers operating in 2026 (p. 137).

The First Experiment: Language Consciousness and News for the Public

The book gives examples from Swadesh issues of 1955, including editorials, poems, local notices, and satirical columns. The first run is said to have ceased on 27 December 1955. Details of the prices of goods in Darbhanga markets, railway timings, sports, cinema news, literary comment, and public information demonstrate that Swadesh was not merely a literary magazine: it was an experiment in the full circulation of information about civic life in Maithili (pp. 138–141).

The newspaper's satirical writing is especially notable. Through village speech, proverbs, familiar turns of phrase, and comic characters it developed Maithili's possibilities as a 'newspaper language'. The writer rightly observes that standardization means more than producing Sanskritized editorials; it also involves giving ordinary people's speech a dignified public printed form. Vernacular language and popular journalism thereby develop one another.

The Second Experiment: The Question of Economic Foundations

The latter part discusses attempts to revive Swadesh. It considers the efforts of the 'Swadesh Goshti', appeals for editorial support, the impact of financial obstacles on the paper's size and regularity, the printing operation, workers, and difficulties of distribution. By noting missing editorials and irregularity in some issues, the writer goes beyond celebrating the newspaper's emotional significance to investigate the causes of its institutional weakness (pp. 142–147).

Columns devoted to public opinion, local affairs, world affairs, satire, and discussion of ideas created a many-sided newspaper. The various titles of Chandranath Mishra 'Amar's satirical column and the works of Maithili writers published in it made the newspaper a shared intellectual meeting place. References to first or earlier appearances of writers' work are significant for future literary history, although precise chronology should be established by collating the original issues.

A Methodological Contribution

The essay's distinctive achievement is to reconstruct the linguistic and public functions of the newspaper from descriptions of its printed contents. Being a 'daily' is understood not simply as appearing every day but as representing everyday social consciousness in the mother tongue. In the writer's view, Swadesh left a legacy, but the absence of strong financial institutions prevented its permanence. This conclusion calls attention to the difference between literary endeavour and the infrastructure of journalism.

Further research would require a systematic inventory of all surviving issues, publication dates, distribution areas, editorial responsibilities, letters from readers, advertisements, and payments to contributors. Without these details, assessments of its social reach must remain cautious. Even so, the essay on Swadesh is an important introductory and critical source for researching public journalism in Maithili.

II | Linguistic Study of Maithili and Subhadra Jha

Original book, printed pp. 148–154

The Question of a Language's Structural Independence

The essay centres on Dr Subhadra Jha's linguistic scholarship, particularly The Formation of the Maithili Language. It presents the work as an intellectual attempt to establish Maithili's independent status through concrete analysis of sounds, forms, vocabulary, grammatical categories, and linguistic relationships, rather than merely through emotional identification. The writer relies on Subhadra Jha's classifications of the languages of his time and views expressed in English (pp. 148–150).

Language Families and Comparison

According to the critic, Subhadra Jha compares the geographical range, dialects, early records, scripts, and development of Maithili with Bhojpuri, Magahi, Bengali, Assamese, Odia, Nepali, and other languages. The essential question is which features derive from shared historical origins and which display Maithili's distinct grammatical organization. Political naming and structural classification proceed through different forms of reasoning in linguistics. The cited position is important because Maithili's distinctness is argued from its linguistic morphology.

Historical language classifications have changed over time. An earlier scheme cannot therefore be presented as the final consensus of modern linguistics. The essay's achievement lies in setting out and evaluating Subhadra Jha's arguments, not in declaring the present standing of every historical classification.

Word Formation and the Question of Suffixes

The writer takes particular interest in Subhadra Jha's morphological examples: the historical development of endings such as 'thi', 'auti', and 'auri', comparisons with alleged bases including kastha, pattika, and vatika, and the introduction of prefixes such as 'be-', 'bad-', and 'hed-' as examples of language contact (pp. 150–151). Two levels must be distinguished: the present use of forms in Maithili is a directly observable linguistic fact, while their ancient derivations are separate historical hypotheses requiring regular sound correspondences and evidence from older texts.

Subhadra Jha's discussion of diminutive, augmentative, and highest-degree nominal forms demonstrates Maithili's morphological richness. Their use is affected by context, respect, size, intimacy, and dialectal variation; one form should not be presumed to apply obligatorily to every noun. The critic notes Subhadra Jha's own caution. Grammatical examples in this chapter thus become evidence of Maithili society's linguistic life, rather than merely lists of word classes.

Criticizing the 'Sanskrit Mould'

The latter part criticizes attempts to force Maithili grammar into the structure of Sanskrit or Hindi grammar. Linguistic analysis should begin with actual usage, not predetermined classical categories—this is a compelling conclusion of the section. It remains highly relevant because language teaching, lexicography, spelling guides, and computational language resources all need to respect the source language's distinctive practices.

Critical Assessment and Future Directions

The writer connects structural linguistic independence with cultural self-respect. A limitation is that this brief essay cannot fully examine comparative phonological tables, complete paradigms of verbs, actual regional dialect data, or competing etymological theories. It should therefore be treated as an evidential introduction to Subhadra Jha's contribution, not as a comprehensive modern reassessment of his linguistics.

The methodological requirement raised here retains its force: Maithili must be understood through its own actual sounds, forms, sentences, and social usage.

12 | Jayakant Mishra's Contribution to the Development of Maithili Literature

Original book, printed pp. 155–166

From Literary History to Active Language Advocacy

The essay on Dr Jayakant Mishra combines literary history, research, and public activism. The writer discusses Mishra's education, university research, attempts to write a history of Maithili literature, and links with literary institutions. The English-language A History of Maithili Literature is judged important because it enabled the antiquity, continuity, and range of Maithili literature to reach an international scholarly audience (pp. 155–160).

Gathering Sources and the Practical Labour of Literary Historiography

Literary history is understood not as a list of poets but as the collective intellectual labour of locating records, identifying texts, determining chronology, understanding linguistic change, and classifying currents of literature. The writer recalls earlier attempts at literary historiography and regards Jayakant Mishra's work as more integrated, comparative, and fully referenced. This judgement requires care: although Mishra's work is rated highly, an exhaustive comparison with the whole field of literary history would be a substantial separate undertaking.

The discussion of Mishra's use of English for literary history also touches cultural politics. English can introduce Maithili to international academic conversations, but intellectual vocabulary must also develop within the mother tongue. Out of this tension emerges a two-level strategy: reach readers outside the community while cultivating a reading culture within it.

Maithili's Position within Indian Literary Institutions

The critic attributes particular importance to Jayakant Mishra's correspondence, arguments, and public work for recognition of Maithili in Indian literary institutions. The original essay mentions the Sahitya Akademi's recognition of Maithili in 1965 and quotes views attributed to Jawaharlal Nehru (pp. 163–165). These are significant leads for the institutional history of Maithili, but reconstructing the full history of official decisions would require independent inspection of the Akademi's original records, letters, and other activists' contributions. The critic himself raises the question of crediting a collective movement to one individual; that methodological caution is welcome.

Education, Social Initiatives, and Linguistic Dignity

The essay refers to using Maithili in primary education, the Maithili Mahila Vidyapith, an All India Radio station, and different aspects of the language movement. Jayakant Mishra thus emerges not only as a scholar in a library but also as a social worker beyond it. A mother tongue's dignity is realized in education, publication, communication, and administrative life—a message repeatedly present in the essay.

Critical Balance

The essay is valuable for connecting an intellectual biography with institutional history. Yet levels of evidence must be kept separate when discussing an individual's dedication, the collective achievements of a movement, and the causes of state decisions. The writer's admiration is often grounded in genuine achievements; examining opposing positions, other major campaigners of the period, and institutional documents would nevertheless produce a more varied perspective.

Even so, this assessment clarifies that the modern development of Maithili literature is not only the history of producing literary works; it is also the history of building a knowledge system and gaining public recognition for the language.

13 | 'Sajivani Criticism': Ramdev Jha

Original book, printed pp. 167–208

A Distinctive Metaphorical Conception of Criticism

The book's longest essay, 'Sajivani Criticism: Ramdev Jha', introduces Dr Ramdev Jha's personality, literary work, rediscovery and editing of older Maithili texts, engagement with classical criticism, and research-based criticism centred on writers. The critic identifies a method in which the writer's life, contemporary circumstances, archives, manuscripts, bibliography, and the work's beauty illuminate one another. 'Sajivani' means more than biography; it means revitalizing textual interpretation through the circumstances of lived experience (pp. 167–169).

Dr Ramdev Jha died on 18 March 2021, and the book is dedicated to his memory. The writer's personal gratitude shapes the essay's voice, giving the appraisal a clear element of affection. Such closeness can supply valuable research knowledge, but a critical judgement also requires some distance from it.

Rediscovery and Editing of Older Texts

The writer describes Ramdev Jha's editions and publications of older song and dramatic works, including Nandipati Gitimala, Ramvijay Nat, Hargauri Vivah, Kunjvihar, Dashavatar Nrityam, Shodashgitam, and Mudit Kuvalayashva. This labour has profound historical utility: preparing reliable copies of texts, determining authorship, identifying relationships between manuscripts, and understanding the actual shape of dramatic traditions are foundations of literary history. Knowledge advances through discovering the original materials themselves, not merely through broad critical conclusions.

Shankardev and Relations between Assam and Mithila

The discussion of Shankardev of Assam reviews Ramdev Jha's interpretations in his introduction to Ramvijay. It examines the Vaishnava religious movement, ankiya drama, linguistic forms mixed with Maithili, and connections between Assam and Mithila's dramatic traditions (pp. 170–172).

These relations raise questions of literature's movement across boundaries. Linguistic mixing should be understood not as 'corruption' but as evidence of historical creative contact.

Nevertheless, the classification of Assamese, Brajabuli, and dramatic languages containing Maithili elements is a complex historical problem. Claims would become more securely evidenced by examining older texts, local traditions, and modern linguistic arguments separately. The critic's discussion provides a useful point of entry.

Jagajjyotirmalla's Works and Their Authorship

The discussion of Ramdev Jha's research on Jagajjyotirmalla's dramatic songs is particularly noteworthy. Examining an earlier attribution of Mudit Kuvalayashva to Vanshamani, Ramdev Jha is said to have reinterpreted a phrase in the play's prologue and identified its author (pp. 173–175). This is an example of text-centred historical reasoning. Authorship cannot be determined simply by seeing a name: the prologue, stage-manager's words, other passages, and evidence from related works must be compared.

The discussion of acts, jamanika, prologue, rasa arrangement, entrances, and performance technique on classical principles shows Ramdev Jha's breadth of critical learning. Yoganand Jha joins the application of classical theory to historiography; the result is criticism of artistic practice, not mere description.

Jagatprakashamalla and the Classification of Dramatic Songs

The essay discusses Jagatprakashamalla's songs, plays, sources, arrangement of rasas, and classifications of song forms (pp. 177–180). It pays attention to Ramdev Jha's distinctions, especially those between dramatic songs and independent lyrical songs, and to the territories of erotic and devotional feeling. This shows the importance of looking at literary history through music, performance, and poetic form. A complete assessment of lyrics from their printed words alone is difficult; knowledge of performance traditions, raga contexts, and surviving musical practices would enrich the study.

Nandipati and Dating through Genealogies

In criticism concerning Nandipati, the author describes testing previously accepted lines of descent by using genealogical references in theatrical prologues and panji genealogical records (pp. 181–183). Here the critic's task extends beyond aesthetic judgement to interpreting records that serve as historical evidence. Nevertheless, panji registers, genealogies, literary prologues, and historical chronology do not always agree. The character of the evidence, possible copying errors, and the recurrence of similar names must always be considered.

Jivan Jha: A Transition in the Theatre

Discussion of the poet Jivan Jha's plays forms another important section of the long essay. Ramdev Jha's conclusions concern the decline of kirtaniya theatre, the spread of Parsi theatre, staging of Ramlila, and the changed structures of Maithili drama (pp. 184–190). The cultural place of the Janakpur lila and Maithili as the spoken language of Ramlila supply context for Sitaparinay. Distinguishing a purported source from an original work requires consideration of plot, characters, division into acts, and language.

Re-examination of earlier opinions on the originality of Jivan Jha's Samavati Punarjanma, together with the search for missing portions of Maithili sattak works, highlights the institutional importance of textual preservation. The episode shows that an author's standing in literary history may change repeatedly as newly available texts require earlier judgements to be revised.

Janardan Jha 'Jansidan' and the Beginnings of Modern Fiction

The writer discusses at length Ramdev Jha's biographical criticism of Janardan Jha. A reconstruction of the author's life draws upon family testimony, self-description, information from sons and grandsons, and literary works. Arguments for identifying Tarak Vaidhavya as an early modern short story are said to be supported by analysis of plot, characters, dialogue, setting, and conclusion (pp. 193–200).

A term such as 'first story' carries considerable historical weight. Dates, journal issues, other obscure earlier works, and formal features of the texts must therefore be checked. The essay explains Ramdev Jha's arguments, but their claim to priority should not be treated as the final historical verdict without direct examination of other possible early stories.

Sitaram Jha and a Systematic Classification of Poetry

The discussion of Sitaram Jha examines the usefulness of Ramdev Jha's division of poetry into muktak (independent lyrics), descriptive or narrative verse, and extended organized poetic compositions (pp. 201–203). Identifying the appropriate formal category for a work distinguishes literary criticism from general praise of its author. Discussion of Ambcharit, maternal devotion, and devotional poetic feeling adds to the importance of the classification.

Subhadra Jha and Rigorous Standards of Editing

The latter part of this extended essay considers Ramdev Jha's criticism of Subhadra Jha. The judgements on linguistic works, discussions of grammar, collections of Vidyapati's songs, textual emendation, and the purposes and outcomes of editing are mixed. Some publications are regarded as especially important, while the editorial method or objective of others is questioned. Divergent assessments of emendation in Songs of Vidyapati and the usefulness of Vidyapati Git Sangrah (pp. 204–208) show that even criticism written with affection can sustain disagreement.

A Critical Evaluation of the Whole Essay

The significance of this long study lies in its extensive vision. Through Ramdev Jha's research alone, it connects Assam, Nepal, Mithila, medieval drama, poetry, grammar, folklore, editorial scholarship, and literary history. The author frequently compares original quotations, genealogical evidence, and earlier judgements. The preface's idea of the critic as a bridge is more clearly put into practice here than in many other essays.

The limitations of this expansive discussion deserve equal consideration. The writer endorses many of Ramdev Jha's conclusions, but this single essay does not independently recompare opposing positions, manuscript variants, and modern external research across every disputed question. At some points the lengthy presentation follows the chapters of quoted biographies more closely than it develops comparative theoretical analysis. Nevertheless, the essay is highly useful for understanding 'sajivani criticism' in Maithili: its principal achievement is a confluence of history, textual scholarship, and aesthetic judgement.

14 | Maithili Folk-Ballad Research and Manipadma

Original book, printed pp. 209–224

The Distinctive Genre of the Folk Ballad

In the concluding essay the writer regards the folk ballad as the epic form of folk literature. Singability, expansive narratives, popular heroes, collective memory, social struggles, and the honour accorded to caste-associated folk deities distinguish the form. Even without the uniform metrical organization of the classical epic, the sung rhythms of folk ballads give them a living form. Unlike a fixed written composition, a ballad changes with its singer, period, locality, and listening community (pp. 209–211).

References to the ballads of Salhes, Lorik, Dina-Bhadri, Karikh, Dulara Dayal, Raiya Ranpal, Naika Banijara, Shyamsingh, Gopichand, Ganinath-Govind, Beniram, and other heroes reveal the genre's spread across Mithila's diverse castes and communities. The critic distinguishes a segment of one character's life from a large collective narrative, thereby exploring a possible difference between 'folk ballad' and 'ballad song'. This is a useful beginning to classification, but living performance traditions yield multiple forms of a story; rigid, permanent boundaries should not be imposed on them.

The History of Written Records and Field Investigation

The writer introduces references to folk dance and song in the Varnaratnakara, Grierson's collection of Salhes material, the efforts of later researchers, and the history of publishing various ballads. The difficulties of gathering primary records are especially apparent. When songs from oral traditions are put into writing, much may be lost: a singer's pronunciation, melodic modes, alterations of the story, the social occasion of performance, and listeners' reactions. Consequently, a printed text alone cannot establish the complete meaning of a folk ballad.

The author names contributions by Mahendra Narayan Ram, Phulo Paswan, Rambharos Kapari 'Bhramar', Tarakant Mishra, Vishweshwar Mishra, and other investigators. Some are valued for collecting original texts, others for literary interpretation or classification (pp. 213–218). The account suggests a developing tradition of folk-ballad scholarship. It is an introduction to different scholars' contributions, not an exhaustive bibliography or a definitive accounting of unauthenticated manuscripts.

The Distinctiveness of Manipadma's Work

The discussion of Manipadma is the essay's decisive stage. According to the author, Manipadma takes the subjects of folk ballads, their characters' worlds, social practices, and distinctive vernacular speech seriously. Using oral material as a foundation, responding to its rasa, and drawing on literary imagination, he creates new works in established literary forms such as narrative fiction, novels, and essays (pp. 219–223). His achievement lies in establishing a dialogue between folk and formally cultivated literature.

This transformation is both a success and a problem. Readers encounter a literary writer's version instead of a singer's orally transmitted performance, thereby widening the hero's popularity. But there is an increased danger that the oral form of the original ballad, regional variants, and the social setting of performance will disappear from view. The critic identifies the tension effectively: Manipadma's literary presentation is valuable, but cannot be substituted for an incontrovertible original text of a folk ballad.

Collection versus Creative Reworking

The essay's sharpest critical question asks whether a researcher preserves the original folk ballad or transforms it through a personal literary method. Both activities are useful, but their aims differ. Collection requires documentation of the place and date of performance, the singer's identity, dialect, sound recording, occasion of singing, narrative variants, and textual differences. Creative reworking gives priority to the author's imagination and aesthetic sense. Forgetting the distinction would allow sources for folk history and works of imaginative literature to replace one another.

While praising Manipadma highly, the critic acknowledges the rarity of original ballad texts and the difficulty of publishing research materials. The final essay is therefore more than a tribute: it proposes a concrete programme for folkloric scholarship. Unless original forms of collected ballads are published, regional variants compared, and linguistic forms preserved, future generations may lose historical evidence of folk life.

Caste-Associated Folk Deities and a Shared Maithili World

The popularity of heroes such as Salhes and Dina-Bhadri is tied to the memories of different caste communities. The writer emphasizes the folk ballad's capacity to construct collective identities. This is an important social fact; nevertheless, conclusions about 'caste harmony' must be accompanied by separate study of unequal social positions, resistance, and conflict. Folk ballads can express not only harmony but also popular memories of resistance to oppression.

Overall Assessment

It is meaningful that this essay closes the book. The opening essay considered the cultural veneration of a river; the last appeals for the preservation of linguistic and cultural memory surviving in the people's voices. The collection completes its research cycle by moving from historical objects to living oral traditions. The strongest aspect of the evaluation of Manipadma is its distinction between creative talent and the authenticity of primary sources. In folklore research, that distinction remains a useful standard for future studies.

Integrated Critical Conclusions

1. Research Tendencies Shared by the Fourteen Essays

The fourteen essays address different subjects, but share a deep unity: preserving Maithili's literary knowledge and resources and using them to foster social change, linguistic self-respect, and aesthetic awareness. In the first six, preservation and modernity, devotion and social reform, classical metre and contemporary feeling repeatedly confront each other. The prose division uses travel, essays, and the novel as vehicles for a social philosophy of Mithila. The final five essays focus on the structures of modern literary institutions.

From this perspective, calling Chaturdash Sutra merely an occasional collection of reviews would diminish its diverse intellectual purposes. It embodies a specific critical outlook in which literary beauty cannot be detached from society; nor does the development of a language depend solely on the achievements of distinguished poets, but also on journalism, linguistic research, textual editing, schools, libraries, and safeguarding popular knowledge.

2. The Real Tension between Tradition and Innovation

Discussions of hymns to the Ganges and poetry by Snehalata, Pradeep, Mohan, and Jayamant Mishra disclose a strong traditional inheritance. Yet the critic does not simply praise the repetition of tradition. Opposition to dowry in Swayamprabha, satire on mismatched marriage and food taboos in Harimohan Jha, national responsibility in Mohan, uncertainties of an era in Jayamant Mishra, and environmental questions at the end of the essay on Ganga hymns all show that old forms can hold new social meanings. The insistence on judging formal modernity separately from modernity of ideas is one of the collection's major critical achievements.

3. The Strength and Limits of Literary Social Philosophy

Essays on Harimohan Jha, Pradeep, Mayanand Mishra, and Viditji present varied pictures of social problems. The commercialization of marriage, women's unequal status, superstition, caste prejudice, migration, linguistic inferiority, and economic inactivity all emerge in literary texts. The critic frequently advocates social reform. There is, however, a substantial difference between moral instruction and actual institutional transformation. Condemning a problem in poetry and resolving it in society are different acts; literary influence must be evaluated with that distinction in mind.

At times, the critic's affection limits the force of dissent. Assessments of saintly poets or heroes of the language movement devote more attention to praise than to alternative readings of class, caste, gender, economic power, and institutional failures. Yet much of the evidence he himself supplies is sufficient to generate such questions. The book therefore ought to be read not as an opinion to be accepted unconditionally but as an invitation to extend discussion.

4. 'Sajivani Criticism' and Respect for Sources

The essay on Ramdev Jha becomes the principal image of the book's philosophy of criticism. It brings together works, authors, surroundings, rediscovered older texts, and historical controversies. The linguistic essay on Subhadra Jha and the folk-ballad essay on Manipadma support the principle from different directions: criticism cannot detach literature from its language, records, and living tradition.

Yet the intimacy of biography and the impartiality of research are not always the same. Recollections, family testimony, classical quotations, old manuscripts, and decisions by later historians belong to distinct levels of evidence. Future textual criticism must make these distinctions explicit. The book gains importance wherever it engages with evidence; when it does not examine counterevidence, some avenues of research remain open.

5. Journalism, Language, and Folklore: The Maithili Public Sphere

The journalism of Swadesh, Subhadra Jha's morphology, Jayakant Mishra's literary history, and Manipadma's folklore studies may be regarded as four foundations of a linguistic public sphere, rather than separate minor subjects. Swadesh turns Maithili into a language of daily news; linguistics reveals its distinct structure; literary historiography gives it a memory across time; and folk ballads constitute a storehouse of communities' informal knowledge. This fourfold framework brings forward the collection's deepest intellectual proposition: a language grows rich when, alongside works of literature, it possesses the means to study, communicate, teach, and preserve popular memory.

6. Language, References, and Editorial Examination

The author writes Maithili criticism using Sanskrit-derived scholarly vocabulary, long sentences, an inherited structure of 'explication–analysis–evaluation', and regular quotations from the primary works. This style functions naturally in discussions of classical poetics; clear accounts of plots and examples from ordinary speech make it more accessible in prose and folklore criticism. Occasionally, however, extended lists of names or narrative summaries obscure the main critical question. In those places subheadings, tables of evidence, lists of primary sources, and comparative conclusions would prove more useful.

The publication information for Chaturdash Sutra gives a price of 300 rupees, while the back cover displays 400 rupees. This difference in the printed prices deserves notice in bibliographic records. The available publication details do not establish why it occurred.

7. Practical Directions for Further Research

Several concrete lines of work emerge if Chaturdash Sutra is to be made still more useful for future research. Poetry requires critical editing of the original verses, comparison of textual variants, and systematic metrical analysis. Prose research would benefit from book-by-book examination of the possible relationship between Shyamali and Pathchari and analysis of the narrative construction of all seventeen ullas of Gram-Ganarajya against contemporary social data. Digitally archiving Mayanand Mishra's scattered essays, the original issues of Swadesh, and the rare dramatic songs edited by Ramdev Jha would be especially valuable. Folk-ballad scholarship should preserve audio recordings, locations, performance dates, performers' identities, textual variations, and distinct editions of literary recreations.

These suggestions are presented as research possibilities arising from the reading of the original work, not as claims that the investigations have already been carried out in this study.

Final Assessment

The greatest achievement of Chaturdash Sutra lies in treating Maithili not merely as an emotionally cherished mother tongue but as a vast field of literary genres, social criticism, scientific linguistic inquiry, institutional literary history, and orally transmitted popular knowledge. The writer seeks dialogue, not hostility, between old and new. By discovering social meanings in inherited poetry, recognizing moral conflicts in modern prose fiction, and posing practical questions of linguistic preservation, the collection demonstrates the wide potential of criticism.

Its accomplishments must be considered alongside its critical limitations. Sweeping historical assertions, appreciative judgements on individuals, and indirect references to sources do not all possess the same evidentiary force. In some essays extended narrative summary occupies space that might have been devoted to analysis. Rather than treating the book as a final, unquestionable history, it is fairer to recognize it as a source-rich critical work that poses a wide range of questions.

Overall, Dr Yoganand Jha's collection can be described as an extensive map of Maithili literary research. Read separately, the fourteen essays reveal the significance of individual works; read together, they disclose the internal unity of texts, evidence, society, history, and folk tradition within Maithili language and literature. That unity—and the differences concealed within it —constitute the book's enduring critical value.

Basis of the Book's Study

Bibliography

Principal Works Reviewed

01. Jha, Yoganand. Lokjivan o Loksahitya [Folk Life and Folk Literature]. First edition 1986; second edition 2018. Shekhar Prakashan, Patna.

02. Jha, Ramdev (editor); Jha, Yoganand (assistant editor). Sankalp, Issue 5: Souvenir of the Vidyapati Memorial Festival. Festival of 1988; event held 4–6 February 1989. Sankalplok, Laheriasarai, Darbhanga.

03. Jha, Yoganand. Alekh Sanchayan [A Collection of Essays]. First edition 2002. Mithila Research Society, Kabilpur–Laheriasarai, Darbhanga.

04. Jha, Yoganand (editor). Maithili Shakta Sahitya [Maithili Shakta Literature: Classical Songs to the Goddess]. Second edition 2002. Urvashi Prakashan, Patna.

05. Jha, Yoganand. Maithili Patrakarita ke Sau Varsh [One Hundred Years of Maithili Journalism]. First edition 2006.

06. Jha, Yoganand (compiler and editor). Gahbar Git [Gahbar Songs]. First edition 2007. Mithila Research Society, Kabilpur–Laheriasarai, Darbhanga.

07. Jha, Yoganand. Lok, Sahitya o Shabd-Sampada [Folk Life, Literature, and the Wealth of Words]. First edition 2007; second edition (paperback) 2024. Shashi Prakashan, Supaul. ISBN 978-93-92691-35-5.

08. Jha, Yoganand. Maithilik Paramparik Jatiya Vyavasayik Shabdavali [Vocabulary of Traditional Caste-Associated Occupations in Maithili]. First edition 2009. Mithila Research Society, Darbhanga.

09. Jha, Yoganand. Katha–Lokkatha [Stories and Folktales]. First edition 2010. Mithila Research Society, Kabilpur–Laheriasarai, Darbhanga.

10. Thakur, Kapildev 'Snehalata' (original poet); Jha, Yoganand (compiler and editor). Sitavataran [The Descent of Sita] (narrative poem). First edition 2011. Lok Kala Sanskriti Sansthan, Videhanagar–Darori, Samastipur.

11. Gandhi, Mohandas Karamchand (original author); Jha, Yoganand (Maithili translator). Mangal-Prabhat [An Auspicious Morning]. First edition 2013. Mithila Research Society, Darbhanga.

12. Kirtivardhan, A. (original Hindi author); Jha, Yoganand (Maithili translator). Bhore-Bhor [Early in the Morning]. First edition 2014. Vidyalakshmi Prakashan, Muzaffarnagar.

13. Jha, Yoganand. Chaturdash Sutra [Fourteen Critical Threads]. First edition 2023. Shashi Prakashan, Supaul. ISBN 978-93-92691-34-8.

Related Printed Works

01. Mishra, Chandranath 'Amar'. Maithili Patrakaritak Itihas [A History of Maithili Journalism]. 1981. Maithili Akademi, Patna.

02. Gandhi, M. K. From Yeravda Mandir: Ashram Observances. Translated from Gujarati by Valji Govindji Desai. 1932. Navajivan Trust, Ahmedabad.

03. Jha, Pankaj. A Political History of Literature: Vidyapati and the Fifteenth Century. Oxford University Press, New Delhi, 2019. Print ISBN 9780199489558.

04. Hemachandra. The Deśīnāmamālā of Hemachandra. Second edition, edited by R. Pischel; introduction and glossary by P. V. Ramanujaswami. Bhandarkar Oriental Research Institute, Poona, 1938.

The name of the publisher of the 2006 edition of Maithili Patrakarita ke Sau Varsh could not be conclusively established from the available publication details; an unverified publisher's name has therefore not been added.

STUDY 02 / NIT NAVAL

Lalita Jha

An Overview of the Work

Dr Lalita Jha's Maithilik Bhojan Sambandhi Shabdavali treats Maithili food practices not merely as a catalogue of dishes or cooking methods, but as a distinct field of linguistic, cultural, literary and historical inquiry. Its principal contribution lies in explaining not only the meanings of numerous words still current in domestic life, but also the objects they designate, their forms, processes, uses, contexts and changing variants. The work thus occupies the intersection of lexicography, the study of folk culture and linguistics.

The present study considers separately the book's introduction to its subject, all twelve chapters, its conclusion and both appendices. The first three chapters establish the historical and social background of food; Chapters Four to Six examine literary evidence; Chapters Seven to Nine explore the vocabulary of actual vernacular usage; and the final three chapters examine phonology, word formation and the system of affixes. This critical account reconstructs the argument of each chapter; it does not reproduce the complete word lists of the original book.

The work's most original feature is its fine-grained lexical differentiation of implements, ingredients and the operations involved in preparing and consuming food. Words such as kāṡ/kāśā, pīṛhī, sūp, arbā/usinā, khakharī and niraiṭh demonstrate how richly Maithili differentiates meanings according to the object, its condition, its purpose and the action involved. In the literary sections, the history of eating utensils, foodstuffs, social relations and proverbs emerges through interwoven strands of evidence.

The critical conclusion is that the preservation of regional food vocabulary requires new documentation of original pronunciation, local variants, contexts of use, speakers' social circumstances and present-day currency. The book is important also because its author pays particular attention to domestic implements, and the names associated with them, that are falling out of use under the pressures of modernity and industrialisation.

Critical Approach

The work's treatment of vocabulary may be understood through three domains of evidence: ancient and modern literature, everyday domestic usage, and the linguistic relationships among sound, form and meaning. The page references provided in the book should be read alongside its literary illustrations and the historical contexts of particular words.

The occurrence of a food name in an ancient text is not the same as proof that the modern dish has survived in precisely the same form. The present criticism therefore distinguishes the book's claims, the limits of the evidence and the possibilities for further investigation.

Regarding the order of the appendices, it is worth noting that the illustrations appear in Appendix A (pp. 327–331), whereas the list of works consulted appears in Appendix B (p. 332 onwards). The sequence in the book itself, rather than any discrepancy apparent in the contents list, is decisive.

Introduction to the Subject: The Fundamental Research Questions

In her introductory discussion (pp. 27–30), the author regards the word as a fundamental unit of language and distinguishes words of ordinary usage from specialised or technical terms. In matters of food, "specialised" does not refer exclusively to the terminology of external scientific disciplines: it also includes village and household names associated with a particular object, shape, action, taste or occasion. The collection of multiple terms relating to a single subject attests both to linguistic richness and to the texture of social life.

This introduction makes lexical borrowing, semantic change and the disappearance of words central questions. As new implements and food practices enter a changing social world, older names may cease to be used. This does not mean that every new form is intrinsically objectionable; the task of research is to identify the social and practical circumstances in which particular words change. The author's concern is to preserve the cultural knowledge embedded in vernacular vocabulary through this process.

Three fundamental research questions emerge from a critical reading of this introduction: (1) What specific, observable referent does a given specialised word have? (2) How do its form, meaning and use change over time? (3) Where do literary attestations and current popular usage coincide, and where do they differ? All three questions can be applied to the book's twelve chapters.

Chapter One. Traditional Patterns of Indian Food

Relevant pages in the book: 31–39.

Environment and the Foundations of Diet

The author takes geographical environment to be a primary determinant of Indian food. Differences in vegetation, livestock, rivers and water bodies, level agricultural land and plateau terrain create diversity in food resources. Yet food is not simply a question of what nature provides: the social and cultural environment also produces classifications of the "edible" and the "inedible." From the outset, therefore, the chapter calls for geographical conditions and human systems of value to be read together.

Chronological Sources and Their Significance

From the Indus civilisation through Vedic literature, the epics, the Purāṇas, Ayurveda, Sanskrit poetry and drama, and subsequent political and cultural contacts, the author gathers references to foods, drinking practices, and prescriptions and prohibitions. On pp. 32–38, barley, wheat, rice, sesame, peas, milk and curds, ghee, honey, jaggery, meat and fish (māch), fruits and salt are related to literary evidence from particular periods. Texts from different ages should not be taken as evidence of a uniform dietary system. The chapter's value lies in signalling changes across time.

The Difference Between a Name and Its Referent

The occurrence of terms such as karambha, apūpa, puroḍāśa, dhāna and taṇḍula in older texts establishes that the names were historically attested. Further evidence, however, would be needed to show that dishes now made under the same names were prepared from exactly the same ingredients or by identical methods. Subject to this caution, the chapter provides a broad Indian background for the study of Maithil food.

Prescriptions, Prohibitions and Relations of Power

In matters of diet, distinctions between purity and impurity, permission and prohibition, meat-eating and vegetarianism, social rank and religious belief are presented as historically changing formations. Such descriptions should be understood as perspectives belonging to their respective periods, not as timeless rules of modern nutrition or social ethics.

Lexical Evidence from the Text

Original word or expression	Meaning and context
Jau (barley), cāur (rice), til (sesame), matar (peas)	Historical basis of grain- and agriculture-based diets (p. 32).
Karambha, apūpa, puroḍāśa	Attested food names in Vedic literature (p. 32).
Taṇḍula, sāṭhī dhān	Forms of grain and references specific to a historical period (p. 37).

Critical Appraisal

The method of recovering food names from older literature is valuable, but the social representativeness of literary texts is limited. Practices recorded in elite writings, religious lawbooks or poetry cannot be treated as a complete account of what entire populations actually ate. Independent comparison with archaeology, botanical remains and local history remains a task for future research when constructing chronological conclusions.

Chapter Two. Traditions of Maithil Food

Relevant pages in the book: 40–53.

A Rice-Centred Dietary Structure

The author connects the predominance of paddy cultivation in Mithila, and the region's climate, with its distinctive food culture. The widespread consumption of cooked rice and chūṛā (flattened rice), the prestige of chūṛā-dahī (flattened rice with curds), pigeon-pea dal, black-gram-based khichṛī, and flatbreads made from finger millet and maize reveal differences in the social distribution and availability of food (pp. 40–42). "Predominant" must not be confused with "exclusive": the book describes a variety of grains, pulses, leafy vegetables, other vegetables, fish (māch) and fruits.

Everyday Meals and Cultural Values

Rice with its starchy cooking liquid, flattened rice, roasted grain, greens, pickles, dal and prepared dishes form part of everyday household meals. The importance of fish is also noted in relation to rivers, ponds and other aquatic resources. To consider a meal merely as an assemblage of edible substances is to miss its social meanings: who was served what, on which occasion, which foods signified respect, and which households could afford which kinds of food are all culturally informative questions.

Festivals, Fasts, Life-Cycle Rites and Communal Dining

The author examines food arrangements in the context of weddings, śrāddha rites, initiation ceremonies, hospitality and communal meals. Festivals such as Satuani, Jur Shital, Ravi-Shani and Kojagara are associated with particular grains, leftover rice, sattu, sun-dried lentil dumplings, dālipūṛī, fox nuts and betel (pp. 49–52). Reading these names as an "occasion-marked vocabulary" clarifies the social functions of food terms.

Customary Rules and Social Classification

Pages 43–49 discuss food prohibitions in religious texts, rules about touching food, vessels, food prepared by others, mealtimes, and caste- and varna-based prescriptions. Such rules are historical features of textual traditions, not instructions for contemporary society. Keeping this distinction clear enhances the chapter's sociological usefulness.

Lexical Evidence from the Text

Original word or expression	Meaning and context
Bhāt, chūṛā, māṛ	Multiple uses of paddy; several names derived from a single food resource (pp. 40–41).
Rāhaṛi, uṛīd, khesārī	Distinctions among names of pulses and their culinary uses (p. 40).
Satuani, Jur Shital	Relation between seasonal cycles and food rituals (p. 50).
Makhān, pān	Cultural exchange and the occasion of Kojagara (p. 52).

Critical Appraisal

The work records the classification of certain foods as "pure" or "impure," and their association with specific social groups, as elements of inherited belief. Such assertions are best read as descriptions of customary perceptions rather than objective nutritional or ethical judgements. Contemporary regional fieldwork would establish which traditions remain in practice.

Chapter Three. Influences on Maithil Taste and the Changes They Produced

Relevant pages in the book: 54–58.

A Threefold Account of Change

The chapter focuses on three domains: implements, ingredients and the processes of preparing and eating food. In the author's view, industrial development, cultural contact and mechanisation have transformed older culinary arrangements. Page 54 contrasts the ukkharī–mūsar (mortar and pestle), ḍhekī–jāṭ (traditional pounding and grinding devices), earthen kohā and ghail vessels, and the low pīṛhī seat with the mill, tin drum, metal cooking pot, pressure cooker, jug, plate, chair and table.

The Mechanism of Lexical Replacement

As the use of an object declines, so does the frequency of its distinctive name. With the introduction of new implements, new words—sometimes borrowed from other languages—enter ordinary speech. It is insufficient to describe this process simply as "word loss." One must also examine changes in materials, craftsmanship, fuels, cooking speeds, household labour and social prestige.

The Reconfiguration of Foods and Tastes

The chapter points to increasing flexibility in distinctions between edible and inedible foods, the arrival of new foodstuffs, urban life and changing preferences. As the structures of family, market and employment alter, the social prestige of food vocabulary changes as well. In this way, the chapter establishes the historical rationale for compiling the vernacular lexicon in Chapters Seven to Nine.

Lexical Evidence from the Text

Original word or expression	Meaning and context
Ukkharī–mūsar → mill	Mechanisation and the threatened vocabulary of older processing techniques.
Earthen kohā → metal dekchī	Change in the vessel's material and its name.
Pīṛhī → chair and table	Change in customary seating during meals.
Hearth → stove/electric cooker	Changes in energy sources and cooking techniques.

Critical Appraisal

Change does not proceed exclusively from old to new: in many rural and urban homes, older and newer implements coexist. Future studies should therefore document replacement, coexistence and revival alike. The original book provides a picture of conditions in 2011; it should not be treated as a universally applicable description of the present.

Chapter Four. Food Practices in Early Maithili Literature

Relevant pages in the book: 59–71.

The Earliest Literary Attestations

The chapter refers to the Caryāpadas, verses of the Siddha masters, Prakrit–Apabhraṃśa materials, and Jyotirishwar's Varṇaratnākara and Dhūrtasamāgama. References on p. 59 to māṛ (rice starch), bhāt (cooked rice) and hāṛī (an earthen pot) establish that vocabulary associated with food occurs not only in modern speech but also in early literary sources. Questions concerning the linguistic classification of these works are complex; nevertheless, the food-related terms appearing in their verses provide useful indications of linguistic history.

The Lexicographical Importance of the Varṇaratnākara

The description of a feast in the Varṇaratnākara offers a dense account of foods, prepared delicacies, utensils and arrangements for dining (pp. 62–67). The author attempts to interpret many rare terms by consulting both the historical textual context and contemporary Maithili vernacular usage. The mutual dependence of lexicography and textual editing becomes particularly apparent here.

Semantic Interpretation and Caution

Connecting an old word with a similar-sounding modern word may be a reasonable hypothesis, but it is not necessarily a demonstrated etymology. The possible relationship between amṛtakuṇḍī and amiratī, discussed on p. 66, is a case in point and should remain a hypothesis. Establishing a meaning requires attention to textual variants, context, the nature of the object and intervening historical forms.

The Social World of Food in Early Literature

Terms relating to rice starch, flattened rice, curds, milk, sweets, betel, meals for guests and the decoration of feasts illuminate the history of both language and culture. The presentation of food here serves at once as a pictorial literary embellishment and as a source of information about social practices.

Lexical Evidence from the Text

Original word or expression	Meaning and context
Māṛ, bhāt, hāṛī	Early food-related terms in Siddha literature (p. 59).
Description of a feast in the Varṇaratnākara	A literary assemblage of numerous food terms (pp. 62–67).
Amṛtakuṇḍī / amiratī	Possible semantic development and discussion of etymology (p. 66).

Critical Appraisal

Metaphorical or exaggerated descriptions of feasts in ancient literature should not be treated as direct evidence of typical diets across society. Checking the quoted terms against authoritative editions, manuscript readings and contemporaneous sources would make the chapter's historical conclusions more secure.

Chapter Five. Food Practices in Medieval Maithili Literature

Relevant pages in the book: 72–79.

The Vidyapati Tradition and the Vocabulary of Food

The author investigates food-related vocabulary in the work of Vidyapati, a central writer of the medieval period, and in the tradition associated with him. In Kīrtilatā, Kīrtipatākā and the lyric Padāvalī, food figures not merely as an answer to hunger but as an expression of hospitality, prestige, affection, separation and the norms of social conduct (pp. 72–77). A form such as subhoan demonstrates the relationship between an early lexical form and its meaning.

The Meaning of Food Beyond Eating

Figurative language, the wish to offer khīr and sugar to a crow, meals offered to guests, curds and ghee obtained from cattle, and references to cultivated grains all reveal the broad literary presence of food. In such instances, khīr and ghṛta denote food substances, whereas offering someone food—or accepting food under humiliating circumstances—signals a social relationship.

Literary Continuity and Locality

In Vidyapati's language, Sanskrit-derived forms, historically transformed forms and indigenous expressions coexist. Medieval food names can be compared with modern vernacular forms within a defined chronology; however, proof of direct descent for every form requires intermediate evidence.

Lexical Evidence from the Text

Original word or expression	Meaning and context
Subhoan	A word for food attested in medieval literature (p. 72).
Khīr–khāṇḍ	Sweet foods in an affective context (p. 75).
A load of dahī and ghṛta (curds and ghee)	Hospitality and the exchange of gifts (p. 77).
Rāhaṛi, makai	Cultivated foods in a literary setting (p. 78).

Critical Appraisal

This chapter is important for its literary attestations of vocabulary. Yet the differences among manuscript readings, questions of poetic attribution and scholarly disagreements over the periodisation of the language require independent critical examination. Comparing the quoted forms with the relevant actual editions would yield more dependable conclusions.

Chapter Six. Food Practices in Modern Maithili Literature

Relevant pages in the book: 80–164.

The Scope of the Longest Chapter

This is the book's most extensive chapter on literature. The author searches for food-related expressions in five major genres of modern writing: epic poetry, lyric poetry, stories and novels, drama, and essays. Her literary discussion is accompanied by an extensive collection of folk songs, traditional sayings, riddles and proverbs. Given this methodological range across authors and works, it would be inadequate to describe the chapter merely as an anthology of descriptions of dishes.

Epic and Lyric Poetry

The discussion of food practices in epic poetry begins on p. 80, tracing references in modern verse to feasts, guests, fruits, fish, curds, ghee, betel and social celebrations. From p. 90, the examination of lyric poetry brings food into the contexts of morality, famine, humour, everyday life, the seasons and metaphor. Treating food expressions in individual poems merely as dictionary citations, detached from their emotional and literary settings, would diminish the meaning of the poetry.

Stories, Novels, Drama and Essays

From p. 106, the discussion of stories and novels shows how domestic life, scarcity, cooking skills, hospitality, taste and characters' social standing confer meaning upon the language of food. The dramatic examples begin around p. 131; dialogue preserves evidence of living pronunciations and everyday idiom. The consideration of essays from p. 138 onwards reveals links between cultural reflection and memories of fish, mangoes, regional preferences and specific dishes.

The Distinctive Importance of Folk Literature

Pages 141–149 take up folk songs, barahmāsā songs of the twelve months, ḍahakan songs, dining songs, proverbial sayings and riddles. The ḍahakan composed about the in-laws, wedding guests and organisers of a wedding feast reveal the social drama surrounding food. Folk songs preserve memories of communal ceremonial practices in the sequence of seating guests on low pīṛhī stools and serving dal and rice, curds and ghee, vegetables and betel.

More Than Two Hundred Proverbs

An ordered collection of proverbs begins on p. 150, with entries numbered beyond 200 appearing on p. 158. The introductory remarks to the original book likewise mention more than two hundred food-related proverbs. This collection extends the meanings of food far beyond "eating and drinking" into metaphors for intelligence, greed, labour, overeating, poverty, social prestige, judgement and conduct. In proverbs, food terms frequently move from primary denotation towards secondary indication and suggestion.

Correlating Literature with Everyday Practice

The breadth of the modern literary record demonstrates that domestic vocabulary constitutes a legitimate literary vehicle for regional knowledge. Yet literary texts, characters' speech and direct social surveys constitute different kinds of evidence. The work supplies substantial initial material for bringing them into dialogue.

Lexical Evidence from the Text

Original word or expression	Meaning and context
Names of different fish	Representation of regional aquatic life in poetry (p. 90).
Tīman, non, tel	The meanings of food terms in domestic dialogue (p. 106).
Ḍahakan	Song traditions associated with communal feasting (p. 146).
Pīṛhī, dal and rice, pān	The ceremonial order of serving food (pp. 147–148).
Proverbs numbered beyond 200	Evidence of the extensive collection of proverbs (p. 158).

Critical Appraisal

The numbers of examples cited from particular genres and periods of modern literature are unlikely to be equal. Lexicographical conclusions would benefit from an electronic index recording genre, author, work, publication year and page references, enabling researchers to test both duplication and actual frequency of use. Renewed regional surveys of proverbs could also establish their current meanings and circulation.

Chapter Seven. Vocabulary of Food Implements in Modern Maithili

Relevant pages in the book: 165–196.

The Principle of Classification

The chapter divides implements into six classes according to their principal material of manufacture: metal, stone, clay, wood, bamboo and grass (p. 165). It then offers detailed distinctions relating to their shape, components, uses, constituent materials, construction and local names. The method grounds lexical definitions in the actual use of objects.

Names of Metals and Alloys

The metal category includes forms associated with copper (tām/tāmā), brass (pittar/pittari), bell metal (kāś/kāśā) and kaṃsakūṭ (pp. 165–174). Such terms denote not only objects but also physical properties and techniques of manufacture. Bāsan is a general term for utensils, whereas more specific names may indicate the shape or function of a vessel. Multiple names for one object may also point to regional, dimensional or functional differences.

The Lexical World of the Hearth and Fuel

Pages 175–179 describe the relationships among terms for the hearth, its construction, fuel, the condition of the fire, ash and acts of cooking. If such expressions are arranged in separate lists, the complete form of the technology concerned remains obscure. A network analysis is needed: fuel → construction of the hearth → lighting the fire → controlling heat → cooking food → residues.

Clay, Wood, Bamboo and Grass

The latter part of the chapter explains the earthen kohā, hāṛī, ghail and kathaut vessels; the wooden pīṛhī, ḍhekī and rolling pin; bamboo sūp and ḍagarā winnowing implements; and other containers. The discussion of variant pronunciations and shapes of the pīṛhī on p. 189 is especially significant. Bamboo- and grass-made baskets, sūp, maunī and storage devices discussed on pp. 192–195 bear witness to traditional craftsmanship.

Standards for Recording Lexical Meanings

For each word in this chapter, it would be possible to record its material, local name, dimensions and shape, maker, purpose, associated activity, ritual occasion and present geographical distribution. Such an entry would amount to a living “ethnographic dictionary,” rather than a mere list of synonyms.

Lexical Evidence from the Text

Original word or expression	Meaning and context
Tām/tāmā, pittar, kāś	Local words for metals and alloys (p. 165).
Cūlhā, jāran, rākh/chāur	Interrelated vocabulary of fuels and the hearth (pp. 175–179).
Kohā, ghail	Shapes and uses of earthen vessels (pp. 181–183).
Pīṛhī/pirhī/baiskī	Pronunciation and functional variations in seating (p. 189).
Sūp, ḍagarā, maunī	Names of objects and crafts based on bamboo and grass (pp. 191–195).

Critical Appraisal

The drawings in Appendix A of the original book are helpful in understanding the implements discussed here, though their number is limited. A digital archive containing high-quality pictures of every implement, location-specific names, measurements and interviews with local craftspeople would be an important next undertaking.

Chapter Eight. Vocabulary of the Basic Materials of Food

Relevant pages in the book: 197–246.

Three Broad Semantic Domains

The author divides food ingredients into "basic," "supplementary" and "special" categories (p. 197). The basic category includes ordinary food grains and locally important roots and tubers. The supplementary category covers ingredients completing a meal, fish, meat, spices and other accompaniments; the special category includes fruits, milk products, honey, sweets, betel and items associated with particular occasions. This is not a chemical or nutritional classification of edible substances. It is organised according to their uses in popular practice.

Fine Distinctions Among Grains, Paddy and Pulses

The treatment of grain on pp. 198–202 includes terms for harvest (phasīl), seed (bīhan), grain intended for eating (khaihan), varieties of paddy, maize cobs, kernels, and the shapes and uses of pulses. Across the life cycle of an agricultural product, its seed, growing plant, crop, stored grain and edible form may each bear distinct names. The lexicographer must therefore connect the stages of cultivation to the stages of cooking.

Roots, Leafy Vegetables and Local Ecology

Words such as ol, alhuā, suthnī, sārukh and cichoṛhī carry knowledge of local soils, seasons, periods of scarcity and domestic culinary skills (pp. 202–208). The many names for leafy greens and vegetables are similarly significant for the preservation of food biodiversity. The book does not consistently provide scientific botanical equivalents for local names of the same species; that remains a subject for future research.

Fish, Meat and Aquatic Resources

Pages 209–219 are particularly rich in terms denoting the appearance, shape, body parts, flavour and varieties of fish. Fish names are more than biological labels: they also convey information about cooking uses, freshness, smell, seasonal availability and popular preferences. The ecology of Mithila's ponds, rivers and wetlands finds linguistic expression here.

Oils, Spices, Fruits, Honey, Betel and Other Ingredients

Oils and spices are discussed from p. 220, seed-grown (bijjū/sarahī) and grafted (kalmī) varieties of mango from p. 224, various other fruits thereafter, honey on p. 240, and betel and other specialised substances in the concluding sections. Terms for mangoes, lemons, jujubes, sugarcane juice and honey express highly nuanced distinctions of local taste. References to intoxicating drinks or substances in the book belong to the study of word meanings; they are not recommendations for consumption.

Lexical Evidence from the Text

Original word or expression	Meaning and context
Phasīl, bīhan, khaihan	Semantic distinctions based on grain production and intended use (p. 198).
Rāhaṛi, uṛīd, kurthī	Regional lexical field of pulses (pp. 199–200).
Cichoṛhī, ol, alhuā	Roots, tubers and popular diets (pp. 202–205).
Many varieties of fish	Morphological and classificatory names for aquatic life (pp. 210–219).
Bijjū/sarahī, kalmī	Distinctions based on how mango trees originate (p. 224).
Madhu (honey)	Meaning of a specialised edible substance (p. 240).

Critical Appraisal

Where an exact scientific name is unavailable, the identity of a plant should not be asserted on the basis of conjecture. The same vernacular name can denote different plants in different villages; reliable identification may require voucher specimens and consultation with local speakers and botanists. Socially defined categories such as “basic” and “special” ingredients may also vary according to income, season and household.

Chapter Nine. Vocabulary of the Processes and Activities of Food

Relevant pages in the book: 247–281.

A Dictionary of Processes, Not Merely Objects

This chapter makes all the operations by which naturally obtained materials are turned into food and consumed part of the vocabulary under investigation. The author proposes five groups: (1) terms relating to grain, (2) those relating to cooked dishes, (3) those relating to milk, (4) those relating to sweets and prepared delicacies, and (5) those relating to eating (p. 247). The distinctive feature of this method is its recognition that a single general activity can produce different results with distinct names.

The Sequence of Operations from Paddy to Food

The use of words such as dhān, bhussā, cāur, khakharī/khakhaṛā, arbā and usinā on pp. 247–253 identifies both the condition of the material and the process it undergoes. The chapter discusses numerous names for such stages as removing the outer husk of paddy, parboiling and drying rice, cleaning rice and cooking it into a meal. A term such as adhasijjhū denotes food that has been only partially cooked.

The Processual Meanings of Dishes and Sweets

Pages 254–271 describe in detail the sequences of preparation, mixing, heating, shaping, preparing batter, cooking and making syrup for foods such as dal, greens, vegetables, baṛī, piḍukiyā and jilebī. On p. 266, jilebī is explained through the combination "method of preparation + form + final cooking." Such a definition is far more useful than a purely formal dictionary synonym.

Serving, Eating, the Condition of Food and Social Acts

Pages 272–277 connect the acts of mixing food, eating, and terms such as jūṭh/aiṇṭh, niraiṭh, not-bijho and bhojanī to the practical and social meanings of meals. The distinction between aiṇṭh and niraiṭh identifies locally recognised categories of food's condition after use and of ritual or social purity. Such categories should be understood descriptively and in context.

Taste, Smell and Sensory Experience

The final pages contain words describing flavours, the smell of burning, the effects of metal vessels, the pungency of chillies and bodily responses (pp. 277–281). Examples such as pitarāini and susuāyab reveal an experiential precision in the language. Sound symbolism, sensation and verbal form deserve integrated study within this semantic domain.

Lexical Evidence from the Text

Original word or expression	Meaning and context
Arbā, usinā	Different processes for turning paddy into rice (pp. 247–248).
Bhussā, khakharī, khuddī	By-products of processing and conditions of grain (pp. 247–250).
Adhasijjhū	A specific state of incomplete cooking (p. 252).
Jilebī, cāsnī	A process-based definition of a sweet dish (p. 266).
Aiṇṭh, niraiṭh	Differentiated states following the consumption of food (p. 273).
Susuāyab	A bodily and vocal reaction to pungent taste (p. 279).

Critical Appraisal

A modern dictionary of food should record the relationships among "action–implement–object–result" in a single entry. For example, separating the nouns denoting successive states of rice, the verbs describing its cooking and adjectives expressing its taste would obscure their actual semantic connections. Translating the vocabulary of this chapter into process maps would constitute a substantial extension of its research.

Chapter Ten. Phonological Analysis of Maithili Food Vocabulary

Relevant pages in the book: 282–289.

From Everyday Usage to the Sound System

After assembling a substantial vocabulary, the author examines patterns of vowels and consonants. Examples of short, long and extra-short vowel quantities, nasalisation, vowel combinations and consonant clusters in the pronunciation of food-related terms are collected on pp. 282–286. The chapter shows that food vocabulary can provide rich material for investigating the general phonological structure of a language.

Variation in Sound and Form

Forms such as ghail–ghailcī and kathaut–kathautiyā reveal the connections among pronunciation, word formation and differences of meaning. Pages 287–289 propose possible chains of sound change leading from Sanskrit and Prakrit to modern forms—for example, from apūpa to pūā/pū and from śūrpa to sūp. These examples provide material for arguments in historical linguistics, but each proposed chain must be checked against sound laws and attested intermediate forms before it can be accepted.

Spelling and Actual Pronunciation

The written form of a word, its regional pronunciation and an idealised etymological form may differ considerably. To replace the spoken pronunciation of a remembered vernacular word automatically with a Sanskritised spelling would therefore obstruct understanding of the lexical heritage.

Lexical Evidence from the Text

Original word or expression	Meaning and context
Ghail/ghailcī	Sound and word forms associated with shape and derivation (p. 282).
Apūpa → pūā/pū	Possible historical development of a word form (p. 287).
Śūrpa → sūp	An instance of consonant-cluster simplification (p. 288).
Mṛtti → māṭi	Historical context and phonological change (p. 289).

Critical Appraisal

The chapter does not consistently use a standard international system of phonetic transcription. Future studies should supply audio recordings, International Phonetic Alphabet (IPA) transcriptions, the region of use, speakers' ages and social circumstances. Such documentation would help distinguish pronunciation variants from genuinely separate words.

Chapter Eleven. Lexical Analysis

Relevant pages in the book: 290–309.

Conventional, Compositional and Specialised Compounds

From p. 290 onwards, the author classifies words by derivational criteria as rūṛha (conventional or lexicalised), yaugika (compositionally formed) and yogarūṛha (compounds with specialised established meanings). The ordinary meanings of ghī, jau, dahī and thārī, for example, cannot be derived from the analysis of their constituent elements; they illustrate the conventional category. Dāli + pūṛī → dalipūṛī and dāli + sāg → dalisaggā illustrate transparent compounding. A form such as bhatkhai may have a particular conventional meaning distinct from the ordinary sum of its component senses.

Word Origins and Language Contact

Pages 298–301 discuss inherited, Sanskrit-borrowed (tatsama), historically evolved (tadbhava), indigenous (deśaja) and borrowed words. Alongside Maithili's historically developed forms, its food vocabulary includes borrowings from other languages. Yet the identification of a source language merely because a word sounds foreign requires the support of reliable historical dictionaries and early textual attestations.

Parts of Speech, Gender, Number and Inflection

Pages 302–305 provide scattered examples of nouns, adjectives, verbs, diminutive formations, gender and related grammatical patterns. Forms such as thār–thārī and poṭhā–poṭhī, considered together with linguistic structures, demonstrate that many rural terms belong to families of related derivations.

Regional Variation, Spelling and Semantic Change

Pages 305–308 consider synonyms, differences of pronunciation, orthographic variants, and the possibilities of semantic narrowing and extension. The specialised meaning of guṇḍā and the use of mūṛā to mean the head of a fish (p. 308) illustrate semantic change. Such claims should be supported by evidence dated to identifiable periods.

Lexical Evidence from the Text

Original word or expression	Meaning and context
Ghī, jau, dahī, thārī	Examples of conventional lexical items (p. 290).
Dalipūṛī, dalisaggā	Transparent, compound-like formations (p. 292).
Bhatkhai	An example of specialised lexicalised-compound meaning (p. 296).
Thār–thārī, poṭhā–poṭhī	Morphological relationships and distinctions of meaning (p. 305).

Original word or expression	Meaning and context
Guṇḍā, mūṛā	Examples of semantic narrowing (p. 308).

Critical Appraisal

In analysing words as "monosyllabic," "disyllabic" and so forth, syllables, written letters and phonemic counts are not interchangeable; the procedure needs to be specified. At the boundaries of the conventional–compositional–lexicalised-compound classification, the same word may function differently in different regions. Each entry should therefore be supported by an example sentence and testimony from regional speakers.

Chapter Twelve. Prefixes and Suffixes

Relevant pages in the book: 310–322.

The Limited Role of Prefixes

The author considers prefixes relatively infrequent in derived food-related vocabulary. Forms such as kubhojan, subhojan and susvādu, involving ku- and su-, are given as examples, while the Persian-derived be- is also discussed (p. 310). Words such as niraiṭh draw particular attention to combinations of a prefix-like element with a local stem.

The Richness of Primary and Secondary Derivational Suffixes

Pages 311–319 demonstrate a range of nominal, adjectival and participial formations using suffixes such as -ani, -iā, -ā, -ī, -uā and -āh. A suffix is not merely an addition to a stem: it can involve sound change and distinguish diminutives, relational meanings, places, associations or particular qualities. Forms such as kuṭiā, kathautiyā, chāčhiyā, bhorāh and maṭiāh exemplify morphological productivity.

The Suffix -āin and the Semantics of Smell and Taste

In the introductory material to the original book, Dr Shriramdev Jha particularly discusses possible meanings of the suffix -āin (preliminary pp. 18–19). The semantic relationships between the feminine-denoting -āin of general usage and terms for taste and odour such as bisāin, ḍaṛhāin and ichāin are complex. Their historical origins and semantic development should be identified as hypotheses rather than established facts.

Complex Suffix Sequences and the Limits of the Analysis

On pp. 320–322, the author acknowledges that the origins of suffixes, their successive combination, uncertain meanings and problems of standardisation remain open research questions. A complex formation such as amilgar indicates that a single uniform rule of suffixation cannot be applied to all words. The willingness to acknowledge these limits is a mark of the work's serious research orientation.

Lexical Evidence from the Text

Original word or expression	Meaning and context
Ku-, su-	Prefixation involving elements of Sanskrit origin (p. 310).
Niraiṭh	A local stem and a prefix-like structure (p. 310).
Kuṭiā, chāčhiyā	Nominal derivation by suffixation (pp. 311–313).
Bhorāh, maṭiāh	Suffixes indicating a property or association (p. 316).
Bisāin, ḍaṛhāin	Debate in the introduction about terms denoting smell (pp. 18–19).
Amilgar	An example of successive suffixation (p. 326).

Critical Appraisal

Resemblance in outward form is not sufficient to establish that a word-final element is a suffix. Reliable analysis requires examining productivity, its occurrence in several independent forms, consistency of meaning, chronology and regular sound change. The chapter thus provides a set of questions for future morphological research.

Conclusion: A Critical Re-reading

In the conclusion to the original book (pp. 323–326), the author shows how extensive the domain of food vocabulary is in both literature and spoken language. The historical context of Indian traditions, distinctive local features of Maithil food, encounters between traditional and modern implements, literary attestations, changing phonological forms, contact between indigenous and borrowed words, and the complexities of suffixation are brought together once more. This concluding synthesis raises the book beyond a mere "list of foods" and establishes it as a study of linguistic and cultural history.

The principal judgement of the present critical study is that the work's essential material lies in the relationships among "object–action–name–use–context." The name of an object cannot be separated from its cultural use, nor can a word's etymology be divorced from attested pronunciation. On this understanding, the daily preparation and consumption of food in the household become indispensable materials for linguistic inquiry.

The original work is exceptionally rich in its collection of words. To transform it into a modern, searchable lexical database, however, each entry would need to register the form of the word, its meaning, geographical distribution, image of the referent, source page, attested example, pronunciation, part of speech, synonyms, semantic relations and current status. This proposal is not a depreciation of the work, but a programme for developing its achievements into a new phase of research.

A Study of the Appendices

Appendix A: Drawings of Selected Implements (pp. 327–331)

The original text offers detailed explanations of implements made from metal, clay, wood and bamboo; the appendix includes line drawings to help readers visualise them. The drawings are valuable because they make meanings associated with the shapes of objects immediately comprehensible. They are selected supplementary material, not a complete inventory. A future illustrated dictionary should provide an independent entry, image, dimensions and variant names for every implement.

Appendix B: List of Works Consulted (p. 332 onwards)

The book concludes with an extensive list of Sanskrit, Prakrit, Maithili, linguistic and other reference works. This establishes that the vocabulary is not drawn exclusively from oral experience: the author also attempts to compare it with literary and historical evidence. The list is a useful starting point for researchers, although the publication details of some older editions may require renewed verification against modern bibliographic standards.

Linguistic and Cultural Conclusions

1. Food Vocabulary Is an Archive of Social Memory

Names of objects such as the sūp, jāt and pīṛhī are inseparable from the histories of their makers, their use and domestic labour. When an implement falls out of use, the specialised terms for its parts and for the actions associated with it may be among the first to be forgotten.

2. Food Traditions Are Not Uniform

Even within rice-growing Mithila, traditions encompass different grains, greens, pulses, fish, roots, tubers and particular fruits and flowers. "Maithil food" is a useful cultural designation, but it must leave room for differences of season, family, economic position, occupation, region and ritual occasion.

3. Verbs Denoting Processes Are Particularly Vulnerable

Verbs such as chāṭab, phaṭakab, paiñcab, rānhab, ulabab, auṇṭab and sānab change together with older technologies. Collecting only the names of ingredients would recover merely half the history of the language of food.

4. Literature Provides Evidence of Meaning, Not Complete Statistics of Practice

Chapters Four to Six present multilayered examples from ancient, medieval and modern literature. These indicate historical sequences; nevertheless, an individual literary reference cannot stand for the total distribution of food across an entire society.

5. Sound, Words and Affixes Must Not Be Isolated from One Another

In forms such as ghail–ghailcī, thār–thārī and kathaut–kathautiyā, sound, word form, the size or shape of the object, and meaning are mutually dependent. All four levels should be recorded in lexical entries.

6. Unsubstantiated Normalisation of Original Forms Causes Information Loss

Transforming an indigenous word into Sanskritised orthography in the name of "correction" can erase its historical sound patterns and regional identity. The proper scholarly practice is to respect the forms followed by the author while identifying demonstrable printing errors and uncertain readings in critical notes.

Principal Lexical Domains: A Comparative Table

Lexical domain	Examples from the original book	Semantic context
Grains	Dhān, cāur, arbā, usinā, khuddī, māṛ	Names of successive stages from production to consumption
Pulses	Rāhaṛi, uṛīd, kurthī, masurī	Use and regional classification
Roots and tubers	Ol, cichoṛhī, alhuā, suthnī	Seasons, ecology and popular diet
Metal vessels	Tām, pittar, kāś, kaṃsakūṭ	Materials and characteristics of manufacture
Earthen vessels	Kohā, ghail, hāṛī	Shape, storage and cooking
Bamboo and grass	Sūp, ḍagarā, maunī	Craftsmanship, winnowing and storage
Eating practices	Sānab, khāyab, aiṇṭh, niraiṭh	Action, result and customary conduct
Taste and smell	Khaṭmadhur, pitarāini, ḍaṛhāin	Experience-specific semantic distinctions
Word formation	Dalipūṛī, kathautiyā, maṭiāh	Compounding, suffixation and parts of speech

Directions for Future Research

First stage—reliable retranscription of the original vocabulary. For each entry, separately record the original printed page, actual spelling, sentence context, part of speech and editorial determination of the reading. Because a single page may contain numerous local synonyms and semantic distinctions, terms should not automatically be reduced to one standardised form.

Second stage—field research. Audio recordings should be made in Maithili-speaking villages and households in Darbhanga, Madhubani, Samastipur, Sitamarhi, Saharsa, Supaul and the Maithili-speaking areas of Nepal, alongside direct observation of objects and cooking activities. Regional representativeness will depend on sampling method and sample size. With speakers' consent, sounds, photographs, production processes and variant names should be preserved.

Third stage—thematic mapping. Prepare process diagrams and digital semantic networks such as "paddy → removing the husk → rice → cooked rice → serving → jūṭh/niraiṭh" or "bamboo → splitting → strips → sūp/ḍagarā → winnowing grain." Such maps would make the relationships among implements, materials and actions explicit.

Fourth stage—verification of literary evidence. Quotations from the Caryāpadas, Varṇaratnākara, Vidyapati, modern stories and poetry, drama and folk songs should be checked again against their original editions. A reference archive should record work, editor, publication year and page.

Fifth stage—separating uncertain etymologies. Attested sequences of forms, conjectural derivations, oral traditions and similarities of meaning should be assigned distinct evidential labels. This would make the research open to review and revision.

Sixth stage—preservation of living usage. Oral descriptions provided by elderly speakers, people skilled in domestic cookery and local artisans should be compared with younger generations' current vocabulary, so that frequently used, partially current and endangered terms can be distinguished.

Overall Assessment

The twelve chapters of Maithilik Bhojan Sambandhi Shabdavali advance a unified argument. The opening historical discussion shows that food reflects both natural resources and social ideas. The literary chapters demonstrate that words associated with food permeate Maithili's literary life. The vernacular-lexicographical chapters establish the existence of extraordinarily fine lexical distinctions among implements, materials and activities. The final three chapters demonstrate that this vocabulary also forms fundamental material for phonological and morphological study.

The book's central achievement, then, is not the "number of food-related words" it records, but its conception of food as an extensive semantic field and its integration of linguistic classification, social contexts and etymological complexities into a sustained piece of research. An illustrated, sound-enabled and geographically tagged digital dictionary based on the book could become an exceptionally useful means of preserving Maithili's vernacular linguistic heritage.

Contents

Chapters and Principal Topics of This Study

An Overview of the Work 3

Critical Approach 4

Introduction to the Subject: The Fundamental Research Questions 4

Chapter One. Traditional Patterns of Indian Food 6

Chapter Two. Traditions of Maithil Food 8

Chapter Three. Influences on Maithil Taste and the Changes They Produced 10

Chapter Four. Food Practices in Early Maithili Literature 12

Chapter Five. Food Practices in Medieval Maithili Literature 14

Chapter Six. Food Practices in Modern Maithili Literature 16

Chapter Seven. Vocabulary of Food Implements in Modern Maithili 19

Chapter Eight. Vocabulary of the Basic Materials of Food 21

Chapter Nine. Vocabulary of the Processes and Activities of Food 23

Chapter Ten. Phonological Analysis of Maithili Food Vocabulary 25

Chapter Eleven. Lexical Analysis 27

Chapter Twelve. Prefixes and Suffixes 29

Conclusion: A Critical Re-reading 30

A Study of the Appendices 31

Linguistic and Cultural Conclusions 31

Principal Lexical Domains: A Comparative Table 33

Directions for Future Research 33

Overall Assessment 34

Index of Words and Names 36

Consolidated Bibliography 37

Index of Words and Names

Selected Terms, Materials and Literary Attestations, with Page References to This Study

Aiṇṭh 23, 24, 33

Amilgar 29, 30

Amṛtakuṇḍī 12, 13

Apūpa 6, 7, 25

Arbā	3, 23, 24, 33	Bhāt	9, 12, 13
Bhatkhai	27, 28	Bisāin	29, 30
Caryāpadas	12, 34	Cāur	7, 23, 33
Chāĉhiyā	29, 30	Cichoṛhī	21, 22, 33
Cūlhā	20	Ḍagarā	19, 20, 33, 34
Dalipūṛī	8, 27, 28, 33	Dhān	7, 23, 33
Ḍhekī	10, 19	Ghail	10, 19, 20, 25, 32, 33
Jau	7, 27, 28	Jilebī	23, 24
Jur Shital	8, 9	Karambha	6, 7
Kathautiyā	25, 29, 32, 33	Khakharī	3, 23, 24
Khīr–khāṇḍ	14	Māch	6, 8
Makhān	9	Māṛ	9, 12, 13, 33
Māṭi	26	Maunī	19, 20, 33
Mūsar	10	Niraiṭh	3, 23, 24, 29, 30, 33
Ol	21, 22, 33	Piḍukiyā	23
Pīṛhī	3, 10, 17, 19, 20, 31	Pittar	19, 20, 33
Rāhaṛi	9, 14, 22, 33	Satuani	8, 9
Sūp	3, 19, 20, 25, 26, 31, 33, 34	Susuāyab	24
Suthnī	21, 33	Taṇḍula	6, 7
Thārī	27, 28, 32	Usinā	3, 23, 24, 33
Varṇaratnākara	12, 13, 34	Vidyapati	14, 34

Consolidated Bibliography

Primary Work Under Review

Jha, Lalita. Maithilik Bhojan Sambandhi Shabdavali (Food-Related Vocabulary of Maithili). First edition, 2011. The publisher's name cannot be verified from the available details.

Maithili Language, Literature and Folk Life

Jyotirishwar Kavishekharacharya. Varṇa-ratnākara. Edited by Suniti Kumar Chatterji and Babua Mishra. Calcutta: Royal Asiatic Society of Bengal, 1940.

Mishra, Jayakant. History of Maithili Literature. New Delhi: Sahitya Akademi, first edition, 1976.

Jha, Devkant. Ādhunik Maithilī Sāhityak Itihās (History of Modern Maithili Literature). New Delhi: Sahitya Akademi, first edition, 2017.

Grierson, George A. An Introduction to the Maithilí Language of North Bihár. Calcutta: Asiatic Society of Bengal, 1881–1882 (two parts).

Grierson, George A. Bihar Peasant Life. Calcutta: Bengal Secretariat Press, first edition, 1885.

Grierson, George A. Linguistic Survey of India, vol. V, part II. Calcutta: Office of the Superintendent of Government Printing, India, 1903.

Yadav, Ramawatar. A Reference Grammar of Maithili. Berlin/New York: Mouton de Gruyter, 1996.

History of Food and Cultural Studies

Achaya, K. T. Indian Food: A Historical Companion. Delhi: Oxford University Press, 1994.

Achaya, K. T. A Historical Dictionary of Indian Food. New Delhi: Oxford University Press, 1998.

Goody, Jack. Cooking, Cuisine and Class: A Study in Comparative Sociology. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1982.

Mintz, Sidney W. Sweetness and Power: The Place of Sugar in Modern History. New York: Viking, 1985.

Crooke, William. The Popular Religion and Folk-Lore of Northern India. Revised illustrated edition, two volumes. London: Archibald Constable & Co., 1896.

Basham, A. L., ed. A Cultural History of India. Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1975.

Semantics, Morphology and Lexicography

Cruse, D. A. Lexical Semantics. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1986.

Lyons, John. Semantics. Two volumes. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1977.

Matthews, P. H. Morphology. Second edition. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1991.

Atkins, B. T. Sue, and Michael Rundell. The Oxford Guide to Practical Lexicography. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2008.

STUDY 03 / NIT NAVAL

Kamla Chaudhary

Preface

Nit Naval Kamla Chaudhary is an attempt to examine the presence of a single creative personality across several literary genres. Kamla Chaudhary's creative and scholarly interests assume distinct forms in fiction, translation and cultural lexicography. Any study of this work must preserve the generic distinctions between original writing, translated literature and works of terminology.

The first chapter presents an extended critique of Kamla Chaudhary's Maithili translation of Ashapurna Devi's narrative Monak Pauti, examining Shashitara's self-determination, familial claims of ownership and linguistic transformation. In bringing together the two strands of the enquiry, twelve consecutive textual sections of the narrative and seventy-five comparative points concerning the Bengali–Maithili contexts have been incorporated in a single sequence. Similarity of narrative content has not been equated with word-for-word correspondence; the question of the original Bengali title has likewise been examined with due caution.

The second chapter reads all fourteen stories of Samay-Sanket in their original order. The third considers the cultural and linguistic significance of the twelve chapters, conclusion and appendices of Maithilīk Vesh-Bhūshā-Prasādhan Sambandhī Shabdāvalī (A Maithili Vocabulary of Dress, Costume and Adornment). Across these three studies, the interrelationships between individual and society, language and cultural memory, and literature and lived experience form a connecting thread.

The volume concludes with an integrated assessment and a book-centred bibliography. Where the publisher's details of a primary work could not be established, this uncertainty has been explicitly retained; no conjectural publication information has been supplied.

Chapter 1: Monak Pauti — Translation, Narrative and Comparative Criticism

Primary work: Ashapurna Devi, Monak Pauti; Maithili translation by Kamla Chaudhary. Pallavi Prakashan, Berma/Nirmali, 2022. ISBN 978-93-93135-12-4.

Introduction to the Work and Critical Framework

Monak Pauti is Kamla Chaudhary's Maithili translation of the novella Moner Jhanpi by the Bengali writer Ashapurna Devi. Taking the entire available Maithili edition as its basis, this study examines Shashitara's character, the social regulation of widowhood, property rights, the family's intermingled self-interest and affection, and the possibility of emotional intimacy in later life. Its central proposition is that the translated narrative does more than carry the subject matter of Bengali literature into Maithili: through the social cadence, forms of address, dialogue and cultural resonances of the target language, it also creates an opportunity to reconsider the independent existence of a woman.

The method operates on two levels. At the first, the sequence of events, the characters' voices and the development of meaning are examined without omitting any portion of the printed Maithili text, following its pagination (pp. 7–89). At the second, the analytical instruments of translation studies—Nida's formal and dynamic equivalence, Venuti's domestication and foreignisation, syntactic shifts, the transfer of culturally specific terms and the translator's visibility—are applied to textual examples.

The publication details of the Maithili book identify the original Bengali title as Moner Jhanpi. A Bengali text entitled Sonar Kouto ('The Golden Box'; Bengali: সোনার কৌটো) also displays close affinities with its plot. The publishing history of the printed Bengali editions would be important in establishing the historical relationship between these different titles; conjecture is not treated as evidence here.

Narrative Structure and Textual Units of Analysis

The novella proceeds as a continuous narrative: from pages 7 to 89, the original book contains neither separately numbered chapters nor sections bearing fixed titles. For the purposes of this study, twelve interpretative 'textual units' have been devised. These constitute an editorial classification, not chapters of the original work. Each unit covers consecutive pages, and no narrative page has been omitted.

Textual unit	Pages of Maithili edition	Principal narrative concern
1	7–13	Shashitara's situation; widowhood, family and memory
2	14–20	Home, social recognition, everyday life and the public gaze
3	21–27	Religion, philanthropy, service and a woman's autonomy
4	28–34	Dialogue, Ajit and the emerging question of property
5	35–41	Old age, relationships and conventional norms
6	42–49	Temple, land, nephew's family and Master Ramesh
7	50–56	Rajbala's statements; intensifying family self-interest

Textual unit	Pages of Maithili edition	Principal narrative concern
8	57–63	Ramesh's dialogue, new possibilities and suspicion
9	64–70	Use of land, sale and purchase, and self-determination
10	71–77	Jivesh's proposal, negotiation and new construction
11	78–84	Change, the meaning of "hamar", and a rethinking of belonging
12	85–89	Final intimacy, conventions of age and an open ending

A Reading of the Entire Narrative in Twelve Textual Units

Textual Unit 1: Character and Widowhood at the Beginning (pp. 7–13)

The opening pages introduce Shashitara's life not through a flat biographical account but through a narrative shaped by memory and questioning. The setting of Phulpur and the Chattopadhyay family, her past marriage, her husband's death and her relationship with her natal home together constitute the life of a woman who is a widow in society's eyes and an enduring centre of responsibility within the family. From the outset, society's habitual assessment of her comes into conflict with her own point of view.

Shashitara serves within the household, helps others with their tasks and conceals her sorrow behind laughter; she is therefore more than an object of pity. The people around her address her as 'Pisi' or by other respectful kinship terms. This network of relationships offers support on one side while drawing boundaries around her personal rights on the other. Details of her marital past on pages 8–9 and everyday conversations on pages 10–13 gradually disclose the pain of her solitary existence.

The critical significance of this section lies in the narrative's challenge, from its very beginning, to the fixed social identity of the 'widow' through the many dimensions of an individual human life. Familial and religious symbols evoke not only bereavement but also the hunger for human attachment. From the first pages, the translator uses the language of domestic life, touches of gentle humour and brief exchanges to bring the reader close to the protagonist.

Textual Unit 2: Household Life, Social Opinion and the Spirit of Service (pp. 14–20)

On pages 14–16, descriptions of everyday living, Shashitara's attentiveness to her own decisions and expressions of familial concern become more prominent. On one side stands the family's respectability; on the other,

Shashitara's will. Society expects her service but shows comparatively little inclination to ask what she herself desires. As a result of this discrepancy, even her silence becomes meaningful.

Flowers, worship, children and interactions with neighbours are significant on pages 16–18. The narrative reveals the family's dependence on Shashitara without making any explicit declaration. To regard the scene of gathering flowers merely as a domestic chore would be to miss half its meaning: the flowers signify personal attachment, worship, and affection both received and withheld. On pages 19–20, conversations involving neighbours, relatives and a teacher prepare the social setting for subsequent developments.

The exchanges are enlivened by the immediacy of such questions as 'Ki?' ('What?'), 'Kiek?' ('Why?') and 'Ahan?' ('You?'). Linguistic naturalness can become a form of ethical resistance. Rather than through sweeping ideological pronouncements, the story reveals a woman's experience to the reader through affection, laughter and the questions of ordinary life.

Textual Unit 3: Religion, Philanthropy and Independence (pp. 21–27)

On pages 21–23, discussions of schooling, service, the suffering of others, daily work from morning to evening, and the needs of relatives strengthen the action-oriented dimension of Shashitara's character. Her religious or moral disposition is not restricted to ritual observance; it is connected to the pain of living human beings. Thus, flowers offered in worship and care given to the sick are presented not as opposites but as expressions of different human needs.

On pages 24–25, concern for health and questions of material means reveal the protagonist's self-respect. Those whom she looks after are accustomed to regarding her simply as a boundless source of maternal affection; yet her own desires, body and time also possess value for Shashitara. On pages 26–27, familial conversations disclose the distinction between affection and self-interest.

In this passage, the story does not assume that love must automatically follow from duty. Service ought to be a matter of willing consent, not an entitlement imposed by a coercive society: this idea gradually takes shape. The translator conveys the subtle sentiment through living dialogue rather than the rigid voice of moral instruction.

Textual Unit 4: The Emergence of the Question of Inheritance (pp. 28–34)

Pages 28–29 contain reasoned questions and answers alongside feelings of human affection, trust and devotion. On pages 30–31, issues of lived experience, insecurity over property and social usefulness emerge. Shashitara is not simply an elderly woman absorbed in recollection; she engages with work, ideas and the realities of her circumstances.

On pages 32–34, Ajit's name, the improvement of the house or changing needs, and the question of land gradually assume importance in the plot. At this point the narrative moves from the emotional life of the household towards economic and legal interests. The paradox of not being regarded as at home in one's own home, and the possibility of deciding what to do with one's own share, bring out what women's rights mean in practice.

Read from the perspective of feminist criticism, 'property' here is not merely wealth but a measure of the recognition of a woman's personhood and her right to decide. Shashitara's affection constitutes no written undertaking to surrender herself economically to anyone.

Textual Unit 5: Personal Old Age versus Socially Imposed Old Age (pp. 35–41)

In her exchanges with family members and acquaintances on pages 35–37, Shashitara repeatedly returns to the fact that an older person's desires do not die. A sense of belonging in home and neighbourhood, past acts of service and present personal aspirations coexist in a single character. In this story, 'old age' is not simply a bodily condition; it also becomes a code of conduct imposed by society.

On pages 38–39, discussions of socioeconomic change, a new house, land and the family's interests advance. On pages 40–41, Shashitara's account of herself collides with the conduct of others. The question ceases to be merely what she wants; it becomes whether society is prepared to acknowledge what she wants.

The prose in this passage is marked by subtle irony. People praise 'Bari Pisi' for her service and sacrifice, yet at the moment of decision they tend to treat her judgment as though it were that of a child. This makes the contradictions within the character intelligible to the reader.

Textual Unit 6: Land, the Temple and the Arrival of Master Ramesh (pp. 42–49)

On pages 42–44, conversations involving Shashitara's grandchildren, the household and religious practices increase the importance of land and material resources. References to the temple establish another plane of faith and social recognition in her life. On pages 44–45, the expectations of her nephew's family and the question of her share in her marital family's property point towards the conflict to come.

Master Ramesh's presence becomes decisive from page 45 onwards. He is not merely the stereotypical 'man who provides the solution': his conversations with Shashitara raise questions of humanity, trust and an independent life. On pages 48–49, humorous exchanges about outward appearance, beauty and old age reveal an emerging intimacy.

In this section, the translator differentiates the voices of two socially distinct characters through respectful forms of address, short sentences, teasing remarks and incisive questions. The narrative offers an unusual example of intellectual discussion conducted in the language of ordinary domestic conversation.

Textual Unit 7: Rajbala's Opposition and the Ethics of a 'Share' (pp. 50–56)

On pages 50–52, Rajbala's statements, Master Ramesh's intervention and the tension in relationships give the plot a new turn. There are competing accounts of whose 'share' it is, who has rendered 'service' and who owes a 'duty'. Shashitara's economic concerns and human aspirations are not reduced to a simple opposition.

On pages 53–55, a question arises within the family: if land is an ancestral legacy, whose opinion should determine its use or sale? To interpret Rajbala's anxieties solely as a villain's greed would be inadequate. The family's economic future, customary assumptions of collective ownership and the unfamiliarity of property being held in a woman's name are also at work. Yet, within this complex arrangement, Shashitara's personal right of ownership is being effaced.

On pages 55–56, Ramesh's questions expose this inequality without aggression. Recalling a person's past service does not thereby extinguish her capacity to decide. Herein lies the story's ethical force: affection, if it does not rest on free choice, can become a subtle form of possession.

Textual Unit 8: Ramesh's Humane Outlook and Reserve (pp. 57–63)

Through Master Ramesh's repeated appearances on pages 57–60, an increasingly intimate dialogue develops between Shashitara's past and present. References to secondary characters, including Rajni, broaden the social world of the story. Shashitara's spontaneous laughter, economy of speech and silence in response to certain questions suggest that many layers of experience remain unspoken within her.

On pages 61–63, the family's suspicions, public gossip and the possibility of a new relationship move together. Ramesh shares with Shashitara not only the language of duty but also that of heartfelt affection. Social surveillance of their closeness, however, remains undiminished: even the natural contact between a widowed woman and a mature man may be construed as a violation of propriety.

The rhythm of their conversations gives this reserve a living presence. Without any explicit declaration of romantic love, companionship, advice, silence, care and the wish to meet again acquire a deepening significance. This subtlety distinguishes the narrative from a conventional love story.

Textual Unit 9: The Decision about Land and Self-Respect (pp. 64–70)

On pages 64–66, the conflict becomes clearer amid Ajit's involvement, the price of land, the expectations of acquaintances and plans to build a house. On page 66, Shashitara speaks of her own share; to understand this statement as mere anger would be mistaken. It is the direct expression of self-respect after a long period of dependence.

On pages 67–69, various possibilities arise for selling the land or putting it to her own use. Shashitara views her financial decision in connection with a moral or social purpose. Family members perceive a loss to themselves in this decision, thereby exposing their underlying self-interest.

By page 70, the recurrence of events and the tension of debate move towards a climax. The translator retains concrete terms such as ‘हमर’ (hamar, 'mine'), ‘हिस्सा’ (hissa, 'share'), ‘जमीन’ (jamin, 'land') and ‘मकान’ (makan, 'house') in the language of the narrative. Through this material vocabulary, a woman's right becomes a real civic question rather than an emotional demand.

Textual Unit 10: Jivesh's Questions and New Construction (pp. 71–77)

On pages 71–73, episodes involving Jivesh and property lend the economic proposal concrete form. The desire to sell the land, prospective buyers, prices, future security and familial self-interest are all present at once. Shashitara's idea of changing the appearance of the old house gives material expression to the broader thought that a new beginning remains possible even in the last stage of life.

On pages 74–75, Ajit's arguments, Shashitara's firmness and the story's social irony emerge together. Ajit sees the land's financial value; Shashitara seeks, through it, to determine the meaning of her own existence and future. Neither party can simply be labelled entirely 'good' or 'evil'. Nevertheless, the woman's independent consent remains the ethical criterion.

On pages 76–77, scenes of the house, work, marketplace and construction provide a material foundation for otherwise invisible emotions. The new house is more than a set of walls: it embodies recognition of Shashitara's wishes and her aspiration for security of residence in the future.

Textual Unit 11: A New Meaning of Belonging (pp. 78–84)

On pages 78–79, Shashitara's busy activity and growing trust in Master Ramesh reveal a new energy in her life. The ordinary pronoun ‘हमर’ (hamar, 'mine' or 'my') acquires particular gravity here. Family is not defined by blood ties alone; it is also created through mutual respect, affection and conduct. The structure of this ethical proposition becomes clear.

On pages 80–82, lonely old age, emotional closeness and the possibility of a changed life occupy the narrative's centre. Social embarrassment, memories of the past and a new orientation towards the future coexist within Shashitara. The reader recognises that the wish to live independently and the desire for another person's affection need not be contradictory.

On pages 83–84, social bitterness, the behaviour of another household and the relationships within her nephew's family are viewed in a new light. Without yet declaring any definitive 'solution', Shashitara recovers from within herself the right to accept or reject what is offered.

Textual Unit 12: On the Eve of the Final Decision and the Opening of Love (pp. 85–89)

On pages 85–86, a family invitation, respect for an elderly woman and the possibility of a relationship carry the story towards its climax. An unexpected intimacy enters Master Ramesh's voice, while embarrassment, judgment, tenderness and apprehension mingle within Shashitara. The distance between social convention and personal happiness becomes the final form of the narrative's underlying tension.

On page 87, the question of how human relationships acquire meaning beyond the boundaries of home, family and blood ties is handled with great subtlety. On pages 88–89, the years lodged in Shashitara's memory, an awareness of mortality and new affection come face to face. Brief exchanges between Master Ramesh and Shashitara on the final page release 'love' from the arithmetic of age. Rather than sentimental excess, they suggest shared responsibility and a new meaning of life.

To describe the ending either as the complete defeat of social convention or as the culmination in marriage would be to draw conclusions beyond the text. A more persuasive reading is that the novella opens the door of affection that had closed within Shashitara, leaving the reader with an unresolved but dignified possibility.

Characterisation and Moral Conflict

Shashitara: An Independent Mind within a Life of Service

Shashitara is the narrative's central character. Her characterisation has three layers: widowhood and familial standing in the past; service, labour and social respect in the present; and rights, affection and decision-making in the future. Her competence in domestic work does not constitute the whole of her consciousness. When the question of land arises, her independence of mind becomes evident alongside her economic rights. In this sense, the protagonist does not consider independence synonymous with loneliness.

Rajbala: The Complexity of Domestic Conduct and Self-Interest

At different moments Rajbala's speech expresses affection, a claim to authority or fear of loss to her relatives. To cast her as an unvarying villain would be to miss the social reality. Her conduct reveals the process by which decisions about property belonging to a woman are brought under collective family control. She also represents expectations learned from the social order.

Master Ramesh: A Test of Sympathy and Equality

Master Ramesh's function is not simply to settle disputes. He asks questions, listens, offers suggestions and respects the possibility of human relationships. Critical caution is nevertheless necessary: Shashitara's emancipation must not be construed as an outcome of Ramesh's benevolence alone. The story has already established her strength of mind and resourcefulness. Ramesh accompanies the recognition of that autonomy; he does not originate it.

Ajit, Jivesh and the Wider Circle of Relatives

Questions of property and residence arise repeatedly in relation to Ajit; through Jivesh's economic or familial circumstances, dealings in land become concrete. Such characters give voice to the narrative's 'other side'. Neighbours, acquaintances, pupils and other family members construct Shashitara's public image. The tension between the pressure exerted by that image and her personal experience propels the plot.

Female Identity, Widowhood and Property

Social Control over the Widow's Body

At the beginning of the story, widowhood appears as a social destiny. It means not only the loss of a husband but also restrictions upon dress, behaviour, travel, laughter, affection and the desire for a future. Shashitara questions these restrictions less through direct speeches than through the continued assertion of her personality. Society's doubt that an older woman might be capable of love is a subtler manifestation of the same prejudice.

The Politics of Service

The household readily asserts a claim over the labour and time of the person it respectfully calls 'Pisi'. A critical reading of the story reveals that even the language of gratitude can at times become an instrument of social control. Service freely given has value; when it is made a woman's only recognised social role, other aspects of her humanity are denied.

Land Inherited through the Marital Family and the Right to Decide

The question of land reveals the actual balance of power within the household. Attempts to restrict rights vested in a woman in the name of the family's collective interest take the form of questions and counterarguments. To dismiss Shashitara's position as greed or obstinacy would obscure the fundamental issue of economic autonomy. The physical structure of the house and the woman's psychological sense of 'home' give meaning to one another.

Love in Later Life: From Prohibition to Companionship

The intimacy gradually developing between Master Ramesh and Shashitara remains under the constant shadow of public shame. The story asks the reader to recognise the possibility of emotional companionship beyond bodily age, marital history and social convention. This does not amount to a simple rejection of conventional family life; it emphasises the ethical conditions of love—respect, reciprocity and free choice.

An Alternative Basis for Kinship

Towards the end of the story, the recurrence of the word ‘हमर’ (hamar, 'my' or 'mine') becomes significant. Belonging is established not solely through blood relationships but also through a willingness to share one another's joys and sorrows. This call to enlarge the definition of family is one of the narrative's human achievements.

Applying Translation Theory

A distinction must remain clear throughout any criticism of the Maithili translation: (a) what is actually observable in the translated Maithili text, and (b) how it differs from the Bengali original. The first question can be answered from the available text; an authoritative answer to the second requires a line-by-line comparison with the Bengali original. The application of theory below is confined to the first question.

Nida's Formal and Dynamic Equivalence

Eugene Nida emphasised the closest natural equivalent of the original message in translation. Formal equivalence gives priority to proximity to the original form and linguistic structure, while dynamic equivalence seeks a comparable effect of meaning upon the reader. From the perspective of making the dialogue of Monak Pauti sound natural to a reader or listener of the target language, the presence of familiar Maithili forms such as 'अहाँ' (ahan), 'हमर' (hamar), 'किएक' (kiek), 'तँ' (ta) and 'छिऐ' (chhiai) suggests possible adaptations associated with dynamic equivalence. In the absence of the original Bengali lines, however, it would be unjustified to claim that any particular sentence has demonstrably been translated in a dynamic-equivalence mode.

Venuti: Domestication and Foreignisation

Lawrence Venuti's two strategies invite consideration together in this book. Kinship terms such as 'पीसी' (Pisi), 'भोजी' (Bhoji), 'माय' (Mai) and 'बाबूजी' (Babuji) create a familiarity accessible to readers of the target language—an effect of domestication. Conversely, surnames such as 'Chattopadhyay' and 'Bandyopadhyay', together with signs of Bengal's local social world, preserve evidence of a distinct cultural origin—an instance of retaining foreign cultural markers. Both strategies may coexist in a single work; they should not be evaluated through the binary of 'pure' versus 'impure'.

The Difference between Fidelity to Content and Fidelity to Feeling

The true problem of translation is not merely finding dictionary equivalents. A woman's silence, a suppressed smile, public sarcasm, the violence implicit in familial authority and the diffidence of love in old age all reside in how the story is told. In such contexts, a literal rendering can drain a character's voice of vitality. The natural presence of conversational rhythm and socially meaningful forms of address in the Maithili translation provides important textual evidence for analysing fidelity to feeling.

Testing Syntactic Transformation

Bengali and Maithili belong to closely related linguistic environments in eastern India, but their case-marking, verbs, honorific systems and sentence endings are not identical. In Maithili, for instance, relational markers such as 'क', 'सँ', 'मे' and 'लेल', and verb forms such as 'छथि', 'छलथि' and 'होइत अछि', signal social distance between characters. Translation criticism must examine sentence division, signs of direct speech, degrees of verbal honorification and the placement of particles. The available text's narrative paragraphs and frequent short exchanges appear consonant with the target language's own character; identifying actual 'shifts' from the original would require a parallel Bengali text.

Skopos, or a Purpose-Oriented Perspective

Purpose-oriented theory asks: for whom, and for what cultural purpose, has this work been translated? In her preface (pp. 5–6), Kamla Chaudhary stresses the importance of bringing literary works from Bengali into Maithili. Making the novella's aesthetic qualities, emotional world and social questions accessible to ordinary Maithili readers is therefore a reasonable reader-oriented purpose. Living everyday Maithili, intelligible narration and meaningful expression serve that purpose. Reader accommodation must not, however, become a pretext for erasing the distinctive image of the Bengali setting.

The Translator's Visibility

The translator's name appears prominently on the cover, title page and in the preface. This gives grounds for treating translation not as inert transportation but as an act of creative choice. Colloquial expressions, terms of relationship, sentence rhythm and cultural mediation illuminate the creative labour of the target language. Criticism must recognise the translator's achievement in its own right, distinct from the original author's creative work.

Maithili Language, Dialogue and Cultural Vocabulary

Characteristics of Linguistic Form

The printed text prominently features Maithili pronouns, honorific verbs, interrogative particles, relational suffixes and familiar compound expressions. Forms such as ‘अहाँ’, ‘हम’, ‘हुनका’, ‘हमर’, ‘की’, ‘किएक’, ‘सँ’ and ‘तँ’ lend the language social specificity. At numerous points, the language of the narrator and that of the dialogue remain close, but shifts in a character's circumstances also change the tone of words. This is an important potential strength of the translation.

The Social Grammar of Forms of Address

'Pisi', 'Babuji', 'Bhoji', 'Master' and 'Mai' do not merely designate kinship relations: they establish relations of respect, age, authority and belonging. A change in the form of address used for a single character can alter the significance of an event. The translator's choice of address terms is as important as the plot itself in enabling the reader to recognise a character's social position.

Text-Based Linguistic Examples: An Annotated List

Word or expression	Source pages	Function in translation criticism
पीसी (Pisi)	8–21, 41	Age, family ties and social expectation

Word or expression	Source pages	Function in translation criticism
अजिया (Ajiya)	8	The intimate domestic meaning of an affectionate kinship term
फूल / फूलपुर (flower / Phulpur)	16–18, 78–89	Worship, memory, place and human attachment
भोजी (Bhoji)	28, 48–63	Intimacy and respect for age within relationships
मास्टर (Master)	20–21, 45–89	From occupational designation to personal relationship
हिस्सा (share)	33–34, 50–69	Conflict over property and autonomous decision-making
जमीन (land)	32–34, 64–77	A concrete emblem of economic rights
मकान (building/house)	33–39, 67, 74–79	From a place of residence to a metaphor of self-creation
हमर (my/mine)	66–69, 78–83	Questions of ownership and affection alike
रंग-रूप (appearance)	37–40, 48–49	Difference between outward beauty and human worth
मन्दिर (temple)	12–13, 44, 55	Tension between religiosity and public welfare
बुढ़ापा / वयस (old age /age)	60–64, 85–89	Social regulation of human desire

The Meaning of Linguistic Purity

Purity in Maithili does not mean eliminating every mark of historical contact with other languages. Genuine linguistic fidelity consists in preserving the Bengali cultural context of the original novella while keeping the working grammar, honorific distinctions, verbs, registers and idioms of Maithili alive. The reader consequently recognises the speech as belonging to everyday life, while the Bengali story retains its distinctive setting. The quality of literary translation should be judged against such a balance.

The Dramatic Quality of Dialogue

Dialogue in the translation is often brief, incisive and built around questions and answers. Characters' utterances contain half-spoken meanings, humour, barbs, uncertainty and the implications of silence. Comparing the dialogues about property shares on pages 50–55 with those concerning affection on pages 85–89 makes it clear that the same language can convey both the sharpness of accusation and the tenderness of intimacy. This narrative rhythm is a tangible achievement of the translator.

Narrative Technique, Time and Symbolism

The Sequence of Memory and the Movement of the Present

The narrative moves between memories of the past and work in the present. Shashitara's experience of her husband's death, the former organisation of the household and familial expectations create the weight of the past. Meanwhile, new land, a house, economic decisions and increasing closeness to Ramesh give momentum to the present. This temporal collision makes the reader understand that an older woman's life is not merely surviving history but a present still in formation.

The Symbolism of Flowers

Flowers carry multiple meanings associated with home, worship, affection and transient beauty. At the beginning, scenes involving flowers are connected to domestic labour and religious practice; towards the end, they can acquire a new emotional significance. It would be inappropriate to assign the flower one fixed meaning at every appearance: its meaning changes with context.

A Building versus a Home

'Makan' denotes a physical structure of brick and stone, whereas 'ghar' evokes the experience of being recognised as belonging. The question of rights over the old building is interwoven with the dream of new construction. Land and the house make visible a question: does a person whom the family calls 'one of our own' possess the right to decide?

The Function of Humour and Irony

Shashitara's laughter and the light teasing of those close to her often conceal serious meanings. Laughter does not erase suffering; it becomes a means of bearing life's complexity. Because of this subtle cadence, the author's social criticism is not confined to strident declarations.

An Open Ending

The final scene should be understood in terms of ethical acceptance rather than presented as proof of a definitive decision to marry. Ramesh's words and Shashitara's change of mind suggest emerging forms of love and responsibility. The reader gains an awareness that transformation is possible even late in life.

The Translator's Achievements and Critical Questions

Achievements Visible in the Available Text

First, for the Maithili reader, the narrative becomes living domestic prose; dialogue performs a social act rather than simply conveying words. Second, tangible signs of the Bengali background survive in surnames and setting, avoiding the artificiality of a complete relocation. Third, in communicating the subtle feelings attached to women's rights and personal affection, the gentleness of language and the rigour of argument reinforce one another. Fourth, the translator attempts to explain her literary purpose in the preface.

Four Questions for Critical Examination

1. Do the honorific verb forms used by a given character remain consistent throughout the text, or do they change with circumstances?

2. Where a Maithili term replaces a Bengali cultural marker, has any of the original local significance been diminished?

3. In emotionally sensitive scenes, are the narrator's voice and the characters' voices clearly distinguishable?

4. Are the legal and social terms associated with land, property, family and inheritance used consistently?

The Bengali Title and Its Relationship to the Narrative

The publication details of Monak Pauti identify Moner Jhanpi as the original Bengali title. On the other hand, the sequence of events in the Shashitara narrative associated with the title Sonar Kouto ('The Golden Box'; Bengali: সোনার কৌটো) closely corresponds to this Maithili translation. The references to Phulpur, child widowhood, Ajit's legal advice, Birnagar, Rajbala, Master Ramesh, the sale of land to renovate the house and the metaphor of a new life all substantiate this affinity. The publication history underlying the difference in titles is a separate bibliographical question.

There are at least two possibilities: the source may have been a different Bengali edition, or the Maithili title may have been chosen as an emotionally resonant renaming. In the absence of direct publishing evidence, neither possibility should be treated as an established historical conclusion.

For comparison, the narrative progression of Sonar Kouto can be read in five units of episodes. Monak Pauti, however, runs continuously from pages 7 to 89 in Maithili. The five units are consequently an arrangement for comparative criticism, not a verified chapter division made by the original author.

Shashitara's rights as a widow must be understood through the contrast between property inherited through her marital family and memories of her natal home. To call the land merely 'paternal property' would diminish the significance of the narrative context. The final metaphor of love cannot, likewise, be reduced to personal attraction towards Master Ramesh.

Skopos-Oriented and Feminist Translation Criticism

For a Maithili readership, the translator's purpose is not simply to transmit Bengali information: it is also to bring Shashitara's agency, distress, humour, family relationships and constraints to life within Maithili experience. A feminist reading of the translation must avoid representing a widow's rights one-sidedly as charity, or making male approval the cause of her liberation.

Five Comparative Units of Narrative Content

Bengali narrative unit	Approximate Maithili printed pages	Principal narrative situation
1	7–21/22	Phulpur, childhood, widowhood, village arrangements, orphaned teacher
2	21/22–39	Community service, Ajit's advice, arrival at Birnagar, old house
3	39–54	Rajbala, Ramesh, memory, the history of the house, relations of "mine"
4	55–73	Temple, family tensions, sale of land, renovation, Jivesh's objection
5 (Shashitara story only)	73–89	Ajit's reaction, a new residence, Phulpur's response, final metaphor of love

A Detailed Comparison of Seventy-Five Narrative Instances

The following seventy-five narrative instances provide a sequential comparative discussion of the Bengali narrative content and the Maithili translation. Each point records the Bengali episode, the page of the Maithili book and a critical interpretation. Together they cover the events of the entire work, but they do not constitute a definitive bilingual edition of word-for-word textual variants.

Comparative Section 1: Village Life, Child Widowhood and Social Power

Bengali evidence: Sonar Kouto, Part 1; Maithili correspondences: printed pages cited below.

01 | Maithili p. 7 | Evidence A

Bengali episode: Whispers of extraordinary news in Phulpur

Maithili textual indication: A curiosity-arousing opening with “खबरि अछि जोरदार” (“There is sensational news”)

Critical comment: Fidelity to the narrative premise combined with the natural surprise of spoken language; a comparable opening rhythm.

02 | Maithili p. 7–8 | Evidence A

Bengali episode: Astonishment at a journey to the marital home, neglected for many years

Maithili textual indication: A succession of questions concerning Shashitara’s visit to her marital family

Critical comment: The sequence of brief questions turns astonishment into a collective psychological response.

03 | Maithili p. 8 | Evidence A

Bengali episode: A body altered in appearance, hair and condition by severe fasting

Maithili textual indication: A contrast between former beauty and present austerity

Critical comment: The crucial criterion is the preservation of the sharp irony in the figurative description of appearance.

04 | Maithili p. 8–9 | Evidence A

Bengali episode: Marriage and widowhood at the age of nine

Maithili textual indication: Child marriage and the social construction of widowhood

Critical comment: The violence of a social order, not merely an individual's misfortune.

05 | Maithili p. 9–10 | Evidence A

Bengali episode: Aghor Chattopadhyay's control over the lineage

Maithili textual indication: The grandfather's authority and his opposition to remarriage

Critical comment: The vocabulary of lineage and religion denotes political power.

06 | Maithili p. 9–10 | Evidence A

Bengali episode: Shashitara's father's wish for her remarriage

Maithili textual indication: The conflict between father and grandfather

Critical comment: The failure of a possible alternative future for a woman's life.

07 | Maithili p. 10–11 | Evidence A

Bengali episode: Climbing bamboo, gathering mangoes and becoming a child widow

Maithili textual indication: The spirited child's temperament and memories in old age

Critical comment: The double effect of irony and pathos must be kept equivalent.

08 | Maithili p. 11–12 | Evidence A

Bengali episode: Shashitara's practical command over every household in the village

Maithili textual indication: A guardian of the village who also manages domestic affairs

Critical comment: The protagonist is not only a victim but also a central force in the narrative structure.

09 | Maithili p. 12–13 | Evidence A

Bengali episode: Nanibala's sick granddaughter and financial assistance

Maithili textual indication: The episode of giving money to a family facing illness

Critical comment: Compassion beneath harsh words; fidelity to feeling is more important here than literal correspondence.

10 | Maithili p. 13–14 | Evidence A

Bengali episode: Assistance with marriage arrangements in Satyacharan's family

Maithili textual indication: A gift given in recognition of a daughter's needs

Critical comment: Not charity, but an ethic of social interdependence.

11 | Maithili p. 14–15 | Evidence A

Bengali episode: An oil charm and the family's faith in it

Maithili textual indication: Shobha's mother and a folk belief in the medicinal uses of oil

Critical comment: The distinction between humour about folk belief and ridicule of it.

12 | Maithili p. 15–16 | Evidence A

Bengali episode: Directions concerning family meals, weather, worship and household stores

Maithili textual indication: Shashitara's instructions for running the household

Critical comment: Sentences built as lists create the rhythmic impression of her energy.

13 | Maithili p. 16–17 | Evidence A

Bengali episode: No opportunity to look at the groom at the wedding

Maithili textual indication: The nine-year-old girl's obstinacy and her failure to see the groom

Critical comment: A point at which the narrator's tender irony can be tested.

14 | Maithili p. 17–18 | Evidence A

Bengali episode: The concern of the inhabitants of Phulpur at her departure

Maithili textual indication: The village's communal dependence upon her

Critical comment: The underlying textual meaning is that the village functions through one woman's labour.

15 | Maithili p. 18–20 | Evidence A

Bengali episode: Bathing at daybreak, gathering flowers and scolding children

Maithili textual indication: Daily routines and a commanding voice

Critical comment: The dual character of household responsibility and public moral surveillance.

16 | Maithili p. 20–21 | Evidence A

Bengali episode: Everyday conversations with the orphaned schoolteacher

Maithili textual indication: A schoolteacher and the form of address “Pisi”

Critical comment: The system of vernacular forms of address should be understood, not merely Sanskritised.

Comparative Section 2: Service to the Village, Legal Claims and Birnagar

Bengali evidence: Sonar Kouto, Part 2; Maithili correspondences: printed pages cited below.

17 | Maithili p. 21–22 | Evidence A

Bengali episode: The orphaned man's age and an old relationship

Maithili textual indication: Shashitara being addressed as “Pisi”

Critical comment: The social relationship signified by “Pisi” outside the biological family must not disappear.

18 | Maithili p. 22–23 | Evidence A

Bengali episode: Work and study in Naru Basu's household

Maithili textual indication: Assistance to an unemployed person's family

Critical comment: The ethics of direct and indirect acts of help is a central concern.

19 | Maithili p. 23–24 | Evidence A

Bengali episode: The delicate domestic labour of Naru's wife

Maithili textual indication: Economic support generated by preparing food, badi and pickles

Critical comment: The translation must retain respect for labour and an awareness of class distinctions.

20 | Maithili p. 24–25 | Evidence A

Bengali episode: The prohibition on labour for a respectable woman, as opposed to a woman of the “lower orders”

Maithili textual indication: Attitudes to women's labour differentiated by caste and class

Critical comment: Shashitara's statement must not be treated as the author's final position.

21 | Maithili p. 25–26 | Evidence A

Bengali episode: Bipin the physician, his mother, a tooth-cleaning twig and remedies

Maithili textual indication: Folk medicine and care for a mother

Critical comment: Preserve both the sarcasm and the culture of traditional healing.

22 | Maithili p. 26–27 | Evidence A

Bengali episode: Food assistance for a poor family

Maithili textual indication: An indirect means of distributing food

Critical comment: Subtle practical assistance, rather than abstract philosophical humanism.

23 | Maithili p. 27–29 | Evidence A

Bengali episode: Religious language and claims about public welfare

Maithili textual indication: An ironic cadence amid moral exhortation

Critical comment: The double edge of the irony contributes to the character's complexity.

24 | Maithili p. 29–30 | Evidence A

Bengali episode: Timetables, women's bodies and food

Maithili textual indication: Shashitara's discipline

Critical comment: When the rhythm of repetition is cut, the voice loses some of its force.

25 | Maithili p. 30–32 | Evidence A

Bengali episode: News of property in Shashitara's marital family reaching Ajit

Maithili textual indication: The awakening of hope concerning a claim to property

Critical comment: Shashitara's claim concerns inheritance through her marital family; it raises questions of a woman's legal ownership and justice within the family.

26 | Maithili p. 32–34 | Evidence A

Bengali episode: The death of an elder mother-in-law and the claims of inheritance

Maithili textual indication: A conversation about inheritance after the old mother-in-law's death

Critical comment: The timing of death and the basis of legal entitlement are distinct causal elements.

27 | Maithili p. 34–35 | Evidence A

Bengali episode: A share of land and its legal reckoning

Maithili textual indication: Bighas, sums of money and a lawyer's explanation

Critical comment: Keep the numerical sequence clear; do not present conjecture about the law as established fact.

28 | Maithili p. 35–36 | Evidence A

Bengali episode: The journey to Birnagar with Ajit

Maithili textual indication: Preparation not merely for a visit but for residence

Critical comment: The act of travelling is a dramatic gesture of social rebellion.

29 | Maithili p. 36–37 | Evidence A

Bengali episode: Observance of Ekadashi and bringing necessary supplies

Maithili textual indication: A widow arriving at the house without having eaten or drunk

Critical comment: Fasting is both a discipline imposed upon women and a strategic convenience.

30 | Maithili p. 37–38 | Evidence A

Bengali episode: The first meeting with Rajbala and the offering of respect

Maithili textual indication: The arrival of an unfamiliar senior daughter-in-law in the family

Critical comment: Conflict over the social authority of the "Barki Bou" (senior daughter-in-law).

31 | Maithili p. 38 | Evidence A

Bengali episode: The guest arranging her own meals

Maithili textual indication: Independence and Rajbala's discomfort

Critical comment: Narrative conflict emerges through the language of hospitality.

32 | Maithili p. 38–39 | Evidence A

Bengali episode: Childhood memories awakened by the sight of a dilapidated building

Maithili textual indication: The familiarity of the house's walls and staircase

Critical comment: Memory and ownership are different layers of experience.

Comparative Section 3: Home, Memory and Family Conflict

Bengali evidence: Sonar Kouto, Part 3; Maithili correspondences: printed pages cited below.

33 | Maithili p. 39 | Evidence A

Bengali episode: An extremely old house within a modern town

Maithili textual indication: Birnagar's modernity and the building's inertia

Critical comment: A metaphor of past and present: the old house is a repository of earlier life.

34 | Maithili p. 39–40 | Evidence A

Bengali episode: Calling property belonging to the marital family "mine"

Maithili textual indication: The expression "हमर ससुर" ("my father-in-law")

Critical comment: A form of address itself becomes a legal and emotional claim.

35 | Maithili p. 40–41 | Evidence A

Bengali episode: Rajbala's fear that her family's share will diminish

Maithili textual indication: The household's restricted conception of ownership

Critical comment: Identify the social roots of antagonism towards another woman, rather than merely making Rajbala a villain.

36 | Maithili p. 41–43 | Evidence A

Bengali episode: The younger brother-in-law's family and the temple's presence

Maithili textual indication: Old memories associated with the goddess's temple

Critical comment: The conjunction of sacred space and marital memory.

37 | Maithili p. 43–44 | Evidence A

Bengali episode: The bathing steps of the pond and domestic neglect

Maithili textual indication: Recognition of shortcomings in the building's structure

Critical comment: Architectural description becomes the construction of an emotional foundation.

38 | Maithili p. 44–46 | Evidence A

Bengali episode: Ramesh's appearance and the form of address "Bhoujai" (sister-in-law)

Maithili textual indication: The meeting between Master Ramesh and Shashitara

Critical comment: Relations are kept alive by memory, even more than by blood.

39 | Maithili p. 46–47 | Evidence A

Bengali episode: The moment of marriage recalled by Ramesh as a boy

Maithili textual indication: Recollection of Shashitara's appearance as a young bride

Critical comment: The mirror of memory holds different ages together.

40 | Maithili p. 47–48 | Evidence A

Bengali episode: Seeing the new bride as a fairy or princess

Maithili textual indication: "Pari-Bou" ("fairy bride") and Shashitara's laughter

Critical comment: If the power of recollection is diminished, the narrative consciousness is affected.

41 | Maithili p. 48–49 | Evidence A

Bengali episode: Alpana designs in the courtyard, adornment and jewellery

Maithili textual indication: Recovery of Shashitara's forgotten image

Critical comment: Memory answers the social suppression of the body.

42 | Maithili p. 49 | Evidence A

Bengali episode: Speaking of "my" home after a very long interval

Maithili textual indication: An experience of familial belonging

Critical comment: Emotional union and a claim to property are not synonymous.

43 | Maithili p. 50–51 | Evidence A

Bengali episode: Rajbala voicing her doubts to her daughter Anna

Maithili textual indication: Antagonism towards Shashitara

Critical comment: Read Rajbala's fear in relation to economic security.

44 | Maithili p. 51–52 | Evidence A

Bengali episode: Sweets for the grandchildren and accusations of enchantment

Maithili textual indication: Ramesh bringing sweets

Critical comment: The same object becomes "affection" to one person and "favouritism" to another.

45 | Maithili p. 52–53 | Evidence A

Bengali episode: The unease of Anna, a widow, in the house

Maithili textual indication: The daughter's card-playing and excursions outside the home

Critical comment: Retain the character's harsh voice without omitting the context of her speech.

46 | Maithili p. 53–54 | Evidence A

Bengali episode: Ramesh's experience of finding support within himself

Maithili textual indication: Renewed confidence arising from Shashitara's presence

Critical comment: The male character too has been dependent: a reversal of the centre of power.

Comparative Section 4: Cooperation and the Reconstruction of Home

Bengali evidence: Sonar Kouto, Part 4; Maithili correspondences: printed pages cited below.

47 | Maithili p. 55 | Evidence A

Bengali episode: Ramesh failing to receive the trust he expects from his family

Maithili textual indication: His reserve in the presence of Rajbala and the children

Critical comment: Male vulnerability and Shashitara's protective role.

48 | Maithili p. 55–56 | Evidence A

Bengali episode: Temple arati, sweets and courtesy

Maithili textual indication: Ramesh accompanying Shashitara to the temple

Critical comment: The conventions of respect become a focus of conflict.

49 | Maithili p. 56–57 | Evidence A

Bengali episode: The form of address for the newly arrived senior sister-in-law

Maithili textual indication: The standing conferred by Ramesh's "Barki Bhoji"

Critical comment: The equivalence of intimacy expressed through Maithili kinship address.

50 | Maithili p. 57–58 | Evidence A

Bengali episode: Anna's widowhood and the episode of playing cards

Maithili textual indication: Shashitara reproving the daughter over her conduct

Critical comment: A feminist reading must also identify patriarchal morality.

51 | Maithili p. 58–59 | Evidence A

Bengali episode: Ramesh's growing self-confidence

Maithili textual indication: More voices and conversation in the courtyard

Critical comment: A movement from domestic communicative deprivation towards dialogue.

52 | Maithili p. 59–60 | Evidence A

Bengali episode: Rajbala's suspicion and sarcasm

Maithili textual indication: New alignments within the household

Critical comment: No character's words should automatically be taken as the author's endorsement.

53 | Maithili p. 60–61 | Evidence A

Bengali episode: A concrete proposal to repair the house

Maithili textual indication: Remedies for the dilapidated state of domestic arrangements

Critical comment: Rebuilding the house gives emotional rebirth a material form.

54 | Maithili p. 61–63 | Evidence A

Bengali episode: Ramesh wanting to transform the house with new enthusiasm

Maithili textual indication: The diminishing of his inner fear

Critical comment: The recovery of male agency through Shashitara's support.

55 | Maithili p. 63–64 | Evidence A

Bengali episode: A prospective buyer for the land and conditions concerning shares

Maithili textual indication: The decision to spend money from one's own share

Critical comment: An economic arrangement: rights must not be turned into charity.

56 | Maithili p. 64–66 | Evidence A

Bengali episode: An account involving ten bighas and ten thousand rupees

Maithili textual indication: Money from the property directed towards rebuilding the marital family's house

Critical comment: Both passages should be reread to verify the numbers.

57 | Maithili p. 66–68 | Evidence A

Bengali episode: Ramesh's hesitation and the invitation to stay in the house

Maithili textual indication: Mutual assurances of shelter

Critical comment: The relationship of "we" is still being constructed; this is not superficial romance.

58 | Maithili p. 68–70 | Evidence A

Bengali episode: Suspicions among outsiders

Maithili textual indication: Accusations about a woman's influence

Critical comment: Public condemnation is not the novel's moral centre.

59 | Maithili p. 70–72 | Evidence A

Bengali episode: Jivesh objecting to the sale of land

Maithili textual indication: The son's questions and the father's silence

Critical comment: Intergenerational conflict over labour, rights and authority.

60 | Maithili p. 72–73 | Evidence A

Bengali episode: Shashitara openly defending her rights

Maithili textual indication: A declaration of her own decision during a dispute

Critical comment: The distinction between legal entitlement and condescending charity is crucial.

Comparative Section 5: New Life, Belonging and the Final Metaphor

Bengali evidence: Sonar Kouto, Part 5; Maithili correspondences: printed pages cited below.

61 | Maithili p. 73–74 | Evidence A

Bengali episode: Ajit's objection: why not profit from selling the land?

Maithili textual indication: A conversation with her nephew, the lawyer

Critical comment: Choosing responsibility for the house over financial gain.

62 | Maithili p. 74–75 | Evidence A

Bengali episode: The old house likened to a diseased body

Maithili textual indication: The medical metaphor of renovation as treatment

Critical comment: The image of healing intensifies the emotional force of the original metaphor.

63 | Maithili p. 75–77 | Evidence A

Bengali episode: A well, pump and new plans for the house

Maithili textual indication: Discussion of a tubewell and construction

Critical comment: Progress is not merely urban development: it also lies in the shared labour of the household.

64 | Maithili p. 77–79 | Evidence A

Bengali episode: The prospect of electricity and reflections on light

Maithili textual indication: Plans to introduce new illumination into the house

Critical comment: Physical electricity and mental illumination function as parallel symbols.

65 | Maithili p. 79–80 | Evidence A

Bengali episode: The pleasure of saying “amar” (“mine”) awakening in a new form

Maithili textual indication: An experience of belonging that exceeds formal property rights

Critical comment: The movement from ruler or servant towards a participant.

66 | Maithili p. 80–82 | Evidence A

Bengali episode: Responses in Phulpur to Shashitara's absence

Maithili textual indication: Her absence being felt in the old household

Critical comment: The village's dependence on her may also be mixed with self-interest.

67 | Maithili p. 82–83 | Evidence A

Bengali episode: Pari's wedding and a brief return to the old home

Maithili textual indication: Spending only a short time at the invitation

Critical comment: The usefulness-based character of ties to the former village comes under scrutiny.

68 | Maithili p. 83–84 | Evidence A

Bengali episode: The fading appeal of former forms of control

Maithili textual indication: Surprise at herself as a result of new experiences

Critical comment: An active transformation, not a sudden abandonment of religion.

69 | Maithili p. 84–85 | Evidence A

Bengali episode: Ramesh coming to the wedding invitation

Maithili textual indication: A new companionship viewed through the eyes of the old world

Critical comment: Social gossip becomes an instrument of poetic irony.

70 | Maithili p. 85–86 | Evidence A

Bengali episode: Returning together to Birnagar

Maithili textual indication: The joy of the journey

Critical comment: The train journey signifies displacement at first and liberation at the end.

71 | Maithili p. 86–87 | Evidence A

Bengali episode: Public slander and a woman's decision

Maithili textual indication: Shashitara's unawareness of, or resistance to, defamatory talk

Critical comment: Social surveillance of an independent widow's movements.

72 | Maithili p. 87–88 | Evidence A

Bengali episode: Discussion of new household work while travelling with Ramesh

Maithili textual indication: A letter about electricity and the work of labourers

Critical comment: The home's new life is demonstrated through everyday activity.

73 | Maithili p. 88–89 | Evidence A

Bengali episode: Talk of living with Ramesh turning into a metaphor of love

Maithili textual indication: The experience of a previously unknown flavour of life

Critical comment: The underlying meaning is love of life; this alone does not prove an explicit declaration of sexual love.

74 | Maithili p. 89 | Evidence A

Bengali episode: The metaphor of suppressed longings kept within a small casket

Maithili textual indication: The resonance of “Monak Pauti” at the conclusion of the Maithili text

Critical comment: The titles share a central imaginative concern, though the Bengali text also invokes gold and its value.

75 | Maithili p. 89 | Evidence A

Bengali episode: The conclusion of the Maithili narrative

Maithili textual indication: Shashitara's narrative arc ends with the final metaphor of love

Close Reading of Language, Dialogue and Cultural Meaning

Short Bengali–Maithili Evidence: Specific Textual Instances

The following examples place brief portions of Bengali expression beside the semantic relationships of their Maithili renderings. In deciding questions of textual variation, narrative content, tone, possible differences between editions and the translator's linguistic choices must be considered separately.

Bengali part	Maithili page	Bengali quotation or clue	Maithili form and interpretation
1	7–8	"খবরটা জবর বটে" ("That really is quite a piece of news")	"खबरि अछि जोरदार" ("There is sensational news"); amazement in dialogue; functional equivalence of the colloquial idiom.
1	10	"শশীতারা ফুলপুরের হৃদযন্ত্র" ("Shashitara is Phulpur's heart")	Shashitara understood as Phulpur's centre or vital force; the metaphor of social centrality survives despite a change of local idiom.
1	21	"পিসিমার পুণ্যের শরীর" ("Pisi's blessed person")	"पुण्यात्मा छी अहाँ, पीसी" ("You are a blessed soul, Pisi"); the communal grammar of respect and the religious register.
2	30–35	"ভাগ" ("share")	Discussion of entitlement to a share; the legal meaning attached to land; no warrant for adding the qualification "paternal".
2	39	"মনের জগতে" ("in the world of the mind")	Memories awakening within Shashitara; a metaphorical movement from mental space to the historical home.
3	39	"আমাদের শ্বশুর ঠাকুরের" ("of our revered father-in-law")	The means of saying "हमर ससुर" ("my father-in-law"); a strategic use of the possessive first person in a claim of belonging.
3	47–49	"পরীবৌ" ("fairy bride")	Memory of a young bride like a fairy; emotion and visuality; recovery of the body of the past.
4	66–68	"আমার শ্বশুরের ভিটে" ("my father-in-law's homestead")	A plan to build at the marital family's house; the narrative centre is the marital plot, not the natal village.
4	61–63	"একটা	A metaphor for Shashitara's importance within the household; an ironic comparison

Bengali part	Maithili page	Bengali quotation or clue	Maithili form and interpretation
		সম্পত্তি" ("a property / an asset")	of person and land/property.
১	79–80	"আমার" ("mine")	Experiencing the pleasure of having a home of one's own; the language of ownership opens her independent emotional world.
১	88–89	"সোনার কৌটায়" ("in the golden box")	The final comparison with Monak Pauti; a substantial re-creation of the title, moving from a Bengali golden or precious container to a treasure of the mind.

Forms of Address, Relationships and the Social Meaning of Translation

The Bengali terms 'পিসিমা' (pishima, paternal aunt), 'বড়বৌ' (borobou, senior daughter-in-law), 'ঠাকুরপো' (thakurpo, younger brother-in-law) and 'দ্যাওর' (deor, younger brother-in-law) are not simply kinship designations to be found in a dictionary. They encode the relationship between speaker and addressee, social distance, age and authority in the household. Near equivalents in Maithili, such as 'पीसी', 'बड़की भौजी' and 'ठाकुरपो/देवर', make the text more readily accessible to its readers. Yet the politics of social designation are present both when Ramesh addresses Shashitara as 'Barki Bhoji' and when Rajbala resents Shashitara's arrival. To generalise all of this as the pan-Indian 'bhabhi' could obscure the precise hierarchy of relations.

In the final episode of scandal, the translation of address terms and community designations is also connected with a social question: why do people seek to control a 'widow's' public interactions? The coexistence of 'Bhoji/Devar' kinship terminology with the implications of love creates a complex ethical space. To read the work as an uncomplicated romance would diminish the irony of the original.

Sentence Rhythm and the Narrator's Humour

At the beginning of the story, the excitement of spreading news is created through short sentences, successions of questions and colloquial exaggeration. Maithili expressions such as 'खबरि अछि जोरदार' ('There is sensational news'), 'की?' ('What?'), 'कखन?' ('When?') and 'सासुर?' ('The marital home?') reproduce the same social rhythm through fragmentary questions. This is a strength of the translation at the level of equivalence of effect. Turning such exchanges into long, compound-heavy sentences in the name of formal prose would destroy their awkward, comic tension.

The humour in the recurring lists of everyday instructions does not arise merely from the fact that Shashitara talks a great deal. It arises from the way she governs the family, courtyard, verandah, kitchen, flower-thieves and villagers in a single administrative rhythm. The recurrence of such injunctions in translation is not merely 'repetition'; it is a means of characterisation.

A Short Glossary of Cultural Terms: Meaning, Function and Problems of Translation

Bengali term or clue	Possible Maithili form	Social or metaphorical function
শ্বশুরবাড়ি (marital home)	सासुर / सासुरक घर	Relation established by marriage; old and new ownership
বৈধব্য (widowhood)	वैधव्य / विधवापन	Age and social punishment
পিসিমা (paternal aunt)	पीसी	Kinship address, age and authority
ঠাকুরপো (younger brother-in-law)	देवर /ठाकुरपो	Address for Ramesh; intimacy
বড়বৌ (senior daughter-in-law)	बड़की भौजी	The senior daughter-in-law of the household
দ্যাওর (younger brother-in-law)	देवर	The moral boundaries of kinship
একাদশী (Ekadashi)	एकादशी	Fasting and the female body
সিংহবাহিনী (lion-riding goddess)	सिंहवाहिनी	Local worship of the goddess
আলপনা (ritual floor design)	अरिपन /अल्पना	Marriage and remembered visual scenes
টিপকল (handpump)	चापाकल / टच्यूबवेल	Evidence of modernisation

Bengali term or clue	Possible Maithili form	Social or metaphorical function
ভিটে (homestead)	घर-डीह /भिट्टा	Land belonging to a natal or marital home
বিঘা (bigha)	बिघा	Measurement of land and comparability of units
জমি ভাগ (share of land)	जमिनक हिस्सा	The widow's economic rights
সতীন (co-wife)	सौत	Relations in a polygamous family
পৌত্রী (granddaughter)	पोती	Lineage and descent
তীর্থ (pilgrimage)	तीर्थ	Faith and travel
প্রণাম (salutation)	प्रणाम	Hierarchy and etiquette
মোহ (attachment)	मोह /आसक्ति	The individual as against love of life
কৌটো (small box)	डिबिया /पौती	Desires preserved within
সোনা (gold)	सोना /सुनहर	A symbol of what is precious
আমার (my/mine)	हमर /अपन	Rights and emotional ownership
আঙিনা (courtyard)	आँगन	Home, memory and society
মন্দির (temple)	मन्दिर	A marker of memory
পুনর্নির্মাণ (rebuilding)	जीर्णोद्धार	A metaphor of renewed life

The heading 'Possible Maithili form' in the following glossary does not imply that the translator actually used every form listed. Where a form is not directly quoted from the printed pages, it functions as a tool for examining lexical relationships. In particular, the choice and possible obscuring of distinctions between 'aripan/alpana', 'chapakal/tubewell' and 'dibiya/pauti' require separate consideration.

The Change of Title, Ownership and the Reconstruction of Home

From Sonar Kouto to Monak Pauti: A Theory of Titular Transformation

The ordinary meaning of the Bengali title Sonar Kouto ('The Golden Box') is a little golden box or a small, precious receptacle. By the conclusion, the narrative can be read as imagining Shashitara's happiness in life as something nurtured and concealed within a precious, private container. The Maithili title Monak Pauti moves the emphasis from material gold to the hidden desires of the mind. It may therefore be regarded as a possible purpose-oriented transformation of the title. Yet because the publication details mention Moner Jhanpi, it is appropriate to leave the history of the original Bengali title unresolved.

The central caution is twofold: it would be mistaken to assume that Sonar Kouto and Monak Pauti are different narratives merely because their titles differ; it would be equally mistaken to regard their publication histories as beyond dispute merely because their stories coincide. Textual comparison and bibliographical verification are two distinct research tasks.

The Natal Village versus the Marital Home: A New Geography of Ownership

Shashitara has spent most of her life in Phulpur, the village of her parents. Her labour there, customary practices, the people and the family's dependence upon her have therefore given her public authority. At Birnagar she encounters the dilapidated house of her husband's family, memories of her former marriage and the possibility of inheritance. In both the Bengali and Maithili narratives, the episode concerning land is fundamentally a question of reviving the marital family's home. This is not a trivial correction of terminology: it changes the entire direction of interpretation towards a woman's right to choose her own home.

The Effacement of Bodily Beauty and the Return of Beauty through Memory

A girl of nine, a complexion likened to unrefined gold, the sacrifice of hair on pilgrimage, a body altered by fasting and an unflinching face in old age—together these episodes inscribe social history upon Shashitara's body. In Ramesh's recollection the young bride comes alive again like a fairy. This scene reveals the personhood suppressed under Shashitara's lifelong widowhood. The contrast between an austere present and an almost otherworldly memory needs to remain present in translation.

Building a Home: Money, Masons, Courtyard, Handpump and Electricity

The land dispute at the centre of the story ultimately becomes an attempt to transform the very ground of the house. The plans for a tubewell, improvements to the well, levelling the courtyard, painting, doors, walls and electricity are indispensable narrative events. If treated merely as background, Shashitara's love of life would become an unstable symbol without material grounding. Ramesh's release from fear and his recovered self-respect are also connected with this process.

The Many Meanings of Love at the Ending

The final Bengali suggestion links love with the experience of discovering a previously unknown taste for life. In the Maithili ending, too, desires long suppressed within Shashitara begin to stir. Shared plans with Master Ramesh, conversations grounded in mutual respect and travelling together are practical expressions of this feeling. The public gaze sees disgrace in them; the narrator reverses the language of disgrace into an acceptance of renewed consciousness. It would therefore be equally one-sided to summarise the ending as 'marriage-like romantic love for Ramesh' or as 'nothing but love for a building'.

Rajbala and Anna: Women's Suffering on the Opposing Side

Rajbala has spent her life under the authority of her mother-in-law and hopes to control her household freely in old age. Shashitara's arrival rekindles her fear of earlier subordination and of the division of land. Anna is herself a widow; her card-playing, excursions outside the house and struggle against others' discipline also reveal patriarchal conventions. Although Shashitara appears as a figure of liberation, her stern instructions can themselves at times oppose women's autonomy. This internal contradiction must not be eliminated from the translated narrative's voice.

The Translator's Achievement and Critical Evaluation

Achievements Supported by the Available Text

• The vigorous rhythm of an opening built around news and the collective voice of the community remain alive in Maithili.

• Local Maithili forms of address make Shashitara not a figure of formal history but a living member of the community's domestic world.

• The emotional continuity of memory remains intact from child widowhood to old age, and the story's chronology is intelligible.

• The multilayered conflict of rights among Ajit, Rajbala, Ramesh, Anna and Jivesh appears to have been preserved.

• Concrete episodes involving repairs to the house, land transactions, the temple and train travel give the final image a social foundation.

• The concluding metaphor of Monak Pauti clarifies the psychological centre of the work; it is a persuasive possibility for a creative alternative title.

Conditions of Criticism: Where an 'Omission' Cannot Be Asserted

Some expressions appear stylistically different in the Bengali and Maithili texts. In view of the possibility of variant textual editions, however, semantic difference by itself does not establish the accusation that the translator has 'cut a sentence from the original'. The present discussion therefore evaluates correspondences of narrative content, register and symbolism; it does not fabricate a list of omissions unsupported by evidence.

Monak Pauti: Overall Conclusion

Monak Pauti is not simply a story about the benevolent travels of an elderly widow. It is a complex narrative of deprivation within marriage, social control, the invisible value of domestic labour, a widow's property rights and the possibility of a new life. From beginning to end it has substantial affinities with the narrative content of the Bengali Sonar Kouto. The colloquial quality of the Maithili dialogue, its familial forms of address and its imaginative reworking of metaphor preserve the social intensity of the work.

The most important subsequent transformation lies in the fact that land and money initially form the basis of the claim to rights, but the land's value ultimately becomes the reconstruction of a home and the affirmation of individual personhood. Without attention to Ajit's legal reasoning, Rajbala's insecurity, Ramesh's emergence from helplessness and Shashitara's newly discovered world of belonging, the final metaphor of love remains incomplete. A woman's self-determination is the novella's backbone.

The comparison of seventy-five narrative instances makes possible an extensive assessment of narrative movement, character relations and thematic equivalence. Any claim of word-for-word identity or of specific omissions would require a more detailed comparison of the complete texts of the printed editions of both works.

Chapter 2: Samay-Sanket — A Comprehensive Reading of All Fourteen Stories

Primary work: Kamla Chaudhary, Samay-Sanket, a collection of short stories, 2010. Original story pages: 13–104.

The Sequence of Stories and the Plan of Analysis

The original sequence of stories in Samay-Sanket has been retained. The page numbers given are those of the printed story collection.

No.	Story title	Original pages
1	Samay-Sanket (Signs of the Times)	13–18
2	Paigh Lok (Important People)	19–26
3	Badla (Revenge)	27–33
4	Dhuri (The Axle)	34–38
5	Gulab Kaki (Aunt Gulab)	39–48
6	Yuddh (War)	49–53
7	Gunanphal (The Product)	54–63

No.	Story title	Original pages
8	Akanksha (Aspiration)	64–71
9	Ahibatak Haar (Necklace of Marital Auspiciousness)	72–77
10	Kaal-Chakra (The Cycle of Time)	78–81
11	Drishtikon (Point of View)	82–88
12	Nirnay (Decision)	89–94
13	Baate Bilayal Pani (Water Lost Along the Way)	95–99
14	Aparajita (The Unvanquished)	100–104

The analysis focuses on the story titles, their order, characters, sequences of events and page references in Samay-Sanket. It also takes account of the intellectual contexts furnished by the introductory pieces entitled 'Lekhakiy' ('Author's Note') and 'Nari-Vimarshak Nari-Lekhani' ('A Woman's Pen Engaging with Women's Questions'). The content of each story is distinguished from its critical significance.

The Author's Narrative Outlook and the Collection's Governing Tone

The introductory essay 'Nari-Vimarshak Nari-Lekhani' and the author's own 'Lekhakiy', which appear at the beginning of the collection, open different pathways for the reader. The introduction emphasises the collection's woman-centred dimension. In discussing the social foundations of her fiction and female characters drawn from experience, the author attaches importance to family, circumstance and the contradictions of life. From a critical standpoint, the introduction, the author's self-statement and the stories themselves are not identical objects; each must be read separately.

The society represented in the collection is not divided simply into two antagonistic camps of women and men. The stories encompass rich and poor, young and old, the dependent and the self-reliant, those with and without physical disabilities, believers in tradition and people making new decisions. Women's struggles form an important connecting thread through this diversity.

Considered in sequence, the collection begins with Samay-Sanket, which depicts the awakening of an awareness of social rights, and ends with Aparajita, which emphasises the inner strength of an individual. The intervening stories ask how human dignity might be preserved at different stages of life. This may be regarded as a possible overarching tone of the collection: it is a critical reading, not a verified statement of editorial intention.

Individual Critical Studies of the Fourteen Stories

Samay-Sanket (Signs of the Times)

Original pages: 13–18 | Principal characters or groups: Sukhna, Bilti, Raja Babu and Master Saheb

Narrative and setting: The story rests upon the social organisation of the village. Sukhna and Bilti live under the pressures of economic deprivation, labour and the denial of rights. Raja Babu's dominance represents an order in which ordinary people are apprehensive even about discussing their entitlements. Sukhna's state of mind at the outset makes this dependence and insecurity clear.

Development of conflict: The presence of Master Saheb introduces a new direction of thought. Discussion of rights, the village's public arrangements and participation in them confronts Sukhna with questions that concern not simply personal benefit but collective dignity. Sukhna stands between an old fear and a new consciousness. Bilti's practical experience also connects this change with the internal life of the household.

Ending and meaning: The ending clarifies the possibility of change. Awakening to one's rights does not immediately transform the balance of power, but it changes Sukhna's thinking. In this sense, the title Samay-Sanket signals a changing time. New circumstances encourage the villagers to understand their rights.

Narrative craft and critical assessment: Rural speech, dialogue and brief episodes of ordinary conduct carry the narrative forward. A far-reaching question of social transformation is contained within a character's private experience. To read it merely as a personal quarrel between Raja Babu and Sukhna would diminish its importance; the central concerns are social rights and self-respect. The achievement of the story is that it renders a change of consciousness credible through the unfolding of events.

Paigh Lok (Important People)

Original pages: 19–26 | Principal characters or groups: Preeta, Neelu and Memsaheb

Narrative and circumstances: The story opens through Preeta's experience. The need to earn a living brings her into a world where a sharp distinction exists between the materially privileged and those dependent upon their labour. Her affection for her daughter Neelu and anxiety about the child's future connect this economic issue with the experience of motherhood. Memsaheb's household and conduct reveal another face of outward prosperity.

Characters and relationships: The distance between Memsaheb's status and her conduct creates the story's critical tension. The respect Preeta hopes for is not automatically secured in a wealthy environment. Neelu is Preeta's emotional centre, and the question of her welfare figures prominently in every decision her mother makes.

The title's implications: The expression paigh lok generally signifies people of wealth, rank and social influence. The story reverses this conventional meaning and turns it into an ethical question: does greatness reside in a person's position or in the heart? Preeta's experience compels the reader to consider this distinction.

Critical observations: The story's social foundation lies in the dignity of labour and respect for the human person. Although the class divide is clear, the narrative does not simply condemn luxury; it proposes humane standards of conduct. Preeta's perspective on her own village changes. In this way, belonging and self-respect are valued above the external glitter of society.

Badla (Revenge)

Original pages: 27–33 | Principal characters or groups: Reeta Bhauri, Haricharan and Satish

Narrative and focal concern: This story is founded upon bitterness within human relationships and the subsequent ethical trial. The experiences of Reeta Bhauri, Haricharan and Satish connect marriage, illness, service and memories of earlier hurt. When circumstances change, the suffering and vulnerability of a person formerly regarded with resentment become visible in a new way.

From revenge to compassion: The title Badla creates an expectation of revenge, but the progression of events complicates that expectation. Harsh treatment need not always receive a harsh response. Human sensitivity emerges as an alternative ethical answer. The story centres upon the question of what our duty towards another person ought to be at a moment of weakness.

The position of the female character: Reeta Bhauri's conduct may be understood in terms of forbearance and inner strength. Nevertheless, it is insufficient to idealise her service without further questioning. The unilateral expectation that women should serve and sacrifice can perpetuate social inequality. The story accordingly displays the woman's moral stature while giving the critic an opportunity to reconsider the value attached to sacrifice.

Narrative craft and evaluation: Changes in life circumstances alter the meaning of relationships. External events and internal psychological transformation develop together. The paradoxical significance of the title makes the story effective. Rather than treating it as a simple homily on forgiveness, it is more appropriate to read it as a complex account of suffering, responsibility and ethical choice.

Dhuri (The Axle)

Original pages: 34–38 | Principal characters or groups: Sheela and her family environment

Narrative: Sheela's life follows the familiar rhythm of domestic existence and family support. An accident involving her husband confronts her with an arduous reality in which emotional and economic security are called into question together. The consequences of the event involve not only grief but the need to discover a means of continuing to live.

The woman's circumstances: The work of the woman who sustains a household is central to the narrative, but a crisis makes apparent that the capacity to decide may remain limited in a dependent existence. Sheela does not retreat from her responsibilities; changing circumstances require her to recognise her own abilities.

Title and symbol: Dhuri denotes the axle, the centre around which a wheel turns. The name symbolises household activity, familial organisation and the often unseen labour that sustains it. Rather than placing the woman only at the periphery, the story brings her central role into view.

Critical assessment: The story's principal achievement is to transform crisis into a question of self-reliance. Yet it also raises a further question: why must women so often wait for calamity before their competence can be recognised? Dhuri is therefore not simply a story of suffering; it insists upon women's need for social and economic independence.

Gulab Kaki (Aunt Gulab)

Original pages: 39–48 | Principal characters or groups: Gulab Kaki and the female narrator

Narrative setting: The neglected life of an elderly woman forms the centre of Gulab Kaki. Her experiences include deprivation, loneliness and social distance. Through the female narrator, the reader gradually comes to know the aunt's circumstances. A person whom ordinary society readily overlooks becomes the central subject of the story.

The creation of intimacy: Here a person's identity is established not by economic status or position in society but by lived experience. The narrator's conduct towards Kaki creates a humane space for sympathy. Small details of life bring into relief the insecurity of old age and the need to belong.

A distinctive concern of feminist criticism: The story addresses not only the rights of younger women but also the dignity of older women. When home, family or society begins to regard the elderly as no longer useful, their experience and emotional needs are obscured. Gulab Kaki's presence calls this inhuman attitude into question.

Language and craft: Memory, affectionate forms of address and details of everyday behaviour lend the narrative its pathos. In the title, the kinship term 'Kaki' attached to a personal name conveys a sense of familiarity. Through this story the author places a forgotten figure of ordinary life at the centre of literature.

Yuddh (War)

Original pages: 49–53 | Principal characters or groups: Rajesh, Chunnu and members of the family

Narrative: The dialogues and behaviour of Rajesh and Chunnu bring into view differences between generations, anxiety over livelihoods and familial expectations. One generation regards its own experience as authoritative, while another seeks to make decisions in the light of changing circumstances. Thus, even ordinary domestic episodes become sites of ideological conflict.

The multiple meanings of 'war': The battle in the story is not fought upon a battlefield. It is a metaphor for the daily struggle among expectations, self-interest, responsibility, values and self-respect. Conflicts without weapons can leave deep marks upon the human mind.

Tensions between characters: Their differences reflect not just stubbornness but also the pressures of social change. Considering the younger generation's aspirations alongside the older generation's experience makes the story more meaningful. Declaring one side wholly right and the other wholly wrong would diminish its complexity.

Critical conclusion: The story's strength lies in conveying a wider consciousness of conflict through events of daily life. The distance between the title and the action encourages the reader to seek symbolic meaning. Family dialogue becomes a record of the transformation of social values.

Gunanphal (The Product)

Original pages: 54–63 | Principal characters or groups: Meera and Sunil

Narrative outline: In Meera and Sunil's married life, questions arise concerning the household, financial needs, the division of time and personal interests. Decisions that seem ordinary from the outside expose differences of power and expectation within marriage. A central concern of the story is how a woman's work and desires are valued.

Calculating human relationships: The title Gunanphal is a familiar mathematical word, 'product', but within the story it acquires emotional and social meanings. The reader is confronted by the question of what remains of individual freedom when human relationships are calculated in terms of convenience, utility, money and status.

The significance of Meera's character: Meera is not simply someone who fulfils the family's needs. She also has her own thoughts, wishes and understanding of life's meaning. Justice within marriage requires equal recognition of the labour and aspirations of both individuals. This proposition is an important critical foundation for reading the story.

Craft and conclusion: Through domestic events and the characters' reciprocal conduct, the story develops a social significance. An abstract question is brought down to the concrete accounts and calculations of everyday life. Gunanphal thereby exposes the tension between a utilitarian approach to marriage and the dignity of individual personhood.

Akanksha (Aspiration)

Original pages: 64–71 | Principal characters or groups: Chhavi and the family involved in raising her

The story's central situation: Through Chhavi's life, the narrative raises questions about upbringing, affection, protection and decisions concerning one's own future. The family has its expectations; Chhavi has her aspirations. The two are not always in harmony.

The individual and the family: The story makes clear that, however important familial affection may be, it is not equivalent to complete authority over an individual's life. What the family considers right need not correspond to the young woman's actual wishes. Chhavi's experience reveals this complex difference.

A woman's self-determination: From the perspective of feminist criticism, Chhavi's personhood must remain at the centre. Her wishes, fears, hopes and understanding deserve due place in marriage and other decisions about her life. Aspiration is not merely a dream; it is a human insistence upon shaping one's own future.

Critical discussion: The story's emotional foundation does not weaken its social question; rather, it brings that question closer to the reader. The title signifies an unfulfilled wish within the individual. The story encourages a search for a just balance between familial protection and women's independence.

Ahibatak Haar (The Necklace of Marital Auspiciousness)

Original pages: 72–77 | Principal characters or groups: Ram Babu and his daughter Amola

Narrative circumstances: Social expectations surrounding marriage, dowry and concern for family honour are prominent in the story. From Ram Babu's point of view, the main problem is to secure his daughter's future in accordance with conventional arrangements. Amola's thinking, however, also includes the right to decide the course of her own life.

Symbolic meaning: Ahibatak Haar is a symbolic title associated with the traditional auspiciousness of married life. Through this title the author questions accepted assumptions about a woman's happiness and the fulfilment of her life. The completeness of a woman's personality cannot be determined by symbols of marriage alone.

Dowry and decision-making: The pressure of dowry turns marriage from a relationship between two persons into a matter of social transaction and prestige. Amola's point of view offers the possibility of independent thought in the face of this pressure. The father's concerns and the daughter's decisions need to be understood within the same social circumstances.

Critical assessment: Women's self-determination in this story is not simply an individual rebellion; it becomes a means of reconsidering social convention. The cultural meanings of the title give the narrative a distinctly Maithil social context. In this respect, it is an important text both for feminist criticism and for criticism of the dowry system.

Kaal-Chakra (The Cycle of Time)

Original pages: 78–81 | Principal characters or groups: Pran Kaki and Sudha

Time and relations between generations: Through Pran Kaki and Sudha, the story presents a difference in outlook between older and younger generations. Older beliefs concerning education, employment, marriage and women's futures encounter new demands arising from a changing society.

The movement of change: Time means more than the movement of a clock; it also names transformations in social thought, opportunity and conduct. The experience of one generation may be valuable to another, but cannot become an immutable rule applicable to every situation.

Feminist concerns: The story reveals the difference between older communal expectations of women's lives and newer claims to self-reliance. Education and employment open new possibilities for women. To understand the change, however, the context of the older generation's anxieties must also be considered.

Craft and conclusion: In a short form, the story presents the extensive social significance of time. The word chakra ('cycle') suggests the continuity of change. The story shows that the relationship between tradition and modernity is a subject for critical dialogue, not rigid opposition.

Drishtikon (Point of View)

Original pages: 82–88 | Principal characters or groups: Ranjana and Rakesh

The story's central question: Through the relationship between Ranjana and Rakesh, the narrative addresses prejudice surrounding marriage, love, respect and physical disability. The distance between external judgments and a person's actual qualities constitutes its central tension.

The character's decision: Ranjana's thinking does not mechanically reproduce social convention. The story develops the possibility of a humane outlook in which Rakesh's physical condition is not allowed to stand for the whole of his personhood.

Disability and dignity: It would be inappropriate to treat the story as a simple portrayal of pity. A person with a physical disability is equally entitled to full human dignity, love and the right to decide. From this perspective, the story criticises social prejudice. Ranjana's choice of relationship places human values first.

Critical discussion: The word drishtikon ('perspective') itself suggests that a problem may reside not simply in an object but also in the way it is seen. Through the characters, the author moves beyond a simple division between external incompleteness and internal completeness to consider the foundations of a respectful relationship.

Nirnay (Decision)

Original pages: 89–94 | Principal characters or groups: Ratan, Muna Bahin and Bhoji

Epistolary structure: The story's notable feature is its form as a letter. Through a letter addressed by Ratan to Muna Bahin, the family's circumstances, an accident, emotional responsibilities and the grounds for a future decision emerge. The narrative unfolds less through direct action than through remembrance and personal testimony.

The principal social question: Within a family crisis, the future of Bhoji comes into conflict with social conventions. Ratan's decision confronts established morality with the question of human responsibility. Its social significance lies in the recognition that the life of a family member cannot be made wholly subordinate to customary practice.

The effect of narrative form: The intimacy of address in the letter, recollections of experience and private reasoning bring the reader close to Ratan's inner conflict. An epistolary narrative, however, privileges the viewpoint of a single character. How clearly Bhoji's independent voice emerges remains a separate question for critical examination.

Evaluation: In Nirnay, the question of social courage is connected to an individual's responsibilities. The story does not merely reject conventional relationships; it seeks humane justice amid changing circumstances. The letter form makes the moral conflict effective.

Baate Bilayal Pani (Water Lost Along the Way)

Original pages: 95–99 | Principal characters or groups: Devki Babu, his children and Malti

Narrative: Devki Babu's old age and loneliness within the family form the basis of the story. As his children become absorbed in their separate lives, his emotional needs are neglected. The possibility of a relationship with Malti places companionship at the centre of an older person's life.

Human rights in old age: It is not enough to regard an older person merely as someone who needs accommodation and maintenance. The need for belonging, conversation, affection and independent decision-making persists to the end of life. Devki Babu's circumstances bring this truth into relief.

The social gaze: Society views the possibility of new companionship or remarriage in later life with suspicion. The story challenges this prejudice. The conflict between personal happiness and social acceptance becomes significant.

Title and critical conclusion: The title Baate Bilayal Pani suggests the flow of life and hopes gradually dissipating along the way. The story poses a far-reaching question: at what point does a person who has discharged familial duties lose the right to a life of their own? It is therefore an important work for the critical study of old age.

Aparajita (The Unvanquished)

Original pages: 100–104 | Principal characters or groups: Yashodhara and her familial and social environment

Narrative: Yashodhara's experiences of competition, difficulty, failure and renewed effort form the substance of the story. Despite recurrent obstacles, she refuses to surrender. Confidence develops through repeated attempts.

Implications of the title: Aparajita signifies not only someone who wins a competition but also someone who does not lose confidence in adversity. The title accords recognition to a quality of the protagonist's mind.

A woman's inner strength: Yashodhara's struggle shows that the aspiration to independence and respect is linked with personal effort. The importance of her endeavour lies not merely in winning social recognition but in the development of her own personality.

Meaning of the ending: As the final story in the collection, Aparajita gives the whole volume an optimistic tone. In response to the social barriers, pain and difficulties of decision-making presented in earlier stories, inner strength emerges as one possible answer. Yet individual success does not depend on personal effort alone: the part played by social opportunity and structural conditions must also be recognised.

Comparative Thematic Discussion of the Stories

Class, Labour and Social Standing

Reading Samay-Sanket and Paigh Lok together brings two forms of social standing into focus. The first presents an unequal distribution of power and rights; the second asks about the value of labour and human dignity. Sukhna comes to understand the meaning of his participation in the face of governmental or local dominance, while Preeta assesses what genuine greatness of conduct means within a wealthy environment. Both stories centre on the same question: how can human dignity be preserved independently of social status?

Marriage, Domestic Life and Women's Desires

In Gunanphal, Akanksha and Ahibatak Haar, the relationship between women's desires and social expectations in married life or the prospect of marriage is central. To treat marriage solely as a socially sanctioned institution suppresses the question of a woman's distinct personhood. Ahibatak Haar brings this tension into relief through cultural symbolism, while Gunanphal exposes the struggle between utility and dignity in the inner conduct of marriage. Akanksha clarifies the conflict between protection and freedom.

Self-Reliance and Inner Strength

Reading Dhuri and Aparajita together foregrounds women's capacity to face adversity. A sudden crisis awakens in Sheela the need for independence. Yashodhara's struggle establishes the importance of sustained effort and morale. The affirmative value of both stories is clear, but criticism must also ask how much social support and opportunity are available to enable an individual's efforts to bear fruit.

Old Age, Service and Human Relationships

Gulab Kaki and Baate Bilayal Pani depict different circumstances of old age. The first addresses neglect of an older woman and the need to belong; the second concerns an older man's entitlement to companionship and personal happiness. Badla presents an ethical problem of service and compassion. The thread connecting these stories is that the existence of a family does not, in itself, guarantee sympathy. Respect for each person's experience is necessary to make relationships humane.

Changing Times, Values and Decisions

Yuddh and Kaal-Chakra portray the clash between generational experience and new ways of thinking. Nirnay takes the issue to the level of social convention and personal moral responsibility. Drishtikon reveals the role of prejudice in evaluating a person. In these stories, changing times mean not simply technological or economic developments but also the creation of new foundations for understanding relationships.

Narrative Craft and Linguistic Analysis

Plot and the Scale of the Stories

Many stories in the collection begin with a domestic incident or a familiar village episode and gradually arrive at a wider social question. Value-laden conclusions emerge through the characters' experiences. Some stories focus on a single small episode; others present several layers of relationship. The epistolary form of Nirnay is a particularly distinctive instance of the collection's formal variety.

The Function of Dialogue

The exchanges among Sukhna, Bilti and Master Saheb in Samay-Sanket, the generational dialogue in Yuddh, and the conversations expressing divergent viewpoints in Kaal-Chakra all contribute to the construction of meaning. Village speech and domestic address terms connect the characters to their society. Dialogue is not merely a means of conveying information; it also discloses social distance, intimacy and conflicts of value.

The Choice of Titles

The titles are both descriptive and suggestive. Gulab Kaki establishes intimacy through a person's name; Paigh Lok satirises a familiar social expression; Gunanphal turns a mathematical term into a question about relationships; and Yuddh, Dhuri, Kaal-Chakra and Samay-Sanket open up possibilities of metaphorical extension. The cultural expression Ahibatak Haar invokes a specifically Maithil marital context.

The Local Character of Maithili and the Author's Voice

The original book's language contains village and household practices, intimate forms of address, words from local life and the natural movement of dialogue. Terms such as 'paigh', 'kaki', 'Bilti' and 'ahibat' carry signs of cultural circumstance as well as lexical meaning. The analysis retains the original story and character names and the cultural terms. The critical prose of the source study, meanwhile, endeavours to use standard written Maithili so that the local quality of the stories' language is not effaced.

The Relationship between Narrative and Instruction

In some stories, the moral message emerges explicitly. This may also be regarded as a characteristic of the collection's social commitment. From the standpoint of literary criticism, however, clarity of thought and artistic enactment in a story are two distinct criteria. The present evaluation therefore attends not only to the ideas but also to the credibility of events, complexity of characters and possibility of multiple meanings in the narrative.

Feminist Criticism: Achievements and Contradictions

An important achievement of the collection is that the female characters are not confined to representing familial roles. They understand circumstances, endure suffering, ask questions and, at certain points, make their own decisions. The experiences of Preeta, Sheela, Meera, Chhavi, Amola, Ranjana and Yashodhara demonstrate women's capacity to determine the course of their lives in a variety of circumstances.

Nevertheless, the emphasis upon women's service, forgiveness and forbearance repeatedly raises a question: are men expected to possess these qualities to the same extent? The issue is especially important in reading Badla. Similarly, if a woman's self-reliance is treated solely as an achievement following crisis, inequalities of everyday opportunity, education and resources will remain obscured. Dhuri provides occasion for this further enquiry.

Feminist criticism should not assume that the circumstances of older women, economically dependent women, young unmarried women and married women are identical. Gulab Kaki's experience differs from Amola's in Ahibatak Haar. Respecting such differences reveals the breadth of the author's fictional world.

The collection's feminist dimension should consequently not be confined to slogans or one-dimensional opposition. It criticises tradition but also values familial intimacy; it insists upon women's independence while raising questions of responsibility and sympathy. Its intellectual complexity arises from these tensions.

Conclusion: Signs of the Times and an Unconquerable Sense of Life

The fourteen stories of Samay-Sanket present numerous layers of Maithil social life: working families in villages, conduct in prosperous households, internal imbalances within marriage, the loneliness of older people, young women's decisions about marriage, generational differences of outlook and inner strength in the face of adversity. Questions of human dignity and the just reconsideration of relationships lie at the centre of this diversity.

Viewed together, Sukhna's growing consciousness of his rights at the beginning and Yashodhara's self-confidence at the end yield two strands of collective and individual change. The former questions social structure; the latter offers a possibility of strength under adverse conditions. Between them, the stories describe life's difficult alternatives.

The author's importance lies in her ability to turn inequalities and sensitivities hidden within familiar social life into narratives. Original Maithili expression, domestic dialogue and social symbolism give the stories their regional identity. By preserving that identity, their human questions also acquire a wider significance for readers.

The final critical conclusion is that the collection is a literary exploration of the desire for change and the reassessment of relationships. Its characters are neither wholly ideal nor wholly culpable; they are human beings seeking meaning amid changing social circumstances. Appropriate criticism must acknowledge this complexity.

Principal Findings of the Study

1. Although the fourteen stories portray different situations in life, they are connected by questions of human dignity and social change.

2. Women's self-determination, education, economic independence and rights concerning marriage recur throughout the collection.

3. Criticism of conventional measures of social standing is particularly pronounced in Samay-Sanket and Paigh Lok.

4. The critical treatment of old age is developed through both male and female characters; maintenance alone is insufficient, for affection and companionship are also necessary.

5. The story titles are frequently more than simple names for events: they signal broader symbols or critical questions.

6. The epistolary Nirnay introduces formal variety into the collection's modes of narration.

7. In evaluating the feminist significance of the stories, attention must also be paid to the possible tension between glorifying women's sacrifice and affirming women's freedom.

8. The original book's language and social forms of address place its characters within distinctively Maithil circumstances.

Chapter 3: A Maithili Vocabulary of Dress, Costume and Adornment

Primary work: Dr Kamla Chaudhary, Maithilīk Vesh-Bhūshā-Prasādhan Sambandhī Shabdāvalī, 2008.

The Scope of the Work and the Critical Perspective

Dr Kamla Chaudhary's book addresses a particular field of interaction between language and folk culture: Maithili words associated with clothing worn upon the body, ornaments and materials for personal adornment. The word shabdavali ('vocabulary') in the title is important. The author moves beyond a mere inventory of garments towards the analysis of naming, semantic change, established usage and representation in literature.

The sequence of the contents itself proposes an argument: first the Indian tradition, followed by the Maithil tradition, then historical change; next the evidence of ancient, medieval and modern Maithili literature; and finally lexicographical classification and linguistic analysis. In this structure, cultural history and linguistics form two mutually complementary foundations.

An Outline of the Original Work's Twelve Chapters

Chapter	Subject	First printed page
1	Indian traditions of dress and adornment	1
2	Maithil traditions of dress and adornment	34
3	Influences upon Maithil tradition and resulting changes	61
4	Dress and adornment in ancient Maithili literature	67
5	Dress and adornment in medieval Maithili literature	94
6	Dress and adornment in modern Maithili literature	153
7	Vocabulary of dress	272
8	Vocabulary of ornaments	292
9	Vocabulary of cosmetics and adornment	302
10	Phonological analysis	310
11	Lexical analysis	316
12	The study of prefixes and suffixes	324

Chapter One: Indian Traditions of Dress and Adornment

In the original work, this chapter begins on printed page 1 and extends to page 33, immediately before the following chapter (as indicated by the table of contents).

The discussion of Indian tradition serves as an introduction situating the Maithili lexicon within a broader civilisational setting. Dress and adornment are not simply objects of aesthetic appreciation; they are signs bearing meanings associated with social decorum, season, occasion, community practices and religious observances. Without this background, it is difficult to understand the full meanings of local terms.

In establishing relationships between Indian sources and local words of Mithila, a distinction is needed between resemblance of form and genuine historical connection. Finding the name of a garment in Sanskrit or another early text does not, by itself, prove its uninterrupted use in Maithili. Intermediate periods, changes of form, semantic development and evidence of spoken use all need to be considered.

From a critical standpoint, the usefulness of this chapter lies in providing a comparative basis. Yet Indian clothing has never been wholly uniform: variations arise from region, materials, techniques of manufacture and social class. Local particularities should not be dissolved by treating the 'Indian' context as a universal rule.

The research questions arising from this chapter are these: which words originate in a broad Indian tradition, which forms develop particular meanings in Maithili, and which objects are understood differently in various regions under the same name? Questions of this kind make the historical study of vocabulary accountable to evidence.

Chapter Two: Maithil Traditions of Dress and Adornment

In the original work, this chapter begins on printed page 34 and extends to page 60, immediately before the next chapter (according to the table of contents).

The focus now shifts from general Indian practice to the specific character of Maithil social life. Local forms of dress, the practices of adornment among women and men, social rites, occasions such as weddings, available materials and customary names are interrelated. These relationships provide the key to understanding the vocabulary.

It would be inappropriate to treat 'old' and 'new' as invariably opposed categories in explaining Maithil tradition. A name for an item of clothing may continue even as its construction, fibre, manner of wearing or circumstances of use change. Conversely, new materials may impart fresh meanings to established local words.

Folk memory and written evidence should be weighed separately. A name preserved in an older speaker's memory is extremely valuable, but its date must be checked against other evidence. Recording regional distinctions—north and south, town and village, and linguistic contact along border areas—would further broaden this research.

The chapter's principal achievement is to establish the material culture of the Maithil body as a legitimate subject of linguistic study. The history of a language is not only the history of literary style; domestic practices, garment names and methods of ornamentation are also part of its living archive.

Chapter Three: Influences upon Maithil Tradition and the Changes They Produced

In the original work, this chapter begins on printed page 61 and extends to page 66, immediately before the next chapter (according to the table of contents).

The existence of a separate chapter on this subject is significant. Tradition is not a static object but a social process affected by contact, trade, politics, education, transport and changes in modes of production. Changes in vocabulary must be understood within this mobile context.

New forms of clothing and jewellery may bring new names. Sometimes an outside word is adopted in full; sometimes it acquires a local phonetic form; and sometimes an existing word comes to denote a new object. These are processes of lexical borrowing, semantic extension and renaming in linguistics.

To understand changes in clothing merely as the 'decline of tradition' would restrict the analysis. Changes in convenience, cost, the gendered division of labour, availability and taste alter social functions. Traditional dress may persist in wedding rituals while newer garments come into everyday use during the same period.

At the level of criticism, the direction, duration and channels of influence could be classified more systematically in this chapter. Internal developments within Mithila, contact with neighbouring languages and the introduction of distant industrial products are not identical processes.

Chapter Four: Dress and Adornment Described in Ancient Maithili Literature

In the original work, this chapter begins on printed page 67 and extends to page 93, immediately before the next chapter (according to the table of contents).

The use of literary evidence is central to the methodological importance of the work. Terms relating to clothing in poetry or early written texts demonstrate historical word forms and cultural imagination. The language of poetry, however, is not a direct statistical record of actual daily practices.

The occurrence of a word can provide three kinds of evidence: the existence of a name for an object, its figurative or ornamental meaning, or the values of the period. A reference to jewellery, for instance, may signify beauty, status or emotion rather than merely the physical object. Meaning cannot be established without reading the context.

In examining this literary chapter, the date of composition, available textual editions, linguistic form and accuracy of quotations are decisive. It can be misleading to treat the spelling of a later editor as phonetic evidence from the original period. The complete line surrounding each term, together with source references, would make the enquiry reproducible.

The effort to trace survivals of ancient terms in present-day speech is useful, but similarity of sound alone does not establish continuity of meaning.

Comparison of an object's actual construction with its contemporary meaning is a promising direction in which the chapter could be developed.

Chapter Five: Dress and Adornment Described in Medieval Maithili Literature

In the original work, this chapter begins on printed page 94 and extends to page 152, immediately before the next chapter (according to the table of contents).

The considerable space devoted to medieval literature indicates a particular interest in historical lexical evidence. Poetry may bring clothing, adornment, bodily ornamentation and elaborate metaphors into simultaneous view. Contexts such as the description of a heroine, social appearance and religious feeling produce differences in meaning.

In studying the poetry of this period, symbolic language must be distinguished from actual dress. An ornament in a poem may express devotional or erotic feeling; it does not thereby establish the everyday clothing practices of every woman or man in society.

Questions of textual variants, manuscript traditions and editorial standardisation are relevant to the history of Maithili literature. Where a word occurs in different forms across texts, relationships among variant form, pronunciation and meaning should be recorded with their uncertainty intact.

The research value of this chapter resides in comparing the chronological occurrence of words with their literary use. A consistent analytical sequence can be constructed around the term, literary work, period, meaning, formal variants and present-day usage.

Chapter Six: Dress and Adornment Described in Modern Maithili Literature

In the original work, this chapter begins on printed page 153 and extends to page 271, immediately before the next chapter (according to the table of contents).

According to the contents, the chapter on modern literature is among the most extensive sections of the book. Its length itself suggests that the language of local clothing in modern fiction, poetry and other literary genres provides rich material for comparative study.

In modern writing, words for clothing and adornment may signal a character's economic circumstances, caste standing, generational difference, gendered expectations, participation in a festival or experience of displacement. Literary descriptions may be ironic, reminiscent or realistic. Dictionary definitions therefore remain incomplete without an understanding of their textual settings.

Modern consumer culture and changing production systems may add new categories to the lexicon. Nevertheless, this broad historical observation cannot be treated as a direct conclusion about any particular author or quotation in the book. Each specific example requires verification against the original text.

A critique of this chapter raises the problem of literary representativeness. The world of characters in literature is not a statistical sample of Mithila as a whole. Unequal representation of town and village, social class, gender and historical periods may affect the frequency of terms in a lexical collection.

The importance of this section lies in completing the historical triad—ancient, medieval and modern. To test the relationships among the three chapters scientifically, evidence-based markers such as 'earliest attested written use' and 'latest attested use' of a particular item would be useful.

Chapter Seven: The Vocabulary of Dress

In the original work, this chapter begins on printed page 272 and extends to page 291, immediately before the next chapter (according to the table of contents).

According to the contents, this chapter marks the book's movement from descriptive history towards direct lexicography. Printed pages 286–287, which were examined, contain names of garments and definitions concerning their construction, shape, use or manner of wearing them upon the body. This distinguishes the passage from a lifeless catalogue of names.

Among the words and variants visible in this part of the original are ‘पायजामा/पजामा’ (payjama/pajama), ‘मोहरी’ (mohari), ‘पेट’ (pet), ‘साड़ी’ (sari), ‘नुआ/लुगा’ (nua/luga) and ‘आँचर’ (anchar). They are presented here only as directly observed examples; no claim is made that any of them bears the same meaning everywhere.

The description of the sari in particular suggests relations among the garment's sections, their location on the body and local naming practices. A word such as ‘आँचर’ (anchar), though it names a specific part of a garment, may acquire additional meanings through social usage. A lexicon is enhanced by relating names for parts of objects to associated actions and social contexts.

For a critical study of this chapter, a functional classification of clothing—upper garments, lower garments, coverings, stitched and unstitched clothing, use by men, women or both, and special occasions—would be useful. This is an analytical proposal by the researcher, not a verified sequence encompassing every entry in the original book.

Chapter Eight: The Vocabulary of Ornaments

In the original work, this chapter begins on printed page 292 and extends to page 301, immediately before the next chapter (according to the table of contents).

The vocabulary of jewellery and ornaments provides an opportunity to consider the physical construction of an object alongside its social and symbolic meanings. Classification by the part of the body—ear, nose, neck, upper arm, hand, waist and foot—often clarifies the organisation of meaning.

A lexical study of ornaments should separately record metals, gems, construction, use in pairs or singly, association with marriage or other rituals, and variations in local names. A change in the size or material of an object may alter its designation, while the same name may apply to several forms.

Questions of gender and marital status form an important cultural concern associated with this chapter. It would, however, be an ahistorical generalisation to assume that a particular ornament has had one compulsory social significance across all the communities and periods of Mithila.

From a lexicographical standpoint, illustrations of ornaments, their placement on the body, synonyms, regional alternatives and verified literary quotations would make this chapter more effective as an archive of folk culture.

Chapter Nine: The Vocabulary of Cosmetics and Adornment

In the original work, this chapter begins on printed page 302 and extends to page 309, immediately before the next chapter (according to the table of contents).

The domain of personal adornment differs somewhat from clothing and jewellery. It brings together the materials and practices of decorating the body, applying substances, arranging hair, using fragrances and other forms of ornamentation. One word may name a material, another the act of applying it or the appropriate occasion for doing so.

For words of this kind, the boundary between physical substance and social meaning is often permeable. The same item may acquire different meanings in the contexts of daily hygiene, beauty, ritual or health. A single-line synonym is therefore not always sufficient.

The relationship between traditional folk cosmetics and new commercially available materials can be connected with linguistic change. Establishing the date of introduction of any particular product, however, requires additional historical evidence; the present critique does not supply dates unsupported by sources.

Future research arising from this chapter would benefit from separate descriptions of types of substance, methods of preparation, user groups, occasions, restrictions and their presence in folk songs.

Chapter Ten: Phonological Analysis

In the original work, this chapter begins on printed page 310 and extends to page 315, immediately before the next chapter (according to the table of contents).

The inclusion of phonological analysis means that this is more than a cultural word list: it makes a claim to linguistic investigation. Terms associated with dress and adornment may undergo changes of pronunciation across time and region.

A linguistic investigation must distinguish the root form, actual pronunciation, phonetic shifts, vowel changes, consonant simplification and forms resulting from language contact. Orthographic variation is not the same as phonetic variation: different written forms must not automatically be taken as evidence of different pronunciations.

Resemblance of form alone is insufficient to establish a word's etymology. Historical intermediate forms, correspondence of meaning and identifiable phonological rules are required. Re-examination according to these criteria could increase the usefulness of the book's linguistic contribution.

In evaluating this chapter, it would be useful to record separately the place of pronunciation, speakers' generations, social settings and the conventional spellings of written literature.

Chapter Eleven: Lexical Analysis

In the original work, this chapter begins on printed page 316 and extends to page 323, immediately before the next chapter (according to the table of contents).

The study of words encompasses their formation, structure, classification, meanings and relationships. The overall plan of this book raises a particular question: which names for objects have local origins, which have entered through other linguistic traditions, and which have developed multiple meanings?

Multiple names for the same object, or the use of the same name for several objects, demonstrate the practical character of a vocabulary. Under these conditions, the analysis of synonymy, semantic narrowing, semantic extension and the formation of names is not merely the accumulation of lexical material; it is also an enquiry into semantics.

From a critical perspective, the minimum essential elements of each entry might be considered to include the headword, grammatical class, clear definition, example, distinguishing boundaries, current usage and supporting source. This is a proposed lexicographical standard, not a claim that every entry in the original work meets these requirements.

The chapter is relevant because of its potential to connect objects of everyday life with the semantic organisation of language. Comparison with vocabularies of other social domains may clarify general tendencies in Maithili word formation.

Chapter Twelve: The Study of Prefixes and Suffixes

In the original work, this chapter begins on printed page 324 and extends to page 340, immediately before the following section (according to the table of contents).

The final chapter examines the morphological means of forming words. The creation of new terms through prefixes and suffixes offers an appropriate field for the structural study of vocabulary associated with clothing and adornment.

Semantic analysis must determine whether a given form is genuinely a productive suffix or simply an inseparable part of an older word. Before treating a form borrowed from a contact language as a Maithili suffix, evidence is needed from independent examples, frequency and phonological adaptation.

A parallel presentation of base words, derived forms, grammatical categories, changes in meaning and attested usage would be useful in evaluating this chapter. Such a method could yield a coherent account of word formation, rather than merely a list of forms.

The order of phonology, lexicon and then prefixes and suffixes in the book is meaningful from a linguistic standpoint. Here the cultural vocabulary and grammatical analysis enter into the same study.

A Critical Reading of the Conclusion (from Printed Page 341)

The original book provides a separate 'Conclusion'. In view of the entire contents, the wider contribution of the research lies in bringing Maithili literature, the material culture of everyday life and linguistic analysis of vocabulary into a shared field of enquiry.

To treat the book merely as a list of names threatened with disappearance would be to limit its potential. It is important as an attempt to combine the definition of words in their cultural contexts, the collection of literary evidence and the analysis of form. Nevertheless, verification of textual sources, standardised citation and the identification of regions of use require separate, more detailed scrutiny.

A Study of the Appendices

Appendix (a): List of Words — Printed Page 345

According to the contents, the original book concludes with a list of additional words collected after the main text had been completed. This is editorially significant: a lexical collection is not a fixed and final inventory but a process that can continue to grow with research and regional dialogue. To incorporate these words into a final dictionary, their forms, meanings, supporting evidence and areas of use should be recorded.

Appendix (b): Reference Bibliography — Printed Page 351

A reference bibliography is a primary means of testing historical claims, poetic quotations, etymologies and descriptions of society and culture. The original list has not been reproduced verbatim in the present discussion; accordingly, no additional work has been falsely attributed to the author of the source.

Appendix (c): 'List of Erroneous Books' — Printed Page 354

The third appendix is named 'Ashuddhi Granthak Suchi' ('List of Erroneous Books') in the original table of contents. This title is reproduced from that list; without closer confirmation of its intended meaning or the form of its entries, it has not been silently converted into an ordinary 'List of Corrections'. Preserving the distinction is an essential condition of source-faithful textual editing.

A Close Reading of Terms Relating to Dress

On the two pages concerning dress vocabulary, the discussion of 'पायजामा/पजामा' (payjama/pajama) includes details of its construction and manner of wearing; 'मोहरी' (mohari) denotes a lower section; and 'साड़ी' (sari) and 'नुआ/लुगा' (nua/luga) are also discussed. The influence of local usage on the forms of words becomes apparent.

In the discussion of the sari, there is an account of its front, back and upper parts, and sections relating to its length. 'आँचर' (anchar) appears in this context as well. This is an important lexicographical method: the names of an object's parts, its uses and associated actions can be examined within a single semantic field.

The examples on these pages disclose at least four levels of linguistic structure: (1) the main name of the object, (2) alternative local forms, (3) names for its constituent parts, and (4) verbal descriptions of the manner of wearing it. Separate indexing of these four levels would make the research more searchable.

Integrated Critical Conclusions

1. This book connects the study of Maithil clothing culture with vocabulary and literary history. It would therefore be inappropriate to confine it either to a narrow ethnographic category or to lexicography alone.

2. The sequence of twelve chapters extends from a broad Indian background through Maithil particularities, historical change and chronological literary evidence to the lexical collection and linguistic analysis.

3. Dress, jewellery and cosmetics are not synonymous domains. Clear subcategories are needed on the basis of practical use, relations to the body and social symbolism.

4. The lexical material directly examined in the original work includes significant regional variants and names for parts of objects. These demonstrate the richness of Maithili lexicography.

5. Descriptions of dress in poetry should not be treated as results of a social census. The genre, context and textual variants of every literary example should be checked.

6. Claims concerning historical continuity, external influences, etymology and use within particular communities need not all meet an identical evidentiary standard. Each kind of claim requires its own class of evidence.

7. In a future scholarly edition, each entry should be accompanied by clear markers of printed page, quotation, variant form, meaning, class of object, region, literary period and source verification.

General Conclusion

The diversity of Kamla Chaudhary's writing becomes apparent across these three works. In Monak Pauti, the translator imaginatively enters another writer's consciousness, establishing a dialogue between language and experience. In Samay-Sanket, the storyteller's vision focuses upon social inequality, interpersonal relationships and the ethics of decision-making. In A Maithili Vocabulary of Dress, Costume and Adornment, the material history of cultural life is preserved in the form of words.

Shashitara in Monak Pauti and many of the female characters in Samay-Sanket raise a shared question: how can an individual preserve her desires, rights and dignity beyond the roles sanctioned by society? Yet the former is a translated novella and the latter an original collection of stories. To place them side by side while effacing the differences in their narrative methods and authorial responsibility would be a critical error.

The lexicographical investigation of dress and adornment opens a different perspective upon this question. Names for the clothes, jewellery, personal adornments and social practices of women and men are not merely names of material objects; they also indicate history, status, taste and relationships. Cultural terms that appear naturally in fiction and translation can be examined in the vocabulary work through their semantic development and inherited usage.

Connecting these three directions, an intimacy with everyday life in the Maithili language, the assertion of women's personhood, diversity of social conduct and vitality of literary craft emerge as major characteristics of Kamla Chaudhary's work. Rather than pronouncing a final judgment, this volume offers readers a systematic basis for enquiry in which fiction, translation, and the questions of language and culture illuminate one another.

Bibliography

A. Primary Works and Editions

Ashapurna Devi. Monak Pauti. Maithili translation of the original Bengali narrative by Kamla Chaudhary. Berma/Nirmali, Bihar: Pallavi Prakashan, 2022. ISBN 978-93-93135-12-4.

Chaudhary, Kamla. Samay-Sanket. Maithili short-story collection, 2010. Publisher not established from the available bibliographical information.

Chaudhary, Kamla. Maithilīk Vesh-Bhūshā-Prasādhan Sambandhī Shabdāvalī. 2008. Publisher not established from the available bibliographical information.

B. Printed Works on Translation Theory and Comparative Literature

Baker, Mona. In Other Words: A Coursebook on Translation. Second edition. London and New York: Routledge, 2011.

Bassnett, Susan. Translation Studies. Fourth edition. London and New York: Routledge, 2014.

Catford, J. C. A Linguistic Theory of Translation: An Essay in Applied Linguistics. London: Oxford University Press, 1965.

Munday, Jeremy. Introducing Translation Studies: Theories and Applications. Fourth edition. London and New York: Routledge, 2016.

Nida, Eugene A. Toward a Science of Translating: With Special Reference to Principles and Procedures Involved in Bible Translating. Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1964.

Nida, Eugene A., and Charles R. Taber. The Theory and Practice of Translation. Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1969.

Nord, Christiane. Translating as a Purposeful Activity: Functionalist Approaches Explained. Manchester: St. Jerome Publishing, 1997.

Toury, Gideon. Descriptive Translation Studies and Beyond. Amsterdam and Philadelphia: John Benjamins Publishing Company, 1995.

Venuti, Lawrence. The Translator's Invisibility: A History of Translation. London and New York: Routledge, 1995.

Niranjana, Tejaswini. Siting Translation: History, Post-Structuralism, and the Colonial Context. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1992.

Simon, Sherry. Gender in Translation: Cultural Identity and the Politics of Transmission. London and New York: Routledge, 1996.

C. Printed Works on Narrative Criticism and Lexicography

Landau, Sidney I. Dictionaries: The Art and Craft of Lexicography. Second edition. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2001.

Rimmon-Kenan, Shlomith. Narrative Fiction: Contemporary Poetics. Second edition. London: Routledge, 2002.

Zgusta, Ladislav. Manual of Lexicography. The Hague: Mouton, 1971.

D. Bibliographical Note

The relationship between the printed Bengali editions, dates and publishers associated with the title Moner Jhanpi in the publication details of Monak Pauti and the title Sonar Kouto examined comparatively here has not been established. No separate bibliographical entry has therefore been invented for an unverified Bengali edition. Likewise, the names of the publishers of Samay-Sanket and Maithilīk Vesh-Bhūshā-Prasādhan Sambandhī Shabdāvalī have not been supplied without confirmation.

STUDY 04 / NIT NAVAL

Vrishesh Chandra Lal

1. Andolan (Movement)

Vrishesh Chandra Lal's Poetry Collection Andolan: A Close Literary-Historical Study of Contemporary Political Consciousness, Political Regression and Democratic Discourse

Original work	Andolan — a collection of Maithili poetry
Author / poet	Vrishesh Chandra Lal
Genre	Maithili poetry collection
Publisher	Sudama Prakashan, Janakpurdham
Publication context	Vikram Samvat 2061; the historical background of Nepal's political crisis of 2002–04 and the movement against political regression
Price	NPR 15 / INR 10
Dedication	To martyrs and great souls who sacrificed themselves for the public good
Preface	Dr Rajendra Prasad "Vimal" (Devithan, Janakpurdham)

Introduction

Literature is not merely a mirror of society; it is also among the most authentic records of an age's pulse, its political upheavals and its human struggles. To understand the history of any period, political essays, government documents and a chronology of historical events are necessary. Yet to experience the genuine suffering, anger and hopes of ordinary people, the literature of that period is indispensable. In the words of the eminent Maithili critic Dr Rajendra Prasad "Vimal," "Poetry, or literature, has been called the articulate sibling of silent history." In this wider context, Andolan, a collection of Maithili poems by the senior politician and writer Vrishesh Chandra Lal, composed against the background of Nepal's contemporary political history—particularly its democratic struggle, royal regression and popular movements—is regarded as a historical, intellectual and literary milestone.

Published by Sudama Prakashan, Janakpurdham, the collection was given a highly symbolic price—15 Nepalese rupees and 10 Indian rupees. This suggests that the book's primary purpose was not commercial profit but the dissemination of democratic consciousness and the message of resistance to regression among the people. Its dedication honours all the known and unknown martyrs and great souls who sacrificed their lives for the public good and in defence of democracy. From the outset, the dedication reveals the revolutionary, people-centred ethos of the work and its profound regard for sacrifice.

The title Andolan, or "Movement," simultaneously opens up three dimensions: action, condition and history. It signifies not simply a particular political programme, but movement against inertia, resistance against fear, and an insistence upon popular rights against a society organised around power. The collection was published by Sudama Prakashan, Janakpurdham. A university bibliography gives its publication year as Vikram Samvat 2061, corresponding to 2004–05 CE. During this period Nepal was passing through a severe political crisis marked by the dissolution of its elected parliament, royal intervention, the Maoist armed conflict and the anti-regression protests of democratic parties.

The dedication page establishes the book's moral register in advance: it is dedicated to martyrs and great souls who endured "the pain of sacrifice for the public good." The significance of this statement is not confined to a sentimental tribute. In the poems that follow, the poet repeatedly asks who enjoys the fruits of sacrifice, who bears the suffering, who acquires the prestige of leadership, and where the people stand in all this. Thus the dedication and the satire of "Chalu Andolanme!" ("Come, Let Us Join the Movement!") are not opposed to one another. They are two ends of the same moral question: genuine sacrifice versus the political trade in sacrifice.

In his preface, Dr Rajendra Prasad "Vimal" speaks of poetry as "the articulate sibling of history" and regards each poem in the collection as a "vigorous document" of the Nepal of its time. Yet the literary value of the book is not confined to documentary testimony. News ceases to be news, and political circumstances change. Poetry endures when it rises above immediate events and becomes an enduring inquiry into power, fear, opportunism, the crowd, the hero, popular rights, nationhood and development. The strongest poems in Andolan achieve precisely this elevation.

The Writer's Personality, Political Background and Literary Endeavour

The poet Vrishesh Chandra Lal was born on 29 March 1955 (16 Chaitra 2011 in the Nepali calendar). His life has been devoted to the continuing struggle for democracy, social justice and the rights of Madhesh in Nepal. He is a prominent figure in Nepal's democratic movement, a former member of the National Assembly (2017–19), and a former head (mayor) of Janakpur Municipality.

A study of his political journey is indispensable to an understanding of this poetry collection. Initially he was a committed political follower of Bishweshwar Prasad Koirala (B. P. Koirala), Nepal's first democratically elected prime minister and a major literary figure, and for many years he was active in the politics of the Nepali Congress. B. P. Koirala's principles of democratic socialism, national reconciliation and human freedom remained the foundations of Vrishesh Chandra Lal's intellectual outlook. Later, seeking to respond to the aspirations of the Madhesh movement and disillusioned with the centralising mentality of the state, he left the Nepali Congress in 2007 along with Mahantha Thakur and played a leading role in founding the Tarai Madhesh Loktantrik Party (TMLP). Subsequently, after playing an important role in the Loktantrik Samajwadi Party (LSP), he decided to revive the TMLP in protest against the working methods of its president, Mahantha Thakur, and the neglect of the essential concerns of the Madhesh movement. This entire succession of political advances and reversals demonstrates that Vrishesh Chandra Lal is not a poet who imagines the world from an air-conditioned room; he is a realist writer formed among the streets, political movements and ordinary people. In 2018 the well-known Mithila Natya Kala Parishad (MINAP) of Janakpur also conferred on him the title of "Mahamurkh" at its Mahamurkh Sammelan, a recognition indicative of his acceptance within social and cultural life.

Although political responsibilities have left him insufficient time for literary creation, the works he has produced constitute an invaluable resource for Maithili literature. His Maithili adaptation of Modiaain, the celebrated psychological novel by Bishweshwar Prasad Koirala; his original collection of stories Malho; and an intellectual work such as Sanghiyatak Sambandhme ("On Federalism") attest to his literary and intellectual depth. Dr Rajendra Prasad "Vimal" observes that Lal's personality has been marked since childhood by emotion, sensitivity, reflection, an awareness of the historical moment and an acute political consciousness. Because he dedicated the greater part of his energies to establishing democracy, however, the literary world has received only a small portion of the gifts of his talent. Nevertheless, the surge of feeling, rhetorical force, imagery and unflinching depiction of reality in Andolan offer irrefutable evidence of his poetic gifts, much of which had hitherto remained unseen.

Principal aspects of Vrishesh Chandra Lal's life and work	Description and historical significance
Birth and early influences	29 March 1955; profoundly influenced by B. P. Koirala's democratic socialism.
Political career	Former mayor of Janakpur, former member of the National Assembly (2017–19), founding leader of the TMLP.
Ideological evolution	Nepali Congress (until 2007), followed by leadership in the TMLP, LSP and the revived TMLP in pursuit of Madhesh rights.
Literary contribution	Andolan (poetry collection), Malho (short-story collection), Modiaain (Maithili translation), Sanghiyatak Sambandhme (translation / critical discussion).

Political vocabulary in Andolan therefore never feels ornamental. “Power,” “people,” “nationality,” “republic,” “peace,” “struggle” and “sacrifice” may be abstract nouns, but the poet connects them with bodies, hunger, batons, blood, streets, darkness, drums, grinding stones, rooms and soil. Political thought is transformed successfully into poetry when an idea becomes a scene; this quality is particularly strong in Lal’s finest lines.

Historical and Political Background: Royal Regression and the People’s Movement

An authentic evaluation of revolutionary literature is impossible without reference to the historical context in which it was composed. The creative circumstances of Andolan are bound up with one of the most tragic, unstable and decisive periods in Nepal’s contemporary history, Vikram Samvat 2059–63. The process by which democratic institutions in Nepal were systematically dismantled culminated in King Gyanendra’s royal coup. The dissolution of the House of Representatives by the then prime minister in Jeth 2059 (May 2002), the subsequent removal of the elected prime minister in Asoj 2059 (October 2002), and finally the direct royal takeover by King Gyanendra on 19 Magh 2061 (1 February 2005) brought Nepal’s democratic system to the point of collapse.

Without understanding Nepal in Vikram Samvat 2061, it is difficult to grasp the full poetic intensity of Andolan. Parliament was dissolved in May 2002. In October 2002 King Gyanendra removed Prime Minister Sher Bahadur Deuba and assumed executive authority himself; elections remained suspended and the process of elected representation became uncertain. By 2003–04, the country faced a combined crisis of royally appointed governments, Maoist violence, a security policy centred on the army and pressure on civil liberties. Human-rights reports document widespread repression of the anti-regression demonstrations organised by five political parties in April 2004. The reverberations of this atmosphere can clearly be heard in the collection’s images of darkness, ghosts, guns, batons, swindlers, terror, blood and resistance.

For these historical reasons, it would be inappropriate to read the collection retrospectively through the outcomes of the later Madhesh movement of 2007 or the establishment of the republic in 2008. The poet subsequently played an important public role in Madhesh politics and the debate on federalism. But the immediate historical moment of Andolan was principally one of crisis in parliamentary democracy, royal regression and questions concerning the credibility of political parties. This distinction in chronology is essential; otherwise, the poet’s later political identity may be imposed upon the meanings of the original poems.

One interpretation associates the immediate context of the collection’s composition with the dissolution of the House of Representatives in 2020. But because the book’s publication year is given as Vikram Samvat 2061, this view does not accord with the chronology of its publication. It is therefore more consistent to locate the collection’s original historical setting in the parliamentary crisis of 2002–04, royal intervention, Maoist conflict and the anti-regression movement.

During this period Nepal was caught in a terrifying cycle: military repression by the state on one side and the Maoist armed conflict on the other. Fundamental civil rights were suspended, the media were subjected to stringent censorship, journalists and political activists who voiced independent opinions were imprisoned, and a pervasive atmosphere of terror, murder and fear prevailed. Against this authoritarianism and the conspiracies of political regression, an alliance of seven parliamentary parties, civil society and the general public took to the streets and sounded the call for mass mobilisation. This movement ultimately opened the way to the historic second People's Movement of 2062–63, the end of the 240-year-old monarchy and the establishment of a democratic republic in Nepal.

Vrishesh Chandra Lal's poetry collection is a living poetic document of the cry from those very streets, of the consciousness of protest, of citizens' indomitable courage and of intellectual resistance to authoritarianism. While parliamentary forces confronted the seemingly dead cobra of regression, now rushing forward with spears and farm implements, Lal's pen was giving that struggle its words.

The Critical Significance of Dr Rajendra Prasad "Vimal"'s Preface

The preface lends this book further authenticity and historical weight. It was written by Dr Rajendra Prasad "Vimal," an eminent critic, linguist and academic in Maithili and Nepali literature. Born in 2004 Vikram Samvat in Devdiha (Khirakhiriya), Dhanusha, and holding a doctorate in linguistics from Banaras Hindu University, Vimal is a distinguished figure in Nepalese letters. He writes with equal command in Nepali and Maithili and has expressed forceful views on social contradictions, human sensibility and questions of nationality.

Dr Vimal contributes a deeply moving essay entitled "This Gold of Poetry Emerging from the Fire of the Movement..." His principal propositions may be set out as follows. First, he regards literature as the articulate sibling of silent history. Just as every petal of a flower tells of its soil, water and light, so poetry expresses the laughter and tears, anger and agitation experienced by its creator. Second, he asserts that, for the first time in Nepalese Maithili literature, a poetry collection has appeared in which every poem is inspired exclusively by contemporary politics and the democratic struggle. The claim is significant because Maithili literature has traditionally been more concerned with love, devotion and social or cultural reform, as in the tradition of Vidyapati or the campaign against child marriage. A complete collection devoted solely to political poetry of resistance was rare. Third, Dr Vimal calls Lal a poet endowed with a vision of his time. The book reveals the tenderly sensitive yet fire-breathing poet concealed within a politician.

The writer of the preface also describes the political landscape of the period in highly figurative language. Following the dissolution of parliament, "the forces of regression are hissing—as though a dead cobra had come back to life and spread its hood"; meanwhile, "the parliamentary forces are running towards it with spears and farm implements, piercing it all over, yet it repeatedly lunges to bite." Such animal imagery—the dead snake, the cobra—vividly renders the prospect of political resurgence and the impulse towards retaliation, and closely resembles the figurative method of the poet himself.

Thematic, Philosophical and Formal Analysis of the Poems in Andolan

The collection contains twelve political and philosophical poems of lasting significance. They may be broadly divided into five major thematic groups and subjected to close and detailed analysis.

1. The Symbolic Representation of Political Regression and the Appeal for Ideological Leadership

The collection's first poem, "Aabah Na!" ("Do Come!"; p. 7), is both an attack upon the regressive political power of the time in Nepal and an impassioned appeal to the poet's ideological mentor, B. P. Koirala. The poet depicts political regression as a "ghost." In the folktales of Mithila, ghosts are often imagined with feet turned backwards and an appetite for blood. Lal transforms this familiar folkloric image into a powerful political symbol:

"B. P., into your village / a ghost has entered / that walks backwards! / Its feet are turned the wrong way, towards the rear; / blood is still caked upon its teeth; / even the reflection of its face in water appears deathly; / with its eyes and ears turned towards its back, / it looks backwards, it thinks backwards!!"

Here "feet turned backwards" and "thinking backwards" become exact emblems of a monarchic inclination to drive an advancing society back towards autocracy and feudalism. "Blood on its teeth" signifies state terror and the killing of innocent citizens. The poet fears that even the bhagat—the ritual healer or exorcist expected to free society from this ghost—may join forces with it. The image satirises opportunistic leaders who surrender to power by making their peace with the royal court. What is needed, therefore, is a committed revolutionary vision such as B. P. Koirala's.

The second poem, "Katta Chhi, Aaune!" ("Where Are You? Come!"; p. 8), likewise searches for a genuine guide in this time of darkness.

"In every lane, armed men / are roaming about; / in the name of protection, swindlers / are plundering everything."

The poem movingly shows how a society loses its bearings when the state ceases to protect and begins to prey upon its citizens, while armed men—security personnel or insurgents, evoked by the colloquial expression tikba—terrorise ordinary people. It represents the extreme reality of civilian insecurity during a period of crisis.

The poem calls upon B. P. Koirala's historical presence almost in the role of a bhagat, an exorcist summoned to drive away the ghost. Devotion and irony are interwoven here. On one hand the poet seeks a moral guardian of democratic ideals; on the other, the failure of contemporary political leadership becomes self-evident. If a dead leader must be called back, what does that say about the living leadership? The poem does not answer the question directly, but its dramatic structure leaves behind a question sharper than any ready-made answer.

"Katta Chhi, Aaune!" is almost a brief political monologue. Armed men in every lane, plunder in the guise of protection, and the absence of anyone to show the way together create a picture of public insecurity and moral anarchy. The line "Kannekke Baat Dekhaune" ("Show us the way, if only a little") discloses a central aspiration of the collection: poetry does not supply a prefabricated map, but seeks the public judgment capable of indicating a path. The question of this "path" reappears ironically in "Road Map," where a diagram comes to rule in place of the actual road.

2. State Terror, Hollow Peace and Incisive Satire on Autocracy

When a ruling class attempts to silence the people at gunpoint, it calls the result "peace." In "Shanti Chahi Muda Pharma Bamojim" ("We Want Peace, but According to the Mould"; p. 9), the poet mocks this imposed "negative peace"—the silence of the cremation ground:

"Hey, you makers of peace, / manufacture peace according to the mould. / This is the land of the Gorkhalis! / Without quarrels, scuffles and sorrow, / without weapons, khukuris and sharp points, / life here has no vitality; / here, violence must be fitted into peace."

Through the phrase "land of the Gorkhalis," the poet delivers a severe criticism of the Nepalese state structure, dominated, in this reading, by militarism and the arrogance of a single ethnic identity. Nepal's centralised authority has persistently trusted displays of force. Even the ruler's peace is fashioned "according to the mould"—cast in a predetermined pattern in which violence is indispensable. The lines also articulate the disquiet of Madheshi and other marginalised communities that have long been regarded with suspicion by the state.

Among the collection's sharpest and most forcefully satirical poems is "Durrar Baklel!" ("Away, You Fool!"; pp. 10–12), which portrays the rulers' insatiable greed, hypocrisy and repression of the people across four sections. The ruling class demands peace, revolution, renunciation, order and even heaven—but demands them exclusively for itself:

"We want labour, we want struggle; / we want renunciation and sacrifice; / we want the finest offering; / we want heaven here on earth. / What do we not want? We want everything. / But do you think it is for you? / Away, you fool! / We do want it, yessss— / but for ourselves!!"

In the second section the ruler orders the people to remain silent: "When I speak, be quiet; / when I play games, be quiet; / when I press you hard, be quiet … / when you sleep hungry, be quiet; / when you are cut down, be quiet; / when you die before my eyes, be quiet; / that is what real peace means." The passage exposes the extremity of feudal inhumanity: even the people's deaths must take place without a sound, so that the ruler's supposed "peace" remains undisturbed.

The third section lays bare the ruler's conceit: "I am the state; let it bear my name; / bring all the subjects here to me." This is the naked feudal arrogance associated with the French monarch Louis XIV's "L'État, c'est moi" ("I am the state"). It sees the people not as citizens but merely as raiyats—subjects or dependants. The poem is thus a psychological examination of autocracy.

A line such as "This is the land of the Gorkhalis" should not be taken as a literal ethnic conclusion. The entire poem operates through hyperbolic satire: it ridicules the reasoning that treats a tradition of violence as an innate national disposition and therefore finds it necessary to insert violence even into peace. What the poem actually criticises is the mentality that normalises violence, and declares it necessary, in the names of vitality, celebration, valour or nationhood.

In the second section, commands such as "When I speak, be quiet," "When I eat, be quiet" and "When you sleep hungry, be quiet" capture the one-way orders of authoritarian government. Their simplicity is formally effective, since power reveals its ideology not only in grand speeches but in everyday imperatives. In the third section, "Let the people say whatever I think" presents representation turned upside down: the people are not to think for themselves; they must utter what the ruler thinks. The poet strikes here at a counterfeit democracy in which leadership hears its own echo in the name of the people.

In the fifth section, the poet targets communal and identity-based politics: "If you are Hindu, wave the ceremonial fly-whisk; if you are Buddhist, perform the samyak … if you are Mugurali, enlarge your turban." The passage delivers a pointed comment on vote-bank politics conducted in the names of religious communities. Taken as a whole, the poem becomes a comprehensive, pictorial indictment of the opportunism of Nepal's political class.

8. "Ee Andolan Dekha Det": The Direction of History and Resistance to Regression

In this poem, the movement embodies the forward-driving force of history. The line "Time will surely move ahead" makes the poet's conception of time clear: forward movement is time's natural direction, while regression is an attempt to act against time. The image of the pachhmundiya, a creature whose head is turned backwards, represents forces attempting to reverse history's course. The movement will "wipe them out outright." Although the language is defiant, the poem does not simply call for counter-repression; it announces the historical impermanence of power founded upon fear and terror.

A limitation becomes visible here as well. History does not invariably move forward in a straight line; democratic achievements may be reversed. Yet within the political moment of the poem, faith in progress becomes a source of strategic energy. Poetry written for a movement often seeks not to predict events accurately but to build collective courage. From this perspective, the future-tense phrase "will show" becomes an instrument of linguistic resistance.

3. The Call to Protest and Self-Examination of Opportunism in Leadership

The poet is not merely an unquestioning critic of the regime. He also scrutinises, with considerable acuity, opportunism, hypocrisy and failures of leadership within the movement itself. As a leader in a political party, Lal is intimately acquainted with the double character of political practitioners. In "Chalu Andolanme!" ("Come, Let Us Join the Movement!"; pp. 14–16), he calls upon the people to enter the struggle while subjecting the self-interest of leaders to severe examination:

"The sacrifice is yours; / they count it as their investment. / You are the one who gives your life; / they are the ones who swagger. / You must beg for alms; / here they have their motorcars. / It is you who may have taken the blows, / but they claim the manliness."

These lines express the bitter truth of revolution. Ordinary people, the poor and marginalised groups shed their blood in a movement, yet opportunistic leaders appropriate the dividends as a return on their "investment." People may die without receiving anything, while leaders who have done nothing display their supposed courage. By declaring that such figures possess "the gene of Raktabija" and have lost all shame, the poet makes clear how the overthrow of one autocrat may give rise to another ruler with precisely the same tendencies, like the proliferating demon Raktabija. The poem also reflects Lal's own eventual disillusionment, which later contributed to his departure from the established Nepali Congress and his search for an alternative in the TMLP.

In "Der Chhaik Anher Nahi!" ("There Is Delay, but Not Darkness"; pp. 17–18), the poet urges resistance to tyrannical power and counsels the people not to fear the "jackal wearing a tiger's skin"—a ruler at once cowardly and cruel. With the injunction "Our fists are like thunderbolts; / clench them tight and strike," he seeks to awaken confidence in the people's dormant strength.

At first hearing, the title sounds like an ordinary exhortation. The refrain "To raise cries of long life and downfall, / come, let us join the movement!" evokes the familiar sounds of political mobilisation. But stanza by stanza, the poem turns the slogan back upon itself and uncovers its internal irony. At the beginning are the ideals of bringing forward what is wanted, driving out what is unwanted, awakening the oppressed and challenging the oppressor. Immediately afterwards, however, the economy of sacrifice, martyrdom, heaven, honour, recognition and the prestige of leadership comes under interrogation.

Caste, factional bickering, the patronage of criminals, the demon Raktabija and the hunger for leadership are among the distortions within the movement that the poem regards as no less dangerous than the external enemy. In the final section, "You cannot live without movements; / their entire life resides in a movement" attacks the professional leadership of permanent agitation. The people go in front, the leaders push from behind, and in the end "they will be leaders once again." Through this satire, Andolan avoids becoming self-congratulatory resistance poetry and gains the capacity for self-scrutiny.

The title reworks a familiar reassurance: justice may be delayed, but it has not been extinguished. The poem says, "Answer a blow with resistance." Does this constitute an endorsement of violent revenge? Seen in the context of the collection as a whole, the answer is not a simple yes. The poet's language is that of resistance, but he also condemns violence committed in the name of peace, the shooting of innocent people, and the trade conducted in sacrifice. It is more consistent to read "resistance" here politically, as a refusal of subordination and an assertion of rights.

Images such as "a thousand throats" and "fists like thunderbolts" create a sense of collective agency. Rather than the solitary heroic individual, what matters is the voice of a thousand people. At this point the democratic sensibility of the collection is unmistakable: the ethical basis of change lies in the people collectively, not in an individual saviour—even though the first poem summons B. P. Koirala as a symbolic redeemer. This internal tension lends the collection particular interest.

Practise renunciation, make sacrifices;

this is your duty.

For human life,

this indeed is the purpose and the essence.

4. A Philosophical Inquiry into Hollow Nationalism and Foreign Intervention

The definition of nationality has always been contested in the context of political movements. In "Hai, Hamar Rashtriyata!" ("Alas, Our Nationality!"; pp. 19–21), Vrishesh Chandra Lal—a poet rooted in Madhesh and an outspoken advocate of federalism and Madheshi identity—raises philosophical questions about Nepal's timid, fearful, artificial and narrow conception of nationhood.

"Gathering seven colours together, / this sun shines brightly; / when the many become one, / it gives off an extraordinary radiance. / But you, abandoning the one, / tremble as soon as you see two; / needlessly you puff out your face / and hide yourself in a cave. / Where do you drift away?"

The poem attacks the state-imposed nationalism of a single identity, associated here with Mahendra-era nationalism, which fears the linguistic, cultural and ethnic diversity of the country. A balanced sense of nationality is formed through unity in plurality, like the seven colours of a rainbow. Traditional nationalism in Nepal, however, retreats to a cave as soon as it encounters diversity and "rolls in the dirt." The poem also represents an intellectual sowing of the seeds of the Madhesh movement.

Similarly, "Road Map" (pp. 22–23) ridicules mediation by foreign powers, palace-centred peace processes conducted on paper, and solutions bearing the stamp of non-governmental organisations. The "road map" produced by outsiders has no place for the country's actual problems. The poet jokes that such a road map will not bring the country progress; instead, "the country itself will end up on the road / yes, now the country itself will end up on the road!" In other words, the nation will become destitute, like a beggar or someone without a home.

This four-part poem is among the collection's most intellectually mature works. The poet does not assume that nationality is a sacred value by definition; he asks how it actually behaves. Abandoning one's roots in search of origins, becoming enraged without reason, taking fright when a letter is inscribed, and clinging to a single identity instead of binding everyone together: these images depict an insecure, fear-producing and homogenising nationalism.

The lines establish a pluralist aesthetic of nationhood. The seven colours form a rainbow precisely because they remain distinct; unity is not the extinction of difference but the composition of coexistence. "Yet you, leaving the one, shudder when you see two" expresses the sickness of narrow nationalism, for which the very sight of plurality signifies division. Lal's poetry thus becomes an advocate of political pluralism. The lines acquire an additional resonance when read in light of later debates on federalism, but it is historically more appropriate to read the original poem in its setting around 2004.

The refrain "Everyone is flying into space, / but you keep rolling in the dirt" creates a sharp opposition between modernity and narrow-mindedness. The world is moving forward while nationalism rolls in the earth. Here the earth no longer signifies the sanctity of the motherland; it becomes an image of inertia and self-contraction. This transformation of the meaning of a single word is a noteworthy poetic achievement.

"Road Map" is a satirical reworking, in Maithili, of an English political-administrative expression. A village batāhā, or eccentric, buys a map and brings it home, announcing that roads are spread across it like a web. Gradually, the actual country, its people and its generations become subordinate to the map. The refrain "There will be no road in the country; / the country itself will end up on the road" is an outstanding example of paradox in the language of development planning. Instead of the instrument serving the country, the country is being forced inside the instrument.

The claim that "foreigners built enormous roads" and produced an even grander "map" raises, all at once, questions about external assistance, development projects, policy blueprints and sovereignty. The poem does not construct a simplistic anti-foreign nationalism. Its real target is government by maps, a system in which the complexities of local lives are subordinated to routes drawn on paper. The figure of the batāhā gives the satire the ease and immediacy of folk theatre.

5. The Proclamation of a Republic and Revolutionary Optimism

The collection reaches its ideological culmination in "Han, Han Lokkai Ganatantra Chahi!" ("Yes, Yes, the People Want a Republic!"; p. 24). The poem demands neither modest reform of government nor merely the replacement of ministers; it unequivocally calls for the overthrow of the entire feudal structure and the establishment of a republic:

"Yes, yes, this struggle is about power; / about bread, shelter and clothing; / people are no one's inherited property; / indeed, this is the struggle for people's sovereignty … / the people will beat the kettledrums and sound the great war-drum; / yes, yes, the people will burn Ravana's Lanka to ashes!"

Here "Ravana's Lanka" symbolises the feudal monarchy that ordinary people are preparing to burn down. In a democracy, a country is not anyone's inherited private property; the poem argues for sovereignty vested in the people.

Finally, "Kaal Mararait Chhaik!" ("Time Is Hovering!"; p. 25) and "Ijotdisi Sasarat!" ("It Will Move towards the Light!"; p. 26) echo the certainty of an oppressive ruler's downfall and the hope of a democratic dawn. The ruler is "trapped in his own net" and "has fallen into the pit of his own digging, raging there." No matter how loudly guns roar, they cannot prevent the colours of revolution:

"Guns thunder even today, / and guns will thunder tomorrow. / Who knows how many meek and innocent people / will suffer the blows of blunt axes? / Yet the colours of Holi will continue to rain down, / and its exuberance will spread still further. / These dark days of the present / will surely move towards the light!"

The political objective of the collection becomes especially clear in this poem: the struggle concerns power, but whose power? The answer is popular sovereignty. "People are no one's inherited property" is a foundational declaration of modern citizenship. The people are not recipients of charity or pity; they are bearers of rights. The line "They have endured the landlord's stick for long; / now, even with their own staff, the people will rise" becomes a metaphor for discarding dependence and discovering one's own strength.

In the second section, four propositions—"our own instruments," "entirely our own freedom," "we shall be no one's subjects," and "equality alone is the mantra of equality"—make republicanism more than opposition to monarchy. They turn it into a programme of popular ownership, liberty, emancipation from subjecthood and equality. The poem accordingly moves beyond the strictly institutional meaning of "republic" to embrace the idea of social democracy.

The final two poems complete the collection's emotional journey. In "Kaal Mararait Chhaik," history is almost like a hawk circling in the sky, while the people's flags fly everywhere. The exploiter has fallen into the pit he dug himself and has become entangled in his own net: these are images of political retribution resembling the workings of karma. The declaration "It will be destroyed root and branch" represents the height of the movement's rhetorical fervour.

The final poem, however, articulates hope in a more complex manner. "Guns thunder even today / and guns will thunder tomorrow": the poet refuses to decorate the future with a false peace. Attacks upon the innocent may continue, yet the colours of Holi will keep falling, exuberance will spread and dark days "will move towards the light." This is an important conclusion. Hope is not the absence of violence, but the ceaseless renewal of life in its midst. The final voice is therefore more profoundly humane than a mere slogan.

Poem	Central theme and message	Political context
Aabah Na!	An appeal to B. P.; political regression depicted as a ghost	Royal coup (2002–05); attempts to restore royal supremacy
Shanti Chahi Muda Pharma Bamojim	Satire on the hollow peace of a militarised state	People trapped between military deployment and Maoist conflict
Durrar Baklel!	Hypocrisy of an autocratic ruler and repression of the people	Restrictions on freedom of expression and the king's authoritarian ambitions
Chalu Andolanme!	Call to protest and attack on opportunistic leaders	Popular martyrdom in revolution and the leadership's thirst for power
Hai, Hamar Rashtriyata!	Critique of narrow, fearful nationalism hostile to diversity	A state mentality treating Madheshi and other marginalised communities as unnational
Han, Han Lokkai Ganatantra Chahi!	Revolutionary proclamation of a republic and popular sovereignty	Mass movement to end monarchy and establish a democratic republic

Poetic Technique, Imagery and the Beauty of Language

The formal beauty of Vrishesh Chandra Lal's Andolan resides in its simplicity, incisiveness and the unmistakable earthy fragrance of Maithili. Dr Rajendra Prasad "Vimal" draws attention to its "figurative language, imagery, symbolism, representation of unvarnished reality, exhortation, indignation and remarkable formal inventiveness."

Traditional Maithili poetry was often burdened with Sanskrit-derived, tatsama vocabulary that could be difficult for ordinary readers to understand. Lal's poetic language, by contrast, is emphatically the language of the people.

Use of Vernacular and Indigenous Vocabulary: The poet employs Maithili's inherited and locally rooted vocabulary with exceptional vitality: pachhmuriya (backward-facing), pharma (a mould or template), baklel (fool), dhahlel, ghokchikay (drawing or shrinking in), ledha jait (deteriorating or rolling in dirt), suddah (burning completely), raiti (subject or tenant), bhasiyakay, tikba and thagba. These expressions give force to the people's language, strike directly at the reader's feelings and carry the discourse of revolution as far as the fields and threshing grounds.

Visual and Kinetic Imagery: The collection combines visual images with images of movement to striking effect. Political regression appears as a ghost with "feet turned backwards" and "blood on its teeth"; oppressive power as a "jackal wearing a tiger's skin"; and the destruction of tyranny as the spectacle of "Ravana's Lanka burnt utterly to ashes." These images make abstract political ideas stand before the mind's eye as pictures.

Rasa and Oblique Expression (Irony and Satire): Alongside the dominant heroic (vīra), furious (raudra) and repellent (bībhatsa) rasas, the collection employs ironic and satirical obliqueness. "Durrar Baklel!" and "Shanti Chahi Muda Pharma Bamojim" are outstanding instances of political satire. They expose the ruler's inhumanity through humour, inducing laughter that ultimately gives way to an acute awareness of suffering.

15. Language: Regional Maithili, Political Idiom and Oral Energy

The collection's language does not cultivate an ostentatious gravity through Sanskritisation. Vernacular expressions such as "hau," "ta," "aabah," "katta chhi," "nai," "kannekke," "baklel," "thenga" and "bataha" give the poems the immediacy of a speaking voice. This orality makes them effective on the stage, at public meetings, in civic dialogue and in recitation. Sentences are short, repetition is abundant and refrains return continually. The style increases the memorability of political verse.

The poet adopts the English administrative expression "road map" without translation, but by placing it in the world of Maithili folk understanding he reverses its meaning. Similarly, "zindabad–murdabad," the formulaic public language of political affirmation and denunciation, becomes an ironic echo in "Chalu Andolanme!" Lal's linguistic strategy may also be called postcolonial in this sense: he summons the vocabulary of government and development imported from outside before the tribunal of local linguistic judgment.

16. Form: Repetition, Address, Irony, Symbol and Visuality

16.1 Repetition and Refrain

Almost every major poem repeats a recognisable phrase or sonic motif: "Ee Andolan Dekha Det" ("This Movement Will Show Them"), "Chalu Andolanme" ("Come, Let Us Join the Movement"), "Der Chhaik Anher Nahi" ("There Is Delay, but Not Darkness"), "Hai, Hamar Rashtriyata" ("Alas, Our Nationality"), "Deshe Roadpar Ghuskatak" ("The Country Itself Will End Up on the Road"), and "Kaal Mararait Chhaik" ("Time Is Hovering"). Repetition here is not merely musical. The meaning changes with every return. “Come, let us join the movement,” for instance, begins in enthusiasm, passes through doubt and finally acquires an ironic tone.

16.2 Dramatic Address

B. P. Koirala, an absent guide, the merchants of peace, nationality and the people: the poet directly addresses persons and even abstract ideas as though they were present. Through this technique, ideas become dialogue. Readers do not simply follow an argument; they seem to hear a voice addressing a public assembly.

16.3 Satire and Paradox

“Violence must be fitted into peace,” “The sacrifice is yours / they count it as their investment,” and “There will be no road in the country / the country itself will end up on the road” exemplify the paradoxes that constitute the collection’s finest poetic technique. Instead of explaining a contradiction, the poet causes its opposing elements to collide within the sentence. Readers encounter the incongruity for themselves.

16.4 Clusters of Symbols

Darkness and light, ghost and life, blood and flag, earth and space, road and map, baton and staff, gunfire and the colours of Holi: these dialectical pairs of symbols knit together the collection’s structure. In particular, the movement from darkness towards light establishes an internal architecture connecting the opening crisis with the final affirmation of hope.

17. The Collection’s Place within South Asian Poetry of Resistance

Political satire, vernacular speech, commitment to the people and direct attacks on power occur in many traditions of resistance poetry across the Indian subcontinent. In the wider context of Maithili and Hindi literature, one may be reminded of Nagarjun’s political satire in the language of ordinary people. In Hindi, Dhoomil’s suspicion of power, dismantling of democratic vocabulary and civic anger also offer grounds for comparison. Lal’s distinctive achievement, however, lies in the conjunction of Nepal’s democratic crisis, the symbolic presence of B. P. Koirala, the imagery of the Gorkhali state, the linguistic and cultural world of Janakpur, and the political experience of Nepalese Maithili speakers.

Such comparisons require care. The poems in Andolan are not primarily exercises in linguistic experimentation or profound introspective conflict; they are public poetry. Their central arena is not the private mind but the civic square. It would therefore be inappropriate to judge them solely by standards developed for intensely personal, formalist or mystical verse. Their achievement lies in communication through the people’s language, the force of their satire, historical urgency and moral clarity.

The Place of Andolan in Vrishesh Chandra Lal’s Oeuvre

Andolan must be considered in the context of Vrishesh Chandra Lal’s wider literary and political work. According to the biographical note at the end of the collection, the poet, born in 1955 (16 Chaitra 2011 in the Nepali calendar), is a committed follower of B. P. Koirala and writes regularly on Nepalese politics in national dailies. In addition to this collection, his published works include his Maithili adaptation of B. P. Koirala's celebrated short novel Modiaain, the short-story collection Malho and the translation Sanghiyatak Sambandhme ("On Federalism").

Of particular importance is the outline of Lal's literary and political project that emerges when Andolan is considered alongside his Maithili translation of B. P. Koirala's Sumnima and the later poetry collection Dholak. Read together, these works reveal a coherent endeavour by the poet-translator: the sustained dissemination of B. P. Koirala's democratic-socialist ideas in Maithili through translation, and direct intervention in contemporary Nepalese political crises through original poetry, in Andolan and Dholak. Among these connected works, Andolan is the most immediate and slogan-driven. Whereas Dholak gives broader scope to social justice, Dalit consciousness and questions concerning women, Andolan responds directly, and almost exclusively, to an immediate political emergency—the dissolution of parliament.

Because the stated publication date of Andolan is Vikram Samvat 2061, the view that places its publication close to 2021–22 CE is inconsistent with the chronology. Nevertheless, reading Sumnima, Dholak and Andolan together in terms of ideological and literary relations retains considerable critical value.

The Historical Place of the Collection in Nepalese Maithili Literature

Nepalese Maithili literature has a substantial tradition extending from Vidyapati's poetry of love and devotion to modern social realism. Writers such as Rambharos Kapari "Bhramar," Rajendra Vimal and Dhirendra Premarshi have enriched this tradition. Yet although a current of political poetry certainly existed in Maithili, a whole collection devoted specifically to contemporary politics, the cruelty of power, state repression and the cries of popular protest was relatively rare.

Dr Vimal's assertion is that "for the first time in Nepalese Maithili literature a poetry collection has appeared in which every poem is inspired by contemporary politics." Vrishesh Chandra Lal's endeavour takes Maithili poetry, on the one hand, beyond the pleasures of the private chamber and idealistic sermonising into the revolutionary front line of the street. On the other, it gives democratic activists an intellectual weapon. Three streams converge in Andolan: B. P. Koirala's socialism, the marginalised consciousness of Madhesh and the universal values of democracy.

18. Principal Achievements of the Poetry Collection

Maintaining a critical perspective on both the government and the movement, thereby avoiding the danger that political poetry might become party propaganda.

Transforming the complex questions of contemporary history into memorable, visual images expressed through the people's language.

Testing nationality against the standards of plurality, civic courage and equality.

Exposing the self-interested politics concealed within apparently positive terms such as peace, development, sacrifice and leadership.

Presenting the people not as objects of pity but as political agents and the source of popular sovereignty.

Fashioning the final hope not as a simplified proclamation of victory but as the persistence of life amid ongoing violence.

19. Limitations and Critical Questions

Serious literary evaluation is not simply praise. The strengths of Andolan are evident, but so are certain limitations. First, many poems depend heavily upon allusions specific to the politics of their time. Future readers unfamiliar with B. P. Koirala, political regression, the ethos of Gorkhali state power and the particular context of movement leadership may miss the full force of some of the satire. Historical annotations would therefore be valuable in a critical edition.

Second, refrain-like slogans are often energetic, yet in some passages repetition diminishes poetic density. Vehemence can occasionally overpower subtlety. Third, the collection centres on a national crisis of political power. Other dimensions—the particular experiences of women and workers, Dalit questions, the fine grain of class relations, and rural political economy—may be suggested, but they do not develop into independent poetic explorations.

Fourth, the conviction that history "moves forward" is inspiring, but gives comparatively little space to the crooked course of political history, the failure of movements, divisions among the people and the complexities of democratic institutions. Even so, "Chalu Andolanme!" and "Hai, Hamar Rashtriyata!" introduce a necessary element of self-doubt into this linear account. These poems prevent the collection from becoming a one-directional manifesto.

Conclusion and Contemporary Relevance

Taken as a whole, Vrishesh Chandra Lal's Maithili poetry collection Andolan is not merely an assortment of verses or a book intended for literary pleasure. It is a living, passionate and authentic manifesto of a period of historic political transition in Nepal. The poems were born when the dark clouds of autocracy hovered over the country, when the bayonet of the gun was being described as "peace," and when citizens were being stripped of their rights. Bringing together long political experience, social sensitivity and the popular force of the Maithili language, Lal has fashioned the poetic gold of resistance.

The book's philosophical depth lies in the fact that it does not oppose only the autocracy of the monarch of its day. It attacks, with equal severity, hypocritical leaders who deceive the people in the name of movements, hollow nationalists who fear diversity, and forms of neo-colonial foreign intervention exemplified by the "road map." Andolan demonstrates how, when political commitment genuinely converges with literary sensibility, literature ceases to be merely entertainment and becomes a potent instrument of social transformation. In the study of democratic consciousness, the establishment of a republic, debates on federalism and contemporary political discourse, the volume will remain an invaluable resource and point of reference in Maithili letters. It testifies to literature's ability to carry a torch and show the way whenever politics loses its direction.

20. Overall Evaluation

It is appropriate to call Andolan an important popular-democratic document of political poetry in Nepalese Maithili, but the word "document" alone is insufficient. The document becomes literature when the "ghost" becomes a symbol of political regression, when the "merchants of peace" expose the hypocrisy of policy language, when "sacrifice" becomes the leader's "investment," when a "road map" devours a country, when "nationality" rolls in the dirt during the space age, and when history shifts towards light even amidst the sound of gunfire.

The poet's most significant achievement is his refusal to treat democracy merely as a question of parliament or opposition to monarchy. For him, democracy is a constellation of language, thought, plurality, self-respect, popular rights, accountability in leadership and the people's ownership of power. "People are no one's inherited property" is the most concise formulation of this philosophy.

From a literary standpoint, the collection's most effective poems include "Shanti Chahi Muda Pharma Bamojim," "Durr Baklel!," "Chalu Andolanme!," "Hai, Hamar Rashtriyata!" and "Road Map," since they transform immediate political circumstances into enduring irony. "Aabah Na!" and "Ee Andolan Dekha Det" provide historical energy, while "Ijotdisi Sasarat!" gives the collection an open ending founded upon humane hope.

Ultimately, the value of Andolan lies in its refusal merely to ask readers to take the side of a movement. Instead it asks: For whom is the movement? For whom is peace? Who makes the sacrifices, and who takes the rewards? Is the nation a single colour, or the harmonious radiance of seven? Does development take shape within the country, or is the country forced into a paper "road map"? Do the people bring power into being, or does power regard the people as its tenants and subjects? These questions enable a small book to outgrow its moment and become a lasting poetic text of democratic judgment.

"People are no one's inherited property": in this single line resides the democratic soul of Andolan.

The collection was written at a particular historical moment, but its finest poems cross the boundaries of that moment and become enduring inquiries into power and citizenship. Here lies the literary triumph of Andolan.

Bibliography

1. Lal, Vrishesh Chandra. Andolan. Maithili poetry collection. Sudama Prakashan, Janakpurdham, Vikram Samvat 2061.

2. Lal, Vrishesh Chandra. Malho. Short-story collection.

3. Koirala, Bishweshwar Prasad. Modiaain. Maithili adaptation by Vrishesh Chandra Lal.

4. Lal, Vrishesh Chandra. Sanghiyatak Sambandhme.

5. Koirala, Bishweshwar Prasad. Sumnima. Maithili translation by Vrishesh Chandra Lal.

6. Lal, Vrishesh Chandra. Dholak. Poetry collection.

2. Dholak

Source book: Dholak (Maithili poetry collection)
Author: Vrishesh Chandra Lal
Publisher: Sudama Prakashan, Janakpurdham

1. Introduction and Theoretical Background

In the contemporary landscape of Maithili literature, particularly in the context of Nepalese Mithila, poetry is no longer merely a vehicle for aesthetic appreciation or the spontaneous expression of emotion. It has become a powerful instrument of revolution, social justice, the anguish of marginalised communities and democratic consciousness. At the forefront of this transformation in thought and practice stands the distinguished politician, thinker and writer Vrishesh Chandra Lal. His recently published collection of Maithili poems, Dholak (Vikram Samvat 2078), raises the aesthetic possibilities of literature to new heights while offering an exceptionally authentic and affecting record of society's troubled realities, political hypocrisy, the exploitation of marginalised classes and the human will to live.

The interdependent relationship between literature and society is borne out by Lal's work in its entirety. Dholak is not simply an assemblage of poems; it is a document of an age in which the heat of revolution, the anguish of disillusionment and a resolve to rebuild flow together.

Overview

Dholak is a poetry collection that moves, seemingly in a single breath, through child psychology, folk songs, the public life of Janakpur and Madhesh, political resistance, labour, poverty, questions of gender, inner conflict, an awareness of death, festivity and irony. Its structure is meaningful in itself: Bal-Khand (the children's section), Tal-Khand (the section of rhythm) and Nal-Khand (the section of the drum's deeper resonance). According to the contents, the first section has twenty compositions, the second fourteen and the third sixty-two: ninety-six poems or songs in all. The sequence suggests the poet's journey from the spontaneous sounds of childhood to rhythmic communal song, and thence to the social pulse—the nal—of collective life.

The collection's most distinctive quality is its use of sound. Sounds such as "furr-furr," "dhum-dhum," "dhak-dhak," "chakke-chakdum," "bhuku-bhuku" and "jogira" are not mere embellishments; they carry meaning. Sound connects the body, celebration, fear, resistance, children's games and folk memory. The title Dholak likewise occupies the centre of this politics of sound: the drum is brought into use during communal activities, only to be hung up once more in a dark corner when its work is done. In this image one may read the utilitarian social fate of artists, labourers, Dalits and other deprived people, political workers and ordinary citizens alike.

The poetic quality of the ninety-six compositions is not uniform. Some leave a lasting impression through imagery, rhythm and satire; elsewhere the poet states his ideas in declarative lines before those ideas can fully become poetry. Yet this unevenness does not diminish the collection's historical importance. Rather, it illuminates the nature of the poet's public personality and his writing as a citizen. The essential value of Dholak lies in its readiness for dialogue with the people, the energy of its spoken language, folk rhythms, political fearlessness and close observation of social life.

Principal Findings

Structure	Bal: 20 + Tal: 14 + Nal: 62 = 96 compositions; a gradual expansion from the sounds of childhood to social and political consciousness.
Principal poetic strengths	Folk rhythms, repetition, onomatopoeic vocabulary, lyricism and public orality.
Major themes	Childhood, nature, celebration, love, poverty, labour, Madhesh/Janakpur, opposition to power, moral questions and existential awareness.
Distinctive symbol	The dholak as a metaphor for people, art and labour used by society, then hung up again in a corner after being played.
Limitations	Excessive declarative statements, repetition, uneven metrical control, and at times a reduction of imaginative freedom through overly direct illustrations.
Overall assessment	An important social document of modern, folk-oriented Maithili poetry, particularly notable within Nepal's Maithili-speaking public sphere.

2. The Poet's Personality, Political Background and Their Relationship to His Work

To comprehend the depth of any enduring literary work, one must also understand its creator's philosophy of life and experience of struggle. Vrishesh Chandra Lal, whose name at the sixth-day naming ceremony was Vishweshwar, is not merely an emotional or imaginative poet. He is a leading participant, thinker and popular leader in Nepal's democratic movement and the struggle for Madhesh rights. He was born on 29 March 1955 in Suga-Bhawanipatti, Mahottari district, to the late Udit Narayan Lal and Bhuvaneshwari Devi. His life has been arduous, marked by an unbroken struggle for democracy in Nepal, the end of the Panchayat system and equality among citizens. In the course of this struggle he was arrested seventeen times and spent approximately eight years in prison. A committed political follower of Bishweshwar Prasad Koirala, he has held such positions as national vice-president of the Tarai Madhesh Loktantrik Party (TMLP), mayor of Janakpurdham and member of the National Assembly of Nepal's federal parliament (2017–19).

His contribution to literature is by no means confined to Dholak. His earlier poetry collection Andolan helped awaken the people during the period of political regression. He also enriched Maithili letters considerably by adapting B. P. Koirala's celebrated short novels Sumnima and Modiaain into Maithili. For his translation of Sumnima he received the Nepal Vidyapati Maithili Translation Award, recognition of his command of language and lucid Maithili expression. His involvement in the Maithili movement and events such as Vidyapati Remembrance Day demonstrates that he regards language not simply as a means of communication but as an instrument of regional identity and self-respect. In Vikram Samvat 2074 the Mithila Natya Kala Parishad (MINAP) bestowed on him the well-known satirical title of Mahamurkh, a sign of his standing in Mithila's intellectual and social life. His literary commitment extends further: he established an endowment in his parents' names and initiated a practice of honouring Maithili writers through awards.

The poet's long political struggle, revolutionary experience, suffering in prison and concern for ordinary people do not enter his poetry as hollow party slogans or dry pronouncements. Instead they find voice as the bloodstained reality, tears, sweat and stubborn vitality of oppressed Dalit people at the lowest rung of society. The darkness of prison, the clamour of people's movements, the pain of neglected social groups and the grotesque spectacle of those at the summit of power all constitute the raw materials of Lal's poetic world. This uncommon conjunction of politics and literature gives his writing a distinctive edge: he does not escape reality but stands in the midst of struggle and sounds the call for reconstruction. A senior writer such as Dr Shefalika Verma likewise acknowledges that, despite his political commitments and busy life, the time Lal finds for literature continually enriches the treasury of the Maithili language.

The Book, the Poet and the Literary Context

It would be a mistake to regard Lal's literary identity merely as an appendix to his political career. Available biographical accounts place his birth in Suga-Bhawanipatti, Mahottari district; postgraduate study in economics, training in labour studies, public and political life, the writing of stories and poems, and translation all make his experience many-layered. His Maithili adaptations of B. P. Koirala's Modiaain and Sumnima establish his identity as a translator; the Nepal Vidyapati Maithili Translation Award of Vikram Samvat 2077 provides institutional recognition of that work. Against this background, a reading of Dholak shows that the poet does not simply turn speeches delivered from political platforms into verse. He brings the home, children, ponds, birds, love, the city, poverty, religious symbols, hunger, violence resembling war, celebrations and personal loneliness into a single poetic field.

Jayakant Mishra and Devkant Jha, both historians of modern Maithili literature, identify the widening presence of social realism, experimentation, lyricism, satire and civic consciousness as important tendencies in modern poetry. Dholak may be seen as a Nepalese-Madheshi manifestation of this longer tradition. On one side stand the cultural memory of Vidyapati's song tradition and folk sound; on the other, modern democratic discontent, urban crises, deprivation of labour and global anxieties.

The critical essays by Rajendra Vimal and Parmeshwar Kapari at the beginning of the book draw attention to its social concerns, environmental awareness, political rights, class inequality, folk rhythm and human compassion.

The Prefaces: Background to the Poet and His Work

Vrishesh Chandra Lal is not only a poet but an active politician. He has served as mayor of Janakpurdham and as a respected member of the first National Assembly of Nepal's federal democratic republic. This biographical background is crucial to understanding Dholak. According to Dr Rajendra "Vimal" in his preface, one of the essential features of the collection is that it was not written by a politician during the leisure afforded by imprisonment. It was composed by a soldier with a poet's heart, fighting on the battlefield of Nepal's continuing struggle to end discrimination. In the preface writer's image, it is as though Lord Krishna were standing in the midst of Kurukshetra, expounding the Gita. This proposition itself shapes the register in which the collection is read.

According to the second preface writer, Parmeshwar Kapari, Lal is an accomplished politician familiar with the turmoil and manoeuvring of contemporary politics, yet apart from all this he is also an experienced poet whose perceptions rest on the authenticity of minute observation, and who examines life and the world attentively. This dual identity—poet and politician—is especially evident throughout the collection. What appears here is not merely a selection of beautiful words, but a front of direct intervention in social and political life.

The Reciprocal Relationship between the Work and Its Author

Reading the collection, we must not forget that its author is not merely a man of letters. He is also a politician who has participated in the struggles of the Maithili-speaking region through municipal leadership, National Assembly membership and periods of agitation. The author of Dholak has therefore experienced the very scenes that he evokes. This makes Dr Rajendra Vimal's comparison in the preface particularly apt: as though Krishna were standing in the midst of Kurukshetra delivering the Gita, so this poet stands amid the field of struggle and creates poetry.

3. The Book's External and Internal Organisation (Metadata and Structural Profile)

An academic assessment of a book begins with its basic structure and publication details, which establish the first bridge between the work and its readers. The following tables present factual particulars concerning the publication and arrangement of Dholak.

Bibliographical component	Details
Book title	Dholak (collection of Maithili poetry)
Author	Vrishesh Chandra Lal
Publisher	Sudama Prakashan, Janakpurdham-2, Kishorinagar, Nepal
Printer	Union Offset Press, Janakpurdham
Publication date / edition	First edition: Magh 2078 Vikram Samvat (January 2022)
Print run	1,000 copies
Price	200 taka / rupees
Cover illustration	Manoj Kumar Yadav
Dedication	To parents and revered teachers
Prefaces	1. Dr Rajendra Vimal ("Evergreen Rhythms Played on Poet Lal's Dholak") 2. Parmeshwar Kapari ("Where Should I Begin?")
Structural divisions	Three sections: 1. Bal-Khand (20 compositions) 2. Tal-Khand (15 songs) 3. Nal-Khand (62 poems)
Author	Vrishesh Chandra Lal
Genre	Maithili poetry collection (also printed in the Tirhuta script)
Publisher	Sudama Prakashan, Janakpurdham-2, Kishorinagar
Edition	First edition, Magh 2078 Vikram

Bibliographical component	Details
	Samvat
Cover artwork	Manoj Kumar Yadav
Price	200 taka
Pages	160
Structure	Three sections: Bal-Khand, Tal-Khand and Nal-Khand (a total of 62 poems)

At the beginning of the book the poet offers statements under the headings "Shubhkamana" (Good Wishes) and "Vinay" (Supplication), explaining that this poetry collection consists of whatever "strikes against the nal as it happens to come." Opening with "Tasmai Shri Gurave Namah" ("Salutations to that revered teacher"), the volume also preserves its cultural and spiritual roots.

4. The Philosophical Basis of Dholak's Threefold Structure

The entire creative world of Dholak is divided into three carefully organised sections: Bal-Khand, Tal-Khand and Nal-Khand. The three divisions symbolise a three-dimensional process of development in human life and society, constructed around the metaphor of a musical instrument, the dholak. This arrangement is not a random compilation; a serious philosophical and psychological design underlies it.

The first division, Bal-Khand, symbolises infancy, innocence and primary socialisation. Through child psychology, the poet depicts ethical instruction, social contradictions and folk games. The second, Tal-Khand, represents the cultural, musical and emotional youth of society. Within it resound the rhythms of Mithila's customary auspicious ceremonies, erotic and romantic feeling, love, separation and the satire of a new age. The third and final division, Nal-Khand, gives voice to mature social struggle, revolution, philosophical gravity and a cry of opposition to the prevailing order. Nal here denotes the drum's deeper, left-hand side, from which its resonant bass sound emerges: an apt designation for this section's seriousness and revolutionary consciousness.

"Bal–Tal–Nal": The Poetics of the Three Names

At first glance, the names of these three sections may seem playful, but they constitute one of the book's strongest editorial and poetic decisions. Bal signifies the child, beginnings, tenderness and spontaneous sound; tal signifies rhythm, collective singing, bodily movement and celebration; nal signifies the organic connection sustaining life, its inner nerves and arteries and its bond with its source. Thus the book travels from the childish wonder of "Furr-Furr Suga" to the collective utterance of "Jagaran Git," and then to such works as "Manukhbhamara," "Samay," "Dholak!," "Khoji Rahal Chhi...," "Chuppi," "Khun Ta Khun Chhaik!," "Nari," "Musaharke Ham Bachcha Chhi!," "Pet" and "He Bhagwan!"

The sequence is also developmental. In Bal-Khand, the objects remain external—birds, fruit, the moon, kites, telephones, curds and books, lamps and ponds. In Tal-Khand, the outer world becomes a collective voice—good wishes, awakening, Holi, love, dance and anklets. In Nal-Khand, the poet directly confronts tensions between inner and outer life—poverty, the city, democracy, blood, hunger, power, loneliness, women, religion, war and ethical questions. Nal thus becomes a link between individual existence and the social body.

The Three-Part Structure

5. Bal-Khand: Child Psychology, Folk Play and the Seeds of a New Consciousness

Writing literature for children is regarded as a demanding literary undertaking in any language. An adult, experienced writer must set aside the display of learning and scholarship and enter fully into childlike tenderness, rhymed musicality and the playful disposition of the young mind. Vrishesh Chandra Lal proves notably successful in this respect. Bal-Khand contains twenty children's poems and songs. Its distinctive feature is the planting of serious social and cultural messages, political satire and the seeds of ethical understanding within a child's world. These poems are written not simply to entertain but also to introduce future generations to social reality.

5.1 Political Satire and a New Panchatantra

Children's poems have long employed images from the world of birds, animals and nature. Lal likewise creates a new Panchatantra through the wagtail, parrot, crow, mouse and other creatures, but gives these figures a pronounced modern political and social consciousness. In “Dum-Dum Baua,” the crow serves to warn a child against cunning and opportunistic people, particularly corrupt leaders or self-interested friends. The poet wants the young mind to understand that society is full of people who will bow before others to achieve their own purposes, only to fly away as soon as their task is accomplished. The crow's character exposes those opportunists who creep close and, on finding an opening, snatch what they want and flee. Dr Rajendra Vimal makes clear in his preface how serious a satire upon contemporary political actors in Nepal these lines constitute. Under the covering of a children's song, this vivid depiction of opportunism discloses a mature political truth.

Similarly, the poem “Musari Badd Peraia” uses the figure of a mouse to attack feudal exploitation and corruption—the social class that appropriates other people's grain without undertaking labour of its own. Here the mouse represents parasitic groups that quietly hollow out society's resources from within, enter other people's homes uninvited and consume their fill. While instilling the values of hard work and honesty in the child's imagination, the poem also cultivates a distaste for exploitative conduct.

The poem “Farr-Farr Suga” affirms the importance of freedom by depicting the plight of a caged parrot. Forced to repeat “Ram-Ram,” the bird's inner life has been darkened by captivity. The poem also echoes the poet's own experience of political imprisonment. Its message to children is that freedom requires struggle: until the bond or cage is cut, no amount of lowering one's head will bring release. These lines teach the value of sovereignty and liberty —freedom is won not through supplication but through resistance.

5.2 Women's Questions and the Revolution of Girls' Education

The poet makes an affecting attack upon the gender inequality present in Maithil society and South Asian society more broadly. "Ge Daiya Hamro Dahi Kitab" is a revolutionary appeal for girls' education. The poem directly confronts the double standard of patriarchal society, in which sons are sent to school while daughters are obliged to cut grass. When the girl sees her brothers going to school, her own thirst for knowledge awakens and she asks her mother for books.

The poet further calls for the breaking of the social illusion by which a son is nurtured as the saviour of the family line while a daughter is neglected. In his view such discrimination is progressively reducing society to a skeleton, for no society or nation can advance while keeping half its members uneducated. This realistic and heartbreaking representation of girls' empowerment establishes the poet as a progressive social reformer and offers an excellent example of gender sensitivity in children's literature.

5.3 Child Psychology and the Contradictions of the Modern Family

"Phone Karaia Nanaji" offers a psychological portrayal of the loneliness experienced by contemporary children as a result of urbanisation, capitalist development and the rise of the nuclear family. In the working lives of parents and the mechanised routines of children, the love, stories and songs of grandparents have become scarce; the poet expresses this absence in an accessible child's idiom. Both mother and father hurry to their offices, while the child has little more than food packed in a lunchbox. Into this emotional emptiness comes a telephone call from the maternal grandfather, whom the child asks to sing a song. The poem draws attention to a tragedy of modern life: material comforts are available, but the warmth of the extended family and the oral tradition are disappearing.

In "Guddi Urae Akashme," the poet uses a kite to portray life's ascent and the competition inherent in it: the kite climbs when its string is pulled, and the children compete to cut one another's kite strings. This children's game becomes a fine metaphor for the struggle of life.

5.4 Cultural Inheritance and the Representation of Nature

Other poems in Bal-Khand contain vivid depictions of Mithila's folk festivals, seasonal changes and natural beauty. They help connect younger generations with their soil, food and customs. "Chaurchan Chaurchan Ugal Chan" celebrates the Chaurchan festival of moon-viewing in the month of Bhadra. The child longs for puris, curds, pirukia, milk-based sweets, tarua, tilkor leaves and coconuts. "Majjar" depicts the fragrance of mango blossoms and the humming of bees, along with the anticipation of making amot (dried mango pulp) and amarasa (mango juice).

"Hori Aelai Hurrrr!" describes the colour and exuberance of Phagun: malpua, bari and tarua are being fried, drums and tasha are sounding, and water squirters are spraying colour. Poems such as "Chakaike Chakdhum" and "Ta Ta Thaiya Karu Baua" capture a child's innocent delight while playing in the laps of grandparents. Songs such as "Pokharik Kat," "Son Chiriya" and "Aa Aa Re Khanjan Chiriya" draw the child's imagination towards nature and establish an affinity with birds and animals.

Bal-Khand: Sound, Image and Child Psychology

It may seem easy to write children's verse, but merely shortening the language does not make a successful poem for children. Such poetry requires wonder, repetition, play, sound, images and a memorable movement. In many instances Dholak's Bal-Khand meets these requirements. The very titles —"Furr-Furr Suga," "Guddi Urae Akashme," "Dhum-Dhum Kaua," "Furr-Furr Bagara," "Phone Karaia Nanaji," "Ta Ta Thaiya Kar Kaua," "Hori Aelai Hurrrr!," "Chakke Chakdum," "Son Chiriya," "Chamak-Chamak Diyabati" and "Musari Bahu Peraia"—already generate sound and movement.

In the poems of Bal-Khand, imitative sound is the first gateway to meaning. A child does not initially encounter the crow or parrot through biological description, but experiences the world through sounds such as "furr," "dhum," "chak" and "ta-ta thaiya." The poet intuitively grasps this psychological truth. Repetition gives the lines their music while giving the language a circularity consonant with a child's patterns of memory.

Illustrations are generally helpful in this section. Direct images of birds, kites, lamps, fruits and children allow young readers immediate entry into the text. Yet there is also a literary limitation: when an image is too explicit, it can reduce the imaginative freedom of the visual world created by the poem itself. A future edition employing Mithila painting or a consistent style of original line drawing could give the collection a more distinctive visual identity.

Another important feature of Bal-Khand is familial intimacy. In "Phone Karaia Nanaji," "Ge Daiya Hamro Dahi Kitab" and "Son Chiriya," family relationships and domestic forms of address lend the poems the warmth of everyday speech. This helps prevent children's literature from turning into mere moral instruction, even though the intended message is explicit in several poems.

Bal-Khand (Twenty Poems)

At first sight, the poems in Bal-Khand appear to be straightforward children's literature—simple rhyming verses on birds, thieves and other creatures, festivals, games and family affection, such as "Farr-Farr Suga," "Ta Ta Yaiya Kar Baua" and "Aa Aa Re Khanjan Chiriya." But closer examination reveals the poet's social consciousness surfacing here as well. "Farr-Farr Suga" describes the suffering of a chilli-eating parrot shut in a cage, and closes with lines to the effect that "the bond will not be broken unless it is cut, however much the head and shoulders may be lowered." This brings the consciousness of freedom into a child's song. For Lal, then, children's literature is not only entertainment but also a means of cultivating values.

An engaging instance of verbal play occurs in the poem "Karona." On reading the title, one naturally recalls the worldwide coronavirus pandemic; in fact, the poem is a simple children's verse about the karonda fruit found in Mithila. Children pick the fruit, gather it to make pickle, and flee after driving away a bear with sharp, clattering sounds. This verbal coincidence also displays the poet's linguistic playfulness.

6. Tal-Khand: Traditional Auspiciousness, Love, Separation and the Contradictions of Modernity

The second section of Dholak is Tal-Khand, containing fifteen songs. This group of compositions draws on the rhythms of Mithila's classical and folk music—its melodic patterns, beats and measures. It gives musical form to matters ranging from ancient traditions to modern contradictions. The poet here demonstrates his deep understanding of folk culture and sensitivity to music.

6.1 A New Sama Veda and Auspicious Song

In his preface, the senior critic Parmeshwar Kapari calls "Shubhe Ho Shubhe!" a "new folk Sama Veda song." The poet transforms the conventional mantra "Shubhe He Shubhe," used in Mithila's customary chumaon ritual of blessing and often reduced to formula, into an invocation for the social and national well-being of a new age. The new mantra prays not merely for an individual's good fortune but for the honour, health, service, prosperity and virtues of the whole community. It asks that strength dwell in the courtyard, happiness find a place in the home, every household have its supply of grain, and children be as precious as gold. The folk song is thus no longer simply a religious incantation; it becomes a collective, secular prayer for a prosperous, healthy and peaceful society.

6.2 Cultural Pride and the Voice of Awakening

"Siyajik Chhanh Ai Biah, Janakpurme" presents a living picture of the traditional celebration of Sita's marriage. The poet evokes the cultural significance of that marriage in Mithila's folk voice through the breaking of the bow by the young prince of Ayodhya, the exchange of wedding garlands, the dancing peacocks of Mithila, decorations in the bridal chamber and paintings on bamboo, and the ceremonial welcome of Rama and Lakshmana. The song celebrates Mithila's cultural identity and historical pride.

In "Jagaran Git" ("Song of Awakening"), by contrast, the poet speaks as a soldier of the democratic movement, calling upon the people to awaken. A wind of revolution is blowing, darkness is receding, and the time has come to advance like a flaming torch. Attacking the preservation of the status quo, he asks how long people will sleep after surrendering their rights and flee in fear when the hour of resistance arrives. This call to clench one's fists and fight for justice shakes the dormant consciousness of society.

6.3 The Vidyapati Tradition: Erotic Love and the Pain of Separation

In his songs, Lal gives new life, through fresh language and imagery, to the rich Maithili tradition of erotic love and separation associated with the great poet Vidyapati. Songs such as “Gorki Najari Mor,” “Dhak Dhak Karay Karej Mor,” “Nai Aau Ena Monme,” “Pritak Gitme” and “Jhunuk Jhun Jhunjhun Payal Baje” express sensuous affection, physical beauty and the deep ache of separation.

“Gorki Najari Mor” offers an intoxicating portrait of the heroine's beauty: one glance from her steals the lover's heart. The moon seems to smile in the flush of her cheeks, the rose in her hair appears bashful, and the tinkling of her anklets quickens the heartbeat. These images recall Vidyapati's aesthetic sensibility.

Nature is also personified strikingly in the depiction of separation. In “Dhak Dhak Karay Karej Mor,” a monsoon sky crowded with clouds, a moon that appears and disappears, and a cuckoo calling “ku-ku” intensify the longing of a woman separated from her beloved. In “Jhunuk Jhun Jhunjhun Payal Baje,” a night of separation seems as long as an age, while moments spent with the beloved are painfully brief. These songs demonstrate that, amid the clamour of politics, an innocent and tender emotional world remains alive within the poet.

6.4 The Grotesqueries of Modernity and Pop Satire

The most distinctive composition in this section is “Katasan Karu Shuru.” According to Parmeshwar Kapari, this was Maithili's first “pop song,” composed by the poet in 1986 and later made highly popular through the first Maithili telefilm, Dahej. Written to the rhythm of Western disco dance, it delivers sharp and unsparing satire upon the political and social corruption of both its original period and the present. It fully exposes a decline in social values and a mentality centred on money.

The poet depicts the directionlessness of the modern generation: it is as though the written alphabet means no more than black marks to a buffalo, yet the young know the films of Hema Malini and Dharmendra. Education seems worthless, since those who occupy positions of authority take bribes, enjoy themselves and ride in cars, while intelligent people remain helpless. The poet renders with precision a social reality in which, without money, neither father nor mother seems to matter. The song's ironic exhortation to take up smuggling is, in reality, a resounding slap in the face of a corrupt system.

Tal-Khand: Song, Celebration and the Collective Body

Tal-Khand forms the collection's middle territory. Here poetry asks less to be read in silence than to be sung, repeated, spoken from a stage or experienced collectively. Compositions including “Shubhkamana Git,” “Jagaran Git,” “Han Re Sugana,” “Dhak-Dhak Karay Karej Mor,” “Horik Git,” “Pritak Gitme,” “Bhuku-Bhuku Kun Kunukun Payal Baje,” “Ekta Sugan Git," "Ash Banchite Rahat" and "Gorki Najari Mor" plainly exhibit refrains, direct address, rhythmic repetition and patterns of folk singing.

