Finally, viewed through Videha's parallel-history paradigm, the most fundamental limitation is that Ramanand Jha practises the idea of parallel history without explicitly presenting it as a theory. His distinction between 'two categories of writers' comes closest to such an account. Yet it remains a supplement to, rather than an alternative to or challenge against, the mainstream canon represented by Jayakant Mishra's history. Ramanand Jha repeatedly treats Mishra as an authoritative foundation and relies on the information he supplies, whereas the essential work of a parallel history is to interrogate the founding assumptions of the mainstream canon itself. In short, Akhiyāsal provides materials for a parallel history while leaving its theoretical foundations incomplete. It enlarges the canon without dismantling the power structures through which a canon is formed. It is this unfinished task that the Videha movement seeks to pursue through an explicitly articulated theory, institutional archiving, and democratic inclusion.

It must also be said that love of the mother tongue energises the book. Yet at several points this affection becomes cultural triumphalism or excessive suspicion of outside influence, although languages always develop through contact, mixture, and change; national or cultural allegiance, too, is sometimes treated as a value exempt from questioning.

Overall Critical Judgement

The Book's Principal Achievement

Akhiyāsal's most important achievement is its illumination of forgotten regions of literary history. The book asks:

Where should the true beginnings of Maithili fiction be located?

What distinguishes literary influence from translation?

What constitutes evidence for identifying a work as the 'first'?

How does a rare manuscript disappear from history?

What roles do journals, editors, and publishers play in the creation of literature?

Why was the contribution of Maithili writers to the national movement forgotten?

Does the popularity of humour conceal social injustice?

What is the relationship between linguistic purity and linguistic development?

Why did the lives of the poor, the unemployed, and workers fail to change after independence?

How does the writer's individual experience become social experience?

These questions raise the book above the level of an ordinary collection of biographical and bibliographical sketches.

From the Standpoint of Indian Literary Theory

The book extends rasa into the social sphere. Compassion does not simply mean shedding tears over a character's suffering; it also means investigating the social causes of that suffering. Heroism is found not only on the battlefield but also in defending one's mother tongue, standing for truth, and resisting exploitation. Humour is not merely entertainment: it can remove the masks worn by authority and convention. According to the theory of dhvani, the indirect social meanings within many works are more important than the narrative stated explicitly. The principle of aucitya provides grounds for testing historical claims, generic classifications, and the credibility of characters. Yet measured against classical criteria, the limitations of many early mainstream works also become visible: excessive moralising and preaching disrupt rasa; the predominance of literal denotation weakens dhvani; and poetry reduced to slogans destroys the obliqueness of expression associated with vakrokti.

From the Standpoint of Western Theory

New Historicist and Marxist tendencies are particularly pronounced in Akhiyāsal. Literature is connected with power, money, caste, language, institutions, and social movements. The readings of Lalit's and Dhirendra's fiction disclose existential crisis, class exploitation, and the modern individual's experience of meaninglessness. A feminist perspective is present, particularly in the discussions of Nirdayi Sāsu, Sumati, and Chandragrahan; its full possibilities, however, such as a resistant reading of Harilata, remain undeveloped. From a postcolonial perspective, alienation from the mother tongue, the dominance of Hindi and English, and the expulsion of Maithili from public life are abiding concerns of the book.

From Videha's Parallel-History Perspective

Akhiyāsal constructs an alternative genealogy of Maithili literature. It includes:

Shrikrishna Thakur and Chandraprabha;

Jivach Mishra and Rameshwar;

Rasbihari Lal Das and Sumati;

literary workers such as Jansidan and the forgotten Janardan Jha;

devotees of the mother tongue such as Trilochan Jha;

poets of awakening such as Yaduvar and Dwijvar;

a struggling woman poet such as Harilata;

editors such as Lakshmipati Singh;

lyric poets such as Madhup and Mohan;

columnists such as Yatri;

linguistic purists such as Vyas;

institution builders such as Rajeshwar Jha; and socially engaged storytellers such as Kiran, Lalit, Dhirendra, and Prabhas.

All find a place within the same expansive history. It does not regard Mithila merely as a centre of royal dynasties or scholastic learning. Its Mithila includes hungry children, oppressed daughters-in-law, unemployed young people, exploited farmers, an educated class estranged from its mother tongue, printing-press workers, and forgotten editors.

Conclusion: The Dignity of Beginnings and the Legacy of What Remains Unfinished

Akhiyāsal matters not because it delivers a final verdict but because it invites a reconsideration of the history of Maithili literature. The book places alternative questions before established literary history. Its author sees not only the glittering peaks of literary achievement but also the buried bricks beneath them: damaged manuscripts, old journals, hungry characters, a neglected language, and forgotten literary workers. From Pandit Shrikrishna Thakur to Prabhas Kumar Chaudhary, the gradual emergence of realism, nationalism, and social reform in literature becomes visible. At the same time, when this entire body of writing is subjected to the rigorous tests of parallel history, Navya-Nyāya epistemology, and Western and Indian poetics, its structural, ideological, and theoretical limitations are also exposed: survivals of feudal mentality, the limits of reformism, patriarchal prejudice, and the absence of authentic voices from dispossessed communities. Literature can become fully parallel and credible only when it frees itself from state patronage and feudal dominance, and represents the reality of the exploited with complete epistemological courage and without recourse to fallacious reasoning.

Its strength lies where:

the author searches for archives;

corrects received errors;

restores forgotten writers to view;

reveals connections between social life and literature; maintains critical distance even while offering praise; and places the mother tongue and the lives of ordinary people at the centre of literary history.

Its limitations appear where:

conjecture replaces evidence;

biography outweighs analysis of the work;

subject matter conceals the beauty of form;

evaluative standards become unstable;

national or cultural commitments become unquestioned values; and the voices of women, Dalits, and the lower classes are not granted sufficient independence.

The conclusion of the overall assessment is that Akhiyāsal is a progressive, courageous, and historically indispensable work of its period, whose originality is inseparable from its limitations. Its virtues—its courage in investigating literary beginnings, its recovery of forgotten authors, its sociological insights, its original conception of 'two categories of writers', and its attempt to free Maithili literary history from a person-centred canon and make it people-centred—establish it as a milestone in Maithili criticism. At the same time, its limitations—the inconsistencies inherent in compilation, the unavailability of primary texts, unstable standards of value, inadequate theoretical inquiry, a restricted perspective, doubts about textual authenticity, personal bias, and the incomplete theorisation of parallel history—are not merely individual failings. They are consequences of the structural constraints of a period limited by print, lacking digital resources and institutional support.

It is this duality, the inseparability of strengths and limitations, that makes Akhiyāsal a precursor of the Videha parallel-history movement. The gaps identified by Ramanand Jha—public accessibility, archival preservation, and reassessment—become a historical responsibility for succeeding generations. In this sense the work's greatest limitation is also its greatest legacy. The 'eye' in its name evokes a vision courageous enough to see forgotten texts, while 'sāl' evokes the age in which the means of fulfilling that vision were not available; the name Akhiyāsal itself suggests this duality. Even so, the book holds a significant place in Maithili criticism and literary history. It opens the closed doors of history and declares that literature's true tradition is not simply a list of celebrated names; it is a shared parallel history of memory, forgetting, struggle, language, institutions, readers, and the lives of the people.

Appendix: Contents of the Collection, with Original Publication Sources

No.	Chapter / Author under Discussion	Original Publication Source and Date
1	Maithili's First Storyteller, Pandit Shrikrishna Thakur, and Chandraprabha	Mithila Mihir, 18 August 1985
2	Maithili's First Novelist, Pandit Jivach Mishra, and Rameshwar	Mithila Mihir, March 1977

No.	Chapter / Author under Discussion	Original Publication Source and Date
3	Rasbihari Lal Das and the Novel Sumati	Hālchāl, issue 1/1986
4	Janardan Jha ‘Jansidan’ and Nirdayi Sāsu	Mithila Mihir, June 1982
5	Pandit Janardan Jha: A Forgotten Literary Worker	Mithila Mihir Daily, 29 July 1985
6	Pandit Trilochan Jha (Bettiah): A Forgotten Devotee of the Mother Tongue	Bhākhā, September 1987
7	Yadunath Jha ‘Yaduvar’: Pioneer Poet of National Consciousness	Bhākhā, 1988
8	Chedi Jha ‘Dwijvar’: Poet and Freedom Fighter	Mithila Mihir Daily, August 1985
9	The Narrative Sensibility of Kumar Ganganand Singh	Mithila Mihir, 24 October 1976
10	The Vaishnavism of Poet Harilata	Maithili Prakāsh, September 1972
11	The Subjects of Poet Shyamanand Jha	Mithila Mihir, 23 November 1975
12	Babu Lakshmipati Singh and Maithili Journalism	Basāt, inaugural issue, 1984
13	The Lyric Poetry of Poet Chudamani Madhup	Mithila Mihir, October 1987
14	The Bhaṭṭikāvya Tradition and Madhup	Mithila Mihir, issue 12/1987
15	The Fictional World of Kanchinath Jha ‘Kiran’	Mithila Mihir, May 1977
16	The Women Characters of Chandragrahan in the Context of the Maithili Novel	All India Maithili Literary Council, 1989
17	Professor Harimohan Jha and His Charchari	Maithili Academy Patrikā, March 1984
18	Poet Yatri's Column Writing	Mithila Mihir
19	Poet R. C.	Maithili Academy Patrikā, 1982
20	Upendra Thakur ‘Mohan’ and His Poetry	Maithili Academy Patrikā, 1989
21	Upendranath Jha ‘Vyas’: A Purist Storyteller	Mithila Mihir
22	Pandit Rajeshwar Jha: Life and Works	Mihir, 1978

No.	Chapter / Author under Discussion	Original Publication Source and Date
23	The Transitional Life of the Social Milieu in Lalit's Stories	Mihir, 1975
24	The Social Context of Dhirendra's Stories	June 1988
25	Prabhas's Journey in Fiction	Mithila Mihir, 1986

Bibliography

1. Ramanand Jha ‘Raman’, Akhiyāsal. Central Institute of Indian Languages (CIIL), Mysore, 1995.

2. Jayakant Mishra, A History of Maithili Literature (Maithili Sāhityak Itihās).

3. Karunakant Jha, research dissertation concerning Maithili literature, cited in Akhiyāsal.

4. Gajendra Thakur, A Parallel History of Mithila and Maithili Literature. Videha: The First Fortnightly Maithili E-Journal, Part 1. https://www.videha.co.in/new_page_1.htm

5. Gajendra Thakur, A Parallel History of Mithila and Maithili Literature. Videha: The First Fortnightly Maithili E-Journal, Part 27. https://www.videha.co.in/new_page_27.htm

6. Gajendra Thakur, A Parallel History of Mithila and Maithili Literature. Videha: The First Fortnightly Maithili E-Journal, Part 28. https://www.videha.co.in/new_page_28.htm

7. Gajendra Thakur, A Parallel History of Mithila and Maithili Literature. Videha: The First Fortnightly Maithili E-Journal, Part 90. https://www.videha.co.in/new_page_90.htm

8. Gajendra Thakur, Collected Writings. Videha: The First Fortnightly Maithili E-Journal. https://www.videha.co.in/gajenthakur.htm

9. Periodicals in which the original essays first appeared: Mithila Mihir, Mithilāmod, Bhākhā, Maithili Academy Patrikā, Basāt, Hālchāl, Maithili Prakāsh, and commemorative publications of the All India Maithili Literary Conference/Council (1972–1989).

II. "Hiāol": Indian Poetics, Western Literary Theory and the Parallel-History Perspective

Abstract

"Hiāol": An Extended Critical Appreciation through Indian Poetics, Western Literary Theory and the Videha Parallel-History Perspective (Dr Ramanand Jha 'Raman', Maithili Criticism, Akhiyāsal Prakashan, Lalganj, Sarisab-Pahi, Madhubani, 2012). Following Akhiyāsal, Besāhal and Bhajāral, Dr Ramanand Jha 'Raman's fourth collection of criticism, Hiāol (2012), belongs to that rare tradition of Maithili criticism which, free of factional entanglements, takes texts, periodicals and archival documents as its evidence. The title itself announces the author's modest method: hiāol means something sounded out or estimated. This choice of word acknowledges the inexhaustible possibilities of research instead of indulging in self-congratulation; in the language of Kshemendra's theory of propriety, the title already plants the seed of propriety in the design of the work.

Keywords: Hiāol · Indian · poetics · Western · theory · parallel · history

"Hiāol": An Extended Critical Appreciation through Indian Poetics, Western Literary Theory and the Videha Parallel-History Perspective

—Gajendra Thakur

(Dr Ramanand Jha 'Raman', Maithili Criticism, Akhiyāsal Prakashan, Lalganj, Sarisab-Pahi, Madhubani, 2012)

1. Introduction: The Book and the Significance of "Hiāol"

After Akhiyāsal, Besāhal and Bhajāral, Dr Ramanand Jha 'Raman's fourth collection of criticism, Hiāol (2012), is part of that rare Maithili critical tradition which escapes factionalism and proceeds by treating texts, journals and archives as evidence. The book's very title announces a modest methodological position: hiāol—something sounded out, gauged or conjectured. Such a choice recognises the open-ended possibilities of investigation rather than proclaiming the critic's own greatness; in the vocabulary of Kshemendra's theory of aucitya, or propriety, the title itself contains the beginnings of prabandhaucitya, the propriety of an entire composition. In his author's note, Raman acknowledges that these essays do not belong to the category of entertaining literature: he has deliberately chosen difficult and relatively inaccessible subjects which deserve study but rarely attract public attention. In his cover note, Pandit Govind Jha remarks, with characteristic poignancy, that other well-known Maithili critics detect a stale smell in earlier literature and inherited tradition, whereas Raman enjoys "rice cooked from old grain, with fresh curd": they mistake his simultaneous preservation and fresh appraisal of tradition for ancestor-worship. In his foreword, Phoolchandra

Mishra 'Raman' rightly observes that the collection brings criticism and counter-criticism together; its purpose is not to diminish anyone's standing but to place questions on the table for discussion—"vāde vāde jāyate tattvabodhaḥ," understanding of truth arises through sustained debate.

The book contains seventeen chapters dealing with linguistics, literary history, counter-criticism, fiction, poetry, epic, folk ballad, folksong, journalism, natural disaster, cultural imperialism and linguistic colonialism. Its table of contents makes clear the sweep from Grierson's language studies to the new tactics of colonialism. These seventeen essays fall readily into three groups. First comes language thought and language politics: "The Study of Maithili and the Mithila Language"; "Ramanath Jha and the Mithila Language"; "Maithili Folksongs: Condition and Preservation"; and "The New Tactics of Colonialism." Second comes counter-criticism centred on writers and works: "Kiran as Counter-Critic"; "Reading Kanyādān through the Eyes of the Neglected"; "Lakshmipati Singh, an Unexamined Poet"; "Yatri's Language"; and "Unexamined Aspects of Manmohan Jha's Stories." Third comes a historical approach organised by genre and tendency: "The Contribution of Migrants to the Development of Maithili Journalism"; "Dīnābhadrī in the Maithili Folk Ballad"; "The Development of the Maithili Story: Some New Facts"; "Mithila's Earthquakes in Poetry"; "What Have You Taken Away, Mother Kosi?"; "The Age and the Maithili Epic"; "Social Consciousness in the New Song"; and "Current Trends in Maithili Poetry." In this threefold structure, the four aspects of Raman's critical personality—the linguist, textual critic, historian and counter-critic—appear together.

This is not a linear literary history but a gathering of parallel narratives which question accepted conclusions. The author's central concerns are to restore forgotten writers and works to visibility, expose the incompleteness of previous criticism, undo the artificial division between folk and cultivated literature, connect the development of Maithili language and letters with power, society, geography and history, and make visible the women, Dalits, labourers, migrants, villagers, flood victims and linguistic communities submerged beside the main historical narrative. Raman himself regards criticism as close scrutiny of the strengths and weaknesses of a work's language, craft, facts, subject matter, characters and characterisation. For him criticism is not merely a search for faults; it must also illuminate merits, and he attaches particular importance to the preservation and evaluation of literature, even beyond its creation.

2. Critical Method: Three Criteria

The present evaluation rests on three criteria.

The Basis in Indian Poetics

The first criterion is Indian poetics: Bharata's theory of the production of rasa; Anandavardhana's doctrine of dhvani or suggestion; Kuntaka's vakrokti, oblique expression; Kshemendra's account of aucitya or propriety; universalisation (sādhāraṇīkaraṇa); the perspective of public welfare (lokamaṅgala); and the Nyāya inquiry into the means of valid knowledge, especially the question of evidence from absence, which repeatedly surfaces in Raman's own reasoning. Rasa theory tests the emotional experience ultimately produced by a literary work. Dhvani reveals the social, political and cultural meanings latent behind explicit statements. Vakrokti attends to the beauty of creative language, symbols, irony and deviation from ordinary expression. Aucitya examines the mutual consistency of subject, language, character, occasion and conclusion. Universalisation asks how a private experience becomes a shared experience. The lokamaṅgala perspective evaluates literature's social usefulness, resistance to injustice and contribution to the public good.

The Basis in Western Literary Theory

The second criterion consists of Western theoretical approaches: postcolonial discourse, New Historicism, sociolinguistics, stylistics, textual criticism, reception aesthetics or reader-response theory, Marxist and subaltern perspectives, feminism, Dalit criticism and ecocriticism. A formalist approach analyses the arrangement of language, structure, symbols, repetition and modes of narration. Reader-response theory treats meaning not as fixed but as constituted through the reader's experience. A Marxist approach foregrounds class, labour, production, exploitation and structures of power. Feminist criticism examines women's silences, bodies, labour, education, rights and representation. Dalit and subaltern approaches seek the voices and self-representation of communities suppressed in history. A postcolonial approach brings to light the continuing colonial domination of language, education, knowledge and culture. New Historicism relates literary works to the power, institutions, economy and social conflicts of their time. Ecocriticism examines the interdependence of human beings, rivers, plants, animals and birds, land and catastrophe.

The Videha Parallel-History Perspective

The third criterion is the Videha perspective on parallel literary history. Alongside the histories of dynasties, royal courts, scriptures, established authors and institutions, it writes a history of ordinary lives; instead of institutionally sponsored canons, it places neglected, unexamined, folk-rooted and archivally attested traditions at the centre. Mithila in this perspective is not merely a political territory but a cultural geography. The Maithili-speaking regions of India and Nepal belong to a long common cultural continuum. History belongs not only to kings but also to peasants, women, Dalits, Musahars, labourers, singers, journalists, migrants and victims of disaster. Literary history includes not just published books but oral transmission, ritual narratives, songs, unpublished manuscripts and forgotten authors; rivers, floods, earthquakes, migration and linguistic displacement become historical forces in their own right. This third criterion is especially apt for Hiāol, because many of its chapters—"An Unexamined Poet," "Unexamined Aspects," "Through the Eyes of the Neglected" and "Some New Facts"—are themselves exercises in constructing counter-canons, preliminary experiments in parallel historiography. Hiāol's central achievement lies precisely in this consciousness of parallel history. Approximately half of the present evaluation is devoted to the limitations of the individual chapters: that, too, accords with Raman's declared principle that criticism is not a testimonial of congratulation and need not be agreeable.

3. Chapter-by-Chapter Achievements and Critical Appreciation

3.1 The Study of Maithili and the Mithila Language

Tracing Western linguistic scholarship from Colebrooke (1801) to Grierson, the opening essay poses a piercing question: why, despite Maithili's long and uninterrupted literary tradition, was its grammar written so late? It dismantles Colebrooke's narrow assertion that Maithili was neither a rich language nor one possessing any distinguished poets. By setting the original English evidence before the reader, Raman shows how Beames (1872), Kellogg, Hoernlé (1880) and finally Grierson (1881) came to recognise Maithili as an independent language; the earliest Western investigations, however, were less studies of Maithili than exercises in gathering specimens for administrative convenience. The chapter is especially important from a postcolonial standpoint. Its citations of Macaulay's observation of 1835—why spend money on a language no one will study without government payment?—and Trevelyan's remarks of 1864 expose a language policy governed by colonial utility. The irony-laden proposition that "George Abraham Grierson was the first originator of Bihari identity" exemplifies the New Historicist insight linking the politics of naming with the politics of identity. Grierson appears here as a dual figure: on one hand, his survey lends Maithili a separate identity and authenticates its distinctive sound system and verbal morphology, helping free it from the shadow of Hindi; on the other, an aggregate label such as "Bihari" compresses linguistic diversity into a convenient category of colonial administration.

A major achievement of this chapter is its refusal to equate language development merely with the history of grammar-writing. Raman explains Maithili's decline through sociolinguistic criteria of functional load and functional transparency: as a language loses ground in government, education, the courts, commerce and public life, its social capacity also diminishes. Archival indications of Maithili as an administrative language under the Karnata rulers, Nepalese state records, and the celebrated remark addressed to Bholalal Das—"If Maithili is recognised, Mithila will come alive..."—reveal the political underside of the making of Bihar. The distinction between traditional and pedagogical grammar, and the discussion of the five levels of pedagogical grammar, are among the most systematic presentations of their kind in Maithili. From the Videha parallel-history perspective, this chapter matters because it grounds linguistic history not simply in governmental recognition but in inscriptions, everyday usage, grammatical writing and the reach of cultural practices. Language crosses political frontiers to become a civilisational continuum.

3.2 Ramanath Jha and the Mithila Language

The longest essay, the backbone of the collection, offers a model of counter-criticism. On the occasion of Acharya Ramanath Jha's birth centenary (1906–2006), it examines the archival record behind the heap of allegations made against him both during his lifetime and after his death. Rare evidence, including Shashinath Chaudhary's council report of 1932, is used to argue that accusations of a conspiracy concerning Maithili's recognition at Patna University are unsupported by fact. The episode of removing Ramanath Jha's half-page "apology" from the fourth edition of Chanda Jha's Mithila Bhāshā Rāmāyaṇa, compared with the Soviet removal of a leader's remains from a mausoleum following accusations of a "cult of personality," is counter-criticism at its sharpest: local literary politics acquire meaning in the light of world history.

The latter part offers a systematic rereading of Ramanath Jha's contributions to teaching, curriculum construction, research, linguistic recognition, editing and literary history. Treating him as a central pillar of Maithili criticism, Raman identifies five kinds of historical evidence for the antiquity of the Mithila language: the dohā in Kalidasa's Vikramorvaśīyam, the metrical forms in Prākṛta Paiṅgala, the Caryāpadas of Siddhas associated with the Sahaja tradition discovered in Nepal, the utterances of Dāk, and Vidyapati's compositions in Avahaṭṭa. The discussion of the sayings attributed to the Buddha and Mahavira and of Ardhamagadhi, the continuity of language in ancient Videha, the distribution of Tirhuta script, Pandit Jivanath Ray's concern for standardisation, and Maharaja Lakshmishwar Singh's historic order of 1880—which permitted Devanagari and Hindi to enter official administration and contributed ultimately to the displacement of Tirhuta (Mithilakshar)—turn this chapter into a document of language politics. Most original is the reappraisal of Ramanath Jha's work through the four phases of language management associated with Haugen and Ferguson: selection, codification, elaboration of functions and acceptance. Raman demonstrates that Ramanath Jha was already undertaking language planning for Maithili according to the processes of a discipline not yet formally established. The concept of diglossia, the differentiation of linguistic levels in a bilingual setting, successfully brings sociolinguistic analysis to bear on Maithil society's linguistic reality.

In the Indian critical tradition, the critic is termed a sahrdaya, a responsive and discerning reader. In this chapter Raman understands such responsiveness not as uncritical adulation but as historical justice. He insists that a person's contribution must be assessed in relation to the times, institutional constraints and resources within which that person worked. From a reader-response perspective, the chapter illustrates how successive generations judge the same personality differently: what was laboriously established by the founding generation becomes an ordinary convenience for later generations, and the founding struggle is consequently forgotten. At the level of Videha parallel history, the chapter asks how the institutions of Maithili language and literature were built. Universities, curricula, literary organisations and individual scholarship were interconnected. Literary history is therefore not only the history of published texts but also a history of institution-building.

3.3 Kiran as Counter-Critic

This essay confers theoretical standing on the term pratyālocanā—criticism of criticism—in Maithili critical discourse. For Raman, this practice is a sign of society's intellectual mobility and vitality. His threefold analysis of Dr Kanchinath Jha ‘Kiran’ as a popular critic, literary critic and counter-critic, together with his division of writers into three classes—those transcending their age, those following it, and consciously oppositional writers—shows a methodologically alert criticism. He sympathetically presents Kiran's new propositions: that Varṇaratnākara is a work of poetry; that folk literature exceeds elite literature in significance; that Vidyapati was a freedom-seeking combatant; and that the little-known poet Fatur Lal, rather than Chanda Jha, inaugurated the modern age. Yet he also unsparingly exposes contradictions. Kiran sharply repudiates Ramanath Jha's interpretation of Radha and Krishna, but elsewhere calls Vidyapati's heroine an imaginary character shaped by courtly convention and thus, by another route, approaches the same interpretation. In discussing Kulanand Mishra's comments on a lunar eclipse, Raman arrives at something like an ethical maxim for criticism: a work's ideas must be examined neither with a devotee's submissiveness nor by imposing the critic's own doctrine upon its author.

Kiran raises a critical voice against caste hierarchy, convention, superstition, the devaluation of labour and social inequality. Through Parāśara he confronts questions of labour, hunger, caste division, religious display and relations between women and men, mounting a severe challenge to the pedigree-consciousness and genealogical-register system of an elite scholarly society. From the standpoint of Indian thought, Kiran's criticism is guided by lokamaṅgala, the public good: literary excellence cannot be detached from social responsibility. A Western Marxist reading connects his thought to social production, labour and criticism of the dominant class; from a Dalit perspective he rewrites classical figures in the light of lower-class experience. The concept of the "Maithil eye," placed in opposition to the "enslaved gaze," is an original principle here. It signifies not narrow regionalism but seeing the world through one's own linguistic and cultural experience. In the Videha parallel-history perspective, this restores the dignity of local knowledge and gives voice to subaltern resistance against established elitist historiography.

3.4 Reading Kanyādān through the Eyes of the Neglected Rather Than the Expected

This is among the collection's most challenging chapters, a rare Maithili application of reception aesthetics or reader-response theory. Dividing the readers of Harimohan Jha into three groups—those seeking entertainment, devotees who read as though reciting the Hanuman Chālīsā, and those reading for an understanding of society and narrative —Raman shows that the meaning of a work is shaped by the reader's standpoint. He then proposes a decisive shift of perspective: rather than view the novel through the eyes of the favoured or "expected" figure, an educated groom like C. C. Mishra, read it through the eyes of the neglected Buchchi Dai. This is a feminist method of displacing the centre and making the margins central. Departing from the dominant reading of the novel as comedy, Raman foregrounds Buchchi Dai's silence, lack of education, fear and cultural dislocation. Why does she not speak? Why are decisions about her life made by others? To what extent is educated society responsible for her silence? He attributes Buchchi Dai's illiteracy not to a personal failing but to the "fault of society's structural construction."

The strongest aspect of the argument is the principle that archival evidence must come first. Yashoda in Jansidan's work, who can read the Ramayana; Sumati in Rasbihari Lal Das; Yogamaya in Punyanand Jha; and Mohini in Pulakit Mishra—all female figures from Maithili novels preceding Kanyādān—were literate, not illiterate. This sequence of evidence produces the provocative conclusion that on the question of women's education Harimohan Jha stands behind, not ahead of, his novelistic predecessors. The comparison between Yoganand in Mithilā Darpaṇa and C. C. Mishra in Kanyādān, and the question "Is the uncomprehending person himself responsible for his incapacity, or is society responsible?" subject comedy to the test of propriety and human dignity. The chapter's subtle linguistic observation is that an urban husband and a rural wife do not inhabit the same cultural and linguistic ground: the husband's choice to speak Hindi deepens the woman's silence. This rereading is exceptionally important for feminist criticism. Behind the humour of marriage lie the objectification of women, linguistic inequality, denial of education and patriarchal control. Buchchi Dai becomes not merely a character but a symbol of the uneducated Maithil girl. In the light of dhvani theory, an undertone of karuṇa, pathos, can be heard beneath the novel's laughter. From the Videha parallel-history perspective, the chapter makes visible again the history of women suppressed within a canonical comic work.

3.5 Lakshmipati Singh, an Unexamined Poet

This chapter is an outstanding example of the seminal method of Videha parallel history: bringing an "unexamined" writer back into the record. By gathering poems scattered across newspapers and journals, Raman reconstructs the poetic world of a forgotten writer and presents him as a poet of national consciousness, attachment to Mithila, social reform, women's suffering, floods, exploitation and cultural crisis. He admits that the complete works are not available, and that this is consequently preliminary research. His interpretation of "Śaradāgama" is a practical application of dhvani theory. In the departing monsoon, flowering kāsa grass, still lake and helpless Purandara, he detects ironic suggestions of the government reforms of 1935 and popular discontent. This discovery of political suggestion beneath the literal description of nature vividly illustrates Anandavardhana's artha-antara-saṅkramita mode of suggestion. In his analysis of the poem "Pachhbā," a symbolic scheme in which the violent gust of Western language and culture blows away the resources of Indian vocabulary seems to anticipate cultural imperialism and connects this essay with the collection's final chapter. "Pachhbā" is not merely a westerly wind but a symbol of Western cultural pressure; autumn's arrival signals a weakening of colonial rule. His gloss on the culturally resonant expression "Not Pūrab," the poignant picture of a widow's lament, and the poet's testimony to the twin catastrophes of flood and earthquake together produce the image of a poet who is "impartial" yet committed to Maithili. From a New Historicist perspective, the poems are not isolated objects of beauty but are read alongside the freedom movement, Partition, social reform, floods and the activities of cultural institutions; karuṇa rasa becomes intense in depictions of widows, flood victims and a neglected Mithila. Where established literary histories set aside a poet because his books are unavailable, Raman creates an alternative literary biography from works dispersed in the periodical press —a model instance of recovering a forgotten author.

3.6 Yatri's Language: Word Selection and Word Formation

Through four instruments of stylistics—selection, deviation, parallelism and figurative or oblique presentation—this examination of the poetic language of Vaidyanath Mishra 'Yatri' (Nagarjun) becomes the collection's most theoretically equipped and systematically organised linguistic chapter. It demonstrates the creative conjunction of indigenous words, tatsama borrowings, tadbhava forms and other loanwords in Yatri's poetry. Hybrid formations of indigenous and non-indigenous elements such as "aparojak" (for the creator born from the lotus of Vishnu's navel), "ūttuṅg khopā" and "tapovanī," as well as the expressive force of the verb "dalkab," are subjected to close verbal analysis. At each point Raman explains why, among several possible synonyms, one particular word is indispensable: its selection conveys not just denotative meaning but a character's social position, a speaker's mental state, satire and cultural memory. The discussion resembles a modern adaptation of Kuntaka's varieties of phonetic arrangement and of the obliqueness of the first part of the word. The concept of "deviation" is also related to the classical allowance "niraṅkuśāḥ kavayaḥ"—poets are not bound by ordinary restrictions—a rare bridge between Eastern and Western poetics. From the standpoint of vakrokti, departures from grammatical order, unusual combinations and neologisms transform language from an ordinary vehicle of information into poetic experience; under dhvani theory, a word's contextual suggestion matters more than its dictionary definition. The analysis of new contextual meanings for mythological figures such as Gauri, Kartik, Ganesh and Lakshmi, beyond their lexically sanctioned senses; the use of parallelism in the "Skeleton Series" and the "Uncle Song"; and resemblance, personification and sensory imagery in figurative presentation all provide reliable keys to Yatri's distinctive diction. The notion of Yatri's "geography of language" is noteworthy. Knowing the objects, labour, customs, myths and everyday speech of his linguistic world, the poet uses words that are not ornaments but bearers of living communal experience. Yatri's diction also expresses a many-voiced regional world opposed to an elitist, heavily Sanskritised Maithili.

3.7 Unexamined Aspects of Manmohan Jha's Stories

Manmohan Jha is known as a writer of compassion. This short essay's achievement is to disclose two largely unexamined aspects of his fiction: Indian nationalism and a distinctly Maithil subnational identity. Narendra Babu in "Āhata Ātmā," written against the background of the shooting at the Patna Secretariat in 1942; the story of labourers' suffering concealed beneath the magnificence of the Taj Mahal; "Vīrabhogyā"; Mahashweta in "Saptapadī"; and the sacrifice portrayed in "Mīnākshī" all show that a firm voice of love for the nation and defence of Mithila's culture flows beneath the undercurrent of compassion. From the perspective of rasa, the synthesis of karuṇa and vīra, pathos and heroism, is the stories' essential strength: personal love is transformed into sacrifice for the nation, homeland or cultural identity. Under a New Historicist reading, their emotional worlds are constituted by the independence struggle, foreign invasion and Mithila's cultural memory. In the Videha parallel-history perspective, Mithila is not opposed to the Indian nation but is a distinct cultural unit within it; Maithil subnationalism thus becomes not fragmentation but a layered form of Indianness. Written within ten days of Manmohan Jha's death in 2009, the essay joins tribute and criticism with restraint.

3.8 Migrants' Contribution to the Development of Maithili Journalism

Beginning with a definition of journalism as the impartial dissemination of reading material in accordance with a predetermined purpose, Raman clarifies the distinctions among a periodical, a journalist and journalism. He asks how "journalism" should be understood where a regular, economically self-sustaining newspaper tradition has remained limited in Maithili. Confronting the legal distinction between migrant and resident drawn from foreign-exchange legislation, he argues for the indivisibility of cultural Mithila: the long-unbroken cultural bond between the Nepal Terai and Indian Mithila makes political borders secondary. The journals Maithil-Hitasādhan, published by migrant Maithils in Jaipur in 1905, and Mithilāmod, published in Banaras in 1905, promoted social education, women's education, resistance to orthodoxy, the cultivation of language and a fearless editorial outlook. Their examination, supported by quotations from the journals' introductory declarations, is historically valuable. Particularly subtle is the sociology of knowledge underlying Raman's explanation of editorial independence. Vidyavachaspati Madhusudan Ojha and Mahamahopadhyaya Murlidhar Jha were not dependent on the contemporary centre of power in Darbhanga; they could therefore speak openly. In the terms of public-sphere theory, these periodicals became forums for society's intellectual conversation: questions difficult to raise within Mithila could be voiced boldly in the relatively freer atmosphere of migration. From the Videha parallel-history perspective, migration is not an existence outside Mithila but an extension of its cultural circumference. Jaipur, Banaras, Ajmer, Calcutta, Delhi and Nepal become alternative centres of Maithili consciousness. By proposing that journalism be examined through criteria other than livelihood or commercial occupation, Raman supplies an alternative, parallel framework for its historiography.

3.9 Dīnābhadrī in Maithili Folk Balladry

This chapter brings textual criticism and subaltern studies into contact. Treating Grierson's 1885 collection of the Dīnābhadrī songs as a primary source, Raman asks why later scholars wrote on the basis of their own collected versions without accounting for variations between those versions and the earlier text. He regards this as a kind of literary disorder: to leave Grierson's collection out of consideration and then declare that the "original ballad remains unpublished" is historically indefensible. His comparative study of the two texts—seven chapters against thirteen, differences in the role of Gulami Jat, and the introduction of English words into Dīnābhadrī's speech after independence—is an authentic demonstration of the principle of flexibility in folk balladry. An orally transmitted ballad changes according to performer, period and audience, and this capacity for change is precisely its source of life.

Dina and Bhadri are heroic brothers from the Musahar community. Their revolt against Zorawar Singh's feudal oppression, courage, brotherly affection, trust in panchayat justice ("justice from the panch"), and resistance to the exploiter show that all the classical qualities of heroism were also present in Dalit society. This is a counter-narrative to a conception of heroism centred on royal lineages. The ballad preserves caste oppression, social inequality, courage, justice and communal memory; the worth of a popular hero is established not by royal office but by defending the oppressed community and safeguarding its self-respect. In Dalit criticism, the chapter is particularly significant: the ballad of a community treated by mainstream history as if it had no history becomes an alternative historical archive in its own right. In the Videha parallel-history perspective, Dina and Bhadri are not heroes of the royal court but heroes of oral tradition. That shift redistributes literary and political visibility, while the suggestion that ballads help create contemporary political space connects the study with present-day debates.

3.10 The Development of the Maithili Story: Some New Facts

This is an excellent example of New Historicist rewriting. Raman challenges the established view that Chanda Jha's translation of Puruṣaparīkṣā (1889) was the point of departure for the Maithili story on three grounds: the improbability that the translation circulated widely enough at the time; the unappealing language of a word-for-word rendering, supported by evidence from Jayakant Mishra and Ramanath Jha; and the implausibility of its supposed influence on scholars already educated in Sanskrit—why would they be inspired by a translation? As an alternative, he disputes the notion that the history of Maithili narrative begins only with the modern printed story. He treats the art of storytelling, enumerated among the sixty-four arts in Jyotirishwar's Varṇaratnākara; the oral tradition of the third stream of vrata narratives, including Madhushravani and Sirta-Bista; folk tales; humour and satire; and a long tradition of oral narration as the prehistory of modern fiction. The creative achievement here is his distinction between narrative matter and the art of storytelling. What is told is one thing; the language, pace, voice, dialogue and presentation that hold an audience are another. In this view oral literature is not an immature genre but one with an independent aesthetics.

The proposal to take Shrikrishna Thakur's Candraprabhā—composed by the 1880s and published in 1939—as a starting point for the original Maithili story, the correction of the title "Candrabhāgā" to "Candraprabhā," a reconsideration of the genre of "Vilakṣaṇa Dāmpatya," and questions concerning the date of "Madanrāj Carita" are the chapter's research contributions. In his interpretation of the story of King Rasadhwaj in Candraprabhā—a population's non-cooperation and migration in the face of an oppressive ruler—Raman perceives a symbolic expression of popular anger after the failure of 1857. He reads the relationship between rulers and subjects through the figures of a flower garden and its gardener, and discovers in Vidyasindhu's frog story (Indra, Earth and Frog) an allegory of colonial exploitation and satyagrahi resistance. Such readings are felicitous exercises in the reciprocal interpretation of literature and history, a central New Historicist method. In terms of dhvani, the king's tale becomes a criticism of colonial and feudal oppression.

3.11 Mithila's Earthquakes in Maithili Poetry

The essay opens by questioning, at the level of literary theory, why a Maithili poetic tradition rich in descriptions of nature as a stimulus to emotion has so often neglected nature as an agent of destruction. It examines poetic records of the earthquakes of 1934 and 1988. Comparing the poet Sitaram Jha's "Bhūkampa Varṇana" with Krishnanandan Singh's "Kampakārikā," Raman underlines the latter's value as a historical document, including its account of Mithila's political, social and economic condition before the earthquake. It is not merely a description of devastation but a poetic record of contemporary politics, economic life, corruption, prices and reconstruction. His psychological observation on a trauma experienced at eighteen and kept alive in memory for thirty-eight years before being expressed in poetry, the pictures of Darbhanga Hospital and Chaturbhuj Sthan with their mingling of pathos and irony, and the evidence taken from Yatri, Chandrabhanu Singh, Dhirendra and Jivakant in the 1988 earthquake-poetry anthology together form a miniature history of disaster literature. Dhirendra's perception that humanity becomes one in catastrophe marks the social outcome of karuṇa rasa.

The conjunction of karuṇa and bhayānaka—the pathetic and the terrible—is central to the chapter. Homes, hospitals, temples, markets, palaces and the poor person's hut all fall within the same circumference of destruction; yet the social consequences of an identical natural shock are not equal. Ecocriticism clarifies the difference between a natural event and a socially produced disaster. An earthquake is natural; weak buildings, government neglect, unequal resources and the politics of relief are consequences of human decisions. Within Videha parallel history, catastrophe becomes a legitimate subject of literary history.

3.12 "What Have You Taken Away, Mother Kosi?"

This survey of tendencies in flood literature begins with the anguished outcry of R. C. Prasad Singh and extends through Chanda Jha, Yatri (Kauśikīk Dhār), Lakshmipati Singh, Chandrabhanu Singh, Siyaram Jha 'Saras' and Sukant Som. Kosi and Mithila's other rivers appear in three forms at once: as mothers, as life-giving powers and as agents of destructive flooding. Raman joins the contradiction between the classical prestige of a "river-nourished region" and the realities of annual deluge, hunger, displacement, debt and migration with the folk-song refrain addressed to Mother Kosi. His portrayal of a popular consciousness that interprets disaster as a mother's wrath and seeks to appease her is rich material for cultural studies. Calling Kosi "Mother" creates cultural intimacy, yet the poems also question this mother: devotion and resistance coexist. In Sukant Som's satire on a minister's aerial inspection, the aeroplane flies over figures as gaunt as dried bamboo slats while a smiling green face appears in the newspaper; Raman cites this as a particularly sharp criticism of power. The theft of relief supplies, the coming together of snakes and rats, and environmental damage extend the significance of flood beyond natural catastrophe to political and moral questions. From an ecocritical perspective, the essay crosses anthropocentric boundaries to depict the suffering of birds, egrets, fields, ponds, vegetation and the living environment as a whole. Rivers' natural courses, dams, embankments, systems of relief, official surveys and corruption form a complex political ecology. In Videha parallel history, flood is not an external accident affecting Mithila but a decisive element of its social structure, songs, memory, economy and history of migration.

3.13 The Spirit of the Age in Maithili Epic Poetry

Five epics—Subhadrāharaṇa by Munshi Raghunandan Das, Rādhāviraha by Madhup, Agastyāyanī by Markandeya Pravasi, Tripuṇḍa by Dhirendra

and Parāśara by Kiran—are selected on the basis of five historical concerns: the struggle for independence, women's empowerment, emotional unity within the nation, a young generation committed to labour, and Maithil subnational identity. The method of reading contemporary history through mythological narratives works well as allegorical interpretation: a Subhadrāharaṇa written after receiving a son's letter from prison conveys the tax boycott of the Non-Cooperation movement; Agastyāyanī resolves the language dispute by imagining Tamil and Sanskrit born simultaneously from Shiva's drum; Parāśara proclaims through labour that "food is life," and makes Sita voice Mithila's democratic pride. In accordance with New Historicist theory, mythological characters do not remain imprisoned in ancient time. Arjuna becomes a figure of the freedom fighter's sense of duty; Radha voices women's participation in national life and social reform; Agastya bears the reconciliation of northern and southern India; Shiva becomes a farmer and labourer in Tripuṇḍa; and Parāśara articulates the dignity of work, resistance to caste division, the emptiness of ritual when confronted with hunger, and Maithili identity. The process of sādhāraṇīkaraṇa, or universalisation, in Indian poetics is clear here: particular mythological figures become representatives of modern people's collective aspirations. Careful records of dates of composition and publication also give this chapter credibility as historiography.

3.14 Social Consciousness in the "New Song"

The theoretical contribution of this essay lies in introducing and defining the term na'v gīt, the "new song." It denotes not an age group but an orientation of values: not every song written after the earlier modern song belongs to this new category. The new song moves away from stereotyped inherited subjects, false glory, didacticism and sentimental lament and gives rhythmic form to modern social contradiction, industrialisation, metropolitan suffering, hunger, unemployment and struggle. Treating it as a product of the machine age, Raman defines it by the rhythmic intermingling of intellectual and emotional elements. He draws boundaries between it and four other traditions: the domestic eroticism of older song, Chanda Jha's emotional effusiveness, nostalgic celebrations of a nationalist past, and rhymed verse made for the stage. This is a fine exercise in classification. Intellect and feeling are not enemies within the new song but complement each other; private suffering is universalised into a shared social crisis. Raman's interpretation of Gangesh Gunjan's image of a large tree spreading its leaves over a tiny sprout of dūb grass—as a privileged class overshadowing the new consciousness of the Dalit and oppressed—is a controlled Marxist reading. His analyses of Buddhinath Mishra's early maize crop and Markandeya Pravasi's invocation of Phagun establish the variety of the new song. History written upon sand and a village burning like a little earthen lamp produce powerful suggestions of contemporary inequality. From a Marxist standpoint, the songs criticise privileged classes, failed development schemes, metropolitan dominance and the punishment inflicted on villages; from a formalist standpoint, they are distinctive in their fresh symbols, fragmented images and rhythms of ordinary speech. The chapter sees the variety of the new song not as weakness but as evidence of living development.

3.15 Current Trends in Maithili Poetry

Read at a symposium in Bhubaneswar in 2012, this paper recalls the shared inheritance of the four sister languages of the eastern Magadhan family—Assamese, Odia, Bengali and Maithili—against the background of India's composite culture. With references to Rabindranath Tagore and Subramania Bharati, Vidyapati's influence and the history of colonial linguistic power, it identifies four currents in contemporary Maithili poetry: concern for the crisis confronting humankind, including Jivakant's farewell to a century ravaged by war; opposition to consumerist culture; resistance to cultural imperialism, including the law of the fish in a unilinear model of development on the information highway; and anxiety over the erosion of biological and cultural diversity, seen in the clearing of six bighas and eight kathas of mango groves and in the departure of egrets. Poems by Jivakant and Uday Narayan Singh 'Nachiketa' illuminate the struggle for human survival and cultural autonomy against the monstrosity of consumerism. In a postcolonial reading, the links among information systems, markets, advanced technology and cultural dominance become visible. This does not mean forbidding contact with external cultures; it means refusing one-sided domination that destroys local language, script, ways of living and imagination. In an ecological reading, the loss of biodiversity, indigenous rice and mango varieties, ponds, egrets and natural habitats becomes a concern of modern poetry. The application of Ashby's law of "requisite variety"—that a system needs at least as much internal variety as exists in the environment it must confront—introduces systems thinking into Maithili criticism and moves the question of survival beyond sentiment to a scientific plane. From the Videha parallel-history perspective, Maithili poetry becomes a poetry of resistance defending the shared linguistic life, indigenous knowledge and cultural plurality of India and Nepal.

3.16 Maithili Folksongs: Their Condition and Preservation

Presented as a response to a conference paper at a national seminar in Janakpurdham, this essay connects the Indian classical basis for honouring folk tradition with the parallel expression "loke ca vede ca," in popular practice as well as in the Veda. Raman begins by criticising the descriptive tendency of the paper under discussion and demands not merely a list of folksongs but an analysis of their social functions, transformations and causes of disappearance. What will happen to songs accompanying labour once machines replace the grinding stone and mills replace the wooden rice-pounder? The question is highly pertinent. Raman treats folksongs as a collective emotional archive and a repository of traditional knowledge, medicinal experience, agricultural culture, family relationships and rites of passage. The healing properties attributed to fenugreek and turmeric, the social economy of "fenugreek ground by grandmother," the mythic narratives woven into songs of a washerwoman's marital good fortune, and symbols such as basil, bael and bamboo all form part of experiential folk knowledge. The essay is particularly forceful from a feminist perspective: songs preserve evidence of grief at the birth of a daughter, the pre-ultrasound use of pepper in practices relating to the foetus, the devaluation of girls, the exploitation of wives' labour, dowry, control by mothers-in-law and sisters-in-law, and the bodily desires of newly married women. His rasa-sensitive interpretation of the oblique images in lagnī songs—clove blossoms, a net cast into the Yamuna—challenges the artificial separation of elite and folk expression. As preservation measures, Raman proposes using UNESCO's framework for intangible cultural heritage, including three approaches to identification and seven protective steps: archives, museums, classification by region, trained collectors, sound recordings and returning copies to the communities concerned. Drawing also on collective consciousness and Ogburn's account of diversity in cultural elements, he argues that popular cultural power should underpin Nepal's new democracy. The discussion reaches a level of practical policy rarely achieved in Maithili criticism. In Videha parallel history, the folksong is not amusement produced by an "uneducated" community; it is society's living history.

3.17 The New Tactics of Colonialism

The concluding essay marks a practical high point in the collection's postcolonial thought, exposing the persistence of linguistic colonialism after political independence. A detailed examination of Kiswahili in Tanzania—the determination to make it a medium of instruction after independence in 1962, economic crisis, the conditions attached by the World Bank and International Monetary Fund, privatisation, and the restoration of English through British aid programmes—leads Raman to the proposition that, after formal political colonialism has ended, linguistic and cultural colonialism continues through new mechanisms of economic assistance. Parallel instances from Madagascar, Zambia, Malaysia and India, including the case of Karpoori Thakur, strengthen the argument. Equally provocative is his close reading of two visits in Patna on the same day, 19 November 2008: a British minister's visit to a girls' school and a visit by the United States embassy to a women's college. He interprets these events as a deliberate effort to turn newly developing areas of female education into spheres of influence for colonial languages.

From a postcolonial standpoint, Raman's principal proposition is that the mere withdrawal of colonial rulers does not terminate colonialism. So long as control persists over the language of government, the standards of knowledge, the medium of education and access to employment, colonial power survives in new forms. In India, the growth of private English-medium schools, the educated classes' sense of inferiority towards local languages and the interruption of language transmission within families across generations together create a twofold crisis for Maithili. Fishman's account of language shift supplies a warning: without intergenerational transmission of the mother tongue, language maintenance is impossible; a language no longer passed from one generation to the next faces extinction. Examples of Maithili disappearing as the family language in Maithil households make the essay a warning about "the two-sided assault on Maithili." From the Videha parallel-history perspective, its most affecting element is the rupture of language within the family. When grandparents can no longer speak with their grandchildren, what breaks is not merely a vocabulary but stories, songs, rites, popular knowledge and collective memory.

4. Chapter-by-Chapter Limitations, Contradictions and Incompleteness

Raman himself maintains that criticism is not a letter of congratulation: to refute an expressed view with evidence, or to disagree with it, is not an insult. In literary criticism, offering praise alone is tantamount to fostering factionalism and the narrow confines of a circle of friends. Accordingly, the limitations, class-based exclusions and theoretical incompleteness of each chapter are examined below by precisely the same standard, and with precisely the same respect. These limitations do not diminish the value of the book; rather, they open the way for further inquiry through the principle that understanding arises from continued debate—vāde vāde jāyate.

4.1 The Study of Maithili and the Mithila Language: Limitations

The first limitation lies in the choice of sources. The chapter is founded largely on the testimony of Western scholars—Colebrooke, Beames, Hoernle and Grierson. Indigenous grammatical consciousness before Dinbandhu Jha—the linguistic records of the pañjī registers, the tendency towards lexical compilation in Jyotirishwar's time, and evidence of Maithili usage in the Sanskrit commentarial tradition—remains almost untouched. Consequently, the essay comes to depend upon the very source material of the colonial epistemology it criticises: a familiar self-contradiction in postcolonial discourse. Second, the contradictions of colonial knowledge production are not analysed sufficiently. Grierson's work was both a means of recognising Maithili and an instrument of colonial census-taking, classification and administration. To view Campbell's vocabulary collection of 1874 merely as an administrative convenience, while failing to recognise the class-discriminatory aspect of Grierson's dialectal divisions—his description of an eastern form as "gāwārī" and of the speech of lower-status groups as the "jolhā dialect"—is to forgo a critique of Orientalist knowledge-gathering that could have illuminated this duality more thoroughly. Third, the principles of functional load and functional transparency are introduced, but there is no domain-by-domain account or comparative evaluation of Maithili in education, administration, commerce, religion and communication. The theory remains at the level of examples drawn from English and Sanskrit; Maithili itself is not measured. Fourth, the question of the social rights of other dialectal forms in defining "standard Maithili"—which structures of power produce a standard—remains unanswered. The causes of the language's decline are concentrated in external assault and administrative neglect; the roles of caste divisions within Maithil society, linguistic indifference among educated groups, the lack of education for women and economic structures receive comparatively little analysis. Fifth, the abundance of untranslated English footnotes excludes readers unable to read English, while the essay closes in a series of questions. Readers are left to assemble for themselves the coherent conclusion to the inquiry into why the writing of a grammar was delayed.

4.2 Ramanath Jha and the Mithila Language: Limitations

The longest chapter in the collection is structurally loose. Counter-criticism, biography, the antiquity of the language, questions of script, standardisation and language planning—the material of six separate essays—have been confined beneath a single heading, blunting the argument at several points. Second, despite the declared commitment to balance, the tone sometimes becomes less a critical assessment of a life and more a defensive tribute. Kiran's objections are called "emotional" and "not well considered," yet the author's own expressions for the opposing side—"kau-carya-pravīṇa," "khidhāṃs" and "laṭuāel-dabakal"—are hardly free from emotion. The neutrality demanded by the counter-critic is sometimes compromised by his own language; without a fair reconstruction of the opposing argument, the reply loses credibility. Third, showing that Ramanath Jha's earlier work accords with the later theories of Haugen and Ferguson is attractive, but carries an equally substantial risk of anachronism. The essay does not examine whether the correspondence reflects deliberate planning or an accidental parallel. Fourth, in the eagerness to establish Maithili's extreme antiquity, some conclusions concerning the epics, the Buddhist period or ancient territories appear to rest more upon cultural inference than linguistic proof. The antiquity of the name "Mithila" does not by itself establish the uninterrupted existence of the present Maithili language in an unchanged form. Fifth, the chapter is nearly silent on Ramanath Jha's own limitations: the dullness of his word-for-word translations, which the author himself discusses in Chapter 10; the practical failures of his model of standardisation; and the question of whether privileging the speech of elite groups in standardisation devalued the Maithili of other classes and regions. To defend a person and to defend a theory are not identical undertakings; excessive praise risks turning a fully human character into an idealised statue. Sixth, the rebuttal of the allegation concerning the closure of Sāhitya-Patra relies more upon argument than on archives. No documents establish the periodical's finances, subscriber numbers or direct reasons for closure.

4.3 Kiran as a Counter-Critic: Limitations

First, the chapter's central proposition—that Kiran's criticism was essentially counter-criticism, rather than arising from independent immersion in literary works—risks serious reductionism. Counter-criticism is reactive by nature, and Kiran's ideas here emerge mainly through the rejection of earlier judgements; his independent aesthetic standards are not reconstructed systematically enough. The question of "reactionism," raised by the author himself, is left without a complete answer. Posing a question and avoiding its resolution is an incomplete discharge of the critic's responsibility. Second, the selection of quotations used to demonstrate contradictions is one-sided. Passages in which Kiran may have corrected or refined his own opinions have not been sought out. Changes of view across forty years of a thinker's writing may indicate development, not merely inconsistency. Third, the episode of Kulanand Mishra and the lunar eclipse is incomplete: Mishra's original argument is not presented in full, and only the portion susceptible to refutation is quoted. Fourth, the insistence upon social justice and lokamaṅgala, the welfare of the people, is important; yet measuring literature exclusively by ideological usefulness risks devaluing form, rhythm, complexity, humour, contradiction and artistic freedom. Conversely, confining Kiran's revolutionary class perspective within the framework of traditional figures-of-speech theory may blunt its social edge. The internal dismantling of the Dūṣaṇa Pañjī and of the purity codes associated with hereditary rank, towards which Kiran's writings pointed, has not been fully developed. Fifth, the "Maithil eye" is a powerful conception of a local standpoint, but its boundaries remain unclear: does it embrace the experiences of Maithils across caste, gender, class, religion and region, or does a culturally educated, male-centred perspective reassert itself in the name of "all Mithila"? Sixth, the relationship between Kiran's poetic works —such as Parāśara—and his prose criticism, the two aspects of the poet-critic, is not examined. The former is taken up separately in Chapter 13 without a bridge between the two. Moreover, in seeking modern nationalism, class struggle or democratic values in older works, adequate care has not always been taken to preserve historical distance.

4.4 Reading Kanyādān: Limitations

The first limitation of this forceful essay is that its succession of questions remains unanswered. "Who is responsible?" is asked repeatedly—illiteracy, parents, relatives, society?—but the author provides no evidenced judgement of his own. The undertaking to read through the eyes of the neglected woman is ultimately suspended in an interrogative posture. Second, the dimension of hāsya-rasa, comic sentiment, which underlies the novel's popularity, receives no examination grounded in rasa theory. Is the object of laughter the innocent Buchchi, or the semi-educated society itself? Through what arrangement does a current of pathos flow beneath the humour? How do the narrator's distance and the double meaning of irony operate, and what does the reader's uneasy laughter signify? These questions remain untouched. At several points the rereading turns into a charge sheet, while it is methodologically hazardous to treat every act of a fictional character as direct social reality and then find the author or work morally culpable: Kanyādān is a work of humour, satire, irony, exaggeration and the construction of social types. Third, the absence of any discussion of Dvirāgaman, in which Harimohan Jha himself composed the sequel, means that the assessment rests upon half the text. Only a reading of the pair of novels together could adequately judge the author's perspective. Fourth, the table of literate female characters in earlier novels supplies quantitative evidence. Without a qualitative comparison of how central their literacy is to those narratives, and how central Buchchi's illiteracy is to hers, the claim of a "step backwards" cannot be considered fully proved. Fifth, the possibility that Buchchi's illiteracy is itself a deliberately fashioned weapon of satire—a mirror held before society—is not addressed. Nor are Buchchi Dai's possible inner consciousness, the resistant meaning of silence, relations among women or the breadth of domestic knowledge fully developed. Sixth, the question of linguistic inequality between husband and wife is valuable, but treating the mere use of Hindi as conclusive evidence of cultural estrangement may be too simple. The combined effects of class, education, the urban–rural divide and unfamiliarity within marriage needed examination.

4.5 Lakshmipati Singh, the Unexamined Poet: Limitations

The author himself admits that from the scattered poems he could gather "only a few." This candid admission is commendable, but it means that conclusions about the poet's impartiality and victimisation by an intolerant age rest upon a limited sample. Their validity as generalisations remains questionable: exceptional care is required before determining a poet's whole outlook from scattered examples. Second, certain images of nature are treated as straightforward political metaphors. The "western wind" (Pachhabā) may indeed symbolise Western culture, and the "coming of autumn" (Śaradāgama) may signify colonial decline, but such interpretations require support from the internal structure of the poems, evidence of the circumstances of composition and other poems. Biographical facts and poetic meaning are sometimes conflated; the national atmosphere of a poet's life does not automatically make every nature poem politically suggestive. Third, his prose works—the novels Śrīcāmuṇḍā and Pañcavaṭī—are merely named. The promise to recover an "unexamined" writer thus stops at his poetry, leaving half his achievement unexamined even after this chapter. Fourth, biographical details, periodical titles and dates abound, while poetics-based analysis of metre, imagery and linguistic register is rare beyond Śaradāgama and Pachhabā. Lakshmipati Singh consequently emerges as an important thinker, but his individual artistic voice as a poet is less clear. Fifth, the question of how proximity to the courtly-feudal milieu affected his class standpoint is untouched. Alongside opposition to Western culture, what voice did his poetry raise against the exploitation of villagers by landlords? Sixth, no question is raised about the interrelationship of his writings in Hindi and Maithili—the movement of a bilingual poetic consciousness—although this would have connected directly with the discussion of bilingualism in the book's final chapter.

4.6 Yatri's Language: Limitations

First, all four analytical devices are borrowed from Western stylistics, while the proposed connection with Indian poetics—niraṅkuśāḥ kavayaḥ and the school of vakrokti—remains little more than an indication. A systematic comparison of selection and deviation with Kuntaka's six kinds of obliqueness could have completed the East–West bridge; that opportunity was missed. Second, the examples are drawn chiefly from successful linguistic experiments, and the textual analysis centres mainly on Patrahīn Nagna Gāchh. A consideration of Yatri's weaker, excessively artificial, obscure or time-bound coinages, together with systematic inclusion of his later collections and prose, would have produced a more balanced picture of "Yatri's language." Third, deviation is sometimes regarded as proof of beauty in itself, although every violation of grammar is not artistic. Each deviation requires separate evaluation in terms of propriety, context, clarity of meaning and effect upon readers. Fourth, the attractive metaphor of the "geography of language" remains undefined. Without mapping which regions, classes and occupational worlds furnished particular words, and where Yatri obtained them, the metaphor remains an ornament rather than an analytical instrument. Pride in the indigenous is justified, but languages are always mixed and changing; any rigid separation of indigenous from imported vocabulary is itself historically unstable. Fifth, in the section on parallelism, the lengthy quotation from the uncle-song receives only a brief reading of its social satire—the irony of middle-class life. Stylistic analysis outruns the analysis of meaning. There is also insufficient consideration of sound structure, sentence length, narrative voice, dialogue, satire's multiple levels, linguistic hybridity and variations of language among genres.

4.7 Manmohan Jha: Limitations

This is the shortest chapter in the collection, and its brevity is its principal weakness. An "unexamined aspect" is announced, yet the discussion remains at the level of plot summary: characters are quoted, but there is no analysis of narrative craft—point of view, manner of narration, temporal arrangement, dialogue, narrative pace or the artistic conjunction of compassion and nationalism. The chapter does not distinguish adequately between the words of a character, the narrator's standpoint and the author's ideas. A character's willingness to sacrifice life for the nation or Mithila does not automatically determine the final meaning of the story or the author's position. Nationalism and Maithil subnational identity are generally taken as positive moral values without asking whether nationalism can accommodate caste, class, gender, religious and regional domination. Questions central to disadvantaged groups—hunger and forced labour—are obscured beneath regional pride. In praising self-sacrificing female characters, the critic needed to ask whether a woman's freedom lies in her own choices or in sacrifice for a nation and culture defined by men. From a feminist perspective, glorifying sacrifice may reinforce patriarchal ideals. The relation between the writer's celebrated karuṇa-rasa and the newly identified national sensibility is not investigated through rasa theory: does compassion stimulate national consciousness or impede it? Written on the tenth day after the writer's death, the essay allows the tenderness of a tribute to outweigh critical detachment. The customary claim about the influence of Bengali fiction is left untested.

4.8 The Contribution of Migrants: Limitations

First, using the legal criterion provided by foreign-exchange regulation to distinguish migrants from residents is awkward for literary and cultural analysis. The author acknowledges the mismatch but offers no operational definition of his alternative criterion, the "density of cultural Mithila." The argument for excluding the Nepal Terai from the category of migration because of cultural continuity is emotionally compelling; nevertheless, political borders, citizenship, administration, economic relations and distinct historical experiences must also be considered. Second, the history of migrant journalism remains principally a history of educated male editors and prestigious periodicals. The roles of women editors, printers, distributors, women readers, financial contributors, rural subscribers and correspondents are scarcely visible. Nor does the chapter examine the class position of the editors themselves—the patronage of landed and respectable elites and its ideological consequences. Third, the chapter lacks statistical evidence. How long did each journal survive? What were its circulation, subscriber groups, distribution area, financial sources, regularity of publication, restrictions, governmental pressures and readers' responses? The quantitative foundations expected of a history of journalism are absent; its judgement of a journal's ideological influence rests mainly upon editorial matter. Fourth, the survey of the post-independence period is uneven. Mithila Darshan receives attention, but later journalistic undertakings in Delhi, Mumbai and Calcutta barely progress beyond a catalogue of names. Fifth, the shadow side of migration—the idealisation of a homeland from afar, distance from Mithila's lived reality and sentimental nostalgia—is not critically examined. The contribution is celebrated rather than subjected to the kind of critical scrutiny implied by Hiāol. Sixth, the boundaries between journalism and the literary magazine become blurred at points. A clearer distinction was required among the functions of literary special issues, social journals, newspapers and journals of opinion.

4.9 Dīnābhadrī: Limitations

First, the author raises but does not himself resolve the central question of textual authenticity: which text should serve as the basis of study? The natural next step—preparing a critical edition with a record of textual variants—is not even proposed. Moreover, the impulse to discover a single original text sits uneasily with the multiplicity of oral tradition. Each region, performer, occasion, caste subgroup and generation makes its own text. Second, Grierson's collection is important, but the mediation exercised by a colonial collector, translator, transcriber and editor is not examined critically enough. How much was altered when a wandering singer's living performance became a written text? This question is essential. Third, the severity with which the claims of Mahendranarayan Ram and Phulo Paswan are rejected as “not in keeping with history” or expressive of a “negative outlook” is not balanced by adequate recognition of their labour in collecting the material. The standards of fair counter-criticism developed in Chapter 3 are somewhat relaxed here. Fourth—and most seriously—the Dalit folk epic is interpreted entirely from an elite critical position. No direct evidence from the Musahar community's own singers, bhagtās and living oral tradition is furnished through fieldwork. The Telugu Dalit argument quoted in the chapter—that Dalits themselves claim the right to speak about Dalit experience—is not brought to bear on the author's own method. The interpretation offered by an external critic may differ from the community's self-interpretation. Nor is the risk of Sanskritising Dīnābhadrī's autonomous, rebellious character questioned when the epic is interpreted within an orthodox framework of liberation from the spirit-world and pilgrimage worship. Fifth, the female figures of the epic—Niraso, Hiriya and Jiriya—receive no independent analysis. Even within a discourse about subaltern groups, women's voices remain marginalised. A more extensive field study was also needed of internal diversity among the Musahars, ritual practices, contexts of performance, economic change and contemporary political uses of the epic.

4.10 The Development of the Short Story: Limitations

First, the dating of Candraprabhā—composed, it is suggested, by the 1880s—rests chiefly on the recollection of editor Lakshmipati Singh ("sixty or seventy years earlier") and the description of a tattered manuscript. In the absence of external tests from manuscript studies—the dating of paper, ink and script style—the repositioning of the genre's point of departure is less secure than the essay's tone suggests. Ramdev Jha's erroneous dating of Madanrāj-Carit is rejected with a rigour not equally applied to evidence favouring the author's own position: a double standard. Second, self-citation is pervasive. The author himself edited several cited sources, including Maithilīk Ārambhik Kathā, Mithila Darpaṇ and Nirdayī Sāsu. The editorial labour deserves praise, but making one's own edited materials decisive evidence inevitably raises questions of interested judgement; no methodological safeguard, such as independent corroboration, is supplied. Third, the generic character of Jaldhar Jha's Vilakṣaṇa Dāmpatya—belletristic prose, a journalistic narrative or a story—is left unresolved. The essay declares it unsuitable for recognition as the first short story but does not formulate the criteria of "story-ness": plot, character and outcome. The boundaries among oral narrative, ritual story, moral tale, ākhyāyikā, novel and modern short story are likewise insufficiently defined. Fourth, the possibility of lost material is an important historical question, but moving from "not available" to "it must have existed" is a leap of speculation. External evidence from manuscripts, references, publication advertisements, correspondence and contemporary reviews is needed. The hypothesis of a third, oral stream of narrative also depends upon an earlier assertion by Ramanath Jha, without independent field evidence. Fifth, the conclusion that the translation of Puruṣaparīkṣā exerted no influence is possible, but direct evidence of its lack of circulation, readership and impact is also limited. Influence is measured not only by popularity but by linguistic and stylistic imitation. Sixth, the political-symbolic reading of Candraprabhā is intriguing, yet not every tale of king and subjects must be an allegory of anti-colonial resistance. Its possible connections with social didactic tales, the duties of kings and older traditions of instruction needed equally careful investigation.

4.11 Earthquakes: Limitations

The chapter has two centres—Sitaram Jha and Krishnanandan Singh—and its use of the 1988 collection is confined to selected quotations. There is no analysis of the collection's overall tendencies: the number of poets, their varying perspectives or their metrical traditions. Second, although the chapter reads poetry effectively as historical documentation, documentary value overwhelms poetic value. The comparative analysis of metre, sound, movement, pauses, repetition and the structure of bhayānaka-rasa, the sentiment of terror, is limited. The question of the propriety of metre for representing disaster—the relationship between pathos and fixed metre—remains untouched. Third, popular memories of earthquakes, preserved in folk songs, proverbs and oral accounts, are entirely missing, although one would naturally expect the author of the chapter on folksongs to employ these sources. A comparison of cultivated poetry with popular expression could have yielded a two-level reading of disaster memory. Fourth, the poet's interpretation of lines from Kampakārikā—"the dharmashala survived; the Kashi-Vaidyanath temple survived"—in terms of divine intervention is not examined critically. The contrast between material reasons for the survival of structures and a faith-based reading needed scrutiny. Here the critic remains a reporter of the poet's worldview instead of becoming its analyst; the contradiction between religious belief and the actual distribution of destruction is insufficiently questioned. Fifth, little attempt is made to uncover the distinct experiences of affected women, Dalit settlements, landless workers, people with disabilities and orphaned children. Popular expressions of class and caste discrimination in relief distribution and rehabilitation are neglected. Social inequality can be concealed within the collective suffering of "all Mithila." Comparison of poetic descriptions with historical sources on the causes of earthquakes, geological structures, relief policy, deaths and their social distribution would also have clarified the relationship between literature and history.

4.12 The Kosi: Limitations

This is the most descriptive chapter in the collection: a succession of quotations, poet by poet, with a thin connecting thread of analysis. First, the political economy of flooding is absent: the history of dam building, the Kosi project, Nepal–India water agreements, siltation, changes in the river's course, water management and the permanent displacement of settlements inside embankments. The expression "human-made tragedy" occurs once but is not developed. Flooding thus appears largely as an assault of fate; criticism of governmental policy is morally forceful but insufficiently precise about policy. Second, prose fiction and novels—Pañcavaṭī, Lilī Rek Paṭākṣep and Inkilāb—are mentioned only by name. The breadth promised by "flood literature" contracts into a discussion of poetry alone. Third, the poignant invocation of the Kosi in folk song, central even to the chapter's title, receives very little textual analysis. The title's promise is not fulfilled by the discussion. Fourth, poems are sometimes read as direct social reports, although poetry also employs hyperbole, symbolism, emotional compression and imagined speakers. Calling the river "Mother" expresses intimacy, but the maternal image may turn natural destruction into destiny or a goddess's wrath, obscuring political responsibility. In many disasters it is not the river but inappropriate dams, weak administration, corrupt relief measures and unequal patterns of settlement that bear responsibility. There is a risk of romanticisation within readings governed by love and pathos. Fifth, the burdens of floods fall differently upon women, lower-caste communities, the landless, livestock keepers and migrant workers; this intersectional analysis needed development. Sixth, the author himself notes the recurrent character of flood poems—much the same experience expressed in much the same manner every year—but does not use that observation to rank or compare the poems according to conventionality and originality.

4.13 The Spirit of the Age in Epic Poetry: Limitations

First, selection of five epics is declared to be purpose-based, but the rationale for exclusion is incomplete. Moving on after observing that "the other epics are not devoid of the spirit of their age" leaves the question of selection bias open. The absence of works such as Kīcakavadh, Dattavatī and Citrā required explanation; merely naming other epics cannot establish whether the selected works adequately represent the tradition as a whole. Second, selecting three prize-winning epics disturbs the book's professed independence from institutions: the shadow of Sahitya Akademi recognition is visible over the choices. Third, in searching for the spirit of the age, the poetic has been subordinated. Almost nothing is said about the realisation of rasa, imagery, the use of metre or the classical characteristics of an epic—division into cantos, type of hero, extensive plot, elevated style, development of character, description and dialogue. The epics are consequently read more as documents conveying ideas than as poetry. Fourth, interpreting mythological characters as modern freedom fighters, social reformers, farmers or regional nationalists can be fruitful, but also incurs the danger of presentism. Ancient myths are not straightforward prototypes of modern ideas. Fifth, the space allotted to individual works is disproportionate: Subhadrāharaṇa and Parāśara receive far more attention than Rādhāviraha and Tripuṇḍa. The argument linking Rādhāviraha to women's empowerment relies upon two or three quotations, without examining how this social reading relates to its dominant vipralambha-śṛṅgāra, the erotic sentiment of separation. Radha's duty is again defined through service to her husband and nation; her autonomy, body, desire and independent personal life receive limited consideration. Sixth, stopping at a general discourse of "the duty of the age," instead of directly dismantling the caste conflict and elite order implicated in Agastyāyanī and Parāśara, sacrifices an opportunity for a fuller critique of feudal structures.

4.14 The New Song: Limitations

First, the period and scope of the "new song" (na'v gīt) remain obscure. From what date or work does it begin, and which songwriters belong to it? No list or chronology is provided. The definition depends on a sensibility of values, but its standard remains subjective. On this definition many modern poems could automatically become new songs; what specifically makes the form a song is not clarified. Second, the evidence is limited to three or four lyricists—Gunjan, Pravasi and Buddhinath Mishra among them. Drawing a general account of the movement from such a thin sample risks faulty induction. There is no detailed map of the social backgrounds of the new-song writers, their publishing platforms, audiences, generational differences or contributions by women. Third, the distinction between the new song and new poetry is offered in outline, and the reader is sent to the author's own book for further treatment. This self-referential habit leaves an argument unfinished. Fourth, song as song—its singability, vocal design, melodic ascent and descent, sequencing of sound, end-rhyme, measures, repetition, relation to folk tunes and potential for collective performance—is not examined. The phrase "rhythmic intermixture" appears, but without an example of rhythmic analysis. Singability is the very life of the song genre: a social theme alone does not make a composition a song. Fifth, traditional poetry of love, devotion and nature is sometimes dismissed as conventional, although modernity is more than a change of subject. Fresh feeling and transformation within an old subject can themselves be modern. Sixth, there is no consideration of the democratisation of songs through contemporary audiovisual platforms, the internet and electronic magazines. The discussion remains within the bounds of traditionally printed collections.

4.15 Current Trends: Limitations

First, this is the text of a lecture, and its dependence upon its original audience persists in essay form. The long introduction on the kinship of eastern Indian languages, appropriate to the gathering in Bhubaneswar, feels like a digression to the book's reader and reduces the space available for the central subject, "current trends." Second, the four headings used to describe those trends are exceptionally broad: human crisis, consumerism, cultural imperialism and the environment can cover almost all modern literature. A finer classification based on poetic movements, generations, form, language and aesthetic outlook was needed. Nor does the discussion examine overlaps among the categories: where, for example, do consumerism and cultural imperialism diverge? Third, the density of evidence is uneven. The currents of human crisis and cultural imperialism are well illustrated, but opposition to consumerism rests upon one or two quotations. The number of selected poems is small, and conclusions drawn from them do not fully substantiate a claim to represent all contemporary Maithili poetry. Fourth, the absence of women's and Dalit voices from the list is conspicuous. A critic whose own book has independent chapters on the neglected woman and on Dīnābhadrī creates an internal inconsistency by omitting both currents from the portrait of the present. Feminist, Dalit, Adivasi, migrant, online and formally experimental poetry do not receive adequate treatment as distinct contemporary currents, and the discussion remains largely confined to established poets of the recognised centres. Fifth, the suggestion that Maithili poetry in Nepal followed different tendencies because it "remained different out of fear of the monarchy" is not accompanied by a single example. The proposition is left unsupported. Sixth, the discussion of cultural imperialism sometimes creates a simple opposition between local and external culture. Cultures develop through exchange, mixture, assimilation and resistance: not every external influence is destructive, and not every local tradition is emancipatory.

4.16 Folksongs: Limitations

First, this is not an independent essay but a response to a conference paper, and its structure betrays that origin. It begins by discussing flaws of method in the paper, moves to an independent discussion of folksongs and ends with policy proposals; the transitions among these three parts are loose. Second, the list of seven measures for preservation drawn from the UNESCO framework is largely translated and reiterated. Without field surveys of the specific condition of Maithili folksong—who still sings, which generations, which occasions survive and which are dying—the list becomes a mechanical application. Archives, museums and classification are necessary, but they also risk turning a living folksong into a fixed specimen. Its life resides in singing, occasion, embodied performance, communal participation and a changing text, not simply in an audio collection. Institutional preservation may also blunt the resistant edge of popular expression; that question requires attention. Third, the musical dimension—rāga, tāla and notation—is entirely untouched. The preservation promised in "Condition and Preservation" has been conceived as preservation of text, not of sound or its transcription into musical notation. Fourth, collectors, researchers and institutions receive recognition, but the questions of ownership, consent, financial benefit, attribution and archive access for the singing communities are not developed sufficiently. Fifth, the patriarchal voice within folksongs—poignant examples of which, including sorrow at the birth of a daughter and arjal biāni, appear in the essay itself—is not confronted critically. Enthusiasm for preservation suppresses the question of which parts of the folk inheritance deserve conservation and which require criticism. Sixth, the presence of medicinal or scientific elements in folk knowledge is important, but to treat every inherited belief as scientific truth would be romanticisation. Experiential usefulness must be distinguished from clinical proof. Further analysis was possible of women's humour, collective resistance, authority to create songs and the differences among women's experiences across castes.

4.17 The New Tactics of Colonialism: Limitations

First, the account of Tanzania is extensive, whereas the comparative analysis of Maithili's situation is proportionately brief. The institutional data given for Kiswahili—budget percentages and dates of policy decisions—have no counterparts for Maithili, such as the condition of Maithili-medium instruction in schools or the proliferation of private schools. The illustration is strong but its application is thin. Because differences among the countries' histories, language populations, economies and educational structures are not made sufficiently clear, some comparative conclusions are reached too quickly. Second, the World Bank, International Monetary Fund and foreign aid do play roles in linguistic domination, yet local elites, governmental inaction, parents' concern about employment, educational quality, the shortage of textbooks and the weakness of mother-tongue institutions are also responsible. An explanation centred upon external conspiracy may obscure internal responsibility. A struggle against external linguistic colonialism remains incomplete without examining the internalised sense of linguistic inferiority in Mithila and the operation of internal colonialism; this question is not developed adequately. Third, the essay offers abundant diagnosis but little remedy. The danger of language death is described, but the constructive side of Fishman's own theory of reversing language shift, present in the very work cited, is not brought into the discussion. The reader is alarmed but given no direction. Nor is an absolute opposition between English and Maithili a practical answer. The essay needed to consider an integrated model of multilingual education: foundational learning in the mother tongue, followed by the staged teaching of an Indian link language and an international language. Bilingualism does not in itself extinguish a language; bilingualism marked by unequal prestige creates the crisis. Fourth, the personal examples—a couple who are professors, a lawyer and a rural woman—are supplied without names or contextual references and cannot be verified. A writer who elsewhere insists upon documentary proof resorts here to anecdotal, almost legendary narration. Fifth, the optimistic claim that entry into the Eighth Schedule of the Constitution in 2003 "breathed life" into the language is not critically tested. In a book published ten years after inclusion, it would have been natural to ask what had changed in everyday language transmission as a result of constitutional recognition. The essay's own argument—that official recognition is insufficient and intergenerational transmission is essential—undercuts this optimism. The concluding self-contradiction remains unresolved. Sixth, too little is said of the prospects for Maithili in urban bilingual households, mixed marriages, among migrant children and through new media.

4.18 Overall Limitations

In addition to the limitations of individual chapters, several weaknesses belong to the book as a whole. First, repetition: a characteristic weakness of essay collections is particularly pronounced here. Kiran's verse beginning "ānāk kānab khasab dekhi kay" appears in two chapters; Sita's declaration that "Janak is not the king's servant" recurs in three; quotations concerning Bholalal Das and points in the Kiran–Ramanath controversy return at several places. Editorial cross-references could have avoided these repetitions. Second, untranslated English: the extensive English quotations in both footnotes and main text deny readers with only Maithili access to the evidence. This is an internal irony of a book committed to the mother tongue. Third, self-citation: a substantial proportion of the sources quoted are works written or edited by the author himself. This testifies to scholarly diligence on one hand, while raising questions about the independence of evidence on the other. Fourth, methodological unevenness: some chapters, such as those on Yatri and Ramanath Jha, are rich in theory; others, such as those on the Kosi and Manmohan Jha, are principally descriptive. Some depend upon close reading, some are documents of historical revision, and others are polemical responses. Diversity enriches the book; without the application of common standards, however, its internal architecture appears uneven and its unifying theoretical argument is difficult to discern. Fifth, printing errors: local inaccuracies and inconsistent citation practices, with some footnotes complete and others incomplete, fall short of the standards of credibility expected of a work so insistent upon proof. Sixth, too few solutions: many of the essays stop at questions and diagnoses. The author has declared question-raising to be an objective in itself; nevertheless, the expectation of a practical programme remains unsatisfied, particularly in the case of language endangerment. Seventh, the author's love of Maithili is the book's source of energy, yet at some points it becomes cultural idealisation, celebration of ancient glory, excessive suspicion of external forces or overinterpretation of national symbols. Eighth, the book raises questions concerning women, Dalits, labourers and the people at large, but offers relatively little systematic examination of the intersections among these perspectives—the Dalit woman, the landless woman affected by floods, the migrant labourer or the speaker of a borderland language. At points where a complete confrontation with elite dominance was possible, the criticism remains only partially progressive.

5. Overall Critical Judgement

5.1 The Book's Principal Achievement

The most important achievement of Hiāol is its interruption of the familiar linear narrative of Maithili literary history. The book asks: who is entitled to call a language independent? Who establishes literary standards? Which writers are honoured in history, and which forgotten? Does material preserved in the people's voices count as literature? Should a woman's silence be read as comedy or social tragedy? Why are Dalit folk heroes excluded from history? Why are earthquakes and floods not events in literary history? What part do centres of migration play in creating Maithili consciousness? How does linguistic subordination survive political independence? Through these questions, the book becomes more than a collection of critical essays: it offers an alternative map of knowledge about Maithili literature.

Viewed through Indian poetics, the book's criticism does not stop at rasa and alaṅkāra. It connects dhvani, aucitya, vakrokti, lokamaṅgala and sādhāraṇīkaraṇa with social history. From the perspective of Western theory, it raises postcolonial, New Historicist, Marxist, feminist, Dalit, formalist and environmental questions at once, even though the author does not always apply these theories under consistent names or by systematic methods. From the perspective of Videha's parallel-history approach, Hiāol writes the histories that run alongside official and prestigious history: histories of linguistic suppression; of neglected critics and poets; of the uneducated woman; of the Dalit folk hero; of migrant journals and newspapers; of oral narrative; of earthquakes and floods; of women's labour and folk knowledge preserved in folksong; and of the breakdown in linguistic transmission between generations.

5.2 Overall Evaluation

The significance of Hiāol lies not in providing final answers but in preparing new ground for questions. It is not a complete literary history, yet it is an indispensable guide for future literary history; it is not a definitive theory, but a critical intervention that unsettles the complacency of established theories. The book is at its best when the writer discovers forgotten documents, demands evidence for accepted conclusions, analyses the subtleties of linguistic form, listens for the voices of women, ordinary people, Dalits and those struck by disaster, and joins literature to living social history. Its limitations become apparent when polemic outweighs analysis, inference replaces proof, national or cultural faith suppresses aesthetic scrutiny, and complex history is reduced to simple oppositions. Moreover, where a complete confrontation with elite dominance was possible, the criticism sometimes remains only partially progressive. The dismantling of hereditary rank, the pañjī institution and state-sponsored establishments is less incisive than might have been expected.

6. Conclusion

Taken as a whole, Hiāol belongs to that rare category of Maithili critical works which subject both reverence and doubt to the test of evidence. From the standpoint of Indian poetics, its fundamental standard is aucitya, appropriateness: the appropriateness of words in the chapter on Yatri, of the reader's standpoint in the chapter on Kanyādān, and of historical narration in the chapter on the development of the story. Dhvani theory is brought into practice in readings of Śaradāgama and Pachhabā, and an awareness of rasa is present in the chapters dominated by compassion, although detailed rasa analysis remains one of the book's weaker aspects. By Western standards, it is a pioneering Maithili application of postcolonial and sociolinguistic discourse, limited by its unequal, and occasionally mechanical, use of theory. From the standpoint of Videha's parallel history, its importance is paramount: the unexamined poet, the neglected heroine, the Dalit champion, the migrant editor and the unknown singer of folksongs—figures relegated to the margins by institutions—are brought to the centre by Raman through the force of documentary records.

Yet even from this perspective one final boundary should be drawn. The full method of the parallel tradition is realised where marginalised voices speak for themselves. In Hiāol, others speak on behalf of the margins more often than the marginalised are enabled to speak. This incompleteness invites future research. Precisely this capacity to invite further debate—to bring thinkers before an ongoing critical conversation—constitutes the book's lasting value. In the history of Maithili criticism, Hiāol will be remembered both as a model work of counter-criticism and as a preparation for parallel historiography.

Dr Ramanand Jha "Raman"'s Hiāol (2012) is a commendable and courageous advance in Maithili literary criticism, offering serious intellectual challenges to numerous established positions. Raman's love of the language and devotion to its distinctively Maithili vocabulary and cultural expression are wholly admirable. Despite the theoretical limitations considered here, Hiāol remains a major milestone along the long road of Maithili critical theory, offering future generations guidance for confronting established elite historiography with hiāo—courage. Beyond literature's front entrance, the book offers a way of seeing history through the back door, the courtyard, the field, the river, the people's voices, women's silences, the Musahar epic, the migrant's periodical and the home collapsed by an earthquake. In this sense it is a powerful foundational work for the critical approach of Videha's parallel history.

References

Dr Ramanand Jha "Raman", Hiāol (a collection of Maithili criticism), Akhiyasal Prakashan, Lalganj, Sarisab-Pahi, Madhubani, 2012.
Dr Ramanand Jha "Raman", Akhiyāsal (a collection of criticism).
Dr Ramanand Jha "Raman", Besāhal (a collection of criticism).
Dr Ramanand Jha "Raman", Bhajāral (a collection of criticism).
G. A. Grierson, An Introduction to the Maithili Language of North Bihar, Calcutta, 1881.
G. A. Grierson, Maithili Chrestomathy and collections relating to Dīnābhadrī, 1885.
Harimohan Jha, Kanyādān (a Maithili novel).
PART 27, Videha: The First Fortnightly Maithili E-Journal, www.videha.co.in/new_page_27.htm.
PART 28, Videha: The First Fortnightly Maithili E-Journal, www.videha.co.in/new_page_28.htm.
PART 82, Videha: The First Fortnightly Maithili E-Journal, www.videha.co.in/new_page_82.htm.
A Parallel History of Mithila & Maithili Literature, Videha: The First Fortnightly Maithili E-Journal, www.videha.co.in/new_page_90.htm.
Editorial of a New Issue, Videha: The First Fortnightly Maithili E-Journal, www.videha.co.in/aboutme.htm.
"Ramanand Jha 'Raman'," Maithili Writers' Association, maithililekhaksangh.blogspot.com/2010/07/blog-post_677.html.

12. Kedarnath Chaudhary's Novels "Chameli Rani" and "Mahur"

Abstract

Kedarnath Chaudhary's first novel, Chameli Rani, appeared in 2004. The novel ended so compellingly that readers demanded a sequel, and the author had to write its second part, Mahur. Reviewing Chameli Rani in Vidyapati Times, Dhirendranath Mishra had written: "...just as the emperor of humour, Harimohan Babu, had to write Dviragaman after Kanyadan, the novelist too will have to write a second part to Chameli Rani."

Keywords: Kedarnath · Chaudhary · novel · Chameli Rani · Mahur · theory of criticism · Maithili

Kedarnath Chaudhary's first novel, Chameli Rani, appeared in 2004. The novel ended so compellingly that readers demanded a sequel, and the author had to write its second part, Mahur. Reviewing Chameli Rani in Vidyapati Times, Dhirendranath Mishra had written: "...just as the emperor of humour, Harimohan Babu, had to write Dviragaman after Kanyadan, the novelist too will have to write a second part to Chameli Rani." These two volumes will be remembered in the history of Maithili novel-writing for several reasons. To begin with, as Ramlochan Thakur asks, "...why has this writer of touchstone-like talent made his appearance so late?" The question genuinely remains unanswered. The author devoted his energies to study and employment in America, Iran and other places; but when the producer of Mamata Gabai Git returned to Darbhanga, he poured the entirety of his life experience into these two novels. I once asked Rajmohan Jha about this in an interview, and he said that creative writing was impossible without lived experience: the broader an author's experience of life, the greater the variety and novelty that author could introduce. Kedarnath Chaudhary's Chameli Rani and Mahur demonstrate the truth of this observation. Chameli Rani established a new sales record: five hundred copies were sold in Janakpur alone. The author dedicated Chameli Rani "to every lover of Maithili who, at some point in an entire lifetime, has spent even a coin of their own money on a book or periodical in the Maithili language." Yet such was its extraordinary sale that a second edition appeared in 2007, before its sequel Mahur came out in 2008; in the second volume, the author evidently considered it better to dispense with a dedication altogether. I came to recognise another distinctive aspect of this fiction towards the end of 2008, when Haryana's deputy chief minister went missing for a month. Political compulsions meant that no action could be taken against him until he returned. Our own Gulab Misir, too, remained in office despite disappearing, because of precisely such political constraints; no one could remove him, however much difficulty the administration of the state encountered.

The novelist's experience of life had enabled him to write down the possibility of such an event four years earlier. The ability to foretell the future is not acquired through sorcery or incantation: lived experience makes such anticipation possible.

The characters in both novels are remarkable, and convincing as well, because the novelist has created them as though he had personal experience of everything they undergo.

At the opening of Chameli Rani, the author passes his first test: the rhythmic beginning immediately arouses the reader's interest. Kirttimukh's intimate friend Kantir offers this advice on naming his five sons: "Give the five boys the names of the five Pandavas. It will be convenient." Elsewhere, the author observes that, had children continued to arrive at the same rate, names from the Kauravas would have been required. Until the heroine Chameli Rani appears, the narrative describes Kirttimukh's sons, followed in turn by the offspring of the Englishman Demsford and Rupkummari, their daughter Sunayana. Then comes the marriage of Shanichari—daughter of Sunayana, herself Rupkummari's daughter—to the political leader Ramthenga Singh "Chingari"; the leader leaves Shanichari with Kanhi Modiyain out of concern for public shame and goes to Patna. The account of his death, and of Shanichari's subsequent marriage to Kirttimukh, draws the narrative threads together again.

Chameli Rani is introduced next. She studies as a boarder at the school attached to the Barauni Refinery and is the daughter of Kanhi Modiyain. By the time Kanhi Modiyain dies, Chameli Rani has passed the tenth-standard examination. Bhukhan Singh is Chameli Rani's adoptive father. The first part of the novel ends with an account of a robbery.

In the second part, the planned looting of an MLA's money or treasure is depicted as though it were the consequence of a rape committed against a modern young woman by MLA Nangatnath. This Nangatnath had been a personal attendant of Chief Minister Gulab Misir and had contrived, through political manoeuvring, to become an MLA.

This character closely resembles Balram Halwai in Aravind Adiga's English novel The White Tiger, which won the Booker Prize in 2008. Balram works at a tea shop, becomes the driver of a wealthy man in Delhi, murders him and makes himself rich. Yet Chaudhary had created his character four years earlier. Next comes the KGB agent Bhataji, whose presence continues to exert a powerful influence right through to the novel's second volume, Mahur.

The third part of the novel presents an engaging account of Ahmadullah Khan's campaign and embraces the ugliness of contemporary politics. The fourth part tells Gulab Misir's story, again recalling Adiga's Balram Halwai. Gulab Misir summons Panna, a companion of Bhukhan Singh, and tells him about Bhukhan Singh's involvement in the Nangatnath and Ahmadullah campaigns. He also orders Panna to kill Bhukhan Singh, but Panna refuses. Gulab Misir nevertheless has Bhukhan Singh murdered through deceit.

The fifth part discusses Bhukhan Singh's trust. Chameli Rani abandons her base and moves to Baidyanath Dham. Her political ambitions now come into view. A sting operation takes place, and Gulab Misir finds himself cornered.

The sixth part speaks of the formation of merely a fact-finding committee even after the chief minister has disappeared—an observation on the compulsions of coalition politics.

The opening part of the novel's second volume, Mahur, similarly winds its way around the organisation of Chameli Rani's political party. The author chooses organisations associated with violence against women, the plight of child widows and the forcing of women into prostitution as subjects for his commentary.

The second part of Mahur recounts Gulab Misir's arrival in the capital. Chameli Rani visits the base of a Naxalite leader to secure support for her campaign. This provides the occasion for the author's view of the Naxalite movement as a whole, while his vivid, pictorial rendering of forest life and the lives of Adivasi people bears witness to his narrative skill. Another revelation comes to Chameli Rani: her mother, Kanhi Modiyain, had belonged to a very prominent family; Patel had subjected her to atrocities, Chameli Rani's father had been murdered, and her unfortunate mother had lived out her life under the identity of Kanhi Modiyain. These disclosures lend further fascination to the narrative.

The third part of Mahur once again generates mystery and suspense through the conspiracies involving Pachkauri Mian, Gulab Misir, the ISI and the KGB.

The fourth part of Mahur describes Chameli Rani's revenge for the atrocities inflicted on her parents. She becomes wealthy after acquiring property worth several thousand crores.

The fifth part of Mahur ends with political manoeuvres and the electoral victory of Chameli Rani's party.

Critical Discussion: Despite the bourgeois origins of the novel, the form contains such complexity that it provides a severe test of literary talent. Although Cervantes's Don Quixote appeared at the beginning of the seventeenth century, it was only shortly before the arrival of the nineteenth century that the novel, notwithstanding its bourgeois beginnings, acquired a fully serious form. In the novel, debate and dialogue generate the essay; the presence of young men and women produces a romance; people and geography provide historical description; and then stories of good and bad characters emerge. At times the novel makes readers laugh, at other times it instructs them. Marxism advocates the social reality of the novel. Freud regards every human being as mysterious. Where he takes a literary work as an occasion for analysing its creator, neo-Freudianism appears to emphasise cultural rather than biological elements. New Criticism is based on close and detailed attention to the work. Alongside all these approaches, lived experience constitutes another dimension. Here, to gratify repressed desires, the author has created a world in which the reader walks the narrow boundary between reality and imagination.

Supplementary Discussion

Kedarnath Chaudhary's first novel, Chameli Rani, appeared in 2004. The novel ended so compellingly that readers demanded a sequel, and the author had to write its second part, Mahur. Reviewing Chameli Rani in Vidyapati Times, Dhirendranath Mishra had written: "...just as the emperor of humour, Harimohan Babu, had to write Dviragaman after Kanyadan, the novelist too will have to write a second part to Chameli Rani." These two volumes will be remembered in the history of Maithili novel-writing for several reasons. To begin with, as Ramlochan Thakur asks, "...why has this writer of touchstone-like talent made his appearance so late?" The question genuinely remains unanswered. The author devoted his energies to study and employment in America, Iran and other places; but when the producer of Mamata Gabai Git returned to Darbhanga, he poured the entirety of his life experience into these two novels. I once asked Rajmohan Jha about this in an interview, and he said that creative writing was impossible without lived experience: the broader an author's experience of life, the greater the variety and novelty that author could introduce. Kedarnath Chaudhary's Chameli Rani and Mahur demonstrate the truth of this observation. Chameli Rani established a new sales record: five hundred copies were sold in Janakpur alone. The author dedicated Chameli Rani "to every lover of Maithili who, at some point in an entire lifetime, has spent even a coin of their own money on a book or periodical in the Maithili language." Yet such was its extraordinary sale that a second edition appeared in 2007, before its sequel Mahur came out in 2008; in the second volume, the author evidently considered it better to dispense with a dedication altogether. I came to recognise another distinctive aspect of this fiction towards the end of 2008, when Haryana's deputy chief minister went missing for a month. Political compulsions meant that no action could be taken against him until he returned. Our own Gulab Misir, too, remained in office despite disappearing, because of precisely such political constraints; no one could remove him, however much difficulty the administration of the state encountered.

At the opening of Chameli Rani, the author passes his first test: the rhythmic beginning immediately arouses the reader's interest. Kirttimukh's intimate friend Kantir offers this advice on naming his five sons: "Give the five boys the names of the five Pandavas. It will be convenient." Elsewhere, the author observes that, had children continued to arrive at the same rate, names from the Kauravas would have been required. Until the heroine Chameli Rani appears, the narrative describes Kirttimukh's sons, followed in turn by the offspring of the Englishman Demsford and Rupkummari, their daughter Sunayana. Then comes the marriage of Shanichari—daughter of Sunayana, herself Rupkummari's daughter—to the political leader Ramthenga Singh "Chingari"; the leader leaves Shanichari with Kanhi Modiyain out of concern for public shame and goes to Patna. The account of his death, and of Shanichari's subsequent marriage to Kirttimukh, draws the narrative threads together again.

Chameli Rani is introduced next. She studies as a boarder at the school attached to the Barauni Refinery and is the daughter of Kanhi Modiyain. By the time Kanhi Modiyain dies, Chameli Rani has passed the tenth-standard examination. Bhukhan Singh is Chameli Rani's adoptive father. The first part of the novel ends with an account of a robbery.

The third part of the novel presents an engaging account of Ahmadullah Khan's campaign and embraces the ugliness of contemporary politics. The fourth part tells Gulab Misir's story, again recalling Adiga's Balram Halwai. Gulab Misir summons Panna, a companion of Bhukhan Singh, and tells him about Bhukhan Singh's involvement in the Nangatnath and Ahmadullah campaigns. He also orders Panna to kill Bhukhan Singh, but Panna refuses. Gulab Misir nevertheless has Bhukhan Singh murdered through deceit.

The fifth part discusses Bhukhan Singh's trust. Chameli Rani abandons her base and moves to Baidyanath Dham. Her political ambitions now come into view. A sting operation takes place, and Gulab Misir finds himself cornered.

The third part of Mahur once again generates mystery and suspense through the conspiracies involving Pachkauri Mian, Gulab Misir, the ISI and the KGB.

The fourth part of Mahur describes Chameli Rani's revenge for the atrocities inflicted on her parents. She becomes wealthy after acquiring property worth several thousand crores.

Critical Discussion: Despite the bourgeois origins of the novel, the form contains such complexity that it provides a severe test of literary talent. Although Cervantes's Don Quixote appeared at the beginning of the seventeenth century, it was only shortly before the arrival of the nineteenth century that the novel, notwithstanding its bourgeois beginnings, acquired a fully serious form. In the novel, debate and dialogue generate the essay; the presence of young men and women produces a romance; people and geography provide historical description; and then stories of good and bad characters emerge. At times the novel makes readers laugh, at other times it instructs them. Marxism advocates the social reality of the novel. Freud regards every human being as mysterious. Where he takes a literary work as an occasion for analysing its creator, neo-Freudianism appears to emphasise cultural rather than biological elements. New Criticism is based on close and detailed attention to the work. Alongside all these approaches, lived experience constitutes another dimension. Here, to gratify repressed desires, the author has created a world in which the reader walks the narrow boundary between reality and imagination.

13. A Review of Subhashchandra Yadav's Short-Story Collection "Banait Bigadait"

Abstract

In most of the stories in Subhashchandra Yadav's collection Banait Bigadait, one finds that the narrative moves forward with a theme rather than a mere anecdote, and comes to an end as soon as its task is accomplished. The language of Balchanma is the autobiographical language of that novel's central character; here, however, the language belongs to the storyteller himself, and for this reason assumes a distinctive form. Subhash's preference for taking a theme through a sharply delimited space, against the tradition of turning the short story into a didactic tale, together with his attention to a thoroughly indigenous linguistic craft, will afford boundless pleasure to one group of readers. At the same time, the collection will not disappoint readers who have yet to move beyond the traditional tale; instead, it will refine their tastes.

Keywords: Banait · Bigadait · Subhashchandra · Yadav · short-story collection · theory of criticism · Maithili

In most of the stories in Subhashchandra Yadav's collection Banait Bigadait, one finds that the narrative moves forward with a theme rather than a mere anecdote, and comes to an end as soon as its task is accomplished. Its language is another distinguishing feature. The language of Balchanma is the autobiographical language of that novel's central character; here, however, the language belongs to the storyteller himself, and for this reason assumes a distinctive form. Subhash's preference for taking a theme through a sharply delimited space, against the tradition of turning the short story into a didactic tale, together with his attention to a thoroughly indigenous linguistic craft, will afford boundless pleasure to one group of readers. At the same time, the collection will not disappoint readers who have yet to move beyond the traditional tale; instead, it will refine their tastes.

Some questions of linguistic standardisation deserve attention—for example, the forms ऐछ, अछि and अ इ छ. At the time when standardisation was taking place, these matters needed to be considered. If, for instance, we write "जाति रही" instead of "जाइत रही", we must then devise a pronunciation rule for the word जाति understood as जा-इ-त; the relationship between ऐछ and अछि is of much the same kind. But the opportunity has now largely passed. The author himself offers some direction by adopting a form in "Kaniyan-Putara", only to revert to the other forms in subsequent stories. Even so, this demonstrates the need to establish a standard form. Whether one chooses to write "छै" or "छैक", either is acceptable, provided that, in the latter case, a pronunciation rule specifies that the final क is silent. Such rules must be formulated promptly and accepted generally. People today do not have a lifetime to spend arguing about whether to write "य" or "ए". Follow phonetic principles; otherwise, prescribe clear rules of pronunciation. Writing "नञि" for "नहि" is intelligible, but among नइँ (Antika), नइं (NBT) and नँइ (Saketananda's Kalaratrishcha Daruna), Saketananda's usage accords more closely with the principles of phonetics. Anyone unconvinced should seek the assistance of a phonetics laboratory. (Audio files illustrating a scientific, standard Maithili alphabet are available for listening or download through the Videha Audio link in the Videha Archive at http://www.videha.co.in/.)

A particular merit of Banait Bigadait is that Subhashchandra Yadav employs a distinctive, phonetically sensitive style of writing capable of advancing the dialogue about standardisation.

The journey of the story encompasses Vedic narratives, Jataka tales, Aesop's Fables, the Panchatantra and the Hitopadesha, together with folk ballads that have continued alongside them. Everywhere, the narratives of the elite have coexisted with those of the folk tradition.

The likelihood of failure is greater in a short story than in a novel, an epic or a long narrative, for the novel resembles a "soap opera" that continues for months or years, with each episode reaching a stopping point. Thus, in a seventy-episode novel, a reader may retain hope through the sixty-ninth episode that the story will take a new turn. If its direction never changes by the end, all the preceding episodes may still be hits and only the final episode a failure. The short story permits no such latitude. It is a work consisting of one episode: either it succeeds magnificently or it fails outright.

Moving beyond the history of traditional tales, the modern short story emerged towards the end of the nineteenth century. It came to be classified as the very short story, the short story and the literary tale, although the distinctions among these three were often explained with needless elaboration. The movement beginning with Rabindranath Tagore spread from one end of India to the other as part of a reformist impulse. Writers such as Bezbarua in Assamese, Fakir Mohan Senapati in Odia, Apparao in Telugu and Kedarnath Banerjee in Bengali spoke at times in support of women and at others against the moneylenders who exploited society. In Nepali, Suryakant Gyawali wrote "Devi Ko Bali" in opposition to the custom of animal sacrifice at Dussehra. Some stories challenged the barriers of caste and wealth placed in the way of love; others dealt with the condition of Dalit society or with religious superstition. Nor did such stories invariably end happily.

Ideologies and Literature: Postmodernist, existentialist and humanist positions are all schools of thought within philosophy. In earlier times philosophy encompassed science, history, society and politics, economics, the arts and language. But as branches of science and art—especially science—acquired their own specialised forms, the domain of mathematics and science within philosophy became largely restricted to mathematical logic. Philosophers increasingly turned to the study of induction and deduction and to analytical methods. Marx, who seemed almost like a divine intervention to the poor throughout the world, made the dialectical method the foundation of his interpretation. What is now called "discussion" or dialectic, containing both a position and its opposition, had already existed in philosophy's methods of refutation and defence, particularly in the six systems of Indian philosophy (see Madhavacharya's Sarvadarshanasangraha).

Francis Fukuyama, who had proclaimed the end of history after the collapse of communist rule, subsequently retreated from that assertion. Postmodernism, too, has faltered after its initial enthusiasm. Existentialism, humanism, progressivism, Romanticism and sociological analysis have preserved their place by becoming part of a synthetic method of criticism.

Because psychoanalysis rests on a scientific foundation, it will continue to maintain its existence, as the dialectical method has done.

What is the modern short story? What ought it to be like? Does it have a purpose, or ought it to have one? And how should that purpose be determined?

Psychology, too, may provide the basis of a story. The purpose of storytelling should correspond to society's needs; changes in the course of storytelling should reflect changes that have taken place, and are taking place, in society. Yet a story is also governed, almost of itself, by the culture of that society. In it, the society's historical existence comes into view.

When we speak of Vedic narratives, they bring love of the nation to the fore and teach people how to live together in society.

The Jataka tales seek to propagate Buddhism along with the spread of the languages of ordinary people.

A narrative of the Muslim world, such as Rumi's Masnavi, is a distinctive work of Persian literature that teaches the importance of knowledge and the advancement of the state.

Contemporary storytelling embraces all these elements and moves towards the creation of an enlightened and humane (!) society. If it does not do so, this aspiration ought to become part of its purpose. Only then can the analysis and criticism of stories become an imperative for readers.

After the end of communist rule and the fall of the Berlin Wall, Francis Fukuyama declared that history, created by the conflict among ideologies, had reached its end and that henceforth only an ideology serving human welfare would advance. Not long ago, however, he withdrew from this position, observing that many different ideologies still survived within societies and among nationalities. Similarly, the postmodern thinker Jacques Derrida, by deconstructing language, showed that its separated elements depend on many different foundations and that we cannot arrive at linguistic meaning without understanding those foundations.

Like psychoanalysis and the dialectical method, the analyses of Fukuyama and Derrida will, through synthesis, endure as lasting models of criticism.

Subhash Chandra Yadav's Short-Story Collection Banait Bigadait:

Subhash belongs to the generation of storytellers who came after Independence. He gives form to life through the story, rendering it meaningful by enriching both its craft and its subject matter. It is only natural, then, that his stories should depict the struggle of ordinary people for existence. In his story "Kathak Banal Lok", written several decades ago, perhaps it was only by chance that Badariya went on smiling. The characters in this collection possess similarly distinctive qualities. A character who has fallen asleep while weeping in a hospital wakes and begins to cry again; another is in love. Some possess business sense; others resemble Harivansh, whose attempts to help someone result instead in harm because of faults in the system. Let us now examine the stories in Banait Bigadait more closely.

"Kaniyan-Putara": In this story, a little girl in the street stretches herself across the narrator's feet and rests her head against his knee without apprehension, as though she were resting against her mother's knee. Something firm, like a lemon, presses against him: it is the girl's chest. She remains entirely unselfconscious, as if leaning against a father, grandfather, brother or sister. The narrator wonders whether she will become Sita or Draupadi. The spectres of Ravana and Duryodhana close around his thoughts.

After reading "Kaniyan-Putara," the same crossroads remains, and the same boys and girls are visible when one starts or stops a car at the traffic light. But the gaze has changed. These are children who wipe car windscreens and ask for money; whether one gives them anything or not, one had previously driven on without another thought. Can that gaze remain unchanged after reading "Kaniyan-Putara"? A boy may grow up to steal, or become the lowest rung in some drug cartel. But the girl? Will she become Sita, Draupadi, or Amrapali? Social organisations and human-rights organisations, which spread a net beneath a lover threatening to jump from an electricity pole and use the television cameras to publicise their own names and those of their institutions—can they continue to operate with their old outlook after reading this story? And a government that considers its duty discharged by renaming a hospital after Jayaprakash Narayan or Hardinge Park after Veer Kunwar Singh: will it reach the roots of the problem and build a new hospital and a new park in those names, or simply stamp "Made by Me" on someone else's work? Will these institutions not finally put an end to their tendency to avoid sustained effort and look for easy solutions?

"Asurakshit" ("Unsafe"): This story vividly describes how dangerous the twenty-minute walk home from the railway station has become after dark. It was not like this before—or so people's mental picture of the past would have it. Yet who pays attention to problems of this kind? The media attend to grand questions, economic liberalisation and countless other subjects. Here a new perspective falls on the everyday insecurity of crossroads and public squares: between station and home, a short distance rises like a mountain in the darkness. The story is, in this sense, a comment on the prevailing condition of law and order in the state.

"Ekaki" ("Alone"): Kusesar is in hospital. The hospital is described with vivid detail. A woman there, after the death of her husband, seems to fall asleep from crying; when she wakes, she begins to weep again. Such things happen. The storyteller points towards a truth of human life and comments on the hospital's arrangements, not by delivering an abstract statement but by making the situation live before us.

"O Larki" ("That Girl"): Against the background of life among young men and women in a hostel, a young man named Naveen sees a girl holding two crumpled, empty cups, belonging to her and her lover. She asks Naveen where he is going. He imagines that she has taken him for someone beneath her and is asking him to throw away the cups. He refuses. The thought continues to revolve in his mind. The story turns on a small incident: did she ask him to dispose of the tea cups because she considered him inferior? Naveen says no firmly and walks on. Like "Ekaki," this story is founded on psychological analysis.

"Ekta Prem Katha" ("A Love Story"): In the days when only a few households had a telephone, calls frequently came to one house for someone living elsewhere: "Please go and call so-and-so." The narrator had a telephone at home and would summon a young man whenever his girlfriend rang. After the young man bought a mobile phone, those calls stopped. But when he changed his number, the girlfriend again began calling the narrator's house. The woman is Ritu, a friend of the young man's maternal cousin, and the narrator becomes anxious to help her. Lovers, mobile telephones and telephone calls enter this new story naturally, as elements of a changing age.

The title story is "Banait Bigadait" ("Making and Unmaking"). It has three named characters: Mala, her husband Satto, and their granddaughter Muniya. The familiar quarrels of a village household between mother-in-law and daughter-in-law have dwindled into such gestures as occasionally asking, after a bath, whether someone has eaten. Yet when that same son and daughter-in-law leave home, the mother-in-law grows anxious even at the cawing of a black crow. The story depicts the reality of the village after migration. One day the crow, too, will disappear along with Satto, and Muniya will search for both the crow and her grandfather. It is a migrant's story, a story of son, daughter-in-law and granddaughter—and of the quarrels and affection between mother-in-law and daughter-in-law.

In "Apan-Apan Dukh" ("Each One's Sorrow"), a wife who feels neglected curses her children. At night the children eat, and after they have finished the kitchen is locked; the wife remains hungry, and her irritation at her husband's snoring is a natural consequence. Everyone inhabits a world of their own. People imagine that the joys and sorrows of their particular world constitute the whole of life, but this is not so. Everyone has their own happiness and suffering, hopes and aspirations. The storyteller discloses truths that fall within the scope of his experience. How can subjective experience be independent of its surroundings? This question comes to the fore throughout Subhashchandra Yadav's stories.

In "Atank" ("Terror"), the storyteller meets an old acquaintance, Harivansh, at an office. The narrator's application for mutation of a land record has gone unattended because, after Harivansh's transfer, no one took a bribe from him—and so no one did the work. Harivansh's flourishing garden was the product of surplus money from bribes; why would someone else surrender an opportunity to earn? The narrator feels terrorised. The office atmosphere, corruption, and the change in social relations brought about by one man's transfer are all expressed here. Nowadays, when either you or I go to the block office or secretariat on some errand, are we not told the same thing: pay whatever is demanded, and if there is still a problem, then come and tell us! If you arrive instead with someone's name or a recommendation, the official will neither take your money nor complete your work.

In "Ekta Ant" ("An Ending"), the narrator's brother-in-law has had his head shaved after the death of their father-in-law, whereas the narrator has not; this provokes all manner of remarks. Having shaved his head, the brother-in-law is at peace. Cultural symbolism emerges here: the one who is caught is declared a thief and wrongdoer, while the one who escapes detection is counted an idealist. Not entirely, but in this story too, such a belief arises and is then broken. In Haryana, people do not shave their heads even when their own father dies: does that make their grief any less? Women in Punjab neither apply sindoor nor wear bangles after the first year, but during that first year their arms are covered with bangles up to the shoulders. Does their love for their husbands diminish after the first year of marriage?

In "Kabachu," the man who gives massages approaches the narrator and lays a hand on his thigh. Because the narrator is seated among people of genteel, upper-class manners, he moves the hand away. The masseur asks what reluctance there can be in touching a body that has already been touched—as though he imagines that the narrator has mistaken him for a young woman. The narrator begins to feel that he himself is a woman and the masseur an old male companion. The masseur lacks a fine sense of appropriate place and time; otherwise the narrator might have accepted a massage even in such intense heat. He feels pity for the masseur's poverty, yet also revulsion when he recalls the man's drawn-out "sh-ee-ee." Freud's psychoanalysis has been much criticised for placing sex at the centre of its arguments. Experience, however, brings out this point: the more one distances oneself from sex, and the more one keeps it outside conversation, fiction and literature, the more violent its intrusion becomes.

In "Karbar" ("Business"), the narrator meets Mr Varma, Sinha and two other men. At a bar, Sinha distinguishes friendship from business by telling two stories. The first concerns the proposition that everything has a price: after a man buys a television for a friend's wife, she demands a refrigerator; the story is left unfinished. In the second, a woman goes to a former lover to obtain money for a doctor's fee that could save her husband's life. In return for the money, the former lover asks her to spend the night with him. Sinha assigns no blame to anyone in this story. Why should the doctor provide treatment without payment? Why should the former lover give away money for nothing? And if the woman refuses to spend the night with her former lover, her husband will die.

As the narrator leaves the bar, even the doorman's salute begins to sound to him like the clink of money. The disintegration of older values, friendships and ideals produces an experience of loneliness.

Freud also comes to the fore in "Kushti" ("Wrestling"). The story begins with a hard, dried stain on a lungi, but it soon becomes clear that this is not the stain first suggested; it is the mark of a wound. The narrative then moves to wrestling at the market, where village problems are resolved, and to talk of the health centre being closed and bricks having been stolen from it. There is also discussion of a younger brother who, during the course of treatment, has come to prefer homeopathy to allopathy. People visit to inquire about the narrator's wound. He gives many of them a full account, but brushes aside several who are younger than he is. These linked incidents create the story's atmosphere.

The characters in "Canary Island's Laurel" are Subhash and Upiya. The story offers an image of a decision resembling the collapsing banks of the Kosi. A letter arrives from a maternal cousin; there is a boat crossing by the manoeuvre called katāri dene, passage into a current of ochre-coloured water, and disembarkation on a sandy shoal, beyond which thigh-deep water stretches for a long distance. Seeing someone push a bicycle across the burning sand, a passer-by calls out: "Did they give you that bicycle at your in-laws' house? Give it a little cattle-driver's shout, like an ox!" Subhash hears his elder sister and brother-in-law speak of how their daughter's wedding was delayed by two days for the sake of a coat, and of the notion that excessive education drives people mad. Though he wishes to, Subhash cannot bring himself to ask for two hundred rupees. His sister's conduct remains ambiguous, and Subhash, unconvinced and uneasy, returns home.

In "Trishna" ("Longing"), the narrator meets Akhilan, who tells him about an encounter with Shrilata. When he returns on the fifth day, he does not find her on the train. What will Akhilan do now—keep travelling between Visakhapatnam and Vijayawada, or spend his days in the company of memory?

"Canary Island's Laurel" and "Trishna" offer analyses of small, emotionally charged incidents.

In "Dana" ("A Grain"), Mohan has gone for an interview. A sympathetic office attendant informs him that outsiders are not recruited there; if he had a PhD, matters might be different. Everything appears sick and dejected to Mohan. A little bird and a myna dart, chirping, at a fragment of bread. The story gives a sensitive account of the distinction between "local" and "outsider" as it operates in interviews for competitive recruitment.

In "Drishti" ("Vision"), a man finishes his studies and searches for employment, enduring the sharp taunts of villagers. Eventually, inspired by a journalist from South India, the narrator takes up farming in his village despite his wife's opposition. Ordinary as these events may sound, they disclose social truths at several points. There is village gossip and intrigue, arising from the abundance of unoccupied time when work is scarce. Alongside this is the aspiration of contemporary women to lead an urban life.

In "Nadi" ("River"), the subject develops with the narrative and ends with it. Bihari arrives at Gagandev's home. He must stay in the city for a year. While helping him look for accommodation, Gagandev encounters a girl. Even after leaving her and moving on, knowing that he will never meet her again, he finds himself filled with a feeling of delight and love.

"Pralay" ("Deluge") is a flood story, set amid the waters of the Kosi. Bauki is waiting for Bunchek, but the water is rising in the channel. The Kosi flood advances, while Bauki is already exhausted by the demands and reproaches of his mother. The cattle cry out with hunger. Since Ramcharan has more food and supplies at home, he asks the others to arrange a boat. Kataniya lies far from Bauku's home. Death and destruction have hardened Bauku and broken the ties of attachment. But then the rain stops. Bauku begins trying to recognise things and call them back to memory.

In "Bat" ("A Matter"), too, the storyteller finds his plot while walking along the road and develops it through craft. At a lemon seller's stall, the narrator hears an argument between the vendor and another man and intervenes. Someone is demanding the umbrella he had put down beneath the stall. According to the narrator, people remember sorrow for a long time.

"Rambha" describes the changing relationship between men and women at a rapid pace. So long as a man remains distant from women, each appears to him a Menaka or Rambha; but when conversation begins, the narrator eventually feels that the woman is like his own daughter. A woman approaches along the road. Who is she, he wonders—Rambha, Menaka, or someone else? She has a son, who is not particularly handsome, and he concludes that the boy's father cannot be handsome either. During their conversation the woman sometimes treats the narrator like a father-in-law, and at other times compares herself to his daughter. At first the narrator dislikes this; later it pleases him. Yet at the end, when she bends to touch his feet but straightens up without touching them, he cannot understand her gesture.

"Hamar Gam" ("My Village") describes the road to the narrator's village, the dispersal of people from Kataniya towards the village of Menahi, and those picking their way between embankments. The people of the Kosi region live in conditions scarcely distinguishable from those of animals. The narrator's house at Kataniya was swept away, and he is therefore staying with Nathuniya. Nathuni makes arrangements for fishing and catching birds. There is a dispute over land: a co-sharer, whose own holding has sunk into the river, wishes to appropriate the narrator's wheat field. People are driven to distraction over land and women (!).

The author has begun pursuing women without adequate reason, much as Vishnu Sharma, while telling the stories of the Panchatantra, repeatedly turns against Shudras and women.

While everyone keeps drinking tea beside Kamal's fire because there are no cups available, the harvest is cut and carried away to Sibanan's place. When the forests of jhau, kans grass and reeds were still standing, birds came in great numbers; now there are fewer. Wild animals, deer, fish, turtles and dokas are disappearing: the resources that sustain life have become scarce. In the evening, a village council hears the land dispute. Satto's goat has died; his daughter-in-law attributes its death to her mother-in-law's curses. The mother-in-law says it is because, despite having vowed an animal sacrifice, the young goats were sold. The narrator describes the maturing figure of Satto's daughter as evidence of contact with men and, with an apparent justification, once again turns his suspicion upon a woman—because such a belief circulates among the people. Satto's daughter has not yet settled in her marital home. While eating at Sukan Ram's house, the narrator feels awkward, and to escape his discomfort says, "Today I have made you a member of my own caste." The Kosi has levelled the distinctions between people: Dom, Chamar, Musahar, Dusadh, Teli and Yadav all fill water from the same vessel and sit on the same mat.

For whom should we write—or tell—a story? The ideological question of storytelling: the people about whom we write may not read it. Will reading stories make people enlightened? The number of those who swear by the Gita and then tell lies has not diminished. Does that mean a story written according to such a criterion has less value?

Even if everyone does not become enlightened, they may at least receive wholesome entertainment. If even one person reads a story and begins to think in that direction, its purpose has been fulfilled. Even when the people for whom it has been written do not read it, those capable of intervening in their circumstances may do so. And as long as these circumstances persist, stories of this kind will continue to be written.

If society changes, will social values remain eternal? Should progressive storytelling reconstruct experience for a changing society, so that natural and social realities may be brought into adjustment with one another? Or does this changing age require stories founded on the enduring, essential elements of tradition, in order to give it some stability? There is a duality between individual welfare and social welfare; the two stand in opposition to each other. They need to be brought into relationship. A worldview is necessary. A story is not simply an idea that has arisen and can be set down anyhow in ink upon paper. It is directed by social and historical conditions.

Should a story, then, be idealist, naturalist or realist? Or should it be humanist, socialist, or a sense-based realism that attaches importance to experience? Alternatively, should a story be purposeful? Such a position would include utilitarianism, experimentalism, pragmatism, causalism, the philosophy of practical efficacy, and consequentialism. This is the most modern standpoint of all. To express oneself is human nature. Yet expression is restricted by social rules and shaped by circumstances.

The story, then, must be fashioned through a reconstruction of experience. Individual consciousness will thereby become social and collective consciousness. The exploiter will be compelled to restrain his tendencies, and the exploited will have to give vocal expression to their opposition.

Freedom—social change. Only then will the story communicate; it will become a medium of dialogue. Only then can the story become a weapon, a force, for society.

If the storyteller preaches, the result will be the transmission of knowledge, which is no longer what is needed. Only when the storyteller initiates dialogue will an atmosphere of liberation emerge; readers who participate in that dialogue will find release from inertia.

The story must be sequential and accessible if it is to achieve this purpose. It must become practical rather than merely intellectual. The generosity of narrative in Vedic literature gave birth to dialogue, which the rigidity of Puranic literature brought to an end.

To re-establish dialogue, the storyteller must possess conviction—conviction grounded in reasoning and conviction grounded in experience. Subhashchandra Yadav possesses both. The analytical philosophy of positivism analyses linguistic propositions and concepts rather than things themselves; this can be seen throughout Subhash's stories. Analytical or logical positivism and existentialism arose as responses to science, and these movements clarified the ambiguous ideas associated with it.

In phenomenology, the givens of consciousness are studied precisely as givens. Experience is the observation of facts pertaining to particular mental activities. This is a means of seeing an object in an absolute and pure form. In existentialism, man is—simply—man. He is nothing apart from what he makes of himself; he is condemned to be free (Sartre). Hegel, through dialectics, emphasised the determination of qualities and judgements of existence by an unending interrelation of analysis and synthesis. The deeper the essential element, the more distant it remains from outward form and the closer it comes to reality.

Quantum theory and the uncertainty principle have also affected modern thought. Beyond visible reality, inner and outer processes become possible through exchanges involving minute elements of force and energy. Under the principle of uncertainty, position and form have to be determined by estimation.

The conception of a universe with more than three dimensions and Stephen Hawking's A Brief History of Time are, in this account, directly undermining the existence of God, for they bring forward the idea of the death of God as well. Thus the existence of a controller of the universe is now in danger. In the context of the death of God and the end of history, how long will Maithili storytelling remain occupied with telling tales? How long will it confine itself to analysing short, very short and shorter stories, tales and fiction?

Just as virtual reality presents reality artificially and unites consciousness with it, so, without conceiving dimensions beyond the familiar three, even if we set out from the time of the Indus Valley civilisation at the speed of light, we could not yet have reached the far side of the universe. This sun is a star of middling rank—a mediocre star—among billions upon billions of other suns. We, living in a town or village on the planet Earth, which circles that mediocre star, sit with our hands upon our heads, worrying: whose problem could be greater than ours? These scientific and philosophical matters present themselves as challenges to our stories.

We shall have to achieve a holistic synthesis, a coordination of the whole! Only then will philosophy move from the merely philosophical to the real.

Poststructuralist methodology locates linguistic meaning not in the word, its meaning, or the rules of grammar, but in the process by which meaning is produced. For different kinds of individuals and groups, language assumes different meanings. There is no final relationship between language and the world. A word and its text possess neither a final meaning nor one exclusively their own.

Modern and postmodern reasoning: modernity was born of reality, dialogue, and the exchange of ideas. Thereafter the New Left movement appeared in France, as did currents such as nihilism and anarchism. These modern systems of thought were based on the distrust that emerged beyond established beliefs and assumptions.

The interpretation of meanings hidden within a text began to take account of its contexts of time and place, and language came to be treated as a form of play—a language-game. Postmodernism appeared as a criticism of power, legitimacy, and their stratification.

Consider the computer and information revolution. A programmer creates a piece of software and places it on the worldwide Internet; thereafter that software goes on working independently of its creator, sometimes performing tasks for which the creator did not design it. Other, intrusive programs, such as viruses, divert it from its course and make it destructive. Yet antivirus software is itself a program that puts the damage right. If even that cannot repair matters, the computer is backed up and formatted—a clean slate!

Capitalism arose with the Industrial Revolution. Now, in post-industrial society, information and communication have acquired increasing importance in place of production, and the computer has assumed a larger role in society. Mobile phones, credit cards and all such devices are based on chips. During the Kosi flood of 2008, Analkantji was trapped in his village, where obtaining food was a desperate struggle; yet an air-conditioned railway ticket was booked for him with a credit card. What further example could one need of the role of information and computers in Mithila's society?

Deconstruction and reconstruction point to a reorganisation of the process by which thought is formed: consciousness itself is being produced in new ways in the post-industrial age. History has not ended, but traditional history has come to an end. State, class, nation, party, society, family, morality and marriage are all being defined anew. Under the impact of so many changes, numerous institutions have fragmented and lost their contexts.

Against this background, let us also take a searching look at the narrative tradition of Maithili.

Ramdev Jha regarded Jaldhar Jha's "Vilakshan Dampatya" (Maithil Hit Sadhan, Jaipur, 1906) as the beginning of the modern Maithili short story. Then came Pulkit Mishra's "Mohini Mohan" (1907–08); Jansidan's "Tara's Widowhood" (Mithila Mihir, 1917); Shrikrishna Thakur's Chandraprabha; Tulapati Singh's Madanraj Charit; Kali Kumar Das's Adla ke Badla and Kamini ke Jivan; Shyamanand Jha's Akinchan; Shri Ballabh Jha's Vilasita; Harinandan Thakur "Saroj"'s Ishwariya Raksha; Shardanand Thakur "Vinay"'s Tara; Shyam Sundar Jha "Madhup"'s Pratigya-Patra; Vaidyanath Mishra "Vidyasindhu"'s Gapp-Sappak Kharihan; and Prabodh Narayan Singh's Bichhal Phool. The journey was carried forward by Harimohan Jha's stories and Yatri's short novels, and by Rajkamal Chaudhary, Lalit, Ramdev Jha, Balram, Prabhas Kumar Chaudhary, Dhumketu, Rajmohan Jha, Saketanand, Vibhuti Anand, Sundar Jha "Shastri," Dhirendra, Rajendra Kishore, Revati Raman Lal, Rajendra Vimal, Rambhadra, Ashok, Shivshankar Srinivas, Pradeep Bihari, Ramesh, Maneshwar Manuj, Shyam Darihare, Kumar Pawan, Anmol Jha, Mithilesh Kumar Jha, Harishchandra Jha, Upadhyay Bhushan, Rambharos Kapari "Bhramar," Bhuvaneshwar Pathey, Badri Narayan Verma, Ayodhyanath Chaudhary, R. N. Sudhakar, Jitendra Jeet, Surendra Labh, Jaynarayan Jha "Jigyasu," Shyam Sundar "Shashi," Ramesh Ranjan, Dhirendra Premarshi, Parmeshwar Kapari, Taranand Viyogi, Nagendra Kumar, Amarnath, Devshankar Navin, Analkant, Shridharam, Neeta Jha, Vibha Rani, Ushakiran Khan, Susmita Pathak, Shephalika Verma, Jyotsna Chandram, and Lalpari Devi.

Is there no good short fiction in Maithili, no good drama? Does Maithili have no grammar? Where, in Maithili grammar, is an analysis of distinctions such as panisoh and panigar, while words such as anal and pavak are readily available? Yet Dinbandhu Jha's book of verbal forms contains 1,025 such genuinely indigenous forms, and Ramanath Jha's Mithilabhashaprakash contains authentic Maithili grammar. With these two reference books, the construction of a standard language and grammar is entirely possible. What happens instead is comparable to writing, in an analysis of the First Battle of Panipat, that the battle was fought between Panipat and Babur. Dhirendra has described Rambhadra as the finest Maithili storyteller; but how many of his stories have been analysed so far? These matters had to be raised in relation to Nachiketa's plays, the work of Mahendra Malangia—the Shakespeare of Maithili—and the narrative journeys of Rambhadra and Subhashchandra Yadav.

At a time when Maithili's problem is its expulsion from household after household, people who have tried their hand at Hindi without becoming known turn to writing Maithili stories and poems and become editors and critics. Under the weight of their ambitions they are burdening the atmosphere of Maithili fiction and poetry. Marxism, feminism and secularism are forcibly stuffed into stories and poems, and the very people who do this proceed to determine their standards; ideology becomes a shield for mediocrity. Those engaged in exploiting and discouraging the poor and people of lower castes seek shelter in Marxism; those who have insulted women take refuge in feminism, the demand for a Mithila state, and related organisations; and communal-minded people find shelter in secularism. One also sees communalists among feminists, opponents of women among Marxists, and many such combinations and literary establishments. Some set about praising Rajkamal, some Yatri and Dhumketu, and some Sumanji; in the guise of taking a position on those writers, they advance themselves. "Even today, Yatri's Paro and the stories of Rajkamal and Dhumketu have not been accepted"—such nonsensical claims are made. Others edit allegedly controversial stories, manufacture a controversy themselves, and thereby promote their own standing. Competition restricted to the writings of Maithil Brahmins and Karna Kayasthas is disturbing these poets and storytellers. Having left Hindi for Maithili, they pursue such manoeuvres with such speed that one wonders when they will attend to the language's central problem. Do they imagine that by writing in Maithili after Hindi, recognition will arrive all the faster? If Maithili writers harbour this misconception, lack confidence and distrust the communicative capacity of their own mother tongue (!), what pretence are we maintaining by placing the future of the language on their shoulders?

At seminars I am astonished to see Sahitya Akademi award-winning, supposedly committed storytellers, editors and critics speaking with their sons, daughters and wives not in Maithili but in Hindi (English, presumably, being beyond their command). When there were twenty people writing in Maithili and five reading it, what controversy could there have been? Having read each of their individual works, I can say that Rajkamal's and Yatri's Maithili writing is gentle in character. In such circumstances, why invent the claim that "this poem" or "that story" contains a controversy, then display one's own brilliance by arguing for it? There follow claims such as "the first novelist after Yatri is so-and-so" and "the first poet after Rajkamal is someone else." Now pairs of storytellers and poets are emerging as well, devoted to one another and promoting each other's positions. Maithili's chief problem is that the language is dying amid the clashing private ambitions of this narrow band of rivals. Poets and storytellers have made Maithili their career: they expel Maithili from their homes and turn it into a subject for seminars. Where, then, are the readers, and what is the point of the controversies? Where do stories and poems stand in relation to what I see as the real problem: providing children with a Maithili-speaking environment and enabling people of every caste to love the language? How many science-fiction stories, and stories and poems for children and adolescents, are these career-minded writers producing? What efforts are being made to take such literature into every home? In an atmosphere where books of one or two hundred copies are printed and reviewed, pieces appear in magazines with circulations of a hundred or two hundred, photocopies are gathered into folders at home, and manoeuvres are undertaken to secure prizes and get books placed on syllabuses, my hopes have come to rest on readers and writers outside the Maithil Brahmin and Karna Kayastha communities.

People who could not manage their own households and families have accumulated heaps of literary and linguistic awards and set out to establish a Mithila state. Who knows how they would administer that state, or in which language they would speak in its legislative assembly when they were honoured there?

People who do not speak Maithili at home have become writers and poets (with equal entitlement in Hindi and Maithili). They think and write in Hindi, then translate it and call the result original Maithili writing! They produce Maithili stories and poems!!

They shamelessly accept awards for translations into Maithili from Marathi, Urdu, Tamil and Kannada, yet if you ask them the meaning of vanakkam, they cannot tell you; they do not know alif, be and se, and cannot converse with a child in Marathi. Their own heads are saved from being cracked by Maithili readers only because they arrange their own publications and reviews—and therefore have no readers. The absence of readers is to their advantage. When members of juries and advisory boards themselves step forward to promote themselves in these prize arrangements, the weakness of this small circle's confidence becomes plain. There is Sarang Kumar, while Balram is once again being discussed as a storyteller. What, then, will happen to writers whose children have not entered literature? Who will revive the discussion of them, who will promote their cause? While they are alive, each is engaged in promoting his own cause, is that not so? But after death? This truth about Maithili literature needs to be brought into the open. People continue searching for a solution even with their eyes closed.

Someone establishes a Chitragupta Sabha and turns Manipadma into a commodity; someone else forms a Maithil (Brahmin) Sabha and begins trading on Sumanji's name. Under the pretext of Manipadma and Sumanji they prosper in their own business and insult the very writers whose names they exploit. The disciples and hangers-on of editors of story and poetry anthologies secure places in collections of Maithili's all-time storytellers and poets—even when they have not published a previous collection or their number of stories and poems is laughably small. The magazines are in much the same state. Engaged in quarrels born of private ambition, these readerless magazines are killing themselves and killing Maithili. Where folk tales are written in drawing rooms without fieldwork, such absurd squabbles are only to be expected. Now caste-based quarrels and abusive language have appeared even on some Maithili blogs on the Internet.

To become a Marxist or feminist and then turn even that into a business, using these labels to compensate for a lack of literary calibre, has become a weapon of less talented writers within this restricted competition. Why should someone who respects Marx feel compelled to announce, “I am a Marxist critic” or “I am a Marxist writer”? What can one say, however, of those who make a business of Marx? The same business is being done in the names of Suman, Rajkamal, Yatri, Manipadma, Dhumketu—and others. The reason, too, is apparent. National surveys show, the argument goes, that Sanskrit, Hindi, Maithili and other literatures are studied at college by people who cannot obtain admission to other subjects; the same people also enter journalism. Such talent-poor servants of literature have acquired a taste for it, and is the future of the Maithili language to be secure in their hands? Yet this reality also opens a path ahead. A category of genuine Maithili-serving storytellers and readers must emerge—people willing to go among dust and dirt, to create literature for children and women, and to devote their energies to keeping Maithili alive. That category will certainly come into being.

There can be no compromise in Maithili's name. Subhashchandra Yadav's collection was serially published online in the Videha e-journal (http://www.videha.co.in) and won the affection of thousands upon thousands of readers. The stories received online comments; I inferred from readers' surnames that most of them belonged neither to the Maithil Brahmin community nor to the Karna Kayasthas. Another point emerged: lack of education can also produce differences between a language's pronunciation and its reading. That does not mean that Yadavji still speaks the language of Balchanma. If we now use that language for a Yadav character in a story, it may resemble the Prakrit given to ordinary people amid the Sanskrit of the play Shakuntalam; people from that community may even find it insulting. Language is in motion, and the tradition of writing introduces a measure of stability within it. This difference is also evident in Subhash's own writing, between the language of his stories and that of his essays and other prose.

Maithil Brahmins and Karna Kayasthas, it is suggested here, cannot remain simply readers for long: they soon begin craving titles such as "the only popular novelist after Yatri" or "the only poet in the true sense after Kulanand Mishra." While calling themselves horses and tigers and other people donkeys and goats, they distance themselves from the essential direction and problems. Their self-satisfied habit of reviewing their own stories and poems has arisen from the weakness of criticism. I have developed an aversion to that word "only," and see a remedy in the Maithili literary movement of the Videha e-journal against the slow poisoning administered to Maithili. More than a hundred writers joined it within a year, while the number of readers exceeded a hundred thousand. The manner in which children and women, along with readers and writers from outside the Maithil Brahmin and Karna Kayastha communities, came together was remarkable. Some will call my emphasis on this a move to divide (Maithili) literature, but my priority is Maithili, the Maithili literary movement. If this language dies, what will become of its fiercely competitive editors, poets, storytellers, critics and advocates of a Mithila state, sitting in their drawing rooms? Reading Subhashchandra Yadav's stories anew and rereading their language attract me all the more in this context. It is also significant that this collection, having first appeared serially on the Internet, is now coming into print: a fresh reading of the stories and of their language accompanies that passage. I hope that events such as these will strengthen Maithili every day and in every respect.

14. Rajdev Mandal's Ambara

Abstract

In efforts to propagate a language such as Sanskrit, simple Sanskrit is used in conversational training camps. Fiction and novels are translated into Sanskrit from modern languages, but poetry is left outside that process. The reason is that nobody reads poetry; translating it into a language for which training camps have become necessary is considered a wasteful use of energy.

Keywords: Rajdev · Mandal · Ambara · literary criticism · Maithili

Poetry: Few people read poetry. In efforts to spread a language such as Sanskrit, simple Sanskrit is used in conversational training camps. Stories and novels are translated into Sanskrit from modern languages, but poetry is excluded from the process. For poetry has virtually no readers, and translating it into a language for which training camps have become necessary is treated as a waste of energy. The situation of Maithili has come to resemble this. If the villages were to disappear today, the number of speakers of the language would become very small. People would speak Maithili only at seminars and gatherings. The need for camps to teach Maithili pronunciation is already being felt. In these circumstances, what is the need or justification for writing poetry in Maithili? When writers emphasise that they compose poetry because they have little time, the situation appears still more alarming. The affairs of the neighbourhood, personal ambitions, accusations and accounts of journeys have become the subjects of Maithili poetry. But why not use prose for these matters? A story may be adapted into a play for the stage, but what is the purpose of transforming prose into poetry? The readers of the poems being written in moments snatched from a busy life are critics given to sycophantic factionalism and the great poets who convert prose into verse while publishing laudatory appraisals of their own poems in prefaces! Who will understand the worth of making verse? A personal, worldly experience that has not penetrated deeply cannot become excellent poetry merely because it rhymes. However abstract otherworldly reflection may be, unless it meets the worldly, it too cannot move us, regardless of free verse, factional praise or the cover provided by an ideology. Human beings need food, clothing and shelter. Only after that comes reflection upon what lies beyond the world. When the Buddha asks whether all the people taking part in a celebration are aware that death is inevitable, and, if they are aware of it, how they can nevertheless celebrate, he poses a question that matters here. Modern Maithili poets see the foundations of their language, culture and economic life vanishing beneath their feet; yet they close their eyes and refuse to acknowledge the fact. They try to force ideologies about events in India and abroad into their poetry and to write for indigenous and Dalit society as though bestowing a favour. Such work fails to acquire any cutting edge. But when Rajdev Mandal writes—

...
Drop by drop, with drops of dripping blood
The earth is being bathed;
A bird is asking
This question of itself:
Will this dark and heavy night to come
Not leave our kind alive...?

—then the words make us shudder. Whose kind is at stake—the poet's, the bird's, or...? What need has this poem of sycophantic factionalism or a self-adoring preface? What factional chorus or ideological shelter does such feeling require? Poetry, then, needs excellence. It needs foundations in language and culture. It does not need merely imported subjects brought in with the intention of conferring a favour upon it. Nor does it need imported feeling that amounts only to a hurried, condescending attempt to recover the linguistic, cultural and economic foundations disappearing from beneath its feet. A good poem can be written on any subject: on the Buddha's concern for humanity's future, for example, to give strength to an unsettled mind. Otherwise people will continue to flock to fraudulent holy men for sermons. Poetry can attend to the foundations of society's language, culture and economy; otherwise camps will be needed to teach Maithili itself. The communicability of images is essential, too. Otherwise someone must first create an atmosphere for the poet and prepare a platform for the poem; training camps would have to be arranged to explain the poet's vocabulary and ideological allegiance. Indeed, poets have been doing something of this sort already!

The gentle rises and falls of Mithila's language, the many strengths of its working classes, and also its ways of life, cultural rigidity and politics—its daily routines, social conventions, economic condition, morality, religion and philosophy—must all enter literature. Otherwise literature will become one-sided, lose its balance, and turn into something fit only to be framed and hung upon a wall. The writing of poetry is a compulsion, a literary necessity. The day when it is felt necessary to organise camps to teach the people of Mithila their own Maithili language, the existence of poetry itself can be called into question. The poet must remain vigilant so that day never comes.

Rajdev Mandal has remained vigilant in just this way, and therefore his collection Ambara has emerged as the finest Maithili poetry collection of the first decade of the twenty-first century.

Supplementary Discussion

Poetry: Few people read poetry. In efforts to spread a language such as Sanskrit, simple Sanskrit is used in conversational training camps. Stories and novels are translated into Sanskrit from modern languages, but poetry is excluded from the process. For poetry has virtually no readers, and translating it into a language for which training camps have become necessary is treated as a waste of energy. The situation of Maithili has come to resemble this. If the villages were to disappear today, the number of speakers of the language would become very small. People would speak Maithili only at seminars and gatherings. The need for camps to teach Maithili pronunciation is already being felt. In these circumstances, what is the need or justification for writing poetry in Maithili? When writers emphasise that they compose poetry because they have little time, the situation appears still more alarming. The affairs of the neighbourhood, personal ambitions, accusations and accounts of journeys have become the subjects of Maithili poetry. But why not use prose for these matters? A story may be adapted into a play for the stage, but what is the purpose of transforming prose into poetry? The readers of the poems being written in moments snatched from a busy life are critics given to sycophantic factionalism and the great poets who convert prose into verse while publishing laudatory appraisals of their own poems in prefaces! Who will understand the worth of making verse? A personal, worldly experience that has not penetrated deeply cannot become excellent poetry merely because it rhymes. However abstract otherworldly reflection may be, unless it meets the worldly, it too cannot move us, regardless of free verse, factional praise or the cover provided by an ideology. Human beings need food, clothing and shelter. Only after that comes reflection upon what lies beyond the world. When the Buddha asks whether all the people taking part in a celebration are aware that death is inevitable, and, if they are aware of it, how they can nevertheless celebrate, he poses a question that matters here. Modern Maithili poets see the foundations of their language, culture and economic life vanishing beneath their feet; yet they close their eyes and refuse to acknowledge the fact. They try to force ideologies about events in India and abroad into their poetry and to write for indigenous and Dalit society as though bestowing a favour. Such work fails to acquire any cutting edge. But when Rajdev Mandal writes—

...
A bird is asking

—then the words make us shudder. Whose kind is at stake—the poet's, the bird's, or...? What need has this poem of sycophantic factionalism or a self-adoring preface? What factional chorus or ideological shelter does such feeling require? Poetry, then, needs excellence. It needs foundations in language and culture. It does not need merely imported subjects brought in with the intention of conferring a favour upon it. Nor does it need imported feeling that amounts only to a hurried, condescending attempt to recover the linguistic, cultural and economic foundations disappearing from beneath its feet. A good poem can be written on any subject: on the Buddha's concern for humanity's future, for example, to give strength to an unsettled mind. Otherwise people will continue to flock to fraudulent holy men for sermons. Poetry can attend to the foundations of society's language, culture and economy; otherwise camps will be needed to teach Maithili itself. The communicability of images is essential, too. Otherwise someone must first create an atmosphere for the poet and prepare a platform for the poem; training camps would have to be arranged to explain the poet's vocabulary and ideological allegiance. Indeed, poets have been doing something of this sort already!

The gentle rises and falls of Mithila's language, the many strengths of its working classes, and also its ways of life, cultural rigidity and politics—its daily routines, social conventions, economic condition, morality, religion and philosophy—must all enter literature. Otherwise literature will become one-sided, lose its balance, and turn into something fit only to be framed and hung upon a wall. The writing of poetry is a compulsion, a literary necessity. The day when it is felt necessary to organise camps to teach the people of Mithila their own Maithili language, the existence of poetry itself can be called into question. The poet must remain vigilant so that day never comes.

15. Munnaji's Maithili Vihani Story Collection "Pratik"

Abstract

Munnaji's collection of Maithili vihani (seed) stories, Pratik, has itself become a symbol of the symbolic power of the seed story. In every story in this collection one can see the process of lifting rice and chilli seedlings from the nursery bed and transplanting them. It has therefore become a crop of transplanted rice rather than broadcast rice.

Keywords: Munnaji · vihani · story · collection · Pratik · critical theory · Maithili

Munnaji's collection of Maithili vihani (seed) stories, Pratik, has itself become a symbol of the symbolic power of the seed story. In every story in this collection one can see the process of lifting rice and chilli seedlings from the nursery bed and transplanting them. It has therefore become a crop of transplanted rice rather than broadcast rice. Everyone may have heard of three maunds to a kattha; here we shall see it.

A vihani story is not a humorous morsel. It is the root of a story, its seed. There is a great difference between a plant grown from broadcast rice and one raised from a seedling. Broadcast rice does not tiller. A humorous morsel, then, is a little joke: it makes us laugh, but it is like broadcast rice. If one hears that same little joke, that humorous morsel, a second time, one will neither laugh nor be startled by it. If one writes a vihani story without allowing it to mature—if one writes it without first bringing it to ripeness—it will remain merely an anecdote. Humorous morsels have, however, been used, and will continue to be used, in seed stories, short stories, longer stories and novels, according to the writer's ability.

Yet seedlings will not emerge in the nursery from parboiled rice. The seed must therefore be sown without first being boiled. It must be brought to maturity without being boiled, and that demands greater labour. Even after one scatters seed, seedlings will not emerge from every grain; some grains will not germinate at all. Thus the proportion of successful seed stories is low; the success rate for short stories is somewhat higher, and higher still for longer stories and novels. A novel, however, is troublesome work: it churns the mind and takes much longer. A seed story can be written at speed. But just as poetry requires an impulse, so does a seed story; without it one cannot simply dash one off, and there remains the danger of making prose out of verse and verse out of prose. Every novelist gathers and arranges a great many seedlings. A novel is prose, but if one of its characters starts singing a song, will you stop that character? A novelist sees a seedling and begins to imagine a flourishing crop of narrative. Sometimes the novelist writes the seed story itself, but then, unable to restrain the temptation, employs that same seedling in a novel, a longer story, or a short story as well.

What, then, is distinctive about Munnaji's seed stories? My neighbour Surju Bhai raises so many seedlings in his nursery that he cannot transplant even ten per cent of them into his own fields. This is a flood-prone region, so other people's fields often remain without seedlings. Surju Bhai's neighbours benefit from this, because during floods rice sometimes has to be transplanted three times over: one planting is washed away by a flood; a second planting is followed by another flood. Since Surju Bhai is there, people need not worry about obtaining seedlings.

Munnaji's vihani stories offer the same reassurance.

Take the seed story "Rewaj" ("Custom"). In village households people call a widow a witch, yet after a man's death they quarrel over the right to light his funeral pyre in order to secure the house-site. Here, however, the seed sown for the story is of a somewhat higher order. The deceased has no son, but he has a wife and a daughter. When his brother wishes to lift the kohā, the widow stops him and tells the daughter to lift it. And who will support this new custom, begun only today? The answer, too, is supplied: those who have no sons.

There is likewise the seed story "Kamrunisa." Could Munnaji not fashion from this seed story another excellent novel like Hasina Manzil? Kamrunisa's father is Rahman. Like the making of lac bangles, asthma too had become something hereditary in their family. This asthma claimed the lives of Kamrunisa's father and mother, and then Kamrunisa herself...

"Jiya Jaray Sagar Rati" ("The Heart Burns All Night") discusses the problem of AIDS and live-in relationships, while "Diyad" describes how a shoe may look smooth and polished on top yet be eaten away underneath.

"Napna" determines the nature of women's work. Even today, when a census is conducted, the government does not count women's domestic labour as income. The story ends by referring to a woman who both holds a job and performs the work of the household.

"Deh, Mon a Prem" ("Body, Mind and Love") offers an example of how a humorous morsel can be transformed into a seed story. Munnaji works this transformation through two characters named Sabina and Mohsin.

Today, as people's lives gather speed, the importance of the seed story has increased. Munnaji is devoted to the vihani story, and this collection is a qualitative expression of that devotion.

Gajendra Thakur

Supplementary Discussion

A vihani story is not a humorous morsel. It is the root of a story, its seed. There is a great difference between a plant grown from broadcast rice and one raised from a seedling. Broadcast rice does not tiller. A humorous morsel, then, is a little joke: it makes us laugh, but it is like broadcast rice. If one hears that same little joke, that humorous morsel, a second time, one will neither laugh nor be startled by it. If one writes a vihani story without allowing it to mature—if one writes it without first bringing it to ripeness—it will remain merely an anecdote. Humorous morsels have, however, been used, and will continue to be used, in seed stories, short stories, longer stories and novels, according to the writer's ability.

Yet seedlings will not emerge in the nursery from parboiled rice. The seed must therefore be sown without first being boiled. It must be brought to maturity without being boiled, and that demands greater labour. Even after one scatters seed, seedlings will not emerge from every grain; some grains will not germinate at all. Thus the proportion of successful seed stories is low; the success rate for short stories is somewhat higher, and higher still for longer stories and novels. A novel, however, is troublesome work: it churns the mind and takes much longer. A seed story can be written at speed. But just as poetry requires an impulse, so does a seed story; without it one cannot simply dash one off, and there remains the danger of making prose out of verse and verse out of prose. Every novelist gathers and arranges a great many seedlings. A novel is prose, but if one of its characters starts singing a song, will you stop that character? A novelist sees a seedling and begins to imagine a flourishing crop of narrative. Sometimes the novelist writes the seed story itself, but then, unable to restrain the temptation, employs that same seedling in a novel, a longer story, or a short story as well.

What, then, is distinctive about Munnaji's seed stories? My neighbour Surju Bhai raises so many seedlings in his nursery that he cannot transplant even ten per cent of them into his own fields. This is a flood-prone region, so other people's fields often remain without seedlings. Surju Bhai's neighbours benefit from this, because during floods rice sometimes has to be transplanted three times over: one planting is washed away by a flood; a second planting is followed by another flood. Since Surju Bhai is there, people need not worry about obtaining seedlings.

Take the seed story "Rewaj" ("Custom"). In village households people call a widow a witch, yet after a man's death they quarrel over the right to light his funeral pyre in order to secure the house-site. Here, however, the seed sown for the story is of a somewhat higher order. The deceased has no son, but he has a wife and a daughter. When his brother wishes to lift the kohā, the widow stops him and tells the daughter to lift it. And who will support this new custom, begun only today? The answer, too, is supplied: those who have no sons.

"Napna" determines the nature of women's work. Even today, when a census is conducted, the government does not count women's domestic labour as income. The story ends by referring to a woman who both holds a job and performs the work of the household.

Today, as people's lives gather speed, the importance of the seed story has increased. Munnaji is devoted to the vihani story, and this collection is a qualitative expression of that devotion.

16. Sujit's "Jiddi"

Abstract

Sujit's new collection of stories penetrates deeply into the world of feeling. In "Adarsh," the storyteller, Sujit, adopts a female narrator. A distinctive feature of this narration is the injunction: if you have bathed before your husband, scrub the bucket; otherwise your husband's lifespan will be shortened. Hearing this from her mother-in-law, the woman narrator—brought up in the town of Bhairahawa but married into a rural household—wonders about her widowed mother-in-law: if scrubbing the bucket prolongs a husband's life, why did she become a widow?

Keywords: Sujit · Jiddi · critical theory · Maithili

Sujit's new collection of stories penetrates deeply into the world of feeling. In "Adarsh," the storyteller, Sujit, adopts a female narrator. A distinctive feature of this narration is the injunction: if you have bathed before your husband, scrub the bucket; otherwise your husband's lifespan will be shortened. Hearing this from her mother-in-law, the woman narrator—brought up in the town of Bhairahawa but married into a rural household—wonders about her widowed mother-in-law: if scrubbing the bucket prolongs a husband's life, why did she become a widow? Her husband, Arun, is caught in a dilemma. He wants both his mother and his wife. But the narrator has left the house. Arun used to say that, if he had a son, he would name him Adarsh.

In "Jiddi" ("Stubborn"), Sharda remembers having had to abandon her dancing and acting midway, and sees the fulfilment of her own purpose in the affection her son Jayant and her daughter Ginni show for dance and acting. Her husband opposes them. The son gives up dancing and acting, but the daughter appears to be realising Sharda's aim. Yet then come alcohol, cigarettes and illicit relationships... The outlook towards dance and acting in the first half of the story moves towards women's empowerment in the second half, but then veers off somewhere else. The son abandons dance and acting, while Sharda's daughter does not. Just as a woman's aspiration is about to find fulfilment through another woman, the subject and purpose of the story unexpectedly drift away.

"Phul Phulaiye ka Rahal" ("A Flower Is Beginning to Bloom") also brings the psychological analysis of a female narrator to the fore. Because her complexion is somewhat dark, she encounters difficulties in finding a marriage partner, but then she meets a handsome young man. There, too, she is betrayed... Yet she pulls herself together, and after a few days everything settles down.

In "Kehan Sajay" ("What a Punishment"), a family abandons its adopted daughter when, late in life, the couple have a child of their own! Here too, however, as the author tells the story, the love between Ritesh and Chameli is not made clear. The author had no need to specify that the parents who adopted Chameli were Yadavs, for no account of Yadav folk culture occurs in the story. Then, by abruptly announcing a pregnancy, the storyteller cuts the narrative short. A modern story must certainly have a subject, but where layers of problems emerge one after another, the writer must also draw upon vocabulary, everyday social conduct and narrative craft to address them. The writer does enter the layers of feeling; yet, in many places, by remaining content merely to state the subject, the stories seem to have been left unripe. One hopes that the writer's powers will be displayed more fully in a later collection.

Supplementary Discussion

Sujit's new collection of stories penetrates deeply into the world of feeling. In "Adarsh," the storyteller, Sujit, adopts a female narrator. A distinctive feature of this narration is the injunction: if you have bathed before your husband, scrub the bucket; otherwise your husband's lifespan will be shortened. Hearing this from her mother-in-law, the woman narrator—brought up in the town of Bhairahawa but married into a rural household—wonders about her widowed mother-in-law: if scrubbing the bucket prolongs a husband's life, why did she become a widow? Her husband, Arun, is caught in a dilemma. He wants both his mother and his wife. But the narrator has left the house. Arun used to say that, if he had a son, he would name him Adarsh.

In "Jiddi" ("Stubborn"), Sharda remembers having had to abandon her dancing and acting midway, and sees the fulfilment of her own purpose in the affection her son Jayant and her daughter Ginni show for dance and acting. Her husband opposes them. The son gives up dancing and acting, but the daughter appears to be realising Sharda's aim. Yet then come alcohol, cigarettes and illicit relationships... The outlook towards dance and acting in the first half of the story moves towards women's empowerment in the second half, but then veers off somewhere else. The son abandons dance and acting, while Sharda's daughter does not. Just as a woman's aspiration is about to find fulfilment through another woman, the subject and purpose of the story unexpectedly drift away.

"Phul Phulaiye ka Rahal" ("A Flower Is Beginning to Bloom") also brings the psychological analysis of a female narrator to the fore. Because her complexion is somewhat dark, she encounters difficulties in finding a marriage partner, but then she meets a handsome young man. There, too, she is betrayed... Yet she pulls herself together, and after a few days everything settles down.

In "Kehan Sajay" ("What a Punishment"), a family abandons its adopted daughter when, late in life, the couple have a child of their own! Here too, however, as the author tells the story, the love between Ritesh and Chameli is not made clear. The author had no need to specify that the parents who adopted Chameli were Yadavs, for no account of Yadav folk culture occurs in the story. Then, by abruptly announcing a pregnancy, the storyteller cuts the narrative short. A modern story must certainly have a subject, but where layers of problems emerge one after another, the writer must also draw upon vocabulary, everyday social conduct and narrative craft to address them. The writer does enter the layers of feeling; yet, in many places, by remaining content merely to state the subject, the stories seem to have been left unripe. One hopes that the writer's powers will be displayed more fully in a later collection.

17. Ramesh Narayan's "Patharak Naw" and Vinod Bihari Verma's "Balanak Bonihar O Pallavi (and Other Stories)"

Abstract

Among Maithili short-story collections, two occupy a special position because of certain distinctive qualities: (1) Ramesh Narayan's Patharak Naw and (2) Vinod Bihari Verma's Balanak Bonihar O Pallavi (and Other Stories). Ramesh Narayan's Patharak Naw was published in 1972 by Upasana Prakashan, 90, Shrikrishnanagar, Patna–1. Vinod Bihari Verma's Balanak Bonihar O Pallavi (and Other Stories) was published in 1994 by Maithili Pratibha, L. F. 1/3, Unit 3, Co-housing Colony, Bhubaneswar–751001.

Keywords: Ramesh · Narayan · Patharak · Naw · Vinod · Bihari · Verma · Balanak

Among Maithili short-story collections, two occupy a special position because of certain distinctive qualities: (1) Ramesh Narayan's Patharak Naw and (2) Vinod Bihari Verma's Balanak Bonihar O Pallavi (and Other Stories).

Ramesh Narayan's Patharak Naw was published in 1972 by Upasana Prakashan, 90, Shrikrishnanagar, Patna–1. Vinod Bihari Verma's Balanak Bonihar O Pallavi (and Other Stories) was published in 1994 by Maithili Pratibha, L. F. 1/3, Unit 3, Co-housing Colony, Bhubaneswar–751001.

Ramesh Narayan's "Patharak Naw"

Ramesh Narayan dedicates his story collection thus: "To the mud and mire of my own village, gleaming like a mirror even in fathomless waters, where my hope that a single blood-red lotus might be born and bloom for me remains suspended…" He adds on his own behalf: "Several of the stories in this collection have been broadcast from All India Radio's Patna station; this collection is therefore also offered with the courtesy of All India Radio."

The stories included in this collection are: 1. "The Weary Mind, the Winding Path" (Thehiyāyal Mon Ghumāon Bāt); 2. "A Line of Kohl" (Kājarak Rekh); 3. "A Palmful of Tears" (Ānjur Bhari Nor); 3. "Fragile Sleep, Shattered Dream" (Kānch Ninn Tutait Swapna); 4. "The Cherished Bed, the Sacrificed Sleep" (Saital Sej Nihunchal Ninn); 5. "Gone Away to a Foreign Land…" (Teji Gel Bides…); 6. "The Shade of Thorny Grass" (Kānt Kusak Chhāhari); 7. "A Postcard: Sarojini and I" (Ek Postcard: Sarojini ā Ham); 8. "Joining the Lines of a Torn Page" (Chīral Pannā Joral Pānti).

Vinod Bihari Verma's "Balanak Bonihar O Pallavi (and Other Stories)"

Vinod Bihari Verma dedicates his collection of stories as follows: "Respectfully dedicated to the sacred memory of the revered Lal Bhai, Dr Braj Kishore Verma 'Manipadma', a man of manifold learning." — Vinod. There are fourteen stories in this collection: three appeared in Mithila Mihir and eleven in Vaidehi. The collection contains: 1. "Balanak Bonihar O Pallavi"; 2. "Kunti, Karna O Parashuram"; 3. "Sulochanak Chatisar"; 4. "Saheb"; 5. "Brahma-Bisun-Rati"; 6. "Ham Pan Khelahun"; 7. "Phulak Katha"; 8. "Antarmukhi Basundhara"; 9. "Kashak Phul"; 10. "Machhak Picnic"; 11. "Jivan-Nao"; 12. "Kapurush"; 13. "Gonaur-Babu"; 14. "Akash-Phul."

18. Some New Books in Maithili

Abstract

Shambhudas — Jagdish Prasad Mandal. Jagdish Prasad Mandal enters the minds of ordinary people, and he enters the mind of Barham Baba. Thus he is able to perceive that both Barham Baba and the people are pleased. He sees Shambhua become Shambhu and then become Darbari Das (Shambhudas).

Keywords: new books in Maithili · critical theory · Maithili

Shambhudas — Jagdish Prasad Mandal. Jagdish Prasad Mandal enters the minds of ordinary people, and he enters the mind of Barham Baba. Thus he is able to perceive that both Barham Baba and the people are pleased. He sees Shambhua become Shambhu and then become Darbari Das (Shambhudas). Shambhudas's fall beneath a collapsing order is a sign of the disintegration of Mithila's art. The central characters of Jagdish Prasad Mandal's stories neither in Bheṭak Lāvā nor in Bisāṛh are reduced to such disarray; how, then, did Shambhudas become a "courtly" servant? Has some change come over Jagdish Prasad Mandal? Is he growing tired, is he losing the struggle? Yet, seen from a villager's standpoint, Shambhudas is in no way inferior to the heroes of Bheṭak Lāvā or Bisāṛh. Why, then, is he being defeated, or why is Jagdish Prasad Mandal making him lose? After all, he is the author, the god of these characters; why did he not make this one victorious? Jagdish Prasad Mandal's characters are not idle pretenders, and that is why they prevail on the economic front, where work is performed with one's own hands. But they become entangled in the classical labyrinth of art (and literature too), constructed by a handful of people. Shambhudas had to fight his economic circumstances; he fought and won. In the sphere of art he became a courtier's servant, for otherwise he could not make a living. Yet even there Shambhudas raised a flag of rebellion. His decision to forget home and family and never marry demonstrated that becoming a "courtly" servant was not a matter of opportunistic convenience but compulsion. He did not become an opportunist for the sake of a household; his decision to forgo home, family and marriage is also an expression of remorse at having had to become Darbari Das. The parallel tradition will prevent art from being reduced to courtly servitude. If Shambhudas loses, Mithila will lose. It is not Jagdish Prasad Mandal who will lose: Mithila will lose, if Mithila fails to recognise this warning.

Bajantā-Bujhantā — Jagdish Prasad Mandal. In the seed story "Bajantā-Bujhantā," the parrot is a domesticated bird that lives with human beings without a cage. Images of this kind are more numerous in this collection of seed stories than the stories themselves, not fewer. In "Chaukīdārī" there is the image of labouring for eight months with one's stomach tied tight in hunger. In "Paṭor," dedicated to Manoj Kumar Karna, the well-known Munnaji, the words "Just as a dark room is alive with snakes, so are we two people" push the seed story away from the crossroads in another direction and carry it forward. Of the stories in this collection, Samdahi's observation seems particularly pointed: "Many have become listeners to the language of crows."

Taregan — Jagdish Prasad Mandal. These seed stories have neither a "punch line" nor a discrete "image" of the usual kind, because the book is for young children: here the entire story is itself an image. Thus, in "The Vow of Service to the Nation," when Subhas Chandra Bose's father says that sleeping on the ground is not enough, the effect upon young Subhas's mind remains unchanged even when he grows up. In "True Knowledge," Bharadvaja declares knowledge greater than heaven. This collection is not only important for children's literature; it also enlarges the scope of the seed-story form.

Gītāñjali — Jagdish Prasad Mandal. In the Uchitpur of "Let Us Go to Uchitpur," everyone's gait and bearing are of one kind, everyone wears the same dress, and there is no distinction between fire and water! The "new-moon full moon" of "An Awkward Form..." says a great deal. "Yār Yau..." is a song of calamity. Its account of everything being swept away in a flood includes the washing away of the mind, thought and consciousness themselves. In "Jug-Jug...," dedicated to Rajnandan Laldas, all doors have been shut in a spider's web. The song collection Gītāñjali, dedicated to Professor Uday Narayan Singh "Nachiketa," is singable in its very texture.

Rāti-Din — Jagdish Prasad Mandal. Baba could not understand the exploits of the barren woman; he dug the earth, planted trees and watered them, and yet did the grove turn haunted and desolate? One who had never seen the soil caught hold of a treetop and reached for the sky! "A Light Task" describes the experience gained from acquiring the knack of doing a task lightly, and, indeed, the experience of encountering an artist's work; it also shows how a world of feeling is created. In the syrup of "Paṭṭā Chhīmī," which makes the heart reel, or in "The Household Pitcher Has Already Sunk," one sees everywhere a new, distinctive form of Maithili verse. This is what makes Rāti-Din remarkable.

Indradhanushī Akās — Jagdish Prasad Mandal. This poetry displays a new and distinctive form of Maithili verse: "Dancing and dancing, it sings a nachārī." The spiritual and otherworldly reflection that poetry can contain is also present: "One creation, another desolation / change is only a game." The poet is attentive in the choice of words and subjects. Mystery, despair and questions continually appear alongside answers and hope.

Tīn Jeṭh Egāraham Māgh — Jagdish Prasad Mandal. In "In Every Home...," a lamp burns in each household while darkness spreads across the whole village, creating a duality. "When Skill..." also offers the cause in the lines, "Good ways and bad, ridges and furrows / the land keeps turning barren." Yet in "With Hope and Love..." hope returns.

Saritā — Jagdish Prasad Mandal. Jagdish Prasad Mandal's verse raises questions. Having examined its subject, it brings a question into its conclusion. Viewed alongside his prose writing, despair appears more frequently than hope. Verse does not give him the leisure to analyse either the question or its answer, so through his poetry he inspires readers to keep asking questions and searching for answers. This distinctive form of verse has entered Maithili literature for the first time.

Basandhurā — Rajdev Mandal. When Rajdev Mandal writes poetry, it makes us shiver. His sensibility needs neither the support of a clique nor of any ideological camp. The excellence of his verse comes from its linguistic and cultural grounding, not from imported subject matter; nor, therefore, will one encounter an imported sensibility. The power of his imagery to communicate lies in his vocabulary. To compose poetry is a compulsion for Rajdev Mandal, a literary compulsion. Feeling turns and surges outward, and becomes his verse.

Sakhārī-Peṭārī — Nand Vilas Rai. Writing about Jitan Mukhiya in "The True Son," he says: "A Mallah by caste, yet without the slightest skill in catching fish!" In "The Curd of Chaurchan," Somni gives half the milk to the woman who comes to warm it. In "Babādham" the writer says, "For me, my mother and father are my Babādham." Nand Vilas Rai finds his subject matter in the neighbourhood around him. Dukhni of "The Dung-Gatherer" begins gathering dung from fallow ground, shaping dung cakes and selling them in Nirmali market to sustain herself. As the use of gas increases, dung cakes sell less readily and her life becomes difficult. In "Cleaning the Lying-in Room," people fight over the work of cleaning; many may not know why there is a fight over it, but the reason is that it generates income. Nand Vilas Rai's collection of short-short stories contains many possibilities still concealed, and what has been brought before us is by no means lacking in interest.

Anshu — Shivkumar Jha "Tillu." Meaningful critics have been almost absent from Maithili literature. This is the first book in which the critic begins with criticism and ends with criticism. Unlike critics who begin with applause or denunciation, plead lack of time, and habitually lavish excessive praise or excessive blame, composing without reading such reviews that they could be fitted to any story, poem, novel or play at will, Anshu opens a new chapter in Maithili criticism and announces the end of the old, dilapidated critical practice. In the preface the critic himself says:

"In criticism, looking only on all four sides is not enough; it is right to look in all ten directions." After reading criticism conducted from these ten directions, the books collected and edited by government institutions will seem stale, and the reviews of today's so-called established critics will seem unethical. This is why that kind of criticism has failed to "increase the creator's creative eloquence": good writers have been pushed to the margins of Maithili literature, opportunists have become trapped in a narrow well-bound outlook through such reviews, and the books collected and edited by government institutions have rotted in warehouses because they never received the affection of readers.

In this respect the criticism contained in Anshu becomes still more significant.

Bāp Bhel Pittī and Adhikār — Bechan Thakur. Bāp Bhel Pittī is a social play in which Santosh begs to educate Manoj and then returns home. Adhikār is a play based on the Right to Information. It tells the story of the real-life figure Manjur, who used the RTI law to expose irregularities in the Indira Awas housing scheme and travelled by rickshaw from Jhanjharpur to Delhi. He could not be erased, although attempts were being made to erase him. Why was this happening, whose interests were threatened by the play, and why was opposition to it so fierce? All this has now become clear.

Biswāsghāt — Bechan Thakur. The play Biswāsghāt announces the beginning of Bechan Thakur's second innings. It is his largest play so far. In their choice of subjects, mainstream playwrights still cling to "Gonu Jha" and "folk tales," without bringing those tales into a contemporary context. Mainstream critics then forcibly discover women's discourse and a host of other supposed themes in them, keeping playwrights as frogs in a well. In these circumstances, this playwright of the parallel current has made into the subject of a drama the happenings and misfortunes surrounding compensation money under the present "N.H." road project. The ugly face of the police and administration comes to the fore. The playwright also received threats intended to prevent the staging of the play, but he did not abandon his commitment as a writer. At the Videha Theatre Festival, the performance ran for more than six hours, and the audience remained spellbound. Bechan Thakur has already written plays about female foeticide, superstition and the Right to Information. His drama on the National Highway project proves that playwrights in the parallel tradition live among the people and remain connected with society.

Hamar Ṭol — Rajdev Mandal. Yatri's Pāro was a "first-hand" account written from within the social and cultural conditions of Mithila's Brahmin caste at the time. Rajdev Mandal's novel is written from within the social and cultural conditions of Mithila's Dhanuk caste. Superstition, social reform, love, hatred, hope and despair are all interwoven here. After Lalit's Prithvīputra, a darkness had spread; mainstream authors and critics had lost their way. Rajdev Mandal's Hamar Ṭol refines the "second-hand" account of Prithvīputra with a "first-hand" account, carrying the course of Maithili literature forward. The author was compelled to make his novel a tragedy. There are certain struggles he does not see, or does not wish to see, and which nobody sees. Yet he gives an account of those too: "Everyone set off in a flurry. The fight between the crow and the myna began. Nobody saw it, but the tree did. And though the tree saw much else, it remained silent." Through its portrayal of the tangle of that silence, refined by a "first-hand" account of what remains unseen, this novel has secured its place in the history of Maithili literature.

19. The Story of "Sagar Rati Deep Jaray"

Abstract

In the history of Sagar Rati Deep Jaray being presented by Raman, there are many discrepancies, from the account of its beginnings to the account of the present day. In telling that history, the contributions of many people have been exaggerated, those of many others reduced, still others altered, and some people have disappeared altogether. It has been described as an autonomous organisation; nevertheless, Raman and Ajit Azad repeatedly took part on behalf of Chetna Samiti. Where no one else accepted the garland, they accepted it on Chetna Samiti's behalf, while the name of Chetna Samiti was omitted from the list of conveners and another name inserted to construct a different history.

Keywords: Sagar Rati Deep Jaray · history · critical theory · Maithili

In the history of Sagar Rati Deep Jaray being presented by Raman, there are many discrepancies, from the account of its beginnings to the account of the present day. In telling that history, the contributions of many people have been exaggerated, those of many others reduced, still others altered, and some people have disappeared altogether. It has been described as an autonomous organisation; nevertheless, Raman and Ajit Azad repeatedly took part on behalf of Chetna Samiti. Where no one else accepted the garland, they accepted it on Chetna Samiti's behalf, while the name of Chetna Samiti was omitted from the list of conveners and another name inserted to construct a different history. According to information attributed to Gaurinath, Chetna Samiti imposed a written ban on Gaurinath, Agnipushpa and Pradip Bihari. Afterwards, Bihari submitted a written apology to this "marriage hall" (Chetna Samiti), and was subsequently given an Akademi Award not for his writing but, the author alleges, for that deed; thus he too became a representative of the marriage hall. What this trio subsequently did in Sagar Rati together with Shyam Deoghar will not be found, the essay argues, in Raman's caste-biased history.

What was in the Sagar Rati register that Raman says Vibha Rani lost? Was the register lost, or was it allowed to be lost? Yet there is something, the author says, that neither Raman nor Vibha Rani knows: two or three days before her death, Aarti Kumari sent a photocopy of it to Umesh Mandal. If she had wished, she could have sent it to any of the Jha figures as well, but she did not trust them. Why did she not trust them? It is said that blood always leaves its traces. The true history of Sagar Rati will soon emerge.

The Darbhanga gathering scheduled for 31 May 2014, the author predicts, will be sponsored by Darihare, Raman and Bihari, with the Sahitya Akademi and Maithili organisations recognised by it that the author describes as fraudulent; it will involve those whom he denounces as casteist, Brahminist and Kayasthaist so-called writers. It will be the second gathering of this kind after Delhi, and Raman, Darihare and Bihari will call it the eighty-third gathering as well. Stories such as "Rāṛak Sukh Balāy" will be read there. Raman, Darihare and Bihari, whom the author describes in the same terms, are barred from the gathering at Mehath.

It is said that Sagar Rati Deep Jaray acts as a training ground for new storytellers, that young writers are given practice in writing. But what is the truth? Are its tendencies any different from those of the Sahitya Akademi? Did the devices employed to take it over not resemble the stratagems used in the Akademi itself?

The boycott of the seventy-ninth Sagar Rati by Hirendra Jha and others, together with what the author calls Raman's casteist pronouncement there, was an affront not merely to Umesh Paswan but to Maithili itself. The politics of seizure of control had begun even before the seventy-ninth gathering. At the seventy-fourth Sagar Rati in Hazaribagh, Pradip Bihari proposed to take up the garland only to defeat someone else's proposal. His proposal was solely intended to secure control for his own group. He withdrew it in favour of that group. He repeated this performance at the seventy-fifth gathering. Was he being used in this practice of blackmail, or was he its leading performer? The essay declares that his writing lacks vitality but his sordid political manoeuvring is vigorous. It alleges that such qualities win Sahitya Akademi awards: he first apologised to Chetna Samiti and humbled himself before it, then shamelessly accepted the award. Thus, the author concludes, he is the principal actor in this business of blackmail. He knows, the essay says, that concentrating on good writing is foolish because it does not bring prizes; a Sahitya Akademi award requires manipulation, at which he is a master. Let Maithili go to ruin.

Under these circumstances new writers received no training. More people were discouraged and driven away from Maithili literature than were brought into association with Sagar Rati: the net result was negative.

The politics of boycott affected the gatherings at Supaul, Deoghar and Narhan. As for the politics of takeover, Manoj Mukti reports that at the Kathmandu Sagar Rati, Dhirendra Premarshi gave no local literary figure even a hint that such a gathering was to take place.

Ashok Avichal, Shyam Darihare, Raman and others allegedly attempted to pressure the Deoghar organiser, Omprakash Jha, by demanding that the Sahitya Akademi gathering be recognised as a Sagar Rati event; they made their participation conditional upon this recognition and threatened to boycott it otherwise. But after what the text describes as the killing of Aarti Kumari, this was the first chance to defeat those whom the author calls blackmailers. The gathering, sustained by successive reviews and counter-reviews, achieved unprecedented success, and their boycott made it stronger still. Darihare told the organiser that, for the Sahitya Akademi gathering to gain recognition as Sagar Rati, he had telephoned about it at Raman's request during a meeting of the Maithili Writers' Association in Patna. Avichal told the organiser the same thing.

The Deoghar gathering proved to be a training school. Had Raman, Darihare and Bihari attended, they might have learned how to bring quality to their writing. But, the author remarks sarcastically, they are practical people: they understand that one writes only for prizes, and that prizes are won through influence and manoeuvring rather than quality. The essay dismisses Avichal as possessing not even a trace of talent, and argues that no training could have helped him. By staying away he saved his time, and did well to do so.

If Sagar Rati Deep Jaray acquired quality, the essay asks, who would pay any attention to mediocrities such as Bihari, Darihare and Raman? They will therefore hold another Sahitya Akademi gathering with the writer of "Rāṛak Sukh Balāy," where Brahmin youths will be trained by Raman, Bihari and Darihare in how to write "good" stories like that work. So much the better, the author says ironically: fools will cease to enter Sagar Rati. Indirectly, Maithili literature will remain grateful to Raman, Bihari and Darihare for that result.

The strategy of boycott through which Darihare, Bihari and Raman sought control of Sagar Rati was able to work at Bhagalpur with Aarti Kumari; two years later, at Deoghar, the same politics failed so thoroughly that first they withdrew from Sagar Rati and then were removed. What process is operating in this literature, known throughout the world, the author contends, as Brahminist in language, that made this possible? The essay asserts that Aarti Kumari had already been sacrificed by the self-appointed priests of the Brahminist ritual of Sagar Rati Deep Jaray. How, amid that climate of fear, did a transformation occur that Raman, Bihari and Darihare could not understand?

The Brahminist character attributed to the Maithili language has, the author argues, enabled extensive manipulation of language itself. Here rāṛ, as understood from the Brahmin standpoint being criticised, denotes Bhumihars, Rajputs, Kayasthas and all other castes. One addresses one's own child with the respectful yau and an elderly rāṛ with the contemptuous hau! Even proverbs become vehicles of dishonesty: "Ten Brahmins, ten stomachs; ten rāṛ, one stomach." My mother, however, says that this proverb exists only among Brahmins, while everyone else says, "Ten rāṛ, ten stomachs; ten Brahmins, one stomach." The essay claims that a mediocre writer such as Bihari does not understand these things: he imagines that in "Rāṛak Sukh Balāy," Raman, Bihari and Darihare have directed their insult merely at Jagdish Prasad Mandal. Raman and Darihare, the author says, know what they mean; Bihari, however, is a Kayastha himself, and by Raman and Darihare's definition the insult in "Rāṛak Sukh Balāy" is aimed not only at him but at every non-Brahmin in Mithila as well as at Jagdish Prasad Mandal.

20. Dr Amarendra's "Angika Bal-Sahitya" (Angika Children's Literature)

Abstract

Dr Amarendra's Angika Bal-Sahitya: From Folk Memory to Modern Writing for Children — A Comprehensive Review in Four Dimensions (A Parallel Maithili–Thethi-Angika Study). From Folk Memory to Modern Writing for Children: A Comprehensive Review in Four Dimensions. Book under review: Angika Bal-Sahitya · Author: Dr Amarendra · Samiksha Prakashan, Delhi/Muzaffarpur · First edition: 2022.

Keywords: Dr Amarendra · Angika · children · critical methodology · Maithili

Dr Amarendra's "Angika Bal-Sahitya": From Folk Memory to Modern Writing for Children — A Comprehensive Review in Four Dimensions (A Parallel Maithili–Thethi-Angika Study)

From Folk Memory to Modern Writing for Children: A Comprehensive Review in Four Dimensions

(A Parallel Maithili–Thethi-Angika Study)

Book under review: Angika Bal-Sahitya · Author: Dr Amarendra · Samiksha Prakashan, Delhi/Muzaffarpur · First edition: 2022

Pages: 112 · Price: two hundred rupees

1. Introduction: Not a History of Children's Literature, but a Cultural Genealogy

Thethi-Angika: 1. Introduction: Not a History of Children's Literature, but a Cultural Genealogy

Maithili — Dr Amarendra's Angika Bal-Sahitya is not merely, in the ordinary sense, a list of books for children, profiles of their authors, or a chronological record. Its larger undertaking is to understand where and how a child in the Angika-speaking community first encounters literature, and what continuity links those first oral and cultural experiences to modern printed children's literature. Consequently, while writing a history, the book also constructs a kind of cultural genealogy: from lullabies sung in a mother's voice, infant sounds, riddles, play-songs, folktales, and the shared experiences of family and courtyard to modern poetry, novels, stories, plays, essays, and biographies.

Thethi-Angika — Dr Amarendra's Angika Bal-Sahitya is not merely, in the ordinary sense, a list of books for children, profiles of their authors, or a chronological record. Its larger undertaking is to understand where and how a child in the Angika-speaking community first encounters literature, and what continuity links those first oral and cultural experiences to modern printed children's literature. Consequently, while writing a history, the book also constructs a kind of cultural genealogy: from lullabies sung in a mother's voice, infant sounds, riddles, play-songs, folktales, and the shared experiences of family and courtyard to modern poetry, novels, stories, plays, essays, and biographies.

Maithili — The book's table of contents itself confirms this perspective. Its first part, "Angika Children's Folklore," extends over pages 8–42; its second and considerably larger part, "Modern Angika Children's Literature," occupies pages 43–112. The final pages are devoted to references and a list of periodicals. This architecture means that the author does not regard modern written children's literature as an achievement born out of nothing: he seeks the origins of its linguistic rhythm, narrative structure, playfulness, entertainment, and communal memory in folk tradition.

Thethi-Angika — The book's table of contents itself confirms this perspective. Its first part, "Angika Children's Folklore," extends over pages 8–42; its second and considerably larger part, "Modern Angika Children's Literature," occupies pages 43–112. The final pages are devoted to references and a list of periodicals. This architecture means that the author does not regard modern written children's literature as an achievement born out of nothing: he seeks the origins of its linguistic rhythm, narrative structure, playfulness, entertainment, and communal memory in folk tradition.

Maithili — The argument is meaningful also within the wider field of modern children's-literature studies. Kimberley Reynolds identifies the importance of an orally transmitted world of stories in introducing each new generation to literary traditions. In that comparative light, the line of continuity Dr Amarendra draws from folklore to modern creation appears to be an independent critical insight arising from local material. The book's enduring significance lies in making the child's actual cultural life central to the writing of children's literary history: home, mother, grandmother, playmates, birds and animals, fields and open land, rain, river, food, sleep, fear, laughter, rhyme, and bodily movement all become legitimate material for literary history.

Thethi-Angika — The argument is meaningful also within the wider field of modern children's-literature studies. Kimberley Reynolds identifies the importance of an orally transmitted world of stories in introducing each new generation to literary traditions. In that comparative light, the line of continuity Dr Amarendra draws from folklore to modern creation appears to be an independent critical insight arising from local material. The book's enduring significance lies in making the child's actual cultural life central to the writing of children's literary history: home, mother, grandmother, playmates, birds and animals, fields and open land, rain, river, food, sleep, fear, laughter, rhyme, and bodily movement all become legitimate material for literary history.

Prologue: Four Angles of Illumination

Thethi-Angika: Prologue: Four Angles of Illumination

Maithili — Within the parallel-literature perspective represented by Videha, no language's children's literature is considered "minor." To apply the same seriousness of criticism to traditions pushed to the margins of institutional history is a foundational commitment of that movement. From this standpoint, I examine Dr Amarendra's Angika Bal-Sahitya through four dimensions: Indian poetics grounded in rasa, dhvani and vakrokti; Western literary theory; epistemology rooted in Navya-Nyāya; and the Videha framework of parallel history. These four perspectives are not antagonists: they are four angles of illumination upon a single text, together revealing its fuller form.

Thethi-Angika — Within the parallel-literature perspective represented by Videha, no language's children's literature is considered "minor." To apply the same seriousness of criticism to traditions pushed to the margins of institutional history is a foundational commitment of that movement. From this standpoint, I examine Dr Amarendra's Angika Bal-Sahitya through four dimensions: Indian poetics grounded in rasa, dhvani and vakrokti; Western literary theory; epistemology rooted in Navya-Nyāya; and the Videha framework of parallel history. These four perspectives are not antagonists: they are four angles of illumination upon a single text, together revealing its fuller form.

Introduction and Background

Thethi-Angika: Introduction and Background

Maithili — Dr Amarendra's book is a comprehensive survey of Angika children's literature, distinguished by its attempt to bind together the folk origins and modern development of the genre. In his "Personal Statement," the author modestly acknowledges that it is not a book written independently as one continuous work. Rather, it is a collection of essays composed at different times for the Bharatiya Bal-Loksahitya Kosh (Encyclopaedia of Indian Children's Folklore) and the Bharatiya Lori-Sahitya Kosh (Encyclopaedia of Indian Lullaby Literature), edited by Dr Suresh Gautam and Dr Veena Gautam. His further acknowledgement is critically important: whatever deficiencies remain in the book will open a way for more writing on Angika children's literature. That modest admission already clarifies the work's true character: a point of departure, not the final word.

Thethi-Angika — Dr Amarendra's book is a comprehensive survey of Angika children's literature, distinguished by its attempt to bind together the folk origins and modern development of the genre. In his "Personal Statement," the author modestly acknowledges that it is not a book written independently as one continuous work. Rather, it is a collection of essays composed at different times for the Bharatiya Bal-Loksahitya Kosh (Encyclopaedia of Indian Children's Folklore) and the Bharatiya Lori-Sahitya Kosh (Encyclopaedia of Indian Lullaby Literature), edited by Dr Suresh Gautam and Dr Veena Gautam. His further acknowledgement is critically important: whatever deficiencies remain in the book will open a way for more writing on Angika children's literature. That modest admission already clarifies the work's true character: a point of departure, not the final word.

Maithili — Literature is a living mirror of a society, a language community, and its cultural heritage. In the case of children's literature, it does not remain merely a collection of stories and informal talk; it becomes a powerful foundation for the psychological, social, and moral development of a new generation. This critical essay offers a detailed literary, linguistic, and psychological analysis of Angika Bal-Sahitya, a work written and edited by the eminent Angika writer Dr Amarendra. Published by Samiksha Prakashan, Muzaffarpur/Delhi, the book is encyclopaedic in its treatment of the development of Angika children's literature, its folk traditions, and its modern tendencies.

Thethi-Angika — Literature is a living mirror of a society, a language community, and its cultural heritage. In the case of children's literature, it does not remain merely a collection of stories and informal talk; it becomes a powerful foundation for the psychological, social, and moral development of a new generation. This critical essay offers a detailed literary, linguistic, and psychological analysis of Angika Bal-Sahitya, a work written and edited by the eminent Angika writer Dr Amarendra. Published by Samiksha Prakashan, Muzaffarpur/Delhi, the book is encyclopaedic in its treatment of the development of Angika children's literature, its folk traditions, and its modern tendencies.

Linguistic and Cultural Relations between Angika and Maithili: Historical Background

Thethi-Angika: Linguistic and Cultural Relations between Angika and Maithili: Historical Background

Maithili — The relationship between Angika and Maithili has been exceptionally close and historically deep. In his Linguistic Survey of India (1903), the linguist George Abraham Grierson classified Angika, which he called "Chhika-Chhiki," as a subdialect of Maithili. Pandit Rahul Sankrityayan and later language activists, however, accorded it the status of an independent language. Dr Shobha Kumari's Angika Sahitya Ka Itihas also regards it as a language with a rich tradition. The earliest literary evidence for this language, according to the discussion, is found in the Charyāpada, attributed to the Buddhist Siddhas Luipa, Bhusukupa, and Kanhapa of the seventh century. The passage states that approximately sixty million people speak the language across twenty-six districts of India, in Bihar, Jharkhand, and West Bengal, and that its folklore is exceptionally rich. Reviewing an Angika book in Maithili is thus presented as a way of bringing two sister linguistic traditions closer together.

Thethi-Angika — The relationship between Angika and Maithili has been exceptionally close and historically deep. In his Linguistic Survey of India (1903), the linguist George Abraham Grierson classified Angika, which he called "Chhika-Chhiki," as a subdialect of Maithili. Pandit Rahul Sankrityayan and later language activists, however, accorded it the status of an independent language. Dr Shobha Kumari's Angika Sahitya Ka Itihas also regards it as a language with a rich tradition. The earliest literary evidence for this language, according to the discussion, is found in the Charyāpada, attributed to the Buddhist Siddhas Luipa, Bhusukupa, and Kanhapa of the seventh century. The passage states that approximately sixty million people speak the language across twenty-six districts of India, in Bihar, Jharkhand, and West Bengal, and that its folklore is exceptionally rich. Reviewing an Angika book in Maithili is thus presented as a way of bringing two sister linguistic traditions closer together.

Pages 1–114: Summary of the Review of the Book's Contents

Thethi-Angika: Pages 1–114: Summary of the Review of the Book's Contents

Maithili — No. · Pages · Section/genre · Contents of the original book · Examination/question · Conclusion

Thethi-Angika — No. · Pages · Section/genre · Contents of the original book · Examination/question · Conclusion

Maithili — 1. Pages 1–4 — Cover and publication. Original content: title, author, first edition (2022), and publisher. Examination: the 2022 Bharatavani entry independently confirms Amarendra as author, Hindi/Angika as the language, and Samiksha Prakashan as publisher. Conclusion: the publication particulars are corroborated.

Thethi-Angika — 1. Pages 1–4 — Cover and publication. Original content: title, author, first edition (2022), and publisher. Examination: the 2022 Bharatavani entry independently confirms Amarendra as author, Hindi/Angika as the language, and Samiksha Prakashan as publisher. Conclusion: the publication particulars are corroborated.

Maithili — 2. Pages 5–6 — Dedication and personal statement. Original content: a revised and combined form of previously published or edited essays; possible shortcomings are acknowledged. Examination: compilation enlarges the body of material but also introduces repetition. Conclusion: the method of composition is both a strength and a limitation.

Thethi-Angika — 2. Pages 5–6 — Dedication and personal statement. Original content: a revised and combined form of previously published or edited essays; possible shortcomings are acknowledged. Examination: compilation enlarges the body of material but also introduces repetition. Conclusion: the method of composition is both a strength and a limitation.

Maithili — 3. Page 7 — Table of contents. Original content: two parts—children's folklore, pages 8–42, and modern children's literature, pages 43–112. Examination: a developmental line is drawn from oral tradition to modern printed literature. Conclusion: cultural genealogy is the book's fundamental structure.

Thethi-Angika — 3. Page 7 — Table of contents. Original content: two parts—children's folklore, pages 8–42, and modern children's literature, pages 43–112. Examination: a developmental line is drawn from oral tradition to modern printed literature. Conclusion: cultural genealogy is the book's fundamental structure.

Maithili — 4. Pages 8–9 — The child's mind and lullabies. Original content: imagination, reasoning, insistence, play, pictures, and music; direct moral instruction is secondary. Examination: a comparative dialogue with the child-centred approaches of Ewers and Reynolds is possible. Conclusion: the child's mind is the central criterion of the book.

Thethi-Angika — 4. Pages 8–9 — The child's mind and lullabies. Original content: imagination, reasoning, insistence, play, pictures, and music; direct moral instruction is secondary. Examination: a comparative dialogue with the child-centred approaches of Ewers and Reynolds is possible. Conclusion: the child's mind is the central criterion of the book.

Maithili — 5. Pages 10–11 — Riddles. Original content: from single-line to four-line riddles; intellectual play extending to adolescence. Examination: the classification is rich, but close textual criticism is limited. Conclusion: a meeting of linguistic skill, memory, and play.

Thethi-Angika — 5. Pages 10–11 — Riddles. Original content: from single-line to four-line riddles; intellectual play extending to adolescence. Examination: the classification is rich, but close textual criticism is limited. Conclusion: a meeting of linguistic skill, memory, and play.

Maithili — 6. Pages 12–14 — Tuktak and verse for infants. Original content: sound, rhyme, and pleasure in articulation take precedence over meaning. Examination: Kavita Kosh and Angika.com separately record the existence of "Tuktak-Muktak." Conclusion: sound itself is a primary element of children's aesthetic experience.

Thethi-Angika — 6. Pages 12–14 — Tuktak and verse for infants. Original content: sound, rhyme, and pleasure in articulation take precedence over meaning. Examination: Kavita Kosh and Angika.com separately record the existence of "Tuktak-Muktak." Conclusion: sound itself is a primary element of children's aesthetic experience.

Maithili — 7. Pages 15–24 — Play-songs. Original content: optional, competitive, and intellectual play-songs, performed collectively. Examination: the words are preserved, but accompanying information on melodies, bodily movement, and rules of play is scarce. Conclusion: audiovisual documentation is needed for the future.

Thethi-Angika — 7. Pages 15–24 — Play-songs. Original content: optional, competitive, and intellectual play-songs, performed collectively. Examination: the words are preserved, but accompanying information on melodies, bodily movement, and rules of play is scarce. Conclusion: audiovisual documentation is needed for the future.

Maithili — 8. Pages 25–37 — Children's folktales. Original content: oral transmission, changes of form, animals and birds, moral lessons, and marvels. Examination: textual variants matter more than a single fixed original. Conclusion: the book establishes a collection of texts; a narratological study remains future work.

Thethi-Angika — 8. Pages 25–37 — Children's folktales. Original content: oral transmission, changes of form, animals and birds, moral lessons, and marvels. Examination: textual variants matter more than a single fixed original. Conclusion: the book establishes a collection of texts; a narratological study remains future work.

Maithili — 9. Pages 38–42 — Folktales across languages. Original content: translations and adaptations from other Indian languages, including environmental themes. Examination: translation expands the language's reach, but comparisons between source and target texts are few. Conclusion: translation is a process that extends the literary field.

Thethi-Angika — 9. Pages 38–42 — Folktales across languages. Original content: translations and adaptations from other Indian languages, including environmental themes. Examination: translation expands the language's reach, but comparisons between source and target texts are few. Conclusion: translation is a process that extends the literary field.

Maithili — 10. Page 43 — Introduction to the modern section. Original content: the roots of the finest modern children's literature lie in the form, aesthetic relish, and movement of folk traditions. Examination: a comparative affinity with Reynolds's account of the transition from oral to written literature. Conclusion: folklore and modernity form a continuity through transformation.

Thethi-Angika — 10. Page 43 — Introduction to the modern section. Original content: the roots of the finest modern children's literature lie in the form, aesthetic relish, and movement of folk traditions. Examination: a comparative affinity with Reynolds's account of the transition from oral to written literature. Conclusion: folklore and modernity form a continuity through transformation.

Maithili — 11. Pages 44–50 — Translated children's stories. Original content: discussion of narrative traditions including Sanskrit, the Jātaka tales, and the Bible. Examination: the historical list is rich; comparative analysis of translation remains necessary. Conclusion: translation played an important role in the making of modern written prose for children.

Thethi-Angika — 11. Pages 44–50 — Translated children's stories. Original content: discussion of narrative traditions including Sanskrit, the Jātaka tales, and the Bible. Examination: the historical list is rich; comparative analysis of translation remains necessary. Conclusion: translation played an important role in the making of modern written prose for children.

Maithili — 12. Pages 51–60 — The children's novel. Original content: "Baṇṭā"; school, family, and social and environmental experiences. Examination: an Angika text of "Baṇṭā" is available digitally on Gadya Kosh. Conclusion: the novel opens up the child's wider social world.

Thethi-Angika — 12. Pages 51–60 — The children's novel. Original content: "Baṇṭā"; school, family, and social and environmental experiences. Examination: an Angika text of "Baṇṭā" is available digitally on Gadya Kosh. Conclusion: the novel opens up the child's wider social world.

Maithili — 13. Pages 61–70 — Modern children's songs. Original content: play-songs, rhyme and rhythm, numerous poets and collections. Examination: Angika.com corroborates five collections by Amarendra and the presence of other poets. Conclusion: children's poetry is the most highly developed field.

Thethi-Angika — 13. Pages 61–70 — Modern children's songs. Original content: play-songs, rhyme and rhythm, numerous poets and collections. Examination: Angika.com corroborates five collections by Amarendra and the presence of other poets. Conclusion: children's poetry is the most highly developed field.

Maithili — 14. Pages 71–80 — Nature, society, and nation. Original content: nature, seasons, living creatures, sociality, national consciousness, and knowledge. Examination: modern thematic expansion is evident. Conclusion: folk imagery combines with modern subjects.

Thethi-Angika — 14. Pages 71–80 — Nature, society, and nation. Original content: nature, seasons, living creatures, sociality, national consciousness, and knowledge. Examination: modern thematic expansion is evident. Conclusion: folk imagery combines with modern subjects.

Maithili — 15. Pages 81–91 — Environment and the long poem. Original content: environmental education, personality, knowledge, ethics, and the long poem. Examination: there is tension between the initial criterion opposing overt instruction and the later praise of educational writing. Conclusion: pleasure versus instruction is a central critical question.

Thethi-Angika — 15. Pages 81–91 — Environment and the long poem. Original content: environmental education, personality, knowledge, ethics, and the long poem. Examination: there is tension between the initial criterion opposing overt instruction and the later praise of educational writing. Conclusion: pleasure versus instruction is a central critical question.

Maithili — 16. Pages 92–93 — "Panchamrit" and the children's ghazal. Original content: five forms of children's verse; the children's ghazal; Amarendra and Dinesh Baba. Examination: experiments in genre require distinct formal criteria. Conclusion: the adaptation of mature literary genres for children.

Thethi-Angika — 16. Pages 92–93 — "Panchamrit" and the children's ghazal. Original content: five forms of children's verse; the children's ghazal; Amarendra and Dinesh Baba. Examination: experiments in genre require distinct formal criteria. Conclusion: the adaptation of mature literary genres for children.

Maithili — 17. Pages 94–97 — Children's stories. Original content: relatively less development than poetry, a variety of stories, and explicit acknowledgement of scarcity. Examination: the author's self-criticism increases the credibility of the history. Conclusion: children's stories remain a field under construction.

Thethi-Angika — 17. Pages 94–97 — Children's stories. Original content: relatively less development than poetry, a variety of stories, and explicit acknowledgement of scarcity. Examination: the author's self-criticism increases the credibility of the history. Conclusion: children's stories remain a field under construction.

Maithili — 18. Pages 98–105 — Children's drama and "Panchagavya." Original content: one-act plays, social problems, science, girls' education, character, dialogue, and satire. Examination: renewed reading shows drama to be comparatively extensive. Conclusion: children's drama merits a major section in a new edition.

Thethi-Angika — 18. Pages 98–105 — Children's drama and "Panchagavya." Original content: one-act plays, social problems, science, girls' education, character, dialogue, and satire. Examination: renewed reading shows drama to be comparatively extensive. Conclusion: children's drama merits a major section in a new edition.

Maithili — 19. Pages 106–109 — "Nibhuhān" and other plays. Original content: noise pollution, environment, education, health, radio and musical drama; other children's literature appears on page 109. Examination: modern public life becomes the subject matter of drama. Conclusion: a meeting of social knowledge and theatricality.

Thethi-Angika — 19. Pages 106–109 — "Nibhuhān" and other plays. Original content: noise pollution, environment, education, health, radio and musical drama; other children's literature appears on page 109. Examination: modern public life becomes the subject matter of drama. Conclusion: a meeting of social knowledge and theatricality.

Maithili — 20. Pages 110–111 — Essays, history, and biography. Original content: prose suitable for children on cities, eminent figures, the independence struggle, the Buddha, and other subjects. Examination: factual accuracy, language, illustration, and curiosity call for distinct criteria in informational literature. Conclusion: the field of children's literature extends into cultural knowledge.

Thethi-Angika — 20. Pages 110–111 — Essays, history, and biography. Original content: prose suitable for children on cities, eminent figures, the independence struggle, the Buddha, and other subjects. Examination: factual accuracy, language, illustration, and curiosity call for distinct criteria in informational literature. Conclusion: the field of children's literature extends into cultural knowledge.

Maithili — 21. Pages 112–114 — References and periodicals. Original content: approximately fifty-two numbered sources and ten periodicals. Examination: the archival mapping is useful, but bibliographic details are inconsistent. Conclusion: a standardised bibliography and index are priority improvements for the future.

Thethi-Angika — 21. Pages 112–114 — References and periodicals. Original content: approximately fifty-two numbered sources and ten periodicals. Examination: the archival mapping is useful, but bibliographic details are inconsistent. Conclusion: a standardised bibliography and index are priority improvements for the future.

Maithili — 22. The whole book — The author as creative writer. Original content: the author is himself a prominent poet, playwright, and novelist, with an extensive body of work. Examination: Bharatavani also carries Shweta Rani's 2021 study and a bibliography of children's songs. Conclusion: inside knowledge is valuable, but the balance of selection needs examination through independent research.

Thethi-Angika — 22. The whole book — The author as creative writer. Original content: the author is himself a prominent poet, playwright, and novelist, with an extensive body of work. Examination: Bharatavani also carries Shweta Rani's 2021 study and a bibliography of children's songs. Conclusion: inside knowledge is valuable, but the balance of selection needs examination through independent research.

Maithili — 23. The whole book — Language and style. Original content: the creative material is in Angika, while critical exposition is mostly in Hindi. Examination: accessibility increases, but the autonomy of Angika as a language of criticism becomes a question. Conclusion: the language is straightforward and rich in sources, but the quality of close reading is uneven.

Thethi-Angika — 23. The whole book — Language and style. Original content: the creative material is in Angika, while critical exposition is mostly in Hindi. Examination: accessibility increases, but the autonomy of Angika as a language of criticism becomes a question. Conclusion: the language is straightforward and rich in sources, but the quality of close reading is uneven.

Maithili — 24. The whole book — Overall value. Original content: folk memory, enlargement of genres, and source lists. Examination: supporting sources adequately substantiate the main conclusion. Conclusion: this is not a definitive history but a foundational reference work.

Thethi-Angika — 24. The whole book — Overall value. Original content: folk memory, enlargement of genres, and source lists. Examination: supporting sources adequately substantiate the main conclusion.

Conclusion: this is not a definitive history but a foundational reference work.