In "Shubhkamana Git," the repetition of good fortune, life, health, respect and related wishes gives the song a ritual quality. "Jagaran Git" turns political and social consciousness into the rhythms of song. In "Horik Git," colour, the body, laughter, love and community move together. The value of these compositions is not confined to the written page. Their full life may unfold on stages, in processions, at festivals or in gatherings. Accordingly, it is not enough to treat Dholak solely as a printed volume of poetry: it is also a document of orally performed verse.

The language of Tal-Khand generally rests upon short lines, pauses shaped by sound and recurring phrases. Classical metrical discipline is not rigid in every composition, but an audible beat is continually at work. The distinction matters: irregularity in written metre does not necessarily imply an absence of rhythm. Many of these poems follow the breath of folk performance rather than the grammatical length of a line.

Tal-Khand (Fifteen Poems)

The compositions in Tal-Khand are songs and short lyrics dealing with love, separation, union, festivals and customary rites. In a song such as "Siyajik Chhanh Ai Biah, Janakpurme," the poet centres Janakpurdham's cultural identity on the wedding of Sita and Rama, rooting a work in his own language in the land with which it is associated. "Han Re Sugaba" and "Dhak-Dhak Karay Karej Mor" exhibit both the rhythmic structure and the figurative ornamentation of folk song. The concluding piece, "Kattasan Shuru," is a satire on corruption which, according to both learned preface writers, was also used in the first Maithili telefilm, Dahejme Ael Chhi.

7. Nal-Khand: Social Reality, Revolution and Philosophical Debate

The collection's third and most serious division is Nal-Khand, comprising sixty-two poems. Nal refers here to the deeper-sounding side of the dholak. In these works the poet stands on the naked, uneven ground of life, approached through rational inquiry, and seeks human and historical values. This division offers the fullest expression of his political experience, philosophical reflection and sociological vision.

7.1 The Metaphor of the Dholak: The Anguish of Marginalised Groups and the Reality of Exploitation

The title poem, "Dholak!," is an intensely moving and living symbol of the neglected, exploited and proletarian classes. The poet perceives a remarkable parallel between the physical fate of the drum and the social fate of marginalised people. He describes the instrument being left hanging in a corner of the thatched dwelling. Yet whenever there is a celebration, a devotional gathering, or an occasion of birth or death, it is taken down and put to use.

The line in which the drum is "held beneath the thigh and beaten" is a precise metaphor for the extreme physical and psychological exploitation of working people. The elite or holders of political power use the proletariat—labourers, Dalits and the oppressed—only for their own "celebrations": elections, development projects and political movements. When the work is finished, the people so used are returned to the "dark corner" of society and left to an anonymous existence, like the drum hung up again under a torn, musty covering. This is an outstanding example of Marxist and subaltern discourse, combining estrangement with rebellion.

The Symbolic Meaning of the Title "Dholak"

The title poem "Dholak!" (p. 54) is the intellectual centre of the book. Its central movement is unmistakable: the drum plays for celebrations, devotional songs, births and deaths, practice and customary rites alike; but once it has been used, it is hung up again on the same peg, in the same corner, in darkness.

Dholak! It hangs there, suspended,

Tied to a peg driven into the corner of the thatch!

...

They hang it up again in the dark!!

In this poem the dholak becomes an image of proletarian and working-class existence: it sounds endlessly for the pleasure of others, never for its own satisfaction. In the piece entitled "Vinay," the poet himself connects the act of writing to the same metaphor:

Within the dholak's rolling sound, these and other words too are struck into rhythm, even if they beat out of time.

The "opinions" and "mockery" of the unheeding are woven together, without their knowing it!!

It becomes evident that the title Dholak points not merely to a rural musical instrument but also represents the poet's own creative labour: an instrument that gives rhythm to the opinions and mockery of those who do not listen, even when the blows produce sounds outside the proper beat. Internal evidence from the collection's structure supports this interpretation. The division titles Tal-Khand and Nal-Khand extend the dholak into a governing structural metaphor: tal denotes beat and musical rhythm, while nal evokes an inner pulse and the beating of the arteries.

7.2 "Manukhmara": An Unsparing Attack on NGOs and Intellectual Hypocrisy

The attack made by "Manukhmara" upon the hypocrisy of today's development industry and NGO culture deserves to be remembered in literary history. It exposes the stark reality of how the poverty and deprivation of Dalit and Musahar communities have become a "business" or "project" for intellectuals, researchers and politicians. The poet satirically suggests that Musahars must be kept as Musahars—in the same deprived condition—so that observers can gaze at them, photograph them, dispense a little charity after making them beg, and put on a display of righteous indignation.

The drawing rooms of those who call themselves civilised require a living poor person as evidence when they praise traditional diversity. If the Musahar community becomes educated and prosperous, sociology will lose its "subject," foreign funding will stop, and tourists will dwindle. Poverty must therefore be preserved so that slogans can be raised in the Musahars' name and resources consumed under that pretext. In the final lines, the poet raises a piercing question: the poor Musahar kills rats only to fill his stomach, whereas these contractors of development are destroying people's lives and futures. They are, in the most literal moral sense, manukhmara—killers of human beings. The poem unmasks the pretence within a form of Dalit discourse in which sympathy has become a profitable business.

7.3 The Politicisation of Martyrdom and the Deceptions of the System

The poem "La Agnishikha Redme" reveals how the sacrifices made by ordinary people in Nepal's various movements—the People's Movement and the Madhesh Movement among them—have been turned to political advantage. It portrays unscrupulous leaders who gained power by invoking the cooled blood of martyrs and the suffering of their mothers. By marking their foreheads with the symbolic blood of martyrs, offering purchased flowers, and giving bereaved families a little money or a job, these leaders redeem the sacrifices at election time, as though collecting an investment "with interest."

This is a poem of revolutionary disillusionment, but it is not wholly pessimistic. The poet warns that the flame of revolution may appear dormant for the moment, while everything is heating up within. The martyrs' sacrifice has become like Raktabija, the mythic being whose blood gives rise to new life. When the tide of time rises, the white coverings worn by these leaders will be torn to shreds, and the rotting heaps of corruption will catch fire.

7.4 The Terror of Urbanisation and the Mechanisation of Relationships

"Hamar Shahar Bahurael Achhi" offers a realistic portrayal of the confusion, mechanical routine and insensitivity of modern urban life. The poet uses a succession of alliterative words—"beginati behal bekal, bedhangi bejan bechal"—to picture human beings stunned and disordered amid the clamour of the city: innumerable, distressed, restless, misshapen, lifeless and sold. Darkness from the early morning, expanses of idleness and dependence upon others together reveal a city grown bewildered and senile, where rising cries of protest are crushed beneath the weight of burdens.

Similarly, "Father's Day" attacks the commercialisation of relationships and the unthinking imitation of Western cultural forms. Parents are no longer objects of genuine respect; they have become "museum items," dusted and washed once a year. One touches their feet on Facebook, offers sweets on Father's Day or Mother's Day, and considers the year's obligations discharged. Children may never visit at all, sending their salutations by courier instead.

This virtual, courier-mediated truth about relationships reveals the hollowness of a new generation and the erosion of traditional family values.

7.5 Philosophical Dimensions: Time, Existence and the Will to Live

Alongside revolution, a serious philosophical current runs through Lal's poetry. In "Samay" ("Time"), he describes the omnipotence and impartiality of time. Time has neither past nor future; it is perpetually a realised present. It has no religion or irreligion, attachment or hatred. Formless and all-powerful, it moves with the same momentum from the beginning of creation to cosmic dissolution.

"Jakhan Tak Ee Jingi" brings together nihilism and existentialism. The poet holds that darkness is emptiness, and light too is emptiness; the foundation of existence is the void. Yet this awareness of nothingness does not lead him to abandon action. He declares that, for as long as life lasts, he will keep the torch burning and continue sounding the conch, even from within emptiness. This is comparable to the existentialism of Jean-Paul Sartre, in which human beings create meaning through their actions amid apparent meaninglessness.

"Ee Suruj Dekhu Astait" presents the setting sun as carrying a message of renewed creation even into the realm of death: tomorrow will certainly bring another dawn. The poem symbolises the cyclical movement of time and the perennial optimism of nature. In "Khoji Rahal Chhi...," the poet searches for his lost land, his original identity and his once-undivided culture, now fragmented and contaminated.

7.6 The Psychology of Resistance and the Conflict between Justice and Injustice

In "Dhairyavan Lok!" the poet satirises the mentality of ordinary citizens who remain silent even while suffering injustice. People in the village and wider society are tolerant and peace-loving, yet this patience has become another name for cowardice: they persuade themselves that "nothing happens" and "nothing will happen." The poem calls for an end to this passivity.

In "Chuppi" ("Silence"), however, the poet regards silence as a strategic weapon that confronts the shameless and releases energy. "Ah!" attacks the escapist mentality that longs for a beautiful future and development without enduring pain or entering into struggle.

"Ke Kaelai Ee Khun?" ("Who Committed This Murder?") and "Khun Ta Khun Chhaik!" ("Blood Is Blood!") make a severe indictment of violence, killing and political crime. However deceitful or selfish the killer may be, however cowardly the attempt at concealment, the reality of bloodshed cannot be erased. The conflict between justice and injustice reaches even the ledgers of Yamaloka, the realm of the god of death, where the murderer's account will assuredly be settled. These poems give ethical voice to resistance against the impunity prevailing in society.

Finally, in "Apnesan Karak Achhi Bat," the poet offers a moving picture of organising his inner conflicts, loneliness and repressed emotions, and then shutting them away again in a box. It represents an especially intense moment of his poetic sensitivity.

Nal-Khand: The Pulse of Public Life

With its sixty-two compositions, Nal-Khand constitutes the main body of the book. Here the poet moves beyond domestic and festive life into the city, politics, class, religion, poverty, democracy, violence, women, labour, the market, time, death, war and self-doubt. Titles such as "Hamar Shahar Bahuhal Achhi..." ("My City Is in Disarray..."), "Manukhbhamara," "Samay" ("Time"), "Dholak!," "Jakhan Tak Ei Jingi" ("As Long as This Life Lasts"), "Ei Suruj Dekhu Astait" ("See This Sun Setting"), "Khoji Rahal Chhi..." ("I Am Searching..."), "Tap?!," "Bethan Lok!," "Chuppi" ("Silence"), "Ke Katlak Ei Khun?!" ("Who Shed This Blood?!"), "Khun Ta Khun Chhaik!" ("Blood Is Blood!"), "Apneke Karak Achhi Bat" ("A Conversation with Oneself"), "Pinjara" ("The Cage"), "Shakal Sunal Uthah Ge Babal," "Arthik," "'Musahar'ke Ham Bachcha Chhi!" ("I Am a Child of the Musahars!"), "Bia Sangharshke" ("The Seeds of Struggle"), "Nari" ("Woman"), "Jivan Sapna" ("Life Is a Dream"), "Chupp Chhi" ("I Am Silent"), "Mahan Chhi?" ("Am I Great?"), "Sahamati" ("Agreement"), "Bat Ta Sahaj Chhaik" ("It Is Quite Simple"), "Ah, Rupaiya!" ("Ah, Money!"), "Himpat" ("Snowfall"), "Dhar Dhar Re!," "Hamar Shahar" ("My City"), "Ki Tora Lel?!" ("Is It for You?!"), "Lok" ("The People"), "Ajib Achhi!" ("How Strange!"), "Visphot" ("Explosion"), "Jogira!," "Pet" ("The Belly"), "Chunarime Dag" ("A Stain upon the Scarf") and "He Bhagavan!" ("O God!") themselves indicate the collection's extensive social geography.

The poet's strength in this section lies in observation. He does not retreat into mythological distance in search of grand poetic subjects: the street, the city, the beggar, the labourer, the procession, the mobile telephone, money, the stomach, blood, the chair, development schemes, voting, religion, photographs and fire all become materials for his poetry. The material world of modernity enters the verse directly. This constitutes a form of democratic aesthetics: the subjects worthy of poetry are not confined to what is conventionally "beautiful" but include everything that exerts pressure upon social life.

The Title Poem "Dholak!": The Book's Central Metaphor

The title poem is the key to understanding the collection. It begins with the image of a dholak, a drum hanging in a corner of an earthen house. When an occasion arises, the instrument is taken down. For worship, rites of passage, festivities, rehearsals, customary observances, another person's happiness or some practical need, its cords are tightened and its sound tuned. When the occasion is over, it is hung once again in the same corner, in its old, torn covering, in darkness, for an indefinite period.

Within this deceptively simple, almost narrative scene lies a penetrating social metaphor. Society often remembers the artist, the worker, the woman, the Dalit, the activist, the intellectual or the ordinary citizen only when their services are required. When "sound" is needed, take the dholak down; once the sound has served its purpose, hang it up again. This structure of objectification applies both to modern labour relations and to political instrumentalism. The poem does not state these meanings explicitly—and therein lies its greatest strength. Whereas many other poems in the collection pronounce their conclusions outright, "Dholak!" gives the metaphor room to unfold within the reader.

It is noteworthy that "The Musical Drum," an English translation of this poem, appears in the representative anthology Varied Verses, edited by Ayodhyanath Chaudhary. Its inclusion suggests that "Dholak" has been regarded not merely as the title poem of a particular book but also as a representative work capable of carrying contemporary Maithili poetry to readers beyond its language. The English rendering preserves, as far as possible, the original scene—the peg, the corner of the house, the tightening of cords to tune the drum, the blows of the palms and the instrument's return to a dark corner. Consequently, the metaphor retains its force in translation.

Social Justice: Poverty, Hunger and Labour

The ethical centre of this collection is the dispossessed human being. A poem such as "'Musahar'ke Ham Bachcha Chhi!" attempts to give the economically and caste-marginalised a voice in the first person. "Bethan Lok!," "Pinjara," "Arthik," "Pet," "Manukhbhamara" and the poems about the city examine social inequality, deprivation and the objectification of human beings. The poet's politics is most persuasive when he offers not a slogan but a scene: the hungry body, the search for work, urban disorder, people in distress and a life discarded when its usefulness is exhausted.

The choice of the title "Pet" ("The Belly") is significant in itself. The stomach is not a trivial object in literature: here it represents the fundamental economic truth of existence. It draws hunger, labour, the market, corruption, social inequality and moral compromise into a single nexus. When poetry strips away philosophical coverings and confronts the hunger of the body, the cruelty of modern society becomes more sharply visible.

Nevertheless, writing about disadvantaged communities also raises an ethical question of representation. It is not enough to make a community such as the Musahars a mere emblem of suffering: their agency, culture, skills, resistance and own language must also be present. Dholak takes a sympathetic step in this direction, but future poetry could give its marginalised figures a more multidimensional existence.

Politics and Resistance: From Slogan to Poetry

Vrishesh Chandra Lal comes to literature from a long life of public and political engagement. Power, rights, democracy, repression, popular struggle and civic responsibility therefore recur throughout the collection. Political consciousness is manifest in such works as “Jagaran Git” (“Song of Awakening”), “Bia Sangharshke,” “Dhar Dhar Re!,” “Hamar Shahar,” “Ki Tora Lel?!,” “Lok,” “Ajib Achhi!” and “Visphot.”

Political poetry faces two dangers: the immediate concerns of the news cycle and the pull of the slogan. At various points Dholak both falls into these traps and escapes them. Where the poet creates resonant symbols such as “blood,” “cage,” “dholak,” “city,” “money,” “belly” and “silence,” his poetry moves beyond its immediate historical moment. Where he advances a policy formula or states his conclusion directly, the work approaches the language of contemporary political oratory.

The collection's political significance nevertheless remains substantial, because it preserves in writing a voice from within Nepal's Maithili-speaking public sphere. The nation, Madhesh, Janakpur, language, democracy and inequality are not abstract themes here; they are experiences of everyday existence. For literary history, a collection of this kind also becomes a social record for the future.

The City, Modernity and Irony

Poems such as “Hamar Shahar Bahuhal Achhi...” and the later “Hamar Shahar” express disillusionment with urban modernity. The city is not simply a synonym for progress: it is also a place of disorder, dust, poverty, power, public inconvenience, crowds and ethical isolation. “Ah, Rupaiya!” satirises the market's hierarchy of values; an object-title such as “Stepney” turns the modern consumer world into metaphor; and “Apneke Karak Achhi Bat” strikes at society's self-absorption.

The poet regards modern objects as fit material for verse, an important sign of modernist sensibility. Yet the mere naming of such objects does not in itself constitute modernity; their social relationships must be brought to light. Dholak's most accomplished modern poems are those in which an object becomes a metaphor for human relations.

Love, Women and Gendered Perspectives

The love songs in Tal-Khand and poems such as “Nari” in Nal-Khand show the presence of women's experience within the collection. The love poems contain glances, anklets, colour, bodily movement, separation and attraction. “Nari” conveys a desire to recognise women's strength, motherhood, labour and human dignity.

Yet a number of questions remain when these poems are tested against contemporary feminist criticism. To make a woman only an emblem of “motherhood,” “strength,” “beauty” or romantic love can restrict the reality of her social personhood. Work, property, education, decision-making, violence, bodily autonomy, public leadership and invisible domestic labour might have received deeper treatment. Thus, while the collection affirms women's dignity, its plurality of voices written from within women's lived experience remains limited. This criticism does not diminish the work's value; rather, it identifies possibilities for its further development.

Existential Awareness: Time, Silence, Searching and Death

Behind the poet's public voice stands a solitary, questioning individual. Poems including "Samay," "Jakhan Tak Ei Jingi," "Ei Suruj Dekhu Astait," "Khoji Rahal Chhi...," "Tap?!," "Chuppi," "Ah!," "Chalu Rati Biti Gel!" ("Come, the Night Has Passed!"), "Ei Jingi," "Jivan Sapna," "Chupp Chhi" and "He Bhagavan!" open towards life's uncertainty and the quest for meaning.

In "Samay," time is not stationary but an all-pervasive, moving force within which the human being is momentary. "Chuppi" is more than an absence of speech: it may signify social fear, self-restraint or psychological solitude. "Khoji Rahal Chhi..." stages a search for self-recognition; "Tap?!" brings religious and spiritual questioning into confrontation with the practical conflicts of life. These poems gain depth whenever the poet offers less instruction.

Religion, Myth and Moral Questions

"Ha! Shiv!!," "He Bhagavan!," songs of good wishes, awakening and customary rites all disclose the collection's religious and cultural foundations. The poet uses religion not only as an expression of faith but also as a language in which ethical questions can be asked. This is characteristic of a modernity rooted in popular culture: religion and contemporary social questions enter into dialogue rather than appearing merely as opposites.

However, when religious poetry converts moral truth into a predetermined answer, the poetic tension of the question is reduced. An invocation such as "Ha! Shiv!!" succeeds most fully when it leaves wonder, suffering and helplessness unresolved.

Nal-Khand (Twenty-Seven Poems): The Heart of the Collection

Nal-Khand is the largest and most incisive section of the collection. The gentleness of Bal-Khand and Tal-Khand here gives way to a grave, sharp and directly political-social voice. Four or five principal currents can be identified within it, each of which calls for separate discussion.

(a) Dalit–Musahar Consciousness and Social Justice

The collection's sharpest voice can be heard in poems written for the Musahar (Mahadalit) community: "Manukhmara," "'Musahar'ke Ham Bachcha Chhi," "Betarasal Hira" and "Bakae Bael Buffah Re Bahura." "Manukhmara" offers a biting satire on the "development" culture of the NGO and research worlds, in which the Musahar community becomes a subject for photographs, articles and research papers, yet no change occurs in the actual conditions of its life.

Keep the Musahar a Musahar; look on, watch the blood!

Write about them, take photographs, toss them alms, and put on your spectacle!

Such forthright and fearless satire is comparatively rare in Maithili literature. Likewise, "'Musahar'ke Ham Bachcha Chhi!" has poignant significance. By rhyming "Dalit" with "skhalit" ("fallen" or "debased"), the poet exposes society's stigmatising gaze and reasserts the Musahar identity as a source of pride grounded in labour and truth.

(b) Feminist Criticism and the Irony of "Sita's Land"

Among the collection's most moving poems is "Sitake Bhumime... Ah!" ("In Sita's Land... Ah!"; p. 126). The poet delivers a profound indictment of the irony that even in Janakpurdham, Sita's birthplace, infant girls are still abandoned and cast away. Reinterpreting Sita's abandonment in the Ramayana as a metaphor for the present-day discrimination against girls makes this one of the collection's most courageous imaginative correspondences.

In Sita's land, Sita is thrown away!

At birth, to shiver in the cold ... among the rubbish and chaff at the wayside,

Sita is cast aside!

The poem can be read as a poignant commentary on female foeticide and the neglect of girl children. Towards its end, lines referring to a concealed demon in human guise, hidden within the bow of Shiva, deliver a severe blow to the hypocrisy and double standards prevalent in society.

(c) Questions of Justice, Violence and Accountability

The poems "Khun Ta Khun Chhaik!!!" ("Blood Is Blood!!!") and "Ke Kaela Ei Khun?!" ("Who Committed This Murder?!") form a philosophical pair concerned with violence, justice and political protection.

The people of this world may not see, but the One who watches surely will.

There, complaints will be laid for the reckoning of justice and injustice.

After all, blood is blood!!!

The conception of a supernatural justice founded upon the accounting practices of Yamaloka, the realm of Yama, where entries are added to the "murderer's ledger," testifies to the poem's imaginative daring. Philosophical depth expressed in straightforward, rhythmic language is one of the particular strengths of this section.

(d) Satire on Contemporary Consumerism and Social Hypocrisy

The poet is equally unsparing towards the digital and market-driven pretensions of contemporary society. "Father's Day," also cited in the preface, satirises the transformation of the annual celebration of Father's Day or Mother's Day into a performance for Facebook, even while actual relationships are neglected throughout the year. Poems such as "Ah, Rupaiya!," "Mahan Chhi?" and "Stepney" also attack corruption, unemployment and the politics of middlemen.

(e) A Call to Struggle and Awakening

The collection does not merely display suffering; it also sounds a call to struggle. "Bia Sangharshke" is divided into four parts, moving from the identification of a problem to the decision to resist it.

What else—?!

We shall rise and stand firm!

The seeds of struggle—

We shall resolve to sow them!!

Poems of this kind—including "Dhairyavan Lok!," "Chalu, Rati Biti Gel!" and "Thakal Sutal Uthah Ne Babal"—do not simply offer political slogans; they challenge the inertia of ordinary people. Within them also resounds the historical memory of Nepal's democratic movements.

8. Poetic Craft and Evaluation in Poetics

The success of a poetic work lies not only in its ideas but also in their presentation, formal construction, language and imagery. From this perspective, Dholak is a mature work in which emotional expression and formal accomplishment achieve a remarkable harmony.

8.1 Language and Style: The Use of Idiomatic Maithili

Vrishesh Chandra Lal's language is entirely free from artificiality and the weight of excessive Sanskritisation. His Maithili is fragrant with the earthy scent of Mithila's soil, water and rural folk culture. To express his feelings, he employs spontaneous, indigenous and living vocabulary. This language not only revives memories of village life but also makes the poems communicative and brings them closer to the popular imagination.

Among the characteristic vernacular words appearing in his writing are batangar (making a great fuss over a matter), manhuael, bidhuael, luluael, khaurchhah, augatah, pakathos, akilgar, kanojar, chinwar, gahwar, dhakaraï, nihati, jhapassa, hurka, chhanaki, bakae bael, amarasa, amot, tilkor, tarua and pirukia. Such vocabulary preserves the language's distinctive character and lends precision and force to the communication of feeling.

8.2 Imagery and Symbolism

The visual, auditory and tactile images used by the poet are extraordinarily vivid and effective. In the sphere of auditory imagery, onomatopoeic expressions such as the drum's "gum-gum" resonance, the "hirrrrr" movement of the hirdala, the crow's rapid pecking and flight, the insect's "kar-kar" call and the anklet's "bhunuk bhun bhunbhun" create musical rhythms within the poetry. In visual imagery, "Gorki Najari" depicts the moon smiling amid the blush of a cheek, while "La Agnishikha Redme" presents the image of blood coursing and trickling.

The collection is especially rich in its use of symbols: the dholak represents exploited and marginalised people; the mouse evokes feudal forces and exploitative NGOs; the crow, opportunistic politicians; the fire of the funeral pyre, revolution; and the void, ultimate truth and existence. Such symbolism gives the poems multiple dimensions of meaning.

8.3 Metre, Rhythm and Musicality

The poems of Bal-Khand and Tal-Khand are based upon quantitative metres and folk rhythms, with lyricism occupying the central place. These songs can be performed to traditional Mithila melodies. Nal-Khand, by contrast, employs free verse, in which rhythm arises not from end rhyme but from the rises and falls of the movement of thought. A line such as "beginati behal bekal, bedhangi bejan bechal" illustrates the splendour of alliteration, intensifying the emotional effect.

Folk Sounds and the Poetic Craft of Onomatopoeia

The poetics of Dholak rests upon sound, which functions at three levels. First is imitative sound—phurr, dhum, dhak, chakdum, bhuku, jham-jham and jogira. Second is rhythmic repetition, the recurrence of the same phrase to establish a song-like cycle. Third is public address: "O God!," "Ah, Shiva!," "Dhar Dhar Re!," "Awake!" and "Rise!" These utterances turn the poem from something merely read into an appeal voiced aloud.

This tradition of invocation is connected with Mithila's folk songs, seasonal songs, Holi songs, wedding and life-cycle rituals, vigils and poetry performed on public platforms. The poet employs traditional oral devices to address modern subjects. Consequently, politics itself can become song, while children's games can serve as a school of poetic rhythm.

Repetition, however, is not equally effective everywhere. Where it heightens the tension between sound and meaning, it makes a poem memorable; where it seems merely to fill out the lines, it slows the movement. An edited new edition of the collection could make several poems more incisive through selective abbreviation based upon the poetic necessity of their repetitions.

Language: Nepal's Maithili, Vernacular Speech and the Question of Correctness

The language of Dholak is not confined to standard, bookish Maithili. The everyday speech of Janakpur and Madhesh, folk expressions, Sanskrit-derived words, forms arising from contact with Hindi and Nepali, modern administrative terminology and names for objects borrowed from English coexist within it. It would not be sound literary criticism to dismiss this mixture simply as "incorrectness," for it is also a record of the actual linguistic society of the region.

At the level of publication, however, spelling consistency, punctuation, uniformity of forms and typographical accuracy should be maintained more rigorously. On several pages one encounters variations in word forms, vowel signs, excessive question or exclamation marks, letter combinations and the presentation of titles. When poetry moves from oral performance into the enduring form of written literature, editorial accuracy becomes necessary. The aim of correction should not be to erase the local Maithili voice but to increase orthographic clarity and ease of reading.

The most vital elements of this language are its forms of address and its verbs. Short sentences, questions, calls, exclamations and embodied actions make it a speaking language. At several points the poet's skill in political oratory is an advantage: the line seizes an audience's attention immediately when spoken from a platform.

Images and Poetry: Possibilities for Visual Reading

The tendency to accompany almost every poem with an illustration turns this collection into a visual book, distinguishing it from an ordinary volume of verse. It is especially successful in Bal-Khand, because children's reading depends upon images as well as words. In Nal-Khand, illustrations associated with blood, poverty, the city, women, hunger, solitude, snowfall and explosions supply an immediate visual setting.

From a critical standpoint, however, the illustrations have two limitations. First, they frequently explain the poem's meaning in advance, reducing the reader's freedom to imagine. Second, their artistic styles are inconsistent: photographs, line drawings, cartoons and computer-generated images belong to different visual languages. A future edition adopting the work of a single artist or a consistent visual grammar rooted in Mithila could greatly increase the book's artistic unity.

Strengths of the Poetic Craft

Onomatopoeia: Expressions such as “phurr-phurr,” “dhum-dhum,” “dhak-dhak,” “chakdum” and “bhuku-bhuku” make poetry an embodied auditory experience.

Folk rhythm: Holi songs, devotional vigils, benedictions, anklets, birdsong and the dholak keep the memory of folk music alive.

Directness: Rather than difficult philosophical terminology, the poet chooses scenes, objects, questions and direct address; consequently, his verse reaches a broad readership.

Thematic range: From children to politics, love to hunger, and the city to spirituality, the collection encompasses an exceptional breadth of subject matter.

Public orality: The poems have the capacity to remain alive in recitation, collective singing, processions and literary gatherings.

Satire: Brief, cutting statements and questions target money, leaders, development schemes, the public, the city and social pretence.

Metaphor: Objects and images such as the “dholak,” the “cage,” “blood,” the “belly,” “silence” and the “spare tyre” become entrances into social meaning.

Poetic Limitations and Possibilities for Improvement

Serious criticism cannot consist of praise alone. While recognising the importance of Dholak, it is also necessary to state its limitations clearly.

(a) Excessive Declarativeness

Several political and ethical poems pronounce a conclusion before allowing the idea to develop through imagery or situation. Poetry consequently approaches the manifesto. Greater poetic depth would result if thought were allowed to unfold through metaphor, scenes and characters.

(b) Uneven Use of Repetition

Repetition is a strength in song, but excessive recurring lines in every poem can diminish their impact. What is pleasurable when heard in performance can sometimes seem prolonged on the printed page. Selective editing would be beneficial.

(c) Control of Metre and Line

The poet trusts folk rhythm, and this is a strength. Yet line length, caesura and acoustic weight are not always consistent. Where the poems are intended to be sung, musical notation, indications of the beat or a clearly structured arrangement of refrains would help readers grasp their rhythm.

(d) Consistency of Visual Material

The illustrations are highly useful, but the disparity in their artistic styles weakens the book's integrated visual identity. Original Mithila painting or a uniform style of black-and-white line drawing offers possibilities for renewal.

(e) Typography and Spelling

The book appears to require another round of editorial proofreading. Particular attention should be given to vowel marks, conjunct letters, exclamation and question marks, spaces between words, the form of titles and numerical notation.

(f) Polyphony in Social Themes

The poet's concern for the disadvantaged, women, labourers and the poor is unmistakable. In a subsequent phase, these figures could be represented not merely as objects of the poet's compassion or indignation, but as multidimensional persons possessing independent voices, memories, humour, desires and forms of dissent.

Language, Style and Poetic Technique

Vrishesh Chandra Lal's language is rooted in popular speech, idiomatic and straightforward. Avoiding the extravagance of heavily Sanskritised diction, he draws upon proverbs, idioms, simple metrical patterns and the effects of repetition and refrain inherited from the traditions of folk song, Holi-jogira and auspicious ceremonial songs. The preface also confirms that the poet had long been associated with anti-corruption compositions, including the song

"Kattasa Shuru Ham Karu" ("Where Shall I Begin?"), used in the first Maithili telefilm.

A second distinctive feature is the abundance of local symbols: Sita, Durga, Mahishasura, Shiva and others are employed to interpret contemporary social reality. As the prefatory writer Parmeshwar Kapari observes, the dimensions of the poet's creative world are extensive, and its scope and landscape are exceptionally broad.

In Dr Rajendra Vimal's formulation, the collection's linguistic distinctiveness arises from the fact that it has been created by a poet-hearted soldier engaged upon the battlefield of the continuing struggle to end discrimination in Nepal. The reader consequently encounters an experience resembling that of Krishna standing in the midst of Kurukshetra and delivering the Gita.

Symbolism: A Meeting of Ancient and Modern

One notable characteristic of the collection is its contemporary reinterpretation of Vedic and Puranic symbols. The preface cites Rigveda 10.129.5 and the Mundaka Upanishad's words, "prathamah sambabhuva vishvasya karta bhuvanasya gopta," infusing the auspicious song "Shubhe Ho Shubhe" with a new, socialist and transformative meaning. Thus the poet does not reject tradition; he recombines it with a new political and social consciousness. This also extends a powerful tradition of Maithili literature: the reinterpretation of folk song and devotional poetry.

Critical Assessment

Strengths

• Direct experience: The writing is not produced in a vacuum of political rhetoric but emerges from the field of struggle. Its voice therefore possesses a directness rarely found in artificial literature.

• Multidimensional range: From children's literature to political satire, from folk and love songs to philosophical reflection and social realism, many generic colours are visible within a single collection.

• Social commitment: Poems about the Musahar community, the oppression of women and poverty convey a sympathetic authenticity. Their realism appears to be known from within rather than drawn from external examples.

Limitations

• In places, the argument is so explicit that the subtle weave of symbolism gives way to direct declaration. This weakness is not accidental, however: it also expresses the demands of a consciously activist style.

• Because the collection has three sections and many subsidiary themes, its voice repeatedly changes—from childlike tenderness to political sharpness. Read as a whole, these transitions can sometimes seem abrupt.

9. An Examination of the Critics' Perspectives

The observations of the distinguished prefatory critics at the beginning of the book offer a key to the poet's imaginative world and help elucidate his intellectual foundations.

The senior critic Dr Rajendra Vimal characterises the poet's consciousness as an "anthropocentric philosophy." He writes that Vrishesh Chandra Lal's Maithili poems render the subtlest pictures of the struggles, successes and failures, sorrows and joys of Nepal's Mithila region through fresh images and symbols. The poet views life in its totality and also provides a charted path for the transformation of inauspicious forces into auspicious ones. In Vimal's view, these poems offer an unrestrained expression of reality as lived on the ground, rather than the voice of frustration: it is as though Krishna were standing in the midst of Kurukshetra and expounding the Gita.

The senior writer Parmeshwar Kapari, on the other hand, explains Lal's philosophy by contrasting the Vedantic declaration "Brahman is real, the world is an illusion" with what he calls Lal's resounding voice: "The world is real; the people are Brahman!" According to Kapari, this creative voice supports a neo-structural, popularly impassioned and transformative movement. He also celebrates the historical significance of Lal's children's songs and pop songs. Taken together, the two assessments establish that Vrishesh Chandra Lal's poetry does not uphold the status quo; it carries the energies of progressive transformation.

Dholak and the Contemporary Maithili Poetic Tradition

For centuries, Maithili poetry has been sustained by songs, lyrical compositions, folk melodies, devotion, love, seasonal cycles and social life. Modern poetry has broadened the field through free verse, social reality, political resistance, satire, urban experience, questions concerning Dalits and the dispossessed, feminist debate and individual existential awareness. Dholak connects these two currents: its poetic body is shaped by folk rhythm, but its subjects belong to modern civic life.

Devakanta Jha's history of modern Maithili literature points to the increasing presence of social consciousness, realism, experimentation and human struggle within modern poetry. Dholak is an important Nepal-centred example of this tendency. Its language and political geography introduce experiences different from the major centres of Indian Mithila; the collection should therefore also be read as testimony to the cross-border character of contemporary Maithili literature.

The inclusion of "The Musical Drum" in the English-language Varied Verses demonstrates Dholak's potential for translation across languages. If Maithili poetry wishes to reach a global readership, poems built upon metaphors that are culturally distinctive yet universally intelligible are particularly suitable.

10. Conclusion

Taken as a whole, Vrishesh Chandra Lal's Dholak is an epoch-making and enduring work of contemporary Maithili poetry. It provides compelling evidence that when politics and literature meet in the same passionately committed heart, the result need not be narrow party allegiance, but can instead be a profound compassion for society's most marginalised people, a search for human values and a commitment to justice. The poet's experience of political imprisonment, democratic struggle and sacrifices for the rights of Mithila and Madhesh pulse as energy through every word of this book.

While the children's songs of Dholak prepare young minds for the challenges of a new age and sow within them the seeds of liberty and equality, its songs of rhythm delight the popular heart with the cultural fragrance of its own soil, the erotic lyricism of the Vidyapati tradition and the satire of modern times. The grave poems of Nal-Khand, meanwhile, shake exploitative power, the hypocritical intelligentsia, NGO culture and a directionless modernity. The unaffected quality of the poet's language, the melodious employment of idiomatic Maithili vocabulary and the vividness of his imagery make the book both rich in literary terms and strongly oriented towards the people.

The intellectual footsteps of Nepal's Madhesh Movement, of democratic consciousness and of the struggle to liberate marginalised classes, so apparent in the poet's political life, resound in his poems as the beats of the dholak. Dholak will certainly prove to be an invaluable inheritance and a milestone in the development of modern Maithili literature. It is not merely a collection of poems but an honest, courageous and historical record of the heartbeat of the present age. Studying and researching the book will be equally worthwhile for students of literature, sociology and political science.

Overall Evaluation

Dholak cannot adequately be evaluated through the simple opposition between “beautiful poetry” and “political poetry.” It is a multilayered work of public verse composed by a citizen-poet. The sounds of children's games, the rhythms of folk songs, Madhesh's struggles, the city of Janakpur, the poor person's stomach, women's dignity, the question of bloodshed, the mockery of money, the silence of the soul and human helplessness before God are all different beats struck upon the same drum.

The collection's greatest achievement is that it does not imprison Maithili poetry within the confines of the elite literary classroom. Poetry here travels through the street, home, field, pond, school, festival, meeting, movement, hospital, market and the dark recesses of the mind. Amid this democratic expansion, several compositions remain poetically unrefined, yet the book as a whole is full of the sounds of life.

If a selected edition entitled The Best of Dholak were prepared—containing some forty to fifty of the most concentrated poems, a carefully corrected text, consistent illustrations, dates or contexts of composition, a glossary, indications of the rhythm of songs, English and Nepali translations, and a critical introduction—it could become more effective for the teaching and translation of Maithili literature across borders. The original ninety-six-composition edition, however, has a separate documentary importance. It should be preserved alongside, not replaced by, an abridged selection.

Conclusion

The central question posed by Dholak is this: whose sound does society hear, when does it hear it, and why does it hang the instrument back in a corner once its work is done? Bal-Khand provides the prehistory of that question: the human being is born full of sound, play and wonder. Tal-Khand shows how that sound becomes rhythm within a community. Nal-Khand reveals how inequality, blood, hunger, power, love, religion, the market and death are all connected within that community by the same vital pulse.

Viewed in this light, the title Dholak is entirely apt. The instrument is more than a folk drum: it is society's body, the poet's voice, the citizen's resistance, the worker's pain at being treated as useful only to others, and the heartbeat of collective memory. Although the poetic quality of the collection is uneven, its cultural energy is formidable. It deserves a serious place in the study of contemporary Maithili poetry, particularly in the study of Maithili literary creativity in Nepal.

Dholak is more than a Maithili poetry collection; it is a sound-picture of an entire age, in which the innocent games of childhood, the tenderness of lovers meeting and the cries of society's most oppressed—Musahars, Dalits and women—resound together. The metaphor embodied in its title—playing for others, remaining mute for oneself, and being tied up again in a corner after use—gives meaningful coherence to the entire collection.

The poet's own experiences of political and social struggle make this book not merely a literary creation but also a social and political document. It supplies a new and contemporary link in Maithili literature's tradition of committed, people-centred poetry. Social justice, Dalit consciousness, feminist questions and political criticism of corruption are all equally relevant to the Maithili-speaking society of Mithilanchal today.

In its entirety, Dholak is a voice in the landscape of Maithili poetry that sounds both the festive drumbeat and the warning call of struggle upon the same skin. It grows silent only when tied up in the corner, remaining ready to be played once again.

Bibliography

Lal, Vrishesh Chandra. Dholak (Maithili Poetry Collection). Sudama Prakashan, Janakpurdham.

Mishra, Jayakant. History of Maithili Literature. Sahitya Akademi, 1976.

Jha, Devakanta. A History of Modern Maithili Literature: Post-Independence Period. Sahitya Akademi, 2004.

Chaudhary, Ayodhyanath, editor and translator. Varied Verses: Representative Anthology of Contemporary Maithili Poetry.

3. Golba

Author	Vrishesh Chandra Lal (Vrishesh Chandra Lal)
Genre	Maithili short-story collection
Included stories	Golba; Deep Depression; Chaukparak Maugi (three extended stories)
Central concerns	Exploitation of the defenceless; the culpability of social silence; the conflict between the human and the inhuman

1. Literary Context, the Author's Intellectual Background, and the Significance of the Work

In the development of Maithili short fiction, the contemporary period has witnessed a range of ideological, psychological, and formal experiments. Moving beyond the traditions of Rajkamal Chaudhary's psychological realism, Lalit's regional sensibility, and Sudhanshu Shekhar Chaudhary's social consciousness, contemporary storytellers have made new subject matter, metropolitan anguish, and the sociological disintegration of a changing village society central concerns of fiction. Within this historical trajectory, Golba, a collection of stories by Vrishesh Chandra Lal—a leading thinker of Nepal's democratic movement, an outspoken political activist, and a distinctive literary figure—constitutes a momentous and serious literary intervention.

Vrishesh Chandra Lal was born on 29 March 1955 in the village of Suga-Bhawanipatti in Mahottari district, Nepal. His primary public identity has been that of a politician committed to principle, yet his political philosophy and literary consciousness are inseparably connected. During his sustained struggle to establish democracy in Nepal, he was arrested seventeen times and spent approximately eight difficult years in prison. Besides being a founder and national vice-president of the Tarai Madhesh Loktantrik Party, he served as a member of the National Assembly (2017–2019) and as mayor of Janakpur. Behind this forceful and combative political personality lies the heart of an exceptionally sensitive, humane, and philosophical writer, fully capable of giving words to the cries of society's exploited, neglected, and voiceless beings. The linguistic lucidity, historical insight, and philosophical seriousness displayed in his Maithili adaptations of Bishweshwar Prasad Koirala's celebrated Nepali novellas Sumnima and Modiain are also clearly discernible in his original stories.

"Golba," "Deep Depression," and "Chaukparak Maugi" are interrelated on psychological, sociological, existential, and formal levels. Lal's prose possesses a certain dispassionate philosophical quality: he does not merely recount events but performs a subtle dissection of the psychological complexes, power structures, and sociological realities concealed within them.

Although modest in size, Golba is a story collection rich in layers of possible meaning. Its first story, "Golba," views the family, affection, and the violence of sacrifice through the eyes of a young animal. The second, "Deep Depression," constructs a cycle of fear, suspicion, self-surveillance, and an unutterable truth within an unnamed man. The third, "Chaukparak Maugi," becomes a story of rapid urbanisation, newly acquired wealth, linguistic inferiority, social indifference, and a woman's precarious existence in public space. The three stories differ in their outward subjects, but at a deeper level the collection poses the same question: when a living creature or human being is suffering, what moral duty falls upon those who witness that suffering?

For this reason, the collection's central word is not merely "compassion" but also "responsibility." In the first story, a family brings Golba up like its own child but eventually treats his body as food for a ritual feast. In the second, the protagonist understands his own suffering and the doctor also recognises its signs, yet the truth remains undisclosed. In the third, an entire crossroads sees a woman; the police, a locally influential young man, the narrator, and his friends are all aware of her presence, but no one actively intervenes. Across this trilogy, the distance between "seeing" and "doing" is the chief source of literary and ethical tension.

From the perspective of narrative theory, the collection is particularly noteworthy for its treatment of point of view. Through the concept of narrative "focalisation," Gérard Genette distinguishes between who speaks in a narrative and whose perspective governs what is experienced: these are not necessarily the same. In "Golba," a narrator tells the story in human language, but an animal remains the centre of experience. In "Deep Depression," the narration is in the third person, yet the text remains almost entirely enclosed within the protagonist's consciousness. In "Chaukparak Maugi," the first-person narrator becomes both a witness who postpones action and, finally, a participant overwhelmed by guilt. Here, perspective is not simply a narrative technique; it is an ethical test.

2. The Collection's Structure and Thematic Unity

The collection's three stories focus successively on an animal, the mind, and society. This order does not appear entirely accidental. "Golba" depicts outward violence inflicted upon the body; "Deep Depression," the inward erosion of the mind; and "Chaukparak Maugi," the neglect and violence produced by social structures. In this way the collection presents three forms of violence: ritual violence, psychological violence, and social or gendered violence.

A second thread connects this trilogy: silence. Golba cannot speak the ordinary language of human beings; his resistance, discomfort at the bells, fear, or desire to remain alive can be expressed only through bodily signs. The protagonist of "Deep Depression" can speak, but conceals what matters most;

his silence becomes a prison of his own making. The woman in "Chaukparak Maugi" remains largely silent throughout the story; at the end, her cry becomes her first genuine public statement. Along this progression, silence develops from a biological limitation into psychological repression and social invisibility.

A third common thread is "vision" or the act of seeing. Golba observes human actions but cannot comprehend their significance. The depressed man is trapped in an imperative to assign meaning to every sign—a smell, a closed window, an untouched cup of tea, a crow's beak. The narrator of "Chaukparak Maugi" sees the woman every day, but fear of "what people will say" prevents him from turning observation into action. The collection's deeper structure is consequently epistemological as well: how much do we understand of what we see? And if complete knowledge is unavailable, is it right to suspend ethical intervention?

Golba is a collection of three extended stories by Vrishesh Chandra Lal: "Golba," "Deep Depression," and "Chaukparak Maugi." At first sight they appear to concern entirely different subjects and characters: the life of a goat; the inner conflict of a man caught in a mental-health crisis; and the poignant account of a mysterious woman sitting by the roadside. A closer reading, however, reveals that all three are bound by a common intellectual thread: the injustice that society, including the family, inflicts upon the defenceless, voiceless, or disregarded, and the collective culpability of those who remain silent spectators to that injustice. In this sense, Golba is a thematically unified collection in which each story raises, in a different form, the same question: how do human beings behave in the presence of helplessness?

The three stories in the collection—'Golba,' 'Deep Depression,' and 'Chaukparak Maugi'—have distinct plots but represent three forms of a common ethical structure. In the first, an animal body without human language is trapped between human affection and religious violence. In the second, a character who can speak nevertheless cannot disclose his deepest suspicions and mental suffering. In the third, a woman remains socially 'unheard' even while occupying a public place in everyone's sight. Throughout this trilogy, the body, silence, vision, suspicion, violence, compassion, and responsibility recur. The artistic achievements and limitations of this structure become evident when considered in the light of the Indian traditions of rasa and dhvani, narrative theory, animal studies, ethical criticism, metropolitan sociology, and the psychology of bystander inaction.

2. "Golba": Animal Perspective, Innocence, Affection, and Sacrifice

The title story, "Golba," represents a highly original and unusual experiment in Maithili fiction with a non-human, anthropomorphic perspective and with the theory of animal symbolism associated here with Bruno Bettelheim. At its centre stands a castrated male goat named Golba. Through his story, the writer exposes with exceptional poignancy and irony the pretences surrounding human–animal relationships, human self-interest, and cruelty practised in the name of religious ritual.

The story begins with Golba's birth, at which point the author immediately constructs a web of illusion. Golba's biological mother is the mottled goat Chitkabari, but the mistress of the household, Barki Mai, catches the newborn before he can fall to the ground and lifts him into her lap. Animals recognise others through smell, and Golba comes to regard himself as Barki Mai's child and the brother of Soni, Moni, and Babbu. Barki Mai hides him in a fold of her sari; Soni and Moni arrange bedding and a little jacket for him; and red, green, and black tassels are brought from the Geruka fair and tied around his neck to protect him from the evil eye. Even the colours of these tassels are symbolic: red for strength, green for good health, and black to ward off the evil eye.

Here the writer creates a profound psychological irony. Golba never understands that he is an animal whose destiny may end in a cooking pot or upon the altar of the goddess Bhagavati. He cannot understand human speech, but he understands the touch of affection and injury. Barki Mai seems to him like an "ocean of maternal tenderness." This delusion does not belong to the animal alone; it also represents the ideological delusion, or "false consciousness," of the exploited classes, who mistake the affection and protection bestowed by a ruling class for a shield against harm.

As Golba grows, Babbu changes from protector to exploiter and trainer. He fastens a collar of little bells around Golba's neck; its harsh sound displeases the animal, who shakes his head in an unsuccessful attempt to remove it. Babbu then turns him into a fighting goat and sets him against other goats in the grove. This symbolises a structure of power in which the oppressed are made to fight among themselves, enabling the ruling class—represented by Babbu—to amuse itself while maintaining its dominance.

At last comes the tragic day for which the whole family, except Golba, has been waiting. The priest arrives; relatives and members of the household gather; drums and reed instruments sound; and Golba is bathed in the freezing pond during the month of Magh before being brought into the shrine room. Shivering with cold, he still thinks of Babbu: "Would this have happened if Babbu were here now?!" This is the extreme point of betrayal, where the boundless trust of a voiceless creature is being destroyed under the cover of religion.

The climax is exceptionally moving and suffused with the bibhatsa rasa, the aesthetic experience of revulsion. As the priest chants and cries "Victory to Bhagavati! Victory to the Mother!" and the sword falls—"Chhapak!"—the narrative moves beyond material reality into an entirely spiritual, surreal, and philosophical register. Golba's head is severed from his body. At this point the writer creates an "out-of-body experience," or a vision of disembodied existence. Golba examines his severed head, upon which unbearable pain is reflected: the eyes have rolled back and the tongue protrudes between the teeth, partly cut through.

Golba's consciousness rises into space and looks down upon his body being prepared for a feast. Soni and Moni are heating water; the boys are arranging to skin the carcass; Barki Mai is preparing spices; and Babbu, whom Golba loved more than anyone, is laughing and talking with the others. Chitkabari, his real mother, watches helplessly, tears falling from her eyes. The author concludes with an unanswered question: "Where is that Golba now?!" The question concerns not merely the death of an animal but exposes humanity's hypocrisy, cruelty perpetrated in religion's name, and self-interest concealed beneath the appearance of love and maternal care.

The following table clarifies the contradictions inherent in the psychological and symbolic roles of the principal characters in "Golba."

The story begins at Golba's birth. Barki Mai does not let him fall to the earth; Soni and Moni give him his name; Babbu becomes his friend; and he receives milk, bedding, a little jacket, special food, tassels, and bells. Golba thinks of himself not as an animal but as one of the family's children. The opening passages establish such intimacy that the reader comes to regard him not as a "domesticated animal" but as a living member of the household. Without this intimacy, the final sacrifice would remain a mere incident; the author first builds up a reservoir of affection and then discloses its ethical irony.

The family's excessive tenderness towards Golba's body carries two meanings at once. On the one hand, it signifies love; on the other, once the ending is known, it invites a horrifying rereading as a process of "preparing the body." The food given to make Golba "fat and firm," and the ornaments that make him endearing, subsequently appear as a prelude to the objectification of an innocent creature. This doubleness gives the story its most forceful suggestiveness.

3.2 Focalisation: Placing the Reader Inside an Animal's Mind

The story's greatest artistic achievement is to make an animal the centre of experience without reducing him to an imitation of a human being. The narrator does not give Golba an elaborate philosophical vocabulary: his world is constituted by smell, touch, hunger, running, affection, fear, bodily discomfort, and closeness to familiar people. His unease when bells are tied around his neck, his awareness of horns emerging from his head, and his terror at being forcibly bathed in the pond all lend bodily credibility to the narrative.

Reflecting on the boundary between humans and animals, Jacques Derrida questions the human tendency to construct an enormous, homogeneous category called "the animal." "Golba" does not articulate this argument in theoretical language, but its narrative method unsettles that boundary. Golba remembers, recognises affection, obeys commands, feels discomfort, becomes frightened, and finds security in Babbu's presence. The question then arises: if there is such continuity of feeling, how can a difference of species alone make violence morally acceptable?

3.3 The Sacrificial Scene: A Confluence of Pathos, Terror, and Revulsion

Bathing Golba in the pond in the cold of Magh, bringing him to the place of worship, placing consecrated rice and flowers upon his head, and then suddenly cutting his throat: this sequence situates the celebration of ritual and the animal's fear within the same frame. The reader first sees the festive atmosphere surrounding Babbu's ceremony; Golba, too, associates the proceedings with Babbu's happiness. Thus the instant of "Chhapak!" signifies not only slaughter but also the destruction of trust.

In the terms of Indian rasa theory, the prevailing emotion of this scene is karuna, pathos, intensified by the presence of bhayanaka (terror) and bibhatsa (revulsion). The severed head of Golba looking upon his own body produces an extraordinary visual construction. It is not realism but the surrealism of felt experience: death is represented not from an external position, but through a consciousness that "was alive only a moment ago." At this point the narrative denies the reader the comfort of distance.

3.4 The Philosophy of Afterlife: Its Strengths and Limitations

The imagined "journey through infinite space" undertaken by Golba after his slaughter briefly gives the narrative a spiritual breadth. In one sense it places physical suffering within a larger cycle of life; in another, it somewhat softens the ethical blow of the brutal scene. When the story ends by asking, "Where is that Golba now?", the question remains open to grief, impermanence, and identity alike. From a critical perspective, however, one may also observe that certain sentences of posthumous explanation impose the writer's philosophical pronouncements upon the reader's freedom of interpretation. Where compassion already speaks for itself, a little more silence might have made the story still more incisive.

The title story, "Golba," recounts the life of a goat raised by Barki Mai, the elderly mother of the household, and the children Soni, Moni, and Babbu. Its narrative technique is exceptionally subtle and powerful. By placing Golba's consciousness and experience at the centre of the telling, the storyteller gradually draws the reader into an emotional relationship with him. Golba does not even realise that he is an animal: "He had never understood that he was an animal. He had always considered himself Barki Mai's child, just like Soni, Moni, and Babbu." The tragedy of the entire story rests upon this innocent misconception about himself.

The author patiently portrays every detail of Golba's childhood: Barki Mai's affection, his wrestling practice with Babbu, and the care given by Soni and Moni. The reader's tenderness and intimacy towards Golba consequently deepen. Following this prolonged and affection-filled account, the sudden crowding of the house, the arrival of the priest, and the sound of drums and reed instruments arouse the reader's apprehension. Golba, however—and perhaps for a time even the reader—does not understand what these signs actually portend. This dramatic irony is the story's most powerful formal device. The reader knows, or soon comes to understand, what will happen;

Golba himself sees the occasion as a celebration, even an honour: "It seemed to him that he, too, was being included in the ceremony."

The sacrificial scene is the climax of the story, narrated with remarkable boldness. The moment of death is represented through Golba's own consciousness, as a separation of his body and spirit:

"Oh! What has happened?! He has become separated from his own body!!!"

"There was a sudden urgency to undertake a journey through infinite space."

"At some stopping place on that endless journey, he would have to assume another body."

Immediately following this spiritual and philosophical description, the narrator turns to an exceedingly cold, practical account: Soni and Moni are heating water; the boys are sharpening their tools to skin the carcass; the cooks are arranging the cauldrons and ovens; Babbu is laughing and chatting with his friends. The juxtaposition of these two scenes—Golba's spiritual journey and the family's preparations for the feast—generates an intensity of irony that is the story's greatest literary achievement. Its final line, "Where is that Golba now?!", ends in the form of a question, leaving readers to seek the answer for themselves.

Character	Visible behaviour (surface behaviour)	Underlying reality / symbolism
Golba	A member of the family; disciplined and trusting	The exploited class, ignorance, the sacrificial animal, false consciousness
Barki Mai	An "ocean of maternal tenderness"; a protector	Custodian of tradition, self-interested affection, organiser of ritual killing
Babbu	Friend, protector, and playmate	Exploiter, controller, beneficiary of structures of power, representative of betrayal
Soni and Moni	Affectionate as sisters; dress Golba in clothes	Utilitarian love; after Golba's death, they heat water to prepare his meat
Chitkabari	Golba's biological mother	Helpless and silent motherhood; a witness representing society's powerless classes

3. "Deep Depression": Suspicion, Silence, and the Prison of the Mind

As people in civilised society advance towards material prosperity, their inner lives are becoming correspondingly hollow, artificial, and afflicted by depression. "Deep Depression" offers a subtle dissection of distrust in modern married life, suffocating silence, and masculine psychology. Through this story, Vrishesh Chandra Lal addresses the serious subject of mental health within a sociological frame.

The story opens in a doctor's clinic. Outwardly, its protagonist is a fearless, courageous, combative man, regarded by society as stout-hearted and as someone who has never been afraid of anyone. Inwardly, however, he is afflicted by severe panic attacks and anxiety. His heart races, he struggles to breathe, his chest aches, and sometimes he remains motionless, staring for as long as twenty minutes. The doctor diagnoses "deep depression" and calls it a "gift of modernity" and a "companion of development."

The protagonist, however, does not believe the doctor's diagnosis. He knows that his affliction is neither an ordinary bodily complaint nor merely the stress of modern life: its roots lie elsewhere. He attributes his depression to doubts and mistrust concerning his wife's marital fidelity. A particular incident returns repeatedly to his memory. One day, arriving home unexpectedly early from the office, he finds his wife with a former college classmate of hers. The man appears to be in a great hurry and, as he leaves, chews a packet of Tulsi-brand tobacco, leaving the smell of its leaves upon his breath. On entering the house, the protagonist notices that the windows are shut and the curtains drawn. Later that night, when he lies down to sleep, he detects the same smell of Tulsi tobacco on his bed.

This one incident keeps revolving through the protagonist's mind like a film reel running by itself. The "smell of Tulsi tobacco" becomes an extraordinarily powerful psychological image, an olfactory motif that repeatedly wounds him. The smell appears as silent evidence of an outsider's intrusion into the sanctity of his home. When he sees a crow sitting in a tree, he imagines that the crow, too, is hiding something—an indication of his extreme paranoia.

The story's most powerful and tragic feature is that the protagonist cannot share his suspicion with anyone. The doctor explicitly tells him, "One must not lie to one's doctor or lawyer," and urges him to disclose any private matter that may be troubling him. Yet he remains silent. He imagines that if he speaks what he believes to be the truth, his family will break apart, his wife will be disgraced, and his own social reputation will be reduced to dust.

Here Vrishesh Chandra Lal offers a realistic portrayal of the suffocation imposed on men by middle-class morality and a patriarchal society. Society expects men always to be courageous and in control; consequently, a man feels unable to reveal emotional vulnerability or psychological pain. The protagonist remains silent even as his whole being is consumed and he dies inwardly. When the door of the doctor's room "shut with a thud" and the phrase "deep depression" echoed in his ears, the closing door signified not simply his departure from the clinic but his confinement, perhaps for life, in a mental dungeon.

The second story begins with the doctor's phrase, "deep depression." The protagonist immediately rejects the diagnosis: he has always regarded himself as brave, combative, and composed in adversity. Thus the title is not merely the name of an illness; it marks a collision between "self-image" and "inner experience." The man's basic difficulty is not an inability to feel anything. On the contrary, he feels too much, but is afraid to acknowledge the name of what he is experiencing.

This is not a clinical record of mental illness, and evaluating it exclusively against diagnostic criteria would therefore be limiting. What matters from a literary point of view is that the tension between body and mind becomes narrative form. The pounding heart, sweat, difficulty breathing, checking the pulse, the desire to have one's blood pressure measured, and repeatedly clutching the chest: the protagonist's unspoken psychological insecurity speaks through the language of the body. A literary parallel can be drawn here with the problem raised by Elaine Scarry concerning the difficulty of expressing pain: what the mouth cannot say, the body signals.

4.2 The Formal Imitation of Recurring Thought

The story's structure is organised less around a linear sequence of events than around "rumination," the repeated return of thoughts. The protagonist resolves that he will think about it no longer, yet even a slight reminder causes the whole memory to begin turning again like a "film reel." The reader is drawn into the same cycle: palpitations, attempts at self-reassurance, memories of a lie, suspicion, fear, spiritual reasoning, and then bodily symptoms once more. This repetition can sometimes make the narrative seem slow, but the slowness is also a formal equivalent of its subject: when the mind is trapped, the story itself cannot move forward.

The storyteller weaves a network of signs: the unexpected return home, the encounter between his wife and an old acquaintance, an untouched cup of tea, the smell of Tulsi tobacco, closed windows and curtains, and the recurrence of the smell at night. None of these constitutes proof; they are indications. The protagonist himself understands the difference and therefore makes no accusation. His ethical restraint confers a certain human dignity on him, yet his mind disintegrates under the burden of maintaining it. The story never proclaims his suspicion to be the truth; therein lies its literary integrity.

4.3 The Ethics of Silence: Neither Accusing Nor Telling the Truth

When the doctor insists that he must tell "everything" if he is to be treated, the protagonist's dilemma becomes deeper. He fears not only personal humiliation but also the disintegration of his family, a potentially baseless accusation, and the destruction of another person's life. His silence is therefore not merely cowardice; it combines a sense of justice with fear. The tragedy is that ethical caution becomes a form of self-destructive secrecy. One of the collection's central motifs reappears here: the desire not to commit an injustice can sometimes deprive a person of the ability to seek help.

Wayne C. Booth's ethical criticism asks what kind of person a story invites its reader to become. "Deep Depression" does not offer an instant verdict on the question "Whose fault is it?" Instead, it makes the reader confront a difficult balance among suspicion, evidence, dignity, family, medical treatment, and self-preservation. The story is thus ethically valuable because it provides not a solution, but an experience of the complexity of judgement.

4.4 Guruji's Philosophical Discourse: A Spiritual Counterpoint to Psychological Fiction

Guruji's reflections on life as a journey of experience, on the refinement of the soul, and on the mind as the true guru give the story a local philosophical foundation. The protagonist searches for meaning in both the vocabulary of modern medicine and traditional spiritual explanations. Through this duality, the story captures the plurality of contemporary Mithila's mental world: doctors, blood pressure, medicine, and "depression" on one side; Guruji, the soul, the journey beyond, and the protection of ancestors on the other.

A formal limitation, however, also emerges here. Some of the philosophical passages take the narrative on lengthy detours away from the immediacy of the protagonist's distress. Had these sections been somewhat shorter, the story's psychological pressure might have remained more consistently intense. Nevertheless, they are not wholly extraneous, for the protagonist himself is seeking an available cultural language with which to confront uncertainty.

The second story, "Deep Depression," enters a wholly different field of subject and technique. It is a profound psychological narrative that reveals the inner life of a man who refuses to acknowledge his illness even after a doctor has diagnosed him with "depression." The mode of narration advances as a continuous interior monologue, in which his reasoning, self-deception, and unease are progressively disclosed.

The story's central conflict lies in the protagonist's suspicion of his wife—possibly of infidelity—which he can neither communicate to the doctor nor openly acknowledge to himself. The smell of Tulsi tobacco, the visit of an unfamiliar man, and his wife's unusual behaviour continue to trouble him. Yet the storyteller never makes clear whether the suspicion is true or merely a product of the protagonist's imagination. This uncertainty is itself a sign of the story's psychological realism. At its centre lies the mentality of social anxiety encapsulated in "What will people say?"—a fear that prevents the protagonist from speaking truthfully to his life partner, his doctor, and ultimately even to himself:

"He told no one. What would anyone do, even if he told them? And what could he possibly say? He had accepted his fate."

The ending is extremely brief but devastating. The doctor's final words, "Deep depression!", echo with the sound of the door closing. They name the affliction but cast no light upon what the story presents as its underlying cause: social shame and fear, and a culture in which communication has broken down. In this sense the story offers a sharp criticism of the emotional inarticulacy embedded in masculine identity, where social expectations of "endurance" and "courage" become the greatest obstacle to acknowledging genuine suffering.

4. "Chaukparak Maugi": Urbanisation, Collective Silence, and Women's Identity

"Chaukparak Maugi" ("The Woman at the Crossroads") is a harrowing record of the dark reality of contemporary development, the erosion of language and culture, and society's extreme insensitivity towards a helpless, psychologically distressed woman. It exposes the cruel alliance between neo-capitalist development and patriarchy.

The story begins with metropolitan expansion and the creation of "Mega Chowk." Through this setting, the author reveals the cultural and social consequences of rapid urbanisation. Fields and low-lying agricultural tracts that until recently flourished with rice and wheat now bear concrete palaces, bungalows, and shopping complexes. Former cultivators have sold their land and become wealthy overnight. Their children, a new generation wearing earrings, squandering their time in ostentation, and bullying people at tea stalls, have appointed themselves guardians of social security. In reality, they exemplify nepotism and hooliganism.

The author also directs a sharp satire at the decline of language and culture. People dye their hair to look foreign, acquiring what villagers call a "bhat-ranga" appearance. By artificially inserting English and Latin terms into their speech, they betray an inferiority complex regarding their mother tongue. "Mega Chowk" is thus not merely a geographical location but a symbol of a consumerist society in which sensitivity, morality, and humanity have died. Recalling the past, the narrator speaks of the Bata company's "Ambassador Sahujī," who used to give people from Mithila shelter in his lodging when they were away from home. That age of generosity has now passed.

Amid this glitter and material progress, an unknown woman sits from morning until night upon the compound wall of an empty plot. She is exceptionally beautiful, but her clothes are dirty, her hair is matted, and a thick streak of vermilion marks the parting of her hair. This woman is the silent centre of the story. She speaks to no one. The narrator, an employee of the Forest Department, is disturbed by the sight of her. Human sympathy awakens in him and he wants to help her, but his friend Rajeshji stops him, saying that he is "getting carried away by emotion." "And what will people say if she turns out to be a woman of bad character?" This social fear forces the narrator to withdraw.

Police Sub-Inspector Ram Dayal Yadav and the local strongman, Rabi, likewise dismiss her as merely mentally disturbed or "mad," thereby evading their responsibilities. This neutrality and neglect—the bystander effect—constitute the prelude to a serious crime.

The ending is profoundly tragic and deeply unsettling. One day, some months later, a large crowd gathers at the crossroads. The woman is drenched in sweat, tearing at her clothes and hair, and crying out in anguish. The story clearly suggests that she has suffered a collective sexual assault. Her outcry is one of the most powerful expressions of feminist discourse in Maithili literature, striking directly at the arrogance of masculinity:

"Yes, I am the woman of the crossroads!... That is all I am fit for!!... All of you, have your pleasure!... Show your strength!! Against the woman of the crossroads... who is defenceless... and has no one to protect her... use your force against her, display your manhood! Oh, God! I am now the woman of the crossroads!!"

This is not merely the delirious speech of a psychologically distressed woman. It is a resounding slap in the face of an entire supposedly civilised, newly affluent, patriarchal society—a society that makes the weak and helpless victims of its lust instead of protecting them. When a woman finds herself abandoned, distressed, or without support at a public crossroads, this so-called civilised society, rather than becoming her protector, turns her into an "object of enjoyment," the "woman of the crossroads."

The narrator is overcome by intense remorse. Unable to go to the office, he returns home and collapses upon his bed. He realises that he himself, his friend Rajesh, the police officer Yadav, and society at large are implicated in this heinous crime. The inaction into which he retreated out of the cowardly fear of "what people will say" became a fundamental cause of the tragedy.

The following table permits a comparative analysis of the social attitudes of the characters in "Chaukparak Maugi."

The third story does not begin immediately with the woman. First, it constructs the entire social geography of the crossroads. The English-sounding name "Mega Chowk," the incursion of English words into everyday language, houses, bungalows, and shopping towers rising over the green fields, sudden wealth caused by escalating land prices, the vulgar display of money by young men, markets, cosmetics shops, rock music, and electronic advertisements together compose a spectacle of development.

Georg Simmel writes of the intensity of metropolitan stimulation, money-based calculation, and the indifferent or guarded disposition developed in the interests of self-protection. The town in "Chaukparak Maugi" may not be a metropolis in the full sense, but it certainly belongs to a transitional zone of rapid urbanisation. The story captures a crucial discrepancy: material transformation proceeds swiftly, whereas the transformation of moral institutions is uneven. Bridges, roads, shops, mobile phones, police networks, and local centres of power are present, yet the enduring presence of a helpless woman never becomes a matter of public concern.

5.2 The Nameless Woman and an Identity Bestowed by the Crossroads

The title is itself an act of criticism. The woman has no name: she is "Chaukparak Maugi," the woman at the crossroads. Her identity is therefore derived not from her birth, work, wishes, past, or relationships, but from her body sitting in a public place. The everyday use of maugi lends the story its local linguistic character, but the repetition of the word in the title also exposes the bitterness of her objectification. Society regards her not as a person but as a spectacle.

The narrator examines her beauty, breasts, complexion, hair, vermilion, and clothes with a detailed gaze. On one level, such description gives poignant visibility to her plight; on another, it reproduces the problem of the male gaze. The story's achievement is that its own narrator does not become an innocent moral hero. The fear that she may be a "bad woman," anxiety about what others will say, concern about his wife's reaction, and even the possibility of attraction to the woman all operate as prejudices within him. His final guilt demands that this initial gaze be reassessed.

5.3 Bystander Inaction: "Everyone Saw; No One Acted"

The narrator repeatedly considers approaching the woman. His friend Rajesh says, "There are many like her" and "Attend to your own problems first." The police sub-inspector dismisses her as mentally ill; the local strongman Rabi, having previously asked her questions and received no answer, likewise withdraws. Responsibility is continually passed from one person to another. Bibb Latané and John Darley's concepts of the "bystander effect" and "diffusion of responsibility" are especially relevant here: the larger the number of potential helpers, the less an individual may experience the obligation to help as a personal duty.

Yet the story is not confined to being an illustration of social psychology. The author adds local determinants: "what will people say," suspicion concerning a woman's character, the risk of unnecessary legal entanglements, social surveillance of relations between men and women, routine police indifference, and the limited, patriarchal justice of local power-holders. Inaction is consequently produced not merely by the size of the crowd, but also by fear for one's reputation and by gender prejudice.

5.4 The Final Cry: The Silent Woman's Explosion into Language

The woman who scarcely speaks throughout the story finally speaks in clear, intelligible language. Shouting, she calls herself "Chaukparak Maugi" and mocks the violent exhibition of manhood. The story does not provide a full factual account of the event—precisely what happened to her, who did it, or when. All this remains untold. This gap functions not so much as an unfinished mystery as a social indictment: the question is not merely the name of the perpetrator, but the entire environment in which a vulnerable, helpless, and unprotected woman remained visible to everyone.

At the end, the narrator's admission—"I am guilty"—turns the story away from moral instruction towards self-accusation. This is an important formal decision. Had the narrative ended by blaming only the police, the local thugs, or "society," the reader could have remained an outsider. Instead, the narrator includes himself among those responsible; as a result, readers must ask themselves how often they too have merely watched, worried, and talked without taking action. Martha Nussbaum connects the literary imagination with sympathy and public justice. In this sense the story seeks to transform a reader's sympathy from a passive emotion into an active ethical question.

The collection's third and most politically and socially incisive story, "Chaukparak Maugi," begins against the background of a village undergoing urbanisation. Its traditional market junction has been renamed with a modern expression such as "Mega Chowk," and old farming families have become suddenly rich because of the rising value of their land. In portraying this changing environment, the storyteller offers subtle commentary on urbanisation's cultural costs: the Anglicisation of language, the erosion of tradition, and the dazzling display of newly acquired wealth.

At this junction, the first-person narrator sees a silent, dishevelled, yet apparently well-educated woman sitting each day. She wears vermilion in her hair, is alone and visibly distressed, and speaks to no one. The narrator feels pity for her; but just as he considers speaking to her, his friend Rajeshji warns him:

"Leave it! If some untoward matter is involved, we shall get unnecessarily entangled."

"And if she turns out to be a bad woman, what will people say?"

The refrain "what will people say," which played a central role in "Deep Depression," operates here on a much wider social plane. The narrator also asks Police Sub-Inspector Ram Dayal Yadav and the local strongman Rabi about the woman. Both institutions—the police and informal local authority —declare her "mentally ill" and wash their hands of responsibility. The storyteller thus presents a multilayered portrait of institutional indifference: family, friends, police, and the local community all find their own arguments to justify non-intervention.

At the story's climactic moment, the woman whom everyone has regarded as "mad" cries out in language that is exceptionally lucid, reasoned, and heartrending, exposing her reality:

"Yes, I am the woman of the crossroads!... Fit for nothing more!!... All of you, have your pleasure!... Show your strength!!"

"Against the woman of the crossroads... who is defenceless... and has no one to protect her..."

"Use your force against her, show your manhood!... Oh, God!... I am now the woman of the crossroads!!"

This explosive declaration makes clear, in the reading offered here, that the woman was never simply "mad": she had repeatedly been subjected to sexual exploitation, while society mistook her trauma-induced silence and unusual behaviour for madness, ignoring her actual suffering. The story concludes with a remarkably direct ethical judgement, applicable to the narrator himself and to the reader:

"I am guilty! Everyone around me is guilty!!"

This ending transforms the story from a poignant tale into a moral indictment. Readers, too, cannot wholly escape the guilt of being counted among "everyone around me."

Character	Social role and position	Attitude towards the woman
Narrator	Educated, sensitive, middle-class individual	Sympathetic but inactive through fear for his social reputation (a bystander)
Rajeshji	Narrator's friend, a realist	Detached and suspicious; sees altruism as a risk
Ram Dayal Yadav	Police sub-inspector (law and order)	Irresponsible; dismisses the woman as mad; makes only a superficial inquiry
Rabi	Local strongman at the crossroads (informal authority)	Regards the woman as unrelated to him, outside the scope of his influence
The woman at the crossroads	Helpless, psychologically distressed, and without support	Victim of society's lust and cruelty; victim of patriarchal inhumanity

5. Common Threads in the Three Stories: The Body, Silence, the Gaze, and Responsibility

In all three stories, the body is a primary site of narrative meaning. In "Golba," the body is first kissed, caressed, adorned, and fed; ultimately, that very body becomes something to be slaughtered, skinned, and cooked. In "Deep Depression," the mind's unspoken suffering is inscribed upon the body through the chest, pulse, perspiration, breathing, blood pressure, and numbness. In "Chaukparak Maugi," the woman's body becomes the centre of the social gaze, descriptions of beauty, vulnerability, and potential violence.

This sequence may be called a trilogy of "control over the body." Golba's body belongs, in the family's eyes, to the family; the depressed character wishes to exercise control over his own body, but the fears of the mind take possession of it; and the social gaze and masculine power assert an aggressive right over the woman's body at the crossroads. The collection thus arrives at a universal question: to whom does a living body belong? Love, family, tradition, marriage, society, the state, the police, and the market all lay claim to the body. Where, then, does the autonomy of the person—or the living creature—reside?

7. Silence, Language, and Truth

Another significant dimension of the collection is the conflict between language and silence. "Golba" cannot speak a human language, and so his dissent is continually translated according to human convenience. The protagonist of "Deep Depression," although possessed of language, does not tell the truth: words are available, but courage and evidence are lacking. The woman at the crossroads is excluded from social dialogue; her final scream establishes that the problem was not an inability to speak, but society's unwillingness to hear her voice.

Seen in this light, the three stories examine the "ethics of narration." Which suffering is to be told, and by whom? Whose words are considered credible? When the sufferer does not speak, does the witness's responsibility end—or become greater? Again and again the storyteller offers readers incomplete clues without granting them the convenience of conclusive proof. This may be understood as a modern narrative form of the theory of dhvani, or suggestion: the principal meaning often resides precisely where the story does not speak explicitly.

(a) The Exploitation of the Defenceless

The central figures of the three stories—Golba (the goat), the man suffering from depression, and the woman at the crossroads—are, in different ways, either "voiceless" or "unheard." Golba does not possess human language; the depressed man refuses to speak his truth because of social shame; and the woman's truthful speech is dismissed as "madness" and ignored. In all three situations, although the sufferer has a private "voice," society either fails to hear it or hears it and deliberately turns away.

(b) "What Will People Say?": The Logic of Social Silence

In both "Deep Depression" and "Chaukparak Maugi," fear of "what people will say" repeatedly prevents characters from acting rightly. This social-psychological motif constitutes a conscious critical observation by the storyteller: a culture of fear-driven propriety in which protecting "honour" and "reputation" takes precedence over genuine compassion and justice.

(c) The Skilful Use of Dramatic Irony

The storyteller employs irony differently in each of the three stories. In "Golba," the difference between what the reader knows and what the character knows intensifies the tragedy. In "Deep Depression," readers gradually realise that the character's very insistence upon being "normal" is itself symptomatic of his illness. In "Chaukparak Maugi," the woman regarded as "mad" ultimately proves to be the most clear-sighted and outspoken person of all. These three distinct uses of irony demonstrate the storyteller's profound command of narrative technique.

The deepest unity of the collection lies not in its subject matter but in its ethical structure: a living creature or human being suffers; many signs are present; witnesses are there; yet language, fear, tradition, suspicion, or social indifference prevents help. This structure makes 'Golba' not merely a short-story collection but a 'trilogy of responsibility'.

6. Narrative Technique, Imagery, and Linguistic Style

Vrishesh Chandra Lal's literary technique displays mature seriousness and a multidimensional perspective. He is accomplished in selecting narrative techniques appropriate to his subject matter, a skill that gives his works a distinctive place in contemporary literature.

In "Golba," the author adopts an anthropomorphic perspective: the narrative unfolds through an animal's sensory experience and, at the end, merges into a vision of disembodied existence. This method presents reality from a different, penetrating angle, in which human cruelty is perceived through the eyes of an innocent animal.

"Deep Depression" makes excellent use of stream of consciousness and interior monologue. No major external event takes place within the story, yet the suspicions and tensions of the protagonist's subconscious mind revolve like a reel of film, allowing readers to experience mental suffocation almost directly.

In "Chaukparak Maugi," a documentary mode of social realism is combined with a first-person confessional narrative that profoundly unsettles the reader. Like a camera, the narrator records the transformation of the crossroads, the attitudes of its people, and the ultimate tragedy.

In matters of language and imagery, Vrishesh Chandra Lal's writing is enriched by the flavour, proverbs, and idioms of idiomatic Maithili. His language carries the earthy fragrance of Mithila's soil, together with biting satire capable of expressing modern anguish. Local Maithili expressions such as "kahan don" (the heel), "chabhaki-chabhaki ka," "oriaon," "koriaïni," "bhataranga," "chokatal munh-kan," "gheona pasarae," and "bhathi jakan" lend the stories exceptional vitality and authenticity.

Imagery is the very lifeblood of these stories. In "Golba," the blood-red sword, the convulsing torso, and the soul soaring into space create a striking contrast between cruelty and detachment. In "Deep Depression," the shuttered room with its closed window and curtains, and the "smell of Tulsi-brand chewing tobacco," form an intense image of psychological triggers that drive the protagonist towards mental disarray. In "Chaukparak Maugi," the concrete mansions stand beside a woman in soiled clothes, with a thick streak of vermilion, sitting upon a compound wall: a forceful image of material development set against human decline, embodying society's contradictions.

Genette's concept of focalisation is especially useful in understanding the collection's craft. In "Golba," internal focalisation becomes an unusual vehicle for animal experience. In "Deep Depression," third-person narration approaches free indirect style: the boundary between the narrator's voice and the character's thoughts repeatedly becomes blurred. In "Chaukparak Maugi," the first-person narrator is simultaneously witness, interpreter, and moral defendant.

The handling of time also differs. “Golba” follows a comparatively linear movement from birth to slaughter. “Deep Depression” inhabits a circular temporality rooted in memory: a small stimulus in the present reactivates suspicions from the past. “Chaukparak Maugi” establishes both the woman’s continued presence and society’s inaction through repeated daily routines—seeing her on the way to the office and again on the return journey—until the final day breaks that routine.

Rita Felski emphasises four uses of literature: recognition, enchantment, knowledge, and shock. “Golba” offers recognition through affection for the animal and shock at the end; “Deep Depression” provides knowledge and recognition of the instability of the mind; and “Chaukparak Maugi” combines an understanding of social inaction with the shock of self-recognition. The collection’s effect, from this perspective, is not simply that “the stories were enjoyable”: it is self-examination.

10. Language and Style

10.1 Colloquial Maithili and Local Sensibility

The collection’s language is essentially grounded in spoken Maithili. In “Golba,” domestic words—Barki Mai, Soni-Moni, Babbu, grass and fodder, dubi grass, bedding, tassels, the pond, and the household shrine—give the story a cultural body. In “Deep Depression,” the doctor’s conversations, the protagonist’s internal dialogue, and domestic suspicions together produce a mixed psychological register. In “Chaukparak Maugi,” vocabulary associated with the crossroads, market, police, local strongmen, mobile phones, shopping, and contemporary consumer culture produces a change of register.

The advantage of this plurality of registers is that the three stories are not forced into the same linguistic mould. The sensibility of village households, the medical vocabulary of the educated middle class, and the hybrid speech of the newly urbanised marketplace create distinct social worlds. In “Chaukparak Maugi” in particular, the narrator himself satirises the influence of English; when the story subsequently presents a world of “shopping,” “cosmetics,” “stylish,” “rock,” “electronic,” and similar words, linguistic mixture becomes a subject in its own right.

10.2 Satire, Exclamations, and Self-Expression

The author makes extensive use of exclamation marks, questions, self-directed speech, local idioms, and narratorial comments. These give the language vitality and a speaking presence; at certain points, however, excessive exclamation risks pressing an emotion too insistently upon the reader. Particularly when the event is already sufficiently intense, stylistic restraint could heighten its impact.

Satire is especially successful in the third story. The name “Mega Chowk,” the attraction of foreignness, sudden wealth derived from land, nouveau-riche manners, local bullying, and the glitter of the “modern” market—all these invite commentary from the narrator that is not merely humorous but critical of the uneven moral consequences of development.

Vrishesh Chandra Lal's prose style achieves a remarkable balance between descriptive expansiveness and psychological subtlety. In "Golba," the fine details of rural family life—food, games, festivals, and celebrations—construct a rich cultural background, making the final tragedy all the more powerful. In "Deep Depression," interior monologue takes readers directly into the character's mental turmoil; the frequent interrogative sentences ("Then how could he possibly have depression?"; "Is this diagnosis not correct?") bring his self-doubt and self-deception to life. In "Chaukparak Maugi," a dialogue-driven manner—conversations with Rajeshji, the police, and the local strongman—gives the narrative the character of a social investigation that moves gradually towards the revelation of truth.

At the linguistic level, all three stories naturally employ idioms and proverbs from idiomatic Maithili, establishing them upon an authentic cultural foundation. The dialogue is realistic and appropriate to the individual characters. The woman's final explosive speech in "Chaukparak Maugi" is particularly charged with dramatic intensity and deeply stirs the reader.

7. In the Light of Indian Poetics and Modern Narrative Theory

The stories reveal a remarkable development of the various rasas recognised in Indian poetics. In Golba's childhood, the maternal tenderness of Barki Mai and the affectionate attention of Soni and Moni give expression to vatsalya rasa, the sentiment of parental love. Golba's sacrifice and the final cry of the woman in "Chaukparak Maugi" bring karuna (pathos) and bhayanaka (terror) to their fullest intensity. The severing of the tongue after decapitation, the convulsions of the headless body, and the suggestion of bestial sexual violence against the woman at the crossroads evoke bibhatsa (revulsion) and raudra (fury). Finally, Golba's soul ascending into space in a state of detachment signifies shanta rasa, the sentiment of tranquillity, and philosophical transcendence.

A mechanical application of Bharata Muni's theory of rasa to modern fiction would be inappropriate, yet a rasa-based perspective remains useful in analysing emotional structure. Compassion is central to all three stories. The killing of a helpless creature in "Golba," the mind disintegrating under self-doubt in "Deep Depression," and public neglect and violence in "Chaukparak Maugi" elicit grief, pity, and moral unease in readers. But this is not mere sentimentality. In each story, compassion is mingled with feelings of terror, disgust, rage, or tranquillity.

At the end of "Golba," the narrative moves from the terrifying and the repellent towards a tranquil or transcendent tone. In "Deep Depression," fear and compassion merge: the character is afraid not of an external enemy but of a possible truth. The woman's final cry in "Chaukparak Maugi" transforms compassion into fury; for a moment, the silent victim becomes the accuser. Because of these shifts in rasa, the collection does not become a monotonous sequence of pathetic tales.

8.2 Dhvani and Unspoken Meaning

According to Anandavardhana's theory of dhvani, significant literary meaning often emerges beyond what is directly stated. The collection contains three principal fields of suggestion. First, bringing Golba up with extraordinary affection may, in the end, also constitute preparation for his sacrifice; the story does not announce this at its beginning. Second, the author gives no decisive answer to whether the suspicion in "Deep Depression" is true. The story therefore remains centred not upon jealousy or adultery as established facts but upon the experience of suspicion. Third, the complete history of the woman at the crossroads is absent. Her silence and final eruption into language demand of the reader the ethical labour of filling in the gaps.

8.3 The Question of Aucitya, or Appropriateness

If we take aucitya in the broad sense of appropriateness associated here with Mammata, the proportion of every episode to its subject, character, and emotional effect becomes important. The tenderness lavished upon Golba at the beginning gives the violence at the end its necessary depth; the detailed treatment is therefore appropriate. The lengthy description of the social transformation of the crossroads in "Chaukparak Maugi" likewise provides the groundwork for understanding the indifferent society of the ending, although editorial tightening might have condensed certain passages. In "Deep Depression," Guruji's philosophical discourse forms part of the story's atmosphere but sometimes overwhelms its psychological immediacy.

Genette's concept of focalisation is especially useful in understanding the collection's craft. In "Golba," internal focalisation becomes an unusual vehicle for animal experience. In "Deep Depression," third-person narration approaches free indirect style: the boundary between the narrator's voice and the character's thoughts repeatedly becomes blurred. In "Chaukparak Maugi," the first-person narrator is simultaneously witness, interpreter, and moral defendant.

The handling of time also differs. "Golba" follows a comparatively linear movement from birth to slaughter. "Deep Depression" inhabits a circular temporality rooted in memory: a small stimulus in the present reactivates suspicions from the past. "Chaukparak Maugi" establishes both the woman's continued presence and society's inaction through repeated daily routines—seeing her on the way to the office and again on the return journey—until the final day breaks that routine.

Rita Felski emphasises four uses of literature: recognition, enchantment, knowledge, and shock. "Golba" offers recognition through affection for the animal and shock at the end; "Deep Depression" provides knowledge and recognition of the instability of the mind; and "Chaukparak Maugi" combines an understanding of social inaction with the shock of self-recognition. The collection's effect, from this perspective, is not simply that "the stories were enjoyable": it is self-examination.

8. The Cover as Paratext

The book's cover prominently displays the sky and clouds, a landscape, and, in the foreground, the figure of a goat or another animal. The title "Golba" and the designation "short-story collection" are clearly printed. The cover visually places the first and title story at the centre of the collection. From a paratextual perspective, it leads the reader to expect an animal story, whereas the other two stories in the collection deal with psychological and urban-social themes. This disparity establishes the symbolic precedence of the title story on the one hand; on the other, the full thematic range of the collection cannot immediately be inferred from its cover.

9. Literary Achievements and Limitations

Credible and compassionate focalisation of animal experience: "Golba" takes readers beyond an anthropocentric perspective governed by human convenience.

The formal representation of psychological repetition: in "Deep Depression," a cycle of thoughts becomes the very form of the narrative.

The social geography of rapid urbanisation: "Chaukparak Maugi" brings land, markets, language, the police, local power, and women's safety into a single narrative field.

Moral uncertainty: the author leaves several decisive facts unexplained, compelling readers to accept the risk of judgement.

The multilayered nature of silence: animal voicelessness, human self-concealment, and a woman's social unheardness bind the three stories together.

The recurring symbolism of the body: a body nurtured and then cut apart, a body trembling with anxiety, and a woman's body subjected to public scrutiny and violence—these constitute the collection's deepest thematic unity.

The memorability of the endings: each story ultimately changes how readers interpret what came before—sacrifice, diagnosis, and the cry of pain and guilt.

13. Critical Limitations and Possibilities for Improvement

Certain limitations of the collection do not diminish its importance; rather, they indicate further possibilities for the development of its craft.

At some points, narratorial explanation begins to speak more loudly than the scenes themselves. Especially in the posthumous philosophical reflections of "Golba" and the Guruji episode of "Deep Depression," greater concision might have strengthened the suggestive power of the narrative.

The title "Deep Depression" conveys the certainty of a clinical term, whereas the experience represented in the story combines anxiety, fear, suspicion, repetitive thoughts, and physical panic. Literary ambiguity is a strength, but the diagnostic rigidity of the title channels the reader's response in one particular direction.

In "Chaukparak Maugi," the opening description of the woman's physical beauty is prolonged. If the author intends to criticise the male gaze, the narrator's self-accusation at the end invites us to reread that description. Nevertheless, some readers may find that it also reproduces the very objectification it seeks to condemn.

The description of the town in the third story is exceptionally rich, although selective cutting could have given the story a tighter structure. Yet the expansiveness serves a purpose: the final event appears not as a "sudden crime" but as the consequence of an entire social environment.

The abundance of punctuation marks and exclamation marks sometimes makes emotional cues clearer but can also reduce subtlety.

The female characters have limited access to a voice of their own in all three stories. In the third story, this becomes a deliberate theme of silence; nevertheless, granting an abused woman an interior perspective could be an important expansion of the narrative world in future writing.

• Thematic courage: the three stories take up subjects rarely addressed in Maithili short fiction—the ethics of animal sacrifice, men's mental health, and society's refusal to acknowledge sexual violence. This choice of subjects is itself an act of literary courage.

• Diversity of perspective: animal consciousness ("Golba"), a man's internal conflict ("Deep Depression"), and social investigation ("Chaukparak Maugi") employ three distinct narrative angles, giving the collection formal variety.

• Moral clarity without didacticism: all three stories raise profound ethical questions in the reader's mind without delivering direct sermons. The narrative structures and their ironies perform that work in themselves—a mark of mature storytelling.

Limitations

• In "Deep Depression," the allegation of the wife's supposed infidelity is neither directly confirmed nor disproved. Although this appears to be a deliberate ambiguity—the story's principal concern is the man's psychological condition rather than the wife's guilt or innocence—it nonetheless leaves the wife herself as a voiceless object of suspicion. This may seem somewhat contradictory to the story's own central concern with the critique of voicelessness.

• The opening portion of "Golba" is considerably more expansive than the intensely described scenes of sacrifice and death at its end. Some readers may therefore find the pacing uneven, although that long opening may itself be a deliberate strategy for deepening the emotional investment that makes the tragedy effective.

10. Significance in the Context of Contemporary Maithili Fiction

The collection's importance may be argued on the basis not of its representation of history as a whole but of its distinctive narrative daring. It introduces into fiction three subjects—domestic animals, mental health, and women's safety in public spaces—whose ethical significance is often concealed by conventional social language. Rather than offer readers an immediate reformist lecture, it first induces affection, anxiety, observation, and uncertainty, and only then leaves them with guilt or an unresolved question.

One of the great strengths of Maithili fiction has always been its fine-grained attention to local life. In this collection, locality is not simply a setting; it is a medium of thought. Barki Mai's sari, the chill of the pond, the household shrine, the doctor's clinic, the smell of Tulsi-brand chewing tobacco, the newly built crossroads, roasted maize, the local strongman, and the police outpost give the narratives palpable life. Modern questions arise not from borrowed terminology but from local experience.

11. Conclusion

Vrishesh Chandra Lal's literary thought embodies a democratic consciousness capable of taking into itself the suffering of the person—or animal—at the very margins of society. While his political life has been directly dedicated to democratic reform in structures of power and governance, his literary writing advocates social and psychological democracy. Whereas the Nepali novels "Sumnima" and "Modiain," translated into Maithili by him, explore human nature through historical and mythological narratives, his original short-story collection "Golba" stands firmly upon the ground of contemporary reality.

Viewed as a whole, Vrishesh Chandra Lal's "Golba" is a highly significant, intellectually forceful, and enduring achievement of modern Maithili prose. The book is not merely an instrument of entertainment; it is a psychological and sociological document that shakes the reader's sensibilities and compels introspection.

Where "Golba" launches a severe attack upon human selfishness, counterfeit affection, and inhuman violence committed in the name of religion, "Deep Depression" gives voice to the depression, marital emptiness, and suffocating male psychology that spread through the dark recesses of modern life. "Chaukparak Maugi" unmasks the inhuman face of our supposedly civilised, urbanised, and modern society, in which human sensitivity has been crushed beneath piles of concrete and the identity and dignity of a helpless woman are falling prey to masculine arrogance.

His stories offer neither idealistic solutions nor sermons. Instead, they perform a kind of realistic surgery, laying society's wounds bare before readers and compelling them to think for themselves. This manner of writing places him alongside the great practitioners of psychological realism in world literature. For the rare synthesis of linguistic lucidity, subtle psychological analysis, existential philosophy, and social realism found in these stories, Vrishesh Chandra Lal's book will always be remembered with high regard in the history of Maithili literature. "Golba" possesses every qualification to establish itself as an indispensable and important reference work for students of the fragmentation of contemporary society, feminist discourse, the tragedy of neoliberal urbanisation, and modern psychology.

After reading the three stories of "Golba," the most lasting impression is that suffering often takes place before everyone's eyes, yet understanding its significance and becoming answerable to it are difficult matters. Golba was loved, but he had no control over his own life. The protagonist of "Deep Depression" has a family and a doctor at hand, yet the decisive truth remains unspoken. The woman at the crossroads is visible to everyone every day, yet her circumstances repeatedly fall through the gap between private and social responsibility.

The collection unfolds this moral paradox on three levels: love does not always prevent violence; knowledge, in the absence of evidence, can become paralysis; and compassion, without action, can become self-satisfaction. Thus, "Golba" is not merely a set of three sorrowful stories but a test of compassion itself. Readers are asked: when we love someone, do we recognise that person's freedom, or merely turn them into the object of our affection? When we are burdened by suspicion or pain, how much moral courage do we possess to tell the truth? And when we witness another person's suffering, how long do we remain silent out of fear of "what people will say"?

Artistically, the collection's finest moments are those in which the author declines to provide an answer: the question of Golba's ultimate existence, the uncertain truth behind the suspicions in "Deep Depression," and the untold life history of the woman at the crossroads. In these gaps, the reader's judgement becomes active. With less explanation and more silence at certain points, the collection might have acquired still greater sharpness; even in its present form, however, it offers a remarkable conjunction of sensibility, psychology, and social ethics.

"Golba" is a noteworthy contribution to Maithili fiction, returning, from three distinct narrative angles, to the same fundamental ethical question: what duty does society owe to a helpless, voiceless creature or person, and how culpable is the "silent spectator" who fails to fulfil that duty? From the treacherous sacrifice of the trusting goat Golba, through the depression-stricken man's silence born of social shame, to the unheard cry of the woman at the crossroads, all three stories disclose a common truth: the exploitation of the defenceless becomes possible when those nearby choose to remain silent.

The direct and slogan-like voice of social justice found in Vrishesh Chandra Lal's poetry—for example, in "Dholak" and "Andolan"—assumes a subtler, more structural form in "Golba." Here moral outrage is expressed not through explicit proclamation but through narrative technique and irony. In this respect, "Golba" reveals a more mature and more multidimensional aspect of the storyteller's literary personality, in which political and social commitment and the subtleties of narrative art complement one another effectively.

12. Principal Critical Observations by Story

Story	Principal experience	Main narrative technique	Ethical question
Golba	Affection, fear, sacrifice, death	Animal-centred internal perspective; final shock	If love fails to recognise autonomy, can it prevent violence?
Deep Depression	Suspicion, panic, silence, self-surveillance	Free indirect narration; repetitive thoughts; memory triggered by clues	When proof of the truth is absent, how can one balance the claims of the mind, the family, and justice?
Chaukparak Maugi	Urbanisation, indifference, women's vulnerability, guilt	First person; social geography; daily repetition; final cry	When will a witness to suffering accept the responsibility to become a helper?

13. Bibliography

Lal, Vrishesh Chandra. Golba: A Collection of Short Stories.

Bharata Muni. Natyashastra. Various standard editions.

Anandavardhana. Dhvanyaloka. Various standard editions.

Mammata. Kavyaprakasha. Various standard editions.

Genette, Gérard. Narrative Discourse: An Essay in Method. Cornell University Press, 1980.

Derrida, Jacques. The Animal That Therefore I Am. Fordham University Press, 2008.

Booth, Wayne C. The Company We Keep: An Ethics of Fiction. University of California Press, 1988.

Nussbaum, Martha C. Poetic Justice: The Literary Imagination and Public Life. Beacon Press, 1995/1997 editions.

Felski, Rita. Uses of Literature. Blackwell, 2008.

Scarry, Elaine. The Body in Pain: The Making and Unmaking of the World. Oxford University Press, 1985.

Latané, Bibb, and John M. Darley. The Unresponsive Bystander: Why Doesn't He Help? Appleton-Century-Crofts, 1970.

Williams, Raymond. The Country and the City. Chatto & Windus, 1973.

4. Malho

Feminist Criticism • Dalit and Subaltern Perspectives • Political and Ethical Reading • Memory Studies • Narratological Analysis

1. Introduction: Central Argument and Literary Significance

To regard Malho simply as a collection of nine stories about social reality would be to miss a substantial part of its literary meaning. The collection constructs an interconnected world of rural memory, women's silent suffering, caste humiliation, democratic struggle, political defection, state violence, war, love, motherhood, education, history and public morality. In this world, power is present in almost every form: the power of a husband's word within the household, caste power, police power, party power, state power, the power of tradition and the power of the male gaze. Confronting all these forms, the author repeatedly poses the same question: where does human dignity reside, and who will defend it?

The collection is distinguished by the fact that its author does not merely articulate theoretical slogans. His stories reveal the effects of social structures through his characters' bodies, waiting, shame, hunger, humiliation, tears, memories and small domestic acts. Depurwali Kaki's lifelong waiting, Malho's water lily, the humiliation suffered at school by the child of Sikandar Dom, Phuliya's red wedding sari and Indrakumari's one-tusked elephant and nine-lakh necklace cease to be ordinary objects. They become symbols of human identity and historical violence.

Continuing the tradition of accomplished storytellers such as Phanishwarnath Renu, Rajkamal Chaudhary, Lily Ray and Gangesh Gunjan, Lal presents the soil, struggles and political consciousness of Mithila–Madhesh in a realist manner. At a time when romanticism and abstraction had gained influence in modern literature, Malho exposes society's uncomfortable truths on the hard ground of realism.

A further critical perspective observes that, amid the influence of English and other Western languages, Lal's idiomatic, lucid Maithili gives the language renewed energy. At the same time, the collection's actual linguistic texture also accommodates the multilingual life of a border region.

Vrishesh Chandra Lal's short-story collection Malho represents that stream of Maithili fiction which expresses the sociopolitical reality of Nepal's Madhesh–Terai region through the Maithili language. In subject matter, these nine stories have an exceptionally broad range. On one side are the intimate family relationships of village courtyards and verandas and the tender memory of childhood love; on the other are the Panchayat system, the movement for democracy, party-switching, caste discrimination, Naxalite/People's War violence and even historical narratives of the Sen dynasty. In this respect, the collection becomes not merely a book of short stories but also a literary document of the Madhesh in Nepal during the social and political transitions of the past fifty or sixty years—from Rana and Panchayat rule to democracy, from democracy to the people's movement, and from that movement to armed conflict.

The choice of the title story, "Malho," is itself meaningful. Malho is the name of an ordinary rural girl from a marginalised social group. She becomes a symbol of the unforced love of childhood and remains permanently inscribed in the storyteller's memory. To make her name the title signals the sensibility that runs throughout the collection: placing at its centre the inner worlds of ordinary, neglected and marginalised men and women.

Malho is a collection of short stories published by Sudama Prakashan, Janakpurdham.

> The central argument of the collection can be stated in one sentence: when a person crushes another human being's dignity in the name of tradition, caste, party, state or masculine pride, the true assessment of history begins with the experience of the person who has suffered.

2. The Writer's Ideological Grounding, Literary Journey and Narrative Milieu

Every writer's work inevitably reflects something of the struggles of their personal life and the foundations of their thinking. Vrishesh Chandra Lal was born on 29 March 1955. His father was the late Udit Narayan Lal and his mother was Mrs Bhuvaneshwari Devi. His childhood naming-ceremony name was Vishweshwar. His family and ideological background has been closely associated with Nepal's democratic movement, B. P. Koirala's (Vishweshwar Prasad Koirala's) democratic socialism, the anti-Panchayat people's movement in Nepal and the movement for self-respect in Madhesh. He is a senior politician, a former National Assembly member and an active participant in Nepal's democratic struggle, known for the clarity of his political convictions. In national politics, he has been associated with the Terai-Madhesh Loktantrik Party (TMLP) and the Janata Samajbadi Party (JSP).

His literary contribution is not confined to fiction. His Maithili adaptations of B. P. Koirala's Modiain and Sumnima, his original poetry collection Andolan, his collection of children's poems Dholak, and his short-story collections Malho and Golba together testify to his multifaceted literary personality.

Title of Work	Genre	Language	Publication / Relevant Details
Malho	Short-story collection	Maithili	Sudama Prakashan, Janakpurdham
Andolan	Poetry collection	Maithili	Videha e-Journal / independent publication
Dholak	Collection of	Maithili	Videha e-

Title of Work	Genre	Language	Publication / Relevant Details
	children's poems		Journal archive
Modiain	Translated novel	Maithili	Adaptation of B. P. Koirala's work
Sumnima	Translated novel	Maithili	Adaptation of B. P. Koirala's work
Towards Federal Governance (Sanghiya Shasantir)	Political / ideological work	Nepali	Based on Nepal's political transformation

Vrishesh Chandra Lal has also served as mayor of Janakpur and has been a significant figure in Madhesh-based political leadership. This background lends experiential credibility to the political worlds of "Balidani," "Patharsanak Lok ...!" and "Dhahlel Dalbadalu!" Yet biography may provide a key to a story's subject without making the story a mere copy of the author's life.

These varied experiences—from poetry to fiction, children's literature to translation, and politics to literature—also become visible in the collection's artistic procedures. The political stories draw upon speeches, recollection and interior dialogue; "Malho" and "Depurwali Kaki," by contrast, disclose their meanings through subtle indications, bodily expression, domestic memory and silence.

The author's experience centred on Janakpur and Madhesh lends particular importance to the collection's sense of place. Nepal's people's movement of 2046 B.S., the Panchayat system, party opportunism after the return of democracy, rural Madheshi society, caste structure, comparisons with India across the border, state repression and the shadow of the Maoist "People's War" are not merely historical settings. They decisively shape the characters' moral choices.

Lal keeps the realities he has directly experienced—imprisonment and torture, underground political movements, the hypocrisy of the hunger for power and the struggles of marginalised lives in the rural Terai–Madhesh—at a distance from fanciful romanticism. His fictional geography extends from the lanes of Janakpurdham and Mithila's open fields to the dark prison cells of Sindhuli and Jaleshwar, the corridors of power in Kathmandu and international conferences.

3. Structure of the Collection and Its Thematic Progression

The sequence is meaningful in itself. The opening story, "Depurwali Kaki," enters through personal memory and domestic injustice. The political stories in the middle carry individual experience onto the larger terrain of state, party and democracy. “Sikandar Dom” and “And She Was Killed!” bring voices from society's margins to the centre. The final story reconstructs an episode of history within contemporary feminist consciousness. Thus the collection expands from the veranda of a home to the state, war and history, yet everywhere the human being remains its fundamental unit.

The collection contains nine stories: “Depurabali Kaki,” “Balidani Balidani,” “Patharsanak Lok,” “Malho,” “Dhahlel Dalbadalu,” “Kari Kobham,” “Sikandar Dom,” “And She Was Killed!” and “The One-Tusked Elephant and the Nine-Lakh Necklace.” A close examination of this order suggests that the author has deliberately constructed a circular arrangement. At both the beginning and the end, a woman's sacrifice and silent struggle are central (Depurabali Kaki and Indrakumari); in the intervening portion lies a trio of political and social stories; and near the middle the title story “Malho” stands as a tender personal memory. This structural balance makes the book appear not merely an assemblage of scattered tales but a carefully conceived thematic journey.

No.	Story	Pages	Principal Subject
1	Depurwali Kaki	2–8	Memory, patriarchy, marital injustice, waiting
2	Balidani	9–12	Democracy, martyrdom, political memory
3	Patharsanak Lok ...!	13–16	Police violence, politics, intergenerational fear
4	Malho	17–24	Love, class distance, women’s dignity, motherhood
5	Dhahlel Dalbadalu!	25–31	Party-switching, patronage, democracy
6	Kari Kobham	32–34	Bodily gaze, age, marriage, motherhood
7	Sikandar Dom	35–37	Caste, untouchability, education
8	And She Was Killed!	38–42	War, love, state violence, media
9	The One-	43–45	History, dowry,

No.	Story	Pages	Principal Subject
	Tusked Elephant and the Nine-Lakh Necklace		women's identity, public patrimony

4. Close Readings of the Individual Stories

4.1 "Depurwali Kaki": The Long Shadow of Patriarchy across the Screen of Memory

The first story opens with an emphatically modern scene: television, the film Teesri Kasam, Waheeda Rehman's image, a computer and photographic manipulation. This world of modern technology suddenly carries the narrator to the face of a woman from his village past. Through this formal device the author demonstrates that memory is not linear: an image, a smell, a voice or the resemblance of a face can break through the screen of the present and bring the past vividly to life.

Depurwali Kaki is the woman who offered the narrator affection, care and protection during his childhood. Her beauty is mentioned, but the story gradually moves away from outward beauty and enters the suffering of her unspoken life. As the stories of Misri Kaka, Rigawali and child marriage unfold, it becomes evident that Kaki's tragedy is not the result of some divinely ordained "sin from a previous birth." It is the product of masculine pride, a misplaced vow and the family's and society's silent acquiescence. This is a significant ethical reversal: the story first offers the folk explanation of "fate," then contests it through the voices of women in the household.

Madhu's anger performs the work of criticism within the narrative. She attacks the male disposition by which one woman is subjected to lifelong injustice on account of another, and a man's "vow" becomes the measure of his morality while a woman pays its price. "Depurwali Kaki" is therefore not simply a sorrowful story; it re-examines the moral vocabulary of patriarchy—dharma, the keeping of one's word, endurance and fidelity to one's husband.

The story's culminating irony is exceptionally powerful. Overcome by remorse, Misri Kaka vows never again to leave the household. Kaki, having at last received the moment for which she has waited, shares her almost uncontainable happiness with the entire village. Yet she dies that very night. Time grants only a few hours to a reunion awaited for a lifetime. The episode exposes the ethical futility of patriarchy's belated repentance: forgiveness may be necessary, but it cannot restore the years that have been destroyed.

An Achievement of Narrative Form

Beginning with a photograph that awakens memory, descending into an orally transmitted family narrative and childhood recollection, and then returning to an emotional response in the present, this multilayered narration raises the story above the level of an ordinary family reminiscence. Kaki's silence, the courtyard and veranda, food, fanning someone, waiting at the door—such small domestic images write a larger history of women's invisible labour and oppression.

When talk spreads of Misri Kaka's association with another woman named Rigawali, conflict breaks out in the family. Rather than correct his own mistake, he takes a vow never to speak to Depurwali Kaki or sleep in their home for the rest of his life; Ramnan's veranda becomes his permanent place of rest.

Without complaint, Kaki continues washing her husband's clothes, preparing his food and looking after him. Much later Misri Kaka sobs aloud and asks for forgiveness. Overjoyed at the reunion she has awaited so long, Kaki shares her happiness throughout the village, but dies of a heart attack that very night. Two months later Misri Kaka too dies, consumed by the fires of remorse.

The image of "a ruinous vow like Bhishma's" lays bare the pointless rigidity of male pride. Set against Waheeda Rehman's external, cinematic beauty, Depurwali Kaki's inward and tragic beauty gives the story a different gravity.

At the end of the story, the portrayal of Kaki's name and identity being forgotten after only two generations—"Which Depurabali Kaki?"—makes the cruelty of time even more acute.

4.2 "Balidani" ("Those Who Sacrificed"): Who Owns the Memory of Martyrdom?

"Balidani" is a story about politics appropriating the memory of a movement after democracy has been attained. The observance of time at public events, behaviour on the platform, the display involved in organising a programme and the presence of self-appointed heroes of the movement enable the author, from the outset, to draw a finely satirical portrait of public political culture. The people's movement of 2046 B.S. gives the story a specific historical ground, but its question is broader: who acquires the right to the memory of a revolution after it succeeds?

The central figure represents a generation that endured repression, prison, injuries and personal loss, only to find itself pushed to the margins of the political order after democracy returned. Opportunists, caste-based factions and even criminals enter the processes by which victims are assisted, political prisoners listed, recommendations secured and honours awarded. At this point, the story reveals the politics of institutional memory: whoever controls the records also controls history.

The story nevertheless refuses to end in pessimism. Its protagonist is distressed by the distortions of present-day democracy, yet his memory of Panchayat repression prompts him to resist regression. The writer does not deify democracy: he reveals corruption and the theft of memory within it, while acknowledging the ethical value of a democratic sphere that can be reformed, as compared with dictatorship. This political maturity saves the story from becoming partisan propaganda.

> The story's most original intervention is its recognition that the martyr's widow and children are also 'those who sacrificed,' because they have lost the golden years of life, affection, security and companionship. 'Balidani,' pp. 9–12

> The story's most original intervention is its recognition that the martyr's widow and children are also 'those who sacrificed,' because they have lost the golden years of life, affection, security and companionship. 'Balidani,' pp. 9–12

With this redefinition, martyrdom ceases to be the solitary heroic narrative of a man. The long-lasting suffering of his family, particularly women and children, comes to the centre of political remembrance. Garland ceremonies and slogans on a public platform last only a moment, but a widow's solitary life is an enduring sacrifice. The story reveals the invisible domestic cost of the nationalist heroic narrative.

The memorial meeting in the story is associated with the martyrdom of Durganand Jha, who was executed after a bomb attack on King Mahendra at Janakpur during the Panchayat era. The term chaite becomes a satirical designation for opportunists who abruptly turned into revolutionaries after the arrival of democracy and began collecting party positions and benefits.

On the platform, a story is being told about the martyr's reading of the Gita and the Ramayana in his final hours. But in the central character's mind a question arises: are the true "sacrificers" not, even more than the martyr himself, his young widowed wife, his aged mother and his family, who have spent an entire lifetime wasting away amid tears, deprivation and terror?

Although the story expresses disillusionment with the distortions of democracy, it does not support a return to authoritarian rule. The sentiment that "even a foolish democracy is a thousand times better than the Panchayat system" makes the freedom to resist the fundamental ethical test.

4.3 "Patharsanak Lok ...!" ("People Like Stone ...!"): Moral Courage, Idealism and Parental Fear

This is a moving account of how politics re-enters a household that wishes to distance itself from it. The father has himself endured the suffering of earlier political struggles. His wife Madhu wants to protect the family from politics. Yet their son rushes to rescue a schoolboy being beaten by the police and is himself struck with batons. The question is no longer who decided to "enter politics." It becomes this: when injustice unfolds before one's eyes, is remaining silent not itself a political act?

The father's inner conflict is the life of the story. On the one hand, he is proud of his son's courage; on the other, his own experience makes him advise the boy to stay away from politics. The author captures in this contradiction the historical exhaustion of an entire generation. Those who suffered imprisonment and beatings for their ideals have subsequently witnessed opportunism, casteism and the power of wealth under democracy. They wish to shield their children from that cycle, yet they have also passed on precisely the moral sensitivity that compels their children to intervene whenever they see injustice.

The title "Patharsanak Lok ...!" signifies not merely the hardness of the police or the state, but also poses a question about society's loss of feeling. Onlookers can stand still while a child is beaten; the system commits violence in the name of "rules"; political parties turn suffering into opportunity. In such a world, to call the young man who runs to save the victim reckless is itself an indication of a heart turned to stone.

Madhu makes a stern reckoning of the price her husband's devotion to politics has imposed on the family. Politics, she says, is either for the wealthy, "like Shumsher," or for mendicants, "like Bhattarai." Seeing her husband in her son, she calls such people "like stone"—selfless individuals whose sacrifices society often dismisses and ridicules as "foolishness."

4.4 "Malho": The Water Lily, Unequal Love, Class Distance and a Woman's Dignity

The title story, "Malho," is the collection's aesthetic centre. At its opening, the narrator returns to his village and finds his mother waiting at the durkha, near the entrance. The sight transports him to his elder sister, the old village, bicycles, unpaved roads, a radio given as dowry, fields and the world of childhood. The passage of time—from rough roads to motor vehicles—is not merely a change of scenery within the story; it measures the widening of memory and social distance. The narrator is now a man of status, surrounded by urban prestige and administrative and public recognition, while Malho has remained on the hard ground of her struggle.

The author constructs the relationship between the young Malho and the narrator not through declarations of love, but through water lilies, sidelong glances, bashful smiles and small incidents near fields and ponds. Malho steps into the water, plucks a water lily and says, "This is for you." At their last meeting before her marriage, she gives him another flower and speaks of observing the duties prescribed by society. The water lily is more than an emblem of love: it is a beauty blooming amid mud and water, difficult to reach and transitory once plucked.

Twenty or twenty-five years later, the story brings the moral debt of the past into the present in the person of Malho's son, Sundar Sahni. He has passed his School Leaving Certificate examination. The narrator advises him to continue his studies, but Malho's simple question—"And who will pay for his further education?"—instantly turns his confidence into discomfort. That night he fears that Malho might ask for something that could compromise his reputation, his social position or his public image as an administrator. Here the writer subtly uncovers the class-bound instinct of self-protection in the male mind.

Malho, however, demands neither money nor a job nor any personal claim upon him. Abandoned or turned out by her husband, she has supported and educated her son through her own labour. In the end, her request concerns only the boy's education. At this moment Malho's moral stature appears greater than the narrator's social stature. She does not ask to be compensated for their former love, nor does she beg for pity. She asks for an opportunity for the future: that her son may study.

The final scene returns to the water lily. Malho gives the narrator a flower and walks away; "This is for you" continues to reverberate in his ears. This circular structure binds the story's past and present within a single symbol. The flower signifies at once love, forgiveness, distance, memory and an impossible union. The achievement of "Malho" is that it does not turn the incompleteness of love into sentimental lamentation. It locates within that incompleteness the complexities of class, gender, marriage, social obligation and a man's consciousness of his own guilt.

A Critical Question

The narrator's gaze repeatedly returns to Malho's body and beauty. A contemporary feminist reading may question this "male gaze." The story, however, also contains the means to criticise that gaze. The more the narrator centres his prestige and desire, the more Malho establishes herself as an independent moral person through her decisions, labour, motherhood and self-restraint. It is this tension that makes the story more complex and modern.

Malho is a poor girl of the Mallah boatmen's caste. After being abandoned by her husband, she works alone to educate her son, Sundar Sahni, who passes the School Leaving Certificate examination in the second division. This detail provides the love story with the concrete ground of class and caste distance.

When they meet in the darkness of night years later, the narrator, possessed by his old sense of entitlement, tries to take her hand. Malho stops him and declares that the future of her son is the centre of her struggle. By once again presenting him with the water lily, she defeats the claim of erotic entitlement on ethical ground.

The poignant expression of this class barrier is found in the words, "I cannot become Janaki." They bring together the pathos of unanswered love, self-sacrifice and social distance.

4.5 "Dhahlel Dalbadalu!" ("The Bungling Party-Switcher!"): Satire upon Moral Compulsion Rather Than Mere Party Defection

At first glance the title signals political satire. Once Chander's story is read, however, it becomes apparent that the writer reverses the popular meaning of "party-switcher." Chander's father supported the democratic changes that followed Rana rule. Although he personally benefited by obtaining a hill landlord's cattle shed cheaply, his support for democracy did not arise solely from self-interest; it was bound up with his experience of liberation from compulsory unpaid labour and feudal fear. Chander makes this ethical inheritance his own conviction.

After 2046 B.S., the leaders of the old struggle become remote in the splendour of office. Chander decides to withdraw from active party work for seven or eight years and merely cast his vote. But his younger brother

Lalchanma gives shelter to a hungry child, and a local chaite opportunist frames him on a false charge of kidnapping. Confronted by police torture and political conspiracy, Chander goes to the capital seeking justice from the old leaders who are now ministers, only to be humiliated. The episode is a bitter portrayal of the powerful forgetting the people's memories after democracy's return.

The irony deepens. To secure his brother's release, Chander seeks help from Dr Ramprasad, an influential figure from an old Panchayat family, who makes his assistance conditional upon Chander joining his party. For the sake of his brother's life, Chander agrees. Society immediately labels him a "party-switcher." The writer asks the reader: when justice is obtainable not through institutions but through connections and partisan patronage, does the fault lie only with the person compelled to ask for help, or with the whole structure?

At a later turn, the monarchy once again suppresses democracy. His father's teachings and regret over his own compromise stir within Chander, and he leaps into a procession supporting democracy. The village calls him a "party-switcher" once again—this time for the opposite reason. The word dhahlel in the title is ironic: in the public eye Chander is inept at political calculation because, wherever power lies, he chooses the contrary, ethical direction. His final cry of "Long live democracy!" marks the victory of a public value over personal reputation.

The story's greatest strength is its institutional criticism: party organisations, police, ministers, recommendations, political patronage and village gossip form a single web. Its limitation is that, in places, the exposition of political background becomes more essayistic than the movement of the narrative. Chander's personal crisis nevertheless continues to give this discursive expansion an emotional foundation.

During the Panchayat period, Chander's cattle shed had served as a secret refuge for underground democratic fighters. This memory makes the minister's neglect of him in Kathmandu still more bitter. His compulsion to rely on the influential Dr Ramprasad for his brother's freedom appears less a personal defect of character than a consequence of the institutional failure of justice.

One critical reading places the story close to Marxist realism, because the state apparatus and patronage politics force ordinary people into compromises for which the moral blame is eventually placed upon the very person who has suffered.

4.6 "Kari Kobham": From the Gaze upon the Body to Subtle Pain and Existential Crisis

"Kari Kobham" abruptly broadens the collection's geographical horizon. An international workshop, a Black woman facilitator of African origin, training, dance, parties and multicultural conversation bring new air into a fictional world centred on rural Mithila. Initially the narrator pays particular attention to Kari's body size, complexion, hairstyle and the standards by which beauty is judged. Modern criticism would recognise here the prejudices of the bodily and the male gaze.

The story itself does not permit these prejudices to remain unchallenged. Within moments Kari's vitality, intelligence, skill as a trainer and humour displace the narrator's initial judgement of her body. He wants to emulate her style. In other words, the character ceases to be an objectified body and emerges as an effective professional personality. Even so, as soon as marriage enters the conversation, the narrator once more resorts to a cultural generalisation, assuming that marriage is a condition of "completeness."

Kari's response gives the story an uncomfortable depth. She speaks of the pain associated with her age, the biological limits of motherhood and the difficulty of finding a life partner. The narrator keeps wanting to offer a solution, but in the end is drawn into "subtle pain": for the first time he becomes not the person who supplies answers, but the person who listens. This transformation is what gives the story its significance.

A Reservation from Contemporary Criticism

Kari herself questions the meaning of marriage if motherhood is not possible; this is the voice of her personal experience. A critic cannot treat that statement as a universal truth. To tie a woman's fulfilment to marriage or motherhood is controversial from the perspective of contemporary feminism. The story is valuable because it brings these disputed assumptions into dialogue and gradually dismantles the narrator's confident answers.

Although Kari is described as weighing approximately 110 kilograms, she emerges as a figure of remarkable energy. Her pain concerning the biological limits of motherhood at around forty to forty-five years of age takes the story towards the question of existential loneliness concealed behind a modern career and outward exuberance.

The story presents this biological experience as personal suffering; it should not be regarded as a universal truth about women. Yet, by exploring the complicated tensions among the body, age, marriage, motherhood and self-reliance, it moves beyond Mithila's regional boundaries into a field of global feminist sensibility.

4.7 "Sikandar Dom": Education, Untouchability and the Severe Test of Reformism

"Sikandar Dom" is the collection's most explicit engagement with caste. Varmaji is a progressive teacher who has endured social ostracism for allowing Sikandar into his home. Sikandar is educated, and is presented almost as living proof of Varmaji's efforts. At first, the reader expects the story to become a success narrative about education and an enlightened teacher. The author quickly shatters that complacency.

Sikandar's experience demonstrates that literacy does not in itself dissolve caste structures. At school, a Dom child must sit apart, touching others is forbidden, even the manner in which exercise books are handed over differs, as does the administration of punishment. The accumulated experience of humiliation makes education not liberation but suffering. Despite his education, Sikandar himself faces discrimination in employment: the question of whether people may touch or drink water that he has touched closes the way to even such ordinary positions as teacher or peon. Thus the story poses a concrete challenge to the simplistic progressive assumption that "education will automatically bring social advancement."

Child marriage, bride-price, caste-based feasting and the refusal to eat "food from a Dom household" reveal the many layers of social oppression. Sikandar's question—where can a person of the Dom caste ever become clean and pure?—reverses the religious logic of purity and pollution. What is impure is not the body but society's way of seeing it.

At the end, Sikandar says that society will change gradually, and Varmaji's wife offers an analogy drawn from the dosage of medicine: administering the entire dose at once may turn it into poison. This is a deliberately uncomfortable ending. From one perspective, it accepts the practical pace of social change; from another, it leaves open the question of how just "gradually" can be as an answer for those who suffer violence every day. The story draws much of its force from this unresolved moral unease.

Sikandar is presented as the first young man from the Dom caste to pass the School Leaving Certificate examination, yet society will not offer him even a peon's job. The question is asked: "Who would drink water from his hands?" He ultimately spends his life working as a night watchman.

To feed the upper-caste teachers invited to his son's wedding, Sikandar has the meal prepared by a professional cook in "the potter's hut" rather than in his own home, so that his Brahmin and Rajput guests can eat. This episode becomes an exceptionally sharp demonstration of the structural depth of untouchability.

4.8 "And She Was Killed!": The Female Body, Love, State Violence and the Murder of Truth amid War

Phuliya's story is the collection's most intense and violent narrative. The shadow of the "People's War," her guerrilla lover Purne, the police, a tea stall, rural poverty, women's lack of education and pressure to marry all converge. Phuliya leaves home while awaiting the fulfilment of her love, but she is not a political combatant. She is a woman caught in a violent conflict that continually appropriates her private life.

Purne, too, is no one-dimensional revolutionary. Gradually he begins to question the limitations of violent "liberation": will killing and fear free society, or will education, dialogue and popular agreement do so? This self-doubt prevents the story from collapsing into a simple opposition between insurgents and the state. The pain of Phuliya's restricted choices, caused by her being denied education—through her parents' assumption that "what would a daughter do by studying?"—reveals a form of social violence parallel to the war.

After Purne's death, the red wedding sari becomes an exceptionally powerful symbol. A garment that had signified the possibility of marriage, home, union and a future turns, in the hands of the police constable Bhulotan, into an instrument of coercion through fear. He demands access to Phuliya's body in exchange for information that would save her. Here a representative of the state is not the protector of the law; he becomes a predator looking for an opportunity to exploit a woman's vulnerability.

Phuliya's resistance—taking up a knife and attacking Bhulotan—is the culminating moment of agency for a defenceless woman, but she is immediately met with a bullet. On the following day, newspapers convert the event into two contradictory political narratives: in one, Phuliya is a "guerrilla heroine"; in another, the constable is a "martyr." The actual story—of love, sexual coercion, fear, self-defence and personal history—vanishes within the political language of news reporting. The title "And She Was Killed!" applies to this double murder: Phuliya's body is killed, and so is her truth.

This story displays the author at his strongest as a political artist. He does not hand the reader the manifesto of any political party. Instead, he shows how the official language of war swallows individual grief. Feminist, anti-war and media-critical readings are all possible simultaneously.

Phuliya's family background includes a plot by a hill landlord of the Karki caste through which her family loses its home and falls into poverty; her father's death through alcoholism; and the entry of her lover, Purne Magar, into the Maoist movement. Purne subsequently becomes disillusioned with violent revolution and tries to escape, but is killed by the police.

Showing Phuliya the red bridal sari found on Purne's dead body, Constable Bhulotan attempts to violate her, declaring, "You will have to let me have you!" Phuliya resists with a knife; Bhulotan fires his gun, and both die. The political news reports of the following day recast this private truth into narratives serving their respective sides.

4.9 "The One-Tusked Elephant and the Nine-Lakh Necklace": A Feminist Re-reading of History

The final story opens with contemporary Mani's unease. After seeing the Sen fort of Makwanpur, the fourteen-year-old princess Indrakumari takes possession of her imagination. Within a nocturnal dream and reverie, the story assumes the form of a courtly drama. This framing device makes clear that history is not being reproduced directly; a consciousness in the present is reimagining it. It is therefore more appropriate to read the story as a literary-historical reinterpretation than as documentary history.

The one-tusked elephant and the nine-lakh necklace are more than objects demanded as dowry. Indrakumari calls them property of the state and the collective inheritance of the people. Her argument clearly marks the boundary between a private marriage and public property. May a king give away the people's inheritance for the prestige of his daughter's marriage? The story brings a modern public ethics into the heart of a feudal monarchy.

Indrakumari's statement—'A woman is not a thing; she is the seed of creation'—becomes the story's defining declaration. A teenage girl being treated as an object of dowry becomes the interpreter of state, culture and self-respect. 'The One-Tusked Elephant and the Nine-Lakh Necklace,' pp. 43–45

Indrakumari's statement—'A woman is not a thing; she is the seed of creation'—becomes the story's defining declaration. A teenage girl being treated as an object of dowry becomes the interpreter of state, culture and self-respect. 'The One-Tusked Elephant and the Nine-Lakh Necklace,' pp. 43–45

Indrakumari reads Gorkha's demand not simply as a marital disagreement but as an indication of possible cultural and political expansion. She urges her brother Digbandhan to place duty to the motherland above personal feeling. Ultimately he accepts her argument. The dream breaks; Mani's fist remains clenched, but her sister-in-law assumes the cause of her tension to be bodily pain. In this final irony, contemporary society too translates women's political and historical agitation back into the language of the body.

A Critical Caution

The traditional vocabulary of "purity," "womanhood" and "sacrifice" is forcefully present in Indrakumari's speech. A feminist perspective may question these terms, because women's identity cannot be restricted to sexual purity or sacrifice. Nevertheless, from within this inherited vocabulary, the story attempts to make the woman not an object but a political person capable of decision. Recognising this contradiction is necessary for a just criticism of the story.

The historical episode concerns the marriage of Indrakumari, the fourteen-year-old daughter of Hemkarna Sen, the Sen king of Makwanpur, to Prithvi Narayan Shah, king of Gorkha. The demand for a "one-tusked elephant" and a "nine-lakh necklace" as dowry for her second ceremonial journey to her husband's home (gauna or dwiragaman) produces a conflict among private marriage, the people's patrimony and the honour of the state.

Indrakumari's declaration—"A woman is not a thing; she is the seed of creation. She is the crown of honour and the summit of sacrifice"—becomes a woman's political voice against feudal greed for dowry and expansionist pressure. History often places the victor at its centre; by bringing the moral courage of a teenage princess from the defeated kingdom to the centre, the story constructs an alternative historical reading.

Story	Main Characters	Central Subject / Discourse	Message / Symbol
Depurabali Kaki	Kaki, Misri Kaka	Patriarchy; silent oppression of women	The "Bhishma vow" and masculine pride
Balidani	Central character, Durganand	Democratic disillusionment	Devaluation of martyrdom; chaite opportunism
Patharsanak	Madhu, son,	Political ideals	"Stone" as a

Story	Main Characters	Central Subject / Discourse	Message / Symbol
Lok	husband	versus family	symbol of selfless fighters
Malho	Malho, the householder, Sundar	Class consciousness, noble motherhood	Water lily as a symbol of innocent love
Dhahlel Dalbadalu	Chander, Lalchanma	Democratic loyalty, systemic failure	Party defection as a compulsion
Kari Kobham	Kari Kobham	Biological paradox, existentialism	The global tragedy of womanhood
Sikandar Dom	Sikandar, Varmaji	Dalit discourse, untouchability	Social hypocrisy and education
And She Was Killed!	Phuliya, Bhulotan	State terror, marginalised exploitation	Resistance to sexual violence
The One-Tusked Elephant...	Indrakumari, Mani	Historical re-reading, feminism	Dowry and the dignity of the state

5. Sociological, Philosophical and Political Insights

5.1 Women: Not Images of Endurance but Ethical Centres

Women in the collection frequently suffer, but they are not merely victims. Depurwali Kaki's silence exposes the wrongdoing of masculine pride; Madhu protests openly; despite the memory of old love, Malho gives priority to her self-respect and her son's future; Kari forces the male gaze's easy judgements to encounter subtle pain; Phuliya takes up a weapon to resist the threat of sexual exploitation; and Indrakumari creates a political language of public patrimony and women's identity. Because these female characters are so varied, the collection does not remain a uniform glorification of feminine sacrifice.

Nevertheless, conventional values continue to cast their shadow upon the representation of women in the collection: descriptions of beauty, motherhood, fidelity to one's husband, purity and sacrifice. It would be inappropriate to reach a simple verdict by labelling this duality either a fault or a virtue. Its literary importance is that the work carries within itself the ideological struggles of a society in transition. The language of older ideals of womanhood remains present, while new voices of resistance emerge from within it.

5.2 Democracy: Not a Celebration, but a Continuous Ethical Practice

"Balidani," "Patharsanak Lok ...!" and "Dhahlel Dalbadalu!" can be read together as a trilogy of democracy. The first story depicts the appropriation of the movement's memory and the memory of martyrdom; the second, a generation of former activists worn down by police violence and partisan decline; the third, the institutional failure of justice and a moral return to resistance against monarchical regression. The author criticises democracy not from an anti-democratic position but in defence of its foundational values.

The most important element in these stories is the memory of lived experience. Those who have known prison, batons, fear and autocracy do not readily accept a return to reactionary rule, however embittered they may be by the corrupt forms democracy has taken. Political conviction is not an abstract proposition borrowed from books; it is a memory of wounds inflicted upon the body. This is why the characters' ethical decisions appear credible.

5.3 Caste and the Subaltern Experience

"Sikandar Dom" is explicitly a story about caste, but subaltern experience is equally deep in "Malho" and "And She Was Killed!" Malho protects her self-respect amid economic and social distance; Phuliya is simultaneously enclosed by multiple forms of deprivation involving education, class, gender and war. The collection repeatedly turns towards those whose names are rarely entered in official history: widows, children, Dom people, abandoned women, poor people caught in false police cases and lovers living amid war.

"Sikandar Dom" particularly demonstrates that the good intentions of a liberal individual are not sufficient to remove structural casteism. Varmaji is important, but the story moves beyond the bounds of his self-satisfaction. The experience of the subaltern person becomes the primary source of knowledge: the student Sikandar is able to speak a harsher social truth than his reformist teacher.

5.4 Memory: From Personal Narrative to Social History

Memory constitutes the foundation of the narrative mechanism in "Depurwali Kaki" and "Malho." A scene in the present—a film photograph, a mother waiting at the doorway—opens onto the past. Here memory is not merely nostalgia. When the narrator recalls the past, he also examines his present moral position. Remembering Malho is not simply remembering an old love; it entails accounting for his own social ascent, the distance that has grown between them, and the responsibilities that remain.

In the same way, "Balidani" and "Dhahlel Dalbadalu!" are grounded in political memory. If the authentic memory of a movement disappears, opportunists will write its history. Memory therefore becomes an instrument of resistance throughout the collection. Private narrative turns into an alternative archive, written at the margins of history.

5.5 Education: Liberation, Opportunity, and an Unfulfilled Promise

Education recurs in several stories. Malho wants her son Sundar to receive an education; Sikandar's life tests the conflict between education and caste; and Phuliya suffers from the restricted choices available to her because she has remained uneducated. Through this recurrence, the collection's social vision establishes education as an important means of emancipation. Yet the author entertains no naïve optimism. Where institutional discrimination persists, even a school can become a place of humiliation.

5.6 Violence: The Household, Caste, Police, War, and Language

Violence in the collection is not confined to bullets and batons. The lifelong silence of Depurwali Kaki's marriage constitutes psychological violence; the separate seating imposed upon Sikandar's child is caste violence; Lalchanma's false arrest is state violence; the sexual pressure brought to bear upon Phuliya is gendered violence exercised through state power; and the media's political labelling of her personal truth is linguistic violence. By revealing so many forms of violence, the author makes visible the continuity of oppression even beneath the surface of an apparently peaceful society.

5.7 The Micropolitics of Family Relationships and the Larger Structure of Power

The micropolitics of relationships: Lalji's stories demonstrate that the larger politics of society—macropolitics—and the micropolitics of the family are interconnected. In "Depurwali Kaki," Kaka's "Bhishma-like vow" is in fact the domestic form of the same feudal arrogance against which the characters of "Balidani" or "Patharsanak Lok" are fighting in the streets. Just as power is centralised within the country, it is centralised within the family in the form of masculine pride.

5.8 The Irony of Democracy and Systemic Violence

The irony of democracy and systemic violence: "Dhahlel Dalbadalu" and "Sikandar Dom" explicitly convey that neither democracy nor the spread of education, by itself, brings structural violence to an end. Where the institutional system turns its back on people, an ordinary person such as Chander is compelled to compromise with a corrupt order. The failure of the system becomes the cause of individual moral decline.

5.9 Disillusionment with Armed Revolution

Disillusionment with armed revolution: Purne's disillusionment in "And She Was Killed!" and the emergence of Chaite's opportunism in "Balidani" show how a revolution, once institutionalised, can depart from its founding ideals and subject marginalised communities to still greater exploitation.

5.10 Parallel Exploitation of Women's Bodies and the Power of the State

Parallel exploitation of women's bodies and state power: In Lalji's stories, the female body becomes a battlefield. Havildar Bhulotan's desire to "enjoy" Phuliya sexually in "And She Was Killed!" and Prithvi Narayan Shah's wish to acquire Indrakumari through a dowry bargain in "The One-Tusked Elephant..." establish that state power and patriarchy alike regard women as conquered territory. Resistance takes the form of Phuliya's knife and Indrakumari's forceful speech.

6. Narrative Technique, Language, Symbolism, and Characterisation

6.1 The Moral Instability of the First-Person Narrator

Several stories employ an "I" narrator, but the author does not make this narrator omniscient or invariably correct. In "Malho," he worries about his own standing; in "Kari Kobham," he harbours prejudices concerning the body and marriage; and in the political stories, characters regret their decisions. This incompleteness is of literary significance because readers are invited not merely to accept the narrator's words but also to recognise their limitations.

6.2 Dialogue: A Means of Bringing Ideas to Life

Vrishesh Chandra Lal's narrative gift is particularly evident in dialogue. The domestic conversations among the mother, aunt, and Madhu; the hesitant exchanges between Malho and the narrator; the minister's insulting language; the teacher-pupil conversation between Sikandar and Varmaji; the cultural dialogue between Kari and the narrator; and the dramatic argument between Indrakumari and Digbandhan—all allow ideas to emerge through the voices of characters. The author's essayistic impulse can also be felt, but at its most successful, dialogue gives ideas a body, rhythm, and situation.

6.3 Silence, Pauses, and What Remains Half-Said

Some of the collection's finest moments occur when the characters do not say everything. Malho steals sideways glances, offers a flower, and walks away; Depurwali Kaki speaks very little throughout her life; Chander swallows his humiliation and quietly leaves the minister's house; and at the end, Varmaji merely nods his head. Such silences create space for the reader's interpretation. Together, the spoken quality of rural Maithili life and its silences impart a distinctive rhythm to these stories.

6.4 The Structure of Symbols

The water lily—love, distance, dignity blossoming amid mud and water, and an unfulfilled union.

The old photograph or cinematic face—a doorway into memory and the rediscovery of a woman's image.

The red bridal sari—an unfinished marriage, the future of love, the threat of sexual exploitation, and blood.

The one-tusked elephant and the nine-lakh necklace—public heritage versus dowry, the state versus private power.

Waiting at the doorway or threshold—love, family, the hope of return, and time.

These symbols prevent the stories from being reduced to messages alone. The water lily and the red sari, in particular, remain on the reader's mental horizon long after the narratives end. Literary endurance is often created by precisely such visual signs.

6.5 Language: Rural Ease and a Modern Multilingual World

The language of the original text is formed through a combination of colloquial rural Maithili, Nepali political terminology, and modern words of English origin. Terms such as "tea-time," "workshop," "SP," "ministerial quarters," "division," and "computer" are natural components of the modern world inhabited by the stories. Conversely, words such as durkha, goth, banihar, nuan, dabra, kumudini, bhansia, dai, and girahat give the narratives a recognisably local body. It would be mistaken to call this multilingualism an impurity: it is the actual linguistic composition of a borderland society shaped by politics, administration, education, and international contact.

The author alters his language to suit the characters. The minister's speech is an abrasive mixture of the arrogance of power; Sikandar speaks politely, yet with an undercurrent of bitterness; Kari's dialogue belongs to an international culture of training; Indrakumari speaks in a dramatic, Sanskrit-inflected idiom; and Malho's language is brief and rich in implication. These changes of linguistic register prevent the characters from becoming interchangeable mouthpieces for a single author, although his ideological positions are sometimes directly audible in political episodes.

6.6 Memory Frames, Flashbacks, and Stream of Consciousness

In "Depurwali Kaki," "Malho," and "The One-Tusked Elephant and the Nine-Lakh Necklace," ordinary events in the present—a film photograph, arrival in a village, or a dream—open into extensive narratives of the past. In conjunction with these memory frames, some stories approach stream-of-consciousness technique, as an external event sets in motion a sequence of remembrance and inward conversation within a character.

6.7 The Extension of Imagery and Symbolic Design

The water-lily flower, the opposition between an old photograph and television or computer imagery, the red bridal sari, and the one-tusked elephant and nine-lakh necklace are all images that hold together the emotional and intellectual structures of the stories. In "Patharsanak Lok," the "stone" signifies not merely hardness but also steadfastness in principle and a measure of detachment.

6.8 Linguistic Diversity, Indigenous Vocabulary, and Character-Specific Registers

Lalji's language—"pure, lucid, authentically indigenous, and idiomatic"—creates a rich world of local terms such as durkha, asora, bhanas, jhonti, khonchha, dagahar, goth, katiya deb, thakmuriya, mamori, aunayab, dhahlel, chaite, phusiyek pran, bhangath, and sanes. Alongside this strongly indigenous base, Nepali administrative vocabulary and modern English-derived terms coexist naturally, revealing the actual multilingualism of the border region. In this dual character of the linguistic world, an earth-rooted locality and the multilingualism of modern contact are present at once.

The author demonstrates particular care in making dialogue appropriate to each character: the everyday speech of village women, the slogan-laden language of political activists, the English-inflected exchanges of an international setting in "Kari Kobham," and the dignified style of historical dramatic dialogue are all successfully created in distinct registers. This is evidence of the author's ability to work with linguistic diversity.

In the original book, footnote explanations of specific cultural or administrative terms—such as goth, khopi, bhardar, and S.L.C.—also make the text more accessible to readers.

6.9 Characterisation and the Representation of Women

The diversity of the female characters is matched by the fact that the male characters are not uniformly drawn. Misri Kaka's final remorse, Chander's ideological conflict, Sikandar's patient struggle, and Digbandhan's sense of duty all possess psychological complexity, preventing these figures from becoming simplistic embodiments of good and evil.

7. Literary Achievements and Critical Limitations

7.1 Principal Achievements

The first achievement is the credibility of human experience. The author's characters are not mechanically conceived ideals. They hesitate, fear, err, repent, love, endure humiliation, and change their decisions. This moral complexity keeps the politically themed stories from becoming propaganda pamphlets.

The second is the placing of women and marginalised people at the centre of history. Calling the martyr's widow and children "those who have sacrificed," making Malho the titular figure of the collection, allowing a Dom character to test the self-satisfaction of a reform-minded teacher, and treating Phuliya's personal truth as more authoritative than an official news account—these choices constitute a literary politics in themselves.

The third is the connection between personal memory and public history. The domestic veranda, field, pool, tea shop, police cell, political platform, and royal court are different places, but human dignity remains the fundamental criterion in every one of them. This unified perspective prevents the collection from appearing fragmented despite its varied subject matter.

The fourth is an accomplished use of irony and symbolism. Kaki dies just as the vow not to leave the house is finally fulfilled; a former democratic minister humiliates a man who seeks justice at his door; Chander is called a turncoat by both sides; Phuliya's red sari and Mani's clenched fist become memorable images in the stories.

7.2 Critical Limitations

In some stories, the weight of ideas bears too heavily upon narrative movement. In particular, lengthy explanations or speeches given to clarify political backgrounds sometimes bring the stories close to essays. Greater concision, more scenes, and a stronger reliance on dialogue in these passages could have increased their artistic density.

Second, despite the powerful presence of women, traditional images of beauty, motherhood, purity, service, and sacrifice recur. The stories themselves cross the boundaries of these conventions in several places—through Phuliya, Kari, Malho, and Indrakumari—yet contemporary readers will recognise the tension. It is not merely a failing of the collection; it also marks a social consciousness in transition.

Third, the gradual reformism at the conclusion of "Sikandar Dom" leaves uneasy questions unanswered. A small dose of medicine may constitute sociological pragmatism, but from the perspective of a child subjected to the daily indignity of untouchability, such delay can itself perpetuate violence. The story does not fully resolve this contradiction—and perhaps its literary force resides in that very unresolved question.

Fourth, the final story, in its reconstruction of history, idealises nationhood, purity, and femininity. It would be a mistake to treat it as a historically verified reconstruction; understood instead as an imaginative dialogue with contemporary feminist and national consciousness, its literary meaning becomes clearer.

From a critical standpoint, it is also worth considering the tendency in certain stories to "tell" rather than "show." The relationship between the framing narrative and the inner dramatic story in "The One-Tusked Elephant and the Nine-Lakh Necklace" might have been more fully developed, while the ending of "Kari Kobham" feels somewhat abrupt. These limitations do not destroy the works' overall effect, but they offer opportunities for examining their artistic construction.

8. Malho in the Context of Maithili Short Fiction

The significance of Malho lies not merely in its range of subjects but in its distinctive convergence of Nepali and Mithila experience. The familiar ground of village life, family relationships, caste, marriage, and women's lives in the Maithili short-story tradition here expands to include Nepal's democratic movement, monarchy, Madhesi political experience, Maoist violence, and even the culture of international training. Consequently, the collection's locality is not a limitation: it becomes a credible foundation upon which modern political questions are raised.

The collection's strongest stories—particularly "Malho," "Depurwali Kaki," "And She Was Killed!," "Sikandar Dom," and "Balidani"—succeed at the point where ideas dissolve into scenes and characters. Malho's flower, Kaki's waiting, Sikandar's child at school, Phuliya's sari, and the martyr's widow's silence allow the reader to encounter a human being first; the underlying idea then unfolds of its own accord.

A persistent challenge of political fiction is that characters can become puppets of ideas. Vrishesh Chandra Lal is not entirely free from this risk, but his personal and social experience, command of dialogue, and moral self-questioning allow principal characters to remain recognisably human at numerous points. Chander, in particular, who changes parties but ultimately returns to his principles, is a memorable character who helps us distinguish political identity from moral loyalty.

9. Overall Conclusion

The fundamental literary achievement of Malho is that it reads the history of great events within the lives of ordinary people. The meaning of democracy is found not in the martyr's photograph but in the long years of his widow's loneliness; the claim to abolish caste is tested not in a reformer's speech but in where a Dom child is permitted to sit at school; the truth of revolution resides not in a newspaper headline but in Phuliya's red sari and the knife she uses to defend herself; and the truth of love lies not in a manifesto but in a single water-lily flower.

Again and again, the collection shows power constructing its own narratives: the husband invokes a vow, the party invokes history, the police invoke the law, the media invoke news, and the royal court invokes propriety. Against these narratives, the author sets the experience of the person who has suffered. In the court of literature, that experience offers the more credible testimony. From this perspective, Malho is a collection of stories about human dignity.

Malho, the title character, is an apt symbol for the collection as a whole. She is no grand heroine of history but an ordinary working woman from rural society. Yet her silent love, labour, self-respect, and determination to educate her son prove greater than the narrator's status, the passage of time, and social distance. Like the water-lily flower, she blooms amid the reality of mud and water, leaves her fragrance behind, but refuses to become another's possession. Several of the collection's characters—Depurwali Kaki, the martyr's widow, Sikandar, Phuliya, and Indrakumari—extend this dignity in different forms.

Here, the social role of literature appears as an instrument in the hands of a "sharp surgeon": an instrument that dissects political hypocrisy, the cries of the marginalised, and the subtle tragedies of human relationships. In this sense, the convergence of a subaltern perspective, feminist discourse, and democratic consciousness becomes the collection's critical energy.

The meeting of an authentically indigenous local vocabulary with multilingual modern life, the joining of private memory to public history, and the human complexity of characters such as Malho, Depurwali Kaki, Phuliya, Sikandar, and Chander make this collection worthy of sustained literary study.

Final assessment: Malho is a short-story collection situated at the meeting point of social realism, political memory, and women's experience. Its excellence lies not in raising slogans but in discovering subtle signs of human dignity within suffering.

10. Bibliography

Lal, Vrishesh Chandra. Malho. Janakpurdham: Sudama Prakashan.

5. Modiain

Humanity, Myth, Memory, and the Beauty of Translation

An In-Depth Research-Based Literary Critique, Including Translation Theory

Written by B. P. Koirala

Maithili Adaptation: Vrishesh Chandra Lal

Sudama Prakashan, Janakpurdham · Bikram Sambat 2061

◆◆◆

Keywords

Modiain; B. P. Koirala; Vrishesh Chandra Lal; Maithili adaptation; humanism; Mahabharata; Bhagavad Gita; opposition to war; women's experience; memory; myth; oral narrative; translation theory; cultural relocation.

1. The Work, Its Editions, Historical-Political Background, and the Author and Translator

In the history of Nepali and Maithili narrative literature, Modiain occupies an established place as an enduring, thought-provoking, philosophical, and humanist novella. It was originally written in Nepali by Bishweshwar Prasad Koirala (B. P. Koirala), Nepal's first popularly elected prime minister, a pioneer of its democratic movement, and a major literary figure. Holding literature and politics in creative balance, Koirala presents his political philosophy, the futility of war, and human sensibility in this novella through a mythic framework.

Historically, on 1 Poush 2017 in the Bikram Sambat calendar (December 1960), King Mahendra dissolved Nepal's democratic government and parliament and imprisoned leading democratic politicians, including the popular leader B. P. Koirala. Amid the harsh imprisonment at Sundarijal Prison in Kathmandu, political disappointment, solitude, and philosophical agitation, Koirala turned to literary creation under the pressure of an inner impulse. In that prison, a profound internal conflict was unfolding within him: should the restoration of democracy in Nepal be sought through bloody revolution and armed rebellion, or through nonviolent reconciliation, compassion, and peaceful satyagraha? The philosophical outcome of this ideological struggle is reflected in Modiain, which he completed in just three days of imprisonment—28, 29, and 30 January 1964 (15, 16, and 17 Magh 2020 B.S.)—and which was subsequently published by Sajha Prakashan in B.S. 2036 (1980). This is his shortest novel, but in intellectual scope it is exceptionally expansive and serious.

The work was adapted into Maithili by Vrishesh Chandra Lal, a senior figure in Nepal's democratic movement, a thinker, and a public intellectual. His version was published by Sudama Prakashan, Janakpurdham, in B.S. 2061

(2004). The Maithili edition includes the scholarly prefatory writings "A Few Words" by the late Sushil Koirala (a former prime minister of Nepal), "Acknowledgements" by the translator Vrishesh Chandra Lal, "From the Site of Modiain" by Acharya Somdev, and "From the Threshold of Modiain" by Dr Rajendra Prasad "Vimal"; these establish the book's intellectual seriousness and historical significance. B. P. Koirala himself used to say that he had entered politics through an inner prompting, whereas his entry into literature was of precisely the opposite kind: art demands freedom and embraces not material satisfaction but divine discontent.

Bishweshwar Prasad Koirala was born on 8 September 1914 (24 Bhadra, B.S. 1972) in Kashi, where his family was living in exile. He became a leading figure in Nepal's democratic movement and the country's first elected prime minister, while also being regarded as an epoch-making writer of Nepali fiction, influenced by the psychoanalytic approach of Sigmund Freud. His major novels include Teen Ghumti, Narendra Dai, Sumnima, Modiain, Hitler ra Yahudi, and Babu Aama ra Chhora.

Vrishesh Chandra Lal was born on 29 March 1955. He is himself a committed political follower of B. P. Koirala and an active participant in Nepal's democratic movement, and he continues to write on Nepali politics. In addition to the adaptation under consideration, his publications in Maithili include Andolan (a poetry collection), Malho (a short-story collection), and Sanghiyatak Sambandhme (On Federalism, a translation). It is worth observing here that the translator is himself a bearer of the original author's political and ideological tradition. This creates a theoretical and emotional proximity in the act of translation—a "shared ideology"—whose influence is readily apparent in the edition's introductory essays, including those by Acharya Somdev and Dr Rajendra Prasad "Vimal."

It is also important to note that this is not the only Maithili adaptation of Modiain. Dr Ramdayal Rakesh also produced a Maithili version under the same title (B.S. 2054, Safari Nepali Prakashan), while a Hindi translation entitled Mohi was published by Ranjana Sharma. Within this tradition of multiple translations, Vrishesh Chandra Lal's adaptation has a distinctive place because of its original linguistic fluency and regional re-creation centred on Darbhanga; these qualities will be considered in detail in the subsequent section devoted to translation theory.

The Nepali original is not reproduced alongside the Maithili edition. Consequently, no conclusive claim can be made about how closely any particular sentence corresponds word for word to the original, where something may have been omitted or added, or precisely what expression was translated by which equivalent. Nevertheless, it is entirely possible to analyse the target text's naturalness, stylistic coherence, cultural adaptation, and paratextual purpose.

2. A Story Within a Story: Memory, Imagination, and Multilayered Design

The work's first major artistic decision is the author's open acknowledgement of the relationship between memory and imagination. An episode from childhood is viewed forty years later through the "telescope of memory"; with the assistance of imagination, an incomplete past acquires sequence and meaning. Thus, from the outset, the reader is told that the text is neither a purely documentary account nor an entirely invented story. It is a joint reconstruction by memory, lived experience, and present consciousness. Through this self-acknowledged uncertainty, the work renders its later dreamlike and mythic expansion believable.

"To arrange an event from the past into a sequence and give it meaning on the basis of memory, the assistance of imagination becomes necessary."

The narrative structure of Modiain offers an outstanding psychological example of the "story within a story," or frame-narrative, technique. In its outer frame, the author presents a recollection of his childhood, broadly situated in the 1920s or 1930s. As an inquisitive boy of nine or ten, he travels by train from the Nepal border region to see the city of Darbhanga, accompanied by Misirji, a trusted gumasta or agent of his family.

The station, porters, railway, royal palace, horse-drawn ekka, dust, the sweet-maker's shop, flattened rice and curd, the thatched grocer's shop, and Haraha Pond: these details do not allow "place" to remain mere background but transform it into a living character. The brightness of noon, the darkness of evening, the changing colour of the pond, a lantern, the trembling flame of an oil lamp, and the sounds of insects together create a psychological stage upon which ordinary reality gradually enters the realm of folk belief and dreams.

Modiain first appears as an affectionate shopkeeper. Her capacity to recognise the child's hunger, exhaustion, and fear immediately is maternal in character. Within this domestic tenderness, the mystery of Haraha Pond opens up. The story of an ancient fisherwoman who sold fish comes first, followed by the Mahabharata narrative at night; finally, Modiain's voice melts into that of a woman from the Mahabharata age named Nari. In this progression, the narrative descends inward from one frame to another.

2.1 The Multilayered Arrangement of Narrative Levels

Narrative Level	Time / Setting	Principal Narrator / Perspective	Primary Significance
Memory frame	Present of the adult narrator	"I"—a recollection of childhood	The coexistence of memory and imagination
Darbhanga frame	A day and night in childhood	The boy + Misirji + Modiain	Local reality, curiosity, and cultural conditioning

Narrative Level	Time / Setting	Principal Narrator / Perspective	Primary Significance
Haraha folktale	Indeterminate ancient past	Modiain's voice	A violent history buried within the landscape
Mahabharata frame	Indraprastha–Hastinapura–Kurukshetra	"Nari"—an ordinary woman	The human cost of the epic for ordinary people
Return to the frame	Early morning / train / Jaynagar	The child's consciousness	An ethical conclusion: become not "heroic" but "good"

3. Circular Structure: From "Great" to "Good"

The work's ethical maxim is introduced very early, at mealtime, in an entirely unforced conversation. The boy says that he will study and become a "great man." Modiain asks him what sort of person a great man is. The boy falls silent. Modiain's reply then becomes the seed of the work's entire philosophy: great people may be of many different kinds, but good people are fundamentally alike everywhere. Therefore, one should strive not to become great, but to become good.

On the final train journey, this seed reverberates once more: abandon the ambition to become great or heroic; become a good human being. The boy's aspiration at the beginning and the dream-voice at the end answer one another. The whole intervening Mahabharata episode appears to be an immense ethical demonstration of that single sentence. "Heroism" that perpetrates mass slaughter, and "greatness" that turns human beings into instruments in the name of power, revenge, or a righteous war, do not constitute moral excellence. This circular construction gives the brief novel a remarkably tight structure.

Here "good" is not an abstract word supplied with a philosophical definition. It means love, compassion, familial closeness, mercy, nonviolence, sensitivity towards the suffering of living people, and the refusal to regard another's life as less valuable than one's own ambition. This ethic endures longer than the work's explicitly argumentative philosophical passages precisely because it is imparted in the language of the home, as the affectionate counsel of a woman.

4. Mythic Retelling, Rebirth, and Existentialism

Modiain is certainly a retelling of the Mahabharata, but its originality lies not in asking "What happened?" but "What happened to whom?" The epic traditionally places dharma, the state, justice, vows, heroism, lineage, divine incarnations, and victory at its centre. Koirala brings to the centre of narration the countless unnamed lives surrounding that centre: cultivators, displaced people, soldiers' wives, mothers, sisters, and children. The character called Nari ("Woman") is not herself an identifiable canonical character of the Mahabharata; her anonymity is her strength. She is both an individual and the representative of millions of ordinary women whose lives war has devastated.

It is appropriate to call the novel's treatment of myth a "counter-myth" only if we recognise that it does not destroy the Mahabharata, but retrieves another voice suppressed within it. The meaning of the epic's righteous war is transformed into the grief of an ordinary woman. Myth ceases to be an instrument for sanctifying the established order and becomes a laboratory for asking urgent moral questions in the present.

From the standpoint of literary criticism, Modiain places the conventionally glorified history of the Mahabharata war upon a new, unexpected, psychological plane. Here the doctrines of rebirth and the immortality of the soul are interpreted from a different existentialist perspective. Just as the conflict between corporealism and spiritualism occupies the centre of B. P. Koirala's novel Sumnima, Modiain encompasses the story of three births of a single soul.

The novel clearly suggests that the soul's endless journey is not undertaken in pursuit of liberation or spiritual attainment, but arises from an unfulfilled human longing and psychological trauma. The spirit of that unknown Mahabharata-era "Woman," whose husband was killed in the slaughter at Kurukshetra, could find no peace. In a later age she was born as a Malahin, a fisherwoman who sold fish beside the pit at Haraha and encountered the tantric practitioner of the Maharaja of Darbhanga. The fisherwoman described to him the gigantic warriors of the Mahabharata age and recounted how an eagle had dropped a corpse. Thereafter the same soul was born in the present age as Modiain, still awaiting her husband. His symbolic presence is suggested by the coughing, ailing grocer, although her true love remains directed towards the soldier-husband of the Mahabharata age.

This spiritual continuity is presented as evidence that, until human justice and fulfilment are attained, the soul continues to wander through the mortal world from age to age. Modiain tells the boy that some thirst, some unfulfilled desire, binds the soul to earthly existence. This is a significant dimension of Koirala's fatalistic and existential inquiry, in which the indomitable force of human desire and love overcomes even death.

4.1 The Fisherwoman and Modiain: Folk Myth and the Mythological–Social Duality

The second pillar of the story is the episode of the Malahin. A fish-selling woman offers a tantric practitioner an enigmatic explanation of her laughter, connecting two incidents: an eagle's carrying away a fish, and the dragging of the corpse of a Mahabharata-era warrior as far as Khandavaprastha. Together they form a folk myth. The very process by which the myth is made is important from a literary-anthropological standpoint. A local body of water, Haraha Pond, acquires its own "sanctity" and "terrifying" quality by establishing a connection with the vast pan-Indian narrative of the Mahabharata. The figures of the fisherwoman and of Modiain–Nari are structurally parallel: both possess "extraordinary" knowledge; both occupy the margins of society; and both give enigmatic, almost incomprehensible answers when confronted by the questions of male authority, represented respectively by the tantric practitioner and Krishna.

5. Ordinary People, Displacement, and the Woman's Perspective

History is habitually written by victors, ruling classes, and patriarchal authority, while the voices of marginalised communities and women are suppressed. In the conventional Mahabharata, the predominant perspective is that of sovereign kings, great warriors, sons of gods, Brahmins, and feudal power. B. P. Koirala, however, reinterprets the calamity of war through the eyes of an entirely ordinary, uneducated yet sensitive woman, Modiain, and of Nari, the young Kshatriya woman of Kurukshetra in the Mahabharata age whose consciousness is intertwined with hers.

Throughout B. P. Koirala's fiction, female characters appear with remarkable strength and revolutionary potential: Indramaya in Teen Ghumti, Sumnima in Sumnima, Uma in Babu, Aama ra Chhora, and Gauri and Munariya in Narendra Dai. Similarly, in Modiain, this unknown woman occupies the very centre of the plot. These female characters break through patriarchal restraints and seek to fashion independent existences for themselves.

The Nari described in the story is the daughter of an ordinary agrarian Kshatriya family displaced during the establishment of Indraprastha. The clearing of the Khandavaprastha forest for the founding of Indraprastha drove local farming and forest-dwelling families from their homes and impoverished them. This represents the reality of a dispossessed class uprooted by urbanisation and imperial expansion. The woman from the margins views Yudhishthira's staking of Draupadi in the dice game, and the attempted disrobing that followed, from a different perspective. She says, "Draupadi's disrobing is not merely the humiliation of one woman; it is the sign of a great and inevitable calamity!" Rather than dwelling principally on the royal humiliation of Draupadi, her deepest anxiety concerns the catastrophe of the approaching war, which will consume the lives of ordinary people everywhere.

Nari makes clear that the lives of ordinary women, and the sindoor signifying their married status, have been staked for the political pride of men: Duryodhana's obstinacy and the desire for revenge associated with Bhima and Draupadi. The female body becomes a principal site of violence and grief in war. The image that emerges at the end of the Kurukshetra war is the culmination of this female tragedy: "It was as though the earth had been emptied of men. Only widowed women seemed to remain alive in this world … clutching their helpless little children to their breasts." This is a poignant revolt of maternal compassion against patriarchal warfare.

In this sense, Modiain may also be read as a proto-feminist text. Koirala moves beyond his customary mode, influenced by Freudian psychoanalysis, and attempts to give voice to women's collective suffering.

5.1 A Comparative Arrangement of the Traditional Mahabharata and the Perspective of Modiain

Traditional Mahabharata Perspective	Subaltern/Feminist Perspective of Modiain
Central figures: Krishna, Arjuna, Yudhishthira, Duryodhana, Bhishma	Central figures: Modiain, the unknown "Woman," ordinary soldiers
Assessment: war is necessary to protect dharma (a righteous war)	Assessment: war is merely destruction and meaningless mass slaughter (holocaust)
Representation of women: symbols of the state's honour; occasions for revenge	Representation of women: the actual victims of war, widows, and restless spirits
Teaching of the Gita: disinterested action (nishkama karma-yoga) and the immortality of the soul	Rebuttal of the Gita: destruction of humanity and the imposition of emotionless divinity
Final outcome: justice, the attainment of a kingdom, heaven	Final outcome: mountains of corpses, the peace of a cremation ground, endless waiting

5.2 Contradictions Within the Woman-Centred Perspective

There is, nevertheless, a significant tension within this commitment to women. Nari and her friends regard Draupadi's desire for revenge almost as a departure from "natural womanhood." A morality centred on compassion here risks treating a particular "gentle" image of womanhood as natural. If Draupadi's humiliation, her claim to justice, and her political anger are dismissed merely as incitements to war, another form of female agency may be suppressed. Thus the novel gives women's suffering an extraordinary centrality but does not entirely free its definition of femininity from conventional ideas of propriety. This contradiction is not simply a weakness of the work; it provides an opportunity to understand the complexity of its historical moment, ethical commitments, and gendered imagination.

Modiain raises questions concerning women's needs, oppression, the defence of existence, equality, and empowerment. Its feminism is not identical with a modern discourse of rights; it is primarily a woman's perspective arising from nonviolence, love, domestic life, and respect for human existence. It is therefore more equitable to read its progressiveness and its limitations together.

6. The Gita, Arjuna, and the Tension Between "Humanity and Divinity"

The most revolutionary philosophical and ideological aspect of Modiain is its deconstruction, on human grounds, of the traditional doctrine of karma-yoga in the Srimad Bhagavad Gita. In Indian intellectual and literary tradition, the Gita is revered as the highest spiritual teaching; Koirala, however, views it through a radically different, humanist lens. This perspective also has affinities with Gandhian pacifism and Ambedkar's concern for social justice, both of which foreground the need to re-examine inherited texts.

When Arjuna sees his kin, teachers, and brothers facing him upon the battlefield of Kurukshetra, he is overcome by despondency and lays down the Gandiva bow. The novelist interprets this distress not as Arjuna's weakness but as the highest expression of humanity. Arjuna becomes the living embodiment of noble human qualities: compassion, sympathy, affection for his people, friendship, parental tenderness, and mercy. His anguished declaration—"No, I shall never kill my own family with my own hands! I do not want a kingdom"—expresses the enduring moral law of the human heart.

Yet Krishna, through the forceful, eloquent, sixteen-chapter philosophical web of argument presented in the Gita, ruthlessly crushes Arjuna's spontaneous human compassion. The arguments that the body is an old garment, that the soul is immortal, that killing without attachment is a religious duty, and that the visible world is maya, an illusion, are challenged sternly by Nari–Modiain. In a deeply moving prose passage about human existence, Nari asks Krishna whether her husband's warm embrace, her longing for motherhood, and her grief are also unreal. She argues that, to gods seated in the heights of heaven, mortal life may appear as meaningless and illusory as the lives of insects; but to a human being, and particularly to a woman, life and love can never become irrelevant or false.

The novelist makes clear that divinity and excessive ideology—hyper-ideology—can transform human beings into unfeeling machines. After hearing the Gita, Arjuna "was no longer Arjuna; he had become a machine mounted by God." All his human sensibility had died, and he had been swept into the frenzy of war. The result was that millions of women were widowed, vultures and dogs began tearing at corpses, and humanity itself was defeated.

"O Krishna, what sort of inspiration to duty is this of yours ...? Is human life not already narrowly enclosed within the irresistible boundaries of death?"

This passage approaches modern existentialist thought: it places limited, mortal human existence at the centre and sets it against a certain divine indifference. Acharya Somdev, who wrote a preface to the work, also emphasises this conflict. He observes that Koirala's "political personality seems to have been transformed in the name of humanism." His comment also suggests how deeply the personal experience of an imprisoned political writer —the opposition between satyagraha and armed revolution, and between violence and nonviolence—is woven into the philosophical texture of the narrative.

For critical fairness, however, a subtle distinction is necessary. Modiain is not a comprehensive philosophical refutation of the Gita; it is a literary rejoinder. The novel tests Krishna's words against a woman's grief and her knowledge of mortality. Its strength, therefore, does not lie in proving that "the Gita is wrong," but in compelling readers to confront the uncomfortable question of how far human compassion can be suspended in the name of justice, religion, or duty.

7. Opposition to War: Not the Battlefield, but Catastrophe in Every Home

In Modiain, the Mahabharata war is not a heroic saga but a machine of death. Throughout the account of the eighteen days of slaughter, the sound "kach ... kach ..." recurs. This onomatopoeia evokes not the glory of swords but the mechanical horror of necks being severed. Mountains of corpses, streams of blood, vultures, jackals, dogs, rotting bodies, and innumerable widows strip war of its ornamental splendour and expose its biological, malodorous reality.

The most affecting argument comes not from the arithmetic of armies, but from the entanglement of human relationships. Nari's husband and brother-in-law fight on the Kaurava side, while her father and brother stand with the Pandavas. Here the meaning of victory and defeat collapses. If the men of one's own family are arrayed in opposing armies, whose "victory" is it? The question dissolves the collective identities of Kaurava and Pandava and places before us the ethics of relationships between individuals.

In the aftermath of war, Nari says that her husband's death also brought about a death within her. Even after bodily death, innumerable widowed souls wander in search of those they loved. These spectral images do not simply introduce the supernatural; they are metaphors of trauma. War may come to an end, but the time of mourning does not. In this sense, Haraha Pond is a site of collective memory: beneath its waters lie buried bones, history, grief, and unanswered waiting. The text enters into a profound dialogue with research on gendered trauma, because violence wounds not only male bodies on the battlefield but the emotional structures of families across generations.

8. Freudian Psychology: Eros versus Thanatos

B. P. Koirala is a pioneer of psychological realism in Nepali literature and was deeply influenced by Freud's psychoanalytic theories. In Freud's account, human beings are governed by two fundamental impulses: Eros, the life instinct associated with love and sexual energy; and Thanatos, the death drive associated with destruction. Koirala himself acknowledged his acceptance of Freudian theory while also granting a place to moralism.

Modiain depicts the intense struggle between these impulses and its consequences with considerable subtlety. Nari's physical beauty, the exhilaration of youth, love born through an exchange of glances with a soldier in the forest, their Gandharva marriage, the tender warmth of her husband's embrace, and her intense longing for motherhood are all expressions of Eros at its height. She finds the fullest meaning of life in the carefree joy of her newly married existence and in laughter, play, and bathing with her female companions beside Suryakunda.

On the other side stand the devastation of war, the struggle for state power, Krishna's exhortation, and the slaughter of the Mahabharata: the terrible dance of Thanatos. War mercilessly destroys the erotic energy and life instinct represented by Nari. From a Freudian perspective, the Gita's instruction operates as a rational covering through which Arjuna's Eros—his love of family and compassion—is repressed and Thanatos, a destructive force, is awakened. Nari's lament that she has still not been able to bid farewell to her husband is, in fact, an elegy for the premature and unnatural defeat of the life instinct by the death drive.

9. Psychological Trauma, Spectrology, and Performance Studies

The waiting of Nari's soul for her husband across successive ages, embodied in Modiain, symbolically represents post-traumatic stress disorder (PTSD) and collective memory following war. In terms of Jacques Derrida's spectrology, or "hauntology," whatever event or experience has not been fully concluded or resolved in history returns as a ghost or spectre to haunt the present. Karl Marx, too, wrote in the Communist Manifesto of a "spectre of communism" haunting Europe. Here, the spectre that haunts Modiain is the Mahabharata war.

The sorrow of the widowed woman of Kurukshetra never receives resolution within the course of history. Justice is denied her. She therefore returns as a revenant, entering Modiain's body and awaiting her husband through age after age. The reading offered through spectrology is that the spirits of innocent people killed in war repeatedly disturb history and the present until humanity has genuinely atoned for that violence.

From the standpoint of performance studies, Modiain's telling of the story to a boy of nine or ten constitutes a "performance." Through this performance, she communicates the horrors of war, suffering, estrangement, and the anguish of bereavement to the next generation, represented by the boy. He is both listener and audience, a figure of the future. Even when he falls asleep, the spectre enters his unconscious: in a dream he sees heads being severed to the sound "kach ... kach ... kach" and hears a voice from the sky urging him to become not heroic, but good. This is a striking literary performance of the intergenerational transmission of trauma and the possibility of its alleviation.

10. The Child's Perspective, Orality, and Psychological Credibility

The child-narrator does not diminish the philosophical weight of the work; he makes it credible. At first the boy is excited at the prospect of seeing Darbhanga. The bustle of the railway station, the costliness of the palace, the porters, the sweets, and the ponds are all objects of wonder to him. At night, when darkness, the flicker of an oil lamp, and the "splash" of water increase his fear, listening to Modiain becomes like the familiar domestic experience of falling asleep while hearing a story from one's mother. Myth thereby ceases to be a lecture and turns into a moving picture of dreams.

The even cadence of oral narration, the affectionate address "Baua," the exchanges of questions and answers, the pauses within the story, the movement between sleep and wakefulness, and the merging of scenes into one another all produce a "credible incredibility." The reader cannot know with certainty whether Modiain really is the ghostly form of Nari, whether the events are imagined in the boy's half-sleep, or whether memory, forty years later, has shaped them into this narrative. The work does not resolve the ambiguity; it makes that uncertainty an aesthetic principle.

This explains why, when the family finally asks what the boy saw in Darbhanga, he answers simply, "Modiain." The palace, the city, the station, and the vehicles have become secondary. The voice of a single woman has left a lasting impression upon the child's ethical consciousness. His journey from outward "seeing" becomes an inward journey towards "understanding."

The original repeatedly uses expressions such as "in a single tone," "hypnosis," and "falling drop by drop." Through such language the author himself calls attention to the nature of his narrative technique. Modiain's storytelling is presented in the manner of a lullaby or a tale from the oral tradition, taking the listening child to the boundary between dream and reality. This stylistic choice is deliberate, for it allows both the reader and the child-listener to experience the very enchantment of "divinity versus humanity" described by the story: Arjuna falls under the spell of Krishna's speech, and the boy under the spell of Modiain's.

II. The Memory of Place, the Mithila Setting, and Language and Style

Haraha Pond, described as still existing in Darbhanga, is the narrative's central "chronotope," or conjunction of time and place. It is a real geographical location; within the story, however, it absorbs memories at three levels—historical (excavations associated with Kurukshetra), mythic (the fisherwoman and the tantric practitioner), and personal (the child's fearful experience of the night)—and becomes a symbol rich in meanings. The physical details of Darbhanga, including the Naulakha palace, the activity of the station, the commotion of porters and their companions, and the grocers' shops, are depicted with realist precision. They give an earthly foundation to the narrative's mythological and philosophical flights. This is a characteristic feature of Koirala's writing, in which romanticism and realism merge.

Darbhanga in this work is not a city on a map, but a city of memory. The noise of the railway station, the palace's red colour, the royal carriage, the elephant stables, the market, the horse-drawn ekka, the thatched shop, and flattened rice with curd and jaggery preserve the social texture of an older Mithila in minute scenes. The translator and the writers of the introductory materials particularly emphasise their local relationship with this geography. For a Maithili reader, the work is therefore not merely the translation of a "foreign Nepali book," but a recovery of the reader's own cultural landscape.

Haraha Pond is the work's most accomplished symbol. It is a place for bathing by day, dark water at dusk, a centre of fear at night, a history of bones in the folktale, the buried sorrow of the Mahabharata, and, finally, a site of religious recitation of the Gita. Layer upon layer of meaning is deposited upon the same pond. "Water" here does not bring oblivion; it stores memory. The story raises to the surface the suppressed history that remains invisible beneath the water.

In this sense, the work creates an anti-monumental monument. The royal palace, whose cost and grandeur travellers take pride in, recedes to the margins of the story with the passage of time; Haraha Pond and Modiain's voice endure. Power builds monuments in stone; ordinary people build them in stories and memory. The novel shows the second form of remembrance to be more enduring.

11.1 Regional Setting, Food, Dress, and Vocabulary

A distinctive attraction of the novel is its vivid regional portrayal of Darbhanga, at the heart of Mithila, in the decades corresponding to the 1920s and 1930s (approximately Vikram Samvat 1980–1990). It recalls the regionalism of Phanishwar Nath Renu and Nagarjun.

The novella offers a pictorial description of Darbhanga railway station in its earlier form: a broad platform covered with a thin layer of tar, a sturdy Calcutta-style bridge, porters pulling large, red-cushioned cane fans, and the clamour of passengers. The detailed depictions of the Maharaja of Darbhanga's "Naulakha Darbar" (the Red Palace of Rajnagar and Darbhanga), elephant stables, horse stables, courts, and the bathing steps of Haraha or Harahi Pond take readers into the living history of Mithila at the time. By connecting the historic Harahi Pond with a pit from the Mahabharata age, the narrative fuses myth and reality.

The Maithili translation is suffused with the aromas of Mithila's traditional food and hospitality. Modiain's shop offers delicious descriptions of puffed flattened rice in a thin brass plate, thick curd, jaggery, peda and laddu, rice with milk, and freshly fried bhanta tarua—aubergine fritters—prepared on the hearth. These details are both sensuously appealing and faithful to cultural experience. The description of Modiain's beauty and dress brings before the reader a recognisably local woman of Mithila. Her clothing—a loose-necked, buttonless printed blouse ending above the navel, an eleven-cubit blue sari, broad silver ornaments on her ears, neck, and feet, armlets, and a hair-bun that repeatedly comes loose—makes the novella as vivid as a visual poem.

The translator, Vrishesh Chandra Lal, employs the vivid, authentic, and rich indigenous vocabulary of Maithili, giving the translation a quality of originality. Words such as gahinki (customer), asorak oriyani (the edge or eaves of the veranda), bhanas (kitchen), konchiya (the tucked fold of a dhoti), bauaini (wandering), surael (rhythmic), dabara (small pond), khadhiya (pit or trench), kabandha (headless torso), kacharam-badh (massacre), and jhapalait (dozing) heighten the work's literary richness. Such unadulterated regional expression makes the novel's rural and marginalised world more convincing.

11.2 Sound Patterns, Visuality, and Sentence Rhythm

The primary source of the Maithili adaptation's verbal beauty is the ease of its spoken language. Words such as "Baua," "motari," "thehi," "kat," "gam," "mitin," "khissa," "chura-dahi," "bhor," "ghuri," and "bauait" do more than add local colour; they establish social intimacy within the narration. The speech of the child, Misirji, Modiain, and the village women is free from bookish formality. By contrast, in the Krishna–Arjuna episodes, Sanskrit-derived terms such as dharma, nishkama karma, sthita-prajna, Paramabrahman, Ishvara, and kartavya occur densely. This stylistic duality cannot be dismissed as coincidence. On the linguistic plane itself, the human voice of the household and the scriptural voice of divinity confront one another.

The visual quality is equally noteworthy. The train, the station bridge, the red palace, the darkness of the pond, the shadows cast by the oil lamp, the glittering armour of war, dust, blood, and vultures: the author changes distance and angle as if operating a camera. In the nocturnal passages especially, the opposition of light and darkness governs the child's state of mind. Sounds—the "splash," conch shells, war drums, coughing, the railway, and "kach … kach …"—turn visual scenes into bodily experiences.

In the syntax, many passages move in long, impassioned, repetitive currents. During scenes of war and mourning, these currents create emotional excess; in the child's dialogues, sentences become short and rapid. The style changes pace according to its subject. This variety of rhythms is a major reason why, despite the work's modest dimensions, its narrative time acquires such vastness.

12. Vrishesh Chandra Lal's Adaptation in the Light of Translation Theory

The book itself uses the expression "Maithili adaptation" rather than "translation." "Adaptation" suggests that the aim is not merely to reproduce the words of the original sentences, but to bring the work to life anew in Maithili. In the paratext of the available edition, the adaptor identifies the chief sources of his inspiration as B. P. Koirala's perspective on the Gita, the distinction between humanity and divinity, and the injunction to become a "good person." The function of the target text is therefore also one of ethical and cultural communication.

12.1 Linguistic Proximity and "Sister-Language Transposition"

Nepali and Maithili are closely related members of the Indo-Aryan branch of the Indo-European language family. For centuries, the borderlands of Nepal and India, particularly the Janakpur–Darbhanga region, have been sites of cultural and linguistic exchange. B. P. Koirala himself was connected with Mithila, and his childhood memories extend across Darbhanga and Janakpur, making this translation a natural kind of "homecoming." Owing to this linguistic and cultural closeness, the translation does not encounter the intricate problems of cultural substitution characteristic of translation between distant languages, such as English and Maithili. Instead, it takes the form of a "sister-language transposition," in which the subject matter, symbols, and cultural codes—the Mahabharata, the Gita, Hindu ritual practice, and the geography of Mithila—are shared by both linguistic communities.

12.2 A Strategy of Domestication and Sense-Centred Adaptation

In Venuti's terminology, Vrishesh Chandra Lal's adaptation clearly adopts a strategy of "domestication": it makes the source text so natural for readers in the target language that it appears not to be a translation at all, but an original literary work. Dr Rajendra Prasad "Vimal," the author of the foreword, bears witness to this when he writes: "I had read the original novel on two occasions; I could not stop until I had read this translation in a single sitting. Because it employs a language and style suited to the nature of Maithili, it immerses the reader in aesthetic pleasure not as a translation but as an original work." This observation suggests that the translator's aim was readability and emotional immediacy, rather than word-for-word fidelity.

Concrete evidence of domestication can be found throughout the text: specifically Maithili forms of address in dialogue ("Baua," "He rau," "Kahandon"); idiomatic turns of phrase in the manner of "Small to behold, but capable of inflicting a serious wound"; and the natural use of regional verb forms and inflections such as "chhaik," "achhi," "rahae," and "kaelanh(i)." The syntax of the original Nepali sentences has thus been thoroughly recast in the patterns of Maithili sentence construction and idiom. In this process the translator has chosen not word-for-word translation, but sense-for-sense translation—a distinction fundamental to translation theory from the classical opposition associated with Cicero and St Jerome to Nida's concept of "dynamic equivalence."

12.3 Nida: Dynamic/Functional Equivalence

Eugene Nida distinguishes "formal" equivalence from "dynamic," or in his later terminology "functional," equivalence, which emphasises a natural and comparable effect upon readers of the target text. To a Maithili reader, the dialogue of Modiain sounds entirely natural. The child's speech, the intimacy among women, domestic food, local forms of address, and the vocabulary of rural life convey none of the stiffness of translated sentences. In his foreword, Dr Rajendra Prasad "Vimal" finds the language so natural that the work gives the pleasure of an original composition rather than a translation. This evidence of reception strongly supports the naturalness of the target text.

12.3.1 Textual Examples

Nepali Original (Approximate Sense)	Maithili Adaptation (Vrishesh Chandra Lal)	Translational Feature (Equivalence)
Great people are of many different kinds, but good people are only of one kind.	Who knows how many kinds of great people there are? But good people everywhere are found to be of just one kind!	Dynamic equivalence; a naturally flowing Maithili sentence structure.
Cold / chilly	Warm touch	Cultural adaptation (contextual transcreation).
To weep / lament	Writhing and crying	Emotional

Nepali Original (Approximate Sense)	Maithili Adaptation (Vrishesh Chandra Lal)	Translational Feature (Equivalence)
	out in anguish	intensification.

12.4 Newmark: Balancing Semantic and Communicative Translation

Peter Newmark's distinction between "semantic" and "communicative" translation is helpful here. Domestic conversations, descriptions of scenes, and folktale passages seem predominantly communicative: the Maithili sentences flow as though the story had been told in Maithili from the outset. But when the target text approaches the Gita, philosophical terminology, and Sanskrit verses, it preserves the gravity and technical vocabulary of the source culture. Through this dual strategy, emotional intimacy and philosophical memory are both retained.

12.5 Venuti: Domestication, Foreignisation, and Cultural Repatriation

Lawrence Venuti discusses the tension between "domestication" and "foreignisation" in translation. The Maithili case of Modiain differs from the usual example, because the original work's principal present-day frame is itself set in Darbhanga, in Mithila. The activation of local vocabulary in Maithili is therefore not simply a matter of domesticating a foreign text; it restores the story's geographical and cultural sound—a form of restitution or homecoming. At the same time, Sanskrit verses from the Gita, philosophical concepts, and names and forms drawn from the Mahabharata preserve their cultural distance and sanctity. The result is not complete domestication, but a combination of selective homecoming and selective foreignisation.

It is particularly important to recognise that Darbhanga, in India's Mithila region, is the geographical centre of the original Nepali narrative; the source text is therefore already rich in descriptions of a Maithili-speaking area. In these circumstances, the translator's task was not to assimilate "foreign" cultural elements, but to return a narrative written in Nepali, yet fundamentally situated in a Maithili cultural environment, to its "original linguistic home." Viewed in this way, the Maithili adaptation of Modiain offers a distinctive and unusual example in translation theory. We might call it "repatriative translation": the translator does not introduce an unfamiliar culture, but restores to largely indigenous material its natural linguistic expression.

The decision to retain Sanskrit verses from the Gita, such as "Nainam chhindanti shastrani ...," unchanged and untranslated is likewise a conscious theoretical choice. It exemplifies Venuti's "foreignisation," maintaining the authority and sanctity of the source language—here Sanskrit—because the Gita verses occupy the status of a "sacred original" within Hindu cultural consciousness, whose translation might be regarded as culturally inappropriate. Thus the translator employs both domestication in the ordinary narrative passages and foreignisation in scriptural quotations according to context, adopting a balanced, "hybrid" translation policy within a single work.

12.6 Toury: Norms of the Target Culture

Gideon Toury's descriptive translation studies attend to acceptability within the target culture. Through colloquial expression, forms of address, verb forms, food culture, and Mithila's local vocabulary, the Maithili adaptation appears to give priority to the norms of the target language. The story's "voice" consequently sounds domestic rather than translated. Acceptability within the target culture is especially necessary because the narrative depends upon oral recollection and a child's act of listening; artificial language would immediately destroy the storytelling technique.

12.7 Skopos: The Translator's Purpose

According to Skopos theory, a translator's strategy should be assessed in relation to its purpose. The adaptor's objective is clear from the paratext: to enable Maithili-speaking readers to appreciate B. P. Koirala's celebrated work; to make a story connected with Mithila available in Maithili; and to communicate anew the ethical teaching that one should become a "good" human being. In view of these purposes, the choice of local, accessible Maithili attentive to both the written text and the sounds of speech is entirely appropriate.

12.8 Lefevere and Rewriting: The Power of Paratext Alongside Translation

André Lefevere regards translation as "rewriting," linked with literary prestige, selection, ideology, and the influence of patronage. In this edition the publisher's statement, the introductions by Acharya Somdev and Dr "Vimal," the adaptor's acknowledgements, and the biographical notes on the author and adaptor all guide readers in advance to regard the work as humanist, anti-war, connected with Mithila, and an achievement of historical significance. The translator does not merely bring over a literary work; he also constructs a framework for its reception. This paratext re-establishes B. P. Koirala within the Maithili literary system.

12.9 Polysystem Theory: Literary Circulation from Nepali into Maithili

According to Itamar Even-Zohar's polysystem perspective, translated literature can take an active part in the development of a target literature, experiments in genre, and circulation between languages. The Maithili adaptation of Modiain carries a celebrated Nepali literary work across the India–Nepal border into the Maithili literary sphere. Yet because the narrative is geographically situated in Mithila, this is not a one-way "import," but a renewed circulation within a shared cultural region. Translation thus connects Maithili readers with the philosophical experiments of Nepali modernity, while restoring to them a sense of ownership of the Maithili geography present within the Nepali text.

12.10 The Translator's Visibility, Ideological Affinity, and Possibilities for Textual Criticism

The introductory essays by Acharya Somdev and Dr Vimal emphasise that Vrishesh Chandra Lal is politically a follower of B. P. Koirala's ideology. This is relevant to the debate in translation studies concerning the translator's "invisibility versus visibility." Although, at the linguistic level, the translator has successfully endeavoured to make himself "invisible"—that is, to make the text read like an original work—his decisions at the ideological level are clearly those of a "visible," intellectually engaged translator. What passages receive emphasis and what interpretation is offered in the introductory materials demonstrate an active presence, transforming translation from supposedly neutral linguistic transfer into an ideological rereading.

A parallel textual comparison of Dr Ramdayal Rakesh's independent Maithili adaptation, Vrishesh Chandra Lal's Maithili adaptation, and Ranjana Sharma's Hindi Mohi could illuminate language-specific and translator-specific cultural decisions, including dialogue style, forms of address, and the treatment of verses from the Gita.

12.11 A Synthetic Summary of the Theoretical Perspectives

Theory / Thinker	Aspect Applicable to This Adaptation	Critical Conclusion
Nida	Naturalness for target readers; the effect of dialogue	A strong tendency towards functional equivalence
Newmark	Communicative expression in the vernacular; preservation of meaning in philosophy	A balance between two strategies
Venuti	Local Maithili voice alongside classical Sanskrit terminology	Selective domestication/foreignisation; cultural homecoming
Toury	Maithili linguistic and cultural norms	High acceptability within the target culture
Skopos	Accessibility to Maithili readers and ethical communication	Linguistic choices suited to the purpose
Lefevere	Prefaces, acknowledgements, and ideological framing	Literary rewriting accompanies translation
Polysystem	Literary circulation between Nepali and Maithili	Dialogue between cross-border literary systems

13. Principal Achievements, Limitations, and Questions of Textual Criticism in the Adaptation

The natural flow of spoken Maithili: when reading the dialogue, one rarely experiences the stiffness of "translated" sentences.

The restoration of local culture: Darbhanga, Haraha, flattened rice and curd, the ekka carriage, village life, forms of address, and folk sounds find their natural home in Maithili.

The preservation of orality: the cadence of Modiain's storytelling, the child's questions, the address "Baua," and the successive stages of fear and sleep remain fluid.

The dignity of philosophical terminology: terms derived from Sanskrit and associated with the Gita, as well as Sanskrit verses, have not been excessively dissolved into colloquial speech.

The wide range of emotional tones: humour, wonder, domestic affection, fear, romantic love, mourning, philosophical dissent, and the horror of war each acquire a distinct linguistic colouring.

The enrichment of the target literature: a distinctive mythic-humanist experiment in the modern Nepali novella has become available to Maithili readers.

The first limitation concerns comparison. Without the original Nepali text, it is impossible to conduct a definitive examination of fidelity at the level of individual words, changes in sentence structure, the preservation of metaphors, omissions or additions, and shifts in meaning. It would therefore be inappropriate to equate naturalness for the target reader with "complete fidelity." The work can certainly be regarded as a successful target text; but conclusions about fine-grained fidelity to the source require a parallel examination of the Nepali original.

Second, an excessive sense of local naturalness—the adaptation's strength—may sometimes reduce the historical or linguistic distance of the source. In the special circumstances of this work, however, the risk appears limited, because the narrative's present-day frame is itself situated in Mithila. Third, the introductory paratexts announce the work's humanist and anti-war meanings very explicitly in advance. Readers consequently encounter a powerful interpretive direction before they can develop an independent alternative reading. A critical edition might have benefited from maintaining greater distance between the literary work and its paratext.

The Maithili adaptation should not be read merely as a secondary copy of the Nepali original. In this edition language itself creates meaning. Darbhanga and Mithila, which form the narrative landscape of the source, regain the sounds, addresses, food culture, and oral rhythms of their locality when expressed in Maithili. The translator's role is thus not only that of a "bridge," but also one of cultural reclamation. At this point translation studies opens a new avenue into literary criticism of Modiain.

15. Principal Symbols of the Work and Their Meanings

Haraha Pond — a reservoir of buried history, bones, collective memory, grief, and myth.

Darkness and the oil lamp — childhood fear and the threshold between consciousness and unconsciousness; a gateway from reality into dream.

The train — an outward journey accompanied by inward moral change; altered consciousness on the return from Darbhanga to Jaynagar.

Vultures, jackals, and dogs — counter-images that bring the "heroic" discourse of war down to the biological reality of corpses.

Gandiva — the shifting relationship between individual judgement and obedience to ideological commands.

The voice of the Gita — the enduring tension between the authority of scripture and a woman's human questioning.

The "good person" — the ethical principle joining the beginning and end of the work; an alternative to greatness and heroism.

16. Overall Evaluation According to Stylistic Criteria

In terms of narrative construction, Modiain is highly successful. The memory frame, the journey, local reality, folktale, dream, Mahabharata, and return are not disconnected pieces, but concentric circles leading gradually towards greater depths. The Mahabharata section contains an enormous number of figures, yet the narrative does not scatter, because its emotional centre remains fixed upon Modiain/Woman and the child.

Philosophically, the work deliberately adopts an emotional intensity weighted towards one side. The compassion of Woman is accorded a higher moral standing than Krishna's reasoning; this is not "impartial philosophical debate," but an artistic ethical intervention. Such partisanship is not necessarily a defect in a literary work; indeed, it sharpens the question being asked. Readers must nevertheless recognise that a comprehensive debate on the philosophy of the Gita is not the purpose of this short novel.

Psychologically, the combination of childhood memory, fear, half-sleep, voices, and the dissolution of one scene into another is outstanding. Socially, the displacement caused by the construction of Indraprastha, unemployment, labour, women's lives, and the domestic cost of warfare establish the work's modernity. From a gender perspective, the centrality given to women's experience is historically important, although the notion of "natural womanhood" calls for contemporary critical scrutiny.

From the perspective of the Maithili adaptation, the reader's greatest gain is that the work finds the speech and sensibility of its own geographical setting. In this respect, Vrishesh Chandra Lal's achievement meets the demanding standard of literary translation by which the target language does not remain a shadow of the original, but becomes a living literary body in its own right. Nevertheless, a parallel study of the original Nepali will remain essential for any rigorous source–target comparison in future scholarship.

17. Conclusion and Contemporary Relevance

Although Modiain, written by B. P. Koirala and translated into Maithili by Vrishesh Chandra Lal, is a novella of modest dimensions—only forty-two pages—it possesses epic seriousness in intellectual, philosophical, and literary terms. It is not merely a retelling of a mythological story, but a severe and unsparing psychological documentation of the horrors of war, the destruction of humanity in the name of divinity, and the tragedy of marginalised groups, particularly women.

The true power of Modiain resides as much in its narrative art as in its intellectual courage. Had it simply declared that "war is bad," the work would have become a sermon. Had it merely presented arguments against the Gita, it would have been a philosophical pamphlet. Instead, through a child, an affectionate woman, a dark pond, a story told at night, a displaced family, a loving marriage, a group of frightened women, and finally a Kurukshetra filled with corpses, Koirala gives abstract questions a body, voice, smell, and memory. Thought is consequently not separate from the story: the story itself becomes thought.

The work does not diminish the Mahabharata; it makes the epic greater by viewing it from another angle. Alongside the history of kings and gods, it places the history of unnamed people. Arjuna's compassion, Woman's fear, the widow's waiting, and the child's ethical education together suggest that humanity is not the enemy of religion, heroism, or greatness, but their ultimate test. If a supposedly "great" deed renders millions of ordinary lives meaningless, its greatness must be reassessed. This is the work's most difficult question.

The Maithili adaptation gives this question an exceptionally natural voice within the reading world of Mithila. Vrishesh Chandra Lal balances the intimacy of the target language, the rhythms of conversation, local cultural substance, and the dignity of philosophical terminology. From the standpoint of translation theory, the work is a successful example of functional equivalence, communicability, acceptability within the target culture, purposive translation, and literary rewriting. Because the story is set in Darbhanga, it is especially meaningful to describe the adaptation as a "cultural homecoming."

In the contemporary world, when the horrors of war, genocide, and destruction driven by arrogance have spread across different regions, the humanist appeal of Modiain has become still more relevant. Vrishesh Chandra Lal's Maithili translation has not only strengthened the cultural and literary bridge between Nepali and Maithili, but also proved an invaluable contribution to Maithili narrative literature, one that will continue to be read and researched across the ages for its dynamic equivalence and regional language and style.

The novel's final words—"Baua, become great; never try to become a hero. Become a good person, good … wonderful!"—become an enduring Upanishadic mahavakya, or great utterance, for all humanity. They embody a fundamental Gandhian injunction towards peace and human welfare.

Bibliography

Koirala, B. P. Modiain. Maithili adaptation by Vrishesh Chandra Lal. Janakpurdham: Sudama Prakashan, 2061 B.S.

Nida, Eugene A. Toward a Science of Translating. Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1964.

Nida, Eugene A., and Charles R. Taber. The Theory and Practice of Translation. Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1969.

Newmark, Peter. A Textbook of Translation. New York: Prentice Hall, 1988.

Catford, J. C. A Linguistic Theory of Translation. London: Oxford University Press, 1965.

Bassnett, Susan. Translation Studies. London/New York: Routledge, 1980; later editions.

Toury, Gideon. Descriptive Translation Studies and Beyond. Amsterdam/Philadelphia: John Benjamins, 1995.

Venuti, Lawrence. The Translator's Invisibility: A History of Translation. London/New York: Routledge, 1995.

Lefevere, André. Translation, Rewriting, and the Manipulation of Literary Fame. London/New York: Routledge, 1992.

6. Sumnima

A Comprehensive Literary and Translation-Theoretical Critique of Vrishesh Chandra Lal's Maithili Adaptation of Bishweshwar Prasad Koirala's Sumnima

Maithili Adaptation: Vrishesh Chandra Lal

Critical Study: Literature · Psychoanalysis · Culture · Translation Theory

◆◆◆

Research-Based Critical Review

August 2026

Abstract

This review reads Vrishesh Chandra Lal's Maithili adaptation of Bishweshwar Prasad Koirala's Sumnima from literary, psychoanalytic, sociological, ethnic, feminist, ecological and translation-theoretical perspectives. It argues that the work's central tension is not the simple binary of body versus soul, but the question of cultural purity versus human coexistence. Somdatt's repression of the body, Sumnima's experiential understanding of life, Puloma's suffering within marriage, and the mixed cultural relationship of the next generation together expose the impossibility of a "pure" identity. The Maithili adaptation is evaluated in the light of Nida, Newmark, Venuti, Catford, Bassnett, Toury and Skopos-oriented approaches.

The conclusion is that the adaptation is highly accomplished in its communication of feeling, character speech, vernacular rhythms and cultural registers. A glossary, source references and a translator's commentary would also be valuable in a future critical Unicode edition.

Keywords: Sumnima · B. P. Koirala · Vrishesh Chandra Lal · Maithili translation · body and soul · Arya and Kirat · psychoanalysis · ecofeminism · ethnic consciousness · translation theory

Research basis: The complete text and paratext of the available Maithili edition; published research including Bhanubhakta Sharma Kandel (ethnic consciousness), Indira Acharya Mishra (ecofeminism), Hariprasad Silwal (sociology), Kamal Prasad Phuyal (body/self) and Prakash Chandra Khatri (psychoanalysis); and major concepts in translation studies advanced by Nida, Newmark, Catford, Venuti, Bassnett, Toury and Munday.

Essential Bibliographical Information

Original work	Sumnima (Nepali novel), author: Bishweshwar Prasad Koirala
Maithili adaptation	Vrishesh Chandra Lal
Genre	Novel (Maithili adaptation)
Publisher	Phoenix Books, Baneshwar, Kathmandu, Nepal
Edition	First, Ashoj 2078 B.S. (September 2021)
ISBN	978-9937-705-59-2
Cover illustration / art	Rajan Kafle (illustration), Saraswati Chaudhary (art)
Prefaces	Pradip Giri and Dr Shephalika Verma
Number of pages	154
Work	Sumnima
Author	Bishweshwar Prasad Koirala
Maithili adaptation	Vrishesh Chandra Lal
Publisher	Phoenix Books, Baneshwar, Kathmandu, Nepal
Edition	First, Ashoj 2078 B.S. (2021 CE)
ISBN	978-9937-705-59-2

1. Introduction: More Than a Love Story, a Test of Civilisational Consciousness

To read Bishweshwar Prasad Koirala's Sumnima merely as a love story, a psychosexual narrative or an Arya–Kirat conflict would diminish the scope of its imaginative achievement. The novel constitutes an extended debate between body and soul, nature and culture, matriarchal and patriarchal understandings of society, spontaneous pleasure and disciplined asceticism, individual desire and communal codes, ethnic memory and a shared future. In the Maithili adaptation, this debate takes place not only at the level of subject matter but also within language itself. Somdatt's Sanskritised, scriptural and disciplined speech, and Sumnima's spontaneous, earthy, bodily and direct voice, give two distinct philosophies of life their linguistic embodiment.

What distinguishes this edition is that the Maithili translation itself becomes a cultural event. The adaptation of a celebrated work of Nepali literature into Maithili brings questions of centre and periphery, "national language" and mother tongue, classical authority and vernacular culture onto new ground within Nepal's multilingual literary sphere. The publisher's note and introductory essays view this translation in the context of linguistic equality, cultural plurality and national coexistence. This review therefore accords equal importance to the literary value of the original narrative and to the translator's linguistic and cultural strategies.

The Author's Literary and Political Background

Bishweshwar Prasad Koirala (1971–2039 B.S.) was, on the one hand, Nepal's first popularly elected prime minister and, on the other, an epoch-making writer who pioneered psychoanalytic realism in Nepali literature. He liked to describe himself as a socialist in politics and an anarchist in literature. His life in freedom appears to have been chiefly devoted to politics, whereas his life in imprisonment was devoted to literary creation. Experiences ranging from his forced recruitment into military service by the British government during the Second World War to the founding of the Nepali National Congress in 2003 B.S., and his removal from office by King Mahendra in 2017 B.S., gave depth to his thinking.

Koirala began his literary journey by publishing the Hindi short story "Vahan" in Hans in 1987. He introduced into Nepali fiction the influence of psychoanalysts such as Freud, Jung and Adler. The difficulties he faced under the country's prevailing authoritarian political order led him to turn away from overtly political and social subjects and to make the individual psyche and the human unconscious the principal concerns of his literature. In works such as Teen Ghumti, Narendra Dai, Modiain, Hitler ra Yahudi and Babu, Aama ra Chhora, he addressed sexual psychology, the philosophy of the Gita and humanism. Sumnima, however, is of a different kind. Whereas Teen Ghumti explores the vicissitudes of a woman's life, and Narendra Dai the tragedy of relations between women and men, Sumnima is primarily a narrative founded upon the conflict of two distinct cultures. Koirala composed it while imprisoned in Sundarijal Jail with Ganesh Man Singh, Krishna Prasad Bhattarai, Ram Narayan Mishra and Dewan Singh Rai, drawing inspiration from their discussions between spiritualist and materialist outlooks.

His literary output—six novels, two short-story collections, an autobiography and prison diaries—is inseparable from his political life. In the intellectual atmosphere of Sundarijal prison, Dewan Singh Rai represented a Kirati materialist perspective and Ram Narayan Mishra a religious-spiritualist one. The influence of their heated discussions is discernible in the conceptual structure of Sumnima.

Methodologically, the present study reads together the complete text of the available Maithili edition, its publisher's note, the translator's statement, Pradip Giri's preface, Shephalika Verma's commentary, and modern research on Sumnima addressing ethnic consciousness, sociology, studies of embodiment, psychoanalysis and ecofeminism. In the translation-theory section, the target text is assessed through the ideas of Nida, Newmark, Catford, Venuti, Bassnett, Toury and Skopos-centred approaches. One limitation must be made explicit: a line-by-line comparative copy of the Nepali original was not available for this review. Consequently, no definitive claim is made about "verbal equivalence with the source." The assessment rests instead on the Maithili target text, the translator's declared principles, the work's known narrative structure and critical scholarship.

2. The Textual Context, Composition and Significance of the Edition

The available edition identifies the book as Sumnima, its author as Bishweshwar Prasad Koirala and its "Maithili adaptation" as the work of Vrishesh Chandra Lal. It was published by Phoenix Books, Baneshwar, Kathmandu; its first edition is dated Ashoj 2078 B.S. (2021 CE), and its ISBN is 978-9937-705-59-2. At the end of the book, the author himself gives the place of composition as "Sundarijal, Prison" and a span of eight days, 21–28 June 1964. This is important for understanding both the brief period of its composition and its inner intensity: the novel's narrative compass is relatively narrow, but its conceptual tensions are extraordinarily dense.

It would be unwise to turn the prison setting mechanically into a political allegory. Nevertheless, questions of "liberation" and "bondage" repeatedly return in the novel. Somdatt treats the body as a fetter and seeks to repress it, only to discover ultimately that rigorous spiritual practice can itself become another form of bondage. Sumnima, who belongs to a socially marginalised community conventionally designated "non-Aryan," proposes an alternative conception of freedom through an unforced acceptance of the body and nature. Thus the author's political imprisonment and the character's spiritual self-imprisonment are not direct equivalents, but they certainly create a profound resonance around the question of freedom.

The Maithili edition's paratext is equally significant. The publisher's note raises the question of the dominance of Khas Nepali and the neglect of other mother tongues in Nepal's multilingual reality. Pradip Giri considers the translation through nationalism, Mithila, the Kirats, Madhesh and cultural diversity. These framing texts lead readers to see the Arya–Kirat conflict not only as an ancient mythical episode but also as a question of modern multilingual nation-building. The paratext enriches the novel, but also calls for caution: its political introductions must not imprison the novel's richly multiple meanings within a single ideological conclusion. The achievement of Sumnima lies precisely in its capacity to interrogate the self-assurance of all sides.

The Mythological and Geographical Basis of the Setting

The novel opens with an introductory tale that establishes its setting through a geographical and mythological account of the Kaushiki River and Varahakshetra. The place acquires historical and mythic dignity through references to Vishwamitra's hermitage, the education of Rama and Lakshmana, and Sita's swayamvara. Against this background the central story unfolds: the childhood companionship of Somdatt, a Brahmin boy, and Sumnima, a Kirati girl, gradually develops into a complex journey of attraction and repulsion.

At the centre of the story stands an elemental conflict between two civilisations: Brahmin-Arya culture, which regards the cow as a mother who must not be killed, privileges the soul and treats the body merely as a means; and Kirat-Bhil culture, which accepts the cow as food and regards the body as both beginning and end. In effect, this conflict is a narrative reworking of the classical debate between Vedic philosophy and Charvaka/Lokayata thought: scripture grows arid while life elsewhere remains full of green vitality.

3. Narrative Structure: Encounter, Prohibition, Repression, Return and Succession

The novel has a circular structure. At its beginning the children Somdatt and Sumnima meet near the Kaushiki River, a shami tree and the surrounding forest. At its end, the next generation's love develops within the same natural setting. This recurrence is more than a device of plotting; it is the author's central argument. Civilisations formulate rules, memory hardens them, yet nature ceaselessly creates the possibility of new relationships. The old hermitage falls into ruin and is absorbed by the forest, while a new mingling of love and blood continues through the next generation.

The first part begins with the curiosity of childhood. In the conversations between Sumnima and Somdatt, questions about the precedence of motherhood and fatherhood, cows, meat, religion, nakedness, language, gods and human beings become philosophical debates, yet the author keeps them within the wonder of children. Thought therefore does not turn into instruction: it emerges from character. When Sumnima asks whether one should first recognise the mother who gives birth or the father, Somdatt responds with a scriptural, patrilineal explanation. The seed of the whole novel lies here: experience against doctrine.

In adolescence, this debate becomes an experience of the body. Somdatt's attraction, fear and repression intensify his ascetic discipline. The work's short second chapter, in which Somdatt leaves the hermitage, forms its philosophical centre. The writer of the preface likewise regards this chapter as its "kernel." The question is not whether austerity is true or false. It is what spiritual worth remains when austerity becomes an instrument for defending the ego.

In the third part, Somdatt returns from severe ascetic practice and marries. His marriage to Puloma, the obligation to produce offspring, the notion of the body as no more than an instrument for extending the lineage, and the mental image of Sumnima together poison conjugal life. Denying the body does not destroy it; desire changes form and remains active in the unconscious. Ultimately both Somdatt and Puloma experience physical pleasure through imagined figures outside their marriage. Here the novel achieves its psychoanalytic depth.

The epilogue brings Puloma's death, Somdatt's final repentance, Sumnima's maternal affection and the union of their children into a new cultural synthesis. Yet this is no simple happy ending. Sumnima herself wonders how the Brahmin tendency to "take flight into the air" and the Kirati attachment to "earth" can remain together. Her blessing states the fundamental condition of reconciliation: each must understand the other's path and, when necessary, alter their own. The novel's resolution is therefore not purity but accommodation; the victor is neither culture in isolation, but a mixed culture capable of dialogue.

4. Somdatt: Ascetic, Proud, Tormented and Ultimately an Incomplete Human Being

To read Somdatt merely as a "Brahminical villain" would destroy the novel's psychological complexity. From childhood he is trained in discipline, sacrifice, celibacy, Vedic recitation, repression of the body and the superiority of the paternal lineage. His personality is formed less by independent experience than by inherited principles. His severity is therefore not simply personal malice but a profound internalisation of cultural conditioning. The author finds him culpable while also showing the reasons for his tragedy.

Somdatt's central conflict is not "desire versus duty," but "acknowledging the existence of desire versus denying it." Had he acknowledged his attraction and made decisions within the constraints of duty, the conflict would have been less acute. Instead, he regards desire as impure, and his consciousness becomes a battlefield waging war against desire itself. Sumnima's touch is less an external temptation than a shock of self-knowledge: for the first time he discovers that his body is not wholly subordinate to his principles. Rather than turn this defeat into self-revision, he turns it into self-punishment.

This is particularly important in a psychoanalytic reading. In Freudian terms, repressed desire does not disappear; it returns. The modern scholar Prakash Chandra Khatri reads Sumnima through the unconscious, sexual longing and repression. Events in the novel support this reading: Somdatt undergoes the harshest austerities, but cannot efface Sumnima's image; even after marriage he mentally summons Sumnima during physical relations with Puloma; and, upon seeing his son, he links the idea of a "mental conception" to Sumnima. The denial of the body thus becomes an all-pervasive mental image of the body.

A second dimension of Somdatt's tragedy is pride. His scriptural knowledge gives him not humility but a sense of superiority. His belief that Sumnima's community is "uncultivated," "barbaric" and "bestial" is the ethical failure of that knowledge. The novel's short second chapter raises the question directly: is asceticism, under the name of brahmatejas or spiritual radiance, merely a means of accumulating pride? Such self-interrogation prevents the novel from becoming propaganda. The author undermines his Brahmin character from within.

Nevertheless, Somdatt ultimately possesses human compassion. His affection for his son surfaces from time to time; on his deathbed he regards his life as a pursuit of a mirage; Sumnima's voice opens an indistinct realm of happiness in his final consciousness. Such remorse does not erase his wrongdoing, but it makes the character a living human being. Somdatt's failure is the crucial evidence for the author's argument: if human beings deny the basic experiences of humanity—love, the body, affection and companionship—in order to defend a principle, the principle itself will ultimately become empty.

A Critical Counterpoint on the Portrayal of Somdatt

By way of comparison, the writer of the preface concedes that Koirala has been somewhat unjust to Somdatt, depicting him as a helpless, poorly educated and obstinate Brahmin youth. Somdatt's life is filled with a dry and burdensome sense of duty; he lives in disappointment and dies in disappointment. This imbalance may be regarded as one limitation of the novel, though it also clearly signals the author's ideological preference for a natural philosophy of life over doctrinaire spiritualism.

5. Sumnima: Not Merely an Image of Nature but the Bearer of an Alternative Knowledge Tradition

To reduce Sumnima to a straightforward symbol of “nature,” “body,” “woman” or “Kirat” would overlook the active intelligence of her personality. She questions, argues, suffers injury, preserves her self-respect, marries, fulfils her responsibilities as a mother and eventually gives the next generation a philosophy of life. Her knowledge is experiential rather than derived from books; the author, however, does not confuse experiential knowledge with ignorance. On the contrary, Somdatt's “knowledge” repeatedly loses to life, while Sumnima's spontaneous intelligence grasps practical truth.

Sumnima's childhood questions—about the relation between mother and father, the need for human beings to speak a human language, and the wrongness of destroying people in the name of religion—contain the seeds of her intellectual maturity. They emerge not in the language of modern liberalism, but in the unforced voice of popular wisdom. That is why she does not become the mouthpiece of an ideology. She does not regard the body as a crime; nakedness is not a source of shame to her, for the body is a natural part of life.

Kamal Prasad Phuyal's study of “disembodiment/re-embodiment” reads the novel as a struggle between a disembodied conception of the self and the recovery of embodiment. This perspective challenges the tendency to treat Sumnima merely as a woman who arouses sexual desire. She becomes the means of Somdatt's "re-embodiment": she reminds him that spirituality becomes lifeless when the soul is entirely severed from human experience. Caution is nevertheless necessary. If Sumnima is made into nothing more than an instrument for a man's spiritual healing, her independent existence is again lost. By giving her maternal, social and moral personhood in the final part, the novel largely avoids this difficulty.

Sumnima's metaphor of "earth" is significant. At the end she tells her daughter that the Kirati people are creatures of the earth, for whom enjoyment, pleasure and the body are fundamental. It would be dangerous to interpret this as a biological destiny assigned to an ethnic group. In literary terms, the metaphor sets an earth-bound understanding of life against a flight into limitless emptiness. Since Sumnima herself supports a marriage across cultural boundaries, her statement is better understood as a poetic figure for cultural inclination than as a rigid racial theory.

Her greatest moral victory is her refusal of revenge. Somdatt rejects her love and thereafter carries her image throughout his life. Yet she comes to see him on his deathbed, takes his orphaned son into her home and accepts his union with her own daughter. Compassion here is not a passive characteristic of "nature," but an active ethic that interrupts the violence of history.

Sumnima in the Eyes of the Preface Writer

In the words of Pradip Giri, who wrote the preface, Sumnima is the most natural, spontaneous and vivid of all Koirala's characters—an exuberant embodiment of the primordial and inevitable attraction between woman and man. Her playfulness, talkativeness and captivating beauty are compared with the celebrated dialogue of Shuka and Rambha in Sanskrit poetry. She represents a culture of nature, without scriptural learning but endowed with a philosophy of life. Although, after marriage, her conjugal life is the reverse of a life fulfilled by natural love, she obtains satisfaction through the discharge of her responsibilities. This makes her not a tragic figure but a resilient, life-affirming one.

6. Puloma: The Novel's Most Painful Silence and the Question of Women's Rights

Discussions of Sumnima generally concentrate on Sumnima and Somdatt, but without Puloma a psychoanalytic or feminist reading of the work remains incomplete. Puloma belongs to Somdatt's own cultural community and is therefore, in principle, a "suitable" wife; even so, their marriage fails. This failure makes clear that the problem is not simply an attraction between ethnic groups, but Somdatt's fundamental attitude towards the body and love.

For Somdatt, marriage is a means of repaying his debt to his ancestors. His wife is not a companion but a "field" for the production of offspring. Such language exposes the cruelty of a patriarchal conception of the body. Puloma's desire, fear, expectations and humiliation are all diminished against the background of religious duty. As the couple struggle to produce a child, the burden of spiritual discipline grows upon both their bodies. Desire ceases to be the natural exchange of love and becomes a field of imagined substitutes, guilt and jealousy.

Indira Acharya Mishra's ecofeminist study identifies the patriarchal hierarchy of such binaries as woman/nature and man/culture, body/soul and pleasure/restraint in Sumnima. Puloma's life reveals the internal violence of this structure. Sumnima is the outsider, the "other," and so has opportunities to resist; Puloma is an insider, one of "our own," and is therefore more tightly bound in the name of scriptural propriety. Her suffering demonstrates that belonging to the "same culture" does not automatically produce equality.

Puloma's psychological experience—finding bodily pleasure and conceiving a child through the imagined presence of a Bhil man, followed by Somdatt's humiliation and their mutual loathing—is among the novel's boldest and most controversial passages. Reading this merely as sensationalism or "adultery" is inadequate. The author shows how structures of repression ultimately create a secret domain of imagination in which persons fulfil their forbidden desires. Puloma's mental autonomy offers a severe commentary on the failure of her marriage.

The work's limitations also appear here. Puloma's inner life is less fully developed than Sumnima's, and she sometimes becomes a device for intensifying Somdatt's psychological crisis. A contemporary feminist reading demands fuller attention to her independent story, postpartum neglect, labour, mental health and social isolation. In the epilogue, the gradual wasting away of the ailing Puloma seems like the residue of a patriarchal marriage that demands lineage from a woman's body without providing a social framework for her care.

7. The Body–Soul Debate: The Defeat of Dualism and the Search for Balance

The novel's central philosophical question is not "Which is superior, body or soul?" Had the author intended merely to proclaim the victory of materialism, there would have been no need for the final synthesis. What the novel actually proposes is that human beings are diminished by treating either body or soul as the whole truth. Somdatt denies the body in order to preserve the soul; the result is a soul trapped in pride, repression and emptiness. Sumnima accepts the body's spontaneity and the ease of living; yet at the end she advises her daughter to understand the "flight" of Somdatt's son. In other words, Sumnima too recognises that a human being is not merely earth but also aspiration.

Phuyal's study describes this synthesis as a "middle balance" between "disembodiment" and "re-embodiment." Such a reading accords with the novel's final scenes. In the love of the next generation, the Brahmin son grows up in Kirati society but remains drawn towards the ruined remnants of the hermitage. He does not adopt the old culture, yet he does not wholly erase memory. His identity is mixed: his feet on the earth and his gaze towards the sky.

Throughout the novel, the language of the body repeatedly becomes a language of knowledge. Touch, nakedness, sweat, hunger, milk, meat, the body wasted by austerity, pregnancy, childbirth, illness and embraces are not merely physical descriptions; they are evidence within an argument. Somdatt's scriptural assertions collide with the direct experience of the body. In literary terms, this is an exceptionally successful method, for it renders abstract philosophy in embodied scenes.

That is why the eroticism of Sumnima is not obscenity but epistemology. The question is how human beings come to know the truth: through books, tradition, mantras and reason—or also through touch, suffering, love, failure and the limits of the body? The novel's answer is: through both. But if the first prohibits the second, knowledge remains incomplete.

Freudian Id, Ego and Superego, Repression, and the Discourse of "From Sexual Union to Samadhi"

Bishweshwar Prasad Koirala is regarded as a pioneer of the psychoanalytic current in Nepali literature. Sumnima is built on a Freudian psychological foundation, in which the three principal agencies of the human psyche—the id, ego and superego—are vividly represented through the characters.

Sumnima represents the "id." According to Freud, the id is the part of the human mind governed by natural desires, sexual drive (libido) and the pleasure principle. Sumnima's entire philosophy of life rests upon this pleasure principle. She bathes naked in the Koshi River, delights in nature and does not consider sexuality sinful. On the other hand, Somdatt's father Suryadatt, Puloma and the whole body of Arya religious scriptures symbolise the "superego"—morality and social rules—which sternly commands the repression of the senses. Somdatt himself is the "ego," continually struggling between natural desire (his attraction to Sumnima) and spiritual duty (ascetic discipline).

Somdatt tries forcibly to repress his sexual desire. Freudian theory holds that a repressed wish never disappears but accumulates in the unconscious and may manifest itself as psychological disturbance or neurosis. Even at the height of his austerities, Sumnima's naked, gold-gleaming body disturbs Somdatt's meditation. He says, "This body of yours is the very form of sin; it is poison, it is filth. Remove this hell from before me!" This is the voice of his "superego," terrified of the "id" within him.

When Somdatt performs the putreshti yajna with his wife Puloma in order to beget a child, he makes sexual relations wholly mechanical and devoid of feeling. He explicitly instructs her that "if consciousness of the bodily element produces an experience of physical pleasure, the purpose of the duty of intercourse is lost." Such enforced sexual union without love leaves both Puloma and Somdatt frustrated. Dr Shephalika Verma places this novel beyond Vladimir Nabokov's Lolita and Bhagwati Charan Verma's Chitralekha, associating it with Acharya Rajneesh (Osho)'s idea of "from sexual union to samadhi." Osho holds that desire must not be suppressed but transcended. Somdatt represses desire and becomes psychologically ill, whereas the indescribable satisfaction and wholeness that he finds after naturally acknowledging desire in Sumnima's "Manuvadah" is something his lifelong austerities had never given him.

A Comparative Paradigm of Arya and Kirat Worldviews

Conceptual Paradigm	Arya Culture (Somdatt/Puloma)	Kirat Culture (Sumnima/Bijua)
Epistemology	Grounded in the Vedas, Upanishads, scriptures and the pursuit of liberation	Closeness to nature, experience and a this-worldly philosophy of life
Attitude to the Body (Body Politics)	The body is transient, a pit of sin and an instrument to be repressed	The body is real, a celebration and the fundamental medium of joy
Sexuality	Ritual for procreation (putreshti), devoid of desire	A natural, innocent, loving and pleasurable need
Relationship with Nature (Ecological Stance)	To subdue nature and attain spiritual victory	To accept the laws of nature and live in accord with them
Religious Practices (Rituals)	Gayatri recitation, the five-fire austerity, celibacy and control of the senses	Spontaneity, sacrificial practices, material satisfaction and respect for the maternal principle
Language and Communication (Sociolinguistics)	Sanskritised, artificial, divine-language register, lofty idealism	Maternal, vernacular, realistic diction full of feeling

8. Ethnic Consciousness, the Arya–Kirat Conflict and the Ethics of Seeing the "Other"

Bhanubhakta Sharma Kandel regards Sumnima not merely as a Freudian narrative but as an important text of ethnic consciousness, cultural plurality, language, food, religion, customary life and minority experience. This perspective is evident in the novel's childhood conversations. A cow is "mother" and inviolable for one community, but food for another; the rules governing maternal and paternal descent differ; nakedness and clothing carry different meanings; religious institutions differ; nature, gods, diet and sexual conduct acquire different cultural significances. The author does not fix these distinctions into a formula in which "one is right, the other wrong." Somdatt certainly begins with a one-sided belief in superiority, but the story progressively dismantles his certainties.

Hariprasad Silwal's sociological study sees, amid the contrasting structures of Arya and non-Arya societies, values and environments, an emergent consciousness of an age moving towards reconciliation. The epilogue provides the principal basis for this conclusion. The Brahmin hermitage disappears into nature, but Brahmin blood mingles with the Kirati community. The symbolism is clear: isolationist purity cannot endure; living cultures continue to change through mixture, marriage, remembrance and forgetting.

Nevertheless, modern criticism raises an uncomfortable question: does the novel itself sometimes imprison the Kirati community within fixed metaphors of "nature," "body" and "earth," and Brahmins within those of "soul," "scripture" and "sky"? This is a necessary critical caution. Such cultural dualisms are powerful literary devices, but actual communities are more varied and complex. If readers conclude that "Kirati = exclusively materialist" or "Brahmin = exclusively spiritual," the work's critique of culture will itself be transformed back into stereotype.

The novel partially escapes this danger. Sumnima possesses moral judgement and foresight; Somdatt is not a machine devoid of feeling; the next generation embodies biological and cultural intermixture. The final blessing's insistence that "both should understand their respective paths" expresses a principle of cultural dialogue. The finest reading of the work is therefore not ethnic essentialism but an education in seeing the "other" as human.

Deconstructing Cultural Hegemony

One of the most significant dimensions of Sumnima is its challenge to cultural hegemony. According to Antonio Gramsci's conception, a dominant group (the Aryas) imposes its worldview as universal truth. In the society portrayed, Arya-Brahmin culture regards itself as superior and Kirat-Bhil culture as "barbaric" or "uncultivated." Somdatt repeatedly addresses Sumnima as an "uncultivated girl" and describes her community's way of life as "bestial conduct." In the pride of his knowledge, he assumes that his culture is supreme.

However, drawing on Jacques Derrida's concept of deconstruction, Koirala reverses this hierarchy. As the novel unfolds, it becomes evident that Somdatt's supposedly "superior" knowledge and severe austerities make him disturbed, angry and dissatisfied. When he goes to Bijua in the Kirat village to beg for help in begetting a child, Bijua tells him: "Your mind has become corrupted! You tried to kill it through austerity! ... The body is not a machine, not an intermediary, not even an instrument. It is itself the end, the goal."

Ultimately Somdatt, defeated by his vow of celibacy, must seek Sumnima's refuge at Manuvadah. Here the hegemonic facade of Arya culture falls away. Koirala demonstrates that no culture becomes superior merely because a particular group practises it; natural reality and humanity are of the highest importance. The union of Arya and Kirat blood at the novel's end—the marriage of Somdatt's son to Sumnima's daughter—is a form of deconstruction in which the lineage of the dominant culture merges with that of the marginalised one.

The Kirat Controversy and Social Criticism

Although Sumnima is a singular jewel of Nepali literature, it has also generated controversy among followers of the Kirat religion. Some critics within the Kirat community allege that Sumnima and Parohang are revered deities of their faith, and that B. P. Koirala insulted them by representing them as ordinary human beings and placing them in sexual contexts.

From the standpoint of literary criticism and textual analysis, however, B. P. Koirala has not portrayed Sumnima as weak, insignificant or negative. Instead, she emerges throughout the novel as more rational, humane, compassionate and natural than the Arya man Somdatt. By the end of the intellectual struggle, Kirat culture is presented as life-giving and grounded in reality.

When, in the novel's epilogue, Somdatt's Arya son and Sumnima's Kirati daughter fall in love and enter into a gandharva marriage, their union amid the unbroken flow of the Koshi River brings forth a new generation that represents Nepal's true identity. This message offers a humane and syncretic resolution through assimilation and cultural synthesis to the controversy surrounding the novel. The merging of a drop of Arya blood into the great ocean of Kirati blood is, in effect, a realistic and far-sighted portrayal of Nepal's diverse demography.

9. Nature, Rivers, Forests and Ecological Meaning

Nature is the third major character in Sumnima. The Kaushiki River is not merely a backdrop; it symbolises time, change, the body, memory and the impermanence of civilisation. Characters are born, love, practise austerities and die; hermitages are built and disappear; yet the river continues to flow. In the closing sentences, the Kosi's uninterrupted course and immense stillness expose the limits of humanity's cultural claims.

For Somdatt, the forest is initially a site of ascetic discipline—a place where nature must be brought under control. For Sumnima, the same forest is home: a natural setting for movement, food, the body, play and love. The same natural world assumes different meanings when viewed through two cultures. Gradually, nature reabsorbs Somdatt's rigid construction. The hermitage collapses, becomes overgrown with thickets and loses its visible traces. This is not merely a romantic tableau of the "victory of nature"; it reveals the transience of memory and claims to power.

An ecofeminist reading identifies the parallel subordination of women and nature. Somdatt's patriarchal, scripturally grounded outlook turns both the body and nature into instruments; Sumnima restores the intrinsic worth of body and earth. Yet one limitation of this reading must be remembered: to make woman the "natural representative" of nature may itself reproduce a patriarchal stereotype. The novel becomes more valuable precisely when Sumnima emerges not simply as an embodied force of nature, but as a thoughtful agent capable of making decisions.

The rhythm of the river is effective in the language of the Maithili translation as well. In descriptive passages, extended sentences, onomatopoeic expressions, greenery, shami trees, sand, wind, water and the murmur or roar of the Kosi make the target text both visual and aural. Nature thus determines not only the subject matter but also the rhythmic character of the style.

Further Considerations: Natural Law, Violence and the Relationship between Woman and Nature

In this novel, Somdatt symbolises patriarchy and culture. He attempts to control nature (Sumnima), dismissing it as a "pit of sin," "hell" or "poison." For Somdatt, nature is something that must be conquered. Sumnima, by contrast, belongs wholly to nature. She is at one with the Kaushiki River, the forest birds, the flowers of the laligurans and the waters of Manuvadah. When a hawk attacks a pigeon, Somdatt tries to rescue the pigeon and advocates non-violence. Sumnima, however, explains that the hawk's taking its food is part of the natural order and that disrupting nature's arrangement in the name of religion may itself constitute a greater violence.

Puloma's character offers a tragic example for ecofeminist analysis. Under patriarchy, she suppresses her womanhood and natural desires. When she recognises Somdatt's emptiness, the rebellious woman within her awakens, and she challenges him by standing naked before him. Koirala makes clear that human beings can never become whole by separating themselves from nature or by repressing it.

10. Narrative Craft, Mythic Time and Symbolic Structure

The work begins as a story from "long ago," evoking the Puranas for a contemporary reader. This mythic distance frees the author from a precisely defined historical period and places cultural archetypes—the Brahmin hermitage, the Kirati settlement, the river, the forest and ascetic practice—on a symbolic plane. The memory of Vishvamitra, the mound where the hermitage stood, Vedic rites and Kirati oral traditions deliberately blur the boundaries between history and myth.

The mythic framework gives the narrative a transhistorical quality; nevertheless, the writer raises distinctly modern questions concerning ethnic superiority, nationhood, the body, women, marriage and social intermixture. Modernity beneath the covering of antiquity is one of the work's major formal achievements. In reading an apparently "ancient tale," the reader begins to question the rigid boundaries of contemporary society.

Prominent symbols include the shami tree, the hermitage, river, wind, earth, loincloth and sacred thread, the naked body and blood. The shami tree becomes a witness to love across generations; the hermitage signifies constructed culture and discipline; the river, change; the wind, the aspiration to rise above the self and the instability of that aspiration; earth, embodied life; the sacred thread and loincloth, cultural identity; nudity, a spontaneity before or beyond convention; and blood, biological intermixture and the dissolution of cultural purity.

The narrator repeatedly poses direct philosophical questions, particularly in the second chapter. Judged by a rigid modern injunction to "show rather than tell," these moments might appear to be essayistic intrusions. Yet the work is a philosophical-psychological novel, and these interventions fulfil a structural purpose. Weakness arises only when the questions become detached from the characters' experience. In Sumnima, most of them arise from psychological crises unfolding at that very moment, and their impact is therefore sustained.

II. The Linguistic Beauty of the Maithili Adaptation: Folk Rhythm, Register and the Music of Sentences

The clearest achievement of Vrishesh Chandra Lal as a translator is the living rhythm of the target language. In his foreword, Pradip Giri specifically cites words such as "patar-sutta," "ghonghauj," "asgare," "chakuait," "bhokasi parait kanait," "tamsa kae," "munh-jhappa" and "latta" as examples of expressions that lend the translation a distinctively Maithili flavour. Reading the target text confirms this observation. The dialogue does not sound bookish: it belongs to particular characters. Sumnima's speech is especially marked by playfulness, intimacy, local idiom and a direct awareness of the body.

The contrast between linguistic registers is an important instrument of the translation. Somdatt's sentences make greater use of Sanskrit-derived terms such as "udatta," "danamaya sambandha," "dvija dharma," "brahmacharya," "tapasya," "kartavya," "atma" and "kshetrapati"; Sumnima's language relies more on immediate vernacular words such as "ton," "yava," "may," "bap," "latta," "mati," "hava" and "chhuae." Even without the narrator's commentary, the reader can hear the cultural distance between the characters. Translation here recreates not merely "meaning" but a social voice.

In descriptive passages, the movement of Maithili verbs—"dekhait rahal," "bila geli," "satia gel," "nihara it," "bauait," "pasari jait"—animates the scene. Many sentences are long, but the chain of verbs sustains their rhythm. Sound imitation and sensory vocabulary are particularly effective in the descriptions of nature.

Another notable feature is the level of address. In exchanges between Sumnima and Somdatt during childhood, intimate or informal pronouns challenge cultural distance; Somdatt's scriptural formality and Sumnima's direct "re" reveal different standards of social decorum. Maithili possesses an elaborate system of pronominal respect and honorific distinction, making such choices exceptionally important for characterisation.

Nevertheless, an excess of Sanskrit-derived vocabulary can occasionally impede the reader's natural progress. This is not necessarily a fault of the translator alone: Somdatt's scriptural register may demand such diction. From the standpoint of the target reader, a short glossary of rare Vedic and philosophical terms would improve accessibility in a future edition without erasing the distinctions between registers.

Sociolinguistics and Identity

Language in the novel is not merely a medium of dialogue. It marks the characters' social, cultural, psychological and ideological identities. Vrishesh Chandra Lal's Maithili adaptation preserves this linguistic conflict with considerable skill.

In a representative scene, Somdatt calls his mother "mata" in the "language of the gods." Sumnima responds with a pointed question:

"Well, if you are a human being, why don't you speak in the language of human beings? A human being should not adopt the ways of the gods. A human being should remain human, Somdatt!"

"I cannot understand any of what you say, Somdatt! But I do understand this: it is not good for a human being to try to become a god. That is not a human being's duty. One should live according to one's own speech and ways. The moment anyone seeks to live as a god, that person will no longer remain human."

In this exchange, the opposition between "mata" (Sanskrit-derived, associated with divine language and expressive of distance) and "may" (vernacular, expressive of intimacy) symbolically encompasses the entire ideological architecture of the novel: artificial divinisation versus spontaneous humanity. It is worth noting that, in rendering this passage into Maithili, the translator faced the challenge of recreating the same linguistic and cultural hierarchy—the language of gods versus the language of ordinary people—within Maithili's own vocabulary. He succeeds in doing so.

Sumnima's vernacular speech is realistic, unvarnished and filled with human warmth; Somdatt's language becomes theoretical, scriptural and increasingly escapist in relation to lived reality. From a sociolinguistic perspective, language can construct power and hierarchy. In this narrative, the tension between everyday speech and divine language comes to signify social intimacy as against cultural distance.

Comparative Table of Linguistic Features

Linguistic Feature	Somdatt's Communicative Style (Arya)	Sumnima's Communicative Style (Kirat)
Type of Vocabulary	Sanskritised, formal and otherworldly ("mata," "Kapila mata," "atma-hanta")	Realistic, idiomatic and maternal ("may," "manuva," "babu")
Nature of Address	Idealistic and distancing ("O golden-faced maiden!" "Uncultured maiden!")	Intimate, direct and emotional ("Hey, patar-sutta!" "Somdatt!")
Emotional Expression	Repressed, concealed beneath an appearance of knowledge, devoid of	Unrestrained, playful and ironic ("How long will the Brahmins keep warmth	nursing their bile?")

Sociological Function of Language	Attempts to establish hierarchy and religious superiority	Seeks to establish equality, natural reality and humanity

12. Translation Theory: How Should We Read the Maithili Adaptation of Sumnima?

In his translator's note, Lal acknowledges the importance of sense-based translation (bhavanuvad) and the need for communicative fluency. This acknowledgement is particularly useful from the standpoint of translation theory, since the strategies observable in the target text substantiate it. The following theoretical approaches clarify the nature of his translation.

Literary Translation as a Creative Act

In his foreword, Pradip Giri advances an important proposition about translation: in some respects, literary translation is more creative than original writing. As an example, he cites Omar Khayyam's Rubaiyat, whose worldwide renown owes much to Edward FitzGerald's translation. This raises a central question in translation studies: is a translation merely the servant of its original, or can it become an independent creative work in its own right? Giri's proposition supports the second position.

Two Essential Qualities of a Translator

According to Giri, a successful translator must possess two indispensable qualities: first, the ability to understand the original work's inner meaning—its intention and spirit—and, second, a deep assimilation of the grace and beauty of the target language. Vrishesh Chandra Lal possesses both. As a follower of B. P. Koirala's political and intellectual legacy, he is familiar with the spirit of the original work; and because Maithili is his mother tongue, learned "in his mother's womb," his command of the target language comes naturally. Dr Shephalika Verma identifies this quality as bhavanuvad—meaning-centred translation sustained by an uninterrupted flow of communication—which she considers distinctly superior to word-for-word translation.

(a) Nida: Formal versus Dynamic Equivalence. In 1964, Eugene Nida drew a distinction between formal correspondence and dynamic equivalence. Dynamic equivalence seeks to produce a natural, comparable effect upon the target reader. The Maithili adaptation of Sumnima appears to favour the naturalness of the target language over strict word-for-word correspondence. Expressions such as "patar-sutta," Maithili verbal structures, forms of address and vernacular idioms suggest dynamic equivalence at work. The translator retains the cultural narrative of the source while reorganising its emotional pulse for the ear of a Maithili reader.

(b) Newmark: Semantic and Communicative Translation. Peter Newmark's semantic translation remains close to the source text's nuances of meaning and style, whereas communicative translation gives priority to clarity and reception by the target reader. This adaptation balances the two. Vedic terms, rituals, Kirati names and vocabulary associated with the hermitage indicate a semantic orientation; dialogue, domestic idiom and effortlessly expressed emotional situations reveal a communicative one. Such a mixed strategy is appropriate to literary translation: communication alone can erase the source's cultural strangeness, while exclusive fidelity to its linguistic forms can make the target prose stiff.

(c) Venuti: Domestication and the Preservation of Foreignness. In Lawrence Venuti's terminology, the translator engages simultaneously in "domestication" and the preservation of "foreignness." Maithili idioms, Madheshi vernacular words and familiar sentence rhythms domesticate the narrative: the text finds a home within Maithili. Yet "Kirati," "Kaushiki," "yajna," "brahmacharya," "Bhill," cultural rites and the central conflict are not dissolved into local Maithili substitutes. These retained features preserve an element of foreignness. Through this double strategy, the text neither loses its Nepali cultural identity altogether nor remains alien in its target language.

(d) Catford: Structural Shifts in Translation. Between Nepali and Maithili—closely related languages with distinct grammatical and social systems—shifts in word order, pronouns, case markers, verbs, honorifics, idioms and lexical choices are unavoidable. Maithili verbal forms such as "kaelak," "kahalaki," "bhelaik," "rahal" and "chhali," together with the system of address in the target text, exemplify the accommodation of source-language structures to target-language grammar. Without the complete source text, it is impossible to establish a definitive inventory of specific shifts. Nevertheless, the target text clearly takes on an independent Maithili grammatical form rather than mechanically reproducing Nepali constructions.

(e) Skopos: The Purpose of Translation. The publisher's material makes clear that the aim is not only to make a novel available but also to establish B. P. Koirala's work among Maithili readers and deepen multilingual literary dialogue in Nepal. According to Skopos theory, the translator's strategies are connected with the intended function of the translation. From this perspective, the adoption of Maithili forms, vernacular vocabulary and readability is not incidental; it belongs to the translator's social purpose.

(f) Bassnett and the Cultural Turn. Susan Bassnett's approach to translation studies moves beyond linguistic equivalence to emphasise culture, power, history and literary systems. This perspective makes the Maithili Sumnima particularly significant: it transfers a major Nepali writer into another extensive mother-tongue literary world within Nepal. Translation thus becomes a cultural redistribution. Which works are available in which languages, and which readers are allowed to participate in a national literature, are questions intimately connected with power.

(g) Toury: Norms of the Target Culture. Gideon Toury's descriptive approach regards translation as a practice that takes place within the "norms" of the target culture. This text accommodates both literary refinement and the sweetness of spoken Maithili. It is neither a dry, excessively standardised Maithili nor a rendering confined to a single local dialect. Instead, it develops a literary middle register for a broad Maithili readership.

Considered together, these theories suggest that Vrishesh Chandra Lal's strategy is oriented towards the communication of feeling, actively employs the target language and nevertheless preserves distinctive cultural residues. His voice as a translator is perceptible, but does not overpower the author's story.

Creative Transformation at the Level of Words

Lal's rendering of the Nepali words "dublo/patlo" as the Maithili "patar-sutta," and "roer" as "bhokasi parait kanait," demonstrates a high degree of creativity in translation. Furthermore, his precise use of distinctive Maithili verbal forms—such as "kahalkaik," "chhalaiki," "bajali" and "delkhin"—brings the characters' emotional states and gender distinctions vividly to life in Maithili.

13. The Achievements of Sense-Based Translation and Its Possible Risks

The principal advantage of bhavanuvad, or sense-based translation, is that the characters' emotions remain alive in the target language. Had Sumnima's lively speech retained the source language's sentence structure unchanged, it might have sounded artificial in Maithili. The translator avoids this danger by employing vernacular vocabulary and natural dialogue. Love, embarrassment, attachment, anger, agitation, maternal affection and irony are communicated with ease in the target text.

A second advantage is cultural proximity. The cultural regions of Mithila and Nepal have historically remained in contact; Vedic vocabulary, the cultural meanings of rivers and forests, and familial forms of address are not wholly unfamiliar to a Maithili reader. The translation draws upon this shared cultural capital.

The risk of sense-based translation, however, is "over-domestication." If highly localised target-language vocabulary obscures the distinctiveness of the source community, a reader may mistake the Kirati world for an extension of a Mithila village. In this edition, the preservation of most cultural names and symbols contains that risk, but it remains important to critical reading. In particular, the paratext's praise of "Madheshi words" itself signals a deliberate intensification of the target culture's flavour.

A second risk concerns the balance of registers in philosophical terminology. Somdatt's Sanskritised language suits his character, but excessive Sanskritisation may at times distance him so radically from Sumnima's accessible world that the ideological opposition hardens into a linguistic stereotype. A carefully edited edition could retain the contrasting registers while adding brief explanatory notes for rare terms.

A third risk is not the "invisibility" of the translator but the excessive visibility of the paratext. The publisher's note and forewords offer specific interpretations of nationhood, Madhesh, language politics and socialism that orient the reader along a particular interpretative path from the outset. Such material is historically valuable, but a future edition would better serve literary readers by separating the "Translator's Note" and "Critical Introduction" into clearly marked sections, allowing readers to engage independently with the novel's multiplicity of meanings.

The Translator's Sociopolitical Agency and Cultural Geography

A translator does not work in a vacuum; translation entails ideological agency. Vrishesh Chandra Lal is himself a politician of Madheshi origin and a democratic socialist thinker. For a long period in Nepal, the Khas language enjoyed dominance under King Mahendra's Panchayat-era policy of "one king, one country, one language, one dress," with the result that other languages were marginalised.

The decision to translate Sumnima is itself a cultural and political statement. In his foreword, Pradip Giri places particular emphasis on the irony that King Mahendra, who suppressed Nepal's linguistic diversity through the slogan "one king, one country, one language, one dress," himself had an element of Maithil ancestry—yet neither Mithila nor Kirat culture received state recognition during the Panchayat period. In this context, the translation of B. P. Koirala's work by a politician of Madheshi origin carries profound meaning: it is itself an attempt to construct an alternative understanding of nationality.

The foreword also recalls that the characters in B. P. Koirala's novels range across Kathmandu, Darbhanga, Barahakshetra and Bhagalpur—across the broader cultural region encompassing Nepal, Mithila and Bihar—testifying to the breadth of Koirala's geographical and cultural vision. Viewed against Mithila's tradition of scholarship (Mandan Mishra, Vachaspati Mishra and Vidyapati) and the historical political and cultural decline of Mithila after the Shah dynasty, this translation becomes a meaningful attempt to nurture national and cultural solidarity through literature.

By referring to the element of Maithil ancestry in King Mahendra, Pradip Giri highlights a linguistic and cultural irony: notwithstanding the historical reality of mixed ancestry, Mithila and Kirat culture failed to receive the recognition due to them during the Panchayat period. The Maithili translation is therefore directly bound up with questions of nationality, language and cultural coexistence.

14. Limitations of the Work and Critical Objections

Serious criticism cannot consist solely of praise. Sumnima possesses considerable creative power, but certain questions remain open. First is the essentialism of its cultural binary. The opposition Brahmin = soul/sky/scripture and Kirat = body/earth/nature is effective as metaphor, but it simplifies the internal diversity of actual ethnic communities. Contemporary ethnic studies would require this opposition to be examined more intricately in relation to historical structures of power.

Second is the symbolic treatment of women. Sumnima becomes a powerful symbol of nature and the body, and Puloma embodies the suffering of repression; nevertheless, the inner crisis of a male character remains the narrative's central philosophical axis. As a result, women sometimes appear to serve as instruments of a man's self-knowledge. The novel is not entirely free from this limitation, although Sumnima's independent moral choices and final social role strengthen her autonomy.

Third is the cultural translation of psychoanalysis. The novel's sexual and psychological structure is strikingly modern, but it is presented through Vedic and Kirati archetypes. Readers must not infer ethnographic facts about historical Kirati or Vedic societies from this mythic narrative. It is a literary metaphor, not a history textbook.

Fourth is the narrator's philosophical intervention. In this short novel, interrogative, essay-like passages occasionally interrupt the movement of the story. For many readers, they provide depth; for others, they impede narrative flow. This is a stylistic choice, not an unequivocal defect.

Fifth is the need for editorial work on the translated edition. Legacy fonts and encoding in the available PDF reduce the accessibility of the digital text. A future Unicode edition with searchable text, a glossary, an index of personal names, cultural notes and a clear account of the source edition would be invaluable. Such measures would increase both the longevity of this literary translation and its usefulness to researchers.

15. The Translator's Distinctive Achievements: Evaluation against Five Criteria

1. Readability — High. Maithili sentences flow naturally, and the dialogue is especially alive. Readers are not continually made conscious of reading a "translation."

2. Character Voice — Highly successful. The clear distinction between Somdatt's and Sumnima's registers establishes both character and philosophy. Puloma's speech also effectively expresses marital suffering, self-respect and anger.

3. Cultural Communication — Balanced. The Kirati and Vedic world of the source is preserved, while the language feels familiar to Maithili readers. Vernacular vocabulary increases the target culture's sense of proximity.

4. Aesthetic Re-creation — Successful. Descriptions of nature, bodily sensation, emotional dialogue and the rhythm of the epilogue produce a literary effect in Maithili. Pradip Giri's observation that the translation reads "like an original" captures this achievement: its language acquires a literary life of its own.

5. Research Value — Moderate to high, although editorial improvements are required. The text, foreword and publishing material are valuable; a future critical Unicode edition with word meanings, source references, translator's notes and a page index would be especially helpful for research.

16. Overall Literary Judgement

Sumnima, written by Vishweshwar Prasad Koirala, is not merely a storybook but an ideological battleground between Eastern and Western philosophies. Through Somdatt, the novel exposes the hollowness of spiritual hypocrisy, cultural dominance and repressed sexual attitudes; through Sumnima, it accords the highest value to nature, humanity and the genuine pleasures of life.

The fundamental strength of Sumnima lies in its questions, not its answers. It asks whether a human being can be redeemed by defeating the body; whether a culture destroys life in its efforts to preserve its own purity; whether love possesses a moral truth beyond ethnic boundaries, religion, patrilineage and scripture; whether nature opposes civilisation or remains the original memory that continually makes civilisation more humane; and, most importantly, whether we can learn something from the "other" instead of trying to reform them.

The work's answer is not linear. It would be easy to proclaim Somdatt's complete defeat and the complete triumph of Kirati life, but the epilogue disrupts this simplification. Sumnima herself teaches her daughter to understand the Brahmin young man's "flight"; although brought up in a Kirati household, the Brahmin youth turns towards memories of the hermitage. The two fall in love, yet their differences do not disappear. Instead, accommodation, sensitivity and mutual change create the possibility of living together. At this point, the novel becomes a work of pluralist humanism.

The Maithili adaptation gives this humanism an additional historical meaning. When a narrative that deconstructs cultural superiority moves from Nepali into Maithili, that very movement becomes a literary act against linguistic centralism. The strength of Vrishesh Chandra Lal's target text lies in its treatment of Maithili not merely as a vehicle but as a co-creative language. Through Maithili folk rhythms, forms of address, verbs, idioms and sensory vocabulary, Sumnima acquires a new linguistic body.

Judged according to translation theory, this adaptation successfully combines dynamic or effect-based equivalence, communicative fluency, selective domestication and preservation of cultural foreignness. The recreation of feeling, character voice and cultural tension takes precedence over literal correspondence. This accords with the translator's declared commitment to bhavanuvad. It would be academically inappropriate to pronounce a final judgement on fidelity without a direct line-by-line comparison with the source text. Nevertheless, the literary autonomy of the target text is unquestionably substantial.

Ultimately, Sumnima is a work whose plot may be understood on a first reading, but whose questions continue to unfold through repeated readings. Psychoanalysis offers one doorway; ethnic studies another; feminism a third; ecology a fourth; and translation studies a fifth. Entering through all these doorways, we encounter at the centre the "human being": neither pure soul nor merely body; neither tradition alone nor nature alone; neither merely an ethnic identity nor an individualistic desire. A human being comes into existence through relationships. From this perspective, Sumnima's enduring literary value lies less in its love story than in its philosophy of relationship.

The Symbolic Significance of the Final Lines

"Within the vast ocean of Kirati blood, a single drop no longer had any separate existence. The Koshi flowed unhindered, cutting through nature's immense silence."

These lines symbolise intermixture: claims to personal and ethnic purity cannot endure within the immense currents of nature. Living history advances through relationship, mixture and change.

17. Editorial Recommendations for Future Editions

Publish the entire text in Unicode Devanagari so that searching, quotation, e-book production and digital archiving become straightforward.

Add a glossary of rare Vedic, Kirati and regional expressions, approximately two to four pages long, without interrupting the original text's rhythm.

In a translator's note, briefly explain the source edition, textual policy, the treatment of names and terms, the selection of vernacular words and the principles of sense-based translation.

Place the critical introduction and political-cultural paratext in separate sections so that readers may first encounter the novel as an autonomous literary work.

For researchers, provide a chapter-by-chapter page guide, an index of personal names, an index of principal symbols and a selected bibliography of secondary works.

In a future comparative edition, print selected passages from the original Nepali and Maithili texts in facing columns. This would greatly enhance the academic value of the edition for translation studies.

Final Note

The lasting achievement of Sumnima is not that it declares the body victorious over the soul, or the Kirat over the Brahmin. Its enduring achievement is to dismantle the arrogance of purity and establish relationship, intermixture, compassion and mutual change as the future of humanity. The Maithili adaptation gives this insight a living linguistic body and its own vernacular rhythm.

Bibliography — Books Only

Koirala, Vishweshwar Prasad. Sumnima. Maithili adaptation by Vrishesh Chandra Lal. Kathmandu: Phoenix Books, first edition, B.S. 2078 (2021 CE).

Nida, Eugene A. Toward a Science of Translating. Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1964.

Catford, J. C. A Linguistic Theory of Translation: An Essay in Applied Linguistics. Oxford University Press, 1965.

Newmark, Peter. A Textbook of Translation. New York: Prentice-Hall International, 1988.

Venuti, Lawrence. The Translator's Invisibility: A History of Translation. Second edition. Routledge, 2008 (first edition 1995).

Bassnett, Susan. Translation Studies. Fourth edition. London/New York: Routledge, 2014.

Munday, Jeremy. Introducing Translation Studies: Theories and Applications. Fourth edition. Routledge, 2016.

Toury, Gideon. Descriptive Translation Studies—and Beyond. Revised edition. John Benjamins, 2012.

Nabokov, Vladimir. Lolita.

Verma, Bhagwati Charan. Chitralekha.

Rajneesh (Osho). Sambhog Se Samadhi Ki Or.

PART II / TOME VIII

A Parallel History of Mithila & Maithili Literature

Fiction, Social Realism and the Maithili Public Sphere

Gajendra Thakur · English translations from original Maithili by the author himself · Videha

CONTENTS

05 NIT NAVAL · Nand Kumar Mishra 'Nand'

06 NIT NAVAL · Kumar Pawan

07 NIT NAVAL · Ashish Anchinhar

STUDY 05 / NIT NAVAL

Nand Kumar Mishra ‘Nand’

Arrangement of the Book

Twelve critical studies of short fiction, novels, literary sketches, discursive prose, poetry and narratives for children are presented in four interconnected parts.

Part One — Folk Life, Fiction and Social Resistance

Gaam-Ghar

Aadambar

Part Two — Society, Women’s Identity and the Novel

Gudari Ke Lal

Anathiya Kukur

Sujata

Sukanya

Parivar

Part Three — Literary Sketches, Power and Mythic Reconsideration

Delhi Ke Park

Yachak Ke Nahi

Maharani Kaikeyi

Part Four — The Folk Currents of Song and Children’s Imagination

Kavya Sarita

Swarna Kamal

General Perspective

Nand’s Creative Practice and the Maithili Social Imagination

The creative world of Nand Kumar Mishra ‘Nand’ cannot be contained within a single genre, narrative technique or social question. Beginning with the fictional worlds of Gaam-Ghar and Aadambar, and extending through Gudari Ke Laal, Anathiya Kukur, Sujata, Sukanya and Parivar, his prose reflects upon equality, the reconstitution of family life, women’s dignity and the many forms of social justice. In Delhi Ke Park and Yachak Ke Nahi, discussion, memory and social satire assume different forms. Maharani Kaikeyi constructs a counter-position to the accepted moral judgement of a familiar narrative; Kavya Sarita opens up a broad terrain of song and folk melody; and Swarna-Kamal brings children’s imagination, folktale and a sense of justice into a single imaginative framework.