2. The Book's Method of Composition: The Strength of Collected Experience and Its Structural Limits

Thethi-Angika: 2. The Book's Method of Composition: The Strength of Collected Experience and Its Structural Limits

Maithili — In his personal statement, the author makes clear that this book was not originally conceived and written as a single, continuous work under one plan. Essays written at different times for edited encyclopaedias and volumes concerned with children's literature and lullabies, previously published material on the Angika language and folklore, and new information added later were revised and brought together to give the book its present form. The author himself acknowledges the possibility of shortcomings. (Original book, p. 6)

Thethi-Angika — In his personal statement, the author makes clear that this book was not originally conceived and written as a single, continuous work under one plan. Essays written at different times for edited encyclopaedias and volumes concerned with children's literature and lullabies, previously published material on the Angika language and folklore, and new information added later were revised and brought together to give the book its present form. The author himself acknowledges the possibility of shortcomings. (Original book, p. 6)

Maithili — This method of composition has two contrasting consequences. First, material accumulated through years of study, collecting, memory, a personal library, and journals and magazines has been gathered in one place. For the literary history of a smaller language community, this is exceptionally valuable, since many sources are scattered across publications that have had little circulation. Second, because the independent essays retain their original structures, the book displays repetition, a predominance of lists, digressions, uneven development, and differences in the depth of criticism.

Thethi-Angika — This method of composition has two contrasting consequences. First, material accumulated through years of study, collecting, memory, a personal library, and journals and magazines has been gathered in one place. For the literary history of a smaller language community, this is exceptionally valuable, since many sources are scattered across publications that have had little circulation. Second, because the independent essays retain their original structures, the book displays repetition, a predominance of lists, digressions, uneven development, and differences in the depth of criticism.

Maithili — For this reason, it is appropriate to understand the book not merely as a "linear history" but as a composite of a literary archive, a collection of critical essays, and a survey organised by genre. A revised edition that added conclusions at the ends of chapters, a chronology, an index of authors, genre-wise tables, and editorial treatment of repetition would greatly increase the usefulness of this resource. Both its strength as a compilation and its structural unevenness arise from the history of its making. The principal cause of that unevenness is not the author's lack of knowledge of the subject, but the bringing together of material prepared at different times.

Thethi-Angika — For this reason, it is appropriate to understand the book not merely as a "linear history" but as a composite of a literary archive, a collection of critical essays, and a survey organised by genre. A revised edition that added conclusions at the ends of chapters, a chronology, an index of authors, genre-wise tables, and editorial treatment of repetition would greatly increase the usefulness of this resource. Both its strength as a compilation and its structural unevenness arise from the history of its making. The principal cause of that unevenness is not the author's lack of knowledge of the subject, but the bringing together of material prepared at different times.

Structure

Thethi-Angika: Structure

Maithili — The material as a whole is divided into two chapters. The first, "Angika Children's Folklore," studies the oral tradition; the second, "Modern Angika Children's Literature," studies the cultivated or written tradition. This division itself gives structural form to the author's central proposition: whatever is best in modern children's literature owes its quality to having been established on the ground of folk literature.

Thethi-Angika — The material as a whole is divided into two chapters. The first, "Angika Children's Folklore," studies the oral tradition; the second, "Modern Angika Children's Literature," studies the cultivated or written tradition. This division itself gives structural form to the author's central proposition: whatever is best in modern children's literature owes its quality to having been established on the ground of folk literature.

The Author: Dr Amarendra's Literary Career and Contribution

Thethi-Angika: The Author: Dr Amarendra's Literary Career and Contribution

Maithili — Dr Amarendra is a versatile writer in Angika and Hindi who is credited with helping to confer literary distinction upon Angika. Born on 5 January 1949 in the village of Rupsar in Banka district, Dr Amarendra has, through his literary practice, established standards in the fields of the epic, the shorter epic, children's literature, and criticism.

Thethi-Angika — Dr Amarendra is a versatile writer in Angika and Hindi who is credited with helping to confer literary distinction upon Angika. Born on 5 January 1949 in the village of Rupsar in Banka district, Dr Amarendra has, through his literary practice, established standards in the fields of the epic, the shorter epic, children's literature, and criticism.

Biographical Details and Literary Contribution

Thethi-Angika: Biographical Details and Literary Contribution

Maithili — Full name: Dr Amarendra Kumar Sinha

Thethi-Angika — Full name: Dr Amarendra Kumar Sinha

Maithili — Date and place of birth: 5 January 1949; Rupsar village, Banka, Bihar

Thethi-Angika — Date and place of birth: 5 January 1949; Rupsar village, Banka, Bihar

Maithili — Parents: the late Pancha Rani Sinha and the late Narsingh Prasad Sinha

Thethi-Angika — Parents: the late Pancha Rani Sinha and the late Narsingh Prasad Sinha

Maithili — Major Angika writings (children's literature): Dhol Bajai Chhai Dhammak Dham; Butru Ke Tutru; Ek Chhari Par Anda Nachai; Bajai Been Bajavai Teen; and Banta (novel).

Thethi-Angika — Major Angika writings (children's literature): Dhol Bajai Chhai Dhammak Dham; Butru Ke Tutru; Ek Chhari Par Anda Nachai; Bajai Been Bajavai Teen; and Banta (novel).

Maithili — Major Angika writings (other genres): Panchagavya (epic); Angadev; Jatayu; Karna (epic); and Rishyashringa.

Thethi-Angika — Major Angika writings (other genres): Panchagavya (epic); Angadev; Jatayu; Karna (epic); and Rishyashringa.

Maithili — Major honours and awards: the Bhavpritanand Award, Rashtrabhasha Award, Nand Award, Karna Award, and Sachchidanand Dhumketu Award.

Thethi-Angika — Major honours and awards: the Bhavpritanand Award, Rashtrabhasha Award, Nand Award, Karna Award, and Sachchidanand Dhumketu Award.

Maithili — Dr Amarendra's Angika Bal-Sahitya is divided into two principal parts: "Angika Children's Folklore" and "Modern Angika Children's Literature." It is essentially an expansion of an essay written for the Bharatiya Bal-Sahitya Kosh (Encyclopaedia of Indian Children's Literature), informed by the serious intention of preserving material that had been omitted or remained unpublished.

Thethi-Angika — Dr Amarendra's Angika Bal-Sahitya is divided into two principal parts: "Angika Children's Folklore" and "Modern Angika Children's Literature." It is essentially an expansion of an essay written for the Bharatiya Bal-Sahitya Kosh (Encyclopaedia of Indian Children's Literature), informed by the serious intention of preserving material that had been omitted or remained unpublished.

3. An Aesthetics of the Child's Mind: The Book's Central Proposition

Thethi-Angika: 3. An Aesthetics of the Child's Mind: The Book's Central Proposition

Maithili — On page 8 the author offers a criterion for children's literature that provides the key to evaluating the entire book. Whether a work has been composed by a child or by an adult for children, the expression of a child's mind must come first. A child's way of looking at objects, thinking, imagination, reasoning, stubbornness, manner of getting demands met, and attraction to pictures and music are treated as elements that determine literary form. The author places direct instruction or the delivery of a message in a secondary position: if there is a message, it should emerge through suggestion, implication, narrative, play, or aesthetic relish (rasa). (Original book, pp. 8–9)

Thethi-Angika — On page 8 the author offers a criterion for children's literature that provides the key to evaluating the entire book. Whether a work has been composed by a child or by an adult for children, the expression of a child's mind must come first. A child's way of looking at objects, thinking, imagination, reasoning, stubbornness, manner of getting demands met, and attraction to pictures and music are treated as elements that determine literary form. The author places direct instruction or the delivery of a message in a secondary position: if there is a message, it should emerge through suggestion, implication, narrative, play, or aesthetic relish (rasa). (Original book, pp. 8–9)

Maithili — This position is particularly important because children's literature is often regarded as an easy vehicle for moral instruction. In opposition to that tendency, Dr Amarendra grants literary autonomy to the child's world of experience. In his studies of literature's suitability for children, Hans-Heino Ewers asks how literature comes to correspond to children's needs, desires, and values. Compared with that broader conception, the child-centred criterion advanced in Angika Bal-Sahitya can be understood as a local, intuitive, and practical counterpart.

Thethi-Angika — This position is particularly important because children's literature is often regarded as an easy vehicle for moral instruction. In opposition to that tendency, Dr Amarendra grants literary autonomy to the child's world of experience. In his studies of literature's suitability for children, Hans-Heino Ewers asks how literature comes to correspond to children's needs, desires, and values. Compared with that broader conception, the child-centred criterion advanced in Angika Bal-Sahitya can be understood as a local, intuitive, and practical counterpart.

Maithili — Yet an intriguing tension also lies within this principle. In the later portions of the book, literature devoted to moral education, environmental education, national consciousness, biography, health, and the rejection of superstition receives considerable praise. Direct instruction is therefore subordinated at the outset, but didactic qualities become important again in the writing of literary history. This is no ordinary contradiction; it is a historical duality within children's literature: pleasure and the inculcation of values, play and education, the autonomous perspective of the child and the expectations of society. The book's fundamental aesthetics is seen at its best when an educational subject is absorbed into children's actions, dialogue, rhythm, humour, imagination, or narrative tension.

Thethi-Angika — Yet an intriguing tension also lies within this principle. In the later portions of the book, literature devoted to moral education, environmental education, national consciousness, biography, health, and the rejection of superstition receives considerable praise. Direct instruction is therefore subordinated at the outset, but didactic qualities become important again in the writing of literary history. This is no ordinary contradiction; it is a historical duality within children's literature: pleasure and the inculcation of values, play and education, the autonomous perspective of the child and the expectations of society. The book's fundamental aesthetics is seen at its best when an educational subject is absorbed into children's actions, dialogue, rhythm, humour, imagination, or narrative tension.

4. Children's Folklore: The Groundwork and a Living Archive

Thethi-Angika: 4. Children's Folklore: The Groundwork and a Living Archive

Maithili — The first part opens out the extensive world of Angika children's folklore. Here literature inhabits not the pages of a book but the activities of life. Lullabies sung while putting a child to sleep, verses sung during oil massage or mealtimes, rhymes spoken during play, competitive group songs, riddles, humour, animals and birds, and folktales all become part of literature. The author does not leave this material in the vague category of "folk culture"; rather, he attempts to identify its subforms according to age, purpose, rhythm, type of game, and narrative character.

Thethi-Angika — The first part opens out the extensive world of Angika children's folklore. Here literature inhabits not the pages of a book but the activities of life. Lullabies sung while putting a child to sleep, verses sung during oil massage or mealtimes, rhymes spoken during play, competitive group songs, riddles, humour, animals and birds, and folktales all become part of literature. The author does not leave this material in the vague category of "folk culture"; rather, he attempts to identify its subforms according to age, purpose, rhythm, type of game, and narrative character.

Maithili — The first significance of this part lies in documentation. Oral material depends for its existence upon memory and living performance; as generations change, the words, tunes, occasions, and rules of games may change as well. Drawing upon available collections, studies, and printed sources, the author constructs a textual archive. An independent literary survey on Angika.com likewise describes the variety and abundance of Angika children's folk verse, observes that much of it survives in oral memory, and regards the collecting work of Naresh Pandey Chakor and Chandraprakash Jagpriya as important. This external evidence supports the archival role of the book.

Thethi-Angika — The first significance of this part lies in documentation. Oral material depends for its existence upon memory and living performance; as generations change, the words, tunes, occasions, and rules of games may change as well. Drawing upon available collections, studies, and printed sources, the author constructs a textual archive. An independent literary survey on Angika.com likewise describes the variety and abundance of Angika children's folk verse, observes that much of it survives in oral memory, and regards the collecting work of Naresh Pandey Chakor and Chandraprakash Jagpriya as important. This external evidence supports the archival role of the book.

Maithili — Its second significance is that folklore is not merely "raw material" for modern literature. The rhythms and melodies of lullabies, the intellectual play of riddles, the pleasure in sound afforded by nonsense rhymes, the collective performance of play-songs, and the changing narrative lives of folktales constitute complete aesthetic systems in their own right. Nevertheless, the structure of the book sometimes risks turning folk tradition into no more than a prelude to modern written literature. A critical reading should also recognise the autonomy of folklore.

Thethi-Angika — Its second significance is that folklore is not merely "raw material" for modern literature. The rhythms and melodies of lullabies, the intellectual play of riddles, the pleasure in sound afforded by nonsense rhymes, the collective performance of play-songs, and the changing narrative lives of folktales constitute complete aesthetic systems in their own right. Nevertheless, the structure of the book sometimes risks turning folk tradition into no more than a prelude to modern written literature. A critical reading should also recognise the autonomy of folklore.

Maithili — The inherent limitations of preservation in writing deserve attention as well. Writing down the words of a play-song does not preserve its melody, beat, bodily movements, rules of play, participation across age groups, season, location, or circumstances of performance. The next phase of research should document an audiovisual folk archive, identifying singers and storytellers, locations, dates, occasions, and variant texts. From this perspective the book is not a completed project, but an initial map for a field archive.

Thethi-Angika — The inherent limitations of preservation in writing deserve attention as well. Writing down the words of a play-song does not preserve its melody, beat, bodily movements, rules of play, participation across age groups, season, location, or circumstances of performance. The next phase of research should document an audiovisual folk archive, identifying singers and storytellers, locations, dates, occasions, and variant texts. From this perspective the book is not a completed project, but an initial map for a field archive.

Textual Survey: Chapter One — Exploring Folk Origins

Thethi-Angika: Textual Survey: Chapter One — Exploring Folk Origins

Maithili — The greatest strength of the first chapter is its authentic primary material. The author arranges lullabies and children's songs by the occasions of life with which they are associated, from infancy to adolescence: first steps, oil massage, eating and drinking, and being put to sleep. As an illustration, this simple and beautiful song accompanying an oil massage is quoted from Ang-Dhulika:

Thethi-Angika — The greatest strength of the first chapter is its authentic primary material. The author arranges lullabies and children's songs by the occasions of life with which they are associated, from infancy to adolescence: first steps, oil massage, eating and drinking, and being put to sleep. As an illustration, this simple and beautiful song accompanying an oil massage is quoted from Ang-Dhulika:

> Maithili — "Give oil, ṭaḍuvā; grow, little Nūnū!"

Thethi-Angika — “Give oil, ṭaḍuvā; grow, little Nūnū!”

Maithili — “Let the oilman apply the oil; let little Nūnū grow plump.”

Thethi-Angika — “Let the oilman apply the oil; let little Nūnū grow plump.”

Maithili — “The oil goes chap-chap; may Nūnū grow lap-lap.”

Thethi-Angika — “The oil goes chap-chap; may Nūnū grow lap-lap.”

Maithili — (Ang-Dhulika, p. 8)

Thethi-Angika — (Ang-Dhulika, p. 8)

Maithili — In verses of this kind, the author rightly demonstrates that the life of children’s literature lies not in denotative meaning (abhidhā) but in the suggestive force (vyañjanā) of sound and rhythm: the message emerges through suggestion, not direct statement. This perspective develops further in the discussion of nonsense verse, where the author shows that the apparently meaningless combinations of words in infants’ songs acquire significance through their sound patterns and musical predominance.

Thethi-Angika — In verses of this kind, the author rightly demonstrates that the life of children’s literature lies not in denotative meaning (abhidhā) but in the suggestive force (vyañjanā) of sound and rhythm: the message emerges through suggestion, not direct statement. This perspective develops further in the discussion of nonsense verse, where the author shows that the apparently meaningless combinations of words in infants’ songs acquire significance through their sound patterns and musical predominance.

Part One: A Philosophical and Psychological Examination of Angika Children’s Folklore

Thethi-Angika: Part One: A Philosophical and Psychological Examination of Angika Children’s Folklore

Maithili — The folklore of any language is both its unwritten history and a direct mirror of folk psychology. In the first chapter of his book, Dr Amarendra explains what he regards as the psychological and scientific foundations of children’s folklore. He argues that, from a scientific perspective, the infant has already been in a state of sleep accompanied by a particular kind of music while in the womb; a mother’s lullaby, he suggests, echoes that music.

Thethi-Angika — The folklore of any language is both its unwritten history and a direct mirror of folk psychology. In the first chapter of his book, Dr Amarendra explains what he regards as the psychological and scientific foundations of children's folklore. He argues that, from a scientific perspective, the infant has already been in a state of sleep accompanied by a particular kind of music while in the womb; a mother's lullaby, he suggests, echoes that music.

5. Lullabies, Infant Verse, and the Maternal Voice: Literature's First Threshold

Thethi-Angika: 5. Lullabies, Infant Verse, and the Maternal Voice: Literature's First Threshold

Maithili — The book places the lullaby among the earliest forms of children's literature. Beginning with the relationship among infancy, music, sleep, and the maternal voice, it presents the lullaby as the infant's first literary and musical experience. The crucial critical point is that the lullaby is not simply a text here but a relationship: the joined experience of a mother's voice, an infant's body, rhythm, touch, and sleep.

Thethi-Angika — The book places the lullaby among the earliest forms of children's literature. Beginning with the relationship among infancy, music, sleep, and the maternal voice, it presents the lullaby as the infant's first literary and musical experience. The crucial critical point is that the lullaby is not simply a text here but a relationship: the joined experience of a mother's voice, an infant's body, rhythm, touch, and sleep.

Maithili — Before a child reads a printed book, the child receives sound; before understanding meaning, the child responds to repetition, intonation, and rhythm. Lullabies and nonsense rhymes are therefore not an inferior stage in literary development but foundational forms of linguistic experience. The book's examples make family, food, oil massage, sleep, and everyday actions into the materials of poetry. Children's literature begins not with grand fantasy but with the familiar world of the body.

Thethi-Angika — Before a child reads a printed book, the child receives sound; before understanding meaning, the child responds to repetition, intonation, and rhythm. Lullabies and nonsense rhymes are therefore not an inferior stage in literary development but foundational forms of linguistic experience. The book's examples make family, food, oil massage, sleep, and everyday actions into the materials of poetry. Children's literature begins not with grand fantasy but with the familiar world of the body.

Maithili — Alongside the central place accorded to the maternal voice, a critical question arises: what part do fathers, grandparents, siblings, neighbours, and other caregivers play in traditional child-rearing? Future field studies, by describing the entire domestic and communal network of children's songs, could give the book's mother-centred material a broader social context. In literary terms, the chief quality of a lullaby is not simplicity but its capacity to be heard: patterns of sound, repetition, short lines, familiar words, and rhythm shape language in accordance with an infant's receptivity.

Thethi-Angika — Alongside the central place accorded to the maternal voice, a critical question arises: what part do fathers, grandparents, siblings, neighbours, and other caregivers play in traditional child-rearing? Future field studies, by describing the entire domestic and communal network of children's songs, could give the book's mother-centred material a broader social context. In literary terms, the chief quality of a lullaby is not simplicity but its capacity to be heard: patterns of sound, repetition, short lines, familiar words, and rhythm shape language in accordance with an infant's receptivity.

Lullabies: A Remarkable Meeting of Tenderness, Music, and Sound

Thethi-Angika: Lullabies: A Remarkable Meeting of Tenderness, Music, and Sound

Maithili — The lullaby is one of the oldest forms of children's literature. It is not merely a means of putting children to sleep: it introduces them to a language's elementary rhythms and sounds. Lullabies preserved in Angika folklore contain exceptionally beautiful images of nature, animals and birds, and familial affection. One may consider this verbatim quotation from the book:

Thethi-Angika — The lullaby is one of the oldest forms of children's literature. It is not merely a means of putting children to sleep: it introduces them to a language's elementary rhythms and sounds. Lullabies preserved in Angika folklore contain exceptionally beautiful images of nature, animals and birds, and familial affection. One may consider this verbatim quotation from the book:

> Maithili — "Ghanā Manjūr, Ghanā Manjūr, where have you hidden, Ghanā Manjūr? Through the forest of twenty-two bighas I shall search for you, wherever you hide, Ghanā Manjūr. Hush now, hush; cock-a-doodle-doo! Little Nūnū, I love you. Come, I will sing a song and put you to sleep."

Thethi-Angika — "Ghanā Manjūr, Ghanā Manjūr, where have you hidden, Ghanā Manjūr? Through the forest of twenty-two bighas I shall search for you, wherever you hide, Ghanā Manjūr. Hush now, hush; cock-a-doodle-doo! Little Nūnū, I love you. Come, I will sing a song and put you to sleep."

Maithili — A literary examination of this lullaby reveals the combination of onomatopoeia ("chuppā chup, kukrū-kū") and rhythm ("manjūr," "khojī," "gīt") that immediately draws the infant's attention. Dr Amarendra further explains that the child need not fully understand the words of a lullaby: its melody and music, he argues, exert their influence upon the infant mind. The line about "the forest of twenty-two bighas" uses hyperbole with a natural ease that expands the child's imagination.

Thethi-Angika — A literary examination of this lullaby reveals the combination of onomatopoeia ("chuppā chup, kukrū-kū") and rhythm ("manjūr," "khojī," "gīt") that immediately draws the infant's attention. Dr Amarendra further explains that the child need not fully understand the words of a lullaby: its melody and music, he argues, exert their influence upon the infant mind. The line about "the forest of twenty-two bighas" uses hyperbole with a natural ease that expands the child's imagination.

6. Riddles and Nonsense Rhymes: Sound Before Meaning, Play Before Knowledge

Thethi-Angika: 6. Riddles and Nonsense Rhymes: Sound Before Meaning, Play Before Knowledge

Maithili — The material on pages 10–14 presents riddles and nonsense verse as two distinct but complementary genres for children. A riddle is a concealed game of meaning: the child joins clues together, guesses, laughs at a wrong answer, and tries again. The reference to forms ranging from a single line to four lines shows how a compact linguistic construction can stimulate intellectual activity. The author also suggests a distinction between the capacities of infants and those of adolescents to grasp these forms.

Thethi-Angika — The material on pages 10–14 presents riddles and nonsense verse as two distinct but complementary genres for children. A riddle is a concealed game of meaning: the child joins clues together, guesses, laughs at a wrong answer, and tries again. The reference to forms ranging from a single line to four lines shows how a compact linguistic construction can stimulate intellectual activity. The author also suggests a distinction between the capacities of infants and those of adolescents to grasp these forms.

Maithili — In nonsense verse, meaning need not be fully apparent. Sound, rhyme, wordplay, repetition, and the pleasure of pronunciation come to the foreground. The child treats language not only as a system of signs conveying meaning but also as a toy made of sounds. Apparent meaninglessness is not a flaw here: it is a resource for sonic beauty, memory, and participation.

Thethi-Angika — In nonsense verse, meaning need not be fully apparent. Sound, rhyme, wordplay, repetition, and the pleasure of pronunciation come to the foreground. The child treats language not only as a system of signs conveying meaning but also as a toy made of sounds. Apparent meaninglessness is not a flaw here: it is a resource for sonic beauty, memory, and participation.

Maithili — External literary catalogues corroborate the development of printed literature in this field. Angika.com lists Amarendra's Ek Chhari Par Anda Nachai as a collection of riddles composed with children's psychology in mind, and Tuktak-Muktak as a collection of poems for younger children. Kavita Kosh likewise places Tuktak-Muktak in its children's-poetry/e-book category. The book's limitation is that, although examples abound, there is comparatively little sustained close reading of phonetics, the shaping of memory, humour, or linguistic deviation. Future research could examine rhyme schemes, repetitions of sound, word formation, and children's responses across this corpus.

Thethi-Angika — External literary catalogues corroborate the development of printed literature in this field. Angika.com lists Amarendra's Ek Chhari Par Anda Nachai as a collection of riddles composed with children's psychology in mind, and Tuktak-Muktak as a collection of poems for younger children. Kavita Kosh likewise places Tuktak-Muktak in its children's-poetry/e-book category. The book's limitation is that, although examples abound, there is comparatively little sustained close reading of phonetics, the shaping of memory, humour, or linguistic deviation. Future research could examine rhyme schemes, repetitions of sound, word formation, and children's responses across this corpus.

The Bujhauval Tradition: An In-Depth Examination

Thethi-Angika: The Bujhauval Tradition: An In-Depth Examination

Maithili — The discussion of Angika bujhauval (riddles) is among the most original portions of this book, and it is here that the author's skill in classification emerges especially clearly. He divides riddles into four classes, from one-line to four-line forms, according to the number of lines. This is not merely a numerical division: it conceals a progression in poetics. In a one-line riddle, the entire enigma is compressed into a single image—

Thethi-Angika — The discussion of Angika bujhauval (riddles) is among the most original portions of this book, and it is here that the author's skill in classification emerges especially clearly. He divides riddles into four classes, from one-line to four-line forms, according to the number of lines. This is not merely a numerical division: it conceals a progression in poetics. In a one-line riddle, the entire enigma is compressed into a single image—

Maithili — "It neither bears fruit nor flowers, yet it winds itself around a tree." (Betel vine)

Thethi-Angika — "It neither bears fruit nor flowers, yet it winds itself around a tree." (Betel vine)

Maithili — Here the paradox "no fruit, no flower, yet it winds itself round a tree" teaches the child to define through negation. It is an elementary lesson in indirect expression (anyāpadeśa) and secondary signification (lakṣaṇā). As the number of lines increases, a dramatic element enters the riddle. In a three-line riddle both resemblance and opposition appear—

Thethi-Angika — Here the paradox "no fruit, no flower, yet it winds itself round a tree" teaches the child to define through negation. It is an elementary lesson in indirect expression (anyāpadeśa) and secondary signification (lakṣaṇā). As the number of lines increases, a dramatic element enters the riddle. In a three-line riddle both resemblance and opposition appear—

Maithili — "Two companions live together as one;

Thethi-Angika — "Two companions live together as one;

Maithili — One moves, while the other lies still;

Thethi-Angika — One moves, while the other lies still;

Maithili — Yet the two never part." (The two grinding stones of a mill)

Thethi-Angika — Yet the two never part." (The two grinding stones of a mill)

Maithili — In the four-line form, the riddle becomes a soliloquy in which the object to be guessed speaks for itself—

Thethi-Angika — In the four-line form, the riddle becomes a soliloquy in which the object to be guessed speaks for itself—

Maithili — "When I was a tender maiden,

Thethi-Angika — "When I was a tender maiden,

Maithili — I suffered blows all the while;

Thethi-Angika — I suffered blows all the while;

Maithili — Now I wear a red skirt,

Thethi-Angika — Now I wear a red skirt,

Maithili — I will bear no more blows." (Earthen pot)

Thethi-Angika — I will bear no more blows." (Earthen pot)

Maithili — Here an earthen pot recounts its own life in the first person: from a tender maiden to an object baked in fire and clothed in a red skirt. This is the most refined form of the riddle, rising to the level of autobiography and metaphor. Through this progression, the author shows, whether explicitly or not, that Angika riddles are not merely exercises in wit, but a small school of simile, metaphor and indirect expression.

Thethi-Angika — Here an earthen pot recounts its own life in the first person: from a tender maiden to an object baked in fire and clothed in a red skirt. This is the most refined form of the riddle, rising to the level of autobiography and metaphor. Through this progression, the author shows, whether explicitly or not, that Angika riddles are not merely exercises in wit, but a small school of simile, metaphor and indirect expression.

Maithili — The author's sharpest critical intervention occurs where he excludes complicated riddles constructed so that "one scholar may outwit another scholar" from the bounds of children's literature. That judgement supplies a criterion: a riddle's suitability lies not in its form but in its accessibility to a child's understanding. In other words, the author reads riddles not from the standpoint of collecting folklore but from that of child psychology; this is his methodological distinction. Epistemologically, a riddle is a miniature game of knowing: by hiding the object of knowledge (the answer) behind a screen of resemblance, it gives a child practice in recognising connections and regularities (vyāpti). Yet the book's limitation is revealed at this very point. The author classifies riddles but does not examine their internal structure—the grammar of concealment and answer—the occasions on which they are told, or their comparative position alongside Maithili and Bajjika riddles. The classification is complete, but the poetics of the riddle still awaits its writing.

Thethi-Angika — The author's sharpest critical intervention occurs where he excludes complicated riddles constructed so that "one scholar may outwit another scholar" from the bounds of children's literature. That judgement supplies a criterion: a riddle's suitability lies not in its form but in its accessibility to a child's understanding. In other words, the author reads riddles not from the standpoint of collecting folklore but from that of child psychology; this is his methodological distinction.

Epistemologically, a riddle is a miniature game of knowing: by hiding the object of knowledge (the answer) behind a screen of resemblance, it gives a child practice in recognising connections and regularities (vyāpti). Yet the book's limitation is revealed at this very point. The author classifies riddles but does not examine their internal structure—the grammar of concealment and answer—the occasions on which they are told, or their comparative position alongside Maithili and Bajjika riddles. The classification is complete, but the poetics of the riddle still awaits its writing.

Riddles, or Bujhauval, as a Means of Cognitive Development

Thethi-Angika: Riddles, or Bujhauval, as a Means of Cognitive Development

Maithili — As a child approaches adolescence, riddles have held a distinctive place in folk literature as a means of developing logical ability. In children's literature, the riddle is an intellectual exercise. Dr Amarendra classifies Angika riddles into one-line, two-line, three-line and four-line forms. He cites numerous riddles from Aṅgikā Lokokti, Phekṛā Aro Bujhauval, edited by Chandraprakash Jagpriya.

Thethi-Angika — As a child approaches adolescence, riddles have held a distinctive place in folk literature as a means of developing logical ability. In children's literature, the riddle is an intellectual exercise. Dr Amarendra classifies Angika riddles into one-line, two-line, three-line and four-line forms. He cites numerous riddles from Aṅgikā Lokokti, Phekṛā Aro Bujhauval, edited by Chandraprakash Jagpriya.

Classification of Riddles and Quotations

Thethi-Angika: Classification of Riddles and Quotations

Type of riddle · Original Angika riddle (verbatim quotation) · Maithili meaning (solution)

Thethi-Angika: Type of riddle · Original Angika riddle (verbatim quotation) · Maithili meaning (solution)

Maithili — One-line — Original Angika riddle: "It bears no fruit or flower, yet winds itself round a tree." — Meaning/solution in Maithili: betel leaf.

Thethi-Angika — One-line — Original Angika riddle: "It bears no fruit or flower, yet winds itself round a tree." — Meaning/solution in Maithili: betel leaf.

Maithili — One-line — Original Angika riddle: “Neither roots nor leaves: what is it?” — Meaning/solution in Maithili: amarbel, the leafless parasitic creeper (Cuscuta).

Thethi-Angika — One-line — Original Angika riddle: “Neither roots nor leaves: what is it?” — Meaning/solution in Maithili: amarbel, the leafless parasitic creeper (Cuscuta).

Maithili — Two-line — Original Angika riddle: “Needles standing straight on this side / A load borne upon the stalk.” — Meaning/solution in Maithili: a maize plant.

Thethi-Angika — Two-line — Original Angika riddle: “Needles standing straight on this side / A load borne upon the stalk.” — Meaning/solution in Maithili: a maize plant.

Maithili — Three-line — Original Angika riddle: “Two companions live together as one / One moves while the other lies still / Yet they are never parted.” — Meaning/solution in Maithili: the two grinding stones of a hand-mill.

Thethi-Angika — Three-line — Original Angika riddle: “Two companions live together as one / One moves while the other lies still / Yet they are never parted.” — Meaning/solution in Maithili: the two grinding stones of a hand-mill.

Maithili — Four-line — Original Angika riddle: “When I was a tender maiden / I endured blows all the while / Now I have put on a red skirt / I will endure no more blows.” — Meaning/solution in Maithili: a chilli pepper.

Thethi-Angika — Four-line — Original Angika riddle: “When I was a tender maiden / I endured blows all the while / Now I have put on a red skirt / I will endure no more blows.” — Meaning/solution in Maithili: a chilli pepper.

Maithili — A reading of these riddles shows how naturally they employ metaphor and simile. Personifications such as “tender maiden” and “red skirt” make the chilli pepper an object of a child’s curiosity. This is an excellent instance of children’s literature establishing an imaginative identification between nature and human life. The illustrative figure of speech in “needles standing straight” likewise appeals to the child’s mind.

Thethi-Angika — A reading of these riddles shows how naturally they employ metaphor and simile. Personifications such as “tender maiden” and “red skirt” make the chilli pepper an object of a child’s curiosity. This is an excellent instance of children’s literature establishing an imaginative identification between nature and human life. The illustrative figure of speech in “needles standing straight” likewise appeals to the child’s mind.

Tuktak and Poetry for Infants (Nonsense Rhymes)

Thethi-Angika: Tuktak and Poetry for Infants (Nonsense Rhymes)

Maithili — A large part of poetry for very young children is sound-based, or tuktak. Greater stress falls upon the rhythm of sounds than upon literal meaning. Angika children’s literature has an ample stock of what English literature calls “nonsense rhymes.” The author distinguishes pure tuktak from partial tuktak. One excellent instance of the pure form is:

Thethi-Angika — A large part of poetry for very young children is sound-based, or tuktak. Greater stress falls upon the rhythm of sounds than upon literal meaning. Angika children’s literature has an ample stock of what English literature calls “nonsense rhymes.” The author distinguishes pure tuktak from partial tuktak. One excellent instance of the pure form is:

Maithili — “O re re, little Nunu, or batnā; / Mother and father have gone —chichor kaṭnā. / Father the landlord, on the choṛbā; / Mother the landlady, on the ḍolbā. / Flattened rice crackles in the tray; / Curds are stirred on the hanging shelf.”

Thethi-Angika — “O re re, little Nunu, or batnā; / Mother and father have gone—chichor kaṭnā. / Father the landlord, on the choṛbā; / Mother the landlady, on the ḍolbā. / Flattened rice crackles in the tray; / Curds are stirred on the hanging shelf.”

Maithili — Analysing these lines, Dr Amarendra writes that word groups such as “or batnā” and “chichor kaṭnā” have no coherent semantic connection, yet are entirely capable of tickling a child’s imagination. Partial tuktak is a rhyme in which a thread of intelligible meaning continues for a while and then gives way, for no apparent reason, to meaningless expressions. The book offers another striking example:

Thethi-Angika — Analysing these lines, Dr Amarendra writes that word groups such as “or batnā” and “chichor kaṭnā” have no coherent semantic connection, yet are entirely capable of tickling a child’s imagination. Partial tuktak is a rhyme in which a thread of intelligible meaning continues for a while and then gives way, for no apparent reason, to meaningless expressions. The book offers another striking example:

Maithili — “I found a pea and hid it beneath my heel; / All seven sisters-in-law are grinding. / One sister-in-law took offence. For whom? / For the old man. / The old man went to the garden; / A crow pecks at his beard.”

Thethi-Angika — “I found a pea and hid it beneath my heel; / All seven sisters-in-law are grinding. / One sister-in-law took offence. For whom? /

For the old man. / The old man went to the garden; / A crow pecks at his beard."

Maithili — The humour created by "the old man went to the garden" and "a crow pecks at his beard" is very close to the child's world of fantasy. This sort of tuktak particularly delights a child's sensibility.

Thethi-Angika — The humour created by "the old man went to the garden" and "a crow pecks at his beard" is very close to the child's world of fantasy. This sort of tuktak particularly delights a child's sensibility.

7. Play-Songs: Text, Body and Community

Thethi-Angika: 7. Play-Songs: Text, Body and Community

Maithili — The pages devoted to play-songs are among the most vividly alive in the book. Children sing as they play; the song is not an external ornament to the game but part of the action itself. The discussion of optional, competitive and intellectual games, among other forms, shows that engagement with children's literature is not confined to silent reading. Children bring literature to life by speaking, running, counting, choosing, losing and winning, laughing and making rules collectively.

Thethi-Angika — The pages devoted to play-songs are among the most vividly alive in the book. Children sing as they play; the song is not an external ornament to the game but part of the action itself. The discussion of optional, competitive and intellectual games, among other forms, shows that engagement with children's literature is not confined to silent reading. Children bring literature to life by speaking, running, counting, choosing, losing and winning, laughing and making rules collectively.

Maithili — Here the book raises a useful question about performance: where does literature end and play begin? In play-songs, words cannot be separated from bodily movement, group formation, rhythm, place or circumstance. Recording the words alone preserves a text, not the whole performance. For this reason, the book's documentation, invaluable though it is, remains incomplete. That incompleteness is not a personal failure on the author's part but a limitation of the written medium.

Thethi-Angika — Here the book raises a useful question about performance: where does literature end and play begin? In play-songs, words cannot be separated from bodily movement, group formation, rhythm, place or circumstance. Recording the words alone preserves a text, not the whole performance. For this reason, the book's documentation, invaluable though it is, remains incomplete. That incompleteness is not a personal failure on the author's part but a limitation of the written medium.

Maithili — Play-songs are also a medium of social learning. Children learn numbers, sequence, selection, rules, taking turns, competition, cooperation, joking and exchanging roles without a formal classroom. Future research that attends to gender-specific games, age groups, the rural–urban divide, seasons, schools and courtyards could draw a more finely differentiated map of Angika childhood culture. The value of documenting folklore becomes especially clear in the context of play-songs: the author has preserved the material; the task of the next generation of researchers is to preserve its melody, movement, setting and social circumstances.

Thethi-Angika — Play-songs are also a medium of social learning. Children learn numbers, sequence, selection, rules, taking turns, competition, cooperation, joking and exchanging roles without a formal classroom. Future research that attends to gender-specific games, age groups, the rural–urban divide, seasons, schools and courtyards could draw a more finely differentiated map of Angika childhood culture. The value of documenting folklore becomes especially clear in the context of play-songs: the author has preserved the material; the task of the next generation of researchers is to preserve its melody, movement, setting and social circumstances.

Play-Songs as a Medium of Physical, Mental and Social Development

Thethi-Angika: Play-Songs as a Medium of Physical, Mental and Social Development

Maithili — Citing the psychologist Karl Groos, the author divides Angika children's play-songs into categories: songs for games involving movement, songs for games played while seated, songs for jumping and running, and songs for intellectual games.

Thethi-Angika — Citing the psychologist Karl Groos, the author divides Angika children's play-songs into categories: songs for games involving movement, songs for games played while seated, songs for jumping and running, and songs for intellectual games.

Maithili — An example of a song used in an active game in which children tickle one another:

Thethi-Angika — An example of a song used in an active game in which children tickle one another:

Maithili — "Aṭṭhā-paṭṭhā, Nunu has seven sons— / Rājā, Pātā, Sīt and Vasant. / Kuṭvā, give a push; baṛgaṛ, give a push. / Let me drink water; I shall go to the pond. / Little Nunu says: I shall go beneath the arm."

Thethi-Angika — “Aṭṭhā-paṭṭhā, Nunu has seven sons— /Rājā, Pātā, Sīt and Vasant. /Kuṭvā, give a push; baṛgaṛ, give a push. /Let me drink water; I shall go to the pond. /Little Nunu says: I shall go beneath the arm.”

Maithili — This song is direct evidence of the competitive spirit and the sense of participation in a group that develop among children during play. A similar competitive impulse is found in Angika songs for the game of kabaddi:

Thethi-Angika — This song is direct evidence of the competitive spirit and the sense of participation in a group that develop among children during play. A similar competitive impulse is found in Angika songs for the game of kabaddi:

Maithili — “Enemy, get ready; /I shall race at full speed and cross to the other side.”

Thethi-Angika — “Enemy, get ready; /I shall race at full speed and cross to the other side.”

Maithili — Songs of this kind foster sociability in children, a disposition to live and act within a group, and the capacity to accept victory and defeat with equanimity.

Thethi-Angika — Songs of this kind foster sociability in children, a disposition to live and act within a group, and the capacity to accept victory and defeat with equanimity.

8. Children’s Folktales: Oral Transformation, Narrative Pleasure and Moral Teaching

Thethi-Angika: 8. Children’s Folktales: Oral Transformation, Narrative Pleasure and Moral Teaching

Maithili — The discussion of children’s folktales, beginning on page 25, opens up the book’s narrative foundations. The author recognises that oral folktales are mutable: a story may change form from voice to voice, generation to generation and place to place. Animals and birds, princes and princesses, cunning, fear, wonders, moral lessons and humour appear as traditional materials of children’s storytelling.

Thethi-Angika — The discussion of children’s folktales, beginning on page 25, opens up the book’s narrative foundations. The author recognises that oral folktales are mutable: a story may change form from voice to voice, generation to generation and place to place. Animals and birds, princes and princesses, cunning, fear, wonders, moral lessons and humour appear as traditional materials of children’s storytelling.

Maithili — This passage matters because the idea of the author changes within the domain of children's oral literature. Authorship is relatively identifiable in a modern written story; in a folktale, collective retelling is itself an act of creation. The storyteller's role, the occasion of telling and the variants therefore become more important than a search for a single "original text." The book offers considerable material in this direction, although it does not systematically analyse tale types, motifs, plot structure, transformations of character or styles of narration.

Thethi-Angika — This passage matters because the idea of the author changes within the domain of children's oral literature. Authorship is relatively identifiable in a modern written story; in a folktale, collective retelling is itself an act of creation. The storyteller's role, the occasion of telling and the variants therefore become more important than a search for a single "original text." The book offers considerable material in this direction, although it does not systematically analyse tale types, motifs, plot structure, transformations of character or styles of narration.

Maithili — The question of moral instruction returns here. A folktale may suggest practical intelligence, caution, ethical conduct or consequences, but it is not popular merely because it preaches. Suspense, repetition, wit, impossible events, marvels, deceit, reversals and communal storytelling give pleasure. If the author's earlier theory of the child's mind is applied, a good folktale is one in which instruction is absorbed into narrative enjoyment. The present book is primarily a builder of a corpus: it preserves the existence, kinds and sources of a narrative world; detailed narratological criticism remains a task for subsequent research.

Thethi-Angika — The question of moral instruction returns here. A folktale may suggest practical intelligence, caution, ethical conduct or consequences, but it is not popular merely because it preaches. Suspense, repetition, wit, impossible events, marvels, deceit, reversals and communal storytelling give pleasure. If the author's earlier theory of the child's mind is applied, a good folktale is one in which instruction is absorbed into narrative enjoyment. The present book is primarily a builder of a corpus: it preserves the existence, kinds and sources of a narrative world; detailed narratological criticism remains a task for subsequent research.

Children's Folktales: A Mixture of Reality and Imagination

Thethi-Angika: Children's Folktales: A Mixture of Reality and Imagination

Maithili — Any review of children's literature would be incomplete without children's folktales. Dr Amarendra maintains that folktales are, in effect, children's literature because their craft and fantasy satisfy the psychology of the child. The book includes an extended discussion of the history of the Anga region. Referring to Acharya Chatursen and Ramdhari Singh Dinkar, the author recounts the claim that in ancient times people of Anga established settlements or colonies stretching from Champa (Bhagalpur) to Indochina (Vietnam and Cambodia), and that this explains the influence of Angika folktales upon Southeast Asian literature. The text invokes Faxian and Vikramashila University as corroboration of that historical account.

Thethi-Angika — Any review of children's literature would be incomplete without children's folktales. Dr Amarendra maintains that folktales are, in effect, children's literature because their craft and fantasy satisfy the psychology of the child. The book includes an extended discussion of the history of the Anga region. Referring to Acharya Chatursen and Ramdhari Singh Dinkar, the author recounts the claim that in ancient times people of Anga established settlements or colonies stretching from Champa (Bhagalpur) to Indochina (Vietnam and Cambodia), and that this explains the influence of Angika folktales upon Southeast Asian literature. The text invokes Faxian and Vikramashila University as corroboration of that historical account.

Maithili — The book discusses collections of folktales such as Chalau Khissā Ke Gāṽ, edited by Meena Tiwari, and Phuljhāmar by Vanchha Bhatt Anjan. It reproduces a full quotation from the well-known Angika children's folktale "Teṅgṭā":

Thethi-Angika — The book discusses collections of folktales such as Chalau Khissā Ke Gāṽ, edited by Meena Tiwari, and Phuljhāmar by Vanchha Bhatt Anjan. It reproduces a full quotation from the well-known Angika children's folktale "Teṅgṭā":

Maithili — "There was a farmer. One day he bought fish at the market and brought them home. His wife sat down to cook the fish. No sooner had she opened the bundle than a teṅgṭā fish slipped out and hid beneath the grain store. … 'Mother! Mother! From today you are my mother and I am your son. Give me my morning food, and I shall take it to Father.'"

Thethi-Angika — "There was a farmer. One day he bought fish at the market and brought them home. His wife sat down to cook the fish. No sooner had she opened the bundle than a teṅgṭā fish slipped out and hid beneath the grain store. … 'Mother! Mother! From today you are my mother and I am your son. Give me my morning food, and I shall take it to Father.'"

Maithili — A reading of "Teṅgṭā": the tale depicts the relationship between a teṅgṭā (a species of fish) and a farmer. At its heart is the fantasy, familiar to children, of being able to talk with birds, animals and creatures of the water. When the teṅgṭā takes the form of a boy and works for the farmer, uses his quick intelligence—with the help of a mouse, a tiger and fire—to teach the king a lesson, and ultimately makes the farmer happy, the tale conveys to the child that even the smallest creature may possess indomitable courage and ability. It delivers this moral without the burden of overt sermonising.

Thethi-Angika — A reading of "Teṅgṭā": the tale depicts the relationship between a teṅgṭā (a species of fish) and a farmer. At its heart is the fantasy, familiar to children, of being able to talk with birds, animals and creatures of the water. When the teṅgṭā takes the form of a boy and works for the farmer, uses his quick intelligence—with the help of a mouse, a tiger and fire—to teach the king a lesson, and ultimately makes the farmer happy, the tale conveys to the child that even the smallest creature may possess indomitable courage and ability. It delivers this moral without the burden of overt sermonising.

9. Translation: The Expansion of Children's Literature and the Development of Language

Thethi-Angika: 9. Translation: The Expansion of Children's Literature and the Development of Language

Maithili — In its history of modern Angika children's literature, the book assigns a notable place to translation. Beginning on page 44, the author discusses adaptations of stories suitable for children from other languages, the Sanskrit narrative tradition, Jātaka tales and stories associated with the Bible. This material advances an important historical argument: modern written prose for children begins not only with original writing but also with translation and retelling.

Thethi-Angika — In its history of modern Angika children's literature, the book assigns a notable place to translation. Beginning on page 44, the author discusses adaptations of stories suitable for children from other languages, the Sanskrit narrative tradition, Jātaka tales and stories associated with the Bible. This material advances an important historical argument: modern written prose for children begins not only with original writing but also with translation and retelling.

Maithili — For a literature in a language with limited institutional resources, translation is not a secondary activity. It introduces new genres, increases the range of texts available to children, develops the vocabulary of written prose and brings stories from around the world into local linguistic experience. In this sense, the book's chapter on translation is also a history of language development.

Thethi-Angika — For a literature in a language with limited institutional resources, translation is not a secondary activity. It introduces new genres, increases the range of texts available to children, develops the vocabulary of written prose and brings stories from around the world into local linguistic experience. In this sense, the book's chapter on translation is also a history of language development.

Maithili — Yet this section invites more extensive future research. The book largely remains at the level of identifying which stories were translated, who translated them and the traditions from which they came. There is relatively little comparative analysis of the source texts and their Angika target texts. Were plots shortened or expanded for children? Were unfamiliar cultural references adapted to local circumstances? How did names, food, religion, humour, dialogue, rhythm and moral conclusions change? These are questions for the next stage of translation studies.

Thethi-Angika — Yet this section invites more extensive future research. The book largely remains at the level of identifying which stories were translated, who translated them and the traditions from which they came. There is relatively little comparative analysis of the source texts and their Angika target texts. Were plots shortened or expanded for children? Were unfamiliar cultural references adapted to local circumstances? How did names, food, religion, humour, dialogue, rhythm and moral conclusions change? These are questions for the next stage of translation studies.

Maithili — Reynolds discusses the transformation of oral and printed traditions across generations. In this light, a history of the translation of Angika children's literature might be extended beyond journeys between languages to journeys between media—from story to picture book, radio, theatre, audio or digital forms. The original book provides a historical foundation for exploring these possibilities.

Thethi-Angika — Reynolds discusses the transformation of oral and printed traditions across generations. In this light, a history of the translation of Angika children's literature might be extended beyond journeys between languages to journeys between media—from story to picture book, radio, theatre, audio or digital forms. The original book provides a historical foundation for exploring these possibilities.

Textual Survey: Chapter Two — The Modern Tradition

Thethi-Angika: Textual Survey: Chapter Two — The Modern Tradition

Maithili — The second chapter is valuable for its historical depth. The author traces the history of translated children's folktales from an eighteenth-century Christian priest (Father Anto Niocour) and his translations of biblical stories, through Grierson's Linguistic Survey of India, to the writings of Dr Maheshwari Singh Mahesh. Along the way, he discusses the eighteen stories drawn from Sanskrit sources in Angika Kathā-Sarovar (2006) and the contribution of Shri Umesh. In the discussion of original modern poetry for children, he applies thematic classifications—such as poetry depicting nature in motion—and considers poets including Dr Mridula Shukla (Son Chiraiya), Santwana Sah, Dinesh Baba, Aniruddha Prasad Vimal and Chandraprakash Jagpriya.

Thethi-Angika — The second chapter is valuable for its historical depth. The author traces the history of translated children's folktales from an eighteenth-century Christian priest (Father Anto Niocour) and his translations of biblical stories, through Grierson's Linguistic Survey of India, to the writings of Dr Maheshwari Singh Mahesh. Along the way, he discusses the eighteen stories drawn from Sanskrit sources in Angika Kathā-Sarovar (2006) and the contribution of Shri Umesh. In the discussion of original modern poetry for children, he applies thematic classifications—such as poetry depicting nature in motion—and considers poets including Dr Mridula Shukla (Son Chiraiya), Santwana Sah, Dinesh Baba, Aniruddha Prasad Vimal and Chandraprakash Jagpriya.

Translation Criticism: An Extended Examination

Thethi-Angika: Translation Criticism: An Extended Examination

Maithili — The discussion of translation is the book's second original contribution, offering the outline of an entire history of translation. It is worth observing that the earliest available Angika "translation"—the parable of the Prodigal Son recorded in Grierson's survey—was essentially a missionary and colonial specimen of language, not an indigenous literary undertaking. This raises a major question: is translation a form of linguistic documentation or a form of literature? The book's implicit answer is clear: it removes the Angika translation tradition from the linguist's specimen bottle and places it within the living room of children's literature. The cultural significance of this relocation is considerable.

Thethi-Angika — The discussion of translation is the book's second original contribution, offering the outline of an entire history of translation. It is worth observing that the earliest available Angika "translation"—the parable of the Prodigal Son recorded in Grierson's survey—was essentially a missionary and colonial specimen of language, not an indigenous literary undertaking. This raises a major question: is translation a form of linguistic documentation or a form of literature? The book's implicit answer is clear: it removes the Angika translation tradition from the linguist's specimen bottle and places it within the living room of children's literature. The cultural significance of this relocation is considerable.

Maithili — The most revealing part of this chapter is where the author reflects on his own translations of three Urdu novels for children—Jangal Roṅ Pahchān, Shikār Aro Shikārī and Faisal Roṅ Jāsūsī. Here he develops his theory of translation through practice. He is not primarily a source-oriented translator but a target-oriented one: he deliberately modifies cruel scenes in the original so that children will not be frightened; in Shikār Aro Shikārī, he even introduces a new emphasis on environmental protection and changes the characters' names. This is, in effect, creative re-creation (sense translation), whose criterion is not equivalence but purpose—suitability for children. Translation of children's literature thus becomes adaptation by its very nature; the author establishes this proposition through his own practice.

Thethi-Angika — The most revealing part of this chapter is where the author reflects on his own translations of three Urdu novels for children—Jangal Roṅ Pahchān, Shikār Aro Shikārī and Faisal Roṅ Jāsūsī. Here he develops his theory of translation through practice. He is not primarily a source-oriented translator but a target-oriented one: he deliberately modifies cruel scenes in the original so that children will not be frightened; in Shikār Aro Shikārī, he even introduces a new emphasis on environmental protection and changes the characters' names. This is, in effect, creative re-creation (sense translation), whose criterion is not equivalence but purpose—suitability for children. Translation of children's literature thus becomes adaptation by its very nature; the author establishes this proposition through his own practice.

Maithili — The author's most penetrating critical observation here concerns stories in Angika Kathā-Sarovar (including those about Chanakya and the Nanda dynasty, and Panditraj Jagannath): inserting original Sanskrit verses into the middle of a story, he notes, disrupts the ordinary reader's enjoyment of its narrative. This is a finely judged observation. The translator must choose between classical authenticity (retaining the Sanskrit verses) and aesthetic communication (the flow of the narrative); for children and general readers, the weight falls on enjoyment. The author plainly favours the communication of rasa. Even so, critical balance requires recognition of certain limitations. First, because the translator is himself the critic, this discussion sometimes becomes a personal commentary on the process of composition rather than disinterested translation criticism. Second, the book enumerates the benefits of adaptation (protecting children) without weighing its costs: how much of the Jātaka stories' moral severity, or of the fear in folktales that can be educationally meaningful, disappears in adaptation? The question goes unexamined. A complete criticism of translation would weigh both the gains and the losses of adaptation.

Thethi-Angika — The author's most penetrating critical observation here concerns stories in Angika Kathā-Sarovar (including those about Chanakya and the Nanda dynasty, and Panditraj Jagannath): inserting original Sanskrit verses into the middle of a story, he notes, disrupts the ordinary reader's enjoyment of its narrative. This is a finely judged observation. The translator must choose between classical authenticity (retaining the Sanskrit verses) and aesthetic communication (the flow of the narrative); for children and general readers, the weight falls on enjoyment. The author plainly favours the communication of rasa. Even so, critical balance requires recognition of certain limitations. First, because the translator is himself the critic, this discussion sometimes becomes a personal commentary on the process of composition rather than disinterested translation criticism. Second, the book enumerates the benefits of adaptation (protecting children) without weighing its costs: how much of the Jātaka stories' moral severity, or of the fear in folktales that can be educationally meaningful, disappears in adaptation? The question goes unexamined. A complete criticism of translation would weigh both the gains and the losses of adaptation.

Part Two: The Emergence and Development of Modern Angika Children's Literature

Thethi-Angika: Part Two: The Emergence and Development of Modern Angika Children's Literature

Maithili — The book's second part offers a close analysis of the trends of the modern era of Angika children's literature. In the modern period, writers gave children's literature new directions, ranging from translation to original composition.

Thethi-Angika — The book's second part offers a close analysis of the trends of the modern era of Angika children's literature. In the modern period, writers gave children's literature new directions, ranging from translation to original composition.

Translated Literature and the Influence of Globalisation

Thethi-Angika: Translated Literature and the Influence of Globalisation

Maithili — Dr Amarendra explains in his book that the modern journey of Angika children's literature began with translations of stories from foreign and other Indian languages. Notable stages include the Christian missionaries' translations of biblical stories (Mukti Ke Mārg, Sacchā Jīvan Ke Mārg and Yīśu Masīh Ke Kahānī), and, in the modern period, Nandlal Yadav "Saraswat"'s translations of Chinese folktales.

Thethi-Angika — Dr Amarendra explains in his book that the modern journey of Angika children's literature began with translations of stories from foreign and other Indian languages. Notable stages include the Christian missionaries' translations of biblical stories (Mukti Ke Mārg, Sacchā Jīvan Ke Mārg and Yīśu Masīh Ke Kahānī), and, in the modern period, Nandlal Yadav "Saraswat"'s translations of Chinese folktales.

Maithili — The significance of the Angika translation of the Chinese folktale "Bāṛhi Par Henā Ke Kabjā Pelkai Chīn Deś Ke Mahān Yū": the book presents an Angika adaptation of a story associated with China's Yellow River and the devastation caused by flooding. From the perspectives of environmental conservation and water management, this story is particularly important.

Thethi-Angika — The significance of the Angika translation of the Chinese folktale "Bāṛhi Par Henā Ke Kabjā Pelkai Chīn Deś Ke Mahān Yū": the book presents an Angika adaptation of a story associated with China's Yellow River and the devastation caused by flooding. From the perspectives of environmental conservation and water management, this story is particularly important.

Maithili — "They began thinking of ways to stop the flood. They thought that if a dam were built outside the village, the floodwaters might be brought under control."

Thethi-Angika — "They began thinking of ways to stop the flood. They thought that if a dam were built outside the village, the floodwaters might be brought under control."

Maithili — From a critical perspective, for children in the Anga region—which itself suffers from floods of the Kosi and Ganges—this story of flood management in China is not merely fantasy but a lesson in scientific awareness. Presenting global problems (flooding and the environment) in a local language (Angika) through children's literature is a radical step by the translator and the author of this book. In addition, Dr Amarendra himself translated Sanskrit Pañcatantra and Jātaka stories into Angika in his volume Angika Kathā-Sarovar.

Thethi-Angika — From a critical perspective, for children in the Anga region—which itself suffers from floods of the Kosi and Ganges—this story of flood management in China is not merely fantasy but a lesson in scientific awareness. Presenting global problems (flooding and the environment) in a local language (Angika) through children's literature is a radical step by the translator and the author of this book. In addition, Dr Amarendra himself translated Sanskrit Pañcatantra and Jātaka stories into Angika in his volume Angika Kathā-Sarovar.

10. The Children’s Novel: Entry into a Wider Social World

Thethi-Angika: 10. The Children’s Novel: Entry into a Wider Social World

Maithili — The discussion headed “Children’s Novel” on page 51 marks an important expansion of modern children’s prose. Dr Amarendra’s Baṇṭā is examined as an Angika novel for children. According to the book, its narrative offers an extended portrayal of experiences connected with a child’s life, school, teachers, social circumstances and the environment.

Thethi-Angika — The discussion headed “Children’s Novel” on page 51 marks an important expansion of modern children’s prose. Dr Amarendra’s Baṇṭā is examined as an Angika novel for children. According to the book, its narrative offers an extended portrayal of experiences connected with a child’s life, school, teachers, social circumstances and the environment.

Maithili — The novel differs from the children’s short story in more than length. A longer plot allows a child character to develop over time; relationships among family, school, companions, society, moral dilemmas and surroundings emerge progressively. For this reason, the children’s novel also tests the narrative resources of a language. The independent digital text of Baṇṭā available on Gadya Kosh provides useful external corroboration of the work’s existence. An external list of Angika writers also records Baṇṭā as a novel.

Thethi-Angika — The novel differs from the children’s short story in more than length. A longer plot allows a child character to develop over time; relationships among family, school, companions, society, moral dilemmas and surroundings emerge progressively. For this reason, the children’s novel also tests the narrative resources of a language. The independent digital text of Baṇṭā available on Gadya Kosh provides useful external corroboration of the work’s existence. An external list of Angika writers also records Baṇṭā as a novel.

Maithili — The children’s novel receives less extended treatment than the earlier sections. Nevertheless, the material as a whole makes clear that the novel occupies a noteworthy place in the development of modern Angika children’s literature, even if its corpus is small in comparison with poetry. Future research in this genre might examine character development, experiences of schooling, rurality, children’s autonomy, the narrator, linguistic register and readership by age group.

Thethi-Angika — The children’s novel receives less extended treatment than the earlier sections. Nevertheless, the material as a whole makes clear that the novel occupies a noteworthy place in the development of modern Angika children's literature, even if its corpus is small in comparison with poetry. Future research in this genre might examine character development, experiences of schooling, rurality, children's autonomy, the narrator, linguistic register and readership by age group.

The Children's Novel: The Ideological Narrative of Baṇṭā

Thethi-Angika: The Children's Novel: The Ideological Narrative of Baṇṭā

Maithili — The book reviews Baṇṭā (by Dr Amarendra), described here as the only children's novel in the Angika language. It is not a magical or fantastical tale; rather, it concentrates on child psychology, children's indifference towards education, the inhuman conduct of a teacher (Jamuar) and an ideal approach to teaching (represented by the teacher Iqbal).

Thethi-Angika — The book reviews Baṇṭā (by Dr Amarendra), described here as the only children's novel in the Angika language. It is not a magical or fantastical tale; rather, it concentrates on child psychology, children's indifference towards education, the inhuman conduct of a teacher (Jamuar) and an ideal approach to teaching (represented by the teacher Iqbal).

Maithili — The most notable feature of this novel is its presentation of the ten principles of conduct offered to children by India's former President and "Missile Man," Dr A. P. J. Abdul Kalam, as the life philosophy of the child protagonist, Baṇṭā.

Thethi-Angika — The most notable feature of this novel is its presentation of the ten principles of conduct offered to children by India's former President and "Missile Man," Dr A. P. J. Abdul Kalam, as the life philosophy of the child protagonist, Baṇṭā.

Dr A. P. J. Abdul Kalam's Principles of Conduct (quoted from the Angika children's novel Baṇṭā)

Thethi-Angika: Dr A. P. J. Abdul Kalam's Principles of Conduct (quoted from the Angika children's novel Baṇṭā)

Maithili — Original Angika quotation: The first principle is: "I shall devote myself wholeheartedly to my studies and work, and become a great person."

Thethi-Angika — Original Angika quotation: The first principle is: "I shall devote myself wholeheartedly to my studies and work, and become a great person."

Maithili — Original Angika quotation: The second is: “From now on, I shall teach at least ten illiterate people to read and write.”

Thethi-Angika — Original Angika quotation: The second is: “From now on, I shall teach at least ten illiterate people to read and write.”

Maithili — Original Angika quotation: The third principle is: “I shall plant at least ten trees and take good care of them.”

Thethi-Angika — Original Angika quotation: The third principle is: “I shall plant at least ten trees and take good care of them.”

Maithili — Original Angika quotation: The fourth principle is: “I shall go to towns and villages and help at least five people give up addiction and the habit of gambling.”

Thethi-Angika — Original Angika quotation: The fourth principle is: “I shall go to towns and villages and help at least five people give up addiction and the habit of gambling.”

Maithili — Original Angika quotation: The ninth principle is: “I shall behave in a friendly manner towards people with intellectual disabilities and those who are physically weak.”

Thethi-Angika — Original Angika quotation: The ninth principle is: “I shall behave in a friendly manner towards people with intellectual disabilities and those who are physically weak.”

Maithili — Original Angika quotation: The tenth principle is: “I shall take pride in my fellow citizens and in the achievements of my country.”

Thethi-Angika — Original Angika quotation: The tenth principle is: “I shall take pride in my fellow citizens and in the achievements of my country.”

Maithili — Baṇṭā establishes an exemplary standard for children’s literature. Its purpose is not merely entertainment but also character building. Presenting Kalam’s principles through a rural Angika-speaking child reflects Dr Amarendra’s progressive and nationalist outlook. The fluency of the novel’s language and the liveliness of its dialogue can hold a child reader’s attention to the end.

Thethi-Angika — Baṇṭā establishes an exemplary standard for children’s literature. Its purpose is not merely entertainment but also character building. Presenting Kalam’s principles through a rural Angika-speaking child reflects Dr Amarendra’s progressive and nationalist outlook. The fluency of the novel’s language and the liveliness of its dialogue can hold a child reader’s attention to the end.

II. Modern Children's Poetry: The Richest Area of the Book

Thethi-Angika: II. Modern Children's Poetry: The Richest Area of the Book

Maithili — The discussion of modern Angika poetry for children is the most extensive, diverse and assured part of this book. From page 61 onward, it brings into view play-songs, nature, children's personalities, social life, national consciousness, the environment, knowledge, rhyme and rhythm, humour, songs based on stories, ghazals, narrative poems and many other forms. The author does not merely offer a catalogue of works; he also comments on their suitability for children, their verbal music, subject matter and imagination, and occasionally on shortcomings in their composition.

Thethi-Angika — The discussion of modern Angika poetry for children is the most extensive, diverse and assured part of this book. From page 61 onward, it brings into view play-songs, nature, children's personalities, social life, national consciousness, the environment, knowledge, rhyme and rhythm, humour, songs based on stories, ghazals, narrative poems and many other forms. The author does not merely offer a catalogue of works; he also comments on their suitability for children, their verbal music, subject matter and imagination, and occasionally on shortcomings in their composition.

Maithili — Independent literary surveys lend support to this conclusion. Angika.com, noting the abundance of Angika children's folk verse, names five collections of children's songs by Amarendra—Dhol Bajai Chhai Dhammak Dham, Butru Ke Tutru, Bajai Bin Bajavai Tin, Ek Chhari Par Anda Nachai and Tuktak-Muktak. It also discusses Santwana Sah, Dinesh Baba, Dr Mridula Shukla and other poets included in Angika Balgeet. Bharatavani also lists the 2021 volume Dr Amarendra Granthavali (Volume 1): Angika Balgeet Samagra. The author-centred account in the original book thus finds corroboration in independent publication records.

Thethi-Angika — Independent literary surveys lend support to this conclusion. Angika.com, noting the abundance of Angika children's folk verse, names five collections of children's songs by Amarendra—Dhol Bajai Chhai Dhammak Dham, Butru Ke Tutru, Bajai Bin Bajavai Tin, Ek Chhari Par Anda Nachai and Tuktak-Muktak. It also discusses Santwana Sah, Dinesh Baba, Dr Mridula Shukla and other poets included in Angika Balgeet. Bharatavani also lists the 2021 volume Dr Amarendra Granthavali (Volume 1): Angika Balgeet Samagra. The author-centred account in the original book thus finds corroboration in independent publication records.

Maithili — The richness of this poetry is not simply a matter of the number of books published. The book shows that children's songs range from the delight that sound gives a very young child to an adolescent's social understanding, from nature to science, and from play to an imaginative conception of the nation. Through this breadth, children's poetry becomes a laboratory for modern literature in Angika, where folk rhythms, modern subjects, adult literary forms and the child's consciousness are continually brought into relation and tested.

Thethi-Angika — The richness of this poetry is not simply a matter of the number of books published. The book shows that children's songs range from the delight that sound gives a very young child to an adolescent's social understanding, from nature to science, and from play to an imaginative conception of the nation. Through this breadth, children's poetry becomes a laboratory for modern literature in Angika, where folk rhythms, modern subjects, adult literary forms and the child's consciousness are continually brought into relation and tested.

Maithili — Yet the question of critical selection is especially acute here. The author is himself a major creator of modern Angika children's poetry, and consequently his own works naturally occupy considerable space. The advantage lies in the testimony of an insider and proximity to the history of publication; the risk is that the relative standing of other poets may be unevenly represented. Future literary histories would benefit from applying comparable criteria to the whole body of texts.

Thethi-Angika — Yet the question of critical selection is especially acute here. The author is himself a major creator of modern Angika children's poetry, and consequently his own works naturally occupy considerable space. The advantage lies in the testimony of an insider and proximity to the history of publication; the risk is that the relative standing of other poets may be unevenly represented. Future literary histories would benefit from applying comparable criteria to the whole body of texts.

Textual Survey: Thematic Classification of Modern Children's Poetry

Thethi-Angika: Textual Survey: Thematic Classification of Modern Children's Poetry

Maithili — The third pillar of the second chapter is a thematic classification of original modern children's poetry. The author divides Angika children's poems into several groups by subject. Chief among them are: poetry of nature in motion—moving natural phenomena and living creatures, as in "Jaar," "Dinosaur," "Kosi Maiya" and the poems representing animal voices in Dhol Bajai Chhai Dhammak Dham; poetry of the regional environment—the geography of the ancient Anga region, musical instruments and local foods such as the distinctive sweetmeat gatta, in works by Anjani Kumar Suman and others; patriotic children's songs about national figures and festivals, Bharat Mata, the tricolour, Gandhi Baba and Abdul Kalam, including poems by Santwana Sah and Rahul Shivay's Mati Hindustan Ke; poems of knowledge and instruction, including arithmetic and moral teaching—the counting-rhyme "Akkad-Bakkad" in "Lalach Ron Phol" and Sudhir Kumar Programmer's Lur; writing that serves as a workshop in environmental education; and humorous or satirical poetry, including "Piyakkar Mama" and the comic songs of Shambhunath Mistri. From the standpoint of form, he also distinguishes dramatic poetry and narrative songs, such as Dr Abha Purve's "Khayali Pulav."

Thethi-Angika — The third pillar of the second chapter is a thematic classification of original modern children's poetry. The author divides Angika children's poems into several groups by subject. Chief among them are: poetry of nature in motion—moving natural phenomena and living creatures, as in "Jaar," "Dinosaur," "Kosi Maiya" and the poems representing animal voices in Dhol Bajai Chhai Dhammak Dham; poetry of the regional environment—the geography of the ancient Anga region, musical instruments and local foods such as the distinctive sweetmeat gatta, in works by Anjani Kumar Suman and others; patriotic children's songs about national figures and festivals, Bharat Mata, the tricolour, Gandhi Baba and Abdul Kalam, including poems by Santwana Sah and Rahul Shivay's Mati Hindustan Ke; poems of knowledge and instruction, including arithmetic and moral teaching—the counting-rhyme "Akkad-Bakkad" in "Lalach Ron Phol" and Sudhir Kumar Programmer's Lur; writing that serves as a workshop in environmental education; and humorous or satirical poetry, including "Piyakkar Mama" and the comic songs of Shambhunath Mistri. From the standpoint of form, he also distinguishes dramatic poetry and narrative songs, such as Dr Abha Purve's "Khayali Pulav."

Modern Angika Children's Poetry: A New Dawn

Thethi-Angika: Modern Angika Children's Poetry: A New Dawn

Maithili — Collections such as Dr Amarendra's Dhol Bajai Chhai Dhammak Dham, Butru Ke Tutru and Bajai Bin Bajavai Tin mark a point of departure for modern Angika children's poetry. These collections encompass everything from the world of birds and animals to the wonders of science.

Thethi-Angika — Collections such as Dr Amarendra's Dhol Bajai Chhai Dhammak Dham, Butru Ke Tutru and Bajai Bin Bajavai Tin mark a point of departure for modern Angika children's poetry. These collections encompass everything from the world of birds and animals to the wonders of science.

Maithili — The poem "Boli" ("Voices"), in Dhol Bajai Chhai Dhammak Dham, depicts the sounds made by different creatures and introduces children to the sound patterns of the natural world:

Thethi-Angika — The poem "Boli" ("Voices"), in Dhol Bajai Chhai Dhammak Dham, depicts the sounds made by different creatures and introduces children to the sound patterns of the natural world:

Maithili — The owl goes hoo-hoo; the cock gives a crow.
The horse neighs; the saundha goes gar-gar-gar-gar.
The mouse squeaks choo-choo-choo; the dog barks bhoo-bhoo-bhoo.

Thethi-Angika — The owl goes hoo-hoo; the cock gives a crow.
The horse neighs; the saundha goes gar-gar-gar-gar.
The mouse squeaks choo-choo-choo; the dog barks bhoo-bhoo-bhoo.

Maithili — Santwana Sah's Bajai Chhai Bin, Dinesh Baba's Hansi Bihanki Dhup and Dr Mridula Shukla's Son Chiraiya open new dimensions in Angika children's poetry. The invocation of nature in Dr Mridula Shukla's Son Chiraiya deserves attention:

Thethi-Angika — Santwana Sah's Bajai Chhai Bin, Dinesh Baba's Hansi Bihanki Dhup and Dr Mridula Shukla's Son Chiraiya open new dimensions in Angika children's poetry. The invocation of nature in Dr Mridula Shukla's Son Chiraiya deserves attention:

Maithili — The earth lay parched, the fields were hungry;
The river ran dry, its sands turned stony.
Clouds gathered and rolled, pouring down rain;
Every pond and pool filled again.
Golden bird, O golden bird!

Thethi-Angika — The earth lay parched, the fields were hungry;
The river ran dry, its sands turned stony.
Clouds gathered and rolled, pouring down rain;
Every pond and pool filled again.
Golden bird, O golden bird!

Maithili — Sudhir Kumar Programmer presents the marvels of science in a manner accessible to children. His verses on the telescope and the radar run as follows:

Thethi-Angika — Sudhir Kumar Programmer presents the marvels of science in a manner accessible to children. His verses on the telescope and the radar run as follows:

Maithili — Bravo, bravo, telescope!
See the distant scene, a bioscope!
There at the border, facing the foe,
Thunderous cannons let their volleys go.

Thethi-Angika — Bravo, bravo, telescope!
See the distant scene, a bioscope!
There at the border, facing the foe,
Thunderous cannons let their volleys go.

Maithili — These poems demonstrate that Angika children's literature is not confined to the boundaries of village and countryside. It is taking up modern science and subjects such as radar and the telescope. This is an indication of the intellectual maturity of children's literature.

Thethi-Angika — These poems demonstrate that Angika children's literature is not confined to the boundaries of village and countryside. It is taking up modern science and subjects such as radar and the telescope. This is an indication of the intellectual maturity of children's literature.

National Feeling and Love of Country

Thethi-Angika: National Feeling and Love of Country

Maithili — The cultivation of national feeling is an important aspect of children's literature. Rahul Shivay's Mati Hindustan Ke is a collection devoted entirely to patriotic songs for children. It celebrates great figures from India's history—Buddha, Mahavira, Shivaji and Subhas Chandra Bose—as well as Tilka Manjhi, the martyr from the Anga region. The following song on the tricolour is moving:

Thethi-Angika — The cultivation of national feeling is an important aspect of children's literature. Rahul Shivay's Mati Hindustan Ke is a collection devoted entirely to patriotic songs for children. It celebrates great figures from India's history—Buddha, Mahavira, Shivaji and Subhas Chandra Bose—as well as Tilka Manjhi, the martyr from the Anga region. The following song on the tricolour is moving:

Maithili — India's glory is the tricolour; it ripples and flies.
At the top is saffron, the blush of morning skies;
It sings the spring-bright honour of our brave martyrs.

Thethi-Angika — India's glory is the tricolour; it ripples and flies.
At the top is saffron, the blush of morning skies;
It sings the spring-bright honour of our brave martyrs.

Maithili — Poets such as Chandraprakash Jagpriya and Anjani Kumar Suman have also emphasised the importance of the mother tongue and the national language in their songs for children. This fragrance of the soil of the country, present in Angika children's literature, gives children a sense of pride in their culture and their nation.

Thethi-Angika — Poets such as Chandraprakash Jagpriya and Anjani Kumar Suman have also emphasised the importance of the mother tongue and the national language in their songs for children. This fragrance of the soil of the country, present in Angika children's literature, gives children a sense of pride in their culture and their nation.

12. Nature, Environment and Modern Knowledge: The Power of Expanding Subject Matter

Thethi-Angika: 12. Nature, Environment and Modern Knowledge: The Power of Expanding Subject Matter

Maithili — The discussion of nature poetry around page 71, and the passages on environmental education on page 81, bring out a distinctive aspect of the book's consciousness of modernity. Nature is not simply foliage, rain, birds or the beauty of the seasons; it also becomes a field of environmental crisis, human conduct, education and children's responsibilities. Thus images of nature inherited from folk tradition are transformed into a modern environmental awareness.

Thethi-Angika — The discussion of nature poetry around page 71, and the passages on environmental education on page 81, bring out a distinctive aspect of the book's consciousness of modernity. Nature is not simply foliage, rain, birds or the beauty of the seasons; it also becomes a field of environmental crisis, human conduct, education and children's responsibilities. Thus images of nature inherited from folk tradition are transformed into a modern environmental awareness.

Maithili — In folksong, nature is an inseparable part of the environment of daily life. In modern poetry for children, nature sometimes becomes a conscious subject: something to protect, understand and investigate for its scientific causes. Literature builds a bridge between experience and knowledge. Yet it is necessary to remember the author's initial criterion: an environmental message alone does not constitute a poem. Its literary value will be determined by images, rhythm, humour, questioning, story or dramatic action appropriate to children's minds.

Thethi-Angika — In folksong, nature is an inseparable part of the environment of daily life. In modern poetry for children, nature sometimes becomes a conscious subject: something to protect, understand and investigate for its scientific causes. Literature builds a bridge between experience and knowledge. Yet it is necessary to remember the author's initial criterion: an environmental message alone does not constitute a poem. Its literary value will be determined by images, rhythm, humour, questioning, story or dramatic action appropriate to children's minds.

Maithili — In its discussion of stories on pages 95–96, the book introduces such subjects as modern technical equipment, towers and the dangers faced by birds. The later plays for children reinforce this widening of modern themes through questions of noise pollution, forests, education and health. Reynolds understands children's literature as both initiating readers into society's values and stimulating the imagination of alternative futures. In the Angika examples, environmental concerns give local expression to this dual function.

Thethi-Angika — In its discussion of stories on pages 95–96, the book introduces such subjects as modern technical equipment, towers and the dangers faced by birds. The later plays for children reinforce this widening of modern themes through questions of noise pollution, forests, education and health. Reynolds understands children's literature as both initiating readers into society's values and stimulating the imagination of alternative futures. In the Angika examples, environmental concerns give local expression to this dual function.

Environment, Science and National Consciousness: Literature Attuned to Its Times

Thethi-Angika: Environment, Science and National Consciousness: Literature Attuned to Its Times

Maithili — The purpose of children's literature cannot be regarded as fully realised unless it acquaints the new generation with the urgent problems of the modern age. Angika children's literature meets this standard, in the author's assessment.

Thethi-Angika — The purpose of children's literature cannot be regarded as fully realised unless it acquaints the new generation with the urgent problems of the modern age. Angika children's literature meets this standard, in the author's assessment.

Maithili — Environmental protection: whether it is a poem like "Badal Aro Butru," included in Dr Amarendra's Butru Ke Tutru, or a poem like "Tauhro Ghor," which draws attention to mosquito-borne malaria and filth, cleanliness and the environment stand at the centre of such works.

Thethi-Angika — Environmental protection: whether it is a poem like "Badal Aro Butru," included in Dr Amarendra's Butru Ke Tutru, or a poem like "Tauhro Ghor," which draws attention to mosquito-borne malaria and filth, cleanliness and the environment stand at the centre of such works.

Maithili — What sort of home is this of yours?
O mosquito, brother mosquito!
What trade have you learned, tell me?
Will you keep the drains so filthy?
Marshy ground inside the yard and out—
O mosquito, brother mosquito!

Thethi-Angika — What sort of home is this of yours?
O mosquito, brother mosquito!
What trade have you learned, tell me?
Will you keep the drains so filthy?
Marshy ground inside the yard and out—
O mosquito, brother mosquito!

Maithili — On water conservation, too, Sudhir Kumar Programmer writes in Dharti Ke Phul: "Do not knowingly waste the water / Keep it, little by little, in every hollow."

Thethi-Angika — On water conservation, too, Sudhir Kumar Programmer writes in Dharti Ke Phul: "Do not knowingly waste the water / Keep it, little by little, in every hollow."

Maithili — Urbanisation and the danger of radiation: in Dr Abha Purve's story for children "Gauraiya-Mai Ke Dor," the deaths of birds, especially sparrows, and the suffering associated with disappearing species are depicted in connection with radiation from mobile towers. When the mother sparrow speaks to her young one, she says:

Thethi-Angika — Urbanisation and the danger of radiation: in Dr Abha Purve's story for children "Gauraiya-Mai Ke Dor," the deaths of birds, especially sparrows, and the suffering associated with disappearing species are depicted in connection with radiation from mobile towers. When the mother sparrow speaks to her young one, she says:

Maithili — "What can I tell you now, my child? Our bodies—and especially the structure of our brains—are such that the waves coming from towers and mobile phones have begun to affect our brains badly."

Thethi-Angika — "What can I tell you now, my child? Our bodies—and especially the structure of our brains—are such that the waves coming from towers and mobile phones have begun to affect our brains badly."

Maithili — This exchange is presented not merely as an episode in a story but as a serious warning about imbalance in the ecosystem, one that the work seeks to plant in the minds of the younger generation through children's literature.

Thethi-Angika — This exchange is presented not merely as an episode in a story but as a serious warning about imbalance in the ecosystem, one that the work seeks to plant in the minds of the younger generation through children's literature.

13. Panchamrit, Children's Ghazals and Narrative Poems in Cantos: Experimentation Across Genres

Thethi-Angika: 13. Panchamrit, Children's Ghazals and Narrative Poems in Cantos: Experimentation Across Genres

Maithili — On page 92, "Panchamrit" is discussed as a set of five poetic dramatic works for children. This is followed by a discussion of children's ghazals, where attempts are noted to adapt the ghazal's established adult literary tradition to the world of children; Amarendra and Dinesh Baba are among the names that figure prominently. Around page 91, the tendency toward the narrative poem in cantos (khaṇḍakāvya) is also considered.

Thethi-Angika — On page 92, "Panchamrit" is discussed as a set of five poetic dramatic works for children. This is followed by a discussion of children's ghazals, where attempts are noted to adapt the ghazal's established adult literary tradition to the world of children; Amarendra and Dinesh Baba are among the names that figure prominently. Around page 91, the tendency toward the narrative poem in cantos (khaṇḍakāvya) is also considered.

Maithili — The significance of these experiments is that poetry for children need not be confined to short rhymed verses. The ghazal, narrative poetry, the poem in cantos and dramatic forms—all established genres of adult literature—can be recast for young readers. But such an adaptation succeeds only when the genre's outward form accords with the child's capacity to understand, subject matter, sense of rhythm and lived experience.

Thethi-Angika — The significance of these experiments is that poetry for children need not be confined to short rhymed verses. The ghazal, narrative poetry, the poem in cantos and dramatic forms—all established genres of adult literature—can be recast for young readers. But such an adaptation succeeds only when the genre's outward form accords with the child's capacity to understand, subject matter, sense of rhythm and lived experience.

Maithili — At times the book raises technical questions of form, but it does not always make its criteria consistent or explicit. A ghazal requires attention to the correctness of its metre (baḥr), rhyme (qāfiya) and refrain (radīf); poetry for children requires age-appropriate vocabulary; and a poem in cantos requires a convincing movement of the narrative. Each calls for a distinct standard. If a future edition stated its genre-specific criteria at the outset, the evaluations would become more transparent. The historical significance is nevertheless clear: Angika poetry for children is experimental, and the adjective "children's" does not diminish a literary genre. Rather, it poses the challenge of remaking an established form for a new readership.

Thethi-Angika — At times the book raises technical questions of form, but it does not always make its criteria consistent or explicit. A ghazal requires attention to the correctness of its metre (baḥr), rhyme (qāfiya) and refrain (radīf); poetry for children requires age-appropriate vocabulary; and a poem in cantos requires a convincing movement of the narrative. Each calls for a distinct standard. If a future edition stated its genre-specific criteria at the outset, the evaluations would become more transparent. The historical significance is nevertheless clear: Angika poetry for children is experimental, and the adjective "children's" does not diminish a literary genre. Rather, it poses the challenge of remaking an established form for a new readership.

Part Three: Children's Drama, Narrative Poems in Cantos and the Craft of the Ghazal

Thethi-Angika: Part Three: Children's Drama, Narrative Poems in Cantos and the Craft of the Ghazal

Maithili — In the concluding portion of the book, Dr Amarendra discusses several particularly distinctive and innovative experiments in Angika children's literature. Drama for children and the narrative poem in cantos are genres in which skill in language and literary construction is put to a demanding test.

Thethi-Angika — In the concluding portion of the book, Dr Amarendra discusses several particularly distinctive and innovative experiments in Angika children's literature. Drama for children and the narrative poem in cantos are genres in which skill in language and literary construction is put to a demanding test.

Narrative Poems for Children in Cantos: Ghatotkacha and Panchamrit

Thethi-Angika: Narrative Poems for Children in Cantos: Ghatotkacha and Panchamrit

Maithili — Dr Amarendra is himself an accomplished playwright and writer of poems in cantos. His Ghatotkacha draws upon the Vana Parva of the Mahabharata. In this narrative poem he attempts to capture children's natural fascination with characters endowed with magical and supernatural powers. In its three cantos—"Manifestation," "Conflict" and "Fall"—the depiction of war and of Ghatotkacha, the son of Bhima, is fearsome yet appealing to the imagination of a child. It is extraordinary:

Thethi-Angika — Dr Amarendra is himself an accomplished playwright and writer of poems in cantos. His Ghatotkacha draws upon the Vana Parva of the Mahabharata. In this narrative poem he attempts to capture children's natural fascination with characters endowed with magical and supernatural powers. In its three cantos—"Manifestation," "Conflict" and "Fall"—the depiction of war and of Ghatotkacha, the son of Bhima, is fearsome yet appealing to the imagination of a child. It is extraordinary:

Maithili — He sends all the earth's dust flying,
He breaks the great trees in his path;
He topples palms and raises rivers,
Makes mountains flow as though they were water;
Dark-hued are the clouds of Sonō,
Like the pitch-dark nights of Bhādo.

Thethi-Angika — He sends all the earth's dust flying,
He breaks the great trees in his path;
He topples palms and raises rivers,
Makes mountains flow as though they were water;
Dark-hued are the clouds of Sonō,
Like the pitch-dark nights of Bhādo.

Maithili — Similes such as "flow as though they were water" and "the pitch-dark nights of Bhādo" give the child's mind a visual image. This narrative poem in cantos demonstrates that children's literature need not be restricted to light subjects; it is also capable of epic breadth.

Thethi-Angika — Similes such as "flow as though they were water" and "the pitch-dark nights of Bhādo" give the child's mind a visual image. This narrative poem in cantos demonstrates that children's literature need not be restricted to light subjects; it is also capable of epic breadth.

Maithili — Panchamrit is a collection of five poetic dramatic works for children: Chokar Ke Halua, Atithi Seva, Atmasamarpan, Vishakha and Buddham Sharanam Gacchami. These dramatic pieces were written to impart moral and spiritual strength to children.

Thethi-Angika — Panchamrit is a collection of five poetic dramatic works for children: Chokar Ke Halua, Atithi Seva, Atmasamarpan, Vishakha and Buddham Sharanam Gacchami. These dramatic pieces were written to impart moral and spiritual strength to children.

Innovation in the Children's Ghazal

Thethi-Angika: Innovation in the Children's Ghazal

Maithili — The ghazal, originally inherited from the Persian–Urdu tradition and characteristically associated with love and philosophical reflection, is difficult to reshape for children's literature. Dr Amarendra and Dinesh Baba are among the poets who have accomplished this seemingly impossible task. Consider a couplet from a children's ghazal by Dinesh Baba, in which children's various games and the ironies of society are threaded together:

Thethi-Angika — The ghazal, originally inherited from the Persian–Urdu tradition and characteristically associated with love and philosophical reflection, is difficult to reshape for children's literature. Dr Amarendra and Dinesh Baba are among the poets who have accomplished this seemingly impossible task. Consider a couplet from a children's ghazal by Dinesh Baba, in which children's various games and the ironies of society are threaded together:

Maithili — The cow went to the cowshed (gosallā),
Drank water at the water-stall (panasallā).
Eyes shut, yet the mind is restless,
Hands move about in the arena (mallā).

Thethi-Angika — The cow went to the cowshed (gosallā),
Drank water at the water-stall (panasallā).
Eyes shut, yet the mind is restless,
Hands move about in the arena (mallā).

Maithili — The sonic correspondences in this children's ghazal—gosallā, panasallā and mallā—have the power to draw a child almost unawares into their music.

Thethi-Angika — The sonic correspondences in this children's ghazal—gosallā, panasallā and mallā—have the power to draw a child almost unawares into their music.

14. Modern Stories for Children: An Honest History of Scarcity

Thethi-Angika: 14. Modern Stories for Children: An Honest History of Scarcity

Maithili — From page 94 onward, the book turns to "Modern Angika Prose Literature for Children—Children's Stories." Here the author's critical honesty is particularly striking. The book itself acknowledges that stories for children have not developed as richly as modern children's poetry. Although some distinguished storytellers achieved recognition in general fiction, they were unable to establish a sustained practice of writing Angika stories specifically for children. The author regards compilations such as Angika Bal-Kahani as important landmarks in the systematic beginnings of the genre.

Thethi-Angika — From page 94 onward, the book turns to "Modern Angika Prose Literature for Children—Children's Stories." Here the author's critical honesty is particularly striking. The book itself acknowledges that stories for children have not developed as richly as modern children's poetry. Although some distinguished storytellers achieved recognition in general fiction, they were unable to establish a sustained practice of writing Angika stories specifically for children. The author regards compilations such as Angika Bal-Kahani as important landmarks in the systematic beginnings of the genre.

Maithili — The clear implication on page 97 is that seven or eight stories cannot, by themselves, make an entire body of children's fiction rich and substantial. This self-criticism is noteworthy, since literary histories often exaggerate the achievements of their chosen subjects. Here, instead, the author turns a deficiency into a challenge for future creation. The book gains credibility as a result.

Thethi-Angika — The clear implication on page 97 is that seven or eight stories cannot, by themselves, make an entire body of children's fiction rich and substantial. This self-criticism is noteworthy, since literary histories often exaggerate the achievements of their chosen subjects. Here, instead, the author turns a deficiency into a challenge for future creation. The book gains credibility as a result.

Maithili — The thematic diversity of the available stories is important: children's ingenuity, adaptations of folktales, reminiscence, social education, science, the environment, animals and birds, and modern life. The endings of some stories tend toward instructive morals. This is precisely where the earlier criterion concerning the child's imagination must be reapplied: does the story live through its characters, events and dramatic tension, or only through its final message?

Thethi-Angika — The thematic diversity of the available stories is important: children's ingenuity, adaptations of folktales, reminiscence, social education, science, the environment, animals and birds, and modern life. The endings of some stories tend toward instructive morals. This is precisely where the earlier criterion concerning the child's imagination must be reapplied: does the story live through its characters, events and dramatic tension, or only through its final message?

Maithili — The self-critical conclusion of this section matters. At the same time, the weakness of children's fiction should not be attributed simply to a shortage of writers. It must also be examined in relation to publishing structures, children's magazines, the readership market, adoption by schools, picture-book culture and traditions of editing. A literary genre develops not through authors alone but through an entire institutional ecology.

Thethi-Angika — The self-critical conclusion of this section matters. At the same time, the weakness of children's fiction should not be attributed simply to a shortage of writers. It must also be examined in relation to publishing structures, children's magazines, the readership market, adoption by schools, picture-book culture and traditions of editing. A literary genre develops not through authors alone but through an entire institutional ecology.

15. Children's Drama: A More Significant Field Revealed by Rereading

Thethi-Angika: 15. Children's Drama: A More Significant Field Revealed by Rereading

Maithili — A close reading of the treatment of drama, essays and biography on pages 98–109 makes it clear that essays and biographies do form a short concluding section, but the discussion of children's drama is both substantial and critical. Children's drama must therefore be recognised as a major achievement in its own right.

Thethi-Angika — A close reading of the treatment of drama, essays and biography on pages 98–109 makes it clear that essays and biographies do form a short concluding section, but the discussion of children's drama is both substantial and critical. Children's drama must therefore be recognised as a major achievement in its own right.

Maithili — Beginning on page 98, the book considers the question of age in children's drama, the boundaries between literature for infants, children and adolescents, and the suitability of the one-act play. The author's argument is practical: children engage readily with a compact form, lively events, dialogue and action on stage. Compared with a long play, a one-act play may be more useful in schools or on a stage intended for young performers.

Thethi-Angika — Beginning on page 98, the book considers the question of age in children's drama, the boundaries between literature for infants, children and adolescents, and the suitability of the one-act play. The author's argument is practical: children engage readily with a compact form, lively events, dialogue and action on stage. Compared with a long play, a one-act play may be more useful in schools or on a stage intended for young performers.

Maithili — The discussion on pages 101–105 of the five one-act plays collected in Panchagavya is particularly significant. Social change, policing and administration, opposition to superstition, a scientific outlook, girls' education, marriage and rural life are transformed into dramatic events. On page 105 the author identifies vivid characters, different age groups, the rural setting, dialogue, satire and humour as measures of success. This is not merely a catalogue of subject matter: it pays genuine attention to dramatic craft—character, dialogue and atmosphere.

Thethi-Angika — The discussion on pages 101–105 of the five one-act plays collected in Panchagavya is particularly significant. Social change, policing and administration, opposition to superstition, a scientific outlook, girls' education, marriage and rural life are transformed into dramatic events. On page 105 the author identifies vivid characters, different age groups, the rural setting, dialogue, satire and humour as measures of success. This is not merely a catalogue of subject matter: it pays genuine attention to dramatic craft—character, dialogue and atmosphere.

Maithili — On page 106, the discussion of the three short plays in Nibhuhān brings to the fore noise pollution, adolescent psychology, the environment and education. Up to page 109, references to radio, musical drama and public health reveal the presence of modern media. Children's drama thus becomes, within Angika children's literature, a meeting ground for social knowledge, public health, environmental concerns and theatrical entertainment. Two especially important directions for further study are the actual performance history of the printed plays and the differences between their written texts and their staging.

Thethi-Angika — On page 106, the discussion of the three short plays in Nibhuhān brings to the fore noise pollution, adolescent psychology, the environment and education. Up to page 109, references to radio, musical drama and public health reveal the presence of modern media. Children's drama thus becomes, within Angika children's literature, a meeting ground for social knowledge, public health, environmental concerns and theatrical entertainment. Two especially important directions for further study are the actual performance history of the printed plays and the differences between their written texts and their staging.

Children's Drama and One-Act Plays

Thethi-Angika: Children's Drama and One-Act Plays

Maithili — The plays and one-act plays written with adolescents at their centre challenge social evils, superstition and problems of education. Dr Amarendra's Panchagavya contains five one-act plays for children:

Thethi-Angika — The plays and one-act plays written with adolescents at their centre challenge social evils, superstition and problems of education. Dr Amarendra's Panchagavya contains five one-act plays for children:

One-Act Plays and Their Social or Moral Themes

Thethi-Angika: One-Act Plays and Their Social or Moral Themes

Maithili — 1. Karni-Bharni Sathe-Sath — a satire on changing attitudes in the village and political self-interest.

Thethi-Angika — 1. Karni-Bharni Sathe-Sath — a satire on changing attitudes in the village and political self-interest.

Maithili — 2. Kalyug Ro Satta — an attack on the dowry system and an affirmation of women's empowerment.

Thethi-Angika — 2. Kalyug Ro Satta — an attack on the dowry system and an affirmation of women's empowerment.

Maithili — 3. Purano Bhut-Naya Ilaj — scientific thinking in place of superstition, occultism and magical remedies.

Thethi-Angika — 3. Purano Bhut-Naya Ilaj — scientific thinking in place of superstition, occultism and magical remedies.

Maithili — 4. Sa Vidya Ya Vimuktaye — the increase in crime, including robbery, in the absence of education, and the importance of learning.

Thethi-Angika — 4. Sa Vidya Ya Vimuktaye — the increase in crime, including robbery, in the absence of education, and the importance of learning.

Maithili — 5. Mutthi Me Dhup — an appeal for women's education and for girls to become self-reliant.

Thethi-Angika — 5. Mutthi Me Dhup — an appeal for women's education and for girls to become self-reliant.

Maithili — From a critical perspective, these one-act plays acquaint young minds with social realism. The attack on the social evil of dowry in Kalyug Ro Satta—where the heroine herself puts handcuffs on her dowry-demanding prospective husband at the marriage pavilion—is especially capable of awakening revolutionary consciousness among adolescents.

Thethi-Angika — From a critical perspective, these one-act plays acquaint young minds with social realism. The attack on the social evil of dowry in Kalyug Ro Satta—where the heroine herself puts handcuffs on her dowry-demanding prospective husband at the marriage pavilion—is especially capable of awakening revolutionary consciousness among adolescents.

Maithili — Similarly, Chandraprakash Jagpriya's Vitamin Sabha, a radio play, and Chaturan Ke Chaturai are excellent examples of dramatic poetry for children. The portrayal of Babasaheb Ambedkar's life in Vitamin Sabha and the first-person account of a centipede (gujaraiṭhā) offer children not only entertainment but also detailed information about zoology:

Thethi-Angika — Similarly, Chandraprakash Jagpriya's Vitamin Sabha, a radio play, and Chaturan Ke Chaturai are excellent examples of dramatic poetry for children. The portrayal of Babasaheb Ambedkar's life in Vitamin Sabha and the first-person account of a centipede (gujaraiṭhā) offer children not only entertainment but also detailed information about zoology:

Maithili — "Look, have you been frightened? … For now I have only a hundred legs. Let me grow a little more; I may develop as many as 380 legs …"

Thethi-Angika — "Look, have you been frightened? … For now I have only a hundred legs. Let me grow a little more; I may develop as many as 380 legs …"

Maithili — To explain, through the dialogue of a centipede, its physical structure (up to 380 legs) and its importance in the ecosystem is presented as one of the greatest achievements of modern drama for children.

Thethi-Angika — To explain, through the dialogue of a centipede, its physical structure (up to 380 legs) and its importance in the ecosystem is presented as one of the greatest achievements of modern drama for children.

16. Other Children's Literature: Essays, History, Great Figures and Biography

Thethi-Angika: 16. Other Children's Literature: Essays, History, Great Figures and Biography

Maithili — The explicit heading "Other Children's Literature (Essays and Biographical Literature)" on page 109 broadens the book's understanding of children's literature beyond poetry, stories and drama. Pages 109–111 discuss prose suitable for children concerning the principal towns of the Anga region, eminent figures, personalities of the freedom struggle, great figures of India, the Buddha and related subjects. The author regards the transmission of historical and cultural knowledge to young readers as a form of literature.

Thethi-Angika — The explicit heading "Other Children's Literature (Essays and Biographical Literature)" on page 109 broadens the book's understanding of children's literature beyond poetry, stories and drama. Pages 109–111 discuss prose suitable for children concerning the principal towns of the Anga region, eminent figures, personalities of the freedom struggle, great figures of India, the Buddha and related subjects. The author regards the transmission of historical and cultural knowledge to young readers as a form of literature.

Maithili — The criteria appropriate to fiction or poetry are insufficient for assessing such material. In literature of knowledge, the reliability of facts, selection of material, simplicity of language, references, illustrations, chronology and the capacity to awaken curiosity are all important. The book pays particular attention to how illustrations and portraits of notable people can stimulate children's interest. In this sense the section occupies the borderland between children's literature and children's education.

Thethi-Angika — The criteria appropriate to fiction or poetry are insufficient for assessing such material. In literature of knowledge, the reliability of facts, selection of material, simplicity of language, references, illustrations, chronology and the capacity to awaken curiosity are all important. The book pays particular attention to how illustrations and portraits of notable people can stimulate children's interest. In this sense the section occupies the borderland between children's literature and children's education.

Maithili — A significant theoretical question arises: does every history or biography written for children count as children's literature? Merely addressing children as the intended readership is not enough. Language, structure, narrative pace, visual material, the encouragement of questions and curiosity, age level and literary presentation become decisive. The book does not develop this question into a complete theory, but it does provide material with which to pursue it. This expansion into essays and biographies clarifies the textual world through which local cultural knowledge is offered to young readers.

Thethi-Angika — A significant theoretical question arises: does every history or biography written for children count as children's literature? Merely addressing children as the intended readership is not enough. Language, structure, narrative pace, visual material, the encouragement of questions and curiosity, age level and literary presentation become decisive. The book does not develop this question into a complete theory, but it does provide material with which to pursue it. This expansion into essays and biographies clarifies the textual world through which local cultural knowledge is offered to young readers.

17. Language and Critical Style: Angika Material, Hindi Exposition

Thethi-Angika: 17. Language and Critical Style: Angika Material, Hindi Exposition

Maithili — The book has a distinctive linguistic structure: the creative examples, titles, songs, story dialogues and the original literary world are in Angika, whereas the critical exposition is conducted largely through Hindi prose. The result is a form of bilingual critical document.

Thethi-Angika — The book has a distinctive linguistic structure: the creative examples, titles, songs, story dialogues and the original literary world are in Angika, whereas the critical exposition is conducted largely through Hindi prose. The result is a form of bilingual critical document.

Maithili — This arrangement has its advantages. Through Hindi, a wider readership—including university researchers and people unable to read Angika fluently—can grasp the outlines of its literary history. Yet a cultural question remains: if Angika is the language of creation, to what extent should its aesthetics, vocabulary of criticism and literary history also develop within Angika itself? A future Angika edition could strengthen the autonomy of the local language of criticism.

Thethi-Angika — This arrangement has its advantages. Through Hindi, a wider readership—including university researchers and people unable to read Angika fluently—can grasp the outlines of its literary history. Yet a cultural question remains: if Angika is the language of creation, to what extent should its aesthetics, vocabulary of criticism and literary history also develop within Angika itself? A future Angika edition could strengthen the autonomy of the local language of criticism.

Maithili — The style is generally straightforward, introductory and rich in examples. It avoids a heavy theoretical vocabulary, making the work accessible to ordinary readers. From a research perspective, however, several passages offer more information about works, writers and subjects than sustained close reading. Criticism would gain in depth if metre, imagery, plot, narrator, character development, humour, reader response, age appropriateness, gender and class representation, and the relationship between illustrations and text were analysed by a consistent method.

Thethi-Angika — The style is generally straightforward, introductory and rich in examples. It avoids a heavy theoretical vocabulary, making the work accessible to ordinary readers. From a research perspective, however, several passages offer more information about works, writers and subjects than sustained close reading. Criticism would gain in depth if metre, imagery, plot, narrator, character development, humour, reader response, age appropriateness, gender and class representation, and the relationship between illustrations and text were analysed by a consistent method.

Maithili — This limitation should not be taken as a deficiency in the author's scholarship, but understood in the light of the book's purpose. Its first task is to map the field; an exhaustive aesthetic interpretation of each individual work is not its sole objective. The responsibility thus passes to subsequent critics to apply different modern methods to the corpus the author has assembled.

Thethi-Angika — This limitation should not be taken as a deficiency in the author's scholarship, but understood in the light of the book's purpose. Its first task is to map the field; an exhaustive aesthetic interpretation of each individual work is not its sole objective. The responsibility thus passes to subsequent critics to apply different modern methods to the corpus the author has assembled.

18. References and the World of Periodicals: The Book as a Literary Archive

Thethi-Angika: 18. References and the World of Periodicals: The Book as a Literary Archive

Maithili — The references on pages 112–114 are crucial to understanding the book's value. Approximately fifty-two numbered books and other sources, together with the names of about ten periodicals, bring into view a whole network of literary circulation encompassing children's songs, riddles, stories, novels, drama, translations, biographies, criticism and magazines. Works such as Dhol Bajai Chhai Dhammak Dham, Butru Ke Tutru, Bajai Bin Bajavai Tin, Tuktak-Muktak, Panchagavya, Banta, Angika Balgit and Angika Balkahani belong to this bibliographical world.

Thethi-Angika — The references on pages 112–114 are crucial to understanding the book's value. Approximately fifty-two numbered books and other sources, together with the names of about ten periodicals, bring into view a whole network of literary circulation encompassing children's songs, riddles, stories, novels, drama, translations, biographies, criticism and magazines. Works such as Dhol Bajai Chhai Dhammak Dham, Butru Ke Tutru, Bajai Bin Bajavai Tin, Tuktak-Muktak, Panchagavya, Banta, Angika Balgit and Angika Balkahani belong to this bibliographical world.

Maithili — The list prevents the book from being merely an exercise in personal recollection or self-praise. Readers can see that the history rests on an interlinked body of books, anthologies, translations, periodicals and writers. In the study of literature in a language with a relatively small publishing infrastructure, such a bibliography is itself a research instrument, since many sources cannot readily be found in general national bibliographies.

Thethi-Angika — The list prevents the book from being merely an exercise in personal recollection or self-praise. Readers can see that the history rests on an interlinked body of books, anthologies, translations, periodicals and writers. In the study of literature in a language with a relatively small publishing infrastructure, such a bibliography is itself a research instrument, since many sources cannot readily be found in general national bibliographies.

Maithili — Bibliographical standardisation is nevertheless necessary. Publication year, edition, page count, place of publication, ISBN and editorial responsibility are not recorded uniformly in every entry. A future edition would become much more useful to researchers if it supplied complete references in a consistent style, together with indexes of authors, titles and genres and a chronological list.

Thethi-Angika — Bibliographical standardisation is nevertheless necessary. Publication year, edition, page count, place of publication, ISBN and editorial responsibility are not recorded uniformly in every entry. A future edition would become much more useful to researchers if it supplied complete references in a consistent style, together with indexes of authors, titles and genres and a chronological list.

Maithili — Bharatavani lists the original Angika Bal-Sahitya (2022) alongside Shweta Rani's Dr Amarendra Ka Angika Bal Sahitya (2021) and Dr Amarendra Granthavali, Volume 1: Angika Balgit Samagra (2021), edited by Abhinandan. This cluster of related publications suggests that, by 2021–22, Amarendra's writing for children had itself become a focus of criticism, editing and literary historiography.

Thethi-Angika — Bharatavani lists the original Angika Bal-Sahitya (2022) alongside Shweta Rani's Dr Amarendra Ka Angika Bal Sahitya (2021) and Dr Amarendra Granthavali, Volume 1: Angika Balgit Samagra (2021), edited by Abhinandan. This cluster of related publications suggests that, by 2021–22, Amarendra's writing for children had itself become a focus of criticism, editing and literary historiography.

19. The Historian as a Creative Writer: Insider Testimony and the Question of Selection

Thethi-Angika: 19. The Historian as a Creative Writer: Insider Testimony and the Question of Selection

Maithili — Dr Amarendra is not an external observer of this literary history. He is himself a poet, writer of children's songs, novelist, playwright, critic and cultural activist. External author lists separately record the publication of works such as Dhol Bajai Chhai Dhammak Dham, Panchagavya, Butru Ke Tutru, Bajai Bin Bajavai Tin, Ek Chhari Par Anda Nachai and Banta. The book is consequently both a historian's account and a creative writer's testimony about his own field.

Thethi-Angika — Dr Amarendra is not an external observer of this literary history. He is himself a poet, writer of children's songs, novelist, playwright, critic and cultural activist. External author lists separately record the publication of works such as Dhol Bajai Chhai Dhammak Dham, Panchagavya, Butru Ke Tutru, Bajai Bin Bajavai Tin, Ek Chhari Par Anda Nachai and Banta. The book is consequently both a historian's account and a creative writer's testimony about his own field.

Maithili — Insider testimony has considerable advantages. The writer has direct knowledge of rare books, periodicals, publishing circumstances, contemporary authors and literary institutions. Many little-known works might never enter the historical record without such networks of firsthand knowledge. Yet the witness is also a participant in the events being described; the location of that perspective must therefore be recognised.

Thethi-Angika — Insider testimony has considerable advantages. The writer has direct knowledge of rare books, periodicals, publishing circumstances, contemporary authors and literary institutions. Many little-known works might never enter the historical record without such networks of firsthand knowledge. Yet the witness is also a participant in the events being described; the location of that perspective must therefore be recognised.

Maithili — Extensive treatment of the author's own works is not necessarily improper if his contribution to the actual corpus is substantial. External sources confirm that he is represented by several works in modern Angika children's poetry. Nevertheless, a future independent history should ask the same questions about every major writer: total output, dates of publication, reception by readers, reprints, formal innovation, language, technique and suitability for child readers. The conclusion is therefore not an accusation but a methodological precaution: acknowledge the value of personal testimony while also undertaking independent bibliographical verification and constructing a comparative corpus.

Thethi-Angika — Extensive treatment of the author's own works is not necessarily improper if his contribution to the actual corpus is substantial. External sources confirm that he is represented by several works in modern Angika children's poetry. Nevertheless, a future independent history should ask the same questions about every major writer: total output, dates of publication, reception by readers, reprints, formal innovation, language, technique and suitability for child readers. The conclusion is therefore not an accusation but a methodological precaution: acknowledge the value of personal testimony while also undertaking independent bibliographical verification and constructing a comparative corpus.

20. Books, Periodicals, Collections and Digital Reappearance: The Institutional Ecosystem

Thethi-Angika: 20. Books, Periodicals, Collections and Digital Reappearance: The Institutional Ecosystem

Maithili — Reading the book makes clear that literature is not a two-point transaction in which an author writes and a reader reads. Periodicals, edited collections, literary organisations, publishers, translators, school use, radio and performance, and eventually digital repositories together constitute the ecosystem of children's literature. The list of books and periodicals on pages 112–114 offers concrete evidence of that network.

Thethi-Angika — Reading the book makes clear that literature is not a two-point transaction in which an author writes and a reader reads. Periodicals, edited collections, literary organisations, publishers, translators, school use, radio and performance, and eventually digital repositories together constitute the ecosystem of children's literature. The list of books and periodicals on pages 112–114 offers concrete evidence of that network.

Maithili — Available external sources indicate the modern forms of this circulation. Bharatavani lists the original book and related studies or collected works on a government language-knowledge portal. Kavita Kosh places Tuktak-Muktak in an e-book or children's-poetry category, while portions of the Angika text of Banta are available on Gadya Kosh. This digital reappearance shows printed Angika children's literature entering new media of reading.

Thethi-Angika — Available external sources indicate the modern forms of this circulation. Bharatavani lists the original book and related studies or collected works on a government language-knowledge portal. Kavita Kosh places Tuktak-Muktak in an e-book or children's-poetry category, while portions of the Angika text of Banta are available on Gadya Kosh. This digital reappearance shows printed Angika children's literature entering new media of reading.

Maithili — The book traces the history through 2022; the field of digital research may have expanded further since then. Future inquiries could ask: which works have been digitised? Which exist as audio? Who reads them in schools and homes? How do children engage with material in their mother tongue on mobile devices? When older play-songs become digital videos, does the performance tradition survive unchanged, or does it assume a new form? In this sense Angika Bal-Sahitya is not merely a catalogue of the past but also a baseline against which changes after 2022 can be measured.

Thethi-Angika — The book traces the history through 2022; the field of digital research may have expanded further since then. Future inquiries could ask: which works have been digitised? Which exist as audio? Who reads them in schools and homes? How do children engage with material in their mother tongue on mobile devices? When older play-songs become digital videos, does the performance tradition survive unchanged, or does it assume a new form? In this sense Angika Bal-Sahitya is not merely a catalogue of the past but also a baseline against which changes after 2022 can be measured.

21. Comparative Dialogue with Indian and International Scholarship on Children's Literature

Thethi-Angika — 21. Comparative Dialogue with Indian and International Scholarship on Children's Literature

Maithili — Dr Amarendra's book was not written to imitate Western theories, and its value should not be sought in such imitation. Comparative study can, nevertheless, make its distinctive insights clearer. Hans-Heino Ewers raises questions concerning the classification of children's literature, suitability for children, readers' needs, and the adaptation of values. The importance attached on pages 8–9 of the original book to the child's mind, imagination, reasoning, obstinacy, rhythm, images and indirect communication enters readily into dialogue with this child-oriented perspective.

Thethi-Angika — Dr Amarendra's book was not written to imitate Western theories, and its value should not be sought in such imitation. Comparative study can, nevertheless, make its distinctive insights clearer. Hans-Heino Ewers raises questions concerning the classification of children's literature, suitability for children, readers' needs, and the adaptation of values. The importance attached on pages 8–9 of the original book to the child's mind, imagination, reasoning, obstinacy, rhythm, images and indirect communication enters readily into dialogue with this child-oriented perspective.

Maithili — In her history of children's literature, Kimberley Reynolds discusses its initially educational character, its later diversification into many genres, the initiation of successive generations into literature through oral traditions, and its relationship to a society's values and imagination of the future. Angika material likewise extends from lullabies, tuktak rhymes and play-songs to moral stories and writing about nature, science, the environment, health and social issues. This resemblance does not establish that Angika literary development followed an external model. It shows only that several fundamental questions of children's literature—enjoyment versus instruction, the child versus the adult intermediary, orality versus print, and suitability versus literary freedom—recur across many linguistic cultures.

Thethi-Angika — In her history of children's literature, Kimberley Reynolds discusses its initially educational character, its later diversification into many genres, the initiation of successive generations into literature through oral traditions, and its relationship to a society's values and imagination of the future. Angika material likewise extends from lullabies, tuktak rhymes and play-songs to moral stories and writing about nature, science, the environment, health and social issues. This resemblance does not establish that Angika literary development followed an external model. It shows only that several fundamental questions of children's literature—enjoyment versus instruction, the child versus the adult intermediary, orality versus print, and suitability versus literary freedom—recur across many linguistic cultures.

Maithili — A comparison among Indian languages could raise similar questions of genre in the children's traditions of Maithili, Hindi, Bengali, Bhojpuri, Magahi and others. But claims of comparative superiority or influence would be unjustified without a dedicated corpus. A sound method for future comparative research would assemble parallel corpora in different languages for the same genre—for example, lullabies, riddles, play-songs or children's stories—over matching periods and assess them by comparable criteria. Exaggeration in the name of proving the worth of literature in a smaller language or related speech variety does not serve literary history. The actual wealth of sources in Angika Bal-Sahitya is sufficient in itself.

Thethi-Angika — A comparison among Indian languages could raise similar questions of genre in the children's traditions of Maithili, Hindi, Bengali, Bhojpuri, Magahi and others. But claims of comparative superiority or influence would be unjustified without a dedicated corpus. A sound method for future comparative research would assemble parallel corpora in different languages for the same genre—for example, lullabies, riddles, play-songs or children's stories—over matching periods and assess them by comparable criteria. Exaggeration in the name of proving the worth of literature in a smaller language or related speech variety does not serve literary history. The actual wealth of sources in Angika Bal-Sahitya is sufficient in itself.

A Four-Dimensional Review: Rasa, Dhvani and Vakrokti; Western Theory; Navya-Nyāya; and Parallel History

Thethi-Angika — A Four-Dimensional Review: Rasa, Dhvani and Vakrokti; Western Theory; Navya-Nyāya; and Parallel History

First Dimension: Rasa, Dhvani and Vakrokti (the Perspective of Indian Poetics)

Thethi-Angika — First Dimension: Rasa, Dhvani and Vakrokti (the Perspective of Indian Poetics)

Maithili — The perspective of rasa: the presiding rasa of children's literature is vātsalya, parental tenderness. In songs accompanying oil massage and feeding, the infant is the ālambana-vibhāva (the sustaining object of emotion), while the mother's touch and gestures are the uddīpana-vibhāva (stimulating determinants). Expressions such as 'Nunu motāy jāy' and 'Baṛhau lap-lap' bring tenderness to fruition as anubhāvas, its expressive manifestations. Even without employing classical terminology, the author arranges these emotional elements in their appropriate contexts and thus makes an unwitting practical application of rasa theory.

Thethi-Angika — The perspective of rasa: the presiding rasa of children's literature is vātsalya, parental tenderness. In songs accompanying oil massage and feeding, the infant is the ālambana-vibhāva (the sustaining object of emotion), while the mother's touch and gestures are the uddīpana-vibhāva (stimulating determinants). Expressions such as 'Nunu motāy jāy' and 'Baṛhau lap-lap' bring tenderness to fruition as anubhāvas, its expressive manifestations. Even without employing classical terminology, the author arranges these emotional elements in their appropriate contexts and thus makes an unwitting practical application of rasa theory.

Maithili — The perspective of dhvani: the author's proposition that 'the message emerges through suggestion, not through literal denotation' is a distinctly Angika restatement of Ānandavardhana's theory of dhvani. The apparently meaningless words of tuktak poetry actually produce a sound-centred suggestion, conveying the beauty of resonance rather than a determinate lexical meaning. In riddles, suggested meaning emerges when the answer is intimated indirectly. In 'Son Chiraiyā', the golden bird that brings rain evokes vastu-dhvani, the suggestion of renewed hope and life amid desiccation.

Thethi-Angika — The perspective of dhvani: the author's proposition that 'the message emerges through suggestion, not through literal denotation' is a distinctly Angika restatement of Ānandavardhana's theory of dhvani. The apparently meaningless words of tuktak poetry actually produce a sound-centred suggestion, conveying the beauty of resonance rather than a determinate lexical meaning. In riddles, suggested meaning emerges when the answer is intimated indirectly. In 'Son Chiraiyā', the golden bird that brings rain evokes vastu-dhvani, the suggestion of renewed hope and life amid desiccation.

Maithili — The perspective of vakrokti: the bujhauval riddle is one of the purest expressions of Kuntaka's oblique expression. A negative formulation such as 'Farai nai phūlai' exemplifies pada-vakratā, verbal distinctiveness at the level of the word; 'Ek saṅ dū sāthī' exemplifies vākya-vakratā, obliqueness at the sentence level. The earthen pot's soliloquy exemplifies prakaraṇa- and prabandha-vakratā: its entire manner of speaking turns obliquely into an autobiography. Indian vakrokti is thus embodied spontaneously in the inventiveness of Angika folklore.

Thethi-Angika — The perspective of vakrokti: the bujhauval riddle is one of the purest expressions of Kuntaka's oblique expression. A negative formulation such as 'Farai nai phūlai' exemplifies pada-vakratā, verbal distinctiveness at the level of the word; 'Ek saṅ dū sāthī' exemplifies vākya-vakratā, obliqueness at the sentence level. The earthen pot's soliloquy exemplifies prakaraṇa- and prabandha-vakratā: its entire manner of speaking turns obliquely into an autobiography. Indian vakrokti is thus embodied spontaneously in the inventiveness of Angika folklore.

Maithili — A fuller account of vakrokti: Kuntaka's Vakroktijīvita recognises six kinds of obliqueness or striking expression, all six of which can be discerned, layer by layer, in this folk material. (1) Varṇa-vinyāsa-vakratā: the elegance of arranging phonemes, evident in the alliterative music of 'chap-chap', 'lap-lap' and 'ṭūmuk ṭhumuk'; this is the lifeblood of tuktak verse. (2) Pada-pūrvārdha-vakratā: distinctiveness in choosing the root or nominal base of a word, evident in affectionate local expressions such as 'nūnu', 'butrū' and 'gaṭṭā', and in diminutive suffixes that convey tenderness. (3) Pada-parārdha- or pratyaya-vakratā: expressive use of inflection, tense, person and number; the earthen-pot riddle exhibits this in tense shifts such as 'chelām … pahanlā … sahbau' and in its first-person voice. (4) Vākya-vakratā: the oblique configuration of a whole sentence; the paradox 'Farai nai phūlai, ḍhakamorai gāch' suggests the answer by indirection. (5) Prakaraṇa-vakratā: obliqueness in the construction of an episode, as in the miniature dramatic situation of the pot's soliloquy or dialogue-songs between animals. (6) Prabandha-vakratā: obliqueness in the structure of an entire composition, as in the architecture of refrain and recurrence in a song such as 'Son Chiraiyā'. This sixfold reading suggests that Angika folk poetry for children provides a living, multilayered embodiment of Kuntaka's account of vakrokti.

Thethi-Angika — A fuller account of vakrokti: Kuntaka's Vakroktijīvita recognises six kinds of obliqueness or striking expression, all six of which can be discerned, layer by layer, in this folk material. (1) Varṇa-vinyāsa-vakratā: the elegance of arranging phonemes, evident in the alliterative music of 'chap-chap', 'lap-lap' and 'ṭūmuk ṭhumuk'; this is the lifeblood of tuktak verse. (2) Pada-pūrvārdha-vakratā: distinctiveness in choosing the root or nominal base of a word, evident in affectionate local expressions such as 'nūnu', 'butrū' and 'gaṭṭā', and in diminutive suffixes that convey tenderness. (3) Pada-parārdha- or pratyaya-vakratā: expressive use of inflection, tense, person and number; the earthen-pot riddle exhibits this in tense shifts such as 'chelām … pahanlā … sahbau' and in its first-person voice. (4) Vākya-vakratā: the oblique configuration of a whole sentence; the paradox 'Farai nai phūlai, ḍhakamorai gāch' suggests the answer by indirection. (5) Prakaraṇa-vakratā: obliqueness in the construction of an episode, as in the miniature dramatic situation of the pot's soliloquy or dialogue-songs between animals. (6) Prabandha-vakratā: obliqueness in the structure of an entire composition, as in the architecture of refrain and recurrence in a song such as 'Son Chiraiyā'. This sixfold reading suggests that Angika folk poetry for children provides a living, multilayered embodiment of Kuntaka's account of vakrokti.

Second Dimension: Western Literary Theory

Thethi-Angika — Second Dimension: Western Literary Theory

Maithili — Translation theory: Amarendra's child-protective adaptations illustrate Skopos theory (Vermeer): the purpose of the translation—its appropriateness for children—determines the target text rather than strict equivalence to the source. This is a target-culture-oriented translation in Toury's sense and a 'domesticating' translation in Venuti's terminology. By contrast, retaining Sanskrit verses in the middle of a story leaves a trace of 'foreignisation' that interrupts the narrative flow. It is this defect of foreignisation that the author identifies.

Thethi-Angika — Translation theory: Amarendra's child-protective adaptations illustrate Skopos theory (Vermeer): the purpose of the translation—its appropriateness for children—determines the target text rather than strict equivalence to the source. This is a target-culture-oriented translation in Toury's sense and a 'domesticating' translation in Venuti's terminology. By contrast, retaining Sanskrit verses in the middle of a story leaves a trace of 'foreignisation' that interrupts the narrative flow. It is this defect of foreignisation that the author identifies.

Maithili — Reader-response theory: children's literature is a vivid domain for Iser's concept of the 'implied reader'. Here that reader is a child, and the translator changes cruel scenes with the implied child in mind. Viewed through Formalism, the bujhauval riddle exemplifies Shklovsky's 'defamiliarisation': familiar things such as a betel leaf, a grinding mill and an earthen pot are made strange so that they may be seen anew. This is a remarkable meeting point between Western defamiliarisation and Indian vakrokti. In the study of folklore, the recurring words of lullabies ('nūnu … nūnu …') provide evidence of the oral-formulaic mode of composition associated with Parry and Lord.

Thethi-Angika — Reader-response theory: children's literature is a vivid domain for Iser's concept of the 'implied reader'. Here that reader is a child, and the translator changes cruel scenes with the implied child in mind. Viewed through Formalism, the bujhauval riddle exemplifies Shklovsky's 'defamiliarisation': familiar things such as a betel leaf, a grinding mill and an earthen pot are made strange so that they may be seen anew. This is a remarkable meeting point between Western defamiliarisation and Indian vakrokti. In the study of folklore, the recurring words of lullabies ('nūnu … nūnu …') provide evidence of the oral-formulaic mode of composition associated with Parry and Lord.

Third Dimension: Epistemology Grounded in Navya-Nyāya

Thethi-Angika — Third Dimension: Epistemology Grounded in Navya-Nyāya

Maithili — A riddle is a game of pramāṇa, or means of knowledge. Its answer is the prameya, the object to be known, concealed beneath a covering of resemblance; recognising it requires inference prompted by analogy (upamāna), with the apprehension of vyāpti, or invariable concomitance, at its foundation. On encountering the attributes 'climbing round a tree, bearing neither fruit nor flowers', the child infers the intended object, the betel vine, from those marks. A negatively framed riddle such as 'Farai nai phūlai' is practice in inference by exclusion (vyatireki anumāna): alternatives are rejected until a decision can be made about what remains. This is a child's lesson in knowledge through absence, or anupalabdhi-pramāṇa.

Thethi-Angika — A riddle is a game of pramāṇa, or means of knowledge. Its answer is the prameya, the object to be known, concealed beneath a covering of resemblance; recognising it requires inference prompted by analogy (upamāna), with the apprehension of vyāpti, or invariable concomitance, at its foundation. On encountering the attributes 'climbing round a tree, bearing neither fruit nor flowers', the child infers the intended object, the betel vine, from those marks. A negatively framed riddle such as 'Farai nai phūlai' is practice in inference by exclusion (vyatireki anumāna): alternatives are rejected until a decision can be made about what remains. This is a child's lesson in knowledge through absence, or anupalabdhi-pramāṇa.

Maithili — Riddles and lullabies are a field of play for all three functions of language—abhidhā (denotation), lakṣaṇā (secondary signification) and vyañjanā (suggestion). The author's distinction between 'denotation and suggestion' is, in another form, an inquiry into the powers of words. Nor is that all: a riddle deliberately produces viparyaya, a mistaken cognition, and its removal generates pramā, valid cognition. In this sense, the riddle is a miniature laboratory for the khyāti debates over the nature of error. In translation, likewise, sense-for-sense rendering preserves not padārtha, the literal meaning of individual words, but tātparya, the speaker's intended meaning. This is an application of the Mīmāṃsā-Nyāya doctrine of intention, and the author reads Amarendra's translation decisions in this light.

Thethi-Angika — Riddles and lullabies are a field of play for all three functions of language—abhidhā (denotation), lakṣaṇā (secondary signification) and vyañjanā (suggestion). The author's distinction between 'denotation and suggestion' is, in another form, an inquiry into the powers of words. Nor is that all: a riddle deliberately produces viparyaya, a mistaken cognition, and its removal generates pramā, valid cognition. In this sense, the riddle is a miniature laboratory for the khyāti debates over the nature of error. In translation, likewise, sense-for-sense rendering preserves not padārtha, the literal meaning of individual words, but tātparya, the speaker's intended meaning. This is an application of the Mīmāṃsā-Nyāya doctrine of intention, and the author reads Amarendra's translation decisions in this light.

Maithili — The classical foundation for this riddle-inference is located in the discussion of vyāpti in Gaṅgeśa Upādhyāya's Tattvacintāmaṇi. There, following the examination and rejection of five preliminary accounts of pervasion—the vyāpti-pañcaka or pañcalakṣaṇī—Gaṅgeśa advances his definitive formulation, sādhyābhāvavad-avṛttitva, the non-occurrence of a reason in a locus where the probandum is absent. When solving a riddle, the child is said to grasp this concomitance without knowing the technical vocabulary: wherever the characteristic 'climbing round a tree without fruit or flowers' obtains, there is the intended betel vine. Recognising this regular, inseparable association, the child infers the sādhya from the hetu.

On this account every riddle becomes a small, folk-oriented exercise in the classical question: what constitutes vyāpti?

Thethi-Angika — The classical foundation for this riddle-inference is located in the discussion of vyāpti in Gaṅgeśa Upādhyāya's Tattvacintāmaṇi. There, following the examination and rejection of five preliminary accounts of pervasion—the vyāpti-pañcaka or pañcalakṣaṇī—Gaṅgeśa advances his definitive formulation, sādhyābhāvavad-avṛttitva, the non-occurrence of a reason in a locus where the probandum is absent. When solving a riddle, the child is said to grasp this concomitance without knowing the technical vocabulary: wherever the characteristic 'climbing round a tree without fruit or flowers' obtains, there is the intended betel vine. Recognising this regular, inseparable association, the child infers the sādhya from the hetu. On this account every riddle becomes a small, folk-oriented exercise in the classical question: what constitutes vyāpti?

Maithili — The five formulations of this vyāpti-pañcaka (here called the siṃhavyāghra-lakṣaṇa) can be examined by name in relation to riddles, because a well-made riddle avoids precisely the defects that an adequate definition of vyāpti must avoid:

Thethi-Angika — The five formulations of this vyāpti-pañcaka (here called the siṃhavyāghra-lakṣaṇa) can be examined by name in relation to riddles, because a well-made riddle avoids precisely the defects that an adequate definition of vyāpti must avoid:

Maithili — (1) Vyabhicārābhāva-lakṣaṇa: pervasion is the absence of deviation in the reason. The alleged defect is mutual dependence or self-dependence, since 'deviation' is itself defined by the absence of pervasion. (A riddle that assumes knowledge of its answer in advance suffers from circularity.) (2) Sādhyābhāvavad-avṛttitva-lakṣaṇa, in a simplified form: the reason does not occur in a locus where the probandum is absent. The alleged defect is non-establishment (aprasiddhi), because with a purely affirmative probandum, such as knowability or expressibility, its absence is nowhere established. (A riddle that offers no contrasting class leaves the child unable to determine an answer.) (3) Samānādhikaraṇya-lakṣaṇa: reason and probandum occupy the same locus. The defect is overextension (ativyāpti), since mere co-location can also hold for a deviant reason. (A riddle offering only one common attribute, such as 'green and growing', fits many possible answers and is therefore ambiguous.) (4) Sādhyavad-anya-avṛttitva-lakṣaṇa: the reason does not occur in anything other than what possesses the probandum. The difficulties involve the complexity of mutual absence (anyonyābhāva) and partial non-establishment (bhāgāsiddhi). (A good riddle excludes competing answers and points in one direction: 'no fruit, no flower, climbing round a tree' eliminates other trees and leads to the betel vine.) (5) The refined definitive formulation:

'pratiyogi-asamānādhikaraṇa-yat-samānādhikaraṇa-atyantābhāva-apratiyogi-sādhya-samānādhikaraṇyam', a refined sādhyābhāvavad-avṛttitva intended to remove the foregoing defects. (A fully determinate riddle, such as the earthen pot's autobiographical utterance, uses a cluster of features to exclude all other answers through complete absence and leave only one. It is presented here as the poetic counterpart of the definitive formulation.)

Thethi-Angika — (1) Vyabhicārābhāva-lakṣaṇa: pervasion is the absence of deviation in the reason. The alleged defect is mutual dependence or self-dependence, since 'deviation' is itself defined by the absence of pervasion. (A riddle that assumes knowledge of its answer in advance suffers from circularity.) (2) Sādhyābhāvavad-avṛttitva-lakṣaṇa, in a simplified form: the reason does not occur in a locus where the probandum is absent. The alleged defect is non-establishment (aprasiddhi), because with a purely affirmative probandum, such as knowability or expressibility, its absence is nowhere established. (A riddle that offers no contrasting class leaves the child unable to determine an answer.) (3) Samānādhikaraṇya-lakṣaṇa: reason and probandum occupy the same locus. The defect is overextension (ativyāpti), since mere co-location can also hold for a deviant reason. (A riddle offering only one common attribute, such as 'green and growing', fits many possible answers and is therefore ambiguous.) (4) Sādhyavad-anya-avṛttitva-lakṣaṇa: the reason does not occur in anything other than what possesses the probandum. The difficulties involve the complexity of mutual absence (anyonyābhāva) and partial non-establishment (bhāgāsiddhi). (A good riddle excludes competing answers and points in one direction: 'no fruit, no flower, climbing round a tree' eliminates other trees and leads to the betel vine.) (5) The refined definitive formulation: 'pratiyogi-asamānādhikaraṇa-yat-samānādhikaraṇa-atyantābhāva-apratiyogi-sādhya-samānādhikaraṇyam', a refined sādhyābhāvavad-avṛttitva intended to remove the foregoing defects. (A fully determinate riddle, such as the earthen pot's autobiographical utterance, uses a cluster of features to exclude all other answers through complete absence and leave only one. It is presented here as the poetic counterpart of the definitive formulation.)

Maithili — A rule emerges from this analogy. Just as overextension (ativyāpti) and underextension (avyāpti) invalidate an account of pervasion, ambiguity—the riddle's overextension—and unanswerability—its underextension—damage a riddle. A good riddle, like an impeccable definition of vyāpti, yields one unmistakable answer. This is the unwritten logic of the Angika riddle tradition.

Thethi-Angika — A rule emerges from this analogy. Just as overextension (ativyāpti) and underextension (avyāpti) invalidate an account of pervasion, ambiguity—the riddle's overextension—and unanswerability—its underextension—damage a riddle. A good riddle, like an impeccable definition of vyāpti, yields one unmistakable answer. This is the unwritten logic of the Angika riddle tradition.

Maithili — In the context of translation, the theory of tātparya, or intended meaning, is pertinent. Among the four conditions of verbal comprehension—ākāṅkṣā (expectancy), yogyatā (semantic compatibility), sannidhi or āsatti (proximity), and tātparya (intention)—the last, the speaker's intended purport, determines the interpretation. When the primary meaning is obstructed and the intended purport becomes inconsistent with it, lakṣaṇā, secondary signification, comes into play. Sense-for-sense translation follows this route: it sets aside the literal meaning of the words and carries the intended sense into the target language. Amarendra's child-protective adaptation is presented as a practical expression of the primacy of tātparya: it serves the intention rather than submitting to the words.

Thethi-Angika — In the context of translation, the theory of tātparya, or intended meaning, is pertinent. Among the four conditions of verbal comprehension—ākāṅkṣā (expectancy), yogyatā (semantic compatibility), sannidhi or āsatti (proximity), and tātparya (intention)—the last, the speaker's intended purport, determines the interpretation. When the primary meaning is obstructed and the intended purport becomes inconsistent with it, lakṣaṇā, secondary signification, comes into play. Sense-for-sense translation follows this route: it sets aside the literal meaning of the words and carries the intended sense into the target language. Amarendra's child-protective adaptation is presented as a practical expression of the primacy of tātparya: it serves the intention rather than submitting to the words.

Fourth Dimension: The Videha Parallel-History Framework

Thethi-Angika — Fourth Dimension: The Videha Parallel-History Framework

Maithili — A counter-canonical reading: Angika children's literature, a repository of folk, women's, Dalit and rural voices, is largely absent from the Hindi-centred institutional history associated with the Sahitya Akademi. Documenting this material is itself an act of parallel-historical recovery. Bringing women's agency into view is central to such a reading: lullabies are, in the first instance, mothers' creations, a largely hidden tradition of women's literature. In the autobiographical account, the author acknowledges the collecting work of his daughter Vasundhara. Parallel history brings that maternal authorship and women's labour to the foreground instead of allowing them to disappear into the anonymous category called 'the folk'.

Thethi-Angika — A counter-canonical reading: Angika children's literature, a repository of folk, women's, Dalit and rural voices, is largely absent from the Hindi-centred institutional history associated with the Sahitya Akademi. Documenting this material is itself an act of parallel-historical recovery. Bringing women's agency into view is central to such a reading: lullabies are, in the first instance, mothers' creations, a largely hidden tradition of women's literature. In the autobiographical account, the author acknowledges the collecting work of his daughter Vasundhara. Parallel history brings that maternal authorship and women's labour to the foreground instead of allowing them to disappear into the anonymous category called 'the folk'.

Maithili — Reclaiming colonial documentation: the translations of Christian missionaries and Grierson belonged to colonial projects of language documentation. This book takes them out of the linguist's specimen jar and returns them to living children's literature. Such reclamation is a central activity of parallel history. Yet the sharpest consequence of the method turns back upon the book itself. A work that constructs a counter-canon is written in Hindi, reaches readers through mainstream publishing, and frequently cites the author's own writings. We must therefore ask who has been left out of this survey: unnamed women folk singers, performers, and the mothers whose lullabies have remained anonymous under the label 'folk'. Parallel history questions even its own counter-canon; therein lies its intellectual integrity.

Thethi-Angika — Reclaiming colonial documentation: the translations of Christian missionaries and Grierson belonged to colonial projects of language documentation. This book takes them out of the linguist's specimen jar and returns them to living children's literature. Such reclamation is a central activity of parallel history. Yet the sharpest consequence of the method turns back upon the book itself. A work that constructs a counter-canon is written in Hindi, reaches readers through mainstream publishing, and frequently cites the author's own writings. We must therefore ask who has been left out of this survey: unnamed women folk singers, performers, and the mothers whose lullabies have remained anonymous under the label 'folk'. Parallel history questions even its own counter-canon; therein lies its intellectual integrity.

Modern Children's Poetry: A Four-Dimensional Re-reading

Thethi-Angika — Modern Children's Poetry: A Four-Dimensional Re-reading

Rasa, Dhvani and Vakrokti

Thethi-Angika — Rasa, Dhvani and Vakrokti

Maithili — Diversity of themes generates diversity of rasas: adbhuta (wonder) and śānta (tranquillity) in nature poetry, hāsya (humour) in comic songs, and vīra (heroism) together with tenderness towards the motherland in patriotic songs. Yet vātsalya remains the presiding rasa, for the other emotions are softened and offered in forms accessible to children's enjoyment. Viewed through dhvani, 'dynamic nature' is itself rich in suggestion: moving images—not stationary moons and stars but jumping crows and flowing rivers—suggest moving pictures to the child's mind. The author's acute observation that a child is more captivated by a hopping crow than by a motionless moon is, in effect, a child-psychological reworking of the theory of dhvani. The perspective of vakrokti yields a test: in patriotic and instructional songs, direct statement (abhidhā) increases as obliqueness diminishes; in humorous, satirical and dynamically imagined nature poetry, obliqueness and inventive distinctiveness survive.

Thethi-Angika — Diversity of themes generates diversity of rasas: adbhuta (wonder) and śānta (tranquillity) in nature poetry, hāsya (humour) in comic songs, and vīra (heroism) together with tenderness towards the motherland in patriotic songs. Yet vātsalya remains the presiding rasa, for the other emotions are softened and offered in forms accessible to children's enjoyment. Viewed through dhvani, 'dynamic nature' is itself rich in suggestion: moving images—not stationary moons and stars but jumping crows and flowing rivers—suggest moving pictures to the child's mind. The author's acute observation that a child is more captivated by a hopping crow than by a motionless moon is, in effect, a child-psychological reworking of the theory of dhvani. The perspective of vakrokti yields a test: in patriotic and instructional songs, direct statement (abhidhā) increases as obliqueness diminishes; in humorous, satirical and dynamically imagined nature poetry, obliqueness and inventive distinctiveness survive.

Western Literary Theory

Thethi-Angika — Western Literary Theory

Maithili — Dynamic nature poetry resonates with a child-centred empiricism compatible with Piaget: the child comes to understand the world through sensation, movement and activity. Thus the preference for movement over stasis accords with developmental psychology. Patriotic and educational songs, by contrast, exhibit pronounced didacticism. Here appears the enduring tension in children's literature between instruction and pleasure—the contrast, as drawn in the discussion, between a Rousseau-associated instructional tradition and pleasure-centred writing. Without explicitly stating it, the author inclines towards enjoyment. Comic and satirical songs, with the reversal of conventional portraits of uncles and aunts, are folk manifestations of Bakhtin's 'carnival' and role inversion: humour emerges when the ordinary social order is turned upside down. Regional poetry, meanwhile, bears witness to linguistic and local identity and offers a children's version of contemporary debates about the global and the local.

Thethi-Angika — Dynamic nature poetry resonates with a child-centred empiricism compatible with Piaget: the child comes to understand the world through sensation, movement and activity. Thus the preference for movement over stasis accords with developmental psychology. Patriotic and educational songs, by contrast, exhibit pronounced didacticism. Here appears the enduring tension in children's literature between instruction and pleasure—the contrast, as drawn in the discussion, between a Rousseau-associated instructional tradition and pleasure-centred writing. Without explicitly stating it, the author inclines towards enjoyment. Comic and satirical songs, with the reversal of conventional portraits of uncles and aunts, are folk manifestations of Bakhtin's 'carnival' and role inversion: humour emerges when the ordinary social order is turned upside down. Regional poetry, meanwhile, bears witness to linguistic and local identity and offers a children's version of contemporary debates about the global and the local.

Epistemology Grounded in Navya-Nyāya

Thethi-Angika — Epistemology Grounded in Navya-Nyāya

Maithili — Counting songs—the akkar-bakkar enumeration in 'Lālac roṅ phol', for example—directly teach the perception of numbers and inferences involved in counting. They are a children's version of training in the means of knowledge. In patriotic songs the message arrives directly through abhidhā. The predominance of literal denotation and the relative weakness of suggestion diminish their poetic quality, in keeping with the author's awareness of the shortcomings of excessive literalism. Dynamic images of nature enable the child to recognise an entity through its attribute of motion. This elementary awareness of the relationship between an attribute and its bearer, and of an action and its locus, contains the seeds of Navya-Nyāya's analysis of qualifier and qualified.

Thethi-Angika — Counting songs—the akkar-bakkar enumeration in 'Lālac roṅ phol', for example—directly teach the perception of numbers and inferences involved in counting. They are a children's version of training in the means of knowledge. In patriotic songs the message arrives directly through abhidhā. The predominance of literal denotation and the relative weakness of suggestion diminish their poetic quality, in keeping with the author's awareness of the shortcomings of excessive literalism. Dynamic images of nature enable the child to recognise an entity through its attribute of motion. This elementary awareness of the relationship between an attribute and its bearer, and of an action and its locus, contains the seeds of Navya-Nyāya's analysis of qualifier and qualified.

The Videha Parallel-History Framework

Thethi-Angika — The Videha Parallel-History Framework

Maithili — Poetry rooted in regional surroundings is a counter-canonical affirmation of Anga identity, a voice of regional linguistic pride resisting the dominance of Hindi as the national language. Yet it reveals a two-sided contradiction. Patriotic songs about Mother India and the tricolour reproduce mainstream nationalism: Angika relinquishes its counter-canonical voice and begins to sing in the centre's idiom. On one side stands regional self-affirmation; on the other, self-effacement within the nation. Parallel history attends to this duality. School songs, such as 'Iskūl cal' and poems about Hindi- and English-medium schools, expose the politics of language and class: aspiration for English schooling exists alongside anxiety for the mother tongue. Such songs are invaluable childhood documents of the educational dilemmas of subaltern communities.

Thethi-Angika — Poetry rooted in regional surroundings is a counter-canonical affirmation of Anga identity, a voice of regional linguistic pride resisting the dominance of Hindi as the national language. Yet it reveals a two-sided contradiction. Patriotic songs about Mother India and the tricolour reproduce mainstream nationalism: Angika relinquishes its counter-canonical voice and begins to sing in the centre's idiom. On one side stands regional self-affirmation; on the other, self-effacement within the nation. Parallel history attends to this duality. School songs, such as 'Iskūl cal' and poems about Hindi- and English-medium schools, expose the politics of language and class: aspiration for English schooling exists alongside anxiety for the mother tongue. Such songs are invaluable childhood documents of the educational dilemmas of subaltern communities.

Convergence: The Meeting of All Four Dimensions

Thethi-Angika — Convergence: The Meeting of All Four Dimensions

Maithili — The four approaches meet at a single point. The riddle's vakrokti (Indian poetics), defamiliarisation (Western theory), valid cognition achieved through the removal of error (Navya-Nyāya), and the recovery of folk authorship (parallel history) express one truth in four critical languages: making the familiar unfamiliar can transform the instant of understanding into delight, and the creators of that delight belong to the unnamed people whom history has forgotten. This is the heart of Angika children's literature and, in part, both the achievement and the omission of this book. In modern children's poetry, the same convergence reveals a further dividing line. Where poetry becomes regional, dynamic and humorous, vakrokti, defamiliarisation, suggestion and the counter-canon all remain vital; where it leans towards nationalist instruction, all four lose some of their force. That is the internal criterion proposed here for evaluating modern Angika children's poetry.

Thethi-Angika — The four approaches meet at a single point. The riddle's vakrokti (Indian poetics), defamiliarisation (Western theory), valid cognition achieved through the removal of error (Navya-Nyāya), and the recovery of folk authorship (parallel history) express one truth in four critical languages: making the familiar unfamiliar can transform the instant of understanding into delight, and the creators of that delight belong to the unnamed people whom history has forgotten. This is the heart of Angika children's literature and, in part, both the achievement and the omission of this book. In modern children's poetry, the same convergence reveals a further dividing line. Where poetry becomes regional, dynamic and humorous, vakrokti, defamiliarisation, suggestion and the counter-canon all remain vital; where it leans towards nationalist instruction, all four lose some of their force. That is the internal criterion proposed here for evaluating modern Angika children's poetry.

22. Social, Gender and Readership Questions: Critical Territory Beyond the Book

Thethi-Angika: 22. Social, Gender and Readership Questions: Critical Territory Beyond the Book

Maithili — The book touches upon family, the mother–child relationship, rural society, schools, girls' education, superstition, administration, the environment, health and related subjects. On the basis of this material, contemporary criticism can pose further questions. There is no single, uniform experience of childhood: age, gender, class, caste, rural or urban setting, access to school, family structure, disability and linguistic mixture all alter a child's experience. The book does not organise these dimensions into a systematic analytical framework; nevertheless, much of its material makes such an approach possible.

Thethi-Angika — The book touches upon family, the mother–child relationship, rural society, schools, girls' education, superstition, administration, the environment, health and related subjects. On the basis of this material, contemporary criticism can pose further questions. There is no single, uniform experience of childhood: age, gender, class, caste, rural or urban setting, access to school, family structure, disability and linguistic mixture all alter a child's experience. The book does not organise these dimensions into a systematic analytical framework; nevertheless, much of its material makes such an approach possible.

Maithili — Girls' education becomes a social issue in the plays; the maternal voice stands at the centre of children's oral literature; and rural settings underlie many songs, stories and plays. Future research might ask: How is the agency of girls represented? To what extent do working children, poor households, different social communities and urban children appear? What is the balance between the morally exemplary child and the actually mischievous or obstinate child-character? Do children speak in their own voices, or does an adult narrator speak on their behalf?

Thethi-Angika — Girls' education becomes a social issue in the plays; the maternal voice stands at the centre of children's oral literature; and rural settings underlie many songs, stories and plays. Future research might ask: How is the agency of girls represented? To what extent do working children, poor households, different social communities and urban children appear? What is the balance between the morally exemplary child and the actually mischievous or obstinate child-character? Do children speak in their own voices, or does an adult narrator speak on their behalf?

Maithili — The absence of readership research is equally significant. The book often describes a reader's likely response on the basis of the critic's supposition. Future empirical studies—school reading sessions, collective reading, children's responses, preferences and memories, their reactions to illustrations, and the difference between audio and print—could provide literary criticism with new evidence. The purpose is not to diminish the book by measuring it against contemporary theories; it is to make the materials gathered in the book the basis of new research questions. In that sense it is a foundational work.

Thethi-Angika — The absence of readership research is equally significant. The book often describes a reader's likely response on the basis of the critic's supposition. Future empirical studies—school reading sessions, collective reading, children's responses, preferences and memories, their reactions to illustrations, and the difference between audio and print—could provide literary criticism with new evidence. The purpose is not to diminish the book by measuring it against contemporary theories; it is to make the materials gathered in the book the basis of new research questions. In that sense it is a foundational work.

23. Principal Achievements: Preservation, the Construction of History and a Map of Genres

Thethi-Angika: 23. Principal Achievements: Preservation, the Construction of History and a Map of Genres

Maithili — The first great achievement of the book, considered as a whole, is preservation. Lullabies, riddles, tuktak rhymes, play-songs, folktales, translations, children's songs, novels, stories, plays, essays and biographies have been brought beneath one critical umbrella. Materials scattered through little magazines, limited editions, oral traditions and private recollections have entered the historical record by name. Without such documentation, later generations of critics might have been deprived of many of these sources.

Thethi-Angika — The first great achievement of the book, considered as a whole, is preservation. Lullabies, riddles, tuktak rhymes, play-songs, folktales, translations, children's songs, novels, stories, plays, essays and biographies have been brought beneath one critical umbrella. Materials scattered through little magazines, limited editions, oral traditions and private recollections have entered the historical record by name. Without such documentation, later generations of critics might have been deprived of many of these sources.

Maithili — Its second achievement is the writing of history. The author does not begin children's literature with modern printing; he traces it back to the culture of infants and folk communities. The third achievement is the child-centred criterion. Literature is not simply a vehicle for teaching children: it expresses their imagination, games, reasoning, stubbornness, rhythms and experience. The fourth achievement is a map of genres—riddles, tuktak rhymes, play-songs, ghazals and narrative poems in cantos; novels, stories and translations; one-act plays, short verse plays and radio or musical drama; and history and biography.

Thethi-Angika — Its second achievement is the writing of history. The author does not begin children's literature with modern printing; he traces it back to the culture of infants and folk communities. The third achievement is the child-centred criterion. Literature is not simply a vehicle for teaching children: it expresses their imagination, games, reasoning, stubbornness, rhythms and experience. The fourth achievement is a map of genres—riddles, tuktak rhymes, play-songs, ghazals and narrative poems in cantos; novels, stories and translations; one-act plays, short verse plays and radio or musical drama; and history and biography.

Maithili — The fifth achievement is self-criticism. Acknowledging the inadequate development of children's stories, accepting gaps in certain areas and pointing out missing sources enhance the historian's credibility. The sixth is bibliographical memory. The concluding lists of references and periodicals transform the book into an institutional memory. For this reason, Angika Bal-Sahitya is not merely a work of literary criticism; it is also a research instrument.

Thethi-Angika — The fifth achievement is self-criticism. Acknowledging the inadequate development of children's stories, accepting gaps in certain areas and pointing out missing sources enhance the historian's credibility. The sixth is bibliographical memory. The concluding lists of references and periodicals transform the book into an institutional memory. For this reason, Angika Bal-Sahitya is not merely a work of literary criticism; it is also a research instrument.

Merits

Thethi-Angika: Merits

Maithili — The book's foremost achievement is the systematic documentation of a neglected and dispersed tradition. Gathering material scattered here and there, classifying it and presenting it with references is itself an act of scholarship. A second strength lies in the author's dual position: he is himself an important creator of Angika children's songs, and consequently his interpretation possesses an insider's understanding seldom available to an outside critic. Third, the attention to child psychology and a poetics centred upon suggestion lifts the work above a mere catalogue or anthology.

Thethi-Angika — The book's foremost achievement is the systematic documentation of a neglected and dispersed tradition. Gathering material scattered here and there, classifying it and presenting it with references is itself an act of scholarship. A second strength lies in the author's dual position: he is himself an important creator of Angika children's songs, and consequently his interpretation possesses an insider's understanding seldom available to an outside critic. Third, the attention to child psychology and a poetics centred upon suggestion lifts the work above a mere catalogue or anthology.

Overall Evaluation and Literary Significance

Thethi-Angika: Overall Evaluation and Literary Significance

Maithili — Dr Amarendra's Angika Bal-Sahitya is no ordinary book. It is an epoch-making work of scholarship which establishes Angika as a language possessing a rich literary culture. Viewed from the standpoint of a Maithili critic, it makes one aware that the roots of children's literature in Maithili and Angika are alike. The fragrance of the earth that pervades their folktales, lullabies and riddles is the same.

Thethi-Angika — Dr Amarendra's Angika Bal-Sahitya is no ordinary book. It is an epoch-making work of scholarship which establishes Angika as a language possessing a rich literary culture. Viewed from the standpoint of a Maithili critic, it makes one aware that the roots of children's literature in Maithili and Angika are alike. The fragrance of the earth that pervades their folktales, lullabies and riddles is the same.

Maithili — The book's principal achievements are as follows. (1) Historical documentation: by collecting lullabies, riddles and play-songs disappearing from oral tradition, Dr Amarendra has preserved an invaluable portion of Angika's cultural heritage. (2) Psychological analysis: the work does not merely collect children's literature; the author's examination of its scientific and psychological effects gives it the standing of a research monograph. His perception is remarkably acute, ranging from Karl Groos's theory of play to the phonetic principles of poetry for infants. (3) Breadth and variety: its inclusion of subjects ranging from folktales to modern science, the 'Missile Man' Kalam, ghazals, radar, the environment and flood management is offered as evidence that Angika children's literature is keeping pace with world literature. (4) Linguistic authenticity and fluency: the passages quoted by the author preserve the native Thethi–Desil character of Angika. Whether in the tale Teṅgṭā or in the dialogue of the novel Baṇṭā, the language retains its sweetness and regional vitality.

Thethi-Angika — The book's principal achievements are as follows. (1) Historical documentation: by collecting lullabies, riddles and play-songs disappearing from oral tradition, Dr Amarendra has preserved an invaluable portion of Angika's cultural heritage. (2) Psychological analysis: the work does not merely collect children's literature; the author's examination of its scientific and psychological effects gives it the standing of a research monograph. His perception is remarkably acute, ranging from Karl Groos's theory of play to the phonetic principles of poetry for infants. (3) Breadth and variety: its inclusion of subjects ranging from folktales to modern science, the 'Missile Man' Kalam, ghazals, radar, the environment and flood management is offered as evidence that Angika children's literature is keeping pace with world literature. (4) Linguistic authenticity and fluency: the passages quoted by the author preserve the native Thethi–Desil character of Angika. Whether in the tale Teṅgṭā or in the dialogue of the novel Baṇṭā, the language retains its sweetness and regional vitality.

24. Limitations: The Dominance of Lists, Uneven Close Reading, Referencing and Selection

Thethi-Angika: 24. Limitations: The Dominance of Lists, Uneven Close Reading, Referencing and Selection

Maithili — To recognise the importance of the work is also to state its limitations plainly. The first is structural repetition, linked to its history as a collection of essays. Similar ideas recur in different sections; the sequence sometimes changes abruptly; and in places the lists outweigh the criticism.

Thethi-Angika — To recognise the importance of the work is also to state its limitations plainly. The first is structural repetition, linked to its history as a collection of essays. Similar ideas recur in different sections; the sequence sometimes changes abruptly; and in places the lists outweigh the criticism.

Maithili — The second limitation is the uneven depth of close reading. The section on the plays collected in Pañcagavya pays sufficient critical attention to characters, dialogue, satire and social settings, but many songs and stories receive no more than an illustrative quotation or brief comment. Comparative conclusions would be firmer if every genre were examined through the same set of questions: theme, language, rhythm or plot, the child's perspective, age-appropriateness, craftsmanship and social meaning.

Thethi-Angika — The second limitation is the uneven depth of close reading. The section on the plays collected in Pañcagavya pays sufficient critical attention to characters, dialogue, satire and social settings, but many songs and stories receive no more than an illustrative quotation or brief comment. Comparative conclusions would be firmer if every genre were examined through the same set of questions: theme, language, rhythm or plot, the child's perspective, age-appropriateness, craftsmanship and social meaning.

Maithili — The third limitation is bibliographical standardisation. The abundance of sources on pages 112–114 is valuable, but full publication years, editions, page numbers, places of publication, ISBNs and the roles of editors or translators are not recorded consistently. A fourth possible limitation is an author-centred corpus. External sources confirm the considerable extent of Amarendra's actual contribution; nonetheless, an independent literary history must accord comparable coverage to other poets and storytellers.

Thethi-Angika — The third limitation is bibliographical standardisation. The abundance of sources on pages 112–114 is valuable, but full publication years, editions, page numbers, places of publication, ISBNs and the roles of editors or translators are not recorded consistently. A fourth possible limitation is an author-centred corpus. External sources confirm the considerable extent of Amarendra's actual contribution; nonetheless, an independent literary history must accord comparable coverage to other poets and storytellers.

Maithili — The fifth limitation is the lack of performance metadata for oral materials. The words of songs are preserved, but melodies, rhythms, performers, places, dates and procedures of play have not been systematically recorded. Sixth is the absence of reader research. Conclusions concerning suitability for children rest largely on the critic's experience, without direct responses from child readers or readership data. These shortcomings do not diminish the book's historical significance; instead, they outline a programme for future research.

Thethi-Angika — The fifth limitation is the lack of performance metadata for oral materials. The words of songs are preserved, but melodies, rhythms, performers, places, dates and procedures of play have not been systematically recorded. Sixth is the absence of reader research. Conclusions concerning suitability for children rest largely on the critic's experience, without direct responses from child readers or readership data. These shortcomings do not diminish the book's historical significance; instead, they outline a programme for future research.

Limitations

Thethi-Angika: Limitations

Maithili — Critical integrity requires several limits to be acknowledged. The first, and perhaps most telling, contradiction is that a book entitled Angika Bal-Sahitya, devoted to Angika, is itself written in Hindi: its language of criticism is Hindi, while Angika appears only in quotations. The fact that the literature of a language is advocated without being discussed in that language raises a methodological question. Second, the list of 'references' is heavily populated by the author's own collections of children's songs, somewhat blurring the distinction between source material and critical distance. Third, the author himself recognises that this is a collection of essays; accordingly, descriptive enumeration sometimes takes the place of sustained analysis.

Thethi-Angika — Critical integrity requires several limits to be acknowledged. The first, and perhaps most telling, contradiction is that a book entitled Angika Bal-Sahitya, devoted to Angika, is itself written in Hindi: its language of criticism is Hindi, while Angika appears only in quotations. The fact that the literature of a language is advocated without being discussed in that language raises a methodological question. Second, the list of 'references' is heavily populated by the author's own collections of children's songs, somewhat blurring the distinction between source material and critical distance. Third, the author himself recognises that this is a collection of essays; accordingly, descriptive enumeration sometimes takes the place of sustained analysis.

Maithili — A further word about these limitations: the book is complete on its own terms, but the duty of criticism is to consider it from an overall perspective. The author acknowledges the severe shortage of children's stories and children's magazines in Angika. Apart from the collection Angika Bāl-Kahānī, no substantial narrative tradition has yet developed. Children's fiction still awaits the kinds of experiment in the use of folklore that Phanishwar Nath 'Renu' achieved in his writing. The closure for want of money of a children's magazine such as Ajolā Bahin is a matter of concern for Angika children's literature.

Thethi-Angika — A further word about these limitations: the book is complete on its own terms, but the duty of criticism is to consider it from an overall perspective. The author acknowledges the severe shortage of children's stories and children's magazines in Angika. Apart from the collection Angika Bāl-Kahānī, no substantial narrative tradition has yet developed. Children's fiction still awaits the kinds of experiment in the use of folklore that Phanishwar Nath 'Renu' achieved in his writing. The closure for want of money of a children's magazine such as Ajolā Bahin is a matter of concern for Angika children's literature.

25. Concrete Editorial Proposals for a Future Edition

Thethi-Angika: 25. Concrete Editorial Proposals for a Future Edition

Maithili — Should an expanded critical edition of Angika Bal-Sahitya be prepared, several structural improvements could turn it into a standard reference work without removing the original material. First, retain the present two-part arrangement, pages 8–42 and 43–112, but number its subchapters: lullabies, riddles, tuktak rhymes, play-songs, folktales, translation, novels, songs and poems, ghazals and narrative poems in cantos, stories, plays, essays and biographies.

Thethi-Angika — Should an expanded critical edition of Angika Bal-Sahitya be prepared, several structural improvements could turn it into a standard reference work without removing the original material. First, retain the present two-part arrangement, pages 8–42 and 43–112, but number its subchapters: lullabies, riddles, tuktak rhymes, play-songs, folktales, translation, novels, songs and poems, ghazals and narrative poems in cantos, stories, plays, essays and biographies.

Maithili — Second, give each chapter a definition and criteria of evaluation at the beginning and a brief conclusion at the end. Third, include a chronological appendix identifying the work, author, year, genre and publisher. Fourth, standardise the bibliography of more than fifty-two sources and record publication places, editors and available years in the list of periodicals. Fifth, provide author and title indexes. Sixth, document field metadata for oral materials: collector, narrator or singer, place, date, occasion and variant.

Thethi-Angika — Second, give each chapter a definition and criteria of evaluation at the beginning and a brief conclusion at the end. Third, include a chronological appendix identifying the work, author, year, genre and publisher. Fourth, standardise the bibliography of more than fifty-two sources and record publication places, editors and available years in the list of periodicals. Fifth, provide author and title indexes. Sixth, document field metadata for oral materials: collector, narrator or singer, place, date, occasion and variant.

Maithili — Seventh, include close readings of representative works. Eighth, compare source and target texts in the chapter on translation. Ninth, specify age groups: infancy, early childhood, middle childhood and adolescence. Tenth, supply illustrations, audio QR codes or links to a digital archive, especially for lullabies, play-songs and drama. Eleventh, survey real child readers' responses and school use. Twelfth, follow a consistent biographical format for writers. Thirteenth, provide a complete Angika edition alongside the Hindi critical text, so that Angika can develop its own language of criticism. These proposals do not seek to replace the present book; they indicate how its existing materials can be used more systematically and scientifically.

Thethi-Angika — Seventh, include close readings of representative works. Eighth, compare source and target texts in the chapter on translation. Ninth, specify age groups: infancy, early childhood, middle childhood and adolescence. Tenth, supply illustrations, audio QR codes or links to a digital archive, especially for lullabies, play-songs and drama. Eleventh, survey real child readers' responses and school use. Twelfth, follow a consistent biographical format for writers. Thirteenth, provide a complete Angika edition alongside the Hindi critical text, so that Angika can develop its own language of criticism. These proposals do not seek to replace the present book; they indicate how its existing materials can be used more systematically and scientifically.

26. Overall Assessment: Its Place as a Foundational Work

Thethi-Angika: 26. Overall Assessment: Its Place as a Foundational Work

Maithili — The greatest accomplishment of Angika Bal-Sahitya is its work of preservation and historical reconstruction. Much of the material might otherwise have remained scattered through oral performance, small periodicals, limited-edition books, translations, private collections or literary memory. Bringing these sources under one critical umbrella is a significant undertaking. Consequently, the book is more than Dr Amarendra's individual work of criticism: it acquires the potential to become an institutional memory of Angika children's literature.

Thethi-Angika — The greatest accomplishment of Angika Bal-Sahitya is its work of preservation and historical reconstruction. Much of the material might otherwise have remained scattered through oral performance, small periodicals, limited-edition books, translations, private collections or literary memory. Bringing these sources under one critical umbrella is a significant undertaking. Consequently, the book is more than Dr Amarendra's individual work of criticism: it acquires the potential to become an institutional memory of Angika children's literature.

Maithili — Its second significance is the argument that the vitality of children's literature comes from the child's own world—from rhythm, play, imagination, curiosity, humour, nature, family, friends, questions and experience. Literature is not merely a means of instruction handed down to children from above; it is the art of seeing the world from their perspective. Although the later sections of the book place strong emphasis on instruction, its fundamental child-centred criterion supplies a critical basis for the entire study.

Thethi-Angika — Its second significance is the argument that the vitality of children's literature comes from the child's own world—from rhythm, play, imagination, curiosity, humour, nature, family, friends, questions and experience. Literature is not merely a means of instruction handed down to children from above; it is the art of seeing the world from their perspective. Although the later sections of the book place strong emphasis on instruction, its fundamental child-centred criterion supplies a critical basis for the entire study.

Maithili — Third, rather than treating folk tradition and modernity as opposites, the book reveals a relationship of transformation: the rhythms of lullabies in modern songs; the narrative resources of folklore in contemporary stories and plays; oral humour and dialogue on the modern children's stage; and the familiar natural world converted into environmental consciousness. This continuity is the work's underlying historical vision. Fourth, close reading makes an important reassessment of children's drama. Pages 98–109 present it as a significant field for the dramatic treatment of modern social problems, science, education, the environment, health, dialogue and performance.

Thethi-Angika — Third, rather than treating folk tradition and modernity as opposites, the book reveals a relationship of transformation: the rhythms of lullabies in modern songs; the narrative resources of folklore in contemporary stories and plays; oral humour and dialogue on the modern children's stage; and the familiar natural world converted into environmental consciousness. This continuity is the work's underlying historical vision. Fourth, close reading makes an important reassessment of children's drama. Pages 98–109 present it as a significant field for the dramatic treatment of modern social problems, science, education, the environment, health, dialogue and performance.

Maithili — Available external sources provide substantial corroboration of the original book's main publication details and the existence of the works discussed. Bharatavani lists the original as a work of children's literature published in 2022; the Amarendra-centred studies and collected children's songs published in 2021 indicate an active critical publishing milieu. Supporting sources such as Angika.com, Kavita Kosh and Gadya Kosh offer evidence of the digital or literary presence of major works.

Thethi-Angika — Available external sources provide substantial corroboration of the original book's main publication details and the existence of the works discussed. Bharatavani lists the original as a work of children's literature published in 2022; the Amarendra-centred studies and collected children's songs published in 2021 indicate an active critical publishing milieu. Supporting sources such as Angika.com, Kavita Kosh and Gadya Kosh offer evidence of the digital or literary presence of major works.

Maithili — The limitations are real: repetitions inherent in compilation, the dominance of lists, uneven close reading, bibliographical inconsistencies, the possibility of author-centred selection, and the absence of performance data and reader-response studies. Yet they do not make the book irrelevant. They show where the next phase of research should begin.

Thethi-Angika — The limitations are real: repetitions inherent in compilation, the dominance of lists, uneven close reading, bibliographical inconsistencies, the possibility of author-centred selection, and the absence of performance data and reader-response studies. Yet they do not make the book irrelevant. They show where the next phase of research should begin.

Maithili — Ultimately, to describe Angika Bal-Sahitya merely as an introduction to writings for children would diminish its importance. It stands at the intersection of folk memory, linguistic identity, the child's world, literary modernity, translation, the expansion of genres and documentation. Its finest passages reveal a cultural continuity from lullabies to modern poetry, play to drama, and folktales to environmental or scientific narratives. It is not a closed or definitive literary history: it is a foundational work for an extensive history of Angika children's literature, textual criticism, performance archives, translation studies and research into children as readers.

Thethi-Angika — Ultimately, to describe Angika Bal-Sahitya merely as an introduction to writings for children would diminish its importance. It stands at the intersection of folk memory, linguistic identity, the child's world, literary modernity, translation, the expansion of genres and documentation. Its finest passages reveal a cultural continuity from lullabies to modern poetry, play to drama, and folktales to environmental or scientific narratives. It is not a closed or definitive literary history: it is a foundational work for an extensive history of Angika children's literature, textual criticism, performance archives, translation studies and research into children as readers.

Maithili — In this sense, children's literature is no minor corner of a linguistic tradition. When children play, sing, listen to stories, ask questions, read and perform in their mother tongue, that language does not merely survive into the next generation: it is recreated in new forms. The enduring literary message of Dr Amarendra's book lies in this profound insight.

Thethi-Angika — In this sense, children's literature is no minor corner of a linguistic tradition. When children play, sing, listen to stories, ask questions, read and perform in their mother tongue, that language does not merely survive into the next generation: it is recreated in new forms. The enduring literary message of Dr Amarendra's book lies in this profound insight.

Editorial Judgement (Conclusion)

Thethi-Angika: Editorial Judgement (Conclusion)

Maithili — Despite all this, the book succeeds in its stated purpose: opening a path for further writing about Angika children's literature. Its lasting worth lies less in novelty of interpretation than in the reliability of its documentation. In particular, the first chapter's folk material—lullabies, oil-massage songs, step-songs and riddles—is a dependable resource for future scholars. With characteristic modesty, Dr Amarendra has called his work a beginning rather than the final word, and the critic's judgement points in the same direction. It is a foundation stone, not the pinnacle, of the house of criticism devoted to Angika children's literature. The virtue of a sound foundation is its ability to support the possibility of much being built above it. Viewed through the Videha perspective, the book marks an initial step towards recovering Angika children's literature from the status of a linguist's specimen and restoring it as a living tradition. Carrying that work forward is now the responsibility of the community of critics.

Thethi-Angika — Despite all this, the book succeeds in its stated purpose: opening a path for further writing about Angika children's literature. Its lasting worth lies less in novelty of interpretation than in the reliability of its documentation. In particular, the first chapter's folk material—lullabies, oil-massage songs, step-songs and riddles—is a dependable resource for future scholars. With characteristic modesty, Dr Amarendra has called his work a beginning rather than the final word, and the critic's judgement points in the same direction. It is a foundation stone, not the pinnacle, of the house of criticism devoted to Angika children's literature. The virtue of a sound foundation is its ability to support the possibility of much being built above it. Viewed through the Videha perspective, the book marks an initial step towards recovering Angika children's literature from the status of a linguist's specimen and restoring it as a living tradition. Carrying that work forward is now the responsibility of the community of critics.

Conclusion

Thethi-Angika: Conclusion

Maithili — In the final analysis, Dr Amarendra's Angika Bal-Sahitya is a milestone for Angika and the wider Bihari literary tradition. An unfortunate tendency in academic life has been to consign children's literature to an inferior place on the margins of literature; this research-based book challenges that misconception. It demonstrates that children's literature is a 'factory' for the reconstruction of society.

Thethi-Angika — In the final analysis, Dr Amarendra's Angika Bal-Sahitya is a milestone for Angika and the wider Bihari literary tradition. An unfortunate tendency in academic life has been to consign children's literature to an inferior place on the margins of literature; this research-based book challenges that misconception. It demonstrates that children's literature is a 'factory' for the reconstruction of society.

Maithili — Maithili literature, too, needs to draw inspiration from this movement in Angika children's literature. The message conveyed by the book—linguistic integrity, scientific preservation of folk traditions and advancing alongside modernity—is exemplary for writers in all regional languages. Dr Amarendra's immense undertaking deserves a distinguished place in the history of Angika literature, and the volume will continue to guide researchers, writers and educationists as a foundational reference.

Thethi-Angika — Maithili literature, too, needs to draw inspiration from this movement in Angika children's literature. The message conveyed by the book—linguistic integrity, scientific preservation of folk traditions and advancing alongside modernity—is exemplary for writers in all regional languages. Dr Amarendra's immense undertaking deserves a distinguished place in the history of Angika literature, and the volume will continue to guide researchers, writers and educationists as a foundational reference.

27. Concise Summary of the Overall Conclusion

Thethi-Angika: 27. Concise Summary of the Overall Conclusion

Maithili — Reading the entire book shows that, from its preliminary publication details and autobiographical statements to its lists of reference works and periodicals, its range of subjects provides a map of a whole field of children's literature. The principal subgenres of the folk-literature section are lullabies and infant songs, riddles, tuktak rhymes, play-songs, folktales and narratives shared across languages. The modern section covers translated children's tales, children's novels, songs and poems, writings on nature, the environment and knowledge, ghazals and narrative poems in cantos, children's stories, one-act plays and other drama for children, and essays, history and biography.

Thethi-Angika — A rereading of all 114 pages shows that the book's range of subjects, from preliminary publication data and autobiographical statements to its reference and periodical lists, maps an entire field of children's literature. The folk section chiefly embraces lullabies and infant songs, riddles, tuktak rhymes, play-songs, folktales and narratives shared between languages. Its modern section covers translated children's stories, children's novels, songs and poems, writing on nature, the environment and knowledge, ghazals and narrative poems in cantos, children's stories, one-act plays and children's drama, and essays, history and biography.

Maithili — The principal lines of argument developed across this study—cultural genealogy, the compilation of materials, the child's mind, documentation, links between folk culture and modernity, translation, the richness of poetry, the relative scarcity of children's stories, drama and other genres, language, achievements, limits and the book's value as a foundation—have been preserved in this essay. Special attention has been devoted to reassessing children's drama; analysing the bibliography and periodical world on pages 112–114 as an archive; considering the author's dual role as writer and historian; checking publication information against external sources; comparing theories of child-appropriateness, oral tradition and socialisation; and proposing future work on performance archives, reader response and standardised bibliography.

Thethi-Angika — The principal lines of argument developed across this study—cultural genealogy, the compilation of materials, the child's mind, documentation, links between folk culture and modernity, translation, the richness of poetry, the relative scarcity of children's stories, drama and other genres, language, achievements, limits and the book's value as a foundation—have been preserved in this essay. Special attention has been devoted to reassessing children's drama; analysing the bibliography and periodical world on pages 112–114 as an archive; considering the author's dual role as writer and historian; checking publication information against external sources; comparing theories of child-appropriateness, oral tradition and socialisation; and proposing future work on performance archives, reader response and standardised bibliography.

Detailed Bibliography

This bibliography includes only books, treatises, dictionaries, collections and literary works issued in book form. Where the material under review does not clearly supply a publication year or publisher, no conjectural information has been added.

A. The Book under Review and Dr Amarendra's Works for Children

1. Amarendra, Dr — Angika Bal-Sahitya. Samiksha Prakashan, Muzaffarpur/Delhi; first edition, 2022. The principal book examined in this review. 112 pages. Price: two hundred rupees.

2. Abhinandan (ed.) — Dr Amarendra Granthavali, Volume 1: Angika Balgeet Samagra. Samiksha Prakashan, Muzaffarpur, 2021. A consolidated book-form collection of Dr Amarendra's writing of children's songs.

3. Rani, Shweta — Dr Amarendra ka Angika Bal Sahitya. Samiksha Prakashan, Muzaffarpur, 2021. A critical study devoted to Dr Amarendra's Angika children's literature.

4. Amarendra, Dr — Dhol Bajai Chhai Dhammak Dham. A collection of children's songs. The material under review does not clearly provide its year of publication or publisher.

5. Amarendra, Dr — Butru Ke Tutru. A collection of children's songs. The material under review does not clearly provide its year of publication or publisher.

6. Amarendra, Dr — Bajai Been Bajavai Teen. A collection of children's songs. The material under review does not clearly provide its year of publication or publisher.

7. Amarendra, Dr — Ek Chhari Par Anda Nachai. A book concerned with children's riddles, games and linguistic curiosity. Publication details are not supplied in the material under review.

8. Amarendra, Dr — Tuktak-Muktak. A collection of sound-centred poems for infants and younger children. Publication details are not available in the material under review.

9. Amarendra, Dr — Banta. An Angika novel for children, centred on an extended narrative world of schools, teachers, the child's mind, social circumstances and the environment. Publication details are not clearly given in the material under review.

10. Amarendra, Dr — Angika Katha-Sarovar. 2006. A book associated with Sanskrit-derived narratives, the Panchatantra–Jataka tradition and adaptations suitable for children. The publisher is not clearly identified in the material under review.

11. Amarendra, Dr — Ghatotkacha. A narrative poem for children in three cantos, based on the Vana Parva of the Mahabharata. Publication details are not clearly given in the material under review.

12. Amarendra, Dr — Panchamrit. A collection of five verse plays for children, including Chokar Ke Halua, Atithi Seva, Atmasamarpan, Vishakha and Buddham Sharanam Gachchhami. Publication details are not clearly supplied in the material under review.

13. Amarendra, Dr — Panchagavya. A collection of five one-act plays for children, addressing social realities, resistance to superstition, education and adolescent awareness. Publication details are not clearly supplied in the material under review.

14. Amarendra, Dr (translator) — Jangal Rong Pahchan. An Angika adaptation of an Urdu children's novel. The original author, publication year and publisher are not clearly identified in the material under review.

15. Amarendra, Dr (translator) — Shikar Aro Shikari. An Angika adaptation of an Urdu children's novel; an example of adaptation for child suitability and environmental awareness. The original author and publication details are not clearly identified in the material under review.

16. Amarendra, Dr (translator) — Faisal Rong Jasusi. An Angika adaptation of an Urdu children's novel. The original author and publication details are not clearly identified in the material under review.

B. Angika Folklore, Literary History and Supporting Works

17. Gautam, Dr Suresh; Gautam, Dr Veena (eds) — Bharatiya Bal-Loksahitya Kosh. An edited encyclopaedic work concerning children's oral traditions in various Indian languages. The prior publication of some essays by Dr Amarendra is connected with this collection. Complete publication details are not available in the material under review.

18. Gautam, Dr Suresh; Gautam, Dr Veena (eds) — Bharatiya Lori-Sahitya Kosh. An edited encyclopaedic collection on Indian lullaby traditions. The material under review does not supply full publication details.

19. Jagpriya, Chandraprakash (ed.) — Angika Lokokti, Phekra Aro Bujhauval. A collection of Angika proverbs, proverbial expressions and riddles; an important source for the book's discussion of riddles. Publication details are not clearly supplied in the material under review.

20. Tiwari, Meena (ed.) — Chalo Khissa Ke Gaon. A collection of Angika folktales. The material under review does not clearly provide its year of publication or publisher.

21. Bhatt, Vanchha Anjan — Phuljhamar. A collection of Angika folktales. The material under review does not clearly provide its year of publication or publisher.

22. Kumari, Dr Shobha — Angika Sahitya ka Itihas. A historical study of the literary development and traditions of the Angika language. Publication details are not clearly given in the material under review.

23. Grierson, George Abraham — Linguistic Survey of India. A source for the classification of Angika/Chhika-Chhiki within the linguistic survey project published from 1903 onwards. The title is given in its Maithili form in the source bibliography.

24. The Siddhacharyas — Charyapada. An early collection of verses from the Buddhist Siddha tradition, cited in discussions of the emerging linguistic and literary traditions of eastern India, including Angika and Maithili.

C. Foundational Works of Indian Poetics and Epistemology

25. Anandavardhana — Dhvanyaloka. A foundational Sanskrit treatise on dhvani, suggestion and poetic meaning; the theoretical basis in this essay for analysing the sound patterns and suggestive meanings of children's songs and riddles.

26. Kuntaka — Vakroktijivita. A foundational Sanskrit treatise on oblique expression, the arrangement of phonemes, and expressiveness at the levels of word, sentence, episode and whole composition; used here to analyse the indirection of Angika riddles and children's poetry.

27. Gangesha Upadhyaya — Tattvachintamani. A major epistemological work of Navya-Nyaya and the philosophical foundation for analyses of valid cognition, inference, pervasion and processes of knowing.

D. Foundational Western Studies of Children's Literature — Titles Given in Maithili Form

28. Reynolds, Kimberley — Children's Literature: A Very Short Introduction. Oxford University Press, 2011. An introductory study concerned with oral tradition, the cultural initiation of successive generations, the history of children's literature and socialisation.

29. Ewers, Hans-Heino — Fundamental Concepts of Children's Literature Research. Routledge, 2009. A study of child-appropriateness, classification, literary communication and fundamental concepts in the study of children's literature.

21. The Critical Theory of Maithili Children's Novels

Abstract

A Detailed Critical Examination of Gajendra Thakur's Thirty-Seven Children's Novels (in the Light of Indian and Western Theories of Children's-Literature Criticism). Introduction: A Critical Perspective on Children's Literature and These Thirty-Seven Books

Keywords: children · novels · critical theory · Maithili

A Detailed Critical Examination of Gajendra Thakur's Thirty-Seven Children's Novels

(In the Light of Indian and Western Theories of Children's-Literature Criticism)

Introduction: A Critical Perspective on Children's Literature and These Thirty-Seven Books

This book presents detailed critical readings of thirty-seven Maithili children's novels written by Gajendra Thakur. These thirty-seven books do not constitute a miscellaneous assortment: they form a deliberately designed architecture of writing for children, bringing together original contemporary children's fiction, alphabet instruction, animal tales, tales of wit, fairy tales, Mithila's heroic folk epics, love legends, devotional legends, biographies of folk deities, folk theatre, and narratives centred on music—all under one roof. Their criticism, therefore, cannot be undertaken as a collection of disconnected reviews. The examination of one book draws another into view, just as the ghats of a single pond are connected beneath the surface of the water. The arrangement of the present volume of criticism attempts to grasp precisely that network of relationships.

Two principal standards of criticism have been adopted, Indian and Western, not as opposing systems but as complementary ones. On the Indian side stands, first, the theory of rasa. In the language of Bharata Muni's Natyashastra, the aim of children's literature may be described as the realisation of rasa: a proportionate combination, for young readers, of heroism (vira), wonder (adbhuta), humour (hasya), pathos (karuna), and parental tenderness (vatsalya). In this collection, the heroic rasa reaches its summit in Dina-Bhadri and Chhechhan; pathos in Mahua Ghatwarin and Moti Dai; wonder in Raja Ansari and Bihula; humour in Murkhadhiraj and Untani; and tenderness in Bal Guru and Varnamala Shiksha. The second Indian criterion is Kshemendra's principle of aucitya, or appropriateness. How fully should an incident be told to children? At what point should the narrative 'lower its eyes'? Questions of this kind are central to the author's editorial judgement throughout the thirty-seven works and will recur in almost every review. The third criterion is the frame-story tradition of the Panchatantra and Hitopadesha: a story within a story, with ethical instruction conveyed through narrative. The introductory and concluding conversations between Ba and Om that frame Tarhari Me Parilok and Untani renew Vishnu Sharma's ancient narrative technique in Maithili. The fourth criterion is the theory of dhvani: the suggested significance of a children's story, a meaning that may become apparent to a child immediately and to an adult only later.

Five major instruments are drawn from Western criticism. First is Vladimir Propp's morphology of the folktale: narrative functions such as interdiction and its violation, the donor figure, the magical agent, the difficult task, and the exposure of a false hero. In books such as Raja Ansari, Raja Dholan, and Brahman Aa Thakurak Katha these functions appear with almost textbook clarity. Second is the Aarne–Thompson–Uther (ATU) index of tale types. Where a Maithili tale corresponds to an international tale pattern—as Murkhadhiraj does to ATU 1696, Kauwa Aa Phuddi to the cumulative-tale category, or the petrified friend in Brahman Aa Thakurak Katha to ATU 516—the correspondence is noted, placing Maithili children's literature in a worldwide context. Third is Bruno Bettelheim's psychoanalytic argument in The Uses of Enchantment: the dark passages of fairy tales externalise children's internal fears and help them work through those fears. Death, witches, and betrayal should therefore not be removed wholesale from children's narratives; it is their presentation that must be handled with care. Fourth is Maria Nikolajeva's question of aetonormativity: the balance between adult authority and children's agency. A distinctive feature of this collection is that children repeatedly become decisive agents—Astha, Om, Mansha, the boy of Bagiyak Gachh, Battu, and Ansari's younger son. Fifth is Perry Nodelman's theory of picture books: the panels identified as 'pictures' in each book give narrative movement a visual rhythm, participating in the double reading of words and images that Nodelman explores in Words about Pictures. Peter Hunt's child-centred approach, J. R. R. Tolkien's 'eucatastrophe' (the unexpected grace of a happy ending), Jack Zipes's discussion of socialisation, and John Stephens's analysis of ideology are also brought in wherever they are pertinent.

There is a third standard, neither exclusively Indian nor Western: the Videha Parallel Literature Movement's own principle of placing the knowledge of the people on a level with the classical treatises. The most revolutionary feature of the collection is its company of protagonists: the Musahar heroes Dina and Bhadri; the Dusadh figures Salhes and Chuharmal; Chhechhan the Dom; Gariban the Dhobi; Lalmain the Chamar; Amarsingh and Gango the Mallahs; and Raghuni the Marar. These are the folk-deity figures whom elite literature pushed to the margins for centuries. Retelling their legends for children is not mere entertainment. It democratises the literary world, inscribing on the next generation's mental map not only admirable lines of verse but also communities whose lives deserve recognition.

The reviews are arranged in four parts. Part One treats modern original stories for children and instructional narratives (reviews 1–4); Part Two covers tales, animal stories, trickster stories, and wonder tales (reviews 5–15); Part Three concerns heroic and romantic folk legends (reviews 16–26); and Part Four examines devotion, folk deities, ritual, and artistic narratives (reviews 27–37). Five principles are observed in each review: a brief account of the plot; an analysis of rasa and aucitya from Indian perspectives; an examination of structure and psychology from Western perspectives; an assessment of suitability for children; and, finally, intertextual links with the other books in the collection. To avoid unnecessary repetition, arguments established fully in one review are subsequently referred to more briefly. The reviews may now begin.

Part One: Modern Original Children's Fiction and Instructional Tales

1. Tarhari Me Parilok: Beyond the Tree Hollow—Maithili's First Dystopia for Children

The opening book of the collection is its most modern in both technique and boldness. Ba tells Om a story. Ten-year-old Astha enters a hollow in a densely branching tree in Channa Gachhi and tumbles into a radiant 'fairyland', where she meets displaced travellers from eight continents: African turaco birds, mamba snakes, Australian kookaburras, Eskimos, penguins, and others. From the surface, the land is beautiful: flowerbeds of seven colours, smooth frictionless roads, and creatures that all speak human language. But Astha's observant, questioning eyes lift the veils one by one. No wind blows here; no leaf stirs. Citizens have numbers instead of names (Vansapto 99995745). Nobody has seen the queen. Beyond the rampart, a desert has been created by repeatedly dumping waste at the queen's command. In the end it emerges that fairyland is a counterfeit kingdom run by deranged scientists, while in the desert dismissed as the 'dark world', a king of walking plants is operating an alternative place of renewal. There are breath, hunger, and a heart there. Using the power of dreams, Astha has all eight hollows sealed and returns home.

From a Western perspective, this book stands at the meeting point of three traditions. Falling through the tree hollow is a Maithili echo of Alice's descent into the rabbit hole in Lewis Carroll: weightless falling, the strange flow of time, and the disappearance of up and down. But Alice's

'nonsense' gradually turns here into a children's dystopia reminiscent of Lois Lowry's The Giver: a colour-coded division of labour, numbers in place of names, invisible authority, and an 'other' cast beyond the boundary of a supposedly perfect world. The third tradition is ecological fiction: a desert made of waste, and walking trees that plant a forest on mounds resembling the backs of whales. Nature is not the villain here but the exiled protagonist. In Tzvetan Todorov's vocabulary, the narrative begins in the 'marvellous' and ends near science fiction through an explanatory reversal—fairyland proves to be the scientists' deception. This crossing of genres has considerable educational value for the young reader. By Nikolajeva's measure of aetonormativity, the book scores exceptionally well: the greatest power in the entire world, the ability to make dreams come true, belongs to a ten-year-old girl. She uses that power not for war but for negotiation and the closing of doors: 'If something can be settled through friendship, what need is there for a quarrel?' This is the seed statement of the collection's ethics of peace. Its echo will be heard in Om's words of forgiveness in Bal Guru (review 2).

From an Indian perspective, adbhuta rasa predominates, but a trace of shanta, tranquillity, follows close behind it. The line on the last page about a 'faint sound' coming from within the sealed hollow is an excellent example of dhvani. Its literal meaning is simply a closed door; its suggested meaning is that the answer to a question can never be shut away for ever. Astha's scientific curiosity about stomata and chloroplasts is a contemporary form of the questioning pupil of the Upanishadic tradition: to ask questions is not disobedience but a form of learning. In terms of aucitya, the author keeps dystopian cruelty at the level of suggestion—the laboratory of the orange line, the ominous implication of 'we need such intelligent people'—giving young readers unease rather than terror. And unease is the mother of thought. The opening and conclusion in which Ba speaks with Om modernise the Panchatantra's frame-story device. Within that frame, the lamp's going out and the shimmering white sky of fairyland form a finely worked parallel. The frame will open again in Untani (review 4), while Om himself becomes the protagonist of Bal Guru. Together the three books form an internal ring within the architecture of the collection.

2. Bal Guru: A Five-Year-Old's Philosophy of Forgiveness

A residential complex in Delhi: Mithila on the third floor (Om's home), Punjab in the block opposite (Mansha's home), and a teenage girl from Odisha, Mahua, looking after Mansha. In the grassy park, Om and Mansha have shared a friendship for four years. Then comes the newly arrived Susen, an altercation, the arrow of the word 'dirty', and Mansha's roar: 'Om is my friend! Anyone who calls him dirty is dirty himself!' Then comes Om's reply, the heart of the book: 'He doesn't know me. He's new here. That's why he called me dirty. Once he gets to know us, do you think he'll still call me dirty?' That is the whole story. Yet within this small compass, the writer creates something rare in children's literature: what may be called realistic fiction. There is no fairy, no magic, no distant past —only today's metropolis and today's multilingual India.

Western criticism would place the book within literature about 'peer aggression', or bullying, but would immediately notice a difference: the two conventional resolutions in Western bullying stories—adult intervention and retaliation—are both rejected. A child offers the resolution himself, through cognitive reframing. The cause of the aggressor's behaviour is understood not as wickedness but as unfamiliarity. In the language of developmental psychology, this is an extraordinary demonstration of 'theory of mind': a child younger than five shapes his response by imagining another person's mental state. From Nikolajeva's perspective, the reversal of power operates on two levels. The child teaches the adults (his mother herself asks, 'Who is the teacher and who is the pupil?'), while the moral centre of the narrative is balanced between the sexes: Om is the teacher of forgiveness, Mansha of courage. The author explicitly says, 'One teaches forgiveness, one teaches courage. Together they make the whole lesson.' The arrangement answers Zipes's warning that children's literature often assigns patience to girls and bravery to boys. Here the pattern is reversed.

From the Indian perspective, this is a narrative of the courage of forgiveness, a child's commentary on 'kshama virasya bhushanam'—forgiveness is the ornament of the brave. In terms of rasa, vatsalya predominates, but it flows in three streams: the birth mother, Mahua who nurtures and cares, and the mother who learns. 'There were three mothers there that evening.' Mahua is among the collection's subtlest social observations: she is a child herself, yet she looks after another child. Her unfinished Odia song—'At the mention of her village, her throat filled and the song stopped'—weaves the pain of migrant child labour into the narrative without a speech about it. At the end, the line 'Where someone knows you by name, a song does not catch in your throat' extends to Mahua the philosophy of recognition that Om had applied to Susen. Intertextually, Om's principle of forgiveness is paired with Astha's principle of negotiation in Tarhari Me Parilok. Its contradictory dialogue with the folk-epic section is also interesting: in Dina-Bhadri (16) and Miran Saheb (23), humiliation and murder are answered by revenge; Bal Guru proposes an alternative ethic from within the same tradition. The author sets both before the reader without pronouncing a verdict. That is the collection's internal dialectic, to be considered again in the epilogue.

3. Varnamala Shiksha: Ankita—An Innovative Journey through the Alphabet

This is the collection's only entirely instructional narrative, a didactic text transparent about its declared purpose. Ankita and her father take an evening walk, and every chapter is woven from words belonging to a particular class of letters in the Maithili alphabet: beginning with 'akadārūṇ', 'akachchh', 'aginavān', and 'akkhaj' under the vowel a; passing through 'ogarbāh', 'kaṛekamān', 'kadbā', and 'kamarsāri' in the ka series; and reaching 'rajanī', 'lassā', and 'harṣ' in the later ya-to-ha series. Each chapter ends with questions and answers.

In the history of Western educational practice, its lineage resembles the abecedarium, or alphabet-book tradition, from Comenius's Orbis Pictus to contemporary alphabet books. Yet the work possesses two original features. First, the letters appear not in a pictured inventory but in the flow of a story. Words are encountered in context, which accords with modern language-acquisition theory's argument that vocabulary develops through use and context rather than through lists. Second, the end-of-chapter questions are a practical form of Vygotsky's 'zone of proximal development': what the child has just heard in narrative form returns immediately as questions to consolidate memory. The author's note to teachers—'How many times a story should be told depends on the child's capacity'—recognises the principle of individual pacing, now described as 'differentiated instruction'. Most valuable of all, the selected words are not modern, standardised vocabulary cast in the shadow of Hindi; they are distinctly Maithili folk words—'uṛkussī', 'ukāpataṅg', 'ṭābhnebok', and 'ḍihbār'. Under the pretext of an alphabet lesson, the book thus becomes a lexicon conserving a disappearing vocabulary. In an age of language loss, a primer for children in a minority language is not simply teaching: it is resistance. What Zipes calls literature's 'socialising function' operates here at the level of linguistic survival.

From an Indian perspective, this book gives narrative form to the initiation into writing, the aksharabhyasa rite. The image of the 'aksharamushtika' appearing in the introductory frame of Tarhari Me Parilok—the small fingers of Om enclosed by Ba's wrinkled fingers, 'like ink inside a pen'—finds its systematic course of study here. Read together, the two books show that initiation into letters belongs to an initiation into affection. Vatsalya assumes an intimate, domestic form: tired feet, Ankita's insistence on a red stick, and the promise of 'fresh bread'. Her father's explanation, 'I was walking quickly so that you could arrive sooner and rest', reveals the love concealed behind discipline and gives young readers a new lens through which to read parental 'strictness'. A limitation must also be observed. Some repetitions in the numbering of chapters (Chapter 3 occurs in two places) and the brevity of the later letter groups suggest that the experiment remains in its seed stage. In the teacher's note, the author himself invites parents and teachers to develop it further. In the architecture of the collection, the book is a bridge: on one side is modern narrative; on the other, the treasury of folk words whose living use is found in the subsequent section on folk epics.

4. Untani: The Damage Done by Imitation and the Discipline of Humour

The Ba–Om frame opens once again. This time Om's request is explicit: 'I want a funny story, not a frightening one!' Ba takes her story from the fields of Haryana. A leaf of a jal tree is stuck in a female camel's throat. A passer-by asks four questions, slaps the camel's neck and dislodges the leaf, then departs saying, 'I am a doctor.' The farmer concludes that this is all there is to medicine. Shouting 'I am a doctor' from village to village, he applies the same questionnaire to a sick old woman ('Had the old woman fallen on her right side? … Had she been eating the leaves of a jal tree?') and strikes her in the same way. The old woman dies. He must help carry her corpse, and when he demands his fee, he is beaten. In the next village the sole lesson he has learned is: 'I will certainly treat the patient, but I will not help carry the corpse!'

In the study of tale types, this belongs to the internationally familiar family of stories about foolish imitation, a group extending from the German Doctor Know-All to Indian tales of imitative jackals, in which someone copies the outward appearance of success without possessing the knowledge behind it. Henri Bergson's theory of laughter applies almost like a textbook example: comedy arises when mechanical repetition displaces living judgement. The farmer repeats his questionnaire mechanically, without noticing that the circumstances have changed. The author's boldness, however, lies in allowing laughter to collide with death in mid-story. The old woman's death sends a chill through the comic narrative, raising it above the ordinary amusing tale into a children's version of dark comedy. In Bettelheim's terms, this death is not necessarily inappropriate: children need to understand that foolishness is not harmless and that others may have to pay its price. Applying aucitya, the author confines the death to a single sentence—'The old woman died then and there'—and avoids lingering over grief. This is the restraint of the adaptation for children, evident repeatedly elsewhere in the collection (Amar Baba, review 24; Bagiyak Gachh, review 5).

The book's true marvel lies in its frame. When the story ends, Ba states the moral plainly ('Before learning to do anything, one must understand its essence; imitation alone is not enough'). This is ethical instruction in the manner of the Panchatantra's framed tales. But what follows goes beyond the conventional moral story. Om asks what Ba means by 'the story from our own direction', and Ba avoids answering: 'I thought you would be coming anyway, so I didn't tell it!' The story closes with its incompleteness, and the child falls asleep laughing. What Nodelman calls the 'hidden adult' in children's literature—the adult standing behind the child reader, selecting and omitting elements of a story—appears here as a character. Ba herself is the editor who decides what to say and what to leave unsaid. Architecturally, this book is the companion to Tarhari Me Parilok. There Ba opened the door to wonder; here she opens the door to humour. Across the two, the tale of the false doctor converses directly with the fraudulent holy man of Gonu Jha Aa Das Thop Baba (review 11). There genuine intelligence exposes false erudition; here false learning exposes itself. Together they complete the collection's lesson in authenticity: knowledge comes from understanding, not from putting on a show.

Part Two: Narrative Tales, Animal Stories, Wit and Wonder Tales

5. Bagiyak Gachh: The Grammar of a Trickster Tale and Its Dark Corner

The clever son of a widowed woman plants a garden, an extraordinary tree grows in it, and the tree attracts the attention of an old witch. With three pretexts—'hathain', 'mathain', and 'khonchhain'—she persuades the boy to bend down and shuts him in a sack. When she falls asleep, he fills the sack with earth, stones, and thorns and escapes. A second time he is deceived by an oath sworn by the disguised witch. In the end he saves himself by trapping the witch's daughter in a trick involving a mortar and pestle. A cat's warning, 'Go and eat your own daughter', reveals what has happened, and the witch's misdeeds return upon her own head.

This narrative is a Maithili member of the familiar international tale-type family in which a witch puts a child in a sack or bag and takes the child home, only for the child to escape repeatedly through ingenuity (the ATU 327 family, especially 327C). Propp's sequence of functions unfolds with remarkable clarity: interdiction (the mother warns against deceivers), violation (the boy trusts an oath), abduction, counteraction, and punishment. Bettelheim interprets stories of this family as dramatisations of the child's primal fear of 'being swallowed'. The witch's craving for meat is that fear embodied, while the child's repeated escapes rehearse the victory of intelligence over it. Notice that the boy is deceived twice. The author does not present cleverness as infallible: error, a repeated error, and only then learning. This error-tolerant learning curve is exemplary from the standpoint of child psychology because it teaches alertness rather than perfection.

Judged by the principle of aucitya, this book is a manifesto of the collection's editorial policy. At the moment in Chapter Eight when the boy does something to the witch's daughter that is brutal in the original folktale, the author explicitly says, 'This was the darkest moment of the tale, and the tale will not dwell on it.' In Chapter Ten comes another declaration: 'The tale will not describe this tragic event in detail.' This is a technique of narrative averting or withholding: the event is not denied, but it is left undescribed. Young readers know that something terrible has happened, yet the image is entrusted to their imagination—and imagination generally produces images only as far as its bearer can endure. This middle path between Bettelheim and modern critiques of the 'sanitisation' of fairy tales is the author's signature technique throughout the collection (compare Amar Baba, 24; Moti Saeri, 26; and Untani, 4). In terms of rasa, the mixture of hasya and bhayanaka, described in the book's own subtitle as 'humorous and thrilling', reaches a peak in the episode involving urination upon the witch's head: fear is released through laughter. This is a classically intelligible treatment of the rasa of terror in a children's story. The author himself establishes the boy's kinship with Gonu Jha ('The boy belonged to Gonu Jha's own original lineage'). Gonu Jha (11) is his adult counterpart, Battu (6) his animal counterpart, and Murkhadhiraj (9) his inverted shadow. In the last of these we will see what happens when imitation replaces intelligence and the same narrative grammar is turned upside down.

6. Battu: The Power of Speech in the Weak

Warned by his mother, a four-month-old male kid runs into the forest overnight to escape sacrifice during Durga Puja. Two or three years later, he has grown into Battu, with an imposing beard and horns. When he confronts a tiger, he frightens it away through extravagant poetic boasting ('I played with seven lions … unless there are ten tigers, I do not even bother to break my fast'). A jackal ties his legs to the tiger's and brings it back. Battu then unleashes his final weapon: 'I told you to bring me two tigers, and you have brought only one?' The tiger runs, and the tethered jackal is dragged to his death.

The story belongs to an ancient Indian animal-tale pattern in which a weak animal defeats a predator through the power of language: the family of jackal-and-lion stories in the Panchatantra, with worldwide forms ranging from The Brave Little Tailor to Tibetan and Indian tales of the tiger and the goat. Its central philosophical proposition is revolutionary for a young reader: reality is not exhausted by physical bodies; one layer of reality is made through language. The tiger does not flee from Battu's body but from Battu's words. What modern philosophy of language would call a 'performative utterance' takes place here in the middle of a forest. The author is also careful that this power of boasting should not be understood as unethical. Battu's untruth is a lie told in self-defence. The story's distribution of punishment is unambiguous: it is not the tiger who is punished but the jackal, because the jackal's deception was aggressive, whereas Battu's was defensive. 'The jackal fell victim to his own cunning': this poetic justice is the narrative's moral backbone.

In terms of rasa, this is a rare combination of vira and hasya, which one might call 'heroism of speech'. Bettelheim allows a still deeper reading. At the opening hangs the shadow of sacrifice: the adults of the household are negotiating to sell their own child. It touches one of childhood's deepest fears: 'What if those who are supposed to protect me abandon me?' The narrative answers on two levels. The mother gives the warning (maternal protection), but the child must survive by his own power (self-reliance). From home to forest and from forest to self-sufficiency: this arc of exile and maturation is a distinctly folk version of the Western coming-of-age pattern. Intertextually, the question raised by the child about sacrifice during Durga Puja anticipates, in miniature, the questions about the relation between humans and divinity in Gariban Baba (28) and Moti Dai (27). Battu's 'two tigers' trick is also the animal-story form of Gonu Jha's question weapon—'Where will you keep so many bamboos?' (11). In both narratives, victory depends not on possessing information but on managing it.

7. Kauwa Aa Phuddi: The Sorrowful End of a Cumulative Tale

During a famine, a crow and a phuddi bird decide to eat their own offspring. The crow's child is eaten; but when the phuddi's turn comes, the cunning bird sends the crow to the Ganges to wash his beak. The Ganges demands an earthen cup; the potter needs clay; the field requires a deer's horn; the deer demands a lion; the lion asks for a cow's milk; the cow wants grass; and the grass requires a sickle. When the crow finally reaches the blacksmith, he sings the entire chain as a song. The blacksmith offers two sickles, one black and one red. The crow grips the red-hot one in his beak, convulses, and dies.

This book demonstrates the collection's generic diversity. It is a pure cumulative tale (ATU 2030 category), part of the international genre of children's storytelling in which every link repeats all those before it, as in This Is the House That Jack Built. Its pedagogical value is well known: repetition trains memory, a lengthening list exercises the sense of sequence, and the crow's final song ('Brother blacksmith, give me a sickle; I shall cut the grass and feed the cow …') invites collective recitation by child listeners. This participatory moment of oral tradition is preserved even in the written version. Yet the author puts two serious elements inside this joyous form. The first is the opening famine, in which the birds decide to eat their children. This is a merciless reality of folktale that the author leaves unsoftened in a single paragraph before proceeding. Memories of famine form part of Mithila's collective past (compare Raghuni Marar, 32, and Madhav Singh, 37, where scarcity propels the plot). Allowing an echo of that history to reach children is an early lesson in historical consciousness. The second is the sudden death at the end: the exact inverse of Tolkien's 'eucatastrophe', for which one might coin 'dyscatastrophe'. A long chain of effort is reduced to nothing by one wrong choice, the red sickle.

Here criticism must raise an honest question: is the ending too harsh for a child reader? The author's answer appears in the concluding chapter: the story 'makes children laugh and at the same time compels them to think'. Read through Bettelheim, the answer gains force. The crow dies not because of greed but because of unthinking obedience: he accepts every demand without questioning it. Nor is the phuddi's 'victory' truly a victory: her deception costs her friend his life. The story puts both extremes, blind innocence and cunning, in the dock, leaving the middle path of alert simplicity unstated. That space belongs to the child's own judgement. Intertextually, the phuddi's pretence of 'purification' (washing the beak in the Ganges) is an ironic foreshadowing of the greatness of the Ganges in the collection's devotional section (Bar Sukhsar, 34). There the Ganges bestows liberation; here the road to the Ganges leads to death. It is a moving demonstration of where the language of purity can lead when it falls into the hands of deceit.

8. Doki-Doka: A Folk Allegory of the Journey Through Separation

The extravagant love between Doka and Doki (a delay of seconds in bringing the stars is pardonable, but a delay of minutes is not) arouses the envy of a jackal and his mate. The jackal plants a doubt in Doki's mind ('It seems his heart has turned towards someone else'). Doka goes into the forest and does not return. A yogi foretells that a curse from a former birth is at work: if she abandons her faith, Doka will be lost, but he will be found on the seventh day. Doki then sets out in search of him. Refusing the egret's, the jackal's, the banyan tree's, and the elephant's invitations to 'stay for one night', she goes with a mouse, who leads her towards a palace while telling her a story. She forgets to respond to the story, crosses a tunnel, and, on the seventh night, the mouse puts his face into a bowl of halwa and dies. Amid Doki's lamenting song, the door opens: there stands Doka, carrying an axe.

This small book is the most dreamlike work in the collection, and its criticism should proceed not by the logic of ordinary reality but by dream logic. Its closest counterpart in Western narratology is the structure of the quest, in which obstacles are not material but temptations. Each invitation to 'stay' is a test, and Doki's lament ('I left the egret, left the jackal, left the banyan tree; I left the strong elephant and took this mouse') is the poetic reckoning of those tests. Notice a subtle and courageous decision. Doki leaves the mighty elephant and chooses the frail mouse as her companion. In the grammar of a quest tale, the choice of a helper tests the protagonist's character, and Doki chooses humble companionship over the worship of strength. The sorrowful irony is that this very humble companion perishes in a moment of greed. The mouse's condition for telling his story ('Keep saying yes from time to time') is a story-within-a-story memorial to the listener's duty in oral storytelling. The listener's answering murmur, the hunkari, is the lifeblood of Mithila's storytelling culture; forgetting the response becomes the forgetting of the story itself. This metafictional moment quietly teaches the child reader that a story is the shared creation of speaker and listener.

From an Indian perspective, this is a child-accessible transformation of vipralambha-shringara, love in separation. The aspect of love that the folk tradition sings in the barahmasa and the songs of longing appears here as an animal allegory, and the allegory makes it bearable for a child. The jackal's seed of jealousy is a recurring motif across the collection. Compare Prithvipal's malicious insinuations (Munga and Jalim Singh, 19), the Chaudhary's envy (Raghuni Marar, 32), and the taluqdar's resentment (Raja Salhes, 17). The author repeatedly shows that the first instrument for breaking a relationship is not a weapon but a rumour. The numerical mystery of the 'seventh night' belongs to the temporal arithmetic of folktales, which renders waiting measurable. Endless waiting is unbearable to a child; waiting seven nights can become a game. In this way the story teaches patience without preaching patience.

9. Murkhadhiraj: An Inverted Tale of Cleverness and the Social Grammar of Humour

The exceptionally foolish son of a cowherd—who has even forgotten that he is married—sets off at his father's bidding to bring his bride home for the gauna ceremony. When puffed rice flies about, he says, 'Come, fly away,' and is beaten by birdcatchers. The phrase he is taught next, 'Come and be caught,' reaches the ears of thieves; 'May this happen in every house' is said in a cremation ground; and 'May such a thing happen in no house' is uttered at a wedding procession. Everywhere he is beaten, everywhere he receives a new formula, until he learns his last lesson: 'Say nothing.' Having become a silent son-in-law, he returns from his in-laws' house with his bride. When the sun causes the vermilion on her forehead to run, he takes it for a 'broken head' and exchanges his wife for a barber's goat, then the goat for a pumpkin. While his father laments, he says, 'Cook the pumpkin and keep the curry ready,' and goes off to play.

This tale is an almost pure Maithili instance of the international fool-tale type ATU 1696 ('What Should I Have Said?'): the worldwide pattern in which a fool utters, in each new situation, the expression learned in the preceding one. Bergson's theory of laughter appears here in its clearest form. Language, a living practice dependent on context, becomes in the fool's hands a context-free machine. Society tries to 'correct' this mechanical behaviour by beating him, but each correction generates a new mechanical rule. In this sense, the story is a laboratory of the philosophy of language for children. The young reader learns through laughter that the meaning of words resides not simply in the words but in the occasion on which they are spoken. A livelier elementary lesson in pragmatics would be hard to find. This is the precise opposite of Bagiyak Gachh (5) and Battu (6): there the protagonists read the situation and fashion their speech accordingly; here the protagonist memorises speech and collides with the situation. Together, these three books constitute a complete elementary course in the use of language.

Beneath the humour, however, lies an uncomfortable layer that criticism must not ignore: the chain of exchanges, wife–goat–pumpkin. Inside the comic tale-type, it is also an image of the objectification of women. The author's defence is that the story is told from the fool's viewpoint and that every exchange adds a fresh count to the indictment of his foolishness; the father's beating of his own head represents the reader's moral response within the story. Even so, for an adult mediator—a teacher or parent—this book is an occasion for discussion, not for laughter without a sting. That is precisely its strength. What John Stephens calls an 'ideological gap' in narrative is deliberately left open here. In terms of rasa this is a book of unmixed hasya, yet the father's lament in the last scene drops into that humour a touch of karuna, lending it the distinctive flavour of the Maithili comic tradition (Harimohan Jha comes readily to mind): laughter with a little tear at its edge.

10. Bhat-Bhatin: Riddle, Betrayal, and a Sister's Intelligence

Bhatin secretly loves a jewel-bearing venomous snake: she serves good food to the snake and only stale scraps to her husband, and at last commands the snake to kill him. Hidden in a shoe, the snake falls out when the shoe is shaken and dies at Bhat's hands. Mourning the snake, Bhatin cuts it into nine pieces and hides them in a bedstead, a low stool, oil, salt, woodwork, and her hair, contriving a deadly riddle. If Bhat cannot solve it, he must die by being thrown into the bhaksi, the furnace. Granted two days' reprieve, Bhat visits his sister. In a dharmashala, lamps speak to one another at night and disclose the secret. The sister then stipulates a counter-condition, solves Bhatin's riddle, and subjects her to the very punishment she devised.

The story joins two ancient streams of world folklore: the story family of the woman with a serpent lover and that of the lethal or 'neck' riddle, in which life hangs upon the answer to a question. The psychology of the riddle tale has particular value in children's literature. A riddle dramatises knowledge: one who knows survives. Here the source of knowledge is supernatural hearing, the conversation of lamps, which expresses folklore's deep conviction that truth is being spoken somewhere or other; what is needed is someone to listen. Talking lamps belong to the living world of objects in the Maithili household and courtyard, where the hearth, the rice-pounder, and the lamp are all imagined to possess a life of their own. For young readers, this animistic imagination is the natural language of children's thinking as described by Piaget: the story speaks in the child's own way of comprehending the world.

The moral centre of this book is the sister, an important figure in the collection's sequence of female agency. Alongside Mansha (2), Astha (1), Bihula (33), and Moti Saeri (26), she takes her place among women who seize the power to decide in a crisis. Notice her method: she neither weeps nor launches a direct assault; she reverses Bhatin's own rule of the game ('If you can solve the riddle …') and turns it against her. The defeat of a rule through the application of that very rule marks a sophisticated sense of justice. Judged by aucitya, the final punishment ('throwing into the bhaksi') retains the severity of the oral tale; the author disposes of it in a single sentence, without depiction—the same technique of narrative withholding (compare review 5). At a psychoanalytic level, the plot to murder the husband and the concealment of nine body parts do not reach the child's conscious awareness in all their implications, but the story's emotional message reaches it clearly: betrayal within the home is the most dangerous of betrayals, while a blood relation—the sister—is the last stronghold in a crisis. Intertextually, the ordinary habit of shaking out a shoe, which saves a life, exemplifies the collection's recurring principle that a small practice can provide great protection (compare Rohineya's practice of covering his ears, 14). The jewel of the jewel-bearing snake also connects directly with the serpent-jewel episode in Brahman Aa Thakurak Katha (12): in both, the jewel is an ambivalent symbol of greed and illumination.

11. Gonu Jha and Das Thop Baba: A Folk Hero of Rational Inquiry

Mithila is in the grip of drought. Following the king's public proclamation, Das Thop Baba appears, claiming, 'I performed penance in the Himalayas for a hundred years; a sacrifice will bring rain.' Returning from a visit to his in-laws, Gonu Jha becomes suspicious and, disguised as Bis Thop Baba, presents himself as a rival. Amid the absurd competing claims of 'Shri Shri 108 Bis Thop Baba', Gonu asks one piercing question: 'Will you prod the clouds with bamboo? Where will you store so much bamboo?' The pretence collapses. The baba tries to escape on the pretext of relieving himself, but people tear away his false beard; Gonu removes his own false moustache and reveals who he is.

Gonu Jha is one of the perennial heroes of the Maithili popular imagination. Western criticism would place him in the international company of clever trickster figures: Birbal, Tenali Raman, Nasreddin Hodja, and the European Till Eulenspiegel. More important than Gonu's trickster identity in this story, however, is his method, which is almost a folk version of the scientific method: listen to the claim (a sacrifice will produce rain), ask for the mechanism of the claim (by what procedure?), examine the physical possibility of the answer (where would such enormous quantities of bamboo be kept?), and reach a judgement when the answer proves inconsistent. This series of questions is a Mithila version of what Carl Sagan calls 'baloney detection', and its value for child readers is immense. The story teaches that reverence and examination are not mutually exclusive. Gonu stands not against religion but against fraud. The author's fine distinction—the mockery of a charlatan's competition in the number of his 'thop' marks, and Gonu's own assumed disguise, which he voluntarily removes in the end—clarifies the ethical difference between hypocrisy and strategic disguise: a disguise is an instrument when used to uncover truth, but hypocrisy when used for self-glorification.

In terms of rasa the tale is pure hasya, yet the background—a people suffering from drought—provides a faint underlayer of karuna, and that underlayer sharpens the satire. Charlatans flourish especially where misfortune and hope form a heated marketplace. In this sense the story is the complete counterpoint to Madhav Singh Aa Amta Gam (37): both begin at the same point, Mithila's drought and the search for rain, but there an authentic discipline of musical knowledge brings the sky within reach, whereas here the pretence of asceticism is torn away along with a false beard. The pairing appears deliberate in the architecture of the collection: the line between knowledge and its performance, the very line separating the traveller and the imitative farmer in Untani (4). From Nikolajeva's perspective on authority, the interesting feature here is that royal power (the king) is credulous while intellectual authority (Gonu) is alert. This persistent pattern of the folktale simultaneously cultivates in young readers a healthy scepticism towards power and respect for intelligence.

12. Brahman Aa Thakurak Katha: A Confluence of Three Stories Within a Story, and the Stone of a Promise

A Brahmin of Debiganj takes a Thakur child with him on a journey to perform a Satyanarayan puja. The child stipulates that whenever he encounters something he cannot understand, the Brahmin must explain it.

Three sights on the road then open three narratives: the story of a queen who, overcome by shame and modesty, leaps into a river after the discovery of a woman's corpse weighted with sand; the story behind a goat being kicked, in which a treacherous friend uses a mantra of changing bodies to appropriate a king's body (until the intelligence of a fairy returns the parrot-king and imprisons the betrayer in the goat); and, behind the sight of an old woman being led to the gallows, the long tale of the maiden Nagavati, a mad prince, and a minister's son. The last includes twenty-five dangers foretold by fate, a friend who turns to stone as he discloses the secrets, and his restoration to life through contact with the blood of a newborn child.

In its structure, this is the most ambitious book in the collection: a frame narrative, a narrative casket containing stories within stories, whose Indian genealogy reaches back through the Panchatantra, Vetala-Panchavimshati, and Kathasaritsagara. The journey is the frame, curiosity the key, and each declaration of 'I do not understand' opens the lock on another tale. Pedagogically, this device is invaluable. The child's 'why?' is not scolded here but rewarded with a story; questioning itself fuels the narrative mechanism, as Astha's questions did in Tarhari Me Parilok (1). The stone episode of the third tale is a Maithili form of the enduring international tale type ATU 516 ('Faithful John'): the servant who knows how to protect his master turns to stone as he divulges the secret and is revived with a child's blood. Its line-by-line resemblance to 'Faithful John' in the Grimm collection testifies to the world citizenship of Maithili's treasury of tales. In Propp's vocabulary the complete cycle is present: interdiction (do not reveal the secret), violation (the king's insistence), punishment (petrification), and restitution (the infant's blood). The moral burden, however, is reversed: the prohibition is broken not out of selfishness but from fear that the friend will be hanged, and so the narrative both punishes and delivers him.

From an Indian perspective the central rasa of the book is adbhuta, wonder. But what emerges from the conjunction of the three tales is an inquiry into speech and the keeping of one's word. In the first tale, shame outweighs speech (the queen leaps into the river); in the second, the misuse of an utterance—a mantra—brings destruction; in the third, protecting one's word turns a man to stone, and friendship makes that stone human again. A child listener who hears all three will arrive at a conclusion not through instruction but through triangular comparison: a refined form of the Hitopadesha's method of teaching ethics by means of stories. A critical qualification is necessary. The density of the third narrative—the old woman, the mad prince, abduction, the wedding party, and the twenty-five dangers—may be too heavy for a young reader in a single sitting. This is a book that calls for reading in stages, at successive stopping places like the travelling pair themselves; that is its natural mode of use. Intertextually, the reinterpretation of the hanged old woman's supposed 'crime' (the condemned woman turns out, when her story is heard, to be intelligent) touches the collection's recurring problem of justice: the distance between what seems evident and what is true. The same question will recur in the false discovery of a necklace in Raja Salhes (17) and the delicate accusation of dishonour in Naika Banijara (21).

13. Raja Ansari: The Language of Dreams and the Discipline of Not Looking Back

King Ansari dreams of diamonds and pearls cascading inside his house, which everyone gathers up and eats like tender mango blossoms. His youngest son promises, 'I shall make it come true.' Separated from his brothers in the forest, the boy falls into a well after following a traveller's directions. Through his service to the yogi Bhairavananda he earns a boon, becomes a parrot, and sets out across seven seas to fetch the fruit of immortality. On the first attempt he turns to look back when a fairy calls, 'Turn and look', and dies; revived by the yogi's matted locks, he succeeds on his second attempt without looking back. He then encounters three fairy sisters in a grove of kalam trees. Finally comes the yogi's extraordinary command: take a knife to the throats of all three fairies and to your own throat at the same moment. There appear trees of gold, stems of silver, and falling pearls. At home the king sees merely 'three women' and calls his son a fool. Before the assembled town the son repeats the act, and the dream becomes reality.

This is the collection's purest wonder tale, filling almost every place in Propp's inventory of narrative functions: lack (the unrealised dream), departure, the donor (the yogi), a difficult task, interdiction ('Do not look back'), violation, death and revival, and a transformative conclusion. The prohibition against looking back is a deep motif of world mythology, extending from Orpheus and Eurydice to Lot's wife. Its psychological meaning reaches the young reader immediately: certain tasks demand such concentration that even a glance back towards the call of doubt, temptation, or the past can prove fatal. The boy fails the first time and succeeds the second. This repetition accompanied by correction (compare Bagiyak Gachh, 5) is a persistent feature of the collection's philosophy of learning. The final knife episode, whose logic the tale deliberately leaves unexplained, is the high point of the dream logic of wonder tales: an action resembling sacrifice, even directed towards one's own neck, opens the door to transformation. Leaving the burden of interpretation to the reader is the author's bold decision about aucitya, for an explanation would turn magic into a set of rules.

A second layer of the story is an interpretation of the meaning of dreams. The king takes the dream as a literal thing (tree equals tree); his son understands it as a relational truth (tree equals prosperity brought forth through the help of the fairies). The irony is that the child who is called a 'fool' proves literate in the language of dreams. The dialogue with Tarhari Me Parilok (1) is direct: there the dream becomes mechanically true and is politically misused; here the dream becomes true through labour, service, and obedience to a prohibition. Together the books offer children two lessons about dreaming: a dream is a power, and the character of power depends on the path by which it is pursued. In the language of rasa, the dominant wonder is tinged with parental tenderness (the father's anxiety and the son's promise), culminating in the spectacle of collective amazement as the whole town gathers up the falling blossoms. The folktale's happy ending is always communal rather than purely individual; this principle will recur in Bihula (33) and Madhav Singh (37).

14. Daku Rohineya: The Power of a Single Sentence—A Children's Jewel from the Jain Narrative Tradition

Magadha is ruled by Bimbisara, and the bandit Rohineya inspires fear. Yet he robs the rich and shares the spoils with the poor, and the people consequently protect him. His dying father, Lauhakhura, gives a command: never listen to Mahavira's sermons. During minister Abhayakumara's five-day vow to apprehend him, Rohineya boldly robs the royal palace. On the road, as he passes a place where a sermon is being delivered, he covers his ears; but a thorn pierces his foot, and while removing it he happens to hear one sentence: gods do not sweat, their garlands do not fade, their feet do not touch the earth, and their eyelids do not blink. Apprehended, Rohineya tries to save himself by posing as 'Durga the farmer'. Abhayakumara gives him wine and stages a false heaven, complete with gandharvas, apsaras, Indra's messengers, and a demand that he confess his sins. But Rohineya notices that these 'gods' are sweating, their garlands have wilted, and their feet rest on the ground. Armed with the single sentence he had overheard, he detects the deception and recounts only his meritorious deeds. When granted a promise of immunity, he tells the whole truth, renounces his wealth, and asks to be initiated by the very Mahavira whose one sentence saved his life.

This book is unique in genre within the collection. It is not a Mithila folk epic but a Maithili children's adaptation of a celebrated narrative from Jain literature (the Avashyaka-Churni and later narrative-compendium traditions). Its inclusion extends the collection's cultural horizon to the ancient shared geography of Magadha and Videha. The intellectual centre of the story is a jewel of logic: a single particle of prohibited knowledge may prove decisive. The father forbids the sermon as a source of 'ruin', but one sentence of that sermon saves his son's life. The prohibition refutes itself. Western criticism would recognise here an early form of the 'epistemic thriller': the pleasure of a detective narrative in which victory comes not through strength but through observation and inference. Rohineya reads the sweating bodies and faded garlands of the sham heaven's 'gods' as a detective reads clues. Opposite him stands Abhayakumara, inheritor of the tradition of ministerial intelligence extending through the moral tales from Chanakya to Abhayakumara. This contest of two minds—one arranging deception, the other exposing it—is as exciting for a child as a game of chess, without a single drop of blood being spilled.

The moral architecture is subtle. Rohineya's 'Robin Hood' character—taking from the rich and giving to the poor—inclines the tale towards sympathy for him; nevertheless, the narrative secures his liberation not through a vindication of banditry but through its renunciation. The distinction between sympathy and approval is a measure of ideologically attentive children's literature. The transformation is convincing because it arises not from a miracle but from gratitude: 'I shall seek initiation from the teacher whose words saved my life.' Intertextually, the exposure of the counterfeit heaven is a state-sponsored variation on Gonu Jha's exposure of a charlatan (11). There real intelligence detects a false holy man; here genuine scriptural speech detects a false heaven. The father's command of prohibition is also the philosophical summit of the interdiction function in Battu (6) and Raja Ansari (13). Throughout the collection an interdiction sometimes protects, sometimes tests, and here proves false in itself. Excitement without violence, a plot governed by reasoning, and inward transformation make this the collection's most intellectual work.

15. Raja Dholan: The Epic of Curses, Concealment, and Letters

King Daksha of Garh Nariyal stubbornly buys cotton on the principle of purchasing what was not for sale, and the fortune of his kingdom takes offence. Impoverished, he goes to Garh Pingal to work as a horse attendant. Children are born on the same day in the two royal households, and, under the astrological necessity of a 'marriage on the sixth night', the newborn girl Madhuvan is married to Dholan, the horse attendant's newborn son. On the return journey, a tiger is killed and the tigress pronounces a curse: 'I shall make your son's bride a widow.' Terrified, the father buries the secret: a buffalo in a pit, his son in a gardener woman's flower garden, and the memory of the marriage in silence. Meanwhile, the grown Madhuvan distributes food and alms in a twelve-year sadavrat on the banks of the Jamuna, searching for her husband. A trader's letter is burned by the witches Hareba and Pareba; a parrot's letter is cast into the fire by the gardener woman. On the third attempt, a holy man carrying ganja, bhang, and opium breaks through the magic with an enchanting flute and delivers the letter to Dholan. Questioned at sword-point, the father confesses. The buffalo, now afflicted with worms, is rescued, the tigress is killed, and Dholan makes himself known at his in-laws' home through the havoc he wreaks in the flower garden. At last come the palanquin, the ceremonial departure of the bride, and kingship.

This is the collection's most intricate wonder epic, and communication is the key to its criticism. The whole epic is, in fact, the story of three letters. The curse forbids information, the father buries it, the witches burn it, and deliverance occurs at the moment information finally arrives. Without consciously being taught the lesson, the child reader learns that a large part of family suffering arises less from conspiracy than from concealment. The father's silence was intended as 'protection', but its cost was the buffalo's imprisonment for years, the son's loss of identity, and the daughter-in-law's twelve-year wait. In Propp's terms, the tale consists of two cycles across two generations: the father's (transgression, downfall, exile) and the son's (ignorance, discovery, redress). The son succeeds precisely where the father failed: the father killed the tiger and incurred the curse, the son kills the tigress and lifts it; the father concealed the secret, the son brings it to light. This pattern of correction across generations (compare Rohineya, 14, who reverses his father's prohibition) expresses the collection's deep optimism: children need not remain prisoners of their parents' mistakes.

The position of women here particularly demands criticism. Madhuvan is not a heroine who merely waits. By establishing the sadavrat she creates a public centre for gathering information (the same strategy is employed by the fairy in Brahman Aa Thakurak Katha, 12). Her attempts through three different means of communication—a trader, a parrot, and a holy man—display strategic patience. Women stand on the opposing side as well, in the pair of witches Hareba and Pareba; the tale therefore distinguishes its allies from its enemies not by gender but by intention. The episode of the buffalo is one of the most moving expressions of compassion towards animals in the collection: an innocent creature's imprisonment over many years and the rescue of its worm-infested body. No book of sermons could give young readers the lesson in sympathy that they receive here. In rasa terms, this long combination of wonder and pathos finally comes to rest in shanta, tranquillity. The transformation of a 'servant's son' into a king also belongs to the collection's egalitarian undertone, which will sound fully in the folk-epic section, from Dina-Bhadri to Chhechhan.

Part Three: Heroic and Romantic Folk Epics

16. Dina-Bhadri: Two Sons of the Proverbial Soil — The Summit of the Tragic Heroic Epic

Dina and Bhadri, Musahar brothers from Jogiyanagar, wield spades weighing five maunds each, clear a bigha of land in a day, and possess righteousness alongside strength. Kanak Singh, the landlord of Janjar, tries to turn them into his 'oxen' and flees after being beaten. His wife Budhni performs austerities at Salhes's shrine and asks for a boon: 'The lives of Dina and Bhadri.' Bound by his promise, Salhes summons his own beloved heroes to the Katai forest through a dream. Crying 'Victory to King Salhes,' Dina defeats the tiger Khunima in wrestling, but a tigress disguised as a bagra kills both brothers through deceit. A succession of marvels follows: the spirits of the brothers, seated on a weighing pan made of arhar stalks, outweigh the contents of an entire shop; they serve food as attendants at a shraddha feast; the sign of the hansa; and their mother's milk bursting through seven layers of cloth. Then comes the killing of one hundred and fifty oppressors in the Morang region, Budhni's end, and Salhes's penitential promise: 'Wherever I am worshipped, you too shall be worshipped.'

This book is the cornerstone of the heroic-epic section of the collection and a child's gateway into the tradition of Maithili folk epics. In the vocabulary of Western tragic poetics, this is a tragedy in its pure form, but with one decisive difference from the Greek pattern: the hero has no 'tragic flaw.' The fault lies in the system—in the mechanics of fidelity to a promise, which makes even a deity an instrument of injustice. Salhes's moral dilemma ('If he breaks his word, divinity is broken; if he keeps his word, justice is broken') presents the young reader, perhaps for the first time, with the question whether rules and justice are always the same. This is an ascent towards the stage of moral development described by Kohlberg at which a child moves beyond obedience to rules and begins to assess their justice. As a counterweight to the tragedy, the folk tradition offers its own 'eucatastrophe': another turn of justice beyond death, through the balance, the milk, the slaying of a hundred and fifty oppressors, and a share in worship. What Tolkien calls the sudden grace of a happy ending appears here as posthumous justice. The child learns that the end of a story is not the end of justice: 'Time is the greatest court of all.'

From an Indian perspective, the tale unites vira and karuna, the heroic and the pathetic, in the manner suggested by Bhavabhuti's declaration 'Eko rasah karuna eva'—that compassion or pathos alone is the fundamental rasa. Dina's victory over the tiger is the height of vira, and the deception of the bagra immediately thereafter opens an abyss of karuna. This oscillation of rasa provides an emotional education for the child. The image of milk forcing its way through seven layers of cloth brings vatsalya, maternal affection, to the point where physiology falls silent and poetry begins to speak: 'A mother's milk is the greatest proof in the world.' Socially, this epic is a manifesto for the Videha Parallel-History paradigm. The sharing of divine worship with two Musahar labouring brothers —'Deity and labourer, in the same courtyard, beneath the same incense and lamps'—is a statement of the democracy of Indian popular devotion that no sociology could express more beautifully. Intertextual connections are especially dense here. Salhes is a constrained deity in this tale but a struggling man in Raja Salhes (17); read together, the two books complete the folk deity's life-history, from humanity to divinity. Budhni's austerities are a dark counterpart to those of Moti Dai (27): the same method, stubborn ascetic devotion, serves opposite purposes, the taking of life and the desire for a child. Death through the deceit of the tigress in the guise of a bagra also connects with the pattern in Amar Baba (24) and Bahura Godhin (25): heroes die not through superior strength but through deception.

17. Raja Salhes: Freedom of Title and Justice Protected by Tantra

Salhes, a Dusadh soldier of Morang, has no throne, yet in the people's hearts he is 'king.' The landlord Naurangi Bahadur Thapa dislikes the title: 'Tell the people not to call him that!' The answer is, 'How can anyone control what people choose to call another?' Salhes leaves Morang because of this impossible command. Dabna, a woman of the gardener community who has tied a knot in her sari for twelve years and is learned in the tantra of Kamru-Kamakhya, makes him commander of seven hundred soldiers. The deposed Chuharmal conspires against him by concealing the queen's necklace, worth nine lakhs, in Salhes's bed. Through Dabna's ritual practice at the Kali temple, Chuharmal vomits blood and confesses everything. Salhes is freed, promoted, and finally married to Dabna.

The intellectual centre of this epic is the dispute over the title, a first lesson in political philosophy for the young reader. Who has a monopoly over the word 'king'—political authority or society? Salhes's argument ('The people gave me this title … even if I renounce it, they will continue to use it') is an argument for democracy in language. A name exists in the minds of those who give it, and no landlord can command their minds. In the vocabulary of Zipes's ideological analysis, this narrative stages a collision between two sources of legitimacy: authority derived from office and authority derived from service. The folk tradition votes unequivocally for the latter. The second subject for criticism is Dabna. She is a rejected lover who chooses evidence rather than revenge: her tantric knowledge serves as a 'forensic' instrument, compelling the guilty man literally to vomit the truth. Supernatural power is therefore placed in the service of due process, not retaliation. The motif of waiting twelve years recurs throughout the collection (compare Jyoti Panjiyar, 31; Naika Banijara, 21; and Madhuvan in Raja Dholan, 15). Twelve years is the complete measure of ascetic endurance in the folk imagination, and Dabna's love is measured by that span.

From the standpoint of aucitya, or propriety, the author reduces the opening incident of a physician's suicide to a single informative paragraph—an appropriate compression for young readers—and places the narrative weight upon exposing the conspiracy. Chuharmal's ordeal ('vomiting blood') is situated within supernatural punishment, where a child may understand it as magical justice rather than physical violence. At the intertextual level, the book creates one of the collection's most intriguing puzzles of names. The villain 'Chuharmal' in this story and the hero Chuharmal of Chuharmal and Reshma (18) share a name but inhabit different character-worlds. This is a sign of the historical tension within folk tradition: the Salhes epic and the Chuharmal epic have been songs of pride for different communities. By granting each figure his own heroism within his own narrative, the author preserves that plurality of voices. The young reader learns indirectly that the story associated with one name can change with the storyteller's location and that history's multiplicity of voices is not a flaw but an inheritance. Reading the constrained deity of Dina-Bhadri (16) alongside the struggling human being of this tale is the proper way to read this pair.

18. Chuharmal and Reshma: Vermilion of Blood — A Memorial to Forbidden Love

Mokama Ghat. Chuharmal, a Dudh-bansi labourer and wrestler, and Reshma, daughter of a Bhumihar mansion: love at first sight comes from Reshma, while Chuharmal says 'no' for years. 'You are a daughter of the mansion; I am a labourer at the ghat.' When their secret becomes known, surveillance follows; the hired killers Ramjit and Manne Khan are themselves slain; the mansion's men attack the Dudh-bansi settlement; and Reshma herself stops them: 'If innocent blood is to be shed because of me, let mine be shed first!' With Ramsakhi's magic the lovers meet unseen. They marry in the Kali temple, where Chuharmal fills the parting of Reshma's hair with his own blood instead of sindur. Then come encirclement, the protection of Reshma in a mahua tree, and the final battle. At the very instant the hero is winning, a soldier named Kalua abducts Reshma, the horse is killed, and Chuharmal dies calling 'Reshma, Reshma.' At the end stand the Reshma-Chuharmal temple in the Mokama wetlands and a fair attended by all castes.

This is the collection's supreme tragedy of love, and the key to its criticism is an image worthy of being called Maithili's own contribution to the world's literature of love: vermilion made of blood. Sindur symbolises the institution of marriage; blood symbolises life. Their exchange declares that where an institution refuses to provide love with the materials of recognition, love fashions those materials from its own body. A Western comparison naturally recalls Romeo and Juliet—love between hostile families, a secret marriage, a tragic ending—but the difference is decisive. Shakespeare's feud is between two families of equal status, whereas the antagonism here is vertical, arranged along a ladder of caste and class. The tragedy is structural, not fated; its villain is not a single person but 'all those walls that have been erected between one human being and another.' Reshma's characterisation deserves particular attention. She initiates the love, an uncommon role in folk epic; she mediates to protect the settlement and devises ways to evade surveillance. By Nikolajeva's measure she possesses full agency. Yet the epic ultimately leaves her fate in silence. The author's observation, 'This silence is more painful than any description,' is an excellent application of aucitya: where the folk variants are multiple and distressing, silence in an adaptation for children is both a form of respect and a deliberate restraint.

In terms of rasa, karuna triumphs over a conjunction of sringara—not consummation, but love at its first awakening—and vira. The final chapter, however, changes pathos into santa, or peace, through the temple and fair: 'The lovers die; love becomes a fair.' This posthumous communal recognition is a secular counterpart to Salhes's promise of worship in Dina-Bhadri (16): there a deity asks forgiveness; here society does. In both cases memory is the court of final justice. Comparison with Munga and Jalim Singh (19) is indispensable and will be pursued in the next study. For now, one may note that there too the marriage mark is made with blood, but the ending is happy. Together the two epics place before the young reader the two possible fates of inter-caste love—the triumph of society and the triumph of love—without offering false reassurance.

19. Munga and Jalim Singh: The Same Fire, a Different Ending

The kingdom of Bettiah. Rajput commander Jalim Singh and Munga, a young woman of the Dudh-bansi community, meet for the first time beside a well. The court flatterer Prithvipal poisons others' minds against them. Pattu, a Mallah, single-handedly destroys an attacking force and finally sacrifices his life for his master. Jalim disregards his guru Mauni Baba's command to 'give up Munga's company.' In the forest is Kanua, who consumes a maund and a quarter of milk and a goat for nourishment and rides a buffalo that hunts tigers; Munga has been bound beneath his sword. Jalim arrives at the critical moment, kills the buffalo and Kanua, and there in the forest applies the vermilion of blood. Then begins the war within his own household: his brother Kunwar's rebellion, their mother's acceptance, the brother's attack and the resulting wounds, Munga's sleepless vigil at the physician's door. At last the weeping mother and brother repent and the lovers are taken 'home with love.'

This epic is the companion text to Chuharmal and Reshma (18), and placing the two face to face is one of the central exercises of this book of criticism. Count their shared elements: inter-caste love; a first meeting by water (a ghat or a well); a jealous conspirator; the sacrifice of a loyal supporter (the settlement in one story, Pattu in the other); vermilion of blood; and violence from the hero's own side. The outcomes, however, are reversed, and analysing why is the true critical work. In Reshma's story the source of violence, the mansion, remains implacable to the end. In Munga's story the source of violence, the brother, reaches repentance. Thus the folk memory as edited by the author preserves the possibility that the fortress of caste may be breached from within when some link in the family, such as the mother, first gives way: 'The mother's acceptance was the first foundation of this new household.' For young readers the pair provides the measured combination of hope and reality that theorists of children's literature recommend repeatedly. An exclusively happy ending would tell a lie; an exclusively tragic one would bring despair.

The epic also has independent distinguishing qualities. First, the episode of Mauni Baba—the realised guru's command and the hero's silent disobedience—is a rare moment of courage in folk narrative. The story does not treat a guru's words as final truth ('Destiny is greater even than a holy man's utterance'); this respectful defiance on behalf of love connects with that tradition of devotional poetry in which love itself is evidence. Second, Kanua's portrayal—his enormous appetite, his tiger-hunting buffalo—uses the idiom of folk hyperbole to measure terror by sheer size. For a child's imagination this larger-than-life adversary provides an exciting narrative grammar. Third, Pattu's sacrifice: the death of this Mallah companion announces the tale's scale of moral values. The epic never forgets the cost of loyalty ('Jalim never forgot the price of that friendship throughout his life'). This thread belongs to the collection's chain of friendship narratives (Lalmain Baba, 29; the stone friend in Brahman and Thakur, 12; and Jitan Yadav in Dina-Bhadri, 16). The movement through sringara, vira, and karuna completes its circle in santa; the last line, tracing the journey 'from an ordinary meeting by the well … to the family courtyard,' is its succinct formula.

20. Mahua Ghatwarin: A Daughter Sold and the Freedom of the Current

Mahua of Parman Ghat is a beautiful, virtuous girl, 'like a pinch of saffron in kneaded dough.' Her father is addicted to cannabis; her stepmother casts furtive, calculating glances. On a night in the months of Sawan and Bhadon she is forced to go and massage oil into a merchant's body. There is Phulmati's consolation and the memory of the beloved waiting in Morang; then comes a messenger's secret news: her stepmother has sold her to the trader. Midstream, the oar is taken away from her: 'The entire payment has been made.' Mahua then does what makes this epic immortal: without warning she jumps into the current, swimming against it towards Morang. The trader's younger guard, who had begun to love her secretly, jumps in after her, and both drown. At the end, the ferryman catches sight of Mahua in the Sawan-Bhadon flood, and with each appearance the story begins again: 'Once there was Mahua Ghatwarin …'

This is the most deeply affecting work of pathos in the collection, and it demands courage from criticism, for its subject falls outside the supposedly 'safe' list of subjects for children's literature: the sale of a daughter. The author's skill in aucitya reaches its highest point here. Commercial details of the transaction are not the centre of the narrative; the girl's experience of it is: 'She had simply been turned into an article of trade, without her consent.' Mahua's question—'Why did you not kill me with a taste of salt instead of raising me for this day?'—enters the young reader's heart directly because it speaks not the language of economics but of betrayal. From a Western critical perspective the essay understands Mahua's leap not as self-destruction but as the final expression of agency. In the narrative's own words, 'This was not surrender; it was her last plan of self-defence.' She leapt not towards death but towards Morang—towards love and freedom—and the river current defeated her. This distinction needs to be underlined for adult mediators of the tale, teachers and parents: the epic teaches resistance, not flight from responsibility. 'I shall not be sold' is its fundamental declaration.

The stepmother is among the most widespread figures in world folklore, from Cinderella to Hansel and Gretel. Bettelheim interprets her as a split projection of a child's ambivalence, the good mother and the harsh mother. Here, however, that psychological figure is outweighed by social reality. Folk epic knows that the sale of daughters by the ghats of Mithila has not been merely imaginary. The younger guard's leap is the most delicate touch in the narrative: a heart rebels from within the machinery of oppression. A purchased guard reclaims his humanity, even at the price of his life; this detail saves the story from reducing its characters to simple villains. The cyclical ending, in which each sighting renews the telling, is a self-portrait of oral tradition. Mahua is immortal because she continues to be narrated; the tale announces its own secret of survival. There is also an intertextual connection with Moti Saeri (26): in that tale a daughter is floated away inside a chest; here a daughter is sold upon the current. Both are narratives of daughters carried away by water, and in both the daughter ultimately acquires an almost river-divine presence in communal memory. The frightening beauty of the Sawan-Bhadon current also connects with the seasonal cycle of the Jat-Jatin rain ritual (36): in the same Bhadon waters, people in one place make a dance and elsewhere lose Mahua.

21. Naika Banijara: Testimony for the Absent Husband — Recognition through a Ring

Shobhanayak, a merchant's son, marries and leaves for Morang before enjoying domestic happiness. On the way he overhears a conversation between a dakhar couple beneath a tree: 'This is an exceedingly auspicious night; whoever stays with his wife tonight will have a gifted son.' Shobhanayak secretly returns home, leaves a ring as a token of recognition, fearing public scandal, and goes back to Morang. He trades there for twelve years. Meanwhile his pregnant wife Bari is suspected by her parents-in-law, expelled, and sheltered by her brother-in-law Chaturgan. There is the lament of a folk song: 'Then Bari weeps, tormented and distraught, oh no.' In the thirteenth year Shobhanayak returns. The ring establishes the truth, and the family is reunited.

The epic represents the recognition tale, that ancient narrative pattern in which the truth concerning a separated couple depends upon a token object. One naturally recalls the ring in the Sanskrit dramatic tradition of Abhijnanashakuntalam, and the recollection is appropriate: in both, society suspects a woman's character and an object resolves the doubt. The difference is that Shakuntala's ring is lost, and the play creates a tragedy of forgetting; here the ring is preserved, and the tragedy arises from absence rather than forgetfulness. The real critical question is ethical, and an honest reading must raise it. Shobhanayak gave the ring to Bari but did not tell his parents the truth. His device for avoiding 'public scandal' became the cause of twelve years of disgrace for Bari. The epic does not make an explicit accusation, but the pathos of Bari's song is a silent indictment. The proposition advanced in the discussion of Raja Dholan (15)—that family suffering is born more often of concealment than of conspiracy—receives further evidence here. For the young reader this paired reading is valuable: in both stories a man's supposedly 'protective' silence becomes a woman's prolonged suffering.

Chaturgan, who knows the truth and gives shelter to the woman cast out, is the voice of conscience within the epic, showing that supporters of truth may remain even inside a family. He is a counter-image to Kunwar (19): the brother in that story was violent, whereas this one protects. The episode of overhearing the dakhar couple belongs to a worldwide folktale device in which a conversation among birds or animals reveals human destiny (compare the dialogue of lamps in Bhat-Bhatin, 10, and the washerwoman episode in Bihula, 33). This accidental and unpossessed source of knowledge is characteristic of folk epistemology: truth needs ears able to hear it, not technical expertise. Dominated by karuna, the story ultimately reaches a peaceful, happy conclusion. Its lasting achievement is the line of Bari's song. Direct quotation of a folksong is comparatively rare in the collection and brings the flavour of the epic-singing tradition to the young reader. The musical element will receive fuller development in Madhav Singh and Amta Village (37).

22. Chhechhan: The Drum, the Wrestling Match, and an Arena of Dom Heroism

A drum hangs in the wrestling arena of Manikchand, the Dom chief of Sahidapur. Whoever strikes it must first fight his pet boar Chatiya; whoever defeats Chatiya must wrestle Manikchand; and whoever defeats Manikchand will marry his sister Panma. Chhechhan Maharaj arrives carrying a katta weighing five paseris. He fills his chillum with medani flowers, smokes, and strikes the drum. At first Chatiya runs away; when he attacks, Chhechhan seizes both his legs and tears him apart. Chhechhan then defeats Manikchand in wrestling, and the delighted chief marries Panma to him. In the latter part, Chhechhan cuts bamboo from the homestead of the Yadav folk deity Krishnaram, the golden elephant Subaran arrives, and the elephant places its foot upon Chhechhan's katta. The epic pauses at the announcement of this new contest, adding that folk memory preserves Chhechhan's 'ultimately victorious struggle.'

This is the most unalloyed embodiment of vira rasa in the collection. There is neither a love story nor a miracle of devotion: only a test of strength, staged in a wrestling arena. From a Western perspective it is a pure challenge narrative: a public challenge signalled by the drum, a graduated sequence of tests (animal, then human), and a stated prize. Its structural resemblance to medieval European tournament romance is noteworthy, but its social meaning is precisely the opposite. The European arena was an aristocratic stage; here it becomes a platform of honour for a social stratum that the caste order labelled untouchable. Manikchand's pleasure after his defeat ('he was not saddened; rather, he was delighted') is the moral jewel of the epic. Competition here is not the production of enmity but a way of forming relationships: 'This contest did not turn into hostility; it became respect and a family bond.' It would be difficult to find a more vivid lesson in sportsmanship for children. The defeated side is not humiliated but included.

In terms of rasa, the contest with Chatiya mixes heroism with a touch of adbhuta, the marvellous: the boar's initial flight is an almost supernatural acknowledgement of the hero's prowess. Chhechhan's preparatory smoking of medani flowers is a local gesture of folk heroism, shaping the hero through his community's ways of life rather than a classical ideal. The author neither glorifies nor censors it; the authenticity of the folk text is carried into the children's version. The unfinished contest in the second half, involving Krishnaram and Subaran, is an interesting critical decision. The epic stops at a climax and states that its subsequent development is preserved in folk memory. This is an honest acknowledgement of the reality of oral tradition: a folk epic has no single 'final version.' For young readers the open ending invites an exercise of imagination. Intertextually, Krishnaram is an elephant-riding folk deity here but a Yadav chieftain hired to abduct a girl in Moti Saeri (26). This double form of a single name (compare Chuharmal in Studies 17–18) provides another demonstration of the many voices of folk tradition. The public drum challenge connects directly with Baidla's arena in Amar Baba (24). In both cases a riverside arena becomes a popular court of justice; the difference is that one arena is a den of oppression and the other a measure of honour.

23. Miran Saheb: Orphaned Before Birth — Vengeance, Restraint, and the Vigil beyond Death

The Sayyid family of Dilarinagar—father and all his sons—is wiped out in a single battle at Nunjagarh. A pregnant widow remains in the mansion, and Miran is born into mourning. His mother vows to keep him away from war and marries him young to bind him to domestic life. Yet 'when a heart has already made its decision within, its silence is not consent but preparation.' One morning his room is empty. Miran travels alone to Nunjagarh, touches its soil to his forehead and says, 'Abba, brothers—Miran has come.' He completes his revenge and stops there: no kingdom, no plunder. 'For him vengeance was not a fire to go on spreading; it was a debt that had been discharged, and the ledger was closed.' He returns; the title 'Miran Saheb' arises spontaneously. Even after his death the town remains peaceful: 'Miran Saheb has not gone away; he is on guard.'

This epic brings a distinctive voice into the heroic section: the story of a Muslim folk hero. With it comes evidence that Mithila's popular sacred world is broader than religious boundaries. Just as Dina-Bhadri, Salhes, and Chhechhan acquired shrines, so Miran Saheb remained in the air as 'peace.' The central critical question is the morality of vengeance, and the author's treatment is unusually subtle. On one side he gives full dignity to the two voices counselling against revenge: the mother ('Vengeance does not bring the dead back to life') and the wife ('I too now have a claim upon your life'). On the other side Miran's departure is presented not as thrilling but as almost inevitable. The third and decisive touch is that the real test of courage comes not in battle but afterwards, in knowing when to stop. 'He closed the account and turned his horse around.' Such self-limited vengeance is rare in the world's repertoire of revenge narratives, and for young readers this is its protection under the principle of aucitya. The narrative presents violence not as a cycle without end but as a closed account. Compare Bal Guru (2): there the answer to humiliation was recognition; here the answer to bloodshed is bloodshed. The collection allows both ethical positions to remain true within their respective narrative worlds and leaves the reader's judgement to find a path between them. Such refusal to decide is not an authorial weakness but a dialectical mode of teaching.

On the psychoanalytic level, being 'orphaned before birth' also places the narrative within grief literature. Miran's entire childhood passes beneath the shadow of an absent father: 'Blood speaks its own language.' His journey, in psychological terms, is an act of closure in mourning. Touching the soil to his forehead is a gesture of ancestral remembrance, not a gesture of war. In terms of rasa, the undercurrent of karuna within vira—the widow's threshold, the empty peg, the noiseless departure—brings the narrative towards a sentence from its subtitle that could serve as a formula for the entire collection's philosophy of heroism: 'Heroism does not roar here; it quietly performs its duty and departs.' The sociology of belief in the hero's posthumous guardianship may be compared with the bhagta traditions of Gariban Baba (28) and Lalmain Baba (29). The difference is that folk divinity there is bound to ritual; here it is a pure ethics of memory: 'Wrongdoers feared his name, and the distressed drew strength from it.'

24. Amar Baba: The Price of Protection — A Heroic Epic Examines Itself

The birth of the Kamala River, the life centred on farmers and boatmen, and the predatory designs of the chieftain Baidala upon the reputation of the young river: “I shall marry Kamala, by force!” The boatmen's penance brings a remedy from Bhola Baba: Amarsingh is born in the village of Shivra, his body is forged in the wrestling arena, he throws Baidala to the ground and kills him with a final throw. But the epic does not stop there. The crowd, fearing the survival of Baidala's family, demands that “the entire lineage be wiped out”, and Amarsingh kills Baidala's pregnant wife. “Here the epic lowers its eyes; let us do so too.” From the dead mother's womb a child is born twice as strong. Kamala herself reveals the secret of his death, and Amarsingh kills him—“He never told anyone that way.” In the evening Amarsingh sits alone on the riverbank, victorious yet burdened. After his death he becomes a gahmar, and the old boatman offers two prayers: “One for protection, and one for forgiveness.”

This is the boldest book in the collection because it criticises the heroic epic from within its own form. In the customary grammar of a folk-hero narrative, every killing by the hero is justified. Here the author breaks that grammar: “What happened was the darkest page of the epic … when the sword of courage passes into the hands of fear, whatever it cuts remains as a wound in the heart of the one who wielded it.” The killing of the pregnant woman is neither justified nor erased as a stain merely imposed upon the protagonist. It is recorded as the consequence of collective fear —"Fear has its own logic, and a crowd its own momentum"—and its moral weight remains forever upon the hero's conscience. In Western critical terminology this is a narrative of moral injury, a wound inflicted not upon a warrior's body but upon his moral being. Its presence in literature for children is radical: the young reader is shown not an advertisement for heroism but an account of its moral costs. Fate's response —a son twice as strong, born from the dead mother's womb—is the seed-mathematics of recurring vengeance, expressed by the epic in a single sentence: "The reckoning is not so simple, Amarsingh."

From the standpoint of aucitya, or appropriateness, the statement that "the epic lowers its eyes" openly acknowledges the collection's technique of narrative restraint (compare Bagiyak Gachh, Study 5). The author does not give the child reader the violent scene, but gives the scene its full moral weight. This is the model of a children's adaptation in which simplification does not become suppression of truth. The concealment of Kamala's disclosure of a fatal secret—"He never told anyone that way"—beautifully imitates oral tradition's guardianship of mysteries: even an epic does not share every kind of knowledge. The movement of rasa proceeds from the heroic through compassion to tranquillity, but this is the tranquillity not of victory but of self-examination. The image of two final prayers offers a folk version of the Indian practice of expiation. Intertextually, Baidala's demand for marriage by force echoes, in worldly form, Mansa's command "Worship me" (Study 33): in both instances a relationship or reverence demanded by force is refused. The burden of protecting a river-goddess falling upon a boatman's son also links this work with Gango Devi's Bhagat (Study 30) and Bar Sukh Sar (Study 34), making it part of the collection's literature of water, to be considered together in the conclusion.

25. Bahura Godhin and Natua Dayal: Tantra, Dance, and the Beauty of Complexity

At the meeting of the Kamala and Balan rivers lives Bahura Godhin, a boatwoman's daughter: a stammerer, an adept of Kamru, one who can command trees to move and in anger turn a wedding party into bats. Dulara Dayal, a prince of Bharaur, learns to dance, becomes a natua, and falls in love with Bahura's daughter. Then come the machinations of the trader Jaisingh, the blinding of the minister Mall, and the journey to Kamakhya at the command of the guru Mangal. The prince learns the six dances from a yogini at the Chandika temple, their bodily movements from Bhuvanmohini of Sarraiya, and attains anahad and the ajna-chakra at the terrifying shrine of Vageshwari, together with a mantra against black magic whispered into his ear. On his return he finds that Bahura has dried up the Kamala. Accusations fly; Natua's dance fills the river with water again; and his humble request for forgiveness transforms Bahura's heart: "Now you are worthy of my daughter." The wedding procession, three betel leaves, the mystery of a well-rope, and the restoration of Mall's sight follow. But at the wedding landing a disciple stabs his own teacher. Dying, Natua offers his cloth to Mother Kamala, and the river runs red with blood. The sorceress of Kamakhya revives him and offers the betrayer as a sacrifice to Kamala.

The author acknowledges in his introductory remarks that "this epic is complex, like the current of the Kamala-Balan itself"; the critic's first duty is to defend that complexity. A prevailing prejudice in thinking about children's literature holds that a narrative for children must move along a simple, linear path. Critics such as Peter Hunt repeatedly remind us, however, that children can cope with complex music, complex games, and complex relationships, provided that each turning point rests upon an emotional truth. The turns in Bahura's epic meet precisely this test: anger, discipline, forgiveness, betrayal, sacrifice, and revival all possess intelligible emotional logic even when their sequence of events is dreamlike. Bahura herself is one of the collection's most complex portraits of a woman: "She was loving, and she was terrifying." She kills her own husband to acquire magical knowledge, yet restores Mall's sight. The author's comment that "Bahura was kind at heart, terrible only in anger" teaches the child reader to interpret characters beyond the two rigid categories of villain and saint. This is an introduction to moral complexity and a first step towards the mature readership described by Nikolajeva.

The second dimension for criticism is the conjunction of dance and tantra. Natua's course of discipline—the six dances, anahad, and the ajna-chakra—makes artistic practice and yoga stages upon a single ascent. It embodies the proposition of Indian aesthetics that dance is not simply knowledge of the body but knowledge of consciousness. Making a river overflow through dance supplies the narrative proof. This is the tantric counterpart of Madhav Singh's rain-producing raga (Study 37): there, music bends the sky; here, dance opens the depths. Together the two works complete the collection's philosophy of art: perfected artistic practice acts in partnership with nature. The recurring cry "Ahi re ba" is a refrain of oral performance, preserved in the written text as a reminder that the epic can be sung. The final sacrifice raises a question of aucitya: this cycle of revenge is harsh for young readers. The author achieves balance by calling the sacrifice "a complicated form of justice", not an exemplary action to imitate, and by ending not with uncomplicated celebration but with the burden of reflection: "No simple happy ending." The Kamakhya thread links this epic to Dabna in the Salhes narrative (Study 17) and to Kamakhya's favour in Raghuni Marar (Study 32). In the collection, Kamrup-Kamakhya is a school of folk tantra from which power is obtained; its ethical direction depends upon the purpose of the person wielding it.

26. Motisaeri: The Horoscope, Greed, and the Daughter Shut inside a Chest

Motisaeri is born through a sacrificial rite to the childless King Bhimsen of Morang. Reading her horoscope, the royal priest discovers that "whoever marries this girl will possess all the pleasures of the world", and greed leads him to fabricate a contrary prophecy: "If she stays, the kingdom will come to an end." The girl is sealed in a chest and set adrift. The current carries it beyond the priest waiting at the landing; Gaval, a chief of the forest, finds it and declares, "From today you are my daughter", raising her without inquiring about caste or lineage. The priest's second scheme is to advise the king, desperate for a son, to marry "the daughter of Chief Gaval". Gaval refuses. The king's army is defeated; half the kingdom is promised to Krishnaram; amid the deceit at Marchhaur, Motisaeri is abducted, and in the royal palace her unknowing father proposes marriage to his own daughter. Seeing the entire deception with divine vision, Motisaeri pronounces a curse: "A kingdom that does this to its own daughter shall cease to be a kingdom." She disappears into liberation. The kingdom is destroyed, the priest vanishes without leaving even a name, and a pale figure is seen at dawn in the forest stream.

This epic is the collection's fiercest social indictment, accusing the three kinds of greed named in the introduction itself: the priest's, the king's, and power's. The first critical point concerns the abuse of the authority of knowledge. Here the priest is the figure who holds a monopoly over interpretation—"Astrology in his hand, scripture on his tongue"—and the narrative demonstrates that expertise left unchecked can become more dangerous than royal power. It is the grave, political counterpart of Gonu Jha's exposure of imposture (Study 11). There, pretence is stripped away through humour; here it consumes a daughter's life and the existence of a kingdom. The second observation concerns Gaval: "What the river gives is a trust to be cherished." This forest ethic of adoption offers the verdict of popular wisdom upon the entire doctrine of purity of blood. The only happy chapter of the tale occurs where no one asks about caste or pedigree. From the Videha Parallel-History perspective, this is the moral centre of the epic.

The final marriage proposal, made by a father unknowingly to his own daughter, belongs to an ancient and worldwide class of forbidden incidents that tale-type indexes identify under unnatural marriage proposals. The author's handling of aucitya is especially circumspect. The incident stops at a single instant—"For a moment time stood still"—with no descriptive elaboration. The narrative immediately reinterprets it as a trap "laid by the priest", shifting the moral burden onto the conspirator. Motisaeri responds not with tears but with fire, not with flight but with a curse, and thereafter with liberation. For the child reader she becomes a victim who is not defined by victimhood: "Not once did she lose in this entire story." A paired reading with Mahua (Study 20) is essential. Both are epics of daughters sold or cast into water, both find their final refuge in the river, and in both collective memory transforms the daughter into a presiding spirit of the current. The distinction is that Mahua jumped towards love, while Motisaeri rose beyond deceit. These divergent exits into karuna and shanta are two poles of the collection's examination of women's suffering. The final line—"The kingdom that sets its daughter adrift is itself swept away"—is a maxim of political ethics disguised as a children's story. In the terms of dhvani theory, the expressed meaning is the story's conclusion and the suggested meaning a warning to the present.

Part Four: Devotion, Folk Deities, Ritual, and Epics of Art

27. Moti Dai: Six Days of Motherhood — Devotion's Ledger and the Slate of Compassion

Moti Dai, a washerwoman devotee from Ujjaini, serves daily at the shrine of Mother Gahil, yet her own lap remains empty. While she makes cow-dung cakes one evening, women of the cattle-herders' settlement hurl words as sharp as barbs: "Barren … even the livestock will perish if they see her." Wounded, she turns to a devotion that rebels, digging up the shrine platform with her own hands and crying, "Appear, Mother!" Mother Gahil appears and goes to Indra's court to consult the ledger: "The fruit of a previous birth; no child is written." Moti Dai prepares to die; the goddess returns a second time to insist, and compassion adds a line to the decree: a child shall be born, but shall die on the sixth-day rite. Moti Dai answers, "For a lap that has been empty all its life, even six days are six ages." She experiences six complete days of motherhood; under the lamp of the chhathihari ceremony the child dies. Moti Dai then begins a second life as a bhagata, becoming an answer to the empty laps of others.

This is the collection's most refined composition in karuna rasa, for its compassion arises not simply from an event but from a choice. Moti Dai knowingly accepts six days of happiness and grief on the seventh, and that informed consent confers dignity upon the tragedy. Western criticism would recognise a folk discussion of theodicy, the justification of suffering under divine justice. The story constructs its answer at three levels: decree (the ledger), compassion (the goddess's insistence), and transformation of meaning (removal of stigma). The last is the subtlest: "Yet the sorrow of being barren ended for her." The child does not survive, but the mark of "barrenness" is washed away forever. The epic distinguishes sorrow from humiliation and shows how humiliation inflicted by society may weigh more heavily than suffering attributed to fate. A young reader absorbs this distinction not as a doctrine but as narrative experience, together with a lesson in verbal violence through the women of the cattle-herders' settlement: "It is one thing to weep privately, and another to be called inauspicious on the village road."

From an Indian perspective, the digging-up of the shrine is a jewel of the philosophy of bhakti: "It was not rebellion; it was devotion's final language, as a child pulls at its mother's sari-end." A devotee's right to quarrel with the deity—from Sur and Mira to a folk woman devotee—is that democratic gesture of Indian devotion which raises prayer above supplication into a relationship. The goddess's two journeys to petition on Moti Dai's behalf bring the relationship to its height. Indra's ledger makes karma theory intelligible to a child, but the emphasis falls not upon the decree but upon the "slate" within it, "where compassion may add a few lines". The point of contact between fatalism and compassion is the epic's philosophical achievement. Intertextually, Budhni's penance (Study 16) and Moti Dai's are opposite poles of the same discipline: penance is a power whose direction depends upon the devotee. The bhagata institution arises here from compassion; its male counterparts, Gariban Baba (Study 28) and Lalmain Baba (Study 29), arise from the cycle of justice. Together the three make a complete triangle of Mithila's bhagata tradition.

28. Gariban Baba: An Unwitting Mistake, Divine Punishment, and Collective Atonement

Three friends from Udhra village—Barham Thakur, Ghasi Yadav, and Gariban the washerman—gather at the wrestling arena. Near it Gariban inadvertently touches with his foot the platform dedicated to Mother Kamala. Enraged, Mother Kamala brings a tigress from Indra's court as punishment. An unequal fight takes place in the arena; Gariban is killed, and his body is cast into the Kamala River. At the washermen's landing another washerman, inconvenienced in his work, pushes the corpse away into the current—a second unwitting wrong. In response to the anguish of Gariban's wife, his spirit speaks through the body of a bhagata: all the washermen must recover the body and perform the funeral rites, or clothes will burn in their washing furnaces. They search together, perform the proper rites, and remove the curse. From then on Gariban Baba becomes the guardian of the furnaces.

From the standpoint of the sociology of religion, this short epic is the clearest text in the collection. The entire making of a folk deity is displayed in four stages: an unjust death, dishonour after death, the spirit's demand, collective redress, and the institutionalisation of that redress in a new guardian of the furnaces. What an anthropologist of religion would call a narrative of cult formation is available here in the simplicity of a children's tale. Its educational value lies in enabling children to understand the surrounding traditions of bhagatas and their sacred enclosures not as superstition or spectacle but as meaningful institutions of social memory. The central distinction in its moral grammar is between the unwitting and the deliberate. Both errors—the accidental touch and the pushing away of the corpse—occur without a stated wish to cause injury, yet consequences follow. The narrative teaches the difficult difference between intention and effect: even unintended harm requires social repair. An apology is not an admission that one meant harm, but an acceptance of responsibility for what one's action caused. In the language of contemporary ethics, this is a folk lesson in "accountability without shame".

A critic must naturally question the proportionality of the goddess's punishment: death for an accidental touch? The epic answers through its structure. It does not present the deity's punishment as an example to imitate, but uses it as the starting point and directs nearly all its energy towards restoration. The final chapter's assertion that "the victim may himself become a protector" changes a punishment narrative into one of transformation. Read beside the question of sacrifice in Battu (Study 6), the question of divine anger here produces a portrait of the relation between gods and humanity that is not free of fear but remains open to dialogue: a deity is not the last word, but another party to a conversation. The opening image of three companions—a Thakur, a Yadav, and a washerman sharing an arena—is the epic's social line of hope, which criticism should not overlook. Their caste names are given, yet in the arena they are companions; and folk divinity ultimately comes to the washerman whose labour with clothes and washing furnaces forms the axis of the tale. This consecration of work is a foundational proposition of the Videha Parallel-History perspective, further developed in Lalmain Baba (Study 29) and Raghuni Marar (Study 32).

29. Lalmain Baba: Hesitation Before a Tigress and the Weight of a Last Wish

Two Chamar friends from Nauhatta, Mansaram and Lalmain, graze buffaloes together. When a tigress attacks, Lalmain fights to protect the animals, but hesitates to exert his full strength against a female creature and is killed. His final request as he dies is simple: "Let my funeral rites be performed properly." Mansaram returns to the village without telling anyone. The angry spirit kills him by "making him bleat"; the village learns what occurred, collectively performs Lalmain's funeral rites, and brings peace to his spirit. Thereafter Lalmain Baba is venerated as a bhagata.

This is among the collection's briefest heroic-devotional narratives, yet its moral density is remarkable. The first critical issue is the hesitation that costs Lalmain his life: "He hesitated to strike a female tigress with his full force." This is a singular moment in folk ethics. The hero's code of valour —do not strike a female—extends even into the animal world. Although the story shows the fatal cost of such overextension, it does not ridicule the principle: "The cost of this sacrifice and morality was exceedingly great." In other words, the narrative acknowledges the tragic aspect of a moral rule without making the rule itself laughable. For the young reader this may be a first encounter with an expensive principle, and with a question that opens the door to mature ethical thought: ought one uphold a principle even when it costs one's life? The story offers respect rather than a categorical answer, and that respect teaches more than a ready-made answer might.

The second centre of the tale is the institution of the last wish. In customary ethics a dying person's request is almost a debt, and Mansaram's silence—whose cause the epic honestly leaves uncertain, "fear, self-interest, or neglect"—refuses that debt. The form of revenge taken by the spirit is severe for young readers; once again the author handles aucitya through restraint, disposing of the killing in a single phrase without description. The narrative's centre of gravity then immediately shifts to collective atonement. The pattern is precisely that of Gariban Baba (Study 28): an individual's failure followed by a community's repair. The parallel suggests a conscious pairing within the architecture of the collection. Washerman and Chamar alike become folk deities of labouring communities, and in each instance posthumous respect stands at the root of divinity. A sociological reading observes that folk religion creates an institution of honour after death for those who may have found honour scarce in life. Together these narratives plant in the child's imagination a first sense of justice in the distribution of respect. Along the axis of friendship and betrayal, this epic occupies a darker pole than the collection's tales of friendship (Pattu, Study 19; Jitan, Study 16; and the stone-friend, Study 12). Elsewhere a friend gives his life; here a friend cannot even give his word. Between these poles the child reader's own ethics of friendship can take shape.

30. Gango Devi's Bhagat: The Power of a Name — The Gentlest Devotional Epic

It is the fair in the month of Sawan. Gango Devi's husband goes fishing with his brother and father, hoping to sell the catch and buy bangles and lac bracelets for Gango. All day the net brings up only shells and other unwanted creatures. On the final attempt he casts it in his wife's name: "This is the last time, Gango … forgive me!" The net fills with so many fish that it can hardly be pulled in. The same thing happens the following day. The brother and father still catch only shells and crabs, and the secret comes to light: Gango's name possesses power. The belief spreads among the boatmen, and even today Gango is remembered before the net is cast: this is the devotion of Gango Devi's bhagat.

This is the shortest and gentlest book in the collection, and criticism should begin by defending its smallness. The author himself underlines the point: "There is no monster, no battle, no complicated conspiracy here." That is precisely its generic courage. The elaborate apparatus of a miracle tale is reduced to a husband's address to his wife. What, then, is the source of the miracle? The story's own answer is psychologically exact: "This humility, this faith, is the true source of the miracle." The crucial words are the husband's admission of failure before his wife—"forgive me". Within the patriarchal grammar of folk tradition, that posture of address is itself a small revolution; the epic shows it as fruitful. The performative theory of language that appeared in Battu (Study 6) in the form of boastful speech appears here in its opposite form. There the utterance created fear; here the name gives rise to faith. Together they complete the collection's philosophy of speech: words derive their power from the feeling animating them.

From the sociology of religion, this epic offers a fourth and distinctive form of the bhagata tradition. Moti Dai (Study 27) attains divinity through compassion, and Gariban (Study 28) and Lalmain (Study 29) through cycles of justice. Gango does so without death or suffering, purely through a memory of love. "A private experience within one family became a collective belief": this is the gentlest possible birth narrative of folk religion. Notice also its labouring world. The devotional story is at the same time an account of livelihood, of nets, fishing grounds, markets, bangles, and lac bracelets. Devotion does not replace work but accompanies it; the remembrance before casting the net is followed, of course, by the casting. For a child reader the structure of its message is exemplary. There is wonder, which nourishes imagination, but it is no lottery: it rests upon a triangle of relationship, humility, and effort. Between the penance of boatmen in Amar Baba (Study 24) and the grace of the Ganga in Bar Sukh Sar (Study 34), this is the middle voice in the devotional literature of the river-dwelling communities. The three works together establish that, in Mithila's water culture, the river is at once a livelihood, a goddess, and a witness.

31. Jyoti Panjiyar: Twelve Years for a Refusal — From Curse to Blessing

Jyoti Panjiyar, a tantric adept of Pampipur, is absorbed in building a sacred enclosure, or gahbar. Dharmaraj, the family deity, approaches disguised as a beggar and asks for alms "from Jyoti's own hands". Jyoti refuses: "I shall not leave the building of the gahbar to come." The result is a curse of poverty and leprosy. Rebuffed at his sister's door, he takes shelter with a friend in Oitdal. A tantric directs him to worship Dharmaraj for twelve years in the banana forest. The shadow of the curse falls upon his journey: a saini tree that gives him shade dries and falls, and Koili, who goes to fetch water for him, dies in a storm. Dharmaraj appears in the guise of a buffalo-keeper and gives a sign; on a leaf is written, "This is Achhamitpur." A childless king receives a boon involving a goat. After twelve years of penance follows a chain of restoration: Koili comes back to life, the river runs again, the saini tree becomes green, and the hidden bond between the goat and the king's son is explained. Jyoti returns to Pampipur carrying the gahbar wrapped in his gamchha.

The philosophical centre of this epic is a recurring question in devotional literature: when service and direct encounter clash, which has priority? Jyoti is building a house for the deity and turns away the deity himself when he arrives as a beggar. The narrative's diagnosis is explicit: "Between work and devotion Jyoti chose work." The means became more important than the end. The curse therefore punishes an inversion of priorities, not necessarily arrogance but inattentiveness to what matters most. This subtle distinction is valuable for children. The tale warns not the lazy person but the excessively busy one—a failing of modern life that a child of any period may recognise in a parent or guardian. What follows is one of the collection's most moving images of contagious misfortune: a tree dies merely from providing shade, and Koili perishes while offering service. Suffering does not remain alone but spreads to those we love. Jyoti's response—"From now on, care at every step, lest anyone else be hurt"—shows compassion being born within suffering.

The twelve-year penance is the collection's fullest use of a time-measure also found in Dabna (Study 17), Maruvan (Study 15), the twelve-year charitable kitchen (Study 12), and Naika (Study 21). Its results are calculated through a sequence of revival: those who died through the curse live again through penance. This balanced ledger of harm and repair presents a folk ideal of justice; its opposite, the irreparability of harm, has already been shown in Amar Baba (Study 24). Together these works teach the reader that some losses can be restored and others cannot. The linked life of the goat and the prince—the prince will return if the goat is found—is an affectionate version of the folktale motif of the external soul. Here a life is not hidden in a monster's parrot but in an animal tied to a blessing. The closing image, "the gahbar in a gamchha", is the epic's answer to its own opening. The sacred enclosure, whose construction had become so weighty that Jyoti turned away the deity, has become light enough to carry in a cloth. Devotion has travelled from burden to lightness. That trajectory prepares for the question of disguise and devotion's burdens addressed directly in Ugna (Study 35).

32. Raghuni Marar: The Armour of Devotion and the Court of False Accusation

Driven from his village by famine, Raghuni Marar reached Bidia Barhampur. He won the wrestling contest held by Jugal Prasad, received a gift of a hundred bighas of land, and established a cattle enclosure at Sugama. The estate was subsequently sold to the Gagori Raj. During a dance performance in the courtyard of the Chaudhary of Simri, Raghuni's generosity—a gift of a pair of cows to the performer—aroused the Chaudhary's jealousy. Makdum Jogi launched three attacks: enchanted mustard seeds proved powerless; a hundred tigers, summoned through mastery of Chandika, killed Raghuni, but Kamakhya restored him to life; and a third assault, the yogi's closed-fist binding spell, failed as well. Then came legal deceit: "He has not paid the rent, and he is stopping the others from paying." The soldiers seized his brother Devdatta; although Raghuni appeared along the road, he remained invisible to the soldiers. In the prison cell, the blows of the whip rebounded upon the man wielding it. The king acknowledged his mistake, released the tenants imprisoned for non-payment of rent, and sought from Raghuni the honour called ghaṭṭī.

This ballad exemplifies the collection's figure of the "invincible devotee." The key to its criticism is the three-rung ladder of assaults: magic at the individual level; physical violence in the form of a hundred tigers; and, finally, the machinery of the state—false accusation, arrest, and whipping. The narrative shows that when envy fails through direct force, it assumes the guise of an institution. The third weapon is more dangerous than the first two: Kamakhya can save Raghuni from the tigers, but the innocent brother becomes the victim of a fabricated charge. For a child reader, this ascending sequence provides an education in recognising injustice: injustice does not always arrive as a monster; sometimes it comes as a piece of paper. The final form of divine intervention, in which the lashes turn back upon the person administering them, is a poetic formula of popular justice that redirects punishment towards the punisher (compare the counter-condition in Bhat-Bhatin, Study 10, and the witch's retribution in Bagiyak Gachh, Study 5). The hero does not himself inflict violence: the system collides with itself. This imagination of nonviolent justice is especially appropriate to writing for children.

The episode in which the Chaudhary's jealousy originates displays subtle social observation. He interprets Raghuni's generosity, the gift of cows, as an attempt to make him appear inferior. The story shows that envy can arise not from humiliation but from another person's virtues. In the collection's chain of envious figures—the jackal in Study 8, Prithvipal in Study 19, and Thapa in Study 17—this is the most delicate link, for the "cause" of jealousy is not any harm done by the victim but the manner in which he does good. The story explicitly identifies the source of Raghuni's invulnerability: "Raghuni was a devotee of the goddess; therefore the magic did not work on him." A critical precaution is necessary here, however. The formula of a devotional shield should not become, in a child's mind, the simplistic equation "devotee = invulnerable." The collection supplies its own counterexample: Dina and Bhadri (Study 16), despite their profound devotion, were killed through deception. Reading the two narratives together teaches the complexity of devotion's consequences. Finally, the king's request for ghaṭṭī—the punishing authority becoming a supplicant for honour—is one of those folk moments in which power is reversed. In Nikolajeva's terms, it offers one of the deepest pleasures of children's literature: the child, and the labouring person, witness the moment when the balance is overturned.

33. Bihula: Defiance upon a Raft — A Children's Recasting of the Manasa Epic

Chand Saudagar of Champanagar possesses fourteen ships and is an unwavering devotee of Shiva: "This head bows in one place alone." Manasa, hungry for recognition, leaves Kailasa and demands worship specifically from him. When he refuses, she kills his seven sons and sinks his fourteen ships, yet the merchant will not yield: "What value has a head bowed out of fear?" A spark survives in the heap of ashes: Lakhindar is born. He marries Bihula, blessed with unbroken married felicity, but even the lattice-work bridal chamber cannot exclude Manasa, who enters in a form thinner than the thinnest opening and strikes with her venom. Bihula sets out with her husband's corpse upon a banana-stem raft: "Where my married happiness goes, I shall go there too." A washerwoman's play between death and life at Triveni shows her the way. After austerities at Manasa's door, she asks not merely for her own husband: "Life for Lakhindar and for all seven of his elder brothers." Eight lives return, eight lamps of worship burn in Champanagar, and the paired worship of Manasa and Bihula begins.

This ballad is a Maithili children's recasting of eastern India's extensive Manasa-mangal tradition, and its art of adaptation is the first subject of criticism. The immense original tradition, running to thousands of lines of mangal-kavya, is condensed into a carefully shaped arc of twelve chapters. The author's distribution of emphasis is significant: the contest of stubborn wills between goddess and merchant occupies the first half, and Bihula's journey occupies the second. The ballad's centre of gravity thus shifts from a struggle for power to the pilgrimage of a woman's determination. Chand Saudagar's character offers child readers an unusually complex gift. Is he a hero, or merely obstinate? The narrative answers: both. "His grief was a mountain, but his steadfastness rose higher than the mountain." His refusal of worship founded on fear—"A goddess who can take seven innocent lives is not asking for worship; she is demanding fear"—raises precisely the question of religious ethics that returns to children's minds and is so often suppressed. The ballad does not suppress it. Even at the end, resolution comes by gratitude, not terror: "Worship born of gratitude is always greater than worship born of fear."

From the standpoint of Propp, Bihula's journey is a fully recognisable quest: departure; encounter with a helper (the washerwoman as donor figure); severe ordeal; acquisition of a boon; and return. Its revolution lies in the identity of the traveller—a newly married woman—and in her means of travel, a raft carrying her husband's corpse. A comparable image would be difficult to find in world children's literature. The ballad offers a folk-traditional revision of the linear, masculine structure of Joseph Campbell's "hero's journey." Bihula's weapons are determination, service, and a question: "The goddess was angry with a man—why should the bride bear the punishment?" The enlargement of her final request—"She came for herself, but asked for everyone: that is what makes Bihula Bihula"—marks the leap from individual deliverance to communal welfare that distinguishes the Indian devotional heroine from the Western quest hero. The personification of Manasa's "hunger for recognition," a hunger "like a human being's," is an example of the folk tradition's courage in portraying deities. The concluding joint worship of goddess and human heroine is the institutional consequence of that courage: "In what other ballad is there such a union of devotion and power?" The intertextual density is considerable. The proverbial ending "Become Bihula" turns the tale into a living idiom (compare "attaining the Ganga like Bodhi Kayastha" in Study 34). The protective lattice-work bridal chamber is the inverse image of the chest in Motisaeri (Study 26): there enclosure was an injustice, here it is protection, and both fail. Again and again, the folk epic declares that fate does not obey a lock, but it can yield to austerity.

34. Baṛ Sukh Sār Pāol Tua Tīre: An Unblemished Life and a Literary Pilgrimage

Bodhi Kayastha of the Mithila court lived on his salary and gave away what remained in charity and pious works. Throughout his life he kept clear of violence and covetous desire; he was a devotee of Bhola Baba. Sensing that death was near, he resolved to obtain the blessing of the Ganga. From a distance described in the source as adhā kos, he called to the river. Mother Ganga broke through her bank, came to him, and took him into herself: he went directly to heaven. The incident belonged to a time before Vidyapati, who set it down in Purusha-pariksha and composed the immortal Maithili lyric upon it: "Baṛ sukh sār pāol tua tīre" ("I found the essence of great happiness upon your bank").

This is the collection's briefest plot—one miracle and one principal figure—yet its critical significance is exceptionally layered, for it is a book of literary history as much as a storybook. The first layer is an inverse method of characterisation. Folk heroes are ordinarily known by their actions; Bodhi Kayastha is defined by his non-actions—what he did not do: commit violence, covet another's spouse or wealth, or hoard possessions. In children's literature this art of characterisation through "negative space" is rare and valuable. The story establishes an ideal without a single spectacle of heroism, and tests that ideal at the end. Calling to the Ganga from adhā kos away is an audacity of faith: "This was neither arrogance nor reckless daring, but the innocent appeal of a wholly surrendered devotee." The river's breaking of its bank is the response. In the vocabulary of devotional thought, this is a tale of "grace that crosses its own bounds": the rule represented by the riverbank yields before love. In Bihula (Study 33), destiny yielded to austerity; here geography yields to devotion.

The second layer is literary self-consciousness, and here this book is unique within the collection. The narrative tells its own literary biography: an event, its Sanskrit inscription in Purusha-pariksha, its transformation into a Maithili lyric, and finally its passage into a proverb ("Ganga's blessing, like Bodhi Kayastha's"). For the first time, child readers are shown the process by which an event becomes a book and a book becomes culture. This self-account of textual transmission is a foundational lesson in literary education. Vidyapati's presence also reveals a trilogy in the collection's architecture: Baṛ Sukh Sār presents Vidyapati as narrator and singer; Ugna (Study 35) presents him as a character; and Jat-Jatin (Study 36) presents the folk theatre arising from the courtly age of Vidyapati. Together they reveal to the child three aspects of the great poet—creator, devotee, and historical age. This teaching of literary history through narrative is an original pedagogical experiment. In terms of rasa, the story is a rare, pure example of śānta-rasa in the collection. Its depiction of death—willingly anticipated and suffused with grace—introduces dignity where children might otherwise find only fear. What Bettelheim identifies as a fairy tale's profound service, reconciliation with an ending, is accomplished here without a monster, in the embrace of a river.

35. Ugna: Mahadeva as a Servant — Devotion's Sweetest Reversal

On Kailasa, Shiva sways as he listens to Vidyapati's nachari songs and forms a wish: "I want to hear these songs while staying close to him." Taking the name Ugna, he becomes Vidyapati's servant. On a road in the fierce heat of Jeth, the poet faints; Ugna releases a stream of Ganga water from his matted locks and gives him a drink. The taste of that water reveals his identity. Shiva imposes a condition: "The day my true name escapes your lips, I shall disappear." On Kailasa, the lonely Parvati devises a scheme involving tetari fruit. The tree is bare and Ugna returns empty-handed; then comes Chandana's broom, and from Vidyapati's heart bursts the cry "Ha, Shiva!" Ugna vanishes. The distraught poet wanders crying "Ugna re, mor katay gelah?" ("O Ugna, where have you gone?"), and a shrine to Ugna Mahadeva is established at Bhit-Bhagwanpur.

This ballad is the crowning jewel of the collection's devotional group. Its central marvel is the reversal the story itself calls "the sweetest inversion in devotional literature": the one who should be served becomes a servant, out of hunger for song. In the vocabulary of bhakti philosophy, this is the supreme example of God's tenderness towards the devotee. Its value as children's literature, however, lies on another plane: it is a tale of domestic intimacy. Shiva washes vessels, goes in search of tetari fruit, and endures a broom. "Mithila turns even its gods into members of the household—this is its greatest achievement." What greater religious lesson could a child receive than the possibility that the divine is approachable even in the kitchen? The inverse of Nodelman's "hidden adult" is here a "hidden god"; sustaining the disguise is itself an austerity: "Had he performed a miracle, the disguise would have broken; maintaining the disguise was also a kind of penance."

The tragic mechanism of the ballad is precise, and criticism must distinguish its three components. First comes the nature of the condition: the secret depends upon a name being spoken—and the name escapes at precisely the instant when devotion is strongest. Seeing Shiva struck with a broom, the devotee cannot remain silent. "He broke the condition himself; but why did he break it? Because of devotion." This self-defeating logic of tragedy—one loses what one wishes to preserve—is among world literature's deepest patterns, here enacted with clarity accessible to children. Second is Parvati's position: the tale does not make her a villain; her manoeuvre arises "from love's sense of entitlement." Third is Chandana's innocence: "She was angry with a servant, not with a deity. If anyone must be blamed, blame the love that turned God into a servant." Together the three components make a tragedy without a villain. A young reader may weep, but need not hate anyone: an exemplary lesson in emotional understanding. Finally, the song deepened by separation —"Grief is the poet's dive, and from that dive comes the pearl"—offers an aesthetic principle that will resonate as far as Madhav Singh (Study 37): the connection of art and suffering. Jyoti Panjiyar's (Study 31) question of "service versus direct encounter" is reversed here. There the devotee sent the god away; here the god asked to serve the devotee. Read together, the stories reveal devotion as a two-way movement.

36. Jat-Jatin: Women's Own Theatre — Love, Domestic Life, and the Ritual of Rain

The setting is the age of Maharaja Shiv Singh (1412–1446). The musician Jayat is said to have set Vidyapati's songs to ragas and raginis; he composed the Jat-Jatin play and himself performed the role of Jat. This folk theatre, performed by women on the bright nights of Sawan and Bhadav, features Jat and Jatin and their groups of female companions. Its episodes include Jatin's insistence on visiting her natal home and the intervening flood; discussion of the rules for sending off a bride; an invitation to the jhumar dance ("On what leaf will you ride?"—"On the leaf of the water lily"); a symbolic wedding; the sale of even an elephant to satisfy demands for jewellery; departure for Morang; rejection of a goldsmith's temptation; anger at the touch of chhauṅkī; a home infested with insects and spiders; and reunion. At the end comes a frog-beating rain ritual and the throwing of the frog at the door of a quarrelsome woman: "The more abuse, the more rain."

Generically, this book is extraordinary within the collection. It does not retell a story; it narratively documents a living folk drama, and its critical vocabulary must therefore come from theatre studies. The first proposition is that this is women's own theatre. Its composition is attributed to a man, Jayat, but performers, characters, and audience are all women. Within a patriarchal society, this seasonal "space of their own"—a liminal space in Victor Turner's terminology—allows the subdued voices of domestic life to speak on stage: longing for one's natal home, desire for ornaments, humiliation at the touch of chhauṅkī, fear of a co-wife. The audience of women sees "a glimpse of its own life." This vernacular form of drama therapy deserves the critic's respect. Its value for children is twofold: girls encounter the cultural inheritance of their mothers and aunts, while boys encounter domestic feelings that are often excluded from their studies.

The second proposition concerns the ritual dimension, and criticism must be candid here. The rain rite involving the beating of a frog is a classic example of sympathetic magic; an analysis in the tradition of Frazer's The Golden Bough applies directly. Yet the episode sits uneasily with modern children's sensibilities and with compassion towards animals, which the collection itself nurtures in the episodes concerning the sadhin (Study 15) and the cuckoo (Study 31). The author's treatment is documentary, not prescriptive: the act is recorded as a "ritual linked to folk belief," not glorified. The critical recommendation is that an adult mediator should make this chapter an occasion for discussion. Folk tradition is not an object in a museum but a living river that continues to change course. Deciding what deserves preservation and what calls for reconsideration is part of cultural education. Structurally, the play's arc—union, quarrel, separation, reunion—is a complete seasonal cycle of marriage. Its parallel with the rain cycle (estrangement as drought, reunion as rain) is the ballad's deep metaphor: domestic life and agriculture follow the same weather. This third panel of the Vidyapati trilogy (Studies 34–36) supplies the social and cultural setting of the age; its seasonal kinship with the Sawan–Bhadav of Mahua (Study 20) completes the collection's "Bhadav literature": one swollen current, carrying sorrow in one place and celebration in another.

37. Madhav Singh and Amta Village: Raga Megh-Malhar — The Final Note of an Epic of Art

Mithila is afflicted by famine. At a deliberation in the court, mention is made of four musician brothers at the Nepal court. Radhakrishna and Kartaram arrive, practitioners of dhrupad, accompanied by the pakhawaj player Bhim Mallik. Clouds gather during the nom-tom alap; the first drops fall with the measured strokes of the composition, followed by a downpour so heavy that water enters the court itself. Messengers go from village to village and report, "There is no dry place anywhere." Only then does the singing stop. In gratitude the king settles the two brothers in Amta, where the fruit of the khiri tree yields milk, and establishes a custom of listening to dhrupad there. As death approaches he makes a final request: "Take me to Amta; let me hear dhrupad once more." The palanquin is still on its way, before reaching Amta, when the king dies. That evening the fruit of the khiri tree sheds "tears instead of milk." After a long silence, a tanpura sounds again in Amta: the first raga is Megh-Malhar, and rain falls without clouds.

This final ballad, in the order adopted for this review, has been deliberately placed here because it is the concluding chapter of the entire collection's aesthetics of art. "This is an epic not of the sword but of the musical note." The opening declaration sets a theory of alternative power against the heroic group's whole vocabulary of weapons: accomplished art participates in nature itself. "If the raga is true and the discipline complete, even the sky becomes a listener." The story of music bringing rain belongs to the familiar family of Indian musical beliefs that attribute the power of rainfall to Megh-Malhar. Criticism should read it not as a scientific claim but as a metaphor of faith in art, and the metaphor has depth. Drought here is more than weather; it is the draining away of a society's life force, and music becomes its restoration. "To sing a raga here is not to provide music; it is to return life." The intended paired reading with Gonu Jha (Study 11)—the same drought, false austerity as against genuine discipline—has already been discussed there. What remains to add is that together the two tales provide children with a test of authenticity: not the grandeur of a claim, but the depth of practice.

The latter half of the ballad, centred on an unfulfilled last wish, is the collection's most restrained tragedy: "No curse, no battle—only an unfinished desire." Death is not punishment here, nor an obstruction deliberately imposed; it is simply the road falling short. In children's literature this third face of death, after the gracious death of Baṛ Sukh Sār and the battlefield deaths of the heroic narratives, completes a spectrum of learning about mortality. Children discover that some wishes remain unfulfilled, yet a life is not thereby worthless. "The king remained on the road—but in the story he reached Amta, for ever." This final sentence, immortality through storytelling, is the collection's self-description. All thirty-seven books do the same: those who were left on the road—the Musahar brothers, the Ghatwarin, the labourer, the woman devotee, the king—are carried to their destination by narrative. Kartaram's grieving silence and his return with Megh-Malhar ("an offering of melody is the true rite for the dead") enact the principle of Ugna's song of separation (Study 35). The milk-tears of the khiri tree are the collection's last unforgettable image of compassion: nature is not a spectator but a fellow mourner.

Epilogue: Thirty-Seven Books, One Literary World

At the end of these thirty-seven reviews, let us return to the question raised in the introduction: are these thirty-seven independent books, or do they constitute a single literary world? The evidence gathered along the course of the reviews supports the second answer. Its principal pillars can now be identified.

The first pillar is a recurring artistic signature. The narrative openings associated with Ba-Om (Studies 1 and 4) open the collection, and close it in humour, as a renewal of the Panchatantra tradition. The visual rhythm of the picture panels creates a double reading of word and image in the books. Most distinctive of all is the technique of narrative restraint: "the ballad lowers its eyes" (Study 24); "that is something the ballad will not describe in detail" (Studies 5 and 26); and the resolution of a death scene in a single sentence (Studies 4, 10, and 29). Such restraint is the golden mean of a children's edition: it preserves the darkness that Bettelheim considers necessary while maintaining a restraint consonant with aucitya—simplification without suppressing the truth. Alongside this, the narrator's aphoristic voice ("Revenge returns home, but justice returns"; "Time is the greatest court"; "Lovers die, but love becomes a fair") gives the collection a common treasury of wisdom. The ending "Even today …" in almost every ballad connects narrative to a living tradition and declares the continuity of collective memory.

The second pillar is an intertextual web whose knots have been revealed throughout the sequence of studies: the dual Salhes figure (Studies 16–17); the doubling of the names Chuharmal and Krishnaram (Studies 17–18 and 22–26); the paired images of vermilion made from blood (Studies 18–19); the two "daughters carried away by the current" (Studies 20–26); the twelve-year measure of narrative time (Studies 12, 15, 17, 21, and 31); the Kamakhya thread (Studies 17, 25, and 32); the four devotees (Studies 27–30); the sequence of prohibitions (Studies 6, 13, 14, and 35); the Vidyapati trilogy (Studies 34–36); the drought pair (Studies 11 and 37); and the literature of water—the Kamala, Ganga, Paraman, Jabuna, and Triveni—in which a river appears in five forms: livelihood, goddess, refuge, witness, and cremation ground. This network asks readers to place works side by side and compare them. That has also been the method of the present critical volume.

The third pillar is an architecture of values, distinguished not by unanimity but by dialectical tension. Forgiveness (Study 2) faces vengeance (Studies 16 and 23); the teacher's word, disregarded in Study 19, and the father's word, proved false in Study 14, are both questioned; the shield of devotion (Study 32) and the killing of a devotee (Study 16) coexist as truths; and the two destinies of inter-caste love (Studies 18–19) are placed together without false reassurance. The collection does not deliver sermons: it offers pairs of paradigms and leaves the arena of judgement open to the reader's discernment. This trust in children's ability to hold contradictions—the respect for the child described by Peter Hunt—is its highest expression. Above all rises the social vision at the heart of the Videha Parallel-History model: Musahar, Dusadh, Dom, Dhobi, Chamar, Mallah, Kewat, Rajak, and Marar all have their epics in the same series of books of honour; deities and labourers stand "in the same courtyard, before the same lamp and incense." Alongside them runs an unbroken line of female agency—Aastha, Mansha, Dabna, Reshma, Munga, Mahua, Bihula, Motisaeri, Maruvan, Bari, Bhat's sister, and Moti Dai. Together they make the collection a literature of equality as well as a literature for children.

Finally there is the historical significance of this literary world. Maithili children's literature has received three things at once: modern original imaginative writing, extending as far as dystopia; a systematic doorway for children into an encyclopaedia of folk culture—epics, tales, theatre, and music; and its own capacity to withstand criticism. These are texts that can be analysed by every standard, from rasa and aucitya to Propp and Bettelheim, and yield new meanings under each. A child who reads these thirty-seven books will not merely read thirty-seven stories; that child will read the memory of a language, the conscience of a society, and the future of a tradition. The critic who reads them must acknowledge that the Maithili children's novel is no longer a "field of scarcity": it is a rich, self-aware literary world in dialogue with other traditions, all of whose landing places belong to the same pond. And that pond is called Mithila.

22. A Comparative Study of Thirteen Translated Books [Sanskrit-to-Maithili Translations by Gajendra Thakur] — In the Light of Indian and Western Theories

Abstract

An Overall Review—Caturbhāṇī, Dāmaka Prahasanam, Hāsyārṇava, Āgamḍambara, Kādambarī, the Satirical Triad of Bhallaṭa, Kṣemendra and Nīlakaṇṭha, Palāṇḍumaṇḍana, Uttararāmacaritam, Abhijñānaśākuntalam, Mudrārākṣasam, Mṛcchakaṭikam, Bhagavadajjukam and Mattavilāsa: A Comparative Study of Thirteen Translated Books [Sanskrit-to-Maithili Translations by Gajendra Thakur]. An Overall Review—Caturbhāṇī, Dāmaka Prahasanam, Hāsyārṇava, Āgamḍambara, Kādambarī, the Satirical Triad of Bhallaṭa, Kṣemendra and Nīlakaṇṭha, Palāṇḍumaṇḍana, Uttararāmacaritam, Abhijñānaśākuntalam, Mudrārākṣasam, Mṛcchakaṭikam, Bhagavadajjukam and Mattavilāsa.

Keywords: thirteen · translated · books · comparative · from Sanskrit · translation · Indian · Western

An Overall Review—Caturbhāṇī, Dāmaka Prahasanam, Hāsyārṇava, Āgamḍambara, Kādambarī, the Satirical Triad of Bhallaṭa, Kṣemendra and Nīlakaṇṭha, Palāṇḍumaṇḍana, Uttararāmacaritam, Abhijñānaśākuntalam, Mudrārākṣasam, Mṛcchakaṭikam, Bhagavadajjukam and Mattavilāsa: A Comparative Study of Thirteen Translated Books [Sanskrit-to-Maithili Translations by Gajendra Thakur].

An Overall Review—Caturbhāṇī, Dāmaka Prahasanam, Hāsyārṇava, Āgamḍambara, Kādambarī, the Satirical Triad of Bhallaṭa, Kṣemendra and Nīlakaṇṭha, Palāṇḍumaṇḍana, Uttararāmacaritam, Abhijñānaśākuntalam, Mudrārākṣasam, Mṛcchakaṭikam, Bhagavadajjukam and Mattavilāsa.

Detailed Criticism — From the Standpoint of Indian and Western Literary Theories

The Nature of the Collection

Taken together, these thirteen books—Caturbhāṇī, Dāmaka Prahasanam, Hāsyārṇava, Āgamḍambara, Kādambarī, the satirical triad of Bhallaṭa, Kṣemendra and Nīlakaṇṭha, Palāṇḍumaṇḍana, Uttararāmacaritam, Abhijñānaśākuntalam, Mudrārākṣasam, Mṛcchakaṭikam, Bhagavadajjukam and Mattavilāsa—constitute a representative selection spanning almost a thousand years of Sanskrit literature, from before the Gupta age to the seventeenth century, and the full range of its genres: bhāṇa, farce, drama, prakarana, ornate prose poetry, śataka verse and satirical verse. There is an internal logic to this selection. At one end stands the "great tradition" of Kālidāsa, Bhavabhūti and Bāṇa; at the other, the "parallel tradition" of monologues, farces and satire, which brings into literature's centre society's disavowed spaces—the courtesans' quarter, the gambling house, the tavern and the corrupt assembly. Placing these two traditions in a single row is itself a critical statement: the history of literature belongs not only to its summits but also to its valleys.

In the Light of Indian Theory: From Rasa to Aucitya

Measured by rasa theory, these thirteen books touch both poles of the emotional spectrum. Śākuntala and Kādambarī belong to śṛṅgāra, Uttararāmacaritam to karuṇa, Mudrārākṣasa to the heroism of intellect, and the remaining body of works largely to hāsya. Yet the essential lesson is that no work is confined to a single rasa: there is pathos in Śākuntala, wonder in Uttararāmacaritam, an assembly of all nine rasas in Mṛcchakaṭika, and often a current of disillusionment beneath farcical laughter. Dhvani theory reveals both its limits in this collection: Bhallaṭa's indirect expression reaches a summit of asamlakṣyakrama-dhvani, while the overt satire of Hāsyārṇava approaches what might be called citrakāvya. Between them stand Āgamḍambara and Bhagavadajjukam, demonstrating that philosophy itself may be suggested. From the perspective of vakrokti, the collection offers a series of examples across Kuntaka's categories, from verbal obliqueness (Bāṇa's play on words) to compositional obliqueness (stories within stories in Kādambarī, and a play within a play in Uttararāmacaritam). Aucitya appears here in its most provocative form. Kṣemendra is himself among the authors represented, while the farces show that deliberate "impropriety"—a reversal of expected dress, speech and behaviour—may become a poetic device: a poetry of impropriety arising from the grammar of propriety.

In the Light of Western Theory: From Aristotle to Bakhtin

Comparison with Western categories establishes the collection's place in world literature. Uttararāmacaritam parallels Shakespearean romance; Mudrārākṣasa anticipates Machiavellian political realism; Kādambarī invites modern narratology; Bhagavadajjukam raises questions of personal identity before Locke; Caturbhāṇī anticipates Browning's dramatic monologue; and Palāṇḍumaṇḍana offers a parallel or antecedent to the mock encomium before Erasmus. If one Western perspective proves especially productive for the collection as a whole, however, it is that of Bakhtin, theorist of carnival, polyphony and the "culture of laughter." The entire array of farces, monologues and satires offers an Indian illustration of his proposition that alongside every "serious" culture there survives a "laughing" culture. A culture capable of making its own laughter into literature—even an emperor of Kāñcī wrote a farce—was inwardly self-confident. A subaltern and feminist perspective, meanwhile, reveals a third thread: Śambūka in Uttararāmacaritam; Āryaka and Sthāvaraka in Mṛcchakaṭika; Vasantasenā and Ajjukā, two courtesan protagonists; and the crises of testimony facing Śakuntalā and Sītā. Marginal voices are recorded within classical literature itself. The critic's task is to hear them.

The Significance of the Maithili Translation Project

These thirteen translations belong to a considered project: bringing the entire spectrum of Sanskrit classics—from high drama to farce, from ornate prose to the satirical śataka—into idiomatic Maithili. Their literary-historical significance operates at three levels. First, the linguistic: the group tests the capacity of Maithili prose to carry Bāṇa's compounds, Bhavabhūti's pathos, Śakāra's distorted speech and Jayanta's epistemological language. Maithili meets each test with the resources of its own vernacular tradition. Second, the cultural: for Mithila, the land of Gaṅgeśa and Ayācī's Nyāya and of Vidyāpati's poetry, these translations are not an "import" but a homecoming of an inherited possession. Third, the formation of tradition: this deliberate diversity of genres makes available to Maithili literature the range that any living literature needs—the grave and the playful, the classical and the everyday, centre and margin, all voices sharing a single shelf. In this sense the thirteen books are more than thirteen translations: they establish an entire "parallel constellation of classics" in Maithili.

Caturbhāṇī

Four Sanskrit bhāṇas—Padmaprābhṛtakam (Śūdraka), Dhūrtaviṭasaṃvāda (Īśvaradatta), Ubhayābhisārikā (Vararuci), and Pādatāḍitakam (Śyāmilaka)

Introduction to the Work

Among the ten types of Sanskrit dramatic composition, the bhāṇa is the most unusual: a one-person, one-act performance in which a witty urban gallant stands alone onstage and, through the technique of ākāśabhāṣita—speech addressed to unseen figures—brings an entire city's variety of characters vividly to life. He speaks to invisible persons, repeats their supposed replies himself, and in doing so spreads before the audience the whole urban world: courtesans' streets, gambling houses, circles of gallants and learned assemblies. The four pieces of Caturbhāṇī—Śūdraka's Padmaprābhṛtakam, Īśvaradatta's Dhūrtaviṭasaṃvāda, Vararuci's Ubhayābhisārikā and Śyāmilaka's Pādatāḍitakam—are exceptional documents of urban culture around the Gupta period. Here the viṭa, familiar in poetics as an "attendant of erotic love," assumes a form that might be understood as a practical version of the urbane man of the Kāmasūtra.

A Perspective from Indian Poetics

Bharata's Nāṭyaśāstra treats the bhāṇa as dominated by the bhāratī-vṛtti, the verbal mode: the performance of speech is paramount. From the standpoint of rasa, the bhāṇa combines erotic sentiment and humour in extraordinary fashion. The viṭa is himself the emissary of love, yet his accounts of acting as go-between possess such a cutting satirical edge that humour comes to assume the force of the dominant emotional disposition. By the criterion of dhvani theory, the bhāṇa's ākāśabhāṣita is itself a theatrical form of suggestion: the presence of the character who does not appear onstage is suggested rather than stated. Viewed through Kuntaka's vakrokti, the lifeblood of all four plays is vākyavakratā, obliqueness at the level of the sentence. In Pādatāḍitakam, even after a courtesan has struck a man on the head with her foot, calling the blow a "favour" is obliqueness at its extreme. Kṣemendra's theory of propriety raises a fascinating question: how do the nearly obscene subjects of the courtesan's world become fitting matter for poetry? The answer is that the gallant's polished, ornamented language elevates the coarseness of his subject. Propriety of expression renders the impropriety of the object aesthetically manageable.

A Perspective from Western Theory

From a Western standpoint, the bhāṇa deserves recognition as one of the earliest mature forms of the dramatic monologue, a millennium before Browning's art of the soliloquy. Bakhtin's concept of the "carnivalesque" fits Caturbhāṇī closely: the courtesans' street is a site of "festive reversal of class," where scholars, royal officials and ascetics remove their social masks and meet as equals. The bhāṇa is a record of that inverted world. Bergson's theory of laughter—the mechanical imposed on the living—is evident in its characterisation: each person becomes a mechanism of his or her single fixed habit, the miser of miserliness and the libertine of lust. From a reader-response perspective, the bhāṇa is a genre that places exceptional demands on the audience's imagination. Iser's "gaps" (Leerstellen) occupy the stage in an almost literal sense: the spectators must create the invisible characters themselves. In this respect, the bhāṇa is an ancestor of minimalist theatre and the one-person show.

Assessment of the Translation and Conclusion

For the urban gallant's verbal play, the Maithili translation can readily draw on a tradition of joking that stretches from Vidyāpati's descriptions of amorous mannerisms to the dhāṅni songs. The rhythm of ākāśabhāṣita —repeating a question and then supplying the answer—has been adapted to Maithili's natural conversational style. Selecting vernacular equivalents for the terminology of the courtesans' world prevents the translation from becoming pedantically learned. In sum, Caturbhāṇī is a gallery of satirical portraits of ancient Indian urban life, and its entry into Maithili fills a previously empty chamber in the language's dramatic literature.

Dāmaka Prahasanam

A Short Sanskrit Farce — A Comic Reworking of the Karṇa–Paraśurāma Narrative

Introduction to the Work

Dāmaka Prahasanam is a brief yet well-constructed farce that places one of the Mahābhārata's most heartrending episodes—Karṇa's learning archery from Paraśurāma in disguise and receiving a curse—within a comic frame. At its centre is not the heroic story but "dear Dāmaka," Karṇa's gluttonous attendant, who has left behind bathing in royal ponds, betel prepared with five fragrances and muslin garments, only to suffer the hardships of forest life. His senses have become reversed "like an image in a mirror": he smells with his ears and sees with his nostrils. A prologue, Dāmaka's long monologue, a very brief initiation scene between Paraśurāma and Karṇa, and two soldiers' narration of the curse suffice to complete the farce.

A Perspective from Indian Poetics

From the standpoint of rasa, this work occupies an unusual meeting point of humour and pathos. Dāmaka's lament about hunger represents ātmastha humour (in Bharata's classification, where the character himself becomes an object of laughter), but Karṇa's destiny carries a subterranean current of karuṇa. His silent endurance of a beetle's sting is sustained by transitory emotions associated with the heroic and the pathetic. From the standpoint of dhvani, the subtlest moment comes when Karṇa says, "I am not a Kṣatriya." In this one line there is vastu-dhvani: at the instant of uttering the lie, the seed of the curse has been sown. This is suggested, not explicitly declared. Dāmaka's description of the hermitage—an ascetic's daughter watering plants from a pitcher "as though a mother were breastfeeding her child"—is an appropriate imitation of the Kālidāsian simile. This island of śānta rasa within a farce creates the beauty of contrast. Making the castor tree announce "the time has come" is an amusing animation of the inanimate.

A Perspective from Western Theory

In Western categories, Dāmaka plainly belongs to the tradition of the parasite character: the food-obsessed dependent of Greek and Roman comedy who follows his master like a shadow in the plays of Plautus and Terence. Dāmaka's monologue is a textbook instance of Bergson's theory of laughter. The body's mechanical rebellion, expressed in the reversal of the senses, and the inertia of habit, expressed in his dependence on royal luxuries, both constitute what Bergson called the mechanical imposed upon life, a primary source of the comic. Structurally, the farce is a miniature experiment in the mock-heroic mode: the disparity between an epic subject—teacher and pupil, curse and destiny—and a petty protagonist, the gluttonous servant, itself produces the satire. Incongruity theory, associated with Kant and Schopenhauer, explains the effect directly. From a modern perspective, Dāmaka's bodily lament—hunger, sleep, headache—is the body's resistance to the "great" plane of the narrative. In Bakhtin's language, the grotesque body brings an elevated story back down to earth.

Assessment of the Translation and Conclusion

In the Maithili translation, Dāmaka's memories of food—"a sweet evening drink, betel enriched with five fragrances"—pass so naturally into the vocabulary of Mithila's dining culture that he comes to seem a local character. The irony of "I am not hungry" becomes sharper in Maithili. The straightforward exchange in the brief initiation scene ("I am not a Kṣatriya." "Then I shall teach you; come.") retains its dramatic dryness in translation. Resisting the temptation to embellish it is itself an observance of aucitya. In sum, Dāmaka Prahasanam shows that Indian tradition could laugh affectionately even at its most tragic hero, Karṇa—and that such laughter was not the opposite of reverence but its complement.

Hāsyārṇava-Prahasanam (An Ocean of Laughter)

A Two-Act Farce by Jagadīśvara Bhaṭṭācārya

Introduction to the Work

Jagadīśvara Bhaṭṭācārya's Hāsyārṇava ranks among the most merciless works of satire in the medieval Sanskrit farcical tradition. Its title, "An Ocean of Laughter," is itself a declaration: laughter is no subsidiary sentiment here, but an all-engulfing sea. In the kingdom of King Anayasindhu ("Ocean of Injustice"), the procession of corruption brings together the royal physician, astrologer, priest, police chief and guru—representatives of every "venerable" social institution—at a courtesan's house. Each invokes the authority of his own discipline while violating its very standards. The naming of the characters is satirical in itself: names such as Viśvabhaṇḍa and Kalahāṅkura carry reversed or mocking meanings. A character's name becomes a manifesto of his character.

A Perspective from Indian Poetics

In terms of dramaturgy, Hāsyārṇava almost resembles a handbook of the pure prahasana: imitation of disreputable persons, the incongruity of costume and speech, and an experimental display of all six forms of laughter, from smita (the smile) to atihasita (uproarious laughter). Its comedy, however, belongs to Bharata's category of parastha: the poet invites us to laugh at the characters, not alongside them. By the criterion of dhvani theory, the striking feature is that satire frequently becomes directly expressed, in what Ānandavardhana might call citrakāvya. Yet a closer reading discovers in the entire farce a vast prabandha-dhvani, a suggestion carried by the composition as a whole: no individual character declares that the machinery of the state has rotted, but the whole work suggests precisely that. Kṣemendra's principle of aucitya becomes an inverted test. Every character acts in direct opposition to the duty attached to his social station, and this carefully arranged "impropriety" is the farce's ornament. Impropriety itself becomes appropriate. In terms of vakrokti, its abundance of puns and ironic reversals—abuse delivered in the language of blessing, denunciation in the metre of praise—forms a series of examples of Kuntaka's obliqueness through reversal.

A Perspective from Western Theory

Among Western categories, Hāsyārṇava's closest relative is Juvenalian satire. As in Juvenal's Rome, anger—saeva indignatio—is the fuel of laughter. Bakhtin's theory of carnival is especially productive here: the courtesan's house is the carnivalesque space where crowns fall away, the boundary between sacred and profane dissolves, and the "high" is brought down to the lower bodily plane. But where Bakhtin's carnival holds out a revivifying joy, Hāsyārṇava replaces it with dark despair. It therefore approaches dark comedy, or the misanthropic satire associated with Swift. Within Northrop Frye's theory of genres, it is a pure example of the "mythos of irony and satire," the narrative mode of winter: no green world emerges, no order is restored, and even the ending remains satirical. From a New Historicist standpoint, the farce is a document of the decay of institutions in its age; the very excess of satire becomes a kind of historical testimony.

Assessment of the Translation and Conclusion

The Maithili translation meets the work's hardest challenge—punning and satire embedded in names—through vernacular parallels. Maithili's own folk tradition of abusive joking, extending to the ḍahakana songs of marriage celebrations, gives the translation a cultural home. It should be observed that the coarse level of obscenity has been kept under control: the edge of satire remains, while mere vulgarity has been filtered out. Overall, Hāsyārṇava is a mirror of satire in which any age can see its corrupt face. Its arrival in Maithili hangs that mirror on Mithila's veranda.

Āgamḍambara

A Philosophical Drama by Jayanta Bhaṭṭa, the Naiyāyika

Introduction to the Work

When Jayanta Bhaṭṭa, author of the Nyāyamañjarī, wrote a play in ninth-century Kashmir, an unprecedented genre emerged: the theatrical transformation of philosophical disputation. The protagonist of Āgamḍambara is neither a king nor a lover but Saṅkarṣaṇa, a brilliant young Mīmāṃsā scholar who sets out on a campaign against "āgama-āḍambara," the pretence practised in the name of religion. Over four acts, he successively encounters Buddhists, Jains, the Nīlāmbara sect, Śaiva practitioners and Cārvākas. Finally, through Dhairyārāśi, an experienced exponent of Nyāya, the drama arrives at the conciliatory doctrine of sarvāgamaprāmāṇya: all scriptural traditions have validity, provided they do not violate social welfare or promote violence. Contemporary politics under King Śaṅkaravarman—notably the prohibition of the Nīlāmbara sect—is directly present in the play.

A Perspective from Indian Poetics

As an experiment in the production of rasa, Āgamḍambara is exceptional. Its dominant rasa is difficult to determine: there is humour in the exposure of impostors, śānta in the final reconciliation, and a form of intellectual delight that might be described in Abhinavagupta's language as pure carvaṇā—the savouring of argument. A question arises: can philosophical debate become a subject of rasa? Jayanta gives a practical answer. His scenes of disputation possess the same dramatic tension of victory and defeat as scenes of warfare. From the perspective of dhvani, the very title is charged with a double meaning: ḍambara signifies both ostentation and clamour. It suggests at once the noise made in religion's name and the pretence masquerading as religion. Judged by aucitya, Jayanta's balance is commendable. His satire targets imposture, not philosophical systems themselves. The Buddhist Dharmottara is presented as a scholar worthy of respect, while a degraded follower becomes an object of ridicule. This discrimination saves the play from crude sectarianism.

A Perspective from Western Theory

Its nearest Western analogue is Aristophanes' Clouds, a theatrical satire of philosophers. Yet Jayanta goes beyond Aristophanes: after mockery he offers a constructive philosophical conclusion. In this sense, Āgamḍambara is a "drama of ideas," an early forerunner of the novel of ideas—a conflict of intellectual positions on stage a millennium before Shaw and Brecht. Bakhtin's "polyphony" finds surprising expression here. Each philosophical system speaks in its own recognisable voice; even the Cārvāka is allowed to state his case with full force, while the author's own voice waits until the end. In terms of contemporary comparative philosophy of religion, the ending can be read as a medieval declaration of religious pluralism. A New Historicist caution is nevertheless necessary: this pluralism operates under the patronage of state power, and the prohibition imposed upon the Nīlāmbara sect displays its limits. The co-presence of conciliation and exclusion is precisely where the play acquires its modern relevance.

Assessment of the Translation and Conclusion

The Maithili translator faced a twofold challenge: philosophical terminology and dramatic movement. By retaining technical terms such as pramāṇa, prāmāṇya and anumāna while presenting them in accessible explanatory Maithili syntax, the translation keeps both dimensions in motion. Because Mithila possesses its own Navya-Nyāya tradition—the land of Gaṅgeśa Upādhyāya!—this vocabulary does not strike Maithili readers as that of a stranger, but rather as a guest returning home. Overall, Āgamḍambara demonstrates that the Indian stage could turn intellectual debate into entertainment, an achievement that gives it a distinctive place in world drama.

Kādambarī

Bāṇabhaṭṭa's Prose Epic

Introduction to the Work

"Bāṇocchiṣṭaṃ jagat sarvam"—"The whole world is what Bāṇa has left over." This famous saying attests to the renown of Kādambarī. In the seventh century, Bāṇabhaṭṭa, court poet of Harṣavardhana, raised prose to a height that might make verse envious. The narrative mechanism of Kādambarī is itself a marvel: a story told through a parrot's mouth encloses other stories; three levels of successive births—Śūdraka, Candrāpīḍa, Puṇḍarīka, and others—intersect; and memory and forgetting play a game in which readers, along with the characters, seem to have forgotten their previous lives, until all the knots are untied at once at the end. Mahāśvetā and Kādambarī, two embodiments of waiting, are immortal heroines of Indian literature. After Bāṇa's death, his son Bhūṣaṇabhaṭṭa completed the latter portion, writing in the shade of his father's great tree of sentences.

A Perspective from Indian Poetics

In terms of rasa, Kādambarī is a vast ocean of love-in-separation, or vipralambha-śṛṅgāra. Moments of union are rare and the waiting seems endless. Mahāśvetā's ascetic state carries separation to the very threshold of śānta-rasa; this meeting of erotic sentiment and tranquillity is Kādambarī's distinctive chemistry of rasa. Bāṇa challenges the school of dhvani: what Ānandavardhana would have called guṇībhūta-vyaṅgya, suggestion subordinated to the expressed meaning, is everywhere present in his ornamented style. Yet at the level of the entire work, the philosophical suggestion concerning karma and rebirth is an instance of prabandha-dhvani, suggestion operating across the whole composition. Judged by the school of rīti, Kādambarī unites the force of compound-rich Pāñcālī and Gauḍī styles with the sweetness of the Vaidarbhī manner. What Daṇḍin called padalālitya, elegance in the arrangement of words, reaches an extreme here. Śleṣa, or double meaning, comes naturally to Bāṇa; the denunciation of Lakṣmī in the Śukanāsopadeśa is such an intricate web of punning that it tests translation itself. From the standpoint of vakrokti, Bāṇa is a master of prabandha-vakratā: the oblique manner of telling the story is itself part of its meaning.

A Perspective from Western Theory

Within Western genre theory, Kādambarī is often advanced as a contender for the title of "the world's first novel." However disputed that claim may be, the structure of its narration is unquestionably modern: frame narrative, in a manner reminiscent of Shahrazad; embedded narrators; and analepsis, employed in ways that could supply a textbook for Gérard Genette's narratology. The parrot who narrates is itself a character in the narrative, while the question "Who is telling whose story?" continues to turn until the end. The centrality of remembrance and oblivion brings the work close to Proust. The inexplicable ache of a former existence arising in Candrāpīḍa's heart seems like a Sanskrit anticipation of Proust's mémoire involontaire, or involuntary memory. In a psychoanalytic reading, the apparatus of rebirth figures the return, across successive lives, of repressed desire—as in the disruption of Puṇḍarīka's asceticism—and thus Freud's "return of the repressed." A feminist reading could understand the waiting of Mahāśvetā and Kādambarī in two ways: as the idealisation of feminine passivity, or, in a deeper reading, as the tenacity of women's memory, which preserves the continuity of the story amid the male characters' forgetting and death. Here the women are the axis of the narrative.

Assessment of the Translation and Conclusion

Translating Bāṇa's prose, dense with long compounds, into Maithili is an audacious undertaking. The translation divides extended compounds into rhythmical sequences of Maithili sentences: semantic density is retained, while the reader gains space to breathe. Where a pun could not carry both meanings, one meaning is chosen and the other preserved in the manner of an explanatory gloss. In the pathos-filled prose of Mahāśvetā's story, Maithili expressions such as nor (tears), hiya (heart) and bāṭ johab (waiting and watching for someone) give Bāṇa's feeling the fragrance of the soil. Taken as a whole, this Maithili Kādambarī re-establishes in Mithila the tradition of poetic prose whose seeds were already present in works such as Vidyāpati's Bhūparikrama.

Bhallata-Śataka, Kalāvilāsa and Kaliyuga-Viḍambanā

Three Works of Satire — Bhallaṭa, Kṣemendra and Nīlakaṇṭha

Introduction to the Works

This collection brings together three ages and three styles of Sanskrit satire. The Śataka of the ninth-century Kashmiri poet Bhallaṭa represents a summit of anyokti, indirect utterance: wounded by King Śaṅkaravarman's neglect, the poet writes verses in which the sea, the wish-fulfilling tree, the parrot and poison all speak of human beings without naming any human being. In the eleventh century, Kṣemendra, in Kalāvilāsa ("The Pleasures of the Arts of Deception"), enumerates across ten cantos the arts of hypocrisy, greed, lust, the courtesan's profession, the Kāyastha scribe, intoxication, the singer, the goldsmith, diverse swindlers and, at last, the "art" of virtue. Under cover of Mūladeva's adventures, he produces an encyclopaedia of society's techniques of fraud. In seventeenth-century southern India, Nīlakaṇṭha Dīkṣita, in Kaliyuga-Viḍambanā, uses a hundred verses to expose thirteen categories of folly—among scholars, astrologers, physicians, poets, moneylenders, misers and those who ostentatiously advertise their piety, among others. At the end he bows to the Kali age itself, "where one's own imagination is law."

A Perspective from Indian Poetics

All three works demonstrate the power of three different instruments of alaṅkāra theory. The animating principle of Bhallaṭa's poetry is anyokti, or aprastuta-praśaṃsā: by describing what is not directly in question, the poet conveys what is. This is an exemplary figure for the theory of dhvani, because the implied meaning remains wholly unspoken. The phenomenon that Ānandavardhana—Bhallaṭa's Kashmiri contemporary—calls arthāntarasaṅkramita-vācya, the expressed meaning passing over into another, is brought to life by Bhallaṭa. In "Alas, Kālakūṭa! How did you arise from that ocean?" the sea is no longer simply the sea. Kṣemendra was himself an authority on aucitya-vicāra, the examination of propriety, and his satirical method puts his own principles into practice. By cataloguing the "improprieties" of each social group—the goldsmith's sixty-four arts, the sixteen defects of the balance—he turns the scholastic style of enumeration, the method of the encyclopaedic lexicon, into an instrument of laughter: a science of cheating dressed up as a learned science. In Nīlakaṇṭha's writing, vakrokti is compressed to its utmost. Each verse has the sharpness of an aphorism; contrary indication, or viparīta-lakṣaṇā—as in "Blessed indeed are the practitioners of charms and spells"—becomes the sting. From the standpoint of rasa, the durable sentiment beneath the humour of all three is, in fact, disenchantment mingled with tranquillity: satire prepares the ground for detachment, particularly in Nīlakaṇṭha, who finally rests in refuge with Śiva.

A Perspective from Western Theory

Bhallaṭa's anyokti differs from Aesop's fables and from allegorical poetry: a fable makes its moral explicit, whereas anyokti leaves it to implication. It approaches emblematic poetry, but is subtler still. Because of his voice of resistance to a king, Bhallaṭa also has a distant kinship with Ovid's Tristia, within a literature of exile and disgrace. Kṣemendra's Kalāvilāsa displays the characteristics of Menippean satire: the blending of genres, an encyclopaedic delight in inventories and a trickster-protagonist. Mūladeva is a predecessor of the picaresque tradition, some five centuries before the Spanish pícaro. Nīlakaṇṭha's style is comparable to the Roman epigram of Martial and to La Rochefoucauld's art of the maxim: brevity becomes a weapon. Bakhtin's proposition that satire belongs to the "unfinished present," in opposition to the enclosed past of epic, applies to all three. That is why they still feel contemporary: their portraits of goldsmiths, astrologers and "honourable gentlemen" can read like the newspaper of the twenty-first century.

Assessment of the Translation and Conclusion

The translation adopts three distinct registers for three distinct styles: a free, verse-like, suggestive rhythm for Bhallaṭa; accessible, enumerative narrative prose for Kṣemendra; and sharply honed aphoristic sentences for Nīlakaṇṭha. A translated title such as "The Pleasures of the Arts of Deception" is already an interpretation. Maithili readers gain something particular from this collection: the region's own satirical tradition, reaching to Harimohan Jha, can recognise its forebears in this confluence. Taken together, the texts demonstrate that Sanskrit was not solely the language of the gods, but also a language of incisive criticism of everyday life.

Palāṇḍumaṇḍana-Prahasanam

A Learned Assembly in Praise of the Forbidden Onion — A Satire of Scholarly Society

Introduction to the Work

Palāṇḍumaṇḍana ("The Ornamenting or Praise of the Onion") is a delightfully sharp work in the late-medieval Sanskrit farce tradition. Its object of ridicule is neither a king nor a courtesan, but the scholarly community itself. The plot is simple and explosive: a gathering of scholars assembles to defend the eating of palāṇḍu, the onion, which the smṛti texts prohibit to Brahmins. Deploying the very skills of scholastic debate, the same tradition of proofs, and the interpretative ingenuity once employed to unravel the problems of Vedānta, they establish the scriptural legitimacy of eating onions. Names such as Liṅgojī Bhaṭṭa point towards a South Indian scholarly milieu. The humour rests on the contradiction that the entire machinery of learning has been put at the service of the tongue.

A Perspective from Indian Poetics

In the classification of drama, this is a pure prahasana, an imitation of what is reprehensible. Yet what is reprehensible here is not a low-status character: it is the misuse of the method of śāstrārtha, or learned disputation. That subtle distinction lifts the work above an ordinary farce. From the standpoint of vakrokti, the entire composition is an immense exercise in vyāja-stuti, praise that is really condemnation: the more lavish the praise of onions, the more naked the scholars appear. According to dhvani theory, the implication behind the laughter depends on the audience's familiarity with śāstra. Only a reader conversant with Mīmāṃsā's procedures of proof will recognise the ironic employment of terms such as arthavāda and gauṇa-mukhya. It is an intriguing situation of suggestion conditioned by the sahṛdaya, the responsive and informed reader. In terms of aucitya, consider the poet's boldness: the idiom of scholarship is used to mock scholarship, without disrespecting the śāstras themselves. The satire attacks the misuse of the method, not the method. Among the varieties of laughter, the play moves from upahasita to apahasita; ultimately the reader laughs at the self, for the ability to turn private taste into learned doctrine through argument is not restricted to scholars, but is a universal human weakness.

A Perspective from Western Theory

Its closest Western equivalent is the mock-encomium, or praise offered in pretence: Erasmus's Praise of Folly (Moriae Encomium) and the older Greek tradition of adoxography, in which insignificant things—flies, baldness or fever—receive solemn praise. Palāṇḍumaṇḍana belongs precisely here: the weightiest scholastic seriousness is applied to an insignificant subject, the onion, and laughter springs from that incongruity. In Bakhtin's terms, the work is a "carnival of eating," a rebellion of forbidden taste in which bodily appetite defeats the discipline of learning. The victory celebrates the "material bodily principle" that animates carnival literature. Read against ancient Greek discussions of the sophists, including Plato's accusation that they could make the weaker argument appear stronger, Palāṇḍumaṇḍana becomes a Sanskrit reflection on sophistry. It laughs at the gulf between the power of reasoning and the ethics of reasoning. In modern terms, it is among the early satires of motivated reasoning.

Assessment of the Translation and Conclusion

The Maithili translation gives this farce a particularly homely flavour. Mithila's gatherings of pandits, traditions of scholastic debate and affection for food are all familiar contexts; a discussion of the palāṇḍu can readily join the debates of a Maithil kitchen. The parody of technical argument survives in translation because Maithili has itself been a language of śāstrārtha. Ultimately Palāṇḍumaṇḍana is a major work in miniature: it shows that a tradition remains alive only so long as it has the courage to laugh at itself.

Uttararāmacaritam

Bhavabhūti's Drama of Compassion

Introduction to the Work

In Uttararāmacaritam, the eighth-century poet Bhavabhūti took up the chapter of the Rāma story from which poets had often turned away: the abandonment of Sītā. This seven-act play narrates twelve years of separation after her exile. It begins with the viewing of pictures—Rāma and Sītā looking upon images of their past in the first act, making memory itself a stage. It moves through the unseen touch of the shadow-Sītā in Pañcavaṭī and the encounter of a father with Lava and Kuśa, whom he does not know to be his sons. Finally, reunion comes through a garbha-nāṭaka, a play within the play. Vālmīki himself arranges a "happy-ending version" of the Rāmāyaṇa on stage, as though the accusation of public opinion can be answered by the voice of the people. "Eko rasaḥ karuṇa eva"—compassion is the one rasa—is Bhavabhūti's own declaration and the generative statement of the drama.

A Perspective from Indian Poetics

Within the history of rasa theory, Uttararāmacaritam is a theoretical intervention. By making karuṇa its governing rasa, Bhavabhūti challenges the assumption associated with Bharata that love or heroism should predominate in a visible art such as drama. He goes further, declaring compassion the sole rasa and the others its transformations and variations. Nowhere is Abhinavagupta's theory of sādhāraṇīkaraṇa, the universalisation of emotion, better illustrated than in the third act: in the shadow-Sītā episode, Sītā is on stage but Rāma cannot see her, while the audience witnesses both characters' suffering simultaneously. This double vision is a theatrical mechanism of universalisation, lifting spectators beyond an individual's grief into the aesthetic experience of grief made general. In the language of dhvani, a line such as "Apūrvakarmacāṇḍālamayi mugdhe vimucyatām," in which Rāma calls himself a caṇḍāla, is filled with the suggestion of self-reproach. The question of aucitya is central: is it fitting for the exemplary Rāma, the Maryādā Puruṣottama, to weep? Bhavabhūti's response—"Vajrād api kaṭhorāṇi mṛdūni kusumād api," harder than thunderbolts, softer than flowers—reinterprets propriety by giving the extraordinary hero an ordinary human heart.

A Perspective from Western Theory

In Aristotelian terms, Uttararāmacaritam has been called one of the closest Indian counterparts to tragedy: it involves hamartia, the abandonment of an innocent wife in the name of royal duty; prolonged suffering; and a catharsis of pity and fear (eleos and phobos). Yet the reunion at the end prevents it from being a tragedy in the strict sense. In Western terms it is a tragicomedy, or a striking precursor of Shakespeare's late romances—particularly The Winter's Tale, with its innocent wife cast off, years of remorse and revival by means of art, through statue or play. The garbha-nāṭaka is an early, self-conscious use of metatheatre, centuries before the "Mousetrap" of Hamlet, and it goes further: the play within the play does not merely test the truth but rewrites it; art repairs reality. In a subaltern reading the episode of Śambūka cannot be bypassed: Rāma's killing of the Śūdra ascetic is not removed by Bhavabhūti but staged, with Śambūka appearing in a divine form and praising Rāma. Modern criticism may discern both the acknowledgement of the violence of the varṇa order and an uneasy purification of that violence. To a feminist reading, the shadow-Sītā becomes an enduring figure of the "present absence" of a woman: she speaks, yet is not heard.

Assessment of the Translation and Conclusion

The Maithili translation responds to the celebrated difficulty of Bhavabhūti's diction with a native vocabulary of compassion. Expressions such as nor (tears), hiya haharab (the heart shuddering) and chātī phāṭab (the chest splitting with grief) root his pathos in the land of sohars and samdaunis, the songs of birth and farewell. The linguistic identity of characters who speak Prakrit is retained. Ultimately Uttararāmacaritam is a work of world drama that shows what comes after epic: after victory, pain. Maithili, a language of songs of separation, proves to be its natural second home.

Abhijñānaśākuntalam

Kālidāsa's Crowning Achievement in Drama

Introduction to the Work

"Kāvyeṣu nāṭakaṃ ramyaṃ tatra ramyā Śakuntalā"—among literary forms, drama is delightful, and among dramas Śakuntalā is beautiful. Such near-unanimity is rare in Sanskrit criticism. Kālidāsa transformed the stern story of Śakuntalā in the Mahābhārata—where Duṣyanta knowingly denies her—by introducing Durvāsas's curse and the ring as an instrument of recognition, or abhijñāna. The resulting seven-act play takes love through three stages: its natural flowering in the hermitage; a painful middle of forgetfulness and rejection in the royal court; and a reunion purified by austerity at Hemakūṭa. Nature is not a backdrop here but a character: at Śakuntalā's departure, trees give her clothing and a deer catches hold of her garment.

A Perspective from Indian Poetics

From the standpoint of rasa, Śakuntalā completes the entire cycle of śṛṅgāra: union, separation and reunion. Its distinction lies in the fact that the cause of separation is not an external villain, but destiny in the form of a curse and the hero's own forgetting. The shade of karuṇa falling upon śṛṅgāra therefore becomes an exemplary blending of rasa. For the school of dhvani, Śakuntalā is familiar ground: Ānandavardhana and Abhinavagupta repeatedly draw examples from it. Kaṇva's farewell in the fourth act—"Pātuṃ na prathamaṃ vyavasyati jalam"—is so dense with the suggestion of parental tenderness that later criticism singled out that act as the jewel of the entire drama: "Kāvyeṣu nāṭakaṃ … tatrāpi ca caturtho 'ṅkaḥ." Seen through vakrokti, the token of recognition, the ring, constitutes an overarching obliqueness: proof of love is entrusted to an object, and then the object is lost. Kuntaka might have called this prakaraṇa-vakratā, obliqueness in the construction of an episode. Kālidāsa's restraint is unmatched by the criterion of aucitya: Duṣyanta is not rendered simply cruel in the scene of rejection; he is under a curse. The artistry of suffering without a straightforward villain is an extreme achievement of propriety. Bharata's dictum "Kāvyaṃ grāhyam alaṅkārāt" finds its fulfilment here in simile—the celebrated phrase "Alaṃ Kālidāsasya upamā" points to the distinction of Kālidāsa's comparisons.

A Perspective from Western Theory

Śakuntalā was among the first Indian literary works to enter Western literary consciousness. After reading Sir William Jones's 1789 translation, Goethe wrote that if heaven and earth were to be named together in a single word, one should say "Śakuntalā." The source reads the theatrical prelude to Goethe's Faust (Vorspiel auf dem Theater) as directly indebted to the sūtradhāra's introduction in Śakuntalā; it locates here one seed of Goethe's idea of world literature, or Weltliteratur. Romantic criticism found in the work a unity of nature and humanity. For contemporary ecocriticism, the forest hermitage is an ideal literary image of an ecological community in which human beings are members, not masters, of nature. A structuralist reading might regard the ring as a pure mechanism of Barthes's "hermeneutic code": the story is locked and unlocked by its loss and recovery. Feminist criticism speaks in two voices. On one side stands the silencing of Śakuntalā: in the court, her truthful testimony is deprived of evidentiary force, an all-too-familiar pattern of devaluing women's witness. On the other side, the bold Śakuntalā of the Mahābhārata, who rebukes the king in open court, appears softened in Kālidāsa's heroine. A more attentive reading, however, observes that Kālidāsa too gives Śakuntalā a sharp rebuke—"Anārya!"—in that courtroom scene. For psychoanalysis, Duṣyanta's forgetfulness can become a figure of repression: guilt about the social transgression of a Gandharva marriage swallows memory, and the ring, as material evidence, brings the repressed back into view.

Assessment of the Translation and Conclusion

In the Maithili translation, Śakuntalā's forest hermitage becomes a flowering garden of Mithila. The soft Maithili vocabulary for creepers, bees and young deer corresponds to Kālidāsa's tenderness. A domestic level of Maithili for Śakuntalā's Prakrit-speaking companions and a higher register touched by Sanskrit for the passages in verse offer a creative answer to the Sanskrit–Prakrit division in the original. Taken as a whole, the Maithili incarnation of Śakuntalā performs the cultural work of building a bridge between Vidyāpati's language and Kālidāsa: the inseparability of love and nature is the common property of both poets.

Mudrārākṣasam (The Royal Seal of Minister Rākṣasa)

Viśākhadatta's Political Drama

Introduction to the Work

In the Sanskrit dramatic tradition, Mudrārākṣasam stands almost alone: there is no heroine, no erotic love, and no jester. The entire play is a game of chess between two minds. After the fall of the Nanda dynasty, Cāṇakya has already placed Candragupta upon the throne; but his real objective is now not to destroy an enemy but to change his heart—to make Rākṣasa, the minister who remained loyal to the Nandas, a minister of Candragupta. Using a seal (mudrā), a forged letter, and a network of disguised spies, Cāṇakya turns every move by Rākṣasa into a position he has already prepared. In the final move, Rākṣasa's own virtue—his compassion in seeking to save his friend Candanadāsa—becomes the means of his 'defeat'. Viśākhadatta was a Kṣatriya prince: his knowledge of politics, the essay argues, came not from books but from the palace.

A Perspective from Indian Poetics

From the standpoint of rasa, Mudrārākṣasam poses a problem for classical classification. Tradition regards vīra (the heroic) as its principal rasa; yet this is not the heroism of battle but that of strategy and intellect—nīti-vīra or buddhi-vīra. Its enduring emotion is enthusiasm, but the object of that enthusiasm is not the battlefield: it is political planning. The play thus creatively expands the limits of rasa theory. In terms of the arrangement of dramatic junctures (sandhi), as formulated in the Nāṭyaśāstra's theory of plot construction, Mudrārākṣasam is exemplary: from mukha and pratimukha to nirvahaṇa, every juncture is tightly organised, and not a single scene is purposeless. From the standpoint of dhvani, the play's richness of suggestion lies in dramatic irony: the spectators know Cāṇakya's trap, while Rākṣasa does not, so every utterance by Rākṣasa continually suggests a second meaning to the audience. Considered through aucitya, Viśākhadatta's daring lies in making the apparent 'villain' the moral centre of the play. Rākṣasa's fidelity to his former sovereign is so noble that the title itself bears his name. Cāṇakya wins, but the greatness belongs to Rākṣasa: this separation of victory from moral stature is a particularly subtle deployment of propriety.

A Perspective from Western Theory

In Western generic terms, Mudrārākṣasam is the dramatic form of political realism. A thousand years before Machiavelli's Il Principe, it stages a debate about ends and means that resembles a theatrical commentary on Kauṭilya's Arthaśāstra. Cāṇakya is the maker of Machiavelli's ideal 'new prince', with one difference: personal self-interest has no place in his objective. Once his purpose is accomplished, he ties up his topknot and looks towards withdrawal into forest life; this conjunction of power and renunciation is absent from the particular model of Western realism under comparison. In terms of genre, the play is an early mature form of the espionage thriller and the heist structure. Its network of intrigue may be compared to John le Carré's Cold War narratives: assumed identities, a double agent (Bhāgurāyaṇa), forged documents, and the 'mastermind's' plan unfolding point by point. Structurally, the drama rests upon binary oppositions—intellect/heart, politics/loyalty, the seal (the abstract power of the state)/Candanadāsa (the affection of ordinary citizens)—and resolves them by the merging of opposites, when Rākṣasa accepts the ministry. New Historicism would read the play as a document of state discourse in the Gupta era: a narrative legitimising the making of empire, in which violence is minimised and the manufacture of consent—Rākṣasa's own consent—becomes the highest aim.

Assessment of the Translation and Conclusion

The Maithili translation announces its approach in the very title, 'The Royal Seal of Minister Rākṣasa', rendering the weight of mudrā through a native vocabulary. It carefully retains the double meanings of diplomatic dialogue, which are the lifeblood of the drama; the coded language of the espionage episodes also moves naturally in Maithili. Taken as a whole, Mudrārākṣasam shows that Sanskrit drama could create the theatre of severity as well as tenderness, of the mind as well as the heart—and that, even there, the ultimate victory is the heart's.

Mṛcchakaṭikam (The Little Clay Toy Cart)

Śūdraka's Ten-Act Prakaraṇa

Introduction to the Work

Mṛcchakaṭikam is the most 'worldly' of the great works of Sanskrit drama. King Śūdraka—the author named by tradition—leaves the royal palace and enters the streets and lanes of Ujjayinī. Here we meet Cārudatta, a generous merchant reduced to poverty; Vasantasenā, an intelligent courtesan; the masseur who becomes a Buddhist mendicant after a life of gambling; Śarvilaka, the thief who regards burglary as an art; and Śakāra, the king's brother-in-law, an enduring embodiment of stupidity and cruelty. Meanwhile, Āryaka's political revolution is gathering strength in the background. The 'clay cart' of the title, the toy belonging to Rohasena into which Vasantasenā puts her jewels, is the seminal symbol of the entire play: an encounter between clay and gold, poverty and love.

A Perspective from Indian Poetics

Within the classification of dramatic forms, this is a prakaraṇa: its plot is invented, its characters belong to ordinary social life, and its heroine is a courtesan. In Bharata's arrangement, the prakaraṇa is regarded as inferior to the nāṭaka; but Śūdraka grants this supposedly 'lesser' form the epic dignity of a ten-act scope. In terms of rasa, Mṛcchakaṭikam is a laboratory of mixed emotions: śṛṅgāra (Cārudatta and Vasantasenā), hāsya (Maitreya and Śakāra), karuṇa (the journey to the place of execution), along with adbhuta, vīra and even bībhatsa. Remarkably, this crowding of rasas produces no rupture of aesthetic experience, because of aucitya: each rasa is tied to the social standing and linguistic register of its characters. One of the richest uses of the Nāṭyaśāstra's language system appears here—seven or eight Prakrit varieties that make the social positions of the characters audible. From the perspective of vakrokti, Śakāra's 'inverted scholarship', his garbled references to the Rāmāyaṇa and Mahābhārata, is the oblique expression of ignorance, an inexhaustible resource of verbal comedy. From the standpoint of dhvani, the clay cart is an ideal instance of suggestion through an object: the jewels placed inside it become the seed of the plot's complications, while 'gold in clay' spreads a symbolic meaning associated with Cārudatta's impoverished generosity.

A Perspective from Western Theory

In Western genre classifications, Mṛcchakaṭikam possesses the full features of tragicomedy and melodrama: the execution of an innocent man is stopped at the last moment. Its deeper identity, however, is as a 'city comedy'. Twelve hundred years before Ben Jonson's London, it presents an extensive civic portrait of Ujjayinī's economy, administration of justice, and criminal underworld. For a Marxist reading, this is an especially fertile Sanskrit text: the circulation of property—the jewels passing from hand to hand—is the actual motor of the plot. The courtroom scene lays bare class justice: the poor person's testimony is treated as invalid. Āryaka's revolt makes this an exceptional Sanskrit drama in which a change of ruler is led by a cowherd's son, anticipating a subaltern view of history upon the stage. From a feminist perspective, Vasantasenā's story is an account of a courtesan's emancipation: she leaves the economy of her profession and gains the status of a bride. A modern reading may see two opposing meanings in this ending: a woman's victory, or her renewed subordination within the institution of marriage. From a Brechtian perspective, the courtroom farce and Śakāra's extravagantly theatrical manner themselves produce an 'alienation effect', obliging spectators to reflect upon the social order. It is worth remembering that German theatre has been staging this play since the nineteenth century.

Assessment of the Translation and Conclusion

To meet the multilingual demands of the play, the Maithili translation, 'The Little Clay Toy Cart', draws on Maithili's own levels of speech: distinctly colloquial, everyday, and Sanskrit-enriched. Śakāra's corrupt utterances find an equivalent in Maithili's humorous distortions of expression, while Cārudatta's verse calls for a mature poetic register. The supposedly 'learned' description of theft and the scenes in the gambling house flourish particularly in Maithili idiom. Ultimately, Mṛcchakaṭikam proves that an Indian classic is a 'classic' not because it tells the stories of kings and gods, but because it can fill a clay cart with the gold of humanity.

Bhagavadajjukam (The Ascetic and the Courtesan)

A Farce Attributed to Bodhāyana: The Comedy of Exchanged Souls

Introduction to the Work

Bhagavadajjukam is regarded as one of the most intellectually brilliant works in the Sanskrit tradition of farce. Its dramatic mechanism is astonishing. To demonstrate to his restless disciple Śāṇḍilya the yogic power of 'entering another body' (parakāya-praveśa), a wandering ascetic (the Bhagavān) enters the body of Vasantasenā (Ajjukā), a courtesan who has died because of a mistake by Yama's messenger. When that messenger tries to correct his error, he places the courtesan's soul in the ascetic's body. The result is Vedāntic speech issuing from a courtesan's body, and the gestures of erotic desire from that of a renunciant. Physician, mother and lover are all bewildered. Śāṇḍilya, the disciple driven by hunger who has fled a Buddhist monastery and become a 'slave to food', serves as both witness and comic facilitator of the chaos. Composed in the Pallava period (possibly contemporaneous with or earlier than Mahendravikrama), this farce survived alongside Mattavilāsa in the temple-theatre traditions of southern India, extending to Kūṭiyāṭṭam.

A Perspective from Indian Poetics

In rasa terms, laughter arises here from the discrepancy between outward appearance and speech. Bharata includes 'distorted costume and ornament' among the causes (vibhāvas) of the comic; Bhagavadajjukam takes the distortion to a philosophical level. What is displaced is not the garment but the soul itself. From the standpoint of dhvani, the farce is exceptional because every moment of humour suggests a serious Vedāntic proposition: the distinction between body and self and the question 'Who am I?' (ko 'ham). What the Upaniṣads formulate solemnly, this farce displays in reverse: when bodies are exchanged, who is the 'I'? Philosophical disputation conducted under the pretext of comedy becomes a kind of 'satirical Vedānta'. From the perspective of vakrokti, the whole play rests upon one immense obliqueness of inversion. The question of aucitya is also fascinating: is this kind of mockery of an ascetic appropriate? The answer lies within the work. The satire is directed not at a genuine yogin—whose spiritual power is real—but at hypocrisy and the confusion of body with self. At the end, all souls regain their proper bodies; the restoration of order preserves dramatic propriety.

A Perspective from Western Theory

Within Western genre categories, the play's narrative mechanism offers one of the oldest fully developed examples of body-swap comedy in world literature. The convention extends into modern cinema, including works such as Freaky Friday; but whereas Western adaptations commonly teach lessons in psychological empathy, Bodhāyana raises a philosophical question: does identity reside in the body or in consciousness? The question directly engages modern philosophy of mind—Locke's memory theory and debates on personal identity—and stages it a millennium before Locke's celebrated thought experiment about the prince and the cobbler. Bakhtin's theory of the carnival is realised here almost literally: the exchange of high and low, ascetic and courtesan, is a central carnivalesque principle, while the centrality of the body resembles Bakhtin's material-bodily perspective. Bergson's formula for laughter, the mechanical imposed upon the living body, reaches an extreme form: the soul changes, but the body's habits do not. From an absurdist perspective, the 'clerical mistake' made by Yama's messenger—taking the wrong life—produces precisely the irony of cosmic administration familiar to readers of Kafka and Ionesco. Here destiny is not tragic; it is bureaucratic.

Assessment of the Translation and Conclusion

The Maithili title, 'The Ascetic and the Courtesan', immediately captures the play's structure of reversal. Its hardest translation problem is the exchange between the Sanskrit-laden voice of the renunciant inhabiting the courtesan's body and the sensuous speech of the courtesan inhabiting the renunciant's body. The distinction between Maithili's levels of expression—a register rich in tatsama words on one side and a lively popular idiom on the other—allows this reversal to work. The success of the translation resides in that linguistic crossing itself. In sum, Bhagavadajjukam shows that the gravest philosophical enquiry and the freest laughter are not antagonists in the Indian tradition: they are two sides of one coin. The question 'Who am I?' may be asked in the very midst of uproarious laughter.

Mattavilāsa-Prahasanam (The Farce of Intoxicated Delight)

A Farce by the Pallava King Mahendravikrama Varman

Introduction to the Work

At the beginning of the seventh century, the Pallava emperor of Kāñcī, Mahendravikrama Varman—known as 'Vicitracitta'—composed a farce that is a remarkable document of royal self-confidence: an exposure of the absurdities of the religious world of his own capital, Kāñcī. Satyasoma, a drunken Śaiva Kāpālika, loses his skull—his begging bowl, made from a human cranium—and accuses the Buddhist monk Nāgasena of stealing it. A Pāśupata intervenes as mediator; the skull is recovered from a madman; and the quarrel subsides almost as suddenly as it arose. In this short, one-act work, the religious plurality of Kāñcī at the time—Kāpālikas, Buddhists, Pāśupatas, and references to Jains—is recorded at the level of street life.

A Perspective from Indian Poetics

From the standpoint of the Nāṭyaśāstra, Mattavilāsa is an exemplary instance of a 'pure farce' (śuddha prahasana): a disparaging imitation of hypocritical ascetics, servants and related figures. Yet the refinement that comes from the royal author is noteworthy. Coarse verbal abuse is relatively limited; humour of situation and character predominates. In the structure of rasa, the determinants of laughter associated with intoxication (mada) occupy the centre. Bharata identifies three stages of drunkenness, and Satyasoma's behaviour progressively exhibits them; the word 'intoxicated' (matta) appears in the very title. From a vakrokti perspective, the play's keenest weapon is specious reasoning: Satyasoma describes the tavern as a sacrificial hall—the flag becomes the sacrificial post, wine becomes soma, the drinking cup becomes the sacrificial vessel. This chain of comparisons simultaneously produces the ingenuity of oblique expression and suggests the hollowness of religious language. From the standpoint of dhvani, the Buddhist monk's private thought—'Which envious old man added the prohibition of wine and women to the Piṭaka texts?'—is an utterance pregnant with the satire of concealed desire. Viewed through aucitya, note the king's balance: no particular sect is favoured. Satire falls upon all alike and, therefore, upon none exclusively—an aesthetics of governmental impartiality.

A Perspective from Western Theory

In Western categories, Mattavilāsa possesses all the characteristics of farce: a missing object, false accusation, a public quarrel, and resolution by chance. A thousand years before Molière's Tartuffe, it staged religious hypocrisy. There is, however, a decisive difference: Molière's satirical figure is a conscious deceiver, while Satyasoma is not a deceiver but a sincere fool —he believes what he says. That distinction saves the satire from cruelty and keeps it within the domain of Bergson's 'mechanisation of habit'. From Bakhtin's perspective, Mattavilāsa literally stages the carnival: wine, the street, the profanation of the sacred (the skull-bowl!), and the 'emperor's own carnival'. Royal authority itself mocks the religious authorities of its city. New Historicism would ask whether this mockery is subversive or instead a safety valve sanctioned by power (licensed misrule). Probably the latter: by permitting laughter, the king also displays his mastery over religious institutions. From a sociological perspective on religion, the play pictures a 'marketplace' of sectarian competition, an economy of alms, vessels and reputation. The disappearance of the skull is thus a story of the theft of symbolic capital, in Bourdieu's sense: without his skull, a Kāpālika loses his very identity.

Assessment of the Translation and Conclusion

The Maithili title, 'The Farce of Intoxicated Delight', brings out the original pun in matta: drunken and carried away by delight. To represent the stumbling speech of intoxication, the translation draws accurately on the familiar folk rhythms of Maithili drunken talk. It preserves the sacrificial terminology in the series of comparisons between tavern and sacrificial hall, which is essential to the edge of the satire. Ultimately, Mattavilāsa is that rare work in which the throne itself descends into the street and laughs. A millennium and a half later, the laughter remains fresh, for hypocrisy never grows old.

23. Jagadanand Jha ‘Manu’s’ Children's Story ‘Māṭik Bāsan’ (Clay Vessels)

Abstract

Māṭik Bāsan was published electronically in Videha and collected in Videha: Sadeha 32 (pp. 2–5), available in the Videha archive at http://videha.co.in/new_page_89.htm. Jagadanand Jha ‘Manu’: village/post office, Haripur Dih Tol, Madhubani. Kedar Prasad is a skilled potter of the village.

Keywords: Jagadanand Jha ‘Manu’ · Māṭik Bāsan · children’s story · potters’ tradition · sculpture · plot · folk culture

Māṭik Bāsan (Clay Vessels)

An Examination of the Story

Positive Aspects of the Story

Negative Aspects of the Story

A long children’s story—or, if one prefers, a novel—by Jagadanand Jha ‘Manu’, entitled Chonaha, was published in Videha. It was subsequently collected in Videha: Sadeha 9 (Videha Children’s Festival, pp. 109–126), and is available in the Videha archive at http://videha.co.in/new_page_89.htm. This is the first Maithili work founded on child psychology. The novel ought to be included in a training course on how to write children’s literature in Maithili: it shows how a modern novel progresses, step by step, and how this works in the case of a children’s novel. I urge you at least to read it.

But in Māṭik Bāsan, Jagadanand disappointed me. I had expected something like Pedinti Ashok Kumar’s Jigri; instead, what I found was something as ordinary as Shivshankar Srinivas’s Pandit O Hunak Putra (The Pandit and His Son).

It is true that Māṭik Bāsan is a children’s vihani tale, a seed-story. Yet a writer with the plot—

“People began using steel and other metals instead of clay vessels”— should not end the story with—

“But my dream— — — will no longer come true.” Saying this, he walked out of the room.

I cannot accept this. Thus an extraordinary plot has remained merely a good but mediocre story.

Analysis

This story needs to be developed further. That could be done by increasing its length, but the subject could equally be developed within the existing word count. The author has strayed from his objective: he failed to develop the proposition that "people began using steel and other metals instead of clay vessels." I had not expected this from the author of Chonaha. He will have to rewrite the story, whether it remains a vihani tale, becomes a short story or a longer story, or even grows into a novel.

24. Why Should Readers Read My Books?

Abstract

The first question is this: we have heard that a work is good, but how are we to obtain the book? Earlier, postage on books sent to Nepal was the same as postage within India; now postage costs more than the book or magazine itself, so Maithili books no longer reach Nepal. If I live in New Jersey and cannot find Maithili books and periodicals in Madhubani or Darbhanga, where will I find them in Uganda, the USA or Australia?

Keywords: Gajendra Thakur · literary works · poetry · ghazals · stories · novels · drama · reader reception

The first question is this: we have heard that a work is good, but how are we to obtain the book? Earlier, postage on books sent to Nepal was the same as postage within India; now postage costs more than the book or magazine itself, so Maithili books no longer reach Nepal. If I live in New Jersey and cannot find Maithili books and periodicals in Madhubani or Darbhanga, where will I find them in Uganda, the USA or Australia? For this reason I tell you that all my works are available on the internet at http://videha.co.in/new_page_90.htm. This amounts to declaring the end of geographical boundaries, and availability is no longer limited by the number of copies in stock.

I shall now describe my books under the following categories:

Original Works

Verse (general poetry, lyrical narratives, ghazals, and poems and ghazals for children)

Prose (general stories, novels, criticism, essays, treatises, drama, editorials, and children's literature)

Translations

Prose — my translations of general stories and children's literature

Verse — my translations of poetry

Let us turn first to poetry. Uday Narayan Singh quoted several of my poems, which he liked. I reproduce his analysis below:

"Several lines may well remain engraved upon the reader's mind, such as:

> "The wall of collapsing emotions
> A pillar of frailty stands upright
> The granary of longing is filled

Standing as a symbol
The shrine of Himalayan wood kept inside the house, or
The tulsi plant standing on the veranda
Only a symbol of fellow feeling."

Or consider the following lines:

"The visible scene of a listening void
On nature's canvas
The picture of a roaring sea
The words of a figure painted in a dark cavern
No one will see these pictures of mine in the darkness
Will anyone, then, even hear the voice of the figure's longing?"

The influence of numerous cultures, not only of Mithila but of India more widely, can be seen in his fiction and poetry. This extends the horizon of active literary creation in Maithili, bringing fresh images, sounds and plots into view.

What Mandākinī is the poet seeking when he says:

"The Mandākinī that was in the midst of the sky
I saw upon the earth today..."

The imprint of his extensive travels is clearly discernible in his writing. One other thing is evident: Gajendra Thakur the lexicographer and Gajendra Thakur the creative writer are different persons, different even in temperament. In his lexicographical work, the figure of the editor and the person concerned with technology is unmistakable, but in the moment of artistic creation all these aspects disappear.

In many works one finds not merely rounded narratives but political commentary as well. He shows no hesitation in writing it. Consider the many great warriors of Kurukshetra: each was a renowned expert in his own field and discipline—some in commanding armies of several akṣauhiṇīs, others in archery, and so on. All knew the difference between dharma and adharma, yet each seemed helpless before the impending catastrophe. Such situations can be glimpsed in stories and interpretations even in the present context. I would call this a strength of the great text, or metatext. Otherwise, why would he write:

Watching the countrymen fall behind
Awakened in a noon filled with spells and charms
A dream of murmured incantations
Becomes the swiftest runner
The most nimble wrestler in the arena
The labouring master's voice breaks his solitude
The sleep of a night painted black with soot

The sequence of sleep and dreams—breaking, returning, breaking
...

We may regard this great text as an experiment; equally, we may see it as a distillation of the circle of the Seven Sages, or as a modern epic divided into seven kāṇḍas."

Rajdev Mandal writes:

"Sitting at the chessboard of the millennium, you are watching the game of life. Through deep exploration you create one image after another and immerse yourself in that exhilaration.

A scene beside the boundless sea
The heart brimming with exhilaration...

The poet within you evokes the image of the sun and says:

"The rays of the sun had spread across
How many mysteries vanished
The mist of darkness has grown fearful
But what is this...?

I had the welcome opportunity to read a few haiku in the collection, for a change of taste. Your poems carry the fragrance of Mithila into all our minds:

"I remember the paddy fields
Jhilli and kachauri
Gathering bundles of harvested paddy
With the money from gleaned ears of grain we bought
Red sparklers
Which were called red sticks, and Played sat-dhariyā..."

While living away from home, one remembers one's village and household. These lines express the pain of separation, together with a new rhythm:

"I do not know whether I shall ever return
Or whether I shall die and fade away
Here..."

The satire is clearly visible in these lines:

"No delay at all in striking with the stick
Nor much sorrow when a heifer is born
Yet you are worthy of worship..."

The problem created by flooding, compressed into a handful of short lines, is an attempt to contain an ocean in a pitcher, as these lines reveal:

"The earthen ridges were breached here and there

And rain kept falling from above
All the paddy and rice stored in earthen bins
The screens collapsed, becoming prey to the water...”

The poems are filled with ever-new images:

“Monstrous as a thousand floods
A tangle of happenings
My breath grew laboured
I sprang up in alarm...”

You did not merely spring up in alarm; you rose with awareness, bearing new images and sounds and a fresh vision. I cannot tell how far you will go, or where your destination lies.

“In the churning of the world
Something new will now emerge...
We shall seek the way along the road...
The journey has now grown long...””

All these poems can be found in my book Sahasrābdīk Cauparpar (On the Chessboard of the Millennium).

I now present two poems from my book Sahasrajit.

The Evil Eye Falls

Mother says
That the evil eye may fall on someone.
And it is true! Who else has a son like mine?
Whenever he begins a task,
He takes on a heap of work at once.
Until it is finished, he thinks of nothing else.
And Mother's heart misses a beat;
Her heart begins to sink.
What is he doing?
What is so beautiful about him?
Yet Mother goes on saying
That the evil eye can fall
On my son at every turn.
The daughter-in-law speaks to her mother-in-law,
And a smile comes to Mother's face.

Kaṭihārī

I
There is a biting chill in the wind.
This cold will penetrate the bones.
They laid it down below,
Dipping it into the icy water.
Taking fire from a cow-dung-cake hearth,
To give the body its final passage,
They consigned it to the flames,
Together with grass, wood and ghee.
Everyone will return.
They are all returning home.
But there is no difference.
Look at the condition of the woman:
More piercing than this freezing wind,
It enters the bones.
Not on the bank of the Kamala, but beside the Yamuna,
A thousand miles from the village,
The same story as sixty years ago,
The same society.
Only the clothes have changed;
Only the course of the river has changed.

That body was laid upon seven stone slabs;
Fire devours it, roaring as it burns.
A family must be built anew, once again.

2
Kuśa grass spread on the ground near the tulsi plant,
Facing north;
A body subjected to a post-mortem examination.
After circling the dead three times,
They offer fire to the mouth.
The deceased, in dove-white attire;
Each person offers five pieces of wood.
Severing all seven bonds,
Throwing the seven satkaṭhiyā sticks into the fire,
Placing children and elders in front,
Stepping carefully, protecting their heels,
They go to bathe.
They offer tila-anjali with moṛā, sesame and water,
Without wiping their bodies dry,
Then, in the courtyard of the deceased,
They touch the ground and return home.

My Ghazal

Om Prakash Jha writes:

"Of course, all the poets who compose ghazals for children are capable of doing so and are writing very fine children's ghazals. In this context, however, I consider it appropriate to mention a children's ghazal by Shri Gajendra Thakur. The opening couplet of one of his children's ghazals is:

Leave the bride-and-bridegroom dolls; bring Barbie.
If the colour is pink, recognise Barbie.

Read the entire ghazal and see for yourself. By invoking the traditional bride-and-bridegroom dolls, this ghazal entertains young children; at the same time it offers a moving reflection on humanity sacrificed upon the altar of today's consumerism."

He writes about this composition:

Children's Ghazal

Leave the bride-and-bridegroom dolls; bring Barbie.
If the colour is pink, recognise Barbie.
The demons who roam from forest to forest—
Imagine Barbie returning with Vanasapto.

At daybreak, bearing seven colours into the village,
A fairy dwells there; listen, Barbie.
Let the shivering among children cease;
Forget the tear-filled eyes, resolve, Barbie.
Wander through water, sky and earth,
Put on wings; heed the little forehead-mark, Barbie.
Play and leap with the dhamm doll;
Dream at night and bring sleep, Barbie.
Put this doll to bed, and go to sleep;
Ride Airāvata and sing of the day, Barbie.

This is included in my ghazal collection Dhāṅgi Bāṭ Banebāk Dām Agūbār Pene Chhaṅ (roughly a hundred pages), in which ghazals occupy forty pages and a study of Maithili ghazal poetics occupies sixty. The book is titled Dhāṅgi Bāṭ Banebāk Dām Agūbār Pene Chhaṅ.

I present here the title ghazal from that book:

A traveller on the bitter path of love since time immemorial,
Carried that aged love in both hands.
With pure fingers, touching its puthpurī,
It spreads farphaisī when the agilkaṇṭha is merciless.
That love, nimarjanā, once beat with unblemished purity;
For the lover's anguish, it was a taut, harsh bow.
Knowing no distinction between an unworthy act and duty,
It never concealed the burning story of love.
The khanja-khūhar Airāvata is no path upon the path;
I have been paid in advance for making the dhāṅgi road.

In an interview with me, Munna Ji asked the following question. The interview is available in Videha: Sadeha, no. 33, p. 415; I reproduce an extract here.

Munnaji: Despite all the work you have done, neither your personality nor your writings have yet received a proper assessment. Does that not affect you?

Gajendra Thakur: No, I do not agree. The emails and letters I have received, readers' appreciations, the success of my project to preserve manuscripts, and my research in linguistics have all given me satisfaction. How could people of ill will also speak well of you? I would not even wish for that. In Maithili, as in other languages, an assessment of a person's life and work comes only after death.

The mind has become as pure as the water of the Ganges;
The Lord follows behind, calling, "Kabir, Kabir."
(Kabir)

(The mind has grown as pure as the Ganges; the Lord himself follows behind, calling "Kabir, Kabir." — Kabir)

The khanja-khūhar Airāvata is no path upon the path;
I have been paid in advance for making the dhāṅgi road.
(Others receive payment after their work is done; I have been paid in advance.)

Jagadanand Jha "Manu" writes: "Gajendra Thakur's observation is entirely right: the more childlike a person can become, the better the children's ghazal that person will write."

Chandan Kumar Jha writes: "Gajendra Ji not only wrote ghazals while strengthening the grammar of the ghazal; in the forms of a simple syllabic metre and a simple quantitative metre, he gave the Maithili ghazal world two invaluable baḥrs, or metrical structures. For many younger poets and beginners like us, they have proved helpful in composing ghazals. This is bringing an unprecedented enrichment to the Maithili ghazal."

Ashish Anchinhar writes:

"Recently, however, Gajendra Thakur successfully composed a ghazal in baḥr-e-mutaqārib. It has therefore become necessary to discuss it. In fact, the discovery of a syllabic baḥr in Maithili was also made by Gajendra Thakur, and almost every new ghazal poet is following that example."

That ghazal is given below.

Baḥr-e-Mutaqārib

Baḥr-e-mutaqārib: eight rukns; faʿūlun (U | |), repeated four times.

You take me for a gambler, for no reason;
Why speak of a peculiar way of living, for no reason?
I raised a clamour; I sang my sadness away;
Why do you coax the conjurer, for no reason?
Whatever nabārī and chabārī there are, they burn;
No one comes back to turn the sutārī, for no reason.
Hungry within the home, disappointed outside,
Crying in famine, helpless, for no reason.
We walk, bearing the palanquin, sustained by this hope;
The bhāsāṭhī approaches; you ponder, for no reason.
Even what has been seen and known comes today;
The lamp of protection is being extinguished.
What shall I tell anyone, and who will believe it?
In every recess—meaning that there is so much.
Why do you refuse to listen without even hearing the matter?
Hate it, if hatred is all that fills you.
A thick line of anxiety across the forehead;
It was small, and now it has grown chhebgar.
Amid the blazing fire of aspiration,
I called it the sign that I had grown great.
Today's matter will come to an end, you know;
The morning breeze has turned into a birro.
Ask everyone; leave no one out.
Why was the new dawn held back?
The breeze that quietly broke into a sob;
Having found love, it has become khaṭbatāh.
To be clever has turned into counterfeit knowledge;
The bhaukī keeps snapping at khikhir every moment.
The performer laughs, turned into a bipṭā;
You too have seen it, just as I have.
I have bathed at the ghāṭ of fear;
And so I shall endure oppression from every direction.
The hare spoke of this pirauñch light;
It stands in the middle of the road; I could not stop it.
Strike them down; cast away the thoughts of the mind;
When things cleared, they went out of control.
Crocodiles have arrived in our neighbourhood;
Water burial has become a business.

Airāvata is not the gaja-grāhaka elephant;
A way of bringing the two together has appeared.
My eyes are closing; tell me what I should do;
I cannot understand; anger rises—tell me what to do.
Here the paddy has turned into empty husk;
A green fire smoulders—tell me what I should do.
A moment of experience, seen and touched;
Will these lines not become history?
Lost along the road, why will you not linger for me?
The flowing current of lies has come to a halt;
When it flows backward, it burns again and again.
Even Lachhano has inherited her father's stubbornness;
Forgetting good and bad, we have become just the same.
The little bird was instructed in this way;
The well-wisher says, "What a formidable hunter!"
At daybreak, sadness was flying away;
I fashioned this charako pariyāṇi many times.
I wait for the path of deliverance, yet I am called the sun;
What remains for the solitary one? Not a single thing.
I rise even in darkness and count and count;
When shall I inscribe my own new form anew?
When shall I make the north–south thoroughfare flow?
The floor will remain shivering with cold, sir;
When will you taste it if you go on yearning?
If somewhere fate weeps over migration,
It is because of the habit of enduring pain.
A knot forms, and that too begins to look beautiful;
I had not understood that the matter had grown so large.
Today I saw that it was sinking;
How much, and what, it used to ask of me, again and again!
It is leaving without taking what had accumulated;
It is leaving without hearing what I have to say.

Like the vihani tale, this form is not regarded as serious. But if the compositions that follow (from my book Sahasrajit) seem serious to you, then you may take it that my work has succeeded.

1

Nature's Wrath

With kuśa grass, sesame, and water, becoming a widow—
what distinction from a woman whose husband lives?
Dūb grass, unbroken rice, and water. (Tanka/Waka)
From the oleander, house, trees, and mountains are encircled. (Haiku)
The people of the forest cannot forget the water flowing by their homes. (Senryū)
I am playing in the dark jhummari;
the sky is below.
Today the house is only an outline;
I am in the marshland.
(Haibun)

2

1.
Pursuing nature,
I have crossed to the other side—
a dried leaf.
(Haiku)

2.
These flowers and fruits go on advancing;
their number decreases.
Turn and look again:
fewer nearby, more at a distance.
(Tanka/Waka)

3.
The colour has faded from mountain and tree—yet life remains.
(Senryū)

4.
The tree has become a solitary child;
its leaves have become nature's toys.

Look at the summit,
but do not stand still.
Come, let us return;
we are travellers,
we are among people,
going out and returning.
(Haibun)

3

4

Waiting upon the road, look towards the sky:
a strange delusion,
as though this water-absorber would rise and open a path.
Seven-coloured is this hope;
hope rises,
the sky ready to sink—
and hope has become dread.

And now, kuṇḍaliyā verses (from my book Sahasrajit).

Kuṇḍaliyā

1

Distinguish truth from falsehood; harbour no obstruction.
Do not vacillate, not even a little, over what fate has written.
What fate has written—how can one simply call it good?
Truth will triumph, if you act without the crookedness of falsehood.
With falsehood comes fear; pull down the fear lodged in the heart.
Airāvat understands: this is the truth concealed in untruth.

2

The canopy turned and rustled with leaves; day grew dark.
Returning home after the day was spent, time became dreadful.
Time became dreadful; every limb trembled.
Who would hear the question? Words were caught in the snare of speech.
Airāvat is distraught: where have words disappeared?
Whirling into time itself, one enters the hornets' nest.

3

If there is victory without pride, recognise that as good.
Do not panic at defeat; understand this, my friend.
Understand this, my friend: should a quarrel arise, accept the loss and move ahead; do not make another uproar.

Where a deed has brought contentment, that alone is worthwhile.
Understand, O Airāvat, and contemplate defeat and victory.

4

Let speech be gracious; understand before speaking.
When the net is vast, silence may be the wiser course.
When the net is vast, it may swallow you at once.
A clamour will arise if the moment is not right.
Listen to what I say: words are precious.
Airāvat says: do not utter words as empty as an elephant's yam.

Now read the Flag Song of Mithila (from Sahasrābdīk Caupaṛpar).

The Flag Song of Mithila

Mithila's flag shall fly across the world;
I have seen Mother angered, adorned and stained;
I am restless, and my mind sinks in distress.
I come from a land of learning, industry and action;
your descendants shall return to prevail;
with intelligence, resourcefulness and courage,
do not doubt their capacity for victory.
Even if Maithili has grown faint of breath,
I shall appeal in the speech of conjunct letters;
our touch shall bring phonemes bursting forth—
the flag shall not fall, O Mother Mithila.
(Using Vidyāpati's vocabulary.)

Now learn the calls of animals and birds through this children's song (from Bāṅk Baṅaurā).

The bullock is threshing, you know!
Elephant: agatt, pichū, thāit, māil biri;
hīrr-hīrr, pig, come home with us;
tī-tī, the pigeon has flown up above;
lih-lih, goat, eat your grass.
The bullock is threshing, you know!
Atū, hen; kut-kut, doggy;
catty, pisū-pisū, will you come?
Hearing chehai-chehai, the young buffalo ran away;
I too shall flee and look for another path.
Arr, goat, eat your grass!
The bullock is threshing, you know!
Do not provoke it with dhēhai-dhēhai;

the bull will come to the threshing ground;
come here, hey, haure hau!
The bullock is threshing, you know!

And now a vihani tale.

If all you have read under the name of vihani tales are little comic anecdotes, this genre will not seem serious to you. So read a vihani tale from Galpa Guccha; read it more than once if necessary. I believe that, as with haiku and haibun, you will begin to take this form seriously too.

Polygamous Marriage and the Hijra

"Poor woman, she has died," the villagers said when Fulana Babu's third wife died.

"Fulana Babu has cut his third wife's throat," said one person.

"You speak the truth. When his first wife had no child, he married a second time. But when the second also had no child, he ought to have understood, shouldn't he?" said another.

"Yes, and instead he kept telling his third wife that God had not given them a child because she would not acknowledge his nephews. Imagine that!" said the third person.

"That damned hijra!" said the fourth, bringing the gathering to an end.

But this grand assembly of four people was united in its view that the first two marriages had been entirely proper.

My Novels

In his essay "The Representation of Dalit Characters in Maithili Novel Literature," Shiv Kumar Jha "Tillu" writes:

"In Gajendra Thakur's Sahasrabāṛhani, an indigenous person brings a medicinal root for asthma, but a few years later that root can no longer be found in the forest—a sign of the decline of the forests. His Sahasraśīrṣā, meanwhile, offers a detailed account of almost all the Dalit communities of Mithila. Although it has only three houses, the Dhobiya Toli has come to constitute a distinct hamlet. Clothes belonging to Marwari families are brought here for washing from as far away as Jhanjharpur. Those Mahiswar Brahmins who set off for wedding processions with their bell-bottoms on, whistling as they go, are not wearing their own clothes. These are the very garments of wealthy Marwaris, obtained on loan. The washerman rents out the Marwaris' clothes to them for two days. Korail Budhan and Domi Safi are washermen. Domi Safi is now Domi Das, because he follows the Kabirpanth. There is another hamlet, the Chamar Toli: the Chamars

Mukdev Ram and Kapildev Ram. It used to lie outside the village, beyond the bamboo grove. Now all the bamboo has been cut down and uprooted; the expanding settlement has reached the Chamar Toli. House plots and brick kilns lie side by side. Their assistance is expected in everything from beating drums to sounding ceremonial horns. When cattle die, the household continues to be regarded as ritually polluted until these people carry the carcass away. Bhola Paswan and Mukesh Paswan are Dusadhs, relatives of Gena Hazari's lower branch. This is the same Gena Hazari who saw a cow come and give milk upon a stalk of kuśa grass at Kusheshwar Sthan. He began to dig at the spot, and Mahadeva appeared deeper and deeper beneath the earth. The Mahadeva installed by Sita's son Kusha was thus discovered by Gena Hazari.

Mukesh Paswan's daughter Malati is a bank officer, and his son-in-law Mathuranand is principal of a D.P.S. school. They live in a farmhouse near Vasant Kunj. Bhola Paswan and Mukesh Paswan continue to live in the village.

During the famine of 1967, when all the ponds and depressions had dried up but Dakahi pond had not, the Prime Minister visited. People showed him how the Musahars dug out bisāṛh roots there to eat. Umesh, the son of the leatherworker Mukdev Ram, has spread out his implements next to that open-air barber's salon, although he lives in Kishangarh. Besides repairing sandals and shoes, he has learned to make duplicate keys for locks. If you have the key, a duplicate costs fifteen rupees. If the key has been lost, a replacement costs one hundred rupees. Calling him to the house costs another two hundred rupees. Raghuvir, son of the Musahar Bichkun Saday, has learned driving. He drives for a businessman in Vasant Kunj and lives in Kishangarh. Shrimant, son of Baudha Mallik of the Dom Toli, has taken a maintenance contract for a sector. He employs two hundred people who collect the rubbish from residential quarters and clean roads and parking areas early every morning. Some of them, particularly people from Nepal, also wipe household windowpanes early in the morning for a monthly fee of two hundred rupees and have become newspaper hawkers. They live in Kishangarh; the Musahar Bichkun Saday, however, lives there in a house of his own."

Durganand Mandal writes:

"The affection of Shri Gajendra Thakur, editor of Videha, has awakened creative energy within me. There were many words that had not been used in Maithili literature and were called merely theth, or vernacular. When I read and came to know Thakur's book Kurukṣetram Antarmanak, my confidence in these words grew still stronger."

Rajendra Kumar Pradhan writes:

"Shri Gajendra Thakur's novel Sahasrabāṛhani bears witness to numerous political and bureaucratic upheavals. His Sahasraśīrṣā is a remarkably successful attempt to spread political consciousness through songs sung by Mohan, a Dalit singer, from India's independence to the Right to Information. Interwoven with it are the politics of the village and of floods, extending from the village all the way to Delhi."

In a novel-trilogy set in the fictional Mithila village of Garh Narikel, the second novel after Sahasraśīrṣā is also being published serially in electronic form on Videha.

Jagdish Prasad Mandal writes: "The minute geographical description of village life in Sahasrabāṛhani astonished me."

Umesh Mandal writes:

"Every letter of Gajendra Thakur's novel Sahasrabāṛhani resonates with a note of sensitivity. Its moving depiction of the images of feeling, imbued with exalted and considered economic understanding, presents the agitated suffering of Nand, a conscientious and honest man, as he fulfils both his household duties and his social responsibilities."

Sahasrabāṛhani (novel)

Sahasraśīrṣā (novel)

Short Fiction

Read "Sar-Samāj" and "Bāṇavīr" in Galpa Guccha (a collection of vihani tales and short stories).

Read "Siddha Mahāvīra," "Śabdaśāstram," "Delhi" and "Taskar" in Śabdaśāstram (a short-story collection).

Yoganand Jha writes:

"Kurukṣetram Antarmanak is a collection of Shri Gajendra Thakur's writings in various genres. Its seventh volume contains twenty-three stories for children. Most are accounts of the folk heroes of Mithila, although about half a dozen may be called children's folktales; even their language, however, is entirely classical in character. The work may be regarded as an important example of ongoing efforts to collect children's folktales."

Subhash Chandra Yadav writes:

"Gajendra Thakur is an extraordinary person, gifted with keen intellect and tremendous energy. His talent has a remarkably wide range. He works wholeheartedly for the advancement of language, literature and society.

Gajendra Thakur is multilingual. This quality is reflected in his dictionary-making, translations between several languages and various kinds of research. He is the founder of Videha, the first Maithili electronic magazine. Videha has provided Maithili with a global platform. To preserve and develop Maithil culture, he has built an extraordinary archive that continues to grow. Published in seven volumes, Kurukṣetram Antarmanak is a garden of Gajendra Thakur's creativity and intellectual inquiry. No literary genre seems to have escaped him. His multicoloured literary world is lucid and dedicated to the public good. In children's literature, the height and refinement of his art are without parallel."

o

The Year Forty-Seven...

A Village in Mithila...

My Plays

Ulkāmukh

Ulkāmukh (play)

Maithili Critical Theory

(For theory)

(For application)

Videha: Sadeha 33, pp. 201–206)

Maithili Ghazal Poetics

Vidyāpati's Bidesiyā

Videha: Sadeha 33, pp. 192–198

Munnaji: How long will you be able to sustain your firm resolve to stand your ground, despite abuse and vilification, in order to prevent Maithili journalism from being pushed aside—or in the pursuit of truth?

Gajendra Thakur: In the dedication to Kurukṣetram Antarmanak, I wrote:

> I had seen my father receiving truth with steadfast equanimity;
> from that very moment I had understood > that there could be no renunciation:
> this path was the path of stubborn resolve.

Many people in my village began to weep on reading those lines. They know what they mean; to you, however, I can only say that the future will decide.

25. Sajhiyā Ropani (edited by Dr Pramod Kumar): A Review of the Collective Anthology of Bīhani Stories by Forty-Three Authors

Abstract

The shared bīhani-story anthology Sajhiyā Ropani brings together forty-three bīhani-story writers: 1. Ghanshyam Ghanero, 2. Munnaji, 3. Narayanji, 4. Pramod Kumar Jha "Gokul", 5. Dr Pramod Kumar, 6. Munni Kamat, 7. Amaresh Kumar Labh, 8. Vidya Chandra Jha "Bambam", 9. Satyendra Karna, 10. Bindeshwar Thakur, 11. Abha Jha, 12. Shiv Kumar, 13. Priyamvada, 14. Mahakant Prasad, 15. Prabhas Akinchan, 16. Ashish Anchinhar, 17. Poonam Jha, 18. Shubhra Santosh, 19. Jawahar Lal Kashyap, 20. Subhash Kumar Kamat, 21. Neeraj Karna, 22. Kumari Aarti, 23. Kalpana Jha–1 (Bokaro), 24. Kalpana Jha–2 (Patna), 25. Sabita Jha "Soni", 26. Vinita Thakur, 27. Mrinal Ashutosh, 28. Amar Thakur, 29. Manisha Jha, 30. Ruby Jha, 31. Om Prakash Jha, 32. Himadri Mishra "Him", 33. Ira Mallick, 34. Kanchan Kanth, 35. Rajesh Verma "Bhavaditya", 36. Misida, 37. Jayanti Kumari, 38. Kalpana Kumari, 39. Santwana Mishra, 40. Nandini Jha, 41. Bhuvaneshwar Chaurasia "Bhunesh", 42. Amar Kant Lal, 43. Deepa Mishra.

Keywords: Sajhiyā Ropani · bīhani story · Pramod Kumar · microfiction · subject matter · language · women's writing · anthology review

I

The shared bīhani-story anthology Sajhiyā Ropani brings together forty-three bīhani-story writers: 1. Ghanshyam Ghanero, 2. Munnaji, 3. Narayanji, 4. Pramod Kumar Jha "Gokul", 5. Dr Pramod Kumar, 6. Munni Kamat, 7. Amaresh Kumar Labh, 8. Vidya Chandra Jha "Bambam", 9. Satyendra Karna, 10. Bindeshwar Thakur, 11. Abha Jha, 12. Shiv Kumar, 13. Priyamvada, 14. Mahakant Prasad, 15. Prabhas Akinchan, 16. Ashish Anchinhar, 17. Poonam Jha, 18. Shubhra Santosh, 19. Jawahar Lal Kashyap, 20. Subhash Kumar Kamat, 21. Neeraj Karna, 22. Kumari Aarti, 23. Kalpana Jha–1 (Bokaro), 24. Kalpana Jha–2 (Patna), 25. Sabita Jha "Soni", 26. Vinita Thakur, 27. Mrinal Ashutosh, 28. Amar Thakur, 29. Manisha Jha, 30. Ruby Jha, 31. Om Prakash Jha, 32. Himadri Mishra "Him", 33. Ira Mallick, 34. Kanchan Kanth, 35. Rajesh Verma "Bhavaditya", 36. Misida, 37. Jayanti Kumari, 38. Kalpana Kumari, 39. Santwana Mishra, 40. Nandini Jha, 41. Bhuvaneshwar Chaurasia "Bhunesh", 42. Amar Kant Lal, 43. Deepa Mishra. This collection contains the work of twenty-three men and twenty women.

Male Bīhani-Story Writers in the Collection

1. Ghanshyam Ghanero, 2. Munnaji, 3. Narayanji, 4. Pramod Kumar Jha "Gokul", 5. Dr Pramod Kumar, 6. Amaresh Kumar Labh, 7. Vidya Chandra Jha "Bambam", 8. Satyendra Karna, 9. Bindeshwar Thakur, 10. Shiv Kumar, 11. Mahakant Prasad, 12. Prabhas Akinchan, 13. Ashish Anchinhar, 14. Jawahar Lal Kashyap, 15. Subhash Kumar Kamat, 16. Neeraj Karna, 17. Mrinal Ashutosh, 18. Amar Thakur, 19. Om Prakash Jha, 20. Rajesh Verma "Bhavaditya", 21. Misida, 22. Bhuvaneshwar Chaurasia "Bhunesh", 23. Amar Kant Lal.

Women Bīhani-Story Writers in the Collection

1. Munni Kamat, 2. Abha Jha, 3. Priyamvada, 4. Poonam Jha, 5. Shubhra Santosh, 6. Kumari Aarti, 7. Kalpana Jha–1 (Bokaro), 8. Kalpana Jha–2 (Patna), 9. Sabita Jha "Soni", 10. Vinita Thakur, 11. Manisha Jha, 12. Ruby Jha, 13. Himadri Mishra "Him", 14. Ira Mallick, 15. Kanchan Kanth, 16. Jayanti Kumari, 17. Kalpana Kumari, 18. Santwana Mishra, 19. Nandini Jha, 20. Deepa Mishra.

The number of women writing bīhani stories is heartening. For that reason, the editor's impartial outlook deserves praise. That an editor should remain impartial is still treated almost as a special virtue in Maithili —a distressing state of affairs, certainly.

2

Forty-three authors have undertaken this shared planting of eighty-six bīhani stories.

Ghanshyam Ghanero's "Achhop" is caustic, whether or not it is aimed at the editorial effort to prop Maithili up and keep it standing; Munnaji's "Focus!" is both sharp and sweet-and-sour. Narayanji's "Kushal" portrays human nature in much the same way as Rajmohan Jha's bīhani story "Chalah" (see the 67th Videha special issue devoted to bīhani stories: https://videha123.files.wordpress.com/2010/10/videha_01_10_2010.pdf), and both have the same plot. This demonstrates that a bīhani story, too, has a plot, and that two quite different bīhani stories can be written around one plot. Pramod Kumar Jha "Gokul" creates embellished, classical scenes in his bīhani stories; those who say that the miniature form cannot accommodate such effects are thereby proved wrong. Dr Pramod Kumar, editor of this effort to support and sustain Maithili, has five bīhani stories in the collection. A child quite reasonably declares his mother backward because she does not know how to make biryani; and in the post-Corona period, too, someone unfamiliar with Google, Classroom, PPT and all manner of similar things is pronounced backward. Munni Kamat's feminism is evident in "Girls Hostel," with its "attempt once again to free the body"; the bīhani story is thus capable of serving as an instrument of feminist writing. Amaresh Kumar Labh's "Kariki" reinforces the attitude expressed in the words "Neither did she study, nor did she get any big job!"—a new ointment, as it were, for turning dark skin fair, after which finding a groom would supposedly present no difficulty. Vidya Chandra Jha "Bambam" is himself afflicted by a demon of love in "Maf Kar Saki Ta"; in "Prabha" he draws an uncle into its grip, while Satyendra Karna calls that same demon "Dimag Phoojab": the final truth. Bindeshwar Thakur remains an old-fashioned man: he likes neither the son's misbehaviour in "Sokaj" nor the daughter-in-law's in "Bahasal Kaniya." Abha Jha's "Laj" strikes at men's definition of morality. Shiv Kumar, too, in "Formality," identifies the conflicts arising within families in the atmosphere of the new economy. Priyamvada's "Swabhiman" opposes the "price of a daughter's marriage." In "Goli," Mahakant Prasad compares the Prime Minister's "Mann Ki Baat" to a goli—a pill or bullet—although he does not actually use the word "Prime Minister." Prabhas Akinchan writes "Kaparachhilla" about the upanayana rite, which people remember only just before marriage. Ashish Anchinhar's "Sthiti" concerns a woman's situation before and after marriage; Poonam Jha, in "Upadesh," makes clear the difference between people's preaching and their conduct. Shubhra Santosh's "Mol Bhav" exposes a grotesque aspect of men and, at the same time, the strength within women. Jawahar Lal Kashyap enters the psychology of both owner and dog in "Kukkur"; in "Hero," he writes about names and the idea familiar from Shakespeare that a rose would retain its fragrance even if it bore another name. Through "Code Word," Subhash Kumar Kamat shows that news of a daughter's birth brings happiness, yet fear of events in society can make people unwilling to bring a daughter into the world. Munna is delighted, but Sudha becomes anxious after watching television news. Neeraj Karna attacks deviousness through "Father's Day." Kumari Aarti's "Jeevansangi," however, keeps alive the hope that a woman and a man may live in harmony as wife and husband. Kalpana Jha–1 (Bokaro) comments on the pollution of the Ganga in "Santap," while "Sappat" looks closely at a daughter's anger as she watches her son and husband eat. Kalpana Jha–2 (Patna), in "Facebookiya Jingi," addresses the problems of old age while also commenting on Facebook posts: she thus shows that, despite its small dimensions, a bīhani story may hold two plots at once. Sabita Jha "Soni" reveals a feminist concern in "Naut": does hunger strike men before anyone else? Vinita Thakur's "Samay Ker Maral" seeks to explain the reversals of time through hunger. Mrinal Ashutosh's "Newton Ke Third Law" portrays the condition of a woman in a live-in relationship, but brings the story to a close not through helplessness but through action and reaction—"Newton's Third Law." He does not himself use the words "action and reaction," because Mithila has now achieved enough scientific literacy for people to understand these words from the mere mention of "Newton's Third Law." In "Nam Uchch Kan Bucch," Amar Thakur elucidates the meaning of the saying "What is the use of growing tall, like a date-palm tree?" Through "Niputra," Manisha Jha shows how a single person can display two different personalities when faced with suffering of their own and that of others. In "Aas," Ruby Jha considers a mother's and child's obstinacy under two different circumstances; in "Tugar," she examines the experience of comparable suffering among human beings and animals. Om Prakash Jha's "Purna Dalan" reverses the familiar idea "a new house rises, an old house falls": it is not a story about an old courtyard building collapsing, but about a place of shelter for a pair of birds. This is a fitting ending for a bīhani story. His "Special Permit," included in Videha Maithili Bīhani Katha (Videha: Sadeha 5), is likewise an inversion reminiscent of Kabir's उलटबाँसी (ulṭabāsī). It is in this manner that a bīhani story ought to end, as I wrote in "The Critical Theory of the Bīhani Story" (Videha: Sadeha 5). Himadri Mishra "Him" describes exchanges of sharp words between mother-in-law and daughter-in-law in "Adhikar." In "Peer Na Jane Koy," Ira Mallick uses the example of grinding grain at the mill all night in order to forget grief, demonstrating the bīhani story's capacity for psychological analysis: the night is difficult to pass; the day passes somehow. Kanchan Kanth ends "Barabari" on a humorous note. Rajesh Verma "Bhavaditya" suggests something further through a person becoming the ghost of his present self, followed by a dispute between the two; after all, people change their opinions when their roles change. Misida clarifies the same point in five lines in "Sapna," through three ideas —literature, creative writing, and politics. Jayanti Kumari's "Khounjhi" is a bold bīhani story. Beginning with crockery being banged about in the kitchen in anger, it opens with the feminist stance of Soni, a domestic helper; it ends by showing that the mistress of the house, Rekha, is part of that same discourse. The author possesses the ability to achieve such a conclusion—what may be called an apex ending. Kalpana Kumari's "Jhamaral Mon" focuses on divisions of family property and inheritance. Santwana Mishra, even in "Bhagwati Janam Leli," seems to be saying that women themselves are responsible for women's troubles—or that women, too, bear responsibility. Nandini Jha, however, reverses this in "Bhadba" and demonstrates that a mother-in-law can be progressive. Bhuvaneshwar Chaurasia "Bhunesh" produces humour through verbal wrangling in "Sahamat"; Amar Kant Lal does likewise in "MRP." Deepa Mishra knows that women are often called the more "clever" ones, but says, "It must be men who are clever," and thereby gets men to do a great deal of work. https://videha123.files.wordpress.com/2010/10/videha_01_10_2010.pdf — Videha Maithili Bīhani Katha.

3

In the introduction to Sajhiyā Ropani (the shared anthology of bīhani stories), its editor, Dr Pramod Kumar, writes of the qualities of the bīhani story: "It contains all the qualities of a long story, such as dialogue, atmosphere, craft, seriousness of subject matter, purpose, and relevance."

His strict measure for a bīhani story is one hundred words, which can be read in two minutes; this naturally brings to mind the advertisement for two-minute noodles. His editorial strength lies in assembling every kind of bīhani story in this collection: some humorous and some serious, some concerned with women's questions, and others with Corona and Facebook. He has thus shown that even a humorous miniature, when contextually meaningful, may be recognised and collected as a bīhani story (see "The Critical Theory of the Bīhani Story," Videha: Sadeha 5). The need to write a commentary on the Aṣṭādhyāyī many times larger than the original was felt roughly five hundred years after its composition, and such a commentary was indeed written. In the same way, if the bīhani stories collected here were reviewed, not merely as part of this anthology but also independently, those reviews would occupy several times more space than the stories themselves. This is a distinguishing quality of the bīhani stories gathered in this collection, and for that reason the compiler-editor deserves our thanks.

26. Jagadanand Jha ‘Manu’s’ “Māṭik Bāsan” and a Critical Commentary

Abstract

A series of invited writings by authors and critical responses by invited reviewers: Jagadanand Jha ‘Manu’s’ children’s story “Māṭik Bāsan” and Gajendra Thakur’s commentary on it. “Māṭik Bāsan” was published electronically in Videha and collected in Videha: Sadeha 32 (pp. 2–5); it is available in the Videha archive at http://videha.co.in/new_page_89.htm. Jagadanand Jha ‘Manu’, village and post office: Haripur Dih Tol, Madhubani. Kedar Prasad, a skilled potter of the village.

Keywords: Jagadanand · clay · vessels · critical · commentary · any · Kedar

Abstract

A series of invited writings by authors and critical responses by invited reviewers: Jagadanand Jha ‘Manu’s’ children’s story “Māṭik Bāsan” and Gajendra Thakur’s commentary on it. “Māṭik Bāsan” was published electronically in Videha and collected in Videha: Sadeha 32 (pp. 2–5); it is available in the Videha archive at http://videha.co.in/new_page_89.htm. Jagadanand Jha ‘Manu’, village and post office: Haripur Dih Tol, Madhubani. Kedar Prasad was a skilled potter of the village. He made his living by producing clay vessels such as ghail (water-pots), lids and matkuris. For him, making earthenware was not merely a livelihood but also a beautiful craft.

A Series of Invited Literary Works and Invited Critical Reviews: Jagadanand Jha ‘Manu’s’ Children’s Story “Māṭik Bāsan,” with a Commentary by Gajendra Thakur “Māṭik Bāsan” was published electronically in Videha and collected in Videha: Sadeha 32 (pp. 2–5); the issue is available in the Videha archive at http://videha.co.in/new_page_89.htm.

First, let us read the story again:

Jagadanand Jha ‘Manu’, village and post office: Haripur Dih Tol, Madhubani

Māṭik Bāsan (Clay Vessels)

Kedar Prasad was a skilled potter in his village. He supported himself by making clay vessels—ghail water-pots, lids, matkuris and the like. Making earthenware was not merely his means of livelihood; to him it was a beautiful craft. While working, he became so wholly absorbed that he seemed like a devotee who, in meditation upon his chosen deity, forgets all awareness of body and mind. Through his own sustained practice, he gradually began making handsome, attractive clay elephants for Chhath

Maiya as well. His earthenware and his Chhath elephants won much admiration.

Gradually the village environment began to change. Steel and other metals started to take the place of clay vessels. Kedar Prasad's income began to fall, but his faithfulness and dedication to his work meant that he could not bring himself to give up pottery.

His handsome, well-mannered son Bibhu had been trained in the hereditary craft since childhood. There was no hesitation in saying that he was even better at it than his father. Kedar Prasad knew this very well and was inwardly both pleased by his gifted son and worried about him. His worry arose because he knew the present state of the potter's trade and could foresee its future; yet, seeing Bibhu's skill with his hands, he did not consider it right to keep him away from the craft. Alongside his schooling, Bibhu continued to acquire all his father's skills. Going beyond the clay elephants his father made for Chhath, he began using his craftsmanship to fashion sculptures. People throughout the village started talking about his work. Where a Chhath elephant made by his father fetched eleven rupees, Bibhu's small dolls and figures began fetching a hundred or a hundred and twenty-five rupees apiece. Under his father's supervision, Bibhu advanced in sculpture day after day. Soon there was demand for his images of Mother Saraswati and the deities of Krishna Janmashtami and Vishwakarma Puja in twenty surrounding villages. Yet his father still pointed out some defect or other in each sculpture and encouraged him to make the next one better. Bibhu treated his father's words like sacred instruction and applied himself to making still finer images.

After the tenth standard, Bibhu left school and devoted himself entirely to sculpture. By the age of eighteen he had become fully discerning and had learnt to distinguish what was good from what was bad. His statues were now admired not only in his village or district but across the state. A single statue of his might fetch two or three thousand rupees. Yet his father continued to find some shortcoming in each sculpture and to instruct him to produce a more beautiful one. Earlier, Bibhu had treated those words as sacred and immediately set about correcting the deficiency. Now, however, his father's comments began to wound him somewhere within. He lacked the courage to object, so he suppressed his feelings and followed the instructions he was given.

Work continued somehow, and news of Bibhu's sculptures now began to travel beyond the state's borders. He received a letter from the Home Department of the state government, informing him that arrangements had been made to exhibit his sculpture at an all-India sculpture exhibition. The state government would bear all the expenses; the winner would receive the honour of being named the country's finest sculptor, together with a cash prize of one lakh rupees. The letter made Bibhu immensely happy. He ran straight to his father to tell him. Kedar Prasad, too, was delighted: the labour of his entire life was beginning to bear fruit. Bibhu stayed awake night after night, working beside his father, guide and teacher.

He made one fine sculpture after another, but Kedar Prasad unfailingly found a fault in each. Instead of setting about correcting the flaws his father identified, Bibhu now began to harbour negative feelings. He started answering back and questioning his father's criticisms. Tomorrow was the last day for sending a sculpture to the competition, and today Bibhu was giving the finishing touches to the one he considered the best of all he had made. As Kedar Prasad examined it minutely, Bibhu's mind was in turmoil: 'Yes, he will certainly point out some mistake or other even now.'

At length Kedar Prasad broke his silence: "Beautiful! The finest of all the sculptures you have made so far." After a brief pause, he added: "But..."

But what? Bibhu's mind flared up. "He is bound to find some fault," he thought.

Kedar Prasad went on: "If this part had been like this, it would have been even better; and if this colour had been such-and-such, it would have been magnificent."

From childhood Bibhu had treated this man's words as a sacred command and had poured his heart and soul into carrying them out. Today, however, he could not bear what his father said. He burst out angrily: "Enough! Finding faults is all you know how to do. No one will buy even one of the clay lids and vessels you make for a single rupee, yet however fine a sculpture I produce, you will always discover something wrong with it."

At Bibhu's words, Kedar Prasad's calm expression changed and he sank into thought. With a deep sigh he patted Bibhu on the back and said, "Enough, son, enough! The moment a person begins to feel that he has attained perfection, his growth comes to a halt. The belief that one is perfect paralyses the mind's capacity to move forward."

For a few moments there was silence. Both remained still. Tears streamed from Bibhu's eyes. What had he done today? He realised his mistake. Kedar Prasad continued: "It was my dream that my son would become the finest sculptor not merely in the state or the country, but in the whole world... But no. Never mind. Who knew me? No one. The whole state knows my son as a good sculptor. That is a very great thing for me. But my dream—now it will never come true." With these words he left the room.

An Examination of the Story

After the story's first paragraph comes the statement, "Steel and other metals began taking the place of clay vessels." As soon as I read this, I recalled Jigri, the English translation of a Telugu novel (Jigri by the Telugu novelist Pedinti Ashok Kumar, translated into English as Friends Forever by P. Jayalakshmi). It tells of a family that earns its living by making a bear dance, and of the bond between the bear and the human beings. When the government bans the practice, all that remains of this marginal culture is its memory, for the family would have to cross numerous political and cultural boundaries in order to be rehabilitated.

Positive Aspects of the Story

In this story, however, the author gives this process of change a promising turn. The son begins making sculptures instead of the clay lids and vessels made by his father. There is another difference: the government has placed no prohibition on the making of earthenware. Indeed, you may recall the fashion for selling and drinking tea in clay cups on trains, a practice the government helped to promote. Yet the memory of this marginal culture is present in me, surely in you, and in the storyteller too. The writer, however, carries the story forward by linking it to the folktale tradition, in which moral instruction is a purpose of children's literature. One is reminded of Shivshankar Srinivas's "Pandit O Hunak Putra" ("The Pandit and His Son"), a children's story based on a Mithila folktale, electronically published in Videha and included in Videha: Sadeha 4 (pp. 138–141); it is available in the Videha archive at http://videha.co.in/new_page_89.htm. Srinivas's story is explicitly based on a folktale, whereas only the final portion of "Māṭik Bāsan" is inspired by one. The purpose of "Māṭik Bāsan" does not, in the end, become the modernisation of a marginal culture: it comes to be the same purpose as that of Srinivas's story. Srinivas arrived there through the rewriting of a folktale; Jagadanand, while attempting to depict the modernisation of a marginal culture, abandons his original narrative plot and pursues that same subject instead.

Negative Aspects of the Story

I have previously discussed Jagadanand's children's novel, Chonaha.

A long story for children—or, one might call it a novel—by Jagadanand Jha "Manu", entitled Chonaha, was published in Videha. The work was later collected in Videha: Sadeha 9 (Videha Children's Festival, pp. 109–126) and is available in the Videha archive at http://videha.co.in/new_page_89.htm. It is the first work in Maithili based on child psychology. This novel ought to be included in a training course on how to write children's literature in Maithili. It shows how a modern novel develops, step by step—and a children's novel at that. I urge you simply to read it.

But in "Māṭik Bāsan", Jagadanand disappointed me. I had expected from him something like Pedinti Ashok Kumar's Jigri; what I found instead was something as ordinary as Shivshankar Srinivas's "Pandit O Hunak Putra" ("The Pandit and His Son").

It is true that "Māṭik Bāsan" is a children's bīhani story. Yet for a writer who has the plot—

"Steel and other metals began taking the place of clay vessels"— to end the story with—

"But my dream—now it will never come true." Saying this, he left the room.
is not acceptable to me. Thus a remarkable plot has been reduced to a good but mediocre story.

Analysis

This story needs to be developed further. That might be done by increasing its length, but its subject could equally be expanded within the same word limit. The author has strayed from his objective: he has failed to develop the statement "Steel and other metals began taking the place of clay vessels." I had not expected this from the author of Chonaha. Jagadanand will have to rewrite the story; in that process it may remain a bīhani story, or become a short story, a longer story, or even a novel.

27. Krishna Kumar Kashyap and Shashibala: An Introduction to Their Creative Work

Abstract

Krishna Kumar Kashyap was born on 15 September 1949. His father was the late Indranarayan Lal "Sanwaliya," a poet and novelist. In January 1965 he established a "Night School" for children. In 1981 he introduced an "art-based approach to life and teaching" and, to put it into practice, founded the Bharati Vikas Sanstha with the assistance of Shiva Kashyap and Shashibala.

Keywords: Krishna Kumar Kashyap · Shashibala · creative work · introduction · Mithila

Krishna Kumar Kashyap and Shashibala: An Introduction

Krishna Kumar Kashyap was born on 15 September 1949 and died on 12 August 2020. His father was the late Indranarayan Lal "Sanwaliya," a poet and novelist. In January 1965 he opened a "Night School" for children. In 1981 he introduced an "art-based approach to life and teaching" and, with the support of Shiva Kashyap and Shashibala, established the Bharati Vikas Sanstha to implement it. His works include Maithili translations of Meghadūta and Gīta-Govinda in collaboration with Shashibala; Māchh-Bhāt; Mithila Chitra Praveśikā, Parts I–II; Mithila Chitra-Kor, Part III; Mithila Aripan, Part IV; Godnā Chitra-Śailī, Part V; and Mithila Lokchitra.

Shashibala's father is Shri Ugra Narayan Lal and her husband is Shri Umesh Kumar Kanth of Bisahath. Her works include collaborative Maithili translations of Meghadūta and Gīta-Govinda with Krishna Kumar Kashyap; Māchh-Bhāt; Mithila Chitra Praveśikā, Parts I–II; Mithila Chitra-Kor, Part III; Mithila Aripan, Part IV; Godnā Chitra-Śailī, Part V; and Mithila Lokchitra.

In my second interview with Krishna Kumar Kashyap, he expressed his views on various dimensions of art. He was concerned about the practice of calling Mithila painting "Madhubani painting." The division between the Jitwarpur school and Mithila artists working elsewhere also emerged in the conversation.

"When visitors come from outside, they ask which district our village belongs to. Once they learn that we are from Darbhanga, not Madhubani district, they say, 'YOU ARE NOT FROM THE ORIGINAL PLACE.' In other words, they assume that our painting is not genuine Madhubani painting, and this suits the Jitwarpur school."

Naren Karunakaran writes in his article "Mithila's Women Paint Their Way Out of Poverty": "In Barheta village of Bihar, Bharati Vikas Manch is teaching impoverished women the Mithila method of painting, enabling many of them to find a means of escaping poverty."

Karunakaran also writes that Shashibala, Kashyap's first pupil and now a teacher there, told him that "the elephant-themed paintings produced by the hands of a poor Musahar community are exceptionally beautiful." Shashibala further explained that the hands of the women who worked as labourers tended to be somewhat rough; where some could not learn the delicate handling of the brush, they were assigned other crafts, such as basket-making and tablecloth-making, instead of painting. Many, however, gradually learnt to use the brush.

Alongside the five colours associated with earth, water, fire, sky and air—kṣiti, jala, pāvaka, gagana and samīra—the entry of Dalit and Adivasi themes, lines and incised designs into Mithila painting has brought the godnā, or tattoo-derived, style into the art.

Krishna Kumar Kashyap admitted a girl from the Dom community to his school. The other pupils supported her, but some villagers opposed her admission. There were also Muslim girls at his school, and they never hesitated to paint Hindu themes.

Gajendra Thakur

Shweta Jha Chaudhary: An Introduction

Shweta Jha Chaudhary, of Sarisab-Pahi village, holds a degree in Fine Arts and Home Science and has completed a certificate course in Mithila painting. Her art exhibitions include the cultural programme at XLRI, Jamshedpur; the Gram-Shree Fair, Jamshedpur; and exhibitions and workshops at Kala Mandir, Jamshedpur.