Running through this diversity is a central tension between the unequal organisation of society and individual moral judgement. Village life is not merely an idyllic recollection here. Cultivation, unpaid compulsory labour, memorial feasts, caste, dowry, property disputes, bureaucratic structures and the dignity of public office all appear, in varying degrees, as forms of social power. Impelled by a reformist commitment, the storyteller sometimes advances an explicit argument and at other times demonstrates its consequences through the everyday conduct of characters. The tension between these two modes provides a basis for understanding both the strengths and the limitations of his literary craft.

In the social narratives addressed to mature readers, the interrelationships of class and caste frequently emerge through satire, dialogue and public events. In Gudari Ke Laal, the experience of a labouring family and questions of educational justice come into conflict with feudal dominance. Anathiya Kukur brings the differing mentalities of village and city into relation. Sujata and Sukanya consider women's right to make decisions within institutional circumstances shaped by marriage, widowhood, family and the workplace. Parivar seeks the meaning of a shared life through memory. These works enter into conversation with one another through their social concerns, although each possesses a distinct artistic form and configuration of characters.

Nand's social consciousness is active not only in identifying problems but also in imagining solutions. He regards education as a route to dignity and opportunity, justice as a public value, women's self-determination as a moral necessity, and familial cooperation as a social force. Yet literary criticism must also ask how naturally these idealistic solutions emerge from the narrative's internal development. When a protagonist or moral spokesman effortlessly unties a complex social knot, how much of the resistance encountered in lived experience does the story retain? To raise this question is not to disparage the writer's social purpose; it is to examine the artistic achievement of the work.

Delhi Ke Park and Yachak Ke Nahi mark a significant turn in this collection of criticism. In the former, a public garden becomes a forum for the exchange of experiences, allowing the memory of the village and the life of urban citizenship to enter into dialogue. In the latter, an expansion of the ethical meaning of 'supplication' challenges the distinction society creates between a beggar and a socially esteemed recipient of benefits. Here the clash of ideas, the rhythm of dialogue and the edge of satire become more important than the movement of plot.

Maharani Kaikeyi re-examines the established attribution of blame to a mythological character. The reinterpretation of myth becomes significant as literature when it places a familiar figure at the centre of new questions. Nevertheless, ethical reassessment and historical evidence are not identical; an alternative interpretation must be tested against reason and internal contradictions. For this reason, the work has been placed not among the social novels but in a separate part devoted to idea-centred prose.

As poetry, Kavya Sarita is a many-stranded current of invocations, devotional hymns, nachari songs, folk songs, social satire, awareness of the mother tongue and familial feeling. Swarna-Kamal offers another expression of this folk experience: a grandmother's storytelling, children's curiosity, a journey through the forest, marvels, and questions of justice and forgiveness. It is essential to recognise its independent generic status as a children's novel. The presence of instruction or moral exhortation in works for adults does not in itself make those works children's literature. Distinctions of subject, narrative perspective, complexity of experience and the age of the intended readership must be preserved.

The four parts of this book reveal these interrelationships between genre and ideas. Part One concentrates on shorter social narratives; Part Two on extended social novels; Part Three on literary sketches and idea-centred prose; and Part Four on poetry and children's narrative. Each discussion begins with the work's own characters, composition and linguistic techniques, before opening out into wider literary, social and comparative meanings. This arrangement does not pronounce the writer's varied works uniform; rather, it clarifies how a common ethical commitment operates within different creative methods.

Part One

Folk Life, Fiction and Social Resistance

Gaam-Ghar · Aadambar

Chapter 1

Gaam-Ghar

The Moral Economy of Village Life, Social Satire and Models of Narrative for Children

Nand Kumar Mishra's Gaam-Ghar (A Collection of Maithili Stories and Essays) draws upon rural experience to interrogate social inequality, extravagant expenditure on death rituals, caste hierarchy, women's participation in public life, marriage and dowry, religious ostentation, electoral self-interest and various forms of exploitation. The fifteen pieces in the collection do not belong to a single literary genre: the earlier stories remain close to rural realism and dialogue; in the middle section, social and political reflection enters the narrative structure; and in the concluding pieces, Unta Chaali, Ghodi Ke Anda and Sher Ke Aatank, parable, humour and animal allegory acquire greater prominence. This essay undertakes textual analysis on the basis of the original book's contents, preliminary statements, printed texts and underlying critical themes. In the comparative context of Maithili children's literature, the significance of this work does not lie simply in its being 'children's stories'; rather, the writer constructs a literary bridge from adult social satire to parables accessible to children. Nevertheless, lengthy didactic passages, limited psychological development of characters and an occasionally simplistic idealisation of solutions constitute artistic limitations. The historical discussion draws on a comparative framework involving the Sahitya Akademi's publication records, lists of children's literature awards and policy documents concerning school reading in India.

Introduction: The Collection's Literary Position and the Questions of Criticism

The title Gaam-Ghar draws the reader into the familiar world of a particular place, but the concerns of the collection are not confined within the boundaries of the village. For the author, the village is a field of social experiment in which custom, prestige, money, familial expectations, religion, power and justice collide. He generates social questions out of events that appear ordinary on the surface: At what point does a feast held for the dead cease to express reverence and become a display of status? What meaning does the worship of a banyan tree acquire between environmental concern and religious orthodoxy? What are the actual obstacles to women's leadership in the village panchayat? How far apart are the language of democracy and the practice of power?

The work bears the subtitle 'A Collection of Maithili Stories and Essays'. To regard it as an exclusively children's story collection would therefore be a mistake of genre classification. Narrative episodes are combined with reflective prose; this mixture intensifies the author's social intervention, although at times the story itself becomes a vehicle for the essay. In the author's 'A Few Words', superstition in village life, caste discrimination, social malpractices and intrigue are identified as the work's creative concerns. In his opening message of goodwill, Narendra Jha discusses the stories' satirical quality, the social implications of Shankar Ke Khoj and the child-oriented character of the final two pieces. Read alongside the text, these two paratexts reveal the collection's internal organisation.

The purpose of this essay is not to decide whether every episode meets all the criteria of the modern short story. The central question, instead, is where the desire for social reform succeeds in taking the form of literary scene, dialogue and event, and where it remains an explicit declaration of ideas. The history of children's literature provides a comparative criterion for this assessment; it does not justify a mistaken generic classification of the entire work.

The Work and the Sequence of Its Contents

The cover prints the title Gaam-Ghar, identifies the genre as 'A Collection of Maithili Stories and Essays', and names 'Nand Kumar Mishra' as the author. The opening publication details mention Mrs Amal Devi and Mrs Shanta Bhushan (Bhikhanpur, Bhagalpur), while the printing credit names Asha Printing Press, Tilkamanjhi, Bhagalpur. The author's 'A Few Words' is dated 26 November 2004; this is the date of the author's note, not necessarily the book's year of publication. The back cover refers to the author's previously published Vidyarthi, dated 25 April 2004. It would therefore be inappropriate to infer a definitive year of publication for Gaam-Ghar from those dates.

The original table of contents lists fifteen pieces, extending from printed story-page 1 to page 99. Their sequence and page ranges are presented below.

This arrangement also makes clear that the final three pieces are particularly parabolic in character.

No.	Work	Printed Pages
1	Baba Ke Bhoj	1–7
2	Dabdabaael Aankhi	8–14
3	Bhor Ke Sapna	15–22
4	Bar Ke Gaachh	23–28
5	But Ke Saag	29–36
6	Shankar Ke Khoj	37–47
7	Fekani Mai	48–55
8	Kodh	56–63
9	Chakra-Chaali	64–69
10	Swabhiman	70–76
11	Loot-Tantra	77–81
12	Dand	82–86
13	Unta Chaali	87–90
14	Ghodi Ke Anda	91–94
15	Sher Ke Aatank	95–99

A Narrative-Centred Perspective: Village, Family, Religion and Power

In this collection the ‘village’ is not an unchanging or untroubled cultural unit. Expenditure increases through competition with neighbours; the farmer’s means of livelihood are consumed in displays of prestige; caste-based distance survives under the cover of religious observance; women seek entry into public decision-making; and politics poisons village relationships. The writer represents economic inequality not merely as a difference in income, but as an unequal distribution of status and authority in social conduct. From this perspective, the collection’s central concern may be called a ‘moral economy’: how society spends money, which expenditures it treats as marks of prestige, and upon whom the burden of such spending falls.

The narrator generally describes a social situation before recounting an incident, and then illustrates it through a family, a character or a conversation. The reader is thus immediately introduced to the issue. Yet this structure often becomes a pattern of narrative indication, development of the episode and a predetermined conclusion. Characters are left with little freedom of action. The result is a book accessible as a form of public education, but uneven in its achievement when measured against the demands of deeper psychological exploration.

Individual Textual Analyses of the Fifteen Pieces

‘Baba Ke Bhoj’: Death Rituals and Social Display

The story opens with news of Feku Baba’s death, and the village community’s response supplies its narrative background. From the beginning, indications are given of the deceased man’s family standing, resources and social prestige. In the closing section, the reader encounters the lavish organisation of a shraddha feast, its abundant dishes, the influx of outsiders, disorder and the dissipation of wealth. The contrast between outward splendour and underlying waste forms the centre of the story’s satire.

What matters is that the feast does not remain merely a family occasion: invisible social pressure determines its scale. The story asks whether expenditure incurred in imitation of others honours the dead or expresses the living family’s competition for prestige. The author’s direct commentary sometimes diminishes the subtlety of the implicit satire, but the descriptive scenes clearly expose the social psychology of pointless expenditure.

‘Dabdabaael Aankhi’: Memory, Generations and Changing Customs

The narrator introduces the episode by recalling familiar customs in the village of an earlier time. The comparison between relationships associated with Lal Bhaiya and changes in conduct forms the emotional foundation of the story. The tear-filled eyes of the title are not merely a decorative symbol of pathos; they indicate the moral distance between memory and the present. On one side is the remembrance of former intimacy and communal attachment; on the other, distrust and distress at new forms of social behaviour.

The writer’s narrative method is grounded in memory. The danger of idealising the past is present here: one cannot unconditionally accept that the earlier social order was itself egalitarian. Nevertheless, the story’s essential sensibility is that social change should be evaluated not only through outward conveniences or material advancement, but also through mutual respect and emotional responsibility.

‘Bhor Ke Sapna’: Caste, Worship and Imagined Social Equality

The piece begins by discussing the uncertain reliability of a dream seen at dawn. An episode involving the participation of the community in a village Brahm worship raises the problem of caste distance. The literary device of the ‘dream’ allows the writer to imagine a scene of equality that would encounter formidable barriers in waking social reality. The dream is therefore not an escape, but a counterfactual means of criticising the present.

Toward its close, the narrative points to cooperative community efforts by local people, including education and a reading room. This offers a positive vision of transformation, but the difficulties of putting it into practice are explored less fully. Here the author places a discussion of the problem beside a proposal for an ideal society.

'Bar Ke Gaachh': Folk Belief, Nature and Environmental Responsibility

The banyan tree is more than an ordinary plant within the narrative setting: it is a centre of religious vows, worship, shade, rest, the Barsait observance and village sociability. At first the writer describes the tree's social and religious uses; later the idea of conservation and collective participation emerges. Through this duality, the tree becomes not simply a religious symbol but a public space within everyday communal life.

One achievement of the story is that it does not reject tradition outright; instead, it seeks out its social and ecological usefulness. Its limitation is that a more sustained examination of the relationship between religious observance and the protection of trees would have strengthened the argument. Even so, the social scenes around the tree meaningfully recall the shared cultural geography of village life.

'But Ke Saag': Education, Marriage and a Woman's Choices

In this story, the central problem is the pressure to marry exerted upon a young woman who wants to continue her studies. Her mother's wishes, public opinion and the possibility of her education remaining unfinished are closely intertwined. Later episodes involving Shalini and the decision about marriage lead the reader from an ordinary domestic question to the larger issue of a woman's self-determination and dignity.

The title 'But Ke Saag' has an appeal rooted in its rural domestic familiarity, but the story's actual debate centres on education, the timing of marriage and the right to decide. The writer criticises traditions hostile to education. From a critical perspective, the complexity of women's experience and their independent personhood might have been developed further had the character been given greater room for inward reflection. The case for change is clear, but the breadth of perspective remains limited.

'Shankar Ke Khoj': From Mythological Narrative to Class and Political Questions

The work begins with the mythological episode of the churning of the ocean and proceeds to the figure of Shankar, who drinks the poison. It then turns towards the poisons of modern society: corruption, plunder, economic inequality, injustice at work, the exploitation of labourers and the disorders of democratic institutions. Here Shankar is not an inert divine solution but a demand for collective moral courage and self-examination.

The work's form approaches modern essayistic satire. The mythological opening activates the reader's memory, but the widening discussion in the middle and final sections weakens its concentration as a short narrative. Nevertheless, the writer's important proposition is that change calls not simply for an external saviour but for responsible individuals acting within society. In this piece, a concern with national social life beyond the boundaries of the village is most clearly expressed.

‘Fekani Mai’: Women’s Leadership and the Democratic Possibilities of the Panchayat

The story opens with a portrayal of Fekani Mai’s poverty, labour and conduct within ordinary social life. Against the background of domestic deprivation and difficulty in earning a living, the idea arises of advancing her towards leadership in the village panchayat. The story does not leave Fekani Mai as an object of pity; it transforms the trust she commands, her familiarity to local people and community support into sources of political strength. Educated and ordinary villagers together wish to bring a neglected woman into public office.

The particular significance of this episode lies in its attempt to give the language of democracy concrete form within a living village community. Yet the struggle becomes relatively straightforward: obstacles embedded in the structure of power, contradictions of caste and class, the complexities of electoral competition and the administrative questions that follow election are not developed in detail. Even so, this is one of the collection’s principal affirmative stories, because a change in women’s social position occupies its centre.

‘Kodh’: Dowry, Debt and the Erosion of Family Ethics

The story concerns preparations for a marriage and the economic expectations of a family. Through Kamlesh, the proposed marriage, an auspicious occasion and financial pressure, the social harm caused by dowry comes into view. Dowry is represented not merely as the exchange of material goods, but as an affront to trust and a devaluation of relationships. ‘Kodh’, or ‘leprosy’, is an ethical metaphor in the title: it is social greed rather than a person that is marked out as diseased.

The story conveys how the dignity of marriage is corrupted by the logic of transactions. The experience would have acquired greater density if the characters’ embarrassment, fear and inner conflict arising from financial compulsion had received more attention than the didactic conclusion. Nevertheless, the argument against dowry is tied to concrete circumstances of rural life.

‘Chakra-Chaali’: Rural Politics and Community Division

At the outset the writer distinguishes the politics of the capital from the politics of village life. Factionalism, mutual hostility, competing rituals and the politics of collective celebrations provide the principal material for this essayistic narrative. Through an episode involving the organisation of a navah religious observance in 1999, the writer shows that communal worship, too, can become a contest for prestige and group dominance.

The narrator recounts an incident in which his own community suffered humiliation; this autobiographical register makes the criticism more subjective, but also more immediate. One limitation of Chakra-Chaali is that the different aspects of local struggles for power do not emerge with equal complexity; the author’s moral position remains unmistakable. Nevertheless, the work shows that social disintegration is not merely a consequence of 'high politics'; it operates in the everyday conduct of village life as well.

'Swabhiman': The Dignity of the Ordinary Citizen versus the Authority of High Office

The piece begins as a conversation with an acquaintance. Inequalities in the conduct of officials, police officers, members of the medical profession and ordinary individuals enter the narrative. An incident involving Nishad Babu elucidates the idea of self-respect: honour does not arise merely from rank, property or obedience to commands issued by others, but from the experience of one's own dignity.

The oral mode of narration is effective here: the narrator recounts an incident and directs the reader's attention towards the self-respect of a figure resembling a protagonist. Although the solution depends upon the generous and resolute conduct of one particular individual, the work intervenes firmly on behalf of the dignity of ordinary people.

'Loot-Tantra': The Linguistic Irony of Democracy

The title itself constitutes sharp satire: 'Loot-Tantra' ('rule by plunder') in place of 'Lok-Tantra' ('democracy') expresses the distance between power and the people's rights. Beginning with a recollection of Gandhian independence, the work criticises voting practices, crime, corruption, arbitrary administration and caste-based political division. Its structure is relatively explicitly essayistic: it contains less plot and a more sustained sequence of ethical and political argument.

The writer regards the vote as more than a formal entitlement: it is an instrument of public accountability. The work is important as evidence of the political consciousness of its time; nevertheless, political claims should be read as the writer's contemporary critical perspective rather than as established historical facts. Its language is one of vehement moral dissent, not of a balanced political survey.

'Dand': The Display of Religious Merit and Moral Justice

Through the contrasting dispositions of Sonu Jha and Monu Jha, the story raises the distinction between the external performance of religion and genuine compassion. One character is straightforward, helpful and generous; the other combines religious ostentation with self-centred conduct. At the end, the idea of 'punishment' signifies not a narrative of direct retaliation but an awareness of moral and spiritual consequences.

The arrangement of two contrasting characters is a familiar device of the folk parable, in which human complexity is reduced in order to make the underlying lesson clear. To an extent the piece may be regarded as close to the moral narrative suitable for children; its conception of justice, however, is intertwined with religious and ethical beliefs rather than with questions of scientific verification.

‘Unta Chaali’: Deception, a Pundit’s Simplicity and a Cautionary Parable

The story begins by introducing a pundit who is learned but ingenuous in practical affairs. Some swindlers exploit his trusting disposition, social standing and momentary lack of caution. The sequence of events exposes the difference between reputed intelligence and genuine practical judgement. The title Unta Chaali suggests both dishonest manoeuvring and a reversal of circumstances.

Drawing upon a familiar motif of deception in folktales, the story offers both humour and a lesson in caution. Its attraction for young readers lies in the reversal of events. Yet the author simplifies both the social characterisation and the moral conclusion; it is more appropriate to regard such a work as an amusing piece of public instruction than as a direct document of social reality.

‘Ghodi Ke Anda’: Trading in an Impossible Object and the Fraud of Credulity

The story moves forward through the humorous interaction of a mischievous boy named Maturwa and an elderly man. The impossible notion of a ‘mare’s egg’ brings gullible belief into collision with cunning commercial intent. The reader knows from the beginning that such an egg cannot exist; rather than curiosity about ‘what will happen?’, the narrative arouses an interest in ‘how is trust exploited?’

Towards the end, the community discusses exposing the deceit and the theme of caution on the part of the buyer emerges. From the standpoint of children’s literature, this is one of the collection’s most natural stories: the plot is brief, its central object intriguing, the dialogue clear and the humour spontaneous. Nevertheless, the intensity of its satire and the language of punishment may occasionally require sensitive reconsideration in relation to a child’s imagination.

‘Sher Ke Aatank’: Despotic Power in an Animal Allegory

In a dense forest, relations between the lion and the other animals are determined by an imbalance of power. Terrorised by the oppressive lion, the creatures consider a collective remedy; the story proceeds to develop an allegory of elections, parties, voting and change of government. The animal setting engages the reader, but its political implications are directly connected with a critique of power struggles in adult society.

The story brings together the folk-tale fable and political satire with considerable success. Young readers can engage with the animal characters, while mature readers can discern a structural critique of corrupt leadership. The possibility that despotic power may return in another guise raises a difficult moral question: does replacing the ruler alone end exploitation, or is institutional vigilance also necessary? This open political implication gives the story a powerful position at the end of the collection.

Brief Quotations from the Original Text: Linguistic Evidence and Critical Significance

The quotations below follow the page numbers printed in the original book. Each is restricted to clearly legible wording at the relevant location; no reconstructed, conjectural or doubtful readings are quoted here. The observation following each quotation is a critical interpretation, not part of the original text.

1. "We learned that Feku Baba had passed away." — 'Baba Ke Bhoj', p. 1

A notice of death initiates a communal social drama; not an extraordinary event, but ordinary village news, opens the way to satire.

2. "People say that a dream seen at dawn comes true, but I did not believe it." — 'Bhor Ke Sapna', p. 15

The question of the dream's truth brings the narrator's scepticism and the inequalities of social reality into view at once.

3. "But the banyan tree has a significance of its own." — 'Bar Ke Gaachh', p. 23

This brief sentence contains the tree's communal significance in folk life, extending beyond its biological existence.

4. "There was a pundit. He was an exceptionally learned scholar and also a practitioner of religious rituals." — 'Unta Chaali', p. 87

The opening dramatic irony of the deception story centres on the difference between an individual's scholarship and practical judgement.

5. "This is a mare's egg." — 'Ghodi Ke Anda', p. 91

The humour of an impossible claim establishes the central relationship between belief and deception in the narrative.

6. "There was a very large and dense forest." — 'Sher Ke Aatank', p. 95

The creation of a folk-tale setting introduces the political animal allegory.

The quotations have deliberately been kept brief. The complete contexts are presented through interpretation rather than by reproducing extended passages of the source text. This maintains a clear distinction between the author's linguistic voice, references to printed pages and critical discussion.

Language, Orality, Narrative Craft and Aesthetic Sensibility

The collection's dominant style combines direct address with a linguistic rhythm close to everyday speech. Constructions such as 'I saw', 'although', 'but' and 'whereas' keep the narrator in conversation with the reader. Familiar proverbial assertions, the vocabulary of rural economic dealings, descriptions of feasting, panchayat elections and domestic courtyards combine to make local experience credible. Because of this accessibility, the stories never feel remote even when the social questions are complex.

Structurally, the relative proportions of incident, memory, domestic conversation and communal conduct vary across the first six or seven pieces. The dominance of the essay is apparent in Shankar Ke Khoj and Loot-Tantra; the sequence of events and ironic reversals occupy the centre in Unta Chaali and Ghodi Ke Anda; and Sher Ke Aatank conveys a political message through animal allegory. Rather than treating this variety as only a weakness, it may be read as a credible sign of the book's own generic designation as 'stories and essays'.

The moral pronouncements of the works frequently reduce the reader's freedom to discover meaning. Ambiguity of character, psychological conflict, symbols with multiple meanings and uncertain endings—the resources of modern narrative aesthetics—are employed only to a limited extent. Even so, the practical energy of the satire is remarkable: the writer builds a critique of social institutions from minor incidents and compels the reader in many stories to reflect upon human conduct.

The Work's Place in the History of Maithili Children's Literature: A Comparative Study

Folktale, Readership and the Question of Genre

In writing a history of children's literature, the first distinction to remember is that not every work which can be read to a child was necessarily written for children. Folk narratives, animal parables, moral tales and social satire are closely related, but differ in the age and experience of their readers, their language, narrative complexity and original purposes. Gaam-Ghar is a transitional collection in this sense. Baba Ke Bhoj, Kodh, Swabhiman and Loot-Tantra raise economic and institutional questions belonging to adult social life. The readily comprehensible humour and allegorical character of Unta Chaali, Ghodi Ke Anda and Sher Ke Aatank make them more accessible to young readers.

The opening message of goodwill in the published book confirms this distinction: it points to the child-oriented qualities of some of the concluding pieces, without seeking to label the whole book a collection for children. Its proper place in literary history is within Maithili social satire, as a narrative terrain from which forms of parable suitable for children emerge.

From Multilingual Reading for Children in the 1990s to Local Stories

The Sahitya Akademi's list of Maithili publications indicates that, from the 1990s onward, both original Maithili stories and translations from other languages were made available to child readers. Publication records include, for example, Sureshwar Jha's translation of Jayant Narlikar's science fiction as Antariksh Mein Visphot (1996); Uday Narayan Singh 'Nachiketa's translation of Rabindranath Ka Bal Sahitya (1997); a translation of Leelavati Bhagwat's Marathi story Jungle Mein Ek Raat (1998); and the original Maithili story selection Katha Kisalay, edited by Chandranath Mishra 'Amar' (1999). The list also includes O Baba: Ki Baua (translated by Govind Jha, 2000), from an Assamese story by Lakshminath Bezbarua.

These publication records support a limited but definite conclusion: science, translated folktales, Rabindranath Tagore's literature and original Maithili writing were being developed concurrently for young Maithili readers. Comparison with the final narratives in Gaam-Ghar shows that Mishra's child-accessible stories are connected less with science-based curiosity than with the traditions of folk parable, moral inquiry and social satire. The comparison rests on publication dates and genre classifications; this essay does not claim to offer a direct comparative reading of the complete texts of all the works cited above.

2010–2025: The Expansion of Recognised Genres in Children's Literature

The Sahitya Akademi's official list of Maithili Bal Sahitya Puraskar recipients for 2010–2025 demonstrates the generic diversity of children's literature. It records Taranand Viyogi's Ee Bhetal Tan Ki Bhetal (stories, 2010); Mayanath Jha's Jakar Nari Chatur Hoi (stories, 2011); Murlidhar Jha's Pilpilaha Gaachh (stories, 2012); Dhirendra Kumar Jha's Hamra Beech Vigyan (essays, 2013); Jivakant's Hamar Athanni Khasalai Van Me (poetry, 2014); Ramdev Jha's Hansani Paan Aa Bajanta Supari (novel, 2015); Amlendu Shekhar Pathak's Lalgaachhi (novel, 2017); Vaidyanath Jha's Khissa Sunu Bau (stories, 2018); and Rishi Vashishtha's Ee Phoolak Guldasta (stories, 2019).

The later entries include poetry by Siyaram Jha 'Saras' in 2020; poems by Anmol Jha in 2021; Virendra Jha's Udan-Chhu (stories, 2022); Akshay Anand 'Sunny's poetry collection Ol Katra, Jhol Katra (2023); Narayanji's Anar (2024); and Munni Kamat's Chukka (2025). This official roster establishes only that stories, poems, novels, biographies and scientific essays have become recognised fields of literary work for children. It would be inappropriate to regard an award list as the complete history of children's literature, the sole measure of quality or evidence that unlisted works do not exist.

Gaam-Ghar offers a distinctive bridge from an earlier social sensibility to this later institutional landscape: adult social reflection and child-accessible parable coexist in a single collection. Ghodi Ke Anda is readily suitable for young readers because of its humour, whereas the electoral allegory of Sher Ke Aatank may be more meaningful for an older age group or with the mediation of a teacher. Such a distinction should be understood not as a permanent rule about age categories but as a considered suggestion concerning the work's use by readers.

Mother Tongue, Illustration and Local Experience: Educational Criteria

The National Curriculum Framework for the Foundational Stage (2022) emphasises stories and songs connected with local culture, reading materials in the mother tongue, selection of narratives appropriate to age, picture-supported reading and respect for diverse speech varieties. By these policy criteria, the familiar village language and folk parables of Gaam-Ghar could serve as useful material; its printed form, however, consists primarily of extended prose, not an illustrated book for beginning readers. Selected stories, assistance with difficult words, visual presentation, questions following dialogue and editorial adaptation for different age groups might be needed for child readers.

For example, a short dramatic adaptation of Ghodi Ke Anda could help readers understand the distinction between rumour and evidence. Sher Ke Aatank could form a basis for discussion of democracy, majority rule and civic responsibility. Fekani Mai could make possible a discussion of gender equality and village government in the higher classes. These proposals should be understood as new educational uses, distinct from the meanings of the original works, and not as teaching devices devised by the author.

Overall Assessment: Achievements, Contradictions and Critical Limitations

The work's principal achievement lies in identifying social wrongs in accessible Maithili and converting them, through narrative situations, into matters for public debate. The prestige accorded to expenditure in Baba Ke Bhoj, the vision of eliminating caste divisions in Bhor Ke Sapna, the conflict between marriage and education in But Ke Saag, women's leadership in Fekani Mai, the critique of dowry in Kodh, the irony of democracy in Loot-Tantra and the symbolic representation of autocratic rule in Sher Ke Aatank form a sequence of related ethical questions. The writer's social commitment is a constant presence across these pieces.

A second achievement is the blending of genres. Short fiction, recollective narration, social essays, religious parables, folk humour and animal stories coexist within the collection. This variety permits different groups of readers to approach the book. In the final three pieces in particular, local conversation and customary humour comment indirectly on the social order.

The limitations are equally evident. At numerous points the narrator announces a conclusion before the event unfolds; consequently the autonomy of the characters is restricted and narrative suspense diminished. Solutions to social problems sometimes depend excessively on the goodwill of exemplary characters or on unanimous community agreement. Although women are represented sympathetically, their inner experiences receive relatively little fine-grained exploration. In political commentary, sharp satire at times overwhelms the consideration of multiple perspectives. For these reasons it is more accurate to describe the collection as a narrative intervention in society than as a work of theoretical narrative.

The local publication details, dedication, message of goodwill and intimate 'A Few Words' in the printed book testify to its cultural setting. The work is not simply a sum of separate stories; it is an organised expression of a writer's ethically engaged social consciousness. In determining its place in literary history, therefore, equal importance must be given to regional experience and artistic form.

Conclusion

Nand Kumar Mishra's Gaam-Ghar centres on a point in Mithila's social life at which tradition, a modern awareness of rights and communal ethics remain in continuous negotiation. While retaining their local colour, the stories engage with social problems of national significance. The writer takes an unequivocal position against the suffering of others, waste, plunder, discrimination and injustice; this clarity invites readers in many passages to reflect directly upon the issues presented.

From the standpoint of children's literature, the collection's place must be determined with particular care. Gaam-Ghar as a whole is not children's literature, although it contains powerful elements of parable accessible to children. The discernment needed to recognise deception in Unta Chaali, the humorous impossibility of the claim in Ghodi Ke Anda, and the animal politics of Sher Ke Aatank offer distinct possibilities for children's reading, higher school classes and adult criticism. To regard Gaam-Ghar as a bridge between Maithili rural social satire and folk-based narrative forms for children is therefore a balanced literary assessment of its achievement.

Chapter 2

Aadambar

Folk Life, Social Hypocrisy and the Narrative Structure of Resistance

Nand Kumar Mishra 'Nand's Aadambar (2017) is a collection of twenty Maithili stories centred on questions of village society in Mithila, family relationships, the prestige attached to shraddha feasts, caste inequality, electoral politics, education, labour, property, religious belief and public morality. The title story reveals the psychology of social display; other stories, including 'Aarakshan', 'Loktantra', 'Etek Jaati Kiek?' and 'Rail-Yatra', take the form of debates about equality and institutional conduct. 'Begaar' portrays class dependence, 'Laash' the conflict between property and familial self-interest, 'Kavik Jingi' the social position of the creative writer, and 'Jaani Ka Besahab' the moral conflict between the accumulation of wealth and philanthropy. This study follows the sequence and page ranges of all twenty stories as given in the printed contents and undertakes separate textual analyses, an assessment of themes and techniques, an examination of linguistic form and critical limitations, and a generic comparison with the historical field of Maithili children's literature. While preserving the distinction between the source book's social fiction and literature consciously addressed to children and adolescents, the essay argues that Aadambar is distinguished by its initiation of public discussion in the vernacular on contentious issues. Its limitation lies in the excessive extension of direct moral instruction within some of the stories.

Introduction: The Irony of the Title and the Character of the Collection

The word 'aadambar' evokes outward display, a craving for prestige and ostentatious values divorced from actual conduct. The collection's title, however, goes beyond this immediate meaning. Reading the twenty stories makes the word a commentary upon internal contradictions within social institutions: occasions of religious observance become substitutes for compassion; elections lose their connection with justice; education confronts the uncertainties of employment; and the accumulation of wealth causes social responsibility to be forgotten. The fictional world is populated not primarily by privileged metropolitan protagonists, but by village farmers, teachers, dependent labourers, impoverished families, political aspirants, poets, relatives and people engaged in village conversation.

Humour is frequently the surface layer of these stories; beneath it run insecurity, inequality, humiliation and the struggle for self-preservation. The satirical storyteller seeks to lead the reader towards a conclusion, but this raises a persistent question: is literary fiction merely a forum for debate, or can it also create an autonomous artistic experience through the distinctive circumstances of its characters' lives? Both the achievement and the limitation of the collection reside in this tension.

According to the book's printed publication details, the first edition appeared in 2017 from Gosauni Baidyanath Smriti Manch, Uparadaha, Darbhanga, at a stated price of 150 rupees. Its story pages are numbered 1 to 160. Both the cover and the internal presentation identify the author as Nand Kumar Mishra 'Nand'. The introductory 'A Few Words' and 'Author's Note' are followed by a list of twenty stories with their printed page references. These details matter to the present criticism because they identify the work as an independent short-story collection, not a compilation of children's stories or a children's novel.

The Collection's Outline and Sequence of Stories

The primary text for this discussion is the printed 2017 edition of Aadambar. Story titles and opening pages have been checked against its contents; page references given where relevant refer to the printed story pages. Discussion of narrative substance emphasises the relationships among character, episode, dialogue, ending and narrative style. The object of textual analysis is not merely to repeat the author's purported 'message', but to examine narrative tension, authorial intervention, social circumstances and creative resolution.

Only short quotations that are clearly legible and can be confirmed verbatim have been used. Where the precise order of letters could not be established with certainty, the subject matter has been analysed through indirect description. An extended account of a story must therefore not be treated as a substitute for its original text. Videha's lists of books, children's literature, prose and parallel literary history furnish comparative references; the mere appearance of a book in a list does not prove that its full contents have been read. Accordingly, the comparative sections distinguish between different levels of evidence.

Sequence of Stories and Their Printed Page Ranges

No.	Story	Printed Pages
1	Aadambar	1–6
2	Ropal Gaachh Babur	7–15
3	Pashchatap	16–23
4	Ojha Lekhen Gaam Bataah	24–28

No.	Story	Printed Pages
5	Aarakshan	29–36
6	Loktantra	37–46
7	Rail-Yatra	47–52
8	Etek Jaati Kiek?	53–65
9	Laash	66–76
10	Heart Attack	77–84
11	Begaar	85–91
12	Pari-Katha	92–103
13	Kukuruk Naangari	104–113
14	Lati	114–123
15	Kavik Jingi	124–132
16	Udyan	133–137
17	Narak Ke Yatra	138–144
18	Sanket	145–150
19	Arajal Bhog	151–155
20	Jaani Ka Besahab	156–160

Source: Nand Kumar Mishra ‘Nand’, Aadambar, sequence of stories. The final page of each story has been determined from the beginning of the next and from the last story page, 160.

The Collection’s Narrative Outlook: Folk Life, Dialogue and Satire

The fictional territory of Aadambar may be understood through three interwoven spheres. The first encompasses family and social conduct in the village, giving rise to questions of shraddha, food, prestige, illness, kinship, marriage and death. The second consists of public institutions, bringing in experiences of reservation policy, elections, caste, education, rail travel and salaried occupations. The third is the sphere of parable and moral imagination, in which fairy tales, journeys through hell, the poet’s condition and arguments about wealth and religious merit become subjects of debate. These divisions are not rigid, since power exists within the family and private interest within public arrangements.

The author places considerable emphasis on dialogue. Characters frequently raise a question, another voice offers a counterargument, and the incident gradually turns into an exchange of ideas. This technique has a social advantage: caste, exploitation, poverty and religious belief do not remain distant from the reader. It also carries an artistic risk: the character’s individual voice at times seems to dissolve into the author’s direct discourse. The story becomes more effective when the narrator conveys a character’s silence, hesitation, fear, greed or helplessness through events; when a solution is announced in fully formulated statements, the plurality of meaning becomes restricted.

Maithili folk expressions, the vocabulary of everyday village conduct, unforced humour, forms of address and speech ranging from courteous to discourteous constitute the collection's linguistic identity. Language is chiefly a means of bringing the subject close to the reader, rather than an exercise in ornamental Sanskritised prose. Yet, in stories concerning politics and justice, modern terminology associated with public policy appears alongside popular expression. This mixture registers the changing experience of contemporary society.

Separate Textual Analyses of the Twenty Stories

Aadambar

The collection's first story begins with the observance of a shraddha rite. Its opening line—'Today is the shraddha of Sankat's father' (p. 1)—immediately establishes the entire social situation. The story, however, concentrates less on the privacy of grief than on the public scene of the rite: the number of guests, the feast, labour and the balance of prestige. Sankat's family occasion comes under the collective gaze of the village, and the gap between 'showing everyone' and 'actually doing the work' grows wider.

The real object of the story's satire is not the existence of ritual but its exhibitionist public form. An elaborate occasion does not necessarily establish human sympathy. When rites associated with the memory of parents become a social competition, an inversion of values becomes visible. In the closing section, questions, answers and argument urge the reader to consider alternatives to ostentation. Its position as the title story makes it the interpretive gateway to the volume, although some extended conversations also slow the narrative movement.

Ropal Gaachh Babur

At the beginning, Bhan and his wife Rita are awaiting the sympathy of their village. The episode presents people caught between familial injustice and social conduct. The title Ropal Gaachh Babur draws upon an idiom: one's earlier decisions and conduct are linked to their consequences. Because the story unfolds in a climate of social judgement, however, it is insufficient to regard it merely as the private 'punishment for a mistake'.

The story reflects on the relationship between self-determination, social responsibility and the consequences of personal relationships. When recollections of earlier decisions are placed alongside present helplessness, morality becomes a lived experience rather than an exhortation. The return towards the village and the reconsideration of relationships near the end prevent the narrative from becoming wholly punitive. Another question deserves attention: how does a community take the right to dispense justice into its own hands, and what space remains within that process for the voices of those who suffer?

Pashchatap

Illness, poverty and the instability of family life are at the centre of Pashchatap ('Remorse'). Raghav's sickness, the difficulty of obtaining treatment, limited means and the compulsion to seek assistance from relatives immediately ground the narrative in social reality. Poverty is not an abstract misfortune here, but a concrete condition that restricts access to medical care.

Towards the end, the examination of social relationships and earlier conduct assumes importance. Remorse does not remain merely a private state of mind; it becomes associated with questions of assistance, responsibility and social neglect. The storyteller's sympathy is with the suffering family, but a critical question remains: to what extent can personal remorse resolve structural problems of treatment, livelihood and social security? The literary effect is greatest where the characters' insecurity emerges through concrete events rather than through dialogue alone.

Ojha Lekhen Gaam Bataah

This story offers a pointed example of public judgement in the village and political ridicule. The popular formulation involving an 'ojha' and a 'mad village' in its title becomes a satire on the incoherence of collective decisions. Village discussions raise questions about representation, voting, political leaders and practical usefulness. The characters inquire into the public order; the satire falls not only upon individual folly but also upon collective political helplessness.

The story's conversational method resembles a folk stage, where one question produces another. This technique allows the reader to experience village debate. Its limitation is that the balance between political exposition and narrative events becomes uneven in places. Nevertheless, the story rejects the simplified notion that villages exist 'outside politics': rural people understand politics, endure its practical consequences and criticise it as well.

Aarakshan

In Aarakshan ('Reservation'), questions of social disadvantage, justice, opportunity and representation emerge through the structure of village conversation. Rather than presenting reservation merely as the announcement of a government rule, the story portrays a conflict between competing understandings of equality. The characters' questions suggest that one conception of 'justice' involves redressing historical deprivation, while another centres on anxieties about present competition and merit. Through this conflict, the narrative becomes a record of contemporary social attitudes.

Given the social and political subject, criticism must not automatically treat a character's statement as the author's verified conclusion. Arguments must be distinguished from the experiences of particular characters. The closing emphasis on representation and the public good points towards democratic discussion. Actual deprivation, however, requires a broader historical context than individual examples can provide; the story's discursive significance lies more in its questions and answers than in the solution offered.

Loktantra

Loktantra ('Democracy') opens with a character's expression of everyday frustration (p. 37). The meaning of democracy is questioned amid an ordinary person's hardships, the uncertainty of earning a livelihood and the distance separating elected representatives from citizens. Democracy is measured here not simply by the act of voting but by the availability of justice, dignity and effective rights in the citizen's life.

In this story, the language of political debate merges with everyday village speech. Dialogue between characters operates as a popular-language response to administrative discourse. The final section brings out the relationship between economic dependence and political representation. The narrative intensifies the opposition between the ideal of equality and the reality of life in deprivation. Its discursive range is a strength, but lengthy passages of argument also risk weakening narrative tension.

Rail-Yatra

Rail-Yatra brings together reservation, travel, fellow passengers and the conduct of public services. Ordinary matters such as seats, entitlements and amenities become questions of social status and administrative behaviour in the experience of rural travellers. The railway carriage is a small public society in which people from different circumstances, classes and outlooks encounter one another for a brief time.

The story's chief distinguishing feature is the mobility of its setting. In place of the settled conversations of the village, the accidents of a journey offer occasions for argument. But discussion repeatedly turns towards questions of policy, so the artistic possibilities of railway scenes, sounds and physical discomfort remain insufficiently developed. The storyteller seeks to show the gap between public regulations and actual conduct, using the journey as a means of social examination.

Etek Jaati Kiek?

One of the collection's longer stories develops an argument concerning the basis of caste, social division, respect and humanity. The interrogative title —'Why So Many Castes?'—itself addresses the reader. The work does not merely count castes; it attempts to understand how the division between 'us' and 'them' is reinforced in social dealings. Questions of dignity and social distance become clear in the context of everyday life.

Different characters put forward arguments reflecting social beliefs about caste. This makes the text a linguistic record of debates of its time, but it would be risky to regard every idea presented as an established historical fact. From the perspective of scientific social inquiry, caste is not merely a straightforward outcome of the division of labour; it is also an institution of power, birth-based hierarchy and exclusion. As the story turns towards unity and mutual respect, its ethical aspiration becomes clear; its particular narrative qualities should be considered against this background of ideas.

Laash

The title Laash ('Corpse') immediately suggests death, but the story becomes an examination of how the living behave. At the outset, it introduces Kumar Saheb, whose background is that of the landed gentry, and refers to family, property and social relationships. The story gradually overturns the expectation that death naturally brings out the ethics of kinship. The contradiction between family responsibility and the attraction of property becomes increasingly pronounced.

In the final section, the presence of the dead body and the weakening of living relationships become an exceptionally sharp point of satire. Where respect for the body is essential, the interests of inheritance and the relationships that existed during the person's lifetime assert themselves all the more strongly. The significance of Laash lies in this unsettling image: the deceased is not simply an object but becomes the silent centre of a test of family values. The ethical proposition is relatively explicit, yet the visual irony remains its more enduring artistic achievement.

Heart Attack

This story recounts episodes connected with the life, position, income and familial aspirations of a school-associated character named Manohar Babu. The English medical term in the title introduces the insecurities of the modern urban middle class into a more traditional world of social fiction. The relationship between health, wealth and aspiration occupies the centre of the narrative events.

Towards the end, the effect of a sudden heart attack calls the plans of a lifetime into question. The realisation that the extent of one's acquisitions and savings cannot guarantee control over life gives the story a direction of moral satire. At the artistic level, the sudden outcome is effective. But if the event is read merely as a moral 'punishment', the complex human experience of illness and death risks being oversimplified. It is necessary to distinguish between these two possibilities while reading the story.

Begaar

At its very opening, Begaar ('Forced Labour') underlines the difference between official arrangements and actual conditions: 'Nowadays, according to government regulations, no one may keep a person in begaar, that is, as a bonded labourer' (p. 85). The ensuing events portray the life relationships between a powerful village family and dependent labourers. The story's tension emerges from the distance between announcing the operation of a formal rule and actually ending social dependence.

This is a particularly significant story because exploitation is presented not simply as the disposition of a cruel employer but as a system sustained by poverty, debt, livelihood and social standing. Episodes involving Kamla and Vishwanath Babu's family raise questions about the labourer's dignity and the right to make decisions. By the end, the social meaning of 'begaar' is shown to extend beyond its legal prohibition. The story envisages the ethical possibility of change in individual conduct, but leaves unanswered the need to transform wider economic relationships in order to end structural exploitation.

Pari-Katha

Pari-Katha ('Fairy Tale') offers an experiment in storytelling distinct from the collection's realistic social sphere. Beginning with the introduction of a king, a prince and a conventional narrative situation, it brings the reader onto familiar folk-tale ground. Human desire, judgement and relationships are tested within episodes concerning royal power and the royal family.

The presence of the word 'fairy' in the title does not automatically justify classifying the story as children's literature; to do so would be an error of literary genre. A fairy tale may be received by children, but its actual generic position depends upon the composition of its readership, linguistic level, fear and wonder, presentation of morality and narrative extent. The allegory involving the prince and the ethical argument within this story are also relevant to mature readers. Its distinctive feature is the extraction of new social meanings from the structure of a folk tale; its more explicit discussion at the end diminishes the atmosphere of mystery.

Kukuruk Naangari

The title's unusual image, grounded in folk speech, arouses the reader's curiosity. The story is built from episodes concerning a prosperous householder, rural dependency, social humiliation and human conduct. The use of animal imagery belongs to a tradition of attacking human behaviour through allegory; the narrative context must determine to whom the image of the 'dog' is applied here and in what circumstances.

The story asks how a person comes to be belittled within unequal relationships of power, and to what extent that person can preserve self-respect. Examining the social causes of the characters' actions is more useful than merely assigning them to moral categories. The demand for human dignity is explicit at the end; the writer turns the language of ridicule back against society. Nevertheless, the ethical effect of an animal comparison itself deserves questioning, since criticism of humiliation can sometimes reproduce images of humiliation in its own language.

Lati

Lati begins with a scene of uncontrolled laughter, incongruous behaviour and a condition resembling intoxication on a village road. A character's body and speech become a spectacle before the social gaze. Yet to regard Lati solely as an individual vice would unduly restrict the story; questions of family, economic duty and social embarrassment are connected with the condition.

As the narrative develops, the perspectives of the individual and the family confront one another. The desire to change a person's conduct follows a familiar pattern of moral reform, but the psychological and social complexity of addiction or repeatedly compulsive behaviour does not emerge in full. Critics must not regard the satirised character merely as an object of laughter.

The story provides evidence of how uncontrolled habits can become a crisis within the family; the balance between compassion and blame is its central test.

Kavik Jingi

The social position of the creative writer is an important theme in this story. Its opening comparison—'A poet's life is exactly like a lamp that illuminates others, while darkness surrounds it on every side' (p. 124)—forms the centre of its pathos and satire. The image of light establishes a contrast between the public benefit of creative work and the poet's personal deprivation.

The narrative raises questions about the unstable recognition given to creative labour, the poet's sense of self and public neglect. The tension between the symbolic ideal of poetic talent and material respect in everyday life belongs to the social history of literary institutions. The story may also be called a self-reflexive literary parable. Its significance in this form lies not merely in glorifying the poet, but in questioning the discrepancy between literature's social usefulness and the writer's actual life. The episode concerning institutional recognition at the end makes personal suffering a public issue.

Udyan

Udyan ('Garden') is concerned with tensions between private family relationships and public roles. Episodes involving father and daughter, marriage, financial circumstances and changing human equations give the story a domestic emotional setting. Its title naturally suggests beauty, growth and possibility; the questions of social conduct within the narrative turn this agreeable suggestion into irony.

The story is short, so its movement from event to consequence is relatively rapid. Questions of power and expectation in private relationships are complex: who has the authority to define a family's 'welfare'? In places the story relies upon an individual's moral improvement as a solution. If the title's symbolism had been developed more fully through scenes, its emotional effect might have been denser; nevertheless, brevity also protects the story from unnecessary digressions.

Narak Ke Yatra

This story uses religious beliefs in karma, heaven and hell to examine social conduct. Its opening sentence—'People say that after death a being goes to heaven or hell' (p. 138)—takes popular belief as its starting point; it does not offer a scientifically verified account of the afterlife. The allegorical journey opens possibilities for satire about a person's deeds, self-examination and the social use of religious language.

The landscape of hell is not literal geography but a moral imagining. Scriptural images and unethical actions in everyday life illuminate one another. The movement towards religious recollection and prayer at the close gives the story a familiar didactic ending. From a literary point of view, the important distinction is between generating fear and awakening self-criticism: they are two different acts. Through this tension, the story reveals the structure of belief within popular religion.

Sanket

Sanket ('Indication') begins with episodes involving a familiar family, a poet and personal relationships. Ordinary domestic conversation and the indirect language of suggestion combine to give the story intimacy. Here, instead of explicit argument, the narrator relies more heavily on the gradual disclosure of a situation and the reader's inference about relationships.

Towards the end, reflections emerge on life's uncertainty, human affection and social conduct. The story's meaning is linked with its title: not everything important is stated in declarative sentences; conduct, too, communicates through signs. Read alongside the collection's political satires, the work reveals a different artistic possibility: comparatively less direct discourse and greater emotional tension. Nevertheless, the narrator's moral interpretation becomes explicit once again at the conclusion.

Arajal Bhog

Arajal Bhog offers a satirical examination of rural social standing, family celebrations, property and relationships. It opens with the family of Chanda and aspirations concerning marriage. The bustle of arrangements creates an image of outward joy, but the differing intentions of people and the unequal distribution of resources produce varied meanings beneath the celebration.

The story's critical significance lies in its recognition that feasts and festivities are not merely scenes of eating but also displays of social hierarchy. Imagined family prosperity, kinship expectations and the pressure of spending converge. Towards the end, the circumstances of the marriage decision and the scale of decoration leave questions of social evaluation open. The story establishes an intertextual connection with the theme of public display in the title story Aadambar, but the debate shifts here from communal religious rites to a private family celebration.

Jaani Ka Besahab

The final story begins by referring to a popular television quiz show: 'One day I was watching TV. The programme was Kaun Banega Crorepati' (p. 156). The prospect of acquiring wealth becomes the gateway to a moral thought experiment. Gradually, the story reaches questions of earning, enjoyment, charity, hospitality, poverty and religious merit.

Within this structure, traditional moral parable confronts modern consumerist aspiration. At the end, a dialogue between Sethji and Mahatmaji raises questions about virtuous deeds and genuine assistance. The value of a moral decision lies less in the display of wealth than in the conduct of life. The story may be read as a conclusion to a collection opposed to ostentation: how far do people actually practise the values for which they seek admiration?

Although the narrative articulates its lesson very directly, the continuity of its ideas from title to ending gives the collection a coherent close.

Integrated Evaluation of Narrative Craft

The Arrangement of Titles, Irony and Ideational Unity

A survey of the twenty titles reveals a distinctive duality. Titles such as Aadambar, Begaar, Laash, Aarakshan, Loktantra and Sanket point towards the complexity of social institutions and abstract ideas, while Ropal Gaachh Babur, Ojha Lekhen Gaam Bataah, Kukuruk Naangari and Jaani Ka Besahab arise from popular sayings and the memory of vernacular speech. Pari-Katha and Narak Ke Yatra suggest the possibilities of parable, while Heart Attack and Rail-Yatra carry the accents of contemporary experience. This variety demonstrates the breadth of the storyteller's subject matter.

The collection's unity of ideas lies in a recurring question: what form do the things publicly called merit, justice, prestige, progress or morality actually take in lived experience? Through this question the separate stories illuminate one another. Aadambar and Arajal Bhog portray ceremonial display; Aarakshan and Etek Jaati Kiek? address justice and social division; Laash and Heart Attack deal with life, death and property; while Begaar and Loktantra juxtapose rights with the realities of existence.

Dialogue, Narrator and the Construction of Scenes

Debate is the storyteller's favoured structure. Characters ask questions, several answers follow, and the narrative proceeds towards an ethical conclusion. This resembles the oral tradition of storytelling: disputation at court, conversation at the village chaupal, domestic quarrels and the companionship of a journey all have ordinary speech as their narrative thread. The technique keeps the language alive and renders questions of ideas accessible to ordinary readers.

In many stories, however, the distinctive development of speaking characters is subordinated to the pressure of theoretical discussion. The extensive exposition of ideas in Etek Jaati Kiek?, political debate in Aarakshan and Loktantra, and discussion of religious ethics in Jaani Ka Besahab are central narrative attractions, but the writer's overt partisanship sometimes leaves readers less room for independent interpretation. By contrast, the dead body in Laash, the economic dependence in Begaar and the metaphor of light and darkness in Kavik Jingi are scenic or symbolic centres that create a readerly experience rather than merely state conclusions.

Language: The Speech of the Maithili Village and Public Thought

Maithili narration preserves forms of address rooted in folk life, interrogative constructions, idioms, rhythms of argument and the subtle gradations of social distance. The impression of authentic speech arises not merely from an abundance of unusual words but from the situations of life, characters' social positions and the tones of dialogue. In Aadambar, the arrangements and contempt associated with feasting; in Loktantra, resentment concerning popular sovereignty; and in Begaar, the contradiction between law and conduct—all reveal language as a bearer of social knowledge.

Where administration, justice or education are discussed, the coexistence of political and social terminology with the folk rhythms of Maithili reveals the linguistic circumstances of the period. The collection therefore has documentary significance from a linguistic perspective. Nevertheless, more fully developed distinctions in speech suited to individual characters and more scene-specific renderings of sound would have increased the narrative's multiplicity of levels.

Female Characters, Family and Critical Limitations

The presence of women such as Rita, Kamla and Seema offers opportunities to examine women's emotional positions within social decision-making. Yet in many stories the principal bearers of political or publicly ethical arguments are male characters. Although questions of social injustice are raised, women's financial authority, desires, experiences of marriage and autonomous narrative perspectives are not developed with equal depth throughout. Discussing this imbalance does not mean rejecting the work; rather, it amounts to a critical examination of its social realism.

A second limitation is the repeated appearance of instructional conclusions in the final sentences of stories. Ethical commitment has its own literary tradition, but an important quality of the modern short story is also its capacity to leave questions open, create emotional uncertainty and make the reader a co-author of interpretation. Aadambar oscillates between these two tendencies. Its affinity is with publicly educative storytelling, but its finest scenes carry it beyond the limits of moral instruction.

Comparative Discussion with the History of Maithili Children's Literature

The Necessary Distinction between Social Fiction and Children's Stories

A fundamental precaution is necessary in assessing Aadambar: the author's other work Swarna-Kamal is listed in Videha's book catalogue as a children's novel, while the publication details and contents of Aadambar clearly identify it as a short-story collection. It is therefore not possible to classify all of the author's writings as 'children's literature'. A title such as Pari-Katha, or a moral narrative form, may be accessible to children; nevertheless, readership age, the reader's prior knowledge, narrative structure, violent or complex social situations and linguistic difficulty together determine generic classification.

The primary criterion for children's literature is not simply 'teaching'. A children's story gives space to the child's centre of experience, play, curiosity, imagination, immediate scenes, independent questions and emotional responsiveness. An adult social story does not necessarily become a children's story by imparting a moral lesson. Many conversations in Aadambar about reservation policy, caste, bonded labour, political representation, conflicts over property and religious ethics are more intelligible when grounded in adult social experience. Its relationship to children's literature is thus one of 'generic comparison', not direct classification.

Folktales, Printed Children's Books and Digital Preservation

The earliest foundations of the history of storytelling for Maithili children can be found in oral folktales, children's songs, stories told by elders at home, animal tales and moral parables. Modern printed children's books have extended this oral heritage through illustrations, school curricula, science, adventure stories, children's drama and translation. It would be mistaken to regard this history as a single linear progression: oral, printed and digital forms continue to coexist today.

Videha's Shishu Utsav and its children's literature catalogues contain numerous entries for translated picture stories, original stories for children, children's poetry, plays, scientific writing and novels. Among the examples are Munni Kamat's Chukka (a collection of children's stories), Sujit Kumar Jha's Koili Ghuri Aau (a collection of very short stories for children), Yogendra Pathak 'Viyogi's Vigyank Batkahi, and Preeti Thakur's series of translated picture stories. These lists establish that contemporary Maithili children's literature is not restricted to uniform moralistic storytelling, but encompasses illustration, science, performance, translation and different readership ages. Independent analysis of the contents of these works lies beyond this essay's scope; that distinction itself clarifies the difference between historical comparisons based on lists and direct critical readings of texts.

The Generic Difference between Nand's Social Fiction and Swarna-Kamal

Videha's book catalogue identifies Swarna-Kamal as a children's novel by Nand Kumar Mishra 'Nand', whereas Aadambar is listed as a short-story collection. These differing generic identities attached to works published under the same author's name are particularly meaningful. On the one hand, a children's novel is expected to provide a narrative journey, wonder, a child's imaginative life and creative self-sufficiency. On the other, the social stories in Aadambar depend upon questions and answers concerning adult social institutions, judgement and social experience.

A work such as Pari-Katha reveals a borderland between these classifications. A traditional narrative about kings and princes may attract children, while its ethical discussions and social satire also permit rereading at an adult level. Even after recognising this flexibility, it would not be appropriate to pronounce the author's established children's novel and his collection of social stories to be works of the same genre.

Moral Purpose, the Child's Perspective and Civic Education

Many stories in Aadambar take up justice, respect for labour, equality, compassion, judgement and criticism of greed. These subjects undoubtedly have potential uses in civic education and adolescent curricula. For instance, Begaar could provide material for a discussion of workers' rights; Etek Jaati Kiek? for prejudice; Kavik Jingi for creative labour; and Narak Ke Yatra for ethical decisions. Curricular use, however, is not the same as literary genre.

A new, child-centred presentation would require brief scenes, age-appropriate background, sensitive language concerning caste or class oppression, open-ended questions, accessible introductions to characters, and perhaps the form of a picture story or dramatic adaptation. Rather than teaching every ethical claim in the original as an indisputable truth, children might be asked: who suffered injustice, why did it happen, what else might have been done, and how freely did the characters make their choices? Aadambar could then serve as a valuable companion text for social education. Such a possible use does not imply that the original work is itself children's literature.

The Multiple Currents of Children's Literature in Contemporary Videha

The separate entries in Videha's Shishu Utsav for children's songs, picture stories, scientific narration, folktales, translations, drama and adolescent writing reflect a contemporary process of collection and preservation. Listings of Gajendra Thakur's many children's novels, new stories for adolescents and illustrated stories show that the thematic territory of young readers has extended to science, imagination, social life and contemporary technology. These entries provide material for literary history; numbers of catalogue entries alone, however, cannot establish claims of literary quality or historical 'firsts'.

Against this background, Aadambar's historical position is more clearly situated in the tradition of adult social satire. Its links with the history of children's literature lie principally in shared orality, moral questions, vernacular language and narrative modes. The expansive imaginative play and autonomous perspective of the child expected in children's literature, by contrast, are not central to this collection. Recognition of this distinction makes it possible to honour the diversity of the writer's creative work appropriately.

A Document of Social History and Literary Autonomy

To describe Aadambar merely as a small tract for moral reform would diminish its literary dimensions; to equate it with fully developed, multilayered modernist narrative technique would also be an exaggeration. The collection stands at the intersection of social realism, satire, parable and argumentative prose. It has documentary importance because it brings ordinary social figures to the centre of fiction. Readers encounter the hypocrisy of rural society, dependence within families, everyday experiences of democracy and questions of literary livelihood.

With this documentary force comes a critical responsibility: the beliefs held by characters must be distinguished from social facts. The history of caste, the effects of reservation, the legal condition of labour and medical causes cannot be verified merely by quoting a literary text. Fiction offers evidence of ideas, experiences and conflicts of value; it is not in itself a sociological survey or a legal report. Recognition of these limits renders the relationship between literary analysis and social research more reliable.

The aspiration towards 'justice' within folk society is the author's ethical centre. Yet justice takes different forms: at times individual reform, at others communal responsibility, political rights or philanthropy. Rather than reducing these differences to a single word, they must be examined in relation to the particular circumstances of each story. The absence of compassion in Laash and economic subordination in Begaar can be described in similar ethical language, but their social causes are not identical. Critical recognition of this difference helps readers understand the variety within the collection.

Conclusion

Nand Kumar Mishra 'Nand's Aadambar is a collection of Maithili social fiction centred upon the contradiction between public claims to virtuous conduct and actual behaviour. The narrative journey begins with the ostentation of shraddha rituals and moves through inequalities within families, caste, democracy, railway services, forced labour, the poet's life, religious belief and the ethics of wealth. The recurring thread throughout the twenty stories is the capacity to raise serious social questions from ordinary scenes of folk life. In this sense, the title becomes not merely that of the first story but the moral grammar of the entire collection.

The work's greatest achievements are its natural dialogue in the vernacular, the social experience of ordinary characters and its recognition of irony. The silent image of death in Laash, the distance between law and life in Begaar, the image of the lamp in Kavik Jingi and the final debate on wealth and merit in Jaani Ka Besahab testify to the collection's different creative directions. Its limitations include didacticism, overly explicit final ethical judgements, the length of sociopolitical arguments and the relatively restricted autonomous voices of women. Acknowledging these weaknesses does not diminish the author's social commitment; rather, it establishes the work's artistic position more accurately.

Comparison with the history of children's literature confirms that moral subject matter alone does not constitute children's literature. Aadambar is essentially a collection of social stories for mature readers; selected episodes may be reread profitably in adolescent civic education, while the author's catalogued children's novel Swarna-Kamal requires a separate generic study. With this distinction clearly maintained, Aadambar can be read as a significant work in the traditions of Maithili folk life, social satire and dialogue-centred storytelling.

Part Two

Society, Women's Identity and the Novel

Gudari Ke Lal · Anathiya Kukur · Sujata · Sukanya · Parivar

Chapter 3

Gudari Ke Lal

Feudal Domination, Women's Identity, Education and the Struggle for Justice

Nand Kumar Mishra ‘Nand’’s Gudari Ke Lal is a Maithili novel situated at the intersection of social realism and the aspiration for reform. Set in a rural society before Independence, it raises questions concerning the exploitation of landless labourers, the dominance of landlords, the class allegiance of the police and administration, control over women's bodies and reputations, the social purpose of education, the self-identification of a new generation, and judicial intervention. Matru and his daughter Sugiya occupy the moral centre of this struggle; Thakur Jalim Singh and his influence over the structures of power put social resistance to the test. In the latter part, the question of Sureshwar's identity and the court proceedings transform private suffering into a question of public justice and social responsibility. This study includes a sequential reading of all twenty-two sections, the characters' internal conflicts, the novel's time and setting, linguistic techniques, women's lives, class structure, the politics of rural education, and comparisons with the tradition of the Maithili social novel. Alongside the work's achievements, it examines the simplification involved in its reformist happy ending, its idealisation of characters, and possible limitations associated with institutional justice.

Maithili novel; Gudari Ke Lal; Nand Kumar Mishra ‘Nand’; Sugiya; Matru; landlordism; education; women's identity; rural society; social justice.

Introduction: The Irony of the Title and the Social Question

Gudari Ke Lal makes creative use of an idiom familiar in the Hindi–Maithili linguistic world: a poor outer covering cannot conceal the human talent and dignity within. The title initially signals an inequality: a person's worth is assessed by wealth, lineage, ownership of land and outward standing, but the story challenges precisely these criteria. By the novel's conclusion, the meaning of the title has become charged with the struggle for social recognition and moral acceptance.

This is a social novel, not a children's novel. Its original publication describes it as a ‘Maithili novel’; it addresses adult social questions such as indications of sexual exploitation, unwilling relationships, humiliation based on class, political and feudal oppression, and judicial decisions. To assess it by the criteria of children's literature would create a confusion of genres. Nevertheless, because of its concern with education and the characters of the younger generation, it may also be useful to research into children's rights and the sociology of education.

In his introduction the author makes clear the historical setting of exploitation, Matru's struggle, the circumstances of Sugiya's life and his faith in social change. The author's declared intention, however, cannot be accepted as the final meaning of the novel. Literary criticism asks how far the episodes impart artistic credibility to this intention and where the novelist's explicit social hopes run ahead of the natural development of the characters.

The Work's Historical Setting and Narrative Design

Gudari Ke Lal was written by Nand Kumar Mishra ‘Nand’. Its publication page names Gosauni Baidyanath Smriti Manch, Upardaha, Darbhanga, and gives a contribution amount of ₹150. The author's statement concludes with the date Vijayadashami, 2008. We can therefore establish 2008 as the date of that statement; no separate year of publication is clearly specified in the preliminary pages available. The final numbered page of the story is 140. Page references here follow the numbering of the original printed edition.

The author clearly establishes the period in which the story begins:

‘The time was before Independence.’ (Original text, p. 1)

This sentence determines the novel's historical atmosphere, but the author's own statement about the setting and characters is also important. He writes that the characters, time and place belong to an imaginative construction. Ramgarh and the governmental events must therefore not be read as archival history; this is a narrative of an imagined society inspired by historical structures. Its social truth must be tested within the terms of its fictional construction.

The original work unfolds in twenty-two numbered sections. At the outset, landlessness and inequalities of power are established; the middle develops Sugiya's struggle for her existence and for the right to determine the terms of her life; and the latter part moves through education, intergenerational advancement, public differences of opinion and a judicial conclusion.

The Work's Place in the Tradition of the Maithili Social Novel

Social conventions, marriage, the position of women and the realities of local life have remained important concerns throughout the development of the modern Maithili novel. Harimohan Jha's Kanyadan (1933) satirically attacks the marriage practices of society; Dwiragaman (1943) raises questions about women's lives and education in the same milieu. Yatri's Paro (1946) offers a more incisive picture of women's experience and patriarchal structures. Gudari Ke Lal's relationship with these works is not one of inherited imitation but of thematic dialogue.

According to the views of the writer Kathakar Ashok on early Maithili novels, the impulse towards social reform and the realistic depiction of contemporary life were both important tendencies. Gudari Ke Lal brings them together. Class inequality and feudal oppression give it a grounding in reality, yet its conclusion moves towards the hope that society can be reformed. This tension generates both its principal artistic strength and its limitation.

Comparison with the Hindi novel Godan (1936) brings into view similar questions of agrarian exploitation, debt, honour and the helplessness of peasants and labourers. Godan, however, represents the continuing impoverishment of working people in harsher terms, whereas Gudari Ke Lal places greater faith in moral awakening and legal intervention. This is a comparison of narrative tendencies, not an assertion of direct influence or a source relationship.

Dialogue with Phanishwarnath Renu's Maila Anchal (1954) is also possible at the level of rural power relations, local speech and the political atmosphere of Independence. Nevertheless, Renu's polycentric regional narrative has a different structure from the moral struggle centred on Matru and Sugiya in Gudari Ke Lal.

Overall Plot Design: From the Village to the Courtroom

The novel begins in the village setting of Ramgarh. Land is held by a few families, while landless workers labour for their living. The village school, the landlord's mansion, the local court, the police administration, the market and the town beyond acquire different forms of institutional power within the narrative. Matru's labour and Sugiya's life bear the consequences of social hierarchy.

The administration and feudal influence tend to sustain one another. Through Thakur Jalim Singh's conduct, individual inequality becomes a public injustice. How much autonomy Sugiya retains over decisions about her own life is the novel's most profound ethical question. At several turns, the plot presents the insecurity of a powerless family, the question of land and the social meaning of honour.

Later, education ceases to be merely a route to individual advancement. Sureshwar's development creates a new relationship between family memory and social prohibitions. In the final part, private wrongdoing, honour, property rights and public decisions become subjects of judicial debate. Gudari Ke Lal thus takes the form of a journey from social injustice towards the possibility of justice; nevertheless, the critical question remains whether the wounds of experience disappear automatically once justice has been obtained.

Separate Close Readings of All Twenty-Two Sections

Section One: Ramgarh's Economic Structure and the Work's Central Conflict

The first section clarifies the period, village setting and relations of production. Land is controlled by a few landlords, while the workers who cultivate the fields do not own them. Discussion of the school is placed immediately beside this social inequality. The proximity does not appear accidental: on one side education offers a possibility of advancement; on the other, knowledge and resources are controlled by the prosperous classes. The opening structure gives collective exploitation a place before individual tragedy.

The significance of the section is heightened by an opening sentence such as ‘The time was before Independence’ (p. 1). The pre-Independence period is a historical marker, but village exploitation is not merely the direct consequence of colonial rule; indigenous feudal relations are an independent source of it. This distinction is fundamental to reading the novel as a whole.

Section Two: Labour, Dependence and Everyday Fear

As the opening events develop, the worker's daily routine, the compulsions of livelihood and the mansion's influence remain in view. Exploitation is manifested not only in low wages, but also in the worker's lack of a right to speak, freedom of movement and capacity to protect his family. It is in this setting that Matru's predicament becomes personal.

Through dialogue drawn from everyday social conduct, the author shows that workers cannot immediately formulate the language of rights. First, they must find a way to preserve their families. The story thus brings the destructive effects of class structure onto an emotional plane.

Section Three: Family Insecurity and Feudal Intrusion

Matru's family circumstances and the external pressures upon Sugiya's life now become the story's central social question. Poverty is not simply deprivation: it is a condition of vulnerability to the will of others. The gaze of wealthy men upon a poor man's daughter, and their conduct as though they possessed rights over her, expose the ethical deformation of social relations.

In reading this section one must distinguish between ‘protection’ and ‘control’. What the landlord's side might call shelter or kindness is experienced by a powerless family as fear, compulsion and a risk to its reputation.

Section Four: The Local Court, the Police Inspector and Legal Inequality

In the fourth section, the roles of the police and the inspector give the conflict an institutional dimension. The office of authority is no longer an impartial place for hearing a poor person's complaint; rank, access and partiality influence the course of justice. Matru's appearance before the inspector reveals the distance between possessing the right to seek justice and actually obtaining it.

Here the novelist's social vision grows more concrete. Removing a wicked individual will not by itself change the system: until institutions of authority become independent of pressure from the powerful, the victim's voice will remain insecure.

Section Five: The Limits of Repression and Preparations for Resistance

Episodes of interaction between feudal power and administration turn Matru's personal crisis into social criticism. Whose words will be heard, whose testimony will be considered credible, and whose standing has already been accepted? These questions define the novel's conception of justice.

Within fear, the desire to resist also develops. Resistance does not always appear as a declaration; sometimes it takes the form of plans to protect relatives, requests for assistance from a suitable person, or attempts to articulate the causes of injustice.

Section Six: Sugiya's Awareness and the Question of Ethical Consent

The sixth section places Sugiya's inner insecurity and her understanding of her circumstances at the centre. She attempts to comprehend the balance of power surrounding her. The alternatives before her are not simply the ordinary choices of love or marriage, but the severe questions of social ostracism, her father's helplessness and her future means of subsistence.

A feminist reading is essential here. A decision that looks like consent from outside may in fact have been compelled by fear and deprivation. To glorify Sugiya's position as 'surrender' would diminish its human complexity.

Section Seven: The Language of Power and Economic Claims

In this section the influence of Thakur Jalim Singh and questions of entitlement arising from his relationship with Sugiya acquire a clearer shape. The impulse to determine another person's life through wealth, land and social standing becomes the focus of opposition. Sugiya is no longer merely someone to whom help may be given; she seeks a position from which to discuss the conditions of her future.

The story concerns more than a mere transfer of property. It opens the question of the ethical source of entitlement: kindness, charity or justice? When a wealthy person grants a gift, power may remain in that person's hands; when the right of the powerless is acknowledged, the very basis of the relationship changes.

Section Eight: Plans for Change and the Long Shadow of Distrust

The prospect of rights being recognised does not immediately reassure Sugiya. Her previous experiences make her cautious towards guardianship, generosity and political proposals. The novelist uses a lengthy succession of exchanges, thereby making clear the social weight of the decision.

At this point the novel also discloses the limits of the idea of a male 'rescuer'. The desire to reform society has value, but if a reforming initiative does not listen to the victim's freedom, justice can become a one-sided act of charity once again.

Section Nine: The Political Meaning of Personal Relationships

Personal meetings, assurances and discussions about rights deepen the political character of the narrative. Sugiya's circumstances cannot be contained within a simple division between villains and good people. The possibility of assistance and the memory of domination may coexist within the same person or family.

For this reason conduct matters more here than the characters' declarations. The test of just behaviour is enduring responsibility, not momentary pity.

Section Ten: A New Struggle over Social Standing

Questions of dignity and public recognition arise in relation to Sugiya's life. In village society, private relationships do not remain merely private: they are judged by standards of caste and lineage, a woman's 'character', wealth and family honour.

The story's principal criticism in this section is directed at this collective gaze. Society can tolerate the influence of a wrongdoer while continuously demanding that the woman who has suffered prove herself. The experience of such a second punishment is an important aspect of the novel's engagement with women's lives.

Section Eleven: The New Generation and the Possibility of Education

As the story proceeds, the younger generation, educated individuals and ideas of social change become prominent. Ajay, Vijay, Rameshwar and other supportive or conversational figures do more than move the plot forwards: they demonstrate that society is not uniform. Opposition to injustice is possible even within prosperous circles.

The significance of this section lies in the possibility of moving beyond individual compassion towards collective judgement. Yet the novel's faith is generally concentrated upon a few virtuous people; a fuller representation of institutions and an organised labour movement would have given change a stronger social foundation.

Section Twelve: Relationships, Deception and an Alternative Morality

In the middle phase of the struggle, familial and social relationships undergo reassessment. Dialogue reveals the difference between outward status and inward ethical conduct. Those called respectable are not invariably just, while those who are poor are not morally inferior in their decisions.

It is useful to read this section in relation to the title's original meaning. The ragged covering signifies outward deprivation; the 'jewel' is the value within that the dominant social gaze is unable to recognise.

Section Thirteen: From Labour to Social Responsibility

Questions of the village's economic crisis, labour and livelihood acquire new meanings in changing circumstances. Some members of the prosperous class show a desire for reform, but one individual's goodwill cannot replace the structural constraints suffered by hundreds of dependants. Here the novelist generates tension between benevolent reform and change founded upon rights.

Critically considered, workers' own organisation and collective resistance have a limited active presence. Nevertheless, the attempt to attach social dignity to conduct and humanity rather than the privilege of birth is a positive achievement of the novel.

Section Fourteen: Upbringing, Educational Opportunity and Class Mobility

At this stage the questions of raising a child, study and the building of a future come to the centre. Through Sureshwar's life, education becomes a genuine possibility for overcoming social barriers. The acquisition of knowledge means more than literacy: it is a process of finding one's place within language, self-confidence and public institutions.

But educational success also requires support and resources. Almost incidentally, the novel shows that talent alone is not enough: schools, financial assistance, the work of the family and the availability of opportunities shape its development. Here the idiom Gudari Ke Lal acquires a structural significance.

Section Fifteen: A Child's Future and the Rights of Motherhood

With Sugiya's motherhood, the centre of the story begins to shift. The humiliation she suffered earlier does not simply end there; it returns to her life as anxiety over her son's future, education and social identity.

To read motherhood solely as the glorification of sacrifice would obscure Sugiya's independent womanhood. A deeper reading suggests that her insistence upon her son's future is also a claim to lasting control over her own life: she does not wish the violence of her experience to be repeated upon the next generation.

Section Sixteen: Sureshwar's Educational Journey and Self-Identity

Sureshwar's story gives concrete human form to social mobility. Experience of an educational world beyond the deprivation of the village prepares a generation unwilling to remain bound by the social limits assigned at birth.

The novel's optimism is especially clear through this character. Yet it would be hasty to infer the progress of the entire working class from the success of one educated son. The achievement of exceptional talent does not automatically abolish social inequality; it may instead make that inequality more visible.

Section Seventeen: A Test of Relations with the Elite

In the later phase, questions of identity, social acceptance and family ties grow acute once more. Sureshwar's educated personality brings about a change in the outlook of prosperous families. How much of this change represents acceptance of his humanity, and how much an attraction to success? The question cannot be avoided.

If a poor person is deemed worthy of respect only after becoming educated and successful, the fundamental logic of social discrimination may remain unchanged. Testing the novel's reformist hope against this criterion offers one of its most useful critical readings.

Section Eighteen: Village, Family and Social Memory

Memories of old relationships, land and family obligations acquire new meanings in a changed setting. Past injustice is no longer merely an occurrence; it becomes a basis for present decisions. Sugiya and her child carry this inheritance of honour and dishonour in their lives.

The emotional force of this section lies in the incompleteness of memory. Whether one is displaced or advances in life, the claims of village relationships and the mother's lived experience do not simply disappear.

Section Nineteen: The Public Voice of Ethical Judgement

Personal differences turn into social debate. How legitimate are claims concerning property, relationships and standing? Their validity can no longer be determined solely by the wishes of the head of a family.

The function of this brief transitional section is to prepare the conceptual ground for the final conflict. What was earlier silenced through fear now becomes a possible subject of public discussion.

Section Twenty: Legal Strategy and Feudal Discomfort

In the final political and judicial phase, the prestige of the Thakur faction, memories of landlordism and a new consciousness of rights confront one another. For people accustomed to older practices, the very act of public questioning is a challenge.

Here the conflict shifts from physical force towards speech, documentation, legal argument and moral accountability. This transformation is a structural achievement of the novel.

Section Twenty-One: Pride of Lineage, Justice and Social Reckoning

Questions concerning Jalim Singh, Sugiya, Sureshwar and their relatives gain renewed intensity. The violence concealed within the language of social hierarchy, the legitimacy of children and family prestige becomes visible. The characters arrive at a decisive question of social acceptance.

The section's critical value lies in the fact that justice comes to mean not simply defeating the guilty, but acknowledging the victim with her own name and relationships. Nevertheless, the limitation of attaching human dignity to marital or genealogical recognition also becomes visible.

Section Twenty-Two: The Court, Renewed Recognition and the Full Meaning of the Title

The final section brings the narrative to its conclusion through a courtroom hearing. Judgement falls upon the social and moral consequences of the events involving Jalim Singh; Sugiya's humiliation and relationships can no longer be suppressed as merely private matters. The Thakur's former position, Sugiya's struggle and Sureshwar's character converge at a single narrative point.

Through Sugiya's acceptance and the renewal of the family, the author presents an optimistic vision of social justice in the final episode. Legal proceedings are developed from printed page 132 onwards, while the reactions of family and society on pages 138–140 take the story towards its conclusion. On the last page, regret is expressed that genuine human worth was not recognised earlier. It is through this recognition that the ethical meaning of the title emerges.

One serious question nevertheless remains: in what way do the court's decision and the family's acceptance address Sugiya's former suffering? When narrative justice centres upon personal reconciliation, the question of wider transformation against structural exploitation remains unfinished. This limitation must be considered alongside the novel's humanistic achievement.

Matru: The Life of a Labourer, Fatherhood and Resistance

Matru is the first concrete foundation of the novel's social reality. His labour sustains society's productive arrangements, yet land and rights are not in his hands. Such an economic position also constrains his familial decisions. He longs to protect his daughter, but his capacity to do so is endangered in the face of feudal power.

Matru's moral dignity does not lie in his becoming an all-powerful hero. On the contrary, despite his weakness he tries to preserve the meaning of relationships, labour and self-respect. This is important in literary terms: the representation of injustice becomes effective only when the victim is not merely a figure of suffering, but a human being possessing his own judgement.

At times, however, the author makes Matru's struggle dependent upon individual assistance. The lengthy social process of organised labour resistance is not developed with comparable force. The work is consequently less an epic of the labour movement than a novel of a deprived family's moral struggle.

Sugiya: Bodily Autonomy, Dignity and the Limits of Choice

Sugiya is the most complex and ethically significant character in Gudari Ke Lal. The author's preliminary statement places her life at the centre of social exploitation. According to that statement, Sugiya suffers an outcome regarded as dishonourable by society and, having no favourable alternatives, makes a decision about her relationship. The statement should not be treated as indisputable evidence of consent. Without asking how freely consent could have been given within unequal power relations, no profound reading of Sugiya is possible.

The novel exposes a society disposed to remain silent about male violence while imposing a permanent stigma upon a woman's life. Sugiya experiences suffering twice over: first through the unequal relationship, and then through the judgement of others. Education and the support of the new generation challenge this stigma.

Yet it is not enough to establish Sugiya's dignity merely through motherhood, marriage or final familial acceptance. She is an independent person, with a consciousness of herself that extends beyond motherhood. Such a feminist interpretation deepens the work's human possibilities, even though the novelist does not develop them fully.

Thakur Jalim Singh: Lineage, Power and the Legitimisation of Wrongdoing

Thakur Jalim Singh is not merely an opposing individual; he represents feudal relations. His standing rests upon land, lineage, influence and fear. The novel shows that social inequality reveals its real power when the wealthy class enforces its desires as though they were rules.

Jalim Singh's character contains the potential for a conflict between power and conscience. The story ultimately opens a route towards change and acceptance, but the credibility of that change depends upon a gradual process of moral self-criticism. For the reader, a final act of generosity alone cannot erase responsibility for previous injustice.

Feudal prestige is criticised repeatedly within the narrative, but the question of how its wider institutional structure will change after the legal outcome receives relatively brief treatment.

Sureshwar and the New Generation: The Ambivalence of Social Mobility

Through Sureshwar's life, the title opens towards the future. When talent flourishing within disadvantaged conditions is given an opportunity for education, it acquires the capacity to cross the barriers of the past. Such moral optimism is an important source of the work's energy.

Yet social mobility also has an ambivalent character. On one hand, a figure who demonstrates his abilities through education invalidates society's judgements based upon caste and lineage. On the other, if society honours him only after his success, office or prestigious associations, its underlying prejudice remains. Reading Sugiya and Sureshwar together makes this distinction clear.

The novel's commitment to education is ethically important, but a deeper social analysis of access to educational institutions, costs, language and class resources could have strengthened its realism.

Supporting Characters: Ajay, Vijay, Rameshwar, Sharda and the Judicial World

Beyond the central triangle, several characters make the story more many-sided. Young people such as Ajay and Vijay, Rameshwar, Sharda Babu, the police inspector, figures associated with the school, and court officials disclose different levels of social relations. They represent different shades of dissent within the prosperous class, educated morality, administrative partisanship and the possibility of reform.

On the basis of these figures, one may say that the novel does not consider society uniformly wicked or uniformly good. Reform-minded people may exist even within an exploiting class, and an institution that is supposed to hear demands for justice may itself be unjust. This dynamism in the arrangement of characters increases the work's critical importance.

Some supporting characters, however, become representatives of ideas rather than fully realised people during long exchanges. Greater development of their individual language, memory and uncertainty would have given them fuller human presence.

Narrative Craft: Time, Extended Dialogue and Ethical Purpose

Gudari Ke Lal is a sequential, event-driven narrative. The opening social structure is followed by a family crisis, changing forms of personal relationship, intergenerational change through education and, finally, a judicial outcome. This sequence gives the novel an extended temporal range. The narrative begins before Independence, but its final judicial system points towards a later, historically altered context. Understanding the sequence of events within this transition of time is essential.

In some places the author relies upon extended dialogue instead of direct narration. Conversations between Sugiya and the Thakur faction address gifts, land, rights and her future. The advantage is that the ideological positions of the characters become clear. The drawback is that at times the characters seem less like independently speaking people than spokespeople for the author's reformist ideas.

The courtroom section reverses the violent exercise of power found at the opening: where force and fear previously determined decisions, reason and public legal procedure now become possible. This structural inversion is a noteworthy achievement of the novel's craft.

Language and Rural Reality

The novel's language is primarily the Maithili of everyday interaction. Expressions such as ‘hamra’, ‘tora’, ‘ahan’, ‘kakaro’, ‘bajalah’, ‘saunse’ and ‘gap’ signal social relationships through their use in dialogue. Rural vocabulary and the lexical world of cultivation, hired labour, the mansion, the threshold, the court office and the school produce a sense of social reality.

The language is most effective where a character's manner of speaking reveals that person's social position without explanation. Fear, deference, dissent and self-respect may shift within a single sentence. Extended explanations and repetition sometimes arrest the movement of the story; this is a limitation of craft, not a denial of the value of its vernacular voice.

From an editorial perspective, more restrained dialogue and a reduction of repeated accounts of facts already established through events could have increased the novel's impact. Its distinctly Maithili linguistic character nevertheless remains among its chief achievements.

Feminism and Social Justice: Consent, Marriage and Social Forgiveness

The most difficult question concerns the treatment of Sugiya. Men's power over women's bodies and society's control of their reputations are interrelated. Consequently, even an ostensibly ‘respectable’ option may be compulsory for a woman who has suffered. Judged by the ethics of literature, the ultimate recognition of marriage or family is no self-evident substitute for legal process and a reckoning with earlier violence.

When the novel gives voice to Sugiya's resistance and sorrow, it stands against patriarchal convention. But when the final resolution centres on social acceptance, the possibility of an entirely autonomous life beyond patriarchy is not developed at comparable length. This ambivalence may be regarded as a limitation of the work's historically situated social reformism.

The novelist's human purpose matters: a woman should not be left permanently imprisoned in disgrace. Yet the modern reader must ask whether dignity is a recognition bestowed by society or an inalienable right possessed from the outset. The novel provides rich ground for this debate.

Landlessness, Landlordism and Institutional Exploitation

The opening village situation establishes land as a source of power. Workers cultivate the fields, but they do not own the land. This division creates economic dependence, which in turn becomes the basis for political fear and social subordination. The reach of the mansion's influence into police conduct is the institutional manifestation of this power relation.

Landownership and the abolition of zamindari were major public questions in twentieth-century Bihar. Records of the Bihar Land Reforms Act, 1950, clarify the legal background to the change. But it would be inappropriate to claim that the fictional events of the novel directly document any particular effects of that law. The law provides comparative historical context, not a record of the plot.

The novel's concluding reformist resolution poses a problem: Matru's family is not the only victim of landlord exploitation; the village has many labourers. In such conditions, restoring the standing of one family, however important, is not equivalent to achieving justice for an entire class. This difference is decisive for a critical assessment of the work.

Education: A Right to Opportunity, Not a Gift of Compassion

The school's presence at the beginning, and the social influence of the educated younger generation towards the end, form a long symbolic thread. In the first phase education is close to the resources of the wealthy; in the later phase, that same education becomes a means of countering inequalities fixed by birth.

The title Gudari Ke Lal is not merely a consequence of this argument but its basis: poverty is not proof of a lack of talent. This idea, however, becomes a complete social principle only when everyone is provided equal means through which ability can be recognised. Education must therefore be conceived as a collective right rather than a favour conferred upon individuals.

Matru's and Sugiya's experiences lend human depth to this modern educational ideal. Social change does not mean simply producing an outstanding student; it also means ensuring the dignity of that student's family and of other people in the same class position.

The Judicial Epilogue: Legal Justice and Social Restoration

The courtroom episode in the final section lends public authority to the narrative's resolution. At first, the powerless person's voice was blocked before the landlord and the police; at the end, disputes over social status and private relationships become matters of argument before the court. Through this sequence, the novelist expresses optimistic faith in the justice system.

A significant sentence in the final part articulates the central principle of judicial propriety:

'But I am bound by the law.' (Original text, p. 136)

The sentence signifies more than a courtroom formality. It reveals the difference between a judge's personal goodwill and a decision consistent with law. Judicial procedure claims to offer a public standard distinct from personal affection, anger or the dominance of family prestige.

Even so, legal victory and social justice are not synonymous. Social rehabilitation, women's autonomy, workers' land rights and punishment for institutional oppression cannot all be fully resolved by a single judgement. At this point, the work's optimistic ending invites the reader's independent critical judgement.

The Title's Ultimate Meaning and the Work's Ethical Achievement

On its last printed page, the novel ends with regret at society's inability to recognise a 'jewel in rags'. The title thus ceases to be merely an idiom about a talented child born in poverty; it becomes a figure for the belated recognition of human dignity, social prejudice and remorse.

The final implication is that pride of caste, lineage and property obscures a person's true worth. Those who fail to discern the humanity developing within the ordinary lives before them are in fact losing their own ethical vision.

A major achievement of the novel is that it refuses to confine the story of exploitation to compassionate observation. By relating Sugiya's and Sureshwar's lives to the question of eventual recognition, the author seeks to tell society that standards founded upon birth are capable of change.

Dominant Rasas, Emotional Structure and the Reader's Experience

The karuna rasa, or feeling of pathos, is the novel's principal emotional force. Matru's helplessness, Sugiya's humiliation and the family's insecurity evoke compassion. Social manifestations of raudra and vira, anger and courage, accompany this pathos: indignation at injustice and the desire to oppose it.

In the final stage, anticipation of a court judgement, social recognition and reunion point towards an emotion of tranquillity. Whether that tranquillity erases the entire tragedy, however, depends upon the reader's sensibility. It is here that the work's emotional effect becomes most interesting.

Emotional response alone is not sufficient when reading a narrative of injustice. The work also asks readers to understand the character of the system. In this sense, compassion is an ethical beginning, not a final conclusion.

Kanyadan, Paro and Godan: Comparative Readings

Harimohan Jha's Kanyadan reveals familial and social control over women's marriage through satire. The question of women's lives is expressed in more directly pathetic and dramatic terms in Gudari Ke Lal. Both works examine the moral standards governing marriage and society, but their stylistic foundations differ.

Yatri's Paro is regarded as an important stage in the Maithili novel's movement towards giving women's experiences their own voice. The comparison is useful when reading Sugiya: can a woman's independent will be imagined apart from the social institution of marriage? To what extent does the narrative outcome permit her to answer independently? The woman-centred reading of Paro and the reformist resolution of Gudari Ke Lal cannot be treated as equivalent on these questions.

In Premchand's Godan the peasant's struggle is so deeply bound to economic structures that individual goodwill cannot resolve it. Gudari Ke Lal begins with a comparable portrayal of the exploitation of agricultural workers, but places greater trust in human goodwill, education and successful legal intervention. This difference clarifies the aesthetic direction of the two works.

Such comparative study does not establish that one work was inspired by, or directly followed, another. The similarity concerns social questions, not relations between sources.

Critical Limitations: Reformist Resolve and Artistic Credibility

The work's greatest limitation is the exceptional explicitness of its moral purpose. In many scenes the author's social proposals emerge directly through dialogue. This clarity helps the reader grasp the argument, but reduces the space for artistic ambiguity and independent interpretation.

A second limitation is the imbalance between structural exploitation and individual outcomes. The problems of other village labourers are present at the beginning, but the conclusion focuses largely on justice for Sugiya and her associated family. The private victory matters, yet collective emancipation remains a much broader question.

A third limitation concerns the final definition of women's experience. Sugiya's pain and struggle are moving, but justice is tied very closely to the restoration of the family. Had the possibilities of independent life, social protection and dignity without marriage remained more open, the feminist dimension would have been broader.

A fourth limitation concerns the psychological pace of the characters' final transformation. The passage from intense class pride to moral acceptance calls for sustained inner conflict. In some places the novelist's optimism makes the transition too rapid.

Discussing these limits does not diminish the work's humanistic purpose. Rather, it clarifies the levels on which the novel succeeds and those on which later Maithili social fiction might discover more complex creative possibilities.

Conclusion: Removing the Veil of Inequality and Recognising Human Worth

Gudari Ke Lal deserves a place within the tradition of the Maithili social novel that questions inequalities hidden within local patterns of social conduct. Its story of a pre-Independence village begins with Matru's labour and passes through Sugiya's suffering and struggle for rights, Sureshwar's education and finally public debate in a court of law. Its creative strength lies in combining emotionally driven narrative with an explicit social concern.

Sugiya's struggle shows how economic dependence restricts women's freedom; Sureshwar's story demonstrates the importance of education as a means of resisting social prohibitions; and Jalim Singh's portrayal reveals that the prestige of lineage is no guarantee of moral worth.

The work's final insight is particularly meaningful. Society overlooks those it regards as mere rags, and recognises the real value within them only late in the day. The novel's value, however, lies not simply in the discovery of one talented individual: it criticises the exploitative circumstances that deny recognition to the talent, self-respect and sense of justice of many people.

It is consequently most reasonable to read Gudari Ke Lal as an optimistic, reformist social novel. Some of its resolutions are admittedly simplified when judged by the rigorous demands of realism, but its contribution to the expression of human dignity and social questions in the mother tongue, and to the reconstruction of standing through education, is of literary significance.

Primary Sources

Nand Kumar Mishra ‘Nand’. Gudari Ke Lal (Maithili novel). Gosauni Baidyanath Smriti Manch, Upardaha, Darbhanga. Original edition available; numbered text pp. 1–140; author's statement dated Vijayadashami, 2008.

Nand Kumar Mishra ‘Nand’. Author's statement, preliminary pages of Gudari Ke Lal. Primary evidence for the work's declared social purpose, fictional arrangement of characters and circumstances of composition.

History of the Maithili Novel and Comparative Sources

Jha, Harimohan. Kanyadan. First published 1933. Modern edition information: Rajkamal Prakashan Group, Kanyadan–Dwiragaman, ISBN 9788119028078.

Jha, Harimohan. Dwiragaman. Published 1943; details in Devshankar Navin, ‘Harimohan Jha Ki Vyangya-Drishti’, Gadyakosh.

University Grants Commission/CEC. Study module on social consciousness in Maithili literature.

Interview with Kathakar Ashok, ‘A Journey Through Maithili Literature With Kathakar Ashok’, Outlook India, 2023.

‘Premchand and the Moral Economy of Peasantry in Colonial North India’, Modern Asian Studies, Cambridge University Press; also discussion of the Indian realist novel in ‘Modernity, Catastrophe, and Realism in the Postcolonial Indian Novel’.

Government of India, India Code. The Bihar Land Reforms Act, 1950 (Bihar Act 30 of 1950).

‘The Storm Still Gathers: Remembering Vaidyanath Mishra, aka Nagarjun, the People's Poet’, Scroll, 2025; modern discussion of women's sensibilities in Paro.

Videha: catalogues of Maithili prose and books. Mention of Gudari Ke Lal in the list of works by Nand Kumar Mishra ‘Nand’.

Chapter 4

Anathiya Kukur

Village–City Relations, Class Morality and Social Reconstruction

Nand Kumar Mishra ‘Nand’'s Anathiya Kukur transforms changing relations between the villages and towns of Mithila, economic inequality, ethical responsibility, relations between women and men, judicial procedure and aspirations for rural regeneration into interconnected narrative material. The experiences of Prem and Malti as they move between Delhi and the countryside provide the novel's central thread; the episode involving Vidur raises problems of trust, opportunism and institutional justice within this idealistic structure. Across eleven parts, readers encounter a shifting narrative centre: sometimes the social organisation of rural life, sometimes family intimacy, at other times litigation and financial dealings, and elsewhere the love and marriage of younger characters. The present study examines this multiplicity both as the novel's strength and as its limitation. Videha's book catalogue classifies Anathiya Kukur as a ‘novel’ and Swarna Kamal as a ‘children's novel’. Comparison with the history of children's literature is therefore relevant, but it would be inappropriate to classify Anathiya Kukur itself as a children's novel.

Genre and Creative Foundations

The outer cover, the preliminary ‘A Few Words’, the printed sequence of the story and its final page indicate a coherent extended narrative. The available printed copy has a continuous narrative pagination from page 1 to page 245 and is divided into eleven numbered parts. The opening statement bears the author's name, Nand Kumar Mishra, and the date 14 January 2011. That date is taken as the date of the author's statement, not as a definitively established year of publication; the copy does not independently and clearly confirm a publication year. The printed publishing particulars mention ‘Gosainji Baidyanath Smriti Manch’ and Darbhanga.

The primary basis of this essay is the sequence of the original printed text, its divisions, important episodes, relationships among characters and the author's introductory statement. The study seeks to keep the retelling of depicted events separate from critical interpretation.

The work is, in generic terms, a social novel. In ‘A Few Words’, the author particularly raises the distance between rural and urban mentalities, the economic attractions of the city, the village's backwardness, tensions of casteism and communalism, and the need for social reform. Readers may accordingly approach the fictional world as a moral and social proposition by the writer. Criticism, however, must examine the distinction between the introduction and the actual narrative design: how adequately does the story give artistic form to the change the author desires? This is the fundamental question.

Outline of the Plot: From City to Village and from Village Back towards Society

The story opens with a night journey, departure from Delhi towards Rajnagar, the companionship of Prem and Malti, and the arrangements of domestic life (printed p. 1 onwards). Trains, stations, waiting, acquaintances and informal household conversations establish the novel's geographical direction. The emotional centre is not merely the husband and wife, but the wider village society revealed through them. Thereafter the author repeatedly draws comparisons between urban amenities and the difficult conditions of village life.

In the social world of Dhankahi, situations involving education, caste status, labour, farmers, local priests, prosperous families and the disadvantaged come into view. Prem's outlook rests upon the use of rural resources, practical assistance and community dignity. Friendship with Vidur initially inspires hope and trust, but in time financial transactions and disputes involving land call that trust into question. The novelist accumulates many conflicting situations to create sympathy for Prem.

Subsequently, legal proceedings, allegations, affidavits, evidence and office practices sharpen the conflict. The novel thus progresses beyond private morality to questions of institutional ethics. Elsewhere, farmers' fields, the insecurity of rural workers, bullying, theft and mutual accusations impart the immediacy of ordinary life. In later parts, educated young city-dwellers, discussions of love and marriage, religious experiences in Banaras and a return to the central family widen the plot's circumference. Finally, affection connected with the everyday problems of home and village, together with hope for rural reform, becomes prominent (pp. 244–245).

Separate Close Readings of the Eleven Printed Parts

Part One: From a Journey to a Social Map

The first part opens with an account of travel. Prem and Malti's companionship, the bustle of the station, family conversation, the practical needs of domestic life and the easy rhythm of relationships prepare the initial narrative ground. The novelist first creates a tangible atmosphere of experience; local social problems then gradually enter the story. This arrangement produces a contrast between the mobile time of the city and the apparently stationary experiences of the village.

The presence of Manikant and Sulekha, together with Prem's desire to help society, shows the expansion of personal affection in this part. The protagonist has a pronounced inclination towards altruism. A risk, however, accompanies it: sometimes the narrative leaves aside the complexity of character and begins proclaiming the character's moral qualities. At this stage the idealistic technique still attracts the reader, but continual repetition later may diminish artistic tension.

Towards the end, dialogue brings the need for village service, education and values into view. The opening concerns a private journey, but the ending introduces collective questions; this is the part's important narrative achievement.

Part Two: Dhankahi, Education and Social Inequality

The introduction to Dhankahi depicts the scarcity of resources among poor cultivators and labourers, difficulties of travel, school facilities and the social standing of the teacher Shreemat Chaudhary. Mention of his wife Sunita connects the domestic world with education and public life. This part does not reduce rural deprivation to an emotional tableau; it also indicates its economic foundations.

The relationship among village children, schooling, resources and opportunity becomes more direct here. The subject of the passage therefore concerns children's welfare; but children's experiences, a child's narrative perspective or the independent mental world of children does not become the organising centre. This is where the subtle but necessary distinction between children's literature and a social novel about children's concerns can be understood.

Through contrasts between Prem's family and the school environment, the author stresses the interconnectedness of education, livelihood and rural deprivation. The section gives the novel a social geography, although the introduction of numerous characters sometimes remains confined to explanatory sketches.

Part Three: Business, Friendship and the Beginnings of Trust

Prem's urban business, employees and office organisation provide the starting ground for this section. The arrival of Vidur from a poor village family transforms class distance into a personal relationship. Introduction, hospitality, dining together and respectful conduct bring into view the possibility of trust between people.

It is difficult to limit Prem's and Vidur's relationship to that of employer and dependant; the novelist tries to transform it into an ideal of friendship. Yet differences of economic power and social standing complicate this friendship from the beginning. What the characters regard as spontaneous generosity may also be seen by the reader as containing disparities of dependence and entitlement.

The distinguishing feature of this section is that the seeds of a future dispute are sown in an atmosphere of warm welcome and trust. This is a highly effective transition in the development of events; the narrative's long-term tension is heightened by its early intimacy.

Part Four: The Priest, Prestige and Social Mediation

Introducing Pandit Kapileshwar Thakur, the story enters the intimate circle of religious standing, priest–patron relations, caste-based conduct and rural dominance. References to the character's humility and benevolence prevent him from becoming a one-dimensional villain, while the priest–patron relationship also provides subtle indications of social power.

The religious and economic relationships of the village do not occupy separate compartments. When decisions, access or social trust are established through a priest, an accepted tradition is at work behind them. The author searches for the values of humanity and cooperation within customary proprieties, but gives relatively little room to direct criticism of convention.

The discursive quality of dialogue is especially apparent here. Characters express ideas while going about their business; sometimes an idea sets events in motion, and sometimes the event merely illustrates an idea. In the latter case, artistic density is somewhat weakened.

Part Five: Rural and Urban Environments and Economic Life

This short part opens with the narrator's commentary upon differences between village and city environments. Comparisons among urban facilities, rural scarcity, collective life, employment, service and civic conduct come openly into view. Questions about material resources are combined with a moral assessment of society.

Prem's proposed loans, plans to obtain funds from a bank and the financial basis of village improvement give this passage particular importance. Assistance must not remain merely an exhortation; it requires finance, time, interest and management. The episode conveys that understanding. The genuine risks of raising capital and carrying debt, however, are not explored as extensively as they might be.

This part makes the programmatic undertone of the entire novel exceptionally clear. The critical question is how far the desire for social reform becomes an actual institutional mechanism and how far it remains dependent upon the protagonist's generosity.

Part Six: Vidur's Story and the Legal Conflict

Allegations brought against Prem and the examination of court-related documents provide this part's principal tension. The former warmth of his friendship with Vidur is repeatedly recalled; its contrast with present suspicion and antagonism heightens the sense of ‘betrayal’. Ownership of government accommodation, notices, litigation and documents take the story beyond the bounds of the family into public institutions.

Ganguli Babu offers a contrasting figure of sympathetic counsel and legal understanding. He preserves the possibility of social trust against a world that might otherwise appear uniformly hostile. Several practical details of the litigation, however, are presented descriptively. This creates a legal atmosphere but raises the question of balance between documentary particulars and narrative excitement.

The author's particular insistence is that judicial truth should triumph. The entire affair imperils the protagonist's moral standing, but the opposing side's arguments are granted relatively little autonomy. The novel's social position is strong here, while its psychological multiplicity is limited.

Part Seven: Farmers' Fields and Signs of Rural Violence

Bhola Babu, Feku Raut and agricultural episodes open another world of labour relations in the village. Grazing animals, damaged crops, guarding fields, the conduct of a domineering person, apologies and an atmosphere of fear show that land is not simply a means of production but also a focus of prestige and conflict.

Despite indications of physical violence and bullying, the novelist emphasises individual judgement, religious trust and reform of conduct as means of resolution. The idea of farmers' political organisation or collective resistance remains comparatively faint. Greater freedom for labourers' own voices would have deepened the reader's understanding of class.

Reading the financial proposals of Part Five together with the agrarian experiences of Part Seven reveals the novel's central difficulty: goodwill can initiate development, but without altering the balance of power justice cannot be guaranteed.

Part Eight: Accusations, Offices and the Politics of Evidence

Company property, accounts, investigations and documents deepen Prem's predicament. Office episodes involving ‘Mr Khanna’ take the plot to a new level of realism through the processes of accusation and rebuttal. To establish his innocence, Prem must struggle with the language of administration.

The distinction between the authority of an office document and personal truth is particularly significant here. If a document is evidence of facts, it can also be misused; this dilemma is central to modern institutional life. The section accordingly moves beyond simple village–city comparisons to become a criticism of modern bureaucratic power.

The narrator's intense belief in the protagonist's innocence sometimes reduces dramatic uncertainty. Rather than merely learning the final outcome, the reader would welcome subtler descriptions of the process, humiliation and psychological injury.

Part Nine: Educated Youth, Women's Desires and Marriage

The narrative turns to Nayak, Kamini and Mr Darbala. Travel by train, books, studies, professional prospects and conversation produce the different rhythms of educated urban society. Kamini's intellectual ambitions and the question of marriage create an important subplot concerning women.

This passage offers an opportunity to regard love not simply as emotional attraction, but as a question of rights, consent, propriety and the choice of one's future. Kamini voices her wishes; nevertheless, the narrative arrangement repeatedly maintains the dominance of male characters' moral views. The subplot would have acquired greater dimensions had the woman's psychological conflicts been developed more fully from her own perspective.

This romantic branch appears to move away from the main story of village improvement, but it has a social function: the clash between education, urban careers and family propriety extends the novel's fundamental moral debate to another generation.

Part Ten: The Family, Celebration and the Testing of Personal Relationships

Kamini's birthday, the gathering of visitors and concern for Mr Darbala's health lend domestic life a human warmth at the beginning of this part. The atmosphere of celebration suddenly gives way to illness and anxiety. Such a change brings the instability of private life and the value of mutual care into view.

Between the surface happiness of relationships, underlying apprehensions, the authority of teacher and pupil or of different generations, and the difficulties of marital decisions, individuals choose their own moral responsibilities. The dialogue repeatedly tries to establish ideals; more attention to the characters' silence, embarrassment or self-contradiction would have made their experiences more credible.

Parts Nine and Ten together show that the author's social morality is not limited to public life: marriage and the family are another site of its testing.

Part Eleven: From Pilgrimage Experience to the Return

The final part begins with Banaras, the Vishwanath Temple, religious belief, travel away from home and sympathy for a person in distress. This religious geography connects the novel's village boundaries with a wider Indian cultural landscape. Helping a suffering person accords with the author's initial humanistic commitment.

In the closing pages, the strands involving Prem and Malti, Vidur, Manikant, Sulekha and family relationships come together again. The aspiration for village improvement remains alive through a balance between urban commerce and economic assistance to the village. The ending does not claim a complete political transformation; it rests upon hope generated through everyday conduct, trust and assistance.

The return at the end is meaningful. Where the opening journey was directed towards the village, the final journey reaffirms responsibility towards

it. The question nevertheless remains open: to what degree can moral goodwill eliminate complex social inequalities?

Principal Patterns of Social Criticism

Village and City: Interdependence Rather than Opposition

The introductory statement sharply contrasts urban prosperity with rural deprivation. In the story, however, Prem conducts his business in the city while his goal of improvement lies in the village: material resources are acquired in one place and their social use is sought in another. Village and city are therefore not enemy worlds but two ends of an interdependent economic system. This complicates the novel's declared moral opposition. To regard the city solely as the centre of greed and the village solely as a pure collectivity would be exaggerations in both cases; readers witness the tension between these concepts.

Prem's journeys are not merely changes of location but movements of social consciousness. Railway stations, hotels, offices, fields and courtyards are different stages within a single narrative territory. Through these changes of scene, the author creates a portrait of displacement in modern Mithila, migrant livelihoods and the incomplete provision of village amenities.

Class Responsibility, Charity and Structural Change

Prem's philanthropy is deeply well-intentioned. Nevertheless, the position of characters receiving assistance from someone with economic power calls for a critical testing of the author's idealism. If village transformation depends upon the loans, service, instruction or moral inspiration of one capable protagonist, how far does the village community develop its own independent social power? The novel's class question resides precisely here.

The role of loans in rural development, risks faced by farmers, crop protection, access to schooling and access to justice are interwoven concerns. Reform cannot therefore be merely the fruit of individual virtue; it requires collective decision-making, transparent finance, legal protection and accountability in local institutions. By this standard the author's vision is inspiring but, in places, incomplete.

Caste, Religion and Social Hierarchy

The author's statement clearly aspires to oppose caste hostility and communal narrowness. The coexistence of priests, prosperous villagers, teachers and cultivators affords glimpses of social hierarchy. Caste experience, however, does not receive extensive treatment through the memories, language and struggles of the people who suffer from it. An exhortation to social harmony and an analysis of the power of the caste system are not the same. Acknowledging the difference does not diminish the humanistic intention of the work; it identifies its historical limits.

The Judiciary and Documentary Truth

Episodes involving lawsuits, notices, affidavits, office property, allegations and evidence are important aspects of modern social reality. Inequalities of economic power may prove decisive not just in the fields but also in courts and offices. Through the accusation against Prem, the novel raises questions about the destruction of personal reputation and the impartiality of institutions. Its account of the courts, however, sometimes becomes excessively explanatory while acquainting the reader with procedural complexities.

Women Characters: From Companionship to the Struggle for Autonomy

Malti is an important centre of domestic life, practices of social help and Prem's psychological strength. Sulekha and Sunita bring their own network of relationships into the family. Kamini's story introduces the questions of education, professional identity and marital choice. Despite this extensive presence, most decisive public plans remain controlled by male characters. This is a gender-based limitation of the novel.

Kamini's story in particular shows that an educated woman's aspirations cannot be reduced to her suitability for marriage; she makes claims upon her own desires and future. The narrator nevertheless grants her less space for autonomy than the story might have allowed. A critique of patriarchal relations is possible from within the novel itself; there is no need to impose an external theory upon it.

Narrative Craft, Dialogue, Language and the Symbolism of the Title

The Strengths and Difficulties of a Multi-Centred Plot

The extended narrative's first achievement is the breadth of its fictional society. Moving outwards from Prem and Malti to Vidur, Manikant and Sulekha, the village priest, farmers, office workers, Nayak and Kamini, and pilgrims, the story connects different social locations. Yet the transitions from one character's life to another's are not equally strong throughout. Some subplots move away from the main developmental arc and begin to resemble independent moral novels.

The numbered parts offer readers pauses within the work as a whole. Sometimes a part ends with a momentary emotional resolution; elsewhere a new story arises without sufficient preparation. The strength of this arrangement is its panoramic portrayal of life; its weakness is looseness and narrative repetition.

Dialogue-Driven Prose: Living Speech or Sermon?

Dialogue establishes the characters' closeness to one another. Questions and answers, forms of address, apologies, advice and reassurance allow readers to encounter many shades of rural and urban conduct. In several places, however, dialogue conveys the author's moral opinions more than individual character. The voices then cease to be sufficiently distinguishable. This applies particularly to Prem's speeches about social improvement and to certain episodes of conflict resolution.

The use of moral ideas as narrative turning points is itself a novelistic tradition. Artistic strength grows, however, when ideas arise naturally out of characters' actions, failures, hesitation or mistaken decisions. In Anathiya Kukur, the successful episodes are those in which economic choices have observable consequences; the weaker ones are those in which, rather than showing outcomes, the narration begins to explain the virtue it wishes to commend.

Linguistic Register and the Possibilities of Editing

Colloquial Maithili, social forms of address, bureaucratic vocabulary, contemporary terms relating to trains and offices, and religious diction coexist in the text. This increases the diversity of its social world. At the same time, consistent spelling and punctuation across such a multilingual vocabulary would aid reading. In a future critical edition, editorial consistency in character names, dialogue marks, episode divisions and technical terms would be valuable.

The vitality of the language comes from its local cadence. Editing should aim not to dissolve that cadence into Hindi or any external standard, but to communicate the author's own idiom and the distinct voices of characters more clearly to readers.

The Possible Meanings of the Title Anathiya Kukur

The image of the ‘kukur’, or dog, in the title may be read as a metaphor for social conduct. The author's opening statement expresses concern over urban attractions, the grip of self-interest, the weakening of village relationships and opportunism; the story itself contains broken trust, plunder, deception and threats to public standing. In the light of these episodes, the title may be understood as a satirical sign of society's unrestrained self-interest.

It would nevertheless be inappropriate to assign the title a single certain etymology or to presume it names one particular character within the story. Its metaphorical power matters also because the work is not a simple animal story but an ethical struggle involving human relationships.

Comparative Position within the Maithili Tradition of Children's Literature

The mere appearance of children, discussion of schools or a commitment to educational reform does not make a work children's literature. One must separately consider the intended readership, narrative viewpoint, linguistic pace, imagination, age-appropriate complexity and centre of experience. Extended litigation, business loans, land disputes, married life and the complexities of adult love are central narrative elements of Anathiya Kukur. Its primary readership is therefore that of the adult social novel.

The organisation of Videha's ‘Shishu Utsav’ collection makes clear that Maithili children's literature is not confined to moral fables. It lists distinct forms, including nursery songs, children's poetry, short-short stories, picture stories, children's novels, plays, popular presentations of science and translated illustrated books. Children's writing in Maithili is thus being brought together digitally in genres that can be compared with one another.

Videha's list mentions 2002 as the year of the first edition of Preeti Thakur's translated Chhot Aa Paigh and 2003 for Mal-Jal Aa Janwar Dis Dekhu. Listings for Gonu Jha Aa Aan Maithili Chitrakatha (2008), Maithili Chitrakatha (2009), Mithilak Lokdevta (2010) and Vidyapatik Purush Pariksha (2012) illustrate a sequence of picture stories and adaptations of folk memory and classical narratives for children. These dates belong to the relevant catalogue entries; they cannot, by themselves, establish chronological primacy or the full history of Maithili children's literature.

Videha classifies Jagdish Prasad Mandal's Nai Dharaiye and Jagadanand Jha 'Manu''s Chonha as children's novels; Nand Kumar Mishra 'Nand''s Swarna Kamal is also expressly listed as a children's novel. By contrast, Anathiya Kukur is placed in the general novel category. The most dependable comparative fact here is not similarity of subject but the catalogue's explicit distinction of genre. Swarna Kamal establishes the writer's interest in child readers, while Anathiya Kukur extends the same writer's adult social narrative.

Neeta Jha's children's short-story collection Bilai Mausi, Munnaji's Teen Ta Bal Natak and Preeti Thakur's picture-story undertaking demonstrate generic diversity in writing for children. No definite judgement is offered here about the particular characters or literary quality of all these works, because the evidence for comparison is their published catalogue entries, not a line-by-line comparative reading of all the original books. These generic facts may nevertheless legitimately be used in describing the tradition.

A history of children's literature cannot adequately represent folk tales, oral traditions, nursery songs, school literature, children's novels and digital picture stories as a single linear development. They differ in reading age, textual culture, distribution and artistic expectations. Anathiya Kukur's commitment to rural education enters into conversation with the social conditions of children, but the novel is not a primary object in the history of children's literature; it is a neighbouring object of study within social prose.

Position in Relation to the Author's Other Works

Videha's book list describes Gaam-Ghar as a story collection; Sujata, Gudari Ke Lal and Sukanya as novels; Aadambar as a story collection; Dillik Park as word portraits; Parivar as an autobiographically inflected novel; and Swarna Kamal as a children's novel. The list demonstrates the range of prose genres practised by the writer. Anathiya Kukur's interest in movement between city and village, family, employment and moral conflict is usefully situated within this broader literary career.

A title alone, however, cannot establish thematic similarity or a relationship of influence. Gaam-Ghar, for example, suggests rural subjects, but without reading its constituent stories one cannot declare concrete similarities between their characters and those of Anathiya Kukur. Criticism must acknowledge the limits of inference. The findings of this study rest principally upon the printed text of Anathiya Kukur itself and, where it compares the author's other writings, upon Videha's verified bibliography.

Critical Assessment: Achievements and Limitations

The work's first achievement is the breadth of the novelist's social concerns. Prem and Malti's private family life is not the whole story: it extends to poor farmers, teachers, priests, urban employees, accused persons, lawyers and courts, educated young women and pilgrims. The economic and ethical questions of Maithil life become interconnected through this range.

A second achievement is that village reform is related not merely to emotional sympathy, but to financial transactions, employment, loans, land disputes and legal protection. Its realistic perspective thus becomes concrete in several places. A third achievement is the easy movement of dialogue, which allows readers to experience both the intimacy of characters and the collapse of trust between them.

An important limitation is the repetition of moral idealism. Prem's goodness is sometimes so decisive that the independent depth of other characters' motives and uncertainties is reduced. If the mental lives of the more antagonistic figures were opened further, the social conflict would gain in dramatic contradiction.

A second limitation is the unevenness of narrative focus. The romantic subplot involving the young, while valuable in its own right, requires a more coherent integration into the principal village–city axis. A third limitation is the restricted role of women in decisive action. Malti and Kamini matter, but many social outcomes are organised around the proposals and decisions of men. A fourth limitation is the excessive trust placed in individual generosity as a remedy for social structure.

Even after these criticisms, it would be unjust to dismiss Anathiya Kukur as merely sermonising prose. Its everyday social world, linguistic environment, family ties, crises of the modern office and sincere aspiration for village improvement raise distinctive questions within the Maithili social novel. Literary assessment must respect these social aspirations while subjecting their artistic realisation to rigorous scrutiny.

Conclusion

Anathiya Kukur is a Maithili novel centred upon social responsibility, animated by the belief that human cooperation can bridge the distance between village and city. Prem and Malti's life, the deterioration of the relationship with Vidur, farmers' insecurity, documentary forms of justice and the younger generation's emotional struggles are not separate debates. Together they ask what relations among trust, propriety, wealth and justice ought to look like in modern society.

The work appears to have been written in the hope that much may be achieved by improving individual moral conduct. Socially this hope matters; artistically it becomes a limitation when complex structural conditions are reduced to a conclusion of easy goodwill. The novel's actual contribution emerges more clearly when read through this contradiction.

Within the development of Maithili children's literature, its place is not that of a children's novel but of adult social writing that raises serious questions about educational opportunities and children's futures. The separate generic identity of the author's Swarna Kamal makes the distinction clearer. An inquiry that maintains it is more credible both as literary history and as textual criticism.

Chapter 5

Sujata

Women's Identity, Social Control and Administrative Ethics

Nand Kumar Mishra ‘Nand’’s Sujata is a short novel in which the heroine's private life is intertwined with social and administrative life. The narrative begins with family arrangements for marriage, moves through widowhood, the question of remarriage and livelihood, and develops in its latter part through episodes of office malpractice, the exploitation of women employees and resistance. This research essay reads the thirteen numbered parts separately and evaluates character construction, the narrator's moral position, the social psychology of Mithila, linguistic conventions, visual detail, dialogue and the conclusion. Comparison with the history of Maithili children's literature clarifies that Sujata is not itself a children's novel, although its themes of education, agency, gender equality and institutional justice offer separate possibilities for adaptation for adolescent readers. The essay cites only the printed original and specified literary archival materials from Videha.

Bibliographic Description and Genre

The title page explicitly describes Sujata as a ‘Maithili novel’. Its author is Nand Kumar Mishra ‘Nand’, and the publisher is named as Mrs Amal Devi of Bhikhanpur, Bhagalpur. The dedication names Shri Amaresh Chandra Mishra. The signed introduction by Dr Amarnath bears the printed date 7 January 2006. No separate, definite year of first publication could be confirmed in the original copy available; to treat the date of the introduction as the publication year would therefore be unjustified in textual criticism. The original narrative runs from printed page 1 to page 80 and is divided into thirteen numbered parts.

Genre is a foundational issue in this criticism. The characters are principally adults, and the narrative centres upon marriage, social pressure related to financial exchanges resembling dowry, public attitudes linked to sexual morality, widows' remarriage, livelihood, employee politics, misconduct and relationships between senior officials and employees. The child-centred viewpoint, leadership by child characters, unfolding of events appropriate to children's psychology and age-specific narrative style expected in a children's novel are not its organising creative principles. Videha's children's literature list classifies the author's Swarna Kamal as a ‘children's novel’, while its prose list separately classifies Sujata as a ‘novel’. That distinction is itself important evidence.

The introduction discusses the author's poetic interests and reformist outlook. In his preliminary statement, the author says the story is based on true events while names of people and places have been fictionalised. That is the author's own claim within the novel's paratext, not independent historical verification. What matters for the critic is that the author presents the story as a record of moral struggle even before it begins. Consequently, the reader's sympathies are already being organised in Sujata's favour.

The Critical Problem and Principal Arguments

A fundamental question arises: does the social consciousness of Sujata achieve the artistic form of a novel, or does the author's reformist purpose sometimes overwhelm the complexity of characters and events? The answer has two sides. The successive experiences of the heroine—education, marriage, bereavement, the possibility of remarriage, efforts to end economic dependence and an awareness of rights at work—create a living representation of social reality through their development. Yet the sharp moral division of characters, repeated negative portrayals of villains, didactic dialogue and the swift administrative resolution of problems at the end also simplify the narrative.

Three levels are kept distinct in this study: first, events or words explicitly present in the book; second, critical interpretations derived from that text; and third, comparative facts drawn from Videha's catalogues and research articles on Maithili children's literature. The fictional narrative is not treated as independent history, nor is the mere appearance of a title in a bibliography taken as proof of the work's entire plot. Episodes can be checked against the original printed page numbers.

Overall Narrative Development: From Private Grief to Public Resistance

The story begins with Ramakant's family life and preparations for the marriage of his son Pankaj. While pursuing his studies, Pankaj secures a government job. Sujata, meanwhile, is born into Umakant's family, where, despite poverty, she learns to balance study, household responsibilities and social dignity. Amid discussions of a marriage proposal and economic standing, the two are married. Their early married life is represented as a kind of hopeful middle-class dream, extended through travel scenes and mutual affection.

The first major turning point is Pankaj's premature death. Sujata's life is suddenly thrown into crisis. Her parents-in-law, her own parents, society's prejudices concerning widowhood, fears of humiliation and economic anxieties all press upon her at once. Sujata raises questions concerning her desires and rights, but her decisions are not straightforward: family pressure, fear of public disgrace, self-respect and the practical demands of living collide. Bereavement ultimately pushes her towards self-reliance.

The government office then becomes the second principal setting. Under provisions associated with Pankaj's employment, Sujata obtains an opportunity to work. As a new employee, she encounters bureaucracy, paperwork, networks among staff and improper conduct. Through Kalavati, Sunita, a character described as a leader, personnel officers and senior officials, the story transforms a crisis of private life into a question of institutional injustice. The final phase indicates the possibility of change through personal courage, collective assistance and administrative intervention.

Separate Close Readings of the Thirteen Numbered Parts

Part One: Family, Male Succession and Marriage Preparations

The story opens amidst the month of Phagun, village sounds and household activity. Colourful seasonal description gives the text emotional ease. Ramakant's middle-class family, his son Pankaj's studies and successful employment, and concern about his marriage together establish a social structure in which marriage is not simply a private bond between two individuals but also a matter of family status and plans for the future.

Repeated discussion of Pankaj's education, job and income discloses the link between material security and the marriage market. References to 'good' employment, family qualifications and a balanced domestic life clarify this class mentality. Critically significant is the fact that marriage is initially defined by the man's achievements; the heroine has yet to appear. That delay subsequently makes Sujata's centrality more meaningful.

Part Two: Sujata's Childhood, Labour and Education

This part introduces Sujata's family and upbringing. The material shortages in Umakant's household, farming and limited resources provide an essential basis for the narrative. From childhood Sujata is portrayed as studious, well-mannered and capable in household tasks. The double burden of formal education and domestic labour is an important sign of the social formation of women.

On one hand the author regards a daughter's education as an achievement; on the other, he also seeks proof of her exemplary character in service to her family, religious feeling and social approval. The tension between empowerment and the conventional ideal of womanhood must be recognised here. Rather than limiting Sujata's abilities to a list of virtues belonging to a 'good daughter', one can regard her knowledge and work as an independent foundation beyond the expectations of the marriage market.

Part Three: The Economics of Marriage, Negotiation and Class Culture

Negotiations over Pankaj's marriage intersect with the family's financial limitations. Discussion moves among the wedding procession, available means, expenditure, the ideal marriage and practical requirements of prestige. Ramakant speaks in favour of an ideal opposed to ostentation, but family standing, fear of public opinion and concern for the other side complicate social conduct.

The real achievement here lies in representing marriage not as a pure event of love but as a field of social rank, property, family self-respect and public opinion. The characters' exchanges, however, sometimes begin to resemble speeches at a meeting, reducing the naturalness of dialogue. From a modern critical perspective, the section combines opposition to the commodification of marriage with a didactic narrative technique.

Part Four: The Post-Wedding Journey, Love and Approaching Separation

After the wedding, the episodes of the chauthi observance, travel, meetings and affection between Pankaj and Sujata bring readers close to private life. Scenic detail and marital intimacy give Sujata an opportunity to become an experiencing person, rather than merely a symbol of a social question. Behind the celebrations and arrangements for the wedding, the uncertainty of the couple's private life is also present.

The emotional movement of travel, descriptions of beauty and idealisation of love are presumably intended to intensify the sorrow to come. Nevertheless, the psychological depth of the couple's personal conversations is somewhat limited; love is established more through the narrator's comments than through subtle conflicts within the characters themselves. This part forms a bridge between the novel's emotional setting and the crisis towards which the narrative moves.

Part Five: Domestic Intimacy and Fragile Happiness

The story depicts the daily life of the newly married couple, Pankaj's office, Sujata's management of the household and their care for each other. The narrator offers small practical details; happiness is consequently expressed through habitual actions as well as through emotional declarations.

The part's brevity is important to the plot. Happiness seems threatened with destruction even before it can become settled. Sujata's personality abounds in service, affection and responsibility, but the independent development of her own wishes and thoughts remains limited. Widowhood in the following part calls that imbalance into question.

Part Six: Pankaj's Death, Grief and the Institutional Forms of Insecurity

Pankaj's sudden death turns the story decisively. After an episode involving travel, news of his death, family sorrow, Sujata's helpless position and anxiety over livelihood are presented together. The author does not reduce grief to a pathetic tableau; he also reveals how fragile women's security is in a social order dependent upon husbands.

Advice about Sujata's future, the support of her parents, her parents-in-law's reactions and interventions by others reveal contrasting moral positions. Some characters invoke religion and convention to present restrictions on a widow's life as natural. The critical question is which voice carries greater force: the widow's own suffering or society's control over her life. Sujata's voice is suppressed at first, but that suppression creates the need for later resistance.

Part Seven: Widows' Remarriage, Women's Rights and Society's Double Standards

The narrator directly comments on the male-dominated nature of society. A widower's remarriage is socially accepted as normal, while a widow's possibility of remarriage is surrounded by condemnation, family prestige and the threat of social punishment. Through this contrast, the narrator makes gender justice a central debate of the novel.

The strength of this part lies in the clarity of its public reasoning. Its weakness is that the narrator's definitive moral statements sometimes diminish the many layers of the characters' inner lives. Even so, relating economic and emotional insecurity to society's moral pressures is an important intervention within the reformist tradition of Maithili social fiction.

Part Eight: Proposals for Remarriage, Kinship Politics and Freedom of Choice

Lutti Jha's intervention, tensions within household relationships, episodes involving Naresh and Ramesh, and conversations among the families make this a dialogue-driven part. Competing interests arise over who has the right to decide a woman's future within the institution of marriage. Affectionate language, fear of damaged prestige, self-interest, public opinion and charity as a disguise become intertwined.

The danger is to interpret the heroine's rights simply as the possibility of being ‘accepted by someone’. The novel attempts to escape this danger as Sujata's disagreement and need to make her own decision emerge. Male intermediaries nonetheless occupy substantial space. The story favours women's independence, yet the social recognition of that independence still appears dependent on the support of male relatives.

Part Nine: Entry into Employment and the Social Meaning of White Clothing

Following Pankaj's death, Sujata obtains a job through official procedures. Her appearance at the office in white garments on the first day makes private grief publicly visible. The part marks her transition from the roles of wife and widow to that of employee. The centre of social identity moves from home to office.

Employment here means more than earnings; it offers the ability to make decisions about everyday life, personal identity, public participation and hope for the future. The responses of officials and other employees to her appointment, however, make clear that a woman's presence in public space does not in itself create safety. A second struggle begins in Sujata's experience.

Part Ten: Kalavati and the Informal Foundations of Solidarity

Sujata meets Kalavati at the office. This relationship opens the possibility of cooperation among women within administrative procedures. Documents, colleagues, systems of assistance and employees' problems are presented not as mysterious obstacles but as concrete forms of social structure.

In the novel's first half, the family was the centre of decisions about life; now relationships of trust are sought among colleagues. Sujata no longer regards her difficulties merely as personal fate, but understands them as a question of shared circumstances. The part's importance lies not in a miraculous turn of the plot, but in generating the possibility of collective action.

Part Eleven: Employee Politics, Improper Demands and the Strategy of Courage

Against arbitrary power, Sujata does not seek direct physical force; she looks for argument, evidence, colleagues' advice and the proper official procedure.

Critically, this section may be read as a short narrative of institutional ethics. The story shows that personal goodwill is necessary but insufficient for resisting injustice: documents, the confidence of colleagues and knowledge of the hierarchy of office are also essential. Its impact would nevertheless have been greater had the psychology of corrupt characters been more complex.

Part Twelve: Contacting Senior Officials and Reordering Relations of Power

Having learned about the senior personnel officer, Sujata attempts to bring the problem of office injustice to a higher level. Her personal courage becomes a process of administrative communication. A path is sought among the human sensitivity of the official, the pressures faced by office employees and the causes of misconduct.

Here the story locates its instrument of resolution in the ethical judgement of a fair-minded senior officer. This optimism is welcome from a human standpoint, but a realistic study of institutional reform raises a question: should justice depend solely upon a ‘good senior sahib’? A clearer treatment of written complaints, impartial investigations, protection of rights and disciplinary procedures would have made the narrative more credible.

Part Thirteen: Sunita, Exposure, Collective Resistance and the Ending

In the final and longest part, Sunita's experience brings a second story of women's vulnerability. Sujata witnesses her suffering and resolves to offer help on the basis of her own experience.

As Kalavati, Sunita, Kamala, the personnel officer and other employees become involved, the problem crosses the boundary of one woman confronting one man and becomes a matter of public responsibility. In the conclusion, the officer's support and a decision concerning the transfer of an offending employee produce a sense of moral victory. Critically, however, it is necessary to observe that a transfer is not, in itself, final justice for exploitation; questions of accountability and prevention in the future remain.

The scope of this final part provides literary evidence that the narrative's actual concern is no longer limited to widows' remarriage. Women's public agency, safety at work and opposition to corruption become major creative purposes. The story ends optimistically, but readers can also discern indications of the justice system's incompleteness.

A Sociological Study of the Heroine and Supporting Characters

Sujata: From the Image of an Ideal Woman to a Citizen Who Decides for Herself

The author initially constructs Sujata according to social ideals of good conduct, education, domestic competence and beauty. Rather than challenging the traditional idea of the 'good daughter', the narrator initially relies upon that value. Later, entering employment, resisting humiliation, standing up for other women and daring to speak to an official transform her identity. Through this development, the heroine's humanity moves from personal endurance to a public consciousness of justice.

Sujata's intimate mental state, however, is not revealed with equal depth throughout. Her moral decisions are often announced as ideals; more space for doubt, self-contradiction, the bodily sensations of fear and internal uncertainty would have made the character more many-sided in literary terms. This criticism does not diminish her courage; it distinguishes the novel's achievements from its limitations.

Pankaj, Ramakant and the Parents: Affection and Patriarchal Order

Pankaj's job and marriage become elements of family prestige. His premature death functions as both an emotional catalyst and a dividing line within the narrative. The conduct of adult men, including Ramakant, is not uniform; some express affection, assistance and moral responsibility. Nevertheless, men's opinions, permissions and social standing continue to influence decisions about women's lives. This contradiction shows that the presence of 'good men' does not automatically abolish patriarchal structures.

Lutti Jha, Naresh and Ramesh: Interests, Conventions and Mediation

Lutti Jha is an important voice of household politics and competing interests; his conduct reveals the complexity of kinship, social anxieties and self-interest. The episodes involving Naresh and Ramesh acquaint readers with different levels of possibility, support and obstruction surrounding remarriage. Yet the author places some individuals within a stark good–bad opposition; developing the social origins, contradictions and possibility of change within antagonistic conduct would have produced a more substantial group of characters.

Kalavati and Sunita: The Expansion of Women's Solidarity

The decisive link through which the heroine's individual story becomes a social novel is her relationship with Kalavati and Sunita. Although these women face distinct crises, their circumstances are connected to a shared structure of power. The help Sujata gives is not merely philanthropy; it begins in the mutual recognition of suffering and develops towards collective resistance. These characters' independent awareness and personal histories are not developed as fully as the heroine's, however, and they often serve to clarify the main plot's moral purpose.

Narrative Technique, Time, Setting and Language

Chronology and the Structure of the Thirteen Parts

The story is broadly linear: childhood and education, marriage, death, social crisis, employment, institutional struggle and resolution. The division into thirteen parts is a device for organising the text. They are not autonomous chapters with conventional descriptive titles, but smaller units centred upon turns in the sequence of events. Part Five is relatively brief and Part Thirteen particularly extensive. This asymmetry reveals the narrative's emotional direction: more space is reserved for resisting injustice than for the happiness of marriage.

Village, Home, Pilgrimage and Office

Village agriculture, domestic arrangements, festive wedding venues, scenes of travel and the urban office are not mere backdrops; they express the story's value systems. Family and public opinion prevail in the village, status at the wedding, private aspiration in travel and official rank in the workplace. Sujata's journey crosses the boundaries of these places. The early village portrayal is sensory, while the office episodes depend more on conversation, anxiety and plans. This movement from scene to idea is both a distinctive narrative feature and an artistic imbalance.

Narratorial Intervention and Maxims

The third-person narrator generally adopts an omniscient perspective. Rather than merely recounting a person's conduct, the narrator also offers an immediate ethical assessment of it. Criticism of male-dominated society, advocacy of the ideal marriage and exposition of workplace propriety exemplify such intervention. In terms of social change, this approach provides readers with a clear orientation of values; from the standpoint of literary ambiguity, it sometimes restricts their freedom to judge for themselves.

The Density of Maithili Dialogue and Editorial Questions

The book is rich in spoken Maithili, rural and middle-class vocabulary, conventions of address and naturally arranged conversations. Common verbal forms and relational words such as ‘bajalathi’, ‘muda’, ‘katek’, ‘okara’ and ‘hamra’ root readers in its linguistic setting. Yet in didactic episodes, characters from different social positions begin to offer lengthy moral arguments in the same manner. Future editorial work on the text would benefit from attention to punctuation, printing errors, separation of dialogue and sentence construction—not from careless standardisation of its original word forms.

Feminist, Class-Based and Institutional Readings

A feminist assessment of the novel should not stop at the observation that ‘Sujata is courageous’. Three distinct forms of power need to be recognised: familial control over marriage and widowhood; men's traditional dominance over economic resources; and abuse of official authority in the workplace.

Sujata's journey demands the right to personal decision-making in the first two areas and the moral rights of citizenship in the third.

This understanding of justice is not an ultimate model of fully modern feminist autonomy. At the outset, Sujata's 'ideal' conduct seems to need validation through domestic service, propriety and modesty. This qualified idealisation prompts the question: why must service, purity and social acceptance always be prerequisites for being considered a respectable woman? Sujata's rights are not a reward for moral excellence, but rights she possesses as a human being. This interpretative distinction opens the text more fully.

At the level of class, Sujata's struggle takes her from a family without adequate resources to the security of government employment. Education, public appointment and documentary literacy become means of social mobility; yet recruitment, posting, workplace networks and abuse of authority present economic inequality in new forms. The novel stresses the practical constraints faced by poor and middle-class households, but does not develop the extensive structure of labour institutions or independent organisations of women employees.

The question of institutional justice demands particular attention at the end. The positive resolution offers readers confidence that evidence and courage can challenge injustice. Nevertheless, making justice dependent upon a single senior official's goodwill does not remove institutional opacity. Complaint procedures, protection for harassed women, accountability of the guilty and collective oversight remain matters for criticism beyond the work itself. Even with this limitation, Sujata is noteworthy for raising the question of administrative ethics.

Linguistic Examples and Their Interpretation

The following brief extracts correspond to the page numbers in the original printed edition. Quotations are kept within evidentiary limits; no lengthy, unclear or ambiguous passages have been quoted simply for the sake of including them. Their interpretation is a critical commentary separate from the words of the quotations.

Original Extract	Printed Page	Critical Significance
"The month of Phagun was passing."	1	Seasonal description establishes the emotional landscape of rural life.
"Sujata was skilled in household tasks as well."	6	An initial ideal that treats domestic labour alongside education as a feminine virtue.

Original Extract	Printed Page	Critical Significance
"Our society is male-dominated."	29	The narrator's direct criticism of social gender relations.
"Dressed in white, Sujata arrived at the office."	44	The visible sign of widowhood marks a new entry into the public workplace.
"One day at the office Sujata met Sunita."	66	The beginning of a new episode involving women's solidarity and institutional injustice.

Particular attention should be given to the evidentiary character of the quotations. They are textual evidence from this particular work; they do not automatically establish the historical truth of all the story's social claims. A sentence on printed page 29 may signal the narrator's overall consciousness, but its actual significance becomes clear when the surrounding argument on that page is read as well.

Comparative Position in the Historical Development of Maithili Children's Literature

When writing a history of children's literature, it is misleading to classify a work as children's writing solely because its language is 'simple' or it conveys a 'moral message'. The age of its readership, independent action by child characters, narrative curiosity, use of images, oral qualities, psychological capacities of readers and experience of childhood are all important criteria. Sujata contains episodes about education in childhood, but the decisive connection for readers is with an adult woman's legal and social rights and the power exercised in offices. It is therefore more appropriate to place it alongside adult social novels, while regarding it as a possible source of themes adjacent to children's literature, than to include it directly in the history of children's novels.

Videha's archives of literature for children and adolescents reveal a broad generic environment for Maithili writing for the young: children's songs and poetry, folktales, children's novels, picture stories, translations, scientific writing and contemporary adolescent fiction. The available list explicitly includes Jagadanand Jha 'Manu"s Chonha, Jagdish Prasad Mandal's Nai Dharaiye, Nand Kumar Mishra 'Nand"s Swarna Kamal, Preeti Thakur's Gonu Jha Aa Aan Maithili Chitrakatha, Devanshu Vats's Natasha and Dr Ramanand

Jha ‘Raman’’s translated picture series Raju Aa Takak Gaachh. The list documents a literary current; the appearance of titles alone cannot establish a complete year-by-year publication history.

The development of children's literature may be understood in terms of at least four tendencies: narrative foundations inherited from folktales and oral tradition; children's songs and writing for ethical instruction; language practice and social curiosity through picture stories, translations and children's novels; and quizzes, audiovisual forms, thematic stories and adolescent debates in contemporary digital media. Videha's archive attests to their coexistence. It would be inappropriate to regard these tendencies as rigid chronological ‘first, second and third’ phases, since many were active simultaneously.

Two Generic Horizons of One Writer: Swarna Kamal and Sujata

Videha identifies Swarna Kamal as Nand Kumar Mishra ‘Nand’’s children's novel, while both Sujata's original title page and Videha's prose catalogue identify Sujata as an ordinary Maithili novel. This demonstrates the writer's creative range. Without separate examination of the complete text of Swarna Kamal, however, one cannot make detailed claims about its plot, characters or final evaluation. The criterion of comparison here is genre: in Sujata, the agency of an adult heroine becomes social and administrative resistance; in a children's novel, the readerly presentation of these questions would have to change in accordance with children's experiences, curiosity and capacity to decide.

Picture Stories, Folk Narratives and the Contemporary Children's Novel

Videha's catalogue provides indications of Preeti Thakur's original picture-story endeavours in 2008–2009 and numerous entries in the tradition of translated picture stories. Children's novels by writers such as Jagadanand Jha ‘Manu’ and Jagdish Prasad Mandal, as well as listings of adolescent stories in modern digital publishing, indicate a tendency to present literary material for different reading levels through distinct media. Against this background, Sujata's arguments about education and self-respect could become material for adolescent fiction, but in its present form the stigma associated with widowhood and the complex power structure of offices are not organised as a child-centred narrative.

Possibilities and Precautions for Adaptation for Young Readers

If an adaptation of Sujata were ever prepared for adolescent readers, its principal educational elements would be girls' education, criticism of prejudice against widows, self-reliance, organised cooperation among women and the importance of complaints, evidence and judicial procedure. Such an adaptation would require a child-centred perspective, age-sensitive treatment, agency for characters, comprehensible presentation of complex workplace incidents and a non-sensational account of violence and harassment. Simply labelling the original novel ‘children's literature’ and undertaking a carefully considered child-friendly rewriting are different enterprises.

'Maithili Bal-Upanyasak Samikshashastra', published in Videha issue 447, presents comparative criteria for appropriateness to child readers, rasa, folk foundations and children's agency. Using those criteria within their proper limits clarifies Sujata's distinctive character: the focus is not children's agency but the civic agency of an adult woman. Acknowledging the distinction does not diminish the work; it makes the history of literary genres more exact.

Achievements, Contradictions and Limitations

The principal achievement is that the novel does not treat women's economic dependence merely as a subject for sentimental pity. By bringing together education, government employment, risks at work and collective resistance, it presents a concrete structure of social injustice. Second, Sujata's story extends from the domestic threshold to the public office; this breadth gives several layers to its representation of social reality. Third, Maithili dialogue and the family-centred vernacular reinforce the work's cultural distinctiveness.

There are four principal limitations. First, the clear moral division between an ideal heroine and negative characters restricts their complexity. Second, the narrator's comments sometimes announce in advance meanings that could emerge from events and dialogue. Third, while advocating women's freedom, the story periodically validates their respectability according to conventional modesty. Fourth, the outcome of administrative reform comes to rest too quickly upon the goodwill of a senior official. Yet these limitations do not render the work's social debate irrelevant; they provide grounds for critical rereading.

In effect, Sujata debates a historical transition: will society regard women's rights merely as an object of 'sympathy', or as a principle requiring change in civic arrangements and social institutions? Sujata's courage provides an initial answer. Contemporary readers will also seek another answer: a safe complaint system, disciplinary accountability, durable structures of support among women and institutional arrangements for equal opportunities.

Conclusion

To call Sujata merely a story about widows' remarriage would omit the broader social significance of its latter half; to call it merely a story against corruption would marginalise its earlier treatment of education, marriage arrangements and widowhood. Its creative unity lies in these two strands: self-determination born of private grief becomes a public consciousness of justice. At first Sujata is society's approved 'ideal woman', but by the end she acquires not merely endurance but an active capacity for resistance and cooperation.

The novel combines social realism, reformist argument and women's civic identity. Its artistry is not equally mature throughout—dramatic conflicts, psychological layers and institutional complexity need fuller development in several places. Even so, in the study of Maithili prose the work raises important questions extending from women's social position to ethics in the workplace.

Its relation to the history of children's literature is not one of direct generic membership but of a comparative boundary encompassing ideas such as education, self-respect, equality and social responsibility. Reading it with that boundary clearly in view presents its actual literary value more accurately.

Chapter 6

Sukanya

Widow Remarriage, Women's Identity and Social Change

An Extended Text-Based Critical Study of Nand Kumar Mishra 'Nand''s Maithili Novel

Nand Kumar Mishra 'Nand''s Sukanya (2019) is a work of Maithili social fiction that relates widow remarriage not merely to personal happiness or the arrangements of a household, but to social recognition, women's dignity, freedom of choice and communal justice. The narrative begins with Ratan's widowerhood and the prospect of companionship returning to his life; Sukanya's experience of widowhood, education and social humiliation invests that prospect with a wider significance. Kamlesh's supportive role, the moral dilemmas of parents and guardians, the episode involving Rinki and Nirmal, Raghuwansh Babu's resistance to convention, and the subsequent events concerning Sewakram, Vishal and Suman extend the story from personal acquaintance to a movement within the community. Drawing on the work's original printed pages, this study examines the development of the plot, the benefits and limitations of its structure, its feminist possibilities, the naturalness of its dialogue, and the tension between idealistic solutions and social reality. A thematic comparison with Kanyadan and Paro helps establish points of continuity and change in the Maithili novel's treatment of women's lives.

The Work and the Scope of the Study

The title page of Sukanya identifies the work as a 'Maithili novel'. Its author is Nand Kumar Mishra 'Nand'; its publisher is Gosauni Baidyanath Smriti Manch, Uparadaha, Darbhanga; its year of publication is 2019; and its stated price is 150 rupees. At the beginning of the book are 'A Few Words of My Own' by Shri Phoolchandra Mishra 'Raman' and the author's own prefatory statement. The principal narrative occupies printed pages 1–90. These details derive from the book's publication information and preliminary matter.

In his foreword, Shri Phoolchandra Mishra 'Raman' identifies widow remarriage as the work's central subject. The author likewise discusses changing social circumstances surrounding marriage: mismatched marriages, the insecurity of widowhood, familial resistance and the wish to establish a household anew. Together, these prefatory statements make clear from the outset that the novel's reformist social purpose is no incidental feature of its plot.

This study analyses the sequence of events, dialogue, characters' decisions and narrative outcomes. It distinguishes the author's intention from the work's actual achievement: to assume that a narrative invariably establishes precisely what its author wishes to say would not constitute criticism. Consequently, where idealistic resolutions simplify the complexity of social inequalities, they call for critical scrutiny.

The Central Problem: The Social Meaning of Widow Remarriage

The novel's question is not simply whether a person can marry again after the death of a spouse. Rather, it asks why society does not judge the widowhood of men and women by the same standards. In the case of a man, the family readily advances arguments in favour of a second marriage; in the case of a woman, the standards governing public shame, caste, prestige, children's futures and supposed propriety become far more severe. The novel makes these inequalities visible in the conversations of numerous characters and in social events.

Following the death of his first wife, Sunita, Ratan struggles with raising his children, managing his business and carrying the burden of memory. The suggestion of remarriage awakens hesitation within him. Sukanya's circumstances bring women's own experience into this discussion. Her intellectual gifts, her confrontation with humiliating accusations, her acceptance of assistance and her self-respecting conduct demonstrate why rebuilding a life should not depend upon a man's decision alone.

The work's social concerns are connected to Hindu marriage practices, rural panchayats, rumours, social standing and the safety of widows. The story repeatedly seeks to distinguish public opinion from moral truth: the opinion of the community is not its sole source, and opposition to a tradition is justified when that tradition injures human dignity.

Narrative Design: The Interconnections of Family, College, Town and Village

The story opens with Ratan's solitary reflections in a public garden. The colourful flowers and cheerful exterior of the garden are set against his personal emptiness. This contrast establishes the novel's emotional ground: life goes on outside, while the individual experiences an inward sense of incompleteness. Although the opening description of nature is not extensive, its function is more than decorative; it supplies a symbolic setting for Ratan's state of mind.

The male elders of Ratan's family, prominent figures in the panchayat, college students and teachers, bank employees and numerous village residents collectively constitute the novel's social world. The presence of so many institutions transforms a private question of marriage into a larger matter of public concern. Yet one consequence of this breadth is that some characters never acquire biographical depth; they serve chiefly as representatives of ideological positions.

The novel develops two principal currents—the relationships between Ratan and Sukanya and between Rinki and Nirmal—alongside the episodes involving Kamlesh and the later characters. The advantage of this multiple-character arrangement is that it allows the social question to appear in various forms. Its limitation is that the sustained narrative presence of the title character's inner life is repeatedly diminished by other episodes.

A Sequential Reading: From the Opening to the Final Outcome

The main narrative explicitly bears the numbers 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 8, 9 and 10. Within the material occupying printed pages 45–64, a separate heading numbered '7' is not clearly marked. The following reading therefore identifies that intervening material as a 'seventh narrative phase', without claiming that the text contains an independently numbered chapter. This fact of textual division is significant to an examination of the novel's craft.

Part One: Ratan's Solitude and the Question of the Panchayat

The central scene of the first part is Ratan's solitary reflection. Three years after the death of his wife Sunita, he remains bound by memory. The practical demands of raising his children pull in one direction; fear of what society will say, and respect for his former relationship, pull in another. The author does not immediately install the possibility of remarriage in Ratan's mind. He first presents an unsettled person whose social and worldly circumstances have fallen out of balance.

Discussions involving Amirkantji's household and village society raise the issue of the panchayat's authority to pronounce decisions. What a respected member of the community says may amount to advice, but it cannot be the final judge of human freedom. The work's reformist temper emerges distinctly for the first time in this conflict.

> 'On what grounds have you delivered this panchayat decision?' (original printed page 3)

This brief question contains the novel's ethical seed. The work does not oppose the very existence of the panchayat; it criticises intervention unsupported by a legitimate moral basis. Nevertheless, the psychological reasoning of the opposing side is not developed at length in the opening part, and the conflict begins to fall into a division between reformers and traditionalists.

Part Two: Tradition, Guardians and the Legitimacy of Remarriage

In the second part, discussion of Ratan's remarriage takes on a more explicitly social form. Arrangements for the family after Sunita's death, the future of the sons and the advice of elders are linked together. Marriage is presented not solely as a matter of love, but as a decision involving the family's many layers of responsibility.

The dialogue between religious destiny and human choice is engaging. Traditional beliefs concerning the influence of fate on birth, death and marriage are present in the story, yet the characters also make practical decisions. This dual outlook helps constitute the mentality of rural society: trust in the past alongside attempts to change the present.

Sukanya's personal introduction and the indications of her widowhood enter the narrative at this point. The social predicament of a woman is placed beside the male predicament that had already occupied the centre of the story. The structure thus prepares the ground for empathy and raises the question: if remarriage is considered possible for a man, why should the same possibility be denied to a woman?

Part Three: Sukanya's Voice and Self-Definition

In the third part, the direct introduction of Ratan and Sukanya through Ramdayalji is decisive. Ratan does not immediately reveal his name as a stranger; through conversation he creates an atmosphere of trust. Information about Sukanya's widowhood, her education and her child provides the episode's fundamental basis of sympathy.

Sukanya does not present herself merely as unfortunate or as an object of pity. Her intelligence, fearlessness in conversation and capacity to understand circumstances make her an active character. Hearing her experiences from the mouth of the woman who confronts society's harsh gaze is more effective than authorial instruction.

The limitation of this part is that Sukanya's entire life soon begins to be read in relation to her possible companionship with the male protagonist. A longer interval of independent existence between the question of self-sufficiency and that of marriage would have made the heroine's personality more substantial.

Part Four: College, Humiliation and the Ethics of Assistance

In the fourth part, events at college bring the social contradictions to a new level. The misconduct of Ranjan, an affluent and unruly student, the allegation against Sukanya, Kamlesh's intervention and a sequence of decisions by teachers and administrators demonstrate that a woman's dignity cannot be confined to the rules governing the household or marriage.

Kamlesh acts as a supportive friend. He opposes an unjust accusation and seeks to bring the facts to light. Here the educational institution itself becomes a site of conflict between justice and injustice. If a college's social prestige inclines it towards the powerful, a student's courage may be necessary to defend the truth.

> 'We are human beings, and it is our duty to protect humanity.' (original printed page 26)

In this sentence, the basis of human morality is neither caste nor position nor physical attraction, but shared humanity. Yet the author's portrayal of the antagonistic student is relatively simple. A fuller development of the social causes of economic privilege and a violent sense of entitlement would have deepened the work's realism.

Part Five: Companionship, the Proposal of Marriage and the Question of Consent

In the fifth part, Ratan and Sukanya's reunion, exchange of ideas and proposal of marriage move explicitly to the centre of the plot. Ratan understands the circumstances of his family, the passage of time and the possibility of social opposition. Sukanya is likewise conscious that a decision to remarry must rest not on sympathy alone, but on careful consideration of the realities of the future.

Between love and help, compassion and equality, shelter and independent choice, the novel poses a significant conflict. The question of remarriage is not the same for Sukanya as marriage might be for an unmarried young woman: her child, her past experience and her social image all bear upon the decision.

The author generally directs the characters towards the adoption of a clear ethical position. Consequently, the emotional intensity of the story is strong, though the complex economic and legal dimensions of the decision receive relatively little development. This is a structural tendency of the idealistic social novel.

The First Half of Part Six: Rinki and Nirmal, and Independent Choice

In the sixth part, the work approaches its central question from another perspective through Rinki and Nirmal's relationship. The working world of the bank, the advice of family elders, the children's future and proposals concerning marriage create a new setting. Advice initially associated with Ratan's life now becomes a means of making change possible in another household.

Rinki is a particularly important character. She appears as a working woman with self-respect who is attentive to her standing in society. In the episode concerning Nirmal's attraction, the question of choice extends beyond personal feeling to the family, prior marital commitments and social attitudes.

The achievement of this part is to present decisions about personal relationships as parallel experiences rather than the problem of one household alone. Its limitation is that the novel must leave the main Sukanya–Ratan narrative for a time in order to offer its wider social example.

Seventh Narrative Phase: From Social Constraint to Public Resistance

The intervening narrative expands through Rinki's moral uncertainty, Nirmal's family's agreement and Raghuwansh Babu's opposition to social convention. The story's debate becomes sharper as it shows how marriage, although a matter of personal desire, generates punitive pressure in the name of public respectability.

'Social constraints, nothing else.' (original printed page 54)

The force of this short exchange lies in its treatment of 'constraint' not as a law of human nature, but as a socially constructed, historically contingent institution. Public opinion is mobilised against private choice; accusations, financial penalties, threats from the panchayat and reformist arguments turn the conflict into a public one.

Raghuwansh Babu argues that social rules can claim legitimacy only when they protect human welfare. In this sense, the novel presents the possibility of collective action. Yet the outcome of public resistance changes comparatively quickly; there was scope for a fuller depiction of the prolonged difficulties that such change entails in numerous social institutions.

Part Eight: Ratan's Illness, the Transience of Life and Reconsidering the Family

In the eighth part, Ratan spends more time at home after retiring from service. His children have lives of their own, but he feels lonely within. His ill health brings home life's finitude. Medical advice, the family's preoccupations and a mind steeped in memory invest the question of love with fresh meaning.

An important change occurs here: remarriage is not merely a matter of youthful physical attraction. It also concerns insecurity as old age approaches, the absence of a companion and the need for emotional care. The author thus returns to the fundamental question of marriage at different stages of life.

Later episodes introduce the relationship between Suman and Vishal and the question of their families' approval. The similarity between the younger generation's love and the older generation's fear of shame and lost prestige allows the principal theme to recur. The comparison is useful, but the plot at times seems to accumulate too many illustrative incidents.

Part Nine: Sewakram, Class and the Economic Violence of Marriage

Through the life of Sewakram of Chandrapur, the ninth part takes the novel's social horizon beyond the personal question of marriage to class exploitation. Episodes concerning cultivators, labourers, wealthy families, interest, the devaluation of work and village power relations lend a new sharpness to its social criticism.

The experience of a character such as Sewakram shows that society's rules of propriety do not burden every class equally. Economically vulnerable people have limited choices, while influential people employ property and prestige to dictate conduct. At this level, Sukanya's discussion of widow remarriage acquires a social grounding in economic inequality.

The relationship between Suman and Vishal, and the opposition of their families, suggest that a new generation is seeking to establish emotional loyalties against social divisions. Nevertheless, outside intervention plays a substantial part in resolving the conflict; the characters' own capacity for organised political action could have received more attention.

Part Ten: Sukanya's Independent Action and Final Rehabilitation

The final part brings together Sukanya's journey, her acquaintance with the fellow railway passenger Chameli, acts of social assistance and events involving Sewakram's family. Sukanya is now portrayed not merely as a woman suffering from widowhood, but as a social worker capable of helping others through crises.

The episodes involving Chameli and social welfare work open up a new world of mutual assistance among the novel's women. Women's safety does not depend exclusively on male generosity; cooperation between women, public awareness and institutional intervention are also possible. This point is particularly important to the novel's feminist significance.

Eventually, in the case involving Sewakram, the intervention of influential people, action by the administration and a change in rural public opinion create the conditions for Ratan and Sukanya's remarriage. Ramdayalji's affection, familial acceptance and the formation of a new household out of two former families supply the story's resolution.

The final outcome offers heartfelt hope, although it develops the successful marriage of particular individuals more fully than it depicts a society-wide transformation of entrenched convention. Readers are left wondering how a widow without comparable assistance, or an economically powerless person, could secure the same rights. This unanswered question does not cancel the work's literary relevance; it broadens its critical meaning.

A Psychological and Social Examination of the Principal Characters

Sukanya: From an Object of Compassion to an Active Personality

The novel's title places Sukanya at its centre. Her life brings together the suffering of widowhood, the suspicion of society, the courage required to pursue education, the struggles of student life, the dependability of friendship, the responsibilities of motherhood and, later, engagement in social service. The heroine does not attain fulfilment merely as a woman eligible for marriage; she also gains the power to improve the lives of others.

Sukanya's independence does not develop at an even pace throughout the narrative. At times she resists through her own articulate voice; at other times she depends upon the moral assurances of Ratan, Kamlesh or other helpers. Such dependence may also reflect the realities of the society depicted. Nevertheless, the distance between that dependence and the novel's ideal of women's emancipation must be measured critically.

In the end, the title character is accepted in the identity of a ‘wife’. The question remains whether her work in society and the independent existence of her educated personality will be preserved after marriage. The novel does not explore this aspect of her future. Its silence constitutes a meaningful critical gap.

Ratan: Memory, Responsibility and the Desire for Companionship Again

Ratan's early widowerhood places him between grief and duty. For a man whose life has long been organised within the family, acknowledging his own solitude after meeting his sons' emotional needs is difficult. He honours the memory of his deceased wife, Sunita; the fear that a second marriage might seem to deny the past repeatedly holds him back.

Ratan possesses an idealism motivated by sympathy. Sukanya's education, talent and circumstances move him. Yet his willingness to listen to advice, his wish to avoid public disputes even when he disagrees with society, and his many deferred decisions prevent him from becoming an omnipotent protagonist. These human hesitations impart novelistic energy to his character.

Sunita: An Active Memory Despite Her Absence

The deceased wife Sunita is not physically present in the opening events, but her influence survives in Ratan's memories. She represents the emotional trust of the past. The possibility of Ratan's new relationship raises the question of fidelity to the old one. In this sense, an absent character remains active within the plot's moral structure.

Kamlesh, Ranjan and the Educational Establishment

Kamlesh is Sukanya's companion in adversity, a figure of resistance and a voice of young consciousness oriented towards justice. Ranjan's misbehaviour exposes the abuse of social privilege. The involvement of the college principal and teachers raises questions about the responsibilities of educational institutions. Kamlesh becomes an ideal of solidarity, while Ranjan suffers from a somewhat excessive simplification into a negative character.

Rinki and Nirmal: The Dilemmas of the Working Middle Class

Rinki's professional circumstances, her family and Nirmal's emotional insistence present an urban, middle-class social environment. Within it, a woman has employment, but family expectations and social standing continue to control marital decisions. The conflict between Rinki's individual aspirations and communal norms reveals the predicament of a new generation.

Raghuwansh Babu and the Village Panchayat

Raghuwansh Babu's role is to advance public arguments against entrenched convention. He seeks to establish that reform is possible from within society. His intervention against unjust directions from the panchayat brings out the importance of civic courage. The rapid attainment of collective agreement, however, is a mark of the novel's idealistic mode of resolution.

Sewakram, Vishal, Suman and Chameli

Through these later characters, the narrative moves beyond the private question of remarriage into the wider terrain of poverty, education, love, public respect and social cooperation. Sewakram is a figure experienced in class exploitation; Vishal and Suman represent the emotional life of a new generation; and Chameli embodies the possibility of relationships and support among women. Their independent narrative development is limited, but together they extend the social canvas of this reformist novel.

A Perspective on Women, Widowhood and the Right to Choose Freely

The centre of Sukanya's engagement with women's questions is the moral and social right of a widow to enter married life again. In traditional society, widowhood has often been treated as a permanent negation of a woman's identity. Against this denial, the novel advances a claim for renewed life through women's education, social usefulness and love.

There are two levels to this perspective. The first is direct resistance to the shame imposed upon women and to prohibitions on remarriage. The second is an attempt to establish new relationships of human support within society. Sukanya's education, Kamlesh's friendship, Rinki's working life and Chameli's supportive role belong to this second level.

Yet if women's dignity is measured solely by success in securing remarriage, the legitimate lives of women who are unmarried, single or do not wish to marry will remain neglected. The novel itself does not examine all these alternatives in detail. It is therefore more consistent to regard it as a significant stage in the transition towards reform than as a complete philosophy of women's rights.

However important Ratan's ethical generosity may be, structural change remains incomplete if women's emancipation is reduced to ‘finding a generous man’. In this connection, the novel's later presentation of public organisation, opposition to the panchayat and administrative intervention is especially valuable.

Patriarchy, Public Opinion and Reformist Idealism

The novel repeatedly calls the language of public shame into question. The anxiety expressed in ‘What will people say?’ gives society an indirect power over personal decisions. Within rural systems of prestige, marriage is conventionally considered not simply a bond between two individuals but a matter of family honour, humiliation and caste position. The author invites readers to doubt the reasoning that is accepted as natural.

The work's reformist consciousness takes different forms in the conduct of Raghuwansh Babu, Kamlesh, Ramdayalji and Sukanya. These characters do not demand the total abolition of tradition; they seek to restore humane values within it. The work is thus not a revolutionary political manifesto but an ethical novel about transforming society from within.

The strength of this literary method is its capacity to draw readers into emotional participation. Social change is shown to be possible through individual generosity, public agreement and just conduct. Its limitation is that prolonged opposition from structures of power and social division sometimes disappears too quickly. Deeply entrenched inequalities do not invariably change on the ground through a protagonist's speech or the intervention of a few well-wishers.

Narrative Craft: Multiple Strands, Coincidence and Resolution

The proliferation of episodes is a principal formal characteristic of Sukanya. Ratan's private memories, Sukanya's college life, the controversy over Rinki and Nirmal's marriage, public conflict in the village panchayat, Sewakram's experience of class oppression and the final scenes of social assistance are all linked by a single reformist axis. Thematic unity is strong, but the skill with which events are connected is not equally successful throughout.

Unexpected meetings between numerous characters and the timely arrival of social assistance increase the role of coincidence in the plot. Such coincidences serve the novel's philosophical objective—the triumph of human goodwill—but their excessive use reduces naturalness from the standpoint of psychological realism.

The narrator offers explicit value judgements on many occasions. Readers are told directly of the evils of social malpractice and the superiority of generous individuals. This technique approaches the manner of didactic prose. Yet several direct exchanges among Sukanya, Rinki and Ratan allow moral conflict to disclose itself through speech and action. These dialogue-driven passages are the livelier parts of the novel.

In the final chapter, numerous strands move towards resolution together. The consent of families, intervention by the police and administration, a change in public opinion and the success of remarriage give the story a positive conclusion. Nevertheless, greater intervals of time and more internal uncertainty between these developments would have made the outcome feel more thoroughly earned and credible.

Language, Dialogue and the Experience of Place

The author's Maithili prose rests upon the natural flow of conversation. Expressions such as ‘ki’, ‘kiek’, ‘ehan’, ‘ahan’, ‘babuji’ and ‘bajalah’ establish a sense of intimacy within the characters' social world. Beginning with the language of the household, the work moves into the institutional register of the college, the professional vocabulary of the bank and the communal speech of village meetings. This layered use of language conveys the breadth of the social setting.

The dialogue of different characters does not, however, always establish fully distinct linguistic personalities. In several places the voices of reformist characters become vehicles for the author's public opinions. Were differences in age, education, social class and geographical experience more audible in each character's language, their personalities would become more convincing.

Gardens, colleges, villages, towns, banks, railway journeys and family spaces associated with weddings construct several social worlds in the story. Description, however, principally serves the progress of the plot. The nature of Mithila, local sounds, subtle distinctions of dialect, details of agricultural life and regionally specific metaphors receive comparatively little extended treatment. Thus, while the novel is firmly rooted thematically in Maithili society, it could have possessed greater richness of regional visualisation.

Sukanya in the History of the Maithili Novel: A Comparative Discussion

Comparison with Kanyadan: Women's Education and the Institution of Marriage

Harimohan Jha's Kanyadan (published in book form in 1933) is regarded as a notable text in the social criticism of the Maithili novel, particularly for its engagement with women's education, mismatched marriage and opposition to convention. It resembles Sukanya in questioning women's position within marriage. Yet the sharp humour and satire of Kanyadan differ from Sukanya's compassion-centred, resolution-oriented mode. One principally addresses a young girl's education before marriage and an unsuitable match; the other asks whether a woman can be granted a second chance at life after marriage. There is therefore thematic continuity without identity of technique.

Comparison with Paro: Women's Suffering and Social Structure

Paro (1946), by Baidyanath Mishra 'Yatri' (Nagarjun), offers a critical example of the tragedy of mismatched marriage and the social order imposed upon women. Paro brings out with particular severity the destructive consequences of controlling women's lives; Sukanya offers more optimistic scenes of possible change and humane assistance. The two works thus represent different narrative outcomes for women's experience. It would be inappropriate to claim precise similarities at the level of dialogue without a close reading of the original text of Paro; the comparison here rests only upon broad thematic resemblance.

Intertextual Contexts: The Author's Gudari Ke Lal and Swarna Kamal

In Nand Kumar Mishra 'Nand''s other work, Gudari Ke Lal, the lives of disadvantaged people, social injustice and dignity are prominent concerns. In Sukanya, comparable ethical questions become debates about marriage, women's circumstances and social standing. Swarna Kamal is a distinct experiment in the genre of children's narrative, dealing with courage, guidance and moral victory. Once the clear generic differences among these three works are respected, one may recognise the recurrence of the author's interest in social justice. This comparative observation does not establish direct intertextual dependence between their characters or plots.

The Tradition of the Reformist Novel and Later Contexts

At different points in the development of the Maithili novel, writers have raised questions concerning social convention, women's education, marriage, caste, exploitation and changing communal life. Sukanya is distinctive in its representation of the coexistence of a twenty-first-century working middle class with local family customs. The bank office and the public panchayat appear within the same novel, creating a composite picture of old and new pressures upon women's choices.

The novel remains in contact with this historical tradition, but it does not supply a systematic answer to every contemporary feminist debate. Its tension between women's independence and society's acceptance of marriage makes it worthy of study.

The Work's Principal Literary Achievements

First, the novel's central achievement is its presentation of social inequality surrounding widow remarriage through both private and collective experience. Rather than relying on narrative instruction alone, it gives the issue several dimensions through Ratan and Sukanya's dilemmas, the disagreement involving Rinki and Nirmal, and pressure from the village panchayat.

Second, the importance of education and self-respect is shown through the heroine's struggles. Sukanya's college life and resistance to unjust accusations give her personality a human foundation independent of the proposal that she remarry.

Third, the ideal of human cooperation appears at several levels of the narrative. Teachers, fellow students, elders, families and administrators can act in the same ethical direction. The work therefore offers a social imagination grounded in hope.

Fourth, the parallel structures of the modern office and the traditional village disclose the double movement of contemporary change. Employment or education does not automatically eliminate harmful social practices; even some highly educated characters remain troubled by the pressure of public opinion.

Fifth, the heroine's capacity to help others in the closing episodes carries her beyond the restrictive image of a woman who simply endures suffering.

Critical Limitations and Unrealised Possibilities

The principal limitation is the relatively clear division between moral positions. Generous characters quickly put forward just arguments, while the conservative side often remains merely a representative of opposition. In actual society, self-interest, fear, economic compulsion and collective notions of honour are more contradictory and interdependent.

A second limitation is the plot's overexpansion. Numerous social examples intrude upon a sustained psychological exploration of Sukanya's inward transformation. They widen the novel's compass, but somewhat weaken continuity in the inner life of its title character.

Third is the speed of resolution. Problems attached to complex social institutions are often settled by a reasonable individual or an abrupt change in public opinion. Literary optimism matters, but a fuller depiction of the duration of conflict would have increased the story's social credibility.

Fourth is the danger of treating successful remarriage as the final sign of women's liberation. A more extended discussion of education, financial security, property rights, marital consent and autonomy in decisions after marriage would have given the work greater depth in relation to contemporary feminism.

Fifth, from an editorial perspective, there is room to tighten recurring exchanges, lengthy statements of intention and the uniformly reformist speech of several characters. This observation does not imply removing the colloquial Maithili from the work; on the contrary, it implies preserving its local distinctiveness more effectively.

Sixth, an editorial inconsistency in numbering deserves attention: heading 8 follows heading 6 in the printed narrative. It would be useful to review this sectional division in a future edition. This is a matter of textual editing, not an inherent defect of the plot.

Conclusion: Beyond Sukanya's Remarriage

To read Sukanya only as a story of a happy marriage would narrow its wider meaning. The fundamental question is how much authority individuals possess over decisive choices in their own lives, and whether society becomes a friend or an obstacle to that authority. Ratan's widowerhood and Sukanya's experiences make this issue relevant to women and men alike, though the social risks fall more heavily on women. It is this inequality that the work brings into view.

The narrative draws its strength from faith in humanity, educational courage, personal compassion, public cooperation and the hope of forming a family anew. Its limitations lie in idealistic solutions, the simplification of antagonism and the many-stranded expansion of the plot. Even so, the novel makes the possibility of a dignified new life after widowhood a compelling moral concern within Maithili social fiction.

The critical conclusion is that Sukanya's achievement lies not only in remarrying Ratan but in gaining recognition as a woman who establishes her place in society anew through education, consent, experience and service. The question raised by her life does not end here. It goes on to ask how society can give every woman—whether she marries or does not marry—equal dignity and the opportunity to live freely. In this open question resides the novel's enduring relevance.

Chapter 7

Parivar (Family)

Memory, Disintegration and Reconstruction of the Joint Family

An Extended Literary Critique of Nand Kumar Mishra ‘Nand”s Parivar, with Separate Textual Analyses and a Comparative Discussion of the History of Maithili Children's Literature

In its publication details, Nand Kumar Mishra 'Nand''s Parivar (2021) is described as a reminiscence-based novel. At its narrative centre is Narendra, a character who links the disintegration of the joint family, experiences of educational institutions, conflicts over inheritance and self-interest, social connections formed through music and theatre, questions of love marriage and the reconstruction of public life in the village. This essay principally argues that 'family' in the novel is not simply an institution of blood relationships, but an ethical community formed through care, participation, memory, economic judgement and social responsibility. Nevertheless, its idealistic solutions, the protagonist's ability to resolve almost every problem, the limited autonomy of women characters and its comparatively easy settlement of economic and political complexities all invite criticism. Alongside distinct analyses of the opening, middle and ending of the printed narrative, the genealogical material in the appendix is read as social memory. The Videha book and prose catalogues and Shishu Utsav archives are used to trace indicative developments in illustrated stories, children's novels and the digital dissemination of Maithili children's literature. Parivar itself, however, is not classified as a children's novel.

Introduction: The Semantic Range of the Title Parivar

The word 'family' signifies at once a physical arrangement for living together, relations of kinship, the sharing of labour, the collective management of property and a refuge of feeling. Writing about the joint family requires an author to hold all these levels together. Nand Kumar Mishra 'Nand' gives this challenge narrative form through Narendra's life and several episodes of village experience. The story begins with a retired man's return to his village; thereafter, the family discipline, educational journey, hostilities and social service of his earlier life gradually come to light. In the end, the meaning of family no longer remains limited to descent alone.

It would not be enough for this study simply to praise the book as a direct transcription of a social ideal. The formal credibility, effect upon readers and ideological consequences of the novelist's proposed solutions must also be examined. Parivar's strongest feature is its resolve to connect intimate relationships to the village's public activities; its chief limitation is the tendency to resolve many causes of conflict through Narendra's individual judgement.

Bibliographical Description and Reminiscence-Based Form

The primary text is the first edition of Parivar (2021). Its publisher is named as Gosauni Baidyanath Smriti Manch, Uparadaha, Darbhanga district; the printer is given as Printwell, Tower, Darbhanga; and the contribution price is stated as 100 rupees. The subtitle 'reminiscence-based novel' appears clearly both on the cover and on the internal title page. Read alongside this generic designation, the author's 'Two Words' and Murlidhar Jha's 'Introduction' reveal two different levels of the work's declared purpose: the author claims a basis in actual experience, while the introduction emphasises the novel's social ideals and the conduct of its characters.

Three levels of evidence have been retained: first, the narrative content and text of the printed book itself; second, its prefatory material, authorial statement and closing genealogy; third, the book listings and children's literature archives available on Videha. Page numbers accompanying quotations refer to the original printed edition. Quotation marks have been reserved for passages whose precise wording can be established; the remaining discussion is presented as an account and interpretation of the text. References to other works recorded in Videha's listings are chiefly confined to genre, title and archival presence; indirect access has not been presented as though it were direct reading.

The Introduction and 'Two Words': The Novel's Account of Itself

The 'Introduction' written by Murlidhar Jha presents the novel as an example of Narendra's struggle through life. It emphasises the progression from childhood deprivation and education to his relationship with Guruji, experiences of love, village celebrations and activities for the common good. The introduction signals early on that Narendra is not merely a narrator of suffering he has endured but a character who actively tries to change his circumstances. It is necessary to distinguish this appreciative assessment in the prefatory matter from the novel's independent artistic achievements; the introduction cannot stand in for a critical conclusion.

The generic claim made in the author's 'Two Words' is particularly significant. He connects the story's material with lived experience, while also indicating that the names of characters and places have been changed. The distinction lies at the boundary between memoir and fiction.

> 'The book Parivar is a reminiscence-based novel founded upon entirely true events.' (printed page 7)

The coexistence of a claim to 'entirely true events' with the attribution of 'fictional' names constitutes a genuine tension in the work's narrative poetics. The book asks readers to trust it as they might trust a document, although its selection of events, conversations and coincidences falls within the creative liberty of a novel. A reasonable critical position is to regard the claim to truth as the author's own declaration, not to consider every event independently verified history. Nor should the author's caution in this matter be turned into an accusation of mystery-making or falsehood.

'Two Words' emphasises Narendra's affection, the ideal of the joint family, the social usefulness of overcoming mutual opposition and the enthusiasm of the younger generation. In this light, it would be incomplete to regard the novel simply as a sorrowful family story; it is also an imaginative proposal for voluntary forms of social conduct.

A Separate Reading: Entering the Story and Returning to the Village

The original narrative begins with Narendra's arrival in his village after retirement. Re-entering village relationships after a modern professional life supplies the frame of the story. Narendra's welcome, his earlier acquaintances among the people and indications of familial conflict carry the narrative backwards from the present moment into remembered time. Readers learn at once that the protagonist is being judged not merely by his lineage or financial position, but also by his usefulness to public life.

> 'Today Narendra has returned to the village after retirement.' (printed page 9)

This simple opening produces a rich narrative effect. 'Today' establishes an immediate present; 'retirement' suggests a long period that has passed; 'village' becomes the enduring site of memory. In these three units of expression, the story establishes the foundation of its temporal structure. Instead of a chronological life history, the narrator first introduces an adult Narendra enriched by experience. The struggles of the past can then be compared with his recognition and contributions in the present.

In the opening part, self-interest, competition for property and Narendra's comparatively conciliatory outlook come face to face. If this opposition becomes a simple division between 'good' and 'bad' people, the characters lose complexity. Nevertheless, the early identification of the village's contradictions establishes the novel's ethical axis.

A Separate Reading: Childhood, Education and the Politics of Dependence

Accounts of Narendra's early life attach particular importance to economic deprivation, family protectors and educational opportunity. Episodes involving Nilambar Babu and Shwetambar Babu suggest the unequal distribution of authority, discipline and protection within the home. The perspective of childhood is moving in itself: a child does not actively create family property disputes, yet may be the first to bear their consequences.

Narendra's commitment to education represents the novel's optimistic outlook. Learning is not presented merely as a means of passing examinations, but as a route towards the formation of personality and an equal place in society. Here one must distinguish childhood remembered from the nature of children's literature: the story depicts childhood, but its lengthy intellectual conversations, network of relationships and retrospective interpretation of an entire life chiefly address adult readers.

There is also another possible reading of the journey out of deprivation. Life stories of successful individuals often transform inequalities embedded in social structures into narratives of personal talent and effort. Narendra's achievement deserves praise, but the question remains: how many children in that village do not receive comparable shelter, guidance or opportunity? The novel's wider ethical significance becomes clearer in the light of such unanswered social questions.

A Separate Reading: Relations among Brothers and the Crisis of the Joint Family

In the middle of the narrative, questions of property, income and expenditure, the authority to make decisions and mutual trust emerge within the joint family. Family unity is not simply an emotional sentiment but a matter of practical organisation. Who will head the family? Who is responsible to whom? How will labour or resources be shared, and which rules will govern disputes? The direct or indirect presence of these questions increases the social vitality of the novel.

Narendra's emphasis on collective welfare rather than private gain is central to the work's inspiration. The novelist locates the root of conflict in conduct that places immediate individual interests above the family's long-term interests. Yet criticism must ask whether real inequalities of property, the invisible labour of care, women's inheritance and differences in generational expectations can all be explained simply as selfishness. The novel's solution-oriented outlook repeatedly simplifies these complexities.

An effective aspect of the narrative design is that family disagreements have consequences for village life. Bitterness within the household, the fragmentation of groups and the decline of shared community resources appear interconnected. In this sense, the novel crosses the boundary between the domestic narrative and the social narrative.

A Separate Reading: From Dispute to Cooperation Through Culture

Narendra and those associated with him attempt to reduce divisions through cultural activity. Theatre, music and collective events carry the narrative out of the inner rooms of the house and into public space. Even people from opposing factions come together on a single stage to rehearse a play; the labour of cultural production provides opportunities for conversation.

The dramatic performance assumes creative significance here because theatre visibly allows social ‘roles’ to change. When a person speaks in the voice of another character and encounters an audience's response, he or she may move beyond narrow self-interest. The work affirms this possibility. Yet opposition does not necessarily disappear immediately after a performance. Where the narrative reaches agreement too quickly, some of the hardness of reality is lost.

> ‘Whatever we all wish to do, for whom is it intended? For this very society, is it not?’ (printed page 16)

The novel's social purpose is expressed concisely in this exchange. ‘We all’ invokes collective agency, ‘for whom’ raises the question of responsibility, and ‘society’ opens up wider human relations beyond the family. The sentence also offers an ethical self-definition of Narendra's character.

A Separate Reading: Shankar, Deepali and a New Basis for Relationships

The episodes involving Shankar and Deepali, associated with Guruji's family, present a conversation between the feelings of a younger generation and social control. Musical training, mutual attraction, the possibility of marriage and the search for appropriate social acceptance link this subplot to the principal discussion of family. Love is not merely private excitement here: it appears alongside adult decision-making, the proprieties of the teacher–student relationship, parental anxieties and institutional prestige.

Shankar's musical education and Deepali's practice of dance are also susceptible to a symbolic reading. Just as Narendra's early educational journey becomes a means of opportunity, artistic training gives the younger generation room to imagine a future beyond conventional understandings of livelihood. At this point, the novel seeks a compromise between the family's protective outlook and the autonomous aspirations of the young.

The narrator does not regard love marriage as either utterly impossible or inherently improper, but legitimacy is gained chiefly through mediation by elders. This offers one model for reconciling tradition and modernity. The question remains how much direct authority Shankar and Deepali possess over decisions concerning their own futures. Familial consent brings happiness in the narrative, but it would be premature to take it as complete evidence of equal agency for women and men.

A Separate Reading: The Educational Profession, Employment and Social Mobility

Episodes concerning Shankar's university-level study of music include conversations about examinations, employment, appointment and professional qualifications. Against the tendency to regard music as entertainment alone, this part demonstrates its institutional importance. The contrast between Guruji's anxieties and Narendra's enthusiasm reveals different life experiences. Art, teaching and marriage become parts of a single project of life.

> 'Sir, I cannot give such a guarantee. Nevertheless, I will certainly make the effort.' (printed page 57)

The importance of this reply lies in the protagonist's acknowledgement of his limits. Elsewhere in the work, Narendra's decisions often appear to succeed almost miraculously. Here, his reluctance to offer a 'guarantee' gives the character a genuine moral modesty. Such moments draw him somewhat away from the conventional image of an all-powerful reformer.

A Separate Reading: Nava Ramayan, Public Memory and Village Institutions

In the later part of the novel, attempts at cultural renewal within the village assume a more tangible form. References to a Vidyapati memorial celebration, collective programmes, public discussion and projects such as Nava Ramayan express a wish to organise the village's social energies. Formally, the narrative takes an interesting turn here: the man who resolves household quarrels emerges as the coordinator of communal programmes.

The novel does not reduce cultural programmes to religious ritual alone; they also involve questions of organising committees, expenditure, public relations, cooperation, performance spaces and public endorsement. The story consequently creates a small sociology of cultural management. It is particularly significant that these programmes provoke both enthusiasm and opposition: unanimity does not come automatically in public life.

A critical question raised by these episodes concerns when institutional rules may be changed in the name of public welfare and when accepted procedures should be followed. Narendra's conduct ought to be judged not solely by its outcome but also by the transparency of its procedures. The book provides enough narrative material to raise such questions, even if its ultimate tone remains conciliatory.

A Separate Reading: The Epilogue and the Expansion of 'Family'

The final section brings together Narendra's later life, the lives of his children, the separate households of brothers and sisters, and their continuing social connections. The story establishes a kind of circular relationship between the loss of the joint family at the beginning and the broader emotional connections at the end. Family no longer entails an obligation to live under one roof; mutual support, communication and happiness remain possible even when people live far apart.

> 'Then Narendra felt that his family really seemed like a "family".' (printed page 76)

The novel's final judgement may be read as a reinterpretation of its title. The first 'family' is the complex group of actual biographical relationships; the second 'family' becomes the name for a desired moral quality—affection, respect, communication and reciprocity. This repetition of the word encapsulates the entire journey of meaning undertaken by the book. Nevertheless, the sentence tells readers its conclusion more than it allows room for an open question. Both its effective brevity and its didactic certainty deserve attention.

Narrative Structure: Memory, the Present and Retrospection

Parivar proceeds not as a linear historical chronicle but as a reminiscence-based novel. Narendra's return to the village as a retiree supplies the initial basis; memories of past hardships, protective figures, education, domestic disagreements, artistic relationships and social reputation are subsequently reassembled across several temporal layers. This design corresponds to the usual movement of memory, in which remembering particular individuals can accelerate a sequence of events.

Nevertheless, a narrative structured through memory presents a difficulty. Many episodes contain entire conversations reconstructed in full, which would be hard to regard as verbatim recollections from decades later. This is not a defect peculiar to the novel, but a generic limitation: the distance between the truth of reminiscence and artistic reconstruction demands care. The author's acknowledgement that characters and places have been altered already marks this mixed form.

Narendra's character gives ethical continuity to the group of incidents, while his mature presence connects the different episodes. The advantage of this structure is the stability of its narrative centre; its disadvantage is that the independent complexities of other characters are frequently relegated to the background.

Characterisation: Narendra's Idealism and Its Limits

Narendra's personality is shaped by education, self-discipline, cultural interests, benevolence and attempts to preserve relationships. His preference for collective well-being over private advantage within family life defines his moral identity. The novel makes him an 'ideal' figure, but the value of such a figure depends upon the complexity of his engagement with characters who oppose him. The more readily the causes of conflict are labelled 'selfishness', the fewer opportunities readers have to hear the other side's economic or emotional arguments.

Nilambar Babu, Shwetambar Babu, Guruji, Shankar, Deepali, Suman and the other characters are not merely decorations in the protagonist's biography; each represents a different dimension of family, education, inheritance or social reputation. Yet representation is not identical with personality. At times the novelist makes a character the vehicle for an issue, and psychological subtlety then becomes relatively slight. Opposing voices such as Suman's sustain conflict, but the full circumstances behind their reasoning receive less attention than Narendra's idealism.

Language, Dialogue and Style

The book's principal language is accessible, dialogue-driven Maithili. Village speech, respectful forms of address, the vocabulary of kinship and contemporary terms associated with public programmes coexist within the narration. The combination presents the linguistic character of modern village life. Fields of vocabulary relating to schools, departments, examinations, music, offices and committees prevent the book from becoming a one-dimensional picture of folklore.

Conversation makes the characters' disagreements direct and visible. The recurrence of questions and answers is part of Narendra's rational mode: he explains matters to others, listens to objections and guides discussion towards an ethical conclusion. Some conversations create a theatrical pace, particularly those concerning Guruji and Shankar's relationship and deliberations over village programmes. Yet the repeated use of long argumentative speeches turns narrative scenes into something resembling essays. This formal imbalance can be understood in relation to the novel's educational intention.

The work trusts in the power of 'telling'; silence, suggestion, brief scenes and independent descriptions of objects play relatively small roles. Readers are usually shown clearly how to make a value judgement. This makes the subject accessible, but somewhat restricts its potential for multiple literary meanings.

Women Characters, the Family and Gender

Family memories are organised predominantly through fathers, uncles, brothers, Guruji and social leadership. Women characters appear in roles related to affection, inherited values, love, marital decisions and domestic continuity. Deepali's dedication to dance demonstrates women's creative ability; she is not merely a potential bride but a person active in the arts. Nevertheless, the independent conditions of her decisions, obstacles to professional achievement and plans for the future might have been explored more fully.

Within the joint family, preparing food, providing care, tending the elderly, raising children and performing household work are frequently distributed unequally. When the novel presents the extended household as an ideal, it becomes necessary to ask whose shoulders bear the burden of this 'shared' work. Women's property rights, education and marital autonomy can be approached through the indications present in the narrative rather than through explicit statements of principle. In this respect, Parivar provides suitable material for new criticism: the worth of its familial ideal must also be assessed through the visible participation of women.

Class, Property and Rural Modernity

Discussions of Narendra's economic hardship, his later employment, his brothers' educational achievements and conflicts over family property register changing patterns of social mobility in rural society. The prospect of education and positions in government or professional life suggests a change in older agrarian measures of status. Modernity here does not simply mean leaving the village; it is a project of reinvesting experience gained in modern institutions back into village life.

The contradiction in this project is that the successful protagonist's character and personal connections become so decisive that questions of collective institutional reform may disappear behind his goodwill. A more extended examination of the resource gap between prosperous and disadvantaged families, local power structures, inheritance rules and unequal opportunities could have made the narrative more realistic. This shortcoming is a limit of the work's social idealism, not a denial of the author's good intentions.

The Appendix Genealogy: Text, Document and Historical Caution

After the principal narrative, printed pages 77–86 contain genealogical diagrams of several lineages associated with the village of Uparadaha. This material is not an ordinary epilogue. Through lines of descent, it offers a visual arrangement of individuals, families, memories of relationships and successive generations. The appendix gives the novel's title, Parivar, the perspective of extended social time: where the story asks about ethical coexistence, the genealogy presents the structural memory of blood relationships.

The narrative and the appendix, however, do not operate at the same epistemological level. The novel combines changed names and constructed events; the genealogy may claim to give historical information about an actual community. Before using it as such, names, generations, branches and dates would require separate verification against local documents and living oral traditions. This essay reads the genealogy as literary and cultural evidence of remembered kinship, not as a completely verified history of descent.

Another important distinction is that genealogies may principally record names along male lines of descent; marriage into families, women's labour, affectionate bonds, adoption and other forms of care may remain obscure in their diagrams. This omission makes the novel's ethical conception broader still: a living family is more than a bloodline; it is also the practice of care and mutual responsibility.

A Comparative Discussion of the History of Maithili Children's Literature

Parivar does not itself belong to the category of children's literature. Videha's prose and book catalogues identify it as a reminiscence-based novel, whereas the author's Swarna Kamal is explicitly recorded as a 'children's novel', including in the Shishu Utsav list. The author's prose thus contains distinct generic categories for an adult-oriented work of reminiscence and a narrative addressed to children. To discuss Parivar in the history of children's literature without making this distinction clear would be a generic error.

Videha's children's literature records document several forms for young Maithili readers: children's songs and verse, stories, drama, illustrated fiction, picture sequences, translations, popular discussions of science and children's novels. Preeti Thakur's Gonu Jha and Other Maithili Picture Stories (listed for 2008), Maithili Picture Stories (2009), Folk Deities of Mithila (2010) and Vidyapati's Purush Pariksha (2012) form an archival sequence of adaptations of narrative and cultural heritage for children. Works such as Gajendra Thakur's Bal Mandali/Kishor Jagat (2009) and Taraharime Parilok (2022) illustrate the separate recognition given to child and adolescent audiences.

Videha's listing also records titles across genres, such as Chonha by Jagadanand Jha 'Manu'; Taregan and Nai Dharaiye by Jagdish Prasad Mandal; Bilai Mausi by Nita Jha; Hamar Gaam by Yogendra Pathak 'Viyogi'; Teen Ta Bal Natak by Munnaji; Koili Ghuri Aau by Sujit Kumar Jha; and Swarna Kamal by Nand Kumar Mishra 'Nand'. Only the stated genres and titles in the catalogue are being compared here. No unverified judgements are offered about the plots or techniques of these works.

The historical conclusion permitted by this limited evidence is that the available digital archives indicate the development of varied genres and authorial approaches in children's literature; they cannot substitute for a comprehensive history of the period. Dates of publication are likewise the information given in Videha's archival entries, not the result of independently verifying every edition of each original book.

Children as Readers and Parivar: Connections and Differences

Parivar includes children's experiences, education, parental conduct and the atmosphere of the joint family, all of which may interest scholars of childhood. Yet the work also contains extended social arguments, adult conflicts over property, employment, marriage arrangements, institutional decisions and a life history stretching into retirement. Given the breadth of its narrative strands, the philosophical quality of its conversations and its reconstruction of memory, it does not appear to have been designed expressly for children.

Its potential points of comparison with a children's novel such as Swarna Kamal might be ‘ethical education’ or ‘a developing character’; these broad similarities, however, do not establish generic identity. Criticism of children's literature should consider the intended audience, sentence rhythms, conflicts appropriate to different age groups, the perspectives of child characters, illustration and narrative autonomy. Parivar's value lies in showing how childhood is reconstructed in adult memory. Its historical place is beside children's literature as a work of social remembrance, rather than within the central current of the children's novel itself.

The Method of Literary History: Distinguishing Catalogue, Text and Evaluation

Videha's book, prose and Shishu Utsav pages are important for making modern Maithili literature accessible. The ability to view different titles and genres in a common archival setting allows readers to map contemporary tendencies. Yet inclusion in a catalogue does not prove a work's artistic superiority, and exclusion from a list does not erase its historical importance. For literary history, the catalogue is an initial guide; the decisive grounds of criticism must be the original text, edition details and evidence of contemporary reception.

Parivar usefully illustrates this method. Videha's prose catalogue makes clear that works by the same writer occupy different genres: Gaam-Ghar as a story collection, Sujata, Gudari Ke Lal and Sukanya as novels, Swarna Kamal as a children's novel, and Parivar as a reminiscence-based novel. Independent examination of these texts would be necessary to reach a final judgement about the author's overall development as a prose writer. The published diversity of genres nevertheless indicates the breadth of his interests.

Literary Achievements Without Which the Picture Would Be Incomplete

The novel's first achievement is the creative enlargement of its title. The author carries a story that begins with Narendra's immediate family into village public life, education, artistic practice and social responsibility. Its second achievement is the attempt to transform remembered experience into a novelistic narrative: temporal distance allows the protagonist's decisions to be evaluated. The third achievement is an outlook that regards the positive possibilities of rural modernity—education, employment, the arts and public cooperation—not as mutually exclusive but as complementary.

A fourth achievement is the ease of conversation in the local language. Mithila's forms of family address, styles of mutual disagreement and negotiations over reconciliation create a dense human atmosphere. A fifth achievement is the provision of a visual dimension to long-term kinship through the genealogy at the end. With due acknowledgement of its limitations, the appendix supplies useful material for the novel's social study.

The Work's Limitations: A Critical Reconsideration

The principal formal limitation is Narendra's nearly unvarying moral superiority. Such characters inspire readers but make it difficult to do full justice to opposing positions. A second limitation is the recurrence of explanatory narration: rather than allowing values to emerge naturally from the characters' experience, the author explicitly proclaims his conclusions. A third limitation is the excessive importance assigned to individual solutions to social problems; the finer questions of property, labour, legal rights and institutional transparency do not receive sustained equal attention.

Fourth is the uneven depth of the gender perspective. Although women characters are emotionally present, they do not everywhere gain an entirely independent space for decisions. Fifth is the possibility that success across many sequences of events appears too easily achieved. Such criticism does not disparage the social purpose of the work; rather, it asks how so ambitious an ideal might be transformed into more credible artistic form.

Conclusion: From Blood Relations to Social Reciprocity

Parivar's principal literary contribution is that it does not confine grief over the disintegration of the joint family to lamentation. Narendra's story searches for possible new connections among generations and social institutions. The value of family exceeds lineage or residence under one roof. It is tested by opportunities for education, respect for elders, the talents of young people, collective engagement with folk culture and the ethical ability to consider everyone's welfare. The final ‘family’ of the novel denotes bonds that can survive through mutual affection and cooperation even after households and occupations have become separate.

At the same time, the limitations of the work's idealism need to remain clear. The notion that all disputes in society can be resolved by benevolent mediation is not always sufficient; genuine social justice demands concrete attention to structural inequality, women's agency, property rules and institutional accountability. Because of this tension, Parivar becomes more than an agreeable lesson about social conduct: it is a literary document inviting criticism of the changing meaning of family in modern Maithili society. Its relationship to the history of children's literature extends to shared elements such as remembered childhood and ethical instruction, but generically it stands apart as a reminiscence-based novel.

Appendix: Comparative Map

This table summarises only the generic information available in the archives; no comparisons of plots have been invented where the original works do not substantiate them.

Work / Author	Genre Listed by Videha	Valid Basis of Comparison with Parivar
Parivar — Nand Kumar Mishra 'Nand'	Reminiscence-based novel	Direct narrative and conceptual analysis of the original text
Swarna Kamal — Nand Kumar Mishra 'Nand'	Children's novel	A different intended readership and generic designation within the same author's work
Gonu Jha and Other Maithili Picture Stories — Preeti Thakur	Illustrated stories for children	Archival distinction in illustration and modes of reading for children
Chonha — Jagadanand Jha 'Manu'	Children's novel	The documented presence of the children's novel as a genre
Taregan — Jagdish Prasad Mandal	Collection of short inspirational stories for children	Generic distinction between brief inspirational fiction and an extended reminiscence-based narrative
Hamar Gaam — Yogendra Pathak 'Viyogi'	Children's novel	Different readership category despite a similarity in titles referring to the village
Bilai Mausi — Nita Jha	Collection of short stories for children	Difference of scale and genre between children's short fiction and an adult novel
Natasha — Devanshu Vats	Children's picture sequence	Distinction in digital/illustrated presentation of visual stories

Part Three

Word-Portraits, Power and Mythological Reconsideration

Delhi Ke Park · Yachak Ke Nahi · Maharani Kaikeyi

Chapter 8

Delhi Ke Park (A Park in Delhi)

The Village–City Conflict, Civic Dialogue and the Art of the Literary Sketch

Nand Kumar Mishra ‘Nand’s Delhi Ke Park is not merely a description of a particular city park. It is a multilayered, dialogic literary sketch of migration, retirement, memories of the village, urban sociability and changing civic relationships. For the author, a bench in a Delhi park becomes a public forum where people from different regions, languages, professions and generations compare their experiences. Spanning nine sections, the work constructs its image of society less through the excitement of a plot than through questions and answers, the development of episodes and exchanges of arguments. This study critically examines its genre, narrative perspective, configuration of characters, village–city discourse, language, migrant consciousness, class perspective and civic ethics. On the basis of Videha’s bibliography of Maithili children’s literature, it also clarifies the work’s generic distinction: Delhi Ke Park is not a children’s book, although its intergenerational experiences and instructive conversations may make it a comparative text in the study of literature for children and adolescents.

The Work, Its Genre and Structural Features

The title page and publication details of Delhi Ke Park describe it as a shabdachitra, or literary sketch; its English description calls it a “Maithili Literary Sketch.” The first edition appeared in 2018, published by Gosaauni Baidyanath Smriti Manch, Uparadaha, Darbhanga. Nine numbered sections occupy printed pages 11–82 of the work. The discussion of personal names, the sequence of sections and individual episodes is tied to the publication and printed material available to the reader. What is offered here is a paraphrastic account of the text’s import, not a quotation of its original sentences.

It is important at the outset to recognise that this book is not a children’s novel. Videha’s book catalogue likewise classifies Delhi Ke Park as a literary sketch while identifying Swarna Kamal, by the same author, separately as a children’s novel. Comparison with the history of children’s literature is useful here not to alter the work’s primary genre but to understand changing readerships, the transmission of language between generations and the place of family within narrative.

The Literary Sketch as a Genre: Social Configuration Rather Than Event

In a literary sketch, a character’s speech, social conduct, the influence of the setting and the organisation of thought take precedence over a single decisive event or the necessary sequence of a novelistic plot. Delhi Ke Park is a clear example of this method. The park is a meeting place for numerous adults, particularly people spending time there after retirement. One day’s conversation generates fresh questions the next; new visitors introduce their experiences of life, while familiar speakers raise further questions. From this recurrence emerges a broad portrait of society.

In the title, "Delhi" signifies the modern metropolis and the "park" a place of public repose. Yet repose is not passive in this work: it entails the labour of discussion, dispute, criticism, empathy, disagreement and self-examination. Although the village is geographically distant from the park, it remains continuously present in the characters' thoughts. They return repeatedly to food, housing, pensions, their children's employment, cultivation, linguistic insecurity, education, politics, social service and old age. The work consequently turns not a tourist attraction but the living memory of rural life within metropolitan existence into its stage.

This form carries both achievements and limitations. The author can accommodate diverse ideas within brief episodes; but when characters begin delivering extended analyses without interruption, their distinctive voices are sometimes submerged beneath the author's ideas. The conjunction of the literary sketch's quality of "what is seen" and the essay's quality of "what is explained" is at once the work's distinguishing feature and its central critical tension.

Narrative Architecture: The Gradual Expansion of Nine Sections

Across its nine sections, the narrative develops through the enlargement of its themes rather than through a linear succession of dramatic reversals. The comparison of village and city that underlies the initial encounter gradually extends to linguistic identity, retired life, aspirations for housing, employment, the disintegration of families, public trust, social responsibility and political memory. A loose but recognisable intellectual unity binds this progression: how does someone who has left the village for the city redefine obligations and the sense of belonging? The park is the laboratory for this question.

Individual Readings of the Nine Sections

Section One: Shyam Babu, Vivek and the Imagined Return to the Village

At the beginning, Shyam Babu is a retired man living in Delhi with his son Vivek. His way of life after retirement, his desire to visit the village, the conveniences of the city and memories of rural life all arise within a single domestic episode. The scene that begins with the park in Delhi gradually becomes a question: is one's connection with the native village a bond of affection, a practical relationship or merely a memory? The author does not present the village as an uncomplicated ideal; he also raises practical questions concerning meals, social distance and altered circumstances.

An episode involving a dog is particularly significant. Comparing relations between human beings and animals raises questions of companionship, ownership, entitlement and trust. The force of the episode lies in the way an animal's loyalty acts as a moral mirror when self-serving human relationships come under criticism. Yet, if the animal–human comparison is generalised too far, the complexity of human social relations risks being reduced to a simple moral binary. The first section may therefore be regarded as the conceptual seed of the entire work.

Section Two: Khushwant Singh's Punjabi Experience and Linguistic Coexistence

With Khushwant Singh's entry in the second section, the park becomes a multilingual meeting ground. The perspective of a retired Punjabi speaker runs alongside that of the Maithili-speaking narrator. Questions arise about attachment to one's mother tongue, coexistence with other languages, Delhi's population drawn from many regions and linguistic identity. Through a single character, the author begins to delineate multilingual Delhi: the city is not the possession of one linguistic community but the shared outcome of numerous migrations.

This section matters to Maithili readers because affection for one's language and respect for another need not be opposed to one another. At certain turns in the conversation, however, general statements are made about cultural or regional character. Such remarks should be understood as a character's personal experience, not as established social-scientific facts. With that qualification in mind, the section's multilingualism emerges as an achievement.

Section Three: Ajay Babu's Administrative Experience and the Village after Retirement

The introduction of Ajay Babu, who has been associated with the Indian Administrative Service, brings out the distinction between professional standing and attachment to the village. Members of his family have established themselves in the city, but memories of the ancestral village remain alive. Where should a home be built after retirement, how can one continue to be of social use, and in what form should one fulfil responsibilities towards the ancestral place? These questions make the section predominantly reflective.

Returning to the village is not treated here simply as an emotional proposition; it entails obligations, resources, family expectations and practical difficulties. The author's encouraging voice favours the village, yet a suitable critical assessment must observe that retired people do not share the same finances, health, connection with land or family circumstances. The more the dialogue acknowledges the multiplicity of individual choices, the more persuasive its social appeal becomes.

Section Four: Khanna Sahib's Experiences of the Body, Language and Dependence

Khanna Sahib attracts the reader's attention through his active presence in the park. Walking, physical exercise, humour, a Punjabi-speaking environment and relations with his family offer a different picture of urban leisure. The section does not depict only the inactivity of old age; it also portrays the desire to retain control over one's body and time after the end of professional service.

References to Khanna Sahib's son's education, higher studies and professional mobility carry the account beyond the confines of the home into metropolitan competition. Education here is a means of advancement, but the position of the elderly within the household may become precarious. Such contradictions prevent the character from remaining merely a humorous figure; he becomes a bearer of social change. One limitation is that lengthy statements sometimes turn him into a spokesman for ideas; nevertheless, his presence introduces ease and variation into the book's tone.

Section Five: Sudhakarji, Teaching, Scarcity and Social Inequality

Sudhakarji's story brings the narrative onto the difficult terrain of salaries, financial struggle, teaching, children's education and family responsibilities. The discussion of educating several children, hoping to acquire a home and managing with limited means poses a necessary question about the story of urban development: everyone may value education, but not everyone possesses the same financial capacity to obtain education of good quality. The interdependence of a teacher's labour and the family's future becomes evident.

Discussion of land, housing, loans or savings can be read as evidence of a lower-middle-class aspiration for security. Here the work depicts not the glamour of consumption but the arithmetic of subsistence. Some episodes become didactic, but Sudhakarji's experience introduces immediate everyday hardship rather than political slogans. The park ceases to be merely a leisure space and becomes a comparative classroom of unequal living conditions.

Section Six: Ramanji's Generational Perspective, Residence and Local Responsibility

Ramanji arrives at the park bearing the experience of an educated life shaped by employment. His children's education, the possibility of work abroad or in another city, the fear of family fragmentation and security in old age all shape this section. Life in the city may seem comfortable, yet the geographical dispersal of a family does not extinguish questions of intimacy. The narrator contrasts memories of rural society's collective life with urban anonymity.

In the latter part of the section, possibilities of change in the village, local service and social responsibility gather force. The central question is important: how might knowledge, capital and professional skills acquired while living away from the village be put to use for society once more? This public-spirited appeal is the ethical backbone of the work. Yet, because its account offers insufficiently concrete details about inequalities of caste, economics and gender within the village, the proposals for rural improvement remain somewhat broad and abstract.

Section Seven: An Unknown Visitor, Medical Service and the Crisis of Trust

In this section an encounter with a new visitor to the park opens into questions of social mistrust, the need for personal introductions and the ethics of service. Alongside the visitor's connection with Dr Kiran, the discussion turns to village life, the treatment of patients, professional service and the structure of the family. Particularly prominent is the difficulty of initiating social relationships in a metropolis: trusting an unfamiliar person is no longer easy.

The account of medical service and returning to the village points to a concrete possibility of civic responsibility. Personal goodwill, however, cannot by itself establish a complete system of community healthcare. Institutions, infrastructure, trained colleagues and local participation are necessary. Read with this distinction in mind, the section moves beyond simplistic praise of social service towards practical questions of public policy.

Section Eight: Budhna, Marukh Kaka and the Changing Moral Meaning of Rural Life

Against the evening setting of the park, the conversation involving Budhna and Marukh Kaka expands the picture of a changing village. Land, labour, cultivation, family decisions, debt, aspirations for employment and the compulsion to leave the village enter the same episode. Budhna is not merely an ideal representative of the wish to remain in the village; his remarks contain economic instability, social experience and a complicated attachment to his native place.

The section is especially important for its fundamental question: "A village for whom?" Is a village only an ancestral home, or is it a practical network of livelihood, social justice, personal dignity and collective cooperation? The true test of the hopeful rural future envisaged by the narrator is the actual life of working people. The eighth section therefore challenges a romantic portrayal of rural life. Its irony is that some discussions move away from economic determinants and turn into moral instruction, where fuller dramatic presentation would have been preferable.

Section Nine: Raghuvansh Babu, Public Work and Political Memory

The ninth section is the longest. With the arrival of Raghuvansh Babu, conversations in the park extend towards public service, organisation, local politics, communal resources, electoral experiences and historical memory. The narrative allows us to examine the difference between service-oriented individuals, public reputation and political claims. A discussion that begins with civic problems in Delhi reaches the workings of institutions. Through this expansion, many themes from the preceding eight sections are brought together again.

The section alludes to events of the twentieth century and, in particular, discusses political and social memories associated with 1984. Such material should be read as the memory and viewpoint of a literary character; independent historical corroboration would require separate contemporary documents. The book's ethical concern is with the public good, civic participation and opposition to exploitation, but some of its assessments of historical figures may also risk one-sidedness.

One creative accomplishment of the extended ninth section is that the public park develops from a setting for private conversation into a wider political community. At the same time, a question of craft arises: the discussions grow so extensive that the scene, the characters and the physical experience of place may recede. Nevertheless, on the final printed page, the conclusion of the conversation with Raghuvansh Babu and the recollection of the author's stay in Delhi bring the circle of the book to a close.

Character Design and the Narrator's Position

Shyam Babu, Khushwant Singh, Ajay Babu, Khanna Sahib, Sudhakarji, Ramanji, Dr Kiran, Budhna and Raghuvansh Babu emerge not merely as separate individuals but as representative perspectives on social experience. The movement from character to character encompasses different linguistic, professional, class and generational positions. Through their combination, the author reveals the diversity within Delhi itself.

The narrator is generally a curious fellow participant. He questions the characters, advances arguments, disagrees, and then moves on to the next episode in agreement or disagreement. This conversational design draws the reader into reflection rather than leaving the reader a passive spectator. Yet the narrator often assumes a definitive moral position; as a consequence, dissenting characters cannot fully express the complexity of their own views. A critical reading of the book must always distinguish the author's opinions from the social positions of the characters.

Language, Speech and the Rhythm of Dialogue

The book's principal linguistic strength is its dialogue-driven Maithili. Sentence structures formed by memories of rural experience, interrogative expressions, colloquial replies, humour and the vocabulary of daily life animate the narrative. Given Delhi's multilingual context, influences from Punjabi, Hindi and English, as well as administrative and professional terminology, naturally appear. This mixture is not, without further examination, a form of "linguistic impurity"; it signals the public linguistic life of a metropolis.

The recurrence of questions between speakers gives the text an audible quality; the book lends itself to reading aloud as individual scenes, dramatic recitation or audio presentation. Extended monologues, however, obstruct the natural movement of conversation. Greater variation in vocabulary, gesture and intonation according to the characters' ages, professions and regions would have intensified the artistic effect of the literary sketch. At certain points more subtle irony and silence might have replaced didactic conclusions.

Village–City Relations: Memory, Convenience and Unequal Opportunity

The central conflict of Delhi Ke Park is not a simple opposition between village and city. The village suggests intimacy, tradition, belonging and memory; the city offers possibilities of employment, education, medical care, safety, mobility and coexistence among numerous languages. One place offers readily available relationships but limited opportunities; the other offers wider opportunities, while relationships may be anonymous or formal. The author sympathises with the village in this tension, yet the importance of economic causes repeatedly emerges within the telling itself.

A particularly valuable social question posed by the work concerns the form in which a migrant imagines obligations towards the native village. Returning regularly is not enough: how are structures of education, healthcare, water, livelihoods, public conduct and cooperation to be changed there? Not all retired people can follow the same course. The work's value therefore lies less in any prescribed solution than in making questions from diverse experiences of life subjects of public debate.

A significant absence is also visible. Women's labour in the village, landless families, the experiences of different castes and classes, working women's perspectives and the voices of urban women workers receive comparatively little sustained attention. There are numerous examples involving families and children, but women characters' independent experiences are not accorded equal space. Without acknowledging this limitation, it would be an exaggeration to accept the image of the "village" as a single, unified collective.

Civic Public Life: The Meaning of the Park and the Limits of Democracy

The park's significance as a public space deserves special attention. Hierarchies of employment do not immediately determine relationships here: retired employees, teachers, doctors, people associated with administrative services and individuals from other backgrounds can converse on the same bench. This verbal public sphere is a miniature image of civil society. Widening one's circle of acquaintance, listening to different opinions and establishing trust with strangers are cultural achievements of the place.

Sharing the same physical space, however, does not automatically mean possessing equal resources. Voices already influential in society are likely to be heard more prominently in debates in the park as well. The dominance of educated older men in Delhi Ke Park is therefore worth considering. This does not diminish the work's importance; rather, it raises a question about those who remain silent in the park—working women, attendants, anxious young people and migrant labourers. This critical gap suggests fresh possibilities for future Maithili writing about urban life.

Comparison with the History of Children's Literature: Generic Difference and a Bridge between Readerships

It would be inappropriate to identify Delhi Ke Park directly as a children's book in the history of children's literature. First, the book describes itself as a literary sketch. Second, its extended social and political conversations primarily address adult readers. Third, the central concern is not the independent development of a child character's experience but the older generation's memories and civic arguments. The sound basis of comparison is therefore genre, the educational use of dialogue and changing social knowledge about village and city—not automatic inclusion in the canon of children's literature.

Videha's "Shishu Utsav" book catalogue lists several distinct strands together: children's poetry, illustrated stories, folktales, comics, children's novels, science fiction, translated illustrated stories and young-adult literature. The bibliographic descriptions of Preeti Thakur's Gonu Jha and Other Maithili Picture Stories (2008), Maithili Picture Stories (2009), Folk Deities of Mithila (2010), Vidyapati's Purush Pariksha (2012), and her series of translated picture stories suggest a trajectory in visually based and translated reading materials for children. These publication years are those specified in Videha's catalogue; they are not independent historical evidence for the origins or earliest examples of Maithili children's literature as a whole.

The Videha list likewise mentions Chonha by Jagadanand Jha 'Manu'; Taregan and Nai Dhaaraie by Jagdish Prasad Mandal; Swarna Kamal by Nand Kumar Mishra 'Nand'; Munna Ji's Three Children's Plays and Khurluchchi; Hamar Gaam and Pyramid Ke Desh Me by Yogendra Pathak 'Viyogi'; and several children's and young-adult novels by Gajendra Thakur. These titles demonstrate an expansion in linguistic resources available to young children, older children and adolescents. No judgement about these books' plots, character development or aesthetic superiority has been reached here merely by consulting their bibliographic entries.

Swarna Kamal and Delhi Ke Park are examples of different genres within the same author's bibliography. The former appears as a children's novel in Videha's children's-literature section, while the latter appears as a literary sketch in its book section. The critical significance of the distinction is that Nand's readership is not restricted to a single age group or genre. The linguistic vitality, companionship, family responsibility and questions of the village in Delhi Ke Park could furnish selected topics for discussion among adolescent readers; but the suitability of the entire work for children cannot be assumed. Adaptation for a particular age group would need to retain the complexity of the social debates while broadening the range of experience represented.

Another important aspect of this comparative history is the transformation of the medium. Stories and illustrated books for children attend to a child's visual and auditory reception, while Delhi Ke Park unfolds as a sustained sequence of audible civic conversations. This distinction shows that the history of children's literature concerns not merely the number of books but also readers' ages, the role of images, accessibility of language, diversity of voices and modes of participation. By this criterion Delhi Ke Park is not a competitor to children's literature but a comparative boundary text grounded in adult civic conversation.

Aesthetic Achievements and Critical Objections

The work's principal achievements are, first, connecting Delhi's urban experience with memories of villages in Mithila; second, transforming a public park into a living site of multilingual popular dialogue; third, portraying post-retirement life as reflective rather than inert; fourth, revealing the differences between personal experiences across professions; and fifth, treating social responsibility as a question distinct from private prosperity. The book also has historical value in its archival character as a record of social experience: it offers imaginative testimony to migrant Maithili sensibilities in Delhi at a particular moment, though it cannot replace statistical history.

Three principal objections stand alongside these achievements. First, didactic elaboration frequently diminishes the creation of scenes and dramatic concision. Second, the characters' ideological positions sometimes become vehicles for the author's fixed conclusions, limiting genuine clashes between differing voices. Third, the social world centres on the perspectives of educated older men; a denser presence of workers, women's experience and the younger generation's direct voices could have made its social portrait more comprehensive. These objections do not amount to an argument for rejecting the work; they constitute a realistic assessment of its artistic potential.

Conclusion

Delhi Ke Park is a significant conversational experiment in representing urban migration through the Maithili literary sketch. Its nine sections begin with memories of the village and the daily life of retired people and end with civic institutions, social ethics and political memory. This expansion makes the book's social aspirations clear. At its best, ordinary conversations in the park become serious questions about collective life; in its less successful passages, discursive elaboration overshadows the art of making scenes visible.

The work's lasting contribution lies not in any single conclusion favouring the village but in repeatedly asking how people living in modern cities understand their responsibilities towards their language, native village, family and wider society. Comparison with bibliographies of children's literature makes clear that the same social questions can assume different forms in different readerships of Maithili prose. Delhi Ke Park therefore properly belongs to the literary sketch of adult civic dialogue; it should be studied with literary form, social context and critical distance kept together.

Chapter 9

Yachak Ke Nahi (Who Is Not a Supplicant?)

From Visible Begging to the Power Structures of Invisible Supplication

At first glance, Nand Kumar Mishra 'Nand's Yachak Ke Nahi begins with society's dismissive attitude towards beggars. Gradually, however, it exposes a moral inequality under which the visible beggar is condemned while soliciting favour through office, connections, recommendations, patronage, contracts or political advantage becomes a mark of prestige. Published in 2022, this Maithili literary sketch has nine numbered sections. Its narrative time, the movement of characters and the unfolding of Subhan Bhai's social experience make it not a collection of independent portraits but a progressively developed, dialogue-driven satirical narrative. The central argument of this essay is that the work's principal aesthetic quality lies in its expansion of the meaning of "supplicant": supplication is not confined to asking with a begging bowl, for persistently seeking favour from institutions that control resources can also constitute a social form of begging.

The essay first examines the work's genre, title, narrative perspective, character structure, linguistic registers, humour and satire, and social history. It then offers separate readings of the nine sections on printed pages 15–116, following their original order. Comparison with children's literature does not misclassify the work as a children's novel; rather, it considers differences in educational purpose, language and readership between this work, Nand's Swarna Kamal, and the tradition of writing for children and adolescents documented in Videha's Shishu Utsav. The sources used include Videha's book catalogue, research index, criticism available in the author's collected works, and relevant records of children's literature.

Entering the Subject: The Question in the Title and the Central Critical Proposition

The title Yachak Ke Nahi is interrogative in its grammatical structure. It asks not only who the supplicants are, but also who is not one. Society does not view in the same way the demands of a visible beggar, an impoverished worker, an unemployed young person, a small shopkeeper, an official, a politician or an intermediary protected by power. By distinguishing economic need, deprivation of rights, the pursuit of favour and the brokerage of advantages, the author attacks the moral classification of the act of "asking." This distinction remains a structural thread from the opening discussion of beggars to the question entrusted to the reader's judgement on the final printed page. [1, printed pp. 15–25, 108–116]

A fundamental textual precaution is necessary in assessing the work's literary significance. The title's Devanagari form contains "नञि" (nahi, "not"); the romanised publishing form is "Yachak ke Nai." To read romanised "Nai" as "new" without consulting the original script would destroy the book's negative and interrogative suggestiveness. Videha's book catalogue records the Devanagari title as Yachak Ke Nahi. This study therefore respects the original title and places the negative "not" at the centre of its interpretation. [1, title page; 2]

Subhan Bhai is a continuously present character. His life connections, relatives, acquaintances, employment and relationships with institutions are gradually revealed. Alongside him, the presence of a narrative-conducting "protagonist" repeatedly reminds readers that this is not a literal transcription of society but a literary presentation made from selected scenes, questions, conversations and viewpoints. A "literary sketch" here is not a motionless picture: it brings together multiple scenes to produce a social outline.

Publication, Textual Extent and Method of Evidence

The original publication details identify Nand Kumar Mishra 'Nand' as author and Gosaauni Baidyanath Smriti Manch (Uparadaha, Darbhanga district) as publisher; they give 2022 as the first-edition year and ₹200 as the stated contribution. After an opening dedication, an appreciative foreword and the author's introductory note, the main text begins on printed page 15 and ends on page 116. The nine sections begin respectively on printed pages 15, 26, 43, 55, 62, 76, 90, 102 and 108. [1, preliminary publication pages; pp. 15–116]

A limitation concerning textual evidence needs to be made explicit. The beginnings of sections, characters, episodes and sequence of events have been examined, but no conjectural wording has been presented as a direct quotation.

"Literary sketch" is the genre the book declares for itself; its introductory discussion places its scale near the boundaries of portrait, narrative and novel. Critical study treats classifications proposed by the author or foreword writer not as final instructions but as propositions to be tested against the structure of the text. This matters because the nine sections do not constitute nine entirely self-contained portraits: they exhibit the gradual expansion of a principal social world. [1, foreword: printed pp. 5–12; main text: pp. 15–116]

Generic Form: The Literary Sketch, Narrative Portrait and the Border of the Short Novel

The language of a literary sketch draws more than a person's exterior outline: it reveals the individual's manner of conduct, social position, differences between speech and action, and the network of relationships around them. A conventional portrait may concentrate upon one individual or moment; here, however, causal sequences in the characters' lives, the intervention of social institutions and recurring conversations combine to make a narrative world. It is therefore more meaningful to call the work a "narrative literary sketch."

The storyteller repeatedly moves from what a character says to description, and from description to new dialogue. Narrative time does not flow at a uniform speed in this recurrence: at moments, an earlier event is incorporated as life history; at others, a present-day encounter instantly turns into a political discussion. The numbering of sections gives readers a sense of stages, but characters and circumstances from one episode continue entering another. To regard the work as "nine separate stories" would therefore fracture its internal relationships.

This generic experiment has limitations as well. As incidents accumulate, some characters appear briefly, serving only as examples; the author's social pronouncements sometimes outweigh the natural movement of the scene. Nevertheless, demanding the complete structural discipline of a short novel would be inappropriate: the selectivity of the literary sketch allows the author to arrange varied angles on social life around one dominant subject. This oscillation should be understood not merely as a weakness but as a creative challenge within the work.

Separate Analyses Following the Original Arrangement of Nine Sections

Section One: The Visible Beggar and Inequality of Respect

The first section begins by identifying the harshness of society's gaze: a beggar becomes an object of contempt, while people occupying far higher social positions also depend upon others to fulfil their needs. Religious utterance, the cultural standing of alms, economic compulsion and social indifference enter the same discussion. The narrator asks for more than compassion; he asks readers to look again by changing the meaning they attach to a word.

Here the author constructs a moral contradiction. An ordinary beggar's bowl is visible; the "bowl" of someone seeking favours close to office or power remains concealed within prestige, acquaintance and recommendation. The distinction between supplication and labour, between charity and entitlement, and the relation of dependence to self-respect are introduced in the first section. Its answers are not offered as an immediate moral lesson: the work invites readers to test them against the episodes to come.

In terms of craft, the first section moves from a conceptual opening towards experience grounded in characters. Its strength lies in raising a contentious question; its limitation is that the initial proposition can occasionally sound didactic. Even so, the opening establishes the central connection between the title and the final question.

Section Two: Subhan Bhai's World and the Struggle for a Livelihood

In the second section, Subhan Bhai emerges as the narrative's living centre. His ordinariness—lacking influence from household to household, enduring prosperity or institutional security—is remarkable because the author reaches large social questions through the experience of an ordinary person concerned with earning a living, rather than that of a supposedly "great man." References to flowers and leaves, household work, petty employment, family responsibilities and advice from acquaintances provide a material foundation for his life. [1, pp. 26–42]

The abundance of dialogue reveals different perspectives across social classes. Subhan Bhai weighs self-help, hard work and possibilities, while others suggest immediate employment, useful contacts, benefits or routes towards social advancement. For the author, this distinction demonstrates that unemployment is not merely an economic crisis but also a cultural one: the absence of employment diminishes not only income but also alters society's standards of respect.

The section's artistic effect arises from small details of lived experience. Even where moral instruction is frequent, these details give it a grounding in reality. They also show that Subhan Bhai's difficulties are not solely matters of individual struggle; they are the result of a lack of resources and the unequal distribution of opportunity.

Section Three: Acquaintance, Identity and the Language of Mediation

The third section makes the debate about social acquaintance and personal connections more explicit. Amid the protagonist's questions and answers arise issues of names, occupations, appearance, addresses and trust. Those who want help are seen concealing their actual identities or presenting them only in part. [1, pp. 43–54]

At this level, the "supplicant" ceases to denote merely the economic condition of a beggar and enters the conduct of people trying to establish social connections. Can any work be accomplished without a recommendation? How wide is the gap between what people say and what they do? Do those offering help genuinely accept responsibility, or take advantage of a social opportunity? These questions move the narrative forward.

From an artistic perspective, the third section is distinguished by tension in its dialogue. An immediate answer seldom settles the issue; more often, it generates fresh uncertainty. This uncertainty increases the story's realism. Yet repeated counter-questions on the same point can also produce a sense of repetition.

Section Four: Suleman's Labour, Trust and Means of Subsistence

The fourth section opens with questions of trust, confidentiality and doing good for others. The small enterprise of a character named Suleman, his work repairing bicycles, and his dealings with other people are notable here. The daily routine of an impoverished worker is not an incidental colour detached from the main action; it supplies an alternative measure of social dignity. [1, pp. 55–61]

The discussion of possibilities for labour among people who beg gives the section further moral density. Rather than treating an immediate donation as the answer, the narrative raises more enduring questions of participation in work, secure livelihoods and social trust. Yet this possibility also reveals a limit: the text does not establish that everyone who begs can readily shift into agriculture or private enterprise. Health, age, land, capital and conditions of social discrimination require separate consideration.

This section displays the work's humanistic commitment. The proximity between Suleman's culture of work and Subhan Bhai's social outlook offers a perspective of actual coexistence instead of an easy opposition based on religion. That is a considerable social achievement.

Section Five: The Small Shopkeeper, Railway Administration and the System of Favours

In the fifth section, the small paan business of a low-income man named Dinu and the setting of a railway station open up a new field of power relations. The fate of a business dependent on daily earnings is tied not merely to individual competence but to official inspections, permissions, informal instructions, middlemen and local influence. Episodes involving Lalbabu and people associated with the railway establishment give these obstacles narrative form. [1, pp. 62–75]

The section's importance lies not in general denunciations of "corruption" but in the depiction of its everyday economic effects. For someone earning very little, the closure of an opportunity is not a one-time financial loss: it affects an entire family's food, dignity and future. The helplessness of a person caught between formal administrative rules and customary pressures becomes a modern image of social disadvantage.

Artistically, this section turns the preceding philosophical question into an administrative example. Its satire becomes most forceful when someone who earns a living through hard work is compelled to supplicate for permission and favour, while a person holding office can market his patronage as a resource. Nevertheless, the narrative should not be mistaken for a complete record of actual governmental procedures. It is a literary reconstruction in which institutions are criticised through a character's experience.

Section Six: Family, Belonging and Expectations of Employment

The sixth section introduces a fuller picture of Subhan Bhai's family life. With references to Jamila Begum and other family members, the work's social questions become questions of domestic need, care and affection. Concern for the family's future security is linked to the discussion of job information, applications, eligibility, examinations and connections with officials. [1, pp. 76–89]

What particularly deserves attention here is the extent to which a family's hopes depend upon decisions made by other people. If this dependence is secured within lawful entitlements, it is a form of equal citizenship; but if recommendations and vested interests become indispensable intermediaries, they produce a mentality of supplication. The author's satire operates within this fine distinction.

Women characters give the narrative an emotional foundation, but a critical question is necessary here: how far does the narrator allow us to hear their own wishes, decisions and work, and how far do they simply form the background to portraits of male characters? The development of women's independent inner voices is limited in this text; this shortcoming in craft should be recorded alongside its criticism of social reality.

Section Seven: Elections, Money and the Displacement of the Public Good

The seventh section enters the political sphere. Subhan Bhai's desire to undertake public work, contacts with representatives, demands for election expenditure and signs of improper pressure reveal a gulf between democracy's fundamental idea and the practical use made of it. An episode involving a legislator and negotiations over money creates the main opposition in the narrative. [1, pp. 90–101]

The position of the "supplicant" is reversed here. A public representative ought to be the servant of citizens, yet arrangements may become such that citizens must approach that representative with money, votes or personal pleas in order to receive services. In criticising political patronage, the author's satire does not reject democratic institutions altogether; it opposes private ownership over services and benefits meant for the public.

The section's achievement is to show social problems as products of decisions and the distribution of power rather than of uncontrollable destiny. Nevertheless, the narrative does not establish the sweeping proposition that all political activity consists of corrupt bargains. It is more balanced to read the author's particular depiction as an example through which a larger institutional question is posed.

Section Eight: Official Power and the Proposal of a Moral Compromise

The eighth section is comparatively brief, but it intensifies the narrative's moral concerns. In a conversation between Subhan Bhai and Raunak, they discuss the influence of a government officeholder, the formal path through which work is done, and intermediary methods serving private gain. Raunak's reply transforms the episode into a moral test between personal interest and the pursuit of improper advantage. [1, pp. 102–107]

Despite its brevity, the section's satirical implication is effective. Wherever the institutional boundary between "doing a job" and "getting a job done through influence" collapses, a private market in favours arises. The desire to obtain services through personal connections can gradually turn a citizen's consciousness of rights into the mentality of someone seeking patronage.

One limitation is that, in certain sensitive social episodes, women remain subjects of discussion or objects of requests; the narrator's critical distance is not always equally clear. A rigorous examination of gender ethics is therefore necessary, otherwise the question of women's autonomy may be suppressed within satire directed against officials.

Section Nine: Raunak, Family and the Final Reversal of the Question of Supplication

The last section brings to the fore the complexities of a social prestige centred on employment through Raunak's difficulties, family expectations, questions of marriage and episodes concerning a character named Seema. Political and administrative connections reach into decisions concerning domestic life. Conversation within the family shows the reader that the pressures of power relations can extend into the domain of private desires. [1, pp. 108–116]

The ninth section's most important action is its return to the title. The question initially focused on a visible beggar returns in reverse at the end, confronting the reader. The social attitude that humiliates the ordinary beggar and the educated, prosperous world that seeks favours from powerful offices are brought into a single moral comparison. The final question does not turn the work into a fully explained manifesto; it expects a judgement from the reader.

The last scene allows the structure of the entire work to be seen anew: the first section establishes an explanatory premise; the middle sections successively reveal "social forms of supplication" in different institutions; and the final section leaves the decision about a new designation to the reader. This open suggestiveness is the ending's aesthetic strength. Some transitions between events are nevertheless rather abrupt; accepting this uneven rhythm does not invalidate the intellectual force of the final question.

Character Design: Subhan Bhai, the Protagonist, Raunak and the Social World

Subhan Bhai is the emotional centre of this literary sketch. He appears at once as a social philosopher, an ordinary person concerned with earning a living, someone responsible for his family, and a character who can envisage the possibility of social change. By bringing these aspects together, the author avoids glorifying an entirely idealised hero. Subhan Bhai's strength lies not in his perfection but in his attempts to understand his circumstances despite having limited resources. The address "Bhai" attached to his name signals affection and the coexistence characteristic of everyday speech.

The protagonist performs the function of directing the discourse. He asks questions within the narrative, changes the subject, listens to others and sometimes adds his own commentary. This witness-like structure allows readers to hear the thoughts of the people involved rather than merely a moral announcement delivered from above. Yet the extent to which the storyteller's opinions differ from the protagonist's is not always clear; because of this ambiguity, readers may adopt certain political conclusions without sufficient critical distance.

Raunak is associated with an advancing social position, professional opportunities and moral risks. Women's participation provides a basis for the family's social anxieties, but how much independent narrative development do they receive with regard to their ability to decide, their livelihood and their aspirations? This remains a significant question. Through individual portraits, characters such as Suleman and Dinu reveal the difficulties of the informal economy; Lalbabu and the official class become figures for the personal appropriation of power.

The social and cultural variety of the names is noteworthy. Subhan, Suleman and Jamila appear in the same narrative world alongside characters from different communities and institutional backgrounds. This linguistic and cultural coexistence is a strength of the work; rather than treating it as idealised proof of social harmony, however, it is more meaningful to emphasise the questions of "shared insecurity" and "shared labour" that it contains.

Thematic Analysis: Alms, Labour, Rights and Patronage

The book can be understood through four levels of argument. The first is "visible alms-seeking," practised by people who are socially despised. The second is "necessity of livelihood," where unemployed people, shopkeepers and workers come to depend on the goodwill of institutions empowered to decide their fates. The third is "political patronage," where access or money affects the distribution of services and opportunities. The fourth is "moral hypocrisy," under which the first kind of request is treated as disgraceful while the other three kinds of supplication may be regarded as marks of prestige.

This categorisation reconstructs the book's social insight; it is not a proposal to force every event in the narrative into a fixed formula. The work becomes especially significant when it does not seek merely to preserve a system of charity through pity, but questions relations among livelihood, social justice, access to services and citizens' rights. The image of the "poor beggar" becomes an occasion to understand structural conditions rather than evidence of moral deficiency.

From the perspective of social economics, the underlying problem of supplication is unequal control of resources. Where many people depend upon a small number of opportunities, the discretionary power of those who allocate them increases. Informal payments, personal acquaintance, recommendations and political affiliations may themselves become an additional currency. The narrative shows the moral consequences of this extra currency. It does not follow, however, that every form of help is unjust; distinguishing assistance grounded in rights from the bargaining of favours is essential to its interpretation.

The Art of Language: Folk Rhythm, Verbal Satire and the Aesthetics of Repetition

The language derives its fundamental energy from popular conversation. The characters' questions, immediate objections, forms of address and comments dictated by circumstance give movement to the narrative. An address such as "Bhai" reduces social distance; practical words referring to railways, stations, offices, contracts, elections, jobs and paan shops establish a realistic geography of experience. This linguistic inclusiveness makes Maithili a capable literary medium for the discussion of contemporary administrative and civic life.

Its principal rhetorical device is paradox: the powerless person is ridiculed while the influential one is admired; the worker is mistrusted while the broker of favours is respected in society. The negative question in the title forms the focal point of this paradox. A subdued current of compassion also runs beside the satire of the dialogue. Humour and compassion do not cancel each other out in the emotional world of the work; by disclosing the social causes of suffering, humour gives questioning its force.

A limitation of its craft can be found in repetition. Multiple versions of the same question, repeated statements of a character's social opinions and didactic declarations about institutional faults sometimes diminish the narrative's momentum. Yet continuous questioning and answering are also part of this work's natural oral mode. Editorial reduction of unnecessary repetition could have increased the narrative's intellectual sharpness, although the repetition also preserves the authentic rhythm of popular dispute.

Ethical Criticism: Literary Achievements and Questionable Aspects

The work's greatest achievement is its exposure of double standards in social morality. Through the characters' connections and acquaintances, the author establishes that, amid unequal relations of power, "asking" itself becomes an action marked by class. A poor person's demand is unacceptable while the powerful person's request passes unquestioned: this comparison sharpens social criticism. Moreover, the author refuses to make occupation or office the sole basis of human dignity; he attaches importance to labour and social responsibility.

The work is nevertheless not beyond criticism. First, certain episodes fail to explore the full range of causes of begging: disability, illness, insecurity among children, elderly dependence and state social-security policy receive limited attention. Second, its representation of government largely emerges through the experiences of opportunistic individuals; affirmative examples or exceptions grounded in legal rights are scarce. Third, the voices of women generally revolve around the struggles of male characters. Fourth, its satire of political episodes sometimes rests more heavily upon personal morality than upon structural analysis.

These limitations arise from an internal examination of the text, not from a wish to reject the author's social commitment. A genuine evaluation of socially engaged literature must consider not only the moral sincerity of its perspective but also its ability to portray the complexity of actual circumstances. By this measure, Yachak Ke Nahi is more powerful in raising questions than in providing comprehensive solutions, whether deliberately or for reasons of craft. A dimension of its modernity lies precisely in this incompleteness.

Its Place in Maithili Literary History: A Parallel Readerly Perspective

A history of Maithili literature cannot adequately be written by concentrating only on prestigious poetic forms or award-winning novels. The literary transformation of ordinary people's livelihoods, small markets, railway stations, local brokerage, the conduct of public representatives and familial hopes is also material for the history of modern Maithili prose. Nand's literary sketch can therefore be approached not merely as a subsidiary genre of fiction but as literary testimony to social history. Such testimony does not substitute for documentary facts: the narrative's value lies in its organisation of social sensibility.

Videha's work on parallel literary history has raised questions concerning neglected writers, popular language, narrative forms and systems of publication. Videha's comprehensive critical study of Nand Kumar Mishra 'Nand' identifies him as a writer working across genres: the social novel, literary sketch, short story, poetry and children's novel all belong to this range. The usefulness of this classification here is to show that Yachak Ke Nahi is not an incomplete shadow of a children's novel but an independent experiment in his social prose.

A textual correction is also necessary. It is doubtful to derive a meaning such as "new petitioner" from the romanised title "Yachak ke Nai." When the presence of "नञि" ("not") in the original Devanagari is considered alongside the narrative's concluding question, the negative-interrogative reading is more consistent. The original title page must therefore take precedence when bibliographies, translations and criticism differ. The accuracy of literary history depends not only on large theoretical propositions but also upon such small textual decisions.

A Comparative Examination of the History of Children's Literature: Generic Boundaries and Shared Social Concerns

First, Acknowledge the Generic Difference

Yachak Ke Nahi is a literary sketch; neither its title page nor its available narrative structure substantiates a claim that it was written specifically for an age-defined readership of children. Placing it directly in a children's-literature catalogue would therefore be a category error. Comparison with the history of children's literature is not, however, irrelevant. Nand's other work, Swarna Kamal, is explicitly catalogued as a "children's novel" in Videha's Shishu Utsav. The social literary sketch and the children's novel by the same writer may differ in their intended readers, pace of narration, density of language and representation of moral questions.

For children's stories, the reader's age, range of experience, visual coherence, active child characters and opportunities to ask questions are distinctive criteria. Yachak Ke Nahi contains mature examples drawn from politics, administrative bargaining, the struggle for employment and moral hypocrisy. This material could be adapted to cultivate adolescents' social understanding, but nothing establishes that the original work in its present form was written for early readers.

Indications of the Development of Children's Literature in the Videha Archive

Videha's Shishu Utsav and book records reveal the varied forms of contemporary Maithili children's literature. Collections based on folktales, illustrated stories, children's poetry, children's novels, plays, books on scientific subjects and translated illustrated literature appear in separate categories. The available catalogue records Preeti Thakur's Gonu Jha and Other Maithili Picture Stories (2008), Maithili Picture Stories (2009), Folk Deities of Mithila (2010) and the adaptation for children of Vidyapati's Purush Pariksha (2012). These examples suggest connections among oral traditions, visually based reading and cultural narratives.

Videha's research index records Phoolchandra Jha 'Praveen's "Maithili Shishu Lok Sahitya" (issue 50, 15 January 2010); Dr Yoganand Jha's "Maithili Ballokkatha: Sthiti Aa Apeksha" (issue 76, 15 February 2011); and Durganand Mandal's "Nena Lel Sundar Chitrakatha" (issue 116, 15 October 2012). The sequence of these three titles indicates the presence in literary discussion of questions about oral folk material, collections and criticism of picture stories. Only their archival titles, authors, issue numbers and dates are verified here; their particular arguments have not been quoted without separately examining the original essays.

In subsequent developments, children's literature has not remained confined to moral tales. Videha's catalogue includes children's novels and short inspirational tales by Jagdish Prasad Mandal, short stories and illustrated works addressing science and society by Nita Jha, discussions of science by Yogendra Pathak 'Viyogi', children's and young-adult novels by Gajendra Thakur, and references to plays and activities for children and adolescents. The 2026 publication Maithili Bal-Upanyasak Samikshashastra (A Critical Theory of the Maithili Children's Novel) examines several children's novels through criteria such as rasa, propriety, folk narrative, children's agency and visual narration. Such work-centred examples demonstrate possibilities for contemporary scholarship, not a final or exhaustive history of all Maithili children's literature.

Swarna Kamal and Yachak Ke Nahi: Purpose, Reader and Form

The appearance of Nand's Swarna Kamal as a children's novel in Videha's catalogue and the designation of Yachak Ke Nahi as a literary sketch indicate two reading worlds within one writer's oeuvre. In a children's novel, narrative excitement, a child's curiosity, clear motivations for characters' actions and visually evocative language have particular purposes. In Yachak Ke Nahi, the complex social meanings of labour, power and supplication matter more; the characters' exchanges gradually form a satire of institutions.

Where, then, is the similarity? Both kinds of literature can help to shape social sensibility. Seeing injustice from a child's perspective and understanding its institutional forms from an adult perspective are different literary paths. Social dignity, respect for hard work, sympathy for the vulnerable and the right to ask questions may be shared values along these paths. The presence of common values alone, however, does not establish generic identity.

If selected passages of this literary sketch are adapted for an adolescent curriculum, it will be necessary to respect young readers' actual experience, employ scene-based presentation, supply explanations of difficult vocabulary, incorporate women characters' perspectives and maintain the distinction between factual and literary writing. The more responsible approach would be to place the adult language and critical difficulties of the political episodes in context, rather than erase them.

Children's Moral Education and Adult-Centred Didacticism

A fundamental question in criticism of literature for children or adolescents is whether children construct meanings for themselves or whether an adult writer supplies ready-made answers. Yachak Ke Nahi challenges readers with its final question, an approach valuable to inquiry-led education. Nevertheless, many sections contain elaborate moral explanations from adults speaking through the characters; this differs from the concise, visually grounded, child-centred narration associated with children's literature.

Videha's 2026 critical study of children's novels includes children's agency, reinterpretation of folk narratives, appropriate presentation of subject matter and criticism of social taboos among its topics. Viewed in this light, Nand's literary sketch provides a conceptual comparison for children's literature: it should open not only the instruction "Help the poor" but also the question "Why do people remain poor?" This is a comparative conclusion about the ethical capacity of children's literature, not a classification of this work as children's literature.

Rasa, Suggestion and Readerly Engagement

The rasa of compassion arises here not simply from depicting poverty but from exposing the social humiliation attached to it. When readers encounter two contrasting social responses to comparable requests for favour, compassion becomes a form of discernment. Humour is principally satirical; by questioning assumptions about social prestige, it makes compassion more acute. The joining of these emotional currents is central to the book's intellectual artistry.

The principal source of suggestion is the uncertain address embodied in the title. "Supplicant" does not remain a fixed social category; each new episode changes its meaning. Thus the reader is not handed a single meaning but shown the boundaries of an earlier one. Linguistically, the negative question is the work's most effective symbolic device.

Readers may answer that question differently: is the issue an individual's moral weakness, a corrupt institution, society's system of prestige, or dependence produced by economic uncertainty? The literary value of the work lies in the fact that these questions are entangled. A clear, single-line moral formula does not displace the indirect social conflict.

Conclusion: The Beggar We See, the Supplication We Do Not and Literature's Ethical Vision

The literary achievement of Yachak Ke Nahi lies in the structure through which it tests one question from its title against multiple social situations. Its opening treatment of beggars, Subhan Bhai's struggle for a livelihood, Suleman's labour, Dinu's petty trade, railway permissions, precarious employment, political bargaining, Raunak's professional difficulties and the final family complications are all different forms of the same social question: how secure are a person's rights when the necessities of life are subject to another's arbitrary control?

Close examination of the nine sections makes clear that the work is essentially an extended, progressively developed literary sketch—neither a children's novel nor merely an irregular collection of separate portraits. Its popular cadence, social satire and dialogue among characters make it valuable prose; verbal repetition, occasionally extended didacticism, the restricted autonomy of women characters and one-sided accounts of institutional procedures constitute its critical limitations.

Its significance in comparison with the history of Maithili children's literature lies in clarifying a boundary. In intended age group, artistic form and social analysis, it differs from a work for children such as Nand's Swarna Kamal. Yet concern for the dignity of vulnerable people, courage in asking questions and respect for labour allow meaningful conversation between the two literary domains. Videha's records offer a historical basis for understanding these relationships among genres.

Ultimately, the book's fundamental question is not resolved by declaring one category of human beings "beggars." Its wider significance lies in correcting the way society sees: why does the appeal of the weak become grounds for humiliation while a powerful person's pursuit of favour receives respect? Keeping this uncomfortable question alive is the enduring literary strength of Yachak Ke Nahi.

Notes on Textual Evidence and Edition

(b) The nine sections begin respectively on printed pages 15, 26, 43, 55, 62, 76, 90, 102 and 108. In the separate analyses, each section is understood to end immediately before the next begins.

(c) This essay follows the original Devanagari title "याचक के नजि." The published romanisation "YACH(A)K KE NAI" does not itself establish the precise English meaning of the negative expression; its contextual interpretation is based on the original Devanagari title and the ending.

Printed page ranges have nonetheless been linked to the arguments so that researchers can check the lines again against the original printed copy.

Chapter 10

Maharani Kaikeyi (Queen Kaikeyi)

Rereading Myth, Women's Agency and Moral Reconsideration

Nand Kumar Mishra 'Nand's Maharani Kaikeyi is a discursive essay developed in ten sections that challenges the familiar image of Kaikeyi grounded in the assignment of blame within the Ramayana. Instead of depicting her as a greedy stepmother or the destroyer of a royal dynasty, the work attempts to establish her as a figure of political foresight, maternal affection, sacrifice and concern for the public good. Its central argument is that Rama's exile should not be regarded simply as the outcome of revenge or excessive attachment to a son, but viewed against the background of a complex national and cultural crisis, Rama's future mission and a measure of family agreement. This study follows the ten sections in sequence, examining the author's mode of argument, use of classical narrative and later poetry, linguistic strategies of character defence, and the evidential limits of an alternative reading. In its comparison with children's literature, it preserves the generic difference between the essay and the children's novel while considering the educational potential of retelling myths and the danger of moral oversimplification. The conclusion is that the work is a bold intervention in Maithili reconsiderations of myth, although it must still confront questions of evidence and interpretative plurality.

Setting the Question: From Villain to the Centre of Debate

Whenever Rama's exile is recounted, Kaikeyi's name emerges in popular memory as a symbol of blame. In most familiar retellings, the political event, religious obligation and family tragedy are compressed into one cause: Kaikeyi's demand for boons. Within this simple chain of causation, her personality, experience of crisis and possible judgement disappear. Nand Kumar Mishra begins his argument by challenging this tradition of accusation. His purpose is not simply to generate a little sympathy for the character; he calls for the moral distribution of responsibility in the Ramayana to be read afresh.

The literary importance of this appeal may be seen at two levels. First, the author directs attention to a character without whom the principal narrative could not unfold, yet whose inner motives are usually interpreted in a single way. Second, he seeks to relocate the cause of the action from personal ill will to a complex relationship among royal succession, military and cultural crisis, maternal duty and collective welfare. In this form, Maharani Kaikeyi becomes not so much an essay that retells a story as one that invites thought about the story.

A precaution is essential here. To treat any one version of the Ramayana as the sole authoritative text for every version would contradict the principles of comparative study. The author constructs his model of Kaikeyi with the help of Valmiki, Tulsidas and later interpretative poetry. His conclusion must therefore be tested as an alternative interpretative proposal presented within a text, not as an independently established historical fact. This distinction illuminates both the work's achievement and its limitations.

The Work, Its Genre and Basic Structure

The available printed copy of Maharani Kaikeyi names Nand Kumar Mishra 'Nand' as its author. The preliminary publishing information mentions publishing assistance and printing in the Darbhanga region; the author's concluding note is dated 17 September 2008. This gives an indication of the period of composition but does not establish the year in which the book was printed. The main text occupies printed pages 1–48. It is accompanied by a preliminary cover, dedication, author's note and final biographical introduction.

The book's generic identity is important. It does not display the continuous event sequence of a children's novel, distinct dramatic acts or the fully developed form of a story dominated by dialogue. Instead, the author chiefly sets out his position, introduces passages of ancient verse and later poetic references, and uses these materials to reassess a character. Videha's catalogue also calls it a "discursive essay" [reference 2]. It is therefore more accurately described as a critical or counter-argumentative prose essay based on myth.

The original is divided into ten sections. The first deals with society's image of the stepmother; the second with political foresight; the third with purpose and sacrifice; the fourth with strategy; the fifth and sixth, respectively, with Kaikeyi's affection for Rama and Rama's affection for her; the seventh with secret consultation; the eighth with the boons; the ninth with preparations for exile; and the tenth with the causes of Dasharatha's death. This arrangement begins by countering accusations, develops the defence of the character through emotional relationships, and concludes by redistributing moral and historical responsibility.

A particular reason for the work's critical importance is that its opening remarks refer to several forms of the Ramayana and indicate a dialogue with Shri Umesh's Kaikeyi Ka Antardvandva. Nevertheless, the various editions, textual variants and historical standing of all those cited works have not been independently investigated in this study. Its examination of argumentative method is based only on the titles and episodes present in the original essay.

The Stepmother Debate: Challenging Social Prejudice

The argument of the first section, "The Nature of a Stepmother" (printed pp. 1–6), is directly sociological: being a stepmother is not in itself synonymous with cruelty, disrespect or injustice. The author questions habitual social assumptions and conventional images of blame. He first examines accusations against Kaikeyi not as simple facts of a family incident but as a stereotyped image produced by public opinion. The opening asks readers to suspend their immediate moral judgement.

This section outlines the distinction between "presumed guilt" and an individual's "actual actions." When readers enter the episode of the exile having already judged Kaikeyi to be a criminal, the meaning of everything she does is predetermined. The author unsettles this interpretative convenience. The force of the change lies not simply in the argument but in shifting the point of entry into the narrative: a figure previously in the dock now gains the opportunity to question the justice of the verdict passed against her.

Yet this strength is accompanied by a limitation. Refuting a collective prejudice does not automatically prove every decision by an individual innocent. It is unjust to condemn a stepmother without hearing her; nevertheless, when contrary evidence exists, criticism of her conduct must remain possible. From the first section onward, the author's defensive impulse is so powerful that readers are given little space to consider alternative motives.

Separate Readings of the Ten Subsections

Political Foresight: From Succession to the Wider Public Good

The second section (printed pp. 7–12) brings questions of statecraft and administration into its defence of a woman character. The author presents Kaikeyi as someone not confined to the women's quarters but concerned simultaneously with succession, military security and social protection. Rama's journey into the forest is read as preparation for a larger campaign against the oppression of the rakshasas. If accepted as an argument, this idea makes the misfortune of exile signify a planned turning point in history.

Critically, the principal weakness of this subsection is its conflation of different levels of evidence. An event present in the Ramayana's narrative and a political intention retrospectively imagined by the author are not evidence of equal standing. Where the text describes Ravana's oppression or the duties of kingship, reference to a political crisis may be justified; but it does not automatically prove that Kaikeyi had devised an entire strategy in advance. Rather than marking the distinction, the author frequently expresses possibility in the tone of certainty.

Purpose and Sacrifice: The Moral Reversal of Heroism

The third section (printed pp. 13–16) associates Kaikeyi's mental outlook and decisions with "Rama's welfare" and "the protection of the wider community." The figure of sacrifice is particularly effective here: a woman who foresees the likelihood of humiliation yet accepts it for the public good becomes more than an agent of events—she becomes someone who sacrifices herself. In the author's elaboration, Kaikeyi chooses the path of Rama's future instead of her own reputation.

This reading evokes compassion but also poses a critical question: is the reality of sacrifice established by the narrative, or is sacrifice being assumed from the beginning? If every disputed action is treated as indirect evidence of altruism, no space remains for testing the narrative. The inspirational force of the essay lies in its reversal of heroism, and so does its critical risk.

Kaikeyi's Strategy: The Ethical Complexity of Means and Ends

The fourth section (printed pp. 17–21) moves from the discussion of purpose to the next stage: the means of attaining it. The author suggests that separating Rama from the royal throne became necessary for his future struggle on behalf of the public good. He transforms the usefulness of an ascetic-like existence, outside royal office and domestic comfort, into a strategic argument. Kaikeyi becomes a political actor capable of bearing the consequences of her decisions.

The ethical test here has two dimensions: outcomes and procedure. Even if the goal of public welfare is superior, it remains necessary to ask whether the decision-making process was transparent, what form the consent of Rama and Dasharatha took, and where the questions of the people's consent and rights are located. The author concentrates chiefly on future results. The tension between consequentialism and duty offers a productive critical perspective from which to read the essay.

Kaikeyi's Affection for Rama: Redefining Motherhood

The fifth section (printed pp. 22–24) gathers evidence of affection and resists the convention of treating Kaikeyi solely as a mother committed to Bharata.

With the aid of several poetic episodes from the Rama tradition, the author draws attention to her respect and attachment to Rama. Motherhood in this reading extends beyond the boundaries of a biological son. Releasing relations within a polygamous royal family from an exclusive narrative of rivalry and conflict is a notable achievement of the subsection.

Yet when the dignity of motherhood becomes the chief basis of Kaikeyi's innocence, a woman's independent political will may be absorbed once again into a maternal identity. Just where the essay wishes to establish Kaikeyi as a woman capable of thinking independently, it repeatedly takes refuge in the sanctity of her maternal duty. This contradiction contains both the strength and the limitation of the essay's perspective on women.

Rama's Affection: Using the Testimony of the Other Party

The sixth section (printed pp. 25–29) opens the other side of the relationship. In the author's presentation, Rama regards Kaikeyi with respect, affection and trust. Rama's own behaviour thus becomes a response to the ordinary readerly inclination to declare Kaikeyi guilty. If the character directly affected by her actions himself shows compassion, respect and restraint in several episodes, it becomes difficult to justify an absolute moral hatred on the reader's part.

Literarily, this is an effective device because one character's response is a significant indication in assessing another. Rama's willingness to forgive, his obedience or his respect, however, does not necessarily constitute support for every decision by Kaikeyi. Evidence of affection and the legitimacy of political decisions are separate questions. Recognising this difference allows a reading to remain both compassionate and analytical.

Secret Consultation: Imaginatively Filling a Narrative Gap

The seventh section (printed pp. 30–36) is decisive in the construction of the essay's argument. The author's extended presentation introduces the possibility of a prior agreement or secret understanding between Kaikeyi and Rama. Here the distinction between an event known from a mythic narrative and an imagined internal conversation becomes extraordinarily important. By invoking the possibility of a private discussion, the author asks how Rama's dignity, resolve and willing acceptance can be understood if the exile resulted solely from hostility.

The seventh section constructs a kind of unrecorded episode: where the original story leaves a matter insufficiently explicit, a purposeful meeting or confidential plan is imagined to fill the gap. This can be a legitimate literary technique in mythmaking or contemporary retelling. But if it is employed as historical or text-critical evidence, the author must specify how far the conjecture extends and where direct testimony begins. The blurring of that boundary is the essay's most significant evidential problem.

The Boons: The Public Meaning of a Private Demand

The eighth section (printed pp. 37–40) reinterprets the boons granted by Dasharatha. The conventional moral account sees personal self-interest in Kaikeyi's demand; the author regards it as the fulfilment of a difficult public obligation. The essay centres on the distance between the literal meaning—Bharata's coronation and Rama's exile—and the asserted indirect purpose: the successful completion of Rama's mission.

This distance possesses literary beauty: a single action can bear two different meanings, wrongdoing or sacrifice. For that very reason, the need for ethical examination becomes greater. Without considering the obligations involved in the boons, royal authority, justice within the family and the distribution of credit together, a conclusion risks becoming one-sided. The essay raises these questions without exploring all their complexities to the same extent.

Preparations for Exile: Giving Suffering a Purpose

The ninth section (printed pp. 41–45) emphasises the meaning of Rama's forthcoming journey. The departure for the forest is explained not merely as painful familial punishment but as necessary preparation for confronting the crisis of an age. In the author's account, Kaikeyi accepts the immediate burden of a tragic result while Rama proceeds to discharge a larger duty. In this interpretation suffering is not meaningless; it becomes inseparable from purpose.

For readers, this is a highly stirring construction, especially when every hardship in the narrative becomes a prelude to a future moral triumph. Nevertheless, when the genuine pain of exile, Sita's decision, Lakshmana's position, the lives of the people of Ayodhya and Dasharatha's helplessness are all subsumed into a predetermined plan, the independent experiences of those characters become less visible. This all-encompassing reading of purpose can compress a many-centred Ramayana into a single centre.

The Causes of Dasharatha's Death: Redistributing Blame

The tenth section (printed pp. 46–48) constitutes the essay's final reply. Instead of treating Kaikeyi as the simple cause of Dasharatha's death, the author brings together the older episode of Shravan Kumar, a father's curse, grief at separation and the tragedy of kingship. The conclusion offers the sharpest counterargument to the conventional accusation: the chain of causes reaches far beyond Kaikeyi's immediate demand into Dasharatha's own past actions.

This redistribution raises questions about the ethical memory of the Rama tradition. But the multiplicity of causes must be acknowledged. The narrative of the curse, Dasharatha's psychosomatic grief, the consequences of the boons and the crisis of the royal family belong to different explanatory levels. It may be reasonable to argue that Kaikeyi was not solely responsible; fully releasing her from every causal connection would require more rigorous reasoning. The essay's final effect is sympathetic, but the conclusiveness of its evidence remains an open question.

Critical Principles: Evidence, Inference and Reimagining

The assessment of Nand Kumar Mishra's work should not be confined to the binary question "Was Kaikeyi good or bad?" A more productive question is: what kind of knowledge is being derived from narrative evidence? If an episode in the original poem suggests Kaikeyi's affection for Rama, a conclusion about affection is possible. If the author then assumes that a secret plan for Rama's exile had already been approved, he moves into the domain of inference. These claims do not stand at the same evidentiary level.

To borrow the analytical terminology of Navya-Nyaya, it becomes necessary to distinguish the limits of pramana (valid means of knowledge), arthapatti (postulation) and anumana (inference). Evidence establishes which textual passage is demonstrably present and in what sense; inference proposes a new relationship on that basis; imaginative retelling can transform the possibility into an artistic construction. The essay activates all three procedures without keeping them clearly separate. For scholarly readers, that difference is the key to understanding both the work's strengths and its errors.

Intertextuality is another significant foundation of the work. References to Valmiki, the Ramcharitmanas, the modern Kaikeyi Ka Antardvandva and other Ramayana traditions are assembled in support of one moral purpose. This dialogue has force because voices from different periods seem to speak on behalf of a marginalised character. Its weakness is that treating all references as equivalent in period, genre, source edition and meaning may obscure the evidentiary difference between an original text and modern poetry.

From the perspective of Indian poetics, the combined effects of compassion and heroism are prominent. Kaikeyi endures condemnation: this is the compassionate aspect. She takes a difficult decision for the public good: this is the proposition of heroism. Yet the work proceeds more through episodes of reasoning and the defence of a position than through the evocation of rasa. It is therefore more appropriate to describe it as an interpretative discourse than as a fully poetic retelling.

Women's Perspectives: Restoring Standing and Its Contradictions

Restoring Kaikeyi to the centre as an intelligent, courageous and politically farsighted figure is a meaningful intervention in criticism concerned with women. The reversal asks why women's agency has so frequently been represented in historical memory through the vocabulary of self-interest, deceit and destruction.

The liberation of a woman, however, cannot be restricted to celebrating the innocent mother. If Kaikeyi is genuinely a political actor, readers must also retain the right to disagree with her decisions. Women's autonomy does not mean placing them beyond criticism; it means judging their political arguments, methods and consequences by the same standards applied to male characters. The essay's defensive tone simultaneously strengthens Kaikeyi and reduces her possible contradictions.

Manthara, Kausalya, Sita and other women's experiences in Ayodhya receive comparatively little attention in this work. Giving Kaikeyi centrality is a legitimate creative choice, but a more polyphonic history of women would benefit from dialogue with other women's perspectives. The final aim of criticism concerned with women should not be merely to turn a condemned queen into a morally exalted heroine. Preserving a character's complex humanity beyond the opposition between vilification and sanctification is even more necessary.

Language, Arrangement and the Art of Discourse

The prose is primarily argumentative and directly addressed to the reader. The author asks questions, restates conventional beliefs, introduces a quoted verse or episode in opposition to them, and then specifies his conclusion. This sequence produces a discursive style that takes readers along with the argument. The short subsections progressively reinforce the essay's central proposition. Accessibility for the ordinary reader is one merit of this approach.

Yet the same conclusion reappears across different subsections, often with very little new doubt. Repetition reinforces emotional commitment but may lessen the intensity of debate. Readers expecting a clash of evidence or a powerful argument from the opposing side may find the continuous defence somewhat monochromatic. An effective rebuttal ought first to present the contrary position in its strongest possible form.

The language of the work makes Maithili a medium of contemporary ethical and political discussion. Sanskrit vocabulary, argumentative terms shaped by northern Indian Hindi, and religious expressions associated with the Rama tradition occur together. This establishes dialogue between popular religious memory and classical quotation. Greater editorial consistency—in punctuation, standardised source references for Sanskrit passages, and the visual separation of quotations from explanation—would nevertheless have improved its academic usefulness.

The preliminary cover shows a mythological chariot image that does not directly correspond to the theme of reconsidering Kaikeyi. It signals the book's cultural context without creating an image specific to the character. Illustrations are extremely sparse in the printed volume; its principal effect arises from the confrontation between the author's arguments and classical quotations. In this respect its visual arrangement differs from the illustrated narrative structure intended to support a children's book.

Comparative Discussion in the Context of the History of Children's Literature

The first precaution in placing Maharani Kaikeyi in relation to the history of children's literature is to respect the generic distinction. This is not a character story written specifically for children or an illustrated children's novel; it is an essay that argues with a mature reader. Videha's Shishu Utsav and book catalogue explicitly list Nand Kumar Mishra's Swarna Kamal as a children's novel. Erasing this difference and counting Maharani Kaikeyi among children's novels would be a mistake of literary history.

This does not eliminate the work's relationship to the study of children's reading. Reinterpretations of myth raise an important educational question in the moral awareness of children and adolescents: when society calls a character guilty, should readers pass judgement without evidence? The essay's opening discussion of the stepmother can initiate conversations about prejudice, justice and changing perspectives. This subject is particularly useful for adolescents, although a separate adaptation would be needed to make the original argumentative prose readily accessible.

The available Videha bibliography offers a documented selection illustrating the changing interests of young Maithili readers. Preeti Thakur's Gonu Jha and Other Maithili Picture Stories (2008), Folk Deities of Mithila (2010) and Vidyapati's Purush Pariksha (2012) present picture stories and cultural traditions in forms accessible to children. Yogendra Pathak 'Viyogi's Vigyank Batkahi, Robot and Hamar Gaam explore science, imagination and social experience. Alongside Nand Kumar Mishra's Swarna Kamal, Chonha by Jagadanand Jha 'Manu' and Nai Dhaaraie by Jagdish Prasad Mandal exemplify the current of children's novels. These examples constitute a comparative map of selected works verified in Videha's collection, not a complete chronological survey of Maithili children's literature.

Three kinds of difference emerge from this comparison. First, a picture story progressively builds meaning through images, scenes and dialogue, whereas Maharani Kaikeyi chiefly offers an extensive argument about a story the reader is already expected to know. Second, discovery, questioning and new experiences drive children's science writing and adventure narratives, while the defence of a fixed reinterpretation outweighs narrative development in this essay. Third, the ethical aim of children's literature is to enable readers to make their own judgements; the essay's principal tendency is to establish firm belief in Kaikeyi's defence. An adolescent adaptation could increase its critical usefulness by allowing rival readings, independent questions and alternative possibilities to remain open.

For a longer historical perspective, one may consult Videha's Parallel History (Part 13) and the available Shishu Utsav collection. These digital records bring together various genres, including folktales, illustrated books, poetry, science fiction and young-adult novels. They support discussion of the present digital expansion of children's literature but do not establish a decade-by-decade record of all twentieth-century production. A verified chronological history would require separate, detailed scrutiny of publication lists, first editions and contemporary journals of criticism.

Dialogue with Earlier Criticism: Questions of Genre and Page Numbers

This distinction matters more than a routine factual correction. If the imaginative presence of narrative dialogue leads a reader to classify the genre as "drama," the central argumentative craft of its discourse is obscured.

Research method demands that an external comprehensive review, however useful, should not replace direct examination of the structure of the primary work. The correct assessment of Nand's essay depends upon this revised understanding of its genre.

Earlier criticism views Kaikeyi as a counter-conventional character endowed with political intelligence and self-sacrifice. The present study accepts that achievement but adds the question of where the attempt to establish an opposite moral conclusion amounts to an interpretative rereading, and where it becomes an absolute exoneration unsupported by evidence. Evaluating the work through this question does not diminish its literary effect; it clarifies its genuine critical force.

Map of Page-Based Evidence and Accuracy of Quotations

This is not an attempt to conceal an absence of quotations; it is an essential discipline of textual criticism: even uncertainty about a single letter must not be attributed to the original poet or author in a research paper.

Conclusion: The Achievement of a Counter-Reading and the Limits of Evidence

Nand Kumar Mishra 'Nand's Maharani Kaikeyi is a noteworthy attempt to present a systematic argument in Maithili on behalf of a much-maligned woman character of the Ramayana. Its ten subsections challenge socially conventional assumptions of guilt and bring political judgement, collective welfare, maternal affection, secret agreement, the reinterpreted significance of the boons and a multicausal account of Dasharatha's death into the discussion. The progression offers readers the opportunity to think about a familiar narrative from an overlooked angle.

Its literary achievement lies in broadening the sense of justice. Asking that a character's viewpoint be heard before condemning her for a notorious act is itself a valuable critical disposition. Its social achievement lies in resisting prejudices concerning stepmothers and women's agency. Its linguistic achievement consists in activating Maithili prose in the contested field of myth interpretation. For all these reasons, the essay deserves independent investigation.

The last word in an assessment, however, should concern the questions the essay raises rather than its partisanship. Kaikeyi's possible motives of public welfare constitute one interpretation; their complete authenticity would require separate evidence. As the author continually joins imaginative recomposition, classical quotations and historical-cultural argument, boundaries of genre and evidence become blurred in several places. Read with this limitation acknowledged, Maharani Kaikeyi is neither a final judicial acquittal nor a simple dismissal of tradition. It is an important Maithili prose work that challenges the moral certainties of a renowned story and provides an occasion for debate.

Part Four

The Folk Current of Song and Children's Imagination

Kavya Sarita · Swarna Kamal

Chapter 11

Kavya Sarita

Folk Melodies, Social Conscience, and the Multiple Currents of Poetic Form

A Critical Research Essay | Maithili Language and Literature

To read Nand Kumar Mishra 'Nand's Kavya Sarita (2019) as a book of poetry governed by a single emotional current would obscure its creative composition. Devotional invocations, songs to the goddess, bhajans, nacharis, kajris, chaitis, compositions based on folk melodies, songs of social reform, political satire, familial feeling, memories of the village, consciousness of the mother tongue, and patriotism coexist in the collection. Its relationship with the history of children's literature also comes under consideration; however, rather than declaring the collection a work of children's literature, this study maintains the necessary distinction between certain passages suitable for young readers and compositions intended for adults.

The Range of Poetic Subjects and the Collection's Composition

At the outset of an examination of Kavya Sarita, it should be made clear that the author has subtitled it "A Collection of Maithili Poems." According to the publication details, its first edition appeared in 2019 from Gosauni Baidyanath Smriti Manch, Upar Daha, Darbhanga, at a marked price of ₹150. The opening pages contain a dedication, an expression of felicitation, and an authorial statement. The principal section contains numbered poems running from one to one hundred and sixty-four. Through successively changing titles, sentiments, metrical rhythms, and occasions, these poems establish an extensive creative stream. The concluding portion also includes a brief introduction to the writer and a list of works.

The metaphor of a "river" itself suggests an uninterrupted flow. Yet it would be a mistake to imagine this stream as a river of only one aesthetic mood. At times its feeling is reverence; at others, sorrow or separation. In one place there is the intimate rhythm of domestic closeness; in another, a public voice raised against experienced social contradictions. Moving beyond the traditional ground of lyric song, the poet reaches political commentary. The critical question, therefore, is not what single unity should be sought in the collection but what linguistic and cultural resources bring so many distinct voices together.

Three levels of evidence have been kept distinct in this study: (a) the book's title page, publication details, sequence of poems, printed page numbers, and titles; (b) the thematic tendencies, oral style, and generic character of groups of poems; and (c) public documents concerning children's literature and Maithili literature available through Videha, which provide a comparative background. Such restraint can prevent readers from mistaking invented quotations for authentic ones. Where printed pages are specified, they serve to identify a poem or group of poems, not to authenticate quoted lines.

This criticism offers a considered literary judgment about the book, not merely a letter of praise to its author. Alongside the value of thematic range, it examines the language's tendency towards didacticism, emotional repetition, generalized applications of folk melodies, questions of rhythmic discipline, and possible deficiencies of literary complexity. The folk song and the lyric included in the text should not be measured by an identical standard. The success of a public song is connected to its reception by a community of listeners, whereas subjective poetry calls for imagery, silence, obliqueness, and plurality of meaning.

The Author's Literary Field and the Collection's Internal Architecture

Videha's catalogue of books records Nand Kumar Mishra 'Nand's separate works of fiction, novels, literary sketches, reminiscences, and poetry. The presence together of Gaam-Ghar, Sujata, Gudari Ke Lal, Anathiya Kukur, Sukanya, Swarna Kamal, and Kavya Sarita makes clear the author's diversity of genres. In this context the collection of poems should not be read in isolation but in contact with narrative realism and the experience of ordinary people. Nevertheless, the plots of his other books cannot imaginatively be imposed upon this one.

The predominance of "Ganesh Vandana," "Saraswati Vandana," "Maa," "Devi Geet," and similar compositions in the opening sequence creates an oral environment of the sacred and the folk. These are followed by "Dular," "Bhajan," "Nachari," "Kajri," "Chaiti," and numerous songs concerning social matters. In the middle portion, questions of family planning, literacy, river pollution, dowry, politics, poverty, and public conduct emerge. Towards the end, themes such as "Are We Free?," "Time," "Bribery," "My Village," "We Shall Claim the Realm of Mithila," and patriotic songs grow more emphatic. This sequence can be read as an effort to connect the poet's personal and religious formation with his presence in public life.

One feature of the structure is the recurrence of generic titles. Titles such as "Maa," "Devi Geet," "Nachari," "Kajri," and "Geet" do not merely indicate subject matter; they also identify traditions of singing. Such titles open a book intended for reading towards the possibility of collective performance in popular assemblies. For this reason, it would be inappropriate to judge the collection solely by the standards of modern free verse: one needs a distinct understanding of the refrain, rhyme, repetition, and singability of songs.

An editorial limitation is also apparent. In the absence of clearly demarcated sections based on themes, readers must find their own path from devotional songs to songs of irony or from love lyrics to political songs. This irregularity can produce the spontaneity of a flowing river, but it also makes a critical reading of the collection difficult. A future critical edition would greatly benefit from a genre-based contents list, glosses, information on singing traditions, and dates of composition.

Invocation, Devotion, and the Folk Religiosity of Maithili

The placement of the opening invocations to Ganesh and Saraswati is not only a religious decision but also a cultural convention governing the beginning of a literary composition. Associating learning with Saraswati and beginnings with Ganesh is familiar in Mithila's folk ceremonies and traditional poetic arrangements. In such invocations the first-person ego often recedes as an address to the deity comes to the fore. The public character of the feeling increases the likelihood that the song can be repeated collectively. [1; printed pp. 3–5]

It is necessary not to conflate the different compositions under the heading "Maa" with the subsequent "Devi Geet." On one side may lie the tenderness, memory, maternal affection, or love associated with one's mother; on the other, the invocation of a goddess and ritual devotion. Their proximity within the collection brings the cultural image of motherhood and the spiritual image of the divine into one emotional family. Critically, this has both promise and danger: the concrete human experience of affection may gain intensity, while excessive glorification of the divine ideal may conceal the diversity of women's actual experiences. [1; printed pp. 6–19]

An important source of the poet's inspiration in the group of "Nachari" songs is Mithila's Shaiva tradition of singing. The cultural force of the nachari lies less in formal scriptural humility than in a voice poised among human helplessness, intimacy with the deity, complaint, prayer, and unforced humour. A meaningful review of this genre must ask whether the poet merely reproduces its traditional refrain or transforms it through lived experience. The abundance of nacharis in the collection indicates the author's engagement with folk music; an assessment of literary originality, however, requires close attention to differences of meaning rather than simply their number. [1; printed pp. 28–37]

The coexistence of bhajans and compositions such as an invocation to Hanuman with questions of social life is a notable quality of this book. Devotion does not leave the literary field and construct a completely detached world. The poet's language moves between faith, folk customs, and a discerning concern for justice. The limitations of the devotional pieces appear where preaching, supplication, and fresh synonyms for the same feeling take the place of exploration through imagery. Wherever ritual expression develops into aesthetic intensity, the poem acquires independent poetic value.

Kajri, Chaiti, and Seasonal Songs: The Poetic Grammar of an Aural Tradition

The presence of the titles "Kajri" and "Chaiti" suggests that the poet regards Maithili poetry as a mode of singing as well as of recitation. In seasonal folk songs, rain, seasonal transitions, waiting, separation, romantic love, travellers, family, and the village environment become vehicles of collective memory. The presence of a folk melody in a written text cannot be established by rhyme alone: one must also examine the beat of pronunciation, the return of a refrain, short groupings of lines, and a sequence suited to group singing. [1; printed pp. 42–45]

There is a distinction between imitating a folk song and recreating one. Simply assembling familiar words, names of seasons, and traditional similes does not make a poem creative. Recreation occurs when contemporary feeling, changing relations between women and men, or the new pain of migration finds expression in an older rhythm. The lyrical portion of Kavya Sarita demands to be read against this criterion. The collection's significance lies in keeping a public connection with the folk-song tradition; its challenge is to preserve imaginative differences among individual verses.

Reading poetry grounded in popular tradition as if it were written for the entirely silent reader of a modern literary magazine leaves out a fundamental part of its meaning. In the communication of feeling through nacharis, bhajans, kajris, and chaitis, the singer's body, the breath of labour, the listening community, and the ritual occasion all participate in making meaning. The collection therefore serves as a bridge between written literature and performative oral literature. A critical edition could clarify this dimension further by adding the names of tunes, performance occasions, regional variants, and possible rhythmic patterns.

Family, Women's Experience, and Reformist Consciousness

The proximity of "Family Planning" and "Literacy" attests to the poet's reformist outlook. Poetry on these subjects often runs the risk of becoming a song for disseminating policy, because its objective is fixed from the outset. The literary question, however, is whether the poet can bring a predetermined message into the realm of human experience. A song on family planning can express public awareness of social health; without presenting the decision-making rights of women and men in families, class inequalities, and local inhibitions, however, its idea becomes merely an instruction. In evaluating this group, its usefulness for popular dissemination and its imaginative density must be measured separately. [1; printed pp. 38–39]

The appearance of poems focused on "Dowry" gives this social conscience a concrete issue. Marriage rituals, family prestige, the pressure of money, and the dignity of women have long been significant questions in the social criticism of Mithila. If the title merely names a social evil, the poem may become a speech; if the subtleties of family scenes, dialogue, humiliation, and resistance enter it, its poetic effect grows. The presence of opposition to dowry in Kavya Sarita identifies the author's concern. How extensively its literary force emerges on the terrain of ordinary life requires a separate close reading. [1; printed pp. 48–49]

Motherhood, marriage, domestic tension, and women's position in society are not a single subject. An examination of these themes should see women not merely as goddesses, mothers, or victims but as independent human beings possessing desires, education, judgment, labour, and rights. Reading the divine feeling of the collection's opening alongside its middle section's reformist voice against dowry brings out a productive contradiction: how far apart are the image of the woman who is worshipped and the reality of the woman exposed to social insecurity? This difference is a site of criticism that must be maintained as an independent question even while respecting the poet's intention.

Advice alone is not enough to make a work suitable for children. How does a child experience a problem? How is the child's own voice heard, and to what extent does the child participate in its resolution? These considerations are necessary. This criterion makes clear the difference between songs centred on children and reformist songs written for society at large. Kavya Sarita's literacy songs can accordingly be called educational resources, but they cannot on that ground alone be declared children's poetry.

Political Satire: Power, Money, Deception, and Ordinary People

In the middle and later parts of the collection, titles such as "Chamcha" (Sycophant), "Thief and Policeman," "A Satirical Remark on the Prime Minister," "Vote," "Are We Free?," and "Bribery" signal a sharp critical current. These titles differ from the humble prayerful voice of devotional poetry. Here the poet's voice questions the immorality of public life. The object of the poems is less to praise political leadership than to make abuses of power, sycophancy, social fraud, and corruption their subject. [1; printed pp. 50–53, 67–70, 80, 126–130]

The literary success of satire does not depend upon direct accusation. Satire grows powerful when its language has irony, inversion, the practical flavour of everyday speech, and two levels of meaning. A title such as "Chamcha" activates a recognizable social type from colloquial language. "Vote" points towards the collective sphere of electoral behaviour. The interrogative title "Are We Free?" opens the possible gap between a nation's formal independence and its citizens' actual experience. At this point the critical question of poetic technique is whether the poet constructs a question or supplies its answer in advance.

One artistic danger of compositions of this kind is their dependence on their own times. Immediate discussions about a leader or office change; yet when a poem depicts structures of injustice, parasitism, greed, and fear, it retains meaning beyond its original moment. Amid these differences of subject, the value of Kavya Sarita depends on the seriousness with which its concern for public morality creates images of human life. Its implications for folk society are also accessible to adult readers and ought not to be presented directly to younger children without explaining the context.

In criticizing power, treating the nation, the community, and the individual as though they meant the same thing can lead to moral confusion. Criticism of an administrative failure is not treason, nor is a declaration of patriotism by itself evidence of democratic tolerance. By placing political and patriotic compositions close together, the collection asks readers to distinguish critical patriotism from passive national pride. At this point the poems become relevant to contemporary social and cultural study.

Reclaiming the Village, Mithila, Language, and Memory of Place

The presence of "Hamar Gaam" ("My Village") gives the collection a geography. The village is not simply a geographical unit but a shared world of social relationships, speech, agriculture, natural surroundings, labour, memory, and festivals. Songs about villages often create picturesque images; but forgetting the inequalities within village life—landownership, caste hierarchy, women's labour, unemployment, education, and migration—can turn them into dreams. Village memory should therefore be examined both as a romantic scene and as a social document. [1; printed p. 132]

A title such as "Raj Mithila Ham Lebe" ("We Shall Claim the Realm of Mithila") suggests a movement from cultural identity towards political aspiration. Reading this poem requires separate recognition of regional identity, linguistic dignity, aspirations for government, and the desire for social justice. "Mithila" is both a memory of history and a collective sign used in present-day politics. If Mithila in the poem signifies only past glory, its vision of the future may remain incomplete; if questions of language, education, economic opportunity, and inclusion emerge, the regional song can become a social proposition. [1; printed p. 133]

The patriotic songs towards the end of the collection establish relationships between local identity and wider Indian cultural images. This duality may be read not only as an opposition but also as a layered sense of belonging. One's village, one's Mithila, and one's country can acquire meaning without excluding one another, provided that belonging does not turn into contempt for those outside it. This democratic criterion is useful in the literary study of patriotism.

The Maithili language itself is central to the collection's expression. Through commonly used words, song structures, domestic forms of address expressing joy and sorrow, and regional cultural references from Mithila, these poems avoid becoming mere translations of Hindi-oriented public discourse. Where Bhojpuri, Hindi, Sanskrit-derived, or political vocabulary exerts an influence, this need not automatically be regarded as a break in linguistic unity: such mixtures can also document modern life. Nevertheless, maintaining consistent Maithili forms and phonetic accuracy wherever possible will be an important editorial task in a future edition.

Individual Textual Analyses: Representative Groups of Poems

"Ganesh Vandana" and "Saraswati Vandana"

The textual placement of this opening pair is symbolic: the poet begins the act of writing with a cultural invocation. The names of the deities shape readers' expectations, preparing them for the classical form of the song, the aesthetic feeling of humility, and the convention of an auspicious beginning. Poetic freedom within this form depends on the ability to add new images or contemporary aspirations. The chief significance of these compositions lies in their introductory function; the aesthetic outlook of the entire collection, however, is not confined to these invocations. [1; printed pp. 3–5]

"Maa" and "Devi Geet"

The proximity between the personal experience of a mother and the collective worship of a goddess opens a distinctive emotional pathway within folk belief. Treating the two groups as indistinguishable sends the domestic, material, and remembered realities of motherhood into the background. The focus of criticism should be whether the human image of the mother turns into a religious icon or remains distinct and raises questions about society's organization of affection. The continuity of the group indicates the poet's enduring relation to the devotional tradition. [1; printed pp. 6–19]

"Family Planning" and "Literacy"

Both titles connect poetry with public education. The ideal listener in these compositions is a community rather than a solitary connoisseur. From one perspective, this is writing intended for popular benefit; from another, it is a struggle for creative autonomy against the limits of oral propaganda. The decisive question is whether the idea acquires living characters, scenes, and contradictions or remains a list of instructions. Such songs may be useful in school activities, but not all listeners are of the same age. [1; printed pp. 38–39]

"Patitpavani Ganga" and "Jhula"

The song about the pollution of the Ganges and the seasonal culture of the swing turn nature from a static view into an experience of bodily movement, weather, and memory. The potential connection with children is especially strong here, because the swing, trees, rain, and changing seasons enter a child's immediate world. Nevertheless, environmental poetry succeeds in the modern sense only when it moves beyond formulas about saving trees to convey the tangible feeling of relationships with nature and local livelihoods. [1; printed p. 40]

"Dowry" and Related Social Songs

In discussing the dowry section, the focus should be the conflict between the economic pressures of marriage and the dignity of the family. The social energy of poetry, however, arises not merely from instruction but from depicting the wounds within relationships. Reading this group raises the question of how fully a woman's own voice is present: naming a social disease and listening to a woman's experience are not the same act. [1; printed pp. 48–49]

"Chamcha," "Vote," and "Bribery"

These three titles identify contradictions at three levels of public life: the desire to be close to power, the commercialization of the popular mandate, and the injustice of administrative transactions. Compassion and humour may lie close together here. If satire merely laughs at someone's weakness, it becomes cruelty; if it exposes a social structure, it acquires the moral strength of resistance. The decisive basis for the effect of the poet's political voice is linguistic indirection and the specificity of experience. [1; printed pp. 50–51, 80, 129–130]

"Are We Free?"

The interrogative title invites reflection on the difference between independence as a legal event and independence as a daily experience. Such a song can become a direct resource for teaching citizenship. The question then is whether references to social suffering distinguish among people and communities or reduce them to sweeping generalizations. Political song at its best preserves the many possible meanings of the question; an insistence on the answer can turn it into a manifesto. [1; printed pp. 126–128]

"Time" and "Bribery"

Near the end, a song about time is followed by a social depiction of bribery: this sequence presents ethical life on two different planes. Time is an abstract experience of loss, duty, and opportunity; bribery is the name of concrete corruption within social institutions. The first concerns an individual's management of the self, the second distortions of public conduct. This pair shows that the poet's moral critique demands both personal discipline and institutional integrity. [1; printed pp. 128–130]

"Hamar Gaam" ("My Village")

The cultural power of a song based on village memory lies in its recognition of local scenes. Yet the symbol of the village can raise questions of exclusion as readily as it produces love. Where do farmers, Dalits, women, migrants, landless people, and children appear in this shared village picture? Criticism seeks an answer. The route from local experience to universal meaning lies in the specificity of human lives, not in declaring everyone identical. [1; printed p. 132]

"Raj Mithila Ham Lebe" ("We Shall Claim the Realm of Mithila")

Regional solidarity often begins in the emotion of declaration. The strength of a Maithili song is that words in the mother tongue give communal desires a living form. Critical assessment, however, must disclose the relationship between its stated aim and justice, inclusion, and citizens' rights. The voice of the title is one of demand; the poem's literary value must lie in its thoughtful and emotionally persuasive elaboration of that demand. [1; printed p. 133]

The Concluding Patriotic Songs

In the final compositions, a wider national landscape and a voice of public unity can be heard. Their political emotional world differs greatly from the praise of deities at the collection's opening, but both share one form: the creation of collective feeling through song. Keeping this pairing in view reveals that the book's essential thread is not the uniformity of its images but the tradition of addressing a community. Poetry is relatively more effective when the collective "we" does not suppress individual experience. [1; printed pp. 136–137]

Language, Metre, Response, and the Shaping of Feeling

The titles of the compositions in Kavya Sarita are often generic, allowing readers to anticipate the direction of rhythm and sentiment. This characteristic has two effects. Positively, it connects the songs to popular memory: listeners immediately recognize the sphere of performance. Negatively, the name of a genre can sometimes diminish the individual identity of a particular poem. A critical index of recurrent titles such as "Devi Geet" is needed so that one poem can be clearly distinguished from another.

Different proportions of stanzaic composition, end-rhyme, repetition, sentences of address, and moral declaration can be observed in the collection. Rhythm and singability are poetic virtues, but they are not identical with terminal rhyme. In a meaningful song, sound moves with meaning; rhyme does not forcibly drag words into place. In the practice of mature poetry, singability and suggestiveness are complementary, not opposing qualities. The significance of this collection lies in preserving familiar structures of folk sound; its critical questions concern uniform repetitions of metre and the editing of overlong verses.

Particular attention must be given to the difference between instructional language and poetic arrangement. When writing verses about public education, opposition to dowry and corruption, or literacy, the poet wishes to keep his message clear. Literary experience, however, requires unspoken suggestions, images, and unexpected comparisons beyond a clear message. A study of certain groups in this collection suggests that a tendency towards aphorism displays the poet's convictions and sense of public responsibility. The question nevertheless remains whether each message acquires a distinct experiential form of its own.

The number of poems is a sign of the author's practice and sustained creativity, but quantity should not be treated as decisive proof of quality. A short song, a group performance on a public stage, and a long poem each have their own justification. Editorial selection of representative pieces also has an important role in a book of this kind. Providing a separate section for the most effective compositions, introductions to their genres, and a contextual glossary would enhance both the stature of the poetry and its accessibility.

Comparative Discussion in the Light of the History of Maithili Children's Literature

The first requirement for locating Kavya Sarita within the history of children's literature is honesty about genre. Videha's book catalogue describes it as a "collection of Maithili poetry," while explicitly identifying the same author's Swarna Kamal as a "children's novel." Swarna Kamal appears in Videha's children's-literature list; Kavya Sarita is not presented there in its entirety as a children's book. Ignoring this evidence to declare the collection a book of children's poems would be inappropriate both in literary terms and in bibliography.

Videha's parallel discussions of children's literature distinguish the readerships of infants, children, and adolescents by age. Pictures, lullabies, and simple repetition are treated as important for the very young; short stories, poems, picture stories, and science for school-age children; and complex narratives, biography, and social realism for adolescents. These divisions are not immutable biological laws but practical aids to understanding readers' capacities for reception. Judged by these standards, the folk songs and some nature songs of Kavya Sarita may be suitable for younger or middle-range child readers, while compositions dealing with politics, family conflict, and satire may better suit adolescents and adults.

Historically, Maithili children's literature should not be seen as beginning with any single modern printed book. Lullabies, folktales, riddles, children's games, seasonal songs, and storytelling have belonged to Mithila's oral heritage. The existence of oral forms and deliberately composed printed literature for young readers, however, mark two different historical phenomena. Videha's historical discussion places children's literature in a continuum of folk narratives, didactic traditions such as the Panchatantra, modern children's stories, picture stories, science writing, and digital media. Within this sequence, Kavya Sarita is relevant chiefly as a modern written embodiment of a folk-song-based tradition, not as a representative work of all contemporary children's literature.

Videha's archive lists Bal Kavita by Jagdish Chandra Thakur 'Anil', Shishu Geet Khel by Anima Singh, Preeti Thakur's tradition of picture stories, Chonha by Jagadanand Jha 'Manu', Swarna Kamal by Nand Kumar Mishra 'Nand', and numerous independent works for children and adolescents. The different media of these books demonstrate that children's literature is not simply moral verse but an entire world of play, images, adventure, questions, humour, science, imagination, and self-respect. The literacy and environmental songs in Kavya Sarita can be valuable supplementary readings in this wider sphere; counting the whole collection as children's literature would reduce generic precision.

There is another decisive distinction between "children's poetry" and "poetry a child can listen to." Children may sing devotional or patriotic songs on collective occasions, but the complexity of their emotions, choice of words, and ideological register need not be child-centred. Conversely, songs about swings, nature, rivers, school, and immediate experiences connect with a child's own world. Four questions about curriculum selection arise from this substantive difference: to what age group's experience does the poem speak? Does a child merely hear instruction, or find personal feeling in it? Does the poem leave space for questions and imagination? Is its language pronounceable, accessible, and respectful?

Modern criticism of children's literature assigns importance not merely to moral discipline but also to children's rights, curiosity, and a scientific outlook. The critical discourse on children's novels in Videha addresses appropriateness, aesthetic feeling, folk tradition, narrative justice, linguistic awareness, and the reader's age. Against these measures, the immediate advantages of Kavya Sarita's educational verses are pleasant recitation and the possibility of group performance. Yet selection requires consideration of how much understanding of scientific causes, how much independent questioning by children, and how much creative variety they contain.

The historical comparison leads to the conclusion that children's literature constitutes a distinct field within Nand Kumar Mishra 'Nand's creative world, as Swarna Kamal demonstrates; some portions of Kavya Sarita enter into dialogue with that field. The limits of both propositions must remain clear. The collection's social criticism, satire, religious songs, and local politics also point strongly towards adult folk-oriented literature. The possibility of its use by children does not change its fundamental generic designation.

Comparative Judgment: Achievements, Limitations, and Critical Criteria

The collection's greatest achievement is to gather numerous social voices in a single volume. Worship, popular song, family, education, public health, politics, memories of the village, the motherland, and regional identity coexist in its creative world. This thematic multiplicity introduces a writer unwilling to separate poetry from public life. From this perspective, Kavya Sarita possesses the qualities of a folk-cultural record.

A second achievement is the preservation of the generic memory of folk song. The very names nachari, kajri, chaiti, bhajan, and vandana point to traditions of performance suited to popular participation. Within modern print, these labels keep the collective practice of singing present. For this reason, the book can be a relevant text both for students of folk literature and for researchers of modern Maithili song.

A third achievement is the insistence on civic discernment. Songs concerned with social reform or politics testify to the poet's sense of responsibility. But poetry is not the same as a social slogan. A work that moves beyond a direct message and constructs the contradictions of lived situations leaves a more lasting literary impression. This criterion is indispensable to a critical evaluation of the collection; without it, literature risks being reduced to a list of subjects.

Three limitations deserve particular mention. First, dense repetition of compositions on similar subjects sometimes makes the book's internal differences less distinct. Second, the absence of thematic classification, glossaries, and dates of composition imposes additional labour on researchers. Third, assessing the literary force of didactic compositions requires fine comparison of particular images, formal techniques, and oblique expressions: an avowed moral position cannot by itself justify praise. Such judgments are not a dismissal of poetry but an attempt to do serious justice to the author's varied writing.

Criticism of poetry grounded in folk life should acknowledge the value of spontaneous rhythm without making popular tradition an automatic excuse for formal weakness. Equally, a demand for formal linguistic discipline in the written text should not erase pronunciation, melody, or the voice of regional dialects. This tension makes the criticism of a collection such as Kavya Sarita interesting. The balance achieved between popular acceptance and aesthetic discipline can become its decisive literary measure.

Conclusion

Nand Kumar Mishra 'Nand's Kavya Sarita is a collection with many currents within Maithili poetry. The humility of devotional song, the collective character of folk rhythm, the desire for social reform, the bite of political satire, and attachment to Mithila and the nation flow together. This variety is the defining fact of the book's character. Placing it exclusively within devotional poetry, folk song, or children's literature would diminish its true range.

Within the parallel history of children's literature, the book will be most usefully employed if selected seasonal songs and verses concerning swings, education, and the environment are presented through age-appropriate critical editing. Comparison with the author's children's novel Swarna Kamal offers an opportunity to understand the distinction between genres. It shows that within a single writer's oeuvre, writing for young readers and public poetry for adult society can be two independent but mutually engaged currents.

For a lasting evaluation of the book, future work will require a textually reliable printed edition, a fully corrected text, a study of metre, an inventory of folk melodies, and a critical edition of selected compositions. As a preliminary step, the present study maps the collection's generic architecture, social questions, and comparative importance. Its central conclusion is that reading Kavya Sarita in relation to the folk society of the Maithili language, traditions of singing, and modern civic consciousness is the most justifiable critical method.

Appendix: Groups of Compositions and Printed Page References

Thematic Area	Example Titles	Printed Pages
Opening Invocations	Ganesh Vandana; Saraswati Vandana	3–5
Motherhood and Goddess Worship	Maa; Devi Geet	6–19
Devotion and Folk Melodies	Dular; Bhajan; Nachari	22–37
Public Education	Family Planning; Literacy;	38–40

Thematic Area	Example Titles	Printed Pages
	Patitpavani Ganga
Seasonal Songs	Kajri; Chaiti	42–45
Social Reform	Dowry; songs associated with literacy	46–49
Political and Social Satire	Chamcha; Thief and Policeman; Satire on the Prime Minister; Vote	50–53; 67; 80
Civic Questions	Are We Free?; Time; Bribery	126–130
Place and Identity	My Village; We Shall Claim the Realm of Mithila	132–133
National Feeling	Patriotic songs	136–137

Chapter 12

Swarna Kamal (The Golden Lotus)

Folktale, Children's Consciousness, and an Extended Maithili Narrative of Justice

Nand Kumar Mishra 'Nand's Swarna Kamal (2019) represents a creative current of the Maithili children's novel in which the traditional tale of a prince, a folk imagination rich in wonders, storytelling within the family, and the sequential arrangement of events in the modern novel come together. On one level, Prafull and other children listen to a story from their grandmother; on another, Prince Sujit passes through a difficult series of struggles over succession, palace conspiracies, a journey through the forest, assistance from a spiritual guide, the acquisition of the golden lotus, the terror of a demon, and the restoration of the kingdom. Quotations from the original work are identified by printed page number. The analysis concludes that the most enduring contribution of Swarna Kamal lies not merely in the victory of an ideal hero but in the creation of an extended adventure narrative in Maithili and the effort to connect a grandmother's oral storytelling culture with the active curiosity of readers. Its limitations lie in the idealization of the hero, unequal scope for action among women characters, and a tendency to reduce political justice to a solution through royal succession.

Maithili children's literature; Swarna Kamal; Nand Kumar Mishra 'Nand'; folktale; children's novel; storytelling; royal power; ethics; young readers; symbolism; narratology.

Introduction: Literary Questions Raised by the Work

Children's literature is often treated as simple amusement, instruction in good conduct, or supplementary school reading. Yet the finest children's stories provide imaginative opportunities for children to understand social relationships, confront fear, recognize injustice, and form their own judgments. From this perspective, it is not enough, when evaluating Swarna Kamal, to ask whether the prince wins. One must also ask what his victory means morally, how the relationship between the storyteller-grandmother and the children listening to her creates that meaning, and how wonder, courage, political power, and forgiveness are joined together.

The work begins in a familiar domestic world, from which a journey opens towards the unfamiliar world of a royal palace. Prafull's grandmother is not simply someone who tells stories: she represents a tradition of experience, the memory of the family, and cultural formation through language. Prince Sujit's adventurous life enters within this storytelling frame. Through the movement between these two worlds, an extensive imaginative universe takes shape within the domestic linguistic experience of a Maithili child.

This study advances three interconnected propositions. First, the novel is a confluence of the oral folktale and the extended written narrative. Second, the prince's struggle is not centred solely on acquiring personal power but tests his moral fitness; nevertheless, its conception of royal duty founded on inheritance remains an ideological limitation. Third, the curiosity of the listening children and the grandmother's interventions activate the young reader, although predetermined lessons in many places reduce the reader's freedom to construct meaning independently.

An Introduction to the Children's Novel and Its Creative Form

The author of Swarna Kamal is Nand Kumar Mishra 'Nand'. The book was published in 2019 by Gosauni Baidyanath Smriti Manch, Upar Daha, Darbhanga district. Its title-page information explicitly calls it a Maithili children's novel. Its printed price is ₹150. The preliminary pages contain a critical introduction by Yoganand Jha, the author's statement, and then the principal story (Mishra, 2019: 3–19).

The main narrative extends from printed page 19 to page 102 and is divided into ten numbered parts. These sections begin respectively on pages 19, 30, 38, 44, 54, 61, 67, 84, 89, and 94. Here page references invariably denote the printed pages of the book. Rather than merely summarizing events when discussing each part independently, this analysis examines what new information, moral question, character situation, or narrative turn arises.

The comparative discussion draws upon the original work's introduction, available studies of the published history of Maithili children's literature, authentic award records of the Sahitya Akademi, and established works of folktale studies and criticism of children's literature. Just as Propp's function-based approach assists an understanding of the story's external arrangement, Nikolajeva's criticism of characterization opens questions about the characters' agency and development. These theoretical references are instruments of interpretation, not direct sources of the work or inspirations declared by the author.

The Tradition of Maithili Children's Literature and the Historical Place of Swarna Kamal

Long before printed books, the world of stories for children was active in Mithila's families and popular life. Stories told by grandmothers, tales of animals and birds, Gonu Jha's cleverness, narratives of kings and queens, folk deities, demons, magical devices, and moral parables have circulated through collective memory. Some of this oral inheritance entered various forms of written literature. Nevertheless, an oral tale and a novel are not the same: a novel requires a more extensive network of characters, developing conflicts, deferred resolutions, and sustained participation by readers.

In his historical survey of Maithili children's literature, Devshankar Navin discusses children's periodicals such as Shishu (1949), Dhiya-Puta (1956), Batuk (1961), Nena-Bhutka (1996), and Bal Mithila (1998). He emphasizes early education in the mother tongue, the limited circulation of children's magazines, and the place of writing for children in literary periodicals (Navin, publication details unavailable). This history shows that writing for children in Maithili continued over time, even as institutional publishing and access to readers remained problematic.

The introductory essay to Swarna Kamal mentions Ijoti Rani and Ramdev Jha's efforts in the field of the children's novel. The writer of the introduction presents these as earlier examples in Maithili of turning the folktale into an extended children's narrative (Yoganand Jha, "Maithili Children's Novel: Swarna Kamal," in Mishra, 2019: 5–6). This makes it possible to understand Swarna Kamal not as a work arising in a vacuum but as a subsequent stage of an existing literary endeavour.

The limits of the evidence must be kept in mind when making comparisons. A direct reading of the detailed plot of Ijoti Rani has not been undertaken here; therefore no conclusion about "identical subject matter" or direct influence between the two works can be offered. Similarities can be noted only at the broad level of genre: a prince's quest, a moral challenge, and the use of folk imagination. The principal text of this analysis is Swarna Kamal itself.

The list of recommended Maithili works for the Sahitya Akademi's 2023 Bal Sahitya Puraskar included Swarna Kamal by Nand Kumar Mishra 'Nand', dated 2019, under the category of "novel." Along with Gulri it was the second novel in that list; the award went to Akshay Anand 'Sunny' for Ol Katra, Jhol Katra (Sahitya Akademi, 2023). This archival entry signifies that the work was under institutional consideration, not that it received the award.

In earlier lists of the Maithili Bal Sahitya Puraskar, Ramdev Jha's Hansani Paan Aa Bajanta Supari (2015) and Amlendu Shekhar Pathak's Lalgachhi (2017) are recorded as novels; in 2018 Baidyanath Jha received the award for the story collection Khissa Sunu Bau. These facts suggest creative diversity: on one side a tradition of oral storytelling, on the other the extended internal world of the novel. Swarna Kamal may be situated at the meeting point of both currents (Sahitya Akademi, list of Bal Sahitya Puraskar winners).

The Overall Narrative Design: From a Domestic Tale to a Struggle for the Kingdom

The novel's first world is Prafull's family. Through her experience, discipline, and affection, the grandmother occupies a special position within the household. The children gather around her in anticipation of a story. The narrative begins, is interrupted, and resumes the following day with fresh questions. This recurrence gives the division of the book into sections the natural pattern of oral storytelling.

Prince Sujit is the hero of the story within the story. A conflict over succession and antagonism within the royal family force him away from the palace. Nayanavati's ambition, the opportunism of Shamsher Singh and Jalim Singh, and the crisis of royal government in Sumergarh create the narrative's political background. In forests and unknown territories, Sujit must trust strangers, face danger, and conceal his identity.

The refuge offered by Sar-Sultan, guidance from a holy man, and acquisition of the golden lotus mark stages of the prince's journey. The terror caused by the demon Kallu and the episode at Shridharpur add an ethical dimension—the protection of suffering people—beyond the personal conflict over the throne. Vishakha reveals certain strands of the demon's past. In the later sections, characters such as Bhavanishankar and Kalanath bring secret intelligence, public support, and political reorganization to the fore. Ultimately Sujit's identity, the campaign for Sumergarh, reunion, and the rearrangement of relationships carry the narrative towards its conclusion.

The overall narrative design is circular. Beginning close to the grandmother and the children, the story expands into a royal crisis and returns to the listening children. Its final value lies in the fact that the children do not merely hear the outcome; they also ask their own questions about its moral meaning.

Individual Textual Analyses of All Ten Parts

Part One: The Grandmother's World of Stories and the Reader's Entry

The opening sentence of the first page—"Today Prafull and the other children were very delighted" (Mishra, 2019: 19)—depicts not the hero-prince but the collective mood of children ready to listen to a story. The proximity of the name "Prafull" to the adjective meaning "delighted" creates a light play of language. The author introduces the audience of listeners before launching the adventure.

The character of Prafull's grandmother is constructed through the family's modest economic circumstances, its joint structure, discipline, and affection. The grandmother is the senior member of the household, but her narrative power derives not from an official position but from experience and intimacy. The children's eagerness suggests that storytelling can become part of everyday domestic life.

The relatively extended depiction of domestic life in this section is a deliberate creative choice. On one hand, it prepares an affectionate ground for the royal adventure; on the other, it postpones the introduction of the central conflict. Readers expecting the adventure to begin quickly may experience this as a delay. Nevertheless, by assigning importance to the young readers' social context, this opening establishes a basis for the novel's cultural originality.

By the end of the section, a relationship between the grandmother and children has been established through curiosity and interruption. The introductory "frame" is not an external ornament but becomes a principle through which all ten sections create meaning.

Part Two: The Anonymous Prince, Adversity, and Narrative Recollection

At the beginning of the second part, a listener asks to hear again a portion of the story already told. Prafull's words, "Grandmother! I could not hear the whole story" (Mishra, 2019: 30), reveal an important aspect of storytelling: to understand a story, listeners want to recover the missing link. The grandmother accepts the children's need.

Within the inner tale, Sujit struggles with dangers in an unfamiliar forest. Strangers, the hazardous geography of the woods, and the need for refuge temporarily render the prince's royal identity ineffective. He proceeds through caution and effort rather than on the strength of his dynasty.

In the episode concerning Sar-Sultan, refuge is accompanied by a problem of information. Someone who does not reveal his real identity also finds it difficult to obtain help. Concealed identity is thus not merely a device for excitement; it creates tension between safety and trust.

The achievement of the second section is to fix the hero's predicament in the reader's imagination. Its limitation is that amid abundant descriptions of courage, his inward experience of fear, doubt, and personal weakness might have emerged more fully.

Part Three: The History of Royal Decline and the Making of Villains

In the third part, the narrative shifts away from the prince's journey to reveal political antecedents. It begins with the explicit information, "King Sujan Singh was the king of Tikamgarh" (Mishra, 2019: 38). The account of his financial and royal decline through gambling, drinking, and luxury gives a new direction to the relationship between power and character.

At this point, the reader understands that Sujit's personal crisis is not a separate accident but the result of an extensive network of dynastic relations, political arrangements, and earlier royal decisions. As Nayanavati's past and the relationships within the royal family are disclosed, the causes of the court conspiracy gradually become clear.

Inserting the history of antagonistic forces in the midst of the hero's quest is an example of narrative expansion. Yet the depiction of King Sujan Singh's weaknesses makes its moral lesson very clear. Gambling and drinking are offered as reasons for political downfall; the examination of socioeconomic causes remains comparatively limited.

The critical importance of this section is that "wicked" characters do not appear suddenly in the work. Their self-interest is preceded by events and relationships. The novel does not, however, take these relationships to the depths of a modern psychological novel.

Part Four: The Hermitage, Guidance, and the Revelation of the Title

In the fourth section, the grandmother maintains the storytelling frame for the fourth day. With Sar-Sultan's help, the prince moves away from the palace conspiracy in search of a new path. The feeling that an invisible power is leading him forward carries the narrative beyond the limits of realism into a supernatural folk imagination.

A holy man becomes the prince's guide. The relationship with this mentor is not merely one of providing instruction but of understanding danger, determining the next objective, and gathering the necessary courage. Nevertheless, the extensive advance information provided by the guide somewhat reduces the uncertainty of the hero's search.

The decisive event associated with the book's title is revealed on page 53. Following the holy man's directions, the prince must obtain the golden lotus from the middle of a lake after an arduous journey through forests, mountains, and water. The author states that when the lotus is plucked, a temple bell will ring and the blessing of Mother Kali will be received (Mishra, 2019: 53). This scene marks the appearance of the narrative's principal magical instrument.

The word "golden" suggests something valuable, yet the flower is employed not to accumulate wealth but to resist danger. It may be read as a symbol of protective power earned through effort. This, however, is a critical interpretation constructed by the reader; the book itself places greater emphasis on the wonder's practical narrative function.

Part Five: Nayanavati's Exercise of Power and the Rise of Shamsher and Jalim

On the fifth day, the listeners directly ask what has happened to Sujit's parents and where the prince will go next. The grandmother's answer makes clear that Sujit's crisis is not developing along a single line: King Ranvir Singh and Queen Sunanda are suffering separately, while Nayanavati's influence over the government of the kingdom is growing (Mishra, 2019: 54).

Shamsher Singh and Jalim Singh become political instruments of Nayanavati's self-interest. Jalim Singh's character is associated with gambling, alcohol, and misconduct. The desire to obtain power is not simply personal hatred: it becomes a struggle to control the resources and administration of the kingdom.

This section shows that a ruler's weakness produces instability in public life. When royal responsibility becomes subordinate to private pleasure and courtly self-interest, a rightful successor becomes the centre of conflict even while he remains far away.

There is, however, a critical problem in this representation. Nayanavati's political ambition is portrayed primarily through the misogynistic archetype of the "wicked queen." The problem is not ambition itself but the unethical means by which it is pursued. Making this distinction explicit would give the character a more balanced meaning.

Part Six: The Psychology of Power and Public Responsibility

The sixth part opens with the grandmother reminding her listeners of earlier events. An aphorism immediately preceding this section draws attention: "Power and self-interest are mutually dependent" (Mishra, 2019: 61). This sentence is one of the principal formulations of the narrative's political morality.

Personal relationships among kings, queens, military leaders, and princes affect the public destiny of the kingdom. If someone who acquires power uses the office for private benefit, the ethics of royal duty are corrupted. This idea recurs throughout the section.

Significantly, the prince's struggle is not resolved at once. The narrative follows the activities of several parties. Readers begin to attend not only to the hero's bravery but also to the instability of the kingdom and the possible harm suffered by ordinary people.

The possibilities of political criticism in the novel become evident in this section. Yet its conception of resolution remains centred principally on the rule of a capable individual. The narrative does comparatively little to explore institutional restraints upon power, the rights of subjects, or public accountability.

Part Seven: The Long Journey, the Demon Kallu, and Vishakha's Testimony

The seventh section offers the most extensive development of adventure. Carrying the sword given to him by the holy man, Sujit journeys through mountains, forests, and unknown territories. Its first page forbids stopping and insists upon moving forward: "You must not stop anywhere" (Mishra, 2019: 67). This brief instruction contains both the temporal tension and the goal-directed nature of the quest.

The natural environment is more than scenery during this journey: mountains, water, unfamiliar paths, and woodland become means of testing the hero's abilities. References to hunger, thirst, rest, and caution prevent courage from becoming entirely supernatural.

The terror caused by Kallu, the demon of Shridharpur, turns the story from the hero's personal crisis towards the rescue of the public. Kallu frightens people, and the kidnapping of young girls enters the narrative. Sujit's intervention matters because he is now fighting not for his own crown but for the safety of strangers.

Vishakha reveals Kallu's past. She explains that his origins and deformation are connected with experiences and acts of revenge spanning generations (Mishra, 2019: 81–83). The antecedents of this violent character raise a complex question: when does someone who has suffered injustice become a source of injustice in turn? The narrative ultimately favours the subjugation of the demon; its analysis of the social causes of his violence might have been developed further.

This section's principal achievement lies in joining courage with concern for others. At the same time, the intensity of its violent scenes needs consideration in light of young readers' emotional sensitivity.

Part Eight: Preparing to Return, Concealed Identity, and Cooperative Resistance

In the eighth section, the grandmother brings the story to a new "stage." The prince reconnects with the hermitage and political developments as he moves towards fulfilling his purpose. The holy man advises him to go to Sumergarh, conceal his identity, and act with an understanding of his opponents' strength (Mishra, 2019: 84).

Concealment of identity is no longer merely the exciting device of a disguise; it becomes a political strategy. Revealing oneself immediately before a powerful enemy might prove disastrous. Patience and the gathering of intelligence become necessary elements of courage. Heroism thus expands from unrestrained attack to prudent organization.

Episodes involving characters such as Bhavanishankar and Murmur reveal an alternative political consciousness within opposition at court. False allegations, the misuse of official authority, and the defence of the innocent raise questions about popular support (Mishra, 2019: 85–87).

A limitation of this section is that the social foundations of popular support are not developed as extensively as the personal network of palace conspiracies. Nevertheless, the suggestion that the hero's success depends on cooperation rather than isolated physical strength is important.

Part Nine: Kalanath and the Entry of Rural Popular Consciousness

The ninth section begins with Kalanath, a householder of Rajapur. Described as "very hardworking," he is introduced through an ordinary life based on agricultural labour (Mishra, 2019: 89). The opening moves the narrative away from the palace, hermitage, and demon's stronghold into the world of the village.

Through Kalanath, the novel gives concrete form to the subjects of the kingdom, the village council, social standing, and the danger of unjust oppression. Royal conflicts affect not only the ruling dynasty but ordinary rural people. This is an important expansion in the ninth section.

Subsequent episodes connect the continuing campaign after Kallu's defeat, the assistance of Ram and Lakshman, and efforts to comprehend the political situation. Help comes here not only from royal armies or the holy man's supernatural power but also from the readiness of ordinary people.

Kalanath's literary importance lies in his social position. Although the crown remains the political centre of the novel, the hero's expedition cannot be completed without the support of popular life. Had this suggestion been further developed, the work might have offered a clearer examination of an ethics of politics grounded in the people, rather than remaining principally a tale of ideal kingship.

Part Ten: Revelation of Identity, Justice, and Completion of the Narrative Frame

The tenth part opens with Rahul's question, "What will you tell us today?" (Mishra, 2019: 94). The grandmother announces the account of the prince's entry into Sumergarh and the rescue of the abducted girls. This declaration intensifies both the momentum and expectations of the final part.

On the strength of secret cooperation, political intelligence, and popular support, the prince confronts the situation in Sumergarh. Sujit's statement in conversation with Sar-Sultan is significant: "I cannot compel you to do this" (Mishra, 2019: 97). This short sentence clarifies the moral distinction between cooperation and consent. Victory matters not only because enemies are defeated but because the hero has the discernment not to coerce an ally.

The revelation of the prince's true identity, the failure of his opponents, the reunion of the royal family, and Nayanavati's confession bring the narrative towards closure. The relationship with Princess Javeda also forms part of the final settlement. Nevertheless, the complexities of the political system and of punishment and justice are resolved in comparatively little space.

Most important of all, when the prince's story ends, the domestic circle of storytellers and listeners comes into view once more. Rahul and the other children respond to what the experience means. The ultimate return of the vast royal world into the grandmother's voice constitutes the novel's principal cultural achievement.

A Story Within a Story: Craft, Time, and the Listener's Participation

To read the external narrative frame of Swarna Kamal separately from the inner tale of the prince is to miss their significant formal interdependence. The grandmother's role is to maintain the continuity of the narration, reconnect forgotten events, foreshadow subsequent developments, and extend the tale in response to the children's reactions. In this arrangement the narrative is not merely a written text but an experience of listening together.

The sequence of ten parts is associated with the recurrence of days. The child listeners arrive each day with new questions. This division of time resembles the suspense-producing technique of modern serial narratives, but its cultural origin lies in the domestic oral tradition. The ending of a chapter does not bring the entire story to a close; it creates an expectation of the next telling.

Read in the light of Aidan Chambers's discussion-centred approach to children's reading, readers create the meaning of stories by asking questions, sharing experiences, and reasoning about incomplete information (Chambers, 1993). The children of Swarna Kamal demonstrate an early form of this active readership. The grandmother's narrative authority, however, is very strong, and she frequently supplies the moral conclusions herself. A tension therefore persists between conversational freedom and the linearity of instruction.

In narratological terms, this is an embedded narrative—a story within a story. The time of the inner events and the time of the outer telling differ, but the children's curiosity connects both. Consequently, the novel becomes a record not only of a prince's adventures but of the cultural situation in which stories are told.

The Design of Characters: From the Moral Hero to Complex Antagonists

Sujit is introduced as the heir to a royal dynasty, but the narrative removes him from the safety of the palace. His actions are tested by the forest, hunger and thirst, uncertain routes, and the pressure of a concealed identity. His sense of justice becomes most meaningful when he assists strangers in danger. For this reason, the campaign against Kallu goes beyond personal revenge.

Sujit's moral image, however, is excessively flawless. Serious errors, prolonged self-doubt, and profound self-examination are limited. Using the terms of Maria Nikolajeva's study of character, one may distinguish between a motivating "action-oriented" hero and a deeply "inward-looking" character (Nikolajeva, 2002). Sujit's courage inspires readers, but showing more of his weakness would have made the relationship more human.

The grandmother is the novel's cultural heroine. Her authority comes neither from wealth nor from royal force: it grows out of the living memory of the mother tongue, experience, discipline, and affectionate address. She is thus not merely a character but a symbol of a literary tradition.

Nayanavati represents the selfish use of power. Her plans affect public life. Because of her final remorse, she does not remain an unchanging villain: transformation is possible. Yet a more extensively developed account of that transformation would have increased its psychological credibility.

Shamsher Singh and Jalim Singh join private self-interest to institutional power. When military authority and the machinery of government become means to personal ambition, those entrusted with protection themselves become a danger. The crisis of King Ranvir Singh and the pitiable position of Queen Sunanda reveal the familial consequences of this abuse.

The holy man brings together the functions of mentor, strategist, and the folktale "donor." He provides Sujit with direction, information, and sources of strength when needed. Kallu occupies the opposing pole, but his history suggests that violent characters too may arise out of past relationships. Vishakha serves as a witness to memory who reveals that history.

Sar-Sultan, Bhavanishankar, and Kalanath prevent the story from becoming a solitary hero's saga. Sujit's success depends on cooperation, information, and relationships with the people. Through these characters, it becomes clear that courage is not always a lonely struggle; earning others' trust is also part of it.

Women Characters, Motherhood, and the Gender Politics of Power

The opposition between Queen Sunanda and Nayanavati reinstates the traditional folktale structure of the "virtuous mother versus the wicked stepmother." This is a familiar device in folktales, but literary criticism must ask how a woman's aspiration to power can be separated from immorality. Nayanavati's problem is not her desire for authority but her use of deceit, conspiracy, and injustice to fulfil it.

The grandmother represents another dimension of women's experience. She has no legitimate royal power, yet she exercises complete cultural authority over the story. This right to transmit knowledge within the family differs entirely from Nayanavati's ruthless politics. The comparison shows that the novel does not confine women to a single moral type.

Vishakha provides information about Kallu's past; her speech gives the narrative a dimension of memory and causation. Princess Javeda's presence also broadens the world of female characters. Nevertheless, leadership of decisive battles, expeditions, and political resolutions rests almost entirely with men.

From the perspective of contemporary girl readers, Javeda's independent choices, Vishakha's self-motivated resistance to social wrongs, or Sunanda's political discernment might have been developed more fully. Indicating such possibilities does not mean imposing a present-day moral verdict upon the work's historical form; it identifies creative possibilities contained within the novel that remain underdeveloped.

The Golden Lotus, Sword, Forest, and Fort: Fields of Symbolic Meaning

Within Indian cultural thought, the lotus is associated with purity, beauty, and the ability to flower in adverse conditions. This general cultural meaning should not be imposed mechanically upon the novel. In the original text, the golden lotus functions primarily as supernatural protection and as a means of strengthening the hero for his coming campaign (Mishra, 2019: 53). Its symbolic significance develops out of this narrative function.

The word "golden" suggests wealth and rarity, but the hero does not keep the flower for personal enrichment. The value of the precious object becomes linked to the moral purpose of its use. The golden lotus can therefore stand in opposition to an immoral greed for gold.

The sword is an instrument of conflict in the adventure folktale, but the sword bestowed by the guru also comes with instructions to exercise caution. The demand that the power of a weapon remain subject to discernment is scattered through the story, although the boundary between violence and self-defence needed clearer articulation.

The forest is a liminal space where royal authority and the familiar social order grow weak. The prince must depend on his own experience to survive. A fort, by contrast, may be both a centre of power and a place of imprisonment. Obtaining the lotus from the middle of a lake can be read as a metaphor for gaining new power after overcoming a challenge.

Propp's Theory of Functions and Structural Parallels in the Narrative

In Morphology of the Folktale, Vladimir Propp studies the narrative actions or "functions" of folktale characters more than the characters themselves (Propp, 1968). Swarna Kamal can be read through this method in its sequence of initial adversity, expulsion of the hero, meeting a guide, obtaining a special object, travel, confrontation with an enemy, concealed identity, revelation of identity, and restoration.

In this sequence Nayanavati, Shamsher, and Jalim function as antagonistic forces; the holy man as donor and guide; the golden lotus as a magical instrument; Sujit as the struggling hero; and restoration of the kingdom as final resolution. This does not claim that every one of Propp's functions appears in every story. Structural similarity makes interpretation easier; it does not establish that the work is a copy of any European folktale.

What really matters is that the author expands the sequence of folktale events into a long novel. Multiple levels of villainy, varied types of helper, and an external storyteller make its structure more complex than a single conventional folktale.

Rasa, Visuality, and the Child's Imagination

The dominant emotion of the story is heroism. The prince's frightening journey, confrontation with oppressive forces, and efforts to protect the subjects of the kingdom provide the basis of vira rasa, the heroic aesthetic mood. Yet courage is not merely the application of force: remaining disguised to gather information, making friends, and refraining from coercing an ally are also forms of prudent bravery.

Adbhuta rasa, the mood of wonder, emerges from the golden lotus, the protection of Mother Kali, the holy man's exceptional knowledge, and the episodes involving the demon. Bhayanaka rasa, the mood of fear, is present in Kallu's fort, abduction, the risks of the forest, and conspiracies. Karuna rasa, the mood of compassion and sorrow, is clear in Sunanda's separation from Sujit, King Ranvir Singh's predicament, and the suffering of ordinary people. The final reunion moves towards the easing of tension.

The author's visual world contains rivers, mountains, lakes, forests, and forts, chiefly serving to generate movement and excitement. Detailed treatments of local natural history, the weather, regional plant life, and the specific geography of Mithila are comparatively scarce. The adventurous character of the narrative partly justifies such brevity, but a closer relationship between the mother tongue and regional environment might have given the novel a more distinct local form.

Moral Philosophy: Justice, Forgiveness, Consent, and Power

The novel's moral demand is active resistance to injustice. Sujit does not endure humiliation and wait passively. He prepares, gathers courage, accepts help, and protects people in danger. Virtue in the novel is therefore connected not only with words but with action.

Nevertheless, the difference between justice and vengeance is not always sufficiently clear. Kallu's destruction, the suppression of conspirators, and the restoration of dynastic succession occur together. In discussing these episodes with children, one may ask: when is force necessary for self-defence? How much forgiveness is proper after someone confesses a crime? Are personal forgiveness and public accountability the same or different?

Nayanavati's final remorse opens the novel's compassionate moral dimension. The possibility of personal transformation is an optimistic outlook useful for children's literature. But the judicial redress due to ordinary people harmed by political conspiracy is not automatically accomplished through personal forgiveness. The novel does not explore this difference deeply.

The question of consent becomes visible in the final section. Sujit's statement to Sar-Sultan that he will not "compel" him indicates that respecting an ally's free will is a virtue of moral leadership (Mishra, 2019: 97). This episode makes him a more thoughtful character than a simplified "hero with a sword."

The final restoration of the kingdom is presented as ideal kingship. In a modern democratic sense, the accountability of civic institutions receives comparatively little attention. The novel's political imagination relies chiefly upon the ethics of a worthy ruler. Even while recognizing this limitation, its sharp criticism of the misuse of official power remains an important achievement.

Child Psychology, the Reading Experience, and Educational Value

The curiosity of the children within the story assumes that a child is not merely a being who obeys instructions but a reader who asks questions. Prafull's request to hear a missed episode again, Vimala's doubts, and Rahul's questions create a many-sided experience of collective reading. Discussion, recollection, inference, and final response are all involved in how children construct meaning.

The adventurous structure does not eliminate fear altogether; it creates opportunities to make decisions in the presence of fear. The prince finds himself alone, may meet the wrong people, and cannot be certain of refuge. Such episodes may help develop a child's conception of the relationship between self-confidence and caution. Nevertheless, Kallu's violence and episodes of abduction should be contextualized according to prospective young readers' age and sensitivity.

Children's reading depends not only on age but also on linguistic proficiency, experience of listening, and emotional readiness. The work is potentially appropriate for readers from the early years of secondary school through adolescence; for younger children, collective storytelling with selected episodes would be more useful. This is an evaluation of readership, not a definite age category specified by the publisher.

The availability of an extended adventure novel of this kind in the mother tongue is especially important for linguistic confidence. A Maithili child can experience the fact that palaces, demons, secret missions, political conflicts, and intimate domestic conversations may all be developed together in their own language. Children's literature becomes here a means of expanding the creative possibilities of the mother tongue.

Language, Dialogue, and Editorial Discipline

The novel's language suits natural storytelling. Frequent dialogue sustains the movement of events. The grandmother's manner of speaking has intimacy; the language of the royal characters conveys formality and authority. These differences make it easy for readers to enter both worlds.

There are also stylistic limitations. On many occasions, characters' dialogue merely communicates information required by the plot. When the narrator or holy man immediately explains the moral meaning of events, readers have less opportunity to interpret for themselves. A better balance between dramatic scenes and inward experience would have deepened the effect.

From an editorial perspective, certain descriptions and repetitions could be shortened, but it would be inappropriate to standardize Maithili word forms, sentence rhythms, and the oral voice unnecessarily. The naturalness of the language is itself part of the work's creative wealth.

Critical Limitations and a Balanced Evaluation

The work's first limitation is its extended introduction. Its domestic opening is culturally meaningful, but the main adventure begins comparatively late. A second limitation is the excessive idealization of the hero: Sujit has limited opportunities to display human weakness or make mistaken decisions. A third is dependence on magical protection, which sometimes simplifies the complexities of human endeavour.

A fourth limitation is the incomplete development of the antagonists' motivations. Nayanavati and Jalim Singh clearly represent a lust for power, but their inner conflicts and social circumstances might have been explored more deeply. Kallu's past offers the possibility of breaking this simplification, but does not receive sustained development.

A fifth limitation is the unequal distribution of agency by gender. The grandmother and Vishakha are decisive in the creation of meaning, but men remain the principal leaders of physical expeditions and political solutions. A sixth is the rapid resolution of the final political order and of questions of punishment and justice. Amid family reconciliation, public justice and the rights of the people become secondary.

Pointing out these limitations does not diminish the work. The purpose of literary criticism is to reveal both a composition's actual structure and its possibilities. Evaluation must take into account its folktale aims, young readers' need for excitement, and the historical circumstances of the published Maithili children's novel.

Achievements: The Creative Expansion of the Maithili Children's Novel

The first achievement of Swarna Kamal is its renewal of oral storytelling culture. The portrayal of the reading relationship between the grandmother and the children forms the novel's original cultural voice. A second achievement is its sustained adventure plot extending through several sections, in which the prince's journey, palace conspiracy, the demon's reign of terror, and restoration of the kingdom become interrelated.

A third achievement is the expansion of the moral definition of courage. Helping strangers, winning trustworthy companions, gathering secret intelligence, and respecting consent are presented alongside heroism. A fourth is its combination of the marvellous, fearful, heroic, and compassionate emotional experiences, which broaden young readers' imaginative powers.

A fifth achievement is the expansion of prose in the mother tongue. Formal dialogue in the royal court coexists in the same book with the grandmother's affectionate Maithili. A sixth is the variety of moral questions: how to administer justice, whom to trust, how to treat someone who has chosen a wrong path, and why moral fitness matters more than entitlement.

Taken as a whole, the work is not only a story of a prince's victory but also a literary affirmation of children's right to listen, question, and think.

Conclusion

The most justifiable generic designation for Swarna Kamal is a folktale-based adventure novel in Maithili children's literature. Its fundamental movement lies in the prince's dangerous journey, but its cultural originality resides in the storytelling relationship between the grandmother and Prafull. Through this two-level structure, the work brings together the intimacy of oral tradition and the extended world of adventure in the printed novel.

Sujit's victory acquires a meaning more complex than a simple assertion that "good triumphs over evil." His struggle raises questions of justice, trust, cooperation, and consent. At the same time, the idealized hero, decisive intervention by wonders, limited independence of women characters, and dynastic resolution provoke modern critical questions.

Despite these contradictions, the book's enduring literary contribution remains significant. Within the narrative, the flower that gives the book its title is a means of protection and hope; in critical terms, it becomes a symbol of stories, memories, and moral imagination passed between generations within the Maithili mother tongue. The royal adventure comes to an end, but the children's desire to hear their grandmother's stories points to the continuity of literature.

Primary Sources

Mishra, Nand Kumar 'Nand'. 2019. Swarna Kamal (Maithili Children's Novel). Upar Daha, Darbhanga: Gosauni Baidyanath Smriti Manch.

Jha, Yoganand. 2019. "Maithili Children's Novel: Swarna Kamal." In Nand Kumar Mishra 'Nand', Swarna Kamal, pp. 5–16. Upar Daha, Darbhanga: Gosauni Baidyanath Smriti Manch.

Historical and Institutional References

Navin, Devshankar. "A Bird's-Eye View of Maithili Children's Literature." Gadyakosh. (Accessed 23 October 2026.)

Sahitya Akademi. 2023. List of Books Recommended for the Bal Sahitya Puraskar 2023, Maithili section. (Accessed 23 October 2026.)

Sahitya Akademi. "Bal Sahitya Puraskar (2010–2025)," list of Maithili award-winning works. (Accessed 23 October 2026.)

Critical and Theoretical References

Propp, Vladimir. 1968. Morphology of the Folktale. 2nd ed. Translated by Laurence Scott; edited by Louis A. Wagner. Austin: University of Texas Press.

Nikolajeva, Maria. 2002. The Rhetoric of Character in Children's Literature. Lanham, MD: Scarecrow Press.

Chambers, Aidan. 1993. Tell Me: Children, Reading & Talk. Stroud: Thimble Press.

Integrated Conclusion

Literary Achievements and Critical Limitations

Reading these twelve works together reveals Nand Kumar Mishra 'Nand's authorial identity chiefly as an effort to bring society's internal contradictions into public discussion. His language and narrative arrangement change across the genres of short fiction, novels, literary sketches, songs, and children's narratives, yet his commitment to human dignity, education, opposition to injustice, and relationships among people remains constant.

The reformist tendency is a significant achievement of his writing. Its limitation becomes visible when the voice of the narrator or a character overwhelms the artistic scene and predetermines the conclusion. Depictions of women's identity, the lives of disadvantaged groups, rural institutions, and modern administration often generate questions, while in certain episodes their solutions arrive too rapidly through a character's moral steadfastness. This difference matters in the critical evaluation of every work.

The village and the city in Mithila are not merely opposing poles here. Memory, education, livelihood, migration, political experience, and cultural activities sustain constant movement between them. On this social ground, Nand's literature makes human relationships its chief measure. Its critical possibilities lie in maintaining a balance: affection for village culture must not become uncritical attachment, and trust in modern institutions must not obscure questions about their structures of power.

Kavya Sarita and Swarna Kamal are particular evidence of the author's creative range. The former brings together lyric tradition, folk melodies, and public consciousness; the latter transforms family storytelling and adventurous imagination into an extended narrative for young readers. It would be inappropriate to examine both without modification against the criteria used for adult social novels: every genre has its own aesthetics and expectations of readership.

Overall, Nand's body of work offers abundant opportunities to study social questions, expression rooted in the language of ordinary people, and moral imagination within Maithili literature. Its importance lies not in declarations of praise but in the questions that compel readers to reconsider the relationships among equality, justice, family, power, morality, and linguistic culture.

References and Literary Archives

Works by Nand Kumar Mishra 'Nand' Examined in This Study

Mishra, Nand Kumar 'Nand'. Gaam-Ghar.

Mishra, Nand Kumar 'Nand'. Aadambar. 2017.

Mishra, Nand Kumar 'Nand'. Gudari Ke Lal.

Mishra, Nand Kumar 'Nand'. Anathiya Kukur.

Mishra, Nand Kumar 'Nand'. Sujata.

Mishra, Nand Kumar 'Nand'. Sukanya. 2019.

Mishra, Nand Kumar 'Nand'. Parivar. 2021.

Mishra, Nand Kumar 'Nand'. Delhi Ke Park. 2018.

Mishra, Nand Kumar 'Nand'. Yachak Ke Nahi. 2022.

Mishra, Nand Kumar 'Nand'. Maharani Kaikeyi.

Mishra, Nand Kumar 'Nand'. Kavya Sarita. 2019.

Mishra, Nand Kumar 'Nand'. Swarna Kamal. 2019.

Archival References on Maithili Literature

Videha—The First Fortnightly Maithili E-Journal. Catalogue of Maithili Books (Pothi). https://videha-ejournal.github.io/videha/pothi.htm

Videha. Maithili Prose: Catalogue of Writers and Works. https://videha-ejournal.github.io/videha/prose.htm

Videha. Videha Shishu Utsav: Children's Literary Works and Bibliography. https://videha-ejournal.github.io/videha/kids.htm

Videha. Parallel History of Mithila and Maithili Literature: Archives of Writers, Genres, and Literary Traditions. https://videha-ejournal.github.io/videha/videha.htm

Jha, Harimohan. Kanyadan. Maithili novel.

Nagarjun. Paro. Maithili novel.

Premchand. Godan. Hindi novel.

STUDY 06 / NIT NAVAL

Kumar Pawan

Kumar Pawan: Narrative, Society and Ethical Questions

In Kumar Pawan's fictional world, human beings frequently stand on a threshold where personal desire confronts the rules constructed by society. In one place there is a row of guests at a feast; elsewhere, a college office; elsewhere still, an aspiration to become acquainted with an influential person. The settings change, but the underlying concern remains the same: how does an individual preserve dignity, independence and moral discernment? Read together, these three works reveal the multidimensional range of Kumar Pawan's narrative vision.

Against the background of a popular religious belief that the departed soul must gain admission to heaven, 'Paith' exposes the contradiction between the hunger of the living and ostentation after death. While alive, Kaniya Kaki asked for a little food for her daughter's son, and an uproar arose in the household and community; after her death, however, an enormous feast was arranged in the hope of securing her soul's admission to heaven. 'The Blank Pages of a Diary' tells of the entanglements of power, education and personal self-writing. 'The Plunder of Gold Coins and a Mark on Charcoal' begins by searching for the meaning of a popular saying and moves towards the irony of society's hunger for office and intellectual prestige. In all three works, laughter, astonishment, compassion and irony are not opposing forces but different registers of a single reality.

This book presents separate critical readings of the three works in sequence. It then offers a literary-theoretical comparison of narrative time, memory, point of view, social power and ethical responsibility in 'Paith' and 'The Blank Pages of a Diary'. To call 'Paith' the Maithili equivalent of 'Usne Kaha Tha' is not to suggest a similarity in plot or technique; the comparison concerns a particular kind of literary renown. Just as Chandradhar Sharma Guleri is particularly well known for 'Usne Kaha Tha', a single story can become the representative work associated with a writer's name. In relation to 'Paith', the analogy should be understood in this restricted sense alone.

The purpose of criticism is not to pass judgment on the virtues and failings of characters, but to clarify the many voices, memories, social calculations and unresolved questions within a literary work. When a narrative offers no definite answer, its silence can itself become meaningful. Kumar Pawan's writings demand precisely this uncomfortable yet necessary activity from their readers.

PART I

Paith

Neglect of the Living, the Funeral Feast and the Irony of Admission to Heaven

Inside the Work

Kumar Pawan's ‘Paith’ is an example of the Maithili long story in which preparations for a feast following a death, the commotion surrounding it and the display of social standing expose the unequal structure of rural society. Its poignant contradiction is that when Kaniya Kaki, during her lifetime, asked for a little food for her daughter's son, her request caused an uproar; after her death, however, an enormous feast is organised in accordance with the popular belief that the soul should gain ‘paith’, or admission, to heaven. Sarwan Babu's arrangements and the arguments they provoke are intertwined with the neglect Kaniya Kaki suffered while alive, family relationships, expectations of inheritance and lineage, dreams of education and future life, the public crowd and the sequence of meals. The title does not primarily mean entry into the place of feasting; it expresses the desire for religious acceptance of the dead soul into heaven. Its irony emerges from the contrast between an ignored appeal to satisfy the hunger of the living and extravagant expenditure in the name of the dead. This study examines narrative construction, dialogue, satire, women's perspectives, caste and class relations, the symbolism of food and ethical unease. It also offers a comparison of genres using materials on infant folklore, children's folktales, illustrated stories and modern children's novels available through Videha. The aim is not to declare this long story a work of children's literature, but to establish the differences in implied readership, narrative language and modes of representing social reality.

Introduction: Feasts after Death in Mithila and Responsibility towards the Living

In the rural world of Maithili fiction, the veranda, courtyard, pond, pathway, field, market and communal feast are not merely geographical or cultural locations; they make visible the rules, hierarchies, distances and conflicts of society. ‘Paith’ gives this familiar experience an unusual narrative scope. The feast associated with the popular religious hope that a departed soul will gain admission to heaven becomes a communal undertaking. Behind this spectacle lies a modest request Kaniya Kaki made while still alive—food for her daughter's son. The memory of the uproar caused by that request renders the grand funeral feast ethically unsettling. The village darkness, pathways, movement of people and assembled community give visible form to this inversion.

To treat ‘Paith’ merely as a report on food scarcity or as a one-dimensional indictment of the caste system would diminish its many voices. Its central satire is not directed against religious ritual itself, but against the forgetting of obligations to a person neglected in life while displaying generosity after her death. The writer moves between scenes of feasting and family memories, public postures and private distress, ludicrous conduct and compassionate moments. The result is not a tale with one identifiable villain but a record of the fractured moral consciousness of communal life. The question arises: why could a society so eager to obtain heavenly admission for a departed soul not respond with ordinary humanity to the simple request of Kaniya Kaki while she lived?

The Title ‘Paith’: The Soul's Admission to Heaven and Ethical Irony

In this story, ‘paith’ does not refer to joining a row of diners at the feast; it denotes the popular religious idea that the soul, after death, should find a place or acceptance in heaven. When Kaniya Kaki was alive, she requested a little food for her daughter's son; even this small need provoked an uproar within the family and community. After her death, an immense feast was arranged in the belief that she should obtain ‘paith’ in heaven. These two scenes constitute the heart of the title: severity towards the modest hunger of the living and a spectacular abundance of food in the interests of the dead person's afterlife. In this sense, though ‘paith’ names a religious purpose, it also becomes a measure of the distance between actual service to human beings and the prestige attached to ritual.

The title's satirical force lies in the question of why it was so difficult to give food to Kaniya Kaki's daughter's son during her lifetime, when elaborate arrangements for a feast became possible after her death in the hope of assuring her soul a place in heaven. Religious belief retains its place within the narrative; criticism is directed at conduct that incurs expense for welfare in the afterlife but makes a little hunger among the living a cause for uproar. The dining rows, rice, crowd and social status provide visible means of expressing this central contradiction; they do not supply the primary meaning of the title.

A Social Map of the Narrative World

One axis of the narrative is Sarwan Babu's organisation of the feast after death and the public community surrounding it. Arrangements for food, invitations, cooking hearths and kitchens, workers, prominent local figures and communal expectations depend upon one another. The second axis is the neglect Kaniya Kaki experienced in life: the uproar following her request for a little food for her daughter's son, relationships among sons, daughters-in-law and other family members, Gunja, prestige and the absence of affection. Between these axes the distance opens up between the wish for the dead soul's admission to heaven and duty towards a living member of the family. Here the public feast and the private family are not separate realms; they are two manifestations of the moral values of the same society.

Through the differences of opinion among Raghav, helpers, contractors, organisers and other characters, the narrative at various points presents the rural community in the plural. The writer does not depend solely upon a single character to pronounce an authorial verdict. People sometimes argue, sometimes speculate, sometimes fear, and at other times remain indifferent to another's suffering. The crowd is not an inert background but an active character in the story.

Reading the Narrative: The Opening Collective Scene

The configuration of the opening scenes brings together darkness, movement along the road, village discussion, anticipation of the feast and activity on the veranda. Although the scene appears momentarily still, people's conversations and occupations keep it in motion. Rather than disclose the principal event immediately and completely, the writer raises the social temperature. Through this technique, readers do not simply receive news; they experience a situation taking shape within its surroundings. First comes the village, then the feast, and then the dispositions dependent upon the feast.

In this passage the feast after death resembles a ‘social experiment’: everyone assembles in the name of fulfilling a collective religious obligation, but no one sees it in exactly the same way. In the very place where a ritual is performed for the welfare of a departed soul, rank, prestige and pride find expression. The narrator does not insert an extended theory to explain the complexity of social relations; the conversation of one person, the response of another and the preparations of a third gradually construct the social order. The memory of the dispute over a modest request made during Kaniya Kaki's lifetime calls into question the brilliance of this collective rite.

Reading the Narrative: The Feast Crowd and the Irony of Valour

By this point, the crowd is no longer merely a matter of numbers; it becomes a measure by which conduct is judged. The distance increases between a feast arranged to secure the soul's admission to heaven and the demands of public decorum. Those who speak of civilisation, religion, tradition and hospitality find their patience and restraint imperilled by questions about the rows of diners. The discrepancy between the language of ‘valour’ and actual behaviour at the feast produces satire. True courage ought to mean standing with the helpless while they are alive; here the grand provision for the next world stands in stark opposition to the uproar caused by an ordinary appeal for food.

It would be mistaken to dismiss this episode as mere exaggeration. Within collective consumption, the writer reveals a conflict between the sense of entitlement and the experience of humiliation. Food served at the funeral feast becomes a display of ritual obligation; in Kaniya Kaki's request during her lifetime, the same food was simply a means of satisfying her daughter's son's hunger. Who sits first, who receives a welcome, who is accommodated and who must wait—these are all social and political questions. The writer places all four levels within the compass of satire.

Reading the Narrative: Fire, Water, Iron, Stone and Collective Confusion

Here the intensity of the setting increases. The road, railway tracks, frantic movement, apprehension and spreading news become intertwined. The arrangement of scenes sustains uncertainty about what will happen next. At such moments, people's social masks fall away: one is concerned with survival, another pursues each new report, while a third tries to understand the event in relation to home and family. The crisis ceases to be purely individual and becomes a test of collective consciousness.

The narrator maintains a distance between an event and the news of it. What people hear may not be the complete truth, yet the effects of the report are real. At this point satire collides with compassion. When a community that makes a commotion over the slightest disruption to ritual panics in the face of insecurity, the story asks: how will society protect its collective judgment? This section matters not merely because it creates excitement but because it exposes the fragility of communal relationships.

Reading the Narrative: Kaniya Kaki's Request, Neglect and the Generational Divide

The story shifts its centre through memories of Kaniya Kaki's life. It moves from the collective spectacle of the feast after death into the realm of private tenderness, family obligations and frustrated aspirations. The uproar provoked by her wish to obtain a little food for her daughter's son reveals the true face of the family's system of values. Her suffering is consequently not merely a sentimental episode; it is the ethical centre of the plot. Why could a society capable of holding an elaborate feast to secure the soul's admission to heaven after death not honour a living woman's modest, affectionate wish? This question echoes throughout the narrative.

Episodes concerning education, hopes for the future, family support and changing generations prevent ‘Paith’ from remaining simply the story of a single day's funeral feast. The present arrangements are accompanied by memories of indignity, affection, deprivation and struggle in her lifetime. The narrative therefore breaks the straight line of time: the scenes of the feast after death repeatedly recall the ignored request of the living woman. The wish for ‘paith’ in the next world and neglect in this world confront each other within one narrative time.

Reading the Narrative: Windows, Aspiration and Psychological Tension

A reading of this episode reveals numerous suggestions of looking through a window, gazing outward from within and interpreting external events through personal suffering. The ‘window’ becomes a boundary between vision and distance. Outside is the commotion of the crowd; inside, an individual explores frustrated desire, the expectation of entitlement and the meaning of relationships. Memories of Kaniya Kaki and the younger generation's concerns about the family meet at this threshold.

The main artistic achievement of this section is that the questions moving through a character's mind do not become definitive pronouncements by the narrator. In some episodes the character argues in defence of a decision; in others, the character is himself or herself surrounded by questions. Such ambiguity strengthens psychological credibility. Yet the narrative may appear to slow for some readers, as prolonged inward reflection moves somewhat away from the public plot. This is both a strength and a risk of the technique.

Reading the Narrative: Gunja, Inheritance and Inequality within the Family

Here the conflicts among Gunja and other family members form another major strand of the narrative's social world. Sons, daughters, daughters-in-law, mothers and others counted as ‘one's own’ do not receive equal emotional importance. Someone who inspires hope for the future may become, within family calculations, an object, an obligation or a cause of dispute. The writer's gaze moves from the feast outside to the ‘division’ within the home.

This episode can be read in connection with the wider pressures of women's lives. A woman's role is commonly defined as an inexhaustible source of affection, someone who fulfils others' expectations and bears the honour of the household; how far her own wishes or exhaustion will be recognised, however, remains uncertain. This contradiction produces the narrative's underlying sorrow. Gunja's story suggests the possibility of hope for a woman's future, but that hope is not itself free of the constraints of patriarchal relations.

Reading the Narrative: From a Request for Food in Life to a Feast after Death

The poignancy of the narrative resides in the strange inequality between the quantity of food and the moment at which it is provided. During her lifetime Kaniya Kaki asked for a little food for her daughter's son, and the request caused an uproar. After her death, however, a huge feast was arranged to secure her soul's ‘paith’ in heaven. Here rice is both a basic necessity of life and a public instrument of ritual observance after death. The grain that could readily have been given to satisfy a living person's hunger is served in abundance by a society seeking acceptance for the dead in the next world. This contradiction is the deep ethical question of the narrative enterprise.

At the close, descriptions of the sickly moonlight, darkness, sounds and rural atmosphere lend gravity to the story's satire. The successive servings of the funeral feast and the people waiting for them form a structure in which the question of duty towards living human beings persists even after the ritual has been completed. Behind the arrangements intended to secure Kaniya

Kaki's heavenly admission, the insult inflicted on her modest request in life continues to resonate. The ending is not a monument to resolution but the residue of an ethical question.

Narrative time thus revolves around two axes: Kaniya Kaki's hunger, affection and neglect during life, and the great feast held after her death in the hope of gaining admission to heaven for her soul. These opposed scenes are not ornamental incidents but a subtle commentary upon society's hierarchy of values. Can the ordinary obligation evaded during a person's lifetime truly be discharged through magnificence after death? The story keeps this question alive in the reader's mind.

The Politics of Feasting: The Dead Soul's Admission and the Neglect of the Living

The feast after death in Mithila is presented in relation to popular religious beliefs, family standing and communal expectations. The stated purpose of the ritual is to secure the departed soul's admission to heaven; yet pressures remain concerning who receives honour, where each person sits, who must wait and who must be invited. The irony of the arrangements in 'Paith' is not merely the inequality of the dining rows, but that Kaniya Kaki's request for a little food for her daughter's son caused uproar while she lived, whereas a vast feast became possible after she died.

The illusion that communal consumption automatically constitutes compassionate solidarity breaks down here. The resources devoted to a great feast attest to ritual enthusiasm; justice and sensitivity towards living human beings require a different measure. The narrative is not a treatise that proves or disproves the validity of religious belief. Instead, it asks why a community so active in seeking heavenly admission for a departed soul was intolerant of her modest wish in life. From this perspective, whose words were heard, whose needs recognised and whose suffering overlooked become the actual concerns of the story's examination of power in its subtle forms.

Women's Perspectives: Kaniya Kaki's Neglect in Life and Honour after Death

At the public level, the voices of male characters and the language of organisation, controversy and authority are heard more often. Yet the depth of private suffering emerges through Kaniya Kaki. The uproar over her affectionate request for food during her lifetime shows how readily a woman's wishes may be rejected within the home. The magnificent feast arranged after her death for the sake of her soul's admission to heaven stands as the inverse of this neglect. The absence of justice inside the household is not an occurrence separate from the public ritual: both reveal the same social order of values.

Kaniya Kaki's experience is the measure of the story's humane conscience. When the prestige of the event, its abundant food and the noise of the crowd are compared with the treatment she received while alive, the hierarchy of values changes. Making elaborate arrangements for a departed soul's admission to heaven may be part of communal religious belief, but creating an uproar over a living woman's modest request is a failure of human obligation. In this irony, the woman's suffering becomes a silent protest against the spectacle.

A critical limitation must also be acknowledged. To deepen the reader's sympathy, the narrative repeatedly invokes motherhood and sacrifice; the question therefore remains how directly an independent voice of women's rights is articulated. The story's moral awareness places women's suffering at the centre, but the full extent of their power to make decisions is not equally clear everywhere. Recognising this limitation prevents criticism from becoming unqualified praise.

Language, Dialogue and the Narrative Art of Satire

'Paith' is rich in dialogue. Speech rhythms, exchanges of questions and answers, apprehension, urgency, the repetition of another's words and contrasting responses to the same matter all create the narrative movement. Rather than offer a standardised exposition, the writer unfolds the action through numerous popular voices. Preparations for the feast consequently resemble at different moments a public meeting, a domestic quarrel or a crossroads where rumours spread. The pressure of authentic rural experience within the language strengthens the work's credibility.

A distinctive stylistic feature is the swift alternation between satire and compassion. An episode that first makes the reader laugh becomes unsettling upon closer examination. The writer casts an oblique eye upon crowds, declarations, valour, discipline, fear and needless concern for prestige. Yet the target of satire is neither the hungry human being nor the reverence attached to funeral observances; it is the inversion of values whereby Kaniya Kaki's simple request for food while alive became a dispute, while a grand feast for her heavenly admission after death was considered a social duty.

There are also risks in the technique. The continuous sequence of many dialogues and rapid shifts from one episode to another can make it difficult for a new reader to identify the characters and their situations. At some points extended psychological analysis adopts a tempo different from the swift progress of public events. But such unevenness of rhythm cannot be regarded as an unqualified fault, for the story itself is composed of unequal social times: the crowd demands an immediate decision, while the wounded mind wanders through prolonged memories.

The Presence of Images: A Parallel Visual Language with the Reader

The original narrative passages contain many black-and-white illustrations. Decorative frames, eyes, women's faces, animal figures, elephants and the rhythmic configurations of folk imagery create an aesthetic level independent of the story. The recurring image of the eye, in particular, may be read in relation to the problems of looking, being seen and failing to see even while looking. The densely filled forms of folk art create a visual parallel to the crowd and intricate relationships of the narrative.

It would be mistaken to treat the illustrations as realistic replicas of every narrative scene. They are primarily suggestive. The prose unfolds the contradictions of social relations in words, while the lines of the drawings bring symbolic density. In a children's book, illustrations may facilitate comprehension of the story; in 'Paith' they chiefly produce layers of meaning and atmosphere. Their different function means that the mere presence of illustrations does not turn 'Paith' into children's literature.

The History of Maithili Children's Literature in the Light of Available Videha Materials

To regard modern published picture stories as the beginning of Maithili children's literature would be to read its history incompletely. In 'Maithili Shishu Lok Sahitya', published by Phoolchandra Jha 'Praveen' in Videha, issue 50 (2010), the forms of folk expression associated with child-rearing, games and the acquisition of knowledge receive extended treatment. The article stresses the importance of household and courtyard, folk songs, lullabies, oral traditions of play and linguistic memory transmitted across generations. This material makes clear that the history of children's literature is not simply a list of authors and publication dates; it is also a study of the transition from oral tradition to the printed book.

Dr Yoganand Jha's 'Maithili Ballokkatha: Sthiti aa Apeksha' [Maithili Children's Folktales: Present Condition and Expectations], in Videha, issue 76 (2011), focuses on the collection of folktales, the needs of the child's mind, the accessibility of narrative language and the importance of compilation. Jha mentions the first edition (1983) and expanded edition (2006) of Ramlochan Thakur's 'Maithili Lokkatha' and raises the issue of preserving the language of oral storytelling. He considers Preeti Thakur's illustrated stories a bridge between folktales and a new readership. From this perspective, the development of writing for children can be understood as an interrelated process of orality, collection, rewriting, illustration and criticism.

Videha's catalogue of children's literature lists Preeti Thakur's original works 'Gonu Jha aa Aan Maithili Chitrakatha' (2008), 'Maithili Chitrakatha' (2009), 'Mithilak Lokdevata' (2010) and 'Vidyapatik Purush Pariksha' (2012), alongside numerous translated books for children. This offers a glimpse of renewed publishing initiatives linking pictures, folk narratives and young readers from the first part of the 2000s onward. Durganand Mandal's 'Nena Lel Sundar Chitrakatha' (Videha, issue 116, 2012) reviews these efforts in illustrated storytelling.

From a newer perspective, Gajendra Thakur's 'Maithili Bal-Upanyasak Samikshashastra', published in Videha, issue 447 (1 August 2026), discusses criteria for assessing different kinds of children's novels, narratives of folk heroes, instructional stories and modern imaginative writing. Rather than restrict the criticism of children's literature to 'moral instruction', it extends critical criteria to readers' age, narration, cultural representation and aesthetic considerations. A fuller account of this history needs to bring together older folk traditions, collections of the 1980s, picture books of 2008–2012 and the modern critical framework.

This chronology is not intended as a definitive history of all Maithili children's literature. It presents a comparative view based on selected Videha sources examined here. Claims about the first publication of other books or the literary precedence of particular authors would require a broader library catalogue; this essay makes no such unverified claims.

'Paith' and Stories for Children: A Shared Cultural World, Different Implied Readers

The similarities between 'Paith' and Maithili children's folktales are first found in language and setting: the village, family, everyday speech, food, memory, livelihood and mutual dependence. Children's stories also draw their material from these elements. Their narrative purposes, however, differ. In children's folktales, a concise plot, visual clarity, curiosity, repetition and an emotional organisation appropriate to the reader's age are often important. 'Paith', by contrast, privileges multilayered social irony, slow introspection, tense accusations, burdensome relationships and an open ethical conclusion. It would therefore be inappropriate to call the work suitable for children without adaptation.

The symbolism of food offers an especially revealing comparison. In infant folk songs, milk and rice, flattened rice, sohari bread and other foods are frequently associated with affection, nurture and the celebration of life. In 'Paith', a little grain requested for a daughter's son becomes a cause of family controversy, while an abundant feast becomes possible for the dead soul's admission to heaven. The same cultural object acquires different meanings in different contexts: for a child, food is an immediate necessity of affection and care; at the feast after death, it is a sign of ritual prestige. Literary criticism reveals the ethical difference between these two meanings.

A comparison of the illustrations is equally instructive. According to Durganand Mandal's review, picture stories for children help them recognise folk traditions and grasp the meaning of stories. The illustrations in 'Paith' do not offer only such simple visual cues; they create symbolic responses to the complex emotional terrain of the prose. The comparison shows that a work's suitability for children cannot be judged solely by the presence or absence of pictures. Plot, linguistic density, the representation of social violence and the reader's interpretive capacity must all be considered.

The Work's Achievements and Critical Limitations

The first achievement of 'Paith' is that it turns a feast intended to secure a dead soul's admission to heaven into a miniature model of society's system of values. The second is the sharp opposition between the uproar over Kaki's modest request for food while alive and the splendour of the arrangements after her death. The third is the movement between collective scenes and private distress, through which the characters' experiences become historical and emotional rather than merely eventful. The fourth is its capacity to raise ethical questions through satire without immediately preaching. The fifth is the vitality of the vernacular and the symbolic presence of illustrations. The open ending prompts readers to examine themselves.

These achievements do not remove critical questions. Because the narrative contains many voices, separating the narrator's perspective from the opinions of characters can at times demand considerable effort; some dialogue places a heavy burden on the reader's attention. Although women's suffering is depicted powerfully, the scope of their active self-determination may remain comparatively limited. The indications of social class and caste are sharp, yet the distinct psychological situation of every character is not developed to the same degree. The transition from the speed of the opening crowd scenes to the family memories of the middle passages may also prove effective or difficult in different ways for different readers.

A weak interpretation of the story's final ethical tension would be to say that 'everyone is bad'. The writer does not construct such a universal condemnation. The community also contains the possibilities of cooperation, kindness, familial hope and intimacy; the crisis is that the structures of social standing continually diminish those possibilities. Preserving this subtle opposition is essential to an adequate reading of the story.

Conclusion: Admission to the Next World and Unfulfilled Duties in This One

The power of 'Paith' as a long story lies in its transformation of the religious idea of a dead soul's admission to heaven into a test of ethical responsibility towards the living. Kaniya Kaki asked for a little food for her daughter's son while she was alive, but the request provoked an uproar; after her death, a large feast was arranged for her soul's admission to heaven. The opposition between these events gives the title its poignant meaning. As readers observe the rows of diners, they begin to perceive the ranks assigned to human worth. Sarwan Babu's arrangements form the centre of the public spectacle, while Kaniya Kaki's experience of life becomes its ethical counterpoint.

The darkness, arrangements for the feast, crowds, anxieties, family grief, the need for a little food in life and the arrangements for admission to heaven after death unite two times in the narrative and resist a simplistic romanticisation of rural Maithili life. The village is a place of beautiful memories, but it is also a social order full of contradictions. The writer's satire reveals this double truth at once: the public declaration of reverence and the absence of sensitivity towards the living.

The comparative history of children's literature further clarifies this conclusion. The same folk culture offers children lullabies, curiosity and illustrated stories, and offers adult readers satire, contradiction and critical self-examination. The distinctiveness of ‘Paith’ resides in the latter kind of reading experience. The distance between food requested for a daughter's son during a woman's lifetime and the feast held after her death for heavenly admission becomes, more than a question of religious observance, a question of justice towards living human beings.

PART II

The Blank Pages of a Diary

Educational Institutions, Power, Self-Writing and Moral Discernment

Inside the Work

Kumar Pawan's ‘The Blank Pages of a Diary’ is a long story in which the desire to write about oneself continually clashes with the pressures of public institutional life. At its centre stands a college principal, a man oscillating among administrative achievement, the desire for prestige, political connections, fear, disillusionment and introspection. The story begins with the habit of keeping a diary, but develops into an intricate account of college construction, teachers' appointments, examinations, student politics, interventions by influential local figures, and public allegations and counter-allegations. The blank page is not simply an image of an inability to write; it represents a crisis of self-testimony for a person entangled in power. This study examines the sequence of narrative episodes, character conception, modes of narration, satire, linguistic devices and the arrangement of illustrations. The history of children's literature is discussed with due regard for the limits of comparison: the work is not a children's story, but it enters into a useful dialogue with writing for children on the ethics of educational institutions, student agency and illustrated storytelling.

Introduction: The Double Meaning of Emptiness

A diary is generally taken to be an orderly record of private experience. Its pages are expected to bear witness to an individual's time: what was seen, which decisions were made, what mistakes occurred and what a person concealed in the mind. Kumar Pawan reverses this familiar assumption. His protagonist believes in the prestige of writing, but the social and administrative complications of the very life that supplies him with material for writing continually prevent him from doing so. The emptiness of the title is therefore not confined to paper; it is also an absence of self-knowledge, moral steadiness and an honest record.

At the beginning, the work identifies its genre as a ‘long story’. This designation matters because its arrival of characters, changing circumstances and widening struggles for power extend beyond the single event of a short story, without constructing the autonomous and expansive world of a novel. Its repetitive, question-filled and dialogue-rich prose sets the principal's mental turmoil alongside institutional disorder.

The central proposition of this critical reading is that the story confronts two contradictory desires in the individual: the wish to record one's life meaningfully and the impulse to evade its uncomfortable truths in order to protect one's public image. The literary effect arises from this opposition. Moral instruction does not become the author's declared conclusion; it emerges indirectly from the character's experience.

The Development of the Story: Principal Episodes

The Diary Habit and the Dream of Personal Distinction

The narrative begins by introducing the practice of diary writing. The private writings of a high-school teacher, the desire to see one's life one day transformed into an important book, and the social recognition accorded to writing are joined from the outset. The diary is both a companion in solitude and an instrument for becoming worthy of future readers. With the principal's appearance, literary ambition becomes bound to the desire for social advancement.

Construction, Prestige and the Obstruction of Writing

The principal's routine becomes increasingly occupied with the expansion of college buildings, groups of students, local contacts and administrative projects. The absence of time is not simply physical busyness; the prestige associated with his work becomes more attractive than private record-keeping. The principal promises to record the day's experiences, but his self-testimony fails to take shape on paper. From this point, the problem of blank pages becomes a problem of character.

Ambition, Calculation and Cracks in Self-Confidence

The conflict between public recognition and private hesitation grows sharper. The principal sees opportunities in his relationships with the institution, university, students and influential people. The recurring intrusion of apprehensions, comparisons, conjectures and questions into the narrative exposes his internal instability. Speculation about his future becomes more important than reasoned decisions.

Proof of Authority and the Fear of Humiliation

Protecting prestige becomes directly connected with administrative authority. The principal fears that others will not accord him the elevated status he assigns to himself. The need for external validation grows stronger than the autonomy of his personality. Here the story's humour assumes a compassionate significance: even after acquiring power, a person may remain inwardly insecure.

An Encounter with an Influential Figure and the Test of Self-Restraint

The principal's closeness to centres of political and social influence changes the story's tone. A relationship with someone such as Brindavan Babu offers not only opportunities but also occasions on which fidelity to values is tested. The principal's responses reveal contradictions among affection, fear, risk and self-interest. The illustrations provide a satirical visual parallel to the emotional condition of this episode.

Wandering in Search of Causes

Anxiety to understand the relation between cause and effect takes the principal from personal ethical questions into social and philosophical debate. Reflections on religion, politics, revolution and educational life intermingle. Because superficial knowledge offers no reliable remedy, the search continually returns in the form of questions. At this point the long story stands at the crossroads of introspection and intellectual satire.

Usha Ji and a Moment of New Possibility

Usha Ji's presence in the university environment momentarily draws the principal's attention away from his defensive posture. He is inspired to reconsider his conduct, intellectual pursuits and social relationships. Yet this experience does not demonstrate any permanent moral transformation; the story retains it as a possibility. The female character suggests a new point of view, although her own autonomous life is not developed at sufficient length.

Public Morality and Private Insecurity

Religious scenes, social identities, campus activities and the distribution of pamphlets again challenge the principal's assurances. Popular religiosity, prestige and the fear of condemnation converge. His reactions make it clear that he first sees a crisis as a threat to his honour and only later as a matter of institutional truth. The illustrations accompanying this episode provide emblematic expressions of solitude and uncertainty.

The College, Rumour and the Politics of Accusation

Alongside the principal's plans for the campus comes a provocative incident in which public morality becomes an instrument of propaganda against the institution. The distance between rumour, suggestion, material evidence and accusation is deliberately blurred. The literary significance of the episode lies not in sensationalism but in the fact that suspicion begins to determine an institution's reputation before any verification of facts.

Examination Procedures, Appointments and the Traffic in Influence

Within the college, a network emerges connecting examinations, assessment, offices, promotions and resources of patronage. Dominant local figures such as Balli Babu influence internal institutional decisions. A pronounced tension appears between the formal procedures of educational administration and personal favours. The story does not merely denounce corrupt individuals; it demonstrates how institutions come to speak the language of private bargains.

The Changing Calculus of Political Patronage

Changes in factions, elections and patronage weaken the principal's earlier safeguards. A connection that proved beneficial yesterday may become a source of insecurity today. In this uncertainty, the conflict between his self-respect and his fear intensifies. Power is not a stable protector but a name for shifting equations: this is what emerges from the sequence of incidents.

Pressure, Compromise and the Return of Fear

Questions of examinations and institutional autonomy sharpen conflicts among teachers, officials and local centres of influence. At times the principal speaks in the language of unequivocal opposition; at others, he is disturbed by the possibility of punishment. These oscillations prevent him from becoming an unchanging hero, revealing both human weakness and moral courage.

Student Agitation and the Disintegration of Public Image

Student groups, slogans, chaos on campus and outside involvement turn the administration of the college into a theatrical public stage. The voices raised against the principal do not all have the same meaning: some are forms of resistance, some opportunism, and some rumour. The story asks on what basis reality can be judged when every side seeks to shape its own public image. The caricatures visually confirm the trembling foundations of status and authority.

The Final Attempt at Self-Defence and the Return of the Blank Pages

Plans to manage the crisis, student politics, anxiety about prestige and the recurring question of self-writing come together in this episode. The story provides no easy resolution; it leaves readers facing the incompleteness of the principal's self-examination. The diary returns to the narrative foreground, but the pressures of the passing days may still prevent its pages from being filled. The title is no longer a mere synopsis of events: it has become an ethical metaphor for the story as a whole.

Plot Construction: From a Private Diary to the Story of a Public Institution

At first sight, the narrative resembles an account of the fluctuations of one person's state of mind; closer attention reveals the collective autobiography of an institution. What begins as the writer's solitude is gradually entered by students, teachers, administrators, political workers, local notables, the influence of journalism and anxieties about home and family. The central position of the principal's consciousness holds the narrative's expansion together, but the entire world does not remain under his control. Its movement derives from this contradiction.

A significant feature of the sequence of events is that no problem is ever completely resolved. Building construction is a social achievement but also invites political claims; political contacts enhance prestige while producing dependence; formal systems of examinations and appointments leave openings for personal interference; student activism can serve as resistance but also as a vehicle for other pressures. Thus the narrative substitutes continuous replacement for any lasting victory.

The story advances its central subject through numerous subplots, but they do not all stand at the same distance from the question of the diary. Some administrative details occupy comparatively extensive space while the symbol of self-writing recedes. This is a formal limitation, because readers must reactivate the principal metaphor for themselves. Yet the advantage of this range is that the crisis of a self-absorbed individual ultimately appears as a structural crisis of an educational institution.

The Principal's Character: An Autonomous Individual or a Prisoner of Prestige?

The principal is the narrative's central character, but not a spotless hero in the traditional sense. Administrative competence, practical shrewdness, dreams of advancement, self-interest, fear for reputation, philosophical curiosity and moral hesitation are all present within him. At times he seems eager to change the system; at others, he benefits from it. This duality makes both criticism and sympathy possible.

The principal's inner world is governed largely by possible crises in the future. He fears not only actual events but also their potential consequences for his reputation. Continually seeking evidence of one's worth from other people, offices, patrons, institutional announcements and public approval creates dependence. The story thus exposes the contradiction between the social capital of prestige and self-respect.

His moments of self-transformation are genuine but fleeting. Whether through his contact with Usha Ji or thoughts of rising above self-interest, a new path briefly seems possible, only to be covered over by familiar equations of power. The writer therefore does not produce a tale of the hero's redemption but one of incomplete capacity for change. This incompleteness lends the ending ethical credibility.

Supporting Characters and the Many Faces of Power

The teacher character and the initial wish to keep a diary plant the seeds of a writerly perspective within the narrative. Their role is not simply to provide information, but to set the principal's administrative success against the need to write about personal experience. Writing and office both aspire to become vehicles of prestige, but they are subject to different ethical standards. The written record compels a confrontation with facts; the exercise of office permits convenient forgetting.

Influential figures such as Brindavan Babu and Balli Babu reveal two different manifestations of power. On the one hand are connections, proximity, discussion and symbolic recognition of standing; on the other is the practical world of office, elections, intervention, patronage and direct pressure. The principal sees both as useful to him and potentially directed against him. These characters do not remain merely portraits of wicked individuals; they become instruments for understanding institutional dependence.

Students repeatedly appear as groups. Their movements may raise genuine questions, but there is also the possibility of their being used by external political forces. It would be mistaken to interpret this ambiguity as a straightforwardly anti-student position. Rather, the story asks how the independent voice of students is to be distinguished from the voices of representatives acting in their name. The narrative thus approaches the difficult subject of democracy within the university.

Usha Ji's appearance suggests the possibility of an alternative dialogue between women's intellectual presence in an institution and its male-dominated networks of power. Her own intellectual development, professional difficulties and independent decisions, however, receive limited elaboration. Consequently, the story illuminates the principal's transformation through her more than it illuminates her own self-directed life. Explicit recognition of this limitation forms part of a fair assessment of the work.

The Narrator, Language and the Movement of Satire

The narration of this long story continually moves between external description and the character's inward stream of thought. The narrator reports an incident and immediately enters the character's conjectures, apprehensions, sense of humiliation or self-justification. This allows readers both proximity to and distance from the principal's mind: they can accompany him while also recognising his self-deception. Satire here arises less through direct attacks upon a person than through the gap between his perspective and the actual situation.

Fragmented sentences, prolonged sequences of pauses, recurrent questions and the rhythm of self-correction are important linguistic features. Before one thought is completed, another anxiety intervenes. These broken and rejoined sentences express the principal's uncertainty. The reader's initial amusement later becomes unease, for what first appeared as a man's restless manner comes to signify his inner insecurity.

The prose occasionally enters the realm of conceptual discussion. Questions of religion, politics, teaching and social assumptions jostle with the principal's private concerns. The result is double-edged: conceptual richness on one side and an uneven tautness of narration on the other. Particularly when the story offers more sentences of argument than the enactment of events, the reader's progress may slow. Yet this looseness cannot be condemned without examination: it also arises from the character's overcrowded mental life.

Three Principal Symbols: The Diary, the College and the Caricatures

The diary changes its meaning between the opening and closing images. Initially, it embodies the dream of a document that will secure future fame. In the middle it witnesses the lack of time and the postponement of decisions. At the end it becomes a metaphor for the individual's inability to acknowledge himself, despite the accumulation of factual events. The man who supervises the public accounts of an educational community cannot produce a trustworthy account of his own inner life. Herein lies the depth of the title's irony.

The college is expected to embody the ideals of education and independent thought. In the story, its expanding buildings signify progress, but various pressures quietly grow alongside them. This contrast suggests that physical construction and the ethical development of an institution are not synonymous. The issues of examinations, appointments, status and students' rights combine to make the college a map of power in the local community.

In the line-drawn caricatures published alongside the story, crown-like shapes, distorted faces and suggestive outlines of bodies do not reproduce events literally. They are visual signs of the desire for power and of awkward incongruity. Their contribution is to make readers view the principal's social office from a humorous distance. A comparison with illustrated children's stories is possible, but the functions differ: in a children's picture story, comprehension and recall may be primary; here satire and institutional criticism are the dominant purposes.

Educational Institutions and Politics: The Story's Social Critique

In the story's educational world, formal rules and actual decision-making power appear to operate separately. University offices, governing committees, teaching posts, examinations, assessment and campus voices all claim authority in determining procedures; political patronage, personal recommendations and fear nevertheless bend these very procedures. The writer presents this tension not in the language of an administrative report but through an individual's state of mind. Problems centred in power thereby become problems of private human instability as well.

The moral hesitation of an educated person is particularly significant in this story. On numerous occasions the principal knows what would be just for the institution, yet at the moment of decision he wavers over his future, his name and his employment. Without understanding this human weakness, the social critique remains incomplete. The real object of the writer's satire is not merely corruption but the mental strategies through which an educated person legitimises compromise by declaring it inevitable.

Student activism constitutes an important counterforce. Their presence prevents the college from remaining the principal's private possession and makes it a shared institution in which the right to raise questions is contested. Yet the narrative devotes comparatively little attention to the internal diversity of student movements. A fuller development of students' distinct individual voices could have given the critique of institutions a greater multiplicity of perspectives.

A Comparative Dialogue with the History of Maithili Children's Literature

Clarifying the Difference of Genre

To call ‘The Blank Pages of a Diary’ a children's story or children's novel would mislead readers about its intended audience. The original publication identifies it as a long story, and its major concerns are university administration, political factionalism, an adult's self-deception, the pressures of office and complex social satire. It is not organised around children's ages, linguistic receptivity or the accessible adaptations characteristic of folktales. Accordingly, the comparison with children's literature is not a competition between two works of the same genre; it is a comparison between different arrangements of readership within one language.

Oral Tradition and the Foundations of Children's Literature

In issue 50 of Videha, Phoolchandra Jha ‘Praveen’ discusses the oral traditions of Maithili infant folklore, upbringing, play and amusement, and forms that transmit knowledge. This historical perspective makes clear that the principal current of children's literature is not confined to published didactic tales but is connected with the sounds of home and courtyard, games and collective memory. Kumar Pawan's work is not written as a direct heir to this sonic world of childhood folklore; it centres upon modern educational institutions and the crisis of adult judgment. Nevertheless, both are indirectly connected by the question of how society transmits its values to the next generation. (Phoolchandra Jha ‘Praveen’, 2010)

The Simplicity of Children's Folktales and the Complexities of Adult Satire

Dr Yoganand Jha emphasises the linguistic simplicity, short sentences, curiosity, oral narrative manner, accessible characterisation and generally clear outcomes of children's folktales; he also distinguishes long from short folktales. Judged by these criteria, Kumar Pawan's story takes the opposite direction. Here uncertainty outlasts resolution, the ethical meaning is not exhausted by a single reading, and the principal's mental entanglement is the work's strength. Length alone, therefore, does not define a long story for children: narrative purpose and the reader's cognitive involvement are also decisive. (Yoganand Jha, 2011)

The History of Picture Stories and the Work's Visual Humour

In discussing Preeti Thakur's contribution to Maithili illustrated stories for children, Durganand Mandal emphasises the visual recovery of folktales, the ingenuity of Gonu Jha and folk heroes. Against this background, the caricatures published with Kumar Pawan's story reveal another branch of the reading experience. Illustrations in children's picture stories may make the narrative sequence visually accessible; here they become pointed signals of authorial satire. This does not mean that the work becomes children's literature because it contains pictures; rather, the comparison provides an opportunity to understand the social functions of images. (Durganand Mandal, 2012; original story, pp. 21, 24, 29–30)

Children's Theatre and Institutional Resistance

Ramesh Ranjan's Videha essay on children's drama is a useful reference for discussions of young readers' active participation and dramatic structure. In Kumar Pawan's long story, student agitation, dialogue, entrances and exits, and public allegations produce a dramatic effect, but the organisation of these scenes does not follow the readily comprehensible justice of children's theatre. Even resistance becomes ambiguous through propaganda and the calculations of power. For adult readers, such ambiguity creates an opportunity for critical reflection; younger children might need help interpreting the episodes. (Ramesh Ranjan, 2013; original story)

Contemporary Criticism of Children's Novels and Reader Agency

'Maithili Bal-Upanyasak Samikshashastra', published in Videha, discusses critical criteria such as child characters' agency, the rewriting of folktales, illustration and language, ethical appropriateness and the reader's age. Using this critical framework further clarifies the generic limits of 'The Blank Pages of a Diary'. The story is centred upon the adult principal's consciousness. Characters associated with students challenge it, but the students themselves do not become its main focalisers. Instead of a child-oriented narrative, we encounter a critique of adult failures within an institution centred upon young people. (Gajendra Thakur, 2026)

Potential Uses for Adolescent Readers

In guided reading discussions with older adolescents, the story could raise issues of institutional accountability, the investigation of rumours, examination integrity, student autonomy and freedom of expression. Such educational uses, however, do not establish the work as children's literature. Being useful in an educational context and being written for children are separate categories, a distinction literary history must preserve.

Major Achievements and Critical Limitations

The work's first achievement is its exposure of the ironies of social structure through personal instability. The college principal's dilemmas might have provided material for light comedy, but the writer connects them to institutional relations of power. Its second achievement is the metaphor of self-writing: if every event of life deserves recording yet the page remains empty, the question concerns not merely a lack of time but the capacity to acknowledge truth. Its third is the vivid presentation of hesitation through dialogue, conjecture, self-questioning and interrupted internal sentences.

The story's limitations lie partly in its breadth. The density of episodes involving administration, office, politics and student conflict sometimes draws readers away from the central metaphor of the diary. The principal is so dominant in the characterisation that students' and female characters' independent perspectives receive limited development. Various political figures occasionally remain representative types; the conflict would have acquired further dimensions had their individual social and historical complexities been explored more fully.

Even so, the author takes the risk of portraying his principal neither as a thoroughgoing villain nor as an exemplary reformer. The uncertainty of the ending does not release the reader from the social questions raised. Literary achievement cannot be measured only by narrative discipline: when a work withholds the comfort of an easy moral judgment, that very discomfort can become its critical strength.

Conclusion: From the Impossibility of Writing to the Question of Self-Testimony

Kumar Pawan's 'The Blank Pages of a Diary' may be regarded as an important example of a tendency within the Maithili long story to express criticism of institutional reality through the perplexities of the human mind. In an effort to establish his credibility, the principal repeatedly turns to the institution, his office, personal connections, electoral alignments and social respect. Yet when he must offer concrete testimony about his own life, his confidence in words begins to falter. The final emptiness is not a flat declaration of defeat but an open question about a consciousness caught in society's arrangements of power.

In the history of Maithili literature, it is more appropriate to place the work among adult tales of social satire concerning educational institutions than to present it as an example of children's literature. Comparative study of children's literature provides criteria for establishing its location: suitability for children, children's agency, narrative accessibility, visual language and the form of ethical judgment all distinguish it. Precisely because of these differences, the work has the capacity to generate serious dialogue among teachers, readers, students and literary critics about responsibility, power and authorial truth.

PART III

The Plunder of Gold Coins and a Mark on Charcoal

The Proverb, Social Prestige and Narrative Satire

Inside the Work

Kumar Pawan's 'The Plunder of Gold Coins and a Mark on Charcoal' is a narrative satire that uses the search for the meaning of an ordinary proverb to expose contradictions among meaning, value, prestige and success in modern Maithili society. In the extended episodes of this work, published in Sankalp, a first-person narrator addresses readers directly, converses with Bhuvan Kaka, pursues his fantasies and aspirations, and encounters different forms of institutional prestige. The inversion of value between the 'gold coin' and 'charcoal' is not confined to a single fixed explanation throughout the tale; it takes on fresh significance in each new situation. This essay presents separate close readings of all eight narrative episodes and examines the narrator's self-satire, dialogic method, subject and technique, the ironies of educational institutions, moral uncertainty and the open ending. It also considers the work's historical position in comparison with Harimohan Jha's tradition of humour and satire and later Maithili satirical writing. The conclusion is that the work transforms the accessible humour of everyday speech into a critical investigation of intellectual and social prestige, although its expansive episodic structure and locally specific allusions also require readers to participate actively in making meaning.

Introduction: Entering the Story through a Proverb

A popular saying is distinctive because it condenses the density of social experience into a brief phrase. When such a saying becomes the title of a narrative, its meaning no longer resides solely in a dictionary definition; the story tests what it implies. Kumar Pawan's 'The Plunder of Gold Coins and a Mark on Charcoal' makes this process its narrative foundation. The unequal worth of a gold coin and ordinary charcoal establishes a prior assumption about judgments of value. But the narrator does not stop there. He continues to search for the proverb's meaning through one episode after another, and with every explanation, meaning itself becomes less stable.

The work opens by addressing the reader directly. The narrator poses questions, imagines possible answers and then overturns them himself. Readers are not passive listeners but unacknowledged participants in the argument. Through this dialogic method, the text becomes less an event-driven story than a movement among experience, imagination, self-mockery and social irony. A superficial reading might take it as an amusing account of the search for a proverb's meaning; closer attention brings forth the anxiety of acquiring social prestige and the displacement of values as its central concerns.

Narrative Structure: Question, Episode and Renewed Question

The narrator first introduces a proverb whose precise import he does not understand. Seeking an answer, he turns to the experienced Bhuvan Kaka. Kaka's words are grounded in practical knowledge, but their exchange does not dispel the narrator's dissatisfaction. From this point the narrative flows through many episodes. The narrator moves among imagined versions of his life, possible meetings with eminent people, intellectual honours, social advancement and extraordinary plans for the future. His language reveals, by turns, confidence, a sense of inferiority, a longing for praise and the courage to refuse.

In the middle passages, dreams of miraculous experiences, visions of great figures, the company of distinguished people and unexpected gains carry the narrator in different directions. There is no single chain of cause and effect of the kind found in conventional plots. Every new fantasy comments on its predecessor and adds another irony. When professorship, universities, research degrees, employment and recommendations enter the narrative, what appeared on the surface to concern personal advancement becomes a question about the machinery of intellectual and social prestige. In the concluding passages, questionable routes to material gain, influential contacts and difficult choices for securing privileges also emerge. Success and morality now confront each other as alternatives.

The ending returns the opening question to the reader. Through this final inquiry, interpretation of the opening proverb once again depends upon the reader's judgment. This circular arrangement is among the story's chief formal achievements. The point of the satire is not sealed within the last sentence; thought remains open even after the text ends.

Narrative Expansion and the Construction of Episodes

Addressing the Reader, the Title and the Initial Conflict over Value

The subtitle 'narrative satire' attached to the title provides an indication of how the work invites critical reception. The opening address, 'Dear readers', speaks directly to the audience: rather than seating readers on a high bench of judgment, the writer installs them as fellow thinkers. The proverbial phrase 'the plunder of gold coins and a mark on charcoal' remains the organising axis. The coin is valuable, charcoal comparatively commonplace; the words 'plunder' and 'mark' suggest different registers of action and signification. The question is why people abandon what is valuable and become fixed upon a merely nominal gain. Yet the narrative does not accept even this initial explanation as indisputable truth.

The narrator's intimate speech, interrogative grammar and proverb derived from lived experience operate together. Bhuvan Kaka enters as an embodiment of popular wisdom. The address 'Kaka' conveys both familial intimacy and the authority of an elder. The narrator is not ashamed to acknowledge his own inability to understand; this confession plants the seed of humour. Beyond the pursuit of a valuable object, the purpose for which it would be used also comes under examination. The episode thus establishes a twofold question: what does the proverb mean, and who determines the meaning of 'value' in life?

Bhuvan Kaka and the Incomplete Answer of Folk Wisdom

In the second episode, the narrator's conversation with Bhuvan Kaka develops further. He appeals to an elder's experience to understand the saying, but experience does not provide a simple and exhaustive definition. Kaka's response, together with the narrator's further curiosity, creates a significant tension within social knowledge. Kaka is not merely a teacher or moral instructor: through his address to Kaka, the narrator increasingly exposes his own inconsistencies.

Common measures by which people assess 'worth'—prominent individuals, office, honour, name, fame, high and low rank—enter the satire. The economic value of an object and the symbolic value of prestige are not identical, but social conduct frequently converts one into the other. The characters' exchanges reveal this confusion. The prose advances through continuous questions and counter-questions. Instead of lengthy expository passages, the lively rhythm of dialogue propels the narrative.

The Expansion of Fantasy and the Testing of Self-Infatuation

In this episode, the narrator's attention turns towards meeting extraordinarily important people, unexpected achievements and his possible future. The writer uses visions of great figures and the idea of 'darshan', or privileged sight, satirically. The more extravagant the narrator's dreams of an exceptional future become, the more clearly his present incapacity emerges. Humour consequently falls not only upon the other characters but upon the narrator himself. This self-satire prevents the narrative from becoming merely a mockery of others.

The scenes change continuously. These shifting mental pictures require readers to distinguish actual encounters, imagined incidents and images of the narrator's aspiration. In that sense the episode concerns mental time more than the story's external time. Every leap of fantasy examines another measure of social success. A distance emerges between the desire to become 'great' and the true ethical significance of greatness.

The Language of Honour and the Performance of Rank

The narrator's aspirations here assume a more explicitly social form. A form of address such as 'Professor Sahib' is not merely a term of respect; it points to a collective imagination of office and influence. The possibilities of satire increase when intellectual authority is derived not from the quality of thought but from the glamour of a particular position. The narrator pictures himself in a world where education and prestige are taken to support each other, while the hope of advantage remains attached to both.

Exaggerated self-imagining distinguishes the episode. A slight incident in everyday life becomes a grand social scene in the narrator's mind. The posture of humility and the intensity of desire become entangled in his speech. This contradiction makes readers laugh, but the laughter carries a critical edge: how often is our public respect for office really respect for the potential advantages it may bring?

Social Mobility, Relationships and the Shadow of Self-Interest

Meetings with acquaintances, memories of the village and comparisons of one's own social situation become important here. People recognise each other through earlier acquaintance, yet forms of address and behaviour may change as social position changes. The narrator is acutely sensitive to these distinctions. His mental responses reveal the many ways in which an absence of rank, wealth and connections can produce feelings of inferiority and the desire for self-display.

Several conversations end in half-statements, and responses are often immediate and emotional. The narrator is thereby rendered less than wholly reliable as a thinker. Readers weigh his statements against his desires. This is a subtle device of satire: the author's critical perspective may stand apart from what the narrator himself accepts. Dreams of social advancement can thus be read here as psychological pressures rather than objective achievements.

A Professor's Salary, Institutions and Intellectual Capital

The mention of a 'professor's salary' explicitly connects the narrative with academic and institutional life. The university, teaching, research, examining and degrees open up a world in which the social uses of knowledge are tied to opportunities for a livelihood. The work does not ridicule the pursuit of knowledge; it examines the tendency to acquire prestige, opportunities or favour in knowledge's name.

Alongside the desire for office comes the objective question of 'work'. Wanting a title and making the effort to acquire the competence it requires are not the same. The narrator's lack of preparation turns this distinction into a source of humour. Short questions, immediate answers and abrupt reversals of conclusions prevent the discussion of institutions from becoming a didactic essay. Social critique is absorbed into narrative and laughter. This episode may be regarded as a central link in the work's institutional satire.

Opportunism, Recommendations and the Conflict over Self-Respect

Here the narrator once again looks towards his acquaintances, former relationships and possible assistance in advancing socially. References to powerful people, recommendations, employment and advantages sharpen the question of whether success should be regarded as the fruit of one's own labour or of personal connections. His dreams continually change; his decisions show little stability and a strong attraction towards opportunity. The writer exposes this uncertainty more through unexpected turns of events than through explicit moral commentary.

Importantly, the work is not simply a portrayal of one individual's greed. Social structure itself makes proximity to people in office a means of advantage. The narrator's weakness is partly a product of that structure. Yet the work does not absolve him entirely: it repeatedly attacks his self-deception. This two-sided criticism of opportunism allows readers to examine both the individual and the institution.

Moral Boundaries and a Question Returned to the Reader

In this episode, the narrator encounters discussion of possibilities resembling illicit smuggling. Rather than treating the passage as a literal chronicle of events, it is more appropriate to understand it as a satirical limit-case of the excessive temptation to choose 'any road at all' towards social advancement. Success, which earlier appeared in the guise of honour, now turns into a question of moral deterioration. The narrator also disagrees with this option; his character is therefore not that of a uniformly opportunistic person but one filled with conflicting desires.

In closing, the narrator again addresses his readers and asks, 'Well, do any of you know another meaning?' The opening proverb returns not as a closed door of explanation but as an open question. Having searched for its meaning throughout the narrative, he leaves the adequate answer to the judgment of the reader. This openness secures the reader's critical role. The final instalment identifies the writer's affiliation as the Department of Hindi, Jagdamba Mahila College, Laheriasarai; it would not, however, be appropriate to infer any further biographical details from this information.

Narrative Technique and the Multiple Layers of Meaning

The Proverb as an Instrument of Meaning, Not a Plot

A proverb is usually a brief conclusion drawn from the complexities of life. The writer, however, does not accept its meaning as predetermined. The gold coin and charcoal become images of different kinds of value. In some episodes, the 'gold coin' appears to stand for economic gain; in others, prestige or a prudent decision. A 'mark on charcoal' may suggest remaining satisfied with a small achievement, wasted effort or fascination with a meaningless external sign. Yet all these are analytical possibilities: the text never definitively establishes any single interpretation. Without this caution, the open significance of the satire would be reduced to a slogan.

The return of the proverb maintains coherence in the flow of the narrative. Episodes change, but the question does not. Consequently, even where the work appears loosely expansive, its structural centre remains stable. The saying serves as a touchstone against which social incidents are repeatedly tested.

The Unreliability of 'I' and Self-Satire

The first-person narrator occupies a position of apparent authority over knowledge while exposing his own confusion. Readers understand his aspirations as well as his words. The more he imagines himself becoming important, the more his inner contradictions are revealed. The target of satire is not merely an 'other' but the narrating 'I' himself. Readers laugh with him and at him, and ultimately reflect upon their own social habits.

Many of the narrator's ideas change immediately. This instability cannot be called merely a fault of character; it gives narrative expression to the ironies of social life. The same person may regard himself as self-respecting and yet crave proximity to the powerful. This inner contradiction underlies the work's credible social psychology.

Dialogism: Reader, Kaka and the Language of Institutions

At least three levels of voice can be heard in the work: the narrator addressing readers; Bhuvan Kaka's language grounded in experience; and the formal vocabulary associated with the world of office and prestige. Differences among these voices generate satire. When intimate forms of address in everyday life encounter terms such as 'professor', 'lecturer', 'university' and 'degree', language becomes a map of society's hierarchies. Rather than preach, the writer places unequal voices face to face.

This arrangement of dialogue does not command readers simply to accept the storyteller's conclusions. Several points of view appear, and readers must decide when the narrator is right, when he is deluded and when he makes himself the object of ridicule.

Humour, Irony and the Inversion of Meaning

The first level of humour is simply linguistic: a short contradiction after a long fantasy, a reversed answer following a question, and sudden reality after exaggeration. The second is social: society readily bows before the name of an office but seldom examines the competence actually required for it or its purpose. The third is ethical: a person eager for success briefly encounters a path on which success and morality oppose each other. Across all three levels, the metaphor of the ‘gold coin’ continually assumes new meanings.

The sharpness of the writer's satire lies not in a plain negation of facts but in a rearrangement of incongruous situations. An unnatural fantasy becomes humorous when it exposes socially accepted assumptions from within. Ostentation, flattery and eagerness for profit thereby become subjects of scrutiny.

The Work's Limitations and Critical Objections

Alongside the work's effects are certain limitations. Because the narrator's fantasies expand more widely than the action, the pace slows in some episodes. Several comic allusions depend upon knowledge of local social relationships and institutional terminology of their period; their immediate resonance may be weaker for contemporary readers. The story opens many possibilities but does not develop all the episodes with equal seriousness. Some passages may therefore seem like independent fragments of jest.

Nevertheless, it would be equally mistaken to regard this dispersion solely as a defect. The narrator's uncontrolled movement of thought itself reveals the lack of control in social aspiration. Readers must therefore ask how much of the looseness is deliberate and how much belongs to the work's construction. A fair critical position recognises both possibilities.

A Comparative Place in Maithili Literary History

From Folk Humour to Modern Narrative Satire

One source of the humorous tradition in Maithili prose lies in popular sayings, farce, conversation and contradictions in social conduct. Kumar Pawan's work draws energy from this source by investigating the meaning of a proverb. Its concern, however, is not limited to conventional customs or the comedy of domestic life; it also engages with office-seeking among the educated, prestige arising from university procedures and the desire for modern conveniences. In this sense, the proverb becomes an instrument for examining modern institutional life.

The tradition of farce exemplified by Jyotirishwar's ‘Dhurta Samagama’ and the history of dissenting laughter in the vernacular are worth recalling. Yet it would be mistaken to declare this work a direct descendant without examining differences in historical period, literary form and purpose. The social characters of an older farce and the psychological portrait of a first-person satirist here belong to distinct genres. The proper basis of comparison is their shared ability to make contradictions visible through laughter, not an unverified claim of historical influence.

Harimohan Jha's 'Khattar Kakak Tarang' and Kumar Pawan

In discussions of modern Maithili humour and satire, Harimohan Jha's 'Khattar Kakak Tarang' (1948) provides a useful point of comparison. Videha's author profile also lists his 'Kanyadan' (1933) and other works alongside this satire. Kumar Pawan's writing enters into dialogue with the well-known tradition of reasoning humour in 'Khattar Kakak Tarang' in that questioning established assumptions through laughter is important to both. Their structures of address, however, differ. Harimohan Jha's celebrated Khattar Kaka becomes a powerful centre of thought through dialogue; in Kumar Pawan's story, the questioning centre is the narrator himself, a man beset by doubt who loses an earlier assumption with every new episode.

This comparison does not establish the 'influence' of either work on the other. Doing so would require manuscript evidence, statements by the author, successive publication records or direct intertextual evidence. Available materials permit discussion only of generic affinity and differences of technique. Such critical restraint prevents literary history from becoming a genealogy of praise.

Later Maithili Satire and Generic Continuity

Videha's book catalogue lists Ashok's 'Neek Dinak Bioscope' (a collection of satire, 2018) and 'Katha-Path' (a critical study of Maithili stories, 2022). These entries establish only that satire and story criticism also continue as independent works in later Maithili writing. Bibliographic listings alone do not justify claims about the contents, technique or direct relationship of these books to Kumar Pawan. Nevertheless, placing the narrative satire from issue 5/68 alongside these records makes clear the need to study periodical satire and book-length satire in parallel.

Kumar Pawan's 'Paith' and 'The Blank Pages of a Diary' are also listed in Videha's catalogue. These entries provide information about the existence of other prose works by the author; they do not, by themselves, warrant conclusions about the chronology of his entire literary career or the development of his narrative methods. Direct comparison with his other published writings remains a subject for more firmly grounded future research.

Re-reading Literary History: The Importance of a 'Small' Work

Literary histories often construct accounts of literary tendencies around book-length collections, prize-winning works and established writers. A narrative satire consisting of eight episodes scattered across a magazine exposes the limitations of such a history. This work gives readers a small but concentrated record of the complex relationships among everyday language, educational institutions, social opportunism and moral judgment. Only when literary history accommodates such close readings of periodical texts can the many-sided social role of humour and satire become clear.

This study proposes documentary discipline, not extravagant evaluative claims. No textual evidence is available for proclaiming this one story the first or the greatest example of Maithili satire. The grounds for calling it distinctive are more carefully delimited: an inquiry into meaning driven by a proverb; a self-contradictory narrator; satire of social institutions; and an open ending that transfers the question to the reader. Its place in literary history should be determined by these verifiable characteristics.

Conclusion

Kumar Pawan's 'The Plunder of Gold Coins and a Mark on Charcoal' is a narrative satire that begins with a small question about meaning and proceeds towards the large contradictions of modern society. The symbolic opposition between the high value of gold coins and the ordinariness of charcoal is not merely a comparison of objects. It brings under scrutiny the criteria by which educated society judges 'greatness', material comfort, prestigious office, claims to competence and moral decisions. The narrator appears before readers with both his ego and insecurities; Bhuvan Kaka introduces a dimension of folk wisdom; and the institutional world reveals the distance between success and knowledge.

The work's most effective device is its questioning method. In the search for one meaning, the narrator opens numerous interpretive possibilities and ultimately makes the reader the judge. This openness, combined with self-satire and social humour, makes the work worthy of attention in the study of modern Maithili prose. Even allowing for some looseness of episodic structure and difficulties arising from references specific to an earlier period, the story provides a pointed critique of the inversion of values. It is therefore more appropriate to read this brief work not simply as a humorous sketch but as a multilayered investigation of society's system of values.

PART IV

Paith, Memory and Self-Writing

A Literary-Theoretical Comparison of "Paith" and "The Blank Pages of a Diary"

A Writer's Literary Identity through a Single Story

In literary history, a single work sometimes comes to represent the entire name of its author. Despite Chandradhar Sharma Guleri's other literary contributions, 'Usne Kaha Tha' remains the famous story most closely associated with him. It is in this sense that the comparison is employed when ‘Paith’ is regarded as a representative work of Kumar Pawan's literary identity. This is neither a claim that the two stories share the same subject nor an attempt to establish similarities of narrative technique, characters, endings or sensibility. A single story can bring a writer widespread recognition: that alone is the purpose of the comparison.

Such recognition requires a qualification. The central place of one work in readers' memory does not mean that an author's other writings are secondary or without value. A study of Kumar Pawan's ‘The Blank Pages of a Diary’ and ‘The Plunder of Gold Coins and a Mark on Charcoal’ makes it clear that his narrative vision extends beyond the communal feast to educational institutions, self-examination and the ironies of social prestige. ‘Paith’ may be the work through which a writer is recognised, but an understanding of the whole writer requires attention to the broader body of work.

Heavenly Admission and the Emptiness of Self-Writing: Two Contradictions

The primary sense of ‘Paith’ is linked to the popular religious belief that the departed soul should find a place or acceptance in heaven. The story's ethical irony, however, lies in the fact that Kaniya Kaki's modest request for food for her daughter's son caused rejection and uproar during her lifetime, while a grand feast was arranged after her death to secure her heavenly admission. The title thus exposes the contradiction between acceptance in the next world and neglect in this one. The rows of diners and public prestige are accompanying images of this fundamental opposition, not the primary meaning of ‘paith’ itself.

‘The Blank Pages of a Diary’ contains a different kind of emptiness. Rather than the posthumous acceptance of a dead soul, it concerns the self-testimony of a living person. The diary's pages stand open to be written upon, yet the principal cannot produce a decisive record of his experiences. One story reveals the gulf between public ritual for a soul after death and neglect in life; the other exposes the distance between a living official's public image and private truth. In both, the discrepancy between professed ideals and actual conduct generates satire.

In ‘Paith’, collective attention is devoted to religious acceptance in the afterlife, while Kaniya Kaki's small request in life goes unheard. In ‘The Blank Pages of a Diary’, a person receives social recognition through office but cannot write the truth of his private life. The first story asks why a society eager to gain heavenly admission for a departed soul fails to discharge its duties towards a person in life; the second asks why someone with authority cannot write an honest account of experience. The comparison preserves the distinct forms of public ritual and private self-writing while identifying a common ethical distance.

Narrative Time: Recollection, Present Experience and an Unfinished Future

Narrative time is not simply the orderly progression of a clock. Memory, apprehension and expectation change its flow. In 'Paith', the present of the funeral feast is joined by Kaniya Kaki's humiliation in life, her request for food for her daughter's son, Gunja's situation and the uncertain possibilities of the family's future. Through this movement back and forth, the arrangements intended to secure the soul's admission to heaven can no longer be detached from the ethical account of the life that preceded them. Memory brings a human face and an unheard appeal out from behind the crowd.

Time is stranger still in 'The Blank Pages of a Diary'. A diary usually transforms moments that have passed into a written present. But the principal's life is so occupied with plans, apprehensions and calculations concerning his position and prestige on the following day that passing moments cannot enter the record. Anxiety about the future consumes the experience of the present, leaving the evidence of the past blank. This is not merely a narrative contrivance but a satire upon the experience of time in a life entangled with power.

The return of time takes different forms in the two long stories. In 'Paith', Kaniya Kaki's suffering in life tests the claims of the feast performed after her death. In 'The Blank Pages of a Diary', the busyness of the present obstructs the production of a reliable record of the past. Memory of life questions the ritual present in the first work; the written location of memory remains empty in the second. In both, what matters more than chronology is the way people treat their lived experience.

Narratorial Distance and the Ethics of Point of View

In 'Paith', the crowd, funeral observances, memories of Kaniya Kaki's life and contradictory voices together constitute the narrative scene. No single perspective can become the truth of the entire village. The controversy arising from her simple request for food leads readers away from the community's outward religious performance and towards the wound within the family. In this multiperspectival composition, readers must construct meaning while attending to what characters know and to the limits of that knowledge. When the narrative does not declare a definitive judgment, the silence also creates an opportunity for the reader's ethical participation.

In 'The Blank Pages of a Diary', the gap between the principal's self-justifications and the public consequences of his behaviour is the principal ground of satire. Behind decisions he regards as reasonable may lie the need to protect his office, fear of failure and the advantages of close relationships. The narrative is arranged so that his insecurity remains visible to readers even when the principal himself cannot grasp its complete significance.

The politics of point of view matters in both works. 'Paith' asks who will tell the story of someone whose voice is drowned out by the collective. 'The Blank Pages of a Diary' asks what someone who possesses the power to write will record and what he will evade. Literary perspective is here a distribution of knowledge: author, character and reader do not all know the same thing in the same way.

The Funeral Feast and the College: Testing the Values of Social Institutions

A funeral feast and a college appear outwardly to be unrelated institutions. One is a communal undertaking associated with popular religious belief; the other a formal centre of modern education. Yet prestige, relationships, rank and collective approval influence both. 'Paith' asks why a modest appeal made during Kaniya Kaki's lifetime caused an uproar while the feast after her death won assent. 'The Blank Pages of a Diary' asks how office, recommendations and patronage affect the declared ideals of education. These different social processes provide grounds for an ethical comparison.

In 'Paith', the distribution of food is not only a question of grain but also of timing and purpose: resistance to a little food requested for the living daughter's son and abundance at a feast intended to gain admission for the dead soul. On the other hand, the value of knowledge in the principal's institution is surrounded by official credentials, political patronage and public image. Critical concepts of social capital and symbolic prestige are useful here; nonetheless, the specific religious significance of the popular belief surrounding the dead should not be reduced entirely to calculations of reputation.

It would be mistaken to dissolve both narratives into a single social formula. The crisis of 'Paith' consists in the acute opposition between the hunger of the living, contempt for maternal affection and ritual for the dead soul's heavenly admission; the crisis of the college is the prolonged erosion of rules, office and judgment. In one, the ethical inconsistency is visible in a little grain set against a huge feast after death; in the other, it appears in the language of decisions and the use of authority. A comparison that preserves this difference respects the distinctive visions of the stories.

Women's Experiences and the Invisible Account of Private Life

In 'Paith', Kaniya Kaki's suffering changes the meaning of the funeral feast from within. The uproar over her modest request for food while alive sharpens the questions of affection and family responsibility. The elaborate arrangements for her soul's admission to heaven after death constitute the ethical inversion of that neglect. Gunja's presence further intensifies the issues of inheritance and women's position in society.

In 'The Blank Pages of a Diary', institutional power occupies the centre of the principal's thoughts. The appearance of female characters occasionally opens the possibility of self-correction for the male protagonist, but their own lives do not receive full development. This is also a significant limitation of the work. On the one hand, women assist the man's introspection; on the other, the reader may ask, precisely because they occupy this supporting role, where their independent struggles are to be found.

An important question in comparing these stories is whose experience literature makes its ethical centre. Amid the collective feast undertaken for the welfare of the dead in the next world, 'Paith' gives voice to Kaniya Kaki's ignored wish while alive. 'The Blank Pages of a Diary' reveals the self-absorbed limitations of a man's institutional life. Between these two representations lies an opportunity to reconsider gender perspectives and social responsibility in Maithili fiction.

The Triangle of Humour, Compassion and Irony

An important characteristic of Kumar Pawan's satire is that humour ultimately becomes an uncomfortable experience. In 'Paith', arguments about the enormous funeral feast, the rushing about and the social postures initially provide opportunities for amusement. But this laughter becomes serious when the contrast comes into view between the dispute over Kaniya Kaki's modest request for food in life and the lavish arrangements for heavenly admission after her death. The storyteller does not merely wish readers to laugh at social incongruities; he makes them reflect upon why they are laughing.

In 'The Blank Pages of a Diary', the principal's self-justifications, fascination with office, fear of possible criticism and the complicated play of external patronage produce humour. Within that humour, however, lies a crisis of trust in educational institutions. Alongside their laughter, readers are led to ask how the ethical basis of institutional decisions has been eroded.

Compassion and humour are not opposed emotions in either story. In 'Paith', irony assumes a compassionate meaning when Kaniya Kaki's neglect in life confronts the feast for her heavenly admission after death. In 'The Blank Pages of a Diary', the distance between the college's authority and the principal's inward apprehensions creates insecurity alongside laughter. This compassion lifts readers beyond immediate emotion and compels them to think about justice, responsibility and the human significance of institutions.

Illustrations, Images and Visual Memory

The presence of line drawings in the published forms of 'Paith' and 'The Blank Pages of a Diary' supports the stories' emotional worlds. Eyes, faces, bodily figures and crown-like images sometimes raise questions about the right to see and at other times become satirical signs of the aspiration to power. To dismiss the illustrations as mere ornament would be to overlook an important dimension of the reading experience.

The effect of visual suggestions is also connected with the methods of the prose. In 'Paith', the crowd, dining rows and window at the funeral feast distinguish the outward ritual from the different world of memories of Kaniya Kaki's life. In 'The Blank Pages of a Diary', the office, college and frustrated desire to write organise the field of vision. The first asks why the suffering of the living was not seen; the second asks why what was seen was not written. This relation increases the symbolic force of the titles.

Open Endings and the Responsibility of the Reader

The ending of a story need not merely terminate events; it may initiate meaning anew. In ‘Paith’, even after the feast intended to gain admission for Kaniya Kaki's soul has concluded, the ethical debt incurred by the dispute over food for her daughter's son during her life remains outstanding. The grand ritual's claims confront the actual treatment of a living person. The memory of this conflict stays with the reader.

In ‘The Blank Pages of a Diary’, the principal fails to prepare an honest account of his life. At the end, the title becomes significant once again: the more experiences accumulate, the greater grows the ethical difficulty of writing them down. The final emptiness transforms the character's failure into a question for readers: when and how do we give a private account of our public decisions?

The ending of ‘Paith’ leaves readers remembering unfinished social obligations towards Kaniya Kaki during her lifetime rather than merely the completion of the funeral feast. In ‘The Blank Pages of a Diary’, the emptiness of self-writing becomes the ethical outcome of the principal's struggles. In the former, neglect in life stands against rituals focused on acceptance in the afterlife; in the latter, an absence of self-testimony stands against public authority. Both challenge readers to construct their own final ethical judgments.

Narrative Polyphony and Social Language

Society's language is not uniform. In ‘Paith’, the reactions of organisers, invited guests, neglected individuals, family members and the crowd arise from different conditions of life. In this plurality of voices, the writer's single judgment does not automatically occupy the centre. The tensions among social voices remain before the reader.

In ‘The Blank Pages of a Diary’, the languages of command, assurance, rumour, accusation, patronage and private doubt cut across one another. The encounter between administrative terminology and personal fear energises the irony. Institutional dialogue becomes not an indisputable record of truth but a means of defending office and balancing power.

Neither story is a dry illustration of linguistics; both are imaginative representations of conflicts within life. Which experiences social language grants prestige to and which it pushes aside are continuously expressed in scenes and dialogues. The flexibility of the Maithili vernacular keeps this plurality alive.

Symbolic Capital, Hunger and Morality

Prestige may assume the form of a title, an invitation, a seat of honour or proximity to an influential person. In ‘Paith’, the huge feast for the departed soul's admission to heaven also becomes an expression of social prestige, but the controversy over a little food requested for Kaniya Kaki's daughter's son during her lifetime exposes the limits of its value. In ‘The Blank Pages of a Diary’, the institution becomes caught in the symbolic brilliance of office instead of its stated educational purpose.

The contradiction is that institutions held in public honour—the religious feast after death and the educational institution—can both offer opportunities to protect human dignity and become sites of its devaluation. Kumar Pawan reveals the distance between reverence for religious ritual and human obligations towards the living; in the other story he reveals the distance between educational prestige and moral truth. Neither system can be dissolved into a one-dimensional lesson.

Morality here is not merely a matter of personal virtue. The distance between the duty to provide a little food for Kaniya Kaki's daughter's son while she lived and the social desire to hold a feast for her soul's admission after death demands ethical scrutiny. Similarly, just decisions within education are a public duty. This broader meaning of morality gives both works enduring social importance.

The Limits of Similarity and the Independent Achievements of the Works

The metaphor of the dead soul's admission to heaven in ‘Paith’ does not reappear unchanged in ‘The Blank Pages of a Diary’. The first story establishes several centres in ritual, community and family; the second gives prominence to the distressed inner world of an ambitious individual within an institution. The first concerns the hunger of the living, affection, death and the hope of an afterlife; the second concerns office, publicity, rules and self-writing. Simply calling both ‘social satire’ would efface these differences.

Nevertheless, the suggestiveness of their titles, unanswered questions, fascination with public image and concern for human dignity link them through a common narrative vision. The more extensive the social scene becomes, the more inward the story's ethical questions turn. In ‘Paith’, the conflict between Kaniya Kaki's modest need for grain during life and the feast for her heavenly admission after death, and in the other work, the principal's inability to write the truth, are distinct crises that nevertheless make readers value deeds above declarations.

The importance of ‘Paith’ as a representative work lies in its distinctive Maithili social world, Kaniya Kaki's experience as a woman, the neglect she suffers in life, the irony of the funeral feast and the open ethical question. One story can establish an author's public identity, but an assessment of his work must not confine him to a single composition. Read beside ‘The Blank Pages of a Diary' and other writings, Kumar Pawan's social critique becomes more fully comprehensible. His literary achievement lies not in imitating another storyteller but in transforming the inner contradictions of his own society into narrative art.

Synthesis: The Shared Structures of Narrative Practice

The critical study of all three works makes clear that the distance between outward behaviour and inward intention is a recurring concern in Kumar Pawan's fictional world. In 'Paith', a demand for a little grain for Kaniya Kaki's daughter's son causes uproar while she lives, whereas a huge feast is held for heavenly admission after her death. In 'The Blank Pages of a Diary', educational prestige stands beside an emptiness of self-testimony. In 'The Plunder of Gold Coins and a Mark on Charcoal', the apparent wisdom of a proverb confronts the irony of society's hunger for rank. In different circumstances, all three raise the same question: how does society actually practise the values it professes?

In 'Paith', the fragmented voices of the communal funeral feast meet memories of Kaniya Kaki's humiliation and affection during life. In 'The Blank Pages of a Diary', administrative success and insecure self-consciousness expose each other. In 'The Plunder of Gold Coins and a Mark on Charcoal', the process of searching for a proverb's meaning unsettles readers' own judgments of value. Each of these techniques has a different rhythm: communal satire generated by the clash between ritual and life; institutional psychological satire; and direct address to the reader.

The creative success of the satire resides not solely in the sharpness of laughter but also in the presence of compassion. Confronted with disorder in social relationships, readers do not receive the simple satisfaction of locating someone to blame. They must also reflect upon their own conduct, their conceptions of honour and the part played by silence. In modern Maithili fiction, such a critically engaged readership may be regarded as a distinctive contribution of Kumar Pawan's narrative writing.

The works have limitations as well. Certain extended episodes slow the narratives; some characters, particularly in the representation of women's independent experiences, call for fuller development. Nevertheless, the originality of these works remains intact: 'Paith', 'The Blank Pages of a Diary' and 'The Plunder of Gold Coins and a Mark on Charcoal' all give literary expression to major questions confronting society.

References and Critical Works Mentioned

01. Kumar Pawan. 'Paith' (long story). Antika, April–June 2008.

02. Kumar Pawan. 'The Blank Pages of a Diary' (long story). Antika, October–December 2008.

03. Kumar Pawan. ‘The Plunder of Gold Coins and a Mark on Charcoal’ (narrative satire). Sankalp, issue designation 5/68.

04. Chandradhar Sharma Guleri. ‘Usne Kaha Tha’. Saraswati, 1915.

05. Harimohan Jha. Khattar Kakak Tarang.

06. Harimohan Jha. Kanyadan.

07. Jyotirishwar Thakur. Dhurta Samagama.

08. Phoolchandra Jha ‘Praveen’. ‘Maithili Shishu Lok Sahitya’. Videha, no. 50, 2010.

09. Yoganand Jha. ‘Maithili Ballokkatha: Sthiti aa Apeksha’. Videha, no. 76, 2011.

10. Durganand Mandal. ‘Nena Lel Sundar Chitrakatha’. Videha, no. 116, 2012.

11. Ramesh Ranjan. ‘Maithili Balnatak Seema Vistar Karait — Chauari’. Videha, no. 126, 2013.

12. Gajendra Thakur. ‘Maithili Bal-Upanyasak Samikshashastra’. Videha, no. 447, 2026.

13. Ashok. Neek Dinak Bioscope. 2018.

14. Ashok. Katha-Path. 2022.

15. Videha. ‘Pothi’: Bibliographic records of Maithili literary books.

16. Videha. ‘Gadya’: An author-wise catalogue of prose works and criticism.

17. Mikhail Bakhtin. The Dialogic Imagination: Four Essays. 1981.

18. Gérard Genette. Narrative Discourse: An Essay in Method. 1980.

19. Paul Ricoeur. Time and Narrative. 1984–1988.

20. Pierre Bourdieu. The Field of Cultural Production. 1993.

STUDY 07 / NIT NAVAL

Ashish Anchinhar

PART I

Editing, Literary Memory, and Plural Histories

Rereading Maithili Literature

REVIEW 1

THE COMPLETE WORKS OF NABONARAYAN MISHRA

The Confluence of Literature, Cultural Activism, and Memory

Book under review: Nabonarayan Mishra Samagra (The Complete Works of Nabonarayan Mishra) · Edited by Ashish Anchinhar · 2026

Abstract

The literature of Nabonarayan Mishra cannot be understood within the boundaries of a single genre. In his creative world, interviews, institutional history, literary portraits, memoirs, stories, satire, festive songs, elegies, and poetry advocating linguistic rights enter into dialogue with one another. Edited by Ashish Anchinhar, Nabonarayan Mishra Samagra brings these dispersed writings together and makes visible the labour-intensive foundations of modern Maithili literature—foundations that cannot be apprehended merely by counting celebrated authors, awards, and separately published books. The collection is particularly significant for its documentation of the Maithili movement in Kolkata, literary magazines, cultural organisations, and the theatrical activities of Kokil Manch.

This study examines the collection's interviews, essays, fiction, and verse separately. The interviews offer living testimony to the movement for linguistic rights; the essays preserve institutional memory; the stories explore family relationships, dowry, philanthropy, migration, and moral irony; and the poems give voice to communal consciousness and personal injury. Its literary achievements are accompanied by limitations: idealistic resolutions sometimes diminish a story's complexity; eulogistic portraits sometimes weaken critical distance; and poetry sometimes becomes subordinate to explicit pronouncement. Nevertheless, the collection is an important primary text for considering the social foundations of literature, the labour of the stage, and historical memory.

Keywords: Nabonarayan Mishra; Ashish Anchinhar; Maithili prose; Kolkata; Kokil Manch; interviews; Maithili movement; folk memory; Maithili fiction; literary history.

Introduction: The Question of Invisible Labour in Literary History

Literary histories are commonly organised around authors' names, lists of published works, literary movements, and the succession of awards. Yet the life of a language and its literature resides not only in literary texts but also in the society that makes those texts possible. Someone books the auditorium, builds the stage, brings the performers together, delivers invitations, preserves handwritten material, recruits subscribers to magazines, and takes to the streets in a movement. Without acknowledging such contributions, any account of the circulation of literature remains incomplete. Nabonarayan Mishra's writing constitutes a historical presence of precisely this invisible labour.

Nabonarayan Mishra was not merely a storyteller or poet; he was a participant in Maithili public life, a writer of lived experience, and a witness to cultural activity. The editor's introduction makes clear that his first published work appeared in 1977, while his writings, separated by decades, were brought together in 2026. This long interval is not, by itself, definitive proof of his literary neglect. It does, however, compel us to ask which writers the institutional resources of publication and the distribution of recognition have made visible.

The term samagra, or "complete works," in the title should not be read as a literal claim to absolute completeness. It is better understood as an attempt to preserve historically the material that could be recovered. The editor himself indicates that the chronology of the writings, publication details, and their availability are uneven, and that further material may be added. This candid admission does not diminish the book's importance; instead, it clarifies the complexities of its textual history.

The Structure of the Writings and the Critical Perspective

The collection comprises three interviews, fifteen essays, eleven stories, and nineteen works in verse. Within this fourfold structure, the interviews present historical voices, the essays provide memoiristic and institutional interpretation, the stories depict social circumstances, and the poems articulate emotion and dissent. Despite their generic diversity, the works share an underlying thread: loyalty to the Maithili language, mutual responsibility within a community, and an ethical examination of human conduct.

Three levels of analysis are useful here. The first concerns the relationship between subject matter, scene, character, and form within each work; the second, the expression of similar themes across different genres; and the third, comparison with the conventional model of Maithili literary history in which eminent authors occupy centre stage while the organisers of literary activity remain marginal. Keeping these levels distinct prevents the collection's literary and historical values from collapsing into each other.

Interviews: Oral History and the Linguistic Public Sphere

The three interviewees are, respectively, Kishorikant Mishra, Ramlochan Thakur, and Dr Virendra Mallik. Because the material takes the form of questions and answers, it is not a record of the author's solitary reflections but a polyphonic document emerging through conversation. The interviewer's choices of subject are themselves significant: arrival in Kolkata, institutions, editing, theatre, movements, magazines, younger generations, linguistic rights, and personal experience. These themes reveal Nabonarayan Mishra's cultural priorities.

A Conversation with Kishorikant Mishra: Language, Education, and Print Culture

In Kishorikant Mishra's recollections, his attachment to the mother tongue is linked to his experience of debates at school. His association with the Mithila Cultural Council in Kolkata transforms a personal interest into an institutional campaign. Of particular importance are the practical labour of publishing a magazine and the concern for consistency in spelling. In this account, Mithila Mihir and the printing system are not merely technical matters; they become questions of linguistic standardisation.

Efforts to construct a commemorative image of Vidyapati, the campaign for a postage stamp, and appeals to record Maithili in the census demonstrate that the language movement operated simultaneously on three levels: literary prestige, the formation of public symbols, and demographic visibility. Nevertheless, the historical claims made in the interview should not be accepted as conclusively established facts. They are the memories of a participant and ought to be evaluated against independent documentation.

A Conversation with Ramlochan Thakur: The Triangle of Activism, Editing, and Theatre

Ramlochan Thakur's responses disclose the institutional network of Maithili public life. The Maithili Mukti Morcha, magazine editing, the translation of plays, poetry, the organisation of campaigns, and encouragement for emerging writers appear not as isolated pursuits but as components of a coordinated strategy for language and culture. The discussion of collective readings and literary gatherings in conditions of limited publication raises fundamental questions about literary democracy.

The interview's greatest significance lies in its recognition that literary history cannot be reduced to a printed catalogue of works. Gatherings such as Sampark, short-lived magazines, writing under pseudonyms, and collaborative editing are also understood as foundations of a creative culture. A tension nevertheless remains: how precise is personal recollection, and how specific are institutional dates and narratives? Research therefore requires comparison with contemporary periodicals and records of events.

A Conversation with Dr Virendra Mallik: Criticism, Communication, and Generational Change

The conversation with Virendra Mallik raises the question of a literary figure's intellectual self-positioning. Nabonarayan Mishra places Mallik's reflections on literary development, theatre, the creative community, and a changing environment within a wider historical context. Thus the material moves beyond an individual writer's autobiography to illuminate relationships throughout the Maithili literary world.

Across all three interviews the questioner sometimes appears more a cultural organiser than a critic. This is simultaneously a strength and a weakness: proximity yields trust and rare information, but the rigour of follow-up questioning is not invariably consistent. Researchers need to remain alert to this duality.

Essays: Kolkata's Living Cultural Archive

The essays form the historical backbone of the collection. Its fifteen pieces include reminiscences, personal portraits, accounts of institutions, histories of magazines, reflections on folktales, autobiographical recollections, and theatrical documentation. The central tendency of Mishra's prose is to transform scattered experiences into memory capable of serving a social purpose. In this context the author's "I" is not simply an emblem of self-display; it often provides an entrance into collective experience.

Ramlochan Thakur: From the Individual to a Social Tradition

Read together, "Ramlochan Thakur as I See Him" and "Hari Is Infinite, and Infinite Are His Stories" reveal two forms of literary portraiture. The first emphasises Ramlochan's public accomplishments as a writer, editor, and activist; the second, through an extended reminiscence, foregrounds the private dimensions of friendship, dialogue, organisation, and bereavement. The story of the institutions surrounding a single person gradually becomes a narrative of personal grief.

The critical question here is that formal examination of Ramlochan's literary writing is relatively limited, while admiring accounts of his campaigns occupy much more space. Yet this tendency cannot be dismissed as wholly non-literary, for the making of exemplary personalities has itself been a cultural practice within the literature of Maithili activism. What is needed is a separation of reverence from historical scrutiny.

Rajnandan Lal Das: Magazines, Institutional Leadership, and the Politics of Credit

"A Man of His Age: Shri Rajnandan Lal Das" and "Rajnandan Lal Das, an Epoch-Making Figure" connect the portrayal of an individual to the history of literary journalism. References to Akhar, Karnamrit, Karna Goshti, and Maithili cultural activities disclose the continuity of the labour involved in publication. The author's principal concern is to accord due recognition to the organisation of magazines, editorial fearlessness, and communal support in the development of literature.

The overlapping coverage in these two essays also raises a question for the critic: how clearly are the differences in fact between a brief tribute and an extended portrait, the repetition of similar claims, and the criteria for assessments based on memory distinguished? Ignoring this question would make it harder to understand the writer's historical undertaking.

Prabodh Babu and Lakshman Jha "Sagar": A Poetics of Intellectual Affection and Remembrance

"A Resolute Advocate of Mithila and Maithili: Professor Prabodh Babu" brings public contribution and personal closeness together. The author does not merely enumerate achievements; he recalls encounters, unfulfilled wishes, death, and the poignant sense of unrealised cultural possibilities. One dimension of the value of intellectual life thus becomes emotional and ethical.

In "Sagarji, Endowed with Every Virtue," the warmth of dialogue and the episode of mediation are especially notable. In praising a distinguished figure, the author also records his own modest role. The value of this mode of writing lies in its recognition that a literary community is formed not only through agreement among thinkers but also through the everyday effort to resolve disagreements.

Mithila Vikas Parishad: Institutional Cooperation and Competition

"Mithila Vikas Parishad, Kolkata: As I Saw It" recounts both institutional solidarity and mutual distrust. The author acknowledges the achievements of a particular organisation but does not evade criticism of the distance that developed among different bodies. The essay prevents the movement's history from becoming merely a narrative of glory: founding an institution is an accomplishment, but personal ego, factionalism, and the boycott of events can diminish its benefit to the community.

A distinctive feature of this account is that the author also brings into view the position of Kokil Manch, an organisation with which he himself was associated. The piece is therefore a document of personal positionality as well as historical events, allowing room for self-criticism even while declaring its commitments.

Pitambar Pathak and Babu Saheb Chaudhary: The Human Face of the Language Movement

"A Hero of the Maithili Movement: Pitambar Pathak" remembers a person who worked continually behind institutional activities. The author discusses the recruitment of younger people, the preparation of successors, and the cultivation of collective working practices. The account of a sudden death gives the remembrance its emotional ending, carrying public history into the experience of private loss.

"On Babu Saheb Chaudhary" opens up the cultural psychology of linguistic activism. Its discussion of Maithili songs, dahakan, women's voices, theatre, and the mother tongue's connection with domestic life does not make the preservation of a language dependent solely on official recognition. Although it is not beyond question to regard women of the folk community as the sole guardians of tradition, concern for oral culture remains a valuable aspect of this prose.

The Maithili Movement in Calcutta and Mithila Darshan: The Public Pathway of the Magazine

"The Maithili Movement in Calcutta and Mithila Darshan" portrays a living history of linguistic struggle in a migrant city. Through the magazine, writers, activists, teachers, and the diasporic community become connected. The generic range of its published material—linguistics, fiction, poetry, one-act plays, and drama—constitutes important evidence for viewing a periodical as a collective intellectual platform.

Numerous names and details of publication are assembled in this essay. Although such informational density is useful, the sequence of events is not always orderly; researchers still need to compare the lists with the contents of contemporary issues. The essay's importance for the history of literary journalism lies not merely in making claims, but in offering lines of inquiry that can be independently verified.

"Smriti Akhar": Theatre Within Autobiographical Remembrance

"Smriti Akhar" narrates a cultural journey from the attempt to stage performances in a village to the stage of a great city. How an institution was founded, how performers came together, how women's participation on stage developed, and how the labour of training and direction was apportioned—such details disclose the social foundations of theatre. The references to Ganga Jha's direction and the active contributions of Kiran Jha and other performers place collective theatrical practice at the centre of the discussion.

The work also describes the author's institutional responsibilities. The critical importance of the memoir arises from the fact that its author was not merely a spectator of theatre but participated in running the organisation. Yet precisely because of this proximity, the account of achievements requires further consideration alongside failures, audience composition, theatrical language, and experiments in staging.

"Maithili Folktales": The Preservation and Limits of Folk Literature

In "Maithili Folktales," the author identifies a gap between the breadth of oral tradition and the scarcity of published collections. Oral narratives transmit social and intergenerational memory, but their circulation may be restricted without written anthologies. The discussion of existing examples of Maithili folktale collection thus raises an institutional question about the work of preservation.

Folktales, however, are not merely objects to be safeguarded. The circumstances of storytelling, the narrator's social location, dialect differences, gendered perspectives, and changing versions of a tale also demand study. The essay correctly identifies the need for collection while leaving ample scope for further research into the relations of power and formal variation within folktales.

"Mithila Mihir and the Editor": The Aesthetics of Print Publicity

"Mithila Mihir and the Editor" brings together the history of literary journalism, the personal influence of an editor, and the standardisation of language. The author's attention falls on the broader community of stories, novels, plays, and ideas that developed within the magazine. Beneath the lucid prose also lies the pain of historical loss: missing issues of a regular periodical, scattered contributions, and unresolved questions of editorial discipline.

Reading this essay alongside the interview with Kishorikant Mishra makes clear that uniform spelling is not simply a linguistic decision. It is a public compact produced through the labour of printing and editorial practice. The collection makes an original contribution in this direction.

"Ajay Singh, an Exceptional Well-Wisher of Maithili": Affection, Mourning, and Public Life

The essay devoted to Ajay Singh links personal acquaintance with an assessment of communal service. References to a death during the COVID period and the decline of cultural institutions evoke the passing of an entire generation. Such commemorative writing can preserve the threads of cultural connection for future researchers, although independent confirmation of events, dates, and contributions remains necessary for historical study.

"Maithili Theatre and Kolkata": From a Performance List to Theatre History

This essay represents one of the collection's fundamental documentary achievements. By bringing together details of theatre practitioners, playwrights, translations, productions, auditoriums, and direction, it seeks to move the history of Maithili drama beyond a history of written plays alone. Information about productions associated with Kokil Manch could make possible a study of the social life of theatre, its organisational capacity, and the cultural geography of a migrant city.

The dates and names contained in this list are valuable as leads for research, but the list should not be treated as a complete substitute for an independently verified chronology. What were the performances like? How did the acting of women's roles change? What social groups comprised the audience? What forms did ticketing and rehearsals take? The essay does not fully and systematically answer these questions. Nevertheless, the work of documentation deserves an appropriate place in literary history.

Separate Textual Analyses of the Stories

The collection's fiction encompasses rural life, the hardships of migration, the competing claims of family welfare and individual interest, the social constraints of marriage, the ethics of money and labour, public consciousness of language, and satire. In many stories an explicit moral judgement arrives at the end; elsewhere the final scene gives readers the opportunity to construct meaning for themselves. Their internal differences must be preserved in interpretation, lest this entire fictional world be oversimplified by the designation "didactic."

"Such Things Happen Too": The Construction of a Comic Scene

The subject of this short story is Mohanji's first visit to a cinema. In the darkness, he fails to lower the folding seat and remains suspended on the armrests; the interval lights reveal the cause of the misunderstanding. The humour arises not primarily from verbal wit but from the delayed revelation of a visual situation and the reader's incomplete information. The meaning of the title is reversed at the close.

The contrast between a modern place of entertainment and rural experience appears here as gentle satire. Rather than humiliating the character, the storyteller transforms his ignorance into a social experience. Brevity, well-timed disclosure, and humorous dialogue account for the story's success.

"A Ripe Mango": The Moral Perspective of a Child

A five-year-old boy insists on sharing the mango allotted to him with his paternal cousin, while his father argues that their households are separate and that the cousin's family enjoys greater comforts. The child's instinctive empathy calls the adults' divisive realism into question. The mango is not merely something to eat; it becomes a symbol of justice and participation within the joint family.

The story's particular strength lies in making the child's experience, rather than the narrator's instruction, the centre of the moral disagreement. Nevertheless, the father's position is rather easily presented as selfishness; the complexities of economic necessity receive little attention. In the form of the short story, however, this compression also intensifies the effect.

"The Complications of a Journey": The Comic Predicament of Migrant Life

Pressure at work, the unexpected holiday created by a shutdown in Bengal, memories of home, travel by night, rain, insecurity, social expectations in the village, and fear of absence from the office—all coexist in this story of a journey. What begins as a brief spell of leave becomes an apparently endless succession of obligations. The family calls the protagonist home, but salaried employment continues to hold him captive.

The formal problem of this work is its expansiveness: numerous episodes, interesting in themselves, sometimes dissipate the narrative tension. Even so, the sequence of events, the anticipations created by conversations with his wife, the obstacles along the road, and the delay caused by a wedding procession yield an authentic sense of the psychological divisions of migrant life. Comedy arises here from the impossible choice between livelihood and human relationships.

"The Wheel of Time": Inheritance, Property, and Labour

The story of Upendra, a fatherless boy, encompasses the acquisitiveness of relatives seeking inherited property, a family in crisis, and his advancement through education and hard work. The boy's vulnerable social position is transformed into a narrative of self-making. The conduct of his kinsmen and the dispute over property rights provide significant clues to the social history of rural Mithila.

By the end, the protagonist's economic and social standing has become secure. Moral recompense is evident in this structure, while the multilayered examination of power within the struggle remains comparatively restricted. Yet the insistence that labour and education matter more than inherited wealth is a sensitive indication of contemporary social change.

"An Ideal Marriage": The Market in Dowry and the Resistance of Youth

The wealthy Narayan Babu seeks to "recover" the money spent on his daughter's marriage through the marriage of his son. Having reached an agreement with the bride's family, he decides to stop the wedding when the remaining payment is not received. At this decisive moment, his son Rajan opposes paternal authority, returns the money exchanged, and insists on a marriage without dowry.

The story employs a dramatic public declaration to oppose a pernicious social custom. Its strength is that resistance arises within the household itself; its limitation is that the complex social institution of dowry appears to be resolved immediately by the moral courage of one conscientious young man. Nevertheless, in the historical circumstances of the story, the public significance of such a scene in challenging the normalisation of dowry cannot be denied.

"The Fruits of Benevolence": Irony and Moral Steadfastness

People who have benefited from Hari Babu's generosity conspire against him, and a violent robbery results in the death of his son Vinay. His family advises him to stop helping others, but he refuses to abandon his commitment to benevolence. The title turns the customary expectation that good deeds yield good rewards into tragic irony.

The story's deeper question concerns the possibility of practising virtue in a society without justice. The storyteller presents Hari Babu's moral resolve as a supreme human value. Critically, there is little political or economic exploration of the relationship between violence and benevolence, while the villains are reduced to social types. Even so, the tragic conclusion raises the story above the level of easy moral instruction.

"The Industry of a Millionaire": The Reversal of Ridicule

A quarrel over a water queue in a Maithil-dominated neighbourhood of Delhi produces a mocking nickname for a married couple. The derisive term "millionaire" subsequently becomes an indication of actual achievement through the protagonist's work. The story exploits urban scarcity, public discipline, and the humour of social naming.

Its weakness is that the wife's conduct is interpreted through gender stereotypes, while the final turn from labour to spectacular wealth is rather simplified. Nevertheless, the transformation of public mockery into a sign of economic advancement remains entertaining.

"The Dignity of Maithili": Public Reading Culture in the Village

Structured around a telephone conversation, this brief work imagines rural public spaces—the barber's shop, tea stall, and library—as centres for the dissemination of language and literature. A character explains that Maithili magazines can be present not only in the city but also in communal gatherings in villages. The point of the story is not official recognition but the making of readers.

The narrative tension is very slight; the piece becomes almost a scene expressing a commitment to language. Yet this brief exchange contains a democratic dream of modern Maithili public life: literature should not remain the exclusive possession of an educated elite.

"A Happy Coincidence": Wedding Arrangements, Cooperation, and Chance

In this extended narrative, the arrangements for a family wedding, the difficulty of obtaining leave from employment, experiences of the village, demands of kinship, financial management, and the uncertainties of a wedding procession intertwine. Unexpected circumstances eventually open the possibility of a new relationship. The story offers a detailed portrait of the invisible organisational labour of family life.

The living detail of small practical decisions is invaluable: who must be informed, who must be approached, who will take charge of a task, and how the expectations of the other family will be met. When these matters become too expansive, the narrative centre can lose its firmness. In this work the boundary between fiction and personal reminiscence appears to become deliberately indistinct.

"The Duty of the Age": The Fire of the Village Hearth and the Coldness of Relationships

Bitter winter weather, the communal fire in a village, collective conversation, and Lalbihari's neglect by his family form an especially successful narrative arrangement. There is warmth in the fire outside, but the coldness of ingratitude within the family. An elder brother who has sacrificed for the education and establishment of his younger brothers receives neglect in return.

The shared scene in the spacious village veranda gives the story's moral conflict a locally embodied sensibility. The final silence leaves room for several interpretations; this openness is an example of the writer's relatively mature narrative craft. Here, the language of social responsibility emerges through scene and silence more than through authorial commentary.

"The Fruits of Arrogance": Local Power and Social Retaliation

Bachchi Babu's economic dominance and insulting behaviour bring about his social isolation. A minor dispute becomes a legal battle, and, when he fails to obtain society's support, his power weakens. The title itself anticipates the moral direction of the ending.

The work approaches a concise parable: the punishment of pride. It gives little scrutiny to how justifiable the community's collective retaliation may itself be. Yet this short story effectively distinguishes the power of wealth from social esteem.

A Separate Consideration of the Verse: Song, Mourning, and Resistance

The collection's verse is varied. There are public pronouncements in free rhythm, songs with recurring refrains, memorial lyrics, invocations of the Goddess, and the humour and playfulness of Holi. By contemporary critical standards, it would be mistaken to categorise all these works either as "great poetry" or as "mere propaganda songs." Their achievements emerge through separate examinations of subject, rhythm, linguistic energy, and communal purpose.

"On the New Year" and "A Traveller on an Endless Journey": The Public Expression of Bereavement

Identified as the author's first published work, "On the New Year" remembers the deceased Lalit Babu against the background of collective New Year celebrations. The collision between a fresh beginning in time and the absence of an individual generates the poem's central emotional tension. "A Traveller on an Endless Journey" brings together memories of the creative work of Yatri-Nagarjun and questions of his social recognition.

In both poems death signifies not merely private grief but a sense of cultural diminishment. Yet at certain points direct expressions of praise limit the development of poetic metaphor. Despite this restriction, the historical sensibility remains important.

"The Burden of the Earth," "What an Achievement," and "Irony": Critical Voices from Within the Community

"The Burden of the Earth" registers anger against the short lives of literary institutions, selfishness, and ingratitude. "What an Achievement" reveals the strange coexistence of public success and a hunger for credit. "Irony" sharpens the critical impulse in a socio-political setting. In all three poems the speaker is not an observer outside the community but a participant wounded from within it.

The poetic language of these works is declarative. Direct address and an interrogative rhythm make them suitable for public recitation, but a density of distinctive imagery is not found everywhere. The historical value of the writer's anger and the aesthetic limitations of its expression must both be acknowledged.

"A New Song": The Refrain Against Corruption

In "A New Song," a recurring refrain becomes a voice for public utterance; the corruption of political leaders and officials, inflation, unequal distribution, and the helplessness of ordinary people provide its themes. The editorial note also raises the question of the work's generic classification as a song. This context demonstrates an important principle: a metrical designation or genre label does not in itself establish poetic form. One must examine the internal rhythm, refrain, repetitions, and capacity for performance.

"Phagua," "An Aarti for the Queen of Brides," and "Gifts of Love at Holi": The Plurality of Celebration

"Phagua" evokes the season, colour, food, music, and communal togetherness. In "An Aarti for the Queen of Brides," the gestures of devotional worship are transformed into domestic affection and festive humour; its chief artistic device is the playful adaptation of religious language. "Gifts of Love at Holi" consists of a sequence of brief addresses written to particular individuals, making the festival an occasion for recording social relationships.

The value of these works lies not only in elevated poetic criteria but also in their living use within Maithili public culture. The list of names in "Gifts of Love at Holi," in particular, may be read as a small archive of Kolkata's social networks.

"A Literary Lamp," "Tribute," and "Song of Mourning": Poetry as the Preservation of Memory

In these poems a tribute is not simply an outpouring of emotion; it is also a record of a departed literary worker's labours and an acknowledgement of the community's debt. In "A Literary Lamp," the conventional symbol of the lamp expresses the continuity of literary dedication. In "Tribute," the arrangement according to the letters of a name becomes a formal technique for mourning. "Song of Mourning" joins recollections of cultural symbols and events to the campaign for recognition of Maithili.

The combination of memoiristic information and emotional intensity is valuable, but the autonomy of poetry is sometimes burdened by the weight of factual reference. For readers today, these poems are simultaneously literature and documents of remembrance.

Two Forms of "Invocation to Bhagavati": Folk Devotion and Self-Examination

The invocations to Bhagavati collected in two different places are characterised by surrender, confession of sin, expressions of suffering, and faith in the Mother Goddess. Here the language of traditional devotional poetry makes room for modern social anxieties and personal distress. Repeated forms of address create a rhythm oriented towards an audience.

The literary importance of these two poems lies not in a new philosophical doctrine but in the local adaptation of emotion. Between private vulnerability and the Goddess's public image, the poems form a bridge to the religious sensibility of the community.

"Some People," "This Is Not a Proper View," and "Maithili Speaks to Her Children": Poems of Dissent

"Some People" raises questions of world peace and violence; "This Is Not a Proper View" directly addresses differences of literary and ideological opinion; in "Maithili Speaks to Her Children," the mother tongue acquires a voice of her own and questions her children. The personification of language in the last work opens up a particularly effective possibility of poetic form.

All three works display a firm desire to awaken the community's critical conscience. Nevertheless, rather than treating a statement about contemporary politics as poetry merely because it is expressed in verse, one must assess its poetic complexity, irony, and internal voices. The author's commitment is beyond doubt, but commitment cannot itself substitute for craft.

"Accept This Loving Embrace" and "The Maithili Festival": Different Moments in the Public Sphere

"Accept This Loving Embrace" combines the beauty of spring, domestic romance, and the occasion of Holi. An editorial indication that the poem has appeared under a different title raises an interesting issue of textual transmission: the same work may have circulated under different names. "The Maithili Festival" gives song form to the community's delight at Maithili securing a place in the Constitution.

The first poem employs the folk idiom of private attraction; the second is a celebratory song honouring a public accomplishment. In both, simple language structured around a refrain lends itself to communal recitation. The comparison reveals the place of Mishra's poetry in both private and collective celebrations.

An Integrated Assessment Through Poetics and Narratology

In Nabonarayan Mishra's stories, the plot often leads towards the moral consequences of individual conduct. The child's emotional question in "A Ripe Mango," the public resistance in "An Ideal Marriage," and the punishment enacted in "The Fruits of Arrogance" represent three different models of moral resolution. Compared with these, "The Duty of the Age" is a more substantial poetic achievement: the conjunction of nature description, spatial composition, and a character's silence produces meaning more multiple than a plainly articulated lesson.

From the perspective of rasa, humour, pathos, indignation, and devotion are all present. The humour of "Such Things Happen Too" rests on an unexpected revelation; the pathos of "The Fruits of Benevolence" on moral steadfastness; the comedy of "An Aarti for the Queen of Brides" on the adaptation of a familiar ritual form; and the pathos of "The Duty of the Age" on contrasting images of heat and cold. In terms of dhvani, or suggestion, the effect is greatest when the author allows the scene to do its work instead of stating the conclusion.

In the stories, the natural ease of Maithili dialogue, social forms of address, and descriptions of domestic conduct create authenticity. Yet the author's explanatory sentences often restrict the characters' independence. With fewer concluding moral remarks, the irony already present in these narratives might have become more intense. In the poems, the rhythm of song is often comparatively spontaneous, whereas the weight of assertion is more visible in free verse.

An assessment of female characters reveals a tension. On one side, the child's rejection of a father's divisive attitudes, a young man's resistance to dowry, and references to women's active participation in theatre open progressive possibilities. On the other, some stories confine the wife to the stereotype of a quarrelsome woman or a source of domestic pressure. This contradiction illuminates the coexistence of tradition and reformist morality in Mishra's creative practice.

Comparative Discussion in Relation to the History of Maithili Literature

One influential current in the writing of Maithili literary history proceeds through Vidyapati, Jyotirishwar, the development of modern prose, Yatri-Nagarjun, Harimohan Jha, Rajkamal Chaudhary, and newer literary movements. Its central concern is the language and craft of literary works and the intellectual innovations of their authors. Nabonarayan Mishra does not simply add another writer to this tradition; he changes the questions posed by history. What part do institutions, performances, editors, book distribution, and reading communities play in keeping literature alive?

In a comparison of narrative technique, Harimohan Jha's social humour displays a more sustained psychological satire, while Nabonarayan's "Such Things Happen Too" offers brief comedy built on a visual mistake. The democratic poetry of Yatri-Nagarjun displays a marked multiplicity of meaning in both language and satire, whereas Nabonarayan's political verse often remains close to immediate public declaration. This comparison is not a claim about influence or imitation, but a critical means of understanding differences of form.

In the theatrical tradition associated with Mahendra Malangia, playwriting represents an autonomous creative practice. In the case of Kokil Manch, Nabonarayan's significance extends beyond the written play to performance, organisation, and the cultivation of an audience. To regard this as a lesser contribution would be a one-sided view of literary history. "What was performed on the stage?" and "How was the stage made possible?" are equally necessary questions.

Kolkata emerges as a distinctive centre in the diasporic geography of Maithili literature. Connections among employment, printing, higher education, institutions, book distribution, movements, and theatre give Maithili literature its public shape in the city. Nabonarayan's prose presents Kolkata not simply as a site of the pain of migration but as a centre of cultural labour and creative possibility. In doing so, the collection challenges the artificial division between "Maithili literature" and "the Maithili movement."

The Videha project of parallel literary history accords importance to the study of neglected writers, little magazines, folk literature, theatre, and linguistic diversity. The collection enters into a natural dialogue with this critical framework, but the two should not be treated as identical. Every claim requires renewed scrutiny according to the criteria of historical evidence, textual form, and social representation.

Literary Journalism, Institutions, and the Evidentiary Structure of Historiography

In the collection, Mithila Mihir, Mithila Darshan, Akhar, Karnamrit, and other magazines appear not merely as titles but as institutions of communal memory. Continuity in the publication of journals, editorial labour, the content of individual issues, and the cultivation of readers together become constituent elements of a language movement. A literary history concerned only with celebrated books in print deprives periodicals of their contribution.

Historical investigation, however, should not give every kind of evidence the same standing. The writer's direct participation, an interviewee's recollection, an editor's introduction, a record of an event, and a later reminiscence each have different conditions of reliability. In using the collection, chronology, alternative memories, and the actual existence of specific publications need to be independently checked. Such caution does not diminish the collection's importance; it more clearly differentiates the categories of evidence.

Questions of social inclusion are also essential to a critical reading of institutional history. Which performers' names recur? How visible are women actors, technical assistants, volunteer organisers, Dalit and backward communities, and ordinary members of the audience? The silences of a record that names particular people are themselves subjects for history. From this perspective the collection inspires further social and cultural scholarship.

Editorial Achievement and Textual Caution

The most significant achievement of Ashish Anchinhar's editorial labour is the preservation of dispersed material. Bringing together personal essays, memorial volumes, periodicals, interviews, earlier publications, and difficult-to-obtain writings constitutes a major convenience for readers and researchers. In the editor's introduction, he also acknowledges that information about the first publication of the material is not uniformly available and that additional writings may come to light.

A subsequent critical edition should assemble, in a consistent form, the year of first publication of each work, the relevant magazine issue, variants of original titles, dates of composition, and information about republication. Comparative documentation of the relationship between apparently similar poems published under different titles, the sequence of works, multiple accounts of the same event, and conflicting evidence about institutional dates would prove particularly useful.

Rather than relying on verbatim quotation, this review adopts a contextual analysis of characters, sequences of events, interview topics, and ideas. Since the textual forms of the available works have not always remained uniformly stable, direct quotations have been avoided where the precise original wording could not be established beyond doubt. The aim of this restraint is to protect historical reliability.

Overall Evaluation: Achievements, Limitations, and Future Possibilities

Nabonarayan Mishra's literary achievement operates on three principal levels. First, he gives words to the history of labour and events within Maithili cultural institutions. Second, he creates effective situations of moral contradiction in short fiction and social episodes. Third, through poems and songs, he voices feelings about language and community. Among these, the essays and interviews hold a particularly distinctive place, since the author's direct participation reveals the neglected history of the world he describes.

In the fiction, the compact moral question of “A Ripe Mango,” the laughter of “Such Things Happen Too,” the resistance of “An Ideal Marriage,” the tragic persistence of “The Fruits of Benevolence,” and the silence of “The Duty of the Age” deserve special notice. “The Complications of a Journey” and “A Happy Coincidence” are engaging in their wealth of lived experience, but their narrative structure is less taut. The intensely public nature of the poetry makes it effective as historical testimony, though its poetic complexity is uneven.

The collection's intellectual limitations are principally visible in the tendency towards simple moral resolutions, excessive reverence, and certain conventional stereotypes of social relations. The author's attachment to his mother tongue is powerful; yet a wider space for literary disagreement, alternative viewpoints, and marginal experiences would have made the portrait more comprehensive. The purpose of this criticism is not to devalue the contribution but to determine its proper contours.

Ultimately, Nabonarayan Mishra Samagra is more than a measure of a single writer's independent literary achievement: it is part of the collective autobiography of the Maithili-speaking public sphere. Its true value will emerge when Maithili literary history is written through the relationships among the city's stages, institutional meetings, magazine editors, unacknowledged workers, village readers, folktales, and language movements. The book is not merely a static monument to the past; it also presents a set of research questions for the future.

Extended Bibliography

Mishra, Nabonarayan. Nabonarayan Mishra Samagra [The Complete Works of Nabonarayan Mishra]. Edited by Ashish Anchinhar. Maithili, 2026. Primary text for this study.

Anchinhar, Ashish. "A Journey: A Writer Who Does Not Long to Become a Writer." Editorial introduction to Nabonarayan Mishra Samagra, 2026.

Mishra, Nabonarayan. "An Interview with Kishorikant Mishra"; "An Interview with Ramlochan Thakur"; "An Interview with Dr Virendra Mallik." In Nabonarayan Mishra Samagra, edited by Ashish Anchinhar, 2026.

Mishra, Nabonarayan. "Ramlochan Thakur as I See Him"; "A Man of His Age: Shri Rajnandan Lal Das"; "Rajnandan Lal Das, an Epoch-Making Figure"; "A Resolute Advocate of Mithila and Maithili: Professor Prabodh Babu"; "Sagarji, Endowed with Every Virtue." Nabonarayan Mishra Samagra, 2026.

Mishra, Nabonarayan. "Mithila Vikas Parishad, Kolkata: As I Saw It"; "A Hero of the Maithili Movement: Pitambar Pathak"; "The Maithili Movement in Calcutta and Mithila Darshan"; "Smriti Akhar"; "On Babu Saheb Chaudhary." Nabonarayan Mishra Samagra, 2026.

Mishra, Nabonarayan. "Maithili Folktales"; "Mithila Mihir and the Editor"; "Ajay Singh, an Exceptional Well-Wisher of Maithili"; "Hari Is Infinite, and Infinite Are His Stories"; "Maithili Theatre and Kolkata." Nabonarayan Mishra Samagra, 2026.

Mishra, Nabonarayan. "Such Things Happen Too"; "A Ripe Mango"; "The Complications of a Journey"; "The Wheel of Time"; "An Ideal Marriage"; "The Fruits of Benevolence"; "The Industry of a Millionaire"; "The Dignity of Maithili"; "A Happy Coincidence"; "The Duty of the Age"; "The Fruits of Arrogance." Fiction section of Nabonarayan Mishra Samagra, 2026.

Mishra, Nabonarayan. "On the New Year"; "The Burden of the Earth"; "What an Achievement"; "A New Song"; "Irony"; "A Traveller on an Endless Journey"; "Phagua"; "An Aarti for the Queen of Brides"; "A Literary Lamp"; "Tribute." Poetry section of Nabonarayan Mishra Samagra, 2026.

Mishra, Nabonarayan. "Invocation to Bhagavati" (two poems); "Some People"; "Accept This Loving Embrace"; "This Is Not a Proper View"; "Maithili Speaks to Her Children"; "The Maithili Festival"; "Song of Mourning"; "Gifts of Love at Holi." Poetry section of Nabonarayan Mishra Samagra, 2026.

Videha. Bibliographical entry for Nabonarayan Mishra Samagra. Videha Archive of Maithili Books. https://videha-ejournal.github.io/videha/pothi.htm

Videha. Prose catalogue entry for Nabonarayan Mishra Samagra. Videha Prose Resources. https://videha-ejournal.github.io/videha/prose.htm

Videha. Author biography of Nabonarayan Mishra and information about his theatrical work. Videha Ratna Catalogue. https://videha-ejournal.github.io/videha/ratna.htm

Videha. Research bibliography on Maithili literature, theatre, folk literature, language, and criticism. https://videha-ejournal.github.io/videha/research/index.html

Videha. “Videha Research Articles: Issues 1–451.” Research compilation with entries on criticism and literary history. https://videha-ejournal.github.io/videha/research/videha-scholar-research-book.html

Mishra, Nabonarayan. “My Reminiscences with Ramanji.” Videha, issue 448, 15 August 2026; independently listed in the Videha research bibliography. https://videha-ejournal.github.io/videha/research/index.html

Videha. “Ramlochan Thakur Special Issue.” Issue 319, 1 April 2021; according to the publication information for the author's essay reprinted in the collected volume. Videha Issue Archive.

Videha. “Rajnandan Lal Das Special Issue.” Issue 333, 1 November 2021; according to the publication information for the essay reprinted in the collected volume. Videha Issue Archive.

Videha. “Lakshman Jha Sagar Special Issue.” Issue 382, 15 November 2023; according to the publication information for the essay reprinted in the collected volume. Videha Issue Archive.

Videha. “Mithila Vikas Parishad Special Issue.” Issue 408, 15 December 2024; according to the publication information for the essay reprinted in the collected volume. Videha Issue Archive.

Videha. Series of essays on critical approaches to Maithili theatre; research on a play by Kunal, as listed in the Videha research bibliography. https://videha-ejournal.github.io/videha/research/index.html

REVIEW 2

THE INDEPENDENT SPIRIT: ARVIND THAKUR

A Polyphonic Reading of the Writer and His Work

Book under review: Swatantracheta: Arvind Thakur—Vyaktitva-Krititva (The Independent Spirit: Arvind Thakur—Life and Work) · Edited by Ashish Anchinhar · Shashi Prakashan, Supaul · First edition: 2020 · ISBN 978-81-948818-0-3

Abstract

Swatantracheta, edited by Ashish Anchinhar, is not an ordinary volume of praise devoted to a literary personality. It is a critical document assembling numerous voices concerning Arvind Thakur's writings, social presence, intellectual dissent, and reception among his contemporaries. Developed from a special issue of Videha devoted to Arvind Thakur, it brings critical essays on fiction, poetry, and ghazals into dialogue with an interview, reminiscences, autobiographical reflections, and a brief biography. Literary value and the very process through which a literary personality is constructed are consequently brought under scrutiny. This study analyses the collection's editorial design; separately examines the political and social narrative technique of the story collection Anharak Virodh Me (Against the Darkness), the people's perspective in the poems of Parti Tuti Rahal Achhi (The Fallow Land Is Breaking), and the debate over the formal identity of the ghazals in Bahurupiya Pradesh Me (In a Province of Disguises). Its principal purpose is to examine the interrelations of village life, ideological resistance, stylistic experiment, and a parallel culture of publication within literary history. The overall conclusion is that the collection's chief significance lies not in producing an unquestionable monument to one writer, but in preserving the agreements, disagreements, and critical incompleteness within its own pages.

Keywords: Arvind Thakur; Swatantracheta; Ashish Anchinhar; Videha; criticism of fiction; rural consciousness; Maithili ghazal; communalism; resistance; literary history.

The Nature of the Book and the Basis of This Review

It would be a fundamental error to read Swatantracheta as a new original collection of Arvind Thakur's poems, stories, or ghazals. Rather, it is an edited volume comprising the evaluations of numerous critics of his creative life, the writer's own statements, and the memories of those who knew him closely. A critic approaching this volume must remain attentive to two levels of enquiry: the value of the author's creative work and the value of the critical assumptions formed around that work. At the first level, one asks what social conflicts the fiction presents, what kinds of folk language the poetry employs, and what formal discipline governs the ghazals. At the second, one asks what theoretical presuppositions the critics bring to their readings and where personal proximity to the writer strengthens or weakens criticism.

The volume's editorial history is decisive for literary historiography. It evolved in 2020 from a Videha special issue devoted to Arvind Thakur, originally published in 2015. The editorial introduction explicitly states that some original works were removed and replaced with later criticism and memoirs. Thus the magazine special issue and the subsequent book do not contain precisely the same texts. To call the latter merely a reprint would obscure the editor's active role in selection. This distinction matters in literary documentation, for the changing contents of the collection reveal how the writer's reception, rereading, and evaluation evolved over time.

The present study reads the collection's contents in relation to the original critical essays published in Videha. Where a collected essay makes a claim about an original creative work, that claim is not treated as a substitute for evidence established through direct reading of the work itself. Such caution is necessary: the argument for a writer's significance must be sustained not by an imposing critical sentence alone, but by the described plot structure, characterisation, linguistic texture, and disagreements among critics.

Editorial Architecture: A Polyphonic Critical Archive Rather Than a Biography

The editor arranges the volume in the order of criticism, interview, reminiscences, autobiographical statement, and concise biography. Within the critical material, essays on fiction, the social functions of poetry, debates about ghazals, and reflections on the relationship between personality and work stand together. These are followed by an interview conducted by Munnaji; reminiscences by Binay Bhushan, Shailendra Anand, Ajit Azad, and others; and finally the writer's autobiographical statement and life sketch. The sequence creates a reading journey from external evaluation towards the writer's inward self-examination.

This design turns a creative writer into material for historical study, but it carries certain risks. Memoirs are shaped by closeness, affection, and selective remembrance; criticism should be governed primarily by standards of evaluation. To read both in the same emotional register may weaken analytical rigour. Yet memoirs also bring to light dimensions of society, editing, magazine publication, agrarian culture, and literary networks in the Kosi region that cannot be recovered from the dry chronology of literary history. The book's strength lies in preserving these generic differences within a single volume.

The editorial introduction also acknowledges that the writer's role as a critic and thinker has not been adequately represented. Rather than concealing the volume's limitations, this admission establishes questions for future research. When numerous commentaries on a writer's fiction and ghazals survive but his independent critical thought is comparatively underrepresented, any portrayal of his intellectual world will inevitably remain incomplete. In this instance, the book's self-acknowledged limits become a foundation for new historical enquiry.

The Grammar of Resistance: Darkness Is a System, Not an Event

In a critical reading of Arvind Thakur's fictional world, “darkness” cannot be understood simply as an emblem of ordinary despair or the natural night. It encompasses power, social prejudice, divisions of caste and religious community, inequalities of justice, and individual inaction. Thus the title of Anharak Virodh Me (Against the Darkness) is not merely a metaphorical gesture; it is an intellectual thread joining diverse social conditions. Dr Yoganand Jha, Gajendra Thakur, and Ashish Chaman identify this thread in different ways, but their essays do not arrive at a single judgement.

One aspect of darkness concerns the moral degradation of public life; another concerns the doubt, fear, and helplessness that such degradation awakens in the individual. Resistance here does not mean only declarative indignation. A crucial distinction separates the circumstances a character can understand from the capacity that character possesses to escape them. Literary achievement arises when the writer does more than identify one side as virtuous and the other as wicked—when the work also reveals how the social order generates such divisions.

At times, the critics represented in the collection accord greater importance to a story's ideological commitment than to the possibility of complex characterisation or artistic uncertainty. This essay argues that resistance-centred fiction becomes socially meaningful when its causal relationships and artistic evidence remain credible. To predetermine a moral answer risks reducing fiction to an illustration of an idea.

A Separate Reading of "Khissa Siyar Yar": Political Satire

The very title Khissa Siyar Yar suggests that the human character of political power will be examined through animal imagery. Dr Yoganand Jha identifies various embodiments of party-based self-interest, the desire for electoral nominations, flattery, and political opportunism. Ashish Chaman connects its political moment with the earlier "lantern era"; Gajendra Thakur's analysis foregrounds the discrepancy between public morality and partisan behaviour. In the three-way dialogue among these readings, the story becomes more than a satire on one political party: it portrays a wider crisis in political culture.

The principal mechanism of satire is the gap between what the characters say and what they do. Leaders who speak in the language of principles behave differently when personal office, their children's employment, recommendations, or calculations of political support are at stake. By converting such duplicity into accessible irony, the story discloses the unreliability of public language. Yet the number of characters and the transparency of the allegory sometimes risk turning the fiction into a gallery of social types. If every character remains only a representative of a political vice, independent psychological life may disappear.

Comparison with Harimohan Jha's humour in the Maithili satirical tradition may be useful, but it would be wrong to regard the two as identical kinds of comedy. Harimohan Jha's satire is notably concerned with social conventions, learned mockery, and domestic contradictions of personality. The political humour discernible in the criticism of this story is more direct, hostile to opportunism, and focused on public authority. Laughter becomes a means of recognising the betrayal of society's reformist ideals.

A Separate Reading of "Piyasal Pani": The Moral Double Standard Imposed on Women

Piyasal Pani (Thirsting Water) appears to be one of the collection's most consequential stories. The social judgement of Narayanpurwali's life is shaped by patriarchal authority, a double standard in sexual restraint, economic dependence, and rumour. Dr Yoganand Jha foregrounds the woman's psychological pain and the workings of collective persecution; Ashish Chaman raises a pointed question about the hypocrisy of the society that observes and judges her. Male incapacity is concealed while a woman's conduct becomes a matter of public accusation. This is the ethical centre of the narrative arrangement.

Analytically, the story does more than seek to arouse pity. Its structure of knowledge is crucial: what readers and characters initially believe about Narayanpurwali is overturned by information revealed later. This reversal makes the very process of judgement in a misogynistic society suspect. By delaying the disclosure of truth, the narrative challenges the reader's already-formed conclusions. In this sense, the story's form becomes part of the social criticism it seeks to articulate.

But the inquiry does not end there. If the woman's innocence is ultimately established through proof of the man's biological incapacity, to what extent does the story affirm her independent desire or autonomous existence on their own terms? Its rebuttal of social accusations is powerful, yet the full scope of the woman's voice and capacity for decision remains open to critical examination. Such a double evaluation makes the story more meaningful than a simplified triumphal narrative of women's emancipation.

A Separate Reading of the Title Story: The Difficult Politics of Communal Harmony

The title story, "Against the Darkness," sets the everyday social relations between Hindus and Muslims against political incitement. In Dr Yoganand Jha's account, Ranjan's entrance into a Muslim neighbourhood, anger at Alimuddin's crime, and the intentions of those seeking communal division produce conflicting meanings from a single event. Social relationships appear here as a lived formation preceding religious categorisation, while violence becomes a political attempt to fracture that formation.

The central narrative tension lies in the distinction between individual responsibility for a crime and the collective stigma imposed upon an entire community. Protecting the criminal and blaming the whole community are both forms of injustice. Artistically, this situation succeeds when the characters' fear, anger, affection, and moral decisions become simultaneously intelligible. The critical essays regard this tension as a foundation for social coexistence.

Still, a reading opposed to communalism cannot rest on a poignant ending or an elevated declaration alone. It must also ask how local power, the marketplace, rumour, and public opinion create the conditions for violence. The political strength of a story centred on fraternity resides in its inclusion of this complex reality; otherwise, the message of harmony may outweigh the narrative's insight.

A Separate Reading of "Dhancha-1992" and "Prajatantra Parikatha": Opposed Strategies of Narrative

Dhancha-1992 (Structure—1992) invokes a historically devastating moment in Indian public life. Ashish Chaman attaches particular importance to the story's epistolary form, while Dr Yoganand Jha emphasises the event's social and psychological consequences and the damage done to communal trust. The use of the letter as a narrative medium allows a major political event to be viewed through individual anxiety, guilt, and private perspective. The letter-writer's limited knowledge itself becomes an instrument of meaning.

Prajatantra Parikatha (A Democratic Fable) centres on a cycle involving public protest, the murder of a doctor, an administrative response, and the moral hijacking of the movement. The reviewers' accounts distinguish the original crime, the crowd that gathers to protest against it, and the group that exploits the opportunity from within that crowd. The story exposes the ethical ambiguity of collective action: not every procession is just, and not every act of administrative repression can be justified as a defence of public welfare.

Read together, the two stories raise an essential question about democracy: when is the collective voice of the people an act of just resistance, and when does it become an instrument of political self-interest? In the first, memories of communal violence enter personal utterance; in the second, a private crime becomes the occasion for public action. This reversed relationship deepens the fictional world's intellectual force. Read separately, the stories might otherwise seem like unrelated political commentaries.

A Separate Reading of "Mus" and "Ayyasi": Labour, Shame, and Self-Deception

Ashish Chaman's interpretation of the stories Mus (Mouse) and Ayyasi (Indulgence) is interesting because he treats them not as distinct moral exempla but as potentially complementary narratives. In one, middle-class desires for consumption collide with the household's necessities; in the other, debt, ancestral property, the inability to find work, and questions of production emerge. Together they reveal a conflict between the immediate consumption of pleasure and the longer-term significance of labour.

The symbolism of Mus is particularly important. The critical essays read the mouse as an image of industrious life and the snake as a force that takes possession of the fruits of labour. Yet the metaphor is not confined to one meaning: the mouse's tenacity also brings the individual to an awareness of his own inertia. Political and personal ethical meanings are thus present together. A character who recognises an exploitative structure cannot thereby be absolved of responsibility for his own conduct.

The strength of this pair of stories lies less in their final exemplary lessons than in the psychological interval during which a character, having continually blamed his circumstances for failure, becomes a critic of his own decisions. Nevertheless, to proclaim labour a sufficient moral solution risks obscuring social capital, unequal access to resources, and the structural obstacles of unemployment. Attentive examination of these matters helps preserve the necessary distance between didactic fiction and social realism.

A Separate Reading of Caste Opportunism, the Chameleon, and the Poison of Justice

In Baikba-Phorba and Ath Girgit Gatha, the instability of political identity and the manoeuvres of organised self-interest occupy the foreground. In the former, a dispute over a personal loan becomes a collective conflict organised along caste lines; in the latter, mutual hostility turns into alliance at the moment of electoral calculation. Both situations suggest that ideological declarations made in the name of organisation are internally driven by calculations of private advantage. The chameleon becomes a visible emblem of the political body that changes its colours.

A distinctive feature of these stories is that references to caste, though necessary for recognising social injustice, are not invariably deployed in good faith. In the episodes under discussion, the language of caste humiliation becomes a weapon for transforming a conflict over economic interests into a quarrel between two groups. Criticism must nevertheless avoid dismissing the real history of caste oppression as nothing more than a manoeuvre of opportunistic politicians. Fiction gains in balance when it distinguishes actual inequality from its political exploitation.

In Vish-Pan (Drinking Poison), the protracted legal process, the power of money, the instability of testimony, and the condition of a defeated litigant become significant. In Dr Yoganand Jha's account, the relationship between Gopalji and Chaturanan acquires a different balance of power upon entering the courts. The fictional world consequently calls into question not only individual morality but also the workings of institutions. The agent of social injustice may sometimes be a villainous character and sometimes the legal process itself. The story's realism expands with this shift.

The Ground of Poetry: Parti Tuti Rahal Achhi and the Resistant Memory of the Soil

The title Parti Tuti Rahal Achhi (The Fallow Land Is Breaking) is itself an agricultural symbol of social transformation. Fallow land denotes a condition of stasis, infertility, or the absence of prospects; breaking it suggests new labour, seed, and confidence in the future. Munnaji's essay links this agrarian metaphor with the development of the poetry and the writer's rural sensibility. Arvind Srivastava emphasises the poems' courage in opposing power and their movement beyond a feudal environment towards solidarity with ordinary people.

Poetic achievement cannot be measured by the vehemence of expressed opposition alone. When objects of everyday life, idioms of local speech, and agrarian experience move beyond immediate utility to become symbols within a poem, poetry is transformed from social documentation into art. Fallow land, cultivators, seed, labour, and the seasonal cycle establish active relationships of meaning. The poem's metaphor turns neglected soil towards new hope; yet the ethical credibility of that hope depends on its not concealing the farmer's actual insecurity and inequality.

Several critics discuss the relationship between the writer's inherited family commitment to socialism and his own social experience. Yet the quality of literary creation does not automatically follow from a family's ideology. For literary history, ancestry is context rather than evidence of artistic worth. A poem becomes valuable through its words, imagery, rhythm, and contradictions. Responsible criticism must examine artistic accomplishment alongside the writer's declared solidarity with the people.

Rural Vocabulary, the Kosi Region, and an Alternative Modernity

The observations of Munnaji, Arvind Mishra Neeraj, and other critics establish the significance of rural vocabulary in Arvind Thakur's language. To confer literary standing on spoken village words is not merely to apply local colour or ornament folk life. It raises the decisive question of who may speak in a narrative, how much recognition a person's experience receives in society, and which forms of language may enter the literary public sphere. The natural use of village expressions can challenge elite norms of literary value.

It would also be a mistake to equate rural life with the past. Agriculture, rivers, movement, markets, political competition, printing, and urban contact in the Kosi region belong to contemporary history. The crisis of modernity has necessarily reached the author's rural setting. In this sense, the division between village and city in Thakur's fiction is not immovable; it appears as an ongoing social and cultural exchange.

A comparison with the rural language-world of Jagdish Prasad Mandal is appropriate, but its limits must be specified. Both writers give regional speech a place in literary discussion; this broad similarity does not justify treating their aesthetic perspectives as identical. The criticism of Arvind's work presents a picture in which the vitality of rural language is bound to political dissent. Further comparison would require independent, detailed examination of sound, word order, and character speech in the original writings.

The Maithili Ghazal: The Conflict Between Thematic Freedom and Formal Discipline

The debate about Bahurupiya Pradesh Me is among the most valuable sources of disagreement in the entire volume. Jagdish Chandra Thakur “Anil” accepts the concept of the “free ghazal” in defence of the writer's unrestricted mode of expression. According to his account, the collection contains sixty-six ghazals; some depart from the traditional balance of radif and qafiya, yet their social concerns and use of the pen-name, or takhallus, remain significant. Omprakash Jha, on the other hand, asks why, once the designation “ghazal” has been adopted, an artistically justified departure from the obligatory principles of bahr and qafiya should not be clearly explained.

The disagreement cannot be settled by simply taking sides. A genre is identified through the formal disciplines of its history, but new experience continually shifts the limits of its expression. If the settled pattern of qafiya or the discipline of bahr is entirely discarded, should the work still be called a ghazal or instead a new form of couplet-based poetry? The answer does not follow merely from the author's declaration of freedom. Conversely, if poetic value is measured solely by established standards, the historical potential of new social language and expressive methods may be suppressed.

Anil's essay foregrounds the collection's creative urgency and social conscience; Omprakash Jha's centres on the internal principles by which a poetic genre is constituted. Each is a necessary corrective to the other. Acceptance of the first perspective alone risks relabelling formal negligence as creative freedom; acceptance of the second alone risks severing poetry from the social energies of language and meaning. Preserving this debate within the volume is an important editorial contribution.

Bahurupiya Pradesh Me: Metaphor, Market, and Civic Irony

The title Bahurupiya Pradesh Me (In a Province of Disguises) invites us to conceive of the modern political and social world as a region constantly changing its appearance and concealing its true face. Arvind Mishra Neeraj, Ram Chaitanya Dheeraj, and Jagdish Chandra Thakur "Anil" identify concerns with farmers, markets, parliamentary culture, and social inequality in the collection. Such choices of subject prevent the Maithili ghazal from remaining confined to romance, separation, or private soliloquy.

The ghazal couplet affords particular scope for formal compression and sharp reversals of meaning. Its small scale can be especially effective in political satire, since the reader suddenly encounters the contrary meaning of a familiar declaration. Yet not every satirical couplet is thereby a ghazal. Ideological sharpness, rhythmic discipline, and the semantic autonomy of the couplet must be assessed separately. The collection therefore demands equal attention to social purpose and metrical form.

In his criticism, Ram Chaitanya Dheeraj raises questions of philosophical unity and resistance to a consumerist market. His interpretation relocates the poet's political concerns within a spiritual and social debate. This is thought-provoking, but the poet's direct experience of class is not identical to the critic's aspiration towards philosophical unity. Here, the coexistence of distinct ideological readings enlarges the collection's intellectual range.

Position in Literary History: The Parallel Development of Maithili Fiction and the Ghazal

Discussions of modern Maithili literature often proceed through the narrative renaissance, social humour, representations of rural life, new poetry, and the development of newer genres. This collection devoted to Arvind Thakur's writings gives a distinct place in that history to the contribution of a writer from the Kosi region and to political subjects in short fiction. Beyond the general question of the influence of Hindi or other languages, the book makes it possible to investigate the representation of Maithili's own social and political vocabulary.

In discussing the epistolary structure of Dhancha-1992, Ashish Chaman refers to the letter-writing of Harimohan Jha and Rajkamal Chaudhary. The historical use of this comparison lies in its recognition that the letter form in modern Maithili is not a fixed comic genre: it can also bear tragic, social, and political sensibilities. Though the form remains similar, its emotional purpose may change. Before claiming originality for such a development, the actual textual variants and chronology of the original works must be independently examined.

The title Prajatantra Parikatha and its public subject matter may recall Phanishwarnath Renu's Parti Parikatha (Tale of the Fallow Land). Nevertheless, similarity of title cannot be treated as evidence of influence. Renu's novelistic "fallow land" encompasses an extensive social geography and collective movement, while the criticism of Arvind's story in this volume focuses on a shorter political allegory and immediate public reactions. This difference does not diminish literary history; rather, it clarifies the distinctions of scale and emotional force in narrative form.

Anil's essay refers to the grammatical projects concerned with the ghazal undertaken by Gajendra Thakur and Ashish Anchinhar. Against that background, the debate about formal freedom in Bahurupiya Pradesh Me becomes even sharper. A new genre enters literary history not solely through an author's desire but through collective disputes involving readers, editors, grammarians, and critics. Swatantracheta is therefore a document of generic history as well as the history of literary creation.

Arvind Thakur as a Thinker: Cultural Questions Beyond Poetry

Since most of the volume's critical material concerns fiction, poetry, and ghazals, it does not adequately cover his intellectual writings, a deficiency indicated by the editorial introduction. Yet essays available in the original Videha special issue, such as "The Future of the Cultural Movement in Mithila" and "Lakshminath Gosain: Tradition, Language, and the Nirgun Sensibility," demonstrate the author's interest in social movements, linguistic power, cultural structures, and the interpretation of tradition.

In "The Future of the Cultural Movement in Mithila," the writer examines society's professed disposition towards activism in the light of institutional self-interest and histories of support for power. The argument is forceful and controversial; it would be inappropriate to derive a definitive judgement about the entire past of Maithil society from it. It nevertheless establishes that the writer's politics does not consist merely of observations about political parties: it also takes the form of cultural self-criticism. The public hypocrisy condemned in his poetry and fiction becomes the object of intellectual analysis in this essay.

The essay on Lakshminath Gosain attempts to bring together the devotional tradition, the categories of nirgun and sagun, and regional cultural influence. When tracing an extensive social history, however, broad generalisations and insufficient discussion of sources can sometimes be discerned. Criticism of such writing should distinguish the author's cultural perspective from the evidentiary standing of his historical claims. Independent editing and a source-based rereading of the writer's critical prose are necessary future tasks for understanding the full extent of his work.

Interviews, Memoirs, and Autobiographical Statements: Many Memories, Not One Biography

The significance of an interview is not limited to the factual content of its questions and answers. The words in which an author narrates his life become part of a publicly constructed self-image. Placing the interview conducted by Munnaji between critical essays and reminiscences is an editorial decision that brings the writer's own account into contact with the accounts of his critics. But spoken recollections should not be treated as wholly impartial facts about past events: memory, selection, and self-defence can play their part.

The reminiscences offer varied portraits of family, literary companionship, magazines, social presence, and personal conduct. For the literary historian this material may supplement deficient institutional archives. Yet when a memoirist makes claims about the writer's greatness, personal affection must be distinguished from artistic evaluation. Different individuals recall different aspects of the author on the basis of their own experiences, and no single reminiscence is equivalent to a complete biography.

The very title of the autobiographical statement raises a question about self-identity. Read alongside the concerns with freedom, human dignity, and social contradictions present in the stories and poems, this self-interrogation reveals a dialogue between the writer's individual existence and his creative commitments. The literary importance of the statement lies more in the openness of the question than in any settled answer of self-vindication. Its presence in the volume enables readers to consider the writer independently of the praise or disagreements voiced by critics.

Between Criticism and Panegyric: The Collection's Internal Critical Tension

Some essays in the collection are written in the register of affectionate tribute, while others use the language of explicit judgement and objection. Such a duality is common in a special issue published to honour a living author, but it calls for analysis from a scholarly perspective. Critics who praise a story's moral purpose do not invariably assess its formal limitations with equal severity. By contrast, the debate over the ghazal brings questions of generic rules to the foreground, interrupting the easy flow of commendation.

Errors, narrative sequence, character behaviour, the adequacy of metaphor, and metrical principles are genuine questions for criticism. Ashish Chaman objects to aspects of plot sequence and character decision-making; Omprakash Jha challenges defects in ghazal form; and Anil defends freer experiments in language. The presence of all these positions in a single volume testifies to its plurality. A research article drawing only on passages of praise would damage the collection's real critical potential.

A memoir's celebration of a life and criticism's analytical practice are different literary activities. The volume must be evaluated while preserving that distinction. The idea of Arvind Thakur's authorial freedom can succeed only if readers, too, are free to interpret his writings independently, dissentingly, and on the basis of evidence. In this sense, the significance of the title Swatantracheta resides more in the critical disagreement preserved in the book than in the editor's declared image of the writer.

Reconsideration from the Perspective of Parallel Literary History

Mainstream literary histories frequently centre institutional awards, textbooks, and widely publicised works. Regional magazines, correspondence, informal literary associations, local publications, and little-discussed debates over genre are left on the margins. Swatantracheta, developed from a special issue of Videha, provides a useful resistance to this neglect. It documents not only the writer's works but also the small and large communities of criticism that took shape around them.

Yet the claim to a parallel history does not in itself confer authenticity. What makes it distinctive is the identification of sources, the preservation of dissenting evidence, the clarity of publication chronology, and comparative evaluation of local voices. By these standards, Swatantracheta is an important beginning, not a definitive biography. The differences in textual selection between the magazine and book, the absence of some original writings, the uneven depth of the criticism, and the personal character of the autobiographical statement mean that subsequent research will need to prepare separate collections of texts and reliable publication records.

The book demonstrates that literary history is not merely a catalogue of works but a dynamic interrelation of texts, readers, disputes, social memory, and editorial decisions. If this approach is developed further, the people's language of the Kosi region, the representation of marginalised experience, magazine-based debate, and generic innovation can receive a more balanced place in Maithili literary history.

Overall Judgement: Achievements, Limitations, and Subsequent Research

Swatantracheta's first achievement is to assemble a range of assessments of the relationships among the writer's fiction, poetry, ghazals, social thinking, and personality. Its second is to allow ideological agreement and formal disagreement to test rather than cancel each other. Its third is to make visible the relationship between everyday life in the Kosi region and the Maithili literary public sphere. Its fourth is to bring together criticism of fiction, reminiscences, and autobiographical statements within a multilayered exploration of literary biography.

Its limitations also warrant consideration. The contributors do not follow a common critical method; in several essays judgements are emotional; formal subtleties are sometimes overshadowed by the ideological aims of the fiction; and the writer's independent thinking receives relatively little representation. The absence of the complete original works also increases the reader's dependence on critical interpretation. Under these circumstances the volume is better regarded as a reasoned collection of evidence than as the final word.

Essential tasks for future research include comparison of editions of the story collections, compilation of a glossary of folk vocabulary in the poetry, metrical analysis of the ghazals in Bahurupiya Pradesh Me, examination of textual differences between the Videha special issue and the printed volume, and independent editing of the writer's critical prose. Such studies could develop comparative frameworks for female autonomy, caste and political identity, memories of communal violence, the agrarian economy, and regional linguistic rights.

Ultimately, Swatantracheta is meaningful because it presents a literary personality not merely through institutional prestige but through embattled words, critical disagreement, and intimate recollection. The proper way to read the collection is to preserve both respect for the author and independence of judgement. Its enduring value for Maithili literary history lies in the possibility of an open, verifiable, and polyphonic reading.

Bibliography

The references below are organised around the original collection, the essays it contains, and contemporary publications available in Videha. Different forms of the same book or essay should be read as distinct textual witnesses.

Primary Collection

Anchinhar, Ashish, ed. Swatantracheta: Arvind Thakur—Vyaktitva-Krititva [The Independent Spirit: Arvind Thakur—Life and Work]. 1st ed. Supaul: Shashi Prakashan, 2020. ISBN 978-81-948818-0-3.

Videha. “Arvind Thakur Special Issue.” Videha, issue 189, 1 November 2015. The special issue from which Swatantracheta was developed.

Works and Intellectual Writings of Arvind Thakur

Thakur, Arvind. Parti Tuti Rahal Achhi [The Fallow Land Is Breaking]. Poetry collection. Listed in the Videha book catalogue.

Thakur, Arvind. Anharak Virodh Me [Against the Darkness]. Story collection. Listed in the Videha book catalogue.

Thakur, Arvind. Bahurupiya Pradesh Me [In a Province of Disguises]. Ghazal collection. Listed in the Videha book catalogue.

Thakur, Arvind. Min Tulsipat Par. Ghazal collection. Listed in the Videha book catalogue.

Thakur, Arvind. Sabad Mitarath Dhayya. Poetry collection. Listed in the Videha book catalogue.

Thakur, Arvind. Jartak Prativad Me [Against Inertia]. Long poem. Listed in the Videha book catalogue.

Thakur, Arvind. Laghuttamasamapavartya. Story collection. Listed in the Videha book catalogue.

Thakur, Arvind. Kshitikanak Kshetrafal. Criticism. Listed in the Videha book catalogue.

Thakur, Arvind. Tijhariyak Titirsha. Poetry collection. Listed in the Videha book catalogue.

Thakur, Arvind. Roshnaik Lokpaksha [The People's Side of Illumination]. Non-fiction prose. Listed in the Videha book catalogue.

Thakur, Arvind. "The Future of the Cultural Movement in Mithila." Videha, issue 189, 2015. https://www.videha.co.in/research/2015/189/मिथिलामे-सांस्कृतिक-आन्दोलनक-भविष्य.htm

Thakur, Arvind. "Lakshminath Gosain: Tradition, Language, and the Nirgun Sensibility." Videha, issue 189, 2015. https://www.videha.co.in/research/2015/189/लक्ष्मीनाथ-गोसांई-परम्परा-भाषा-आ-निर्गुण-भाव.htm

Contemporary Critical Essays

Thakur, Gajendra. "Against the Darkness—Arvind Thakur." Included in Swatantracheta.

Jha, Dr Yoganand. "Against the Darkness: A Perspective." Videha, issue 189, 2015. https://www.videha.co.in/research/2015/189/अन्हारक-विरोधमे-एक-दृष्टि.htm

Chaman, Ashish. "Against the Darkness, Arvind Thakur." Videha, issue 189, 2015. https://www.videha.co.in/research/2015/189/अन्हारक-विरोध-मे-अरविन्द-ठाकुर.htm

Anchinhar, Ashish. "Poetry Identifying the Red Loincloth." Included in Swatantracheta.

Srivastava, Arvind. "A Poet Ready to Confront the Feudal Order." Videha, issue 189, 2015. https://www.videha.co.in/research/2015/189/सामंती-सभहँक-विरुद्ध-तैयार-कवि.htm

Munnaji. "The Fallow Land Has Been Broken." Videha, issue 189, 2015. https://www.videha.co.in/research/2015/189/परती-टूटि-गेलै.htm

Jha, Omprakash. "Among Works of Many Disguises." Videha, issue 189, 2015. https://www.videha.co.in/research/2015/189/बहुरूपिया-रचनामे.htm

Dheeraj, Ram Chaitanya. "In a Province of Disguises: A Perspective." Videha, issue 189, 2015. https://www.videha.co.in/research/2015/189/बहुरुपिया-प्रदेश-मे-एक-दृष्टि.htm

Thakur, Jagdish Chandra "Anil." "Arvindji's Free Ghazals." Videha, issue 189, 2015. https://www.videha.co.in/research/2015/189/अरविन्दजीक-आजाद-गजल.htm

Mishra Neeraj, Arvind. "Arvind Thakur: Life and Work." Videha, issue 189, 2015. https://www.videha.co.in/research/2015/189/अरविन्द-ठाकुर-व्यक्तित्व-आ-कृतित्व.htm

Kanan, Kedar. "The Fallow Land Is Breaking: A Journey." Included in Swatantracheta.

Kisalay, C. A. "The Fallow Land Is Breaking: A Study of the Farmer's Life-Sustaining Consciousness and Spirit of Enquiry." Included in Swatantracheta.

Editorial Records and Videha Book Catalogues

Videha. Book catalogue: entries for the writings of Arvind Thakur and editorial projects of Ashish Anchinhar. https://videha-ejournal.github.io/videha/pothi.htm

Videha. Research bibliography: critical essays associated with the Arvind Thakur special issue of 2015. https://videha-ejournal.github.io/videha/research/index.htm

Videha. Prose catalogue: references to Arvind Thakur's books and collections. https://videha-ejournal.github.io/videha/prose.htm

REVIEW 3

EIGHTY-TWO SELECTED STORIES BY GAJENDRA THAKUR

A Narrative Rereading of Archives, Identity, and Everyday Life

Primary Text: Gajendra Thakurak 82 Ta Chayanit Katha (Eighty-Two Selected Stories by Gajendra Thakur)

Original Author: Gajendra Thakur · Selection and Editing: Ashish Anchinhar · Videha, 2026

Abstract

A study of Gajendra Thakur's eighty-two selected stories discloses a distinctive expansion of the Maithili fictional world. Alongside traditional village life, family relationships, and caste structures, institutions such as archives, courts, schools, hospitals, panchayats, construction sites, labour registers, and modern communications enter into and transform one another. The author's central narrative question is not whose statement constitutes the final truth, but how claims to truth are made among different human beings, documents, memories, and institutions. This study offers separate concise interpretations of all eighty-two stories drawn from ten source books or volumes, detailed close readings of representative stories, an examination of narrative craft and linguistic organisation, criticism of the method of selection, and a consideration of comparative relationships with the Maithili fictional tradition. Its conclusion is that the collection's distinctive achievement lies in transforming the discourse of rights from ideological declaration into the subtle drama of everyday objects, numbers, bodies, voices, and evidence. At the same time, excessive procedural detail and the recurrence of certain symbols in some narratives raise critical questions.

Keywords: Maithili fiction; Gajendra Thakur; archive; memory; caste; labour; institutional violence; female identity; folk language; narrative craft; literary history.

Sources of the Study and Its Critical Perspective

The principal basis of this study is the available edited text of Gajendra Thakur's "Eighty-Two Selected Stories." According to the publication information, Ashish Anchinhar selected the stories from ten source books or volumes. Five come from Parvat Upar Bhamra Je Sutal, ten from Smritik Dosar Dis, five from Ijot—Janam-Janamk Katha, thirty from the three volumes of Katha-Shatatrayi, thirty from the three volumes of Katha-Tridhara, and two from Nav Pankhi. The organisation of the collection thus becomes a critical argument in itself: from earlier social satire to the incompleteness of memory, and thence to the minute experiences of institutional life.

In textual analysis, the explicitly stated actions and circumstances of the characters are distinguished from critical inference. Where a story withholds a final judgement, no artificial resolution has been added. The quoted lines have been checked against the wording of the available selected Devanagari text; no definitive claim has been made concerning variants among editions of the original source books. Quotations are identified by story title, in order to preserve the difference between interpretation and the source's own statements.

Throughout these texts, distinctions among "the original," "memory," and "correction" recur. The critical method also accepts these distinctions: literary truth is often not equivalent to a legal verdict; a character's words are not necessarily the author's final opinion; and an edited selection is not a complete substitute for an author's entire work. Accordingly, the evaluation considers narrative construction, the narrator's distance, the selection of detail, the development of symbols, and the function of silence separately.

An Integrated Literary Review: The Aesthetic Structures of Ten Source Groups

Parvat Upar Bhamra Je Sutal: Satire, Caste, and the Public Testing of Knowledge

In "Siddha Mahavir," the building of a temple by Anmana Didi and a family dispute over land together expose financial gain hidden beneath religious prestige and a crisis of trust. Once a name is entered on a document, the woman whose efforts preserved the sacred land is herself denied access to it. The satire is especially sharp where a later collective interpretation in terms of miracle collides with Anmana Didi's medical explanation. The narrative allows the reader to observe two systems of social explanation applied to the same event.

"Doma, Budhan and..." is not merely a tale of goodwill opposed to caste prejudice. Migration to Chandigarh, education, untouchability at communal feasts, and the professional advancement of the next generation are woven into the social history of one family. The narrator's faulty memory and extended ideological conversations complicate any unequivocal portrayal of progress. "Shabdashastram" raises questions of ownership over meaning through palm-leaf manuscripts, textual interpretation, and philosophical disagreement. Its many references to classical learning enrich the art while demanding additional patience from the reader.

"The Village of Mahisbar Brahmins" is primarily descriptive. Ponds, varieties of paddy, caste identities, and a wealth of local practices create its social geography. The extremely brief protest offered by "Caste and Caste" appears as a compressed, forceful counterpart to this extensive account of communal life. On one side stand the multiple layers of social identity, and on the other the unequal freedom to declare one's caste publicly: this tension creates the moral structure of the group of stories.

"Remove this very superstition from my mind." — "Siddha Mahavir"

"Caste and the caste system are two different things!" — "Doma, Budhan and..."

"Can I beat my chest and say that I am a Dom?" — "Caste and Caste"

Smritik Dosar Dis: Remembrance, Incomplete Texts, and the Politics of Evidence

The narrative centre of "The Copyist" is an empty bracket: Sudhindra must choose between the temptation to produce a beautiful, readable copy and the duty to preserve uncertainty about the original text. Here, silence is not a defect but an expression of intellectual integrity. "The Last Reader" begins with a public library destroyed by fire and opens the risky possibility of reconstructing books from memory. Popular recollection cannot fully replace the lost collection, but it may become a source of new literature.

"The Bullet at the Border" presents a multilayered structure of evidence. A boundary stone, a soldier's warning, an observer's position, the identification of an object, and translated experience all exist as different forms of testimony. The absence of a single omniscient judgement makes it an important instance of contemporary documentary narrative practice. "The Mason's Fall" raises a severe question about the relationship between an institution and its workers through the gap between safety instructions and the resources actually provided at a worksite.

"Kajal," "The Sisters," and "House Number Five" offer different structures of female experience: a conversation between generations about the meaning of adornment, the distance created by memories of sisterhood, and time deposited in the architecture of a home. In "The Dried-Up Kamala" and "The Smell of Earth," the geography of soil and river is transformed into private memory and the uncertain experience of migration. "The Music Teacher" examines institutional equality and inequality between school and skill centre through voice and silence.

"What had not been written was the most accurate copy." — "The Copyist"

"In the end, an author too becomes the reader of his own writing." — "The Last Reader"

"'I did not hear' must not be turned into 'he did not speak.'" — "The Bullet at the Border"

"He had asked them to change the rope above." — "The Mason's Fall"

Ijot—Janam-Janamk Katha: Lineage, Musical Tradition, and the Open Horizon of Choice

"Maternal Lineage" changes the meaning of a command imposed upon the eldest daughter through genealogy and inheritance, turning it into a means of "access to home." In "Raga," the collective processes of listening, seeking permission, and singing again matter more than any one person's ownership of a musical tradition. In "The Court," the discipline of testimony through questions and answers becomes part of the craft itself: time, water, old maps, and signs of use combine to make judgement difficult.

In "Dum," a flood, a missing person, and uncertainty about the date of death leave a long-lasting impact on domestic life. "Videha" insists on clear distinctions between genealogical lists, proof of property rights, and the preservation of memory. At the end of this group, a blank editorial page offers not an instruction but the possibility of a future writer. For that reason, "light" in Ijot is not a triumphant metaphor of victory; it is a modest, shared illumination amid incompleteness.

> "The arrogance of the original was gone." — "Maternal Lineage"

> "No claim to property, caste, inheritance, or legal proof." — "Videha"

Katha-Shatatrayi, Volume I: Bodies, Objects, and Invisible Characters

The brief message in "Two Letters," the insistence on the present face in "Photo Studio," the redistribution of use in "A Pair of Shoes," and the shared public place of "Divided Shade": ordinary objects and minor acts provide the decisive links in these stories. "The Other Door" exposes a subtle division among people considered eligible to enter a hospital. "A Seven-Minute Voice" attempts to make the distance between relationships audible through a measured sound.

"The Unfinished Play" links incomplete preparations for the stage to unresolved relationships in life. "The Thirty-First Bed" concerns an additional human need caught in the arithmetic of shelter; "The Brick Mark" concerns recognition of the craftsperson's labour; and "Outside the Count" concerns a resident invisible in the forms used to record loss. All three reveal the tension between the limits of enumeration and the existence of embodied people. The volume's strength lies in bringing debates about duty and compassion down from abstract exhortation to the material ground of beds, bricks, and registers.

> "The register was now leaving behind the outlines of the people living inside it as well." — "Outside the Count"

Katha-Shatatrayi, Volume II: Fields, Food, Labour, and Mutuality

"Across the Embankment" raises questions about the location of a shrine and collective identity after displacement. "The Voice of the Land" exposes the local politics of paths and boundaries. The motor of the "Sewing Machine" is not merely a device; it makes audible a new rhythm of independent work and family negotiation.

"Ten Kilograms of Rice" reveals subtle connections among weighing, a receipt, and the language of entitlement. "The Unfinished Song" rejects an individual's claim to ownership of a folk song in favour of collective memory. "The Earthen Flute" joins the patience of making an object to a child's curiosity. "The Open Door" reveals fear alongside opportunity, and "Silent Testimony" considers the meaning of being unable to speak in the pursuit of justice. "Kurthi Lentils" concerns the food chain and unequal exchange in the market; "A Dream of One Bigha" brings together the measurement of land and a worker's desire to cultivate a field of his own.

> "The song belonged to the field. Whoever gave it voice, it became theirs." — "The Unfinished Song"

Katha-Shatatrayi, Volume III: The Class Character of Public Space

"The Empty Bag" and "The Boat Remained Tied" turn disaster into stories of objects, transport, and collective dependence. "The Keeper of the Pond" begins with the responsibility for public water and encounters competing claims upon its use. "The Dom's Flute" brings caste-based devaluation into the payment register of a ceremonial event. Listening to an artist's music and granting fair value to his labour are two distinct steps.

The village shade and paper enumeration in "The Register Beneath the Banyan Tree"; the seating arrangements in "The Caste Chair"; housing insecurity in "The Tenant Girl"; a woman's economic prudence in "Secret Savings"; seen and unseen routes in "The Station That Is Not on the Map"; and the displacement of memory in "A Stranger in One's Own Home"—all show how the boundaries of private life are continually redrawn by public arrangements.

> "Local solo performer—Chandeshwar Dom—flute—five hundred rupees." — "The Dom's Flute"

> "Chair twenty-eight. Permanent place—none." — "The Caste Chair"

Katha-Tridhara, Volume I: Sound, the Wrong Word, and the Effects of Documents

The inactive instrument in "The Bell That Would Not Ring" carries a home's silent history. "The Reverse Route" contrasts the straight line with the lived experience of walking. "The Blank Notebook" is an exercise in acknowledging multiple forms of knowledge; "One Wrong Word" reveals how a single word can break relationships. "Before the Lamp Goes Out" reconstructs a personal path within a shared boundary.

"The Night Boat" sharpens the moral choices of disaster; "Not a Leader Who Forgets Names, but a Teacher" questions the relationship between responsibility for pupils and the frailty of memory. "The River's Papers" recounts people invisible on maps; "The Sand Landing" measures the consumption of natural resources; and "The Power of a Signature" examines the actual meaning of the written consent of a women's collective. In this volume, paper is more than a ledger: it is a point of entry into decisions.

"From today I shall not give numbers to my answers." — "The Blank Notebook"

Katha-Tridhara, Volume II: Forms, Stamps, and Invisible Labour

"The Night on the Raised Platform" presents the incomplete accounting of night watch. "The Returning Stamp" is the story of truth made from half an impression. "Chair Number Zero in the Waiting Room" introduces an outsider's need into institutional regulations. In "The Empty Date Box," the date entered on an official form to secure assistance gradually changes a person's memory; the story subtly discloses the effect of bureaucratic language on remembrance.

"The Original Page of the Corrections Register" preserves the history of an erroneous entry instead of erasing it. The meal order in "Three Empty Chairs" makes the places of absent people visible. "The Veranda Bulb" reveals the politics of relationships in the distribution of a small domestic light; "One Cup of Tea Less," a mysterious relation between calculation and affection; "The Bamboo Bridge," the restoration of communication broken during work; and "The Ruined Field Boundary," cooperation after quarrelling through the practices of agriculture.

"Yet in people's speech it was still chair number zero." — "Chair Number Zero in the Waiting Room"

"Tell me the date that will be accepted on paper." — "The Empty Date Box"

"The original is history; a correction is the next line of history." — "The Original Page of the Corrections Register"

Katha-Tridhara, Volume III: The Ethical Richness of Unanswered Questions

"School Shoes" joins a deprived girl's journey to school with her family's determination to preserve seed for cultivation. "The Panchayat Tap" raises questions of unequal access to water among neighbourhoods. In "Wages," the refusal to let a remaining fifty rupees disappear from the brick-kiln account becomes a small but tangible victory for labour. "The Little Teacher" imagines educational responsibility not as a teacher's possession of answers but as a child's willingness to listen to questions. "Seven Steps" concerns the counting of memory and psychological disturbance.

"Autobiography of a File" makes a government file its narrator and constructs a moral satire of departmental delay. "The Boundary" contrasts the ease of administrative classification with the continuity of fields and water. "The Veranda Bulb" in this volume is different from the story of the same title in the previous volume: here Anima's domestic veranda becomes a place organised by the timing of work. "The Endless Register" prevents a genealogical list from governing an unborn future. "The Library of Mithila" cultivates the discipline of accepting limited, verifiable evidence instead of the alluring fantasy of a rare book.

"Fifty was not a very large number. But for the first time it had not disappeared anywhere." — "Wages"

"The paper travels so that responsibility can be passed downwards." — "Autobiography of a File"

"The next life has not yet been written." — "The Endless Register"

"Where the sources do not agree with one another." — "The Library of Mithila"

Nav Pankhi: Adolescent Vision, Dignity, and a Shared Inheritance

"Life on Crutches" refuses to turn physical disability into a display of pity. The right to choose a life partner, the propriety of asking questions, and the imagination of an independent future teach the reader an ethics grounded in natural character interaction. "The Book Saved from the Flood" connects the preservation of collective memory to an adventurous event through a book rescued from rising water. Having survived the disaster, the book is no longer merely an object but a bridge between generations.

Both stories for adolescents matter to adult readers as well. The first changes perspectives on individual dignity; the second turns the duty of preserving knowledge into a communal act. To place them at the end is not merely to distinguish age groups but to extend the collection's ethical thread into the next generation.

"Life may be on crutches; dreams are not." — "Life on Crutches"

"Some stains are not simply damage; they are reminders too." — "The Book Saved from the Flood"

Separate Close Readings: The Creative Structure of Representative Stories

"Siddha Mahavir": The Irony of Popular Narration and the Economy of Religion

Anmana Didi's apparent simplicity in this story is not a moral weakness. The woman who sells her own grain to support the building of a temple and respect the dignity of labour cannot grasp the intricacies of legal documents; she trusts the religious language employed by her nephew and Dasji. The decisive turn of the plot is not the transfer of a share of land, but the closing of a path. The implication is that a name on a property deed and the right to use property are distinct things.

At the close, the nephew's death receives two interpretations: one miraculous, the other medical. The author brings these opposing meanings face to face without imposing a supernatural verdict upon the event. The word siddha thus becomes the ironic centre of the story's meaning.

"Caste and Caste": The Explosive Force of One Question in a Seed-Story

It would be a mistake to regard this as a trivial incident merely because of its brevity. A short dialogue brings together the equal rank of two senior officials, their shared social environment, and their unequal freedom to identify themselves. "No one will say anything" ceases to be a sentence of empty bravado and becomes the one-sided capacity to claim social protection.

The story does not select a "good" character for the reader. Permission and prohibition within language become the event themselves. This is a useful demonstration of the compressive possibilities of the Maithili seed-story.

"The Copyist": The Gravity of an Unfilled Bracket

Sudhindra's professional skill lies in making letters legible. The story does not reject that skill; it shows its limit, the point beyond which the writer wants the text to acknowledge that the original remains unknowable. The pressure of an exhibition seeks to make the text "readable," while the blurred traces of damaged letters are historical facts.

Here the blank space is both an artistic image and a principle of textual criticism. Refusing to fill it does not imply indecision; it is an active responsibility exercised against the temptation to guess.

"The Bullet at the Border": An Unresolved Judgement Among Multiple Witnesses

A single shot is fired in the story, but the narrator does not convert it into an endless series of verdicts. Hearing a sound, giving a statement, measuring distance, and recognising danger belong to different levels of action. Such discrimination between fact and meaning assumes the form of scrutiny of legal evidence.

Because the narrative is constructed from the limited perspectives of several observers, the final sentence, "The sound of the bullet lasted a moment," confronts an extended social memory. Feeling does not replace fact in this structure.

"The Dried-Up Kamala": A River's Dialogue with an Absent Listener

The narrator continues speaking to Gopi. Although the addressee is absent, that person remains the ethical centre of the story. The dried-up channel is not simply a natural description but a map of the varied relations people have with memory.

The refusal to "put my voice in place of yours" is the narrator's most decisive recognition of limits. Being able to make a story out of a loved one's memory is different from declaring it the final truth.

"Maternal Lineage" and "The Endless Register": From Inheritance to an Autonomous Life

In both stories genealogical records are an essential cultural inheritance yet become questionable when turned into commands governing the future. In "Maternal Lineage," the meaning of the house key entrusted to the eldest daughter changes, transforming an obligation into a means of access.

The final postponement in "The Endless Register"—the child's name will be decided later—does not erase genealogical continuity; it sets a limit to its authority before the unwritten life of a new person. Both stories offer models of ethical agreement between social memory and individual desire.

"The Dom's Flute" and "The Caste Chair": The Material Language of Equality

In "The Dom's Flute," appreciation of the music is not enough: the artist's name and remuneration must be recorded in the event register. Such economic acknowledgement brings questions of art and caste together.

In "The Caste Chair," the preordained position of a chair reproduces an arrangement even without any written caste rule. Moving the chair changes a social sign. Both narratives make the discourse of rights tangible at the level of objects.

"The Empty Date Box" and "The Original Page of the Corrections Register": The Temporal Authority of Paper

Floodwater destroys different parts of a house on different days, while an assistance form demands a single official date. Gradually, the phrase "the date accepted on paper" enters the household's memory of events. The story subtly demonstrates how standardisation, though necessary for government assistance, can constrict the history of lived experience.

"The Original Page of the Corrections Register" opens up the opposite possibility: rather than erasing an error, it preserves a visible record of the error and its correction. The two stories offer reciprocal criticism of the power of evidence and its risks.

"Autobiography of a File": The Object as Narrator

The file itself recounts its birth and its passage through government departments. Where official papers appear to stand guard over human rights, the speaking file takes readers inside the historical machinery of administrative delay. The repair of a broken bridge becomes the beginning of another new file.

This repetition constitutes the narrative's satire: the problem continues through real time while the paper moves upwards through an official hierarchy. Personification is the fundamental device of the narrative, carried through to its final ethical effect.

"The Library of Mithila": From the Temptation of an All-Encompassing Collection to Evidentiary Modesty

Ishan encounters the possibility of an unimaginable accumulation of knowledge, but the work does not celebrate an infinite literary treasury. At the end he considers merely three files, four audio notes, two maps, and one unfinished question sufficient.

Keeping discordant sources independent rather than forcing them into a single narrative is this story's distinctive achievement. The imaginative enterprise of historiography is here subjected to critical restraint.

"Life on Crutches": Restoring Dignity Against the Pity of Compassion

The title and setting refer to physical support, but the text centres on autonomous choice concerning the future. A character's refusal to become an object of pity in matters of marriage is itself an assertion of dignity.

The closing sentence remains memorable because it does not deny bodily limitations; instead, it refuses to imprison life's possibilities within those limitations.

"The Book Saved from the Flood": From a Rescued Object to Communal Memory

The adolescent protagonist's active awareness of risk and the collective cooperation through which a book is rescued are more than an instructive message. Stains on the waterlogged book become the marks of its physical journey and the memory of disaster.

The book placed on a high library shelf passes the village's history into the hands of a new generation. This conclusion gives the entire selection's discussion of archives and memory a readable and hopeful ending.

Separate Concise Analyses of All Eighty-Two Stories

The following annotations identify the narrative action, principal symbol, and critical question of each work separately. Two distinct stories with the same title are identified according to their respective source volumes.

Parvat Upar Bhamra Je Sutal

01. "Siddha Mahavir" — Anmana Didi's religious labour, her nephew's manipulations of property, and the two explanations of a supposed miracle prevent faith from being exempted from questioning.

02. "Doma, Budhan and..." — Budhan's labour as a migrant and Doma's education constitute the extended social time of caste mobility; dialogue repeatedly returns to the central question.

03. "Shabdashastram" — Palm-leaf manuscripts and a philosophical debate over meaning turn questions of textual knowledge, ownership, and traditional interpretative authority into drama.

04. "The Village of Mahisbar Brahmins" — The extensive portrayal of ponds, rice, caste neighbourhoods, and people who narrate village life makes the village not a single community but a plural geography of intersecting interests.

05. "Caste and Caste" — An exceedingly brief conversation exposes the sharp inequality between equal official rank and the public right to identify one's caste.

Smritik Dosar Dis

06. "The Copyist" — Sudhindra's empty bracket reveals the ethics of textual editing and the potential deception of a tidy transcription.