Her art-related activities include serving as a judge at an art competition at NIT Jamshedpur; teaching Mithila painting at Basera, Jamshedpur, from 2002 to 2007; and producing wall paintings for the Women's College library and Hotel Boulevard. Her notable sponsors include Corporate Communications, TISCO; TSRDS, TISCO; AIADA; the State Bank of India, Jamshedpur; and various individuals, hotels, organisations and private art collectors. Her interests include Mithila painting, fine arts, music and cooking.

I

This painting depicts a Mithila village at harvest time. Men bring the crop home from the fields, while the women process it into rice. During this season, women step outside their everyday routines, gather together and exchange conversation and laughter.

2

Whenever love is mentioned, the first image that comes to mind is Radha and Krishna. This painting is an attempt to depict that love.

3

There is no limit to the pleasure of swinging in the month of Sāvan, breathing the fragrance of earth moistened by fine rain.

4

The Palanquin Bearers

The young bride's conflicting feelings on her journey to her husband's home: sorrow at leaving her natal family, and excitement at entering a new life. Unaware of this inner turmoil, the palanquin bearers cheerfully carry her to her in-laws' home.

5

Kariyā-Jhummari

Kariyā-Jhummari is a popular game among the girls of Mithila. Both the young and the older girls enjoy playing it.

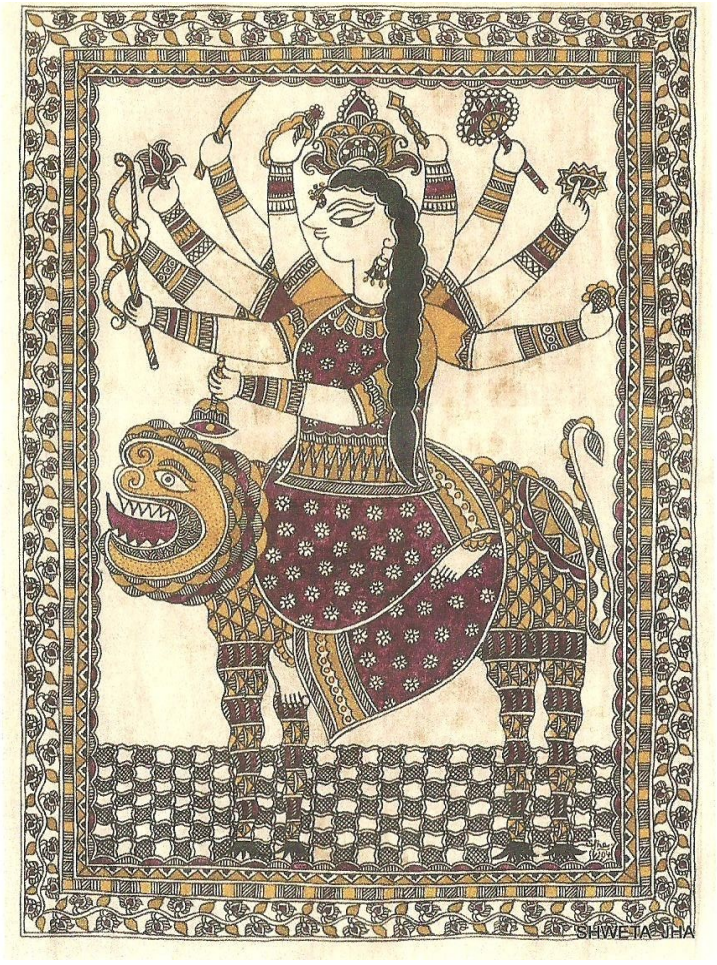
6

The Holy Man

An attempt to portray a sādhu-bābā in a modern manner within Mithila painting.

7

Durgā Pūjā



8

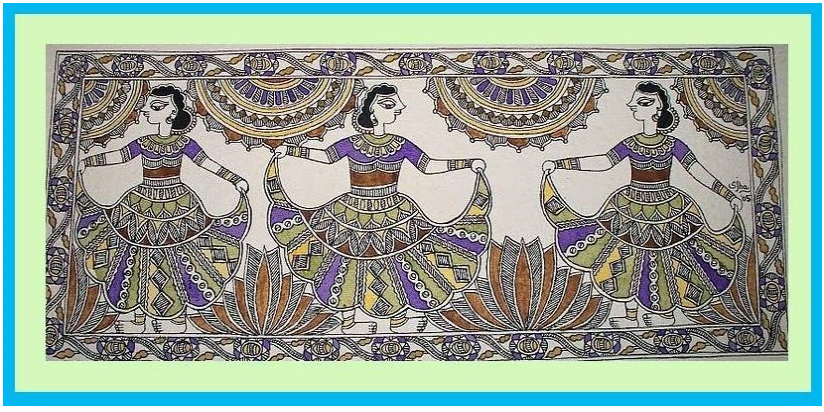
Mother Kālī

9

The Water Carrier

10

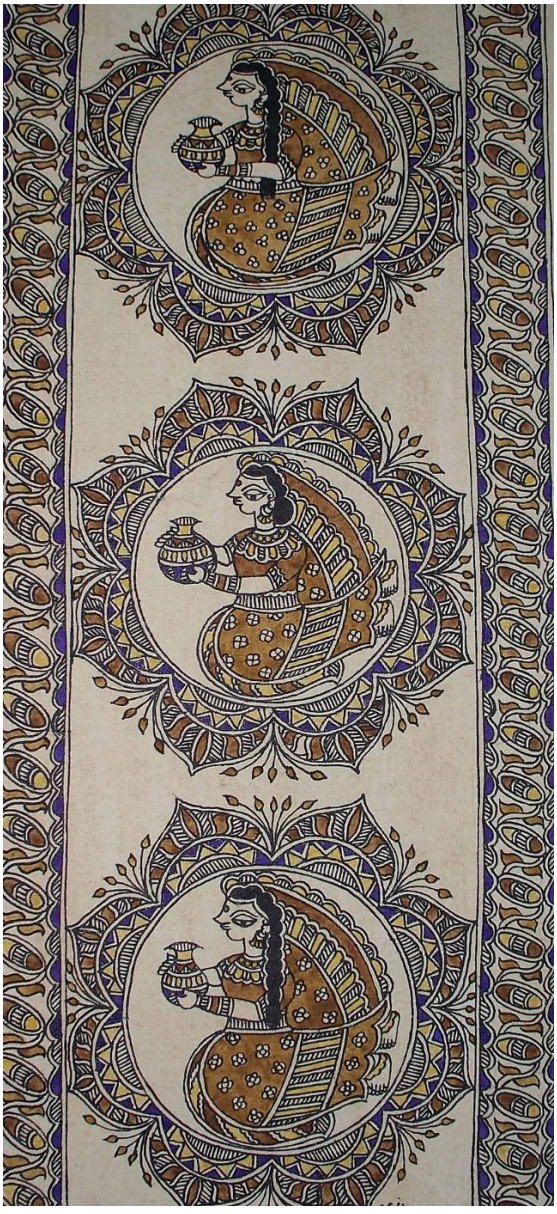
11



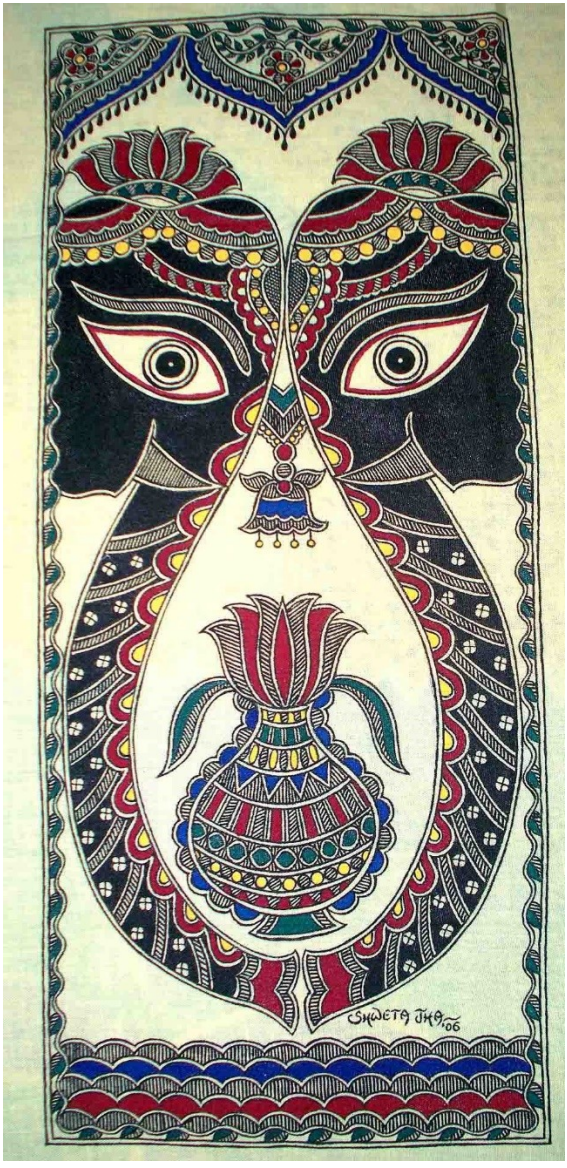
12

On the painting: the sun is a symbol of hope and of the fulfilment of resolve; it represents light after darkness. It is the root of life on earth and the blessing of divinity. It is therefore revered in cultures throughout the world, particularly in Maithil culture during Chhath and Makar Sankranti. This painting seeks to depict these meanings.

13



14



15

16

17

18 19 20 21

(Videha: Sadeha 35)

28. Pandit Bal Govind "Arya"

Abstract

Introduction to Pandit Bal Govind "Arya's" Commentary on the Section on Letters. At a Mailorang seminar in Delhi, the late Mohan Bharadwaj had asked a grammarian of the mainstream: "Why is there no grammar in Maithili? Are we not capable of having a grammar of our own in Maithili?"

Keywords: Bal Govind Arya · Maithili grammar · study of letters · indigenous grammar · linguistics · grammatical tradition

Introduction to Pandit Bal Govind "Arya's" Commentary on the Section on Letters

At a Mailorang seminar in Delhi, the late Mohan Bharadwaj addressed a grammarian of the mainstream: "Why is there no grammar in Maithili? Are we not capable of having a grammar of our own in Maithili?"

Yet the mainstream seems to consider its duty discharged merely by patching together Hindi and Sanskrit grammars and making adjustments of the sort that say: in Hindi, ham ("we") is plural, whereas in Maithili it can be singular. Govindacharya of the parallel tradition, however, constructed a genuine grammar in opposition to such a makeshift, patchwork grammar. This became possible, as in Pāṇini's case, through his habit of extensive travel.

Consider how both nīra, used in southern India, and jala, used in northern India, denote water in Sanskrit. If, when teaching conversational Sanskrit, you taught a southern Indian "ahaṃ nīraṃ pibāmi" and a northern Indian "ahaṃ jalaṃ pibāmi," would you not be regarded as a good teacher?

Govindacharya—Pandit Bal Govind "Arya," the well-known Govind Yadav—has produced the commentary and introduction to the Varṇa-Prakaraṇa (Maithili grammar), which should also prove useful to schoolteachers.

29. Structural Instability and the Play of Meaning: A Critique of Ramesh's Kathā-Samay

Abstract

Structural Instability and the Play of Meaning: A Critique of Ramesh's Maithili Short-Story Collection Kathā-Samay. Critical discussion of Maithili literature has traditionally oscillated between sentimental regionalism and realism. In the contemporary moment, however, the text must also be understood as a field of linguistic and ideological contradictions. Ramesh's Kathā-Samay, bringing together the collections Samānāntar (1997) and Samāṅ (1991), presents a complex linguistic map of a Maithil society fractured between tradition and modernity.

Keywords: structural · instability · play of meaning · Ramesh · criticism · analysis

Abstract

Structural Instability and the Play of Meaning: A Critique of Ramesh's Maithili Short-Story Collection Kathā-Samay. Critical discussion of Maithili literature has traditionally oscillated between sentimental regionalism and realism. In the contemporary moment, however, the text must also be understood as a field of linguistic and ideological contradictions. Ramesh's Kathā-Samay, bringing together the collections Samānāntar (1997) and Samāṅ (1991), presents a complex linguistic map of a Maithil society fractured between tradition and modernity. To deconstruct these stories is not merely to separate the elements of their plots; it is to identify the aporia, or logical impasse, at which a text begins to unsettle its own message.

Structural Instability and the Play of Meaning: A Critique of Ramesh's Maithili Story Collection Kathā-Samay

Critical discussion of Maithili literature has traditionally oscillated between sentimental regionalism and realism. In the contemporary moment, however, the text must also be understood as a field of linguistic and ideological contradictions. Ramesh's Kathā-Samay, which incorporates the collections Samānāntar (1997) and Samāṅ (1991), presents a complex linguistic map of a Maithil society fractured between tradition and modernity. To deconstruct these stories is not merely to separate the elements of their plots; it is to identify the aporia, or logical impasse, at which a text begins to unsettle its own message. A close analysis of the stories in Kathā-Samay shows how they disrupt binary hierarchies and expose a condition of undecidability.

The Theoretical Perspective of Deconstruction and Maithili Prose

Deconstruction treats language as a system of différance. According to Derrida, meaning never remains fixed: it is continually displaced or deferred from one word to another. This is particularly important for Maithili literature because Maithili itself exists in a state of continuing dialogue and tension with Sanskrit, Hindi and English. The critic's aim is to locate the text's logocentrism—the assumption that there is a single ultimate truth—and then to unsettle it.

Ramesh's stories are immersed in the socio-economic realities of northern Bihar and south-eastern Nepal, yet they also play with such oppositions as urban/rural, state/individual and knowledge/taboo. Deconstructive reading reveals that these stories do not merely "reflect" reality. They participate in a play of signifiers in which the supposed "protector"—the state, the parent or the teacher—often turns out to be a "devourer" or a "terrorist."

Deconstructing "Palāṣṭī Ke Khelonā" (Plastic Toys)

"Palāṣṭī Ke Khelonā" is an important story in the collection. It portrays the conflict between a father's idealistic humanism and the consumerist culture disseminated by television and cinema. The father regards a certain high culture as superior: Pandit Ravi Shankar's sitar is placed above Bombay films.

The Breakdown of the Art/Violence Opposition

This hierarchy collapses when the son, Pappu, rejects the "sitar," the symbol of humanism, and chooses a "pistol." The father argues that the sitar, as art, is superior to violence. For the child, however, the pistol signifies not "violence" but "smartness" and "agility," whereas the sitar seems to represent rigidity and inertia. Thus the story also dissolves the opposition between "innocence in childhood" and "uncomprehending aggression."

The State as Protector and Devourer

One of the story's central aporias emerges when the father tells his wife that there is no difference between "government terrorists" (the police) and "private terrorists" (criminals). This statement deconstructs the logocentric claim that the state is a protector. If the police and the criminal perform functionally identical roles, the very foundation of the social order becomes unstable.

Presence and Absence in "Kankhī"

In "Kankhī" (The Side-Glance), Ramesh depicts the failure of the system through Bihar's electricity crisis from 1991 to 2019.

Fleeting Hope and the Trace of Time

Deconstruction: Concepts and Their Application to Maithili Prose

Concept	Deconstructionist definition	Application to Maithili prose
Binary opposition	A pair such as presence/absence	Tension between village tradition and the ruthlessness of the city
Aporia	Logical impasse or internal contradiction	When the ritual of marriage turns into the "sacrifice" of land
Trace	The lingering effect of an earlier meaning within a word	A form such as "pilsim", behind which lies the failure of public administration
Undecidability	The condition of being unable to reach a final meaning	An ending in which neither victory nor defeat is conclusive

The opposition between light (electricity) and darkness (load-shedding) is central to the story. Modern life takes electricity as "presence," yet in Jha Babu's life "absence" is continually present. The same flicker of electricity —bhuk-bhuk—persists in 1991 and in 2019: time has passed, but the trace of failure remains. When Jha Babu receives a bill of seven hundred rupees despite living in darkness, that "bill," as signifier, no longer has a corresponding actual meaning, or signified.

"Naramedha": The Economics of Sacrifice

"Naramedha" exposes the horrifying character of dowry, as ancestral land is sold to pay for Sanju's wedding.

The Land/Capital Opposition

Land is "Annapūrṇā," the giver of food, while capital is a "demon." The opposition between the grandmother's supposed "madness" and the parents' supposed "wisdom" is deconstructed. The grandmother understands that selling the land amounts to suicide; the parents, however, silence her with an injection in order to preserve the "sanctity" of the marriage. When she dies at the time of the sale, the marriage/mourning binary collapses. The "success" of the wedding depends upon the "presence" of death.

"Had Dinkar Babu Been Under a Delusion?": The Fragmentation of the Family

In this story, Ramesh portrays television as a medium that fractures the family instead of bringing it together. Dinkar Babu values news, or truth, while his children are absorbed in "disco music" and "scenes of rape." In the final scene he watches his children imitate the violence shown on television: it is the deconstruction of "innocence."

"The Mirror Trade in Nāgades": Mirrors and Reality

This story is an allegory in which the inhabitants of the village of Nāgadah legitimise their corruption by attaching it to religious belief.

The mirror becomes a deconstructive site where the "self" is transformed into an "other." The trader's mirror deconstructs the village myth: when people look into it, they see not a goddess but a snake. This is presented as confirming Derrida's proposition that there is no "ultimate truth" outside language: everything is only a reflection.

The Female Body and "Dudhuā"

"Dudhuā" views the female body through the opposition between motherhood and beauty. Kamini's husband treats her body solely as an object of sexual desire and arranges for injections to dry up her breast milk. From a deconstructive perspective, this is an attempt to erase the "sign" of motherhood. When Kamini develops breast cancer, however, that "absence" turns into "presence" in the form of illness.

"Octopus": An Ecological Aporia

In "Octopus," Neha sees urban pollution as a monster. Her education in botany enables her to name the devastation but not to stop it. This is an aporia of knowledge: the more she knows about nature, the more acutely she recognises its destruction. Industry, supposedly a symbol of progress, is killing the very city it has developed. The development/destruction hierarchy is thus deconstructed.

"Praveś-Niṣedh" (Entry Prohibited): Silence and Taboo

"Praveś-Niṣedh" deconstructs society's tendency to maintain "silence" about sex education. Kishore wants to read the chapter on the reproductive system in his science textbook, but his teachers and guardians dismiss it as "dirty." The story shows that silence does not protect; it can kill. Kishore's sister-in-law dies in childbirth because of ignorance. His declaration, "Your M.A. degree is worthless," reverses the conventional opposition between education and ignorance.

"Dhrupad-Dhamār": Music and Deprivation

This story uses the vocabulary of classical music to expose inflation and the failure of the state. Pandit Tuntun Misar is a retired teacher dependent upon his "pilsim" (pension). The governor's "promise" printed on the currency note has become a hollow signifier, for inflation has emptied that promise of value. When the minister speaks of "computerisation" and Tuntun Misar of "kerosene," the modern/primitive binary collapses.

Deconstructing Other Stories in Samāṅ

"Ek Ser Chāur" (A Seer of Rice): The opposition between dignity and survival. A mother sells her "flower-patterned plate," a token of dignity, in exchange for rice. The story thus deconstructs human values.

"Sahānubhūti" (Sympathy): The opposition between protector and devourer. The village headman takes a woman to his orchard under the appearance of sympathy, but his compassion is in fact a signifier masking exploitation.

"Luṭṭīs-Kes": Building an embankment along the Kamala River breaks down the opposition between safety and danger. The embankment is built not to provide safety but to facilitate plunder.

Binary Oppositions and Their Deconstructive Reversal

Binary pair	Privileged term	Subordinate term	Deconstructive reversal
Beauty / biology	A body like that of a "heroine"	Milk / maternity	Suppression contributes to an illness such as cancer
Husband / child	Husband's desire	Mother's duty	Both roles consume the woman's body
Health / image	External appearance	Biological function	In the pursuit of an "image", health is destroyed

"Akṣa Ā Vṛttacakra" (Axis and Circle): The conflict between love and economics. On a wedding anniversary, the centre—the axis—is not love but the accounting of debts and bills.

Linguistic Instability

The Hindi and English words in Ramesh's Maithili prose are not merely signs of modernity. They are traces of a culture that is displacing Maithili itself.

"Pilsim" (Pension): This distortion of the word becomes a symbol of institutional corruption.

"Mummy/Papa" as against "Mā/Bābūjī": The change in forms of address deconstructs traditional patriarchal authority.

"Bhuā" (Caterpillar): This is not merely an insect; it becomes a trace of the male erotic gaze.

Conclusion: Mithila's Undecided Future

The collection Kathā-Samay ends not with resolution but with a deep sense of undecidability. Ramesh does not offer a "moral of the story" in the traditional sense. Instead, he leaves his characters at an intersection of aporias. Neha is still in the haze; Dinkar Babu is still watching the children wrestle; Sanju is still wearing her golden insect-shaped fetters.

From a deconstructive perspective, this absence of resolution is the text's greatest strength. It refuses to offer a "transcendental signified," any final and easy answer to Mithila's problems. Instead, it invites readers to enter into the play of meaning, to perceive the trace of the village within the town and the trace of the serpent within the official.

Ramesh's writing demonstrates that the "Maithili path" is a complex, unstable and profoundly reflective language. By deconstructing the binaries of state, family and body, Kathā-Samay exposes the fissures in modern Maithil identity. For the literary critic the collection is not merely a book of stories, but a "watch-platform" that makes visible the "holes" in society's construction—those places where truth and falsehood, protector and predator, life and death remain inextricably intertwined. Kathā-Samay thus stands as decisive evidence that Maithili literature has moved beyond the "metaphysics of presence" and entered the demanding, multidimensional world of poststructuralist reality.

References

1.Deconstruction - Literary Theory and Criticism, accessed on March 11, 2026, https://literariness.org/2016/03/22/deconstruction/

2.Deconstruction: A Cornucopia of Esoteric Meanings - International Journal of English Literature and Social Sciences (IJELS), accessed on March 11, 2026, https://ijels.com/upload_document/issue_files/46-IJELS-APR-2019-14-Deconstruction.pdf

3.Deconstructionism in Literature | Definition & Examples - Lesson - Study.com, accessed on March 11, 2026, https://study.com/academy/lesson/deconstructionism-in-literature-definition-examples-quiz.html

4. Deconstruction — Contemporary Literary Thought, accessed on March 11, 2026, https://ebooks.inflibnet.ac.in/hinp16/chapter/%E0%A4%B5%E0%A4%BF%E0%A4%96%E0%A4%A3%E0%A5%8D%E0%A4%A1%E0%A4%A8%E0%A4%B5%E0%A4%BE%E0%A4%A6/

5.Deconstruction Theory of Darida: A Comprehensive Guide, Jacques Derrida's deconstruction, accessed on March 11, 2026, https://www.youtube.com/watch? v=UyyrgxYXNQc

6.A Survey of Maithili Literature, accessed on March 11, 2026, https://archive.org/download/a-survey-of-maithili-literature/A%20Survey%20of%20Maithili%20Literature.pdf

7.A Critical Analysis of Maithili Novel: Twenty First Century - IJIRT, accessed on March 11, 2026, https://ijirt.org/publishedpaper/IJIRT189645_PAPER.pdf

8.Dancing Soul of Mount Everst English | PDF | Poetry - Scribd, accessed on March 11, 2026, https://www.scribd.com/document/383738676/dancing-soul-of-mount-everst-english

9.Deconstructionism in Literature | Definition & Examples - Lesson - Study.com, accessed on March 11, 2026, https://study.com/academy/lesson/deconstructionism-in-literature-definition-examples-quiz.html

10.Deconstruction - Literary Theory and Criticism, accessed on March 11, 2026, https://literariness.org/2016/03/22/deconstruction/

11.Deconstructionism and literature (practice) | Khan Academy, accessed on March 11, 2026, https://www.khanacademy.org/test-prep/mcat/critical-analysis-and-reasoning-skills-practice-questions/critical-analysis-and-reasoning-skills-tutorial/e/deconstructionism-and-literature

12.Deconstruction: A Cornucopia of Esoteric Meanings - International Journal of English Literature and Social Sciences (IJELS), accessed on March 11, 2026, https://ijels.com/upload_document/issue_files/46-IJELS-APR-2019-14-Deconstruction.pdf

13.Deconstruction — Contemporary Literary Thought, accessed on March 11, 2026, https://ebooks.inflibnet.ac.in/hinp16/chapter/%E0%A4%B5%E0%A4%BF%E0%A4%96%E0%A4%A3%E0%A5%8D%E0%A4%A1%E0%A4%A8%E0%A4%B5%E0%A4%BE%E0%A4%A6/

14.Deconstruction Theory of Darida: A Comprehensive Guide, Jacques Derrida's deconstruction, accessed on March 11, 2026, https://www.youtube.com/watch? v=UyyrgxYXNQc

15.A Survey of Maithili Literature, accessed on March 11, 2026, https://archive.org/download/a-survey-of-maithili-literature/A%20Survey%20of%20Maithili%20Literature.pdf

16."M' - Kannur University, accessed on March 11, 2026, https://www.kannuruniversity.ac.in/media/documents/MA_Hindi.pdf

17.A Critical Analysis of Maithili Novel: Twenty First Century - IJIRT, accessed on March 11, 2026, https://ijirt.org/publishedpaper/IJIRT189645_PAPER.pdf

18.Inside the text.... - Book-Publishing Training Programme in Gangtok, Sikkim, accessed on March 11, 2026, https://www.nbtindia.gov.in/writereaddata/attachment/friday-july-17-20153-12-53-pmhindi-samwad-may-2015-compressed.pdf

19.Hindi Criticism: Development, Major Genres and Modern Literary Perspectives - Testbook, accessed on March 11, 2026, https://testbook.com/ugc-net-hindi/alochana

30. Umesh Paswan's Mujrim: A Critical Reading of the Short-Story Collection

Abstract

Through the educated young woman Sunanda and her father, Raman Master, the story "Sunanda" exposes society's narrow-mindedness. Out of compassion, Sunanda brings home a newborn infant abandoned beside the road, but the village brands her a woman of loose character. It is later revealed that the baby was born to the unmarried daughter of a prominent family in the village.

Keywords: Umesh Paswan · Mujrim · story collection · critical reading

Abstract

Through the educated young woman Sunanda and her father, Raman Master, the story "Sunanda" exposes society's narrow-mindedness. Out of compassion, Sunanda brings home a newborn infant abandoned beside the road, but the village brands her a woman of loose character. Her father, too, succumbs to public pressure.

Umesh Paswan's Mujrim

Umesh Paswan's Mujrim contains a collection of sixteen stories.

I

"Sunanda" exposes the narrowness of social attitudes through an educated young woman, Sunanda, and her father, Raman Master. Moved by compassion, Sunanda brings home a newborn baby abandoned beside the road. The villagers, however, accuse her of immorality; even her father yields to social pressure. Eventually it is disclosed that the child was born to the unmarried daughter of one of the village's prominent families. Once the truth emerges, every allegation is shown to be false. The story effectively brings out the readiness with which women are blamed, the pressures of caste prestige, malicious gossip and the real meaning of humanity. Finally, moral courage and a willingness to forgive point society towards a better path.

"Solakanmā Pokhair" (The Pond of the Solakanma Hamlet) reveals the bitter irony of a severe water crisis compounded by caste discrimination. Although the pond in the Solakanma settlement contains water, members of the upper castes avoid using it; anyone who does so faces social ostracism. Untouchability and ideas of high and low status outweigh the basic human need for water. Then a fire breaks out and the entire village is saved by water drawn from that very pond. What was denounced as impure becomes life-giving in a crisis. The story makes clear that natural resources belong equally to everyone and that emergencies expose the artificial nature of social divisions.

"Karmak Phal" (The Fruits of One's Deeds) recounts Ranjit's downfall. The educated son of a respectable household falls under the influence of bad companions and becomes addicted to alcohol. The first time he drinks, supposedly as a joke, the police catch him and he is sent to prison, where association with criminals redirects his life. He later enters the liquor trade, is arrested, becomes a fugitive and, disguised as a holy man, attempts to cheat people. When his identity is revealed, the public hands him over to the police. Ultimately the seizure and attachment of his family's property leave the household ruined. The story insists that bad company and immoral acts inevitably have destructive consequences.

"Girahat Ghar Par Giddh" (Vultures over the Landlord's House) is set against caste discrimination and social confrontation in Daulatpur village. Dalit youths are made to rise from a row of diners at a śrāddha feast. Subsequently a young man is beaten and punished for entering a temple. The humiliated Dalit community resolves to stop removing dead livestock from upper-caste households and to suspend its traditional services. Soon animals begin dying of disease, and vultures circle the village, leaving the landlords themselves in difficulty. Eventually the village council intervenes and the issue of equal rights is raised. The story foregrounds dignity, labour and equality.

"Tetar Das" follows the life of a boy named Tetra. His mother dies giving birth to him, so villagers regard him as an ill omen and call him "Lūṭnā." His father brings him up lovingly, and he proves exceptionally able at school. Through the study of Sanskrit he becomes a scholar, acquires renown as a saint and is known as Tetar Das. Thousands are influenced by his discourses. But when his name is proposed for the position of mahant at the Govindpur monastery, caste-based objections arise. Deeply wounded, he abandons everything and returns to his village. The story poignantly exposes caste prejudice and society's disregard for talent.

"Kodāri Chhāp" (The Spade Symbol) exposes the interplay of power and greed in a village-council election. To take advantage of a reserved seat, the unscrupulous Folter makes Fekni—the illiterate wife of a Dalit labourer, Musba—a candidate for village head. Liquor, money and threats secure her victory. Thereafter Fekni remains a figurehead while Folter makes every financial decision. Government projects and MGNREGA funds are extensively misappropriated. When an inquiry takes place, Fekni reveals that she did nothing but affix her thumbprint to documents. Both Folter and Fekni are eventually arrested.

"Sahodarā" concerns the love between two brothers. After their parents die, Janak raises and educates his younger brother Prem. Quarrels begin after marriage and the household is divided. With time, Prem prospers, while Janak falls into financial difficulty and becomes burdened by debt. One day Prem sees his brother working as a labourer and feels profound pain. In the end, he hands over his shop to Janak and resolves to reunite the family. The story emphasises sacrifice, fraternity and family bonds.

"Garībak Jingī" (A Poor Person's Life) portrays the exploitation and struggle of poor labourers through Bholta and his son Bantha. A landlord, Nunubabu, schemes to take Bantha out of school and employ him in his house; he refuses to raise wages even when prices rise. When Bantha protests, he is threatened. The poor organise and begin working in other villages, bringing the landlord's cultivation to a halt. In revenge, the landlord blocks a road and obstructs medical treatment for a patient, with the result that Bantha's younger brother dies. Later a false allegation of theft becomes the pretext for an attack on Bantha and Bholta; Bholta is killed. Bantha chooses not to resort to violence. He seeks legal redress and obtains justice.

"Śramdānī Bāndh" (The Voluntary-Labour Embankment) concerns a village's protective embankment during the rainy season. Heavy rainfall weakens it and the villagers seek help from the mukhiya, or elected village head. He publicly assures them that the administration will deal with the danger, but secretly hopes the embankment will collapse so that he can collect commissions and bribes from crop-loss compensation, relief payments and housing schemes. At night he has his henchmen cut through it. Floodwaters spread through the village, destroying homes, grain and livestock. Later the body of a young man is found in the water: he is the mukhiya's own son. Greed thus returns to him as personal bereavement.

"Dachhinwāri Ṭol" (The Southern Hamlet) describes a proposed national-highway development in Manikpur village. The road is diverted southwards to save the main village, but the house of Budhna Mallik in the southern hamlet is demolished. He receives no land compensation and rebuilds elsewhere. Upper-caste neighbours resent him because of his caste and accuse his wife of witchcraft. One night his house is set alight. The family escape, but, left without shelter, all four are crushed to death by a truck while sleeping beside the road. The story reveals the cruelty of caste hatred and inhumanity.

"Paglā Pul" (The Madman's Bridge) traces the fluctuations in the life of Vineet Das. Once a gifted student, he falls into bad company and addiction, loses all his land and becomes mentally disturbed. Ostracised by his village, he lives by the river, earning what he can. One day a minister and some officials are imperilled when their boat sinks. The spectators merely watch, but Vineet—the supposedly "mad" man—dives into the river and saves all four lives. His courage becomes widely known, and treatment gradually restores his health. Offered a reward, he asks not for money but for a bridge across the river. In the end a bridge is built, and society comes to respect him anew.

"Vidhvā Vivāh" (Widow Remarriage) poignantly depicts Sushila's struggle. On the first night of her marriage her husband Rajiv dies from a snakebite, leaving her widowed at a young age. Humiliation in her marital home and social contempt break her spirit. Her father brings her back to her natal home, but the community refuses to countenance a widow's remarriage. In acute distress Sushila attempts suicide. A young engineer arrives in time to save her and offers to marry her. The story argues strongly for widow remarriage and human sympathy.

"Vṛddhāśram" (Old-Age Home) offers a sensitive portrayal of duty and ingratitude through Gopal Ji and his son Raman. Gopal Ji sells his land and works as a labourer to educate his son, who becomes a bank officer. After marriage Raman and Sulochana settle in the city for work. They regard the elderly parents as an inconvenience and send them to an old-age home rather than caring for them. Gopal Ji and his wife both die there. In time Raman and Sulochana are themselves sent to the same institution by their son. The story makes parental neglect return upon the next generation.

"Dostak Biāh" (A Friend's Wedding) vividly recounts friendship and an encounter with caste prejudice. The narrator and Mahesh have been close friends since childhood, studying and eating together. Years later Mahesh marries, and the narrator accompanies him as his close wedding companion, a lokaniyā. At the wedding procession, once his caste becomes known, the bride's family refuses to accept him in that ceremonial role. Humiliated, he returns home that very night. Mahesh and his family later apologise. The narrator eventually obtains a successful job and comes to feel that economic standing, more than caste, has become the determinant of respect in society.

"Mānavatāk Pūjārī" (A Worshipper of Humanity) powerfully presents greed, exploitation and moral transformation. Chunnilal Seth exploits the poor through usurious lending, while his son, Dr Shyam, earns money by ordering needless medical tests. Dr Vivek deliberately gives Shyam a false diagnosis of blood cancer to awaken his conscience. Afraid of death, father and son change their conduct: they forgive debts, assist the poor and begin treating patients selflessly. Eventually they discover that the diagnosis was false; nevertheless the shock has led them to serve humanity. The story insists that true prestige lies not in wealth but in compassion and humanity.

"Bhagwanpur" offers an inspiring portrait of Bhagwan Lal Das's extraordinary public service and self-sacrificing life. Remaining unmarried, he devotes himself wholly to helping the poor with daughters' marriages, schooling, medical care and shelter. Even after becoming a Block Development Officer, he serves honestly and puts his income to public use. Eventually he establishes a school and devotes himself to expanding education. After his death, society's caste narrowness emerges once more when his cremation at the cremation ground is obstructed. Yet his service and sacrifice shake the community's conscience, and the village finally renames itself "Bhagwanpur" in his honour.

2

The very title Mujrim ("Culprit" or "Accused") deconstructs its established meaning. Ordinarily a mujrim is a person who commits a crime. In this collection, however, the word moves away from its conventional meaning to become a symbol of the cruelty of power and privilege. Those pushed to the social margins and subjected to exploitation are declared "criminals" by the system. Who, then, is the real culprit—the oppressed person upon whom the label is imposed, or the dominant order that determines who will bear it?

3

Those whom society regards as "inferior" or "impure" ultimately become indispensable to the supposedly "pure" centre. In "Solakanmā Pokhair," upper-caste people regard the pond of the Solakanma hamlet as untouchable and polluted. Yet when fire breaks out, water from this very "impure" pond saves the whole village, becoming life-giving and therefore "pure." The tale reverses the myths of untouchability and ritual purity, demonstrating how man-made social boundaries collapse in a crisis.

4

In "Girahat Ghar Par Giddh," upper-caste landlords imagine themselves the centre of authority and power. But when humiliated Dalits refuse to remove their dead livestock, vultures begin circling those "powerful" households and the landlords become helpless. The refusal to act by those kept on the margins paralyses the centre. In this way, the story deconstructs the hollowness of feudal authority and domination.

5

In "Paglā Pul," society regards Vineet Das, who survives beside the river, as mad and contemptible. On the other side stand ministers and officials, whom society considers "intellectual" and "civilised." But when their boat sinks, these supposedly capable people are helpless and it is Vineet, the "madman," who jumps into the river and saves them. The wall separating sanity and madness crumbles, and the man called mad teaches society a lesson in humanity.

6

In "Tetar Das," a boy denounced as "Lūṭnā," an ill omen, becomes a formidable Sanskrit scholar and saint. Thousands are moved by his discourses. Yet when the time comes for him to become a mahant, caste outweighs learning. The story deconstructs institutional religion's claim to spiritual equality, showing how birth is given greater authority than merit.

7

Umesh Paswan's Mujrim is not merely a lament over Dalit oppression. It breaks apart from within the linguistic and ideological structures that produce marginalisation and exclusion. The text reveals that the social centre depends for its existence upon the very periphery it despises.

8

"Kodāri Chhāp" (The Spade Symbol) is extraordinarily moving and politically important. Reserving a seat in a panchayat election for a Dalit woman ought to mark a democratic victory and the empowerment of an oppressed group. Yet the story unsettles that promise. The reserved seat does not give the Dalit woman Fekni power; instead, she becomes a puppet in the hands of the dominant and intimidating Folter. Behind the appearance of democracy is a new feudalism: rather than rule openly, the exploitative class rules through a Dalit figurehead. Supposed "empowerment" generates a new form of exploitation.

The election symbol, the spade, signifies the working class, labour, sweat and soil. It is the true emblem of Musba and his wife Fekni, the exploited labourers. In order to win the election, however, the spade symbol becomes detached from its original meaning. A tool once used to dig the soil becomes the emblem of fraud and the diversion of lakhs of rupees from MGNREGA schemes. Folter, the exploiter, hijacks the sign of the exploited for his own benefit.

At the end, a corruption inquiry leads to the arrest of Folter and Fekni alike. This is presented as proof that "the law is equal for everyone." But is Fekni truly a criminal? She cannot read or write; her husband Musba, caught in a web of liquor and inducements, puts her forward as the candidate; she has merely placed her thumbprint upon papers. The justice system weighs Folter, the mastermind, and Fekni, the victim, on the same scale. Deconstruction reveals that such "justice" may be profoundly unjust, because it treats ignorance and structural helplessness themselves as "crimes."

Folter's feudal mentality makes him look down upon a poor labourer such as Musba. Yet to gain power and occupy the position of village head, Folter must depend entirely upon that Dalit labourer and his wife, on those he relegates to the periphery. The key to the powerful Folter's authority is in the hands of a poor, uneducated Dalit woman. The presumed balance between exploiter and exploited is thus destabilised.

"Kodāri Chhāp" demonstrates that so long as economic and educational inequality persist—as in Musba's poverty and Fekni's illiteracy—political reservation by itself cannot achieve genuine change. The story depicts both the cunning of the exploitative class and the hollowness of the legal order.

9

"Sahodarā" narrates the division and eventual reunion of two brothers amid blood ties and economic insecurity. It affirms the proposition that "brothers of the same blood remain brothers." Janak raises his younger brother Prem almost as a father would. When Janak falls into poverty and labours for a living, the now prosperous Prem gives him his shop. This is an idealised and sentimental victory of fraternal love. But a major patriarchal contradiction lies hidden in the tale. The entire blame for the household's division is placed upon Janak's wife. Society often overlooks the economic causes of family breakdown and calls the woman a "home-breaker" or a source of discord. Prem's apparent greatness, moreover, depends on his prosperity. Had his land not fallen within the route of the national highway and had he not been able to open a shop with the compensation, could he have rescued his brother so readily? Unwittingly, the story shows that even greatness and sacrifice require "capital."

10

"Vidhvā Vivāh" (Widow Remarriage) is a tale of women's struggle and the myth of the "male saviour." It recounts the hardships and eventual remarriage of Sushila, widowed at a young age. Society is exceedingly cruel to widows: her mother-in-law calls her a witch and an ill omen, while others cast predatory glances at her yet refuse to accept her. The story challenges this injustice by portraying a progressive young engineer who accepts Sushila as an ideal. Yet at the beginning Sushila's physical beauty—fair skin, large eyes and long hair—is described at length and she is called a "dream girl." Had she been unattractive or ordinary-looking, would the engineer have saved her and proposed marriage? Her "value" is still determined by her body and appearance. Driven to attempt suicide, she must be rescued by a "capable man." She does not become self-reliant and confront society on her own; her deliverance consists in passing from one man's protection to another's. Thus, despite its progressivism, the story fails to overcome the patriarchal opposition between the "helpless woman" and the "protective man."

II

"Śramdānī Bāndh" offers an exceptionally sharp criticism of contemporary politics, institutional corruption and "disaster capitalism." Villagers bring their fear of an embankment collapse to the mukhiya because he is their elected representative and protector. He assures them that he will summon the Block Development Officer and Circle Officer and get the embankment repaired. The story, however, shows state power, represented by the village head, acting not to protect citizens but to exploit them. He prevents the villagers from reinforcing the embankment with earth. The "protector" proves to be a "devourer": under cover of darkness he orders his henchmen to cut through the embankment. This thoroughly deconstructs the promise of political representation in democracy.

Politically, the tale exposes the cruellest form of turning "disaster" into "opportunity" within a neoliberal economy. For the mukhiya, the destruction of the village is not a tragedy but a "project." He openly reasons that unless the embankment breaks, houses will not fall; and unless houses fall, there will be no scope for him to earn commissions from housing assistance, crop-loss payments and relief. Human pain and devastation are being converted directly into financial profit. The story shows how in a corrupt system "destruction" becomes the prerequisite for "development."

The name "Śramdānī Bāndh" (Voluntary-Labour Embankment) is deeply symbolic. Śramdān signifies the collective strength, self-reliance and solidarity of ordinary people. When the ruler orders the embankment cut, he destroys not simply an earthen wall but the people's collective labour and independence. Power does not want people to be self-sufficient; it wants them homeless and dependent upon the authorities for relief and housing grants.

The mukhiya's greed brings him to have the embankment cut, and eventually his own son Amit drowns in the floodwaters. This is the story's message of karmaphala, the fruit of action. Intoxicated by power and privilege, the mukhiya believes himself immune from the destructive system he has engineered. He imagines that floodwaters will drown only "the poor." But the alliance of a natural disaster and a corrupt administration is blind; the exploiter who digs a pit for others must eventually discover the limits of his imagined safety. The mukhiya's authority proves helpless before nature and the consequences of his actions.

"Śramdānī Bāndh" is therefore not merely the story of an individual corrupt village head's downfall. It calls the whole "system" to account. It reveals how institutional greed puts ordinary lives at risk, and how the centre of power finally becomes entangled in the trap of its own making.

12

Umesh Paswan's stories paint a realistic and moving picture of society. Their analysis also reveals, however, that traditional prejudices and economic realities may remain concealed even within apparently reformist visions of social progress.

31. “Diyari”: A Comprehensive Literary Evaluation of R. N. Sudhakar’s Short-Story Collection

Abstract

A Multidimensional Review of R. N. Sudhakar’s Maithili Short-Story Collection. Diyari (a Maithili short-story collection), written by Ramnarayan Sudhakar (R. N. Sudhakar), is an important document of Maithili literature centred on Biratnagar, Nepal. The publisher’s note records that the author has been writing for nearly sixty years but remained largely invisible to the literary world for want of publication, publicity and circulation. The collection received the Nepal Vidyapith Maithili Manuscript Award, 2065.

Keywords: Diyari · Sudhakar · Collection · Comprehensive · Literary · Evaluation · Stories

Diyari: A Comprehensive Literary Evaluation

A Multidimensional Review of R. N. Sudhakar’s Maithili Short-Story Collection

Preliminary Observations: The Book’s Character and Importance

Diyari (a Maithili short-story collection), written by Ramnarayan Sudhakar (R. N. Sudhakar), is an important document of Maithili literature centred on Biratnagar, Nepal. The publisher’s note records that the author has been writing for nearly sixty years but remained largely invisible to the literary world because his work lacked publication, publicity and circulation. The collection received the Nepal Vidyapith Maithili Manuscript Award, 2065. The volume brings together twenty-two stories.

Part One: Structural Analysis of the Collection

1.1 Geographical and Cultural Setting

Sudhakar’s fictional world is centred principally on three geographical regions:

(a) The border area (the Jogbani–Biratnagar frontier): Stories such as “Sandhi,” “Khutti Par Tangal Bra” and “Chan Asothakit Achhi” present this frontier’s complex socioeconomic environment. The author himself pursued his literary vocation while living in this border area, a fact reflected in the authenticity of the stories.

(b) Rural Mithila: “Pradakshina,” “Jhakharal Phulak Gachh,” “Sunagait Karej,” “Thakuchal Masuk Butti” and other stories offer detailed pictures of rural Maithil life—ponds, wells, the sacred basil courtyard, the scent of earth and mustard flowers. These images of remembrance express the nostalgia of a displaced soul.

(c) The urban environment (Biratnagar): "Diyari," "Gharmunha," "Chilhori Uri Rahal Achhi," "Nukka Chori" and "Karjakhor" focus on the struggles of industrial urban life, economic pressure and the fragmentation of families.

1.2 Chronology and Period of Composition

The stories in the collection were composed across a wide span of time: 1976–77 CE.

This span (1976–2020, or forty-four years) reveals the length and continuity of Sudhakar's literary journey. The development of a storyteller can be observed within the collection itself.

Part Two: Detailed Reviews of the Stories

2.1 "Pradakshina" (Circumambulation): Memory, Displacement and the Death of the Village

Plot: After living away for twelve years, a man named Bachanu returns to his village and is shocked to discover how completely it has changed. The villagers have become strangers, friends have forgotten him, the pond has dried up and the bhalsari tree has been uprooted.

Detailed Analysis:

The story inhabits a world of feeling reminiscent of Thomas Hardy's The Return of the Native: a confrontation between the person who returns and the landscape transformed in his absence. Yet Sudhakar's vision is more poignant. Bachanu left his village out of economic necessity; when he returned, the village's soul had died.

The story's most moving passage describes Bachanu feeling as though his village had been left behind somewhere, his friends had become ghostlike somewhere, the bhalsari blossoms had been scattered somewhere; he himself stood stock-still, like the long, sharp thorn of a shani tree in a desolate wilderness.

The mythic dimension: Circumambulation is a significant symbol in the story. In Hindu tradition, walking around a village or temple is an auspicious act. Here, however, Bachanu's circumambulation of his village becomes a funeral procession: he circles a past that no longer exists.

From the perspective of Indian poetics: Karuṇa rasa, the aesthetic sentiment of pathos, predominates; yet vipralambha śṛṅgāra, the pain of separation, also flows beneath it—in Bachanu's estrangement from the friends of his childhood.

2.2 "Diyari": Women's Identity amid Family Pressures

Plot: A middle-class family is bound by complicated relationships among an elderly father-in-law, the ailing wife Sushila and her husband, the story's first-person narrator. The elderly father-in-law seeks financial freedom, Sushila lives in pain, and the husband is crushed by pressure from both sides.

Detailed Analysis:

The title "Diyari"—a tract of land surrounded by currents of water from both sides—is a precise metaphor. The husband resembles such an island, caught between pressures advancing from opposite directions.

The story's most moving passage:

The lantern flares brightly. On one side stands the palace of Sushila's aspirations; on the other, the flickering lamp of an old man's paternal affection. Can that lamp burn inside the palace? Neither does the palace appeal to the old man, nor does Sushila wish to shelter the lamp within it.

A psychoanalytic perspective: Viewed through Sigmund Freud's Oedipus complex, Sushila's psychological conflict with her father-in-law introduces a subtle psychic layer. Sudhakar, however, does not portray the situation as mysterious or sensational; he presents it as an ordinary complexity of family life.

Women's discourse: Sushila is the story's central force, but hers is a silent force. Her illness, her helpless position and her husband's powerlessness form a triangle that makes the narrative an authentic document of women's suffering.

2.3 "Choliya Me Chor Base Gori": Rural Youth and the Language of the Body

Plot: Two young women, Samtoliya and Vilta, become immersed in love, jealousy, attraction and the energy of youth while cutting grass.

Detailed Analysis:

Published in the magazine Mati-Pani in March 1984, this story has an open narrative structure that does not feel stale. Like D. H. Lawrence's depictions of rural youth, it is uninhibited and closely connected to nature.

The story's beauty is captured in these lines: on one side, the embankment was fragrant as far as the eye could see with the yellow blossoms of mustard; on the other, towering, jointed sugarcane stalks, intoxicated by their own sweetness, bent and swayed in wild luxuriance.

Nature is not merely a background but a force that affects the characters: the fertility of nature and the fertility of youth become one.

The folkloric context: The story's title is itself a line from a folk song. Sudhakar weaves the folk tradition naturally into a modern narrative.

A feminist perspective: The relationship between Vilta and Samtoliya displays a strong female bond, one often overlooked in male-centred literature.

2.4 "Khutti Par Tangal Bra" (A Bra Hanging on a Peg): Consumerism and the Female Body

Plot: Buchiya goes into a shop. Gangba, the shopkeeper, shows her various articles and finally gives her a bra (brassiere). Buchiya's inner conflict—between economic constraint and bodily need—lies at the centre of the story.

Detailed Analysis:

Written in October 1984, this story was extraordinarily bold for its time. No other Maithili writer of that period addressed this particular subject.

A critique of market culture: The story presents a criticism of the marketplace.

Gangba embodies market culture: he views the female body through a commercial lens.

A Marxist perspective: The commodification of the female body is the story's central theme. Buchiya's economic vulnerability traps her in Gangba's net. Class exploitation and gender exploitation operate together.

Foucault: Michel Foucault observed that "power operates on the body." In this story, Gangba's gaze, his "commercial smile," and finally the bra hanging on the peg are all visible expressions of relations of power.

In the final line, her gaze comes to rest on the hanging brassiere. She feels as if she herself has filled its two cups with what is compressed inside her and hung them there with her own hands. The line gives expression to a woman's helpless condition and the merciless nature of the market.

2.5 "Chan Asothakit Achhi" (The Moon Is Restless/Weary): Old Age, Desire and Social Hypocrisy

Plot: Sushil Babu is elderly and suffers from breathlessness, yet Maya, who cares for him, continues to arouse him. Maya herself suffers sexual frustration: her husband Mantunma is almost impotent. Eventually Sushil Babu appoints Mantunma as a new sutanahar (watchman).

Detailed Analysis:

The story occupies an exceptionally complex psychological terrain. "Chan Asothakit Achhi"—the moon is unsettled or exhausted—is itself a title charged with erotic suggestion.

Simone de Beauvoir: In one sense Maya represents de Beauvoir's "second sex." Her bodily needs are dependent on a male-centred arrangement. Her eagerness and agitation are human expressions suppressed by society.

Old age and sexual desire: Literature frequently portrays the desires of older people as laughable or reprehensible. Sudhakar approaches the subject with compassion and sympathy. Sushil Babu's breathlessness is not merely a physical symptom; it is also a tragic experience of old age.

Moral complexity: The moral framework is not simple. Sudhakar views Maya's self-sacrifice and the other elements of the situation with sympathy rather than condemnation.

2.6 "Jhakharal Phulak Gachh" (The Uprooted Flowering Tree): Polygamy and Women's Suffering

Plot: Jivachha, Khanjaniya and Phuliya are the principal figures. Jivachha maintains an illicit relationship with his stepmother Khanjaniya. The conflict between the two women and Jivachha's moral decline are exposed.

Detailed Analysis:

The story was written on 14 November 1976. Chronologically it is one of Sudhakar's earliest pieces, yet the boldness of its subject is unparalleled.

Khanjaniya's character: Khanjaniya gives the story its power. She says, "Do not separate me from Jivachha ... I shall lie in some corner." This line exposes a woman's helplessness: economic, social and psychological dependence keep her bound.

The symbolic significance of the elderly Khanjaniya: Phuliya uproots old Khanjaniya, Jivachha's stepmother, as mercilessly as a flowering tree torn from the ground, and casts her into the courtyard.

The aptness of the title: "Jhakharal Phulak Gachh" is a beautiful metaphor for old age and abandonment.

2.7 "Gharmunha": Urban Isolation and Family Disintegration

Plot: The narrator, a husband, and his wife live in a small room in Biratnagar. Their struggles, economic deprivation, the wife's illness and the husband's psychological suffering form the story's substance.

Detailed Analysis:

The struggle of an entire family is portrayed through only a handful of images.

The image of the cooking stove: The pot of rice and lentils on the stove in the room, "potatoes and arikonch greens covered in a metal vessel," and the plates and bowls on the bench are not merely an inventory of objects. They are visible signs of a life spent struggling.

A crisis of identity: The narrator can neither understand, enjoy nor make himself at home in urban life; nor can he forget the fragrance of his rural soil or free himself from its moist, clinging texture. This is a common experience of Maithils settled in Biratnagar.

2.8 "Upahar" (The Gift): Modern Women's Suffering through the Symbol of Yashodhara Plot: Yashodhara's husband Gautam has fled the home. Recriminations, the family's expectations and her loneliness are portrayed.

Detailed Analysis:

Mythic context: Sudhakar reinterprets the story of Yashodhara and Gautama Buddha in a modern setting. Gautam, a modern man, pursues his ideals and leaves Yashodhara—and their Rahul—behind.

Irony: At the end, Yashodhara takes the child Rahul into her arms: "Gautam's first and last gift." The line is ironic: a man's supreme "gift" is a child.

2.9 "Chilhori Uri Rahal Achhi": Unemployment, Marriage and Betrayal by Friends

Plot: Vinod is unemployed. Chanda's conduct hurts him; in his period of unemployment, he experiences neglect and betrayal by a friend.

Detailed Analysis:

Economic impotence and masculine identity: In a patriarchal society, a man's identity is tied to his earnings. Vinod's unemployment is not merely a financial problem. His masculine pride, public standing and "value" in his wife's eyes are threatened together.

Chanda's character: Chanda is not one-dimensional and is no villain. Her demands and dissatisfaction are human responses to a system that regards women's dreams and aspirations as frivolous. In the end, however, her behaviour breaks Vinod.

The story's title, "Chilhori Uri Rahal Achhi," is a metaphor for Vinod's life, flying without support.

2.10 "Nukka Chori": Forbidden Love and Social Barriers

Plot: Chandan and Vibha are young people connected through a pahun relationship; the structure of kinship renders their love "illicit."

Detailed Analysis:

The complexity of relationships: Romantic feelings are considered forbidden within a relationship such as pahun. Yet Chandan and Vibha's attraction crosses this barrier.

Chandan's conflict: This is a genuine emotional connection that goes against the social structure.

A balance between romanticism and realism: Sudhakar neither glorifies nor condemns the relationship. He shows only the agitation of two human hearts.

2.11 "Karjakhor" (The Debt-Ridden Man): Debt Traps and Middle-Class Torment

Plot: Dasji is an unemployed middle-class man who has borrowed from several people: Dhruvji, 1,500; Gopal, involving a pillow, bedding and a sheet; Virendra, 500; Umashankarji, 400; Pradip, 590; and Harishankarji, approximately 1,700. This inventory of debts expresses the pathos of his life.

Detailed Analysis:

Realistic detail: The schedule of debts is a literary device. A list compiled with pen and paper becomes an account of one person's entire struggle to live.

The episode involving Pradip: The relationship between Pradip, who behaves rather like a moneylender, and Dasji is moving. Pradip says, "Look, Dasji, for you this sum is no great mountain … Pay it a little attention and you'll be able to arrange it." The line reveals a complicated power dynamic in which the debtor's dignity is gradually eroded.

Marx: Debt is a chain by which capitalist society makes a middle-class person captive. Dasji's predicament is a literary example of "debt bondage."

2.12 "Rampari": The Epistolary Form and Women's Inner Conflicts

Plot: The narrator, a young woman named Suryamukhi, writes a letter to her friend Rampari, referring to her own life.

Detailed Analysis:

The epistolary form: The story is written in the epistolary mode, a relatively rare experiment in Maithili fiction. The language of a letter carries an intimacy and informality different from straightforward narration.

The inclusion of a song: A song appears midway through the narrative, lending it an additional emotional dimension. The mingling of song and story is an old tradition in Indian literature.

The date 28 August 1976: The letter ends with "Your Suryamukhi (28.8.76)." The date turns the story into a historical document.

2.13 "Astitva" (Existence): Three Brothers, an Elderly Father and a Property Dispute

Plot: Three brothers—Shrikant, Shashikant and Sudhakant—and their aged father are at the centre of the narrative. The father's care, the daily arrangements for meals and a tendency towards separation under the influence of their wives become points of tension.

Detailed Analysis:

The disintegration of the joint family: "Astitva" narrates the breakdown of the joint-family system. All three brothers, under pressure from their respective wives, are thinking about setting up separate homes.

The old man's painful predicament: The elderly father, lying on a trunk, suddenly becomes alert. This single small detail conveys the entire psychology of the relationship between father and sons.

Satirical criticism: The story, with its image of chewing jaggery and rice, draws a satirical portrait.

2.14 "Sunagait Karaj": Child Psychology and the Adult World

Plot: Maheshwa, a small boy, leaves school and plays in an orchard, and so on.

Detailed Analysis:

The child's perspective: Sudhakar reveals the psychology of childhood with exceptional sensitivity. Maheshwa's hunger, curiosity, "rebellion" and smoking of a bidi establish the child as a complete human being.

The coin offered to Mahadeva: Maheshwa sees some money placed on the Śiva-liṅga and takes it. The scene has a profound symbolic meaning.

2.15 "Thakuchal Masuk Butti": Art, Youth and Society's Violence

Plot: Lalanma, a gifted flautist and singer, has been the narrator's friend since childhood. Gradually, however, Lalan takes the path of violence.

Detailed Analysis:

The tragic destiny of an artist: Society does not nurture Lalan's talent for the flute; it destroys it. The story poses the question: what sort of society compels its gifted children to become violent?

Lalan and the narrator: Roasted grains cupped in the hands, and song.

2.16 "Khandit Lok" (A Fragmented World): Generational Conflict and the Clash between Tradition and Modernity

Plot: A generational struggle unfolds between the elderly Lalchan and his family. Lalchan lived by the ideals he found in Premchand, Sarat Chandra and Jaishankar Prasad, but his family rejects those values.

Detailed Analysis:

The episode with the fish: The old man buys fish and brings it home. His wife exclaims, "Oh dear! Who will cook fish at this late hour of the evening?" It is an ordinary domestic incident, but two generations and two worlds collide within it.

Idealism and realism: Literary idealism had been the old man's sustaining provision for life. Yet what use are those fragrant ideals if nobody understands them? There is the reality of modern life. The old man is isolated between the two.

2.17 "Chhagar" (Goat): Multiple Relationships and Women's Resistance

Plot: Chandan and Rupam, also called Rupa, are married. Chandan's mother, Rupam's mother-in-law, continually torments her. At last Rupam gives voice to her resistance.

Detailed Analysis:

The title "Chhagar" is a satirical symbol. A goat is reared for sacrifice; similarly, Rupa is like a sacrificial animal in her marital home.

The relationship between mother-in-law and daughter-in-law: This relationship recurs throughout Indian literature. Sudhakar, however, neither makes the mother-in-law a villain nor casts Rupa as solely a victim. Chandan, the husband, stands somewhere between them, but his silence is also a form of complicity in oppression.

2.18 "Parivesh" (Milieu): Politics, Personal Ambition and Moral Decline

Plot: Bachcha Bhai, an influential villager, comes into conflict with Manohar's educated family. A young man, Chandrakant, becomes embroiled in the quarrel and is beaten by men belonging to Bachcha Bhai's faction.

Detailed Analysis:

Political satire: Published in the January 1991 issue of Sanket, issued from Janakpur, the story is set against the years preceding democratic change in Nepal. Bachcha Bhai's enjoyment of power and rural political intrigue reflect that historical period.

2.19 "Chhahari Tarak Kant" (A Thorn beneath the Shade): Brotherhood, Women and Justice

Plot: The relationship between Shashikant and Hemkant is central. Sumitra, Shashikant's wife, and Shyama, Hemkant's wife, are the two women. There is a property dispute and a slap.

Detailed Analysis:

The metaphor of the cucumber: Two cucumbers growing from the same seed, in the same soil, with the support of the same bamboo, mature side by side—yet their kinship breaks. It is a poignant image of fractured brotherhood.

2.20 "Sandhi" (Treaty): The Border Area and a Thunderbolt Striking Both Men

A playful man speaks in Kabirdas's idiom, and the effect on the two men is like a thunderbolt. Both earn their livelihood; yet on the twenty-seventh day they reconcile. Twenty-nine days have passed since the India–Nepal treaty was broken.

2.21 "Swapna-Bhang" (The Shattering of a Dream): Love, Imagination and the Struggle with Reality

Plot: Shrikant is attached to Padma. His account is an interior monologue resembling a diary.

Detailed Analysis: This is the collection's most Romantic story in its mode of narration. The very title, "The Shattering of a Dream," invokes an important theme of the Romantic movement.

2.22 "Kono Ek Din" (One Day): The COVID-19 Pandemic and Human Isolation

Written on 3 October 2020, the story takes the form of a night-time conversation between husband and wife during the COVID lockdown. Memories of the past and dissatisfaction with the present emerge.

Detailed Analysis:

This is the collection's only story to record the experience of the pandemic. Its closing line—"It was a full-moon night that day …"—expresses the return of past memory to the present.

Part Three: Analysis in the Light of Gangesha Upadhyaya's Navya-Nyāya

3.1 Foundational Concepts of Navya-Nyāya

The Tattvacintāmaṇi of Gangesha Upadhyaya, the Mithila philosopher active around 1320 CE, is a foundational text of Navya-Nyāya philosophy. Its principal concepts and means of cognition include:

Vyāpti—universal concomitance

Anumāna—inference

Śabda—verbal testimony

Pratyakṣa—direct perception

Upādhi—a condition or qualifier

These are major means or principles of knowledge.

3.2 A Navya-Nyāya Analysis of "Diyari"

In relation to vyāpti (universal relation): In Navya-Nyāya, vyāpti signifies an invariable relation, as in "Where there is smoke, there is fire." Sudhakar's stories reveal a pervasive relation:

Where there is economic deprivation, there is family disintegration.

This relationship appears consistently in "Karjakhor," "Gharmunha," "Diyari" and "Chilhori Uri Rahal Achhi." From the Navya-Nyāya perspective, that pervasive pattern is the foundation of Sudhakar's literary worldview.

In relation to anumāna (inference): Navya-Nyāya distinguishes three forms of inference—kevalānvayin, kevalavyatirekin and anvayavyatirekin. Sudhakar's characters draw conclusions through inference, but these inferences are frequently misleading; sometimes they prove mistaken. [Story: "Parivesh."]

In relation to upādhi (condition): In Navya-Nyāya an upādhi is a qualification that restricts a purported universal relation. In "Nukka Chori," social conditions are imposed upon Chandan and Vibha's love and declare it "illicit." Such conditional restraints recur throughout Sudhakar's fiction.

Part Four: Analysis within the Videha Parallel-History Framework

4.1 The Videha Tradition and Mithila's Literature

"Videha" is an ancient name of Mithila. King Janaka's kingdom of Videha symbolises Mithila's civilisation. The "Videha history framework" seeks to recover the parallel history of Maithils living in Nepal's Tarai: a history commonly overlooked in official national narratives.

4.2 Sudhakar's Stories and Videha History

Sudhakar was born in Malhani, Kalaiya (Birgunj), Nepal, and later settled in Biratnagar. This migrant-Maithil experience constitutes a parallel history:

(a) Maithil identity on the India–Nepal border:

The Nepal–India oil treaty in "Sandhi" is not merely an element of plot; it is the living history of a Maithil community situated, like a diyari, between two countries. [Border area.]

(b) Nepal's political transformations and the Maithils:

The shadow of Nepal's democratic movement and Maoist struggle is clearly present in "Parivesh" and "Khandit Lok." These stories document the effects of political upheaval on Maithil society.

(c) Linguistic identity:

Writing in Maithili is itself a political act where the language has been marginalised. Sudhakar's sixty years of literary work constitute a chapter in this "linguistic resistance."

Part Five: Overall Assessment through Indian, Chinese and Western Theories

5.1 From the Perspective of Indian Poetics

Rasa Theory (Bharata Muni, approximately 300 BCE):

Story — Predominant Rasa

"Pradakshina" — Karuṇa + Bībhatsa

"Diyari" — Karuṇa + Śānta

"Jhakharal Phulak Gachh" — Karuṇa + Raudra

"Choliya Me Chor Base Gori" — Śṛṅgāra

"Upahar" — Karuṇa + Vīra

"Karjakhor" — Karuṇa

"Thakuchal Masuk Butti" — Karuṇa + Raudra

The sentiment of compassion or pathos, karuṇa rasa, is the strongest in Sudhakar's stories. In Bharata's Nāṭyaśāstra, the abiding emotion underlying karuṇa rasa is śoka (grief). Abhinavagupta maintained that this sentiment becomes possible when the reader or spectator, through sādhāraṇīkaraṇa (universalisation), recognises the self in a character's suffering. Sudhakar achieves this universalisation with remarkable success: readers can recognise themselves in the distress of Dasji, Vinod, Bachanu and Lalan.

Dhvani Theory (Ānandavardhana, approximately ninth century):

Suggestion, or dhvani, is exceedingly powerful in Sudhakar's stories. The title "Diyari" itself carries suggested meanings: a river island, a husband's predicament and the uncertainty surrounding a woman's identity are all evoked simultaneously.

"Khutti Par Tangal Bra" likewise contains a suggested meaning that conveys both "market-oriented civilisation" and the "commodification of the female body."

Vakrokti Theory (Kuntaka, approximately tenth century):

Kuntaka's vakrokti—oblique or distinctive expression—is readily visible in Sudhakar's language. He uses obliqueness at the level of the word (pada-vakratā), sentence (vākya-vakratā) and overall composition (prabandha-vakratā).

5.2 From the Perspective of Chinese Literary Theory

Liu Xie (465–521 CE), Wenxin Diaolong—"The Literary Mind and the Carving of Dragons":

For Liu Xie, fine literature brings together both Qíng (feeling) and Lǐ (reason or principle).

Sudhakar's fiction offers a beautiful conjunction of the two:

Qíng: the emotional authenticity of his characters.

Lǐ: the rational depiction of social problems.

The Aesthetics of Su Shi (1037–1101):

Su Shi said that literary truth emerges from nature. This "natural truth" is strongly evident in Sudhakar's stories. Avoiding artificial language and an entangled narrative mechanism, he grasps the truth of life directly.

Bi and Xing: Metaphorical Principles in Chinese Poetics

Bi means simile or metaphor, and xing an arousal of feeling. Both are prominently present in Sudhakar's stories:

"Diyari" (bi): a river island in the midst of water = the predicament of husband and wife.

"Jhakharal Phulak Gachh" (bi): an uprooted tree = an abandoned elderly woman.

"Sunagait Karaj" (xing): the smouldering heart or debt arouses emotion.

5.3 From the Perspective of Western Theory

Mikhail Bakhtin (1895–1975): Dialogism and Polyphony

Bakhtin argued that the great novel—and literature more broadly—contains many voices, or polyphony: the author's is not the sole voice; different characters' voices sound together.

This polyphony is apparent in Sudhakar's stories:

In "Diyari," there are three voices—the elderly man, Sushila and her husband, the narrator. Each viewpoint is valid.

In "Astitva," the three brothers speak in three different voices.

In "Gharmunha," domestic life contains many unexpected voices.

Georg Lukács (1885–1971): Critical Realism

Lukács developed the theory of "critical realism," which reveals the contradictions of bourgeois society through truthful artistic representation.

In this sense Sudhakar is a critical realist. He neither writes propaganda for socialist realism nor retreats into escapism. Like a skilled surgeon, he lays bare the contradictions of the Maithil middle class.

Antonio Gramsci (1891–1937): Hegemony and the Organic Intellectual Gramsci's concepts of "hegemony" and "organic intellectuals" illuminate Sudhakar, who is an organic intellectual expressing the experience of working people from within their own social world.

He worked in Biratnagar's industrial region. His struggles in life give his writing an organic authenticity.

Homi Bhabha (born 1949): The Third Space and Cultural Hybridity

Bhabha argued that colonialism—and displacement—produces a "Third Space," an identity that is neither wholly old nor wholly new.

Sudhakar, a Maithil of Nepal, inhabits this "Third Space." His characters —Bachna in "Pradakshina," the narrators of "Gharmunha" and "Sandhi"—suffer the disquiet of hybrid identity. "I could neither seize the moment to enter the turbulence of urban life … nor forget the fragrance of my rural soil": this is a literary expression of Bhabha's Third Space.

Part Six: Analysis of Language, Style and Technique

6.1 The Use of Maithili

Sudhakar employs a distinctive variety of Nepalese Maithili. It contains:

– An eastern dialect of Maithili.

– Certain words influenced by Nepali.

– The influence of the market speech of Biratnagar.

– The folk speech of rural Mithila.

6.2 Descriptive Style

Sudhakar's descriptions are economical. For example: "The pot of rice and lentils on the stove … the vessel of milk on the shelf … potatoes and arikonch greens covered in a metal dish, and their smell … the plates, bowls and glasses clustered on the bench … chutney of tomatoes, chillies and coriander crushed and heaped on the grinding stone … and, above all, a burning lamp, as though a flame were rising from someone's funeral pyre in the loneliness of a cremation ground."

These details produce an imagist effect.

6.3 The Style of Dialogue

Sudhakar's dialogue is exceptionally natural and alive. It is not unnecessarily "literary." For example, the dialogue in "Karjakhor" is a precise transcription of conversation in an ordinary Maithil family.

Part Seven: Overall Literary Evaluation

7.1 Sudhakar's Strengths

(a) Authenticity: Sudhakar's greatest strength is his authenticity. He writes what he has lived, seen and experienced. This "lived experience" distinguishes his stories from, and places them above, artificially manufactured literary fiction.

(b) Social commitment: He writes about social inequality, the exploitation of women and economic deprivation without ideological prejudice. He offers neither "communist" propaganda nor "Hindu conservative" moral sermons. He simply depicts human beings in all their complexity.

(c) Portrayal of women: Sudhakar's female characters are powerful and multidimensional. Sushila, Khanjaniya, Maya, Rupa, Yashodhara, Samtali and Vibha are real women—neither idealised goddesses nor "fallen women."

(d) The soil of language: His language carries the scent of Maithili soil. Instead of putting on a show of "pure Maithili," he writes in living Maithili.

7.2 Sudhakar's Limitations

(a) Plot structure: In some stories, such as "Swapna-Bhang," the plot structure becomes loose. The diary format does not always cohere.

(b) Centrality of male narrators: Most of the narrators are male, even though the female characters are exceptionally strong.

(c) Absence of resolution: Some stories, such as "Karjakhor," are left without a clear resolution. This is defensible from a realist perspective but can at times frustrate the reader.

Part Eight: A Comparative Perspective

8.1 Place within the Maithili Literary Tradition

Sudhakar's fiction appears to have been influenced by Harimohan Jha (satire), Lalit (the novel and short story), Rajkamal Chaudhary (modern prose) and Manipadma (realist fiction), yet he has developed his own original voice.

His position within the Nepalese Maithili short-story tradition is distinctive: he brought into literature the experiences of Biratnagar's "border area," experiences not otherwise available.

8.2 Comparison with Hindi Literature

A comparison may be drawn with Premchand (1880–1936): both wrote about the rural-to-urban transition and were sensitive to socioeconomic problems. Sudhakar, however, is bolder than Premchand in addressing sexuality.

A comparison with Mohan Rakesh (1925–1972) reveals themes shared by both: the discontent of the urban middle class and family disintegration. Sudhakar's language, however, is more deeply rooted in the soil.

Epilogue: A Comprehensive Judgement

"Diyari" is a priceless treasure of Maithili literature. Across six decades of writing, R. N. Sudhakar has created a literary world that is:

– In authenticity, rooted in Mithila's soil.

– In social responsibility, on the side of the poor, the neglected and the exploited.

– In its consciousness of women, ahead of its time (1976–2020).

– In linguistic beauty, living and fresh.

From the perspective of vyāpti in Navya-Nyāya: "Wherever there is a Sudhakar story, there is human truth." From the historical perspective of the Videha tradition, this collection is a living document of the Maithil people of Nepal's Tarai. From the perspective of Indian rasa theory, it is an intense cultivation of karuṇa rasa. From the Chinese Qíng–Lǐ perspective, it is a beautiful conjunction of emotion and truth. From the Western perspective of critical realism, it speaks the truth of an organic intellectual.

This collection has received a broad welcome within parallel Maithili literary circles. Such a welcome should come not only from Maithili readers but from the entire literary community of India and Nepal.

"Diyari"—situated amid the waves approaching from two sides—resembles Sudhakar's own literature: between tradition and modernity, village and city, the Maithili and Nepali worlds, yet steadfast in its originality.

32. A Critical Review of Parmeshwar Kapari's Tales and Folk Narratives

Abstract

Indian aesthetics of rasa, dhvani and vakrokti • Navya-Nyāya (Gangesha Upadhyaya) • Videha Parallel History. Parmeshwar Kapari, a senior Maithili writer from Janakpurdham, is known chiefly as a playwright. Yet his creative world also contains a rich body of stories and folk narratives that has not received the critical attention it deserves. Kapari's narrative world can principally be divided into four streams: (a) folk tales in their pure form, exemplified by "Lachhminiya Kaniya" and "Hanuman Nam Smaranke Mahima."

Keywords: Parmeshwar · Kapari · Tales · Critical · Review · Maithili · Kapari

A Critical Review of Parmeshwar Kapari's Tales and Folk Narratives

Indian aesthetics of rasa, dhvani and vakrokti • Navya-Nyāya (Gangesha Upadhyaya) • Videha Parallel History

Introduction: Parmeshwar Kapari as a Storyteller

Parmeshwar Kapari, a senior Maithili literary figure resident in Janakpurdham, is chiefly known as a playwright. But his oeuvre includes a rich world of tales and folk narratives that has not yet received adequate critical attention.

Kapari's narrative world is principally divided into four streams:

(a) Folk tales in their pure form, of which "Lachhminiya Kaniya" and "Hanuman Nam Smaranke Mahima" are outstanding examples.

(b) Fresh interpretations of mythological narratives: "Yajna-Sita," "Chhaunri-Chhaunra Sudyumna," "Lakshmi-Bali," "Tap Aa Satsang" and "Hridaybasi Ishwar."

(c) Didactic tales: "Shiksha Aa Diksha" and "Number."

(d) Stories and folk narratives: "Kutta-Bilai-Mus" and "Gonubabu Gharepar."

(e) Narrative poetry: "Dam" (an extended verse narrative, Sakshi).

Two elements lie at the heart of all his tales: the vitality of spoken Maithili and the language's sociocultural reality. Together they give his narratives a distinctive geographical and cultural identity.

Reviews of the Tales

1. "Hanuman Nam Smaranke Mahima" (The Glory of Remembering Hanuman's Name)

1(a) Plot: The nine planetary deities, the Navagraha, are imprisoned in Ravana's Lanka, powerless and miserable. While setting Lanka ablaze, Hanuman sees them, asks about their plight, breaks their bonds and sets them free. The Navagraha invite Hanuman to seek a boon, but he replies, "Lord Rama is with me; I have no need to ask for any boon." The Navagraha then make a promise of their own: those who recite Hanuman's name will suffer no harm at their hands.

1(b) Linguistic analysis: This is an excellent specimen of Maithili. Forms such as "rahae," "hai," "ai," "aela," "hunkasabke" and "okarasabke" are natural Maithili forms, not substantially different from the language of Darbhanga and Mithila in India.

"As he went about setting fires here and there in Lanka, Hanuman caught sight of the nine planetary deities, stripped of their strength and power, as though dead and withered."

"Agi-laggi," "agarahi-pasahi" and "muil-vilai" are living evidence of Maithili expression. The paired compound "muil-vilai" (dead and withered) exemplifies the language's grammatical riches.

1(c) Rasa: The devotional sentiment predominates, but it is not devotion alone. The pathos of the Navagraha's misery and the heroic sentiment of Hanuman's bravery in breaking Ravana's bonds create a composite experience of rasa. According to Ānandavardhana's theory of dhvani, the principal suggestion is that "divine grace comes not through asking, but through surrendering oneself." This suggested meaning lies beyond the literal sense.

1(d) Vakrokti: Viewed through Kuntaka's concept of oblique expression, the tale's most striking statement is "With him beside me, why should I ask you for any boon?" Conventionally, the devotee requests a boon and the deity grants it. Here Hanuman reverses the logic of devotion: "Asking for a boon is a weakness in devotion." This reversal gives an ordinary tale philosophical elevation.

1(e) A Navya-Nyāya perspective: According to Gangesha's account of verbal testimony (śabda-pramāṇa, or the statement of a trustworthy authority), the Navagraha's promise that "those who chant Hanuman's name will suffer no harm" constitutes reliable testimony. In Navya-Nyāya such testimony has evidentiary value because its speakers, the Navagraha, are trustworthy. Through a folk tale Kapari makes this scholastic argument accessible.

1(f) The Videha framework: The tradition of Hanuman stories in Maithili literature is very old. Kapari, however, places this narrative in a new geographical and cultural location. When a Maithili storyteller from Janakpurdham, Nepal, recounts a tale of Rama, Ravana and Hanuman, its folk voice and perspective are distinctly his own.

2. "Lachhminiya Kaniya": Parmeshwar Kapari's Finest Folk Tale

2(a) Plot: An elderly couple live in a village. Their daughter-in-law is slight of build and ordinary to look at, yet notably resourceful and clever in household work and judgement. One night a jackal calls out, and the daughter-in-law understands its language. It says that a corpse floating in the river has a pair of precious rubies in its thigh. The young woman courageously retrieves the jewels, gives the corpse to the jackal and returns home. Her mother-in-law misunderstands, imagining that she has been eating a corpse. A commotion follows and the daughter-in-law is sent to her parental home. Along the road a crow speaks; she understands the crow's language too. It tells her that feeding milk to a snake that day will lead the snake to show her diamonds and pearls. She explains this to her father-in-law, who believes her. They feed the snake milk and puffed grain, and obtain jewels. The household becomes prosperous, and mother-in-law and daughter-in-law begin living together happily.

2(b) Structural analysis of the folk tale: According to Vladimir Propp's Morphology of the Folktale (1928), folk tales possess a definite underlying structure. "Lachhminiya Kaniya" follows that structure closely:

(i) Initial lack: poverty and the humiliation of the daughter-in-law.

(ii) Donor: the jackal and the crow, who impart knowledge to the daughter-in-law.

(iii) Helper function: knowledge of animal speech, the daughter-in-law's special power.

(iv) Test or challenge: the courage required to approach the river at night.

(v) Final victory: the jewels and the reconciliation of the family.

One distinctive feature of the Maithili–Mithila tradition is the addition of the snake-and-milk episode at the end. This is the Maithili folk tale's own creative supplement.

2(c) Extraordinary lexical richness: The most important feature of "Lachhminiya Kaniya" is the wealth of words drawn from the spoken folk language. The following clusters are priceless elements of Maithili's living vocabulary:

"labakaniya," "harharahi khatbanari," "chhotkhutiya bhutiya," "chhagunaae," "dhatpatae," "gundhunaae," "paniaae," "lobhaae," "jhisi-bunnibala," "bikaral rait," "huan-huan," "jumus banhik," "habakka mari," "lattopato," "hathi-bardam," "dhukka-pharki," "dhipal aig-baul," "chhabakal dabakal," "pithiya-thok dhamakka," "nangatiniya rakamsani," "odhabadhak," "lohchhi jhantiyak," "pachhamuriya kandariya," and "hapais-lapaikak."

These words remain alive in Maithili folk speech. Kapari gathers and safeguards them, giving them literary standing; therein lies his greatest contribution.

2(d) The daughter-in-law's character: The young woman looks ordinary, "labakaniya, chhotkhutiya bhutiya," but possesses the rare power of understanding animal speech. Folk tradition calls this accomplishment pashu-siddhi and it makes her extraordinary. She goes to the river alone at night—courage. She removes jewels from a corpse —resourcefulness. She withstands her mother-in-law's anger—patience. She understands the crow and convinces her father-in-law—intelligence. She becomes the emblem of Mithila's "Lachhminiya": a brave, intelligent woman who brings prosperity, an ideal of female agency.

2(e) The union of devotional and pathetic sentiments: The middle of the tale blends the mother-in-law's anger (raudra rasa) with the daughter-in-law's helplessness (karuṇa rasa). At the end, however, the emotional movement resolves into śānta rasa: "After that, mother-in-law and daughter-in-law, and everyone in the household, lived together in mutual understanding, happiness and delight." This traditional happy ending of a Maithili folk tale upholds an ideal of domestic life.

2(f) Comparative perspective: "Lachhminiya Kaniya" belongs to the Maithili tradition of the "Sunari-Bahuriya" tale. In many stories from that tradition, however, the daughter-in-law is merely a passive recipient of magic. Here she takes risks and uses her intelligence. The distinction matters: Kapari makes the daughter-in-law an agent, not merely a patient upon whom events act.

3. "Yajna-Sita": A Bold Reinterpretation of Mythological Narrative

3(a) Plot: Whenever King Rama performs a sacrifice, an image of Sita fashioned from gold is made. A group of these sacrificial Sitas gathers in Rama's residence. They feel aggrieved and neglected. One day they all approach Rama and demand recognition. Rama cites his vow of monogamy: "I have taken the hand in marriage of Sita, daughter of Janaka, ruler of Mithila." The sacrificial Sitas ask, "Why were we needed to help with the sacrifice but not accepted in life?" At last Rama offers a solution: in his incarnation as Krishna in the Dvapara age, they will become gopīs. "All those sacrificial Sitas became gopīs in Braj."

3(b) Literary courage: This is one of Kapari's boldest compositions. Rama and Sita are sacred figures in Maithili folk tradition, and to question their relationship is unusual. Kapari nevertheless reconsiders it from Mithila's Sita-centred standpoint: Sita is Janaka's daughter, a daughter of Mithila.

"While the sacrifice is being performed, we are absolutely indispensable! / Without us it is incomplete! / Does not the officiant conduct the sacrifice together with us?"

This argument is unassailable from a scriptural standpoint. The wife, the husband's other half, is indispensable to the sacrifice under Vedic prescription. By placing this scriptural reasoning in the mouths of the sacrificial Sitas, Kapari compels Rama to answer them.

3(c) Folk feminism: The work is an excellent example of a discourse on women's rights in Maithili folk literature. The sacrificial Sita is not merely a "helpless woman": she reasons, makes demands and understands her rights. "And yet you call yourself the ideal Maryada Purushottam?" This question opens a new chapter in the Maithili literature of Nepal.

3(d) Analysis of dhvani: At the literal level, the composition tells the tale of the sacrificial Sitas. At the level of suggestion, however, Kapari communicates a profound message: "A society that makes use of women's labour but denies them rights is out of balance." From Ānandavardhana's standpoint, that dhvani is the soul of the composition.

3(e) Within the tradition of mythological reinterpretation: The Maithili poet Vidyapati (distinct from the pre-Jyotirishvara Vidyapati) considered mythological narratives afresh in Bhuparikrama and Purushapariksha. Kapari carries that tradition forward with a new social consciousness. This is an important aspect of Videha's parallel history.

4. "Chhaunri-Chhaunra Sudyumna": A Mythological Tale of Gender Transformation

4(a) Plot: King Vaivasvata Manu and Queen Shraddha desire a son. The queen arranges a rite for begetting a boy but says, "If there is to be a child, let it be a daughter." As a result a girl, Ila, is born. At five or seven years of age, the girl displays masculine conduct. An investigation reveals that the priest's incantation at the sacrifice was intended to produce a son; the queen's wish caused a daughter to be born, but masculine qualities remained. Through the power of austerity, Vasishtha transforms the girl into a boy, Sudyumna. Sudyumna enters a forest where Shiva and Parvati enjoy their play, and becomes a woman. The sage Budha falls in love with this woman, and their son Pururavas is born. Vasishtha then arranges a recitation of the Devi Bhagavata, making Sudyumna permanently male. A coronation follows.

4(b) Gender discourse: The story is based on the Śrīmad Devī Bhāgavata Mahāpurāṇa (Chapter 3). Kapari retells it in the language of Maithili folk speech. It raises the question of gender transformation or gender fluidity, a subject linked with contemporary debates about gender. The queen's wish, "If a child is born, let it be a daughter," reverses society's preference for sons.

4(c) The Vitality of Language

"When Ila, their daughter, had reached the age of four or five, her whole bearing and manner began to seem masculine! She was a girl, yet she spoke and did many things like a boy."

"Bagay-bani" and "chhara jika" are indigenous Maithili expressions. The first means bearing and demeanour; the second means "like a boy." These terms may not be found in standard dictionaries of Maithili.

4(d) A Navya-Nyāya perspective: In terms of Gangesha's theory of vyāpti, the tale contains a chain of reasoning: (a) listening to the Devi Bhagavata (the reason or hetu) leads to (b) Sudyumna's permanent male form (the proposition to be proved, or sādhya). Kapari, however, does not treat this concomitance as ultimate truth: Pururavas, Sudyumna's son, is evidence of Sudyumna's earlier motherhood. This is a dramatic application of Navya-Nyāya's method of challenging a proposed vyāpti.

5. "Hridaybasi Ishwar" (God Who Dwells in the Heart)

5(a) Plot: At the beginning of creation, God gives human beings special intelligence and knowledge. But humans start searching for God over every small and large problem. Troubled by this, God hides in forests, mountains, caves and ravines, but people find him there too. Finally God hides where humans will not think of looking: within their own hearts.

5(b) Vedānta and folk tradition: A union of three traditions. The germ of the story belongs to three traditions: (a) Vedānta—"Tat tvam asi": Brahman resides within oneself; (b) the Maithili folk tale, in which the search for God ends in the heart; and (c) Kapari's transformation of this metaphysical insight into humorous narrative rather than dry philosophy. The portrayal of stubborn, demanding people relentlessly looking for God is a fine example of comic rasa.

5(c) Play with Language

"However far God went to hide himself in a secluded corner, those insistent, headstrong, self-interested people searched him out there as well."

"Aurh kat" (a secluded corner), "ghaihar garju" (excessively insistent) and "hehar-thethar" (obstinate and stubborn) testify to the vitality of Maithili. The expressive sounds "ghaihar" and "hehar" make their meanings almost audible.

5(d) Humour and philosophy: God's irritation is an anthropomorphic image typical of folk narrative. Kapari, however, turns it into a philosophical proposition: where God is most readily available—in the heart—humankind never searches. This irony, or vakrokti, raises the folk tale to the level of philosophy.

6. "Lakshmi-Bali Khissa": The Raksha Bandhan Episode

6(a) Plot: Vishnu serves as a gatekeeper at King Bali's door because he is bound by a promise. Lakshmi waits anxiously. Narada explains what happened in the Vamana–Bali episode. Lakshmi disguises herself, visits King Bali and ties a protective thread on his wrist. Bali offers her a gift. She asks, "Give me that gatekeeper." Bali grants the request. From then on, Raksha Bandhan becomes the festival of brothers and sisters.

6(b) A fusion of folk narrative and Purāṇic mythology: The story draws upon the Vishnu Purana and Bhagavata traditions. Kapari, however, fills it with the vitality of everyday Maithili: "ahar takay, pahar takay," "batjohime ankh khiya," "talbal-talbal ladh-dular," "halasal lahalot"—idiomatic expressions that animate the tale.

"Bali greatly liked Lakshmi's bearing and demeanour. His curiosity grew, and advancing towards her with affectionate eagerness, he asked, 'Well then, dear child, who are you?'"

"Hapasi-lapakik," an idiom meaning to rush forward with affection, is exactly right. Lakshmi's assumed role as a sister is a natural expression of love.

6(c) Women's Agency and Power

Lakshmi is not passive in this tale. She devises her own plan, changes her appearance, negotiates with Bali and secures Vishnu's release. The goddess of wealth is capable of freeing her own husband: this is a powerful narrative of female agency.

7. "Tap Aa Satsang" (Austerity and Good Company)

7(a) Plot: Vishvamitra and Vasishtha quarrel over whether austerity or the company of the wise is superior. Neither Brahma nor Vishnu wishes to become entangled in the argument. At last Sheshanaga offers a test: lifting the burden of the earth. Vishvamitra applies all the power of his austerities but cannot lift it. Vasishtha offers "the merit earned from one day in good company," and the earth rises into the air. Austerity loses; satsang wins.

7(b) The philosophical fable: This is a philosophical tale of argument in which a difficult question is resolved in narrative form. "Austerity" and "good company" stand for the relation between individual discipline and a social-spiritual community.

Kapari's humorous outlook is also alive: "Very good, an excellent idea! Lord Shesha told both of them to their faces." The idiom "soharde ange" (directly to someone's face) humorously casts Shesha in the role of a judge.

7(c) The Use of Folk Language

"Hearing this, Vishvamitra felt the sting of envy and, flaring up in anger, exclaimed, 'What! How can I possibly fail to lift such a little weight!'"

"Ikh-bikh lagab" (to burn with envy) and "pinakale-phanaki" (to flare up with anger) are two priceless Maithili idioms.

8. Didactic Tales: "Shiksha Aa Diksha" and "Number"

8(a) "Shiksha Aa Diksha" (Education and Initiation)

In the traditional gurukula, a teacher strikes a prince without apparent reason before sending him away, in public view. The next day he explains why: "So that you may experience injustice. When you become king and dispense justice, you will know the pain of those who have suffered wrong."

The didactic narrative is close to India's tradition of moral tales, yet its method of "experiential learning" also corresponds to the principles of modern pedagogy. "Thereupon everyone's inner eyes were opened": that sentence is the philosophical essence of the story.

8(b) "Number"

At night a wealthy merchant loses his way and enters a temple. He gives money to a distressed person and also hands him his own card bearing a number. The person says, "I know your number." Astonished, the merchant asks what he means. "God's number," the man replies, "the one who sent you to me."

This is an excellent didactic tale with a twist ending. It occupies barely a page but carries a profound philosophical message. This portrayal of faith in God is among the finest examples of the Maithili moral tale.

9. "Kutta-Bilai-Mus" (Dog, Cat and Mouse)

9(a) Plot: Dog, Cat and Mouse are three friends. Dog leaves on a pilgrimage and entrusts all his papers to Cat, who gives them to Mouse for safekeeping. Mouse chews them up and destroys them while using them for food and bedding. When Dog returns, the papers are gone. Cat attempts to kill Mouse. Mouse flees, unable to understand why everyone is pursuing him. "Ever since then, dogs chase cats, and cats chase mice, whenever they see one another."

9(b) The character of an origin tale: This is an aetiological tale, one that explains the supposed origin of a familiar occurrence. It offers an amusing folk answer to the question of why dogs chase cats and cats chase mice. This narrative type is found in folk traditions across the world; Rudyard Kipling's Just So Stories provides a Western parallel.

9(c) The problem of justice: The line "The mouse could not understand why everybody was chasing him" is profound. He ate and used the papers as bedding because they served his needs, but his conduct harmed the others. The narrative concerns the consequences of an unwitting wrong. From the perspective of Navya-Nyāya, the mouse's absence of knowledge does not in itself make his action morally criminal.

10. "Gonubabu Gharepar" (Gonu Babu at Home)

10(a) Plot: Gonu Jha is "the craftiest of the crafty, exceptionally nimble and clever." He returns to his village after a long absence. Everyone asks, "Where had you gone?" He replies, "You could say, right here in the village." They are astonished. The real explanation is that in the months of Ashvin and Kartik people come seeking favours and provisions. To avoid them, Gonu had left home and the village. Even on his return he says, "You could say Gonu Babu was at home."

10(b) Place in the Gonu Jha tradition: Gonu Jha is a distinctive Maithili folk hero—cunning, satirical and keenly aware of his own interests. His counterparts in other traditions include Nasreddin Hodja (Turkish), Akaltam (Hebrew) and Birbal (Hindi). Kapari keeps this tradition alive.

The statement "You could say Gonu Babu was at home" has several levels of meaning: (a) literal—"I was here in the village"; (b) satirical—"I shall not tell you where I went"; (c) implied—"I fled the village to avoid people coming to ask for things." These three levels exemplify Kuntaka's vakrokti.

10(c) Social satire: "In these months even the storeroom of the grandest house ends up empty." This precisely depicts the financial squeeze of Ashvin and Kartik. Gonu Jha's cleverness is a strategy for living, funny yet grounded in reality. It reflects the economic cycle of rural Maithil society.

Overall Critical Evaluation

12(a) Distinctive Features of Kapari as a Storyteller

Preservation of Maithili in Its Authentic Form

Kapari's most distinctive contribution is to give literary dignity to the authentic Maithili of an alternative tradition. Words such as "labakaniya," "harharahi," "chhagunaae," "dhatpatae," "hapasi-lapakik," "pachhamuriya," "hathi-bardam," "ghaihar garju" and "hehar-thethar" might never have entered literary writing had Kapari not recorded them.

Reviving the Tradition of Animal Speech

The knowledge of animal language in "Lachhminiya Kaniya" and divine intelligence in "Hanuman Nam Smaranke Mahima" keep alive the ancient Pañcatantra–Jātaka tradition of Maithili folk narrative. That tradition had almost disappeared from modern Maithili storytelling.

Counter-Readings of Mythology

In "Yajna-Sita," Kapari questions the Rama–Sita relationship; in "Chhaunri-Sudyumna," he treats gender transformation; and in "Hay Ram!" he interrogates Rama's "maryada," or moral propriety. In these pieces he does not accept mythological narrative with closed eyes. His engagement is critical, and that is the basis of his modernity.

Skilful Use of Humour and Satire

"Gonubabu Gharepar," "Number," "Tap Aa Satsang" and "Hridaybasi Ishwar" all contain humour and satire. But the humour goes beyond simple amusement to philosophy and social commentary.

12(b) Limitations

(a) Length: Most tales are very short—roughly the size of a Facebook post—making profound character development difficult.

(b) Repetition: Many subjects recur, a consequence of insufficient editing.

(c) Range of subject matter: Most tales concern religious mythology or folk morality. There are very few stories grounded in contemporary social reality, like "Lachhminiya."

12(c) Place in the History of Maithili Folk Narrative

In the history of Maithili folk tales, Kapari is a rare figure in the Maithili tradition for making rural Maithili the medium of literary storytelling.

From the perspective of Videha parallel history: "What the Canon Left Out." Kapari's stories have been "left out" of mainstream Maithili literary history. A storyteller working in Maithili in Nepal did not find a place in a history centred on the Sahitya Akademi. Through this critical review Videha seeks to correct that injustice.

Dedicated to the writer: Parmeshwar Kapari, a true servant of the soil and water of Mithila.

Gajendra Thakur

Parmeshwar Kapari: A Critical Review of His Verse Compositions

(Including original compositions, translations and quoted verse)

Rasa–Dhvani–Vakrokti • Navya-Nyāya • Videha Parallel History

Introduction: The World of Parmeshwar Kapari's Poetry

Parmeshwar Kapari's collected writings reveal verse at several levels: his own poems; ghazals by other poets quoted in his criticism; children's songs; a translation from the Rigveda; Maithili renderings of Sanskrit verses; and various folk songs and phakṛās. These verse compositions fall into the following categories:

(a) Original Maithili dohas and independent short verses.

(b) The Maithili translation of the Rigveda's Nāsadīya Sūkta, "Tattvabodh."

(c) Maithili sense-translations of Sanskrit verses—from the Gītā, the Nāsadīya hymn and the Sītā-stotra.

(d) Children's songs: "Hamar Janakpurdham" and "Sita Avatar."

(e) Song-phakṛās from "Reṅ-Reṅ."

(f) A Hindi ghazal by Dhirendra Premarshi, together with Kapari's review.

(g) Maithili ghazals by Dr Rajendra Vimal, together with Kapari's detailed criticism.

(h) The narrative poem "Dam."

1. "Tattvabodh": A Maithili Translation of the Rigveda's Nāsadīya Sūkta

This is the most ambitious verse composition in the entire collection of materials. Kapari presents a Maithili translation, based on the Radhakrishnan–Moore volume, of the 129th hymn of the Rigveda's tenth maṇḍala—the "Nāsadīya Sūkta," which poses some of world literature's earliest philosophical questions about the mystery of creation.

1(a) The Passage in Verse

There was no one then nor even the lifeless no air
nor the sky above it /

What was concealed where?
under whose protection and was there a deep, immeasurable ocean?

There was as yet no death
nor was there immortal life /

It breathed in the airlessness apart from it there was nothing here.

In the beginning desire entered it with this thought it was the very first seed of creation.

Who knows with certainty?
Who will make it clear?
When was it born
and when was this creation made?

God alone knows this and perhaps even He does not know!

1(b) An Analysis of the Translator's Craft

The Rigvedic original, "nāsad āsīn no sad āsīt tadānīm" ("neither being nor non-being existed then"), describes the state before creation through negation: "Then there was neither existence nor non-existence." In Kapari's translation it becomes "There was no one then / nor even the lifeless." These short, broken lines are the marks not merely of translation but of re-creation.

In the original Sanskrit, "ānīd avātam svadhayā tad ekam" means that the One breathed, by its own power, without air. Kapari writes, "It breathed in the airlessness." This single line is poetry of the deepest oxymoron in Maithili. Breathing where there is no air: the very contradiction expresses the ineffability of what precedes creation.

1(c) Analysis of Rasa

Of the nine rasas described by Bharata Muni, adbhuta, the sentiment of wonder, pervades this poem. "It was the very first seed of creation" is the culmination of this wondrous rasa. Yet the last line—"God alone knows this / and perhaps even He does not know!"—transforms wonder into karuṇa: the pathos of not knowing.

1(d) A Navya-Nyāya Perspective

According to the principle of the "limits of the means of knowledge" (epistemological limits) associated here with Gaṅgeśa Upādhyāya, none of the four pramāṇas—perception, inference, comparison and verbal testimony—can supply knowledge of the state before creation. "Who knows with certainty?" Within this question, Navya-Nyāya's limit of cognition is itself suggested through Kapari's translation.

1(e) Analysis of Dhvani

In terms of Ānandavardhana's theory of dhvani, the poem has three levels of suggestion: (a) the literal, a description of the physical condition before creation; (b) the figurative, a depiction of human ignorance; and (c) philosophical resonance—"Even God may not know"—which is the deepest suggestion of agnosticism. Philosophical poetry of this order is extremely rare in Maithili literature.

1(f) The Videha Framework

This bold tradition of translating Vedic philosophy is rare in Maithili poetry. After Vidyapati, who built a bridge between Sanskrit and Avahaṭṭha, Kapari brings the Rigveda's most mysterious hymn into Maithili and initiates a new tradition. This is a significant chapter in Videha parallel history.

2. Original Dohas and Independent Verses

2(a) A Political Doha

> The bell rang; politics stirred to life.
> See how many parties died while still alive.

This doha is the finest poetic expression of Kapari's political satire. Two lines contain an entire satirical portrait.

"The bell rang"—the election bell. "Politics stirred to life"—renewed enthusiasm. "Died while still alive"—the moral death of political parties. The capacity of the doha lies precisely in gathering these three successive movements into only two lines.

Kuntaka's vakrokti appears in "died while still alive": death in the midst of life. That paradox compresses the collapse of political morality into a single image. In Nepal's political reality, a party does not "die while alive" simply because it loses an election, but because its soul has died. This is a distinguished example of the modern Maithili doha.

2(b) An Aphoristic Verse Based on a Proverb

A whole village full of healers—whose guidance shall we follow? This two-line, proverb-based verse was spoken in the context of Martyrs' Day. "A whole village full of healers" means everyone in the village considers himself an expert; "whose guidance shall we follow?" asks where direction is to be found.

Kapari uses this proverb in discussing political movements. Nepal has innumerable martyrs and leaders of "movements," but an absence of genuine leadership. This metaphorical application is an instance of poetic-political argument.

Bharata's Nāṭyaśāstra supplies the category of hāsya-rasa, the comic sentiment; but here the laughter is on the surface and the pathos lies within. This combination produces the rasa of "A whole village full of healers."

2(c) A Short Verse on the Mother

> There is no mother like a mother.
> There is no one like a mother.

In only six or seven words, the word māy ("mother") acquires limitless significance. This is poetry of the greatest brevity and the greatest emotional concentration. "There is no mother like a mother" expresses absolute uniqueness: no one can be compared with one's mother.

At the basis of karuṇa-rasa lies the height of tender parental love, vātsalya. What is described here as Bharata Muni's vātsalya as an enduring emotion, subsumed within karuṇa in Indian aesthetics, is condensed into these two lines. The verse was spoken on Mother's Day, but its truth transcends the occasion.

2(d) A Birthday Verse

> Today, on the day of breaking the Chhath fast, on Diwāti (Lakshmi Puja), is Mother's birthday.
> On the day of breaking the Chhath fast, of Chhathi Parameshwari, is Father's birthday.
> The names of both accord with their birthdays: Mother is Lakshmi because hers falls on Lakshmi Puja, and Father is Parmeshwar because his falls on the Chhath fast-breaking day.

A son, Kumar Bhaskar, offers his parents a birthday tribute. This composition is not by Kapari but by his son. The occasion involves a striking poetic coincidence: Lakshmi (the mother) and Parmeshwar (the father), their names corresponding to the festivals—her birth on Lakshmi Puja, his on the day of breaking the Chhath fast. Such poetry of coincidence has its own distinctive place in Maithili tradition.

3. Children's Songs: "Hamar Janakpurdham" (from Hamar Maithili Pothi, Class Three) and "Sita Avatar" (by Bhuvaneshwar Prasad "Adhyapak," from Maithili Bal Ramayan)

3(a) "Hamar Janakpurdham" ("Our Janakpur Dham")

The home of Lava and Kusha's maternal uncle—that is our Janakpur Dham.
Sita, through her ideals, made this land of Mithila sacred in name.
This capital of Janaka of Videha gave birth to many a sage.
The Maithili language is as sweet as honey;
those who speak it are proud Maithils.

This children's song is included in Hamar Maithili Pothi, Class Three. Kapari quotes it; the quotation itself bears witness to his concern for children's literature.

"The home of Lava and Kusha's maternal uncle": the poetic convention of calling Janakpur the maternal home of Lava and Kusha is an old one in Maithili. The song employs it naturally.

"The Maithili language is as sweet as honey": this simile is distinctive. The sweetness of sound is compared with the sweetness of food. This transposition across the senses is synaesthesia.

Rasa: vīra-rasa, the heroic sentiment. "Proud Maithils" awakens self-respect and plants the seed of courage in children's minds.

3(b) "Sita Avatar" ("The Incarnation of Sita"), by Bhuvaneshwar Prasad "Adhyapak," from Maithili Bal Ramayan

How did Sita take birth?
Listen: the tale is long.
When the night-roaming demons unleashed disorder,
all religious duties fell into ruin.

No rain fell upon Mithila;
then Janaka took the plough in his own hands.
The moment he began to till the earth,
she appeared from the soil.

A voice resounded through the sky—
the World-Mother had taken birth.
As the demons multiplied upon the earth,
she came to remove the world's burden.
Mother Earth bestowed on King Janaka a new gift;
the world could find release from pain, grief and sorrow.

Kapari quotes this children's song, and the choice is apt. "Sita Avatar" is an important song from the Maithili children's Ramayana, recounting, in a simple, accessible rhythm, the mythological account of Sita's birth associated with Ravana's vessel of blood.

"The moment he began to till the earth / she appeared from the soil": these are the finest two lines of the song. The distinctive Maithili expression dhatibhūmi means "appearing from the ground." Rhythm, rhyme and feeling are all held in balance.

The final quatrain—"A voice resounded through the sky"—acquires grandeur through its longer lines. Such rhythmic rise and fall keeps the children's song from becoming monotonous.

4. The Song-Phakṛā from "Reṅ-Reṅ"

The swollen-throated boaster, the chameleon-like fellow, the leaping frog, the mouse as palanquin bearer—
the wedding procession is dressed and ready!

The one who makes the world laugh, who knocks off his father's turban, the unruly little rat goes to wed—
and the procession sets off to the cat's house!

4(a) The Nature of the Phakṛā

This is a song-phakṛā from the play "Reṅ-Reṅ." The Maithili phakṛā tradition is a distinctive type of folk song in which animal characters satirise human society.

4(b) An Analysis of Symbols

"Swollen-throated boaster" suggests the politician's self-praise. "Chameleon-like fellow" is the politician who changes colours. "Leaping frog" denotes an opportunist. "The mouse as palanquin bearer"—a procession of mice heading to a cat's house—is traditional Maithili burlesque.

"One who knocks off his father's turban" is someone who destroys his father's honour. "The unruly little rat goes to wed" evokes a disorderly marriage bond. "The procession sets off to the cat's house": the wedding party arriving at the cat's door is the height of comic rasa.

4(c) Connections with Folk-Theatre Traditions

In Maithili folk theatre there is a naṭuā tradition of wearing animal masks to satirise society, and the roots of this phakṛā are connected with it. Kapari revives that old tradition in the setting of contemporary political theatre.

5. Dhirendra Premarshi's Hindi Ghazal, with Kapari's Readerly Review

5(a) The Text of the Ghazal

Be patient, my friend put off your needs, my friend.
Happiness walks beside sorrow;
move with the times, my friend.

Whatever God has given you, preserve it, my friend.
What use is resentment?
Drive it from your mind, my friend.

In losing yourself, examine the self within yourself, my friend.
Plunge into love and become wealthy beyond measure, my friend.

If you would become a "Premarshi," keep your heart aflame, my friend.

5(b) Kapari's Critical Perspective: A Piece of Poetic Prose in Its Own Right

The "reader's perplexity" Kapari recorded after reading this ghazal is itself a piece of poetic prose. His first reaction was: "The moment I stepped into the third line, my disillusionment soured my mind—good heavens, this is a Hindi ghazal!" That is a natural response from someone devoted to Maithili.

But Kapari then acknowledges his own narrowness and looks at the ghazal objectively: "When we examine and grasp the totality of the linguistic and literary grace of his composition, we must concede that, through this poem, his command of language and the structure of the ghazal are distinctive and pleasing." This self-correction demonstrates Kapari's honesty as a critic.

5(c) A Poetic Analysis of the Ghazal

"Happiness walks beside sorrow": this couplet is connected with the Sufi concept of fanā, the dissolution of the self. Happiness and grief are opposites, yet companions. Such paradoxical beauty belongs to the essential spirit of the Urdu ghazal.

"In losing yourself, examine / the self within yourself": seeking khudī (the self) within bekhudī (self-loss) is the Sufi method of self-realisation. It is appropriate for Kapari to place Premarshi within the tradition of Mirabai, Kabir and Rahim.

Kapari's comparative observation—"In him one sees a great deal of the consciousness of an age and the purity of mind associated with Mirabai, Tulsidas and Surdas"—is an outstanding example of Maithili criticism.

6. Dr Rajendra Vimal's Maithili Ghazals: Kapari's Detailed Review

6(a) Ghazal 1: A Call to Revolution

Link arm with arm, raise your voice with force.
He has stolen our bread; tear open his belly.

He makes us deaf and goes on biting; do not worship him.
Seize him by the neck; take a sword in your hand.

The one who drank my blood—I shall spill his blood.
Let flames spread through every drop of our own blood.

To slay Ravana is righteousness; the Lanka of sin will burn.
Beat the drums and plant the banner of dharma.

I shall go on chanting amid the tumult of words, Vimal.
Arrange and adorn the Diwali of awakened consciousness.

Critical Review

Kapari describes this ghazal as "very aggressive and explosive," and the description is accurate. "Seize him by the neck; take a sword in your hand" is the culmination of raudra-rasa, the furious sentiment. Bharata Muni identifies anger as the enduring emotion of raudra, and it is powerfully present in this couplet.

"He has stolen our bread" opens a discussion of exploitation. "Tear open his belly" expresses metaphorical revenge: it is not a literal call to violence but a poetic demand for justice. In terms of vakrokti, "plant the banner of dharma" turns resistance into a righteous war; that is its oblique symbolic system.

6(b) Ghazal 2: "Mar Sar Dogalake" ("Strike Down the Two-Faced Scoundrels"): A Satirical Ghazal

Bang, bang, the shots ring out: strike down the two-faced scoundrels.
Here is the command being given: strike down the two-faced scoundrels.

They will not spare your fields, homes, daughters or daughters-in-law.
They come under cover: strike down the two-faced scoundrels.

Generation after generation, they have only slit your throats.
Here is a gang of throat-cutters: strike down the two-faced scoundrels.

In this ghazal, "strike down the two-faced scoundrels" is the same radīf, or refrain, in all five units; this technique of repetition intensifies raudra-rasa. "Fields, homes, daughters and daughters-in-law" means everything in life: exploitation that devours all. Gheṅṭ-kaṭṭā ṭolī, a gang of throat-cutters, is a distinctive Maithili term of abuse. Its use in poetry is an audacious linguistic experiment.

6(c) Ghazal 3: "Chhai Kon Lokak Basti" ("Whose Settlement Is This?")

Whose settlement is this? Everyone here lies wounded.
Every head is under lock, and every tongue has been cut out.

People move here hanging together on a gallows.
What city is this, where people hang themselves of their own will?

The constitution changes daily, like a sex worker's new skirt.
My mother's garment, even today, is still torn.

This is Vimal's finest ghazal. "A settlement where everyone lies wounded" makes a remarkable opening couplet, or matla. "Heads under lock, tongues cut out" is a metaphor for intellectual and verbal enslavement. "People moving in groups, hanging from the gallows" introduces an image of crucifixion that is new to modern Maithili ghazal writing.

"The constitution changes daily, like a sex worker's new skirt": the comparison between the constitution and a sex worker is profoundly controversial, but poetically forceful. "My mother's garment is still torn" becomes a personal and universal image of poverty, and it is this that gives Vimal his stature.

6(d) Ghazal 4: "Takhane Diwali Thik" ("Only Then Is It Diwali")

When the whole creation shines, only then is it Diwali.
When the lamp of consciousness burns, only then is it Diwali.

Make the old and worn-out things objects of open ridicule.
When a new lamp burns every moment, only then is it Diwali.

Architects of darkness, beware! Beware!
When rocket-bombs fly into battle, only then is it Diwali.

In this ghazal, "only then is it Diwali" is the radīf: each couplet places a new condition upon the celebration of Diwali. "The lamp of consciousness" signifies intellectual awakening. Hukkālōlī, a folk-language word for open mockery, is rare in a ghazal; its presence brings the vernacular into contact with the Urdu ghazal tradition.

"When rocket-bombs fly into battle, only then is it Diwali": the image of exploding bombs within Diwali's festival of joy is the most oblique expression in the work. Warning the "architects of darkness" is a poetic appeal to revolutionary consciousness.

6(e) Ghazal 5: "Inkilab Gaganme" ("Revolution in the Sky")

Who writes "revolution" and hangs it across the sky?
Who colours earth and heaven with blood?

Who has murdered my poetry of moons and stars?
Who searches for a book of hatred in life?
Rather than starve, people choose to die by bullets.
Knowing this truth, they choose death itself.

"Who writes 'revolution' and hangs it across the sky?" is an opening couplet to remember in the history of Maithili ghazals. "Who colours earth and heaven with blood?" gives an image of sky and earth dyed in blood: a high point of revolutionary poetry.

"The murder of poetry" personifies poetry as a living creature and levels an accusation of its killing—a rare personification in modern Maithili verse. "Rather than starve, people choose to die by bullets" is brutal realism: it speaks of the tragedy of poverty without embellishment. It is a great poetic utterance.

What Parmeshwar Kapari calls a ghazal collection—Rajendra Vimal's Suryastas Se Pahine ("Before Sunset")—is in fact a song collection. A ghazal is a distinct literary form, just like the doha, kuṇḍaliyā and rolā; neither Rajendra Vimal nor Dhirendra Premarshi has mastered it. Now consider this so-called children's ghazal from Rajendra Vimal's collection:

Come, sir!
Have some dates!
You are the master;
I am the labourer.
The liquor of power
is smashed to pieces.
You are my servant,
yet I am kept at a distance.
You deceive me
and glare at me.
For five whole years
you whisper into my ears.
Now you come again;
I will seize you and thrash you.
The poor person's heart
will never find fulfilment.
In a honking car, go on your tour.
The ballot box
will leave you with a hole.
Come, O politician!
I shall certainly come.

Then I shall charge straight at you with a blow from a stick.
Come, O Crow
Come, O crow, come—come—come!
Fly here, fly here; run here, run here!
Come, little bird, come flying here!
Dance for my little child and let us see.
Come, O parrot, come—come—come!
Come, O myna, come—come—come!
Parrot and myna, fly, fly here!
Peck the mango creeper and bring its fruit down.
The myna came, all grey-feathered.
The parrot came, all green.
It knocked down a dark jamun fruit.
The child spread out a little cloth bag.
My Little Granddaughter
This little granddaughter of mine is a light of joy and happiness.
She will eat parathas and bread, and will find no fault with anyone.
Though very small to look at,
she speaks with playful boldness.
Quick to play, quick to cry;
when she laughs, she is pearls and diamonds.
She plays digital games and with toys, with the little pieces called "touch" and "click."

This could be a good children's song, but it is not a children's ghazal.

7. Maithili Sense-Translations of Sanskrit Verses

7(a) A Verse from the Gītā: "Pitāham Asya Jagato" (Composition No. 86)

Original Sanskrit: "पिता हमस्य जगतो माता धाता पितामहः। वेद्यं पवित्र ओंकार ऋक्सामयजुरेव ॐ।" — "I am the father of this universe, its mother, sustainer and grandsire; I am what is to be known, the holy syllable Om, and the Ṛg, Sāma and Yajur Vedas."

Maithili sense-translation: "I alone am the sustainer of the entire universe —that is, the one who bears and nourishes it and gives the fruits of all actions—and its father, mother and grandfather; I also am the sacred Om that must be known, and the Rigveda, Samaveda and Yajurveda!"

Kapari's method of translation: Sanskrit brevity, in which one verse embraces a universal truth, is expanded and explained in Maithili. "The one who bears and nourishes"—his rendering of dhātā—embraces all three meanings attributed to the word: creator, sustainer and giver of the fruits of action.

7(b) A Hymn to Sita: "Tvaṁ Vidyā Paramā Trailokya Jananī"

> Original Sanskrit: "त्वं विद्या परमात्रैलोक्य जननी स्वर्गापवर्ग दायिनी। त्रैलोक्या कर्षणी देवी सीता देवी नमस्तुते।" — "You are supreme knowledge, mother of the three worlds, bestower of heaven and liberation; goddess Sita, who draws the three worlds to you, I bow before you."

Maithili sense-translation: "You are supreme knowledge, the highest Mother of all three worlds. You are the giver of heaven and of other exalted realms. You are the centre of attraction for all three worlds. O Sita, I bow to you!"

"Tvaṁ vidyā"—"You are ... supreme knowledge"—is a direct Sanskrit statement of identity, expanded in Maithili. "Trailokyākarṣiṇī" means "she who draws the three worlds," with the sense of magnetic power. Kapari makes this difficult expression accessible through the simple Maithili phrase "centre of attraction."

7(c) Nārada's Words: A Sense-Translation of a Sanskrit Verse

> Original Sanskrit: "धर्माधर्म विवेकेन वेदमार्गानुसारिणी। सर्वलोकहितासक्ताः साधवः परिकीर्तिताः" — Nārada, 16 (29–31). English: "Those who discriminate between right and wrong, follow the Vedic path and devote themselves to the welfare of all beings are called virtuous persons."

Maithili sense-translation: "A person who distinguishes between dharma and adharma and follows the path taught by the Vedas is called a sādhu."

This rendering clarifies Kapari's translation principle: he does not translate word for word. He does not immediately expand "sarvalokahitāsaktāḥ," "devoted to the welfare of all people," because his purpose is to make the meaning of the term sādhu clear to Maithili readers, and that purpose has been fulfilled.

7(d) The Gaṅgāsāgara Hymn (Purāṇa)

> Original Sanskrit: "गङ्गाद्याः सरितः सर्वाधिक स्त्रिषु लोकेषु विश्रुता। ता सर्वा अनपायिन्यो गङ्गसागर मण्डलले।" — "The rivers beginning with the Ganga, renowned in the three worlds, are all abiding in the Gaṅgāsāgara region."

Maithili sense-translation: "O Parvati! All the supremely sacred rivers, beginning with the Ganga, renowned throughout the three worlds, dwell perpetually in the Gaṅgāsāgara pond of holy Mithila!"

Kapari quotes this verse to establish the mythological importance of Janakpur's Gaṅgāsāgara pond. He translates "anapāyinyaḥ," which he glosses as "flowing continuously," as "dwelling perpetually." The extension of meaning from "flowing" to "dwelling" is remarkable. The river does not flow; it dwells. This is translation as creation.

8. Suresh Pandit's Hanuman Chalisa and "Dam," a Narrative Poem (in Sakshi), Presented by Parmeshwar Kapari: A Detailed Analysis of Verse

"Dam" (in Sakshi, dedicated to the Vidyapati Seva Sansthan, 2012) is a metrical narrative poem already analysed as a complete story. Here only some significant lines are considered from the standpoint of poetic craftsmanship:

> There was a certain Lambodar Babu, whose belly was always empty.
> He would not lift a finger at work, yet would devour a full plate at once.

"Khattē" ("empty" or "hungry") and "turtē" ("immediately") make an exact rhyme. "He would not even strike a fly in the name of work" is a humorous idiom meaning that he would do no work at all.

> But one day, when he happened to meet someone, the king's order came.
> The preparations for battle were made: "Take the enemy's life!"

"Sājal gel saṅgrām-sāj" ("the battle preparations were arranged") employs alliteration within a single line, repeating the sounds s and j. It displays an awareness of metre and sonic pattern.

> The very same bread played its trick and took the tiger's life.
> Life ebbs away with ease—thus Lambodar is great.

The closing line, "thus Lambodar is great," confers greatness ironically. Such irony is characteristic of Kapari's humorous and satirical style. "Dam" is a long poem, but its narrative element predominates.

Likewise, writing about Suresh Pandit's Hanuman Chalisa, Parmeshwar Kapari says: "Children are mischievous troublemakers, of course; there is no shortage of laughter and joking in their literature either. And Suresh Pandit's Hanuman Chalisa, although somewhat older, remains extraordinary and entertaining." Its opening lines are:

> Victory to Hanuman, ocean of knowledge and virtue.
> Mummy laughs; Father cries.

9. Overall Assessment: Kapari's Identity as a Poet

9(a) Strengths

(a) Philosophical depth: His Rigvedic translation is unprecedented in Maithili poetry, giving poetic expression to agnosticism.

(b) A living use of folk-poetic traditions: The phakṛā and proverb-based short verse are rooted in Maithili's own cultural soil.

(c) Creative translation: In his Maithili sense-translations of Sanskrit verses, "creative freedom" makes translation a form of re-creation.

(d) Poet-critic: His remarks on Premarshi's free-form Hindi ghazal and Rajendra Vimal's song collection, published as a ghazal collection, are themselves pieces of poetic prose.

(e) Political satirical verse: The doha "The bell rang" is a distinguished example of the modern Maithili doha.

9(b) Limitations

(a) Very little verse is his own: most of the poems are by other poets—Vimal, Premarshi and "Adhyapak"—whose work Kapari reviews.

(b) An absence of substantial original long poems.

(c) Imagery: Kapari's images belong primarily to the folk-narrative tradition; there is little creation of grand modern images.

9(c) His Place in Videha Parallel History

Parmeshwar Kapari is first and foremost a storyteller and playwright, and only secondarily a critic-poet. Nevertheless, his Rigvedic translation ("Tattvabodh"), his political dohas and his phakṛā from "Reṅ-Reṅ" constitute noteworthy contributions to the history of Maithili verse. Videha parallel history—"What the Canon Left Out"—accords this poet, critic and translator the recognition he deserves.

Gajendra Thakur

The Literary World of Parmeshwar Kapari: An Extended Review of His Maithili Writings

Introduction: Parmeshwar Kapari and the Range of His Literary Work

Parmeshwar Kapari has produced more than 600 pieces: folk tales, narratives, mythological stories, satire, cultural essays, discussions of language, autobiographical episodes, debates over prizes, political commentaries and theatrical criticism. Together they constitute a vast and many-sided body of writing. From the standpoint of the Videha parallel-history framework, Kapari belongs among the "left-out" Maithili writers whom mainstream literary institutions have largely neglected.

This review undertakes a detailed analysis of each of his literary genres through four approaches: Indian aesthetics of rasa, dhvani and vakrokti; Western critical theory; Gaṅgeśa Upādhyāya's Navya-Nyāya epistemology; and the Videha framework of parallel literary history.

Part One: Folk Tales and Folk Narratives

1.1 "Hanuman Nam Smaranke Mahima": This work belongs to the unalloyed tradition of Maithili folk narrative. Kapari recounts the episode involving Ravana, Hanuman and the nine planetary deities in his distinctive bajaiyā-bol, the language as people actually speak it. The story is written in conversational Maithili.

Analysis of rasa: Bhakti-rasa predominates. Hanuman's compassion, shown in his pity for the nine planetary deities; his heroism in burning Ravana's Lanka; and his devotion as a servant of Rama are beautifully combined. In Ānandavardhana's theory of dhvani, Hanuman's statement that he has "no need to ask for a boon" suggests a deeper meaning: divine grace comes not from asking but from surrendering oneself. From a Navya-Nyāya perspective, the promise made by the nine deities is āpta-vākya, authoritative testimony, as understood through Gaṅgeśa's conception of knowledge acquired from words. An authentic speaker's testimony has validity in Navya-Nyāya, and Kapari renders this philosophical idea accessible through a folk tale. In the Videha framework, this version of the Ramayana tradition places the liberation of the nine planetary deities, rather than Rama and Hanuman alone, at its centre; it expresses Mithila's own perspective. The Hanuman of the people, rather than the Brahmanical mainstream, is an important part of Videha parallel history.

1.2 "Lachhminiya Kaniya": This is among the finest examples of Maithili folk narrative. A linked sequence of an old man, an old woman, their daughter-in-law, a jackal, a crow and a snake tells of an intelligent woman's courage and ingenuity, followed by a reconciliation within the family. The language is particularly notable: labakaniyā, haṛhaṛahī khaṭbanarī, piṭhiyā-ṭhok dhamakkā, naṅṭiniyā rakamasanī and dhīpal āig-bāul are treasures of spoken Maithili. Kapari confers literary dignity on such expressions; this is his greatest contribution. As for rasa, the narrative moves successfully from bhayānaka, the fearful sentiment when the young wife goes to the river at night, to hāsya, the comedy of the old woman's anger and misunderstanding, and finally to śānta, the tranquillity of familial reconciliation. The work can be understood through Bharata's threefold structure of vibhāva, anubhāva and vyabhicārī-bhāva. In Kuntaka's terms, "giving the corpse to the jackal to eat" is its most oblique expression. The daughter-in-law is neither an eater of corpses nor a witch; she is a courageous woman free of greed. Yet her mother-in-law sees everything in a distorted light. This reversal is the very substance of vakrokti. From a feminist perspective, the daughter-in-law knows no witchcraft and is no witch. She is a brave, competent woman who accomplishes the impossible for her family's well-being. Such an image of women's strength is exceptional in Maithili folk narrative.

1.3 "Yajna-Sita": This is Kapari's most daring, controversial and philosophical work. Golden images of Sita made for a sacrifice come alive and demand acknowledgement from Rama—a rare act of imaginative courage in Maithili writing. In this reinterpretation of myth, Kapari questions Rama's observance of the ideal of taking only one wife. The sacrificial Sita asks, "Then why will you not accept me?" This line inaugurates a new discussion of women's rights in Maithili literature. From a Navya-Nyāya perspective, Gaṅgeśa's notion of vyāpti, or invariable concomitance, provides the terms of the argument: anyone who participates in the sacrificial rite possesses the rights of a partner or consort. Rama accepts this logical connection but offers an alternative: these Sitas will love Krishna as gopis in the Dvapara age. The philosophical resolution is distinguished. At the level of suggestion, the final sentence—"All those sacrificial Sitas became gopis in Braj"—conveys an important cultural message: every neglected woman ultimately finds liberation.

1.4 "Punyatma Bau Prasang": This is Kapari's most moving autobiographical piece. The account of a son's last moments with his dying father is an instance of emotional intensity in Maithili prose. Its living idiom includes "when I carried the grandson around," chhaṭpaṭāichhai and baṛīkālē—expressions from Maithili's own vocabulary that touch the heart directly. The father's remark, "Even at the time of death a wave of this sort of restlessness comes over one," expresses affection through extraordinary humour at the brink of death. In the terms attributed here to Abhinavagupta's account of the ultimate resolution of pathos, the father's death brings compassion to its height and teaches the son that "the emotional meaning of the word 'father' cannot be found in a dictionary!" This sentence deserves a place among the most memorable expressions in Indian writing. In the "Bau" episode, the writer spends his father's final days worrying about his own promotion; acknowledging this human weakness is a mark of realist literature.

1.5 "Limmaviniya Kaviniya": A folk tale of a daughter-in-law who understands the speech of animals—a jackal, a crow and a snake—this is a fine example of the Maithili bīhani kathā, or seed-story tradition. Kapari brings about a remarkable conjunction of animal-language studies (zoolinguistics) and folk tradition.

Part Two: Mythological and Philosophical Essays

2.1 "Tattvabodh," a Primordial Poem: This is a Maithili translation and re-creation of the Rigveda's Nāsadīya Sūkta (10.129). "There was no one then / nor even the lifeless / no air / nor the sky above it": these lines represent a philosophical high point in Maithili poetry. Within Indian philosophical tradition, the Nāsadīya Sūkta is among the most profound enquiries into the mystery of creation. Kapari makes it available to Maithili readers. "God alone knows this / and perhaps even He does not know!": the last line expresses the essence of agnosticism in Indian thought. From the perspective of Navya-Nyāya, both perception and inference, in Gaṅgeśa's account, are insufficient for knowledge of creation; this is the hymn's suggested meaning. "Who knows with certainty?" acknowledges the limits of the valid means of knowledge.

2.2 "Puranokta Paribhasha" ("Definitions from the Purāṇas"): Kapari explains in Maithili five concepts quoted from the Nārada Smṛti: truth, dharma, non-violence, falsehood and the virtuous person. The incorporation of Nārada's verse—"Those who distinguish dharma from adharma, follow the Vedic path and devote themselves to the welfare of all are called sādhus"—is appropriate. This work demonstrates Kapari's learning: he is not merely a teller of folk tales but also a scholar of classical tradition. Within the Videha framework, this bringing together of śāstric learning and folk tradition is one of his defining characteristics.

2.3 "Chhinnamasta Bhagavatīk Tāntrik Svarūp" ("The Tantric Form of the Goddess Chhinnamasta"): This is Kapari's most scholarly work. His Tantric interpretation of Chhinnamasta through Mithila painting, and the philosophical account it offers of creation, destruction and renewal, are exceptionally profound. "The interaction between light and sound becomes so violent and powerful that the relationship of the created thing with its creator is severed at a stroke": this sentence touches the essence of Indian Tantric philosophy. "Until the umbilical cord between a mother and child is cut, the newborn cannot enter into independent existence": this biological metaphor explains the Tantric symbolism of Chhinnamasta in a distinctive way. Kapari approaches the Tantric foundations of Mithila painting scientifically and philosophically. Such writing is rare in Maithili literature.

2.4 "Ayurveda and Dhanteras": The account of Brahma's creation of Ayurveda, its three foundational aphorisms, the Ātreya and Dhanvantari traditions, and the churning of the Ocean of Milk demonstrates Kapari's classical knowledge. His threefold classification—"Til Sankranti is a festival of the mind," "Phagua is a festival of the mind," and "Durga Puja is a festival of the soul"—discloses his philosophical perspective.

2.5 "Marriage Rites and Rights": Kapari offers a learned philosophical interpretation of the derivation of the word marriage from vi + ava + hāra, alongside the practices of kanyādāna, pāṇigrahaṇa and the sacred fire rite. The final sentence—"Ever since income and rights entered marriage, life has become a burden and a whirlpool"—is a satirical comment on modern debate over marriage.

Part Three: Cultural Essays and Commentary on Contemporary Life

3.1 "Bharu Ki Moru?!" ("Indian Rupees or My Rupees?!"): This is a distinguished example of Kapari's cultural-historical essays. Exploring the meanings of bhāru, the Indian rupee, and nēru, the Nepali rupee, he invites a rethinking of Maithili literary history through Vidyapati's life and Mahendra Malangia's position between Nepal and India. "Vidyapati came to Nepal, established a home and household, dug ponds and wells, completed his life's work and spent the rest of his life and died here—yet is he still 'bhāru'?" This question touches the heart of literary nationalism in Maithili. Kapari favours establishing Nepal's Maithili identity as independent and self-respecting. In the episode concerning Mahendra Malangia's Guinness Book certificate, he raises another important question: if Malangia is called a master of theatre, why should it be wrong to call him "a Maithili playwright of Nepal"? This is a debate over Maithili-Nepali political identity.

3.2 "Maithili Folk Theatre": Kapari's essay on Maithili folk drama is an important document in Maithili theatre history. "Maithili culture possesses its various parts and resources—folk language, folk dance and theatre, songs and ballads": this statement expresses a holistic view of Maithili culture.

In his description of the village of "Parbaha," the derivation from "parbāh ahā" ("you care") is interesting and culturally significant. Whoever cares for his language, literature, culture and theatre is a parbāhā. This piece of wordplay displays Kapari's linguistic consciousness.

3.3 "Victory to the People's Language, Maithili!": This is a prime example of Kapari's thinking about language. "The language of the Vedas and Purāṇas, of religion, philosophy, art and science—the speech of the gods—became so tightly knotted and inaccessible that it died": this offers a sociological explanation of the decline of Sanskrit. Kapari sees the future of Maithili as a language of the people, not as babhan-bhāṣā, the Brahminical standard variety. In this piece he subtly satirises Dr Ramavatar Yadav's "Standard Maithili" movement through the phrase "the stiff, affected Brahmin language." In the Videha parallel-history framework, this is an important argument: Maithili should remain a people's language rather than become the exclusive possession of pundits and scholars.

3.4 "Sitasakhi Gangasagar": Kapari depicts the deterioration of the Gangasagar pond in Janakpur through a mythological fantasy. Gangasagar "takes the form of a wizened old woman" and goes to the Mahakumbh; this symbolic invention is remarkable. There, confronted with the purity of the Ganga's water, she feels ashamed of herself and curses the residents of Janakpur. The satire comments on neglect by the city and its municipal authorities.

Part Four: Satirical Writing

4.1 "Ehanē Janakpur?" ("Is This What Janakpur Has Become?"): This satire concerns the dilapidated roads of Janakpur Sub-Metropolitan City, the breeding of mosquitoes and the indifference of its leaders. Kapari writes: "In Ward No. 16, Pulchowk, of the great sub-metropolitan municipality, back in the year 2051 … during the difficult tenure of Biltu Pajiyar … a mud road was somehow constructed; in the thirty years since then, not a single trailer-load of earth has been laid on it." Such writing is an outstanding example of local journalism. "So, O Janakpur, should we imagine the ghee of a development called Surdas rolling about on a leaf?" The idiom "Surdas's ghee" is a jewel of Maithili satire. The ghee of development, invisible to the blind, becomes a singular satire of negative politics.

4.2 The Series of Political Satires: Kapari's sequences "Hagna-Padna," "Dhoti-Gamchha" and "Bagariya-Sanghatiya" are written as imaginary dialogues. Their satire of Nepali politics—the Gen-Z movement, the decline of Madheshi parties, Balen Shah, Upendra Yadav and K. P. Oli—is pointed and precise.

Linguistic plurality: These dialogues vividly bring out Nepal's multilingual reality. "Look, the point is that his lady from Kathmandu, that madam …": this mixture of languages, or code-mixing, is an important feature of Kapari's literary style.

From the perspective of satirical rasa, Bharata Muni describes six kinds of laughter within hāsya: self-directed, directed at others, shared or mutual, decorous, indecorous and ordinary. Kapari's political satire belongs to the category directed at others; it laughs at the folly and frailty of other people. Its object is not merely entertainment, but social awakening.

4.3 "Janakpur Municipality: A Discussion": Kapari's satire surrounding the release of two books by Rambharos Kapari "Bhramar" exemplifies his fearless critical outlook. "Being yourself the chairperson of the Madhesh Academy, why did you hold the launch at the Maithili Development Fund?" This question strikes directly at the institutional politics of Maithili literature. The piece brings out a significant aspect of Kapari's personality: he speaks forthrightly against institutional corruption and opportunism. "People have lost the courage to speak the truth" (Arun Arya's observation) aptly describes the environment to which Kapari responds.

Part Five: Literary Reviews and the Practice of Criticism

5.1 "A Reader's Perplexity over Dhirendra Premarshi's Hindi Ghazal": This is Kapari's finest piece of critical writing. On reading Premarshi's Hindi ghazal, his first response—"Good heavens, this is a Hindi ghazal!"—demonstrates a Maithili writer's linguistic commitment. Yet Kapari evaluates the ghazal with a wider vision: "When we look at and grasp the overall literary and linguistic grace of his composition, it must be conceded that his flow of language and his structural arrangement of the ghazal are distinctive and pleasing." This is a model of impartial criticism.

A principle of criticism: "A review of any work can become a clear and reasoned assessment only when it is undertaken without infatuation, with impartial feeling and a generous perspective." This sentence sums up Kapari's philosophy of criticism. A vision free of attachment and prejudice is extremely rare in Maithili reviewing.

5.2 "The Revolutionary Temper and Tone of Dr Vimal's Ghazals"

This is Kapari's most extensive piece of criticism. He makes a comprehensive evaluation of all three dimensions of Dr Rajendra Vimal's ghazals: their ideological stance, linguistic strength and revolutionary energy.

"Linking arm with arm, raise your voice with force / He has stolen our bread; tear open his belly."

Kapari comments on this couplet: "His anger here is extremely aggressive and explosive." This is a finely judged critical observation. Kapari makes implicit use of the Indian critical tradition's understanding of how rasa is produced.

A particularly important feature of Kapari's study of Vimal is its idea of the "ideological ghazal." Kapari says that Vimal's poems are filled with "social and cultural consciousness, values of life, devotion to one's own culture, and a strong resonance of commitment to ordinary people." This is the quality that transforms an ordinary ghazal into a "great ghazal."

Part Six: Autobiographical and Reminiscence Writing

6.1 "Even in My House, Maithili Is Highly Honoured": The episode of sarāin. Kapari calls his wife sarāin, a new feminine formation from sar. This linguistic invention is a distinctively Maithili example. "Just as the feminine of 'master' is masterani, so the feminine of 'doctor' is doctorani, and of 'lion' is lioness!" Such unpretentious humour reveals Kapari's personality. The piece also shows the sweetness of domestic life: "The mother of my child, grinding the mixture for adauri while singing jantsari songs." This is an exceptional record of rural life in Maithili prose.

6.2 "Women of Former Times … Grinding the Mixture for Adauri": This short composition compares women of earlier and later generations: the textured, carefully worked traditional designs against "fancy decoration." It is a touching comment on cultural change. "The mother of my child, grinding the paste for adauri and the gram-flour mixture for tisiauri, singing songs at the hand-mill": this picture deserves a place among the finest prose-poems in Maithili.

6.3 Birthdays of Children, Parents and Grandchildren: "Even when a sugar sweet is crooked, it tastes sweet all the same!" This saying of Kapari's elder sister is a fine example of folk wisdom. "What is little is little even in the womb!" His explanation of why the child Prabhu was named "Prithu," after King Prithu, reveals his awareness of tradition.

6.4 "The Development of Janakpurdham": Kapari writes continually about the Martyrs' Day of the Mithila movement, the deterioration of Janakpur Sub-Metropolitan City, the Parbaha festival and related matters. These writings exemplify social commitment. "May Mithila's martyrs live for ever!" is not merely a slogan but Kapari's philosophy of life. He has served as a coordinator of the Mithila State Struggle Committee, and this commitment is visible throughout his literature.

Part Seven: Theatrical Debate and Thought about the Stage

7.1 The Play "Reṅ-Reṅ": Ayodhyanath Chaudhary's response after reading "Reṅ-Reṅ"—"Colours and lines have a philosophy and psychology of their own"—attempts to connect the aesthetics of Mithila painting with theatrical craftsmanship. "This is not merely women's kachni-bharni line work; it is exalted by all the energy and impulse of modern pictorial art."

The comment places "Reṅ-Reṅ" at the meeting point of visual and dramatic arts.

7.2 The Development of Maithili Theatre

Kapari's writings on the Virat Maithili Dramatic Arts Council, the Janakpurdham International Theatre Festival and the Parbaha Cultural Festival are contemporary records of Maithili theatre history. He is not merely a spectator but an active participant and critic.

One important theatrical observation of Kapari's is that "Janakpur has many male and female actors, but lacks the principal tendencies of modern global theatre—stage philosophy, dramatic consciousness and artistic movements." This diagnosis is precise.

7.3 The Play "Tatkal Darshan": The discussion of the play's subject and technique and the publication of an English review by Dr Virendra Pandey illustrate the satisfaction of seeing Kapari's theatrical writing recognised internationally. Kapari emphasises "the play's substance, craftsmanship and stage technology, together with the practical arrangements for its performance." He is a practical theatre worker, not merely a theorist.

Part Eight: Historical and Mythological Narratives

8.1 "Alha-Rudal": This tale of the five Pandava brothers taking birth in the Kali age as Alha, Rudal, Brahmanand, Lakhan and Vir Malkhan is a beautiful union of mythology and folk ballad. Krishna fulfils Yudhishthira's frustrated wish—"Why was I unable to kill even one Kaurava in the Mahabharata?"—in the Kali age. The story gives the Maithili folk-ballad tradition a philosophical foundation. The cosmic context of the Alha-Rudal oral tradition, the rebirth of the Pandavas, lifts it above mere entertainment.

8.2 "Sitasakhi Gangasagar": A remarkable combination of mythological fantasy and contemporary social satire. The Gangasagar pond is personified as a "wizened old woman" who goes to the Mahakumbh. This is an excellent Maithili example of personification.

Part Nine: Children's Literature and Children's Songs

9.1 "Children's Folk Literature Overflowing with Joy and Entertainment": Kapari underscores the importance of Maithili folk literature for children. "This inexhaustible and priceless natural wealth will never grow stale": the observation reveals his serious attitude to children's literature. A play-song for Roshan Janakpuri's grandchild—"Hey, little scatterbrain, hey, little scatterbrain! / Why did you interrupt?"—displays the rhythms and playful nonsense that characterise Maithili songs for children, which Kapari seeks to preserve.

9.2 The Song-Phakṛā Tradition: The folk-song refrain from "Reṅ-Reṅ," with its comic swollen-throated speaker, brings the cultural energy of the play to life through folk style. Kapari incorporates the folk-song tradition into modern dramatic writing.

Part Ten: Overall Critical Assessment

10.1 The Writer's Strengths: The greatest strength of Parmeshwar Kapari's body of writing is the authenticity and vitality of his Maithili. Words such as labakaniyā, haṛhaṛahī, dhatpatāe, chhagunāe, hapasi-lapaki and kutharait-batharait testify to the language's living tradition. His second strength is courage and forthrightness. Whether in political satire, criticism of literary institutions or opposition to corruption, Kapari has never yielded to the lure of superficial popularity. His third strength is versatility. He moves easily across folk narrative, mythological storytelling, satire, autobiographical scenes, literary reviews, plays and philosophical essays.

10.2 Limitations and Points of Criticism: (a) Constraints of social-media writing. Many pieces were originally written as Facebook posts. The limitations of this medium—brevity and immediacy—sometimes restrict the depth of their subject matter. Kapari's talent could develop further in extended essays and research articles. (b) Personal attacks in satire. At times the satire descends to the personal level; criticism of Rambharos Kapari "Bhramar" and remarks about other writers occasionally take the shape of personal controversies rather than literary criticism. (c) Repetitiveness. Certain subjects—the Gen-Z movement or the struggle over the Maithili language—recur again and again. His creative range could expand still further.

10.3 Place in Videha Parallel History: Parmeshwar Kapari is an important pillar of the Videha parallel-literature movement. He establishes a distinctive identity for Nepal's Maithili literature outside the India-centred mainstream. He grants literary dignity to authentic Maithili speech and places folk tales, folk drama and folk songs on an equal footing with high literature. He unites the struggle for Mithila statehood with a literary and political campaign. Working outside the institutional system of literary prizes, he continues to honour his commitment to writing.

10.4 Comparative Position: Kapari brings together in his single personality the various strands of Maithili literature: cultural preservation, devotion to theatre, political realism and the energy of social movements. He is not merely a writer, but an entire cultural activist.

Conclusion

The literary world of Parmeshwar Kapari is a precious chapter in Maithili literature. The living language of folk tales, the philosophical substance of mythological narratives, the fearless pen of satire, the emotional force of autobiography and the impartiality of his literary criticism all testify to his many-sided talent. "The Mithila campaign is a very great undertaking": Kapari's own words sum up his philosophy of life. The cause of Mithila—its language, literature, culture and theatre—creates an integrated consciousness of Mithila. Kapari is a living representative of that consciousness.

Considered through all four perspectives—Indian aesthetics of rasa, dhvani and vakrokti; Western critical theory; Gaṅgeśa Upādhyāya's Navya-Nyāya epistemology; and the Videha parallel-history framework—Kapari is an important, versatile, courageous and committed Maithili writer who deserves and needs a central place in Videha's parallel literary history.

Gajendra Thakur

A Critical Theory for the Maithili Stage and Drama (Part One)

With Reference to Parmeshwar Kapari's Play Reṅ–Reṅ

An Extended Literary Review

[Indian Aesthetics of Rasa, Dhvani and Vakrokti • Western Critical Theory • Gaṅgeśa Upādhyāya's Navya-Nyāya • The Videha Parallel-History Framework]

1. An Introduction to the Life of the Writer Parmeshwar Kapari

1.1 Biographical Background

Parmeshwar Kapari is a Maithili writer, educationist and activist for Mithila and Maithili associated with Janakpurdham, Nepal. His work crosses genres, is experimental in character, and is deeply committed to social and cultural life. He formerly headed the Maithili Department at the Ra.Ra.B. Campus of Tribhuvan University in Janakpurdham. He also served as head of Tribhuvan University's Central Department of Maithili, making an invaluable contribution to teaching Maithili, literary research and the collection of folk literature.

An important feature of his personality is that he has simultaneously been a writer, an authentic student of folk literature, coordinator of the Mithila State Struggle Committee, and former member-secretary of the Maithili Development Fund. His place in contemporary Maithili literature is particularly noteworthy as an experimental and realist playwright. His literary production encompasses folk tales, plays, essays, critical writing, social commentary and cultural debate.

1.2 Literary Genres and Published Works

Parmeshwar Kapari's literary activities extend across several genres. Among his known writings are:

(a) Drama: Reṅ–Reṅ, a contemporary political and social satirical play associated with the Avantika Maithili Theatre Organisation in Janakpurdham, Nepal; (b) folk tales; (c) cultural essays; (d) social commentary; and (e) songs and phakṛā verses.

This variety makes clear that Kapari is not simply a scholar but also a creative, many-sided cultural worker. His central concerns are the people's language, the people themselves, and Mithila's cultural identity.

2. The Play Reṅ–Reṅ: Plot and Dramatic Craft

2.1 Introduction to the Play

Reṅ–Reṅ, a Maithili play written by Parmeshwar Kapari, is centred on the rehearsal space of the Avantika Maithili Theatre Organisation. Its title, Reṅ–Reṅ, is an onomatopoeic symbol, representing the differentiated colours of the stage, the changing colours of life, and the many-layered portrayal of social and political character.

The principal characters are Shridhar (the director), Anwar, Hamal, Akshara, Chhauṅṛā, Lakshmi/Aishwarya, Vishnu/Vivek, Bam Bahadur and Nunu Kaka. Together they represent the play's social class structure: artists, workers, divine powers, the police and the spirit of folk theatre.

2.2 Outline of the Plot

The play opens in an old landlord's building, where the Avantika Theatre Organisation is rehearsing. Shridhar is absorbed in reciting a poem: a song of invocation that expresses the desire to act upon the stage and to reconstruct society.

In the middle of the play Lakshmi, the goddess of wealth, appears. Her appearance, however, brings no divine blessing; it exposes a bitter truth about where wealth actually resides in society and how a corrupt system of government appropriates it. Poverty is the root of all sins: this is the play's central truth.

Vishnu, too, appears as a deity, but even he cannot distribute Lakshmi's gold. Bam Bahadur, the policeman, enters and arrests the performers. Finally Nunu Kaka appears as an embodiment of folk culture, revealing the truth through folk theatre. The play concludes with a marriage ceremony, a symbol of renewal and new life.

2.3 Stagecraft and Dramatic Technique

Reṅ–Reṅ is composed in the manner of epic theatre. Changes in vocal inflection, shifts from emotional absorption to political sloganeering, dance and song bring it close to Brecht's Verfremdungseffekt, or alienation technique. The play employs five principal dramatic devices:

(1) Vocal modulation and shifts in inflection as an estrangement effect.

(2) Waves of colour as a metaphorical device for changing scenes.

(3) Episodic structure: a sequence of discontinuous scenes.

(4) Changes of rhythm through folk songs, humarī and the style of political slogans.

(5) Metatheatre: a play that refers to its own theatricality.

3. A Fourfold Method of Analysis

According to the Videha parallel-history framework, this review rests on four pillars: (a) the Indian aesthetics of rasa, dhvani and vakrokti; (b) Western critical theory; (c) Navya-Nyāya, particularly Gaṅgeśa Upādhyāya; and (d) the Videha parallel-history framework itself.

3.1 Indian Aesthetics of Rasa, Dhvani and Vakrokti

3.1.1 The Theory of Rasa: The Dominant Rasas in the Play

In the light of Bharata Muni's Nāṭyaśāstra, with its nine dramatic rasas, and Abhinavagupta's Abhinavabhāratī, with its theory of aesthetic relish, the rasas of Reṅ–Reṅ may be analysed as follows:

Principal Rasa: Karuṇa, or Compassion

The tragedy of poverty, the suffering of unemployed artists, and the scene in which Lakshmi, the goddess of wealth, departs empty-handed constitute the basis of the enduring emotion that sustains the play's compassionate rasa. The lament "Poverty is a disease" keeps the entire drama immersed in an atmosphere of pathos.

The Rasa of Satire (Hāsya and Raudra): A Dual Aesthetic Experience

The playwright establishes a remarkable tension between Bharata's hāsya, the comic rasa, and raudra, the furious rasa. Bam Bahadur's entry as a policeman and Lakshmi's departure combine laughter and anger. According to Abhinavagupta's theory of rasābhāsa, what occurs here is not the complete awakening of a rasa but an incomplete, disturbed experience. This situation recurs throughout Reṅ–Reṅ.

Vīra Rasa: The Final Resistance

Anwar and Vivek's fearless resistance in the prison scene, together with the revelation of truth through folk theatre, expresses the heroic rasa. The declaration "Om Khambrahman—Suga Ṛtasya Panthā" marks its culmination.

3.1.2 The Theory of Dhvani: Ānandavardhana's Perspective

According to Ānandavardhana's Dhvanyāloka (850 CE), suggestion, or dhvani—the level of meaning beyond the literal, expressed sense—is paramount in accomplished poetry. Three levels of suggestion are discernible in Reṅ–Reṅ:

The first level is literal: Reṅ–Reṅ is the sound associated with colour. The second is metaphorical: it suggests the changing colours of life. The third is political: it signifies the fragmentation of popular culture under corrupt rule.

The play's title is itself a many-voiced sign in which raṅg (colour and stage), rog (disease, embodied in poverty), raṇ (struggle) and reṅ (the sound of a suppressed cry) resonate together.

3.1.3 Vakrokti: Kuntaka's Perspective

According to Kuntaka's tenth-century Vakroktijīvita, oblique expression —language that deviates from simple denotation—is fundamental to accomplished poetry and drama. Reṅ–Reṅ provides several examples:

(a) Vishnu's appearance is satirical rather than divine: he utters only a couple of cursory remarks and leaves.

(b) Lakshmi, the goddess of wealth, goes away empty-handed—the most strikingly oblique statement of all.

(c) The recitation associated with Satyanarayan worship becomes a satirical religious ceremony in the midst of poverty.

(d) The gold ashrafī coin symbolises a dream of riches that turns to ashes: an oblique system of symbols.

3.2 Western Critical Theory

3.2.1 Brechtian Epic Theatre

Bertolt Brecht's (1898–1956) theory of epic theatre offers the closest Western counterpart to Reṅ–Reṅ. The Brechtian Verfremdungseffekt, or estrangement effect, is expressed in the play in the following ways:

(a) Altered voice and gesture, as well as songs and dances within the performance, prevent the spectator from becoming wholly absorbed in emotional identification and instead prompt rational reflection; these devices exemplify Brechtian Gestus. (b) The repeated slogan "Poverty is a disease" employs Brecht's song technique. (c) Anwar and Akshara's awkward exchanges over a mobile telephone in the prison scene connect the spectator with contemporary reality.

3.2.2 Marxist Dramatic Criticism

In the light of Raymond Williams's Drama from Ibsen to Brecht (1952) and Terry Eagleton's Marxism and Literary Criticism (1976), the class struggle in Reṅ–Reṅ may be examined as follows:

The ruling class (the police, the government, and Vishnu as a divine guardian of the status quo), the class of artists (Shridhar, Anwar, Hamal and Akshara, all unemployed performers), and the folk class (Nunu Kaka and Chhauṅṛā) constitute a triangular conflict that dramatizes Marxist class struggle. The accumulation, distribution and ultimately disappointing disappearance of gold, representing capital, form a metaphor for capitalist accumulation.

3.2.3 A Postcolonial Perspective

In the light of Homi Bhabha's The Location of Culture (1994) and Gayatri Chakravorty Spivak's "Can the Subaltern Speak?" (1988):

The debate over language in Reṅ–Reṅ—Maithili as against Nepali, Hindi, English, Sanskrit and Urdu, and the dispute over which language should be inscribed upon Vishnu's gold coin—is an outstanding postcolonial scene of hybridity. The playwright creates Bhabha's "Third Space," in which no single language or culture remains dominant. Nunu Kaka's entrance, embodying the spirit of folk theatre, invokes Bharata Muni's argument for the "Fifth Veda" to challenge colonial and Brahmanical-Sanskritic dominance.

3.2.4 Feminist Criticism

An analysis of Akshara's character in the light of Judith Butler's Gender Trouble (1990) and Simone de Beauvoir's The Second Sex (1949):

Akshara is the only female character who speaks out boldly in the play. She proposes a love marriage to Hamal, the protagonist, and speaks fearlessly to the police. Yet in the Lakshmi episode a tension emerges between women's economic power, personified by the goddess of wealth, and patriarchal economic authority—a tension that can be understood through Butler's concept of performativity.

3.2.5 Chinese Literary Theory

In the light of the Chinese theory of jingjie, or the realm of aesthetic experience; Wang Guowei's Renjian Cihua (1908–1910); and the feng tradition of satire in classical Chinese theatre:

The political satire of Reṅ–Reṅ is comparable to the satirical elements of Chinese zaju, the musical drama of the Yuan dynasty, and Kunqu opera. In these traditions, humorous criticism of the ruling class's folly, a story-within-a-story structure, and the poetic use of folk melodies are central. An awareness of poverty (pínkùn yìshí) and the desire for social justice are shared focal points of the two traditions.

3.3 Navya-Nyāya: The Epistemology of Gaṅgeśa Upādhyāya

3.3.1 Direct Perception and Dramatic Truth

The epistemology of Reṅ–Reṅ may be examined in the light of pratyakṣa, direct perceptual knowledge, as expounded in the perception section of Gaṅgeśa Upādhyāya's Tattvacintāmaṇi. Gaṅgeśa was active in Mithila around 1320 CE.

The direct experience of poverty expressed in Anwar's "We are dying of hunger" constitutes nirvikalpaka pratyakṣa, or indeterminate perception. The manifestation of Lakshmi and the shower of gold constitute savikalpaka pratyakṣa, or determinate perception, which is ultimately exposed as false. This is a dramatic expression of Gaṅgeśa's account of perceptual illusion.

3.3.2 Inference and the Play's Chain of Reasoning

Gaṅgeśa's concept of vyāptigraha, the apprehension of invariable concomitance that makes inference possible, provides the basis of the central argument of Reṅ–Reṅ:

Vyāpti: "As long as there is poverty, there will be every disease." In other words, where poverty exists, every form of suffering exists. This is the play's hetu, or logical reason. Sādhya: "Poverty causes every disease." In other words, all affliction proceeds from poverty. The critique presents this as the play's pakṣa, the subject of inference.

Through the Navya-Nyāya technique of parāmarśa, or subsumptive reflection, the playwright presents Shridharam's speech as a philosophical and logical declaration.

3.3.3 Verbal Testimony and the Dispute over Language

A significant scene in the play concerns the language to be used on the gold ashrafī: Maithili, Nepali, Hindi, English, Sanskrit or Urdu? It becomes a dramatic test of Gaṅgeśa's theory of śabda-pramāṇa, knowledge derived from verbal testimony. According to Gaṅgeśa, testimony is valid when its speaker is āpta, or trustworthy. The question of linguistic dominance in the play therefore raises two questions: which language's words carry authority, and which speaker is to be considered āpta?

3.4 The Videha Parallel-History Framework

3.4.1 The Counter-Canon and Parmeshwar Kapari

The central contention of the Videha parallel-literary-history movement is that much has been excluded from the "mainstream" history of Maithili literature centred on the Sahitya Akademi in New Delhi and the Nepal Academy—particularly Maithili writers in Nepal, marginal authors and the tradition of folk theatre.

Parmeshwar Kapari represents one of these excluded groups. His Reṅ–Reṅ:

(a) Represents Maithili theatre centred on Janakpurdham, Nepal.

(b) Directly makes the Sahitya Akademi's institutional dominance an object of satire.

(c) Places folk theatre, through the Nunu Kaka episode, on an equal footing with classical drama.

(d) Places the struggle of unemployed performers at the centre—an experience absent from mainstream literary history.

3.4.2 Reṅ–Reṅ in a Parallel History of Maithili Theatre

Reṅ–Reṅ occupies a distinctive position in the history of Maithili drama. The response of Ayodhyanath Chaudhary, the distinguished Maithili writer, shows that the play accurately delineates the truth of its age, the reality of the people, and a political climate shaped by the Gen-Z movement—the rebellious movement of a younger generation.

4. Comparative Study: Other Maithili Playwrights and Writers

Where the mainstream is absorbed in historicity and cultural revival, Kapari focuses on contemporary political reality. In technique, mainstream drama tends to observe the classical three unities of place, time and action more closely, while Reṅ–Reṅ adopts the open structure of epic theatre.

Comparison with Mahendra Malangia

Where Mahendra Malangia raised folk theatre chiefly to an aesthetic plane, Kapari turns it into a weapon of political resistance. Both playwrights employ satire as a primary literary instrument in Maithili literature: Malangia within a more limited dramatic form, Kapari in a freer one. Their central concerns differ. Malangia addresses the problems of a restricted social group, whereas Kapari writes, like Bechan Thakur, against unemployment and corrupt institutions and in defence of Maithili identity.

The character "Shridharam," the director, may be a satirical allusion to Nepal's institutional Maithili literary establishment.

The dramatic tradition of Jyotirishwar's Dhūrta-Samāgama and Vidyapati's Gorakṣavijaya—the latter Vidyapati being distinguished here from the earlier Vidyapati preceding Jyotirishwar—echoes in the Nunu Kaka episode. Bharata Muni's Nāṭyaśāstra and the argument that drama constitutes a "Fifth Veda" are directly connected to this tradition. Kapari re-establishes it in a contemporary political context.

5. Critical Evaluation: Strengths and Limitations

5.1 The Distinctive Strengths of the Play

(a) A successful fusion of folk theatre and modern political drama.

The most significant achievement of Reṅ–Reṅ is its transformation of the phakṛā verses of Maithili folk theatre into an instrument of contemporary political theatre. In this respect it goes beyond Brecht's epic theatre, for its aesthetic roots lie in a local folk tradition.

(b) Linguistic plurality and cultural dialogue.

The presence of Maithili, Nepali, Hindi, Sanskrit, Urdu and English within the play is itself a cultural and political statement. The reality of Maithili identity in Nepal, where it exists within a multilingual region, comes alive in this experience.

(c) Metatheatre: the play within the play.

Reṅ–Reṅ is itself metatheatre: it tells the story of a theatre organisation rehearsing a play, and the rehearsal turns into a social drama. This play-within-a-play structure is rare in Maithili drama.

(d) The Aishwarya/Lakshmi scene as an economic metaphor.

Lakshmi's shower of gold, its seizure by greed-driven characters, and her eventual departure empty-handed constitute an outstanding metaphorical portrayal of the capitalist economy, fulfilling the expectations of Marxist criticism.

5.2 Limitations and Points for Criticism

(a) The final marriage scene, in which Hamal and Akshara are married, seems somewhat inconsistent with the play's political edge. Such a conclusion suggests a concession to commercial theatre.

(b) Nunu Kaka's argument about the "Fifth Veda," the philosophical high point of the play, could have been developed at greater length.

(c) The characters have unequal psychological depth. Shridharam and Anwar are well developed, whereas Chhauṅṛā and Bam Bahadur at times lapse into oversimplified stereotypes.

6. The Literary Significance of the Playwright and His Play

6.1 Contribution to Maithili Theatre

Reṅ–Reṅ gives the Maithili theatre of Nepal a new dimension. It demonstrates that:

(a) Maithili drama can be placed within the context of world-class political theatre.

(b) The folk-theatre tradition is not "primitive" but a vehicle for the most modern ideas.

(c) The struggles of unemployed, marginal Maithili performers constitute a serious literary subject.

(d) Janakpurdham, a centre of Nepalese Maithili theatre, possesses its own tradition independently of the history centred on Darbhanga.

6.2 Place in Videha Parallel History

Within the framework of the Videha parallel-literature movement, Parmeshwar Kapari is a writer who:

(a) Continues his literary work outside the institutional apparatus; (b) links the folk-literary tradition with modern political theatre; (c) gives literary expression to the struggle for Maithili identity in Nepal; and (d) brings Mithila's cultural riches into dialogue with modern thought.

Together these features give substance to "What the Canon Left Out," the subtitle of Videha's parallel history.

7. Conclusion

Parmeshwar Kapari's Reṅ–Reṅ is a Maithili play that shows life as though it were taking place upon a stage. Poverty, corruption and unemployment among performers are all diseases. Yet the playwright is not a pessimist. Through folk theatre, the power of the Fifth Veda and the symbol of a new marriage, he seeks to convey a message of irrepressible hope.

Viewed in the light of the Indian aesthetics of rasa, dhvani and vakrokti; Western epic theatre; the Chinese tradition of satirical drama; and Gaṅgeśa's Navya-Nyāya epistemology, Reṅ–Reṅ is a rich, many-layered composition that gives Maithili drama a new dimension.

Within the framework of Videha parallel literary history, Kapari is an important playwright marginalised by mainstream literary historiography, whose Reṅ–Reṅ retains an unforgettable place in the history of Maithili theatre.

Gajendra Thakur

A Critical Theory for the Maithili Stage and Drama (Part Two): With Reference to Parmeshwar Kapari's Play Gahan Ugarās

Gahan Ugarās — Parmeshwar Kapari

A Multidimensional Review in Dramatic Theory

The Historical Background and Publication of Gahan Ugarās

Parmeshwar Kapari's Gahan Ugarās is a landmark in contemporary Maithili drama and experimental theatre. The first edition was published in Phagun 2073 of the Vikram Samvat calendar by Prithu Prakashan, Janakpurdham. Written as an entirely original dramatic work, the book carries a cover painting by the celebrated Mithila artist S. C. Suman; its setting and design were undertaken by Kumar Bhaskar. Kapari dedicated this distinctive play to the renowned and historic Maithili theatre practitioner Kunalji, whose work on stage and whose dramatic creativity have brought lasting honour to the Maithili language and literature.

Dr Abhi Subedi, an eminent scholar of Nepalese theatre, calls the play's structure "experimental." He writes that Kapari creates the stage through human dialogue and the internal relationships between speakers instead of relying upon conventional scenic arrangements or artificial scenography. The principal character is a landlord, and social relationships continually form and disintegrate around him. Parmeshwar Kapari is known for confronting established systems. He is himself a living dictionary of Maithili, as the authentic and abundant vocabulary of Gahan Ugarās amply demonstrates.

Historically, Janakpurdham has been the theatrical and cultural capital of the Mithila region within Nepal. A principal source of its vitality was the Mithila Natya Kala Parishad (MINAP), founded in 1979, whose energy sustained Maithili theatrical consciousness. By the end of the twentieth century, however, the untimely death of Dhirendra Dhumketu had begun to diminish Janakpur's theatre. At the same time the Patna theatre scene in India also fell into inactivity; obscene orchestras occupied traditional village stages, and people who turned Vidyapati festivals into enterprises of subscription collection began to stigmatise deserving individuals rather than honour them with a ceremonial pāg. Mahendra Malangia's slapstick humour continued to ridicule the proletariat. In this darkness, institutions such as MINAP, Akriti, Achhinjal and Bhangima brought about a revival of Maithili theatre in Janakpur. It was then that Ramesh Ranjan appeared with Sakhi, and Parmeshwar Kapari with Gahan Ugarās, both drawing upon the realities produced by Nepal's ten-year Maoist people's war and the upheaval of the Second People's Movement.

Dramatic Structure, Symbolic Design and Sociopolitical Reality

The plot of Gahan Ugarās is principally divided into two parts, which present, through metaphor, a historical discourse on Nepal's transition from feudalism, the social repercussions of the people's war and cultural colonisation. Its opening historical setting is the political crisis of the regressive period following Nepal's Second People's Movement (Vikram Samvat 2062–63). The repression of monarchy and the autocratic Panchayat order is weakening, but Gyanendra's government is making a final coercive attempt to retain power. Meanwhile a new movement for a federal republic through a Constituent Assembly is spreading across the country.

A Close Analysis of the First Part

The first part opens at the crumbling house of the Rajput landlord Phulgen Singh, a remnant of feudalism whose granaries contain not a single grain. The landlord's children live elsewhere, while a Dhanuk villager, Manejara, looks after him and prepares his food. The irritable old landlord Phulgen Singh, his knees and back wrapped in a gamchhā, swats flies while recalling his former feudal prestige. Two impudent, impish village children, Tunma and Musna, mock him on his veranda with traditional songs: "The elephant has arrived, the horse has arrived; at this old fellow's wedding the grandson will lead the procession," and "Reṅ, reṅ, reṅ—a frog on your plate." Two young girls playing Jaṭ-Jaṭin expose his exploitative character by singing: "This landlord is the master of the village, isn't he? He cheats the measure on the scales, doesn't he?"

At this point a middle-aged woman named Sati enters. She restrains the landlord's abusive language and warns him that the days of feudal oppression have passed, and that he can now expect to be beaten with shoes and kicks. Five revolutionary young people then enter the stage:

Phulo Khatbe: a militant Dalit human-rights activist.

Dukhiya Sada: a voice of the oppressed, appearing as a representative of Amnesty International.

Subhadra Mandal: an active political worker.

Jwala Prasad Singh (Jwala): an underground fighter in the Maoist people's war who has taken up arms to put an end to exploitation.

Vidyapati Yadav: an outspoken journalist and media worker who uses his pen to expose the exploiting class.

The landlord boasts of his ancestral feudal power: "Your fathers and grandfathers grazed cattle at the mansion, and your wives were servants there." In fury, the Maoist fighter Jwala Singh strikes him with a blow, and the old landlord falls trembling to the ground. The young people depart to report on and participate in a major political meeting against regression. Soon afterwards a servant runs in and, weeping, tells the old man Khokhna and an elderly woman that the police have opened indiscriminate fire at the political meeting at the school. Sati has been shot twice in the chest and has died; Jwala Singh was killed instantly; Phulo is breathing her last; and Subhadra and Vidyapati are in critical condition.

The Second Part: Metaphor and Cultural Debate

The second part begins as a surreal and allegorical journey. Baba Abhelba and his paralysed disciple Baklelba, who walks with a shaking gait as though pounding rice, head towards Janakpurdham carrying a tumrī, a water vessel and a blanket, and singing the devotional refrain "Laṭak Saṭak Siyārāmā." Even after his bundle slips from his head, the disciple continues singing jogirā. In Janakpurdham they meet Lakhna, Bechna, Mangla and Janka, who have gathered there to sleep. Janka Mallah narrates the marriage of Rama and Sita during the Vivah Panchami celebrations. He says that after the wedding Dasharatha insisted upon a dowry, whereupon Janaka placed his own head before Dasharatha. The story becomes a metaphor for Mithila's seemingly endless cultural exploitation.

Meanwhile Genma and Phaguni hear the earth weeping. Everyone begins to dig and discovers a stream of thick, bright-red blood. Vidyapati explains that this blood comes from the repression carried out by the Gorkha Shah dynasty 230–240 years earlier. Remains of the Maithili language, culture and arts lie buried in the soil, destroyed by the coercive "One Language, One Dress" policy. At the call of Bulanti and Dukhiya, the women sing songs of renewal—Chhathi songs, Chaitāwar, and Jaṭ-Jaṭin. At the end, Vidyapati leads a great revolutionary procession for the release of Maithili from its "deep eclipse," its gahan ugarās, and for the establishment of an autonomous Mithila province in a new federal Nepal.

1. General Introduction and Structure of the Book

Parmeshwar Kapari's Maithili play Gahan Ugarās—a dialectal form of "release from an eclipse"—is an expression of profound social suffering. It was published by Prithu Prakashan, Janakpurdham, in Phagun 2073. Divided into two parts, the play develops its dramatic action around the sociopolitical circumstances of Nepal's Mithila region. Its cast contains representatives of many social groups: the landlord Phulgen Singh, an oppressive feudal figure; Tunma and Musna, comic children; Girl One and Girl Two, voices of female rebellion; Phekua, a young man; the Heroine, symbolising new cultural distortions; Bulanti, Subansh, Subhadra, Jwala, Dukhiya, Phulo and Sati, belonging to the proletarian community; an old man and an old woman; Vidyapati, a symbolic embodiment of cultural consciousness; Janka, Bechna and Lakhna, representing different strata of Mithila's social life; and the Telephone Man, representing modern means of communication. This diversity of characters itself demonstrates the playwright's desire to exclude no section of society from the stage.

2. From the Perspective of Indian Dramaturgy

A Comparison with Indian Dramatic Theory and the "Theatre of Roots"

The rasa theory of Indian dramaturgy—especially karuṇa, vīra and raudra—fully animates Gahan Ugarās. Suresh Awasthi's "Theatre of Roots" movement sought to revitalise indigenous folk forms in opposition to colonial Western realist theatre. Habib Tanvir, Ratan Thiyam, B. V. Karanth and K. N. Panikkar joined folk rituals and indigenous traditions to modern political consciousness.

In Gahan Ugarās, Parmeshwar Kapari presents the philosophy of this roots movement in a new form within Maithili theatre. Traditional forms of nāch, such as Jaṭ-Jaṭin, Jhijhiya and folk song, had often been treated as mere entertainment, without a written script. Rambharos Kapari "Bhramar" and Parmeshwar Kapari, however, transformed this folk dance into a forceful political weapon against class oppression and colonial domination. When the Jaṭ-Jaṭin song sounds in the second part, its dialogue expresses the harsh reality of migrant life. The result is a living, dynamic folk tradition—the central principle of the Theatre of Roots.

Four Traditions of Theatre Theory in Gahan Ugarās

Tradition of dramatic theory	Principal exponents / underlying philosophy	Concrete application and analysis in Gahan Ugarās
Indian Theatre of the Roots	Suresh Awasthi, Habib Tanvir and Ratan Thiyam	Traditional Jat-Jatin, Jhijhiya, Chhath songs and folk narrative (Janaka's self-sacrifice) become vehicles for class conflict and political revolution.
Western epic theatre	Bertolt Brecht	Breaking the illusion of the fourth wall; drawing spectators into logical and ideological critique rather than mere sentiment; symbolic acting.
Chinese xieyi theatre	Mei Lanfang and Huang Zuolin	Fluidity, flexibility, three-dimensionality and formal convention; a direct transition from the present into the oppressive Simraungarh of 250 years earlier.

Tradition of dramatic theory	Principal exponents / underlying philosophy	Concrete application and analysis in Gahan Ugarās
Jewish Yiddish theatre	Abraham Goldfaden and Itzik Manger	Indigenous farce comparable to Purimshpils and Broder singers; analogy between the pain of Gulf migration and the trauma of Yiddish displacement.

(a) The Five Junctures and the Structure of Dramatic Action

Bharata Muni's Nāṭyaśāstra divides dramatic action into five junctures: mukha, pratimukha, garbha, vimarśa and nirvahaṇa. In this framework, the mukha of Gahan Ugarās appears in the opening scene: the landlord's granary is empty, and the children Tunma and Musna mock him in song as they play in his courtyard. The pratimukha emerges when the wave of the people's movement begins to challenge the landlord's power. The garbha arises with the Heroine's entrance, raising the problems of cultural disintegration and economic migration. The vimarśa is expressed when the proletarian community, in the symbolic presence of Vidyapati, searches for a path to liberation. The nirvahaṇa, the point of resolution, is not clearly present. This constitutes a major shortcoming in terms of Indian dramaturgy.

(b) The Theory of Rasa

Indian dramatic theory recognises eight or nine rasas. Karuṇa flows most powerfully through Gahan Ugarās: in the lament of the elderly couple, in the women's song of departure for distant lands, and in Bulanti's grief at separation from her only son. Vīra emerges in the second part's scenes of popular agitation. Bībhatsa is felt in the descriptions of the landlord's oppression. Hāsya appears in the children Tunma and Musna's playful, satirical exchanges. But śṛṅgāra, which Bharata Muni regards as the king of rasas, is almost entirely absent. Seen through the commentator Abhinavagupta's theory of suggestive rasa, the play's language possesses considerable power of suggestion, but because it lacks sufficient literary refinement, dhvani does not achieve its fullest development.

(c) Types of Hero and the Classification of Characters

The Nāṭyaśāstra names four heroic types: dhīrodātta, dhīroddhata, dhīralalita and dhīrapraśānta. Gahan Ugarās has no single central hero. Vidyapati functions symbolically as the serene dhīrapraśānta hero, summoning a cultural awakening. The people collectively constitute the protagonist, a choice closer to Indian folk theatre than to classical Sanskrit drama. This may be understood as a deliberate dramaturgical decision.

(d) Number of Acts and Dramatic Form

The Nāṭyaśāstra describes ten dramatic forms, including nāṭaka, prakaraṇa, bhāṇa, vyāyoga and samavakāra. Gahan Ugarās departs from the characteristics of the classical nāṭaka and comes closer to prakaraṇa, since it depicts the realities of social life rather than a royal plot. Within folk theatre, however, it is still more closely associated with the traditions of Vidapat Nāch, Jaṭ-Jaṭin and the collective singing of Sama-Chakeva. The way women enter the stage with headcloths tied and cultural songs on their lips represents the living continuity of Mithila's folk-theatre tradition.

3. From the Perspective of Western Dramatic Theory

A Comparative Reading through Western and Chinese Theatre Theory

The Western playwright Bertolt Brecht's theories of epic theatre and the Verfremdungseffekt, or alienation effect, distance spectators from emotional absorption in the plot so that they can examine it rationally. Brecht's theory was influenced by traditional Chinese theatrical styles, especially Mei Lanfang's acting. Chinese theatre breaks the "fourth wall" to address spectators directly.

Huang Zuolin, a pioneer of Chinese spoken drama (huaju), described a related approach as xieyi, or essentialist theatre. Its principal qualities are fluidity, flexibility, sculpturality and conventionality.

The dramatic craft of Gahan Ugarās is a Maithili adaptation of both xieyi and Brechtian principles. According to Dr Abhi Subedi, rather than constructing a realistic scenic environment, the play builds the stage through the dialogue and relationships of its characters. Changes of scene are exceptionally fluid and flexible: without lowering a curtain, the action moves straight from the present to the repression and historical displacement at Simraungadh some 240 years earlier. Baklelba's trembling walk and the landlord's posture with his staff demonstrate the use of symbolic, conventionalised movement.

Comparison with Yiddish Dramaturgy and the Discourse of Displacement

Yiddish theatre developed among the Ashkenazi Jews of Eastern Europe in their Yiddish language. Its roots include the Purimshpil farces performed during the festival of Purim, which sharply attacked contemporary social contradictions and the wealthy classes. The satirical plays associated with Maithili's Vivah Panchami tableaux and MINAP's Mahāmūrkha Sammelan are remarkably close to the realistic and humorous style of the Purimshpil.

The "Broder Singers" of Yiddish theatre were itinerant musicians who changed costumes and performed satirical, humorous farces; from this tradition Abraham Goldfaden laid the foundation of professional Yiddish theatre. The children's farce at landlord Phulgen Singh's door in the opening scene of Gahan Ugarās, and the comic scenes of Baba Abhelba and his disciple Baklelba in its second part, resemble the indigenous, humorous theatrical techniques of the Broder Singers.

In considering the conflict within Yiddish theatre between shund, or popular "trash theatre," and literary theatre, Itsik Manger wrote that shund was in fact a "free stage" without academicised acting, where popular desires found spontaneous expression. A similar conflict has existed in Maithili theatre between shund forms, such as folk nāch and the kīrtaniyā, and refined literary drama. Gahan Ugarās bridges that division by linking popular culture with political liberation.

Displacement, Employment Abroad and the Pain of Nostalgia

Diaspora, migration and nostalgia have been among the most important foundations of Yiddish theatre. Poor Jews who emigrated from Eastern Europe to America sang songs such as "Mayn Shtetele Belz" and performed plays in memory of their shtetl, or Jewish village, to relieve their sorrows.

Gahan Ugarās presents this tragedy of modern Maithil displacement with considerable force. The telephone conversation between a Maithil migrant labourer, Mundha, trapped in the oppressive kafala system in Gulf countries such as Qatar and Saudi Arabia, and the "Gulf widow" (the Heroine), who lives alone at home, is a Maithili adaptation of the dramaturgy of Yiddish displacement. Here anxiety about AIDS, the use of condoms and the torment of suspicions about sexual conduct expose the pain of nostalgia and the harsh realities of migrant life.

(a) Aristotle's Theory of Mimesis and the Three Unities

Aristotle argues in the Poetics that tragedy imitates the actions of a noble person and generates catharsis, a purification of the spectator's emotions. Gahan Ugarās does not strictly observe the three unities of time, place and action. Its settings shift among a village, a police station, a fairground and a Jūṛśītal bathing place, while the action seems to stretch over years. Yet one of the most important Aristotelian elements, unity of action, is partially present: all the incidents revolve around the central struggle for liberation from oppression.

In the light of Aristotle's theory of great tragedy, peripeteia, or reversal of fortune, can be seen in the landlord's decline. Once all-powerful, he is finally mocked by children singing, "Turn out the dog, and chase away the cat." But anagnorisis, the moment of recognition, is clearly absent; this prevents the play from attaining the structure of a complete classical tragedy.

(b) The Brechtian Influence: Theatre of Distanciation

The most apparent influence upon Gahan Ugarās is the German playwright's anti-individualising dramatic method. In his foreword, Dr Abhi Subedi explicitly calls the work "experimental" and writes, in Nepali, that "human beings themselves, rather than scenic arrangements or 'scenography,' create the stage, and they themselves have given Gahan Ugarās its dramatic body." In keeping with Brecht's epic-theatre tradition, the narrative thread repeatedly breaks, the characters sing songs of the people and disrupt theatrical illusion, and the spectators are invited to respond intellectually rather than identify emotionally.

Tunma and Musna's comic song—"The elephant has arrived, the horse has arrived; at this old man's wedding the grandson will lead the procession"—is a clear Brechtian intervention. It forces spectators to look consciously at the grotesque contradictions of reality.

(c) Stanislavski's Psychological Realism

From the perspective of Stanislavski, who emphasised profound investigation of a character's inner life, Gahan Ugarās offers relatively little psychological depth. Bulanti's grief at separation from her son and the Heroine's conflict over her double life provide a few sensitive dramatic moments, but characterisation as a whole remains incomplete. In this respect the playwright has chosen to privilege social purpose over the development of individual personalities.

(d) Existentialist Theatre

Viewed through the existentialist thought of Camus and Sartre, the play carries an echo of inward sorrow: people remain alive, but the social order deprives their lives of meaning. Bulanti's outcry that her son has fled from home and she has not seen his face expresses the existential pain of a disconnected life without discernible destiny.

4. From the Perspective of Israeli Dramatic Thought

The Israeli playwright Hanoch Levin (1943–1999), a central figure of modern Israeli theatre, was accomplished in dramatising political satire and the suffering of ordinary people. The satirical exchanges directed against the landlord in Gahan Ugarās, the mockery of authority in the mouths of children and the collective songs of protest resemble Levin's sharpness and directness. Just as the anguished voice of the ordinary citizen becomes the language of Israeli theatre, Kapari carries out a parallel task upon the soil of Mithila. Yet Gahan Ugarās does not fully attain the philosophical density discernible in the Israeli theatrical tradition.

5. From the Perspective of Chinese Theatre

The Chinese theatrical tradition, especially Yuan opera and the political theatre that followed the Mao era, is distinguished by its combination of song, dance and dialogue, through which collective consciousness speaks. The repeated use of folk songs in Gahan Ugarās—songs of Jūṛśītal, Holi, the ceremonial headcloth, and opposition to dowry—has a functional resemblance to this Chinese dramatic style. The staging of Vidyapati as a historical and cultural symbol of Mithila recalls the Chinese practice of making historical and mythological figures carry contemporary political messages.

6. The Principal Distinctive Features of the Play

First, political forthrightness. The play brings Nepal's monarchy, the Maoist people's war, the Second People's Movement, Gyanendra's regressive rule and the establishment of the federal democratic republic directly onto the stage, making it a form of explicit political testimony. The Indian part of Mithila now stands outside this history while witnessing its theatrical presentation: the work is thus produced in a particular geographical and cultural situation.

Second, linguistic stratification. There is a clear difference between the language of the landlord and that of the workers, as well as differences in tone between female and male characters. Vidyapati's dialogue is literary and exhortatory. The Telephone Man becomes a vehicle for satire on modern communication culture. Such a many-layered linguistic structure is the mark of a mature dramatist.

Third, the importance of women's voices. Girl One and Girl Two openly insult and taunt the landlord: "On this old fellow's griddle, fry two lumps of jaggery; set the dogs barking and the cats yowling." Bulanti and Subhadra likewise raise voices of resistance. Through the forceful presence of these female characters, the play challenges Mithila's patriarchal social order in dramatic language.

Fourth, the incorporation of cultural and ritual elements. Sprinkling water on Jūṛśītal, the Holi festival, folk songs and the tying of ceremonial headcloths are woven naturally into the dramatic plot. They raise Gahan Ugarās above a merely political drama and turn it into a document of cultural memory.

Fifth, criticism of the dowry system. In an important scene, Lakhna, Janka and Bechna together expose dowry through satire. The exchange, "Remember, it was at King Janaka's palace that the dowry custom began among us," introduces a satirical perspective that connects King Janaka's cultural prestige with a social evil.

7. The Play's Principal Limitations

First, looseness of plot. There is no tightly controlled sequence of events. One scene is often linked to the next by coincidence rather than causation. Neither Bharata Muni's sūtradhāra tradition nor Brecht's clearly articulated scene divisions provide a guiding structure. The spectator or reader must piece the narrative together independently.

Second, incomplete character development. Vidyapati's symbolic appearance is ambitious, but its dramatic potential is not fully exploited. The Heroine is made a symbol of cultural distortion, yet the deeper socioeconomic causes of her situation remain unexplored. The landlord is a one-dimensional oppressor lacking human complexity.

Third, ambiguity about the ending. The final scene brings processions, slogans and agitation together without a clear dramatic resolution. The line "Remove the eclipse that has fallen upon society and culture" justifies the play's title, but this poetic ending is not a dramatic ending. The absence both of the nirvahaṇa-sandhi required in Indian dramaturgy and of the denouement expected in Western drama is a creative limitation.

Fourth, the complexity of staging. The many locations, numerous characters, folk-music performances and sounds of movements arriving from distant places make the production exceptionally difficult on the resource-constrained stages of Mithila, although not impossible.

Dr Abhi Subedi writes in his introduction that "The play will pass the director's test one hundred per cent, and the audience's test even more readily." From this perspective its stageability is not a limitation.

8. The Historical Significance of the Play

Gahan Ugarās is an important work in the literature of Maithili drama in Nepalese Mithila. It may be regarded as a distinctive representative of the theatrical tradition that developed after the establishment of the Mithila Natya Kala Parishad in Janakpur in 1979.

9. Conclusions from an Integrated Comparison of Dramatic Theories

Gahan Ugarās is an ambitious effort, motivated by political and social concerns, to link the folk-theatre tradition with modern political drama. It succeeds notably in the compassionate rasa of Indian aesthetic theory, its living use of folk-theatre traditions and its concept of a collective protagonist. Its partial use of Brechtian distanciation and its political forthrightness testify to its modern character.

Nevertheless, the play cannot be considered free from structural looseness, a lack of psychological depth in its characters, the absence of a clear nirvahaṇa-sandhi, and practical difficulties of performance. Even so, the historical significance and cultural contribution of Parmeshwar Kapari's work within Maithili drama are beyond dispute.

Conclusion and Long-Term Cultural Influence

Parmeshwar Kapari's Gahan Ugarās is more than an experimental play of the Maithili stage: it is a practical meeting ground for major theories of contemporary world theatre. Enriched by the indigenous vitality of India's Theatre of Roots, it readily incorporates Brechtian intellectual distance and the fluidity of the Chinese xieyi style. Like Yiddish theatre, it brings the inward pain of displacement and the popular power of shund into the centre of a literary movement.

Through his wealth of vocabulary and intimate knowledge of folk life, Kapari has created a theatre that strikes, at the regional level, at the contradictions of Nepal's Madhesh movement and people's war, while at the global level offering a new path towards liberation-consciousness to communities struggling with crises of language and identity. The experimental character of Gahan Ugarās will stand as an enduring achievement in the history of Maithili drama.

33. Kedarnath Chaudhary Special Issue: Stories, Personality and Literary Achievement

Abstract

Kedarnath Chaudhary Special Issue—Editorial by Gajendra Thakur. I was on night duty. At two in the morning my telephone began ringing. A colleague of mine, a Tamil speaker, was listening to my conversation. When the call ended, he asked in Hindi: “What language were you speaking for an hour? It is such a sweet language.”

Keywords: Kedarnath · Chaudhary · special issue · personality · literary achievement · Kumar · also

Kedarnath Chaudhary Special Issue: Editorial

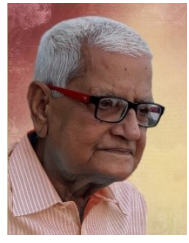
Stories 1–10

I was on night duty. At two in the morning my telephone began ringing. A colleague of mine, a Tamil speaker, was listening to my conversation. When the call ended, he asked in Hindi:

“What language were you speaking for an hour? It is such a sweet language.”

How could I explain to him—or to you—the bitterness concealed within that sweetness? Yet you will have to prepare yourself for it. First comes the starter in Part One; from Part Two onward, the doses will rise to 100, 200 and 500 milligrams, increasing in just that way.

Story 1



Kedarnath Chaudhary (born 1936) was one of the two producers of the first Maithili film, Mamta Gābay Gīt; the other was Madanmohan Das.

Udaybhanu Singh subsequently became the third co-producer because of financial difficulties.

Mother: the late Kusumpari Devi. Father: the late Kishori Chaudhary. Date of birth: 3 January 1936.

Village and postal address: Nehra, Darbhanga. Other family members: wife, Mrs Kumud Chaudhary; children, elder daughter Mrs Kiran Jha and younger daughter Mrs Archana Chaudhary. Education: postgraduate degree in Economics, 1958; Law, 1959; postgraduate qualification in Economics from the University of California, 1969; MBA in Marketing and Distribution from Golden Gate University, San Francisco, USA, 1971. Returned to India in 1978. Between 1981 and 1986 he was in Tehran and Frankfurt; subsequently in Bombay and Pune, and, following retirement, resident in Laheriasarai, Darbhanga, from 2000. Six novels: Chamelirani (2004), Karar (2006), Mahur (2008), Abara Nahitan (2012), Hina (2013) and Ayana (2018). Honours: (1) Videha Literary Award, 2013, from the Jharkhand Maithili Manch, Ranchi; (2) Prabodh Literary Award, 2016; and (3) Kedar Award, 2016, for Abara Nahitan.

Story 2

Dr Kalpana Manikant Mishra

Her father was Dr Shiv Kumar Jha; her natal village was Rati and her marital home Gajhara. Having completed her medical education at J. J. Hospital/Grant Hospital, she became a gynaecologist. Together with her husband Dr Manikant Mishra, the producer of the Maithili film Au Piya Hamar Nagari, she edited the Maithili journal Videha, published from Bombay during 1980–82.

In an email from 2009 she writes:

"My greetings to Gajendra Thakurji! I am a regular reader of your magazine. I found the background song on your website moving and melodious."

She continues with a reminiscence, also collected in Videha Sadeha 2 (http://videha.co.in/new_page_89.htm):

Mother Tongue

"Much has been written and said about love for one's mother tongue. You too must have heard of it many times, but very few are granted the opportunity to experience it personally. We had only recently arrived in Bombay. More than an age has passed since the incident, yet I cannot bring myself to forget it—and why should I? We were lost in the dazzling metropolis and feared losing our way. In the 1980s a scheme of Sanjay Gandhi's offered unemployed graduates bank loans of Rs 20,000 on favourable terms. I was an unemployed doctor myself. I applied and received the loan immediately. But what was I to do with the money? I could have invested in my profession: a dispensary or a small house in which I might later open a clinic. All that was quite accessible and possible then, though today it would be a dream at that price. By investing the money I could have secured my future, bought jewellery and ornaments to satisfy my wishes, or travelled throughout India. But no! My husband, Dr Manikant Mishra, wished to launch a magazine in Maithili. Together we started a Maithili periodical called Videha. The magazine was printed, certainly, but who would buy it and who would read it? That was the great problem. Somehow, investing our household savings, we kept it going for two years. Then we had to close it. Both of us practised medicine, and managing home, hospital and family responsibilities was very difficult. We were newcomers to Bombay. No ordinary person would have dared such an undertaking; only Dr Manikant Mishra could do it, because of his passionate attachment to Maithili. Neither Bombay's frantic life nor the ups and downs of his health diminished his devotion to the language."

"...And twenty or twenty-two years later, he committed all his money and the whole strength of his body to making the Maithili film Au Piya Hamar Nagari. It was a beautiful film; perhaps you have seen it. If not, please watch it at least once. I cannot now describe the hardships and experiences of making it. Perhaps another time...! But amid these events, Mother Maithili was parted forever from her worthy son. Is there any devoted son of his mother tongue who can feel Mother Maithili's heartache and dedicate everything to her?"

Story 3

Greetings on 15 August 2022, India's seventy-sixth Independence Day. It was a coincidence that Videha's sixty-fourth issue had been published electronically on 15 August 2010, twelve years earlier, on the country's sixty-fourth Independence Day. This time its 352nd issue has just appeared online.

My father died in 1995, aged fifty-five. Twelve years ago, however, his friends and elders from the village were still alive. When the sisters of Parashuramji and Dhaneshwarji went to Jhanjharpur to study with Mallikji, wealthy local people ostracised them. Parashuramji's sister's studies were interrupted. Dhaneshwarji, who was somewhat older, held his ground. The British police were made to arrest him, and the person who had arranged his arrest later continued receiving a freedom-fighter's pension. In 1942 Dhaneshwarji and his companions drove the British police out of the police station and installed Phekan Munshi as its officer in charge. I recall my father's words: a wealthy former MLA from the village refused to sign his scholarship form. Nevertheless, he obtained admission to engineering at MIT Muzaffarpur in 1959, with roll number one and the highest marks.

On one occasion Dhaneshwarji, Parashuramji and my father went to eat at Gopeshji's house. It was a protest against the ostracism led by wealthy people after Gopeshji had eaten eggs. Dhaneshwarji and Gopeshji are no longer with us, and Parashuramji too died this year. After retiring in 1998 from a professorship of English in Kolkata, Parashuramji wrote two English books on "English Poetics". In my book Kurukshetram of the Inner Mind, the dedication reads:

"I had seen my father bear truth with a mind steadfast and undisturbed;

It was then that I understood

That renunciation might not have been made;

The path is to be obstinately resolute.

—Dedicated to all the fond and bitter memories of my father."

Reading it, he held both my cheeks in his hands and could not restrain his tears. Many villagers wept on reading the dedication, saying that it was all the fruit of my father's merit. I do not know why these memories returned again on Independence Day.

Story 4

The Sahitya Akademi Award Controversy

Paghalait Himakhand is a collection of poems translated by Dr Shiv Kumar Prasad from Rajni Chhabra's Hindi original Pighalte Himkhand. It reached the final round—and lost there. We shall see what happens next year. It appeared serially online in Videha and was later published as a book. The poems were collected in Videha Sadeha 28, available for download at http://www.videha.co.in/new_page_89.htm. The writer belongs not to what I call the "washed-dhoti" tradition, but to the "plain-dhoti" tradition. This time, for the first time, the main award went to a novelist of that plain-dhoti tradition, Shri Jagdish Prasad Mandal, for his novel Pangu; it was unprecedented in the history of the Sahitya Akademi.

The prize had seemed reserved for those in washed dhotis. Pangu appeared serially online in Videha and then as a book, and was collected in Videha Sadeha 21, downloadable from the same link. The Sahitya Akademi Tagore Literature Award for Maithili in 2011 had also been given to Shri Jagdish Prasad Mandal for his short-story collection Gamak Jingi. The ceremony took place in Kochi on 12 June 2012. There seems little chance of Maithili's controversies ending. Even then, when referees forwarded seven names for the 2011 Tagore Literature Award in Maithili, one book had not even been published within the stipulated 2007–09 period. Was it recommended without being examined? Did the Sahitya Akademi identify the person who recommended it? Was that person's name made public? Was the person permanently barred? None of this happened. How, then, can Maithili's standing be preserved?

The award should also have gone to Shiv Kumar Prasad, but two people from the plain-dhoti tradition could not be honoured in the same year. Even a single award to someone in a plain dhoti has provoked an uproar among washed-dhoti wearers from both forward and backward communities and among those I call "mixed-varna" litterateurs (the term has nothing whatever to do with biological mixture of varnas).

Those wearing washed dhotis should relinquish the translation assignments they distribute among themselves through the Sahitya Akademi. Those assignments ought instead to be offered to Nand Vilas Rai, Rajdev Mandal, Rambillas Sahu, Dhirendra Kumar, Durganand Mandal, Manoj Kumar Mandal, Shiv Kumar Prasad, Umesh Paswan, Sandeep Kumar Safi, Bechan Thakur, Meghan Prasad, Kishan Karigar, Laldev Mahto, Umesh Mandal, Shardanand Singh, Subhash Kumar Kamat, Munni Kamat and others. That would create an army of Agniveers for Maithili. Meghan Prasad expressed this wish in an article in Videha, yet he was not offered a translation assignment. Half-congratulations to Ashok Avichal: during his tenure only one person in a plain dhoti, not two, managed to receive an award. What new pretexts the magicians of the washed-dhoti factions, both forward and backward, will devise, and whether the Sahitya Akademi will once more become the exclusive preserve of washed-dhoti wearers next year—only the future can tell.

Story 5

A Literary Event

I shall recount a literary event. It occurred in the modern period of Tamil literature.

The mainstream summoned scholars from across the world and staged an enormous array of programmes and publicity. Writers of quite extraordinary stature were invited, event followed event, and the radio and television were full of promotion. The mainstream threw money about. The grand number-one programme came to an end.

What did the parallel current do? It published an anthology of contemporary alternative prose and poetry called Kurukshetram. Produced on ordinary paper with a plain design, this Kurukshetram shook Tamil literature. A debate began over which of two simultaneous events had contributed more to the history of Tamil literature: the money-squandering world—or perhaps universe—conference of Tamil literature, or Kurukshetram.

The majority held that the modestly printed and designed Kurukshetram was the more significant event.

Videha's special issues devoted to living writers have become the Kurukshetram of Maithili literature. In Facebook debates writers have acknowledged that these special issues have gained greater importance than the Sahitya Akademi Award. The clamour surrounding the Akademi, despite the lakhs of rupees at stake, shows no sign of dying down. The mainstream has become entangled in its own net: those who received assignments clamour for awards, those who received awards struggle for assignments, and those who received neither demand both. Those who have received both are in the worst situation: neither does the Akademi properly recognise them nor can their writing stand before the parallel current. A few exceptions have fallen into depression or begun declaring themselves marginalised, indeed members of the parallel current.

In other words, proclaiming oneself marginalised or part of the parallel current has become a fashion among mainstream writers, whether of forward or backward communities (the writers of towering stature in both belong to the mainstream). But it is not, in fact, a fashion...

Story 6

How Does One Become a Scholar?

"Maithili was the language of Sita, mother of the universe"—"Hanuman said: mānuṣīm iha saṃskṛtām."

A Pillar of Letters (akkhar / akṣara)

"In the field of the three worlds, how shall his creeper of fame spread if, erecting pillars of letters, he does not raise the platform?" [Verse retained from Kīrtilatā: tihuan khettahi kāñi tasu kittivalli pasarei / akkhar khambhārambha jau mañco bandhi na dei.]

[The first couplet of the first pallava of Kīrtilatā.] That is, if one does not build pillars made of letters and upon them erect the stage of poetry, how can the creeper of one's fame spread across the field of the three worlds?

You will have seen people in villages who make telling use of Sanskrit maxims. Before Videha appeared in Maithili literature, a writer who could recite ten such maxims from memory qualified as a scholar. Bashō too rightly said that whoever had composed three to five haiku in a lifetime was a haiku poet, and someone who had composed ten was a great poet.

Here are thirty-two selected Sanskrit maxims. Memorise just ten and you too will be a mighty scholar by the standards of Maithili's mainstream. But where is that shortcut in the parallel current? There will be nobody here to flatter you; you will have to work hard.

Subhāṣitam ("Well-spoken words": a maxim)

Learning protects like a mother, directs one towards one's good like a father, and, like a beloved, delights and drives away distress.

It increases prosperity and spreads fame to every quarter. Like a wish-fulfilling creeper, what can learning not accomplish?

What can scripture do for someone who possesses no understanding of their own?

What use is a mirror to a person without eyes?

Who in this world does not live for their own sake?

It is the person who lives for the good of others who truly lives.

An ant that keeps walking can travel even hundreds of yojanas;

Even Garuḍa, if he does not move, cannot advance a single step.

Straw for seating, the earth, water, and, fourth, gracious speech:

Even these are never lacking in the home of a good person.

People who invariably say agreeable things are easy to find in this world;

Rare are the speakers—and listeners—of truths that are unpleasant but beneficial.

The single safeguard of acquired wealth is giving it away;

Just as the water held within a pond is kept wholesome by its outflow. [The source verse is textually irregular.]

Knowledge confined to books and money held in another person's hands —

When the moment of need arrives, neither that knowledge nor that wealth is of use.

The union of many things, each with little strength, can accomplish a task;

Twisted into ropes, blades of grass can bind even an enraged elephant.

A pot gradually fills with the falling of single drops of water;

This is the principle behind the accumulation of knowledge, merit, and wealth.

One should consider beforehand what to do when disaster strikes;

It is no use beginning to dig a well once the house is burning.

Regard other people's wives as mothers, and their possessions as mere clods of earth;

Whoever regards all beings as oneself is a learned person.

One whose plans and counsels are not known to outsiders,

And whose deeds alone become known when accomplished, is called wise by everyone.

One whose heart is compassionate and whose speech is adorned with truth,

And whose body labours for others—what can the age of Kali do to such a person?

People imitate one another; they do not always pursue ultimate truth.

"Because of a sand-made liṅga beside the Ganges, my copper vessel disappeared." [A satirical maxim about unthinking imitation.]

The hand is adorned by generosity, not bracelets; purity comes from bathing, not sandalwood paste.

Fulfilment comes from honour, not food; liberation from knowledge, not a shaved head.

A student receives one quarter of learning from the teacher, and another through personal intelligence;

A third from fellow students, and the fourth through the passage of time.

As the mind is, so are the words; as the words are, so are the deeds;

In great people there is unity of thought, speech, and action.

No syllable is without the possibility of a mantra; no root is without medicinal potential;

No person is inherently useless; what is rare is someone who can put each to the right use.

One who weighs merit and defect in what lies ahead, decides promptly in the present,

And understands what remains from the past is not overwhelmed by misfortune.

Do not grieve over what is past, nor be anxious about the future;

The discerning attend to the present moment.

Trees give others shade while standing in the scorching sun themselves;

Their fruits too are offered to others: trees are like good people.

What is remarkable about treating a benefactor well?

One who treats even an enemy well is rightly praised as good.

Work is accomplished through effort, not wishes;

Deer do not walk into the mouth of a sleeping lion.

"This one is mine, that one a stranger"—such calculation belongs to narrow minds;

For the generous in spirit, the whole world is one family.

All living creatures are pleased by kindly words;

So speak kindly: what poverty is there in words?

No consecration or rite is performed to crown the lion in the forest;

By its own strength and prowess it becomes king of beasts.

Harder than a thunderbolt, softer than flowers—

Who can fathom the hearts of extraordinary people?

The gift of food is a noble gift, but the gift of knowledge is greater;

Food satisfies for a moment; learning sustains one for a lifetime.

Six defects must be abandoned by anyone who seeks prosperity:

Excessive sleep, torpor, fear, anger, laziness, and procrastination.

Without causing others pain, without stooping to the wicked,

And without abandoning the path of the good, even a small achievement is great.

A country with a vast expanse of land and a population too numerous to reach,

If deprived of organisation, cannot protect itself.

Story 7

Now, a Few Pieces of Advice

At the request of my friends, I am setting down here some of the advice I often offer them in conversation.

Always drink low-fat milk and eat less salt. Reduce your consumption of meat, though you can eat more fish. Pay attention to the daily routines of people in your neighbourhood; otherwise change your home. Praise people, for your appreciation will greatly encourage them. Cook a vegetable dish or another delicacy for a neighbour and write down the recipe for them as well. Harbour neither malice nor prejudice against anyone. When visiting a shopping mall, park the car far away and walk there with your family and children. Do not watch violent television serials; boycott the products of the companies sponsoring them. Respect all people, animals, and birds. If you borrow someone's vehicle, return it with the petrol or diesel tank completely full. People usually do the reverse: they borrow a car with fuel and bring it back on reserve. You will see the owner speak well of you for days and never make excuses about lending it to you again. Greet five or seven people every day. Keep one or two domestic animals; if you live in Delhi or Mumbai, raise a dog instead. At least once a month watch the sunrise—and watch the stars too. Remember other people's names and birthdays. Always tip the person serving your food in a hotel. Greet people warmly when you meet them, shake hands, and always look them in the eye while speaking. Use words of thanks and respect. Be sure to learn a musical instrument; if nothing else, you can surely play the jhāl cymbals. Sing while bathing.

Measure your success by the service you render to others, not by things you acquire at someone else's expense. Deceiving others is wrong; being deceived is not. Learn how to conduct an interview and what its essential points are. Listen to rumours but do not embellish or contribute to their circulation. Attend to your children's worries and fears. Do not quarrel with your mother. Do not believe everything you hear. Save something from the money you have before spending it. Treat elderly people courteously. Never tolerate evil or injustice. Preserve letters of appreciation. Distribute the printed text of a seminar address only after you have delivered it. Begin saving for your children's education as soon as you marry. Parents should always teach their children independence. You can become mentally independent only when you stop waiting for others to solve your problems. Marriage and bringing up children are not such burdensome matters. Smiling makes you look beautiful: laugh heartily. Unless you undertake new things, how will you learn new things? If you insist on doing a task without a single mistake, that task may never be completed. Even after a long interval, try to repair a damaged relationship. Human feeling can help us accomplish a task and overcome even the hardest circumstances. You learn about a path, an idea or an undertaking by advancing along it, not merely by arguing about it. A friend is someone who knows all your virtues and failings and likes you nonetheless.

Always share your knowledge and experience, and remain modest in speech, action and judgement. When someone speaks well of a friend of yours, let that friend know. If you believe an action is right, do it. Do not work merely to establish a reputation; do work that people can recognise and remember. The great changes of life arrive without warning. Teach children not to undervalue another person because of their limitations. Whatever you do, do with your whole heart. Always be among the first to applaud at the end of a play. Think, believe in your idea, dream, and have the courage to realise your dream.

Story 8

I now present a review written in 2008–09, published electronically in Videha and later included in my book Kurukshetram of the Inner Mind (2009).

Kedarnath Chaudhary's Novels Chamelirani and Mahur

Kedarnath Chaudhary's first novel, Chamelirani, appeared in 2004. It ended so attractively that readers clamoured for a second part, prompting the novelist to write Mahur. Reviewing Chamelirani in Vidyapati Times, Dhirendranath Mishra wrote: "Just as the emperor of humour Harimohan Babu had to write Dviragaman after Kanyadan, this novelist too will have to write a second part to Chamelirani." Both volumes will be remembered in Maithili fiction for several reasons. As Ramlochan Thakur asks, "Why was the arrival of this writer with his touchstone-like talent so long delayed?" That question truly remains unanswered. With his considerable energies, Chaudhary pursued education and employment in America, Iran and elsewhere. But when the producer of Mamta Gābay Gīt returned to Darbhanga, he poured the experiences of his whole life into these two novels. I once asked Rajmohan Jha about this in an interview, and he said writing is impossible without lived experience; the broader a writer's experience, the greater the variety and novelty that writer can bring. Chamelirani and Mahur prove the point. Chamelirani established a new sales record: five hundred copies were sold in Janakpur alone. The author dedicated it "To every lover of Maithili who has spent even a penny of their own money during their entire life to buy a Maithili book or periodical." But its extraordinary sales obliged him to issue a second edition in 2007, before Mahur appeared in 2008. For the second volume he evidently thought it better to omit the dedication. I noticed another distinctive feature late in 2008, when Haryana's deputy chief minister disappeared for a month. Diplomatic and political compulsions made it impossible to take action against him until his return. Our Gulab Mishra likewise remained in office despite disappearing, because of the same political compulsion; nobody could remove him, whatever difficulties that created for the government.

The novelist's life experience had enabled him to imagine such a possibility four years in advance. Prophecy does not spring from sorcery: lived experience makes such anticipation possible.

The characters in both novels are remarkable—and successful—because the novelist creates them as though he has known everything about them from personal experience.

At the opening of Chamelirani, the author passes his first test: a rhythmic beginning awakens the reader's interest. When Kirtimukh's close friend Kantir suggests names for Kirtimukh's five sons, he says: "Give the five sons the names of the five Pandavas. It will be convenient." Elsewhere the writer observes that, had children continued to arrive at the same speed, names from the Kauravas would have been needed. Until the heroine Chamelirani arrives, Kirtimukh's sons are described. Then come the Englishman Demsford and Rupkummari's daughter Sunayana; Sunayana's daughter Shanichari; and Shanichari's marriage to the political leader Ramthenga Singh "Chingari". The leader, fearing public disgrace, leaves Shanichari in Kanhi Modiyani's care and goes to Patna. His death, followed by Shanichari's marriage to Kirtimukh, draws these strands of the story together again.

The narrative then introduces Chamelirani, a boarding-school student at the school attached to the Barauni refinery and the daughter of Kanhi Modiyani. By the time Kanhi Modiyani dies, Chamelirani has passed her tenth-standard examination. Bhukhan Singh is her adoptive or religious father. The first part closes with an account of a robbery.

The second part recounts a previously planned robbery of an MLA's money or treasure, represented as the consequence of the rape of a modern young woman by MLA Nangtanath. Nangtanath, formerly an attendant of Chief Minister Gulab Misir, had made his way into the legislature through political manoeuvring.

This character closely resembles Balram Halwai in Aravind Adiga's Booker Prize-winning English novel of 2008, The White Tiger: a boy working in a tea stall becomes the driver of a wealthy Delhi man, murders him and makes himself rich. Yet Chaudhary had conceived his character four years earlier. Then enters the KGB agent Bhataji, whose presence remains strikingly effective through the second volume, Mahur.

In the third part, Ahmadullah Khan's operation is equally absorbing and draws together the ugliness of contemporary politics. The fourth part recounts Gulab Misir's tale and once again recalls Adiga's Balram Halwai. Gulab Misir summons Panna, a friend of Bhukhan Singh, and tells him about Bhukhan Singh's actions against Nangtanath and Ahmadullah. He orders Panna to kill him; Panna refuses. Gulab Misir nevertheless has Bhukhan Singh killed by deception.

The fifth part concerns Bhukhan Singh's trust. Chamelirani leaves her base and travels to Baidyanath Dham. Her political ambitions now come into view. A sting operation traps Gulab Misir.

The sixth part discusses how, even after the chief minister's disappearance, only a fact-finding committee is constituted—an observation on the compulsions of coalition politics.

The first part of the second volume, Mahur, circles back to the organisation of Chamelirani's party. The novelist uses organisations that oppress women, perpetuate child widowhood, and push women into prostitution as subjects of commentary.

The second part of Mahur describes Gulab Misir's arrival in the capital. Chamelirani visits a Naxalite leader's hideout to seek support for her campaign. The author uses the occasion to present his views on the entire Naxalite movement; his vivid account of forest life and Adivasi communities demonstrates his skill. Chamelirani learns another secret: her mother, Kanhi Modiyani, came from a very prominent family; Patel had subjected her to atrocities, her father had been murdered, and the unfortunate woman had survived by living as Kanhi Modiyani. These revelations deepen the novel's fascination.

The third part again generates mystery and suspense amid the conspiracies of Pachkauri Miyan, Gulab Misir, the ISI and the KGB.

The fourth part of Mahur describes Chamelirani avenging the atrocities inflicted on her parents. She becomes wealthy after acquiring property worth thousands of crores.

The fifth part ends with political manoeuvring and the victory of Chamelirani's party.

Critical Discussion: Despite the bourgeois origins of the novel as a genre, it has acquired such complexity that it thoroughly tests a writer's talent. Although Cervantes's Don Quixote appeared at the beginning of the seventeenth century, the genre did not attain a fully serious form until shortly before the nineteenth. Debate and dialogue in the novel produce the essayistic element; young men and women's characters bring romance; people and geography supply historical description; then come stories of good and bad characters. Sometimes the novel makes readers laugh, sometimes it instructs them. Marxism argues for the novel's social realism. Freud sees human beings as mysterious and selects literary works as instruments for analysing their authors, whereas neo-Freudianism places greater emphasis on cultural than on biological factors. New Criticism rests on close and detailed engagement with the work. Together with all this, life experience remains one-sided, and the writer here creates a world in which repressed desires can be satisfied, while the reader walks the boundary between reality and imagination.

Story 9

The Saketanand Episode

Saketanand's post of 12 November 2009:

http://saketanands.blogspot.com/2009/11/blog-post_12.html

He writes:

"It seems to me that, just as some politicians begin to fidget the moment they see a crowd, a stage and a microphone, certain writers do the same. Once two or four of their works have been discussed somewhere, they immediately become 'established'. Thereafter, if they glimpse a literary stage, they are ready to seize a chair. Seeing Alok Dhanwa seated with Namvar at the book fair held in Patna, I felt that writing and the politics of literature are opposite poles that cannot coexist. Maithili still has the generosity of its own soil and a touch of the ayācī tradition, refusing to solicit favours. Even now, without considering who will publish a text or, more importantly, who will read it, people keep writing, and writing without end."

"In my view, when people find something worth reading—of whatever kind—they will certainly read it."

"So should people now write Chamelirani?"

Story 10

This Is Not a Story

Saketanand was a learned man, but wrote out of envy. Harimohan Jha too had to endure such harassment. Neither Harimohan Jha nor Kedarnath Chaudhary was someone who had merely memorised Sanskrit maxims. Harimohan Jha translated Datta and Chatterjee's An Introduction to Indian Philosophy into Hindi, not to win a translation award but to prove himself as a professor of philosophy. He also made his fictional character Khattar Kaka recite Sanskrit verses; the difference is in their use.

People have sacrificed everything for Maithili. Dr Kalpana Manikant Mishra and Kedarnath Chaudhary are only two examples. People fear fraudsters, especially those who freeload in the name of theatre and cinema. Bhramarji's CD was even reissued by others under their own names. Literature is in much the same condition.

If the stories above have shaken you, join the parallel current. If they have not, my efforts will continue, and special issues will continue to appear for that very reason.

34. Kedarnath Chaudhary: A Re-reading of the Writer and His Novel

Abstract

Kedarnath Chaudhary—A Re-reading of the Writer and His Novel. After failing the matriculation examination, the decision to end one's life by jumping from the easily accessible Ekmi Bridge into the Bagmati's furious current could not be shaken even by the fragrance of jalebi and kachauri fried in pure country ghee. Nevertheless, one resolution was reached: before committing suicide, one would eat a hearty portion of jalebi-kachauri. Eat at the restaurant, walk to Ekmi Bridge, and the matter would end. But Khattar Kaka's own younger brother happens to be there.

Keywords: Kedarnath · Chaudhary · re-reading of the novel · chapter · film · none

Kedarnath Chaudhary: A Re-reading of the Writer and His Novel

Having failed the matriculation examination, he resolves to end his life by jumping from Ekmi Bridge, an easily accessible spot, into the Bagmati's raging waters. Even the smell of jalebi and kachauri fried in pure country ghee cannot dissuade him. Still, he decides to eat a hearty helping of jalebi-kachauri before taking his life.

So: eat jalebi-kachauri at the restaurant, go to Ekmi Bridge—and that will be the end.

But Khattar Kaka's own younger brother is present there. The background, too, is worth remembering: the incident belongs to a time when the country had already become independent and a republic.

One of the two young men was already married; the event's date is given earlier, and so the question of child marriage and related matters is settled.

Then a friend's maternal uncle arrives. He proposes to arrange employment for his nephew that will enable him to send bundles of money to his father. So the question of suicide vanishes altogether. The nephew leaves for Howrah, while the autobiographical novel's narrator, its "I", leaves for the village. Chapter One ends.

In Chapter Two, our "I" obtains an MA in Economics. Then enters Prabuddha, who has earned a PhD in England. Chapter Two ends. It does not actually end quite so quickly, but given the pace of Chapter One you can guess how the second proceeds. There is a reference to the magazine Mithila, with the observation that its paper and type were as rough as a rasp, just like Mithila itself.

Chapter Three begins with earning a living in Calcutta. Chapter Four brings the arrest of Janaki Nandan Singh and an observation attributed to someone with a PhD from England—perhaps not merely perhaps, but indeed Lakshman Jha, the famous Lakhan Jha—about what the people on the ground have said. Our "I" then departs for the residence of Mahant Madan Das. The real drama begins.

Chapter Five concerns work for Maithili, film production for that purpose, and the capital it requires: our "I" will have to resign from his job.

Born in 1936, he is now in 1961, at that age of youthful twenty-five. He resigns. Chapter Six ends.

Chapter Seven: arrival in Bombay.

Chapter Eight: Parmanand Chaudhary, in a distinctly cinematic style. The debate now turns to whether the film's story should be mythological or social.

Chapter Nine: the screenplay is ready. Rabindra becomes the lyricist. Who will sing the songs? Lata and Rafi charge Rs 3,000 for each song. Suman Kalyanpur accepts Rs 1,400 for two songs, while her husband issues a receipt for Rs 300. Geeta Dutt is continually intoxicated, troubled by difficulties with her husband Guru Dutt, who later takes his own life; she records her song in five days. Music costs Rs 14,000 in all. Phanishwar Nath Renu is deeply moved by news that a Maithili film is being made.

Chapter Ten: shooting at Rajnagar.

Chapter Eleven: filming ends after two months and thirteen days. Carrying the film negatives in twenty aluminium boxes, "I" and Madan Bhai leave for Bombay.

Chapter Twelve: panic follows the news that only a little more than half the film has actually been made.

Chapter Thirteen: they reach Calcutta with five edited reels. A screening at Ganesh Talkies takes place, and the song "Bhar nagari me sor, bauā māmī tohar gor" ("The whole town is abuzz, little one: your aunt is fair") moves everyone deeply.

Chapter Fourteen: our "I" is selected for admission to an American university.

Chapter Fifteen: he returns to India in 1977. Rabindranath Thakur acquires the rights from Kedarnath Chaudhary and has the film completed and released, earning a handsome profit.

One thing this book does not mention is that the film was also shown on Doordarshan several times.

By now you must have realised that this is no conventional novel: it carries no disclaimer that its places and characters are fictional. Yet how did its ending become as poignant as that of Harimohan Jha's Graduate Putohu? And what, after all, is a novel? Everyone's life is a novel. Let everyone write an autobiography and novels will keep coming into being.

This is a book written in an autobiographical manner. Its "I" is Kedarnath Chaudhary. It tells the story of why people flee even from the road on which programmes are organised in the name of Maithili and Mithila.

That is why I regard all of Kedarnath Chaudhary's writing as compulsory reading for candidates preparing for competitive examinations. Even children's fathers would be unable to stage the Maithili translation of Rabindranath Tagore's children's play published by the Sahitya Akademi. I cannot accept the argument that whatever is being done by theatrical, literary and Mithila-activist institutions must therefore be right.

The novel belongs to the autobiographical and memoiristic categories.

If you can "shoot" your own life, you will discover that life seen through the lens has greater impact. A stage actor moving into cinema may not need glycerine to bring tears to their eyes. You may think that if you film yourself driving along an empty road in the rain, the lens will transform you into a "film hero". I refuse to give that illusion any importance. I believe not only examination candidates but literary writers too should read these books. Indeed I advise everyone to take a summer course in photography. Here is another suggestion: mobile phones now have cameras; record five or ten minutes of video every day. Look at the world through square, rectangular, triangular and other frames, and experience how even the weightiest subject can be made intelligible. The physicist Feynman, of The Feynman Lectures, is celebrated for teaching physics engagingly. Yet here we have remarkable worthies who write even "fiction" as though it were "physics".

Why do people not watch art films? Because writers and directors imagine that merely choosing an art-film subject will win them prizes. In reality, art films can also become hits. The Kashmir Files, though a documentary-style film, succeeded because its director and scriptwriter were not dishonest. When the Polish people in Schindler's List say, "Go, Jew, go," does that make the film one-sided? Must we now introduce a good Polish person into the script to correct it? Neither can everything fit into a 180-minute film (100 minutes abroad), nor into a memoir of one hundred or one hundred and twenty-five pages. Someone may object that Kedarnath Chaudhary abandoned the film and Rabindranath Thakur completed it. But that is precisely what the book itself says.

Plain language requires greater talent. In this small book we meet campaigners for Mithila whom everyone respects—but that is as far as it goes. We also encounter the condition of Maithili institutions. Should people therefore abandon the undertaking like gamblers leaving the table? No. Instead, look at yourself within the frame and ask what work you were made to do.

The sharpness of Kedarnath Chaudhary's pen does not arise from talent alone. It also comes from what he experienced in Bombay, and from the art of "shooting" and "editing" frames that he learned and observed there. That art appears in all his writing. Many people go on "shooting" indefinitely but lose their sense of how much to "edit".

His work has an edge in both senses: the edge that cuts and the current that flows. That is how a memoir has become a novel.

Appendix: Shailendra Mohan Jha's composition, collected in Videha Sadeha 32 (available at http://videha.co.in/new_page_89.htm). Notice how Mamta Gābay Gīt has become a legend among the younger generation and entered a song.

Shailendra Mohan Jha

I am fortunate to belong to Bharwara, the village of Gonu Jha, whom the whole of India knows as a supreme master of humour. I presently work as a manager with Tata Motors Finance Limited in Sambalpur.

A Dream

I lay asleep one afternoon and saw a dream;
Sister-in-law, I was married—my bride was lovely as the moon.
My dream broke, dear sister-in-law, in the middle of the afternoon...

When I met her I was overjoyed;
Seeing her beauty, sister-in-law, I was astonished.
I asked her name, and she said it was Rajni;
That dream-beauty became the queen of my heart.

She asked me, "Tell me, beloved, how do I look?"
I said, "Listen, my darling, you look like the moon.
Yet even the moon has blemishes, while you are spotless.
Your eyes are like Aishwarya's, your nose like Juhi Chawla's;
Your hair is like Neelam's, your cheeks like Vyjayanthimala's."

Then I asked, "And how do I look?"
She said, "Not so good; well, you are just about all right.

But, darling, why have you become so bald while still young?"
"You resemble Sunny a little, and Rahul Roy somewhat;
And there is something of Govinda in you too—that is my opinion."

Then I said, "Come, my beloved, let us go sightseeing in Darbhanga.
I shall buy a sari for you, and an aṅgā garment for myself.
I have two tickets for Uma Talkies, seats side by side;
Together we will watch Mamta Gābay Gīt."
I took her hand in mine and rose to depart;
I took her hand in mine and rose to depart;
Just then Pintua woke me—just then Pintua woke me, and I rose from sleep.
My dream was broken, dear sister-in-law, in the middle of the afternoon...

My hair has become rather sparse.
The title of a well-known Maithili film.
*Pintua is my younger brother.

35. The Sahitya Akademi Awards Controversy: Yuva and Bal Awards, 2022

Abstract

The Sahitya Akademi Awards controversy (Yuva and Bal Awards, 2022): There seems no prospect of the controversies surrounding Maithili coming to an end. Antataḥ ("At Last"), the poetry collection by Munni Kamat, reached the final round and lost there—or was made to lose. Some of Munni Kamat's books are available for download at http://www.videha.co.in/archive.htm.

Keywords: Akademi · awards · controversy · youth · 2022 · Shri · Mandal

The Sahitya Akademi Awards Controversy (Yuva and Bal Awards, 2022): There seems no prospect of the controversies surrounding Maithili coming to an end.

1

The Yuva Puraskar Controversy

Antataḥ, Munni Kamat's collection of poems, reached the final round and lost—or was made to lose. Let us see what happens next year. Some of Munni Kamat's books can be downloaded from http://www.videha.co.in/archive.htm. The author belongs not to the "washed-dhoti-and-sari" tradition, but to the "plain-dhoti-and-sari" tradition. Her writing contains genuine feminist questioning, as well as subjects the mainstream has not yet even thought to address—for example, the use of poor people as test subjects or "vectors" in drug trials, and their deaths. Be that as it may...

2

The Bal Sahitya Puraskar Controversy

Discussion of this is futile. The shortlisted books all came from people in immaculate, dazzlingly white washed dhotis and saris—those "farmhouse-chicken" types. People of the plain-dhoti tradition had also published books, but for children, not for juries. Who prepared the preliminary list? Will their names be made public? Will they be permanently barred? If not, how is Maithili's reputation to survive?

This year, for the first time, the principal award was given to a novelist from the plain-dhoti tradition, Shri Jagdish Prasad Mandal, for his novel Pangu. It was the first such event in the history of the Sahitya Akademi. The award had seemed reserved for the washed-dhoti circle. The novel was published serially online in Videha before appearing as a book, and was collected in Videha Sadeha 21, available for download at http://www.videha.co.in/archive.htm.

The Yuva award should also have gone to Munni Kamat, and a translation award to Shiv Kumar Prasad, but it would apparently be impossible to honour two or three plain-dhoti-and-sari writers in the same year. Even the recognition of one plain-dhoti writer has provoked an uproar among washed-dhoti wearers of both forward and backward communities and among those whom I call "mixed-varna" litterateurs (this has nothing to do with biological mixture of varnas). But two from the plain-dhoti tradition cannot, it seems, be honoured in the same year. Recognition of just one has already stirred the same uproar among washed-dhoti wearers of both forward and backward communities and among the "mixed-varna" litterateurs (again, the term has no biological connotation).

Shri Jagdish Prasad Mandal, Shri Rajdev Mandal and Shri Bechan Thakur —respectively, in my view, the greatest living Maithili novelist and storyteller, poet, and dramatist—along with Shri Umesh Paswan, Shri Umesh Mandal, Shri Ramdev Prasad Mandal "Jharudar", and Shri Durganand Mandal: are there no assignments for any of them? But can an alleged conspiracy by the Maithili Advisory Board to destroy Maithili actually kill the language? No. Why not? Because Jagdish Prasad Mandal, Rajdev Mandal, Bechan Thakur, Umesh Paswan, Umesh Mandal, Ramdev Prasad Mandal "Jharudar", Durganand Mandal and many others are nourishing its roots with their own body, mind and money—with their sweat and blood. This alleged conspiracy to kill Maithili will not succeed. The language will live.

Every member of the advisory committee should immediately return or cause the return of their assignments—"their own" meaning those taken for themselves, their families, children or protégés. Otherwise they should face pressure to resign. Aṣṭajāma devotional singing should take place before their homes; the national song should be sung, and an aṣṭajāma of the national song held.

If a Mithila state were created under these circumstances, those same ten families would consume it entirely.

The organisations campaigning for Mithila statehood should burn these spurious translations at their meetings. Only then could they show whether they intend to create a state of Mithila or merely a state of Maithili.

Those in washed dhotis should give up the Sahitya Akademi translation assignments they pass among themselves. The assignments should be given to Nand Vilas Rai, Rajdev Mandal, Rambillas Sahu, Dhirendra Kumar, Durganand Mandal, Manoj Kumar Mandal, Shiv Kumar Prasad, Umesh Paswan, Sandeep Kumar Safi, Bechan Thakur, Meghan Prasad, Kishan Karigar, Laldev Mahto, Umesh Mandal, Shardanand Singh, Subhash Kumar Kamat, Munni Kamat and others, thus creating an army of Agniveers for Maithili. Meghan Prasad expressed that wish in Videha, yet did not receive an assignment. One-third congratulations to Ashok Avichal: during his tenure only one plain-dhoti writer, rather than three plain-dhoti-and-sari writers, received an award. What excuses the wily washed-dhoti factions of both forward and backward groups will produce, and whether next year the Sahitya Akademi will again become an all-washed-dhoti preserve, remains hidden in the womb of the future.

PART III — LITERARY CRITICISM

Poetry, Songs, Metre and the Reading of Verse

36. The Forgotten Poet: Pandit Ramji Chaudhary (1878–1952)

Abstract

Pandit Ramji Chaudhary (1878–1952) was born in Rudrapur village, Andhratharhi police-station area, Madhubani district. His ancestral origin was Pagulbar Raje, of the Shandilya gotra. In the family genealogy, Jivan Chaudhary, born in Panchobh, Darbhanga, came to Rudrapur in 1801. He had two sons: Shri Rangi Chaudhary and Shri Kant Chaudhary, both born in Rudrapur.

Keywords: forgotten · poet · Pandit · Ramji · Chaudhary · 1878 · 1952 · literary criticism

Pandit Ramji Chaudhary (1878–1952) was born in Rudrapur village, Andhratharhi police-station area, Madhubani district. His ancestral origin was Pagulbar Raje, of the Shandilya gotra.

Genealogy: Jivan Chaudhary, born in Panchobh, Darbhanga, came to Rudrapur in 1801.

—His two sons were Shri Rangi Chaudhary (born in Rudrapur) and Shri Kant Chaudhary (born in Rudrapur).

—Kant Chaudhary had three sons: Shri Chumman Chaudhary, Shri Budhan Chaudhary and Shri Rudan Chaudhary.

—Chumman Chaudhary had two sons: Shri Goni Chaudhary and the poet Pandit Ramji Chaudhary.

Shri Jivan Chaudhary was the poet's great-grandfather. His maternal relatives lived in Rudrapur; that was why he left Panchobh in 1801 and settled in Rudrapur.

The poet's grandfather was an accomplished singer. His chief repertoire consisted of devotional songs addressed to the divine couple Sita and Rama, and this deeply influenced the poet. It was for this reason that he named his grandson Ramji. True to his name, the late poet had memorised Tulsidas's Shri Ramcharitmanas. He answered every question with a chaupai from the Ramayana. The most sorrowful circumstance of his life was that he married three times, yet none of his wives lived longer than four years after marriage. He married for the last time at the age of fifty-three. That wife died within fifteen days of giving birth to a son, Durganath Chaudhary (Dukhiya Chaudhary).

During his lifetime the poet served as a senior raiyat under the Darbhanga Raj. After the death of his third wife he resigned even from that position and devoted himself to worship. His sole published book and his unpublished manuscript contain poetry in Brajabuli as well as Maithili.

These poems bear the imprint of the poet's grandfather's knowledge of ragas; they also include Mithila's Maheshvani songs, Chait-month thumris and morning devotional songs, known as prabhati or parati.

Just as Shankardev composed in Maithili rather than Assamese, Ramji Chaudhary composed in Brajabuli as well as Maithili. Each of his poems identifies a raga, as do the Vidyapati lyrics recovered from Nepal. This influence seems to have come from his grandfather, himself a singer. The people of Mithila worship five deities, yet a Shiva shrine will be found in every village; accordingly, Ramji Chaudhary composed Maheshvani songs, thumris for the month of Chait, and morning hymns (parati or prabhati). The ragas and song forms named in his works are:

1. Raga Rekhta; 2. Lavani; 3. Raga Jhaptala; 4. Raga Dhrupad; 5. Raga Sangeet; 6. Raga Desh; 7. Raga Gauri; 8. Tirhut; 9. Bhajan Vinay; 10. Bhajan Bhairavi; 11. Bhajan Ghazal; 12. Holi; 13. Raga Shyam Kalyan; 14. Kavita; 15. Damphak Holi; 16. Raga Kagu Kafi; 17. Raga Vihag; 18. Ghazal Thumri; 19. Raga Pavas Chaumasa; 20. Bhajan Prabhati; 21. Maheshvani; and 22. Bhajan Kirtan.

His compositions are presented below. All the Maithili verses are reproduced here from his only published book and from a manuscript which the poet had Shri Harekant Chaudhary (now deceased) write out, and which was obtained through Shri Shrimohan Chaudhary.

Various Devotional Songs

Salutations to Shri Ganesha.

1. Prayer

Victory to Ganesha, fair son of Shankara, exceedingly gracious to the helpless;

Protector, round-bellied and wondrously formed, elephant-faced: even the thousand-faced one could not recount your glory.

I am utterly ignorant, I know nothing; grant my heart meditation upon your lotus feet.

Hear something of Ramji's petition: he longs to describe the virtues of Rama.

2. Raga Dhrupad

O mind, serve most gracious Shankara, merciful destroyer of his servants' sorrows;

The Ganga adorns his matted hair; ash covers his body, and a garland of skulls rests upon his breast.

A serpent is his sacred thread, his eyes are vast; drinking vijaya, he wanders in rapture.

The trident is in his hand, a tiger skin his raiment; he keeps alive his servant's hope, O divine lord.

He dwells on Kailash with Girija beside him; the rhythm resounds, the moon shines upon his brow.

Lord of Kashi, your glory is boundless; hearing of it, I hurried to your door.

Look kindly upon poor Ramji; let me swiftly encounter the lord of Ayodhya.

3. Raga Sangeet

The Lord himself dances.

On every side of the woodland bowers stand lovely, dense trees, adorned with blossoms; flowers seem to blush, celestial trees gleam in the moonlight. (1)

Clappers, the damph and cymbals sound; the gopis fill every direction; peacocks cry and dance, and Radha takes up the mridang. (2)

Flutes and other instruments sound in their own melodies; the thirty-six raginis are sung; all who hear hurry there, while waves rise on the Yamuna. (3)

The three worlds rejoice as they listen again and again; even wind and water seem to stir; Ramji peeps from his household tasks at the marvellous spectacle. (4)

4. Tirhut

My beloved has abandoned me in the bloom of youth, dear friend; what can I say of his judgment?

I have not seen him with these eyes, dear friend, though a year or two have passed.

Neither house nor bed brings delight, dear friend; if only he would clasp me fully in his arms.

What shall I do with such a life, dear friend? Others will speak only ill of me.

Fine ornaments and garments mean nothing, dear friend; little life remains in me.

My beloved has turned cruel and sits apart, dear friend; how much sorrow can Ramji endure?

5. Tirhut

Cruel Shyam has not returned, dear friend, though he gave his solemn word.

How shall I spend my days, dear friend? There is no other who cares for me.

My eyes rain tears, my body is drenched, dear friend; desire wears me down day after day.

The vermilion on my head gives no delight, dear friend, nor the ornaments at my ears.

How pitiless the Creator has become, dear friend; he knows nothing of another's pain.

Ramji's hope will not be fulfilled, dear friend; the god of love has pronounced his verdict.

6. Bhajan Bhairavi

Now, O mind, become devoted to Hari's feet.

Give up the many longings of your heart; abandon pride and deceit.

Children, wife, kin and townsfolk will be of no use in the end.

The feet on which gods, human beings and sages meditate—awake to them now, even in the night.

Worship merciful Raghupati, who has rescued thousands of the fallen.

Without worship of Hari, the days pass in vain; the world is like a dream.

Ramji, set aside every other reliance and cling now to Sita's lord.

7. Raga Vihag

Who else is there without Rama? The Lord who went and saved Ahalya, who had stood transformed into stone; who rescued the elephant Gajendra from the water on hearing its call; who lengthened Draupadi's garment in the assembly, as the whole world knows. Ramji, worship Sita's lord night and day, foolish one, if you desire happiness.

8. Thumri for Chait

Chait has come, yet my beloved has not, O Rama; my heart is troubled.

The house gives no pleasure, love torments me, and sleep will not come to my eyes.

Night and day the cuckoo keeps calling; every garden is filled with flowers.

For Ramji the spring season passes in vain if his beloved does not embrace him, O Rama.

My heart is troubled; in Chait my beloved has not come.

9. Thumri for Chait

The hostile month of Chait has arrived, O Rama; fate has turned against me.

I spread my red-and-red patterned veil upon the bed, but my beloved did not come even in a dream.

Youth's force grows day by day; my home tastes like poison.

Ramji says, life in this body is wasted; Lord, why have my eyes not seen you?

10. Thumri for Chait

The son of the Wind has come searching for Sita, O Rama.
Again and again they forbade him, yet none of the demons could prevail against him in battle.
He destroyed the grove in anger; the lord of Lanka speaks to Meghavada.
Do not kill him, son; bind him and bring him here, so that Ramji may understand the reason, O Rama.

11. Maheshvani

Listen, listen, Lord Chandeshvara; cast one merciful glance upon me, for I am utterly orphaned.
I served so many gods, demons and kings; none stood beside me in distress.
Deeply disappointed, I have placed my head at your feet with one last hope.
Wandering everywhere, I learned what pleased each person; everyone stood by self-interest.
Those counted as friends and needed relatives have all left me to suffer.
I know nothing of the Vedas or Puranas, nor the proper sentiments of worship.
Night and day I am burdened by the worry of filling my stomach and by idle talk.
The world knows that you are ever merciful toward the poor.
Fulfil all Ramji's aspirations, O Bhola Nath.

12. Maheshvani

Bam Bhola is beyond price; how many sorrowing people
Have I seen coming to him in utter distress!
Some bear suffering of body or destiny,
Others endure worldly affliction;
Some come seeking the hope of grain or money.
Some suffer for wife and children; others have many different troubles;
Some worship you for the sake of the highest good.
You sit in the thicket like a philosopher's stone, taking away everyone's suffering.
Ramji cannot say what he deserves, laden with offences as he is.

13. Maheshvani

What a remarkable bridegroom they have found for Parvati!
He has neither household nor wealth nor relatives, and will not be bound by caste or rank.
He beats his damaru on the mountain, playing night and day with ghosts and spirits.
He grows no grain at all; hemp and datura he has in plenty.

Venomous serpents hang as ornaments from every limb; the sight makes one shudder.

All the signs of perfect madness are upon him; he has smeared his limbs with ash.

Forsaking elephants, horses and the palanquin, he rides upon a great bull.

Ramji says: good fortune has now awakened!

The Lord of the three worlds will be Gauri's husband; prepare the wedding of Purahara.

14. Maheshvani

My life too has passed away in vain.

I never plucked a bilva leaf, nor did I cultivate flowers.

I never worshipped Shankara with rice, incense, lamps and sandalwood.

Nights and days slipped away as I entertained desire after desire.

Not once did I sit with a peaceful mind in meditation and chant 'Bam, Bam.'

Caught in thoughts of wife and children, my mind found no rest.

Worrying and worrying, my days passed; now this body has grown frail.

Ramji says: abandon every other hope and serve the wondrous Shiva.

Resolve in your heart that none but Shiva can remove unbearable sorrow.

15. Maheshvani

I have heard that Shiva is compassionate;

When will he listen to the suffering person's plea?

Hail him who bears the Ganga and the moon upon his brow, a garland of skulls at his throat, overcome with bhang.

Parvati occupies his left side; riding the bull, he carries a thousand serpents upon his limbs.

Lord of spirits, protector of those who bow, sky-clad one,

With ash upon his body, goblins beside him, a damaru and a tiger skin.

When will you take notice of poor Ramji?

Without Shiva, who will sustain me?

16. Maheshvani

Shiva, cut through this tangle of troubles.

How much longer shall I recount my plight?

Night and day there is no peace; hunger has become a torment.

In my anxiety I even forgot to think of you.

Friends and family held out many promises of good,

But none came to help when hardship grew severe.

Ramji's one hope is you; if you do not look upon him, he will remain distraught.

17. Maheshvani

Shiva, explain this to me:
To whom shall I go and tell my suffering?
I can find no one equal to you,
One who would hear and come at once to help.
Friends, companions, wife and children—even health—seem dear;
But seeing me penniless, they hide and turn away.
Bam Bhola Vaidyanath, receive the poor; seated in the thicket,
You scatter rubies and diamonds as gifts.
Ramji waits in hope; look upon him with merciful eyes,
O Lord, take him into your care.
Here ends the section.
May there be accomplishment; may there be well-being.

18. Prayerful Bhajan

Who but the Lord can save us from suffering?
How many afflicted people have you rescued in this world, carrying them across the ocean of existence as if it were without water? I have made so many mistakes, yet you do not seem to hear my cry. Your name has become ‘Redeemer of the Fallen’: uphold the pledge of that name, Lord, for I remain profoundly unworthy. If you show no compassion to this servant, who else will learn of his plight? Ramji has no other refuge for one so fallen.

19. Supplication to Lakshmi-Narayana

Lakshmi-Narayana, why do you not look toward me?
Everyone calls you merciful toward the poor.
Why do you shrink from the terrible sight of my sorrow?
You rescued the hunter, the courtesan, the vulture, Ajamila and the elephant.
You rescued the lowly Kaul, the Kirata and the Bhil woman.
Who could count how many fallen people you have delivered?
You have gone to Bhola Nath's abode in Rudrapur.
If you show me no mercy, what am I to do?
Keep Ramji, one orphaned servant, in your care.

20. Prayer to the Goddess

Victory, victory to Mother Janaka's daughter; you are the refuge of the three worlds.
You alone sustain the world, even Shesha, Ganesha and the gods.
No one can fully tell your glory; even the gods and their lord are humbled.

I am profoundly afflicted in this world: who in the three worlds does not know it?
I place my only hope at your feet; protect this unworthy servant.
No one else has been able to grant shelter; see how the poor are suffering.
If you will show no mercy, Mother of the World, know this in your heart:
Who then will remove my sorrow? I have abandoned all but you.
If ever you find an opportunity, tell the Lord of Ayodhya of my troubles.
Ramji has no support other than your feet.

21. Prayerful Bhajan

Who but the Lord can deliver us from sorrow?
How many suffering people have you saved in this world,
Carrying them across the ocean of existence as though it were without water!
How many mistakes I have committed;
My voice does not seem to reach your ears.
You are known by the name Redeemer of the Fallen.
Uphold that name, O Lord; I am a wretched one.
If you will not show mercy to this servant, who else will hear of him?
Ramji, fallen as he is, has no other refuge.

22. Vihag

Bhola, look upon me for a single instant.
You have rescued so many suffering people in this world; where have you gone now that my turn has come?
Lord of spirits, Shankara, beloved of Gauri, remove my distress this time.
If you do not show compassion, Shiva-Shankara, who else will ease this pain?
Knowing you to be most merciful, I have come to your shelter, having heard of your fame.
Ramji has no other refuge—no one else at all.

23. Maheshvani Bhajan

Bhola, when will you deliver me from sorrow?
The threefold afflictions come to torment me; they seek to take my life.
Night and day they remain with me; there is not a moment's rest.
I have exhausted every remedy, and my suffering grows stronger by the day.
If you do not show mercy, Shiva-Shankara, who else will remove my pain?
Keep Ramji in your shelter, Lord; know that he is the foremost among the unworthy. O Bhola!

24. Prayer in Vihag

Who but Rama can take away my sorrow?
The merciful lord of Kosala, gentle of heart,
Upon whom the sages fix their minds.
In this world you have rescued multitudes of the fallen,
Among them the courtesan, foremost of the lost.
You saved the boatman, the vulture and Ajamila,
Even though your name was spoken unknowingly.
There is no other as merciful as you,
No one so richly endowed.
Ramji cries out, having nowhere else to turn: save me from worldly existence, O Rama! [Refrain: Without Rama.]

25. Prayerful Bhajan

Lakshmi-Narayana, when will you remove my sorrow?
Redeemer of the Fallen—everyone gives you that name.
Why are you so stern when my turn comes?
The threefold suffering torments me constantly, night and day.
Who but you will deliver me?
I have served so many gods, demons and human beings,
Yet none helped me when calamity came.
How much shall I tell you, if you will not show mercy?
Who will shelter Ramji, apart from you?

26. Prayerful Bhajan

Look upon me once, O Lord.
Without you there is no one else to take away sorrow.
Night and day I never find a moment's peace;
No one else turns to look at me.
My sole hope rests at your feet: come and deliver me.
You have rescued so many fallen people that no one could count them,
Yet you do not seem to hear my words;
Have your ears become so deaf?
Your mighty power is renowned in this world;
Who does not know of it?
The courtesan, the vulture, Ajamila and the elephant—
You saved their lives, even from the water.
If you do not show mercy, descendant of Raghu,
Disaster is certain to overtake me.
Ramji has no refuge left now,

No one else at all.

27. Maheshvani

Listen, listen, O merciful one;
Who else is as compassionate as you?
Whoever comes to seek your shelter,
You have filled them all with joy.
When will you take away my suffering?
Tell me, O Jhāṛī Lal.
The Ganga adorns your matted locks; the moon rests upon your brow.
You dwell at Jhāṛī and show such care for those in sorrow.
Keep Ramji in your refuge;
Listen, listen, O Mahakala;
Take away my affliction, Shiva, and come to protect me.

28. Maheshvani

Cut through the entanglement of suffering;
Show mercy, generous Chandeshvara; cut through this snare of sorrows.
If you show no compassion, Shiva-Shankara,
To whom else shall I speak?
Each day I grow more distressed; how much pain must I bear
If you refuse to heed my plight?
The Ganga shines among your matted hair;
The moon rises upon your brow.
You carry a deer skin and play the damaru;
You drink bhang all three times of the day.
Take your trident and cut through my suffering;
Quickly bring me relief from sorrow.
Ramji sets his hopes on you alone;
Be mindful of him and remove his distress.

29. Maheshvani

Shiva, protect me;
Who else can be as compassionate as you?
Ash upon your limbs, the Ganga on your head, the moon like a mark upon your brow;
You drink bhang and abide in delight,
Yet do not forget the suffering.
You roam upon the bull,
Accompanied by hosts of spirits;
You play the damaru, and your three

Eyes are vast.
You dwell at Jhāṛī,
Scattering precious diamonds and rubies;
Yet when Ramji's turn came, Shiva had become impoverished!

30. Maheshvani

Shiva, why have you made me so poor? Why so poor?
Day and night I find no peace;
My anxieties remain divided and troubled,
And on top of them the threefold torments
Seek to exhaust me.
My wife and children pay no heed to what I say;
Other relatives too seem bent on taking my life.
Knowing you to be exceedingly merciful, I came weeping to your shelter;
Remove Ramji's sorrow, knowing him to be one without refuge.

31. Maheshvani

Fate has inflicted a terrible sorrow:
Why did it decree such a husband for dear Gauri?
He has neither caste nor lineage nor relatives,
And lives alone upon the mountain.
He beats his damaru, dances to himself, and plays with ghosts and spirits.
His body is smeared with ash; the Ganga adorns his head,
And the moon rises upon his brow.
There is not a single garment on his body;
Over it he wears a tiger skin.
Poisonous serpents hang from his limbs,
And a garland of skulls adorns his throat.
Why do you worry, Maina? Ramji asks;
Gauri will live happily and be blessed.

32. Vihag

Look upon Vrindavan in every direction.
See Kali-daha and Vamshivata,
The leafy bowers and lanes everywhere;
Behold the Lord in Seva Kunj,
And dance there once.
See the lovely bathing steps on the Yamuna's bank,
Where so many travellers have stayed;
See the bending kadamba trees,
And places where garments are hung.

Ramji says: Vrindavan is Vaikuntha;
Wander through all its places.
See the beauty of the rasa circle;
Stay a few more days.

33. Vihag

Go and see the sights of Mathura.
There are ghats built of stone,
And their sound carries far;
Along the banks of the holy Yamuna,
So many places are silent.
See the pillars made of eight metals,
And electric lights blazing everywhere;
See the splendour in the heart of the city,
And the many heaps of sand.
Drains run along both sides,
And stonework is abundant.
See the fortress of King Kamsa,
And remember Devaki and Vasudeva.
See the warriors Chanura and Mushtika,
And the house of Kubja too;
See the temple of Radha and Krishna,
And the temple of Dauji as well.
Leave aside the Vihag.
Ramji, go now and wander through Madhuban,
Where Krishna once dwelt.
See Gokul, Nanda and Yashoda,
And rock Krishna's cradle once.

34. Maheshvani

Bhola, why have you become so hard-hearted?
Turn your gaze toward me just once.
Ash covers your body, and the Ganga rests upon your head;
The moon on your brow shines brilliantly.
The bull is your mount, a rudra garland about your throat;
You play with ghosts and spirits.
Lord of the three worlds, Gauri's husband, if you will not look upon me even once,
Who then will remove my sorrow?
My life cannot endure much more.
Knowing you to be deeply merciful, I came

To your shelter, having heard your renown.
Ramji cries out, without refuge;
Grant me a vision of you, if only once.

35. Prayerful Bhajan

Listen, listen, O Lord;
Without you,
My unworthy life is slipping away.
I have entreated so many gods, night and day,
But none has heard my appeal.
Knowing you to be very merciful, I have come to your shelter.
My friends and relations are all very wealthy,
Yet at the sight of my sorrow, they think only of their own loss.
Ramji, despairing of all else, trusts in you alone;
Look upon me graciously, O Lord,
Knowing I am without refuge.

36. Maheshvani

Look, look, O Maina;
The bridegroom for dear Gauri has arrived;
How shall we receive him with the wedding rites?
His body is smeared with ash, the moon upon his brow,
Venomous snakes cover every limb;
How shall I go near him?
A tiger skin is his covering, a garland of skulls his ornament;
Ghosts and spirits accompany him—what kind of wedding party is this?
A trident and damaru in his hands, a tiger skin and strange eyes;
Forsaking elephants, horses and a palanquin, he rides upon a dwarf-like bull.
Ramji says: listen, O Maina;
This bridegroom too is exceedingly accomplished.
He is the master of all three worlds;
Accept him as your son-in-law.

37. Maheshvani

How can we give dear Gauri to such a husband?
Snakes cover his whole body, and a tiger skin serves him as a cloak;
His body is smeared with ash—how fearsome he looks!
The Ganga roars in his matted hair;
How strange the garland of skulls around his neck!
A crescent moon sits upon his head like a tilak;

Abandoning elephants, horses and the palanquin, he rides a diminutive bull.
Ramji says: listen, O Maina; dear Gauri is immensely fortunate
To have obtained the Lord of Kailash in this way.

38. Bhajan Vihag

Who but Rama will take away my distress?
The most gracious lord of Kosala
Knows the truth of everything;
No one as low, crooked, cowardly and wicked as I
Will be found anywhere else.
Come now into Hari's shelter and look at him for one moment;
He saved the courtesan, the vulture and Ajamila,
And countless other fallen souls.
I have fallen into an ocean of grief;
If you will not seek me out, Lord,
Who else will take away my suffering,
Apart from you?
Night and day I am trapped in calamity, and have no other helper;
Keep Ramji, who has no refuge, in your shelter;
Look upon me now with merciful eyes.

39. Bhajan Vihag

Cut away my troubles, O Lord.
Your servant is surrounded by enemies one after another;
Protect him, O brave descendant of Raghu.
Many enemies oppress me as well;
Come and deliver me.
You went into the waters and saved Gajendra,
Leaving even Garuda behind in the open field;
You lengthened Draupadi's garment in the assembly,
Piling it high as the sky.
You made friends of the boatman and the monkeys,
And gave the vulture a place in your own abode;
You took Vibhishana into your protection
And granted him a kingdom for an age.
You rescued many more unworthy people,
Among them Shabari and the hunter;
Ramji has come to your shelter,
His misery reaching its utmost limit.

40. Maheshvani

I shall always call him the Lord of Jhāṛīkhaṇḍ, Jhāṛīkhaṇḍ.
A trident in his hand, the Ganga upon his head,
Ash adorning his body;
I shall always call him the bearer of the damaru, the bearer of the damaru.
I shall call him the moon-crested one;
I shall always call him the bearer of serpents, the bearer of serpents.
I shall call him the most gracious sky-clad one; I shall call him Gauri-Shankara.
Remove Ramji's calamities;
I shall call him the protector of those without refuge.

41. Chait Naradi Janani

The month of Chait, king of seasons, has passed; my heart has grown restless.
Love has driven me almost mad; the arrows of flowers have struck me.
The jasmine vines, roses and mango trees have bloomed in abundance;
Bees hum in every direction—how shall I find peace?
Each night passes like an age; my house gives me no delight.
Hearing call upon call, how many tears will pour down?
Ramji will now surrender his life; how much longer can the waiting last?
The Lord went to Madhupur and never returned.

42. Bhajan to Lakshmi-Narayana

Lakshmi-Narayana, why do you not look toward me?
Everyone calls you merciful to the poor;
Yet even you shrink at the sight of my grievous sorrow.
You saved the hunter, the courtesan, the vulture, Ajamila and the elephant;
You rescued the Kaul, the Kirata, the Bhil woman and the lowly;
Who can count the many fallen people you have delivered?
You went to Bhola Nath's dwelling in Rudrapur.
If you will not show me mercy, what shall I do?
Keep Ramji, a solitary orphaned servant, in your care.

43. Maheshvani

Shiva, look upon me for a single instant.
I have fallen into an ocean of sorrow;
Row me across it this time.
If you show me no mercy, Shiva-Shankara,
I will not survive here.
The threefold afflictions have come to torment me

And wish to take my life.
Ramji has no other support; one without refuge, he has come into your shelter.

44. Samdaun

My day of departure to my husband's home has drawn near;
Come together, dear friends, and meet me, all of you.
When shall I come again into this world, a young bride,
From the distant land of my husband's house?
Day and night I remained forgetfully among my friends,
And did none of my own work.
Suddenly the heart has grown restless, as I realise
How shall I manage the work that lies before me?
Who will accompany me, and what message or provisions can I take?
The road to that distant land is long.
No loan or borrowed help will be found there;
The path is strewn with kusa grass and thorns.
All of you, show me kindness now;
Forgive whatever offences remain.
Ramji, what use will regret be now?
How shall I journey to that far-off land?

45. Maheshvani

How much arduous penance did you perform, Gauri,
To obtain such a husband?
Snakes hiss and hiss upon all his limbs;
A tiger skin lies across his body,
And a garland of skulls is his ornament.
There is a tiger beside him, and he rides a bull;
How strangely the ghosts and spirits dance around him!
The Ganga roars among his matted locks;
How the moon shines upon his brow!
Ramji says: listen, O Maina;
Gauri's marriage is auspicious indeed; give up your stubborn objection.

37. Vidyapati's Bidesiya: The Beloved in a Distant Land

Abstract

Bhojpuri literature is less extensive than Maithili literature, but that is only in quantity; in several respects it is ahead in quality. I say this with reference to Bhikhari Thakur's Bidesiya in Bhojpuri. Bhikhari Thakur had lived as a migrant in Calcutta. On returning, he travelled from village to village across the Bhojpur region, singing and giving moving accounts of the hardships he had endured. Out of this emerged the play Bidesiya.

Keywords: Vidyapati · Bidesiya · beloved abroad · literary criticism · Maithili

Bhojpuri literature is less abundant than Maithili literature, but only in quantity: in several respects it is ahead in quality. I say this in connection with Bhikhari Thakur's Bhojpuri Bidesiya. Thakur had lived as a migrant in Calcutta; after his return he travelled from village to village in the Bhojpur region, singing poignant accounts of his experiences. This became the play Bidesiya. Migration from Mithila is a phenomenon of the present age, when entire villages have emptied and migrants from Mithila have spread to every corner of the country. Earlier, however, Mithila did not experience migration in the same way as Bhojpur. Movement was largely confined to Morang, a region of Nepal's Mithila. As a result, Maithili folk ballads tend to lack fine-grained narrative detail. What detail exists often reads not as the experience of a folk hero but as a heavy, epic-style account of a hero. It has no equivalent to Bhikhari Thakur's Bidesiya. Consider the story of Salhes: across a regional boundary Salhes may change from king to thief and from thief to king. Likewise, in the case of Chuharmal, where Salhes is regarded as king, Chuharmal may be the thief; where Salhes is called a thief, Chuharmal may be the king or the powerful figure. Yet none of this has been researched. While looking through Vidyapati's Padavali, I encountered songs of many kinds. Most describe the separation of lovers, rather than the central predicament of Bidesiya: being compelled to migrate for employment and a livelihood. Eventually I found some genuine Bidesiya songs, which Vidyapati calls Piya Desantar—the beloved in a distant land. Unsurprisingly, most came from Vidyapati's Nepal Padavali, and one from the collection edited by Nagendranath Gupta. A possible reason is that Morang, part of Mithila in Nepal, was known as a destination for migration.

On this basis I present the following short dramatic composition.

Vidyapati's Piya Desantar (The Beloved in a Distant Land)

Scene 1

Onstage, our migrant leaves home to take a job in a distant land, while the young woman sings. A traveller arrives in the middle of the song. At the other end of the stage, thieves crouch in hiding. On the opposite side, the constable and a white-dhoti-clad man sit unconcernedly, their hands resting on their bellies.

Dhanachhi Raga (from Vidyapati's Nepal Padavali)

> I am a young woman; my husband has gone abroad. No neighbours live anywhere near me.
>
> I am a young woman and my husband has gone to a distant land. Not even a trace of a neighbour remains nearby.
>
> My mother-in-law and sister-in-law understand nothing; they suffer night blindness and cannot hear.
>
> My mother-in-law and sister-in-law understand nothing either; they have difficulty seeing in the dark and cannot hear properly.
>
> Awake, traveller; do not set off before dawn. The night is dark and the village is full of thieves.
>
> Traveller, give up sleep. Do not come before daybreak: the night is dark and there are many thieves in the village.
>
> The constable does not keep watch, even in dreams; even when appealed to, he gives it no thought.
>
> The constable never stands guard, not even in his dreams; even when invited to intervene, he does not consider the matter.
>
> The king does not punish anyone here;
>
> All the important men belong to our own kind.
>
> That is why the king punishes no one, while all the powerful people are alike.
>
> The poet Vidyapati sings this sentiment, making its feeling known through poetic expression.
>
> The poet Vidyapati sings of this experience and conveys its meaning through figurative words.

The poet Vidyapati enters. A white-dhoti-clad man and a poor man approach the constable. On the strength of appearances alone, the constable decides in favour of the man in white. The young woman, sitting in another corner of the stage, beats her head in distress. Vidyapati sings the last four lines of the song.

Scene 2

The young woman opens a shop, indicated symbolically. From the opposite side of the stage, the mother-in-law and sister-in-law depart, while a traveller arrives as a customer. The young woman begins to sing. After every line Vidyapati comes onto the stage, gives its meaning, and vanishes into darkness. But Vidyapati sings the last line himself, and the young woman explains its meaning.

Malava Raga (from Vidyapati's Nepal Padavali)

How cool the shade of this tree; villages lie scattered from place to place.

The shade of this tree is very cool; villages are settled here and there.

I am alone; my beloved is in a distant land; no wicked man is spoken of here.

I am alone and my beloved is abroad; nowhere does one hear the name of an evil man.

O traveller, rest here a while.

Traveller, please take your rest here.

Whatever you wish to buy will not be dear; everything is available in this place.

Whatever you buy will be inexpensive; you can find everything here.

My mother-in-law is not at home; my relations are elsewhere, and my sister-in-law is simple by nature.

My mother-in-law is away, the family are far off, and my sister-in-law is straightforward by nature.

If you still turn away and leave, traveller, I can do nothing more.

Even after all this, if you go away unwilling to stay, the matter is no longer in my hands.

Vidyapati says: listen, young woman, you who live in hope of another's town.

Vidyapati says: young woman, listen—you are fulfilling another person's hope.

Scene 3

Vidyapati is absent from this scene. The young woman's sister-in-law is scolding the traveller; the sight reminds the woman of her beloved abroad. Addressing her sister-in-law and her companion, she sings. After each line, the companion gives its meaning.

Dhanachhi Raga (from Vidyapati's Nepal Padavali)

In a foreign land one depends upon others; do not turn the traveller away —give him a place to stay.

In a distant land one must continually depend on other people. So no one should be turned away; one should certainly offer shelter.

Understand this much, dear friend, of the beloved's plight.

Friend, understand at least this much about one's beloved.

Sister-in-law, weigh good and ill in your mind; do not address the traveller harshly.

Sister-in-law, think about what is right and wrong; do not speak broken, harsh words to the traveller.

Wash his feet, give him a seat, and comfort him with gentle words.

Wash his feet, offer a place to sit, and speak kindly to reassure him.

Friend, it would be wrong to let him go so far away; show him still greater respect.

Friend, it would be unjust for the traveller to leave this place; honour him even more.

Scene 4

The young woman and her sister-in-law have come to the town and found lodging. When a traveller arrives asking for shelter, the woman sings and the sister-in-law explains the meaning after each line. In the middle, four lines are sung from offstage without explanation. The young woman then continues to sing, and the sister-in-law provides the explanations. Finally Vidyapati enters and sings the last two lines. At the end of the scene the sister-in-law asks: 'You disliked my scolding the traveller that day, so why did you refuse shelter to a traveller today?'

Kolara Raga (from Vidyapati's Nepal Padavali)

I am alone; my beloved is not in the village; that is why I hesitate to offer a place for the night.

I am alone, and my beloved is not in the village. That is why I feel uncertain about telling someone to spend the night here.

Elsewhere I would have offered shelter, if only there had been another neighbour nearby.

If someone had been living near us, I would have shown the traveller another place to stay.

Forgive me, traveller; what can I do? Go through the town and look elsewhere for lodging.

Forgive me, traveller, and go; seek shelter somewhere else in the town.

Open country lies between us, and evening has come; in a foreign place act with care for what is to come.

There is open countryside in between, evening has fallen, and one must act with an eye to the future when away from home.

My heart is scattered moment by moment; how can youth remain concealed when desire awakens?

Go, go, traveller—what am I to do? Wander through the town and seek lodging elsewhere.

Seven or five houses had been readied for him; my beloved went abroad, and a distance opened between us.

He set a limit of twelve years; four years have already passed since he left.

Terrible rain clouds split the night; consider carefully what you must do.

The clouds are threatening; this is a matter of the night, so decide after taking thought.

Vidyapati says: this is the way of town-dwellers—love is stirred through indirect, cutting speech.

Vidyapati says that such is the custom of the town: affection is brought forth by bitter words.

Scene 5

Vidyapati is not present in this scene either. A traveller arrives, but seeing neither mother-in-law nor sister-in-law in the house, he declines to stay out of embarrassment and moves on. The young woman sings.

Ghanachhi Raga (from Vidyapati's Nepal Padavali)

My situation suits the thief called Manmatha; an elderly maidservant stands guard.

My circumstances are just right for the thief who is the god of love; the old maid is keeping watch.

He gave a term of twelve years; four years have passed since he went.

The promised period was twelve years; he departed then, and four years have passed since.

Even the traveller who seeks shelter is ashamed; neither mother-in-law nor sister-in-law is here.

Neither my mother-in-law nor sister-in-law is present, and even the traveller feels embarrassed at the thought of being given shelter.

Five or seven houses he prepared; then my beloved went to a distant land and came to be separated from me.

He prepared a house for the god of desire and left for a distant country; a distance arose between us.

The neighbour's dwelling has become as distant as a hundred yojanas; everyone has gone away to different places.

A neighbour's house now seems a hundred yojanas away; all my relatives have gone here and there.

The evening dark hides everything; the neighbour has fastened the gate.

The gathering of people has vanished into darkness, and the woman next door has shut her gate.

My mind wanders again and again; how long can I conceal my going when Manmatha is awake?

My heart flees from one thought to another; the god of love is awake—how much longer can I hide my movements?

Scene 6

Here too there is neither sister-in-law, nor mother-in-law, nor Vidyapati. A guest arrives, and at that very moment the clouds burst into rain. The young woman sings.

Dhanachhi Raga (from Vidyapati's Nepal Padavali)

I was seated in my own house; there was no one else at home.

I was sitting at home; nobody else was in the house.

Just then a traveller arrived as my guest, and the heavens began to rain.

At that moment the traveller arrived, and it started to rain heavily.

Who knows what the spiteful neighbour will say, now that she has found a chance to speak?

I do not know what the jealous woman next door will say; she has been handed an opportunity to talk.

Pitch darkness and unceasing rain have made day appear like night.

Even in daylight it has begun to look like night.

What can I say, and who will believe me? The world knows the power of the five-arrowed god of love.

To whom can I speak, and who will trust me? The fame of Kamadeva is known throughout the world.

Scene 7

From one side of the stage, the mother-in-law's body is carried out following her death, and the stage falls dark. When the lights return, the sister-in-law's husband takes her to her marital home. The traveller stands in the aisle among the audience. Gesturing toward the spectators, the young woman sings, and after each line Vidyapati explains its meaning. For the final two lines Vidyapati speaks both the song and its interpretation. He repeats those final two lines and their meanings several times.

From the Padavali edited by Nagendranath Gupta

My mother-in-law grew old and passed away; my sister-in-law too went to her husband's home.

My mother-in-law has died; my sister-in-law too has gone to her marital home.

There is no one left to see; no one with whom to stay awake at night and talk.

There is no one even to converse with.

Such is the conduct of this town: nobody asks after anybody else.

The way people behave here is such that no one inquires after another.

Tell my beloved: how many more days must I, a woman alone, remain like this?

Tell my beloved: how long am I to stay by myself?

Traveller, tell my husband not to abandon the joy of love with a woman like me.

Traveller, tell him: how long will the passionate glow of a woman such as I endure?

Vidyapati says, singing: the woman separated from her beloved wanders about, entreating the traveller.

Vidyapati sings: the woman in separation goes about telling her story to the traveller.

As Vidyapati sings, he falters a little. Darkness begins to spread. One figure can dimly be seen emerging from the darkness toward the young woman. Is it he, the beloved returned from the distant land? Yes—or perhaps not!

The strains of Piya Desantar are heard; as music sounds, the curtain falls.

This conception of Piya Desantar is placed before discerning readers and respectfully dedicated to the great poet Vidyapati, amid the present suffering of Maithili migrants scattered far from home.

Supplementary Discussion

Bhojpuri literature is less abundant than Maithili literature, but only in quantity: in several respects it is ahead in quality. I say this in connection with Bhikhari Thakur's Bhojpuri Bidesiya. Thakur had lived as a migrant in Calcutta; after his return he travelled from village to village in the Bhojpur region, singing poignant accounts of his experiences. This became the play Bidesiya. Migration from Mithila is a phenomenon of the present age, when entire villages have emptied and migrants from Mithila have spread to every corner of the country. Earlier, however, Mithila did not experience migration in the same way as Bhojpur. Movement was largely confined to Morang, a region of Nepal's Mithila. As a result, Maithili folk ballads tend to lack fine-grained narrative detail. What detail exists often reads not as the experience of a folk hero but as a heavy, epic-style account of a hero. It has no equivalent to Bhikhari Thakur's Bidesiya. Consider the story of Salhes: across a regional boundary Salhes may change from king to thief and from thief to king. Likewise, in the case of Chuharmal, where Salhes is regarded as king, Chuharmal may be the thief; where Salhes is called a thief, Chuharmal may be the king or the powerful figure. Yet none of this has been researched. While looking through Vidyapati's Padavali, I encountered songs of many kinds. Most describe the separation of lovers, rather than the central predicament of Bidesiya: being compelled to migrate for employment and a livelihood. Eventually I found some genuine Bidesiya songs, which Vidyapati calls Piya Desantar—the beloved in a distant land. Unsurprisingly, most came from Vidyapati's Nepal Padavali, and one from the collection edited by Nagendranath Gupta. A possible reason is that Morang, part of Mithila in Nepal, was known as a destination for migration.

Onstage, our migrant leaves home to take a job in a distant land, while the young woman sings. A traveller arrives in the middle of the song. At the other end of the stage, thieves crouch in hiding. On the opposite side, the constable and a white-dhoti-clad man sit unconcernedly, their hands resting on their bellies.

I am a young woman; my husband has gone abroad. No neighbours live anywhere near me.

I am a young woman and my husband has gone to a distant land. Not even a trace of a neighbour remains nearby.

Awake, traveller; do not set off before dawn. The night is dark and the village is full of thieves.

How cool the shade of this tree; villages lie scattered from place to place.

Vidyapati is absent from this scene. The young woman's sister-in-law is scolding the traveller; the sight reminds the woman of her beloved abroad. Addressing her sister-in-law and her companion, she sings. After each line, the companion gives its meaning.

Friend, it would be wrong to let him go so far away; show him still greater respect.

Friend, it would be unjust for the traveller to leave this place; honour him even more.

Elsewhere I would have offered shelter, if only there had been another neighbour nearby.

Vidyapati is not present in this scene either. A traveller arrives, but seeing neither mother-in-law nor sister-in-law in the house, he declines to stay out of embarrassment and moves on. The young woman sings.

My situation suits the thief called Manmatha; an elderly maidservant stands guard.

My circumstances are just right for the thief who is the god of love; the old maid is keeping watch.

The neighbour's dwelling has become as distant as a hundred yojanas; everyone has gone away to different places.

A neighbour's house now seems a hundred yojanas away; all my relatives have gone here and there.

The evening dark hides everything; the neighbour has fastened the gate.

The gathering of people has vanished into darkness, and the woman next door has shut her gate.

Who knows what the spiteful neighbour will say, now that she has found a chance to speak?

I do not know what the jealous woman next door will say; she has been handed an opportunity to talk.

The Forgotten Poet: Pandit Ramji Chaudhary

(1878–1952)

Ramji Chaudhary (1878–1952) was born in Rudrapur village, Andhratharhi police-station area, Madhubani district. His ancestral origin was Pagulbar Raje, of the Shandilya gotra. In the genealogy, Jivan Chaudhary, born in Panchobh in Darbhanga, came to Rudrapur in 1801. His two sons were Shri Rangi Chaudhary and Shri Kant Chaudhary, both born in Rudrapur. Kant Chaudhary had three sons: Shri Chumman Chaudhary, Shri Budhan Chaudhary and Shri Babua Chaudhary. Chumman Chaudhary had two sons: Shri Goni Chaudhary and the poet Pandit Ramji Chaudhary.

Shri Jivan Chaudhary was the poet's great-grandfather. His maternal relatives lived in Rudrapur, and it was for this reason that in 1801 he left Panchobh and settled there.

The poet's grandfather was an accomplished singer. His chief repertoire consisted of devotional songs addressed to the divine couple Sita and Rama, and this deeply influenced the poet. It was for this reason that he named his grandson Ramji. True to his name, the late poet had memorised Tulsidas's Shri Ramcharitmanas. He answered every question with a chaupai from the Ramayana. The most sorrowful circumstance of his life was that he married three times, yet none of his wives lived longer than four years after marriage. He married for the last time at the age of fifty-three. That wife died within fifteen days of giving birth to a son, Durganath Chaudhary (Dukhiya Chaudhary).

During his lifetime the poet served as a senior raiyat under the Darbhanga Raj. After the death of his third wife he resigned even from that position and devoted himself to worship. His sole published book and his unpublished manuscript contain poetry in Brajabuli as well as Maithili.

These poems bear the imprint of the poet's grandfather's knowledge of ragas; they also include Mithila's Maheshvani songs, Chait-month thumris and morning devotional songs, known as prabhati or parati.

Just as Shankardev composed in Maithili rather than Assamese, Ramji Chaudhary composed in Brajabuli as well as Maithili. Each of his poems identifies a raga, as do the Vidyapati lyrics recovered from Nepal. This influence seems to have come from his grandfather, himself a singer. The people of Mithila worship five deities, yet a Shiva shrine will be found in every village; accordingly, Ramji Chaudhary composed Maheshvani songs, thumris for the month of Chait, and morning hymns (parati or prabhati). The ragas and song forms named in his works are:

1. Raga Rekhta; 2. Lavani; 3. Raga Jhaptala; 4. Raga Dhrupad; 5. Raga Sangeet; 6. Raga Desh; 7. Raga Gauri; 8. Tirhut; 9. Bhajan Vinay; 10. Bhajan Bhairavi; 11. Bhajan Ghazal; 12. Holi; 13. Raga Shyam Kalyan; 14. Kavita; 15. Damphak Holi; 16. Raga Kagu Kafi; 17. Raga Vihag; 18. Ghazal Thumri; 19. Raga Pavas Chaumasa; 20. Bhajan Prabhati; 21. Maheshvani; and 22. Bhajan Kirtan.

The poet's compositions are presented here from his sole published book and from a manuscript he had Shri Harekant Chaudhary (now deceased) write out, obtained through Shri Shrimohan Chaudhary; these are available in the Videha archive at www.videha.co.in.

38. Vidyapati: A Refutation of Certain Widespread Misrepresentations

Abstract

Vidyapati's Sanskrit works bear the attribution "composed by Ṭhakkura Vidyāpati," and that Vidyapati was a Brahmin. My concern, however, is with the Vidyapati of Maithili. I have discussed why he was made to wear the pāg, so that he could be appropriated as "our Vidyapati." This did not happen during the eight hundred years in which non-Brahmin communities kept his work alive through Bidāpat Nāch. It occurred after Bengal laid claim to Vidyapati and Govindadas; after the Bengali scholar Rajkrishna Mukhopadhyay was the first to assert that Vidyapati was a poet of the language of Mithila, and Nagendranath Gupta of Bengal was the first to say the same of Govindadas. At first all Bengal furiously opposed these claims, but eventually accepted them.

Keywords: Vidyapati · prevailing misrepresentations · refutation · literary criticism · Maithili

I

Vidyapati and the pāg in the parallel tradition

The Sanskrit works attributed to Vidyapati say "composed by Ṭhakkura Vidyāpati"; that Vidyapati was a Brahmin. My concern is the Vidyapati of Maithili. I have already discussed why a pāg was placed on his head and why he was converted into "our Vidyapati." This did not happen during the eight centuries when non-Brahmin communities sustained his living presence through Bidāpat Nāch. It happened after Bengal claimed Vidyapati and Govindadas, after Rajkrishna Mukhopadhyay first identified Vidyapati as a poet of Mithila's language, and Nagendranath Gupta first identified Govindadas likewise. Bengal initially reacted with hostility, but later accepted these findings. Then the scholars of Mithila themselves became uneasy. By invoking Vidyapati's Sanskrit writings, and citing entries in the genealogical registers under the names Govindadas and Vidyapati, they produced "Vidyapati Thakur" and "Govindadas Jha" (!!!). Ramanath Jha's superficial understanding of the Pañjī and his restricted outlook did damage. Then, as if without warning, the Brahmin community placed the pāg on Vidyapati's head—the Vidyapati of Maithili, not the Sanskrit writer—and made him "our Vidyapati." Some people even began calling him a nephew of Jyotirishwar!

Yet the genealogical registers contain many poets like Kavīśvara Jyotirishwar. Why, then, does this variation in personal names arise in the case of Vidyapati but not in that of Jyotirishwar? Although the entire operation was planned, a piece of evidence still escaped their notice.

2. Why go all the way to Bengal? I have attended the worship of village deities in Purnia and seen Ram Thakur (a deity) represented as a god in the field where earthen clods were being raised; someone had lit a flame there.

3. They had migrated from Mithila to Chhattisgarh and Madhya Pradesh. Prabhat Jha, a Rajya Sabha member from Madhya Pradesh, was saying that when the barhī community (carpenters) migrated from Mithila, people began addressing them as "Jhaji" because they spoke Maithili. They now use Jha as their surname. Prabhat Jha campaigned for one such candidate, who won by a single vote. We all know from experience that, whatever someone's original surname, even as far as Patna they may be called "Jhaji" or "Jhaua." In four or five villages of Malda district in Bengal, the surname of Maithil Brahmins is Ojha; in Aligarh, that of the Maithil Brahmins settled in Braj is Sharma.

4. The Pañjī genealogical registers contain the following entries for persons named Vidyapati (archival spellings and unexplained abbreviations preserved):
1. panicobha from vidyāpatisuta ramāpatika vivāha vidyāpatika- mātā (devadāsī)-dūṣaṇa paṃjī
2. maho keśavo suta ma. ma. pāō govinda sutā maho lakṣmīnātha ma. ma. vidyāpati ma. ma. dāmodara
3. mahāmaho vidyāpati gaṃgolī from mānakuḍha vāsī kavirāja gaṇeśvara
4. ghosotafrom ma. ma. govinda sutā ma. lakṣmīdhara ma. ma. vidyāpati
5. rājapaṇḍita ma. ma. u. vidyāpati
6. karamahāfrom devanātha suta kavi vidyāpati
7. guṇapati santati-paṭhoṅagī) . . vidyāpati-puḍarīka-machadī. keśava-amarāvatī.
8. . . siṃhāśrama fromvidyāpati ddauo bhāgīratha sutau kuleśvara:
9. sidhūka: e sutā delhana viśvanātha śrīnāthā: siṃhāśrama from vidyāpati dau. .
10. miśra jayadeva (76/06) sutā nagavāḍa ghosota from mahāmahopādhyāya vidyāpati dau
11. mahāmahopādhyāya govinda sutā mahāmaho lakṣmīnāthā paranāmaka (209/05) ṭhakarū mao mao upāo vidyāpati
12. ddauo. . evam ṭhao vidyāpati mātṛka cakraṃ. .
13. mahomahopādhyāya vidyāpati sutā anirūddha ananta acyutā: ekaharā from kāśī dau
14. saduosupe sutau dāmodara: e sutau ḍālūka: pavaulīfrom goḍhi dau ḍālū (34/06) suto vidyāpati
15. sutā śirū padama lākhū gādūkā: ekaharā from śrī kara suta cānda dau khauāla from bhūle ddauo madhusūdana sutā umāpati (84/01) vidyāpati
16. musai sutā khauāla from ḍālū suta vidyāpati dau bhaṇḍārisama from śubhe ddauo ṭhao
17. sodarapura from choṭāī dau (28/08) basāuna sutā paśupati vidyāpati

18. kalyāṇa sutā karamahā from vidyāpati dau
19. jālaya from rāmeś varasuta mahighara dau yamugāma from geṇāī ddauo vidyāpati suto bhagīratha:
20. harakhū govindā sakao guṇe suta vidyāpati dau suragana from hore ddauo
21. kṛṣṇapati sutā murāri vidyāpati prajāpati ṭakabāla from rāmakara dau. .
22. kavindra padāṃkita mao mao uo raghunāthā karamahā from vidyāpati dau
23. suto vidyāpati māṇḍarafrom yagyapati dau
24. talhanapura from gaḍhavaya ddau. vidyāpati
25. yaśu suto ravipati rūdrapati vidyāpati candrapati
26. narauna from vidyāpati dau
27. ravipati suto kṛṣṇapati vidyāpati ghusauta from hore dau. .
28. vidyāpati sutā belauṁca fromrāma dau
29. guṇe suta gaurīpati vidyāpati lakṣmīpati kulapatiya: dario divākara dau
30. mahipati jhāka mātāmaha kavi kokila vidyāpati ṭhākara) dāmodara suto pāṁsadu. harideva: naraunafrom māṅani dau
31. gaṇapati suto kavi kokila rājapaṇḍita mao mao upāo vidyāpati: e sutau haripati dhanapati. .
32. mahāmahopādhyāya vidyāpatisutā hṛṣikeśa
33. harapati sutā vidyāpati kāśī dāmodarā:
34. ratipati sutā sodarao vidyāpati dau
35. vidyāpati prapautra pautra hariśvara dhaneśvara suto gondūka pālīfrom jñānadau. .
36. vidyāpati ddau. veṇī suto ravinātha:
37. sodarao vidyāpati ddauo nikāra
38. śrīpati suto vidyāpati parānau dariharā
39. sodarao vidyāpati ddauo miśra kamalanayana sutā hariama from bachāī dau
40. ravauālafrom sone dau devanātha suto kavi vidyāpati pacahī sodarapurafrom jagannātha dau
41. gopī suto vidyāpati vācaspati śīvā hariamafrom nārāyaṇa dau. .
42. vidyāpati nidhi pra. dharāpatiya:
43. taraunī karamahāfrom mahidhara dau. . (46/03) vidyāpati (111/03) suto madhusūdana:
44. kulānanda hṛdayanan dano kara. panāī dau (109//106) vidyāpati (314/05) sutā pritinātha śobhanātha mahināthā:
45. uṁmāpati suta vidyāpati suto jayapati:
46. jāgū sutā surapati haripati prabhāpati girapati vidyāpatiya:
47. hacalū sutā harapati vidyāpati maho jñānapati dinapati maṇikaṃṭhā
48. kṛṣṇa sutā ramāpati śrīpati ratnapati vidyāpati: būdhavāla from dhīrū dau. .
49. dāśe sutā dayorī khaṇḍabalā from gopīnātha dau (85//02) vidyāpati suta jīvanātha

50. narauna from vidyāpati ddauo
51. dharmādhika raṇika bāṭū suto vidyāpati
52. sodarapura from gayana dau vidyāpati sutā ramāpati horila hararavū jivāīkā māṇḍara from soḍhū dau. .
53. khauāla from raghunātha dau (54//07) vidyāpati suta jānū
54. ṭakabālafrom vidyāpati ddau matinātha
55. khaṇḍabalāfrom vidyāpati suta jīvanātha dau
56. karamahā from vidyāpati ddauo viśvanātha
57. kṛṣṇapati suto uṁmāpati (bao 28/01) vidyāpati (302/03) paṇḍuā from pāṁ bhagīratha dau
58. maho harikṛṣṇa sutā khauāla from vidyāpati dau
59. madhusūdana suto vidyāpati: alaya from anirūddha dau
60. māṇḍara from devaśarmma ddauo vidyāpati sutā narauna from badanī dau
61. ṭhao śyāma suto purandara paramānando māṇḍara from vidyāpati dau
62. vidyāpati sutā sodarapura from jayarāma
63. dharmeśvarau khauāla from harāī suta manohara dau rūda suto rāma: gaṃgolī from deve dau visphī from kavi kokila rāja paṇḍita mao mao pāo vidyāpati ddauo rāma suto bhiravūka: phanandaha from locana dau pakaliyā from dinū ddauo bhiravū suto harāika: sodarapura from vira suta haridau khauāla from śubhe ddauo harāī sutā mohana manoharā kamala nārāyaṇā: sodarapura from jagannātha suta bhavānī dau bhavānī suto harideva sadāyakau hariama from govinda suta śrīdhara dau sakao jāge ddauo manohara sutā karamahā from ratanapati suta kṛṣṇadāśa dau kṛṣṇadāśa sutā sodarapura from madhusūdana suta sundara dau (47//05) dariharā from muśāī ddauo hari suto prāṇapati: sodarapura from nārāyaṇa suta nanū dau (110//01) (101//01) nārāyaṇa suto nanūka: vudhavāla from bahuḍa dau (180/04) dāmodara suto bahuḍa ka: sodarapura from paramānanda suta kāṃgava dau paramānanda suto kāṃgava: māṇḍara from halaghara suta pītāmbara dau (58//05) karamahā from śrīrāma ddauo kāṃgava sutā karamahā from śivadeva suta kārama dau māṇḍara from vāvū dauhitra dauo
64. vāvū durgāpati siṃha: suto vāvū vidyāpati siṃha: karamahā from harinātha suta tārānātha dau
65. khauāla from yuvarāja ddauo bāvū vidyāpati siṃha suto vāvū girijāpati siṃha
66. vāvū gaṃgāpati siṃha sutā bheṣapati siṃha vidyāpati siṃha
67. vāvū bheṣapati siṃha patnī antarjātīya e suta haṃsapati siṃha: vāvū vidyāpati siṃha suto ramana kumāra siṃha:
68. bālā suto bhaiyā kalyāṇau khauāla from vidyāpati dau
69. viśvanātha kāśīnāthā: alaya from vidyāpati dau
70. pāṭhaka vidyāpati suto dukhamaṃjana kalarau āsī ekaharā from uṁmānanda dau
71. narapati sutā kalyāṇapura visphī from sundara dau kamalanayana suta nārāyaṇa suto sundara: karamahā from vidyāpati dau

72. murāri sutā dāmodara vidyāpati mahighara ānandā:
73. vidyāpati sutā padmāpati sabhāpati ādipati gaṇapatiya: . .
74. vidyāpati suto chītū paramānando māṇḍara from narapati dau baherāḍha from gadādhara ddauo
75. alaya from kamala suta nakaṭū dau. vidyāpati suta jīvanātha suto parama: dari. rāma dau. .
76. karamahā from vidyāpati suta madhusūdana dau
77. mānī sodarapura from vācaspati suta vidyāpati dau
78. khaṇḍabalā from vāvū durgāpati siṃha suta vāvū vidyāpati siṃha dau
79. khauāla from vidyāpati dau ṭha. madhurāpati suto vācha śivānandano
80. sodarapura from baidyanātha ddau. harikṛṣṇa sutā khauāla from madhusūdanasuta vidyāpati dau
81. madhusūdana suta vidyāpati dau
82. dariharā from ramāpati suta veṇī dau alaya from kṛṣṇapati suta vidyāpati ddau
83. alaya from vidyāpati ddau. ॥
84. jyo. śivanandana suto vidyāpati.
85. khauāla from bhavadeva suta vidyāpati dau.
86. pāṭhaka kṛṣṇapati suto uṣāpati vidyāpati.
87. vidyāpati suto dukhabhaṃjana kalaro ekaharā from devānanda suta uṁmānanda dau
88. alaya from vidyāpati suta kalaru dau
89. kāru sutā pitāmbara vidyāpati devakīmānā kā sodarapura from vaidayanātha suta jayi dau
90. suroi pra. śāradānanda sutā gaurīnandana vācaspati pra. vidyāpati divākara pra. mandū ratnākara pra. bhra. bholana jī kā naga. ghusauta from dāmodara suta ugramohana dau ekaharā from śobhānanda ddau.
91. khauāla from vidyāpati dau.

Let us return to the central issue. I have no doubt that the royal scholars and numerous holders of religious-judicial office called Vidyapati—including one who was the son of a devadāsī—were Brahmins. But I am not discussing Vidyapati Ṭhakkura or his Kīrtilatā and Kīrtipatākā; I am discussing the songs of the Vidyapati Padāvalī. Let there be no confusion on that point. Let us turn to the Bidāpat sung by non-Brahmins. This Vidyapati, I argue, lived before Jyotirishwar, possibly in the barber caste: Jyotirishwar's Varṇa-Ratnākara mentions this poet and his compositions.

Mahadeva was originally a god of non-Brahmin communities and was gradually adopted by Brahmins. Nowhere in the poems of Vidyapati's Padāvalī does their author claim to have written in Sanskrit or Avahaṭṭha. These songs express a pain on behalf of the dispossessed that is absent from the writings in Sanskrit and Avahaṭṭha by the other, Brahmin Vidyapati. Why is that so? Consider an example.

Vidyapati's Bidesiya: Piyā Desāntar (The Beloved in a Distant Land)

Bhojpuri literature is less extensive than Maithili literature, but that is a matter of quantity alone; in several areas it is ahead in quality. I say this particularly with reference to Bhikhari Thakur's Bidesiya. Bhikhari Thakur lived as a migrant in Calcutta. After returning to the Bhojpur region, he went from village to village, singing of his suffering with such poignancy that his account became the play Bidesiya. Migration from Mithila is a phenomenon of our own times: entire villages have fallen silent, and migrants from Mithila are scattered throughout the country. Earlier, however, migration was not as widespread in Mithila as in the Bhojpur region. It was largely confined to Morang, the Mithila-speaking region of Nepal. Hence there is a striking lack of finely observed detail in Maithili folk narrative: even when such narratives exist, their heroes are described more like the heroes of epics than those of ordinary life. They are ponderous and cannot be compared with Bhikhari Thakur's Bidesiya. Consider the story of Salhes: when its regional boundaries change, Salhes becomes a thief instead of a king, and a king instead of a thief. Likewise, Chuharmal becomes a thief where Salhes is a king, and a king or powerful man where Salhes is called a thief. No serious research has been undertaken into these transformations. As I searched the verses of Vidyapati's Padāvalī, I came across various kinds of song. Most describe the pain of separation between lovers, rather than the central experience of the bidesiya: reluctant migration to earn one's livelihood. Eventually I found a few genuine songs of migrant separation, which Vidyapati calls piyā desāntar. Most, naturally, came from the Nepalese collection of his Padāvalī, and one from the collection edited by Nagendranath Gupta. Morang lies in Nepalese Mithila and was traditionally associated with labour migration; that may explain their provenance. On this basis I present the following short dramatic conception. *Vidyapati's Piyā Desāntar. Scene 1. Onstage our migrant prepares to leave for employment abroad, while the young woman sings. A traveller enters during the song. Thieves crouch concealed at the opposite edge of the stage. Elsewhere the constable sits unconcerned beside a white-dhoti-clad man, resting a hand on his belly. Rāga Dhanachhī* (Vidyapati's songs from Nepal): "I am young; my husband has gone to a distant land. Not even a neighbour's trace remains nearby." The singer explains: I am a young woman; my husband has gone away, and no neighbour remains close to me.

"Neither my mother-in-law nor my husband's sister knows anything; their eyes are night-blind, and their ears cannot hear." The mother-in-law and sister-in-law understand nothing: they suffer from night-blindness and are unable even to hear.

"Awaken, traveller; do not come at daybreak. The night is dark and the village full of thieves." Traveller, shake off your sleep. Do not come tomorrow morning; darkness covers the night and many thieves live in the village.

"Not even in dreams does the constable keep watch; even when approached, he gives no thought to the plea." The constable does not patrol even in a dream, and he pays no attention to an appeal for help.

"The ruler chastises no one here; the men of importance all belong to my own kind." Hence the king punishes nobody: all the powerful people are of one sort.

"Poet Vidyapati sings of this feeling, conveying his emotion through indirection." Vidyapati sings the experience and makes its meaning known through his manner of expression.

Poet Vidyapati enters. A man in a spotless white dhoti and a poor man approach the constable. By mere appearance the constable decides in favour of the white-dhoti-clad man; the young woman seated at the other corner of the stage beats her forehead in distress. Vidyapati sings the final four lines of the song. Scene 2. The young woman symbolically opens a shop. As the mother-in-law and sister-in-law depart on the far side of the stage and a traveller arrives as a customer, she begins to sing. After each line Vidyapati appears, explains its meaning, and disappears into the darkness. At the final line, however, Vidyapati sings and the woman explains it.* Rāga Mālava* (Vidyapati's songs from Nepal): "How cool is this tree's shade! Villages appear at every stopping place." The shade of the tree is exceedingly cool, and villages are settled here and there. "I am alone, my beloved is abroad; here no evil person's name is heard." I am solitary; my beloved is in a distant land, and no one here speaks of a wicked person.

"Traveller, rest here awhile." Traveller, take your rest here. "Whatever you purchase is inexpensive; everything can be found in this place." Nothing you buy will be costly: all things are available. "My mother-in-law is not at home; relatives are far away, and my sister-in-law is innocent by nature." The mother-in-law is absent, other relatives are distant, and the sister-in-law is simple-hearted. "If you turn away despite all this, that will no longer be my doing." If even after this you refuse to stay, I cannot be held responsible. "Says Vidyapati: listen, young woman, you who look to others for fulfilment." Vidyapati addresses the woman and calls upon her to listen. Scene 3. Vidyapati does not appear in this song. The young woman's sister-in-law is rebuking a traveller; seeing this reminds the woman of her beloved abroad. She addresses the sister-in-law and a female friend in* song; after each line the friend speaks its meaning. Rāga Dhanachhī (the Nepalese Padāvalī*)*: "In foreign lands one must always depend on others; do not turn anyone away, but surely grant shelter." A person far from home depends on the kindness of strangers; a traveller must not be denied a night's lodging. "Friend, understand this much about my beloved." My friend, let this be the lesson of my beloved's situation. "Sister-in-law, judge what is good and bad within your own mind; do not address the traveller with broken, harsh speech." Sister-in-law, consider what is right and wrong, and do not speak roughly to him.

"Wash his feet; offer him a seat; reassure him with words of sweetness." Give him water to wash his feet, a place to sit, and gentle consolation. "Friend, it would be wrong to send him far away; honour him all the more." Friend, sending the traveller elsewhere would be improper: show him greater kindness. Scene 4. The young woman and her sister-in-law have come to a town and found lodging. A traveller comes seeking shelter. The woman sings, and after each line the sister-in-law interprets it. Four lines are then sung offstage without explanation. The woman resumes, the sister-in-law interprets, and finally Vidyapati appears to sing the last two lines. At the end the sister-in-law asks: "You disliked my rebuking that traveller the other day; why, then, did you refuse this one shelter today?"* Rāga Kolāra* (Vidyapati's songs from Nepal): "I am alone, my beloved is not in the village; I hesitate even to name a place where he might spend the night." I am alone and my husband is away, so I find myself at a loss when asked to provide lodging. "Had anyone lived nearby, I might have pointed him to some other place to stay." If there were a neighbour, I could have directed him there.

> "Forgive me, traveller; what else can I do? Walk through the town and seek shelter elsewhere." Pardon me, traveller, and look for lodging somewhere else in town.
>
> "Open country lies between us, and evening approaches; when staying in a foreign place, consider what may follow." A stretch of lonely land separates us; it is dusk, and a stranger must act with an eye to the future.
>
> "My mind, alas, breaks apart from moment to moment; how long may I hide my youth when desire is awake? Go, go, traveller: what more can I say? Wander through the town and seek another lodging. He prepared those seven or five chambers, then my beloved went far away and distance arose between us. Twelve years were appointed; four years have elapsed since his departure."
>
> "Deep clouds split the darkness of night; weigh carefully whatever you mean to do." Fearsome clouds have gathered: it is a question of the night, and a decision must be made after reflection.

"Says Vidyapati: it is the practice of the town to awaken love through words of indirection." Vidyapati explains that in urban life affection can arise even from sharp or indirect speech. Scene 5. Vidyapati does not appear here either. A traveller approaches, but when he sees neither mother-in-law nor sister-in-law he feels too embarrassed to lodge and passes on. The young woman sings.* Rāga Ghanachhī (the Nepalese Padāvalī*)*: "My dwelling would suit the thief named Desire; an old maidservant stands guard." My circumstances are apt for Love, that thief, while an elderly servant keeps watch.

> "Twelve years were ordained, and four years have passed since he went." His stay had been for twelve years; four years have now elapsed since he left.
>
> "Even the traveller is ashamed to seek shelter; neither mother-in-law nor sister-in-law is here to keep me company." Neither relative is present, and the traveller himself is reluctant to ask for lodging.
>
> "He arranged seven or five rooms for Love, then my beloved crossed into another land and a distance came between us." He made the house ready for Kāma, the god of love, and departed abroad, leaving us separated.
>
> "The neighbour's house seems a hundred yojanas away; all relations have scattered to their different places." Even the next dwelling feels a hundred leagues distant, and kin are dispersed everywhere.
>
> "The gathering disappears into the darkness; the neighbour has bolted the gate." People vanish in the night, and the woman next door closes her door.

"My mind flees this way and that; how much longer can I conceal my journey when the god of desire is awake?" I cannot still my mind; passion has awakened, and how long can I hide my intended departure? Scene 6. Here too neither sister-in-law nor mother-in-law nor Vidyapati is present. A guest arrives just as the rain begins to pour, and the young woman sings.* Rāga Dhanachhī (the Nepalese Padāvalī*)*: "I was seated within my own house; there was no other person inside." I was sitting alone at home. "Just then a travelling guest appeared and heaven began to rain." At that very moment the guest arrived and the downpour began.

"Who knows what the spiteful neighbour will say, now she has been given a chance to speak?" I cannot know the words of that jealous woman: an occasion for gossip has been handed to her. "Pitch darkness and unbroken streams of rain turn day itself into night." Even by day it seemed like night. "To whom can I tell my story, and who will believe me, when the five-arrowed god of love is known throughout the world?" What can I say, and whom will I convince, when Kāma's reputation is everywhere known? Scene 7. At one side of the stage, after the mother-in-law's death, her body is carried out and the lights dim. When the stage becomes bright again, the sister-in-law's husband arrives to take her to her marital home. The traveller moves among the audience. The young woman gestures to the spectators and sings; after each line Vidyapati speaks the meaning. In the final two lines Vidyapati sings both the song and its explanation, repeating* them several times. From the Padāvalī* edited by Nagendranath Gupta: "My mother-in-law has grown frail and died; my sister-in-law too has gone away to her husband's home." My mother-in-law has passed away; the sister-in-law has left. "Not a soul remains in sight; no one stays awake at night to talk." There is nobody even for conversation. "Such is the custom in this town: not a person asks after another." In this place no one inquires about anyone else. "Tell my beloved how long I, a solitary woman, must remain alone." Ask my husband how many more days I am to live by myself. "Traveller, speak to my lord; how long can the fervour of a woman like me endure?" Tell him how long I can continue in this state. "Sings Vidyapati: the woman afflicted by separation wanders and makes the traveller understand her grief." Vidyapati sings as the separated woman goes from place to place, confiding in the traveller.

As Vidyapati sings, he gradually falls silent. Darkness spreads; a figure becomes visible indistinctly, moving out of the darkness toward the young woman. Is this the beloved who went abroad? Yes—or no?

The atmosphere of Piyā Desāntar dissolves; music accompanies the final fall of the curtain.

This conception of Piyā Desāntar is offered to thoughtful readers and spectators. In the present suffering of Maithil migrants, it is respectfully dedicated to the great poet Vidyapati.

1. Does the Vidyapati who wrote in Sanskrit and Avahaṭṭha speak out of this same pain?

2. The Padāvalī bears witness to a parallel culture. A single writer could compose in both Sanskrit and Avahaṭṭha, and suffer the scorn of scholars for writing in Avahaṭṭha—but is there even a trace of this particular pain in the Vidyapati of the Padāvalī? What we find there is joy and suffering: the joy and suffering of the dispossessed. The Sanskrit- and Avahaṭṭha-writing Vidyapati—the royal scholar, not a poet of Pali and similar languages—was an erudite man who could be censured even for his Avahaṭṭha compositions. But the Maithili Vidyapati belonged to a parallel tradition far removed from that position. This parallel tradition has existed since the age of the Ṛgveda, when nārāśaṃsī songs were current. History is silent on whether the Vidyapati of this tradition necessarily belonged to the barber caste or to the Brahmin caste. Yet folklore and inherited practice, the close ties between Bidāpat and the dispossessed, and the traditions of Bisfi all point, in my view, to a non-Brahmin identity. No line of the Sanskrit or Avahaṭṭha literature mentions the songs of this Vidyapati; neither do the songs attribute to their author Sanskrit or Avahaṭṭha works. Sanskrit and Avahaṭṭha texts lament Muslim invasions and the defilement of the sacred thread and temples, whereas the Padāvalī voices the happiness, vitality, and struggles of the dispossessed. Such lamentation is absent there. When the Brahmin or non-Brahmin identity of the Maithili Vidyapati is itself the question, what outlook are we creating by placing a pāg on his head? Would he cease to be "ours" if he were not a Brahmin? Would his migration song, Piyā Desāntar, thereby lose its value? Is the exclusive emphasis upon his erotic verses itself a kind of conspiracy? How proper is it to confine a poet like Vidyapati within caste boundaries by making him wear the pāg? Vijay Kumar Thakur writes in Medieval Mithila: "In Mithila's religious sphere, the influence of the feudal religious ideology of that age was so pervasive that the following remnants of the tradition survive in society even now: ... (d) the pāg too is associated with Tantric ideology" (p. 26). Let that headgear, then, be confined to Tantric rites, marriage ceremonies and initiation with the sacred thread. Why mix the Vidyapati of the parallel tradition with those practices? If he belonged to the barber caste, this remains true; if he was a Brahmin, it is all the more true. We can see the rigidity of twenty-first-century Brahminism: if a Brahmin living a thousand years ago was part of the parallel tradition, this feudal survival in the form of a pāg should belong to Tantric religious ceremonies, not to the head of Vidyapati.

Mahākavi Vidyapati: an early poet of Maithili who, in this account, preceded Kavīśvara Jyotirishwar (approximately 1275–1350), since Jyotirishwar mentions him in his own work. He is distinguished here from Vidyapati Ṭhakkura, who wrote in Sanskrit and Avahaṭṭha.

Possibly the son of Shri Mahesh Thakur, of the barber caste, from the village of Bisfi.

The Bidāpat Nāch of the parallel tradition performs, through music and dance, the poems of Vidyapati's Padāvalī—a tradition extending, in this account, to before Jyotirishwar.

Vidyapati Ṭhakkura, 1350–1435: of the Viṣaivāra line, the Bisfi-Kāśyapa branch; a courtier of King Shivasimha and an author in Sanskrit and Avahaṭṭha. His many enduring works include Kīrtilatā, Kīrtipatākā, Puruṣa-Parīkṣā, Gorakṣavijaya, and Likhanāvalī. He is distinguished here from the earlier Maithili poet Vidyapati, whom the author places before Jyotirishwar.

Bodhi Kayastha

In Vidyapati Ṭhakkura's Puruṣa-Parīkṣā the story of Bodhi Kayastha's attainment of the Ganges is told. The same story of reaching the Ganges also circulated about Mahākavi Vidyapati, the earlier writer of the Maithili Padāvalī, and later became attached as well to Vidyapati Ṭhakkura, the Sanskrit and Avahaṭṭha author.

Ugna Mahadeva

Mahadeva, in the guise of Ugna, lived as Vidyapati's servant so that he might hear the poet's songs. This tale of Ugna has become popular through its association with both the earlier Maithili poet Vidyapati, whom the author places before Jyotirishwar, and the later Vidyapati Ṭhakkura, author in Sanskrit and Avahaṭṭha and courtier of Shivasimha.

2

"The Investiture of Vidyapati with the Sacred Thread and the Pāg by the Mithila Sanskritik Parishad"

The Mithila Sanskritik Parishad and those associated with it, including Kishorikant Mishra, either failed to grasp—or did not wish to grasp—the difference between Vidyapati Ṭhakkura, the author in Sanskrit and Avahaṭṭha, and the poet known as the Kavikokila, the cuckoo-voiced Vidyapati. The written historical record places Gonu Jha between 1050 and 1150, yet Usha Kiran Khan depicts him engaging in a learned debate with the Sanskrit- and Avahaṭṭha-writing Vidyapati in her Hindi historical novel Sirjanhar (Bharatiya Jnanpith). Virendra Jha places Gonu Jha five hundred years ago, while Taranand Viyogi places him three hundred years ago; their Hindi books on Gonu Jha were published respectively by Rajkamal Prakashan and the National Book Trust. In Vibha Rani's Hindi book on Gonu Jha (Vani Prakashan), Kunal places him during the rule of Bhav Singh, in the fourteenth century. Such is the situation, even though the entries in the Pañjī place Gonu Jha ten generations before the Vidyapati who wrote in Sanskrit and Avahaṭṭha.

Vidyapati and the Pāg in the Parallel Tradition. Vidyapati's Sanskrit writings bear the words "composed by Ṭhakkura Vidyāpati"; that Vidyapati was a Brahmin. My concern is the poet of the Maithili Padāvalī, and the question of why he was made to wear the pāg and thereby turned into "our Vidyapati." This did not happen during the eight centuries when non-Brahmin communities preserved him through Bidāpat Nāch. Rather, Bengal appropriated the songs of Vidyapati and Govindadas; yet it was the Bengali scholar Rajkrishna Mukhopadhyay who first declared, in 1875, that Vidyapati was a poet of Mithila, and it was Nagendranath Gupta, also of Bengal, who first declared Govindadas to be a poet of Mithila. Bengal initially responded with fierce opposition, but eventually accepted the facts.

The Vidyapati whom Rajkrishna Mukhopadhyay identified as belonging to Mithila was the Vidyapati of the Padāvalī. Bengal never claimed the Sanskrit- and Avahaṭṭha-writing Vidyapati Ṭhakkura as its own.

The Maithili songs inserted into Jyotirishwar's Sanskrit play Dhūrtasamāgama, and those included in the Sanskrit- and Avahaṭṭha-writing Vidyapati's Gorakṣavijaya, also testify to the older Padāvalī tradition and show its influence on both writers.

Then Mithila's scholars grew uneasy. They appealed to Vidyapati's Sanskrit and Avahaṭṭha writings and to genealogical-register entries under the names Govindadas and Vidyapati, producing a "Vidyapati Thakur" and a "Govindadas Jha" (!!!). Ramanath Jha's superficial understanding of the Pañjī and narrow perspective were damaging here. Then, without warning, a pāg was placed on Vidyapati's head: the Mithila Sanskritik Parishad, established after India's independence, committed what the author calls the offence of adorning the Maithili poet—not the Sanskrit author—with this headgear and declaring him a Brahmin. Thus the Brahmin establishment made the poet into "our Vidyapati." Yet the Pañjī contains many poets, including Kavīśvara Jyotirishwar. Why, then, does the discrepancy between people bearing the name Vidyapati arise here, but not with Jyotirishwar? Although the process was planned, one item of evidence escaped suppression.

Let us return to the Bidāpat sung by non-Brahmins. According to this argument, its Vidyapati lived before Jyotirishwar, possibly in the Nāuā Thakur (barber) community. Jyotirishwar's mention of the poet in the Varṇa-Ratnākara is advanced as evidence.

Nowhere in the Padāvalī does this Vidyapati identify himself as a writer of Sanskrit or Avahaṭṭha. The poems contain compassion for the dispossessed that the writings of the other, Brahmin Vidyapati do not display. Why is this? The Sanskrit- and Avahaṭṭha-writing Vidyapati, the author argues, expresses contempt for the dispossessed and is a rigid Brahmin in his written statements.

The Vidyapati of the Padāvalī, by contrast, is guileless. The author alleges that a few rigidly orthodox passages were absurdly interpolated by Brahminist editors.

The idea behind Piyā Desāntar, Vidyapati's Bidesiya, has now been placed before informed readers. In the face of the present misery of Maithil migrants, it is respectfully offered to Mahākavi Vidyapati. Does the Sanskrit- and Avahaṭṭha-writing Vidyapati express this pain?

The Padāvalī bears witness to a parallel culture. A writer who composed in Sanskrit and Avahaṭṭha might experience scholars' ridicule for writing in Avahaṭṭha; but is this the pain voiced by the poet of the Padāvalī? His songs contain joy and anguish—the joy and anguish of the dispossessed. The Vidyapati who wrote in Sanskrit and Avahaṭṭha was a learned royal scholar and could be censured for composing even in Avahaṭṭha; the Maithili poet, belonging to the parallel tradition, was remote from that situation. This tradition goes back to the Rgveda, when nārāśaṃsī compositions existed. History is silent on whether this parallel-tradition Vidyapati belonged to the Nāuā Thakur caste or to the Brahmin caste.

Yet the folk narratives and oral traditions, the intimate connection of Bidāpat with the dispossessed, and the traditions of Bisfi, are held here to support his non-Brahmin identity. Not a single line of the Sanskrit and Avahaṭṭha writings mentions the songs of that Vidyapati, nor do the Padāvalī songs mention their author's supposed Sanskrit or Avahaṭṭha works. The Sanskrit and Avahaṭṭha literature laments Muslim incursions and the desecration of sacred threads and temples; the Padāvalī, in contrast, speaks of the delight, vitality and struggle of the dispossessed, without such outcries. In his supposed time, Muslims may scarcely have been resident in Mithila. And when the very question is whether the Maithili Vidyapati was a Brahmin, what mentality are we fostering by dressing him in a pāg? Was Vidyapati "ours," or not? If he was not a Brahmin, would he cease to belong to us? Would his migration song Piyā Desāntar lose its significance? Is the exclusive discussion of his erotic songs not potentially a conspiracy? How proper is it to imprison a poet of Vidyapati's stature within caste boundaries by making him wear the pāg? Vijay Kumar Thakur writes in Medieval Mithila: "In Mithila's religious sphere, the influence of the religious ideology of the feudal age was so pervasive that the following remnants of that tradition are still found in society: ... (d) the pāg too is connected with Tantric ideology" (p. 26).

Let the pāg, then, be confined to Tantric rites, marriage and sacred-thread initiation. Why bring the Vidyapati of the parallel tradition into such ceremonies? It was the Mithila Sanskritik Parishad of Kishorikant Mishra that committed this offence. If the language and culture have nevertheless survived in the care of people claiming to be their guardians, that survival says much about the distinctive strength of the language and culture themselves.

Ramlochan Thakur also made a statement suited to the platform of this same reactionary Kishorikant Mishra, concerning the number of novels, a pronouncement that has no historical value. In the magazine of the Chetana Samiti, Maneshwar Manuj likewise declared in a platform-driven statement that Jagdish Prasad Mandal had written only four novels!!!

If Jagdish Prasad Mandal did not have "Mandal" as a surname and were known simply as Jagdish Prasad, Ramanath Jha's followers would declare him a Śrotriya, Amar and Ramdev Jha's followers would pronounce him a Brahmin, and Mr Verma, author of the Laldas Memorial Volume, would proclaim him a Kayastha.

And if Jagdish Prasad Mandal's photograph were unavailable, the reactionary Mithila Sanskritik Parishad of Kishorikant Mishra would perform his sacred-thread investiture, place a pāg on his head, and repeat on him the offence it committed against Vidyapati after a thousand years. Some old man in Berma would point to a clod of earth and declare: "Here is the imaginary homestead of Jagdish Prasad Jha/Ṭhakkura."

Abusive remarks from the sons of Malangiya and Ramdev Jha, and from numerous pseudonymous writers, have also been printed without cuts in Videha, so that readers may see them. Only abuse that could not be printed has been excluded. Out of fear of abuse, the historians of Maithili and Mithila have thus far hinted at this question but not pursued it further.

Thus, the argument once again concludes that he was a Vidyapati who preceded Jyotirishwar (1275–1350). The song-and-dance tradition of Jayadeva (about 1200) and the kīrtaniyā tradition correspond with the songs of this earlier Vidyapati, rather than with the poetic style of the Sanskrit- and Avahaṭṭha-writing Vidyapati.

Let us return to the platform of the Mithila Sanskritik Parishad, from which Ramlochan Thakur issued his platform-specific declaration. The Parishad did not initiate Vidyapati with the sacred thread; it performed the sacred-thread initiation of Maithili itself. The pāg it placed on Vidyapati's head erased Bindhyeshwar Mandal and Shrikant Mandal from Kolkata, and the ritual initiation of Maithili was complete.

Consider an example of the caste rigidity displayed by the Sanskrit- and Avahaṭṭha-writing Vidyapati:

Kīrtilatā: "Marriage across the boundary of caste and non-caste is base and despicable."

In Puruṣa-Parīkṣā, while narrating a story, Vidyapati offers an authorial pronouncement that Rajput women lack character. This recalls the statement in the Atharvaveda that someone may take a Shudra man's wife by the hand without his consent. The Sanskrit- and Avahaṭṭha-writing Vidyapati gives exceptional importance to caste and non-caste; purity of blood and birth are central for him. He declares that no person of low lineage deserves compassion!! Beauty, moreover, is supposedly the exclusive possession of the rich and privileged classes!! The Vidyapati in Sanskrit and Avahaṭṭha—the Vidyapati upon whom Kishorikant Mishra's Mithila Sanskritik Parishad bestowed the sacred thread and pāg—maintains that caste is the ultimate determinant of social life. Someone born in a bad family can be nothing but a serpent with an evil mind!! The same writer states that a country without enforceable caste rules is a land of mlecchas, outsiders or barbarians (Upendra Thakur, Aspects of Society and Economy of Medieval Mithila).

I have found no description of the pāg earlier than Amir Khusrau.

But the earlier Vidyapati, whom the author identifies as the writer of the Padāvalī before Jyotirishwar, says: "The king punishes no one here."

"The men of consequence are all of my own kind."

Hence the ruler does not punish anybody, and all the great and powerful people are of the same kind.

Govindadas's verses were difficult and did not possess a parallel living tradition, perhaps because they circulated among the upper castes. For those reasons they could not be preserved in this soil as Bidāpat Nāch was. What became of the poems of Gaṅgeśa Upādhyāya, author of the Tattvacintāmaṇi, whom Vardhamāna called Sukavi-kairava-kānana-induḥ, the moon over a grove of water lilies that are excellent poets? Pakṣadhara imposed a ban on writing, yet Raghunatha Shiromani and his disciples "Udayana" and "Gaṅgeśa" continued by memorizing works; with the establishment of the Navya-Nyāya school at Navadvipa, students stopped coming from Bengal.

The Vidyapati placed before Jyotirishwar: Abhinavagupta of Kashmir, who lived at the end of the tenth and beginning of the eleventh century, is said to mention Vidyapati in his Īśvara-Pratyabhijñā-Vimarśinī.

In Śrīdhara Dāsa's Saduktikarṇāmṛta, five verses of Vidyapati are quoted, in the language of the Vidyapati Padāvalī.

"So long as the mālatī does not unfold its blossom,"
"The bee will not sport with its honey."

And

"Where is the nectar of a bud whose petals remain closed?"

(Medieval Mithila, Upendra Thakur)

Jyotirishwar (1275–1350), Sixth Kallola, "Description of Learned People": "The Bidāpat entered the court; following him came a Telugu woman and a Maratha woman. The two women associated with the Bidāpat looked as though they had bathed in the two-coloured waters of the Ganges and Yamuna. Each wore a garment with four hanging ends … How did they appear? As the Saraswati joins the Ganges and Yamuna at Prayag, so the two attendants stood beside the Bidāpat. Daśaundhī announced to the king: 'Let the Bidāpat take his place in court.'"

(The Bidāpat, a man, entered. Behind him came a Telugu woman and a Maratha woman. The two women looked as though they had bathed in the differently coloured Ganges and Yamuna. Each wore a garment with four ends. Imagine how they looked: just as the Saraswati is joined by the Ganges and Yamuna at Prayag, the two women stood on either side of the Bidāpat. Daśaundhī informed the king, and the Bidāpat took his seat.)

Eighth Kallola, "Description of the Realm": "The songs of the Bidāpats, their dancing, instruments and rhythm, with their long, flowing skirts ..."

The Bidāpat performers sang, danced and played instruments in time, wearing their long skirts.

Ugna Mahadeva. Mahadeva lived in Vidyapati's house as a servant, under the name Ugna, to hear the poet's songs. This tale of Ugna became famous through its association with both the earlier Maithili Vidyapati, whom the author places before Jyotirishwar, and Vidyapati Ṭhakkura, the Sanskrit- and Avahaṭṭha-writing courtier of Shivasimha.

Bodhi Kayastha. The story of Bodhi's attainment of the Ganges is told in the Sanskrit- and Avahaṭṭha-writing Vidyapati Ṭhakkura's Puruṣa-Parīkṣā. The tale also circulated about the earlier Mahākavi Vidyapati of the Maithili Padāvalī, and later became attached to Vidyapati Ṭhakkura as well.

Vidyapati Ṭhakkura's Sanskrit writings came to prominence after Mithila's learned tradition had declined. His work receives little particular attention within Sanskrit literary history, and fewer students were coming from Bengal. For those who did arrive, his Sanskrit and Avahaṭṭha compositions were contemporary works produced while the older scholarly tradition was dying, whereas the pre-Jyotirishwar Padāvalī had already become famous. It is not even certain that the pāg existed in Gonu Jha's or Vidyapati's time, since the author finds its mention only in Amir Khusrau (1253–1325). Vijay Kumar Thakur regards it as a feudal symbol associated with Tantric practices. It may have been imposed upon subordinate chiefs after Muslim incursions; it also resembles a Muslim cap. Following those incursions, according to this account, only Brahmins and Kayasthas—not Rajputs—held feudal authority in Mithila; among those two groups the headgear is sometimes still used at weddings and other ceremonies.

Mahākavi Vidyapati. The first poet of Maithili, placed here before Kavīśvara Jyotirishwar (about 1275–1350), because Jyotirishwar's work mentions him. He is distinguished from Vidyapati Ṭhakkura, the Sanskrit and Avahaṭṭha author. According to tradition, he may have been the son of Shri Mahesh Thakur of the Nāuā Thakur (barber) community in Bisfi. The Bidāpat Nāch of the parallel tradition has performed his Padāvalī poems in song and dance since before Jyotirishwar's time.

Vidyapati Ṭhakkura, 1350–1435: belonging to the Viṣaivāra, Bisfi-Kāśyapa branch; a courtier of King Shivasimha, and a Sanskrit and Avahaṭṭha writer. His many lasting works include Kīrtilatā, Kīrtipatākā, Puruṣa-

Parīkṣā, Gorakṣavijaya, and Likhanāvalī. The author distinguishes him from the earlier Maithili poet Vidyapati, placed before Jyotirishwar.

3

Phanishwarnath Renu wrote a reportage on Bidāpat Nāch, published in the weekly Vishwamitra on 1 August 1945. The reportage is important because it was written seven hundred years after Jyotirishwar's account of the same subject; throughout those seven centuries, the parallel tradition kept Vidyapati alive. Yet Vidyapati was suddenly taken away from the people who had kept him alive. Bideshwar Thakur died singing Vidyapati's songs and protesting that the Brahmins had taken the poet away by placing a pāg upon his head. Kanungo Badri Prasad Thakur of Brahmpura, Vinod Thakur of Pokharbhira, Saryug Thakur of Rudrapur, Jayaram Thakur of Mehath, and the whole village of Bisfi continue to repeat this lament. Shaligram Yadav and Awadhiya Thakur are witnesses to Bisfi's tradition. All kinds of fanciful arguments concerning Vidyapati's birth have been advanced in the course of this ritual appropriation, but no research paper has even discussed his parallel tradition. This essay is dedicated to the thousands of people of that tradition, people like Bideshwar Thakur who kept Vidyapati alive between Jyotirishwar's account and Phanishwarnath Renu's reportage.

Mithila's Śatapatha Brāhmaṇa tradition and its parallel tradition.
Language must have existed before the Ṛgveda, the oldest surviving work of Vedic Sanskrit. A considerable body of oral literature—gāthā, nārāśaṃsī, tales of deities and other narratives—must already have been composed. The Ṛgveda employs the terms gāthin, gātuvit and gāthapati for singers of such narratives. From the Vedic period onward, gāthā and nārāśaṃsī existed side by side. Did Vedic Sanskrit develop out of Prakrit, or did Prakrit develop out of Vedic Sanskrit? The people's narratives called nārāśaṃsī in the Veda indicate that the two continued in parallel for a long time, each influencing the other. Consider the Ṛgveda: what does the use of dūlabha in place of durlabha (4.9.8) demonstrate? What does paścā in place of paścāt in the Atharvaveda (10.4.10) suggest? And what does pratisaṃhāya for pratisaṃdhāya in the Gopatha Brāhmaṇa (2.4) show?

The Aryans came to Mithila from the western part of India, and parts of the Vedas existed before they arrived. That is why so many Maithili words and pronunciations occur in Vedic Sanskrit but not in classical Sanskrit. Ignorance, the theory of karma, the round of birth and rebirth, and liberation are concepts, the author argues, that the Aryans received from non-Aryans. Hence the Upanishads teach a path to liberation, not merely to heaven. How is liberation obtained? Through sacrifice? No: through knowledge, reflection, contemplation and meditation. Under the patronage of King Janaka, Yājñavalkya composed the Bṛhadāraṇyaka Upaniṣad in Tirhut, a region characterized here as non-Aryan.

Commenting on the fifty-seventh aphorism of the Sāṃkhyakārikā, Vācaspati Miśra asks whether it can be said that unconscious milk nourishes a calf and, correspondingly, that unconscious nature directs a living being toward liberating knowledge. God is complete in himself: for what purpose would he create the world? If he created it out of compassion for living beings, those beings would be bound only after creation; before creation there was no bondage, so what occasion could there have been for compassion? Creation therefore occurs through prakṛti, and the living being obtains apavarga, liberation, by its own effort. Dissolution too occurs through discrimination. The author's reading of Vācaspati is thus non-theistic, not theistic. If God took part in directing nature, that would be a conscious act undertaken for a purpose; God has no such need. Gautama of Mithila, composer of the Nyāyasūtra, speaks of attaining the supreme good through knowledge of sixteen categories, but nowhere among those categories does he say that liberation is attained through God. The Vaiśeṣikasūtra says the Vedas were composed by learned people, not by God. Kumārila Bhaṭṭa holds that reliable discussion of God's existence before creation is impossible.

The so-called mainstream of the Śatapatha Brāhmaṇa and its parallel mainstream. Brahminism and non-Brahminism existed in Mithila from the beginning. Jyotirishwar writes, "The Buddhist side appears thus: fearsome at first sight." Because of a similarity of names, the inert tradition of the Śatapatha Brāhmaṇa has been eager to sanctify the Sanskrit- and Avahaṭṭha-writing Vidyapati. Vedic ṛc and nārāśaṃsī, Mahākavi Vidyapati and the pāg-wearing Vidyapati, liberation and heaven or hell: these opposed ways of thinking have coexisted in Mithila. Both Videgha Māthava of the Śatapatha Brāhmaṇa and Nimi of the Purāṇas are said to have a priest named Gautama; the author identifies them and locates the beginning of the Videha kingdom here. Māthava's priest Gautama inaugurated the Mitravinda sacrifice or offering, which Yājñavalkya later restored in the time of Mahājanaka II. The tradition that continually invoked Maitreyi, Yājñavalkya, Sita and Janaka was able to perform Vidyapati's sacred-thread investiture and install the pāg with extraordinary speed; that course of action accorded with its supposed Śatapatha Brāhmaṇa mainstream.

After the decree of Madhav Singh's branch of the Pañjī in 1760, a new ideology of elite lineage spread among Brahmins and Kayasthas in Mithila. The bhalmānus or battēsagamiyā subdivision emerged among Karna Kayasthas and the Śrotriya subdivision among Maithil Brahmins. The author associates these developments with severe increases in physical and mental illness in both groups, along with polygamy, child marriage and the number of widows. The speed and quietness with which this took place also suited the supposed mainstream of the Śatapatha Brāhmaṇa.

The views of Dineshwar Lal Anand and Ramvriksha Benipuri on Vidyapati!! Dineshwar Lal Anand was mistaken. At that time the Pañjī was a secret body of records, and the Viṣaivāra Bisfi line of the Sanskrit- and Avahaṭṭha-writing Vidyapati had been reclassified in the registers as Jayavara, a lower grade. The branch registers did not exist before 1760. Evidence of this, the author contends, is that descendants of Ayachi Mishra's original line appear in both the Śrotriya and other Brahmin subdivisions. It is rather like the Indus Valley seals: they show bulls, but not cows—how then could bulls have appeared without cows? Anand did not have access to every fact in the registers. Perhaps, influenced by the misrepresentation that the Padāvalī poet and the Sanskrit- and Avahaṭṭha-writing Vidyapati were one and the same, he thought that connecting the Jayavara classification of the Viṣaivāra Bisfi line with the writer's use of Avahaṭṭha would explain why Vidyapati Ṭhakkura became a revolutionary. Anand nevertheless admits that not even an autograph of the Padāvalī, nor a record of its collection during Vidyapati's lifetime, is available. But how could that be, when the Sanskrit- and Avahaṭṭha-writing Vidyapati announced the beginnings and endings of his books so emphatically, identifying the kings and queens who inspired him and the patrons under whose protection he lived? The full apparatus of literary authorship is there, with the strength of both Saraswati and Lakshmi. Why is it absent from the Padāvalī? Anand remains silent. The Sanskrit- and Avahaṭṭha-writing Vidyapati identifies his patrons but writes almost nothing about himself in those books. He feels pressured even in writing Avahaṭṭha, which was then a literary language of the dominant tradition. Yet the earlier Vidyapati's influence was so great that he had to insert Maithili songs into his Sanskrit drama Gorakṣavijaya, just as Jyotirishwar, who wrote the first reportage on the Bidāpat, had included Maithili songs in his Sanskrit Dhūrtasamāgama.

Govind Jha recognises the Vidyapati tradition in Jyotirishwar's Bidāpat and discusses it. Why, however, can he not carry that recognition back to a pre-Jyotirishwar Vidyapati, while Bideshwar Thakur is literally singing his life away? How can the place in a play where Vidyapati felt thirsty become the home village of the playwright? Everyone is writing plays about "our Vidyapati" according to personal convenience.

Ramvriksha Benipuri too lacked the evidence of the Pañjī. On the basis of a fabricated caste subdivision and an anecdote he wrote a satirical piece on Keshav Mishra's Vidyapati. This Keshav Mishra of the Dvaita Pariśiṣṭa was the grandson of Vācaspati II (1400–1490). Another Keshav Mishra, living around 1150, wrote the Tarkabhāṣā; Vardhamāna, son of Gaṅgeśa, composer of the Tattvacintāmaṇi, reviewed it in his Tarkaprakāśa. Benipuri could not advance even one step beyond the research Ananda Coomaraswamy had undertaken in 1915; nor has any other mainstream scholar advanced beyond it a hundred years later. Benipuri retells the Ugna story but is silent on whether Mahadeva would dance on Kailasa to the Brahminical Vidyapati's Śaivasarvasvasāra or to the nācārī songs of the earlier Vidyapati. Like Coomaraswamy, Benipuri knew that a manuscript of the Bhāgavata written in the hand of the Sanskrit- and Avahaṭṭha-writing Vidyapati was available, and had heard that Vidyapati attained the Ganges and was taken into the river's embrace. Like Coomaraswamy, however, he had heard of the Sanskrit- and Avahaṭṭha-writing Vidyapati's Puruṣa-Parīkṣā without reading it. Otherwise he would have known that Vidyapati tells that story of Bodhi Kayastha. The Ganges tale, like the story of Ugna, had circulated in connection with the earlier Vidyapati before it was transferred ritually to the later Sanskrit and Avahaṭṭha writer; the story of Bodhi Kayastha in Puruṣa-Parīkṣā is cited as evidence. Benipuri even calls Kīrtipatākā a collection of Maithili songs!! Is inquiry by hearsay to be called research? Why has the withered mainstream failed to go beyond the foundation laid by Coomaraswamy a hundred years earlier? Because, the author says, its Śatapatha-Brahminical mainstream will not allow it. Yet without evidence Benipuri declares Puraditya, a friend of Shivasimha, a Bhumihar Brahmin, just as Ramanath Jha called Govindadas (Jha) a Śrotriya—a claim Sukumar Sen considered ridiculous —Ramdev Jha declared him a Brahmin, and Mr Verma, in the Laldas Memorial Volume, pronounced Kalidasa a Kayastha.

The Sanskrit- and Avahaṭṭha-writing Vidyapati begins and ends his books with full ritual observances; he remembers kings, queens and patrons, but says nothing about himself. Why did the Padāvalī live on in people's voices? Why was it not furnished with the elaborate literary framing of his books? Because, in this account, the songs were composed centuries before him, at a time when the pāg had not yet appeared in Mithila. Names such as Rupnarayan, Shivasimha, Lakhima, Dev Singh, Har Singh, Padam Singh, Vishwas Deve, Arjun-Amar, Raghav Singh, Rudra Singh, Dhir Singh, Bhairav Singh and Chandra Singh were later inserted into the songs; their insertion is clearly perceptible in disruptions of the melody. The Sanskrit- and Avahaṭṭha-writing Vidyapati's Bhūparikramā (for Dev Singh), Kīrtilatā (for Kirti Singh and Vir Singh), Kīrtipatākā, Gorakṣavijaya (for Shivasimha), Likhanāvalī (for Puraditya) and Dānavākyāvalī (for Queen Dhirmati) were plainly works composed under royal patronage. Gorakṣavijaya was written for a Bhairava worship ceremony; like Dhūrtasamāgama, it contained Maithili songs, demonstrating the immense influence of the earlier Vidyapati. Were their names not identical, someone would have turned Jyotirishwar himself into a Vidyapati who lived before Jyotirishwar.

Gaṅgeśa, author of the Tattvacintāmaṇi, wrote one work equivalent, it is said, to twelve thousand books. Professor Dinesh Chandra Bhattacharya writes in History of Navya-Nyāya in Mithila: "The family which was inferior in social status is now extinct in Mithila … Gangesha's family is completely ignored and we are not expected to know even his father's name." He adds that this information was provided by Professor R. Jha—that is, Ramanath Jha!

Let us examine what the genealogical registers say. They clearly record, the author contends, that Gaṅgeśa was born five years after his father's death and married a woman of the leatherworking community. Why did Ramanath Jha conceal these facts from Dinesh Chandra Bhattacharya? A caste subdivision spread the story of Gaṅgeśa's transformation from fool to scholar, and a conspiracy was formed to erase him. Gaṅgeśa's son Vardhamāna called his father Sukavi-kairava-kānana-induḥ. The foregoing examples, the author argues, show the kind of conspiracy through which the poetry of so celebrated a scholar has become unavailable.

Vasudeva of Bengal was a fellow student of Pakṣadhara Miśra. He came to Mithila for study, passed the śalākā examination, and received the title Sārvabhauma. Vasudeva memorised the verses of Gaṅgeśa's Tattvacintāmaṇi and Udayana's Nyāyakusumāñjali. Pakṣadhara and the other teachers of Mithila would not allow the Tattvacintāmaṇi to be written down or copied! Raghunatha Shiromani, Vasudeva's disciple, defeated his teacher Pakṣadhara Miśra in disputation and secured the right to reproduce the text. Vasudeva and Raghunatha established a Navya-Nyāya school at Navadvipa. Pakṣadhara Miśra was a contemporary of the Vidyapati who wrote in Sanskrit and Avahaṭṭha; with Raghunatha, the arrival of students from Bengal to Mithila came to an end.

Grierson called the Bisfi copperplate said to have been given by Shivasimha to the Sanskrit- and Avahaṭṭha-writing Vidyapati a forgery, because Grierson knew the Padāvalī and thought it impossible that its poet should have received such a grant. Yet the copperplate had actually been given, according to the argument here, to the Sanskrit and Avahaṭṭha Vidyapati. Grierson did not consider the difference between the two. Mahāmahopādhyāya Haraprasad Shastri did consider it and judged the copperplate genuine.

Śrīdhara Dāsa's Saduktikarṇāmṛta contains a hymn to the Ganges by the Kaivarta Papiha, and songs of Radha and Krishna. Dhoyi, a court poet of Lakshman Sen, was a jolhā (weaver). Lakhima Thakurain did not compose Padāvalī songs but wrote verse in Sanskrit, according to Grierson. Śrīdhara Dāsa's inscription is at Andhratharhi, and he served as minister to Nanyadeva and Gangadeva. His descendant Amiyakar lived at the time of the Sanskrit- and Avahaṭṭha-writing Vidyapati. Upendra Thakur considers Gangadeva a Kalachuri ruler. Vijay Kumar Thakur reads a Vidyapati song in Śrīdhara Dāsa's Saduktikarṇāmṛta as a eulogy of the Kalachuri Karna. Radhakrishna Chaudhary differs. In any event, this Vidyapati lived before Jyotirishwar. According to the Rāmacarita, Vigrahapala III defeated Karna; Radhakrishna Chaudhary found two Pala inscriptions at Naulagarh, sixteen kilometres north of Begusarai, bearing upon that struggle. That Karna too belonged to the eleventh century. Dhūrtasamāgama is also well known in South India.

Appendix:

Phanishwarnath Renu

A Vidyapati of Folk Song
Introduction

While researching Mahākavi Vidyapati, I felt that one chapter would need to be entitled "Vidyapati, Poet of the Cultivators, Sowers and Bullock-Cart Drivers." For even today, in the Purnia-Saharsa region, there are troupes that sing Vidyapati's songs and dance while expressing their emotions. The leaders of these troupes are often buffalo-riders, herdsmen and drivers of carts. I asked the scholars of Mithila about this.

"How could this have happened?" They replied, "What sort of trouble have you got yourself into? These fools are the reason Vidyapati is in such a condition today. These ordinary people took it into their heads to tack on four or so songs in Vidyapati's name ... You are being led astray." Paying no attention to the prohibitions of Mithila's scholars, I cheerfully began preparing for a journey to Saharsa—or should that be Saharsha? Kanchira is a village over which two district magistrates exercise authority: half the village lies in Saharsa and half in Purnia. The Vidyapati troupe of Kanchira is known to people in both districts. On the day I reached the village, something unusual had happened there. A leader who had represented the area for ten years had been defeated outright in an election. A performance of song and dance that night might therefore have been given another political meaning. Fearing this, Janakdas, leader of the Vidyapati troupe, refused permission for a performance.

On the second night, after much persuasion, he gave permission. After prolonged argument, returning repeatedly to the point, Janakdas asserted that "Vidyapati dance" had first originated in his own family. He would never explain further. When he finally became convinced that I had not come to obtain one or two thousand rupees from the government treasury in the name of his "Vidyapati Dance Troupe," he struck the mṛdaṅga. I watched the dancing all night. A boy who normally tended cattle, dressed in a sari, became Radha, a woman tormented by separation, and sang in tears: "How many days, Hari, must I send you away, I, a solitary woman?" The next day I asked Janakdas about the origin of the dance. He said, "I do not know how long its original songs have continued in our family." His unhappiness was caused by my tape recorder. "You secretly put all the songs on your tape, slyly! You got your work done for free, did you?" Even after I paid him fifty rupees in cash, he would not answer my question: when and how had cultivators, field-workers, herdsmen and cart drivers begun to dance while singing Vidyapati's songs? I lay all day on the straw in Janakdas's thatched shelter, but he took no pity. His widowed young daughter pleaded my case, but he still would not relent. "Do you want to have our family's joke printed in the Government Gazette?" The old Janakdas released his oxen and went to graze them. I remained lying in his shelter, and only afterwards heard a story—or dreamed it, or fell into some illusion. I cannot say which.

39. Ramdev Prasad Mandal 'Jhārūdār', Known as the Bhikhari Thakur of Maithili: The First People's Poet of Maithili, His Songs and Jhārū — 'Without Me, the World Is Empty'

Abstract

The 'Bhikhari Thakur of Maithili', Ramdev Prasad Mandal 'Jhārūdār', challenges the world and declares, 'Without me, the world is empty.' Have we ever heard of a poetic genre called jhārū ('broom') in Maithili literature—or indeed in the literature of any language—apart from Mandal's jhārū? For the new form that Ramdev Prasad Mandal 'Jhārūdār' has invented spontaneously, on a buffalo's back, along the embankments and ridges of fields, and at crossroads, is meant to sweep away society's vices with a rough broom.

Keywords: Maithili; Bhikhari Thakur; renowned as; first people's poet; Ramdev.

The 'Bhikhari Thakur of Maithili', Ramdev Prasad Mandal 'Jhārūdār', challenges the world and says, 'Without me, the world is empty.' Have we heard of a poetic genre called jhārū ('broom') in Maithili literature, or in the literature of any other language, apart from Ramdev Prasad Mandal 'Jhārūdār's' jhārū? Of course not!

For the new genre that Ramdev Prasad Mandal 'Jhārūdār' has spontaneously invented on a buffalo's back, along field embankments and dusty ridges, and at crossroads is designed to scour society's vices away with a coarse broom. A flower-broom will not sweep a threshing floor, just as a rough field-broom cannot be used to sweep a veranda. A broom of pigeon-pea stalks fastened to a stick clears away the refuse. Thus there are many kinds of brooms and scraping brushes in everyday use. Ramdev writes songs, and also jhārū in many colours and varieties, like the many-coloured panisokhā. Each problem calls for its own broom. And when both older and newer writers of Maithili increasingly adopt surnames derived from clan and lineage, how much does the pen-name 'Jhārūdār'—the wielder of the broom—communicate without a further word?
And consider the poet's self-confidence: without me, there is nothing.
Before me there was no rule.
Nor was there any ordinance of religion.
Without me the world is empty.
The one who would kill is no better than a beast.
Now seek out, if you will, the Buddhist philosophy of emptiness and Śaṅkara's Advaita in this jhārū!
He wants neither the disease of money nor the disease of superstition.
Everyone has become sick with the hunger for money,
Devotees of superstition and harmful custom.
But do we need Rāma's bow and arrows to remedy this? That would mean waiting for Rāma to be born again. No: trust yourself. For if you are the problem, you are also the solution.
Who but you will take away this suffering?
It is through you that all these demons will die.
Make the pen, once more,
Rāma's bow and arrows, my friends.
The poet understands the importance of unity among people. But how is unity to be achieved? Observe his answer:
To forge unity, one must endure;
One must flow together, joining vessel to vessel;
One must bend when one is in the wrong.
The condition of women—whether a woman remains in her village or has become a political leader—still causes pain. When the poet is Jhārūdār, that hurt finds expression in this manner:
Women bear within them Sītā and Rādhā;
Men have turned into Rāvaṇa and Kaṃsa.
How then can this household,
This world of human relationships, survive?
But what is the remedy? Will men change the condition of women? No:

women themselves possess the necessary confidence. They will grasp the thread of education, and then—
No longer shall women remain ignorant;
They will become resolute, strong, and unyielding.
Does the poet concern himself only with women's condition, caste and similar social questions? Not at all. He is also troubled by pollution, that product of scientific and technological development:
Pollution, this gift of science,
Has entered the home like a rat.
It stands with its mouth agape like a tiger;
The world has become its prey.
And he also shows the younger generation how pollution may be reduced:
Let the engine be in perfect condition;
Let it emit no needless smoke.
Think a little of the next generation:
How will it build its world?
He has written a jhārū on this theme too. He asks us to protect not merely the forests but those who live in them:
Forests, lakes, rivers and forest-dwellers,
Mountains and plateaus, together with deserts—
Protect the environment;
In this way the country will become prosperous.
On dowry and the kāṭar custom, Ramdev writes:
Today Sītā weeps in every home;
All night long Janaka cannot sleep.
Where will the money for dowry come from?
How will a daughter be given in marriage?
Jhārūdār is proud of Mithila. But of which Mithila?
Where the world-purifying Gaṅgā flows, where the jyotirliṅga shines;
Where the teachings of Hazrat, Tulsī and Vālmīki resound.
Yet Jhārūdār worries about Mithila as it exists within Bihar. He wishes to show something to Bihar's Chief Minister Nitish Kumar, who is called a 'son of development':
I shall take photographs with my camera
Of Mithila and its Maithil families;
I shall go to Patna to show them
To Nitish Kumar, the 'son of development'.
I shall photograph fields without irrigation,
Deprived of irrigation water and electricity.
Where does humanity reside? In human beings, surely. And it is such a person who will win the world's crown and live victoriously as Jhārūdār!
May I receive the crown of the entire world,
And live as Jhārūdār;
If humanity lives in human beings,

Their true nature will never change.
Thus the jhārū and songs composed while wandering through woods, scrubland, fields and open countryside must surely be distinctive, and the one who wrote them deserves that crown. Mithila's Bhikhari Thakur will indeed wear it and bear the name Jhārūdār.

Supplementary Discussion

The 'Bhikhari Thakur of Maithili', Ramdev Prasad Mandal 'Jhārūdār', challenges the world and says, 'Without me, the world is empty.'

Have we heard of a poetic genre called jhārū ('broom') in Maithili literature, or in the literature of any other language, apart from Ramdev Prasad Mandal 'Jhārūdār's' jhārū? Of course not!

For the new genre that Ramdev Prasad Mandal 'Jhārūdār' has spontaneously invented on a buffalo's back, along field embankments and dusty ridges, and at crossroads is designed to scour society's vices away with a coarse broom. A flower-broom will not sweep a threshing floor, just as a rough field-broom cannot be used to sweep a veranda. A broom of pigeon-pea stalks fastened to a stick clears away the refuse. Thus there are many kinds of brooms and scraping brushes in everyday use. Ramdev writes songs, and also jhārū in many colours and varieties, like the many-coloured panisokhā. Each problem calls for its own broom. And when both older and newer writers of Maithili increasingly adopt surnames derived from clan and lineage, how much does the pen-name 'Jhārūdār'—the wielder of the broom—communicate without a further word?

And consider the poet's self-confidence: without me, there is nothing.

> Before me there was no rule.
> Nor was there any ordinance of religion.
> Without me the world is empty.
> The one who would kill is no better than a beast.

Now seek out, if you will, the Buddhist philosophy of emptiness and Śaṅkara's Advaita in this jhārū!

He wants neither the disease of money nor the disease of superstition.

> Everyone has become sick with the hunger for money,
> Devotees of superstition and harmful custom.

But do we need Rāma's bow and arrows to remedy this? That would mean waiting for Rāma to be born again. No: trust yourself. For if you are the problem, you are also the solution.

> Who but you will take away this suffering?

It is through you that all these demons will die.
Make the pen, once more,
Rāma's bow and arrows, my friends.

The poet understands the importance of unity among people. But how is unity to be achieved? Observe his answer:

To forge unity, one must endure;
One must flow together, joining vessel to vessel;
One must bend when one is in the wrong.

The condition of women—whether a woman remains in her village or has become a political leader—still causes pain. When the poet is Jhārūdār, that hurt finds expression in this manner:

Women bear within them Sītā and Rādhā;
Men have turned into Rāvaṇa and Kaṃsa.
How then can this household,
This world of human relationships, survive?

But what is the remedy? Will men change the condition of women? No: women themselves possess the necessary confidence. They will grasp the thread of education, and then—

No longer shall women remain ignorant;
They will become resolute, strong, and unyielding.

Does the poet concern himself only with women's condition, caste and similar social questions? Not at all. He is also troubled by pollution, that product of scientific and technological development:

Pollution, this gift of science,
Has entered the home like a rat.
It stands with its mouth agape like a tiger;
The world has become its prey.

And he also shows the younger generation how pollution may be reduced:

Let the engine be in perfect condition;
Let it emit no needless smoke.
Think a little of the next generation:
How will it build its world?

He has written a jhārū on this theme too. He asks us to protect not merely the forests but those who live in them:

Forests, lakes, rivers and forest-dwellers,
Mountains and plateaus, together with deserts—
Protect the environment;
In this way the country will become prosperous.

On dowry and the kāṭar custom, Ramdev writes:

Today Sītā weeps in every home;
All night long Janaka cannot sleep.
Where will the money for dowry come from?
How will a daughter be given in marriage?

Jhārūdār is proud of Mithila. But of which Mithila?

Where the world-purifying Gaṅgā flows, where the jyotirliṅga shines;
Where the teachings of Hazrat, Tulsī and Vālmīki resound.

Yet Jhārūdār worries about Mithila as it exists within Bihar. He wishes to show something to Bihar's Chief Minister Nitish Kumar, who is called a 'son of development':

I shall take photographs with my camera
Of Mithila and its Maithil families;
I shall go to Patna to show them
To Nitish Kumar, the 'son of development'.
I shall photograph fields without irrigation,
Deprived of irrigation water and electricity.

Where does humanity reside? In human beings, surely. And it is such a person who will win the world's crown and live victoriously as Jhārūdār!

May I receive the crown of the entire world,
And live as Jhārūdār;
If humanity lives in human beings,
Their true nature will never change.

Thus the jhārū and songs composed while wandering through woods, scrubland, fields and open countryside must surely be distinctive, and the one who wrote them deserves that crown. Mithila's Bhikhari Thakur will indeed wear it and bear the name Jhārūdār.

40. Ramvilas Sahu's Collection of Poems, Songs, Haiku, Senryū and Tanka, Rathak Chakkā Ulaṭi Chalai Bāṭ ('The Chariot Wheel Travels Against the Road')

Abstract

Rathak Chakkā Ulaṭi Chalai Bāṭ is the title of Ramvilas Sahu's collection of poems, songs, haiku, senryū and tanka. Employing an unadulterated vernacular vocabulary, he expresses his love of nature in three-line haiku and senryū and five-line tanka. His emotional response brings so many facts to light, discovers so many problems and searches for so many solutions, that readers may exclaim: 'Yes, why did I not think of this? But now I shall be able to.' Does Sahu's following tanka not remind us of Japan's Bashō?

Keywords: Ramvilas Sahu; poetry; song; haiku; senryū; tanka.

Rathak Chakkā Ulaṭi Chalai Bāṭ is the title of Ramvilas Sahu's collection of poems, songs, haiku, senryū and tanka. Employing the genuine vocabulary of the countryside, he conveys his love of nature through three-line haiku and senryū and five-line tanka. His poetry reveals so many facts, identifies so many difficulties and searches for their remedies with such feeling that readers may say: 'Yes, why did I not think of that? Now I shall be able to.'

The chariot's wheel
Travels against the path;
The potter's wheel spins,
Dancing where it stands—
Each wheel performs its different work.

Does the following tanka by Ramvilas Sahu not call to mind Japan's Bashō?

The month of Sāvan;
Drops of water fall
From the sky.
The frogs' instruments sound;
Ditches and hollows fill with water.

How wonderful the meeting of human life and nature seems in his poetry:

Black kohl,
Disfiguring a face;
The black cuckoo
Sings a sweet song
And enchants everyone.

But the comparison with black kohl does not end there:

Black kohl
May dry out the eyes;
Dark clouds
May drown us in rain,
And spoil our faces.

The nature-loving poet has read the properties of the sun well. Is this any less a description of the seasons than those of spring and winter?

The sunlight of Chaitra
Heats earth and water;

The westerly wind
Ripens gram and wheat,
And sweeps up dust and grit.

The poet is no less accomplished in longer verse; the current of the Kosi stirs him deeply:

My life has turned impoverished;
Jhauā, reeds, kāś and khagrā grasses contend with me;
The lives of my children have been swallowed by the floodwaters.

The poet also turns his pen against superstition:

The goddess's spirit dances through male and female mediums;
Thirty-six goddesses and fourteen gods
Have supposedly entered your body this very moment.
Whatever you ask for, they will grant;
They will remove every illness and affliction;
They will bless you with flowers and consecrated rice;
Failed undertakings and cherished wishes
They will fulfil in the snap of a finger;
In return they will demand laddus, goats and kids.

The poet is a farmer: how could he forget agriculture?

From early morning the fields
Begin to turn to muddy slush;
The ploughman drives his plough
While singing birhā songs.

And then …

'On the destruction of the plough
And the cultivation of the field
Rest all our hopes
Of filling our stomachs.'

And then …

I filled the granary with wheat grain;
I piled the chaff in the chaff-house.
The wheat crop of four months
I brought home through labour day and night;
With bread to eat, we shall live all year.

Through the words of village life and its sayings and proverbs, the poet communicates a great deal:

Rice bought in the market, water drawn along the road—

The merchant's household scales
Carry no value or worth.

For ...

The market's rice was lost on the way;
The water at the river landing dried up there.

The poet also knows about indigenous remedies and the prevention of disease:

Whoever eats a chutney of ichnā and poṭhī fish,
Along with bread made of finger millet,
Will not grow ill or fat—
From high blood pressure, diabetes or dropsy.

Ramvilas Sahu sings (and writes) chaitāvar songs, listens to birhā, and composes poetry on rice transplantation and farming. It would be difficult to find a match in literature for his poems on all these subjects. They have expanded the range of Maithili poetry. Ramvilas Sahu possesses not merely the ability to write about these matters but the ability to enter into their inner life and write from within.

Gajendra Thakur

Supplementary Discussion

Rathak Chakkā Ulaṭi Chalai Bāṭ is the title of Ramvilas Sahu's collection of poems, songs, haiku, senryū and tanka. Employing the genuine vocabulary of the countryside, he conveys his love of nature through three-line haiku and senryū and five-line tanka. His poetry reveals so many facts, identifies so many difficulties and searches for their remedies with such feeling that readers may say: 'Yes, why did I not think of that? Now I shall be able to.'

Does the following tanka by Ramvilas Sahu not call to mind Japan's Bashō?

The nature-loving poet has read the properties of the sun well. Is this any less a description of the seasons than those of spring and winter?

Ramvilas Sahu sings (and writes) chaitāvar songs, listens to birhā, and composes poetry on rice transplantation and farming. It would be difficult to find a match in literature for his poems on all these subjects. They have expanded the range of Maithili poetry. Ramvilas Sahu possesses not merely the ability to write about these matters but the ability to enter into their inner life and write from within.

41. Umesh Mandal's Nishtuki: A Collection of Poems, Short Poems, Haiku, Tanka and Ghazals

Abstract

Nishtuki is a collection of poems, short poems, haiku, tanka and ghazals by Umesh Mandal. The new generation of Maithili writers does not wish to accord respect to age alone when that age is not progressive. And this is how it should be: it is work that merits respect, not age or inherited standing.

Keywords: Umesh · Mandal · Nishtuki · poetry · short poem · haiku · tanka

Nishtuki is Umesh Mandal's collection of poems, short poems, haiku, tanka and ghazals. Maithili's new generation does not want to confer prestige merely on the basis of age if the elder in question is not progressive. Nor should it: work deserves respect, not age or inherited rank. Why, then, should elderly people or established figures who are progressive not receive their due respect?

Consider this tanka:

> The problem, the venerable elder—
> Adorned in all sixteen ornaments,
> The man of letters;
> The elder seems old in his writing:
> How will reality ever arrive?

And so, in the short poem "In Old Age," he says:

> Life wants to act;
> It shows us the path of work.

Once we take the path of action, we must keep sounding out our protest:

> From a tiny hole into a burden,
> Gathering the scattered earth,
> Dissatisfaction again and again—
> The hollow trunk goes on smouldering.

Migration from Mithila continues, and it wounds the poet again and again. But when spring arrives, will a philosophical recognition not arrive with it?

> Spring has come;
> I shall go to the village.
> Here, now,
> I can remain no longer.
> In search of spring itself

I have been wandering.
From this migration:
At the village threshold
A forest has grown.

Again and again, fissures appear in the poet's thinking:

Your words,
My mind—
The two meet;
Together they are entangled,
Searching for spring.
But
The bird of spring—
I do not wish to keep it beside me.

He is beginning to understand:

In that pitch-dark room—

And he asks you:

How, then, will it appear in the mirror?
How will its image emerge?

And no one wants to hear the song in which nothing is being sung but the song of culture:

That rushing, buzzing voice—
No one is prepared to listen.

Why is no one prepared to listen? Because there is fear: afraid of pain, they do not wish to hear that rushing, buzzing voice.

Certain strange things make him uneasy:

Fire and water,
The measure of the mind.

There is a reason, too. Consider the image of the incendiary:

Swearing an oath, the god of death,
A companion as people's houses burn.

Knowledge, the learned, and even the light of knowledge sometimes leave him caught in confusion:

Even knowledge becomes a slave;
Sankrityayan comes to mind with a thud.

Even the corpse you thought you understood will now speak:

Now it will speak;

Speaking, it will laugh
At your creations,
At the culture you have made.

Mangal and Mangala appear in several places in his poems. Mangala is a symbol of helplessness.

Mangala stands aside,
And further on ...
She has made herself solitary.

At the dry river landing, look at Mangala's helplessness before the keeper of the ghat:

He will demand the fare at the dried-up landing;
If we do not pay, he will raise an outcry.
Thus it happened: Mangala turned back,
And faced towards the west.

The poet brings in the image of the potter's craft in this way:

Like an image made of unfired clay,
It is called nothing but a frame;
Likewise the fruit formed from a flower
Is called merely the first hard growth.
And that very first growth
Goes on holding fast to hope,
Enduring sun and wind.

And he comes upon other travellers like himself:

These travellers, too, are like me;
They want to advance along a lost path.

The poet has no illusion: the path one takes determines the landing one reaches, and the water there will answer to that landing:

As the path of walking is,
So is the path of understanding;
Whatever road a person takes,
That is the landing they will reach.

The same path and way of thinking recur in another poem:

If one walks with thought,
No one can prevent one from reaching the landing.

His pen also explores how someone takes a good or a bad road:

As the people of a house are,
So is the threshold of that house;

As the threshold of a house is,
So is the path it takes.

The road does not leave him even in a later ghazal:

The fair woman, blinded by pride, stood stubbornly;
The road looks dark—come, let us turn back.

He never entirely surrenders to despair:

Even in death, taking blow upon blow,
I call it a wisdom beaten into us.

And the reason, as he says, is this:

Just as water rises when it finds its course,
Even a dead current comes to life.
Though in the midst of the victorious current,
It may be called a mere three-masua stream.

Amid hope, anger and despondency, he writes:

Leave it alone and society will break apart;
If our Umesh joins it together, it seems it will blossom.

Whatever Umesh Mandal says, he says it nishtuki—plainly and without evasions. Confusion, entanglement and disorder lie scattered all around him. But he works to straighten them out rather than deepen the tangle.

Gajendra Thakur

Supplementary Discussion

Once we take the path of action, we must keep sounding out our protest:

Migration from Mithila continues, and it wounds the poet again and again. But when spring arrives, will a philosophical recognition not arrive with it?

From this migration:

Again and again, fissures appear in the poet's thinking:

Even the corpse you thought you understood will now speak:

The road does not leave him even in a later ghazal:

Leave it alone and society will break apart.

42. Umesh Paswan's Poetry Collection Varnit Ras

Abstract

The poet places his trust in the young. He addresses them and calls them to action, as in "We, the Youth": "In the name of caste and religion / and religious sect / someone plots a conspiracy; / entering our country, / someone plants / the tree of terrorism." This connects with his poem "The Flag of Victory": "Let the enemies / of the motherland burn; / keep the fire kindled." It is precisely this enemy against whom the flag of victory must be raised: "Keep the fire kindled; / keep the flag of victory flying." And again in "We, the Youth" he says: "Someone plants / the tree of terrorism; / we Indians are lions— / someone comes into the lion's den / to wake the lion."

Keywords: Umesh · Paswan · poetry · collection · Varnit Ras · criticism · Maithili

The poet trusts young people, and therefore both addresses them and calls them to action. In "We, the Youth" he writes: "In the name of caste and religion / and religious sect / someone plots a conspiracy; / entering our country, / someone plants / the tree of terrorism."

A related thought occurs in his poem "The Flag of Victory": "Let the enemies / of the motherland burn; / keep the fire kindled."

It is against this very enemy that the flag of victory is to be unfurled: "Keep the fire kindled; / keep the flag of victory flying." In "We, the Youth" he likewise says: "Someone plants / the tree of terrorism; / we Indians are lions — / someone comes into the lion's den / to wake the lion." For the youth of the country are: "I am the bullet; / I am the gunpowder; / I myself am dagger and sword." Who, then, is the pistol for this bullet, or the fire for the gunpowder? The answer is the young people themselves, who are both dagger and sword.

Does his poetry, then, possess an energy based simply on enmity? No, not at all: "If you extend a hand in friendship, / then I myself am the garland of flowers, / the necklace around your neck." The poet does not care for the game of pulling one another down, and he says:

Outwardly, such an innocent little child; / inwardly, he calls us fools. / For years I have watched / the neglect of Dalits in every form.

The destruction caused by flooding compels the poet to speak: "How shall I go to the ridge of the field this time / and speak of / a clod as heavy as a seer, / shoots thick as sugarcane, / stalks like a pounding pestle?" At Gabahā Sankrānti he must ask: "How shall we get by / growing only kās and paṭer grasses?" Addressing the Kosi, he says: "You have divided Mithila into two: / to the east, Saharsa and Supaul; / to the west, Madhubani and Darbhanga; / in the middle, nothing but sand and dust."

Yet there is also mention of the construction of the Nirmali bridge: "Tell me, how much longer should we remain silent? / This time we have built the bridge."

Umesh Paswan is as concerned as Ambedkar was about the conduct of educated Dalits towards ordinary Dalits: "I myself am a Dalit; / I know the pain of Dalits; / I am astonished at the behaviour of certain individuals. / Though himself a Dalit, / that person has forgotten his own community; / abandoning his own language and dress, / he has adopted another's habits and manner."

He asks society: "I am a Dalit; / I spend my life in hard labour, / yet I still burn."

The poet has been influenced by Jagdish Prasad Mandal, and expresses this through a poem: "I am a servant of Mithila, / a disciple of Jagdish Babu. / He did not feed me laddus; / he gave me no lump of sugar candy."

But he has by no means abandoned humour:

We shall tug one another's hair, / O dancing girl, / this very time, with you!

Spring's arrival draws his attention not only to flowers and leaves but also to the many other elements of living existence: "New buds and clusters of blossom appear on trees; / the whole expanse of fields grows fragrant with the flowers of wheat, khesari, flax, lentils and mustard; / a bee colony has built its hive on the sinduri mango tree, frightening the mischievous onlooker; / the sunbird chirps after drinking from the hibiscus flower; / the crow and the cuckoo have fallen into a quarrel."

He cannot understand the practice of refusing water touched by another person: "How may body touch body, / yet water touched by me be considered untouchable? / What offence am I being punished for? / Why do you regard me as dishonourable?"

People have divided even the friendship of Sudama and Krishna: "People separated the two friends, / like a wall across their paths, / though they once laughed and played together ..."

Why has this condition arisen? "We endured everything, / though we were descendants of Salhesh, / for as long as we remained silent."

He adds: "How much longer shall I write of Dalit suffering? / The message from Salhesh's village."

But does the language and culture of Mithila belong to someone else? No: it belongs to us, and the poet takes pride in it:

Behind the plough a heron walks; / the ploughman loudly urges his oxen onward, calling them 'Babu' and 'Bhaiya'.

He is indignant about the nation's development and its politicians: "The leaders here are rolling in wealth; / but look at the roads and streets—"

"They are like a plate filled with thick mud."

And this is how he describes the great national highways (the NH roads): "At the haunted bend, the national highway has become a crossroads of death."

Even a buried corpse worries about the direction in which people are moving: "The buried dead body is writhing; / from within, it raises its fingers—"

"Its own fingers."

His pen ranges freely over women's devotion to work: "Over there the womenfolk pull up the seedlings; / some exchange jibes about mothers-in-law and sisters-in-law; / others sing sohar and samdaun songs."

The poet also says much through rhyme. Consider his account of labour migration to Punjab:

"If the old ox is still there in the month of Āṣāḍh, / there is pain in the ribs, / and the man of the house is in Punjab, / then understand: the household has come to grief."

He issues an appeal: "How much injustice does the poverty of literature inflict on me? / Let someone speak! / Let someone raise a voice on my behalf."

And one must demand one's rights: "I will no longer listen / to that old song of sixteenfold completeness—"

The rains break the embankment and turn the village into an expanse of the Kosi and Kamala rivers: "The surface was still low; / bullfrogs, insects and ants—"

"Were raising a din; / the sun had barely risen when the little creatures began to chirp."

How, then, shall we speak of all the kinds of rasa expressed in Varnit Ras? Does the poet's spring contain only leaves and flowers, giving fragrance and delight to the eye? Would that satisfy an empty, burning stomach? The rasa of the spring described by this poet therefore cannot be the beauty of fruitless flowers—and it is not. This is Dalit discourse by a Dalit poet, one who bears the legacy of Salhesh and has not forgotten his culture, speech, sohar songs or samdaun laments. That poet is Umesh Paswan. His view of spring and of the crossroads on the national highway is different; so his poetry is different too.

Gajendra Thakur

Supplementary Discussion

A related thought occurs in his poem "The Flag of Victory": "Let the enemies / of the motherland burn; / keep the fire kindled."

It is against this very enemy that the flag of victory is to be unfurled: "Keep the fire kindled; / keep the flag of victory flying." In "We, the Youth" he likewise says: "Someone plants / the tree of terrorism; / we Indians are lions — / someone comes into the lion's den / to wake the lion." For the youth of the country are: "I am the bullet; / I am the gunpowder; / I myself am dagger and sword." Who, then, is the pistol for this bullet, or the fire for the gunpowder? The answer is the young people themselves, who are both dagger and sword.

The destruction caused by flooding compels the poet to speak: "How shall I go to the ridge of the field this time / and speak of / a clod as heavy as a seer, / shoots thick as sugarcane, / stalks like a pounding pestle?" At Gabahā Sankrānti he must ask: "How shall we get by / growing only kās and paṭer grasses?" Addressing the Kosi, he says: "You have divided Mithila into two: / to the east, Saharsa and Supaul; / to the west, Madhubani and Darbhanga; / in the middle, nothing but sand and dust."

Umesh Paswan is as concerned as Ambedkar was about the conduct of educated Dalits towards ordinary Dalits: "I myself am a Dalit; / I know the pain of Dalits; / I am astonished at the behaviour of certain individuals. / Though himself a Dalit, / that person has forgotten his own community; / abandoning his own language and dress, / he has adopted another's habits and manner."

Why has this condition arisen? "We endured everything, / though we were descendants of Salhesh, / for as long as we remained silent."

And this is how he describes the great national highways (the NH roads): "At the haunted bend, the national highway has become a crossroads of death."

"If the old ox is still there in the month of Āṣāḍh, / there is pain in the ribs, / and the man of the house is in Punjab, / then understand: the household has come to grief."

The rains break the embankment and turn the village into an expanse of the Kosi and Kamala rivers: “The surface was still low; / bullfrogs, insects and ants—”

43. Ramlochan Sharan's Maithili Ramcharitmanas

Abstract

Epic or lyrical narrative (gīta-prabandha): Prescriptions about the number of cantos in an epic, the nature of its hero, his birth into a noble family, and similar requirements have now become little more than intellectual exercises. Just as prose narrative is divided, according to length, into short-short story, short story and novel, so a novel rendered in verse—with dramatic passages appearing from time to time—may be called an epic.

Keywords: Ramlochan · Sharan · Ramcharitmanas · literary criticism · Maithili

Epic or lyrical narrative (gīta-prabandha): Prescriptions concerning the number of cantos of an epic, the nature of its hero, his high birth, and the like have become little more than intellectual exercises. Just as prose narrative is classified by extent into short-short story, short story and novel, so the versification of a novel, with occasional dramatic passages, may be termed an epic. If we go back to the Rigvedic tradition, the epic ought more properly to be called a lyrical narrative, or gīta-prabandha.

Acharya Ramlochan Sharan's lyrical narrative, the Maithili Ramcharitmanas: Readers of Maithili have generally encountered the story of Rama, or the Ramayana, in two works: Chanda Jha's Mithila Bhasha Ramayana and Laldas's Rameshwar Charit Mithila Ramayana. Whether in the school and university Maithili curriculum, general books of criticism or scattered articles in journals, the very existence of this third Ramayana has scarcely been acknowledged. We should also understand that the public accepts judgments made on the basis of literary criticism only when those judgments represent truth. Even today, the uninterrupted ceremonial recitation of the Ramayana in Mithila usually draws upon Valmiki's Ramayana or Tulsidas's Ramcharitmanas. For a long time I wondered why. I distributed copies of Chandra Jha's Ramayana and Laldas's Mithila Ramayana among groups conducting these uninterrupted recitations, but everyone said much the same thing: both were priceless treasures of Maithili literature, yet the musical cadence of Tulsi's Manas suited continuous recitation, even though it belonged to another language. Shankardev employed Maithili rather than his own Assamese precisely because Maithili was musical. I could not accept that a language with such musical qualities had failed to produce a melodious Ramayana fit for uninterrupted public recitation. The evidence to the contrary is Shri Ramcharitmanas, Ramlochan Sharan's Maithili verse rendering, which preserves the original meanings as fully as possible and follows corresponding metres. Why have our critics failed to recognise this pearl? Why has it not even been mentioned beside the two more familiar Maithili Ramayanas? No book by the late Harimohan Jha was published by the Maithili Academy during his lifetime; he received the Sahitya Akademi Award only after his death. Acharya Ramlochan Sharan is the author of Maithili's largest epic and, to my mind, its most complete Ramayana. When I gave a photocopy of the epic to an organisation in eastern Mithila that organises uninterrupted Ramayana recitations, its members were astonished and decided to recite this work the following year. This must be seen as a failure of Maithili literary criticism; the epic itself cannot be dismissed as a failure. I had heard of the Acharya's Manoharpothi since childhood, but never of this work. Why does the discussion of Maithili's largest epic end with Sitayan? That Shri Ramlochan Sharan's Maithili Shri Ramcharitmanas is the largest epic is a fact; it does not depend on the favour of literary critics or historians of Maithili. In the section "A Brief Account of the Background" (Kiñcit Pūrvavṛttam) of his book, the Acharya writes in Sanskrit: "The eminent Maithili writer Shri Harimohan Jha, on hearing of this undertaking, was greatly delighted and encouraged me repeatedly" (Mithilābhāṣāyāḥ mūrdhanyā lekhakāḥ Śrīharimohanajhāmahodaya niśamyaitad vṛttaṃ paramāhlādaṃ gatā bhūyo bhūyaś ca mām utsāhitavantaḥ). He goes on to write: "I am sincerely grateful to Professor Shri Surendra Jha 'Suman' and to Pandit Shri Shivshankar Jha of the editorial department" (Prādhyāpakasya Śrī Surendrajhā 'Suman' tathā sampādanavibhāgastha Paṇḍita Śrī Śivaśaṅkarajhā-mahodayasya hṛdayenāhaṃ kṛtajño'smi). All of them had seen and appreciated the undertaking.

The singability of Acharya Ramlochan Sharan's Maithili Ramcharitmanas: Consider the opening of the Acharya's Sundarkand and compare its musical quality with the Ramayanas of Chanda Jha and Laldas:

> Jambavan's words were pleasing; / Hanuman heard them with great delight in his heart. [1] / Until then, my friends, let us wait here in pain, / living on roots and forest fruits. [2]
>
> Until I have gone and seen Sita, / the task cannot be fulfilled and our hearts gladdened. [3] / Saying this, he bowed his head to all, / and departed in joy, holding Raghunath in his heart. [4]

> On the ocean shore stood a beautiful hill; / with a playful leap he mounted it. [5] / Again and again he held the heroic Rama in his heart; / the son of the Wind assumed immense strength. [6] / The mountain that Hanuman pressed with his feet / sank straight down towards the netherworld. [7] / Like Raghupati's unerring arrow, / Hanuman sped swiftly forward. [8] / The ocean, recognising the messenger of Raghupati, / said to Mainaka: "His labour is great." [9]

Tulsidas lived in Akbar's time, and there is now some difference between his language and ours, but his verses remain just as singable. The Acharya preserved Tulsidas's musical quality while removing linguistic difficulty. The Sanskrit verses at the beginning of each kand are taken from Tulsi's Manas. Although this Maithili Ramcharitmanas is an adaptation of Tulsi's Manas, it deserves to be counted as an original Maithili epic, just as Kamban's Tamil Ramayana and Tulsi's Manas are counted in their respective languages. While adapting Valmiki's Ramayana into Tamil, Kamban compared the original to an ocean of milk and himself to a cat planning to drink all that milk at once. It is also true that neither Kamban nor the Acharya claimed to have created an entirely original Ramayana: both described their works as adaptations of their precursors. Yet Kamban made Rama divine in his poem, whereas Valmiki presented him as an exemplary human being. Valmiki narrates Sugriva's marriage to Vali's wife after Vali's death, while Kamban depicts Vali's wife as remaining a widow throughout her life. The Acharya did not have to make changes of this kind, because Tulsi's Manas was already on the people's lips; he needed above all to sustain its musical cadence.

Acharya Ramlochan Sharan's lyrical narrative, the Maithili Ramcharitmanas, and its expressions of prejudice against women, Shudras and forest communities: Let us consider a controversial verse from the Manas and see how meanings can be distorted. At the end of the Acharya's Sundarkand, when the ocean refuses Rama a route to Lanka, Rama says: "Lakshman, bring my bow and arrows. / I shall dry up the ocean with the fire of my shafts." [1]

> The ocean then speaks with folded hands: "Drum, rustic, Shudra, animal and woman— / all are fit to be chastised."

One interpretation offered of the line is that all those named—drum, rustic, Shudra, animal and woman—are fit to be instructed or corrected: the argument runs that the rustic, Shudra and woman supposedly lack education, the animal lacks human understanding, and an untaught player produces noise rather than music from a drum. But at that moment the ocean is becoming an antagonist; its utterance cannot automatically be taken as the poet's or author's opinion. A literary work contains virtuous and wicked characters alike, and both kinds of speech may come from their mouths. An author's success depends on whether the author can distinguish himself from the characters. Yet Tulsidas—and therefore, in several places, Acharya Ramlochan Sharan—fails to maintain this distinction. Such unnecessary remarks about Shudras and non-dvija communities are especially troubling in the context of feudal society. Mithila's smṛti writers continued the tradition later. It is more surprising still to find Maithil authors making such gratuitous remarks in Sanskrit works produced under British rule, when the colonial authorities described Brahmins and non-Brahmins alike as "black Indians."

The Acharya removed the difficulty of Tulsi's language rather than his period-bound orthodoxies or harsh attitudes. Caste prejudice is visible in other verses besides the controversial one just cited.

Consider the third verse following doha 12 of the Ayodhyakand in the Maithili Ramcharitmanas:

> A foolish woman of ill-disposed understanding and lowly birth plots—
> By what contrivance may a wrong be accomplished tonight? [3]

Consider the first verse after doha 59 of the Ayodhyakand:

> The daughters of Kols and Kiratas are suited to the forest;
> Fate has created them deprived of the enjoyment of happiness. [1]

Consider the fourth verse after doha 161 of the Ayodhyakand:

> Even the Creator cannot fathom a woman's heart;
> It is a mine of deceit, sin and every fault. [4] (Even the Creator cannot comprehend the workings of a woman's heart: it is laden with deceit, wrongdoing and faults!)

Consider the third verse after doha 193 of the Ayodhyakand:

> Those whom both worldly custom and sacred teaching account lowly
> Feel sanctified, as though touched by a shadow, when the water is sprinkled. [3]

Tulsidas—and after him Acharya Ramlochan Sharan—often fails to separate his own outlook from the attitudes of his characters. (In adapting Valmiki, Kamban frequently distances himself from inherited assumptions in accordance with a newer age.) Thus, after doha 250 of the Ayodhyakand, the Maithili Ramcharitmanas puts the following words into the mouth of a forest-community character:

> We consider this our greatest service:
> That we do not steal vessels or clothing. [3]

Consider the seventh verse following doha 62 of the Balkand:

> Although the world contains many cruel sorrows,
> None is harder to bear than humiliation on grounds of caste. [7]

But when, in a twentieth-century Sahitya Akademi publication, a Maithili essay on Lorik claims that Lorik rose against Shudra oppression of Brahmins, how can one blame Akbar-era Tulsidas or Acharya Ramlochan Sharan, his metrical translator, alone? Just as Vishnu Sharma, while narrating the tales of the Panchatantra, sometimes becomes gratuitously harsh towards women and Shudras, so too does the Ramcharitmanas.

Distinctive features of Acharya Ramlochan Sharan's lyrical narrative, the Maithili Ramcharitmanas: The work is divided into Balkand, Ayodhyakand, Aranyakand, Kishkindhakand, Sundarkand, Lankakand and Uttarkand. There are certain changes in the carefully organised narrative of Valmiki's Ramayana. The style and portrayal of characters are elevated. Śṛṅgāra rasa, the sentiment of love, does not predominate, but appears in the relationship between Rama and Sita both in union and in separation. The principal, governing rasa is peace or tranquillity, though the whole is absorbed into devotion to Rama. Devotion predominates without diminishing the importance of knowledge and action. Though the divine with attributes (saguṇa) is privileged, the importance of attributeless devotion (nirguṇa bhakti) is not lessened. Rama is Brahman, in both its formless and manifest aspects; the individual self and Brahman are one. The poem is suffused with ideals: keeping one's word, devotion to one's father and brothers, a woman's love and fidelity to her husband. All kinds of figures of speech occur, chiefly metaphor and simile. Although the narrative employs the kaṛvak form based on dohas and chaupais associated with romance narratives, it also uses Sanskrit metres. The Maithili Ramcharitmanas employs the song forms of Vidyapati; the chhappay metre of heroic poetry; doha and soratha; the kavitt and savaiyā of the bards; gnomic aphorisms; and such metres as ghanākṣarī, tomar and tribhaṅgī. Various human folk beliefs and ritual practices are described throughout. Its purposes are liberation, the public good and the establishment of Rama's rule. Besides Rama, it praises Krishna, Shiva (whom Rama worships during the building of the bridge) and Ganesha. The depiction of nature and character alike is distinctive. The poet tells a story, but at intervals he also presents it through the conversations of Bharadvaja and Yajnavalkya, and Garuda and Kakabhushundi. The dialogic technique is used extensively: whether in the exchanges between Lakshman and Parashuram, Manthara and Kaikeyi, or Ravana and Angada, one encounters lively verses comparable to dramatic dialogue. Balkand at the beginning and Uttarkand at the end form two poles of the narrative. Uttarkand depicts the deteriorating guru–disciple relationship and Brahmins selling the Vedas and falling into corruption, but it also outlines the ideal of Ramrajya.

The place of the Maithili Ramcharitmanas among Maithili lyrical narratives: No account of Rama's life, in Maithili or another language, can escape the influence of Valmiki's Ramayana. Acharya Ramlochan Sharan's Maithili rendering of Tulsi's Manas in corresponding metres is particularly significant because it never neglects distinctively Maithili elements. In scale—and, I would argue, in quality as well—it remains the largest Maithili lyrical narrative, or epic, produced so far.

Supplementary Discussion

Acharya Ramlochan Sharan's lyrical narrative, the Maithili Ramcharitmanas: Readers of Maithili have generally encountered the story of Rama, or the Ramayana, in two works: Chanda Jha's Mithila Bhasha Ramayana and Laldas's Rameshwar Charit Mithila Ramayana. Whether in the school and university Maithili curriculum, general books of criticism or scattered articles in journals, the very existence of this third Ramayana has scarcely been acknowledged. We should also understand that the public accepts judgments made on the basis of literary criticism only when those judgments represent truth. Even today, the uninterrupted ceremonial recitation of the Ramayana in Mithila usually draws upon Valmiki's Ramayana or Tulsidas's Ramcharitmanas. For a long time I wondered why. I distributed copies of Chandra Jha's Ramayana and Laldas's Mithila Ramayana among groups conducting these uninterrupted recitations, but everyone said much the same thing: both were priceless treasures of Maithili literature, yet the musical cadence of Tulsi's Manas suited continuous recitation, even though it belonged to another language. Shankardev employed Maithili rather than his own Assamese precisely because Maithili was musical. I could not accept that a language with such musical qualities had failed to produce a melodious Ramayana fit for uninterrupted public recitation. The evidence to the contrary is Shri Ramcharitmanas, Ramlochan Sharan's Maithili verse rendering, which preserves the original meanings as fully as possible and follows corresponding metres. Why have our critics failed to recognise this pearl? Why has it not even been mentioned beside the two more familiar Maithili Ramayanas? No book by the late Harimohan Jha was published by the Maithili Academy during his lifetime; he received the Sahitya Akademi Award only after his death. Acharya Ramlochan Sharan is the author of Maithili's largest epic and, to my mind, its most complete Ramayana. When I gave a photocopy of the epic to an organisation in eastern Mithila that organises uninterrupted Ramayana recitations, its members were astonished and decided to recite this work the following year. This must be seen as a failure of Maithili literary criticism; the epic itself cannot be dismissed as a failure. I had heard of the Acharya's Manoharpothi since childhood, but never of this work. Why does the discussion of Maithili's largest epic end with Sitayan? That Shri Ramlochan Sharan's Maithili Shri Ramcharitmanas is the largest epic is a fact; it does not depend on the favour of literary critics or historians of Maithili. In the section "A Brief Account of the Background" (Kiñcit Pūrvavṛttam) of his book, the Acharya writes in Sanskrit: "The eminent Maithili writer Shri Harimohan Jha, on hearing of this undertaking, was greatly delighted and encouraged me repeatedly" (Mithilābhāṣāyāḥ mūrdhanyā lekhakāḥ Śrīharimohanajhāmahodaya niśamyaitad vṛttaṃ paramāhlādaṃ gatā bhūyo bhūyaś ca mām utsāhitavantaḥ). He goes on to write: "I am sincerely grateful to Professor Shri Surendra Jha 'Suman' and to Pandit Shri Shivshankar Jha of the editorial department" (Prādhyāpakasya Śrī Surendrajhā 'Suman' tathā sampādanavibhāgastha Paṇḍita Śrī Śivaśaṅkarajhā-mahodayasya hṛdayenāhaṃ kṛtajño'smi). All of them had seen and appreciated the undertaking.

The singability of Acharya Ramlochan Sharan's Maithili Ramcharitmanas: Consider the beginning of the Acharya's Sundarkand and compare its musical quality with the Ramayanas of Chanda Jha and Laldas:

On the ocean shore stood a beautiful hill; / with a playful leap he mounted it. [5] / Again and again he held the heroic Rama in his heart; / the son of the Wind assumed immense strength. [6] / The mountain that Hanuman pressed with his feet / sank straight down towards the netherworld. [7] / Like Raghupati's unerring arrow, / Hanuman sped swiftly forward. [8] / The ocean, recognising the messenger of Raghupati, / said to Mainaka: "His labour is great." [9]

Tulsidas lived in Akbar's time, and there is now some difference between his language and ours, but his verses remain just as singable. The Acharya preserved Tulsidas's musical quality while removing linguistic difficulty. The Sanskrit verses at the beginning of each kand are taken from Tulsi's Manas. Although this Maithili Ramcharitmanas is an adaptation of Tulsi's Manas, it deserves to be counted as an original Maithili epic, just as Kamban's Tamil Ramayana and Tulsi's Manas are counted in their respective languages. While adapting Valmiki's Ramayana into Tamil, Kamban compared the original to an ocean of milk and himself to a cat planning to drink all that milk at once. It is also true that neither Kamban nor the Acharya claimed to have created an entirely original Ramayana: both described their works as adaptations of their precursors. Yet Kamban made Rama divine in his poem, whereas Valmiki presented him as an exemplary human being. Valmiki narrates Sugriva's marriage to Vali's wife after Vali's death, while Kamban depicts Vali's wife as remaining a widow throughout her life. The Acharya did not have to make changes of this kind, because Tulsi's Manas was already on the people's lips; he needed above all to sustain its musical cadence.

The ocean then speaks with folded hands: "Drum, rustic, Shudra, animal and woman— /all are fit to be chastised."

One interpretation offered of the line is that all those named—drum, rustic, Shudra, animal and woman—are fit to be instructed or corrected: the argument runs that the rustic, Shudra and woman supposedly lack education, the animal lacks human understanding, and an untaught player produces noise rather than music from a drum. But at that moment the ocean is becoming an antagonist; its utterance cannot automatically be taken as the poet's or author's opinion. A literary work contains virtuous and wicked characters alike, and both kinds of speech may come from their mouths. An author's success depends on whether the author can distinguish himself from the characters. Yet Tulsidas—and therefore, in several places, Acharya Ramlochan Sharan—fails to maintain this distinction. Such unnecessary remarks about Shudras and non-dvija communities are especially troubling in the context of feudal society. Mithila's smṛti writers continued the tradition later. It is more surprising still to find Maithil authors making such gratuitous remarks in Sanskrit works produced under British rule, when the colonial authorities described Brahmins and non-Brahmins alike as "black Indians."

Consider the third verse following doha 12 of the Ayodhyakand in the Maithili Ramcharitmanas:

Consider the first verse after doha 59 of the Ayodhyakand:

Consider the fourth verse after doha 161 of the Ayodhyakand:

Consider the third verse after doha 193 of the Ayodhyakand:

Tulsidas—and after him Acharya Ramlochan Sharan—often fails to separate his own outlook from the attitudes of his characters. (In adapting Valmiki, Kamban frequently distances himself from inherited assumptions in accordance with a newer age.) Thus, after doha 250 of the Ayodhyakand, the Maithili Ramcharitmanas puts the following words into the mouth of a forest-community character:

We consider this our greatest service:

Consider the seventh verse following doha 62 of the Balkand:

But when, in a twentieth-century Sahitya Akademi publication, a Maithili essay on Lorik claims that Lorik rose against Shudra oppression of Brahmins, how can one blame Akbar-era Tulsidas or Acharya Ramlochan Sharan, his metrical translator, alone? Just as Vishnu Sharma, while narrating the tales of the Panchatantra, sometimes becomes gratuitously harsh towards women and Shudras, so too does the Ramcharitmanas.

Distinctive features of Acharya Ramlochan Sharan's lyrical narrative, the Maithili Ramcharitmanas: The work is divided into Balkand, Ayodhyakand, Aranyakand, Kishkindhakand, Sundarkand, Lankakand and Uttarkand. There are certain changes in the carefully organised narrative of Valmiki's Ramayana. The style and portrayal of characters are elevated. Śṛṅgāra rasa, the sentiment of love, does not predominate, but appears in the relationship between Rama and Sita both in union and in separation. The principal, governing rasa is peace or tranquillity, though the whole is absorbed into devotion to Rama. Devotion predominates without diminishing the importance of knowledge and action. Though the divine with attributes (saguṇa) is privileged, the importance of attributeless devotion (nirguṇa bhakti) is not lessened. Rama is Brahman, in both its formless and manifest aspects; the individual self and Brahman are one. The poem is suffused with ideals: keeping one's word, devotion to one's father and brothers, a woman's love and fidelity to her husband. All kinds of figures of speech occur, chiefly metaphor and simile. Although the narrative employs the kaṛvak form based on dohas and chaupais associated with romance narratives, it also uses Sanskrit metres. The Maithili Ramcharitmanas employs the song forms of Vidyapati; the chhappay metre of heroic poetry; doha and soratha; the kavitt and savaiyā of the bards; gnomic aphorisms; and such metres as ghanākṣarī, tomar and tribhaṅgī. Various human folk beliefs and ritual practices are described throughout. Its purposes are liberation, the public good and the establishment of Rama's rule. Besides Rama, it praises Krishna, Shiva (whom Rama worships during the building of the bridge) and Ganesha. The depiction of nature and character alike is distinctive. The poet tells a story, but at intervals he also presents it through the conversations of Bharadvaja and Yajnavalkya, and Garuda and Kakabhushundi. The dialogic technique is used extensively: whether in the exchanges between Lakshman and Parashuram, Manthara and Kaikeyi, or Ravana and Angada, one encounters lively verses comparable to dramatic dialogue. Balkand at the beginning and Uttarkand at the end form two poles of the narrative. Uttarkand depicts the deteriorating guru–disciple relationship and Brahmins selling the Vedas and falling into corruption, but it also outlines the ideal of Ramrajya.

44. A Multidimensional Critical Study of the Poetry of Booch Ji

Abstract

In Booch Ji's poem "Jethi Kareh," the poet says that the Kareh rises at daybreak and swells even when the rainfall is slight. Its danger mark is very high; why, then, is it agitated? At the end the poet suggests that it will break its embankment and bring devastation. This is a straightforward reading of the poem.

Keywords: Booch Ji · poetry · multidimensional criticism · critical theory · Maithili

Jethi Kareh (The Elder Kareh)

In "Jethi Kareh," Booch Ji says that the river rises at dawn and overflows even after light rain. Its danger level is very high; why, then, does it become so restless? Finally he anticipates that the Kareh will breach its embankment and cause devastation. That is the poem's ordinary reading. From a structuralist perspective, its rising in the morning implies the expectation that it does not rise at other times. That it overflows despite scant rainfall is presented as something that ought not happen. Sunlight glitters on the water, eddies form near the bends, and the river engulfs the heart of the raised homestead. As the sandy deposits grow, the poet's patience breaks. Turning from structuralism to history, we discover a new significance for a new age: the danger level that seemed so high in the poet's day is no longer so high because of the silt and sediment that have accumulated between the embankments. The younger generation therefore encounters a poem whose meaning has separated itself from its author. Now let us turn from structuralism to deconstruction. A deconstructionist would say that structuralism's fixed poles have acquired a philosophical rigidity. The river's swelling after light rainfall, the folly of engineers trying to imprison the Kareh behind embankments, and the poet's prediction that it will breach them and bring disaster all raise the question of whether the poet's own polarity is permanent or transient. Return once more to historical context. In magical-realist fiction, when we enter the past we encounter the obsession with embankment construction in the 1960s: embankments would be made taller and broader, would confine the river, and would supposedly confer innumerable benefits on humanity. A character inhabiting that magical-realist past would read this poem differently for a third time. The author's presence would disappear and the play of language would begin. A character who lives in a magical-realist future would find yet another meaning; the earlier high danger mark would be almost unintelligible, and the character would search anew for the poem's feeling. Yet deconstruction itself becomes caught in its own net. Much will have changed, and much will remain. Rain will persist; so will the river, in transformed form. Its water will continue to glitter in the sunlight, and rising and overflowing will endure.

Song of Welcome

The ordinary reading of "Song of Welcome": the poet welcomes the guests, but what song of celebration is possible amid the grievous cry of Mithila's uprooted earth? The bees are thirsty, the fruit trees are withered; what can a ceremonial gathering accomplish under such conditions? Along with poetry, one will have to carry a staff; along with aesthetic relish, a rough cudgel. A note beneath the poem identifies its occasion: a welcome to guests attending the Vidyapati Memorial Festival in 1984 at Baidyanathpur village, Rosera block, Samastipur district. That period marked the beginnings of large-scale outmigration from Mithila. The bridge across the Ganga at Hajipur had been built, yet the development model appeared to have failed. Faith in vast embankments was collapsing. Devastating floods harmed agriculture and farmers; industries based on local crops were absent, and there was no visible campaign for education. In that situation, the task of welcoming a ceremonial assembly fell to the poet. Dhvani theory: In the Dhvanyaloka, Anandavardhana holds that literature communicates or produces meaning indirectly. His theory explains the structure and operation of suggested meaning, rasa as aesthetic experience, and figurative ornament. For Anandavardhana, suggestion (dhvani) is the soul of poetry. The suggested meaning arrives indirectly but in an organised form; hence meaning and symbol emerge as two related principles and give rise to rasa. Nyaya and Mimamsa resisted this theory, arguing that dhvani has no separate existence, being the outcome of inference already subsumed under secondary signification, and that not everything can be encompassed in words. Reading "Song of Welcome" through dhvani: By saying that Vidyapati, Shiva incarnate and conqueror of death, has died, the poet brings both meaning and symbol immediately before us. Nyaya rejected the theory of dhvani, but Booch Ji, the poet of Kariyan—the village of Udayana—is a poet rather than a philosopher. He produces a powerful pattern of suggestion: our misfortune has taken root and become indestructible; what will a mere ceremonial assembly achieve? The poet then urges the audience to recite poetry but keep a staff on the shoulder, the source of rasa in one hand and a stout stick in the other. Moving coherently through these symbols, the poem nevertheless welcomes its guests. A Marxist reading: The poet's work is conceived as extending beyond the recitation of verse. Acceptance is set beside resistance, old beside new, development beside death. If "Song of Welcome" had divorced itself from its circumstances to indulge in hollow exclamations, Marxist criticism would rate it poorly—as it might many other songs of ceremonial welcome and praise in Maithili. Instead, the poet makes it part of a dynamic process, turning it into one of Maithili's finest welcome songs.

A Daughter Becomes a Mountain

The ordinary reading of "A Daughter Becomes a Mountain": the cherished daughter has become a heavy water pot around her father's neck. She arrived as though on a flying vehicle, but Hari abandons Garuda and asks for a car. Thirty-five grams of gold have been secured, yet the expense of the wedding night is still demanded, and the bridegroom's party will bring ten vehicles. Electric bulbs are lit everywhere, but darkness persists at the centre. Dasharatha asked for no money; Rama said nothing. History even knew Krishna's love marriage, but what difference does that make? Janaka is crying out in the present. A father has gripped his son's throat, households have become slaughterhouses, and villages have become marketplaces. A sociological reading: The poem protests against the dowry system. In the society of that time—and still today—the cherished daughter who once seemed to arrive upon a flying chariot becomes an intolerable burden to her father because of dowry demands.

Song of Sorrow

The ordinary reading of "Song of Sorrow": hearing the cuckoo's plaintive song, one beholds a flowering grove through tear-filled eyes; a readily won victory of the ocean of peace upon the golden summit of valour. Just as an embrace begins, innumerable crooked thorns pierce the body. Beauty came for two moments and departed; the honey of love turned bitter. Night's lament dissolves into dawn. A formalist reading: Notice the tear-filled eyes viewing the blossoming grove; the fierce form of a blazing cremation ground appearing upon the bed of love; and the easy victory of the ocean of peace upon the golden peak of courage. The poet makes skilful use of language's unfamiliar possibilities. It is this that gives his writing its poetic quality. The concentration of opposites, their unexpected combinations, and a diction rich in verbal figures make this poem distinctive. The entry of thorns into flowers and similar constructions render "Song of Sorrow" particularly successful from a formalist viewpoint.

I Keep Remembering the Village

The ordinary reading of "I Keep Remembering the Village": bread was scarce and even bathua greens lacked salt, yet in Calcutta the speaker cannot stop remembering home. If one irrigates with the Kareh's water and grows pearls, will the children be ruined? Is it better to remain a respectable gentleman beside the Hooghly or a labourer along the Kamala? The woods along the Kamala are better than Eden Gardens. A husband offers his wife a garland in Eden Gardens, while a woman of Tirhut searches for dhatūra and ākon flowers for her Bhola in the Kamala woods. A feminist reading: This is a poem of migration. The Tirhut woman seeks flowers for her Bhola while Bhola is away. An existentialist reading: Bhola himself bears responsibility for his condition, his solitary existence, and his anxiety.

Son Dai

The ordinary reading of "Son Dai": her life will hold neither laughter nor pleasure—but why? Groups of children depart, young people depart, and eventually the elders wither away. Why, then, does Son Dai keep her faith? The answer emerges later: forgetting her homeland, she endures life in exile. As her age advances, how long will she have a home to dwell in? A feminist reading: Theories made by men in a male-centred society, even if they are theories of poetry, are not necessarily appropriate for women. For whose sake has Son Dai forgotten her land and endured migration?

Famine

The ordinary reading of "Famine": the poet describes tying the yoke of hunger to a plough and beating time upon it. The failure of rainfall brings famine, famine brings soaring prices, and the sky above burning villages turns red. A dance of death begins in India like that in Lanka, but this time even Vibhishana's house will not be spared, for the garland of severed heads is tied strand by strand. A mother clutches the earth in full armfuls. Ten-headed Ravana rolls his twenty eyes and shakes his head. The principle of appropriateness (aucitya): In the* Aucityavicāracarcā*, Kṣemendra considers appropriateness central to literature. It ought to be present in the word, sentence, meaning of the composition, quality, figure of speech, rasa, grammatical case, verb, gender, number, adjective, prefix, particle, time, place, lineage, vow, fundamental principle, inner character, intention, disposition, selection of essentials, imagination, circumstance, thought, name and benediction. This universe trembles: it is trembling itself. After the reading of poetry comes peace—peace everywhere, and peace spreading through the mind. Reading "Famine" through aucitya: This is not merely famine; it is* Mahākāla*, the Great Time of destruction. The image of a hungry yoke tied to the plough and the beating of time upon its frame is appropriate to Mithila's particular place and historical moment. Ravana will be uprooted, and Vibhishana too will not survive.

Your Lips

The ordinary reading of "Your Lips": lips stained by betel and the beloved's lips; the beloved applies the lime of speech and colours her cheeks red as kattha. But where is the reed pipe of love? Dawn's redness resembles her lips, and evening without her is restless. If a butcher becomes the beloved's husband, I shall become a fragmented Rahu. Nectar is scarce even in heaven: how much harder, then, to find her lips! The Sakri mill will become great if I learn science from Vishvakarma, and sweetness will emerge from that mill. Her lips resemble the ripe segments of a sugarcane stalk. Even in rebirth I shall come near you, beloved, as rice and prepared food. Yet after all this, the intended meaning remains unexpressed through words. A reading through the theory of figures of speech (alaṃkāra): Bhamaha understands ornament as a form of suggestive compression that gives pleasure. Dandin and Udbhata developed theories of literary figures further. Figures are fundamentally verbal and semantic; they may also be classified by resemblance and contrast, logical reasoning, popular conventions, poetic conventions and the apprehension of hidden sense. Mammata organises sixty-one figures into seven groups: simile, metaphor, indirect praise, illuminating connection, contrast, opposition and combination. "Applying the lime of speech" is indirect praise; the red cheeks like* kattha*, betel-coloured lips, dawn red as the beloved's lips, and her lips like mature sugarcane joints are similes. "But where is the reed pipe, the longing of love?" operates through similarity and opposition. The line about wandering restlessly without her employs metaphor. Indian reflections on poetry: Consider the idea of art as a path towards liberation, and the posture of Nataraja, in which creation and destruction share a rhythm. A permanent emotional disposition, intensified and brought to fulfilment, becomes rasa. Sita and Rama experienced many such rasas, as the* Valmiki Ramayana shows. Krishna teaches the Indian philosophy of action and is also a connoisseur of rasa. A theory was needed to understand the relish of art, and Bharata composed the Natyashastra*. Abhinavagupta wrote a commentary on Anandavardhana's* Dhvanyaloka*; Bhamaha in the sixth century, Dandin in the seventh, and Rudrata in the ninth advanced discussion of poetic ornament. Reading "Your Lips" through rasa theory: Bharata holds that rasa arises through dramatic performance. Drama exists to represent rasa and to produce it. Its emergence depends upon determinants (vibhāva), consequent expressions (anubhāva) and accompanying transitory feelings (vyabhicāribhāva). The stable emotion ripens into rasa, which an audience can savour. Bhatta Lollata argues that determinants and consequences intensify the permanent emotion to create rasa; actors participate through investigation and imagination. He assigns little importance to the poet or to the audience. Shaṅkuka holds that spectators must enter imaginatively into the performance, much as one treats a painting of a horse as a horse. Bhatta Nayaka locates the effect of rasa in the spectator, regards poetic language as distinctive, and describes the listener's or viewer's soul as joining the supreme soul through aesthetic experience. The pleasure of rasa is delight in one's own being and makes self-realisation possible. Rasa theory is therefore oriented towards the hearer, viewer and reader. In the context of structuralism and poststructuralism, Roland Barthes invokes the death of the author to emancipate readers from authorial intention: the author separates from the work and the reader seeks meaning independently. "You laid the stone-white lime of speech / And adorned the cheeks with the red blood of* kattha*": these are determinants that make the heart surge with feeling, an expressive consequence. The theory of* sphoṭa*: Bhartrhari's* Vākyapadīya holds that the meaning of a word or sentence is communicated by sphoṭa*, the integral manifestation of linguistic sense. One distinguishes letter-, word- and sentence-level* sphoṭa*. No cognition is possible without a relation to language; this became an element of Indian epistemology. Meaning can be communicated without assuming that individual letters, words and complete sentences all exist simultaneously.* Sphoṭa is śabdabrahman*, language as the fundamental creative principle. Letters, words and sentences do not coexist at every moment. A spoken sound in isolation does not bear a complete word's meaning; sounds emerge and perish as the word unfolds. In* sphoṭa*, meaning is conveyed although individual letters, words or sentences need not be simultaneously present at the precise moment of apprehension. A letter contributes to meaning through its sequence within the word, and words do likewise within a completed sentence. Sankhya, Nyaya, Vaisheshika, Mimamsa and Vedanta do not accept this theory; they maintain that letters and their sounds are adequate to produce meaning. Jacques Derrida's account of deconstruction and dissemination bears an interesting proximity to the idea of* sphoṭa*. Reading "Your Lips" through* sphoṭa*: Although the poet lives in Kariyan, associated with Udayana and the Nyaya tradition that rejects* sphoṭa,* Nyaya's objections do not prevent his poem from working through that principle. The unspoken thoughts of the heart find expression when he compares the beloved's lips to an unattainable thief of hearts.

Booch Ji, the poet of Kariyan, the village of Udayana, says that sounds dissolve, one after another, and words have failed to disclose the intended meaning. His communicative achievement in "Your Lips" and elsewhere in the collection comes not simply from isolated words but from sphoṭa. Through the world's most rhythmic and melodious language, Maithili—in Yehudi Menuhin's phrase—Booch Ji emerges as the most lyrical poet after Vidyapati, and compels us to define Maithili poetry anew.

45. Videha: Logo, Vidyapati, Ugna, Mithila and Maithili

Abstract

The Mahabharata mentions that Indra's standard was dark blue. Rama's standard was red or saffron, bearing an image of the Sun, his family's tutelary deity. Arjuna's flag, according to the epic, bore an image of the monkey king.

Keywords: Videha · logo · Vidyapati · Ugna · Mithila · critical theory · Maithili

I.

The Mahabharata mentions that Indra's standard was dark blue. Rama's standard was red or saffron and bore the image of the Sun, his tutelary deity. Arjuna's flag carried the monkey king. Nakula's bore the fabulous śarabha. According to the Atharvaveda, this creature has two heads, two beautiful wings, a long tail, and eight sharply clawed toes, like a lion's. Abhimanyu's standard bore the sāraṅga bird; Duryodhana's was a serpent standard. Drona's displayed a deerskin and a water pot, while Karna's displayed a chain used on an elephant's leg and also the Sun.

Vishnu's standard bears Garuda; Shiva's bears Nandi the bull.

At a Durga pavilion, weapons and musical instruments—ṭakkā, paṭaha, mṛdaṅga, bronze cymbals, but not the flute—along with standards, armour and bows, are worshipped. The sword should be worshipped first, followed by the knife, dagger, bow, spear and armour; then the fly-whisk, umbrella, flag, pennant, kettledrum, conch, throne and horse. In my view, no flag of Mithila can be complete without incorporating all these elements.

I.

Like Indra's Shachi, like Gauri to the Lord of Gauri, like sweet-natured Rati to Kama and Sita to Rama, like Shri to Vishnu, she who is the beloved of King Padmasimha, famed throughout the world for her policy and conduct, the daughter of an eminent Brahmin, shines upon the earth. [9]

The verse quoted above is the ninth introductory stanza of Vidyapati's Śaivasarvasvasāra. Its meaning is that Queen Vishwasadevi, a Brahmin-born woman of outstanding virtues and sweet temperament, renowned for her political acumen, adorns the world. She was as dear to King Padmasimha as Shachi to Indra, Gauri to Shiva, Rati to Kama, Sita to Rama and Lakshmi to Vishnu. [9] II.

South of the Madhubani district headquarters, near Pandaul railway station, lies the village of Bhawanipur. Nearby, about six feet below the ground, is a Shiva linga known as Ugranath Mahadeva. A popular belief holds that, at the beginning of the fifteenth century, Vidyapati's companion Ugna drew Ganga water from his matted hair and offered it to the great poet when he was nearly overcome by thirst. This raised the poet's suspicion, and he asked the companion's true identity. Shiva then revealed his real form at that place.

Such an account can be credited only when faith is joined to reason and science. Of Shankaracharya it is said that he enclosed a river in his water pot. What actually happened, the account suggests, was that a ridge separated a flooded region from a drought-stricken region. With his disciples' help, Shankara opened the intervening passage and emerged holding his kamaṇḍalu, the ascetic's water pot. People saw water flowing to the other side, praised him for bringing the river into his pot, and thanked him for saving one area from drought and the other from flood. Opportunists subsequently turned the practical feat into a miracle. I hope that, when writing about Ugna, you will likewise weigh the story with both reason and faith.

On 20 March, the fourteen-day circumambulation of Mithila—nowadays chiefly associated with Janakpur—enters Janakpur by way of Kua Rampur. Two principal processional groups lead it, those of Mithila Bihariji and Kishoriji, accompanied by numerous other temple and devotional groups. Some pilgrims travel with their animals. The circuit begins at Kachuri Math in Dhanusha. Its first overnight halt is at Hanuman Nagar on the new-moon night and its fifteenth at Janakpur on the fourteenth lunar day, as the source states. On 21 March, the Phagun Parikrama day, the pilgrimage includes an inner circuit of Janakpur Municipality, approximately eight kilometres. Holi is celebrated in and around Janakpur on 22 March.

The fifteen stops of the middle Janakpur pilgrimage circuit and their principal deities or features are: (1) Hanuman Nagar—Hanuman; (2) Kalyaneshwar—Shiva linga; (3) Girija Sthan—Shakti; (4) Matihani—Vishnu temple; (5) Jaleshwar—Shiva linga; (6) Manai—Sage Mandava; (7) Dhruva Kund—Dhruva temple; (8) Kanchan Van—no temple, only beautiful scenery; (9) Parvat—five mountains; (10) Dhanusha—fragments of Shiva's bow; (11) Satokhadi—seven ponds associated with the Seven Sages; (12) Harushaha—Vimala Ganga; (13) Karuna—no temple, only beautiful scenery; (14) Bisaul—Vishvamitra temple; and (15) Janakpur, where the circuit concludes. Pilgrims stay at the Barahbigha grounds and in pilgrims' shelters.

The short circuit is eight kilometres; the middle circuit forty kos, or 128 kilometres; and the extended circuit 268 kilometres.

1. Ugratara Sthan: the family goddess (gosāunī) of Mandana Mishra, Mahishamardini Bhagavati at Mahishmati. In the fourteenth century Queen Padmavati, the senior queen of King Shivsinha, built a temple here. The temple was maintained under the Khandwala dynasty, and the king would visit during the autumn Navaratri celebrations for worship and residence.

Devotees of Tara come here in great numbers during Durga Puja.

2. Kapileshwar Sthan: five kilometres west of Madhubani, with the Madhav temple and an ancient Shiva linga. Kapila, the founder of Sankhya philosophy, is said to have established a temple here. The present shrine was built some 250 years ago by Maharaja Raghav Singh of Darbhanga. In ancient times the sea extended towards the Himalayas and land subsequently emerged. After Kapila burned the 60,000 sons—or soldiers—of Sagara near the Ganga Sagar pilgrimage site on the Bay of Bengal, he came to Kapileshwar. Even Ganga Sagar now lies somewhat away from the sea.

Janaki Navami: the ninth day of the bright half of Vaishakh, associated with the human Sita. Ram Navami: the ninth day of the bright half of Chaitra. Vidyapati's death anniversary: the thirteenth day of the bright half of Kartik, associated with desil bayna.

Vivah Panchami: the fifth day of the bright half of Agahan. Shatananda served as priest at the marriage of Rama and Sita. Mithila painting on the wedding pavilion, welcoming rites, gosāun songs and the Naina Jogin customs continue today as they did, according to tradition, at the marriage of the divine couple.

In antiquity Mithila was the land of the Maithils, known as Videha, whose capital was Mithila, founded by Mithi according to the Bhavishya Purana. Its other names include Videha, Mithila, Tirabhukti, Tirhut, Tapobhumi, Sambhavi, Suvarnakanana and Mantili. The Mithila Mahatmya in the Brihad Vishnu Purana describes an extended annual circumambulation of all Mithila, 268 kilometres in the account given here: from the Kaushiki to Singheshwar Sthan, then Simaria Ghat, the Himalayan foothills, back to the Kaushiki and finally Singheshwar Sthan. The middle circuit is forty kos, 128 kilometres, once performed in five days but nowadays in fifteen. It begins on the first day of the bright half of Phagun, described here as the new-moon day, and finishes on the full moon. The Phagun pilgrimage is the best known, though circuits can also be undertaken in Kartik and Vaishakh.

Panini: Mithila is the city where enemies are crushed. Janaka is derived from jana (viś). Nimi founded Vaijayanti (Janakpur), and Mithi founded the city of Mithila.

The śarabha appeared on Nakula's flag: a fabulous animal with two heads, two wings, a long tail and eight lion-like claws. When Vishnu assumed his Narasimha incarnation, Shiva is said to have taken the form of a śarabha to pacify him. The five colours of Mithila painting signify earth, water, fire, sky and air. An aṅkuśa is a double-curved goad used to control an elephant; Ganesha's goad is associated here with controlling the mouse.

Unicode: a 1,200-year-old figurine and 500-year-old manuscripts. The following are the counts of conjunct forms absent from, or substantially different in, Bengali: ka group (10), kha (4), ga (8), gha (4), ṅa (4), ca (6), ja (5), jha (4), ṭa (3), ṭha (2), ḍa (2), ḍha (3), ṇa (6), ta (6), tha (3), da (8), dha

(3), na (6), pa (8), pha (2), ba (4), bha (3), and ma (11). For final conjuncts: ya (2), ra (2), la (4), va (4), śa (9), ṣa (8), sa (8), and ha (8). Three-consonant conjuncts number 49 and four-consonant conjuncts one. Also listed are one bikārī form, two short/long gvaṅg forms, and five additional kinds of añjī, including the one described by Anshuman Pandey.

Vidyapati's flight to Nepal with Lakhima, in the context of Sanskrit and Avahattha; after his return his final work was Durga Bhakti Tarangini. Before Vidyapati, Jyotirishwar; Vidyapati wrote jhumar, nachari, Maheshvani, jog-uchiti, batgavani, parichhani, kobar, parati, barahmasa, man, Tirhut, drishtikut, and songs on Shiva, Bhagavati and the Ganga, Vishnu, Shakti, and Hara-Gauri.

46. Bajjika Gīt-Saṅgīt: An Integrated Bilingual, Multidimensional Literary Review

Abstract

A parallel Maithili–Bajjika examination of Dr Rameshwar Prasad's work. Book reviewed: Bajjika Gīt-Saṅgīt, Kishore Prakashan, Muzaffarpur, first edition, 2000. Since its inception, Videha has upheld literary justice for voices ignored, marginalised or excluded by established institutional criticism.

Keywords: Bajjika · song · music · integrated · bilingual · multidimensional · literary criticism

A Parallel Maithili–Bajjika Examination of Dr Rameshwar Prasad's Work

Book reviewed: Bajjika Gīt-Saṅgīt · Kishore Prakashan, Muzaffarpur · First edition, 2000

Part One: A Four-Dimensional Critical Examination

1. Editorial Introduction

From its beginning, Videha has advocated a literary justice that places at the centre voices left outside, pushed to the margins and unheard within established institutional traditions of criticism. This is the fundamental pledge of the parallel-literature movement: to accord authentic critical dignity to the voices of the people, women, Dalits, working people and neglected communities scarcely named in literary histories of institutions such as the Sahitya Akademi.