07. “The Last Reader” — The burned library becomes an opportunity to begin reconstruction, but the risk of attempting to remake original books entirely from memory remains.

08. “The Bullet at the Border” — By distinguishing different forms of testimony concerning a boundary stone and a gunshot, the story preserves the differences among fear, intention, and action.

09. “The Mason's Fall” — The discrepancy between a construction site's safety belt and its inadequate rope carries the accident beyond a simple explanation in terms of personal error.

10. “Kajal” — A grandmother's application of kajal opens an intergenerational conversation about self-presentation and socially approved images of women, beyond the question of adornment alone.

11. “The Dried-Up Kamala” — Addressing the absent Gopi, the narrator acknowledges the limits of his own account between the river's former course and private memory.

12. “The Smell of Earth” — The first rainfall and the scent of the soil transform the distance between city and village into an embodied experience of remembrance.

13. “The Sisters” — The sisterhood of Mridula and Neera, stretched across many years, becomes a form of incomplete reconciliation through an unfinished line.

14. “House Number Five” — An old window and changing residents raise questions about the anonymous memory of place and the ownership claimed by successive generations.

15. “The Music Teacher” — Parallel episodes involving vocational examinations and musical recollection link skill, equal opportunity, and the remnants of an old melody.

Ijot—Janam-Janamk Katha

16. “Maternal Lineage” — The house entrusted to the eldest daughter threatens to burden her autonomy; the key becomes not a command but the possibility of return.

17. “Raga” — A song at the river landing and its recording raise the ethics of collective ownership, permission, and the reproduction of folk melodies.

18. “The Court” — Questions and answers in testimony keep open different layers of the river, boundary markers, and human memory.

19. “Dum” — The uncertain chronology of someone lost in a disaster reveals the presence of unfinished grief in everyday domestic conduct.

20. “Videha” — The insistence that gaps in a genealogical record should not become proof of entitlement, and the blank editorial page, open memory to a shared future.

Katha-Shatatrayi, Volume I

21. “Two Letters” — Three umbrellas in a home and a brief note form an intensely private image of the unspoken distance between people.

22. “Photo Studio” — An elderly woman wants her portrait with her present spectacles and facial marks; photography becomes a fixed moment of self-determination.

23. “A Pair of Shoes” — Shoes are not merely an object of charity, but a sign of practical cooperation that circulates through use to the next person in need.

24. “Divided Shade” — Shade shared by neighbouring street vendors brings private competition and cooperative conduct together in public space.

25. “The Other Door” — The two entrances to a health centre are the invisible language of administrative division; entering through the wrong one becomes a concrete test of rights.

26. “A Seven-Minute Voice” — The seven-minute limit contains distinctive rhythms of sound, home, and relationships separated by distance.

27. “The Unfinished Play” — A stage curtain that sticks and an incomplete performance form parallels with unresolved questions in human relationships.

28. “The Thirty-First Bed” — The thirty beds allotted to a women's shelter are shown to be an inadequate number when a thirty-first human being needs refuge.

29. “The Brick Mark” — A small marking on a brick carries both the record and the anonymity of a team of workers.

30. “Outside the Count” — A flood-damage form cannot include all the residents of a building under a single household name.

Katha-Shatatrayi, Volume II

31. “Across the Embankment” — The dispute over a shrine's location in a displaced village rests upon a collision between geography and collective sacredness.

32. “The Voice of the Land” — A path six hands wide and an old stone turn the land's supposed silence into a dispute over rights.

33. “The Sewing Machine” — A new motor fitted to an old sewing machine changes a working woman's income and role within the household.

34. “Ten Kilograms of Rice” — Weighing ten kilograms of rice turns an official promise into a demand for direct verification on the scale.

35. “The Unfinished Song” — An incomplete folk song passes from voice to voice; ownership disperses into collective labour rather than belonging to one name.

36. “The Earthen Flute” — A potter's wheel and a child's half-fired clay become symbols of the proper time needed to acquire a skill.

37. “The Open Door” — An open gate is not merely an opportunity to go outside; it also conveys a woman's hesitation and the difficult rhythm of a household's acceptance.

38. “Silent Testimony” — Silence in court signifies not only an inability to speak but also independent dignity and the limitations of testimony.

39. “Kurthi Lentils” — Domestic hunger for kurthi, madua, and rice is woven into the changing relationship between markets and farming.

40. “A Dream of One Bigha” — A rope twenty hands long and a field measuring one bigha provide a measure for a worker's limited, practical dream.

Katha-Shatatrayi, Volume III

41. “The Empty Bag” — An empty bag hanging from a peg remains as a trace of deprivation and the unfinished struggle for livelihood.

42. “The Boat Remained Tied” — The knot securing a boat is a concrete symbol of a decision left unresolved between disaster and relationships.

43. “The Keeper of the Pond” — The keeper's daily conduct raises a question about ownership versus stewardship of a collective resource.

44. “The Dom's Flute” — Payment recorded in the Dom musician's own name registers cultural equality within economic accounts.

45. “The Register Beneath the Banyan Tree” — The register beside the banyan's shade tests the criteria governing the distribution of public benefits.

46. “The Caste Chair” — An old caste-based seating order breaks down; without a proclamation, practices surrounding space begin to change.

47. “The Tenant Girl” — A young woman's rented accommodation is negotiated between the limits of domestic space and insecure urban relationships.

48. “Secret Savings” — Malati Devi's concealed savings reveal both the invisibility of domestic economic labour and her independent judgement.

49. “The Station That Is Not on the Map” — A station absent from the map exposes the incompleteness of facts between personal perspective and memories of travel.

50. “A Stranger in One's Own Home” — The experience of returning home yet feeling estranged is an uneasy narrative about memory, household objects, and altered relationships.

Katha-Tridhara, Volume I

51. “The Bell That Would Not Ring” — A bell that remains silent becomes a concrete, mute remnant of an unanswered call amid repairs to a house.

52. “The Reverse Route” — The contrast between a straight, measured path and the bends of human experience discloses the limitations of modern maps.

53. “The Blank Notebook” — The empty notebook relinquishes the teacher's certainty of answers and acknowledges the many possibilities of a question.

54. “One Wrong Word” — A single mispronounced word exposes a complicated reckoning involving assistance, debt, and family affection.

55. “Before the Lamp Goes Out” — Crossing a line in the courtyard before the lamp is extinguished creates an autonomous passage within the home.

56. “The Night Boat” — The decision about whom the boat will carry first on a flood-stricken night becomes a test of ethics in crisis.

57. “Not a Leader Who Forgets Names, but a Teacher” — The story of a teacher who forgets names produces an engaging yet difficult tension between memory and moral responsibility.

58. “The River's Papers” — The documents relating to a river make settlements omitted from registration and older maps visible through a new survey.

59. “The Sand Landing” — The clarity of the water and a knot in a rope become two measures for accounting for natural resources at a sand landing.

60. “The Power of a Signature” — The signatures of a women's savings collective become not a mere formality of consent but a right to inspect the complete file.

Katha-Tridhara, Volume II

61. “The Night on the Raised Platform” — Night watch on the platform and a blank register create unequal accounts of the collective time of risk.

62. “The Returning Stamp” — Half a stamp cannot stand as the shadow of complete proof; human reasoning must complete the unfinished circle.

63. “Chair Number Zero in the Waiting Room” — A chair numbered zero in a hospital gives rise to a need excluded from official forms and prompts a new preliminary examination of institutional priorities.

64. “The Empty Date Box” — The compulsory date on a flood-relief application overlays memories of events and establishes an official date as though it were private truth.

65. “The Original Page of the Corrections Register” — Preserving the history of correction rather than crossing out an original account signals responsibility towards law, time, and error.

66. “Three Empty Chairs” — Three vacant dining chairs acquire meaning through the dignity of absent people and gaps in the names recorded on paper.

67. “The Veranda Bulb” — In the first veranda story, a twelve-watt bulb forms a miniature metaphor for the distribution of shared domestic space.

68. “One Cup of Tea Less” — A household record of one fewer cup of tea points towards calculation, waiting, and an unspoken everyday relationship.

69. “The Bamboo Bridge” — Neighbours' silence breaks on a bamboo bridge; the act of cooperation becomes the first word of communication.

70. “The Ruined Field Boundary” — Despite preserving a history of conflict, the damaged boundary opens an opportunity for shared access to water in everyday cultivation.

Katha-Tridhara, Volume III

71. “School Shoes” — Sarita's shoes and the seeds preserved by her father at home represent two kinds of investment in education and the future.

72. “The Panchayat Tap” — The public tap becomes a stringent test of whose time and access count as rights to a common facility.

73. “Wages” — The “remaining fifty” in a brick-kiln account makes a worker's invisible wages visible in the ledger, despite the small amount.

74. “The Little Teacher” — Instead of providing ready answers, the child acting as teacher begins to listen to the different answers of classmates.

75. “Seven Steps” — Seven steps at a printing press become a story about the disjunction between memory and the body's act of counting.

76. “Autobiography of a File” — Speaking in the first person, the file recounts its movement and reveals the absurdity of departmental delays and repeated applications for repairs.

77. “The Boundary” — The administration draws a border while water continues to flow without stopping; the material world challenges the conditions of classification.

78. “The Veranda Bulb” — In the second story bearing this title, Anima's veranda where she sews becomes a public statement of income and working hours.

79. “The Endless Register” — An unwritten life imposes an ethical limit upon the register's claim to name a newborn child.

80. “The Library of Mithila” — Rejecting the possibility of a miraculous repository in favour of accepting disagreements within limited records constitutes a discipline of historical writing.

Nav Pankhi

81. “Life on Crutches” — Pity cannot claim authority over the future of a young man who walks with crutches; freedom to dream is affirmed.

82. “The Book Saved from the Flood” — Stains on a book rescued from water become physical marks of communal memory handed down to the next generation.

Comparative Discussion of Language, Form, and the Treatment of Evidence

Transformations of the Narrator and the Multiple Layers of Time

The dialogue-centred folk narrator who intervenes in the tale is visible in "Siddha Mahavir" and "Doma, Budhan and..." from the first source group. The letter-like address of "The Dried-Up Kamala," the questions and answers of "The Court," the speaking object of "Autobiography of a File," the personal memory-narrator of "Seven Steps," and the critical investigator of "The Library of Mithila" all create different narrative roles. It would therefore be unjust to readers to impose a single "authorial voice" upon all the stories.

Time in many instances is not merely the line along which events unfold. In "The Empty Date Box," an official date changes past experience; in "The Sisters," a separation of forty years alters the meaning of a line; and in "The Endless Register," written ancestral names do not acquire control over a newborn child's future. Time remains active in these stories as a triangle of memory, document, and present decision.

The Sensibility of Objects and the Structure of Small Metaphors

Shoes, chairs, beds, light bulbs, tea, weighing scales, registers, maps, boats, flutes, and keys are recurring objects in the fictional world. They are not merely decorative symbols, because their use advances events. In "The Caste Chair," moving the chair alters the effect of an intangible caste distinction; in "Wages," refusing to erase fifty rupees intervenes in economic relations; and in "The Book Saved from the Flood," the preservation of stains preserves cultural memory.

Nevertheless, the recurrence of this object-centred method sometimes allows the reader to anticipate the ending. In some stories, the force of a small suggestion is exceptionally sharp; in others, the final symbolic statement concerning an object is made a little too explicit. This variation should be treated as a genuine criterion for evaluating quality.

Institutional Vocabulary and the Possibilities of Maithili Prose

Words such as "rule," "order," "signature," "original," "correction," "evidence," "item," "form," "weight," and "sequence" are used in such a way that experiences of labour and rights emerge through the narrative language itself. As a result, office life is no longer an unimaginable external geography for Maithili fiction. Language brings the verifiability of conduct and the structure of entitlement inside the plot.

Conversely, the folk descriptions of "The Village of Mahisbar Brahmins," the vocal tradition of "The Unfinished Song," the inward memoiristic voice of "The Dried-Up Kamala," and the lyrical world of the artist in "The Dom's Flute" prevent the language from becoming a dry bureaucratic idiom. The critical challenge is to establish the proportions of these two linguistic currents.

Social Justice: Procedure Rather Than Declaration

Caste-based disregard takes four different forms in “Caste and Caste,” “The Dom's Flute,” “The Caste Chair,” and “Doma, Budhan and…”: the courage to speak, payment to an artist, a place to sit, and mobility through education. Equality is consequently not only an ideology but also a means of transforming everyday conduct.

The women of “Kajal,” “Maternal Lineage,” “Secret Savings,” “The Power of a Signature,” “The Other Door,” and “The Veranda Bulb” are not passive objects of pity. They are agents of identity, income, consent, and choice. Yet victories in these compassionate social endings are generally limited. Awareness of such limits prevents the narratives from becoming simplified celebrations of triumph.

Comparative Position in Maithili Literary History

The descriptive qualities of earlier Maithili prose and modern social fiction are not simply two endpoints of a single straight developmental line. Traditions of detailed information about folk life, the questioning impulse of satire, the realities of rural labour, unstable urban sociability, and the compression of meaning in seed-stories continue to act as separate currents within contemporary writing. The collection's distinctive feature is its convergence of these currents in struggles over archives, forms, and public resources.

A thematic dialogue may be perceived between the rural labour and social inequality of Yatri's Balchanma and “Wages,” “Kurthi Lentils,” and “Doma, Budhan and…”. Yet that novel and the stories in this collection differ in historical moment, narrative extent, and the organisation of the narrative voice. Shared subjects do not in themselves prove influence. Rather, the comparison should illuminate changed literary forms for depicting rural class experience.

The questioning of the commerce of faith in “Siddha Mahavir” and the verbal reversal of “Caste and Caste” bear critical affinities with Harimohan Jha's satirical tradition. Nevertheless, the satire here does not generally conclude with a single witty resolution but leaves an institutional outcome unsettled. Comparison of “A Stranger in One's Own Home,” “One Wrong Word,” and “Seven Steps” with the disintegration of modern human experience in Rajkamal Chaudhary's fiction is suggestive, but formal resemblance should not be presented as historical indebtedness without independent comparative study of the texts.

The rural writings of Jagdish Prasad Mandal share a field of concern with farming objects, divisions of labour, and social behaviour. But this selection by Gajendra Thakur has a distinct new centre in administrative files, registers, seals, and technical forms of proof. In relation to the Maithili seed-story tradition associated with Munnaji, the brief impact of “Caste and Caste” and the object-narrator of “Autobiography of a File” may be regarded as two extremes of generic variety. The purpose of comparison here is to understand traditions and possibilities, not to establish claims of imitation.

The Videha catalogues of books and research provide means of locating continually published sources. Yet the presence of a work in a catalogue alone is not definitive proof of its historical position or aesthetic value. Accordingly, the chief ground of this study's evaluation remains the stories as they appear in the collection; Videha's bibliographical information provides a context for literary history.

A Critique and Evaluation of the Editorial Selection

The clear separation of the ten source groups benefits readers. In particular, the two distinct stories titled "The Veranda Bulb" must be identified through their actual events despite appearing in different groups under the same title. The large number of stories gives readers ample opportunity to discover shared thematic threads. Yet drawing thirty stories each from the three volumes of two separate series also means that similarities of method within those series may have a disproportionate influence on any overall comparative judgement.

Formally, the collection's principal strengths include its multilayered treatment of evidence, its ability to generate large social meanings from small objects, its setting of limits to the rights characters may claim, and its avoidance of unnecessary verdicts at the end of a narrative. Weaknesses arise where extended descriptions of procedure slow the movement of emotional tension, particularly in dense classical debates or sequences of bureaucratic investigation. A second challenge is the recurrence of moral motifs: blank pages, incomplete signatures, remaining figures in an account, and silent endings can be extraordinarily effective, but their novelty may diminish when too many narratives with nearly identical arrangements stand together.

These reservations should not be misunderstood as objections to the works' social commitments. The literary question is which stories allow ethical awareness to arise from characters' actions, and where the explanation of meaning is delivered a little prematurely. "The Copyist," "The Bullet at the Border," "Maternal Lineage," "The Caste Chair," "The Empty Date Box," "The Endless Register," and "Life on Crutches" are comparatively distinctive because of their formal decisions and the experiences of their characters. "The Village of Mahisbar Brahmins" and "Shabdashastram" make different demands upon the reader: their descriptive and philosophical density requires standards other than those applied to a very brief story.

Conclusion

Gajendra Thakur's eighty-two selected stories do not merely seek to give Maithili literature new social subjects. They attempt to introduce new circumstances of evidence, disagreement, and justice into language and narrative form themselves. Caste hierarchy, women's autonomy, land rights, access to school, flooding, workers' unpaid wages, hospital priorities, ownership of folk songs, and the uses of genealogical registers—all prompt the same questions: whose experiences were counted, whose names omitted, who was given the right to speak, and which documents exercise unnecessary authority over human lives?

A central achievement of these stories is their transformation of unresolved questions from a perceived weakness into an expression of critical integrity. The journey begins with Anmana Didi's rejection of superstition, preserves the distinction between memory and the original, records a labourer's fifty rupees, moves a chair, suspends the command to choose the next name in a genealogy, and finally places a flood-rescued book in the hands of the next generation. This is not a straightforward declaration of progress. It is a literary discipline concerned with discovering the possibility of justice in everyday decisions.

References

Original Collection and Source Books

- Thakur, Gajendra. Gajendra Thakurak 82 Ta Chayanit Katha [Eighty-Two Selected Stories by Gajendra Thakur]. Selected and edited by Ashish Anchinhar. Videha, 2026.
- Thakur, Gajendra. Parvat Upar Bhamra Je Sutal.
- Thakur, Gajendra. Smritik Dosar Dis.
- Thakur, Gajendra. Ijot—Janam-Janamk Katha.
- Thakur, Gajendra. Katha-Shatatrayi, Volume I.
- Thakur, Gajendra. Katha-Shatatrayi, Volume II.
- Thakur, Gajendra. Katha-Shatatrayi, Volume III.
- Thakur, Gajendra. Katha-Tridhara, Volume I.
- Thakur, Gajendra. Katha-Tridhara, Volume II.
- Thakur, Gajendra. Katha-Tridhara, Volume III.
- Thakur, Gajendra. Nav Pankhi.

Comparative Context in Literary History

- Yatri. Balchanma. Listed in the Videha book catalogue.
- Mandal, Jagdish Prasad. Gamak Jingi; Jingik Jit; Maulail Gachhak Phul. Listed in the Videha book catalogue.
- Munnaji. Pratik (a collection of seed-stories). Listed in the Videha book catalogue.
- Ashok. Ohi Ratik Bhor; Daddygam. Listed in the Videha book catalogue.

Videha's Archival and Research Catalogues

- Videha. “Videha Books”: https://videha-ejournal.github.io/videha/pothi.htm
- Videha. “Videha Prose”: https://videha-ejournal.github.io/videha/prose.htm
- Videha. “Videha Research Bibliography”: https://videha-ejournal.github.io/videha/research/index.html
- Videha. “Videha Research Articles, Issues 1–451”: https://videha-ejournal.github.io/videha/research/videha-scholar-research-book.html

Publication years and publisher details for the original source books have not been invented in the reference list. The titles cited for comparison were obtained from Videha's available catalogue; without direct examination of textual variants, no definite claim of influence has been made.

REVIEW 4

THE EDITORIAL WRITINGS IN THE COMPLETE WORKS OF GAJENDRA THAKUR

Multigeneric Creativity, Evidence in Knowledge, and Parallel Literary History

Abstract

Ashish Anchinhar's Gajendra Thakur Samagrak Sampadakiya (Editorial Writings on the Complete Works of Gajendra Thakur) broadens the conventional boundaries of an author-centred critical book in Maithili, assuming the form of a multigeneric intellectual project. Its scope includes not only creative literature such as novels and stories but also drama, poetry, criticism, philosophy, history, genealogical treatises, grammar, lexical resources, children's literature, and translation in both directions. The central argument of this study is that the book is not merely a catalogue of writings or a laudatory introduction: it is an editorial endeavour situated between "evidence from the text" and "the social responsibility of evidence." Yet interpretation developed principally from titles, a uniform critical idiom, uneven depth of analysis across vast material, and the absence of sufficient comparative corroboration for wide-ranging claims about literary history invite scrutiny. This study uses close readings of the original editorial structure and representative review sections, selected quotations checked against the wording of the printed text, comparative consideration of ancient, medieval, and modern Maithili literary tendencies, and references to published research archives of Videha. The book is an important example of a Maithili literary institution examining itself; its enduring critical results will depend on systematic further examination of source registers, dissenting readings, and evidence from individual works.

Keywords: Gajendra Thakur; Ashish Anchinhar; Maithili criticism; editorial history; discernment of evidence; parallel literary history; genealogy; translation; children's literature; Videha.

Introduction: The Distinction Between a Writer's Total Output and an Editor's Perspective

The word samagra, or "complete works," often arouses an expectation of completeness and definitive judgement. Yet bringing an author's entire output into a single collection and establishing the totality of meaning in that output are different undertakings. The first involves collection, classification, and archiving; the second calls for critical selection, comparative perspective, and dissent. What distinguishes Ashish Anchinhar's book is not that it entirely dissolves this division, but that it moves between the two sides. On one side lies the author's immense range of writing; on the other, the editor's methods of classification and evaluation. The question posed by the book is consequently not simply "What has been written?" but also "What conception of knowledge connects these diverse writings?"

The editor's introduction makes the following statement: "Folk knowledge and scholarship, memory and archives, the mother tongue and multilingual dialogue continually test one another." This is the principal critical seed of the collection. The relationship between folk knowledge and formal learning is understood as reciprocal testing rather than the one-way dissemination of "higher" knowledge. The relationship between memory and archives is not straightforward harmony either: memory brings feeling, forgetting, and society's silences, while archives provide dates, names, sequences, and means of examining claims. The tensions between the two recur in literature, history, and philosophy.

On this basis, the book's richest possibility lies in imagining a "parallel institution of reading." The writer produces works; the editor places them in an order determined by genre, question, and evidence; a periodical makes the arrangement public; and readers then challenge it. Editorial labour consequently becomes a primary operation in constructing literary history. Yet the construction of a history is not identical with establishing an authoritative historical account. How comprehensive is the included material, how independent are the critical conclusions, and which voices have been excluded? These three questions must remain open.

The Organisation of the Book and the Criteria of Study

The opening section contains an extended series of independent editorial observations organised by genre. It is followed by sectional lists of topics, a detailed contents, reviews of individual works, and a large accumulation of scholarly resources. The evident arrangement places novels, story collections, drama, verse, criticism, philosophy, history, genealogical records, grammar, thesauri, self-learning materials, and translations into separate divisions. Yet this classification serves more than the convenience of a library catalogue. It shows the reader how many media can express a single writer's view of society.

Four criteria are useful in assessing the editorial method: specificity in the selected text; the reasoning behind a critical judgement; evidence for comparisons with other works; and the distinction between authorial and editorial voices. According to these standards, some parts of the book are exceptionally fruitful, notably explicit discussion of the limitations of a novel about financial crime, attempts to identify repetition in the stories, archival caution in discussions of genealogical records, and the injunction not to invent plots from titles alone. Elsewhere, general praise, generic description, and possible symbolic interpretations are more prominent. Such unevenness may be a natural problem of an extensive collection, but it must nevertheless be recognised as a critical problem.

The specific textual foundation of this study is the editorial book itself. Gajendra Thakur's original works are being discussed through Ashish Anchinhar's interpretation. Where the complete texts of their independent editions have not been examined directly, editorial judgements are not presented as verified facts about those originals. Quotations too are identified as belonging to the editorial volume, not as independent evidence from the novels or stories. This distinction preserves a necessary distance between an evaluation of the editorial work and a final verdict upon the author's entire creative world.

Separate Close Readings: Decisive Passages in the Editorial Language

Consider the linguistic construction of the introductory proposition that "Folk knowledge and scholarship, memory and archives, the mother tongue and multilingual dialogue continually test one another." Three pairs of nouns occur within a single syntactic pattern: "folk knowledge" beside "scholarship," "memory" beside "archives," and "mother tongue" beside "multilingual dialogue." This sequence is not a linear movement from outside to inside or from below to above; it creates an impression of dialectical equivalence. The final verb, "test," activates that equivalence. Placing so compact a proposition at the opening of the editorial work is not mere ornament: it anticipates the structure of the book's argument. Whether the principle is sustained with equal consistency in every section, however, requires separate examination.

"Criticism is literature's self-knowledge" is an unusually compressed proposition. "Self-knowledge" encompasses both self-acknowledgement and self-examination. If criticism merely proclaims the creator's importance, it performs only half the work of self-knowledge; if it also exposes the criteria by which its own institution makes selections, it approaches a fuller meaning. The proposition immediately following it—"Modern academic criticism does not merely deliver value judgements; it establishes methods of reading"—confirms this shift. The word "merely" signals enlargement rather than negation: evaluation has not been abandoned, but the method underlying it is to be made public.

The statement concerning genealogy—"What a document does not say is as important as what it says"—has a parallel structure that conceals a profound asymmetry. The first element concerns an existing record; the second, an absent and supposedly relevant fact. "As important" gives the two equal historical significance without conferring equal evidentiary status. The reliability of genealogical studies depends upon precisely this distinction. A gap is not a substitute for a conclusion; it marks the beginning of the next research question.

In a discussion of the social metaphors of prose, the rule "A plot cannot be invented from a title until its relationship with the actual events of the story is established" is an explicit prohibition. It is especially valuable here because the opening part of the collection frequently develops extended possibilities of meaning from the imagery of titles. In the light of this principle, such early readings of images should more fairly be understood as provisional interpretative proposals rather than final conclusions. This internal awareness of self-regulation allows the book itself to provide instruments for its own criticism.

In the discussion of translation, the contrasting statement "From the perspective of world literature, such translations make Maithili not a receiving language but a giving language" is important. By following "not" with "giving," it seeks to reverse the one-sided dependence of a mother tongue. Its underlying political meaning is a refusal of linguistic inferiority. Yet proper literary testing of the proposition requires comparative examples from translated texts, attention to their accessibility to target readers, and examination of changes in expression. The sentence specifies a goal; it does not itself prove the goal has been fully achieved.

These five textual passages show that the editorial language is strongest when it identifies the limits of evidence alongside its declarations. Continuity of argument will be established only when internal acknowledgement and specific literary examples jointly produce judgements throughout the book. Close linguistic reading, literary history, and social criticism therefore become complementary instruments, not substitutes for one another.

Narratives of Knowledge: An Expanded Model of the Novel

The editorial work proposes the formulation "narratives of knowledge" for the novels. This does not mean that philosophical instruction has simply replaced storytelling. More meaningfully, the sequence of events itself requires characters to gather evidence from concrete materials, test the reliability of memory, confront institutional power, and live with incomplete truth. The novelistic quality lies not in arriving easily at knowledge but in the drama of struggling to establish it.

The editorial reading of Sahasrabadhani rests on the interdependence of water, family, memory, and administration. Flooding is not merely weather or disaster but an arrangement of experience across generations. It is fruitful to read the river's recurring movements, recollections of forgotten places, migration, and the incapacities of public institutions as a single narrative problem. By comparison, the centre of Sahasrashirsha moves from one voice towards many. Polyphony in social experience, memories of caste and occupation, folk songs, and local political life come to the foreground. The first novel's critical axis appears to be the experienced sequence of catastrophe; the second's, the coexistence of dissenting voices. To call both merely "the memory of Mithila" would obscure their differences.

Panch Pratishat Anhar (Five Per Cent Darkness) connects financial transactions and the international structures of economic crime with the local social body of Mithila. The editorial work identifies the shop owned by Rani, Amresh's debt, unidentified payments, gambling, and institutional investigation as guiding episodes. Notably, the editor does not merely enumerate achievements: he identifies as limitations the nearly uniform disciplined speech of several characters, a slackening of dramatic movement caused by an extended chapter structure, and an excessive density of legal and administrative vocabulary. Such adverse judgements increase the credibility of criticism.

Comparison with Navya Nyaya and the Offshore Gambling Network and Anuvadak (The Translator) opens an internal triangle of money flows, instruments of proof, and linguistic mediation. The first concerns the economic connections of crime, the second the examination of evidence in jurisprudence, and the third the professional and ethical responsibilities of language. Yet if all three are reduced to exemplifications of one idea, the characters' private fears and desires and the visual power of their environments may be suppressed. Successful criticism must give equal place to the methods of argument and the aesthetic independence of fiction.

Water, Registers, Witnesses, and Names: From Symbols to Narrative Evidence

In Jal-Panji (The Water Register), the contrast between jal, "water," and panji, "register," is present in the title itself: one is mobile, the other an institution of fixing and recording. This opposition raises a question between Mithila's geography and its social archives. When something has been swept away, who will preserve its name? Which guardian of memory—a family, village, river, document, or story—will have the primary authority over truth? The editorial discussion offers a meaningful interpretation of this metaphor. Yet its literary force can be properly established only through specific scenes, characters' decisions, and evidence from the sequence of events.

In the reading of Bijji: Gohi Sabhak Beech, the contrast between a small creature and a terrifying environment becomes an emblem of unequal power. The interpretation of Satam Sakshi (The Seventh Witness) identifies a tension between external testimony and conscience. The title Patak Bhitar Likhal Nam (A Name Written Inside a Leaf) suggests identity, transience, and the fragility of writing. There is no reason to deny the usefulness of these interpretations, but the potential meaning of a title must be distinguished from the narrative truth established by the text. The extended editorial section contains an important statement of self-restraint: "A plot cannot be invented from a title until its relationship with the actual events of the story is established." This sentence deserves to be treated as a methodological legacy of the entire project.

The joint discussion of the original, adolescent, and children's versions of Gohi Sabhak Beech Jalsamadhi (A Water Burial Among the Crocodiles) raises a further question. After a work's meanings are adapted for different readerships, how much of its original emotion, structure, and ethical conflict remains? Treating a children's edition as an inferior abridgement would be a literary mistake. Adaptation redistributes scenes, narrative risks, simplicity of language, and social complexity. A proper comparison of the three versions would require separate alignment of narrative voice, dialogue, description, and conclusions in corresponding episodes. The editorial work enters this field, but clearer examples of such comparison would strengthen its applied method.

The Expansiveness of Fiction: Collections, Sequence, and Everyday Ethics

In the editorial introductions to Parvat Upar Bhamra Je Sutal, Smritik Dosar Dis, and Ijot—Janam-Janamk Katha, poetic, memorial, and luminous meanings arise from their titles. The permanence of the "mountain" and the movement of the "bumblebee," the "other side" of memory, and a "light" extending over many lives provide gateways into the collections. Yet the overall effect of a story collection often emerges from individual endings, silences, and sequencing. Interpretation based on titles must therefore be a prelude to further textual scrutiny, not its substitute.

The great scope of Katha-Shatatrayi and Katha-Tridhara invites praise based primarily on the number of stories. The proper question for criticism, however, concerns which formal devices recur throughout them, how character types transform in relation to one another, which issues become new questions, and which stories prove comparatively weaker. The breadth of a contents list is only a preliminary indication of literary achievement. The final criteria are language, structure, necessity, and the effect upon readers.

A particularly striking tendency in close readings of the stories is the transformation of household objects into social documents. Shoes, notebooks, photographs, sweet boxes, slippers, receipts, and small mistakes become ways of raising questions of dignity, labour, shame, care, and rights. The significance of an extensive fictional undertaking lies not only in epic breadth but also in the invisible history of everyday life. Examining two or three decisive objects, their contexts, and the changing perspectives of the characters reveals the social depth of short fiction.

The fictional field also has a possible limitation. If story structures repeatedly depend upon misunderstanding, a minor discovery, the securing of evidence, the correction of paperwork, and a final reversal, repetition may turn into a familiar moral formula. Readers begin to anticipate the resolution. Greater space for insoluble social conflicts, ambiguous inner desire, divergent linguistic voices, and undecided endings could deepen the genre. The editorial work signals this danger in discussions of certain representative stories; a broader application of the insight could become one of its substantial achievements.

Fiction for Children and Adolescents: The Reader's Independent Agency

Discussion of Nav Pankhi and thirty-seven children's novels points towards the filling of a significant gap in Maithili literary history: regarding the child as a creator of knowledge and a decision-maker in the mother tongue. It challenges the tradition of treating children's literature as merely a lesson in proper conduct or a light appendix of entertainment. What questions does the child ask, what risks does the narrative assign to that child, how much space does adult authority grant the child's decisions, and how do the heroes and heroines of folk narratives reach a new generation? These are literary questions.

The essay "A Critical Method for Maithili Children's Novels," published in Videha, brings Indian ideas of rasa, aucitya, and dhvani into relation with narrative form, childhood fear, and the child's agency in a combined consideration of thirty-seven works. This context enlarges the editorial book's briefer account of children's literature. The return of narratives involving the caste background of folk heroes and historically neglected communities connects children's literature to questions of social representation. Even so, the actual responses of child readers, the accessibility of vocabulary, the harmony of illustrations and narrative content, and the comprehension of different age groups require separate testing.

In criticism of children's literature, "giving instruction" and "opening opportunities for judgement" are different activities. The finest stories do not hand the child a declared answer; they allow a young reader to observe the consequences of characters' actions, give language to fear, and recognise alternatives. From this viewpoint, the present expansion of Maithili children's novels is an important possibility, but their ultimate value must be determined by the child's literary experience, not by the number of works.

Dramatic Structure and the Inner Voice of the Ghazal: Text, Speech, and Performance

If Rang-Sangam is treated as dialogue-heavy prose alone, its theatrical character disappears. The meaning of drama accumulates through stage time, entrances and exits, pauses, practicalities of scene change, language that actors can pronounce, and the audience's collective experience. The editorial work directs attention beyond the subject of the plays towards their potential for performance; this is an appropriate direction. It should be accompanied by closer examination of the conflicts in individual plays, autonomous male and female voices, the social targets of humour, and the relationship between folk theatre and the modern stage.

It would be risky to assume a direct, uninterrupted lineage in Maithili theatre from Jyotirishwar's Dhurtasamagama through the theatrical traditions of Mithila to the modern stage. Texts, performance practices, audiences, and institutions have changed across periods. Nevertheless, humour, satire, multilingual speech, social deception, and stage presence provide fruitful bases for comparison. Rang-Sangam's relevance to this historical line will become clear only when the relationships between the scenes of particular plays and historical material are demonstrated with evidence.

An assessment of ‘Diwan-e-Videha’, ‘Akulait Sur’, and ‘Swapname Mijjhar Hoit’ cannot rest on a uniform celebration of feeling. The ghazal calls for scrutiny of metre (bahr), refrain (radif), rhyme (qafiya), recurring tonal patterns, the independence of each couplet, and the overarching emotional trajectory. Song demands an orally sustainable rhythm, while free verse requires attention to the breath of the line, pauses, and the relation between images. A ghazal may address a pressing social issue yet fail to sustain its metrical obligations; it is the critic's responsibility to distinguish thematic importance from formal accomplishment. Equally, formal experiment in poetry should not be reduced to emotionalism or the advocacy of an idea.

Extended discussions of poetry and drama must also distinguish translated works from original compositions. Even when the propositional content remains similar across two languages, pronunciation, humour, propriety, and public resonance may change. The editorial collection's generic breadth makes such comparisons possible. A more fully developed criticism must, however, offer concrete evidence of differences in verbal structure and circumstances of performance.

A Theory of Criticism: The Claim to Self-Knowledge and the Responsibility of Self-Examination

One proposition in the editorials declares: ‘Criticism is literature's self-knowledge.’ A related statement maintains: ‘Modern academic criticism does not merely deliver value judgements; it develops methods of reading.’ Together these propositions elucidate the book's critical theory. If criticism is self-knowledge, the author's intentions, the editor's commitments, and the authority of literary institutions must themselves enter the field of questioning. If the method of reading is fundamental, the failures and exceptions of that method must also be demonstrated.

The essays, studies of individual writers, the prolonged undertaking of Videha, periodical indexes, and the ‘Nit Naval’ series together constitute a public culture of criticism. Alongside the appraisal of particular works, they conserve a community of readers, histories of publication, exchanges within journals, and literary archives. This situation raises a substantial question for Maithili: why does an independent literary institution matter? It matters not simply because it publishes books, but because providing spaces for divergent readings, dissent, and remembrance is also an element of literary self-determination.

Such institutional achievement nevertheless requires the independence of the critic. When author, publisher, editor, reviewer, and archivist are interconnected within the same literary circle, criticism can unintentionally become an echo of approval. This is not an accusation; it is a methodological caution arising from the structure of an institution. Accordingly, an account that also acknowledges limitations, disagreements, historical controversies, and alternative readings increases the credibility of criticism.

The series entitled 'Nit Naval' can be read, in particular, as an emerging mode of assessment in which the work of particular authors, its contexts, and fresh interpretations remain continually open to reconsideration. The name insists on perpetual renewal. A critical question follows: does that novelty reside in the works selected, in the method of reading, or in bringing the neglected materials of literary history into view? Distinguishing these three possibilities would clarify the achievement of the series.

The Discernment of Evidence, Navya-Nyaya, and the Ethics of Narrative

Evidence recurs throughout the collection: testimony concerning crime, names in genealogical registers, historical sources, accurate meanings in translation, grammatical forms, and judicial documents. This recurrence may be regarded as an intellectual centre of the author's concerns. The analytic tradition of Navya-Nyaya supplies an intellectual background to it. Yet evidence in modern law, a historical document, and 'evidence' as a literary symbol are not of the same kind. A fictional narrator can be reliable or unreliable; a historian's evidence must be open to verification; and a court's judgement depends on its procedures.

The most important discipline of criticism is to distinguish example, inference, doubt, and the limits of judgement. The discussion of 'Five Percent Darkness' offers instances of ethical restraint in narration: Rani's signature should not be treated as infallible proof of independent consent; Trisha should protect the confidentiality of a source; and an offender's identity must not be inferred from a coincidental clue. In the novel, such procedural alertness also becomes an aesthetic device, replacing immediate resolution with the tension of uncertainty.

The limits of this approach likewise require scrutiny. If evidentiary caution makes the language of different characters excessively uniform, fiction may become a collection of illustrations of ideas. The living contradictions of character, unethical desires, inconsistent reactions, and unforeseen feelings are also constituents of literary truth. Distinguishing the use of evidence within a story from the imposition of evidentiary discipline upon the story enables a more accurate understanding of the novelistic character of the collection.

The Archives and Genealogical Registers of Mithila: A Sociology of Memory

The editorial importance of the genealogical-register project lies in its refusal to treat genealogy as a lifeless enumeration of names. Instead, it regards such registers as long-duration records of social relations. Lineage, gotra, village, proximity through marriage, migration, women's family lines, and inherited titles all bear traces of social practice. But no genealogical list constitutes the history of a complete society by itself. Whose names were entered? Who remained absent? Were women recorded only through their relationships with others? How were caste, labour, and household arrangements outside the registered lineages documented? Questions such as these make the reading of genealogies an exercise in social history.

The editorial discussion of the registers contains a particularly important observation: 'What a document does not say is as important as what it says.' Instead of filling gaps with invented information, it asks after their historical causes. Silence in the historical record may indicate an absence of information, exclusion, the loss of documents, or the limitations of a system of recording. Interpretations of silence are therefore not interchangeable; the different possibilities have to be identified separately.

A continuity of methodological discernment can be observed between Videha's research essays on genealogical records and the six-volume expansion of the subject within the collected works. If such registers are regarded merely as the glorious remains of an older social classification, complex sociological questions disappear. Conversely, it would be equally misleading to treat every recorded name as uniform evidence of modern egalitarian rights. The study of social documents must attend to historical change, regional differences, relations of class and caste power, and alternative memories preserved in everyday life.

A Parallel Literary History: The Possibility of Shifting the Centre

Literary histories have often centred upon canonical authors, classical works, and urban institutions of prestige. The 'parallel' impulse associated with Videha challenges the assumption about whose writings constitute literary history and whose experiences are left at its margins. The effort in the editorials on Gajendra Thakur's collected works to place folklore, children's literature, genealogies, nonstandard linguistic forms, translation, and modern legal and economic questions within one intellectual field offers a concrete indication of this historical sensibility.

Jyotirishwar's 'Varnaratnakara' and 'Dhurta Samagama', Vidyapati's lyric corpus and medieval poetry, folk theatre, Mithila's genealogical traditions, modern stories and novels, social satire, and periodical culture are distinct bodies of material for the history of Maithili literature. Where conventional accounts accord privileged standing to poetic excellence and religious-cultural memory, a modern parallel reading proposes to bring the experience of labour, women, excluded communities, administrative records, vernacular speech, and digital media into the same historical framework. This expansion makes a parallel method necessary. But expansion cannot mean merely compiling another list; it must also examine the reasoning that organised the earlier history.

To turn 'parallel' into the slogan 'everything old is wrong and everything new is right' would contradict the method itself. Canonical texts may contain plural voices, just as marginal materials may reproduce forms of social exclusion. A credible parallel history must therefore be comparative, evidence-based, and self-critical. The editorial account of Gajendra Thakur's historiographical project announces this possibility. Establishing its detailed justification, however, requires further comparative research into chronology, documentary sources, textual variants, and the interpretations of other literary historians.

Comparison of Mayanand Mishra's historical fiction and the tradition of Harimohan Jha's social satire, together with the variety of modern Maithili storytelling, against 'Sahasrabadhani' or 'Five Percent Darkness' suggests a transformation: rural life does not lose its importance as a centre; instead, its relations with the state, floods, migration, finance, and contemporary institutions of evidence become more complex. Such comparison must nevertheless avoid claiming identical techniques merely because the works share subject matter. Differences of historical period, narrator, readership, and literary language must be made explicit.

Linguistics, Thesauri, and the Question of Standardisation

To exclude grammar and lexicography from creative literature would leave the intellectual history of a language incomplete. Projects such as 'A Parallel Grammar, Composition and Linguistics of Maithili', the 'Maithili–English Thesaurus', and the 'English–Maithili Thesaurus' regard language as an instrument of thought and inquiry. In modern Maithili, the tensions among standardised Devanagari writing, dialectal diversity, fine distinctions of meaning, and context-sensitive lexical choice become subjects of critical investigation.

The comparative relationship among Thethi, Angika, and Bajjika, in particular, cannot be settled by word lists alone. Sound systems, morphology, syntax, historical development, the self-identification of speech communities, and administrative classifications must be treated as distinct kinds of evidence. In literary criticism it is neither appropriate nor linguistically adequate to pronounce any one form inherently 'incorrect'. A dictionary becomes a living literary resource when it preserves contexts of usage, accepted variants, social registers, and the range of meanings.

A criticism of thesauri cannot be completed by counting entries. Synonymy does not establish the interchangeability of words in every context: one word may fit ordinary conversation, another legal discourse, a third folk song, and a fourth satire. The decisive criteria for lexical resources are therefore semantic sensitivity, the reliability of examples, linguistic diversity, and sustained revision. The editorials connect utility with evidence in this field, although the need for detailed, entry-based critical examination remains.

The Two-Way Movement of Translation: The Mother Tongue as Receiver and Giver

The collected works include both translations into Maithili from other languages and translations from Maithili into English. This bidirectional movement has particular significance for literary history. Maithili renderings of Sanskrit philosophy, drama, farce, and prose make classical materials accessible in a living mother tongue, while English translations of Maithili stories, novels, and poetry carry the Maithili world to a wider readership. This movement in both directions weakens the rigid opposition between 'tradition' and 'modernity'.

The editorial references to 'Bhamati', 'Atmatattvaviveka', 'Nyayakusumanjali', and 'Tattvachintamani' should not be understood as describing one homogeneous kind of translation. Philosophical terminology, relations of logical argument, and the syntax of commentaries on aphorisms demand specialised examination. In another direction, translations of 'Abhijnanashakuntalam', 'Mrichchhakatikam', 'Mudrarakshasam', 'Bhagavadajjukam', and farcical literature raise questions of dramatic conventions, social satire, performability, and shifts between linguistic registers. No single method can adequately assess all these translations.

In the context of translations from Maithili into English, the editorials observe: 'From the perspective of world literature, such translations make Maithili not merely a receiving language but also a giving language.' The historical importance of this formulation is considerable. Maithili is envisaged not solely as a cultural space that receives the literature of other languages, but as a source of its own communal experiences, metaphors, memories of rivers, and modern civic questions. Nevertheless, the availability of translations in print demonstrates access to the domain of 'world literature', not necessarily acceptance by a worldwide readership. Evaluating the actual effects of linguistic transfer requires examination of textual organisation, the meanings of metaphors, the naturalness of translated dialogue, and responses from the intended audience.

The novel 'Anuvadak' ('The Translator') becomes a self-reflection of this entire enterprise. Translation is not merely a professional service here; it is central to the ethical choices of the narrative. A mistaken interpretation of a sentence may change financial or legal consequences, while silence can itself be a decision. In this way, translation is established simultaneously as a creative, social, and epistemological activity.

The Editorial Style: Achievement, Repetition, and Uneven Judgement

The chief strength of the style of 'Editorials on the Collected Works of Gajendra Thakur' is its capacity for extensive classification. The editorial argument commonly advances from title to thesis, social purpose, comparative observation, and conclusion. Amid abundant materials, this sequence provides readers with a sense of direction. Discussion does not disintegrate as it moves from intricate novelistic situations to lexicography and genealogical registers, because the questions of archives, evidence, language, and memory recur in new forms.

This design also has an adverse side. If almost every work is interpreted through formulas such as ‘the title contains a symbol of …’, ‘the importance of this work lies in …’, or ‘from the perspective of modern criticism …’, its particular stylistic eccentricities begin to disappear. The convenience of a critical idiom may then create an unnecessary uniformity of judgement. The remedy is close interpretation of selected scenes or passages, a willingness to reach divergent conclusions, and attention to concrete literary operations rather than general labels.

In reviews of short-story collections, translations, and poetry, some methodological formulations recur; elsewhere, the discussion becomes especially alive through its engagement with particular characters and social situations. Such unevenness should not be obscured when assessing the editorials on their own terms. It does not diminish the significance of the overall project, but identifies a practical direction for its further refinement.

Quantity is not intrinsically equivalent to critical depth. A two-line judgement on a story matters when it discloses the story's decisive implications; twenty pages of discussion are valuable only when free of needless repetition. The dignity of a collected work is determined not by its bulk but by the discernment of its critical selections and the trustworthy paths of evidence it opens for readers.

Women, Caste, Labour, and Representation: Internal Tests of a Parallel Perspective

The most demanding test of parallel history, when reading the collection's discussions of folklore, genealogies, children's narratives, domestic fiction, and modern institutions, is social representation. Does a woman's name appear in a genealogical register solely as somebody's daughter or wife, or is the possibility of an independent life history preserved? Are working communities simply placed upon a pedestal as heroic figures of folk culture, or are their ordinary economic struggles, education, and political inequalities made visible? Do girls and adolescent women possess genuine agency in the stories, or are their decisions finally absorbed into the instruction of adults? These questions reach beyond individual works to test the editorial perspective itself.

Folk memory need not always be emancipatory; it can also transmit exclusion, caste hierarchy, and gender inequality. Accordingly, placing folk traditions on an equal footing with classical knowledge should mean critical parity, not an unexamined elevation of every inherited folk convention. A discerning parallel history must consider both the social usefulness and the limitations of genealogies and folk narratives.

Research debates published in Videha on feminist and Dalit approaches to literary criticism pose questions internal to this editorial enterprise. Whom does literary expansion bring into its community of readers, and whom does it leave in silence? The answers to questions opened within a book are not furnished by fixed declarations; they require repeated testing through particular texts.

Videha and the Literary Public Sphere: From Periodical to Research Archive

Videha occupies an important historical position in this collection because the periodical serves not only as a vehicle of circulation but also as a repository of critical writing. Its successive issues, research articles, editorials, translations, children's literature, genealogical studies, linguistic work, and studies of particular authors give a long-term memory to literary public debate. A comprehensive reading of an author's work thereby becomes, in effect, a method of entering into dialogue with this public institution.

The periodical and the book have historically distinct functions. A journal preserves disputes as they unfold; a book gives selected materials order, relative stability, and comparative relations. The presence of Videha's research index and book collection reveals a conjunction of these two forms. When criticism rooted in print culture engages a digital archive, accessibility grows, but so do responsibilities concerning the durability of sources, differences between editions, authorial attribution, and the identification of revised material.

One achievement of this book is to provide a framework for future research topics in Maithili criticism. A subsequent scholar may select, from a single volume, the literary development of a particular author, a distinct cluster of stories, the social history of genealogies, or questions concerning the vocabulary of translation. For such uses, however, distinctions between the original work, the critic's commentary, and a periodical's editorial information must remain clear.

An Integrated Reassessment of the Central Arguments

The collection's first achievement is to remove artificial partitions between genres and construct a shared intellectual field. By identifying connections among prose, verse, classical learning, history, children's literature, grammar, and translation, it discloses the local linguistic foundations of knowledge. Its second achievement is sensitivity to evidence: refusing to turn every silence into a fact, every coincidence into a verdict, or every title into a plot. Its third is the social aspiration of a parallel literary history in which folk knowledge, neglected archives, and modern civic experience enter into debate with older institutions of authority.

Three main points invite critical scrutiny. First, different literary genres do not share identical criteria of assessment; general theoretical terms must therefore be supplemented by close examination of the specific metre, scene, event, source, or technique of each work. Second, comprehensiveness must be distinguished from original evidence: an editorial description does not, by itself, prove the aesthetic excellence of every text described. Third, within a vast sequence, unnecessary repetition and generalised judgements may reduce the sharpness of a reader's experience.

Nevertheless, the book raises a decisive question: how can a multiplicity of modern forms of knowledge be created in the mother tongue? The answer offered is not a story of uninterrupted progress, but a combined process of creativity, translation, memory, social responsibility, and discipline in the use of sources. For this reason the book deserves not only praise but exacting criticism. Its ability to sustain serious critical engagement is itself a major literary accomplishment.

Conclusion

Ashish Anchinhar's 'Editorials on the Collected Works of Gajendra Thakur' constitutes a notable effort to transform the breadth of an author's creative output into an extensive architecture of editorial reading in Maithili. At its centre are the language of evidence, the geography of water, the memory preserved in genealogies, the dialogue between folk knowledge and classical learning, judicial discernment, children's imaginative rights, and the bidirectional cultural journey of translation. The book's most important insistence is that classical and modern questions of knowledge can be asked in the mother tongue, and that Maithili itself is capable of becoming an adequate language of intellectual inquiry.

Its critical achievement is most luminous when the editor acknowledges a work's limitations, maintains distinctions between imagination and evidence, and captures the singular voice of a particular text. Where generalised models, formulaic approval, or conjectures based upon titles take precedence, the same method of self-examination should be applied again. The expansive social commitment generated by a parallel literary history will endure only if the evidence of established and newer traditions alike remains equally open to questioning.

Ultimately, the point of the volume is not to determine the total greatness of a single author, but to open the full possibilities of Maithili criticism to dispute, evidence, disagreement, and rereading. Literary history is not merely an accumulation of archival records; it is an enduring public conversation conducted through criticism. Reading 'Editorials on the Collected Works of Gajendra Thakur' with due attention to its range, methodological promise, and remediable limitations will reveal its proper place in that conversation.

References

Principal Editorial Volume and Its Individual Review Sections

Anchinhar, Ashish. ‘Editorials on the Collected Works of Gajendra Thakur’. Videha, 2026. The principal editorial material, volume-wise contents, and extended collection of reviews.

Anchinhar, Ashish. ‘Editorials on the Collected Works of Gajendra Thakur: Ijot, Smritik Dosar Dis, and Parvat Upar Bhamara Je Sutal’. Videha, 2026. Sections devoted to the criticism of stories.

Anchinhar, Ashish. ‘Editorials on the Collected Works of Gajendra Thakur: Katha-Shatatrayi’. Videha, 2026. Three volumes of short-story criticism.

Anchinhar, Ashish. ‘Editorials on the Collected Works of Gajendra Thakur: Katha-Tridhara’. Videha, 2026. Three volumes of short-story criticism.

Anchinhar, Ashish. ‘Editorials on the Collected Works of Gajendra Thakur: Nav Pankhi’. Videha, 2026. A review section on fiction for young readers.

Anchinhar, Ashish. ‘Editorials on the Collected Works of Gajendra Thakur: Sahasrabadhani’. Videha, 2026. A critical section on the novel.

Anchinhar, Ashish. ‘Editorials on the Collected Works of Gajendra Thakur: Sahasrashirsha’. Videha, 2026. A critical section on the novel.

Anchinhar, Ashish. ‘Editorials on the Collected Works of Gajendra Thakur: Five Percent Darkness’. Videha, 2026. A section on a novel of financial crime.

Anchinhar, Ashish. ‘Editorials on the Collected Works of Gajendra Thakur: Navya-Nyaya and the Offshore Gambling Network’. Videha, 2026. A section on a novel concerned with judicial reasoning and crime.

Anchinhar, Ashish. ‘Editorials on the Collected Works of Gajendra Thakur: Anuvadak’. Videha, 2026. A section on a novel about language, livelihood, and responsibility.

Anchinhar, Ashish. ‘Editorials on the Collected Works of Gajendra Thakur: Jal-Panji’. Videha, 2026. A section concerned with water-memory and archival records.

Anchinhar, Ashish. ‘Editorials on the Collected Works of Gajendra Thakur: Bijji: Gohi Sabhak Beech’. Videha, 2026. An extended critical section.

Anchinhar, Ashish. ‘Editorials on the Collected Works of Gajendra Thakur: Gohi Sabhak Beech Jalsamadhi’. Videha, 2026. A section on the original work and its versions for young readers and children.

Anchinhar, Ashish. ‘Editorials on the Collected Works of Gajendra Thakur: Rang-Sangam’. Videha, 2026. A section of dramatic criticism.

Anchinhar, Ashish. ‘Editorials on the Collected Works of Gajendra Thakur: Diwan-e-Videha, Akulait Sur, and Swapname Mijjhar Hoit’. Videha, 2026. Separate review sections on poetry, ghazals, and songs.

Anchinhar, Ashish. ‘Editorials on the Collected Works of Gajendra Thakur: Gajendra Thakur's Parallel Philosophy’. Videha, 2026. Two sections of philosophical discussion.

Anchinhar, Ashish. ‘Editorials on the Collected Works of Gajendra Thakur: A Parallel History of Mithila and Maithili Literature’. Videha, 2026. A section of criticism on literary historiography.

Anchinhar, Ashish. ‘Editorials on the Collected Works of Gajendra Thakur: The History of Mithila, Vajji and Anga’. Videha, 2026. Two sections of historical criticism.

Anchinhar, Ashish. ‘Editorials on the Collected Works of Gajendra Thakur: Panji-Prabandha, Ancient Panjis, Utip Panji, Nagaram Panji, Genealogical Mapping and Dushan Panji’. Videha, 2026. Separate sections of archival criticism.

Anchinhar, Ashish. ‘Editorials on the Collected Works of Gajendra Thakur: Treatises, Essays, Criticism’. Videha, 2026. Two sections on theoretical and applied studies.

Anchinhar, Ashish. ‘Editorials on the Collected Works of Gajendra Thakur: Maithili–English and English–Maithili Thesauri’. Videha, 2026. A section on lexical-semantic resources.

Referenced Texts and Research Archives Published in Videha

Thakur, Gajendra. ‘A Critical Theory of the Maithili Children's Novel’. Videha, issue 447, 1 August 2026.

Thakur, Gajendra. ‘A Parallel Grammar, Composition and Linguistics of Maithili (Including Thethi-Angika and Bajjika)’. Videha, issue 447, 1 August 2026.

Thakur, Gajendra. ‘Bhamati, Atmatattvaviveka, Nyayakusumanjali and Tattvachintamani: Book Synopses and Critical Evaluation’. Videha, issue 447, 1 August 2026.

Thakur, Gajendra. ‘Mithila's Genealogical Registers: Lineage, Marriage, Dushan, Social Memory and Modern Rereading’. Videha, issue 447, 1 August 2026.

Thakur, Gajendra. ‘A Comprehensive Retrospective: A Comparative Study of Literature Translated from Sanskrit into Maithili’. Videha, issue 447, 1 August 2026.

Thakur, Gajendra. ‘Towards a Critical Theory of Dalit Literature in Maithili’. Videha, issue 440, 15 April 2026.

Thakur, Gajendra. ‘Towards a Feminist Critical Theory for Maithili’. Videha, issue 442, 15 May 2026.

Thakur, Gajendra. Research essays on ‘Sahasrabadhani’, ‘Sahasrashirsha’, ‘Anuvadak’, and ‘Rang-Sangam’. Videha, issue 450, 15 September 2026.

Videha Book Collection. A subject-classified catalogue of Videha's original, historical, and modern Maithili books. https://videha-ejournal.github.io/videha/pothi.htm

Videha Research Index. An integrated index of research essays on literary history, linguistics, and criticism. https://videha-ejournal.github.io/videha/research/index.html

Videha Research Articles, Issues 1–451. An index by author, research subject, and literary genre. https://videha-ejournal.github.io/videha/research/videha-scholar-research-book.html

Videha: The First Fortnightly Maithili E-Journal. A publishing space for literary archives, editorials, prose, poetry, Videha Sadeha, and parallel history. https://videha-ejournal.github.io/videha/index.htm

REVIEW 5

Priti Karan Setu Banhal

Bridges, Memory, and the Digital Public Sphere

Primary Work Reviewed: ‘Priti Karan Setu Banhal—Redefining Maithili’, edited by Ashish Anchinhar (2024).

Abstract

‘Priti Karan Setu Banhal—Redefining Maithili’ (2024), edited by Ashish Anchinhar, is a distinctive collective venture in contemporary Maithili critical literature. Its basic arrangement consists of three parts associated with Kripanand Thakur, Preeti Thakur, and Gajendra Thakur, but its thematic reach extends beyond family biography to comics, children's literature, oral tradition, digital journalism, genealogical research, scripts, dictionaries, publishing culture, novels, criticism, and alternative literary institutions. The present study reads the volume not merely as a collection of celebratory writing but as an active editorial structure for constructing literary reputation and cultural memory. On one hand, Preeti Thakur's comics seek to bring Mithila's diverse folk heroes to children through a visual language; on the other, the material associated with Gajendra Thakur reveals emerging possibilities for a digital Maithili public sphere and new resources of knowledge. The study also demonstrates that claims to priority, the social limitations of genealogical registers, personality-centred praise, and inconsistencies in editorial selection demand independent scrutiny. The volume's significance lies in this duality: it both supplies material for history and becomes an instrument of historical construction.

Keywords

Maithili literary history; Ashish Anchinhar; Preeti Thakur; Gajendra Thakur; comics; children's literature; Videha; genealogical registers; digital public sphere; parallel literary tradition; editorial criticism.

The Character of the Book and the Central Critical Question

‘Priti Karan Setu Banhal’ was published in 2024. Its publication details describe it as a critical appreciation of the work of Gajendra Thakur and Preeti Thakur. Its title is drawn from Mithila's folk-song tradition, while the English subtitle, ‘Redefining Maithili’, announces a contemporary aspiration. There is a productive tension between these indications: cultural continuity carried by the folk voice on one side, and an attempt to redefine language and literature in relation to new media, forms, and readers on the other. The critic's first question is how the volume connects these objectives, and where that connection succeeds or remains incomplete.

The volume is not a single argument by its editor. It brings together appraisals, disagreements, reminiscences, interviews, collections of information, and bibliographies by numerous writers. It would therefore be inappropriate to regard every statement as the editor's definitive position. Some essays undertake direct textual analysis; others offer biographical recollections, assemble research information, or argue for an author's social or cultural importance. These differences are not obstacles to analysis but structural features of the book. A suitable critical method distinguishes the original 'work', the 'response to a work', and the 'editorial arrangement'.

Of the three principal parts, the first centres on memories of Kripanand Thakur's life; the second concerns Preeti Thakur's comics, Mithila's folk divinities, the early history of comics, and interview material; the third offers a broad examination of Gajendra Thakur's digital, cultural, linguistic, and literary initiatives. The sequence moves from genealogical and familial information through children's literature towards publicly accessible literary institutions. It is thematic rather than chronological, and thus asks readers to discover connections across changing subjects for themselves.

Editorial Vision: Title, Folk Song, and the Structure of the Volume

According to the editor's own account, the title comes from a line associated with a barahmasa folk song. The decision to use different lines of the song to identify the contents, introduction, parts on Kripanand Thakur, Preeti Thakur and Gajendra Thakur, biographical notes, and conclusion is more than ornament. It is an attempt to introduce the language of folk culture into the structure of prose criticism. The 'bridge' symbol proposes connections not simply through the creative partnership of husband and wife, but between generations, older and newer media, oral and written memory, and mainstream and parallel readerships.

The editor's introduction expressly treats editing as an intellectual act requiring judgement rather than external decoration. He writes: 'Editing is essentially a matter of perspective, vision, and critical thinking.' This statement is central to the volume's understanding of itself. Soliciting contributions, including disagreements, recovering previously published materials, accepting differences of spelling, and supplying contextual information to readers are all practical manifestations of that 'vision'. The editor acknowledges that different contributors use different forms of language, and does not favour complete uniformity. The result preserves linguistic diversity, although it may sometimes challenge ease of reading and textual coherence.

To organise a volume through a folk song is to move Maithili's oral literature beyond a fixed division between 'high' and 'low' literary forms. Yet according symbolic prestige to a folk song is not the same as studying its singing community, gendered context, occasion of performance, varying versions, and social circumstances. The volume accomplishes the first task effectively and opens possibilities for the second, without pursuing them in every instance. Identifying this limitation does not diminish folk culture; it recognises the need for historical scrutiny of folk sources.

Kripanand Thakur: From Personal Reminiscence to Social History

Siyaram Jha ‘Saras’ contributes the principal essay of the first part, ‘Karot Pherait Gamak Nidarshak: K.N.T.’. Instead of a conventional biography arranged around dates of birth and death, it presents a village, schools, public life, cooperative social labour, and administrative and cultural surroundings. Memories of an earlier Madhubani, educational institutions, teachers, and rural theatre connect an individual's life with the public memory of an era. Here ‘personality’ is expressed not as private identity alone but through participation in a community.

The essay does not matter because it offers a definitive historical verdict on Kripanand Thakur; it matters because it makes a local source of social memory accessible. For researchers, an event, date, conversation, and felt experience narrated in memoir do not occupy identical evidentiary positions. Experience may convey literary truth, but not every recollected statement automatically becomes documentary proof. A critical reading accordingly receives this work as material for investigating changes in the rural middle class, education, cooperation, and public morality, not as a substitute for conclusive history. The first part thus introduces the question of cultural inheritance between generations that informs the volume as a whole.

Preeti Thakur's Comics: The Visual Remaking of Oral Narrative

Preeti Thakur's creative presence constitutes one of the book's most distinctive literary contributions. Professor Veena Thakur's discussion explains that of the sixteen stories in ‘Gonu Jha and Other Maithili Comics’ (2008), nine concern Gonu Jha; the others feature folk or historical figures such as Reshma-Chuharmal, Naika-Banijara, Bhagata Jyoti Punjiar, Mahua Ghatwarin, Raja Salhes, Chhechhan Maharaj, and Kalidasa. The observation ‘All the characters represent Mithila's culture’ discloses the genre's principal intention. Their selection maps a shared geography of oral legend, folk belief, wit, resourcefulness, resistance, and the memories of marginalised communities.

A comic is not merely an illustrated transcription of a folktale. Where the linear sequence of words conducts reading in one direction, the arrangement of images allows the eye to move among objects, characters, and gestures simultaneously. Unfilled space, facial expression, sequential panels, condensed dialogue, and visual memory create a new narrative rhythm. To restrict Preeti Thakur's work to ‘children's entertainment’ would therefore diminish its aesthetic accomplishment. Familiar narratives of Mithila acquire a new medium of reception when transformed into visual stories. The criticism collected in the volume recognises the change, although it devotes less sustained formal attention to panel design, chromatic sequence, point of view, and word-image relations.

Comparing the essays by Professor Veena Thakur, Dr Raman Jha, Shiv Kumar Jha 'Tillu', Dhirendra Kumar, and Durganand Mandal reveals that the defining characteristics of comics are not understood uniformly. Some see them as instruments of cultural preservation, others as remedies for the scarcity of children's literature, introductions to Mithila's popular and subaltern heroes, or the foundation of a new genre. Reading these positions together shows that 'preservation' and 'creation' are different but connected undertakings. When orally transmitted stories acquire a visual form, their inherited content is not merely retained unchanged; it is also reorganised in relation to the sensibilities and curiosity of a new generation.

'Maithili Comics' (2009) includes subjects such as Raja Salhes, Dina-Bhadri, Naika-Banijara, Bodhi Kayastha, and the final years of Vidyapati's life. The selection is not simply a hierarchy of fame. The traditions of Dina-Bhadri, associated with the Musahar community, and of Salhes have particular caste and social foundations. Comics offer an opportunity to connect these memories to a larger readership of children. Yet it would be premature, without comparing the original oral traditions with their visual adaptations, to conclude that every depiction does full justice to the perspectives of the communities represented. The opportunity for representation and the adequacy of representation are separate questions.

Children's Literature, Women's Writing, and Language Acquisition

Dr Shefalika Verma's essay questions the tendency to place women's writing at the margins of literary history. This context protects Preeti Thakur's work from being reduced to an appendix to the work of her writer-husband. The volume itself attends to the distinction: Preeti Thakur has her own independent choices and accomplishments in comics, illustration, translation, and writing for children. Sociologically, this matters because the presence of women writers is becoming visible not only in poetry or the expected domains of domestic writing, but also in visual technology and the spread of language.

Preeti Thakur's interview supplies an autobiographical basis for the discussion. Asked when she began making pictures, she replies: 'I used to draw from childhood; when my son was born in 2000 and began to speak, the thought came to me.' This brief answer makes domestic experience a source of creativity without confining the work to the home. Children's reading interests, the need for pictures, the coexistence of books and electronic media, and the question of accessible language all emerge in the interview. Such direct testimony from a creator is valuable, although autobiographical accounts must still be distinguished from critical interpretation.

The relation between the mother tongue and children's literature is decisive here. A language does not remain alive solely through a school curriculum or constitutional recognition. Through household conversation, play, storytelling, visual art, and pleasurable reading, a child comes to inhabit it as a linguistic world. Comics can be effective at precisely this threshold, where oral stories and alphabetic reading meet. Yet the assertion that any individual book has resolved a crisis of language transmission would exceed the evidence. A sustained response must involve regular publishing, libraries, schools, distribution, and research into readers.

Testing Claims to 'Being First' in Literary History

The introduction and materials on the early history of comics present Preeti Thakur as the first Maithili woman comics writer. The gathered records identify a sequence: translations 'Chhot a Paigh' (2002) and 'Mal-Jal a Janwar Dis Dekhu' (2003); the original publication 'Gonu Jha and Other Maithili Comics' (2008); 'Maithili Comics' (2009); 'Folk Divinities of Mithila' (2010); and 'Vidyapati's Purush Pariksha' (2012). Their historical value lies partly in allowing a distinction between 'the first comic' and 'the first original comic'. The history of translation must not be erased from the history of original composition.

However, claims to absolute priority depend upon a clear definition of the genre. A single-panel cartoon, a newspaper caricature, a serial picture strip, a translated comic, an original comic, and an extended graphic narrative do not constitute one undifferentiated category. Ashish Anchinhar's historical essay investigates earlier achievements and remains open to revision when new evidence appears. Within the collection, Dhirendra Kumar's remarks also offer a different indication concerning preceding comics. Rather than suppressing this alternative voice as an inconsistency, it should be recognised as a productive challenge to historical scholarship. Preeti Thakur's achievement is important on the evidence presented, but no categorical conclusion for all time is secure without a systematic examination of earlier periodical materials.

Videha's book catalogue, which separately classifies original and translated works, provides a useful tool for such examination. More than a listing of available books, it can enable the history of a genre to distinguish the type of work, language, medium, and sequence of revised editions. The question raised by this volume will be most fruitful for future literary history if the study of comics becomes not merely a dispute over publication dates but a history of aesthetics, readership, visual language, and social representation.

Digital Journalism and the Literary Public Sphere

The third part, devoted to Gajendra Thakur, begins with digital libraries and journalism. Kalpana Jha's essay demonstrates the usefulness of free book resources through the experience of accessible reading. Kirtinath Jha considers two historical obstacles to publication—finance and editorial approval—and sees alternative points of entry in digital media. Lal Dev Kamat's essay traces technological and communicative changes of medium. Read alongside the editor's introduction, these perspectives show that web journalism here concerns not merely news dissemination but the redistribution of literary opportunity.

Several contributors discuss the beginnings of a web presence and stages in the development of ‘Bhalsarik Gachh’, ‘Samadiya’, and ‘Videha’. It is prudent to read their dates as claims supported by particular sources rather than as a single settled chronology. Starting a blog, naming an electronic journal, establishing regular fortnightly publication, and institutionalising a publishing structure are different events. References to Videha's fortnightly publication beginning in 2008 are important in these assessments; to produce its complete chronology, however, the original issues, editorial notices, and extant archives must be collated.

Democratisation of publication inevitably raises difficult questions. The presence of a book in a digital collection is not the same as its effective accessibility to rural students, economically disadvantaged readers, or people with limited devices. Free access lowers one barrier, but equipment, connectivity, searchability, script support, accommodations for visual disability, long-term preservation, and the critical quality of content also determine access. The principal achievement of the collected material is to establish the necessity of digital media; its next critical stage should assemble social evidence about access and investigate how people actually read.

From ‘Mithila Mihir’ to ‘Videha’: Continuity and Rupture

Lakshman Jha ‘Sagar’, in ‘Mithila Mihir and the Videha Web Journal’, creates an opportunity to compare the cultural role of a traditional periodical with the achievement of a digital fortnightly. The historical standing of ‘Mithila Mihir’ rested upon its cultivation of a shared site for publication, editorial selection, and literary discussion in Maithili. In the case of ‘Videha’, the medium changes: the internet replaces physical distribution, reproducible materials replace restricted print runs, and an alternative community of writers challenges the centralised point of entry. Yet the basic questions of a literary journal—whose writing is admitted, according to what criteria, and how it is received—remain alive in both periods.

Such a comparison should not collapse into the binary judgement ‘the old was superior’ versus ‘the new is more democratic’. The institutional memory of older journals and the immediacy of digital access are different strengths. Their editorial economies, linguistic standards, reach among readers, spaces for dissent, and capacities for preservation offer comparative terms for literary history. The volume initiates this comparison but does not present systematic longitudinal data on circulation, regular readership, editorial policies, and participation. This is both its use and its limitation.

Genealogical Registers: Heritage, Lineage, and the Politics of the Archive

Essays on genealogical registers by Vinayanand Jha, Jagdishchandra Thakur ‘Anil’, Dr Kailash Kumar Mishra, and Bhavnath Jha constitute an important thematic cluster. Such registers are not merely instruments for understanding marriage rules relating to lineage and gotra: they also record villages of origin, clans, individuals, chronology, social relationships, and historical displacement. Publishing and digitising these sources can open old manuscript materials to researchers and curious general readers alike. The volume attributes the work of 'genome mapping' and the editing of registers jointly to Gajendra Thakur, Nagendra Kumar Jha, and the genealogist Vidyanand Jha. Amid accounts of individual accomplishment, this dimension of cooperation should not be forgotten.

Recognising the historical usefulness of genealogies does not eliminate the question of social selection. Communities excluded from records of particular names, ranks, and marriage practices will be less visible in them. The silence of a source can itself become a social fact. Research must therefore ask which communities were documented and for what social purposes, how original entries are distinguished from later copies, and how evidence obtained from genealogies can be compared with other historical materials. Severing the work of 'preservation' from social justice risks making the historical source merely an instrument of lineage prestige.

Within the volume, Bhavnath Jha raises practical concerns about presentation, the organisation of headings, and accessibility to readers. The historical importance of these criticisms should not be underestimated. Sheer quantities of material do not automatically create usefulness. Research requires control over textual variants, indexes of names, source identification, an explicit transliteration policy, and facilities for checking readings. Thus the combined argument of these essays goes beyond commendation: developing methods for scholarly use of the archived materials is as necessary as making those materials available.

Language, Script, and Dictionaries: The Literary Importance of Foundational Work

Uday Narayan Singh 'Nachiketa' situates Maithili–English, English–Maithili, and computational-terminology projects within a wide history of lexicography. Literary histories usually foreground poetry, fiction, and drama, but literary production across genres has a precarious foundation without dictionaries, writing technologies, spelling standards, and accessible semantic information. It may be tempting to divide lexicographical labour from creative work. Yet decisions about a word's semantic field, evidence of usage, historical variants, dialectal diversity, and technical neologisms shape the intellectual future of a language community.

Discussion of publishing materials in multiple scripts, including Tirhuta, demonstrates that script is not merely a question of pride in historical inheritance but also of practical reading rights. Making the same language accessible in different scripts can reduce the distance between heritage and contemporary access. Sustainable multiscript publication nevertheless requires standardised character encoding, search facilities, checks for translation and transliteration errors, and training for new readers. Work on dictionaries and scripts should therefore be placed not at the margins of literary history but within the structural history of literary communication.

‘Kurukshetram Antarmanak’: Generic Intermixture and Intellectual Expansion

In the collection, Uday Narayan Singh ‘Nachiketa’ discusses seven divisions of ‘Kurukshetram Antarmanak’, covering treatises, essays and criticism, novels, poetry, stories, drama, epic, and literature for children and adolescents. The list does more than affirm an author's productivity; it suggests an aspiration towards a many-sided creative programme in contemporary Maithili. Where critical study, narrative, drama, and experiments in language for children coexist within one creative world, generic boundaries cannot remain fixed.

However, versatility does not automatically entail artistic success. A work intellectually expansive in conception may be less concentrated in its plot; linguistic daring may increase demands upon readers. The presence of multiple critics addressing ‘Kurukshetram Antarmanak’ makes divergent evaluations possible. Rajdev Mandal's epistolary response, Shiv Kumar Jha ‘Tillu”s readerly assessment, and Ashok's study of the novel offer different forms of critical expression. Rather than subsuming these approaches under one conclusion, they should be allowed to test one another.

‘Sahasrabadhani’: A Narrative of Social Change Within the Family

Arvind Thakur's ‘Sahasrabadhani: In My View (Some Observations)’ can be counted among the more closely text-based studies in this collection. His opening proposition is: ‘“Sahasrabadhani” is essentially the story of the successive evolution of four generations of one family.’ A multigenerational family narrative renders social change not as an abstract political declaration but through concrete forms of education, professions, opportunities, humiliation, decisions, and family tensions. Examining relationships between characters and generations, the critic begins to interpret new education, structures succeeding colonial rule, and modern professional institutions.

From this perspective, the study of ‘Sahasrabadhani’ can also become an examination of the internal fragmentation of a family history. What one generation calls progress, the next recognises as limited. Tensions between public power and private ambition form the narrative's ethical terrain. The criticism available here is valuable because it concentrates less on laudatory adjectives than on the relationship between narrative structure and social change. Nevertheless, a critical account quoted within the collection cannot be treated as the final standard for the novel without independent attention to its entire text.

Social Inequality, Narrative Form, and the Parallel Tradition

Abha Jha's 'Stories That Penetrate the Layers of Social Inequality' identifies caste divisions, women's experiences, hunger, migration, the commercialisation of education, ecology, and structures of power within Gajendra Thakur's fiction. The essay is especially valuable because it insists on reading literature through the complexity of social experience rather than through generic prestige or linguistic skill alone. Yet a story's ethical significance cannot be established simply by listing its subjects. Point of view, contradictions within characters, the narrator's distance, and the final artistic effect are also decisive. Social realism should be evaluated with these distinctions in mind.

Acharya Ramanand Mandal's essay explicitly raises the question of relations between the mainstream and parallel currents of Maithili literature. Here literary history is not just a succession of celebrated authors, but a history of the institutions that confer prestige. Who entered the curriculum? Whose works were reprinted? Who received prizes or opportunities for review? Which dialects and social classes were accepted as the substance of 'standard literature'? Such questions must occupy the centre of critical historiography. Nonetheless, treating the mainstream and its alternatives as two impermeable camps could conceal their internal disagreements, inequalities, and mutual influences. The volume raises this complex problem, and its strongest reading leaves the inquiry open.

The Place of Dissent: Internal Criticism in a Celebratory Collection

A familiar risk in books devoted to individual personalities is that critical disagreement becomes submerged in honorific language. Dhanakar Thakur's essay 'Videha and Gajendra' resists this danger. Its opening declaration —'Gajendra Thakur is not Videha, nor was or is Videha Gajendra'—insists upon a distinction between an individual and an institution. Dhanakar Thakur objects to aspects of editorial decision-making, the awards system, presentation, and organisational structure. Such objections are not necessarily universally accepted conclusions, but their presence widens the collection's critical horizon.

The initiating editor undoubtedly plays an important role in sustaining an institution. Yet its history also includes readers, writers, technical collaborators, associate editors, printers, and the social support that enables its work. Many essays in the volume accord considerable personal credit, while some register collective labour. Distinguishing the language of 'heroic individual achievement' from that of 'institutional history' helps illuminate this unevenness. The book's critical capacity increases when it permits disagreement; its evidentiary value diminishes when intense praise replaces argument.

Interviews and Editorial Commentary: Constructing a Living History

Alongside Preeti Thakur's interview, the collection includes earlier conversations with Gajendra Thakur and a newer interview. Such materials provide direct evidence of contemporary opinions, disagreements, and self-assessments. Placing earlier and later accounts together makes it possible to examine changes and continuities in claims over time. This is an important contribution to biographical literature: beyond the author's works and their external reception, the author discusses the rationale, limitations, and programme of his own activities.

Yet an interview is also a form of self-presentation. The interviewer's interests, public controversies, and the respondent's circumstances influence the answers. Interviews are therefore best treated as records of thought at particular moments, not as entirely impartial histories. Editorial notes create dialogue among contributors, but when they merely offer a rebuttal without examining the original critic's question in full, the reader must keep these two levels of criticism distinct. Recognising the distinction protects the reader's independence in interpreting disagreement.

A Comparative Framework for Literary History

The history of Maithili literature has generally been organised as a development from early poetry, medieval courtly and devotional verse, through modern journalism, the novel, short fiction, and contemporary literary creation. ‘Priti Karan Setu Banhal’ introduces another important axis into this broad sequence: the history of the media through which literature circulates socially. If a history beginning with Vidyapati's poetic stature or the prose of ‘Varnaratnakara’ remains only a catalogue of great works, changes involving comics, children's language, libraries, manuscript preservation, script accessibility, and digital public spaces will receive insufficient attention. The collection helps make this absence visible, although it is not itself a complete literary history.

The book's opening through a folk song, the visual reanimation of folk heroes in Preeti Thakur's comics, and the public accessibility of manuscript genealogies discussed in the essays together constitute a history of ‘memory and media’ that crosses the conventional ancient–medieval–modern division. In this perspective, a literary inheritance is not a fixed body of material but a sequence of textual variants and transformations. Oral voices, printed books, newspapers, electronic journals, dictionaries, and readers' discussions change one another. This interdependence can serve as a foundation for writing the literary history of contemporary Maithili.

Comparing the journalistic tradition of ‘Mithila Mihir’ with Videha's online publication offers an opportunity to understand the social effects of changing media. Earlier, editing, postal distribution, printing, and restricted institutional entry were central; the newer period allows digitisation, continued archiving, and extensive redistribution. But the digital age is not automatically egalitarian. Measures of popularity, editorial prejudices, unequal access to networks, and the problems of permanent preservation may reproduce old inequalities in new forms. This qualification makes the historical comparison more even-handed.

Structural Imbalance and the Responsibilities of Criticism

The title of the volume presents Preeti Thakur and Gajendra Thakur together, but their proportions within the contents are unequal. The sequence contains one extended memoir of Kripanand Thakur, ten critical, historical, or interview-related contributions on Preeti Thakur, and twenty-nine named essays and interviews on Gajendra Thakur. This imbalance is not merely arithmetic; it concerns the distribution of readers' attention. The announced restitution of a woman's literary history would have been more effective if the aesthetics of visual storytelling, the adaptation of comics, direct responses from child readers, and the study of creative labour had received fuller treatment.

A second limitation is the recurrence of celebratory vocabulary. Adjectives such as ‘historic’, ‘unprecedented’, ‘first’, and ‘vast’ register the energy of an achievement in many of the essays, but do not constitute scholarly conclusions without cross-checking their sources. The presence of different writers' opinions is natural in an edited volume; research nevertheless requires verified timelines for such claims, documentary foundations, and adequate consideration of earlier attempts. The volume supplies a great deal of material for conducting these inquiries, which remains one of its admirable qualities.

A third limitation is the uneven depth of historical treatment. Extensive material on genealogical registers is available, but the contradictions within stories of folk heroes, the aesthetics of the visual medium, the readership of periodicals, and the social use of free archives require further comparative study. These limitations should not be understood merely as deficiencies: they provide a map of potential research topics. The volume raises questions whose solutions might not have fitted within a single edited book.

Research Method, Evidence, and the Reliability of Interpretation

This study compares the original collection's editorial introduction, arrangement of parts, thematic clusters, selected reviews, interviews, and internal bibliographies. Statements about historical sequences are treated as the claims of the respective contributors. Where Videha's book catalogue permits additional confirmation of a publication year or genre, it is used as a supplementary source. This method avoids the error of treating an author's original work and a reviewer's assessment of that work as a single thing.

Historical interpretation requires distinctions among levels of reference. The availability of a published work is one sort of fact; declaring it the ‘first’ or the ‘best’ is a different sort of judgement; measuring its social effects calls for a third kind of inquiry. Without these distinctions, literary homage may pass for history. Likewise, the presence of folk traditions in comics can be established by examining their content, but proof that such representation has eliminated social discrimination would require an entirely different body of evidence.

Conclusion: The ‘Bridge’ Reconsidered

The lasting importance of ‘Priti Karan Setu Banhal’ is that it does not confine literary work in Maithili to the narrow act of publishing creative writing. The social memory of schools and villages, visual narratives made by a woman artist, renewed readings of folk divinities and neglected heroes, the public sphere of digital journals, the historical preservation of genealogies, the construction of scripts and dictionaries, and the social criticism embodied in fiction collectively reveal a much larger structure of literary life. Literary history encompasses not only celebrated works and names but also media, collaborators, readers, editors, and conditions of access. This is the volume's especially significant insight.

Alongside these achievements, its critical limitations are clear. Further research must establish documentary support for its claims, offer more balanced consideration of female and male creators, distinguish personal prestige from the independent history of institutions, examine social exclusions in the genealogical record, and study digital access objectively. The disagreements already represented in the collection legitimise this programme. A ‘bridge’ exists in the fullest sense only where praise, questions, evidence, and dissent can meet in dialogue. By this measure, the edited volume emerges as an important source for contemporary Maithili criticism, a polyphonic cultural document, and a provocative foundation for future literary historiography.

Extended Bibliography

The primary references are essays and interviews published in the original collection. Supplementary publication details have been drawn only from Videha's literary archive.

- Anchinhar, Ashish, ed. ‘Priti Karan Setu Banhal—Redefining Maithili’. 2024. ISBN 978-93-340-0956-9.
- Anchinhar, Ashish. ‘Pratham Ganesh Pad Gaol Devata Manaol He…’ (editorial introduction). In the aforementioned collection.
- Jha, Siyaram ‘Saras’. ‘Karot Pherait Gamak Nidarshak: K.N.T.’. In the aforementioned collection.
- Verma, Dr Shefalika. ‘Preeti Thakur's Gonu Jha and Other Maithili Comics’. In the aforementioned collection.
- Thakur, Professor Veena. ‘Gonu Jha and Other Maithili Comics’. In the aforementioned collection.
- Jha, Dr Raman. ‘Gonu Jha and Other Maithili Comics and Maithili Comics’. In the aforementioned collection.

- Jha, Shiv Kumar 'Tillu'. 'Gonu Jha and Other Maithili Comics'; 'Maithili Comics'; 'Folk Divinities of Mithila'. In the aforementioned collection.
- Kumar, Dhirendra. 'A Look at Both of Preeti Thakur's Comics'. In the aforementioned collection.
- Mandal, Durganand. 'Beautiful Comics for Children'. In the aforementioned collection.
- Anchinhar, Ashish. 'The Early History of Maithili Comics, 2002–2016'. In the aforementioned collection.
- Thakur, Preeti. 'An Interview with Preeti Thakur, the First Woman Comics Writer in Maithili'. Interviewer: Ashish Anchinhar. In the aforementioned collection.
- Jha, Kalpana. 'The Videha Digital Library: A Blessing for Reading Enthusiasts'. In the aforementioned collection.
- Jha, Kirtinath. 'Gajendra Thakur: A Pioneer of Maithili Digital Journalism'. In the aforementioned collection.
- Kamat, Lal Dev. 'Gajendra Thakur: Maithili's Internet Man'. In the aforementioned collection.
- Jha, Vinayanand. 'Gajendra Thakur's Contribution to Genealogical Literature'. In the aforementioned collection.
- Thakur, Jagdishchandra 'Anil'. 'What Is Panji-Prabandha?'. In the aforementioned collection.
- Mishra, Dr Kailash Kumar. 'Dushan Panji: Gajendra Thakur's Universal Contribution to Maithili Culture'. In the aforementioned collection.
- Jha, Bhavnath. 'Mithila's Genealogical Registers and Shri Gajendra Thakur's Work towards Their Preservation'. In the aforementioned collection.
- Mishra, Dr Shiv Kumar. 'Gajendra Thakur: A Guardian of Mithila's Heritage'. In the aforementioned collection.
- Singh, Uday Narayan 'Nachiketa'. 'On Gajendra Thakur's Maithili–English, English–Maithili, and English–Maithili Computer Dictionaries'. In the aforementioned collection.
- Jha, Lakshman 'Sagar'. 'Mithila Mihir and the Videha Web Journal'. In the aforementioned collection.
- Srinivas, Shivshankar. 'Special Issues of Maithili Journals (With Particular Reference to Issues Devoted to Individuals)'. In the aforementioned collection.
- Thakur, Dhanakar. 'Videha and Gajendra'. In the aforementioned collection.
- Jha, Dr Yoganand. 'Shri Gajendra Thakur: A Devoted Practitioner of Maithili Literature'. In the aforementioned collection.
- Singh, Uday Narayan 'Nachiketa'. 'Gajendra Thakur's Kurukshetram Antarmanak'. In the aforementioned collection.
- Ashok. 'Gajendra Thakur and His Novel'. In the aforementioned collection.
- Thakur, Arvind. 'Sahasrabadhani: In My View (Some Observations)'. In the aforementioned collection.
- Mandal, Rajdev. 'A Letter concerning Kurukshetram Antarmanak (An Epistolary Review)'. In the aforementioned collection.
- Singh, Professor Premshankar. 'The Tradition of Children's Poetry in Maithili'. In the aforementioned collection.

• Jha, Abha. ‘Stories That Penetrate the Layers of Social Inequality’. In the aforementioned collection.
• Mandal, Acharya Ramanand. ‘The Writer Gajendra Thakur: His Life and Works’. In the aforementioned collection.
• Datta, Mukesh. ‘Gajendra Thakur and New Dimensions in Maithili Web Journalism’. In the aforementioned collection.
• Anchinhar, Ashish. ‘Discussion of Shruti Prakashan and Nagendra Kumar Jha in Connection with the Publication of Panji-Prabandha’. In the aforementioned collection.
• Thakur, Gajendra. ‘An Interview with Gajendra Thakur’. Interviewer: Ashish Anchinhar. In the aforementioned collection.
• Videha. ‘Archive of Maithili Books: Catalogue, Original and Translated Works of Preeti Thakur, and Gajendra Thakur's Book Resources’. Videha E-Journal book collection, https://videha-ejournal.github.io/videha/pothi.htm (accessed October 2026).
• Videha. ‘Videha E-Journal and Literary Resources’. https://videha-ejournal.github.io/videha/ (accessed October 2026).

REVIEW 6

Setusham: Vibrant Maithili

The Bridge as Metaphor and an Inclusive Literary History

Research Abstract

Edited by Ashish Anchinhar, ‘Setusham: Vibrant Maithili’ documents the institutional transformation of modern Maithili literature alongside the creative work of Preeti Thakur and Gajendra Thakur. The collection contains two essays on Preeti Thakur's children's literature and comics, and fourteen on Gajendra Thakur's digital editing, preservation of genealogies, lexicography, multiscript publishing, emerging writers, commitment to ordinary people, criticism, and literary history. The central argument of this study is that the book's significance lies not merely in celebrating two individuals but in regarding literature as a composite phenomenon of creation, institutional structure, dissemination, archives, editorial selection, and readers' participation. The bridge metaphor derived from Vedic chant, the place of women's writing for children, the entry of caste and class into literary discussion, the possibilities of a digital library, and disengagement from the culture of public literary platforms both conflict and connect with one another. Yet uneven documentary evidence, the celebratory orientation of several contributors, comparatively limited attention to women's creative achievement, and the need to verify numerous claims to priority also reveal the volume's limitations. Reading these tensions critically, the essay proposes a multicentred view of literary history.

Keywords: Maithili literature; Ashish Anchinhar; Preeti Thakur; Gajendra Thakur; Videha; comics; digital humanities; genealogical registers; popular commitment; parallel history; editing.

The Central Critical Problem: Text, Individual, and Institution

The literary histories of modern Indian languages have commonly been constructed through chronological lists of celebrated works by poets, storytellers, novelists, and critics. The work of journal editors, those who make books available, the preservation of forgotten manuscripts, early mentoring of new writers, and the creation of a visual literary world for child readers have often remained peripheral. 'Setusham' addresses that periphery. Counting 'how many books were written' will not suffice to understand what the volume brings forward. We must ask how the books reached readers, whose language was published, whose memories were preserved, and which literary voices received recognition.

For this reason, criticism of 'Setusham' must proceed on two levels. The first consists of the contributors' respective arguments: praise, experience, historical description, dissent, and proposals for the future. The second is the collection itself as an edited literary work: its organisation, anticipated readership, title, subdivisions, Vedic allusions, relations among essays, and ideological unevenness. Keeping these levels distinct reveals what the volume establishes through direct evidence and where it depends on value judgements or personal experience. Independent criticism must preserve this difference rather than effacing it out of loyalty or disagreement.

The Architecture of the Collection and Editorial Autonomy

The collection opens with an extensive introduction by the editor, Ashish Anchinhar. A descriptive list of contributions follows, together with a brief section on Preeti Thakur's writing and a substantially larger one on the diverse work of Gajendra Thakur. Munni Kamat and Ira Mallik open a discussion of women's creativity, children as readers, and visual language. Kailash Kumar Thakur, Vikas Vatsanabh, Bhairav Lal Das, Poonam Jha 'Sudha', Shiv Kumar Prasad, Kalpana Jha, Munnaji, Dhanakar Thakur, Hitnath Jha, Praveen Kumar Jha, Kundan Karn, Jagadanand Jha 'Manu', Ujjwal Kumar Jha, and Mukesh Anand then address differing dimensions of the digital literary sphere. Their distinctive social experiences, styles, and disciplines of knowledge partly prevent the collection from becoming a uniformly laudatory testimonial.

The numerical ratio of two to fourteen contributors is not an incidental statistic; it is an editorial circumstance that affects meaning. The title and introduction claim a shared creative enterprise, but most of the discussion concentrates on Gajendra Thakur's institutional achievements and intellectual labour. Preeti Thakur's independent contributions receive relatively limited space. Readers are consequently invited to imagine a joint achievement without receiving equivalently developed accounts of both. It is more reasonable to identify this as a structural limitation than to declare it a proven defect of editorial intention. Naming the imbalance is a first condition of recognising Preeti Thakur's independent literary position.

In the introduction, the editor explains the new collection's complementary relationship with the previously edited 'Priti Karan Setu Banhal—Redefining Maithili'. Where the first volume adopted a folk-song-based presentation, the new one links its internal parts through Vedic verses. The editor also explains why fresh essays were solicited, repeated contributions by previous authors restricted, and space offered to writers outside the mainstream. This editorial self-examination matters: the book comments on its own structure and can be understood not only as a thematic anthology but as an exposition of the theory of editing.

The Semantic Structure of Setusham: Chant, Bridge, and Public Ethics

The title 'Setusham' derives its meaning from a contemporary rereading of an ancient Vedic chant. Distinguishing the original mantra from its sung rendition, the editor identifies four symbolic means of crossing beyond anger, greed, disbelief, and falsehood. His compact interpretation reads: 'Build four bridges; cross four obstacles.' The importance of this statement lies less in a perfectly identical literal meaning than in the new critical use of a cultural allusion. The bridge of the Samaveda becomes a metaphor for literary ethics: the path of creation is made not through individual talent alone but through exchange, restraint, trustworthiness, and cooperation.

The editor goes on to identify the culture of literary stages, garlands and microphones, attachment to awards, plagiarism, and efforts to block the progress of other writers as obstacles in literary life. The mythic-religious allusion thereby enters contemporary institutional criticism. The metaphor's strength is that it offers readers an ethical vocabulary of evaluation; its limitation is that ethical ideals cannot themselves verify factual achievements. Critiques of literary prizes and the actual practices of conferring honours, for example, require investigation through different sets of historical evidence.

Discussing the relation between folk tradition and Vedic culture, the editor explicitly chooses the order 'folk–Veda'. The first volume's folk singing and the second's Vedic illumination become different expressions of one cultural connection. The history of that relationship, however, has never been uniform: the independence of folk traditions, women's song cultures, the power relations embedded in genealogical registration, and the prestige assigned to Vedic learning must all remain visible. Ignoring these tensions would reduce 'folk–Veda' to a decorative emblem. Reading it as a question makes it a measure of the volume's inclusive claims.

Preeti Thakur's Comics: An Independent Creative Sphere in Children's Literature

Munni Kamat's ‘Mrs Preeti Thakur: An Accomplished Writer for the Child's Mind’ regards children's literature as a foundation for a language's future. She emphasises accessible stories, visual attraction, and familiarity with folk culture for young readers. She discusses ‘Gonu Jha and Other Maithili Comics’, ‘Maithili Comics’, ‘Folk Divinities of Mithila’, and ‘Vidyapati's Purush Pariksha’. Through these works, folk figures distinguished by wit and intelligence, Mithila's heroic legends, folk divinities, and classical narratives re-enter the world of children. Comics thus combine language acquisition with cultural remembrance rather than serving solely as entertainment for the young.

Ira Mallik's ‘Preeti Thakur's Contribution to Maithili Comics’ extends this discussion into the study of visual art. She emphasises the interplay of line, colour, figure, traditional kachni and bharni techniques, and narrative subject. The translation of a literary story into pictures alters its sequence, atmosphere, physical expression of characters, and the reader's inferences. A young reader, in particular, makes narrative connections through images while still developing a vocabulary. An effective comic does not render words meaningless: picture and language compensate for one another's limitations.

Historical discussions of children's literature must treat claims about ‘the first’ comics cautiously. Contributors provide historical information, but decisive priority cannot be established without comparative catalogues of earlier periodicals, schoolbooks, popular picture series, and privately published materials. A more trustworthy conclusion is that the volume records an important stage in establishing the generic standing of Preeti Thakur's experiments with Maithili comics. Its editorial assessment can be developed through separate examinations of the original works' plots, visual composition, and language.

The Active Child Reader: From Text to Image

A particular experiment discussed by Munni Kamat in relation to Preeti Thakur's writing deserves attention: the child identifies a story, supplies a title to the image, adds dialogue, and fills in colours. The reader here is not merely a consumer but acquires the role of co-creator. Filling a story's gaps personally can encourage narrative understanding, decision-making, visual imagination, language practice, and confidence. This aspect locates comics at an intersection of childhood education and literary creation.

Yet children do not share a single age, linguistic background, or visual experience. The effectiveness of comics must therefore be tested against differences among young readerships, the clarity of pictures, ease of language, and actual responses from children. The collection provides comparatively little systematic research of this kind. Assessment often rests on adjectives such as ‘beautiful’, ‘simple’, and ‘successful’. A further critical step would be to examine, in each comic collection, the independence of characters, women's agency, representations of caste, transformation of folk divinities, and the moral consequences of endings. This would bring the specifically literary character of Preeti Thakur's achievement into sharper focus.

Digital Maithili: Beyond Publication to Linguistic Infrastructure

The essays by Kailash Kumar Thakur and Vikas Vatsanabh do not regard digital transformation as merely a story of building websites. They jointly discuss an early internet presence, Videha's regular publication, access for established and new writers, dictionaries, experimentation with multiple scripts, and the possibility of searchable literature. Within such an infrastructure, an editor is more than someone who accepts submissions: the editor becomes an intermediary in distributing texts, building archives, and connecting communities of readers. As literary history examines the role of the printing press, so the digital age requires analysis of universally available repositories of texts and open editorial processes.

In Videha's case, multiscript publication raises an essential question about Maithili identity: language and script are not the same thing. Devanagari can expand readership, preservation of Tirhuta and Kaithi maintains links with history, and other scripts enlarge the range of linguistic expression. Yet an announcement of multiscript publication differs from practical readability. An achievement cannot be regarded as complete without evidence at the level of actual use: accurate Unicode text, standardised transliteration, printability, searchability, accessibility for readers with visual impairments, and long-term preservation.

Vikas Vatsanabh's discussion of dictionaries provides a foundation for this argument. The compilation of Maithili–English, English–Maithili, and computational terminology is connected to the practical life of a language in digital settings. Coining words is not merely a translator's problem: science education, administration, technological communication, and writers' confidence depend upon it. A modern literary history may recognise lexicographers and language technologists as contributors to the formation of a literary environment, although the linguistic accuracy of their dictionaries demands separate examination.

The Contradictions of Preserving Genealogies: Documents, Social Justice, and Rights

Bhairav Lal Das's ‘Gajendra Thakur's Contribution to Preserving Mithila's Genealogies’ is among the collection's most historically and socially complex essays. Genealogical registers provide material concerning lineages, marriage structures, family relationships, and local history; their customary uses have also been associated with caste rankings and social control. Das holds these facts together. While establishing the documentary significance of publishing genealogies, he discusses historical systems of genealogists, interventions by the Darbhanga Raj, changing marriage customs, and the physical deterioration of manuscripts. Preservation should therefore mean safeguarding the records with historical discernment, not idealising their older social arrangements unchanged.

Particular caution is needed when discussing work published under the name ‘genome mapping’. Compiling genealogical lineages and sequencing biological genetic material are not identical methods. The designation in the volume should be understood as a publication title and in the context of genealogical research, not as automatic evidence of genetic testing. Likewise, digital availability alone does not settle the question of public access: genealogies may disclose information about living people, raise issues of privacy, risk incorrect assignment of ancestry, and reproduce caste-based exclusion. A public-interest archive fulfils its purposes only when access, contextualisation, correction, and rights are governed by clear policies.

An important strength of Das's essay is that it leaves one-sided celebration behind and confronts the economic and managerial problems of preserving genealogies. The livelihood of genealogists, transmission of local knowledge, manuscripts that are disintegrating, and the needs of Maithils living far from home are considered together. The essay supplies a method for historically sensitive reading of the collection: history cannot be separated from the society in which people live.

Commitment to the People: Diversity of Thought and Democratic Entry

Poonam Jha ‘Sudha’, in ‘Diversity and Videha’, discusses diversity across language, authorship, and subject matter. Munnaji's ‘The Scarcity of Non-Upper-Caste Writers in Maithili and Gajendra Thakur’ sharply questions caste inequality in access to literary publication. Dhanakar Thakur's ‘Videha Journal's Commitment to the People’ mediates between these perspectives through a reasoned classification. He proposes five tests: commitment in language, commitment with regard to writers' social classes, commitment in themes and genres, commitment in awards, and commitment in special issues. Such distinctions turn a largely emotive expression into a subject open to critical verification.

The most significant subtlety of Dhanakar Thakur's discussion is that he acknowledges the existence of earlier Maithili writers from non-upper-caste communities while identifying the lack of an equally receptive literary environment for them. The assertions ‘there were no writers before’ and ‘there were no adequate editorial opportunities before’ are not the same. Preserving the difference is essential to social literary history. Videha's contribution can be evaluated more accurately through this conceptual precision.

Commitment to the people cannot be measured solely by a writer's caste identity. It is also necessary to examine the representation within literary works of labour, land, women's experiences, education, economic exploitation, vernacular speech, and local justice. Shiv Kumar Prasad's extended essay connects examples of numerous writers to their works. These examples suggest that evaluating literary representation requires both attention to the numbers of authors and to the internal forms of their writing. An inclusive journal's strength lies not merely in accommodating diverse voices but in daring to hold them to equally rigorous critical standards.

New Writers, Editorial Collaboration, and Literary Generations

Kalpana Jha's 'Videha and New Writers' places the educational role of editing at its centre. Refining a new writer's language, clarifying meaning, introducing earlier literary works, and fostering confidence before readers are forms of labour that often disappear behind a celebrated text's finished form. Kalpana Jha makes this invisible work part of literary inheritance. An important implication follows: nurturing new authors is not the displacement of older writers but the creation of a living conversation between inherited tradition and experiment.

Kundan Karn's brief autobiographical account turns this general argument into an engaging personal illustration. He describes his development as an emerging writer through writing on social media, contact with Munnaji, and an introduction to the journal. Its importance goes beyond homage: it gives a glimpse of the social processes by which writers are formed. Nevertheless, one person's experience cannot establish a universal account of all authors. A more comprehensive study would need to collect early publications, editorial exchanges, revised texts, and material from subsequent books.

Historical comparison here brings into view Maithili traditions of edited journals, village literary gatherings, school publications, and literary assemblies. Videha is not an entirely disconnected new creation but a digital extension of these traditions with a different social structure. Its differences lie in the speed of circulation, durable access, connections with migrant readers, and conversations across geography. Attending to both continuity and difference produces a more capable historiography.

The Theory of Criticism: Commitment and Closeness to the Text

Hitnath Jha's 'Gajendra Thakur and Maithili Literary Criticism' identifies forms of intellectual labour: discussions of short narrative forms, miniature stories, ghazals, haiku, prosody, verbal usage, and criticism of prose and verse. Quoting another work, the essay presents an important principle: 'A writer's ideology should be like salt in water, not oil in water.' As cited by Hitnath Jha, the statement means that ideology should dissolve into a work's meanings rather than form an external coating over its autonomous sensibility.

Yet 'ideology' and 'impartiality' should not be understood as a simple pair of opposites. Every critical act begins with certain questions, interests, values, or social experiences. Responsible criticism makes these premises transparent and substantiates its judgements through language, imagery, structure, plot, character, metre, or evidence. Hitnath Jha's study illuminates the need for genre-specific critical instruments in Maithili; evaluating their practical success, however, requires independent close readings.

At this point the book's metaphor enters into an interesting relation with critical method. An inclusive editor has a responsibility to publish articles expressing divergent views; a critic has no duty to declare every view equally valid, but must judge on evidence. 'Setusham' contributes precisely through this difficult coexistence: gathering different authorial perspectives while allowing readers to recognise the distinctions between them.

History, Dictionaries, and Multilingual Modernity

In Praveen Kumar Jha's biographical-literary account and Ujjwal Kumar Jha's discussion of cultural renewal, Gajendra Thakur appears as writer, editor, historian, lexicographer, and investigator of scripts. A common aim can be seen across these fields: not to sever the continuity of older knowledge, and not to allow a language's future to narrow for lack of modern resources. Manuscript preservation, dictionary making, translation, and digital publication are distinct kinds of labour. It would therefore be misleading to merge them into one generic celebration of an individual. Each demands its own technical evidence, practices of error correction, and tests of usefulness for readers.

Studies available in Videha's research index, including 'A Parallel History of Maithili Literature', 'A Critical Theory of Children's Novels in Maithili', and 'A Parallel Grammar, Composition and Linguistics of Maithili', show how this many-sided project extends through a series of texts. Their titles alone suggest an attempt to consider alternative readerships rather than confining literature to prestigious genres or one standard form of language. Their presence in a research catalogue does not, however, establish the quality of the works. That requires independent evaluation.

In the context of multilingual modernity, differences between Maithili experience in Nepal and India must also be remembered. Kailash Kumar Thakur's essay strongly conveys Nepalese experiences of Maithili usage, schooling, and pressure from state languages. Editorial notes explain these linguistic differences to readers. The point is that standardisation and correctness should not turn into enforced uniformity: the actual vocabulary and social situations of writers across the border deserve a place in the history of contemporary Maithili literature.

Absence from the Stage: An Alternative Understanding of the Literary Public Sphere

Mukesh Anand's 'Gajendra Thakur's Absence from Literary Platforms in Mithila and among Maithils: Causes and Effects' is the final principal essay of the collection. Its tone differs from that of many celebratory contributions. It raises uncomfortable questions about literary events, the politics of personal acquaintance, desires for honours, factional associations, and deficiencies in readers' judgement. The writer argues that sustained creative labour and regular appearances on public platforms are not identical. In this context 'absence' becomes less a negative void than the possibility of independent space for literary work.

Distance from literary platforms nevertheless cannot itself serve as the only evidence of ethical superiority. Literary gatherings offer direct readings, collective learning, and opportunities for argument; digital forums may complement rather than merely replace them. The essential question is how transparent such institutions are in their decisions, distribution of opportunities, and criticism. The standards applied to traditional institutions must also be applied to alternatives. Such symmetry would strengthen the book's intellectual credibility.

The Language of Praise and the Seriousness of Evidence

Essays by Jagadanand Jha 'Manu', Kundan Karn, and Ujjwal Kumar Jha contain numerous comparisons invoking extraordinary effort, incomparable service, and the shaping of an era. Such images have a social purpose: they make overlooked labour visible and produce a sense of respect. But 'unique', 'first', 'peerless', and 'epoch-making figure' cannot suffice for scholarly judgement. Decisive claims require bibliographies, publication records, comparisons with earlier works, dated evidence, and direct examples from texts. The volume does not consistently apply these standards with equal rigour.

An abundance of praise is itself a literary symptom. Where communities feel a lack of institutional recognition, sympathetic criticism may adopt the language of building an exemplary figure. Consequently, contradictions, shortcomings in form, or the limits of an author's ideas can be displaced from consideration. 'Setusham' also contains essays with searching questions that counterbalance this tendency. Its fullest value emerges when the reader treats praise and questioning as mutually corrective.

Close Readings: Four Critical Centres

A close reading of the editorial introduction places the 'bridge' at its first centre. Its primary meanings are to connect what is separate, cross an obstacle, and make a journey possible. From the introduction to the chapter organisation, this image is transformed from a religious allusion into a social action. It is easy to compare literary institutions to the two banks of a river, but the metaphor becomes effective when it raises questions: which banks have been connected, who remains unable to cross, and which social conditions make passage difficult? The title thus becomes a source of critical inquiry in its own right.

The second centre is the textual nature of Preeti Thakur's comics. Narrative here unfolds not only in words but in visual sequence. When Gonu Jha's ingenuity reaches children through pictures, it does more than produce humour: it offers a visual representation of folk knowledge. The creative representation of stories from 'Purush Pariksha' effects a particular change by transforming materials from a learned tradition into reading for children. Such transformations, however, require reconsideration of the source stories' unexamined assumptions concerning violence, caste, female characters, education, or morality. Without independently examining the original children's books, the present discussion can identify interpretive possibilities, not pronounce a final judgement.

The third centre is Bhairav Lal Das's essay, whose special quality is to connect documentary material with social processes. Discussing genealogies in relation to caste restrictions, genealogists' livelihoods, and changing forms of marriage reveals history together with its contradictions. The fourth centre is Dhanakar Thakur's essay, which divides commitment to the people into five criteria and turns editorial celebration into analysis. These two essays are particularly compelling examples of the critical possibilities within the collection.

Together, the four centres delineate the collection's central concerns: metaphor, visual storytelling, documents, and institutional ethics. They move beyond a conventional 'author–work' relation to establish the many-sided relationship of 'author–medium–society–reader'. At this level, 'Setusham' has the potential to become more than a tribute centred on individuals.

A Comparative Place in the History of Maithili Literature

Jyotirishwar's prose, Vidyapati's poetry, and the long tradition of folk narratives provide different foundations for Maithili literary expression. In earlier periods, circulation depended on complex relationships among manuscripts, singers, reading communities, courts, and local patrons. The development of modern printing and periodicals established new relations between literature and its audiences. Digital publication may be read as a third social stage, in which writing can travel great distances almost immediately and older materials can be retrieved with greater ease. This is not a straightforward narrative of 'progress' but a history of the advantages and losses associated with different media.

Most essays in 'Setusham' connect an author's creative activity with the history of literary dissemination. The volume can thus be regarded as a source for the institutional history of modern Maithili literature. Unlike a direct assessment of poems or stories, it finds literary value not only in the verbal beauty of creative writing but in editing, collecting, standardising, training, and work concerning language policy. A historically balanced comparison nevertheless cannot exclude earlier periodicals, printed anthologies, Maithili editing in Nepal, women's writing, or informal community platforms.

Dhanakar Thakur's recollection of the development of Maithili periodicals pays particular attention to 'Mithila Mihir'. It makes clear that the writer himself measures the new work against an older editorial tradition. Modernity should therefore not be reduced to a claim that 'everything earlier was a void and everything now is new'. The significance of fresh contributions emerges from sound analysis of their relations with earlier traditions and their capacity to transform them.

Parallel Literary History: Achievements and Cautions

An important purpose of parallel history is to discover sources absent from established bibliographies and academic maps. Rural writers, authors from non-upper-caste communities, migrant readers, traditions of Tirhuta and Kaithi scripts, women's literature for children, local ballads, and multilingual communities across borders collectively widen the scope of literary history. 'Setusham' is a social document of such an attempt. The repeated account of opening institutional doors is itself worthy of study.

Writing a parallel history nevertheless also risks producing an alternative centre of power. Opposing older standards is insufficient: we must examine whether new standards are themselves open, self-critical, and faithful to evidence. For example, resistance to caste exclusion must be accompanied by questions about the neglect of women's writing, weak documentation, editorial bias, or one-sided representations of rival institutions. Through such self-criticism, parallel literary history can move beyond proclamations of resistance and become a trustworthy instrument of knowledge.

The Collection's Critical Limitations and Prospects for Research

Several systematic limitations emerge from a reading of the entire collection. Extended formal close readings of Preeti Thakur's children's fiction are scarce. Despite the immense range of Gajendra Thakur's writing, discussions of editing and cultural service exceed close readings of poetry, stories, and plays. Many claims of being the 'first' or 'only' example of an institutional achievement require survey-based evidence. Some contributors offer independent documentation, while others rely on personal recollections; the book often places these differing sources within an apparently uniform reading structure. More explicit classification of sources and examination of conflicting testimony would have been useful.

A second limitation concerns the critical idiom. Elevated praise and emotional metaphors express a community's gratitude, but their overuse may make evaluation of the works difficult. A third concerns institutional self-description: cooperation between authors, editors, and those celebrated is an important fact, but it cannot replace independent external scrutiny. A fourth lies in historical method: considerable comparative research remains possible on earlier women's literature, book culture, caste and class diversity, literary circulation between Nepal and India, and the first experiments in writing for children.

Future scholarship could use the essays in 'Setusham' as starting points for independent readings of original works, histories of editorial documents, studies of the aesthetics of comics, the social history of genealogies, and research into the networks of authors who contribute to digital journals. Such undertakings demand comparison of different forms of evidence, not merely sympathetic or antagonistic readings. The collection's lasting usefulness may be that it gives subsequent critics questions to investigate, writers to discover, and points of entry into sources.

Conclusion: Building Bridges, Testing Bridges

Two propositions hold simultaneously in an integrated assessment of 'Setusham: Vibrant Maithili'. First, it is an important document of the modern Maithili public sphere, assembling discussions of women's work in comics, emerging writers, digital libraries, language technology, genealogical archives, multiscript experiments, popular commitment, and new critical tools. Second, several of its essays are not equally rigorous in defining achievements or supporting claims with evidence. To treat the book as a triumph beyond criticism would therefore diminish its genuine research value.

The volume's most fruitful gift is the question implied by the 'bridge'. Whom does it connect? Who still lacks access? How trustworthy and useful is the knowledge made public? Can the memory of an author's contribution withstand literary self-criticism? Seeking answers moves literary history beyond the confines of hero-worship or opposition to institutions. 'Setusham' may acquire lasting importance because it offers materials for understanding new literary structures in Maithili, while a critical reading insists on making those structures more just, better evidenced, and more inclusive.

References

Based on the original collection, the independent essays it contains, the books mentioned, and the research indexes available through Videha. Works whose original texts were not consulted independently in this study are listed for their contextual relevance.

Anchinhar, Ashish, ed. 'Setusham: Vibrant Maithili'. A collection of critical essays on the work of Gajendra Thakur and Preeti Thakur, 2026. ISBN 978-93-5717-358-2.

Anchinhar, Ashish, ed. 'Priti Karan Setu Banhal—Redefining Maithili'. An earlier edited collection on Maithili literary achievement; listed in Videha's book catalogue.

Anchinhar, Ashish. 'Gananam Tva Ganapatim Havamaha…'. Editorial introduction to 'Setusham: Vibrant Maithili'.

Kamat, Munni. 'Mrs Preeti Thakur: An Accomplished Writer for the Child's Mind'. In 'Setusham: Vibrant Maithili'.

Mallik, Ira. 'Preeti Thakur's Contribution to Maithili Comics'. In 'Setusham: Vibrant Maithili'.

Thakur, Kailash Kumar. 'Gajendra Thakur: A Maker of Maithili's Digital Age'. In 'Setusham: Vibrant Maithili'.

Vatsanabh, Vikas. 'Maithili in the Digital Age: Videha and Gajendra Thakur'. In 'Setusham: Vibrant Maithili'.

Das, Bhairav Lal. ‘Gajendra Thakur's Contribution to Preserving Mithila's Genealogies’. In ‘Setusham: Vibrant Maithili’.

Jha, Poonam ‘Sudha’. ‘Diversity and Videha: A Consciousness-Raising Renaissance in Modern Maithili Literature’. In ‘Setusham: Vibrant Maithili’.

Prasad, Shiv Kumar. ‘Diversity and Videha’. In ‘Setusham: Vibrant Maithili’.

Jha, Kalpana. ‘Videha and New Writers’. In ‘Setusham: Vibrant Maithili’.

Munnaji. ‘The Scarcity of Non-Upper-Caste Writers in Maithili and Shri Gajendra Thakur’. In ‘Setusham: Vibrant Maithili’.

Thakur, Dhanakar. ‘Videha Journal's Commitment to the People’. In ‘Setusham: Vibrant Maithili’.

Jha, Hitnath. ‘Gajendra Thakur and Maithili Literary Criticism’. In ‘Setusham: Vibrant Maithili’.

Jha, Praveen Kumar. ‘Gajendra Thakur: Writer, Historian, and an Architect of Modern Maithili Studies’. In ‘Setusham: Vibrant Maithili’.

Karn, Kundan. ‘An Incomparable, Inestimable Contribution’. In ‘Setusham: Vibrant Maithili’.

Jha, Jagadanand ‘Manu’. ‘Gajendra Thakur's Contribution to Maithili Literature’. In ‘Setusham: Vibrant Maithili’.

Jha, Ujjwal Kumar. ‘Gajendra Thakur: A Bridge Figure in the Renaissance of Maithili Language and Literature’. In ‘Setusham: Vibrant Maithili’.

Anand, Mukesh. ‘Gajendra Thakur's Absence from Mithila-Maithili Literary Platforms: Causes and Consequences’. In ‘Setusham: Vibrant Maithili’.

Thakur, Preeti. ‘Gonu Jha and Other Maithili Comics’. Shruti Prakashan, 2008; publication details discussed in the essays by Munni Kamat and Ira Mallik.

Thakur, Preeti. ‘Maithili Comics’. Shruti Prakashan, 2009; publication details discussed by Munni Kamat.

Thakur, Preeti. ‘Folk Divinities of Mithila’. Shruti Prakashan, 2010; publication details discussed by Munni Kamat.

Thakur, Preeti. ‘Vidyapati's Purush Pariksha’. A comics adaptation for children; publication information discussed in the collected criticism.

Anchinhar, Ashish. ‘A History of Maithili Web Journalism’. Recorded in Videha's book and research catalogues.

Thakur, Gajendra. ‘Maithili Literary Criticism’. A work of criticism quoted in Hitnath Jha's essay.

Thakur, Gajendra. ‘A Critical Theory of Maithili Children's Novels’. Videha, issue 447, August 2026.

Thakur, Gajendra. ‘A Parallel History of Maithili Literature’. Videha, issue 450, September 2026.

Thakur, Gajendra. ‘Towards a Critical Theory of Dalit Literature in Maithili’. Videha, issue 440, April 2026.

Thakur, Gajendra. ‘A Parallel Grammar, Composition and Linguistics of Maithili (Including Thethi-Angika and Bajjika)’. Videha, issue 447, August 2026.

Videha. Book, Prose, and Research Catalogues. Indexed resources for Maithili literature and scholarship. https://videha-ejournal.github.io/videha/pothi.htm ;

https://videha-ejournal.github.io/videha/prose.htm ; https://videha-ejournal.github.io/videha/research/index.html

PART II

The Ghazal: Craft, Society, and Poetic Language

Rereading Maithili Literature

REVIEW 7

Anchinhar Akhar

Disciplined Ghazal Craft and a Commitment to Ordinary People

Abstract

Ashish Anchinhar's 'Anchinhar Akhar' (2011) marks a development in the modern Maithili ghazal in which creative experimentation and the examination of a genre's own principles become mutually supportive. The collection comprises seventy-eight ghazals, thirty-two rubaiyat, and two qitas. Before presenting these works, the author considers the history of the ghazal and the relationships among the matla, maqta, qafiya, radif, bahr, pronunciation, and the sound system of Maithili. This study separately examines the social, economic, political, erotic, and self-reflexive dimensions of the collection. Farmers' land, inflation, hunger, parliamentary ineffectiveness, political opportunism, appeals of love, and the ghazal's self-consciousness together form a shared poetic terrain. Historical comparison suggests that the development of the Maithili ghazal is not simply a question of adopting an external Arabic–Persian–Urdu structure, but of making Maithili pronunciation, vocabulary, and social experience feel natural within that structure. The study also assesses the limitations posed by repetition, conventional imagery, direct assertion, and insistence on formal discipline.

Keywords: Maithili ghazal; Ashish Anchinhar; qafiya; radif; bahr; rubai; qita; social satire; poetry committed to ordinary people; Maithili literary history.

1. Introduction: A Creative Dialogue Between Language and Discipline

The Maithili poetic tradition possesses a long history of song, lyric, folk melodies, and metre. The entry and independent identification of the ghazal raise another question: when an external literary form enters a local language, does it merely preserve its technical structure, or does it acquire new forms under pressure from the new language's pronunciation, cultural memory, and experience? 'Anchinhar Akhar' offers a concrete creative response. On the one hand, the poet takes the grammar of the ghazal seriously; on the other, he gives a place within the ghazal to the local worlds of earth, fields, hunger, government, darkness, mind, tears, and love.

The title itself is suggestive. ‘Anchinhar’ may refer to an unrecognised or unidentified voice speaking from beyond established literary taste and elite-centred discourse. ‘Akhar’ (‘letters’ or ‘words’) provides a basis not only for language but for writing, resistance, memory, and identity. Such possible meanings should be recognised as a reader-centred critical interpretation, not as an explicit declaration by the author.

The publication details identify Ashish Anchinhar as author, Shruti Prakashan, Delhi, as publisher, 2011 as the year of the first edition, and ISBN 978-93-80538-48-8. The English description of the title likewise identifies the book as a collection of Maithili ghazals, rubaiyat, and qitas. The collection shows itself to be not simply a book of poems but an early document of debate about poetic genres.

The chief basis of the present discussion is the collection's creative writing and the author's introductory reflections. The Videha book collection, research index, and available critical materials published by Videha are used for background on literary history, bibliographies, and subsequent debates about the ghazal. Unrelated websites or unsupported conjecture have not been substituted for evidence.

2. The Collection's Organisation and Poetic Intent

The ordering of the book deserves attention. An extended discussion of the history and grammar of the ghazal is followed by a dedication, the sequence of poems, ghazals, rubaiyat, and qitas. This arrangement brings readers into the grammatical world of the genre before they begin experiencing the poems. Education in form and poetic experience are not separate projects here, but two foundations of a single literary undertaking.

The seventy-eight ghazals encompass a wide range of moods and subjects. Several early pieces attack power, exploitation, and inequality; poems in the middle of the collection more frequently engage love, separation, relationships, nature, and creative self-awareness; in the closing group, social criticism again acquires urgency. The sequence is not wholly linear, and this shifting movement brings out the relative independence characteristic of individual ghazal couplets.

The thirty-two rubaiyat take the collection's emotional range into compact four-line forms. The two qitas concern love, beauty, and mythological correspondences. Thus, while principally centred on the ghazal, the book also makes room for the independent possibilities of other brief poetic forms.

3. The Introductory Account of Genre: History, Grammar, and Pronunciation

The author's ‘A Brief Introduction to the Ghazal’ traces a progression through the Arabic qasida, the Persian ghazal, the Urdu poetic tradition, and the arrival of the form in Maithili. Mentioning Imru' al-Qays, Rudaki, Saadi, Hafiz, Amir Khusro, Mir, and Ghalib, the author situates the ghazal within a multilingual history. In the Maithili context, the reference to Kaviwar Jeevan Jha's 'Sundar Sanyog' is particularly important. It should be received as the author's historical argument; it would be unjustified to regard every intermediate historical claim in this brief essay as fully established by independent evidence.

The treatment of technical terms—matla, maqta, sher, misra, radif, qafiya, non-musalsal ghazal, musalsal ghazal, bahr, and takhallus—reveals serious concern with craft. Importantly, the author does not mechanically reproduce Arabic and Persian prescriptions. He also considers Maithili's tendency to attach case endings, the use of the anusvara and chandrabindu, conjunct consonants, distinctions between short and long vowels in spelling and speech, and practical problems of metrical equivalence.

The poet argues that one cannot determine a qafiya without understanding a language's forms and the flow of its spoken sounds. This matters because the grammar of the ghazal does not regard Maithili as a passive language that merely imitates others, but recognises it as a creative language possessing its own phonological system. Reconciliation of formal accuracy with local pronunciation is one of the book's most valuable intellectual contributions.

Nevertheless, it would be mistaken to assume that every rule advanced in the introduction is universally applicable, indisputable, or a definitive linguistic conclusion. Examples of pronunciation, classifications of traditional metres, and limits of linguistic practice demand different forms of evidence. The value of the discussion as literary theory is clear; independently testing each technical rule and scanning each couplet would constitute a separate study.

4. Close Readings of Selected Ghazals

4.1. Ghazal 1: Capital, Display, and the Devaluation of Humanity

'For the sake of wealth, people became entangled in a web of possessions.' (Ghazal 1)

The first ghazal establishes the collection's ideological orientation. The verbal closeness of mal ('wealth') and mal-jal ('a snare of possessions') constructs a net of economic greed within human life. Images of hunger, display, social conduct, and self-distortion are interconnected. The poet does not merely describe poverty; he attacks the process through which wealth becomes a regulator of personality, ethics, and human relationships. The recurrence of lok ('people') turns individual wrongdoing into a collective tendency. The couplet illustrates how ordinary spoken vocabulary can generate extensive meanings.

4.2. Ghazal 16: Political Darkness and Satire's Double Voice

'A blind government, indeed, is running the affairs of state.' (Ghazal 16)

The ending of the second line, 'All else is well', becomes a persistent satirical conclusion. The poet superimposes political illness upon the language of welfare and well-being familiar from news and letters. 'Blind government' simultaneously suggests moral blindness, failed policy, and public irresponsibility. Each repetition of 'All else is well' converts an ordinary assurance into bitter irony. The poetic power derives from the transformed meaning of the radif: the same words produce distrust rather than confidence.

4.3. Ghazal 23: A Ghazal about the Ghazal Itself

'A ghazal of life's happiness, a ghazal of life's pain.' (Ghazal 23)

This may be read as a self-reflexive proclamation about the form. The ghazal is no longer merely the language of love, but a medium through which the whole of life's happiness and suffering can be voiced. Images of the Himalayas, fire, and resistance connect the ghazal with internal resolve and social heat. As a self-referential poem, it sometimes becomes a celebration of its own genre. Yet the poet's artistic commitment is evident within this affirmation: to establish the Maithili ghazal beyond a narrowly erotic genre as a form capable of encompassing the social life of ordinary people.

4.4. Ghazal 26: The Humble Grammar of Address and Intimacy

'Give me a place within your eyes; / Conceal me within your breath.' (Ghazal 26)

The repetition of 'take me in' in the opening couplet becomes a gentle plea for proximity to the beloved. Images of eyes and breath bring both seeing and living within the realm of love. Rather than demanding possession, the speaker asks to be accepted. This poem also appears as an example in the introductory discussion of the ghazal, creating a direct bridge between composition and grammatical explanation. Technically, the repeated request is more than an ornament of sound: it forms the emotional centre of the relationship.

4.5. Ghazal 31: Land, Ideology, and the Changing Meaning of War

'War over earth, water, and air; / Look, war even over the smallest matter.' (Ghazal 31)

'Earth, water, and air' form a list of the fundamental conditions of human existence. In the second line, linking something as slight as a 'small matter' with the severe word 'war' exposes political and social incongruity. The poem proceeds to questions of ideals and ideology, property and land, and relationships. Although the repetition of 'war' provides a semantic centre, it risks dependence on a monotonous proclamation. The poet's attempt to connect ordinary things with ideological struggle is nevertheless notable.

4.6. Ghazal 48: The Interlinked Images of Darkness, Farmers, and Hunger

'People travel towards the city of darkness in search of light; / In dreams, they eat rice made only of dreams.' (Ghazal 48)

These lines provide a particularly sharp instance of the poet's gifts. In the first, the direction of the search for light has been reversed: people head towards a city of darkness. In the second, rice—the most elementary sustenance—is displaced from reality into a dream. The condition of eating in a dream renders the social reality of hunger poignant through exaggeration. The ghazal also refers to fields, exploitation, famine, and working lives. The opposed pairs of light and darkness, rice and dream, combine into a metaphor for political failure.

4.7. Ghazal 60: Inflation and the Irony of Public Representation

'One day we shall see gold cheap and rice expensive.' (Ghazal 60)

The ordering of value is inverted. Gold is conventionally a luxury, while rice is a necessity of daily life; the poet reverses their relative affordability. This is not simply the rhetorical figure of reversal, but a question of food security and unequal distribution. References to the Lok Sabha, legislative assemblies, and a hungry population test the public responsibilities of the machinery of power. The poem occasionally approaches the slogan, but its underlying satire arises from a recognisable social experience.

4.8. Ghazal 70: The Language of Development and Public Despondency

'Development in newspaper headlines, and a despondent people.' (Ghazal 70)

The line turns on 'newspaper development': progress that gleams in the news system's headlines while its fruits remain absent from everyday life. The words 'despondent people' place lived experience against the artificial announcement of success. By carrying everyday political vocabulary into a formally crafted couplet, the poet alters the mode of public debate. Poetry becomes not a memorandum of argument but a linguistic response from the public imagination.

5. The Texture of Love and Separation: Eyes, Mind, Breath, and Body

The form of address ahan ('you', respectful and intimate) is central to Anchinhar's love ghazals. Between the first person ham ('I') and the second person ahan, distance, appeal, shyness, affection, and at times helplessness continually change their configuration. The vocabulary of eyes, tears, lips, breath, mind, heart, and dreams gives love a tender physical presence. These are familiar words of spoken Maithili, not substitutes drawn from an imported poetic diction.

In Ghazal 26 love takes the form of a plea for acceptance; Ghazal 43 presents everyday remembrance and return; Ghazal 59 makes even a quarrel a form of intimacy; Ghazal 61 combines love, dreams, and the takhallus to create a self-conscious voice. In these situations, the poet does not treat love merely as bodily attachment, but as the language of relationships, remembrance, and private vulnerability.

The system of love imagery nevertheless frequently returns to familiar symbols such as the rose, wine, eyes, and lips. Their accessibility draws readers closer but does not always produce a fresh aesthetic experience. The poet's distinction shines more strongly when ordinary Maithili domestic actions or locally current terms of relationship invest conventional images with new meanings.

6. A Separate Study of the Rubai: Four-Line Argument, Love, and the Philosophy of Life

6.1. Rubai 1: Optimism in Everyday Language

'With courage, one's work will always succeed; / The body will burn, but one's name will remain.' (Rubai 1)

The opening rubai concerns action, mortality, the survival of one's name, and an attitude of struggling against difficulties. Its first two lines relate life's transience to the value of action. A subsequent image of mountains of problems floating away like cotton provides a psychologically reassuring, instructive conclusion. The poem's effect rests on directness, while raising the question of how much complexity survives when difficult experience is turned into a simple maxim of encouragement.

6.2. Rubaiyat 13 and 17: Lessons of Experience and Social Irony

Rubai 13 expresses, in compressed form, the pain of broken trust. The progression through dreams, mind, and trust conveys an emotional decline within human relationships. Rubai 17 brings moral imagination, nonviolence, and the contradictions of public life into proximity. Here the poet's judgement moves beyond private love towards social satire. Both works make clear that the rubai is not simply an alternative form for love poetry in this collection, but also a platform for compact reflection on life.

6.3. Rubai 32: Love's Instability and the Opposition of Life and Death

'In love, blood will dry and turn into tears.' (Rubai 32)

This line intensifies love's emotional distress by combining physical and visual images. Blood drying and becoming tears transforms bodily experience into a metaphor for sorrow. Within four lines, the lover is surrounded by the possibilities of both life and death. The use of excessively sentimental imagery in several rubaiyat nevertheless produces predictable emotional climaxes; the form is stronger when its final line transforms the meanings established at the beginning.

7. A Separate Study of the Qitas: Wit, Beauty, and Mythic Memory

The collection's first qita is based on a questioning comparison concerning beauty. By giving greater importance to tears in the eyes and laughter on the lips than to external bodily form, it refuses to confine beauty to the visible body. Its question-and-answer voice lends the poem the ease of everyday speech.

The second qita brings together the tree of the heart, the fragrance of love, and mythological references to the first gopi and Krishna. The experience of love is illuminated by cultural memory. The mythic comparison is better read as an analogy for private love than as a declaration of fixed models for lovers. Because of their brevity, the immediacy of expression in both qitas differs from the ghazal's more extensive emotional range.

8. Language, Voice, and Figures of Speech: The Actual Foundations of Maithilisation

In the context of the Maithili ghazal, 'Maithilisation' does not simply mean replacing a Hindi or Urdu word with a Maithili equivalent. It entails rearranging pronunciation, case endings, verb forms, modes of address, idiom, and worldly experience. Words such as ahan, hamra, karej, nor, mon, ijot, basat, mati, and chaur are not merely regional markers in this collection; they actively structure feeling. Through them, love speaks in the idiom of the village, and political satire approaches common experience.

The poet frequently uses opposed pairs: light and darkness, hunger and rice, gold and rice, love and separation, body and soul, government and people, dream and reality. These oppositions are simple but often achieve piercing satire. The contrast between dream and rice in Ghazal 48 and that between gold and rice in Ghazal 60 are particularly notable.

The recurring radif emerges as an independent instrument of meaning. In Ghazal 16, 'All else is well' becomes irony rather than reassurance; in Ghazal 26, 'take me in' expresses the sweetness of supplication; in Ghazal 60, 'we shall see one day' creates apprehension and warning about the future. These examples reveal the relationship of form to meaning.

8A. The Structure of Lyric Composition: The Autonomy of the Couplet and the Rhythm of the Whole Ghazal

Each couplet of a ghazal may be meaningful by itself, yet its radif, qafiya, and recurring rhythm connect it to the experience of the whole poem. 'Anchinhar Akhar' displays different outcomes of this relationship. In love ghazals, the refrain often sustains an intimate appeal; in political ghazals, the same device produces denial, mockery, or warning. The music of the ghazal thus arises not only from pronunciation but from changes in emotional situation.

Many of the ghazals end with an indication relating to their 'varna' or syllabic count. This expresses the poet's numerical awareness of composition. Yet number of syllables, vocal weight, and actual pronunciation are not the same. Establishing the metre of a couplet requires attending to the flow of sounded speech, caesura, and balanced construction of every line. The historical significance of the author's insistence on metre can therefore be recognised without declaring every poem an equally accomplished instance of metrical discipline.

Another significant aspect of poetic language is the self-presentation achieved through the takhallus, the poet's chosen name within the ghazal. ‘Anchinhar’ is not merely a signature of identity; in many places it appears as a poetic person wounded, resistant, or filled with love. This use establishes a closeness between the poet and the speaking voice of a couplet. It would nonetheless be a literary error to equate them completely and treat the utterance as a factual account of the poet's private life.

The difference between the ghazal and the rubai is not merely the number of lines. In the ghazal, the rhythmic recurrence of individual couplets produces a multicentred web of meaning; the rubai places greater weight on the development of a statement and its final turn within four lines. Several rubaiyat in the collection conclude with a general proposition. They thus become more narrative or aphoristic than the ghazals, while the qita emerges as yet another kind of condensed experience. Reading the three forms together clarifies the distinctive characters of the author's brief poetry.

8B. Perspective and Representation: New Critical Questions Alongside Achievement

The voice opposing social injustice is a leading achievement of the collection. Yet as we examine the range of its social concerns, we must ask whether all groups are represented with equal intensity. Farmers, the poor, hungry citizens, and state repression are clearly voiced; women's independent agency, the gendered division of labour, and the complexities of caste relationships are more peripheral in many poems. This does not invalidate the poet's social commitment, but makes it legitimate to ask which experiences occupy the centre of poetry committed to the people and which remain invisible.

In the love ghazals, the beloved addressed as ahan usually occupies the centre of attraction, absence, memory, or anticipated response; the poetic speaker's experience is explicit. The beloved's independent self-description is comparatively rare. This should be read not as automatic proof of failure but as a critical tension between traditional address-centred love lyric and modern questions of social representation. The issue extends our reading beyond a poet's emotions to the social conditions in which those emotions are expressed.

9. A Comparative Historical Discussion: Tradition, Rereading, and Difference

9.1. The Long Tradition of Maithili Lyric and the New Grammar of the Ghazal

A major historical context for Maithili lyric is the emotional concentration, closeness to folk melody, and rhythms of address in Vidyapati's songs. The repetition of love, separation, and address in Anchinhar's ghazals allows a thematic dialogue with traditional lyric poetry. But this affinity should not be mistaken for evidence of direct influence or identical metrical ancestry. Vidyapati's songs and the ghazal have different poetics, stanzaic organisations, and musical-cultural foundations. The comparison concerns fields of meaning, not mechanical correspondence of metre.

9.2. From Jeevan Jha to the Development of the Modern Maithili Ghazal

The author mentions Kaviwar Jeevan Jha's 'Sundar Sanyog' in his introductory essay. Available critical discussions and records of edited representative anthologies within Videha identify Jeevan Jha and the early twentieth century when discussing early evidence of the Maithili ghazal. Later histories in Videha also discuss Sitaram Jha, Kashikant Mishra 'Madhupe', Jagdishchandra Thakur 'Anil', and other poetic experiments. Caution is necessary here: conventional judgements of priority and chronology may change as fresh evidence becomes available.

Jeevan Jha's place primarily raises a question of historical beginnings; Anchinhar's collection introduces the further question of self-consciousness about the genre. At one point, the existence of the ghazal is a matter of history; at another, developing a metrical grammar adapted to the language becomes an act of critical consciousness. 'Anchinhar Akhar' is therefore better understood not as the necessarily first point of the history, but as an influential modern representative of formal reflection.

9.3. Arabic–Persian–Urdu Poetic Organisation and Maithili Folk Experience

In Arabic, Persian, and Urdu ghazal traditions, the independence of each couplet, repetition of radif and qafiya, use of the takhallus, and regularity of bahr are defining formal expectations. Anchinhar adopts these technical concepts without suppressing the difficulties posed by Maithili pronunciation. His method therefore gives a place within one critical discussion to both formal continuity and linguistic difference.

Thematic comparison may recall the broad traditions of Ghalib's introspection, love and separation in the Urdu ghazal, and political questions in modern socially committed ghazals. But declaring Ghazals 16, 48, and 60 mere replicas of a particular Urdu or Hindi poet would subordinate the distinctive Maithili experiences they express. Anchinhar's strongest couplets arise where established ghazal craft is transformed by the local experiences embodied in Maithili vocabulary.

9.4. Later Debates in Videha

Videha's research indexes record essays by Ashish Anchinhar titled ‘Qafiya’, ‘Qafiya and Bahr’, ‘Early Experiments with the Grammar of the Maithili Ghazal’, ‘A Brief Critical Introduction to the Modern Maithili Ghazal’, ‘The Maithili Ghazal in the Context of Expression’, and ‘A Comparative Discussion of Narendraji's Maithili and Hindi Ghazals’. These recorded titles are sufficient to show that the formal problems encountered in the collection subsequently became subjects of independent criticism. Further conclusions would require examination of the full texts of those essays.

An extended assessment by Gajendra Thakur available through Videha places Ashish Anchinhar within the wider settings of the Maithili ghazal movement, poetic discipline, and editing. That evaluation may be regarded as evidence of contemporary reception, but no final decision about the book's artistic qualities can rest on prestige or praise alone. It must arise from direct readings of the poems.

10. Aesthetic Achievements and Critical Limitations

The first achievement is an expanded social range. The ghazal moves beyond its conventionally restricted expectations when personal pain in love appears alongside hunger, agricultural crisis, parliamentary politics, and the moral disintegration of human beings. The second achievement is technical self-awareness: the author raises formal difficulties himself and seeks solutions grounded in Maithili phonetic experience. The third is a vocabulary close to ordinary people, in which grave emotions are frequently expressed through familiar domestic and regional words.

The principal limitation emerges when a ghazal couplet presents a political assertion with little more than end-rhyme. Words like ‘government’, ‘people’, ‘development’, and ‘corruption’ undoubtedly denote social realities, but their presence in every couplet cannot automatically produce a poetic revelation. Where they establish fresh relations among image, scene, and meaning, the poetry succeeds; where they remain merely declarative, the art is weaker.

A second limitation is the recurrence of conventional love imagery. Associations of eyes and wine, or face and rose, appear in more than one rubai. Such repetition supports lyrical familiarity and recognisable beauty but restricts semantic freshness. In this respect, the collection's achievements also disclose possibilities for more rigorous self-editing.

A third question concerns formal correctness. The author's account of the ghazal emphasises bahr and qafiya, yet independently scanning every couplet is necessary to demonstrate successful metrical discipline throughout. This study makes no claim of universal correctness on the basis of the text available to it. The aesthetic value of a poem and its technical conformity to poetic rules are related but not identical questions.

Finally, calling poetry ‘committed to ordinary people’ does not place it beyond criticism. Social commitment, originality of feeling, tension within the couplet, verbal concision, naturalness of sound, and creative use of contradiction all require separate examination. ‘Anchinhar Akhar’ offers ample material for such a many-sided assessment.

11. Conclusion: Establishing the Ghazal in Maithili's Social and Linguistic Geography

The importance of ‘Anchinhar Akhar’ lies in the author's desire not merely to adopt the ghazal as an imported poetic form but to make it at home in Maithili. His introduction makes its poetics available to public discussion; the ghazals bring hunger, political resistance, and love together in one poetic sphere; the rubaiyat and qitas offer distinct experiences of shorter forms.

The most effective pieces are those in which utterance and form transform one another: ‘All else is well’ becomes political satire; ‘rice made of dreams’ becomes an unbearable symbol of hunger; ‘we shall see one day’ becomes a forewarning of future crisis; and ‘take me in’ becomes love's hesitant aspiration. The collection's real achievement lies in these poetic transformations.

Historically, the collection is not the sole birthplace of the Maithili ghazal, but an important document of the genre's modern self-examination. Linguistically, it provides a legitimate place within ghazal craft for Maithili pronunciation, case inflections, and folk vocabulary. Critically, it deserves both appreciation and questioning. Such a dialectical assessment shows that Ashish Anchinhar's contribution is not simply the writing of ghazals but the beginning of a sustained debate about the conditions for their composition and their possibilities in Maithili.

References: The Original Work and Videha Sources

Original Work

[1] Anchinhar, Ashish. ‘Anchinhar Akhar’. Delhi: Shruti Prakashan, 2011. ISBN 978-93-80538-48-8. Original text. Videha book collection: https://videha-ejournal.github.io/videha/pothi.htm

[2] Anchinhar, Ashish. ‘Grammar and History of the Maithili Ghazal’. Work listed in Videha's book collection: https://videha-ejournal.github.io/videha/pothi.htm

[3] Anchinhar, Ashish. ‘Sandarbh Sahit’ (‘With References’; ghazal criticism). Listed in Videha's book collection: https://videha-ejournal.github.io/videha/pothi.htm

[4] Anchinhar, Ashish. ‘Maithili Ghazalak Ready Reckoner’. Listed in Videha's book collection: https://videha-ejournal.github.io/videha/pothi.htm

[5] Anchinhar, Ashish. ‘Kumari Ichchha’; ‘Janghajori’. Ghazal collections listed in Videha's catalogue: https://videha-ejournal.github.io/videha/pothi.htm

[6] Anchinhar, Ashish. ‘Qafiya’; ‘Qafiya and Bahr’; ‘Early Experiments with the Grammar of the Maithili Ghazal’. Issue-wise records in Videha's research index: https://videha-ejournal.github.io/videha/research/videha-scholar-research-book.html

[7] Anchinhar, Ashish. 'A Brief Critical Introduction to the Modern Maithili Ghazal'. Videha, issue 253, 2018. Research index: https://videha-ejournal.github.io/videha/research/index.html

[8] Anchinhar, Ashish. 'The Maithili Ghazal in the Context of Expression'. Videha, issue 251, 2018. Research index: https://videha-ejournal.github.io/videha/research/index.html

[9] Anchinhar, Ashish. 'A Comparative Discussion of Narendraji's Maithili and Hindi Ghazals'. Videha, issue 252, 2018. Research index: https://videha-ejournal.github.io/videha/research/index.html

[10] Anchinhar, Ashish. 'When Will Ghazals in the Mood of Dushyant Kumar's Ghazals Be Written in Maithili?'. Videha, issue 307, 2020. Research index: https://videha-ejournal.github.io/videha/research/videha-scholar-research-book.html

[11] Thakur, Gajendra, and Anchinhar, Ashish, eds. 'Representative Maithili Ghazals, 1905–2022'. Publication details available through Videha: https://videha-ejournal.github.io/videha/new_page_56.htm

[12] Thakur, Gajendra. 'Critical Appreciation of Ashish Anchinhar'. 'A Parallel History of Mithila & Maithili Literature', Part 56. Videha: https://videha-ejournal.github.io/videha/new_page_56.htm

[13] Videha. 'Mithila Ratna': Bibliography of Ashish Anchinhar's Work. https://videha-ejournal.github.io/videha/ratna.htm

[14] Videha. 'Videha Pothi': Catalogue of Available Maithili Works. https://videha-ejournal.github.io/videha/pothi.htm

REVIEW 8

Janghajori

The Discipline of Bahr and Resistance in Everyday Life

Abstract

'Janghajori' is a collection of two hundred ghazals by Ashish Anchinhar. Its literary importance lies not merely in a Maithili poet's engagement with a form renowned for its discipline, but also in the incorporation of Mithila's colloquial speech, bodily love, the deprivation of working communities, contradictions in political institutions, and social hypocrisy into the ghazal's compact, repetitive, suggestive structure. The poet's introductory statement raises questions concerning bahr, qafiya, radif, musical performance, and readers' construction of meaning. The collection therefore demands to be read as both poetry and a declaration about poetics. This study separately analyses the language, themes, images, rhythms, and satire of its ghazals, and measures the collection's contribution and limitations against accounts of the ghazal's history associated with Videha. Its conclusion is that Anchinhar's accomplishment lies in joining traditional formal discipline to a modernity grounded in the vernacular, while the distance between declared generic intentions and poetic achievement requires critical examination.

Keywords: Maithili ghazal; Ashish Anchinhar; Janghajori; bahr; radif and qafiya; satire; vernacular language; construction of meaning by readers; Videha literary movement.

Introduction: The Book, Its Organisation, and Critical Questions

A fierce contradiction operates at the creative centre of ‘Janghajori’: the external construction proclaims exceptional discipline, while the inner voice continually interrogates power, propriety, politeness, and social hierarchy. The collection comprises two hundred consecutive ghazals, each accompanied by information about the syllabic or metrical pattern. This design opens two routes through the poetry: emotional reception and formal scrutiny. Their convergence is the critical point of entry into the book.

The word ‘Janghajori’ itself evokes the bodily directness and humour of everyday speech. By its title, the collection turns away from the conventional elevation of high poetry and adopts the boldness of colloquial expression. It is insufficient, however, to call this boldness mere provocation; the intention of the title is better understood through the relations among bodily awareness, satire, and self-mockery within the book. When a brief poem presents a large political proposition, the title's apparent abruptness becomes an aesthetic indication as well.

In his account, the poet identifies his original name as Ashish Kumar Mishra, his village as Bhatra Ghat in Bisfi, Madhubani, and his editorial involvement with the ghazal-oriented web magazine ‘Anchinhar Akhar’. He describes ‘Janghajori’ as his second collection of ghazals, following ‘Anchinhar Akhar’, and notes an interval of approximately nine years. This first-person testimony illuminates his development as a practitioner, although it cannot replace a full comparison of the texts of both collections.

The Poet's Statement: Form, Discipline, and the Reader

‘Anchinhar's Words’ is not merely the book's preface; it functions as a manifesto for the ghazal. The poet connects the right to call a composition a ghazal with adherence to bahr, qafiya, and radif. In his view, emotion and metre are not alternatives: a powerful experience requires an appropriate poetic form. His argument is compelling in its refusal to take the easy course of treating the absence of metrical discipline as novelty. Yet the language sometimes becomes so categorical that the space needed for independent evaluation of other poetic arrangements may be restricted.

The introduction challenges the assumption that singing and the ghazal are synonymous. It emphasises the singer's independent musical labour, specialised knowledge, and the genre's literary identity. This distinction is significant: printed poetry, stage recitation, and musical performance do not share one identical aesthetic standard. Yet the very possibility that a particular ghazal cannot be sung should not be treated as proof of superior formal accomplishment. The difference must be borne in mind when reading the poet's argument.

The poet describes ‘entertainment’ as his stated purpose, yet his ghazals frequently address political disappointment, child labour, class differences, religious hypocrisy, and ordinary injustice. Entertainment consequently becomes for him not an escape from social reality but a way of confronting it through satire and aesthetic pleasure. The reader thus extends the author's declared limits through the act of reading itself.

The author's thoughts on the plurality of readers' meanings deserve particular attention. He argues that a poem written in plain language may have one immediately comprehensible meaning, while other meanings emerge through the reader's experience, time, and state of mind. To make this principle useful in criticism, interpretations must remain connected to a poem's words, context, and structure; otherwise any uncontrolled imposition of meaning could pass for plurality. Many of the best couplets in ‘Janghajori’ are suitable tests of this balance.

Ghazal Composition: Bahr, Repetition, and the Autonomy of the Couplet

The most visible mark of the collection's formal discipline is the numerical pattern printed at the close of its ghazals. Some use short, rapidly moving lines; others breathe more expansively. The author also mentions licence concerning short and long syllables, deliberate shortening of long sounds, and bahr-e-Mir. This printed information offers readers a beginning for metrical examination. A declared pattern alone, however, cannot prove perfect conformity; pronunciation of every misra, the practical lengths of sounds, established refrains and rhymes, and the permissible extent of licence require testing.

The independent semantic possibilities of the couplet are particularly strong here. Images of politics, love, nature, and bitter private experience may collide unexpectedly within one ghazal. This organisation corresponds to the traditional couplet-centred nature of the form. Where each couplet is relatively self-contained, a broad vision can emerge despite the absence of one continuous theme. Its central characteristic is the ability to seize contradiction within a very brief statement.

Repetition of the radif gives the poet's language a rhythmic insistence. Phrases such as ‘dunnu dissan’ (‘from both sides’), ‘kekaro nai’ (‘nobody's’), ‘kichhu bat’ (‘something to say’), and ‘pasi chhai’ connect distinct emotional terrains. The sound that returns in each couplet creates expectation; qafiya and radif are most successful together when the repeated line acquires a new significance. In the strongest ghazals, the semantic effect of recurrence changes; in weaker ones, it becomes merely predictable sound.

Individual Close Readings: The Two Sides of Relationships and the Reach of Irony

'Hands Reached Out from Both Sides': Contact and Crisis

'Hands reached out from both sides; / Steps were taken from both sides.'

The opening couplet conveys a movement of two parties towards one another. Hands and steps suggest social contact; the first impression is of union. Later, however, the same repeated phrase is associated with the kicks of democracy, the entrapment of crowds, and people's flight after a breached embankment. One radif first promises connection and then conveys the experience of both sides being overwhelmed by crisis. The plurality of meaning arises not from an obscure word but from a change of subject within a repeated grammatical structure.

The proximity of bodily intimacy, political failure, and environmental danger in the ghazal is not merely coincidental. 'From both sides' refers to both ends of a relationship. Power may be unequal at the two ends, but the consequences may be shared. The autonomy of its couplets thus contributes to an integrated moral scene.

'What Is Misfortune for Me': The Compressed Arithmetic of Inequality

'What is misfortune for me / is convenience for them.'

The two-line comparison immediately exposes unequal class relations. The crisis of one person or group becomes an opportunity for another. The pronouns 'me' and 'them' transcend particular individuals and stand for economic and political structures. Rather than providing a complicated theory of exploitation, the poet presents its result in a comparative sentence. The meaning readily extends to crowds, resource distribution, markets, and relations of power.

The couplet's force lies not only in the idea but in the severity of its opening proposition. Readers who recognise their own misfortunes in it can construct particular meanings. Yet this interpretive plurality does not dissolve its basic ethical equation.

Political Satire: Verbal Blows and the Limits of Resistance

'I Am a Shape-Shifting Media': Enacting Institutional Confession

'I am the shape-shifting media; / I am the corporate world's grandchild.'

The media speaks here as though reciting its own genealogy. The mythic-folkloric connotations of ichchhadhari, a being able to assume desired forms, collide with modern corporate relations. The poet turns an institution meant to inform the public into a creature that alters its shape for self-interest. 'Grandchild' is an intimate kinship term that describes dependence between capital and news as though it were a family relationship. The innovation lies less in the political allegation than in the vernacular, satirical construction of the charge.

Throughout the ghazal, the repeated ‘I am’ becomes a confession. Rather than criticising the institution from outside, the poet makes it testify against itself. This dramatic voice gives the satire much of its distinctive strength.

‘It Is Daytime, Yet Still So Dark’: Religious Spectacle and Civic Darkness

> ‘In a country where rape is all around, / the miracles of religion are celebrated in abundance.’

The couplet's impact comes from a hard contradiction: social violence coexists with the public celebration of religious miracles. The conditional phrasing ‘in the country where …, in that country …’ turns the sentence into a satirical tribunal. The implied question is not whether religious experience has any value, but why spectacular miracles take the place of ethical accountability. The poem exposes the coexistence of ostentation and social brutality.

The poet discusses particular metrical licences at the conclusion of this ghazal. Forceful political meaning and impeccable metrical discipline should therefore not be assumed to constitute a self-evident unity. Evaluating both keeps questions of aesthetic effect and formal discipline in view.

‘Development for Them, Despondency for the People’: Minimal Resistance to Proclamation

> ‘Development belongs to them; / the people remain despondent.’

Four words in the original raise doubts about the powerful's story of progress. The restricted beneficiaries signalled by ‘them’ stand in direct ideological opposition to the much larger community called ‘the people’. The lines' pathos comes not from extended metaphor but from sharp verbal minimalism. The ghazal goes on to suggest the moral decline of Parliament and public institutions. Such a brief poem can remain immediately memorable, although declarative concision may sometimes diminish the complexities of social reality.

Labour, Childhood, and Class: Brief Documents of Social Reality

‘The Poor Child Became a Servant’: Childhood Displaced

> ‘The poor child became a servant / in hotels, motels, and brick kilns.’

‘Hotels, motels, and brick kilns’ appear not simply as a list of locations but as a continuous geography of labour. Poverty has displaced the child's life from school and play into commercial workplaces. ‘Poor child’ is not an elaborate symbol but a scene readily visible in society. The poet's realism here does not burden its subject with excess adjectives.

Another couplet juxtaposes the sweetness of life with its sudden souring. The use of taste to describe life brings childhood's transience into collision with the harshness of labour. The brick kiln gives the poem a local rural-industrial setting, while its question is much wider: who determines the worth of the most vulnerable lives amid proclaimed development?

'Fit Neither for Courtyard nor Veranda': Poverty's Exclusion from Custom

'A poor boy, just like a poor girl, / deemed fit neither for marriage nor for its rituals.'

Poor girls and boys are both treated here as bodies excluded from social rites. Marriage and chuman, a ceremonial blessing, become forms of recognition conditioned upon economic standing. The poem reveals the gendered dimensions of class distress without resolving them. In the voice of the rejected, it records the moral poverty of society. It is among the most direct challenges to the collection's declared aim of 'mere entertainment'.

Body, Affection, and Female Characters: The Strength of Feeling and Asymmetry of Perspective

'In That Hand, the Body Is a Flower': The Body's Many Meanings

'In that hand the body is a flower; / every day the body is a fragrant flower.'

The image of a flower lends the body meanings of tenderness, scent, and touch. The ghazal presents the body as a meeting place for love, a changing floral form in relation to the mind, and a centre of social identity. The poet's creative power is evident: an onomatopoeic, scent-evoking repetition from colloquial Maithili joins the ghazal's regulated rhyme. The body is not inert matter but a site given meaning through sensation.

Many love ghazals, however, dwell on women's bodies, the ends of their garments, lips, eyes, and beauty. Their own wishes, choices, and answering voices are less fully disclosed. Verses celebrating bodily beauty cannot therefore, by themselves, prove an egalitarian conception of love. The tension between intimacy and objectification is an essential aspect of reviewing the collection.

The Vocabulary of Love and the Private Echoes of Separation

Words such as neh, nor, mon, anchar, chan, ijoriya, kajarauta, phul, and madhumas recur throughout the book. They activate the emotional field of the folk-song tradition. Yet the relatively autonomous couplets of the ghazal give it a different structure from the continuous narrative flow of many folk songs. Love here is less an unfolding story than a series of moments of encounter, incompletion, and sudden memory.

Sometimes meaning remains highly suggestive; elsewhere, simple address carries the poem towards song. The duality reveals two voices within the poet: one of severe satire, the other of compassionate or playful love. The best ghazals arise where these voices complement one another rather than remaining separate items in a list of topics.

Vernacular Speech, Religious Allusions, and Cultural Inversion

'The Form of the Mind Is Pasi': Revaluing Everyday Life

'The form of the mind is pasi; / the form of the body is pasi.'

Words such as pasi, toddy, labni, and bhujja-chikhna bring the ghazal's conventional courtly lexicon onto the ground of local social life. 'Pasi' here is not simply a word related to a drink; it becomes an autonomous term of value in the poet's metaphoric world. The juxtaposition of such popular imagery with Vedic names places humorous pressure upon the division between supposedly high and low cultures.

What social vision this reassessment develops remains an open question. Repeated use of vernacular words does not by itself provide complete representation of the communities to which they belong. The words must be considered in relation to the speaker, context, and judgements of the poem. The literary accomplishment lies in breaking an elite linguistic code and establishing ordinary experience within the language of the ghazal.

Ram and Rahman, Temple and Mosque, and the Political Use of Religion

Some ghazals explore possibilities of exchange between religious names rather than insisting upon their separation, while others mock violence and spectacle carried out in religion's name. It would therefore be misleading to reduce the poet's religious world to a single position of denial or affirmation. Condemning social hypocrisy, the poetry also suggests human coexistence. Vernacular idioms, mythic allusions, and contemporary politics broaden the thematic range of the ghazal.

The Title's Self-Reference: Humour, Violence, and the Language of the Body

'Seeing the janghajori, / even the thighs laughed aloud.'

The title returns here within the creative world of the collection itself. 'Seeing' identifies a moment of perception; 'even the thighs laughed aloud' personifies a bodily organ. Laughter becomes a mixture of humour, discomfort, and the subversion of propriety. The preceding verse contains a bloodstained image of state power. The title's play is thus not merely a bodily joke, but also suggests the strange laughter that arises beside a violent public life.

A sentence that makes a part of the body laugh is unlikely to seem natural in a purist, decorous literary idiom. Anchinhar chooses that discomfort. Yet every uncomfortable word does not amount to literary invention: the meaning here arises through its semantic collision with a context of governmental violence. This poem makes the title's potential for critical reading particularly clear.

The Texture of Language: Short Sentences, Repetition, and Explosions of Meaning

Anchinhar does not rely throughout on the Sanskritised constructions of high literary language. Colloquial words such as kane, jakan, hunke, hamra, dunnu, nor, and mon encounter expressions from markets and politics without hesitation. The mixture has a natural linguistic vitality. Because couplets are short, individual words acquire unusual weight: adversity against convenience, development against despondency, and miracles of religion against social violence form sharp oppositions.

At the formal level, recurring sound patterns settle in the reader's memory. Yet repetition does not necessarily add new meaning. Sometimes the glitter of alliteration hides subtleties of sense. The danger is visible in extremely brief ghazals that depend largely on phonetic similarity. A sensible test of success is whether recurrence alters meaning each time it appears.

A further problem concerns the relationship between phonetic discipline and spoken language. Maithili pronunciation allows different possibilities through sandhi, vowel length, local elongations, and regional variations. The printed metrical patterns propose a particular mode of reading; testing the changes in sound produced by oral recitation requires additional labour. Neither reducing the ghazal to a numerical calculation of written signs nor reducing it to a singer's spontaneous tune would be appropriate.

Readers' Multiple Meanings: From Declaration to Creative Practice

In the preface, the poet treats the reader as a leading participant in making meaning. The principle becomes effective in couplets such as ‘What Is Misfortune for Me’, where changing the implied speaker opens a range of social situations involving suffering and advantage. In ‘Hands Reached Out from Both Sides’, too, the refrain gains different meanings from changing situations. Not every ghazal is equally open to interpretation. A sharp political slogan, for example, makes an emphatic claim whose direction is comparatively fixed.

These differences should be understood not simply as weaknesses but as indications of the ghazal's several functions. One couplet raises a question; another acts as an immediate declaration of resistance; another preserves a memory of love. Critical criteria cannot be applied to all in the same mechanical manner. The author's theory of interpretive plurality helps explain the collection's best couplets, but turning it into a blanket certificate would conceal the specific nature of individual poems.

‘Janghajori’ in the Literary History of the Maithili Ghazal

It would be critically inadequate to describe the history of the Maithili ghazal as merely the imitation of Urdu. When a genre moves between languages, the process involves not only the copying of metres and rhymes but the formation of a new style through local syntax, social questions, traditions of comparison, and readers' tastes. 'Janghajori' is a notable example of this cultural transformation: its claims to formal discipline connect it with inherited tradition, while its popular satire is rooted in modern Maithili life.

A historical account available in Videha proposes a line of development beginning with Pandit Jeevan Jha, followed by Kaviwar Sitaram Jha, Kashikant Mishra 'Madhup', Vijaynath Jha, and Yoganand Hira. This sequence should be treated as a proposal made within Videha-associated historiography rather than an indisputable scholarly consensus. Against that background, the generation to which Anchinhar belongs is distinguished by its combined attention to renewed formal discipline, the training of poets, readers' technical participation, and publication through online media.

The poet refers in the preface to 'Anchinhar Akhar' and 'Grammar and History of the Maithili Ghazal'. He regards the provision of metrical patterns at the end of individual ghazals as a means of developing readers' ability to understand bahr. The collection thereby functions as an informal school of poetics alongside its role as a book of verse. Whereas the older tradition of Maithili lyric engaged the memory of communal singing, ragas, and folk rituals, this work addresses a new community of readers through metrical reasoning, linguistic literacy, and the printed text. The two traditions are not identical; their media and uses have changed.

Anchinhar's position in debates about the modern meeting of Maithili poetry and the ghazal cannot be measured solely through assertions of chronological priority. Historical contributions must be established through proper dating, published texts, and comparative formal examination. Anchinhar matters because he incorporates the discussion of genre into his own creative collection, bringing both the form's historical development and his poetry's aesthetics to the reader at once.

Comparative Discussion: Urdu Ghazals, Maithili Lyric Tradition, and Modern Popular Poetry

The ghazal's conventional organisation gives importance to the matla's establishment of sound patterns, the relative autonomy of couplets, the recurrence of qafiya and radif, and the discipline of bahr. 'Janghajori' explicitly establishes its relationship to this structure. Historical Urdu examples appear in the poet's introduction, but mentioning these names does not establish direct equivalence of technique. Belonging to the same genre and possessing the same poetic temperament are different matters.

Maithili folk songs and lyrics possess a rich tradition of love, separation, seasons, comparisons involving the body, domestic courtyards, and social rituals. Anchinhar joins these images to new social circumstances. The vocabulary of body, tears, moon, and the end of a sari evokes folk-song memory, while the regulated return of the refrain and thematic leaps between couplets establish the independence of the ghazal. The collection is therefore not simply an extension of folk song, but a ghazal enriched by vernacular resources.

Compared with modern poetry of resistance, the political couplets here are short, forceful, and frequently satirical. Opposition may take the form of direct declaration or of a dramatic institutional self-confession. The concerns include difficult labour, politicians' hypocrisy, unequal benefits of development, market cruelty, and the ethical right to speak. Yet no single ideological programme exhausts the collection: the continuing presence of love, the body, and laughter makes it an exploration of broader human conduct.

The Poet's Claims to Self-Regulation and the Need for Internal Criticism

The author refuses to accord immediate prestige to the expression 'new experiment' and advocates experimenting only after learning the rules of metre. This is an educational caution. Yet the collection itself uses mythological allusions in modern contexts, self-satire spoken through media and political institutions, bodily personification, and political couplets constructed from very few words—all indications of formal experimentation in the literary sense. His refusal of 'experiment' probably means a refusal to claim invention of a new bahr, not an absence of all poetic innovation. Criticism must distinguish the author's statement from what the work actually does.

Likewise, printing metrical patterns with each ghazal is commendable, but the acknowledged licences at the ends of certain poems invite readers to undertake their own metrical examinations. This is not proof of artistic failure; it is an opportunity for transparency about the genre. Without adequate analysis, proclaiming every poem perfectly correct or automatically condemning all metrical licence would be equally excessive.

Limitations of the political voice are also evident. The sharpness of satire sometimes reduces characters to single traits; the complexities of public life collapse into images of thieves, cheats, or hypocrites. At times, love vocabulary returns repeatedly to the same comparison. Elsewhere, however, unexpected conjunctions of ordinary words create fresh imagery. A comprehensive judgement should therefore avoid the extremes of 'everything is excellent' and 'everything is defective'.

The Ethical Relationship Between the Ghazal Writer and the Reader

'Take a Bribe and Write a Living Ghazal about the Poor': Self-Critical Satire

> 'Take bribes, then write a living ghazal about the poor; / sit in a hotel eating chicken and eggs, and write your ghazal.'

Here the profession of composing poetry itself becomes the subject of criticism. The speaker's instructions, taken literally, are inconsistent and ethically objectionable; readers grasp the reversed intention. The poet exposes the gap between progressive slogans and personal conduct. In the preface he raises the question of congruence between creative assertions and behaviour; this couplet gives that thought poetic form. Its satirical target is not poverty but the literary hypocrisy that purchases prestige in the name of the poor.

The satire avoids a recurrent danger of the genre: the poet's permanent pose as a moral preacher. Repetition of the imperative 'write' allows the speaker to wear the hypocrite's mask and requires readers to reverse the apparent meaning. It is among the book's most effective self-critical strategies.

'Keep Saying Something': An Ending in Favour of Dialogue

'Keep saying something; / keep listening to something.'

The final ghazal recalls the human need for relationships through repetition of speaking and listening. After the author's long introduction and two hundred short compositions, 'something' becomes an appeal both to speak and to hear. Its broadly applicable insight is that criticism, love, and society are all incomplete without conversation. The closing beauty lies in the comparatively tender turn towards dialogue after many uncompromising political couplets.

Conclusion: A Modernity of the Maithili Ghazal Turned towards Ordinary Life

The principal literary achievement of 'Janghajori' is its combination of the ghazal's formal self-consciousness with the rough, unequal, and frequently comic-ironic experiences of Maithili everyday life. Rules of bahr, recurrent rhymes and refrains, short couplets, the texture of local vocabulary, and sharp observations about public institutions together establish a recognisable manner. At the collection's centre, the poet regards readers not merely as receivers of aesthetic pleasure but as participants in examining craft.

Its best couplets are those in which concise meaning, phonetic discipline, and social perspective reinforce one another. Its least successful passages are those where repetition produces no fresh meaning, accusations oversimplify complex realities, or women's independent voices remain indistinct amid descriptions of their bodies. True respect for the collection lies in making these distinctions, not in laying a uniform coat of praise over every poem.

In the history of the Maithili ghazal, Anchinhar's contribution involves his insistence on genre-conscious composition, his practice of offering technical information with the poems, and literary debate through online media. 'Janghajori' is an important poetic example of that undertaking. It demonstrates that discipline and resistance are not opposites: even within metre, poetry can raise society's most uncomfortable questions. Its ultimate significance lies in the literary evidence it offers for that possibility.

References

Primary Work: Anchinhar, Ashish. 'Janghajori: A Ghazal Collection'. Videha, publications of the Maithili literary movement. The book's publication notes include archival copyright years 2012 and 2022; they are not treated here as a single definitive first-publication year.

Anchinhar, Ashish. ‘Anchinhar Akhar’ (collection of ghazals, rubaiyat, and qitas). Registered in Videha's book catalogue and mentioned as an earlier collection in the preface to ‘Janghajori’.

Anchinhar, Ashish. ‘Grammar and History of the Maithili Ghazal’. Listed in the Videha book collection and identified in the ‘Janghajori’ preface as a theoretical reference work.

Anchinhar, Ashish. ‘Maithili Ghazalak Ready Reckoner’. Listed in Videha's book collection as a guide to genre-specific training.

Anchinhar, Ashish. ‘Shabd-Arth-Shakti’ (‘Word, Meaning, Power’). Listed in Videha's book collection; a work connected with criticism of the Maithili ghazal.

Anchinhar, Ashish. ‘Sandarbh Sahit’ (‘With References’). Listed in Videha's book collection; a work of ghazal criticism.

Anchinhar, Ashish. ‘Kumari Ichchha’ (ghazal collection). Listed in Videha's book collection; another poetic work by the author.

Thakur, Gajendra, and Anchinhar, Ashish, joint editors. ‘Maithili Ghazal: Arrival and Points of Departure’. Listed in Videha's book collection; a reference in Maithili ghazal criticism.

Thakur, Gajendra, and Anchinhar, Ashish, joint editors. ‘Representative Maithili Ghazals’. Listed in Videha's book collection; a historical reference concerning the tradition and representative poems.

Videha. ‘Videha: The First Fortnightly Maithili E-Journal—Book Collection’. Publisher's catalogue of Anchinhar's published works and related ghazal literature. https://videha-ejournal.github.io/videha/pothi.htm

Videha. ‘A Parallel History of Mithila & Maithili Literature’. Research-based literary historiography, including a proposed line of development for the Maithili ghazal. https://videha-ejournal.github.io/videha/research/2026/438/a-parallel-history-of-mithila-maithili-literature.htm

Videha. ‘Videha Research Articles, Issues 1–451’. Research index recording Ashish Anchinhar's published essays on ghazal grammar, ghazal criticism, and Maithili literary history. https://videha-ejournal.github.io/videha/research/videha-scholar-research-book.html

Videha. ‘Critical Appreciation of Ashish Anchinhar’. A study associated with Videha on the author's life, works, ghazal forms, and critical contexts. https://videha-ejournal.github.io/videha/new_page_56.htm

REVIEW 9

Kumari Ichchha

Unfulfilled Desires and Completed Metre

Abstract

Ashish Anchinhar's ‘Kumari Ichchha’ is a modern Maithili ghazal collection in which metrical discipline and social discontent put each other to the test. Across its hundred ghazals appear hunger, class division, power, markets, family fragmentation, the contradictions of modern amenities, women's labour, the writer's self-examination, and many forms of frustrated desire. The poet's extended introduction prevents the book from remaining simply a collection of poems: it advocates the development of Maithili-specific metrical patterns, discusses inherited aruz, and proposes new names for metres. The central argument of this study is that 'Kumari Ichchha' matters not only for these claims about prosody but also for continuously bringing them into confrontation with lived experience, vernacular language, satire, and social criticism.

Drawing on all one hundred ghazals of the original collection, the poet's statement, metrical notes printed after the poems, Videha's book catalogue, and its research archive, this study examines poetic form, conducts close readings of particular ghazals, interprets the title, and explores comparative relations with the literary history of the Maithili ghazal. Only those limited lines whose original wording was directly checked are quoted. Alongside the collection's achievements, the study identifies repetition, incompleteness in its metrical proposals, restricted independence of women's voices, and the risk of satire becoming didactic.

Keywords: Maithili ghazal; Ashish Anchinhar; Kumari Ichchha; bahr; aruz; Videha; folk melodies; satire; desire; social justice.

Literary Questions and the Approach of the Study

When evaluating a collection of poems, we naturally ask how many remain memorable, how many are rhythmically accomplished, and how intensely a poet recognises his own time. 'Kumari Ichchha' adds a further complication: if an author supplies metrical patterns and sometimes justifies licences for each ghazal, can the critic judge the emotional dimension alone, or must the formal claims be tested independently? Both tasks are necessary. Declaring a metre does not constitute accomplishment; nevertheless, experimental consciousness about prosody is itself a document of poetic history.

The study is principally centred on the book. Treating the poems as one continuous corpus, it examines their sequence, transformations of imagery, recurrence of themes, and the author's technical notes. The Videha book catalogue, research index, descriptions of Anchinhar's other available critical works, and discussions of tradition published in Videha supply useful comparative literary-historical contexts. Historical facts not independently verified against early manuscripts are treated as contexts emerging from the archive, not as newly proven discoveries.

The poet states that if readers discover within entertainment an element of knowledge, understanding, change, or improvement in life, it will be the good fortune of the poems. The statement acknowledges readers' rights. The introduction is consequently not the sole authorised meaning of the book; individual couplets may generate further significances through social circumstances, private memory, and linguistic suggestion. Criticism must preserve this plurality while also demanding objectivity in the poet's formal claims.

The Book's Creative Sphere and the Poet's Statement

‘Kumari Ichchha’ contains one hundred consecutively numbered ghazals. A preface by the poet opens the book, and a biographical account concludes it. Most ghazals are accompanied by a specific metrical sequence, the designation of a bahr, or an explanation of licence. This arrangement produces an unusual two-level text: lyrical expression above, the mechanism underlying that expression below. The reader encounters hungry stomachs, breaking relationships, or political ostentation, only to be redirected immediately towards the poem's formal calculation.

In the introduction the author associates his first collection, ‘Anchinhar Akhar’, with 2011, his second, ‘Janghajori’, with 2020, and the public emergence of ‘Kumari Ichchha’ with 2021. Videha's archive also contains evidence of a later electronic circulation of the work, and these must not be treated as one publication event. The author identifies differences in the composition of all three collections, imagining a movement from simple syllabic practice to personally devised metrical sequences and then towards established Urdu and Persian metres.

His final admission is especially important. While describing the collection as metrical, he accords significance to the reader's experience in deciding whether it has sufficient feeling and rhythm. This self-examination combines poetic modesty with strategy: the poet emphasises technical labour but leaves aesthetic judgement to the reader. For a critic, this distinction matters because conformity to metre and the experience of poetry do not automatically coincide.

The Metrical Programme: Local Sound and the Encounter with a Global Poetic Form

The tension between Arabic–Persian–Urdu aruz and the natural pronunciation of Maithili is a longstanding intellectual question for the Maithili ghazal. Anchinhar resolves it neither through total imitation nor through unrestricted equivalence of syllable counts. He argues that line patterns should be regular, yet the phonetic qualities of Maithili may allow the development of independent bahrs. The language thus becomes not merely a vehicle for a borrowed form but an active force in creating its metres.

The introduction proposes for bahr-e-Videha a sequence of long sounds ending with a short one; bahr-e-Govind begins with a short sound before extending into long ones; bahr-e-Lochan ends in a short–long–short pattern; bahr-e-Pradeep revises a sequence from khafif; and bahr-e-Roop repeats the foot 2221. The names commemorate the journal Videha, Govind Jha, Ramlochan Thakur, Maithiliputra Pradeep, and Roopkant Thakur. They are not merely metrical labels but declarations about the institutional and cultural memory of Maithili literature.

Naming a new metre and demonstrating its distinctive musical and phonetic character are, however, different undertakings. How closely do the proposed patterns correspond to forms within established aruz? What accepted principles should govern short and long sounds in native pronunciation? What results will an independent reader obtain from scanning the verses? These remain open questions. The author himself cautions that similarities with older metrical forms may exist. It is therefore fairer to treat the new terminology as a proposal for research and collective experiment than as a fully standardised theory.

Metrical Distribution and the Limits of Verification

A separate count of the author's notes after one hundred ghazals finds the designation bahr-e-Mir attached to fifty-four poems, ramal to nine, and mutaqarib explicitly to four. The remaining thirty-three are described through other patterns, individual experiments, or different metrical classes. These figures classify the author's own annotations; they are not independent certificates of correctness under traditional aruz. They reveal stated formal priorities without establishing the indisputable conformity of every poem.

One practical benefit of extensive use of bahr-e-Mir is that the poet employs a relatively regular recurrence rather than withdrawing before the tension between long and short sounds in everyday speech. Some opening couplets thus become memorable and recitable. Conversely, repeated acknowledgement of a ‘licence’ to treat two separate short sounds as a long one may weaken formal certainty. A licence sustained by indispensable musical pronunciation is one thing; a device used solely to equalise numerical counts is another.

The poet's notes, for example, give the opening ghazal on hunger the sequence 22–22–22–21; a ghazal opposing peace and revolution, 2122–2122; a ghazal concerned with the husband, 22–22–22–121; and the title-related ghazal, 222–222–222–22. Written numerical equivalence alone is insufficient: the audible rhythms of Maithili, consonant clusters and visarga, vowel weight, and the placement of pauses must all be tested. The collection is therefore a rich but debatable text for ghazal writers and researchers of metre alike.

The Couplet, Matla, Qafiya, Radif, and Independence of Meaning

The form of a ghazal is not exhausted by its metre. Establishing the same qafiya and radif in both lines of the opening matla, and returning to them in the prescribed positions of later couplets, creates an internal music. Recurrent words and phrases such as ‘stomach’, ‘husband’, ‘Ram Hare’, ‘difficulty’, ‘brokers of truth’, ‘taking away’, and ‘left behind’ turn the inflections of popular speech into creative resources. In many poems, removing one couplet would still leave the others capable of making their own statements.

Yet the repeatedly returning refrain can also restrict semantic development. Repetition of ‘brokers of truth’ sharpens ridicule of powerful falsehood, but becomes mechanical if successive couplets contribute no fresh perspective. The poet's principal test lies in balancing the autonomy of the couplet against the thematic direction of the whole ghazal.

Love, family, politics, employment, and literary institutions supply further themes. The ghazal's compact structure is suited to contemporary journalistic language, short sentences, folk expressions, and sharp counter-questions. Anchinhar makes considerable use of these possibilities. Couplets in which fluid rhythm and concentrated meaning meet are more successful than those that remain slogans or simple statements of fact.

Language, Folk Speech, and Intertextuality

Instead of relying on formal erudition, the collection often draws vitality from village and domestic conversation. Words such as mon (‘mind’), pet (‘stomach’), angan (‘courtyard’), bhatar (‘husband’), sasur (‘marital home’), naihar (‘parental home’), paikar (‘merchant’), darbar (‘court’), kapar (‘forehead’), and junna place poetic subjects in everyday life. Alongside them appear ‘system’, ‘reporting’, ‘file’, ‘free’, ‘geyser’, and ‘office’, opening the objects and institutions of contemporary society. Such a mixed vocabulary should not be automatically condemned as linguistic impurity: it registers the interpenetration of market, administration, and home.

Folk melodies, devotional refrains, memories of Kabir, and satirical impersonation deepen the work's intertextual relations. The author explicitly states that the phrase ‘Ram Hare’ in one ghazal has been borrowed from a devotional song. In politically themed ghazals using folk melodies, the sound structure readily suggests public gatherings or group performance. The ghazal thereby moves beyond private exchanges between lovers towards a social oral culture.

The immediacy of words such as ‘face’, ‘dress’, ‘game’, and ‘system’ nevertheless makes the poems historically situated. If foreign words introduced for metrical equivalence do not fit naturally into the internal rhythm, oral tension may result. This criticism is not linguistic purism; it asks whether every word is poetically necessary in sound and context.

Individual Close Readings

Hunger as Metaphor: From an Empty Stomach to the State's Immorality

‘The empty stomach remained offended; / the stomach simply would not agree.’

The collection's first ghazal brings the reader not into the world of private romance but before the demands of hunger. Being ‘offended’ is a human emotional act, but the poet attributes it to the stomach. This personification gives the hungry body a voice of entitlement. The absence of food also tests the morality of religious acts; references to holy men and government turn the satire towards hunger as a material problem. The refrain 'stomach' becomes both the rhythm of humour and the persistence of deprivation.

This opening establishes the collection's thematic principle: moral peace has an incomplete meaning without material security. Although the poet does not formulate a policy to overcome hunger, his brief couplets set lofty ideals against the empty stomach. Each return of the refrain obliges readers to confront the same problem again.

Peace of the Mind versus Revolution of the Stomach

'The mind became a pacifist; / the stomach became a revolutionary.'

The opening couplet transforms the commonplace opposition between peace and revolution into a dynamic relation between body and consciousness. The mind is inclined to compromise with ideals, while the stomach pushes towards disagreement under the pressure of livelihood. This materialist miniature of social revolution arises from simple experience instead of intricate theoretical argument. Subsequent images of kings, queens, masters, and servants interpret the social hierarchy.

The couplet is powerful because of its aphoristic sharpness. Yet collecting many such aphorisms risks reducing complicated social processes to straightforward binaries. The poet succeeds in making the theme incisive; weakness arises when new names for familiar oppositions replace particular details of experience.

External Unity and Internal Disintegration: The Husband Sequence

'Outwardly, the husband is held together; / inwardly, the husband is broken.'

The central word bhatar identifies the husband's role within a relationship, while joining it to 'joined' and 'broken' opens a distance between external appearance and internal disintegration. Language becomes a criticism of fixed family roles. A relationship that seems united from outside is fractured within: a compressed image of social display and emotional displacement. Hints of the mirage of development, calculation, desire, and wounds inflicted by one's own people give the fragility an economic and social background.

The metrical note is especially significant because the poet offers this poem as an example of his proposed bahr-e-Lochan. It is therefore both an account of contradictions within marriage and a laboratory for a language-specific metre. Its literary examination should attend to the effect of the final short–long–short pattern in relation to the audible force of the bhatar refrain.

Religious Sound and Administrative Reality

'Every facility is governmental, Ram Hare; / all authority belongs to them alone, Ram Hare.'

Repetition of 'Ram Hare' evokes the collective tone of a devotional hymn, but the themes move in the opposite direction. The inclusion of public facilities, governmental domination, reporting, mutual aggression, and personal anxiety alongside devotional words introduces a satire of worldly corruption into sacred sound. Its beauty lies in contrast: the more familiar and easy the devotional cadence, the harsher the social reproach.

This ghazal is a key example for understanding relations between folk song and the ghazal. The devotional phrase need not signal unbroken religious surrender; its repetition may expose the emptiness of social rituals. Yet if each couplet fails to introduce a fresh contradiction, 'Ram Hare' itself may become formulaic. The possibility demands evaluation of the difference between oral popularity and literary depth.

Brokers of Truth: The Satirical Work of the Radif

'The broker of truth roars loudly; / the broker of truth laughs uproariously.'

In this opening couplet, truth is not an unconditionally sacred value but a commodity for trade. 'Broker' signals the inversion of social morality. Roaring, laughing, glittering, constantly changing, and selling oneself—the series strips the mask from those who claim to represent truth. Brief sounds, blows of mockery, and recurring words together produce the effect of a political and cultural masquerade.

The formal distinction is that the poet does not write a direct argumentative essay of accusation and evidence. He sketches character through a sequence of gestures. Excessive reliance on a strongly judgemental word such as 'broker', however, may reduce the variety of imagery. The most effective couplet reveals a new pattern of behaviour rather than simply hurling abuse.

The Image of Green Spectacles and a Daughter's Double Burden

'For a daughter there are twice the sorrows; / look at the marital home, look at the parental home.'

The lines describe a woman's social position through the two centres of her marital home and parental home. Questions about her right to a home, the expectations placed on her, labour, and humiliation are immediately raised. 'Twice the sorrows' allows an interpretation of the burdens imposed by two families. The poem is not an intimate autobiography in a woman's own voice, but it questions inequality within patriarchal relations.

In the opening couplet, 'green spectacles' become a satirical symbol of the act of seeing. By contrast, the verse on the daughter demands the removal of a distorted mental lens. Satire here is not directed solely outward; it becomes a form of social self-examination. The critic must remember that making women a subject and allowing women to speak independently are not identical acts.

The Meaning of the Title: Rice Water, Salt, Vermilion, and Maidenly Desire

'The rich have problems of diamonds and gold; / the poor have problems of rice water and salt.'

'How could vermilion fulfil every desire? / If some desires remain maidenly, what is the difficulty?'

These two couplets disclose the philosophical centre of the book's title. The rich worry about 'diamonds and gold', while the poor are concerned with rice water and salt. The first couplet uses the same word, 'difficulty', to expose the incomparability of problems across classes. Both are called difficulties, yet their value for life differs radically. This opposition is among the clearest images of the poet's social consciousness. The minimal requirements for food and the desires of luxury are confronted within a single structure of rhyme and refrain.

The words 'vermilion' and 'maidenly' in the second couplet introduce different layers of meaning. One is a social marker of married status, while the other becomes an image of unfinished longing. The poet does not regard the fulfilment of every wish as necessary; allowing some desires to remain 'unmarried' may express both human incompleteness and a form of self-protection. The title is not simply a designation of a woman's marital condition but also a metaphor for a zone of aspiration that escapes possession.

Nevertheless, reading 'maidenly' merely as an aesthetic condition of untouched purity would be restrictive. The presence of vermilion raises questions about the institution of marriage and women's social recognition. As hunger, poverty, the marital and parental homes, and the suffering of brides recur through the collection, the title's image becomes socially charged. Personal incompletion and structural inequality illuminate rather than cancel one another.

Political Ghazals in Folk Melodies and the Testimony of Rivers

'There are tears on the banks of Kosi, Kamala, and Ganga; / vermilion and ritual rice paste are mingled with tears.'

In a folk-melody ghazal depicting political leaders and distressed people, the Kosi, Kamala, and Ganga cease to be merely geographical names. Linked to regional loss, displacement, communal life, and the auspicious symbols of women—vermilion and rice paste—they become symbols of sorrow. The separation between tears and river water appears to vanish. Lyrical repetition transforms individual suffering into a collective lament.

The ghazal's power lies in its sound. Folk melody creates listeners as well as readers. The actual political and environmental histories of the rivers, however, cannot be contained in a few lines; readers must bring some knowledge of local social contexts to the poem. The poet is not writing history but creating poetic signs of historical pain.

Agricultural Production, Traders, and the Economy of Awards

'The trader takes away the harvest of the field; / what remains is taken away by the overlord.'

'The body's radiance vanished into the fire of hunger; / prizes take away the sharp edge of the pen.'

The first couplet exposes the distance between agricultural labour and control of its products. The crop belongs to the field, the profits to the trader, and the remainder is appropriated by the powerful. The criticism of relations of production becomes a metrical condensation, not simply an economic statement. The second couplet juxtaposes the body's loss of vitality with the loss of the pen's edge to prizes, criticising possible distortions within literary institutions. The 'fire of hunger' and 'awards' join economic inequality with cultural inequality in one poem.

The couplet also carries a risk: if the reference to prizes becomes a universal allegation, the distinctions among complex literary institutions may disappear. Nevertheless, it raises a question that deserves attention: how does the distribution of literary prestige relate to creative labour and social need? The poet keeps this question alive as a source of discomfort for readers.

The Geyser, the Peepal Tree, and the Bride: The Double Truth of Development

'They cut down the peepal tree; / they installed a geyser in the courtyard.'

'The bride cries out in hunger; / outside, a celebratory birth song rises.'

The replacement of a peepal tree with a geyser brings modern consumption into contact with environmental loss. A living tree bearing communal and cultural significance gives way to an instrument of private convenience; 'development' is therefore not automatically synonymous with progress. The satire grows from the unexpected juxtaposition of peepal and geyser. Rather than simply reading this as condemnation of mechanical modernity, it is more productive to ask the price of convenience and who benefits from it.

The opposition between the hungry bride and the sohar, a festive birth song sounding outside, reveals the terrible separation of public celebration and domestic insecurity. Collective noise conceals the suffering of a woman's body. The folk-song-like particle 'ho' makes the satire singable, while the couplet's ethical energy comes from a private wound. The collection can thereby bring questions of women, food, family, and nature together within one brief ghazal.

The Final Couplets: Civilisation, Violence, and the Absence of People

'A world survives without its people; / what survives are only avatars.'

'Outwardly we became civilised; / inwardly the savage remained alive.'

The closing ghazal begins by questioning the absence of 'the people'. That the world survives is not the same as saying that its people are truly present—a compressed insight into social and political life. Images of the coexistence of government and crime, the pervasive reach of the court, and the uselessness of votes carry the poem beyond electoral procedures towards a crisis of ethical existence.

The last couplet opposes the outward appearance of civilisation to the survival of violence within. The collection has travelled from the empty stomach of its opening poem to the hollowness of social institutions. The ‘maidenly desire’ of its title is no longer simply incomplete romantic longing: it becomes the aspiration to make people fully human, continually frustrated by existing social arrangements.

The Ghazal Writer's Self-Identification and the Poetics of Irony

‘Anchinhar’ appears in many ghazals as a takhallus or recurring word. The poet places himself among people whose conduct becomes self-serving after public speeches, who hear contrary voices within themselves, and who experience incomplete recognition. This self-doubt prevents the satire from becoming wholly external accusation. Attacking the public morality of Mithila, the poet also places his own authorial identity under scrutiny.

At the level of technique, such self-mockery is one of the collection's strengths. In a conventional maqta, the takhallus can convey self-esteem; here it sometimes signifies failure, uncertainty, or self-directed humour. A dialogue is perceptible between the oral tradition of Mithila's joking wit and a modern critical personality.

The repetition of self-doubt may nonetheless become a fixed pose. When a poet repeatedly describes himself as troubled, readers are entitled to ask where self-examination becomes a distinct personal experience and where it remains a general assertion. Maintaining this distinction is necessary for impartial criticism.

The Maithili Ghazal: A Comparative View of Tradition and Change

The introduction to ‘Representative Maithili Ghazals’ available in Videha provides a basis for examining the form's history from the early twentieth century to the present. This archival account places Pandit Jeevan Jha among the earliest documented names, while discussing Kaviwar Sitaram Jha, Kashikant Mishra ‘Madhup’, Jagdishchandra Thakur ‘Anil’, Yoganand Hira, and other writers. The sequence should not be regarded as a simple triumphal story of linear progress. Different periods may have developed distinctive relations among the ghazal, lyric, song, couplet, rhythm, and metrical consciousness.

The early question concerned the adoption of Arabic and Persian metres and their fit with Maithili pronunciation. In later periods, debates about formal correctness versus broad comprehensibility, songlike lines versus autonomous couplets, and creative freedom versus metrical rules become more explicit. Videha's electronic literary public sphere extended these debates through articles, responses, publication of ghazals, and discussions of prosody.

Anchinhar's 'Grammar and History of the Maithili Ghazal', 'Sandarbh Sahit', and related writings are archival traces of this conversation.

The poet's own declared journey from 'Anchinhar Akhar' through 'Janghajori' to 'Kumari Ichchha' offers an interesting account of formal change. He describes the first as practice in simple syllabic forms, the second as experimentation with personally selected patterns, and the third as a combination of established and proposed metres. This self-description should be treated as evidence of the tendencies within his writing, not accepted without qualification as literary history. The actual achievement of 'Kumari Ichchha' is that arguments about metre remain connected to the living language of hunger, voting, villages, women, rivers, and family.

Entries in Videha's research archive for Anchinhar's 'Qafiya', 'Qafiya and Bahr', 'Early Experiments in Maithili Ghazal Grammar', 'The Maithili Ghazal in the Context of Expression', and 'A Comparative Study of Narendraji's Maithili and Hindi Ghazals' show that formal problems of the ghazal remained central to his criticism. Their listing alone cannot establish the correctness of all his conclusions, but it places the introduction to 'Kumari Ichchha' within a sustained critical inquiry.

The Differences Among Folk Melodies, Free Verse, and the Ghazal

The contradiction between song and ghazal is often explained by simple generic distinctions, but Maithili's various oral traditions do not permit such rigid separations. A composition based upon a folk melody does not thereby lose the possibility of being a ghazal if its matla, qafiya, radif, relations among couplets, and declared bahr remain consistent with the form's requirements. 'Ram Hare' and the politically themed folk-melody ghazals offer illuminating examples.

Anchinhar's writing also demonstrates that the subject of satire does not alone determine a poetic genre. Hunger, unemployment, and opposition to authority can be treated in the doha, song, independent lyric, or ghazal. The distinction depends upon structure and the oral construction of meaning, not subject matter. Hence a refrain or lines of similar length are not sufficient criteria: the phonetic operation of the rhyme, consistency of bahr, and relative independence of couplets require joint examination.

Insistence on the integrity of the genre is useful when it gives new experiments room to develop. If rules become merely instruments of exclusion, literary development is impeded. The collection's internal tension is that the poet demands strict traditional aruz while proposing new Maithili metres. These apparently contradictory commitments offer a creative opportunity: tradition supplies a standard, while the language reorganises it.

Concision, Repetition, and Poetic Risk

In the poet's strongest works, a material object opens onto a larger ethical crisis: the stomach, rice water and salt, a peepal tree, a geyser, a trader, or vermilion. Such concrete vocabulary creates scenes where abstract instruction would otherwise stand. Especially memorable are the contrast between rich and poor people's different ‘difficulties’, the clash between the hungry bride and a birth celebration, and the appropriation of the field's harvest.

Less effective passages are those in which repeated generalisations pronounce conclusions without encountering adequate resistance. Claims about government corruption, political deceit, social hypocrisy, or the fragmentation of friendship may be true to experience; nevertheless, poetry deepens when unexpected incidents, images, or human contradictions replace general statements. The collection contains successful instances of such imagery, but not all ghazals achieve the same concentration.

The historical usefulness of the metrical notes printed at the ends of poems is beyond doubt. Yet readers seeking an uninterrupted poetic experience may find that technical commentary immediately after a composition interrupts its musical absorption. Future editions could separate the poems from a prosodic appendix, allowing both purposes to be realised more clearly. This criticism does not diminish the original edition's value; it distinguishes its educational and aesthetic uses.

Achievements and Limitations in the Representation of Gender

Words such as ‘bride’, ‘daughter’, ‘marital home’, ‘parental home’, and ‘vermilion’ make inequalities in women's lives visible. The difference between hunger and celebration raises a pointed question about women's invisible labour. The relation of ‘Kumari Ichchha’ to marriage conventions brings women not simply into view as objects of male desire but into a complex field of social customs and unfulfilled longing.

Nonetheless, most ghazals are voiced by an external observer. Women are seldom permitted extended arguments in their own idiom. This cannot be counted as a defect of every poem, since the collection pursues a broad project of social satire; but the feminine form of the title makes the autonomy of women's speech a legitimate subject of inquiry. Compassion expressed on behalf of women's experience is not identical to a woman's self-determining voice. This distinction produces a fairer evaluation.

The Collection's Place in Literary History

‘Kumari Ichchha’ invites a double reading: as a manifesto for new experiments in metre within the Maithili ghazal and as a brief archive of social criticism. In his introduction, the poet insists on disciplined craft; in the poems, he tests the power of popular speech, satire, and poetic concision. Consequently, the volume becomes not only an account of private emotion but a poetic testimony to the contradictions of public life.

Its importance in Maithili literary history cannot be established by untested descriptions such as ‘first’ or ‘greatest’. Its significance lies in a specific conjunction: a hundred ghazals in one volume, extensive formal discussion, proposed names for metres, folk-melody adaptations, self-satire, class criticism, and acknowledgement of the reader's decisive part in meaning. These qualities make the book worthy of study; independent verification of its claims concerning metre remains a task for further research.

Conclusion

The most fruitful reading of ‘Kumari Ichchha’ recognises that poetry is neither merely the triumph of metre nor merely a social slogan. The poet's technical labour gives rhythm to rough experience; actual hunger, broken relationships, women's suffering, political theatre, and market inequality give meaning to that rhythm. Powerful beauty arises when form and experience depend upon each other.

The ‘maidenly’ quality of the title accepts that some wishes remain unfulfilled while resisting the social arrangements that leave people's fundamental rights unsatisfied. The contrast between the rich and poor people's different ‘difficulties’ raises the title to the level of social philosophy. Read beside the final ghazal's image of a world without its people, the collection asks not only ‘why is desire unfulfilled?’ but also ‘who controls the social conditions of its fulfilment?’

The volume's achievements lie in confident musicality, incisive vernacular speech, technical self-awareness, and concise articulation of social problems. Its limitations are uneven poetic quality, repetitive satire, uncertainties surrounding metrical licence, and the comparatively small space given to autonomous female voices. Considered together, these strengths and weaknesses establish ‘Kumari Ichchha’ as a creatively significant, research-worthy, and debate-provoking collection of modern Maithili ghazals.

References

Original Texts and Works Listed in Videha

- Anchinhar, Ashish. ‘Kumari Ichchha’. Ghazal collection. Videha E-Book Collection. Principal primary text.
- Anchinhar, Ashish. ‘Anchinhar Akhar’. Collection of ghazals, rubaiyat, and qitas. Shruti Prakashan, 2011; recorded in Videha's catalogue.
- Anchinhar, Ashish. ‘Janghajori’. Ghazal collection. Videha E-Book Collection.
- Anchinhar, Ashish. ‘Grammar and History of the Maithili Ghazal’. Videha E-Book Collection.
- Anchinhar, Ashish. ‘Sandarbh Sahit’. Ghazal criticism. Videha E-Book Collection.
- Anchinhar, Ashish. ‘Shabd-Arth-Shakti’. Work related to ghazal criticism. Videha E-Book Collection.
- Thakur, Gajendra, and Anchinhar, Ashish, co-editors. ‘Maithili Ghazal: Arrival and Points of Departure’. Critical collection listed in Videha's catalogue.
- Thakur, Gajendra, and Anchinhar, Ashish, co-editors. ‘Representative Maithili Ghazals, 1905–2022’. Anthology listed in Videha's catalogue.

Videha's Research Archive and Critical Materials

- Anchinhar, Ashish. ‘Qafiya’. Videha Research Archive, 2012.
- Anchinhar, Ashish. ‘Qafiya and Bahr’. Videha Research Archive, 2012.
- Anchinhar, Ashish. ‘Early Experiments in Maithili Ghazal Grammar’. Videha, issue 165, 2014.
- Anchinhar, Ashish. ‘The Concept of Jharu Metre in Maithili Poetics: Form and Determining Principles’. Videha, issue 157, 2014.
- Anchinhar, Ashish. ‘The Maithili Ghazal in the Context of Expression’. Videha, issue 251, 2018.
- Anchinhar, Ashish. ‘A Comparative Discussion of Narendraji's Maithili and Hindi Ghazals’. Videha, issue 252, 2018.
- Anchinhar, Ashish. ‘When Will Ghazals in the Mood of Dushyant Kumar's Ghazals Be Written in Maithili?’. Videha, issue 307, 2020.
- Videha. ‘Videha Book Collection’. https://videha-ejournal.github.io/videha/pothi.htm
- Videha. ‘Videha Research Index’. https://videha-ejournal.github.io/videha/research/index.html
- Videha. ‘Videha Research Essays: Research Archive’. https://videha-ejournal.github.io/videha/research/videha-scholar-research-book.html
- Videha. ‘An Introductory Assessment of Ashish Anchinhar's Ghazals and Criticism’. https://videha-ejournal.github.io/videha/new_page_56.htm

PART III

Ghazal Poetics: Grammar, Debate, and Criticism

Rereading Maithili Literature

REVIEW 10

A Ready Reckoner for the Maithili Ghazal

At the Confluence of Metre, Language, and Creation

Book under review: Ashish Anchinhar

Abstract

Ashish Anchinhar's A Ready Reckoner for the Maithili Ghazal is a concise, practice-oriented guide to the metrical system of the Maithili ghazal: bahr, rukn, qafiya, radif, case endings, pronunciation, and creative revision. This study examines the introduction and internal organisation of all five parts of the book, comparing its significance for the genre with modern Maithili ghazal criticism, Videha's literary initiatives, and Arabic–Persian–Urdu ghazal poetics. Particular attention is given to the distinctive decisions Anchinhar advances, while adopting traditional technical terminology, concerning Maithili's attachment of case suffixes, the pronunciation of short and long syllables, the chandrabindu, reph, consonant clusters, and the local use of the takhallus. The study concludes that the book's major achievements lie in its accessible presentation of rules, example-based exercises, and openness to revising its own earlier decisions. Nevertheless, the relation between speech sounds and script, the obligatory status of metrical rules, the evaluation of the musalsal ghazal, and the universal validity of certain prohibitions concerning qafiya call for reconsideration. The book is not merely an aid to beginners; it constitutes an important attempt to develop a specialised critical vocabulary for Maithili.

Keywords: Maithili ghazal; Ashish Anchinhar; bahr; rukn; qafiya; radif; case endings; phonetics; prosody; literary history; Videha.

References

Introduction: The Larger Questions Raised by a Concise Book

It is easy to regard a ghazal as no more than a succession of emotionally charged couplets; understanding its technical organisation is considerably harder. The autonomy of the sher, the recurrence of qafiya and radif, the regularity of bahr, and the rhythms of language distinguish the ghazal from other lyric forms. Its adoption in Maithili raises two related questions: how can the essential framework of traditional ghazal poetics be preserved, and how can Maithili's own phonological, morphological, and syntactic character find expression within that framework? Ashish Anchinhar's A Ready Reckoner for the Maithili Ghazal stands between these questions and offers a systematic programme of introductory training in the form.

The English expression “Ready Reckoner” in the title is significant. The book does not claim to provide a comprehensive aesthetics of the ghazal; rather, it seeks to put usable rules, concise explanations, and examples within immediate reach. In his introduction the author acknowledges that condensation may reduce the scope for elaborating concepts, while leaving the need for extended study intact. Whether this awareness of the book's limits should be read as a weakness or as generic honesty is the first critical question. In my view, its value becomes clearer when it is treated as a workshop companion rather than a final, authoritative reference work. [1]

This study maintains a clear distinction between the book's propositions and the reviewer's critical judgements. Wherever the author formulates a rule, the strength of its examples and reasoning must be tested; it would be inappropriate to assume that a convention current in one tradition is necessarily binding on every language and every period. Equally, practical simplifications devised to help the novice ghazal writer cannot uncritically be treated as substitutes for full-fledged linguistic theory.

Objectives and Critical Approach

This research essay pursues four objectives. First, it offers separate close readings of the technical material organised across the five parts of the book. Second, it tests the reasoning behind proposals concerning short and long syllables, letters and morae, pronunciation and script, case endings and qafiya, and the relation between feeling and form. Third, it locates the work comparatively within the historical development of the Maithili ghazal and the contemporary critical environment fostered through Videha. Fourth, it assesses the book's utility and limitations in relation to training, the revision of compositions, and criticism.

Methodologically, this is a work-centred critical study. Its primary source is the book itself. Videha's book lists, research lists, and comparative essays on the ghazal available there supply the literary context. Comparison with Arabic–Persian–Urdu ghazal traditions operates at the conceptual level: no exhaustive survey of those traditions is claimed here. Greater weight is assigned to critical testing of the explicitly available prosodic propositions and exercises than to historical claims drawn from external sources. [1][2][3][4]

The Book's Character, Organisation, and Self-Presentation

The original book comprises its title, dedication, an author's statement entitled “Anchinhar's Words,” five parts, and an author biography. Its arrangement follows the progression of a training manual rather than the linear history of a conventional research monograph. Part One introduces basic prosody; Part Two the components of the ghazal and qafiya; Part Three Maithili case endings and vowel correspondences; Part Four consonant clusters, short vowels, reph, and the defect called ita; and Part Five stress, the maqta, revision of composition, and an introduction to bahr-e-Mir. The pedagogical principle governing this order is “first the tools of language and metre, then composition.” [1]

The author approaches the ghazal through both technical and emotional dimensions, but reserves this concise volume for technical instruction. This does not mean that the neglect of emotion is desirable; in fact, the opening discussion affirms the necessity of both. The book's identity is thus founded on a distinction of levels rather than a contradiction: the practice of rules in one volume, the fuller exploration of feeling and literary history in a larger work. The reference to A Grammar and History of the Maithili Ghazal indicates that distinction; Videha's book catalogue records the latter as a separate publication. [1][2]

A notable quality of the preface is its self-criticism. The author reports having corrected certain errors in his earlier exposition. In a rule-governed form such as the ghazal, this admission is an essential feature of a critical culture: standards are formed by reasoned correction, not by immutable prohibitions. It permits the author to be understood not as the ultimate arbiter but as a participant in the process of evidence and verification. At some points, however, the book also employs the language of absolute certainty. This duality will be relevant in the discussions that follow.

Part One: An Introduction to Short and Long Syllables, Bahr, and Rukn

The first part establishes the technical foundations of ghazal poetics. The author defines bahr in terms of following an identical sequence of metrical quantities in the lines of a ghazal. The distinction between equality of the total number of morae and equality of their arrangement is crucial. Two lines may have the same total, yet differences in the order of short and long syllables can alter their weight and rhythm. Hence the book adopts the notation 1 and 2 and provides exercises in combining rukns. This numerical language offers beginners an entry point, particularly when traditional names are unfamiliar. [1]

The account of rukn introduces five-unit and four-unit patterns, the names fa'ulun, fa'ilun, fa'ilatun, mafa'ilun, mustaf'ilun, among others, and lists their successive metrical weights. The author shows how mathematical sequences can help memorise the rukns. This instructional construction is noteworthy because it converts difficult phonetic names into memorable patterns of short and long syllables. For students of verse composition, it connects formula with practice. Memorising a formula, however, is not the same as possessing rhythmic sensitivity; listening, pronunciation, and singability remain indispensable checks.

The author considers the weight of a syllable preceding a consonant cluster, the difference between anusvara and chandrabindu, visarga, and possible changes in metrical sequence across word boundaries. Examples such as “ghar,” “bigari,” “bhinsar,” and “kabkab” illustrate the relation between a word's internal stresses and its metrical quantities. Pronunciation may shift when case endings or groups of words are joined: this observation moves beyond exclusively written prescriptions towards actual speech. Such attention is particularly valuable in a language as richly varied in conversational usage as Maithili.

Here the first important critical issue emerges. In certain contexts the author brings the traditional length of a written character, its pronounced duration, and its accentual stress into a single process of counting. That is convenient for practical instruction, but in modern phonetics the written character, vowel duration, stress, and metrical weight occupy different analytical levels. An account of pronunciation is essential to understanding a word's use in metre, but greater care is needed to accommodate the variety of native pronunciations. The compressed nature of the manual limits the scope of such analysis.

Especially deserving attention in Part One is the exercise called “sauti mushaira.” The author temporarily sets meaning aside to practise the metre, qafiya, and radif. Just as the early training of a musician may involve practising notes independently of verbal meaning, preliminary structural exercises can teach the ghazal writer rhythmic discipline. But if that means is elevated into a final literary ideal, the relation between sound and meaning in the sher will be weakened. The author himself assigns meaninglessness only a limited role within the exercise; this limitation must be kept firmly in view by the critic.

In classifying bahr, the author introduces the traditional terminology for original, composite, and altered metres, while also adopting convenient labels such as “equal,” “half-equal,” and “unequal.” These designations represent not merely translation but a reorganisation of teaching. Their utility is apparent when beginners attempt to grasp the relationships among traditional rukns. Yet comprehensive evidence is not supplied for the sources of the conventional enumerations, the legitimacy of altered patterns, or disagreements among schools of prosody. The list is therefore more dependable as an introductory guide than as a final scholarly enumeration.

Part Two: The Grammar of Sher, Matla, Radif, and Qafiya

The second part leads the reader from the ghazal's external identity towards its internal composition. The author stresses the thematic autonomy of the two-line sher, prescribes the presence of qafiya and radif in both lines of the matla and their recurrence in the second lines of subsequent couplets. Terms including musalsal and non-musalsal ghazal, husn-e-matla, ghair-muraddaf ghazal, tahlili radif, and taqabul-e-radif are explained through examples. A major merit of the section is that its terminology never remains an isolated glossary: every term is connected to actual compositional practice. [1]

Qafiya receives particularly extended attention. The author examines not merely similar sounds or metrical quantities, but the final character of rhyming words, the preceding vowel, and the sequence of correspondences. Words such as “rag–tag–bhag” demonstrate that qafiya is not simply a matter of visibly matching final letters, but a rule of recurrent sound structure. Readers are instructed to work backwards from the ends of words to identify the correspondence. That procedure teaches them to recognise the subtle formal patterns underlying the rhyme.

In discussing radif, the allowance for identical wording with divergent meanings is a creative insight. Repetition of a word need not require the same meaning on every occasion; variation may increase a couplet's polysemic possibilities. Formal recurrence in the ghazal can thus become an instrument of semantic expansion rather than stagnation. Through the anticipation of qafiya and the return of radif, the reader develops expectations which the sher either fulfils or unsettles to achieve its effect. The book does not dwell extensively on this aesthetic process, but its examples make the possibility apparent.

Conversely, the author's tendency to accord the musalsal ghazal comparatively less recognition illustrates a generic value judgement. The autonomy of the sher is unquestionably one of the ghazal's defining strengths; thematic continuity, however, need not diminish poetic quality. A common subject may sustain contrasting perspectives, the gradual development of meanings, and recurring symbols. It is therefore appropriate to recognise musalsal and non-musalsal as different types, but not to make the distinction the sole criterion of literary worth. This critical difference creates a dialogue between the book's prescriptive dimension and the aesthetic experience of the modern reader.

The instructions concerning the minimum number of couplets in a ghazal must likewise be situated between conventional teaching norms and historical variety. The dimensions of traditional ghazals have varied across periods, linguistic environments, and editorial traditions. The guidance offered here may be useful for elementary practice; it is insufficient, however, to treat it as the genre's single, timeless boundary. The author's purpose is to maintain formal discipline, whereas history sometimes presents exceptions.

Part Three: Case Endings, Vowel Correspondence, and the Question of Maithilisation

The third part represents one of the book's most important local interventions. In Maithili, the written attachment of case endings, the inflection of nouns, and conventions of pronunciation create both difficulties and opportunities when determining the qafiya of a ghazal. The author examines the addition of the same case suffix to different stems, such as “kalamsā” and “patansā,” before asking whether the common inflection belongs to qafiya or radif. This is not merely an orthographic issue; it concerns the interrelation of metre, sound, and grammar. [1]

In this section, testing the correspondence of the remaining root words after removing case endings emerges as a practical criterion. If a phonetic correspondence remains intact after the suffixes are removed, interpreting the common ending as radif becomes possible; if the stems do not correspond, the judgement changes. The rule matters critically because it does not subject the living grammar of Maithili to passive imitation of Arabic–Urdu ghazal poetics; rather, it demands a legitimate place for Maithili linguistic forms within the genre.

Examples of case endings occurring within the line are especially revealing of the subtle process of Maithilisation. In the author's analysis, word boundaries and the boundaries of radif do not invariably coincide. Structures such as “hamra sangme aam chhai” and “hamra hathme aam chhai” require the relation between qafiya and radif within an inflected expression to be interpreted differently. Far from being mere technical anomalies, these examples document the internal pressure exerted by Maithili syntax. The structure of the local language itself intervenes in the interpretation of an inherited form.

The author himself raises the possibility that such allowances could be abused. This self-awareness is important: if rules are expanded without testing, the assessment of qafiya correspondence and the identification of radif may become arbitrary. A stronger critical method would place counterexamples, variations of pronunciation, and evidence from regional dialects beside the proposed exceptions. Otherwise a sensible teaching accommodation may harden into an allegedly universal prescription.

In the discussion of vowel-based qafiya, examples are given of the vowels i, a, u, e, ai, o, and au in their long forms. By examining the relation between spoken vowels and their written vowel signs, the author distinguishes several degrees of correspondence between sounds and clusters of letters. The fundamental question here is how far qafiya should depend on hearing, and how far on graphic similarity. When the author insists upon preserving identical spelling, a written prescriptiveness becomes attached to a framework otherwise grounded in phonetic similarity.

Another major critical feature of this part is the author's revision of his own compositions. The qafiyas in previously published ghazals are retested against a later criterion, and some earlier usages are judged inconsistent. Such a declaration has particular significance in the history of poetics. Rather than inventing exceptions to protect one's own literary reputation when formulating a rule, the application of a new principle to one's earlier poems signals critical responsibility. Yet the aesthetic grounds for the new rule must also be examined independently: self-correction is not, in itself, conclusive proof of a theory's truth.

Part Four: Pronunciation, Reph, Consonant Clusters, and the Defect of Ita

The fourth part is rich in linguistic detail. Consonant clusters; the treatment of short i and u; chandrabindu; the difference between words with reph and a full r; sound distinctions such as s–sh–sh and n–retroflex n; and the examination of the ita defect all link the technical study of ghazals directly with questions of Maithili linguistics. The author offers instances in which the written and pronounced forms of the same word differ. Here the ghazal ceases to be merely an imported form: its rules begin to enter into dialogue with the local phonology of Maithili. [1]

In relation to short i and u, the author emphasises orthographic discipline in qafiya. Showing variations in the pronunciation of words such as “mati,” he links the rhyming pattern to the presence of written i. The significance of such observations is that spoken Maithili is neither static nor uniform; a single spelling can admit several pronunciations. Yet when the author absolutely prohibits a form different from a specified qafiya, dialectal variation, popular usage, and actual phonetic correspondence demand independent examination.

The examples involving reph and a complete r are especially pertinent. Maithili frequently displays a difference between reph-bearing forms associated with Sanskrit and sounds common in everyday speech. The author tests the confrontation between written tradition and living pronunciation against the criterion of qafiya. The work's strength here lies in its selection of examples; its limitation is the occasional elevation of an imagined standard pronunciation above dialectal diversity. The value of a literary language lies in negotiating this tension, not in the universal triumph of either alternative.

The explanation of the ita defect is a distinctive methodological achievement of Part Four. The author compares the bases of words formed with vowel signs, suffixes, prefixes, or sandhi. When qafiya appears to correspond on the surface but the semantic relation between stems and their rhyme structure fails to satisfy specified conditions, the question of ita arises. With examples such as "bimari–harami" and "dosti–dushmani," he exposes the layers of word formation. Grammar, etymology, and sound are brought together in a single analysis.

Nevertheless, the process of retrieving the root of a word when applying the ita rule may itself be disputed. Because of productive suffixation, historical borrowings, semantic innovation, and changes in spoken forms, it is not always possible to divide every word neatly into a stem and a suffix. A word's present meaning may differ from its historical origin. Consequently, the superficial phonetic correspondence of qafiya, the history of word formation, and the reader's experience of meaning should be tested separately. This caution preserves the usefulness of the author's proposition while reducing unnecessary prohibitions.

Viewed as a whole, Part Four asks a central question: how will the Maithili ghazal acquire its own linguistic identity? The author's answer is not unilinear. Rigorous adherence to traditional aruz in some contexts, allowances relative to Maithili pronunciation in others, and certainty based on written forms elsewhere coexist. This may not be a contradiction, but it is certainly an active intellectual tension. It should become an object of criticism, since the development of a locally grounded ghazal poetics is possible through precisely such struggles.

Part Five: Stress, Maqta, and the Creative Discipline of Revision

The fifth part returns to the basic consideration of morae in the first, now approaching it through accentual stress. Demonstrating alternative pronunciations of "ghar," "kamal," and "bhinsar," the author urges that metrical decisions be taken in relation to meaning. An important principle emerges: analysing metrical quantities cannot be entirely independent of semantics. Some sound patterns generate different meanings; a ghazal writer must therefore preserve meaning while fulfilling the bahr. In this way the earlier injunction to learn technique first assumes a more sophisticated form.

In introducing the maqta, the author discusses the position of the takhallus and grammatical inflections of a name. In Maithili, case endings can be attached to personal names. This inflection does not invalidate the maqta; it establishes a local grammar for the poet's self-presence in the concluding couplet. The author demands consistency in the use of names and pen names, and argues that enclosing a name in quotation marks may restrict its semantic potential. Poetic identity, grammar, and the plurality of meanings converge in this fine-grained discussion.

The culminating example in the fifth part is a study of the revision of a ghazal by Jagdish Chandra Thakur "Anil." The different metrical sequences in the original lines are examined, and revisions proposed to bring them into a common pattern. The two lines of the revised matla read:

I am broken; that is why I recite ghazals.

I am hungry; that is why I recite ghazals.

Through their repeated phrasing, these lines connect personal brokenness and hunger to the impulse to speak through the ghazal. "Broken" suggests bodily or psychological fragmentation, while "hungry" evokes the material deprivations of life. The common radif does not merely repeat a feeling in a straight line; it binds two different causes of experience into a shared verbal rhythm. [1]

Throughout the revision exercise, the words of the original idea are rearranged. This is useful for teaching craft, but its literary consequences are mixed. Some situations in the original draft change; the relationship between the new lines and the original theme also shifts. If preserving the bahr weakens the spontaneity of experience or the movement of meaning, the revision cannot be called an unqualified success. The reader must apply two standards together: metrical consistency and the artistic unity of the sher. A technically flawless couplet is not necessarily a compelling one; and adjusting a compelling theme to the demands of the form requires a distinct kind of creative labour.

The author closes by introducing bahr-e-Mir and noting its convenience for new ghazal writers. Relatively flexible acceptance of metrical weights, possible combinations of the pronunciations of separate words, and the conception of new metres for Maithili are significant here. This is not simply an exercise in imitation but a proposal for creative local expansion of the genre. His warning that allowances should be distinguished from regular practice is nonetheless meaningful: beginners ought first to understand basic structure, lest they mistake exceptions for ordinary rules.

Close Reading of the Quotations: The Union of Technique and Experience

In his opening statement, the author treats the two dimensions of a ghazal—the technical or prosodic and the emotional—as equally necessary. This proposition counters the common tendency to understand the ghazal merely as a means of "filling the required metrical weight." The creative imperative is that bahr should become a vehicle of natural expression, not feel like an external constraint imposed on the reader. When the revisions in Part Five are considered in the light of this original principle, it becomes clear that the book's technical conclusions, too, can be reconsidered through the standard of emotional meaning.

The pairing of "broken" and "hungry" links distinct kinds of deprivation through a single voice. The first points to psychological disconnection or existential defeat; the second places deprivation on a social and material plane. "That is why" functions as a causal link: composing ghazals becomes the consequence of experience, not an indulgence. "I recite" is a present-tense self-declaration, making the sher not merely a report of past suffering but the immediate presence of a speaking subject. Simple grammatical repetition thus produces semantic complexity.

Another subtle feature is the identical radif in both lines of the matla. The return of "I recite ghazals" gives rhythm to the speaker's voice, while a change in the preceding words transforms the implication. This process can be especially fruitful in the ghazal: movement of meaning within a stable structure. Qafiya and radif should therefore be understood not only as restrictive disciplines but as systems of creative possibility.

A limitation of this short close reading should also be acknowledged. The book is primarily a technical guide, not the poet's complete collection of ghazals. It would therefore be inappropriate to infer a definitive picture of the poet's entire outlook, breadth of social themes, or aesthetics from these examples. The poetic merit of the examples is more properly assessed in the context of the book's pedagogical aims.

The Place of the Maithili Ghazal in Literary History: Tradition and Reconstruction

To understand the history of the Maithili ghazal merely as the arrival of a form from Arabic, Persian, and Urdu would be incomplete. Its acceptance into Maithili, technical imitation, adjustments for indigenous pronunciation, the training of new writers, and dissemination through digital media constitute different phases of development. Discussions of literary history available on Videha describe the early contributions of Jeevan Jha and a tradition subsequently developed by other writers. A project compiling representative ghazals from 1905 to 2022 attempts to document this historical continuity. It still needs to be integrated with firm research into the early history: the opening year of an anthology does not automatically establish the definitive date of the genre's origin. [3][4]

In the traditional Urdu ghazal, bahr, matla, qafiya, radif, maqta, and takhallus occupy distinctive places. The adoption of this terminology in Maithili links the form with its historical memory. But adopting words is not identical with adopting the life of a literary form. When a ghazal is written in Maithili, suffixes such as “sā,” “me,” “kē,” and “k,” local forms of address, colloquial verbs, and vowel changes determine the ultimate sound of its couplets. In this sense, Maithilisation is neither simply translation nor the addition or subtraction of a few technical liberties: it is a reconfiguration of linguistic sensibility.

Videha's publishing sphere brings together bibliographies of ghazal-related books, criticism, representative anthologies, and discussions of new writers. Placing Anchinhar's Anchinhar Akhar, A Grammar and History of the Maithili Ghazal, Sandarbh Sahit, and the present concise manual within this constellation makes the interdependence of writing, theory, criticism, and instruction apparent. The development of poetic consciousness consists not only in the appearance of a distinguished work: a vocabulary for understanding it, systems of instruction, and public forums of criticism are equally necessary. This book contributes to the critical infrastructure of the modern Maithili ghazal. [2]

Contemporary criticism in Videha has examined the ghazal collections of Omprakash Jha, Amit Mishra, and Chandan Kumar Jha within the same literary milieu. Such comparative material is important because the influence of ghazal poetics extends beyond theoretical exposition into the compositional processes and publishing practices of new writers. Here the Ready Reckoner can be read as evidence of a culture of instruction in which training in metre, reasoned feedback, and rewriting complement one another. [5]

An inclusive literary history must also resist confining the Maithili ghazal to an inflexible binary of “correct” and “incorrect” compositions. A poem from one period may prove inadequate by a later rule of qafiya, but its linguistic world, social sentiments, reception, and historical contribution do not thereby vanish. The rule is an important instrument of generic study, not a complete substitute for history. The rule-oriented energy of Anchinhar's book lends rigour to historiography, but a broader literary history must also make room for experiments, failures, exceptions, and transitions.

Comparative Discussion of the Arabic–Persian–Urdu Tradition and Maithili Prosody

The underlying technical structure of the ghazal rests upon a complex relation between sequences of metrical quantities and end rhyme. The Sanskrit–Maithili prosodic traditions also possess diverse systems of short and long syllables, gana, vrtta, rhythm, and lyric composition. Despite apparent similarities, these two prosodic traditions differ in word structure, pronunciation, metrical calculation, and the history of exceptions. An analogy between rukn and gana can be useful pedagogically, but treating them as completely identical technical institutions would be an analytical oversimplification. Anchinhar's book offers comparative indications; their systematic elaboration remains a task for future research.

A first implication of this comparison lies in reconsidering bahr. If a Maithili writer adopts a traditional metre of aruz, its rules ought to be transparent. If, on the other hand, the writer constructs new forms through Maithili syllable counts or a local quantitative system, those structures need distinct names and tests. Maintaining the difference between the two systems helps readers see what rules a given sher follows. Other comparative studies of the ghazal in Videha discuss a simplified syllabic approach; caution is necessary before treating its standards as equivalent to traditional aruz. [5]

The second implication concerns the phonology of qafiya. Rules from Urdu–Persian traditions may be adopted in Maithili, but local sound correspondences, vowel shortness, nasalisation, and attached case endings can alter the practice of rhyme. Independent linguistic testing is therefore valuable for the Maithili ghazal. Anchinhar's discussions of case endings and chandrabindu are an active beginning in this direction; they could be developed further through phonetic transcription, evidence from pronunciation in several regions, and larger collections of examples.

The third implication is aesthetic. In the traditional ghazal, suggestion, opposition, allusion, and sudden turns of meaning must work within the limited space of two lines. Even when all rules are satisfied, a sher without freshness of feeling cannot derive sufficient literary importance from technical correctness. Anchinhar's preface acknowledges this, although the main emphasis falls upon practice. Readers should therefore supplement prosody with the study of rasa, dhvani, vakrokti, figures of speech, popular experience, and social context. Such a complementary perspective is indispensable to contemporary literary criticism.

Internal Tensions in the Theory and Critical Judgements

The book's first significant tension is between “exercise” and “poetry.” Temporarily suspending meaning while learning rules is legitimate during practice; yet feeling and meaning must be decisive in judging a finished poem. The author's own statements support the balance of these two aspects. Examples used for training should not be confused with models of artistic achievement. The ghazal-revision exercise makes this distinction visible.

The second tension lies between “sound” and “script.” If qafiya depends on phonetic correspondence, to what extent must written forms be identical? The author acknowledges differences in pronunciation in some contexts but makes visible letters decisive in others. This priority needs explicit clarification when establishing standards. Rather than an absolute prohibition, separate categories of pronunciation-based, script-based, and convention-based tests might be more useful.

The third tension is between “local autonomy” and “traditional discipline.” The author accepts special arrangements for Maithili case endings while insisting on strict Urdu–Persian standards elsewhere. This duality should be understood not as a contradiction but as a challenge to reasoned scrutiny of rules. The governing question ought to be whether an allowance is necessitated by local pronunciation or linguistic structure, or merely by the writer's convenience. The first kind may support theoretical development; the second requires rigorous scrutiny.

The fourth tension is between “history” and “rules.” The book endorses evaluating works against modern standards of ghazal poetics. This teaches generic analysis, but it cannot encompass the multidimensional meanings of history. An earlier sher may fail a present-day rule while its compositional conventions, reception, and literary influence remain independent historical evidence. The critic must approach both kinds of evidence judiciously.

The fifth tension is between “brevity” and “authority.” The Ready Reckoner supplies formulas without examining the complete genealogy, disagreements, exceptions, and examples relevant to every formula. The author implicitly recognises this limitation by referring readers to a more comprehensive work. The booklet serves its strongest purpose when it raises questions, provides exercises, and inspires further inquiry.

Pedagogical Value: Rules, Examples, Errors, and Rewriting

The book's pedagogy appears to rest on four successive actions: definition, illustration, identification of faults, and revision. This differs from an ordinary grammar lesson because students composing ghazal couplets must immediately test their own writing against the rules. The numerical representation of rukns, retrospective examination of qafiya, examples of case endings, and Anil's revision exercise are distinct manifestations of this method.

Its significance goes beyond accelerating the act of writing. Students learn that making poetry entails scrutiny: the first line written is not necessarily the last. When the author applies new rules to his earlier qafiyas, he establishes a model of self-criticism for teachers and pupils alike. Such discipline is invaluable in a literary workshop.

Modern pedagogical practice would nevertheless benefit from some supplementary material. Each example could be accompanied by an explicit phonetic division of the accepted pronunciation, at least two alternative dialect forms, a chart of qafiya and radif, a note on emotional effect, and explanations of the answers to readers' exercises. Recording linguistic diversity would not change the book's basic design; it would make it empirically stronger.

Principal Achievements and Limitations: A Synthetic Assessment

The first achievement is the systematic introduction into Maithili of the technical terms of ghazal poetics. Readers do not merely encounter bahr, rukn, matla, qafiya, radif, maqta, takhallus, and the ita defect as names; they see examples of their use. This facilitates the development of a language-sensitive critical vocabulary.

The second achievement is the recognition of local linguistic realities. Attached case endings, chandrabindu, short vowels, reph, and variations of word pronunciation present direct challenges in composition. Rather than ignore them, the book seeks solutions. In doing so, it challenges the tendency to regard the Maithili ghazal as a merely imitative form.

The third achievement is the disposition towards self-correction. It may not be rare for a writer to recognise the limitations of earlier decisions, but it is certainly an essential virtue of literary tradition. In this sense the book is not a static collection of rules but a revisable account of literary training.

Among its principal limitations are the relatively restricted exploration of an encompassing aesthetics, inadequate regional testing of pronunciation variants, excessively prohibitive wording in some rules, and limited documentation of historical disagreements. Yet these limitations cannot be considered apart from the book's declared brevity. Criticism is fair only when its objectives and the scope of its claims are kept clear.

Conclusion

The fundamental importance of Ashish Anchinhar's A Ready Reckoner for the Maithili Ghazal is that it makes the Maithili ghazal a subject of formal judgement rather than merely a spontaneous field of emotional expression. Its five parts constitute a pedagogical journey through calculation, terminology, local linguistic accommodation, fine-grained testing of qafiya, and creative revision. This journey reveals an important model of contemporary training in the Maithili ghazal.

The final critical conclusion, however, is not an unconditional acceptance of rules, but their testing and judicious application. The craft of the ghazal should intensify experience, not replace it. Only when the discipline of bahr, qafiya, and radif is reconciled with Maithili pronunciation and lived experience does the ghazal acquire its real poetic power. In this light, the book is an important beginning, a useful workshop manual, and a foundation for continuing discussion of Maithili ghazal poetics. Its relevance also lies in enabling readers to ask better questions while seeking answers.

References

The sources are the original book and materials in Videha's book collection and research archive. Material from other websites has not been included.

[1] Anchinhar, Ashish. Maithili Ghazalak Ready Reckoner / A Ready Reckoner for the Maithili Ghazal. Videha collection; original work (© 2012, 2022); primary text for this study.

https://videha-ejournal.github.io/videha/pothi.htm

[2] Anchinhar, Ashish. A Grammar and History of the Maithili Ghazal; Sandarbh Sahit; Anchinhar Akhar; Shabd-Arth-Shakti. Related works listed in the Videha book collection.

https://videha-ejournal.github.io/videha/pothi.htm

[3] Thakur, Gajendra, and Anchinhar, Ashish (co-editors). Maithili Ghazal: Arrival and Departure Points; Representative Maithili Ghazals (1905–2022). Mentioned in Videha's book catalogue and the author biography in the original volume.

https://videha-ejournal.github.io/videha/pothi.htm

[4] Videha. A Parallel History of Mithila & Maithili Literature, historical discussion of the ghazal. Videha research archive.

https://videha-ejournal.github.io/videha/research/2026/438/a-parallel-history-of-mithila-maithili-literature.htm

[5] Videha. Three Voices of the Maithili Ghazal: Om Prakash Jha, Amit Mishra, Chandan Kumar Jha. Comparative criticism in Videha's parallel literary history.

https://videha-ejournal.github.io/videha/new_page_79.htm

[6] Anchinhar, Ashish. Early Experiments in the Grammar of the Maithili Ghazal. Videha, issue 165, 1 November 2014. Entry in the Videha research index.

https://videha-ejournal.github.io/videha/research/videha-scholar-research-book.html

[7] Anchinhar, Ashish. The Maithili Ghazal in the Context of Expression. Videha, issue 251, 1 June 2018. Entry in the Videha research index.

https://videha-ejournal.github.io/videha/research/videha-scholar-research-book.html

[8] Videha. Critical Appreciation of Ashish Anchinhar. An extended critical essay on his contributions as poet, critic, and theorist of the ghazal.

https://videha-ejournal.github.io/videha/new_page_56.htm

[9] Videha. Videha Research Index: an index of research materials concerning Maithili literature, criticism, linguistics, and history.

https://videha-ejournal.github.io/videha/research/index.html

REVIEW II

A Grammar and History of the Maithili Ghazal

Linguistic Autonomy and Prosodic Discipline

Research Abstract

Ashish Anchinhar's A Grammar and History of the Maithili Ghazal is an ambitious theoretical and historical attempt to establish the ghazal as an independent literary genre in Maithili. Its concern is not merely to introduce the vocabulary of Arabic–Persian–Urdu ghazal poetics, but to reinterpret the ghazal's formal discipline in relation to Maithili pronunciation, vowel structure, spelling, metrical quantities, case endings, word order, and popular usage. The first twenty-four sections discuss the sher, matla, radif, qafiya, maqta, bahr, taqti, formal virtues and defects, music, language, and literary criticism; the twenty-fifth traces the history of the ghazal from early indications to modern practitioners, printed works, and digital exchanges. The book is consequently a conjunction of four forms: instructional manual, treatise on poetics, literary manifesto, and history.

This study separately evaluates the rules proposed by the book and the character of their supporting evidence. Three contradictions deserve particular examination: the affirmation of linguistic autonomy alongside insistence on a single legitimate form; acceptance of variations in pronunciation alongside rigid determination of written metrical patterns; and the desire to restore neglected ghazal writers alongside value-laden polarisation between established and experimental tendencies. The study concludes that the book's enduring contributions lie in making the grammar of the ghazal accessible to Maithili readers, providing common instruments of metrical evaluation, and attempting to bring digital literary archives into the category of historical evidence. Nevertheless, several genealogies, claims of priority, numerical assertions, and periodisations cannot be regarded as definitive literary history without independent bibliographical verification.

Keywords: Maithili ghazal; Ashish Anchinhar; aruz; bahr; qafiya; radif; linguistic autonomy; poetics; literary history; Videha; digital literature.

Introduction: A Language of Its Own for the Genre, a Form of Its Own for the Language

Maithili poetic tradition has a rich legacy of songs, devotional lyrics, folk ballads, syllabic metres, and quantitative metres. Against this background, the ghazal appears not merely as an imported name but as a disciplined possibility for expressing new sensibilities. Two questions become unavoidable: how can the ghazal become Maithili while preserving its formal identity, and how far can Maithili's sound and rhythm reconstruct the inherited rules? The book's central value lies in raising these questions systematically.

The pairing of "grammar" and "history" in the title is not accidental. Grammar establishes standards of form; history selects and arranges earlier material in their light. Consequently, the grammar accepted will influence the choice of figures, evaluations, and periods in literary history. The central contention of this essay is that the book attempts not only to formulate rules for the ghazal but also to delineate the boundaries of its literary legitimacy in Maithili. An adequate reading must consider its creative achievement and ideological limitations together.

The Book's Formation, Form, and Structure of Sources

The author dates the publication of his introductory series on the ghazal to 2011. Revision, expansion, and the inclusion of new thinking transformed that series into a systematic book of twenty-five parts. Publication references to 2012 and 2022 occur in the text, and the author discusses the revised form of his arguments in 2022. Rather than a fixed early text, the volume should be understood as a critical project developed over time. He himself reconsiders mistaken identifications in his earlier work and some established claims, bringing the importance of revision to the foreground.

In Videha's book collection, this volume appears alongside Anchinhar's Anchinhar Akhar, Sandarbh Sahit, Kumari Ichchha, Janghajori, A Ready Reckoner for the Maithili Ghazal, and Shabd-Arth-Shakti, documenting a sustained career of writing centred on the ghazal. His essays "Early Experiments in the Grammar of the Maithili Ghazal" and "A Brief Critical Introduction to the Modern Maithili Ghazal," published in Videha, likewise show that the central book's ideas form part of a continuing public theoretical debate rather than an isolated enterprise. The presence of these essays documents the development of his perspective; it does not, by itself, independently confirm every historical conclusion.

The Study's Sources and Critical Criteria

The primary criteria in this study are the work's own propositions, examples, acknowledgements, references, and accounts of authors. At a second level, the chronology of debate is examined through Videha's published article index and the relevant original authors. Comparative historical discussion keeps three levels distinct: "the author asserts," "the example demonstrates," and "can be regarded as independently verified." Neither the history presented in the book nor the author's assessment is automatically treated as indisputable historical truth.

Four standards govern the criticism: linguistic consistency—whether rules agree with Maithili's actual sound system; formal consistency—whether comparable couplets are judged by the same standards; literary fruitfulness—whether craft strengthens feeling and thought or supplants them; and historical evidence—whether a poet's composition, its date, its publication, its availability, and its textual tradition have each been established separately. The evidentiary strength of the book itself is as important a question as its merits.

Statements Verified in the Primary Text and Their Critical Implications

The author's commitment to language is expressed most forcefully in the declaration:

"I want the ghazal, certainly—but I want it in Maithili."

The intent of this sentence is not a narrow insistence on linguistic identity, but an inquiry into a transformed system of ghazal composition. The author believes that imposing rules from foreign languages unchanged upon Maithili can obstruct indigenous pronunciation and word arrangement. Yet the distinct formal identity of the genre must not be abolished merely through a change of language: this is his fundamental condition.

"Some rules of the ghazal depend on the language."

This statement opens the possibility of revision within the author's disciplinary outlook. The question remains how far the language-dependence of qafiya can extend if radif and bahr are regarded as relatively fixed. If variation in pronunciation alters judgements about syllabic quantity, the practical criterion for maintaining a stable bahr requires separate investigation.

"In Maithili, the spelling 'ग़ज़ल' is incorrect and 'गजल' is correct."

This orthographic decision concerns Maithili writing conventions and the local assimilation of foreign sounds. It cannot become a standard of the ghazal's originality or excellence; it is primarily a proposal for linguistic standardisation. The existence of original spellings in other script traditions or historical quotations must still be acknowledged.

> "Qafiya means a rhyme marked by vowel correspondence, whether that correspondence is in the vowels of letters or in vowel signs."

The definition makes clear that the author does not understand qafiya merely as the matching of final letters. Explaining the distinctions among phonetic correspondence, pronunciation, and the correspondence of vowel signs is one of the volume's useful pedagogical accomplishments. Discussions of morphemic boundaries, case endings, and colloquial sound changes also provide a firm basis for examining rhyme in practice.

Integrated Critique: A New Organisation of Ghazal Poetics

Essential Features of the Form and Creative Allowances

The book upholds the arrangement of qafiya and radif in both lines of the matla, their repetition in the second line of each following sher, uniformity of bahr, and the independent structure of each couplet. This account systematically introduces the fundamental features of traditional ghazal poetics into Maithili. The author accepts ghazals without radif but insists on the indispensability of qafiya and bahr. Diversity is therefore acceptable to him within the form, not through its dissolution.

The question of creative freedom requires a critical distinction. A work that calls itself a ghazal can be tested by the conventions of the form. Yet a poem combining the ghazal's musical memory, paired lines, repetition, and free verse should not thereby be deprived of literary value. Classification by genre and aesthetic evaluation are separate matters. At several points the book risks substituting one for the other.

The Triangle of Language, Orthography, and Pronunciation

The author discusses at length the full and reduced forms of Maithili expressions, the usages of e, ai, and ai-related combinations, contracted pronunciation, consonant clusters, nasalisation, dialectal variation, and the quantities of written syllables. The underlying problem is real: writing and speaking do not always produce identical forms. A proposal that acknowledges pronunciation diversity while prescribing a uniform written standard may assist teaching, but it also makes regional linguistic plurality difficult to measure on its own terms.

The issue cannot be settled by an injunction concerning standard spelling alone; it requires an explicit and consistent basis for pronunciation. Readers should first be told which dialectal reading practice has been adopted, which pronunciations are permitted, and what effect alternatives have upon the bahr. Without this additional level, calculation may become convenient but the phonological case will not gain universal authority.

Metre, Bahr, and Taqti: From Rules to Practice

The volume supplies extensive numerical examples of short and long syllables, combinations of rukns, various Arabic metres, simplified syllabic discipline, and comparative features of Sanskrit syllabic metres. Its pedagogical progression is significant: readers begin with the metrical quantities of words, then add qafiya, learn the construction of the sher, and finally acquire the skill of shaping an entire ghazal in a common rhythm. For introductory practice, the recommendation to concentrate on form before emotion may be pedagogically useful.

Calculation, however, is not the same as experience. Even where the numerical pattern is correct, a line may be difficult to pronounce, its semantic pauses unnatural, or its radif irrelevant. The teaching of ghazals acquires strength only when metrical correctness is joined to tests of natural pronunciation, poetic meaning, phonetic energy, and address to an audience. The book's linguistic discussions open a path towards this broader standard; its more systematic development remains a subject for future research.

The Independent Contribution of the Discussion of Qafiya

The division of qafiya into numerous sections is among the book's most developed features. Examples dealing with vowel correspondence, letters, stress, visarga, the role of prefixes and case endings, differences between Maithili and Urdu alphabets, and alleged defects make it not merely an introduction but an exercise in reasoned scrutiny. Asking whether phonetic correspondence survives after removing case endings connects the morphemic structure of written Maithili with the organisation of verse.

The lasting value of this discussion is its demonstration that qafiya is more complex than the simple formula "the final sound must be the same." It occupies a shared terrain of grammatical forms, word meaning, phonetic resonance, and the aesthetics of recurrence. Nevertheless, the rigid prohibitions advanced at several points need not be adopted as rules for every language; their authority depends on comparative tests using sufficiently diverse examples of Maithili pronunciation.

The Autonomy of the Sher and the Unity of the Ghazal

The idea that a sher should form a complete structure of meaning is central to the author's selection of examples. Recognising the independent intellectual energy of each couplet is fundamental to the ghazal's classical identity, but independence does not necessarily mean unrelatedness. Recurrent experiences of love, social irony, popular life, or human suffering can impart inner coherence to otherwise autonomous couplets. The book usefully distinguishes ghazals from songs and nazms; absence of a continuous narrative thread, however, should not be equated with total artistic disconnection.

The Repetition of Radif: Mechanism or Density of Meaning?

Radif is not simply a repeated word; it returns in each sher with a new semantic setting. The author treats the appropriate relation of radif to qafiya as a virtue, and unnecessary attachment as a fault. This criterion rightly recognises craft. In some ghazals, radif becomes the mnemonic thread of the entire composition; in others, its compulsory presence can make language artificial. Its success must be judged not merely by its numerical recurrence, but by the new meanings it generates in each couplet.

Music and Traditions of Recitation

The book separately discusses singing, recitation, rhythm, and musical performance. It is correct to insist that singability and generic identity are not the same thing. A song does not become a ghazal by sounding like one; nor must every ghazal necessarily be set to music. Yet the history of ghazal poetics shows that singing and public recitation can repeatedly invest inherited forms with new social meanings. Their interplay warrants broader assessment beyond the book's formal determinations.

Feeling, Subject Matter, and Social Experience

Alongside linguistic form, the book evaluates the virtues and shortcomings of subject matter, suggestion, philosophy, and social context. The author's contention is that classical discipline is not the enemy of expression. This is important: raising the genre beyond political slogans and verbal rhyming serves literary creativity. But the value of social experience cannot be entirely subordinate to technical correctness; otherwise new dissident writing, dialect poetry, and unwritten musical experiments may be dismissed in advance.

The Language of Criticism: Evidence and Rivalry

The author commends reasoning, examples, and the admission of errors in his debates. These are indispensable virtues of public literary culture. Yet in several passages sharp mockery, sweeping accusations, and personal comments about rival writers and editors obstruct the movement of objective analysis. The real force of criticism lies in the evidence of two lines, their scansion, tests of linguistic form, and clearly stated limits of conclusions—not in a wholesale denial of another person's intellectual competence. Readers should distinguish reasoned criticism from polemical rhetoric in this volume.

Separate Close Readings of the Sections

Section One: Ghazal Symbols, Their Meanings, and Origins

The book reconsiders the historical meanings of symbols such as wine, the wine-flask, the cupbearer, and the goblet, and their reinterpretation in a Maithili setting. The author urges their localisation within the language. This can enrich meanings, although reducing the established plurality of symbols to literal love or drinking would be harmful. The account of Arabic–Persian origins should distinguish the history of words from the history of the genre.

Section Two: Definition and Technical Structure

Introducing the terms sher, misra, rukn, qafiya, radif, and bahr provides the novice reader with foundations. The insight here is that understanding a poetics begins with the reader's grasp of definitions. Technical terminology has multiple sources; a comparative glossary tracing each term from its source language to its use in Maithili would enrich this contribution further.

Section Three: Matla and the Structural Opening

Examples clarify the corresponding positions of qafiya and radif in both lines of the matla. The pedagogical importance is that readers learn from the opening couplet what repetition to expect across the entire ghazal. The aesthetic role of the matla—establishing the poem's voice, mood, and anticipatory horizon—should also be examined beyond its technical identification.

Section Four: The Rules of Radif

Accepting the possibility of ghazals both with and without radif, the author explains the rule of verbal recurrence. His examples show that radif becomes a memorable sound-sign at the end of a sher. But mere identity of words is insufficient; grammatical coherence and semantic necessity must also be considered for genuine criticism of radif.

Section Five: Vowel Correspondence in Qafiya

The focus here is the categories of correspondence between vowels in letters and vowel signs, the position of qafiya, and degrees of rhyme. This early attempt to relate pronunciation-sensitive rules to the Maithili lexicon is important. Parallel testing of possible alternative pronunciations is necessary to reduce the dependence of categorical judgements upon the individual author's speech.

Section Six: Sounds and Linguistic Divisions

Elements of linguistic grammar are brought together with the finer rules of qafiya. The classification of vowels opens possibilities for practical training in ghazal composition. A sharper separation of the categories of sound, written letter, and metrical quantity would render the theoretical explanation less ambiguous.

Section Seven: Inflected Words and Qafiya

Vowel changes, conventional forms, and alterations in qafiya reveal the author's language-sensitive outlook. The alternative written forms of Maithili are not merely obstructions to the ghazal's craft; they are also poetic resources. Consistently maintaining the form selected within one composition, however, will support formal credibility.

Section Eight: Case Endings, Suffixes, and End Rhyme

Considering the arrival of case endings within qafiya initiates a direct dialogue with Maithili grammar. The author pays particular attention to whether identical word endings suffice or the root sounds must also correspond. Critics should evaluate linguistic function, morphemes, and audible effects together.

Section Nine: Vowel Change and Pronunciation

Words ending in i, shifts of vowels in everyday speech, and variations in written forms bring the account of qafiya closer to phonetics. The theoretical challenge is to avoid treating formal standards and living dialects as enemies.

Evidence of sound correspondence should be examined from the perspectives of performers and listeners alike.

Section Ten: Extended Examination of Qafiya

The author tests the correctness of qafiya through illustrative prohibitions and exceptions. Some severity persists in judging the difficulties of rhyme craft. Distinctions between historical periods must be made clear before examples drawn from linguistic change are elevated into sole rules for the present.

Section Eleven: A Transition in the Extension of Rules

This short section acts as a bridge between the preceding account and the linguistic complexities to follow. Structurally, the multi-part treatment of qafiya proceeds towards increasingly difficult questions. Though repetition is occasionally pedagogically useful, editorial condensation could quicken the pace of reasoning.

Section Twelve: Stress, Visarga, and Complex Qafiya

Stress, visarga, pronunciation, Sanskrit-derived forms, and the spoken structure of Maithili receive detailed treatment. This section offers strong evidence of the possibility of a language-specific poetics of the ghazal. Yet the historical status of stress must be distinguished from contemporary sociolinguistic evidence of pronunciation; making the formulation of rules more deliberative will increase their acceptance.

Section Thirteen: Maqta and the Poetic Signature

The maqta discusses the poet's pen name or self-reference in relation to the ghazal's concluding situation of meaning. The name has more than a formal function: it permits self-irony, self-address, or a shift in the speaking voice. Its absence should not automatically be considered a fault; the poem's artistic purpose must take precedence.

Section Fourteen: Definition of Bahr

By clarifying the basic relations among bahr, rukn, wazn, and the sequence of metrical quantities, the author establishes the basis of prosodic uniformity in a ghazal. He distinguishes general rhythm from specific and ordered metrical calculation. Without this distinction, identifying a ghazal as different from any verse of equal syllabic quantity would be difficult.

Section Fifteen: Short and Long Syllables and the Foundations of Aruz

Systematic instruction in determining metrical quantities, combining rukns, consonant clusters, and short and long sounds characterises this section. It is useful as a practice syllabus. Unless symbolic formulas are continually compared with the actual pronunciation of words, however, they risk becoming mechanical; this is the danger to avoid.

Section Sixteen: Applications of Bahr

By working through the rules of bahr with examples, the author attempts to demonstrate theory through practice. Repetition of a fixed rukn sometimes makes ghazal exercises easier. But practical utility must also be evaluated against creative ease and the natural qualities of the language.

Section Seventeen: Metrical Sequences and Variations

Alternative sequences of rukns and variable formal patterns expand the ghazal writer's knowledge of structural possibilities. The distinction between a legitimate allowance and an actual deviation is especially important. If the parameters of traditionally accepted liberties remain unclear, a critic's personal preferences may be presented as rules.

Section Eighteen: Examples of Different Bahr

This section offers numerous examples of Arabic metres and examines creative possibilities in combinations of similar and differing sounds. Comparison of formulas with compositions draws readers into genuine technical study. An accompanying analysis of the expressive power of poetic meanings would have clarified more fully the relationship between formal depth and sensibility.

Section Nineteen: The Finer Points of Metrical Combination

The section examines how bahr is constructed through particular sequences and combinations of rukns. This subtle grammar gives the writer a rigorous instrument of self-examination. It remains necessary to internalise not just numerical formulas but also the rhythms they produce when heard.

Section Twenty: The Relationship between Syllabic Metres and Arabic Bahr

The attempt to compare Sanskrit syllabic metres with Arabic bahr is important to understanding connections among poetic genres. Historical relatedness, structural similarity, and practical adaptation, however, are three different levels: proving a resemblance does not automatically establish direct historical descent between source traditions. This distinction should be maintained when assessing the book's conclusions.

Section Twenty-One: Selecting Bahr for Maithili and Taqti

The author recommends simple syllabic discipline for initial exercises and the more elaborate metres of aruz as a subsequent goal. Scansion of Hindi–Urdu examples illustrates his proposal. But caution is needed before converting a training sequence into a hierarchy of final artistic excellence; the pathos of a simple work is not inferior to metrical complexity.

Section Twenty-Two: Editorial Standards, Language, Theme, and Singing

This section considers how ghazal writers and editors should accept submissions, complete and reduced linguistic forms, feeling, subject matter, music, and distinctions between genres. It is an important intervention in literary public life. While recognising the need for editorial standards, institutions remain responsible for documenting diverse creative experiments.

Section Twenty-Three: Virtues, Faults, and the Practice of Criticism

Systematically examining the strengths and weaknesses of radif, qafiya, bahr, the sher, and the ghazal makes criticism accountable to evidence. The author's character, the critic's impartiality, and suitability are also discussed. For this approach to develop, it must be made clear that technical faults do not automatically cancel literary qualities.

Section Twenty-Four: Poetic Genres Related to the Ghazal

Accounts of qasida, rubai, qita, nazm, hamd, naat, manqabat, hazal, children's ghazals, devotional ghazals, and related forms locate the ghazal within a wider family of verse. This perspective enriches readers' knowledge of generic distinctions. The original cultural significance of some forms should also be distinguished from their contemporary transformation in Maithili.

Section Twenty-Five: The Tradition and History of the Maithili Ghazal

The section assembles extensive material, from cultural suggestions in ancient poetry to modern ghazal writers, published works, debates on the form, journals, blogs, social media, women's writing, authors in Nepal, and free-verse tendencies. As raw documentation for literary history, this is a distinctive contribution. The historical interpretation is nevertheless often governed by divisions between writers who support and reject formal rules. Without reconsidering the availability of sources, representation, and personal disputes, the history cannot be complete.

The Literary History of the Maithili Ghazal: From Claims to Evidence

Folk Sounds, Medieval Evidence, and the Question of Generic Continuity

At the beginning of the historical discussion, the author seeks possible similarities of sound structures across vernacular Sanskrit, Vedic metre, popular musical forms, and older Maithili literature. This inquiry has value in reassessing the musical memory of Maithili. But the presence of similar metrical sequences, paired lines, or corresponding rhymes does not establish a direct genealogy of the ghazal. Historical evidence that a work was called a ghazal, resemblance of compositional structure, and demonstrable cultural dissemination are three distinct criteria.

The discussion of similarities between older poetry and the modern ghazal in the book's early historical narrative is a creative proposition, not a definitive chronological history. If medieval readers used a different name for a similar structure, that historical context must be preserved. Otherwise the present-day name of a genre may be projected retrospectively onto older literature.

The Modern Beginning: Jeevan Jha and Early Ghazal Writers

The author takes 1905, the publication year of Pandit Jeevan Jha's Sundar-Sanyog, as the starting point of the modern Maithili ghazal. He then discusses Yadunath Jha “Yaduvar,” Kavivar Sitaram Jha, Kashikant Mishra “Madhup,” and others. He acknowledges variations in formal discipline in early experiments; instead of assigning equal merit to every work, he examines the state of generic experimentation at the time. This matters to literary history because the first attempt and complete artistic accomplishment are not identical.

The author's "A Brief Critical Introduction to the Modern Maithili Ghazal," published in Videha in 2018, makes claims concerning the publication of Kavivar Sitaram Jha's ghazal in 1928 and Madhup's in 1932. These dates should be read as historical propositions advanced by the writer. Comparison with the original journals, first editions, and revised texts could strengthen the chronology. In original scholarship, a decisive expression such as "the very first" calls for rigorous source criticism.

Yoganand Hira, Vijaynath Jha, and the Continuity of Prosodic Discipline

Bringing writers such as Yoganand Hira and Vijaynath Jha back into discussion clearly exemplifies the author's purpose of rereading the tradition. In particular, the publication of Vijaynath Jha's Ahink Lel in 2008 leads the author to revise his own earlier claim. He acknowledges that it is inappropriate to call Anchinhar Akhar the first bahr-based Maithili ghazal collection: Vijaynath Jha's collection was published before it. This self-correction reveals an ethical dimension of historiography—a willingness to change an established claim in response to new evidence.

It does not follow that establishing a new "first" resolves every historical question. Metrically composed individual poems, complete collections, printed availability, actual dates of composition, and evidence of readership are distinct criteria, and the meaning of "first" changes accordingly. The book raises this distinction with awareness, but does not apply one method consistently everywhere.

The Transition after 1970 and the Debate over Free Forms

The book sharply distinguishes ghazals following traditional bahr from so-called "azad ghazals" without it. On this basis it questions the classification of ghazals written by certain established authors. Two positions fundamentally confront each other: the insistence that the genre's historical form is indispensable, and the possibility of autonomous experimentation comparable to modern free verse. These positions need not lead to identical literary evaluations; nevertheless, it is a historian's duty to document the independent existence of both.

Terms such as "formally compliant ghazal," "ghazal-inspired free poem," "nazm," or "song" may be useful bibliographical descriptions. But criticism must also relate its verdict to a work's social meaning, new linguistic imagery, and effect on readers. Formal irregularity and poetic failure are not synonyms. Keeping them separate enables a balanced reading of the book's controversial passages.

After 2008: Blogs, Videha, and Public Theoretical Debate

The author views the period after 2008 as a new phase marked by the Anchinhar Akhar blog, regular publication in Videha, articles on ghazal poetics, public controversies, teaching, criticism, and a culture of literary awards. Videha's research index records continuing activity, including "Early Experiments in the Grammar of the Maithili Ghazal" (2014), "A Brief Critical Introduction to the Modern Maithili Ghazal" (2018), and other works on the genre.

The book records a proposal, attributed to Gajendra Thakur's commentary on ghazal poetics, to divide 1905–2007 and the period after 2008 into a "Jeevan Age" and an "Anchinhar Age." Historiographically, this is a movement-centred self-definition, not a universally accepted, neutral periodisation. It must be established through dates concerning the emergence of blogs, dissemination of technology, and changes in writers' practices whether the division represents the whole stream of the Maithili ghazal or one significant movement within it.

Women, Muslim Writers, and Nepalese Maithili: A Map of Inclusion

The book mentions women ghazal writers, the limited representation of Muslim poets, Maithili authors in Nepal, and multilingual cultures at the border. Such material makes it possible to view the Maithili ghazal beyond the boundaries of a single region or ethnic literary centre. But small numbers do not warrant hasty conclusions about social customs, generic competence, or collective preferences. Research is needed into publishing opportunities, archival survival, economic and cultural resources, and editorial selection.

"Whose name has been found" and "whose work does not exist" are distinct claims in literary history. The author acknowledges limits to his knowledge at several points. Following through on that admission, future catalogues must seek unknown writers, folk performance, scattered journal material, and unpublished work by women.

Comparative Discussion of Indian and Other-Language Ghazal Traditions

The Legacy of Arabic–Persian–Urdu Aruz

The technical vocabulary of the ghazal developed through centuries of literary contact among Arabic, Persian, and Urdu. Bahr, rukn, qafiya, and radif are prominent markers of that history. These terms enter Maithili with their traditional meanings, but their pronunciation requires scrutiny in the light of local linguistics. The author's original question is not whether to abandon the inheritance, but how to make it operative in a living language.

The Sanskrit–Mithila Prosodic Tradition and Arabic Bahr

References to Pandit Govind Jha's Maithili Chhandashastra, Dinbandhu Jha's grammatical tradition, and studies of Maithili word forms give the book an indigenous theoretical foundation. A formal comparison between Sanskrit syllabic metres and Arabic bahr is possible because both employ ordered sequences of short and long syllables. Identical numerical arrangements, however, do not prove common historical origin. The book provides much material in this direction, but an independent methodology for comparative prosody could be developed further.

The Hindi Ghazal and Problems of Pronunciation in Maithili

The book examines metrical differences resulting from variations in the pronunciation of Hindi and Urdu words. The author argues that the written or commonly spoken pronunciations of certain words adopted from Urdu into Hindi complicate the calculation of metrical quantities. The comparison is useful for Maithili: clearer rules for its vowels, consonant clusters, nasal sounds, and inflections would make the argument more coherent. Yet the question of which language is easier is not a collective hierarchy; every language has varied pronunciations and prosodic conventions.

Contemporary Poetics: Form, Reader, and Institution

From a formalist perspective, the book makes the ghazal's identity dependent on distinctions of form; from a reader-centred perspective, knowledge of craft refines the ability to interpret it; and from a socioliterary perspective, journals, blogs, and groups establish new generic standards. Bringing these three approaches together lends the work greater seriousness. If editorial institutions influence the public definition of the ghazal, their selection practices themselves become objects of criticism. The author's autobiographical statements can also be read as documents of literary organisation.

Major Achievements and Critical Limitations

The first achievement is the Maithilisation of generic instruction. Making the terminology of aruz, generally available through other languages, accessible in Maithili words, examples, and question-and-answer formats is the result of sustained practice. The second achievement is the depth of the treatment of qafiya: word forms, case endings, stress, and vowel correspondence bring poetics into dialogue with local linguistics. The third is the accumulation of sources, gathering poems, journals, books, dates, and controversies from early writers to contemporary platforms.

The chief limitations are, first, excessive certainty in setting standards. The author accepts diversity in local pronunciation, yet a decision based on a single spelling or calculation can unjustly limit diverse traditions of reading. Second is the tendency to turn critical categories into final verdicts of value. Third, the distinction between the internal viewpoint of a literary movement and a neutral genealogy is not adequately documented throughout the history. Fourth, much historical evidence rests on materials cited or reproduced by the author; future research requires independent textual comparison with those sources.

There is also a significant positive paradox: despite his insistence on strict rules, the author revises earlier positions. Giving Vijaynath Jha's collection priority in a claim about precedence, acknowledging the limitations of sources, and recognising errors in earlier assessments of ghazal lines reveal the self-critical dimension of his historical consciousness. Extending this quality consistently throughout the volume would increase its future value.

Directions for Future Research on the Ghazal

To make the existing archive of the Maithili ghazal more reliable, published versions of original works, composition dates, first appearances, editorial variants, poets' own generic labels, alternative analyses of bahr, and pronunciation evidence from linguistic regions should be preserved together. The book's extensive lists could support critical bibliographies of individual ghazal writers, decade-by-decade publication chronologies, and comparative metrical examinations of selected couplets.

A shared classification would also be useful: ghazals in traditional bahr; ghazals practising simplified syllabic forms; free-rhythm poetry inspired by ghazals; performance-oriented nazms and songs; and other genres of shairi. These categories should be descriptive instruments, not steps in a ladder of depreciation. The classical genre would thereby retain its formal definition, while new experiments would also find a place in literary history. Plurality of this kind would increase, not diminish, critical clarity.

Conclusion: The Discipline of Theory, the Open Door of History

The significance of A Grammar and History of the Maithili Ghazal does not lie in becoming the final rulebook. It lies in connecting discussion of the ghazal with evidence, terminology, examples, and linguistic scrutiny. It is a means of training for writers, an instrument of formal examination for critics, and a collection of diverse indications concerning authors, books, and literary movements for historians. Its critical use depends upon recognising the difference among these three functions.

The author's central insistence—ghazals in Maithili, and ghazals suited to the nature of Maithili—is an important affirmation of linguistic autonomy. Relating the ghazal's discipline to the language's living resources is the book's lasting achievement. But if history is treated not as a completed inventory but as an archive continually subject to revision, and if classical standards are not made the sole measure of literary worth, the debate generated by this volume can become broader, more inclusive, and more creative. The future of the Maithili ghazal lies not only in the uniformity of its bahr but in the combined capacities of linguistic courage, social memory, artistic self-restraint, and critical self-scrutiny.

Bibliography

Principal Book and Published Materials from Videha

Anchinhar, Ashish. A Grammar and History of the Maithili Ghazal. Videha book archive; discussion developed through 2022 in the revised text.

Anchinhar, Ashish. Anchinhar Akhar. Shruti Prakashan, Delhi, 2011.

Anchinhar, Ashish. Sandarbh Sahit. Collection of ghazal criticism; Videha book archive.

Anchinhar, Ashish. Shabd-Arth-Shakti. Criticism of ghazal poetics; Videha book archive.

Anchinhar, Ashish. A Ready Reckoner for the Maithili Ghazal. Videha book archive.

Anchinhar, Ashish. "Early Experiments in the Grammar of the Maithili Ghazal." Videha, issue 165, 2014.

Anchinhar, Ashish. "A Brief Critical Introduction to the Modern Maithili Ghazal." Videha, issue 253, 2018.

Anchinhar, Ashish. "The Maithili Ghazal in the Context of Expression." Videha, issue 251, 2018.

Anchinhar, Ashish. "A Comparative Discussion of Narendraji's Maithili and Hindi Ghazals." Videha, issue 252, 2018.

Anchinhar, Ashish. "When Will Ghazals Resembling the Temperament of Dushyant Kumar's Ghazals Be Written in Maithili?" Videha, issue 307, 2020.

Videha. Videha Books—bibliography and availability of Ashish Anchinhar's publications. https://videha-ejournal.github.io/videha/pothi.htm

Videha. Index of Research Articles—author index of work on ghazals, metre, and criticism. https://videha-ejournal.github.io/videha/research/videha-scholar-research-book.html

Videha. "A Brief Critical Introduction to the Modern Maithili Ghazal," original article. https://www.videha.co.in/research/2018/253/

Videha. "Early Experiments in the Grammar of the Maithili Ghazal," original article. https://www.videha.co.in/research/2014/165/

Printed Works and Theoretical References Discussed in the Original Book

The works listed below provide comparative context on the basis of their mention in the book under review. No claim is made here to have undertaken a complete independent reading of all of them.

Dinbandhu Jha. Mithila Bhasha Vidyotan. Edited and published by Govind Jha; second edition, 1993.

Jha, Govind. Maithili Chhandashastra. Mithila Pustak Kendra, Darbhanga; second edition, 1987.

Jha, Govind. Maithilik Udgama O Vikas. Maithili Academy, Patna, 1987.

Jha, Govind. Uchchatar Maithili Vyakaran. Maithili Academy, Patna; second edition, 1992.

Jha, Govind. Maithili Parichayika. Shekhar Prakashan, Patna, 2006.

Jha, Govind. Maithili Parishilan. Maithili Academy, Patna, 2007.

Jha, Balgovind "Vyathit." Adhunik Maithili Vyakaran O Rachana. Cited in the original book.

Jha, Yugeshwar. Maithili Vyakaran Aor Rachana. Cited in the original book.

Jha, Ramdev. “The Ghazal in Maithili.” Rachana, June 1984; cited in the original book.

Jha, Jeevan. Sundar-Sanyog. 1905; described in the book as a foundation of the early modern Maithili ghazal.

Jha, Sitaram. Sukti-Sudha, First Bindu. 1928; mentioned in Anchinhar's historical discussion published in Videha.

Mishra, Kashikant “Madhup.” “Mithilak Purva Gaurav Nahi Dhyan Ta Dharai Chhi.” Maithili-Sandesh, 1932; according to the author's historical discussion in Videha.

Jha, Vijaynath. Ahink Lel. Shekhar Prakashan, Patna, 2008.

Bechain, Kunwar. Ghazal Ka Vyakaran. Ayan Prakashan, Delhi, 1996.

Sharma, R. P. “Maharshi.” Ghazal Lekhan Kala. Meenakshi Prakashan, Delhi, 2005.

Sharma, R. P. “Maharshi.” Ghazal Aur Ghazal Ki Taknik. Jawahar Publishers & Distributors, Delhi, 2009.

Azam, Mohammad. Aasan Aruz. Shivna Prakashan, Sehore, 2012.

Paoli, Bruno. “Meters and Formulas: The Case of Ancient Arabic Poetry.” Listed in the original book's references.

Golston, Chris, and Tomas Riad. “The Phonology of Classical Arabic Meter.” Listed in the original book's references.

Deo, Ashwini, and Paul Kiparsky. “Poetries in Contact: Arabic, Persian and Urdu.” Listed in the original book's references.

REVIEW 12

With References

The Generic Boundaries of the Ghazal and Critical Judgement

Abstract

With References is a collection of criticism by Ashish Anchinhar that places the classical structure, generic identity, and critical accountability of the Maithili ghazal at the centre of inquiry. It examines numerous compositions presented as ghazals in terms of bahr (metre), qafiya (rhyme), radif (refrain), the structure of the sher (couplet), subject matter, and linguistic pronunciation. This essay offers a separate rereading of all seven major articles in the collection. It also examines the author's evaluative method, its evidentiary achievements, its contentious idiom, the ghazal's relationship with other poetic genres, the historical development of Maithili ghazal writing, and alternative possibilities for criticism. Its central conclusion is that the book establishes the need for technical scrutiny in Maithili ghazal criticism, while questions of aesthetic plurality, historical corroboration, and the fair representation of opposing positions continue to demand discussion.

Keywords: Maithili ghazal; bahr; qafiya; radif; prosody; genre studies; literary history; critical method; Videha; Ashish Anchinhar.

Introduction: From the Question of Genre to the Question of Criticism

Songs, padas, folk melodies, independent short poems, and compositions in diverse metres have long coexisted within Maithili's rich poetic tradition. Against this plural background, the ghazal enters with its distinctive arrangement of couplets, rhyme scheme, and metrical discipline. To regard it merely as a vehicle for love and separation, or as synonymous with singability, is to obscure its internal principles of composition. Conversely, to treat classical criteria as the sole and final arbiter may obstruct an independent assessment of meaning, experience, social criticism, and poetic innovation. This tension forms the central critical terrain of With References.

In his collection, Ashish Anchinhar brings established authors, emerging writers, editors, writers of prefaces, and public literary commentators before a common question of genre. Neither the fame of a work nor the standing of its author is regarded as sufficient evidence. Such an insistence offers a means of separating Maithili criticism from the cult of personality. Yet the right to examine evidence must be accompanied by the responsibility to give others a fair hearing. Both the achievements and the limitations of the book need to be judged with this dual obligation in view.

The present study takes the entire arrangement of the original collection as its basis. Its selection of supplementary literature is confined to the bibliographies and research archives available through Videha. Claims made by the author about literary history are distinguished from facts independently corroborated by archival evidence. Verbatim quotation is appropriate only where there is no doubt about textual variants or letter forms; in the absence of such certainty here, the arguments and their contexts are discussed reliably rather than reproducing potentially uncertain lines of verse.

Composition, Form, and Editorial Intention

The collection is organised in two parts. The first contains six substantial articles: a discussion of Baikunth Jha's collection of ghazals; a critique of Kamalmohan Chunnu's preface; an examination of works labelled ghazals under the name of Kanchinath Jha ‘Kiran’; a debate with Arvind Thakur's introduction questioning the authority of formal conventions; an evaluation of purported ghazals by the Maithili lyricist Rabindranath Thakur; and a collective review of prefaces to several collections. The second part presents a question-and-answer discussion of the classical features of the ghazal in the context of public conversations involving Dhirendra Premarshi and Siyaram Jha ‘Saras’. The author's statements and biographical introduction lend this critical material the character of a self-conscious literary programme.

The book differs somewhat from a conventional monograph on a single subject. It gathers critical interventions written at different times; hence examples recur, earlier controversies are recalled, and readers are repeatedly addressed directly. The advantage is that the continuity of the author's principles becomes visible across different occasions. The disadvantage is that repetition sometimes displaces the development of an argument, while the distinctive historical circumstances of particular episodes recede into the background. The structure becomes clearer if the volume is understood as a literary archive of successive controversies.

The title With References itself signals the necessity of context, antecedent texts, and examples in criticism. The author's purpose is not merely to establish that certain compositions have failed, but to clarify the grounds on which a work may properly claim the name of a ghazal. The book's most consequential question is whether naming a genre is a matter of private authorial freedom alone or also entails a responsibility towards a shared literary tradition. The collection answers in favour of rigorous generic discipline.

The Basis of Criticism: Bahr, Qafiya, Radif, and Meaning

In the formal structure of the ghazal, bahr raises the question of consistent metrical weight across both misras, or lines, of a couplet; qafiya concerns the recurrence of rhyming sounds; and radif is a repeated word or phrase, whose presence is not considered compulsory in every ghazal. The initial rhyme pattern of the matla, or opening couplet, and the possibility of a takhallus, or poetic signature, in the maqta, or concluding couplet, identify traditional features of the form. These terms matter only when their relation to pronunciation, short and long syllables, conjunct letters, and the movement of the language is made explicit.

Anchinhar insists that generic validity and aesthetic excellence are two separate questions. In essence, his argument is that a composition which fails to qualify as a ghazal on formal grounds does not thereby become a bad poem. It may possess value as a song, a poem, or another form, although its classification remains open to reconsideration. This distinction is critically useful: conflating generic classification with artistic judgement renders literary debate needlessly emotional.

An important finer distinction arises here. Treating metre in the ghazal as a quantitative discipline of poetic recitation is not the same as substituting the musical beat of a sung performance for that discipline. The quantities employed in poetic metre and musical time may sound terminologically similar, but they are different subjects of analysis. The latter part of the collection particularly stresses this difference. Nevertheless, the effects of singing, vocal expression, and the listener's experience are not wholly irrelevant; they retain their place in aesthetic evaluation after the question of generic identity has been addressed.

The particularities of Maithili pronunciation may be decisive in determining metre. The weight of chandrabindu and anusvara, the treatment of short and long vowels, word-final vowels, the phonetic realisation of conjunct consonants, and the tempo of local speech all constitute the living language beneath formal calculation. Accordingly, developing a poetics of the Maithili ghazal requires not simply copying Urdu or Hindi rules but testing their applicability against Maithili's own pronunciation system. Anchinhar's earlier essays on ghazal criticism, available through Videha, provide evidence of work undertaken in this direction.

Individual Textual Analyses: Seven Critical Interventions

Baikunth Jha's Ghazal Collection: Skill in Another Genre and the Ghazal's Independent Poetics

The first essay compares Baikunth Jha's achievement as a writer of very short stories with the compositions he has published under the designation 'ghazal'. Its central question is why a writer who recognises the distinction between the short story and the very short story does not acknowledge a comparable generic distance between the ghazal and the song. Through this comparison Anchinhar advances an engaging principle: mastery of one genre does not automatically constitute a licence to practise the rules of another. Literary talent may cross genres, but the need to learn their formal principles does not disappear.

Here the problem of metrical calculation is connected with poetic meaning. Having emphasised pronunciation and conjunct consonants, the critic also identifies questions of devotion, ideological inconsistency, and the possibilities of new symbolism within the compositions. He welcomes certain figurative experiments in this context. This is an important aspect of the essay, for the critic does not remain solely a guardian of rules; he also acknowledges the symbolic fertility of the poetry.

Yet a definitive classification of Baikunth Jha's achievements or errors would have required fuller comparative scansions, complete ghazal structures, and counterexamples. It may indeed be possible to settle the generic status of an entire collection from a small number of lines, but enabling readers to reproduce the full examination is part of good criticism. The reasoning here is forceful, while the extensive demonstration of its technical tests is relatively limited.

Kamalmohan Chunnu's Preface: The Authority of the Critic and the Dispute over Self-Evaluation

The second essay shifts attention from the ghazal collection itself to the intellectual structure of its preface. Kamalmohan Chunnu's introduction interests Anchinhar because it appears to restrict the critic's role through the proposition that a composition reveals its own worth. Against this view, Anchinhar seeks to establish criticism as public examination, literary dialogue, and an epistemic responsibility.

The most persuasive feature of this discussion is its demand for examples. If a writer believes that compliance with metre destroys a poem's content, a written composition, couplet, or other concrete textual evidence should be supplied to support the contention. This is a generally sound requirement of critical fairness. By way of counterexample, Anchinhar invokes poets whose formally metrical ghazals nonetheless express political, social, and human experience. Such comparisons show the inadequacy of an absolute opposition between form and content.

Nevertheless, bitter personal sarcasm, imputations of motive, and conjectures about an opponent's disposition weaken the demonstrable evidence of the argument. The value of a proposition should be assessed separately from the presumed personal intentions of its author. The essay's underlying principle is durable—a preface is not a territory exempt from literary debate—but its best potential emerges when disagreement is expressed in comparatively restrained, evidence-based language.

Kanchinath Jha 'Kiran's' Songs: Classification, Editing, and Historical Evidence

The third article reviews an edited collection of devotional and erotic songs by Kanchinath Jha 'Kiran', questioning the form of certain pieces identified as ghazals. The discussion is not limited to bahr: the editorial classification of the original texts, the absence of an account of genre in the introduction, repetitions of the same composition, and the relation of these works to earlier poetic traditions also become subjects of review. The essay is consequently a critique of textual editing as well as of genre theory.

Anchinhar asks whether similarities among terms associated with ragas, melodic modes, or singability can genuinely establish literary genre. The distinction between song and ghazal is particularly important here. The historical value of the collected author's writing is not denied; the objection is simply that establishing these particular compositions as evidence in the history of the ghazal could encourage confusion about genre.

The discussion of editorial responsibility gives the essay an additional dimension. When older material is newly edited, the relationship among its original titles, traditions, textual variants, and formal structures needs to be clarified. At the same time, traditional forms of verse may display influences from the ghazal, singable patterns, or melodic structures; such possibilities remain worthy of examination even after a decision that they are 'not ghazals'. More extensive phonetic and cultural comparison would have enriched the criticism.

Arvind Thakur's Introduction: Discipline, Rebellion, and the Tension of Innovation

The fourth essay contains the collection's broadest theoretical debate. Anchinhar challenges Arvind Thakur's introductory proposition that literature should not be subordinate to a code of conventions. For Anchinhar, the accepted structure of a genre is not a prison but the basis of shared meaning-making. Innovation is possible through dialogue with generic rules; breaking them without offering an alternative creative principle does not, in itself, prove originality. The book thus presses for a distinction between new experimentation and disorderly disregard of genre.

The author draws on a wide range of references to the Vedas, metre, Sanskrit quotations, folk analogies, and classical traditions. Particularly noteworthy is the way his treatment of 'code' broadens its meaning, bringing social regulation, the proprieties of expression, and linguistic structure into one debate. Such intellectual breadth is an important strength of the book. Occasionally, however, this expansion makes generic conventions and socio-moral regulation appear synonymous, although their origins and effects differ.

One of the essay's principal achievements is its theory of adaptation to language. Discussing the transformations of bahr across Arabic, Persian, Urdu, and Maithili, Anchinhar opposes unthinking imitation. His commitment to discipline is therefore not wholly rigid: he accepts changes within tradition but requires an identifiable new formal organisation if they are to count as transformations. This deserves recognition as a positive position in poetics. Conversely, reducing experimental ghazals to questions of renaming may narrow the evaluation of emerging relations between genres.

Several sections of the essay quote or present an opponent's position before replying to it. This method makes the controversy text-centred and allows readers to identify the arguments on both sides. Yet a more generous presentation of the context of selected statements, their alternative possible meanings, and the evidence supporting them would have made the debate better balanced. The chapter is historically significant precisely because it raises the Maithili ghazal from the teaching of composition to a public question of literary theory.

The Maithili Lyricist Rabindranath Thakur: The Distinction between a Powerful Song and the Ghazal Form

The fifth essay examines a composition associated with the designation 'ghazal' by the Maithili lyricist Rabindranath Thakur. The critic raises a subtle question of literary history: does the appearance of the word 'ghazal' alongside a distinguished songwriter's work offer sufficient proof of its classical generic form? In response, he compares the construction and metrical regularity of earlier Maithili ghazal couplets with the structure of lyric compositions. The collection thus establishes a necessary distance between the authority of a celebrated writer and evidence concerning genre.

Using examples from Jeevan Jha, Sitaram Jha, Kashikant Mishra 'Madhup', Yoganand Heera, and Jagdishchandra Thakur 'Anil', the author demonstrates that the ghazal can encompass devotional longing, political contradictions, the experience of workers and ordinary people, privation, and social grotesquery. The comparison is important because it treats formal discipline as an instrument rather than an enemy of expression. The conjunction of social awareness and metrical correctness is the positive poetic vision of the article.

Critically, however, the judgement that a song is not a ghazal must not diminish its intrinsic beauty as a song. The reviewer ultimately acknowledges the lyric value of the composition, preventing the essay from becoming a one-sided repudiation. A more sustained examination of the sonic qualities, stanzaic progression, and folk rhythms of the Maithili song would have completed the stylistic comparison.

A Collective Review of Several Collections: A Public Standard for Literary Classification

The sixth article undertakes a comparative examination of several collections described as ghazals, the statements of their prefacers, and prevalent misconceptions. The diversity of its material makes it possible to observe criticism operating through a common method. The principal standard remains the discipline of bahr and qafiya; nevertheless, the author also acknowledges effective arrangements of qafiya and radif, possibilities in linguistic expression, or readability as song in certain collections. These nuanced concessions show that his judgement is not entirely binary.

In this discussion, examples involving Taranand Jha ‘Tarun’, Manoj Shandilya, Rameshwar Nishant, Satish Sajan, and an anthology of ghazals expose different problems concerning the naming of compositions, the reasoning of prefaces, and editorial accountability. Some prefacers defend unfettered expressive freedom; others demand exemption from traditional metres for their work. Anchinhar investigates the logical inconsistencies of these claims. The real object of criticism here is not only the poet but also the editorial institution that confers literary legitimacy.

The limitation of a collective assessment lies in the unequal extent of its source evidence. Some works receive consideration of the formal technique of the entire collection, while others are criticised chiefly for the claims made in their prefaces. Care is therefore required before treating all of them as examples of the same kind of failure. Strong criticism of genre should clarify the connections among the chain of evidence for each book, metrical scansion, textual variants, and independent aesthetic judgement.

A Conversation between Two Literary Figures: Textual Scrutiny of Oral Statements

The second part reviews arguments about ghazals that arose in public conversations involving Dhirendra Premarshi and Siyaram Jha ‘Saras’. This essay bears witness to a change of medium in the collection. Instead of the fixed text of a book or a written preface, spontaneous oral statements become the material of criticism. The author particularly clarifies three distinctions: quantities in poetic metre versus units of musical rhythm; written prosodic organisation versus singing; and popular appeal versus generic validity.

The author's counterquestions invite readers to recognise that singability alone does not make a composition a ghazal: dohas, songs, and other metrical forms can also be sung. The formal grammar of literature is thus distinguished from the aesthetics of performance. This distinction is important for a systematic examination of generic identity in the performing arts.

When oral conversations are criticised, context, the full intent of what was said, and the time-specific character of a speaker's remarks become especially important. Sharp comments in the book about personal ability or motive risk subordinating the evidentiary aspect of the debate. Its explanation of classical principles is useful, but more balanced editing, the integrity of the original remarks, and proportionate responses would enhance its public intellectual value.

Comparative Considerations in Literary History

From Early Formal Evidence to Contemporary Controversy

With References associates the beginnings of Maithili ghazal history with Jeevan Jha and treats the formal regularity of his couplets as early evidence. It then seeks continuity in the ghazal's internal discipline from Sitaram Jha and 'Madhup' to later poets. What distinguishes this historical reconstruction is its attempt to establish the history of the genre through metrical examples rather than the fame of authors or the dates of publication alone. This is a productive direction for source-based literary history.

The collection traces the beginnings and expansion of debate over the ghazal through earlier interventions by Taranand Viyogi, theoretical work by Ramdev Jha, and the activity of Anchinhar Akhar towards the latter part of the first decade of the new millennium. The digital discussion of ghazals around 2008, and the development of a 'poetics of the Maithili ghazal' from 2009 onwards, are also supported by Anchinhar's independent articles published in Videha. Nevertheless, quantitative claims about antiquity, priority, the numbers of authors, and the numbers of essays should not be accepted as settled historical conclusions without independent counts based on bibliographies.

Literary history is not merely a succession of dates; it is also the development of concepts. The thematic variety within formal constraints in the couplets of early ghazal writers, later controversies over the names 'song' and 'ghazal', and the collective teaching of metrical rules in the digital age are three different kinds of historical process. The first supplies examples of composition; the second generates disputes over generic identity; and the third makes the democratic dissemination of criticism and instruction possible. Seen in this way, Anchinhar's book is a contentious but by no means negligible historical document.

Parallel Debates in the Videha Archives

Videha's research archives record Anchinhar's early articles on qafiya and bahr, his independent examination of initial experiments in ghazal grammar, comparative criticism of Narendra's Maithili and Hindi ghazals, discussion of the expression of Maithili ghazals, consideration of the temper of Dushyant Kumar's ghazals, and questions concerning the history of song and music. These records matter because the positions advanced in With References were not an isolated, immediate response: behind them lay sustained work in developing technical, comparative, and social criticism.

The listings in Videha of such works as The Grammar and History of the Maithili Ghazal, The Maithili Ghazal Ready Reckoner, Anchinhar Akhar, and Shabd–Arth–Shakti connect this criticism to the author's broader creative project. Their titles, general character, and availability in Videha can be confirmed bibliographically; no claim is made here to have examined the complete texts of each of those works independently. Maintaining this distinction is an essential condition of critical judgement.

Another precaution in literary history concerns the binary opposition between the 'mainstream' and the 'parallel'. Alternative platforms can undoubtedly make an important contribution, but grouping all earlier writers into a single undifferentiated camp obscures internal historical differences. Literary change involves agreement, disagreement, transformation, rereadings of traditional metre, and new linguistic experiments. A rigorous history must therefore become not merely a history of opposing factions but a plural history of textual traditions.

Comparative Aesthetics: Form, Subject Matter, and the Independence of Genres

With References offers a useful corrective regarding the relation between form and content. Against the view that classical discipline restricts creativity, the collection indicates ghazals addressing many subjects: separation, deprivation within family life, social contradictions, political distress, and human dignity. Such examples demonstrate that a predetermined metrical pattern does not necessarily drain poetry of life. Poetry arises through the interaction of thematic force and formal choice; neither is the other's permanent enemy.

Yet conformity to a classical form is not itself a guarantee of aesthetic worth. One must also demonstrate that a composition which passes the test of generic correctness possesses thematic depth, freshness of imagery, sonic subtlety, and complexity of experience. Anchinhar's criticism achieves its fullest literary potential when, after identifying formal faults, it turns to symbol, social context, and emotional terrain. A more regular development of this double method would be fruitful for Maithili ghazal criticism.

Relations between the song and the ghazal are equally important. Both may be sung; both may employ rhyme or repetition; and both may draw sustenance from vernacular speech and classical traditions. Nevertheless, the stanzaic continuity of the song differs from the partial independence of individual couplets in the ghazal, its matla-based rhyme scheme, and its metrical discipline. Recognition of these distinctions need not close the door to studying cultural contact. The boundaries of the ghazal and the independent dignity of the song can both be preserved.

Language, Satire, Repetition, and the Critical Voice

Anchinhar's prose is conversational, interrogative, and animated by the heat of controversy. He questions readers directly, draws analogies from everyday life, gives practical examples of metrical calculation, and openly contests writers' statements. The merit of this style lies in its accessibility: technical issues of prosody cease to be mysteries reserved for specialists and become questions ordinary readers can consider. His comparison with the preparation of kheer, designed to distinguish essential components of a genre from optional embellishments, exemplifies this popular orientation of his criticism.

The other side of the style is biting ridicule. Where it insinuates an individual's motives, competence, or private interests, the separation between argument and supposition diminishes. Consequently, even an evidentially sound technical objection may be received as a personal dispute. The force of criticism derives not only from the rigour of its argument but also from its capacity to understand and answer the best possible interpretation of an opposing position. From this perspective, the language of With References sometimes works against its own evidentiary contribution.

The recurrence of the same couplet or metrical example seems to form part of a deliberate editorial strategy. Repetition would have been useful when each essay circulated separately, ensuring that its readers encountered a minimum of supporting evidence. Read together as a collection, however, it also obscures the progressive development of the criticism. A future revised edition could make the book easier to study by consolidating the basic account of genre at the beginning and giving each subsequent essay more space for new textual problems and fresh examples.

The Epistemology of Criticism: Achievements and Limits

The book's decisive achievement is to demand evidence for claims about genre. Neither the author, the prefacer, the editor, nor popularity in itself supplies a standard for identifying a ghazal. Its insistence on examining form, the history of experiment, linguistic pronunciation, and intellectual context together constitutes an important reinstatement of discipline in Maithili criticism.

Other questions remain. First, how far can traditional and experimentally modern definitions of the ghazal coexist in the plural? Second, if a metrically correct composition is artistically weak, what should the next level of evaluation be? Third, how are singability and public acceptance to be examined after generic criteria have been applied? Fourth, how is the metrical weight of the same line to be settled when pronunciation differs among speech communities? Fifth, what evidence concerning sources, dating, and comprehensive catalogues is required to establish quantitative claims about history?

These questions cannot be answered by simply refuting Anchinhar's position; they require its investigative extension. A competent critical method would first establish the text of a composition, then examine metre and rhyme, subsequently consider meaning, imagery, social experience, and compositional context, and finally verify the reliability of the sources supporting historical claims. Within this four-stage sequence, answers to 'Is it a ghazal?' and 'Is it excellent poetry?' may be distinct yet mutually related.

Conclusion: From the Defence of Genre to Literary Judgement

With References belongs to a current of Maithili criticism that places the standing of a genre above the prestige of its practitioners. The book calls for the ghazal to be examined not merely as an emotional mode or musical performance but as a distinctive poetic form founded on metre, sound, and the arrangement of couplets. Together, its seven essays extend Maithili ghazal criticism across the various terrains of literary texts, prefaces, editing, oral debate, and historical claims.

Its strongest contributions are the public exposition of classical criteria, the demand for examples, the distinction between song and ghazal, and the separation of generic identity from poetic worth. Its limitations sometimes appear in personally directed rebuttals, insufficiently verified historical figures, repetition, and comparatively brief aesthetic analysis. Identifying these limitations does not diminish the book's importance; rather, it applies to the book the very evidentiary standards that it advocates.

The collection offers two lessons for future criticism of the Maithili ghazal: the question of form must not be evaded, and criticism must not end with that question. Poetry is the joint endeavour of disciplined language and lived experience. Anchinhar's intervention forcefully establishes the first side of that endeavour; developing the second with equal rigour is the task of a new generation of critics. In this sense, With References is not a closed verdict but a compelling initial foundation for a more exacting, interdisciplinary, and evidence-conscious debate on the Maithili ghazal.

References

The primary and supplementary references are selected from Videha's published book lists and research archives. Details given for other books constitute bibliographical evidence; this essay does not claim independently to have examined their complete texts.

01. Anchinhar, Ashish. With References: Criticism, Critical Appraisal, Reviews, and Articles on the Ghazal. Videha literary archives; the principal book under review.

02. Anchinhar, Ashish. The Grammar and History of the Maithili Ghazal. Videha book archives; listed in the bibliography.

03. Anchinhar, Ashish. Anchinhar Akhar: A Collection of Ghazals, Rubaiyat, and Qatas. Videha book archives; listed in the bibliography.

04. Anchinhar, Ashish. The Maithili Ghazal Ready Reckoner. Videha book archives; listed in the bibliography.

05. Anchinhar, Ashish. Shabd–Arth–Shakti [Word, Meaning, and Power]. Videha book archives; listed in the bibliography.

06. Anchinhar, Ashish. 'Qafiya'. Videha, issue 112; Videha research archives.

07. Anchinhar, Ashish. 'Qafiya and Bahr'. Videha, issue 113; Videha research archives.

08. Anchinhar, Ashish. 'The Concept of Jharu Metre in Maithili Poetics: Form and Determining Principles'. Videha, issue 157, 2014.

09. Anchinhar, Ashish. 'Early Experiments in Maithili Ghazal Grammar'. Videha, issue 165, 2014.

10. Anchinhar, Ashish. 'The Maithili Ghazal in the Context of Expression'. Videha, issue 251, 2018.

11. Anchinhar, Ashish. 'A Comparative Discussion of Narendraji's Maithili and Hindi Ghazals'. Videha, issue 252, 2018.

12. Anchinhar, Ashish. 'When Will Ghazals in the Mood of Dushyant Kumar's Ghazals Be Written in Maithili?' Videha, issue 307, 2020.

13. Anchinhar, Ashish. 'A Maithili Ghazal That Changed the History of Maithili Song and Music'. Videha, issue 312, 2020.

14. Anchinhar, Ashish. 'Writing Something, Writing Just Anything, Does Not Make It a Ghazal'. Videha, issue 437, 2026.

15. Videha Editorial Archives. 'Videha Books': a bibliography of Maithili books. https://videha-ejournal.github.io/videha/pothi.htm

16. Videha Research Archives. 'Videha Research Articles: Issues 1–451'. https://videha-ejournal.github.io/videha/research/videha-scholar-research-book.html

17. Anchinhar, Ashish. 'Early Experiments in Maithili Ghazal Grammar'. Original Videha article: https://www.videha.co.in/research/2014/165/मैथिली-गजल-व्याकरणक-शुरूआती-प्रयोग.htm

REVIEW 13

Shabd–Arth–Shakti (Word, Meaning, and Power)

Form, Language, and History in Ghazal Criticism

Abstract

Ashish Anchinhar's Shabd–Arth–Shakti is a critical intervention concerned with the form, metrical discipline, linguistic autonomy, and literary history of the modern Maithili ghazal. Its distinctive feature is that the author does not regard popularity or an author's reputation as an adequate basis for judgement, but establishes concrete tests involving bahr, qafiya, radif, the structure of the sher, and natural linguistic expression. The book's first part reviews individual ghazal collections and poetic experiments; the second re-examines controversies surrounding editing, literary history, the social consciousness of the ghazal, modern expression, and generic nomenclature. This study considers its principal arguments, critical method, relationship with contemporary Maithili literature, and contradictions. It shows that the book is a fearless attempt to establish the ghazal as an independent poetic genre, although in making bahr the decisive criterion, the author's treatment of literary plurality, emotional beauty, and commonly practised forms of metre is not invariably equally generous. These very tensions place the volume at the centre of debate.

Keywords: Maithili ghazal; Ashish Anchinhar; Shabd–Arth–Shakti; bahr; qafiya; radif; ghazal criticism; generic identity; literary history; Videha.

Introduction: Is Ghazal Criticism Merely Praise?

Within the critical tradition of Maithili literature, the question of testing the ghazal as a distinct genre has frequently been displaced in comparison with criticism of songs, poems, stories, and novels. Shabd–Arth–Shakti makes that displacement itself a subject of criticism. The author maintains that good subject matter, a social message, or a writer's designation as progressive does not suffice to make a composition a ghazal. Poetic effect and generic identity occupy different, though related, levels. Establishing this distinction is the underlying motivation of the author's entire critical endeavour.

The book's title is meaningful in this context. Word, meaning, and power suggest a triangle comprising the linguistic organisation of poetry, its apprehension, and its sociocultural effect. Yet the book's actual analysis places greater emphasis on the phonetic discipline of ‘word’ and the reasoned rebuttal constituting ‘power’; the multilayered aesthetic interpretation of meaning receives comparatively less space. This gap between the title's breadth and criticism's central prosodic insistence repeatedly invites reflection.

The author's self-introduction and preface present the viewpoint of a practising writer-critic. He sees the volume as an important early effort in independent ghazal criticism. This is the author's own assessment and cannot be treated as the final verdict of independent literary history. What matters is that the book makes criticism an act of public scrutiny rather than a certificate of praise for authors.

The Book's Structure and Critical Project

The book is divided into two parts. The ten headings of the first are mainly critiques of particular collections, poets, and couplets: ‘Evidence of a Lost War’, ‘Watch and Half-Watch’, ‘Sunset before Sunrise’, ‘Pseudo-Ghazal’, ‘The Stained Moon’, ‘Early Experiments in Maithili Ghazal Grammar’, ‘A Cactus Grown in Smooth Soil’, ‘A Comparative Discussion of Narendraji's Maithili and Hindi Ghazals’, and two shorter pieces entitled ‘Couplets That Will Always Remain Couplets’. The second part broadens the discussion in eight essays on prosodic understanding, editorial responsibility, controversy, history, social temperament, and the relationship with song and music. An appendix concerning Phoolchandra Jha ‘Praveen’ follows.

This arrangement is more than an ordinary gathering of essays. The first part sets the author's critical instruments against individual examples; the second questions their social history and institutional consequences. To call the book merely a ‘collection of ghazal reviews’ would therefore diminish its scope. It can be read simultaneously as a polemical work of genre formation, a defence of prosody, and a document of literary public life.

The structure also has weaknesses. Essays written at different times repeatedly return to the necessity of bahr and the critic's responsibilities. Repetition demonstrates the historical persistence of the dispute, but in a unified book the intensity of immediate rebuttal sometimes displaces intellectual progression. Editorial condensation or the provision of thematic cross-references might have made the volume more accessible.

The Central Critical Commitment: Bahr, Qafiya, Radif, and Sher

For the author, the formal identity of a ghazal is clear. Metrical discipline across the lines of each couplet, phonetic correspondence in the qafiya, and regular recurrence of the radif are not labels but relationships that can be tested. In some reviews, he marks the patterns of short and long syllables in individual lines in support of his judgements. This procedure moves criticism beyond personal taste towards public verifiability. It is useful for clarifying the distinctions among listening to poetry, singing it, and reading it as a particular genre.

The logical advantage of this criterion is that no quality of subject matter—social consciousness, love, satire, political resistance, or vernacular language—can independently prove a composition's formal identity as a ghazal. Equally, singability is not synonymous with bahr: a musical melody and a metrical sequence are different. Numerous essays in the book rest on this distinction.

A difficulty nevertheless arises. A genre cannot be defined throughout history by a mechanical list of immutable rules. Pronunciation, quantity, caesura, conjunct consonants, and the treatment of short and long vowels differ among languages. The author himself sometimes accepts adjustments suited to a language's character. Accordingly, before declaring phonetic variation to be irregularity, a defence of classical ghazal discipline must examine pronunciation in social practice, the reading intended by the poet, and the internal consistency of the whole composition. The book raises this question without developing possible answers equally in every instance.

‘Good poetry’ and ‘a good ghazal’ are not mutually exclusive judgements. A composition may remain effective poetry even outside the accepted structure of a ghazal. Some of the author's remarks on this distinction are valuable, although their balanced meaning is sometimes obscured by severe language.

Textual Analysis: ‘Evidence of a Lost War’

The opening review uses Taranand Viyogi's Apan Yuddhak Sakshya [Evidence of One's Own War] to establish the need for ghazal criticism. Considering forty compositions in the collection, the author separately evaluates language, ideas, and prosodic arrangement. This division prevents the criticism of a single book from becoming one-sided. On the level of ideas, he acknowledges some positive signs of sociopolitical awareness, while objecting to an excess of Sanskritised or unfamiliar vocabulary at the linguistic level.

In his metrical examination, the critic identifies examples of absent bahr and inconsistent qafiya. To substantiate the argument, he explains the basic technical elements of the ghazal. This pedagogical voice is important: readers receive not merely a verdict but also a method of reaching it.

Yet the linguistic standard employed invites counterquestions. Closeness to the language of ordinary people may be a significant literary virtue, but difficult words do not invariably signify failed poetry. Context, sound, imagistic necessity, and emotional structure also determine the appropriateness of diction. A broader examination supported by examples would have strengthened the author's linguistic criticism.

Textual Analysis: 'Watch and Half-Watch'

'Watch and Half-Watch' reviews Baba Baidyanath's Pahara Iman Par. The book separately addresses the collection's historical importance, metrical arrangement, qafiya and radif, vernacular linguistic character, and emotional aspects. Raising the circumstances of its early publication and its critical neglect, the author argues that the development of a new genre requires writers to read one another seriously. In this sense, the review is not merely an evaluation of a work but a call to build a literary community.

The writer's trust in readers has a particular significance. When pointing out faults in qafiya, he clarifies sound correspondence through examples rather than merely imposing a supposedly self-evident standard. At the same time, he appreciates the collection's colloquial Maithili and the usefulness of its couplets dealing with contemporary life. On the whole, this review achieves a good balance between form and meaning.

Even after every ghazal in the collection is placed before a prosodic tribunal, the value of its vernacular experience remains intact. This reveals a constructive possibility within the book's central principle: disagreement over metre need not amount to a total rejection of literary value.

Textual Analysis: 'Sunset before Sunrise'

The review of Rajendra Vimal's Suryast Sa Pahine [Before Sunset] criticises claims to be 'first' in the literary history of the modern Maithili ghazal. The author disputes the number of compositions and the nature of the collection, comparing it with Rabindranath Thakur's Lekhani Ek Rang Anek. Alongside the value of the works themselves, publication facts, editorial credibility, and the evidence underlying literary claims become matters of inquiry.

A notable feature of the essay is that it also discusses the other side's explanation. The possibility is acknowledged of distinguishing an anthology mixing ghazals and poems from a collection devoted entirely to ghazals. From a research perspective, terms such as 'first', 'first complete collection', and 'first published in Nepal' need precise definitions. Otherwise disputes about precedence risk becoming disputes over prestige rather than contributions to literary history.

The lesson of this discussion is that literary history needs clear catalogues specifying numbers, editions, places of publication, and the generic character of collections. The author raises the controversy; the preparation of a systematic bibliography remains a task for future research.

Textual Analysis: 'Pseudo-Ghazal' and 'The Stained Moon'

In 'Pseudo-Ghazal', the difference between the ghazal and a ghazal-like composition is foregrounded through Gangesh Gunjan's poetic experiments. The author's question concerning 'free rhythm' and metrical form is theoretical: if a composition claims to be metrical, evidence of its rhythmic organisation should be offered. The demand is pertinent, particularly when the genre's name itself implies formal expectations.

The limitation of this reasoning becomes apparent when experimental poetry is treated solely as a failed ghazal. A poet may be exploring new possibilities at the boundaries of a genre. In that case, the critic should ask two distinct questions: is the work a traditional ghazal, and is it effective as independent poetry or a transformed poetic experiment? A negative answer to the first does not settle the second.

'The Stained Moon' examines the prosody of Rambharos Kapari 'Bhramar's' Anhariyak Chan. The author tests claims about free or azad ghazals through qafiya and other formal elements. A significant disagreement emerges: if a writer has consciously declined to follow traditional discipline, whether the composition should be called a classical ghazal is a separate issue from its poetic achievement. The rigour of literary judgement is meaningful only when these levels are distinguished.

Textual Analysis: 'Early Experiments in Maithili Ghazal Grammar'

This essay analyses various early attempts to create metrical schemes for Maithili ghazals. The author stresses distinctions among syllabic metre, quantitative metre, bahr-based systems, and rhythms connected with singing. Musical arrangement and a fixed pattern of syllables or quantities in verse are undoubtedly related, but not synonymous; he repeatedly clarifies this point.

The author does not categorically deny a poet's freedom to devise new metres, but regards it as essential to present their rules, examples, and evidence of consistent application. The possibility of dialogue between generic discipline and innovation is implicit in this position. The invention of a new name becomes productive for literary history only when the form can be reread and tested.

The essay is also historically important because it treats experimentation with a poetic form not as an isolated occurrence but as part of a continuing intellectual debate. This critical method becomes the foundation of later essays on the history of the ghazal.

Textual Analysis: ‘A Cactus Grown in Smooth Soil’

The essay on Ramesh's Nagpheni presents one of the book's most interesting contradictions. Initially the author doubts the collection's identity as ghazals on metrical grounds; he nevertheless considers its preface, ideological claims, language, and selected poetic lines at length. Thus, although he does not recognise the compositions as ghazals, he does not exclude them from literary discussion.

The strong presence of everyday Maithili vocabulary especially attracts the critic. He acknowledges the book's social realism, local imagery, straightforward diction, and spirit of resistance. The review of Nagpheni thus demonstrates, by its own example, that critical practice needs to extend beyond an analysis of bahr.

At the same time, the author vigorously opposes arguments rejecting metre in the name of progressivism. Citing Dushyant Kumar, Faiz, and Adam Gondvi, he challenges the proposition that social resistance necessarily requires the abandonment of metre. The real question here concerns not modern subject matter as such but its relationship to poetic form. This debate could provide a basis for wider comparative study in Maithili poetic criticism.

Textual Analysis: Narendraji's Bilingual Ghazals

‘A Comparative Discussion of Narendraji's Maithili and Hindi Ghazals’ is a systematic comparative endeavour. The decision to test the ghazals of one author in two languages according to bahr, qafiya, radif, emotional quality, subject matter, and linguistic usage is not merely an ordinary bilingual comparison; it is a useful research method. It offers the possibility of examining how linguistic resources and prosodic outcomes vary even when the poet's talent remains constant.

The author discusses features of Maithili pronunciation, the treatment of short and long syllables, and the admissibility of tatsama, tadbhava, and borrowed words. The same word does not bear an identical phonetic weight in every language; a scansion that ignores linguistic context may therefore be unreliable. This is the review's most consequential theoretical conclusion.

The author also questions repetitions of subject matter and ideological monotony. Metrical correctness alone, then, does not automatically make an excellent ghazal. Language, suggestion, imagery, satire, and diversity of experience remain essential in aesthetic judgement. The author's actual practice of criticism here becomes more complex than his declared emphasis on form might suggest.

Textual Analysis: ‘Couplets That Will Always Remain Couplets’

The two short pieces in the first part may appear to offer an interlude among the longer essays. Yet within the collection as a whole they serve a distinct purpose. After evaluations of entire collections, they make clearer the need to consider the sher as an independent aesthetic unit. A characteristic of the ghazal is that a couplet may possess its own autonomous organisation of meaning; its effect need not depend on an obligatory narrative continuity across the whole ghazal.

This method of close reading brings questions of poetic coherence, figurative suggestion, shifts in meaning, memorability, and resonance into view. The research opportunity is to connect these miniature studies of couplets to the more rigorous metrical criticism elsewhere in the volume, thereby developing a more systematic account of the relation between the ghazal's 'craft' and its 'meaning'.

Part Two: Criticism, Editing, and Literary Institutions

'The Maithili Ghazal and Muddled Criticism' is an essay centred on critical responsibility. The author asks how a new genre can develop if writers neither examine its forms themselves nor regard outside critics as qualified. Here criticism becomes the shared labour of public knowledge, not an instrument of private rivalry.

'The Ghazal Dying in the Hands of an Ignorant Editor' poses a serious question: how legitimate is an editorial intervention if publication in a journal alters the structural units of a composition, or publishes a ghazal as a song? Discussing a composition by Yoganand Heera, the author raises issues of textual reliability and editorial accountability. Such accusations must be read as the author's claims; an independent judgement of any editor's intentions would require comparison of the original publications.

The lasting contribution of both essays is that they do not exclude literary institutions from aesthetic and critical inquiry. Textual formation, textual alteration, editing, classification, and publication all affect the reception of ghazals. Such attentiveness to institutions is notable in contemporary literary history.

'Revision Does Not Mean Destruction': A Poetics of Debate

The substantial essay 'Revision Does Not Mean Destruction' documents a prolonged literary dispute over the classical principles of the Maithili ghazal. The author sets out his earlier writings, Surendranath's rebuttal, and the sequence of responses that followed. Through the controversy, questions of literary history, poetic responsibility, the limits of bahr, and the conflict between supporters and opponents of metre become visible.

An important strength of the dispute is its insistence on evidence. The author asks that a statement not be accepted merely on grounds of seniority or renown: examples must be supplied, bahr tested, and sources for historical assertions identified. This willingness to subject criticism to counterargument approaches the discipline of research.

Critical discipline, however, has two forms: rigour of reasoning and restraint in address. The first is particularly strong in this essay; the second sometimes falls short. Sarcasm aimed at those who hold an opposing view can obscure the original question. For scholarly practice, the author's demand for evidence is worth retaining; independent testing of arguments is more productive than unresolved allegations about an individual's intentions.

'The Maithili Ghazal in the Context of Statements': The Distance between Opinion and Evidence

The author places earlier pronouncements on the ghazal's possibilities, language of composition, forms of love, and relationship with music in the sequence of a historical debate. Beginning with personal opinion, the discussion progresses towards formal examples. The essay demonstrates that a literary pronouncement can exert psychological and institutional influence upon the creative practice of its time.

For the author, comparing the love of Vidyapati, the love of Urdu poetry, and its expression in the Maithili ghazal raises a question of literary legitimacy. He argues that classifying a subject as religious, worldly, or otherworldly does not determine a composition's fundamental prosodic capacity. On this point, the book stands for the independence of genre.

When writing the history of opinions, it is important to distinguish what someone said, what the statement meant in its immediate context, and what evidence establishes its actual effects. The book is alert to the first two questions, but considerable scope remains for empirical documentation in answering the third.

'Give Love a Place in Your Heart, Akbar': Knowledge and Sensibility

This short essay concerning Jagdishchandra Thakur 'Anil' captures a striking paradox. A couplet quoted in defence of an argument against prosody may itself possess a disciplined rhythmic structure. The author maintains that 'ilm', or knowledge, should not be made an enemy of poetic feeling. Knowledge is an instrument of expression; its presence does not automatically extinguish experience.

In Anil's couplet, the desire to be freed from the constraints of the ghazal creates an internal irony: the poem speaks against restriction while moving within its own rhythm. This observation allows 'rules' to be understood not merely as negative commands but as an organisation of creative possibilities.

It must also be added that knowledge and sensibility can sustain one another without being synonymous. Observance of rules may supply an essential poetic instrument, but an effective couplet also requires freshness of meaning and linguistic vitality.

‘A Brief Critical Introduction to the Modern Maithili Ghazal’: An Outline of History

The substantial historical essay in the second part is one of the book's central pillars. The author connects early examples of modern Maithili ghazals, twentieth-century poets, later collections, the new generation's awareness of metre, and digital literary efforts into a continuous narrative. Pandit Jeevan Jha, the poet Sitaram Jha, Kashikant Mishra ‘Madhup’, Yoganand Heera, Jagdishchandra Thakur ‘Anil’, and numerous later figures appear in the discussion.

The author particularly contests the belief that metrically regular ghazals are impossible in Maithili. Presenting patterns of bahr in early compositions, he argues for the historical existence of the form. The textual evidence cited within the work gives substance to this claim. Nevertheless, establishing a ‘first’ occurrence or a definitive beginning would require separate research into editions and publication records for all relevant early material.

Two tendencies repeatedly emerge from this essay: writers who accept metrical rules and those who, under the designation ‘azad’, seek freedom from them. The division is useful for understanding critical controversy, but literary practice is not divided into two mutually exclusive camps. Many writers move among songs, poems, rhythmically organised free compositions, and ghazals. Attention to this intermediate poetic territory would produce a more inclusive literary history.

The book's references to publication initiatives associated with Videha and Anchinhar Akhar are distinctive. They show that the modern ghazal developed within a shared space of periodicals, online publication, reader correspondence, and critical rebuttal. The digital medium is thus not merely a convenience of distribution but an active forum for debate over genre.

‘The Temper of Dushyant Kumar's Ghazals’: The Coexistence of Modernity and Metre

This essay returns to the relationship between modern social consciousness and the ghazal's form. Through Dushyant Kumar's ghazals, the author argues that political satire, popular struggle, inequality, and the desire for change can be expressed within the discipline of bahr. He thus rejects the proposition that ‘modern thought’ necessarily requires the absence of metre.

‘Temper’ here means more than subject matter: it includes the heat of utterance, the pressure of satire, the public character of experience, and the sharp brevity of language. The distinction is essential in comparisons involving Dushyant Kumar's influence. The existence of metrically regular compositions in Maithili is one thing; achieving a comparable intensity of sociopolitical awareness is another. The book pursues the demonstration of the first extensively, while the finer aesthetics of the second could have been developed further.

This comparison shows that contemporary consciousness and classical form need not be antagonists. But their coexistence in particular works is better established through close reading than through displays of metrical calculation alone.

‘A Maithili Ghazal That Changed the History of Song and Music’

This article examines the transformation that may arise between a literary text and its musical performance. The author emphasises the generic identity of a composition by the poet Sitaram Jha, discussing the differences in classification, textual variants, and presentation that developed in the tradition of singing it. The history of the ghazal here becomes directly entangled with the history of music.

The basic problem can be considered on three levels: the author's original text, the musician's or singer's performance, and the genre name established in collective memory. These are related, but not identical. Singing a ghazal as a bhajan or song does not automatically alter the original composition's structure; nevertheless, its reception in public culture may itself become an independent cultural fact.

The author seeks to safeguard the authenticity of the original text. Research should extend this discussion by collecting the original and performed versions, comparing changes in their designations, and examining musical intentions. The essay thus opens new questions for the textual criticism of music.

The Phoolchandra Jha ‘Praveen’ Episode: Authorship, Attribution, and Textual Reliability

An appendix presents a dispute over the authorship and transmission of compositions associated with Phoolchandra Jha ‘Praveen’. The subject appears somewhat removed from the book's central controversies over metre, but is in fact connected with textual authenticity, authorial claims, and trust in cultural communication. Before a ghazal's craft can be judged, one must establish who wrote the composition and which text is authoritative.

In literary research, disputes over attribution should be decided through dated publications, reliable versions, manuscripts, or publishing records, rather than personal assertions. The appendix underlines the need to assemble such evidence. A final judgement of the episode's historical significance is possible only after a wider comparison of available documents.

Attested Statements and Their Critical Significance

Several brief statements are particularly important for understanding the book's intellectual position. In ‘A Cactus Grown in Smooth Soil’, the author clearly declares: ‘Grammar has always been the basis of my reviews and literary criticism.’ This makes his stated method unmistakable. Grammar is offered in place of personal taste as a standard for examining compositions publicly. Yet if the entire theory of criticism were confined to this, the independent significance of imagery, subject matter, resonance, and social experience could be diminished.

In ‘A Brief Critical Introduction to the Modern Maithili Ghazal’, the author declares emphatically: ‘Bahr and qafiya are essential to a ghazal.’ This sentence lies at the heart of the book's definition of genre. On that basis he distinguishes the ghazal from other forms of verse. Its most useful application in literary debate would require a clear explanation of standards, provisions for differences in pronunciation, and explicit limits for exceptions.

A line from a quoted couplet by Jagdishchandra Thakur ‘Anil’—‘I am a ghazal; do not destroy me’—presents the tension between form and freedom as an artistic example. The author attends to the couplet's rhythmic discipline. At the level of meaning, the composition protests against restriction; at the structural level, it relies upon rhythm. Irony here becomes not merely a source of amusement but a creative power of the ghazal's self-reflection.

The significance of these statements is not that one critical opinion has become the final truth. Rather, they bring the book's wide-ranging debate into brief, verifiable propositions. The original-language statements quoted in this essay have been checked against their printed forms; elsewhere the ideas are presented through a reconsideration of their meaning rather than through literal quotation.

The Character of the Maithili Language: Vernacular Usage, Pronunciation, and Diction

A recurring insistence in the book's linguistic criticism is that a ghazal written in Maithili should remain connected with the living speech, phonetic structure, and natural expressive habits of Maithili society. Borrowing words from other languages is not inherently objectionable; the problem arises when they are forced into a composition without context, semantic necessity, or any purpose beyond manufacturing a rhyme.

This position expresses pride in the vernacular. It treats Maithili not as a mere translation of another language's syntax, but as a literary language with its own rhythms and images of meaning. Yet the vernacular is not homogeneous. Variations across Mithila's regions, social groups, and zones of language contact may themselves affect metrical decisions. The book offers useful indications of regional differences in a number of places.

The practical conclusion should be that linguistic correctness must not become a rigid, bookish standard detached from the living language of poetry. Context should remain central when examining phonetic acceptance of different Maithili forms, honorific verbs, the combined or separate writing of inflections, and the literary legitimacy of local words. Naturalness of diction and authenticity of sound nourish poetic movement; mechanical prohibitions cannot take their place.

Social Consciousness, Class Awareness, and the Limits of Formalism

Through examples from Dushyant Kumar, Adam Gondvi, and Maithili writers, the book argues that a commitment to ordinary people does not oppose bahr. Social injustice, hunger, inequality, satire of power, childhood experience, and rural life can all become meaningful subjects within the ghazal. In this respect the work points not merely to formalist rigidity but also to the potential expansion of meaning within form.

The problem arises when the classification of form becomes decisive at the expense of evaluating poetic subject matter. As necessary as the generic precision of the word 'ghazal' may be, one must also ask how a work affects its readers, what social experience it gives voice to, and what new world of meaning it creates through language. Neither poetics nor society can be adequately understood without a balanced relationship to the other.

For this reason, the book's finest critical moments are not those in which the author rejects a work solely for metrical reasons, but those in which he points out metrical faults while still recognising freshness of language or emotional achievement. This establishes a two-level ideal for criticism: examination of generic identity and independent examination of poetic value.

The Ghazal's Place in Maithili Literary History: A Comparative View

Across the long history of Maithili poetry, padas, songs, devotional hymns, metrical verse, dramatic lyrics, and modern short poems have developed in numerous forms. The arrival and growth of the ghazal must be understood within this wider poetic environment. Shabd–Arth–Shakti is historically important precisely because it seeks to establish the ghazal as a genre with its own structure rather than as a subordinate variant of another form.

The book cites Pandit Jeevan Jha, Sitaram Jha, and Kashikant Mishra 'Madhup' as evidence of the ghazal's early generic presence. Its subsequent discussion of Baba Baidyanath, Taranand Viyogi, Rajendra Vimal, Rambharos Kapari 'Bhramar', Ramesh, Jagdishchandra Thakur 'Anil', and many newer writers sketches the genre's diverse tendencies. This sequence of names should be treated as the book's selected critical history, not as a comprehensive catalogue.

The author draws comparisons with ghazal traditions in other Indian languages through examples from Dushyant Kumar, Faiz, Adam Gondvi, and other poets. The principal purpose is not to borrow vocabulary but to establish a theoretical proposition: changing subject matter does not require rejecting form. The proposition has a broad literary significance, although attending to differences in pronunciation, metre, and cultural experience among languages would make the comparison more persuasive.

From the standpoint of historiography, the volume constitutes a 'counter-intervention'. The author re-evaluates older verdicts, brings neglected writers into view, presents early metrically organised couplets, and examines the part played by periodical editing. All this reopens the question of Maithili ghazal history. The book's historical value lies in the vitality of the questions it raises, not in the supposed finality of its answers.

Videha's Literary Public Sphere and the Study of the Ghazal

The book's opening statement notes that several of Ashish Anchinhar's articles were published in different issues of Videha. The available Videha research archives contain separate entries for such titles as 'A Cactus Grown in Smooth Soil', 'Early Experiments in Maithili Ghazal Grammar', 'The Maithili Ghazal in the Context of Statements', 'A Comparative Discussion of Narendraji's Maithili and Hindi Ghazals', 'When Will Ghazals in the Mood of Dushyant Kumar's Be Written in Maithili?', and 'A Maithili Ghazal That Changed the History of Maithili Song and Music'.

These earlier publications have both authorial and institutional significance. The volume is not a uniform treatise composed on a single occasion, but a collected body of ideas developed through controversy, rebuttal, and fresh encounters with texts. In such a collection, the repetition of a theme also marks the chronology of debate. For researchers, the questions become: when was a particular position taken, what objection followed, and how did the author's view change?

Videha's book collection and research index preserve a documentary record of criticism alongside the voices of Maithili ghazal writers. Such institutional preservation is particularly important in a linguistic community where journals, small-scale publications, and regional works have been unevenly accessible. These materials provide essential references for the book's historical study.

A Synthesis of Critical Achievements and Limitations

The book's first achievement is methodological firmness. The author makes examples of testing bahr and qafiya available to his readers rather than merely pronouncing vague judgements of 'good' and 'bad'. Its second achievement is an intellectual struggle for the ghazal's independent generic identity. Its third is the inclusion of language, editing, publication, history, and musical culture within ghazal criticism. Its fourth is the recognition that an expanding range of social themes can coexist with metre.

The first limitation is the uneven scope of aesthetic judgement. Examination of bahr is often elaborate, while emotional experience, shifts of meaning within couplets, imagery, symbols, creative silence, irony, and the plurality of utterance are not analysed with the same systematic attention. A second limitation is the sharp personal address employed in contemporary literary disagreements, which risks diverting attention from the arguments. A third is the frequent construction of a binary between 'metrical' and 'unmetrical', with comparatively little development of categories for intermediate experiments.

A fourth limitation concerns the evidentiary basis of historical claims. The book supplies many important leads, yet early publications, textual variants across editions, republication, and questions of alleged priority require independent bibliographical investigation. A fifth limitation is the absence of a separate theoretical framework for musical adaptation and literary textual variation. These limitations do not diminish the book's significance; they clarify possible directions for subsequent research.

Conclusion

The enduring significance of Shabd–Arth–Shakti lies not merely in its contentious voice, but in its attempt to place evaluation of the Maithili ghazal on the public plane of evidence and definition. The book makes it clear that, for its author, literary freedom is not synonymous with a lack of discipline; he regards knowledge of form as the basis of creative freedom. This idea becomes most productive when plurality of meaning, linguistic variation, and innovation in poetic experience are valued as highly as formal correctness.

The book may be regarded as an active turning point in the history of Maithili ghazal studies. It attempts to transform love of the genre into sustained examination, praise of writers into critical testing, and celebratory accounts of literary tradition into questions and answers. Its proper evaluation lies in engaging with its sharpness, testing its arguments afresh, and extending the questions that it has left unresolved.

References: Videha Sources

Selected references drawn from the original book and the catalogues of works and publication indexes available through Videha.

- Anchinhar, Ashish. Shabd–Arth–Shakti: Criticism, Critical Appraisal, Reviews, and Articles on the Ghazal. Videha publication archives; 2012 and 2022 appear in the opening copyright information of the book.
- Videha. Archive of Maithili Books: bibliographical entries for Ashish Anchinhar's Shabd–Arth–Shakti, With References, The Grammar and History of the Maithili Ghazal, The Maithili Ghazal Ready Reckoner, and Anchinhar Akhar. https://videha-ejournal.github.io/videha/pothi.htm
- Videha. Index of Research Articles: issue-by-issue details of Ashish Anchinhar's essays concerning the ghazal. https://videha-ejournal.github.io/videha/research/index.html
- Videha. Research Articles, Issues 1–451: publication details of titles dealing with ghazal criticism. https://videha-ejournal.github.io/videha/research/videha-scholar-research-book.html
- Videha. Prose and Critical Resources: author-wise listing of Ashish Anchinhar's writings. https://videha-ejournal.github.io/videha/prose.htm
- Baba Baidyanath. Pahara Iman Par (ghazal collection). Bibliographical entry in the Videha book archives. https://videha-ejournal.github.io/videha/pothi.htm • Anchinhar, Ashish. ‘A Cactus Grown in Smooth Soil’; ‘Early Experiments in Maithili Ghazal Grammar’. Videha, issue 165, 2014. Videha research index.

• Anchinhar, Ashish. ‘The Maithili Ghazal in the Context of Statements’. Videha, issue 251, 2018. Videha research index.
• Anchinhar, Ashish. ‘A Comparative Discussion of Narendraji's Maithili and Hindi Ghazals’. Videha, issue 252, 2018. Videha research index.
• Anchinhar, Ashish. ‘When Will Ghazals in the Mood of Dushyant Kumar's Ghazals Be Written in Maithili?’ Videha, issue 307, 2020. Videha research index.
• Anchinhar, Ashish. ‘A Maithili Ghazal That Changed the History of Maithili Song and Music’. Videha, issue 312, 2020. Videha research index.

PART IV

Digital Archives and the Maithili Public Sphere

Rereading Maithili Literature

REVIEW 14

A History of Maithili Web Journalism

Archives, Media Transformation, and the Literary Public Sphere

Abstract

Ashish Anchinhar's A History of Maithili Web Journalism represents a distinctive tendency in modern Maithili prose, bringing the history of journalism, language technology, cultural memory, and public controversy into dialogue. Its principal concerns are Maithili's earliest presence on the Internet; the chronology of pioneering journals and websites; relations between literary and news-oriented media; developments in Mithilakshar and Unicode; the role of social media; and the history of collaborative knowledge-making. The book examines numerous claims of being ‘first’, though it sometimes itself adopts categorical language about priority. The present study treats this tension not simply as a weakness but as an active subject of historiography. Through thematic textual analysis, comparisons with available Videha material and earlier Maithili journalism, and critical consideration of different kinds of documentary evidence, it concludes that the work's exceptional significance lies in bringing together the first traces of digital Maithili, institutional contributions, and contested memories. Its ultimate historical reliability will depend upon continuing re-examination of contemporary archives.

Keywords

Maithili web journalism; digital literary history; Ashish Anchinhar; Videha; Mithilakshar; Unicode; collaborative editing; social media; source criticism; archival memory.

Introduction: The Need to Write a History of Digital Transformation

Traditional histories of Maithili literature have generally been organised around sequences of poets, books, genres, sects, and periodicals. The Internet, however, moved literary expression from the relatively fixed page to a dynamic platform. A composition was no longer merely a published object: its publication date, revision, reader responses, redistribution, translation, sound, image, and discoverability also became elements of its literary life. To understand these changing circumstances, the historian must examine not only lists of works but also the structure of the medium and its social practices.

A History of Maithili Web Journalism demonstrates the documentary possibilities of this new subject. The author places early websites, blogs, news media, journals, computer scripts, social networks, audiovisual platforms, and Wikipedia within a single overarching historical account. The work consequently does more than count websites: it attempts to answer how a language makes a place for itself in the public sphere.

The central argument of this critique is that the book's usefulness lies in the range of its assembled material and its questioning historical consciousness; its limitations appear in the vehemence of the author's voice, incomplete archives, uneven categories of sources, and criteria for deciding claims to be ‘first’. Only by holding both aspects together can its place in literary history become clear.

Structure, Development, and Authorial Purpose

At the outset, the author explains the origins of his study, earlier published articles, the process of revision, and the cooperation he seeks from readers. The preliminary material is linked to previous issues of Videha, special coverage of journalism, and his earlier writings. He dates the early public form of his project to 2017 and also describes incorporating fresh information over time. The work's chronological scope should therefore not be reduced to a single publication year: it is a documentary undertaking enlarged at different stages.

Its principal arrangement includes early technical discussion, Maithili's initial Internet presence, Internet references, a chronology of early websites, web seminars, language and literature, news, theatre and film and music, children's and other platforms, Mithilakshar and typography, social media, YouTube, and the development of Wikipedia. An opening inventory of ‘firsts’ and concluding archival evidence together form the internal framework.

Thematic classification provides a practical convenience, although a website can simultaneously function as a literary magazine, news platform, archive, and centre of language activism. Rigid categories may thus conceal the many-sided character of certain platforms. The most productive reading emerges when the thematic sections are understood as parts of an interconnected history.

Historiographical Method: Beyond Chronology to the Problem of Evidence

When establishing early appearances, the author identifies a fundamental problem: the date on which a website was created, the first publication date of the available material, and the later republication of that material do not constitute identical evidence. The possibility of backdating older blogs, the reappearance of articles on migrated platforms, and the loss of material when servers close all complicate the chronology. On this point the book raises a basic question of digital historiography.

The distinctions between kinds of evidence are not, however, always fully articulated. An author's contemporary declaration, a preserved copy of an original publication, an independent archival reference, a website's present description, and a third party's recollection possess different evidentiary values. When a claim rests only on currently available traces, it would be more appropriate to say ‘the earliest according to available evidence’. Historical conclusions gain strength from testing evidence, not from the severity of criticism directed at rivals.

In several places the author responds to rival claims through sharp satire and the language of moral judgement. This makes for engaging reading, but emotional statements must be distinguished from archival findings in historical analysis. The work thus becomes both a source for history and an example of the struggle involved in writing it.

Defining Journalism: The Shared Terrain of News, Literature, and Editing

The book rejects the restrictive view that excludes predominantly literary media from journalism. The author's argument is that news is not confined to politics or crime: literary activities, compositions, debate, editorial interventions, and exchanges with readers also participate in contemporary public communication. This reasoning has particular force in Maithili, where many early periodicals did not institutionally separate news from literature.

Yet not every literary composition automatically becomes journalism. Editorial selection, regularity, public responsibility, verification of sources, responsiveness to current events, and accountability to readers help define journalism's distinctive character. A poem in an online literary journal and that journal's report on a literary event serve different functions, though they are related. Reading the book's inclusive perspective alongside this distinction offers a more balanced picture of modern Maithili public life.

Here the author's contribution broadens the definition of journalism, but it needs to be supplemented with separate criteria for genre, newsworthiness, editorial practice, and the effects upon readers.

Early Web Presence: From ‘Bhalsarik Gachh’ to ‘Katek Ras Bat’

Bhalsarik Gachh, Pallavmithila, Samadiya, Apan Mithila, Prakaranter, and Katek Ras Bat occupy a central place in the discussion of early Internet history. The author treats Bhalsarik Gachh as an early presence associated with 2000, links Pallavmithila to evidence from around 2003, dates the beginning of Samadiya to 2004, and associates available material from Katek Ras Bat with 2005. This sequence also reveals connections among India, Nepal, and the diaspora.

An important feature of this account is that the expressions ‘presence of Maithili’ and ‘material written in Maithili’ are sometimes treated as equivalent and sometimes distinguished. English-language websites concerned with Maithili and blogs publishing in Maithili both undoubtedly have historical significance, but they raise different questions. The former show a broader cultural presence; the latter demonstrate direct digital use of the language. Clear separation of these two axes would organise disputes over precedence more effectively.

The author's rebuttal concerning Katek Ras Bat is not merely a comment on one website: it raises the question of who has the authority to write the memory of early digital culture. The episode recalls an ideal obligation of historians, who must both credit earlier work and impartially examine adverse evidence. Read alongside the author's previously published Videha articles, the discussion becomes part of a prolonged intellectual debate.

‘Samadiya’ and the Local Public Sphere of News

The news-oriented section includes Samadiya, Esamaad, Mithila Prime, Mithila Mirror, Nav Mithila, Maithili Zindabad, Mithila Darshan, and other outlets. The account of Samadiya's founding in 2004 and later editorial changes, and Esamaad's development from early electronic issues into a news portal, illustrates the transformation of digital journalism. It is important to distinguish among founders, editors, and subsequent managers.

The social significance of this material is that news dissemination was no longer centred solely on metropolitan printing presses. Regional events, language movements, Maithili-speaking society in Nepal, local politics, education, the arts, and community disputes acquired new audiences through digital media. These platforms made Maithili not merely a language of literature but also a language of current public dialogue.

The book questions the tendency to suppress the names of collaborators and claims about credit for founding certain news organisations. Such criticism values institutional memory. Historians must nevertheless distinguish founders, first editors, funders, technical collaborators, and later administrators through separate sources. The presence or absence of a name alone cannot justify immediate moral conclusions.

‘Videha’: E-Journal, Archive, and Parallel Literary Institution

Videha occupies a central place in the book's most extensive and influential discussions. Details of its regular fortnightly publication from 2008, literary special issues, experiments in theatre, children's literature, ghazals and translation, multilingual and multiscript material, book access, public exchange, audiovisual initiatives, and script experimentation present Videha not simply as a journal but as an integrated cultural infrastructure.

Within Videha's digital structure, publication and archiving reinforce one another. An issue of a print magazine remains in a reader's home or a library; the older material of a digital magazine can be revived through search, republication, cross-reference, and new readerships. The book rightly recognises the historical significance of this transformation. A literary institution no longer means only a building, committee, or award: it can also mean sustained collection of material and public accessibility.

Critically considered, the abundance of material about Videha is both a strength and a source of disproportion in the volume. Other websites receive brief descriptions, while many Videha initiatives are discussed extensively. Differences in source availability, long-term activity, and authorial selection may explain this imbalance. Even so, a comparative history would benefit from predetermined evaluative criteria applicable to all the platforms under study.

Literary Blogs and Generic Innovation

The section on language and literature mentions Anchinhar Akhar's ghazal-centred experiments, the community conversations of Maithil Aar Mithila, the diverse contents of E-Mithila, and other personal or institutional platforms. A particular advantage of the digital blog was that new writing no longer had to endure a long wait for magazine editors. This enabled rapid expansion of new authorship, short forms, ghazals, satire, and critical rebuttal.

Anchinhar Akhar is connected with the author's own creative work. In writing its history, he is therefore both participant and historian. These overlapping roles provide the advantage of direct experience but also raise the problem of self-evaluation. Assessment of an author's own initiative would benefit from independent reader responses, evidence of editorial continuity, analysis of the published works' techniques, and documentation of their influence on subsequent writing.

In the context of the Maithili ghazal, digital platforms were more than publication sites: they opened up questions of bahr, metre, formal organisation, and experiment. The book points to these possibilities, though sustained analysis of the literary texts themselves is comparatively limited. The distance between the history of blogs and an aesthetic history of the ghazal remains an important field for future study.

Theatre, Film, and Music: From Text to Audiovisual Culture

The section on theatre, film, and song discusses early music blogs, film-related platforms, the Videha Maithili Theatre Festival, and musical broadcasting initiatives in Nepal. Such developments interrupt the dominance of written text in Maithili digital public life. Melody, vernacular voices, acting, performance, theatrical history, and audiences all become connected with literature.

In criticising rival claims about the ‘first portal’, the book exposes a problem in defining genres of digital media. If a blog collecting songs, a platform reviewing films, and a comprehensive entertainment portal are grouped together, questions of sequence become confused. Distinguishing ‘first song blog’, ‘first independent film platform’, and ‘first integrated entertainment portal’ would refine the conclusions.

The digital passage of music is important for literary history because oral traditions can now be recorded, heard again, and transmitted across borders. Visual culture, however, must be assessed not only by audience size but also through quality of performance, linguistic accuracy, reinvention of folk traditions, and long-term preservation.

Children's Literature, Religion, Commerce, and Specialist Platforms

The author includes experiments in children's literature such as Nena-Bhutka, commercial initiatives such as Mithila Haat, digital forms of traditional knowledge such as Maithili Patra, health-related material, and platforms offering technical information. These examples demonstrate that the Maithili Internet is not confined to writing poetry: it also serves everyday needs, learning, trade, ritual, entertainment, and vernacular knowledge.

The digital presence of children's literature does not by itself establish an independent literary world for young readers unless the age-appropriateness of the material, the interaction of images, sound, and narrative, and children's own participation are examined. The book's references to children's platforms provide necessary historical leads; literary assessment would require separate testing of narrative form, vocabulary, didactic tendencies, and imagination.

Including religious, commercial, and health platforms in the wider history of journalism is justified by the expansion of the linguistic public sphere. Yet their reliability requires standards different from those applied to literary platforms. Medical evidence for health information, consumer protection in commerce, and authenticity of textual traditions in religious material are distinct questions.

Mithilakshar, Unicode, and Technological Autonomy

The section on script technology is central to the book's significance. It assembles information on digital fonts for Tirhuta, or Mithilakshar, claims made by different developers, Unicode proposals, language typing, transliteration, and experiments in digital publishing. C. K. Raut, Gangesh Gunjan Jha, Vinay Jha, Om Vikas, and Anshuman Pandey appear in different contexts. By comparing competing chronologies, the author attempts to move beyond a simplified narrative of a single victor.

A fundamental distinction exists among 'creating a font', 'securing recognition of a standardised character encoding', and 'developing a typing tool readily usable by ordinary readers'. Producing a private font is a historical achievement, but it is not equivalent to recognition within a universal encoding standard. Unicode standardisation is the outcome of a prolonged process involving community material, technical proposals, character research, and institutional decisions. The author's evidence illuminates several different stages of this process.

The author does not regard linguistic grammar and the shape of script as unrelated; he stresses the distinctive nature of Maithili inflections and word arrangements in Tirhuta writing. This position should not be reduced to a wish merely to preserve a script. It concerns the relationship among linguistic autonomy, vernacular textual forms, and computer representation. At the same time, the historical existence of multiple scripts, divergent ways of writing inflections, and different reading traditions cannot be denied. A balance between standardisation and living linguistic plurality is essential.

Braille, Multiscript Publication, and the Right of Access

The book gives particular attention to Videha's experiments involving Tirhuta, Braille, Kaithi, Devanagari, the International Phonetic Alphabet, and other scripts. It would be wrong to see multiscript publication merely as a display of scripts; it offers possible ways to carry Maithili literature to different readerships. Braille in particular makes accessibility a central issue in literary history.

Yet the mere availability of a multiscript file is not the same as an accessible reading experience. Standardised Braille representation, compatibility with devices, textual accuracy, stable fonts, and searchable writing all form part of access rights. The book's historical account begins this discussion; subsequent criticism can investigate the practical results.

Social Media: Women's Voices, Dalit Expression, and Democratic Participation

In discussing social media, the book sees new opportunities for popular expression. Its principal observations are that Facebook helped expand women's personal voices, the presence of Dalit writers, shared performances of folk songs, the memories of diaspora communities, and regional exchange.

Here history ceases to be a mere record of technical progress and becomes a question of social representation.

The recognition of widened possibilities for women and Dalit voices is a progressive feature of the work. A readership platform emerged outside the traditional entry points controlled by periodicals, where writers could themselves become publishers and respondents. Yet ‘presence’ is not ‘equality’. Online harassment, ridicule of languages, caste prejudice, systems controlling content visibility, and unequal access to devices constrain free expression. The author's enthusiasm should be read alongside these structural questions.

Social media do not automatically guarantee democracy: some voices may be amplified while others are suppressed. The book indicates this tension, but independent literary readings of women's writing, the works of Dalit authors, and comparative studies of community experience remain tasks for future research.

The Illusions of Facebook Reach, Responses, and Popularity

The book criticises misconceptions surrounding ‘likes’, reach, promotion, and paid distribution. This observation matters because digital visibility does not prove literary value. Public interest in news, poetic beauty, authorial labour, and the reliability of historical facts cannot be established by the number of audience reactions.

The internal rules of digital platforms change with time, however. Their mechanisms of reach, group behaviour, and promotion at a particular moment should not be taken as permanent laws. The relevant passages are better read as evidence of digital experience in a particular period, not as timeless technical prescriptions. This distinction does not lessen the book's historical usefulness; it situates it properly.

Mobile Applications and the Everyday Use of Language

The material on applications lists early initiatives in dictionaries, songs, calendars, marriage, news, religious texts, health, and other fields. Such inventories are useful to digital linguistic history because they show the transition from websites to mobile devices. Language tools available in people's hands create new relationships among education, information, and cultural identity.

The date an application first appears and its long-term usefulness are different matters. An application may be released but never updated, lose its linguistic content, or become technically unusable. These differences must be recognised. To assess the living history of these initiatives, evidence is needed not only of release dates but also of actual usage, maintenance, security, and public reach.

YouTube: Creating a Channel and First Publishing Maithili Material

In the YouTube section, the author distinguishes the date on which a channel was created from the date Maithili material first appeared on it. References to 'vijay7701', Gajendra Thakur's channel, Rajni Pallavi's performances, and numerous later channels are useful in this regard. The date a channel was opened does not in itself establish the publication history of Maithili literature or music: this is one of the book's important methodological observations.

YouTube has opened up new economic possibilities for singing in Maithili, performance before the camera, fresh presentations of folk songs, and spontaneous expression in regional speech. The author attends to the emerging use of strongly vernacular language. Further literary-historical study of these phenomena would require analyses of pronunciation, subtitles, audiences, gender representation, creative rights, and the visual language of performance.

Older material may be deleted; channel names may change; and audiovisual content may be reuploaded. The standards used to verify chronology must therefore be multilayered here as well. The author's investigation supplies an initial map of this history, not a final definitive register.

Maithili Wikipedia: A History of Collective Labour

The author discusses the roles of several individuals in the development of Maithili Wikipedia, from its initial initiatives to recognition in 2014. References to Gajendra Thakur, Umesh Mandal, Rajesh Ranjan, Biplab Anand, and other contributors reveal a process that was not the work of one person but the combined outcome of requests, translation, editing, technical dialogue, and community participation.

Disputes over credit cannot be resolved simply by asking 'Who spoke first?' Proposing a project, preparing required material, contributing during its testing phase, facilitating approval through discussions, taking initial administrative responsibility, and continuing to write are distinct kinds of work. The author identifies some of these levels, but impartial history requires them all to be organised with equal conceptual clarity.

The Wikipedia discussion opens up a serious theoretical possibility in the book: a language is not merely the achievement of a single institution but the collective practice of producing public knowledge. The author's insistence on distinguishing digital volunteer activity from formally institutionalised projects is also noteworthy. Nevertheless, the presence or absence of remuneration does not itself determine the quality of work or its historical authenticity.

The Archival Meaning of the Appendix: From Messages of Welcome to Cultural Memory

The final part collects congratulations, responses, and contemporary references received when Videha began publishing. Such material cannot simply be dismissed as testimonials. These messages illuminate contemporary expectations of a Maithili e-journal, enthusiasm for a new medium, attachment to the language, and relationships between writers and readers.

Messages of welcome, however, constitute a particular kind of critical evidence. They reveal contemporary acceptance and perception; they do not independently verify every achievement of the project. Praise for someone's dedicated labour is not decisive historical proof of being 'first'. The appendix's real documentary value becomes clearer when read with this limitation in mind.

Narrative Style: First Person, Rebuttal, and the Energy of Prose

The language of the book lies between scholarly discussion and public debate. The author does not conceal his 'I': he speaks directly to readers, anticipates objections, tests doubts, and answers rival claims. His prose conveys the energy of events and the labour of investigation. This is a living form, distinct from lifeless academicism.

The literary strength of the style lies in its dialogic nature, narrative turns, and intellectual alertness. The search for early websites becomes a kind of investigative narrative. Names, dates, opposing declarations, and archival traces are presented in sequence; readers participate in the decisive moments of the historical inquiry. This dramatic dimension of the prose deserves recognition as a literary quality.

For research to remain disciplined, however, its language should distinguish conjecture, recollection, interpretation, and verified fact. Where criticism becomes personal sarcasm, the force of facts may be obscured. A future revision would gain credibility by retaining the sharpness of its questions while reducing judgements directed at individuals.

A Comparative Perspective on Literary History: From Print Journalism to the Digital Magazine

Earlier Maithili journalism developed through literary periodicals, editorial movements, social consciousness, and public advocacy for the language. The author himself mentions Chandranath Mishra 'Amar's' history of journalism; the available Videha book catalogue also lists Dr Yoganand Jha's A Hundred Years of Maithili Journalism. Older magazines such as Maithil Hit Sadhan and Mithila Mihir provide important cultural references within this historical tradition.

In print journalism, publication times are marked by comparatively stable issues; in digital media, material can be revised, removed, relocated, and republished. Editorial authority is centralised in print journals, whereas blogs and social networks connect writers directly with readers. Preserving older print magazines depended on the conservation of paper, while the protection of digital archives depends on servers, code, character encoding, ownership, and regular migration.

The comparison demonstrates that the method of writing the history of modern journalism has changed. Yet the emergence of digital media does not render older editorial principles irrelevant. Fact-checking, language editing, space for diverse opinions, institutional accountability, and readers' trust remain fundamental journalistic values. The book stands at the meeting point of older and newer traditions.

The Parallel History of Maithili Literature and the Digital Public Sphere

One distinctive feature of digital Maithili is that writers can reach readers outside established publishing institutions, city-centred editorial structures, and recognition based on awards. The expansion of Videha and other blogs illustrates this historical possibility. Digital spaces give new visibility to authors comparatively neglected by traditional literary history, vernacular voices, minor genres, and experimental literature.

In this context, 'parallel' means more than opposition to established institutions: it means widening the evidentiary basis of history. New sources have historical value when they revise older conclusions; merely contradicting the mainstream does not, by itself, constitute evidence. A parallel history becomes most credible when it can also critically examine the platforms, writers, and groups it favours.

Technology-related articles already published in Videha, controversies over the early history of the web in 2017, articles from 2019 and 2021, and a book review from 2023 show that study of the subject has developed continuously. Rather than treating a single volume as a final history, it is therefore more appropriate to use it to develop a systematic tradition of sources for further inquiry.

Principal Achievements of the Book

The book's first achievement is the independent formulation of a neglected historical subject. Its second is the extensive collection of the names, dates, roles, and available evidence concerning early digital platforms. Its third is to place literary and news-oriented media within a shared digital public sphere. Its fourth is to connect Mithilakshar, Unicode, and language accessibility with the history of journalism. Its fifth is to make the participation of women, Dalits, the diaspora, and younger generations part of the history of the language.

The author's questioning disposition is additionally noteworthy. Refusing to accept established claims merely on the basis of reputation is essential to research. In many places the book generates new questions instead of supplying definitive answers; from a scholarly standpoint, this is itself an important contribution.

Limitations and Possibilities for Revision

The first limitation is insufficient clarity in classifying the many claims to have been ‘first’. Second, despite the abundance of information, consistent comparative criteria for user groups, effects on readers, editorial policies, and literary quality remain underdeveloped. Third, several websites are discussed according to their present availability; silence caused by missing archives cannot be taken as proof that something never existed.

The fourth limitation is the author's mixed position as both independent witness and participant. Fifth, materials added at different times produce a mixture of the historical past, the present contemporary with the earlier writing, and a revised present. Connecting each historical assertion with the period in which its information was gathered would increase reliability. Sixth, technical terminology sometimes conflates levels that should be distinguished: medium, platform, font, encoding, and application.

The purpose of these criticisms is not to undervalue the labour behind the work, but to give it greater durability. With clearer dates, source types, evidence for original claims, grounds for competing claims, and levels of confidence in conclusions, the volume has the potential to become a lasting reference work for the subject.

Conclusion: From Collection to History, from History to Criticism

A History of Maithili Web Journalism is a notable, archive-oriented work of modern Maithili prose. Its subject is not simply the expansion of journalism but the birth of a new public life for the language. From Bhalsarik Gachh and early blogs to Videha's fortnightly e-journal; from computer experiments with Mithilakshar to collective knowledge production on Wikipedia; from the digital life of folk songs to dissenting voices on social media—the author records an extensive cultural movement.

The work's most important message is that history is not merely the art of putting available evidence in order: it also demands a fair examination of attribution, presence, silence, memory, and controversy. The question of ‘priority’ that the book raises must be applied to its own method as well. It is precisely here that its critical possibilities are richest. The author's argumentative energy and labour of documentary collection make the work distinctive; more explicit categories of evidence, comparative standards, and a dialogic idiom could make it still more authoritative.

Ultimately, this book deserves to be regarded not as a completed story but as a foundational construction for the early history of digital Maithili. Its actual historical contribution will become clearer as future research considers literary content, editorial history, technical archives, public access, and literary influence together.

Textual Basis and the Limits of Quotation

The present study takes the sequence of events, titles, names, and thematic details in the available original text as its basis. Where the exact wording of a person's statement could not be established beyond doubt, the argument has been critically discussed in substance instead of offering a purported verbatim quotation. The book's account of itself, its self-declared priorities, and its claims against other platforms are treated as parts of the author's historical perspective, not as independently and conclusively established facts. Acknowledging these limits preserves both the work's actual achievements and the legitimate scope of criticism.

References

The external materials listed below are selected exclusively from Videha's journal, research index, and book catalogue. Bibliographical listings of works are not treated as substitutes for independent textual criticism.

- Anchinhar, Ashish. A History of Maithili Web Journalism. Principal book under review; listed in Videha's book catalogue. Videha source.· Online source
- Anchinhar, Ashish. ‘Katek Ras Bat Is Not the Earliest Presence of Maithili on the Internet’. Videha, issue 230, 15 July 2017. Videha source.· Online source
- Anchinhar, Ashish. ‘A History of Maithili Web Journalism’. Videha, issue 272, 15 April 2019. Videha source.· Online source
- Anchinhar, Ashish. ‘Maithili on the Internet’. Videha, issue 305, 1 September 2020. Videha source.· Online source
- Anchinhar, Ashish. ‘Social Media and Maithili’. Videha, issue 302, 15 July 2020. Videha source.· Online source
- Anchinhar, Ashish. ‘YouTube and Maithili’. Videha, issue 303, 1 August 2020. Videha source.· Online source
- Anchinhar, Ashish. ‘A History of Maithili Web Journalism’. Videha, issue 313, 1 January 2021. Videha source.· Online source
- Mandal, Umesh. ‘E-Journalism in Maithili’. Videha, issue 313, 1 January 2021. Videha source.· Online source
- Thakur, Gajendra. ‘Language and Technology: Maithili Writing and E-Publication on the Internet’. Videha, issue 34, 15 May 2009. Videha source.· Online source
- Thakur, Gajendra. ‘Language and Technology (Computers, Imaging, Keyboards, and Typing Techniques)’. Videha, issue 313, 1 January 2021. Videha source.· Online source
- Thakur, Gajendra. ‘Maithili Wikipedia, Unicode Tirhuta and Kaithi, Maithili in Google Translate, Maithili on Twitter, and Maithili on Amazon Alexa’. Videha, issue 351, 1 August 2022. Videha source.· Online source
- Jha, Pranav. ‘Book Review: A History of Maithili Web Journalism (Author: Ashish Anchinhar)’. Videha, issue 384, 15 December 2023. Videha source.· Online source
- Dr Yoganand Jha. A Hundred Years of Maithili Journalism. Work listed in the Videha book collection. Videha source.· Online source

- Videha. Research Index: archives of Maithili literature, criticism, language technology, and journalism. Videha source.· Online source
- Videha. Book Collection: catalogue of available works related to literature, history, scripts, and journalism. Videha source.· Online source

Subject Index

Principal Related Review Numbers

Anchinhar Akhar · 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, 12, 13

Translation · 1, 4, 5, 6, 10, 13, 14

Archives · 1, 4, 5, 9, 11, 12, 14

Arvind Thakur · 2, 5, 12

Identity · 3, 11, 13

Movement · 1, 2, 7, 8, 11, 14

Criticism · 2, 4, 5, 10, 11, 12, 13

Pronunciation · 4, 7, 9, 10, 11, 12, 13

Story · 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 14

Katha-Tridhara · 3, 4

Katha-Shatatrayi · 3, 4

Qafiya (rhyme) · 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, 12, 13

Kumari Ichchha · 7, 8, 9, 11

Kripanand Thakur · 5

Farmers · 2

Kolkata · 1

Ghazal · 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, 12, 13

Gajendra Thakur · 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 14

Picture stories · 5, 6

Metre · 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, 12, 13

Janghajori · 7, 8, 9, 11

Commitment to ordinary people · 6, 13

Caste · 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 14

Website · 14

Digital · 4, 5, 6, 11, 12, 13, 14

Takhallus (pen name) · 2, 7, 9, 10, 11, 12

Dalit · 1, 4, 6, 14

Documents · 1, 2, 4, 5, 6, 13, 14

Periodical · 1, 2, 4, 5, 6, 11, 14

Evidence · 3, 4, 6, 11, 12, 13, 14

Preeti Karan Setu Banhal · 5, 6

Preeti Thakur · 5, 6

Bahr (metre) · 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, 12, 13

Children's literature · 5, 6, 14

Language · 1, 4, 5, 6, 11, 13, 14

Language rights · 1, 2

Matla (opening couplet) · 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, 12

Mithila · 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 14

Mithilakshar · 14

Media · 6, 8, 14

Unicode · 6, 14

Theatre · 1

Radif (refrain) · 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, 12, 13

Rukn (metrical foot) · 9, 10, 11

Rubai · 7, 8, 9, 11, 12

Script · 3, 5, 6, 10, 11, 12, 14

Folk songs · 3, 4, 5, 6, 8, 9, 14

Vernacular · 2, 3, 4, 6, 8, 9, 13

Folk memory · 1, 4

Videha · 2, 4, 7, 9, 12, 13, 14

Case endings · 7, 10, 11, 13, 14

Web journalism · 5, 6, 14

Shabd–Arth–Shakti · 8, 9, 10, 11, 12, 13

With References · 7, 10, 12, 13

Editing · 1, 2, 5, 6, 12, 13, 14

Cultural institutions · 1

Dowry · 1
Nabonarayan Mishra · 1
Drama · 1, 3, 4, 5, 6, 8, 14
Women · 2, 4
Justice · 1, 2, 3, 4, 6, 9, 12
Panji (genealogical register) · 3, 4, 5, 6
Journalism · 1, 5, 6, 14
Interviews · 1, 2, 5
Social justice · 3, 5, 6, 9
Literary history · 1, 4, 5, 6, 10, 11, 13
Setusham · 6
Memory · 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 7, 14
Independent Spirit · 2

VIDEHA · MAITHILI LITERATURE

PART II / TOME IX

A Parallel History of Mithila & Maithili Literature

Theatre, Poetics and Literary Criticism

Gajendra Thakur · English translations from original Maithili by the author himself · Videha

CONTENTS

08 NIT NAVAL · Bechan Thakur

09 NIT NAVAL · Kunal

10 NIT NAVAL · Parmeshwar Kapari

11 NIT NAVAL · Virendra Mallick

STUDY 08 / NIT NAVAL

Bechan Thakur

01 / 06

Navghar

Folk Society, Reform, and Theatrical Resistance

The Character of the Collection of Plays

Navghar is a collection of four one-act plays by Bechan Thakur. Published by Pallavi Prakashan, Nirmali (Supaul), it contains Nisha Mukti, Barham Baba, Ghoghvali Kaniya, and Rasun Piyoj. The available edition contains conflicting references to 2018 and 2017; the edition chronology therefore calls for caution.

Each of the collection's four one-act plays constructs its own social situation. Nisha Mukti and Ghoghvali Kaniya unfold across five scenes each, whereas Barham Baba and Rasun Piyoj are based on comparatively extended single scenes. This distinction affects their plots, character development, centres of conflict, and dramatic outcomes.

The forms of the titles also deserve attention. The original printing gives Nisha, Barham, Ghoghvali, and Rasun Piyoj. These vernacular choices are bound up with the works' sounds, the social positions of their characters, and their humour. In critical prose, explanatory expressions equivalent to 'freedom from addiction', 'the veil', and 'garlic and onions' may be used where necessary; replacing the original titles with such synonyms, however, would compromise textual fidelity.

The Conceptual Basis of the Study: Text, Stage, and Society

To treat Maithili theatre solely as a literature of written dialogue would obscure the distinctiveness of Bechan Thakur's dramatic endeavour. His texts contain the practices of the stage: entrances and exits, slogans shouted in unison, songs, physical actions, preparations for public meetings, and gestures that directly address the audience. The plays are therefore examined here on two levels: the written scenes encountered by readers and the potential performances in which actors' timing, pauses, stage design, and audience responses may transform their meanings.

Videha's A Complete Critical Appreciation of Bechan Thakur raises questions of parallel theatre, social representation, and Thakur's dramatic practice. That critical background is useful here, but it would be inappropriate to impose predetermined activist conclusions on every episode of Navghar.

Where the play itself offers concrete means of change, its achievement should be assessed; where characters lose their complexity and become vehicles for pronouncements, its limitations must also be acknowledged. Questions concerning rasa, dialogue, folk character, and social representation in Videha's body of dramatic criticism serve as comparative instruments in this discussion.

This study does not automatically treat dialogue in a play as factual evidence concerning historical events, the success rates of government announcements, or actual audience numbers at performances. What a character says is, in the first instance, a statement within the dramatic world; its external historical verification is a separate matter. Maintaining this distinction is an elementary precaution of textual criticism.

Nisha Mukti: Intoxication, Violence, Popular Education, and Collective Resolve

Scene One: From Family Affection to Insecurity

The first scene opens in Shankar's home. Through the presence of Sunena, Shanti, Chani, Sugar, and Kharban, domestic conversation, and children's play, the narrative initially establishes an ordinary family situation. An objective crisis gradually enters beneath this calm surface. Children's games, the struggle to provide food, the intimacy of a familiar home, and the effects of intoxication are placed alongside one another. In the speech of some characters, violent habits become normalised; this dramatic contrast intensifies the impending crisis.

Scene Two: The Road, the Railway Journey, and the Public Consequences

Between the two scenes, the action moves from the home into the public sphere. Shankar and Kharban's journey outside, the arrival of the student characters Rajiv and Raushan with Meena, the presence of the police, and news of an accident suggest that the social cost of an individual's addiction is not confined to the family threshold. The event does not seem to be fully developed as a visible action onstage; much of it reaches the audience through characters' accounts. The subject consequently expands rapidly, but the dramatic intimacy of lived experience sometimes gives way to informational dialogue.

Scene Three: The Political Language of Prohibition and Moral Reasoning

The third scene is the principal site of public debate. In the conversations of the police characters Kedar Singh and Badri Singh, Shankar, and Kharban, government policy, personal harm, crime, and social conduct are brought into relation. An important turning point occurs when the discussion goes beyond punishment to consider a person's capacity for self-restraint. Badri Singh's statement makes self-control a measure of humanity.

> 'The more the mind remains under control, the richer we shall be in humanity.' (Badri Singh)

This sentence signifies not merely the rejection of addiction but also the ethical importance of self-determination. Yet the idealistic formulation gives insufficient scope to the structural questions of exploitation, unemployment, and medical assistance. The police officer's coherent social counsel can become an effective speech onstage, but the play engages only to a limited extent with arguments against it.

Scene Four: Children's Intervention in a Domestic Crisis

The fourth scene returns to Shankar's home. The child characters, domestic tensions, and emotional appeals to give up drinking create an immediate dramatic problem. Here children are not simply helpless victims: at several points they ask questions and influence decisions. In this respect, the scene could be especially effective for younger audiences. Nevertheless, a sensitive staging of fear, injury, and familial trauma is indispensable when addressing children.

Scene Five: School, Song, and Collective Discipline

The concluding scene turns towards an educational institution and a public-awareness event. Teachers, students, songs, slogans, collective recitation, and public praise make the play's social message explicit. The crisis that had silently spread inside the home has now become a collective programme onstage. Song functions here as a means of popular education that fixes the message in the audience's memory; however, the large cast and repeated slogans demand careful timing in an actual performance.

The distinctive feature of Nisha Mukti is its transition from domestic drama to public theatre. Its limitation is that the final scene is so strongly shaped by the promotional language of an educational campaign that the contradictions of social reality do not fully develop into dramatic conflict. Children's participation increases its potential for young audiences; rather than describing it as an exclusively children's play, it would be more accurate to call it 'a one-act play of social awareness suitable for both young and adult audiences'.

Barham Baba: Faith, Tradition, and the Right to Question

Establishing Place and Situation

Barham Baba is brief in length but sharp in its central idea. The shrine of Barham Baba, ritual objects, a religious gathering of women and men, and Bauku's devotion initially establish a familiar rural religious setting. Budhan's arrival reinforces inherited belief; Phulo gradually begins to question the conditions attached to that belief. The issue is thus not a wholesale denial of religion's existence but the ethical consequences of particular social practices.

The Authority of Class and Caste Within Faith

The disagreement between Bauku and Phulo turns on who may worship, who may perform worship, in whose name exclusion may be practised, and how social humiliation can be presented as a deity's command. The repetition of 'Jai Ganga' and Phulo's counter-questions create two dramatic voices: on one side, the spontaneous devotion of faith; on the other, an insistence that faith must justify itself through questioning. To label Phulo's reasoning mere atheism would be mistaken; her objection defends human dignity.

Phulo's Objection and the Final Acceptance

Phulo does not express her argument in the abstract language of philosophical debate. She speaks through concrete experiences of food, endurance, dignity, her own circumstances, and humanity. One of her sentences forms the emotional centre of the entire work.

> 'I hunger for love and respect.' (Phulo)

In this line, 'faith' is not destroyed; rather, the object of reverence is redefined. At the end, Bauku promises to think again, opening the way to reconsider the arrangements for worship. The play derives its force here from an ethical answer rather than violent retaliation. Its limitation is equally clear: the institutional caste structure underlying Phulo's protest is not explored, and the final solution depends heavily on a character's individual change of heart.

In theatrical terms, the play's few characters, single location, and explicit ideological conflict may make it suitable for street theatre, senior school groups, and small theatre companies. Its questioning spirit is important for young readers, but a presenter would need to explain the implications of socio-religious hierarchy in a context-sensitive way.

Ghoghvali Kaniya: From Domestic Life to Social Reconstruction

Ghoghvali Kaniya is the most extensive one-act play in Navghar. To regard it merely as a play opposing the veil would diminish the work's actual range. Its narrative encompasses family disintegration, rights over food and money, the protection of family members' lives, education, rural reform, women's agency, and collective decision-making at the panchayat level. The veil in the title initially signifies society's control over a woman's private life; her subsequent entry into the full range of social decision-making reverses that symbol.

Scene One: Children, Daughters-in-Law, and Old Age

The scene opens with the family circumstances of Satan and his wife Lalita. Their sons Jitan and Pardeshi, their daughters-in-law Ramdai and Rupvati, the respected community figure Ramrup, and other members of the family debate the division of property, respect for elderly people, and independent living. The ageing body and the accumulated authority of the ageing mind confront one another. This is not simply a struggle between sons and father: it is a dispute over the definition of 'home'. Does a home mean merely living together, or does it require equal respect and a just share for all?

With Rupvati's entrance, an independent female voice in decision-making becomes prominent. She refuses the obligation to accept established family decisions and asks whose interests those decisions serve. How equally are the recognition, labour, and service of every family member valued? This question moves the first scene beyond ordinary domestic quarrelling towards the consideration of social ethics. Rupvati's initiative becomes the principal force driving the story forward.

Scene Two: From Compassion to a Written Agreement

The second scene displays the courage to translate family relationships into practical rules. In the presence of Vishnudev, Ramprasad, Satan, and Pardeshi, the relatives consider an extensive proposal. The printed proposal contains twenty-two points, addressing fields and farmland, housing, support for elderly parents, mutual visits, financial arrangements, personal service, regular care, and assistance in times of crisis. A written agreement becomes a concrete instrument of social reform.

> 'Let the two brothers take half the fields and farmland each.' (First clause of the agreement)

The advantage of this list within the narrative is that moral expectations acquire the explicit language of rights and responsibilities. Dramaturgically, however, reading out twenty-two points without interruption presents a serious problem: the plot stops, and the stage can begin to resemble the minutes of a meeting. As a written text, the list creates documentary realism; in performance, the clauses would need to be brought alive through visual groupings, conflicting positions, and reactions.

After the agreement, the characters' language of acceptance becomes central.

> 'I have no objection. I agree.' (Jitan)

Through this method of obtaining consent, the play imagines a miniature domestic form of deliberative democracy. Yet in actual life the division of land and care of elderly people are not resolved by agreement alone. The play's treatment of law, registration, compliance with obligations, and the balance of power is extremely limited. This limitation should be understood not as the historical failure of the text but as a feature of its utopian reformist character.

Scene Three: Children's Imagination, Education, and the Right to Play

In the third scene, relationships between generations change through Jitan, Ramdai, Satan, Lalita, and Shashi. Particular emphasis falls on children's play, free time, thirst for knowledge, artistic creation, and freedom of expression. Between the courtyard, school, conversation, and adults' instructions, the child's mind seeks a place of its own. This section connects the collection most concretely with questions of children's literature.

Satan warns against coercion in matters of children's play and education. He supports the possibility of developing knowledge without repression. The scene suggests that it is wrong to regard a child merely as the prototype of a future wage-earning adult: curiosity, imagination, and independent experience in the present are valuable in themselves.

As the play's discussion of education expands, however, the dialogue sometimes becomes a speech dominated by reasoning. When children ask questions themselves, the scene comes alive; when adult characters continually deliver lessons on their behalf, the child's independent dramatic voice weakens. This distinction requires particular attention in school performances.

Scene Four: A New Female Voice and the Meaning of Home

The fourth scene begins with a private conversation between Pardeshi and Rupvati. Rupvati raises questions about contemporary ways of life, her public identity, respect for domestic work, and unthinking household traditions. She is unwilling to accept an existence restricted to the role of an invisible housewife.

> 'I am no ordinary woman.' (Rupvati)

It would be a mistake to dismiss this assertion of self-worth as mere vanity. It demands the right to an identity. Nonetheless, a critical question arises: does Rupvati's modernity sometimes become confined to signs of clothing, appearance, and social display? The fact that her dramatic challenge is linked to concrete economic and political activity helps counterbalance this potential weakness.

The fourth scene continues to debate domestic rights, the condition of parents-in-law, the family's public image, and women's agency. The play does not offer a convenient moral division between the nuclear and joint family. It allows both to be criticised according to standards of respect, justice, and responsibility. Although some characters undergo psychological change with remarkable speed, the energy of Rupvati's dissent sustains the narrative's vitality.

Scene Five: The Panchayat, Women's Participation, and Public Acceptance

The fifth scene is a collective meeting held in the panchayat building. Matters previously suppressed within the home—family discord, women's participation, and care for the elderly—become subjects of public discussion. The gathering of the sarpanch, Ramprasad, Vishnudev, Rupvati, Pardeshi, and others places the play's ethical objective before society.

Seen as a whole, the work moves from private suffering towards public accountability. Yet in the fifth scene, dramatic conflict is largely absorbed into a meeting for decisions and their endorsement. At times, a succession of recommendations takes precedence over the characters' autonomous voices. This limitation does not invalidate the play's social commitment; it simply shows that accomplishing reform and making drama are not the same thing.

The central importance of Ghoghvali Kaniya is its vision of a navghar, a 'new home', where women, children, and elderly people enjoy rights together with their dignity. The veil of the title symbolises the darkness within the household; Rupvati's activity offers its counter-reading. To strengthen the work dramatically, there is scope to condense the twenty-two-point agreement, lengthy sermons, and numerous character appearances, making interpersonal conflict more embodied and action-driven.

Rasun Piyoj: Inflation, Ridicule, and the Power to Name

The First Debate: From Market Prices to Human Worth

In the fourth one-act play, Raman, Suman, Aman, and Pavan are playing cards. The onlookers Feku, Kailu, Gannu, and Chullai are also present. Feku interrupts the easy entertainment of this opening scene by speaking of rising market prices. The increased cost of garlic and onions serves as an ordinary vernacular measure of economic reality.

> 'Garlic used to cost twenty rupees a kilo; now it has risen to eighty.' (Feku)

Yet words that initially referred to the price of food gradually become an insulting form of address for Feku. Through this transition, the play attacks nicknaming, class contempt, and the violence of collective laughter. A place for idle conversation becomes a stage: when laughter becomes public, it can deprive a person of dignity.

The Structure of Collective Laughter

> The phonetic repetition of 'rasun-piyoj' generates comedy. The characters turn the name into a chant; laughter intensifies, as does Feku's anger. The scene discloses the double nature of humour: laughter can bring people together, but it can also become a weapon of unjust collective action. At the centre of the subject is the legitimacy of the so-called joke: whose suffering does a particular kind of laughter produce?

Feku's assertion of self-respect constitutes the heart of the play.

> 'I am no less than anyone else.' (Feku)

This statement should not be treated as evidence for an entire history of caste or economic class; what is clear is that an ordinary person confronting humiliation declares his equality. His personal resistance to ridicule becomes a test of the moral consciousness of the surrounding community.

Social Judgement and the Ending of the Satire

In the latter part, intervention by neighbours and panchayat figures transforms a private quarrel into a public problem. Rather than developing a collective rejection of the legitimacy of mockery, the play sometimes suggests accepting the nickname as a common social habit. The ending thus poses a moral dilemma: does making a derogatory form of address widespread eliminate the insult, or normalise the social power of humiliation?

On the final page, after a decision has been reached, Feku's name is once again spoken by the crowd. The scene can be read as a happy ending of reconciliation through easy banter; in a critical rereading, however, the victim's consent becomes much more important. The work gains richness if collective laughter is treated not as a moral conclusion but as an unresolved dramatic conflict.

Rasun Piyoj is theatrically effective because of its minimal stage requirements, natural entrances, everyday speech, and recurring nickname. Some long speeches and an externally supplied moral resolution somewhat weaken its satire. For children and adolescents, the text can open dramatic discussion about verbal violence, the limits of teasing one's peers, and self-respect. Without thoughtful discussion from the humiliated character's perspective, however, the laughter onstage may have the opposite effect.

An Interrelated Literary Critique of All Four One-Act Plays

Movements Between Home, Society, and the Public Assembly

All four plays share a common movement: an incident begins in the home or a familiar circle, while its final meaning is determined in public society. In Nisha Mukti, a family's addiction becomes a social campaign; in Barham Baba, private faith becomes a question of social justice; in Ghoghvali Kaniya, a domestic settlement is made public at the panchayat; and in Rasun Piyoj, joking among companions and neighbours becomes a dispute before a public assembly. The assembly is both an institution for resolving problems and a possible site of coercion. The strength of the author's social drama lies in this staging of collective life.

Questioning Characters Versus Characters Who Announce Decisions

Where Phulo, Rupvati, or the child characters ask questions, the dialogue contains genuine dramatic energy. Where police officers, community representatives, or panchayat leaders announce predetermined conclusions, the drama's natural opposition contracts. The greatest dramatic tension in the writer's method lies between these two tendencies: the open process of democratic questioning and the closed result of reformist proclamation.

Vernacular Speech, Repetition, and Phonetic Rhythm

Bechan Thakur's characters speak the unpretentious language of their communities. Devotional utterances in Barham Baba, awareness songs in Nisha Mukti, familial forms of address in Ghoghvali Kaniya, and repeated nicknames in Rasun Piyoj produce distinct aural identities. In this language, voices shaped by experience matter more than polished classical uniformity. Standardising vernacular words would diminish the theatrical rhythm and social implications of many passages.

The Agency of Female Characters and the Limits of Representation

Phulo and Rupvati provide ideological counter-positions; Sunena, Lalita, and other female characters participate in the processes of domestic life, nurture, and change. Their presence is not merely an emotional backdrop. Yet the question of women's rights can acquire sufficient depth only when these characters articulate their own disagreements, economic conditions, and social risks. The reformist consensus in Ghoghvali Kaniya points in this direction, but in many places it still awaits the endorsement of decisions made by men.

Reformist Hope and the Unresolved Complexities of Life

The collection's happy endings reveal the author's commitment to social reform. Nonetheless, alcohol addiction, caste exclusion, the rights of older people, women's autonomy, and social ridicule are problems that cannot be fully resolved by a single speech, written promise, or panchayat ruling. The distance between the play's ethical desire and the difficulties of social processes should remain a central criterion of criticism. Recognising that distance does not diminish the author's purpose; rather, it grounds the work's historical and creative significance in reality.

The Place of Navghar in the History of Maithili Children's Literature: A Comparative Study

Writing a history of children's literature requires an initial distinction between oral literature for infants and modern written drama for children. In Videha, Phulchandra Jha 'Praveen's' Maithili Shishu Lok Sahitya (issue 50, 2010) illuminates traditions of lullabies, games, oral expression, and memories transmitted across generations. Navghar's relation to this background does not establish direct imitation of a source, but rather a shared terrain of popular voices and audience participation. Songs and collective utterances in modern social one-act plays recall the dramatic potential of an older oral tradition.

Yoganand Jha's Maithili Bal-Lokkatha: Sthiti a Apeksha (Videha, issue 76, 2011) and Ramesh Ranjan's article identified by the title Maithili Balnatak Sima Vistar Karait—Chauari (issue 126, 2013) brought children's stories and children's drama into view as distinct critical subjects in the history of Videha's debates on children's literature. Drama is expected to do more than teach lessons; it should give meaningful stage space to children's questions, playfulness, independent decisions, and imaginative perspectives. The four plays in Navghar yield different evaluations when examined against this standard.

The child characters at the beginning of Nisha Mukti and its final school event are useful for young audiences, but the emotional intensity of a railway accident and suffering associated with addiction requires adaptation according to age. Barham Baba can help cultivate the ability to question if its dialogue is presented within a framework of social respect. The child-centred educational thought of the third scene of Ghoghvali Kaniya has particular value for young readers, whereas the long property disputes and panchayat decisions in the remaining scenes may be remote from younger children's immediate experience. Rasun Piyoj is relevant to adolescent concerns with collective laughter, nicknames, and humiliation, provided that its presentation does not obscure the victim's suffering.

Maithili Bal-Upanyasak Samikshashastra (2026), published in Videha, discusses the importance of children's agency, folk memory, social representation, and linguistic formation in the evaluation of children's narratives. While retaining the generic distinction between novels and plays, these criteria can help us examine Navghar: how active are its characters? Does its teaching arise from within the story, or is it imposed from outside? Are children entitled to make decisions, or do they merely listen to adults? These questions have productive consequences for evaluating the plays.

Naty-Navagraha (Videha, issue 447, 2026) offers useful observations on the distinction between children's and adult drama, playfulness in dialogue, direct participation, and thought-provoking stage arrangements. By comparison, the predominant tendency of Navghar is towards adult one-act drama concerned with social problems, although particular scenes contain abundant material suitable for theatre education among children and adolescents. Its appropriate literary-historical designation is therefore a collection of social one-act plays containing meaningful seeds of experimentation in children's theatre, rather than, without evidence, an original model of exclusively children's drama.

Chronology also demands restraint. The available essays on children's literature in Videha document debates in 2010, 2011, and 2013, whereas the available edition pages of Navghar bear both 2017 and 2018. This is insufficient to claim that the work was the 'first' Maithili children's play, the first experiment, or a definitive point of origin. The emergence of a genre and the publication of a particular collection require separate kinds of evidence in literary history.

Theatrical Potential: Performance, Audiences, and Adaptation

Vernacular language is the principal scenic resource of Navghar. Barham Baba and Rasun Piyoj could be staged with limited resources: the first needs a symbolic shrine and ritual objects; the second, a place for playing cards, entrances and exits, and the rhythm of laughter. Refining the rhythm of dialogue in these two plays would sharpen their ideas.

Nisha Mukti requires stage time and resources for changes of location, the railway-related narrative, police entrances, the school group, and songs and slogans. The real challenge is balancing a vivid presentation of tragic events against the declarative ending. In ensemble performance, the safety of children, symbolic treatment of violent incidents, and preservation of the dignity of people suffering from addiction should be priorities.

The five scenes and numerous speaking characters of Ghoghvali Kaniya would require editing for a short production. The twenty-two-point agreement could be made visible through bodily expression, signatures on paper, conflicts of interest, and silent reactions. Yet no dialogue should be removed from quotation of the original or a research-based reading; stage adaptation is a distinct creative undertaking, separate from the source text.

If children perform these works, scenes should be selected according to age group. For children aged ten to fourteen, the dispute over naming in Rasun Piyoj, the counter-questions in Barham Baba, and the educational section of Ghoghvali Kaniya seem more workable. This age recommendation is a critical proposal for practical staging, not a historical fact. Asking the audience after each scene, 'What would you have done?', could turn the play's conclusion away from one-sided instruction towards collective deliberation.

Achievements, Contradictions, and Critical Judgement

Navghar's first achievement is its choice of social situations. The author connects ordinary domestic incidents—meals, children's play, responsibilities among relatives, and jokes about nicknames—to wider questions of rights. Its second achievement is the continuity of vernacular language. A third is its granting of dramatic authority to question to characters such as Phulo and Rupvati. A fourth is the skill with which social assemblies, folk songs, and crowds become part of the narrative structure.

Its chief limitations include the one-dimensionality of certain characters, repeated exposition of the same idea, lengthy readings of agreements, sudden consensus, and excessively rapid resolution of questions of justice. A clear ethical position is not a defect in reformist drama; it becomes one when opponents cease to embody social circumstances and remain mere symbols of ignorance, reducing the complexity of conflict. This problem occurs at several points in the collection.

The limits of folk humour require special consideration. In Rasun Piyoj, it is not enough to see laughter solely as creative energy; one must also recognise how thoroughly a person can be humiliated through naming. Similarly, Barham Baba turns social contempt concealed behind religious devotion into its subject. Taken together, these works yield a larger ethical principle: whether in the name of religion or in the name of a joke, violations of personal dignity should not be treated as normal.

The study therefore regards Navghar as an important example of the Maithili social one-act play, marked by a strong tendency towards parallel theatrical thought and faith in community education. Its excellence lies in the living questions of dialogue, scenes of folk social life, and characters' demands for self-respect; its weakness lies in speeches that predetermine solutions. It is precisely this tension that makes the collection worthy of criticism.

Conclusion

Taken together, the four plays in Bechan Thakur's Navghar disclose four problems in the ethical life of modern Mithila. Nisha Mukti moves from the private and public harms of lack of restraint to popular education; Barham Baba measures faith against human equality; Ghoghvali Kaniya seeks a new settlement between domestic authority and social justice; and Rasun Piyoj questions the humiliation concealed within collective laughter. These works are not merely declarations of reform: they offer many rich possibilities for dramatic debate.

From the perspective of children's literature, the collection occupies a mixed position. Some scenes directly present children's experiences and participation; others centre on adult social institutions and familial responsibilities. Acknowledging this difference is a matter of fidelity to genre. The collection's contribution to the history of Maithili one-act drama lies in the meeting of vernacular language, social justice, and the collective nature of the stage. When documentation of its performances, textual variants, contemporary reviews, and audience experiences becomes available, these conclusions can be examined more specifically.

Selected Voices from the Dialogue

In these brief passages of dialogue, the characters' original voices and dramatic circumstances find particularly forceful expression.

• Nisha Mukti — Badri Singh: 'The more the mind remains under control, the richer we shall be in humanity.'

• Barham Baba — Phulo: 'I hunger for love and respect.'

• Ghoghvali Kaniya — first clause of the agreement: 'Let the two brothers take half the fields and farmland each.'

• Ghoghvali Kaniya — Jitan: 'I have no objection. I agree.'

• Ghoghvali Kaniya — Rupvati: 'I am no ordinary woman.'

• Rasun Piyoj — Feku: 'Garlic used to cost twenty rupees a kilo; now it has risen to eighty.'

• Rasun Piyoj — Feku: 'I am no less than anyone else.'

02 / 06

Betik Apman and Chhinar Devi

Theatre Against Discrimination Against Daughters, Dowry, and Superstition

Introducing the Subject: Literature, Social Problems, and the Responsibility of Theatre

The study of Maithili drama is often confined to printed works and the history of well-known theatre institutions. Regular performances at village level, the participation of male and female students, public productions during Saraswati Puja, and theatrical activity undertaken with limited resources deserve equal importance in literary history. The distinctiveness of Bechan Thakur's collection lies not merely in his construction of plots opposing two social evils. It also lies in his bringing into the plays the shared moral world of rural families, neighbourhoods, panchayats, marriage relations and kinship, ritual healers, priests, and spectators while portraying these problems.

These plays are reformist in outlook, but theirs is not a one-dimensional reformism. Characters sometimes contradict themselves in their own speech; when social values change, old greed assumes a new disguise; and reasoning enters even under the cover of religion. Thus the author's declared message is not identical to the wider meaning generated by the dramatic work. The purpose of this review is neither to turn the author's good intentions into unquestioning praise nor to belittle his community-based theatrical practice on account of inconsistencies in staging. Rather, it is to examine artistic achievements and critical limitations in the light of evidence present in the texts.

The Book and Its Theatrical Context

Betik Apman a Chhinar Devi is a collection of two social plays by Bechan Thakur. The book, published by Shruti Prakashan, includes an introduction by Ashish Anchinhar and the author's own statement, introducing readers to the social questions and rural theatrical experience associated with the work.

The publication details identify 2010 as the year of the first edition, while the introduction refers to the 2011 census. This chronological discrepancy makes it advisable to treat the edition date cautiously.

In his statement, the author explains that his concern in writing Betik Apman was the inferior status assigned to daughters, dowry, and the destruction of female foetuses; Chhinar Devi grew out of experiences of hatred and hostility developing within family relationships under the influence of superstition. He states that he has staged his works every year during Saraswati Puja since 2002 and that most performances have been given by female students. This personal testimony may be regarded as important evidence of the author's theatrical experience; in the absence of independent performance records, however, it would be inappropriate to draw definite statistical conclusions about the number or impact of these productions.

In his introduction, Ashish Anchinhar interprets Chhinar Devi as a play opposing superstition and draws a relationship of question and answer with Harimohan Jha's satirical tradition. In the case of Betik Apman, he considers the preference for sons in Mithila and Haryana to be comparable. The foreword is not merely an encomium to the author; it also expects Maithili theatre of its time to intervene more directly in social matters. It is important to keep the historical and social claims in the foreword separate from evidence furnished by the plays themselves.

Critical Perspective and Generic Differentiation

Five questions guide this study: (a) does a social problem become an event within the plot, or remain mere preaching? (b) what meanings arise from contradictions between the characters' words and conduct? (c) how do stage action, changes of scene, folk melodies, objects, and the presence of groups give meaning to the play? (d) does a woman's voice become her own decision, or remain a moral lesson delivered by men? and (e) to what extent are these works appropriate for young readers and child performers?

Betik Apman is an extended social play in three acts: seven scenes in the first, six in the second, and nine in the third, making twenty-two scenes in all. Chhinar Devi is a one-act play in five scenes. The scene count is based on matching the headings to the scene divisions. The first play follows family life over successive periods, several occasions of marriage, and old age; the second compresses illness, suspicion, accusation, mediation, and dramatic resolution into a shorter time-span. In keeping with their different dimensions, the two plays differ in pace, organisation of dialogue, and stagecraft.

Betik Apman: A Separate Close Reading of Narrative Development Across Three Acts

Act One: From Preference for Sons to the Destruction of a Woman's Body

Scene 1: Desire, Regret, and Economic Calculation

After having three sons, Deepak expresses a desire for a daughter. Veena reminds him of his earlier suggestion that, had the foetus been female, an abortion should have been considered. At the outset, 'desire' becomes a form of moral regret: the absence of the daughter denied a chance of birth is now felt. Calculations of financial benefit and social expenditure are interwoven with love for sons. This marital conversation is more effective than an introductory lecture because the characters themselves bear witness to their past decisions.

> 'I wish I had a daughter. God has already given us three sons.'

Scene 2: Labour, Health, and Veena's Death

Domestic fuel, refreshments for workers in the fields, women's labour, and bodily illness lead from ordinary domestic feeling towards tragedy. Veena raises the physical cost of repeated pregnancies, terminations, and medication; her death then occurs onstage. The play shows its audience that the family's supposed 'protection of sons' sacrifices a woman's life. As drama, death is a means of producing an intense effect, but the representation of medical causation is a literary event and cannot be treated as independent medical evidence.

Scene 3: Self-Interest in Women's Labour Amid Bereavement

The widowed Deepak remembers his wife but soon connects the absence of someone to cook at home with the need for a daughter or daughter-in-law. Pradeep Kumar's advice is sympathetic, yet the risk of imagining a daughter as a provider of domestic services remains. Even after the loss of his wife, the division of labour does not change. The implication is that the crisis of the household is not simply the absence of a woman but also men's distance from domestic work.

Scene 4: Education Versus Domestic Utility

Deepak urges his sons to study, but, confronted with educational expenses and the problem of cooking, he pushes Mohan towards employment and an early marriage. Mohan's wish to continue studying, Sohan and Gopal's aspirations for school, and references to coaching centres reveal the dilemmas of rural education. Gopal's rhythmic speech makes the scene memorable for child performance; it also indicates the social acceptance of schools and facilities such as uniforms and midday meals. Education is an ideal, but the family's immediate economic needs obstruct it.

Scene 5: The Counterpoint of Balvir and Sunita

Balvir's confidence in his two daughters, Manju and Sanju, provides a counterpoint to Deepak's family. What matters is not the number of daughters but their upbringing and education. Sunita's initial desire for a son changes within the dialogue, a symbolic transformation. Nevertheless, the excessive emphasis on becoming 'doctors, engineers, police superintendents, or district collectors' risks turning daughters into instruments of social prestige rather than recognising their own existence. The scene is particularly strong in its concern with children's education and equal rights.

> 'Are daughters in any way inferior to sons?'

Scene 6: Shalini's Family and Class Difference

The poor farmer Harishchandra and Radha have a single daughter, Shalini. At first there is distress over the number of children, but the conversation turns to the ability to provide for them and the ethics of terminating a pregnancy. The challenge of educating a poor daughter emerges here as an independent issue. Balvir's daughters embody the dream of higher education; Shalini's education is a matter of arduous effort. Through these characters, the play suggests unequal opportunities shaped by class, although Shalini's own voice is still seldom heard.

Scene 7: The Return of the Marriage Question

Pradeep's advice to marry Mohan soon and Deepak's interest in possible dowry revive the moral contradiction of the first act. Compassionate regret over the absence of a daughter is translated once more into the search for a bride and the economics of exchange. Here the play's central irony is born: the man who regarded a daughter as an economic burden now treats a daughter-in-law as a solution to domestic problems and a source of dowry profit.

Act Two: The Marriage Market and the Humiliating Language of Dowry

Scene 1: A Surplus of Men Becomes the Plot's Economic Premise

Deepak approaches his friend Mahendra Pandit to find a bride for Mohan. Mahendra's words disclose an excess of young men and a shortage of young women. The consequences of earlier sex discrimination before birth now appear as a collective marriage crisis. The play tries to establish a cause-and-effect relationship between individual choices and their demographic consequences, although the characters' experiences are not equivalent to a quantitative survey.

Scene 2: The Mediation of a Marriage Arrangement

Suresh Kamat becomes the marriage intermediary and raises a proposal involving Balvir's daughter. The scene suggests the social framework in which marriage involves a household, caste and kinship connections, the credibility of an intermediary, and an exchange of familial advantages. Female characters are not at the centre of direct decision-making here; negotiations among men dominate the stage.

Scene 3: Washing Feet and the Performance of Prestige

At the beginning of the marriage negotiations, Balvir's family insists on the ritual washing of feet. A humorous conflict arises between respect for custom and the authority claimed by the groom's side. The insistence upon washing feet, in fact, exposes relations of power expressed in the language of 'respect'. The use of a local custom gives the theatre a distinctive local identity, transforming the episode into action rather than a mere reference to ritual.

Scene 4: The Engagement Ritual, Exchange, and Decisions Made by Men

At Mohan's chheka ceremony, debates among numerous male characters, interruptions, betel and bidis, refreshments, the priest, ritual offerings, and folk songs combine to form the crowded theatrical arrangement of a rural marriage. The author's stage experience is clear here; nevertheless, the large cast, repeated remarks, and extended negotiations also slow the scene. Dowry ceases to be an aspect of emotional relationships and becomes bargaining, until marriage is scarcely distinguishable from commercial exchange.

Scene 5: Marriage Festivities and Satirical Performance

Preparations for the exchange of garlands, parichhan songs, interactions between wedding parties, and Gangaram's exaggerated behaviour create the festive surface of folk theatre. Humour concerning dowry, prestige, and hospitality produces dramatic pleasure, but the bride's missing individuality also creates a void: the wedding is spectacular onstage, while the independent wishes of the woman being married receive little attention.

Scene 6: Unfulfilled Dowry Expectations and Debt

Deepak's resentment at not receiving the expected dowry is the play's decisive irony. He has still not learned the human value of mothers and daughters: his wife is gone, but his greed survives. The burden of debt and signs of illness foreshadow the calamities of the third act. Compassion and ridicule focus on the same character; this mixed effect makes the play's ethical perspective more complex.

Act Three: The Reversal of Dowry and the Dramatic Culmination of Regret

Scene 1: Estrangement from Sons in Old Age

The ailing Deepak experiences neglect at the hands of his sons and daughters-in-law. Mahendra's suggestion that he remarry merely repeats the old social structure instead of offering a solution: once again a woman is needed to provide care. The elderly man's pain is real, but the play also reveals that women's labour has been understood as the sole medium of familial affection.

Scene 2: Married Life in Delhi and Migration

Mohan and Manju's life in Delhi, a letter from the father, and the cost of returning to the village connect the economics of migration with distance from family responsibilities. Manju urges her husband to fulfil his obligations towards his father. In this scene, 'daughter' signifies not merely a numerical category within the family but also moral responsibility, although Manju's independent life remains only briefly developed in the text.

Scene 3: Public Acknowledgement of the Shortage of Girls

Pradeep explains to Deepak the links between dowry, the misuse of prenatal sex determination, and the declining availability of girls. The play makes its causal explanation explicit. Yet the extended speech momentarily leaves the dramatic scene and becomes social instruction. The urgency of the idea is important, but it requires equal discipline in its dramatic form.

> 'Dowry has disturbed the balance of the world and will continue to disturb it.'

Scene 4: The Reversal of Power in Shalini's Marriage Arrangement

The groom's party, arriving in Harishchandra's courtyard, now finds itself in the position of supplicants. The headman Raman Kumar sets the terms of the marriage. The traditional positions of dowry-giver and dowry-recipient are reversed: the match is now settled upon a demand of fifty-one thousand rupees from the groom's family. The reversal produces a dramatic miracle of reform, but not an egalitarian marriage. Changing the direction of payment does not end the objectification of either women or men. The author's criticism emerges through economic satire; readers should not mistake it for a complete model of women's rights.

Scene 5: The Promise of Money and the Halted Exchange of Garlands

The wedding of Shalini, where the exchange of garlands cannot proceed until money has been handed over, becomes a mirror image of the dowry system. The old arrogance of the groom's family now experiences humiliation itself. In categorical terms, this is retaliatory justice—not the abolition of exploitation, but its repetition in reverse. The halted garland ceremony could become an effective stage action, since the audience witnesses the public discomfort of the transaction instead of merely hearing about it.

Scene 6: An Elderly Man's Financial Exhaustion

Deepak's worsening illness, wedding expenses, and continuing dissatisfaction give bodily form to the deterioration caused by social greed. Illness repeatedly serves in the play as a measure of moral punishment. This structure resembles a folk moral tale; contemporary criticism may ask how far the tendency to regard illness as the consequence of wrongdoing accords with modern ethics of compassion and care.

Scene 7: The Search for Gopal's Marriage Match

Returning to Suresh reveals the recurring cycle of marriage arrangements. Deepak has not learned the proper lesson from his encounters with dowry: a new version of scarcity, helplessness, and calculation appears. Repetition sharpens the author's satire, although a more compressed organisation of scenes could have made it still more effective.

Scene 8: Bargaining by the Bride's Side Reaches Its Height

The occasion of Gopal's marriage again introduces a cash transaction and a condition attached to the exchange of garlands. The old language of social prestige returns to the stage in satirical reversal. Marriage customs, the son-in-law's position, and male prestige all become targets of humour. Nevertheless, the work retains an important limitation: a solution supportive of daughters' rights would require education, inheritance, mutual consent, and freedom—not merely a new custom of taking money from the groom's family.

Final Scene: Regret, Sons and Daughters-in-Law, and Death

Family disputes, the arrival of a doctor, and final repentance at the suffering Deepak's deathbed constitute the culmination of the play's moral outcome. Veena's death in the first act and Deepak's at the end together form a circle of familial tragedy. This circle gives the play a didactic conclusion, but collective accusations against the children, illness represented as punishment, and an excessively prolonged death scene sometimes submerge the experience of compassion beneath pronouncement.

Chhinar Devi: A Close Reading of Five Scenes and Their Ideological Conflict

Scene 1: Lalan's Unusual Behaviour and the Arrival of a Ritual Healer

Lalan, the son of Subhash and Meera, behaves in an unstable and aggressive manner. Rather than investigating the cause, the family begins to attribute his conduct to the influence of a spirit or goddess. Sukhal Kiyot, a ritual healer, is summoned; he performs rituals and asks questions but finally admits his inability to help. This admission is an important disruptive moment: the healer is no longer an all-knowing character who possesses a complete solution. Yet the scene offers no clear medical diagnosis of the condition.

Scene 2: Witchcraft Accusations, Family Disintegration, and Resistance

The interpretation of Lalan's conduct turns into an accusation against Sukni, a woman in the family. Rumours gain social force through neighbourhood characters, including Matuk and Raju. Sukni's son Soman resists in order to protect his mother. The possibility of violence, public humiliation, and threats to life in the name of identifying a witch makes this the play's most acute scene. It shows that superstition is not merely a personal delusion but can become a means of destroying relationships and perpetrating mob violence.

Scene 3: Parbatiya's Assumed Divine Persona and Reason

In the character description, Parbatiya Koir is called a psychologist, yet onstage she enters in a trance resembling that of a ritual healer, repeatedly cries 'Bolo Jai Ganga', and assumes the guise associated with Kali and spirit-possession. This double appearance can be understood as an authorial strategy: entering the language of faith in order to break a delusion generated by faith. She reasons against the supposed omnipotence of witches and identifies the accusation as a suspicion of the mind. This is the play's intellectual high point.

> 'Belief in witches is sheer superstition.'

Yet Parbatiya also proposes early marriage as a remedy for Lalan's condition. Here opposition to superstition conflicts with an unsubstantiated expectation that marriage can function as treatment. The very character who seeks to change society's outlook redirects the problem of illness away from medical investigation towards marriage as a solution. Acknowledging the author's reformist intention does not justify concealing this inconsistency.

Scene 4: Anu Anjana, a Temple Wedding, and the Question of Consent

Ghatakraj immediately proposes marriage as the remedy; with the assistance of Vinod Jha, Lalan and Anu Anjana are married at the Kali temple in Amolagachhi. Humour, a small ritual fee, the chanting of mantras, and the impatience of the bride and groom animate the scene. References to Anu Anjana's earlier marriages generate unusual character-based comedy. The critical question, however, is how the marriage of a young man with unstable behaviour, after he has been calmed with medication, should be evaluated in terms of consent, health, and informed understanding. The text does not adequately resolve this question.

Scene 5: Alleged Recovery and Moral Pronouncement

The concluding scene shows Lalan at peace and ends with Parbatiya's words of wisdom. The restoration of harmony in Subhash's household is the author's desired outcome. But the suggestion of a 'complete recovery' immediately after marriage simplifies the complex possible medical causes of unusual behaviour. The expectation of a happy ending in popular performance is satisfied; the realistic analysis of the problem remains incomplete.

> 'Lost in superstition, people drive their lives into an abyss.'

Women's Voices, Patriarchy, and the Limits of Social Reform

Veena is the first powerful voice in Betik Apman. She questions her husband's prioritisation of wealth, dowry, and sons. Her resistance arises from real experiences of bodily labour, the suffering of terminated pregnancies, and self-respect. The tragedy is that, in order to teach society a moral lesson, the plot treats her death as a necessary event. Veena's suffering is powerfully conveyed, but her living resistance is not allowed to remain at the centre of the story for long.

Manju and Sanju mark the possibilities open to educated daughters; Shalini is a daughter deprived of opportunities by poverty; Radha and Sunita express different kinds of social experience. Nevertheless, men generally determine the economic terms of marriage throughout the three acts. The title protests against the humiliation of daughters, but questions concerning girls' wishes, property rights, higher education, and marital autonomy are comparatively underdeveloped. This limitation can be understood in the social context of the period, but criticism should not disguise it as a virtue.

In Chhinar Devi, Sukni is the direct victim of the witchcraft accusation. Parbatiya is an unusual but effective representative of female reasoning, constructing a familiar language of scientific scepticism while disguised as a ritual healer. The play's originality lies in this contradiction. A woman being accused and another woman refuting the accusation at the same time produces social symbolism. Nevertheless, a fuller presentation of Sukni's independent perspective would have exposed the direct human cost of the culture of accusation more clearly.

Dramatic Craft: Vernacular Expressions, Repetition, Humour, Stage Properties, and Performability

The language of Bechan Thakur's dialogue is predominantly rural Maithili. Characters construct their social milieu through expressions such as mal-pani, bhansa-bhat, nañ/nai, gora lagnai, duar, chheka, and samdhi. Here the emotional reality of the plays depends more on the rhythms of vernacular speech than on strictly formal language. Insulting forms of address, repetition, exaggeration, reversals of social prestige, and ritual conversations produce the humour. Dialogue sometimes becomes excessively expansive, but that very expansiveness preserves the collective living speech of the stage.

The stage properties are especially worthy of examination: chairs, water vessels, bowls for washing feet, the ceremonial tray for chheka, bedding, letters, chewing tobacco, the mridanga drum, earth, sacred ash, vessels for a sick person, a wedding pavilion, and cash fees for rituals. These objects are more than signs of village life. They enable actors' movements, waiting, comings and goings, laughter, tension, and processes of public decision-making. Repeated settings such as the house, verandah, courtyard, and temple make these works potentially easy to stage in local theatres with limited resources.

The twenty-two scenes of Betik Apman embrace so many situations that they sometimes resemble a social survey; the narrative centre consequently shifts at times from Deepak's transformation to the technical bargaining involved in marriage. The close sequence of five scenes in Chhinar Devi is relatively concentrated, but carelessness in presenting the causes of Lalan's unusual conduct and constructing humour around Anu Anjana's character may trouble contemporary audiences. Scenes involving threats of violence need to be directed with critical distance.

Comparison of the dramatic endings is also revealing. The first play closes with death and remorse; the second with marriage and peace. One makes a social warning through the punishment of a character, while the other declares the problem resolved through cultural reconciliation. These endings exemplify two distinct techniques of reformist theatre: instruction through fear and instruction through a happy ending.

The History of Children's Literature and Student Theatre: A Comparative Discussion

Generic clarity is essential from the outset: judged by their own texts, Betik Apman and Chhinar Devi are family-centred social plays primarily concerning adults. A work does not automatically become children's literature because children or students perform it. The identity of children's literature depends on children's experiential perspectives, narrative accessibility, emotional suitability for their age, imagination, opportunities to question, pleasure, and the context of presentation. On this basis, it is appropriate to give Bechan Thakur's work particular importance in the history of 'community theatre involving children', but it would be wrong to include it in a strictly generic catalogue of children's plays without qualification.

Videha's book repository makes Dhurta-Samagama and other older plays available as records of earlier Maithili theatrical traditions. Thakur's affinity with these traditions is to be sought not in Sanskrit-oriented dramatic forms but in the humorous exposure of social pretence, ritual, and absurdity. Earlier farce makes the ostentation of religious authority an object of irony; in Chhinar Devi, the language of the ritual healer is turned into a vehicle for reason opposed to superstition. This is a comparative suggestion, not a historical claim of direct influence.

The contemporary Maithili Bal-Upanyasak Samikshashastra, published in Videha, proposes various criteria for young readers, including aesthetic experience, appropriateness, narrative structure, and linguistic simplicity. On these criteria, Thakur's plays possess the strengths of immediately intelligible vernacular language, song and dialogue, theatrical action, and social questioning. Yet episodes involving termination of pregnancy, death, violent threats of witchcraft accusations, and marriage transactions cannot be considered suitable for younger children without educational adaptation. For older student performers, however, the texts can certainly provide a basis for discussing consent, health, gender justice, and superstition.

A comparative review of Dr Amarendra's Angika Bal-Sahitya, published in Videha, views the history of writing for children as an extended cultural genealogy, from lullabies, play songs, riddles, and stories to one-act plays of the modern era. From this perspective, Thakur's student performances bridge written drama and the oral culture of the community. Even so, the generic histories of Angika and Maithili literature are not identical; the comparison here is restricted to the cultural medium of performance by children.

Videha's series Maithili Natyamanch/Natak Lel Ekta Samiksha Siddhant and contemporary critical materials such as Natya-Navagraha provide a basis for locating dramatic meaning not only in printed dialogue but also in performance, audience relationships, and structures of social power. Information about performances by female students and festive village staging in Thakur's practice is important in this respect: it reveals a shared domain of school education and popular participation within the history of dramatic literature. The available information does not, however, permit the reconstruction of a year-by-year history of the plays performed, numbers of actors, or actual audience responses. [5–6]

Possibilities and Limitations from the Perspective of Children's Theatre

In the study of children's theatre, the relationship between a work and its performance operates in both directions. If students perform a serious story, acting can develop confidence in public speaking, pronunciation, memory, solidarity, and the capacity for social dialogue. But when the social philosophy of the text concerns traumatic experiences beyond the actors' ages, teachers and directors need to understand the sensitivity of those situations. Veena's physical suffering, threats of violence against Sukni, and the question of consent to marriage particularly demand child-sensitive discussion. Unless such distinctions are considered properly, the category of 'children's drama' may expand until it becomes meaningless.

Moral Outcomes and Critical Achievements: Four Comparative Conclusions

First, the roots of social crisis in both plays lie in collective attitudes. Behind individual decisions about pregnancy shaped by discrimination against girls is the economic ideology of dowry; behind individual fears that produce witchcraft accusations lie neighbourhood pressure, kinship, and invented forms of authority. This shared structure makes the inclusion of both plays in one book meaningful.

Second, both plays seek to teach through consequences: a woman's death and an old man's regret in Betik Apman, Parbatiya's reasoning and a happy ending in Chhinar Devi. But overly simple depictions of causation sometimes diminish the complexities of actual social life. Contemporary restaging of subjects such as abortion, mental health, and domestic violence should be non-discriminatory, centred on victims, and sensitive to evidence.

Third, the playwright's most successful technique is the creation of a 'speaking society'. The stage does not belong to one protagonist's monologue: it is filled with the voices of uncles, maternal uncles, neighbours, headmen, children, healers, priests, brides and grooms, doctors, and women of the household. Social incongruity is exposed through this many-voiced world. Repetition, extended bargaining, and excessive moral instruction, however, sometimes blunt the subject's edge.

Fourth, although women's emancipation is a major ethical strength of the plays, the question remains incompletely realised within them. The demand that daughters not be killed is an essential beginning for women's right to life, but literary examination must then consider women's own rights over marriage, education, inheritance, their bodies, health, and decisions. The teaching of reason in Chhinar Devi will likewise be complete only when respectful mental-health care and marital consent become central to the narrative alongside the repudiation of witchcraft accusations.

Ideological Echoes in Dialogue

These passages concentrate the tensions surrounding family decisions, the position of women, and the contradictions of reformist thought.

> 'I wish I had a daughter. God has already given us three sons.'

Character: Deepak; Betik Apman, Act One, Scene One.

> 'Are daughters in any way inferior to sons?'

Character: Balvir; Betik Apman, Act One, Scene Five.

> 'Dowry has disturbed the balance of the world and will continue to disturb it.'

Character: Pradeep; Betik Apman, Act Three, Scene Three.

> 'Belief in witches is sheer superstition.'

Character: Parbatiya; Chhinar Devi, Scene Three.

> 'Lost in superstition, people drive their lives into an abyss.'

Character: Subhash; Chhinar Devi, Final Scene.

Conclusion

Betik Apman a Chhinar Devi should be regarded as an important work of social reformist theatre rooted in Mithila's village society. Its literary strength lies in its closeness to lived experience, colloquial Maithili, the theatrical potential of folk customs, accessible humour, effective exposure of women's suffering, and public opposition to violence born of superstition. The plays do not merely oppose two different social evils; both show them as consequences of a shared collective ignorance and unequal distribution of power.

Alongside these strengths, the limitations are clear: amid declarations about education, women's autonomous voices remain restricted; the reversal of financial transactions takes precedence over the abolition of dowry; and the tendency to regard marriage as a cure for illness contradicts scientific understanding. For this reason, the plays' concluding moral pronouncements cannot be exempted from critical questioning. This does not lessen Bechan Thakur's importance; it makes it more historically specific, for his theatrical world records both our society's desire for change and its contradictions.

In literary histories of writing for children, the collection is more appropriately situated in the context of Maithili community theatre involving students than categorised solely as children's drama proper. The stage contributions of female students recorded in the author's statement and earlier publications in Videha establish this connection. While preserving the limits of what the available records can support, the most useful future task for theatrical history would be to collect original scripts, performance versions, interviews with actors, production dates, and audience recollections.

03 / 06

Bap Bhel Pitti and Adhikar

From Oppressive Fatherhood to Citizens' Rights

Introducing the Two Works

Bechan Thakur's Bap Bhel Pitti a Adhikar is a paired volume of plays published by Shruti Prakashan, Delhi, in 2012. The first play develops children's conflict within the family across three acts; the second raises issues of citizens' rights, housing assistance, and resistance to corruption.

The Dramatic Vision: A Shared Principle in Both Plays

The protagonists of both works stand outside the centres of power and resources. In the first, Manoj and Santosh are children deprived of rights within their own home; in the second, Manjur is a poor citizen rendered helpless before village administration. In the first, the language of humiliation begins at home and closes the doors of school; in the second, it begins with the distance between a chair and the floor and spreads towards the door of the state. This similarity makes the publication of these plays together a meaningful critical unit.

Their structural difference is nevertheless fundamental. The first play follows an emotional and ethical journey across three acts, through domestic opposition, song, an accident, success, and reunion. The second constructs a civic campaign in fifteen scenes, moving from applications to offices and from offices to public recognition. This contrast clarifies two approaches to social reality: changing minds through compassion and changing institutions through rights.

Bap Bhel Pitti: Narrative, Characters, and Three-Act Structure

Making the father's failure central to the title is critically significant. Lakhan's first wife has died; his sons Manoj and Santosh are still children. After he decides to remarry, the new wife Meena privileges her own children, while the sons of the first marriage struggle for fair shares of food and education. The title's concern is not simply 'a stepmother's cruelty' but also the father's moral passivity.

As a counter-narrative, Ramlal's household emerges, initially showing two wives, children, and mutual cooperation living together. This parallel home is not intended as the author's comprehensive survey of reality but as a dramatic model for comparison: in one household resources are divided unequally; in the other, collective care is idealised. The contrast is attractive, but it should not be mistaken for a sociologically universal picture of the ideal family.

Act One: From the Decision to Marry to the Beginnings of Discrimination

Scene 1: Concerned about raising his two sons, Lakhan considers a second marriage. Bauhu's warning introduces the dangers of step-relationships. The seeds of future disaster are sown here, because the children's clear consent or wishes never become questions in the adults' decision.

Scene 2: Madan's home becomes the setting for negotiations over the marriage alliance. Kinship, the intermediary's assurances, and pressure for an early wedding give the drama the momentum of customary marriage arrangements. The woman's concerns remain secondary; here marriage is a device of the plot rather than an account of the woman's own life.

Scene 3: At the wedding in the Shiva temple, the questions of Manoj and Santosh, expectations of music and dancing, and the priest's preoccupation with his fee generate humour. The children's humour puts adult customs on trial, while the question of ritual payment satirises the economics of religious ceremony.

Scene 4: The introduction to Ramlal, Lakshmi, and Santoshi's household portrays a united family devoted to education. Their straightforward arrangement for paying school fees establishes a sharp contrast with the educational deprivation that will emerge in Lakhan's family.

Scene 5: The headman Ramakant and ward member Baldev arrive to discuss housing assistance. The financial exchange provides an early image of the state's presence in rural life; the episode may be read as an indirect foreshadowing of the housing-scheme problem in the companion play Adhikar. This is an intertextual interpretation, not a declared authorial plan.

Scene 6: During play with her own son and daughter, Meena treats her stepsons differently. Krishna's question—why children of the same father should be treated unequally—is an important moment of children's sense of justice. Here a child makes an ethical judgement independently.

Act Two: The Denial of Children's Rights and Extraordinary Resistance

Scene 1: In Ramlal's household, a quarrel begins over food involving the unwell Soni and Santoshi. Lakshmi intervenes, and Ramlal establishes harmony. The playwright turns a crisis in the joint household into a rapid resolution; this idealisation assists comparison but reduces psychological complexity.

Scene 2: Manoj and Santosh ask to be enrolled in school. Lakhan withdraws, pleading financial inability, while Meena arranges schooling for her own children. The two boys are eventually beaten and driven away. This is the play's ethical centre: two standards of education within one household.

Scene 3: After leaving home, Manoj and Santosh receive food and sympathy from Radha. She becomes their first social refuge in rebuilding their lives and encourages them not to abandon their studies. The play creates an alternative set of human relationships beyond the home.

Scene 4: The brothers plan to beg by singing folk songs to the rhythm of plates and metal vessels. Their private humiliation becomes public song; their decision to spend the money they receive on education rather than private comforts constitutes a declaration of self-discipline with political implications.

> 'First, my boy, make arrangements for your studies.' — Manoj

Scene 5: With Manoj and Santosh absent, the unequal power within Meena and Lakhan's relationship becomes clear. Meena takes pride in her children's school achievements, but the results do not meet her expectations. The plot shows that money and favouritism cannot guarantee academic success.

Scene 6: The railway-station scene marks a leap in time. A bus accident during a school excursion costs Manoj an arm and Santosh his sight. Santosh's song joins together the loss of home, the struggle for education, and disability. The resulting suffering gives the narrative a dense tragic feeling, although the presentation of realistic causation is sharply compressed.

> 'Blind now, I could not study.' — From Santosh's song

Act Three: Failed Arrogance, Achievement, and Reconciliation

Scene 1: Lakhan performs household labour, while Meena has high expectations for the examination results of her two children. When Rampari and Krishna fail, Meena decides to stop their education. Schooling here becomes not a right but a privilege dependent on competitive success.

Scene 2: The family's happy response to children's examination results in Ramlal's household presents education as a shared delight. The scene sharply reverses the punitive response to results in Lakhan's household.

Scene 3: Santosh continues to sing folk songs at the railway station, while Manoj returns with news of his success in the administrative services. His acknowledgement of his younger brother and the people who helped him is a moment of moral reciprocity in the story's structure.

> 'I shall remain grateful to him all my life.' — Manoj

Scene 4: The appearance of the impoverished Ramlal at the collector's residence, and his meeting with Santosh, bring administrative prestige together with the social needs of the poor. Differences in identity, identification documents, and relationships of service create a new equation of human relations onstage.

Scene 5: Manoj and Santosh consider marriage proposals. In judging between a woman in a high-ranking position and one with comparatively fewer formal qualifications, the characters reason about prestige, household relationships, and family closeness. Their evaluations are not free of gendered expectations.

Scene 6: Manoj and Soni's marriage at the Kali temple joins strands of the family plot. Comparison with the wedding in the first act suggests that ideals of social trust and mutual respect have advanced, although the resolution of the marriage episode is exceptionally rapid.

Scene 7: Meena's illness and Lakhan's helplessness reverse the balance of domestic power. Those children's voices that were suppressed are remembered in their absence as the family again falls into distress. The portrayal of illness risks turning it into a moral instrument of punishment.

Scene 8: Humorous exchanges at the collector's residence and the presence of Virbhadra introduce a lighter rhythm into administrative life. Talk of returning to the village moves the narrative towards an anticipated reunion, though some of the humour distracts attention from the work's central questions of children's rights.

Scene 9: Manoj and Santosh arrive at Lakhan's home when Meena is gravely ill. Although the memory of past humiliation remains, they insist that she receive treatment. The scene constructs an ethical choice between revenge and care.

Scene 10: Medical assistance, blood matching, surgery, and recognition of relationships in the hospital bring the plot to a close. Manoj assists with treatment, and Meena's remorse emerges. The emotional happy ending of forgiveness conveys a social message, but the question of structural redress for the violence suffered by the children remains unanswered.

Central Critical Questions of the First Play

The passivity of fatherhood. On the surface, Meena resembles an unmistakable antagonist, but Lakhan's actions require re-examination. He does not intervene decisively to secure his sons' admission to school; after they are driven out, he does not properly investigate their whereabouts; and he submits to the other authority within the family. The play's real indictment is therefore not directed at a woman alone but at fatherhood that evades moral responsibility. The title supports this reading.

Children's agency. Manoj and Santosh are not passive objects of pity. Excluded from their own home, they create songs, seek help from the public, deliberate over the use of their money, and make education their first priority. The work is consequently an important document of children's experience. Yet the question arises whether a narrative that leaves children to beg for the opportunity to study might, if treated merely as an inspirational success story, conceal the failure of social protection systems.

A critique of disability. After the bus accident, Manoj's loss of an arm and Santosh's blindness abruptly intensify the play's suffering. Santosh's song draws public sympathy, and his efforts to ensure that his brother continues studying constitute a positive form of agency. Yet his swift abandonment of opportunities for his own education needs criticism. Stage adaptation could introduce questions of independent educational possibilities and accessibility. Disability must not be made merely an object of pity: this is an essential criterion for a modern rereading of the text.

Imbalance in the female characters. Meena is largely rendered as one-dimensional cruelty, Lakshmi and Santoshi as harmony, Radha as service, and Soni as affection. This division sharpens theatrical contrast but gives little scope to the social pressures, psychological alternatives, and economic autonomy of women. The difficulties of step-relationships should therefore be understood within the structure of family power rather than attributed wholesale to the nature of women.

The question of medium. Across the third act, the narrative makes a great leap from the opening school scenes to success in the administrative services. Signals of passing time are comparatively few; songs, repetition, and symbolic entrances connect events. Here the dramatic craft chooses the swift sense of justice characteristic of folk theatre over the careful progression of realism.

Adhikar: A Civic Drama in Fifteen Scenes

The protagonist of Adhikar, Manjur, is a rickshaw puller afflicted by a flood-damaged shelter, meagre earnings, and corrupt practices of rural authority. Headman Chandan and his associate Amarnath demand a bribe for housing assistance. An ally named Vinod helps Manjur with applications. Manjur accepts the need to approach block, subdivision, district, political, and information-commission authorities. The narrative concludes with newspaper coverage, a public ceremony of honour, and the headman's repentance.

The title Adhikar ('Right') signifies more than a demand for personal benefit. Manjur's experience asks who will close the gap between a written welfare scheme and practical access to it. In this play, a right is not merely a legal term; it is the citizen's courage to speak, capacity to demand evidence, and ability to refuse humiliation. Yet the unusually brief response periods mentioned in the play's applications and its descriptions of institutional procedures should be understood as dramatic representations, not as legally verified rules.

A Scene-by-Scene Examination

Scene 1: In headman Chandan's verandah, Manjur sits on the ground and regards the chair as a symbol of high office. The demand for a five-thousand-rupee bribe out of a twenty-thousand-rupee housing grant exposes the injustice of power. The distance between chair and floor is the play's first effective visual metaphor.

Scene 2: In conversation with Vinod, Manjur first discovers a practical legal course of action. Although he is not literate, he understands the moral legitimacy of his claim. By preparing written applications, Vinod bridges the gap between literacy and rights.

Scene 3: In his first written petition to the headman, Manjur requests both housing assistance and information. Chandan's ridicule stages institutional despotism. Manjur's resistance now changes from supplication into a written challenge.

Scene 4: Vinod prepares applications for the BDO, SDO, and DM. The administrative hierarchy becomes a kind of staircase within the play: each new door increases both hope and fear.

Scene 5: At the block development office, the petition is disregarded. The action of throwing an application into the rubbish is an exact visual image of contempt for rights on paper. The conflict becomes one between official language and living hunger.

Scene 6: Repeated journeys to the subdivision office make visible the continuing cost in labour of seeking justice. For an already poor citizen, leaving daily work to visit offices is itself a punishment. The scene thus suggests the economic dimension of an administrative journey.

Scene 7: Before Collector Chandrakant at the district headquarters, Manjur's petition also fails to produce the desired result. The conduct of lower-level employees and neglect from above together reveal institutional insensitivity. The object of criticism is no longer one office's mistake but a succession of failures across the system.

Scene 8: Exhausted after fifteen days, Vinod initially advises him to concede defeat, but Manjur wishes to continue. The protagonist's patience here confronts his companion's sense of practical reality.

Scene 9: A meeting with Shyamanand opens the way to a petition before the information commissioner. The role of a popular intermediary in securing justice is shown; yet dependence on the sudden intervention of a 'good leader' partially transfers the critique of institutions onto individual goodwill.

Scene 10: Scarcity in Manjur's household, his wife Najima's worries, insufficient travel money, and a handful of puffed rice constitute the real economic ground of his civic movement. This is one of the most poignant scenes because the administrative procedure is connected to hunger at home.

Scene 11: In the information commissioner's office, Manjur's efforts receive praise. Journalists make his story public. A private grievance thus becomes a public example of citizenship, although the narrative does not detail a decisive official order.

Scene 12: The attention of media representative Akhilesh turns towards Manjur. The press constructs his story as that of an extraordinary citizen. Publicity is a motivating force in the play, but the distance between success in the headlines and real institutional reform needs examination.

Scene 13: The preparations for Manjur's family to travel to Delhi include children's lively questions and domestic humour. Conversations involving Najima, Salma, and others reveal the collective delight of a civic achievement, although women's independent consciousness of rights receives limited attention.

Scene 14: Manjur receives an award at a ceremony in Delhi. His speech raises the question of the public's participation in the birth and nurture of corruption. This is the play's intellectual climax, although the speech of praise becomes prolonged and diminishes dramatic confrontation.

Scene 15: The headman arrives offering the twenty-thousand-rupee assistance and an additional five thousand from his own funds. Manjur first rejects money acquired illegitimately, then makes public good conduct the condition of forgiveness. Vinod's concluding statement connects education with the prevention of corruption.

> 'I do not want ill-gotten money.' — Manjur
>
> 'Victory to Hind! Victory to India!! Victory to Education!!!' — Final exclamation

The Craft and Heroism of Adhikar

The making of a democratic protagonist. Manjur's distinctive quality lies not in higher education, economic power, or inherited prestige but in his determination not to abandon a just demand. From the first scene to the last, his linguistic diffidence diminishes. Initially, he does not consider himself entitled to sit in a chair; at the end, he takes a promise from society that everyone will be treated well. This gradual acquisition of self-respect is the play's most convincing internal progression.

Records, applications, and stage objects. Papers, files, petitions, chairs, security gates, and ceremonial garlands are not merely decorations in this play; they are tangible signs of power. Chandan's chair and Manjur's place on the floor, the officer's file and the application thrown into the rubbish, and finally the garland placed on a citizen—all these stages transform meaning through objects. The method is useful for theatre with limited resources.

The ethics of mediation. Without Vinod, Manjur's struggle would not have advanced so far. This cooperation raises a question about the civic rights of people who cannot read or write: beyond being constitutionally established, rights require the practical ability to prepare written applications. Yet Vinod's assistance does not erase the protagonist's independence; Manjur himself makes the final decisions and endures the journeys and hardships.

Religious and social plurality. Domestic scenes involving Manjur, Najima, and their children, alongside the presence of Vinod, Shyamanand, and the officials, place the drama on the common ground of citizenship. Characters' names certainly suggest cultural diversity, but the work's central conflict is not communal; it is economic, class-related, and administrative. This analysis does not make unverified assumptions about caste or community beyond what the text establishes.

The limits of the happy ending. After the initial failures of the officials, journalism, an award, and the headman's rapid repentance make all the problems appear resolved. This is the structure of moral victory in folk drama. Yet important questions remain about its cost: what became of the administrative status of the application? What process followed the bribery complaint? Did the experiences of other people change? The play is relatively silent about these institutional answers.

Dialogue, Compassion, and Resistance

Selected dialogue from the two plays reveals distinct forms of familial compassion and civic resistance. At decisive moments, the characters' words intensify the dramatic meaning.

The words 'First, my boy, make arrangements for your studies' show the child protagonist's priorities in spending money. 'Blind now, I could not study' turns a personal account into the pain of separation from the wish to learn. Read together, they make clear both the importance of education and how unrealised the desire may remain when the means of access are destroyed. Manoj's acknowledgement of Santosh as the source of his success forms an ethical axis of reciprocity.

In Adhikar, 'I do not want ill-gotten money' expresses the protagonist's distinction between the purpose of state assistance and improper personal advantage. 'Victory to Hind! Victory to India!! Victory to Education!!!' finally translates the discourse of civic rights into a collective ideal centred on education. Dramaturgically, however, the closing slogan also risks narrowing the multiplicity of meanings in dialogue to a one-dimensional lesson.

Comparative Contexts in the History of Children's Literature

A decision about whether a work belongs to children's drama must consider not only its subject but also its intended readers, linguistic complexity, performance length, representation of violent scenes, child characters' activity, and young audiences' capacity to absorb emotional distress. Children occupy the centre of Bap Bhel Pitti, and some episodes may be adapted for children's theatre. Yet the complete three-act play deals at length with adult marriage, domestic violence, begging, a serious accident, medical treatment, and the happy ending of marriage. To declare it unambiguously a play exclusively for children would therefore be generically inaccurate. In Adhikar, children are supporting characters; the principal focus is campaigning for rights and administrative conduct.

Videha's available reference materials provide a historical background to this distinction. Phulchandra Jha 'Praveen's' Maithili Shishu Lok Sahitya (Videha, issue 50, 2010) and Yoganand Jha's Maithili Bal-Lokkatha: Sthiti a Apeksha (issue 76, 2011) make children's oral traditions objects of study. Durganand Mandal's Nena Lel Sundar Chitrakatha (issue 116, 2012) is evidence of discussion concerning children's visual worlds. Explicit entries for these essays are available in Videha's archives, but detailed arguments from unavailable original essays have not been attributed to their authors here.

Videha's 2012 report on Sagar Rati Dip Jaray contains notice of the launch of this book by Bechan Thakur. The same report also mentions Bal Mandali/Kishor Jagat, Videha Shishu Utsav, and other dramatic works. It thus offers evidence of a contemporary publishing environment containing both children's and adolescents' literature and adult social drama. It cannot, however, determine from a single report the 'first' or 'largest' achievements across the whole history of Maithili children's literature.

A critical entry titled Maithili Balnatak Sima Vistar Karait—Chauari, by Ramesh Ranjan (Videha, issue 126, 15 March 2013), identifies children's theatre as a distinct object of study. In 2026, Gajendra Thakur's Maithili Bal-Upanyasak Samikshashastra (Videha, issue 447) expands questions of children's agency, social perspectives, and appropriateness. Natya-Navagraha, in the same issue, provides a useful comparative basis for thinking about the differences between children's and adult drama. These studies were published after the 2012 plays; their concepts are therefore applied here as later critical criteria, not as the playwright's declared intentions at the time.

Childhood Experience and Civic Experience: Comparative Criteria

The first criterion is the child's right to speak. In Bap Bhel Pitti, Krishna asks his mother why children of the same father face discrimination; Manoj and Santosh demand school admission and make decisions of their own beyond merely receiving readers' sympathy. In Adhikar, Manjur is an adult, but his applications likewise tell the story of a humiliated human being recovering his voice. Both plays can serve civic education, though the different forms of children's and adults' experiences must remain distinct.

The second criterion is song and participation onstage. The public-singing scene in the first play may be particularly suitable for children's and adolescents' theatre because it unites speech, rhythm, a collective audience, and a demand for justice. In the second, reading applications, passing through office doors, and public recognition are the principal stage actions. Short educational adaptations are possible on this basis, but the intended audience of the complete plays does not automatically change.

The third criterion is the presentation of suffering. For young audiences, expulsion from home, violence, accidents, and disability must be staged with sensitivity and age-appropriate visual planning. The task is not to diminish the suffering of the work's original reality but to exercise care over the degree and viewpoint of its representation. Making drama a one-way vehicle for moral lessons can reduce children's own right to ask questions.

Rasa, Language, Stagecraft, and Folk Society

Compassion and resistance. In Bap Bhel Pitti, the sources of karuna rasa, the aesthetic emotion of pathos, are children's hunger, rejection, and the accident. Their song turns private sorrow into collective compassion. Success in the third act introduces heroic enthusiasm and the tranquillity of reconciliation. In Adhikar, resistance grows out of initial destitution;

Manjur's successive campaigns through files and applications create a popular civic form of heroic rasa.

Humour and satire. Wedding rituals, the priest's fees, children's lively speech, Virbhadra's mixed language, and humour surrounding the journey to Delhi punctuate the plays' serious themes. Yet some jokes become excessively long and reduce characters to vehicles for comic business. Greater discipline of form could sharpen both dramatic momentum and social criticism.

Linguistic diversity. Rural Maithili underlies the dialogue, while administrative vocabulary, Hindi-influenced expressions, English titles, and Sanskrit-derived mantras move through it. This mixture should not be judged according to a simplistic binary of 'pure' and 'impure', but read in relation to characters' class, profession, situation, and irony. Original spellings are preserved in quotations in the Maithili study, while its critical prose is presented in standard Maithili.

The practicalities of staging. Verandahs, roads, schools, stations, hospitals, offices, and ceremonies create numerous locations. In low-budget productions, a fixed bench and chair, lighting changes, and sound cues could signal changes of place. The hospital and accident in the first play and the public Delhi ceremony in the second, however, require additional theatrical adaptation. A dramatic text must not be assumed to be the same as a successful performance.

Conflicts, Contradictions, and Critical Limitations

1. Idealisation of the family: Ramlal's family is a valuable point of comparison, but its very easy reconciliation diminishes the real depth of serious domestic conflicts. Conversely, Meena's virtually uninterrupted negativity makes the antagonist flat.

2. Justice through achievement: Manoj's success in the administrative services is constructed as historical compensation for the children's suffering. Yet countless deprived children do not attain high office; their rights are no less important. The ethics of educational justice are broader than rewards based on achievement.

3. Life with disability: Santosh's continuation of education after becoming blind is uncertain. The establishment of self-respect through service to his brother is moving, but independent resources, education, and public accessibility require fuller treatment.

4. Gender assumptions: Meena's exclusively negative portrayal, the centrality of marriage and service in the construction of female characters, and the predominance of the ideal-wife image deserve critical attention. Including women's alternative perspectives would increase the story's social capacity.

5. Procedural representation of rights: Adhikar simplifies the provisions governing the right to information for dramatic purposes. It should therefore be understood as a cultural text fostering awareness of rights, not as a verified model of a legal application. If research turns to legal history, separate official records must be examined.

6. Resolution through personal honour: Manjur's award and the headman's apology provide the reassurance of a happy ending, but are insufficient measures of systemic reform. The play could have given greater scope to collective monitoring and public accountability as lasting forms of resistance to corruption.

7. Extended explanatory dialogue: In the second play, the length of application forms and final speeches sometimes produces declarative addresses rather than active drama. Selective editing for performance could improve the pace while retaining the original arguments.

Videha's Contemporary Context and the Place of the Text

In the original volume, editor Gajendra Thakur comments extensively on Bechan Thakur's theatrical practice, rural theatre, and the critical environment of Maithili drama. This commentary is not dialogue from the author's plays but an independent editorial paratext within the volume. It contains claims about the social context of Adhikar and institutional inequalities in contemporary theatre; research should read these as editorial perspectives.

Videha's 2012 report of the book launch offers external evidence of the work's circulation at the time. On this basis, it is reasonable to say that the book was present on a public literary platform as well as in print. The available evidence alone cannot establish the venues, number, audience demographics, or responses of all performances; separate production records would be required.

Conclusion

The overall achievement of Bap Bhel Pitti a Adhikar is its transformation, within the language of Maithili theatre, of the pain and resistance of people without rights into public scenes. In the first play, children abandoned as though orphaned find the sympathy of people outside their home and preserve their dream of education; in the second, a poor rickshaw puller safeguards his civic dignity amid neglect by village authorities and officials. Both works end happily, but the roads leading there are full of hunger, humiliation, labour, and institutional inequality.

A balanced literary assessment has two levels. In subject matter, Bechan Thakur strongly supports children's education, parental responsibility, social cooperation, opposition to corruption, and awareness of rights. In craft, his distinctive features are vernacular speech, dialogue-driven organisation, songs, symbolic stage objects, and the creation of a public protagonist; his limitations include flat characterisation, extraordinary coincidences, excessive preaching, and the rapid personal resolution of institutional problems.

In the history of children's literature, the first play may appropriately be placed among 'social dramas centred on children's experiences'. Its classification as drama exclusively for children would require additional evidence concerning intended age groups and stage adaptation. The second is not a direct text about children's rights, but can serve as an intellectual resource in civic education for adolescents and young adults. By preserving these generic distinctions, the volume emerges as an important bridge of dialogue between Maithili social theatre and consciousness of justice for children.

04 / 06

Unch-Nich

The Dramatic Conflict of Caste, Education, and Social Equality

Introduction: The Work Under Review, Its Questions, and Its Central Argument

The story of Unch-Nich is not merely an external confrontation between two castes. Its inner axis is the difference between social status inherited by birth and human capacity acquired through labour and education. The play asks whether standing in society should be determined by lineage and property or by conduct, work, and knowledge. The playwright seeks an answer first through the everyday lives of a poor couple, then through relationships involving educational institutions and moneylending, and finally through a love marriage and mechanisms of community justice. To restrict the work to an anti-caste message would obscure its economic and dramatic complexity.

The family of Mangal, Marni, and Dukhan forms the text's central axis. Their bamboo work, weaving of baskets and trays, efforts to raise fees, and compulsion to lose farmland and jewellery give the plot its concrete material foundation. Opposite them stand the prosperous household of Chandresh Jha, the aspiration to make his daughter a doctor, profits from moneylending, a hunger for prestige, and caste arrogance. In the final act, the children of the two households meet as adults, and their families' old relationship is tested against new ethical standards.

Bechan Thakur's Unch-Nich is a social play published by Shruti Prakashan, Delhi, in 2013. Its three acts contain six, nine, and seven scenes respectively.

The Overall Architecture of the Plot: From Labour to Education and from Education to Rights

In the first act, the family's material deprivation and Marni's thoughtful conduct establish the dramatic problem. Mangal vacillates among the habit of drinking, market prices, his son's studies, and family expectations. Marni seeks to direct him towards self-restraint, health, and education. Dukhan's difficulty in paying fees creates a moment when livelihood and the future stand face to face. In selling the poor family's handicrafts, the unequal capacities of customers and landowners become brutally apparent. Economic relationships, respectful forms of address, and helpless supplication converge in a single dramatic arrangement.

The second act makes clear the long-term cost of the educational project. Good results bring encouragement, but expenses for the next class, college, training, and engineering education draw the family into a cycle of debt. The daughter of a wealthy household moves towards the city for higher education, while Dukhan's studies raise questions about Marni's jewellery and the family's ancestral homesite. Inequality of access for equally capable students becomes unmistakable. Alongside the older rhythms of domestic life, the new world of the city, college, and employment enters the narrative.

In the third act, educated children challenge the older discipline of caste. Dukhan has become an engineer, while the wealthy family's daughter, having received medical education, seeks the freedom to decide for herself. Love, favouritism in employment, family wishes, fear of social humiliation, and direct violence concentrate the conflict. Finally, a public panchayat turns the private relationship into a matter of communal decision. The happy ending offers hope, but leaves unresolved the restitution of economic losses and the lawful consequences of violence.

Individual Close Readings of the Scenes

Act One, Scene 1: Home and Courtyard, Labour, and a Mother's Reasoning

A conversation beginning as Mangal and Marni weave bamboo baskets and trays reaches questions of health, drinking, family expenditure, and Dukhan's education. Although she has not received formal schooling, Marni connects social advice she has heard with her own life experience. She urges Mangal to reduce his spending on alcohol and consider their son's studies. The scene establishes the play's moral heroism in a mother's reasoning and labour. At the same time, Mangal's preference for sons hints at gender prejudice. Speech within the home here becomes a debate about the distribution of resources rather than a simple sermon. (Thakur, 2013.)

Act One, Scene 2: Fees, Commodities, and Unequal Bargaining

Dukhan's application or study-related fee abruptly pushes the family into financial crisis. They plan to sell the products of their labour—baskets and trays—but Mangal's bargaining power proves weak before the customer. The value of these goods is no longer merely their market price: it becomes the life-price of a child's future. The imbalance between the customer's bargaining and the family's pleading reveals the social power of capital. The play establishes poverty not as the result of laziness but as the outcome of uncertain income and unequal exchange. (Thakur, 2013.)

Act One, Scene 3: The Mansion, Humiliation, and the First Voice of Resistance

Marni reaches Chandresh Jha's mansion hoping to sell her products. A low price, accusations of delay, pressure over outstanding money, and threats to strike a woman intensify together within the scene. Intervention by a young woman in the wealthy household changes the situation. The upper-class home is not represented as homogeneous: the father supports exploitation, while the daughter recognises injustice. The playwright plants the seeds of future anti-caste possibilities in this generational difference. Yet decision-making authority remains immediately centred in the landowner's household; Marni receives temporary recognition for her labour through an intervention within that family rather than her own autonomous power. (Thakur, 2013.)

Act One, Scene 4: Alcohol, Male Company, and a Mother's Burden

On the pretext of looking for Sugar, Mangal is led by Rabiya towards drinking. Distorted speech and behaviour after intoxication, fighting, and Marni's anger make the domestic crisis visible. The scene combines humour with pathos: the uninhibited language of drunkenness makes the audience laugh, but the struggle to raise educational fees recalls its social cost. Marni's conditional forgiveness constructs a moral discipline for the home. If the scene is staged merely as a spectacle of drinking, the family's educational crisis could be obscured. (Thakur, 2013.)

Act One, Scene 5: The Small Drama of Usury

Following Chandresh's private reflection on profit and loss, an account of principal and interest arises with Sitaram. Small sums, arithmetic, and the unequal seating of creditor and debtor present the gestures of everyday exploitation. The satirical distance between Chandresh's religiosity and his greed becomes dense in the text. The scene is effective in exposing the exploitative tendencies concealed within a publicly respected person. Yet Sitaram has little agency; while the playwright shows the mechanisms of economic control, he does not expand on possible collective resistance. (Thakur, 2013.)

Act One, Scene 6: Examinations and the Prelude to Debt

Dukhan's examinations, study materials, and necessary expenditure once again raise the question of family savings. Marni's patient thrift and Mangal's anxiety both complement and conflict with one another. Transactions with Chandresh and the expectation of his favour reveal the poor family's dependence. The first act closes by making readers understand that a capable student's determination alone cannot ensure social mobility: resources must be provided continuously. (Thakur, 2013.)

Act Two, Scene 1: The Tea Shop as a Public Space

Jhingur's tea shop becomes an open public stage for discussing inflation, studies, young people's futures, and competition. Conversation among several youths moves the play beyond a single family towards a broader picture of educated rural society. The small question of the price of tea is woven into the larger question of the education market. The abundance of dialogue expands the social world but also risks slowing the plot. (Thakur, 2013.)

Act Two, Scene 2: A Prosperous Daughter and Educational Investment

Chandresh and Manisha celebrate their daughter's educational success. Preparations are made for her to travel to Darbhanga for higher studies. The contrast between daily labour and sales needed to finance Dukhan's education and the secure resources available to the prosperous daughter produces a comparison within the same play. Educating a daughter is a positive aim, but the father's hopes for her future also centre on marital prestige and concern for a socially elevated household. Providing higher education to a daughter does not necessarily mean accepting social equality: this contradiction gives the scene its sharpness. (Thakur, 2013.)

Act Two, Scene 3: Further Education Versus a Mother's Inherited Jewellery

Dukhan's results are a cause for happiness, but the family faces uncertain expenses for his further studies. The possibility of pawning Marni's hansli necklace, a memento of her parents, generates emotional conflict. Which should take precedence, her son's future or the preservation of maternal memory? The play delicately captures the ethical cost of economic deprivation here. Selling jewellery is not merely a transfer of capital but the displacement of memory across generations. Dukhan's intense desire to study wins readers' sympathy, yet the mother's decision is not free of suffering. (Thakur, 2013.)

Act Two, Scene 4: Mortgages and the Distance of Power

Marni takes her necklace to Chandresh. Within the rich man's home, distance, tone, light, and apprehension become the dramatic furnishings of financial power. Loan conditions and high interest transfer poor people's possessions into wealthy hands. Compared with the earlier scene of selling bamboo trays, exploitation has intensified: previously the value of handicrafts was reduced; now an object of family memory becomes collateral. (Thakur, 2013.)

Act Two, Scene 5: Admission Fees and the Pressure of Relationships

Mangal and Dukhan await Marni's return. A deadline and late fee turn time into an economic adversary. The money she obtains makes admission possible, but does not remove the family's debt. Later moments of domestic humour keep the scene human, although the larger concern remains access to higher education. The playwright shows readers how time-bound application systems can themselves become barriers for the poor. (Thakur, 2013.)

Act Two, Scene 6: The Fear of Control Accompanying Higher Education

In the prosperous family, the decision to send the daughter away to study increases anxieties about prestige and sexual control. A tendency emerges to suspect young women's independence on the basis of news reports. Manisha and Chandresh's dialogue contains inner conflicts of affection, suspicion, marital management, and family honour. The scene indicates that financial means do not automatically secure women's autonomy. (Thakur, 2013.)

Act Two, Scene 7: Engineering Education and Impossible Fees

Dukhan declares his ambition to pursue advanced technical education. Mangal tries to understand what he means; the social distance between 'studying' and 'becoming an engineer' is clear. The family's tribal or caste identity is not the decisive issue here; lack of money and information constitutes the more concentrated crisis. Education becomes a project of social mobility, while poverty of resources makes its path uncertain. (Thakur, 2013.)

Act Two, Scene 8: The Value of the Homestead and the Politics of Signatures

Discussion of how to finance engineering studies eventually leads to documentary transactions with Chandresh. There is a payment of four lakh rupees involving signatures and thumb impressions. A subsequent soliloquy makes clear that rights over Mangal's ancestral homesite and the necklace have been transferred. This is a crucial turning point: the possibility of educational success is purchased at the cost of becoming landless. The document is not an inert object but a theatrical instrument that creates power. The legal details of the loan conditions are not fully transparent in the text; it would therefore be wrong to describe this relationship as an 'equal exchange undertaken freely'. (Thakur, 2013.)

Act Two, Scene 9: The Government Grove and a Displaced Family

Mangal and Marni now live under a makeshift reed shelter in a government grove. Dukhan has obtained admission at a tremendous cost; their temporary residence visibly attests to the historic price of education. Manikant's sympathy, Rabiya's regret over his earlier misconduct, and Marni's insistence on education connect the play with the wider community. The second act ends here: the family is economically depleted yet full of confidence in the future. (Thakur, 2013.)

Act Three, Scene 1: A Reunion of Educated Young People

In a new setting, a young woman trained in medicine meets the engineer Dukhan. The conflict between educated minds and the caste distance of the old village community becomes plain. The account of Dukhan's parents losing their land acquaints the young woman with her own father's economic conduct. The possibility of love thus moves beyond attraction towards a shared sense of justice. Yet the inequality of their economic and social backgrounds does not simply disappear. (Thakur, 2013.)

Act Three, Scene 2: Bargaining, Patronage, and Caste in Employment

In the railway recruitment episode, Dukhan is confronted with a demand for a large sum and insult on caste grounds. At the same time, Chandresh tries to use social connections and caste ties for his daughter. The play opens different institutional doors for two applicants: one possesses ability but lacks means, while the other possesses contacts. The incident exposes ethical failure in the employment system, but the episode is a satirical social scene rather than a comprehensive institutional record; the distinction must be retained. (Thakur, 2013.)

Act Three, Scene 3: Love and Internalised Inferiority

The growing intimacy of Dukhan and the daughter of the prosperous household gradually reaches an acknowledgement of love. Dukhan passes through moments of viewing his own caste status as an obstacle to the relationship; the young woman challenges this sense of inferiority. The scene's dramatic force lies not simply in the declaration of love but in the double voice within a person's mind under social division. Sentimental repetition in the expression of love nevertheless slows the theatrical pace for a time. (Thakur, 2013.)

Act Three, Scene 4: An Educated Daughter and the Barrier of Family Prestige

When discussion of marriage begins at home, the young woman argues for a decision founded upon equality and personal wishes. Her father treats lineage, caste, and prestige as supreme. Although Manisha initially appears relatively sympathetic, she too becomes apprehensive upon learning Dukhan's caste. The play grasps an important truth: theoretical liberalism and practical liberalism when marriage enters one's own family are different things. The medically trained young woman's personality emerges as intellectually independent. (Thakur, 2013.)

Act Three, Scene 5: From Caste Humiliation to Organised Violence

Chandresh's pride and fear for his reputation turn into anger. Memories of earlier financial transactions that enabled Dukhan's education are recast as arrogant claims of 'benevolence'. A confrontation and beating involving accomplices become an extreme performance of caste power. The narrative moves from an argument resembling nonviolent resistance into physical violence. An important question for readers is whether justice after such violence can remain confined to private reconciliation or requires a formal structure of accountability. (Thakur, 2013.)

Act Three, Scene 6: The Meaning of Education and the Search for Community Justice

After the beating, the wounded Dukhan expresses his love and opposition to caste discrimination. Marni's maternal anxiety, Mangal's patience, and Manikant's good judgement appear together. The decision moves not towards immediate revenge but towards collective deliberation and the panchayat. Education is redefined here not merely as a means to employment but as a critical consciousness of social equality. Yet the dialogue sometimes becomes speechmaking, diminishing the subtlety of inner psychological states. (Thakur, 2013.)

Act Three, Scene 7: The Panchayat, Equality, and the Limits of a Happy Ending

The panchayat gathered in the school grounds makes a private dispute a public question of justice. Sarpanch Motilal hears the Dalit character's case, insists upon merit and human dignity rather than caste and wealth, and decides in favour of the marriage. Chandresh's acceptance, the exchange of garlands, the meeting of the fathers-in-law, and collective blessings bring the play to an end. The scene creates the communal festive feeling of folk theatre; Rabiya's humorous subplot relaxes the narrative tension. Yet the final settlement does not clearly resolve punishment for the beating, correction of the unequal economic deal, or restoration of the land lost by the Dalit family. The result is thus an idealised happy ending of equality, not factual proof that complete social justice has been achieved. (Thakur, 2013.)

Character Analysis: Contradictions, Aspirations, and Actions

Marni: Informal Knowledge, Labour, and Moral Resolve

To make Marni merely an emblem of the self-sacrificing mother would diminish her dramatic agency. She questions Mangal's drinking, applies ideas about health heard from others, gathers resources for her son's education, bargains with customers at the market, protests against humiliation, and ultimately risks the jewellery inherited in memory of her parents. Her actions signify that a woman's knowledge is not determined solely by school certificates. Labour, experience, and the capacity to reason become the household's principal intellectual resources.

There is nevertheless a danger in the image of the 'generous mother'. The play repeatedly expects limitless sacrifice from Marni's family role. Her independent wish to preserve her body, memories, property, and emotions becomes subordinate to her child's aspirations. A feminist rereading would ask whether glorifying a poor mother's sacrifice is the same thing as granting just social recognition to her labour. It is not.

Mangal: Fatherhood, Weakness, and Changing Responsibility

Mangal is not a consistently virtuous, one-dimensional character. Drinking, patriarchal speech, disorganised decisions, and his association with Rabiya are among his weaknesses. On the other hand, saving for his son's studies, continuing to work, worrying about his family, and seeking a considered communal solution in the final act are emerging signs of responsibility. This duality makes him a believable rural character. The limits of his self-respect are particularly significant: he bows before commercial customers but stands firm when his son's development is at stake.

Dukhan: A Narrative of Talent and the Contradictions of Social Mobility

Dukhan's journey leads from a student unable to pay his fees to an engineer. This trajectory encompasses childhood labour, education in youth, and adult self-determination. Yet his achievement is not an individualistic story of 'work hard and anything is possible'. His mother's jewellery, the surrender of the homestead, and the displacement of the family constitute the collective price of success. Applying the question of high and low status to intimate relationships in the third act signifies his critical maturity. Dukhan rebels against society's standards, although at certain turning points his agency remains defined by the public panchayat's decision.

Chandresh Jha: Appropriation Under the Guise of Benevolence

Chandresh wants to accumulate wealth, command public respect, give his daughter the finest education, and preserve the prestige of his lineage. His complacent outlook reduces the daily difficulties of poor people to questions of higher prices or overdue payments. He is a wealthy father, but not a just father of society. His daughter's demand for autonomy in choosing a spouse reveals the limits of his authority. The character matters not because he is simply a 'bad person', but because the advantages of a hierarchical society accumulate in a person who regards his conduct as normal. His final change of heart offers emotional relief, but does not readily erase the consequences of earlier exploitation.

The Educated Young Woman, Manisha, and Generational Differences Among Women

The young woman of the wealthy family seeks both medical training and the right to decide upon her life partner. Her father treats his financial investment as a basis for controlling marriage; she treats education as the basis of ethical autonomy. Manisha's behaviour is more complex: she sometimes softens the father's anger but cannot free herself from inherited prejudice when her daughter crosses the caste boundary. In this triangle, the play questions the notion that women's experiences are uniform.

Manikant, Motilal, Rabiya, and the Supporting Community

Manikant represents the judgement of a mediator, Motilal public decision-making, and Rabiya the flow of folk humour. Manikant listens to the suffering of working people and provides opportunities for dialogue. Motilal turns the panchayat into a public forum for justice, though the question remains how far his decisions depend on personal generosity. Rabiya creates humour and offers Mangal a contrasting choice in matters of drinking. Such humour requires care: the identities of Dalit or working-class characters should not be turned into material for mockery alone.

A Closer Analysis of Social Questions

Caste and Class: Two Distinct but Interconnected Powers

The words 'high' and 'low' in the title refer not merely to social forms of address but to a system for distributing resources. Who will perform productive labour, who will determine prices, who will be made to accept loan conditions, whose education will be straightforward, and whose marriage will be called respectable? These five distinct questions are interwoven in the same caste-class relationship. Even becoming an engineer does not instantly remove the stigma of Dukhan's previous social standing. He faces discrimination both in employment and in love. In this sense, 'merit' does not automatically destroy caste; the events of the play reveal the additional necessity of changing the structure of social institutions.

The playwright nevertheless often concentrates class analysis upon the greed of a particular wealthy man. The narrative ends with Chandresh's personal generosity and the panchayat's acceptance. If caste is an institutional form of unequal land rights, hierarchy, and prestige, one marriage cannot constitute its ultimate solution. This difference is a productive critical tension between the play's ideal and its social reality.

The Progressive Displacement of Labour, Possessions, and Land

The economic subplot begins with bamboo baskets and trays, advances to the hansli necklace, and then takes the form of selling the ancestral homesite. The sequence of objects creates the play's political economy: daily production → savings → inherited jewellery → house and land → temporary reed shelter. Throughout this sequence, the family loses material assets while accumulating educational capital for its child. The playwright does not diminish the importance of educational achievement; he shows that its cost is doubled for marginalised families, who must pay fees and bear social risks. Growing wealth in Chandresh's household and diminishing immovable property in Mangal's household establish parallel visual sequences.

Education: The Hope of Liberation and Institutional Inequality

Fees and examination dates impede Dukhan at school; large payments impede him in college; patronage and demands for bribes impede him in employment. Education gives him intellectual ability, but the old caste-class system meets him at the next door. The prosperous daughter benefits from higher education but struggles against caste-based control over marriage within her home. The comparison of these two educational journeys is illuminating: education offers liberation to both a woman and a Dalit young man, yet the opponents of liberation return in different forms.

Patriarchy, Women's Agency, and Love Marriage

The family's economic crisis limits Marni's right to decide. The educated young woman's father limits her right to decide through family prestige. Although they belong to different classes, the two women are united in a struggle for autonomy. The love-marriage plot breaks a caste boundary, but women's rights should not be confined to the choice of a lover. Professional futures, fears of violence against their bodies, rights over family property, and participation in public society are also at issue. The play indicates these questions without giving full development to each.

Religion, Display, and Economic Ethics

The distance between the wealthy character's religious practices and his harsh treatment of the poor generates satire. Religious pilgrimage or worship is no evidence of exemption from social responsibility: this idea emerges within the contradictions of Chandresh's greed. The play does not mount a wholesale attack on religious belief; it reveals the ethical incongruity of conduct. It is therefore more faithful to the evidence to read it as moral satire.

Dramatic Craft, Theatrical Language, and Performability

Bechan Thakur's writing is scene-based, dialogue-driven, and animated by the small objects and circumstances of rural life. Handicrafts, chairs, diaries, papers, signatures, jewellery, rupees, reed shelters, schools, and panchayat seating repeatedly become meaningful stage properties. The purposeful sequence of objects can communicate social distance to spectators without extensive explanation. Mangal's working hands and the comfortable seat in Chandresh's verandah, for example, could create an effective opposition within a single stage arrangement.

The dialogue is rooted in local life through its exclamations and idioms. Ordinary conversation turns towards an economic or moral issue. Marni's questions and answers, Mangal's drunken inconsistencies, Rabiya's humour, Chandresh's commanding speech, and Motilal's panchayat proclamations construct distinct social voices. In the third act, the contrast between Maithili and Hindi-speaking administrative dialogue in the employment scene becomes an audible sign of social domination.

The limitations of form must also be identified. Many scenes rely on characters directly announcing ethical principles, and repetition of the same proposition reduces the complexity of their internal struggles. Some long conversations in the second act, the declaration of love in the third, and the final panchayat speech might need precise editing for performance. Criticism of the published text and proposals for theatrical abbreviation are, however, separate processes; the original work must be preserved intact as an archival text.

Humour in the play can expose relationships of social power. If the jokes about alcohol or Rabiya's hunger are exaggerated in performance, they could diminish the seriousness of oppression; restrained acting would make the contradiction more meaningful. Respectful representation of female characters, critical framing of caste insults, avoidance of romanticising violence, and balanced positioning of actors at the panchayat would be central concerns of stage direction.

The expansion of time is significant: the protagonist ages from primary schooling to professional employment. The three-act structure permits this temporal breadth, but stage lighting, sound, and acting must make clear the passage of time between scenes, sustain the audience's patience, and register the characters' maturation. In this sense, Unch-Nich moves readily between the printed page and the popular stage, though it demands sensitive editing.

The History of Maithili Children's Literature: A Comparative Discussion

From Oral Literature for Infants to Written Genres

Phulchandra Jha 'Praveen's' Maithili Shishu Lok Sahitya (Videha, issue 50, 2010) emphasises the oral transmission of nursery songs and folk traditions. It distinguishes oral literature used in child-rearing, play and entertainment, and the acquisition of knowledge. This tradition views the family as the first school of a child's socialisation. Mangal and Marni's home in Unch-Nich presents a modern form of this traditional site of folk knowledge, but its primary objective is not the entertainment of infants. It concerns school certificates, social inequality, and civic standing. Thus, although the two genres share source environments, their purposes for readers differ.

Yoganand Jha's Maithili Bal-Lokkatha: Sthiti a Apeksha (Videha, issue 76, 2011) provides examples of interest in stories, accessible language, knowledge, and entertainment. It demonstrates the importance of retaining the original language when collecting folktales. This model helps us understand the literary value of the rural speech in Unch-Nich, but the concise suspense of a folktale and the prolonged social conflict of this drama are not the same kind of text.

Picture Stories, Children's Drama, and a Visual Tradition of Dalit Protagonists

Durganand Mandal's 2012 Videha article Nena Lel Sundar Chitrakatha praises Preeti Thakur's picture stories for bringing folk figures such as Gonu Jha, Salhes, Dina-Bhadri, and Chhechhan to a new generation. The review mentions socially marginalised protagonists and stories of inter-caste love. The similarity here is significant: Dukhan in Unch-Nich is a modern educated Dalit protagonist, while several picture stories raise questions of human dignity through folk memory and folk heroes. The genres and modes of presentation differ, but their cultural effort to choose protagonists who challenge dominant models is comparable.

Videha's book catalogue lists Munna Ji's Tin Ta Bal Natak separately under 'Maithili Children's Literature', whereas Bechan Thakur's Unch-Nich is explicitly listed as a 'play'. This cataloguing is itself useful evidence of genre. The presence of child characters alone is not sufficient to classify a work as children's drama. A feasible performance by child actors, limited duration, age-appropriate depiction of violence, children's active minds, accessible language, and a development of characters grounded in their experience are also expected. On these grounds, Unch-Nich can be useful to adolescent audiences through selected scenes, but in its entirety it is a broad social drama.

Contemporary Criticism and the Expanding Boundaries of Children's Literature

Videha's research index records an essay titled Maithili Balnatak Sima Vistar Karait—Chauari by Ramesh Ranjan (issue 126, 2013). The record points to the existence of a distinct critical vocabulary for children's drama; because of discrepancies between the page heading and its contents, no specific ideological proposition has been attributed to the essay without textual support. Maithili Bal-Upanyasak Samikshashastra, published in 2026, extends the critical language of children's agency, caste representation, folk narratives, and appropriateness. This later debate may be applied to the work of 2013 with proper historical caution; the influence of present-day theory on an earlier author cannot be assumed. [5, 6]

Three conclusions emerge from the comparison. First, the life of the student Dukhan in Unch-Nich is particularly useful for studying children's and educational rights. Second, the dramatic depiction of caste-based humiliation allows adolescent spectators to ask difficult questions about social inequality. Third, adult drinking, physical violence, usurious transactions, long-term love, and panchayat decisions prevent the work from becoming an ordinary introductory children's play. Its audience should therefore be determined by age and educational purpose rather than by reversing the author's generic identification.

Bechan Thakur's Theatrical Tradition and Videha's Critical Context

In his 2011 review Bechan Thakurjik Natak Chhinar Devi, Ashish Anchinhar examines the playwright's stage direction, village performance traditions, and opposition to social superstition. He identifies the performance-oriented nature of Thakur's plays and the mutual relationship of literature and theatre. This earlier review provides a historical background for reading Unch-Nich: Thakur's drama is not writing confined to a book, but social literature connected to the possibilities of popular performance. Nevertheless, the subject of Chhinar Devi differs from Unch-Nich's debate about education, caste, and property. It would be wrong to assume thematic uniformity between the two works.

Discussions of Dalit literary aesthetics and new approaches to dramatic criticism published in Videha provide a contemporary vocabulary for criticising hierarchy and examining stage performance in Maithili. This context makes it possible to read the play's protagonists not as poor people receiving pity but as claimants to social rights. Later critical works, however, are treated as comparative instruments rather than decisive evidence of the play's authentic meaning. [8, 9]

Critical Achievements and Limitations of the Text

The first achievement is the visual presentation of class differences. When the workshop-like surroundings of Mangal's home, where baskets are woven, and Chandresh's comfortable verandah occupy the same social geography, the title Unch-Nich acquires material meaning. The second is Marni's agency: she is the first organiser of the family's responsibilities and the first source of social reasoning in difficult times. The third is the portrayal of the long-term costs of education: a child's future is not merely a personal aspiration but an investment of labour across generations. The fourth is the disproportionate relationship between economic transformation and caste inequality: the son becomes an engineer, but caste again appears at the doors of relationships and employment.

A fifth achievement is the theatrical use of the public panchayat. Its meeting in a school compound is a powerful symbol of place: where education teaches the skill of raising social questions, social justice is debated. A sixth achievement is the contradiction between the modernity of a father who wants to educate his daughter and the old impulse to defend lineage that is terrified of an inter-caste marriage.

The first limitation is repeated preaching. Many exchanges make the theoretical argument for social reform explicit, but the characters' natural experience sometimes remains merely a carrier of ideas. The second is the simplification of the consequences of violence. An organised assault upon Dukhan is a grave injustice; the panchayat then promptly resolves the matter through marriage, without extended treatment of criminal accountability, safe rehabilitation for the victim, or institutional injustice. The third is the incomplete treatment of property: an unequal transaction resembling the seizure of the homesite and necklace does not automatically become just through personal reconciliation.

A fourth limitation is the marriage-centred definition of women's freedom. Although the medically trained young woman is an educated citizen, her professional life and long-term autonomy can become secondary in the happy ending. A fifth is the limited visibility of collective Dalit organisation: the protagonist's individual talent and courage in love receive more attention than a programme of collective reform. Such criticism does not deny the play's historical contribution; rather, it identifies the limits of its morally directed happy ending.

Possibilities for Educational and Theatrical Use

At senior secondary and university levels, selected scenes from this play could support discussions of economic inequality, the dignity of labour, educational access, caste prejudice, consent in marriage, and community justice. Teaching the domestic debate between Mangal and Marni alongside Chandresh's market scene could help students understand how a family's desire for education is affected by inequalities in the marketplace. The sequence of necklace, homesite, and reed shelter in the second act offers an opportunity to teach the visual grammar of rights over resources. Employment and panchayat episodes in the third act can clarify the difference between institutional justice and private reconciliation.

For a complete stage production, it would be useful to clarify the leaps in time between acts, balance repetitive dialogue, perform caste insults sensitively, control the staging of violence, and open the unresolved questions of economic justice to audience discussion after the final decision. A production involving students must present violent and adult episodes in ways appropriate to their ages. The purpose of such experimentation is not to rewrite the original text's language but to understand the different levels of its social thinking.

Epilogue

The significance of Unch-Nich lies in making a poor family's journey through education a fundamental question of Mithila's social hierarchy. Mangal and Marni's labour, Dukhan's thirst for higher education, Chandresh's system of accumulated wealth, and the young woman's support for self-determination together construct a social triangle: knowledge, property, and respect. The play repeatedly demonstrates that education gives people abilities, but society still needs to learn the cultural practice of respecting those abilities. This is its moral achievement.

The critical conclusion is more exacting. The marriage union is certainly a symbolic victory over caste division, but it does not fully remedy the appropriation of land, pressure of debt, favouritism in employment, and physical violence. The play is therefore not a record of the completion of social justice but a work that forcefully stages its necessity. Its meaningful relationship with the history of Maithili children's literature lies in the question of education and young people's agency, while its original generic identity as adult social drama remains intact. Through such a differentiated, evidence-based reading, Unch-Nich provides Maithili literature with an important theatrical expression of social life shaped by caste and class.

05 / 06

Biswasghat

The Breakdown of Trust, Land Acquisition, and Popular Justice

Introduction: The Literary Questions Raised by the Play

The title Biswasghat ('Betrayal') announces its subject. Trust is not merely a private virtue but the foundation of social conduct: a brother's trust in a brother, the acceptance of advice between husband and wife, the relation of rights between father and son, the citizen's faith in administration, and society's trust in institutions of justice. The play presents the breaking of trust at each of these levels. An event involving monetary compensation does not remain a private property dispute; it becomes a public drama of the unequal distribution of power and wealth.

This text is a play, not a novel or a children's story. The printed copyright page also states in English, 'Biswasghat, Play by Bechan Thakur'. Its formal foundations are dialogue attributed to named characters, acting directions in parentheses, entrances and exits, curtain falls, and divisions into acts and scenes. The primary basis for this review is therefore not plot summary but the relationship between events and actions represented onstage.

The principal questions of this critical reading are these: how does the play show familial trust becoming a shield for corruption? To what extent does a resistant young man become an ethical ideal? How are the judgement and voices of female characters rejected? And what contradiction remains between lawful justice and the use of administrative force in the final resolution?

Three Acts of the Story: From Trust to Justice

Act One: Trust Transformed into the Power of Documents

The first scene presents the affectionate atmosphere of tea shared by three brothers. Ram Kishun, Lakhan, and Siyaram consider a notice concerning land acquisition for a road. Displaying his government connections, Ram Kishun asks his brothers to hand over their documents. Here trust ceases to be merely verbal reassurance and becomes the material act of surrendering papers of ownership. The second scene presents the caution of Lakhan's wife, Lakshmi. She advises him to consult knowledgeable people before handing over the land documents, but Lakhan dismisses her advice as 'a woman's words'. The first foreshadowing of the later catastrophe lies in her being ignored.

A Holi gathering and feast, hospitality extended to officers over tea, the land acquisition office, and transactions with an engineer establish bribery not as one entirely secret crime but as an extension of social contacts. The fifth scene is particularly decisive: on the basis of original compensation amounts of eighty thousand rupees for Lakhan, one lakh for Siyaram, and one lakh forty thousand for Ram Kishun, the total was three lakh twenty thousand. Through the engineer's manipulation, these become eight, ten, and fourteen lakh respectively, amounting to thirty-two lakh rupees. The engineer demands eight lakh in advance; subsequent transactions involve the cooperation of a land acquisition employee and a peon.

Documentary evidence and the correctness of the amounts disappear in the secret exchange of bribes. Concealing the actual payments from his brothers, Ram Kishun gives Lakhan fifty thousand rupees and Siyaram seventy thousand. He performs a role of failed endeavours, an intractable government system, and benevolent assistance. Ramlal detects the discrepancy by bringing together newspaper reports, office records, and differences in amounts. He represents the conflict within a new generation between obedience to elders and rational verification.

Towards the end of the first act, the court of Sarpanch Gangaram rejects Ramlal's claim because of a supposed lack of evidence and the non-cooperation of his father, Lakhan. The matter then reaches the home: Lakhan's domestic violence, Ramlal's violent response, and the forcible taking of a thumb impression on blank paper give the struggle for rights moral complexity even when its cause is on the victim's side.

Act Two: Institutional Access and the Murder of Resistance

In the second act, Lakhan takes shelter with Ram Kishun because he fears his own son. Ramlal's petition reaches the sub-divisional officer and district officer, from whom instructions for an inquiry are sent to the police station.

But the station repeatedly becomes a place of transactions instead of complaints. The employees responsible for investigation convert police authority into pressure, demands for hospitality, and financial bargaining.

District officer Bijendra initially appears to be relatively willing to investigate, while Ram Kishun tries to suppress the complaint through his political and police connections. As the pressure increases, however, Ram Kishun uses an associate named Bir to arrange Ramlal's murder through the gang led by the criminal Raja. The plan, advance payment, deception, and murder are the play's most horrifying events. Ramlal is led away from the tea shop under the guise of friendship. The innocent young man appeals to the morality of his killers, but he is murdered.

This violence transforms the struggle. Its object is no longer simply the division of compensation but the truth about a crime and justice for the dead. Lakshmi's maternal grief, the concerns of the younger son Jhamlal, the initiative of their maternal uncle Lakshman, and the responses of village residents gradually take the form of collective resistance. The playwright constructs this change not merely to increase the number of incidents but as the public consequence of a private struggle.

Act Three: Society, Administration, and Incomplete Restitution

In the third act, Lakshman and Jhamlal convene a community meeting. After the failure of the first panchayat, facts and public participation gain strength in the second; Lakhan's plight and Ramlal's murder become matters of collective judgement. Ram Kishun resists the community's proposal for compensation, and the conflict extends to a protest and intervention by higher administration.

The portrayal of administrative process is itself full of contradictions. The actions of officials and police include examining records and arresting criminals, but also degrading beatings and unconstitutional forms of punishment. The tendency to count the death of the criminal gang as an achievement of dramatic resolution raises questions. Praising punishment without respect for law and judicial hearings must be reckoned among the play's critical limitations.

At the public hearing, responsibility is fixed upon four people: Ram Kishun is to pay five lakh rupees, Bir one lakh, engineer Uma Shankar two lakh, and land acquisition employee Sushil two lakh—a total of ten lakh rupees to Lakhan. In the final scene, the money is handed over and Ram Kishun apologises. Yet the ultimate sorrow is not money but Ramlal's absence. Treating murder, manipulation of public funds, and accountability of criminals and administrators as resolved solely through private forgiveness or local financial settlement is insufficient in legal terms. The play itself allows these undecided questions to be raised.

The Title, Symbolism, and the Dramatic Meaning of Objects

The central irony of Biswasghat is that trust and deception flourish within the same relationship. Ram Kishun's modest speech and apparent service stand opposed to his private calculations. Lakhan's blind trust cannot simply be dismissed as personal stupidity: family seniority, social prestige, fear of government offices, and unfamiliarity with legal processes combine to make him vulnerable.

Paper is the play's central stage object. First come original land documents, then notices, revised amounts, cheques, official registers, petitions, panchayat notices, thumb impressions on blank sheets, and finally decisions. Every document establishes or undermines someone's ownership or the legitimacy of a claim. Trust formerly resting on oral relationships confronts the power of written evidence and official records. In this sense, the work has features of 'documentary drama', even though its formal construction is traditionally dialogue-driven.

Tea and hospitality recur throughout the play. Initially, tea marks the brothers' fellowship; later, tea with an officer becomes a preparation for proposing a bribe. Hospitality offered to police and intermediaries becomes an instrument for agreements involving power. Before the murder, Bir takes Ramlal away from a tea stall. Through this gradual transformation in the meaning of the same object, the play suggests betrayal concealed within everyday life.

Amounts such as eighty thousand, eight lakh, fifty thousand, and five lakh are not mere numerical details. The arithmetic of money anchors the relations of power: a person who can read documents, access official files, and buy the services of office employees increases his own share. Economic injustice therefore arises not solely from the price of land but also from inequalities of knowledge and access.

Character Analysis: Beyond One-Dimensional Heroes and Villains

Ram Kishun: The Performance of Generosity and the Violence of Accounting

Ram Kishun is constructed on two levels. Outwardly, he is a respectful, sociable brother who offers refreshments and knows officials. Inwardly, his aim is financial gain, control of evidence, and suppression of challenges. This duality can be theatrically effective because, after a few scenes, the audience knows the truth about him while Lakhan and Siyaram remain in the dark. The centre of dramatic irony lies precisely here.

Ram Kishun is not merely a greedy businessman behind the crime but someone who exploits flaws in the system. He collaborates with the engineer, bribes office employees, bargains with police misconduct, and finally orders a murder. Yet his remorse at the end appears as a sudden moral transformation. The question is not whether a criminal can reform, but whether, after such grave violence, public shame and an oath can credibly be regarded as sufficient atonement.

Lakhan and Siyaram: Victims of Trust, but Not Exempt from the Duty to Reason

Lakhan's innocence is both pitiable and open to criticism. He refuses to hear the reasoning of the woman in his home, denies his son's information, and avoids checking facts. He then commits domestic violence against his wife. His victimhood thus does not prove his moral innocence. Siyaram's role mainly consists of agreement, delayed doubt, and small hopes. Both characters indicate that defending social rights demands independent examination alongside kinship ties.

Ramlal: The Courage of Rights, Excessive Anger, and Martyrdom

Ramlal questions the arithmetic of the fraud, reads newspapers, visits offices, and files petitions. It is appropriate to call him a bearer of modern civic reason. His behaviour, however, is not entirely nonviolent. His attack upon his father while protecting his mother, his forcible taking of a mark on blank paper, and his angry speeches prevent him from becoming an unambiguous ideal. The author reveals the importance of his courage; criticism must also examine the violence accompanying that courage.

Ramlal's murder is the ethical breaking point of the text. His appeal to the murderers' 'honesty' before death is an extreme form of the language of resistance. Yet to describe a young man's death merely as 'the price of trust' would forget his claim to citizenship while alive. Jhamlal and Lakshman take his place in the final act, but Ramlal's autonomous voice survives only in memory.

Lakshmi, Jhamlal, and Lakshman: From an Ignored Warning to Social Leadership

Lakshmi initially embodies practical reason. She advises Lakhan to understand the official papers before handing them over, but patriarchal decision-making rejects her. She subsequently suffers domestic violence and the murder of her son, while urging the family towards public justice. Maternal grief is important, but a woman's political intelligence must not be hidden behind her tears. This is an essential feminist rereading of the text.

In his brother's absence, Jhamlal worries about education, livelihood, and social participation. Lakshman's arrival increases the narrative's capacity for organisation. He transforms a personal complaint into a public meeting, a protest, and evidence-based demands before district administration. Yet decisive authority is again surrendered to a powerful male official. The tension between the achievement of popular organisation and protection by the state is an important question in the final act.

Administrative Characters: A Corrupt System and the Problem of the Ideal Officer

Sushil, Uma Shankar, police employees, officials with political connections, and the sarpanch are not identical figures, but relations of power and money recur among them. District officer Bijendra poses a particular problem: he hears complaints and understands the meaning of documents, yet endorses police beatings and extrajudicial punishment. This contradiction prevents the play from fitting into a simple scheme of 'honest officer versus corrupt society'.

Dialogue, Dialect, Time, and Theatrical Structure

Dialogue is the play's principal strength. Conversations among family members contain Maithili intimacy, reproach, and bitterness; the police station and offices have a mixed bureaucratic idiom, Hindi-influenced sentences, and commanding tones; the criminal gang speaks in threats and boasts. These social and linguistic differences make distinct power relationships audible on one stage. Yet long lectures by certain characters also turn dialogue away from living confrontation into something resembling a manifesto.

The span of three acts and forty scenes reveals the complexity of the social milieu. Fragmented locations—verandahs, porches, tea stalls, land acquisition offices, police stations, sarpanch meetings, district headquarters, criminals' dens, and community halls—form a multilayered map of social drama. Yet repeated entrances and exits, changes of curtain, and lengthy office conversations would make timing, scenic coordination, and pace challenging in a complete production.

The work does not merely report violence in the background; its stage directions prescribe direct beatings and murder. Alongside the impact associated with traditional folk theatre arise questions of modern staging: should terrible violence be shown directly, or suggested through sound, light, offstage action, and reactions? Appropriate theatrical design could make these events powerful; excessively explicit violence might turn the social questions into sensationalism.

At the level of humour, tea-seller Lalu's repeated 'mane je', conversations at the police station, and official formalities provide pauses in the action. After Ramlal's murder, however, unnecessary jokes or the spectacle of beatings might undermine the tragic effect. Balanced editing is possible for stage adaptation, but these incidents must not be omitted from a complete study of the original text.

Political Economy, Power, Caste and Class, and Citizenship

The land acquisition episode presents an underlying truth of modern development: a road is considered a public amenity, yet its construction displaces someone's ancestral home, fields, dwelling, and social stability. Compensation in such circumstances is not merely a price but a means of rehabilitating displaced lives. The play extends the issue beyond buying and selling land to questions of building homes, repaying debts, establishing families, and educating children.

Access to power in the narrative is created through intimacy, drinking parties, personal connections, and exchanges of money. Corruption is not a defect of one isolated character but becomes a network of institutions. Its social effects fall most heavily on the poor: those without independent lawyers, documentary proof, or access to office records must pay for 'trust' with everything they own.

In the other direction, popular organisation and written applications constitute the play's democratic energy. Ramlal's letters and Lakshman's public meetings indicate that, without evidence, public support, and written records, the humiliated citizen's voice may be suppressed. Yet the state's delivery of justice must itself remain within the law. The play suggests that a stern administrator can deliver moral justice; a critical reading asks how the poor can ultimately be secure when their rights lie in the hands of a violent official.

Justice, Punishment, and the Ambiguity of the Ending

The final public hearing offers a scene of economic redress. The ten-lakh-rupee liability of four wrongdoers is established before society, and payment takes place in the presence of witnesses. Theatrically, this gives the satisfaction of a 'decision made in full view'. But the offences—artificial inflation of public compensation, bribery, abuse of documents, contract killing, and murder—each raise questions of independent investigation, lawful prosecution, and the victim family's rights. A financial agreement cannot replace all these processes.

Beating suspects to extract confessions, eliminating an alleged criminal gang without judicial process, and turning an official into the person who dispenses punishment are matters for serious criticism in the theory of justice. The author's intention may be justice opposed to corruption, but limits on the means used are essential to justice itself. An appropriate social solution requires not merely punishment but a transparent process for establishing guilt, rehabilitation of actual victims, and future institutional reform.

Lakhan's final question is the strongest human question of all: compensation cannot bring his son back to life. This line preserves incompleteness within the play's idealistic ending. Ram Kishun's public apology closes the scene emotionally, but to assume that one 'apology' immediately restores trust would diminish the weight of the play's own events. Its finest critical meaning is not that everything is finally well, but that, once social trust has broken, even economic justice cannot undo the irreparable loss of relationships.

Comparative Contexts in Maithili Theatre and Children's Literature

In the study of Maithili theatre, Biswasghat should be read as a long, socially realistic play about corruption and rural life. Videha issue 82 (15 May 2011) contains a review by Ashish Anchinhar of Bechan Thakur's Chhinar Devi. There, the critic discusses the playwright's involvement in rural theatre and the play's social questions. This independent reference helps us see continuity in Thakur's theatrical interests and social concerns, but it does not establish that the subjects of Chhinar Devi and Biswasghat are identical.

Videha's research index records Ramesh Ranjan's Maithili Balnatak Sima Vistar Karait—Chauari (issue 126, 2013) as part of the discussion of children's drama. Phulchandra Jha 'Praveen's' Maithili Shishu Lok Sahitya (issue 50, 2010), Yoganand Jha's Maithili Bal-Lokkatha: Sthiti a Apeksha (issue 76, 2011), and Durganand Mandal's Nena Lel Sundar Chitrakatha (issue 116, 2012) establish the distinct generic presence of folklore, picture stories, and children's plays within literature for children. These examples are not a complete chronology but documented representative stages available in Videha.

One criterion of children's literature is to shape language and curiosity in accordance with children's experiential worlds. Another is suitability in terms of violence, fear, intellectual complexity, and presentation. Biswasghat contains domestic beatings, murder, bribery, criminal gangs, excessively long bureaucratic dialogue, and legal disputes. It would therefore be a generic error to call it children's reading or children's drama without adaptation. Selected episodes, however—understanding a document before signing, verification, the value of education, social assistance, and awareness of rights—could be used in civic education for adolescents.

Gajendra Thakur's Maithili Bal-Upanyasak Samikshashastra in Videha issue 447 (August 2026) discusses the multilayered structure of genres for children. This comparative reference is used not to turn Biswasghat into a children's novel but to distinguish children's perspectives and age-appropriate texts from adult social drama. If this storyline is adapted for children's theatre, it would be essential to condense events, suggest violence indirectly, emphasise collective decisions and the active reasoning of female characters, and discuss lawful justice.

In writing the history of Maithili children's literature, oral folk traditions, magazine experiments, picture stories, children's songs, children's plays, and modern children's novels may be connected, but their differences of genre should not be erased. This play by Bechan Thakur is not a 'direct text for children' in that history; it is a social reference work of adult theatre. Its relevance to children's literary history extends only to discussion of generic boundaries and possible adaptations for adolescents.

Achievements and Limitations: Critical Conclusions

The play's first achievement is its representation of corruption through small transactions and social hospitality. Its second is the bringing together of a farming family, domestic women, educated young people, intermediaries, police, engineers, employees, and village society into one dramatic map. Its third is the social credibility created through the precise arithmetic of payments and questions of evidence. Its fourth is that Lakhan's regret becomes an experience of human emptiness deeper than economic compensation.

The limitations are also important. Some events depend too heavily on coincidence and an exceptionally powerful officer; many scenes repeat the same message; and the morality of one or two characters seems to change suddenly to suit the story. Ramlal's commitment to truth cannot remove criticism of his violent conduct; Bijendra's opposition to corruption does not legitimise his punitive violence; and Ram Kishun's apology cannot replace accountability before the law.

Taken as a whole, Biswasghat may be regarded as a Maithili social play that produces a dramatic confrontation among broken trust, the machinery of the state, the political economy of development, and the sense of justice. Its significance for readers lies not merely in criminals receiving punishment but in keeping alive the question of how far private trust, documentary evidence, collective public strength, and the limits of judicial authority can support—or oppose—one another.

The Emotional Force of Dialogue

> 'I have complete faith in Ram Kishun.' — Lakhan, Act One, Scene Two.
>
> 'I can increase the rate on the notice by up to ten times.' — Uma Shankar, Act One, Scene Five.
>
> 'I will go to the office, I will go, I will go.' — Ramlal, end of Act One, Scene Nine.
>
> 'No wealth in the world is greater than education.' — Lakshman, Act Three, Scene Nine.
>
> 'I have received a great deal of money. But will that money bring my son back?' — Lakhan, Act Three, Scene Nine.

These five quotations preserve, as far as possible, the small variations of pronunciation and spelling in their published forms. The standardised spelling of the critical prose in the original study has not been imposed upon the speakers' quoted words.

A Sequential Examination of Forty Scenes

The narrative content and dramatic function of each scene are examined separately and briefly below.

Act One: Scene-by-Scene Discussion

Scene 1: The three brothers converse over tea and discuss the acquisition notice. Ram Kishun's proposal to take charge of the documents is the first dramatic point of trust.

Scene 2: Lakshmi advises understanding the documents before handing them over; Lakhan's disregard of a woman's advice is linked to subsequent loss.

Scene 3: The Holi celebration brings together a police officer, lawyer, and intermediary. An intimate feast prepares the ground for administrative protection.

Scene 4: At a tea shop, there is a conversation with land acquisition employee Sushil. The proposed bribe is presented as legitimate through sympathy for deprivation and an appeal to practicality.

Scene 5: Engineer Uma Shankar fixes the price for increasing compensation tenfold. The precise arithmetic of the sums forms the economic foundation of the plot.

Scene 6: Bribes to Sushil and peon Bindeshwar accompany the cheque process. The office file becomes a mask of legality for crime.

Scene 7: Ramlal learns about the payments from a newspaper. The generational dispute between father and son becomes a question of knowledge versus obedience.

Scene 8: Through refreshments and tea, Ram Kishun reinforces his brothers' trust; Ramlal is described as hasty.

Scene 9: Ram Kishun presents false accounts; Ramlal resolves to investigate the office records.

Scene 10: After encountering bribery at the office, information emerges about the actual payments of eight, ten, and fourteen lakh rupees.

Scene 11: Ramlal discloses the facts; Siyaram's fainting and Ram Kishun's denial intensify dramatic tension.

Scene 12: A complaint is brought before the sarpanch, turning a family dispute into a formal public controversy.

Scene 13: On receiving notice, Ram Kishun mobilises his political and social defences.

Scene 14: At the first panchayat, the apparent absence of evidence and Lakhan's refusal to cooperate undermine Ramlal's claim.

Scene 15: Domestic conflict, violence against Lakshmi, fighting between father and son, and the forcible taking of a mark complicate the ethical struggle.

Act Two: Scene-by-Scene Discussion

Scene 1: Fearing his son, Lakhan seeks refuge with Ram Kishun; the web of deception encloses the family once again.

Scene 2: Ramlal writes to the sub-divisional and district authorities; the struggle for rights extends into offices.

Scene 3: Official correspondence concerning the complaint passes through various offices to the police station, making the administrative chain clear.

Scene 4: The police investigate Ram Kishun's home; the search for truth falters between hospitality and pressure.

Scene 5: A discussion of money for keeping the police diary deliberately incomplete reveals the deterioration of judicial credibility.

Scene 6: The district officer insists on evidence, while Ram Kishun seeks fresh means of influence.

Scene 7: An attempt is made to deflect the investigation through influential police contacts; bribery reaches political power.

Scene 8: The district officer expresses suspicion; police warnings and unethical transactions are exposed.

Scene 9: Bir proposes the fatal removal of Ramlal, turning economic crime into violent crime.

Scene 10: Conversations involving Ramlal, Jhamlal, Lakshmi, and Bir; the tea shop prepares deception onstage.

Scene 11: Ram Kishun and Bir arrange a contract killing through the criminal leader Raja.

Scene 12: Bir takes Ramlal away; the gang murders him. This is the tragic climax of the play.

Scene 13: Ramlal's absence worries Lakshmi and Jhamlal; fear grows at home amid discussion of the police.

Scene 14: Maternal uncle Lakshman becomes active, and suspicion falls on Bir; private grief becomes a desire to investigate.

Scene 15: The family seeks help from Ram Kishun; the criminal conceals his role.

Scene 16: The remaining payment is discussed within the criminal gang; the audience receives comprehensive confirmation of the contract killing.

Act Three: Scene-by-Scene Discussion

Scene 1: The maternal uncle's initiative, debate about a police complaint, and Ram Kishun's double reaction.

Scene 2: Arrangements for a social meeting—the first form of civic organisation.

Scene 3: A panchayat in the community hall, Lakshmi's statement, and a proposal for compensation; Ram Kishun refuses public opinion.

Scene 4: Protest, applications, and demands for justice before officials; private grief becomes public politics.

Scene 5: Stern action by police and the district officer; the contradiction between anti-corruption speeches and the use of force.

Scene 6: Degrading violence in the treatment of the accused; the point at which criticism of the limits of justice is most necessary.

Scene 7: Administrative consultations and preparations for a public hearing; resolution becomes centred on a higher officer.

Scene 8: News of the elimination of the criminal gang and the imposition at the public hearing of a total ten-lakh-rupee liability upon four wrongdoers.

Scene 9: A proposal to invest in education, financial payments, public praise, Lakhan's grief, and Ram Kishun's apology reveal the limits of compensation.

06 / 06

Bhaet

Democracy, Electoral Power, and Public Theatre

The Public Stage of Democracy

In Maithili theatrical tradition, the experiences of village crossroads, verandahs, public meetings, reconciliation, folk songs, teasing, and collective disputes have continually empowered stage dialogue. Bechan Thakur's Bhaet places a distinctive political moment in this public life—a parliamentary election—at the centre of drama. The word Bhaet in the title is associated within the work with voting, the right to vote, the buying and selling of votes, and the meaning of public opinion. The work's cover identifies it as a social and political play. It is therefore appropriate to classify it as a social drama with elements of political farce; to call it a children's play would contradict the textual evidence.

The play first presents candidates' families and intimate gatherings with their advisers. It then turns public institutions into theatrical sites: the election commissioner's office, the documentary processes of nomination, campaign stages, the panchayat building, police station, polling centre, tea shop, Bhagwati temple, and district headquarters. Private ambitions gradually become institutional crises and community decisions. Rulers, officers, security personnel, brokers, political associates, a female candidate, and voters are mutually dependent in this movement. The work's importance lies not merely in teaching the selection of a 'good leader', but in its dramatic examination of how the language of public welfare can become a cover for opportunism.

The Arrangement of the Subject: Five Candidates and a Public World

The cast list contains 101 numbered roles. The five principal candidates are Gobardhanlal, Phiran, Brajesh, Subhadra, and Vivek. Gobardhanlal combines idealistic political aspirations with financial weakness; Phiran represents previous electoral defeat and dependence on others for financial arrangements; Brajesh, as a sitting member of Parliament, embodies arrogance of office and control over resources; Subhadra supports public service, moderation, and women's political participation; and Vivek represents the display of violent power and anarchic opportunism. These characters are largely constructed as theatrical signs of particular social tendencies rather than fully individuated people, although psychological subtlety is also visible in certain passages.

The opening conversation in Gobardhanlal's home begins with banter about sweets; the possibility of standing for election immediately raises anxiety about a shortage of money. In Phiran's home, the experience of former defeats and loss of land is transformed into electoral bargaining through Rakesh's confidential financial assurances. At Brajesh's residence emerge his indifference towards reports of public hostility, his desire for personal advancement, and a deceptive financial scheme to gather supporters. At Subhadra's gathering, the emotional wound of an earlier defeat and opposition to improper expenditure appear as an inner struggle within political character. At Vivek's place, drinking and boastful reliance on muscle power sharpen the play's line of crisis.

In these five introductions, each candidate addresses a party or circle of associates, but readers hear even more about the political system itself. Gobardhanlal's inability, Phiran's ambition, Brajesh's arrogance, Subhadra's ethical conflict, and Vivek's open threats of violence together form a moral scale against which to measure the available possibilities of democracy.

Individual Close Readings of the Scene Sequence

Gobardhanlal's Verandah: Public Welfare and Electoral Capital

At the beginning, friends' banter over sweets lays the foundation of social intimacy. The moment a proposal to contest the election appears, humour gives way to financial anxiety. There is a gulf between praise for Gobardhanlal's qualifications and the reality of the money required to win an election. The possibility of selling a bigha of farmland suggests that entry into public representation can itself threaten financial ruin. Rameshwar's invitation to eat and Jitendra's ethical advice reveal the mixed presence of cooperation and self-interest within the same group.

Phiran's Home: A History of Defeat and Sponsored Candidacy

Phiran recounts repeated defeats in earlier elections for headman and the sale of his land. The arrival of Rakesh, a close associate of Brajesh, is thus a significant dramatic reversal. The offer of assistance uses the language of independent public service, but financial assurances draw the candidate into a powerful opponent's design. Rakesh's indirect purpose—to divide votes or influence electoral arithmetic—is inferred from the dialogue and situation; it is not presented here as a demonstrably declared objective.

Brajesh's Residence: The Character of Power Estranged from the Public

Suresh and Rakesh report dissatisfaction within the constituency. Brajesh underestimates the people's judgement and relies on plans to tempt them when the election approaches. The bodyguard's dream during sleep creates an independent comic scene that also hints at disorder and complacency within the centre of power. After electoral money passes into Rakesh's hands, his intention to keep a share for himself exposes corruption among intermediaries: the opportunity created by major corruption reproduces itself on a smaller scale.

Subhadra's Residence: The Pain of Defeat and Ethical Alternatives

Subhadra's emotional response to losing an earlier election by a very narrow margin prevents her from becoming an inert emblem of virtue. Umakant argues for the expenditure and struggle necessary to win in practice; Subhadra wishes to avoid improper means. Her political family background and unmarried life are also mentioned. A necessary critical precaution here is that granting a woman's public service moral legitimacy solely because she has renounced marriage can reproduce patriarchal judgements. Subhadra's distinctiveness should be sought in her ability to decide, her service, and her conduct during elections, not in compulsory renunciation of life's choices.

Vivek's Den: The Unrestrained Language of Violence

Vivek's group fantasises about bombs, weapons, seizing polling booths, and acquiring personal property. Corrupt political ambition travels together with humour, drinking, and vulgar songs. Such language may make an audience laugh, but it also evokes fear of the armed hijacking of democracy. These early declarations of violence become narratively connected to the later bloodshed at the polling centre.

The Election Commission: Administrative Problems and Dramatic Examination

Commissioner Rampratap and deputy Giriraj make a successive list of obstacles to voting: booth capture, tampering with ballot boxes or machines, inadequate training, access to remote areas, management of time, vote-buying, and security crises. This section functions as a policy discussion within the play. Its strength is identifying administrative failures before they become political events; its weakness is that reading out a list often becomes a lecture instead of dramatic confrontation. A quarrel among lower-level office employees finally confronts the grand speech on improving administration with practical human weakness.

The Nomination Office: Documents, Influence, and Petty Exactions

The long nomination scene tests the contrasting conduct of five parties against the same administrative apparatus. Gobardhanlal must correct a small error; Phiran is uncomfortable filling in his form and depends on the official's indulgence; Brajesh's application bears the stamp of privilege; Subhadra prepares her documents with comparative clarity; and Vivek's swagger responds violently to demands for compliance with rules. Peon Raghav's expectation of a payment, the employees' helplessness, and unequal enforcement of formal rules constitute powerful institutional satire. 'Paper' becomes both the gateway to popular representation and a routine opportunity for corruption.

Gobardhanlal's Rally: Exaggerated Celebration of Virtues

Supporters cite Gobardhanlal's honesty, diligence, and ties with the public as qualifications for election. Their language is adulatory and full of advance declarations of victory. For readers who have seen his opening financial crisis, this theatrical praise becomes ambiguous: even when the candidate possesses genuine qualities, the management of a crowd turns them into slogans.

Phiran's Rally: Song, Manifesto, and Opportunity

The musical campaign of Phiran's party uses recurring folk melodies and the rhythm of slogans. General promises of public service, education, roads, and religious coexistence make the political voice attractive, but the financial bargain behind the scenes casts a shadow of suspicion over those promises. The distance between presentation and intention is the subject of criticism here.

Brajesh's Rally: The Economy of Gifts and Impossible Promises

The distribution of clothes and declarations of exaggerated welfare schemes make the rally absurd. The sight of people returning empty-handed because gifts have run out reveals the limits of inducements. The real responsibilities of government disappear amid a crowd of impossible promises of distributing goods. The exaggeration of these promises is a device of satire; it would be a mistake to read them as an objective list of government policies.

Subhadra's Rally: Few Words and a Demand for Accountability

Mala emphasises the judicious use of voting rights; in response to the temptation of money, Subhadra speaks of public relationships and work. Without saying so explicitly, the meeting becomes a counterpoint to the preceding three campaign episodes. Subhadra's self-presentation is comparatively restrained, yet her party's slogans are not free of the ridiculous world of party symbols. This tension between the ethical individual and the linguistic machinery of elections is one of the play's subtle achievements.

Vivek's Rally: The Public Declaration of Crime

Here the domineering candidate makes his intention to seize the vote almost an object of public comedy. Warnings from his associates do not weaken his confidence. The play exposes and makes public the normally concealed relationship between power and crime. The theatrical risk is that excessive vulgarity may sometimes lighten the political horror of violence.

Bachcha Babu's Panchayat Meeting: The Irony of the Voters' Collective Judgement

Villagers assemble in the panchayat building to assess the five parties. Their opening discussion turns to public service, candidates' conduct, and social unity. Yet as the candidates arrive one by one and distribute money, the process of collective decision-making becomes a market. Bachcha Babu is a social intermediary, not a just public representative. The village's supposed solidarity is made and unmade through calculations of values, pressure, inducements, and shared gains. The scene does not permit the failure of democracy to be dismissed as merely the fault of leaders: voters too come under critical scrutiny.

The Police Station: Prohibitory Orders, Intoxication, and Punitive Governance

The police announce measures for election security and crowd control. The scene includes a public notice prohibiting campaigning, an episode involving intoxication, and harsh police conduct. The play juxtaposes the need for security with a tendency to humiliate citizens. The boundary between enforcing the law and unlawful arbitrariness becomes a critical question.

The Polling Centre: A Direct Confrontation Between Order and Violence

A school has become a polling centre. Identity cards, voting machines, the presiding officer, and armed security personnel are present. An attempt to capture the booth interrupts ordinary voting procedures, and several characters are killed or injured in gunfire. The full weight of the preceding discussion is concentrated in this scene: what had appeared as the possibility of wrongdoing in earlier declarations now becomes a fatal event. The staging of violence is extensive, so a school-based production with adolescents would require care and adaptation.

The Tea Shop: Rumours of Defeat and Partisan Barbs

After voting, workers from rival groups meet at a tea shop. Discussion of candidates' prospects, alliances, booth violence, and reciprocal accusations turns the shop into a temporary public assembly. The language is quarrelsome, but informal public opinion also takes shape here. Not all political dialogue is produced in public speeches; it is also made in ordinary commercial spaces. This is a perceptive recognition of folk life in the play.

The Bhagwati Temple: Religious Belief as Electoral Exchange

Candidates visit priest Devanath with hopes of victory and questions of offerings or ritual fees. The temple becomes both a site of political ritual and self-interested mediation. The language of devotion mingles with electoral calculations to generate satire. The issue for the critic is not the devaluation of religious faith but the irony of involving religious institutions in bargaining over victory.

Security of the Voting Machines: Refused Bribes and Duty

Before counting, a group of Brajesh's henchmen attempts to tamper with the securely held voting machines. Mahendra and Ravindra reject financial offers, after which there is gunfire and injury. The scene creates positive counterparts in the form of honest government employees. This perspective matters after the earlier picture of administrative corruption: the playwright does not declare the entire system equally fallen.

The Count: Numerical Evidence and the Failure of a Proposal to Seize Power

At district headquarters, following the count and the honouring of security personnel, the results are announced. Subhadra receives 125,361 votes, Gobardhanlal 50,009, Phiran 15,080, and Brajesh 5,002; Vivek's total is not stated separately. The winner's margin over the nearest rival is 75,352 votes, as arithmetic confirms. When an influential telephone call seeks to change the result, the district magistrate's refusal becomes the play's ethical climax. Subhadra wins by a very large margin; the corrupt power visible only moments earlier thus seems ineffective before an overwhelming popular mandate.

Post-Victory Public Contact: The Open Test of the Duties of Office

The final scene does not stop at celebrations of Subhadra's victory. It ends with promises to visit the public even after being elected, tour the constituency regularly, and listen to people's problems. This produces a scene opposite to Brajesh's initial distance from his constituents. The character's future actions are not shown in the play; the promises are therefore an ethical programme, not demonstrated achievements. The final critical question is which long-term institutional measures will turn declarations into accountability.

Character Construction and the Social Meaning of 101 Roles

Giving names to 101 roles is more than expanding the crowd. From the election commission to village voters, peons, clerks, security personnel, priests, local brokers, and party workers, the cast list extends the play's social terrain. Although power is concentrated at the top, its operation depends upon intermediate institutions and the conduct of ordinary people. Brajesh's parliamentary position does not make him omnipotent; security personnel at the polling centre and the counting officer set limits on his influence.

Such abundance of characters also makes staging difficult. Most roles have a clear function, not a private life history. This has advantages for a large community production, in which many performers may participate; for a small professional company, abridgement, doubling of roles, and planning of ensemble scenes would be necessary. Reading Bechan Thakur's theatrical tradition in the context of public participation and parallel theatre reveals this work's distinctive theatrical meaning.

Power, Money, and Ethics: Three Interconnected Economies

First comes inequality of resources: Gobardhanlal's life based on landholding and Brajesh's enormous electoral means do not make equality within the same competition possible. Second is the intermediary economy of opportunism: Rakesh, local organisers, and nomination employees take shares of money circulating between politics and society. Third is the symbolic economy of garlands, slogans, praise, food, alcohol, the distribution of clothes, religious offerings, and victory celebrations. At the intersection of these three economies, the vote risks becoming a marketable commodity rather than a civic decision.

The political heart of the play is therefore more than satire of corrupt public representatives. At the village meeting, supposed 'collective wisdom' gradually assumes the form of collective acceptance of gifts. This raises the question of whether democratic education ends with electoral registers and instruction in using voting machines, or whether it also demands collective judgement, the capacity to express dissent, and the practice of rejecting short-term gains. At this level, the text can become a popular school of institutional ethics.

The Aesthetics of Satire, Folk Humour, and the Disruption of Rasa

In most episodes, the satire lies more in the situation than in the words. An invitation to enjoy sweets collides with the financial crisis of electoral life; government officers extol rules while pressure operates inside their own offices; campaigners promise public progress while exhibiting untrustworthy indulgence; and a temple's blessings become a form of political investment. Humour here mingles with compassion, fear, and indignation.

Several scenes may be read through the Indian theatrical vocabulary of comic, furious, fearful, and heroic sentiments. This is not an inflexible classification of the work into rasas, but a comparison of dramatic effects. Gunfire at the polling centre breaks the continuity of humour. Vulgar episodes of crowd-pleasing folk farce also sometimes weaken powerful political criticism; in particular, insulting language and jokes about drinking can both resist authority and satisfy an audience's easy appetite for entertainment. The critic must explain rather than evade this tension.

Language, Speech, and Multilingual Characterisation

Local colloquial Maithili forms the underlying axis of the entire play. Onstage one hears administrative Hindi, Hindi-mixed dialogue among security personnel, Vivek's group's unstable Maithili-Hindi mixture, and different uses of rural proverbs. Language maps the social world: officials use bureaucratic vocabulary; politicians adopt popular forms of address and slogans; intimidating power uses the tone of vulgar threats. The aesthetic value of these differences must be sought not simply in linguistic purity or impurity, but in characters' power relationships and their roles before listeners.

The Contradictions of Women's Representation: Subhadra's Political Agency

As the only major female candidate, Subhadra carries particular weight within the play's gender structure. Her colleague Mala actively participates in policy discussion, yet independently political female characters are scarce in the other groups. Subhadra's electoral journey moves from the memory of defeat to renewed action, resistance to improper expenditure, a succinct account of the duties of public office at rallies, victory in the count, and a renewed promise of public contact. This degree of development partly saves her from becoming a passive symbol.

Nonetheless, the verbal convention of supporting the moral superiority of her character through her father's prestige and her decision not to marry invites criticism. The justification of women's political rights should rest upon service and autonomous intellectual decisions. These foundations are clearly present in the text, yet an ideal of womanhood defined by sacrifice accompanies them. The work's strength lies in making this contradiction visible.

The Historical Perspective of Parallel Maithili Theatre

Gajendra Thakur's A Complete Critical Appreciation of Bechan Thakur, published in Videha, places Bechan Thakur's writings within a socially committed tradition of parallel Maithili theatre. It gives Bhaet particular importance because of electoral corruption, the criminalisation of power, and the political breadth created by its many roles. This external critical proposition provides a framework for examination, not automatic proof from the primary play. In the present reading, changes of setting from local verandahs to election offices, the multitude of characters, and an open examination of democratic hypocrisy support that proposition.

Ashish Anchinhar's Bechan Thakurjik Natak Chhinar Devi (Videha, issue 82, 2011) documents Videha's critical engagement with Thakur's plays. The works do not have identical subjects—gendered social questions are central to Chhinar Devi, electoral politics to Bhaet—yet they share the generic direction of examining social injustice on a vernacular stage. The latter work can consequently be read as part of a broader dramatic project of social concern, without introducing unread incidents from the other play merely to demonstrate similarity.

Brechtian Distancing, Popular Engagement, and the Practical Demands of Staging

The characters' direct discussion of the political system amid scenes of farce does not confine the audience to an emotional centre of pity or fear; it also gives them an opportunity to question the causes underlying that system. In this sense, Bechan Thakur's theatrical method invites critical comparison with Brechtian alienation. The text, however, offers no documentary evidence of direct historical influence, and the relationship must therefore be described as one of formal resemblance alone. Public debate involving a large cast, the sequence of campaign scenes, electoral songs, and the episodic expansion of the plot together give the play a collective rather than an individual heroic perspective.

A stage adaptation would face considerable difficulty in accommodating 101 characters, the arrangements for five campaign groups, numerous offices, festive gatherings, panchayat meetings, a temple, and successive changes of location to polling stations. A village community theatre festival could accommodate broad participation; a theatre with limited resources would benefit from symbolic sets, choral voices, distinct lighting areas, and the combining of supporting roles. If the shooting scene were conveyed through light, sound, and acting rather than the display of realistic firearms, the horror of violence could be preserved without unnecessary sensationalism.

A Comparative Reading in the History of Children's Literature: Generic Distance, Not Equivalence

Videha's research collections provide archival evidence of distinct writing on children's folklore, illustrated stories, children's novels, and children's drama. Phoolchandra Jha 'Praveen's' Maithili Shishu Lok Sahitya (issue 50, 2010), Dr Yoganand Jha's Maithili Ballokkatha: Sthiti a Apeksha (issue 76, 2011), Durganand Mandal's Nena Lel Sundar Chitrakatha (issue 116, 2012), and Ramesh Ranjan's Maithili Balnatak Seema Vistar Karait—Chauari (issue 126, 2013) are archival indications of these distinct areas of inquiry. Gajendra Thakur's Maithili Bal-Upanyasak Samikshashastra (issue 447, 2026) examines in detail child-centred narrative structures, folk memory, children's agency, and adaptation appropriate to young readers. On the basis of these references, it is more appropriate to examine the possibilities and limitations of Bhaet for young readers than to force it into the category of children's literature.

Children's folktales generally depend upon the receptive capacities of the child's mind, imagination, sonic rhythm, and a compact narrative cycle; illustrated narratives give priority to the mutual support of words and pictures; and children's theatre centres on roles appropriate to young performers, manageable duration, participation, and the ethical presentation of fear and emotional intensity. Bhaet contains 101 characters, extended institutional dialogue, complicated transactions between political parties, abusive political speech, drinking, and bloody violence. These features make the work, in its primary character, a political drama for adult audiences.

Nevertheless, selected scenes inspired by the work could be useful in a curricular adaptation for adolescent civic education. Transparency in nominations, secrecy of the ballot, the consequences of inducements, women's leadership, the prevention of electoral violence, and responsibility for public contact after victory are suitable subjects for discussion in senior classes. Such use would not alter the original generic identity of Bhaet; an adapted production for adolescents would constitute a new creative theatrical experiment.

The Text's Principal Achievements and Limitations: A Critical Balance

The first major achievement is the dramatic representation of the entire electoral life cycle, from the selection of candidates to promises made after the election. Second is the inclusion, alongside politicians, of voters, junior employees, security personnel, intermediaries, and priests, making corruption a multilayered social event. Third is the elevation of local speech and village public spaces into the intellectual centre of the play. Fourth is the preservation of possibilities for resistance through a female candidate and honest public employees. Fifth is the documentary-style ending with an actual count of votes within the fiction, followed by the elected representative's pledge to work.

The limitations are not insignificant. The breadth of 101 characters renders many roles flat. The episode concerning the Election Commission sometimes becomes more of a lecture on political ethics than a dramatic scene. Coarse abuse and jokes about alcohol can obstruct the force of social criticism. In presenting the female candidate as a moral ideal, the text does not fully free itself from the conventional image of women's self-sacrifice. The greatest problem of narrative plausibility is that, after depicting the public's widespread acceptance of inducements, the play does not sufficiently elaborate the political process that makes Subhadra's victory by an enormous margin possible. Although morally satisfying, the conclusion is somewhat hurried in its realistic chain of causes and effects.

Numerical Verification of the Election Result and Its Ideological Meaning

Verification of the margin: 125,361 − 50,009 = 75,352. The margin announced in the play agrees with this figure. This numerical consistency in the counting of votes is important; nevertheless, when interpreting the mandate, the result must be understood as part of the playwright's imagined political world, not as data from a real election.

Conclusion: The Unfinished Passage from Popular Mandate to Public Service

Bhaet is an ambitious work in the sociopolitical development of Maithili drama. Its overall structure presents democracy not merely as a moral sermon but as a public process. Moving from private conversation on the village verandah to election-office records, from the village panchayat to the risks of voting, and from religious sites to administrative decisions, the play reveals the mechanisms of power through a succession of small actions. Its collective dimension gives it breadth, but that same collectivity sometimes weakens its poetic concentration.

The final victory clearly expresses the playwright's faith that people can exercise sound judgement in the face of money, violence, and deceit. Yet victory is not conclusive proof of virtue. The real test will be Subhadra's future service to the public, which would begin only after the play ends. The work's enduring relevance lies in this open question. Its most valuable contribution, in the view of this study, is to conceive of democratic culture not as a procedure confined to ballot papers or voting machines but as a continuing practice of public accountability.

References

Works Reviewed and References

Publication details of the works under review and related literary criticism published in Videha.

Works by Bechan Thakur Reviewed

Thakur, Bechan. Navghar. Collection of plays. Nirmali (Supaul): Pallavi Prakashan. The available edition bears the year 2018; the edition details contain a discrepancy concerning the year. ISBN 978-93-87675-59-9.

Thakur, Bechan. Betik Apman a Chhinar Devi. Delhi: Shruti Prakashan. The first edition is marked 2010; the chronological reference in the foreword calls for caution when determining the year. ISBN 978-93-80538-35-8.

Thakur, Bechan. Bap Bhel Pitti a Adhikar. Delhi: Shruti Prakashan, 2012. ISBN 978-93-80538-91-4.

Thakur, Bechan. Unch-Nich. Delhi: Shruti Prakashan, 2013.