From its beginning, Videha has advocated a literary justice that places at the centre voices left outside, pushed to the margins and unheard within established institutional traditions of criticism. This is the fundamental pledge of the parallel-literature movement: to accord authentic critical dignity to the voices of the people, women, Dalits, working people and neglected communities scarcely named in literary histories of institutions such as the Sahitya Akademi.

From this standpoint, reviewing a Bajjika song collection in a Maithili journal is no alien undertaking; it is a natural expression of fellowship with a sister vernacular. Maithili itself has struggled for a long time to assert its distinct literary identity within the Hindi-speaking belt. That struggle gives us particular sympathy when we try to understand the literary aspirations of Bajjika, an unscheduled language subordinated in two directions.

From this standpoint, reviewing a Bajjika song collection in a Maithili journal is no alien undertaking; it is a natural expression of fellowship with a sister vernacular. Maithili itself has struggled for a long time to assert its distinct literary identity within the Hindi-speaking belt. That struggle gives us particular sympathy when we try to understand the literary aspirations of Bajjika, an unscheduled language subordinated in two directions.

The present study examines the work through four dimensions: (a) Indian poetics—rasa, dhvani and vakrokti; (b) Western critical theories—Marxism, structuralism and formalism, postcolonial and subaltern criticism, dialogism, orality and performance, and feminist perspectives; (c) Navya-Nyāya epistemology; and (d) the Videha framework of parallel history. Bringing these perspectives together makes a multilayered reading of a folk-song collection possible.

The present study examines the work through four dimensions: (a) Indian poetics—rasa, dhvani and vakrokti; (b) Western critical theories—Marxism, structuralism and formalism, postcolonial and subaltern criticism, dialogism, orality and performance, and feminist perspectives; (c) Navya-Nyāya epistemology; and (d) the Videha framework of parallel history. Bringing these perspectives together makes a multilayered reading of a folk-song collection possible.

2. Introduction to the Work

Bajjika Gīt-Saṅgīt is a collection of songs by Dr Rameshwar Prasad, first published by Kishore Prakashan, Muzaffarpur, in 2000. The author was principal of B.P.C. College at Lalganj in Vaishali district and wrote fluently in both Bajjika and standard Hindi. Among his varied works are Kuntī ke Beṭā, a Bajjika narrative poem; Bajjika Lokgīt; Ham Kahā̃ Hatī, Bajjika literary essays; and the Hindi poetry books Ai Lāsh! Suno and Kahī̃

Vipin Mẽ Madhushālā. The volume under consideration is an important stage in his cultivation of the Bajjika song.

Bajjika Gīt-Saṅgīt is a collection of songs by Dr Rameshwar Prasad, first published by Kishore Prakashan, Muzaffarpur, in 2000. The author was principal of B.P.C. College at Lalganj in Vaishali district and wrote fluently in both Bajjika and standard Hindi. Among his varied works are Kuntī ke Beṭā, a Bajjika narrative poem; Bajjika Lokgīt; Ham Kahā̃ Hatī, Bajjika literary essays; and the Hindi poetry books Ai Lāsh! Suno and Kahī̃ Vipin Mẽ Madhushālā. The volume under consideration is an important stage in his cultivation of the Bajjika song.

The book is dedicated to his eldest son, Gopal Ji Kishore. Its preface, an introductory essay, is by Acharya Shambhunath Mishra of the Rashtriya Sanskrit Sansthan, who detects in the author's poetry a brilliance comparable with Dinkar's. The collection contains 105 songs divided into nine thematic groups. These compositions are meant not merely to be read but to be sung: the author's declared intention is that Bajjika-speaking performers should be able to set them to melodies and rāgas.

The book is dedicated to his eldest son, Gopal Ji Kishore. Its preface, an introductory essay, is by Acharya Shambhunath Mishra of the Rashtriya Sanskrit Sansthan, who detects in the author's poetry a brilliance comparable with Dinkar's. The collection contains 105 songs divided into nine thematic groups. These compositions are meant not merely to be read but to be sung: the author's declared intention is that Bajjika-speaking performers should be able to set them to melodies and rāgas.

3. The “Author's Statement” and the Question of the Bajjika Language

The book's “Author's Statement” is not simply a modest personal declaration; it is a linguistic and cultural manifesto. The author says that he began organising gatherings of Bajjika poets at Lalganj in 1971, sang folk songs at street-corner meetings and published a selection in 1976 under the title Doctor Saheb ke Bajjika Lokgīt. He nevertheless felt that performers lacked enough newly composed songs to sing. The present collection was born from his resolve to address that absence.

The book's “Author's Statement” is not simply a modest personal declaration; it is a linguistic and cultural manifesto. The author says that he began organising gatherings of Bajjika poets at Lalganj in 1971, sang folk songs at street-corner meetings and published a selection in 1976 under the title Doctor Saheb ke Bajjika Lokgīt. He nevertheless felt that performers lacked enough newly composed songs to sing. The present collection was born from his resolve to address that absence.

In this essay the author argues strongly for Bajjika's independent linguistic identity. He observes that its verbal forms differ across the region: bā east of the Gandak, chhī around Darbhanga and Samastipur, hatī near Muzaffarpur and Hajipur, and hath towards Sheohar. Yet such variation does not in itself destroy the language's unity.

In this essay the author argues strongly for Bajjika's independent linguistic identity. He observes that its verbal forms differ across the region: bā east of the Gandak, chhī around Darbhanga and Samastipur, hatī near Muzaffarpur and Hajipur, and hath towards Sheohar. Yet such variation does not in itself destroy the language's unity.

Here he cites the proverb, "Every four kos the water changes; every eight kos the speech." He goes further, arguing that Bajjika is an ancient language descended from Pali and that Maithili and Bhojpuri were influenced by Bajjika rather than the other way round.

Here he cites the proverb, "Every four kos the water changes; every eight kos the speech." He goes further, arguing that Bajjika is an ancient language descended from Pali and that Maithili and Bhojpuri were influenced by Bajjika rather than the other way round.

From a critical standpoint this linguistic claim seems driven more by commitment than established evidence. Modern linguistics generally regards Maithili, Magahi, Bhojpuri and Bajjika as related members of the eastern, or Bihari, Indo-Aryan group; it is not simple to establish any one as the mother of all the others. The underlying impulse, however—to give a neglected vernacular its own literary identity and body of songs—is entirely genuine. The author himself accepts that literary work must rise above caste partisanship and sectarian mentalities and become a form of service to literature; this generous outlook is the healthiest element of his preface. Also quoted there is a 1977 letter by Jagdish Chandra Mathur, a founder of the Vaishali Festival, advising that new songs be written for the people, including fisherfolk, and urging writers to "turn towards the earth." The letter clarifies the popular inspiration behind these compositions.

From a critical standpoint this linguistic claim seems driven more by commitment than established evidence. Modern linguistics generally regards Maithili, Magahi, Bhojpuri and Bajjika as related members of the eastern, or Bihari, Indo-Aryan group; it is not simple to establish any one as the mother of all the others. The underlying impulse, however—to give a neglected vernacular its own literary identity and body of songs—is entirely genuine. The author himself accepts that literary work must rise above caste partisanship and sectarian mentalities and become a form of service to literature; this generous outlook is the healthiest element of his preface. Also quoted there is a 1977 letter by Jagdish Chandra Mathur, a founder of the Vaishali Festival, advising that new songs be written for the people, including fisherfolk, and urging writers to “turn towards the earth.” The letter clarifies the popular inspiration behind these compositions.

4. Structure and Survey of the Collection's Contents · 4. Organisation and Survey of the Contents

The songs are arranged in nine groups: (a) Krishna (1–20); (b) love and erotic sentiment (21–42); (c) the heroine's suffering (43–52); (d) nature (53–60); (e) human nature (61–78); (f) the condition of the country (79–84); (g) poverty (85–95); (h) agriculture (96–103); and (i) spring (104–105). This sequence traces a natural emotional journey, beginning with devotion and love, passing through nature, arriving at sociopolitical reality, and finally resting in the musical sweetness of agricultural labour and springtime. The author's claim is that songs on all three planes—classical song, light music and folk song—are represented.

The songs are arranged in nine groups: (a) Krishna (1–20); (b) love and erotic sentiment (21–42); (c) the heroine's suffering (43–52); (d) nature (53–60); (e) human nature (61–78); (f) the condition of the country (79–84); (g) poverty (85–95); (h) agriculture (96–103); and (i) spring (104–105). This sequence traces a natural emotional journey, beginning with devotion and love, passing through nature, arriving at sociopolitical reality, and finally resting in the musical sweetness of agricultural labour and springtime. The author's claim is that songs on all three planes—classical song, light music and folk song—are represented.

(a) Songs of Krishna

The twenty songs in the Krishna section are an outgrowth of the Vidyapati–Surdas tradition, recast in unmistakably rustic Bajjika idiom. Krishna is a playful deceiver, while Radha's mind is full of separation, wounded pride and reproach. The refrain of the first song, “How shall I walk along the pathway now? People cast their eyes upon me,” suggests the lover's dilemma amid public propriety. The second, “Kanha casts a glance —oh, Kanha is a trickster,” renders Krishna's playful deception in village imagery. The section is strongest when dramatic elements enter, particularly the dialogue songs between sister-in-law and brother's wife, where an episode at the water-drawing place becomes a lively exchange of questions and answers. The mention of Kubja gives expression to Radha's jealousy and sense of injustice. Songs such as “Little Kanhaiya Plays” also contain a gentle touch of parental affection.

The twenty songs in the Krishna section are an outgrowth of the Vidyapati–Surdas tradition, recast in unmistakably rustic Bajjika idiom.

Krishna is a playful deceiver, while Radha's mind is full of separation, wounded pride and reproach. The refrain of the first song, "How shall I walk along the pathway now? People cast their eyes upon me," suggests the lover's dilemma amid public propriety. The second, "Kanha casts a glance —oh, Kanha is a trickster," renders Krishna's playful deception in village imagery. The section is strongest when dramatic elements enter, particularly the dialogue songs between sister-in-law and brother's wife, where an episode at the water-drawing place becomes a lively exchange of questions and answers. The mention of Kubja gives expression to Radha's jealousy and sense of injustice. Songs such as "Little Kanhaiya Plays" also contain a gentle touch of parental affection.

(b) Love and the Erotic Sentiment

The love section (21–42) frequently evokes early dawn, drowsy eyes and the courtyard at daybreak. A line such as "The eyes grew languid; the bangles smiled" vividly depicts the heroine's preparations and gestures in the morning. Although this love poetry is sensuous, it remains within customary village decorum. Its life is the tension between longing and restraint.

The love section (21–42) frequently evokes early dawn, drowsy eyes and the courtyard at daybreak. A line such as "The eyes grew languid; the bangles smiled" vividly depicts the heroine's preparations and gestures in the morning. Although this love poetry is sensuous, it remains within customary village decorum. Its life is the tension between longing and restraint.

(c) The Heroine's Suffering

Here the collection's most original and affecting voice emerges, as traditional poetry of separation becomes a living social document. The husband who has gone away is no imaginary figure: he embodies the harsh realities of Bihar's labour migration, travelling to "Calcutta" in search of a livelihood. "I went looking for my beloved, all the way to Calcutta" gives that suffering a popular voice. In another song—"No one knows where my husband, gone abroad, may be"—the migrant husband becomes intoxicated by his earnings, drinks alcohol and neglects his household. The heroine's grief then exceeds private longing and becomes an awareness of familial and social disintegration.

Here the collection's most original and affecting voice emerges, as traditional poetry of separation becomes a living social document. The husband who has gone away is no imaginary figure: he embodies the harsh realities of Bihar's labour migration, travelling to "Calcutta" in search of a livelihood. "I went looking for my beloved, all the way to Calcutta" gives that suffering a popular voice. In another song—"No one knows where my husband, gone abroad, may be"—the migrant husband becomes intoxicated by his earnings, drinks alcohol and neglects his household. The heroine's grief then exceeds private longing and becomes an awareness of familial and social disintegration.

(d) Nature

The nature section (53–60) is suffused with rural images of the cuckoo, papiha, mahua, spring and moonlight. In the line "O dark cuckoo, with such dark-dark eyes, Ram, they do not seem dark," the play on sām—dusky and Shyam, a name of Krishna—joins nature and devotion. Sound figures such as kuhukī-kuhukī, ṭah-ṭah and lah-lah convey the audible beauty of the natural world.

The nature section (53–60) is suffused with rural images of the cuckoo, papiha, mahua, spring and moonlight. In the line "O dark cuckoo, with such dark-dark eyes, Ram, they do not seem dark," the play on sām—dusky and Shyam, a name of Krishna—joins nature and devotion. Sound figures such as kuhukī-kuhukī, ṭah-ṭah and lah-lah convey the audible beauty of the natural world.

(e–g) Human Nature, the Condition of the Country, and Poverty · (e–g) Human Nature, National Conditions, and Poverty

In these three sections the poet is most incisive and committed. His satire has a sharp edge and unmistakable targets: the chair of power, corruption, politicians and bribery. "The chair has made the world dance" attacks the corruption of authority, while "I am the most righteous man of all, yet people call me corrupt" bitterly mocks the corrupt person's self-deception. Mythological references sharpen the satire: "Watch your step, Tulsi—the times have turned topsy-turvy" applies the stories of Rama, Bharata, Ravana and Dasharatha to modern political absurdity. The poverty section (85–95) addresses inflation, debt, daughters' dowries and the desperation of the poor. "The season of the poor, O Rama, distributes nothing but calamity" articulates their continuing cycle of distress. The tone recalls the progressive popular poetry of Nagarjun.

In these three sections the poet is most incisive and committed. His satire has a sharp edge and unmistakable targets: the chair of power, corruption, politicians and bribery. "The chair has made the world dance" attacks the corruption of authority, while "I am the most righteous man of all, yet people call me corrupt" bitterly mocks the corrupt person's self-deception. Mythological references sharpen the satire: "Watch your step, Tulsi—the times have turned topsy-turvy" applies the stories of Rama, Bharata, Ravana and Dasharatha to modern political absurdity. The poverty section (85–95) addresses inflation, debt, daughters' dowries and the desperation of the poor. "The season of the poor, O Rama, distributes nothing but calamity" articulates their continuing cycle of distress. The tone recalls the progressive popular poetry of Nagarjun.

(h–i) Agriculture and Spring · (h–i) Farming and Spring

In the agricultural section the poet celebrates the dignity of labour and of farmers: "Come, I shall become a farmer; you become the farmer's wife," and "Work and eat with dignity; give up the fruits of exploitation" convey a wholesome consciousness of labour. Dialogue songs between husband and wife (97–98) capture the tenderness of domestic life. Finally, the spring section, with its Holi songs (104–105), returns the collection to Krishna's play and the sensuous rhythms of spring, producing a graceful circular ending.

In the agricultural section the poet celebrates the dignity of labour and of farmers: "Come, I shall become a farmer; you become the farmer's wife," and "Work and eat with dignity; give up the fruits of exploitation" convey a wholesome consciousness of labour. Dialogue songs between husband and wife (97–98) capture the tenderness of domestic life. Finally, the spring section, with its Holi songs (104–105), returns the collection to Krishna's play and the sensuous rhythms of spring, producing a graceful circular ending.

5. First Dimension: Rasa, Dhvani and Vakrokti · 5. First Critical Dimension: Rasa, Dhvani and Vakrokti

5.1 Examination of Rasa

From the perspective of rasa, this collection is a treasury of aesthetic sentiments. In the Krishna section, the permanent emotion is rati, love, transformed into the sweetness of devotion; Krishna is the supporting determinant (ālambana-vibhāva), while the Yamuna, flute and Vrindavan are excitant determinants (uddīpana-vibhāva). The heroine's gestures are consequent expressions (anubhāva), and curiosity, anxiety, jealousy over Kubja, and sorrow are transitory feelings (vyabhicāribhāva). In the childhood-Krishna songs, the permanent feeling of parental love gives rise to vātsalya-rasa.

From the perspective of rasa, this collection is a treasury of aesthetic sentiments. In the Krishna section, the permanent emotion is rati, love, transformed into the sweetness of devotion; Krishna is the supporting determinant (ālambana-vibhāva), while the Yamuna, flute and Vrindavan are excitant determinants (uddīpana-vibhāva). The heroine's gestures are consequent expressions (anubhāva), and curiosity, anxiety, jealousy over Kubja, and sorrow are transitory feelings (vyabhicāribhāva). In the childhood-Krishna songs, the permanent feeling of parental love gives rise to vātsalya-rasa.

In the section on the heroine's suffering, a subtle transition between rasas can be observed. Conventionally, separation is vipralambha-śṛṅgāra, love-in-separation, which implies hope of reunion. But where separation results from social and economic compulsion—migration and poverty—the weakening of hope inclines that emotion towards karuṇa-rasa, the sentiment of pathos. This transition from separation-love to pathos is one of the collection's defining emotional features.

In the section on the heroine's suffering, a subtle transition between rasas can be observed. Conventionally, separation is vipralambha-śṛṅgāra, love-in-separation, which implies hope of reunion. But where separation results from social and economic compulsion—migration and poverty—the weakening of hope inclines that emotion towards karuṇa-rasa, the sentiment of pathos. This transition from separation-love to pathos is one of the collection's defining emotional features.

The political songs on human nature, national affairs and poverty test the limits of traditional rasa classifications. Their feeling is neither pure comedy nor merely pathos: it is the modern register of anger, outrage and rebellion, which does not fit comfortably within the classical eight- or nine-rasa scheme. The seeds are clear of what progressive criticism sometimes calls the "rasa of indignation" or "rasa of revolt." That is this collection's innovation in rasa. The agricultural songs offer zeal for work —a "heroism of labour," corresponding to heroic action—and rural tranquillity; the spring and Holi songs bring the joy of love-in-union. The range of rasas is thus extensive.

The political songs on human nature, national affairs and poverty test the limits of traditional rasa classifications. Their feeling is neither pure comedy nor merely pathos: it is the modern register of anger, outrage and rebellion, which does not fit comfortably within the classical eight- or nine-rasa scheme. The seeds are clear of what progressive criticism sometimes calls the "rasa of indignation" or "rasa of revolt." That is this collection's innovation in rasa. The agricultural songs offer zeal for work —a "heroism of labour," corresponding to heroic action—and rural tranquillity; the spring and Holi songs bring the joy of love-in-union. The range of rasas is thus extensive.

5.2 Examination of Dhvani

The power of these songs lies more in suggestion (vyañjanā) than in literal or secondary meaning (abhidhā and lakṣaṇā). All three types of dhvani occur. Suggestion of an idea (vastu-dhvani): simply naming Kubja implies Krishna's neglect of Radha without saying it outright, and the word "Calcutta" suggests the whole tragedy of migration. Suggestion of figures (alaṃkāra-dhvani): the punning sām-sām combines darkness with Shyam* *or Krishna, while "fire in the heart" and "the cord of affection" evoke figurative meanings. Suggestion of rasa (rasa-dhvani): throughout the section on the heroine's grief, sorrowful love-in-separation is suggested rather than bluntly stated.

The power of these songs lies more in suggestion (vyañjanā) than in literal or secondary meaning (abhidhā and lakṣaṇā). All three types of dhvani occur. Suggestion of an idea (vastu-dhvani): simply naming Kubja implies Krishna's neglect of Radha without saying it outright, and the word "Calcutta" suggests the whole tragedy of migration. Suggestion of figures (alaṃkāra-dhvani): the punning* sām-sām *combines darkness with Shyam or Krishna, while "fire in the heart" and "the cord of affection" evoke figurative meanings. Suggestion of rasa (rasa-dhvani): throughout the section on the heroine's grief, sorrowful love-in-separation is suggested rather than bluntly stated.

The refrain or ṭek plays a distinctive role in this suggestive process. Repetition accumulates resonance in it; returning after each stanza, it increases the density of suggestion, the vernacular counterpart of Anandavardhana's rasa-dhvani. Most of the suggestion here is of the vivakṣitānyaparavācya type, grounded in semantic power: the literal sense remains intended while pointing beyond itself.

The refrain or ṭek plays a distinctive role in this suggestive process. Repetition accumulates resonance in it; returning after each stanza, it increases the density of suggestion, the vernacular counterpart of Anandavardhana's rasa-dhvani. Most of the suggestion here is of the vivakṣitānyaparavācya type, grounded in semantic power: the literal sense remains intended while pointing beyond itself.

5.3 Examination of Vakrokti

According to Kuntaka, vakrokti, oblique expression, is the soul of poetry. His six levels of obliqueness apply to this collection as follows. (1) Phonetic arrangement: alliteration and sound-painting in forms such as kuhukī-kuhukī, ṭah-ṭah, lah-lah and jhan-jhan. (2) The first part of the word: native and vernacular forms such as ḍagariyā, najariyā and bāsuriyā, made attractive by the affectionate suffix -iyā. (3) The latter part of the word: Bajjika verb forms such as delā, jāle, kahe nā and banī ha themselves create distinctive turns of expression charged with cultural meaning. (4) Sentence-level obliqueness: refrains, questioning formulas such as "How shall I walk now?" and dialogue construction. (5) Episode-level obliqueness: the village-waterplace episode and the dialogues between sisters-in-law and between spouses. (6) Composition-level obliqueness: the arrangement of nine thematic groups, from devotion through spring, forms the oblique overall design.

According to Kuntaka, vakrokti, oblique expression, is the soul of poetry. His six levels of obliqueness apply to this collection as follows. (1) Phonetic arrangement: alliteration and sound-painting in forms such as kuhukī-kuhukī, ṭah-ṭah, lah-lah and jhan-jhan. (2) The first part of the word: native and vernacular forms such as ḍagariyā, najariyā and bāsuriyā, made attractive by the affectionate suffix -iyā. (3) The latter part of the word: Bajjika verb forms such as delā, jāle, kahe nā and banī ha themselves create distinctive turns of expression charged with cultural meaning. (4) Sentence-level obliqueness: refrains, questioning formulas such as "How shall I walk now?" and dialogue construction. (5) Episode-level obliqueness: the village-waterplace episode and the dialogues between sisters-in-law and between spouses. (6) Composition-level obliqueness: the arrangement of nine thematic groups, from devotion through spring, forms the oblique overall design.

Assessment: the poet's most effective obliqueness occurs in phonetic arrangement and the latter part of words—their sound and distinctly Bajjika morphology. But when he descends into direct didactic statements, especially in some political and poverty songs, obliqueness weakens and literal declaration predominates. There the characteristic indirectness of poetry is less pronounced.

Assessment: the poet's most effective obliqueness occurs in phonetic arrangement and the latter part of words—their sound and distinctly Bajjika morphology. But when he descends into direct didactic statements, especially in some political and poverty songs, obliqueness weakens and literal declaration predominates. There the characteristic indirectness of poetry is less pronounced.

6. Second Dimension: Western Critical Approaches · 6. Second Dimension: Western Critical Perspectives

6.1 Marxist Reading

Songs about national conditions and poverty are saturated with class consciousness. Migration to "Calcutta" pictures labour extraction from village to city and the "reserve army of labour," transforming Bihar into a reservoir of workers for Bengal's industries. The "chair" songs criticise the state apparatus—politicians, officials and the police—and call to mind Althusser's repressive and ideological state apparatuses. The relationship between base and superstructure is clear: the poet demonstrates how economic conditions—poverty, indebtedness and dowry—produce consequential disasters in the social superstructure. Lines such as "Blood has become cheap" depict the commodification of human life, while criticism of an independence that has benefited only politicians and performers sharply indicts the postcolonial bourgeois state. By composing songs in the language of ordinary people, the poet assumes the role of a Gramscian “organic intellectual.”

Songs about national conditions and poverty are saturated with class consciousness. Migration to “Calcutta” pictures labour extraction from village to city and the “reserve army of labour,” transforming Bihar into a reservoir of workers for Bengal's industries. The “chair” songs criticise the state apparatus—politicians, officials and the police—and call to mind Althusser's repressive and ideological state apparatuses. The relationship between base and superstructure is clear: the poet demonstrates how economic conditions—poverty, indebtedness and dowry—produce consequential disasters in the social superstructure. Lines such as “Blood has become cheap” depict the commodification of human life, while criticism of an independence that has benefited only politicians and performers sharply indicts the postcolonial bourgeois state. By composing songs in the language of ordinary people, the poet assumes the role of a Gramscian “organic intellectual.”

6.2 Structuralism and Formalism · 6.2 Structuralism and Formalism

The collection is organised around binary oppositions: village/elsewhere, poor/rich, earth-and-hoe/chair-of-power, righteous/corrupt, food/hunger. The “chair” becomes a shifting signifier of authority, while the cuckoo and papiha recur as signs of separation. Formally the refrain is the structural backbone. What Cleanth Brooks calls “tension” runs between the sensuous surface of the love songs and the moral and social undercurrent. “I am the most righteous man of all” deploys dramatic irony: the corrupt speaker unknowingly condemns himself.

6.3 Postcolonial and Subaltern Criticism · 6.3 Postcolonial and Subaltern Discourses

Spivak's question, “Can the subaltern speak?”, is pertinent here. The poet borrows the voices of an abandoned wife and a hungry farmer, but their representation is mediated: an educated college principal speaks “for” the subaltern, itself a problem for critical inquiry. Yet the choice of a subordinate language like Bajjika is already a decolonising gesture against the dominance of Hindi and Sanskrit. Migration to “Calcutta” is an afterlife of colonial economic geography.

Spivak's question, “Can the subaltern speak?”, is pertinent here. The poet borrows the voices of an abandoned wife and a hungry farmer, but their representation is mediated: an educated college principal speaks “for” the subaltern, itself a problem for critical inquiry. Yet the choice of a subordinate language like Bajjika is already a decolonising gesture against the dominance of Hindi and Sanskrit. Migration to “Calcutta” is an afterlife of colonial economic geography.

6.4 Theory of Dialogism (Bakhtin)

Songs structured as conversations between a husband's sister and his wife, or between husband and wife, are literally dialogic. A plurality of voices becomes audible: the heroine, the sister-in-law, the farmer, and even the politician who satirises himself. Holi songs exhibit carnivalesque festivity —the brief liberty of a world turned upside down through playful transgression.

Songs structured as conversations between a husband's sister and his wife, or between husband and wife, are literally dialogic. A plurality of voices becomes audible: the heroine, the sister-in-law, the farmer, and even the politician who satirises himself. Holi songs exhibit carnivalesque festivity —the brief liberty of a world turned upside down through playful transgression.

6.5 Orality and Performance Theory · 6.5 Orality and Performance Theory

Seen through Ong, Parry–Lord and Zumthor, these are oral-formulaic compositions. They employ recurring refrains, name-formulas or epithets such as “Chhaliya” and “Giridhari,” and memory-supporting repetitions. Textual mobility or mouvance also appears: the alternation between sohāgin and suhāgin within a single song shows the fluidity of oral practice. These songs are not only “texts”; they are “performances,” in which the primacy of the voice is essential. Simplicity and repetition should therefore be regarded as virtues of the genre rather than defects.

Seen through Ong, Parry–Lord and Zumthor, these are oral-formulaic compositions. They employ recurring refrains, name-formulas or epithets such as “Chhaliya” and “Giridhari,” and memory-supporting repetitions. Textual mobility or mouvance also appears: the alternation between sohāgin and suhāgin within a single song shows the fluidity of oral practice. These songs are not only “texts”; they are “performances,” in which the primacy of the voice is essential. Simplicity and repetition should therefore be regarded as virtues of the genre rather than defects.

6.6 Feminist Implications

The heroine's-suffering section presents a gendered subjectivity: the interior world of the abandoned woman who endures the “living widowhood” imposed by a migrant husband. Yet the collection is also divided against itself: in many love songs the woman's beauty is fashioned through the male gaze. Recognising this contradiction is central to a feminist reading.

The heroine's-suffering section presents a gendered subjectivity: the interior world of the abandoned woman who endures the “living widowhood” imposed by a migrant husband. Yet the collection is also divided against itself: in many love songs the woman's beauty is fashioned through the male gaze. Recognising this contradiction is central to a feminist reading.

7. Third Dimension: Navya-Nyāya Epistemology · 7. Third Dimension: Navya-Nyāya Epistemology

This dimension illuminates the songs' structure of knowledge through the conceptual instruments of post-Gangesha Nyaya. At the outset it must be clear that this is an epistemological reading, not a claim that the folk poet consciously employed Navya-Nyaya. Rather, the logical and relational structures implicit in our understanding of the poems become especially clear when viewed from this philosophical standpoint.

This dimension illuminates the songs' structure of knowledge through the conceptual instruments of post-Gangesha Nyaya. At the outset it must be clear that this is an epistemological reading, not a claim that the folk poet consciously employed Navya-Nyaya. Rather, the logical and relational structures implicit in our understanding of the poems become especially clear when viewed from this philosophical standpoint.

7.1 Verbal Cognition, Acquisition of Word-Meaning, and Vernacular Signs · 7.1 Verbal Cognition, Learning Meaning, and Local Signs

According to the Naiyayikas, verbal cognition (śābdabodha) arises through four conditions: expectancy (ākāṅkṣā), semantic fitness (yogyatā), proximity (āsatti or sannidhi) and intention (tātparya). Prior knowledge of the relation between word and referent (śaktigraha) is also required. The principal means of acquiring this relation is usage: children learn conventional signs from the speech and conduct of elders. From this perspective, vernacular words in folk songs—ḍagariyā, bālam, sāiyā—derive their understood meanings from the practices of the performing community. Song itself becomes a communal act through which meaning is acquired. In elliptical folk-song sentences, expectancy is often satisfied through context and intention; shared cultural knowledge supplies the unstated words.

According to the Naiyayikas, verbal cognition (śābdabodha) arises through four conditions: expectancy (ākāṅkṣā), semantic fitness (yogyatā), proximity (āsatti or sannidhi) and intention (tātparya). Prior knowledge of the relation between word and referent (śaktigraha) is also required. The principal means of acquiring this relation is usage: children learn conventional signs from the speech and conduct of elders. From this perspective, vernacular words in folk songs—ḍagariyā, bālam, sāiyā—derive their understood meanings from the practices of the performing community. Song itself becomes a communal act through which meaning is acquired. In elliptical folk-song sentences, expectancy is often satisfied through context and intention; shared cultural knowledge supplies the unstated words.

7.2 Determining Objecthood: The Relational Structure of Knowledge of Separation · 7.2 Determination of Objecthood: The Relational Structure of Separation

In post-Gangesha Nyaya every cognition is defined through its relation of "objecthood" (viṣayatā) to its object. This has three forms: substantiveness (viśeṣyatā), qualifierhood (prakāratā) and relationality (saṃsargatā). Consider the heroine's cognition, "My husband has gone away" (mama patiḥ proṣitaḥ). Here substantiveness pertains to the husband, qualifierhood to being absent or separated, and relationality to the connection between the substantive and its qualifying condition. The complete cognition is constituted by this threefold determination of its object. The key to the poetic effect is that when the reader's or listener's subsequent cognition apprehends the heroine's separation under a particular qualification conducive to pathos, rasa arises. Thus the theory of viṣayatā offers a relational explanation of the transmission of rasa.

In post-Gangesha Nyaya every cognition is defined through its relation of "objecthood" (viṣayatā) to its object. This has three forms: substantiveness (viśeṣyatā), qualifierhood (prakāratā) and relationality (saṃsargatā). Consider the heroine's cognition, "My husband has gone away" (mama patiḥ proṣitaḥ). Here substantiveness pertains to the husband, qualifierhood to being absent or separated, and relationality to the connection between the substantive and its qualifying condition. The complete cognition is constituted by this threefold determination of its object. The key to the poetic effect is that when the reader's or listener's subsequent cognition apprehends the heroine's separation under a particular qualification conducive to pathos, rasa arises. Thus the theory of viṣayatā offers a relational explanation of the transmission of rasa.

7.3 Cognition of Absence: Relational Absence, Counterpositiveness, and Delimitation · 7.3 The Knowledge of Absence: Relation and Delimitation

The central cognition of separation, "The husband is not here" (patiḥ atra nāsti), is a cognition of absence, analysable through the Navya-Nyaya apparatus of delimiters (avacchedaka). It is a relational absence (saṃsargābhāva), not mutual non-identity (anyonyābhāva): the husband is absent from the courtyard by the relation of contact or conjunction. The counterpositive is the husband, the delimiting property of counterpositiveness is husbandhood, and the delimiting relation is conjunction or proximity; the locus of the absence is the courtyard or house. The poetic subtlety is that absence is not usually easy to apprehend as an object of experience. The poet, however, makes this relational absence almost perceptible through excitant determinants—the empty courtyard, the silent bed. Such objectification of absence is a source of the section's poetic force.

The central cognition of separation, "The husband is not here" (patiḥ atra nāsti), is a cognition of absence, analysable through the Navya-Nyaya apparatus of delimiters (avacchedaka). It is a relational absence (saṃsargābhāva), not mutual non-identity (anyonyābhāva): the husband is absent from the courtyard by the relation of contact or conjunction. The counterpositive is the husband, the delimiting property of counterpositiveness is husbandhood, and the delimiting relation is conjunction or proximity; the locus of the absence is the courtyard or house. The poetic subtlety is that absence is not usually easy to apprehend as an object of experience. The poet, however, makes this relational absence almost perceptible through excitant determinants—the empty courtyard, the silent bed. Such objectification of absence is a source of the section's poetic force.

7.4 Simile and Metaphor: Obstruction of Primary Meaning, the Basis of Secondary Signification, and Figurative Usage · 7.4 Simile and Metaphor: Primary Meaning and Secondary Signification

At a metaphorical expression the Naiyayika analysis proceeds as follows. In "the fire of the heart," the primary meaning—actual fire inside the heart—cannot be coherently connected with its context. This obstruction of literal meaning supplies the basis for secondary signification (lakṣaṇā). Similarity in the capacity to cause suffering then becomes the ground of figurative usage (gauṇī-vṛtti), whereby a painful mental condition is indicated. In "the cord of affection," the relevant similarity is the ability to bind. For a simile, knowledge of resemblance is itself the product of comparison as a means of knowledge (upamāna): cognition of an entity qualified by resemblance. Navya-Naiyayikas locate these processes within primary or secondary signification and resist the literary theorists' proposal of a separate faculty of suggestion (vyañjanā-vṛtti).

At a metaphorical expression the Naiyayika analysis proceeds as follows. In "the fire of the heart," the primary meaning—actual fire inside the heart—cannot be coherently connected with its context. This obstruction of literal meaning supplies the basis for secondary signification (lakṣaṇā). Similarity in the capacity to cause suffering then becomes the ground of figurative usage (gauṇī-vṛtti), whereby a painful mental condition is indicated. In "the cord of affection," the relevant similarity is the ability to bind. For a simile, knowledge of resemblance is itself the product of comparison as a means of knowledge (upamāna): cognition of an entity qualified by resemblance. Navya-Naiyayikas locate these processes within primary or secondary signification and resist the literary theorists' proposal of a separate faculty of suggestion (vyañjanā-vṛtti).

7.5 Invariable Concomitance, Conditions and Deviant Reasoning in Songs of Maxims · 7.5 Vyāpti, Upādhi and Fallacious Generalisation in Aphoristic Songs

The logic of aphoristic songs becomes clearer through the theory of invariable concomitance (vyāpti). In Gangesha's formulation, vyapti is the non-occurrence of a reason in any locus where the probandum is absent (sādhyābhāvavad-avṛttitva). The line "Whoever commits oppression enjoys every happiness" offers a seemingly universal rule: being an oppressor implies being happy. But it contradicts experience and contains a fallacy of irregular concomitance (savyabhicāra): the existence of unhappy oppressors shows the reason occurring without the alleged consequence; a condition relating to dharma might also qualify the generalisation. The poet's skill lies in knowingly stating a defective universal as though it were certain. When listeners recognise its exceptions, the satire of moral outrage flashes forth. An ethically disordered reality is thus expressed through an ironically false appearance of universal law.

The logic of aphoristic songs becomes clearer through the theory of invariable concomitance (vyāpti). In Gangesha's formulation, vyapti is the non-occurrence of a reason in any locus where the probandum is absent (sādhyābhāvavad-avṛttitva). The line "Whoever commits oppression enjoys every happiness" offers a seemingly universal rule: being an oppressor implies being happy. But it contradicts experience and contains a fallacy of irregular concomitance (savyabhicāra): the existence of unhappy oppressors shows the reason occurring without the alleged consequence; a condition relating to dharma might also qualify the generalisation. The poet's skill lies in knowingly stating a defective universal as though it were certain. When listeners recognise its exceptions, the satire of moral outrage flashes forth. An ethically disordered reality is thus expressed through an ironically false appearance of universal law.

7.6 Dhvani versus Inference: An Analysis of the Kubja Episode · 7.6 Dhvani and Inference in the Kubja Episode

Literary theorists treat suggestion as an autonomous semantic operation. Naiyayikas, and advocates of inference such as Mahimabhatta, reduce it to inference. The Kubja episode can be reconstructed in inferential form: subject: Krishna; probandum: neglect of Radha, or attachment elsewhere; reason: reports of Krishna's attentions to Kubja, together with Radha's reproaches; universal concomitance: wherever a man favours another heroine, he neglects his own beloved. Reflection upon the inferential sign thus produces the suggested meaning as an inference, without needing a separate semantic faculty. Anandavardhana's response deserves attention, however: poetic wonder arises immediately and aesthetically, whereas inference unfolds through stages of reasoning. The reduction of suggestion to inference thus loses something essential to experience. Both positions should be kept in view.

Literary theorists treat suggestion as an autonomous semantic operation. Naiyayikas, and advocates of inference such as Mahimabhatta, reduce it to inference. The Kubja episode can be reconstructed in inferential form: subject: Krishna; probandum: neglect of Radha, or attachment elsewhere; reason: reports of Krishna's attentions to Kubja, together with Radha's reproaches; universal concomitance: wherever a man favours another heroine, he neglects his own beloved. Reflection upon the inferential sign thus produces the suggested meaning as an inference, without needing a separate semantic faculty. Anandavardhana's response deserves attention, however: poetic wonder arises immediately and aesthetically, whereas inference unfolds through stages of reasoning. The reduction of suggestion to inference thus loses something essential to experience. Both positions should be kept in view.

7.7 Memory, Latent Impressions and Stimuli: The Memory Processes of Songs of Separation · 7.7 Memory and the Evocation of Separation

Songs of separation are fundamentally awakeners of memory. In Nyaya, experience produces latent dispositions (saṃskāra), from which memory emerges with the aid of an activating stimulus (udbodhaka). Natural stimuli—the cuckoo's call, the moon, the month of Phagun—act as such activators, awakening impressions formed through earlier experience of the absent beloved. The resulting recollection intensifies the pain of separation. Thus the function of the excitant determinant (uddīpana-vibhāva) in poetry parallels Nyaya's causal account of memory as the conjunction of disposition and activating stimulus.

Songs of separation are fundamentally awakeners of memory. In Nyaya, experience produces latent dispositions (saṃskāra), from which memory emerges with the aid of an activating stimulus (udbodhaka). Natural stimuli—the cuckoo's call, the moon, the month of Phagun—act as such activators, awakening impressions formed through earlier experience of the absent beloved. The resulting recollection intensifies the pain of separation. Thus the function of the excitant determinant (uddīpana-vibhāva) in poetry parallels Nyaya's causal account of memory as the conjunction of disposition and activating stimulus.

7.8 Theories of Validity: Externally Established Validity of Folk Song · 7.8 The External Validity of Folk-Song Knowledge

For the Naiyayikas, the validity of cognition is established externally (parataḥ)—through correspondence with experience or successful action—rather than being intrinsic, as the Mimamsakas argue. A folk song is a form of reliable popular testimony, a trusted utterance; its account of social suffering is validated externally by the corresponding experience of its community. In this sense, the shared recognition of singers and listeners establishes the reliability of the evidence: collective verification of suffering.

For the Naiyayikas, the validity of cognition is established externally (parataḥ)—through correspondence with experience or successful action—rather than being intrinsic, as the Mimamsakas argue. A folk song is a form of reliable popular testimony, a trusted utterance; its account of social suffering is validated externally by the corresponding experience of its community. In this sense, the shared recognition of singers and listeners establishes the reliability of the evidence: collective verification of suffering.

It bears repeating that all the Nyaya analyses above illuminate the songs' epistemic structure; they are not a history of the poet's conscious intellectual commitments. A folk poet may be accomplished in rasa rather than formal logic. Nevertheless, the clarity with which these philosophical categories reveal the internal relational organisation of the songs' meaning is itself testimony to the deep knowledge embodied in the vernacular voice.

It bears repeating that all the Nyaya analyses above illuminate the songs' epistemic structure; they are not a history of the poet's conscious intellectual commitments. A folk poet may be accomplished in rasa rather than formal logic. Nevertheless, the clarity with which these philosophical categories reveal the internal relational organisation of the songs' meaning is itself testimony to the deep knowledge embodied in the vernacular voice.

8. Fourth Dimension: The Framework of Parallel History · 8. Fourth Dimension: A Parallel-History Perspective

From the perspective of Videha's parallel history, this work is counter-canonical. Bajjika, an unscheduled language subordinated between Hindi as an official language and Maithili as a scheduled language, seeks to write itself into literature from outside the institutional literary-Akademi canon. It is a literary history written from the margins.

From the perspective of Videha's parallel history, this work is counter-canonical. Bajjika, an unscheduled language subordinated between Hindi as an official language and Maithili as a scheduled language, seeks to write itself into literature from outside the institutional literary-Akademi canon. It is a literary history written from the margins.

Restoring voices: The heroine's-suffering section records the abandoned woman's experience, the divided position between natal and marital homes in gauna songs, and the "living widowhood" imposed by a migrant husband—though the author's mediation must be remembered. Workers' and farmers' voices: the farming and poverty sections offer a history from below of the erased labourer, the migrant and the indebted cultivator. The political songs voice popular criticism of the postcolonial state, a parallel history opposed to official nationalist narratives, including a critique of an independence that deceived the poor.

Restoring voices: The heroine's-suffering section records the abandoned woman's experience, the divided position between natal and marital homes in gauna songs, and the "living widowhood" imposed by a migrant husband—though the author's mediation must be remembered. Workers' and farmers' voices: the farming and poverty sections offer a history from below of the erased labourer, the migrant and the indebted cultivator. The political songs voice popular criticism of the postcolonial state, a parallel history opposed to official nationalist narratives, including a critique of an independence that deceived the poor.

The affinity between Bajjika's and Maithili's counter-canonical struggles is unmistakable. Horizontal solidarity among subordinate languages is the moral centre of this reading. Evidentiary value: as parallel history, the songs archive popular memory and preserve the emotional and economic organisation of rural Bihar in the latter half of the twentieth century. Digitisation by Bharatavani (CIIL) is itself a parallel archival act. Democratic form: these songs were written for oral performance; literature here is a shared commons, not the private property of elites. Their origin in street-corner gatherings confirms this.

The affinity between Bajjika's and Maithili's counter-canonical struggles is unmistakable. Horizontal solidarity among subordinate languages is the moral centre of this reading. Evidentiary value: as parallel history, the songs archive popular memory and preserve the emotional and economic organisation of rural Bihar in the latter half of the twentieth century. Digitisation by Bharatavani (CIIL) is itself a parallel archival act. Democratic form: these songs were written for oral performance; literature here is a shared commons, not the private property of elites. Their origin in street-corner gatherings confirms this.

A self-critical note consistent with parallel principles: the author's linguistic claim—that Bajjika descends from Pali and is the mother of Maithili and Bhojpuri—reproduces, within a counter-canon, the hierarchical logic of canon-making that the parallel movement resists. Establishing Bajjika's dignity through claims of greater antiquity or priority is less desirable than affirming its equal yet distinctive subordinate identity. Parallel history privileges horizontal fellowship among languages over contests for precedence.

A self-critical note consistent with parallel principles: the author's linguistic claim—that Bajjika descends from Pali and is the mother of Maithili and Bhojpuri—reproduces, within a counter-canon, the hierarchical logic of canon-making that the parallel movement resists. Establishing Bajjika's dignity through claims of greater antiquity or priority is less desirable than affirming its equal yet distinctive subordinate identity. Parallel history privileges horizontal fellowship among languages over contests for precedence.

9. Integrated Assessment: Craft, Achievements and Limitations · 9. Integrated Evaluation: Form, Accomplishment and Limits

In terms of craft, the backbone of the collection is the refrain. The close weave of Bajjika verb forms establishes its linguistic identity; village images —the clay pot, bamboo flute, cuckoo, moon, rice and aluminium plate— along with sound figures create its popular aesthetic texture. Yet there is a tension: Sanskritised phrases such as “the resounding, graceful, new golden anklets” do not always merge with the native idiom, weakening the consistency of some songs.

In terms of craft, the backbone of the collection is the refrain. The close weave of Bajjika verb forms establishes its linguistic identity; village images —the clay pot, bamboo flute, cuckoo, moon, rice and aluminium plate— along with sound figures create its popular aesthetic texture. Yet there is a tension: Sanskritised phrases such as “the resounding, graceful, new golden anklets” do not always merge with the native idiom, weakening the consistency of some songs.

Achievement: its foremost achievement is a singable treasury of songs on varied subjects and in many rasas, exactly what the author intended. The social consciousness through which romantic separation becomes a reality of migration, together with explicit political satire, gives the work enduring value. Its deep involvement in ordinary life and the authenticity of its village imagery make it a genuine document of the people.

Achievement: its foremost achievement is a singable treasury of songs on varied subjects and in many rasas, exactly what the author intended. The social consciousness through which romantic separation becomes a reality of migration, together with explicit political satire, gives the work enduring value. Its deep involvement in ordinary life and the authenticity of its village imagery make it a genuine document of the people.

Limitation: the collection is uneven. Some political and poverty songs become more propagandistic and didactic than poetic, with literal statements displacing obliqueness and suggestion. Many Krishna and love songs tread ground already familiar from Vidyapati and Surdas. Recurrent images and the imperfect fit between Sanskritised and vernacular diction sometimes jar. The introduction's linguistic claims arise more from conviction than demonstration, and the mediation of subordinate voices raises a representational problem. Nonetheless, simplicity, recurring refrains and lucid emotion are necessary for singability. These songs were made for the stage and the singing voice, not merely for silent reading.

Limitation: the collection is uneven. Some political and poverty songs become more propagandistic and didactic than poetic, with literal statements displacing obliqueness and suggestion. Many Krishna and love songs tread ground already familiar from Vidyapati and Surdas. Recurrent images and the imperfect fit between Sanskritised and vernacular diction sometimes jar. The introduction's linguistic claims arise more from conviction than demonstration, and the mediation of subordinate voices raises a representational problem. Nonetheless, simplicity, recurring refrains and lucid emotion are necessary for singability. These songs were made for the stage and the singing voice, not merely for silent reading.

10. Conclusion

Taken together, the four dimensions show Bajjika Gīt-Saṅgīt to be a multilayered work: under rasa, dhvani and vakrokti it is a repository of popular aesthetic feeling; from Western perspectives it is class-conscious, dialogic and performance-centred; through Navya-Nyaya it reveals an emotional organisation structured by knowledge of absence, inference and invariable concomitance; and in parallel history it is a counter-canonical document carrying subordinated voices.

Taken together, the four dimensions show Bajjika Gīt-Saṅgīt to be a multilayered work: under rasa, dhvani and vakrokti it is a repository of popular aesthetic feeling; from Western perspectives it is class-conscious, dialogic and performance-centred; through Navya-Nyaya it reveals an emotional organisation structured by knowledge of absence, inference and invariable concomitance; and in parallel history it is a counter-canonical document carrying subordinated voices.

Its lasting value is twofold. On the one hand it is folk-literary evidence of poverty and migration in Bihar; on the other it is an important primary text for comparative study of a vernacular closely related to Maithili and for the questions raised by the parallel-literature movement. Dr Rameshwar Prasad's collection belongs to a tradition in which song is the natural, accessible means by which poets establish a linguistic identity in ordinary people's minds. The work is an authentic component of the alternative literature whose canon the Videha parallel movement hopes to build; for this reason it commands critical respect.

Its lasting value is twofold. On the one hand it is folk-literary evidence of poverty and migration in Bihar; on the other it is an important primary text for comparative study of a vernacular closely related to Maithili and for the questions raised by the parallel-literature movement. Dr Rameshwar Prasad's collection belongs to a tradition in which song is the natural, accessible means by which poets establish a linguistic identity in ordinary people's minds. The work is an authentic component of the alternative literature whose canon the Videha parallel movement hopes to build; for this reason it commands critical respect.

Critical method: the study draws upon four dimensions—Indian poetics (rasa, dhvani and vakrokti), Western critical theory, Navya-Nyaya epistemology and Videha's parallel-history framework. All quotations have been taken unchanged from the original book and restricted to the needs of analysis.

Critical method: the study draws upon four dimensions—Indian poetics (rasa, dhvani and vakrokti), Western critical theory, Navya-Nyaya epistemology and Videha's parallel-history framework. All quotations have been taken unchanged from the original book and restricted to the needs of analysis.

Part Two: Close Reading, Song Structures, and Sociocultural Interpretation

Critical Method · Method of Criticism

The critical method operates on three levels. First comes close reading: detailed attention to words, images, repetition, rhythm, refrains, dialogues and subject matter. Second comes Indian poetics, encompassing rasa, dhvani, figures of speech and oblique expression. Third is sociocultural interpretation, which considers Bajjika's linguistic identity, the representation of women, rural life, poverty, migration, farming, politics and popular memory. These levels are treated together rather than as mutually exclusive methods.

The critical method operates on three levels. First comes close reading: detailed attention to words, images, repetition, rhythm, refrains, dialogues and subject matter. Second comes Indian poetics, encompassing rasa, dhvani, figures of speech and oblique expression. Third is sociocultural interpretation, which considers Bajjika's linguistic identity, the representation of women, rural life, poverty, migration, farming, politics and popular memory. These levels are treated together rather than as mutually exclusive methods.

1. The Nature of the Book: A Meeting of Song, Poetry and Folk Melody · 1. Form and Organisation of the Book

How shall I walk along the pathway now? People will cast the evil eye upon me.

The fundamental strength of Bajjika Gīt-Saṅgīt is its singability. It is not an ordinary collection of poems but of songs in which line formation, sound, refrain, repetition and musical movement are organised for performance. Its rhythm has a distinctly communal character. The title correctly joins song and music: the text creates a space for the singing voice. Unlike poetry intended only for the printed page, these pieces anticipate the listener's ear and the performer's breath.

Bajjika Gīt-Saṅgīt is not simply a set of songs. It is an extensive singable world of Bajjika life: love, sorrow and happiness, nature, politics, poverty, farming and the month of Phagun. It links the language of familiar village life with the emotions of everyday existence.

The book begins with Krishna songs, then expands through erotic love, the heroine's suffering, nature, social realities, the condition of the country, poverty and agriculture, ending with spring. This progression gives the volume an emotional architecture: private affection opens into collective social experience and returns at the end to seasonal celebration.

In this sequence the poet begins with Radha and Shyam and the village world of love, passes through the heroine's pain, nature and human character, then addresses the country, the poor and farmers, and finally returns to the colours and rhythms of spring. The movement links personal feeling with public life.

In the opening refrain, common expressions such as ḍagariyā (little road or pathway) and “casting the eye” bring poetry directly into everyday life. The road is more than a physical path: it is the public space in which a lover must confront society's watching eyes and judgments.

The book's basic tone can be heard in this opening refrain: direct village speech, a melody made to be sung, the hesitation of love and the gaze of society. Ḍagariyā does not signify a road alone but also the passage of love under public scrutiny.

2. The Krishna Section: Folk Devotion and Erotic Love Together · 2. Krishna Songs: The Meeting of Devotion and Love

The first twenty songs centre on Krishna, but this Krishna is not a remote philosophical deity. He is close to village life, to Radha and Shyam's love, the flute, Yamuna, courtyards, water-drawing places, glances, longing and the swing. Devotion and desire coexist. The songs transpose received mythology into the tone and social experience of Bajjika-speaking communities.

In the Krishna section the deity is not distant or merely philosophical. Among the Yamuna, waterplace, flute, swing, Radha, village beauties, courtyard and village, Krishna is present like one of the people. The songs bring devotion into familiar life.

Separation in the Radha–Shyam episodes is mostly expressed in the rhythm of ordinary speech. Rather than elaborate Sanskritised figures, the poet uses popular images and bodily gestures: eyes, flute, Yamuna, swing, the rains and the behaviour of village lovers. This is a particular strength of the Bajjika rendering of an old literary tradition.

The poet's distinction is that he has given the old Krishna story Bajjika speech, conduct and feeling. Shyam, Radha, the flute, Yamuna, moon and waterplace are familiar traditional symbols, but a local voice animates them afresh.

One achievement of the Krishna songs is this reanimation of mythological figures through local language and cultural practice. Their limitation is the recurrence of conventional images—Radha and Shyam, moon, eyes and flowers—in some pieces. What may look repetitive to a silent reader can nevertheless function effectively as recurring melody and memory in performance.

Images of moon, eyes, flowers, flute and beauty recur frequently. While they sometimes seem repetitive on the page, they acquire force as refrains and aids to memory when sung. Repetition thus has both an artistic limitation and a practical oral function.

3. Love: A Poetry of Body, Gaze and Waiting · 3. Love: Gaze, Body, Modesty and Expectation

The love section has a striking visual character. Eyes, the end of a sari, scarves, moon, lotus, lightning, clouds, fragrance, anklets, hair, lips and flowers recur. The beloved's bodily appearance is rendered through recognisable images of the natural world and the village household. Love is as much a matter of seeing as of feeling.

In this section love appears in vividly visible forms. The sari's end, anklets, eyes, hair, lotus, moonlight, lightning, flowers, air, night and colour become love's language. The poet constructs a sensuous world out of immediate and recognisable images.

In many songs love also takes place in public. The village path, courtyard, roof, riverbank, flower garden and night form its stage. Private emotion must negotiate a social gaze, and the tension between longing and restraint gives these poems much of their force.

Village pathways, courtyards, rooftops, gardens and rivers become stages of love. Private feeling remains in tension with the community's watching eyes. Love is therefore not only an experience of the body but also an experience of social custom and restraint.

The poet's similes are simple and immediately intelligible. Traditional images such as moon, lotus, lightning and the honeyed season are renewed through local verb forms and folk rhythm. He relies less on elaborate figures than on the expressive force of familiar objects.

Descriptions of beauty are sometimes conventional, but Bajjika verbs, modes of address and everyday expressions give them new life. The poet seeks neither difficulty nor rarefied ornament: the image is meant to speak at once to its audience.

4. The Heroine's Suffering: Women's Experience and the Ground of Pathos · 4. The Heroine's Suffering: A Woman's Inner Voice

The section on the heroine's suffering is one of the collection's emotional centres. A husband abroad, waiting, the pressures of marital family, humiliation, loneliness and the insecurity of love become elements of women's inner experience. The songs bring private suffering into contact with social and economic life.

This is among the book's most sensitive sections. The absent husband, the marital home, loneliness, waiting, sorrow, anger and uncertainty in love reveal an inner world experienced from a woman's position. Its social grounding makes the songs particularly affecting.

The migrant husband, life in the marital household, the shadow of child marriage, helpless waiting and failures of communication recur. Yet the women are not invariably passive: in their reproaches, questions and complaints they begin to articulate the terms of their own suffering.

The simplicity of the language deepens the effect of pathos. Short sentences, cries, repetitions and ordinary words keep sorrow from seeming artificial. The heroine's pain is not merely private: it reflects the social conditions of migration and gendered domestic life.

The evocation of karuṇa-rasa does not depend upon extravagant lamentation. Simple vernacular sentences, direct addresses and repetitions make it more persuasive. Such simplicity is one of the work's essential achievements.

The achievement here is the special place given to women's emotional life within a recognisable folk-song structure. The limitation is that in other, more overtly erotic songs, women are at times viewed chiefly through their outward beauty. Both tendencies need to be considered together.

5. Nature: Not Decoration but a Living Companion · 5. Nature: Humanity's Living Companion

Night came dressed in kohl-darkness; morning fled like gold.

Rivers, wind, rain, cuckoos, the season of love, henna, flowers, the moon and green fields are not merely background in these songs. Nature participates in human feeling: the river carries separation, the breeze conveys remembrance and the changing season reflects shifts of mood.

The river, wind, rain, cuckoo, henna, Phagun, flowers and moon are no mere decorations. Nature seems to change with the changing human heart. Its motions and feelings are inseparable from those of the people who inhabit it.

In the quoted lines, night becomes animate through kohl, and morning shines like gold. Such effortless transformation of everyday images into poetic pictures demonstrates the author's gift for visualisation.

The comparison of night with kohl and morning with gold produces a vivid scene despite its simplicity. The poet's most effective imagery often comes from the familiar materials of everyday village life.

Nature's beauty also has a palpable rural geography: fields, river, waterplace, orchard, kadamba tree, cuckoo and Phagun. Consequently the descriptions are not abstract romantic scenery but part of the lived environment.

These images are not abstract. Field, river, waterplace, orchard, kadamba, cuckoo and Phagun all belong to the geography of daily life. The landscape of the songs is the same landscape in which ordinary people work and live.

6. Human Nature: The Expansion of Social Satire · 6. Human Nature: Satire and Social Criticism

The tone changes decisively in the “Human Nature” section. After love and seasonal celebration, the poet turns to officers, ministers, elections, corruption, authority, plunder, moral decline, unemployment and violence. Song becomes an instrument of public accusation.

The book's voice changes in the “Human Nature” section. Officers, ministers, voting, the chair of power, corruption, looting, unemployment, violence and moral decay come to the fore, displacing the earlier emphasis on love and the seasons.

Several songs are declaratory and sometimes approach direct political statements. Artistically this is risky, because the dominance of an explicit message can diminish poetry's complexity and suggestiveness. Yet these texts remain valuable as testimony to their time and to the social dissatisfaction that shaped them.

Some songs become almost straightforward political declarations. Artistic subtlety sometimes suffers, but as documents of their historical moment such passages remain significant. Their directness makes evident the author's sense of social urgency.

The political vocabulary of minister, officer, election, vote, democracy and chair of power is a modern intrusion into the traditional lexicon of folk song. This mixture firmly situates the collection in its own historical era.

The remarkable point is that the poet does not confine folk song to love and seasonal change; he makes it speak about government, corruption and social discontent.

7. The Country's Condition: National Awareness and Public Concern · 7. The Country's Condition: Civic Concern and National Feeling

In the section on national conditions, the poet's conception of the nation is formed by idealism, opposition to corruption and moral indignation. Independence, democracy, poverty, border crises, education, administration and public responsibility become themes of song.

Songs on the country's condition express concern about freedom, government, education, borders, corruption and civic responsibility. The speaking “I” begins to change from private lover into a member of a larger public.

These songs sometimes approach the form of mass or people's songs. The private “I” gradually becomes a collective “we”; attention shifts from the beloved to civic life. This turn broadens both the scope and the audience of the collection.

Some songs take on the voice of popular mobilisation. Slogans and moral advice can become too prominent, yet the willingness to address national problems directly in a vernacular language is part of the work's courage.

The limitation is that direct instruction or slogans reduce poetic ambiguity in some songs. The achievement is that the author makes civic criticism possible through the language of the people.

Artistic achievement and limitation thus coexist: directness increases popular communication but can also reduce a poem's range of meanings.

8. Poverty: Compassion, Anger and Structural Questions · 8. Poverty: Hunger, Wages and Dignity

For the poor, O Rama, hardship distributes only more misfortune.

The poverty section is among the collection's most socially affecting parts. Inflation, wages, hunger, debt, daughters, land, unemployment, illness and inequality appear as ethical questions rooted in ordinary life. The poor are not presented merely as sufferers but as people with labour, dignity and claims upon society.

Inflation, labour, daughters' futures, loans, fields, hunger, livelihood and inequality define the poverty section. The poor person is more than an object of pity; work, self-respect and struggle are also part of this experience.

The author does not make the poor a passive object of compassion. He represents them through work, dignity and resistance. Some songs call upon God, yet within that appeal one also hears questions addressed to an unjust social order.

At times there is a cry to God, and elsewhere a challenge to the system. Folk faith and social resistance proceed together, making these songs' suffering seem grounded rather than manufactured.

Language is particularly effective here because the poetic vocabulary grows out of life's actual economy: earning, wages, rising prices, fields, borrowing and bread. Such terms connect the songs directly to the material circumstances of their subjects.

Earnings, wages, inflation, fields, debts and bread provide the ground of this poetry. Here language carries an especially palpable social weight.

9. Agriculture: The Aesthetics of Labour · 9. The Beauty of Work in Agriculture

The agricultural section gives lyrical form to the farmer's work, preparing the field, rice, water, green leaves, the uncertainties of cultivation, changing weather and cooperation among village families. At this point the collection's social geography becomes especially concrete.

Farmers and farmers' wives, rice, water, fields, crops, work and weather make up this entire world. Farming is not simply a green and pleasing scene: the poet recognises its hardship and uncertainty as well as its production.

The farmer's life is not represented merely as romantic greenery. Struggle, unpredictable seasons, physical labour and difficulties of production are visible. At the same time, scenes of cultivation bring out the cooperative character of village work.

Here a field is not merely land. It is the basis of family, food, dignity and the future. The joint appearance of farmer and farmer's wife brings rural life before us as collective labour.

These songs convey the book's social geography most concretely. A language that began with the sari's end and the anklet in love poetry now reaches the plough, rice, water and work.

The social landscape is clearest here. The words that began with the sari and anklet of love have moved towards plough, rice, water and labour.

10. Spring: A Return to Rasa, Colour and Festivity · 10. Spring and Holi: A Colourful Return at the Close Mohan plays at teasing by force, O fair one! How shall I play Holi?

The final two songs return the collection to spring and Holi, to love, play and celebration. It began with Krishna and ends again in the colours of Krishna's Holi. The closing thus gives the sequence a circular shape.

The last songs are about spring and Holi. Since the book began with Krishna and ends once more with his Holi festivities, the whole becomes a kind of completed circle.

After passing through heavy questions of society, poverty, politics and agriculture, the reader returns to colour, Phagun, laughter and bodily joy. This conclusion restores an aesthetic balance.

After politics, poverty, the country's troubles and farming, the reader returns to colour, laughter, love and playful pleasure. The close maintains the collection's emotional balance.

11. Language: Bajjika's Intimacy and its Many Registers · 11. Bajjika's Strength as a Literary Language

The language is the work's most distinctive achievement. The author does not employ Bajjika merely as a decorative touch of “local dialect” but as a full poetic medium. Verbs, pronouns, modes of address, idioms and sound patterns make it recognisably itself.

One of the book's greatest achievements is to use Bajjika as a complete language of literature. Village words, local verb forms, cries, forms of address, sayings and sound give its songs a distinctive character.

Alongside regional Bajjika forms the songs employ Hindi, Sanskritised and modern administrative vocabulary. Love poems draw upon the sari, pathway and intimate terms of address; political songs add elections, ministers, officials, democracy and administration. The language remains open to newer social circumstances.

Modern words such as election, minister, official, democracy and administration appear beside traditional expressions. The language is not confined to an old village world; it has accommodated the experiences and vocabulary of a new age.

The author offers views on the regional varieties of Bajjika and their differing verbs in his introductory statement. From a literary standpoint it is more important that the collection actually demonstrates the language's ability to express many kinds of experience.

The most important literary point is that Bajjika is not merely the subject of the songs: it is their medium. It is used to speak of everything from love to politics and agriculture.

Hindi, Sanskrit-derived expressions and local Bajjika words coexist in the poet's language. This mixture should not be judged solely by a standard of linguistic "purity"; it also bears witness to the multilingual life of twentieth-century northern Bihar.

Hindi, Sanskritised words and Bajjika forms appear together. Rather than measure this only against "purity," we should see it as part of the history of a multilingual region in the twentieth century.

12. Metre, Rhythm, Refrain and Sound · 12. Rhythm, Refrains and Sound

The songs do not all follow a uniform classical metre. Their strength lies in oral rhythm, repetition, roughly balanced lines, rhyme, refrain and vocal movement. Many closing lines return in performance, creating the form's musical backbone.

Their real metre is in speech and melody. Not all follow a single scheme of classical syllabic weight; repetitions such as rah-rah, chal-chal, kuhukī-kuhukī and āyel-āyel create rhythm and momentum.

Repetitions such as rah-rah, chal-chal, kuhukī-kuhukī and āyel-āyel are striking in the work's sound organisation. Sound conveys not only sense but also bodily movement and energy.

In many songs the final line returns again and again. Sung aloud it becomes a refrain, helps memorisation and intensifies feeling.

In a few places the inequality of metrical quantities is noticeable on the printed page, though the sung melody may well restore the balance. The collection's rhythmic strength must be assessed with its performance context in view.

Syllabic quantities sometimes look unequal in writing, but the collection relies principally on folk rhythm. Its musical qualities cannot properly be judged by written prosody alone.

13. Images, Symbols and the Folk World

The main symbols of the work—the moon, eyes, flowers, river, Yamuna, clouds, wind, cuckoo, field, courtyard, flute, anklets, the sari's end and Phagun—are familiar objects of ordinary life. Their familiarity allows them to communicate feeling directly.

The principal images—moon, eyes, flowers, river, Yamuna, clouds, wind, cuckoo, field, courtyard, flute, anklets, sari and Phagun—come from everyday popular life. This familiarity gives their meanings immediate accessibility.

The moon signifies bodily beauty; the river, separation and movement; the field, work and livelihood; the courtyard, the domestic world; the pathway, both society's gaze and life's journey; and Phagun, unrestrained festivity. The symbols bind emotional states to local geography.

The moon evokes beauty, the river absence and flow, the field labour and sustenance, the courtyard the household, the path both public scrutiny and the course of life, and Phagun festive freedom. These familiar symbols create the work's shared folk universe.

14. A Feminist Perspective: Achievements and Limitations · 13. Women: Tradition and Their Own Voices

Female characters have a wide presence in the collection: the beloved, wife, heroine, woman waiting for a migrant husband, rural young woman, member of a working family and participant in domestic life. Their many roles bring women's feelings into the songs' emotional centre.

Women appear in many forms: Radha, lover, wife, the woman awaiting a husband abroad, the woman working at home or in the field, the beautifully adorned young woman and the woman in distress. Their presence extends throughout the book.

Critical scrutiny nevertheless shows that some love songs view women from the outside, concentrating on eyes, hair, complexion, gait and bodily appearance. The singer's standpoint may thus be determined by a male gaze, even where the woman's own grief finds expression elsewhere.

In several love songs the woman's exterior appearance dominates. Yet in songs of the heroine's suffering she has her own questions, grief, complaints and resistance. A feminist interpretation must account for both tendencies.

15. The Work as a Social Document · 14. The Book as a Social Document

Published around 2000, this book is valuable for understanding the social and cultural outlook of rural northern Bihar. Its songs do not concern love and seasons alone: migration, unemployment, inflation, elections, public administration, poverty, farming and gender are also recorded.

Alongside love and nature, Bajjika Gīt-Saṅgīt writes about the society of its time. Migration, inflation, elections, governance, poverty, fields, wages and unemployment enter the songs as living concerns.

For this reason its value is not merely aesthetic but also cultural and archival. It brings language, popular experience and the social concerns of an era together in one body of song.

The book's importance exceeds the category of "beautiful songs." It is a document of the language, feelings, social concerns and cultural memory of the Bajjika region.

In this sense, the book acts as a bridge between folk tradition and modern popular consciousness.

Thus it connects inherited popular forms with modern forms of public awareness.

16. Artistic Achievements · 15. The Book's Principal Achievements

Establishing Bajjika confidently as a singable literary language.

Creating an extensive world of 105 singable compositions in Bajjika.

Organising 105 songs into nine thematic sections to create a broad emotional world.

Extending the themes from Krishna and love to poverty, politics, farming and spring.

Effective use of folk rhythm, refrains, repetition and natural rhyme.

Effective use of folk melody, refrains, repetition and simple rhyme.

Extending the range of themes from Krishna and love to politics, poverty and agriculture.

Vivid images of village, courtyard, river, field, waterplace, migration and women's experience.

Memorable depictions of village women's experience, migration, fields, weather and community life.

The courage to undertake contemporary social and political criticism in a vernacular language.

The courage to express modern democratic and social criticism through the people's language.

The book's evident confidence in Bajjika as a literary language.

17. Limitations · 16. The Book's Limitations

Excessive repetition of images such as moon, eyes, flowers, beauty and anklets in some songs.

Some love songs repeat images of moon, eyes, flowers and beauty too often.

At points the statement of a political argument overwhelms poetic ambiguity.

Some political songs come closer to speeches than to poetry.

The balance of syllabic quantities is not always uniform under classical metrical rules; the collection principally relies upon folk rhythm.

Syllabic balance is uneven in places, and the songs depend more on popular melody.

Some erotic passages give undue prominence to the outward description of women's beauty.

In a few places the emphasis on feminine beauty remains chiefly external.

The initial claims about linguistic history require independent linguistic evidence for verification.

The claims made at the beginning about the history of the language need separate, independent linguistic verification.

18. Overall Evaluation · 17. Overall Evaluation

The literary importance of Bajjika Gīt-Saṅgīt lies in establishing Bajjika not merely as the language of collected folklore but as a medium for contemporary creative writing, love, satire, social criticism, pathos and public consciousness. The songs demonstrate its ability to represent a modern social world.

The book's real achievement is to make Bajjika a literary language capable of expressing love, devotion, suffering, laughter, resistance, poverty, farming and national concern alike. Its compass is wider than the preservation of folklore.

The weakest moments occur when argument becomes a direct slogan or instruction, but this weakness is linked to the period's aspiration to create songs for the people. Taken as a whole, the book is better understood as a broad cultural intervention than as a uniformly accomplished set of lyrics.

At certain points instruction and slogans diminish artistic subtlety. Yet viewed in the context of the entire book, the limitation belongs to its larger social aims. It should not obscure the collection's contribution to Bajjika literature.

Its lasting achievement is not simply to collect popular sensibilities in Bajjika but to establish them as materials for contemporary literary expression.

The book's enduring accomplishment is to place Bajjika's popular feelings into a contemporary literary form rather than merely store them as items of folklore.

Part Three: A Broader Historical, Cultural and Linguistic Context for Bajjika Literature

The Bajjika language and its folk literature, nurtured within an extensive geographical and cultural world, carry what the author regards as an extraordinarily rich and ancient tradition of the Indian subcontinent. Spoken in Muzaffarpur, Vaishali, Sitamarhi, Sheohar and parts of Samastipur in Bihar, as well as in Nepal's Terai, especially the districts of Rautahat and Sarlahi, Bajjika has been classified by some linguists as a "western dialect of Maithili." The source cites the 2001 census as recording approximately 11.5–11.8 million speakers in India and about 238,000 in Nepal. Despite this large population base, the language is described as struggling for survival without adequate institutional support. In this setting, the book Bajjika Gīt-Saṅgīt, edited by Dr Rameshwar Prasad and published in Muzaffarpur by Kishore Prakashan in 2000, represents an important undertaking in recording and preserving folk literature.

The Bajjika language and its folk literature, nurtured within an extensive geographical and cultural world, carry what the author regards as an extraordinarily rich and ancient tradition of the Indian subcontinent. Spoken in Muzaffarpur, Vaishali, Sitamarhi, Sheohar and parts of Samastipur in Bihar, as well as in Nepal's Terai, especially the districts of Rautahat and Sarlahi, Bajjika has been classified by some linguists as a "western dialect of Maithili." The source cites the 2001 census as recording approximately 11.5–11.8 million speakers in India and about 238,000 in Nepal. Despite this large population base, the language is described as struggling for survival without adequate institutional support. In this setting, the book Bajjika Gīt-Saṅgīt, edited by Dr Rameshwar Prasad and published in Muzaffarpur by Kishore Prakashan in 2000, represents an important undertaking in recording and preserving folk literature.

The principal purpose of this critical article is to assess Dr Rameshwar Prasad's book against the multiple criteria of literature, sociology, psychology and linguistics. Alongside the literary review, it proposes a multidimensional programme of scientific research into the Bajjika language and its folk literature, intended as a guide for future researchers.

The principal purpose of this critical article is to assess Dr Rameshwar Prasad's book against the multiple criteria of literature, sociology, psychology and linguistics. Alongside the literary review, it proposes a multidimensional programme of scientific research into the Bajjika language and its folk literature, intended as a guide for future researchers.

The Historical Development of Bajjika Literature and Dr Rameshwar Prasad's Contribution · The History of Bajjika Literature and Dr Rameshwar Prasad

The source associates the origins of Bajjika with the ancient Vajji confederacy, centred upon Vaishali and regarded as one of the world's earliest republican polities. It traces the language's evolution through Magadhi Prakrit and Magadhi Apabhramsha, language stages also associated with the emergence of Maithili, Bhojpuri, Magahi, Angika, Bengali, Assamese and Odia. Historically, Prakrit is said to have been used for administration and Sanskrit for religious activity, enriching the vocabulary from both sources. Vidyapati's writings in Avahattha, notably Kīrtilatā, are presented as exceptionally close to the structure of contemporary Bajjika, a sign, in the author's view, that the language has preserved its earlier forms.

The source associates the origins of Bajjika with the ancient Vajji confederacy, centred upon Vaishali and regarded as one of the world's earliest republican polities. It traces the language's evolution through Magadhi Prakrit and Magadhi Apabhramsha, language stages also associated with the emergence of Maithili, Bhojpuri, Magahi, Angika, Bengali, Assamese and Odia. Historically, Prakrit is said to have been used for administration and Sanskrit for religious activity, enriching the vocabulary from both sources. Vidyapati's writings in Avahattha, notably Kīrtilatā, are presented as exceptionally close to the structure of contemporary Bajjika, a sign, in the author's view, that the language has preserved its earlier forms.

The history of Bajjika literature is presented as ancient and distinguished. Among its early authors is Gayadhar, said to have composed in 1045 CE, to have lived in Vaishali and to have travelled to Tibet to propagate Buddhism. A later work is Sudāmācaritra, a narrative poem written by Haldar Das in 1565 and treated here as representative of Bajjika. From around the turn of the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries, Mangniram's

Mangniram ki Sakhi, Ramsagar Pothi and Anmol Ratan—associated in the account with about 1815—are regarded as important inheritances. A renewal of Bajjika writing is traced from the middle and later twentieth century, when numerous scholars undertook the difficult work of recording literature that had survived in people's memories and voices. The authors and works involved in that renewal warrant careful examination.

A Selection of Bajjika Writers and Works

Writer / editor	Major work or book	Publication year and publisher	Literary genre
Dr Rameshwar Prasad	Bajjika Gīt-Saṅgīt; Bajjika Lokgīt; Bajjika Swar Saṅgam	2000; Kishore Prakashan, Muzaffarpur	Collection of folk songs
Nirmal Milind	Gitiyā; Tarhāttī Par Taregan; Khissā Pehānī	1984 and 1999; All India Bajjika Literary Conference	Novella, songs and poetry, fiction
Prafulla Kumar Singh ‘Mani’	Bajjika Sahitya ka Itihas	1995; Hansraj Prakashan, Muzaffarpur	Literary history
Dr Awadheshwar Arun	Bajjika Rāmāyaṇa	Not stated	Epic
Chandra Kishore Shwetanshu	Injurī Bhar Sinhorvā	1977; Samiksha Prakashan, Sitamarhi	Collection of songs and poems
Yogendra Rai	Bajjika Vyākaraṇa	1987; Shailesh Bhushan, Hajipur	Grammar

The history of Bajjika literature is presented as ancient and distinguished. Among its early authors is Gayadhar, said to have composed in 1045 CE, to have lived in Vaishali and to have travelled to Tibet to propagate Buddhism. A later work is Sudāmācaritra, a narrative poem written by Haldar Das in 1565 and treated here as representative of Bajjika. From around the turn of the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries, Mangniram's Mangniram ki Sakhi, Ramsagar Pothi and Anmol Ratan—associated in the account with about 1815—are regarded as important inheritances. A renewal of Bajjika writing is traced from the middle and later twentieth century, when numerous scholars undertook the difficult work of recording literature that had survived in people's memories and voices. The authors and works involved in that renewal warrant careful examination.

Within this historical development, Dr Rameshwar Prasad plays the role not merely of a collector but of a guardian of cultural inheritance. In Bajjika Gīt-Saṅgīt, the songs of village farmers, workers and women, including people with little or no formal education, bring popular life vividly before us. While formally cultivated literature may privilege artifice and intellectuality, the folk songs discussed here seem to flow like a natural spring of emotional and musical beauty.

Within this historical development, Dr Rameshwar Prasad plays the role not merely of a collector but of a guardian of cultural inheritance. In Bajjika Gīt-Saṅgīt, the songs of village farmers, workers and women, including people with little or no formal education, bring popular life vividly before us. While formally cultivated literature may privilege artifice and intellectuality, the folk songs discussed here seem to flow like a natural spring of emotional and musical beauty.

Society in the Mirror of Folk Music: Musical Expressions of Ritual and the Life Cycle · Society, Rituals and the Musical Life Cycle

The fundamental spirit of a society lives in its folk songs. Bajjika songs, substantially represented in Bajjika Gīt-Saṅgīt, give musical expression to the entire human life cycle. Across Mithila and Tirhut, significant occasions in human life are traditionally marked by ritual and song. There is a rich repertoire for birth, upanayana or sacred-thread initiation, and marriage, among the life-cycle rites recognised in Indian tradition.

The fundamental spirit of a society lives in its folk songs. Bajjika songs, substantially represented in Bajjika Gīt-Saṅgīt, give musical expression to the entire human life cycle. Across Mithila and Tirhut, significant occasions in human life are traditionally marked by ritual and song. There is a rich repertoire for birth, upanayana or sacred-thread initiation, and marriage, among the life-cycle rites recognised in Indian tradition.

In an agricultural society, childbirth may signify both the continuity of the family and an increase in economic capacity; its joy is expressed through sohar and khelaunā songs. Yet these are not merely celebrations. Sociological and psychological reading reveals the pain of childbirth, life's victory over the fear of death, and the realities of family relations, including the teasing and conflicts between a husband's sister and his wife. By giving musical form to the physical and mental suffering of the woman in labour, society affords her a kind of psychological refuge.

In an agricultural society, childbirth may signify both the continuity of the family and an increase in economic capacity; its joy is expressed through sohar and khelaunā songs. Yet these are not merely celebrations. Sociological and psychological reading reveals the pain of childbirth, life's victory over the fear of death, and the realities of family relations, including the teasing and conflicts between a husband's sister and his wife. By giving musical form to the physical and mental suffering of the woman in labour, society affords her a kind of psychological refuge.

The songs of marriage rites are a crowning achievement of Bajjika folklore. From erecting the wedding canopy through worship at the altar, the application of vermilion, the kohbar chamber, songs of instruction and finally the daughter's departure, each rite has its distinctive song. The sorrow-laden songs of farewell employ comparisons and imaginative figures of extraordinary richness, sometimes difficult to match even in epics. The popular poet portrays the father as Lake Manasarovar, the mother-in-law as a brimming stepwell, the mother as the flowing Ganga and the husband as the rising sun. Such metaphors reveal the inventive powers of popular imagination and its sense that human relationships are at one with nature. In farewell songs, the father's tears bring floods to the Ganga, the mother's tears darken the sky, and the brother's tears soak his garment down to the feet. These hyperboles are deeply moving, capable of softening even a hardened heart. They show how deeply the idea of the daughter as another family's property can wound a woman in patriarchal society.

The songs of marriage rites are a crowning achievement of Bajjika folklore. From erecting the wedding canopy through worship at the altar, the application of vermilion, the kohbar chamber, songs of instruction and finally the daughter's departure, each rite has its distinctive song. The sorrow-laden songs of farewell employ comparisons and imaginative figures of extraordinary richness, sometimes difficult to match even in epics. The popular poet portrays the father as Lake Manasarovar, the mother-in-law as a brimming stepwell, the mother as the flowing Ganga and the husband as the rising sun. Such metaphors reveal the inventive powers of popular imagination and its sense that human relationships are at one with nature. In farewell songs, the father's tears bring floods to the Ganga, the mother's tears darken the sky, and the brother's tears soak his garment down to the feet. These hyperboles are deeply moving, capable of softening even a hardened heart. They show how deeply the idea of the daughter as another family's property can wound a woman in patriarchal society.

Nature, Agriculture and Labour Culture: Feminist Readings of Seasonal Songs and Jatsari · Nature, Farming and the Labour Culture of Songs

The Bajjika-speaking region depends heavily upon agriculture, and its folk literature therefore follows the rhythms of nature and the cycle of seasons. Seasonal change becomes an image of changing human emotion rather than a mere shift in weather. In Phagun and Chaitra, when the rabi crops are ready and nature seems in full bloom, Holi and Chaiti songs express celebration, sensual delight and earthly love. The affection of Radha and Krishna or Rama and Sita is often freed from a purely divine framework and recast as that of an ordinary farming couple.

The Bajjika-speaking region depends heavily upon agriculture, and its folk literature therefore follows the rhythms of nature and the cycle of seasons. Seasonal change becomes an image of changing human emotion rather than a mere shift in weather. In Phagun and Chaitra, when the rabi crops are ready and nature seems in full bloom, Holi and Chaiti songs express celebration, sensual delight and earthly love. The affection of Radha and Krishna or Rama and Sita is often freed from a purely divine framework and recast as that of an ordinary farming couple.

After the heat of Jeth, when the rains arrive, kajri and pāvas songs begin to resound. On the dark, cloud-filled nights of Sawan and Bhadon, a heroine waiting for her migrant husband may feel the night biting like a serpent. Yet the coolness of feeling in such songs descends like nectar upon people exhausted by struggle and labour. This identification of natural season and human love is presented as a distinguishing excellence of the Bajjika musical tradition.

After the heat of Jeth, when the rains arrive, kajri and pāvas songs begin to resound. On the dark, cloud-filled nights of Sawan and Bhadon, a heroine waiting for her migrant husband may feel the night biting like a serpent. Yet the coolness of feeling in such songs descends like nectar upon people exhausted by struggle and labour. This identification of natural season and human love is presented as a distinguishing excellence of the Bajjika musical tradition.

Work songs, particularly jatsari, sung while grinding grain on a handmill, and ropani, sung while transplanting rice, are invaluable elements of Bajjika folk literature. They ease labour but also articulate social realities. The friction of the grinding stones accompanies the woman's pain, conflict between mother-in-law and daughter-in-law, her precarious position within patriarchy, and remembered narratives of women seeking to preserve their dignity during historical invasions by Mughals and Turks. Feminist critical discourse analysis reveals that although male authority shapes the social order and popular sayings often portray women as weak or inferior, work songs such as jatsari create a protected space for women's quiet rebellion. In song they can raise their voices against their oppressors. Thus the source argues that a concern with women's resistance is not a recent import from the West but has long existed in the popular singing traditions of the region.

Work songs, particularly jatsari, sung while grinding grain on a handmill, and ropani, sung while transplanting rice, are invaluable elements of Bajjika folk literature. They ease labour but also articulate social realities. The friction of the grinding stones accompanies the woman's pain, conflict between mother-in-law and daughter-in-law, her precarious position within patriarchy, and remembered narratives of women seeking to preserve their dignity during historical invasions by Mughals and Turks. Feminist critical discourse analysis reveals that although male authority shapes the social order and popular sayings often portray women as weak or inferior, work songs such as jatsari create a protected space for women's quiet rebellion. In song they can raise their voices against their oppressors. Thus the source argues that a concern with women's resistance is not a recent import from the West but has long existed in the popular singing traditions of the region.

Marginalised Voices and Mythic Consciousness: Ballads and Environmental Criticism · The Marginalised and the Environment in Folk Narrative

Bajjika folklore is not confined to the rites of prosperous or high-status groups; it also gives forceful expression to marginalised, neglected and Dalit communities. Particularly important are the ballads of Dina and Bhadri, folk deities associated with the Musahar and other agricultural labouring castes. The two brothers are remembered as having struggled against feudal oppression and forced labour and as having sacrificed their lives. Their stories are popular in Mithila, the Bajjika region and Nepal's Terai, where they are sung as narratives of manukhdev, divinity embodied in human beings.

Bajjika folklore is not confined to the rites of prosperous or high-status groups; it also gives forceful expression to marginalised, neglected and Dalit communities. Particularly important are the ballads of Dina and Bhadri, folk deities associated with the Musahar and other agricultural labouring castes. The two brothers are remembered as having struggled against feudal oppression and forced labour and as having sacrificed their lives. Their stories are popular in Mithila, the Bajjika region and Nepal's Terai, where they are sung as narratives of manukhdev, divinity embodied in human beings.

An ecological reading of these ballads suggests that Dina and Bhadri are not merely heroes of a particular community but figures associated with environmental protection. Their struggle against feudal lords concerns rights over water bodies, ponds and forest resources. Powerful female characters, including Kama Mai and Somaro Dhani, are represented as defenders of agriculture, particularly rice cultivation. The environmental consciousness of this Dalit folk literature shows how Bajjika traditions embrace the mythic narratives, conflicts and relationships to nature of different social groups. Preserving and performing these ballads helps marginalised communities assert dignity and collective identity.

An ecological reading of these ballads suggests that Dina and Bhadri are not merely heroes of a particular community but figures associated with environmental protection. Their struggle against feudal lords concerns rights over water bodies, ponds and forest resources. Powerful female characters, including Kama Mai and Somaro Dhani, are represented as defenders of agriculture, particularly rice cultivation. The environmental consciousness of this Dalit folk literature shows how Bajjika traditions embrace the mythic narratives, conflicts and relationships to nature of different social groups. Preserving and performing these ballads helps marginalised communities assert dignity and collective identity.

An Analytical Study of Linguistic and Grammatical Relations between Bajjika and Central Maithili · A Comparison of Bajjika and Standard Maithili

A complete assessment of Bajjika Gīt-Saṅgīt requires a scientific understanding of its language and grammatical structure. Bajjika has been classified in linguistics as "Western Maithili" and is considered part of a broader Maithili dialect continuum. Nevertheless it differs in certain grammatical, phonological and morphological features from Central Maithili, commonly treated as the standard; linguists such as Abhishek Kumar Kashyap have studied these distinctions. The differences contribute to its recognisable regional linguistic identity.

A complete assessment of Bajjika Gīt-Saṅgīt requires a scientific understanding of its language and grammatical structure. Bajjika has been classified in linguistics as "Western Maithili" and is considered part of a broader Maithili dialect continuum. Nevertheless it differs in certain grammatical, phonological and morphological features from Central Maithili, commonly treated as the standard; linguists such as Abhishek Kumar Kashyap have studied these distinctions. The differences contribute to its recognisable regional linguistic identity.

For an objective linguistic analysis, the following table compares principal grammatical features of Bajjika and Central Maithili.

For an objective linguistic analysis, the following table compares principal grammatical features of Bajjika and Central Maithili.

Grammatical / Linguistic Feature	Bajjika (Western Maithili)	Central / Standard Maithili
First Person Pronoun	Commonly uses ham	Uses ham and also frequently mai / maĕ
Verb Agreement / Transitivity	The verb form can encode up to two discourse referents (for example, subject and object) simultaneously	Complex agreement can encode up to three referents (for example, subject, object and recipient)
Phonology	Distinct pronunciation of aspirated and unaspirated consonants; pervasive nasalisation	Uses aspiration, with a comparatively different and more restrained distribution of nasalisation
Syntax	SOV order, e.g. Rām ghar jā rahal hai / sōṭā bhutley gelai hin	Also SOV, but with different auxiliary verb forms
Honorifics	Verb forms change according to forms of address such as āp, ahā̃, tū	Highly elaborate honorific agreement depending on the social standing of speaker, addressee and third person
Consonant Gemination	Greater tendency towards gemination, e.g. /majjil/ and /hammar/	Gemination is present but phonologically different

Analysis of Bajjika vocabulary reveals a rich combination of tatsama words borrowed directly from Sanskrit, tadbhava forms evolved from earlier Indo-Aryan sources, and indigenous or local words. The last are understood here as words formed within popular local usage without a direct Sanskrit or foreign derivation. Rural workers and farmers, including people without formal schooling, use such expressions abundantly. Idioms such as “the belly swelling” (ḍhīṛ phulānā, to be pregnant) and “a poor man's wife is everybody's sister-in-law” (nimlā ke maugī sabke bhaujāī, meaning the poor person's dignity is an easy target of ridicule) reveal both the social realities and figurative richness of Bajjika speech.

Analysis of Bajjika vocabulary reveals a rich combination of tatsama words borrowed directly from Sanskrit, tadbhava forms evolved from earlier Indo-Aryan sources, and indigenous or local words. The last are understood here as words formed within popular local usage without a direct Sanskrit or foreign derivation. Rural workers and farmers, including people without formal schooling, use such expressions abundantly. Idioms such as “the belly swelling” (ḍhīṛ phulānā, to be pregnant) and “a poor man's wife is everybody's sister-in-law” (nimlā ke maugī sabke bhaujāī, meaning the poor person's dignity is an easy target of ridicule) reveal both the social realities and figurative richness of Bajjika speech.

The vocabulary used in Dr Rameshwar Prasad's Bajjika Gīt-Saṅgīt indicates that the boundary between Bajjika and Maithili is very narrow. At the same time, local vocabulary and verb forms give Bajjika a distinctive regional fragrance.

The vocabulary used in Dr Rameshwar Prasad's Bajjika Gīt-Saṅgīt indicates that the boundary between Bajjika and Maithili is very narrow. At the same time, local vocabulary and verb forms give Bajjika a distinctive regional fragrance.

Part Four: A Multidimensional Research Framework for Bajjika Folk Literature and Linguistics

Bajjika is the mother tongue of large populations in both Nepal and India. To protect it against the pressures of globalisation and modernity, and to establish its academic significance, collection alone is not enough. The songs assembled by Dr Rameshwar Prasad and the wider corpus of Bajjika oral literature must also be analysed scientifically, linguistically and sociologically. A detailed interdisciplinary research framework is therefore essential.

Bajjika is the mother tongue of large populations in both Nepal and India. To protect it against the pressures of globalisation and modernity, and to establish its academic significance, collection alone is not enough. The songs assembled by Dr Rameshwar Prasad and the wider corpus of Bajjika oral literature must also be analysed scientifically, linguistically and sociologically. A detailed interdisciplinary research framework is therefore essential.

1. Principal Research Objectives and Hypotheses · 1. Objectives and Hypotheses

Objective 1—Textual and thematic inquiry: identify and classify systematically the social, familial, gender-related and environmental themes embedded in the folk songs collected by Dr Rameshwar Prasad and other scholars.

Objective 1—Textual and thematic inquiry: identify and classify systematically the social, familial, gender-related and environmental themes embedded in the folk songs collected by Dr Rameshwar Prasad and other scholars.

Objective 2—Grammatical and linguistic mapping: compare the Bajjika vocabulary, verb forms, case markers and syntax used in the songs with Central Maithili, Bhojpuri and Magahi, and codify the distinctive grammatical regularities of Bajjika.

Objective 2—Grammatical and linguistic mapping: compare the Bajjika vocabulary, verb forms, case markers and syntax used in the songs with Central Maithili, Bhojpuri and Magahi, and codify the distinctive grammatical regularities of Bajjika.

Objective 3—Feminist and marginalised perspectives: decode representations of women's independence, patriarchal influence and the voices of marginalised groups, especially in jatsari, sohar and narrative ballads such as those of Dina and Bhadri.

Objective 3—Feminist and marginalised perspectives: decode representations of women's independence, patriarchal influence and the voices of marginalised groups, especially in jatsari, sohar and narrative ballads such as those of Dina and Bhadri.

Objective 4—Digital preservation and computational linguistics: develop means of preserving this endangered intangible cultural heritage digitally and create corpora suitable for natural language processing (NLP).

Objective 4—Digital preservation and computational linguistics: develop means of preserving this endangered intangible cultural heritage digitally and create corpora suitable for natural language processing (NLP).

2. Theoretical Framework

The research will be undertaken in the light of the following modern approaches.

The research will be undertaken in the light of the following modern approaches.

Feminist critical discourse analysis (FCDA): examine how women are represented in Bajjika folk songs and idioms. Are they depicted merely as dutiful daughters and wives, or do work songs also record their resistance to patriarchy?

Feminist critical discourse analysis (FCDA): examine how women are represented in Bajjika folk songs and idioms. Are they depicted merely as dutiful daughters and wives, or do work songs also record their resistance to patriarchy?

Ecocriticism: investigate the interrelationship of people and nature, the conservation of forests and the importance of water resources in seasonal songs, agricultural songs such as ropani, and the Dina–Bhadri ballads.

Ecocriticism: investigate the interrelationship of people and nature, the conservation of forests and the importance of water resources in seasonal songs, agricultural songs such as ropani, and the Dina–Bhadri ballads.

Sociolinguistics: study the relationship between language and society, particularly how Bajjika gives cultural identity to speakers in Vaishali, Muzaffarpur, Sitamarhi and Nepal's Terai, and how modern pressures are rendering the language vulnerable among younger generations.

Sociolinguistics: study the relationship between language and society, particularly how Bajjika gives cultural identity to speakers in Vaishali, Muzaffarpur, Sitamarhi and Nepal's Terai, and how modern pressures are rendering the language vulnerable among younger generations.

3. Research Methodology and Techniques · 3. Methodology

The investigation will proceed through four successive phases.

The investigation will proceed through four successive phases.

Phase One: Text Collection, Thematic Coding and Semantic Analysis · Phase One: Collection, Coding and Interpretation of Texts

Songs will first be gathered from primary sources including Dr Rameshwar Prasad's Bajjika Gīt-Saṅgīt and Bajjika Lokgīt, and Nirmal Milind's Tarahāttī Par Taregan.

Songs will first be gathered from primary sources including Dr Rameshwar Prasad's Bajjika Gīt-Saṅgīt and Bajjika Lokgīt, and Nirmal Milind's Tarahāttī Par Taregan.

They will be classified by occasion—life-cycle rites, seasons, labour and religion—and subjected to qualitative data analysis.

They will be classified by occasion—life-cycle rites, seasons, labour and religion—and subjected to qualitative data analysis.

Similes, metaphors and idioms in the songs will be identified and analysed for their cultural and figurative meanings.

Similes, metaphors and idioms in the songs will be identified and analysed for their cultural and figurative meanings.

Phase Two: Morphosyntactic and Phonological Analysis · Phase Two: Linguistic, Morphological and Syntactic Analysis

The songs' lexical verbs and auxiliaries will be examined in detail. The study will analyse aspirated sounds, nasalisation and consonant gemination, including phonological features that distinguish Bajjika from Maithili.

The songs' lexical verbs and auxiliaries will be examined in detail. The study will analyse aspirated sounds, nasalisation and consonant gemination, including phonological features that distinguish Bajjika from Maithili.

Honorific expressions and their grammatical effects will be studied in relation to social stratification. This requires examining power relations between speakers and listeners.

Honorific expressions and their grammatical effects will be studied in relation to social stratification. This requires examining power relations between speakers and listeners.

Phase Three: Ethnographic, Spatial and Historical Study · Phase Three: Fieldwork and Historical Ethnography

Fieldwork will compare the book's cultural references with contemporary life in the Tirhut region—particularly Muzaffarpur and Vaishali—and Nepal's Terai.

Fieldwork will compare the book's cultural references with contemporary life in the Tirhut region—particularly Muzaffarpur and Vaishali—and Nepal's Terai.

The historical influence of biraha, bidesiya and Ambapali, the celebrated courtesan of Vaishali, will be investigated. The relationship between Ramvriksha Benipuri's play Ambapali and Bajjika folk culture will be examined through historical evidence.

The historical influence of biraha, bidesiya and Ambapali, the celebrated courtesan of Vaishali, will be investigated. The relationship between Ramvriksha Benipuri's play Ambapali and Bajjika folk culture will be examined through historical evidence.

The similarities and differences between Bajjika songs and Bhikhari Thakur's Bidesiya tradition will be analysed.

The similarities and differences between Bajjika songs and Bhikhari Thakur's Bidesiya tradition will be analysed.

Phase Four: Digitisation, Language-Conservation Strategy and Corpus Building · Phase Four: Digital Preservation and Corpus Creation

In keeping with the objectives of the Central Institute of Indian Languages (CIIL) and the Bharatavani project, these written folk songs will be recorded in audio and audiovisual formats to establish a digital linguistic corpus.

In keeping with the objectives of the Central Institute of Indian Languages (CIIL) and the Bharatavani project, these written folk songs will be recorded in audio and audiovisual formats to establish a digital linguistic corpus.

Computational-linguistics methods will be used to design part-of-speech tagging for Bajjika vocabulary and to prepare a framework for a reliable trilingual Bajjika–Maithili–Hindi dictionary.

Computational-linguistics methods will be used to design part-of-speech tagging for Bajjika vocabulary and to prepare a framework for a reliable trilingual Bajjika–Maithili–Hindi dictionary.

4. Expected Outcomes and Academic Contributions · 4. Anticipated Results and Scholarly Value

The proposed research would do more than bring renewed attention to Dr Rameshwar Prasad's Bajjika Gīt-Saṅgīt as a literary work; it would also reinforce the cultural identity and dignity of more than ten million speakers in the Bajjika-speaking region, as the source estimates.

The proposed research would do more than bring renewed attention to Dr Rameshwar Prasad's Bajjika Gīt-Saṅgīt as a literary work; it would also reinforce the cultural identity and dignity of more than ten million speakers in the Bajjika-speaking region, as the source estimates.

It would demonstrate in academic settings that the range of human experience, philosophical depth and poetic beauty present in Bajjika songs are no less valuable than those of an established classical or written literature.

It would demonstrate in academic settings that the range of human experience, philosophical depth and poetic beauty present in Bajjika songs are no less valuable than those of an established classical or written literature.

For students and researchers of linguistics it would provide a dependable reference demonstrating that the relationship between Bajjika and Maithili involves not merely dialectal labels but continuous historical language development.

For students and researchers of linguistics it would provide a dependable reference demonstrating that the relationship between Bajjika and Maithili involves not merely dialectal labels but continuous historical language development.

For policymakers and educational institutions, including Bihar University at Muzaffarpur, it would supply a substantial basis for introducing Bajjika literature into undergraduate and postgraduate teaching.

For policymakers and educational institutions, including Bihar University at Muzaffarpur, it would supply a substantial basis for introducing Bajjika literature into undergraduate and postgraduate teaching.

Conclusion · Concluding Remarks

Bajjika Gīt-Saṅgīt, edited by Dr Rameshwar Prasad, is not merely a printed collection of folk songs. It is a historical document that gives words to the soil and climate of Tirhut and Mithila and to the beating hearts of their people. The pain of an aunt or sister-in-law turning the grinding stone, the restless yearning of a woman singing kajri amid the showers of Sawan, the joy that follows childbirth and its pain, and the tears of a daughter departing from her wedding pavilion all express experiences shared across humanity.

Bajjika Gīt-Saṅgīt, edited by Dr Rameshwar Prasad, is not merely a printed collection of folk songs. It is a historical document that gives words to the soil and climate of Tirhut and Mithila and to the beating hearts of their people. The pain of an aunt or sister-in-law turning the grinding stone, the restless yearning of a woman singing kajri amid the showers of Sawan, the joy that follows childbirth and its pain, and the tears of a daughter departing from her wedding pavilion all express experiences shared across humanity.

This research framework insists that folk literature should not be seen only as sentiment, old custom or the colourful pleasures of village life. It requires serious academic, linguistic, ecological and sociological analysis. Bajjika and its rich musical inheritance constitute an invaluable element of world literature, with the pulse of an entire era preserved in each page and each voice. Scientific research of the kind proposed could give Bajjika and the larger Maithili literary world a new, authoritative and dignified presence on the global stage. Protecting this intangible inheritance from disappearance and preserving it for future generations is a collective responsibility.

This research framework insists that folk literature should not be seen only as sentiment, old custom or the colourful pleasures of village life. It requires serious academic, linguistic, ecological and sociological analysis. Bajjika and its rich musical inheritance constitute an invaluable element of world literature, with the pulse of an entire era preserved in each page and each voice. Scientific research of the kind proposed could give Bajjika and the larger Maithili literary world a new, authoritative and dignified presence on the global stage. Protecting this intangible inheritance from disappearance and preserving it for future generations is a collective responsibility.

Extended Bibliography

This list includes books and printed volumes only, not journals, research papers, online sources or websites. Publication years and publishers are supplied where available; uncertain details have not been guessed. Foreign titles are given in Maithili translation in the source for the convenience of readers.

1. Primary Work, Bajjika Literature and Linguistic Sources

1. Rameshwar Prasad. Bajjika Gīt-Saṅgīt. Muzaffarpur: Kishore Prakashan, first edition, 2000.

2. Rameshwar Prasad. Bajjika Lokgīt. Muzaffarpur: Kishore Prakashan, 2000.

3. Rameshwar Prasad. Bajjika Swar Sangam. Muzaffarpur: Kishore Prakashan, 2000.

4. Nirmal Milind. Gītiyā. 1984.

5. Nirmal Milind. Tarahāttī Par Taregan: Bajjika Songs and Poems. 1999.

6. Nirmal Milind. Khissā Pehānī: A Collection of Representative Bajjika Stories. All India Bajjika Literary Conference, Secunderabad.

7. Prafulla Kumar Singh "Mani." Bajjika Sāhitya kā Itihās. Muzaffarpur: Hansraj Prakashan, 1995.

8. Yogendra Rai. Bajjika Vyākaraṇ. Hajipur: Shailesh Bhushan, 1987.

9. Yogendra Prasad Sinha. Bajjika kā Svarūp. Muzaffarpur: Bajjika Sansthan, 1997.

10. Avadheshwar Arun. Bajjika Rāmāyaṇ.

11. Chandra Kishore Shwetanshu. Injurī Bhar Siṅhorvā. Sitamarhi: Samiksha Prakashan, 1977.

12. Devendra Rakesh. Sāč Mẽ Āč Ki? Muzaffarpur: Ahilya Prakashan, 1970.

13. Siyaram Tiwari. Bajjika Bhāṣā aur Sāhitya. Patna: Bihar Rashtrabhasha Parishad, 1964.

14. Surendra Mohan Prasad, ed. Bajjika–Hindi Dictionary. All India Bajjika Literary Conference, 2000.

15. Vidyapati. Kīrtilatā.

16. Haldar Das. Sudāmācaritra.

17. Mangniram. Mangniram kī Sākhī.

18. Mangniram. Rāmsāgar Pothī.

19. Mangniram. Anmol Ratan.

20. Ramvriksha Benipuri. Ambāpālī.

21. Bhikhari Thakur. Bidesiyā.

2. Indian Poetics, Rasa, Dhvani, Vakrokti and Navya-Nyāya

22. Bharata Muni. Nāṭyaśāstra.

23. Anandavardhana. Dhvanyāloka.

24. Kuntaka. Vakroktijīvita.

25. Abhinavagupta. Abhinavabhāratī: Commentary on the Nāṭyaśāstra.

26. Mammata. Kāvyaprakāśa.

27. Vishvanatha Kaviraja. Sāhityadarpaṇa.

28. Gangesha Upadhyaya. Tattvacintāmaṇi.

3. Western Criticism, Social Theory, Orality and Performance

29. Karl Marx. Capital, Volume One. Hamburg: Otto Meissner, 1867.

30. Louis Althusser. Lenin and Philosophy and Other Essays. London: New Left Books, 1971.

31. Antonio Gramsci. Selections from the Prison Notebooks. Edited by Quintin Hoare and Geoffrey Nowell Smith. New York: International Publishers, 1971.

32. Gayatri Chakravorty Spivak. A Critique of Postcolonial Reason: Toward a History of the Vanishing Present. Cambridge, Massachusetts: Harvard University Press, 1999.

33. Mikhail Bakhtin. Problems of Dostoevsky's Poetics. Edited by Caryl Emerson. Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press, 1984.

34. Walter J. Ong. Orality and Literacy: The Technologizing of the Word. London: Methuen, 1982.

35. Albert B. Lord. The Singer of Tales. Cambridge, Massachusetts: Harvard University Press, 1960.

36. Paul Zumthor. Oral Poetry: An Introduction. Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press, 1990.

37. Cleanth Brooks. The Well Wrought Urn: Studies in the Structure of Poetry. New York: Harcourt Brace, 1947.

38. Richard Bauman. Verbal Art as Performance. Rowley, Massachusetts: Newbury House, 1977.

39. Greg Garrard. Ecocriticism. London: Routledge, 2004.

40. William Labov. Sociolinguistic Patterns. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1972.

41. Norman Fairclough. Language and Power. London: Longman, 1989.

47. Kuṇḍaliyā in Laldas's Mithila Ramayana and Metrical Breaks Introduced through Editorial or Proofreading Ignorance

Abstract

Understand that about ninety-five per cent of the work is in chaupāī, while the remaining portion uses metres such as rūpmālā and gītikā. I am concerned here, however, with the kuṇḍaliyā. Although this metre occurs only rarely, it has impressed me deeply. The character of kuṇḍaliyā resembles that of the rubāī, and anyone who has read the quatrains of Omar Khayyam may come to love it.

Keywords: Laldas · Mithila Ramayana · kuṇḍaliyā · doha · rola · quantitative metre · broken metre · textual criticism

1

Doha

Rola

Kundaliya

2

Kundaliya Doha (Maithili Akademi edition)

Seeing Vibhishana in distress, Raghunayak, abode of compassion,

Granted him the royal estate in token of his pledge; keep the mind absorbed at his feet.

Keep the mind absorbed at his feet, protector of the lowly and the destitute;

Kind to those who seek refuge, the merciful one who dispels Lal's sorrows.

Even guardians of the world, Yama and Time, tremble at the sight of his unfailing arrows;

He is Lord Raghunayak, who frees all the worlds from sorrow. [1]

The tale of Raghupati destroys evil; merely hearing it banishes sorrow;

The Lord remains gracious to his devotees and fulfils their wishes.

He fulfils their wishes and always protects them from the cruel;

He increases their wealth, family, victory, glory, fortune and happiness.

He saves them from desire and its companions and bestows undying devotion;

The Ganga, called Aghayāśinī here, removes all their sin and suffering. [2]

Why should the mind, that moon-loving bird, forever taste the burning coals of worldly objects?

Better worship Sita and Rama, and eat the nectar of the fruit of action.

Take the fruit as nectarous food, laying aside the burden of the world;

The devotee attains the supreme Brahman, breaking the fetters of becoming.

Even the fallen may find a way and proper happiness wherever they remain;

Know your own certain good; the other pleasures of worldly objects are unfitting. [3]

O bird of the mind, why suffer so much inside the cage of worldly existence?

Hold fast, says Lal, to the sheltering tree of the Lord's feet if you seek happiness.

Find shelter beneath that tree and sing Rama's story every day;

There is no better means for protection, welfare and salvation.

Countless sinners have crossed the ocean of existence without pausing for a moment;

Sing the story of Hari according to your capacity, keeping the mind single. [4]

The text above is taken from the edition published by the Maithili Akademi.

3

Counting Quantitative Metre

Let us consider Maithili pronunciation, the rules of reading, and the distinction between short and long vowels.

Learn the distinction between guru (heavy) and laghu (light) syllables in classical prosody.

Among the thirteen vowels, a, i, u, ṛ and ḷ are described as short, and ā, ī, ū, ṝ (printed thus in the source), e, ai, o and au as long. When a vowel is joined to a consonant, a syllabic written character (guṇitākṣara) is formed: k + a = ka; k + ā = kā. A vowel or a consonant joined to a vowel constitutes a syllable; an isolated consonant does not. Thus avāk has two syllables, a and vā. (1) All short vowels and syllables formed with them are light (laghu), signified by U. (2) All long vowels and syllables formed with them are heavy (guru), signified by a short horizontal stroke above. (3) Syllables with anusvāra or visarga are heavy. (4) A syllable followed by a conjunct consonant or an isolated consonant is counted as heavy; in ac and satya, the syllables a and sa are heavy in this account.

Having said that anusvara and visarga make a syllable heavy, we must now add that a short vowel together with chandrabindu is counted as short.

That is: chandrabindu + short vowel = one mātrā.

Conjunct consonants: here the quantitative units are counted as follows.

kti = k + t + i = 0 + 0 + 1 = 1.

ktī = k + t + ī = 0 + 0 + 2 = 2.

kṣa = k + ṣa = 0 + 1.

tra = t + ra = 0 + 1.

jña = j + ña = 0 + 1.

śra = ś + ra = 0 + 1.

sra = s + ra = 0 + 1.

śṛ = ś + ṛ = 0 + 1.

tva = t + va = 0 + 1.

ttva = t + t + va = 0 + 0 + 1.

Short vowel + avagraha (ऽ) = 1 + 0.

The bikārī sign should not be used after a or a long vowel: forms such as dia′, ā′ and o′ are defective. It can, however, follow a consonant plus short a.

Short vowel + chandrabindu = 1 + 0.

Long vowel + chandrabindu = 2 + 0.

For example, hãsal = 1 + 1 + 1.

Sā̃s = 2 + 1.

The bikārī sign and chandrabindu are assigned zero additional units.

Jā ka′ = 2 + 1.

k (the bare consonant) = 0.

ka = k + a = 0 + 1.

Since a tendency has arisen in Maithili to pronounce ka as bare k, the bikārī sign became necessary; there is no comparable need with long vowels.

U denotes a short syllable.

— denotes a long or heavy syllable.

One long unit (—) equals two short units (U + U).

4

Broken Metre

Let us now examine all four kuṇḍaliyās in Laldas's Mithila Ramayana. A disruption of metre is readily apparent. Surely Laldas himself would not have written defective metre. There is no obvious typing error here, however. The fault may therefore lie with a Maithili Akademi editor or proofreader unfamiliar with quantitative scansion who altered the text to standardise spelling, inadvertently damaging the metre. Ramdev Jha, editor of the Sahitya Akademi edition of Laldas's Ramayana, claimed that his text did not contain such metrical disruptions. In response to accusations that he had altered the original wording, he argued that his accusers did not understand quantitative metre. He claimed that his departures from the received text served to repair metrical defects. If Laldas wrote in the kuṇḍaliyā form, editors ought at least to know enough to recognise that giving a passage the heading "Kundaliya" is insufficient without preserving the metre itself. In Ramdev Jha's opinion, the Sahitya Akademi edition of Laldas's Ramayana should be regarded as the definitive text. Now consider that version.

Laldas's Kundaliya, Edited by Ramdev Jha (Sahitya Akademi)

Kundaliya Doha

> Seeing Vibhishana in distress, Raghunayak, abode of compassion,
> Granted him the royal estate in token of his pledge; keep the mind absorbed at his feet.
> Keep the mind absorbed at his feet, protector of the lowly and the destitute;
> Kind to those who seek refuge, the merciful one who dispels Lal's sorrows.

Even guardians of the world, Yama and Time, tremble at the sight of his unfailing arrows;
He is Lord Raghunayak, who frees all the worlds from sorrow. [1]
The tale of Raghupati destroys evil; merely hearing it banishes sorrow;
The Lord remains gracious to his devotees and fulfils their wishes.
He fulfils their wishes and always protects them from the cruel;
He increases their wealth, family, victory, glory, fortune and happiness.
He saves them from desire and its companions and bestows undying devotion;
The Ganga, called Aghanāśinī here, removes all their sin and suffering. [2]
Why should the mind, that moon-loving bird, forever taste the burning coals of worldly objects?
Better worship Sita and Rama, and eat the nectar of the fruit of action.
Take the fruit as nectarous food, laying aside the burden of the world;
The devotee attains the supreme Brahman, breaking the fetters of becoming.
Even the fallen may find a way and proper happiness wherever they remain;
Know your own certain good; the other pleasures of worldly objects are unfitting. [3]
O bird of the mind, why suffer so much inside the cage of worldly existence?
Hold fast, says Lal, to the sheltering tree of the Lord's feet if you seek happiness.
Find shelter beneath that tree and sing Rama's story every day;
There is no better means for protection, welfare and salvation.
Countless sinners have crossed the ocean of existence without pausing for a moment;
Sing the story of Hari according to your capacity, keeping the mind single. [4]

In fact there is very little difference between the Maithili Akademi text and this one: mostly case endings and two words have been joined or separated at a few places. In the last line of the second kuṇḍaliyā, the form Aghayāśinī has been changed to Aghanāśinī.

Gokarna in Karnataka lies by the Gangavali and the stream named Adhanāśinī in the source. In the line "the Ganga removes all their sins and suffering," the author argues that the form Adhanāśinī is appropriate, not Aghanāśinī (written Aghnāsini in this discussion), which he considers a possible typing error. This distinction and spelling are retained as stated in the original discussion.

Although the claim to have repaired the broken metre has not been substantiated, an effort has been made to use the appropriate word. For this reason the Sahitya Akademi text seems preferable to the Maithili Akademi edition.

48. The First Pattern (Repetition) Poetry and Shape or Concrete Poetry in Maithili

Abstract

Poetry composed with a recurring pattern of line lengths is pattern poetry. It is a verse form organised around repetition. The repeated element need not be a sound; it may simply be the length of the lines.

Keywords: pattern poetry · repetition · shape poetry · concrete poetry · visual verse · experimentation

1

Pattern (Repetition) Poetry

Poetry written according to a pattern of line lengths is pattern or repetition poetry.

What is the metre of lines?

It is verse made with recurring arrangements. Repeated sounds are not necessary; the lengths of successive lines recur according to a pattern.

Example

Going, going
Going, going I travel to a far-off land from which I cannot return.
Many times before I have come back to this place.
I thought the road was only half the distance.
When I returned,
It was to depart once again towards a distant place,
To a country so far away that return was impossible.
Whoever tries to come back will tire halfway through half the road;
And whoever goes on will find the road disappearing.
I will leave behind no pathway and no
Familiar sign,
Nor abandon even a little hope.
The track after the halfway point, scrambling and breaking through,
And I, advancing as the vanishing road accomplished its work.
One task will now begin all over again,
With a new atmosphere and new people,

An experiment upon an experiment
May yield some unforeseen result,
Or push me still farther into that distant land;
And I shall not return again to my former country,
Where the old frightened people will no longer remain,
Nor the old and familiar trees and plants.
Proof of a consequence
Seems to have turned away from me.
New people and new trees and plants in this country,
No familiar sign, no hope, and no recognisable path.
2.

Shape or Concrete Poetry

Unlike pattern poetry, this kind of poem assumes the form of a visible shape. Instead of merely repeating line lengths, it places words into an image. The example below is arranged like a tree.

A Familiar Sign of Vanishing Hope
Seeing
Trees on both sides,
Moving alongside the road,
The shade of the trees deepens;
I think my recognition will grow denser and more certain, yet
T
H
I
C
K
E
N
I
N
G
Darkness grows thick and close,
The familiar signs of my hope disappear.

49. The Round-Necked Mahākavi Vidyāpati of the Padāvalī Before Jyotirīśvara, and the Turbaned Vidyāpati Ṭhakkura of Sanskrit and Avahaṭṭha After Jyotirīśvara: Two Traditions

Abstract

Vidyāpati's Sanskrit works bear the attribution 'composed by Ṭhakkura Vidyāpati', and that Vidyāpati was a Brahmin. My concern is with the Vidyāpati of Maithili. I have discussed why a turban was placed upon his head and he was appropriated as 'our Vidyāpati'. This did not happen when non-Brahmin communities kept him alive for eight hundred years through the Bidāpat dance. It happened when Bengal claimed both Vidyāpati and Govindadās as its own, and when the Bengali scholar Rājkrishna Mukhopādhyāy was the first to say that Vidyāpati was a poet of Mithila's language, while Nagendranāth Gupta of Bengal first said that Govindadās too was a poet of that language. When these facts came to light, Bengal at first rose in furious opposition and subsequently accepted them.

Keywords: Jyotirīśvara; Vidyāpati; padāvalī; Avahaṭṭha; Sanskrit; parallel tradition; literary history

.....

Let us come to the central question. I have no doubt that the many Vidyāpatis who served as royal pandits or in religious offices—one of them also the son of a devadāsī—were Brahmins. But I am speaking not of Vidyāpati Ṭhakkura and his Kīrtilatā and Kīrtipatākā; I am speaking of the Vidyāpati Padāvalī. Let us keep the distinction clear. Consider the Bidāpat tradition sung by non-Brahmins. Its poet, I suggest, belonged to a barber caste and preceded Jyotirīśvara: evidence lies in the reference to this poet and his work in Jyotirīśvara's Varṇa-ratnākara.

Mahādeva was originally a deity of non-Brahmin communities and was gradually adopted by Brahmins. Nowhere in the poems of the Padāvalī does Vidyāpati refer to himself as a Sanskrit or Avahaṭṭha author. Above all, why does the sympathy for the dispossessed found in these poems not appear in the Sanskrit and Avahaṭṭha works of the other Vidyāpati, the Brahmin? Let us consider examples.

Mahākavi Vidyāpati

The earliest poet of Maithili, anterior to the poet-scholar Jyotirīśvara (c. 1275–1350), because Jyotirīśvara mentions him in his work. He is distinct from Vidyāpati Ṭhakkura, the Sanskrit and Avahaṭṭha writer.

Possibly the son of Śrī Maheś Ṭhakkura, of the barber caste, from Bisphī village.

The Vidyāpati Padāvalī has been danced and dramatised in Bidāpat performances of the parallel tradition since before Jyotirīśvara.

Vidyāpati Ṭhakkura (1350–1435), of the Bisphī–Kāśyapa branch of the Viṣaiwār lineage, was a court poet of King Śivasiṃha and an author in Sanskrit and Avahaṭṭha. His enduring works include Kīrtilatā, Kīrtipatākā, Puruṣaparīkṣā, Gorakṣavijaya, Likhanāvalī and many others. He is not, in this account, the same person as Maithili's earlier Vidyāpati.

Bodhi Kāyastha

Vidyāpati Ṭhakkura describes Bodhi Kāyastha's attainment of the Ganges (gaṅgālābha) in Puruṣaparīkṣā. The same story circulated about Mahākavi Vidyāpati, author of the pre-Jyotirīśvara Maithili Padāvalī; subsequently it came to be associated with Vidyāpati Ṭhakkura, the Sanskrit and Avahaṭṭha author.

Ugnā Mahādeva

Mahādeva, in the form of Ugnā, stayed with Vidyāpati as a servant so that he could hear his songs. The legend became attached to both Maithili's pre-Jyotirīśvara founding poet and Vidyāpati Ṭhakkura, the Sanskrit and Avahaṭṭha author at King Śivasiṃha's court.

2

'Mithila Sanskritik Parishad's Investiture of Vidyāpati with the Sacred Thread and the Ceremonial Pāg'

The Mithila Sanskritik Parishad and associates such as Kishorikānt Miśra either failed to understand—or did not wish to understand—the difference between the Sanskrit-Avahaṭṭha Vidyāpati Ṭhakkura and the poet celebrated as the cuckoo of Maithili. Written historical evidence, I maintain, places Gonu Jhā in 1050–1150; yet Uṣā Kiran Khān makes him debate the Sanskrit-Avahaṭṭha Vidyāpati in her Hindi historical novel Sirjanhār (published by Bharatiya Jnanpith). Vīrendra Jhā says Gonu Jhā lived five hundred years ago, while Tārānand Viyogī places him three hundred years ago—their Hindi books on Gonu Jhā appeared respectively from Rajkamal Prakashan and the National Book Trust. In Vibhā Rānī's Hindi book on Gonu Jhā (Vani Prakashan), Kunal puts him in the reign of Bhav Siṃha, in the fourteenth century. Such is the situation even though the written genealogical register places Gonu Jhā ten generations before the Sanskrit-Avahaṭṭha Vidyāpati.

Had photographs of Jagdish Prasad Mandal not survived, Kishorikānt Miśra's reactionary Mithila Sanskritik Parishad would have invested him too with the sacred thread, placed a pāg upon his head, and repeated the very act it performed upon Vidyāpati a thousand years later. It would have pointed to some old earthen mound in Burma and proclaimed it the imaginary ancestral homestead of Jagdish Prasad 'Jhā/Ṭhakkura'.

The abuse hurled by Malangiyā's son, Ramdev Jhā's son and numerous pseudonymous persons has also appeared in Videha without expurgation, so that readers can judge for themselves. Only certain insults impossible to publish have been withheld. Fear of abuse is also why historians of Maithili and Mithila have hinted at this issue but never pursued it.

Thus, I argue, the poet was indeed the Vidyāpati who preceded Jyotirīśvara (1275–1350). The song-and-dance tradition of Jayadeva (c. 1200) and of kīrtaniyā performance accords with the pre-Jyotirīśvara Vidyāpati Padāvalī, not with the poetic form of Sanskrit-Avahaṭṭha Vidyāpati.

Let us return to the platform of the Mithila Sanskritik Parishad, from which Ramlochan Ṭhakkura made his statement in a manner suited to that platform. The Parishad did not perform Vidyāpati's sacred-thread ceremony: it performed Maithili's sacred-thread ceremony. With the pāg it placed on Vidyāpati, it erased Bindhyeśvar Maṇḍal and Śrīkānt Maṇḍal from Kolkata and completed the ritual appropriation of Maithili.

Consider some instances of caste orthodoxy in the Sanskrit-Avahaṭṭha Vidyāpati:

Kīrtilatā: marriage between castes and non-castes is condemned as base and transgressive.

In Puruṣaparīkṣā, Vidyāpati interrupts the narrative to make an authorial pronouncement that Rajput women lack character. This is comparable, I argue, to the statement in the Atharvaveda that someone may seize the wife of a Śūdra by the hand without her consent. The Sanskrit-Avahaṭṭha Vidyāpati lays special emphasis on caste and non-caste; purity of blood and caste matter greatly to him. He declares that a person of low birth deserves no mercy, and that beauty is the monopoly of the wealthy and privileged. He treats caste as the final determinant of social life and a person born into a bad lineage as no more than a snake with a vicious mind. He calls a country in which caste regulations are not enforced a land of mlecchas (see Upendra Thakur, Aspects of Society and Economy of Medieval Mithila). This is the Vidyāpati whom Kishorikānt Miśra's Mithila Sanskritik Parishad would dress in sacred thread and pāg.

'The great ancestors were all of my own caste.'
'Until the mālatī unfolds its bloom,
The bee cannot revel in its sweetness.'
And:
'What nectar could there be in an unopened bud?'

3

Phanishwarnath Renu wrote a reportage on Bidāpat dance that appeared in the weekly Vishvamitra on 1 August 1945. The account matters because it was written some seven hundred years after Jyotirīśvara's description of the subject, and records the parallel tradition that kept Vidyāpati alive through those centuries.

Yet Vidyāpati was unexpectedly wrested from the people who had sustained him. Bideśvar Ṭhakkura, singing Vidyāpati's songs and protesting that Brahmins had taken the poet by putting a pāg on him, died with that anguish. Kānungo Badri Prasad Ṭhakkura of Brahmapurā, Binod Ṭhakkura of Pokharbhīṛā, Saryug Ṭhakkura of Rudrapur, Jairām Ṭhakkura of Meṃhath, and the whole village of Bisphī still repeat the charge. Śāligrām Yādav and Avadhiyā Ṭhakkura bear witness to Bisphī's tradition. A host of fanciful arguments about Vidyāpati's birth and background accompanied this ritual appropriation, but scarcely a research paper even mentioned his parallel tradition. I dedicate this essay to the thousands who, like Bideśvar Ṭhakkura, kept Vidyāpati alive between the accounts of Jyotirīśvara and Phanishwarnath Renu.

Mithila's Śatapatha Brāhmaṇa Tradition and Its Parallel Tradition

Following Madhav Siṃha's 1760 order concerning the branch genealogical registers (śākhā-pañjī), a new cult of pedigree spread among Mithila's Brahmins and Kāyasthas. It produced the battesagamiyā or bhalmānas subdivision among Karṇa Kāyasthas and the śrotriya subdivision among Maithil Brahmins. According to this critique, physical and mental illness increased alarmingly in these groups, as did polygamy, child marriage and the number of widows. The speed and peacefulness of these changes were compatible with what was presented as the mainstream Śatapatha Brāhmaṇa tradition.

Views of Dineśvar Lāl Ānand and Rāmvṛkṣ Benīpurī on Vidyāpati

Dineśvar Lāl Ānand was misled. In those days the genealogical registers were confidential; in them the Bisphī branch of the Sanskrit-Avahaṭṭha Vidyāpati, identified as Viṣaiwār, had been classed as the lower-ranking Jaiwār. Branch registers did not exist before 1760; the evidence, I submit, is that the later generations of Ayāchi Miśra's original lineage appear both among Śrotriyas and within another Brahmin subdivision. It is rather like finding a bull but no cow depicted on the seals of the Indus Valley civilisation: how, one asks, could the bull have come into existence without the cow? Ānand lacked full access to the genealogical data. Perhaps, influenced by propaganda that identified the Padāvalī poet with the Sanskrit-Avahaṭṭha author, he thought the classification of Viṣaiwār Bisphī as Jaiwār could explain why Vidyāpati Ṭhakkura became a revolutionary by writing in Avahaṭṭha. Yet Ānand admits that there is neither a manuscript of the Padāvalī in Vidyāpati's own hand nor even evidence of a collection of those songs made in his lifetime. How is that possible, when the Sanskrit-Avahaṭṭha Vidyāpati opens and closes his books with expansive declarations about the kings, queens and patrons who inspired him and under whose protection he worked? He has a full authorial confidence, a command of both Sarasvatī and Lakṣmī. Why, then, is the Padāvalī silent? Ānand has no answer. The Sanskrit-Avahaṭṭha Vidyāpati writes about his patrons but says nothing of himself in those works. He even shows discomfort in writing Avahaṭṭha, then a literary language of the mainstream. But the pre-Jyotirīśvara Vidyāpati was so influential that he had to include Maithili songs in his Sanskrit drama Gorakṣavijaya—just as Jyotirīśvara, the earliest reporter of Bidāpat, had to include Maithili songs in his Sanskrit drama Dhūrttasamāgama.

Govind Jhā detects Vidyāpati's tradition in Jyotirīśvara's description of Bidāpat and even discusses it. Why, then, does he not pursue the possibility of the earlier Vidyāpati while Bideśvar Ṭhakkura is singing himself to death? How does the place at which Vidyāpati feels thirsty in a play become the playwright's own village? Everyone writes a play about 'our Vidyāpati' to serve a different claim.

Rāmvṛkṣ Benīpurī likewise lacked the evidence of the genealogical registers. From the construction of a subdivision and a legend he wrote derisively about Keśav Miśra's treatment of Vidyāpati. This Keśav Miśra, of the Dvaita Pariśiṣṭa, was a grandson of Vācaspati II (1400–1490). Another Keśav Miśra, who lived around 1150, wrote Tarkabhāṣā, which was reviewed in Tarkaprakāśa by Vardhamān, son of Gaṅgeśa, author of Tattvacintāmaṇi. Benīpurī advanced not a single step beyond the research Ananda Coomaraswamy had undertaken in 1915; nor, a century later, has another mainstream scholar done so. Benīpurī retells the Ugnā legend but is silent on whether Mahādeva would dance on Kailāsa to the orthodox Sanskrit-Avahaṭṭha Vidyāpati's Śaivasarvasvasāra or to the pre-Jyotirīśvara poet's nacārī songs. Like Coomaraswamy, he knows that a Bhāgavata in the Sanskrit-Avahaṭṭha Vidyāpati's hand exists and has heard how the Ganges absorbed Vidyāpati in his gaṅgālābha. Like Coomaraswamy, he has heard of Puruṣaparīkṣā without reading it; otherwise he would know that its Sanskrit-Avahaṭṭha author tells the gaṅgālābha story about Bodhi Kāyastha. That story, like the legend of Ugnā, circulated about the pre-Jyotirīśvara Vidyāpati and was later ritually attached to the other poet: the tale of Bodhi Kāyastha in Puruṣaparīkṣā is the evidence. Benīpurī even calls Kīrtipatākā a collection of Maithili songs. Is research done by hearsay? Why has an exhausted mainstream been unable to develop the foundation Coomaraswamy laid a century ago? Because the dominant Śatapatha-Brāhmaṇa orthodoxy does not permit it. Yet scholars assert without evidence that Purāditya, a friend of Śivasiṃha, was a Bhūmihār Brahmin, just as Ramānāth Jhā called Govindadās (Jhā) a Śrotriya (a claim Sukumar Sen found ridiculous), Ramdev Jhā pronounced him a Brahmin, and Vermaji, writing in the Laldās commemorative volume, pronounced Kālidāsa a Kāyastha.

The Sanskrit-Avahaṭṭha Vidyāpati frames the opening and closing of his books with ritual observances and the names of royal and other patrons, but not an account of himself. Why, then, did the Padāvalī remain on the people's lips rather than receive the elaborate bookish treatment he gave his other writings? Because its songs had been composed centuries before him, before the pāg came into use in Mithila. Names such as Rūpnārāyaṇ, Śivasiṃha, Lakhimā, Dev Siṃha, Har Siṃha, Padma Siṃha, Viśvās Dev, Arjun-Amar, Rāghav Siṃha, Rudra Siṃha, Dhīr Siṃha, Bhairav Siṃha and Chandra Siṃha were later inserted, audibly disturbing the rhythm of the songs. The Sanskrit-Avahaṭṭha Vidyāpati's Bhūparikramā (Dev Siṃha), Kīrtilatā (Kīrti Siṃha and Vīr Siṃha), Kīrtipatākā, Gorakṣavijaya (Śivasiṃha), Likhanāvalī (Purāditya) and Dānavākyāvalī (Queen Dhīrmatī) are manifestly court-sponsored works. Gorakṣavijaya, written for the worship of Bhairava, contains Maithili songs like those in Dhūrttasamāgama: another indication, in my view, of the earlier Vidyāpati's overwhelming influence. Had the names not differed, people would have identified Jyotirīśvara himself as the poet who preceded him.

Gaṅgeśa, author of Tattvacintāmaṇi, produced one work said to equal twelve thousand treatises. Professor Dinesh Chandra Bhattacharya writes in History of Navya-Nyāya in Mithila: 'The family which was inferior in social status is now extinct in Mithila... Gangesha's family is completely ignored and we are not expected to know even his father's name.' Bhattacharya says Professor R. Jhā (Ramānāth Jhā) supplied this information.

Now consider the genealogical records. They expressly state, I argue, that Gaṅgeśa was born five years after his father's death and married a woman of the leatherworking community. Why did Ramānāth Jhā conceal this information from Bhattacharya? A particular caste subdivision circulated the story of Gaṅgeśa's rise from fool to scholar and, I allege, conspired to erase him.

Gaṅgeśa's son Vardhamān called his father sukavi-kairava-kānana-induḥ, the moon shining upon the water lilies of good poetry. Under what scheme, then, have the poems of a scholar as renowned as Gaṅgeśa disappeared? The preceding examples, I contend, explain this. Vāsudeva of Bengal was a fellow-student of Pakṣadhar Miśra. He came to study in Mithila, passed the śalākā examination and earned the title Sārvabhauma. He memorised the verses of Gaṅgeśa's Tattvacintāmaṇi and Udayana's Nyāyakusumāñjali. Pakṣadhar and other teachers in Mithila would not permit the Tattvacintāmaṇi to be copied. Vāsudeva's disciple Raghunāth Śiromaṇi defeated his teacher Pakṣadhar Miśra in debate and obtained the right to demonstrate a proof. Vāsudeva and Raghunāth founded the Navya-Nyāya school at Navadvīpa. Pakṣadhar Miśra was a contemporary of the Sanskrit-Avahaṭṭha Vidyāpati. With Raghunāth, the arrival of Bengali students in Mithila ceased.

Grierson called the Bisphī copperplate that Śivasiṃha granted to the Sanskrit-Avahaṭṭha Vidyāpati a forgery. He was familiar with the Padāvalī and believed that its poet could not have received such a grant. The plate, however, had been bestowed upon the Sanskrit-Avahaṭṭha writer, a distinction Grierson did not consider. Mahāmahopādhyāya Haraprasad Shastri recognised the difference and regarded the copperplate as authentic.

Śrīdharadās's Saduktikarṇāmṛta includes the fisherman Kaivarta Papīhā's hymn to the Ganges and songs of Rādhā and Kṛṣṇa. Dhoyī, a weaver, was a court poet of Lakṣmaṇsen. Lakhimā Ṭhākurāin wrote verse in Sanskrit, not the Padāvalī (Grierson). A record of Śrīdharadās survives at Andhrāṭhāṛhī; he was a minister under Nānyadev and Gaṅgadev. His descendant Amiyakar was contemporary with the Sanskrit-Avahaṭṭha Vidyāpati. Upendra Thakur considers Gaṅgadev a Kalachuri. Vijay Kumar Thakur identifies the Vidyāpati song in Śrīdharadās's Saduktikarṇāmṛta with praise of the Kalachuri Karṇa. Rādhākṛṣṇa Chaudhary takes a different view. In any case, I argue, this Vidyāpati preceded Jyotirīśvara. In connection with the Rāmacarita and Vigrahapāla III's defeat of Karṇa, Rādhākṛṣṇa Chaudhary found two Pāla inscriptions at Naulāgaṛh, about sixteen kilometres north of Begusarai. That Karṇa, too, belongs to the eleventh century. Dhūrttasamāgama is famous in South India as well.

Appendix I

Phanishwarnath Renu

Vidyāpati of a Folk Song

Introduction

While researching Mahākavi Vidyāpati, I felt that a chapter ought to be called 'Vidyāpati, Poet of Cultivators, Field Labourers and Cart Drivers'. For in the Purnea–Saharsa region, even today there are troupes that sing the Padāvalī, act out its emotions and dance. Their leaders are generally buffalo riders, cowherds or drivers of bullock carts. I asked Maithil pandits about this.

'How did it happen?' They replied: 'What business are you getting into? It is because of these fools that Vidyāpati is in such a sorry state today.

Whenever these ordinary people fancy it, they add four more songs in Vidyāpati's name. You are being led astray.' Ignoring the prohibitions of Mithila's pandits, I gladly began preparations to visit Saharsa. Kanchīrā is a village governed by the district magistrates of two districts: half of it is in Saharsa, the other half in Purnea.

People in both districts speak of Kanchīrā's Vidyāpati troupe. On the day I arrived, a remarkable incident had occurred. A politician who had represented the area for ten years had been soundly defeated in an election. A night of singing and dancing might therefore be interpreted politically, and the troupe's leader, Janakdās, refused permission to perform.

The next night, after much entreaty, he relented. After lengthy argument, circling the point and repeating himself, Janakdās claimed that the Vidyāpati dance had first originated in his own family, but he would never say more. When he was satisfied that I had not come to extract a thousand or two thousand rupees from the government treasury in the troupe's name, he struck the mṛdaṅga. I watched the performance all night. A boy who grazed cattle put on a sari and became Rādhā, bereft of her beloved, and sang in tears: 'How many days must I pass without Hari, an abandoned woman all alone?' The next day I again asked Janakdās about the dance's origins. 'Who knows how long the hereditary lead-singing of this dance has passed down through my family?' he answered. What troubled him was my tape recorder: 'You secretly filled your tape with every song. Cleverly you got your work done for nothing, didn't you?' Even after I paid him fifty rupees, he would not tell me when or how cultivators, labourers, cowherds and cart drivers had begun singing and dancing to Vidyāpati's verses. I lay on the straw in Janakdās's shelter all day and felt he had no pity. His young widowed daughter spoke on my behalf, but he remained unmoved: 'You want to have the secrets that would make a laughing-stock of my family printed in the Gazette?' Old Janakdās untethered the oxen and went to graze them. I stayed in his shelter and then heard a tale—or dreamed a dream—or fell into some delusion. I cannot say which.

Appendix 2

Bidāpat Dance (original reportage by Phanishwarnath Renu; Maithili adaptation by Madhupnāth Jhā)

Bidāpat Dance

It is supposed that this dance originated in Darbhanga district. There is little need to describe its present condition in its own birthplace. Yet it is still valued in villages of certain North Bihar districts and in parts of Bhagalpur and Purnea. It has come to be regarded as a dance of the 'little people'; members of so-called polite society regard watching it as beneath them. But at weddings, tonsure ceremonies and other festivities among Musahars, Dhāṅgaṛs and Dusādhs, it remains an event of great excitement. Seven or eight performers take part, with only two instruments: the mṛdaṅga and the manjīrā cymbals.

Come, then, let us enjoy the Bidāpat dance, setting aside our respectability for a while.

Dhṛṅg dhā, dhṛṅg dhā, tinnā—the mṛdaṅga sounded until it seemed to speak. Kun kun kun kun—the cymbals joined it.

'Gaṇanāyakaṃ phaladāyakaṃ paṇḍitam patitam...' Do not laugh, all of you. That was the opening invocation, in pure Sanskrit.

Dhṛṅgā, dhṛṅgā, dhṛṅgā, dhṛṅgā—the mṛdaṅga began again.

Kinkāṃ, kinkāṃ, kinkāṃ, kinkāṃ—the manjīrā kept pace.

The dancers began circling the assembled musicians and spectators on every side. Behind them Bipatā spun like a top, contorting his face and crying, 'Oy, oy, oy, oy!'

Dhirināṅgī, dhirināṅgī, dhirināṅgī, dhirināṅgī. The mṛdaṅga changed rhythm and produced another strain. Kinkāṃ, kinkāṃ... Enough now! I have made you dance quite enough; the story of the dance can wait.

The dancers gathered in one place and swayed. Dhirināṅgi tintā, tiṭak-tiṭak dhā, tiṭakal gadagin dhā. The rhythmic sequence and the dance ended. The performers pulled their veils down and sat among the audience. Bipatā, who had been playing the clown, began looking for the dancers. Dhṛṅgā-dhṛṅgā...

'Dhin-tinak tinak, dhin tinak-tinak'—the mṛdaṅga sounded.

The accompanists joined their voices.

'Here enters the tenderest of maidens,

Walking like a swan, Vṛṣabhānu's darling...'

The dancers rose and approached Bipatā, who joyfully began crying, 'Oy, oy, oy, oy!'

'Dhin-tinak tinak, dhin-tinak tinak.'

'Ah, body and mind are stirred by the wind together,

The moon rises above the lightning...'

The dancers cast their veils aside. At the sight of their moon-like faces—close-shaven beards, moustaches and ungainly, peculiar features—the audience roared with laughter. One dancer looked down, shrinking and moving like a sensitive plant in a display of maidenly shyness. Bipatā tried to attract the dancer's attention.

'Ah, the bride smiles when she sees her beloved,

And turns her bashful face away...'

The dancer smiled and turned away, exposing teeth blackened by chewing tobacco. Please, ladies and gentlemen, be quiet. Yes, yes, these may be songs from Vidyāpati's Padāvalī, but what we are watching is the Bidāpat dance.

Stop talking about New Theatres, Vidyāpati, Kanan Bala and Pahari Sanyal. I am beginning the last musical phrase.

How often must I explain that this is the Bidāpat dance? That dancer, Ṭahalu Pāswān, had a father who was a notorious bandit. His father was sentenced to transportation across the black waters, his mother went off with another man, and he began dancing as a child. In his youth he was the sensation of the locality—a tremendous sensation. So irresistible were his gestures that Parbatiyā abandoned her settled household and ran away with him one night. Yes, Ṭahalu Pāswān could sing:

'When my charming lover comes into the courtyard,
I shall turn and walk away with the faintest smile;
Kānh will try a hundred ways to win me...'
Dhṛnnā dhṛṅgā, tinā-tinnā—the mṛdaṅga shifted to a new rhythm.
Kinnā-kinnā—the cymbals changed their beat too.
'My friend...
My friend, why do you ask what I have experienced?'
'Since the beginning of life I have gazed on beauty,
Yet even now I am not satisfied.'

'Hey, silence! Silence!' Bipatā angrily tried to stop them. One of the accompanists began twisting his towel into a whip. Bipatā complained that beating him would only waste time: his back had grown thick-skinned after years of blows from the landlord's shoes. He had interrupted merely to ask whose beauty the singer had been gazing upon all his life. Once persuaded that the song meant his own face, he was delighted; immediately he drew a little mirror from his pocket and proudly studied himself.

The song ended. Now it was Bipatā Mahādeva's turn.

'Hey, leader!'

'Hmm?'

'Listen to me now.'

'Oh, father!
Oh, father, what misery have I not endured?
For seven years I paid interest,
Yet still I was not free of debt.

Like a bullock turning the oil press I worked day and night,
Yet the obligations only grew.
I sold my plate to pay the revenue clerk,
My drinking vessel to pay the village watchman,
I sold my goat to pay the policeman—
And now I am Fakṭanāth Girdhārī, stripped of everything.'

Did you understand anything? You yourselves are all Fakṭanāth Girdhārī. Just look at the spectators: whatever they have understood, they are laughing until their stomachs hurt.

Dhṛṅgā-dhṛṅgā, dhidhinnā tinnā...
'O friend!
The month of Bhādo, the clouds are swollen,
And my dwelling is empty...'

Beautiful, beautiful! Vidyāpati truly is the cuckoo of Mithila...

You are being swept away again; you are no better than Bipatā. However often you are asked not to, you cannot resist making a comment on every song, just as he does. And here comes Bipatā himself again.

'The month of Bhādo; the clouds pour down,
And the roof of my hut is leaking.'

'Ha-ha-ha!' The audience doubles over with laughter. I forgot to mention that Bipatā imagines himself both Kṛṣṇa and a lover setting out for foreign parts. Yet he never forgets that he is Kalaru Musahar of Halhaliyā, a human being whose social position, he feels, is no higher than that of a bullock at an oil press. When the dancers put their arms round his neck, feigning love, affection and wounded pride, and sing that Mādhava has forsaken them for a distant land, he forgets that he is Kṛṣṇa leaving Gokul for Mathurā. The inequalities of his own life begin dancing before him in bodily form, and he sings:

'The Ādrā rains did not fall, nor those of Āśleṣā;
Everywhere the fields look like an old woman's hair.
Fish and turtles have vanished underground;
My friend, will a terrible famine come?
A whole day's toil brings a single seer of paddy—
How can a life be kept alive on that?
Leaving you, beloved, I go to a foreign land.'

A moment later the dancers begin another song:

'She carries her beloved in her lap to market,
And the people ask: "Who is this man to you?"
"My mother-in-law's son, my sister-in-law's elder brother—

The husband written in my fate from long ago.'"

Now Bipatā clamours like a child for jalebis, batāshā sweets and toys.

Just then a dancer begins to sing:

'At the coming of dawn,
My husband returned to me.
With trembling hands he took my necklace against his breast;
With lotus hands he touched my bosom and looked upon my moon-like face.'

Bipatā interrupts and asks one of the accompanists to explain the meaning. The accompanist elaborates freely on the song: how the heroine had been sleeping on the straw in her hut when Bipatā arrived.

Let us turn to the audience. Strong young women with dark, sturdy bodies watch Bipatā intently, suppressing smiles, nudging one another and whispering with delight. Middle-aged women pretend to be angry and try to restrain them. But who can restrain stifled laughter or a heart that has been tickled? Meanwhile the dancers begin their refrain:

'Come, my heart, come, my heart, to my husband's home,
Let us go, O Rāma;
Ah, O Rāma, in my parents' house
I shall set a fire...'

The girls grow restless; electricity seems to race through the young men's veins. The dance is coming to an end.

'Come, my heart, come, my heart,
Dhin dhinak dhinak, dhin dhinak dhinak...
Ah, O Rāma, I shall set my parents' house on fire...!
Dim dimik dimik, dim dimik dimik...'

But who is this? Why, it is Chethru Gusāin! Gusāin is a devotee of Kabir. Ten or fifteen years ago, when the landlord demanded that he give false testimony, he refused. The angry landlord turned him out of his home, and he has lived as a renunciant ever since. Hand drum, shoulder-bag and tongs; matted locks and a long beard... Look! Gusāin begins to beat his khanjarī and dance alongside the performers.

'Dim dimik dimik, dim dimik dimik,
Ah, O Rāma, in my parents' house, a fire...'

For Chethru Gusāin, the song is entirely nirguṇa: an expression of the formless divine.

Ah! Tears shine in his sunken eyes. And the dance is over.

(Phanishwarnath Renu's reportage was published in the weekly Vishvamitra on 1 August 1945. This translation from Hindi into Maithili is dedicated to Phanishwarnath Renu. Acknowledgement: Videha: Sadeha, no. 11.)

I place this conception of piyā desāntar—the beloved gone to a distant land—before thoughtful readers and respectfully dedicate it to Mahākavi Vidyāpati, amid the present distress of Maithil migrants. Does the Sanskrit-Avahaṭṭha Vidyāpati Ṭhakkura possess this anguish?

50. 'No One Could Understand Me' — Ghazal Poet Om Prakash Jhā

Abstract

In Bhādo the clouds gather heavily; no vidāgarī-tidāgarī is under way, yet the water-borne life stirs. The season is full; there is no call for elaborate dissection. But if a gust happens to blow towards a particular bahr—the metrical measure of the ghazal—there is no harm in that.

Keywords: Om Prakash Jhā; Maithili ghazal; separation; bahr; sher; poetic language; rhythm

In Bhādo the clouds hang heavy. There may be no vidāgarī-tidāgarī, yet the water-borne life stirs. Bhādo has arrived in force; there is no need to dissect everything.

Circling aimlessly is not a good thing. But if one happens to turn towards a particular bahr, that does no harm.

If a collection were made of Maithili ghazals written in proper bahr, Om Prakash would be among its finest practitioners.

'Blood kept flowing out of my heart.'
Love lives in the heart, and blood is flowing from it: someone must surely have driven a knife into it. Who could be so audacious? But the second line of the couplet says:

'Yet never did a tear of separation fall from my eyes.'
A history almost came into being—but why did it stop short?

'It would have become a story, had you understood the hint;
I was the one in your heart—if only you had said so once.'
Neither party, it seems, is entirely to blame.

The poet wishes his burning heart to go on burning:

'I cannot tell what fire kept burning in my heart;
My heart asked not for water but only for ghee.'

The ghazal writer has suffered a lover's wound but remains so close to the beloved that tears of separation would compromise that person. So he does not weep. He wants his heart to continue burning, and for ghee, never water, to be poured upon its fire.

People then suppose that his mind and heart are hard. He therefore writes:

'Tell me why nobody could ever understand me;
Everyone took my laughter for a great coldness.'

And there is this too:

'The world has struck me so often in love's false game;
No one saw my heart as it lay groaning.'

But whether people understand him or not—why should that matter so much? In another ghazal, written in bahr-e-mutaqārib, he declares:

'Who now has the stature to come and clash with me?
Whenever I have fought, I have always fought myself.'

Does that make the poet arrogant? Not quite. In bahr-e-hazaj he says:

'Let the world cut off Om's head now;
If a village can be saved by bowing, the pāg shines brighter.'

Are Maithili ghazal writers, then, still caught in the confines of love and separation, unable to take up new subjects? Not so. Listen to this sher in bahr-e-salīm:

'All the weapons will lie unused in the armoury;
The people driven by hunger have become missiles.'

And consider this ghazal for children. Children's poetry or ghazals generally evoke a voice of delight; where is such delight in the life of a child labourer? There remains hope, however:

'The darkness of sorrow spreads on every side;
It will pass, and I too shall grow.'

The same hope is found in another ghazal:

'I shall keep gathering shells along the seashore;
One day some shell will surely yield a pearl.'

When Om Prakash finds his pearl is another matter; Maithili literature has already found one in him. He has been recognised; he has been understood.

51. Munnāji: A Ghazal Poet and Writer of Bīhani Stories

Abstract

Mājh Āṅganme Katiāel Chhī ('Marginalised in the Middle of the Courtyard') is the title of Munnāji's collection of rubāĭyāt and ghazals. Is this the influence of Kabir's paradoxical utterances, or simply the nature of the ghazal? Neither. It is a reality.

Keywords: Munnāji; ghazal; bīhani story; Mājh Āṅganme Katiāel Chhī; rubā'ī; love; experiment in genre

Ghazal Poet Munnāji's Mājh Āṅganme Katiāel Chhī

Mājh Āṅganme Katiāel Chhī is the title of Munnāji's volume of rubā'iyāt and ghazals: pushed to the margin, and that too in the very middle of the courtyard! Is it Kabir's upside-down mode of speech, or the temperament of the ghazal? It is neither; it is a fact of life. Many people like Munnāji have been marginalised and lost sight of despite their talents. Yet the poet takes all the blame upon himself.

'Now I have been pushed aside in the middle of the courtyard;
My own manner of walking has led me astray.'

And that is why he begins to savour the strange pleasure of tears.

'The tears fall, yet somehow they seem sweet;
What a beautiful sorrow of love I have taken upon myself!'

He falls into a great ditch and holds himself responsible even for that:

'I learnt nothing from even the smallest stumble;
That is why I fell into so deep a pit.'

Has the ghazal poet forgotten the importance of love? No. Everyone needs love.

'People of every age need love;
They need goodwill and well-being until death.'

And if he had merely a mile or two to travel, perhaps it would be otherwise. But he has far to go, and so he needs love.

'Envy will carry you a mile or two;
To go farther, you need love.'

And this is true everywhere. A friend of mine once topped an examination and said, 'If I do not compete, I do not compete; but if I compete, I top it.' He was no ghazal poet. Had he been one, he might have written as Munnāji does:

'Let the clouds gather; that is no great matter,
But if they rain, let them come as the monsoon.'

He presents both a change of viewpoint and the idea of the glass being half full in this way:

'Raise your eyes and the world will seem empty;
Lower them and the whole world will appear.'

The poet values criticism as well as opposition.

'Keep your distance from those who merely take your side;
Do not think every word of an opponent bitter.'

Inflation has driven people to distraction. Consider the image of a swaying platform:

'Inflation dries up not just blood but bone;
People now seem like a watch-platform trembling in the air.'

Consider this paradox, too: the image is new, the feeling timeless.

'I lit a warming fire in the heat of summer;
From its extinguished embers, warm yourself one day.'

What kind of literary gathering is this, resembling the politics of sponsored letters published in certain magazines? Consider this rubāʿī:

'The heart grew heavy with shouts of distress;
The audience fled when fighting broke out;
The sponsor kept his ears attentively pricked,
And the organiser's caste affiliations stood exposed.'

If floods did not enter the Maithili ghazal, we would have to say its poets had become detached from society. But that is not the case.

'The river is still in full spate;
People stand on the embankment, watching one another.'

Migration out of Mithila has declined for the present. Outsiders have come to treat 'Bihari' as synonymous with labourer or worker. The poet writes of that too.

'Bihar's appearance seems to have changed today;
With workers in short supply, factory owners themselves look like Biharis.'

Munnāji's ghazals and rubāʿiyāt flow freely, like a bursting torrent. Such is the nature of a well-turned sher: it cannot fail to draw an 'āh' or a 'vāh' from its listeners. Seeing how the ghazal and rubāʿī are spreading in Maithili, one feels that, even as the genres extend their reach, the Maithili language is gaining still more and expanding with them.

52. Ashok the Poet, Ashok the Storyteller, and Ashok the Writer of Non-fictional Prose

Abstract

Although Ashok now calls himself "Storyteller Ashok" (that is the name on his Facebook profile), his first published book was a collection of poems, Chakravyūha, which appeared in January 1986. In November of that same year, Trikoṇ, a joint collection by Ashok, Shivshankar Shrinivas and Shailendra Anand, was published; each contributed five short stories. Ashok the poet, Ashok the storyteller, and Ashok the writer of non-fictional prose.

Keywords: Ashok; short-story writer; non-fictional prose; author; Mahābhārata; poetry

Abstract

Although Ashok now calls himself "Storyteller Ashok" (that is the name on his Facebook profile), his first published book was the poetry collection Chakravyūha, published in January 1986. In November of the same year, Trikoṇ, a joint collection by Ashok, Shivshankar Shrinivas and Shailendra Anand, appeared, containing five stories by each of the three. Ashok writes little, and poetry even less.

Editorial for the New Issue

Ashok the Poet, Ashok the Storyteller, and Ashok the Writer of Non-fictional Prose

Although Ashok now calls himself "Storyteller Ashok" (that is the name on his Facebook profile), his first published book was the poetry collection Chakravyūha, which appeared in January 1986. In November that year the joint collection Trikoṇ, containing five stories each by Ashok, Shivshankar Shrinivas and Shailendra Anand, was published.

Ashok writes sparingly, and produces even less poetry. Among mainstream authors, writing little has become a fashion. Premchand had written three hundred stories before bringing out a selection entitled Merī Priya Kahāniyā̃ ("My Favourite Stories") in 1933. In that book he admits that, whether one wishes it or not, not everything an author writes can be good. He also observes that a reader who reads the entire output of one writer might not manage to read even five or six writers in a lifetime. That was why he came under pressure to select a few stories from his three hundred and offer them to readers as his favourites. In my view, too, an author ought to proclaim himself a storyteller only after writing three hundred stories. Premchand goes on to suggest there that folktales contain such things as flying horses, and that the literary short story is therefore of greater importance than the folktale. I differ from Premchand on this point and agree with Firaq Gorakhpuri. In his collection of rubāīyāt, Rūp, Firaq writes that "Hindu folksong" gives him something it transforms into music both human and celestial, something even Ghalib, Iqbal and Chakbast could not give him. He offers this example:

"Father, I am leaving the home of my girlhood;
That threshold has become a mountain, and the courtyard a foreign land."

The Mahābhārata has by now become a folksong and a folk epic; the Bhīl Mahābhārata is an example. Some poems in Ashok's Chakravyūha draw upon the Mahābhārata and, in that sense, also upon folksong and folk narrative.

Thus, to my mind, there are three creative Ashoks: Ashok the poet, Ashok the storyteller, and Ashok the writer of non-fictional prose. Arvind Thakur calls his book Roshnaik Lokpakṣ non-fictional prose; I shall therefore use that expression as well for essays, treatises and criticism.

Gajendra Thakur

Ashok the Poet

"Father, I am leaving the home of my girlhood;
That threshold has become a mountain, and the courtyard a foreign land."

Ashok the Poet

First Phase: Ashok's Chakravyūha (A General Reading)

The Mahābhārata is a remarkable work. This Jaya Saṃhitā is a workshop for the short-story writer: the Mahābhārata tells stories, yet all those stories are in verse! An extremely condensed Maithili verse rendering of the Mahābhārata can be found in my Tvañcāhañca—Gīt Prabandha.

Then the fighting began again upon the thirteenth day,
As Arjuna pursued the Saṃśaptakas and the Trigartas away.
Yudhishthira learned then of the chakravyūha battle formation;
Seeing his anxious uncle, Abhimanyu offered an explanation:
"In the womb I heard my father describing it to my mother,
How to break through all its first six gates, one after another;
I remember every detail of that method of combat,
But not the account of fighting through its seventh gate;
Mother fell asleep, and that one gate alone remained."
Vyasa's image of learning in the womb
Is a symbol of the hero, not merely the literal sense of words.
Abhimanyu advanced, though no one understood,
Where the gate or point of entry stood, with Jayadratha on guard.
"Come, Uncle Bhima; here is the entrance, we shall go in here."
Abhimanyu struck Jayadratha with an arrow and entered,

But Jayadratha stood there barring Bhima and the other warriors.
At the second gate stood Drona, releasing his arrows;
Abhimanyu cut Drona's bow and pierced the array to advance.
At the third gate he showered arrows upon the astonished Karna,
And reached the fourth, where Ashwatthama stood.
A terrible battle broke out, yet he could not be stopped.
Abhimanyu's chariot advanced; Duryodhana grew anxious:
"Karna, what shall we do now? Defeat seems certain."
Karna said: "Let all seven great chariot warriors unite;
Together we can stop this boy; no one can do so alone."
All the warriors gathered, including Duryodhana's son Lakshmana;
By then Abhimanyu had reached the seventh gate.
Seeing the scene, Abhimanyu's charioteer said:
"These unrighteous men have joined forces. Shall I turn the chariot back?"
"I am Arjuna's son; I shall not abandon this battle. Watch; Turn the chariot in a circle and behold the courage of Partha's son."
Then Lakshmana came directly before Abhimanyu;
An arrow severed Lakshmana's head. Drona declared:
"He is invincible, his armour impenetrable; strike his head!"
Then Abhimanyu's charioteer fell and his chariot broke apart.
He descended and fought on with sword, wheel and mace;
In mace combat with Dushasana's son, both fell to the ground.
Dushasana's son rose first and struck him on the head;
Among the seven chariot warriors fell Subhadra's son, Uttara's husband.
(Gajendra Thakur, Tvañcāhañca—Gīt Prabandha, 2009)

The opening poem of the collection Chakravyūha, also entitled "Chakravyūha," presents a day when neither Krishna nor Yudhishthira nor Arjuna is present. Today—the thirteenth day of the Mahābhārata war—the chakravyūha has been formed.

"I Shall Ask Something" describes the attempt to strip Draupadi.

In anger Duryodhana repeated his command:
"Dushasana, strip her! Draupadi is a slave."
Draupadi appealed to the worthy elders,
"Save my honour, I plead with you; I implore you."
Everyone in that assembly bowed their heads;
Krishnaa, Draupadi, had lost hope from every direction:
"Protector of devotees, in you alone rests my hope;
Somehow preserve my modesty—that is my prayer."
In a voice choked with emotion Draupadi called out;

Crying for help, she collapsed unconscious in the hall.
Dushasana began pulling at Draupadi's clothing;
The assembled people watched a miracle unfold,
For as long as Dushasana continued pulling,
Draupadi's garment went on growing without end.
(Gajendra Thakur, Tvañcāhañca—Gīt Prabandha, 2009)

Vyasa is satisfied with Krishna's role, but Ashok is not. Ashok's dissatisfaction arises from his sense that "in today's stripping of Draupadi / Krishna's role / kneels down / before Dushasana." Thus the Draupadi of his own relationship has been stripped naked. He wonders when there will be a Vetala carrying his own corpse on his back, and when a Vikramaditya will appear. The poem "From Soviet Russia" evokes a narrative that was served up to Ashok's generation: the Soviet Union was praised and America was disparaged, even while those who did the praising sent their own children to America for their education. I remember a friend who went to Darbhanga to take an examination. After wandering about the university area, he returned saying that there could be no better city in all Bihar than Darbhanga. Ashok does something similar in this poem. He dislikes people who vote four times in a year and then snore soundly after casting their ballots, but he fails to see the social equations that take shape around these repeated elections. Nor can he recognise the rising wave of those catalytic forces of social change produced by such equations. "The Song That Was Never Written" and "What Shall I Tell You?" concern the suffering inherent in the poet's vocation. "People Do Nothing" takes up human inertia, while "I Had Promised You" explores human self-interest. "Sanchikāsta" is built around the vocabulary of office files. The image in "Inscription" is beautiful. Addressing a tyrant, the poet asks whether the tyrant's thirst for blood should be engraved and securely preserved upon a stone inscription. But this tyrant is God: the poet asks him to accept death and then remarks ironically that he will certainly be reborn. The conception of a universe with more than three dimensions and Stephen Hawking's A Brief History of Time directly threaten the existence of God, for they also bring the possibility of God's death into view: the existence of the world's controller is in jeopardy. Francis Fukuyama, who announced the end of history when communist rule collapsed, subsequently retreated from the claim. After communist government fell and the Berlin Wall came down, Fukuyama declared that history generated by the conflicts among ideologies had ended and that only ideologies beneficial to humanity would now advance. Some time later, however, he revised his position, saying that many rival ideologies still survived within societies and among nationalities. Against the background of the death of God and the end of history, "Inscription" is important. If we wish to find a relationship between the poet's heart and nature in "Again Some

Lightning Flashed," we can—for example, in the image "it rained in the courtyard plastered with cow-dung." "Whom Do You Want?" asks whether you want words or meaning: words are chaff or husks, and meaning is grain. The poet will supply whichever you choose. In "Silence Does Not Become You," he complains: silence was endured for the sake of the stomach, yet the stomach still remains unfilled. He remembers the waterside near his village; and when his superior officer rebukes him, in the next poem, "I Shall Certainly Write a Letter Today," the village returns to his mind, and he wishes to abandon everything and go home. "Alone" speaks of seeing tears in the mirror of time, the outcry of solitude after separation. In "Before Creation," every line appears unfamiliar to the poet, who wonders how so much of his life has passed. "Zero" is a poem about a failure to meet; it is not even a poem about travelling on parallel paths. In "The Bell of the Mind," remembrance brings a coolness like sandalwood, while forgetfulness brings a hissing serpent. The poet has brought the images of sandalwood and snake from Sanskrit subhāṣitas into Maithili, but in a somewhat altered form. The roots of the sandalwood tree are parasitic: they take water and minerals by breaking into the roots of another tree. The banyan and the peepal are not parasitic trees, yet when young they need other trees for support, like props to help them stand. Little by little their roots so engulf the supporting trees that those trees wither, deprived of water and sunlight. Does this complicate our understanding of the image "even a snake wrapped around a cool sandalwood tree is not without venom"? Ashok, however, is careful: he confines himself to the sandalwood's coolness. Am I needlessly applying Jacques Derrida's deconstructive method to this criticism? The image of the wagging tail of the "Cringing Dog" recalls a Sanskrit subhāṣita: "The endeavour of a crow, the concentration of a heron, the sleep of a dog, eating little and living away from home—these are the five qualities of a student." Here "the sleep of a dog" means waking at the slightest sound. Yet on the four-lane road near my village thousands of people have died in accidents, and almost as many dogs have died while asleep upon the road. People say dogs sleep very heavily! Where, then, is the proverbial light sleep of the dog? Have we robbed them of their habitat? Are the vehicles moving so fast that a dog cannot hear them in time to become alert? Has this Sanskrit subhāṣita been rendered false by humanity's interference with the environment? With Derrida I have wandered unnecessarily into environmental discourse; Ashok has simply used the image of a frightened dog wagging its tail. "An Unframed Picture" again returns to his solitude. In "Give Me Some Name," he feels that his existence disappears before the other's immense form. "A Song of the Sad Dawn" is a song of pain, pain extending from the heart through the body. In "How Long?" the poet seeks a fair in which to lose himself, continually plastering the clay of hope upon a vessel of coloured dreams. But for how long? "One Point: Three Images" offers three images: the fulfilment of a desire; bloodshot eyes; and falling without attempting to save oneself. In "The Three Letters of Love," the first image is of words written by reading the language of her eyes: however forcefully he writes them out, the lines come forth like pearls. In the second he sees her reflection in his mind's mirror, a reflection he wishes to swallow, grind and chew until he is bloodied. In the third he is afraid even to approach her. Here, then, are love's three letters, beyond its proverbial two-and-a-half. "One Night" evokes the coolness of night and its pleasing sensations—but the daytime sun? Day—no, no. "Evening" comes shamelessly each day, and the poet tells it to go away or he will increase the light. "A New Scene" sings of the new year: while striving to become a hero rather than a villain, one must not end up as an extra; then the old apprehension and despair recur. "A Pearl with the Fragrance of a Shell" invokes Gandhi's tolerance and non-cooperation movement within a procession of ideals. One can laugh heartily not upon winning but upon losing! A pearl can form from a tear that has fallen and hardened. Next come "Five Unnecessary Poems." The first concerns Krishna's birthday, celebrated every year at Janmashtami, but this time Krishna has forgotten his flute and arrived with a violin. The poet evidently considers the violin a foreign instrument: in terms of Hindustani music that is true, but Carnatic music incorporated this foreign violin two hundred years ago. The second unnecessary poem concerns the dance floor, where once again his foot slips. The third concerns a rickshaw-puller; only when the front wheel is jerked askew does he understand the world. The fourth concerns relationships accumulated over a lifetime for the sake of living—but! The fifth concerns the dark tongue of destruction. The last poem in Chakravyūha is "Two Drops of Tears": storm and tempest, yet none greater than the tempest of the heart. There is no beloved dark one; there is only the expectation of death. "And I die!" The broken house of earth and tiles is washed away, together with the body made of clay.

Second Phase: Ashok after Chakravyūha (A General Reading)

In "Once Again," the little son's sorrow is accompanied by a mass of dark clouds and the urge to write poetry; we see that the atmosphere for Ashok's poetry forms when there is sadness. "Teeth" refers to the advice given to a bride that she must not open her mouth in her husband's family. In "Now...," he observes changes in proverbs as the use of mud, wood and bamboo declines and that of cement, sand, stone chips, iron and marble increases. "Brahmottar" examines the pain caused by the acquisition of trees, houses and fields in the name of development. Once land was taken from cultivators and allotted as brahmottar grants; today it is taken from ordinary people and distributed among new Brahmins. Yet Nandigram has challenged the global village. In "Moustache," he explains the importance of weapons while identifying the elder's moustache as an obstacle to greatness; alternatively, he advises people to work and earn so that their moustache is not stained. At the "Liberation Ceremony," a dove, the emblem of peace, is released; passing from one politician's hand to another, it is distressed by its unfulfilled hope for freedom—"My India is great." In "Do Something Now, Āchārya!" the teacher merely worries but does not listen to his disciple. In "When He Dies of Thirst," the person whose silence had displeased the poet now sets about silencing the poet himself. "Do Not Labour under This Illusion" warns the politician Mishra. In "Context: An Election Year," democracy is Draupadi in the poem "Election," whereas "Vote" depicts deception and intrigue committed to win votes. "Politics Now Smells" exposes the grotesque face of politics. "Toofan Ali Said" discusses the manufacture of counterfeit Hindu and Muslim identities. In "The Clever Man," the character Kakka seeks cracks in every household like the roots of a banyan or a peepal. In "Poetry Betrays Humanity," the poet defines not only what poetry is but also what it is not: "Poetry is not the bel leaf offered by worshippers of the phallus." In "Poison," he searches for a venomous serpent. "Eating and Bathing" speaks of the old belief that few people had seen a man eating or a woman bathing—but what of the present? In "The Genie," the genie of one's own making has stopped speaking. "What Happened?" concerns a person reduced to an idol. In "Maithili in the Eighth Schedule," now that a cherished ambition has been fulfilled, the poet cannot decide whether to become a Vaishnava, play pachīsī, or bathe in the Ganges, as though nothing remains to be done. Whether it is Maithili's entry into the Sahitya Akademi or its inclusion in the Eighth Schedule, both developments have increased and strengthened mainstream rigidity. Beyond the purchase of certain mainstream hardbound books by libraries and the mainstream's unproductive seminars, Maithili has gained nothing from this, while the parallel current of Maithili literature must now work harder to contend with these developments. "The Season Is Changing" discusses rising atmospheric temperatures, yet despite considerable effort the poet cannot perceive the changing seasons, mounting heat and flying egrets. In "Mahaprakash Has Gone," Sukant Som brings news of Mahaprakash's death, and the poet finds only the consolation that he will have work to do in the winter.

What precedes is a general reading of Ashok's poetry.

A Critique of Ashok's Poetry in the Light of Eastern and Western Theories (for the theories themselves, see my Maithili Samīkṣāśāstra, available from Videha Books at www.videha.co.in)

An Examination from Marxist, Historical, Structuralist, Magical-Realist, Postmodern, Feminist and Deconstructionist Perspectives, Together with the Perspective of Indian Aesthetics

Of Ashok's poems in Chakravyūha and those written after Chakravyūha, not one poem in the former will disappoint you; many of the later poems, however, will seem dull, with the exception of "When He Dies of Thirst."

From a structuralist standpoint, "Chakravyūha" and "I Shall Ask Something" seem to be based upon a universal Mahābhārata narrative: only the place, time and characters have changed.

There is a depiction of Draupadi's disrobing. Vyasa is satisfied with Krishna's role, but Ashok is not. The reason for Ashok's dissatisfaction is his impression that "in today's stripping of Draupadi / Krishna's role / kneels down / before Dushasana." Thus the Draupadi belonging to his own relationship has been stripped naked. He asks when there will be a Vetala carrying his own corpse on his back, and when a Vikramaditya will arrive.

Leaving structuralism aside for a moment, let us turn to a historical analysis. "From Soviet Russia" is a poem about a narrative within which Soviet authoritarianism lay concealed—a system that has now collapsed.

From a Marxist perspective, "The Song That Was Never Written," "What Shall I Tell You?," "People Do Nothing" and "I Had Promised You" show poetic work reaching beyond the merely poetic. These poems combine affirmation and its denial, old and new, development and death. If they had detached themselves from their circumstances and indulged merely in praise and admiration, they would have been inferior from a Marxist standpoint—as are so many of the barren mainstream Maithili songs celebrating Mithila's imagined splendour. Instead, the poet has made them part of a dynamic process.

Let us now look at "Sanchikāsta," "Whom Do You Want?," "Silence Does Not Become You" and "I Shall Certainly Write a Letter Today" from a deconstructionist perspective. A deconstructionist would say that the structuralist's poles take on a philosophical form. The poet's statements themselves cast doubt upon whether his own polarisation is permanent or fleeting. A deprived class may migrate from the village and throw off its social stigma; the powerful class, by contrast, misses the prestige it enjoyed in the village, as we see in "Sanchikāsta." In "I Shall Certainly Write a Letter Today," the sight of the officer's angry red eyes likewise makes the poet wish to return to his village. "Whom Do You Want?" announces the end of ideals and morality: words, whether truth or falsehood, and meanings are available in abundance, and everything is for sale with a single signature; but ideals and morality are out of stock and cannot be sold. All this questions the permanence or transience of the poet's polarities.

"Inscription" uses a paradox: people record their glory on stone inscriptions, but the poet wants to inscribe upon the tyrant's own stone the record of his thirst for blood! Let us return to the historicity of the poem. Imagine a magical-realist literary work read in a future age: a character living in that work might assign this poem a third, quite different meaning. The poet's own existence would then disappear, and the science of words would begin its play. For a character in magical-realist literature who lives in the future, the poem will possess another meaning altogether, even as that character searches for the emotion of the poet's verse. A little further on, we realise it is about God: the poet asks God to pack up his belongings and wonders whether he should announce God's death. This was the meaning of Nietzsche's proclamation that God is dead: God was an idea, a mode of thought, which the scientific thinking following the Enlightenment in the West destroyed. In India, Pūrva Mīmāṃsā and Sāṃkhya had already rejected the idea of God. Both, however, are āstika philosophical systems: they recognise the authority of the Vedas while not acknowledging God. Thus, whether he intends it or not, Ashok differs at many points from Mithila's mainstream tradition derived from the Śatapatha Brāhmaṇa and approaches its parallel tradition. Language must have existed before the Ṛgveda, the oldest surviving work of Vedic Sanskrit. Much oral literature—gāthās, nārāśaṃsīs, divine tales and narratives—would have been composed in it. For the singers of these narrative songs, the Ṛgveda uses the terms gāthin, gātuvid and gāthapati. Gāthā and nārāśaṃsī existed in parallel from Vedic times. Vishvamitra was a gāthin, a son of Gathin and a seer of the Gāyatrī. Did Vedic Sanskrit emerge from Prakrit, or Prakrit from Vedic Sanskrit? The nārāśaṃsī narratives in the Vedas show that the two continued alongside one another for a very long time; this parallel tradition influenced both. Consider the Ṛgveda: what does its use of dūlabha for durlabha (4.9.8) establish? What does paścā for paścāt in the Atharvaveda (10.4.10) establish? And what does pratisaṃhāya for pratisaṃdhāya in the Gopatha Brāhmaṇa (2.4) establish? Those who were Aryans came to Mithila from western India. Certain portions of the Vedas existed before their arrival, which is why many words and pronunciations found in Maithili occur in Vedic Sanskrit but not in Classical Sanskrit. Avidyā, the doctrine of karma, the cycle of birth and rebirth, and liberation were received by the Aryans from non-Aryans. That is why the Upanishads teach the way to liberation, not the way to heaven. How does one achieve liberation? Through sacrifice? No:

through knowledge, reflection, contemplation and meditative absorption. Under King Janaka's patronage, Yājñavalkya composed the Bṛhadāraṇyaka Upaniṣad in the non-Aryan region of Tirhut. Commenting upon the fifty-seventh sūtra of the Sāṃkhyakārikā, Vācaspati Miśra asks whether we can say that just as unconscious milk nourishes a calf, unconscious nature gives a living being the knowledge of liberation through its activity. God is complete within himself: what purpose would creation serve for him? If he created the world for living beings, those beings would become bound only after creation; before creation there could be no question of bondage. Why, then, would compassion towards them arise? Creation is brought about by prakṛti, and living beings attain apavarga, release, through their own effort. Dissolution, too, comes through discriminative understanding. Vācaspati's account is therefore non-theistic, not theistic. If God participates in the operation of nature, it becomes a conscious process governed by a purpose; and God, having no need, can have no such purpose. Gautama of Mithila, the author of the Nyāyasūtra, speaks of attaining the highest good through knowledge of the sixteen categories, but nowhere among them does he say that liberation can be obtained through God. The Vaiśeṣikasūtra holds that the Vedas were composed by learned people, not by God. Kumārila Bhaṭṭa says that no reliable discourse about God before creation is possible. In "Inscription" Ashok takes a step further: he knows that God, too, will be reborn after death. In "Two Drops of Tears," likewise, there is no dark beloved; there is only the anticipation of death: "And I die!" Magical realism reappears; the poet sees himself being carried away in the waters.

The rhythm of "Alone" is remarkable. Read "Again Some Lightning Flashed," "The Bell of the Mind," "Give Me Some Name" and "A Song of the Sad Dawn" in the light of dhvani theory. Ashok presents meaning and symbol together. Nyāya philosophy opposed dhvani theory, but Ashok nonetheless offers a forceful structure of suggestion. His poems, filled with these symbols, advance in a well-organised manner. Read them from a formalist standpoint: the poet makes effective use of the unfamiliar aspects of language, thereby generating poetic quality. The abundance of opposed words, the unfamiliar nature of their combinations, and a language rich in figures of sound make the poems distinctive. Their manner of combination gives them formalist excellence. Read them also in the light of sphoṭa: the transmission of meaning occurs not merely through isolated words but through the integrated burst of signification.

Consider "One Night," "Evening," "A New Scene," "A Pearl with the Fragrance of a Shell," "Five Unnecessary Poems," "How Long?," "Before Creation," "The Cringing Dog," "An Unframed Picture," "One Point: Three Images" and "The Three Letters of Love" from an existentialist perspective. The poet assumes responsibility for his own condition, his solitary life and his anxieties. From the standpoint of aucitya—propriety or aptness—the descriptions are justified by the requirements of the poems.

Read "Zero" through deconstruction. Mathematics makes it zero; but how shall one answer the exhaustion that follows? The poem then becomes caught in its own net: much will be left unsaid, and yet very much will remain to be said.

Second Phase: Ashok after Chakravyūha

The poems of the second phase call for a sociological method of criticism. "Once Again," "Now...," "Brahmottar," "Moustache," "Liberation Ceremony," "Do Something Now, Āchārya!," "Do Not Labour under This Illusion," "Context: An Election Year," "Vote," "Politics Now Smells," "Toofan Ali Said," "The Clever Man," "Poetry Betrays Humanity," "Poison," "The Genie," "What Happened?" and "The Season Is Changing" all deal with one problem or another.

"When He Dies of Thirst" is a sequel to "Silence Does Not Become You" in Chakravyūha. "The Season Is Changing" comments on the environment, while "Vote" comments on politics. But have we not read a great deal more prose dealing with these very subjects? Is that why the poems now seem ordinary?

"Maithili in the Eighth Schedule" resembles Faiz's anguished response to the formation of Pakistan—"This is not the dawn we were promised"—only in its suggested meaning; its literal meaning is ironic.

"Once Again" and "Mahaprakash Has Gone" are grounded in individual psychology.

"Teeth" and "Eating and Bathing" call for a feminist reading. From a sociological standpoint, they are poems opposing social customs. The theories concerning women—even literary theories—framed by men within a male-centred society cannot be regarded as appropriate for women. In any case, both poems are weak treatments of their subjects.

Ashok's poems may also be read through the theory of alaṃkāra, or figures of speech. Kabir has taught us the art of indirect simile, metaphor and the contradiction of resemblance. A reading through rasa theory is possible as well. Ashok develops anubhāvas—expressive responses or effects—from vibhāvas, the determinants of emotion. He uses this procedure at several points, especially in Chakravyūha. But after Chakravyūha, the poet disappoints us here as well.

The Ashok who had carried poetry forward even to the rebirth that followed God's death came to a halt after Chakravyūha. Did the mainstream's pseudo-criticism kill Ashok the poet? Yet the poet Ashok will be reborn, and soon. "When He Dies of Thirst," the sequel to "Silence Does Not Become You" from Chakravyūha, has already planted the seed of that rebirth.

Gajendra Thakur

Ashok the Storyteller

"Father, I am leaving the home of my girlhood;
That threshold has become a mountain, and the courtyard a foreign land."

Ashok the Storyteller

Trikoṇ (Short-Story Collection, 1986)

Dedicated to the late Dr Braj Kishore Verma "Manipadma," Trikoṇ contains five stories each by Ashok, Shivshankar Shrinivas and Shailendra Anand.

Ashok's five are "Haḍḍī" ("The Bone"), "Hairpin," "Antim Shah" ("The Final Check"), "Ekaṭā Muskurāit Āṅkhi" ("A Smiling Eye") and "Khauñjh" ("Irritation").

"The Bone": Jageshar, his wife Seema, daughter Gudiya and son Pappu are the characters. Jageshar is delayed at the office; his rented accommodation is far from work, while lodgings nearby are expensive. A suicide has taken place next door, apparently because the lawyer's daughter-in-law could not endure harassment over dowry. Everyone in the locality is afraid. Jageshar feels as though a bone is stuck in his throat, hence the title "The Bone." From its naming to its execution, the entire story is ordinary.

"Hairpin": The characters are Chander and Urmila, separated for the first time since their marriage. Urmila went to the village five days earlier. Chander picks up a magazine: pictures of women that formerly held no attraction now draw his attention. The milkmaid arrives. Previously he had seen only the milk, but today he notices the milkmaid as well. Why had he never looked at her before? She goes into the other room to put the milk away, and Chander closes the door. She is frightened of him, but he presses two hundred rupees upon her. She forgets everything; he imagines that she will leave the house and not return for several days because she must go to the village. Chander begins to be swept up in a storm, to become soaked in rain—the storyteller uses both expressions as metaphors for intercourse. Then the narrator says that Chander has a fever today and will not go to work; we can already see that the tale is about to turn into a paradox. Chander reads letters. He finds one that Ramanand wrote to Urmila two months earlier and becomes angry: is Ramanand her lover? Was her love for him a lie? The next morning Urmila arrives with Ramanand. Chander is furious, but Urmila explains, in the manner of a film, that Ramanand is her paternal aunt's son. He found a job in Calcutta two months before the wedding and could not attend, so they had never met. Chander's suspicion disappears—but now it is Urmila's turn. In the next room she finds a hairpin. She never wears hairpins; whose can it be? She asks Chander. This hairpin gives the story its title, and it is almost screaming in Urmila's hand. The story ends, but I, as a reader, feel cheated. My attention has been diverted to the way the milkmaid seems to have been assigned a price of two hundred rupees, making it difficult to attend to the intended point. The writer wants to draw our attention to the moral character of men and women, especially male-centred judgements and hypocrisy, but he fails to do so.

"The Final Check": Bisheshar, his wife, son Kusheshar and daughter-in-law Phuleshari are the principal characters. Kusheshar has gone to Patna with Ramrachana and drives a rickshaw there. Fifteen years earlier, Bisheshar borrowed two hundred rupees from Phool Babu for the marriage of his daughter Dhanmanti. Kusheshar was a small boy then; at Sukrati he had thrown a wrestler from Dharampur to the ground. The landowner patted his back, and although the boy played beautifully and was placed upon a buffalo, he never liked being restrained. Kusheshar now returns from Patna. No longer does he drive a hired rickshaw: he owns one and belongs to a union. Phool Babu is playing chess. He has already received interest exceeding twice the principal, but keeps adding more. He does not intend to return the bond, yet is forced to do so. Times have changed; this story goes far beyond Premchand's Hindi "Savā Ser Gehū" ("A Seer and a Quarter of Wheat"). At the same time, Mishraji gives Phool Babu the "final check" on the chessboard and defeats him. Phuleshari will no longer have to go and work in the mansion.

"A Smiling Eye": The protagonist remembers a master who once tutored him. The master taught him to live as though he were performing a role. The departure of the living troubles the protagonist more than people's deaths, but through the art of acting he conceals this pain. The master searches out his flute once more, cleans it and plays for his pupil. Hearing the mournful strain, the protagonist falls asleep, forgetting the pain of his grief. Many other nostalgic memories return to him.

"Irritation": Smoke rises from an open fire. Ramnarayan throws down an eight-anna coin and orders a pān. Ravishekhar has come from the village with a bag to attend to some work at the Board office. Something has happened between Ramnarayan and his wife Sudhira. He sets out with Ravishekhar for their lodging, but feels as though a heavy wooden log were tied to his feet. They discuss the decline of drama in the village, the notion that supplementary earnings are disreputable, and even tea without milk when no milk is available. Then the writer tries to pull the story together. There is only one mosquito net; they will borrow money from Chaudharyji to buy another. But Sudhira has saved fifty rupees and will give it for the net. The ending is happy, and just then electricity returns. Ramnarayan hears the fan in Ravishekhar's room; even without a mosquito net, the mosquitoes will no longer trouble him.

Within this collection of still-immature stories, "A Smiling Eye" gives some grounds for confidence about the future.

Ohi Rātik Bhor (Short-Story Collection, 1991)

Dedicated to the late Sushil Jha, Ohi Rātik Bhor contains fifteen Ashok stories. Kulanand Mishra contributes the prefatory "In Passing," but it obstructs the reading of the stories. Kula Babu writes, for example, that "limitations gradually fell away—Ashokji's story of 1977, 'Baukā Chup Chhal' ('Bauka Was Silent'), and his story of 1989, 'Sarisabak Sāg' ('Mustard Greens'), can be read and understood together." Yet such a comparison actually makes "Bauka Was Silent" stand far above "Mustard Greens." In the psychology of the man and woman—in both stories a husband and wife—both spouses in "Bauka Was Silent" reveal the immensity of their inner selves, whereas the spouses in "Mustard Greens" behave like figures in an ordinary Hindi television serial. The stories in this collection are as follows.

"Before the Interval": Sameer leaves his examination unfinished and his father is stunned. The bell rings at the examination centre; it is time for the examination to begin, but Sameer has abandoned it because he has developed a fever. The plot had promise, but the writer fails to reach the central issue until half the story has gone by and makes an unsuccessful attempt to rescue the story in the final paragraph.

"Bauka Was Silent": Because the doctor's wife has gone to the village, the moonlight is pouring down around him. The description becomes rather protracted. The central plot begins when Bauka is bitten by a snake, and the doctor sets off to see him. The real story lies there. Though Bauka understands everything, he remains silent. He was a master at cutting earth, but illness overcame him. His wife Radhiya arrives late, wearing perfume; Bauka does not ask who put the scent upon her or where. Radhiya says that if he is angry he may beat her, but Bauka merely smooths her hair. Even when his sister-in-law abuses Radhiya, Bauka says nothing. His death comes not from disease but from the snakebite. Then comes Radhiya's lament. After such beautiful psychological analysis, the author did not need to conclude by making the sight of Radhiya remind the doctor of another pillow. Both opening and ending weaken the story, and a beautiful tale is ruined. This is a striking example of the effects of the mainstream's spurious criticism.

"Another Brahma": A brahmabhoj, the ritual feast after a death. Someone cheats Chhitan out of his money, but people say that he is lying because he is afraid of paying for the feast. Chhitan will therefore raise money against his land and hold the feast.

"The Mind Hung in Prison": The chief characters are the hot-tempered Asit, his even-tempered friend Kishore, and Asit's sister Meena. Asit is in prison and will be released only after the Emergency, according to a letter from his father. Meena must be married off in Asit's absence. A flashback follows: Meena and Kishore; Meena is lively and likes breaking the little ṭikulā ornaments. One day she begins calling Kishore "brother," which displeases him. Only a few days remain before her marriage. The story ends.

"A Crossroads Means Chandinath": First a crossroads is described, then Chandinath, who frequents it. Chandinath's mother tells tales of good and ill fortune, makes hearths and household implements, and provides for their meagre food. His wife is beginning to go outdoors a little, but they have no children. During the Emergency, Chandinath was once jailed in a ticket inspection case. Mischievous boys spread a rumour that he had been sterilised, and when his wife asked about it, he even beat her. He needs a child to silence the village gossip, but none has yet arrived. He will now stand for village headman. The story ends.

"He Became a Human Being": Here are the seeds of the writer whom you now call "Storyteller Ashok." This is the story of becoming an ordinary, earning-and-spending person—which is also the story of life coming to an end, of abandoning my companionship. "I tried hard to save you from becoming merely a human being, but you preferred completeness. I had kept a little emptiness in you so that your writing and thinking might continue to flow. Neelu entered your life but became someone else's, because she hungered for a man, and at that time you could not satisfy that human hunger. There was something incomplete in you; that is why Meenu, your imagined beloved, was born. But I know there was no difference between them. Meenu was life itself; she could never have become anything else." There is an episode from the hostel: affection for a younger student, almost like a little brother, because you had none. People alleged an illicit relationship; you decided the laugh forcibly produced by the accusation was the product of an unhealthy mind, yet you could never declare the allegation false. "I know that laughter was constructing a word for you, but to others it carried only one meaning; at the price of that meaning your rights were mortgaged there, and a wall of silence rose between you. When talking and the clamour stop, thought begins to move. Today you have wife, home and money, everything, but you have grown weak. You say Neelu is dead, yet you too are dead now. I alone can see it, for I am not dead."

"The Third Question": A very ordinary story. Rampravesh Chaudhary retires and returns to his village. His unemployed son Krishnakant runs away to Calcutta and earns a great deal. He spends generously on his sister's marriage; Rampravesh begins buying land in instalments and eating meat prepared from slaughtered animals. Krishnakant sends money but never visits the village, not even for his sister's wedding. When he finally comes, a CBI arrest warrant follows him: he has been manufacturing counterfeit medicines.

"The Timid One": Another mediocre story. Subhash and Manju quarrel over a grafted mango tree and its young fruit. Manju is to be married that year. Suddenly Subhash gathers her into his arms and takes her behind a tree, but Tejua and Shankar arrive and blows with sticks follow. A village council orders Subhash expelled, and he runs away. Ten years later he returns. His mother is dead; he has a nephew. His elder brother tells him that Manju later spoke in his defence, said she would marry him and that people searched for Subhash in vain. Manju's marriage fell through. You will already have guessed that the sister-in-law is Manju herself—and so it is.

"The Dancer": Here Ashok begins, at last, to find his voice. In Nainital, Anand, the protagonist, meets Rajni Sharma, formerly his fellow student at a college in Sitamarhi. Dowry considerations have forced her into marriage with an impotent man twice her age. They meet at a Nainital hotel. Also present is Sohan Mandal of the Purnia region, once a member of Dukhi Das's Bidapat dance troupe. Dukhi Das has died; the Bidapat dance itself is dying, and Sohan has come to Nainital. The story narrowly escapes mediocrity. In its final eight lines the writer tries to rescue it, and succeeds. Sohan and Rajni marry; he learns dance, and the two visit the protagonist in Patna.

"Mirza Sahib": The tenth story in the collection. The writer cannot bring it under control. I am reminded of Sushil's stories, particularly "Masjid" and others in Asmitā (a collection of short-short stories available in the Videha archive): excellent stories, carefully unfurled, without haste. "Mirza Sahib," by contrast, is mediocre despite its promising plot. Mirza Sahib's wife comes from a nawab family. Her mother died, and her father raised her. Her maternal uncle, aunt and the rest of that family are in Pakistan; she speaks of them frequently, much to Mirza Sahib's displeasure. After her father dies, Pakistan virtually becomes her parental home. She travels there with their son Salim for a wedding. Meanwhile war breaks out between India and Pakistan, in which her sister's husband is killed. In anger she writes to Mirza Sahib against India. Their correspondence begins again after Salim qualifies as a doctor there. When the wife returns with Salim, Mirza Sahib has died in the Bombay riots. It is plot upon plot. The beginning raised hopes; I even began to analyse a dream by Freud's method, but the promise remained unfulfilled.

"Concern": Suresh, a friend adept at disguise, is denied justice after Chandranath and his associates gang-rape his wife. Chandranath, the rapist and a political leader standing in a parliamentary election, is murdered by Suresh. The story resembles a pale, yellowed copy of Amitabh Bachchan's film Aakhree Raasta. Almost everything is mediocre, although the writer recovers something in the final eight lines. Suresh's son Paresh now lives with the protagonist. He too is a born mimic and a master of disguise, but for reasons no one knows he remembers Chandranath particularly well, imitating his politician's manner to perfection.

"The Day the Sun Did Not Rise": The story of Jogiya and the society around him; it is also the story of Bauasin. Jogiya's father is dead and his mother has entered into a relationship in another neighbourhood. An uncle and aunt live in the courtyard, while Jogiya stays with a landowner. In that household Bauasin is blamed for being barren and is being tormented to death; the younger landowner intends to marry again. She had begged Jogiya to free her. Jogiya's mother obtained freedom, but Bauasin did not. The younger landowner will not take Bauasin to a doctor; since she has no child, it is simply assumed that the fault lies with her—or with some other supposed defect. The story brings together the manners of two communities and the issue of dowry. Yet after surveying the vast world of Jagdish Prasad Mandal, Rajdev Mandal, Ramvilas Sahu, Ramanand Mandal, Santosh Kumar Rai "Batohi," Kapileshwar Raut, Sandeep Kumar Safi, Umesh Paswan, Umesh Mandal, Kishan Karigar, Ram Chandra Rai, Laldev Mahto and Nand Vilas Rai, all this seems insipid.

"Mustard Greens": Another mediocre story. When the protagonist's wife first came to his home, she was afraid; now she is not. A vegetable seller relates his sorrows to her in order to overcharge her, and cheats her. The protagonist becomes jealous, disliking his wife's smiling conversations with the vendor. She replies that when she speaks pleasantly, he weighs the vegetables correctly and sells them cheaply as well!

"The Earth Is Round": Manoj, Sudhakant and Tapan are in Moscow for training. There is casual conversation; after drinking they fall asleep in a park. Ashok wants a startling ending and introduces an elderly woman who speaks Russian and lays her hand on Tapan's head. Her affection makes him think of his mother, as though she had come in disguise. But the conclusion makes little impact.

"The Dawn of That Night": The title story. Two friends: Hira, a Brahmin who runs a pān shop, and Pulkit, an Amat who runs a tea stall. In an election for village headman, Subodh Mishra, a Brahmin, stands against Sattan Mandal of Raima, who belongs to Pulkit's caste. Perhaps, in Raima, the title Mandal is used by Amats. The election causes a quarrel between the friends. Only after all their money is exhausted on litigation do they come to their senses. Attempting another dramatic ending, the author brings Pulkit to Hira like a shadow at eleven at night. Hira says, in effect, "If you want to strike me, strike again," but the two embrace.

Mātbar (Short-Story Collection, 2001)

Dedicated to "all the participants in Sagar Rāti Dīp Jaray who listened to stories and deliberated upon them," Mātbar contains eighteen stories by Ashok. It opens with "Ekaś Ekaīs," by Mohan Bhardwaj, a mainstream critic whose writing amounts largely to idle chatter. Ashok's observation of society astonishes him—as perhaps it ought to astonish mainstream people: an examination of both the forward and backward communities! Ashok does present both sides, but balancing opposing positions is the task of an essay. It is wrong for a storyteller to accept such pressure. Bhardwaj then adorns Ashok's writing with what he calls the "Maithil weave," of which he identifies two marks: becoming a teller of yarns and giving extended descriptions of reality. In the next paragraph he declares the second not merely a condition for a Maithil story but for a Maithili story. On that reasoning, hardly anything in the world could be non-Maithil! In my village such chatter masquerading as criticism is called bakathothī, and is not held in esteem. He goes on to describe Ashok as a believer in development and a realist; in elaborating, he even calls caste-based and religious mentalities "realistic mentalities." Nowadays such thinking is called "woke" in the West, where it too is not regarded favourably. Before writers of the parallel current began attending Sagar Rāti Dīp Jaray, this kind of criticism was the fashion, and stories were discussed there in much the same way.

Let us now consider the stories in Mātbar.

"Mātbar": The title story of Ohi Rātik Bhor was the last in that collection; "Mātbar" is the first story in the collection of that name. Maharajji is the chief networker—the kind of person nowadays said to provide a single-window service. "He," the protagonist, goes to Maharajji to arrange a posting where there is money to be made. His current officer is a scoundrel who gives him work with no opportunity to earn even a little unofficial income; perhaps Maharajji can exert pressure on him. Everyone gathers at Maharajji's place, eating, drinking and chatting. The author details two or three accompaniments to the liquor, including boiled eggs. But what happened to the real errand "he" came to accomplish? On his way home he narrowly escapes a beating; perhaps the thieves recognise him. His wife and son are angry with him too. The story ends. It is exceedingly ordinary.

"Signature": The story of an IAS officer, beginning with a description of his fingers and ending with his thumb. Corruption, moral depravity and bureaucratic red tape are described in the manner of reportage. At last his thumb ceases to function. He will go to America for treatment—but how can he obtain a passport without a signature? Hence the title.

"The Room": A story about a minister, written as reportage. The author carries it forward in the style of the reportage about the IAS officer in "Signature." An excellent story.

"Ease and Unease": Ashok the storyteller is beginning to come into his own. Kameshar has become an officer, moved to town, takes tablets to sleep and observes restrictions in his diet. Success exacts its price. Radheshyam has had to abandon his studies, yet in the eyes of Kameshar's children he is Superman from the comics.

"Things": A husband and wife manage their household and its petty irritations. Problems at the office interrupt the narrative in italic type on three occasions. There is the craving for supplementary income, the husband's rebukes to his wife and her replies.

"Greed": The manufacture of money and the greed for earning it receive an effective analysis. This can be placed among humorous and satirical stories, and now and then one feels an echo of Chekhov. The officer tells the protagonist, "You may be good at idle conversation, but you have no talent for running an industry devoted to making money."

"The Feast": A person who has undergone the upanayana cannot eat at a śrāddha feast for a year. A Maithil discussion of ritual feasting is presented through the eyes of a Brahmin boy. An outstanding children's story.

"A Question of Happiness": Also based upon child psychology, this account of a family is presented from a boy protagonist's point of view. Another outstanding children's story.

"The Tanpura": The glamour Bhimsen Joshi brought to classical music is evidenced by his Mercedes car and the Bharat Ratna conferred upon him later. His declaration, upon accepting the Bharat Ratna, that he received it on behalf of the great teachers of music was dignified. Those very custodians kept alive the two Indian classical traditions—Hindustani and Carnatic—alongside Western classical music, often at the cost of their own subsistence. "The Tanpura" narrates the death of such livelihoods. Sharadindu Chaudhary has written memoirs, in his own manner, about the plight of block printing after the arrival of offset machines. Likewise, Jagdanand Jha "Manu" wrote the children's story "Earthen Vessels" about potters after metal utensils displaced their ware.

"Harsinghdevi" concerns the harmful consequences of the pañjī genealogy system. Its subject is good, but the treatment is ordinary and essayistic.

"The Well-Wisher of Siwan Rajak" brings caste, politics and Siwan Rajak's bank employment into the narrative. Even the final image, "they uprooted him from the thicket and planted him in a flowerpot," cannot rescue the story.

"Mahto" is another caste-based tale. It concerns an ordinary salaried employee, Mahto, employed as a gardener. We encounter coded terminology for percentages of bribes, Mahto's working in his officers' houses as well as the office, office gossip, and politics—and the story ends. I expected more from Ashok's stories named after Rajak and Mahto, but they seem exercises in filling a quota.

"A Message": Executive Engineer Paswanji harshly berates Diwakar Ravidas after he stops tutoring Paswanji's child. Some essay-like Dalit discourse follows. To introduce a turn at the end, the author has Diwakar ask the protagonist for his steel ring and return a gold ring of the same size. This produces only a little theatrical effect. The story is a pale shadow of O. Henry's "The Gift of the Magi."

"Attachment and Detachment": A story about the ways wealthy and cunning people cheat innocent people with encouragement and reassuring talk. It rises above the ordinary.

"Impulse": A mediocre story. The mother's emotional outburst is described, but adolescent psychology is suppressed, leaving the story one-sided.

"The Old Man Continued to Live" exemplifies Ashok's distinctive strength and area of expertise. It is the fault of dull mainstream criticism that he was never made aware of this strength; he nevertheless recognised it himself and wrote more stories of this kind in his final collection. The old man has no real intention of marrying, declaring that he will not marry a woman over eighteen. Even when an eighteen-year-old proposal arrives, he finds another pretext. Yet in entertaining the matchmakers he goes far beyond the customary serving of śarbat. He laughs even after the deaths of his wife and three sons, because he wants to live. Still, he must sometimes lament, in his loneliness—and he does so before his pupil Sattan.

"Inverse" is another mediocre story, mixing village gossip and backbiting, funeral rites and caste discussion into a single narrative. These strands needed to be disentangled and developed more patiently.

"The Widow" is above average, like "The Old Man Continued to Live." It has three flashpoints. First, the aunt asks Manish whether Sirajuddin is really bad; if he is a decent person, why could Manish not convince his father? Second, she asks what is wrong with working and earning money. Third, Manish admires her dressing well even after her husband's death. The statement that Manish is surprised to see his aunt in such clothes weakens the craftsmanship: after showing so firm a character, the writer should have made Manish surprised if he saw her in white widow's clothing. That is where the drama was needed; the author misses it. Compared with the first two flashpoints, the third feels somewhat insipid. The story is the aunt's, and its opening is sound, but a sequence marker or dash could have marked the transition to the flashback. Had a different narrative technique been used to depict the village's other widow, the story might have reached the highest rank.

Daddygaon (Short-Story Collection, 2017)

Dedicated to Dida, the late Geeta Devi, Daddygaon contains fifteen stories by Ashok.

"A Kick" is a story about a flamboyant kurta; extremely ordinary, it belongs to the category of diary-like writing.

"Deception" is Ashok's finest story, of an exceptionally high order. Vidyanand Jha has translated it into English with only ordinary competence [in The Book of Bihari Literature, edited by Abhay K., HarperCollins, 2022]; nevertheless, the story is so powerful that it comes alive even in that translation. Its psychology is that the soul of the person one acts will enter one's own being. Perform the role of Vidyapati grieving for Ugna, and tears will flow without glycerine. Bholi Jha is clever and resourceful, yet precisely such a soul has entered her.

"Independent" is based on marital rape, but the author becomes preoccupied with writing upon a sociological issue, leaving the story ordinary.

"The Two of Them Learn to Ride Bicycles" is also based on a contemporary problem, but neither the problem is convincingly realised nor the story properly untangled.

"Daddygaon" is the title story. As with "The Dawn of That Night" and "Mātbar," Ashok chooses his most cherished story for the title and adds prop upon prop, yet all three title stories remain ordinary. "Daddygaon" follows a routine sequence concerning development, confusion and commotion.

"Rāg" is another ordinary tale of Hindu–Muslim friendship, with conversation about meat.

"Lemon Ice Cream" is a high-quality story, a true Ashok story. The protagonist's mother used to say, when he cooked well, "It tastes as though it came from a hotel." His wife Meera, however, disliked hotels. She died. As long as his son and daughter were with him, the protagonist had no interest whatever in cooking. The son went to the village, and everyone gathered around him affectionately, praising his mother and praising him. And then...

"Umki" almost becomes an outstanding story. It contains much material on sexist behaviour, and its ending is good. "Your companion is always making you dance anyway. What dance can you show merely by dancing?" lends it a measure of suspense. Yet something is missing.

"Intention" tells of a collapsing family and its emotions. Artificial life has no place for feeling or social institutions; the writer becomes cruel towards his subject, and the story remains ordinary.

"Abhay's Son Has Two Teeth" is an outstanding story. The village is no longer fit to live in, but...

"Life Is the Name of Happiness": Kanhaiya Babu's son finally agrees to marry, and Kanhaiya is happy. The young man is a Maithil Brahmin, the girl a Nair from Kerala. The story concludes by saying that the bride from Kerala is just like us. An ordinary story.

"A Pang": This reads like a tale derived from a case file, and the case itself is commonplace: a husband forges his wife's signature to embezzle money, the wife accepts responsibility, and there is imprisonment. The story is consequently ordinary too.

"A Day's Leave" treats problems of reading and writing in Maithili, with digressions and an inter-caste love marriage. It ends with the proverb that quarrelsome people find even elephant-foot yam irritating, but Abhinav will not. An ordinary, essay-like story.

"The Highway at the Edge of the Village" concerns ring roads. Umesh Paswan writes, "The ghostly turning on the national highway has become a crossroads of death" [Bhutahā Moṛ, in Varṇit Raṣ, 2012, a work awarded the Sahitya Akademi's Maithili Yuva Puraskar]. On national highways crossroads are now routinely called "ghostly bends," because deficient design and a lack of flyovers cause accidents. I too wrote a poem upon this subject:

> And then what a magnificent sight our village would have been!
> What a magnificent sight this six-lane road would have presented!
> We too would have worn clothes
> Just like those

Worn by the child sitting in that red car!
Mother!
I always felt
This road through our village
Was closer to us than that red car belonging to the foreigner;
Yet both of them looked foreign.

(Gajendra Thakur, "The Great Six-Lane Road," Kurukshetram Antarmanak, 2009)

The settlement has died and withered; this national highway seems determined to swallow the village. Dogs are dying throughout the village. The story is high-quality reportage.

"Someone Like This": Boroline, Boroplus and black-and-white television provide material for nostalgic reportage. Then the description of Chaudhary Sahib begins; the story wanders without purpose, obsessed with appearing attractive, praising women, before a junior becomes angry and Chaudharyji's eyes are opened. This purposeless story ends with an ordinary joke.

Ashok has written few short stories, and few of those attain the highest rank. His distinguishing strength is an awareness of modern social problems, a variety of subjects, and a fine capacity to dissect psychology and emotion. Yet his art of clarifying and developing the subject frequently fails because he wants a punchline ending; those punchlines are sometimes very ordinary and repetitive. Again and again I am reminded of the refined narrative technique of Sushil, his mastery of storytelling and his gift for writing new-modern stories.

Gajendra Thakur

Ashok the Writer of Non-fictional Prose

"Father, I am leaving the home of my girlhood;
That threshold has become a mountain, and the courtyard a foreign land."

Ashok the Writer of Non-fictional Prose

Ashok's non-fictional prose includes Maithil Āṅkhi (2007), Saṃvād (a collection of interviews, 2007), Kathāk Upanyās: Upanyāsak Kathā (2012), Āṅkhime Basal (travel writing, 2013), Bāt-Vichār (criticism, 2015), Nīk Dinak Bāiskop (satirical writing, 2018), Rajmohan Jha (an extended essay, 2019), and Kathā-Pāṭh (2022). There is also criticism and other non-fiction scattered through Videha and elsewhere: for example, "More Unmaking than Making" (on Subhash Chandra Yadav's Banait Bigarait), "Editor Rajnandan Lal Das and Karṇāmṛta," "Reading Ramlochan Thakur's Poetry," work on Kedarnath Chaudhary's novel, writings on Sharadinduji, and others.

In Saṃvād, Ashok interviews Rajmohan Jha, Dhumketu, Kulanand Mishra and Mohan Bhardwaj. He is unable to ask any of them an uncomfortable question: whether it concerns Rajmohan Jha's alleged compromise in connection with Subhash Chandra Yadav's monograph on Rajkamal Chaudhary and the Sahitya Akademi award (see my Nit Naval Subhash Chandra Yadav, Gajendra Thakur, 2022, available in the Videha archive); Dhumketu's writing with the red flag as a prop; or Mohan Bhardwaj's description of Maithil Brahmin ritual songs as the ritual songs of all Mithila (see the volume he edited for the Maithili Academy). Later Umesh Mandal collected the ritual songs of all castes, which were published electronically by Videha and constitute the genuine ritual-song traditions of Mithila. Yet, in "A Day's Leave" (Daddygaon, 2017), Ashok did raise all the questions that he had not managed to ask. An interview with Prabhas Kumar Chaudhary could not take place because of the latter's death; instead Ashok brought out Sandhān, issue 3, devoted to Prabhas.

Āṅkhime Basal (travel writing, 2013) describes the narrative presented to Ashok's generation, in which the Soviet Union was celebrated and America derided, even while those who propagated it sent their sons and daughters to America for education. I remember a friend who travelled to Darbhanga for an examination, walked around the university neighbourhood and declared on his return that no other city in Bihar was as fine as Darbhanga. Beyond his travel writing, Ashok did the same thing in the poem "From Soviet Russia" (Chakravyūha, 1986).

Maithil Āṅkhi (2007), Kathāk Upanyās: Upanyāsak Kathā (2012), Bāt-Vichār (2015) and Kathā-Pāṭh (2022) are collections of his essays and essay-like critical pieces.

The following points emerge in favour of, and against, Ashok's criticism and essays:

(1) His work offers evidence of studying only mainstream writers. He seems unaware of the contributions of the parallel current over the last fifteen years—or perhaps he fears that mentioning them will estrange him from the mainstream. In "The Development of the Maithili Short Story: Changing Voices and Tendencies," he says that Jivakant wrote more stories than any other Maithili author and puts the number at two hundred. He has not yet felt a need to revise that article in the light of new evidence, although Jagdish Prasad Mandal has written 850 stories so far.

(2) His criticism of living writers consists chiefly of praise and description. If criticism of a living author never identifies weaknesses, how can that author improve? One example is "The Mirage of Migration to a Distant Land and the Struggle of a Working Woman—Hasina Manzil." In criticism of deceased writers he shows somewhat more courage, as in "Lalit's Pṛthvīputra," but there he creates further confusion. He asks: "The natural question here is why, while writing a novel about the struggles of cultivators, Lalit introduced the love story of Kalpu and Bijli. Why did he think it necessary to raise a social problem such as marriage between a Brahmin and an untouchable? Why did a conscious writer like Lalit needlessly take on this burden?" In the final line of his article, Ashok explains his reasoning: "In fact, this conception of Lalit's Maithil saṃskāra is a product of casteist ideology." In support, he invokes a conversation between Lalit and Ramdev Jha, although such a prop is unnecessary. Love and sex are perennial subjects; neither famine nor plague can abolish them. Ashok needed no external justification. Gabriel García Márquez's Love in the Time of Cholera is proof enough.

(3) Nīk Dinak Bāiskop, his collection of satire, gave Ashok an opportunity to say everything he wished, in the manner of the exuberant jogīrā sung at Holi. He missed that opportunity too.

53. A Study of Būchjī's Poetry from Marxist, Historical, Structuralist, Magical-Realist, Postmodern, Feminist and Deconstructionist Perspectives, as Well as from Indian Aesthetics

Abstract

In his poem "Jeṭhī Kareh," Būchjī says that the river rises turbulently in the morning and overflows even when rainfall has diminished. The danger mark lies very high, so why does the river remain restless? At the end he suggests that it will break through the embankment and unleash a catastrophe. This is the ordinary, surface reading of the poem.

Keywords: Būch; poetry; Marxism; structuralism; deconstruction; postmodernity; Indian aesthetics; sphoṭa

"Jeṭhī Kareh"

In Būchjī's poem "Jeṭhī Kareh," the poet says that the river rises in turbulence in the morning and overflows despite a decrease in rainfall. The danger mark stands very high; why, then, is the river so agitated? He ends by predicting that the river will break its embankment and work destruction. That is a general reading. From a structuralist standpoint, the statement that the Kareh rises turbulently in the morning implies that perhaps it does not rise so at other times. It overflows despite less rain, although one would expect otherwise. The shimmering of its water, whirlpools at the bends, and their effect—the river drawing the very heart of the village mound into itself—come together as a structure. The rise in its sandbanks unsettles the poet's patience. Let us move away from structuralism to historical analysis. The poem will acquire a new meaning in a new era. The danger mark that appeared very high in the poet's time is no longer so high, because silt has accumulated between the embankments and raised the riverbed. For a new generation the poem thus assumes a form different from the poet's original conception. Now turn from structuralism towards deconstruction. A deconstructionist would contend that the structuralist's poles take on philosophical dimensions. Reduced rainfall accompanied by flooding, the foolishness of engineers attempting to imprison the Kareh behind embankments, and the poet's prediction that the river will tear the embankments apart and cause devastation—all raise questions about whether the poet's polarisation is lasting or temporary. Let us return to the poem's historicity. In magical-realist literature, if we travel back into the past, we see the spirit of dam-building possessing people in the 1960s: dams, lofty and broad, that would restrain rivers and supposedly shower blessings upon human beings. If this poem reached a character inhabiting such a magical-realist world, the character would give it yet another meaning. The poet's own presence would dissolve, and the science of language would begin its play. A magical-realist character inhabiting the future would also interpret it differently: unable to comprehend the poet's claim that the river's danger mark stood high, the character would seek the feeling that animated the poem. But deconstruction would then become entangled in its own net. Much would be left unsaid, and still much would remain to be said. Rain would endure, and the river would remain, though in a transformed state; its waters would continue to shimmer in the sunlight. Rising turbulence and overflowing would persist.

"A Song of Welcome"

A general reading: the poet welcomes everyone, yet asks what song of celebration can be sung amid the anguished cries of Mithila's eroding earth. The bees are thirsty and the fruit trees wither: what use is this ceremonial gathering? One must bring a staff along with poetry and a rough implement of labour alongside the flow of rasa. Beneath the poem appears a note: "Welcome to the guests at the Vidyapati Memorial Festival, 1984, village Baidyanathpur, Rosera block, Samastipur district." This was the period when migration from Mithila was beginning. The bridge over the Ganges at Hajipur had been built. The model of development seemed to have failed; disillusionment with large embankments had set in. The catastrophe of floods afflicted farming and farmers, while industrialisation based on local crops was absent and campaigns for education were nowhere visible. In these circumstances the poet had undertaken the duty of welcoming the guests. Consider dhvani theory. In the Dhvanyāloka, Ānandavardhana argues that literature's purpose is to suggest or generate meaning indirectly. The theory describes the structure and functioning of implied meaning and is related to rasa, the experience of aesthetic relish, and alaṃkāra, figures of speech. Ānandavardhana regards dhvani, suggestion, as the soul of poetry. Meaning may emerge obliquely through suggestion, but it emerges in an organised fashion; hence theories of meaning and symbol, and the production of rasa, become important. Nyāya and Mīmāṃsā opposed this theory, denying an independent existence to dhvani and regarding its effects as inference already covered by the category of secondary indication (lakṣaṇā). Not everything, they argued, could be directly stated in words. Read "A Song of Welcome" through dhvani. By declaring that Vidyapati, the Shiva-like conqueror of death, is dead, the poet brings meaning and symbol into view together. Nyāya opposed dhvani theory, but Būchjī, a poet from Kariyan, the village of the Nyāya philosopher Udayana, is a poet rather than a philosopher. He gives suggestion a powerful structure: our ill fortune has become deeply rooted and enduring; what will this ceremonial gathering alone accomplish? He continues: "Recite poetry, but carry a staff upon your shoulder; let one hand hold the source of rasa, the other the rough tool." Filled with such symbols, the poem moves forward with coherence as it welcomes the visitors. From a Marxist standpoint, the poet's task exceeds the simple recitation of verse. Affirmation and negation, the old and the new, development and death have been combined successfully. Had "A Song of Welcome" detached itself from its circumstances to offer applause and empty praise, it would have been an inferior poem from a Marxist perspective, like so many conventional Maithili songs of welcome and celebrations of wealth. Instead, the poet makes the song part of a dynamic process, transforming it into Maithili's finest welcome song.

"The Daughter Became a Mountain"

A general reading of "The Daughter Became a Mountain": the cherished daughter has become a water jar hanging from her father's neck. She arrived on a flying conveyance, but now forsakes Hari's Garuda and demands a car. Thirty-five grams of gold have been furnished, yet there are further demands for wedding-night expenses and a ten-vehicle marriage procession. Electric bulbs shine everywhere, but darkness remains at the very centre. Dasharatha did not ask for a single coin; Rama said nothing. History tells of Krishna's love marriage, but what of that? In the present, Janaka cries out in despair. The father holds his son by the throat; homes have become slaughterhouses and villages markets. From the standpoint of sociological criticism, the poem opposes the system of onerous marriage demands or dowry. In that period, as even now, the custom has made the cherished daughter who seemed to arrive upon a flying vehicle a source of exhaustion and anxiety for her father.

"A Song of Sorrow"

A general reading of "A Song of Sorrow": hearing the cuckoo's plaintive song, one sees a flowering grove through tear-filled eyes. On a golden summit of valour, a readily attained victory of the ocean of peace! Whenever an embrace seems possible, innumerable crooked thorns pierce the flesh. Beauty came for two moments—and went away. Love's honey turned bitter. Night's weeping melts into dawn. A formalist reading: examine the flowering grove seen through streaming eyes, the terrible aspect of a burning cremation ground appearing upon the bridal bed, and the easy victory of an ocean of peace upon the golden summit of valour. The poet employs the defamiliarising aspect of language particularly well, and this gives his poem its poetic quality. Contradictory words, their unfamiliar combinations, and language rich in sound figures make the poem distinctive. Thorns piercing like flowers and other such combinations give it formalist excellence.

"It Is the Village I Remember"

A general reading: in the village there might have been barely enough bread and the poorest greens without salt, yet it is the village that the speaker remembers from Calcutta. If water from the Kareh could be used to cultivate pearls, would the children have to scatter? Would it be better to remain a gentleman on the Hooghly or a labourer on the banks of the Kamala? The woods beside the Kamala are lovelier than Eden Gardens. There a husband adorns his wife with a garland, whereas in the woods by the Kamala a woman of Tirhut searches for dhaturā and ākoṇ flowers to offer her Bhola, Shiva. A feminist reading: this is a poem of migration. The Tirhut woman searches for flowers for Bhola, while her Bhola lives away from home. From an existentialist standpoint, this Bhola is responsible for his own circumstances, solitary existence and worries.

"Son Dai"

A general reading: neither laughter nor pleasure will enter Son Dai's life—but why? Groups of children depart; young people follow, and the elderly wither away. Yet why does Son Dai continue to trust? The answer appears later: she has forgotten her homeland and spends her life in migration. As age advances, how long can she go on living in Son Dai's house? From a feminist standpoint, theories about women, even theories of poetry, made by men in a male-centred society are not appropriate to women. For whose sake has Son Dai forgotten her homeland and endured a migrant existence?

"Famine"

A general reading of "Famine": the poet describes hunger as a torch tied to a tail, beating time upon a raised platform. Drought brings famine, and famine rising prices, until the sky over the burning village becomes red. Death performs a dance of destruction in India as in Lanka; this time even Vibhishana's house will not escape, for a garland of heads is tied together with cord. Mother embraces the earth in her arms; ten-headed Ravana opens all twenty eyes and shakes his heads. The theory of aucitya, or propriety: in the Aucityavicāracarcā, Kshemendra treats propriety as the principal element of literature. Where should propriety reside? In a word, sentence, the meaning of an entire composition, literary quality, figure of speech, rasa, grammatical case, action, gender, number, adjective, prefix, particle, time, place, family, observance, essential truth, inner quality, intention, nature, selection of essentials, talent, condition, reflection, name and benediction. The universe trembles, existing as vibration alone. After a poem is read, peace spreads everywhere, even through the mind. A reading of "Famine" from aucitya: this is not merely a famine but Time as the Great Destroyer—hunger's torch tied to a tail beating its rhythm on the platform. Within the time and place of Mithila, this description of famine is appropriate to the poem. Ravana must be uprooted; Vibhishana too will not survive.

"Your Lips"

A general reading of "Your Lips": lips reddened by pān and the lips of a beautiful woman. She applies the lime of speech and adorns her cheeks with drops red as katthā, the catechu used in pān. But where is the pipe that sounds the tune of love? The redness of dawn resembles her lips, and without her the speaker is like an anxious evening. If an executioner is to become her husband, he will become the dismembered Rahu. Nectar is rare even in heaven; where, then, can one find lips like hers? The Sakri sugar mill will become great when he learns science from Vishvakarma; sweetness will flow out of that mill. Her lips resemble a ripe segment of sugarcane. Even in rebirth he will come to her as paddy and delicately cooked rice. Yet after all this, the intended purpose is still not revealed through words. A reading through alaṃkāra theory: Bhāmaha regards figures of speech in terms of samāsokti, the expression that becomes a source of pleasure. Daṇḍin and Udbhaṭa developed the theory further. Figures of speech fall primarily into two classes, those based upon sound and those upon meaning, and further into resemblance, contrast, logical inference, common-world reasoning, poetic convention and apprehension of hidden significance. Mammaṭa divides sixty-one figures into seven groups: upamā (simile), rūpaka (metaphor), aprastuta (indirect praise), dīpaka (a figure of distributed illumination), vyatireka (contrast), virodha (contradiction), and samuccaya (combination). "Applying the lime of speech" is indirect expression. "Cheeks with red drops like katthā," "lips red with pān and the woman's lips," "the blush of dawn like her lips," and "her lips like a ripe joint of sugarcane" are among the poet's similes. "Where is the sounding reed of love?" expresses tension between similarity and difference, while "anxious in the middle of the road without you" employs metaphor. The Indian conception of poetry: art as a path to liberation. Consider Nataraja's posture, where the rhythms of creation and destruction are simultaneously visible. The enduring emotion is intensified and matured into rasa—and how many such experiences of rasa did Sita and Rama undergo (see Vālmīki's Rāmāyaṇa)? Krishna is a teacher of the Indian doctrine of action, and at the same time a connoisseur of pleasure. A theory of rasa was needed to account for the savour of art, and Bharata composed the Nāṭyaśāstra. Abhinavagupta wrote a commentary on Ānandavardhana's Dhvanyāloka. Bhāmaha in the sixth century, Daṇḍin in the seventh, and Rudraṭa in the ninth developed related lines of thought. A reading of "Your Lips" through rasa theory: for Bharata, the performance of drama produces rasa. What is drama for? For the enactment of rasa, but also for bringing rasa into being. How is it produced? Through vibhāva (determinants or causes), anubhāva (expressive manifestations or consequences), and vyabhicāribhāva (associated or transitory states). The enduring emotion matures into rasa and becomes something we can relish. For Bhaṭṭa Lollaṭa, the enduring emotion intensifies through cause and effect until it becomes rasa. Actors and actresses experience it through research and imagination. Lollaṭa gives little importance to the poet or to the listener-spectator. Śaṅkuka holds that, to experience rasa, the spectator must enter the performance imaginatively, much as one appreciates an image of a horse by apprehending it as a horse. Bhaṭṭa Nāyaka says that rasa acts upon the spectator and treats poetic language as distinct from ordinary language. Through rasa the soul of the listener-spectator unites with the supreme soul. The pleasure of rasa is the enjoyment of one's own essential being, yielding self-realisation. Rasa theory is founded upon the listener, spectator and reader; these are its emphases. In the passage "You applied the stone-lime of speech / and adorned your cheeks with the blood-red katthā," we have vibhāva, the determining cause; "seeing this, my heart surged" is anubhāva, its expressive consequence. The theory of sphoṭa: Bhartṛhari's Vākyapadīya holds that the meaning of a word or sentence is conveyed through an integrated burst of apprehension, sphoṭa. Through varṇa-sphoṭa, letters are apprehended; through pada-sphoṭa, words; and through vākya-sphoṭa, sentences. No knowledge is possible without some relation to words. This became part of Indian epistemology. Meaning can be communicated without the simultaneous physical presence of letters, words and sentences. Sphoṭa is śabdabrahman, the verbal absolute, and the fundamental cause of creation. Letters, words and sentences do not exist simultaneously as complete wholes. The separate sounds of an uttered word do not individually possess the full meaning; until the word is complete, they arise and perish. In sphoṭa, meaning is apprehended even though the letters, words or sentence do not all exist at the moment of apprehension or transmission. Until the word is complete, each successive letter contributes to a sequence of signification, just as successive words do until a sentence is complete. Sāṃkhya, Nyāya, Vaiśeṣika, Mīmāṃsā and Vedānta reject sphoṭa, holding instead that letters and their sounds adequately establish meaning. Jacques Derrida's theories of deconstruction and dissemination come close to sphoṭa. A reading of "Your Lips" through sphoṭa: although Būchjī lives on the soil of Udayana's Kariyan, Nyāya's rejection of sphoṭa is not enough to account for his poetry. Having spoken every secret thought held in his heart, he compares the elusive thief of his mind to the beautiful woman's lips.

Būch, the poet from Udayana's village, writes of letters exhausting themselves, one by one, and of the purpose remaining unrevealed by words. The manner in which he communicates meaning not simply through words but through sphoṭa in "Your Lips" and the other poems in this collection presents Būchjī as Maithili's most rhythmic poet after Vidyapati. In Yehudi Menuhin's words, Maithili is the world's most rhythmic and melodious language. Būchjī's poetry redefines Maithili verse in this form.

Drama and Theatre

54. Nachiketa's Play No Entry: Mā Praviśa

Abstract

The Plot of the Play—First Kallola: This play is divided into kallolas in the tradition of Jyotirishwar. His Varṇaratnākara is divided into kallolas, although it is not a play; his play Dhūrtasamāgama is divided into acts. The first of the four kallolas begins at the entrance to heaven—or perhaps hell—where many dead people wait in a queue to be allowed inside.

Keywords: Nachiketa; drama; No Entry; Mā Praviśa; literary criticism; Maithili

The Plot—First Kallola: This play is divided into kallolas in the tradition of Jyotirishwar. His Varṇaratnākara is divided into kallolas, although it is not a play, whereas his play Dhūrtasamāgama is divided into acts. The first of four kallolas opens at the gate of heaven—or hell—where a large number of the deceased are queuing to enter. There is a city gentleman who died in a road accident, along with soldiers killed in war, thieves killed while stealing, rogues and pickpockets. The ultramodern absurdity of Jyotirishwar's Dhūrtasamāgama is evident also in No Entry: Mā Praviśa. In the first kallola, when a thief and a ruffian break the queue and go forward, the city gentleman seizes each of them by the collar and returns them to their places. The ruffian, later revealed as a gang boss, tells him to let go of his shirt, but is momentarily restrained by the gentleman's imposing manner. When a pickpocket speaks from the gentleman's side against the thief, the ruffian draws a knife, reveals his true nature and launches himself at the pickpocket. The thief explains that the pickpocket belongs to their own fraternity but has only managed to become a petty pickpocket, not a skilled thief like himself, and could never even dream of being a hardened thug like the ruffian. The ruffian now turns on the thief: whom did he just call a thug? The pickpocket quickly changes sides and tells the ruffian that the insult was aimed at him, not at the ruffian. He adds that the thief is so incompetent at his craft that a householder's sons and dogs beat him to death while he was stealing—and yet he dares ridicule a pickpocket and call himself a great thief! The respectable man cannot believe that someone who speaks so fluently could actually be a thief, so the pickpocket teases "His Majesty the Thief" still further. The thief then laments that, had he known, he would never have taken this pickpocket along to steal that night, nor would he have been able to bear seeing him beaten. The city gentleman, who earlier dragged the thief and ruffian back by their collars, listens in silence and wonders what sort of heaven it will be if he must live there with such people. He recites a fragment of song upon the subject. As in Dhūrtasamāgama, songs are interspersed throughout No Entry: Mā Praviśa; the singing begins here and makes this a musical play. Meanwhile the pickpocket empties everyone's pockets and wallets. Another musical refrain begins, but a dead ragpicker interrupts the spell by observing that beyond the closed gate of Yama's realm, money and purses are of no use. The two deceased respectable men agree: the currency of one country is not accepted in another. A dead romantic gentleman named Ramani Mohan comments that changing countries' currencies is much like one's beloved becoming someone else's wife. An argument begins, so Ramani Mohan changes the subject to the Apsaras Rambha and Menaka who may be waiting inside. A beggar woman, who has passed the doll she was cradling to someone else in order to join the argument, jealously abuses Rambha and Menaka as sharp-tongued women. The pickpocket points out that the other side may contain sorrow as readily as happiness. This delights an insurance agent, who sees an opportunity to expand his business. The pickpocket then begins soliciting bids, in rupees, for Indra's thunderbolt. The city gentleman interrupts the proceedings, and the respectable men support him: what an extraordinary auction, run by a pickpocket with the thief and beggar woman bidding! They have never heard of its like. Another musical refrain starts. Just then Nandi and Bhringi enter, dancing to classical music. Asked by Nandi and Bhringi what lies beyond the door, each character answers according to his or her beliefs: heaven or hell, the heights of the sky or the depths below. Nandi and Bhringi tell them that each has spoken the truth, yet none has spoken the whole truth. They begin listing the deaths: one was killed while stealing (at which the thief tries to run away, only to be brought back by two or three others), one in an accident, and so on. But even Nandi and Bhringi cannot explain how the insurance agent arrived here without dying. He declares that he has come prospecting for a new market! Thus one person is present without being dead. Bhringi explains to Nandi the fierce competition brought about by the arrival of so many insurance companies. Meanwhile the lovers quarrel because the young man wants to go back. Ramani Mohan is delighted at the prospect of the young man's departure: the woman will be alone and he will have his chance. Bhringi says that leaving this place is impossible, though the couple might go and arrange for their respective parents to die in accidents and join them. The lovers refuse to sacrifice their parents for their own convenience. Nandi and Bhringi therefore marry the pair with music and ceremonial instruments, the city gentleman performing the giving away of the bride.

Second Kallola: The scene opens with the expectation that a political leader will arrive after his death. Two of his followers have already died and reached the waiting area. Everyone awaits Netaji, while the two followers make short speeches, with songs, to compensate for his lateness—even after death. The thief fails to understand a song, but the beggar woman and ragpicker understand it, prompting an argument. The thief objects to being called a thief; when he calls the woman a beggar, she protests: she is Anasuya of Sarisav-Pahi, a Mithila painter. Only after arriving in Delhi's Ashok Basti did she discover that no one in the city would buy art objects, so she became a beggar at the crossroads. The thief claims that only he has earned a bad name, for everyone steals. Nothing is new; everything is a theft from the past. Netaji then arrives and attributes the presence of thieves, ruffians and pickpockets to social conditions. A leftist arrives too and is offended to find Netaji surrounded by such people. But the thief again advances his own argument, and the city gentleman launches into song upon Netaji's expression "the Purāṇa of Thieves."

Third Kallola: Discussion turns to a coalition between Netaji and the leftist, and to the leftist's external support for the government. Netaji again begins to sing, but attention shifts when a deceased actor, Vivek Kumar, arrives in a stunt-like entrance. Netaji satirises the compulsion to supply instant "breaking news." Twice the leftist says something new: first, that no one can become a political leader without first becoming an actor; second, that a thief cannot become a leader (so the thief asserts), whereas politicians themselves lag behind no one in stealing. Just then a high-born woman arrives. After she is questioned, a VIP queue forms alongside the ordinary queue. The actor, political leader and leftist promptly stand in the VIP line! When asked why they have formed a queue at all, the thief and pickpocket answer that they are practised at forming queues—and breaking them.

Fourth Kallola: Yama examines everyone's accounts and records. Chitragupta reveals that there was once an age when the door in front of them opened and closed. Nandi and Bhringi have already warned them that the supposed door was no dream, but an error of perception. Asked what lies beyond, everyone gives a different answer, and Chitragupta says that everything in their descriptions is indeed there. Nandi and Bhringi announce that entry through this gate is forbidden: the sign says "NO ENTRY." Alas, what are they to do? Netaji is sent before Yama, but his eloquence deserts him. The famous politician Badri Vishal Mishra is questioned about having understated his age on a certificate. It says fifty-five, but the astrological Śaśa Yoga indicates that he will live beyond seventy. He is therefore sent back, along with the four soldiers. Two soldiers accompany Netaji, and the leader's two followers wish to leave too. Their crimes, however, are too serious. On Chitragupta's orders Nandi and Bhringi take the followers away to be roasted in a cauldron; the other two soldiers seize and lead them away, and Nandi and Bhringi return to the stage. After further debate, the lovers, the two respectable men and the city gentleman are also granted release, leaving to the sound of drums and pipes. Nandi then announces the actor as "Vivek Kumar, alias..." but the actor interrupts: after so much effort he has managed to leave his caste identity behind, so please omit the "alias." When the actor mentions assisting a leftist meeting, the leftist contradicts him. The actor too is sent back. What of the leftist? His ideology has neither heaven nor hell, neither Yama nor Chitragupta. He is offered the opportunity to decide his own future, but says that although his education taught him otherwise, how can he disbelieve what is happening before his eyes? Yama answers that what he sees might be a nightmare: everywhere he seeks to enter he will find the words "NO ENTRY." Yama then asks who is unequal or unjust—human beings or nature? The leftist answers: both. Nature sometimes operates according to natural justice, but where is any prospect of such justice in human nature? Leftist politics nevertheless attempts to secure equality and reform. Yama sends the thief, the ruffian and the pickpocket with him, inviting him to change them. The thief hesitates and asks: "We are going, but what lies beyond?" Nandi, Chitragupta and Yama respond together: "NO ENTRY." Bhringi now returns, having escorted the actor away. Yama says, "Mā praviśa—do not enter." Bhringi reports what people are saying below: everywhere there is talk that the rules here will be changed and that many people are to be allowed to return to earth. Yama's messengers stand idly beside their cauldrons, having found no one to roast —except the two followers. Everyone agrees that no arrivals remain. Chitragupta removes his long beard and Yama his crown, revealing two ordinary human beings beneath the costumes! The beggar woman, who is still there, laughs at Chitragupta's long theatrical beard. Bhringi reveals that the beggar woman is an actor just like themselves. What acting! Their exchange about it ends with love and playful teasing, but the beggar woman says that the real performance is happening "over there," pointing to the romance developing between Ramani Mohan and Nibha, the high-born woman. Nibha, however, says nothing. The beggar woman tells Yama that Nibha will speak only when she receives the key to the locked door; she will imagine that Yama can help make her an Apsara. The heart of this romantic woman, too, bears the sign "NO ENTRY." Yama coughs, and Chitragupta realises that Yama has been struck by the five arrows of the god of love. At Chitragupta's instruction everyone leaves the stage except Yama and Nibha. Facing her, Yama begins, "Listen, Nibha..." and stops. Encouraged by the others, he gives her an enormous key, but once she has it she walks away with Ramani Mohan as though she did not know Yama at all. She passes the key to Ramani Mohan, who cannot open the lock. Nibha steps forward to try, but Chitragupta says that this is the door of the mind and cannot be opened in that manner. The woman protests that they have been given the key only to be deceived. Everyone laughs: "Where have you left your mind?" Once again Ramani Mohan and Nibha attempt, unsuccessfully, to join their minds and unlock the door. Nandi, Bhringi and the beggar woman sing of the lock upon the heart and its sign "NO ENTRY." Yet spring brings endless love, and the heart calls "Maina, Maina." Therefore, they resolve to stage a sit-in right there before the "NO ENTRY" door.

Critical Discussion: A comparative study of Indian and Western theories of drama shows how remarkably similar human thinking can remain despite geographical distances. Indian dramaturgy is grounded principally in Bharata's Nāṭyaśāstra and Dhanañjaya's Daśarūpaka. The authoritative Western text is Aristotle's Poetics.

Bharata calls drama an imitation of action (kṛtānusāra) and an imitation of emotion (bhāvānukāra), while Dhanañjaya defines it as the imitation of a condition. In Indian literary theory, imitation is the actor's work, not the poet's. In the West, imitation is understood as the poet's work; the actor is not discussed in the same way.

Aristotle places special emphasis on plot. Tragedy comprises plot, characterisation, diction, thought, spectacle and song. Bharata distinguishes the principal plot concerning the hero, ādhikārika, from an incidental plot that aids it, prāsaṅgika. Not every play, however, must have an incidental plot. No Entry: Mā Praviśa has neither a conventionally central plot nor a subsidiary one, because it has no universally acknowledged hero. The city gentleman who seizes the ruffian by the collar soon becomes a minor figure. The thief who cowers before the ruffian later emerges as a spokesman for the philosophy that nothing is truly new. Yama, who terrifies everyone, finds his authority weakened before Nibha. When the beggar woman laughs at his removal of the divine costume, Ramani Mohan and Nibha even abuse him and Chitragupta at the end. The leftist and the actor undergo comparable reversals. No character is inherently weak; each rebounds and changes in response to time and circumstance.

From the perspective of narrative source, plots fall into three groups: prakhyāta, drawn from known history or the Purāṇas; utpādya, invented; and miśra, combining both. The possibility of calling No Entry: Mā Praviśa a mixed plot ends when Chitragupta and Yama remove their false costumes and Bhringi, after the beggar woman laughs, identifies her as an actor like themselves. Names such as Yama and Chitragupta alone do not make a story historical or Purāṇic; its plot is wholly invented. Aristotle distinguishes simple and complex plots. The ease and fluency with which unforeseen events enter No Entry: Mā Praviśa place it among simple plots. Aristotle further relates narrative material to fable, imagination and history; by that scheme this play belongs to the imaginative category. His tragic characters are renowned and noble, mixed in virtue and vice. Here too every character combines good and bad. Nibha is high-born yet becomes intimate with Ramani Mohan, who died from injuries inflicted upon him after committing rape. The beggar woman is Anasuya, a Mithila painter. In contrast, the two respectable men, the city gentleman and four soldiers appear untainted. Bharata calls the lover of music and dance dhīralalita, the person of peaceful disposition dhīrapraśānta, the heroic or Kshatriya-like nature dhīrodātta, and the jealous or arrogant person dhīroddhata. The city gentleman and the two respectable men love music; Ramani Mohan becomes jealous at the sight of the lovers. The soldiers possess both tranquillity and heroic qualities and may be regarded as dhīrapraśānta and dhīrodātta. Yet no such division fully encompasses the characters of No Entry: Mā Praviśa.

Indian dramaturgy names five stages of action: ārambha (commencement), prayatna (effort), prāptyāśā (hope of attainment), niyatāpti (certainty of attainment), and phalāgama (fruition). At prāptyāśā disappointment threatens the outcome; at niyatāpti hope returns. Western theory describes exposition, rising action, climax, falling action and final resolution. The first three increase entanglement; the final two bring it to a close.

The five arthaprakṛtis, or elements of the developing action, are bīja, bindu, patākā, prakarī and kārya. In No Entry: Mā Praviśa, the seed is the paradox of the world after death, especially an insurance agent who comes there without dying. Yama and Chitragupta eventually turn out to be actors in make-up. Various pivotal moments raise one character and lower another. Patākā and prakarī concern subsidiary episodes, which are absent here. Kārya, the fully developed seed, should be the completed action, yet here the action ends in a sit-in protest! Aristotle speaks of beginning, middle and end. Consider now the sandhis, or structural junctures: mukha-sandhi joins the seed and commencement; pratimukha-sandhi joins the connecting point and effort; garbha-sandhi joins the extended incident and hope of attainment; vimarśa-sandhi joins the brief episode and certainty of attainment; and nirvahaṇa-sandhi joins fruition and completed action. No Entry: Mā Praviśa has mukha, pratimukha and nirvahaṇa junctures, but lacks the other two.

Western theory seeks the unities of place, time and action. No Entry: Mā Praviśa takes place in a single location, unfolds in continuous time, and concerns one action: the desire to enter through the gate. A two-hour play depicts events lasting two hours. Abhinavagupta likewise advises that a single act should not contain events spanning more than a day and that two acts should not contain more than a year. The divisions into kallolas here arise from the time allotted to episodes and the interval before new action begins. Dryden, however, opposed the strict classical triad and defended the freedom of Shakespeare's plays. No such difficulty arises here.

Casual conversation among the characters—also describable as flashback —effectively reveals the circumstances of their deaths.

In India, the performability and visual nature of drama were supported, whereas Aristotle and Plato opposed spectacle in important respects. In the sixteenth century Lodovico Castelvetro argued for spectacle; d'Aubignac also supported the visual dimension, whereas Dryden emphasised drama's readability. Dacier valued both reading and performance. Abhinavagupta held that the fullest experience of rasa comes after performance, although reading can also yield aesthetic relish. At the opening of the first kallola of No Entry: Mā Praviśa, the primacy of stage performance becomes clear. Western theatrical convention tends towards realistic representation; Indian theatre makes extensive use of symbolic gesture. For example, in Abhijñānaśākuntalam Kālidāsa writes, "He acts as though fitting an arrow to the bow." No Entry: Mā Praviśa adopts the Indian convention: the invisible wall of the gate to heaven is made perceptible by the characters' dialogue and acting. Performance was central to Ankiyā Nāṭ as well. Kīrtaniyā theatre was in one sense musical, yet acting played a dominant role there too; Ankiyā drama began with the sound of the mṛdaṅga. No Entry: Mā Praviśa connects itself with Maithili tradition while offering a new perspective on history, mythology and contemporary life, and a fresh insight with which to think about them.

Extending the lineage of Jyotirishwar's Dhūrtasamāgama, Vidyapati's Gorakṣavijaya, Kīrtaniyā plays, Ankiyā Nāṭ, Munshi Raghunandan Das's Mithila Nāṭak, Jivan Jha's Sundar Saṃyog, Ishanath Jha's Chīnīk Laḍḍū, Govind Jha's Basāt, Manipadma's Tesar Kaniyā, Nachiketaji's "Nāyakak Nām Jīvan" and "Ek Chhal Rājā," Shreeji's Puruṣārtha, Sudhanshu Shekhar Chaudhary's Bhaphāit Chāhak Jīngī, Mahendra Malangia's Kāṭhak Lok, Ram Bharos Kapari Bhramar's Mahiṣāsur Murdābād, and Gangesh Gunjan's Budhibadhiyā, Nachiketa's No Entry: Mā Praviśa repeatedly rejects the supposed objectivity of rationality and modernity. Yama even tells the leftist that what he sees may not be true at all, but a dream. The play thus comments on the supposed completeness of scientific knowledge. Everyone describes truth and falsehood from a particular point of view. The thief has his own argument, while the leftist says that thieves cannot become leaders, yet political leaders are threatening the thieves' livelihood by taking up theft themselves. Self-centred humour and judgements of good and bad arise and disappear repeatedly. Even Yama and Chitragupta live behind masks. Alongside these postmodern features, each character may reveal several identities, as does the high-born woman. No event has a single complete meaning, and one can never know when truth will turn into falsehood. The play abounds in superficial postmodern reflection and such characters. It offers neither optimism nor pessimism; what it offers is a kind of inspired madness, the idea that one thing may be thought about in several different ways. Rather than place faith in results produced by reason, control and planning, it gives greater weight to the consequences of chance. Democratic and feminist outlooks and ideologies symbolised by the red flag also enter through laughter and satire.

Thus No Entry: Mā Praviśa presents a postmodern outlook. Readers encounter problems raised in the course of the plot which they recognise from their own lives. The conflict shown at the end does not astonish a reader in the postmodern age, for such conflicts are encountered in everyday life.

55. Four Postmodern Plays: Samuel Beckett's French Waiting for Godot, Harold Pinter's English The Birthday Party, Badal Sircar's Bengali Evam Indrajit, and Uday Narayan Singh "Nachiketa"'s Maithili No Entry: Mā Praviśa

Abstract

[No Entry: Mā Praviśa was published in 2008 and was not selected for the Sahitya Akademi Award in 2010, 2011 or 2012. It will therefore no longer be eligible for the Sahitya Akademi Award for Maithili literature. The place of No Entry: Mā Praviśa between Maithili literature and world literature is examined below.

Keywords: four postmodern plays; Samuel Beckett; French; Waiting for Godot

[No Entry: Mā Praviśa was published in 2008 and was not selected for the Sahitya Akademi Award in 2010, 2011 or 2012. It will therefore no longer be eligible for the Sahitya Akademi Award for Maithili literature. There have been other instances of this kind. The position of No Entry: Mā Praviśa in relation to Maithili and world literature is examined below. This series will continue.]

...

Waiting for Godot is a tragicomedy in two acts. Samuel Beckett wrote it in French in 1952; its first performance took place in Paris in 1953. The English version was staged in London in 1955 and published in 1956.

Harold Pinter's English play The Birthday Party was staged in Cambridge in 1958 and published in 1960.

Badal Sircar wrote the Bengali play Evam Indrajit in 1962, and it was staged in Calcutta in 1965.

Uday Narayan Singh "Nachiketa"'s No Entry: Mā Praviśa was published electronically in 2008 and also appeared in print that year. Directed by Kunal, the ninety-minute play was staged at Kalidas Rangalaya, Patna, on 19 February 2011.

All four plays—in French, English, Bengali and Maithili—are counted as postmodern drama. People leaving a performance of Samuel Beckett's Waiting for Godot encountered a strange experience. There are only five characters: Estragon, Vladimir, Lucky, Pozzo and a boy. In the evening, on a country road beside a tree, Estragon sits on a mound of earth, struggling with both hands to take off his boots. He becomes exhausted. He and Vladimir begin to talk, wandering at length through trivial and seemingly pointless exchanges. Pozzo and Lucky arrive. Pozzo appears to be the master, Lucky his slave—a slave with a long rope fixed around his neck by Pozzo. Lucky enters first, followed by Pozzo holding the rope. Lucky carries a large bag, folding stool, picnic basket and greatcoat. Pozzo has a whip, and Lucky obediently carries out every command, eventually standing again with the entire load. Estragon and Vladimir are uneasy at the sight of this burden. Pozzo says that Lucky is always like that, and Estragon takes Pozzo for a tyrant. When Estragon tries to wipe Lucky's tears, Lucky kicks him. Pozzo remarks that he had warned Estragon Lucky does not like strangers. What, meanwhile, are Estragon and Vladimir doing here? They are waiting for someone called Godot.

Pozzo and Lucky leave. A boy comes to Estragon and Vladimir and announces that Godot cannot come today but will come tomorrow. After further random chatter the boy departs. The stage lighting changes; night falls and the moon rises. Vladimir and Estragon resume their conversation, mixing occasional meaningful observations with apparently empty talk. They resolve to leave, yet neither moves. The curtain falls on Act I.

Act II takes place at the same time and in the same location. Vladimir remembers everything, but Estragon has forgotten. Estragon declares that he forgets everything instantly—or never forgets anything at all. Fragments of memory do come back to him. Pozzo and Lucky arrive. Pozzo is now blind, while Lucky carries his burdens as before. The rope remains, though shorter. Pozzo and Lucky fall to the ground. Pozzo cries for help, but Estragon and Vladimir continue talking.

As in the first act, Estragon calls Vladimir "Didi." Vladimir declares, "We must not waste time in idle chatter." Pozzo's cries for "Help!" come again and again at regular intervals, yet the pair pay no attention. Pozzo now offers first one hundred, then two hundred francs to anyone who helps him. Vladimir tries to lift him, falls himself in the attempt, and calls for help. Following further talk, Estragon tries to lift Vladimir and falls too. Vladimir strikes Pozzo, who groans. Vladimir then seeks him out, saying, "Come on, I shall not hurt you."

Estragon and Vladimir decide to try standing and manage to rise. Estragon says getting up is as easy as child's play; Vladimir calls it a question of willpower. Pozzo cries for help. They raise him, let go, and he falls. They raise him again and keep hold of him. After a while they release their grip experimentally, catching him whenever he begins to collapse. Pozzo too appears to have forgotten yesterday's events. He says he awoke one day and found himself blind, and wonders whether he may still be asleep. He asks about Lucky, apparently unable to remember how the two fell. Pozzo instructs them to pull hard on the rope around Lucky's neck or kick him in the face to wake him. Vladimir tells Estragon that this is an excellent chance for revenge. Estragon asks—his memory is returning—what if Lucky defends himself? Pozzo assures him that Lucky never does. Estragon, or perhaps Vladimir, begins kicking Lucky but injures his own foot. By this point it seems that Pozzo has managed to stand unaided.

Pozzo is taking Lucky to sell him at a market, yet he remembers nothing of yesterday and will remember nothing tomorrow of today. He tells Lucky to get up. Lucky rises and lifts his baggage. Pozzo asks for his whip. Lucky puts down everything, hands over the whip, and picks up the baggage again. Pozzo asks for the rope. Lucky puts down all his burdens once more, hands the rope to Pozzo, and lifts the burdens again!

Lucky and Pozzo depart. The boy returns and addresses Vladimir as Albert. Vladimir asks if the boy does not recognise him and whether he was not here yesterday. The boy says this is his first visit. His message is unchanged: Godot will not come today but will certainly arrive tomorrow. Vladimir asks what Godot does; the boy replies that Godot does nothing. Vladimir asks after the boy's brother; he is unhappy, the boy says. Did his brother come yesterday? The boy does not know. The boy says that Godot has a beard and is fair rather than dark. As in the first act, he asks what message he should take back to Godot. Vladimir says, "Go and tell him that you met us." Vladimir rushes angrily towards the boy, who runs away. The sun sets and the moon appears.

Estragon suggests that separation might be better for both of them. Vladimir says that if Godot does not come tomorrow, they will hang themselves from a rope; if he comes, they will be saved. Vladimir looks into Lucky's hat, shakes it and puts it on. The two decide to leave but neither moves. The curtain falls.

...

Harold Pinter's Three-Act Play The Birthday Party

Its characters are Petey, Meg, Stanley, Lulu, Goldberg and McCann.

Act I: Meg serves Petey breakfast and asks whether Stanley has got up. Stanley enters; Meg serves him breakfast too. Petey leaves for work. Meg and Stanley exchange intimate, joking remarks. Petey has told Meg that two visitors will come and stay in her house for several days. Her home is listed as a boarding house. Stanley, on hearing this, asks questions and becomes anxious. He says that he has received an offer to play piano in a Paris nightclub, followed by opportunities in Athens, Constantinople, Zagreb and Vladivostok: a job that would take him around the world. Asked about his experience, he claims to have played piano everywhere in the world, in every country, and to have given a concert once. He then says he lost the address of the first concert venue and could not reach it. When he arrived at the second venue, it was locked. Meg does not want Stanley to leave.

Stanley suspects that the two men are looking for somebody. Lulu is heard outside. Meg leaves carrying a shopping bag; someone addresses her as Mrs Boles. Lulu enters and talks with Stanley. After Lulu leaves, Goldberg and McCann arrive. McCann calls Goldberg "Nat." Stanley has already slipped away. Meg returns. Goldberg addresses her as Mrs Boles and introduces himself and his friend McCann. During their conversation he asks about the other lodger, his name and occupation. Meg says he is Stanley Webber, who once gave a concert but, owing to the caretaker's mistake, was locked inside the venue all night until morning. He then took his "tip," caught a train and came here. Suddenly Meg says that today is Stanley's birthday. A birthday party is planned for nine o'clock, and Lulu is to be invited that afternoon. All three go out, and Stanley looks through the window. Meg returns. Stanley is suspicious of the two strangers. He asks their names; Meg has forgotten but remembers "Gold..." and Stanley supplies "Goldberg." Meg asks whether Stanley knows him, but Stanley remains silent. He then says that today is not his birthday. Meg has bought him a child's drum as a present and demands a kiss in return.

Act II: Stanley and McCann are talking. Stanley wants to go out. He tells McCann that this is not a boarding house and never has been. Petey and Goldberg arrive. Goldberg addresses Petey as Mr Boles. After Petey leaves, Stanley says that the people of this house have lost their sense of smell and cannot recognise the danger posed by Goldberg and McCann. He feels responsible for them.

McCann snatches Stanley's spectacles. McCann and Goldberg demand to know why he murdered his wife. They accuse him of changing his name, lacking moral character and corrupting women.

An argument breaks out. When it has ended, Meg—apparently unaware of it—enters in her party dress. Ordinary conversation follows.

Lulu arrives and Goldberg seats her upon his lap. When Lulu asks why she thought his name was Nat, Goldberg explains that his wife calls him "Simey."

At the party they begin playing a game of blindman's buff. Lulu ties a scarf over Mrs Boles's eyes. Whoever Meg touches next must then be blindfolded. She touches McCann, and the turn later falls to Stanley. His spectacles are taken away, and a blindfold is placed over his eyes. McCann breaks Stanley's spectacles and sets the drum in his path. Stanley falls and tries to throttle Meg, but McCann and Goldberg save her.

Darkness falls.

Seeing Stanley approach, Lulu faints. Stanley places Lulu upon a table. McCann finds a torch and shines it upon the table and Stanley.

Act III: Petey and Meg talk, and Meg asks him about Stanley. Lulu enters and asks Goldberg what her father or Eddie, her first lover, would think if he heard what had happened. She accuses Goldberg of satisfying his wicked thirst and teaching her what a young woman would otherwise learn only after being married three times. Goldberg answers that he did it because Lulu allowed him to.

Lulu leaves.

In Meg's absence Goldberg and McCann take Stanley away. Petey tells them to leave Stanley alone. Goldberg and McCann invite Petey to come with them too: there is room in the car. Petey stands still. Left alone, he is joined by Meg. "Have they gone?" she asks. "Yes," he says. "Is Stanley still asleep?" she asks. Petey answers that he is sleeping.

"Let him sleep."

Meg asks, "Wasn't it a good party?" Petey says, "He came later."

The curtain falls.

...

Badal Sircar's Evam Indrajit

The characters in Evam Indrajit are the Writer, the Aunt, Manasi, Amal, Vimal, Kamal, Indrajit and, later in the play, Indrajit's wife, another Manasi.

Act I: The Writer is searching for a play. His aunt is angry that he goes on writing instead of eating and drinking properly. Manasi asks whether he will read what he has written. The Writer says he has written nothing. She urges him to try. The Writer calls four latecomers from the auditorium to the stage: Amal, Vimal and Kamal. The fourth calls himself Nirmal Kumar. The Writer objects that this is impossible and asks his real name. "Indrajit Ray," he replies. Amal, Vimal, Kamal—and Indrajit. Manasi—her actual name is different, but the Writer calls her Manasi—is Indrajit's maternal cousin. He loves her and wants to break with convention.

Act II: Later Indrajit wonders whether a successful love affair would answer his questions. It would not. He will go to London too. He wants death but cannot bring himself to die. The Woman whom the Writer calls Manasi, the one associated with Indrajit, remains unmarried and teaches in Hazaribagh.

Unlike Amal, Vimal and Kamal, Indrajit refuses to follow the beaten track. He wants something different. The aunt, whom the Writer calls "mother," tells him to eat; Manasi tells him to write. But when Manasi also tells the Writer to eat, he is hurt: "No—not you too!"

Manasi then realises her mistake and asks about his writing. The Writer is disturbed: this Indrajit refuses to acknowledge reality and shows no commitment to anything. Manasi disagrees.

"But he does dream, doesn't he?"

Indrajit returns to Calcutta from London and marries another woman, also called Manasi—Indrajit calls her Manasi. The first Manasi, whom the Writer names Manasi, is Indrajit's maternal cousin. He loves her but does not marry her because she is regarded as his sister and because of what people will say; all along he insists to the Writer that her name is not Manasi.

Indrajit begins to understand, and tells Manasi, that differences among individuals are merely an illusion. A dream is a dream and cannot become reality. Manasi, Manasi, Manasi—all are Manasi, just as there are Amal, Vimal and Kamal. When the Writer asks him, Indrajit replies: "Amal, Vimal, Kamal—and Indrajit as well!"

The Writer's journey has no destination and no purpose: an apparently meaningless journey with no reason behind it. He tells Indrajit that we must live and keep walking; there is no sacred destination, yet the pilgrimage must continue.

Uday Narayan Singh "Nachiketa"'s No Entry: Mā Praviśa

The Plot—First Kallola: This play is divided into kallolas in the tradition of Jyotirishwar. His Varṇaratnākara is divided into kallolas, although it is not a play, whereas his play Dhūrtasamāgama is divided into acts. The first of four kallolas opens at the gate of heaven—or hell—where a large number of the deceased are queuing to enter. There is a city gentleman who died in a road accident, along with soldiers killed in war, thieves killed while stealing, rogues and pickpockets. The ultramodern absurdity of Jyotirishwar's Dhūrtasamāgama is evident also in No Entry: Mā Praviśa. In the first kallola, when a thief and a ruffian break the queue and go forward, the city gentleman seizes each of them by the collar and returns them to their places. The ruffian, later revealed as a gang boss, tells him to let go of his shirt, but is momentarily restrained by the gentleman's imposing manner. When a pickpocket speaks from the gentleman's side against the thief, the ruffian draws a knife, reveals his true nature and launches himself at the pickpocket. The thief explains that the pickpocket belongs to their own fraternity but has only managed to become a petty pickpocket, not a skilled thief like himself, and could never even dream of being a hardened thug like the ruffian. The ruffian now turns on the thief: whom did he just call a thug? The pickpocket quickly changes sides and tells the ruffian that the insult was aimed at him, not at the ruffian. He adds that the thief is so incompetent at his craft that a householder's sons and dogs beat him to death while he was stealing—and yet he dares ridicule a pickpocket and call himself a great thief! The respectable man cannot believe that someone who speaks so fluently could actually be a thief, so the pickpocket teases "His Majesty the Thief" still further. The thief then laments that, had he known, he would never have taken this pickpocket along to steal that night, nor would he have been able to bear seeing him beaten. The city gentleman, who earlier dragged the thief and ruffian back by their collars, listens in silence and wonders what sort of heaven it will be if he must live there with such people. He recites a fragment of song upon the subject. As in Dhūrtasamāgama, songs are interspersed throughout No Entry: Mā Praviśa; the singing begins here and makes this a musical play. Meanwhile the pickpocket empties everyone's pockets and wallets. Another musical refrain begins, but a dead ragpicker interrupts the spell by observing that beyond the closed gate of Yama's realm, money and purses are of no use. The two deceased respectable men agree: the currency of one country is not accepted in another. A dead romantic gentleman named Ramani Mohan comments that changing countries' currencies is much like one's beloved becoming someone else's wife. An argument begins, so Ramani Mohan changes the subject to the Apsaras Rambha and Menaka who may be waiting inside. A beggar woman, who has passed the doll she was cradling to someone else in order to join the argument, jealously abuses Rambha and Menaka as sharp-tongued women. The pickpocket points out that the other side may contain sorrow as readily as happiness. This delights an insurance agent, who sees an opportunity to expand his business. The pickpocket then begins soliciting bids, in rupees, for Indra's thunderbolt. The city gentleman interrupts the proceedings, and the respectable men support him: what an extraordinary auction, run by a pickpocket with the thief and beggar woman bidding! They have never heard of its like. Another musical refrain starts. Just then Nandi and Bhringi enter, dancing to classical music. Asked by Nandi and Bhringi what lies beyond the door, each character answers according to his or her beliefs: heaven or hell, the heights of the sky or the depths below. Nandi and Bhringi tell them that each has spoken the truth, yet none has spoken the whole truth. They begin listing the deaths: one was killed while stealing (at which the thief tries to run away, only to be brought back by two or three others), one in an accident, and so on. But even Nandi and Bhringi cannot explain how the insurance agent arrived here without dying. He declares that he has come prospecting for a new market! Thus one person is present without being dead. Bhringi explains to Nandi the fierce competition brought about by the arrival of so many insurance companies. Meanwhile the lovers quarrel because the young man wants to go back. Ramani Mohan is delighted at the prospect of the young man's departure: the woman will be alone and he will have his chance. Bhringi says that leaving this place is impossible, though the couple might go and arrange for their respective parents to die in accidents and join them. The lovers refuse to sacrifice their parents for their own convenience. Nandi and Bhringi therefore marry the pair with music and ceremonial instruments, the city gentleman performing the giving away of the bride.

Postmodern, Emotion-Centred Absurd Drama: Samuel Beckett himself translated En attendant Godot from French into English as Waiting for Godot, adding the subtitle "A Tragicomedy in Two Acts," which was absent from the French edition. A tragicomedy combines tragedy and comedy. The foregoing account of the plot should have made clear that its supposed central character, "Godot," does not appear at all. Nor is he its emotional centre. Its essential element is waiting. Language, the stage, speech, silence and ways of moving form inseparable parts of the work. Its main characters live like wandering nomads moving through space and time. They perform like mime artists, conveying emotion through the body without speaking. The play gives new definitions to plot and dramatic equilibrium and ushers modern theatre into a new age. British music-hall theatre combined music and comedy; Beckett uses cross-talk to dramatise the despair of life, while Harold Pinter represents political and social terror through humour. No Entry: Mā Praviśa also begins at the entrance to heaven—or hell—where the people queueing are all dead, except for one living person! The ruffian becomes submissive before the city gentleman! The lovers even marry there! Netaji is fated to arrive late after death! The leftist still lends outside support! There is no escaping a VIP queue even there! Chitragupta, however, reveals that the door before which they queue used to open and close in another age. If it no longer opens, what are they waiting for? Nandi and Bhringi say that the apparent door was not a dream but a mistake in understanding. When the actor Vivek Kumar is asked his surname, he says that he has left caste behind only after a tremendous struggle, so let the "alias" be dropped. The leftist believes in neither heaven nor hell, neither Yama nor Chitragupta; yet how can he disbelieve what he sees here? Yama himself tells him that it may be a nightmare. Yama's messengers stand beside their cauldrons with nobody to roast. When the beggar woman laughs at Chitragupta's make-up beard, Bhringi says that she too is an artist like them. And how can the door of the mind be opened if the mind itself has been left behind?

The four plays—Beckett's French Waiting for Godot, Pinter's English The Birthday Party, Sircar's Bengali Evam Indrajit, and Uday Narayan Singh "Nachiketa"'s Maithili No Entry: Mā Praviśa—fall outside the defined beginnings and endings of conventional drama. They begin anywhere and end anywhere. In Evam Indrajit, the Writer searches for characters and suddenly addresses the auditorium, summons four latecomers onstage and makes them characters in the play. The fourth is his favourite: not Nirmal but Indrajit, someone different, a figure bearing the historical name of one who conquered Indra. He will not follow the line taken by Amal, Vimal and Kamal. Yet by the end he too becomes part of the refrain: Amal, Vimal, Kamal—and Indrajit.

The early criticism of Harold Pinter's The Birthday Party was so severe that his literary career nearly ended. Its rereading, however, made it a classic. Pinter sustains a measure of mystery and terror throughout the play, and humour strengthens the dramatic substance. What is Stanley, what was he, and what does he want to become? Does he corrupt women, or did he murder his wife? Why does Meg like him? What prevented his first and second concerts? Is he lying, or does he behave outside existing social and political categories? He tries to strangle Meg, yet why does she continue to like him? Why and how do social and political powers carry him away, represented by Goldberg and McCann, even though Goldberg's mysterious behaviour towards Lulu shows that the supposed agents of authority cannot themselves embody any ideal?

A mound of earth and a leafless, naked tree by a desolate road make the stage for Waiting for Godot. The space outside a locked gate provides the stage for No Entry: Mā Praviśa. In Evam Indrajit the audience itself becomes the stage. In The Birthday Party the stage is a room in a house, yet Pinter seems to take Stanley apart and put him together again by a process resembling Derrida's deconstruction. Spectators alternately envy him, sympathise with him and despise him. But when he appears powerless before Goldberg and McCann, they identify with him, just as they identify with Indrajit in Evam Indrajit. In Waiting for Godot, the spectator identifies with the slave, only to be startled when an offer of compassion earns a kick. In No Entry: Mā Praviśa, the beggar woman jealously abuses Rambha and Menaka! The pickpocket puts Indra's thunderbolt up for auction in exchange for rupees. Nandi and Bhringi declare that everyone has spoken truth, yet nobody the complete truth. Indrajit in Evam Indrajit resembles Sisyphus, the accursed figure of Greek myth condemned to push a marble boulder uphill; whenever he reaches the summit, it rolls back down and carries him to the foot. Human labour and life are founded upon absurdity. Is humanity condemned to fail, like Indrajit? Or will the sight of heaven and hell, Yama and Chitragupta being exposed as false in No Entry: Mā Praviśa change what we think we have seen? But then Yama himself says the apparent reality may be a nightmare. Waiting for Godot is not about waiting for God: Beckett himself says they are waiting not for "God" but for "Godot," even though he uses Christian mythology. In existentialist thought, humanity and the universe are meaningless, absurd.

56. Chhutahar, Chhutahar Ghail, or Chhuthā Ghail

Abstract

Chhutahar / Chhutahar Ghail / Chhuthā Ghail: Chhuthā Ghail is the title of Mahendra Malangia's latest play. He has written a ten-page preface to this short drama. He is distressed that Ramanand Jha "Raman" suggested that a "chhutahar ghail" is called simply a "chhutahar."

Keywords: chhutahar; ghail; chhuthā; literary criticism; Maithili

Chhutahar / Chhutahar Ghail / Chhuthā Ghail: Chhuthā Ghail is the name of Mahendra Malangia's latest play. To this small play he has attached a ten-page preface. Let us first consider that preface. Malangia resents Ramanand Jha "Raman" for advising him that a chhutahar ghail is called simply chhutahar. He offers three arguments. First, he invokes the lines, "You may speak of what is written in books; / I shall speak of what these eyes have seen." Second, he cites Yatri's lament: "I remain apart, like a ghail chhutahar; / Alas, how wretched is my great misfortune." And he asks what the widow in Yatri's poem or Kabutari Devi in his play has to do with Shiva's Māheśvara Sūtras or Pāṇini's ten lakāras (Pāṇini identified twelve such verbal formations for Vedic Sanskrit and ten for Classical Sanskrit—but let that pass). Third, he likens his own position to that of Copernicus: what can the objections of other people matter, when people in villages and homes do in fact say chhutahar ghail! Yet all three arguments turn against Malangia himself. "What these eyes have seen" and actual usage establish that the object is called chhutahar alone. Can one place a chhutahar atop a ghailchī? When water is sprinkled in the courtyard from a loiṭā, should it, according to Malangia's logic, be called a loiṭā ghail? Ghail, surāhī, kohā, taulā, chhutahar, loiṭā, khāpaṛi, kuṛnī, kurvār, kosiyā, sarbā and sobarnā are the distinct names of distinct objects. Accepting the suggestion of Phoolchandra Mishra "Raman"—who probably proposed chhuthā ghail in jest, and, if not, has coined a new word for the language—Malangia changed chhutahar ghail to chhuthā ghail. This shows that he had realised his mistake, but did not wish to appear diminished by agreeing with Ramanand Jha "Raman"; instead, he planted his own stake. Later Ramanand Jha "Raman" urged Chetna Samiti to publish the book, but because that institution would give him only twenty-five copies, Malangia published it through his own organisation. What concern are these details of the reader's? Now consider Yatri. Yatri had Hindi readers to think of as well, and often did not remember which of his poems were in Hindi, which in Maithili and which in both languages. He wrote chhutahar ghail, perhaps because of the demands of rhyme. Now consider Copernicus. If Yatri or Malangia writes ghail chhutahar, chhutahar ghail or chhuthā ghail, will native Maithili speakers suddenly begin using those expressions instead of chhutahar? Thus Copernicus too stands against Malangia's position. Malangia cannot deploy the Copernican legend accurately. He may even be confusing Copernicus with Galileo: Copernicus's theory received papal support, and he dedicated the forty-page manuscript of his heliocentric theory to Pope Paul III. In any case, one will not be surprised by Malangia's ignorance of science or his tendency to turn scientific theory into legend after encountering in the same preface his ignorance of well-known folktales. "Ali Baba and the Forty Thieves" is known worldwide as a medieval Arabic folktale found in The Arabian Nights or One Thousand and One Nights. There is debate as to whether it was inserted later into that collection, but its status as a medieval Arabic folktale is not in dispute. Malangia brings in tales of Balban's tyranny and other claims with a communal outlook, exposing only his superficial acquaintance with folklore. The shallow understanding of pañjī genealogy represented by Mithilā Tattva Vimarśa or Ramanath Jha was overcome long ago; the relevant information is recorded in our genealogy books. Gonu Jha lived three hundred years before Vidyapati, but Malangia proceeds upon fifty-year-old gossip. He knows that Gonu has been called Dhūrtācārya, a master of cunning, but apparently does not know that Gonu is also called Mahāmahopādhyāya. Muslims did not live in Mithila in Gonu Jha's period; where, then, could the story of "the tax collector's beard" have come from as a Muslim official's beard? An object known to the people as chhutahar is turned into chhuthā ghail. The beard of a man who collected taxes becomes the beard of a tahsildār, allowing Muslims to be cast as oppressors on communal grounds. And the preface is written in such a way, it seems, that Ramanand Jha "Raman" and others will be intimidated into silence. The Satnami rebellion, begun with a quarrel between a foot-soldier and a member of the progressive Satnami community founded by Dalit and backward groups, arose in resistance to Aurangzeb's policies, and a mosque was burned during it. But Gonu Jha's tax collector was not Muslim; the folktale makes no such claim. If a communally minded folklorist introduces his own ideology into a transmitted story and writes it down dishonestly, what has that to do with Maithili folklore? This is what happens when folktales are collected without fieldwork. Mahendra Narayan Ram writes that folklore knows no caste distinctions, but how could Malangia accept that? A bhagatā, too, inevitably appears in his narrative. The real cause that makes this habit integral to Malangia's theatre is his inherited belief in caste superiority. His play consists of seventeen scenes averaging two and a half pages apiece. Up to the fifteenth scene he follows his familiar method of making high-caste audiences laugh at the purported speech of the "lower castes" (a language of his own invention) and generating counterfeit comedy through the bhagatā's corrupted Hindi. He begins trying to give the story a purpose only in the sixteenth scene, by which time the opportunity has been lost. At a time when Prakrit and other languages are no longer used in Sanskrit plays as they once were, Malangia's invocation of Bharata out of context reveals his lack of command of Sanskrit and suggests reliance on Hindi-language secondary accounts of the Nāṭyaśāstra. Is Malangia claiming that a play good to read cannot be staged, or that one written for the stage cannot be good to read? That is what his Sanskrit quotations seem to imply. If a play does not stir a reader, how will a director decide to stage it? And what, precisely, are its stage qualities: seventeen scenes of about two and a half pages each, casteist language that humiliates a supposedly inferior class, the bhagatā's Hindi "Samajhtā hai ki nahī?" ("Do you understand or not?"), and the slapstick humour supposedly produced by bringing these together? Whoever resists this and imagines a parallel Maithili theatre is dismissed as merely advocating the readability of drama, while an old-fashioned casteist is praised as a defender of its stage qualities! Would Malangia's caste-based sentence constructions be accepted in twenty-first-century plays in Sanskrit, Hindi or any other modern Indian language apart from Maithili? If not, why does a playwright who has not read Bharata's original Sanskrit Nāṭyaśāstra repeatedly deploy decontextualised details from eighteen-hundred-year-old Sanskrit drama as a shield for his vocabulary? If someone carries a basket on the head and a child on the hip, must that person belong to a lower class? In the bārahmāsā in his courtyard, Malangia calls women of this class rāṇḍ. After several decades, he has improved to the extent of calling them a "lower class." That improvement is welcome, but it is much too little for so long a period. How did Babaji enter the story, and how did gāñjā enter it? What have they to do with the trees in the orchard? How could Malangia have inserted his caste-based constructions and corrupted Hindi sentences had he not created the pseudo-concepts of the bhagatā and a lower class? He tries very cleverly to conceal this fact and therefore cannot move beyond mediocrity. He wants to give this dramatic narrative a purpose, but he cannot acquire the ability to do so.

57. Four English Plays—Doctor Faustus, Samson Agonistes, Murder in the Cathedral, and Strife

Abstract

This essay is based upon Parshuram Jha's Dimensions of Peace in English Drama: Studies in Doctor Faustus, Samson Agonistes, Murder in the Cathedral and Strife. Parshuram Jha (born 1938), from Mehath village in Madhubani, is the author of Dimensions of Peace in English Drama and Christian Poetic Drama.

Keywords: four English plays; Doctor Faustus; Samson Agonistes; Murder in the Cathedral; Strife

This essay is based upon Parshuram Jha's Dimensions of Peace in English Drama: Studies in Doctor Faustus, Samson Agonistes, Murder in the Cathedral and Strife. Parshuram Jha, born in 1938 in Mehath village, Madhubani, wrote Dimensions of Peace in English Drama and Christian Poetic Drama. He devoted his entire professional life to teaching English literature.

Doctor Faustus belongs to the Elizabethan age, Samson Agonistes to the Age of Reason, and Murder in the Cathedral to the modern age. These three are essentially religious dramas. Strife is a modern secular play and demonstrates, in this reading, that secularism emerges from religion, or at least from the moral context of religion.

Doctor Faustus (The Tragical History of the Life and Death of Doctor Faustus) was written by Christopher Marlowe (1564–1593), a contemporary of Shakespeare (1564–1616). The Privy Council issued a warrant summoning Marlowe in connection with an objectionable manuscript, and ten days later he was stabbed to death at the age of twenty-nine. Whether he might have surpassed Shakespeare as a dramatist had he lived a full life remains hidden in history. The play mixes blank verse and prose. Blank verse has metre but no rhyme. It was performed in Marlowe's lifetime but published eleven years after his death.

Samson Agonistes ("Samson the Wrestler" or "Samson the Combatant") is a tragic closet drama in verse by John Milton (1608–1674). A closet drama is written not primarily for staging but for solitary reading, or to be read aloud and heard by a small group.

Murder in the Cathedral is a verse drama by T. S. Eliot (1564–1593).

Strife, a play about bitter industrial conflict, was written by John Galsworthy (1867–1933).

Doctor Faustus — Christopher Marlowe

In 1592, Doctor Faustus was constructed through additions to and omissions from the English Faust Book, presenting the realities of its age.

In both subject and form, Doctor Faustus is connected with the medieval mystery play, the morality play and the interlude. Yet Faustus's uncontrollable thirst for limitless knowledge, worldly pleasure and power brings it close to the spirit of the Renaissance.

When Faustus first enters, two choices face him: the spiritual or the worldly life; unending enjoyment or a spiritual abyss and death; the pursuit of his own will or obedience to God's will. He is learned, having studied Aristotle's logic; he knows medicine and the treatment of disease, and holds a doctorate in theology. Yet none of this learning gives him peace or joy. He chooses magic and the satisfaction of worldly desire.

In choosing magic he abandons his reliance on faith.

Faustus covets the gold of the West Indies and America (called India in Marlowe's day), pearls of the East, and fine fruits. Valdes and Cornelius are the magicians who offer a means to satisfy his desires.

Later Mephistophilis appears. Faustus asks him to tell Lucifer that he is ready to exchange his soul for worldly pleasures. The Good Angel advises Faustus to think of heaven and heavenly things, but Faustus follows the Evil Angel and desires wealth.

Faustus writes the deed mortgaging his soul in his own blood and surrenders himself to Lucifer. Mephistophilis tells him of hell, but he pays no attention, turning instead to sleep, food and travel. With Mephistophilis's help, Faustus gains opportunities for disputation, the accumulation of knowledge, astronomy, botany and aesthetics.

Before satisfying Faustus's sexual desires, Mephistophilis tries to reason with him, but then dresses an evil spirit as a woman and presents her as Faustus's wife.

An evil spirit may imitate a dead person but cannot itself come to life. Its kiss therefore sucks the very soul from Faustus. Through his intercourse with the evil spirit he commits sin, the consequence of which is his spiritual death.

He moves away from God and immerses himself in revelry, to spend twenty-four years in the company of the evil spirit.

As the time fixed in the bond for his death approaches, he says, "Had I lived with them, I would have lived a settled life; but now, in dying, I shall die forever."

And in his final moments, before his death, the clock ticks towards midnight. In despair he says, "His soul must yet live on to dwell in hell." But...

He tells the scholars that the serpent which tempted Eve may be saved, but Faustus cannot.

He cannot repent, cannot be forgiven or sanctified. He admits that he has insulted God.

Samson Agonistes — John Milton

The opening shows Samson, blinded and imprisoned at Gaza, forced into hard labour, being led by someone towards a bright place outside the prison. It is a holiday, the festival of Dagon, the Philistine god imagined as half-human and half-fish. Feeling the breeze, Samson experiences a resurgence of energy. He possesses power given by heaven to free Israel from Philistine subjugation. Yet he thinks that God gave him immense strength without equal wisdom; otherwise he would not have revealed its secret so readily to Delilah. But how can he dispute the wisdom and wishes of God?

His father Manoa brings a plan for his release. Manoa proposes paying the Philistine lords to secure Samson's freedom, but Samson dislikes the proposal and refuses.

Manoa tells him that during the feast the Philistines will praise Dagon and insult the God of Israel. Samson is distressed by this news. He assures Manoa that he has no doubt Israel's God will prevail over Dagon. Yet after Manoa has left, he asks the chorus how he will be able to serve God.

Delilah enters and promises to persuade the Philistine lords to free him, but Samson denounces her for revealing his secret.

Harapha tells Samson that God has abandoned him.

An official arrives with an order from the Philistine lords that Samson must display his feats at Dagon's feast. At first he refuses, then reflects and agrees. Milton depicts the Philistines as steeped in worldly pleasure and Dagon as the god of that pleasure. Samson stands between two pillars, prays, and brings the building down.

The messenger's account produces a calm reaction from Samson's father. He says this is no time for grief: by his death Samson has brought honour and freedom to Israel.

Murder in the Cathedral — T. S. Eliot

Murder in the Cathedral begins with a chorus of women of Canterbury describing a world of nature neither kindly nor safe.

A messenger announces that the Archbishop is returning to England. Becket has spent seven years in France and now comes back to Canterbury. Both external and internal conflicts await him: the conflict of state and church, king and archbishop, but also a struggle with his own desires. He calls his past, including his friendship with the barons and his chancellorship, a "shadow" with which he must contend.

Four knights, his external enemies, enter brandishing swords. Becket has already conquered his enemy within and calmly tells the knights, "You are welcome, whatever your purpose."

He says that he has never wished to take the crown away from the king's son.

When the knights convey the king's order that he leave the country, Becket refuses: he has already spent seven years apart from his people.

Before they kill him, he tells the knights, "Do with me what you will, but my people will not so much as touch you."

Against his wishes the priests force him inside the cathedral and lock the church doors. Becket, however, says:

> "The church must always remain open, even to enemies."

As soon as the doors are opened, the drunken knights enter, intent upon murdering Becket.

Becket is killed, and the priests thank God for giving Canterbury another saint.

Strife — John Galsworthy

An industrial dispute at the Trenartha Tin Plate Works has led to a strike beginning in October. Four months later, on 7 February, a special board meeting is held in the dining room of the manager, Francis Underwood, who is the son-in-law of company chairman John Anthony. The directors Frederick H. Wilder, William Scantlebury and Oliver Wanklin are present, along with Anthony's younger son Edgar.

Edgar is distressed by the workers' plight. Wilder, however, is furious that the company's shares have fallen and worried about losses exceeding fifty thousand pounds. Scantlebury favours nonviolence, while Wanklin adopts a middle course.

Anthony, on the other hand, is opposed to showing any sympathy for the workers.

Wilder suggests asking Harness of the Central Union to help resolve the dispute, but Anthony refuses.

Roberts attends with other members of the workers' committee and opposes Anthony. Unlike Harness, he too is uncompromising.

Anthony's daughter Enid objects to her father's class prejudice. Her maid Annie is married to Roberts, and Enid wishes to help her. Enid visits Roberts in his cottage and urges a compromise. Roberts calls Anthony a tyrant and declares that if Anthony were dying and could be saved by the mere lifting of Roberts's hand, he would not raise even his little finger.

At a workers' meeting Evans and John Bulgin, supporters of Roberts, quarrel. Henry Thomas intervenes and says, "Shame on your strife!"

At the afternoon meeting he announces Mrs Roberts's death and says that he will resign his membership.

Anthony, however, declares, "War is war."

Roberts arrives a little late at the board meeting and discovers that the workers have removed him. Meanwhile Anthony has been displaced by his own directors.

Negotiations towards a settlement proceed under Harness's leadership. Henry Tench, the company secretary, is satisfied.

58. Nachiketa's "Second Person Singular"

Abstract

Poetry differs from prose in that images allow it to say more in fewer words. It is therefore not possible to regard verse as a substitute for prose adopted because the writer is short of time, although examples of that sort can indeed be found. Whether verse follows metre or dispenses with metre and rhythm, genuine quality will make its impact felt.

Keywords: Nachiketa · second person · singular · literary criticism · Maithili

Abstract · सारांश

This chapter presents a fieldwork-based study in folk culture of Nachiketa's "Second Person Singular". The discussion brings Nachiketa, the second person, the singular, "my" and poetry to the fore. Drawing upon examples, quotations and arguments available in the original material, it comparatively examines fieldwork, oral sources and textual forms, enabling readers to understand both the critical structure of the subject and its wider context.

Poetry differs from prose in that images allow it to say more in fewer words. It is therefore not possible to regard verse as a substitute for prose adopted because the writer is short of time, although examples of that sort can indeed be found. Whether verse follows metre or dispenses with metre and rhythm, genuine quality will make its impact felt. People invoke the political left or right to save land from the ceiling laws. But to invoke the left or the right on behalf of literature that has fallen under a ceiling, or to insist upon—or reject—metre and rhythm, is merely to extend the manoeuvring of literary factions. Amid all this stands Nachiketa's collection of thirty-three poems, Madhyamapurush Ekavachan (Second Person Singular).

In "Virodh Samudra Se" ("Against the Sea"), the poet speaks of the sea lying between you and me: somebody is weeping on its shore, over its consequences; between us are fish and flocks of kites, while Varuna holds the crests of all the tides, wondering whether to let love win or the sea. When the poet says that he will once again take hold of the crest of Varuna's tide, a picture rises before the eyes. In "Ritu-vishesh Prithvi Par" ("A Particular Season on Earth"), there is the particular season of love, at whose outset even the drops of the rainy month begin to dry. A net is cast for words, and words surrender in the poem's renunciation. Then the poet returns to the riverbank, to utter a morning mantra that turns water into sky. The god of rain in a barren country can make even the sky weep beyond measure. Ghosts dance, striking their sticks again and again; a young prince dreams of communism and releases balloons into the sky. There is a compromise with words, and every sigh is submerged in their scream. Then comes a summons to the sky: weep aloud, so that the sound of lightning may convince us that Sawan has come to earth. There is the desire to touch the drops falling from the forehead and to read one's own written lines: the task the poet left unfinished the last time. This, precisely, is the particular season—to remember that person.

In "Toñ" ("You"), one enters a sentence hesitantly, holds a heated hand, and encounters the fire raging within me: in it are I and you, a branch of the wish-fulfilling tree; all else is empty, like some grandmother's tale. The ten directions ripen within it—an illusory path (bewildered!). The long hours of nine months of pride, of pregnancy. A fifth season (!), a sixth enemy (!); even the raga is in vilambit, the slow tempo, then drut, the fast beat (frightened), and the sun goes down. In "Ratuk Aa Dink Katha" ("A Tale of Night and Day"), the Buddha leaves home while the world sleeps, but the poet's departure takes place inside the poem, beyond the legally contracted ceremony of marriage and the pain of childbirth. Within the poem are loosened knots without metre or letter, stitching pulled open, needlework, points falling into the innermost being; a dirty, coarse towel tries to cover my body, while instability grows inside. Then come hunger and the story of pain and separation. Sexuality spreads over everything as it stands erect, becoming the dense array of all thirty-six dishes in your kitchen. Yet my "saka"—the poet's own abbreviated or equivocal expression—seeks only the poem's interior. Its sense is double; its subtle argument has melted into beat and rhythm. A body is packed with Prakrit and liver, weighted with awareness of the great womb and phallus. This is the only expedient learnt: to keep dreaming of you at every instant. When the world awakens, I shall sleep beside you. O my poem, the night of destruction will come; remove pain, separation, hunger and fear. Already a ray of dawn glimmers, like hope born of longing.

In "Chakrant" ("Conspiracy"), the temper of letters floating in the sky sends forth a bitter surge of fire; it will not be the poet's fault if that fire is extinguished. The world's cycle comes to an end. There is no hope that she will come to him, nor that his poetry, transformed into words, will dress itself for another shower of rain as before. In "Damayanti Ke Upadesh" ("Advice to Damayanti"), people stand petrified (!) on the riverbank—limbless, helpless people. Grass and leaves envelop them, and a Takshaka serpent is tangled among the silk-cotton trees. There is swaying in the wind and the smouldering of a fire fanned into flame. "Damayanti, Damayanti": the forest is mute. Amid flowers and leaves stands an orphaned sun (!), staggering as it carefully cuts open Hiranyaka's belly. Thirty-three ugly mouths counsel the trees to go this way. "Damayanti, do not cross the forest." In the darkness, traffickers in human bodies wait in the north-east. "Damayanti, it is time." Nala, the godlike husband, hides in the south-west. To know trees is to know how a poem arrives; it is to learn the history of the forest and the cruelty of human beings—how the vast woodland was thoughtlessly devastated, uprooted and destroyed, and how domesticated (!) trees forgot their language. Damayanti is warned not to trust human beings: they will bind her with stories, poems and rumours. She must not cross the forest. And then every tree will write its first poem about Damayanti.

In "Prashnavali" ("Questionnaire") the questions come in succession: Is this the last immovable night? Is this the last line of the song? Can you read my poem? Is this my last day? Now there is the compulsion (!) to act, the body bewildered: what poverty, felt in that instant, is this? Have I merely been sleeping and enduring? What future awaits my letters? The restless bee of the mind ranges over an immense landscape like an undying current of love. In "Bheetar Ugait Shabd" ("Words Growing Within"), the sounds of words suggest somebody weeping in a cave, or laughter ringing from a mountain summit. There is the sound of furtive footsteps and of an envelope being opened; words seethe from every line of a letter. Only belatedly does one comprehend the tears running down a sister's face. Sentences drift away, refusing to become either a remainder or a compound; it is difficult to understand the creaking of a broken spine, yet it grips the stiffened poet by the throat and drags him forward. In the poem these words reappear as intimations of things heard, sensed and understood. They have emerged from within the poet, but even the poet has no authority to alter them. He has only the right to kiss them, to love and unite with them; not the right to churn them endlessly or to exercise hatred and anger. He may adorn them with flowers and leaves, braid the hours of the night into their hair, brighten the parting of that hair with the red of the first sunrise, place a garland of night-flowering jasmine about the neck, wrap their bodies in the warm bark of a tree: all this honours the fact of their having happened as words. The poet dedicates this poem to the poet Ila Rani Singh.

In "Janal-Pahichanal" ("Known and Familiar"), the body is read page after page until life itself begins to seem known and familiar. There are songs of depths and hollows, and the poet's own declaration that she will cease to trust his words. Only the language of touch remains: it is a rural experience that nobody can give an etymology for; it must be lived. In "Samarthapad" ("Equivalent Word"), the poet supposes that he will not utter his dreams, for if they spoke they would pronounce all your names. There is no weakness in the verbal roots of words, no shortage of prefixes and suffixes. Yet no synonym can be pronounced: the language of an inaudible vision has departed with the hooves of horses. A new Amarakosha, a new poem, must therefore be written. In "Ankur" ("Sprout"), four seeds of poetry germinate in the mind, and within them the words of love are written. Do not confuse them with questions whose answers I myself do not know. Listening to the conversation, the word-hoard is divided among four poets at once; even so, the four will sing together and a sprout of love will grow.

In “Katte Baras Ke Bad” (“After So Many Years”), the poet stands in your courtyard and asks to be allowed to read a poem. In childhood you drove me away: I had broken the metre and incurred a fine (!). Among other things there was the grieving mother; no means of observing Chhath, provisions for only four months of the year, and roasted unsalted sweet potatoes as a means of survival. Let me read one poem. In “Kiai Nahi Likhai Chhi?” (“Why Do You Not Write?”), the answer is a full stop: not one more line in your name. Why insist that a love letter must be written in somebody else's alphabet, dressed up with colour, meaning, clothing and agitation? There is the language of drying lips and fingers playing on the soles of the feet; there are marvellous inland words and the arrangements made of them. Then do not reproach me for not writing a letter.

In “Rajhans” (“Swan”), the poem's royal swan has moved two paces away from your body. Falling meteors and other disturbances have left it no respite, and even your body has not been put to use. The poet will tell it to fly with you once, for as long as it can bear your weight. The poet's simile of a teardrop is hidden under the edge of a sari. He will ask the swan to lay aside the curiosity of the young woman into whom it has turned. In “Anher” (“Darkness”), a bird tells the poet not to utter anything secret, or darkness will follow. Last night a poem arrived and lost herself in the crowd of prose. A secret history runs from sinful love to marriage, and so on. Why be afraid? Nobody will ask your name. But tell me, bird: what did you know of the poet whose grave has only just been dug?

In “Ek Ahi Chhi” (“You Alone”), I have called to you again and again in poems, yet you never turn to look. These are no ordinary records of love with a balance sheet of gain and loss, no casual invitations, no food laid out for commonplace guests. I have given you a name in the poem that a chirping bird could pronounce, not one around which some sensational story could be spun. Still you say nothing. In “Puratan Prem” (“Ancient Love”), an old love demands the price of a song, posing questions and demanding answers—although where is there room for such an exercise in nature's school? Ancient love is confined between the textbook and the history lesson: use the old word in a sentence; are all the sentences true or false? Explain the sense. But I have now become shrewd. I can read the anguish of the mandakranta metre and measure the chastity of the pure dhaivata note. My blood has truly recognised the savagery of life's mathematics. I speak less; when I speak, it is not towards the past but towards an unstruck, still-unarrived spectral time. My perception moves towards what has not been spoken or translated. An embankment in a banana field, haunted cattle and the old love have left it all grimy.

In "Chah" ("Desire"), if I want something, what indeed can I want? You are infinite and, beyond all adjectives, you can fulfil the wish of my heart in an instant. But by the time I desire, the suffix of this whole deception is already there: my life is a sup-ting-antam, a form inflected with nominal and verbal endings, bound in a phrase and diminished into a lexicon. I can offer the short, the exceedingly short, the omkara, the form of a Vedic verse. My small desires, language, feelings and sufferings remain irregular, while the fragrance of raga Yaman-Kalyan is held in restraint.

In "Hamar Pati Ke Lel—1" ("For My Husband—1"), a hole has opened in your roof; the bitter winter wind has chilled the rice-starch water, and tears falling from the sky have soaked my sweet potatoes. The bedding is wet and you are silent. This hole will finish you. At least write the song of that destruction with your own hands. In "Hamar Pati Ke Lel—2", he says my place is upon his head, but I will not remain there among the scanty hair and the topknot. In his heart? Not beside the apparatus of breath. In his eyes? Not with the tears beneath his spectacles. On his lips? I will not become a rosary bead for prayers. On his tongue? For the flavour of cooking, yes, perhaps, but how to get out again? Under the shoe on his foot, on the earth—I understand politics. Once I understand how the shoe rises from beneath the foot to the top of the head, I will have learnt the first lesson of resistance. In "Hamar Pati Ke Lel—3", do not ask about the grammar or script of this poem. Do not tell me to throw it in the fire. What if I am illiterate? I am a magic wand and can spin. Why should it surprise anybody if someone writes a poem on me and grammar upon my consciousness? I will not call it empty pretension.

In "Hisab" ("Accounting"), five words fill Hiriya's shoulder-bag when he goes out to work at dawn. One is spent eating unsalted sweet potato; half a word is used up when Bhusahu Babu, sheltering under a peepal tree in the rain, kicks him three times. One and a half remain, and those are pledged at Chuhara's liquor counter in the Chamar hamlet when he drinks on credit. The remaining words—seven times fourteen of them!—he keeps for buying goods at the market. By evening not a single word remains to place upon Hiriya's heart. How can he then open his heart without words? He stands beneath the dew in the courtyard all night.

In "Atmakathan" ("Self-Account"), I wish to tell you something of my mind, Kapalakundala. But a female singer has been placed before the striking labourers' leader. A street-performer reads my poem while I, in a distant field, wear a rope around my waist. Let us then speak of something other than poetry. Yet there is no rasa, no word, no blow left, nor even a name of mine suited to this terribly prosaic life. Let us ask a few questions beyond the boundary walls of prose: in which grammatical person and number is one entangled, in what forest of tense and case? The indeclinables have been destroyed, the adjectives stripped of their clothing, the substantives pulled down from their throne. Is anybody capable of reading a feeling from a prefix? Panini's hand is caught in the tangled locks of manhood, and he will cry out through Maheshvara's aphorisms if I try to speak to you. Patanjali and Hemachandra press the poet down and explain the second person singular: tvam, tvam, tvaya, tubhyam, tvat, tava, tvayi. O Kapalakundala, in the mind all rules, classes and objectives disappear, while you alone stand at the centre, singular.

In "Ahi Sa Prem, Ghrina Ahi Sa" ("From You, Love; From You, Hatred"), love comes from you, hatred from you too. On the day of the final truth, hang me, so that you may no longer hear me. Before you can swallow me, I shall throw you away. I have removed all the lamps from beside you. I love, but hate more. I have brought the eyes, hands and both lips to an end. Yet your laughter turned an untrue word into ice across my philosophy; then life begins running once more through every vein. In "Kani Ta Jagah Chhori Diyah" ("Leave Me a Little Space"), leave a place in this corner, beneath a pile of letters, for my desire. It was I who wrote of you and wished to fashion a poem. I need space because a poet has three feet: one covered in bestiality, another with ink dried on its tip, and the third a counterfeit heart. If you want a poet like me, leave me a little room.

In "Bhay—1" ("Fear—1"), there is the Atharvan poet and the anxiety that his book may be stolen. Perhaps the poems would then pass under somebody else's name, and the poet would be excluded from history. It costs money to keep me alive and takes arrangements to prepare my funeral pyre, decorated with profound mantras; how many histories must be written upon the anger of my poems? In "Bhay—2" ("Fear—2"), deceit will come, but now I fear nobody: I have learnt the arts of swimming and of sinking to the lowest depth, and even of being destroyed. Can an unheard word awaken hares and owls, and a touch from someone deemed untouchable awaken hunger? I am no longer toothless; a full set of teeth has appeared. Harsh words, cool breasts, long sentences, tender compositions, Vibhishana's commentary and scattered texts—all are overwhelmed with meanings and mismeanings.

In "Namkaran" ("Naming"), the moon is called chandrama and the stars niharika, and the meaning of night changes. Call the light pratyusha and the sun martanda, and the eyes are dazzled. Call the jungle a pleasure-grove and grass and straw the sacred durvakshata, and a mantra seems to recite itself. Rename relentless labour 'untiring endeavour', or the joining of incongruous words a 'compound', and a broken heart is suddenly soothed. Life seems to belong only to the living —and only to you and me, or whoever continues living under a changed form, trusting the changing horoscope and its calculations on every lunar day. If I am called Dushyanta and you Shakuntala, then I shall remain anxious about Kanva and the fawn.

In "Ajuk Kavi, Bar Uchchhrinkhal Kavi" ("Today's Poet, Such an Unruly Poet"), the poet is bound in ropes of metre and non-metre, caught and wounded, rubbed raw, cooked and burned in the consonance of ornament. Let the mountains not be leapt over or made to roar: keep singing the dhaivata note. Poet, become your own line and cross beyond it into the poet's courtyard. Here come the poets—kavih, kavi, kavayah—to a modern tune. Critics will make the poem metrical, fettered and worshipped by their ways of thinking, leaving it a half-poem, a half-anti-poem, an Ardhanarishvara poised upon a half-man. How unrestrained is today's eminent poet, this 'Hatanarishvara'! In "Ahan Nahi Bajalahun Kichhu" ("You Have Said Nothing"), you have uttered nothing until now; you have buried your store of words beneath the ground, where corpses are buried. But I am also a religiously frenzied Hindu devotee: even in death I shall not go underground. I shall burn and flare, singing my song in the flames until nails and hair vanish. Which discipline or scripture taught us to put a bridle upon feeling? Let the body remain hidden beneath pride and ornament; lock the throat so that no sound comes forth. Yet I am a Suryavanshi Rajput; my weapons are words, meanings, sounds and scripts. If I lose in argument I shall surrender, but whether I lose or win, I shall certainly speak. The lighting apparatus lies helpless; the signals of red, green and yellow are mute. I peer into your scheme to strip me of clothes and weapons, to make me tell a lie with a half-truth, to steal nectar while seated in the line: life, staked upon a signifier, has become a corpse-word. Still I hope that you will speak—or, failing that, that I shall burst into one of my own songs.

In "Apan Kavita Sunau!" ("Recite Your Poem!"), you took me, your former lover, to the new house on the mountain summit. I ask the clouds for directions, and they smile obliquely at the sight of us together. But neither the clouds, stars, zodiac and ascendant, the sky's geometry, nor the arithmetic of fate made the error that led to our separation. Our final meeting took place in a crater on the moon. The stones and the geography of darkness were not to blame. The signs of sun and earth and the stars' signatures conspired together to bring about separation and prevent either of us from uttering a memorable line or word. Silence tightened its grip upon our throats. Yet neither silence nor the inscriptions on the walls were to blame: we had simply never learnt to read their alien letters. The hollow filled with your poems. I tried, unsuccessfully, to climb the rising lines to their summit, but do not blame the lines. You do not have a monopoly on betrayal. Now I have learnt your language; I can climb the mountain burning with desire and read every line, poem and inscription. I have learnt to decipher your signature. Yet on this inscription you display the amounts of rebar, timber, sand and cement, doors, hinges and flooring! What I want to hear are a few poems, spoken by you in your language, which has now become my language as well.

In "Jivani" ("Biography"), should there be the mutiny in the cantonments, Tantia Tope, Victoria, the birth of Rabindranath the government poet, and the debate over widow remarriage? The first page of theatre history: has a worm eaten an entire page about Herasim Lebedev? But the pioneers of today's theatre do not mind if that page is missing. On the reverse is an article on Michael Madhusudan, and another on the beginnings of modern poetry; how would an ill-read poet born after 1990 know any of it! That is why such a chameleon as I can never be satisfied. Then comes 1951, the birth of this century's government poet, childhood poverty and neglect, Vivekananda's fabricated tale and fragmentary sayings. Must Girish Ghosh, Sir Ashutosh, Netaji's escape and the Mahatma's imprisonment precede my own story? False! For does history begin only with the appearance of Godse and my own birth? Then come a shattered geography, mathematics of appropriation and classical divisions of caste, the very summit of suffering. Set my heart right, you official biographer of mine! Every chapter you write about me ought to begin in 1951. There is my stepmother, the matriarch of the family, and the invented story of a grandmother who becomes the princess of Sonbarsa. How did poetry arrive, and what of the woman who entered my life? I relinquish the commission: go and find someone else, an unborn or unknown nameless poet. Until then, poetry herself will look after me and tell the story of my life.

In the title poem, "Madhyamapurush Ekavachan" ("Second Person Singular"), comes the command to think of someone other than you. But trees, flowers and stones are deceptive, and treacherous grammar has spread its net everywhere. You are the second person singular! Politics, the mountainous debt of the nation, corrupt appointments … You are the second person singular, but … Write of the injustices of Navya-Nyaya, heap up the categories of Vaisheshika, forget the grammar of wealth. You are the second person singular, but … The aesthetic essence of erotic rasa and suggestion proves useless, merely momentary. From a lifetime to Jatayu's sacrifice to rescue another man's Sita; to the Gita. Chalati, chalatah, chalanti: poetry flows as a truthful stream of speech, as though grammar itself were flowing. You are the second person singular, but … How can I think of anything that leaves you out?

Poetry: very few people read it. In campaigns to promote and disseminate languages such as Sanskrit, conversational camps employ simple Sanskrit. Fiction and novels are translated into Sanskrit from modern languages, but poetry remains outside this process. The reason is that nobody reads poetry; translating it into a language that has come to require instructional camps is considered a wasteful expenditure of energy. The situation of Maithili has become such that if the villages were to disappear today, the number of its speakers would fall drastically. People would speak Maithili only at seminars and gatherings. There is already a felt need for camps teaching Maithili pronunciation. In such circumstances, what need or justification is there for writing poetry in Maithili? Emphasising the claim that one writes poetry for want of time makes this predicament even more alarming. The events of one's neighbourhood, personal ambitions, accusations and accounts of travel have consequently become the subject matter of Maithili poems. But why not write prose about these things? A story is adapted into drama for the stage; to what end is prose converted into a poem? The readers of this poetry, supposedly composed for lack of time, are factional critics and those 'great poets' who turn prose into verse and use their own prefaces to write favourable reviews of their own poems. Who, then, will understand the worth of making poetry? An individual experience of the material world that never penetrates deeply cannot become great poetry merely by rhyming. Metaphysical reflection, however abstract, cannot move us either if it fails to touch the material world, whether it is free verse or enjoys the backing of a clique or ideology. Human beings need food, clothing and shelter, and only thereafter metaphysical speculation. The Buddha asks whether those participating in festivities know the inevitability of death; if they do, how can they participate so blithely? Likewise, when modern Maithili poets see the linguistic, cultural and economic ground disappearing beneath their own feet and nevertheless shut their eyes to this truth, they cannot bring sharpness to the political positions on domestic and foreign events that they try to force into poetry. Nor does their patronising desire to write 'for' the indigenous Dalit community, doing that community a favour, acquire any edge. But when Rajdev Mandal writes:

...

> From drops of blood falling, drip by drip,
> the earth is being bathed.
> A bird asks itself this question:
> Will the black and heavy night ahead > leave any of our kind alive ... ?

The poem sends a shiver through us. Is the 'kind' here the poet's species as a poet, the bird's species, or ... ? Why should such a poem require factional intrigue and a self-satisfied preface? What political clique or sect must sponsor this feeling? What poetry requires is excellence. It requires a foundation in language and culture. It does not need merely imported subjects, brought as though someone were conferring a favour upon it. Nor does it need imported sentiment that amounts only to a patronising, hurried attempt to discover the linguistic, cultural and economic foundations disappearing under its feet. A good poem can be written on any subject. It may take up the Buddha's anxiety about humanity's future and give strength to a troubled mind; otherwise people will keep going to the sermons of fraudulent holy men. It may address the linguistic, cultural and economic foundations of society; otherwise Maithili itself will come to require instructional camps. Images must also communicate: otherwise a suitable atmosphere will have to be arranged for the poet in advance, a stage prepared for the poem, camps organised to train audiences in the poet's vocabulary and doctrine—and poets are already doing just that. Literature ought to include the gentle rises and falls of the language of Mithila, the many-sided gifts of its working class, and equally its rigid conventions of life and culture, its politics, daily routines, social norms, economy, morality, religion and philosophy. Without them, literature will become one-sided, tip over, and turn into something fit only to be framed and hung on a wall. The making of poetry is a literary necessity. On the day people in Mithila begin to feel that they need camps to teach them Maithili, the existence of poetry itself will become questionable. The poet must remain vigilant to prevent that day from arriving. Here Nachiketa's Madhyamapurush Ekavachan—tvam, tvam, tvaya, tubhyam, tvat, tava, tvayi—stands before us in distinction from the first-person forms aham, mam, maya, mahyam, mat, mama, mayi.

59. The Nine Planets of Drama (Natya-Navagraha)

Abstract

Kamalak Bhagata · Danavir Dadhichi · Apala Atreyi · Bha Jayab Chhu · Jalodip.* Editor, Videha: the first Maithili fortnightly e-journal (since 2000) | ISSN 2229-547X. 1. Kamalak Bhagata: A Comic Dissection of Symbols, Tradition and Blind Imitation.*

Keywords: drama · nine planets · literary criticism · Maithili

Abstract · सारांश

This chapter examines "Gajendra Thakur—Natya-Navagraha". The present book collects reviews of nine Maithili plays by Gajendra Thakur: Kamalak Bhagata, Danavir Dadhichi, Apala Atreyi, Bha Jayab Chhu, Jalodip, Sankarshan, Ganga Bridge, Machand and Ulkamukh. The first five belong to children's drama and the remaining four were written for adult audiences. This division, however, is merely administrative. Together the nine plays constitute a continuous vision of theatre, from the sutradhar's direct lesson in Kamalak Bhagata—"Ask, understand, and then act"—to Acharya Singh's profound maxim in Ulkamukh—"An incomplete text cannot become oblivion; only a complete text can be forgotten."

An Interrelated Critical Study of Nine Maithili Plays

Kamalak Bhagata · Danavir Dadhichi · Apala Atreyi · Bha Jayab Chhu · Jalodip

Sankarshan · Ganga Bridge · Machand · Ulkamukh

Playwright

Gajendra Thakur

Editor, Videha: the first Maithili fortnightly e-journal (since 2000) | ISSN 2229-547X

Contents

Introduction: Nine Plays, One Vision of Theatre

1. Kamalak Bhagata: A Comic Dissection of Symbols, Tradition and Blind Imitation

2. Danavir Dadhichi: From a Legend of Bones to the Gift of Knowledge

3. Apala Atreyi: Marks on the Body, the Disease of Perception and the Birth of a Vedic Hymn

4. Bha Jayab Chhu: Reading Maithili's First Climate-Conscious Four-Way Play

5. Jalodip: Floods, Children and a Dramaturgy of Water's Path

6. Sankarshan: The Disease of Calling an Injury a Welcome, and the Shoe of Self-Knowledge

7. Ganga Bridge: History's Hammering at the Altar of Development

8. Machand: The Human Being in the Triangle of Language, Justice and Terror

9. Ulkamukh: The Great Struggle Between Memory and Forgetting —the Summit of the Dramatic Cycle

Conclusion: Nine Plays, One Dramatic Philosophy

Introduction: Nine Plays, One Vision of Theatre

This book brings together reviews of nine Maithili plays by Gajendra Thakur—Kamalak Bhagata, Danavir Dadhichi, Apala Atreyi, Bha Jayab Chhu, Jalodip, Sankarshan, Ganga Bridge, Machand and Ulkamukh. The first five belong to children's drama, while the remaining four were written for adult audiences. But that distinction is only administrative: together the nine plays present a continuous vision of theatre. At one end stands the direct instruction of the sutradhar in Kamalak Bhagata: “Ask, understand, and only then act.” At the other stands Acharya Singh's profound proposition in Ulkamukh: “An incomplete text cannot become the poet's memory; only a complete text can become forgetting.” One play teaches the child spectator to question; the other teaches the adult spectator to understand the politics of remembrance. Between them lie seven steps, each probing the steps that precede and follow it.

This book adopts a method on two levels. The first is an independent review of each play, considering its narrative construction, arrangement for performance, organisation of rasa and ideological substance. At the second level, each review traces its relations with the other eight plays—what Julia Kristeva calls intertextuality. No text is born alone; it is woven from quotations, echoes and transformations of other texts. Since all nine plays come from a single playwright, their intertextuality is deliberate rather than accidental. Both Dadhichi and Jalodip end with the same whispered words: “That is the real point.” The teenage girl in Bha Jayab Chhu is named Apala, recalling the heroine of Apala Atreyi. Both Sankarshan and Ulkamukh are divided into kallolas rather than acts. The drum in Ganga Bridge and the folk songs in Ulkamukh carry popular memory alongside written history. Once these connections are recognised, the nine plays appear not as nine separate books but as a dramatic navagraha—a constellation of nine planets.

Theoretical tools have been selected according to the subject. On the Indian side, the study draws upon Bharata's arrangement of rasa in the Natyashastra, the distinction between natyadharmi and lokadharmi representation, the tradition of the sutradhar and the divisions of stagecraft; Abhinavagupta's sadharanikarana, or universalisation; Anandavardhana's dhvani, or suggestion; Kuntaka's vakrokti, or oblique expression; Kshemendra's conception of aucitya, or propriety; and the critical criteria supplied by Maithili's own kirtaniya theatre and folk-ballad traditions. From Western and modern theatre come Aristotle's Poetics, Bergson's analysis of laughter, Brecht's epic theatre and learning plays, Piscator's documentary theatre, Badal Sircar's Third Theatre, Safdar Hashmi's street-theatre tradition, Augusto Boal's Theatre of the Oppressed, the Theatre in Education movement, Peter Slade's theory of child drama, the educational approaches of Brian Way and Dorothy Heathcote, Bruno Bettelheim's psychology of folktales, Lev Vygotsky's theory of play, Erving Goffman's work on stigma, the modernist outlooks of Kafka and Pirandello, Walter Benjamin's philosophy of history, and Jan Assmann's theory of cultural memory. No theory has been imposed upon a play from outside: each critical measure is applied only where the text itself calls for it.

It is useful to clarify here the theoretical distinction between theatre for children and theatre for adults. Peter Slade sees child drama not as a miniature version of adult theatre but as an autonomous art form animated by play, participation and a circular performance space. Dorothy Heathcote, through her "Mantle of the Expert", teaches children to think from within knowledge by placing them in the position of experts. All five children's plays are tested against these criteria. They do not make children passive recipients of moral instruction; they enable them to ask questions, participate in play and undertake commitments. The adult plays move in the opposite direction: they fracture the audience's habitual beliefs and, in Brecht's terms, make the familiar strange so that spectators think instead of being carried away by emotion. One kind of theatre joins children to the world; the other teaches adults to challenge that world. These nine plays constitute the bridge between the two.

The sequence of reviews also constitutes a reading journey. First come five children's plays: folktale in Kamalak Bhagata; Vedic narrative in Danavir Dadhichi and Apala Atreyi; and contemporary crises in Bha Jayab Chhu and Jalodip. Then follow four adult plays: individual vanity in Sankarshan; the violence of institutions in Ganga Bridge; the conflict between state power and terror in Machand; and, finally, the great battle over memory in Ulkamukh, which draws all eight earlier plays into itself. Readers may take each review separately, but the real pleasure of their intertextual connections emerges when they are read in sequence.

1. Kamalak Bhagata: A Comic Dissection of Symbols, Tradition and Blind Imitation

Kamalak Bhagata is the shortest work in this cycle of plays and perhaps the sharpest. Its subtitle announces its purpose: "A pointed, humorous and instructive children's play about blind imitation." The sutradhar tells us at the outset that the plot is based on a well-known story from Sanskrit literature. The narrative is straightforward. A beggar arrives to bathe in the Kamala River, bringing a little packet of money saved over a year and dreaming of going to Janakpur to become a devotee of the Kamala. Afraid of theft, he buries the money in sand and raises a mound over it with his foot in the shape of a Shiva-linga to mark the spot. What happens next is the play's true dramatic event. Bathers arrive one after another, mistake this linga for the local ritual prescription and each make one of their own. The stage fills with cries of "Har Har Mahadev," while the beggar returns from his bath to find his marker lost in a sea of Shiva-lingas. The sutradhar's concluding words are the play's seed-mantra: "The sign was made for oneself; it became a tradition for everyone."

In Bharata's theory of rasa, the enduring emotion of the comic rasa is laughter, and he distinguishes two kinds of laughter: atmastha, in which the character laughs, and parastha, in which others laugh at the character's behaviour. The comedy of Kamalak Bhagata is entirely parastha. Nobody on stage laughs: the beggar is serious and the bathers are devout. Yet laughter sweeps the audience because spectators know something the characters do not. In dramatic criticism this is dramatic irony, and it matters especially for young spectators: children are placed in a position of superior knowledge, giving them confidence and enabling them to experience the lesson as their own discovery rather than an instruction imposed on them. Seen through Anandavardhana's theory of dhvani, the final words of the sutradhar are equally significant. Their literal meaning describes an incident at a bathing place, but the suggested meaning extends across ritual observance, social custom and the culture of herd-like imitation. The work also satisfies Kshemendra's criterion of aucitya, or propriety. The punishment in this children's play is not violent. The beggar is not beaten; his money is merely lost among the replicas of his own marker. The consequence follows from the logic of the story instead of being imposed from outside it.

By Western criteria the piece approaches Brecht's Lehrstück, or learning play, which seeks to develop a capacity for analysis while providing pleasure. At the end all the characters turn towards the audience and say in unison: "Ask, understand, and only then act. Do not imitate with your eyes shut." This is Brechtian direct address: the fourth wall is broken and spectators become the judges. Bruno Bettelheim explains the psychological work of folktales as a safe imaginative enactment and resolution of a child's inner fears—here the fear of losing one's possessions. The beggar's loss cautions rather than terrifies children because, at the end, the community acts together to gather up the sand: an image of repair following loss.

Intertextually, Kamalak Bhagata is the seed-play of the cycle. Its central malady—repeating an action without understanding its cause—returns in adult form in Sankarshan. There three black dogs are beaten in turn at Madhur's shop, and each calls the blow a warm welcome and sends another dog down the same road. The crowd of bathers in Kamalak Bhagata has condensed into three figures, and a new layer of self-deception has been added to the disease of imitation. Jalodip and Bha Jayab Chhu, by contrast, offer an antidote: their children question instead of following the crowd. Where Kamalak Bhagata diagnoses the malady, those two plays teach its treatment. In Ulkamukh the same affliction appears in its most terrifying form in Acharya Sarabha's rote instruction: students are made to memorise a text without understanding it. The movement from imitating a Shiva-linga to imitating scripture gives this dramatic universe one of its most consistent lines of concern.

As for limitations, the play is built upon a single incident and a single satirical thrust. Its performance therefore depends on disciplined pacing and sound design. The directions in the text—the sound of begging, the clink of coins, the flow of the Kamala, the rustle of digging sand, the crowd's chants and the final silence—create a complete acoustic architecture. That last moment of silence, when the crowd realises that it has followed a rule without understanding why it was devised, is the greatest theatrical moment in this little play. Few children's plays achieve such a complete dramatic circle in such a short span.

2. Danavir Dadhichi: From a Legend of Bones to the Gift of Knowledge

The boldest decision in Danavir Dadhichi appears in its subtitle—"A Vedic Dramatic Ballad on the Defence of Knowledge, a Promise and Truth." The stage directions explicitly state that in the revised text Dadhichi's gift is not presented as the legendary donation of his bones but as the safeguarding of knowledge, a promise, eligibility and truth. At the end the sutradhar announces this reinterpretation: Dadhichi did not give his body away; he sacrificed for the defence of knowledge, his pledge and truth. The story of a thunderbolt made from bones was, he says, a later misunderstanding by the myth-makers. This is not an arbitrary revision. The account of Dadhyang Atharvana in Vedic literature is connected with madhu-vidya and a horse's head, with references reaching to the Ashvin hymns of the Rigveda and the Madhu section of the Shatapatha Brahmana. The familiar bones-and-thunderbolt version is a subsequent Puranic development. Roland Barthes calls myth a kind of speech that turns history into nature: something once said within a particular context becomes, as myth, apparently timeless and beyond dispute. The play reverses precisely that process. It dissolves a hardened myth back into history and meaning, telling its young audience directly in the closing lines: "A story may change, but the search for truth must not cease." This lesson in source criticism is exceptional in children's theatre.

The title itself is a theoretical signal in its organisation of rasa. Sanskrit poetics recognises three varieties of the heroic rasa: yuddhavira (heroism in battle), dharmavira (heroism in duty) and danavira (heroism in giving). By calling itself Danavir Dadhichi, the play declares from the beginning that its heroic focus is not fighting but giving, and giving not a material object but knowledge. Indra's thunderbolt strike introduces a touch of the terrible, and the Ashvins' surgical wonder introduces the marvellous. The total maturation of the rasas, however, inclines towards shanta. The sage's declaration—"This body is impermanent … but out of fear for it I shall not allow brahmavidya to be extinguished"—is a pure expression of nirveda, or shama, the stable disposition of the tranquil rasa. Bharata's Natyashastra considers the direct enactment of killing unsuitable for the stage, and the play follows that restraint creatively. The two moments in which the neck is severed occur through the half-falling and half-rising curtain, together with light and sound cues. The direction is explicit: "Let sound and light create fear, not violence." This natyadharmi technique—the repeated lowering and raising of the curtain to select the moments of the surgery—offers a model solution to the depiction of violence in children's theatre.

Two central devices of Aristotle's Poetics shape the characters: peripeteia, the reversal of fortune, and anagnorisis, recognition. Both occur not in Dadhichi but in Indra. In the first scene Indra seeks knowledge through the calculation "First secure the promise, ask questions afterwards," and leaves with the threat, "Knowledge will be guarded by me." In the third stage the same Indra, thunderbolt in a trembling hand, asks forgiveness: "In the name of protecting knowledge I went to murder knowledge." This inward journey of the antagonist raises the play above a flat moral fable. By contrast, the Ashvins' argument about deserving to receive the gift—"Service made us worthy, not rank"—gives a modern meaning rooted in respect for labour to the classical requirement of patre danam, giving to a worthy recipient. The episode of Chyavana and the narrative thread concerning the Ashvins' right to drink Soma are also drawn authentically from the Vedic-Puranic tradition.

The deepest intertextual connection of Danavir Dadhichi is with Ulkamukh. Indra's threat—"If you impart this madhu-vidya to anyone, your head will fall"—and the rule of the chaupari in Ulkamukh, where outside students could not even make a copy or summary of the Tattvachintamani, are two historical forms of the same offence: policing knowledge. Dadhichi answers the interdiction by risking his own body; Gangesha and Vallabha answer it through song. Yet the playwright's position in both places is the same, articulated in Dadhichi's words: "There is no greater criminal than one who obstructs knowledge." Another connection is with Apala Atreyi. Both are Vedic plays for children; both depict gurukula life extensively and authentically; and in both, learning proves greater than the limits of the body. Apala's hymn transcends the marks on her skin, while Dadhichi's madhu-vidya survives the severing of his neck. The third connection is with Kamalak Bhagata: there the failure to understand what is imitated reappears in Indra's initial desire for knowledge as prestige rather than understanding. The final whisper, "That is the real point," returns word for word at the conclusion of Jalodip. It is the playwright's signature-sound, to which the conclusion will return.

For performance, the emotional division of the three worlds—the golden tranquillity of the ashram, sharp brightness at Indra's entrance and smoky redness on the battlefield—turns lighting into a vehicle of meaning. The Sharyana reservoir and the list of weapons fashioned, including trisandhivraja, suchimukha and vikankatimukha, preserve the flavour of the Vedic setting. The final admonition—"The duty of a weapon is defence, not vanity"—saves the play from war fever and preserves its tranquil conclusion.

3. Apala Atreyi: Marks on the Body, the Disease of Perception and the Birth of a Vedic Hymn

Apala Atreyi is the third work in the cycle drawn from a Vedic source, and perhaps its bravest. Its heroine is one of the rare women seers of the Rigveda whose hymns have survived in the Samhita. In seven scenes the play traces the course of Apala's life: a questioning child in the hermitage; the initiation and education of girls and boys alike; the onset of a skin disease, described as white leprosy; marriage to Krishashva; her husband's growing indifference; her return with self-respect to her father's forest hermitage; her chewing of Soma and praise of Indra; her cure; and the inclusion of her hymn in the Rigveda at the assembly of brahmodya, learned disputation. The materials of the Soma scene—a little stalk of Soma chewed with the teeth; a prayer for the renewal of three places, her father's head, the field and her abdomen; purification through the apertures of a chariot and its yoke; and skin like the sun—are authentic echoes of the Rigvedic hymn attributed to Apala. The playwright translates the hymn's imagery into dramatic action without mutilating or distorting it. The porcupine, monitor lizard and chameleon in the stage setting are also derived from the hymn's symbols of transformed skin.

The intellectual centre of the play is a subtle reversal, made incisive in Apala's words: "The marks are on my body; it is your vision that has fallen ill." Erving Goffman's theory of stigma holds that stigma is not simply a bodily property but a relation established by society's gaze: the identity of a stigmatised person is severed from its wholeness and reduced to a single mark. The play seems to anticipate this theory. At the outset Atri fears that the disease is on the body but society will turn it into an accusation against the soul. Krishashva's confession—"Inside me there is a conflict between love and desire … I am confessing my weakness; I cannot give it the name of religion"—offers an honest portrayal of human frailty instead of presenting him as a stock villain. Such honesty saves the play from melodrama: Krishashva is not evil, but his way of seeing has become diseased, and the play's compassion extends to both sides. At the close, however, the play refuses the tearful route of karuna rasa. Apala neither accepts nor rejects the repentant Krishashva on his return. She simply declares her new identity: “I am Apala Atreyi—nobody's object of charity, but the seer of my own hymn.” The transformation from karuna to vira—one might call it the heroism of self-respect—is the play's classical achievement. The final lighting direction, increasing illumination on Apala at the altar while dimming it on Krishashva, places the stage's seal upon it.

From the standpoint of feminist criticism, the play's most valuable feature is its movement of Apala out of a narrative of victimhood and into a narrative of creative agency. When the sages at the brahmodya assembly say, “The question of whether to include it does not arise. From today it is part of the Rigveda. Apala's name must never be separated from the mantra,” the play constructs an ideal of acknowledging the woman creator by name. Its exact opposite appears in Ulkamukh, where Vallabha's song loses its attribution and wanders as the ghostly song of a bamboo grove, while Acharya Singh-Vyaghra becomes a symbol through the effacement of his name. Together the plays reveal two poles in the politics of memory: remembrance with a name, in Apala's case, and nameless forgetting, in Vallabha's. The sutradhar's closing statement—“A bodily wound may heal by itself; a wound in perception heals through knowledge”—connects the cycle's learning-centred philosophy to Dadhichi's gift of knowledge. In that play, learning proved greater than death; here, it proves greater than stigma.

Several finer decisions deserve praise from the standpoint of child-drama theory. The instruction that the illness be indicated through a pale white cloth and lighting rather than ridicule unites Kshemendra's principle of propriety with modern inclusive education: young spectators should perceive the illness without treating it as something disgusting or laughable. Atri's declaration during the initiation scene—“Here girls and boys alike have the right to ask questions; questioning is the first step towards learning”—is the Vedic predecessor of the culture of questioning in Bha Jayab Chhu and Jalodip. The details of the hermitage rules—the animals of the forest must not be killed, food should be gathered from uncultivated produce, deer may roam undisturbed—likewise provide an ancient basis for the ecological awareness of Bha Jayab Chhu. Knowledge and nature alike are to be served rather than possessed. It is worth remembering that the adolescent girl in Bha Jayab Chhu is named Apala, while her male counterpart is Jayanta. By giving young characters the names of predecessors within his dramatic universe, the playwright maintains an internal chain of remembrance, confirming that this book's intertextual method corresponds to the writer's own design.

One limitation is that the list of lessons in the second scene—letters, vowel quantities, accent, Samavedic chanting and so forth—may become static in performance. But the text itself offers a solution. Apala's intervening questions—"If pronunciation is faulty, meaning changes; if perception is faulty, a human being changes"—weave the information into dialogue. As a whole, Apala Atreyi is a mature drama of women's dignity in the guise of a children's play, demanding not pity but respect.

4. Bha Jayab Chhu: Reading Maithili's First Climate-Conscious Four-Way Play

Bha Jayab Chhu makes two claims in its subtitle: to be Maithili's first climate-fiction play and to be a chaubatiya, or four-way street play. Its construction clearly fulfils both. There is neither raised stage nor curtain. The sutradhar calls to the crowd, "Form a circle," and the directions instruct the spectators to leave a passage for air in the circular enclosure. This round, equipment-free performance space surrounded by spectators is a foundational principle of Badal Sircar's Third Theatre—a theatre liberated from the economics of an auditorium and brought into the midst of ordinary people. It equally belongs to Safdar Hashmi's street-theatre tradition, in which the play comes to spectators instead of expecting spectators to travel to the play. The opening exchange between the sutradhar and an actor emerging from the crowd—"Will watching a play fill our bellies?"—is a genuine street-theatre opening. The sutradhar's reply—"There is hunger in the belly, hunger in the mind, hunger in speech and hunger for air"—connects the subject with livelihood. In doing so, it anticipates the criticism that environmental discussion is a luxury of the well-off.

The structure has three parts—"The Beings of Creation," "Science and Imagination," and "The Pledge"—while its assignment of roles provides a textbook illustration of Peter Slade's theory of child drama. Eight actors assume eight roles: bird and firefly (Om and Aastha), tree and vegetation (Jayanta and Apala), sun and stars and moon (Vijay and Vijaya), the unsuccessful scientist Neklal as a ghost, and Ramvati as Dream and Imagination. Slade holds that a child's ability to become an object or creature in play—what he calls projected and personal play—is a natural artistic faculty. The play makes this faculty into its theatrical form: the nonhuman world speaks from the stage, and climate crisis ceases to be an abstract statistic and becomes a matter of life and death for characters. At the level of communicating science, the play is strikingly concrete. The comparison between the cool light of a firefly, bioluminescence, and Neklal's wasteful lamp, producing fifteen units of heat for sixteen units in all, encapsulates an entire lesson in energy efficiency in one image. The eucalyptus episode—"A tree that does not quench the soil's thirst does not create a forest merely by being planted"—argues the ecological case for native species. The song of a seed caught in a buffalo's hair and carried to a distant land sets scientific knowledge of seed dispersal to a folk rhythm. The dispute between Imagination, embodied by Ramvati, and Science, embodied by Neklal, is the philosophical pivot: "Science remains incomplete if what one understands is never put into practice." It identifies the same gap between knowing and acting that appears as imitation in Kamalak Bhagata and as vanity in Sankarshan.

A central conception of Augusto Boal's Theatre of the Oppressed is the "spect-actor": a spectator who becomes an actor through the act of watching. The third part of Bha Jayab Chhu enacts precisely this. All eight characters voice their pledges—"I shall plant more trees than I cut"; "I shall recognise native trees and preserve their seeds"; "I shall acknowledge old mistakes"—then extend their hands to the spectators and ask, "Tell us, will all of you do the same?" The direction instructs the performers to elicit a collective "Yes." Boal called theatre a rehearsal for revolution; here the rehearsal consists of speaking a pledge together. The use of coughing is the play's most poignant acoustic device. After the song mourning the death of trees, every character coughs, and the coughing gradually acquires a rhythm: a bodily symptom of pollution is transformed into the rhythm of art and becomes energy for resistance. The title itself is a triumph of dhvani, or suggestion: the innocent sound of a children's disappearing trick, bha jayab chhu, is filled with the terror of extinction, which the final line then negates: "If the roots survive, we shall not vanish; if the roots survive, we too shall survive."

Intertextually, the play is the companion of Jalodip. Both are children's plays about contemporary environmental crises. In one, the air is ill; in the other, water demands a passage. Both end in collective pledges, and in both the underlying cause of the crisis is not nature but unimaginative human conduct. Its relation to Kamalak Bhagata is one of reversal. There a crowd imitates without questioning; here a crowd standing in a ring is questioned and prompted to answer "Yes." The process of turning a crowd into a community makes the two plays opposite sides of a single coin. Neklal's admission—"I am an unsuccessful scientist … I could not imagine"—is the children's version of Sankarshan's final realisation: "The kick was not in the shoe; it was in my pride." In both cases the ethical climax is the admission of one's own fault rather than assigning blame to somebody else.

The possibilities for performance also demonstrate the practicality of the chaubatiya form. A laser light can suggest a firefly; a sheet can provide cover; and inexpensive props such as photo-strips are easy to use on a street. The only limitation is that, with eight roles being developed in parallel, some voices, particularly Vijay and Vijaya, remain relatively less developed. In the rapid tempo of street theatre, however, the imbalance is forgivable. Overall the work opens a new genre—climate drama—for Maithili children's theatre.

5. Jalodip: Floods, Children and a Dramaturgy of Water's Path

Jalodip is a social children's play about flood safety and drainage, and it stands closest to contemporary reality in this cycle. In its preliminary scene there is water everywhere. A child rescued from a flood stretches out a hand and says, "I am all right. But my ..." Darkness falls before the sentence is completed. This unfinished sentence is the seed of the play's karuna rasa, its tragic compassion, because we later discover that the walls of the house survived while the house's laughter was carried away by water. The five-act journey begins with this grief and ends in collective resolve. Between them stands a scene that could earn the play a place in theoretical accounts of children's theatre: the game of building a landscape.

Sitting on a wooden cot, four children make a model of their locality using bowls, a water jug, wet cloth, clods of earth, sticks and an overturned plate. A drawn line is the river, a clod the village, a stick the embankment, and the upturned plate the highway—"a road by name, a wall in practice." The fourth child pours water from the jug, and it becomes trapped on the far side of the road. The entire engineering of the flood becomes visible through a game. In Dorothy Heathcote's famous "Mantle of the Expert" method, children are given the role of specialists in the knowledge they are expected to acquire; they then learn it from the inside, accompanied by responsibility. Here children become engineers in play. The adults themselves say, "Look, the children have become engineers too." The conclusion reached through the game—"The bridge was built for vehicles. What was built for the water?"—opens the adults' eyes. Lev Vygotsky's theory of play argues that in playing a child rises a whole head above his or her actual age. Jalodip uses exactly this theatrical device: knowledge begins to flow in the opposite direction, from child to adult.

A second strength of the play is its discipline about facts. The claim that somebody cut an embankment enters as a rumour and is immediately challenged: "What we have heard need not be true." Such epistemic caution is rare in children's drama. The contractor's defence—"It was a natural disaster ... a flood like this comes once in a century"—is refuted by people's experience: "Our courtyard has gone under water three times in the past five years." The engineer refuses to attribute the flood to a single villain and instead identifies a network of causes: the river's old course blocked, ponds filled in, settlements built on low land, elevated roads, undersized culverts—all joining to form a trap for floodwater. The Theatre in Education movement values precisely this ideal arrangement: narrative feeling, factual analysis and a programme of action working together. The fourth and fifth acts of Jalodip realise all three through eight measures: relief; a map of the village's waterways; inspection of culverts; open accounts of repair costs; swimming instruction for children; a ban on throwing plastic into drains; cleaning before the rains; and development that preserves a route for water. Taken offstage, the measures could become a proposal before any village panchayat. In Boal's Forum Theatre spectators propose solutions; here the community of characters performs that work. Yet the democratic shape of the process—the headman, villagers, engineer and children each offering a measure in turn —fully embodies the forum spirit.

The title-symbol Jalodip, "a lamp upon water," is the play's poetic summit. On the night of the flood children float lamps upon leaves and bowls. "A lamp in the flood? The water will put it out." "That is why it needs a boat. Float the lamp on the water. A lamp upon water. Jalodip." The very water that took the house away now carries a lamp of memory and hope. This paradoxical image fulfils Anandavardhana's criterion of dhvani: the lamp is not merely an object but a suggestion. "This lamp is for my father … This lamp will not go out if we remember everything." The image of a lamp of remembrance connects the work with the philosophy of memory in Ulkamukh: there the force resisting oblivion is song, here it is the lamp. The whispered final words, "That is the real point," reproduce the concluding sound of Danavir Dadhichi verbatim, sealing both plays with the same sign of truth.

The pairing with Ganga Bridge is perhaps the most instructive in this volume. Both address water, infrastructure and corruption, but the distinction between the child and adult versions is unmistakable. In Jalodip the contractor eventually yields—"I … I shall give you the list"—and the village awakens. In Ganga Bridge the system crushes an honest engineer beneath a road roller. The optimism of the children's play is not artificial. It follows from the pedagogical principle shared by Boal and Heathcote that a child's experience of agency is a primary condition of becoming a citizen. Yet reading the two plays side by side reveals that the playwright is not giving two answers to the same question; he is showing two responsibilities for two ages: possibility for the child, warning for the adult. The four children's concluding maxim forms the pair's common manifesto: "Water is not the enemy; the blocked path is. Development is not the enemy; blind development is."

6. Sankarshan: The Disease of Calling an Injury a Welcome, and the Shoe of Self-Knowledge

Sankarshan is the first adult play in the series. Its subtitle—"A Maithili Play in Five Kallolas on Vanity, False Hospitality and Self-Knowledge"—encloses its entire arc in three ideas. In the prologue the playwright introduces his protagonist-antagonist: "The real darkness is in the glitter of his vanity, fear and falsehood." He announces that a shoe through which the man is cheated at Delhi's Chor Bazaar will show him the very mirror he has held before others all his life. The five kallolas—"The Seed of Prestige," "The Lie Takes Root," "The Market in Marriage and Boasting," "The Mirror of the City," and "The Shoe of Self-Knowledge"—trace the germination, growth, social and familial spread, crisis and dissolution of vanity like the stages of a plant's life. The word kallola, "wave," frees the divisions from the mechanical partitioning of acts and suggests the rise and fall of feeling. The same unit is used in Ulkamukh, where the waves are of memory rather than vanity: two ragas set to the same metre.

Henri Bergson's explanation of laughter is that it arises from the mechanical imposed upon the living. A person becomes ridiculous by mechanically repeating a rigid action even as circumstances change. The entirety of Sankarshan's farce displays this mechanism. After receiving a scolding from the Collector, Sankarshan sits in the stenographer's office and returns to the village saying that the Collector himself detained him in conversation. After suffering a panchayat's punishment he puts on a devotional necklace, only to take up a hoe against rohu fish at dawn. On the pilgrimage to Jagannath, where custom requires relinquishing a fruit, he relinquishes sugarcane so that he can reject tea sweetened with jaggery and instead drink tea with Russian sugar made from beet. The story of three black dogs related by Bhaskar is a tale within the tale and exemplifies Bergson's other comic devices, repetition and the snowball effect. The first dog measures a blow with a weight and describes it as a jalebi; the second calls scalding water a hot, freshly made jalebi; and the third describes the closed shutters and a beating with a stick as a host pleading, "Do not go away; have some more." Each lie sends the next dog towards an injury. Bhaskar states the story's point: "This is not a tale of hospitality; it is a tale of the disease of calling injury hospitality." Here lies the umbilical connection with Kamalak Bhagata. There the crowd repeats others' actions without knowing their causes. Here an individual renames personal harm as prestige and makes it an example worth repeating. Blind imitation and self-deception are the external and internal forms of the same sickness of knowledge.

The play is not merely farce, however. Its satirical edge continually becomes social criticism. Sankarshan's speech poisons other people's lives. The cruel medicine containing a poisonous plant's sap could have killed a patient had Nitya Kaka not intervened: "When someone knows the truth, even remaining silent can amount to giving medicine." An unfounded fear about a telephone directory leads Gonar Bhai to tear up his diary. Kuntaka's theory of vakrokti treats obliqueness of expression as the very quality of poetry. In Sankarshan's speech that obliqueness operates in reverse. Every crooked statement—telling an older woman who requests a seat, "Mother, this is not a boy; he has three boys of his own"; or praising his wife with "But her complexion is a shade darker than mine"—is an ornament of self-importance. The playwright shows that when oblique expression parts company with truth, it ceases to be art and becomes a disease. A single remark from his wife offstage—"The household runs because I am not a pampered wife. If I become pampered, who will carry the dung of your vanity?"—is the play's woman's voice. Without appearing onstage, she exposes the whole economy of Sankarshan's male pride in one sentence.

In the fourth and fifth kallolas, the play meets Aristotle's criteria. At Aligarh, police take a bundle of khesari bidi for marijuana and confiscate all Sankarshan's money except twenty rupees. The man whose words frightened the village becomes a victim of fear himself in the city: this is peripeteia, reversal. When the sole of a shoe he was cheated into buying at Chor Bazaar in a neighbour's name comes loose and protrudes like a heart, anagnorisis, recognition, occurs. It is not recognition of a destiny in the manner of an Aristotelian hero, but of character: "Tell me the truth, Gonar: the kick was not in the shoe; it was in my pride." In the epilogue the sutradhar rightly says that this one line contains more courage than anything else in the play. The comic rasa is resolved into tranquillity rather than loud laughter. The final direction—"Gonar does not laugh: this is no longer the moment for laughter, but for understanding"—gives this change of rasa its theatrical discipline. Intertextually, the Aligarh incident anticipates Machand: the state discovers a crime in the bag of an innocent person. Here a bundle of bidi becomes marijuana; there a pressure cooker becomes a shipment of narcotics. The sutradhar's last question—"Is there not a Sankarshan hidden somewhere within each of us?"—uses the same Brechtian audience address found in children's form in Kamalak Bhagata and Bha Jayab Chhu.

A structural limitation is that some scenes in its episodic design—the story of the guru's tea, for example—can look like self-contained jokes. Look more carefully, however, and each introduces a new sphere of vanity: administration, religion, medicine, marriage, appearance, food or geography. The episode of the son's flight—"I spent my life teaching everybody, but I could not teach my own son the way home"—opens a tunnel of pathos within the farce. Through it the play reaches its serious ending.

7. Ganga Bridge: History's Hammering at the Altar of Development

Ganga Bridge is a moving play about development, corruption and sacrifice, but its real subject is not a bridge: it is the writing of history—who dies, who writes, and what remains of the dead in the history that is written. The play spans five parts and eight pallavas, or segments, and its time-scale is extraordinary. It begins with a school celebration of the national flag on 15 August 1947 and reaches the day on which the retired chief engineer launches his own book, Ganga Bridge, when the new Chief Minister has already announced a second bridge beside the decaying first one. Across this historical canvas, almost the entire apparatus of Bertolt Brecht's epic theatre is at work. The repeated announcement of the drummer—"Listen, listen … workers needed!"—functions like a song-placard that both divides and connects the sequence of scenes. The two drummers form a chorus that cools events through commentary: "Whom do you call the government?" Their debate teaches a lesson in the civics of democracy in unadorned Maithili. And when the labourers freeze during the imagined conversation between the engineer and the contractor, the staging becomes a direct instance of Verfremdung, alienation or distancing. Spectators cannot simply be swept along by events; they are made to see that an event is being shown to them.

In the tradition of Erwin Piscator's documentary theatre, the play does not flinch from statistics or institutional detail. Thirty workers died in the previous month; three hundred died in a year; only ten families were recommended for compassionate assistance. Ramdhani's hand is caught in a machine and is covered with a sack instead of a bandage. There are the back channels of tendering and a chain of commissions running through politicians, another engineer and hired thugs. The contractor's long confession is the play's most complex ethical document. He followed the engineer's method of transporting sand and stopped paying commissions. The engineer was transferred, and the contractor returned to his former practices: "I cannot take my children's names off the school roll." The villain here is the system, not any one individual; even the contractor is its hostage. The representation of this system reaches its peak in the exchange between Chief Minister and chief engineer in which different means of disposing of the honest engineer are ruled out one after another. Shoot him? He will become a Bhagat Singh. Charge him with corruption? The raid will find nothing but a cot. Force him to commit suicide? He is not the kind of man to do so. At last the decision is made: "He will meet with an accident." His death beneath a road roller, and the blanket of an 'accident' thrown over it, expose without disguise the state's machinery for manufacturing narratives.

The last pallava, the launch of the book, raises the play to the level of a philosophy of history. Hearing the chief engineer declare that "the business of history is not to reopen wounds but to bind them up, even if pus remains inside," and the Chief Minister praise the project with "The voices raised along the way were merely the dust of development; the blood that fell was the colour of sacrifice," one recalls Walter Benjamin's famous proposition that there is no document of civilisation that is not also a document of barbarism, and that history is written through sympathy with the victors. Alongside this authorised written history, the play establishes an audible counter-history: the workers' hammering, the "thak-thuk" that the drummer identifies at the end: "This is not the hammering of the bridge; it is the sound of history's bones." Writing against sound: this conflict is the adult political version of Ulkamukh's central conflict—"A name may be cut from a book, but breath will survive in the song." There the chaupari drives the song into the bamboo grove; here power smothers eyewitness memory under a mechanical smile and repeated "Thank you, thank you, thank you." That reiterated thanks is a brilliant example of Brecht's Gestus: an action that crystallises a social relationship in bodily gesture.

The organisation of rasa moves a bitter satire, touched by the repellent, between karuna and raudra, compassion and fury, while skilfully respecting Bharata's prescriptions for combining rasas. The laments of the deranged mother and the engineer's widow—"Where is the document now? The eyes of these children will speak"—are pure karuna. The MLA's speech on applying tilak and the scramble for four half-measures of sugar scatter a little lokadharmi laughter across the mourning, keeping the tale watered with life. The three-dimensional journey of Child 3—from school truant looking for goats, to cart-puller, to a worker who has fled bonded labour in Bhadohi—reveals the underworld beneath the national story of development, where the ironic mantra "Free country. Free school. Free college" keeps resounding. Intertextually, Jalodip is its children's counterpart: culvert, embankment, written document against the realities on the ground; the community wins there and loses here. Machand advances another step, showing the system's violence operating through procedure. And the engineer's final promise—"If the person who gives hope is crushed, hope will not die; his voice will dwell in the drum, the hammer, the bridge's cracks"—is a declaration of Ulkamukh's philosophy of remembrance on the banks of the Ganga.

The problems of staging are plain: a large cast, a leap of more than forty years, and the swift changes of scene required by the pallava structure. Yet the acoustic frame provided by the drummer and the ceremonial drum holds them together. Every change of scene brings back the same call, reminding spectators that the bridge is still where it always was—shaking and demanding repairs. The final irony is that even as the curtain falls the drummer is still calling for workers. The circle has been completed; the repairs have not.

8. Machand: The Human Being in the Triangle of Language, Justice and Terror

Machand is the most sharply contemporary work in the cycle. At its centre stands a person who has no language—more precisely, he has his own language, but nobody who understands it. Mutalif is a young Tamil speaker confined in the lock-up of a Delhi court. At the outset the interpreter, whether man or woman, sums up his predicament in a sentence: "The city that calls him a criminal cannot even pronounce his name correctly." Josef K. in Franz Kafka's The Trial cannot understand what offence he is accused of; Mutalif's condition is still worse, for he cannot understand the language in which the accusation is made. The intelligence officer's remark—"If justice does not understand a language, it is no longer justice; it becomes only procedure"—is the play's jurisprudential thesis. The description of the interpreter in the dramatis personae—"a bridge of words, though sometimes even the bridge remains unfinished"—is its poetic statement. Telling the story of the linguistic exile of a Tamil speaker in a marginalised language such as Maithili is itself a political act: a language ignored by the centre takes the side of another language that has gone unheard.

The most subtle stage device is a packet of food. In the first act the intelligence officer sends a packet containing the evening meal to Mutalif in his cell. Mutalif joins his hands and sobs in hiccuping bursts: gratitude and fear are both present in his crying. In the final stage direction, darkness leaves a pool of light on the empty food packet, accompanied by an echo of the officer's words: "Sometimes a packet of food gives greater testimony than a court." In Brecht's conception of Gestus, a concrete action gives bodily form to an entire social relationship. Here the gift of food forms a human bond outside the charge sheet between the state and the accused; the whole play tests that bond. The extended episode at Babadhām may seem at first to digress: Lulha has travelled there on foot for twenty years while grazing buffaloes, whereas Piar Bacha goes in a vehicle and keeps erecting storeys on his buildings. In fact the passage supplies the play's storehouse of metaphors. The intelligence officer's conclusion—"The foot-soldier is a pawn in chess. The king and queen are not the country. The country is Mutalif. The country is Lulha"—transforms the chess-piece image with which he first identified Mutalif into a definition of the nation: "He is a chess-piece, a foot-soldier, a pawn. But where is the hand that moves the pieces?"

The dialogue between the intelligence officer and the terrorist leader in Act II is the intellectual spine of the play, and its arrangement deserves attention. There is no table between the two, as if an invisible ravine separates them. As their argument intensifies, their shadows begin to interpenetrate: the stage direction is itself a thesis. The Lal Denga episode within the exchange is a documentary insertion in Piscator's manner. The actual history of the Mizoram Accord is brought in as an argument for peace: "A great leader does not abandon his people in midstream." On the opposite side, the terrorist leader's accusations—"You will open a factory and he will become a watchman … Even your mercy testifies against you. Mercy, Officer, is a weapon more dangerous than power"—touch the emptiness of the state's promise of development, previously exposed in the rhetoric of sacrifice in Ganga Bridge. The title-word Machand swings both ways around this argument. First the officer says to the terrorists, "You put explosives into the empty begging bowl of unemployment. You are the machands." In answer the terrorist leader, seized by the throat and gasping, says, "You too are a machand, a government machand … the only difference is that you wear a uniform and I am in the forest." The exchange of the same epithet constructs the play as a mirror: each side sees its reflection in the other, and the audience is denied an easy position of comfort.

Act III brings peripeteia. Mutalif, released on bail, returns with an uncanny steadiness in place of fear. Through the interpreter he says that after leaving prison he had wanted to become like the officer, but the police station, journalists, village unemployment and the stain on his name would not allow him to do so: "When society cannot accept somebody as innocent, it does not take long for him to become a criminal." Measured against his hiccuping tears in Act I, the shift from victim to potential agent reveals the play's pathos: the system manufactures its own enemies. In the self-reflection of Act IV, the play turns metatheatrical. The intelligence officer recalls Mutalif saying, "I write stories … I found the plot of a story on this journey … the hero of that story will be Mutalif." The story spectators have been watching is thus being written from within, while the claim to its central role belongs to the one who previously had no recognised language. "But becoming a hero and surviving are two different things." This sentence leaves the ending unresolved. In the tradition of Badal Sircar, such a refusal of closure gives spectators responsibility rather than relief.

Intertextually, Machand links Ganga Bridge and Ulkamukh. In Ganga Bridge, the state crushes a dissenter beneath a road roller; in Machand, it entangles him in legal procedure. Reading the two together makes visible a progression in violence, from the suppression of bodies to the suppression effected by institutions. Mutalif's language of gestures is akin to the song-language of the cowherd Hiru in Ulkamukh: both are voices that power's ears refuse to hear, and in both plays those voices ultimately become the centre of the story. The earlier connection with Sankarshan's Aligarh episode has already been discussed: a bundle of bidi and a pressure cooker become criminal objects in the state's gaze. The soundscape—the court's noise, the clink of handcuffs, the interpreter's halting speech and, at the end, the city's mixed distant sounds of the azan and bells—makes the separation of language from power audible. Overall, Machand is a drama of the philosophy of justice in the form of a political thriller on the Maithili stage.

9. Ulkamukh: The Great Struggle Between Memory and Forgetting —the Summit of the Dramatic Cycle

Ulkamukh is the banyan tree of these nine plays. It was staged at the Videha Theatre Festival in 2012 under Bechan Thakur's direction; the text also declares that its stage conception accords with Bharata's Natyashastra. This is more than rhetoric. The directions put the classical divisions of the stage—rangapitha, rangashirsha and mattavarani—to practical use. Characters enter the rangapitha through the mattavarani, while light is focused upon the rangashirsha: a practice rare even on the modern Indian stage. The play is structured in kallolas, as in Sankarshan, although these are waves of memory rather than pride. The transformation of the central stage-symbol maps the play's journey of meaning. In the first four kallolas a solid cube inscribed with the pattern of a chessboard stands onstage to symbolise ghosts and imagination. From the fifth kallola it is replaced by a sphere, the symbol of reality. The text explains: “The corners of the cube have disappeared; now there is a circle that turns memory back before us.” From sign to reality, imagination to truth: this geometric metaphor, the movement from angles to a circle, gathers the play's whole philosophy into a single object.

The first half is historical in subject. Gangesha Upadhyaya, author of the Tattvachintamani, defended Nyaya against Shriharsha's attacks and established Navya-Nyaya. The Dushana Panji records that Gangesha was born five years after his father's death and preserves information about his marriage to a woman of the leatherworking caste. The play turns these archival threads into dramatic material, together with the poetic praise composed by his son Vardhamana, beginning sukavikairavakananendu. Giving Gangesha's beloved and wife the name Vallabha, it creates the love story of which the scholastic tradition is silent. From this silence arises the play's central question. Commentary after commentary and gloss after gloss continued to be written on the Tattvachintamani, but Gangesha's poetry became an ulkamukh—it was lost, reduced to the trace of a name. Acharya Vyaghra and Acharya Singh, whom Gangesha mentions in his book without their actual names, come onstage as ghosts and explain their own condition: "When names are hidden, people slowly become symbols; from symbols, stories; and from stories, faults." Jan Assmann's theory of cultural memory appears to be enacted directly. Institutional, written and archival memory—the chaupari school and the commentary tradition —contends with living, oral memory transmitted in song. Vallabha's declaration gives the conflict its enduring formulation: "If my name is cut from the book, my breath will survive in the song. And a love able to wait seven hundred years cannot be stopped by a bamboo grove."

The machinery of forgetting appears in the episode of Acharya Sarabha and his disciples—Khikhir, Shahi, Narhiya and Bijji. There is rote learning without understanding, intended to make everybody forget Gangesha and Vallabha. A disciple who asks questions is killed: "Now rote instruction will survive and questions will die." The weapon of resistance is a sign, a hint. Acharya Singh's maxim—"An incomplete text cannot become the poet's memory; it becomes forgetting, and only a complete text can be memory"—is the play's epistemological jewel. Something that survives only partially, in an image or a song, stays embedded in the mind like a thorn and sooner or later demands completion. Ulkamukh is that sign. The metatheatrical quality of this first half is startling. The characters know they are imagined beings: "Am I entirely imaginary, disciple Khikhir?" "Acharya, you are imagined, and all of us are about to become imaginary." They recall Pirandello's Six Characters in Search of an Author, except that these characters search not for an author but for remembrance. Alongside them the whole storehouse of folk ballads comes onto the stage: the tale of Dina-Bhadri, which Vallabha and Gangesha take turns singing and enacting; Goril and Balgoraiya; Salhes and Photaragidar; Bishahari; and songs of Gosaini. The song-centred theatrical memory of the Maithili kirtaniya tradition becomes the very body of the play. The recurring word narashamsi, an encomiastic ballad of people and deeds, signals that the playwright treats folk narrative not as decoration but as an alternative form of historical writing.

From the fifth kallola, the play leaps seven hundred years, and its characters are reborn. Gangesha becomes Gangadhar, Vallabha becomes Kumarsuta, Bhagata becomes Jata, and Acharya Sarabha becomes King Kirti Singh, whose very name evokes the memory of Mithila's Oiniwar rulers. Gangadhar's story gathers its energy from another historical source. He refuses the sacred thread, accepts the Dalit cowherd Hiru and the sage Jata as his teachers, establishes a school in the forest of Saptari, demonstrates the pairing method by adding the numbers from one to one hundred to obtain 5,050, marries Kumarsuta, and establishes an Anubhava Mandala where there are no distinctions of caste or of women and men. The play does not conceal the source of this other tradition. Jata's disciple says expressly that his teacher has returned from the south with news of Basaveshwara and insists that such things will happen in Mithila too. The history of the Kalyana-sharana movement, the Anubhava Mantapa, and royal punishment for inter-caste marriage is transplanted into Maithili geography. For the marriage against caste convention between Medha, daughter of a Brahmin commander, and Jive, son of a leatherworker, the king orders their eyes gouged out and their bodies crushed beneath an elephant. His words—"The throne cannot tolerate the eyes of those who have seen love beyond caste"—turn the prohibition of the first half—"If love climbs the wall of caste, all the guards on the wall catch fire"—into royal violence. Then come Madhava's covert campaign of revenge, the harsh folk-theatrical scene of Rudramati's rice, the assassination of the king and Madhava's suicide. Finally the dying Gangadhar examines his own conscience, raising the play entirely above propaganda theatre: "My only fear is that this fire of revenge may turn the Anubhava Mandala itself into another ulkamukhi caste … The door I have opened must not be shut again after I am gone." The danger that a movement may harden into a new caste through its own oppositional identity is a mark of self-awareness. Here Brecht's historical method acquires its purpose: a fourteenth-century narrative questions every movement of the present.

In terms of rasa, Ulkamukh fuses adbhuta, wonder—the haunted bamboo grove, airborne characters, amulets—with karuna, compassion, for Medha and Jive and Gangadhar's death, and shanta, tranquillity. Its acoustic ending is a rare achievement in sound-centred drama: the rattle of the cube and the rumble of the sphere sound together, followed by a line of folk song returning from afar, as though oblivion were losing once again. Intertextually this play is the meeting point of all eight others. Dadhichi's prohibition against sharing knowledge returns as the chaupari's ban on copying texts. Apala's inclusion by name finds its exact opposite in Vallabha's erasure. The uncomprehending imitation of Kamalak Bhagata hardens into an institution of rote learning. The children's plays' culture of questioning—"Questioning is the first step of knowledge"—comes to fruition in the Anubhava Mandala. The contest between written history and the sound of the drum in Ganga Bridge becomes the contest between book and song; and the unheard language of Machand becomes Hiru's singing, seeking a path to the ears of power. If one sentence from the nine plays were chosen as the motto of the whole cycle, it would be Vallabha's: "Cut the name, cut the song, cut the body—but where will you cut the sound of love?"

Conclusion: Nine Plays, One Dramatic Philosophy

After these nine reviews, the network of connections that makes this group of works a book can be drawn together. The first is the sutradhar tradition. The sutradhar appears in six plays—Kamalak Bhagata, Danavir Dadhichi, Bha Jayab Chhu, Apala Atreyi, Sankarshan and Ulkamukh—sometimes calling out to the audience, sometimes interpreting events, sometimes asking spectators questions. Originating in Bharata's prescriptions for the purvaranga, this figure now bridges the modern narrator and the Brechtian commentator. Where the sutradhar does not appear—in Jalodip, Ganga Bridge and Machand—an acoustic device assumes the function: drumbeat, the rumble of a helicopter, the interpreter's voice. The second link is the signature sound already mentioned several times: "That is the real point." It is whispered at the end of Danavir Dadhichi and returns as a collective melody at the end of Jalodip. This seal of truth is the playwright's stylistic mark, like a painter's initials in the corner of a picture.

The third connection is a sound produced by the body. In Bha Jayab Chhu, coughing after the death of a tree turns into rhythm. In Ulkamukh, the coughs of Bhagata and the sage Jata ring like bells at transitions between scenes, and the play breathes its last with Gangadhar's final cough. Coughing—an involuntary bodily sound that is neither speech nor song—is the most candid index of crisis in this dramatic world: crisis in the environment, in the body and in memory. The fourth connection is water. From the flow of the Kamala in Kamalak Bhagata to the Ganga in Ganga Bridge, from the devastating flood in Jalodip to the Sharyana reservoir in Danavir Dadhichi, water is at times a witness, at times a judge—"Water itself is the evidence"—and at times the deceptive guise of a demand for sacrifice: "This Ganga … she wants blood," when the appetite actually belongs to power. The fifth link is knowledge, made apparent step by step in the reviews: imitation without understanding (Kamalak Bhagata) → restricting knowledge (Danavir Dadhichi) → the right to question (Apala Atreyi) → joining imagination with practice (Bha Jayab Chhu) → the child's expertise (Jalodip) → self-deception (Sankarshan) → history's bandaging of wounds (Ganga Bridge) → justice for those without an understood language (Machand) → rote learning against understanding and the defence of memory (Ulkamukh). This is not a random table of contents but an ordered epistemology, from questioning to remembrance.

The cycle's own answer to the theoretical difference between children's and adult theatre is now clear. All five children's plays, in keeping with the Slade–Heathcote–Boal tradition, make children agents of action, and each ends in hope or a pledge. The four adult plays, in the Brecht–Piscator–Sircar tradition, disrupt the spectator's comfort, and three end without resolution. Sankarshan is the sole exception, arriving at self-knowledge —but even that is a moment not for laughter but for understanding. The two strands, nevertheless, flow in the same river. If the children's maxim —"Ask, understand, and only then act"—is honoured, the tragedies of the adult plays, the engineer beneath a roller, Mutalif in jail, Medha and Jive beneath an elephant's feet, might be averted. The adult plays depict the future awaiting children who do not learn to question. In this sense the nine plays form a complete theatrical curriculum, from the sands of the Kamala ghat to the amulet of Ulkamukh, suitable for performance in schools, on village stages and in city auditoriums, either in sequence or separately.

A final proposal: if someone has the opportunity to read or stage only two of these nine plays, let the choice be Kamalak Bhagata and Ulkamukh, the shortest and the longest works in the cycle. The first teaches how an action performed without understanding becomes a rule; the second shows how knowledge memorised without understanding becomes forgetting. The seven intervening plays trace the journey of human beings, society and memory between these two poles. The words the playwright has given his sutradhar deserve to be the final line of this book: "A story may change, but the search for truth must not cease."

60. Munni Kamat's The Price of Life and Chukka

Abstract

In the series featuring invited works by authors and reviews by invited critics, Munni Kamat's one-act play The Price of Life and Gajendra Thakur's commentary on it appeared electronically in Videha and were collected in Videha: Sadeha, no. 13 (pp. 412–20), available through a link in the Videha archive. "You're awake; speak. You seem very troubled." Ram Ratan: "Father, I'm thinking of going away to earn a living."

Keywords: Munni Kamat; one-act play; The Price of Life; critical commentary; Phoolchan.

The series of invited literary works and critical responses: Munni Kamat's one-act play The Price of Life and Gajendra Thakur's commentary on it.

The Price of Life was published electronically in Videha and subsequently collected in Videha: Sadeha, no. 13, pp. 412–20; it is available at the indicated link in the Videha archive.

First, let us reread the one-act play.

Munni Kamat

One-act play: The Price of Life

Scene One

RAM RATAN: Father, are you asleep?

BHIKKHAN: What is it, son? I'm awake. Speak; you seem very troubled.

RAM RATAN: Father, I'm thinking of going away to earn money. What do you think?

BHIKKHAN: No, son. All these years I've never allowed you to go anywhere, and I won't let you go now. Whom have I besides you? Your mother put you in my lap and left this world. Since that day you have been my everything. I cannot bear to be apart from you for even a moment.

RAM RATAN: Father, I've turned eighteen now. I can look after myself. Give me one chance to see the world outside. Let me go just once; afterward I'll live with you.

BHIKKHAN: No. Your marriage is to be held this coming Baisakh. Get married first; afterward you may go wherever you like.

RAM RATAN: Father, please agree now. It's only a matter of a few days. After that I'll do whatever you say.

BHIKKHAN: All right, I shall have to bow to your stubbornness. With whom will you go, and where?

RAM RATAN: Father, Phoolchan is going to Himachal tomorrow. I'll go there with him.

BHIKKHAN: Very well. If you're leaving tomorrow, I must arrange some money. Which train will you take?

RAM RATAN: We'll catch the eleven-o'clock night train from Nirmali. I'm going now to clean my clothes.

[CURTAIN.]

Scene Two

BHIKKHAN: Son, come here … Phoolchan has arrived.

RAM RATAN: Coming, Father. I'm getting dressed.

BHIKKHAN: Son, Phoolchan, you live there. You must know all about the place.

PHOOLCHAN: Yes, Uncle. Don't worry. Ram Ratan will stay with me. He won't lack anything there.

BHIKKHAN: You work in a pharmaceutical company, don't you? What sort of work do you do?

PHOOLCHAN: Yes, Uncle, it's a pharmaceutical company. There are many kinds of jobs there. I do whatever work comes my way.

BHIKKHAN: All right then; that's fine.

RAM RATAN: Come along, Phoolchan!

BHIKKHAN: Son, have you packed everything properly? Keep calling me every day. You're going away from home, so be careful about traffic and vehicles.

RAM RATAN: All right, Father. Don't worry at all. I'll look after myself, eat on time, and not work too hard. I'll come back soon after seeing a little of the world.

[Everyone leaves.]

[CURTAIN.]

Scene Three

[After arriving in Himachal.]

RAM RATAN: Phoolchan, it's been six days since we left the village. You go off to work while time weighs on me like a mountain. Please find some work for me too.

PHOOLCHAN: All right. Tomorrow I'll speak to my employer about you.

[The following day.]

PHOOLCHAN: Ram Ratan, come with me from tomorrow. I've arranged a job for you at eight thousand rupees a month. That's acceptable, isn't it? If you work conscientiously, your pay will increase.

RAM RATAN: This is wonderful news for me. I'm going to tell Father at once.

[CURTAIN.]

Scene Four

[Ram Ratan and Phoolchan sit eating and talking in the company canteen.]

RAM RATAN: Phoolchan, what work do they actually do here? They didn't give me any work today. A man wearing a doctor's coat came, made me swallow a tablet, and went away. I can't understand what medicine he gave me. Four or five others were there, and he gave them all the same medicine.

PHOOLCHAN: They make medicines for different illnesses here. The company employs some people to test them, and you're one of them.

RAM RATAN: Won't those medicines do any harm?

PHOOLCHAN: No! Even if they do, is there any shortage of doctors or medicines here? Whatever the treatment costs, the company pays for it. I did exactly this work for so many years; nothing happened to me.

A MAN: Phoolchan, send Ram Ratan over. The doctor is calling him.

PHOOLCHAN: Yes. [To Ram Ratan.] Go and see what he wants.

[Ram Ratan enters the doctor's consulting room.]

RAM RATAN: Sir, you called for me?

DOCTOR: Take this medicine and lie down here. I have to give you some injections.

[Ram Ratan swallows the medicine and lies down on the table to receive the injections.]

[Two hours later.]

DOCTOR: Ram Ratan! Ram Ratan! Wake up!

[The doctor shakes him and then begins to check his pulse.]

DOCTOR: What's this? He's dead! Is anybody there? Call Dr Khurana!

DR KHURANA: What happened?

DOCTOR: Sir, look at him. What has happened? There's no pulse.

DR KHURANA: Oh no! He's dead. Which medicines did you give him?

DOCTOR: Sir, these three.

DR KHURANA: Are you out of your mind? So many medicines at once, and on the very first occasion! First you gave him a sleeping pill, then two injections of such powerful drugs?

DOCTOR: Sir, what will happen now?

DR KHURANA: This is an everyday occurrence here. Give his family compensation and silence them. And remember, we must move the body outside only after everyone has gone. Until then, news of his death must not leave these compound walls. Understood?

[9 p.m.]

PHOOLCHAN: Sir, where is Ram Ratan? Hasn't he finished work?

DOCTOR: I'm sorry, Phoolchan. Ram Ratan is no longer in this world. I regret it. The company will give his family one lakh rupees as compensation. I couldn't save him.

[Phoolchan thinks to himself.]

How shall I answer Uncle now? How can I tell him that the one support of his life has been snatched away? How will he live? O God, how could this have happened?

[CURTAIN.]

Final Scene

PHOOLCHAN: Hello ... Uncle, catch a train right away, just as you are. Ram Ratan is seriously ill.

BHIKKHAN: Son, let me speak to Ram Ratan just once. What has happened to my boy? I've never even seen Himachal. How can I get there?

PHOOLCHAN: Uncle, my younger brother will bring you. He's coming to your house right now. Just come quickly.

BHIKKHAN: I'm coming, son. Please look after my boy.

PHOOLCHAN: All right, I'll hang up now.

[As he speaks, Phoolchan begins to weep.]

[The following day, after Bhikkhan arrives in Himachal.]

BHIKKHAN: Son … son! Where is Ram Ratan?

PHOOLCHAN: Uncle, eat something first. Ram Ratan is all right.

BHIKKHAN: I won't put anything in my mouth until I have seen my son.

[Phoolchan clings to Bhikkhan's neck, weeps, and tells him everything.]

BHIKKHAN: Phoolchan, you sold my son's life for eight thousand rupees. You knew everything, and still pushed my boy into the jaws of death. You took everything from me; you have left me lifeless. Your company offers me alms of one lakh rupees for my son's death. Throw that money in its face. I want no alms! Today my son has died; tomorrow another man's son will die. Why is this deadly game being played? Medicines that ought to be tested on animals are being tested on innocent, impoverished human beings. Is there no law to stop this?

[The curtain falls amid a torrent of weeping.]

Critical Examination of the One-Act Play

Let me state first that the Government of India has now prohibited the use of human beings as test subjects for examining the effects and adverse effects of medicines before they reach the market. Many people, including Munni Kamat, deserve thanks for this. In much the same way, many people like Mohan Gabaiyya, the protagonist of my novel Sahasrashirsha, helped secure the right to information, though certain people are now desperate to take the credit for it alone. The situations are somewhat alike.

The one-act play has a single act and five scenes. Its protagonist, Ram Ratan, leaves for Himachal as soon as he turns eighteen. There are many pharmaceutical companies in Himachal Pradesh and Uttarakhand, established there to take advantage of tax concessions offered by the Government of India. Ram Ratan is unwilling to marry. The job he obtains at eight thousand rupees is, in fact, to serve as a human subject in tests intended to determine a drug's effects and side effects before it is marketed. He has doubts, but Phoolchan says that he himself used to do the same work. Ram Ratan dies; Dr Khurana's dialogue makes it clear that many such deaths have occurred before, and that the case can be closed by paying one lakh rupees in compensation. Bhikkhan does not want the money. He asks: "Medicines that ought to be tested on animals are being tested on innocent, impoverished human beings. Is there no law to stop this?"

My answer to Bhikkhan, then, is that the Government of India has enacted a law. Your refusal to accept that lakh of rupees forced the government's hand. Now animals, and not human beings, will be the experimental subjects, and the demand that even such testing be carried out safely has also been met. In the course of my official duties I myself detected a case of this kind in which well-known hospitals were also involved. But why am I telling Bhikkhan this? He is only a character in Munni Kamat's one-act play, an imaginary figure. No: Bhikkhan is a name, but I have seen many Bhikkhans and many Ram Ratans as well. Mainstream dramatists, by contrast, have neither experienced "bisandh" nor encountered a Ram Ratan. Malangia-ji therefore brought his talent to an end with Bujhta Hai Ki Nahin. Had he paid attention to my criticism of Chhutaha Ghail, he had enough talent to have encountered a Bhikkhan himself in the intervening ten years. Even after ten years Malangia-ji has not understood the difference between satire and a casteist attack. The incidents involving Malangia-ji's family and members of the casteist theatrical establishment after my review have already been documented in Videha.

Critical Examination of the One-Act Play: The Sociological Dimension

Bhikkhan belongs to the plain-dhoti tradition: he could be from a socially forward caste or a backward one. Unlike Malangia-ji, Munni Kamat has not felt any need to label him by an insulting caste designation or as backward. Why? Because she has talent. She does not conceal her own shortcomings by announcing that nobody watches or reads art-based one-act plays. She knows that even an artistic one-act play will become popular if it has a plot. She has therefore brought such a plot to the stage.

Let us now turn to the sociolinguistic analysis of this play and compare its language with the artificial language created by Malangia-ji for characters whom he regards as lesser people. Munni Kamat allows no smoke-stained, ostentatiously dhoti-clad figure to enter her play. She understands that this is a tragedy and that such a figure would bring both linguistic monotony and the ruin of the one-act play. She is careful. Malangia-ji, however, remains intoxicated by his own assumptions. The world has moved on, yet he and the directors of his casteist theatre believe a two-tiered language to be necessary—not in response to the demands of drama, as Bengali and other writers do, but to ridicule and insult. How else would their casteist audience applaud? Malangia-ji and that theatre should still take criticism constructively, read Munni Kamat's work repeatedly, identify the sociolinguistic form represented in it, emulate it, and improve their practice accordingly. Videha would welcome such improvement.

Linguistic Analysis of the One-Act Play

Bhikkhan says: "No. Your marriage is to be held this coming Baisakh. Get married first; afterward you may go wherever you like."

"This coming Baisakh": did you have the slightest difficulty with that expression? You did not. But if we look at the latest anthology from the casteist theatre—Adhunik Maithili Natya Sanchayan, collected and edited by Ramanand Jha 'Raman', available at the indicated link for INR 465—the same utterance would become something like this:

[Enter a smoke-stained, dhoti-clad figure.] "Well, Bhukkhan, is your son going to Himachal to earn money? Hey, Ram Ratan, don't you marry some memsahib over there!"

> BHIKKHAN: "No, Ram Ratan's marriage is to be held this coming Baisakh."

Now the very utterance that flows naturally from Munni Kamat's pen seems artificially assigned to a character constructed as a lesser person. The dramatist's deliberateness becomes visible, and Maithili is insulted. A writer such as Munni Kamat would not let this happen. Yet before the casteist theatre fades away, it has appeared in all its malice as Adhunik Maithili Natya Sanchayan, supported by assignments worth lakhs from the Sahitya Akademi. In this INR 465 book there is not material worth even forty paise, and it will make young people still more sectarian, without their even realising what sociolinguistic manipulation has been used. One consolation is that Chandranath Mishra 'Amar' wrote that Maithili books published by the Sahitya Akademi rot in warehouses. As the Buddha is said to have blessed the people of an evil village to remain in one place and the people of a good village to spread, so I wish this casteist dramatic anthology to remain in the warehouse and spread no further.

Weaknesses of the One-Act Play

A play has a plot just as a novel does. A one-act play is, after all, a seed-story, like a vignette in the Hawa Mahal programme on Vividh Bharati. I therefore hope that Munni Kamat or other writers of the parallel tradition will write a play of at least four acts on this subject or on another like it. Munni Kamat possesses such fine subject matter and such an understanding of the sociological dimensions of language that this is certainly within her powers.

Chukka

1

Munni Kamat's One-Act Play: The Price of Life

Scene One

RAM RATAN: Father, are you asleep?

[CURTAIN.]

Scene Two

BHIKKHAN: Son, come here ... Phoolchan has arrived.

RAM RATAN: Coming, Father. I'm getting dressed.

BHIKKHAN: All right then; that's fine.

RAM RATAN: Come along, Phoolchan!

[Everyone leaves.]

[CURTAIN.]

Scene Three

[After arriving in Himachal.]

[The following day.]

[CURTAIN.]

Scene Four

RAM RATAN: Won't those medicines do any harm?

PHOOLCHAN: Yes. [To Ram Ratan.] Go and see what he wants.

[Ram Ratan enters the doctor's consulting room.]

RAM RATAN: Sir, you called for me?

[Ram Ratan swallows the medicine and lies down on the table to receive the injections.]

[Two hours later.]

DOCTOR: Ram Ratan! Ram Ratan! Wake up!

DR KHURANA: What happened?

DOCTOR: Sir, these three.

DOCTOR: Sir, what will happen now?

[9 p.m.]

PHOOLCHAN: Sir, where is Ram Ratan? Hasn't he finished work?

[Phoolchan thinks to himself.]

[CURTAIN.]

Final Scene

PHOOLCHAN: All right, I'll hang up now.

[As he speaks, Phoolchan begins to weep.]

[The following day, after Bhikkhan arrives in Himachal.]

BHIKKHAN: Son ... son! Where is Ram Ratan?

[The curtain falls amid a torrent of weeping.]

Critical Examination of the One-Act Play

Let me state first that the Government of India has now prohibited the use of human beings as test subjects for examining the effects and adverse effects of medicines before they reach the market. Many people, including Munni Kamat, deserve thanks for this. In much the same way, many people like Mohan Gabaiyya, the protagonist of my novel Sahasrashirsha, helped secure the right to information, though certain people are now desperate to take the credit for it alone. The situations are somewhat alike.

The one-act play has a single act and five scenes. Its protagonist, Ram Ratan, leaves for Himachal as soon as he turns eighteen. There are many pharmaceutical companies in Himachal Pradesh and Uttarakhand, established there to take advantage of tax concessions offered by the Government of India. Ram Ratan is unwilling to marry. The job he obtains at eight thousand rupees is, in fact, to serve as a human subject in tests intended to determine a drug's effects and side effects before it is marketed. He has doubts, but Phoolchan says that he himself used to do the same work. Ram Ratan dies; Dr Khurana's dialogue makes it clear that many such deaths have occurred before, and that the case can be closed by paying one lakh rupees in compensation. Bhikkhan does not want the money. He asks: "Medicines that ought to be tested on animals are being tested on innocent, impoverished human beings. Is there no law to stop this?"

My answer to Bhikkhan, then, is that the Government of India has enacted a law. Your refusal to accept that lakh of rupees forced the government's hand. Now animals, and not human beings, will be the experimental subjects, and the demand that even such testing be carried out safely has also been met. In the course of my official duties I myself detected a case of this kind in which well-known hospitals were also involved. But why am I telling Bhikkhan this? He is only a character in Munni Kamat's one-act play, an imaginary figure. No: Bhikkhan is a name, but I have seen many Bhikkhans and many Ram Ratans as well. Mainstream dramatists, by contrast, have neither experienced "bisandh" nor encountered a Ram Ratan. Malangia-ji therefore brought his talent to an end with Bujhta Hai Ki Nahin. Had he paid attention to my criticism of Chhutaha Ghail, he had enough talent to have encountered a Bhikkhan himself in the intervening ten years. Yet his casteist theatrical director still pours venom against Jagdish Prasad Mandal in Maithil Punarjagaran Prakash. That publication ought to dissociate itself from such casteist elements. If it is under pressure to print such writing, it should at least carry a disclaimer: "The author's casteist views are his personal opinions and do not represent those of the editorial board or proprietor." If all concerned are acting together, then I can only offer the same blessing the Buddha is said to have given: may they stay in one place and not spread further. [Further details follow.]

Even after ten years, like Malangia-ji, he has not understood the difference between satire and casteist abuse. The incidents involving Malangia-ji's family and the people of the casteist theatre after my criticism have already been recorded.

Critical Examination of the One-Act Play: The Sociological Dimension

Bhikkhan belongs to the plain-dhoti tradition: he could be from a socially forward caste or a backward one. Unlike Malangia-ji, Munni Kamat has not felt any need to label him by an insulting caste designation or as backward. Why? Because she has talent. She does not conceal her own shortcomings by announcing that nobody watches or reads art-based one-act plays. She knows that even an artistic one-act play will become popular if it has a plot. She has therefore brought such a plot to the stage.

Let us now turn to the sociolinguistic analysis of this play and compare its language with the artificial language created by Malangia-ji for characters whom he regards as lesser people. Munni Kamat allows no smoke-stained, ostentatiously dhoti-clad figure to enter her play. She understands that this is a tragedy and that such a figure would bring both linguistic monotony and the ruin of the one-act play. She is careful. Malangia-ji, however, remains intoxicated by his own assumptions. The world has moved on, yet he and the directors of his casteist theatre believe a two-tiered language to be necessary—not in response to the demands of drama, as Bengali and other writers do, but to ridicule and insult. How else would their casteist audience applaud?

Linguistic Analysis of the One-Act Play

Bhikkhan says: "No. Your marriage is to be held this coming Baisakh. Get married first; afterward you may go wherever you like."

"This coming Baisakh": did you have the slightest difficulty with that expression? You did not. But if we look at the latest anthology from the casteist theatre—Adhunik Maithili Natya Sanchayan, collected and edited by Ramanand Jha 'Raman', available at the indicated link for INR 465—the same utterance would become something like this:

> BHIKKHAN: "No, Ram Ratan's marriage is to be held this coming Baisakh."

Now the very utterance that flows naturally from Munni Kamat's pen seems artificially assigned to a character constructed as a lesser person. The dramatist's deliberateness becomes visible, and Maithili is insulted. A writer such as Munni Kamat would not let this happen. Yet before the casteist theatre fades away, it has appeared in all its malice as Adhunik Maithili Natya Sanchayan, supported by assignments worth lakhs from the Sahitya Akademi. In this INR 465 book there is not material worth even forty paise, and it will make young people still more sectarian, without their even realising what sociolinguistic manipulation has been used. One consolation is that Chandranath Mishra 'Amar' wrote that Maithili books published by the Sahitya Akademi rot in warehouses. As the Buddha is said to have blessed the people of an evil village to remain in one place and the people of a good village to spread, so I wish this casteist dramatic anthology to remain in the warehouse and spread no further.

Weaknesses of the One-Act Play

A play has a plot just as a novel does. A one-act play is, after all, a seed-story, like a vignette in the Hawa Mahal programme on Vividh Bharati. I therefore hope that Munni Kamat or other writers of the parallel tradition will write a play of at least four acts on this subject or on another like it. Munni Kamat possesses such fine subject matter and such an understanding of the sociological dimensions of language that this is certainly within her powers.

2

Munni Kamat's Chukka

Munni Kamat, the author of the one-act play The Price of Life (2012), has now brought out Chukka for children.

At the age of eighteen, Ram Ratan in The Price of Life becomes a living laboratory test subject, employed to determine the effects and side effects of medicines on humans before those medicines are marketed. This is his job, and in the course of it he dies. But what were Ram Ratan's infancy, childhood and adolescence like? Through Chukka, I shall examine that question from sociological and psychological perspectives and analyse the language by means of Jacques Derrida's deconstructive method. [For the theoretical analysis, see my Maithili Samikshashastra, 2022, available in the Videha archive at www.videha.co.in.]

Chukka contains twenty-four stories.

1

An Image of Faith

The mother of Kanhaiya, the son of the potter Ratnesh, has died. You will have heard many stories in which a dead mother becomes a star. Here, however, Bedara's grandfather says that God has a little child even younger than you, but that there was no mother there; so God summoned your mother to look after that child.

Does this device not astonish you?

Now let us approach the potter's wheel of clay, which shapes beautiful images of God. The child remains lying awake like a "nibadiya" after everyone else has fallen asleep; strengthening his faith, he receives an answer from God and conveys it to his grandfather. Grandfather confirms his account by citing the clay figures that break in the kiln. The child's mind is now at rest; he no longer needs a story about stars.

2

Chiniya-Siniya

In the story told by Akash's father, a bird dies of thirst. Akash decides to take water in a pot and place it with crumbs on the roof of the house.

A tragic ending to a children's story—or a happy ending born out of tragedy?

3

Golu the Elephant

When Golu the elephant grows up, his body becomes heavy. He can neither fly like a bird, swim like a crocodile, nor leap like a monkey.

Yet he accomplishes something that neither the monkey, the bird nor the crocodile could do. He becomes a hero and receives a load of bananas and a garland of flowers.

God has created all living beings differently; each has its own distinctive gift.

4

Nutritious Vegetables

Naman and his father whisper and put their heads together. Naman dislikes vegetables and secretly feeds all of his portion to his pet Tunna.

In the middle of the night he has a dream. Thereafter he begins to like vegetables and other dishes.

5

Practice

Naman wants to score higher marks than Gangesh. He learns the art of reading slowly and repeatedly until he understands—an art that India's former president and "Missile Man," Dr A. P. J. Abdul Kalam, learned from his mother. Naman comes first.

6

The Bookish Ghost

Aman and a shaggy, bushy ghost; the new-moon day; exorcists and healers.

But Aman begins to read aloud, and the letters no longer fly away.

7

The Firefly

Rama and Dulari hear their mother tell the story of Firefly Auntie: a small body does not mean a small spirit.

8

Balance

It is Golu the squirrel's birthday. Eating without chewing, continuing to eat, and jumping about while eating give him a stomach ache.

9

Selfless Love

This is a story about a cat and mice.

Here the tale is not about a cat catching mice, but about the end of the cat brought about with the help of the mice.

Every living being understands the language of affection and belonging.

10

The Magic Umbrella

Wealth, a body free from illness, boundless strength, or boundless knowledge? Wealth can be stolen; knowledge cannot.

11

Painting

It is not her elder brother's pencil but skill in Mishti's fingers that matters.

12

The Assembly at the Pond

A story based on environmental education.

A duck is needlessly placed in the dock for what human beings have done, but the heron reveals the truth …

13

Chukka

Banknotes enter Chukka's belly and go to sleep there …

Manavi will use the money saved in Chukka to have spectacles made for her father.

14

Mother Bharati

Radhiya went to school, not to study but to run errands and do chores. When there was no one to play Mother Bharati in the tableau, Radhiya, who stood holding a little child at her waist, was called upon.

15

Friendship with a Snake

Many facts occur in this story; a trader dealing in pythons appears. But the ending is delayed and somewhat slack. The story could have ended a little earlier, when the trader arrived. Fear of snakes and affection for wild creatures become confused with one another.

16

A Pair of Pigeons

The pair of pigeons think that there is plenty of food here and a guardian to protect them. Yet the very guardian who drove off the marauding cat takes all four of their chicks out of the nest for his evening meal.

17

Lord of the Clouds

This, too, is a story founded on environmental education.

Together with their grandfather, the children will dig ponds and wells and plant trees.

18

The Clever Mosquito

Who will become king of the mosquitoes?

The one who works hardest, or the one who shows the greatest self-restraint?

Read the story to find the answer.

19

The Engineer

Embankments cannot stop flooding. Give the river a course; build bridges at intervals.

20

The Customs of Mithila

Let the egret wander through the courtyard and house; do not betray its sense of security.

21

The Goat

A story based on the practice of animal sacrifice.

22

Rakhi

A story about the child Naman's understanding: if his elder sister protects him, then it is he who should tie a rakhi on her wrist, rather than she on his.

23

Shoes

Bittu wears shoes that light up. He even bows before the goddess Bhagavati without taking them off. But when he sees his father's old, torn shoes, he takes off his own and gives them to him.

24

The Village

When food, clothes and homes are available in the village, why do people abandon it for Delhi? Manavi's question sets everyone thinking.

An Image of Faith, Chiniya-Siniya, Painting, Chukka and Shoes are stories grounded in child psychology. If we examine An Image of Faith sociologically, the comparison with clay images in the kiln is especially apt for the child of a potter. In the psychologically informed Chiniya-Siniya, the story that Akash's father tells him is, for obvious reasons, not included in the Maithili syllabus. Nevertheless, one should accept education and knowledge wherever they can be found, even if they come in a form one might laugh at.

Stories based on birds and other wild creatures include Golu the Elephant, The Firefly (also concerned with child psychology), Selfless Love, The Customs of Mithila (living together), Friendship with a Snake (where wildlife affection and fear are mixed), A Pair of Pigeons (the malice lurking behind an unexpected offer of help), and The Clever Mosquito (qualities and signs of cleverness).

Let us now consider Friendship with a Snake, in which affection for wild creatures and fear of them are mixed. Nature maintains an equilibrium. If affection for wild creatures is right, does it follow that sacrificing them or fearing them is wrong? Jacques Derrida argues that Western civilisation (or, in this case, Eastern society and culture) teaches us to think in just such a manner. But a child may lose its life in the pursuit of affection for wild creatures.

Stories centred on education include Nutritious Vegetables, Balance (health), Practice, The Bookish Ghost (how to comprehend and retain what one reads), and The Magic Umbrella (human virtues).

Stories devoted to environmental conservation are The Assembly at the Pond, Lord of the Clouds and The Engineer.

Consider The Engineer. The embankment, once regarded as an emblem of development—while those who opposed it were labelled opponents of development—is now to be breached by a child to make way for the river, with bridges built at intervals. What was held right or wrong fifty years ago has now exchanged places. The Assembly at the Pond and Lord of the Clouds are both remarkable stories.

Mother Bharati concerns child labour, and The Village concerns migration.

In Mother Bharati, a story about child labour, some children attend the same school to study while one child goes there to run errands and perform chores. Yet, following a court order, children of the women who sweep the school and of the gardeners who work there are also now studying in schools built on cheap land acquired with government benefits.

Children's stories, then, will not remain mere fairy tales. This collection announces the end of the children's-literature tradition which, under the Sahitya Akademi, began as a kind of khula khel farrukhabadi—a free-for-all.

61. Kusma-Salhes and Six Other Plays: An Introduction to the Collection, Its Architecture and a Survey

Abstract

In the long history of Maithili theatre, Kunal—the playwright, director and poet whose original name is Shiv Narayan Jha (born in 1951 at Palimohan, Madhubani)—marks the beginning of a new era and a point of departure. When the world of Maithili drama was passing through a time of transition and crisis, his entry into theatre came as a means of rescue.

Keywords: Kunal; Kusma-Salhes; dramatic anthology; folk theatre; the quartet of love; Maithili theatre.

Playwright Kunal: His Contribution to Theatre

In the long history of Maithili theatre, Kunal—the playwright, director and poet whose original name is Shiv Narayan Jha (born in 1951 at Palimohan, Madhubani)—marks the beginning of a new era and a point of departure. When the world of Maithili drama was passing through a time of transition and crisis, his entry into theatre came as a means of rescue. Across his four-and-a-half decades of work on stage and three decades of uninterrupted playwriting, he has not merely secured for Maithili drama its theatrical standing: he has given new life to and revived Mithila's disappearing folk-theatrical forms, including the kirtaniya, Bidapat, Pamariya and Bhatua traditions.

The anthology Kusma-Salhes and Six Other Plays, published by Antika Prakashan in 2021, is a document of enduring importance for the Maithili dramatic tradition. Its seven plays demonstrate Kunal's experimental theatrical vision, his socially engaged thought and his classical integration of folk craftsmanship. The anthology's most notable quality is that it restructures narratives embedded in popular consciousness and mythological stories through fresh interpretation in contemporary contexts.

1. Introduction: The Collection and Its Publication History

Kunal's Kusma-Salhes and Six Other Plays is a collection of contemporary Maithili drama that is stage-centred in both substance and form. These are not merely "closet dramas" written to be read; they are works repeatedly staged, tested and refined through theatrical experiment. The publisher's information bears this out: all seven plays were first performed at Vidyapati Bhavan in Patna and subsequently published in magazines such as Bhangima and Antika. That is why it is insufficient to analyse only their written texts: theatricality, or performability, must also occupy the centre of their criticism.

The dedication page is itself a theatrical manifesto: "To the known and unknown people and artists who perform plays ('nach') from village to village, and to J. Brahmanand, the Vishvakarma of Bhangima." This dedication contains the seed of Kunal's entire vision of drama. On the one hand, he salutes the unnamed village performers of nach—the tradition that has lived for centuries in the soil of Mithila but whose names are absent from institutional literary histories. On the other, he expresses gratitude to his theatrical ensemble Bhangima, many of whose members, such as J. Brahmanand, were involved in the original productions of these plays. The cover illustration is by Vinay Ambar, and distinctly echoes the Mithila tradition of folk painting.

2. The Collection's Architecture: A Design of Two Circles

Viewed together, the seven plays fall into two distinct circles. Although the author does not explicitly declare this division, it becomes evident from their forms, sources and chronology.

(a) The folk-theatrical trilogy: Chalis Chor a Gonu Jha, Bidapat and the title play Kusma-Salhes. These three expansive, multi-character plays, rich in song and dance, are based on Mithila's own oral narratives and folk theatre—the nach, Salhes nach and Bidapat nach. Their dates of composition extend from 1990 to 2006.

(b) The quartet of love: Prem-Pratijna urf Shruvavatik Jai! [The Vow of Love, or Shruvavati's Victory!], Vishwask Shakti urf Sukanyak Vivah [The Power of Faith, or Sukanya's Marriage], Premak Vistar urf Shwetak Avishkar [The Expansion of Love, or Shweta's Discovery] and Premak Pariksha urf Suprabha a Ashtavakra [The Trial of Love, or Suprabha and Ashtavakra]. These four comparatively short playlets, economical in their use of characters, derive from mythology or traditional narrative and appeared in Antika in 2013–14. Their titles are cast in a single mould: an abstract value—love or trust. Each revolves around a woman who makes her own decisions.

A thread binding the two circles is the establishment of love as a life principle. The refrain of the concluding song in Kusma-Salhes—"A flower without nectar is just so; what is life without love?"—echoes almost word for word in Shwetak Avishkar. In other words, a single intellectual thread remains taut from the folk-theatrical trilogy to the quartet of love.

3. A General Survey of the Plays

3.1 Chalis Chor a Gonu Jha urf Gyan Jhak Khissa [Forty Thieves and the Tale of Gonu Jha, or Gyan Jha]

The opening play of the collection is also its most experimental. Its very beginning is an outstanding instance of self-referential theatre. Three bhats, or hereditary bards, enter the stage and lament their dying art: "Our knowledge is of no use any more." When their conventional kavitts and songs of praise fail to affect the listeners, they decide to put on a "play" instead. In that single scene Kunal makes three historical realities dramatic at once: the decline of Mithila's bardic tradition, the crisis of arts dependent on princely patronage, and the migration of folk performers towards theatre.

Within that outer frame unfolds the familiar cycle of Gonu Jha stories. The ruler has bestowed upon Gonu the title "Crest-Jewel of Rogues"; the humiliated court poets appeal to him for justice; and eventually a band of forty thieves attempts to plunder his house. Gonu defeats them not by physical force but by intelligence. He inflames rivalries among the thieves by dangling the symbolic prize of the leader's muretha, or headcloth, before them and deceives them through a farcical, mock ceremony of investiture. Here hasya rasa, the comic sentiment, is blended in a rare way with vira rasa, heroism, in which valour becomes the quality of reasoning rather than of weaponry.

The play's intellectual climax comes at the end, when the bhats step back outside their roles and argue among themselves about the conclusion: "But in this way, brother, hasn't the ending of the play changed?" In that one line Kunal exposes the fluidity of theatrical reality, the possibility of alternative endings and the transparency of composition before an audience. Then comes a sharp social observation: theft is called a malady "arising from illiteracy and poverty", whose remedy lies not in punishment but in a just social arrangement.

At the end the bhats spread out a gamchha, or cloth, to collect donations from the audience. This is more than a realistic depiction of folk artists collecting their wages; it is a moving acknowledgement of the relation between art and livelihood. The line of the concluding song—"There is no power greater than intelligence"—is the thesis of the entire play and vindicates the title's reference to the tale of "Gyan Jha".

Read from the perspective of Navya-Nyaya, the play's central value, intelligence, celebrates prama (valid cognition) and yukti (reasoning). Each of Gonu's victories comes not from physical power but from inference, conjecture and argument. Beneath a comic exterior lies a vernacular affirmation of epistemology.

3.2 Bidapat

Bidapat, the folk pronunciation of Vidyapati's name, is the most refined example of Kunal's skill as a dramatist. The title page calls it a "playlet based on folk-theatrical form"; in fact, its form synthesises the classical and the popular traditions of theatre. The drama begins with a purvaranga, adopts the classical dialogue between sutradhara and actress, and simultaneously brings onstage such folk-theatrical figures as the samaji chorus, the clown-like Vipta, and the natua dancer-performer.

The drama's most remarkable formal feature is its extensive, careful and meaningful use of Vidyapati's own padas. A hymn to Shiva, a salutation to Bhairavi, the portrayal of spring ("New Vrindavan, ever-new groves of trees … the young lover wanders"), poems of separation ("Take the moon's essence and shape a face; eyes startled like the chakora bird"), and a concluding verse in the Avahattha style: all are woven into the action so closely that the play becomes a theatrical commentary upon Vidyapati's lyric poetry.

The plot interlaces Vidyapati's life through three relationships: that with his patron and friend Shiv Singh, with Shiv Singh's queen Lakhima, and with his servant Ugna, who according to the famous legend was Lord Mahadeva himself. The final part is profoundly moving: Shiv Singh disappears during the battle of Oini; Lakhima refuses to regard her husband as dead and waits for him; Vidyapati mourns him throughout his life. Here Lakhima is not represented as an emblem of sati but as a determined, self-respecting woman who waits. It is a subtle rereading of the inherited narrative.

The play's dhvani—its suggested or resonant meaning in Indian poetics—reaches a culmination at the close. Vidyapati declares that he will live through his padas and that Shiv Singh, Lakhima, Vipta, Natua and Ugna will survive with him. Below the karuna rasa of sorrow runs a deep current of shanta rasa, tranquillity: poetry's immortality is established above the grief of death. In effect, Bidapat takes Vidyapati down from the institutional history of literature, where he stands as an image of the "great poet", and establishes him anew as a living protagonist of folk theatre. It offers an outstanding dramatic example of the parallel-history perspective associated with Videha.

3.3 Kusma-Salhes

Its position as the title play is more than coincidence. Artistically and intellectually it is the heart of the collection. The title page describes it as "a play based on the epic narrative of King Salhes and on the folk theatre of Salhes nach". King Salhes is a folk deity and hero of Mithila's Dusadh (Dalit) community, and Salhes nach is the folk-theatrical tradition associated with him. This choice of source is itself a cultural and political statement: rather than draw upon the elite-centred literary tradition of Mithila, Kunal bases his most ambitious drama on the epic narrative of a subaltern community.

The dramatis personae take on a fully epic scale: Salhes, king of Mahisoutha; the heroine Kusma, a gardener; Hiraman the parrot, who carries the story; Vipta, clown of the folk theatre; Salhes's animal companions, the tiger Thanka and the bear Banka; the yogini sisters who are gardeners; such realms as Morang, Bhot, Baghgarh and Samdagarh; and the goddess Durga herself. This breadth preserves the original folk structure of Salhes nach: purvaranga, sumiran or invocation, communal choral singing, and geographical journeys enacted scene by scene.

The opening sumiran is an extraordinary declaration of religious and cultural syncretism. Along with the gods, the village deity Baba Dihbar, gurus, the rising sun, the Ganga and Gora-Parvati, it invokes to the west "Mira-Sultan", a Muslim pir, and ends by remembering "the whole community" and the "people's hearts and minds". The greeting to the spectators is equally inclusive: "Pranam, namaste, adab, good evening, salaam." This syncretism belongs to the cultural character of the Dusadh Salhes tradition itself, and Kunal brings it to the stage with fidelity.

The heroine Kusma's account of herself—a princess who abandoned the palace to become a forest-dwelling gardener—is charged with folk-poetic intensity. Her memory of pilgrimages to Janakpur, Kamru-Kamakhya and Visunpur, and of Durga's message in a dream when she was twelve years old, supplies the emotional setting. But the play's central struggle is not simply about love: it is love in conflict with the lust for power.

That conflict reaches its peak when the expansionist emperor Suchong chains Salhes in the prison at Rangilagarh and dreams of sole dominion over all Mithila. Salhes's answer speaks the soul of the play: "My life may be in your fist, Emperor. But my thoughts and feelings cannot be chained. Salhes may not remain, but a people filled with the creed of a life without fear will remain." With this one speech Kunal transforms the Dusadh folk deity Salhes into a popular hero, a symbol of fearlessness and freedom, and the gardener sisters into embodiments of peace, compassion, affection, delight and public welfare.

The drama ends in collective song and dance, from which emerges the unforgettable refrain: "Love is truth, love is fragrance, the feeling of love is eternal; as a flower is without nectar, so what is life without love?"

Shringara rasa here rises above its mundane level and becomes a universal human principle. Love is no longer an individual attachment but a creative force of the world. This is the strongest play in the collection: fidelity to a folk source, political consciousness and poetic achievement meet in one work.

3.4 The Quartet of Love: Four Mythological Heroines

The final four dramas form a coherent sequence of ideas. All four share a theatrical grammar: economical casts, multiple-role acting (one performer playing several characters), layered or empty stages, narrative presentation by a sutradhara or announcer, and occasional quotations from Vidyapati's lyrics. Through mythological and narrative heroines, each establishes contemporary values: female agency, self-determination and the dignity of love.

Prem-Pratijna urf Shruvavatik Jai! [The Vow of Love, or Shruvavati's Victory!]. Shruvavati, daughter of the sage Bharadvaja, rejects the conventional criteria for marriage—a handsome, wealthy and valiant bridegroom—and declares that she will marry only when someone becomes genuinely arthavan, meaningful, to her. Calling herself an "independent and self-reliant" person, she wishes to be an "exception" to tradition. Indra, disguised as Vasishtha, tests her by requiring her to cook a fruit before sunset. The fruit becomes stone, but considering a life emptied of loving memory meaningless, Shruvavati resolves to enter the funeral pyre. Through this strength of will she makes Indra yield. The thesis is: "Inner strength is a human being's greatest possession." Although the convention of entering the fire creates some tension with a feminist reading, the focus here is resolve rather than sacrificial submission.

Vishwask Shakti urf Sukanyak Vivah [The Power of Faith, or Sukanya's Marriage]. In this adaptation of the Mahabharata's Sukanya-Chyavana narrative, the playful young princess Sukanya meets the aged sage Chyavana, absorbed in meditation inside an anthill. The play opens with Vidyapati's spring lyric, "The lord of seasons, King Spring, has arrived." Between the queen's anxiety and King Sharyati's tender paternal affection comes a subtle philosophical exchange: "If you close your eyes, you will not see that tree … yet everything is present." This dialogue stages the distinction between knowledge and the object of knowledge: non-apprehension is not the absence of existence. The heart of the play is trust; it is Sukanya's fidelity that restores Chyavana's youth.

Premak Vistar urf Shwetak Avishkar [The Expansion of Love, or Shweta's Discovery]. This is the most imaginatively original of the quartet. Shweta, the royal dancer, falls in love with King Atiratha after seven years of rigorous discipline. Atiratha, however, remains "detached" from art. In favour of the power to discriminate the essential from the inessential—nira-kshira-viveka—he insists on seeing art separately from the body, and declares that "to love would be utter foolishness." Shweta replies by quoting the poet: "As nectar is to a flower, so is love to life" (note that this is the refrain at the end of Kusma-Salhes) and resolves to make this "detached" king propose love to her himself. The double meaning of avishkar is exact: Shweta discovers love and also discovers her own agency. A character such as a dancer, traditionally constructed as an "object", is turned by Kunal into a "subject", an agent of action. This is the drama's chief achievement.

Premak Pariksha urf Suprabha a Ashtavakra [The Trial of Love, or Suprabha and Ashtavakra]. "Trial" is central to this tale of the deep attachment between Ashtavakra, the sage whose body is bent in eight places, and Suprabha, daughter of the great sage Vadanya. Vadanya sends Ashtavakra to heaven and the company of Urvashi in order to test Suprabha's constancy; Suprabha rejects the prospect of marrying another king at a swayamvara, insisting that she will do nothing but "wait for Ashtavakra". Ashtavakra rejects Urvashi and returns, and the two marry. The concluding couplet expresses the play's meaning: "As gold glows more brightly in fire, so love becomes deeper when it undergoes a trial."

Comparative Table: Production History and Stage Design

Play	First performance / publication	Principal artists and credits	Principal theatrical form and tradition
Forty Thieves and Gonu Jha, or the Tale of Gyan Jha	4–5 August 1993, Vidyapati Bhavan, Patna	Premlata Mishra, Umakant, J. Brahmanand, L. R. M. "Rajan", Keshav Nandan, Kumar Manish Arvind	Mixture of folk theatre, Pamariya and Bhat styles
Bidapat	30 September 2002, Vidyapati Bhavan, Patna	Ravindra Bihari Raju, Radha Mishra, Prakash Jha, Pragati Shekhar, Raghuvir Mochi, Brahmanand Jha, Suruchi Verma	Bidapat style; craft based on folk theatre
Kusma-Salhes	Various performances; Antika publication	Local folk artists and the Bhangima troupe	Folk-epic form; Salhes saga
The Vow of Love, or Shruvavati's Victory!	Antika publication (published between 2003 and 2014)	Performers of Bhangima and Mailorang	Mythological narrative; synthesis of classical and folk traditions
The Power of Faith, or Sukanya's Marriage	Antika publication (published between 2003 and 2014)	Local and professional theatre groups	Mythological drama; introspective staging
The Expansion of Love, or Shweta's Discovery	Antika publication (published between 2003 and 2014)	Musical-theatre artists	Musical drama (Maithili adaptation of the Hindi Shweta)
The Trial of Love, or Suprabha and Ashtavakra	Antika publication (published between 2003 and 2014)	Bhangima's classical-theatre ensemble	Philosophical and mythological narrative form

Comparative Table: Social, Intellectual and Theatrical Perspectives

Play	Social and political consciousness	Women's agency and characterisation	Integration of folk art and theatrical thought
Forty Thieves and Gonu Jha	Satire on monarchical exploitation, corruption and justice	Gonu Jha's wife as a rational and alert woman of the household	Pamariya and Bhat forms; natural flow of folk theatre
Bidapat	Democratisation of language; opposition to Sanskrit dominance and feudal oppression	Queen Lakhima's independent thought and assertion of marital rights	Bidapat form; folk-theatrical music of nachari and maheshvani
Kusma-Salhes	Dalit resistance; a challenge to untouchability and feudalism	Strong, independent and revolutionary women such as Kusma and Dauna the gardener	Synthesis of the Salhes saga, folk dance and traditional theatre
The Vow of Love	Individual commitment rising above royal power and social pressure	Shruvavati as an embodiment of indomitable resolve and self-determination	Combination of classical narrative and experimental stage movement
The Power of Faith	Mutual understanding between old age and youth; social propriety	Sukanya's faith empowers her to challenge the king of the gods and other deities	Introspective staging and symbolic scenic design
The Expansion of Love	Scientific perspective on biological and philosophical development	Shweta as an independent creative being through nature and love	Musical drama combining modern sound and lighting
The Trial of Love	Philosophical conflict of intellectual brilliance and the clown tradition	Suprabha values intellectual beauty above physical beauty	Classical delivery of dialogue and symbolic mythological staging

62. Forty Thieves and Gonu Jha, or the Tale of Gyan Jha: A Review of the Drama from Multiple Perspectives

Abstract

This review of Kunal's first play reads its narrative structure, humour, intellect, bardic tradition, metatheatre, folk-theatrical form and the economics of artistic labour together. It explores the drama's multiple layers through a comparative application of Indian theories of rasa and vakrokti, Western estrangement and the carnivalesque, Chinese aesthetics of dramatic structure, and Israeli ideas of iconic performance.

Keywords: Gonu Jha; humour; intelligence; metatheatre; bard; estrangement effect; folk theatre.

1. Introduction and Narrative Structure

Kunal's first play, Chalis Chor a Gonu Jha urf Gyan Jhak Khissa, occupies a remarkable place in the history of Maithili drama. It matters even more for its "way of telling the story" than for its subject matter. The drama begins with a metatheatrical, self-referential device: three bhats, the traditional bards and singers of praise, enter and lament their uselessness before the spectators. Discovering that their customary recitation of kavitts no longer has any effect, they decide: "What if we were to perform a play?" Another story begins: the story of the bards (the outer frame) and the story of Gonu Jha, Mithila's familiar folk logician (the inner frame).

The inner story has several principal elements: an opening examination of a child's parentage, in which a ploughman cleverly proves whose child it is; the humiliation of intelligence at the court of Subedar Bhunbhunadev; the court poets' appeal to Gonu; a journey in pursuit of justice to the fort of Ghuskiyahi; conflict over leadership among the thieves (Durmatiya versus Debaha); Gonu's dream of Mother Kali; and finally a scene in which he overcomes the thieves through an elaborate, deceitful rite of investiture. A particular note by the playwright is important: one actor can perform multiple roles in this play; there are versions lasting forty-five, sixty and ninety minutes, as well as an audio-drama series of thirteen episodes broadcast on radio.

The play's fundamental questions are these: Who will sustain art—the state, society or the artist? And in the struggle to survive, is intelligence, or knowledge, ultimately the highest power? These questions remain central to a review through all four dramatic traditions.

2. Indian Dramatic Theory

2.1 The Natyashastra: The Production of Rasa and Character Types

Bharata's Natyashastra (approximately second century BCE to second century CE) calls rasa the life of drama: "Rasa is the life of theatre." The principal sentiment of this play is hasya, humour, but it does not stand alone. Bharata distinguishes six varieties of laughter; parastha hasya, laughter directed at another, is central here. The portrayals of the folly of Buriraj, Bhunbhunadev, Durmatiya and the band of thieves fall into that category. Alongside it is atmastha hasya, laughing at oneself, exemplified by the bards' self-irony.

The alambana vibhavas, or supporting determinants of humour, are the incongruous behaviour of Bhunbhunadev and Buriraj ("Your Majesty, I call you Buriraj because I like that name better"), Durmatiya's obstinacy and Runubhanu's helpless farce. The erotic shringara of the Kamasutra tradition associated with Vatsyayana is absent; this is essentially a comedy. Yet it has an extraordinary form of vira rasa: Gonu's courage lies not in arms but in reasoning. Bharata's dhira-lalita hero is calm, humorous and intelligent. That is Gonu's character.

The vidushaka tradition: in Bharata's Natyashastra, the clown or vidushaka is a distinct character type, often Brahmin, comically dressed, yet clever and friendly with the hero. Gonu Jha partly inherits this tradition, but Kunal redefines it through folk realism. Gonu is not a courtly clown but a popular logician grounded in the soil.