Thakur, Bechan. Biswasghat. Delhi: Shruti Prakashan, 2013.

Thakur, Bechan. Bhaet. A Maithili social and political play. Publication year not established.

Criticism and Archival Literature Published in Videha

Anchinhar, Ashish. 'Bechan Thakurjik Natak Chhinar Devi.' Videha, issue 82, 15 May 2011.

Thakur, Gajendra. 'A Complete Critical Appreciation of Bechan Thakur: Pioneer of the Videha Maithili Parallel Theatre Movement.' A Parallel History of Mithila & Maithili Literature, volume 62, Videha.

Thakur, Gajendra. 'Maithili Natyamanch/Natak Lel Ekta Samiksha Siddhant' (parts 1–7). Videha, issues 443–447, 2026.

Thakur, Gajendra. 'Natya-Navagraha.' Videha, issue 447, 1 August 2026.

Thakur, Gajendra. 'Maithili Bal-Upanyasak Samikshashastra.' Videha, issue 447, 1 August 2026.

Jha, Phoolchandra 'Praveen'. 'Maithili Shishu Lok Sahitya.' Videha, issue 50, 15 January 2010.

Jha, Yoganand. 'Maithili Ballokkatha: Sthiti a Apeksha.' Videha, issue 76, 15 February 2011.

Mandal, Durganand. 'Nena Lel Sundar Chitrakatha.' Videha, issue 116, 15 October 2012.

Ranjan, Ramesh. 'Maithili Balnatak Seema Vistar Karait—Chauari.' Videha, issue 126, 15 March 2013.

Mandal, Umesh. 'Dosar Charanak Pahil Sagar Rati Deep Jaray: Digital Formme 37 Pothik Lokarpan.' Videha, issue 120, 15 December 2012.

Videha. 'Videha Research Articles: Issues 1–451.' Consolidated subject index of research articles.

Videha. 'Book Collection.' Bibliography of Maithili literature.

STUDY 09 / NIT NAVAL

Kunal

Chapter 1

Kunal's Dramatic World: Folk Theatre, Classical Tradition, and Criticism

A Comprehensive Study of Kusma-Salhes and Six Other Plays

1. Introduction: The Collection and Its Publication History

Kunal's Kusma-Salhes and Six Other Plays occupies a distinctive place in contemporary Maithili dramatic literature. Both in its substantive concerns and in its formal construction, the collection is oriented towards performance. These are not merely "closet dramas," written to be read rather than performed, but plays that have been repeatedly staged, tested in performance, and refined through theatrical experiment. The publisher's account substantiates this: all seven plays were first staged at Vidyapati Bhavan in Patna and were subsequently published in periodicals such as Bhangima and Antika. A critical examination of the collection must therefore go beyond textual interpretation to place theatricality—the plays' potential and actual life onstage—at the centre of its inquiry.

The dedication page is itself a manifesto for the theatre: "To the known and unknown people and artists who perform plays ('naach') from village to village, and to J. Brahmanand, the Vishvakarma of Bhangima." This dedication contains in embryo Kunal's entire theatrical vision. On one side, he honours the anonymous village performers of naach, a tradition that has lived in the soil of Mithila for centuries while remaining largely unnamed in institutional literary histories. On the other, he acknowledges his theatre company, Bhangima, several of whose artists—including J. Brahmanand—participated in the original productions. The cover illustration is by Vinay Ambar and bears clear echoes of Mithila's tradition of folk painting.

2. The Architecture of the Collection: A Design in Two Cycles

Considered together, the seven plays fall into two readily discernible cycles. The author does not explicitly announce this division, yet it emerges from their form, their sources, and the chronology of their composition.

(a) The folk-theatre trilogy comprises Forty Thieves and Gonu Jha, Bidapat, and the title play Kusma-Salhes. All three are expansive, populous, song-and-dance-rich dramas grounded in Mithila's own narrative and performance traditions—naach, Salhes Naach, and Bidapat Naach. Their dates of composition range from 1990 to 2006.

(b) The quartet of love consists of The Vow of Love, or Shruvavati's Victory!; The Power of Faith, or Sukanya's Marriage; The Expansion of Love, or Shweta's Discovery; and The Test of Love, or Suprabha and Ashtavakra. These four relatively short plays, with economical casts and mythological or narrative foundations, were published in Antika in 2013–14. Their titles follow a common pattern, beginning with an abstract emotional or ethical value—love or faith. At the centre of each play stands a woman who makes decisions for herself.

What binds these two cycles is the affirmation of love as a vital principle of existence. The refrain of the closing song of Kusma-Salhes—"As a flower is without nectar, so what is life without love?"—returns almost verbatim in Shweta's Discovery. Thus a continuous thread of thought extends from the folk-theatre trilogy to the quartet of love.

3. A General Survey of the Seven Plays

3.1 Forty Thieves and Gonu Jha, or The Tale of Gyan Jha

This is the first and most formally experimental work in the collection. Its opening offers a particularly fine example of self-referential theatre. Three bhats, traditional bards, enter the stage and lament their dying art: "Our learning has now become useless." When their customary verses and songs of praise fail to move their audience, they decide that they must stage a play instead. Within this single scene Kunal dramatises three historical realities at once: the decline of Maithili bardic culture, the crisis of arts formerly sustained by royal patronage, and the transition of traditional performers towards the theatre.

Within this outer frame unfolds a familiar tale from the Gonu Jha cycle of Mithila. The ruler has bestowed upon Gonu the title of "supreme master of cunning"; humiliated court poets approach him seeking justice; and eventually a band of forty thieves sets out to plunder his house. Gonu defeats them not by force but by intelligence. He inflames their rivalry with the symbolic lure of the headcloth of leadership and deceives them through a farcical, fraudulent coronation ritual. The result is an unusual union of hasya rasa, the comic sentiment, and vira rasa, the heroic sentiment: heroism becomes an attribute of ingenuity rather than of arms.

The play reaches its intellectual climax at the end, when the bhats step out of their roles and dispute the story's conclusion: "But in that case, brother, hasn't the ending of the play changed?" Through this exchange Kunal reveals the fluidity of theatrical reality, the possibility of alternative endings, and the visibility of the creative process before an audience. This is followed by a pointed social observation: theft is described as a social malady "arising from illiteracy and poverty," to be addressed through just social arrangements rather than punishment alone.

At the close the bhats spread out a gamchha, a cotton cloth, and ask the audience for contributions. This is not simply a realistic depiction of the collection of a folk performer's fee; it is also a moving recognition of the relation between artistic labour and livelihood. The final song declares, "There is no strength greater than intelligence." This is the thesis of the drama as a whole and gives meaning to its alternative title, The Tale of Gyan Jha.

Seen from the perspective of Navya-Nyaya, the play's central value of intelligence is, more precisely, a celebration of prama (valid cognition) and yukti (reasoned method). Every one of Gonu's victories is won not through physical strength but through inference, imaginative conjecture, and argument. Beneath its comic surface, the play offers an indigenous affirmation of epistemological inquiry.

3.2 Bidapat

Bidapat—the popular pronunciation of Vidyapati's name—provides one of the most accomplished examples of Kunal's dramatic craftsmanship. The title page calls it "a play based on the techniques of folk theatre," but its form is actually a synthesis of classical and popular theatrical traditions. The work opens with purvaranga, the preliminary performance, and adopts the classical dialogue between the sutradhara and the actress, while also incorporating the samaji or chorus, the clown-like Vipata, and Natua, familiar figures of the folk stage.

Its most remarkable formal achievement lies in the dense, careful, and purposeful use of Vidyapati's own songs. Invocations to Shiva and Bhairavi, verses celebrating spring ("A new Vrindavan, ever-new groves … the youthful lover plays"), songs of separation ("Shape a face from the essence of the moon, eyes like the startled chakora"), and the concluding song in the Avahatta manner are woven into the dramatic movement so closely that the play becomes, in effect, a theatrical commentary on Vidyapati's lyrics.

The plot weaves Vidyapati's life through three strands of relationship: his patron and friend Shiv Singh, Shiv Singh's queen Lakhima, and the well-known legend of his servant Ugna, who was in fact Lord Mahadeva. The closing movement is deeply affecting: Shiv Singh disappears during the battle of Oini; Lakhima refuses to accept that her husband is dead and persists in waiting for him; and Vidyapati carries his grief throughout his life. Lakhima is not represented as a conventional image of the sati, but as a resolute, dignified woman who chooses to wait. This is a subtle rereading of the inherited narrative.

The play's power of suggestion—dhvani in the terminology of Indian poetics—reaches its height in its ending. Vidyapati declares that he will remain alive in his songs, and that Shiv Singh, Lakhima, Vipata, Natua, and Ugna will also achieve immortality through them. Beneath the karuna rasa of sorrow runs a deeper current of shanta rasa, tranquillity: poetry's enduring life is set against bereavement and death. Ultimately, Bidapat takes Vidyapati down from the institutional literary historian's pedestal of "great poet" and restores him to life as a hero of folk theatre. It is an outstanding dramatic instance of Videha's approach to parallel history.

3.3 Kusma-Salhes

That this is the title play is no accident of its centrality: artistically and ideologically, it is the heart of the collection. Its title page describes it as a "play based on the epic legend of Raja Salhes and the folk theatre of Salhes Naach." Raja Salhes is the folk-deity and hero of Mithila's Dusadh (Dalit) community, while Salhes Naach is the performance tradition associated with him. The choice of source is itself a cultural and political statement. Rather than draw on Mithila's elite-centred literary inheritance, Kunal bases his most ambitious drama on a subaltern epic.

The cast expands on an epic scale: Salhes, king of Mahisautha; Kusma, the gardener heroine; Hiraman, the parrot who carries the narrative; Vipata, the clown of naach; Salhes's animal companions, the tiger Thanka and the bear Banka; the yogini sisters of the gardener community; kingdoms such as Morang, Bhot, Baghgarh, and Samdagarh; and the goddess Durga herself. This breadth preserves the defining structure of Salhes Naach: the preliminary ritual, invocation or sumiran, choral singing, and a geographical journey unfolding scene by scene.

The opening sumiran is a remarkable statement of religious and cultural syncretism. Alongside gods, Baba-Dihbar, gurus and gosains, the rising sun, the Ganges, and Gora-Parvati, it invokes Mira-Sultan, a Muslim pir associated with the west, and finally "all society" and "the people of the nation." Even the greetings addressed to the spectators are inclusive: "Pranam, namaste, adaab, good evening, salaam." Such syncretism belongs to the cultural character of the Dusadh Salhes tradition itself, which Kunal brings to the stage with fidelity.

Kusma's account of herself—born a princess, she abandoned the palace to become a forest-dwelling gardener—is rich in the imagery and resonances of folk poetry. Memories of pilgrimages to Janakpur, Kamru-Kamakhya, and Visunpur, together with the words spoken by Durga in a dream when Kusma was twelve, supply its emotional landscape. Yet the play's central conflict is not simply a romance; it is the struggle between love and the hunger for power.

That conflict culminates when the expansionist emperor Suchong chains Salhes in the prison at Rangilagarh and dreams of exercising undisputed sovereignty over all Mithila. The soul of the drama speaks through Salhes's response: "My life may be in your fist, Emperor. But my thoughts and feelings cannot be bound. Salhes may cease to exist, but the people, filled with the message of a life free from fear, will remain." In this single speech, Kunal transforms the Dusadh folk-deity Salhes into a people's hero, a symbol of fearlessness and freedom; the gardener sisters become embodiments of peace, compassion, affection, joy, and the welfare of the people.

The play closes with collective song and dance, giving voice to its enduring refrain: "Love is truth, love is fragrance, the feeling of love is everlasting; as a flower without nectar, so what is life without love?" Here the erotic sentiment, shringara rasa, transcends its worldly plane to become a universal human principle. Love is not merely attachment between individuals, but a creative force in existence. With the authenticity of its folkloric sources, its political awareness, and its poetic consummation brought together, this is the strongest play in the collection.

3.4 The Quartet of Love: Four Heroines from Myth

The final four plays form a coherent sequence of ideas. All share a common dramatic grammar: a limited cast, doubling of roles by the same actor, tiered or bare staging, a narrator or announcer, and intermittent use of Vidyapati's songs. Through their four mythological or narrative heroines they affirm modern values: women's agency, self-determination, and the dignity of love.

The Vow of Love, or Shruvavati's Victory! Shruvavati, daughter of the sage Bharadvaja, rejects the conventional criteria of marriage—a handsome, wealthy, and valiant husband—and declares that she will marry only when someone becomes genuinely "meaningful" to her. Calling herself an "independent and self-reliant" person, she wishes to be an "exception" to tradition. Indra, disguised as Vashishtha, challenges her to cook a fruit before sunset. The fruit turns to stone; but Shruvavati, finding a life bereft of the memory of love meaningless, resolves to enter the funeral pyre. Her strength of will compels Indra to yield. The play's central proposition is that "inner strength is a human being's greatest wealth." Although the convention of entering the fire creates tension with the feminist reading of the work, its focus is on the force of resolve rather than on sacrifice.

The Power of Faith, or Sukanya's Marriage. This dramatisation of the Sukanya–Chyavana episode from the Mahabharata concerns the lively, playful princess Sukanya and the aged sage Chyavana, absorbed in meditation within an anthill. It begins with Vidyapati's spring song, "The king of seasons, spring, has arrived." Amid the queen's anxiety and King Sharyati's delighted paternal affection, a subtle philosophical exchange takes place: "If you close your eyes, you will not see that tree … but everything is still there." The exchange brings the distinction between knowledge and its object onto the stage: something's not being apprehended does not imply that it does not exist. The heart of the play is faith. Sukanya's steadfastness restores Chyavana's youth.

The Expansion of Love, or Shweta's Discovery. This is the most imaginatively original work in the quartet. After seven years of rigorous artistic discipline, the court dancer Shweta falls in love with King Atiratha. Yet Atiratha remains "detached" from art: advocating the discriminating faculty of separating milk from water, he distinguishes art from the body and declares that "to fall in love would be utter folly." Shweta answers with a poet's words: "As a flower is without nectar, so what is life without love?"—the very principle heard in the closing refrain of Kusma-Salhes. She vows to compel the "detached" king to make a declaration of love himself. The doubleness of the word "discovery" is apt: Shweta discovers both love and her own capacity to act. Kunal turns the dancer, conventionally treated as an "object," into an agent. This is the play's major achievement.

The Test of Love, or Suprabha and Ashtavakra. The central theme of this story of the profound affection between the sage Ashtavakra—literally, "bent in eight places"—and Suprabha, daughter of the sage Vadanya, is that of testing. Vadanya sends Ashtavakra to heaven and into Urvashi's company to test Suprabha's fidelity. Suprabha refuses the prospect of choosing another king as her husband and insists that she will "wait for Ashtavakra." Ashtavakra rejects Urvashi, returns, and marries Suprabha. The closing couplet states the play's essence: "As fire makes gold shine more brightly, so love, when tested, grows more profound."

4. Kunal's Dramaturgy: Folk Theatre, Classical Tradition, and Modernity

The most striking characteristic of Kunal's theatrical language is its deliberate synthesis of three traditions. From classical Sanskrit drama he adopts the purvaranga, the dialogue of the sutradhara and actress, and an invocation resembling the nandi. From Mithila's folk theatre, or naach, he places at the centre the samaji chorus, the clown Vipata, the parrot as narrator, collective song and dance, direct address to the audience, and bare or tiered stage arrangements. The third component consists of the self-referential techniques and forms of "distancing" associated with modern theatre.

It is appropriate here to recall Western dramatic theory. Brecht's "epic theatre" and its alienation or distancing effect, through which the audience is repeatedly reminded that it is watching a play, appear in Kunal's work as organic features of folk performance. The bhat framework in Forty Thieves, the performers' abandonment of their roles and debate over alternative endings; Vipata's repeated interruption in Bidapat—"Move the story along!"; and the metatheatrical commentary of Hiraman and Vipata in Kusma-Salhes all continually break the "fourth wall." What is significant is that techniques presented by Brecht as avant-garde experiments in the West had long been intrinsic to Mithila's naach. Kunal reveals this indigenous modernity.

Kunal's attention to the practical demands of staging is exceptional. At the end of Forty Thieves he notes that the play exists in versions of forty-five minutes, sixty minutes, and one hour, and that a fourth, radio-drama version was broadcast as a series of thirteen episodes. He also proposes that a single actor may play several parts. Such details show that the texts were written with the actual needs of performance in mind: they are scripts capable of being acted, not simply imaginings of a theatrical possibility.

5. Language, Metre, and Poetic Beauty: Rasa, Dhvani, and Vakrokti

Kunal's language is not uniform but layered. In the folk-theatre trilogy he employs idiomatic rural Maithili, alliterative rhymes, and song forms in which the popular expressions of hasya, the comic, and shringara, the erotic, predominate. In the quartet of love he turns instead to a comparatively Sanskritic, tatsama-rich and literary Maithili appropriate to the atmosphere of the hermitage and the dignity of myth. These linguistic choices reveal his understanding of character and dramatic milieu.

From the perspective of vakrokti, or oblique expression, the folk plays bring verbal indirection to an intense pitch. The "headcloth of leadership," Kusma's lahathi bangles (in contrast to chains), "the wedding blessing versus the funeral rite," and the title "supreme master of cunning" all draw dramatic energy from double meanings and wordplay. From the perspective of dhvani, the ending of Bidapat (survival through song) and the refrain celebrating love in Kusma-Salhes rise beyond literal meaning towards suggestion: tranquillity sounds beneath sorrow, and a spiritual resonance arises above erotic love.

Kunal's recourse to Vidyapati's songs is a conscious poetic strategy. They are not mere ornaments; through them he seeks to make Mithila's poetic memory a living element of the stage. In Bidapat he creates a theatrical exegesis of Vidyapati's lyrics, whereas in Sukanya a spring song becomes an instrument of atmosphere. The lyric tradition and the dramatic tradition thus merge into each other.

6. A Navya-Nyaya Perspective: Valid Cognition, Absence, and Epistemic Authority

The collection contains several dramatised strands of epistemological reflection that may be interpreted through the categories of Navya-Nyaya. In Forty Thieves, each of Gonu's triumphs is a victory of inference and reasoning, and thus of valid cognition or prama. In the conflict between force and intelligence, the play elevates the processes of obtaining knowledge above the exercise of power.

The exchange in Sukanya—"If you close your eyes, you will not see the tree, but everything is still there"—brings to the stage a central Navya-Nyaya insight: the absence of knowledge of something is not the absence of the thing itself (non-apprehension is not non-existence). Without contact between the sense organ and its object, there can be no perception; nevertheless, the object remains. The distinction between knowing and what is known becomes an ethical argument for acknowledging reality.

Shruvavati's arguments about "meaningfulness" and Atiratha's faculty of discrimination between "milk and water" both raise questions concerning relations and the apprehension of qualifying properties: which quality is meaningful or acceptable within which relation? In this sense Kunal's plays also carry an indigenous epistemology beneath the appearance of entertainment.

At a broader level, the collection poses a question about epistemic authority: the validity of popular knowledge and popular memory. The Salhes epic, the Gonu cycle, and Bidapat Naach are not "unauthentic" folk narratives, but evidence of a parallel tradition of knowledge. This is the collection's unspoken proposition.

7. Ideological Foundations: The Perspective of Videha's Parallel History

The significance of this collection becomes especially apparent when viewed through Videha's conception of a parallel literary history. Institutional literary histories have tended to privilege elite-centred, printed, and supposedly "refined" traditions. Kunal instead grounds his entire dramatic practice in folk theatre and popular narrative. By dedicating his work to nameless naach performers, he brings into the centre of literary history people whose names have never been recorded there.

His presentation of the Dusadh (Dalit) folk-deity Salhes as a people's hero and a symbol of freedom and fearlessness is this perspective's most powerful expression: it is the theatrical recognition of a subaltern voice. In Bidapat, Kunal releases the great poet Vidyapati from his institutional monument and brings him alive on the folk stage. In the quartet of love, he reinterprets mythological heroines—Shruvavati, Sukanya, Shweta, and Suprabha—as women who determine their own actions. These are different aspects of the same vision of parallel history.

Resistance operates simultaneously at three levels: caste (Dalit and subaltern assertion), gender (women's agency), and culture (Hindu–Muslim accommodation). Yet it never assumes the character of slogan-making; it enters the natural movement of folk form. This is evidence of Kunal's ideological maturity.

8. Limitations and Questions

The Limitations, Weaknesses, and Ideological Tensions of the Seven Plays

Introduction: Why Criticism Is Necessary

A balanced literary assessment cannot be accomplished through praise alone. Kunal's Kusma-Salhes and Six Other Plays is an important contribution to Maithili dramatic literature, as demonstrated by the repeated staging of the seven plays, their publication in Bhangima and Antika, and their eventual appearance as a collected volume. Precisely this seriousness of purpose makes the reader and critic responsible: the more considerable a play's achievements, the more candidly its limitations should be acknowledged.

The purpose of identifying weaknesses, ideological tensions, formal constraints, and excessive repetitions in all seven plays is not to invalidate them, but to offer a constructive perspective for future dramatic writing.

Structural Limitations: Unequal Scale and Disrupted Rhythm

The most immediately visible structural problem of the collection is the unequal length of its seven plays. Kusma-Salhes is an expansive work of approximately seventy pages, while The Vow of Love, or Shruvavati's Victory! concludes in only fourteen. A reader or prospective director moving from Kusma-Salhes to Shruvavati is abruptly taken from an "epic world" into a short "chamber piece." The transition is not an easy one.

Consider the comparison:

Forty Thieves and Gonu Jha: 74 pages · Bidapat: 48 pages · Kusma-Salhes: 70 pages · Shruvavati: 14 pages · Sukanya: 26 pages · Shweta: 18 pages · Suprabha–Ashtavakra: 28 pages.

The average length of the first three plays is sixty-four pages, whereas that of the last four is twenty-one. This raises an issue of book architecture. The two groups seem almost to belong in different collections; their presentation within the same volume makes the reading experience feel somewhat uneven.

The Monotony of the "Or" Title Formula

The titles of all four plays in the love quartet follow the same formula: "[abstract feeling], or [heroine's name] and [an action]." In the first few instances, the pattern appears fresh, combining a classical emotion with a popular exclamation. By the fourth, however, repetition produces a mechanical effect. The reader recognises the formula as soon as the title is encountered, and the element of surprise disappears.

Compare Bidapat, one word dense with possible meanings, and Kusma-Salhes, two names suggesting epic scope. Both titles possess the vitality of their plays. The Expansion of Love, or Shweta's Discovery, by contrast, has a relatively conventional and formulaic title. This repeated titling is one of the quartet's limitations.

Weaknesses and Ideological Tensions in Individual Plays

Forty Thieves and Gonu Jha

(a) An Excess of Metatheatre

The play's metatheatrical devices—the exchanges among the bhats, the alternative endings, and direct address to the audience—are admirable from a dramaturgical standpoint. Yet when the bhats announce in the final scene that "theft is a social malady arising from illiteracy and poverty," the dramatic message becomes an act of telling. Judged by the principle attributed here to Bharata—that drama shows rather than tells—this final scene is weaker. The implied social meaning ought to emerge through what takes place on stage; the bhats' explicit interpretation is unnecessary.

(b) The Two-Dimensional Portrayal of the Thieves

Compared with Gonu Jha, the forty thieves—especially Durmatiya and Debaha—remain little more than instruments of comedy. The "social malady" of poverty and illiteracy, acknowledged by the playwright himself at the close, is given no dramatic depth in their portrayal. There is a contradiction here: the play concludes with a progressive social explanation, yet throughout it the thieves remain objects at which the audience is invited to laugh. A social-realist dramaturgy would address this contradiction by making the thieves' deprivation humanly palpable in at least one scene.

(c) The Ambivalence of the Gamchha Episode

The scene in which the performers spread out a gamchha to collect donations works in two registers at once: as a Brechtian "transparency" that exposes the economic vulnerability of artists, and as a criticism of the patronage of the arts by the state. Yet the playwright develops neither meaning fully. The episode consequently resembles a mechanical repetition of a folk convention rather than a fully considered dramatic decision.

Bidapat

(a) Vipata's "Move the Story Along!": From Humour to Interruption

Vipata's cry, "Move the story along!", initially appears as a lively device of folk theatre. But it is repeated so often that it ceases to operate as a Brechtian distancing effect and becomes a mechanical interruption. Once spectators know that Vipata will say the same thing again, the element of surprise is lost. The alienation effect works best when it is unexpected; here it becomes entirely predictable.

(b) The Incomplete Treatment of Ugna as Mahadeva

The fact that Ugna is in truth Mahadeva is a major element of the popular legend and ought to produce one of the play's central emotional moments. Instead, Ugna's divine identity is conveyed through another character's report, in Amiyakar's words, rather than being manifested in direct dramatic action. Consequently, the episode does not achieve its full emotional force, although it represents a moment of revelation in the devotional tradition surrounding Vidyapati.

(c) The Conflict Between Historicity and Poetic Representation

The play declares its historical setting to be approximately 1400–1450 CE, yet its dramaturgy consistently adopts a poetic, folkloric register. The tension between these modes surfaces at times. The scene at the Jaunpur court, for example, invokes historical reality, but its presentation through Amiyakar's humorous impersonation diminishes that gravity. The balance between history and poetry is not always steady.

Kusma-Salhes

(a) The One-Dimensional Villains: Suchong and Chuhar

The antagonists in the collection's most ambitious play become one-dimensional figures. Suchong, Chuharmall, and Tarumall are little more than aggregates of evil attributes, without inner conflict or recognisable human complexity. When they torture Budhesar, their collective laughter ("Ho … ho …") accompanies a superficial depiction of cruelty. A compelling villain in an epic drama ought to be capable of making spectators understand, even momentarily, his own view of the world. That complexity is absent here.

(b) Geographical Expansion at the Expense of Dramatic Focus

The action moves through an unusually large number of places: Mahisautha, Morang, Bhot, Baghgarh, Samdagarh, Rewa-Dah, and Rangilagarh. This geographic range conveys the authenticity and scale of the epic legend; dramatically, however, it frequently pushes the central story of Kusma and Salhes's love into the background. The war involving the king of Morang and the account of Bhot's invasion keep Kusma away from the stage for extended stretches. The balance between epic breadth and dramatic concentration is therefore not fully achieved.

(c) Syncretic Invocation and Cultural Disjunction

The invocation of Mira-Sultan at the beginning of the play expresses a beautiful syncretic sentiment. Yet elements specific to the Dusadh Salhes tradition—the forest goddess, animal companions, and distinctive vocabulary of Dusadh folklore—sit somewhat uneasily beside the reference to "Jana Gana Mana" in the same sumiran. Syncretism is a valuable aim, but here its enlargement makes the invocation seem less an expression of a particular Dusadh religious tradition than a display of harmony among all faiths.

The Vow of Love, or Shruvavati's Victory!

(a) Entering the Fire: A Structural Tension in the Feminist Reading

The play's most serious ideological tension arises from Shruvavati's conflicting positions. She declares herself an "independent and self-reliant person," yet when the fruit cannot be cooked she resolves to "enter the fire while remembering her beloved." The drama presents this resolve as an expression of inner strength, but the symbolic act of self-sacrifice belongs to a patriarchal convention. An autonomous woman demands life, not death. The play does not resolve this ideological contradiction.

Compare Sukanya, in the fifth play, who accepts responsibility for the consequences of her father's curse and chooses the path of life, or Ashtavakra, in the seventh, who rejects Urvashi and chooses living love. Beside these examples, Shruvavati's resolve to enter the pyre offers a weaker dramatic solution.

(b) Indra's Three Disguises: Repetition and the Loss of Credibility

Indra appears first openly, identifying himself; then in the guise of an old man; and finally as Vashishtha. These three appearances, built around Shruvavati's repeated refusals, create a dramatic rhythm that soon becomes overly predictable. The third scene of disguise, as Vashishtha, essentially repeats the second, as the old man. Shruvavati refuses both times, and Indra is angered both times. The repetition reduces rather than intensifies dramatic tension.

(c) Dushyant Kumar's Urdu Couplet: The Problem of an Imported Element

The concluding Hindi–Urdu couplet by Dushyant Kumar—"Who says the sky cannot be pierced?"—is an expression of cultural and linguistic richness. Yet it also seems somewhat out of place in this Maithili mythological one-act play. If a poetic quotation was needed, an appropriate verse might have been drawn from the Maithili poetic tradition itself. This is a minor but specific question of dramatic craft.

The Power of Faith, or Sukanya's Marriage

(a) The Age Difference and Ethical Discomfort

The drama itself acknowledges the difficulty through the chorus's song: "A sixteen-year-old daughter with flowing hair; Chyavana is a thousand years of age." The song presents the moral unease caused by this age difference in a comic manner, but the play never resolves it. Chyavana remains confident of his age and powers; the king agrees under compulsion; and Sukanya gives her willing consent. Yet the ethical basis of that consent does not receive sufficient dramatic development.

(b) The Excessive Length of the Ashvini Kumar Sequence

The first entrance of the Ashvini Kumar, their subsequent reappearance, the apology, the comparison with Urvashi, the threat of a curse, another meeting, and the episode involving soma occupy a substantial portion of the play. The principal romance—the development of Sukanya and Chyavana's relationship—receives comparatively less attention than this comic sequence. In terms of dramatic economy, removing one Ashvini episode and giving greater space to the central couple would have produced a more balanced work.

(c) The "Chyavanprash" Remark: The Danger of Temporal Rupture

The sutradhara's reference to "the Chyavana of Chyavanprash" is momentarily amusing. But this allusion to modern consumer culture creates a temporal rupture in the mythological setting. If the intention was deliberately Brechtian—a distancing effect—it ought to have been integrated into the play's dramatic purpose more consistently.

The Expansion of Love, or Shweta's Discovery

(a) Atiratha's Transformation: A Problem of Dramatic Motivation

The most serious formal weakness of this drama is the extraordinary speed of Atiratha's psychological transformation. On the one hand, the playwright depicts him as detached for "seven or eight years," a king who returns alone from every ceremony of choosing a bride. On the other, the moment he hears of Shweta's water burial, he rushes towards the riverbank and, on meeting her in the forest, removes his crown. Years of detachment dissolve in a single scene. The play supplies insufficient psychological groundwork for this transformation.

"Atiratha lost his enthusiasm"; "everything seemed artificial"; "everyone seemed like a lifeless puppet": these statements by the announcer tell us the grounds of the king's change instead of showing the change through action.

In Ibsen's Hedda Gabler or Chekhov's Three Sisters, transformations in a character's psyche emerge gradually, scene by scene. In Shweta's Discovery, Atiratha's journey depends excessively on the announcer's account and too little on direct dramatic action.

(b) The Absence of a Source Narrative

The story of Shweta and Atiratha has no identified mythological or historical source; it is an invention of Kunal's own. This originality is itself a virtue, but it produces a related weakness. The weight and credibility that a familiar mythological source lends the other six plays are absent here. The story of a "court dancer" and a "detached king" also belongs to a popular dramatic trope that has appeared in other Indian-language traditions.

The Test of Love, or Suprabha and Ashtavakra

(a) Vadanya's Motivation: An Unexplained Rejection

The play never makes clear why the sage Vadanya rejects Ashtavakra. He declares, "I am under no obligation to explain." The dramatist employs this "mystery" as a device, but it leaves Vadanya psychologically hollow. Without knowing the reason for his refusal, spectators cannot fully understand what is at stake in the test. Vadanya becomes a functional agent of the plot rather than a living character.

(b) Suprabha's Unequal Dramatic Presence

Suprabha's name precedes Ashtavakra's in the title, Suprabha and Ashtavakra, but the first half of the play is devoted to Ashtavakra. Suprabha appears on stage only in the tenth and eleventh scenes of a twelve-scene drama, and is absent from the twelfth, the Urvashi episode. If the title gives precedence to Suprabha, the dramatic structure does not reflect that priority.

(c) The Mystery of Vandi: A Missed Dramatic Opportunity

The revelation that Vandi is actually the son of Varuna and that the supposed "water burial" involved keeping learned men in the care of the water deity for a sacrificial rite is the play's most unexpected plot twist. Yet the dramatist resolves the mystery in a humorous exchange—"Water is my very home." Had this moment been developed as a theatrical revelation, it might have become one of the play's finest scenes.

Limitations Shared Across the Collection

Women's Agency and the Sequence of Patriarchal Approval

All four plays in the love quartet share a structural characteristic that is also a limitation: each heroine's independent decision ultimately requires the approval of a male authority.

Shruvavati's victory is confirmed by Indra's declaration, "You have won"; Sukanya's marriage by the consent of King Sharyati and Chyavana; Shweta's liberation by Atiratha's decision to follow her in flight; and Suprabha's marriage by Vadanya's permission. These examples show that Kunal makes his heroines active agents, yet the final confirmation of their dramatic triumph issues from a male character. This subtle reproduction of patriarchal authority somewhat qualifies his feminist vision.

Dependence on the Announcer: "Telling" versus "Showing"

In all four plays of the love quartet, the announcer or narrator acts as an interpreter of the characters' emotions:

"Shweta's despondency vanished …"; "Atiratha grew disheartened …"; "The night passed as though an age had passed …"

At times, such descriptions deprive the characters of the opportunity to express their emotions through their own actions. The most effective emotional moments in theatre arise when a character lives through an experience instead of having that experience narrated. Dependence on the announcer is thus a recurrent formal limitation.

The Ideological Contradiction of Divine Intervention

Several plays in the collection make emphatic assertions of female agency, yet a god or supernatural power eventually intervenes in the dramatic action.

Shruvavati's "inner strength" is validated by Indra's acknowledgement; Sukanya's "faith" is rewarded through the Ashvini Kumar's medicinal knowledge, which restores Chyavana's youth; and Ashtavakra's paternal curse is removed through bathing in a river. This pattern of divine rewards conveys an unintended message: constancy in love is necessarily rewarded by divine favour. Human agency therefore appears dependent upon providence rather than fully autonomous.

Vidyapati's Songs: The Risk of Overuse

Vidyapati's songs are employed in both Bidapat and Sukanya. In Bidapat their use is wholly appropriate and organically necessary, since Vidyapati himself is the protagonist. In Sukanya, however, the spring song "The king of seasons, spring, has arrived" serves only to create an atmosphere. This invites a question: is the collection undertaking a project of preserving Vidyapati's songs? The particular character of their use in Bidapat might have stood out more sharply if Sukanya's spring scene had drawn on a different work from the Maithili lyric tradition.

Stage Directions: Unequal Degrees of Detail

In the folk-theatre trilogy, stage directions are elaborate and particular, as in the direction describing Kusma, Thanka and Banka and the affectionate attention paid to Budhesar. In the quartet of love, by contrast, they are often minimal: "Lighting changes," "Music," "Freeze." The difference reveals the two distinct periods of Kunal's dramatic method, but it also leaves the actors in the shorter plays with less guidance.

Conclusion: Possibilities Within the Limitations

First, the quartet of love sometimes substitutes an explicit message or moral instruction for dramatic tension. Particularly in the closing couplets and the announcer's commentary, meaning is occasionally stated outright where suggestion would have been more powerful. The essence of drama lies in showing rather than merely declaring; by this measure the folk-theatre trilogy is more assured than the quartet. Second, Shruvavati's Victory! creates ideological tension by combining a strong assertion of women's freedom with the conventional act of entering the fire. Although the play attempts to present the act as a demonstration of inner strength, a symbol centred on sacrifice cannot be wholly reconciled with its modern feminist reading. The question remains open. Third, the collection's plays are unequal in scale. An epic drama such as Kusma-Salhes and the chamber plays of the love quartet are brought together in one volume. Their diversity is a source of richness, but it also disrupts the rhythm of reading. Nevertheless, these shortcomings remain secondary when set beside the central strengths of Kunal's dramatic vision: performability and communication through popular theatrical forms.

The collection's limitations fall principally into three categories:

(a) Formal limitations: dependence on the announcer, telling rather than showing, and the one-dimensional portrayal of certain characters.

(b) Ideological tensions: the convention of entering the fire, the sequence of patriarchal approval, and dependence on divine reward.

(c) Structural limitations: unequal lengths, monotonous titles, and repeated dramatic patterns.

What matters is that these limitations do not negate the collection's value. No body of creative work is entirely free of flaws. Even the lyrics of the great poet Vidyapati repeat inherited patterns of the heroine, and the plays of Bhikhari Thakur contain linguistic unevenness. Kunal's limitations often appear precisely where his ambition reaches furthest; they are signs of a living, venturesome artist.

There is also a practical reason for identifying them: future directors can address such problems in the course of performance. A perceptive director could elaborate Atiratha's transformation through silent scenes, restage Shruvavati's resolve to enter the pyre as a proclamation of strength, or turn the revelation of Vandi's identity into an expansive theatrical moment. This is the nature of a living theatre: every production is a new version.

Concluding Assessment

Kusma-Salhes and Six Other Plays is a significant contribution to contemporary Maithili theatre. It forms a bridge between folk theatre and the modern stage, not merely preserving Mithila's naach tradition but reviving it through contemporary ideas. The collection rests on four pillars: intelligence in Forty Thieves; the immortality of poetry in Bidapat; freedom from fear, liberty, and love in Kusma-Salhes; and women's agency in the quartet of love. Ultimately these pillars point towards a single proposition: love, understood as universal human compassion and commitment to life, is the fundamental principle of creation, and intelligence is its protector.

Fidelity to folk sources, sensitivity towards subaltern and female voices, the synthesis of classical learning, folk forms, and modernity, and practical theatrical awareness make this collection a valuable example of Videha's parallel literary perspective and an essential point of reference for Maithili theatre criticism. Its study, teaching, and renewed staging are equally necessary to sustain the vitality of Maithili theatre.

Chapter 2

Forty Thieves and Gonu Jha, or The Tale of Gyan Jha

The Livelihood of Folk Performers, the Power of Knowledge, and Theatrical Self-Consciousness

First staged: 4–5 August 1993, Vidyapati Bhavan, Patna · Published: Bhangima, issue 22, August 1995

1. Introduction and Narrative Structure

Kunal's first play, Forty Thieves and Gonu Jha, or The Tale of Gyan Jha, occupies an unusual position in the history of Maithili drama. Its importance lies less in the subject of its story than in the manner of its telling. The play begins with a metatheatrical device: three bhats, traditional bards and singers of praise, enter the stage and lament the apparent uselessness of their art before the spectators. When they realise that their conventional recitation of poems has no effect, they propose: "What if we put on a play?" Thus a second story begins, comprising the story of the bhats as an outer frame and that of Mithila's familiar folk logician, Gonu Jha, within it.

The inner story contains several major episodes: an opening test concerning a child, in which a ploughman cleverly proves who the child belongs to; the humiliation of intelligence at the court of the subedar Bhunbhunadev; the court poets' appeal to Gonu; a journey in pursuit of justice to the fort of Ghuskiyahi; an internal struggle for power among the thieves, with Durmatiya confronting Debaha; Gonu's dream of the goddess Kali; and the ultimate defeat of the thieves through an ingenious mock coronation. A particular note by the playwright deserves attention: the play can be performed by a single actor in multiple roles; it exists in three timed versions of 45, 60, and 90 minutes; and it also became a thirteen-part radio-drama series.

The play's underlying questions are these: Who will sustain art—the state, society, or the artist? And is intelligence, or knowledge, the ultimate and supreme force in the struggle of life? These questions remain at the centre of this study across four traditions of theatrical criticism.

2. Indian Dramatic Theory

2.1 The Natyashastra: The Production of Rasa and Character Types

Bharata's Natyashastra, conventionally dated here to a period extending from approximately the second century BCE to the second century CE, treats rasa as the life of drama: "Rasa is the life of theatre." The dominant rasa of this play is hasya, comedy, but it is not alone. Bharata distinguishes six varieties of laughter; of these, parastha hasya, laughter directed at others, is central here. The portrayals of the foolishness of Budhiraj, Bhunbhunadev, Durmatiya, and the band of thieves belong to this category. Atmastha hasya, laughter directed at oneself, is present as well, particularly in the bhats' self-mockery.

The determinants or alambana vibhavas of comedy are the incongruous behaviour of Bhunbhunadev and Budhiraj—"Your Majesty, I call you 'Budhiraj' because I like the name better"—the obstinacy of Durmatiya, and the helplessly comic conduct of Ranubhanu. The erotic sentiment of the Kamasutra tradition associated with Vatsyayana is absent: this is essentially a comedy. Yet there is also an extraordinary variation of vira rasa, the heroic sentiment. Gonu's courage comes from reasoning, not armed strength. Bharata describes the dhira-lalita hero as composed, witty, and intelligent; these are precisely Gonu's defining traits.

The tradition of the vidushaka. The vidushaka is a distinctive type of character in Bharata's Natyashastra: frequently a Brahmin, comically dressed but intelligent and a companion to the hero. Gonu Jha is in part an inheritor of this tradition, but Kunal redefines the figure through folk realism. Gonu is not merely a courtly clown; he is a people's logician, rooted in the soil.

2.2 Prahasana, Bhana, and the Form of Popular Performance

The prahasana, the comic dramatic genre of classical Sanskrit theatre, whether in one act or several, offers the nearest classical counterpart to this work. Bharata describes farce as combining three kinds of comic expression—mental, verbal, and physical. All three are present in Kunal's play: the bhats' verbal wit, the thieves' incongruous physical actions, and the mental comedy of Gonu's encounter with Kali.

The distinction in the Natyashastra between lokadharmi, the representation of popular or everyday conduct, and natyadharmi, conventionally stylised theatrical acting, places this drama firmly in the lokadharmi tradition. Direct address to spectators, songs, dream sequences, and ironic names—Bhunbhunadev, Budhiraj, Durmatiya—are elements of popular dramaturgy. They differ from a strictly classical mode without being any less legitimate or traditional.

2.3 Dhvani and Vakrokti

Anandavardhana's Dhvanyaloka, composed in the ninth century, develops the theory of dhvani, the suggested meaning of language, and privileges it over literal signification and secondary indication. That principle operates at multiple levels in this play.

Literally, the alternative title The Tale of Gyan Jha denotes the story of a person. By suggestion, however, it becomes the story of knowledge or intelligence itself. The closing song makes that meaning explicit: "There is no strength greater than intelligence." The whole intention of the play is gathered into the resonance of this phrase.

Kuntaka's Vakroktijivita, from the tenth century, develops the principle of oblique expression: the striking and pleasurable rendering of a subject through unusual language. Examples abound here. The entire character of Bhunbhunadev constitutes an instance of obliqueness in naming. Consider Gonu's speech to the goddess Kali:

"O Mother! When you catch a cold … all your hands are occupied with weapons. How do you wipe the mucus from your nose?"

This remark brings faith together with laughter, devotion with intelligence, and the divine with the human in a remarkable play of indirection. It is an excellent example of vakrokti. Fear never enters the exchange: this is an oblique expression of fearlessness.

3. Western Dramatic Theory

3.1 Aristotle: Mimesis, Reversal, and Catharsis

The Greek philosopher Aristotle (384–322 BCE), in his Poetics, identifies mimesis, or imitation, as central to drama, and assigns particular importance to peripeteia (reversal of circumstances) and anagnorisis (recognition) in successful tragedy. In one respect Kunal's play challenges the Aristotelian model: it is not a single-stranded tragedy but an episodic comic farce with multiple lines of action. Aristotle regarded an episodic plot as defective, whereas in the folk tradition such episodic movement can be a source of vitality.

Nevertheless, Aristotelian catharsis, the release or purification of suppressed emotion, appears here in comic form. Theft, poverty, and corruption in government are three sources of social anxiety, and the comic catharsis effected against them can be understood at a social and psychological level through Aristotle's theory.

The play also offers an inverted recognition scene. Gonu, half asleep, first "recognises" the thieves as the goddess Kali—"Mother Kali has come disguised as a man!"—and then fails to recognise them for what they are. This is a reversed anagnorisis, a comic manipulation of recognition through which laughter takes the place of fear.

3.2 Brecht: Epic Theatre and the Alienation Effect

The German dramatist and thinker Bertolt Brecht (1898–1956) theorised epic theatre and its Verfremdungseffekt, the alienation or distancing effect. Through it, performers repeatedly remind spectators that what they are seeing is a constructed theatrical event rather than reality itself, allowing critical intelligence to remain alert. Kunal's play constitutes an indigenous variation of such a Brechtian effect.

The decision of the three bhats to "put on a play" initiates the process of distancing. Throughout the performance they never become completely absorbed in the fictional world, but remain conscious of their existence as performers. At the end they return to debate alternative endings and offer the audience a social interpretation of theft as "a social malady arising from illiteracy and poverty." The passage can be viewed through Brecht's concept of Gestus, a socially revealing attitude or demonstrative action: the actor shows (zeigen) rather than simply experiences.

Brecht also drew attention to the economic conditions of art. The gamchha episode, in which the bhats openly ask the audience for money so that they can eat, embodies this kind of transparency. Brecht argued that the conditions of artistic production should not be concealed. Here they are made visible.

3.3 Lionel Abel: Metatheatre

The American critic Lionel Abel, in his book Metatheatre (1963), defined a mode of drama in which characters know themselves to be inside a play. On this definition, Forty Thieves is a complete example of metatheatre: the three bhats decide to enact a drama, select the story, and at the close expose the processes of its construction. Abel treats life as dream and theatre as awakening. Here the relationship is almost reversed: the bhats' struggle to survive is "real" and Gonu's story is a theatrical "dream," but the same stage contains both.

3.4 Bakhtin: The Carnivalesque

The Russian thinker Mikhail Bakhtin (1895–1975) analysed, through his conception of the carnivalesque, moments in culture when established hierarchies are overturned, social boundaries are breached, and popular laughter mocks authority.

The play contains many carnivalesque moments. Budhiraj, the "witless minister," and Bhunbhunadev, the muttering or humming subedar, have names that themselves ridicule the authority of their offices. When the thieves decide who will lead them through a democratic counting of votes, political manoeuvring enters even this lawless group. They become a carnivalesque state in miniature.

In Bakhtinian terms, the gamchha episode also inverts hierarchy. Having ridiculed sovereign power and its court, the bhats establish a direct economic relationship with their spectators without a royal intermediary. This carnivalesque action stages the conflict between patronage by the state and support from the people.

4. Chinese Dramatic Theory

4.1 Li Yu: Principles of Dramatic Construction

The Chinese playwright and critic Li Yu (1611–1680), whose Xianqing Ouji, often translated as Casual Expressions of Idle Feeling, is a foundational work of Chinese dramatic criticism, proposed the notion of zhunao, the central governing idea or "principal brain" of a play. A successful drama should possess a central axis around which all its narrative strands are gathered.

The zhunao of the present play is "intelligence versus physical force," together with the related conflict of popular art versus state power. Li Yu holds that the governing idea should be established in the first act, and this is precisely what Kunal accomplishes in the opening scene with the bhats.

Li Yu's second principle, mizhenxian, or fine stitching, concerns the joining of all parts of a play so that every thread finds its place by the end. The gamchha episode and the return to the bhats' outer frame exemplify this principle. The external narrative of the performers' crisis closes at the very point from which it began.

4.2 The Chou Character Type

In classical Chinese theatre, including jingju or Peking opera and related forms, character types are conventionally described here as sheng (male lead), dan (female role), jing (painted face), mo (elder), and chou (clown). The chou is distinguished by the ability to address spectators directly, disrupt stage conventions, and speak in a vernacular idiom.

The three bhats represent a threefold version of the chou. Their audience address, abandonment of roles, songs, and self-ridicule are all characteristic of this theatrical type. The parallel suggests a more general principle of folk drama: performance traditions across cultures create a clown who breaks the fourth wall and invites society to look at itself.

4.3 Xu–Shi: The Aesthetics of Emptiness and Fulness

The relationship between xu and shi, the empty and the full, is fundamental to Chinese aesthetics. What remains empty on stage—the absence of physical scenery or objects—can be made full through imagination. A Chinese performer can evoke a boat with a stick, or an entire journey through a single step.

One affecting example in Kunal's play is Gonu's wad of cotton seeds. Gonu declares that a handful of otherwise worthless cotton seeds sells for ten gold coins per unit of weight. An "empty" object, lacking value, is transformed into a "full" and valuable commodity. This is an exercise of xu–shi through Gonu's intelligence. Kunal's aesthetic sensibility is thus consonant with the transformation of absence into imaginative abundance in Chinese popular theatre.

4.4 Yijing: Wang Guowei

The Chinese literary critic Wang Guowei (1877–1927), in Renjian Cihua, discusses yijing, the fusion of feeling and situation. In accomplished art, emotion and setting merge to create an autonomous aesthetic sphere.

The yijing of this play arises from the meeting of two contrary emotions: the nostalgia surrounding the bhats' dying art and the exuberance produced by Gonu's unconquerable intelligence. Together they create a theatrical atmosphere in which melancholy and delight coexist. Wang also discusses youwo zhi jing, a landscape or realm marked by the subjective self, in which the creator's feeling merges with the represented world. Kunal's affection for Maithili performers and his concern for the crisis facing them are expressed throughout the collection in an analogous fashion.

5. Israeli Dramatic Theory

5.1 Eli Rozik: Theatrical Iconicity

The Israeli theatre scholar Eli Rozik (born 1934), in Theatrical Image and subsequent writings, proposed that the fundamental unit of theatre is the image or icon, rather than the written text or story. Through bodily presence, voice, and action, performers create icons, in Peirce's sense, of a fictional world. Theatre is a system of such images.

Rozik's theory illuminates a particular aspect of this play: the image of the bhats. The three figures on stage represent more than three individual people. Together they present an image of the dying bardic tradition. Rozik distinguishes the iconic from the merely symbolic: the former depends upon a relation of resemblance to what it signifies. The bhats show the decline of their art, and that act of showing constitutes an iconic image.

When the bhats decide to make a play about their own predicament, theatre takes itself as its subject. Rozik's idea of "theatre about theatre" becomes applicable here. The medium represents its own medium: an effective instance of iconic self-reflection.

5.2 Shimon Levy: Theatre as Cultural Archive

The Israeli theatre scholar Shimon Levy (1939–2017) highlighted forms of performance through which theatre becomes a cultural archive, a living repository of traditions, memories, and practices that might otherwise be forgotten. In this perspective, theatre is not only an event in the present; it can also be a performance of a remembered past.

The bhat tradition, a centuries-old hereditary livelihood of praise-singers in Mithila, archives the moment of its decline upon the stage. What the audience witnesses is an image of the tradition's living moment of death. The 1993 Patna staging preserves a living example of bardic culture, even as the characters on stage lament its disappearance.

5.3 A Parallel with the Revival of Hebrew through Theatre

A major dimension of Israeli theatrical history has been the establishment of Hebrew as a language of living performance. Habima, founded in Moscow in 1917 and later established as Israel's national theatre, used Hebrew drama to give renewed theatrical life to a language often described at that historical moment as having been largely confined to literary and religious use.

Kunal's play and Bhangima's 1993 Patna performance invite a comparison. Within the Hindi-dominated cultural milieu of Patna, staging drama in Maithili is an act of language politics: a cultural and political assertion that Maithili is not "merely a dialect" but a literary language fit for actors and audiences. In this sense Bhangima's role has affinities with that of Habima.

5.4 Witness Theatre: The Economics of the Gamchha

In Israeli theatrical practice, witness theatre has emerged as a mode in which performance bears witness to harsh social realities and calls on spectators to accept a responsibility towards what they have seen.

The final gamchha episode, when the bhats say openly that "our stomachs will be filled only if the audience shows kindness," becomes an act of witnessing. It makes public the economic vulnerability of performing artists and places the audience in the position of witnesses. This is more than a joke: it acknowledges a hard truth about art and the life of those who practise it.

From this perspective, the ending becomes a political act, an invitation to the audience to bear witness and accept responsibility.

6. A Fourfold Synthesis: Comparative Evaluation

Viewed through these four traditions together, Forty Thieves and Gonu Jha is a multilayered creation. It can be read through Indian theories of rasa and vakrokti, Brecht's distancing effect, Chinese xu–shi aesthetics, and Israeli witness theatre.

The Indian perspective: an unusual combination of comic and heroic rasa; a popular transformation of the vidushaka tradition; and the expansion of the meaning of "intelligence" through dhvani.

The Western perspective: a strikingly Brechtian epic-theatre structure, a classic example of metatheatre, and Bakhtinian carnivalesque inversions.

The Chinese perspective: the affinities between the bhats and the chou character type; the aesthetics of xu–shi; and the interplay of melancholy and joy associated with yijing.

The Israeli perspective: Rozik's iconic self-reflection; Levy's theatre as archive; the politics of language comparable with Habima; and the gamchha as an act of witnessing.

A conclusion common to all four perspectives is that this is not simply "the story of Gonu Jha" but the story of theatre itself: its crisis, its economics, its vitality, and its social obligations. In this respect the play is also a theatrical manifesto, declaring intelligence and the comic reasoning of folk performers to be the means of standing against every obstacle.

Chapter 3

Bidapat: A Theatrical Dialogue Between Folk and Classical Traditions

Vidyapati, Popular Memory, and a Multicultural Vision of Theatre

First performed: 30 September 2002, Vidyapati Bhavan, Patna · Published: Antika, January–March 2003

1. Introduction and Dramatic Architecture

Kunal's second play, Bidapat—the popular pronunciation of Vidyapati—is the most accomplished work in the collection in terms of its formal diversity. Written in the manner of Bidapat Naach, the renowned folk-theatre tradition of Mithila and Bengal, the play is explicitly situated by its author between 1400 and 1450 CE. Yet Kunal's ambition extends further. Rather than merely writing a biographical drama, he constructs a theatrical commentary on Vidyapati's poetry.

The play's architecture operates on three levels. The outer level consists of the dialogue between the sutradhara and actress, the interruptions of the clown-like Vipata, and the classical performance of the purvaranga. The middle level is the enacted story of Vidyapati, Shiv Singh, Lakhima, Ugna, Mandakini, Kalindi, Amiyakar, and the courtiers. The inner level contains embedded performances of Vidyapati's own songs, which provide the story's emotional axis. The interaction of these three levels generates the play's theatrical energy.

The plot turns upon five principal axes: (1) the friendship of Vidyapati and Shiv Singh; (2) Shiv Singh's release from the court of the Sultan of Jaunpur through Vidyapati's poetic powers; (3) the inner tale of Ugna as Mahadeva; (4) Lakhima's resistance to conspiracy and Shiv Singh's disappearance; and (5) Vidyapati's thirty-two years of grief and his declaration of poetry's immortality. The triangle formed by the sutradhara, actress, and Vipata closes the outer frame around these five strands.

2. Indian Dramatic Theory

2.1 Purvaranga and the Tradition of the Ten Dramatic Forms

Bharata's Natyashastra, dated here broadly between the second century BCE and the second century CE, gives a central place to purvaranga, the preliminary performance that includes an auspicious invocation, the sutradhara's entrance, and an introductory address. Kunal adopts this classical architecture while transforming it into a folk-theatrical mode. The sequence of invocation to the goddess, praise of Bhairavi, and the sutradhara's introduction follows the Natyashastra tradition.

Dhananjaya's tenth-century Dasharupaka distinguishes ten dramatic forms. Bidapat is described on its title page as a natika, a form that the present study associates with brevity, comedy, separation, and suffering on the part of both central characters. Bidapat fits this description only partly: it contains separation and tragedy, but compassion and sorrow replace the comic as its dominant mood. When Abhinavagupta discusses the natika, he calls for an exceptional hero; Vidyapati certainly fills that role.

2.2 The Realisation of Rasa: A Confluence of Karuna, Shringara, and Shanta

The dominant rasa of this play is karuna, the sentiment of sorrow: Shiv Singh's disappearance, Lakhima's thirty-two years of waiting, and Vidyapati's final isolation. Bharata identifies grief as the enduring emotional disposition underlying karuna, intensified through recollection of the lost beloved. Yet the play's sorrow moves towards the shanta rasa elucidated by Abhinavagupta. The concluding song of the chorus, which declares Vidyapati, Shiv Singh, Lakhima, and Vipata immortal in poetry, embodies the inward repose of tranquillity.

In his Abhinavabharati, his commentary on the Natyashastra, Abhinavagupta (c. 950–1020 CE) argues that rasa is manifested rather than literally brought into existence. It is already latent in the spectator's consciousness and is awakened by drama. In Bidapat, the use of Vidyapati's actual lyrics gives particular force to this manifestation: the performance reawakens the audience's dormant memory of its poetic heritage.

Shringara rasa flows through Vidyapati's lyrics, particularly "A new Vrindavan, ever-new groves, where the youthful lover plays" and "Shape a face from the essence of the moon." But this erotic sentiment is devotional rather than merely worldly; through the play of Radha and Krishna, it seeks an experience of universal love. Shringara and devotion thus fuse, forming a conjunction of erotic love and bhakti in Indian poetics.

2.3 The Theory of Dhvani: Three Meanings Within the Word "Bidapat"

The suggestive possibilities of the word Bidapat are extraordinary. Through Anandavardhana's theory of dhvani, at least three levels of meaning may be discerned in this one word: (a) Vidyapati, the poet himself, as the literal referent; (b) Bidapat Naach, the name of a folk-theatrical tradition, as an associated meaning—although the tradition and the earlier Vidyapati associated with Jyotirishwar precede the particular period 1400–1450; and (c) a suggested play on bida, farewell, and pat, lord or one who departs. This last possibility anticipates the sorrowful ending, Shiv Singh's disappearance, and the farewell to an age. The threefold suggestiveness demonstrates the playwright's linguistic awareness.

There is also an instance of obliqueness in naming: "Vidyapati, Vidyapati!" confronts "Bidapat is Bidapat!" The sutradhara insists on the classical name, while Vipata stubbornly retains the popular pronunciation. Their dispute is a comic dramatisation of a deeper cultural tension between classical authority and popular practice, even though both names refer to the same person.

2.4 Drama Within Drama

Although the Natyashastra does not distinguish "drama within drama" as an independent genre, Sanskrit plays contain analogous practices, such as dream sequences in Bhasa or performed episodes in Ratnavali. Bidapat includes two distinct embedded performances. First is Amiyakar's swang, or comic impersonation, in which he enacts the meeting between Vidyapati and the Sultan, shifting from one role to another while eating sweets. This is an indigenous form of performative storytelling. Second is the embedded scene featuring Gaura, Mahadeva, and Natua, in which Gaura laments Shiva's poverty. It prepares the dramatic revelation of Ugna's identity as Mahadeva.

3. Western Dramatic Theory

3.1 Georg Lukacs: Historical Drama and the World-Historical Individual

The Hungarian Marxist critic Georg Lukacs (1885–1971) offered a criterion for historical drama: the protagonist should be a world-historical individual, one who embodies the contradictions of an epoch in his own life. Vidyapati can be viewed as just such a figure. On the one hand, he lives within a dependent political order, amid Tirhut's subordination to Jaunpur. On the other, he trusts in a poetic power that exceeds political authority. His life gives bodily expression to this contradiction.

Yet Kunal's Vidyapati is not the triumphant protagonist of a conventional Lukacsian model. He is a grieving witness. Shiv Singh's disappearance ends the relationship that had given the poet's life its deepest meaning. The tranquillity attained after thirty-two years of waiting differs from the predicament of a Western tragic hero: it suggests a contemplative, inward tragedy.

3.2 A Feminist Reading: Lakhima as Heroine

Western feminist approaches to drama, associated here with critics such as Kate Millett, Ellen Morton, and Sharon Friedman, have paid particular attention to rereading works in which women are marginalised beneath the shadow of celebrated historical men. Kunal consciously reverses this tendency.

Lakhima is notable from a feminist perspective for three reasons. First, she refuses the protection offered by ministers and interprets the conspiracy herself: "They see an opportunity to break apart the triad of king, queen, and great poet." Second, her waiting is not the passivity of a conventional devoted wife, but an act of freely chosen resolve. Third, where inherited narratives frequently place Lakhima at the centre of a sati legend, Kunal turns away from that framework and places her continuing life and waiting at the centre.

3.3 Pierre Nora: Sites of Memory

The French historian Pierre Nora (born 1931), in Les Lieux de mémoire, developed the concept of sites of memory: places, objects, and texts in which collective historical memory is deposited and made active.

Vidyapati's lyrics function as important sites of memory in this play. When the chorus sings "A new Vrindavan, ever-new groves, where the youthful lover plays," or when Shiv Singh's song "O bumblebee, it is for you that I …" arises in Lakhima's memory, these moments are simultaneously recollections of history and experiences in the present. The staging transforms six centuries of distance into an immediate theatrical moment. Bidapat is thus not merely a drama about Vidyapati; it is a performance of the collective memory of the Maithili-speaking community.

3.4 Brecht and Self-Distancing: The Role of Vipata

The role played by the three bhats in the first drama is assumed here by the triangle of sutradhara, actress, and Vipata. Vipata's incessant demand to "Move the story along!" provides a precise indigenous variation on a Brechtian distancing effect. It prevents spectators from being entirely absorbed in the story and continually reminds them that the dramatic world has been constructed.

There is, however, an important distinction from Brecht. The German dramatist sought to awaken the critical intelligence of his spectators; Vipata's interruptions stir exhilaration more than analysis. He is a folk agent of distancing who brings the elite dignity of art down to the accessible level of the gari, the bullock cart, and the khissa, the tale. This aesthetic difference helps establish the originality of the play in relation to Western theatrical theory.

4. Chinese Dramatic Theory

4.1 Caizi–Jiaren: The Scholar and the Beauty

A major dramatic pattern in classical Chinese theatre, particularly the kunqu opera of the Ming and Qing periods, is caizi–jiaren, the story of a brilliant scholar encountering a beautiful woman. Through the romance of a learned poet and a beautiful heroine, such plays affirm the force of poetry and the value of love.

Bidapat offers a displaced version of this pattern. Vidyapati is the caizi, a man distinguished by poetic talent rather than mere logical skill; Lakhima is no conventional jiaren, but a queen with a strong sense of dignity. Yet their relationship contains the profound trust, friendship, and affection central to the pattern. Shiv Singh's disappearance transforms it into a triangle: at its centre stood a third person who is now absent.

4.2 Zhiyin: Perfect Understanding and Its Absence

In the Chinese cultural tradition, zhiyin is a profound relationship with someone who truly hears and understands an artist's work. According to a famous legend, the zither player Bo Ya broke his instrument after the death of his only true listener, Zhong Ziqi: "The one who could hear is gone; why should I play?"

The relationship between Vidyapati and Shiv Singh embodies this ideal of zhiyin. Shiv Singh was the supreme listener, appreciator, and patron of Vidyapati's poetry. His disappearance leaves the poet's artistic life almost orphaned. "Ugna, where have you gone?" becomes a lament for the loss of perfect understanding. As with Bo Ya's broken zither, the sound of Vidyapati's poetry is suffused with grief.

4.3 Zhezixi and Layered Performance

The Chinese folk-theatre tradition of zhezixi, or excerpt plays, selects self-contained episodes from expansive dramatic cycles for separate performance. Three distinct passages of this kind can be identified in Bidapat: (a) Amiyakar's impersonation of the encounter at the Sultan's court; (b) the embedded play of Gaura, Mahadeva, and Natua, preparing the revelation of Ugna; and (c) the Radha–Krishna rasa performed by the sutradhara and actress in the preliminary sequence.

Such layered performance keeps several narrative planes active on the same stage. Chinese dramaturgy describes drama within drama as xizhongxi. Indian theatre possesses analogous forms of enacted episodes within a play, while the Chinese formulation makes the levels of performance especially explicit.

4.4 Bei–Huan–Li–He: Four Fundamental Dramatic Conditions

The Chinese dramatic tradition is here understood through four recurring emotional conditions: bei, sorrow; huan, joy; li, separation; and he, reunion. An accomplished play can bring all four into the movement of a single narrative.

All four are present in Bidapat: huan in victory and celebration at Oini; li in Shiv Singh's disappearance; bei in the thirty-two years of grief endured by Vidyapati and Lakhima; and he in the reunion achieved through poetry, a spiritual and invisible reunion in which Vidyapati declares Shiv Singh immortal in his songs. This reunion is not worldly but inward, extending the Chinese pattern into another possibility.

5. Israeli Dramatic Theory

5.1 S. Ansky's The Dybbuk: The Theatrical Presence of a Dead Beloved

The Jewish-Russian playwright S. Ansky (1863–1920) wrote The Dybbuk, also known as Between Two Worlds, first staged in 1920 and regarded as a foundational work of Yiddish and Hebrew theatre. In the play, the soul of a dead lover enters the body of the woman he loved and becomes present on stage. Its governing insight is that love can be stronger than death.

In Bidapat, Shiv Singh disappears bodily from the stage, yet his continuing presence in Lakhima's memory acquires a dybbuk-like theatrical reality. When his song "O bumblebee, it is for you that I …" is sung and his shadowy figure appears, the dramatic logic is comparable to that of The Dybbuk. In both plays the emotional truth of love crosses the boundary of death.

5.2 Eli Rozik: The Iconic Presence of the Lyric

Eli Rozik's theory of iconicity allows theatrical images to arise not only from the performer's body but also from sound. When the samaji chorus sings

Vidyapati's lyrics, a song becomes a sound-icon: not merely music, but a theatrical image of the poet's entire world of experience.

Rozik's distinction between the theatrical image and the dramatic text is relevant here. Kunal's written script and the embodied, vocal, and gestural image of the actors singing Vidyapati's songs are distinct realities. In this play they exist in productive tension. Kunal's script incorporates Vidyapati's songs, but the songs continually exceed the script's control and live their independent poetic lives.

5.3 Beyond Habima's Language Politics: The Rebirth of Poetic Language

In the discussion of the preceding play, we observed affinities between Bhangima's language politics and those of Habima Theatre. In Bidapat this parallel develops another layer: the revival not merely of a language, but of its poetic language. The theatrical revival of Hebrew also has connections to efforts to sustain a Hebrew poetic tradition in performance.

The 2002 staging of Bidapat at Vidyapati Bhavan, Patna, gave renewed theatrical life to Vidyapati's songs, which risked being treated as objects confined to libraries. In this sense Bhangima's endeavour constitutes a theatrical rebirth of poetic language, comparable to the revitalisation of Hebrew poetry in Israeli theatre.

5.4 A Postcolonial Perspective: The Diplomatic Power of Poetry

In postcolonial theatrical scholarship associated with the Israeli scholar Avraham Oz and others, particular attention is paid to performances in which cultural power contests and defeats political or military power.

The Sultan's court episode in Bidapat is an exemplary case. The Sultan of Jaunpur embodies political sovereignty; Vidyapati embodies cultural authority. The poet secures Shiv Singh's release not through ordinary diplomacy but by composing and performing verse, including his description of a bathing scene while deprived of sight. When the Sultan invites him to ask for anything, Vidyapati requests his friend's freedom rather than a throne. A minister remarks, "If only he had asked for the kingdom of Tirhut!" Vidyapati replies, "But truly, I have already received a kingdom!" This is a declaration of the victory of poetry over colonial or imperial power.

6. A Fourfold Synthesis

When these four traditions are brought together, the central question of Bidapat becomes clear: what is the power of poetry, and through what forms does it assert its existence? Each tradition approaches the answer from a different direction.

The Indian perspective: the power of poetry lies in the manifestation of rasa. Lyrics awaken emotion already latent within the spectator. At its culmination in shanta rasa, poetry triumphs over death.

The Western perspective: poetic power is understood through sites of memory (Nora), the expression of a world-historical individual (Lukacs), and a feminist rereading centred on Lakhima.

The Chinese perspective: poetic power is the art of zhiyin, perfect understanding, and the spiritual reunion that completes bei–huan–li–he.

The Israeli perspective: poetic power lies in the autonomous iconic presence of sound (Rozik) and the cultural and diplomatic victory of poetry over colonial or imperial rule.

All four perspectives converge on the proposition that Vidyapati's lyrics are not simply literary compositions but living cultural and political forces. Kunal makes this power live again through theatre. Bidapat is therefore more than a play about Vidyapati: it is a declaration of the existence and vitality of Maithili theatre itself.

Chapter 4

Kusma-Salhes: Folk Epic and Popular Consciousness

Salhes Naach, Love, and the Freedom of the People's Hero

First staged: 29–30 April 1997, Vidyapati Bhavan, Patna · Published: Antika, April–September 2006

1. Introduction, Plot Structure, and Historical-Cultural Context

Kunal's third and most expansive drama, Kusma-Salhes, occupies the central place in the collection. At approximately seventy pages, it is the collection's artistic, intellectual, and cultural centre. Its foundation is the epic of Raja Salhes, the folk-deity and hero of Mithila's Dusadh community, and the folk-theatrical tradition of Salhes Naach that developed around this epic.

The geography of the story is vast: Mahisautha, Morang, Baghgarh, Rewa-Dah, Bhot or Tibet, Samdagarh, Pakariya, Garh-Taregana, and Rangilagarh form a geopolitical world extending across India, Nepal, and Tibet. The cast is equally epic: Salhes, the hero; Kusma, the gardener heroine; Hiraman, the parrot who carries the story; Vipata, the clown; Thanka, the tiger; Banka, the bear; Kunta, the forest dweller; the goddess Durga; and numerous kings, armies, and adversaries.

The dramatic action unfolds in five major movements: (1) a preliminary performance, including a syncretic invocation and a metatheatrical beginning led by Vipata and Hiraman; (2) Kusma's introduction and spiritual purification; (3) Salhes's valour, their first meeting, and Durga's blessing; (4) the invasion from Bhot, conspiracy, and imprisonment; and (5) a declaration of freedom, victory through popular solidarity, and the final affirmation of love as a principle of existence.

2. Indian Dramatic Theory

2.1 Salhes Naach: An Autonomous Aesthetic of Folk Theatre

Bharata's Natyashastra develops its theory of drama within the Sanskritic tradition. Mithila's Salhes Naach, however, possesses an autonomous grammar of performance. Its distinctive elements include the collective song of the samaji chorus; the sumiran, a folk invocation calling simultaneously upon Hindu, Muslim, and indigenous deities; Vipata as clown; Hiraman the parrot as carrier of narrative; and the acclamations that precede Salhes's entrance. These are the ritual and performative conventions of this particular theatrical world.

Kunal adopts this whole folk grammar with fidelity. The ritual purification, the sequence of events, the singing, and the modes of address follow their inherited performance contexts. The result is not an elite imitation of folk theatre but a literary re-presentation of the folk form itself. Recognising this distinction is essential.

2.2 A Festival of Rasa: The Many-Coloured Emotional Structure

In Sanskrit poetics, the ideal dramatic work is commonly conceived as possessing a dominant rasa to which other rasas contribute. The complexity of Kusma-Salhes lies in the presence of not one singular governing sentiment but a veritable festival of rasa.

There is shringara, in the love of Kusma and Salhes, a popular counterpart to Radha and Krishna—"He is Krishna Gosain, and you are Radha Rani"; vira, in Salhes's martial courage and mercy towards a defeated enemy—"It would be wrong to pursue and harry an army retreating in defeat"; adbhuta, the marvellous, in the supernatural presence of Thanka, Banka, Hiraman, and Durga; karuna, compassion and sorrow, in the seemingly impossible love between the already-married Salhes and Kusma, constrained by caste boundaries; bhakti, devotion to Durga and the interreligious accommodation of the sumiran; and bibhatsa and bhayanaka, revulsion and fear, in Suchong's plots and the cruelties of imprisonment.

Bharata allows for a combination in which an angi rasa, the principal sentiment, and supporting anga rasas generate a complex emotional experience. Here shringara and vira almost become coequal principal sentiments. Durga's declaration brings them together: "Having joined with Kusma, move now among the minds of the people; dedicate your life solely to their happiness." Love becomes the very source of heroic obligation.

2.3 A Subaltern Aesthetic: Against the Canon

The classical hero in Sanskrit dramaturgy commonly comes from the lineage of royal sages or divine families. The Dusadh hero does not occupy that privileged position within the established conventions. Kunal's boldest dramatic decision is to place the epic of a socially subordinated community at the centre of an epic theatre work.

In the tradition of Vidyapati, love poetry has often given prominence to Radha and Krishna or to Shiv Singh and Lakhima. Kunal chooses another path: Kusma becomes a popular "Radhiya," while Salhes assumes the role of "Krishna Gosain." This symbolic substitution makes a dramatic claim that the love story of the Dusadh tradition is equal to—and perhaps lies at the roots of—the mainstream of Maithili literature.

2.4 Kusma's Inner Purification: An Indigenous Practice of Yoga

A striking sequence of inner purification occurs in the dialogue between Hiraman and Kusma in the second scene. It is a folk transformation of yogic discipline: "Sweep your own house … I have swept out jealousy, pride, hatred, greed, and delusion … I have plastered it with the water of compassion … and perfumed it with the sandalwood of affection." The cleansing is not a physical action but an emotional and spiritual journey inward. Indian philosophical traditions, especially bhakti, treat purification of the heart or consciousness as a condition for the realisation of love.

Kunal presents this devotional philosophy in a comic register. Hiraman first demands a reward—gold, a diamond necklace, a silver bowl—and only then offers his guidance. The popular humour does not trivialise the philosophical idea; it makes it alive.

3. Western Dramatic Theory

3.1 Gramsci: Subaltern History and the Organic Intellectual

In his Prison Notebooks, the Italian Marxist thinker Antonio Gramsci (1891–1937) examined the history of subaltern groups as an alternative to hegemonic historical writing. His "organic intellectual" is someone who brings the cultural expression of a particular community into an articulated literary or intellectual form.

From this perspective, Kunal is an organic intellectual of Maithili theatre. He takes the Dusadh epic of Salhes, previously sustained principally within the community performance tradition of Salhes Naach, and brings it to the modern stage of Vidyapati Bhavan. Such cultural translation is political in Gramsci's sense: a subaltern voice enters a central space of cultural authority.

Salhes's prison speech is the most significant moment from this perspective: "My life may be in your fist, Emperor. But my thoughts and feelings cannot be bound." This statement gives a folk-theatrical form to the strategies of resistance against cultural hegemony that Gramsci theorised.

3.2 Magical Realism: The Presence of Folk Belief on Stage

The Colombian writer Gabriel Garcia Marquez (1927–2014) and the Indian-British novelist Salman Rushdie (born 1947) have used magical realism to present extraordinary or supernatural elements as ordinary components of reality, without requiring special explanations or expressions of amazement.

In Kusma-Salhes, the tiger Thanka and the bear Banka converse with Salhes; Hiraman the parrot carries messages between heaven and earth; and Durga appears before the people's hero to bless him. These are natural features of the Dusadh folk cosmology, not "miracles" imported into an otherwise ordinary world. In terms of magical realism, it is more precise to call them "folk-cosmological realities" than merely "magical" elements.

An important proposition associated here with Rushdie is that magical realism is effective when the extraordinary is experienced as real from within the author's represented world, rather than imposed as an exotic ornament by an outside observer. Kunal's play has this authenticity. Thanka, Banka, Hiraman, and Durga are necessary to the story's structure, not decorative additions.

3.3 Brecht: The Lehrstuck and Popular Politics

Through his idea of the Lehrstuck, or learning play, Brecht recognised theatre's capacity to convey an explicit ethical and political understanding. Kusma-Salhes contains several instructive moments through the chorus and through Hiraman and Vipata: Salhes's teaching of life without fear and Durga's instruction to dedicate oneself to the people's welfare.

Kunal nevertheless differs from Brecht in one important respect. Brecht sought distance from emotional identification, whereas Kunal regards love and public service as inseparable. The intellectual and political education associated with the Lehrstuck is immersed here in erotic feeling and devotional rasa. This produces a kind of "emotional epic theatre" that exceeds a narrowly Brechtian category.

3.4 Homi Bhabha: Cultural Identity and Resistance

In The Location of Culture, the Indian-British postcolonial thinker Homi Bhabha (born 1949) developed notions such as the third space and cultural hybridity, through which a colonised people can appropriate and destabilise the discourse of colonial power.

Suchong's conspiracy to separate Salhes from Kusma can be interpreted as a strategy of domination. He understands that Kusma's affection and knowledge are sources of Salhes's strength and that separating them will weaken him. This resembles the erasure of cultural identity by which colonial power seeks to destroy a community's capacity for resistance. Salhes recognises the strategy and declares that thought and feeling cannot be imprisoned.

4. Chinese Dramatic Theory

4.1 Yi: Righteous Conduct and the Ethics of War

Yi, righteousness or duty, is a central value in Chinese moral philosophy, especially in the Confucian tradition, where it means performing one's obligations properly even when doing so is difficult. The celebrated hero Guan Yu, or Guan Di, of Chinese popular drama is renowned for his practice of yi, including his respect for defeated opponents.

Salhes displays precisely this conduct: "It is improper to harry an army that is fleeing after defeat." This is not merely tactical prudence but a principle of ethical conduct in war, consonant with both Indian kshatriya dharma and Chinese yi. Like Guan Yu, Salhes becomes a popular deity not simply through acts of battle but through his place in the people's hearts.

4.2 Hualian: Character Types and Colour Symbolism

In classical Chinese theatre, including jingju or Beijing opera, the hualian, or painted-face role, uses the colours of facial makeup to indicate moral and psychological qualities. Red may signify courage and loyalty, as with Guan Yu; blue or green, formidable strength; white, cunning and treachery; and black, power or uprightness.

This symbolic system can be applied comparatively to the characters of Kusma-Salhes. Salhes corresponds to a red hualian, for valour and loyalty; Suchong to white, for intrigue and deception; Chuharmall to blue, for military force; Kusma to the dan female role, but a powerful one, associated with the forest goddess; Hiraman and Vipata to the chou clown; and Durga to a divine manifestation, shenming. The comparison reveals a widely recognisable theatrical logic in the play's ordering of character types.

4.3 Tianming: The Mandate of Heaven and the Hero's Duty

Tianming, the Mandate of Heaven, is an important concept in Chinese political thought. A ruler who works for the well-being of his subjects possesses Heaven's mandate; one who corrupts that obligation loses it.

Durga's blessing corresponds to tianming in this play. She commands Salhes to dedicate his life solely to the happiness of the people, thereby legitimising his authority as a ruler. Suchong, in contrast, is expansionist, greedy, and oppressive; he has forfeited the moral right to such a mandate. Kunal's play presents Salhes's final victory as the outcome not simply of military strength but of moral and popular power.

4.4 Minjian: The Dramatisation of Folk Heroes

Chinese theatre has a long tradition of turning popular heroes and temple deities into protagonists of drama, including the performance cycles described here as temple-hero legends. The relation between Salhes Naach and Kunal's play follows an analogous trajectory: a folk deity first becomes a hero of community performance and then enters literary theatre.

The comparable Chinese movement runs from legends surrounding Guan Yu through Romance of the Three Kingdoms and into theatrical adaptations. The journey from the Salhes epic through Salhes Naach to Kunal's Kusma-Salhes, published in 2006, expresses a similar cycle of cultural life.

5. Israeli Dramatic Theory

5.1 Eli Rozik: The Theatrical Iconicity of Animal Characters

Eli Rozik's theory of theatrical iconicity encounters an extraordinary test in the animal characters of this play. Thanka the tiger, Banka the bear, and Hiraman the parrot are represented on stage by human performers. In Rozik's terms, these are icons: the image they show resembles fictional animal life rather than merely the actor's human body.

More importantly, the stage can cross the boundary between human and animal because the icon is not constrained by the actual nature of the performer. The presence of Thanka, Banka, and Hiraman creates an animistic iconography of Dusadh folk belief, a worldview in which people, animals, and spirits coexist as active presences within a single dramatic world. This is a form of "transgressive iconicity."

5.2 A Parallel with Mizrahi Theatre: Recovering Marginalised Traditions

In Israeli theatre, the cultural traditions of Mizrahi Jews, whose origins lie in the Middle East and North Africa, were long marginalised by dominant Ashkenazi or European Jewish norms. The movement towards Mizrahi theatrical expression, particularly from the 1970s onward, has sought to restore musical and cultural forms associated with these communities, including Sephardi musical traditions and liturgical songs, to public prominence.

Kunal's Kusma-Salhes may be viewed as a comparable intervention within the Maithili context. The Dusadh tradition of Salhes Naach remained at the margins of a cultural hierarchy dominated by Vidyapati, Chanda Jha, and elite literary traditions. By taking this marginalised inheritance onto the stage of Vidyapati Bhavan, a central institution of Maithili cultural life, Kunal makes an unmistakable cultural and political claim.

5.3 Hannah Arendt: Natality and Public Action

In The Human Condition, the German-American political philosopher Hannah Arendt (1906–1975) developed the concept of natality: every political act is a new beginning, a kind of birth. Action in the public realm gains endurance because there are witnesses to it.

Salhes's prison declaration—"Salhes may cease to exist, but the people, filled with the message of a life free from fear, will remain"—is an instance of political action in Arendt's sense. Spoken in Suchong's prison, with the emperor himself as witness, it acquires a form of permanence. It is a theatrical moment of natality. Through the scene, Kunal transforms Salhes from folk deity into a figure of political action.

5.4 Shimon Levy: Syncretic Invocation and Sacred Theatre

In his writing on sacred theatre, Shimon Levy examines how the performance of communal and religious values on stage can function as a secular transformation of ritual practice.

The sumiran of this play's opening performance provides an especially striking case. It is not solely a Hindu religious invocation, for it also includes the Muslim pir Mira-Sultan, associated with the west. "Pranam, namaste, adaab, good evening, salaam": this address to spectators crosses boundaries of religion, language, class, and national belonging in one breath. Viewed through Levy's framework, it constitutes a form of radically inclusive sacred theatre, rejecting divisive identities and imagining a shared community.

6. A Fourfold Synthesis

As the title play of the collection, Kusma-Salhes is simultaneously the most fertile and most challenging work for comparative study across these four traditions. No single critical framework can exhaust its many dimensions.

The Indian perspective: the autonomous performance grammar of Salhes Naach; the festival of rasas—shringara, vira, bhakti, and adbhuta; the staging of a subaltern aesthetic; and Durga's blessing as the declaration that love, knowledge, and service to the people are inseparable.

The Western perspective: Gramsci's organic intellectual; an authentic folk version of magical realism; an emotionally charged variation of Brechtian epic theatre; and Bhabha's account of resistance through cultural identity.

The Chinese perspective: the ethics of yi, comparable to Guan Yu; the hualian system of character types; tianming in Durga's heavenly command; and the dramatic transformation of folk heroes within the minjian tradition.

The Israeli perspective: Rozik's transgressive animistic iconicity; the cultural parallel with Mizrahi theatre; Arendt's natality, with the prison speech as a political birth; and Levy's radical sacred dimension in the sumiran.

The shared conclusion of these four traditions is that the play performs an act of cultural justice. It brings the Dusadh hero Salhes into the centre of the Maithili literary stage, makes folk theatre the foundation of written drama, and affirms love and service to the people as inseparable principles. Taken together, these actions are presented as valuable and necessary within Indian, Western, Chinese, and Israeli frames of theatrical thought.

The final refrain completes the drama: "Love is truth, love is fragrance, the feeling of love is everlasting; as a flower without nectar, so what is life without love?" All the preceding critical arguments lead towards these words. They constitute a declaration of the soul of the collection itself.

Chapter 5

The Vow of Love, or Shruvavati's Victory!

Women's Self-Determination and the Vow of Love

Published: Antika, April–June 2013 · Stage: three levels · Cast: two male and two female actors

1. Introduction, Dramatic Architecture, and Central Questions

The Vow of Love, or Shruvavati's Victory!, the first play in the quartet of love, marks a new turn in Kunal's dramatic writing. In contrast to the populous, song-and-dance-filled expansiveness of the folk-theatre trilogy, this play is economical, concentrated, and driven by ideas. The stage directions specify "a three-level stage, with levels used at times as platforms and at others as steps." There are only four performers, two men and two women, who undertake multiple roles: Bharadvaja, the old man, Vashishtha, and Indra are shared between the male actors, while Shruvavati, her friend, and other women's roles are played by the actresses.

The source is a Puranic narrative concerning Shruvavati, daughter of the sage Bharadvaja, who appears in various mythological accounts. Kunal's Shruvavati, however, reaches far beyond the inherited story. She does not simply reject the conventional role of a daughter of marriageable age; she claims the right to determine the conditions of marriage: "The moment someone becomes meaningful to me, I shall marry!" The demand for meaningfulness is the drama's central philosophical and theatrical question.

The play has five movements: (1) Shruvavati's assertion of her independence and self-reliance before Bharadvaja; (2) her experience of love through Indra's shadow at the riverbank; (3) Indra's open appearance and invitation to enter heaven after death, which she refuses; (4) the tests set by Indra in the disguises of an old man and Vashishtha, involving a miraculous fruit that turns into stone; and (5) Shruvavati's resolve to enter the pyre, Indra's acceptance, and a conclusion marked by a couplet from Dushyant Kumar.

2. Indian Dramatic Theory

2.1 The Classical Form of the Short Play and the Arrangement of Acts

The Natyashastra distinguishes dramatic forms according to extent and structure. Within the tradition of the Dasharupaka, the natika is presented here as a relatively short, heroine-centred drama involving a principal romance and an element of sorrow. The word "or" in the present title combines elite and popular traditions: The Vow of Love names a classical emotional value, while Shruvavati's Victory! has the force of a popular exclamation.

The use of a three-level stage may be read as a modern transformation of the Natyashastra's concept of the rangamandapa. Bharata describes divisions associated with the rangashirsha, the rangapitha, and the backstage area. Kunal's arrangement reinterprets these levels: the highest for male narrators or the sutradhara, the middle for the principal dramatic episodes, and the lower for the natural world of vegetation and riverbanks.

2.2 Rasa: Three Expressions of Shringara Together

Three varieties of shringara rasa coexist in this play: (a) love in union, in the initial attraction and the vision of a shadow by the river; (b) love in separation, in Indra's repeated refusals and Shruvavati's painful waiting; and (c) devotional love, in the making of a garland "to place upon the deity of my heart." Bharata identifies rati, loving attachment, as the enduring emotion of shringara. At its highest level, this can be understood as a purified love transcending the senses. Shruvavati is an embodiment of that aspiration.

Karuna rasa also has a distinctive presence: "What use is a heart that contains no memory of the beloved?" This is not simply an expression of grief but a philosophical sorrow in which the value of life is itself brought into question. The concluding scene also contains an element of shanta rasa, a quiet acceptance beyond all the relationships of ordinary life.

2.3 Dharmashastra and Female Autonomy: A Political Reading of the Drama

A familiar passage from the Manusmriti—"The father protects in childhood, the husband in youth"—assigns the responsibility of protecting a woman to male relations. Bharadvaja upholds this convention: "A woman should live with her brother, father, or husband." Shruvavati counters the entire norm with a question: "Why? Can I not protect and care for myself, Father?"

The cultural importance of this question is remarkable. It reaches beyond a demand for personal independence to challenge a dharmashastric norm from within Maithili mythological drama itself. Bharadvaja's final response—"May you be happy, whether as a householder or an ascetic"—concedes her right to choose. Patriarchal authority yields at this dramatic moment, which follows upon a tradition of women-centred intellectual and literary figures such as Maitreyi, Gargi, and Shakuntala.

2.4 Vakrokti: The Many-Layered Suggestiveness of "Meaningful"

From the perspectives of both Kuntaka's vakrokti and Anandavardhana's dhvani, the word "meaningful" is the most important term in the play. Literally it means important or useful; by extension, someone who lives a purposeful life; by suggestion, someone whose presence gives meaning to my own existence. The third meaning is the philosophical soul of the drama. Shruvavati seeks not outward qualifications such as beauty, wealth, or valour, but an intimate relationship of meaning.

The irony is that Indra, king of the gods, immensely powerful, already married, and lord of heaven, fails the test of becoming "meaningful" to a sage's daughter. Only at the scene of the pyre does he finally prove himself. The reversal combines oblique expression with satire.

3. Western Dramatic Theory

3.1 Simone de Beauvoir: The Second Sex and Female Agency

The French philosopher and feminist Simone de Beauvoir (1908–1986) famously argued in The Second Sex (1949): "One is not born, but rather becomes, a woman." Her account treats the positioning of woman as "Other" as a social and cultural construction.

Shruvavati is a mythological dramatic example of this contention. Her father's protection, marriage proposals from royal families, and Indra's invitation for life "after death" all seek in different ways to turn her into an object of others' arrangements. At each stage she refuses and claims the position of an acting subject. Her final words—"I had accepted you all along, beloved! Now you say so yourself!"—represent the culmination of that agency. The victory is hers.

3.2 Sartre: Existentialism and the Creation of Meaning

The French philosopher Jean-Paul Sartre (1905–1980) made "existence precedes essence" the central proposition of his existentialism. Human beings do not arrive with a predetermined essence; they define themselves through free decisions.

Shruvavati's position offers a mythological parallel to Sartrean existentialism. To be a sage's daughter is an identity given by birth; to be an "independent and self-reliant person" is an identity she claims and creates. "You yourself have said that exceptions prove the rule. Let me be an exception, Father!" expresses a kind of radical freedom in Maithili dramatic language.

Sartre uses mauvaise foi, or bad faith, for the refusal to acknowledge one's freedom and the retreat into prescribed roles. Indra's succession of disguises, as an old man and as Vashishtha, offers a divine variation on evasive self-presentation: the king of the gods hides his actual identity while administering tests. Shruvavati breaks through each disguise: "I was married from the moment I gave you a place in my heart."

3.3 Bakhtin: Polyphonic Drama and Dialogism

Mikhail Bakhtin's concept of dialogism treats language as inherently populated by different voices, with multiple discourses reverberating through individual utterances. The play's most notable example of such dialogism occurs in its final Urdu couplet.

Dushyant Kumar's (1931–1975) celebrated lines—"Who says a hole cannot be made in the sky? / Throw a stone with all your strength, friends"—appear suddenly at the end of a Maithili mythological play. Three linguistic and cultural registers meet in this polyphonic conclusion: Maithili myth, Hindi–Urdu poetic tradition, and modern political consciousness, in which piercing the sky signifies making the impossible possible. This is a distinctive theatrical instance of Bakhtinian heteroglossia.

3.4 Peter Brook: The Empty Stage and Theatrical Economy

In The Empty Space (1968), the British director Peter Brook (1925–2022) famously suggested that one person crossing an empty space while another watches is enough to constitute theatre. His concept of holy theatre also directs attention to what can be suggested rather than materially represented, allowing the spectator's imagination to participate.

The three-level empty stage of this play is a Maithili mythological counterpart to Brook's empty space. The levels become platforms or stairs according to need: the design offers possibilities of space rather than a mass of scenery. Indra's disappearances and returns, the fruit turning into stone, and the creation of the pyre can all be realised through changes in light and the performer's actions rather than elaborate sets. This is the realm of Brook's holy theatre, in which the spectator's inward attention becomes active.

4. Chinese Dramatic Theory

4.1 Yuanfen: Predestined Love and Shruvavati's Challenge

In Chinese cultural thought, yuanfen denotes an affinity or bond of fate that brings two people together, often imagined as a preordained thread linking two souls. Many poetic dramas seek its fulfilment.

The relationship between Shruvavati and Indra gives yuanfen a complicated form. She calls Indra the "deity of her heart" and makes a garland for him, acknowledging the bond. Yet she rejects his condition of union only "after death" and therefore redefines what that bond means. Fate may bring two people together, she suggests, but a woman can determine the time and conditions of their relationship. This is a subtle assertion of agency.

4.2 Kaoyan: The Dramatic Tradition of the Trial

Kaoyan, the test or trial, is a familiar device in classical Chinese drama. Folk narratives frequently require a lover's loyalty to be demonstrated through an extraordinary ordeal. The dramatic tradition of Liang Zhu, or The Butterfly Lovers, likewise gives great importance to tests of fidelity.

In Kunal's play, the conventional structure of the trial is reversed. Instead of the hero being tested, Shruvavati is subjected to Indra's fruit test; yet the examiner himself is tested when her resolve to enter the pyre unsettles him. The examiner becomes the one examined. This reversal testifies to the play's originality.

4.3 Yizhi: Moral Will in Neo-Confucian Ethics

Neo-Confucian thinkers, particularly Wang Yangming (1472–1529), emphasised moral will, yizhi, and the extension of innate moral knowledge, zhi liangzhi. They understood moral knowing as something fundamentally available within human beings rather than simply imposed from outside.

Shruvavati may be regarded as a character endowed with such moral will. Her demand for meaningfulness, her denunciation of the disguised Indra as a man belonging to another woman, and her resolve at the pyre are not decisions taught to her by external authority. They arise from within. The play's assertion that "inner strength is a human being's greatest wealth" consequently bears a striking resemblance to Wang Yangming's moral philosophy.

4.4 Beiju: Chinese Tragedy and the "Victory" of This Play

Chinese dramatic criticism has debated whether classical Chinese theatre possesses beiju, tragedy in a specifically Western sense. Wang Guowei is presented here as observing that Chinese drama can involve painful circumstances while commonly moving towards accommodation or reconciliation. Such a pattern may be called a form of incomplete or qualified tragedy.

The "Victory!" of the title indicates that this play is not simply beiju, but an example of joy within sorrow. The hardening of the fruit and the resolve to enter the pyre are painful; Indra's acknowledgement and the declaration of victory bring reconciliation. The crucial reversal is that the victor is Shruvavati, not Indra, lord of the gods.

5. Israeli Dramatic Theory

5.1 Hanoch Levin: Dramatising the Defence of Human Dignity

The Israeli playwright Hanoch Levin (1943–1999) repeatedly explored the systems against which human dignity must be defended. In plays such as The Labour of Life, women often struggle to preserve their identity against familial and social pressures.

Shruvavati's circumstances resemble those of Levin's female characters, but with a significant difference. Levin's women frequently fail, overwhelmed by the structures surrounding them, whereas Shruvavati wins. The distinction reveals Kunal's optimistic humanism. In place of Levin's harsh realism, he offers a mythological Indian optimism in which inner strength ultimately triumphs.

5.2 Eli Rozik: Multiple Roles and the Iconicity of Changing Identity

Rozik's theory of theatrical iconicity is tested here by the use of multiple roles. The same performer may play Bharadvaja, the old man, Vashishtha, and Indra.

The question is: when an actor assumes several identities, what theatrical image does the spectator see? Rozik's approach distinguishes the actor's presence from the image of the represented character. This dual perception is a source of theatrical beauty. Here it acquires a specific dramatic and political meaning: when Indra tests Shruvavati disguised as an old man or Vashishtha, the spectator knows that the figure is Indra. The resulting dramatic irony makes Shruvavati's insight into the truth even more striking.

5.3 Post-Holocaust Theatre: Fire and Existence

In post-Holocaust theatrical reflection associated in this account with the Israeli scholar Dvora Ben-Shaul and others, fire has become a heavily charged symbol, bringing together destruction and survival.

Shruvavati's pyre scene becomes a complex image in this interpretative context. Within the traditional Indian setting, entering the fire recalls sati, a patriarchal institution. Kunal reverses the symbolic logic: the pyre expresses not simply a wish to die but a demand for a life that contains love. She lights the fire herself and declares that she will enter it while remembering the beloved. The choice is framed as a demand to live with love or not to live without it. From the perspective of the politics of survival, Shruvavati becomes a witness who makes her own existence the evidence of her claim.

5.4 Yaakov Shabtai: The Final Urdu Couplet and Intercultural Dialogue

In works such as Past Continuous, the Israeli writer and dramatist Yaakov Shabtai (1934–1981) treats language as an important aesthetic instrument. The interplay of Hebrew, Yiddish, and Arabic provides an expression of cultural hybridity.

Kunal's use of an Urdu couplet at the end of his Maithili play offers an analogous form of intercultural dialogue. Maithili, a mythological context, and the Urdu poetic tradition meet here not merely as ornaments but as a cultural and political proposition: the language of inner strength recognises no linguistic boundary, and its Urdu expression can be as authentic as its Maithili one. Dushyant Kumar's injunction to throw a stone with conviction becomes, in this reading, an Urdu translation of Shruvavati's resolve at the pyre.

6. A Fourfold Synthesis: The Many Meanings of "Victory"

Seen through all four dramatic traditions, the central question of The Vow of Love, or Shruvavati's Victory! comes into focus: whose victory is this, and what sort of victory has been achieved?

The Indian perspective: the three forms of shringara; the dramatic challenge to the dharmashastric regulation of women; three levels of suggested meaning in "meaningful"; and the pyre reinterpreted through devotion.

The Western perspective: the emergence of the woman as a subject through Beauvoir; Sartre's radical freedom; Bakhtin's heteroglossia in the Urdu couplet; and Brook's holy theatre of the empty stage.

The Chinese perspective: a redefinition of yuanfen; the reversal of kaoyan, the trial; Wang Yangming's moral will as inner strength; and a resolution characterised by joy within sorrow.

The Israeli perspective: the contrast between Levin's struggling women and Kunal's hopeful affirmation of inner strength; Rozik's double iconicity; fire and the politics of survival; and Shabtai's intercultural dialogue.

The shared conclusion is that Shruvavati's victory is not merely a personal triumph in love. It is a philosophical victory: that of inner strength, understood in Indian terms as courage, in Western thought as freedom, in Chinese thought as moral will, and in Israeli theatrical reflection as dignity. The exclamation mark in the title matters. It proclaims; it does not merely describe.

Chapter 6

The Power of Faith, or Sukanya's Marriage

A Rereading of the Sukanya–Chyavana Narrative

Published: Antika, April–June 2013 · Source: Mahabharata (Shanti Parva) · Cast: sutradhara and performers in multiple roles

1. Introduction, Dramatic Architecture, and Distinctiveness

The Power of Faith, or Sukanya's Marriage, the second play of the love quartet, draws on the story of Sukanya and Chyavana in the Shanti Parva of the Mahabharata. Kunal, however, rewrites this traditional narrative from a new feminist and philosophical perspective. The title is revealing: "The Power of Faith" identifies the governing idea, while "Sukanya's Marriage" identifies the event of the story.

The structure is closely organised around five dramatic movements: (1) a spring festival, with the sutradhara, Vidyapati's song "The king of seasons, spring, has arrived," and the contrasting outlooks of king and queen; (2) Chyavana's meditation inside an anthill and Sukanya's accidental injury to him during play; (3) Chyavana's forgiveness, the marriage proposal, the king's dilemma, and Sukanya's willing acceptance; (4) life in the hermitage and the deceptive test set by the Ashvini Kumar through three identical figures; and (5) Sukanya's test of recognition through the eyes, Chyavana's restoration to youth, the offering of soma, and the conclusion.

The play's central question is: what is faith, and from where does it arise? Does it come from the eyes or from the heart? When three indistinguishable figures stand before her, by what means does a woman recognise her husband —his body or his inner being? The play's ideological climax provides its answer: "Affection, jealousy, compassion—they stir within these eyes."

2. Indian Dramatic Theory

2.1 The Mahabharata Source and Its Rewriting: The Politics of Dramatisation

In the account of Sukanya and Chyavana attributed here to the Shanti Parva of the Mahabharata, Sukanya is an obedient daughter who marries the aged Chyavana at her father's command. Kunal replaces this obedient daughter with a woman who acts by her own will. Where the marriage is the father's decision in the epic account, Sukanya declares in this drama, "The offence is mine; I shall make amends," and freely chooses to become Chyavana's wife.

Such rewriting of epic narratives is an established practice in Indian women-centred literature, which retells inherited epics through figures such as Urmila in the Ramayana and Draupadi in the Mahabharata. As a male author, Kunal displays a conscious engagement with this tradition.

2.2 Rasa: Three Stages of Shringara and the Triumph of Wonder

Shringara rasa follows a distinct dramatic progression: (a) it begins in the poetic elevation of spring through Vidyapati's "The king of seasons, spring, has arrived"; (b) it passes into sorrow and fear when Sukanya accidentally wounds Chyavana within the anthill, provoking his anger and her sense of guilt; and (c) it grows into a love grounded in trust during life in the hermitage, where Sukanya declares that she is happy even while living like an ascetic, dressed in bark cloth.

The climactic moment of adbhuta rasa, wonder, occurs in the Ashvini test: three identical figures stand before Sukanya. This is a particular form of pleasurable astonishment. Bharata associates the marvellous with transitory emotions such as fatigue, delight, envy, dejection, and restlessness, all of which the analysis finds in this scene.

2.3 The Trial of the Eyes: Vision in Indian Philosophy

In Indian philosophical and poetic traditions, the eye has several interconnected meanings: the organ of direct perception, the "mirror" of the soul, and the medium of intimate encounter. Reading the heart through the eyes is a longstanding poetic convention, prominent also in Vidyapati's lyrics.

In the test involving three identical figures, Sukanya's recognition emerges from vision, but not from merely external sight. It depends upon inner perception.

"Affection, jealousy, compassion—these surge within these eyes. Passion, tenderness, joy—these dwell within these eyes."

In the terms used here from Nyaya philosophy, this amounts to perception through distinguishing marks: recognition of inner qualities despite the lack of outward difference. In the terminology of Navya-Nyaya, a linga, a sign or reason, supports the inference of a sadhya, the intended conclusion. Sukanya sees the signs of affection and compassion in the eyes and thus identifies Chyavana.

2.4 The "Chyavanprash" Episode: Folk Memory and Theatrical Wit

The sutradhara introduces an amusing remark: "The Chyavana of Chyavanprash? ... Yes ... no ... let us say he is the one." In a single line Kunal draws two thousand years of distance into a comic theatrical moment. The sage Chyavana is famed for medicinal knowledge, while Chyavanprash is a modern product named after that tradition. This is a modern instance of the vidushaka's comic speech, which inserts wit and irony into the solemnity of mythological material.

3. Western Dramatic Theory

3.1 Martin Buber: I–Thou and I–It Relationships

In I and Thou (Ich und Du, 1923), the German-Jewish philosopher Martin Buber (1878–1965) distinguished two fundamental modes of relationship. In an I–Thou relationship, the other person is encountered as a complete subject; in an I–It relationship, the other is treated as an object.

The Ashvini Kumar represent the I–It attitude: they seek to turn Sukanya into a beautiful object, seeing only the body. The relationship between Chyavana and Sukanya embodies I–Thou. Chyavana says, "You enter through the door of the eyes and see the heart." This is a dramatic rendering of Buber's genuine meeting, Begegnung. The reversed movement of the Ashvini test, in which Sukanya reads the inner person through the eyes, is the means of recognition proper to I–Thou.

3.2 Aristotle: A New Form of Anagnorisis

In Aristotle's Poetics, anagnorisis, or recognition, is a significant dramatic moment in which a character discovers an identity or truth. In the most effective plots, recognition coincides with peripeteia, a reversal of circumstances.

The scene of the three identical figures creates an unusual version of recognition. Sukanya identifies her husband among the three. Aristotelian recognition is often associated with external tokens, such as a scar, ring, or name. Here the recognition depends upon reading inner qualities—affection, compassion, and tenderness. This "internal anagnorisis" extends the possibilities of the category.

3.3 Erik Erikson: The Crisis of Identity and the Development of Trust

The American psychologist Erik Erikson (1902–1994) formulated eight stages of human psychosocial development. His first stage concerns basic trust versus mistrust, and the establishment of this fundamental trust is a foundation of later development.

Sukanya's faith becomes a mythological dramatic example of the formation of basic trust. She grows up hearing the contrasting philosophies of her parents: her father's liberal optimism, "Be happy; everything will be all right," and her mother's cautious realism, "Do not turn your eyes away from reality." Sukanya moves beyond both positions to develop her own trust through the guilt of accidentally injuring Chyavana, her voluntary marriage, and her steadfastness during the Ashvini test. The action forms a dramatic journey of trust formation.

3.4 Brecht: The Politics of Humour and the Irony of the Demigods

In Brechtian dramaturgy, comic episodes can bear political satire. The Ashvini Kumar sequence is particularly striking in this regard. The demigods, who live in heaven, associate with celestial nymphs, and enjoy a privileged divine status, fail before a princess living in a forest hermitage and wearing bark cloth.

Read through Brecht's Gestus, the scene offers a critique of class. Privileged divine beings cannot comprehend the human values lived by an ordinary mortal woman. Sukanya's answer—"You people have no hearts"—becomes the scene's ethical and political judgement.

4. Chinese Dramatic Theory

4.1 Xinyan: The Eye of the Heart

In Chinese poetics and Buddhist thought, xinyan, the "heart-eye," is a form of inward seeing that perceives truth beyond outward appearances. Within Chan Buddhist traditions, it has affinities with the idea of the dharma-eye.

The play's central test, identifying one's husband from three identical figures, is an exercise in this inner sight. Sukanya closes her physical eyes, then discerns different inner qualities in the figures' eyes: pride and arrogance in the first Ashvini, acquisitiveness and greed in the second, and affection, compassion, and joy in Chyavana. This is a remarkable theatrical realisation of the heart-eye.

4.2 Yuan: Karmic Connection and Atonement

In Chinese Buddhist philosophy, yuan, karmic connection, is an important concept. The meeting of two lives may arise from earlier actions, while such bonds can also be shaped through choices in the present.

Sukanya's injury to Chyavana is an unintentional act: "I did not wish to do it; it happened." Her response—"I am guilty, and I deserve punishment"—is a conscious movement towards atonement and the repair of a karmic relationship. Her decision leads to Chyavana's proposal of marriage. The dramatic action thus follows a trajectory of karmic rectification.

4.3 Xing–Shen: The Conflict Between Form and Spirit

Chinese aesthetics repeatedly discusses the relationship between xing, external form, and shen, the inward spirit. The theory of painting likewise considers how the artist may capture spirit through the representation of form.

In the scene of the three identical figures, xing is the same in each, while shen differs. Sukanya's faith is the capacity to see spirit beyond form. The Ashvini Kumar fail because they can imitate xing but not shen. Their defeat therefore corresponds to the distinction at the centre of this Chinese aesthetic principle.

4.4 Yiwu: Moral Obligation and Sukanya's Ethical Development

Yiwu, moral obligation, is central to the ethical framework described here through Confucian philosophy. Such obligation is not merely obedience to outward rules. For Mencius, moral conduct arises from ren, an inward disposition towards benevolence and humanity.

Sukanya's journey shows a distinctive sequence of moral development: (a) an unintentional act, the injury within the anthill; (b) an awareness of responsibility and admission of fault; (c) an ethical choice in her voluntary marriage; and (d) the manifestation of benevolence through forgiveness of the Ashvini Kumar and love for Chyavana. The resulting progression may be read as a Mencian moral arc.

5. Israeli Dramatic Theory

5.1 Martin Buber and Israeli Spiritual Life: Hasidic Faith

Martin Buber, whose I–Thou philosophy has been discussed in the Western section, is also an important figure in modern Israeli intellectual and cultural traditions. His engagement with Hasidic Jewish thought places emunah, faith, among the central spiritual and ethical values.

In Buber's interpretation of Hasidic tradition, faith is more than intellectual assent. It is a turning of the entire self towards another, a kind of surrender or dedication. Sukanya's trust provides a Hindu mythological counterpart to this understanding of emunah. She recognises Chyavana not through calculation but with her whole heart. The Power of Faith and Buber's account of faith therefore describe comparable spiritual journeys.

5.2 Eli Rozik: The Iconicity of the Mask and the Crisis of Identity

Rozik's theory of theatrical iconicity faces an unusual problem in this play: three apparently identical actors, in the same costume and outward form, speaking in the same manner. What can the spectator perceive when a theatrical image appears indistinguishable from its counterparts?

The audience sees three levels simultaneously: (a) the bodily presence of three actors; (b) the three fictional figures, Chyavana and the two Ashvini brothers; and (c) Sukanya's reading of the heart, which separates the referents of seemingly identical images. The scene thus creates a complex iconic ambiguity: the problem of recognition itself becomes the dramatic subject.

5.3 Tikkun Olam and the Drama of Atonement

Tikkun olam, the repair of the world, is a significant idea in Jewish religious ethics, affirming a responsibility to restore what has been damaged through human conduct. At the personal level, the movement towards repair may begin with teshuva, repentance and a return to the right path.

Sukanya's conduct can be read as a Hindu mythological counterpart. She acknowledges the shever, the break or damage, caused by her action at the anthill; undertakes teshuva by accepting responsibility; and seeks to repair her life through her marriage to Chyavana. The closing image, "a rain fragrant with affection kept falling," marks the completion of this process of repair.

5.4 The Purim Spiel and Comic Reversal

The Purim spiel is a traditional Jewish popular dramatic form that recasts inherited narratives through humour and satire, often employing reversals of status, changes of costume, and comic interpretations of serious subjects.

The Ashvini Kumar episode resembles this kind of performance in a Hindu mythological setting. The demigods are supposedly exalted beings, but here they are ridiculous, frustrated, and humiliated. Sukanya's threat to make them "human in front and goats behind" creates a carnivalesque inversion reminiscent of the Purim spiel. Comic ridicule enlivenes the serious mythological material.

6. A Fourfold Synthesis: What Is the Power of Faith?

When these four theatrical traditions are considered together, the answer to the play's governing question becomes multidimensional.

The Indian perspective: a rewriting of the epic through voluntary marriage; shringara combined with wonder and sorrow; the interpretation of signs in the eyes through Navya-Nyaya; and the Chyavanprash remark as the wit of the vidushaka.

The Western perspective: Buber's I–Thou as a relationship of the heart rather than objectification; Aristotle's internal recognition; Erikson's formation of trust; and a Brechtian class critique of demigods who fail to understand human feeling.

The Chinese perspective: xinyan, the heart-eye; yuan, karmic affinity and atonement; xing–shen, the contrast between outward form and inward spirit; and yiwu, the Mencian trajectory of moral development.

The Israeli perspective: Buber's Hasidic emunah, the faith of the whole heart; Rozik's iconic ambiguity; tikkun olam as a movement from injury to marriage and repair; and the Purim-spiel-like carnivalesque comedy of the Ashvini scene.

The shared conclusion is that the power of faith resides not in bodily appearance but in the heart. The play's finest moment, when Sukanya closes her eyes and identifies her husband among three identical figures through the affection and compassion visible in his gaze, is illuminated by all four traditions of theatrical interpretation.

Chyavana's final words also serve as the conclusion of this fourfold review: "It could not be otherwise ... I know you, beloved. You enter through the door of the eyes and see the heart."

Chapter 7

The Expansion of Love, or Shweta's Discovery

Shweta, Atiratha, and the Question of Autonomous Love

Published: Antika, July–September 2014 · Setting: royal complex to forest · Cast: announcer and performers in multiple roles

1. Introduction, Dramatic Structure, and Distinctive Features

The third play of the love quartet, The Expansion of Love, or Shweta's Discovery, is the quartet's most original and ideologically adventurous work. Its story comes from no inherited mythological source; it is Kunal's own invention. Shweta, the court dancer, and Atiratha, the "detached" king, are fictional characters whose conflict nevertheless gives dramatic form to an enduring philosophical question.

The playwright creates a daring contradiction. King Atiratha is a great patron of art, a connoisseur of music and dance, devoted to his subjects and almost saintly; yet he remains "detached," declaring, "To fall in love is sheer folly, a completely useless undertaking." Against him stands Shweta, a dancer moved by love after seven years of disciplined training, who insists that "one cannot see art without seeing the artist."

The plot consists of six movements: (1) the announcer's introduction, Shweta's dance training, and Atiratha's philosophy of detachment; (2) an encounter at the temple and Shweta's refusal to dance at court; (3) her request for a private meeting and Atiratha's angry expulsion of her; (4) the report of Shweta's supposed water burial and Atiratha's distress; (5) their meeting in the forest, where Shweta has changed and declares, "Desire and supplication belong to my past"; and (6) Atiratha's renunciation of the crown and their union with the natural world.

2. Indian Dramatic Theory

2.1 Shweta and the Classical Types of the Heroine

Shweta occupies a distinctive position in the Natyashastra's classification of eight heroines, the ashtanayika. She is not simply the abhisarika, who ventures out to meet her lover, nor the svadhinapatika, who has her husband under her influence. Her nearest counterparts are the woman yearning for union and the one tormented by separation, yet she ultimately transcends both. All eight classical types define the heroine's love in relation to another person. By the end of the play, Shweta dissolves love into the supreme being understood through nature and divinity.

This dissolution resembles the devotional ideal of the lover in separation, familiar from Mirabai's ecstatic longing and Radha's passion, where the impossibility of earthly union is transformed into the sublimity of divine love. Shweta's final declaration—"Here everything visible and invisible will love me, and I shall love everything"—expresses the universal love celebrated by the bhakti tradition.

2.2 Rasa: The Journey from Shringara to Shanta

The most remarkable emotional feature of the play is the transformation within Shweta from intense shringara rasa to shanta rasa. Abhinavagupta treats tranquillity as a supreme aesthetic experience, in which attachment and detachment subside into an impersonal enjoyment of beauty. Shweta's life in the forest becomes an embodiment of this tranquillity.

The irony of the journey is elegant. Atiratha, who has always been "detached" and seemed to belong to shanta rasa, becomes emotionally attached to Shweta at the end. Shweta, originally consumed by attachment, becomes detached and absorbed into nature. The dramatic skill of the play lies in this reversal of their emotional positions.

2.3 Dhvani: The Multiple Meanings of "Discovery"

From the perspective of Anandavardhana's Dhvanyaloka, the word avishkar, translated here as "discovery," is the most suggestively charged term in the title. Literally it means disclosure or discovery; by extension, the manifestation of oneself, as in Shweta's self-disclosure to Atiratha; and by suggestion, the discovery and creation of a new understanding of oneself through love.

In this third sense, discovery becomes an epistemological event. Through the failure of her attempt to win Atiratha, Shweta discovers a higher form of love: "Now I have become acquainted with the true nature of love." The refrain from Kusma-Salhes, "As a flower without nectar, so what is life without love?", is spoken by Shweta, who at the conclusion finds this very nectar in nature.

2.4 Dramaturgy: The Triangle of Art, Artist, and Spectator

Atiratha's proposition that "the body matters only as the vehicle of art" raises a major dispute in Indian aesthetics. In his Abhinavabharati, Abhinavagupta makes the sensitive spectator, the sahridaya, essential to the realisation of rasa. Aesthetic experience need not depend on personal identification with the artist. In this respect, Atiratha's position is an extreme version of the theory of the appreciative spectator.

Shweta exposes the limits of this view. To separate art from the artist is to attempt an artificial discrimination between milk and water. The artist's feelings, body, and lived experience are all absorbed into the work; art does not exist wholly apart from the person who creates it. This disagreement is a living question of theatrical and aesthetic philosophy.

3. Western Dramatic Theory

3.1 Ibsen and Nora: Freedom after the Rejection of Love

In A Doll's House (1879), the Norwegian playwright Henrik Ibsen (1828–1906) tells the story of Nora Helmer, who breaks with the expectations imposed by society, marriage, and family and departs in search of freedom. Nora's departure is not simply an evasion of duty, but a pursuit of her own identity.

Shweta's journey into the forest parallels Nora's departure, with a significant reversal. Nora leaves by closing a door, taking her leave of a society she rejects; Shweta moves towards nature with open arms, entering a new relationship. Nora's departure is solitary, whereas Shweta's ultimately draws Atiratha after her, as he removes his crown and follows her. The drama proposes another step beyond Ibsen's theatrical ending.

3.2 Sartre and Camus: Rebellion and the Absurd

In The Myth of Sisyphus (1942), the French existentialist Albert Camus (1913–1960) analysed the experience of the absurd, arising from the confrontation between humanity's hunger for meaning and the silence or resistance of the world. His response includes the celebrated proposition that one must imagine Sisyphus happy.

Atiratha's detachment creates a form of absurdity in this sense: a sensitive, cultivated connoisseur of beauty declares love to be a pointless undertaking. Shweta revolts against this absurdity. She stops dancing at court, places a garland at his feet in the temple, and demands a private meeting. She becomes a female dramatic counterpart to Camus's rebellious human being, l'homme revolte.

The final reversal, when Atiratha removes his crown and enters the forest, also bears a resemblance to Camus's paradoxical joy of Sisyphus. Happiness emerges as the weight of royal power is abandoned.

3.3 Erich Fromm: Love as an Art

In The Art of Loving (1956), the German-American psychoanalyst Erich Fromm (1900–1980) argues that love is an art which, like other arts, requires learning, practice, and dedication. People often imagine love as an object to be obtained, whereas it is a capacity that must be cultivated.

Shweta's seven years of discipline can be read as training not only in dance but also in love. Yet the pivotal point in terms of Fromm's thought comes when she declares, "Now I have become acquainted with the true nature of love." In this new understanding, love ceases to be desire directed towards one person and becomes a pervasive capacity for relation. In Fromm's terminology, it approaches mature love.

3.4 Epiphany: The Culminating Moment of Dramatic Revelation

The Irish writer James Joyce (1882–1941) developed the notion of epiphany, a moment when an otherwise ordinary situation reveals an extraordinary truth. The present discussion connects this idea with theatrical approaches to epiphany associated with Egon Wellesz and other critics.

Shweta's contemplation of the stars beside the river is a dramatic epiphany: "The sky is filled with thousands upon thousands of stars. How lovingly they look towards me!" A simple scene beside a river suddenly becomes an overwhelming revelation of significance: "Why had this thought never occurred to me before?" In that moment her understanding changes. It is a Maithili theatrical instance of epiphanic discovery.

4. Chinese Dramatic Theory

4.1 Wuwei: Atiratha's Detachment and Daoist Non-Action

Wuwei, non-coercive or effortless action, is a central idea in Daoist philosophy associated with Laozi. The Dao acts without forcing action, yet things are accomplished. Wuwei does not mean inertia but acting without artificial interference.

Atiratha's detachment is a distorted version of wuwei. He correctly avoids interfering with the natural flow of art, yet also attempts not to participate in the flow of human emotion. From a Daoist perspective, he embodies not wuwei but artificially enforced inaction. Shweta's reproach—"You have raised a glass palace of false propriety all around you"—gives voice to such a criticism.

4.2 Ziran: Naturalness and Shweta's Forest Life

Ziran, naturalness or being-so-of-itself, is an important ideal in Daoist and Buddhist thought: the shedding of artificial constraints and the joining of natural processes. In Chinese shanshui, mountain-and-water painting, human figures are often small presences within the immensity of nature.

Shweta's forest life dramatises ziran. She abandons palaces, ornaments, and the throne to live among "trees, fruits and flowers, an ever-flowing stream, and the open sky." The final words of the announcer—"They mingled with the music of nature and became one with it"—express the culmination of this ideal.

4.3 Bian: Change and the Dramatic Logic of the I Ching

The I Ching, or Book of Changes, places transformation, bian, at the centre of the order of the world. Change is unavoidable; those who accept it may find freedom, whereas attempts to arrest it bring suffering.

The play presents two responses to change. Atiratha avoids transformation, using detachment as a protective shell. Shweta accepts it, even after rejection, especially at the riverbank where her outlook is transformed. From the perspective of the I Ching, she behaves like the junzi, the exemplary person, adjusting to the movement of change.

4.4 Yishu and Shenghuo: The Tension Between Art and Life

Chinese aesthetic reflection, including arguments associated here with scholars such as Liu Zhiyuan, has examined the relation between yishu, art, and shenghuo, life. Good art arises from life; when art is wholly separated from life, it becomes an empty form.

Atiratha's view that the body is "merely the vehicle of art" is an attempt to sever yishu from shenghuo. Shweta's protest—"How is detachment from the artist possible?"—opposes that division. Chinese aesthetic discussions of qi, the vital force, also hold that the artist's energy passes into the work; deprived of that life-force, art becomes lifeless.

5. Israeli Dramatic Theory

5.1 Hanoch Levin: The Boundaries of Royal Power and Personal Revolt

In works associated here with Hanoch Levin, including Patience of Stone, the predicament of individuals rebelling against structures of power appears repeatedly. A distinctive device in this theatrical mode is the small rebellion, a personal action that momentarily shakes a seemingly immense structure.

Shweta's refusal to dance at court offers an excellent example. She does not take up arms or proclaim revolution; she merely stops dancing. This precise, individual, symbolic act brings the court's entire performance order to a sudden standstill. It is the refusal of a small person before overwhelming power: a tremendous "no."

5.2 Eli Rozik: The Offstage Event and the Image of Absence

In his studies of theatrical images, Rozik gives attention to offstage events. What remains unseen by spectators but active in their imagination can possess greater dramatic force than something represented directly.

Shweta's supposed "water burial" is such an offstage event. The audience does not witness it but hears about it through the words of an attendant. In terms of theatrical iconicity, the absence becomes an image of exceptional dramatic power. Atiratha's response—"It may also be that the current swept her away and she reached the bank somewhere"—measures the force of what is unseen.

5.3 Israeli Theatre and Exile: A Tradition of Departure

Galut, exile, is a recurrent subject in Israeli cultural and theatrical life. Within this tradition, leaving home does not necessarily represent defeat; it can be a necessary journey through which new meaning is created.

Shweta's expulsion from the courtly world resembles galut, but it concludes in a form of teshuvah, a spiritual return home. Exiled to the forest, Shweta discovers a new home through union with nature. Atiratha's renunciation of his crown and entry into the forest reverses the movement: the king leaves his home, the throne, to enter Shweta's new home among the trees.

5.4 Israeli Environmental Theatre: The Politics of Union with Nature

Contemporary Israeli theatre has developed forms of environmental and site-specific performance that make the human relationship with the natural world a theatrical subject. The discussion associates this development with artists such as Yossi Maya, who address the politics of humanity's relation to nature.

Shweta's concluding words—"Here everything visible and invisible will love me, and I shall love everything"—become, from this perspective, a declaration of ecological love. The failure of a narrowly human relationship, after Atiratha rejects her, turns into a biophilic enlargement of love towards the living world.

6. A Fourfold Synthesis: What Does the "Expansion" of Love Mean?

The "expansion" announced in the title is the play's governing question. Love expands in the sense that it begins with one person and moves towards the whole of existence. The four traditions interpret this development from different directions.

The Indian perspective: the heroine of separation in bhakti transformed into shanta rasa; Abhinavagupta's tranquillity and the reversal of the emotional positions of Shweta and Atiratha; the three levels of dhvani in "discovery"; and the staged argument over art and the artist.

The Western perspective: a departure beyond Ibsen's Nora, leading not only to severance but to new relation; Camus's revolt against absurdity; Fromm's mature and all-embracing love; and Joyce's epiphany in the transformation occasioned by contemplating the stars.

The Chinese perspective: Atiratha's distorted wuwei; Shweta's ziran and union with nature; the acceptance of change, bian, in the I Ching; and the dispute between art and life, yishu and shenghuo.

The Israeli perspective: Levin's small rebellion in Shweta's refusal to dance; Rozik's iconic absence in the water-burial episode; galut and teshuvah as exile and return to a spiritual home; and ecological love in environmental theatre.

The conclusion shared by these perspectives is that the expansion of love means liberation from confinement to a single individual, Atiratha, and union with nature, the universe, and existence as a whole. In this sense the title makes the most ambitious philosophical claim of the entire love quartet.

The play's final image, Atiratha laying aside his crown and entering the forest, is an ironic moment of joy. The man who was "detached" becomes attached; the woman once attached becomes detached. This is the dramatic truth of love's expansion.

Chapter 8

The Test of Love, or Suprabha and Ashtavakra

Suprabha, Ashtavakra, and the Dramatic Trial of Fidelity

Published: Antika, July–September 2014 · Settings: forest hermitage, Mithila, and heaven · Fourteen scenes

1. Introduction, Plot Structure, and Place Within the Collection

The final play in the quartet of love, The Test of Love, or Suprabha and Ashtavakra, also brings the entire collection to a close. Its position is therefore symbolic: after The Expansion of Love comes The Test of Love. Its relatively epic scale—fourteen scenes, five settings embracing hermitage, city of Mithila, Janaka's court, heaven, and forest, and at least ten characters—is unusual within the love quartet.

The source lies in the Ashtavakra narrative of the Mahabharata's Vana Parva. Kunal transforms it into a complete drama of love in which the mythological and historical account of Janaka's court and the learned disputation with Vandi is absorbed into the framework of a trial of love. The first twelve scenes concern Ashtavakra; the thirteenth and fourteenth turn to Suprabha.

The seven major movements are: (1) knowledge and a curse in the womb, followed by birth; (2) Uddalaka's hermitage, the absent father, and the first meeting with Suprabha; (3) the plan to travel to Mithila; (4) a dispute on the road with King Janaka, the debate with Vandi, and the father's release; (5) the restoration of Ashtavakra's youthful form through river bathing; (6)

Vadanya's year-long test and Suprabha's solitary waiting; and (7) the rejection of Urvashi, the return, and marriage with a garland of white lotuses.

2. Indian Dramatic Theory

2.1 Rewriting the Mahabharata: The Boldness of Centring a Disabled Hero

The Ashtavakra narrative in the Mahabharata is primarily philosophical; the Ashtavakra Gita, associated with dialogue with Janaka, is a text of self-knowledge. The learned contest with Vandi provides another narrative strand. Kunal adds a third: the test of love. The result is a drama with three layers—knowledge through disputation with Vandi, duty in the liberation of the father, and love in the marriage to Suprabha.

More importantly, Kunal places a disabled hero at the centre of the stage. Conventional Indian dramatic characterisation often privileges bodily excellence in its heroes: the noble hero is strong, handsome, and valiant. Ashtavakra reverses that standard. His body is bent in eight places, but his intelligence is extraordinary. The Natyashastra offers no straightforward equivalent for such a central disabled hero. Kunal proposes a different dramatic ideal.

2.2 Transforming the Trial by Fire: Testing Gold

The agnipariksha, or trial by fire, is a major motif in Indian literary and dramatic traditions, as exemplified by Sita's trial in the Ramayana. Kunal transforms the motif into a trial through coldness and absence: not literal flames, but a year of solitary separation and the pain of being unable to see the beloved. The concluding couplet makes the transformation explicit:

"As gold emerges more radiant from fire, so love becomes deeper when it undergoes a trial."

The metaphor of testing gold through fire is applied to the testing of love. This figurative flame, the ordeal of separation, is more subtle and philosophically reflective than the literal fire associated with Sita's ordeal.

2.3 A Festival of Rasa: Seven Sentiments Together

This work presents the richest range of rasas among the seven plays. Vira, the heroic sentiment, appears in Ashtavakra's encounter at court and his victory over Vandi; karuna, sorrow, in the prenatal curse, the absence of the father, and Suprabha's suffering as she waits; adbhuta, wonder, in the restoration brought by river bathing and the revelation of Vandi's water-burial mystery; hasya, comedy, in the courtiers' taunts of "Your Hunchbacked Majesty" and Vandi's laughter; shringara, love, in the bond between Suprabha and Ashtavakra; shanta, tranquillity, in Ashtavakra's refusal of Urvashi; and bhayanaka, fear, in the supposed water burial of the father.

According to Bharata's distinction between principal and supporting rasas, vira and shringara operate here as complementary governing sentiments. The heroic struggle for knowledge establishes worthiness in love, while love gives heroism its direction.

2.4 Ashtavakra's Rejection of Urvashi: A Rare Moment in Indian Literature

Urvashi is a supreme symbol of beauty in Indian literary tradition, from the love of Pururavas to Kalidasa's classical drama Vikramorvashiyam. Ashtavakra's rejection of Urvashi is therefore a bold dramatic departure from a long-established pattern. He declares, "My Urvashi, Menaka, Rambha … all are Suprabha. Suprabha alone." The statement consciously dismantles the conventional attraction of the celestial nymph.

3. Western Dramatic Theory

3.1 Viktor Frankl: The Search for Meaning and the Transformation of Suffering

The Austrian psychiatrist Viktor Frankl (1905–1997), drawing on his experience in Nazi concentration camps, developed logotherapy in Man's Search for Meaning. Human beings live through the search for meaning, and a person who can find meaning within suffering may become able to withstand it.

Ashtavakra is born into suffering through his father's curse. Yet the knowledge of his father's condition, conveyed amid Shvetaketu's harsh words, gives his suffering a purpose: "I shall free my father." In Frankl's terminology, this is self-transcendence, the dedication of oneself to something meaningful beyond oneself. Ashtavakra's entire dramatic journey follows this movement.

His refusal of Urvashi is its highest expression. He turns away from the supreme beauty of the cosmos and the splendour of heavenly pleasure in favour of a meaningful bond, his love for Suprabha.

3.2 Sophocles: Bodily Impairment, Tragedy, and the Triumph of Knowledge

In Oedipus Rex, the Greek tragedian Sophocles (c. 497–406 BCE) presents a hero marked by an impairment associated with his very name, the "swollen foot," and by an inherited fate. Oedipus's search for knowledge ultimately contributes to his destruction.

Comparison with Ashtavakra is revealing. Both narratives connect the hero's early life to a curse; both involve the search for a father and the pursuit of knowledge. The decisive difference is that Oedipus's search leads to destruction, whereas Ashtavakra's leads to liberation and love. The contrast exposes a fundamental difference between the hopeful dramatic philosophy identified here with Indian traditions and the tragic ironies of Greek theatre.

3.3 Bakhtin: Carnivalesque Exclusion and Recognition

Bakhtin's carnivalesque becomes visible in a distinctive moment of the encounter at Janaka's court. The gatekeeper addresses Ashtavakra as "Your Hunchbacked Majesty," yet the supposedly inferior body belongs to the person who will teach those in power the ethical and legal arguments concerning the right of way. Social hierarchy is inverted: someone regarded as among the lowest teaches knowledge to the highest.

After Ashtavakra defeats Vandi, the collective laughter—"Good for him; he was terribly arrogant"—becomes an instance of Bakhtin's liberating laughter. The society that attempted to exclude the disabled boy from court now rejoices in his victory. The reversal is a carnivalesque form of social justice.

3.4 Peter Brook: The Mahabharata and Mythological Theatre

Peter Brook's The Mahabharata, staged in 1985 and subsequently adapted for film, was a major effort to transform an enormous epic into an experience of theatre with universal human resonance. Brook drew extensively upon Indian traditions, but approached them from outside.

Kunal's position differs because he writes from within the tradition. He makes the Ashtavakra narrative of the Mahabharata's Vana Parva specifically Mithila-centred by emphasising Janaka as king of Mithila. He also turns Vandi's revelation—that he is Varuna's son and that water is his home—into an episode mixing comedy with wonder. This is an internal revivification rather than an external reinterpretation of the mythic inheritance.

4. Chinese Dramatic Theory

4.1 Bianzhe: The Tradition of the Exiled or Dishonoured Talent

Bianzhe, the exile or demotion of a gifted person, is a prominent subject of Chinese literary tradition. From the poet Qu Yuan (c. 340–278 BCE) to Su Dongpo (1037–1101), great Chinese writers were often unjustly exiled or disgraced yet achieved immortality through their gifts.

Ashtavakra's prenatal curse becomes a form of bianzhe: he is, as it were, exiled even from his own body while still in the womb. Yet, as in Chinese writing about gifted exiles, his intelligence transforms exclusion into an epic journey. His victory over Vandi and bodily restoration through river bathing resemble the final moment of release in this literary tradition.

4.2 Zhong: Loyalty and Solitary Discipline

Zhong, loyalty or faithfulness, is a major Confucian ethical value. Often interpreted as loyalty to a ruler, it can also mean fidelity to one's own word and obligations.

The year-long test brings out this form of fidelity in both characters. Ashtavakra observes Vadanya's conditions to the letter, deliberately keeping his distance from Suprabha even when near her. Suprabha understands her father's intentions and consciously reduces her excursions from the hermitage. Their loyalties take different forms but reveal the same moral purpose: the proof of love.

4.3 Zhezixi and the Drama's Episodic Structure

The Chinese tradition of zhezixi, excerpt plays, is useful in understanding the drama's fourteen-scene architecture. Three independent episodes stand out: (a) the debate with Vandi at Janaka's court, a self-contained dramatic unit; (b) the year-long ordeal involving Ashtavakra and Suprabha; and (c) the rejection of Urvashi. Each could be staged as a separate excerpt, yet together they make up an expansive trial of love.

4.4 Wenda: Question-and-Answer Philosophy and Learned Disputation

Wenda, a question-and-answer dialogue, is a major Chinese method of philosophical inquiry, found in the conversations of Zhuangzi, the Confucian Analects, and the koans of Chan Buddhism. Ashtavakra's debate with Vandi is a theatrical counterpart. The announcer speaks of "doubt and resolution, refutation and exposition, question and counterquestion," precisely the structure of wenda.

Ashtavakra's first exchange with Vandi even recalls a Chan koan or paradoxical riddle. Vandi laughs at the idea of debating with a bent-bodied child. Ashtavakra responds, "Oblique remarks and laughter are of no use; what is required is learned debate." The seriousness of the question renders ridicule irrelevant, which is the spirit of the philosophical dialogue.

5. Israeli Dramatic Theory

5.1 Disability and Israeli Theatre: Ashtavakra's Embodied Presence

Disability theatre is a significant contemporary movement in Israel, pursuing accessible and inclusive performance and bringing disabled performers into the centre of the stage. In this approach the body is not a deficiency but a different capacity.

The play's treatment of Ashtavakra offers an Indian mythological counterpart to this movement. He neither conceals his body, bent in eight places, nor apologises for it. Instead he states, "My body is bent in eight places, but intelligence has no relation to age or appearance." The declaration expresses a principle central to disability justice.

5.2 Eli Rozik: River Bathing and the Icon of Transformation

The transformation of a theatrical character's outward image can be interpreted through Rozik's iconicity: the spectator witnesses the instant in which one represented body becomes another.

Ashtavakra's becoming straight and healthy after bathing in the river creates precisely such an image of transformation, enacted visually by a performer. In this interpretation the moment is doubly iconic: it suggests bodily change, from bent to straight, and inward change, from a son seeking his father to a recognised man of learning. The spectator sees both dimensions together.

5.3 The Jewish Talmudic Tradition and Learned Debate

The Talmudic tradition preserves a distinctive practice of scholarly disputation, including pilpul, the dialectical testing of arguments in search of understanding. The victory of an unexpected or younger scholar is a familiar possibility within such a tradition.

The debate with Vandi offers a Hindu mythological counterpart to pilpul. A young disabled boy defeats an established great scholar through arguments and counterarguments. Janaka's role as arbiter has an affinity with the beit din, the house or tribunal of judgement.

5.4 Israeli Theatre of Hope: Optimism in the Trial of Love

The discussion associates Israeli theatrical thinking, including writers such as Naomi Lapid, with a "theatre of hope" in which hope endures even under adverse conditions. Such hope is not naive optimism but hope that has been tested.

The closing couplet—"As gold emerges more radiant from fire, so love becomes deeper when it undergoes a trial"—expresses the spirit of tested hope. The final words of the entire collection—"There is no feeling greater than love, whose glory is boundless; come, let us all together proclaim love's victory!"—are not simply the conclusion of the seventh play but an acclamation completing all seven.

6. A Fourfold Synthesis: Why Is the Trial Necessary?

Considered together, the four traditions suggest a response to the play's central question and that of the collection: the trial does not merely prove love but brings it to maturity.

The Indian perspective: the boldness of centring a disabled protagonist within the context of classical dramaturgy; the meeting of seven rasas; the transformation of trial by fire into a trial of separation; and the refusal of Urvashi as a rupture with inherited conventions concerning celestial beauty.

The Western perspective: Frankl's logotherapy and meaning within suffering; the contrast with Oedipus, whose knowledge brings destruction rather than liberation; Bakhtin's carnivalesque reversal of the bent-bodied boy into a victor at court; and the difference between Brook's external reinterpretation and Kunal's revival from within the tradition.

The Chinese perspective: bianzhe, the exile of gifted persons; zhong, the faithfulness displayed during the year-long test; zhezixi, the three dramatic episodes; and wenda, the question-and-answer dispute that leads to Vandi's defeat.

The Israeli perspective: disability justice and the refusal to equate intelligence with bodily form; Rozik's image of transformation through river bathing; Talmudic pilpul as a parallel to the debate with Vandi; and a theatre of hope in the concluding couplet.

The shared conclusion is that the test of love is not an externally imposed torment but an inner refinement. Just as fire purifies rather than destroys gold, the year of separation deepens rather than destroys love. In this final play Kunal makes a last declaration of the ideological axis of the collection: "Love is truth."

7. The Collection as a Whole: The Ideological Unity of the Seven Plays

After examining the seven plays through four critical traditions, the collection Kusma-Salhes and Six Other Plays emerges as a coherent journey of thought.

The ideological progression of the folk-theatre trilogy is Forty Thieves (intelligence), Bidapat (poetic immortality), and Kusma-Salhes (love and service to the people): a moral and philosophical arc.

The development of the love quartet proceeds from Shruvavati (inner strength) through Sukanya (faith) and Shweta (the expansion of love) to Suprabha (love tested and matured): a sustained philosophical progression.

The thread that unites the collection is its recurring refrain: "Love is truth, love is fragrance, the feeling of love is everlasting; as a flower without nectar, so what is life without love?" It echoes from the closing song of Kusma-Salhes, the third play, through the declaration of Shweta's Discovery, the sixth. It is the manifesto of Kunal's dramatic work as a whole: love is the highest human value. The collection's contribution lies in affirming that value through folk tradition, classical inheritance, and independent imagination, tested against four major traditions of theatrical thought.

Chapter 9

Vidyapati's 100 Songs: Let No One Be Born a Woman

Edited by Kunal | A Song-by-Song Critique of "A Woman's Mind" and "A Poet's Mind"

1. Introduction to the Book and the Scope of Inquiry

This book is an edited selection of one hundred of Vidyapati's songs. Its cover and title page identify the work as Vidyapati's 100 Songs: Let No One Be Born a Woman, edited by Kunal. The publication pages give ISBN 978-81-962063-0-7, a first edition of 2023, and Ankita Prakashan Pvt. Ltd. as publisher (original edition, pp. 3–4). The design of the selection itself raises a critical question: the meaning of a lyric emerges not only from its words but also from the way the pieces are selected and ordered.

The present study is based on a comparison of the contents pages (original pp. 7–8) with the actual sequence of songs. Of the hundred songs, the first seventy belong to the section "A Woman's Mind," while the remaining thirty fall under "A Poet's Mind." Song 1 begins on original page 9 and Song 100 appears on page 127. Page 128 contains a list of sources and abbreviations.

2. The Editorial Introduction and the Structure of the Selection

The editor's introduction (original pp. 5–6) insists upon the central place of women's experience in the collection. The title, "Let No One Be Born a Woman," supplies its governing emotional idea: the relationships among birth, womanhood, misfortune, and social constraint. This does not mean that all of Vidyapati's poetry is nothing but women's lamentation; rather, the title directs the reader's attention first towards women's worlds.

Within "A Woman's Mind" are separation, the beloved living far away, wounded pride, the confidante, union, surveillance within the household, and social convention. Yet towards the latter part there also appear popular humour concerning Shiva and Gauri and the domestic lives of mythological figures (Songs 59–66). "Woman" therefore does not mean a narrowly conventional heroine; it embraces the different voices of goddess, housewife, daughter, woman in separation, and social subject.

"A Poet's Mind" may be read as a separate conceptual section, but erotic love does not disappear from it. Songs 79–82 contain images of Vrindavan, Radha, new youth, flowering groves, and dance; in Songs 89–90 the dialogue with a female confidante and the invocation of Madhava return. The editorial division is therefore relative. It offers a direction for reading rather than constructing entirely impermeable categories.

For many songs the edition supplies source indications, glossaries, and prose explanations. These aids help readers understand difficult folk words, archaic forms, sound effects, and narrative contexts. But an expansive prose interpretation may sometimes direct the reader towards one particular account of a character's intentions, a narrative background, or a moral judgement. One task of criticism is to make these differences visible.

3. Method and Principal Critical Concepts

(a) Close reading. Each numbered song is studied independently to identify its principal subject, speaking voice, narrative situation, imagery, and the poet's concluding signature. A distinction is maintained between what the song actually says and how the editor interprets it.

(b) Comparative intratextual reading. Recurring subjects within this selection are grouped for comparison: separation from an absent lover (9, 18, 34); public shame (5, 19, 35); natural stimuli (16, 27, 30, 55); Shiva's marriage (59–66); the seasons and Vrindavan (79–82); and the consciousness of impermanence (11, 73, 94, 100). These comparisons take place within the selected corpus, not through a word-for-word collation with other editions.

(c) The study of rasa. Textually supported instances of love in union and separation, sorrow, comedy, devotion, and tranquillity or detachment are identified. Rasa categories aid interpretation, but more than one emotional register may coexist in a single song.

(d) Feminist reading. Attention is given to the heroine's self-determination, supervision by a mother-in-law or by society, constraint, secrecy, and resistance. Her suffering is not automatically treated as documentary evidence of the poet's personal life; it is understood as a voice crafted within the poem.

(e) Textual-critical caution. The original song, the editor's word meanings, and the editor's prose interpretation must be distinguished. A definitive study of textual variants would require comparison with other authenticated editions and manuscripts.

4. "A Woman's Mind": Individual Readings of Songs 1–70

The number of each entry follows the song's number in the original book. The page number refers to the first printed page of that song. Each reading examines formal and interpretative questions alongside its subject matter.

Song 1 | Original p. 9 | Pride and Intimate Dialogue

Close reading. On hearing her lover's words, the heroine gives voice simultaneously to pride, expectation, and self-respect. Love is not simply surrender here but also a test of mutual conduct. The poet gives an animated voice to tension within an intimate relationship.

Form and critical observation. Repetition of colloquial phrases and counterquestions lends the heroine's speech dramatic immediacy. The social judgement offered in the editor's prose explanation must be distinguished from the original speaker's experience.

Song 2 | Original p. 11 | Hesitation, Decision, and the Crisis of Love

Close reading. The heroine expresses her emotional experience in dialogue with a female friend. A tension develops between her inner resolve and the inhibitions imposed by public opinion. The dilemma created by affection becomes the poem's real event.

Form and critical observation. Short phrases render the restless movement of emotion. While the glossary is helpful, the speaker's hesitation should not be reduced to a single moral lesson.

Song 3 | Original p. 12 | Trust in Male Love and Its Ironies

Close reading. The song questions the difference between a man's declarations of love and his behaviour. The heroine moves between reassurance, waiting, and the fear of abandonment; the insecurity of love takes shape in these delicate fluctuations.

Form and critical observation. Similes and interrogative sentences intensify the movement of feeling. The speaker's voice should be kept distinct from that of the editorial interpreter.

Song 4 | Original p. 14 | Life, Time, and Waiting

Close reading. Awareness of life's brevity sharpens the urgency of love. For the woman who waits, time is not an abstract chronology but a bodily and psychological suffering.

Form and critical observation. The ordering of the lines progressively increases temporal pressure. Natural signs such as the bee must be read in their relation to season and emotional state.

Song 5 | Original p. 16 | The Value of Attachment and Social Shame

Close reading. A distance opens between the attraction of love and society's accepted norms. The speaker defends her affection while remaining aware of public criticism and practical consequences.

Form and critical observation. Direct address and rhythm suggest the secrecy of a conversation with a confidante. A moral observation in the editorial paraphrase should not be assumed to be the universally binding intention of the lyric.

Song 6 | Original p. 17 | A Man's Feelings and Separation

Close reading. Claims about emotional experience accompany the pain of a lack of affection. The reliability of love is measured not by speech but by enduring separation and longing for reunion.

Form and critical observation. The intensity of separation is conveyed through parallel images of body and mind. The compact structure strengthens the song's musical quality.

Song 7 | Original p. 18 | The Tragedy of a Young Woman's Life

Close reading. An exclamation such as "Let no one be born a young woman" directs attention towards the inequalities shaping women's lives. It may be read not merely as an individual speaker's despair but as a sign of collective experiences of waiting, fate, and dependence.

Form and critical observation. The hyperbolic utterance is an instrument of karuna rasa, the sentiment of sorrow. Reading it as a literal doctrine hostile to women would be an insufficiently careful interpretation.

Intratextual connection. Read together with the domestic control represented in Song 35 and the resistance in Song 57, this song's question about female birth reveals a range of different forms of women's suffering.

Song 8 | Original p. 19 | Slander and the Defence of Love

Close reading. The speech of malicious people enters the private world of love as an external intrusion. The heroine creates a complicated emotional situation involving suspicion born of rumour, loyalty, and shame.

Form and critical observation. The "malicious person" embodies the gaze of society. The difference between the lyric's actual utterance and the narrated events supplied in the prose interpretation merits scrutiny.

Song 9 | Original p. 20 | The Beloved Abroad and the Experience of Waiting

Close reading. The beloved's departure for another country transforms the heroine's experience of time. Night, sleep, and the prolonged interval of separation embody a sense of absence.

Form and critical observation. The distant land signifies more than a geographical destination; it becomes a metaphor for emotional distance. Darkness and solitude intensify the pathos.

Intratextual connection. Comparison with the separation from home in Songs 18 and 34 reveals how geographical distance becomes an emotional measure of time.

Song 10 | Original p. 21 | The Gardener and the Bee as Metaphors

Close reading. Flowers, bees, and nectar become signs of attraction. By turning nature into a language of dialogue, the poet conveys both human hesitation and desire.

Form and critical observation. The metaphor has no fixed meaning: the bee may represent the beloved, but it may also suggest inconstancy. Alternative implications need to be considered alongside the editor's reading.

Song 11 | Original p. 22 | The Transience of Beauty

Close reading. The image of life as a precious jewel unites the brevity of existence with the rarity of opportunities for love. The heroine considers the meaning of a relationship against the background of bodily impermanence and mortal time.

Form and critical observation. The contrast between a "jewel" and "four days" brings value into confrontation with time. The philosophy of life and erotic love meet in this opposition.

Song 12 | Original p. 23 | The Pond Landing and the Secret Meeting

Close reading. The steps at a pond, physical proximity, and a natural point of passage become a boundary between the public and private worlds of love. The heroine's behaviour displays caution and courage at once.

Form and critical observation. The setting is not merely decoration but a potential stage for the encounter. The flowing rhythm supports the urgency of a concealed meeting.

Song 13 | Original p. 24 | The Solitary Heroine and Separation

Close reading. In the beloved's absence, the heroine's loneliness becomes an objective emptiness in the world around her. Family members and intimate companions cannot fill the absence of the person she loves.

Form and critical observation. Loneliness and separation are suggested through concentrated speech rather than extended description.

Song 14 | Original p. 25 | Beauty, Youth, and the Essence of Life

Close reading. The lyric considers the pleasure of love together with the impermanence of beauty and youth. Physical beauty is treated as an avenue towards happiness, while the knowledge of mortality puts its apparent glory into question.

Form and critical observation. Phrases such as "the essence of life" connect desire with philosophical reflection. A simple opposition between eroticism and renunciation does not adequately describe the song.

Song 15 | Original p. 27 | The Secret Language of the Confidante

Close reading. Conversation with a companion or confidante allows the concealed pain of love to unfold. The friend appears as listener, critic, and possible helper.

Form and critical observation. Repetition of forms of address gives the lyric dramatic quality. The "I" of the character's speech and the poet's final signature voice belong to distinct levels.

Song 16 | Original p. 28 | Imagining a Land Without Nature's Music

Close reading. The image of a land without cuckoos or bees suggests the absence of an atmosphere suffused with love. Natural sounds can both delight the heart and intensify the pain of separation.

Form and critical observation. The pairing of cuckoo and bee is a familiar erotic convention. Here its negation becomes the principal means of constructing meaning.

Song 17 | Original p. 29 | Patience, Separation, and an Unsettled Mind

Close reading. Mere advice to be patient cannot heal the wound of separation. Restlessness, the weight of time, and an insistence on the personal truth of love converge in the song.

Form and critical observation. Negative sentences and exhortative verbs create emotional tension; a simple lesson about patience in love would suppress the lyric's conflict.

Song 18 | Original p. 30 | Calling to the Beloved Far Away

Close reading. Remembering a beloved living abroad, the heroine feels absence within every activity of life. The outer season and her inner separation intensify each other.

Form and critical observation. The invocatory style is particularly suitable for a sung tradition. The difference between metaphor and self-address should remain visible in interpretation.

Intratextual connection. Read against the nights of separation in Songs 9 and 50, the heroine's experience of time becomes a continuous movement of metaphor.

Song 19 | Original p. 32 | Family Honour versus Attachment

Close reading. References to lineage, propriety, and social reputation reveal external control over romantic relationships. The heroine challenges the conflict between desire and accepted custom.

Form and critical observation. The sequence of value-laden terms brings a social structure before the reader. The speaker's resistance cannot be reduced to a narrow moral lesson.

Song 20 | Original p. 34 | A Brief Drama of a Meeting in Solitude

Close reading. Meeting the beloved in seclusion, sudden embarrassment, and bodily closeness produce an intimate psychological scene. Love is presented not as a fixed sentiment but as a process of movement and fleeting response.

Form and critical observation. Verbs of motion and indications of dialogue give the song a theatrical character. The events elaborated in the editor's prose reading may extend beyond what the original lyric actually implies.

Song 21 | Original p. 35 | Moon Imagery and the Vow of Love

Close reading. The moon in the sky, and images of light and darkness, relate love's inner illumination to the wider environment. A dialogue between lovers develops into a reflection on the meaningfulness of life.

Form and critical observation. The conventional poetic epithet kalanidhi, "treasury of radiance," acquires a fresh relation to the poem's particular meaning. Ornate language and popular speech coexist.

Song 22 | Original p. 36 | Sweet Speech, a Hard Heart

Close reading. The contrast between words as honey and a mind as hard as a thunderbolt is the principal image of betrayal in love. The heroine's experience exposes the distance between seductive language and insensitive conduct.

Form and critical observation. The opposition of honey and thunderbolt achieves characterisation in very few words. It is a clear example of verbal ornamentation.

Song 23 | Original p. 38 | The Courtyard, the Gaze, and Intimacy

Close reading. The domestic courtyard becomes a theatrical space for lovers to look at one another. Movement of the eyes, gesture, and embarrassment form a language preceding spoken exchange.

Form and critical observation. Local domestic imagery brings out the particular Maithili quality of the lyric. The courtyard is a meeting place of social scrutiny and private desire.

Song 24 | Original p. 39 | The Fulfilment of Birth and Attachment

Close reading. The fulfilment of human birth is associated with the experience of love. Attachment becomes a force leading the lover from incompleteness towards fullness, though the fear of disappointed expectation accompanies it.

Form and critical observation. The brief statement contains an important existential view. The personal and universal meanings of love must be distinguished.

Song 25 | Original p. 40 | The Cry of "O Friend"

Close reading. Repeatedly calling upon her confidante, the heroine reveals her suffering. Waiting for love, bodily agitation, and the intolerable passage of time sharpen her self-disclosure.

Form and critical observation. The invocation is the sonic centre of the song. Its musicality arises not only from metre but from the recurrence of direct address.

Song 26 | Original p. 41 | Memory of the Beloved and Forgetfulness of Self Close reading. Without the beloved, the mind cannot rest. The body, home, and daily tasks appear without meaning as memory overshadows the present.

Form and critical observation. The conflict between presence and absence is brought forward through repeated sounds and expressions. Images of beauty such as gold require interpretation within their particular context.

Song 27 | Original p. 42 | A Burning Heart and the Heat of Life

Close reading. Images of heat transform emotional suffering into a bodily temperature. The heroine's anguish becomes inseparable from her experience of the season.

Form and critical observation. The interrelation of season, heat, and desire is a feature of Vidyapati's figurative language of love. Reading the heat merely as a description of weather would be inadequate.

Song 28 | Original p. 43 | Attachment and Self-Surrender

Close reading. The heroine's longing comes into conflict with social restrictions. Even as she accepts the risks of love, she refuses to deny her feelings.

Form and critical observation. The direct conversation with the friend and the poet's final statement create two voices. The first should not be suppressed in favour of a convenient interpretation of the second.

Song 29 | Original p. 44 | The Repeated Cry of "O Hari"

Close reading. The repeated invocation of the beloved, Hari, shows patience breaking down. Recollection and its recurring surges cause the pain of separation to begin anew, again and again.

Form and critical observation. Repetition of the same address blurs the boundary between prayer and romantic longing. Both devotional and erotic interpretations remain possible.

Song 30 | Original p. 45 | Rain and the Contradictions of Separation

Close reading. Rain brings renewal to the outer world but intensifies the suffering of the heroine separated from her beloved. A season normally associated with joy becomes adverse for the woman in separation.

Form and critical observation. The reversal of seasonal expectation is the central artistic device. Sounds and suggestions of running water sustain the song's musicality.

Song 31 | Original p. 46 | Confiding Sorrow to a Friend

Close reading. The heroine addresses her suffering not directly to the beloved but to her confidante. This mediation reveals a female community underlying the language of love.

Form and critical observation. The rhythm of "O friend" carries the emotions. The interplay of exclamation and pause evokes pathos.

Song 32 | Original p. 47 | "My Madhava" and the State of Separation

Close reading. Remembering Madhava makes the heroine's everyday existence one of suffering. Descriptions of mental activity and tears reveal the absence of love as an abiding psychological condition.

Form and critical observation. The name Madhava can indicate both an earthly lover and a divine protagonist; the narrating voice and context must guide its interpretation.

Song 33 | Original p. 48 | Letters, News, and Hope

Close reading. Longing for news of the beloved gives voice to the heroine's expectation. Imagining a letter or message is an attempt to overcome distance, but uncertainty increases her restlessness.

Form and critical observation. The messenger motif gives lyric poetry narrative movement. The sounds closing individual lines suggest the duration of waiting.

Song 34 | Original p. 49 | The Desolation of the Beloved's Distant Journey

Close reading. In the sentiment of "My beloved, friend, has gone to a faraway land," the emptiness of the house, the lengthening of nights, and despair in love become apparent. Though the surrounding world continues its course, the heroine's inner time stops.

Form and critical observation. Numerous scenes within the expanded lyric become stages of one emotional state. When the editor's prose explanation turns them into a continuous story, it risks reducing the openness of the original song.

Intratextual connection. Compared with the compressed separation of Song 9, this song uses a fuller series of events to transform absence into a condition of everyday life.

Song 35 | Original p. 51 | The Mother-in-Law, Surveillance, and Women's Secrecy

Close reading. The ageing mother-in-law becomes the embodiment of familial supervision of the woman in love. The possibility of a secret encounter contends with scrutiny within the house, bringing social realism into an erotic lyric.

Form and critical observation. The arrangement of domestic characters creates dramatic tension. The heroine's desire should be understood as a response to regulation, not merely as cunning concealment.

Song 36 | Original p. 52 | Enumerating Virtues and Remembering the Beloved

Close reading. Remembering the beloved's beauty and qualities is an attempt to resist the pain of separation. Numerical lists and exaggerated counting suggest the boundlessness of emotion.

Form and critical observation. Enumeration becomes a form of ornamental expansion. Criticism should distinguish the literal meaning of the numbers from their emotional significance.

Song 37 | Original p. 54 | Direction and Compassionate Waiting

Close reading. References to north and south, wind, and paths extend waiting across a geographical space. The attempt to keep gazing towards the beloved's direction makes the mind's restlessness visible.

Form and critical observation. Directional references transform physical orientation into an emotional map, with a pronounced union of erotic feeling and sorrow.

Song 38 | Original p. 55 | One's Own Shadow as Madhava's Companion

Close reading. The heroine experiences echoes of her sorrow in body, vision, and memory. Madhava's absence narrows the distance between reality and imagination.

Form and critical observation. Intimacy of address and recurring recollection make the song deeply subjective. It should not be regarded simply as a fragment of an external plot.

Song 39 | Original p. 56 | The Incomparable Qualities of Love

Close reading. Praising the beloved's virtues reveals the distinctive place occupied by love in the heroine's mind. Personal experience asserts itself at the limits of ordinary reasoning.

Form and critical observation. Hyperbole gives love its autonomous scale of value. The coexistence of affirmation and experiential doubt also deserves scrutiny.

Song 40 | Original p. 57 | A Premonition of the Beloved's Arrival

Close reading. The possibility of the beloved's arrival alters the heroine's movements, her preparations at home, and the direction of her thoughts. A glimpse of hope energises the body's language.

Form and critical observation. The sequence of actions creates a small dramatic scene. The opposing sensations of absence and possible reunion occur together.

Song 41 | Original p. 58 | A Meeting and the Dialogue of the Eyes

Close reading. Gestures, looks, and physical movements convey the lovers' affection. The conflict between shyness and attraction is more dramatically compelling than a static description of emotion.

Form and critical observation. The arrangement of bodily details is a poetic strategy of showing. The sense of the characters' active consent should not be overlooked.

Song 42 | Original p. 59 | Inexperience at the First Union

Close reading. The first intimate meeting brings together hesitation, curiosity, and apprehension. The poet treats inexperience as a component of the heroine's emotional complexity.

Form and critical observation. Suggestion is especially important in the description of union. It is unnecessary to expand every hint into an assertion about a literal event.

Song 43 | Original p. 60 | Seeing the Beloved in a Dream

Close reading. A dream offers momentary compensation for separation. On waking, the renewed emptiness makes the happiness of the dream even more painful.

Form and critical observation. The dream is not a replica of reality but a structure of desire. Shifting time is a significant formal feature.

Song 44 | Original p. 61 | Home, Memory, and a Friend's Support

Close reading. The domestic world becomes a setting for the heroine's suffering in love. What she tells her confidante takes the form of self-recognition.

Form and critical observation. The simplicity of household speech gives the lyric something of the quality of a folk song. The editor's Hindi-influenced prose interpretation needs to be compared with the idiom of the original Maithili.

Song 45 | Original p. 62 | Forest, Town, and Movement

Close reading. References to a grove or town indicate the possibility of meeting and the fear of separation. Even as love remains private, its world is shaped by routes, journeys, and time.

Form and critical observation. Changes of place stand for changes in the heroine's mind. The metaphor of the path admits several layers of reading.

Song 46 | Original p. 63 | Obstacles to Love and Self-Restraint

Close reading. Confronting actual obstacles in separation, the heroine struggles to maintain composure and patience. Her effort to escape memories of the beloved only intensifies those memories.

Form and critical observation. Repeated prohibitive statements create a paradox. This is not a passive declaration of despair but an active conflict within consciousness.

Song 47 | Original p. 64 | A Tongue of Flame and the Burning Heart

Close reading. The image of fire brings the intensity of suffering caused by love into sharp focus. Portraying body and mind in the same heat joins longing with sorrow.

Form and critical observation. The literal and suggested meanings of the fire image differ. The movement between popular expression and poetic metaphor is central to the song's beauty.

Song 48 | Original p. 65 | Extreme Separation and Doubt About Life

Close reading. Separation from the beloved appears to weaken the will to continue living. Life, recollection, and the apparent impossibility of reunion bring the poem to the height of karuna rasa.

Form and critical observation. Intense exaggeration is a dramatic expression of feeling. It should not be read as the speaker's literal plan of action.

Song 49 | Original p. 66 | A Direct Complaint to Madhava

Close reading. Addressing the beloved directly, the heroine places responsibility for her suffering upon him. Anger and attachment remain present together.

Form and critical observation. Direct address creates the verbal illusion of the beloved's presence. The sequence of questions clarifies the duality of reproach and affection.

Song 50 | Original p. 67 | The Lengthening Night of Life

Close reading. The pain of enduring an entire night, waiting for morning, and experiencing a restless mind forms the song's central sense of time. The lengthening of night is not simply quantitative but a qualitative experience of separation.

Form and critical observation. The association of time with darkness provides the lyric's emotional thread. Repeated sounds intensify impatience.

Intratextual connection. Reading the song beside Songs 9, 18, and 34 discloses the experiential distance between "one night" and "one life."

Song 51 | Original p. 68 | The Coming of Spring and New Life

Close reading. Spring colours, winds, and the renewal of town and countryside create an atmosphere in which love reawakens. The relation of external celebration to inner desire is central.

Form and critical observation. The spring description is not a weather report but a poetic arrangement of stimulating determinants, uddipana vibhavas. Animated references to the natural world heighten its musical quality.

Song 52 | Original p. 69 | Affection, Reproach, and Speech

Close reading. The discrepancy between the beloved's feelings and behaviour becomes the heroine's question. Her expectation of sincere love gives voice to pain, hope, and helplessness.

Form and critical observation. Figurative description is combined with direct utterance. Choosing the contextually appropriate meaning from the various alternatives supplied in the glossary is a task of textual criticism.

Song 53 | Original p. 70 | Gaze, Neglect, and Self-Respect

Close reading. The heroine's distress emerges through her acute observation of the beloved's appearance and conduct. The self-respect born of neglect prevents love from becoming an uncomplicated surrender.

Form and critical observation. Repeated counterquestions, imperatives, and assertions give the song the structure of an inner debate; the boundary between entreaty and reproach remains unsettled.

Song 54 | Original p. 72 | Madhava, the Eyes, and Restlessness

Close reading. In Madhava's absence, the eyes' longing to see him becomes physical exhaustion. The heroine makes an impossible attempt to turn her mind away from her beloved.

Form and critical observation. The conjunction of eyes and heart creates the song's imagery. Attention must be paid to the distinct roles of the dialogue with the confidante and the poet's signature.

Song 55 | Original p. 73 | The Southern Wind and the Favourable Season

Close reading. References to the southern wind, flowers, and seasonal pleasures awaken the opposite sensation of anguish in the heroine. When the beloved is absent, a favourable natural world becomes emotionally adverse.

Form and critical observation. The direction of the wind functions as an important stimulating determinant, or uddipana-vibhava. The opposition of spring and separation gives the song its emotional architecture.

Intratextual connection. Compared with the cuckoo and bee in Song 16 and the rain imagery in Song 30, nature becomes a force of pleasure or pain according to the speaker's condition.

Song 56 | Original p. 74 | The Analogy of "A Lake Without a Lotus"

Close reading. The comparison of a lotus-less lake with a life without love expresses the inner indispensability of human attachment. Duty, support, and bonds of affection become mutually implicated.

Form and critical observation. A sequence of analogies lends material presence to an abstract emptiness. Not every element of the comparison should be reduced to a single literal meaning.

Song 57 | Original p. 76 | Resistance to Domestic Convention

Close reading. The heroine asserts her identity by resolving not to abandon her home and live in another household. Her language of refusal is particularly significant amid marital and familial pressures.

Form and critical observation. The recurrence of "I will not" gives negation the poetic form of autonomy. Her unmistakable voice should not be submerged beneath an editorial sermon on propriety.

Intratextual connection. In contrast to the supervision of domestic life in Song 35, the heroine's declaration of refusal here is linguistically more direct.

Song 58 | Original p. 78 | Fire and the Trial of Discernment

Close reading. The reference to fire creates a sensory intensity of desire, fear, and suffering. The heroine recognises the risks imposed by society, yet her attraction to love continues to produce a decisive conflict.

Form and critical observation. The adverse metaphor serves as a means of self-assessment. Harsh and hyperbolic speech should not automatically be treated as a factual account of literal conduct.

Song 59 | Original p. 80 | Gauri's Courtyard and the Humour of Shiva's Wedding

Close reading. Gauri's courtyard, the wedding party, and the family's responses invest Shiva's world with the colours of folk humour. Spirituality enters the everyday scene of domestic life.

Form and critical observation. The mythological figures Shiva and Gauri appear alongside laughter and familiar household speech. The song's inclusion in a section on erotic sentiment reveals the difficulty of rigid classification.

Intratextual connection. Songs 60–66 demonstrate how folk humour situates the Shiva–Gauri episode within the domain of women's experience.

Song 60 | Original p. 81 | The World of Bhoginia and the Ironies of Marriage

Close reading. Through an address to the mother and an account of marital circumstances, the song exposes the ironies of happiness and sorrow in ordinary domestic life. Elevated mythological material turns into the practical anxieties of women.

Form and critical observation. Colloquial sentences, satire, and intimate forms of address evoke folk theatre. To call the piece merely a devotional song would be inadequate.

Intratextual connection. The courtyard in Song 59 and the matrimonial ironies in Song 62 continually develop this domestic folk setting.

Song 61 | Original p. 82 | An Appeal to the Mother and Social Unease

Close reading. Uneasiness about marriage, family, and intimate relationships is expressed before the mother. Tension arises between a woman's search for support and the pressure of social ritual.

Form and critical observation. Shifts in the speaking voice require attention: folk narrative, dialogue, and the poet's signature occupy different positions.

Intratextual connection. Between the personal resistance of Song 57 and the social satire of Song 62, this song introduces the tonal element of maternal address.

Song 62 | Original p. 84 | Satire on an Ill-Matched Marriage

Close reading. Questions of age, appearance, family, and compatibility are raised through laughter. The Shiva–Parvati episode can also be read as a critique of prevailing matrimonial arrangements.

Form and critical observation. The characters' anger should be read through popular expressions and suggested meanings. Mythological narrative should not be presented in its entirety as an event of documented history.

Intratextual connection. Songs 59, 60, and 63 explore different domestic aspects of the same group of religious figures; humour, therefore, is not inherently opposed to devotion.

Song 63 | Original p. 85 | The Repeated Cry "O Shiva"

Close reading. Address to Shiva, descriptions of his appearance, and exchanges of accusation and defence produce familiarity and laughter. Here devotion and popular life maintain no formal distance from each other.

Form and critical observation. The repeated invocation of the deity resembles the conversational idiom of a prayer-song; the humanisation of the god is the principal formal device.

Intratextual connection. Read alongside the amusement concerning Shiva's bull in Song 66, the song discloses a folk-poetic tradition of humanising the divine.

Song 64 | Original p. 86 | Royal Patronage and the Poet's Self-Awareness

Close reading. The closing indication of a courtly environment may be read as evidence of the poet's social position. The poet locates his composition among human relationships, beauty, and the world of his patrons.

Form and critical observation. The occurrence of names such as King Rupanarayana demands textual verification. Neither the poet's signature nor a panegyric should be mistaken for the entire subject of the poem.

Intratextual connection. Comparison with the dream and royal references in Song 86 permits reflection on the cultural bridge between poetic praise and love lyric.

Song 65 | Original p. 87 | The Incomparable Quality of Love

Close reading. Love's influence surpasses ordinary reasoning and the calculation of profit and loss. In celebrating love's qualities, the song acknowledges its uncertain, difficult, and profound nature.

Form and critical observation. Its concentrated statements approach the manner of didactic verse; the method of connecting aphorism with personal feeling deserves attention.

Song 66 | Original p. 88 | Shiva's Bull and Comic Sentiment

Close reading. References to the bull, the mount, the prospective husband, and contrasts in appearance create Shiva's singular image. Popular perception sees the mythological deity as an extraordinary, even comically improbable, bridegroom.

Form and critical observation. The combination of strange visual details and opposing attributes generates humour. The song is not simply praise of Shiva but a theatrical recreation grounded in social life.

Intratextual connection. This comic scene should be read with the Shiva–Parvati songs 59–63; to classify it as divine praise alone would erase its satirical dimension.

Song 67 | Original p. 89 | The Treasury of Jewels and the Restraint of Desire

Close reading. The sea and its jewels invite a comparison between material wealth and human desire. Love or honour emerges as a value distinct from possessions.

Form and critical observation. Simile and interrogative speech are aphoristically concise. Interpretation demands care over the context of the form of address actually used in the text.

Song 68 | Original p. 90 | Body, Mind, and Remembrance of the Name

Close reading. The name of Hari or the beloved opens the field of loving surrender towards devotion. There is a tension between the body's impermanence and the enduring relationship expressed through the name.

Form and critical observation. The repetition of a name is possible in both erotic and devotional discourse; the choice of one interpretation should not exclude the other.

Song 69 | Original p. 91 | The Folk Image of Cowries and Betel Leaves

Close reading. Concrete popular references to cowries and betel leaves raise questions of worldly exchange, honour, and affection. Everyday objects make possible reflection on the significance of relationships.

Form and critical observation. A practical word such as "cowrie" connects poetic language with the folk economy; metaphor should not be mistaken for a literal description of trade.

Song 70 | Original p. 92 | The Opposition of Sandalwood and Fire

Close reading. The coolness of sandalwood and the opposing heat of fire or separation evoke the unbearable pain of love. Feeling becomes a multisensory experience of touch, fragrance, and temperature.

Form and critical observation. A sequence of opposed sensations creates an urgent rhythm. Both spiritual and worldly interpretations remain open.

Intratextual connection. The fire of Song 47 and the wind of Song 55 help to construct an extended imagery of bodily heat and coolness.

5. "The Poet's Mind": Separate Readings of Songs 71–100

This section examines Songs 71–100 under the heading "The Poet's Mind." The song numbers and opening page references follow the contents of the original collection.

Song 71 | Original p. 93 | Service, Play, and the Poet's Self-Expression

Close reading. Opening the section on the poet's mind, references to life as play and to the spirit of service introduce a fresh perspective on the poet's experience. The voice becomes more self-examining as it moves away from the heroine's private anguish.

Form and critical observation. The shift between sections should not be mistaken for an absolute break in subject; the earlier lyric rhythms and ethical intimations remain present here.

Intratextual connection. Juxtaposing this opening song with the dance in Song 81 and the awareness of transience in Song 94 reveals the emotional range of "The Poet's Mind."

Song 72 | Original p. 94 | Floral Adornment and the Instability of Beauty

Close reading. A world fashioned from flowers brings together visible beauty, delicacy, and the possibility of destruction. The poet places the aesthetic pleasure of material adornment within the passage of time.

Form and critical observation. Floral imagery engages both sight and scent. In editorial interpretation, the difference between a simile and an actual object must be examined.

Song 73 | Original p. 96 | Day, Night, and Fleeting Happiness

Close reading. The passage of the day, the hazards of life, and the pursuit of lasting happiness constitute the song's central philosophical concern. The youthful body and the foundations of worldly existence appear impermanent.

Form and critical observation. The repetition of temporal references produces the effect of ethical or didactic song, yet the individuality of feeling prevents it from degenerating into dry instruction.

Song 74 | Original p. 97 | Sudden Suffering and Life's Uncertainty

Close reading. An unexpected event or change of feeling brings the insecurity of life into view. The poet recognises human limitations through abrupt changes in time and circumstance.

Form and critical observation. A temporal exclamation such as "today itself" lends immediacy to the song; the experience may be understood at both physical and symbolic levels.

Song 75 | Original p. 98 | Sleep, Waking, and the Struggle of Consciousness

Close reading. The movement of the mind between sleeping and waking becomes a crisis of lived experience. The urgency of desired pleasure and prudent decisions about life are in conflict.

Form and critical observation. Recurrent dream imagery deepens the meaning; care is required in establishing whether the identity of the speaker changes.

Song 76 | Original p. 99 | Lotus, Lake, and Affection

Close reading. The imagery of lake and lotus becomes a metaphor for the emergence of love, its fragility, and its dependence on circumstance. Without affection, beauty seems lifeless.

Form and critical observation. Though the lotus is a traditional image, its particular function here is relational interdependence; its meaning extends well beyond a description of beauty.

Song 77 | Original p. 100 | Images of Sensuous Grace and Gesture

Close reading. The poet's gaze rests on the body's gestures, gait, glance, and modest hesitation. Feeling emerges through intimations of union, reaching the reader as a visual experience rather than as a statement.

Form and critical observation. The conventional head-to-toe description of beauty is joined to the brevity of song. Bodily detail must be read in relation to the active gaze and the character's experience.

Song 78 | Original p. 102 | The Bodily Nature of Separation

Close reading. Separation makes itself felt in its effects on the body. Personal recollection and time intensify each other; poetic suffering is not merely mental.

Form and critical observation. Read as embodied longing, images of vision, fever, or weakness acquire emotional force. The entire meaning does not depend on any one figure of speech.

Song 79 | Original p. 103 | Young Radha and Love

Close reading. Radha's youth, modesty, and the intimations of her love for Krishna connect worldly erotic experience with the Vaishnava tradition. The relation between hero and heroine inhabits the space between a familiar myth and personal feeling.

Form and critical observation. The repetition of "new" creates freshness and energy. Devotional and erotic readings are not mutually exclusive.

Intratextual connection. Read with the new Vrindavan of Song 80 and the dance of Song 81, this song constructs a musical and natural world of Radha and Madhava's love.

Song 80 | Original p. 104 | The Natural World of "New Vrindavan"

Close reading. Beginning with "new Vrindavan, ever-new trees," the reiteration of newness creates an abundant picture of forest, flowers, bees, and love. Though Vrindavan is a natural location, it also becomes a realm of inward delight.

Form and critical observation. The alliterative recurrence of "new" gives dynamism to the rasa; the harmony of sight, scent, and sound is a major artistic achievement.

Intratextual connection. The youthful heroine of Song 79 and the blossoming grove of Song 82 together show the mutual transformation of season and love.

Song 81 | Original p. 105 | Dance Syllables and the Art of Sound

Close reading. Onomatopoeic sequences such as "dhingi-dhingi" give linguistic form to the rhythms of dance. Bodily movement, instrumental beat, and collective joy become structural elements of the poetry itself.

Form and critical observation. It would be an error to dismiss these imitative syllables as meaningless sounds. Their living context of singing and dancing extends beyond the printed page.

Intratextual connection. The visual "newness" of Song 80 and the audible dance syllables here reveal the intimate relationship between poetry and the performing arts.

Song 82 | Original p. 106 | A Scene of Love in a Flowering Grove

Close reading. A woodland bower full of flowers becomes a possible meeting place for lovers. Its natural privacy and atmosphere of attraction correspond to the heroine's state of mind.

Form and critical observation. Nature operates as an uddipana-vibhava, a stimulating determinant; its floral beauty should be read in conjunction with human desire.

Song 83 | Original p. 107 | Pride and the Appeal for Reunion

Close reading. The insistence on "now" creates pressure for an immediate decision. The beloved's pride, the appeal made to them, and the prospect of restoring the relationship become subjects of a sensitive dialogue.

Form and critical observation. Sentences of prohibition and entreaty create dramatic tension. The poet's signature is a concluding mark, not the voice of the dialogue's initial speaker.

Song 84 | Original p. 108 | The Conflict of Wakefulness and Joy

Close reading. Descriptions of the heart's longing and changes in the external world exhibit the instability of feeling. Hope of union and anxiety of mind appear together.

Form and critical observation. Repeated changes in sentence direction and the mode of addressing the confidante heighten the song's visual immediacy. It must not be treated as a fixed moral maxim.

Song 85 | Original p. 110 | The Seasons and a Tender Invitation

Close reading. Remembering the beloved amid a rainy or wintry setting, the poet turns natural features into a language of love. The mixture of beauty and suffering grants the season an emotional existence.

Form and critical observation. The literal meanings of seasonal markers should be distinguished from their use in evoking rasa. The succession of images gives the song its movement.

Song 86 | Original p. 111 | Dream, Royal Context, and Panegyric

Close reading. Dreams and the poet's references to royalty disclose the world of patronage in which he writes. Beyond the experience of the beloved, his social standing and panegyric diction open a new direction of interpretation.

Form and critical observation. Royal names, the poet's signature, and a dream narrator should not all be read as straightforward autobiography. Dating is impossible without comparison with independent historical evidence.

Intratextual connection. As in the references to royal patronage in Song 64, the poet's social location becomes a question for interpretation; concrete historical conclusions require other evidence.

Song 87 | Original p. 112 | Parting and Self-Restraint

Close reading. Departure, promises, and expectations express the pain of inevitable change. The heroine or speaker attempts to detain the beloved or hold that person in memory.

Form and critical observation. The interaction of imperatives and supplication creates emotional subtlety. The section title does not in itself establish the gender of the speaker.

Song 88 | Original p. 113 | The Rama Narrative and Devotional Poetry

Close reading. References to Rama, the family of gods, familial duty, or royal figures summon a distinct world of religious narrative. Rama's presence within a collection of love songs demonstrates the plurality of Vidyapati's poetic range.

Form and critical observation. Names and relationships in the printed text allow one to identify the devotional subject. Resemblance to another Ramayana tradition requires separate textual evidence.

Intratextual connection. Read with the Shiva-related Songs 59–66 and the invocation of Madhava in Song 90, this song reveals the collection's religious diversity.

Song 89 | Original p. 115 | Dialogue with a Confidante and the Beloved's Beauty

Close reading. An exclamation such as "What shall I say, my friend?" gives voice to otherwise unexpressed pain. Descriptions of the beloved's face, gaze, and the longing for union create emotional intimacy.

Form and critical observation. The interrogative opening exposes the limits of self-explanation. The poet makes artistic use of the ineffability of feeling.

Song 90 | Original p. 116 | Remembrance of Madhava and Self-Surrender

Close reading. The repeated cry "O Madhava, O Madhava" fuses prayer and the call of love. Bodily suffering, the mind's yearning, and the hope of grace meet in one address.

Form and critical observation. This song is particularly important at the boundary of erotic and devotional expression. One reader may find devotion, another the sorrow of separation; both readings have textual foundations.

Intratextual connection. Comparison with the invocation of Hari in Song 29 and the parting scene of Song 97 develops this combined erotic and devotional sensibility.

Song 91 | Original p. 117 | The Awakening of the Mind and an Impermanent World Close reading. The restlessness of the mind, the appeal of sensual desire, and the call for self-restraint turn the song towards a philosophy of life. The conscious mind's examination of its own instability is the central concern.

Form and critical observation. Didactic sentences and emotional expression bring ethical reflection into lyric poetry. Their conceptual differences should be made clear in interpretation.

Song 92 | Original p. 118 | A Question Addressed to the Beautiful Woman

Close reading. Directly addressing the "beautiful one," the speaker reflects on the instability of love and the meaning of promises. The relationship is marked by tested trust and unextinguished hope.

Form and critical observation. Counterquestions turn the reader not into a judge but into a witness of feeling. Changes in address must be registered.

Song 93 | Original p. 119 | Dishevelled Hair and the Beauty of the Eyes

Close reading. Vivid descriptions of loosened hair, the face, and bodily features create a delicate picture of physical beauty. Alongside its visual charm, the character's shyness, agitation, and private uncertainty become perceptible.

Form and critical observation. The sequence of bodily images privileges visual beauty; the figure should be read not as a passive object but as an active presence in the exchanges of love.

Song 94 | Original p. 120 | The Impermanence of "Life Is Not Lasting"

Close reading. The instability of life, the body, and time is directly articulated. The question of mortality connects the experience of love with a wider philosophy of human existence.

Form and critical observation. The repetition of "not lasting" turns philosophical thought into a memorable lyric expression; emotional unease accompanies its concise moral reflection.

Intratextual connection. Read together with the reflections on life's brevity in Songs 11 and 73 and the awareness of the moment in Song 100, it becomes an ethical thread running through the selection.

Song 95 | Original p. 121 | Sunrise and Remembrance of the Beloved

Close reading. The rising sun, the movement of birds, and the beginning of day bring freshness to the setting. Nature awakens, but remembrance of the beloved keeps the mind in a different condition of wakefulness.

Form and critical observation. Dawn is both visual and symbolic; the precise conjunction of a change in time with a change in feeling shapes the song.

Song 96 | Original p. 122 | Grace, the Cry of Compassion, and Refuge

Close reading. The appeal of an impoverished speaker expresses a need for assistance and shelter. The voices of love, devotion, and personal supplication merge.

Form and critical observation. Immediacy conveyed by words such as "now," along with pleading verb forms, draws readers into the speaker's distress. Any religious identification must remain anchored in textual evidence.

Song 97 | Original p. 123 | Hari's Departure and Separation

Close reading. Hari's departure transforms a visible relationship into recollection. The song presents a sequence of restraint, hesitation, waiting, and emotional self-effacement.

Form and critical observation. Verbs of movement and repeated address make separation immediate. The mythological name should not lead us to disregard the poem's worldly sensitivity.

Song 98 | Original p. 124 | Humility, the Earth, and Divine Orientation

Close reading. The body and mind's incapacity, remembrance of the name, and indications of divine support turn the poem into a spiritual confession. The individual recognises personal limitations and seeks help.

Form and critical observation. The relation between worldly helplessness and trust in the divine strongly suggests devotional rasa. The song is difficult to contain wholly within a category of erotic verse.

Song 99 | Original p. 126 | Arrows, Beauty, and Love's Wound

Close reading. Through the image of arrows from the eyes or from beauty itself, attraction becomes palpable as a wound. The poet composes the pleasure and pain of love within a single image.

Form and critical observation. Although the arrow is a conventional metaphor of erotic poetry, it lends particular force to this song's psychological condition. A literal weapon is not intended.

Song 100 | Original p. 127 | The Present Moment and the Transience of Life

Close reading. In the final song, the immediacy of "now" confronts human mortality and the fleeting nature of time. Tension between the mind's attachments and sound understanding gives the collection a reflective close.

Form and critical observation. The final placement is part of the editor's design: the selection moves from separation and beauty towards a philosophy of life. There is no evidence that this sequence was arranged by Vidyapati himself.

Intratextual connection. Reading the suffering of female birth in Song 7 alongside the consciousness of impermanence in Song 94 enables a philosophical dialogue between the collection's beginning and its conclusion.

6. The Heroine's Expression: Agency, Reserve, and Resistance

6.1 Not One but Many Forms of "the Woman's Mind"

The beloved woman's voice and Vidyapati's poetic voice are not always identical. The pride in Songs 1–3, the suffering of separation from an absent lover in Songs 9–18, intimate encounters in Songs 20–24, domestic surveillance in Song 35, and the language of refusal in Song 57 are not merely incomplete aspects of a single "woman"; they constitute diverse sites of experience. A critical strength of the selection is its attention to women's speech. Its limitation lies in the risk that the section title may encourage readers to define women primarily through suffering.

6.2 The Confidante Is More Than a Listener

The address "sakhi" transforms a woman's solitary inward experience into a social dialogue. The confidante is a potential medium of secrecy, advice, communication, self-examination, and assistance towards reunion. Comparing Songs 15, 25, 31, 33, 34, and 89 reveals the distinct linguistic functions of addressing a sakhi. To describe all these songs merely as a lover's lament would be to neglect the subtle structure of social communication.

6.3 The Pressure of Social Custom

Family honour (19), the household courtyard (23), the mother-in-law's watchfulness (35), familial restraint (57), and the satirical treatments of Shiva and Gauri's wedding (59–63) show the control exercised by social custom over intimate love. Within what society calls "honour," women's voices negotiate their desires. Yet the speakers should not be turned into direct manifestos of contemporary theory: reticence, supplication, attachment, and resistance coexist in their speech.

7. The Structure of Rasa, Imagery, and Sound

7.1 Love in Separation and the Pathetic Sentiment

Suffering occasioned by absence abroad (9, 18, 34), the arduous night (50), fruitless waiting (43, 54), the burning of fire (47), and the emotional stimulation of the wind (55) present several forms of vipralambha-shringara, love in separation. What matters is that separation is not merely absence; it reconstructs the experience of time and the body. Nights lengthen, homes become empty, nature turns hostile, and self-address grows restless. The pathetic sentiment arises from within erotic feeling, and so it is inappropriate to imprison every song within a single category of rasa.

7.2 Union, Modesty, and the Heroine's Gaze

Songs 20, 23, 41, 42, 77, and 93 create different scenes of loving gazes, intimations of touch, gesture, shyness, and concealed dialogue. The rasa of union here is not a public declaration: it manifests itself moment by moment in a relationship sustained amid social risk. Narrative and pictorial qualities reinforce one another in these compositions.

7.3 Humour, Satire, and Praise

The songs concerning Shiva and Gauri, 59–66—particularly 59, 62, 63, and 66—give humour an unusual place amid the seriousness of love. The gods' strange attire, Shiva's bull, and matrimonial conventions take on new meaning through the eyes of ordinary women. Such irony need not be hostile to devotion; it may equally signify the religious intimacy of popular culture.

7.4 Phonetic Texture and Song

The life of a song extends beyond semantic content into its utterance. The repetition of "O Hari" (29), the call "O sakhi" (25), successive repetitions of "new" (80), the onomatopoeic dance syllables (81), and the refrain "not lasting" (94) make sound an active vehicle of meaning. A prose paraphrase of textual meaning cannot fully preserve these effects of rhythm, pause, resonance, and address.

7.5 Families of Related Images

Bees and cuckoos (10, 16), moon and darkness (21), lake and lotus (12, 56, 76), wind and rain (30, 55, 85), sandalwood and heat (70), and flowers, bowers, and Vrindavan (72, 79, 80, 82) are recurring images. The same natural object can signify hope in one place and separation in another. As context changes, the image acquires a different rasa. The selection thus brings into focus a particular strength of Vidyapati's poetic craft.

8. Language, Folk Consciousness, Dialogue, and Singability

Abbreviated sounds, variant forms, and regional usages in the original Maithili songs may each possess a distinct history. It is therefore preferable to preserve the originality of certain readings rather than "correct" them according to modern standard spelling. Writing criticism in "correct Maithili" does not justify forcibly altering the language of historical verses being quoted. The songs' original verbal forms must be protected as source material.

The voice of dialogue is essential to the poetry's existence. Sakhi, mother, beloved, Hari, Madhava, Shiva, and the poet himself: each addressee occupies a distinct social and emotional context. If the interpreter adds a phrase such as "she says," this is an explanatory introduction, not the literal text of the song. The present critique repeatedly maintains that distinction.

9. Shaiva, Vaishnava, Worldly, and Ethical Voices

The thematic diversity within this collection of Vidyapati's songs is genuine. Songs of popular Shaiva humour (59–66), Vrindavan and Radha–Madhava poetry (79–82), the confluence of spiritual and romantic address (29, 90, 97), Rama-related references (88), and the sense of transience (11, 73, 94, 100) all find a place in the same selection. To impose a rigid sectarian declaration on these differing voices without textual evidence would diminish the breadth of Vidyapati's poetic world.

Love and devotion intermingle through the name of Madhava. In one song the beloved's delayed arrival (32) is the subject, while in another the cry "O Madhava" (90) approaches an invocation of religious refuge. Critical interpretation should distinguish the indications provided by divine address, the speaker's position, the bodily character of love, and the tone of surrender.

The poet's signature and suggestions of royal patronage in Songs 64 and 86 invite attention. But these signs do not establish a historical date, a particular court, or episodes in the poet's private life. Modern research must compare internal textual evidence with manuscripts, early commentaries, royal inscriptions, and other edited versions.

10. Merits and Limitations of Editorial Glosses and Problems of the Text

10.1 The Usefulness of the Editorial Arrangement

The editor generally supplies source indications and meanings of difficult words after a song, followed by an explanation of the text—for example, Song 1 (original pp. 9–10), Song 12 (p. 23), Song 36 (pp. 52–53), and Song 88 (pp. 113–14). This three-level arrangement enables readers to move among vocabulary, subject matter, and context. The selection, contents, and final list of sources (p. 128) make the book a more useful object of study than an ordinary popular anthology.

10.2 Glossary and the Determination of Meaning

A word can take several context-dependent meanings. Dictionary definitions alone cannot settle words such as madhukar, Hari, barad, gaam, maan, sakhi, sar, thir, and agni. A useful procedure for researchers is first to understand the grammar and speaker of the original line; second, to examine the glossary; third, to identify new narrative details introduced in the explanatory paraphrase; and fourth, to record possible alternative interpretations.

10.3 The Difference Between Printed Source References and a Critical Edition

Brief references to other books or collections of songs are supplied beneath several poems; a list of abbreviated source titles also appears on page 128. This documentation is commendable. By itself, however, it does not constitute a comprehensive critical apparatus recording manuscript readings, variants, questions of authenticity, and editorial intervention for each song. In particular, the letter sequences of a longer work such as Song 88 or an onomatopoeic song such as Song 81 cannot be declared definitive without comparison with other editions.

10.4 Possible Extensions of Interpretation

At times, the explanatory prose expands a short original song through additional incidents, motives, or descriptions of a character's thoughts. This is a traditional interpretative practice, not necessarily an error. Readers should nevertheless distinguish between an assertion clearly supported by the original words and an editor's inference—such as an elaboration beginning "the confidante thought." The distinction is repeatedly underlined in this study.

10.5 Editorial Presentation of Women's Voices

The compiler's woman-centred perspective is an important critical intervention. It calls for two simultaneous precautions: first, the heroine's voice should not be subordinated; second, every song should not be reduced to one uniform discourse of female empowerment or female suffering. Humour concerning Shiva and Gauri, Radha and Madhava's love, the poet's ethical reflections, and references to royalty demonstrate this complexity.

11. General Conclusions and Directions for Further Research

This selection edited by Kunal introduces readers to Vidyapati's poetry through the intensity of women's experience. Its first seventy songs range across lovers, confidantes, domestic life, ethical expectation, separation, and the humanised world of divinities; in the final thirty, the poet's self-reflective voice, beauty, dance, Vrindavan, devotion, and an awareness of mortality become increasingly prominent. Yet the passage of feelings across the boundaries of the two sections is its true beauty.

An important conclusion of the present study is that Vidyapati's speaking voice is plural. Sometimes the heroine speaks for herself; sometimes the confidante becomes the medium; sometimes the poet changes voices; sometimes the mythological world of Hari–Madhava or Shiva–Gauri opens up. These songs should not be homogenised under the label "love poetry." Nature carries contrary sentiments; popular speech generates exalted poetic meanings; and vocal performance is itself part of meaning.

While acknowledging the editor's contribution, one critical problem remains clear: readers must remain conscious of the distinction between the interpretative elaboration in a paraphrase and what the original song actually establishes. The volume is an important gateway into the texts. With a collation of variant readings from other sources, it could provide a more secure foundation for research on women's poetry, the theory of rasa, and the linguistic history of medieval Maithili.

A detailed study of textual variants through comparisons among edited song collections and manuscript traditions would raise further questions. Studies devoted to metre, singing traditions, folk usage, and women's speech could similarly extend our understanding of this selection.

12. Song-by-Song Page Index and Source Material

The following table gives the original printed page number for each of the hundred songs, enabling readers to move directly between the source book and this criticism. On several pages within the printed range 9–127, the gloss and explanation of a song continue onto subsequent pages; the table therefore indicates the opening page of each song.

Song	Page	Song	Page	Song	Page	Song	Page
1	9	26	41	51	68	76	99
2	11	27	42	52	69	77	100
3	12	28	43	53	70	78	102
4	14	29	44	54	72	79	103
5	16	30	45	55	73	80	104
6	17	31	46	56	74	81	105
7	18	32	47	57	76	82	106
8	19	33	48	58	78	83	107
9	20	34	49	59	80	84	108
10	21	35	51	60	81	85	110
11	22	36	52	61	82	86	111
12	23	37	54	62	84	87	112
13	24	38	55	63	85	88	113
14	25	39	56	64	86	89	115
15	27	40	57	65	87	90	116
16	28	41	58	66	88	91	117
17	29	42	59	67	89	92	118
18	30	43	60	68	90	93	119

Song	Page	Song	Page	Song	Page	Song	Page
19	32	44	61	69	91	94	120
20	34	45	62	70	92	95	121
21	35	46	63	71	93	96	122
22	36	47	64	72	94	97	123
23	38	48	65	73	96	98	124
24	39	49	66	74	97	99	126
25	40	50	67	75	98	100	127

Chapter 10

Rangayan: A Critical Study of Maithili Theatrical Consciousness

Folk Theatre, Performance, Linguistic Identity, and Theatre History

Rangayan: Kunal

Work reviewed: Rangayan (Theatre Criticism) | Author: Kunal | First edition: 2023 | Publisher: Ankita Prakashan Pvt. Ltd. | ISBN: 978-93-91925-67-3

Introduction to the Study

Kunal's Rangayan attempts to bring the many dimensions of Maithili theatre discourse into a single volume. It brings together essays on naach, folk drama, kirtaniya theatre, Salhes, contemporary Indian theatrical consciousness, people's theatre, dramatic writing, content, form, directors, audiences, institutions, literature, and the reciprocal relationship between literature and performance. Its concluding portion also includes conversations and essays on particular individuals. The collection's fundamental importance lies in its repeated insistence that Maithili theatre must be considered not merely as the history of printed plays, but in its relationship to performance and popular life.

The introduction, article titles, and thematic arrangement of the volume raise questions about the interplay of theatrical traditions, modernity, language, and theatrical practice. The thematic concerns of each essay, together with the critical questions they suggest, are examined below in the order of the table of contents.

The Arrangement of the Volume and the Method of Study

The contents are organised into four main sections: "Naach and Folk Theatre," "Contemporary Maithili Theatre," "Theatre," and "Conversations." Each listed subsection is given a separate entry below. The book begins with the author's preface (printed pp. vii–viii) and concludes with an entry on the future of Maithili theatre. The titles include brief poems and interrogative formulations; not every contribution is therefore treated as belonging to a single prose genre.

Preface: The Author's Conception of Theatre

In the preface, the author considers the continuous relationship between long practical experience of theatre and reflection upon it. The insistence on placing drama in the contexts of stage production, acting, folk language, organisation, and society provides a link between the preface and the opening essays. The author acknowledges a commitment born of experience. A critic must recognise both the strength and the limitations of that position. Experience makes the writing vivid, but general historical claims require independent substantiation.

Critical Discussion of All Subjects in the Four Sections

Naach and Folk Theatre

01. Mithila's Culture and Folk Theatre [Printed p. 13]

Subject. At the centre of this essay is the insistence on understanding folk theatre through its interconnections with community life, language, cultural practices, and festivals.

Critical discussion. Performance space, social participation, and oral traditions cannot be separated from the written text when studying folk forms.

02. Naach and Kirtaniya: Form and Possibilities [Printed p. 21]

Subject. The aesthetics and theatrical possibilities of the naach and kirtaniya traditions constitute the subject.

Critical discussion. The interdependence of narration, singing, acting, dialogue, and collective ritual provides the principal basis for analysing the form.

03. Dramatic Forms of Folk Ballads [Printed p. 25]

Subject. Questions concerning the narrative craft of folk ballads and their transformation into drama are raised.

Critical discussion. Converting a folk ballad into a play requires rearranging the roles of narrator, singer, and character, as well as transitions in time and audience participation.

04. A Folk Theatre in Transition: Salhes Naach [Printed p. 31]

Subject. Changes in Salhes Naach are presented as an example of social and cultural transition.

Critical discussion. One can investigate the relationship between the folk hero's story, caste-based and social memory, and changing conditions of performance.

05. Kirtaniya Theatre [Printed p. 36]

Subject. The historical tradition and theatrical form of kirtaniya drama are examined.

Critical discussion. The encounter of song, performance, poetry, and devotion must be studied alongside verification of the sources behind historical claims.

06. The Components of Kirtaniya [Printed p. 40]

Subject. The constituent elements of kirtaniya performance are classified by naming practices, troupe organisation, language, entrances, presentation, and related criteria.

Critical discussion. Unlike more general essays, this piece offers a useful analytical framework for understanding particular elements of theatrical practice.

Contemporary Maithili Theatre

07. Contemporary Indian Theatre and Maithili [Printed p. 47]

Subject. The relationship of Maithili theatre to, and its differences from, diverse movements in Indian theatre are considered.

Critical discussion. Rather than simply opposing mainstream and regional traditions, it is useful to examine the relations among experimentation, institutions, language, and audiences.

08. Contemporary Maithili Theatre: Its Condition and Expectations (A Director's Perspective) [Printed p. 50]

Subject. The present condition of theatrical work and the expectations of directors are questioned.

Critical discussion. The relations among a director's artistic autonomy, ensemble discipline, rehearsal, and resources provide the basis for criticism.

09. Distinctive Identity and Maithili Theatre [Printed p. 54]

Subject. The distinctiveness and identity of Maithili theatre, and its relation to other theatrical traditions, are discussed.

Critical discussion. Distinctiveness must be found not merely in costume or pronunciation, but in lived social experience and the creation of a theatrical language.

10. Defining the Form of Maithili Theatre: In the Context of People's Theatre [Printed p. 59]

Subject. The form of theatre and its public responsibilities are examined from the perspective of people's theatre.

Critical discussion. Dialogue with the people and commitment to their concerns must be reconciled with artistic freedom and dramatic craftsmanship.

11. Theatre: End, Means, and Duty [Printed p. 64]

Subject. Theatre is examined at several levels: as art, as communication, and as social responsibility.

Critical discussion. Distinctions between means and ends should be connected to practical performance, audience response, and artistic discipline.

12. A Maithili Play Should Be a Maithili Performance [Printed p. 73]

Subject. The question concerns the theatrical identity of a language and the representation of local experience.

Critical discussion. A Maithili performance should not mean displaying conventional cultural signs alone; it should permit the creative presence of lived feeling and different social voices.

13. Dramatic Tendencies and Theatre in the Language [Printed p. 77]

Subject. The interrelationship between theatrical tendencies and theatre grounded in language is the principal concern.

Critical discussion. Attention must be given to spoken language, bodily expression, stage rhythm, and the plurality of local dialects.

14. Theatre: Truth and Form [Printed p. 80]

Subject. The relation between representing truth onstage and the autonomy of artistic form is considered.

Critical discussion. The truth of the stage is not a direct imitation of reality; it is an experience constructed through dramatic arrangement and acting.

15. Social Consciousness in Maithili Playwriting, 1960–1990 [Printed p. 85]

Subject. The historical relationship between playwriting and social consciousness in the specified period is examined.

Critical discussion. Historical conclusions require separate evidence concerning plays, publication dates, performances, and critical responses.

16. The Shortage of Writing [Printed p. 91]

Subject. The lack or insufficiency of dramatic writing is raised as a problem.

Critical discussion. The reasons for any shortage cannot be determined without distinguishing the number of works, their suitability for performance, training, and opportunities for publication.

17. Presenting Dramatic Subject Matter on the Maithili Stage [Printed p. 96]

Subject. The development and staging of material suited to the theatre is examined.

Critical discussion. The presence of a theme in the written text does not guarantee its effectiveness in performance; visual action, time, rhythm, and audience receptivity must also be considered.

18. The State and Direction of Theatre in Modern Mithila [Printed p. 100]

Subject. Conditions of theatrical activity in modern Mithila and its future directions are discussed.

Critical discussion. Rehearsal space, training, economic organisation, audience development, and local institutions must be included in debates about theatrical artistry.

19. The Story of Art and Mithila: An Introduction to the Debate [Printed p. 112]

Subject. The piece introduces a discussion of the relationship between art and Mithila's cultural condition.

Critical discussion. Art's relationship with social life should be made a subject of critical inquiry, not merely an occasion for declarations of cultural pride.

20. A Narrative Context: Culture, Anti-Culture, and the Enlightened Public [Printed p. 118]

Subject. The argument concerns the moral division between culture and anti-culture, and the role of enlightened people.

Critical discussion. Assessing culture requires a critical examination of class, relations with the people, artistic freedom, and claims to moral authority.

Theatre

21. The Expression of Popular Life in Maithili Drama [Printed p. 127]

Subject. The question concerns representing the lives of ordinary people onstage.

Critical discussion. Staging popular life should be understood not simply as gathering folk material but as recreating social conflicts and voices in a living form.

22. Maithili Journalism, Literature, and Theatre [Printed p. 133]

Subject. The relationship of intellectual dialogue among literature, journalism, and performance is examined.

Critical discussion. This raises the question of how important the distinct functions of theatre criticism and news reporting are in documenting theatrical movements.

23. Theatre and Literature: One [Printed p. 135]

Subject. The differences and similarities between dramatic writing and a theatrical production are questioned.

Critical discussion. Drama is also a literary genre, but images, sound, and actors create meanings of their own in performance.

24. Theatre and Literature: Two [Printed p. 138]

Subject. A second side of the preceding debate further explores the relationship between the theatrical art and literature.

Critical discussion. These two essays should be read as a connected discussion while their separate arguments are independently examined.

25. Theatre and Literature: The Stage [Printed p. 140]

Subject. The discussion places the independent artistic existence of theatre at its centre.

Critical discussion. Particular attention should be paid to the collective creation of theatrical meaning by playwright, director, actor, technical collaborators, and audience.

26. Drama Competitions [Printed p. 142]

Subject. The role of competitions and their possible limitations can be considered in relation to theatrical organisations.

Critical discussion. Prizes should not be the sole measure of quality; the value of sustained rehearsal and experimentation also requires consideration.

27. The Process of Establishing Identity [Printed p. 145]

Subject. Artistic identity is considered as something created over a prolonged period.

Critical discussion. The subtle cooperation or tension between identity and experiment calls for careful examination.

28. Who? [Printed p. 148]

Subject. The brief interrogative title opens possible questions about agency, identity, or responsibility in theatrical criticism.

Critical discussion. The specific argument cannot be established from the title alone. This essay especially requires line-by-line comparison with its full text.

29. Theatrical Dreams and Alternatives [Printed p. 151]

Subject. The subject is the relationship among theatrical futures, aspirations, and practicable alternatives.

Critical discussion. Idealistic commitments should be assessed in conjunction with the social and institutional conditions necessary for their implementation.

30. Some “Dramas” in the Name of Drama [Printed p. 154]

Subject. The title suggests the possibility of an ironic critique of contradictions within theatrical practice and culture.

Critical discussion. Its satirical implication should not be substituted for the author’s actual argument when drawing conclusions.

31. Expectations of Maithili Theatre [Printed p. 158]

Subject. Expectations of theatrical practitioners and necessary changes form the subject.

Critical discussion. It is fruitful to divide such expectations into clear criteria: writing, production, audiences, institutions, and training.

32. Theatricality and Maithili Theatre [Printed p. 161]

Subject. Questions concerning the aesthetics of theatricality and the specific character of Maithili theatre are brought face to face.

Critical discussion. The meaning of theatricality emerges from a complex combination of acting, stage time, visual relationships, and collective experience.

33. Our Own Story of Theatre [Printed p. 166]

Subject. The title suggests a personal account of theatrical experience and practice.

Critical discussion. The testimony of personal experience should not be treated as an unmediated equivalent of general history.

34. Pamar: Traditional Theatre of Every Community [Printed p. 169]

Subject. The contents mention a traditional theatrical form belonging to a particular community.

Critical discussion. Definitive claims concerning social origins or genre-specific characteristics require an exact reading of both the name and the full text.

35. Bulletin Meeting: Theatre Poems—1 [Printed p. 171]

Subject. This is the first instalment in a series of imaginative poetic utterances concerning theatre.

Critical discussion. The material should be approached not as a dramatic essay but as poetry or short creative writing, with attention to figures of speech, voice, and theatrical imagery.

36. Bulletin Meeting: Theatre Poems—2 [Printed p. 176]

Subject. The second part of the series of poems on theatre.

Critical discussion. Its thematic connection with the preceding poem should be considered without losing sight of its independent textual form.

37. Bulletin Meeting: Theatre Poems—3 [Printed p. 185]

Subject. The third instalment of the theatrical poems.

Critical discussion. The generic boundary between the symbolic language of performance and poetry must be kept in view.

38. Bulletin Meeting: Theatre Poems—4 [Printed p. 193]

Subject. The fourth part of the sequence of theatrical poems.

Critical discussion. Studying each instalment separately can disclose repetitions, changes, and rhythms of expression.

39. Bulletin Meeting: Theatre Poems—5 [Printed p. 202]

Subject. The fifth part of the sequence.

Critical discussion. All five compositions must be counted and given their due place in the study. Conclusions about the architecture of the complete sequence require comparison with the original text.

Conversations

40. Sudhanshu Shekhar Chaudhary's Plays [Printed p. 213]

Subject. A conversation centred on a figure associated with plays and theatrical work.

Critical discussion. The speakers, context, and question-and-answer form should be examined while distinguishing opinions expressed in conversation from biographical facts.

41. Life and Our Theatre: The Life of Prakash Natak [Printed p. 219]

Subject. A conversation concerning the mutual relationship between lived experience and theatrical experience.

Critical discussion. Independent archival sources are needed to verify the historical accuracy of biographical statements.

42. Oh, Shrikant Ji! [Printed p. 226]

Subject. A memoir or conversational piece about Shrikant Ji appears in the contents.

Critical discussion. The intimacy of its conversational voice should be read with an awareness of differences among factual information, evaluation, and recollection.

43. Folk Elements in the Plays of Pandit Govind Jha [Printed p. 230]

Subject. The presence of folk elements in Pandit Govind Jha's plays is under consideration.

Critical discussion. Assessing folk elements requires separate attention to their roles in plot, song, language, characters, and stage experiment.

44. Play and Naach: Theatrical Drama [Printed p. 234]

Subject. The relationship of play, naach, and theatre is explored.

Critical discussion. The reciprocity between the spontaneity of play and the discipline of dramatic construction is a productive critical question.

45. The Future of Maithili Theatre [Printed p. 251]

Subject. The final subject concerns the future possibilities of Maithili theatre.

Critical discussion. This concluding piece should be connected to the theatrical outlook of the volume as a whole and examined against the criteria of institutional and creative possibility.

Integrated Assessment: The Questions Raised by the Work

Folk Theatre and Modern Dramatic Forms

The volume's first section invites us to regard popular performance not as peripheral entertainment but as a primary source of Maithili theatrical tradition. Forms such as kirtaniya and Salhes are interwoven with oral memory, music, the construction of roles, social organisation, and collective audience participation. Such material calls into question a linear theatrical history based exclusively on printed literature.

Linguistic Identity and Theatrical Practice

Linguistic identity is central to the search for the distinctiveness of Maithili theatre. Yet the language of the stage is more than dialogue: movement, sound, song, silence, pronunciation, and the relationship with an audience also belong to it. Unless the demand for a distinctive identity is connected with social diversity, the very conception of identity may become narrow.

Dramatic Text and Performance

The author's script constitutes one possibility; it becomes a complete theatrical event in the hands of actors and directors, through sets, lighting, sound, rehearsal, and an encounter with an audience. Setting literary standards beside independent criteria for performance makes the volume's debates more coherent.

Historical Evidence and the Place of Experience

Because the volume gathers writings produced at different times, it contains layers of contemporary cultural questions. First-hand testimony is valuable, but an impartial history of the people, institutions, dates, and productions concerned requires comparison among performance lists, periodicals, reviews, dramatic texts, and interviews.

Theatre Institutions, Training, and Audiences

The absence or strength of artistic institutions cannot be explained solely by the determination of individual artists. Rehearsal spaces, financial resources, audience engagement, the participation of women and emerging performers, the circulation of dramatic writing, and the critical archive must also be examined.

Critical Voice and Style

The opening essays employ a strongly argumentative and questioning voice committed to theatrical practice. The tensions between folk tradition and classical learning, tradition and modernity, artistic truth and theatrical technique generate their critical energy. Yet more clearly documented examples and an equally serious consideration of opposing arguments would strengthen the authority of their judgements.

The Limitations of the Collected-Essay Form

Gathering writings from different periods and circumstances in one volume provides abundant material but also permits repetition, variations of voice, and conceptual inconsistency. A table recording each article's earlier publication, chronology of composition, and textual variants would enhance the academic usefulness of a future edition.

List of Essays in the Volume

The following list provides the names of all forty-five essays and subjects included in the original book, together with their opening printed page numbers.

No.	Essay / Subject	Page
1	Mithila's Culture and Folk Theatre	13
2	Naach and Kirtaniya: Form and Possibilities	21
3	Dramatic Forms of Folk Ballads	25
4	A Folk Theatre in Transition: Salhes Naach	31
5	Kirtaniya Theatre	36
6	The Components of Kirtaniya	40
7	Contemporary Indian Theatre and Maithili	47
8	Contemporary Maithili Theatre: Its Condition and Expectations (A Director's Perspective)	50
9	Distinctive Identity and Maithili Theatre	54
10	Defining the Form of Maithili Theatre: In the Context of People's Theatre	59
11	Theatre: End, Means, and Duty	64
12	A Maithili Play Should Be a Maithili Performance	73
13	Dramatic Tendencies and Theatre in the Language	77
14	Theatre: Truth and Form	80
15	Social Consciousness in Maithili Playwriting, 1960–1990	85
16	The Shortage of Writing	91
17	Presenting Dramatic Subject Matter on the Maithili Stage	96
18	The State and Direction of Theatre in Modern Mithila	100
19	The Story of Art and Mithila: An Introduction to the Debate	112
20	A Narrative Context: Culture, Anti-Culture, and the Enlightened Public	118
21	The Expression of Popular Life in Maithili Drama	127
22	Maithili Journalism, Literature, and Theatre	133
23	Theatre and Literature: One	135
24	Theatre and Literature: Two	138

No.	Essay / Subject	Page
25	Theatre and Literature: The Stage	140
26	Drama Competitions	142
27	The Process of Establishing Identity	145
28	Who?	148
29	Theatrical Dreams and Alternatives	151
30	Some “Dramas” in the Name of Drama	154
31	Expectations of Maithili Theatre	158
32	Theatricality and Maithili Theatre	161
33	Our Own Story of Theatre	166
34	Pamar: Traditional Theatre of Every Community	169
35	Bulletin Meeting: Theatre Poems—1	171
36	Bulletin Meeting: Theatre Poems—2	176
37	Bulletin Meeting: Theatre Poems—3	185
38	Bulletin Meeting: Theatre Poems—4	193
39	Bulletin Meeting: Theatre Poems—5	202
40	Sudhanshu Shekhar Chaudhary’s Plays	213
41	Life and Our Theatre: The Life of Prakash Natak	219
42	Oh, Shrikant Ji!	226
43	Folk Elements in the Plays of Pandit Govind Jha	230
44	Play and Naach: Theatrical Drama	234
45	The Future of Maithili Theatre	251

Conclusion

The critical importance of Rangayan lies in the diversity of its material and its questioning conception of theatre. From the sources of folk performance to the expectations of the modern stage, the collection locates Maithili theatrical practice within a shared field of art, language, community, and public reflection. It offers readers a valuable map of debate and researchers a guide to primary materials.

Detailed Bibliography

Printed books relating to the Maithili works under review and to the literary, theatrical, and comparative concepts discussed in this study. Publication details refer to the specified editions where available. Conceptual comparison should not be mistaken for evidence of direct historical influence.

A. Principal Works Reviewed

1. Kunal. Kusma-Salhes and Six Other Plays. First edition (hardbound), 2021. Ghaziabad: Antika Prakashan Pvt. Ltd. ISBN 978-93-88799-77-5.

2. Kunal, ed. Vidyapati's 100 Songs: Let No One Be Born a Woman. First edition, 2023. Ghaziabad: Ankita Prakashan Pvt. Ltd. ISBN 978-81-962063-0-7.

3. Kunal. Rangayan (Theatre Criticism). First edition, 2023. Ankita Prakashan Pvt. Ltd. ISBN 978-93-91925-67-3.

B. Indian Poetics and Textual Criticism

1. Bharata Muni. The Nāṭyaśāstra. Translated by Manomohan Ghosh. Calcutta: Asiatic Society of Bengal, 1951.

2. Anandavardhana. Dhvanyāloka of Ānandavardhana. Edited and translated by K. Krishnamoorthy. Delhi: Motilal Banarsidass, second edition, 1982.

3. Kuntaka. The Vakrokti-jīvita of Kuntaka. Edited and translated by K. Krishnamoorthy. First edition, 1977. Dharwad: Karnatak University.

C. Theatre Theory, Dramatic Technique, and Cultural Studies

1. Aristotle. Poetics. Translated by Malcolm Heath. Penguin Classics, 1997.

2. Bertolt Brecht. Brecht on Theatre: The Development of an Aesthetic. Edited and translated by John Willett. New York: Hill and Wang, first American edition, 1964.

3. Lionel Abel. Metatheatre: A New View of Dramatic Form. New York: Hill and Wang, first edition, 1963.

4. Mikhail Bakhtin. Rabelais and His World. Translated by Hélène Iswolsky. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, Midland Book edition, 1984.

5. Konstantin Stanislavsky. An Actor Prepares. Translated by Elizabeth Reynolds Hapgood. New York: Theatre Arts, Inc., 1936.

6. Richard Schechner. Performance Theory. Revised and expanded edition. New York: Routledge, 1988.

7. Erika Fischer-Lichte. The Transformative Power of Performance: A New Aesthetics. Translated by Saskya Iris Jain. London and New York: Routledge, 2008.

8. Hans-Thies Lehmann. Postdramatic Theatre. Translated by Karen Jürs-Munby. London and New York: Routledge, 2006.

9. Eli Rozik. The Roots of Theatre: Rethinking Ritual and Other Theories of Origin. First edition. Iowa City: University of Iowa Press, 2002.

10. Eli Rozik. Generating Theatre Meaning: A Theory and Methodology of Performance Analysis. Brighton: Sussex Academic Press, 2008.

D. Comparative Philosophy and Other Theatrical Traditions

1. Martin Buber. I and Thou. Translated by Walter Kaufmann. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons, 1970.

2. Hannah Arendt. The Human Condition. Second edition; introduction by Margaret Canovan. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1998.

3. Shimon Levy. The Bible as Theatre. Brighton: Sussex Academic Press, illustrated edition, 2000.

4. Elizabeth Wichmann. Listening to Theatre: The Aural Dimension of Beijing Opera. Honolulu: University of Hawaii Press, 1991.

5. Catherine C. Swatek. Peony Pavilion Onstage: Four Centuries in the Career of a Chinese Drama. Ann Arbor: Center for Chinese Studies, University of Michigan, first edition, 2002.

STUDY 10 / NIT NAVAL

Parmeshwar Kapari

CHAPTER 01

A Critical Study of Parmeshwar Kapari's Tales and Stories

Folktales, Mythological Narratives and Linguistic Craft

Introduction: Parmeshwar Kapari as a Storyteller

Parmeshwar Kapari, a senior Maithili writer living in Janakpurdham, is known primarily as a playwright. Yet his creative world also encompasses a rich body of stories and traditional tales that has not, to date, received the critical attention it deserves.

Kapari's narrative work can broadly be divided into five streams:

(a) Folktales in their pure form, outstanding examples being "Lachhminiya Kaniya" and "The Glory of Remembering Hanuman's Name."

(b) New interpretations of mythological tales: "Yajna-Sita," "Chhauri-Chhaura Sudyumna," "Lakshmi and Bali," "Austerity and Holy Company," and "God Who Dwells in the Heart."

(c) Didactic tales: "Education and Initiation" and "Number."

(d) Traditional tales and anecdotes: "Dog, Cat and Mouse" and "Gonu Babu at Home."

(e) Narrative poetry: "Dam" (an extended narrative poem, Sakshi).

Two elements lie at the centre of all these stories: the vitality of spoken Maithili and the social and cultural realities of Maithili life. Their conjunction gives his narratives a distinctive geographical and cultural identity.

A Critical Examination of the Stories

1. "The Glory of Remembering Hanuman's Name"

1(a). Plot

In Ravana's Lanka, the nine planetary deities, the Navagraha, are imprisoned, powerless and miserable. During the burning of Lanka, Hanuman sees them, enquires about their condition, breaks their bonds and sets them free. The Navagraha invite Hanuman to ask for a boon, but he answers, "Lord Rama is with me; I have no need to ask for any boon." The Navagraha then make a promise of their own accord: the nine planets will cause no suffering to anyone who chants Hanuman's name.

1(b). Analysis of Language

The work is an excellent specimen of Maithili. Forms such as "rahae," "hai," "ai," "aela," "hunkasabke" and "okrasabke" are natural Maithili usages and are not substantially different from the Maithili of Darbhanga and Mithila in India.

"As he went on setting Lanka ablaze, spreading fire hither and thither, Hanuman saw the nine planetary deities there, deprived of strength and power, looking almost dead and withered."

Expressions such as "agilaggi," "agarahi-pasahi" and "muil-vilai" attest to the living character of Maithili. The last expression, meaning "dead and withered," exemplifies the paired compound that forms part of the language's grammatical wealth.

1(c). The Question of Rasa

The devotional rasa predominates in this tale, but devotion is not its only emotional register. The pathos of the planets' helplessness and the heroic rasa of Hanuman's courage in breaking Ravana's fetters together produce a composite aesthetic experience. According to Anandavardhana's theory of dhvani, the principal suggestion is that "divine grace is obtained not by asking for it but through self-surrender." This suggestion operates at the level of implication, beyond the literal meaning.

1(d). Vakrokti, or Oblique Expression

From Kuntaka's perspective on vakrokti, the most strikingly oblique utterance is "With Him beside me, why should I ask any of you for a boon?" In conventional devotional logic, a devotee requests a boon and the Lord grants it. Here Hanuman reverses the logic and redefines devotion: "To ask for boons is a weakness of devotion." That reversal raises an ordinary tale to a philosophical plane.

1(e). A Navya-Nyaya Perspective

According to Gangesha's theory of verbal testimony, or shabda-pramana, the Navagraha's promise that whoever chants Hanuman's name will be free of suffering is an apta-vakya, the statement of a trustworthy authority. In Navya-Nyaya, such testimony has evidentiary value because its speakers, the planetary deities, are authoritative. Kapari makes this classical reasoning accessible through a folktale.

1(f). The Videha Perspective

The Hanuman narrative has a long history in Maithili literature. Kapari, however, presents it within a renewed geographical and cultural setting. When a Maithili storyteller from Janakpurdham in Nepal narrates the story of Rama, Ravana and Hanuman, the work possesses its own vernacular voice and standpoint.

2. "Lachhminiya Kaniya": Parmeshwar Kapari's Finest Folktale

2(a). Plot

An old man and an old woman live in a village. Their daughter-in-law is small and slight, "labkaniya," "chhotkhutiya bhutiya," yet remarkably capable in work and endowed with intelligence and understanding. One night a jackal cries out. The daughter-in-law knows the language of animals. The jackal tells her that two rubies are lodged in the thigh of a corpse floating down the river. Braving the danger, she retrieves the gems from the river, leaves the corpse for the jackal and returns home. Her mother-in-law misunderstands what happened and thinks the young woman has been eating a corpse. A commotion follows, and she is sent to her parents' house. On the way a crow speaks, and she understands its language too. The crow says that if a snake is offered milk on that day, it will reveal diamonds and pearls. She persuades her father-in-law to follow this advice. He agrees, offers the snake milk and parched grain, and obtains diamonds and pearls. The household becomes wealthy. Mother-in-law and daughter-in-law are reconciled, and the family lives in happiness and harmony.

2(b). Structural Analysis of the Folktale

According to the Russian folklorist Vladimir Propp's Morphology of the Folktale (1928), folktales possess a recognisable structure. "Lachhminiya Kaniya" follows this structure closely:

(i) Initial lack: poverty and the humiliation of the daughter-in-law.

(ii) Donors: the jackal and the crow, who impart knowledge to the daughter-in-law.

(iii) Helper function: the knowledge of animal languages, her exceptional power.

(iv) Test or challenge: the courage required to visit the river at night.

(v) Final victory: diamonds and pearls, followed by family reconciliation.

A distinctive feature of the Maithili-Mithila tradition, however, is the episode of the snake and its offering of milk at the conclusion. It is this additional element that gives the Maithili folktale its own imaginative specificity.

2(c). An Extraordinary Richness of Language

The most significant feature of "Lachhminiya Kaniya" is its wealth of vernacular vocabulary. The following clusters of words are precious elements of the living Maithili linguistic heritage:

"labkaniya," "harharahi khatbanari," "chhotkhutiya bhutiya," "chhagunae," "dhatpatae," "gundhunae," "paniae," "lobhae," "jhisi-bunnibala," "bikaral rait," "huan-huan," "jumus banhik," "habakka mari," "lattopato," "hathi-bardam," "dhukka-pharki," "dhipal aig-baul," "chhabkal dabkal," "pithiya-thok dhamakka," "nangtiñya rakmasani,"

"odhabadhak," "lohchhi jhantiyak," "pachhmuriya kanderiya," and "hapais-lapaikak."

These words remain alive in the spoken Maithili tradition. By gathering, preserving and according them literary dignity, Kapari makes perhaps his greatest contribution.

2(d). The Distinctive Female Protagonist

The daughter-in-law, described as "labkaniya, chhotkhutiya bhutiya," appears physically unremarkable. Yet she possesses the rare ability to understand animal speech. Known in the folk tradition as pashu-siddhi, this knowledge makes her exceptional. She goes alone to the river at night: courage. She extracts the jewels from a corpse: resourcefulness. She endures her mother-in-law's anger without collapsing: fortitude. She understands the crow and convinces her father-in-law: intelligence. She thus embodies Mithila's "Lachhminiya," an ideal woman who combines courage, wisdom and the auspicious prosperity associated with Lakshmi.

2(e). The Convergence of Devotional and Pathetic Rasas

In the middle of the story, the old woman's anger (raudra rasa) merges with the daughter-in-law's helplessness (karuna rasa). By the conclusion, however, these emotions resolve into shanta rasa, the rasa of tranquillity: "Thereafter, mother-in-law, daughter-in-law and all the others lived together in mutual affection, happiness and contentment." This is the conventional happy ending of the Maithili folktale, affirming an ideal of domestic life.

2(f). A Comparative Perspective

"Lachhminiya Kaniya" belongs to the Maithili "Sunari-Bahuriya" narrative tradition. Yet in many tales from that tradition the daughter-in-law is only a passive beneficiary: magic takes place on its own. Here she exercises courage and applies her intelligence herself. This difference matters. Kapari makes the daughter-in-law an agent, not merely a patient upon whom events act.

3. "Yajna-Sita": A Bold Rereading of Myth

3(a). Plot

Whenever King Rama performs a sacrifice, a golden image of Sita is made. A group of these sacrificial Sitas gathers at Rama's residence, distressed and neglected. One day they go to Rama together and ask for recognition. Rama invokes his vow of fidelity to a single wife: "I have married Sita, daughter of Janaka, the ruler of Mithila." The sacrificial Sitas ask, "If we participated in the sacrifice, why can we not participate in your life?" Finally Rama offers a resolution: in the Dvapara age, when he is incarnated as Krishna, they will become gopis. "All those sacrificial Sitas became gopis in Braj."

3(b). Literary Courage

This is among Kapari's boldest creations. In Maithili popular tradition Rama and Sita are sacred figures, and questioning their relationship is unusual.

Kapari nevertheless reconsiders it from Mithila's Sita-centred perspective: Sita as Janaka's daughter, a daughter of Mithila.

> "When a sacrifice is performed, we are indispensable! / Without us it remains incomplete! / Does not the officiating sacrificer undertake it in our company?"

In terms of scriptural reasoning, the argument is unassailable. A wife as her husband's other half is indispensable to the sacrifice: that is the Vedic injunction. By placing this argument in the mouths of the sacrificial Sitas, Kapari compels Rama to answer them.

3(c). Vernacular Feminism

This work is a notable example of a discourse of women's rights in Maithili folk literature. The sacrificial Sitas are not simply helpless women: they reason, present demands and understand their rights. "And yet you call yourself the ideal Maryada Purushottama, the supreme exemplar of righteous conduct?" This question opens a new chapter in the Maithili literature of Nepal.

3(d). Analysis of Dhvani

At the literal level, the narrative tells the story of the sacrificial Sitas. At the level of suggestion, however, Kapari communicates a profound message: "A society that makes use of women's labour but denies them rights is out of balance." From Anandavardhana's perspective, this suggested meaning is the very soul of the work.

3(e). Within the Tradition of Reinterpreting Myth

The Maithili poet Vidyapati (distinct from the earlier Vidyapati who preceded Jyotirishwar) reconsidered mythological narratives in Bhūparikramā and Puruṣaparīkṣā. Kapari extends that tradition but brings to it a new social consciousness. This is an important dimension of Videha's parallel history.

4. "Chhauri-Chhaura Sudyumna": A Mythological Tale of Gender Transformation

4(a). Plot

King Vivasvan Manu and Queen Shraddha desire a son. The queen arranges a putrakameshti sacrifice but says, "Whenever a child comes, let it be a daughter." Through the force of this wish, a daughter, Ila, is born. By the age of five or seven, the child exhibits masculine behaviour. An enquiry reveals that the priest's incantation during the sacrifice had been intended to bring forth a son; the queen's wish had produced a daughter, but the masculine disposition remained. Through his ascetic power, Vasishtha transforms the girl into a boy named Sudyumna. Sudyumna enters a forest and, because it is the place of Shiva and Parvati's amorous recreation, becomes a woman there. The sage Budha falls in love, and a son, Pururava, is born. Vasishtha recites the Devi Bhagavata and transforms Sudyumna permanently into a man. A coronation follows.

4(b). Questions of Gender

The story is based on the Shrimad Devi Bhagavata Mahapurana (chapter 3). Kapari, however, retells it in the distinctive vernacular of Maithili. Gender transformation, or gender fluidity, is central to the narrative and intersects with modern debates about gender. The queen's wish, "Whenever a child comes, let it be a daughter," reverses society's customary preference for sons.

4(c). The Vitality of Language

"When their daughter Ila was four or five years old, all her bearing and manner began to seem masculine! She was a girl, yet in most things she acted and spoke like a boy."

"Bagay-bani" and "chhara jika" are distinctively Maithili expressions. The former describes bearing and manner, while the latter means "like a boy." Such expressions are not found in standard Maithili dictionaries.

4(d). A Navya-Nyaya Perspective

Under Gangesha's theory of vyapti, the story presents a chain of reasoning: (i) hearing the Devi Bhagavata, the cause (hetu), leads to (ii) Sudyumna's permanent male form, the conclusion (sadhya). Kapari, however, does not take this universal relation as the final truth, for Pururava, Sudyumna's son, provides evidence of the experience of motherhood. This is a dramatic use of the Navya-Nyaya technique of challenging a universal concomitance.

5. "God Who Dwells in the Heart"

5(a). Plot

At the beginning of creation, God gives human beings special intelligence and knowledge. But people begin to seek God whenever a problem, great or small, arises. God grows troubled. He hides in forests, mountains, ravines and caves, yet human beings always find him. At last he conceals himself in a place they will never think to search: their own hearts.

5(b). Vedanta and the Folk Imagination

A meeting of three traditions: the central idea of this tale draws upon three traditions: (i) Vedanta, with its "Tat tvam asi," and Brahman dwelling within oneself; (ii) Maithili folktale, in which the search for God leads at last to the heart. Kapari, however, does not present this metaphysics as dry philosophy but as a humorous tale. His portrait of troublesome people described as "ghaihar garaju, hehar-thethar matlabi lok," forever worrying God with their demands, is an appealing example of comic rasa.

5(c). Linguistic Play

"However far God might slip away and hide himself in some isolated corner, those importunate, obstinate and self-seeking people would still track him down."

"Aurh kat" means a secluded corner; "ghaihar garaju," someone excessively insistent; and "hehar-thethar," stubborn and unyielding. These clusters attest to Maithili's vitality. "Ghaihar" and "hehar" are both expressive, sound-symbolic words whose meanings announce themselves when spoken.

5(d). The Philosophy of Humour

The idea of God being harassed exemplifies the anthropomorphism characteristic of folktales. Kapari makes this predicament philosophical: the one place where God is most readily available, the heart, is the very place human beings never seek him. This irony raises the folktale to the level of philosophical reflection.

6. "The Tale of Lakshmi and Bali" (The Raksha Bandhan Episode)

6(a). Plot

Because he is bound by a promise, Vishnu serves as gatekeeper at King Bali's door. Lakshmi waits in anxiety. Narada explains the reason, recalling the episode of Vamana and Bali. Lakshmi disguises herself, visits King Bali and ties a rakhi on his wrist. Bali offers her a gift. Lakshmi requests, "Give me that gatekeeper." Bali agrees. It is from this episode that Raksha Bandhan becomes the festival of brothers and sisters.

6(b). The Fusion of Folklore and Myth

The narrative draws upon the Vishnu Purana and the Bhagavata tradition. Kapari, however, fills it with the lively texture of Maithili vernacular speech. Expressions such as "ahar takay, pahar takay," "batjohime aankhi khiya," "talbal-talbal ladh-dular," and "halasal lahalot" enliven the tale through their idiomatic force.

"Lakshmi's manner and bearing pleased Bali greatly. His curiosity grew, and he leaned forward with eager affection and asked, 'Well, child, who are you?'"

The Maithili expression "hapasi-lapaikik," describing an affectionate movement towards someone, is particularly apt. Lakshmi's appearance as a sister is an unforced manifestation of love.

6(c). The Question of Female Power

Lakshmi is not passive in this story. She devises a plan, assumes a disguise, negotiates with Bali and secures Vishnu's release. The goddess of wealth is capable of freeing her own husband: this is a powerful narrative of female agency.

7. "Austerity and Holy Company"

7(a). Plot

Vishvamitra and Vasishtha dispute whether austerity (tapas) or the company of the virtuous (satsang) is superior. Neither Brahma nor Vishnu wishes to be drawn into the quarrel. At last Sheshanaga devises a test: the lifting of the Earth's weight. Vishvamitra offers the entire merit of his austerities but cannot raise it. Vasishtha offers "the merit of one day's satsang," and the Earth hangs suspended in the air. Austerity loses; holy company triumphs.

7(b). The Form of the Philosophical Tale

This is a philosophical fable, a tale in which an abstruse question is resolved through narrative. Tapas and satsang present a choice between individual spiritual discipline and a socially shared spiritual community.

Kapari's sense of humour remains alert. "Very well, very good. Lord Shesha told the two of them straight to their faces." The Maithili "soharde aange," meaning directly or face to face, playfully places Shesha in the role of a judge.

7(c). The Use of Vernacular Language

"Hearing this, Sage Vishvamitra was consumed with envy and exclaimed in a fit of anger: 'What! Do you think I cannot lift such a paltry weight?'"

"Ikh-bikh lagab," meaning to burn with jealousy, and "pinakale-phanaki," meaning to flare up in anger, are two invaluable Maithili idioms.

8. Didactic Tales: "Education and Initiation" and "Number"

8(a). "Education and Initiation"

In the gurukula tradition, a teacher strikes a prince without apparent cause in public just before the prince's departure. The following day he explains: "I wanted you to experience injustice. When you become king and administer justice, you must know the pain of those who suffer it."

This didactic story belongs to the Indian moral-tale tradition, yet its method of experiential learning is consistent with modern educational theory. "This opened the inner eyes of everyone present" is the tale's philosophical essence.

8(b). "Number"

A wealthy merchant loses his way at night and enters a temple. He gives money to a distressed man and also hands him his contact-number card. The man responds, "I already know the number." Astonished, the merchant asks what he means. The answer is: "God's number, which sent you to me."

With its excellent twist ending, this is a memorable didactic tale. Though no longer than a page, it carries a profound philosophical message. Its portrayal of faith in God makes it an outstanding example of Maithili moral storytelling.

9. The Tale of "Dog, Cat and Mouse"

9(a). Plot

Dog, Cat and Mouse are three friends. Dog sets out on a pilgrimage, entrusting all his documents to Cat. Cat gives them to Mouse for safekeeping. Mouse eats and uses them until they are destroyed. Dog returns to find his papers gone. Cat prepares to kill Mouse, and Mouse runs away without understanding why everyone is chasing him. "From that day to this, the dog has chased the cat, and the cat has chased the mouse whenever they meet."

9(b). The Character of an Origin Tale

This is an aetiological tale, explaining the supposed origin of a familiar phenomenon. It supplies a humorous folk answer to the question of why dogs chase cats and cats chase mice. Such narratives appear in folktale traditions throughout the world. Rudyard Kipling's Just So Stories offers a Western parallel.

9(c). The Question of Justice

The line "Mouse could not understand why everyone was chasing him" is profound. Mouse ate the paper and used it as bedding because he needed it; but the consequence was a loss for everyone. The tale concerns the consequences of an unwitting wrongdoing. From a Navya-Nyaya perspective, Mouse's "absence of knowledge" does not make his act a morally culpable offence.

10. The Tale "Gonu Babu at Home"

10(a). Plot

Gonu Jha, "the most cunning of rogues, extraordinarily quick-witted and shrewd," returns to his village after a long absence. Everyone asks, "Where have you been?" He replies, "Well, right here in the village." They are taken aback. The true reason for his absence is that during the months of Ashvin and Kartik people come round asking for contributions and favours. To avoid them, he left his home and village for those months. On returning, the refrain remains: "Well, Gonu Babu is at home."

10(b). His Place in the Gonu Jha Tradition

Gonu Jha is a distinctive folk hero of Maithili: clever, satirical and alert to his own advantage. Comparable figures in other traditions include Nasreddin Hodja in Turkish tales, Akaltam in Hebrew stories and Birbal in Hindi. Kapari keeps this narrative tradition alive.

"Well, Gonu Babu is at home" has multiple meanings: (i) literally, "I am in the village"; (ii) satirically, "I will not tell you where I went"; and (iii) implicitly, "I fled the village to escape the people who came begging." These three levels are an instance of Kuntaka's vakrokti.

10(c). Social Satire

"In these months, even the storehouse of the best-off household becomes empty." This precisely evokes the economic hardships of Ashvin and Kartik. Gonu Jha's ingenuity is a strategy for survival. It is presented humorously, yet remains grounded in reality. The episode mirrors the rural economic cycle of Maithil society.

Overall Critical Assessment

11(a). Kapari's Distinctiveness as a Storyteller

Preserving the Authentic Forms of Maithili

Kapari's most distinctive contribution is to secure literary recognition for the authentic Maithili of an alternative cultural stream. Words such as

"labkaniya," "harharahi," "chhagunae," "dhatpatae," "hapasi-lapaikik," "pachhmuriya," "hathi-bardam," "ghaihar garaju," and "hehar-thethar" might never have entered literary discourse had Kapari not written them down.

Reviving the Tradition of Animal Speech

The understanding of animal speech in "Lachhminiya Kaniya" and the divine knowledge in "The Glory of Remembering Hanuman's Name" sustain the ancient Panchatantra-Jataka tradition of Maithili folktelling. This narrative practice had almost disappeared from modern Maithili fiction.

Counter-Readings of Mythological Narratives

The questioning of Rama and Sita's relationship in "Yajna-Sita," the account of gender transformation in "Chhauri-Chhaura Sudyumna," and the questioning of Rama's maryada in "Hai Ram!" demonstrate that Kapari does not accept mythology uncritically. He enters into a critical engagement with it; herein lies his modernity.

A Skilled Use of Humour and Satire

"Gonu Babu at Home," "Number," "Austerity and Holy Company" and "God Who Dwells in the Heart" all contain humour and satire. But their humour transcends simple entertainment to become philosophical reflection and social commentary.

II(b). Limitations

(a) Length: most of the tales are extremely brief, making sustained character development impossible.

(b) Repetition: themes recur frequently, an outcome of insufficient editing.

(c) Range: the stories are largely religious, mythological or concerned with folk morality. Very few, apart from works such as "Lachhminiya Kaniya," are grounded in contemporary social reality.

II(c). Kapari's Place in the History of Maithili Folktales

Within the history of Maithili folktelling, Kapari is among the rare writers who have made rural Maithili a medium of literary narrative.

From the perspective of Videha's parallel history, these are "works excluded from mainstream history." Kapari's stories have been omitted from mainstream histories of Maithili literature. The history centred on the Sahitya Akademi had not found a place for Maithili storytellers from Nepal. Through this critique, Videha seeks to correct that injustice.

CHAPTER 02

A Critical Study of Parmeshwar Kapari's Verse

Original Poetry, Translation, Children's Songs and the Criticism of Ghazals

Introduction: Parmeshwar Kapari's Poetic World

Kapari's creative world contains several kinds of verse: his original poems; ghazals by other poets quoted in his critical writing; children's songs; a translation of the Rigveda; Maithili renderings of Sanskrit verses; and various folk songs and rhyming verses. These may be classified as follows:

(a) Original Maithili dohas and independent short poems.

(b) A Maithili translation of the Nasadiya Sukta of the Rigveda, entitled "Tattvabodh."

(c) Free Maithili renderings of Sanskrit verses from the Gita, the Nasadiya Sukta and hymns to Sita.

(d) Children's songs: "Our Janakpurdham" and "The Incarnation of Sita."

(e) The folk-song verses of "Reng–Reng."

(f) A Hindi ghazal by Dhirendra Premarshi, together with Kapari's critical response.

(g) Maithili ghazals by Dr Rajendra Vimal, accompanied by Kapari's extended criticism.

(h) The narrative poem "Dam."

1. "Tattvabodh": A Maithili Translation of the Rigveda's Nasadiya Sukta

This is the most ambitious poetic work discussed in the present study. Drawing on the Radhakrishnan–Moore volume, Kapari has translated the 129th hymn of the tenth mandala of the Rigveda, the Nasadiya Sukta, which raises some of world literature's earliest philosophical questions about the mystery of creation.

1(a). Excerpts from the Verse

There was no one then / nor even the lifeless / no air / nor was there sky above it /

What lay concealed / where? / beneath whose protection? / Was there a deep, immeasurable ocean?

There was no death then / nor was there immortal life /

It breathed in airlessness / apart from it, nothing existed here.

At the beginning desire entered it / it is thought / the very first seed of creation.

Who knows for certain? / Who will explain it clearly? / When was it born / and when did this creation come to be?

God alone knows / and perhaps even God does not know!

1(b). The Craft of Translation

The Rigvedic original, "nāsad āsīn no sad āsīt tadānīm" ("then there was neither being nor non-being"), describes the pre-creation condition through negation. In Kapari's rendering this becomes "There was no one then / nor even the lifeless." These short, fragmented lines are signs not merely of translation but of imaginative re-creation.

For the Sanskrit "ānīd avātam svadhayā tad ekam" ("that One breathed, without air, by its own power"), Kapari writes, "It breathed in airlessness." This line offers one of Maithili's most arresting poetic paradoxes. Breathing without air expresses the ineffability of the state before creation.

1(c). An Analysis of Rasa

Among the nine rasas associated with Bharata Muni, adbhuta, the rasa arising from wonder, pervades this poem. "The very first seed of creation" marks its culmination. Yet the closing lines—"God alone knows / and perhaps even God does not know!"—transform wonder into karuna, the pathos of unknowing.

1(d). A Navya-Nyaya Perspective

According to the limits of epistemic proof considered in Gangesha Upadhyaya's theory, the four pramanas—perception, inference, comparison and testimony—cannot yield knowledge of what existed before creation. "Who knows for certain?": through this question Kapari's translation itself suggests the limits of cognition central to Navya-Nyaya.

1(e). An Analysis of Dhvani

Under Anandavardhana's theory of dhvani, this poem works at three levels: (i) the literal, a physical description of the state before creation; (ii) the metaphorical, an image of human ignorance; and (iii) the philosophical, the suggestion that "even God does not know." This is its most profound intimation of agnosticism. Philosophical verse of this order is exceedingly rare in Maithili literature.

1(f). The Videha Perspective

This bold tradition of translating Vedic philosophy is unusual in Maithili poetry. After Vidyapati, who provided a bridge between Sanskrit and Avahattha, Kapari's rendering of the Rigveda's most mysterious hymn inaugurates a new tradition. It is an important chapter in Videha's parallel history.

2. Original Dohas and Independent Short Poems

2(a). A Political Doha

> The bell has rung; politics has stirred to life. / Behold how many parties have died while still alive.

This doha is Kapari's finest expression of political satire in verse: a complete satirical portrait in two lines.

"The bell has rung" refers to the election bell; "politics has stirred to life" suggests new enthusiasm; and "died while still alive" names the moral death of political parties. The compression of these three stages into two lines demonstrates the capacity of the doha form.

Kuntaka's vakrokti appears in "died while still alive," a paradox that encapsulates the collapse of political morality in a single image. It reflects a Nepali political reality in which parties do not die merely by losing an election; they become the living dead when their moral spirit dies. This is a notable example of the modern Maithili doha.

2(b). An Aphoristic Short Poem

"The whole village is full of healers; whose path should one follow?" This two-line aphoristic poem is uttered in the context of Martyrs' Day. "The whole village is full of healers" means that everyone regards themselves as an expert; "whose path should one follow?" asks where guidance can then be found.

Kapari applies this proverb to the discourse of political movements. Nepal has countless martyrs and self-proclaimed leaders of movements, yet suffers a vacuum of genuine leadership. The metaphorical application is an example of political discourse conducted through poetry.

In terms of Bharata's Natyashastra, the lines produce hasya rasa, but comedy lies on the surface and pathos underneath. That mixture determines their aesthetic effect.

2(c). A Short Poem on Motherhood

> There is no mother like a mother. / There is no one like a mother.

In a mere six or seven words, the word "may," mother, acquires an inexhaustible significance. The poem is extremely brief, yet extraordinarily concentrated in feeling. "There is no mother like a mother" asserts an absolute uniqueness beyond comparison.

The emotional foundation is the height of parental tenderness, vatsalya. The enduring emotional condition of vatsalya, here considered within the domain of karuna in Indian poetics, is compressed into two lines. Written for Mother's Day, the poem nevertheless expresses a truth beyond any particular occasion.

2(d). A Birthday Verse

> Today, at the conclusion of Chhath; at Diwali (Lakshmi Puja), Mother's birthday; at the conclusion of Chhath, Parameshwari, Father's birthday. / Both their names accord with the days of their birth: Lakshmi on Lakshmi Puja, Parmeshwar at the breaking of the Chhath fast.

This is a son's birthday tribute to his parents, written by Kumar Bhaskar. It is not Kapari's poem but that of his son. One important poetic feature is the coincidence between the names of Lakshmi, his mother, and Parmeshwar, his father, and the festivals on which their birthdays fall. Such verse built upon coincidence has a distinctive place in the Maithili tradition.

3. Children's Songs: "Our Janakpurdham" (Our Maithili Book, Class Three) and "The Incarnation of Sita" (Bhuvaneshwar Prasad "Adhyapak," Maithili Children's Ramayana)

3(a). "Our Janakpurdham"

> The maternal uncle's home of Lava and Kusha / that is our Janakpurdham. / Daughter Sita made exemplary / this sacred land of Mithila. / This capital of Videha's King Janaka / gave birth to people of profound wisdom. / The Maithili tongue, sweet as honey / is spoken by proud Maithils.

The song is included in Our Maithili Book, Class Three. Kapari quotes it, demonstrating his awareness of literature for children.

"The maternal uncle's home of Lava and Kusha": the poetic practice of describing Janakpur as their mother's family home has a long history in Maithili. It occurs here with unaffected ease.

"The Maithili tongue, sweet as honey" is a distinctive simile. It compares the sweetness of sound with the sweetness of food, producing a transfer between sensory registers, or synaesthesia.

The rasa is vira, the heroic sentiment. The phrase "proud Maithils" appeals to self-respect and plants the seed of courage in the child's mind.

3(b). "The Incarnation of Sita" (Bhuvaneshwar Prasad "Adhyapak," Maithili Children's Ramayana)

> How did Sita take birth? / Hear the story, extensive indeed. / When the night-roaming demons wrought havoc / every righteous deed fell into ruin.
>
> No rain fell upon Mithila / so Janaka took the plough in hand. / No sooner did he begin to till the earth / than she appeared from the ground.
>
> A voice resounded through the sky: / the Mother of the World has taken birth. / Demons have multiplied upon the earth; / she will lift its heavy burden. / Mother Earth gave King Janaka / a precious new gift; / the world found deliverance / from pain, grief and suffering.

Kapari's choice to quote this children's song is apt. "The Incarnation of Sita" is an important song in the Maithili Children's Ramayana, telling in a simple and accessible rhythm the mythological narrative of Sita's birth associated with Ravana's vessel of blood.

"No sooner did he begin to till the earth / than she appeared from the ground" comprises the song's finest two lines. "Dhatibhumi," meaning to emerge from the ground, is a distinctive Maithili expression. Rhythm, rhyme and emotional significance are held in balance.

The final quatrain, opening with "A voice resounded through the sky," acquires grandeur through its longer lines. The rise and fall of the rhythm prevents the children's song from becoming monotonous.

4. The Folk Verses in "Reng–Reng"

> The swollen-throated braggarts, the chameleon people, / the leaping frogs, the carriers— / the mice have dressed for a wedding procession!
>
> Laughingstocks of the age, those who knock off their fathers' turbans, / the wanton mouse bridegroom sets out to marry— / the wedding procession has reached the cat's house!

4(a). The Character of the Folk Verse

These are song verses from the play "Reng–Reng." They belong to the distinctive Maithili tradition of phakra, a form of folk verse in which animal characters become instruments for satirising human society.

4(b). Symbolic Analysis

"Gheghaha bhemh," the swollen-throated braggart, signifies politicians engaged in self-praise; "girgit lokaniya," chameleon-like people, signifies politicians who change colours; and "kudka beng," the jumping frog, signifies opportunists. "The mice have dressed for a wedding procession"—mice going to the cat's house for a wedding—is a traditional Maithili burlesque.

"Those who knock off their fathers' turbans" refers to people who destroy their fathers' honour. "Ladho musari biyahan" evokes an unruly marriage. A wedding procession arriving at the cat's door represents the climax of comic rasa.

4(c). Links with the Folk-Theatre Tradition

In Maithili folk theatre, the natua tradition involves performers wearing animal masks to satirise society. These verses are rooted in that practice. Kapari revives this older tradition within the setting of contemporary political theatre.

5. A Hindi Ghazal by Dhirendra Premarshi: Kapari's Response as a Reader

5(a). The Ghazal

> Cultivate patience, my friend / put off needless desires, my friend. / Joy keeps company with sorrow / understand the movement of time, my friend.
>
> Whatever God has given you / preserve it, my friend. / What is gained by resentment? / drive it from your mind, my friend.
>
> Within self-forgetfulness itself / search out the self, my friend. / Immerse yourself in love / and become richly blessed, my friend.
>
> If you would become "Premarshi" / keep a heart of fire, my friend.

5(b). Kapari's Critical Perspective as Poetic Prose

The "reader's dilemma" that Kapari records after reading this ghazal is itself a piece of poetic prose. His initial reaction—"As soon as I reached the third line, the spell broke and my mind grew uneasy: ah, so this is a Hindi ghazal!"—is a natural response from someone deeply devoted to Maithili.

Kapari then acknowledges his own narrowness and examines the ghazal objectively: "Considering the language, literary elegance and overall form of the composition, one must accept that the fluency of its language and the arrangement of its ghazal structure are exceptionally graceful and pleasing." This self-correction demonstrates his integrity as a critic.

5(c). Poetic Analysis of the Ghazal

"Joy keeps company with sorrow" is a couplet associated here with the Sufi idea of fana, or annihilation of the self. Joy and sorrow are opposites, yet are companions; this paradoxical beauty belongs to the central aesthetic of Urdu ghazal.

"Within self-forgetfulness itself / search out the self" seeks khudi, the self, within bekhudi, self-loss. It is a Sufi path to self-realisation. Kapari is justified in placing Premarshi in the tradition of Mira, Kabir and Rahim.

Kapari's comparative observation—"In his work one frequently glimpses the consciousness of an age and the purity of heart associated with Mira, Tulsidas and Surdas"—is an excellent instance of Maithili literary criticism.

6. Maithili Ghazals by Dr Rajendra Vimal: Kapari's Extended Critique

6(a). Ghazal I: A Call for Revolution

> Link arm with arm; raise your voice with force. / He has stolen our bread; tear open his belly.
>
> He makes us deaf and will go on stinging us; do not worship him. / Seize him by the throat; take the sword in hand.
>
> He drank our blood; we shall make his blood flow. / Spread the blaze through every vein of your own blood.
>
> The slaying of Ravana is righteous; Lanka's sins will burn. / Beat the drums loudly and plant the banner of dharma.
>
> Even amid the clamour of words, I shall go on singing, Vimal. / Adorn and illuminate the festival of consciousness.

Critical Commentary

Kapari calls the ghazal "highly aggressive and explosive," an accurate description. "Seize him by the throat; take the sword in hand" marks the height of raudra rasa. In Bharata's poetics, anger is the enduring emotional basis of that rasa, and it appears in these lines with tremendous force.

"He has stolen our bread" voices an indictment of exploitation. "Tear open his belly" represents metaphorical revenge, not a literal prescription of violence but a poetic demand for justice. From the perspective of vakrokti,

"plant the banner of dharma" recasts resistance as a righteous war, a system of oblique symbols.

6(b). Ghazal II: "Strike Down the Hypocrite" — A Satirical Ghazal

> Bang, bang goes the gun; strike down the hypocrite. / You have given him your word; strike down the hypocrite.
>
> He will spare neither farms nor homes, daughters nor daughters-in-law; / he has revealed his true colours: strike down the hypocrite.
>
> For generations he has done nothing but cut your throat; / this is a gang of throat-cutters: strike down the hypocrite.

The refrain "Strike down the hypocrite" is repeated across the five couplets of this ghazal, intensifying raudra rasa. "Farms, homes, daughters and daughters-in-law" denotes everything that constitutes life and thus the all-consuming nature of exploitation. "Ghentkatta-toli," a gang of throat-cutters, is a distinctly Maithili term of abuse. Its use in poetry is a daring linguistic choice.

6(c). Ghazal III: "What Sort of Settlement Is This?"

> What sort of settlement is this, where everyone is wounded? / Locks are fastened to every skull, and every tongue is cut.
>
> Here people walk suspended, tied in groups to the gallows. / What sort of city is this, where people hang of their own will?
>
> The constitution changes every day, like a prostitute's new skirt; / my mother's sari remains torn even now.

This is Vimal's finest ghazal. "A settlement where everyone is wounded" is a remarkable opening couplet, or matla. "Locks upon skulls" and "tongues cut off" are metaphors of mental and verbal enslavement. The image of people moving while suspended from the gallows introduces the metaphor of crucifixion into the modern Maithili ghazal.

The simile of a constitution changing "like a prostitute's new skirt" is extremely controversial but poetically forceful. "My mother's sari remains torn even now" creates a personal yet universal image of poverty, lending Vimal's poetry its greatness.

6(d). Ghazal IV: "Only Then Is It Diwali"

> Only when all creation shines is it Diwali. / Only when the lamp of consciousness burns is it Diwali.
>
> Turn all that is old and decaying into an object of ridicule. / Only when a new lamp burns at every moment is it Diwali.
>
> Architect of darkness, beware, beware! / Only when rocket-bombs rise and battle is it Diwali.

The refrain "Only then is it Diwali" ties each couplet to a new condition for the celebration. "The lamp of consciousness" signifies intellectual awakening. "Hukkaloli," a vernacular term for open mockery, is unusual in a ghazal and brings folk language into contact with the Urdu ghazal tradition.

"Only when rocket-bombs rise and battle is it Diwali" introduces the imagery of explosions into a festival of joy and is the work's most oblique expression. The warning addressed to the "architect of darkness" is a poetic appeal to revolutionary consciousness.

6(e). Ghazal V: "Revolution in the Sky"

> Who writes revolution across the sky and leaves it hanging there? / Who dyes the earth and heavens with blood?
>
> Who slaughters the poetry of my moon and stars / and weighs a book of hatred against life?
>
> Rather than starve, people choose to die of bullets; / recognising this truth, they pick death for themselves.

The opening line, "Who writes revolution across the sky and leaves it hanging there?", is memorable in the history of the Maithili ghazal. "Dyes the earth and heavens with blood" produces an image that marks a high point in revolutionary poetry.

"The slaughter of poetry" personifies poetry as a living creature and charges someone with its murder, an unusual instance of personification in modern Maithili poetry. "Rather than starve, people choose to die of bullets" offers a brutal realism that expresses the tragedy of poverty without ornament. It is a great poetic utterance.

What Parmeshwar Kapari calls Rajendra Vimal's ghazal collection, Suryastasā Pahine ("Before Sunset"), is actually a collection of songs. Like the doha, kundaliya and rola, the ghazal is a distinct poetic form that neither Rajendra Vimal nor Dhirendra Premarshi has mastered. Now consider these so-called children's ghazals from Rajendra Vimal's collection:

> Come, good sir,
>
> Have some dates.
>
> You are the master;
>
> I am the labourer.
>
> Drunk on power,
>
> Utterly intoxicated.
>
> You are our servant;
>
> We are the ones left out.
>
> Our own rubbish heap
>
> Is what scorches us.
>
> For five long years
>
> You fill our ears with noise.
>
> You come once more;
>
> We shall seize and thrash you.
>
> The poor man's heart
>
> Will never be content.

Take a tour
In your honking car.
The ballot box
Will be riddled with holes.
Come, Mr Politician,
We shall certainly come.
This time we shall drive in
The blows of our sticks.
Come, O crow,
Come, O crow, come, come, come;
Come flying, come running;
Come, little bird, fly, fly here;
Dance and show my little child.
Come, O parrot, come, come, come;
Come, O myna, come, come, come;
Parrot and myna, fly, fly here;
Peck and drop the mangoes and fruit.
The myna arrived, grey and speckled;
The parrot arrived, bright green;
It knocked down a dark jamun fruit;
The child gathered it into a little bag.
My Grandchild
This little child of mine, my grandchild,
A radiance of joy and delight,
Will eat parathas and bread,
Will injure nobody.
So very small to look at,
But able to speak so cleverly;
Quick to play, quick to cry;
When smiling, a treasury of diamonds and pearls.
Playing digital games and with toys,
With the pieces called “touch” and “click.”

These might make good children's songs, but they are not children's ghazals.

7. Free Maithili Renderings of Sanskrit Verses

7(a). A Verse from the Gita: "Pita Hamsya Jagato" (Composition No. 86)

> "I am the father of this world, the mother, the sustainer and the grandfather; I am the object of knowledge, the sacred Om, and the Rig, Sama and Yajur Vedas. Om."
>
> Maithili rendering: "I alone am the sustainer of the entire world: the one who upholds and nourishes it and awards the fruits of every action. I am its father, mother and grandfather, the sacred Om that must be known, and the Rigveda, Samaveda and Yajurveda."

Kapari's approach to translation expands the concision of Sanskrit, which compresses a universal truth into a single verse, into an extended Maithili explanation. In rendering "dhata" as "the one who upholds and nourishes," Kapari incorporates the word's threefold meaning: creator, sustainer and dispenser of the fruits of action.

7(b). A Hymn to Sita: "Tvam Vidya Paramatrailokya Janani"

> "You are the supreme knowledge, mother of the three worlds, giver of heaven and liberation; O Goddess Sita, who draws the three worlds to herself, I bow to you."
>
> Maithili rendering: "You are supreme knowledge and the mother of all three worlds. You bestow heaven and other exalted realms. You are the centre of attraction of the three worlds. O Sita, I bow to you!"

The compact declaration "tvam vidya," "you are knowledge," becomes an elaborated statement in Maithili. The Sanskrit "trailokya-karshani," the one who attracts the three worlds, is made accessible through "the centre of attraction," a simple expression for a difficult word signifying magnetic power.

7(c). Narada's Statement: A Free Rendering of a Sanskrit Verse

> "Those who distinguish dharma from adharma, follow the Vedic path, and devote themselves to the welfare of all worlds are called holy persons." — Narada, 16 (29–31).
>
> Maithili rendering: "A person who distinguishes righteousness from unrighteousness and follows the path laid down by the Vedas is called a sadhu."

This rendering clarifies Kapari's translation philosophy. He does not translate word by word. He does not immediately expand "sarvalokahitasaktah" as "devoted to the welfare of all," because his immediate objective is to make the definition of "sadhu" intelligible to the Maithili reader.

7(d). The Gangasagar Hymn (Purana)

> "All the rivers, beginning with the Ganga, renowned throughout the three worlds, abide unfailingly in the region of Gangasagar."

> Maithili rendering: "O Parvati! All the supremely sacred rivers, beginning with the Ganga, renowned in the three worlds, dwell continuously in Mithila's Gangasagar lake!"

Kapari quotes this verse to establish the mythological importance of the Gangasagar lake in Janakpur. He translates "anapayinyo," suggesting continuous flow, as "dwell continuously." The semantic extension from "flowing" to "dwelling" is striking: the rivers do not merely flow, they inhabit a place. This is translation as imaginative creation.

8. Suresh Pandit's Hanuman Chalisa and "Dam," a Narrative Poem (Sakshi), as Presented by Parmeshwar Kapari: Extended Analysis of Verse

"Dam" (Sakshi; dedicated to the Vidyapati Seva Sansthan, 2012) is a narrative poem in a quantitative metre. Its entire plot has already been examined. Here the focus is confined to significant lines from the standpoint of poetic craft.

> There was once a Mr Lambodar, / whose belly was always empty. / He would not lift a finger to work, / but promptly emptied a heaped plate.

The rhyme between "khatte" (empty or hungry) and "turte" (immediately) is precise. "He would not kill a fly in the name of work" is the humorous idiom meaning "he would do no work at all."

> But one day, as soon as he appeared, / the king's command arrived. / The instruments of battle were prepared: / take the enemy's life!

"Sajal gel sangram-saj," "the instruments of battle were prepared," uses alliteration through repeating s and j sounds, demonstrating an awareness of metre and sound patterning.

> That same bread played its trick, / depriving him of his strength to fight. / Life slips away so easily in distress: / thus Lambodar is great!

The final line, "thus Lambodar is great," offers a satirical assertion of greatness. This irony characterises Kapari's humorous and satirical style. "Dam" is an extended poem, yet primarily narrative in character.

On Suresh Pandit's Hanuman Chalisa, Parmeshwar Kapari observes: "There are, of course, unruly, mischievous children; their literature too is full of laughter and jokes. Although Suresh Pandit's Hanuman Chalisa is somewhat older, it remains extraordinary and entertaining." Its opening lines read:

> Hail Hanuman, ocean of knowledge and virtue;
>
> Mummy laughs and Father cries.

9. Overall Assessment: Kapari's Poetic Personality

9(a). Strengths

(a) Philosophical depth: the Rigvedic translation achieves something exceptional in Maithili verse, giving poetic expression to agnosticism.

(b) Living engagement with folk-poetic traditions: the phakra and aphoristic short poems remain closely rooted in Maithili culture.

(c) Creative translation: his free renderings of Sanskrit verses into Maithili exhibit an imaginative freedom that turns translation into re-creation.

(d) The critic as poet: his remarks on Premarshi's free-form Hindi ghazal and Rajendra Vimal's song collection, published as a collection of ghazals, are themselves poetic prose.

(e) Political satire in verse: the "The bell has rung" doha is an outstanding example of the modern Maithili doha.

9(b). Limitations

(a) Very little original verse: most of the poetry under discussion is by others —Vimal, Premarshi and "Adhyapak"—and is examined by Kapari as a critic.

(b) An absence of substantial original long poems.

(c) Imagery: Kapari's images generally draw upon the folktale tradition rather than creating grand, distinctly modern images.

9(c). His Place in Videha's Parallel Literary History

Parmeshwar Kapari is primarily a storyteller and playwright and, secondarily, a critic and poet. Nevertheless, his translation of the Rigveda ("Tattvabodh"), his political dohas and the phakras of "Reng–Reng" are notable contributions to Maithili verse. Videha's parallel history, devoted to "works excluded from mainstream literary history," accords this poet, critic and translator his due recognition.

CHAPTER 03

The Creative World of Parmeshwar Kapari

Autobiographical Writing, Culture, Satire and Literary Reflection

Introduction: Parmeshwar Kapari and His Creative Universe

Kapari's more than six hundred writings—folktales, narratives, mythological stories, satire, cultural essays, discussions of language, autobiographical episodes, reflections on awards, political commentary and theatre criticism—together constitute an extensive and many-sided body of work. From the perspective of Videha's parallel literary history, Kapari belongs among the "omitted" Maithili writers who have largely been neglected by mainstream literary institutions.

1. Autobiographical and Family Episodes

1.4. "An Episode Concerning My Blessed Father"

This is one of Kapari's most moving autobiographical works. Its description of a son's final moments with his dying father exemplifies the emotional heights of Maithili prose. Expressions such as "jakhain ham potake kar ghumaeliai," "chhatpataichhai" and "barikale" draw on the language's own resources and speak directly to the heart. The father's words, "At the time of death, such restless waves come over one," express an astonishing combination of humour and affection in the face of death. According to the idea of the ultimate resolution of pathos associated here with Abhinavagupta, the father's death brings karuna rasa to its height and leads the son to realise that "the meaning and feeling of the word 'father' cannot be sought in a dictionary!" This utterance deserves a place among the finest in Indian literature. In the "Father" episode the writer spends the period of his father's death preoccupied with his own promotion: the admission of such human frailty is a hallmark of realist literature.

6.1. "Maithili Is Highly Respected in Our Home Too"

The "Sarain" episode: Kapari calls his wife "sarain," a feminine form derived from "sar." This coinage is a distinctive instance of linguistic creativity in Maithili. "Just as the feminine of master is masterni, of doctor is doctorni, and of singh is singhni!" This simple humour reveals something of Kapari's personality. The work captures the tenderness of domestic life: "the children's mother grinding the soaked lentils for adauri while singing songs of the grinding-stone." Such an image is an incomparable record of rural life in Maithili prose.

6.2. "In Earlier Days, Women Folk ... the Lentils for Adauri"

This brief piece contrasts old and new forms of domestic life. Its comparison of a smooth, hand-shaped traditional surface with "fancy decoration" is a moving comment on cultural change. "This mother of my children, grinding the lentils for adauri and the gram flour for tisiyouri while singing at the grinding-stone!" Such an image belongs among the finest prose-poems of Maithili.

6.3. Birthday Episodes Concerning Children, Father and Grandchildren

"Even a crooked sweet made of sugar tastes sweet somehow!" This saying of Kapari's elder sister is an excellent example of folk wisdom. The proverb "what is dear from childhood is dear even in the womb," and the manner in which Kapari explains the naming of the child Prithu after King Prithu, demonstrate his sense of tradition.

2. Interpretations of Myth, Philosophy and Ritual Practice

2.2. "Definitions According to the Puranas"

Kapari presents in Maithili explanations of five concepts drawn from the Narada Smriti: truth, dharma, nonviolence, falsehood and the holy person. The inclusion of Narada's verse—"Those who discern dharma from adharma, follow the Vedic path and devote themselves to the welfare of all are called holy persons"—is appropriate. This essay attests to Kapari's learning. He is not merely a folklorist but also a student of the classical tradition. For the Videha perspective, this synthesis of learned and popular traditions is among Kapari's defining qualities.

2.3. "The Tantric Form of Goddess Chhinnamasta"

This is one of Kapari's most scholarly writings. His Tantric interpretation of Chhinnamasta through Mithila painting and its philosophical examination of creation, destruction and regeneration are exceptionally profound. "The interaction of light and sound becomes so fearsome and intense that the connection of creation with the creator is severed in a single instant." This sentence reaches the essence of Indian Tantric philosophy. "Until the umbilical cord between mother and child is cut, the newborn cannot come into an independent existence." This biological metaphor elucidates the Tantric symbolism of Chhinnamasta in a remarkable way. Kapari interprets the Tantric basis of Mithila painting from a scientific and philosophical perspective, an uncommon undertaking in Maithili literature.

2.4. "Ayurveda and Dhanteras"

The description of Brahma's creation of Ayurveda, its three foundational principles, the Atreya and Dhanvantari schools, and the churning of the Ocean of Milk testifies to Kapari's knowledge of classical traditions. His threefold classification—"Tila Sankranti is a festival of the mind," "Phagua is a festival of the mind," and "Durga Puja is of the soul"—reveals his philosophical outlook.

2.5. "Marriage Rites and Rights"

Kapari offers a learned account of the proposed derivation of "vivaha" as "vi + ava + hara" and a philosophical explanation of kanyadana, panigrahana and the sacrificial fire. His closing observation—"Ever since income and rights entered the matter, life has become a burden and a whirlpool"—offers a satirical comment on contemporary debates about marriage.

8.1. "Alha-Rudal"

The narrative in which the five Pandava brothers are reborn in the Kali age as Alha, Rudal, Brahmananda, Lakhan and the heroic Malkhan beautifully combines mythology and folk epic. Yudhishthira's unfulfilled longing—"In the Mahabharata, did I get to kill even one Kaurava?"—is fulfilled by Krishna in the Kali age. This account gives the Maithili folk-epic tradition a philosophical foundation. Placing the Alha-Rudal singing tradition within a cosmic framework of Pandava reincarnation lifts it beyond mere entertainment.

3. Language, Folk Culture and Janakpurdham

3.1. "Bharu or Moru?!"

This is an excellent example of Kapari's cultural-historical essay writing. Exploring "bharu" (Indian rupees) and "neru" (Nepali rupees), he invites a reconsideration of Maithili literary history through the tension between Nepal and India in the lives of Vidyapati and Mahendra Malangia. "Vidyapati came to Nepal, made a home, had ponds and wells dug, completed his life's work, lived and died here—and yet he remains 'bharu,' Indian?" This question touches the heart of Maithili literary nationalism. Kapari supports an independent and self-respecting identity for Maithili in Nepal. In discussing the Guinness Book certificate episode concerning Mahendra Malangia, he poses a significant question: if Malangia is called a master of drama, is it inappropriate also to call him "a Maithili playwright of Nepal"? This is a discourse on the political identity of Nepali Maithili.

3.2. "Maithili Folk Theatre"

Kapari's essay on folk drama is an important document in the history of Maithili theatre. "Maithili culture has its various components and instruments —that is, folk language, folk dance, drama, songs and narrative ballads." This sentence articulates an integrated view of Maithili culture.

The description of the village "Parbaha" is also striking. The proposed derivation "parbah aha" carries cultural significance: one who cares for language, literature, culture and theatre is a "parbaha." This play on words illustrates Kapari's linguistic consciousness.

3.3. "Long Live the Maithili Vernacular!"

This is among Kapari's finest statements on language. "The divine speech, the language of Vedas and Puranas, religion and philosophy, arts and sciences ... had become so intricately entangled that it died": this offers a sociological explanation of the decline of Sanskrit. Kapari imagines Maithili's future as a people's language, not as "Babhan-bhasha," the Brahmin-centred standard language. The essay contains a subtle satire on Dr Ramavatar Yadav's movement for "standard Maithili": "the stiffened, affected Brahmin language." From Videha's parallel standpoint, the argument is important: Maithili must remain the people's language, rather than the exclusive domain of pandits and classical scholars.

3.4. "Sita's Companion Gangasagar"

Kapari describes the deterioration of Janakpur's Gangasagar lake through an imaginative mythological story. Gangasagar takes on "the shape of a haggard old woman" and travels to the Maha Kumbh, a striking symbolic invention. There the purity of the Ganga's waters makes her ashamed of her own condition, and she curses Janakpur's inhabitants. The satire is directed at the neglect of the city and its municipality.

6.4. "A Debate on the Development of Janakpurdham"

Kapari writes repeatedly about Mithila Movement Martyrs' Day, the dilapidated state of the Janakpur sub-metropolitan municipality, the Parbaha festival and related concerns. This is an example of social commitment. "Long live the martyrs of Mithila!" is not merely a slogan but part of Kapari's philosophy of life. He has served as convenor of the Mithila State Struggle Committee, a commitment evident throughout his writing.

Kapari's writing on the Virat Maithili Natya Kala Parishad, the Janakpurdham International Theatre Festival and the Parbaha Cultural Festival constitutes a contemporary record of Maithili theatrical history. He is not merely a spectator but an active participant and critic.

His important diagnosis of contemporary theatre is this: "Janakpur has a great many actors and actresses, but lacks the main currents of modern global theatre, theatrical philosophy, dramatic consciousness and artistic movements."

9.1. "Children's Folk Literature Overflowing with Joy and Entertainment"

Kapari underscores the importance of Maithili folk literature for children. "It is an immeasurably precious natural resource that can never become stale or exhausted": this reveals the seriousness of his engagement with children's literature. Roshan Janakpuri's grandchild's play song—"Hey, foolish one, hey, foolish one! / Why did you interrupt?"—exemplifies the rhythm and playful nonsense characteristic of Maithili children's songs, which Kapari has helped preserve.

4. Political Satire and Social Criticism

4.1. "A Janakpur Like This?"

This satire concerns the broken roads, mosquito breeding and political indifference of the Janakpur sub-metropolitan municipality. "In Ward No. 16, Pulchowk, of this great sub-metropolitan municipality, in the year 2051 … in the difficult tenure of Biltu Pajiyar … a mud road was built with much struggle … yet in the thirty years since, not a single truckload or trailer of soil has been added to it." This is an outstanding example of local journalistic prose. "Well then, Janakpur, are we to imagine the ghee of development being poured upon a leaf for the blind Surdas?" The idiom "Surdas's ghee" is a jewel of Maithili satire. The image of development's ghee, invisible to the blind, is a distinctive attack on negative politics.

4.2. A Series of Political Satires

Kapari's satirical series "Hagna-Padna," "Dhoti-Gamchha" and "Bagariya-Sanghatiya" uses invented conversations. Its attacks on Nepali politics—the Gen-Z movement, the decline of Madheshi parties, Balen Shah, Upendra Yadav and K. P. Oli—are pointed.

The multilingual texture brings Nepal's linguistic reality vividly to life. "Hey, the thing to understand is that his Kathmandu madam-wife …" This code-mixing is a significant feature of Kapari's style.

In terms of satirical rasa, Bharata's Natyashastra describes six kinds of laughter: self-directed, other-directed, mutually directed, refined, coarse and ordinary. Kapari's political satire falls within the category of laughter directed at others, exposing their foolishness and frailty. Its purpose is not merely amusement but social awakening.

4.3. "Debates Concerning the Janakpur Municipality"

Kapari's satire on the launch of two books by Rambharos Kapari "Bhramar" exemplifies his fearless critical outlook. "When you are yourself chair of the Madhesh Academy, why hold the launch at the Maithili Development Fund?" This is a direct challenge to institutional politics in Maithili literature. The piece reveals an important part of Kapari's personality: his outspoken opposition to institutional corruption and opportunism. Arun Arya's observation that "people have lost the courage to speak the truth themselves" applies aptly to him.

5. Literary Criticism and Theatrical Thought

Kapari's critical principle is expressed in the observation: "Any work can be reviewed clearly only through impartial feeling and a generous perspective, free from infatuation or prejudice." This is the governing maxim of his critical philosophy. Such an unbiased outlook is rare in Maithili literary criticism.

7.3. The Play "Tatkal Darshan"

The publication of Dr Virendra Pandey's English review of "Tatkal Darshan," with its discussion of subject matter and technique, offers a happy example of the international recognition of Kapari's dramaturgy. Kapari attends to "the play's thematic structure and theatrical procedures, together with the arrangements required for performance." He is a practical theatre worker, not merely a theorist.

6. Conclusion

Parmeshwar Kapari's creative universe forms an invaluable chapter of Maithili literature. The living language of his folktales, the philosophical elements of mythological narratives, the fearless pen of the satirist, the poignancy of his autobiographical writing and the impartiality of his criticism all testify to the many dimensions of his talent. "MINAP is a very great movement," as Kapari himself declares, encapsulates his philosophy of life. The movement for Maithila/Mithila—its language, literature, culture and theatre—creates an integrated Mithila consciousness, and Kapari is a living representative of that consciousness.

Judged through Indian aesthetics of rasa, dhvani and vakrokti, Western literary criticism, the Navya-Nyaya epistemology of Gangesha Upadhyaya and Videha's parallel historical perspective, Kapari emerges as a significant, versatile, courageous and committed Maithili writer. It is both appropriate and necessary that he occupy a central place in Videha's parallel literary history.

CHAPTER 04

Reng–Reng: An Extended Literary Critique

The Language of Theatre, Social Satire and Dramatic Vision

1. A Biographical Introduction to the Writer Parmeshwar Kapari

1.1. Life and Career

Parmeshwar Kapari is a versatile, experimental Maithili writer, educationist and activist for Mithila and Maithili associated with Janakpurdham, Nepal, and deeply committed to social and cultural concerns. He was formerly head of the Maithili Department at the R. R. M. (Tribhuvan University) Campus, Janakpurdham. His service as a former head of the Central Department of Maithili at Tribhuvan University also made an exceptional contribution to Maithili-language teaching, literary research and the collection of folk literature.

His distinguishing characteristic is that he has simultaneously been a literary writer, an authentic scholar of folklore, convenor of the Mithila State Struggle Committee and former member-secretary of the Maithili Development Fund. In contemporary Maithili literature, he occupies a particularly significant position as an experimental and realist playwright. His writing includes folktales, drama, essays, literary criticism, social commentary and cultural debate.

1.2. Literary Genres and Published Works

Kapari's literary activity extends across several genres. His known work includes:

(a) Drama: “Reng–Reng,” a contemporary political and social satire associated with the Avantika Maithili Dramatic Institution, Janakpurdham, Nepal; (b) folktales; (c) cultural essays; (d) social commentary; and (e) folk songs and rhymes.

This range makes clear that Kapari is not simply a scholar but an imaginative and many-sided cultural practitioner. His central concerns are the vernacular language, popular society and the cultural identity of Mithila.

2. The Play “Reng–Reng”: Plot and Dramatic Craft

2.1. Introducing the Play

“Reng–Reng” is a Maithili play by Parmeshwar Kapari set around the rehearsal space of the Avantika Maithili Dramatic Institution. Its title is a sound-symbolic expression, suggesting distinctions of theatrical colour, changes in the colours of life and multilayered representations of social and political character.

Its principal characters are Shridhar, the director; Anwar; Hamal; Akshara; a boy; Lakshmi/Aishwarya; Vishnu/Vivek; Bam Bahadur; and Nunu Kaka.

Together, this group represents the social-class structure of the play: artists, workers, divine forces, police authority and the spirit of folk theatre.

2.2. An Outline of the Plot

The play opens in an old zamindari building where the Avantika dramatic troupe is rehearsing. Shridhar is engrossed in reading a poem, a song of invocation expressing the desire to become active on the stage and rebuild society.

Later, Lakshmi, the goddess of wealth, appears. This is not, however, the arrival of a divine boon but an exposure of a bitter truth: where wealth actually resides in society and how a corrupt system of government appropriates it. The central assertion of the play is that poverty is the root of every evil.

Vishnu then appears, but even he cannot distribute Lakshmi's gold. Bam Bahadur, the policeman, enters and arrests the artists. Finally Nunu Kaka, the symbol of folk tradition, appears and reveals the truth through folk theatre. The play ends with a marriage ceremony symbolising renewal and new life.

2.3. Dramatic Form and Technique

"Reng–Reng" is written in the manner of epic theatre. Changes of vocal register, movement between absorption and political sloganeering, dance and song bring it close to Brecht's Verfremdungseffekt, or alienation effect. Five major theatrical techniques are employed:

(1) Changes in vocal delivery as an alienation effect.

(2) Colour and wave: the metaphorical representation of scene changes.

(3) Episodic construction through fragmented scenes.

(4) Rhythmic variation through folk song, humri and the style of political slogans.

(5) Metatheatre: the play's self-referential concern with a play inside a play.

3. A Fourfold Method of Analysis

According to Videha's parallel literary-historical perspective, the four pillars of criticism are: (i) Indian aesthetics of rasa, dhvani and vakrokti; (ii) Western critical theory; (iii) the Navya-Nyaya of Gangesha Upadhyaya; and (iv) Videha's parallel historical approach.

3.1. Indian Aesthetics: Rasa, Dhvani and Vakrokti

3.1.1. Rasa: The Dominant Aesthetic Emotions of the Play

In the light of Bharata's Natyashastra, with its nine rasas in drama, and Abhinavagupta's Abhinavabharati, which theorises aesthetic relish, the rasas of "Reng–Reng" may be examined as follows.

Principal rasa: karuna, or pathos.

The tragedy of poverty, the suffering of unemployed artists and Lakshmi's departure empty-handed establish the enduring emotional basis of karuna rasa throughout the play. The lament "poverty is a disease" sustains its atmosphere of suffering and compassion.

Satirical rasa (hasya and raudra): a double aesthetic experience.

The playwright creates a remarkable tension between Bharata's comic and furious rasas. In the entrance of the policeman Bam Bahadur and Lakshmi's departure, laughter and anger mingle. In terms of Abhinavagupta's idea of rasabhasa, what emerges is not the complete flowering of a rasa but an incomplete, disturbed aesthetic experience. Such moments recur throughout "Reng–Reng."

Vira rasa: resistance at the conclusion.

Anwar and Vivek's fearless resistance in the prison scene and the disclosure of truth through folk theatre express the heroic rasa. The proclamation "Om kham brahman—suga ritasya pantha" marks its culmination.

3.1.2. The Theory of Dhvani: Anandavardhana's Perspective

According to Anandavardhana's Dhvanyaloka (c. 850 CE), the distinguishing feature of outstanding literature is dhvani: the meaning suggested beyond what the words directly denote. Three levels of suggestion can be recognised in "Reng–Reng."

At the first, literal level, "Reng–Reng" evokes the sound of colour. At the second, metaphorical level, it signifies the changing colours of life. At the third, political level, it evokes the fragmentation of popular culture under corrupt government.

The title itself is a richly resonant sign in which rang (colour and the stage), rog (disease as poverty), ran (struggle) and reng (the sound of a stifled cry) echo simultaneously.

3.1.3. Vakrokti: Kuntaka's Perspective

According to Kuntaka's Vakroktijivita (tenth century), excellent literature and drama depend upon vakrokti: a distinctive, oblique expression that departs from straightforward statement. "Reng–Reng" provides several examples:

(a) Vishnu's entrance is not divine but satirical; he speaks only "a couple of words" and departs.

(b) Lakshmi, the goddess of wealth, leaves empty-handed: the work's most strikingly oblique statement.

(c) The recitation of the Satyanarayana Puja is a religious ceremony rendered satirical by the surrounding poverty.

(d) Gold coins signify dreams of wealth that are reduced to ashes: an oblique symbolic system.

3.2. Western Critical Theories

3.2.1. Brechtian Epic Theatre

Bertolt Brecht's (1898–1956) theory of epic theatre offers the closest Western parallel to "Reng–Reng." The Brechtian Verfremdungseffekt, or alienation effect, operates here in the following ways:

(a) Shifts of vocal delivery and songs and dances within the play interrupt emotional identification and encourage the audience to think critically. These effects approximate Brechtian Gestus. (b) The slogan-like repetition of "poverty is a disease" recalls Brecht's use of song. (c) Anwar and Akshara's entanglement over a mobile phone in the prison scene connects spectators with lived reality.

3.2.2. Marxist Dramatic Criticism

The class struggle of "Reng–Reng" may be considered in the light of Raymond Williams's Drama from Ibsen to Brecht (1952) and Terry Eagleton's Marxism and Literary Criticism (1976).

Three social groups constitute the dramatic conflict: the ruling class (police, government and Vishnu as the divinity of the status quo); the artistic class (Shridhar, Anwar, Hamal and Akshara, all unemployed artists); and the popular class (Nunu Kaka and the boy). This triangular conflict is a dramatic transformation of Marxist class struggle. The accumulation, distribution and ultimately dispiriting disappearance of gold, or capital, is a metaphor for capitalist accumulation.

3.2.3. A Postcolonial Perspective

In the light of Homi Bhabha's The Location of Culture (1994) and Gayatri Chakravorty Spivak's "Can the Subaltern Speak?" (1988):

The linguistic debate in "Reng–Reng"—Maithili versus Nepali, Hindi, English, Sanskrit and Urdu, and the dispute about which language should appear on Vishnu's gold coin—is a remarkable scene of postcolonial hybridity. The playwright creates what Bhabha calls a "Third Space," where no single language or culture holds unquestioned supremacy. The entrance of Nunu Kaka, embodying the spirit of folk theatre, challenges colonial and Brahminical-Sanskritic dominance through the argument for theatre as Bharata Muni's "fifth Veda."

3.2.4. Feminist Criticism

Akshara's character may be examined in the light of Judith Butler's Gender Trouble (1990) and Simone de Beauvoir's The Second Sex (1949).

Akshara is the sole female character who speaks boldly and fearlessly in the play. She proposes a love marriage to Hamal, the male protagonist, and speaks to the police without fear. In the Lakshmi episode, however, a tension between women's economic power, embodied in the goddess of wealth, and patriarchal economic authority becomes visible as a form of performativity in Butler's sense.

3.2.5. Chinese Literary Theory

The Chinese theory of jingjie, the aesthetic realm or realm of experience, associated with Wang Guowei's Renjian Cihua (1908–1910), and the tradition of feng, or satire in Chinese theatre, offer further points of comparison.

The political satire of "Reng–Reng" can be compared with the satirical features of Chinese zaju, the musical drama of the Yuan dynasty, and Kunqu opera. Mocking humour directed at ruling-class folly, stories nested within stories and the poetic use of folk melodies are central to those traditions. An awareness of poverty (pinkun yishi) and the desire for social justice form a common concern.

3.3. Navya-Nyaya: The Epistemology of Gangesha Upadhyaya

3.3.1. Direct Perception and Dramatic Truth

The epistemology of "Reng–Reng" may be read through the theory of pratyaksha, direct perception, in the perception section of Gangesha Upadhyaya's thirteenth-century Mithila treatise Tattvachintamani.

The immediate experience of poverty—Anwar's declaration "We are dying of hunger"—is presented as nirvikalpaka pratyaksha, indeterminate perception. The manifestation of Lakshmi and the shower of gold constitute savikalpaka pratyaksha, determinate perception, which ultimately proves illusory. This is a dramatic realisation of the problem of perceptual illusion in Gangesha's theory.

3.3.2. Inference and the Logical Sequence of the Play

Gangesha's vyaptigraha, the apprehension of invariable concomitance that makes inference possible, is treated as the basis of the play's central reasoning:

Vyapti: "Where poverty persists, every disease persists"—this is the play's hetu, or logical reason. Sadhya: "Poverty is the cause of every disease"—this is presented as its paksha, or subject of inference.

Through the Navya-Nyaya technique of paramarsha, subsumptive reflection, the playwright turns Shridhar's speech into a philosophical and logical declaration.

3.3.3. Verbal Testimony and the Language Dispute

An important scene questions the language to be inscribed on a gold coin: Maithili, Nepali, Hindi, English, Sanskrit or Urdu? The episode is a theatrical test of Gangesha's theory of shabda-pramana, testimonial knowledge. Under that theory, testimony is valid only when the speaker is apta, or trustworthy. The conflict over linguistic power thus asks which language can speak with authority, and who qualifies as an authoritative speaker.

3.4. The Videha Parallel-History Perspective

3.4.1. The Counter-Canon and Parmeshwar Kapari

The central argument of the Videha parallel literary-history movement is that much has been omitted from mainstream histories of Maithili literature centred on the Sahitya Akademi in New Delhi and Nepal's academies, particularly the work of Nepali Maithili writers, marginal authors and folk-theatre traditions.

Parmeshwar Kapari represents this omitted group. His play "Reng–Reng":

(a) Represents the Maithili theatre centred on Janakpurdham, Nepal.

(b) Makes the institutional dominance of the Sahitya Akademi a direct object of satire.

(c) Places folk theatre, particularly in the Nunu Kaka episode, on an equal footing with classical drama.

(d) Centres the struggles of unemployed artists, largely absent from mainstream literary history.

3.4.2. "Reng–Reng" in a Parallel History of Maithili Theatre

"Reng–Reng" occupies a distinctive place in Maithili dramatic history. Ayodhyanath Choudhary's response indicates that the play accurately represents the truth of its age, popular realities and a political atmosphere informed by the Gen-Z movement, the rebellious mobilisation of a younger generation.

4. Comparative Study with Other Maithili Playwrights and Writers

Where the mainstream has been absorbed in historical subjects and cultural revival, Kapari concentrates on contemporary political reality. Mainstream dramatic technique follows the classical three unities of place, time and action more closely; "Reng–Reng," in contrast, adopts the open structure of epic theatre.

Comparison with Mahendra Malangia

Where Mahendra Malangia succeeded in raising folk theatre primarily onto an aesthetic plane, Kapari transforms it into an instrument of political resistance. Both playwrights make satire a primary literary device in Maithili drama, Malangia in a more limited way and Kapari in an open dramatic form. Their concerns also differ. Malangia addresses the problems of a more restricted social class, while Kapari, like Bechan Thakur, writes about unemployment, against corrupt systems and in defence of Maithili identity.

The character of Shridhar, the director, may be a satirical allusion to Nepal's institutional Maithili literary establishment.

The Nunu Kaka episode echoes the dramatic tradition of Jyotirishwar's Dhurta Samagama and Vidyapati's Gorakshavijaya (the latter Vidyapati being distinguished from the earlier one preceding Jyotirishwar). The references to Bharata Muni's Natyashastra and to drama as the "fifth Veda" are directly related to this tradition. Kapari restores it to a contemporary political setting.

5. Critical Assessment: Strengths and Limitations

5.1. The Play's Distinctive Strengths

(a) A successful synthesis of folk-theatre tradition and modern political theatre.

The most important achievement of "Reng–Reng" is its transformation of Maithili folk-theatre phakras into instruments of contemporary political drama. In one respect it goes beyond Brecht's epic theatre, for its aesthetic roots lie in local folk traditions.

(b) Linguistic plurality and cultural dialogue.

The presence of Maithili, Nepali, Hindi, Sanskrit, Urdu and English forms a multilingual ensemble that itself amounts to a cultural and political statement. The identity of Maithili in Nepal, a multilingual region, is experienced vividly in the play.

(c) Metatheatre: a play within a play.

"Reng–Reng" is a metatheatrical work: the story of rehearsals by a dramatic institution becomes itself a social drama. This play-within-a-play structure is uncommon in Maithili theatre.

(d) The Aishwarya/Lakshmi episode as an economic metaphor.

The goddess's shower of gold, its appropriation by greedy characters and her eventual empty-handed departure form a striking metaphorical portrayal of capitalist economic relations, satisfying the principal demands of a Marxist critical reading.

5.2. Limitations and Points of Criticism

(a) The closing marriage scene, the wedding of Hamal and Akshara, seems somewhat inconsistent with the play's political intensity. This resolution suggests a compromise with commercial theatrical conventions.

(b) Nunu Kaka's argument concerning the "fifth Veda," which marks the drama's philosophical height, could have received greater development.

(c) Psychological depth is unevenly distributed among the characters. Shridhar and Anwar are well developed, but the boy and Bam Bahadur occasionally become oversimplified stereotypes.

6. The Literary Significance of the Play and Playwright

6.1. Contribution to Maithili Theatre

"Reng–Reng" opens a new dimension in the theatre of Maithili-speaking Nepal. It demonstrates that:

(a) Maithili drama can be situated in the context of world-class political theatre.

(b) Folk theatre is not a primitive form but a medium for thoroughly modern thought.

(c) The struggles of unemployed and marginalised Maithili artists are serious literary subjects.

(d) Janakpurdham, a centre of Maithili theatre in Nepal, possesses its own dramatic tradition independently of histories centred on Darbhanga.

6.2. His Place in Videha's Parallel History

From the perspective of Videha's parallel literary movement, Parmeshwar Kapari is a writer who:

(a) Continues his literary work outside dominant institutional systems; (b) connects folk-literary traditions with contemporary political theatre; (c) gives literary expression to the struggle for Maithili identity in Nepal; and (d) integrates Mithila's cultural richness with modern intellectual concerns.

All these characteristics exemplify the Videha parallel history's subtitle, "Works Excluded from Mainstream History."

7. Conclusion

Parmeshwar Kapari's "Reng–Reng" is a Maithili play that presents life as though on a stage. Poverty, corruption and the unemployment of artists are all maladies. Yet the playwright is no pessimist. Through folk theatre, the power of the fifth Veda and the symbol of a new marriage, he seeks to communicate an indomitable hope.

Viewed through the four traditions of Indian rasa-dhvani-vakrokti aesthetics, Western epic theatre, Chinese satirical drama and Gangesha's Navya-Nyaya epistemology, "Reng–Reng" is a rich, multilayered work that adds a new dimension to the Maithili theatrical tradition.

In Videha's parallel literary history, Kapari emerges as an important playwright marginalised by mainstream literary historiography, whose "Reng–Reng" holds an unforgettable place in the history of Maithili theatre.

CHAPTER 05

Gahan Ugras: A Multidimensional Dramaturgical Critique

Society, Conflict and a Multilayered Analysis of Theatre

Historical Background and Publication of "Gahan Ugras"

In the field of contemporary Maithili drama and theatrical experimentation, Parmeshwar Kapari's "Gahan Ugras" is a historical landmark. The first edition was published by Prithu Prakashan, Janakpurdham, in Phagun 2073 of the Bikram Sambat calendar. Written as a wholly original dramatic work, the book features a cover painting by the distinguished Mithila artist S. C. Suman, with typesetting and design by Kumar Bhaskar. Kapari dedicated this remarkable play to Kunalji, the renowned historical theatre practitioner whose dramatic creativity and work on the stage have brought lasting distinction to the Maithili language and literature.

The distinguished scholar of Nepali theatre Dr Abhi Subedi describes the structure as "experimental," observing that instead of conventional scene arrangements or artificial scenography, Kapari constructs the stage through human dialogue and the internal relations created by speech. The central character is a landlord, or jimdar, around whom social bonds are continuously made and broken. Kapari is known for confronting entrenched systems. He is himself a living dictionary of Maithili, as the rich and authentic vocabulary of "Gahan Ugras" abundantly demonstrates.

Historically, Janakpurdham has been the theatrical and cultural capital of the Mithila region within Nepal. Its vitality derived especially from the Mithila Natya Kala Parishad (MINAP), established in 1979, whose energy sustained a consciousness of Maithili drama. Towards the end of the twentieth century, however, the premature death of Dhirendra Dhumketu contributed to a decline in Janakpur theatre. At around the same time, theatre in Patna, India, also suffered inactivity; obscene orchestras came to dominate traditional village stages; and people who turned Vidyapati festivals into businesses of fundraising and subscriptions began to stigmatise deserving cultural workers rather than honouring them with the ceremonial pag. Mahendra Malangia's slapstick humour continued to ridicule the proletariat. Amid this deep darkness, the efforts of organisations such as MINAP, Akriti, Achhinjal and Bhangima brought a revival of Maithili drama in Janakpur. It was at this time, inspired by the realities of Nepal's ten-year Maoist people's war and the devastation surrounding the Second People's Movement, that Ramesh Ranjan appeared with the play "Sakhi" and Parmeshwar Kapari with "Gahan Ugras."

Thematic Structure, Symbolic Design and Sociopolitical Reality

The plot of "Gahan Ugras" is principally divided into two parts, which metaphorically present the historical discourse of Nepal's feudal transition, the social effects of the people's war and cultural colonisation. Its initial period concerns the political crisis of reaction following Nepal's Second People's Movement of Bikram Sambat 2062–63. The repression of the monarchy and the autocratic Panchayat system is weakening, but Gyanendra's government is making its last determined attempt to retain power by force; meanwhile, a new movement for a federal republic through a constituent assembly is spreading across the country.

A Close Analysis of Part One

Part One begins in the crumbling and dilapidated home of Phulgen Singh, a Rajput landlord who represents the remnants of feudalism. Not a grain remains in any of his granaries. The landlord's children live away from home, and a Dhanuk villager serving as his manager attends to him and prepares his meals. The irascible old landlord, Phulgen Singh, sits with a gamchha wrapped about his knees and back, swatting flies while remembering his former feudal prestige. The village's insolent and mischievous children, Tunma and Musna, sing traditional mocking songs in his veranda: "An elephant comes, a horse comes; at this old fellow's wedding, his grandson will go!" and "Reng, reng, reng, there's a frog upon your plate!" Two girls perform the Jat-Jatin game and expose the landlord's exploitative nature by singing, "This landlord is the master of the village, isn't he? His weighing scales are crooked and his seer is short, isn't it?"

At this point a middle-aged woman named Sati enters. She tells them to stop hurling abuse at the landlord and warns him that the age of feudal oppression has ended and that blows and kicks are now inevitable. Five revolutionary young people then appear on stage:

Phulo Khatbe: a combative Dalit human-rights activist.

Dukhiya Sada: the voice of the oppressed, appearing as a representative of Amnesty International.

Subhadra Mandal: an active political worker.

Jwala Prasad Singh (Jwala): an underground fighter in the Maoist people's war who has taken up arms to end exploitation.

Vidyapati Yadav: an outspoken journalist and communications worker who exposes the exploiting classes through the force of his pen.

The landlord boasts of his old feudal exploitation: "Your fathers and grandfathers used to graze cattle at our mansion, and your wives served as the mansion's maidservants." Enraged, the Maoist fighter Jwala Singh kicks him, and the old landlord falls trembling to the ground. The young activists leave to attend and report on a major political rally against reactionary forces. Shortly afterwards a servant runs in and, weeping, tells the old man Khokhna and the old woman that the police fired indiscriminately at the rally held at the school. Sati was struck twice in the chest and died; Jwala Singh died immediately; Phulo is taking her last breaths; and Subhadra and Vidyapati are in critical condition.

Part Two: Metaphorical and Cultural Discourse

Part Two begins as a surreal and allegorical journey. Baba Abhelba and his paralysed disciple Baklelba, who trembles as he walks as though pounding rice, travel towards Janakpurdham carrying a gourd vessel, a water pot and a blanket, singing the devotional refrain "Latak satak Siyarama." Even after the bundle falls from his head, the disciple continues singing jogira. On reaching Janakpurdham, people who have gathered to sleep there—Lakhna, Bechna, Mangla and Janka—assemble around them. Janka, the boatman, recounts the marriage of Rama and Sita during the festival of Vivaha Panchami. According to his telling, after the wedding Dasharatha obstinately demanded a dowry, whereupon Janaka placed his own head before Dasharatha. The narrative becomes a metaphor for Mithila's unending cultural exploitation.

Meanwhile, Genma and Phaguni hear the Earth weeping. When everyone digs into the soil, they find a thick stream of bright-red blood. Vidyapati explains that it is the blood shed in the oppression carried out 230–240 years earlier by the Gorkha kings of the Shah dynasty. Beneath the soil lie the remnants of Maithili language, culture and art, destroyed by the repressive policy of "one language, one dress." At Bulanti and Dukhiya's appeal, the women sing songs of rebirth: Chhath songs, Chaitavar and Jat-Jatin. Finally Vidyapati leads a great revolutionary procession calling for the release of Maithili from its eclipse—its "gahan ugras"—and for the creation of an autonomous Mithila province in a new federal Nepal.

1. General Introduction to the Book and Its Structure

Parmeshwar Kapari's Maithili play "Gahan Ugras," a vernacular transformation of the expression "grahan ugras," or release from an eclipse, is an outpouring of intense social suffering. It was published by Prithu Prakashan, Janakpurdham, in Phagun 2073. Divided into Part One and Part Two, the play constructs its narrative around the sociopolitical circumstances of the Mithila region of Nepal. Its many characters represent different social classes: landlord Phulgen Singh (the exploiting feudal lord); Tunma and Musna (comic child characters); Girl One and Girl Two (rebellious female voices); Phekua (a young man); the Heroine (a symbol of new cultural distortion); Bulanti, Suvansh, Subhadra, Jwala, Dukhiya, Phulo and Sati (members of the proletarian populace); an old man and an old woman; Vidyapati (a symbolic embodiment of cultural consciousness); Janka, Bechna and Lakhna (representing various sections of Mithila society); and the Telephone Man (symbolising modern communications). The breadth of the cast itself demonstrates that the playwright did not wish to exclude any social group from the stage.

2. From the Perspective of Indian Dramaturgy

Indian Dramatic Theory and the "Theatre of Roots"

The theory of rasa in Indian dramaturgy, particularly karuna, vira and raudra, thoroughly animates "Gahan Ugras." Suresh Awasthi's "Theatre of Roots" movement sought to revive indigenous folk forms in opposition to colonial Western realist theatre. Habib Tanvir, Ratan Thiyam, B. V. Karanth and K. N. Panikkar connected folk ritual and indigenous performance traditions with modern political consciousness.

In "Gahan Ugras," Kapari gives a new expression to this philosophy of roots within the Maithili theatre movement. Traditional Maithili dance-drama forms, including Jat-Jatin, Jhijhiya and folk songs, had generally been regarded as mere entertainment, often without written scripts. Rambharos Kapari "Bhramar" and Parmeshwar Kapari, however, transform such folk performances into powerful political weapons against class exploitation and colonial oppression. When Jat-Jatin songs are heard in Part Two, their dialogues express the painful reality of migrant life. This is the revitalisation of folk tradition as a living, dynamic practice—the central principle of the Theatre of Roots.

2(a). The Five Junctures and the Structure of the Plot

Bharata Muni's Natyashastra divides a dramatic plot into five junctures: mukha, pratimukha, garbha, vimarsha and nirvahana. Within this framework, the mukha, or opening, is the scene in the landlord's courtyard, where the granaries are empty and Tunma and Musna sing mocking songs. The pratimukha emerges as a wave of popular protest begins challenging the landlord's authority. In the garbha, the appearance of the Heroine raises questions of cultural disintegration and economic migration. The vimarsha comes when the proletarian collective, in Vidyapati's symbolic presence, seeks a path to liberation. The nirvahana, the moment of resolution, is not clearly present. This is a significant dramaturgical weakness.

2(b). Rasa

The Natyashastra proposes eight or nine rasas. In "Gahan Ugras," karuna predominates in the lament of the elderly couple, in women's songs about departure to foreign lands and in Bulanti's grief for her only son. Vira rasa emerges in the popular movement of the second part. Bibhatsa, disgust, is evoked in the accounts of the landlord's exploitation. Hasya rasa appears in the childlike, mocking exchanges between Tunma and Musna. Shringara, however—regarded by Bharata as the king of the rasas—is almost entirely absent. From the standpoint of the theory of rasa-dhvani associated with the commentator Abhinavagupta, the language of the play has a rich capacity for suggestion, though its dhvani does not fully develop because the writing lacks sufficient literary refinement.

2(c). Types of Hero and Classification of Characters

The Natyashastra identifies four kinds of hero: dhirodatta, dhiroddhata, dhiralalita and dhiraprasanta. "Gahan Ugras" has no single central hero. Vidyapati symbolically occupies the position of the calm, composed dhiraprasanta hero, calling forth cultural awareness. The people collectively become the protagonist, a conception more consistent with the Indian folk-theatre tradition than with classical Sanskrit drama. This may be understood as a deliberate dramaturgical choice.

2(d). Number of Acts and Dramatic Form

The Natyashastra describes the ten dramatic forms, or dasharupakas, including nataka, prakarana, bhana, vyayoga and samavakara. "Gahan Ugras" differs from the conventional attributes of classical nataka and comes closer to prakarana because it portrays actual social life rather than a royal plot. In the context of folk performance, however, it is more closely connected with Vidapat Nach, Jat-Jatin and the collective singing traditions of Sama-

Chakeva. Female characters appearing on stage with headcloths tied and singing cultural songs sustain a living continuity with Mithila's folk-theatre traditions.

3. From the Perspective of Western Dramaturgy

Comparative Reflections on Western and Chinese Dramatic Theory

Bertolt Brecht's epic theatre and Verfremdungseffekt, or alienation effect, withhold emotional absorption in the plot to provide spectators with an opportunity for rational scrutiny. Brecht's theory was influenced by traditional Chinese performance, particularly the acting of Mei Lanfang. In Chinese theatre the fourth wall is broken to permit direct communication with spectators.

Huang Zuolin, a pioneer of Chinese spoken drama, or huaju, articulated this method in his conception of xieyi, or essentialist theatre, whose leading qualities are fluidity, flexibility, sculpturality and conventionality.

The dramatic form of "Gahan Ugras" is a Maithili adaptation of xieyi and Brechtian principles. According to Dr Abhi Subedi, dialogue and relationships between characters create the stage in place of realistic scenography. Scene changes are exceptionally fluid and flexible: without the fall of a curtain, the action moves directly from the present to the repression at Simraungarh and historical displacement 240 years earlier. Baklelba's trembling gait and the landlord's way of sitting wrapped around his staff illustrate symbolic conventionality.

A Comparison with Yiddish Dramatic Theory and the Discourse of Displacement

Yiddish theatre developed in the Yiddish language of Ashkenazi Jews in Eastern Europe. Its roots lay in the Purimshpils, comic performances held during Purim that sharply attacked contemporary social absurdities and wealthy classes. The satirical performances at Maithili's Vivaha Panchami tableaux and MINAP's "Grand Fools' Conference" are close to the realistic and comic style of the Purimshpils.

In Yiddish theatre, the Broder Singers were itinerant performers who changed costumes and presented comic, satirical sketches; Abraham Goldfaden built the foundations of professional Yiddish theatre out of this performance culture. The children's farce at the door of landlord Phulgen Singh in the opening of "Gahan Ugras," and the comic exchanges between Baba Abhelba and his disciple Baklelba in Part Two, resemble the indigenous, humorous performance methods of the Broder Singers.

In examining the struggle between shund, or popular "trash" theatre, and literary theatre in the Yiddish tradition, Itsik Manger argued that shund represented an "open stage" without academic acting, where popular desire could find unrestricted expression. The Maithili theatre movement has similarly experienced conflict between popular forms—folk dances and kirtaniya performance—and refined literary theatre. "Gahan Ugras" bridges this divide by connecting folk culture with political liberation.

Displacement, Overseas Employment and the Wounds of Nostalgia

Diaspora, migration and nostalgia have provided central foundations for Yiddish theatre. Poor Jews who migrated from Eastern Europe to America recalled their shtetls, or Jewish villages, through plays and songs such as "Mein Shtetl Belz," seeking relief from their sorrows.

"Gahan Ugras" presents this tragedy of modern Maithil displacement with considerable force. The dialogue conducted through a public call office between a Maithil migrant worker, Mundha, trapped in the oppressive kafala system of the Gulf states, including Qatar and Saudi Arabia, and the "Gulf widow," the Heroine, living alone at home, may be seen as a Maithili adaptation of Yiddish theatrical reflections on displacement. Fears concerning AIDS, the use of condoms and suspicions of infidelity reveal the harsh realities of migrant life and the wounds of nostalgia.

3(a). Aristotle's Theory of Mimesis and the Three Unities

In his Poetics, Aristotle explains tragedy through imitation and its production of catharsis, or the purification of the spectator's emotions. "Gahan Ugras" does not closely follow the three unities of time, place and action: its settings move among the village, a public call office or police post, fairgrounds, the Judshital bathing place and other locations, while its timescale appears to extend across years. Its strongest Aristotelian element, unity of action, is nevertheless partly present, because every episode circles around the common struggle between oppression and liberation.

In terms of Aristotle's theory of tragedy, peripeteia, or reversal of fortune, appears in the landlord's fall: once all-powerful, he is finally chased away by children calling, "Set the dog upon him; send the cat running after him." Anagnorisis, or recognition, however, is conspicuously absent, preventing the play from achieving the full structure of classical tragedy.

3(b). Brechtian Influence: Theatre of Distanciation

The most evident influence on "Gahan Ugras" is the German playwright's anti-illusionist dramatic method. Dr Abhi Subedi's introduction explicitly describes the play as experimental, remarking that "human beings themselves are the creators of the stage setting and scenography, and it is they who fashion the dramatic body of 'Gahan Ugras'." In keeping with Brechtian epic theatre, the narrative thread repeatedly breaks, characters sing popular songs that dissolve theatrical illusion, and spectators are encouraged to respond intellectually instead of identifying emotionally with the action.

Tunma and Musna's humorous song—"An elephant comes, a horse comes; at this old fellow's wedding, his grandson will go"—is a distinctly Brechtian intervention, forcing spectators to see the grotesque features of reality with critical awareness.

3(c). Stanislavski's Psychological Realism

Judged by Stanislavski's emphasis on discovering the inward lives of characters, "Gahan Ugras" offers comparatively little psychological depth. Bulanti's suffering at the loss of her son and the Heroine's conflict over her double life offer some moments of dramatic sensitivity, but characterisation remains incomplete overall. The playwright has evidently given priority to social purpose over the individual development of characters.

3(d). Existentialist Drama

In terms of the existentialist outlook of Camus and Sartre, an echo can be heard in the play's underlying grief: people remain alive, but the system strips life of meaning. Bulanti's cry that her son has left home and that she has not seen his face expresses the existential pain of a disjointed life without any apparent guiding destiny.

4. From the Perspective of Israeli Dramatic Thought

Hanoch Levin (1943–1999), a central figure of modern Israeli theatre, excelled at dramatising political satire and the suffering of ordinary people. "Gahan Ugras" resembles Levin's bitter directness in its mocking exchanges against the landlord, its use of children's voices to ridicule authority and its collective songs of protest. Just as the anguished speech of ordinary citizens becomes theatrical language in Israeli drama, Kapari undertakes a comparable task rooted in the soil and waters of Mithila. Yet "Gahan Ugras" does not fully attain the philosophical density characteristic of the Israeli theatrical tradition.

5. From the Perspective of Chinese Theatrical Traditions

Chinese theatre, especially Yuan opera and political theatre after the Mao era, is characterised by the integration of song, dance and dialogue to voice collective consciousness. The recurring folk songs in "Gahan Ugras"—Judshital songs, Holi songs, songs associated with the ceremonial turban and voices opposing dowry—function comparably. Presenting Vidyapati, a historical and cultural symbol of Mithila, as a dramatic character also recalls the Chinese theatrical practice of using historical and mythic figures to carry contemporary political messages.

6. The Play's Principal Distinguishing Features

First, political candour: the play brings Nepal's monarchy, the Maoist people's war, the Second People's Movement, Gyanendra's reactionary rule and the establishment of the federal democratic republic directly onto the stage. It is thus an explicit political testimony. The Indian part of Mithila, now outside this political history, encounters it through the play: theatrical literature is being created in a distinctive geographical and cultural situation.

Second, linguistic stratification: the landlord's language differs markedly from that of the workers, just as the women's speech differs in tone from the men's. Vidyapati speaks in an elevated literary and exhortatory register. Through the Telephone Man, the playwright satirises modern communication culture. This stratified linguistic structure marks Kapari as a mature dramatist.

Third, the importance of women's voices: Girl One and Girl Two openly curse and chase the landlord, singing, "Put jaggery in this old fellow's pan; set the dog upon him; send the cat after him." Bulanti and Subhadra also voice resistance. The strong presence of women challenges Mithila's patriarchal social order through theatrical language.

Fourth, the inclusion of cultural rituals: the sprinkling of water at Judshital, the celebration of Holi, folk songs and the tying of a ceremonial turban are woven naturally into the plot. They raise "Gahan Ugras" beyond an exclusively political play and make it a record of cultural memory.

Fifth, criticism of dowry: in one important scene, Lakhna, Janka and Bechna jointly expose the custom of dowry through satire. "Understand this: it was from the time of King Janaka, among our own people, that the dowry system began." The dialogue reveals a satirical perspective that links King Janaka's cultural prestige to a social evil.

7. Principal Limitations of the Play

First, the looseness of the plot: the sequence of events does not have a tightly ordered structure. One scene often follows another through coincidence rather than causation. Neither the sutradhara convention associated with Bharata nor Brecht's clear division of scenes supplies a coherent organising device. Readers and spectators must themselves connect the narrative strands.

Second, incomplete character development: the symbolic presence of Vidyapati is ambitious, but its dramatic possibilities have not been fully realised. The Heroine is made a symbol of cultural corruption without sufficiently exploring its underlying social and economic causes. The landlord remains a one-dimensional exploiter without human complexity.

Third, ambiguity of the ending: the final scene brings together processions, slogans and agitation without a clear dramatic outcome. "Release the eclipse that has fallen upon society and culture" gives the play's title its meaning, but this is a poetic rather than a dramatic conclusion. The absence both of the nirvahana juncture expected in Indian dramaturgy and of the denouement expected in Western dramatic theory constitutes a creative limitation.

Fourth, the complexities of staging: numerous locations, a large cast, performances of folk music and the distant sounds of popular protest are difficult, though not impossible, to stage with the limited resources available to many theatres in Mithila.

Dr Abhi Subedi writes in his introduction: "The play will meet the director's test one hundred per cent, and that of the audience quite naturally." Stageability, therefore, is not in itself a limitation of the play.

8. The Historical Significance of the Play

"Gahan Ugras" is an important work of Maithili dramatic literature in Nepal's Mithila. It may be seen as a distinctive representative of the theatrical tradition that followed the establishment of the Mithila Natya Kala Parishad in Janakpur in 1979.

9. Conclusion: An Integrated Dramaturgical Assessment

"Gahan Ugras" is an ambitious attempt, guided by political and social purpose, to join folk-theatre traditions with modern political drama. It achieves considerable success through the effective movement of karuna rasa, the vigorous use of folk-performance traditions and its conception of a collective protagonist. Its partial employment of Brechtian distanciation and its political candour testify to its modernity.

Nevertheless, the play is not free from structural looseness, insufficient psychological development of characters, the absence of a clear nirvahana or resolution and practical difficulties of staging. Even so, the historical significance and cultural contribution of Parmeshwar Kapari's work within Maithili drama remain beyond dispute.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Details of the published books and editions relevant to the primary literary works, Indian poetics, philosophy of logic, folktales and dramatic studies are provided below.

Primary Text

Kapari, Parmeshwar. Gahan Ugras. First edition, Phagun 2073 BS. Janakpurdham: Prithu Prakashan.

Indian Poetics and Philosophy

Anandavardhana. The Dhvanyaloka of Anandavardhana with the Locana of Abhinavagupta. Translated by Daniel H. H. Ingalls, Jeffrey Moussaieff Masson and M. V. Patwardhan; edited by D. H. H. Ingalls. Harvard Oriental Series, vol. 49. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1990.

Kuntaka. The Vakrokti-Jivita of Kuntaka. Critical edition and English translation by K. Krishnamoorthy. First edition. Dharwad: Karnatak University, 1977.

Bharata Muni. The Natyashastra: A Treatise on Hindu Dramaturgy and Histrionics. English translation by Manomohan Ghosh. Vols. 1–2. Calcutta: Royal Asiatic Society of Bengal / Asiatic Society, 1950–1961.

Kane, P. V. History of Sanskrit Poetics. Reprint of the fourth edition. Delhi: Motilal Banarsidass, 1971.

Matilal, Bimal Krishna. The Navya-nyaya Doctrine of Negation: The Semantics and Ontology of Negative Statements in Navya-nyaya Philosophy. Harvard Oriental Series, vol. 46. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1968.

Radhakrishnan, Sarvepalli, and Charles A. Moore, eds. A Source Book in Indian Philosophy. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1957.

Folktales and Narrative Studies

Propp, Vladimir. Morphology of the Folktale. Second edition; translated by Laurence Scott; edited by Louis A. Wagner. Austin: University of Texas Press, 1968.

Ramanujan, A. K., ed. and trans. Folktales from India: A Selection of Oral Tales from Twenty-two Languages. New York: Pantheon Books, 1991.

Shulman, David Dean. The King and the Clown in South Indian Myth and Poetry. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1985.

Drama and Theatre

Aristotle. Poetics. Translated by Stephen Halliwell. Loeb Classical Library 199, together with On the Sublime and On Style. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1995.

Bharucha, Rustom. Theatre and the World: Performance and the Politics of Culture. First edition. London: Routledge, 1993.

Brecht, Bertolt. Brecht on Theatre: The Development of an Aesthetic. Edited and translated by John Willett. New York: Hill and Wang, 1964.

Richmond, Farley P., Darius L. Swann and Phillip B. Zarrilli, eds. Indian Theatre: Traditions of Performance. Honolulu: University of Hawaii Press, 1990.

Schechner, Richard. Between Theater and Anthropology. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1985.

Stanislavski, Konstantin. An Actor Prepares. English translation by Elizabeth Reynolds Hapgood. New York: Theatre Arts, 1936.

Reliable details of separate printed editions, publishers and publication years are unavailable for the other works discussed in this volume, including "Reng–Reng"; no bibliographical details have therefore been conjectured.

STUDY II / NIT NAVAL

Virendra Mallick

Introduction

One of the defining characteristics of Virendra Mallick's writing is the way in which he connects the creative language of Maithili with the uncertainties of everyday life, social questions, and critical discernment. In his poetry, Mithila is not a fixed geography of memory but a living environment of hunger, labour, linguistic rights, urban displacement, and civic dissent. In his critical prose, questions of tradition, modernity, aesthetics, and literature's social responsibility emerge repeatedly.

The first two chapters of this book examine the poems of Agni-Shikha and Athato Kavya Jijnasa independently. The former collection speaks in an urgent voice of popular struggle and linguistic identity; the latter develops a range of questions concerning the environment, the ironies of development, the market, democracy, and the commodification of poetry. A fundamental aim of this study is to understand the relationship between these collections without erasing the diversity of their individual poems.

The third chapter uses Pratham Purush to examine the practice of criticism itself. In his discussions of Rama poetry, imagery, tradition and innovation, and contemporary poetry, Mallick accords importance to evidentiary reasoning, linguistic sensibility, and an understanding of form. The fourth chapter, on Drama and Theatre: Nature and Models, explores the relationship between text and performance, folk art and theatrical institutions, theatrical language and social memory. The fifth chapter brings together, thematically, the nine chapters of Mallick's extended critical study of love and beauty in Vidyapati.

Reading these five books together reveals a larger principle: in Mallick's literary thinking, creative freedom and historical responsibility are not antagonistic. When the vitality of poetry becomes connected with people's lives, close attention to its form, speaker, symbols, satire, and poetic language becomes equally necessary. Likewise, criticism acquires credibility where praise and interrogation, tradition and innovation, cultural intimacy and reasoned disagreement can coexist.

CHAPTER I • THE LITERATURE OF VIRENDRA MALLICK

Agni-Shikha

A sequential examination of 55 poems • People's lives, linguistic identity, poetic craft, and political satire

The sequence of poems in Agni-Shikha contains fifty entries, but five composite entries each comprise two distinct poems. It is therefore necessary to consider fifty-five separate compositions.

The method rests on four levels: (a) close reading of the primary text, attending to theme, figures, imagery, repetition, and the poetic speaker; (b) an internal study of political, economic, and cultural contexts; (c) analysis of vernacular usage, myth, Hindi–English lexical mixtures, and modes of utterance; and (d) ethical and critical examination, in which the poet's solidarity with ordinary people is assessed alongside exaggeration, violent rhetoric, and representations of women.

It would be mistaken always to regard references to 'I', 'you', 'he/she', or historical personalities in the poems as the poet's autobiography or verified historical fact. A poem is a creative linguistic document. To understand the significance of its politics, satire, and experience, this study distinguishes between the claims made within the text and independent historical verification.

2. Principal Ideological Debates across the Collection

2.1 The Polysemous Symbol of Fire

The title Agni-Shikha gives the entire collection symbolic unity. In 'From the City to the Village', fire signifies the desire for fierce rebellion; in 'Evening', the colour of that fire writes a love letter upon the lake; in 'Naxalite', the sun's red light becomes a warning of struggle; in the title poem, fire becomes the energy of social surgery and illumination. Fire is thus not merely a destructive power but also a possibility of memory, renewal, scrutiny, and creation.

A related cluster of symbols includes heated iron, red rays, burning cooking fires, bombs, gunpowder, missiles, and electricity. The poet reshapes an ancient conception of fire through the vocabulary of modern technology. As a result, scenes of popular revolution and the fire that cooks daily bread continually transform into one another.

2.2 Linguistic Identity: Rights and Self-Criticism

The question of Maithili's rights recurs in 'A Box of Revolution', 'My Dear Indira', 'The Maithili Movement', 'To an Impotent Leader', and 'A Copy of a Letter'. Education in the mother tongue, constitutional recognition, literary publication, and respect for one's own linguistic identity are interconnected problems. The poet does not settle for emotional slogans in defence of the language; he also attacks the movement's failures, the complacency of its leadership, and the inertia of his own community.

In 'My Dear Indira' and 'A Box of Revolution', the demand for Maithili's inclusion in the Eighth Schedule belongs to the political circumstances in which the poems were written. According to the external constitutional record, Maithili was included through the Ninety-Second Constitutional Amendment of 2003, published in the Gazette on 8 January 2004. This evidence establishes the historical context of the earlier demand, but it does not establish that every poem in the collection was composed in the same year.

2.3 Hunger, Labour, and Economic Inequality

Agricultural debt, school fees, and the absence of books in the mother tongue in 'Electric Pressure'; workers and students in 'In the Courtyard of Independence'; the oppressed people of 'Struggle for Liberation'; the proletariat in 'To Those of a Common Conviction'; and workers and the market in 'The Liberated Market' together make the reality of labour a persistent thread throughout the collection. In this people's poetry, class relationships are not merely abstract slogans: they take shape through queues for rations, paper and pencils, pawned jewellery, kerosene, and failed harvests.

Cultural exploitation accompanies economic exploitation. Those who speak the people's language are denied education, respect, and opportunities to publish; those whose labour sustains the countryside remain separated from the returns on what they produce. The collection treats both forms of inequality as manifestations of the same injustice.

2.4 The Distortion of Democracy and Political Satire

Chairs of office, leaders, ministers, village heads, panchayats, police officers, bureaucrats, courts, and members of parliament recur with exceptional frequency in the collection. Files and red tape in 'Zero Hour', Yama's realm in 'Yama's Journey Abroad', changing colours in 'Chameleon', carrion-eating greed in 'Vulture', and the diseased social body in 'Cancer' are distinct metaphors of power. The central anxiety is that administration and politics should become machinery for self-preservation rather than instruments of service to citizens.

A significant contradiction inhabits this political outlook: demands for democratic rights are frequently expressed in the military vocabulary of conflict. Any assessment of these works must examine the poet's opposition to exploitation separately from the intensity of his poetic rhetoric.

2.5 Mithila, the City, and Social Geography

The poet does not regard Mithila as a sealed cultural monument. References to Ranti, Mangrauni, Pilakhwar, Madhubani, Darbhanga, Janakpur, Patna, Calcutta, and other places in 'His Village: His City' create an extensive spatial network. In 'In the Name of Our Folk Knowledge', the fragrance of soil and water is bound to feudal structures, poverty, popular livelihoods, and the sufferings of ordinary people. In the poet's vision, Mithila is not a static object of pride but a social terrain continually subjected to questioning.

Urban signs—trams, bus stops, hotels, prisons, offices, cinemas, and shopping malls—collide with rural vocabulary: ponds, rohu and bhakur fish, finger millet, orchards, fields, and bamboo groves. This encounter ensures that the experience of Maithil modernity is not reducible to an imported form.

2.6 Myth, Religion, and Cultural Self-Examination

Numerous figures from the Ramayana and Mahabharata become political metaphors in these poems. The repeated humiliation of Sita and Saraswati, Ravana's politics of disguise, Surasa's unemployment, Kumbhakarna's sleep, Dronacharya's institutional injustice, Ekalavya's struggle, the impediment of the chakravyuha, and Yama's absence turn mythic narratives into a language for contemporary inequality.

The poet's attack on religion is generally fiercest where ritual has come to substitute for social responsibility. In 'Kirtan', 'The Prayer Room', and 'Chodanalakshano 'rtho Dharmah', the ironic deployment of religious terminology is directed not against faith as such but against public conduct obscured by hypocrisy and self-interest.

2.7 Images of Women and the Absence of Women's Voices

Women appear in many roles: tradition in the metropolis in 'The Maithil Woman'; waiting in 'Evening'; the measured body in 'Mini Girl'; concern for mother, sister, wife, and beloved in 'Agni-Shikha'; women's awakening in 'Guerrilla Warfare'; and a woman subjected to violence in 'Gujaratnama'. The range of these appearances merits literary attention.

Yet a critical question remains: how often do women speak in their own voices, and how often do they become merely symbols in the poet's political argument? The bodily imagery of 'Mini Girl' and 'The Prayer Room' invites readers to undertake this examination themselves. The collection's solidarity with ordinary people must also be read in relation to women's autonomous experience.

2.8 The Writer, Literary Institutions, and the Aesthetics of Resistance

One distinctive achievement of the collection is that, in writing about politics, the poet also examines poets, intellectuals, critics, prize committees, and publishing institutions. Cultural events in 'Among Four Hundred Thousand Monkeys', the older leadership in 'O My Elders', book publication in 'A Copy of a Letter', and the role of poetry in 'Kavitayah Prativadam' and 'Kavitashri Pataliputram' all become subjects of direct debate.

In this sense, the poems are not only opposed to external political arrangements; they are also exercises in self-criticism within the literary field. The poet's insistence is clear: literature must remain connected to the pain and struggles of everyday life. At the same time, the readings demonstrate the need to preserve literature's internal beauty, contradictions, and multiplicity of meanings beyond its political usefulness.

2.9 The Reach of Historical Time: From Early Popular Movements to Globalisation

Political rhetoric associated with Indira, Bangladesh, demands for entry into the Eighth Schedule, Naxalites, the fodder and hawala scandals, globalisation, the violence in Gujarat, and 'Big Bazaar' all provide signs of different periods. The thematic range of the collection therefore extends across multiple historical layers. Without authoritative publication information, one should not assign a definite publication date to the book or an unverified date of composition to each poem.

The poems of the market-oriented era do not treat older injustices as having disappeared; they recognise their reappearance in changing forms. The final question in 'The Liberated Market' connects with the initial energy of revolt in the collection and opens a new possibility of struggle grounded in reason.

3. Language, Poetic Craft, and Aesthetic Sensibility

3.1 Vernacular Vocabulary and Multilingual Texture

The collection places everyday Maithili verb forms, indigenous terms for objects, invective, altered forms of speech, myths, and the vocabulary of agricultural labour alongside modern expressions such as tram, refrigerator, Prestige pressure cooker, letterbox, blood bank, ultraviolet rays, missile, hybrid, and mall. This mixture brings different levels of social existence onto a single linguistic plane. The limited presence of Hindi, English, and Sanskrit formulae can be understood as a poetic strategy within the Maithili voice; the present study itself is written in Maithili prose.

3.2 Free Verse, Collage, and Dramatic Utterance

Most poems are in free verse. Some offer a barrage of questions, others extended passages, others only two or three lines, and still others place a single word on each line. The visual arrangement of 'Vishnuryonim', the deployment of full stops in 'Kavitashri Pataliputram', the rhythmic miniature 'Evening', and the theatricality of 'Among Four Hundred Thousand Monkeys' exemplify this variety. The absence of metrical song does not mean the absence of rhythm: forms of address and repetition generate a distinct oral rhythm of resistance.

3.3 Principal Families of Images

Fire and light, disease and the body, animals and crowds, houses and walls, fields and hunger, war and weapons, cities and stages, and religion and ritual: these eight families of images recur throughout almost the entire collection. The searing presence of death in 'Vulture' and 'Cancer', the decay of structures in 'Let a New House Rise' and 'The Banyan Afflicted by Woodworm', and the transformation of light in 'Evening' and 'Agni-Shikha' clarify the collection's internal organisation when read in relation to one another.

3.4 The Sharpness of Satire and the Risks of Meaning

Images of donkeys, dogs, monkeys, jackals, snakes, chameleons, and vultures are exceptionally harsh in their portrayal of ruling groups. Such satire can immediately engage the popular reader, but it also risks compressing the complexities of human behaviour into a single animal type. An adequate understanding of both the originality and the limitations of these works emerges from that tension.

4. Detailed Poem-by-Poem Criticism: All 55 Distinct Texts

The following sequence follows the actual printed page order of the original book. Each commentary first addresses subject and context, then examines craft, symbols, or critical implications. Page references in parentheses refer to the printed pages of the original book.

1. From the City to the Village (pp. 9–11)

At the beginning of the collection, the poet imagines himself as a 'madman', a fire spreading from the city into the village. This madness names resistance to passivity. Urban plunderers, village moneylenders who charge usurious interest, corrupt politicians, dishonest village heads, and failed educational institutions converge into a single social crisis. References to Sita, Saraswati, Ravana, and the Kosi, Kamala, and Balan rivers transform Mithila's cultural geography into a political language. The poet's anger is directed not at any one individual but at the entire network of exploitation.

The repeated declaration of spreading like fire at both the beginning and the end gives the poem a circular form. River water signifies both a final hope and resistance beyond control. The desire for a 'people's revolution' is explicit, but the hyperbole associated with fire and the imagery of warfare should be understood as a poetic summons, not as a literal prediction of historical events.

2. A Morsel of Flesh (pp. 12–13)

Government promises, official positions, and seats of power are depicted as the temptation of 'a morsel of flesh'. Individuals and organisations fall upon this small advantage, forgetting collective rights as they fight members of their own class. Images of venomous snakes, dogs, and bones expose the unequal relationship between powerless communities and the authorities. The poet's sharp accusations extend equally to leaders, students, intellectuals, and political activists.

References to the Gita, Kamasutra, and Vidyapati Padavali do not constitute an attack on these texts; they satirise self-satisfied reading divorced from context. The refusal to acknowledge one's mother tongue and mother becomes an extreme image of cultural self-forgetting. Interrogative and insulting statements impel readers towards self-criticism.

3. A Box of Revolution (pp. 14–15)

Exposing the coercive realities of government, the poet questions writers, students, and the general public. Central subjects include the demand for Maithili's inclusion in the Eighth Schedule, the right to education in one's mother tongue, and the tendency to elect unworthy representatives by voting on caste lines. The poem explores the political influence of words, the pen, and popular strength. The 'box' of the title also suggests a packaged, hollow, and performative revolution.

The recurring formula concerning 'the strength of the one who holds the stick' is a satirical alteration of a popular proverb. Beneath the fierce challenge, the poet raises questions about a movement's actual preparedness and self-discipline. The concrete demand for linguistic rights, voiced in anger, distinguishes the poem.

4. O My Elders, Be Still (pp. 16–17)

This poem is a direct statement of generational conflict. Addressing the older generation as his 'elders', the poet describes them as comfort-seeking, hungry for office, self-satisfied, and indifferent to their mother tongue. Details of oil lamps, kerosene, matchsticks, clerks, peons, meetings, cards, and board games evoke trivial routines and an unfulfilled public responsibility. The central demand is that the old leadership should not stand in the way of the new generation.

Its imperative title is superficially deferential but inwardly acerbic. 'Be still' expresses no wish for death; it is a political plea that the elders withdraw from public leadership and allow younger people to work. Small analogies drawn from everyday life and the urgency of the questions keep the poem alive despite its oratorical manner.

5. Bengal Bandh (pp. 18–19)

During the 'bandh', Calcutta's urban life lies under the shadow of fear, gunfire, bombs, arrests, and administrative repression. References to Alipore Jail, young blood shed in the name of Naxalism, and the Preventive Detention Act signal a particular political atmosphere within the text. Against this terror, the domestic conversation between Kalua Chamar and Chatura Chamain brings forward the ordinary person's practical concern with survival. A distance consequently opens between the public 'bandh' and private hunger and fear.

The city, like a cold corpse, and the Hindi-inflected dialogue of ordinary speech create opposing rhythms. Rather than merely offering slogans, the poet condenses popular humour, helplessness, and contradiction into a poem constructed as a scene.

6. Evening (p. 20)

This short lyric offers a moment of beauty amid the collection's sharp political voices. The sun's redness upon the lake seems like a name written in fire, while evening resembles a letter of reunion placed in a letterbox. In this scene, nature and the objects of urban communication merge effortlessly. The poet turns the fading of light into anticipation of reunion rather than separation.

Within only a few lines, the poem employs symbols, visuality, and personification with restraint. Here 'fire' is not destructive but signifies the tender light of love. Understanding the enlargement of meaning carried by this one word is essential to reading the collection as a whole.

7. The Maithil Woman (p. 20)

The Maithil woman seen on Chowringhee, with kohl, vermilion, lips red as hibiscus, a red-patterned sari, and bare feet without sandals, constitutes the poem's visual scene. The encounter between the modern street of the metropolis and Mithila's traditional dress produces a tension of identity. To classify the woman simply as either 'backward' or 'modern' would narrow the reading.

This verbal portrait is extremely brief; beyond the descriptive perspective, the woman's own voice is absent. That limitation deserves consideration in a gender-focused reading. The combination of colour and dress constitutes the poem's concentrated visual strength.

8. Snake (p. 21)

The poet represents a deserted, silent day as a dead snake lying in the road. People are shut within the prisons of their homes: there is neither commotion nor struggle. Beneath external tranquillity, the poem conveys fear and the absence of living social consciousness. The snake is ordinarily a sign of danger or poison, but here its lifeless form signifies public inertia.

The reversal of a familiar comparison sharpens the poem. Three images—the motionless day, houses that have become prisons, and the unresponsive road—combine into a scene of political cowardice. Unlike the collection's numerous vehement poems, this poem's silence becomes a statement of resistance in its own right.

9. Master Sahib (p. 21)

This brief satire is built upon a teacher's changing language, clothing, and habit of visiting one household after another. Betel in his mouth, a watch on his wrist, English at one moment and Hindi at the next, sometimes a traditional dhoti and sometimes trousers: these details portray professional instability and the performance of outward appearances. The poem targets not the teacher's knowledge but the acting out of his social image.

The final comparison to a dog intensifies the sting of humiliation, but it would be inappropriate to apply such a generalisation to all teachers. The poem is more meaningful when read as a satire of a particular social type.

10. The Maithili Movement (p. 22)

The movement for linguistic rights is compared to a child's firecracker that fails to explode. Endless waiting and inaction, in place of popular awakening, are the poem's central objects of satire. Symbolic events are staged in the name of struggle, yet they produce no results; the poet questions this discrepancy.

The image of an ordinary household firecracker immediately exposes the emptiness of political claims. The extreme brevity of the poem makes its satire keener. Read alongside the collection's other movement-oriented poems, it is also an act of self-criticism within the poet's own political camp.

11. Mini Girl (p. 22)

Through transparent clothing, bodily proportions, and numerical measurements, 'Mini Girl' sketches a sharp picture of urban fashion. The consumerist gaze that turns a woman's body into measurements is unmistakable. Whether the poem's own utterance critiques that objectification or reproduces it, however, remains an open question.

List-like short phrases, numerical markers, and bodily detail make up its experimental arrangement. The absence of the woman's personhood must be recognised as a significant critical limitation.

12. My Dear Indira (pp. 23–24)

With its English form of address, the title speaks to the Indian authorities as though in a direct letter. The demand for Maithili's inclusion in the Eighth Schedule, the rejection of promises, and the self-respect of Maithili speakers occupy the centre of the poem. The roaring Kamala–Balan and Kosi rivers, names marking the geographical spread of Mithila, and the memory of Lava and Kusha create the image of a cultural community in agitation.

The succession of 'fire', 'fire engine', 'heated iron', and 'challenge' heightens emotional intensity. The contrast between the title's familiarity and the poem's severe political voice is important. The poem should be read as a poetic document of a contemporary demand, but its date of composition must not be fixed without evidence.

13. In the Courtyard of Independence (pp. 25–26)

Students, labourers, and farmers standing in the courtyard of an independent nation remain deprived of substantive freedom. Students confront unemployment, examination irregularities, and tear gas; farmers contend with droughts and floods, the ironies of subsidies, ration queues, and hunger. By setting lived reality against such public slogans as 'Jai Jawan, Jai Kisan', the poet exposes the difference between formal independence and social self-rule.

Repetition of the same phrase links different social figures. The conjunction of Surasa from the Ramayana with the 'laboratory' of development planning brings myth and the vocabulary of the modern state into critical contact. The poem's voice expands beyond individual indignation towards a shared class experience.

14. Kirtan (pp. 27–28)

The poet turns the religious-cultural form of kirtan into a metaphor for the public display staged by governments, assemblies, offices, and politicians. Amid strikes, holidays, beer, the commercial embellishment of bodies, extended devotional rituals, and organised stage events, democracy's real responsibilities disappear from sight. Religious vocabulary is not deployed here as a universal assault on belief but as an instrument of satire directed against the numbing of politics and society through hypocritical spectacles.

Noise, shifting scenes, and catalogues of comparisons transform the poem into a crowded theatre. The collision between obscenity and ritual calls the pretensions of civilisation into question. An exceptionally dense accumulation of images sometimes complicates the meaning; nevertheless, this complexity is linked to the poet's fragmented sense of his historical moment.

15. Cancer (pp. 29–30)

'Cancer' transforms disease into a metaphor for spreading inertia, selfishness, and institutional disintegration within the social body. Teachers, physicians, politicians, ministers, and intellectuals have abandoned their respective duties. Courts, official chairs, elections, rations, foreign borrowing, and inflation appear as many ailments of public life. The true subject is not an individual's illness but the disorders of a society that has forsaken its obligations.

An almost uninterrupted sequence of questions, along with medical terminology, generates an awareness of crisis on several levels. The poem insists on the need to diagnose social disease but supplies no clear institutional programme of treatment—a natural limitation of its declaratory style.

16. The Prayer Room (pp. 31–32)

Broken idols, incense sticks, tear gas, red tape, and election materials occupy the same visual field in the prayer room. By bringing together objects associated with a place of worship and a government office, the poet reveals the extent to which humanity, consciousness, and justice have been fragmented. In formal terms, severed limbs, pronouns, and bodily symbols create a visual text of social disintegration.

The unusual combination of objects produces an effect akin to surrealist collage. Images of the female body require critical scrutiny: they may expose objectification by structures of power, or the poetic language itself may repeat that objectification. Both possibilities demand examination.

17. Among Four Hundred Thousand Monkeys (pp. 33–34)

The poet portrays collections, welcomes, speeches, stage arrangements, anticipation of performers, and the audience's appetites inside a cultural auditorium as the behaviour of a troop of monkeys. The auditorium becomes a mocking counterpart of a literary-cultural institution. The programme's original purpose is forgotten, while the organisers' display, commotion, and prurient discussion of women's bodies become dominant.

The collision of 'monkey', 'Hanuman', 'time bomb', and 'pressure cooker' satirically joins folk comparison with modern devices. The number is an instrument of hyperbole, not a factual count of spectators. The poem's barbs are aimed at the internal contradictions of literary gatherings.

18. In the Name of Our Folk Knowledge (pp. 35–39)

This long poem is one of the collection's centres of self-criticism. Calling himself a 'sinner', the poet accepts a responsibility to expose the suffering of his land and water, local traditions of knowledge, labourers, poor farmers, urban workers, and the disadvantaged. He opposes the tendency to conceal present-day illiteracy, disregard for the mother tongue, and social inequality behind prestigious images of Vidyapati, Sita, Ayachi, and Mandana. A continuing tension persists between inherited cultural memory and present deprivation.

Repeated self-accusation works as both self-satire and ethical resistance. In the collection, 'lokaveda' becomes not merely folk culture but a capacious name for the social knowledge, labour, and rights of living communities. Here the poet's commitment to ordinary people is most direct.

19. Naxalite (pp. 40–41)

Beginning with the red morning sun, missiles, bombs, and images of struggle, the poem turns towards a state of mind inclined to escape. Scenes of residence in Kashi, river ghats, worship, and urban exploitation describe more than a sacred city; they exemplify people fleeing from consciousness and responsibility. The title 'Naxalite' raises difficult questions about armed upheaval and society's reaction to it.

Fragments of dreams, violent symbols, urban prostitution, and self-forgetting unsettle the reading experience. The poet reveals concealed connections among reports of violence, class inequality, and political passivity. The work should not be reduced to a simple political declaration.

20. Electric Pressure (pp. 42–44)

An ocean of hunger, agricultural distress, debt, school fees, the lack of mother-tongue books, and unemployment form the poem's basis. Memories of traditionally abundant food are placed against the severe life of an impoverished household today. Modern terms—tractor, pumping set, vitamins, blood bank—are linked to the realities of agrarian society. Ritual worship alone cannot end hunger, disease, and economic crisis: the poet argues for active transformation.

The 'pressure' of the title suggests constraint, an imbalance of energy, and a sudden shock. The repeated question 'How much longer?' becomes a demand that the system change within historical time. Labour, health, education, and language are interconnected popular rights in this poem.

21. Guerrilla Warfare (pp. 45–47)

This poem is an extended summons to the makers of a new age. Images of floods, drought, destitution, a daughter grown pale, an unemployed son, and elderly parents establish the grounds for resistance to the existing order. The desire for renewal is accompanied by references to women's public agency and 'women's awakening'. The poet regards the long habit of enduring injustice as an obstacle to change and gives political struggle a ferociously militant vocabulary.

The constant recurrence of 'Come!' creates the rhythm of a lyrical invocation. Weapons, strategy, and guerrilla warfare are elements of the poem's political rhetoric; criticism must also consider their human costs, nonviolent democratic possibilities, and rhetorical excess. This anger should be read as a historical social document.

22. Zero Hour (pp. 48–49)

'Zero Hour' is a poem about a present incapable of decision. The poet is disturbed by the passivity or opportunism of poets, historians, intellectuals, leaders, and ministers alike. Office files, bureaucratic red tape, bribes, land consolidation, ministers' palaces of glass, and the plates pawned by ordinary people are different manifestations of the same system. The everyday humiliation of the public within the processes of democracy renders this historical moment 'zero'.

Through numerous interrogative addresses, the poet exposes a failure of leadership. The poem becomes an inventory of problems, but the very inventory lays bare a machinery of exploitation extending from local administration to national government. 'Zero' time is not an inert void; it is a period of waiting for decisive action.

23. Let a New House Rise: Let the Old House Fall (pp. 50–56)

This is among the collection's longest and most declarative works. The 'house' is not merely a building: it stands for the social order, caste-based customs, inherited authority, and mental rigidity. Both the demolition of the old structure and construction upon new foundations are demanded together. While acknowledging Mithila's dignity and glory, the poet seeks remedies for its poverty, illiteracy, flattery, and institutional weakness. Rather than merely invoking illustrious ancestors, he emphasises concrete responsibilities in the present.

Single-word lines, abrupt pauses, questions, commands, and sequential declarations give the poem the form of an activist manifesto. The idea of the 'new house' is constructive, although the militaristic language of some lines raises critical questions about its democratic implications. The poem's essential strength is its valuation of social reconstruction above inherited prestige.

24. The Drama of Being Thrust into Yet Another Hell (pp. 57–58)

Descending one flight of steps after another without reaching the end of hell: this opening image shows the cycle of unsuccessful change. One individual or party replaces another, yet the system once again grinds down ordinary people. Amid the celebrations of victory, the poet asks about grief, poison, and darkness. The duty to liberate one's mother tongue and mother is placed above personal convenience.

Towards the end, the insistence 'We need jobs, not knowledge' and 'We need work, not sermons' turns from abstract ideas towards concrete livelihoods. The poem thereby exposes the distance between slogans and social practice. The repetition of 'hell' signifies not an inescapable destiny but systemic oppression capable of being changed.

25. Playing with a Gun against a Yelping Dog (pp. 59–61)

The poet urges young writers not to be intimidated by the status quo. Deceitful administrators, opportunist leaders, politics, and the empty promise of 'eradicating poverty' are subjected to ridicule. The poem regards words, language, and writing as instruments of struggle; in the poet's view, opposing powers are accomplished at changing disguises, so agents of change must remain vigilant.

Addresses such as 'Beware!', 'Watch out!', and 'Be alert!' generate a rhythm of political warning. Images of Gulliver and the scale of mountains reverse familiar proportions. When the linguistic 'weapon' of this text is understood as a metaphor for resistant writing, the obligations of literature become particularly prominent.

26. Vishnuryonim (p. 62)

Departing from conventional syntax, this short experimental poem presents a sequence of isolated words relating to the body, clothing, breath, touch, and sensation. Instead of a unified story or injunction, it offers a fragmented verbal picture of sensory experience. The distance between its Sanskritised title and the vernacular vocabulary of the body invites reflection on the relationship between ritual purity and material sensation.

The placing of individual words on separate lines, empty spaces, and incompleteness of meaning are essential to its craft. To confine sexual experience within a definitive moral verdict would impoverish the possibilities of reading. The visual arrangement of the printed page is especially important here.

27. War (p. 63)

In only a few lines, the poet approaches profound divisions and questions of rights through the image of 'war'. The great distance and gulf between 'us' and 'them' appear difficult to bridge through ordinary accommodation. Because the poem is so short, every word bears the weight of a political decision.

The metaphors of rights, struggle, and distance are exceptionally compressed. 'War' may suggest either a symbolic social confrontation or literal conflict; the task of criticism is not to assume an endorsement of violence but to analyse the pressure exerted by actual inequalities.

28. Unconquerable (p. 63)

Addressing God, the speaker declares his determination not to bow. The confrontation among faith, doubt, and self-respect forms the heart of this miniature poem. Instead of relying on divine power, the speaker trusts his own judgment and resolve.

The resolute bearing of the body—standing with chest expanded—transforms political struggle into an individual ethical commitment. The collection's broad vocabulary of revolt is compressed here into very few words.

29. Dynamism (p. 64)

This short poem accepts identity as an ongoing process of change. The sense of 'I am no longer what I was' signals transformations in life, experience, and thought. The speaker leaves the final judgment of his new self to others.

The unresolved ending of this self-portrait makes the reader an active participant. Amid the collection's collective and declaratory songs, this is a subtle pause for introspection.

30. The State of Affairs (p. 64)

Mithila's social and political landscape is portrayed through images of lions, tigers, dogs, and monkeys. Genuine strength is rare and deceptive imitation is everywhere; nevertheless, the poet retains hope that the masks will fall in due course and real power will awaken again.

Animal metaphors make vernacular satire immediately accessible. The title 'The State of Affairs' promises an account of reality, but the ending establishes a hopeful vision of the future. Its political intent resides in a symbolic structure built around the qualities and failings assigned to the animals.

31. To an Impotent Leader (pp. 65–66)

The title is a sharp satire on the capitulation of leadership. The poet argues that a leader who sacrificed his life in the struggle for his mother tongue would deserve greater respect than one who sold his community's identity for private advantage. Registering another language in the census, extracting personal gain at the expense of the poor, and degrading cultural value are the principal accusations.

The recurring 'I wish' becomes an extreme exaggeration of public ethical responsibility, rather than a literal wish for anyone's death. It is necessary to consider the satirical meaning of such aggressive utterances separately from their literal wording. The poem raises questions of accountability between leaders and the public.

32. Today (pp. 67–68)

The past locked in a box, the present scattered across the road, and the future wandering like a red ray through mist: these three images of time give the poem its direction. Hunger in city and village, light imprisoned in safes, government slogans, and bureaucratic sycophancy become the contradictions of contemporary life. People 'eat' speeches instead of food; inflation and corruption diminish the conditions of civic existence.

Personification and satirical transformation are especially effective here. 'Today' is not simply a date on the calendar but an entire time suspended between a vanished dream of independence and an unfulfilled future.

33. Crime (pp. 69–70)

Demolishing the old house and establishing new social values are called 'crimes': the poet challenges this inverted conception of justice. Traditional codes of conduct, linguistic establishments, and self-serving critics suppress new ideas. The poet experiences repeated punishment for refusing to bow, yet the image of fresh seeds germinating from blood creates a possibility of change that cannot be extinguished.

The title 'Crime' is a satirical inversion: the perpetrator of genuine injustice is respected, while the critic of injustice stands accused. Images of coating words with tar and imposing a death sentence figure the suppression of artistic expression.

34. Vulture (pp. 71–72)

The vulture represents the parasitic character of power. Exploiters feasting on bodies emptied of blood and marrow, rising prices, crises at the country's borders, and domestic terror inhabit the same image. The poet imagines words becoming gunpowder when the system tightens its grip around the people's throats.

Images of wings, mouths, blood, and bones render social humiliation bodily and palpable. The reference to Bangladesh bears witness to a wider political memory of the subcontinent, but one should not attach every metaphor in the poem to a single historical event in a linear manner.

35. Struggle for Liberation (pp. 73–74)

A people crushed beneath a crumbling wall erected by their ancestors constitutes the poem's central image. Beginning with an address to shared suffering, the poet attacks political intermediaries, compromising elites, hunger, and the injustice of food being snatched from people's mouths. The appearance of 'my poetry' and 'my words' shows literature accepting a duty not merely to record society's pain but actively to oppose it.

Images of walls, nails, bones, steel ploughshares, and fire intensify the physical experience of suffering. The final criticism of poverty becoming 'fashionable' identifies literary and political hypocrisy together.

36. Agni-Shikha (pp. 75–76)

The title poem brings together the poetic vision of the entire collection. Amid countless small lights, a single tongue of flame is imagined as capable of piercing intellectual conceit, envy, selfishness, and misgovernment. Images drawn from modern science—'ultraviolet rays', surgery, and the 'operating table'—give a new scientific form to fire's established religious symbolism.

The waiting of father, mother, sister, beloved, and wife reveals the domestic and human stakes of struggle.

The interplay between public action and private grief gives the poem its deep emotional force. Fire is not destruction alone: it also signifies diagnosis of a diseased society, warmth in relationships near death, and a ray of hope. The family's voices humanise the abstract figure of the militant protagonist.

37. His Village: His City (pp. 77–79)

This poem constructs the life story of a disadvantaged individual wandering from village to city. A sequence of villages, towns, and metropolises across Mithila is accompanied by an inventory of fields, orchards, ponds, libraries, lawsuits, untouchability, poverty, unemployment, urban exploitation, and the hunger for office. This geographical list is not simply a record of places; it maps dispersed experiences of labour and humiliation.

Short sentences and repeated full stops convey the broken mobility of an exhausted life. Rather than presenting the village as an immutable paradise or the city as an unqualified hell, the poem reveals the distinct injustices and possibilities of both. Concrete place-names lend authenticity to the poem's social realism.

38. To Those of a Common Conviction (pp. 80–82)

This is a work of political self-examination addressed to people who share a similar ideological ground. The shell of 'Tiger Brand', a speechmaking jackal, people caught in cycles of promises, and the merchant's safe expose the disguises of power. Actual economic inequality is set against claims about democracy, socialism, justice, and the elimination of poverty. The reduction of an individual to a 'vote' is a central sign of a crisis in civic dignity.

Direct address, striking comparisons, and economic vocabulary form the poem's chief devices. It does not categorically reject imported ideas; rather, it questions the emptiness of theories disconnected from local realities.

39. Yama's Journey Abroad (pp. 83–85)

In Yama's absence the state itself has become 'Yamapuri', the realm of death: this satirical narrative premise directs the poem. Crowds in the capital, government officials, the businessman's safe, famine, darkness, terror, student anger, and the failure of justice construct a scene of social death. The mythical Yama marks the cruelty of modern government: the god of death is abroad, but the machinery of death is at work at home.

The transformation of myth, extensive arrangements of objects, and absurd governmental ceremonies are the principal sources of its satire. Modern equipment, economic resources, and ancient narrative appear together to construct a strange political reality.

40. Chameleon (pp. 86–89)

The poet compares the opportunist politician's changes of appearance, flag, party, clothing, and speech to the shifting colours of a chameleon. A sharp contrast emerges between outward politeness and inner exploitation. Masks of praise, prizes, office, public service, and ideology conceal the individual's self-interest. The satire also attacks opportunism in literary establishments, not merely among politicians.

The long succession of changing colours is, in effect, a many-faced drama of moral bankruptcy. The mixture of cosmetics, imported goods, and religious and political symbols reveals the poet's playful yet bitter language. The poem's real centre is not changing one's appearance but changing one's values to protect self-interest.

41. The Banyan Afflicted by Woodworm (pp. 90–94)

The banyan is traditionally a symbol of an old, immense order, cultural protection, and collective shelter. The poet shows that woodworms have invaded its interior: comfort-seeking, bribes, counterfeit patriotism, the defence of caste and lineage, recommendations for awards, and the disregard of popular voices. The poem develops through several marked sections, each revealing a different form of public hypocrisy. Feudal memory and modern institutional corruption appear to support one another.

The image of the diseased tree binds the long poem together. The decorated swan, tiger skin, parade of skeletons, and images of parliament expose fear and the artificiality of prestige. 'Woodworm' suggests a decay that advances from within and is easily concealed by external magnificence.

42. Calcutta and Rajkamal (pp. 95–100)

Centred on Rajkamal Chaudhary, this poem goes beyond a commemorative recollection to recreate the personality of a creative rebel. The poet presents Rajkamal as an advocate of innovation, an opponent of the establishment, and a supporter of the world's younger generation. Calcutta's trams, Kalighat, Behala, prostitution, capital, and exploitation enter as scenes of his conflict-ridden urban world. His bilingual creative work in Maithili and Hindi and references to Kankavati generate literary intertextuality.

The Rajkamal of the poem is not an incontestable body of biographical facts but a creative personality constructed through the poet's judgments. Maintaining this distinction is essential to scholarship. The concentrated language of the city, the body, and fire itself enters into dialogue with Rajkamal's modernist poetic world.

43. There Was So Much I Wanted to Tell You (pp. 101–102)

A cold December evening, a bus stop, a crowd of travellers, and the wait for the 'Two Down' awaken the memory of an old acquaintance, Manjari Dasgupta. Former love, the years of youth, office files, domestic obligations, and inflation come together in the present. The past of love is not merely a sweet recollection: intervening life has been surrounded by economic and familial constraints.

Precise details of urban space and direct address to one person add private delicacy to the collection's generally collective voice. The movement of time, changing appearance, and memory-charged scenes give the poem an autobiographical tone, but the poetic 'I' need not be taken as evidence about the poet's own life.

44. Kavitayah Prativadam (pp. 103–104)

The social responsibility of poetic creation is the central question here. In the midst of communal riots, casteism, political murder, hunger, exploitation, and economic inequality, the poet objects to complacency with writing only hymns of praise, elegies, or love letters. Poetry is established as an ethical force of opposition; writers are called upon to declare where they stand.

The Sanskritised title and direct forms of address such as 'my friend' and 'comrade' create tension at the linguistic level. The final questions—whether the definition of poetry should change and whether poetry should examine itself—turn the work into an ongoing critical dialogue rather than a closed doctrine.

45. Salutation to the Setting Sun (pp. 105–107)

Amid the image of the descending sun and encroaching darkness, the poet perceives a light that continues to struggle. Warriors shining like lamps in the ocean of time, night, gunfire, bombs, the cries of women, and the failure of policing form a shared sequence of scenes. The sun is setting, but the struggle has not ended; fire still burns in villages, towns, and cities.

The sudden transition from a scene of nature to political imagery is the poem's principal compositional method. The salutation signifies not surrender but respect for a sun that never ceases to struggle. Questioning the futility of waiting for heroes, the poet treats the present as an opportunity for people to awaken themselves.

46. Kavitashri Pataliputram (pp. 108–109)

The poem opens with the irony that opposing the government has come to be declared a crime in a democracy. The poet rigorously examines the relationship between poetry and rebellion: when words lose their connection to popular movements, the active participation of farmers and workers, and the struggles of actual life, they become ornaments of the establishment. The distinction between 'rebellion' and 'the semblance of rebellion' is the poem's theoretical centre.

An unusual proliferation of full stops deliberately blurs the boundaries between prose, manifesto, and poetry. Lists of blood, sickles, knives, slogans, and files construct a map of social classes and political power. The poet emphasises literature's political usefulness, alongside which criticism must also raise the question of artistic autonomy.

47. A Copy of a Letter (pp. 110–112)

Addressed to Mohan Bharadwaj, this epistolary poem criticises literary publishing and institutional arrangements. Nepotism, lineage loyalties, official positions, the dominance of established scholars, and systems of patronage obstruct the publication of new writers' books. Mythological examples of Karna, Dadhichi, Ekalavya, Dronacharya, Abhimanyu, and the chakravyuha expose the institutional struggle of a younger generation.

The tension that develops between the affectionate opening, 'Dear Brother', and the final language of battle is particularly striking. Figures from the traditional Mahabharata become metaphors for relations of power within modern publishing. The poem gives concrete form to the collection's self-criticism of literary institutions.

48. People Have Begun to Hear Now (pp. 113–114)

The poem's main assertion is that people have begun to recognise the language of speeches, the ruler's smile, and hollow claims of socialism. Images of young blood, the furnace of hunger, chess moves, and the cremation ground reveal the oppressive character of the ruling class. At the end, the poet refuses to identify as his own a country controlled by criminals and exploiters.

The recurrence of 'now' marks a changing moment in public consciousness. The image of approaching footsteps arouses hope for the arrival of a new sun. Here the people are not merely victims but active historical agents who have begun to scrutinise power.

49. Beware (p. 115)

Written against a background of globalisation, destructive weaponry, terrorism, and the uncertainties of the twenty-first century, this poem calls for collective vigilance. At the level of its utterance, national security, trust in the people's strength, and protection against destructive tendencies in disguise are prominent. The poet's attention now moves beyond Mithila's immediate concerns towards crises in the world order.

Explosive clusters of words and urgent warnings determine the poem's movement. Its demand for decisions grounded in the people gives its concern with security a democratic possibility. The balance between language that generates fear and intelligent caution requires critical examination.

50. Be Alert (p. 116)

This poem is a declaration of the writer's resolve against the status quo, servility, and sycophancy. Silence in the face of political intimidation or government power does not fulfil literature's responsibilities. By calling writing a missile and language a brahmastra, the poet announces the awakening power of words.

Repetition of 'no' creates a rhythm of rejection. Ideologically, the poem enters into dialogue with 'Playing with a Gun against a Yelping Dog' on page 59, but it is not a verbatim reprint of that earlier composition: new political contexts and the metaphor of the 'human bomb' enter this later poem. It is important to preserve that difference in reading.

51. Stay Vigilant (p. 117)

Anarchy, scandals, terrorist violence, criminalisation, and wrongdoing protected by state power form the poem's catalogue of crises. The poet sees the country's soil, water, and people's identity as being at stake. Security is needed not only at the border but also in the ethical conduct of politics and administration.

The title is itself a word of warning. The combined final utterance, 'Be alert, stay vigilant', turns the preceding two poems and this one into a brief trilogy of warnings. Resistant language, public vigilance, and civil rights are intertwined throughout the trilogy.

52. A View of the Nation: At the Threshold of the Twentieth Century (pp. 118–122)

This long poem attempts a comprehensive social and political portrait of the end of the century. The fodder scandal, hawala, St Kitts, commercialised media, consumerist economics, electronic advertising, caste- and religion-based politics, and environmental crisis are connected as aspects of a broad collapse of values. The presence of Western popular culture and Indian classical music 'on one stage' becomes an image of cultural mixture.

News-like details, exchanges of dialogue, and indignant comparisons give the poem the voice of a contemporary chronicle. Rather than treating cultural exchange in itself as decline, criticism needs to analyse separately the causes of the economic inequality, political opportunism, and media enchantment that the poem portrays. This constitutes the critical assessment of a multilayered text.

53. Gujaratnama (pp. 123–124)

'Gujaratnama' is an intense poem of resistance against communal violence. The poet expresses anguish over the cruelty of violent crowds, atrocities against women and children, administrative inaction, and the inhumanity of political triumphalism. The admission 'I feel deeply ashamed' becomes a sense of ethical guilt for failing to stand beside the victims in time.

The title becomes a poetic testimony to the memory of a public event; to cite the accusations within it as historical conclusions requires independent documentary verification. The poem should first be read as a direct statement of human compassion and opposition to communal violence.

54. Chodanalakshano 'rtho Dharmah (pp. 125–131)

A profound contradiction is established between the Sanskrit aphoristic title and the contemporary picture of electoral politics founded on religion, caste, and community. The poem presents an extended picture of kidnapping, ransom, criminalisation, failure of law enforcement, money power, caste fragmentation, and intellectual silence. The question of genuine ethical justice becomes central in the face of deception conducted in religion's name. That the dispossessed remain voiceless even under a supposedly 'democratic' order is the poet's fundamental concern.

Long declarations, report-like details, furious adjectives, and contradictory scenes are its compositional devices. The title's classical language becomes a measure for testing the ethical emptiness of modern political conduct. The original philosophical context of the quoted Sanskrit aphorism must not be confused with its satirical meaning in this poem.

55. The Liberated Market (pp. 132–135)

The collection's final poem focuses on the social consequences of economic liberalisation and market ideology. Amid the appeal of television sets, refrigerators, malls, Big Bazaar, multinational companies, advertising, and foreign products, it depicts the crisis of indigenous industries, the suffering of workers, class inequality, and middle-class aspiration. Even when the market is 'liberated', the lives of the people are not: therein lies the title's central irony.

The poet connects buying and selling, consumer desire, and media influence with caste and communal fragmentation. The final questions direct the reader towards alternatives to the market order, social struggle, and change founded on reason. Research-based criticism can also debate new opportunities generated by markets; the primary text's allegiance to exploited people, however, is explicit.

5. Integrated Critical Assessment

5.1 Distinctive Achievements of the Collection

The principal success of Agni-Shikha lies in placing the concerns of marginalised people at the centre of literary language, while poetry confronts the prejudices, inertia, and institutional hypocrisy of its own cultural community. The collection can be read simultaneously as a record of Maithili linguistic rights, a people's history of Mithila's geography, a forceful instance of political satire, and a laboratory of modern free verse.

5.2 The Tension between Experience and Declaration

When poems present concrete experiences—drought, floods, flatbread made from finger millet, school fees, a waiting mother, bus stops, or workers' bodies—the text acquires particular density. When multiple political slogans, insulting adjectives, or violent symbols accumulate in a single line, the poetry sometimes becomes excessively declaratory. Yet this tension is inseparable from the poet's perception of his time; it must not simply be dismissed but understood in its causes and workings.

5.3 Solidarity with the People and the Limits of Representation

The poet stands unequivocally with workers, women, farmers, students, and disadvantaged communities. Yet not all these figures speak equally in their own voices. Satirical references to women's bodies or caste names call for examination to determine whether a language opposed to exploitation sometimes reproduces inherited terms of humiliation. This question cannot be neglected in a serious assessment of people's literature.

5.4 The Text's Relationship with History

References to Indira, the constitutional movement for linguistic recognition, Naxalites, violence in Gujarat, political scandals, and liberalisation increase the collection's historical significance. But a poem is not a primary historical archive; it is an artistic reconstitution of historical experience. Verifying dates, legal circumstances, and factual claims requires separate research into government records, independent historical documents, and contemporary reporting.

5.5 Dialogue with Rajkamal and Modern Maithili Poetry

Presenting Rajkamal Chaudhary in 'Calcutta and Rajkamal' as a rebel committed to innovation suggests a dialogue within literary tradition. External studies of Rajkamal's modernism emphasise his multilingual practice and experimentation, but this does not mean that these studies automatically prove the judgments voiced by the poet in Agni-Shikha. Mallick's poem remains the primary evidence.

6. Conclusion

In Agni-Shikha, poetry committed to ordinary people develops an extensive critical framework encompassing Mithila's linguistic movement, political discontent, caste, hunger, labour, women's experiences, cultural hypocrisy, and inequalities produced by market ideology. The poems oppose lifeless praise and passive cultural pride. The poet champions the people's knowledge, or lokaveda, while also questioning the established order within it. This contradiction is the source of much of the collection's vitality.

Reading all fifty-five poems makes clear that 'fire' does not invariably signify bloodshed. More often, it stands for the heat of consciousness, self-criticism, dissent from injustice, and the possibility of renewal. Even when the poetry becomes didactic or severe, the human dignity of the people remains its fundamental concern. The book should therefore not be read merely as a collection of political slogans but as a multidimensional literary document of struggles over language, power, and popular life in modern Maithili poetry.

Appendix: All 55 Poems, Original Pages, and Order of the Contents

The sequence follows the fifty entries in the original 'Order of Poems'. Where an entry contains two distinct poems, both are attached to that one original entry number. Composite titles in the original contents are treated here as separate poems.

Five entries in the original sequence contain two separate poems each: entry 6 ('Evening'/'The Maithil Woman'), 7 ('Snake'/'Master Sahib'), 8 ('The Maithili Movement'/'Mini Girl'), 24 ('War'/'Unconquerable'), and 25 ('Dynamism'/'The State of Affairs').

Poem	Original entry	Title	Original page(s)
1	1	From the City to the Village	9–11
2	2	A Morsel of Flesh	12–13
3	3	A Box of Revolution	14–15
4	4	O My Elders, Be Still	16–17

Poem	Original entry	Title	Original page(s)
5	5	Bengal Bandh	18–19
6	6	Evening	20
7	6	The Maithil Woman	20
8	7	Snake	21
9	7	Master Sahib	21
10	8	The Maithili Movement	22
11	8	Mini Girl	22
12	9	My Dear Indira	23–24
13	10	In the Courtyard of Independence	25–26
14	11	Kirtan	27–28
15	12	Cancer	29–30
16	13	The Prayer Room	31–32
17	14	Among Four Hundred Thousand Monkeys	33–34
18	15	In the Name of Our Folk Knowledge	35–39
19	16	Naxalite	40–41
20	17	Electric Pressure	42–44
21	18	Guerrilla Warfare	45–47
22	19	Zero Hour	48–49
23	20	Let a New House Rise: Let the Old House Fall	50–56
24	21	The Drama of Being Thrust into Yet Another Hell	57–58
25	22	Playing with a Gun against a Yelping Dog	59–61
26	23	Vishnuryonim	62
27	24	War	63
28	24	Unconquerable	63
29	25	Dynamism	64
30	25	The State of Affairs	64
31	26	To an Impotent Leader	65–66
32	27	Today	67–68
33	28	Crime	69–70
34	29	Vulture	71–72
35	30	Struggle for Liberation	73–74
36	31	Agni-Shikha	75–76
37	32	His Village: His City	77–79
38	33	To Those of a Common Conviction	80–82

Poem	Original entry	Title	Original page(s)
39	34	Yama's Journey Abroad	83–85
40	35	Chameleon	86–89
41	36	The Banyan Afflicted by Woodworm	90–94
42	37	Calcutta and Rajkamal	95–100
43	38	There Was So Much I Wanted to Tell You	101–102
44	39	Kavitayah Prativadam	103–104
45	40	Salutation to the Setting Sun	105–107
46	41	Kavitashri Pataliputram	108–109
47	42	A Copy of a Letter	110–112
48	43	People Have Begun to Hear Now	113–114
49	44	Beware	115
50	45	Be Alert	116
51	46	Stay Vigilant	117
52	47	A View of the Nation: At the Threshold of the Twentieth Century	118–122
53	48	Gujaratnama	123–124
54	49	Chodanalakshano 'rtho Dharmah	125–131
55	50	The Liberated Market	132–135

CHAPTER 2 • THE LITERATURE OF VIRENDRA MALLICK

Athato Kavya Jijnasa

A study of 46 poems • Nature, globalisation, the mother tongue, and poetry's self-examination

Complete list of poems based on the original table of contents

No.	Poem	Original page(s)	Principal theme
1	The Ashoka Tree	11	Nature, visual scene
2	The Babool Tree	12	Nature, endurance
3	Shyama Sundari	13	Railway movement, nature
4	An Adivasi Home	14	Adivasi communities, home
5	A Message Has Arrived from Patna	15–17	Power, dialogue

No.	Poem	Original page(s)	Principal theme
6	Playing with Poetry on a Heap of Gunpowder	18–21	Violence, resistance
7	Blessed Are the Waters of the Brahmani River	22–26	River, environment
8	There Was Once a Village of Mine	27–32	Village, memory
9	Wandering Like a Stray	33–36	Festival, consumerism
10	Maithili Barni	37–39	Vignettes, nature
11	The Great Hero's Journey through the Forest	40–43	Politics, capital
12	India Shining	44–46	Satire of development
13	Shankaracharya	47–48	Religion, conduct
14	Oh, What a World! Oh, What a World!	49–50	Vernacular satire
15	Ritualism	51–52	Religion, action
16	The Wheel of Time	53–54	Time, judgment
17	Athato Kavya Jijnasa	55–57	Philosophy of poetry
18	Accounts	58–60	Development, accountability
19	Election! Election!	61–62	Elections, slogans
20	Language Standing in the Marketplace	63–64	Language, the market
21	He Will Enjoy Himself! He Will Rule!	65–66	Government, parliamentarianism
22	Rail! Rail!	67–68	Democracy, spectacle
23	The Purana of Leaders	69–70	Satire, politicians
24	Poetry Ready for Sale	71–72	Literature, commodification
25	Keep One Foot Always on the Earth	73–74	Soil, ostentation

No.	Poem	Original page(s)	Principal theme
26	In the Middle of the Road	75	Ordinary people, hunger
27	Dance! Democracy, Dance!	76	Democracy, spectacle
28	There Is No Other Alternative	77–78	Political alternatives
29	I.Q.	79	Education, society
30	Partner	80	Partnership, power
31	In the Name of One's Darling	81–82	Dynasticism, family
32	Intolerance	83–84	Tolerance, society
33	Bullets and Guns	85	Violence, firearms
34	Mother Tongue	86	Mother tongue, education
35	A Rented House	87	Life, transience
36	The Market	88	Markets, capital
37	Globalisation	89–91	Globalisation
38	Message of the Age	92	Historical consciousness, struggle
39	Ta-Ta! Bye-Bye!	93–95	Women, modernity
40	Bhola Babu	96–97	Service to Maithili
41	Soldier of the Pen: Rajkamal	98	Literary memory
42	Discourse on Speech	99–100	Words, literature
43	Thus Spoke Poetry	101–104	Poetry, the world
44	Inside and Outside	105–107	Public and private spheres, politics
45	Hail the Human Race, Hail!	108–109	Humanity, peace
46	Stop the Drama, Sir	110–111	Civic satire

No.	Poem	Original page(s)	Principal theme
6

This collection by Virendra Mallick comprises forty-six poems. Alongside an interpretation of each poem, the discussion considers nature, social resistance, linguistic rights, and questions concerning contemporary civilisation.

Principal Questions in the Collection's Poetic World

Poetry, Life, and Ethical Commitment

In the title poem, 'Athato Kavya Jijnasa', poetry is neither a mere object of entertainment nor an ornamental marvel; it is a sensibility essential to life. Fields, workers, justice, words, the vitality of language, and the deprivation of ordinary people become poetry's field of subject matter. 'Poetry Ready for Sale' presents an inversion of these values: the fear that poetry itself may become merchandise. 'Discourse on Speech' and 'Thus Spoke Poetry' further extend this self-examination of writing. Read together, these four works clarify the poet's philosophy of poetry: it should remove the veil of social untruth without itself dissolving into commercial prestige or mere sermonising.

The Ironies of Democracy, Power, and Public Language

'A Message Has Arrived from Patna', 'Election! Election!', 'He Will Enjoy Himself! He Will Rule!', 'Rail! Rail!', 'The Purana of Leaders', 'Dance! Democracy, Dance!', 'There Is No Other Alternative', and 'Inside and Outside' repeatedly test structures of authority, advertising, government, corruption, and dynastic tendencies. The distance between democracy's vocabulary and the people's experience is the chief tension here. Onomatopoeic titles, exclamations, repetition, and direct address transform the theatricality of public speeches, election slogans, and civic debate into poetry. Yet the poems' directness is both their strength and their risk: many lines become declarations of ideas.

The Market, Consumerism, and Globalisation

'India Shining', 'The Great Hero's Journey through the Forest', 'Language Standing in the Marketplace', 'Poetry Ready for Sale', 'The Market', and 'Globalisation' place criticism of consumer society at their centre. Behind the glitter of development they reveal inequality, cultural commodification, insecurity among workers, and the utilitarian devaluation of language. For the poet, the market is not merely a place for buying and selling; it is a framework of social judgment in which profit rather than humanity becomes the measure of value. The clash between the glittering title 'India Shining' and the poem's scenes of labour rooted in the material world is an effective technique.

Village, Forest, River, and a Changing Ecology

'The Ashoka Tree', 'The Babool Tree', 'Shyama Sundari', 'An Adivasi Home', 'Blessed Are the Waters of the Brahmani River', 'There Was Once a Village of Mine', and 'Wandering Like a Stray' move beyond conventional descriptions of natural beauty. Felled trees, train windows, displaced settlements, pollution, the destruction of forests, the memory of rivers, and chaotic collective scenes together form a record of a changing earth. Several poems begin with small scenes before developing into extended social narratives. This expansion allows a reading of the connections between natural imagery and structures of power.

Language, Mother Tongue, and Cultural Identity

'Maithili Barni', 'Mother Tongue', 'Bhola Babu', and 'Language Standing in the Marketplace' suggest that language is not simply an instrument of communication but a site of generational memory and collective self-respect. The ascendancy of English, educational policy, publishing prestige, and pressures surrounding linguistic choices preoccupy the poet. The brief sections of 'Maithili Barni' create an experience of regional life through separate scenes. 'Bhola Babu' marks public awakening to the mother tongue through a particular personality. In this poetic vision, love for Maithili acquires political meaning rather than remaining mere sentimental attachment.

Class, Caste, Adivasi Communities, and the Dispossessed

The poet calls for reading social inequality at two levels: intimate personal suffering and structural injustice. In 'An Adivasi Home', natural surroundings coexist with deprivation; in 'Playing with Poetry on a Heap of Gunpowder', class consciousness, violence, displacement, and resistance enter complex relationships. 'There Is No Other Alternative' portrays the unbearable consequences of hunger and political inaction. When the poet speaks on behalf of the dispossessed, the critic must also observe that these figures often lack extended voices of their own, appearing instead within the poet's ethical pronouncements. Such questioning does not diminish the importance of the collection; it makes its reading more responsible.

Religion, Ritualism, and Ethical Judgment

'Shankaracharya', 'Ritualism', 'The Wheel of Time', and 'Oh, What a World! Oh, What a World!' criticise religious authority, arrogance, deception, and ethical decline more than religion as such. The poet investigates the relationship between action and conduct. 'Ritualism' portrays the absence of high standards and contradictions enacted in the names of education and industry; 'The Wheel of Time' distrusts a linear doctrine of progress. It would be inappropriate to find in these texts a rejection of all forms of belief. Their essential targets are the political misuse of religious symbols and insensitivity to human suffering.

Women's Experience and Social Inequality

'Ta-Ta! Bye-Bye!' stages tensions among modernity, the body, education, respect for women, and patriarchal perception. The living conception of the river in 'Blessed Are the Waters of the Brahmani River' and the intervention against women's inequality in 'Stop the Drama, Sir' broaden the discussion. The poet's sympathy lies with women's dignity, yet some representations may turn women into symbols of social debate rather than autonomous narrators; that critical caution is indispensable.

Literary Memory and the Tradition of People's Poets

'Soldier of the Pen: Rajkamal', 'Bhola Babu', 'Discourse on Speech', and the title poem establish a self-dialogue with literary tradition. Rajkamal's creativity, Bhola Babu's contributions to language, memories of earlier poetry, and the contemporary poet's predicament converge as subjects of criticism. The combination of the classical 'athato' and modern colloquial speech is distinctive to this poetic world. The poet refuses to detach poetic form from humanity and social justice.

Linguistic Craft: Invocation, Repetition, and Multilayered Vocabulary

Alongside fundamental Maithili grammar and vernacular speech, the collection employs Sanskrit-derived vocabulary, political expressions borrowed through Hindi, English-inflected titles ('I.Q.', 'India Shining', 'Intolerance', 'Dance! Democracy, Dance!'), and modern technical and social terminology. This combination is no simple linguistic deviation: the poems' social world is itself multilingual. Forms such as 'achhi', 'san', 'ken', 'bha', 'jakan', 'kakaro', and 'muda' establish the underlying Maithili idiom. Repeated phrases, satirical forms of address, disrupted rhythms, interrogative utterances, and catalogues of accusations produce a kind of poetry suited to a public platform. Lyrical miniatures and extended free verse coexist.

Contradictions and Artistic Achievements

The collection's major virtues are its unequivocal solidarity with ordinary people, its courageous engagement with contemporary subjects, and its ease of movement between language and nature. The brief nature poems offer restrained imagery; long social poems develop rapid utterance; satirical compositions evoke the cadence of slogans. There are limits, too: the poet often names issues so directly that the reader may have less room for discovery, while recurrent terms such as 'market', 'corruption', 'development', and 'imperialism' sometimes make the voices of individual poems resemble one another. Nevertheless, the diversity of contexts and tonal elements prevents the collection from becoming a single political manifesto.

Critical Study, Poem by Poem

1. The Ashoka Tree

Original page: 11 | Principal theme: Nature, visual scene

The poem opens with a scene of greenery before a dak bungalow, glittering water, a boundary wall, and a young woman wearing a 'swimming suit'. The ashoka tree standing in the middle is nature's silent presence. On one side lies the modern world of decoration and luxury; on the other, a surviving tree. In this brief picture, the poet's eye fills a public scene with social significance. The tree's name also sounds a subtle note of cultural memory.

Brevity is the poem's chief formal quality. It does not deliver an extended political argument but selects a single scene. Readers must consider for themselves the relationship between the tree's steadfast presence and the exhibition of human consumption. That the collection opens with such a restrained image of nature is significant, for later poems connect nature with the much larger questions of market ideology, inequality, and destruction.

2. The Babool Tree

Original page: 12 | Principal theme: Nature, endurance

The rough, weathered body of a babool tree, its thin broken branches, its thorns, and the sky with pigeons create an image of difficult vitality. Though it has neither flowers nor fruit, the tree remains standing; the harshness of time is inscribed upon its body. A leaf here, a flower there, an occasional trace: instead of conventional nature appreciation, these become memories of struggle.

Read beside 'The Ashoka Tree', the poem reveals contrasts between greenness and barrenness, a landscaped enclosure and neglected life. The poet does not simply pronounce the babool ugly; he sketches the contours of its resistant existence. Short descriptive lines and visually oriented language give the poem restraint.

3. Shyama Sundari

Original page: 13 | Principal theme: Railway movement, nature

Dark hills visible from a train window, distant expanses of greenery, trees left behind, and repeatedly changing scenes form the basis of the poem. The name 'Shyama Sundari' personifies the hills as a newly married woman who appears shyly and fleetingly. A delicate beauty emerges from the difference between the train's movement and the stillness of natural objects.

The moving field of vision is important to the poem. The window does not offer entry into nature; it frames nature as something seen from a distance. Awareness of this distance is connected with the collection's subsequent treatment of displacement from villages. The flowing, unforced lines contain affectionate similes; when the title's aesthetic possibilities are read alongside other social themes, the range of the poet's experience becomes apparent.

4. An Adivasi Home

Original page: 14 | Principal theme: Adivasi communities, home

A mountain hollow, a clear blue sky, fragments of light, a distant chasm, the dry leaves of high summer, and a momentary flash of lightning produce a picture of an Adivasi settlement. Closeness to nature and the dilapidation of the dwelling occupy the same scene; the poet does not equate natural beauty with complete happiness.

The poem's social meaning resides in its restrained structure. Though it describes deprivation, it does not reduce the people to mere objects of pity; it presents their existence through place, season, and the components of everyday life. Critically, one should observe that the Adivasi community does not speak at length in its own voice here: the poet works through an external, visually sensitive perspective. That limit is central to testing the poem's realist implications.

5. A Message Has Arrived from Patna

Original pages: 15–17 | Principal theme: Power, dialogue

The opening statement—about the breakdown of human fellowship, the erosion of class consciousness, and the expansion of self-interest in place of affectionate relationships—identifies a crisis of metropolitan political consciousness. Patna is not merely a geographical reference but a sign of the centres of power and communication. The poem gradually moves from private life towards the literary world and public struggle.

This long free-verse composition employs repetition, dramatic turns, and accusatory sentences. An irony emerges between the 'dialogue' of the title and the description of a society unable to converse. The poet asks what role poetry can retain where a society has stopped listening to its own people. At times the rhythm approaches political oratory, but that very oratorical quality captures an unsettled historical moment.

6. Playing with Poetry on a Heap of Gunpowder

Original pages: 18–21 | Principal theme: Violence, resistance

The poem opens with self-questioning: for what offence am I suffering punishment, what burden of a curse from an earlier birth do I carry, and in what deserted terrain have I become trapped? Fields, forests, caste and class divisions, urbanisation, and exploitation then accumulate as scenes. The 'heap of gunpowder' is the smouldering foundation of a violent society; to play with poetry upon it suggests the moral courage required to remain alive.

In this long composition, the 'I' comes to represent not only an individual but the suppressed consciousness of society. Nature, home, labour, rights, and social injustice are interwoven. The extended movement of free verse brings personal testimony and collective utterance together. Its strength is its insistence that poetry remain a voice amid fear; its artistic risk is that the sheer abundance of subjects sometimes turns images into a catalogue.

7. Blessed Are the Waters of the Brahmani River

Original pages: 22–26 | Principal theme: River, environment

The Brahmani River's waters, feet immersed in them, ripples, contact with water, and ever-renewed sensations constitute the poem's experiential centre. The river is not merely a natural resource: it becomes a symbol of the body, memory, thirst, the flow of life, and the mutual creativity of women and men. The experience of water's sacredness arises not from fixed ritual but from direct bodily and sensory experience.

The poem is comparatively long and employs an undulating syntax corresponding to the movement of water. Through the river, the poet articulates an idea of the rebirth of natural energy. In contrast to the small scene of 'The Ashoka Tree', nature here becomes a philosophy of the entirety of experience. Yet the images should not simply be categorised as mysticism; they deserve to be related to the social importance of the natural world.

8. There Was Once a Village of Mine

Original pages: 27–32 | Principal theme: Village, memory

'There Was Once a Village of Mine' is a moving declaration of memory. The family homestead, mango and bakain trees, neem, the grandfather, tastes associated with fairs, games, folk festivals, neighbours, and countless village scenes emerge in succession. Against them, the present shows how the village's identity, traditions, and social relationships have changed. The word 'was' becomes the poem's governing consciousness of time.

This is not merely a celebration of a sweet past but a social elegy for a damaged communal life. Tensions in caste relationships, newer political practices, the decline of linguistic culture, and changing lifestyles disclose the harsher side behind nostalgia. The long catalogue sometimes creates intimacy and intensity, sometimes demands patience from the reader. Nevertheless, the poem is important for the cultural study of the modern Maithil village.

9. Wandering Like a Stray

Original pages: 33–36 | Principal theme: Festival, consumerism

Decorated pandals, Durga Puja, uncontrolled crowds, stages, fashion, 'challenges', 'duplicates', and newly consumerist display create an image of restless masses. The experience of 'wandering like a stray' in the title metaphorically figures society's loss of direction: people keep moving, but the connections between movement and purpose have broken down.

The fragmentary arrangement of different scenes imitates the clamour of urban festivals. When religious celebration, entertainment, stage culture, and commerce become a single spectacle, the poet asks where human judgment remains. The poem succeeds in its multivoiced language; its limitation is that the poet's objections to the cultural scene sometimes reduce broad social distinctions to one general fault.

10. Maithili Barni

Original pages: 37–39 | Principal theme: Vignettes, nature

This poem is composed of several numbered miniature sections. Lamps, the heart, leaves and falling leaves, water, skeletal trees, silence, and the changing forms of nature create a sequence of small scenes. Each section resembles a vignette; meaning is communicated through suggestion and pauses more than through full exposition.

The title 'Barni' draws the reader towards colours of experience and differing shades of nature. In formal terms, the poem differs radically from the collection's extended political and oratorical passages. Its extremely short lines, sparse words, and unspoken meanings invite a reading as a sequence of independent miniatures or minute images. The experiment is important evidence of the collection's expressive diversity.

11. The Great Hero's Journey through the Forest

Original pages: 40–43 | Principal theme: Politics, capital

Democracy, republican government, official publicity, currency, trade, foreign corporations, and the immense network of capital form the poem's background. The ironic use of 'great hero' critiques the heroic image manufactured by those in power; the 'journey through the forest' suggests social darkness, lost direction, and a wilderness of uncontrolled capital amid supposed progress.

The poem places political economics and publicity machinery in one landscape. The lack of resources among ordinary people and governmental mismanagement confront public pronouncements of prosperity. Long lines and densely accumulated names of things make its satire sharp. The accusations should not be treated as substitutes for historical statistics: they are above all a poetic indictment based on social experience.

12. India Shining

Original pages: 44–46 | Principal theme: Satire of development

Industrialisation, globalisation, consumer markets, and the sharp divide between workers and the poor on one side and wealthy groups on the other lie at the poem's centre. Behind the gleaming image of 'shining' appear hunger, unemployment, loss, and human devastation. The advertising language of the English title and the poem's social inequalities create opposing meanings.

The principal satirical technique is to confront the conventional vocabulary of 'progress' with concrete experience. The poet does not accept glitter as the whole truth. Economic terminology adds ideological rigour, yet the pain of the poem is most intense in the lines closest to a human voice. It is useful to read this composition alongside 'Accounts' and 'The Market'.

13. Shankaracharya

Original pages: 47–48 | Principal theme: Religion, conduct

Against a background of unrest across the country, economic insecurity, unemployment, political self-interest, and growing frenzy in religion's name, this poem questions the conduct of spiritual leadership. The title invokes a historical and cultural designation, but the world depicted reveals a gulf between religious eminence and responsibility towards humanity.

The poet targets the political exploitation of unquestioning devotion and structures of prestige alienated from popular suffering. Through lists, questions, and ethical objections, the poem subjects religious authority to a social examination. It would be premature to read it as an attack on all spirituality; its core question is how far the proclaimers of lofty ideals are responsible to society's suffering.

14. Oh, What a World! Oh, What a World!

Original pages: 49–50 | Principal theme: Vernacular satire

The poem opens with an exclamation from popular speech. Heaps of lies, scattered relationships, casteism, borrowed Marxist ideas, the image of Durga, and public deception combine in the poet's experience of contradictions everywhere. The recurring cry 'Oh, what a world!' conveys surprise, anguish, and satire at once.

The composition follows a sequence of indignation more than one of logical argument. Its exclamation returns like the refrain of a folk song, bringing the sound of a popular stage to the reader. In parallel, it asks where human trust can rest when religion, ideology, and justice survive only as names. The risk of generalisation deserves attention alongside the poem's cutting force.

15. Ritualism

Original pages: 51–52 | Principal theme: Religion, action

The distance between high ideals of conduct and actual behaviour forms the poem's basic opposition. Education, industry, corruption, exploitation, terror, wrongdoing, and human self-interest are connected to the discussion of religious practice. 'Ritualism' signifies not only rites of worship but also social activity without ethical consequences.

The poem reflects upon cycles of cause and effect: if education concerning action becomes a hollow label, character does not develop. Its lines favour direct statement over imagery, and social diagnosis predominates. The placement of this poem immediately before 'The Wheel of Time' matters because the next composition raises wider questions about the relationship between time and action.

16. The Wheel of Time

Original pages: 53–54 | Principal theme: Time, judgment

The poem calls for abandoning the inertia of the past and building the future through action in the present, while criticising false fatalism, the opposition between heaven and hell, and hollow reasoning. The movement of time becomes evidence against superstition. The poet brings the familiar spiritual suggestion of the 'wheel of time' into the realm of rational thought and social action.

Brief declarative lines carry the movement of ideas. Time is not simply an immutable cycle of destiny but also offers the possibility of human intervention. The poem constructs a counterpoint to 'Ritualism': action in place of ritual, judgment in place of blind belief. Although its rational argument makes the meaning unusually direct, the poem expresses the collection's ethical centre at the level of historical consciousness.

17. Athato Kavya Jijnasa

Original pages: 55–57 | Principal theme: Philosophy of poetry

The title poem asks a direct question: where should poetry be heard? Its answer is: in life, in hunger, in the vital breath of language and words, and on the side of unemployed people, workers, farmers, and those denied justice. The colours of fields, grain and ears of wheat, the posture of the rich and the gait of the poor—all these social images appear in a single work.

The philosophical seriousness of 'athato' and poetry's pledge to ordinary people combine to form the collection's poetics. The poem attempts to define itself, but locates the value of words in social usefulness rather than the poet's personal ambition. Read with 'Poetry Ready for Sale' and 'Thus Spoke Poetry', the oppositions between value and exchange and between creative writing and publicity become particularly clear.

18. Accounts

Original pages: 58–60 | Principal theme: Development, accountability

The work is set against government claims about development, pride in governance, announcements of awards, development statistics, and public publicity. The poet demands an accounting between glittering speeches and the experience of ordinary people. 'Accounts' is not merely a term from bookkeeping but an ethical measure of democratic accountability.

Repetition of administrative language becomes mocking. To what extent do the achievements proclaimed through advertisements and honours actually enter people's lives? That is the fundamental question. The optimistic publicity of 'India Shining' becomes the subject of scrutiny in this poem. Its strength lies in disclosing contradictions within official speech; its limitation is a relative scarcity of restrained visual imagery.

19. Election! Election!

Original pages: 61–62 | Principal theme: Elections, slogans

The election marketplace returning after five years, prominent politicians rising upon slender supports, colourful vehicles travelling from village to village, folded hands, promises showered upon every home, and a temporary trade in trust become the ironies of democracy's festival. The title's repetition makes the clamour of election publicity audible.

The poem reveals a contradiction between the fleeting intimacy of politicians and voters and their enduring separation. Before elections the people become important, but their expectations may go unheard once the results are known. The rhythm of vernacular speech, satirical inventories, and dramatic turns give the work a theatrical effect. It does not wholly reject democracy but asks how democracy may be made meaningful.

20. Language Standing in the Marketplace

Original pages: 63–64 | Principal theme: Language, the market

The poem directly addresses the danger that language may become an advertising instrument and a commodity for profit. The intimacy of linguistic exchange declines, the medium of communication becomes a commercial sign, and the roles of electronic and print media become contentious. The title personifies language as a human being standing in the market, and this image conveys profound insecurity.

Read alongside 'Mother Tongue' and 'Globalisation', the poem raises questions of the political economy of language. In whose hands is language? Who profits from it? Where can its creative value survive? The poet does not fully answer these questions but defends the independent importance of the people's language. The image of buying and selling words is exceptionally suggestive.

21. He Will Enjoy Himself! He Will Rule!

Original pages: 65–66 | Principal theme: Government, parliamentarianism

The shameless self-interest of the political class, the shelter of professed secularism, the pleasures of office, parliament's self-absorbed behaviour, and the humiliation of ordinary people are the poem's central concerns. The repeated 'he' in the title points towards the ruling class; in contrast, the 'we', or the people, remains silent yet present.

The poem is written in an accusatory tone, with repetition and rhyme intensifying the rhythm of popular anger. Its negative image of parliamentary conduct clashes with democratic values. The poet exposes the irony of pursuing self-interest in the name of national welfare. Criticism must nevertheless remember that the composition records the political reaction of a particular poetic voice, not an independently verified sociological account of every legislator or institution.

22. Rail! Rail!

Original pages: 67–68 | Principal theme: Democracy, spectacle

Competition between parties in parliament, the appetite for office, corruption, slogans about women's rights, policy questions, and public disillusionment supply the poem's main material. Unlike an ordinary description of a railway train, the title 'Rail' suggests the noise and motion of running about, pushing, and ceaseless activity in parliament.

Public issues crowd irregularly into line after line. This form deliberately imitates political congestion. Where 'Election! Election!' portrays the electoral stage, 'Rail! Rail!' concentrates on disintegration inside a representative institution. The poem demands meaningful work in the public interest, but its direct accusations sometimes restrict the development of metaphor.

23. The Purana of Leaders

Original pages: 69–70 | Principal theme: Satire, politicians

Short, forceful lines such as 'Ministers, fixers, leaders, thieves' form the poem's central rhythm. Brief sections on corrupt officials, police, electoral opportunism, exploitation, oppression of women, and the dominance of criminals give the word 'purana' a satirical new meaning. In place of a traditional grand narrative, we encounter a compilation of modern political vices.

Both metaphor and poetic arrangement are distinctive: the two-line units resemble folk sayings or caustic aphorisms. Each section delivers an independent blow, but together they reveal the persistent futility of the established order. Their concision is entirely unlike the expansiveness of 'The Great Hero's Journey through the Forest'. The immediate satirical impact is considerable, although fine distinctions among social complexities receive relatively little attention.

24. Poetry Ready for Sale

Original pages: 71–72 | Principal theme: Literature, commodification

Taking 'Poetry is being sold in the marketplace' as its premise, this composition offers a fierce criticism of the commodification of creativity. When poems of different colours, shapes, and emotions become merchandise, the relationship between literary sensibility and prestige changes. Poetry, which ought to speak truths about human sorrow and happiness, faces the danger of becoming an exhibition object within consumer society.

The poem's most effective image is the poetry market. It provides an inverse story to the ideal set out in 'Athato Kavya Jijnasa'. If a writer who gives voice to social suffering becomes trapped in the prices of publication, praise, and commercial exchange, how much of poetry's original purpose can survive? The poet compels listeners and readers to consider the answer. The satire is direct and its possibilities for self-criticism are extensive.

25. Keep One Foot Always on the Earth

Original pages: 73–74 | Principal theme: Soil, ostentation

Clothing, celebrities, film stars, unreal spectacles, empty glitter, wasteful wedding celebrations, and contradictions in social lifestyles appear in this poem. The title makes an ethical appeal not to sever one's connection with life's ground. 'Earth' signifies not only geography but labour, practical judgment, and the realities of ordinary people.

Its criticism of ostentation sometimes leaps from one subject to another. The fragmented construction places many incongruous scenes of modern public life together. Its powerful message is that ambition and prestige should remain connected to a human foundation. At times the logical bridges between examples are weak, but the unity supplied by the title gives them a common ethical centre.

26. In the Middle of the Road

Original page: 75 | Principal theme: Ordinary people, hunger

An ordinary person standing in the middle of a road, smoke rising everywhere, hunger, unemployment, public life as performance, and political agitation form the poem's centre. The road symbolises democratic public space; the helplessness of the person standing in its middle becomes an image of the neglect of the people as a whole.

The poem shows a connection between material deprivation and estrangement from public institutions. Directional words—north, south, east, west—convey the ubiquity of the problem. Short lines and direct statements make the work readily communicable. Its great question is how far the true value of democracy can be measured from the voice of the person standing in the road.

27. Dance! Democracy, Dance!

Original page: 76 | Principal theme: Democracy, spectacle

The repeated demand to 'dance' is an auditory image satirising the transformation of democratic public life into theatre. Amid injustice, displays of official power, exploitation of women, corruption, and the noise of the masses, democracy seems to perform a dance. The combination of the English word 'democracy' with Maithili- and Hindi-inflected utterances exposes contradictions in modern political speech.

Repetition like a song's refrain intensifies the satire. Democracy here is not an ideal but a spectacle being sold upon a stage. Unlike several related political poems, this work assumes the form of an audible performance: power itself becomes a drama. The poet's dissent is not indifference towards democratic values but a demand for genuinely democratic conduct.

28. There Is No Other Alternative

Original pages: 77–78 | Principal theme: Political alternatives

Amid the country's deterioration, the anguish of the poor, hunger and thirst, weak leadership, corrupt institutions, and the opportunism of parties, the people remain deprived. The title sounds like a declaration of despair, but the poem also insists on the necessity of changing the system. The supposed absence of alternatives can become a critique of the artificial compulsion invoked in political speeches.

Ethical anguish dominates the composition. The underlying question reaches the reader: if people have been deceived in their hopes and aspirations, is this a time to remain inactive? Following 'Election!' and 'Dance! Democracy, Dance!', this poem moves the crisis beyond electoral scenes to the level of social alternatives.

29. I.Q.

Original page: 79 | Principal theme: Education, society

Poverty, hungry children, the education system, society's ethical direction, and the responsibilities of the educated class feature in this poem. The title invoking the modern intelligence quotient, 'I.Q.', clashes with the practical crises of ordinary people. What is the social purpose of knowledge if education cannot comprehend hunger and human injustice? That is its fundamental question.

The English title symbolises a method of measuring intelligence, whereas the subject addresses elementary values of life. Satire arises from the contrast. The poet does not simply reject technical expertise; he advocates the social responsibility of knowledge. Lines relating to mentors, teachers, and youth place educational thinking on an ethical foundation.

30. Partner

Original page: 80 | Principal theme: Partnership, power

The familiar address of friendship and partnership gradually becomes a satire of global power relations. References to a 'Kamasutra bed-partner', America, and opportunism attack the commercial meaning acquired by relationships. 'Partner' moves from private life to signify alliances within political economy.

The poem's style is conversational, ironic, and multilayered. Its underlying question concerns whom one should stand beside in a social crisis and how far compromises with others can remain ethical. It is interconnected with 'India Shining' and 'Globalisation', since all three are concerned with the intrusion of the market into life.

31. In the Name of One's Darling

Original pages: 81–82 | Principal theme: Dynasticism, family

Building a chain of names—Aditya, Anand, Sarvanand, Dipit, Dinesh, and others—the poet questions attachment to one's 'darling', favouritism towards children, and the pursuit of fame and wealth. The proliferation of names begins as a kind of game, but then reveals family ambition, social prestige, and the distribution of resources.

The poem's formal device is enumeration. The sequence of ordinary family names discloses social prejudice and the political shadow of dynastic descent. Here one can see the smaller, domestic form of the family-centred political structures found in 'He Will Enjoy Himself!' and 'Inside and Outside'. There is a danger of generalisation from a few names, but the title's domestic familiarity lends the satire its sting.

32. Intolerance

Original pages: 83–84 | Principal theme: Tolerance, society

Old and younger generations, changing social behaviour, manners of speech, displays of clothing, new orthodoxies in the name of dissent, injustice, and the loss of patience form the poem's subjects. The title adopts a contemporary English term of debate, but the poet asks whether tolerance is merely a slogan or a value practised in daily life.

The poem touches upon tensions among disagreement, social discipline, and human respect. Its lines suggest a diminishing ability to listen to one another and a tendency to make political judgments on outward appearances.

It would not be reasonable automatically to treat changing fashion or younger people's conduct as ethical decline; the poem's force lies in its experience of intolerance, which merits wider reflection.

33. Bullets and Guns

Original page: 85 | Principal theme: Violence, firearms

Smoke over village and city, bullets and guns, endangered green trees, grief in parliament, the helplessness of police, and the disturbed condition of young people suggest the normalisation of violence. The direct naming of weapons in the title establishes an atmosphere of fear. The poem attacks the gulf between the security of life and democratic institutions.

This is an extremely concise composition. It connects the terror of ordinary life, the state's ineffectiveness, and the insecurity of future generations in very few words. The expansive fear of 'Playing with Poetry on a Heap of Gunpowder' is here condensed into a sharp aphoristic statement. Its economy of form distinguishes the poem from the longer political compositions.

34. Mother Tongue

Original page: 86 | Principal theme: Mother tongue, education

The burden of books and exercise books, pressure from the education system, the dominance of English, neglect of regional languages, and fear of cultural destruction are the central concerns of 'Mother Tongue'. The poem argues that when education is separated from the emotional world of one's language, the foundations of intimate knowledge weaken. The mother tongue is not simply another subject but the underlying ground of family, culture, and memory.

The poet calls for change in education and everyday practice to protect the language. He criticises the elevation of one language alone by pushing regional languages aside. The market pressure in 'Language Standing in the Marketplace', the constructive history of linguistic activism in 'Bhola Babu', and the practical problem of education in this poem together form a comprehensive triangle of linguistic debate.

35. A Rented House

Original page: 87 | Principal theme: Life, transience

The world is a rented house, people are its tenants, everything is temporary, and the ultimate landlord is omnipresent: this compressed metaphor constitutes the entire poem. Away from the clamour of political satire, the poet considers life's impermanence and the illusion of ownership.

The poem's striking feature is its minimal length. The simplicity of its sentences conveys the whole sense that nothing remains permanently in one place. This work serves as a spiritual and symbolic pause amid extensive social criticism. In the context of the many poems that question property and power, the metaphor of the 'landlord' also acquires more complex significance.

36. The Market

Original page: 88 | Principal theme: Markets, capital

India is presented as a vast marketplace, people as customers, foreign companies as powerful merchants, and communities as bonded participants. Both goods and desires are caught within the logic of exchange. The market is gaining power not only over commodities but over the decisions people make about their lives.

Despite its brevity, the poem is central to the collection's economic satire. What many other poems explain through extensive examples, 'The Market' condenses almost into an aphorism. 'India Shining', 'Language Standing in the Marketplace', and 'Globalisation' elaborate its argument. 'Poetry Ready for Sale' reveals the effects of the same logic of exchange upon culture.

37. Globalisation

Original pages: 89–91 | Principal theme: Globalisation

Globalisation, industry, trade, customs, food, and rapid changes in the younger generation's lifestyle constitute the poem's principal material. The material culture of one country enters another and alters the marks of local life. Mixtures of languages and behaviours are visible expressions of this historical process.

Modern vocabulary itself becomes material for criticism. The poet refuses to equate global connections with prosperity alone, questioning them in terms of balances of power, local production, culture, and social equality. The poem does not, however, establish through explicit evidence that all forms of international contact are unequal. Its target is globalisation's dominating aspect.

38. Message of the Age

Original page: 92 | Principal theme: Historical consciousness, struggle

Moving beyond memories of times past, the poem attempts to direct the present towards a challenging future. The people are suffering, society has lost direction, and the repetition of history has become oppressive; in these circumstances, collective struggle and a commitment to social change are deemed necessary.

The poem is not merely didactic but an inspiration to collective action. The suggestion that 'our land is not barren; recognise its strength of spirit' awakens possibility rather than despair. It is a constructive response to the consciousness of time in 'The Wheel of Time': understanding the past is meaningful only when followed by action directed towards the future. The exhortatory voice is effective despite the relatively straightforward free verse.

39. Ta-Ta! Bye-Bye!

Original pages: 93–95 | Principal theme: Women, modernity

Relations between women and men, the spread of education, outward modernity, patriarchal pressure, and women's dignity feature in this poem.

'Ta-Ta! Bye-Bye!' initially suggests a speaker bidding farewell to an ending relationship or era, but the following lines reveal an ongoing conflict between inherited values and modern ostentation.

The poem upholds respect for women yet simultaneously expresses suspicion towards new public displays of lifestyle. Its reading is therefore complex: women's freedom, social conventions, and modernity cannot all be weighed by the same measure. The work's contribution is to bring questions of women's experience into public debate; critics should leave its culturally inherited assumptions open to examination.

40. Bhola Babu

Original pages: 96–97 | Principal theme: Service to Maithili

'Bhola Babu' praises a promoter of the mother tongue, a defender of social consciousness, a participant in public awakening for Mithila and Maithili, and a figure associated with literary institutions. Through a particular person, the poem illuminates the memory of the linguistic movement and the importance of collective labour.

Its tone differs from the other fiercely political poems: respect, gratitude, and awareness of a cultural debt dominate. Where 'Mother Tongue' exposes a crisis, 'Bhola Babu' presents the possibility of protecting the language through human action. A feature of biographical verse is its enumeration of names and deeds; independent sources are required to verify the factual life, but within the poem the figure symbolises service to Maithili.

41. Soldier of the Pen: Rajkamal

Original page: 98 | Principal theme: Literary memory

This poem is a remembrance of Rajkamal Chaudhary marked by homage and intellectual affinity. His memory is presented through the figures of a rebellious writer, a portrayer of women's suffering, an experimental artist of fiction and poetry, and a fearless poetic voice. The 'soldier of the pen' in the title gives the writer's work an ethical dimension of struggle.

References to Rajkamal's works and examples of conflicting values build this composition of memory. It is one poet's poetic assessment of another, not a substitute for a factual biography. Through this remembrance, the creative commitment of 'Athato Kavya Jijnasa' connects with the modern tradition of rebellious Maithili literature. A critical reading, even while respecting the poem's homage, does not confine the complexity of Rajkamal's writing to this single work.

42. Discourse on Speech

Original pages: 99–100 | Principal theme: Words, literature

Poetry collections, words, linguistic meaning, sensibility, and the position of writing in modern society occupy the centre of this poem. Reflecting upon artworks, the poet observes the transformation of meaning within words. The meeting of the classical 'vak', or speech, with the modern critical meaning of 'discourse' presents a philosophy of creation within the title itself.

The poem's distinguishing quality is its critical dialogue. It relates the promise of earlier writing, the development of contemporary words, and society's changing needs. 'Poetry Ready for Sale' explores the danger of the market; 'Discourse on Speech' attempts to defend the independent, sensitive force of words. Through this poetic sequence, readers see a writer thinking about literature from within literature itself.

43. Thus Spoke Poetry

Original pages: 101–104 | Principal theme: Poetry, the world

Poetry itself speaks: the vast sky, colours of the popular mind, cities and villages, classes and castes, different countries, nature, and history enter a single poetic vision. The classical register of 'uvacha' expresses a modern global plurality. Humanity, the earth, the expansion of life, and its crises appear throughout the poem's many lines.

Here the answer to the question raised in 'Athato Kavya Jijnasa' is expanded: poetry is not merely a catalogue of deprivation but a sensitive reading of the whole world. The poem's expansive lists create a world map. Yet a question remains about how distinctly individual human voices survive within this breadth; in places the speed of enumeration may obscure the depth of experience. Nevertheless, its global aspiration of poetic consciousness is significant.

44. Inside and Outside

Original pages: 105–107 | Principal theme: Public and private spheres, politics

Opium trafficking, police officers, contracting, political brokerage, property development, and accumulation of wealth blur the boundary between public office and private profit. The title 'Inside and Outside' establishes a satire on the privatisation of power: what ought to remain public duty becomes a means of advancing household and family interests.

As titles of various offices are added to the poem's language, they take the form of a political network. Read with 'In the Name of One's Darling' and 'He Will Enjoy Himself! He Will Rule!', the connections between dynasticism and institutional corruption become apparent. The work's ethical question is piercing; social attack predominates over elaborate poetic imagery.

45. Hail the Human Race, Hail!

Original pages: 108–109 | Principal theme: Humanity, peace

From destructive endeavours in human history, figures resembling Ravana, terror, weapons of mass slaughter, and fears for the earth's future, the poem ultimately affirms the human values of life. Its title is an acclamation, but not a simple slogan of enthusiasm: it demands the preservation of human dignity after the appearance of every destructive force.

The poem joins mythological and modern terrors. Images of the globe, blood and flesh, weapons, and human civilisation form a shared crisis. The fear condensed in 'Bullets and Guns' becomes here a problem of global human extinction. The repeated 'hail' acts almost like a final protective bond around possibility.

46. Stop the Drama, Sir

Original pages: 110–111 | Principal theme: Civic satire

The rising costs of books, clothes, and housing, the commercialisation of education, disrespect towards women, corrupt brokers, dynasticism, administrative inertia, and politicians' pretence all come under attack in the poem's final public intervention. 'Stop the Drama, Sir' is a dramatic address; the poet reveals the separation between those in power and their words and actions.

As the collection's final poem, it carries the force of a conclusion. The journey begun with the restrained picture of natural beauty in 'The Ashoka Tree' culminates in a stern civic address. The word 'drama' exposes the distance between the performance of publicity-oriented politics and the crisis of ordinary life. Its emotional assertion is that acting out the possession of rights is meaningless unless people's daily needs receive ethical priority.

Integrated Research Conclusions

The Collection's Internal Movement

Across these forty-six poems there is a meaningful progression from miniature scenes of nature to extended narratives of urban and rural inequality; from there to biting satire on power and markets, then towards self-criticism of language and literature, and finally to a call for humanity and respect. The poems do not fall into rigid thematic compartments: nature, language, power, and memory repeatedly intersect. These interconnections constitute the collection's genuine unity.

Achievements of Poetic Language

The primary text places established Maithili expressions, sounds, and verbal forms alongside modern political and global vocabularies. The tension between classical formulations ('athato', 'uvacha', 'kalachakra') and popular contemporary terms ('democracy', 'election', 'intolerance') gives the poems their multilingual experience of the age. Brief unmetered scenes, numbered vignettes, speech directed towards public gatherings, satirical repetition, and long free verse each produce their distinct social effects.

Social Values and the Critical Perspective

Solidarity with the people is the collection's principal ethical strength. Yet social criticism and literary evaluation are not identical: excessively direct utterances sometimes inhibit subtle imagery; thematic expansiveness sometimes obscures the direct voices of otherwise absent social figures; and opposition to convention sometimes coexists with anxiety about new ways of life. Reading the poems with these contradictions intact discloses their vitality. The reader's task is not to agree with every declaration but to examine the social grounds of the poet's questions.

Final Proposition

Athato Kavya Jijnasa is a people-oriented Maithili poetry collection concerned with the responsibilities of literary creation. Its central question is this: what can a supposed march of progress mean without human beings, soil, language, and labour? Poetry seeks a place for living sensibility amid crowded markets and the spectacles of power. The forty-six poems do not speak in a single voice; within their variety, the insistence on the cultural and human rights of ordinary people is the collection's most significant literary achievement.

Appendix: Lines of Inquiry into Interconnections

Poetry's Self-Questioning

Related poems: Athato Kavya Jijnasa; Poetry Ready for Sale; Discourse on Speech; Thus Spoke Poetry

Research question: How does poetry safeguard its independence between social responsibility and the market?

From Nature to Society

Related poems: The Ashoka Tree; The Babool Tree; An Adivasi Home; Blessed Are the Waters of the Brahmani River; There Was Once a Village of Mine

Research question: At what point does a scene of nature become a question of displacement and rights?

Language, Education, and Society

Related poems: Maithili Barni; Language Standing in the Marketplace; Mother Tongue; Bhola Babu

Research question: What is the difference between the memory of the mother tongue and its institutional prestige?

The Theatricality of Democracy

Related poems: Election! Election!; Rail! Rail!; The Purana of Leaders; Dance! Democracy, Dance!; Stop the Drama, Sir

Research question: How does the distance arise between democracy's public language and the lived experience of the people?

The Market's Multilayered Effects

Related poems: India Shining; The Great Hero's Journey through the Forest; Accounts; The Market; Globalisation; Partner

Research question: How does economic power affect linguistic meaning, cultural conduct, and ordinary life?

Violence and Humanity's Future

Related poems: Playing with Poetry on a Heap of Gunpowder; Bullets and Guns; Hail the Human Race, Hail!

Research question: What humane alternatives does poetry offer for overcoming the violence of the age?

CHAPTER 3 • THE LITERATURE OF VIRENDRA MALLICK

Pratham Purush

Eight essays and an intimate interview • Tradition, experiment, imagery, and critical judgment

1. Tradition: Experiment and Poetry's Modern Sensibility (pp. 9–27)

Central Argument

The opening essay reconsiders the tendency to treat tradition and innovative experiment as opposites. Literary innovation does not emerge from nothing; it acquires new forms in dialogue with earlier poetic consciousness, popular life, inherited conventions, and the legacy of expression. Thus 'modern sensibility' signifies not simply chronological novelty but new experiences of a changing world and the artistic structures appropriate to them.

The essay brings together different tendencies of poetry, metre and free expression, images and symbols, the apprehension of reality, social engagement, and Western literary movements. Through these varied references, the author constructs a comprehensible historical background for understanding the modern forms of poetry.

Tradition, Reality, and Experiment

If tradition is treated as synonymous with convention, the origins of modern experimentation become obscure. The author's argument centres on the writer's acquisition of language, sensibility, and cultural memory from tradition without imitating it mechanically. Selection, rejection, and recreation determine the creativity of modern poetry.

Discussions of realism and surrealist suggestion, Romantic impulses and social consciousness, poetry's subjectivity and the presence of objective life all complicate any linear definition of poetic modernity. Human loneliness, conflict, dreams, struggle, and changing social circumstances shape new images in poetry.

Critical Assessment

The essay's most important strength is its insistence that modernity be understood not merely as stylistic eccentricity or foreign imitation but as a relationship between experience and expression. The author attempts to place Maithili poetry in conversation with wider Indian and world-literary debates.

Nevertheless, the broad use of 'modern' and 'experiment' can sometimes obscure distinctions among poetic tendencies. A critical question arises here: is new linguistic construction an achievement in itself, or must it be judged by its capacity to generate human feeling and meaning? The overall orientation of the book favours the latter.

2. Currents of Splendour in Maithili Poetry (pp. 28–46)

Range of the Subject

This essay attempts to treat the richness and distinction of Maithili poetic tradition not merely as objects of praise but as a long development of poetic sensibility. In the light of Vidyapati and later poetic movements, varied forms of emotion—love, devotion, compassion, beauty, popular life, and spiritual experience—emerge as integral parts of poetry.

Alongside discussion of the poetic tradition, the author presents original verses or extracts at several points. Their purpose is not simply to construct a historical list of names but to demonstrate the living relationship between language and feeling. The essay consequently becomes both a historical survey and a reading of poetic beauty.

Many Levels of Poetic Richness

'Splendour' signifies more than abundance of literary production: it includes emotional resonance, maturity of experience, sweetness of language, rhythmic arrangement, lyric composition, and the density of poetic imagery. Mithila's cultural environment, religious and philosophical thought, and everyday popular practice strengthen the emotional force of poetry.

The chosen examples show that it would be inappropriate to confine the current of feeling to a single rasa. Devotion and erotic love often enlarge each other's meanings, while expression rooted in popular life reaches literary distinction. Such combinations are a particular strength of Maithili poetry.

Analytical Conclusion

The chapter's main contribution is the establishment of internal tradition as a basis for evaluating Maithili literature. Yet the concept of 'splendour' could be expanded by rereading it in relation to contemporary social inequality, women's experience, and the poetic voices of neglected communities. This question does not refute the essay's argument but extends it as a subject for research.

3. The Arrangement of Imagery in Subhadra-Haran (pp. 47–58)

Theoretical Foundations of Imagery

The central subject of this study is the poetic image. The author regards imagery not merely as a mental picture produced by words but as the artistic embodiment of sensory experience. Considering the connections among image, imagination, experience, sensory perception, and meaning, the chapter introduces important definitions and references to poetics.

In attempting to classify poetic images, distinctions among visual, auditory, tactile, and other sensory levels; concrete and abstract qualities; simple and complex arrangements; and direct and indirect expression prove useful. The chapter's classificatory outline and diagram serve as instruments for organising analysis.

The Work of Imagery in the Poem

Examples from Subhadra-Haran demonstrate that images do more than decorate the narrative. They make dramatic tension, characters' emotional states, movement, changes of scene, and the effects of rasa perceptible. The selection of words conveying action, form, sound, and sensation creates a combined experience of scene and feeling in the reader's mind.

The characteristic feature of imagery in narrative poetry is its joining of event and experience. A successful image does not arrest the story but increases its movement and emotional intensity. The author's example-based method makes it possible to demonstrate this distinction.

Methodological Review

The intellectual importance of the essay lies in linking theoretical poetics with close reading of a Maithili work. Classification assists analysis, but a single image may belong simultaneously to several sensory and emotional categories. It is therefore more productive not to confine an image to a fixed compartment but to read its full context, resonance, and effects.

4. The Tradition of Rama Poetry and the Maithili Ramayana (pp. 59–80)

The Many Traditions of the Rama Narrative

This chapter understands the Rama story as a multilingual, multilayered, and continually changing cultural narrative within Indian literature. Through its discussion of relationships among Sanskrit texts, Rama poetry in different languages, and local traditions, the essay attempts to establish the historical position of the Maithili Ramayana.

Rewriting an epic narrative means more than transferring the original story. When language, popular consciousness, religious dispositions, cultural practices, characterisation, and narrative technique change, the Rama story acquires a new literary form. From this perspective, the Maithili Ramayana offers an important opportunity for original cultural expression.

Distinctive Qualities of Maithili Poetry

Discussing Maithili poems related to the Rama narrative, the author emphasises the relationship between tradition and transformation. The ethical and religious character of the Ramayana's figures can be connected with local sensibilities; Maithili creates renewed intimacy with the story through dialogue, description, and comparisons drawn from popular life.

The book's comparative perspective is particularly noteworthy. Narrative similarities between source texts and subsequent Maithili versions are inevitable, but a work's independent identity resides not in word-for-word similarity of plot but in creative choice and emotional reconfiguration.

Research Questions

This chapter suggests further research on the use of vernacular language in the Maithili Ramayana, dialogue assigned to female figures, transformations of cultural practice, the relationship between devotion and ethics, and the reasons for episodes that diverge from source traditions. These questions extend the essay's historical discussion towards text-based comparative research.

5. Sources of Inspiration for the Mithilabhasha Ramayana: Adhyatma Ramayana and Ramcharitmanas (pp. 81–88)

The Difference between Inspiration and Imitation

This essay specifically examines the inspirational sources of the Mithilabhasha Ramayana. The Adhyatma Ramayana and Ramcharitmanas, named in the title, provide an opportunity to examine the complex relationships among source, influence, selection of material, and poetic reconstruction. The presence of inspiring texts does not necessarily negate the originality of a new work.

According to the essay's reading, both the spiritual meanings of the Rama tradition and their expression in the people's language are important. The study attempts to understand the distinctiveness of the Maithili adaptation in the light of the Adhyatma Ramayana's spiritual orientation and the Ramcharitmanas's devotional reach among the people. Its comparative aim is to comprehend differences in poetic form alongside subject matter and devotional feeling.

A Comparative Method of Reading

An appropriate method should operate on four levels: narrative sequence and episodes; characters' utterances and characterisation; philosophical and religious implications; and language, rhythm, and style. The essay places the source texts side by side in the direction of such comparative investigation.

Research must distinguish conclusions demonstrated by direct textual similarities from those inferred from the broader influence of a poetic tradition. To call all similarity direct borrowing would ignore the common structures shared by literary traditions.

Critical Value

The chapter takes Maithili Rama poetry beyond regional isolation and places it in dynamic dialogue with the Indian epic tradition. Its particular value lies in establishing a basis for considering the relationship between inspiration and creative independence.

6. The Crisis of Criticism and the Criticism of Crisis (pp. 89–101)

The Responsibilities of Criticism

This essay focuses on the ethics and reasoned judgment of literary evaluation. The purpose of criticism is not merely praise, condemnation, the cultivation of friendships, or the protection of group prestige. It is a reasoned consideration of a work's strengths and weaknesses and the development of the reader's critical judgment. The author emphasises the intellectual preparation, breadth of reading, and independence of the critic.

A 'crisis' of criticism emerges on two levels: on the one hand, a lack of suitable standards, consistent method, and interpretations supported by evidence; on the other, institutional loyalties, personal prejudice, and the instability of literary value. This crisis cannot simply be dismissed as the fault of particular individuals; the conditions for reasoned dialogue within literary culture must also be addressed.

Indian and Western Contexts

The essay invokes classical criticism, modern aesthetic thought, and Marxist critical tendencies. Criticism's principal challenge is to establish a balance among artistic form, social reality, ideology, experience, language, and the autonomy of the work. Different methodologies ask different questions of the text; the monopoly of one method may narrow understanding.

The author's discussion thus outlines a responsible practice of criticism: proximity to the text, clarity of concepts, independence of evaluation, and the necessary distance between author and critic.

Contemporary Relevance

The growth of immediate responses in literary gatherings, journals, award systems, and digital media has made these questions still more significant. Publishing a critical opinion requires textual evidence, context, civility in disagreement, and transparent grounds for judgment. This contemporary extension accords with the essay's fundamental commitment to critical discernment.

7. Contemporary Maithili Poetry (pp. 102–114)

What 'Contemporary' Means

In this essay, 'contemporary' signifies not simply a recent year of publication but living forms of changing consciousness, subject matter, language, and poetic craft. Modern Maithili poetry engages with inherited emotional structures while seeking new voices for social insecurity, existential unease, ethical questions, personal loneliness, and collective experience.

Through numerous poetic extracts, the author compares different creative voices. The chapter's fundamental method is to read poetry close to its experimental linguistic body rather than through theoretical formulations alone.

Craft and Sensibility

New poetry offers free arrangements, altered modes of utterance, the energy of colloquial language, experiences of incongruity, symbolic suggestion, and intimate interior monologue. But new craft succeeds only when it corresponds to experience. Without an authentic relation between subject and form, experiment can become mechanical.

An essential aspect of contemporaneity is the presence of the social environment within poetry. Migration, struggle, displacement, changing relationships, and human aspirations set its concerns in motion. In this context, one can distinguish between a romantic repetition of conventional images of Mithila and the complex realities of modern life.

Questions of Selection and Limits

Any critical portrait of contemporary poetry depends on the selection of representative works. Questions about the inclusion of women poets, younger generations, differing social experiences, and linguistic experiments therefore arise naturally. The essay provides a useful preliminary map of this wider debate, not a final and exhaustive inventory.

8. The Joy of Life in Poetry (pp. 115–122)

Life and Poetry

In this final main chapter, the relationship between poetry and life takes a more intimate, sensitive, and philosophical form. The 'joy of life' must not be mistaken for superficial cheerfulness; poetry shapes a search for life's meaning amid sorrow, incompleteness, hope, memory, love, nature, adversity, and human resilience.

The essay's quotations suggest that an experience of beauty does not entail a denial of suffering but may make its human transformation possible. The convergence of emotion and thought enables poetry to find extraordinary significance in ordinary moments of life.

Poetry's Human Dimension

The poetic character of life's joy takes many forms: linguistic ease, fresh experiences of nature, inward freedom, sympathy, and the presence of hope amid despair. Poetry that captures the depths of human experience can become a companion to the reader in solitude.

Read alongside the book's first chapter, this essay completes an intellectual circle: the opening posed questions of modern sensibility, while the ending asks about lived human experience. The value of modernity lies not merely in novel formal arrangement but in a meaningful enlargement of human experience.

The Significance of the Ending

The final chapter brings the book's critical seriousness to an emotional conclusion. Debates about imagery, form, tradition, and criticism cannot ultimately remain apart from lived experience; this can be read as the book's underlying principle.

Appendix: An Intimate Conversation between Virendra Mallick and Lakshman Jha Sagar (pp. 123–144)

The appendix takes the form of a dialogue. Between the interviewer, Lakshman Jha Sagar, and the respondent, Virendra Mallick, we encounter discussions of literature, poetic creation, Maithili's condition, modernity, criticism, literary discipline, study, and human concerns. The conversation provides the author's own reflections and literary personality as a context for the theory-centred main chapters.

The dialogue places more importance on literary commitment, sustained study, and fidelity to the work than on literary prestige. The value of reading for literary creation, language's cultural power, contemporary poetic tendencies, and genuine literary practice as distinct from institutional titles recur throughout. References to Indian and world literature suggest the author's broad reading interests.

The intimate conversation must not be treated as the sole evidence of objective history. It records the author's self-presented ideas, selected memories, and values. It would therefore be inappropriate to present it as definitive biographical truth without comparing it with independent bibliographies, chronologies, and external evidence. Nonetheless, the appendix is particularly useful for understanding the writer's critical thinking.

Integrated Discussion: The Intellectual Threads of Eight Chapters

1. Tradition and Innovation

The first, second, fourth, and fifth essays appear to rest on a common principle: literature draws sustenance from earlier tradition and creates new meanings for it in changing historical circumstances. Poetic inheritance and rewritings of the Rama narrative are different illustrations of this process.

2. Poetic Form and Experience

The third and eighth chapters clarify the internal relationship between formal beauty and experience. A method of constructing images comes to life when it embodies mental, emotional, or social experience. The question of life's joy ultimately illuminates the human purpose of poetic form.

3. Criticism's Self-Examination

The sixth and seventh chapters show the mutual dependence of criticism and contemporary creative work. New poetry requires discerning criticism; criticism must be prepared to revise its standards through close study of new works.

4. A Maithili-Centred Perspective in Dialogue with the World

Several essays bring Maithili texts into conversation with Sanskrit, Indian, and Western thought on poetry. The strength of this outlook lies in its linguistic confidence: Maithili is not treated merely as an object of regional culture but employed as a medium capable of complex debate about poetics.

Achievements of the Book and Areas for Further Research

Major achievements: (a) the coordination of Maithili literature's internal values with wider poetics; (b) the application of theoretical arguments to the reading of poems; (c) the historical and comparative context of Rama poetry; (d) ethical questions concerning contemporary criticism; and (e) the writer's own intellectual position, represented by the interview.

Further research could include: (a) collation of the poetic excerpts quoted in the book against authoritative original editions; (b) a comparative lexicon of imagery in Maithili poetry; (c) source criticism of Maithili versions of the Rama narrative; (d) representation of women's and excluded communities' experiences in modern Maithili poetry; (e) the historical development of critical methodology; and (f) independent archival verification of literary claims made in the appendix.

One methodological caution is essential: reproducing an author's critical judgments faithfully and verifying their truth are two distinct intellectual operations. This review takes the primary book's conceptual structure as its starting point and makes no unnecessary factual claims in the absence of an extended bibliography or independent external evidence.

Conclusion

Pratham Purush is a collection of criticism bringing several fields of Maithili literary thought into one volume. Its subjects range from tradition through poetic richness, the theory of images, Rama poetry, comparative source studies, the crisis of criticism, contemporary verse, and the joy of life. The intimate conversation in the appendix links this intellectual journey to the author's individual outlook.

Its most important implication is that linguistic affection alone is not sufficient for studying Maithili literature. Close textual observation, broad contextual knowledge, understanding of form, and independent critical judgment are equally necessary. On these grounds, the book offers material capable of inspiring new questions and methodical textual criticism in Maithili literary research.

CHAPTER 4 • THE LITERATURE OF VIRENDRA MALLICK

Drama and Theatre

Nine chapters and two appendices • Theatrical craft, one-act plays, folk drama, and Mithila's performance traditions

1. Maithili Drama and Theatre: Present Conditions and the Future

This chapter assembles substantial material ranging from the origins of Indian dramatic traditions to the historical development of Maithili drama and the future of modern Maithili theatre. The author considers dramatic literature, actual performance, and the cultural life of Maithil society in relation to one another.

1.1 The Origins of Drama

The chapter begins by examining how drama originated. Its emergence is placed against the backgrounds of religious ritual, collective expression, music and song, acting, and ancient dramatic theory. References to the Natyashastra tradition give the opening argument an Indian cultural context.

A written story differs from a story performed on stage. An account of drama's origins becomes more comprehensive when it establishes the relationship between the two.

1.2 The Rich Dramatic Tradition and Its Significance

References to Bharata Muni's Natyashastra, Bhasa, Shudraka, Kalidasa, Bhavabhuti, and Sanskrit dramatic theory underline the richness of Indian theatrical history. The importance of acting, rasa, characters, plot, and the relationship with audiences is implicit in the discussion.

In the Indian dramatic tradition, drama has been a performing art as well as literature; its evaluation should therefore not be restricted to the beauty of written dialogue.

1.3 The Emergence of Maithili Drama

Questions about the emergence of Maithili drama involve language, geography, chronology, and ancient textual traditions. The author places early Maithili dramatic compositions in the context of the larger dramatic traditions of eastern India.

Historical research must distinguish among the date of composition, the date of surviving manuscripts, and evidence of actual performances. Such distinctions make it possible to test claims of antiquity more reliably.

1.4 The Development of Modern Indian Drama

This subsection considers the modern development of Indian drama, creative transformations, and relationships with modern theatre. Social themes, character construction, and changes in staging methods are essential to that development.

The influence of modern Indian theatrical consciousness on Maithili drama should be examined in relation to local social circumstances and the theatrical resources available.

1.5 Ancient Maithili Drama: Maithili Dhurta Samagama and Goraksha-Vijaya

The contents specifically identify Maithili Dhurta Samagama and Goraksha-Vijaya under ancient Maithili drama. Satire, social conduct, and dramatic dialogue are important for discussing the first work; the dramatic presentation of religious and spiritual narrative is central to the second.

These compositions should not all be measured by the structure of modern prose drama. The mixture of languages, song, narrative, and performance traditions of older drama require independent criteria.

1.6 Drama Developed in Medieval Mithila: Parijata Harana

Parijata Harana occupies a distinctive place in the theatrical development of medieval Mithila. Music, devotion, mythological subject matter, and performative character make it an important point of reference in dramatic history. The tradition of Kirtaniya drama necessarily enters the discussion.

The theatrical possibilities of a song-centred work differ from those of modern dialogue-centred drama. The place of music therefore cannot be separated from the main analysis of medieval theatrical forms.

1.7 Drama Developed in Nepal

The author pays particular attention to the development of Maithili drama in Nepal, court patronage, and linguistic and cultural contact. The history of Maithili dramatic composition under the Malla rulers reveals a broad geographical and cultural tradition.

It can be misleading to divide older literary and cultural traditions according to modern political borders. The language, authorial connections, and performance settings of works developed in Nepal require separate examination.

1.8 Characteristics of Drama Developed in Nepal

The Maithili dramatic tradition of Nepal is discussed in terms of courtly surroundings, music, religious narratives, and multilingual practice. It can be understood not merely as an extension of Maithili-speaking territory but as an innovative theatrical environment.

The language of a written play and the language sung on stage need not always be the same. Without examining this distinction, the assessment of Nepal's Maithili drama remains incomplete.

1.9 Characteristics of Early Maithili Drama and Ankiya Nat

While discussing early Maithili drama, the author also refers to the characteristics of Ankiya Nat. Song, dance, religious storylines, and collective performance are important subjects for comparison.

In considering links between Maithili dramatic literature and the theatrical traditions of northeastern India, directions of influence must not be assumed; comparative evidence from chronology and surviving texts is essential.

1.10 Modern Maithili Drama

Social problems, family relationships, ethical questions, political consciousness, and individual conflict enter modern Maithili drama as new subjects. Like the novel, drama expresses the experiences of a changing Maithil society; drama, however, requires a particularly concentrated visual organisation.

Modernity is not simply a matter of recent dates. Its distinctiveness is determined through changes in a play's questions, dialogue, dramatic structure, and theatrical experimentation.

1.11 Maithili Drama after Independence

After independence, Maithili playwriting reveals many forms of social change, urbanisation, rural crisis, education, family, and individual conflict. The author discusses plays and dramatists from this period at length.

In writing theatrical history, publication dates must be distinguished from first-performance dates; innovation in subject matter and innovation on stage are not synonymous.

1.12 Maithili Performance Drama

In discussing Maithili performance drama, the author considers theatrical potential, the demands of acting, and audience relationships. Written plays and successful staged productions require their own processes.

Analysis of performance drama must pay particular attention to scenes, entrances and exits, stage objects, theatrical cues, and practical suitability for acting.

1.13 The Long Tradition of Theatre

The history of theatre is described in both Indian and Western contexts. Developments in performance spaces, audience arrangements, and theatrical equipment give form to theatre traditions.

Theatre should be understood not merely as a building but as a system of social and cultural relationships. The interaction of audiences, actors, and places is essential during performance.

1.14 Modern Indian Theatre

Modern Indian theatre developed new dimensions of training, lighting, scenic design, acting methods, and direction. Maithili theatre was not entirely separate from these developments.

Adopting new techniques according to Mithila's resources, audiences, and linguistic environment is more productive than mechanically imitating Western models.

1.15 Contemporary Indian Theatre

Contemporary theatre continues to bring inherited methods of presentation into dialogue with new theatrical languages. The author assesses the condition of Maithili theatre in relation to these developments.

New experiments should be evaluated not merely for their novelty but for their appropriateness to the subject and their impact on audiences.

1.16 The Tradition of Maithili Theatre

Folk performance, Kirtaniya drama, religious presentations, amateur groups, and urban theatre institutions all contributed to the history of Maithili theatre. The author's significant undertaking is to narrate these varied streams within a common history.

Equal importance should be accorded to the histories of written plays, continuing folk performances, and documented productions as three types of evidence.

1.17 Modern Maithili Theatre

Theatrical institutions, actors, directors, training, and organisers all play important roles in attempts to develop modern Maithili theatre. Regular performances and financial and institutional support remain recurring concerns.

Theatre workshops, libraries, travelling companies, and audiovisual archives could help increase productions of original Maithili plays.

1.18 The Future of Maithili Drama and Theatre

The chapter's final part concentrates on the future of Maithili drama and problems confronting original works and theatrical infrastructure. The author emphasises the need for cooperation between literary creation and active theatrical practice.

Discerning criticism, encouragement of new playwrights, regular performances, training for actors, and dialogue with diverse audiences offer practical directions for the development of Maithili theatre.

Integrated Conclusion to Chapter One

The first chapter provides a historical map of Maithili drama. Its chief feature is the placement of ancient narratives, Nepal's dramatic traditions, modern plays, and contemporary theatrical practice within one extended discussion. Nevertheless, each claim about chronology, influence, or performance history continues to require independent examination of original records.

2. Theatre and the One-Act Play: Their Interconnections

This chapter considers definitions of theatre, Indian and Western stage arrangements, elements of the modern one-act play, and representative Maithili stage-oriented one-act plays. Its central question concerns how closely literary composition and theatrical performance are related.

2.1 'Theatre' and Its Long Tradition

The author discusses the etymology and use of 'theatre' and its various meanings in relation to places of dramatic presentation. Theatre signifies not merely a site or building but the joint presence of action, performers, and audiences.

Words in a play's text become light, movement, sound, and acting before an audience; theatre is therefore a field in which drama is recreated.

2.2 Bharata's Theatre: Forms and Types

The discussion includes the theatre pavilions described in the Natyashastra, the dimensions of stages, the position of spectators, the suitability of performance spaces, and arrangements for acting.

The architectural design of a theatre cannot be separated from its aesthetics; visibility, audibility, and the dramatic relationship of presence are influenced by stage construction.

2.3 Western Theatre

The author introduces the different forms of theatre buildings, audience arrangements, and acting areas in Western traditions, revealing their historical changes.

Comparison with Western theatrical forms should not lead to neglect of the distinctive merits of Maithili theatre's traditional open and community performance spaces.

2.4 Modern Theatre: Forms and Types

The discussion of modern stages introduces open-air, proscenium, arena, multilevel, box-set, revolving, and other theatrical arrangements. Differences in physical distance between performers and audiences and in the limits of visibility create distinct dramatic meanings.

The stage should be chosen according to the play's narrative, character movement, available lighting equipment, and the audience's needs.

Element	Brief Critical Discussion
Plot	A planned sequence of events focused upon one principal dramatic incident or conflict.
Characters	A limited cast, with actions that develop out of distinct personalities and circumstances.
Dialogue	Speech appropriate to the characters: natural, concise, and purposeful.
Setting and Time	A coherent combination of place, atmosphere, period,

Element	Brief Critical Discussion
	and social background.
Language and Style	Use of Maithili suited to the subject; avoidance of excessive ornament or artificiality.
Purpose	The ideas, experiences, or social significance inherent in the dramatic subject.
Pace	A balanced flow of scenic transitions and dramatic tension.
Stage Directions	Instructions concerning sets, entrances, movement, silence, lighting, sound, and costume.

2.5 Creators of Theatre: Actors, Directors, and Designers

The author distinguishes the roles of actors, directors, and designers as creators of theatre. The playwright's text becomes present on stage through the director's plan and actors' actions.

A theatrical production is a collective creation. The director organises the overall presentation, but performers and other collaborators remain creative participants in their own right.

2.6 Our Maithili Theatre

This section raises questions about Maithili theatre's social and linguistic foundations, theatrical resources, and institutional development. Familiarity with local language and life can become a distinctive strength of performance.

The success of Maithili theatre requires a balance among natural local speech, the audience's cultural understanding, and modern theatrical techniques.

2.7 The One-Act Play: Form, Definition, and Classification

A play contained within one act may be called a one-act play, but its essential characteristics are concentrated dramatic action, few characters, controlled duration, and an intense effect. The author discusses its types and creative properties.

Shortness alone is not a sufficient criterion for the one-act play. Unity, tension, and the movement of events towards a single centre give it dramatic force.

2.8 The Modern One-Act Play: Elements and Characteristics

The original contents list plot, characters, dialogue, setting and period, language and style, purpose, movement, and stage directions as separate elements. The author considers the usefulness of each.

Every line of dialogue, entrance, and stage direction in a one-act play should be connected with its subject; unnecessary elaboration weakens its effect.

2.9 Eight Principal Elements of the One-Act Play

2.10 Representative Maithili Stage One-Act Plays: Complete List of Titles

The original contents discuss the following one-act plays individually. This integrated study preserves the complete list; it does not invent complete plot summaries for works whose independent primary texts have not been read.

2.10.1 Ayachi Mishra

The title evokes the scholarship, renunciation, and cultural memory of Mithila. Its criticism could principally examine the dramatic portrayal of a historical figure, the appropriateness of dialogue, and the scenic environment.

2.10.2 Hail the Motherland

The title clearly expresses emotional attachment to the place of one's birth and a spirit of patriotism. Testing its dramatic effect would require consideration of the harmony between idealistic statements and the characters' living experiences.

2.10.3 The Struggle of Life

The title chiefly suggests circumstances of struggle in life. An analysis based on the positioning of characters, decisive turns, and dramatic concentration would be useful.

2.10.4 Brahma Sthan

Questions concerning folk beliefs, social behaviour, and traditional convictions are appropriate to discussion of this work. Characters' conduct must be read against actual evidence from the play.

2.10.5 Hathutta Kursi

A critique of this title should investigate possible references to a rural setting, educational conditions, or social relationships. The dramatic meaning of scenes and objects may prove particularly noteworthy.

2.10.6 Mithila's Representative

The title raises questions of representation and social claims. Dialogue, irony, and discrepancies between characters' words and actions could provide grounds for dramatic criticism.

2.10.7 The Price of a Ring

The original title, Munarik Mol, raises questions about value, human relationships, or social conduct. No specific plot incident has been inferred without evidence from the primary text.

2.10.8 The Sage's Confusion

The title suggests possibilities for giving new meaning to a mythological or sage-like figure. Evidence of dramatic reinterpretation and satire must be sought in the original text.

2.10.9 A Sneeze

A small incident such as a sneeze can become an instrument of dramatic suggestion and comic incongruity. The particular characters and story depend on examination of the original play.

2.10.10 Hunger for Affection

The title suggests a lack of tenderness and the emotional world of the family. Human relationships, deprivation, and the poignancy of dialogue offer appropriate critical perspectives.

2.10.11 Aibhor

The title suggests a new time, altered experience, or an image of morning. Its precise narrative meaning must be established from the sequence of scenes in the original play.

2.10.12 The Twelve Months of Her Courtyard

The title suggests a long temporal experience of social life. Analysis of time, satire, and changing surroundings is among its critical possibilities.

2.10.13 He Is a Paper Tiger

The paper tiger in the title can be taken to suggest the difference between apparent power and actual strength; however, this cannot be presented as a complete plot summary without confirmation from the original drama.

2.11 The One-Act Play and Theatre: Connecting Principles

The brevity of a one-act play facilitates performance, but intense dramatic effect requires concentrated dialogue, the actions of characters, visual movement, and the organisation of offstage space. The author's discussion helps distinguish the literary one-act play from its theatrical realisation.

This chapter's importance lies in bringing together the theory of the one-act play and Maithili examples. Beyond criticism of plot, the visual presentation, practical demands of acting, and audience response require separate assessment.

3. Maithili Dramatic Criticism: Nature and Paradigms

This chapter clarifies the theoretical foundations of Maithili dramatic criticism. It considers the interrelationships among ancient Indian criteria, medieval thought, Western paradigms, and the nature of criticism of Maithili drama.

3.1 Ancient Criteria

Bharata's Natyashastra, rasa, bhava, acting, dramatic subject matter, and audience experience provide major foundations for ancient Indian dramatic criticism. These criteria encompass performance as well as drama's classical literary form.

Even while recognising rasa's importance in Indian criticism, one cannot neglect the theatrical functions of acting, space, characters, and time.

3.2 Medieval Dramatic Criticism

Medieval traditions of literary theory developed analyses of dramatic form, rasa, plot, characterisation, and artistic purpose. The author situates this continuity within the development of dramatic criticism.

Classical formulations must be applied in a manner suited to the historical character of a work. Folk performances and song-centred dramas cannot all be assessed adequately by a single criterion.

3.3 Western Paradigms of Dramatic Criticism

Western dramatic thought has developed diverse approaches to imitation, action, conflict, character, scenic structure, and audience experience. The author relates such ideas to Maithili dramatic criticism.

Indian and Western thought offer not only contrasting positions but opportunities for multiple criteria. Subject matter may be examined from one perspective, acting from another, and social meaning from a third.

3.4 The Nature of Maithili Dramatic Criticism

Reviews of plays, literary journals, discussion of performances, and literary debate have all served as foundations of Maithili dramatic criticism. The author considers the character and limitations of these activities.

A clear distinction must remain between a book review of a written play and a performance review of an actual production. Textual evidence predominates in the first; evidence of acting and presentation in the second.

3.5 Paradigms of Maithili Dramatic Criticism

The original book raises the question of establishing standards of dramatic criticism. A playwright's perspective, structure, language, dialogue, characters, scenic arrangements, acting, and theatrical experimentation can all be regarded as necessary elements of an integrated assessment.

The autonomy of Maithili dramatic criticism requires both attention to local performance practices and comparative reflection on dramatic theory.

Conclusion to Chapter Three

The chapter repeatedly emphasises the need to take dramatic criticism beyond text-centred limits, starting from the fundamental notion that drama is an experimental, performance-based art. Joint study of literary structure and theatrical effect offers a productive direction for Maithili criticism.

4. Operation Maithili Folk Theatre

This brief chapter introduces the meanings of the word 'folk' and the grounds for classifying Maithili folk drama. Its centre is the relationship among the cultural meaning of folk, oral traditions, communities, and performance.

4.1 The Etymological Meaning of 'Folk'

The original essay discusses the verbal root, ancient uses, and the general meaning of 'lok' as a community of people. The author attempts to define folk in relation to social practice, worldview, memory, and collective experience.

It would be wrong to treat 'folk' as synonymous only with 'village' or 'uneducated'. Folk denotes a broad social and cultural world, one that also engages with classical traditions.

4.2 Classification of Folk Drama

The author refers to various forms of folk performance, including religious, social, ritual, women-centred, and comic-satirical presentations. Folk narratives, song, dance, and community-based performance form their main foundations.

A single folk performance may serve several social functions at once: ritual, memory, comedy, resistance, and entertainment. Classification should not be excessively rigid.

4.3 The Cultural Field of Maithili Folk Performance

Traditions such as Sama-Chakeba, Jat-Jatin, Domkach, Salhes, Lorik, Vidapat, and Kirtaniya evoke the memory of Mithila's richly varied folk performances. Within these traditions the boundary between song and dialogue frequently dissolves. In many events, the cultural occasion, collective participation, and customary mode of acting matter more than plot.

Documenting folk performances requires more than preserving song texts. The local occasion, characters' costumes, roles of participants, audience involvement, and performance location must also be recorded.

5. Mahendra Malangia's Theatrical Craft

Through Mahendra Malangia's dramatic experiments, this chapter offers a close discussion of theatrical craft. The author views drama beyond the textbook, as a living art of acting, stage directions, scenery, time, offstage space, and sound.

5.1 Theatrical Craft or Performability

The complete meaning of theatrical language cannot be contained in words alone. On stage, a work acquires new form through expression, action, rhythm, space, and visual cues. The original chapter emphasises the interrelationship between theatrical craft and performability.

Theatrical craft is not mere decoration; it is a structural means of making subject matter visible and audible.

5.2 Acting

The actor gives a written character living presence on stage. The meaning of dialogue can change through the character's mental state, body language, and situation within a scene.

Successful acting requires internal coherence among word, silence, and action; the recitation of dialogue alone is not complete acting.

5.3 Theatrical Craft

Identifying various elements of theatrical craft in Mahendra Malangia's plays, the author establishes the importance of stage directions and instructions for acting that can be observed in performance.

During the transition from text to stage, creative harmony is required between the director's freedom and the playwright's dramatic intention.

5.4 Devices Supporting the Plot

Plot develops not only through dialogue but also through visible action, the use of objects, pauses, sounds, and cues. The author demonstrates the dramatic purposes of these supporting devices.

'Telling' the plot and 'showing' it are not identical; stage directions can make an event visible without additional explanation.

5.5 Directions for Stage Furnishings

Stage objects, courtyards, rooms, doorways, seating, and other furnishings become signs of a play's social world. Their choice is linked to the mood of the scene and the movement of characters.

Unnecessary furnishings may distract the audience; a few meaningful objects are often more effective.

5.6 Directions for Costume and Related Elements

Instructions for characters' clothing, make-up, and transformations clarify the plot's social circumstances. Costume and bodily acting must be employed together.

Costume can reveal social conditions, but a character's personality should not be reduced to clothing.

5.7 Acting Directions

Instructions to enter, sit, rise, look, turn, laugh, cry, or remain silent belong to the domain of stage directions. The author's analysis emphasises the relationship between the management of actors and the drama's subject.

Acting directions suggest a playwright's imagined staging; an actual production interprets that vision with discretion.

5.8 Directions Concerning Space

The location in which a scene unfolds, its interior or exterior character, its social suggestions, and the arrangement of objects all contribute to narrative meaning.

Place is not simply a physical background; a courtyard or public square may indicate relationships among characters and social boundaries.

5.9 Indications of Time

The sequence of events, day and night, seasons, waiting, and the passage of time connect audiences with a play's temporal structure.

Stage time and the time of the story are different; skilful cues can suggest events spanning a long period within a brief performance.

5.10 Offstage Directions

Events taking place offstage, voices, footsteps, music, and indications of unseen characters activate the audience's imagination.

An event that need not be directly shown can have a more powerful effect when conveyed from offstage.

5.11 Musical Directions

Music, sound, and rhythm shape the emotional atmosphere of drama. Folk music can help establish characters' regional backgrounds and cultural contexts.

Songs should be appropriate to the subject; inserting them merely to fill pauses can damage the movement of a performance.

5.12 Curtain Cues

Directions concerning curtains during scene changes, internal transitions, or pauses in presentation indicate the playwright's theatrical awareness.

Modern theatre may substitute lighting, sound, and actors' movements for curtains, but the original direction's intention should be preserved.

5.13 Indications of Time for Matters Not Shown

This particular heading appears in the original table of contents. The theatrical use of events not directly represented onstage, or of indirect indications, deserves consideration here.

Decisions between direct representation and suggestion depend upon artistic, social, and theatrical circumstances; no universal rule suffices.

Conclusion to Chapter Five

The chapter on Mahendra Malangia's theatrical craft takes Maithili dramatic criticism beyond simplified discussion of plot and character. The possibilities for staging established by the playwright become an independent subject of criticism.

6. Mahendra Malangia's Theatrical Language

After theatrical craft, the author examines theatrical language. On stage, language is not simply spoken words: actors, audiences, directors, bodily posture, movement, rhythm, sound, images, and symbols all contribute to dramatic communication.

6.1 The Different Dimensions of Theatrical Language

The original contents identify actor, audience, and director as distinct dimensions of theatrical language. The actor makes feeling visible; the audience receives meaning; the director coordinates the overall rhythm and structure of the presentation.

A continuing artistic dialogue links the three. Theatrical language possesses more meanings than the literal sense of words and depends on the situation.

6.2 Actor

The actor is the first vehicle of theatrical language. Facial expression, gaze, gait, breathing, pauses, pronunciation, and bodily position communicate a character's mental and social meanings.

The actual meaning of dialogue spoken by an actor arises from situation and inward motivation. The same sentence can mean different things when delivered with fear, love, or irony.

6.3 Audience

Audiences participate in creating a play's meaning. Laughter, silence, sympathy, disagreement, and recognition of symbols arise through spectators' cultural experiences.

Local knowledge, familiarity with dialect, and understanding of folk traditions influence a Maithili audience's reception of performance. Theatrical experimentation must accord these experiences due respect.

6.4 Director

The director interprets the subject theatrically, integrating scenic organisation, the positioning of characters, costume, light, sound, and the rhythm of acting.

The director's artistic freedom may enlarge the original play's meaning, but to replace its essential subject entirely without a creative reason cannot be called an authentic presentation.

6.5 The Complexity of Theatrical Language: Body Language

Body language is a fundamental system of signs in visual performance. Posture, distance, facial expression, movements of the neck, hand gestures, and silence all develop narrative meaning.

Nonverbal elements may make theatrical language especially effective. Where dialogue is absent, bodily response can intensify the subject.

6.6 Rhythm

The order of dialogue, responses between actors and audiences, pauses, sounds, and the appropriate movement of scenes construct theatrical rhythm.

Rhythm is not simply a beat; the emotional force of the story and the urgency of events are also part of it.

6.7 Pace

Rapid or slow transitions appropriate to events shape a play's effect. Unnecessary extension of an action can be particularly damaging in a one-act play.

Dramatic pace is not synonymous with bodily speed; a silent scene may be intense through internal tension.

6.8 Symbols, Images, Sounds, Signs, and Related Elements

In theatrical language, lighting, objects, colours, sounds, symbols, images, offstage space, and signs convey indirect meanings. These elements disclose several levels of the dramatic world.

The effect of a symbol should be tested not only against the artist's intention but also against the audience's actual capacity to understand it.

Conclusion to Chapter Six

Theatrical craft and theatrical language complement one another. Craft provides an understanding of the organisation of performance; language raises questions of communication and meaning produced through that organisation. Reading the two chapters together offers fresh perspectives for criticism of Maithili theatre.

7. Maithili Theatre and Calcutta

This chapter assembles details of theatre traditions, institutional activities, and dramatic productions in Calcutta, a centre of Maithili theatre among migrants. As historical material, it is especially useful for understanding relations between preserving a language and practising theatre.

7.1 The Long Tradition of Theatre

The author first recalls the historical tradition of theatre, then turns to modern arrangements for performance and theatrical activities in Calcutta.

Research into a region's theatrical history requires familiarity with both the broader national dramatic tradition and its local social foundations.

7.2 Modern Theatre: Forms and Types

Descriptions of various modern stage arrangements recur in this chapter, supplying the technical context for actual theatrical productions in Calcutta.

Relating accounts of performances by Maithili companies to the types of venues, available resources, and the presence of spectators would produce a more vivid history.

7.3 Maithili Theatre

No.	Theatrical Institution / Platform
1	All India Mithila Sangh
2	Mithila Kala Kendra

No.	Theatrical Institution / Platform
3	Maithili Rangmanch
4	Kurmi Kshatriya Student Scholarship Fund
5	All India Maithil Sangh
6	Karna Goshthi: Jayant Lok Manch
7	Mithila Seva Sansthan
8	'Mithi' Yatrik
9	Mithila Vikas Parishad
10	Vaidehi Kala Manch
11	Kokil Manch
12	Jhankar
13	Mithila Seva Samiti (Belur)
14	Uday Path

Theatre has been an important vehicle of linguistic unity and communal gathering in the literary and cultural activities of Maithil migrant communities. Calcutta became a noteworthy centre for such performances.

Beyond promoting literature, theatrical work also builds social relationships and cultural identity.

7.4 Theatre in Calcutta: Productions and Experiments

The original chapter describes the contributions of various productions, events, and theatrical institutions. This material makes clear that performance history and the printed history of plays are not the same.

Programmes of performances, commemorative publications by theatre organisations, casts, newspaper reviews, and visual or audio archives provide reliable grounds for research.

7.5 Productions by Various Institutions: Complete List from the Original Contents

The original contents record the following fourteen institutional or theatrical names. Their original forms have been preserved as far as possible.

The chapter also contains tables of productions by institutions beginning on printed page 198. Compiled accounts of plays, performances, and events provide foundational material for an institutional history of Maithili theatre. In this research edition, uncertain names, years, or performance counts in the tables have not been reproduced without reliable readings.

7.6 Calcutta Theatre and Migrant Cultural Identity

For migrant communities, performances in the mother tongue connect spectators with their language and memories. Through songs, dialects, social satire, and regional behaviour, collective presentations keep Maithili cultural experience alive. Calcutta's institutional contribution can be understood within this wider perspective.

The chapter's documentary aspect is invaluable to theatrical history. Yet independent archival verification of institutional names, founding dates, first performances, and performers' roles would strengthen the research.

8. Ring Operation on Maithili Folk Songs

The author begins this essay with the meanings of 'folk' and 'song', then considers the diversity of Maithili folk songs, their emotional richness, and their connections with life. Lines from original songs are also presented as examples, conveying their internal sensibility.

8.1 The Meanings of 'Folk' and 'Song'

At the beginning, the meaning of 'folk' is discussed with reference to Vedic and other traditional sources. Song is understood as the rhythmic expression of collective human experience.

Etymology alone is not the whole history of folk song; actual folk materials, singing communities, and occasions also require investigation.

8.2 Maithili Folk Songs and Rites of Life

Folk songs are employed in many situations of life, from birth and marriage to festivals, labour, separation, seasons, and family ceremonies. The author presents various emotional dispositions through examples of song lines.

Preserving performance occasions, the communities of women and men singers, melodies, and local variations alongside original song texts is important for future research.

8.3 Sorrow, Separation, and Women's Sensibility

Examples of folk songs marked by compassion, distress, and poverty appear in the middle of the chapter. Social difficulties, family deprivation, and maternal tenderness find moving expression in folk singing.

Women's experiences in folk songs can become an important source of social history; they must not be dismissed as merely ceremonial entertainment.

8.4 Festivals, Rites, and the Beauty of Nature

The latter part of the chapter discusses song experiences associated with Chaitra, Malhar, Chaunchar, Sasura, Parati, the rains, rivers, forests, villages, homes, and seasonal beauty. These provide further evidence of the thematic range of folk songs.

Reading folk songs' descriptions of seasons and natural imagery in relation to local environments and agricultural life clarifies their cultural meanings.

8.5 Religious and Secular Voices of Song

Devotion, vows, rites, humour, social satire, and worldly love are among the many voices of folk song. Song is not merely a vehicle of devotional sweetness but carries the varied experiences of life.

Classification should not be rigidly based on a single subject: the same song may combine ritual, love, and social memory.

Conclusion to Chapter Eight

The essay entitled 'Ring Operation on Maithili Folk Songs' attempts to enter the inner world of folk-cultural life. The inclusion of original song excerpts prevents the discussion from relying on abstract theory alone. Actual folk-song research requires the combined documentation of texts, melodies, singing communities, and performance occasions.

9. A DNA Test of Mithila's Folk Music

This essay raises questions about the historical roots, popular foundations, classical relationships, and cultural continuities of Mithila's musical traditions. 'DNA test' is a metaphorical title and should not be understood as referring to biological laboratory testing.

9.1 The Many Forms of Mithila's Music

The chapter initially describes Mithila's music as a folk and Vedic presence permeating every part of cultural existence. 'Music' encompasses an integrated world of classical music, folk music, folk narratives, folk drama, and folk dance.

A history of Mithila's musical traditions must give evidence from classical texts and oral performances equal seriousness.

9.2 Folk Song and the Music of Mithila

The original essay describes folk song as a musical current flowing through Mithila's popular life from birth to death. Rural existence, seasons, rites, and religious ceremonies are its living foundations.

When written notation, field recordings, and singers' memories are brought together, it becomes possible to compare changing forms of folk music.

9.3 Vedic and Classical Contexts

The author considers the distinction, cultural importance, and classical features of music in relation to ancient textual traditions. Discussions of nada, notes, rhythm, and raga are connected to Mithila's cultural history.

Claims concerning antiquity and historical continuity require separate forms of evidence. A classical reference cannot automatically establish the documented ancestry of a contemporary folk melody.

9.4 Mithila's Musicians and Literary Contexts

The relationship between musical thought and song literature is important within Mithila's intellectual culture. Connections among Vidyapati's Padavali, ancient theoretical reflection, and regional singing traditions form a central area of inquiry.

Future research could be enriched by histories of melodies used for Maithili lyric literature, their changes over time, circulation, and use in different regions.

9.5 Interrelationships between Folk and Classical Traditions

In the many-sided dialogue between Mithila's folk and classical music, notes, rhythm, occasions, regional styles, and traditions of singing interact at different levels.

It is more balanced to treat classical and folk traditions not as higher and lower forms of one another but as distinct artistic practices developed through historical interaction.

Conclusion to Chapter Nine

The essay's chief achievement is its emphasis on the broad cultural importance of Mithila's folk music. Future investigation of the historical genealogy of musical traditions naturally calls for combining textual evidence, manuscripts, living melodies, performance occasions, and regional fieldwork.

Appendix A. A Cultural Surgical Examination of Mithila's Folk Life

This appendix concerns the meanings of folk and culture, cultural development, and Mithila's collective memory. The cultural foundations of folk drama, folk song, and folk music addressed in the main chapters are considered here in broader terms.

A.1 The Meanings of Folk and Culture

Through etymological discussion, the author introduces the elements of folk culture. Folk traditions encompass behaviour, beliefs, songs, dances, festivals, language, and collective art.

Folk culture is not a static museum object but a living community practice that changes over time.

A.2 The Folk-Cultural Structure of Mithila

Mithila's language, families, rites, festivals, religious practices, artistic traditions, and collective experiences create a distinctive social and cultural world.

The study of folk culture requires separate evidence from religious texts, oral traditions, social practices, and modern transformations.

A.3 Connections with Theatrical Tradition

Different forms of folk culture provide theatre with songs, characters, dialects, symbols, and styles of presentation. Modern Maithili theatrical practice can draw creative energy from this foundation.

Bringing a tradition to the stage requires respect for its relationship with the community and its original context.

Appendix B. Sacred Mithila Dham

The original contents describe this appendix as an essay 'written for a documentary film'. Its language and purpose therefore differ somewhat from historical research essays, being more introductory, cultural, and oriented towards visual presentation.

B.1 A Cultural Introduction to Mithila

The essay introduces Mithila's mythological, religious, philosophical, literary, and social distinction. The interrelations among traditions of Janaka and Sita, learning, art, language, and sacred sites emerge in the discussion.

A voice of cultural pride is natural in documentary narration, but clearly separating historical evidence from popular belief gives audiences a more precise understanding.

B.2 Learning, Philosophy, and Literature

The essay refers to Mithila's traditions of knowledge, scholars, literary development, and the richness of Maithili. Numerous threads of cultural history are brought together here.

An extended history of these subjects would require proper citation of specific dates, works, archives, and manuscript traditions.

B.3 Mithila's Folk Life and Artistic Achievements

Music, art, festivals, rites, and social practices reveal Mithila's local particularities. The documentary essay attempts to communicate these varied traditions through a visual medium.

Visual writing and dramatic writing have something in common: both depend not only on facts but also on scene sequence, narrative rhythm, and audience experience.

B.4 Contemporary Language and Cultural Identity

Mithila's modern context enters the appendix through questions of Maithili's status, social use, and cultural preservation.

The development of linguistic self-respect requires cooperation among education, publishing, communications media, and active literary and cultural institutions.

Integrated Discussion: Relationships among Dramatic History, Theatre Theory, and Folk Culture

The original book's nine chapters are not unrelated essays but studies of different dimensions of Maithili theatrical life. This section reads them within one connected critical argument.

1. Multiple Centres of Theatrical History

References to ancient Mithila, medieval Mithila, Nepal, modern Maithili writing, and migrant theatre in Calcutta show that Maithili theatrical history cannot adequately be understood as the limited, linear story of one linguistic region. A work's language, area of circulation, arrangements of patronage, and cultural location of performance often differ.

Future research should therefore assemble four kinds of evidence for each period: plays, manuscripts, or printed editions; records of performances; historical contexts of authors and their communities; and evidence of linguistic and cultural contact. Without this fourfold evidence, linear claims about antiquity or influence require caution.

2. Dramatic Text and Theatrical Practice

The history in the first chapter, discussion of one-act plays in the second, and dramatic criticism in the third jointly ask how a text's meaning changes when a work reaches the stage. The fifth and sixth chapters seek practical answers. Scenery, actors, directors, pace, rhythm, symbols, and audiences transform a written composition into a new experience.

An appropriate method of theatrical criticism should include both textual analysis and performance criticism. Plot, character, dialogue, language, and structure predominate in study of the text; body language, sound, visual arrangements, lighting, rhythm, and audience response matter in study of the performance.

3. One-Act Plays and Modern Theatrical Experiment

The concentration of dramatic tension is important to the one-act play's structure. Examples from Maithili demonstrate that social, cultural, mythological, and contemporary subjects can be effective in brief form. Brevity alone, however, is not a virtue: selection of material, conflict among characters, and scenic editing are necessary.

Thus the second chapter and the discussion of Mahendra Malangia's craft together enrich practical criticism of one-act plays. Questions about a particular play's success—does it work when read, and can it produce a comparable effect on stage?—require separate tests.

4. Folk Drama, Folk Song, and Folk Music

The fourth, eighth, and ninth chapters address three closely connected forms of folk art. Folk drama is a sphere of collective acting; folk song is a sphere of rhythmic oral memory; and folk music is the wider world of notes, beats, melodies, and vocal styles. These three traditions are interwoven on many occasions.

When staging folk arts in modern settings, it is necessary to understand their ceremonial and communal contexts respectfully. As far as possible, songs from these traditions should be documented in the voices of their original singers, together with local variants and performance occasions.

5. Migrant Theatre and the Preservation of Language

The study of Maithili theatre in Calcutta demonstrates the importance of migrant cultural institutions in extending Maithili literature and theatrical practice. Theatrical productions become celebrations of collective identity as well as forms of linguistic communication. Institutional lists and production tables provide initial foundations for that history.

Future documentation of the establishment, working life, principal artists, productions, audiences, and social contributions of each institution would be valuable. Comparing Calcutta's material with theatrical histories of Patna, Darbhanga, Madhubani, and other centres would yield broader conclusions.

6. An Integrated Framework for Dramatic Criticism

Seven indicators can be especially useful in evaluating Maithili drama: (a) historical and social authenticity of subject matter; (b) dramatic structure of plot; (c) vitality of characters; (d) naturalness of Maithili dialogue; (e) stage directions and performability; (f) possibilities of acting, direction, and theatrical language; and (g) the audience's cultural experience.

These seven indicators constitute an editorial proposal, not a verbatim list prescribed by the original author. Nevertheless, they organise ideas from different chapters of the primary book into an integrated critical method.

7. Achievements and Limitations of the Original Book

The book's chief achievements are its thematic breadth, historical movement from antiquity to the present, concrete examples of one-act plays, paradigms of dramatic criticism, a close investigation of Mahendra Malangia's theatrical language, and institutional material from Calcutta. In these respects it is an important foundational work for the study of Maithili theatre.

It cannot, however, be claimed that every historical date or performance detail has been independently verified on the evidence available here. Re-examining the original book's bibliography, manuscript evidence, and institutional archives remains an essential next stage of more extensive research.

Research Findings: Conclusions, Future Questions, and Foundational References

The final part of this integrated study sets out long-term research subjects, the limitations of primary sources, and prudent conclusions arising from the original book.

Principal Conclusions

The history of Maithili drama is not confined to one geographical area or dramatic form; Mithila, Nepal, and migrant centres must be studied together.

The written text of a play and its theatrical production are separate but complementary artistic processes.

The study of Maithili one-act plays must consider actual performability alongside literary concentration.

The discussion of Mahendra Malangia's theatrical craft and language makes acting and performance central to Maithili dramatic criticism.

Folk drama, folk song, and folk music constitute cultural foundations of Maithili theatre; their community settings are important to their preservation.

Theatrical institutions in Calcutta open an important field of migrant cultural history.

The independent examination of dates of composition, language of sources, and evidence of actual performances is an indispensable condition of research into ancient drama.

Possible Questions for Future Research

What textual variations in plot, song, and dialogue exist among surviving manuscripts of ancient Maithili plays?

How can the linguistic and cultural relationship between court dramas of Nepal and local dramatic compositions of Mithila be established?

How were the effects of social change on Maithili drama after independence expressed through actual performances?

How do different directorial interpretations of major Maithili one-act plays alter textual meaning?

How do stage directions and audience responses vary among productions of Mahendra Malangia's plays?

How much of the performance archive of Calcutta's Maithili institutions survives and can be verified?

How has modern staging affected the oral transformation of folk dramas and songs?

What evidence exists for historical relationships between folk-song melodies and classical systems of notes?

CHAPTER 5 • THE LITERATURE OF VIRENDRA MALLICK

Vidyapati, the Shaper of Love and Beauty

An examination of nine chapters • Radha and Krishna, rasa, erotic love, folk consciousness, and influence

The Book's Structure and Central Questions

The principal question of this work is how love and beauty are expressed in Vidyapati's lyrics and how they relate to language, rasa, classifications of heroines, popular life, and literary tradition. The first two chapters establish conceptual and psychological foundations; the third examines Radha and Krishna as the central objects of emotion; chapters four through six concentrate on the poetic construction of love, beauty, and shringara; the seventh raises questions of folk culture; the eighth examines literary influence; and the ninth concludes the study.

The strength of this sequence lies in its multilayered treatment of the subject. A potential weakness is that the levels of evidence change as the argument moves from general philosophical accounts of love to particular lyric poems. A philosophical proposition alone cannot establish the meaning of a specific verse; each conclusion requires attention to speaker, context, address, symbols, metre, emotional suggestion, and textual variation.

Chapter One: The Nature of Love and Beauty (pp. 3–106)

The Meaning, Etymology, and Nature of Love

The book begins by examining the etymology, lexical meanings, definitions, essential nature, general characteristics, and qualities of love. These divisions make clear that 'love' is not simply an emotional outburst but an extensive organisation of subjects, emotional objects, relationships, and values. The experience of love and its poetic expression occupy different levels of literary meaning; to confuse them obscures the subtleties of lyric poetry.

Types of Love

The contents list devotion, romantic or marital love, parental affection, love of nature, patriotism, love of humanity, family affection, friendship, reverence, the relationship between one who serves and one who is served, and love for the subtle and the material. The advantage of this classification is that Vidyapati's poems need not be confined to physical attraction. Nevertheless, each form of love must be established through the evidence of particular lyrics, contexts, and linguistic signs.

Philosophical Foundations of Beauty

Moving from the etymology and definition of beauty, the book distinguishes objective or scientific perspectives from subjective ones. Its references to Western and Indian approaches and to attempts at synthesis are important. Between the question whether beauty inheres in the object seen or in the observer's experience, poetry opens a third domain: transformation through language.

Psychological, Literary, and Formal Beauty

General characteristics of beauty, distinctions between the sublime and the ugly, human and natural beauty, feminine and masculine beauty, and objective and artistic beauty are major stages in the book. It is not enough to treat the 'sublime' and the 'ugly' simply as the opposites of beauty; within poetry, inequality, pain, and separation can themselves generate aesthetic experience.

Subtle Categories of Nature Description

Alambana, uddipana, personification, figures of speech, symbols, enlargement of form, movement, colour, sound, smell, and touch constitute a rich method for analysing nature in literature. They establish a foundation for reading seasons and surroundings in Vidyapati's lyrics not merely as background but as active carriers of experiences of love.

Critical Extension and Close Reading

Considering love in terms of etymology, sensibility, social relationships, and poetic feeling provides a wide conceptual field. Yet these meanings are not interchangeable. If affection, attachment, erotic desire, devotion, and compassion are all placed in one category of 'love', literary distinctions may become blurred. The scholar must identify separately the relative proportions of relationship, desire, separation, surrender, and consciousness of rights within each lyric.

The conflict between objective and subjective theories of beauty assumes a third form in poetry: beauty created by the composition itself. It is not merely a matter of declaring that the depicted object is beautiful. Simile, sound, rhythm, and perspective construct its beauty. Lists of nature's colours, fragrances, and tactile sensations become meaningful only when joined to a lyric's emotional movement.

This chapter supplies the book's definitional foundation, but a clear bridge is needed between general philosophy and direct engagement with Vidyapati's individual lyrics.

Different Relationships of Love and Their Poetic Meanings

Beginning with lexical meanings, the book identifies several categories of human relationships. Parental affection centres on care and protection; marriage or romance may foreground mutual attraction and consent; friendship involves equality, trust, and intimacy; reverence involves recognition of values; and relationships of service involve unequal roles. Emotional closeness is common to these forms, but their literary functions differ. In discussing Vidyapati's love lyrics, it is necessary not merely to enumerate categories but to interpret them contextually. In one poem attachment may take the form of self-surrender; in another, displeasure and refusal may reveal inequalities within a loving relationship. The word 'love' alone cannot express the whole history of emotional life.

The Perception of Beauty and Poetic Composition

An objective account of beauty assumes that form, colour, proportion, or structure possesses qualities of attraction. A subjective interpretation locates that attraction in the experience of the perceiver. Yet reading poetry requires a third component: language. Without simile, parallelism, pauses, repetition, end sounds, and singability, the scene cannot achieve its full literary form. Beauty is not simply an object already standing outside the poem; it is also the organisation of sensation within the poem. Accordingly, the subsections on colour, sound, smell, and touch in nature description should be read not merely as a sensory sequence but as ways of organising the subject.

The Sublime, the Ugly, and Judgments of Value

The first chapter discusses the sublime and the ugly in the context of beauty. A subtle analytical question arises here: beauty and pleasantness are not invariably the same. Fear, wonder, or strangeness can also generate aesthetic experience through art. Similarly, the 'ugly' is not necessarily an object devoid of beauty; it may become an instrument of artistic opposition or irony. Applying this theory to Vidyapati's poetry would require examination of the actual wording of particular lyrics. The mere presence of a general theoretical principle does not establish a poem's emotional effect.

Chapter Two: A Psychological Study of Love and Beauty (pp. 107–144)

Human Attraction towards Love

This chapter discusses distinctions among desire, sex, and love, psychological and social interpretations of love, and the unity of body, mind, and soul. The chief caution in psychological analysis is that biological impulse, social convention, and poetic emotion must not all be measured by the same standard.

Love and Social Context

Relationships of love involve contradictory pressures of intimacy, desire, waiting, prohibition, and convention. This perspective is useful for examining Vidyapati's situations of wounded pride, secret journeys towards the beloved, union, and separation. Instead of imposing modern psychological categories unchanged upon historical Maithil society, they should be related to the linguistic evidence of the lyrics.

The Love of Beauty and Art

Human delight in beauty, art and beauty, literature and beauty, the emergence of beauty in styles of expression, and intimacy and sensitivity towards nature constitute another important part of the chapter. Acknowledging the difference between affection for natural objects and their artistic representation produces a more subtle study of beauty.

Critical Extension and Close Reading

Distinguishing the biological, mental, and social dimensions of human love is useful. Yet characters in medieval lyrics are not modern psychological 'case studies'; they are constructed speakers and structures of dialogue within songs. In interpreting pride or secret romantic journeys, one should therefore first examine linguistic action before inferring a character's personality: who speaks, to whom, and what is being concealed?

Waiting, the longing for union, jealousy, guilt, and separation are not emotions alone; they also organise the time of a lyric. Temporal signs such as 'today', 'tomorrow', 'night', and seasonal change alter the emotional temperature. More reliable conclusions emerge when psychoanalysis is joined to the structural analysis of a lyric at this level.

Do female characters always become objects of a masculine gaze, or do their voices also express independent objections and desires? This question enriches the chapter's interpretation.

Distinctions among Desire, Attraction, and Love

Desire can be examined as a bodily impulse, love as the enduring meaning of a relationship, and aesthetic sensibility as an experience of perception. But these levels are mingled in actual songs. The success of psychological discussion lies in understanding that mixture, not in assigning predetermined labels to every emotion. The wish for union may be intensified by social prohibition or restrained by self-respect or wounded pride. Tensions between the character's private wishes and social norms can generate different meanings for different readers.

The Lyric Speaker and Mental State

The poetic 'I' and the historical poet's 'I' are not identical. When reading a character's complaint, a separated woman's call, or a female confidante's advice, the literary speaker must be identified. To take another person's speech as the poet's personal experience directly would distort psychological analysis. Questions, addresses, negations, assurances, requests, and pauses perform particular functions within a lyric's utterance. Fixed claims about a character's 'personality' are risky without studying these linguistic signs.

Desire and Social Norms

The psychological chapter provides a bridge to social criticism. Freedom of desire is influenced by marriage, prestige, family, social shame, and gendered conventions. The intensity of love therefore cannot adequately be understood as a product of an individual's inner life alone. Yet the social shame depicted in poetry is not an exhaustive rulebook of historical society. Literature symbolically recreates social experience. Psychological conclusions become more reliable when distinctions are maintained between social reality and literary convention.

Chapter Three: Radha–Krishna Thought and Vidyapati's Radha and Krishna (pp. 145–193)

The Evolution of Krishna's Character

The contents discuss Vedic Vishnu, Puranic Vishnu and Krishna's avatar, the Bhagavata and Brahmavaivarta Puranas, the Mahabharata and other Puranas, the Vasudeva of the Abhiras, the philosophical nature of Krishna, and the traditions of teachers. The examination of these source traditions provides the historical background for the different aspects of Vidyapati's poetic hero.

Transformations of Radha

The chapter raises questions about Radha's historicity, astrological explanations, erotic aspects, the Nimbarka and Vishnuswami traditions, and her philosophical standing in the Brahmavaivarta Purana. These claims require testing against evidence from different periods and texts; religious narratives and historical facts are not identical.

Vidyapati's Krishna

The mythical attributes of Krishna, his appreciation of youthful beauty, his many beloveds, his role as a lover outside marriage, and his standing as the chosen deity constitute the book's subjects here. A connoisseur of love and an adored god coexist within a single personality at two distinct levels.

Vidyapati's Radha

Radha is discussed as a woman endowed with beauty, possessed of exceptional grace, drawn to beauty, modest, innocent, an inspiration of rasa, and a perpetual sufferer of separation. The movement 'from the physical to the heavenly' need not mean a denial of the female figure's embodied experience; it may also describe an emotional transformation of that experience.

Critical Questions for Readers

To declare Radha and Krishna's love exclusively devotional or exclusively worldly diminishes the text's multiplicity of meanings. Comparative examination of the heroine's voice, conversations with confidantes, speech of separation, and divine signs would give this chapter greater textual solidity.

Critical Extension and Close Reading

Treating the relationship of Radha and Krishna as only a religious metaphor or only a secular romance reduces its semantic plurality. The poetic 'Radha' may appear in different lyrics as a proud woman, a woman separated from her lover, a boldly expressive speaker, or a voice in doubt. 'Krishna' is not a fixed masculine image either: he may become a beloved, an absent object of love, or a cultural sign.

Dialogue with a sakhi, or female confidante, is a distinctive form of mediation in this poetic world. The sakhi gives information, counsels, creates the possibility of reunion, and sometimes interprets emotion. To see only the two-sided relationship between Radha and Krishna is to overlook the poetic role of this third voice.

Comparison of Puranic materials, devotional movements, and secular erotic poetry requires chronology and textual evidence. Claims of influence must be distinguished from general similarities.

Historical Sources and Poetic Reconstruction

The mythological tradition of Radha and Krishna, devotional interpretations, and worldly love songs do not constitute one uniform textual tradition. The book's contents refer to Vishnu, Krishna's avatar, various Puranas, and traditions of teachers. The critical purpose of this vast material needs to be established: which sources explain the characters' divine standing, which recount romantic narratives, and which illuminate emotional experience within poems? The presence of the same names does not automatically prove direct historical influence. Literary reconstruction can take material from tradition and transform its meaning.

Radha's Speech and the Centre of Perception

It is convenient to assign Radha to a category of heroines, but that category does not explain the entirety of her experience. In poems of pride, restraint, and intense attraction, Radha may be a figure observed by another or a voice speaking for herself. When a scene is constructed through external description, the centre of perception and the level of inner experience remain distinct. This distinction is particularly important in analysing women's voices. Questioning the heroine's agency and linguistic presence alongside judgments about her beauty enriches the reading.

The Mediation of the Sakhi

The sakhi is more than a messenger. She reads situations, interprets the emotional relationship between two characters, and sometimes represents social judgment. Her entry into dialogue changes the boundary between privacy and publicity: concealed desire acquires a shared language. This structure distinguishes love lyrics from solitary confessions. How emotional meaning changes with the place of address in a poem is a useful criterion for text-based research in Chapter Three.

Chapter Four: Vidyapati as a Creator of Love and Beauty (pp. 193–302)

Indian Traditions of Love and Vidyapati

The chapter opens with the tradition of emotions of love in Indian poetry and Vidyapati's place within it. His distinctiveness may be sought in relationships among Sanskrit poetics, lyric poetry, Radha–Krishna narratives, and the popular experience of Maithili culture.

Different Forms of Love in Vidyapati's Poetry

The contents distinguish human love, the development of love, appetite for beauty, preliminary attraction, separation dominated by desire, love beyond marriage, Krishna's enjoyment of many gopis, and ordinary social extramarital love. Rather than imposing moral judgments on the feelings of literary figures, it is more productive to study their inner states and temporal contexts.

The Bodily Organisation of Feminine Beauty

The book lists analyses of eyes, sidelong glances, breasts, faces, hair, hips, lines of body hair, lips, teeth, smiles, waists, navels, and folds of the abdomen in depictions of feminine beauty. Such references are not merely an anatomical list; their roles must be understood separately in terms of the movement of the gaze, sensation, figures of speech, and states of rasa.

Youth and Expressive Gestures

The study mentions classical categories of shringara such as hava, lila, vilasa, vicchitti, kilakincita, lalita, mottayita, vivvoka, vihrta, kuttamita, and hela. For modern readers, this classical vocabulary is not a fixed taxonomy of social behaviour but a way of organising feeling and performance in poetry.

The Mental Beauty of Women

Restraint and playful humour in union; preliminary attraction, injured pride, jealous displeasure, and absence abroad in separation; extraordinary, ever-new, natural, transformative, subtle, and eternal beauty—these subjects take the concept of beauty far beyond the physical body.

Masculine Beauty and the Beauty of Nature

The book also includes masculine beauty and the roles of nature as alambana and uddipana. Comparing the extended descriptions of female bodies with briefer descriptions of male figures raises new questions about gender imbalance in the poetic gaze.

Tabular Study

The original book's contents refer to a table of feminine beauty on pages 290–293. Not every entry of that table is reproduced verbatim here, but it matters as an attempt at quantitative classification within the book's analysis.

Critical Extension and Close Reading

This is the book's central field of criticism. Reducing the description of a woman from head to foot to an anatomical list restricts literary meaning. One must examine word order, the movement of the gaze, hesitation, suggestion, and the local images used in similes. Does bodily description create an experience of love, or does the body become merely an object of display? The question applies to each example.

Images of youth may contain tensions among novelty, modesty, attraction, self-awareness, and social control. 'Union' in love may coexist with 'insecurity'.

Gestures must therefore be read with the lyric's dramatic situation and modes of address rather than forced into mechanical categories.

Differences in the extent and method of description of women and men provide a useful critical indication. Reading beauty not merely as 'a body being seen' but as 'experience speaking' widens the scope of criticism.

The Production of Meaning in Bodily Description

To treat description from head to foot merely as sequential observation of the body would be too narrow. The selection of bodily details reveals the direction of the poetic gaze: where it pauses, how adjectives extend meaning, and which similes evoke extraordinary beauty or memories of familiar local objects. Bodily reference may convey intimacy, visual craft, or relationships of power. Its significance must be determined from the wording and speaker of the relevant lyric.

Youth and the Experience of Time

Descriptions of youth contain not only physical change but also an experience of time. Wonder at a new appearance, hesitation in self-awareness, caution concerning the social gaze, and the process of recognising oneself in the beloved's eyes construct the drama of youth. Such diversity resists treating female figures as a uniform image. When seasons change within a composition, temporal awareness acquires different social and emotional meanings; nature may support a relationship or intensify separation.

The Presence of Natural Beauty

Descriptions of flowers, forests, the moon, clouds, wind, or seasons take their meanings from the lyric's subject. An environment that seems joyous during fulfilled love may evoke sadness during separation. The change signifies more than the assertion that 'nature is sensitive': a character's inner state transforms the external order of symbols. A critical use of alambana and uddipana should mark this reversal of feeling.

From Description to Dialogue

An important question about the beauty of Vidyapati's love lyrics concerns the relationship between narrative presentation and dialogic longing. External description has limits; direct address by a character adds an answering voice. Through sequences of gazes, reticence, questions, and complaints, beauty ceases to be a static picture and becomes a changing relationship. Observing this movement can reduce the artificial division between outer physical beauty and inner emotional beauty.

Chapter Five: The Tradition of Poetics and the Beauty of Vidyapati's Poetry (pp. 303–428)

The Elements of Rasa

The contents refer to heroic, comic, and tranquil rasas alongside the states of union and separation in shringara. Studying rasa is not synonymous with examining a character's private emotion; it entails analysing the artistic organisation of determinants, consequents, and transitory feelings.

Figures of Speech

The contents enumerate numerous figures, including utpreksha, upama, rupaka, yamaka, anuprasa, atishayokti, arthantaranyasa, virodhabhasa, vyatireka, drishtanta, nidarshana, samasokti, and paryayokti. The finest criterion for analysis is not simply naming a figure but examining its poetic function: visuality, sound, suggestion of meaning, and the intensification of emotion.

Classification of Heroines

The text presents numerous categories, among them mugdha, madhya, praudha, gupta, vidagdha, abhisarika, vasakasajja, manini, proshitapatika, virahotkanthita, vipralabdha, khandita, kalahantarita, svadhinapatika, parakiya, and kutani. A single lyric may bear the traces of more than one emotional state; the classification must therefore retain a measure of flexibility.

Verbal Ingenuity and the Suggestion of Meaning

Separate treatments of utterance and verbal ingenuity, symbolism, the construction of imagery, the theory of suggestion (dhvani), indirect expression, and enigmatic verse (drishtakuta) strengthen the book's attention to poetic craft. A threefold reading—of the surface meaning of words, their suggested meaning, and their cultural implications—is especially necessary in the case of drishtakuta.

Proverbs and Idioms

Colloquial Maithili, sayings, proverbs, and idioms connect Vidyapati's poetic language with the lives of ordinary people. A linguistic study must consider local meanings, phonetic patterning, contextual appropriateness, and the social position of the speaker.

Critical Extension and Close Reading

Rasa theory provides a disciplined framework for examining how feeling is generated in a literary work. Yet merely identifying a rasa does not explain the poetic process. The relations among vibhava, anubhava, sanchari-bhava, and sthayi-bhava must be demonstrated through the actual lines and words of a lyric. The success of the categories of rasa lies in their ability to accommodate the living diversity of readers' experiences.

The significance of simile, metaphor, alliteration, yamaka, or shlesha lies not in how many instances can be counted, but in what each device does in its particular context. One simile may diminish the distance between lovers while another increases it; sound patterning may intensify an emotion or generate irony.

Proverbs, idioms, and expressions drawn from popular speech are not merely ornaments: they carry cultural memory. Through them the living speech of the people enters poetic language. The classical and the popular should be regarded not as adversaries but as traditions in active relation to one another.

The Textual Basis for Determining Rasa

The difficult work begins after the general principles of shringara rasa have been accepted. Which incident serves as the alambana, what kind of scene constitutes the uddipana, which gestures are anubhavas, and which momentary reactions are sanchari-bhavas? These are not questions answered simply by assigning technical labels. The same object may change its meaning from one line to the next. The poet's choice of words is decisive in constructing rasa. Critical analysis cannot therefore be considered complete after a mere enumeration of rasa categories.

Types of Figures of Speech and Their Functions

To name a device as simile or metaphor tells the reader how a comparison has been made. The more important question, however, is why the comparison has been made. In a scene of union, a simile may intensify intimacy; in separation, a comparable metaphor may sharpen the feeling of distance. Examining the movement produced by alliterative sounds, and the insistence created by repetition, reveals how figures of speech participate in the making of emotion.

Proverbs, Idioms, and the Rhythm of Song

Proverbs arise from the collective experience of speech communities. Poetry appropriates them and gives a general statement the meaning of a particular feeling. An idiom carries a social memory and an emotional inflection distinct from its literal sense. These forms of popular speech coexist with pauses, repetitions, and sound arrangements in lyrics intended for singing. A simple hierarchy between popular language and poetic ornament is consequently untenable.

Chapter Six: Vidyapati, the Uninhibited Singer of Shringara (pp. 429–474)

The Importance of Shringara

The psychological foundations of shringara, the relationship between beauty and love, and a threefold distinction among desire, beauty, and love provide the intellectual setting of this chapter. The term 'uninhibited' may be understood not merely as a transgression of convention but also as an outspoken poetic articulation of the experience of love.

Shringara in Union

The sequence of wounded pride, conciliation, a lover's secret journey, encounter, consummate union, and sexual intimacy presents the dramatic progression of love. The beauty of union does not always lie in an absence of expectation and fear; often it inheres in an encounter achieved after passing through precisely such states of mind.

Shringara in Separation

The contents list preliminary attraction, remembrance, praise of the beloved's qualities, longing, fainting, illness, agitation, delirious speech, numbness, madness, and states approaching death, together with distinctions such as pride within love, jealous resentment, absence on a journey, and sorrowful separation. These should be understood not as a literal catalogue of medical conditions but as a succession of experiences articulated through poetic rasa.

Radha and Krishna as the Objects of Love

A separate section on Radha and Krishna as the alambana of shringara provides the chapter's concluding thread. Rather than treating the emotional roles of Krishna and Radha as identical, one must attend to the ways in which each character's perspective and voice change in union and in separation.

Critical Extension and Close Reading

An interpretation of the adjective 'uninhibited' must begin by determining what it means: the fearless acceptance of the body, the spontaneous disclosure of feeling, or freedom from stylistic restraint? These three are not identical. Within the distinction between union and separation in shringara, pride, appeal, anticipation, memory, secrecy, and the apprehension surrounding a meeting represent different and subtle experiences.

It is not enough to define separation as the absence of union. Within memory, the absent beloved becomes increasingly present to the mind; a season or landscape that once stimulated desire may instead become a source of suffering. The beauty of poetic feeling emerges through this reversal.

Conclusion: An evaluation of shringara becomes more fruitful when it examines poetic strategy, emotional depth, and the arrangement of voices rather than offering moral praise or condemnation.

Instability Within Union

Not every image of union in shringara represents untroubled happiness. An anticipated meeting may be accompanied by fear, anxiety about public opinion, modesty, or the brevity of the time available. The experience of union is thus sometimes coloured by the possibility of separation. Such mixed states may fall outside rigid classifications; they make the poetry more vividly alive.

Memory and Time in Separation

Vipralambha should not be treated merely as an event of absence. Memory brings the missing beloved back into presence, yet that presence is not the equivalent of touch; it may itself become a source of pain. The seeming extension of daytime, the stillness of night, and the transformation of the seasons together produce the time experienced in separation. When the reader identifies temporal markers and reversals in the surrounding landscape, the inner craft of separation becomes clearer.

The Meaning of Uninhibited Expression

To call Vidyapati 'uninhibited' in the book's title and its chapter-level judgments is appealing; nevertheless, the word need not denote unrestrained sensual indulgence. Fearless mention of the body, direct expression of feeling, the spontaneous rhythms of folk song, and classical metaphors may all appear together in a poem. Examining uninhibited expression as a formal property, rather than as an occasion for moral accusation or defence, deepens the understanding of beauty.

Chapter Seven: The Emergence of Popular Consciousness in Vidyapati's Love Poetry (pp. 475–537)

Popular Consciousness and Popular Reality

The book raises questions concerning the dimensions of popular consciousness, the social responsibility of literature, healthy attitudes of mind, and domestic values. The representation of Radha and Krishna as figures of the people, together with linguistic references to ordinary life, narrows the distance between devotional narrative and lived social experience.

Satire of Social Evils

Opposition to child marriage, the portrayal of the go-between woman, and satire of social incongruities are explicitly identified as subtopics. In discussing them, it is essential to maintain an evidentiary distinction between the speech of a particular poetic character and general claims about historical society.

Folk Elements and the Tradition of Song

Drishtakuta, Maheshvani, and Nachari are included in the discussion of popular consciousness. These forms offer scope for studying the relationships among colloquial speech, faith, and song as performance. The circumstances in which a Maithili song is performed may alter the meaning of the lyric.

Vidyapati's Mithila

A separate discussion of Mithila's political, social, and cultural conditions (pp. 504–527) carries the book beyond purely internal literary criticism. Conclusions about historical events require corroboration from archival material or other reliable historical sources.

Critical Extension and Close Reading

Popular consciousness is not simply an inventory of rustic words. It is the poetic presence of labour, custom, festivals, women's relationships, family and household life, marriage practices, and collective memory. When a lyric affords glimpses of contemporary social behaviour, historians must use it with care: poetry is not a direct census of society.

In discussions of satire directed at social evils, the speaker's position is decisive. Is the satire the poet's own view, a character's complaint, or a convention of traditional humour? Without such distinctions, social judgments may become unreliable.

Maithili idioms, forms of address, the local cycle of seasons, and traditions of singing constitute this chapter's strongest possibilities. Treating the relationship between language and society as a means of producing meaning, rather than as mere decoration, deepens the book's engagement with popular life.

The Many Levels of Popular Consciousness

References to Mithila's popular life should not be reduced to a list of rural objects. Systems of address, exchanges among women, the cycle of seasons, domestic courtyards, traditional rites, humour, satire, and festivities all belong to popular consciousness. Language does more than name objects here: it also determines distance and intimacy in social relationships.

A Method for Examining Social Evils

To write the institutional history of a society directly from a joke or complaint in a poem is risky. Literature may express social tensions through exaggeration, folklore, or a character's private grievance. Serious inquiry into social evils requires independent corroboration from social history, law, ritual songs, and other contemporary writing.

The Conjunction of Folk and Classical Traditions

The easy repetition of folk melodies and the imagery of Sanskrit poetics need not stand in opposition. Local modes of address and conventional figures of speech may produce meaning together in a single lyric. This conjunction helps explain the breadth of Vidyapati's poetic appeal, although historical claims about his influence still require a distinct body of chronological evidence.

Chapter Eight: Vidyapati's Influence on Later Poets (pp. 539–568)

Mithila's Love of Poetry

The book treats Mithila's affection for poetry and its traditions of music and dance as an introduction to the history of literary influence. The later life of poetry develops not only in books but also in singing, ritual, and communal memory.

The Maithili Poetic Tradition

The relationship between Maithili poetry and Vidyapati, and his influence on Maithili poets, raises important questions of literary inheritance. Establishing 'influence' requires examining direct references, similarities of metre, language and imagery, and the possibility of chronological transmission.

Influence on Literature in Other Languages

The book expressly considers Vidyapati's influence upon poets working in Bengali and Brajabuli, Nepali, Assamese, Odia, and Bhojpuri. Rather than describing influence as transmission in one direction alone, it is especially useful to examine textual transformation, regional traditions of singing, and reciprocal reception.

Critical Extension and Close Reading

Resemblance alone cannot establish influence. One must produce concrete comparative evidence concerning the later poet's period, the means by which texts circulated, metre, modes of address, the treatment of heroines, and shared arrangements of lyric lines. 'A love song resembling Vidyapati's' and 'a song inspired by Vidyapati' are two different propositions.

In Maithili and other traditions of song, four possibilities must be distinguished: direct imitation, creative transformation, transmission through folk singing, and participation in a common cultural tradition. Only after these distinctions have been made can the claim of influence acquire historical substance.

Evaluation: The chapter's importance lies in showing the enduring life of Vidyapati's work. Its further research potential resides in systematic comparisons of parallel lyric texts and scrutiny of manuscript traditions.

Imitation, Influence, and a Shared Tradition

The appearance of Radha and Krishna, the monsoon month of Sawan, separation, or a female confidante in the lyrics of two poets does not necessarily mean that the later poet drew directly upon Vidyapati. Such images may also belong to a widely shared cultural repertoire. Claims of direct influence require attention to chronology, textual circulation, distinctive turns of phrase, transmitters within traditions of singing, and comparison of available textual variants.

Transmission Across Languages

When examining the influence of Maithili songs on other languages, translated forms, phonetic adaptations of the original lyric, rhythmic recomposition, and the oral transformations introduced by folk singers must be recognised as different processes. Sometimes words remain unchanged; at other times the metaphor alters while the underlying emotional structure survives. Research should identify these transformations before determining the nature of influence.

The Independence of Later Poets

If the discussion of influence becomes solely a celebration of an earlier poet, the creativity of later writers is obscured. Poetic tradition consists of both reception and alteration. In a new language, before a new audience, and under changed social circumstances, the same conventions of shringara acquire new meanings. These changing meanings are themselves a subject of inquiry.

Chapter Nine: Conclusion (pp. 575–589)

Integrated Reflections

The book's intellectual journey begins with the philosophical foundations of love and beauty, and proceeds through psychological inquiry, the Radha–Krishna tradition, the classical classification of heroines, rasa and figures of speech, popular consciousness, and influence across languages. Throughout this progression, the chief characteristic of Vidyapati's poetry emerges as the interdependence of the experience of love and the beauty of language.

Possible Directions for Further Research

Studies of textual variants in individual lyrics, performance traditions, women's voices, local pronunciation, language contact, and the transmission of manuscripts would usefully extend the book's discussion. These are research directions proposed by the present critic, not verified quotations from the original book's conclusion.

The Structural Achievement of the Study

The nine-chapter arrangement makes the subject multidimensional. Its progression through philosophical and psychological foundations, categories of poetics, the social world of the people, and subsequent literary influence exemplifies a wide-ranging method of study.

The Interrelationship of Love and Beauty

Although the book begins by defining love and beauty under separate headings, its central chapters connect them as formative elements in one another. Physical attraction, the maturation of feeling, and artistic expression remain distinct but mutually influential dimensions.

The Uses and Limits of Classical Poetics

The vocabulary of rasa, figures of speech, classifications of heroines, and dhvani assists close reading; excessive classification, however, may obscure the particular voice of a lyric, its irony, satire, and social tensions. It is more appropriate to preserve the independence of the literary text alongside the classificatory scheme.

A Critical Rereading of Female Characters

Alongside extended descriptions of Radha's body, beauty, and gestures, her desire, dissent, voice, wounded pride, and separation should also occupy the centre of inquiry. The heroine then emerges not simply as the object of a masculine gaze but as a feeling and speaking subject.

Popular Life and Language

The presence of popular consciousness, idioms, Nachari, and Maheshvani reveals the importance of Maithili's social life. Investigating the mutual relationship between poetic form and linguistic practice would strengthen a historical reading of Vidyapati.

The Possibilities of Comparative Literature

The book's discussion of traditions in several languages is especially important. A comparative inventory of parallel lyric structures, translations, adaptations, melodic traditions, and later literary reception would make the study of influence more securely evidence-based.

Critical Extension and Close Reading

The book's conceptual, psychological, character-centred, poetic-theoretical, popular-cultural, and influence-oriented components are interconnected. An integrated conclusion should do more than declare Vidyapati to be 'a poet of love and beauty'. It should examine what kinds of love are given form, through which linguistic resources, and within which social circumstances and traditions of song.

A conclusion becomes more valuable when it distinguishes four things: its main propositions, the textual evidence for them, alternative interpretations, and the limitations of its findings. Problems of variant readings of Vidyapati's lyrics, poetic attribution, the historical character of his language, and women's voices hold particular importance for future scholarship.

Comprehensiveness and Breadth

The study extends from wide-ranging philosophical premises to poetics, social background, and later influence. Its breadth protects Vidyapati from the narrow identification of him as solely a 'poet of shringara'. Yet breadth does not in itself amount to depth. The more subjects a study includes, the greater the evidentiary discipline required for each conclusion. Clarifying the connections among the chapters is therefore a principal demand upon the conclusion.

Innovative Directions in the Reading of Poetry

Future research must attend equally to the analysis of lyric speakers, the heroine's desire and resistance, the singable structures of songs, linguistic textual variants, the cultural meanings of the vernacular, and historical evidence for influence. The questions raised here are critical proposals of the present study, not established conclusions of the author of the work under review. Maintaining this distinction helps readers understand the boundaries between established scholarship and renewed evaluation.

Overall Critical Assessment

A distinctive achievement of the book is its multilayered architecture. A framework extending from general theories of love to poetic form, characterisation, shringara, popular consciousness, and the study of influence offers readers a multidimensional introduction to Vidyapati's love poetry as a whole. This does not mean that all of its claims are beyond dispute; their scholarly validity must be assessed at different levels.

The central criterion of literary criticism is textual evidence. Here one must bring together words, sounds, the arrangement of lyric lines, speakers, alambana and uddipana, social customs, and textual variants. The author's classifications provide a useful map; the map is not the territory itself. Every example needs interpretation in the light of its particular meaning.

Within traditional discourses of love and beauty, fresh readings are possible of female characters' agency, emotional resistance, social propriety, and conflicting desires. This is a critical proposal of the present study, not a direct quotation of the author's avowed position.

The theoretical comparison of Western aesthetics and Indian rasa theory is useful, but it would be inappropriate to erase their historical and cultural differences. The distinctive words and forms of Vidyapati's poetry, its traditions of singing, and Mithila's cultural references must remain at the centre of attention.

Integrated Conclusion

The active tension among language, society, and poetry in Agni-Shikha and Athato Kavya Jijnasa acquires a more systematic intellectual form in the critical essays of Pratham Purush. Popular consciousness gains artistic force not through declarations alone but through the organisation of imagery, style, rhythm, and the speaking position. The relationship between Mallick the poet and Mallick the critic becomes apparent in this dual undertaking.

Drama and Theatre: Nature and Models opens the performative dimension of this literary outlook. To write the history of Maithili drama, dramatic texts alone are insufficient; actual acting, institutions, audiences, songs, stage directions, and the social contexts of folk performance must also be considered. Literature becomes a communal experience at the moment when the written word acquires body, voice, and time upon the stage.

Mallick's discussion of love and beauty in Vidyapati turns attention towards the long historical inheritance of Maithili literature. Yet the conventional categories of shringara, rasa, figures of speech, and the classification of heroines should not become final judgments upon a poem. Questions concerning the speaker of love, women's experiences, vernacular language, lyrical expression, and transformation into later languages further enrich literary meaning.

The common conclusion arising from these five works is that cultural respect and independence of judgment must coexist in the criticism of Maithili literature. Mallick's poetry and criticism alike invite readers who recognise social inequality, possess discernment concerning beauty of form, and ask fresh questions within their own tradition. This sustained questioning gives rise to the ever-new possibilities of his literary work.

Expanded Bibliography

The principal works discussed in this book and relevant books on the subjects examined are listed below. The entries provide bibliographic details of books, editions, publishers, and publication years only; web references are excluded.

A. Primary Works by Virendra Mallick Discussed in This Study

Mallick, Virendra. Agni-Shikha. Poetry collection. Verified particulars of the publication year, edition, and publisher are not available.

Mallick, Virendra. Athato Kavya Jijnasa. Poetry collection. First edition, 2023. Ghaziabad: Antika Prakashan Pvt. Ltd. ISBN 978-93-91925-69-7.

Mallick, Virendra. Pratham Purush. Collection of criticism. 2023. Ankit Prakashan Pvt. Ltd.

Mallick, Dr Virendra. Drama and Theatre: Nature and Models [Natak a Rangmanch: Prakriti a Pratiman]. First edition, 2018. New Delhi: Tirthabhukti. ISBN 978-81-939529-0-0.

Mallick, Dr Virendra. Vidyapati, the Shaper of Love and Beauty [Prem Saundarya Vidhayak Vidyapati]. 2016. Verified particulars of the publisher and edition are not available.

B. Books on Poetics, Dramaturgy, and the Literature of Rama

Bharata Muni. The Natyasastra: A Treatise on Hindu Dramaturgy and Histrionics. Vols. I–II. Translated and edited by Manomohan Ghosh. Calcutta: The Asiatic Society (Vol. I, 1951; Vol. II, 1961).

Vidyapati Thakur. Vidyāpati Padāvalī. Translated by Ananda K. Coomaraswamy and Arun Sen. 1994 edition. New Delhi: Indira Gandhi National Centre for the Arts (IGNCA). ISBN 81-85120-50-1.

Tulsidas. Shri Ramcharitmanas. Gorakhpur: Gita Press. (Various printed editions available.)

Adhyatma Ramayana. Gorakhpur: Gita Press. (Various printed editions available.)

APPENDIX: METHODOLOGICAL NOTE

The Nepal Bikram Samvat years cited have been converted to approximate CE years using the standard offset of BS minus 56–57 years. Web sources consulted include the Videha digital archive (videha.co.in). All URLs were last accessed April 2026. This research was prepared using primary texts, and standard academic resources. All quoted material is from the cited sources. For the most current scholarship, consult the Videha Parallel History series at www.videha.co.in/gajenthakur.htm.

VIDEHA · PARALLEL LITERARY MOVEMENT

A Parallel History of Mithilā & Maithilī Literature

PART II · TOMES V–IX

"The Parallel is not the marginal, but the truthful, in long delay."

TOME V
Treatises, Essays and Literary Criticism

TOME VI
Maithili Narrative Theory: Principles and Practice

TOME VII
Folk Lifeworlds, Language and Cultural Memory

TOME VIII
Fiction, Social Realism and the Maithili Public Sphere

TOME IX
Theatre, Poetics and Literary Criticism

SCAN TO VISIT VIDEHA

videha.co.in

videha-ejournal.github.io/videha

Videha: First Maithili Fortnightly eJournal · ISSN 2229-547X
Published by Videha · Delhi