2.2 Farce, Bhana and Folk-Theatrical Form

The Sanskrit dramatic genre of prahasana, the comedy or farce in one or more acts, is this play's closest classical equivalent. Bharata describes farce as combining a threefold humour of mind, speech and body. All three are present in Kunal's play: the bards' verbal play, the thieves' absurd physical acts and the mental comedy of Gonu's encounter with Mother Kali.

The Natyashastra distinguishes lokadharmi, which follows popular conventions, from natyadharmi, which follows stylised classical conventions. This play falls unmistakably within the lokadharmi tradition. Direct address to spectators, songs, dream scenes and mockery through names—Bhunbhunadev, Buriraj, Durmatiya—are all folk-theatrical techniques. They differ from classical formal standards, yet are no less legitimate or traditional.

2.3 Dhvani and Vakrokti

The theory of dhvani in Anandavardhana's ninth-century Dhvanyaloka, according to which suggested meaning surpasses direct denotation and secondary indication, operates at several levels in this play.

The phrase "Gyan Jha's tale" literally names the story of a man but, through suggestion, becomes the story of knowledge and intelligence. The closing song articulates precisely this suggestion: "There is no power greater than intelligence." In that verbal resonance lies the purpose of the entire play.

Kuntaka's tenth-century Vakroktijivita sets out the principle of oblique expression: the marvellous, delightful expression of an object or meaning. It is found here in abundance. Bhunbhunadev's entire character is an instance of "obliqueness in naming". Consider Gonu's conversation with Mother Kali:

"O Mother! When you catch a cold ... all your hands are occupied holding weapons. Then how do you wipe the mucus from your nose?"

This utterance blends faith with humour, devotion with intelligence, divinity with humanity in an oblique fashion that makes it an excellent example of vakrokti. Fear never enters: this is the obliqueness of fearlessness.

3. Western Dramatic Theory

3.1 Aristotle: Mimesis, Reversal and Catharsis

The Greek philosopher Aristotle (384–322 BCE), in his Poetics, treats mimesis or imitation as central to drama and identifies the importance of peripeteia, reversal of fortune, and anagnorisis, recognition, for an excellent tragedy. In one respect Kunal's play resists the Aristotelian standard: it is not a single-stranded tragedy but a many-stranded comedy. Aristotle regards the episodic plot as defective; within the folk tradition, however, precisely this episodic quality is its lifeblood.

Nevertheless, Aristotelian catharsis, the release or purification of suppressed emotions, is present here in comic form. Against the three social anxieties of theft, poverty and the corruption of the state, the play brings about a catharsis through laughter that can be defended on the socio-psychological level through Aristotle's theory.

The recognition scene is inverted. Gonu, half asleep, first "recognises" the thieves as Mother Kali ("Mother Kali has come in the guise of a man!"), and only then fails to "recognise" them. It is a reversed anagnorisis: the comic deployment of recognition, replacing fear with laughter.

3.2 Brecht: Epic Theatre and the Estrangement Effect

The German playwright and theorist Bertolt Brecht (1898–1956), in his theory of epic theatre (Episches Theater), proposed the Verfremdungseffekt, or estrangement effect. Actors repeatedly remind spectators that what they are watching is a "construction", not an unmediated reality, so that their critical intelligence remains awake. Kunal's play offers a vernacular version of Brechtian estrangement.

The three bards' onstage decision to "perform a play" is already an act of estrangement. Throughout the performance they never lose themselves completely in emotion, but remain conscious of their identity as performers. At the end they return to argue over an alternative conclusion and present a social interpretation to the spectators: "this social malady arising from illiteracy and poverty". That is an excellent example of Brechtian Gestus, the social attitude revealed through performance. The actor "shows" (zeigen) rather than simply undergoing an experience.

Brecht also made the economic foundations of art an issue. The episode of the gamchha, in which the bards openly ask spectators for donations to fill their stomachs, is precisely this kind of Brechtian transparency. Brecht wanted the conditions of artistic production never to be hidden. Here they are brought into view.

3.3 Lionel Abel: Metatheatre

The American critic Lionel Abel, in Metatheatre (1963), defined a form of drama in which characters know that they are "in a play". By this definition, Chalis Chor is fully metatheatrical. Three bards decide onstage to perform a play, choose the story they will enact, and expose the process of composition at the end. Abel says that metatheatre treats life as dream and theatre as awakening. Here the relationship is almost reversed: the bards' crisis of existence is "real" and Gonu's narrative is "dream" or play, but the same stage holds both.

3.4 Bakhtin: The Carnivalesque

The Russian thinker Mikhail Bakhtin (1895–1975) developed the concept of the carnivalesque to analyse cultural moments when established social hierarchies are overturned, restraints are broken and popular laughter ridicules authority.

The play has many carnivalesque features. Buriraj, the "witless minister", and Bhunbhunadev, the "humming god" who is a subedar, bear names that are carnivalesque commentaries on their official positions. When the band of thieves holds a democratic vote to choose a leader, politics is seen to operate even among these brigands: a carnivalesque parallel state.

From Bakhtin's perspective the gamchha episode inverts hierarchy. Mocking the sovereign and his court, the bard-performers establish a direct economic relationship with their spectators without an intermediary. The tension between dependence on the state and dependence on the people is exposed in carnivalesque form.

4. Chinese Dramatic Theory

4.1 Li Yu: Principles of Dramatic Structure

The Chinese dramatist and theorist Li Yu (1611–1680), whose Xianqing Ouji [Casual Expressions of Idle Feeling] is regarded as a foundational text of Chinese dramatic criticism, presents a central principle: zhu nao, or the main governing idea. Every good play must have a central axis to which all the threads of its plot are tied.

This play's zhu nao is "intelligence versus brute strength" and the related opposition, "folk art versus state power". Li Yu argues that the central idea must be established in the first act, and that is exactly what Kunal does in the opening scene with the bards.

Li Yu's second principle is mi zhen xian, fine stitching: the parts of a play should be woven together so that all its strands fall into place at the end. The return to the bards' frame and the gamchha episode exemplify this: the outer narrative, the bards' predicament, ends at precisely the point where it began.

4.2 The Chou Character Type

In classical Chinese theatre—jingju, or Beijing opera, and other forms—there are five basic role types: sheng (male protagonist), dan (female), jing (painted face), mo (older man) and chou (clown). The chou role is distinctive in directly addressing the audience, breaking stage conventions and speaking a vernacular idiom.

The three bards of this play are a trinity of chou figures. Their addresses to the audience, abandonment of roles, use of songs and self-mockery are all recognisable qualities of the chou. This parallel reveals a global logic of folk theatre: each culture invents a clown who breaks the fourth wall and holds up to society a mirror of its own condition.

4.3 Xu–Shi: The Empty–Full Principle

The principle of xu–shi, emptiness and fullness, is fundamental to Chinese aesthetics. What is empty onstage—the absence of scenic objects—is made full through the imagination. A Chinese actor can evoke a boat with a stick and a journey with a single step.

The most telling instance of xu–shi in Kunal's drama is Gonu's bundle of cottonseed. He declares that a handful of worthless seeds sells for ten gold coins per unit of weight. The "empty" object, the valueless seed, becomes "full", a treasured commodity. This is Gonu's application of xu–shi through the power of intelligence. It suggests that Kunal's aesthetic sensibility accords with the essence of emptiness and abundance in Chinese folk theatre.

4.4 Yijing: Wang Guowei

The Chinese aesthetician Wang Guowei (1877–1927), in Renjian Cihua, develops the concept of yijing, the fusion of feeling and situation. In outstanding art, feeling and setting blend to produce an autonomous aesthetic sphere.

The play's yijing is the conjunction of nostalgia for the bards' dying art and delight in Gonu's unconquerable intellect. Together they create a peculiar theatrical field of feeling in which sorrow and exuberance coexist. Wang describes a you wo zhi jing, a scene in which the subject is present and the artist's feelings are absorbed into the world represented. The playwright's love for Maithili's imperilled artistic identity is likewise expressed in a composite form here.

5. Israeli Dramatic Theory

5.1 Eli Rozik: The Theory of Theatrical Iconicity

The Israeli theatre scholar Eli Rozik (born 1934), in Theatrical Image and subsequent writing, advances a major proposition: the basic unit of theatre is the image or icon, rather than the text or story. The actor's body, voice and actions create an icon of a fictional world, in a Peircean sense. Drama is a system of such iconic images.

The image of the bards gives Rozik's theory a particular application here. What the three bards create onstage represents not merely "three individuals" but the entirety of a dying bardic tradition. Rozik distinguishes an icon from a symbol: the former is related to what it represents by resemblance. By "showing" the decline of their art, the bards produce an icon.

When the bards decide to "perform a play", they make theatre its own subject. Rozik's concept of "theatre about theatre" applies here. The medium of theatre itself becomes what is represented—an accomplished instance of iconic self-reflection.

5.2 Shimon Levy: Theatre as Archive

The Israeli theatre scholar Shimon Levy (1939–2017) has emphasised in a number of works the way theatre can become a cultural archive, a living repository of traditions, memories and practices that might otherwise be forgotten. On this view, theatre is not only an event taking place now but also a performance of the remembered past.

In Kunal's play, the centuries-old livelihood of Mithila's hereditary bards is archived onstage at the moment of its decline. The spectator witnesses an image of the tradition's living death. The Patna production of 1993 preserves a living example of the bardic tradition even as the bards lament their fate onstage.

5.3 A Parallel with the Revival of Hebrew through Theatre

An important dimension of the history of Israeli theatre is the establishment of Hebrew as the language of a living stage. Habima, founded in Moscow in 1917 and later Israel's national theatre, experimented in Hebrew and helped re-establish it as a language of performance after its long exclusion from everyday theatrical life.

Kunal's drama and its Patna production by the Bhangima troupe in 1993 offer a parallel. In a cultural environment dominated by Hindi, staging drama in Maithili is an act of language politics: an effort to affirm Maithili not as "merely a dialect" but as a literary language fit for theatre and its audience. In this respect Bhangima played a role analogous to that of Habima.

5.4 Witness Theatre: The Economics of the Gamchha

In Israeli theatrical practice, witness theatre, or edut, has become an important form in which the stage testifies to a harsh social reality and makes the audience responsible for it.

In the final gamchha scene the bards say openly that "our stomachs will be filled only if the spectators show kindness". This is a moment of witnessing. It makes the economic vulnerability of performing artists public and turns the audience into witnesses. The moment is not merely comic: it acknowledges a hard truth of artistic life.

Seen in this way, the ending becomes a political act: an invitation to spectators to become witnesses and accept responsibility.

6. Four-Cornered Synthesis: A Comparative Evaluation

Bringing all four traditions together, Chalis Chor a Gonu Jha emerges as a multilayered work. It can be read through Indian rasa and vakrokti, Brechtian estrangement, Chinese xu–shi and Israeli witness theatre with equal effect.

Indian perspective: an exceptional mixture of hasya and vira rasa; a folk transformation of the vidushaka tradition; the semantic enlargement of "intelligence" through dhvani.

Western perspective: a fully Brechtian epic theatre; a classic case of metatheatre; Bakhtinian carnivalesque.

Chinese perspective: the bards' striking likeness to the chou role; the aesthetic of xu–shi; a yijing combining melancholy and exhilaration.

Israeli perspective: Rozik's iconic self-reflection; Levy's theatre-as-archive; language politics comparable to Habima; the witnessing moment of the gamchha.

The four traditions share a conclusion: this is not only "Gonu Jha's story" but "the story of theatre" itself—its crisis, economics, life force and social duty. In this sense the play is also a theatrical manifesto, declaring intelligence and the humorous reasoning of folk artists to be powers capable of standing against every obstacle.

Supplementary Socio-Political Reading

Forty Thieves and Gonu Jha, or the Tale of Gyan Jha deconstructs the inherited sense of humour associated with Gonu Jha, the foundational figure of Mithila's clown tradition, and gives it a new intellectual dimension. The transformation from "Gonu Jha" to "Gyan Jha" is not merely a change of name. It signifies the use of intelligence for collective welfare and as an intellectual weapon against social contradictions.

The drama's plot is complex and tied to social reality. It opens with a ploughman's conspiracy against a married couple: by tempting a child with sugar, the ploughman wins the child's claim in his favour and exposes the folly of the supposed wise arbiters, the panch-parmeshwar. One of its most important philosophical scenes occurs in Yama's realm. On his deathbed Gonu Jha donates a barren cow in the ritual of godan. Upon reaching the other world, Chitragupta looks at Gonu's "account" and says that he is entitled to "lodging" in heaven but not "food", because he donated a barren cow. Gonu cleverly answers this scriptural rebuke by whispering in the cow's ear that Yama and Chitragupta are insulting her for being barren. Enraged, the cow chases both of them, and the terrified Yama finally sends Gonu back to the mortal world. The scene is Kunal's exceptionally sharp, penetrating assault on religious pretension, empty ritual and priestcraft.

Another dimension concerns political and administrative corruption. Bhunbhunadev, the new king of Ghuskiyahi Fort, is exceedingly greedy and cruel. Pretending to mourn his late father, Jhunjhunadev, he appropriates the prizes meant for artists. Through the crooked intelligence of his minister Buriraj, taxes are raised and a conspiracy is eventually laid to rob Gonu Jha's house.

The leadership struggle among the thieves after the death of their chief—the contest between Debaha and Durmatiya—reveals contradictions within the deprived classes. They wager that whoever succeeds in robbing Gonu's house will become the new chief. Gonu defeats both attempts through ingenuity. When Debaha hides in the raised basil shrine in the courtyard, Gonu spits on it, pretending to invoke a "spitting deity", and catches him. When Durmatiya arrives to rob the house with sword and spear, Gonu announces that a bundle of cottonseed, or bangaur, is a miraculous medicine called karpasa-bija-vati, worth four gold coins per rati. The thieves abandon the gold and silver and flee with the packet of seeds.

The play's most important social intervention comes at the end. When the thieves are captured in the imperial court, "Gyan Jha", unlike the traditional Gonu Jha, asks the king not to execute them but to provide them with an adequate means of livelihood and vigilant social protection. Theft, he argues, is a disease whose underlying causes are economic distress and political corruption. This is the stage expression of Kunal's Marxist and socialist consciousness.

63. Bidapat: Folk Theatre, History, Memory and the Theatre of Poetry

Abstract

This review of Bidapat centres on Vidyapati's poetry, folk-theatrical craftsmanship, historical memory, Lakhima's agency as a heroine, plays within plays, and the immortality of poetry. It examines dramatic structure and cultural significance through Indian theories of rasa and dhvani, the historical approach to drama, memory studies, Brechtian critical distance, and comparative Chinese and Israeli concepts.

Keywords: Bidapat; Vidyapati; folk theatre; memory; Lakhima; dhvani; historical drama.

A Clarification of Historical Method

One fundamental distinction is indispensable in this chapter: Vidyapati, the Maithili lyric poet before Jyotirishwar, and Vidyapati Thakkura, the Sanskrit–Avahattha writer of Shiv Singh's era, belong to two different historical persons or traditions. For theatrical purposes, Bidapat brings the memories, lyrics, narratives and popular beliefs associated with these two source traditions into a single dramatic world of characters. The combination of Shiv Singh, Lakhima, Ugna and songs from the padavali must therefore be understood as the dramatist's creative synthesis, not as proof that the traditions are historically identical or belong to a single person.

First performance: 30 September 2002, Vidyapati Bhavan, Patna. Publication: Antika, January–March 2003.

1. Introduction and Dramatic Architecture

Kunal's second play, Bidapat—the folk pronunciation of Vidyapati's name—is the most refined work in the collection in terms of its diverse dramatic forms. The playwright explicitly dates this playlet, written in the style of Bidapat nach, a celebrated folk-theatrical tradition of Mithila and Bengal, to AD 1400–1450. But his ambition goes further: he does not merely write a biographical play. He creates a theatrical commentary on Vidyapati's poetry.

The play's architecture operates on three levels. The outer level consists of the framing dialogue between sutradhara and actress, interruptions by the clown-like Vipta, and the classical performance of the purvaranga. The intermediate level stages the events of the plot and its characters—Vidyapati, Shiv Singh, Lakhima, Ugna, Mandakini, Kalindi, Amiyakar and the courtiers. The inner level consists of embedded performances of Vidyapati's own lyrics, which form the emotional axis of the narrative. The interaction of these three levels generates the theatrical energy of the play.

Five main axes shape the plot: (1) the friendship of Vidyapati and Shiv Singh; (2) Shiv Singh's release from the court of the Sultan of Jaunpur through Vidyapati's poetic powers; (3) the embedded tale of Ugna and Mahadeva; (4) Lakhima's resistance to conspiracy and Shiv Singh's disappearance; and (5) Vidyapati's thirty-two years of mourning and declaration of the immortality of poetry. The triangle of sutradhara, actress and Vipta provides the framing conclusion for these five axes.

2. Indian Dramatic Theory

2.1 Purvaranga and the Dasharupaka Tradition

Bharata's Natyashastra (approximately the second century BCE to the second century CE) requires a purvaranga, or preliminary performance, at the opening of a play. This includes the nandi or auspicious verse, the entry of the sutradhara and the prologue. Kunal not only adopts this classical structure but transforms it into folk-theatrical form. Invocation of the goddess, praise of Bhairavi, and then the sutradhara's introduction: this sequence follows the Natyashastra.

From the perspective of the dasharupaka, Dhananjaya's tenth-century treatise divides drama into ten kinds. The title page calls Bidapat a natika, one of the forms of drama, described here as a brief form involving humour, separation and suffering on the part of both hero and heroine. Bidapat partly fits this definition: separation and grief are present, but karuna, compassion or pathos, takes the place of dominant humour. In explaining natika, Abhinavagupta emphasises the need for an exceptional hero. Vidyapati is precisely such a figure.

2.2 The Production of Rasa: The Confluence of Pathos, Love and Tranquillity

The predominant sentiment is karuna: Shiv Singh's disappearance, Lakhima's thirty-two-year wait and Vidyapati's final isolation. Bharata identifies the permanent emotion of karuna rasa as grief and its determinant as the remembrance of the beloved or the lost. Yet beneath the pathos the play moves towards Abhinavagupta's shanta rasa. The concluding choral song, declaring Vidyapati, Shiv Singh, Lakhima and Vipta immortal in poetic verse, expresses the inward repose of tranquillity.

Abhinavagupta (c. 950–1020 CE), in his commentary Abhinavabharati on the Natyashastra, explains that rasa is manifested rather than produced: it already exists within the spectator's consciousness and is awakened by dramatic performance. Bidapat strengthens this manifestation by using Vidyapati's actual lyrics. The spectators' dormant poetic memories awaken through performance.

Shringara rasa flows through Vidyapati's poems, particularly "New Vrindavan, ever-new groves of trees, the young lover wanders" and "Take the essence of the moon to fashion a face". But this is not simply worldly erotic love; it is devotional shringara directed towards universal love through the play of Radha and Krishna. Erotic sentiment and devotion thus merge in what Sanskrit poetics understands as a union of love and bhakti.

2.3 The Theory of Dhvani: Three Meanings Compressed into "Bidapat"

The suggested meaning of the word "Bidapat" is exceptional. From the perspective of Anandavardhana's Dhvanyaloka, at least three layers of meaning are compressed in that one word: (a) the dramatic character belonging to Shiv Singh's era, namely Vidyapati Thakkura, the Sanskrit–Avahattha author; (b) the folk tradition of Bidapat nach, whose lyric memory is connected with the Vidyapati of the padavali before Jyotirishwar; and (c) the folk resonance suggested by the sounds bida and pat. The drama creatively brings the two historically different Vidyapati traditions together in one stage structure, but the criticism does not mistake that synthesis for historical identity.

Obliqueness in naming—"Vidyapati, Vidyapati!" versus "Bidapat is Bidapat!"—sets the scholarly name against its vernacular pronunciation within the play. The sutradhara insists on the classical name; Vipta prefers the popular one. This comic quarrel concerns the naming of a single character within the drama. It does not justify regarding the pre-Jyotirishwar lyric poet and Vidyapati Thakkura, the Sanskrit–Avahattha author of Shiv Singh's era, as one historical person.

2.4 Embedded Drama: The Play Within a Play

Although the Natyashastra does not define "embedded drama" as a separate genre, Sanskrit drama contains examples, such as dream scenes in Bhasa's plays and dramatic performance in Ratnavali. Bidapat contains two such inner dramas. First is Amiyakar's swang, a theatrical impersonation in which he enacts Vidyapati's meeting with the sultan; while eating sweets, he moves between roles. This is a vernacular form of acting. Second is the scene involving Gaura, Mahadeva and Natua, where Gaura's lament about Shiva's poverty is performed as a preparation for revealing Ugna as Mahadeva.

3. Western Dramatic Theory

3.1 Georg Lukács: Historical Drama and the World-Historical Individual

The Hungarian Marxist critic Georg Lukács (1885–1971) advances a criterion for historical drama: the protagonist should be a welthistorisches Individuum, a world-historical individual who lives the contradictions of an age within his own person. Vidyapati is such an individual. On one hand, he inhabits a dependent kingdom (Tirhut under Jaunpur); on the other, he believes in a poetic power that transcends politics. His life embodies that contradiction.

Yet Kunal's Vidyapati is not Lukács's "victorious hero". He is a "mourning witness". Shiv Singh's disappearance ends the friendship that had given meaning to the poet's life. The tranquillity attained after thirty-two years of waiting is different from the condition of a Lukácsian tragic hero: this is the tragedy of an Eastern, contemplative protagonist.

3.2 Feminist Reading: Lakhima as Heroine

Western feminist dramatic criticism, including the work of Kate Millett, Elaine Morton and Sharon Friedman, takes particular interest in rereading dramatic texts in which women become secondary figures in the shadow of great historical men. Kunal consciously reverses that tendency.

Lakhima is notable from a feminist perspective for three reasons. First, she rejects ministerial protection and interprets the conspiracy herself: "They are treating this as a golden opportunity to break the trinity of king, queen and great poet." Second, her waiting is not the passivity of conventional wifely fidelity but a freely chosen determination. Third, although traditional narratives often centre Lakhima in a tale of sati, Kunal departs from that pattern by making her lived experience of waiting central.

3.3 Pierre Nora: Sites of Memory (Lieux de Mémoire)

The French historian Pierre Nora (born 1931), in Lieux de mémoire, develops the idea of sites of memory: places, objects and texts in which collective historical memory is stored and made active.

Vidyapati's lyrics are a principal site of memory in this play. When the chorus sings "New Vrindavan, ever-new groves of trees, the young lover wanders", or Lakhima remembers Shiv Singh through the song "O bumblebee, for your sake and mine", the moment belongs simultaneously to historical memory and present experience. Performance brings six centuries of distance into the present instant. Thus Bidapat is not merely a drama about Vidyapati; it is a theatrical enactment of the collective memory of the Maithili-speaking community.

3.4 Brecht and Critical Distance: Vipta's Role

The role performed by the three bards in the first play is taken here by the triangle of sutradhara, actress and Vipta. Vipta's repeated insistence that they "move the cart along" is a precise vernacular transformation of Brechtian estrangement. It prevents spectators from becoming wholly submerged in the story and continually reminds them that what they are seeing is a construction.

Yet there is an important difference from Brecht. Brecht sought to awaken the spectators' critical intellect through estrangement. Vipta's interruptions awaken delight rather than intellectual scrutiny. He is a "folk estranger" who brings the elite dignity of art down to the level of the bullock cart and the tale. This aesthetic difference establishes the play's originality in relation to Western dramatic theory.

4. Chinese Dramatic Theory

4.1 Caizi Jiaren: The Convention of Poetic Genius and Romance

A major dramatic pattern in classical Chinese theatre, especially the kunqu opera of the Ming and Qing periods, is caizi jiaren, the "talented scholar and beautiful lady". The romance of a poet-scholar and a beautiful heroine establishes the values of poetic power and love.

Bidapat is a displaced version of this convention. Vidyapati is the caizi, distinguished by poetry rather than logical disputation. Lakhima is no ordinary jiaren but a self-respecting queen. Their relationship nevertheless contains the deep trust and affectionate friendship at the heart of the convention. Shiv Singh's disappearance transforms it into a triangle: a third person who made their union meaningful is now absent.

4.2 Zhiyin: Perfect Understanding and Its Absence

In Chinese culture, zhiyin, "one who truly hears or understands", denotes a profound relationship: the person who comprehends an artist's work in all its depth. The famous legend tells how the zither player Bo Ya broke his instrument after the death of his sole zhiyin, Zhong Ziqi. "The one who could hear is gone; why should I play?"

The relationship between Vidyapati and Shiv Singh embodies precisely this ideal. Shiv Singh was the supreme listener, connoisseur and patron of Vidyapati's poetry. His disappearance leaves the poet's creative life in a sense orphaned. "Ugna re, where have you gone?" becomes a lament of separation from the perfect listener. Like Bo Ya's broken zither, the sound of Vidyapati's poems becomes filled with grief.

4.3 Zhezixi and Layered Performance

In Chinese folk theatre the tradition of zhezixi, the excerpt-play, is well known: a self-contained scene from an extensive epic dramatic cycle is selected for independent performance. Three examples appear clearly in this drama: (a) Amiyakar's impersonation in the sultan's court episode; (b) the inner drama of Gaura, Mahadeva and Natua, anticipating Ugna's revelation; and (c) the Radha-Krishna rasa performed by the sutradhara and actress in the purvaranga.

Layered performance keeps several narrative worlds active simultaneously upon the same stage. Chinese dramatic theory calls this xizhongxi, a play within a play. Indian theatre has comparable occasions of performance inside a drama, but the Chinese term provides a more exact vocabulary for analysing its layers.

4.4 Bei–Huan–Li–He: Four Fundamental Dramatic States

According to one convention of Chinese theatre, every excellent play should contain four basic emotional states: bei, grief; huan, delight; li, separation; and he, reunion. Excellent drama brings them together in one narrative current.

All four occur in Bidapat: huan in the victory at Oini and the celebrations; li in Shiv Singh's disappearance; bei in Vidyapati and Lakhima's thirty-two years of mourning; and he in reunion through poetry—a spiritual, invisible reunion in which Vidyapati proclaims Shiv Singh immortal in his verses. This reunion is not earthly but inward. It thereby transcends the Chinese ideal and opens another possibility.

5. Israeli Dramatic Theory

5.1 S. Ansky's The Dybbuk: The Theatrical Presence of Dead Love

The Jewish-Russian dramatist S. Ansky (1863–1920) wrote The Dybbuk (Between Two Worlds, 1920), regarded as a foundational text of Hebrew and Yiddish theatre. A dead lover's spirit enters the body of his beloved and gains a theatrical presence. Love is stronger than death: that is its central proposition.

In Bidapat, Shiv Singh disappears physically from the stage, yet his presence in Lakhima's memory becomes a theatrical existence resembling a dybbuk. When his shadow appears as the song "O bumblebee, for your sake and mine" is sung, the moment follows a theatrical logic akin to that of The Dybbuk. In both works the emotional truth of love breaks through the boundary of death.

5.2 Eli Rozik: The Iconic Existence of the Poetic Lyric

In his theory of iconicity, Eli Rozik argues that theatrical images arise not only through the actor's body but also through sound. When the samaji chorus sings Vidyapati's lyrics, the song becomes a "sound-icon", not simply music but a theatrical image of Vidyapati's entire world of life.

One distinction made by Rozik is particularly relevant: the difference between the theatrical image and the dramatic text. Kunal's written playlet and the stage image made by the singing actor's integrated body, voice and movement are independent entities. In this drama they exist in a particular tension: Kunal's text incorporates Vidyapati's songs, but those songs continually exceed the text's control and live their own independent poetic life.

5.3 Beyond Habima's Language Politics: The Rebirth of Poetic Language

In the discussion of the preceding play we saw the parallel between Habima Theatre and the language politics of Bhangima. In Bidapat this parallel acquires another dimension: not only the life of a language but the life of poetic language. The continuation of Habima's tradition in Israel is also connected with attempts to keep Hebrew poetry alive onstage.

The 2002 Patna performance of Bidapat at Vidyapati Bhavan revived Vidyapati's lyrics through theatre at a time when they were increasingly becoming objects confined to libraries. In that sense the production by Bhangima is a "theatrical rebirth of poetic language", parallel to the revival of Hebrew poetry in Israeli performance.

5.4 A Postcolonial Perspective: The Diplomatic Power of Poetry

Within postcolonial theatre studies associated with the Israeli scholar Avraham Oz and others, particular importance is given to theatrical acts in which cultural power defeats political or military power.

The sultan's court episode in Bidapat is exemplary in this respect. The Sultan of Jaunpur represents political power; Vidyapati represents cultural power. He secures Shiv Singh's release not through diplomacy in the conventional sense but through a poetic performance: while blindfolded, he composes a lyric depicting a bathing scene. Asked by the sultan to name his reward, Vidyapati demands his friend's freedom, not a throne. A minister remarks, "He could have asked for the kingdom of Tirhut!" Vidyapati replies, "But I have indeed obtained a kingdom!" This is a postcolonial declaration of victory through poetic power.

6. Four-Cornered Synthesis

Bringing together the four traditions clarifies the central question of Bidapat: what is poetic power, and in what forms does it establish its existence? Each tradition offers a different angle of approach.

Indian perspective: poetic power is the manifestation of rasa. The lyrics express an already existing sentiment. At the culmination of shanta rasa, poetry becomes a conqueror of death.

Western perspective: poetic power is a site of memory in Nora's sense, an expression of the world-historical individual in Lukács's sense, and a feminist rereading centred upon Lakhima.

Chinese perspective: poetic power is the art of perfect understanding, or zhiyin, and of the spiritual reunion reached through bei–huan–li–he.

Israeli perspective: poetic power is the independent existence of a sound-icon in Rozik's sense and a cultural-diplomatic victory over colonial power through poetry.

All four perspectives agree on one point: Vidyapati's lyrics are not merely literary works but a living cultural and political force. Kunal revivifies that force through theatre. In this sense Bidapat is not simply a play about Vidyapati: it is a declaration of Maithili theatre's own existence.

Next: Kusma-Salhes

Supplementary Historical and Social Analysis

The play Bidapat is composed on the structural foundation of the famous Maithili folk-theatrical form of the same name. It releases the great poet Vidyapati from the narrow confines of courtly culture and establishes him as a people's poet and a protagonist of popular struggle.

The purvaranga opens with praise of Shiva and a dance to Bhairavi, placing the dramatic period between AD 1350 and 1450. The first scene depicts festivities in the capital after King Shiv Singh's victory at Oini, where Pamariya performers and bards sing his praises. Yet orthodox Sanskrit pundits, identified as Pandit One and Pandit Two, strongly oppose the nachari and maheshvani songs composed by Vidyapati in the vernacular, Maithili. Because these songs describe Mahadeva as "naked, a beggar since birth", they conspire to brand Vidyapati obscene and a disgrace to society. Fundamentally, this conflict is a class struggle between a priestly group defending the dominance of the "language of the gods" and the ordinary people's desil vayna, speech of the land.

The second scene gives a delicate portrayal of courtly and personal relations. Vidyapati dedicates his new Avahattha poem Kirtilata, the story of the defeat of Gaudesh Yadusena, to the young prince Shiv Singh. Here he is not merely a poet; he also becomes an emotional bridge between Shiv Singh and Queen Lakhima, resolving the alienation and conflict in their marriage through the song "Sarasija binu sara …".

The third scene portrays political intrigue and the exploitation of the people. The royal tax collectors mercilessly beat the peasants with canes while extracting revenue. Vidyapati insists upon freeing the afflicted peasants from their grasp. In revenge, the Sanskrit-dominant pundit Chandrakar and his associates conspire to issue a secret invitation to Sultan Ibrahim Shah of Jaunpur to send his army against Tirhut, hoping that the rebellious prince Shiv Singh will be imprisoned and the supremacy of Sanskrit restored. The scene exposes the internal treachery of feudalism and its hostility to the people.

64. Limitations, Shortcomings and Intellectual Tensions in the Seven Plays

Abstract

Criticism is not merely appreciative evaluation. This chapter therefore examines structural inconsistencies across the seven plays, character development, the repetition of metatheatre, reliance upon announcers, tensions between women's agency and patriarchal validation, divine intervention, the formation of titles, stage directions and dramatic economy. The objective is not to diminish the works' value but to clarify possible improvements for their future reading and performance.

Keywords: criticism of limitations; structure; character development; announcer; female agency; stage directions; dramatic economy.

Introduction: Why Criticism Is Necessary

Balanced literary evaluation cannot be completed through praise alone. Kunal's Kusma-Salhes and Six Other Plays is a notable collection of Maithili drama. That is evident from the fact that all seven plays were staged repeatedly, published in Bhangima and Antika, and finally brought together in book form. Yet this very commitment makes the reader and critic responsible: the greater a play's achievement, the more candidly must its limitations be acknowledged.

The purpose of examining the weaknesses, intellectual tensions, formal limitations and defects of repetition in all seven plays is not to dismiss the works but to offer a constructive perspective for future playwriting.

Structural Limitations: Unequal Scale and a Disrupted Rhythm

The collection's most obvious structural problem is the disparity in the lengths of its seven plays. Kusma-Salhes is a vast drama of about seventy pages; Prem-Pratijna urf Shruvavatik Jai! ends in only fourteen. When a reader or future director moves from Kusma-Salhes to Shruvavati, the transition is suddenly from an epic world to a short chamber piece. It is not a comfortable shift.

Consider the comparison:

Chalis Chor a Gonu Jha: 74 pages; Bidapat: 48 pages; Kusma-Salhes: 70 pages; Shruvavati: 14 pages; Sukanya: 26 pages; Shweta: 18 pages; Suprabha–Ashtavakra: 28 pages.

The first three plays average sixty-four pages, while the final four average twenty-one. This is a problem of book architecture. They seem like the contents of two different books; placing them in one volume produces an awkward reading rhythm.

The Uniformity of the "Or" Formula in the Titles

All four titles in the quartet of love follow the same pattern: "[abstract emotion] or [the heroine's name] and [a word signifying action]". It feels fresh in the first three plays, combining a classical emotion with a popular announcement; by the fourth repetition it becomes mechanical. The reader recognises the "formula" as soon as the title is read, and surprise vanishes.

Compare Bidapat, one word dense with many meanings, and Kusma-Salhes, two character names suggesting an epic scope. Each title carries the living energy of its play. Premak Vistar urf Shwetak Avishkar is relatively formal and formulaic. The repetitive progression of titles is a limitation of the quartet of love.

Weaknesses and Intellectual Tensions in Individual Plays

Chalis Chor a Gonu Jha

(a) Excessive Metatheatre

The play's metatheatrical devices—the bards' debate, alternative endings and addresses to spectators—are admirable as dramatic craft. Yet in the final scene, when the bards announce that "theft is a social disease born of illiteracy and poverty", the message becomes something merely "told". By the criterion attributed to Bharata—that drama "shows" rather than "tells"—the ending is weak. The message should emerge from the action itself; an explicit explanation by the bards is unnecessary.

(b) Two-Dimensional Thieves

Compared with Gonu Jha, the forty thieves, especially Durmatiya and Debaha, remain little more than comic devices. The poverty and lack of education that the playwright himself recognises at the end as a "social disease" are never given dramatic depth. There is a contradiction here: the playwright offers a progressive social explanation in his conclusion, yet throughout the play the thieves remain objects of ridicule. Socially realistic drama would resolve the contradiction by humanising the thieves' poverty in at least one scene.

(c) The Double Meaning of the Gamchha Episode

The scene in which performers spread a cloth and ask for donations has two functions simultaneously: Brechtian transparency, revealing the economic vulnerability of artists, and a criticism of state patronage of the arts. But neither meaning is fully developed. The episode appears more like a mechanical repetition of a folk convention than a deliberate dramatic choice.

Bidapat

(a) Vipta's "Move the Cart Along": From Humour to Interruption

Vipta's refrain, "Move the cart along", is at first a fresh folk-theatrical device. Yet it occurs so frequently that, instead of producing a Brechtian estrangement effect, it becomes a mechanical interruption. Once spectators know that Vipta will say it again and again, the element of surprise disappears. Brechtian estrangement works best when unexpected; here it becomes entirely predictable.

(b) The Incomplete Ugna–Mahadeva Episode

The revelation that Ugna was really Mahadeva should constitute a central emotional moment in the famous folk tale. In this play, however, the discovery of Ugna's divine identity reaches us through another character's report—Amiyakar's account—rather than through direct dramatic action. Consequently, the moment cannot fully release its emotional potential, which in Vidyapati devotion is a moment of divine revelation.

(c) The Tension Between History and Poetry

The play announces an "historical" period from AD 1400 to 1450, but its dramatic structure is poetic and folk-theatrical throughout. The tension between the two sometimes becomes visible. For instance, the sultan's court represents a historical reality, yet presenting it through Amiyakar's comic impersonation lightens its historical gravity. The playwright's balance between history and poetry occasionally wavers.

Kusma-Salhes

(a) One-Dimensional Villains: Suchong and Chuhar

In the anthology's most ambitious play, the villains become one-dimensional. Suchong, Chuharmall and Tarumall are merely accumulations of evil traits, without inner conflict or human complexity. When they torture Budhesar, their communal laughter—"Ho … ho …"—makes their cruelty superficial. In epic drama, the finest villain compels the audience to understand, perhaps even temporarily to share, his perspective. Such complexity is absent here.

(b) Geographical Expansion at the Expense of Dramatic Focus

The play changes locations too often: Mahisoutha, Morang, Bhot, Baghgarh, Samdagarh, Rewa-Dah and Rangilagarh. This geographical expanse confirms the authenticity of the epic narrative, but as drama it pushes the central love story of Kusma and Salhes into the background. The war involving the king of Morang and the account of Bhot's invasion keep Kusma offstage for a considerable time. The balance between epic scope and theatrical focus is not wholly achieved.

(c) Syncretic Invocation and Cultural Dissonance

The invocation of Mira-Sultan at the opening is a beautiful syncretic gesture. Yet placing the specific cultural elements of the Dusadh Salhes tradition—forest goddess, animal companions, and its distinctive folk terminology—alongside "Jana Gana Mana" seems somewhat incongruous. Syncretism is an admirable goal, but here its reach makes the invocation resemble a display of universal religious harmony more than an authentic Dusadh religious appeal.

Prem-Pratijna urf Shruvavatik Jai!

(a) Entering the Fire: A Structural Tension with the Feminist Reading

The play's gravest intellectual tension is that Shruvavati declares herself an "independent and self-reliant person" yet, when the fruit fails to cook, resolves to "enter the fire while remembering the beloved". The play treats her entry into the fire as an expression of "inner strength", but the sacrificial image itself follows a patriarchal convention. A free woman demands life, not death. The contradiction remains unresolved.

Compare Sukanya in the fifth play, who takes responsibility for the consequences of her father's curse and chooses a course of life, or Ashtavakra in the seventh, who rejects Urvashi and chooses living love. Beside them, Shruvavati's resolve to enter the pyre is a weaker dramatic resolution.

(b) Indra's Three Disguises: Repetition and Loss of Credibility

Indra first appears openly and introduces himself, then as an old man, and finally as Vasishtha. The three appearances repeat the same structure—Shruvavati rejects him each time—creating an increasingly predictable dramatic rhythm. The third encounter, as Vasishtha, is essentially a repetition of the second, as the old man. She rejects him in both; he becomes angry in both. Instead of increasing tension, repetition diminishes it.

(c) Dushyant Kumar's Urdu Couplet: The Difficulty of an Imported Element

The concluding Hindi–Urdu couplet by Dushyant Kumar, "Who says that a hole cannot be made in the sky?", contributes cultural and linguistic richness. But within a mythological Maithili playlet it also feels somewhat out of place. If a poetic line was necessary, the Maithili poetic tradition could have supplied a comparable verse. This is a small yet particular problem of form.

Vishwask Shakti urf Sukanyak Vivah

(a) Difference in Age and Ethical Discomfort

The play itself acknowledges this tension through a choral song: "A daughter sixteen years old, and Chyavana's age a thousand." The song gives amusing expression to the ethical discomfort of the age difference without resolving it. Chyavana is confident of his age and abilities, the king gives his assent out of helplessness, and Sukanya willingly accepts. Yet the ethical basis of that consent is not sufficiently developed.

(b) Excessive Length of the Ashvini Kumars' Episode

The first arrival of the Ashvini Kumars, their reappearance, apology, comparison with Urvashi, threat of a curse, renewed meeting, and episode of soma-rasa occupy a large part of the play. The main story of love—the developing relationship between Sukanya and Chyavana—receives comparatively little space. In terms of dramatic economy, removing one Ashvini scene and expanding the central couple's relationship would have produced a better balance.

(c) The "Chyavanprash" Remark: The Risk of a Temporal Rift

The announcer's reference to "Chyavana of Chyavanprash" is humorous for a moment. Yet this reference to modern consumer culture creates a temporal rift in the mythological setting. If the intrusion was deliberate, a Brechtian estrangement effect, its dramatic purpose should have been applied more consistently throughout the play.

Premak Vistar urf Shwetak Avishkar

(a) Atiratha's Transformation: A Problem of Dramatic Motivation

The play's gravest formal limitation is the excessive speed of Atiratha's psychological transformation. On the one hand, he is portrayed as a king detached for "seven or eight years", a man who returns alone from every marriage-selection assembly. On the other, as soon as he hears of Shweta's water burial, he races to the riverbank and removes his crown upon meeting her in the forest. Years of detachment dissolve within a single scene. The transformation lacks sufficient psychological groundwork.

"Atiratha became dispirited", "everything seemed artificial", "everything seemed like lifeless puppets": these pronouncements by the announcer tell us why Atiratha changes. But this is telling, not showing.

In Ibsen's Hedda Gabler and Chekhov's Three Sisters, psychological transformation is established gradually, scene by scene. In Shwetak Avishkar, the arc of Atiratha's change depends too heavily on the announcer's description and too little upon direct theatrical action.

(b) Lack of a Source Narrative

The story of Shweta and Atiratha has no known mythological or historical source: it is wholly Kunal's invention. That is a strength in itself, a mark of originality. But it also leads to a weakness: this story lacks the narrative weight and credibility that a mythological source supplies to the other six plays. The royal dancer and the detached king are a familiar dramatic trope already used in several Indian languages.

Premak Pariksha urf Suprabha a Ashtavakra

(a) Vadanya's Motivation: An Unexplained Refusal

The real reason for the sage Vadanya's rejection of Ashtavakra is never made clear. He says, "I am not obliged to offer an explanation." The dramatist employs this "mystery" as a device, but it leaves Vadanya psychologically hollow. Because the grounds of rejection remain unknown, spectators cannot fully understand what is at stake in the trial. Vadanya becomes a functional agent of the plot rather than a living character.

(b) Suprabha's Uneven Presence on Stage

In the title Suprabha's name comes before Ashtavakra's, yet the first half of the play is devoted to Ashtavakra. Suprabha appears only in the tenth and eleventh scenes of twelve; she is absent from the twelfth, concerning Urvashi. If the title accords priority to Suprabha, the dramatic structure fails to reflect that priority.

(c) The Secret of Vandi: A Lost Dramatic Opportunity

Vandi is in fact Varuna's son, and "water burial" means that scholars were being kept under the water god's protection for a sacrifice. This secret is the play's most surprising plot twist. Yet the playwright reduces the revelation to a comic passage ("Water is my home and hearth"). Had it become a full theatrical disclosure, it could have been one of the drama's finest scenes.

Limitations Shared by the Collection

Female Agency and the Sequence of Patriarchal Approval

All four dramas in the quartet of love share a structural feature that is also a shared limitation: every heroine's independent choice ultimately receives completion through the "approval of male authority".

Shruvavati's victory is validated by Indra's announcement, "You have won"; Sukanya's marriage by the assent of King Sharyati and Chyavana; Shweta's liberation by Atiratha's departure and pursuit; and Suprabha's marriage by Vadanya's permission. These four examples show that the dramatist makes the heroine an agent, yet the final confirmation of her victory comes from a male character. This subtle reproduction of patriarchal structures somewhat limits the playwright's feminist ideas.

Dependence on the Announcer: "Telling" versus "Showing"

All four dramas in the quartet assign the announcer, or narrator, the role of interpreter of emotions:

"Shweta's depression vanished ..."; "Atiratha grew dispirited ..."; "The night passed as though an age were passing ...".

At times such explanations deprive the characters of a dramatic opportunity to express their feelings themselves. Theatre reaches its strongest emotional moments when characters live through an experience rather than having a narrator tell us about it. Dependence on the announcer is a broad formal limitation of these plays.

The Intellectual Contradiction of Divine Intervention

Several plays in the collection make lofty declarations about female agency, yet a deity or supernatural power intervenes to resolve the action.

Shruvavati's "inner strength" is "proved" by Indra's recognition; Sukanya's "trust" is rewarded with Chyavana's renewed youth through the Ashvini Kumars' medicinal knowledge; and Ashtavakra's paternal curse is lifted by bathing in a river. This sequence of divine rewards produces an unintended message: fidelity in love inevitably wins supernatural recompense. Human agency is thus validated as dependent upon fate rather than as autonomous.

Vidyapati's Lyrics: The Risk of Overuse

Vidyapati's poems are used in both Bidapat and Sukanya. In Bidapat their use is entirely fitting and coherent: Vidyapati is the central protagonist. But in Sukanya the spring song "The lord of seasons, King Spring, has arrived" serves to create atmosphere. This raises a question: does the collection have some programme of preserving Vidyapati's lyrics? If another poem from the Maithili tradition were used for the spring setting in Sukanya, Vidyapati's songs in Bidapat would become even more distinctive.

Stage Directions: Uneven Levels of Detail

Stage directions in the folk-theatrical trilogy are extensive and specific: "Singing, Kusma the gardener, Thanka-Banka … Kunta, tenderly fondling Budhesar". By contrast, the quartet of love often uses minimal directions: "Change of lighting", "Music", "Freeze". This difference reflects two periods in the dramatist's compositional practice, but it also means that the shorter playlets give performers less guidance.

Conclusion: Possibility Alongside Limitations

First, the prominence of explicit messages sometimes replaces dramatic tension in the quartet of love. In particular, concluding couplets and comments by announcers occasionally state outright what would have been more powerful if left to suggestion. The heart of theatre is showing, not announcing; by that standard the folk-theatrical trilogy is stronger than the quartet of love. Second, the use of the convention of entering the fire in Shruvavati's Victory! creates an intellectual tension with its forceful argument for women's freedom. Although the play seeks to portray it as a resolution expressing inner strength, the sacrificial symbol does not wholly accord with a contemporary feminist reading; the question remains open. Third, the collection shows a difference in scale: epic dramas such as Kusma-Salhes are placed alongside chamber playlets in the quartet of love. In one sense this variety is a source of richness, but it also disrupts the rhythm of reading. Even after recognising these limits, one must admit that they remain secondary beside the central strength of Kunal's theatrical vision: performability and communication with ordinary audiences.

The collection's limitations can be grouped chiefly in three categories:

(a) Formal limitations: dependence on the announcer, telling rather than showing, and the flatness of certain characters.

(b) Intellectual tensions: the convention of entering the fire, patriarchal approval, and dependence on divine rewards.

(c) Structural limitations: unequal scale, uniformity of titles and repeated dramatic formulae.

Crucially, these limitations do not destroy the collection's value. No body of writing is without weaknesses. Even the great poet Vidyapati repeats conventional patterns of heroines; Bhikhari Thakur's plays, too, contain linguistic inconsistencies. Kunal's limitations frequently occur precisely where his ambition takes its highest flight. That is a sign of a living creative writer.

Identifying such limitations also has a practical purpose: future directors can address them in performance. A perceptive director could expand Atiratha's journey of transformation through silent scenes; Shruvavati's decision to enter the fire could be restaged as a declaration of strength; and the revelation of Vandi's secret could become an immense theatrical moment. This is the quality of living theatre: each production is a new "version".

65. Overall Conclusion: The Intellectual Unity of Kunal's Dramatic World

Abstract

This concluding chapter brings together the collection's folk-theatrical trilogy and quartet of love as successive developments of intelligence, the immortality of poetry, fearlessness, faith, self-determination and love. Fidelity to folk sources, a synthesis of classical learning, popular tradition and modernity, social sensitivity, and practical theatricality emerge as the common foundations of Kunal's dramatic work.

Keywords: Kunal; Maithili theatre; folk drama; love; intelligence; female agency; synthesis.

Conclusion

Kusma-Salhes and Six Other Plays is an important contribution to contemporary Maithili theatre. It is a bridge between folk drama and the modern stage, one that not only preserves Mithila's tradition of nach but also revives it by filling it with contemporary thought. The collection stands on four pillars: intelligence in Chalis Chor, the immortality of poetry in Bidapat, freedom from fear and love in Kusma-Salhes, and women's agency in the quartet of love. Ultimately these pillars lead towards a single thesis: love, understood as broad human compassion and an attachment to life, is the fundamental principle of creation, while intelligence is its guardian.

Through its fidelity to folk sources, its sensitivity to subaltern and women's voices, its synthesis of classical learning, popular forms and modernity, and its practical knowledge of the stage, this collection exemplifies the parallel-literary perspective of Videha. It also constitutes an essential point of reference for Maithili dramatic criticism. Study, teaching and renewed performance of these works are equally necessary for the vitality of Maithili theatre.

Kunal's Kusma-Salhes and Six Other Plays opens a new highway in the development of Maithili dramatic literature. Drawing upon his long theatrical experience, Kunal has demonstrated that no art can survive by imitating the past alone. Continuous renewal and contemporary relevance are essential.

The way these seven plays establish Mithila's traditional folk culture, the voice of Dalit resistance, the deconstruction of mythological narratives and women's identities upon the stage enriches Maithili literature immeasurably and gives it cause for pride. Kunal's renewed use of the kirtaniya, Bidapat and Pamariya forms gives direction to the next generation of theatre workers. Ultimately the anthology effects an intimate yet reasoned reconciliation between classical dramatic vision and folk life, restoring theatre as one of society's sharpest intellectual instruments.

66. Mahendra Malangia's Chhutahar / Chhutahar Ghail / Chhutha Ghail

Abstract

Chhutha Ghail is the title of Mahendra Malangia's new play. He has written a ten-page preface to this short play. He is distressed that Ramanand Jha 'Raman' suggested that 'Chhutahar Ghail' should simply be called 'Chhutahar'.

Keywords: Mahendra Malangia; Chhutha Ghail; drama; vernacular speech; caste; stageability; arrangement of scenes.

Chhutha Ghail is the name of Mahendra Malangia's new play. He has written a preface of ten pages to this short drama.

Let us begin with that preface. He is aggrieved that Ramanand Jha 'Raman' suggested calling 'Chhutahar Ghail' simply 'Chhutahar'. In response, he advances three points. First:

'You speak sometimes of what is written in books;

I speak sometimes of what my own eyes have seen.'

Second, a lamenting poem by Yatri:

'I remain off to one side, like a ghail chhutahar;

Alas, how grievously unfortunate I am!'

He then asks what connection the widow in that poem and Kabutari Devi in this play have with Shiva's Maheshvara Sutras and Panini's ten lakaras (Panini specified twelve lakaras for Vedic Sanskrit and ten for classical Sanskrit … but let that pass).

Third, he likens his own position to that of Copernicus: what difference does it make what people say, when in villages and households people actually use the expression 'Chhutahar Ghail'!

Yet on all three points Malangia's arguments work against him. Both the evidence of 'what the eyes have seen' and actual popular usage show that people say simply 'Chhutahar'. Can one place a chhutahar on a ghailchi? When betel leaves are laid out in a loita to grow, would Malangia's reasoning require us to call it a 'Loita Ghail'? Ghail, surahi, koha, taula, chhutahar, loita, khapari, kurni, kurwar, kosiya, sarba and sobarna are all distinct objects with distinct names. In accepting a suggestion by Phoolchandra Mishra 'Raman'—who probably proposed 'Chhutha Ghail' jokingly; if he did not, it is a newly coined expression in a new language!—

Malangia changed 'Chhutahar Ghail' into 'Chhutha Ghail'. This indicates that he had realised the mistake but did not wish to appear diminished by accepting Ramanand Jha 'Raman's' point. Instead he planted his own stake. Later Ramanand Jha 'Raman' asked the Chetana Samiti to publish the book; the committee would provide only twenty-five copies, so Malangia had it published by his own organisation. What concern are these matters of the reader's? Now consider Yatri's example. Yatri also had to keep Hindi readers in mind. He sometimes could not even remember which of his poems were in Hindi, which in Maithili and which in both. Thus he wrote 'Chhutahar Ghail'. One can also see the reason in Yatri's wish to secure a rhyme. And now to Copernicus: even if Yatri or Malangia writes 'Ghail Chhutahar', 'Chhutahar Ghail' or 'Chhutha Ghail', will native speakers of Maithili begin calling the chhutahar by any of these expressions? The Copernicus example therefore works against Malangia too.

Malangia has been unable to employ the Copernicus legend correctly. Perhaps he is confusing Copernicus with Galileo. Copernicus's theory received the support of the Pope, and Copernicus dedicated his forty-page manuscript on heliocentrism to Pope Paul III. But Malangia's unfamiliarity with science, and his tendency to attach scientific theories to legends, will not surprise you when you encounter in this very preface his ignorance of genuine folk narratives.

'Ali Baba and the Forty Thieves': the entire world knows this as a medieval Arabic folk tale included in the Arabian Nights (the Thousand and One Tales). There is a dispute over whether it was inserted into the Arabian Nights later, but there is no dispute that it is a medieval Arabic folk tale. The things Malangia goes on to say about Balban's atrocities and similar matters, from a communal perspective, reveal only a superficial attachment to folklore. The shallow knowledge of the panji system found in Mithila Tattva Vimarsha or in Ramanath Jha's account was superseded long ago; the matter is recorded in our genealogical books in written form. Gonu Jha lived three hundred years before Vidyapati, but Malangia proceeds on the basis of stories circulating fifty years ago. He knows that Gonu was called Dhurtacharya, but does not know that Gonu was also called Mahamahopadhyaya! In Gonu Jha's time, Muslims did not live in Mithila; where, then, could a 'tahsildar's beard' have come from? The people say 'chhutahar'; change it to 'chhutha ghail'. The folk tale speaks of the beard of a tax collector; call it a 'tahsildar's' beard and on communal grounds pronounce Muslims oppressors. Then write a preface so intimidating that Ramanand Jha 'Raman' and others will be afraid to review it. The Satnami rebellion, which began in a quarrel between a foot soldier and a Satnami—a member of a progressive sect founded by Dalit and backward communities—was directed against Aurangzeb's policies, and a mosque was also burnt in its course. But Gonu Jha's tax-collection officer was not Muslim: that is not in the folk tale. If a communal storyteller has inserted his ideology into a narrated story and then acted dishonestly in writing it down, what has that to do with Maithili folklore? This is what happens if folk tales are not collected through fieldwork.

Mahendra Narayan Ram writes that folk tales do not observe caste distinctions; but how could Malangia accept that? Bhagat too is bound to appear in his narrative. The real reason he becomes an inseparable part of Malangia's play, however, is the dramatist's inherited belief in caste superiority. The drama has seventeen scenes, each roughly two and a half pages long. Until the fifteenth scene Malangia follows his old practice of inviting upper-caste spectators to laugh at the alleged speech of the 'lower castes'—a language of his own invention—and of creating a spurious humour through Bhagat's broken Hindi. Only from the sixteenth scene does he attempt to give the story a purpose, but by then the opportunity has slipped from his grasp. At a time when Prakrit or any other secondary language is no longer used in Sanskrit drama, Malangia's introduction of Bharata in an inappropriate context reveals his unfamiliarity with Sanskrit. It indicates reliance on secondary Hindi-language books about the Natyashastra rather than study of the original text.

Does Malangia mean that a play which is good to read cannot be fit for performance, or that a play written for the stage cannot be good to read? That is certainly the impression given by the Sanskrit line he quotes. If a drama does not stir its reader, how is a director to decide to stage it? And what precisely are its theatrical qualities: seventeen scenes of approximately two and a half pages each; a casteist idiom humiliating the so-called lower class; Bhagat's Hindi formula 'Samajhta hai ki nahin?' ('Do you understand or not?'); and the 'slapstick humour' allegedly produced by combining them? Anyone who opposes this and proposes a parallel Maithili theatre becomes, in this argument, merely a champion of the readable elements of drama, while the conservative casteist is represented as the champion of its theatrical elements! Would Malangia's caste-based sentence construction be acceptable in a twenty-first-century play in Sanskrit, Hindi or any modern Indian language other than Maithili? If not, why does a playwright who has not read Bharata's original Sanskrit Natyashastra repeatedly use irrelevant facts about Sanskrit drama eighteen hundred years old as a shield for this vocabulary? Does carrying a basket on one's head and a child at one's side necessarily mark someone as belonging to a lower class? In his Barahmasa of the courtyard he calls this class 'rad'; after several decades he has at least advanced to calling it the 'lower class'. The improvement is welcome, but very small for so long a period. How did Babaji enter the story, how did ganja enter it, and what relation does that have to the trees in the orchard? How could Malangia have smuggled in his caste-based syntax and broken-Hindi expressions without introducing Bhagat and the fictitious concept of the lower class? He tries very cleverly to conceal this fact, and consequently cannot rise above mediocrity. He therefore wishes to give his dramatic narrative a purpose but has not acquired the capacity to do so.

Authors, Special Issues, Institutions and Social Debates

67. Dr Babasaheb Ambedkar (1891–1956)

Abstract

Ramji Sakpal's family came from that village. He was the headmaster of a school in the Indian Army. Gaurangi, Nilakshi and Bhima were his wives. His fourteenth child was born to Bhima on 14 April 1891 and named Bhim. Ramji was then posted at Mhow ...

Keywords: Dr; Babasaheb; Ambedkar; 1891; 1956; literary criticism; Maithili.

Summary · Abstract

This chapter presents a dramatic-critical study on "Dr Babasaheb Ambedkar (1891–1956)". Babasaheb, Ambedkar, 1891, 1956 and Bhim emerge as principal points of focus in the discussion. On the basis of the examples, quotations and arguments available in the original material, the dramatic text, the configuration of characters, the structure of performance and the cultural context are examined, so that readers may understand both the critical structure of the subject and its wider context.

1

Ratnagiri is a town in Maharashtra. Near it is the village of Ambavade.

Ramji Sakpal's family came from that village. He was the headmaster of a school in the Indian Army. Gaurangi, Nilakshi and Bhima were his wives. His fourteenth child was born to Bhima on 14 April 1891 and named Bhim. Ramji was then posted at Mhow.

In 1894 Ramji retired from service. Bhim's mother died when he was only six years old, after which his disabled elder sister brought him up. His father married again and went to Goregaon in search of work.

2

Ramji Sakpal belonged to the Mahar community, treated as untouchable. He would wake Bhim early in the morning to study by reciting Kabir's couplets to him.

When, after retiring, he came to Kap-Dapoli in 1894, the education department of the Dapoli municipality decided not to admit untouchable children to its schools. Until then such children had been enrolled in them. Ramji therefore went to Mumbai and then to Satara. Bhim received his elementary education in Satara.

No barber would cut Bhim's hair, so his sister cut it for him.

No one would sit next to him at school.

A bullock-cart driver agreed to carry him only on condition that Bhim himself drove the cart while the driver sat at ease.

Even drinking water was a crisis: were the reservoirs not for him?

'I will acquire an education; then all these things will become available to me.' Bhim made this resolution.

There were two teachers at the school, Pendse and Ambedkar.

One day Bhim deliberately soaked himself so that he would not have to attend school. Pendse, however, sent him home, and he had to put on a dhoti and return to his lessons.

Bhim became Ambedkar's most beloved pupil. Ambedkar was a Brahmin. One day Bhim had brought no food and was sitting alone beneath a tree, hungry.

Ambedkar asked, 'Bhim, why are you sitting here by yourself?' Bhim said that he had not brought any food that day. 'So what?' Ambedkar replied. 'Come, today teacher and pupil will eat roti and vegetables together.' No one had ever treated Bhim with such kindness. He was overjoyed.

Ambedkar said, 'Bhim, I give you my family name. From now on you will be called Ambedkar.'

3

Ramji came to Mumbai. Bhim was admitted to Elphinstone School, completing his school education in 1907. Keluskar gave him the Buddhacharitam as a gift.

Bhim very much wanted to study Sanskrit at school, but he was not permitted to do so.

When Bhim was seventeen, he married Rama, who was nine years old.

Through Keluskar's efforts Bhim obtained a scholarship from the ruler of Baroda, and in 1912 he passed the BA examination.

The Baroda government appointed him to the rank of lieutenant.

After that, however, his father fell ill. Bhim came to see him, and his father was happy. Amid that happiness his father passed away. Such is death's play; Bhim wept aloud.

4

With the ruler of Baroda's scholarship, Bhim left for New York in 1913 to pursue his studies. Columbia University accepted his dissertation and awarded him the degree of Doctor of Philosophy.

Bhim returned.

His well-wishers decided that he should be honoured—honoured on a grand scale.

But he refused the felicitation. 'Use the money that would be spent on honouring me to provide scholarships. Educate the deprived.'

The ruler of Baroda summoned him to Baroda and directed that accommodation and meals be arranged for him.

Yet no eating house or lodging house was willing to receive him. A Parsi establishment sheltered him for a few days but then expelled him.

He began to weep beneath a tree. 'I had thought that by acquiring an education I would overcome what others called my defects. But now I am educated: why am I still being subjected to this torment? I resolve to break this system and strike at its roots.'

5

Bhim returned to Mumbai and became a professor at Sydenham College.

Chhatrapati Shahu Maharaj of Kolhapur was committed to the uplift of marginalised people. Bhim went there. At Mangaon, Shahu Maharaj declared, 'People who have been neglected, your liberator has arrived—Dr Ambedkar.'

Then came another blow. After the death of their son Gangadhar, his wife Rama sank into sorrow. She continued to raise Yashwant. Her husband gave very little time to the family, but she bore everything.

6

Leaving his teaching post, he submitted a dissertation on 'The Problem of the Rupee' to a London institution named 'Economic and Political Science'. He was regarded as a revolutionary, however; he therefore submitted a revised thesis to the institution's satisfaction and returned with the degree of Doctor of Science. After studying law he also began to practise in court.

On 20 July 1924 he founded the Bahishkrit Hitakarini Sabha ('Association for the Welfare of the Excluded'). He had come to believe that people must solve their own problems; others could not solve them for them.

On 20 March 1927 he led a people's movement at Mahad, where all drank water from the Chavdar Talav reservoir.

Thereafter he disseminated his ideas through the monthly Bahishkrit Bharat ('Excluded India').

On 2 March 1930 he led a mass movement seeking entry into the Ram Temple at Nashik. The priests, however, shut the doors, and the participants bathed in the Ram and Lakshman Kunds before returning.

In 1933, however, legislation was passed in Bombay Province permitting the excluded communities to enter temples.

7

In 1927 he met his former teacher Ambedkar. Bhim had lovingly preserved his teacher's letter, and teacher and pupil were overcome with emotion.

Bhim was selected for a committee of the Simon Commission; he recommended universal adult suffrage.

He attended the Round Table Conference in London three times and raised the problems of Dalits.

Then came another blow: the death of his wife Rama.

On 15 April 1948 he married Sharada Kabir, a Brahmin physician.

'Time is running short. The struggle seems fruitless. Hindu—and an untouchable Hindu! No. I shall not fail. Conversion.' The Buddhacharitam given to him by Keluskar would give him strength.

On 14 October 1956, on the day of Dashami, from nine to eleven in the morning at Nagpur, Mahasthavira Chandramani of Gorakhpur would conduct the conversion to Buddhism.

He, his second wife Savita, who was a Brahmin, and hundreds of thousands of others embraced Buddhism.

He placed the dust of the Buddha's feet upon his head and bowed three times.

8

Babasaheb Ambedkar became the Law Minister of independent India. He loved Sanskrit deeply and conversed in it (Aaj, Hindi magazine, issue of 15 September 1949; The Leader, Allahabad, 13 September 1949). At the All India Scheduled Castes Federation he proposed that Sanskrit should become the official language, but younger figures including B. P. Maurya opposed the proposal, and it was withdrawn.

His private library contained hundreds of thousands of books. He donated the entire collection to Siddharth College in Mumbai.

Even after attaining greatness, he did not distance himself from his community or his people.

He attained nirvana on 6 December 1956.

68. Videha · The Parallel Literary Movement

Abstract

A Water Burial Among the Crocodiles [Gajendra Thakur's Maithili novel, Volumes 0–1–2; Volume 0, Chapters (−100) to (−1); Volume 1, Chapters 0 to 100; and Volume 2, Chapters 101 to 200]: A Synopsis and Critical Evaluation in the Light of Indian and Western Literary Theory. Three volumes · Chapters −100 to 200 · 301 chapters in all. Part One — Volume 0 (the prehistory): A Literary Review.

Keywords: Videha · Parallel · Movement · Literary Criticism · Maithili

Abstract

This chapter examines ‘Videha · The Parallel Literary Movement’. Gajendra Thakur — A Water Burial Among the Crocodiles [Gajendra Thakur's Maithili kādambarī, Volumes 0–1–2; Volume 0, Chapters (−100) to (−1); Volume 1, Chapters 0 to 100; Volume 2, Chapters 101 to 200]: A Synopsis and Critical Evaluation in the Light of Indian and Western Literary Theory. The story of Garh Narikel, where bodies sink in the pond while names survive upon leaves, flows from the present towards the future in the main novel (Volumes 1 and 2). But Volume 0 travels against the current—back towards its roots.

A Water Burial Among the Crocodiles [Gajendra Thakur's Maithili novel, Volumes 0–1–2; Volume 0, Chapters (−100) to (−1); Volume 1, Chapters 0 to 100; and Volume 2, Chapters 101 to 200]: A Synopsis and Critical Evaluation in the Light of Indian and Western Literary Theory.

A Water Burial Among the Crocodiles

A Critical Study of the Complete Trilogy

Three volumes · Chapters −100 to 200 · 301 chapters in all

Part One — Volume 0 (the Prehistory): Literary Criticism

Part Two — The Main Novel (Volumes 1–2): Synopsis and Criticism

Appendix — An Anthropological Compendium (All Three Volumes)

Author: Gajendra Thakur

Part One

Volume 0 (the Prehistory) — Literary Criticism

One · A Narrative Returning to Its Roots

The story of the village called Garh Narikel, where bodies sink into the pond but names survive on leaves, flows from present towards future in the main sections (Volumes 1 and 2) of A Water Burial Among the Crocodiles.

Volume 0, however, travels against that current—back towards its roots. This is the prehistory: beginning with Chapter [−100] and proceeding to [−1], its negative numbering discloses twelve hundred years of extended memory upon which the entire narrative edifice of the principal novel stands.

In literature, a 'prequel' frequently becomes a commercial extension of an original work; here it is a philosophical necessity. If the central proposition of the main novel is that 'the crocodile devours the body, not the name', the origin of that proposition, its first articulation, its development, and its testing all take place in Volume 0. The volume is therefore no mere appendix but the epistemological foundation of the original work.

In this review I shall attempt to read Volume 0 from four perspectives: Indian poetics (rasa, dhvani and vakrokti); modern Western theory (memory studies, postcolonial theory and archive theory); the epistemology of Navya-Nyāya; and the Videha framework of parallel history. These four perspectives do not cancel one another; rather, they reveal the text's many layers.

Two · The Architecture of Negative Time

Volume 0's boldest structural decision is its negative chapter numbering. The sequence from [−100] to [−1] continually reminds the reader that the narrative is moving towards 'zero'—the starting point of the main story. This is no mere typographic device; it is a philosophical interpretation of time. The farther a chapter stands from zero, the deeper it lies within history. As the numbers advance towards zero, the reader approaches the present—but is never allowed to forget how deeply that present is indebted to the prolonged past.

> What stood at the beginning stood once more at the end. What had commenced with shell and silver converged again twelve hundred years later, on that night of the new moon.
>
> — Chapter [−3], 'The Circle Completed'

History in this architecture is not linear but circular. The shell–silver illusion of Chapter [−100] and the acknowledgement of the final witness in Chapter [−1] echo one another. The text returns to its origins, bearing in that return the weight of twelve hundred years. This 'circle' is not merely a structure but a theme: names die and are born again; villages sink and rise again; witnesses change, but testimony remains.

Three · Body and Name: The Central Proposition

The intellectual axis of the entire volume lies concealed in a folk saying repeatedly emerging from Garh Narikel's collective memory: 'The crocodile devours the body, not the name.' The novel's whole metaphysics is contained in this single sentence. The crocodile—that is, time, oblivion, power, violence and the market—swallows bodies; but when the 'name' (memory, record, testimony, identity) survives in speech and on leaves, the person does not perish entirely.

This 'name' is multivalent. It is a person's identity, but it is also a record—a register, an account, written testimony: the ordinary person's only resistance to power. In Chapter [−20] ('The Bridge of Names'), the idea reaches its fullest expression: the stone bridge is swept away by floodwaters, but the bridge made of names—the record of those killed in its construction—stands through the ages. Here the 'name' becomes architecture; remembrance becomes engineering.

> The crocodile eats the body, ah, but not the name. Leave the bridge of stone; build a bridge of names.
>
> — Folk song opening Chapter [−20]

Four · Rasa, Dhvani and Vakrokti

The Organisation of Rasa

The rasa structure of Volume 0 is plural, yet its predominant rasa is karuṇa, pathos—a compassion that stands against oblivion. Budhua's water burial [−90], the night of the epidemic [−71], and the market in bodies [−35] disclose grief in its dignity, without ever reducing it to mere shrieking. This pathos is accompanied by vīra rasa, heroism, though not the heroism of weapons: it is the courage of memory. Whoever preserves a name, whoever bears witness, is the hero of this novel. The philosophical chapters ('Shell and Silver', the debate over the proof of the self) also explore śānta rasa, tranquillity, in which the intensity of argument finally dissolves into peace.

Dhvani

The work's strength resides in its dhvani, or suggested meaning. The witness tree, the paired ponds, the crocodile, shell and silver—all signify far beyond their literal sense. The 'crocodile' is literally the reptile in the pond, but its suggested meaning brings together time, capital, authority and oblivion. When Chapter [−36] says, 'The old crocodile lived in the water; the new crocodile lives in the wire', the invisible fraud of the internet age is linked through suggestion with the ancient reptile. This continuity of suggestion binds twelve hundred years into a single thread.

Vakrokti

Kuntaka's vakrokti, or obliqueness of expression, is evident here in the arrangement of titles. 'The Bridge of Names', 'Paper in the Throat', 'The Bottom of the Well', 'Tower and Root'—every title is an oblique metaphor holding contradictions together. Poetic craft resides in this obliqueness: the author bends direct statement towards metaphor, deepening meaning through the turn.

Five · The Epistemology of Navya-Nyāya

The opening octet of Volume 0 (Chapters [−100] to [−93]) is a series of philosophical dramas planting Mithila's Nyāya tradition at the very root of the story. Here Vācaspati Miśra (Bhāmatī), Udayanācārya (Nyāyakusumāñjali) and Gaṅgeśa Upādhyāya (Tattvacintāmaṇi)—three peaks of Mithila's philosophical tradition—are present both as characters and as echoes.

Chapter [−100], 'Shell and Silver', forms the epistemological gateway to the entire novel. Mistaking a shining shell seen from afar for silver—the classical example of the shell–silver illusion—becomes an argument: whoever knows how to question can escape error. Perception, inference, comparison and verbal testimony, the four pramāṇas, cease to be merely scholastic categories in this drama and become practical instruments of living. The philosophical seed of the whole novel's insistence on 'vigilance'—its imperative to guard against rumour, deception and oblivion—is planted here.

> Illusion lasts but a moment, ah, while truth endures through ages; > whoever knows to question will not mistake a shell for silver.
>
> — The narrator's folk song in Chapter [−100]

The collection of 'stories, narratives, exempla and quotations' at the end of these philosophical chapters—the water on the highway and the flow of the Ganges, crystal and the hibiscus flower, rope and snake, tat tvam asi and ahaṃ brahmāsmi—is no display of erudition. Voiced by the narrator, among students and village folk, it becomes a living tradition. Scriptural 'quotation' is transformed into popular recitation: the intellectual refinement of Navya-Nyāya descends into the people's voices. This is one of the novel's original contributions: it makes 'philosophy' into 'folk culture'.

Six · Memory, the Archive and Subaltern Voices

From the perspective of modern Western theory, Volume 0 is a rich text. Its central concern—'Who dies, and who is remembered?'—engages directly with memory studies and archive theory. The demand to write down once again the names of those killed in bridge-building, their names struck off the contractor's papers ([−10], [−4], [−30]), imagines a 'counter-archive': the people's record against the official record of power.

The voice of subaltern studies is unmistakable in this volume. 'Light in the Leatherworkers' Quarter' [−91], 'The Owner of the Soil' [−54], 'The Market in Bodies' [−35]—these give voice to those whom history habitually silences. Yet the novel presents such voices not as the objects of 'rescue' but as 'witnesses': they speak, pronounce their own names and inscribe those names upon leaves. The novel thus offers a poetic response to Gayatri Spivak's question, 'Can the subaltern speak?' The subaltern can speak, provided the village remembers the name.

> The body merges with the earth, ah, but the name remains upon the leaf; whoever is remembered by the village cannot be erased.
>
> — Folk song from Chapter [−96]

From the perspective of trauma theory, the chapters on epidemic, flood, famine and trafficking turn trauma into 'ritual', not a 'cry'. To bind grief into folk song is a popular means of bearing trauma, different from modern clinical language but no less profound.

Seven · The Framework of Parallel History

According to the Videha framework of parallel history, 'history' is not what victors write but what people preserve in their voices. Volume 0 gives that framework narrative form. Twelve hundred years of 'official' history —kings, treaties and wars—remain in the background, while the foreground holds the 'parallel' history: who survived the flood, who preserved the name, who bore witness.

An elegant self-reference occurs in Chapter [−73], which recounts the origins of the tradition of the 'chapter-opening folk song'. Mourning the death of his daughter Radhika, Mohan plays a melody on his flute; in later generations that melody becomes the 'chapter-opening folk song'—the device that introduces every chapter in the main novel (Volume 1). The novel thus gives birth to its own literary device within its fictional world. This is a poignant form of 'metafiction': the form narrates its own origin.

> That same melody travelled onwards and became the opening of the story; at the dawn of every chapter it emerged as a folk song.
>
> — Chapter [−73], 'Mohan's First Melody'

Eight · Folk Song, Narrator and Stagecraft

Volume 0 moves among three narrative voices: the prose of the novel, the dialogue of drama and the verse of folk song. The philosophical chapters assume dramatic form, the historical accounts appear as passages of fiction, and the dawn of each chapter is announced through song. This threefold voicing prevents the narrative from becoming monotonous. The narrator links all three voices: a stage manager, a storyteller and a singer of folk songs at once.

The device of the 'chapter-opening folk song'—each chapter from [−73] to [−1] begins with a named folk melody (a mournful flute tune, a wedding sohar, a vigil song, a courtroom song, a bidesiya song of departure, a protest song and so on)—weaves Maithili folk music's immense treasury into the architecture of a modern novel. These melodies are no mere ornaments; each establishes the emotional disposition of its chapter in advance. The bidesiya melody embodies the sorrow of migration, the vigil tune the community of an epidemic-stricken night, and the sohar the hope accompanying birth. Folk form and narrative emotion become one.

Nine · Language and Style

The refinement of Maithili prose in this volume is a major achievement. In the philosophical chapters, the language is disciplined and dominated by Sanskrit-derived terminology (pratyakṣa, anumāna, prāmāṇya, abhāva); in the folk songs it is earthy, rhythmic and rich in vernacular forms (the vocatives 'he' and 're', the repeated words 'name', 'crocodile' and 'earth'). This dual register—the scholastic and the popular—also embodies at the linguistic level the novel's fundamental tension between philosophy and folk life, elite culture and common experience.

Particularly striking is the use of proverbs. Each chapter opens with a saying attributed to Garh Narikel, compressing its essence into one line. These sayings are invented, yet their vernacular rhythm is so convincing that they sound like genuinely ancient proverbs. The invention of such original proverbial speech is a rare skill in Maithili narrative writing.

Ten · Evaluation

Volume ০ is an audacious work. Rejecting the commercial ease of the prequel, it fashions itself as a philosophical and historical epic. Its architecture of negative time, its threefold voice, its remarkable conjunction of Navya-Nyāya and folk song, and its central ethical imperative—'preserve the name'—distinguish it in the contemporary Maithili novel.

If it has a limitation, that limitation is its density: the philosophical octet's tight network of argument may initially deter the general reader. Yet for those who pass through that gateway the volume opens an uncommon experience—one in which philosophy becomes narrative, history becomes folk song and memory becomes resistance.

> The lamp may go out, the curtain may fall, ah, yet let the name remain awake; the story of a village that preserves its names can never die.
>
> — The concluding benediction of Chapter [−১], 'The Final Witness'

❖

Part Two

The Main Novel (Volumes 1–2) — Synopsis and Criticism

A Water Burial Among the Crocodiles

A Synopsis and Critical Evaluation in the Light of Indian and Western Literary Theory

Author: Gajendra Thakur

1. Introduction

A Water Burial Among the Crocodiles is an extraordinary, expansive and multilayered work in the field of the modern Maithili novel. Divided into three volumes—Volume 0 (prehistory: Chapters −100 to −1), Volume 1 (Chapters 0 to 100) and Volume 2 (Chapters 101 to 200)—its 301 chapters refuse confinement within conventional plotting. Instead, the text interweaves folk epic, archival narrative, social realism, philosophical novel, mystery investigation, folk theatre, memoir and communal documentation of resistance. At the centre stands the village of Garh Narikel, yet it is far more than a geographical location: it is a world in which memory, soil, labour, water, caste, women's experience, folk belief, technological modernity and institutional injustice collide.

This criticism focuses primarily on the main novel—Volumes 1 and 2 (Chapters 0 to 200). A detailed literary analysis of Volume 0 (the prehistory, Chapters −100 to −1) is provided separately in Part One of this study. Together the three volumes constitute a single, unbroken journey through twelve hundred years of testimony.

The novel's basic ethical question is simple but profoundly serious: after a human body dies, what becomes of the person's name, labour, rights and memory? When the state, the market, the courts, universities, charities, banks, digital platforms, telephones, archives and caste-bound society reduce a human being to a number, a form, an account, a percentage, an image or the word ‘absent’, what remains literature's responsibility? The novel seeks an answer not in the victory of an individual hero, but in communal remembrance, the reading aloud of names, consent, testimony, folk song, children's games and unceasing vigilance.

The work is important because it does not simply depict injustice; it constructs a method of knowledge necessary for securing justice. Perception, inference, testimony, non-apprehension, memory, remnants, voices, bodies, footprints, seals, torn papers, discarded sacks, empty trunks, dried leaves, the smell of earth and the movement of water all become evidence. In this sense the novel is not just a story, but an alternative discipline of knowledge and ethical accountability.

This work calls itself a ‘Maithili kādambarī’ and contains three appendices: the Garh Narikel Folk Encyclopaedia, the original songs of the Nameless Planet episode, and the original philosophical inner narrative of Nyāya. These appendices are not decorative; they explicitly lay before us the work's foundations in folk culture, dream and śāstra.

2. The Work in One Sentence

Through the joint efforts of children, women, workers, the dead, repentant witnesses and communal memory, the names of those submerged in Garh Narikel's river, bridge, courts, platforms, markets, charities and archives are raised to the surface again, until the village itself becomes a ‘guardian of names’.

3. Detailed Synopsis

3.1 Establishing the Folk World

Chapter Zero introduces Garh Narikel's folk culture. Soil, water, fields, ponds, trees, floods, work songs, wedding songs, women's voices, children's games, folk deities, nirgun devotional song, marsiya lament, craftsmanship, occupational knowledge and caste inequality together create the novel's geography. This introduction establishes that the narrative to follow unfolds not in an empty modern space, but within a living landscape of cultural remembrance. In Garh Narikel, knowledge does not reside only in books and offices; it inhabits hands, ears, feet, songs, sayings and collective experience.

Channa Gachhi is the central site of memory in this world. At night, ghosts, spirits, demons, loth, water-drowned spirits and other souls of the prematurely dead play kabaddi there. The game is not entertainment but the dead's folk tribunal. Its fundamental rule—cross the boundary, preserve your breath, return with a name—becomes the formal principle of the whole novel. Whoever can return bearing a name remains present in history; whoever forgets a name loses the turn.

Chapter Zero assembles twenty-four folk episodes—from leaf-lamps on Dakahi Pond, the songs of rice transplantation, the samdaun of a daughter's departure, mourning songs, the silent song of aripan designs, the lamps of jhijhiya, Kabir's nirgun voice, and songs of court dates and popular justice, all the way to warnings against digital fraud. It announces that the first and final protagonist of this kādambarī is the people themselves—their songs, their memory and their consciousness of justice.

3.2 The Bridge Disaster, Drowned Workers and the First Struggle over Names

The narrative opens with urgency through bridge construction, a river accident and scenes of innumerable labourers' deaths. The official register contains thirty names, but the actual deaths are suggested to number around three hundred. Bisesar Paswan, Saryu, Kanhaiya, Shivnath Sada and many unnamed workers, whose labour lies buried within the bridge, remain absent, incomplete or distorted on paper. Bodies sink in the river, but names sink within the system.

Nand Aruni becomes the first alert witness to this discrepancy. He reads a torn gamchha, shoes, a tiffin box, an incomplete slip, a diary and the sound of a splash as evidence. Here 'splash' is not simply the sound of a body falling into water, but the sound of a system making human beings disappear. Nand's petitions, lists of the dead and diary take the story into courts, offices and a distant financial world.

3.3 The Crocodile's Expanding Forms

Across the opening chapters of Volume 1, the 'crocodile' gradually assumes multiple institutional forms. In court it is the 'crocodile of adjournments', devouring the litigant's years. During the epidemic, it transforms life into a market commodity through the 'price of breath'. On digital platforms and telephones it enters as online gambling, debt, deception, blackmail and invasion of privacy. 'The Market in Bodies' turns women's bodies, images, consent and dignity into commodities. 'The Dark River of Money' is the secret flow of illicit accounts, mule accounts, overseas channels, donations and financial crime.

Harvard's lectures on ethics, Edward Broom's civilised phrases, Chandrapal Batra's financial platform, Raghav 'Signal' and his disappearing messages, Lau Kin-Hung's nameless accounts, and Batuknath Hariharan's legal ingenuity together demonstrate that modern exploitation is not merely local thuggery: it is a coalition of expertise, prestige, technology, law, capital and the global language of ethics.

3.4 The Court of Channa Gachhi and a New Politics of the Defeated

Human courts give delays, red tape and decrees of victory; the court of Channa Gachhi demands memory, names and self-acknowledgement. Here the dead are not judges but moral mirrors. Even those who prevail in external courts are defeated before their inner tribunal. Their punishment is neither imprisonment nor execution, but reading and pronouncing the names associated with their actions, carrying those names home and bearing their weight.

One of the novel's most original features is that the 'defeated' do not raise slogans of revenge but set about their own work. Devika provides education against digital fraud; Meera establishes a forum for privacy, consent and the right to one's image; Ira reads names on an international ethical stage; Gop Kumar safeguards records; children establish a school of names. The meaning of victory therefore changes. True victory lies not in defeating an adversary, but in building a society where the next victim is not left alone.

3.5 The School of Names and Inheritance between Generations

Ananya and Aruni represent the next generation. They read the names of the dead aloud, answering 'Present'. Reading names is not simply reciting a list; it restores families, labour, unrealised dreams, bodies and rights. Chapters such as 'The School against the Screen', 'The Oath of Privacy', 'Three Pebbles', 'Pronouncing the Name', 'The Boat of Names', 'The Granddaughter's Notebook' and 'The Next Voice' turn the safeguarding of memory into an educational practice.

Three pebbles—home, fear and dream—become a principle of ethical education for children. They ask of each name: Where was that person's home? What was their fear? What was their dream? These questions restore the dead as whole human beings rather than data. Education here is not the fixed text of a book, but an exercise in hearing living testimony in the community.

3.6 Felling, the Commodification of Memory and a New Struggle

After Channa Gachhi is felled, the stump remains. It is wounded memory —destroyed, yet not lifeless. Municipal notices, heritage projects, tenders involving remembrance, memorial apps, Harvard research teams, processions of counterfeit ghosts and deeds of donation all seek to make memory into marketable property once more. Questions arise about ownership of the dead's stories, images, dramatisation, research and tourism. Meera defends the 'right to one's image', while Devika opposes the use of memory without permission.

Here the novel raises distinctly contemporary questions: Who may tell the victim's story? Who may retain their image? If the dead cannot consent, what roles should be played by family, community and dignity? Is a memorial an act of justice or a market in memory? The answers are not one-dimensional; the narrative consistently stresses consent, participatory decisions and respect for spaces left empty.

3.7 The Women's Assembly, Workers' Feet and a Constitution of Names

The women's night assembly constitutes one of the novel's ethical centres. After the male-dominated language of public life, women's voices reveal the material body of experience. Moisture in a shirt, cracked heels, a red thread, waiting for a son, wounds to privacy, domestic silence and caste humiliation become more authoritative than official testimony.

'The Workers' Feet' reads the history of labour not from the architecture of the bridge, but from bodily fatigue, cracked heels and sweat. 'Fasting from the Screen' redirects sight and hearing towards human faces. 'Satyavrat's Public Hearing' and 'The Constitution of Names' establish a communal ethical code: do not erase names, do not sell privacy, do not dishonour the body, do not put memory out to contract, and ask after the names of the absent.

3.8 Flood, the Crocodiles' Return and Partial Confession

Another flood returns the story to the elemental crisis of water. The crocodiles' return makes clear that a single victory is not a permanent solution. Greed can always return in new papers, proposals, institutions and technological forms. Lau Kin-Hung recognises the childhood wound of his namelessness; Batuknath offers a belated apology; Chandrapal realises that his entire life has become a mule account; Raghav's deleted messages finally become indelible testimony; Satyavrat acknowledges his silence.

The novel clearly distinguishes the causes of wrongdoing from its forgiveness. Childhood humiliation, fear and social injury may make crime comprehensible, but not innocent. Confession is necessary, yet cannot substitute for justice, restitution and public accountability.

3.9 The Elephant-and-Crocodile Parable and the Nameless Planet

Volume 1 ends with 'The Elephant, the Crocodile and the Child's Hand'. The novel gives the Purāṇic episode of the elephant and crocodile a new meaning. The conflict between the powerful elephant and the crocodile clutching it is resolved not by miraculous deliverance from above, but by a child's hand, the hearing of a name and communal cooperation.

At the beginning of Volume 2, Aruni and the children dream of a nameless planet. It is without suffering because memory has been erased; houses bear numbers instead of names. This apparent utopia is in truth a totalitarian regime of oblivion. Under the pretence of abolishing suffering, history, crime and relationships have been obliterated. The children play kabaddi among the inhabitants and bring names back. Ultimately Garh Narikel chooses the wounded Earth. This is not a choice of despair but an acceptance of responsibility: fleeing an imperfect Earth for a heaven without memory would be a moral evasion.

3.10 Keeping Watch over the Earth: From Seed to Justice

From Chapters 105 to 132, the narrative establishes a vigil over the Earth's elements and the social body. Seed bears witness to the future; stealing seed is stealing tomorrow's food. Soil raises questions of ownership, caste, acquisition, chemicals and debt. Water remembers; fire turns the ashes of burned documents into testimony; air is a collective right; the emptiness of the sky is not an invitation to escape, but a question of responsibility.

The Body of Words, the Soul of Meaning, the Vigil of the Voice, the Inheritance of Silence, the Debt of Memory, the Right to the Body, the Body of Labour and the Body of Justice—this sequence brings social justice down from abstract concepts into embodied practice. 'The Cage of Caste' reveals caste's subtle presence in tradition, food, marriage, touch, cremation grounds and kitchens. 'The Liberation of Gaṅgeśa' makes Mithila's great philosopher not merely a revered symbol but an embodiment of the right to ask questions. 'A Leaf of the Tattvacintāmaṇi' turns the epistemology of perception, inference, testimony and non-apprehension into an instrument of popular justice.

The chapters on grain, hunger, thirst, salt, taste, the shared plate and the republic of the kitchen clarify that justice is not confined to judicial decisions: it takes visible shape in fields, boundaries, water, hearths, food, shared seating and caste-free kitchens. Eating from one plate challenges the hidden structures of power within society.

3.11 A Novel inside a Play, a Public Hearing inside a Novel

In the episode of the Videha Theatre Festival, the novel transforms its first 132 chapters into a dramatic reading. The story rises onto the stage but does not surrender its substance by turning into a synopsis. The silence after the applause, spectators' testimonies, the procession outside the theatre, street performance and the travelling village forum carry art beyond presentation into social accountability.

The spectator is no longer a passive consumer but becomes a witness. The hand applauds, signs documents, commits crimes and also testifies. When theatre enters the street, the stage's hierarchy collapses. Performance rooted in folk life becomes collective writing and a travelling court.

3.12 Archival Investigation: From the Veranda to the City's Accounts

From Chapter 141 onward, the story assumes the form of an extended archival investigation. The veranda is an intermediate state of waiting; the records room is the darkness of obstructed time; the sack of waste paper bears witness to discarded lives. The name in a file returns to the doorstep. Fear begins to crack. The stain left by a seal appears darker on a hand than on paper. A knock at each door is made not by command but by permission.

The adulterated identity, the map of the network, the seal's shadow, the source of the order, the name behind the signal, the father's promise, the account of service, the debt of a donation, the iron trunk, the matching of consent notebooks, the consent of the dead and the warehouse's shadow—these chapters examine minutely how institutions, charity, faith, hunger, medicine and relief can become instruments for stealing consent. A thumbprint obtained on a night of illness or a day of starvation is not freely given. Consent manufactured after death is the cheapest piece of paper and the costliest crime.

3.13 Telephones, Voices and the Industry of Fear

Imprisonment by Phone, the Seal of the Voice, Traces of Removed Papers, the Stomach of Chandrapal's Shadow, the Warehouse at Imli Ghat, the Voice across the River, the City's Throat, and the Shells of Chandra Two and Chandra One—this sequence links the digital fraud network to social trust, pensions, lawsuits, sons abroad, women's names, the fears of old people and institutional voices. Criminals do not merely deploy technological tricks; they imitate family speech, the mother's voice, the cadence of official instructions, a fan's sound, station schedules and local patterns of trust.

Channa Gachhi's 'invisible court' becomes a safe place for victims to untie their fear. Knots are read slowly; they are not ripped open by force. The vigil over registers, doorsteps, seal-bearers, service ceremonies, door-to-door papers, the upstairs room, the seal's footprints and city accounts connect the local and urban strands of the crime.

3.14 The Final Layer of Crime and the Resurrection of Names

The Shadow of the SIM, the Door of the Service Centre, the Face inside the Phone, the Mask of the Voice, the Master's Room, Madhavesh's Real Name, the Queen within the Hive, Maheshwar's Seal, the Iron Box, the Blue Register, Dhruvesh's Chair, the Voice of the Silent Recorder, the Face of the Voice, the Summons of Breath and the Frozen Account—these chapters disclose the crime's multilayered organisation. Madhukar Madhav Mishra, Maheshwarnath Sevak, Dhruvesh and their associated organisations conduct business in names, women's accounts, voices, seals, aid lists and fear.

Freezing accounts is an act of justice, but the novel warns that the poor person's pension, a student's assistance or a legitimate household fire must not thereby be extinguished. The rigour of truth and compassionate discernment are both necessary. The chapter 'The Meaning of Water Burial' unfolds the title's central insight: water is not the criminal; the true force of submergence is a system that seizes the name after the body has gone. The silence of those standing on the bank deepens the burial.

'The Names Raised to the Surface' resists spectacle. The victim's permission, respect for the family's silence and the right to wait are indispensable. 'The Criminal's Earth' teaches the ethical discipline of preserving evidence. 'Morning inside the Trunk' brings Shivnath Sada's name out of false absence and back to his threshold. In the final chapter, 'Guardians of Names', the village reads again the titles of all 301 chapters. The dead hand over the staff of judgement to the living. The children form a circle again: whoever crosses the line must return with a name. The story pauses, but does not end, because justice is not a single decision but a continuous vigil.

4. Principal Characters and Communal Heroism

This is not the story of one hero in the conventional sense. Its true protagonist is 'the awakened community of Garh Narikel'. Even so, certain characters perform distinctive ethical and structural roles.

Nand Aruni is the first witness, archivist and ethical initiator. His diary, petitions and reckoning of splashes take the narrative from private grief to public evidence. His importance lies in the fact that he does not glorify impossible truths: he pieces together small objects, incomplete names and missing lines.

Aruni embodies the alert consciousness of the next generation, forming a bridge among technology, registers, dreams and folk memory. Ananya is the most compelling embodiment of children's moral intelligence. Her questions test complex institutional language against straightforward human standards. She is not a fearless warrior heroine; she accepts responsibility despite being afraid, and that makes her credible.

Meera represents the ethics of sight, the body, images, privacy and consent. Her role is crucial to the critique of contemporary visual culture. She rejects the assumption that victims' images, memories of the dead or women's bodies may be treated as freely available objects in the name of public interest.

Devika embodies resistance through education. She turns Ujjwal's death from a private shame into a social warning. Ira brings local names into the hollowness of international ethical platforms. Satyavrat Mehta represents conscience within the legal establishment—awakened late, burdened by the fault of silence, yet prepared for confession and public testimony.

Ba, Phoolkali, Surmani, Jagmaya, Shanti, Dhirmati and the other women of the assembly preserve folk memory, grief, consent, food, the body and ethical fortitude. The ghosts, spirits, water-drowned souls and the old ghost are more than the dead: they are metaphors of collective memory.

Chandrapal, Batuknath, Raghav, Lau, Broom, Madhukar, Maheshwar, Dhruvesh and the other antagonists are not uniformly demonic. They represent different coalitions of capital, law, technology, charity, prestige, namelessness, fear and the rhetoric of service. Some receive psychological histories, but the novel does not turn their wounds into absolution for their crimes.

5. The Characters' Accounts after the Entire Journey

After this long journey through three volumes and 301 chapters, if we sit beside the stump at Channa Gachhi and take account of who gained what, who lost what, and who disappeared where, the following reckoning emerges.

1. Those Whose Names Were Recovered after Death

Bisesar Paswan — He died at the bridge foundation and was marked 'absent' in the register. By the journey's end, however, his shoes, his name and his labour have become immortal in the village's enduring memory, on a clay tablet and in the testimony of an iron box. Nothing was gained that could restore him to life, yet his name was recovered—the novel's greatest 'victory'.

Saryu — A woman worker whose name officially did not exist because she worked under her husband's name. In the end, Satyavrat Mehta reads her name aloud in the courtroom. Her thumbprint, once invisible to the law, becomes the first lesson of justice.

Chhotu (Bholatun) — The underage son of a Musahar woman, whose real name was recovered from the village's collective memory. Muniya, Dhanesari, Nagina and many others: all their names are preserved in the final chapter's 'Roll of Silence' and on the clay tablets. Empty places are left for those whose names are nowhere to be found. As Ba says, an empty place also bears witness.

Ujjwal Jha — Victim of a digital-arrest scam, he took his own life. Although he lost his life, his death became the seed of the exposure of the whole network (Chandrapal Batra, Raghav Signal and Lau Kin-Hung). Through the struggle of his sister Devika Sah, his name became a symbol of the village's movement for justice: personal loss was transformed into collective awakening.

2. Living Characters Whose Journeys Reached Completion

Nand Aruni and His Lineage

Nand Aruni — The principal witness in Volume 1, he lost his engineering career through transfers and exclusion. But he left behind the principle 'One copy with Mother, one beside the water, one with the wind', which became the foundation of testimony preservation throughout the novel. Ba — The maternal voice, she remained alive to the end and saw three or four generations of her family walking the path of justice—her greatest gain. Aruni (Nand's descendant) — He witnessed the final courtroom victory through the reading of names and took up leadership of the village. Ananya — A central pupil of the school from childhood, she ultimately became keeper of the register, the village's permanent archivist; hers was the greatest responsibility.

Leaders of the New Generation

Ira Aruni — Born abroad, she challenged Edward Broom at Harvard and came to understand her family name as evidence rather than a burden. She lost faith in the hypocrisy of international institutions but rediscovered her roots. Meera (Mrinalini Arya) — A victim of invasion of privacy and blackmail, she nevertheless did not lose her love for Aditi or her dignity; she found the courage to speak as a witness rather than a victim. Devika Sah — She lost her brother Ujjwal forever, an irreparable loss, but through that grief emerged as the village's boldest voice. Phoolmati — Freed from a human-trafficking network, she publicly regained her real name and the right to say, 'My name is Phoolmati, not FM'.

Investigators and Advocates of Justice

Gop Kumar — He lost his corporate career through reduced privileges and exclusion from the folder, but gained credit for exposing the entire network and a measure of moral fulfilment. He devised the three-copy system. Soumya Ramanathan and Ramaiyya Subramanyam — Constant allies who earned trustworthiness and the confidence of the village. Satyavrat Mehta — He sacrificed the comfortable career of a government lawyer and old friendships, but entered history as a man who stood for truth against the state. Reading the names of the dead aloud in court became the defining testimony of his life.

3. Criminal Characters: Downfall and Partial Atonement

Batuknath Hariharan — He lost the lustre, status and moral authority associated with the Bar Council. His son's question ('Did you save justice or your profession?') shook him from within. In the end he apologised, too late to restore the wasted years. His accounts were frozen and his name entered in the register of offenders.

Chandrapal Batra — His mule-account network was completely exposed and his bank accounts frozen. The childhood wound of having his name distorted by a teacher was revealed as an unacknowledged root of his wrongdoing. He had been forced to live with half a name, only to be caught at last under his full name.

Raghav Somani ('Signal') — He had unwittingly deleted the last recording of his mother's voice, a loss that broke him inwardly. He wrote his last and most candid message, but his entire network—his game of 'networks without trust'—came to an end.

Lau Kin-Hung — A Hong Kong intermediary, he decided his final bargain through his memory of a childhood refugee identity, when he had been called by an incorrect number. His accounts were frozen, but he remained the most distant and elusive. The novel grants him no scene of personal atonement, only institutional defeat.

Edward Broom — The international face of the networks involving the bridge, medicines and gambling, he never receives direct punishment. Ira's questions and the village's rejection of his donation document strip away his ethical mask. Yet the novel clearly suggests that powerful international offenders of this kind frequently escape full punishment: 'Some criminals will flee; some will be caught' (Chapter 200).

Malvika Green, Madhavesh, Maheshwar and Dhruvesh — Intermediate operators who are exposed one after another, but whose individual endings the novel does not make explicit. The uncertainty is itself a comment on systemic crime: the names and ultimate fates of all the guilty can never be completely known.

4. Missing and Mysterious Characters

Ishan Dutt — The most mysterious character, one who never cast a shadow and had already been declared 'dead' in government records. Throughout the novel he offers information and courage, yet reaches no personal resolution at the end. He simply departs, saying, 'If one person dies, another will speak.' He remains not an individual but a collective symbol of unnamed informants. His 'disappearance' is itself his greatest truth: those who erase their identities to protect truth can never fully be encountered as individuals.

Shashibhushan Dev, Mahendra Pathak, Victor Halden and Divakar Lal — Corrupt officials from the beginning of Volume 1 who vanish from the narrative after Nand Aruni's transfer. Their accounts are never fully settled, a realistic depiction of impunity in lower-level corruption.

The Old Ghost, Hulasi, the water-drowned spirits, loth, demons, witches and the Brahma spirit of the peepal tree — These supernatural judges of Garh Narikel have administered justice to the dead for twelve hundred years. In the final chapter they voluntarily place their staff of judgement in the hands of the living: 'Let the living decide now.' They have never been defeated, yet surrender their central role and become watchkeepers only. This voluntary, dignified 'defeat' is, in truth, complete victory.

Conclusion

At the end of the entire journey, we realise that no single hero has won and no villain has been wholly defeated. What has won is the name, which rises again and again after death, forgetting and crime. What is lost irretrievably is life itself: the lives of Ujjwal, Saryu, Bisesar and countless unnamed labourers will never return. Yet names remain, along with the responsibility Ananya and the village children have taken upon their shoulders. In this sense the story is never fully 'over': so long as even one mouth says, 'I am here', the vigil continues.

6. The Title's Multiple Meanings

6.1 What 'Crocodile' Means

In the novel the crocodile moves beyond the boundaries of a natural creature to become a structural antagonist. The river crocodile is visible terror, but the actual crocodiles are concealed in court dates, digital platforms, banks, markets, universities, caste, charity, records, reputation, invasions of privacy, silence and the appetite for profit. The crocodile's defining features—teeth, grip, ambush, concealment under water and dragging prey below—become metaphors for institutional violence.

Crucially, the novel does not make any single person the centre of all evil. Each individual is a knot in the network; the crocodile's entire body is constituted by institutions, habits, conveniences and collective silence. In this sense the plural 'crocodiles' is profoundly significant.

6.2 What 'Water Burial' Means

Water burial is meaningful on at least five levels. First, it is the actual drowning of bodies in the river. Second, it is the submergence of names in registers. Third, it is the disappearance of personhood into debt, platforms, the body trade, telephones and accounts. Fourth, it is the forgetting of suffering within society's silence. Fifth, it is rebirth within memory: when names rise above the water, death is no longer the final word.

Thus, although the title is filled with pathos, it is not pessimistic. Water burial signifies destruction, yet water itself is also a medium of memory, testimony and renewal. The river may carry bodies away, but not names.

7. Principal Symbols and the Imagery System

Channa Gachhi is at once a people's parliament, an archive of memory, a court, a school and a stage. Its felling is an assault on history; its stump is wounded continuity; a small green point upon it signals rebirth.

A coconut leaf is an alternative page. Paper can fall subject to lies, cancellation and seals; the leaf is associated with the community, the seasons and nature's memory. Even a dry leaf preserves stories within its veins.

A splash is a sonic symbol. Initially the sound of death, it later becomes the sound of a platform breaking, a paper opening, memory awakening and an answer being given.

The name is the minimal yet supreme right of existence. It brings together person, family, labour, body, inheritance, justice and remembrance. In the novel a name is not merely a linguistic sign, but an ethical relationship.

Kabaddi is a metaphor of breath, boundaries, risk, return and communal rules. Crossing the line is courage; returning with a name is responsibility; preserving one's breath is memory; the voices of teammates are community.

The blank plaque, empty trunk, removed page, marks in dust and vacant chair are active symbols of absence. What is not there becomes present as a question.

Seals, accounts, registers, trunks, recorders and telephones are symbols of institutional embodiment. Such objects are not neutral; they bear impressions of human hands, fear, profit and history.

8. An Evaluation in the Light of Indian Literary Theory

8.1 Rasa Theory

The work's enduring emotional ground is compassion. Drowned labourers, waiting mothers, cracked heels, empty plates, erased names, the body trade, consent attributed to the dead and justice delayed for years evoke karuṇa rasa. This compassion, however, is not passive. Within it, raudra, vīra and śānta rasas develop and transform in sequence.

Raudra rasa manifests in the community's anger against injustice, but the novel does not let that anger turn into violent revenge. Vīra rasa resides in writing names, testifying, seeking consent, safeguarding records, breaking the cage of caste and untying the knots of fear. Adbhuta rasa arises from the ghosts' kabaddi, letters upon leaves, water's memory and dreams of the nameless planet. Bhayānaka rasa inhabits crocodiles, dark record rooms, counterfeit voices and water-drowned spirits. Bībhatsa rasa appears in the trade in bodies, manufactured consent of the dead, forged thumbprints and the conversion of human suffering into profit.

The final śānta rasa is not detached stillness, but alert ethical equanimity. The dead lay down the staff of judgement and the living assume the vigil. In Abhinavagupta's sense, the universalisation of pathos lifts the spectator above private grief towards an experience common to humanity. Yet this novel does not establish universality by erasing particular names: its universalisation preserves the specificity of names.

8.2 Dhvani Theory

In the light of Ānandavardhana's theory of dhvani, the work is exceptionally rich. The literal meanings of 'crocodile', 'water burial', 'splash', 'name', 'stump', 'leaf', 'breath', 'seal' and 'vacancy' are limited, but their suggested meanings are immense. The 'crocodile of adjournments' suggests that a court date is not merely a day but a mechanism that devours justice. The 'crocodile of the screen' transforms a digital medium into a psychological hunting ground.

Rasa-dhvani is particularly effective where a scene discloses its own significance: a blank plaque, a green point on the stump, a dead person's signature, children playing kabaddi while reciting names, Dhruvesh's shoes, dew on leaves. After such scenes, meanings reverberate within the reader.

8.3 Vakrokti Theory

According to Kuntaka's theory of vakrokti, poetic quality inheres in the distinctive obliqueness of an ordinary utterance. The novel animates institutional objects: a court becomes a pond, red tape becomes the hair of a water spirit, a cupboard becomes a dark chamber, dust a clerk, a seal a wound, an account a river, a register a watchman and a screen a crocodile. This obliqueness is not ornamentation alone; it is a method for making the structures of power visible.

The work is powerful at both the levels of verbal obliqueness and episodic obliqueness. 'The Novel Begins Again', 'The Story Has Not Ended', a novel inside a play, and the rereading of all chapters at the end are examples of structural or prabandha-vakratā.

8.4 The Principle of Aucitya

From Kṣemendra's perspective of aucitya, or propriety, the folk songs, kabaddi, ghost stories, river, leaves, women's assembly, shared plate and folk theatre emerge organically from the narrative world. Their conjunction of Mithila's folk life and contemporary institutional crises is largely apt and meaningful.

Nevertheless, the criterion of propriety also reveals certain limitations. The recurrence of maxims, songs, philosophical undertones and final ethical statements in every chapter at times makes the meaning too explicit. Where a symbol already speaks for itself, further explanation diminishes the space available for suggestion. Thus the work's conceptual propriety is strong, though a degree of artistic restraint seems necessary in places.

8.5 Rīti, Guṇa and Language

From the standpoint of Vāmana's rīti theory, the novel's predominant qualities are prasāda (clarity) and ojas (vigour). Its language clarifies meaning through accessible images, folk sayings and rhythmic aphorisms; vigour is particularly strong in scenes of injustice. The women's assembly, mourning songs, leaves, dew and salt also display mādhurya, sweetness.

The work's distinctive rīti may be called a ‘folk-archival style’: vernacular speech, administrative vocabulary, technical terms, songs, philosophical concepts and legal formulations penetrate one another within the same idiom.

8.6 Sādhāraṇīkaraṇa and Lokamaṅgala

According to Bhaṭṭa Nāyaka's conception of universalisation, private emotion becomes a shared experience through art. The novel transforms the suffering of specific characters—Bisesar, Saryu, Shivnath, Ujjwal, Phoolkali and others—into an experience embracing all those who have been forgotten. Yet this universality is not achieved by converting them into an abstract ‘poor’ or ‘victim’, but by preserving their particular names, castes, occupations, bodies and places.

From the perspective of lokamaṅgala, or the common good, in modern Indian criticism, the work treats literature as a means for society's ethical reconstruction. The school, shared plate, public hearing, theatre, constitution, vigilance over memory and preservation of records are active forms of the common good.

8.7 Lokadharmī and Nāṭyadharmī

Within Bharata Muni's tradition, lokadharmī performance is close to the natural conduct of life, while nāṭyadharmī is a stylised presentation. The novel combines the two. The ghosts' kabaddi at Channa Gachhi is stylised, metaphorical and nāṭyadharmī; workers' feet, women's heels, court verandas, discarded paper sacks and pension lists belong to lokadharmī realism. The Videha Theatre Festival consciously stages this duality.

9. Navya-Nyāya and the Novel's Epistemology

The work's most original intellectual achievement is its connection of Navya-Nyāya thought about pramāṇas with social justice. Perception is not restricted to what the eyes see: bodies, footsteps, smell, sounds, sweat, soil and the feel of paper extend its domain. Inference leads from dust, marks left by removed pages, tyres, breath heard in voices, the pressure of seals and the flow of accounts to an otherwise invisible criminal network. Verbal testimony appears in the victims' accounts, folk songs, women's voices and children's questions. Non-apprehension—what has not been found—is central evidence: a missing name on a list, an expected document absent from a trunk, a vacant chair, a removed page, a switched-off recorder, or consent that cannot possibly have been given.

This epistemology is profoundly democratic. Truth does not belong exclusively to experts, judges or universities. Dust, an elderly litigant, women's memories, children's questions, artisans' eyes and village speech help to establish evidence. Nevertheless, the novel does not endorse uncritical folk belief; it recognises the need to detect tampering, investigate, preserve sequence and copies, seek permission, and examine counter-evidence. A balance between popular knowledge and reason is thereby maintained.

10. Evaluation in the Light of Western Literary Theory

10.1 Aristotle's Mimesis, Plot and Catharsis

From Aristotle's perspective, the novel imitates life, yet it does not accept the conventional structure of a single linear action, one protagonist and one climax. Its plot is circular, episodic and wave-like. Each crisis returns in a new form. Causal relations are nevertheless present: the bridge disaster leads to the search for names; the search for names to courts; courts to the school; the school to the constitution; the constitution to archival investigation; and investigation to the exposure of financial and technological networks.

Aristotelian catharsis here is more than an emotional purgation through fear and compassion. The reader does not grieve and thereby become free of responsibility; instead, the reader assumes the ethical duty of becoming a watchkeeper. The work transforms catharsis into civic responsibility.

10.2 Lukács and Social Totality

Georg Lukács's realist conception of totality clarifies the novel's significance. The bridge disaster is not an isolated event; it is linked to the labour market, contracting, courts, banks, universities, epidemics, digital platforms, the body trade, philanthropy, caste, land, seed, food and global capital. The local village becomes a social totality connected with the world system.

The characters frequently take on the contours of social types: the lawyer, financial broker, technical operator, charitable guru, silent official, awakened child, and woman guarding memory. Typification clarifies the social structure, though psychological subtlety sometimes diminishes as a result. Herein lie both the work's Lukácsian accomplishment and its limitation.

10.3 Marxist Criticism

From a Marxist perspective, the novel offers a sharp account of the unequal relationship between labour and capital. The bridge is built with workers' bodies, while its benefits go to contractors, financial institutions and people of prestige. Workers' names are erased because a name demands accountability; numbers are more convenient for exploitation.

Commodity fetishism and reification pervade the novel at multiple levels: the price of breath, the market in bodies, the sale of privacy, the tendering of memory, seed patents, water privatisation, indebtedness through charity, the imitation of voices and accounts opened under women's names. Human labour and relationships become commodities; commodities—seals, accounts and platforms—acquire human power.

Donation and service become gentler forms of domination. A thumbprint secured in exchange for assistance is turned into future silence. This accords with Gramsci's conception of hegemony and consent: power endures not only through force but through trust, faith, favours, prestige and common sense.

10.4 Bakhtin's Polyphony and Dialogism

From Mikhail Bakhtin's perspective on polyphony, the work is exceptionally fertile. Folk song, the voices of ghosts, children's questions, legal language, technical messages, women's speech, philosophical undertones, administrative documents, maxims, letters, drama and silence all appear as distinct social languages.

The kabaddi game at Channa Gachhi is a carnivalesque inversion. The dead examine the living, children question officials, waste paper discloses the truth of the archive, and an empty chair rules over power. Hierarchies are overturned.

Nevertheless, complete polyphony is sometimes restricted by the author's strongly pronounced ethical voice. Explicit conclusions at the ends of chapters, philosophical undertones and recurrent maxims prevent different voices from following their independent paths to the end. The characters speak in many voices, but the ethical direction is usually predetermined.

10.5 Foucault: Power, Archives and Biopolitics

From Michel Foucault's perspective, the novel exposes the subtle mechanisms of modern power. Power is not confined to the police or courts: registers, hospitals, pensions, universities, identity cards, mobile phones, banks, cameras, aid lists and research institutions classify, measure and regulate bodies and populations.

'Thirty names, three hundred corpses' expresses the cruelty of biopolitical counting. Who is considered alive, who dead, whose death is legally recognised and whose grief can be publicly acknowledged—power makes these decisions. Data about privacy, voice and the body become instruments of modern discipline.

The records room, register, seal, consent notebook and blue list embody archival power. But the novel also constructs a counter-archive: leaves, songs, children's exercise books, women's memories, objects, dust and copies preserved by the community.

10.6 Derrida: Signs, Absence and the Archive

Through Jacques Derrida's deconstructive perspective, the novel continually unsettles binaries such as present/absent, alive/dead, paper/leaf, original/copy and centre/margin. The absent individual becomes all the more powerfully present in names, shoes, sounds and blank spaces. A removed page leaves its outline in dust. An empty trunk raises more questions than a full one.

A 'trace' is what remains after a crime. Meaning is not locked within one definitive document; it spreads across leaves, water, memory, bodies, voices and rereading. At the end, the rereading of chapter titles recirculates the archive: the text becomes a copy of its own history.

10.7 Memory and Trauma Theory

In the light of theories of collective memory, Garh Narikel is a community of remembrance. According to Maurice Halbwachs, memory is formed within social frameworks; the novel gives this insight concrete expression through folk songs, thresholds, trees, leaves, rivers, games and the annual reading of names.

Trauma is not simply an event that occurs once: it returns in the form of the 'splash', the platform, court dates, floods, voices and blank pages. Repetition begins as compulsive remembrance and later becomes conscious 'working through'. Testimony, the reading of names, theatre, the constitution and archival protection give trauma public meaning.

The work opposes turning mourning into spectacle. It regards the victim's consent, the right to silence and the need to wait as essential. This accords with the ethical principles of trauma literature.

10.8 Feminist Criticism

From a feminist standpoint, the novel makes a serious intervention in the politics of bodies, looking, consent, privacy, shame, domestic silence, labour and food. Meera raises the question of visual rights: who may view an image, publish it or profit from it? The women's night assembly gives voice to domestic labour and suffering invisible in public history.

'Consent of the Dead', 'An Account in a Woman's Name', 'The Queen within the Hive', 'The Shared Plate' and 'The Republic of the Kitchen' criticise the appropriation of women's names and labour by family and institution. Shame is shifted from the victim's head to the offender's.

Yet a number of women characters perform symbolic ethical roles; the plurality of their private wishes, desires, contradictions and individual struggles could have been developed further. The community of women is powerful, but particular women's psychology sometimes dissolves into a collective metaphor.

10.9 Postcolonial and Subaltern Perspectives

Postcolonial power is not merely foreign rule; it also comprises the subordination of local life through knowledge, development, universities, law, finance and language. The contrast between Harvard's platform of ethics and the testimony of a leaf in Garh Narikel is especially meaningful. Prestigious global institutions seek to turn local suffering into an object of study, while the village reclaims its authority over knowledge.

Can the subaltern speak? The work answers not with one voice but with a collective archive. Workers, women, Dalits, the elderly, children and the dead speak through different media. Nevertheless, the role of educated intermediaries such as Aruni, Satyavrat and Meera is prominent, leaving open the question of how directly the subaltern voice is heard and how much it reaches us through representation. The novel acknowledges rather than wholly resolves this tension.

10.10 Ecocriticism

The river, soil, seed, fire, air, sky, trees, leaves and crocodiles are not mere settings, but active ethical presences. Water remembers, soil questions, ash testifies, air carries both rumours and smoke, and trees give the community shade as well as records. This extends the boundaries of anthropocentric literature.

From the perspective of the blue and green humanities, the novel resists treating the river only as a resource. Water privatisation, seed theft, land acquisition and the politics of flooding raise questions of ecological justice.

A critical caution is necessary: although the 'crocodile' metaphor powerfully depicts institutional violence, it also risks turning an actual animal into a symbol of moral evil. In several places the work distinguishes the natural crocodile from its human counterparts; from an ecological perspective, however, the distinction could have been made clearer.

10.11 Reader-Response Theory

Blank plaques, empty pages, absent names, incomplete letters, silent recorders and the assertion 'The story has not ended' invite active reader participation. This structure corresponds to Wolfgang Iser's conception of 'gaps'. The reader must complete questions, remember names and make ethical judgements.

Yet at times the narrative immediately explains its own gaps. This reduces readerly freedom. Where a scene remains silent, the work is at its best; where every meaning is supplied with an explicit commentary, the reader's creative participation is restricted.

The supernatural here is indigenous rather than imported: the folk beliefs in ghosts, spirits, demons, loth, water-drowned souls and witches have already been presented with the authority of a lived tradition in the folk encyclopaedia of Chapter 0. Hence 'folk realism' is more appropriate than magical realism: the dead can become plaintiffs against injustices committed by the living. Episodes of digital arrest, voice imitation and mule accounts also connect the kādambarī with contemporary critiques of surveillance capitalism. The system that once struck names off lists now manufactures 'the voice of a name'.

11. Narrative Craft and Formal Design

The novel's structure is circular. The kabaddi game of Chapter 1 returns in the final chapter; the difference is that the dead play at the beginning and living children play at the end. Initially the dead demand justice; finally the living take over the vigil.

Each chapter's title, aphorism, folk song, narrative body and, frequently, philosophical undertone establishes a consistent rhythm. This lends the work an epic discipline. Repeated phrases—'The story has not ended', 'Name: Present', 'The crocodile devours the body, not the name'—function as refrains in oral storytelling.

The novel draws upon numerous genres: folktale, ghost story, mystery, social document, philosophical dialogue, song, letter, public hearing, dramatic reading, accusation, archival investigation, dream parable and children's game. This mixture of genres gives the work the breadth of a modern epic.

Metafiction is also significant. 'The Novel Begins Again' comments on its own narrative form. At the theatre festival, earlier chapters are dramatised. In the concluding chapter, all the chapter titles are read again. The text reflects on its making, rewriting and public use.

The author calls the work a 'Maithili kādambarī', and this designation is more than a label of genre. Appendix 3 narratively presents a classical debate about maṅgalavāda in relation to the final page of Bāṇabhaṭṭa's unfinished Kādambarī: the result of an auspicious invocation is not the completion of a book but the removal of obstacles. Thus the work connects itself both with Bāṇa's prose tradition and Mithila's Nyāya tradition. The architecture of each chapter—an aphoristic sentence, a chapter-opening folk song specifying its melody, prose narration, an oblique philosophical undercurrent and a concluding song—recalls both Sanskrit campū and folk dance-theatre.

12. Language, Folk Melodies and Stylistic Distinctiveness

The work's language creates a hybrid world of vernacular Maithili, scholarly terminology, bureaucratic expression, philosophical concepts and contemporary technological vocabulary. Brief aphoristic sentences are memorable: the river cuts away the embankment with its current, papers cut away the village with adjournments; taking a name to its home matters more than merely writing it down; the threshold is truth's first boundary of dignity; when help demands silence, a donation becomes a bargain.

Folk songs give the story orality, collectivity and rhythm. They are not mere decoration but instruments of labour, mourning, education, theatre and resistance. Women's songs and children's songs are particularly powerful bearers of communal knowledge.

The novel's imagery is often exceptionally effective: red tape is a water spirit's hair; a cupboard, the darkness of arrested time; dust, a clerk; a seal, a wound; a register, a map of fear; a green point in the stump. Such images make social abstractions palpable to the senses.

13. Social and Political Significance

The work questions the official narrative of development. Bridges, service, charity, technology, research and financial inclusion are all terms associated with the public good; yet without names, consent, safeguards and accountability they can become covers for violence.

The question of caste is integral to the novel's fundamental architecture. Workers' names, the shared plate, kitchens, cremation grounds, touch, Gaṅgeśa's life and testimony from the supposedly lowest households all demonstrate that justice remains incomplete without an examination of caste.

The work is not simplistically opposed to digital modernity. Mobile phones, records, copies, messages and platforms serve both as instruments of crime and means of resistance. The issue is not technology itself but ownership, consent, transparency and communal use.

The novel proposes alternative forms of democracy: a constitution of names, public hearings, shared kitchens, investigations based on permission, copies held by the community, children's questions and vigilance over memory. It does not reject legal institutions; it holds that the community's voice is needed to give them human meaning.

14. Principal Achievements of the Work

First, a powerful joining of locality and globality. Garh Narikel's grove is linked to Harvard, Hong Kong, banks, digital platforms and global capital without losing its own folk perspective.

Second, an ethical philosophy of names. Modern literature discusses identity extensively, but here the name becomes central on legal, social, emotional, philosophical and spiritual levels alike.

Third, the conjunction of folk memory and the methods of evidence. Ghost stories are not superstition but metaphors of suppressed history; leaves become alternatives to paper, songs become archives and children's games become a jurisprudence.

Fourth, a serious treatment of consent and the right to one's image. The ethical questions concerning victims' stories, women's bodies, images of the dead, research and memorialisation receive unusually extensive treatment in a Maithili novel.

Fifth, its epic scope through the mixing of genres. The combination of the social novel, philosophical thought, mystery investigation, folk songs, theatre and dream parables is the work's distinctive signature.

Sixth, an unsimplified form of hope. At the end, not all criminals have disappeared and not every case has been resolved. Some criminals flee, some are arrested, and some shelter behind religion or illness. Hope resides not in the claim that the ‘problem is over’, but in the continued vigil.

15. Artistic Limitations and Critical Objections

Vastness is the work's strength, but its scale sometimes diminishes narrative density. Across 301 chapters, the recurrence of name, memory, silence, testimony, vigilance, leaf, crocodile and 'the story has not ended' produces a ritual effect; however, the constant repetition also places an extra burden of meaning upon the reader. Editing out repeated restatements of similar ideas would make the effect more acute.

The aphorism, song and philosophical conclusion attached to every chapter provide structural uniformity but sometimes produce formulaic writing. Where the scene itself makes its meaning clear, the final explanation appears unnecessary. From the standpoint of dhvani theory, more space could have been left for the reader to interpret.

Chapter Zero's extended account of folk culture matters for world-building, but such expansive essayistic material before the narrative begins delays the forward motion of the story. Distributing some of it through appendices or the narrative itself would have produced a more concentrated opening.

The philosophical undercurrents of Navya-Nyāya are original, yet when classical examples are only loosely connected with the story they resemble stand-alone textbook passages. Where narrative and philosophy are organically linked—non-apprehension, testimony, inference, consent and evidence—the effect is extraordinary; where philosophy is merely displayed, the narrative flow breaks.

Some antagonists gradually become schematic types as they represent social structures. More subtle depiction of their private lives, contradictions, self-deceptions, relationships and pace of change would have increased the ethical complexity. Their confessions sometimes follow a similar pattern: the remembrance of childhood humiliation, recognition of wrongdoing and incomplete remorse.

The novel's ethical position is clear and firm, but clarity sometimes dominates art. The reader generally understands early on whom to regard as right. More room for moral uncertainty, irony and complex choices by characters could have made the work more psychologically multilayered.

The supernatural is organic to the folk perspective, yet talking objects, letters emerging on leaves and direct intervention by the dead may blur the boundary between metaphor and event for some readers. The work usually treats these as the language of popular memory; nevertheless, restraint at certain points could have intensified the effect.

16. Overall Critical Judgement

The value of A Water Burial Among the Crocodiles lies not merely in its immense size or multiplicity of subjects, but in its original conception that justice for human beings is impossible unless the social life of their names is preserved. The work breaks the narrow assumptions that death is solely a biological event, injustice merely a legal case, technology merely a tool and memory a sentiment. Death is a crisis in the relations among paper, body, family, history and the future; injustice is a structural network; technology raises the ethical issue of ownership; and memory is public responsibility.

From the standpoint of Indian poetics, this is a folk epic moving from compassion through heroism towards an alert tranquillity, enriched by dhvani and vakrokti. From the standpoint of Navya-Nyāya, it is a novel of evidence from absence, the authority of testimony and the social application of inference. From the perspective of Western theory, it is a multilayered text of social totality, polyphony, archival power, biopolitics, trauma and memory, feminist consent, postcolonial knowledge and ecological justice.

Its limitations lie in excessive length, explanatory repetition, formulaic chapter design and the typification of several characters. Yet these limitations do not destroy its primary achievement. Rather, they show that the work takes the risk of becoming a vast communal archive instead of an elegantly bounded psychological novel. Its form is frequently uneven because it attempts to hold disparate voices, songs, documents, theories, memories and wounds within one body.

Ultimately the novel's highest achievement is the making of a new ethical proposition: justice is not only the punishment of offenders; it also consists of restoring forgotten names, respecting victims' consent, saving archives, teaching children to ask questions, sharing a plate and putting into words the silence within oneself. The final green point at Channa Gachhi symbolises the belief that so long as memory remains a communal undertaking, no crocodile will ever completely devour a human name.

17. Epilogue

A Water Burial Among the Crocodiles is an ambitious, philosophical novel of folk life in modern Maithili literature. It tells the story of a village and thereby becomes the story of the world, without losing the village's speech, leaves, salt, earth and doorsteps in that vastness. Its final message is not reassurance but a call: read the names of the dead, hear the fears of the living, honour the ethics of evidence, and make justice a continuing vigil.

The work does not end, for beyond its final page the reader stands before the question of becoming the next watchkeeper.

Appendix

An Anthropological Compendium — All Three Volumes (0 · 1 · 2)

Key: 0 = Prehistory (−100 to −1) · 1 = Chapters 0 to 100 · 2 = Chapters 101 to 200

A · Category-wise List

Geographical Places — Villages, Hamlets, Mansions and Sites

Garh Narikel · Channa Gachhi · Coconut-Leaf School · Leatherworkers' Quarter · Musahari · Haripur Erosion · Thakur Mansion · Market in Bodies · Harihar Service Centre · Tetari Ghat · Imli Ghat · Old Bridge / Great Bridge · Harvard · Hong Kong · Meerut

Water Bodies — Rivers, Ponds, Wells, Reservoirs and Wetlands

Kamala-Balan · Ganga · Kosi · Twin Ponds · Pond of the Drowned · Dakahi Pond · Inner Pond · Dark River of Money · Well · Ahar (traditional reservoir) · Chaur (seasonal wetland) · Embankment · Small Pool

Trees and Plants

Channa Gachhi (Peepal / Witness Tree) · Coconut Tree · Mango · Tamarind · Bamboo · Bathua Greens

Animals and Other Creatures

Crocodile · Fish · Makhana (Fox Nut) · Elephant–Crocodile · Conch Shell · Snake · Tiger · Pigeon

People — Workers and the Dead (Principal)

Bisesar Paswan · Saryu Devi · Chhotu (Bholatun) · Salamat Ansari · Gopi Mahto · Rajnu Mandal · Kanhaiya · Shivnath Sada · Ujjwal Jha

People — Protagonists and Witnesses (Principal)

Nand Aruni · Ba · Aruni · Ananya · Ira Aruni · Meera (Mrinalini Arya) · Devika Sah · Phoolmati · Gop Kumar · Satyavrat Mehta · Soumya Ramanathan · Ramaiyya Subramanyam · Ishan Dutt · Ramlakhan · Madhav · Aditi

People — Offenders

Batuknath Hariharan · Chandrapal Batra · Raghav Somani ('Signal') · Lau Kin-Hung · Edward Broom · Mahavir Pathak · Malvika Green · Madhavesh

· Maheshwar · Dhruvesh · Shashibhushan Dev · Mahendra Pathak · Victor Halden · Divakar Lal

People — Other Characters and Register Names in Volume 2

Bhikhari Lal · Surmani Devi · Rani Devi · Dinbandhu and the Widow Ragini Devi · Phoolkali Devi · Ramratiya Devi · Jasoda Devi · Surajmukhi · Phulkunwari · Kamlu Paswan · Jagdish Mallah · Munna Paswan · Saurabh Mahto · Imran · Nageshwar Jha · Muniya · Dhanesari · Nagina

People — The Prehistory (Volume 0) and Philosophers

Mohan and Radhika · Sukhdev Mahto · Thompson Sah (Sahib) · Pratapsen · Kamala Devi · Gauri · Karu · Kalit · Gaṅgeśa Upādhyāya · Vācaspati Miśra · Udayanācārya

Supernatural and Folk Characters

The Old Ghost · Hulasi · Water-Drowned Spirits · Loth · Demons · Witches · The Brahma of the Peepal Tree · Salhes

Folk Festivals, Rituals, Dances and Song Genres

Sohar · Samdaun · Vidapat · Batgabani · Chaiti · Phag · Nirgun · Marsiya · Jat-Jatin · Jhijhiya · Madhushravani · Aripan · Chapter-Opening Folk Song · Proverbs · Dhol · Mridang · Flute · Nagara Drum

Folk Justice and Communal Institutions

Ghost Kabaddi · Genealogical Register · Blue Register · Queen's Account · Service Register · Constitution of Names · Festival of Names · Night Assembly · Public Hearing · Women's Assembly · Roll of Silence · Guardians of Names

Objects and Symbols

Clay Plaque · Bronze Bowl (Three Waters) · Torn Gamchha · Iron Trunk · Iron Box · Three Pebbles (Home · Fear · Dream) · Leaf-Lamp · Lamp · Ritual Pitcher · Betel Leaf · Areca Nut · Vermilion · Paag Headgear · Dhoti · Gamchha · Splash (Sound)

Crops, Food and Caste Communities

Paddy · Makhana · Finger Millet · Sugarcane · Flattened Rice · Curd · Paswan · Musahar · Leatherworker · Ansari · Mahto · Mandal · Sada · Mallah

Philosophy, Classical Texts and Modern Phenomena

Navya-Nyāya · Tattvacintāmaṇi · Bhāmatī · Nyāyakusumāñjali · The Four Pramāṇas + Non-Apprehension · Digital-Arrest Scam · Mule Account · Voice Cloning · Surveillance Capitalism

B · Detailed Tables

Geographical Places — Villages, Hamlets, Mansions and Sites

Name	Volume	Brief Description
Garh Narikel	0·1·2	The novel's central village; a living world of memory, labour, water and caste.
Channa Gachhi	0·1·2	The site of a felled peepal grove; the dead's folk court and stage for ghost kabaddi.
Coconut-Leaf School	0·1·2	A children's school beside Channa Gachhi's stump; centre of the register of testimonies.
Leatherworkers' Quarter	0·1·2	A working community's quarter in the village; a site of caste inequality.
Musahari	2	The Musahar community's quarter; Chhotu's home.
Haripur Erosion	2	A village damaged by riverbank erosion; origin of the 'Queen's Account' in Rani Devi's episode.
Thakur Mansion	0	The mansion of Pratapsen and Kamala Devi; setting of the inner narrative in Volume 0.
Market in Bodies	1·2	A metaphorical location for the trafficking network; the episode of Phoolmati's liberation.
Harihar Service Centre	1·2	An investigative lead; entry point into the archival inquiry.
Tetari Ghat · Imli Ghat	2 · 0·1·2	Ghats on the Kamala-Balan; places of folk memory.
Old Bridge / Great Bridge	0·1·2	A road bridge built over the Ganga; site of labourers' water burial.
Harvard · Hong Kong · Meerut	0·1·2 · 0·1 · 0·1	External centres: ethical hypocrisy, global financial networks and crimes committed from afar.

Water Bodies — Rivers, Ponds, Wells, Reservoirs and Wetlands

Name	Volume	Brief Description
Kamala-Balan	0·1·2	The village river; source of flooding and erosion, and an ecological agent.
Ganga	0·1·2	The great river; site of the Great Bridge and workers' water burial.
Kosi	0	Mithila's river of sorrow; a reference point for memories of flooding.
Twin Ponds	0	Linked ponds; the site of water burial in the prehistory.
Pond of the Drowned	0·1·2	A pond associated with water-drowned spirits.
Dakahi Pond	0·1	The pond of the leaf-lamp episode (Chapter Zero's folk encyclopaedia).

Name	Volume	Brief Description
Inner Pond	0·1·2	A metaphor for deaths suppressed within a household: 'water burial without water'.
Dark River of Money	0·1·2	A metaphor for the secret financial flows of illegal accounts, mule accounts and donations.
Well · Ahar · Chaur · Embankment · Pool	0·1·2	The wells, traditional canals or reservoirs, low-lying wetlands, embankments and small pools of the village's water geography.

Trees and Plants

Name	Volume	Brief Description
Channa Gachhi (Peepal / Witness Tree)	0·1·2	A witness tree enduring for twelve hundred years; even after felling, its stump retains memory.
Coconut Tree	0·1·2	The tree from which the village takes its name.
Mango · Tamarind · Bamboo	0·1·2	Trees associated with names of ghats and the folk environment.
Bathua Greens	2	Greens growing from a crack beside the threshold; an image of remembered devastation (Surmani Devi's episode).

Animals and Other Creatures

Name	Volume	Brief Description
Crocodile	0·1·2	The reptile; central metaphor of time, oblivion, authority and capital—'the crocodile devours the body, not the name'.
Fish	0·1·2	Pond creatures; an image of words crossed out of the register ('little fish').
Makhana (Fox Nut)	1·2	An aquatic pond crop; part of the folk economy.
Elephant–Crocodile	0·1·2	The parable of elephant and crocodile; an episode of rescue through calling a name.
Conch Shell	0	The philosophical image of the shell–silver illusion (Navya-Nyāya).
Snake · Tiger · Pigeon	0·1·2	Creatures appearing in parables (rope and snake, a tiger subdued through yogic power, blue and white pigeons).

People — Workers and the Dead (Principal)

Name	Volume	Brief Description
Bisesar Paswan	1·2	Died at the bridge foundations; 'absent' in the register, his name is finally preserved.
Saryu Devi	1·2	A woman labourer; her thumbprint becomes the first lesson of justice.
Chhotu (Bholatun)	1·2	An underage Musahar boy; his real name is recovered through communal memory.
Salamat Ansari · Gopi Mahto · Rajnu Mandal · Kanhaiya · Shivnath Sada	1·2	Names of drowned workers reduced to anonymity on paper.

Name	Volume	Brief Description
Ujjwal Jha	১·২	Victim of a digital-arrest scam; his death plants the seed of the network's exposure.

People — Protagonists and Witnesses (Principal)

Name	Volume	Brief Description
Nand Aruni	০·১·২	The original witness; source of the 'three-copy testimony' principle.
Ba	১·২	The maternal voice; guardian of folk memory: 'An empty space also bears witness.'
Aruni · Ananya	০·১·২	The next generation; reading names, leading the village and safeguarding registers.
Ira Aruni	১·২	Born abroad; challenges Edward Broom at Harvard.
Meera (Mrinalini Arya)	১·২	A victim of invaded privacy; initiator of the 'right to one's image' forum.
Devika Sah	১·২	Ujjwal's sister; a courageous advocate for education against digital fraud.
Phoolmati	১·২	Freed from trafficking: 'My name is Phoolmati.'
Gop Kumar	০·১·২	Preserver of records, creator of the three-copy system and exposer of the network.
Satyavrat Mehta	০·১·২	An elderly advocate; reads aloud the names of the dead in court.
Soumya Ramanathan · Ramaiyya Subramanyam	১·২	Continuing investigative allies.
Ishan Dutt	১·২	A mysterious informant declared 'dead'; symbol of anonymous whistleblowers.
Ramlakhan · Madhav · Aditi	১·২	Supporting characters who examine the account registers; Aditi is Meera's love.

People — Offenders

Name	Volume	Brief Description
Batuknath Hariharan	১·২	A glittering Bar Council career, legal cunning and belated apology.
Chandrapal Batra	১·২	Operator of a mule-account network; the wound of a humiliated childhood name.
Raghav Somani ('Signal')	১·২	A voice-imitation network; guilt over deleting his mother's last voice recording.
Lau Kin-Hung	০·১	Hong Kong intermediary; nameless accounts and institutional defeat.
Edward Broom	১·২	International face of the bridge, drugs and gambling networks; 'development with human dignity'.
Mahavir Pathak	২	A concealed name from Batuknath's earlier period, brought out by the investigation.

Name	Volume	Brief Description
Malvika Green · Madhavesh · Maheshwar · Dhruvesh	1·2	Mid-level operators whose ultimate fates remain uncertain.
Shashibhushan Dev · Mahendra Pathak · Victor Halden · Divakar Lal	1	Corrupt officials from the beginning who later disappear from the story.

People — Other Characters and Register Names in Volume 2

Name	Volume	Brief Description
Bhikhari Lal	2	A village character in an episode about the weight of a lock: 'The breath inside is heavy.'
Surmani Devi	2	Mistress of the first home visited on the journey of repentance.
Rani Devi	2	An elderly woman of erosion-hit Haripur; the first name on the 'Queen's Account' (aged seventy-two).
Dinbandhu and the Widow Ragini Devi	2	Ragini Devi gives public testimony for the first time.
Phoolkali Devi	2	Distinct from Phoolmati; an episode about differentiating names in the archival register.
Ramratiya Devi · Jasoda Devi · Surajmukhi · Phulkunwari	2	Women's names inscribed in ledgers and name registers.
Kamlu Paswan · Jagdish Mallah · Munna Paswan · Saurabh Mahto · Imran	1·2	Names associated with registers and mule-account episodes.
Nageshwar Jha	2	A living litigant in the Channa Gachhi episode ('But he is alive').
Muniya · Dhanesari · Nagina	2	Names preserved in the 'Roll of Silence' and on clay plaques.

People — The Prehistory (Volume 0) and Philosophers

Name	Volume	Brief Description
Mohan and Radhika	0	Mohan the flautist; his grief for his daughter Radhika gives rise to the tradition of chapter-opening folk songs.
Sukhdev Mahto	0·1·2	Resident of the village's southern edge; chooses forgiveness rather than revenge.
Thompson Sah (Sahib)	0	A foreigner carrying a notebook; questions village elders ('The Sahib's Notebook').
Pratapsen · Kamala Devi · Gauri	0	Figures in the Thakur mansion's inner narrative; folk belief associated with Gauri's hand.
Karu · Kalit	0·1·2	Recurring folk characters from the prehistory and the main story.
Gaṅgeśa Upādhyāya	0·1·2	Author of Tattvacintāmaṇi, founder of Navya-Nyāya and source of questions about the 'gateway to proof'.
Vācaspati Miśra · Udayanācārya	0	Authors of Bhāmatī and Nyāyakusumāñjali; basis of the philosophical drama in Volume 0.

Supernatural and Folk Characters

Name	Volume	Brief Description
The Old Ghost	0·1·2	A judge for twelve hundred years; ultimately hands over the staff to the living.
Hulasi	0·1·2	A spirit without hands; player in ghost kabaddi.
Water-Drowned Spirits · Loth · Demons · Witches	0·1·2	Souls of the prematurely dead in folk belief; members of the dead's tribunal.
The Brahma of the Peepal Tree	0·1·2	Folk deity inhabiting the witness tree.
Salhes	2	A Mithila folk deity and hero of oral epic; a folk-cultural reference.

Folk Festivals, Rituals, Dances and Song Genres

Name	Volume	Brief Description
Sohar · Samdaun	0·1·2	Folk songs celebrating birth and a daughter's departure or mourning.
Vidapat · Batgabani · Chaiti · Phag	0·1·2	Vidyapati's songs, journey melodies, seasonal songs and the rhythms of Phag.
Nirgun · Marsiya	0·1·2	Kabir's nirgun devotional voice and mournful marsiya elegy.
Jat-Jatin · Jhijhiya · Madhushravani	1·2	Folk dances and festivals of Mithila.
Aripan	1·2	The silent courtyard art of alpana; a sign of folk memory.
Chapter-Opening Folk Song · Proverbs	0·1·2	Folk-melody songs named at the dawn of every chapter, and aphoristic proverbs.
Dhol · Mridang · Flute · Nagara Drum	0·1·2	Folk musical instruments.

Folk Justice and Communal Institutions

Name	Volume	Brief Description
Ghost Kabaddi	0·1·2	The dead's folk court: ‘Cross the line, preserve your breath, return with a name.’
Register · Blue Register · Queen's Account · Service Register	0·1·2	The village's permanent record of names; a counter-archive distinct from criminal accounts.
Constitution of Names · Festival of Names	1·2	A communal code and celebration for protecting names.
Night Assembly · Public Hearing · Women's Assembly	0·1·2	Forms of collective justice.
Roll of Silence · Guardians of Names	1·2	The list of unspoken names and continuing vigilance over memory.

Objects and Symbols

Name	Volume	Brief Description
Clay Plaque	2	A commemorative tablet for one name at each of the grove's four sides.
Bronze Bowl (Three Waters)	2	Well water + Kamala-Balan + Ganga water: 'three kinds of testimony'.
Torn Gamchha	1·2	Not a sign of defeat, but a flag of labour, memory and courage.
Iron Trunk · Iron Box	1·2	Containers of sealed documentary evidence.
Three Pebbles (Home · Fear · Dream)	1·2	A principle of children's ethical education: three questions for each name.
Leaf-Lamp · Lamp · Ritual Pitcher	0·1·2	Leaf-lamps on Dakahi Pond; ritual lamps and ceremonial pitchers.
Betel Leaf · Areca Nut · Vermilion · Paag · Dhoti · Gamchha	0·1·2	Objects and garments of Maithili folk life.
Splash (Sound)	0·1·2	The sound of a body falling into water; the sonic mark of injustice.

Crops, Food and Caste Communities

Name	Volume	Brief Description
Paddy · Makhana · Finger Millet · Sugarcane · Flattened Rice · Curd	0·1·2	The village's crops and traditional foods.
Paswan · Musahar · Leatherworker · Ansari · Mahto · Mandal · Sada · Mallah	0·1·2	Working caste communities of the village; bearers of subaltern voices.

Philosophy, Classical Texts and Modern Phenomena

Name	Volume	Brief Description
Navya-Nyāya · Tattvacintāmaṇi	0·1·2	Mithila's tradition of logic and Gaṅgeśa's foundational text; tools for investigating injustice.
Bhāmatī · Nyāyakusumāñjali	0	Texts by Vācaspati and Udayana; foundations of the philosophical drama of Volume 0.
The Four Pramāṇas + Non-Apprehension	0·1·2	Perception, inference, comparison, verbal testimony and non-apprehension: categories for establishing testimony.
Digital Arrest · Mule Accounts · Voice Imitation · Surveillance Capitalism	1·2	Modern crocodiles of false-arrest scams, rented accounts, stolen voices and identity theft.

❖

A Water Burial Among the Crocodiles — Criticism of the Complete Trilogy · Videha Parallel Literary Movement

69. The Ram Bharos Kapari ‘Bhramar’ Special Issue: Literary and Institutional Debates

Abstract

Some people, both in Nepal and in India, have reservations about Ram Bharos Kapari ‘Bhramar’ because of his association with the Madhesh movement, and therefore will not contribute to the special issue devoted to him. Yet the parallel literary stream is accustomed to such responses. Bhramar restored dignity to the proletarian classes at a time when Mahendra Malangia and caste-bound theatre were putting words such as sholkan and raar into plays built around slapstick humour. This made Bhramar's intervention all the more important.

Keywords: Bharos · Kapari · Bhramar · Special issue · Literary · Institutional · Debate

Abstract

Some people, on both the Nepalese and Indian sides, object to Ram Bharos Kapari ‘Bhramar’ because of his participation in the Madhesh movement and therefore decline to contribute. The parallel stream, however, is accustomed to this. The special issue has not received fewer contributions than any other issue.

Gajendra Thakur — Editorial for the New Issue

Ram Bharos Kapari ‘Bhramar’ conferred dignity on the proletarian classes. While Mahendra Malangia and casteist theatre were deploying the words sholkan and raar in plays based on slapstick humour, what Bhramar did was especially significant.

He travelled from Raipur to Guwahati. A bhramar is one who wanders.

2

The original author alleges that the Sahitya Akademi in Delhi is hypocritically perpetuating Professor Ramnath Jha's suppression of the social and genealogical background of Gangesha Upadhyaya.

For immediate reference, I reproduce the following extracts from my Pañjī Prabandh, Parts I and II:

—

A source note states that this genealogical manuscript was subsequently uploaded in 2009 to Videha Pothi (www.videha.co.in) and Google Books.

The original genealogical references appear below:

Dūṣaṇa Pañjī — The Black Record

49.

21//10 From Chhādan: Jagadguru Gangesha, author of the Tattvacintāmaṇi.

188/2	Chamar woman	Mandar	Vabhaniyam	Chhadan
Gangesha, author of Tattvacintamani	Gangesha of Chhadan	Nai	Ratnakar's mother (unknown)	Gangesha
	Vallabha	Bhavai	Maheshwar
			Jive

From Chhādan: the author of the Tattvacintāmaṇi.

Gangesha's beloved was a woman of the Chamar community; five years after his father's disappearance/death, Gangesha, the author of the Tattvacintāmaṇi, was born. The record says that he was a descendant of the Chamar woman Medhā.

From Chhādan: Mahāmahopādhyāya Gangesha, author of the Tattvacintāmaṇi.

"An account concerning Mahāmahopādhyāya Gangesha, author of the Tattvacintāmaṇi, is available from an ancient pañjī [genealogical register]."

"Gangesha was born five years after his father had passed from sight": thus runs an ancient entry, recorded somewhere.

Devānanda Pañjī 39–2: From Chhādan, Jagadguru Guru Gangesha; from Vabhaniyām, Jayāditya, son of Sādhukar, and his wife.

Devānanda Pañjī 30=5: From Chhādan, the author of the Upāya, Mahāmahopādhyāya Vardhamāna; and from Khaṇḍvalā, Vishwanātha, son of Shivanātha, his wife, Gangesha; Mahāmahopādhyāya Vardhamāna / Supan / Harisharma.

3

In a book on Nagarjun—Yatri in Maithili—Kamalanand Jha credits him with giving Maithili literature a new direction. The original reviewer disagrees. For comparison, he cites Chandradhar Sharma Guleri's Hindi story Usne Kaha Tha: although an outstanding story, Guleri's literary output is limited, so crediting him with directing the whole Hindi short-story tradition on that basis alone would be an exaggeration. In the reviewer's judgment, Yatri's corpus in Maithili is smaller even than Guleri's. He refers to an observation by Rajkamal Chaudhary [Subhash Chandra Yadav, Rajkamal: A Monograph, p. 14]. Yatri's Chitra (25 poems) and Patrahin Nagna Gachh (44 poems) are mentioned; the latter received the Sahitya Akademi Award in 1968, after which, according to the original reviewer, Yatri's writing in Maithili almost came to a halt. On this basis, the claim of a sustained long-term influence is questioned. The author treats changes in Yatri's ideological life—going to Sri Lanka to become a Buddhist monk and, upon returning to his village, undergoing a second sacred-thread ceremony to reassume a Brahmin identity—as evidence of ideological instability. The article then questions Kamalanand Jha's understanding of Maithili literature, recalling the authors of the parallel tradition alongside those of the mainstream (Annexures 1 and 2). On Vidyapati, the author alleges that Vidyapati Thakur, the Sanskrit–Avahaṭṭha writer, has been conflated with the lyricist Vidyapati who preceded Jyotirishwar. He recommends the writings of the left-wing historian Vijay Kumar Thakur and says that his own essay on Vidyapati in Volume II of Prabandh Nibandh Samalochana addresses these questions. The Vidyapati depicted in the Videha logo, he states, is the pre-Jyotirishwar poet, as drawn by the artist Pank Lal Mandal, a recipient of the Videha honour.

Annexure 1

Chanda Jha (1831–1907), originally named Chandranath Jha, was born in Pindaruch village, Darbhanga. He was honoured with the titles Kavishwar and Kavichandra. He was Grierson's principal assistant in matters concerning Maithili. His works include Mithila Bhasha Ramayan, Giti-Sudha, Maheshvani Sangrah, Chandra Padavali, Lakshmishwar Vilas, Ahalyacharita, and a mixed prose-and-verse translation of Vidyapati's Sanskrit Purusha-Pariksha.

1

The house of justice is called the court;
Yet injustice fills the whole place.
Few there are who speak the truth;
All are intent on stealing others' wealth and hearts.
Deceit fills countless corners;
Whose dignity has it not diminished?
Says the poet 'Chandra': the court takes bribes;
All are complicit—whom, then, shall one blame?

2

By night and day, misery, O Bhola!
The cow, mother of the world, O Bhola,
Is slaughtered at the butcher's hand.
The magistrate has grown merciless, O Bhola;
Where shall we bow our heads?
No rain has come, O Bhola;
It has been an age since the clouds gave water.
By night and day, misery, O Bhola;
Life itself, in every body, hangs in doubt.
Village headmen flourish in comfort, O Bhola,

While the hungry poor wander in distress.
Who will endure the sidelong whispers, O Bhola,
That pass through the happy neighbourhoods?

3

Weapons have ceased to rule; lawsuits strike instead.
Brother hurls abuse at brother day after day.
The dishonest claim their rights by ruining the good.
Who can undo what fate has written on the brow?
I seek no wealth, no lovely women, no delicacies or jalebis;
Nor would I visit Indra's palace for diversion.
Merciful Goddess, this alone is my heart's desire:
To serve your lotus feet always with devotion.
Grain is dear; India falters—how will relief be found?
To the north and west, mountains and unbearable snow make the land impassable.
Opponents of religion loudly spread their wrong-headed doctrines.
Show your grace, Mother of the world, Tara of Mahishi.
What Mithila was, and what has she become?
The sage Yajnavalkya and the noble King Janaka—
Her knowledge and devotion have departed with them.
Vachaspati Mishra and the other world-teachers,
Who vanquished the disputes of Buddhists—
Has that Sharada departed for heaven?
Mislearning has increased its sport.
No one now cares for the rules of varṇāśrama;
Reverence for the Vedas is cast aside.
Worship, recitation, meditation and ritual gestures—
All have become games of deception.
Says Kavichandra: the court all day long
Inflicts suffering and sends many to prison;
Quarrels destroy both religion and wealth,
Servants of Kali's poverty and ruin.

4

What a dreadful age has come, O Shiva!
Cattle are in peril, religion declines—how long can the heart remain hard?
The company of the good is oppressed by rulers; thieves rejoice.
The earth swarms with those deemed low-born; little honour is paid to the high-born.
No one values religion, good conduct or affection; the wicked have the upper hand.

Even roots, tubers and fruit are scarce; grain has departed from the land.
No auspicious remedy succeeds; the mind is exhausted and bewildered.
Says Chandra: your grace alone, O Shiva, can end my sorrow.

5

Remember, remember, O mind, Shankara; know these times are terrible.
Whose heart is not stained when Kali rules through the king's hand?
One who serves Shiva, the compassionate, will not bring harm upon the people.
Know devotion as the wish-fulfilling creeper, a store of the supreme touchstone.
Do not become entangled in sensual objects; renounce them as improper.
Then in happiness, O 'Chandra', you will dwell at last in the realm of the crested Lord.

Annexure 2

1

Faturilal's Famine Poem / Verses on Famine

Faturilal's famine poem for the Fasli year 1281 (AD 1873–74)

[Grierson, Maithili Chrestomathy and Vocabulary]

Hear the story of the year eighty-one: / famine fell in every direction.
The rains failed that year; / how far can I describe the misery?
Rohini and the other rainy-season constellations / came and went as they pleased.
Mrigashira fulfilled only a little hope, / shedding a few light showers before leaving.
Ardra made an enormous show, / thundering on every side.
Pushya kept the earth's trees waiting / and turned away from the rains.
Punarvasu, held to be most auspicious, / was grudging with its rain as well.
Whatever seeds had sprouted / received only a scant, belated shower.
Magha became a miserly, barren season; / who in the world does not know it?
Purva gave no fullness and left nothing for the later rains; / whose story should I recount?
Uttara came and sat at home; / not even seven drops would fall.
Hathiya shut its horned head away; / even it was touched by decay.
Chitra showed no tenderness of heart; / it too became a plundering thief.
All the lunar mansions disgraced themselves; / the poor hid away in shame.
Those who came after reading astrology, / having mastered the geography of the earth,

Who knew geometry and algebra, / uttered only a few uncertain words.
They could not know the workings of Lord Rama's grace, / through which all deeds are done.
Whenever someone asked them about rain, / even they spoke in embarrassment.
When the rivers and streams were not replenished, / famine was bound to come.
Without water nothing sprouted in the world; / the earth herself was scorched.
The people who first sensed the approach of famine / were those who farmed the land.
Fate spared no side and favoured none; / it cut the rice crop at the root.
Neither kodo nor marua grew, / nor did any sama millet.
The young crops withered in their fields; / Providence had turned against us.
Who will protect the mortal world? / Where may one go in flight?
Even the netherworld is dried up; / everywhere there seems to be fire.
Shame upon that king Indra, / who withheld the waters!
Living creatures are distraught upon the earth; / no relief comes to them.
Neither winter crop nor kheri nor chin grew; / not a harvest could be seen.
In every household, men and women fretted; / the evil days had now begun.
The wealthy remained content in their minds, / keeping great stores in reserve.
They laughed, with rupees hidden in their homes, / while the price of a ser of grain rose.
Some bought kurthi or pulses / with the few coins they possessed.
Many kept fast after fast, / dreaming only of a meal of rice.
Some pooled their means to buy janer grain; / the poor could only sit and watch.
Two crops proved life-saving in that world: / pigeon pea and maize.
A terrible famine struck Tirhut; / its news spread everywhere.
In every house, men and women sought a little comfort / by chewing popped maize.
Landlords and moneylenders / still had heaps of grain in their houses.
Yet even they stared on helplessly, / their faces like those of the poor.
The merchants panicked at the sight of the times / and put up shutters in fear.
The shops of the towns fell silent; / the market stalls too were deserted.
Bodies grew thin, speech became confused; / how much suffering can one tell?

Men and women abandoned their adornments; / jewellery was now being sold.
Forehead ornaments, hairpins and earrings, / even nose studs no longer graced the nose.
Rings and toe rings, tiny tinkling ornaments, / armlets and bracelets were sold.
Moon-shaped necklaces, necklets and chains, / and beads of many kinds,
Suti, navagraha and pachkhandi ornaments, / down to the last lashuni piece.
Then not even household utensils were left; / fortune was utterly spent.
Pitchers, measures and spittoons, / neither basins nor trays remained.
Bowls, weights and betel boxes, / and the platters for eating,
Other utensils, even the finest household pieces, / nothing remained in the home.
Neither money, property nor house remained secure; / everything had been mortgaged.
Still hunger left nobody; / the stomach became an unfillable pit.
The Company descended as if by divine dispensation, / and Rama was its helper.
Hearing that Mithila was drowning in distress, / it hurried to the rescue.
It bought grain and loaded vessels, / filling sack after sack.
Tilanga soldiers were recruited at headquarters, / and Europeans disembarked.
Hundreds of thousands of measures at Hajipur, / and so many more at Patna;
At Bajitpur and Sultanpur depots, / who knows how much was stored?
Carts, oxen, wagons and camels moved through Bihar, / carrying all that grain.
At Mishra Kanhaiya's ponds / stood the first halting place.
King Lakshmishwar Singh, / the Maharaja of Mithila:
May the kingdom of Darbhanga remain steadfast; / may the Lord dispel its distress.
Ox-carts arrived by tens and hundreds of thousands, / with halts set along the road.
The first depots were Madhuban, Bhaura, / Jafra and Arer;
Benipatti and Pachmahala, / Kumhrauli and Kamtaul;
Hariharpur and Pindaruch—how shall I recount / how much work was done?
Baripokhar and Birsair, / and Pandoul, known to all;
Navhad, Sarisab and Bhatpura, / and farther south and upstream;
Jhanjharpur, Mahrail and Kanhauli, / with Madhepur an important centre;

Benipur, Kaman and Naraihi, / and let me name Phulparas;
Jhamna, known throughout the world, / Mahtha and Bachhaur;
Duhbi and Mahinathpur, / the work extended as far as Jainagar;
Baldevpur and Dhanga, / and the small market at Mirzapur;
Sibipatti and Kapsia, / and the headquarters depot at Saurath.
The officers came to Tirhut / to make provision for the poor;
Otherwise how many men and women would have died, / with children shrivelling away?
How many bodies would have mingled with the dust, / how countless lives would have gone!
Neither in-laws nor kinsmen could have saved them; / even those who supplied water might not have survived.
Everything everywhere seemed to change: / ponds, dust and roads alike.
Brahmins, scholars, Kayasths and Thakurs / remained distinct from one another.
Some had themselves registered as overseers; / some found employment as clerks.
In the name of charitable work they plundered rupees; / all began to profit.
Some escaped by furnishing bonds / when the officials were not upon them;
Others were beaten till their backs were broken, / bearing the punishment of a lifetime.
Some were abused until their bodies wasted; / many were sent away.
Parents and relatives wept at home: / their son had gone to prison.
Some houses were searched; / the clerk was found taking his share.
Some wailed in court; / others twirled their moustaches in arrogance.
Hearing of all this, the officer grew angry / and began appointing people to tasks.
The clerks were brought to shame, / their faces marked white with lime.
Among the Jog, Bikaua and ordinary lineages, / oaths and obligations multiplied.
Orchards, bamboo groves, oxen and buffaloes / became collateral or objects of dispute.
With that money came more noise and commotion, / and loans were taken through the court.
So many households fell into quarrels; / brothers and nephews separated.
The honourable Lieutenant-Governor arrived / at the sacred seat of Darbhanga.
With gentlemen and local notables / he assembled a committee.
.....
.....
.....

Sitting together with them, / the committee set to work.
A wonder of government enterprise: / the railway reached Tirhut.
They hurried to lay a road from Bajitpur, / rushing to the task.
They built bridges over the Hahaya and Gandak / and crossed the broad lowlands.
The Company, courageous and steadfast in duty, / was known, says Jagdishan.
By the pond at Lakshmi Sagar / it established a station.
The great Governor from Calcutta / sat with Shri Durga beside him.
The lesser lord from Agra / joined them, all seated together.
Commissioners and collectors gathered / and spoke without reserve.
These five sat upon the bench, / with the attendant party beside them.
News of Mithila's condition / reached the newspapers.
Hear us, foreign rulers, and come; / untangle the net of our sorrow.
Orders went to both Governors: / listen to our words.
Help the people, / why do you sit idle in comfort?
The high Governor called forth brave men, / officers and generals,
Majors, magistrates and collectors, / with colonels in attendance.
They procured grain from many lands, / paying everyone its price.
Mung beans, wheat and rice, / bajra and almonds,
From Doli, Patna and Bhatsar, / Delhi and Ajmer,
From Agra, Kanpur and Dhaka, / wherever grain lay in heaps.
The grain was dispatched to Tirhut, / piled upon carts and ox-wagons;
Elephants, horses, donkeys and carts, / accompanied by handsome soldiers.
Kshatriyas, Pathans, Mughals, / bold Rajput warriors—
Their splendour defied description, / like messengers of Hanuman.
At the head of the procession / marched the brave soldiers;
They carried spears and swords, / and bows and arrows in their hands.
They drilled on horseback / with their jamadar beside them.
Their appearance at that time / was beyond describing.
They worked in village after village, / amid broken roads and disorder;
Clearing crowds and groves, / they built roads and bridges.
In Patna district and Bhatsar, / within the Mahisaur pargana,
There lived a worthy man, / to whose house Lakshmi hastened.
Shri Dwarika Prasad, / devout and wise,
A distinguished court tehsildar, / known throughout the world.
Babu Ishwari Prasad of Diwati / came to Madhuban;
He instructed the superintendent / to visit every hamlet.
Many received substantial provisions, / and many took charitable relief.
Blessed, blessed be the British officers: / everyone's body found sustenance.

Poor and rich, all shouted victory, victory; / Brahmins offered blessings.
May the rule of Shri Raghunath increase; / may its throne endure a hundred thousand years.
The poet Fatur Lal recounts / the misery of this famine.
May the Governor and Government officers / keep Tirhut flourishing.

2

Radhakrishna Chaudhary, History of Mithila (available in the Videha archive)

"The famine of 1770 was unprecedented in the history of Mithila, and its population was reduced drastically. In 1873–74 Mithila experienced another famine of the same kind, described in Faturi Lal's Akali Kavitt, a poem on famine which has not been published. At the time, a railway project was undertaken both to relieve the famine and to give employment to labourers. Faturi Lal writes of the railway:

'The Company made a marvel of a machine, / fashioned with extraordinary grandeur.
Outstripping the wind, / it was set loose upon the plains.
Leaving its station, it rushed through the middle, / running at tremendous speed;
People scattered aside and stood away, / clearing its path.
The telegraph brought repeated news, / of every kind and from afar;
The ticket-holder grew alert: / the railway was coming.
It made a strange roaring sound; / where could one see its end?
Its machinery thundered so forcefully, / such was the greatness of the engine.
Guards, compartments and all the fittings / were astonishing to behold;
Filled with coal, the engine / sent smoke flying upwards.
A single whistle began to sound, / like the cry of an elephant;
Those who climbed aboard found / a place according to their station.
Crossing the full stream of the Ganges, / Fatur reached the other bank by train;
This is the astonishing poem / he composed about that wondrous thing.'

70. Dalit Discourse and Dr Babasaheb Ambedkar (1891–1956)

Abstract

From that village came the family of Ramji Sakpal, who served as headmaster of a school in the Indian Army. Gaurangi Nilakshi and Bhima are named as his wives. His fourteenth child was born to Bhima on 14 April 1891 and was named Bhim; Ramji was then posted at Mhow…

Keywords: Babasaheb Ambedkar; Dalit discourse; education; social justice; biography; history

1

Ratnagiri is a town in Maharashtra. Near it lies a village called Ambavade.

A family from this village was that of Ramji Sakpal, who was headmaster of a school in the Indian Army. Gaurangi Nilakshi and Bhima are named as his wives. His fourteenth child was born to Bhima on 14 April 1891, and he was named Bhim. Ramji was posted at Mhow at that time.

In 1894 Ramji retired from service. Bhim was only six when his mother died, and thereafter his disabled elder sister cared for him. His father remarried and went to Goregaon in search of employment.

2

Ramji Sakpal belonged to the untouchable Mahar caste. He would wake Bhim early in the morning for his studies by reciting couplets of Kabir.

After retiring, when he came to Camp-Dapoli in 1894, the municipal education department of Dapoli decided not to admit untouchable children into its schools. Until then, such children had been admitted there. Ramji consequently moved to Mumbai and then Satara. Bhim's early schooling took place in Satara.

No barber would cut Bhim's hair, so his sister cut it for him.

At school nobody would sit close to him.

The driver of a horse-cart would let him ride only on the condition that Bhim himself drove while the driver sat at ease.

Even drinking water was a problem: were water sources not meant for him?

“I shall acquire an education; then all these things will become available to me.” Bhim made this resolution.

There were two teachers at that school, Pendse and Ambedkar.

One day Bhim deliberately got himself wet so that he would not have to attend school. But Pendse sent him to his own home, and Bhim had to put on a dhoti and return to his lessons.

Bhim became teacher Ambedkar's favourite pupil. Ambedkar was a Brahmin. One day Bhim had brought no food and was sitting alone beneath the shade of a tree, hungry.

Ambedkar asked, "Bhim, why are you sitting here alone?" Bhim explained that he had brought no lunch. "What of it?" Ambedkar replied. "Come; today teacher and pupil shall eat roti and vegetables together." No one had ever treated Bhim with such kindness. He was overjoyed.

Ambedkar said, "Bhim, I give you my family name. From now on you shall be known as Ambedkar."

3

Ramji moved to Mumbai. Bhim was enrolled at Elphinstone School. He completed his schooling in 1907. Keluskar presented him with a copy of Buddhacharitam.

Bhim longed to study Sanskrit at school, but permission was refused.

When Bhim was seventeen, he married Rama, who was nine years old.

Through the efforts of Mr Keluskar, Bhim received a scholarship from the ruler of Baroda; he passed his BA in 1912.

The Baroda government appointed him to the rank of lieutenant.

Thereafter his father's health deteriorated. Bhim returned to see him, and his father was happy to see his son. He departed this life in that happiness; Bhim wept bitterly at his death.

4

With a scholarship from the ruler of Baroda, Bhim left for New York in 1913 to study. Columbia University accepted his dissertation and awarded him the degree of Doctor of Philosophy.

Bhim returned home.

His friends and relatives decided that he should be honoured with a grand public reception.

But he refused the honour. "Use the money that would be spent on my reception to provide scholarships and educate the deprived."

The ruler of Baroda summoned him to Baroda and ordered that arrangements be made for his lodging and meals.

But no eating-house or dharamshala was willing to accommodate him. A Parsi guesthouse allowed him to stay for a few days, but he was eventually expelled from there too.

He began to weep beneath a tree. "I had thought that if I became educated, this fault attributed to me would disappear. But I have acquired an education now. Why am I still being subjected to such suffering? I swear that I shall break this system and strike at its roots."

5

Bhim returned to Mumbai and became a professor at Sydenham College.

Chhatrapati Shahu Maharaj of Kolhapur was committed to uplifting the marginalised. Bhim visited him. At Mangaon, Shahu Maharaj proclaimed, "O people who have been neglected, your liberator has arrived—Dr Ambedkar!"

Yet another blow followed: after the death of their son Gangadhar, his wife Rama grew grief-stricken. She continued to care for Yashwant. Her husband spent very little time at home, but she endured it all.

6

He then resigned from teaching and submitted a dissertation on The Problem of the Rupee to a London institution named "Economic and Political Science". He was regarded as a revolutionary, however, and therefore submitted a revised dissertation in the form the institution wanted, returning with the degree of Doctor of Science. After studying law, he also began to practise in the courts.

On 20 July 1924 he founded an organisation called the Bahishkrit Hitakarini Sabha. He believed that people must resolve their own problems; others would not do it for them.

7

8

71. The Kamalanand Jha Affair: Pseudo-Criticism in Maithili

Abstract

The title of Kamalanand Jha's book Maithili Upanyas: Samay, Samaj aur Sawal (Maithili Novels: Time, Society and Questions, 2021) is misleading. It is a collection of a few syndicated, supposedly critical essays on certain upper-caste novelists. Its 263-page hardbound edition can only be sold to libraries, where it will decay. I bought it on Amazon for 405 rupees, but in my view it contains material not worth even five paise. One correction is necessary: without reading Gulo, a novel by the non-upper-caste writer Subhash Chandra Yadav, he disposed of it in two lines. I reproduce those two lines here for your amusement.

Keywords: Kamalanand Jha; Maithili novel; critical method; Gulo; literary controversy; textual criticism; allegations of plagiarism

The title of Kamalanand Jha's Maithili Upanyas: Samay, Samaj aur Sawal (Maithili Novels: Time, Society and Questions, 2021) is misleading. It is a collection of several syndicated, purportedly critical essays on certain upper-caste novelists. This 263-page book, in hardback, can only be sold to libraries, where it will rot away. I paid 405 rupees for it on Amazon, but it does not, in my judgement, contain material worth even five paise.

One correction is in order. Without reading Gulo, the novel of the non-upper-caste author Subhash Chandra Yadav, Jha wrote two lines and dismissed it. I reproduce those lines here for your amusement. You may already have read Gulo; if not, read it first, for the experience will then be even more amusing. With Subhash Chandra Yadav's permission, Gulo is available in the Videha archive at http://videha.co.in/pothi.htm.

"The novel's weakness is the author's political prejudice. Partisanship towards a particular politics cannot do justice to a work of literature."

Where politics is nowhere to be found in a novel, there can be no question of "political prejudice" or "partisanship towards a particular politics". Dhumketu and Yatri made use of the language of political prejudice and partisanship. Subhash Chandra Yadav's Bhot, published in 2022 and available with his permission in the Videha archive at http://videha.co.in/pothi.htm, does deal with politics; yet even there, his Bhagat-style narration has no need of the crutch of political prejudice or partisanship. Read my book Nit Naval Subhash Chandra Yadav, available at the same address.

Kamalanand Jha's Brahmanical caste prejudice against Subhash Chandra Yadav, without having read his work, sounds a warning bell. The Parallel Stream is alert to the way Jha, as I see it, adopts the guise of leftism to advance Brahmanism and sacrifice social justice. Landholders became communists to escape land-ceiling laws; now others seek shelter in leftism to protect Brahmanism. People of this kind have, in the author's view, inflicted great damage on communism.

(With Subhash Chandra Yadav's permission, his entire literary output is available in the Videha archive at http://videha.co.in/pothi.htm.)

In his biographical note he proudly mentions a Sahitya Akademi assignment to translate into Maithili—an assignment, I contend, obtained by depriving a non-upper-caste person of an opportunity and denying the rightful claims of writers from the Parallel Stream. This assignment, in my assessment, came not through merit but through a caste-marked surname and such manoeuvres. For people like him, Maithili is one line in a résumé; for the Parallel Stream, it is a question of life and death.

Dinesh Kumar Mishra's Dui Patan Ke Beech Mein is a historical autobiography of the Kosi River. He has written historical accounts of other rivers of Mithila as well: Bandini Mahananda; Bagmati Ki Sadgati!; Dui Patan Ke Beech Mein... (Kosi Nadi Ki Kahani); Na Ghat Na Ghar; Bagawat Par Majboor Mithila Ki Kamla Nadi; Bhutahi Nadi Aur Takniki Jhar-Phunk; The Kamla River and People on Collision Course; Bhutahi Balan: Story of a Ghost River and Engineering Witchcraft; and Refugees of the Kosi Embankments. I allege that Pankaj Jha Parashar, a member of the Sahitya Akademi's Maithili Advisory Board, translated paragraphs from these books into Maithili and published them under his own name as a novel—work that the pseudo-critic Kamalanand Jha then describes as this novelist's "research". Let me make clear that this writer, whom I accuse of theft, and the critic I call a pseudo-critic both belong to the Hindi Department at Aligarh Muslim University. The research is Dinesh Kumar Mishra's. He earned a BTech in Civil Engineering from IIT Kharagpur in 1968 and an MTech in Structural Engineering in 1970, and is qualified to carry out such research. People sometimes enrol in Hindi when they are exhausted by the failure to gain admission elsewhere; otherwise, Kamalanand Jha might have understood that this research could only have been carried out by a civil engineer. Perhaps he did understand it. Screenshots from the Hindi original and the Maithili text are appended below.

Dinesh Kumar Mishra is not from Mithila, yet he has written the histories of all its rivers. We are grateful to him, and the people of Mithila will never be able to discharge this debt. Once again, however, the author argues, those greedy for mainstream awards and money have shown ingratitude. Ten or twelve years earlier, Taranand Viyogi had come to Pankaj Parashar's defence, writing, in effect, that Parashar became so influenced by others that their material inadvertently entered his own work. Now Parashar has sought Kamalanand Jha's protection—but unfortunately for him the Parallel Stream is conscious of what, in the author's view, is Jha's use of leftism to promote Brahmanism at the expense of social justice. Landowners once turned communist to avoid land ceilings; some now shelter under leftism to defend Brahmanism. Such people have caused immense harm to communism.

All of Dinesh Kumar Mishra's books are now available in the Videha archive with his permission:

http://videha.co.in/pothi.htm

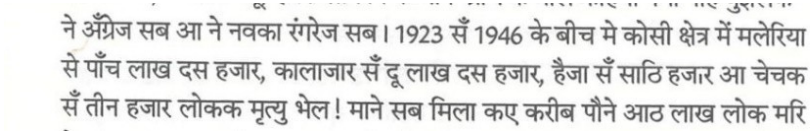
Recall, at this point, that when Bill Gates was asked whether the Xbox was being introduced late in India because of fears of piracy, he replied that Microsoft had never delayed the launch of any product for fear of piracy. Despite risks of this sort, therefore, we shall keep enriching the Videha archive. One rotten fish does not spoil every fish in the pond of the Parallel Stream. The fisherfolk here have been removing the rotten fish one by one, and will continue to do so.

I recommend two books to clear Kamalanand Jha's mind and vision. He should read the first, Sushil's Gambaali (novel, 1982), and the second, my Dushan Panji: The Black Book. Both are available at http://videha.co.in/pothi.htm. When my review of Sushil begins, I shall offer Jha the lesson I have reserved for him there.

A final blow against syndicated criticism.

I shall keep an eye on this pseudo-critic, Kamalanand Jha.

Original, Dinesh Kumar Mishra (Dui Patan Ke Beech Mein..., 2006): "It is worth noting that between 1923 and 1946, 510,000 people died of malaria in the Kosi region, 210,000 of kala-azar, 60,000 of cholera, and 3,000 of smallpox—a total of 783,000 deaths."
Pankaj Jha Parashar, accused here of plagiarism [Jalprantar, 2017, p. 103]:

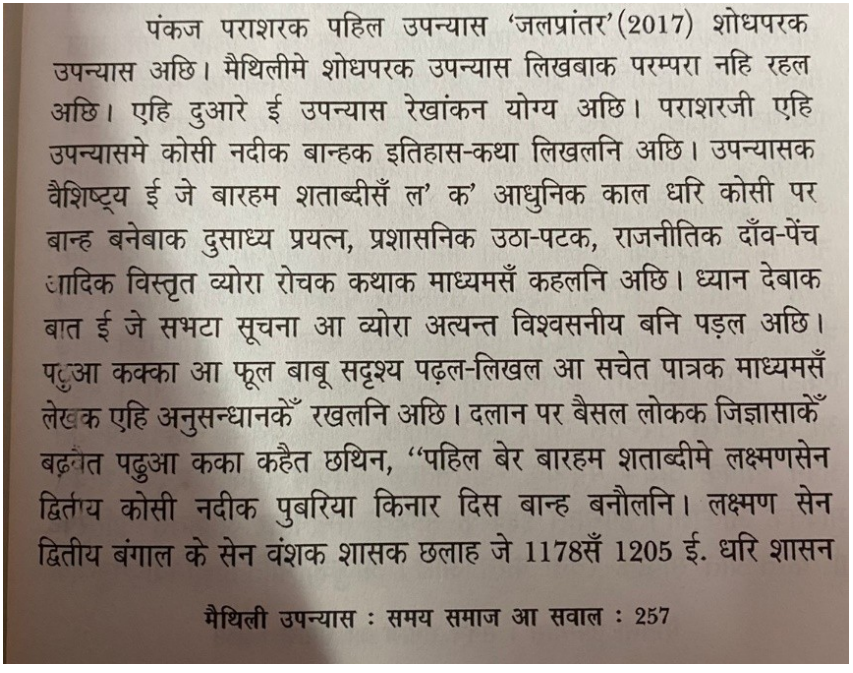


ने अँग्रेज सब आ ने नवका रंगरेज सब। 1923 सँ 1946 के बीच मे कोसी क्षेत्र में मलेरिया
से पाँच लाख दस हजार, कालाजार सँ दू लाख दस हजार, हैजा सँ साठि हजार आ चेचक
सँ तीन हजार लोकक मृत्यु भेल! माने सब मिला कए करीब पौने आठ लाख लोक मरि

English rendering of the visible facsimile (Jalprantar, p. 103): The excerpt mentions deaths in the Kosi region between 1923 and 1946, including 510,000 from malaria, 210,000 from kala-azar, 60,000 from cholera and 3,000 from smallpox, for a total of 783,000. The image is reproduced to document the textual comparison.

Original, Dinesh Kumar Mishra (Dui Patan Ke Beech Mein..., 2006): "In Bihar, India, the Kosi River was embanked in the twelfth century by a king named Lakshman II. For this he received the title 'Bir' from his subjects, and the embankment came to be called 'Bir Bandh'. Traces of this embankment can still be seen some five kilometres south of Bhimnagar in Supaul district. Dr Francis Buchanan (1810–11) conjectured that the structure might have been the outer wall protecting a fort, because it extended for thirty-two kilometres along the western bank of the Dhaus River, as far as its confluence with the Tilyuga. Dr W. W. Hunter (1877) did not agree with Buchanan's view that it was a fortification wall. Citing local people, Hunter said that most did not think it was a fort wall; they thought it was something else, though he could not say with certainty what. The prevailing view, however, is that it was an embankment built along the Kosi to prevent the river from shifting westwards. People also said it appeared that work on the embankment had been stopped abruptly."

Kamalanand Jha, called a pseudo-critic here, praises the novelist whom I accuse of plagiarism. See the passage he quotes from Pankaj Jha Parashar (Maithili Upanyas: Samay, Samaj aur Sawal, pp. 257–58):



पंकज पराशरक पहिल उपन्यास 'जलप्रांतर' (2017) शोधपरक उपन्यास अछि। मैथिलीमे शोधपरक उपन्यास लिखबाक परम्परा नहि रहल अछि। एहि दुआरे ई उपन्यास रेखांकन योग्य अछि। पराशरजी एहि उपन्यासमे कोसी नदीक बान्हक इतिहास-कथा लिखलनि अछि। उपन्यासक वैशिष्ट्य ई जे बारहम शताब्दीसँ ल' क' आधुनिक काल धरि कोसी पर बान्ह बनेबाक दुसाध्य प्रयत्न, प्रशासनिक उठा-पटक, राजनीतिक दाँव-पेंच आदिक विस्तृत व्योरा रोचक कथाक माध्यमसँ कहलनि अछि। ध्यान देबाक बात ई जे सभटा सूचना आ व्योरा अत्यन्त विश्वसनीय बनि पड़ल अछि। पढुआ कक्का आ फूल बाबू सदृश्य पढ़ल-लिखल आ सचेत पात्रक माध्यमसँ लेखक एहि अनुसन्धानकेँ रखलनि अछि। दलान पर बैसल लोकक जिज्ञासाकेँ बढ़बैत पढुआ कका कहैत छथिन, "पहिल बेर बारहम शताब्दीमे लक्ष्मणसेन द्वितीय कोसी नदीक पुबरिया किनार दिस बान्ह बनौलनि। लक्ष्मण सेन द्वितीय बंगाल के सेन वंशक शासक छलाह जे 1178सँ 1205 ई. धरि शासन

मैथिली उपन्यास : समय समाज आ सवाल : 257

English rendering of the visible facsimile (Kamalanand Jha, Maithili Upanyas: Samay, Samaj aur Sawal, p. 257): "Pankaj Parashar's first novel, Jalprantar (2017), is a research-based novel. Maithili has no tradition of writing research-based novels; for this reason the book deserves attention. In this novel Parashar writes a historical narrative of embankments on the Kosi River. Its distinctive feature is that, through an engaging story, it gives an extensive account of the arduous efforts to build embankments on the Kosi from the twelfth century to modern times, administrative upheavals, political manoeuvres and the like. What deserves attention is that the information and details seem remarkably credible. Through literate and alert characters such as Padhua Kakka and Phul Babu, the author presents this research. As the curiosity of the people sitting on the veranda increases, Padhua Kakka says: 'The first embankment was built on the eastern bank of the Kosi in the twelfth century by Lakshman Sen II. Lakshman Sen II was a ruler of Bengal's Sena dynasty, who ruled from AD 1178 to 1205 ...'"

कयने छलाह। एहि बान्हक अवशेष अहाँ एखनो भीमनगरसँ दू कोस
पश्चिममे देखि सकैत छी। एकटा पश्चिमी विद्वान फ्रांसिस बुकाननकेँ
अनुमान रहनि, जे ई बान्ह सम्भवतः कोनो किलाकेँ रक्षा हेतु बनाओल गेल
होयत। मुदा बुकानन के मतसँ डब्ल्यू. डब्ल्यू. हंटर सहमत नहि भेलखिन।
ओ साफ कहलनि जे कोसीक किनार पर बान्ह एहि दुआरे बनाओल गेल
होयत जे नदी पश्चिम दिस नहि बहय लागय।" एहि तरहेँ बान्हक मादे

English rendering of the continuation of the visible facsimile: "'... You can still see the remains of that embankment two kos west of Bhimnagar. A Western scholar, Francis Buchanan, conjectured that it may have been made to protect a fort. But W. W. Hunter disagreed with Buchanan. He stated plainly that the embankment beside the Kosi had been constructed to keep the river from flowing westwards.' In this way, concerning the embankment ..." [The photographed excerpt ends mid-sentence.]

Pankaj Jha Parashar, accused here of plagiarism [Jalprantar, 2017, p. 31]:

पढ़ुआ कका पछिला गप कें आगाँ बढ़बैत कहलखिन, 'फूल बाबू, कोसी नदीक बेसिन प्राचीन काल सँ मनुक्खक निवास लेल उपयुक्त स्थान रहल अछि। बारहम-तेरहम सदी मे भारत मे जखन कइक टा नदी सुखा गेल, तँ ओहि ठामक पशुचारक समाजक लोक एतय आबि कए बसलाह। तहिये सँ बढ़ैत जनसंख्या आ कोसी नदीक बदलैत प्रवाहक मध्य टकराहटि होमय लागल। नदीक अनियंत्रित धारा कें लोक बाढ़ि बूझय लागल। पहिल बेर बारहम शताब्दी मे लक्ष्मणसेन द्वितीय कोसी नदीक पुबरिया किनार दिस बान्ह बनौलनि। लक्ष्मणसेन द्वितीय बंगाल के सेन वंशक शासक छलाह, जे 1178 सँ 1205 ईस्वी धरि शासन कयनें छलाह। एहि बान्हक अवशेष अहाँ एखनो भीमनगर सँ दू कोस पश्चिम मे देखि सकैत छी। एकटा पश्चिमी विद्वान फ्रांसिस बुकानन के अनुमान रहनि, जे ई बान्ह संभवत: कोनो किला के रक्षा हेतु बनाओल गेल होयत। मुदा बुकानन के मत सँ डब्लू. डब्लू. हंटर सहमत नहि भेलखिन। ओ साफ कहलखिन, जे कोसीक किनार पर बान्ह एहि दुआरे बनाओल गेल होयत, जे नदी पच्छिम दिस नहि बह' लागय।' पढ़ुआ कका सँ मुँहजबानी एतेक रास ऐतिहासिक तथ्य सुनियो कए फूल बाबू सहमति मे मूड़ी नहि डोलेलखिन। जाहि सँ ओतय बैसल लोक सबहक उत्सुकता और बढ़ि गेलनि, जे गप मे एहेन कोन तथ्य रहि गेलै जे फूल बाबू संतुष्ट नहि भेलखिन? लोक कें बुझेलनि जे फूल बाबू शास्त्रार्थ के अखड़हा पर माटि फेकि रहल छथिन। पढ़ुआ कका कें आइ जोड़ीदार भेटि गेलनि!

जलप्रांतर / 31

English rendering of the visible facsimile (Jalprantar, p. 31): "As Padhua Kakka continued his account, he said: 'Phul Babu, from ancient times the banks of the Kosi River have offered people a suitable place to settle. When several rivers dried up in India during the twelfth and thirteenth centuries, their pastoral communities settled here and began farming. With the increase in population, collisions began to occur between the changing course of the Kosi and human settlement. The river's uncontrolled flow caused growing hardship. The first embankment on the eastern bank of the Kosi was built in the twelfth century by Lakshman Sen II. Lakshman Sen II was a Sena ruler of Bengal, ruling from 1178 to 1205. Remains of the embankment can still be seen two kos west of Bhimnagar. A Western scholar, Francis Buchanan, believed it might have been built to defend a fort; W. W. Hunter did not agree with him and stated clearly that the embankment was built on the Kosi to prevent the river moving west.' Padhua Kakka was putting these historical facts before the assembly. Phul Babu grew stubborn and would not accept what the elderly men had said. What, he asked, had the authorities done when the flood came? The people hurled mud at Phul Babu's stubbornness. Several readers arrived at Padhua Kakka's place."

Original, Dinesh Kumar Mishra (Dui Patan Ke Beech Mein..., 2006): "The terrifying force of the Kosi can be glimpsed in the account of Firoz Shah Tughlaq's army returning from Bengal to Delhi in 1354. It is said that, when the Sultan's forces reached the Kosi, they saw Haji Shamsuddin Ilyas's army standing on the opposite bank, ready for battle. This was the same Haji Shamsuddin who founded the towns of Hajipur and Samastipur. Firoz's forces appear to have halted somewhere near Kursela, unsure what to do. The speed of the river barred their advance. Eventually they decided to travel north along its bank, taking soundings wherever a crossing seemed possible. The Sultan's army advanced nearly one hundred kos upstream and crossed near Jiyaran, at the point where the river descended from the mountains to the plains. Though the river was narrower there, its current was so fierce that huge boulders weighing five hundred maunds were swept downstream like straws. At the place where a crossing seemed feasible, the Sultan stationed rows of elephants on both sides, suspending ropes from the lower row to rescue anyone carried away by the current. Shamsuddin had never imagined that the Sultan's army could cross the Kosi. On learning that it had succeeded, he fled."

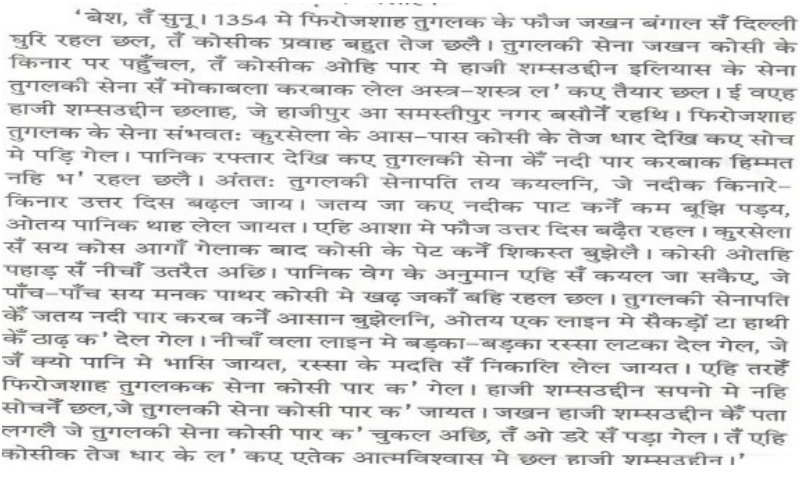
Pankaj Jha Parashar, accused here of plagiarism [Jalprantar, 2017, p. 105]:



'बेश, तँ सुनू। 1354 मे फिरोजशाह तुगलक के फौज जखन बंगाल सँ दिल्ली घुरि रहल छल, तँ कोसीक प्रवाह बहुत तेज छलै। तुगलकी सेना जखन कोसी के किनार पर पहुँचल, तँ कोसीक ओहि पार मे हाजी शम्सउद्दीन इलियास के सेना तुगलकी सेना सँ मोकाबला करबाक लेल अस्त्र–शस्त्र ल' कए तैयार छल। ई वएह हाजी शम्सउद्दीन छलाह, जे हाजीपुर आ समस्तीपुर नगर बसौनैं रहथि। फिरोजशाह तुगलक के सेना संभवतः कुरसेला के आस–पास कोसी के तेज धार देखि कए सोच मे पड़ि गेल। पानिक रफ्तार देखि कए तुगलकी सेना कैं नदी पार करबाक हिम्मत नहि भ' रहल छलै। अंततः तुगलकी सेनापति तय कयलनि, जे नदीक किनारे–किनार उत्तर दिस बढ़ल जाय। जतय जा कए नदीक पाट कनैं कम बूझि पड़य, ओतय पानिक थाह लेल जायत। एहि आशा मे फौज उत्तर दिस बढ़ैत रहल। कुरसेला सँ सय कोस आगाँ गेलाक बाद कोसी के पेट कनैं शिकस्त बुझेलै। कोसी ओतहि पहाड़ सँ नीचाँ उतरैत अछि। पानिक वेग के अनुमान एहि सँ कयल जा सकैए, जे पाँच–पाँच सय मनक पाथर कोसी मे खढ़ जकाँ बहि रहल छल। तुगलकी सेनापति कैं जतय नदी पार करब कनैं आसान बुझेलनि, ओतय एक लाइन मे सैकड़ों टा हाथी कैं ठाढ़ क' देल गेल। नीचाँ चला लाइन मे बड़का–बड़का रस्सा लटका देल गेल, जे जँ क्यो पानि मे भासि जायत, रस्सा के मदति सँ निकालि लेल जायत। एहि तरहेँ फिरोजशाह तुगलकक सेना कोसी पार क' गेल। हाजी शम्सउद्दीन सपनो मे नहि सोचनैं छल,जे तुगलकी सेना कोसी पार क' जायत। जखन हाजी शम्सउद्दीन कैं पता लगलै जे तुगलकी सेना कोसी पार क' चुकल अछि, तँ ओ डरे सँ पड़ा गेल। तँ एहि कोसीक तेज धार के ल' कए एतेक आत्मविश्वास मे छल हाजी शम्सउद्दीन।'

English rendering of the visible facsimile (Jalprantar, p. 105): "'Brother, listen. In 1354, as Firoz Shah Tughlaq's army was returning from Bengal to Delhi, it reached the bank of the Kosi. There it encountered the army of Haji Shamsuddin Ilyas, ready to fight on the other side. The Kosi's swift current kept the Sultan's troops from advancing. They resolved to move north along the bank until they found a place to cross. After travelling some hundred kos, they reached a crossing near Jiyaran. There the river was narrow but its flow so violent that huge boulders were swept away like straw. The Sultan had elephants arranged in lines on either side of the crossing and ropes hung below, so that anyone carried away could be rescued. Shamsuddin had never expected the Sultan's army to cross the river; when he learned that they had done so, he fled.'" [Only the portion visible in the photographed excerpt is rendered here.]

Comments by Maithili writers on the Kamalanand Jha controversy

.....

Who is the novelist—Pankaj Parashar (the novel Jal Prantar)?

Sad.

RabindraChaudhary

.....

Extremely unfortunate, objectionable and criminal conduct.

KumarManojKashyap

.....

I am deeply troubled after reading all this.

R N Mishra

.....

Unfortunate.

Kalpna JhaPatna

.....

Good heavens! Then who is this person?

Pankaj Parashar (the novel Jal Prantar).

Oh God! So he really is a thief.

Umesh Mandal

.....

Gaurinath:

Good. It is necessary to expose such a thief.

Pankaj Parashar (the novel Jal Prantar).

His entire literary career rests on theft, and there is no shortage in Maithili of people willing to patronise him.

.....

Such thieves are always in the forefront when it comes to harming Maithili and Mithila.

JhaPrasanna

.....

He should be taken to court.

Yogendra Pathak Viyogi

+91 98310 37532

.....

SubhashChandraYadav: I condemn it. The thief must be exposed.

.....

Extremely sad and reprehensible.

ManojPathak

.....

Respectful thanks.

He could have quoted it; but the source must be acknowledged. Otherwise it is considered literary plagiarism.

RamanandMandal

.....

Thank you.

VidehaKeshavBhardwajDelhi

.....

Nabo Narayan Mishra

An unfortunate situation.

.....

Mukund Mayank

Oh

.....

Pradeep Pushp

A very bad thing.

.....

Abhilash Thakur ·

A despicable act! Shameful.

.....

Ajit Kumar Jha

One wonders whether people with such tendencies have any sense of shame. A separate award ought perhaps to be announced for such people as well. Congratulations to you for exposing them.

.....

Ramesh Kumar Sharma

Perhaps he was in a hurry to receive an award.

.....

Kunal

Announce the name of the novel and its author.

.....

Ashish Anchinhar

Kunal-ji, if an ordinary reader had asked this question, I would have welcomed it.

When such a question comes from enlightened readers and writers, it means the situation has become grave. In any case, since you have asked, here is the answer: the book is Jalprantar, the author Pankaj Parashar. The critic who praises the book unstintingly is Kamalanand Jha.

.....

Kunal

Thank you, Ashish Anchinhar.

It seems to have become a universal practice to make very serious allegations without naming the person concerned. To me this is hypocrisy at its worst. It is distasteful ...

Now the names have been given. It seems to me that Pankaj Parashar (novelist) and Kamalanand Jha (critic) should respond.

.....

Lakshman Jha Sagar

Such a thief ought to be socially ostracised. Fire and water should be denied to him. His face should be blackened and he should be paraded openly on a donkey. The punishment should be such that nobody dares commit so despicable an act again.

.....

Chitragupta Chitragupta

Extremely sad.

.....

Jagdanand Jha 'Manu'

Literary plagiarism in Mithila and Maithili is well known. But now, through the Sahitya Akademi and its writers ... a most reprehensible matter. Such people must certainly be exposed.

.....

Shridharam

As for Pankaj Parashar, I did not even think it necessary to read him. He has nothing but connections and manoeuvring in place of talent.

.....

Videha: The First Fortnightly Maithili E-Magazine, ISSN 2229-547X, VIDEHA (since 2004), http://videha.co.in/. A comment on the report in issues 26–50: "Pankaj Jha Parashar is a thief of long standing."

.....

kellner@ucla. edu"

Dear Gajendra, thanks for the detective work. was there a response? best regards,

Douglas Kellner, Philosophy of Education Chair

Social Sciences and Comparative Education, University of California-Los Angeles, Box 951521, 3022B Moore Hall, Los Angeles, CA 90095-1521, Fax 310 206 6293, Phone 310 825 0977 http://www.gseis.ucla.edu/faculty/kellner/kellner.html

.....

Dear Gajendra-ji, I received your email. I was deeply saddened to learn of Pankaj-ji's conduct. It will bring disrepute to Maithili. Your action is entirely appropriate. —Rajiv K. Verma

.....

These People are hellbent to bring down the literary discourse down to the gutter. Now you have been receiving mails like one. We are with you and i have forwarded your mails to Maithili speaking people all across the country. Sir I have sent the link of Parashar's duplicacy to several people along with Pranabh Bihari who had traslated that article. I had telephonic conversation with him also and he was quite upset over Parashar' s duplicay. Pranav is my junior and a good friend of mine. since you have referred Pranav who had traslated that article it is unfortunate that he was misused by Parashar. But i must congratulate you for exposing scam run by Parashar and his team. Parashar, though must not be blamed if he lifted the article of Nom Chomskey . Now i must doubt the artistic sensibility of Parashar who is now a pseudo-- intellectuals. I am amazed that how did he dare to publish the article of Nom Chomskey as his own. God bless him no more. - VIJAY DEO JHA

.....

Thank you. But such people are honoured everywhere. —Shridharam

.....

I am sending this for your information (some reprehensible deeds of Pankaj Parashar). Pankaj has been doing such things for some time. —Avinash

.....

Dear Gajendra g, You are doing very well in the field of collecting all the documents related to the Maithili. Videha. Com realy a adventureous collection. I will also find some time to learm the article published through the videha. Now your detective style theft the sleeping of many of the so called literary personnel. Go a head. jai Maithili jai Mithila- Sunil Mallick, President, MINAP, Janakpur your efforts are commendable. Anysuch ghost writer or fake identity holder must be boycotted from literature at once Thanks.- shyamanand choudhary

.....

.....

Greetings. I have delivered a copy of the email to the secretary of the Chetna Samiti. —Dr Ramanand Jha 'Raman'

.....

Dear Gajendra-ji, I did not know that the Chetna Samiti had honoured him, although I too am a permanent member of Chetna. Be that as it may, this is a reprehensible episode, and it has distressed me. My own affectionate tendency to assess and encourage certain young Maithili talents has become a source of anxiety following this mishap. I myself am astonished. A very sad spectacle. In the literary context, this anti-creative act will be remembered as one of the ugliest episodes in modern Maithili. With affection, —Gangesh Gunjan

.....

Dear Maithils, remember your language, traditions and culture, and put an end to such controversial writing and conduct. Taking God as witness, place your hand on your heart, remember your family deity and ask yourselves how close you are to the truth. It would be best to use this forum for constructive work. Thank you. With affection, —P. K. Choudhary

.....

Gajendra Babu, Pankaj has been a thief for a long time. We condemned his actions in writing in Aarambh ten years ago. You have done well to ban him. The Chetna Samiti should withdraw its award and condemn him. — Subhash Chandra Yadav

.....

Dear Thakur-ji (honourable editor of the Maithili Videha e-magazine), on the evidence available so far, I would choose to stand with you. — Shambhu Kumar Singh

.....

Dear Gajendraji,

I fully agree with you that we must fight against blatant cases of wrongful appropriation.

Yes, you wrote in your email that all the writings of the author concerned would be removed from the Videha archive. That would also erase this episode and its evidence from the archive. In my view, evidence of both good and bad deeds ought to remain. Your comments and decision could be preserved as a postscript to the relevant writing in the archive for future readers. There is little point in repeating that Videha is making an excellent impression and that your hard work is clearly visible. Yours, — Sadan Jha

.....

Thank you.- Nishikant Thakur

.....

Thanx Gajendraji, for your immediate response. I must congratulate you for the work you have done to save the sanctity of the literature world as a whole. I feel proud for the person like you who shows the courrage to bell the cat. If the so called writers like Parasharji are there to spoil the sea, on the other side it is very hopeful sight to have a person like you who is alert enough to take care of such filth & keep the sea clean. Thanx for enlightening me on the subject. Regards- Bhalchandra Jha.

.....

This action of Pankaj Parashar brings to mind an incident some twenty or twenty-five years ago, when a poet broadcast the one poignant Maithili lyric by the late Sir Ganganath Jha over All India Radio, Darbhanga, claiming it as his own. Subsequently, after an alert listener provided the information, that poet was banned for life. The point is that if someone in Darbhanga–Madhubani can claim Ganganath Babu's lyric as his own, this is hardly surprising. Stern action against such a writer is certainly necessary. —Ajit Mishra

.....

Dear Gajendrajee, We should take strong step to prevent such intellectual cheats. My support is always with you.- K N Jha

.....

This seems to be a dangerous trend and we should also try and refrain from publishing anything from such authors. Regards,- Prof. Udaya Narayana Singh

.....

Dear Thakur-ji, I am enormously delighted to learn that Maithili writers are now also committing cybercrime. To reward the full deployment of Pankaj Parashar's negative intellect, I should like him to receive an honour such as the Nobel Prize. —Buddhinath Mishra

.....

Honourable editor, thank you for your efforts to stop such misconduct. It is essential to protect Maithili from such blackmailers. Respectfully, — Shiv Kumar Jha

.....

Gajendra Bhai, greetings! This sort of thing has been happening continuously in Maithili. Some people are advancing this trade. A number of supposedly literary figures who read English are taking advantage of the ignorance of Maithili editors. I too read the article by Pankaj-ji in Pahal, and a few days later I also read the original author's article online. I was surprised that Pankaj-ji had not at least changed its title. But had he had that much knowledge, things would have been different. Not only this: many of his poems, too, have been altered from English literature. Well, let him do as he pleases ... This time, however, the proverb "A single stroke by the blacksmith is worth a hundred by the goldsmith" ought to prove true. Anyone committing such a wrong in publishing should be regarded as a serious offender. Thank you for raising the matter so forcefully. Yours, —Prakash Chandra (Prakash Jha, Mailorang)

.....

The Pankaj Parashar episode was very distressing. —Kamini

.....

Gajendra-ji, the more you magnify this affair, the more everyone's energy will be consumed by it. My view is simply that, since you have exposed the matter once, it should now be left alone. The same thing happens in Hindi. Repeated writings in harsh language distress me. I then wonder why we should waste our time on it. Caste will not disappear from India, and even less so from Maithili. I once refused to believe this, but after thirty years of writing in Maithili I have begun to see the following:
1. In Maithili literature, when people name women writers after Lili-ji, Usha-ji and Shefalika-ji, they mention me.
2. Whenever a periodical is launched, I am still asked to contribute.
3. I am as active as ever and continue to write regularly.
4. Sadly, after me—though I regard Sushmita Pathak and Jyotsna Milan as my contemporaries—no comparably strong woman writer has appeared.
5. Despite this, when I look around I find that almost nothing has been written about me, my literary journey or my work, whether by Mohan Bhardwaj or anyone else. When my decade is discussed, three or four names are treated at length, but mine is omitted. It is included only as a passing reference.
6. Over all these years, only Raman-ji has written an article about me. I shall have it retyped and send it to you.
7. I never paid attention to caste, religion or animosity. I now begin to wonder whether that is why I find myself in this situation.
8. A teacher of mine, himself a renowned Hindi storyteller, advised me to stop writing in Maithili. He said that because I was not of the particular caste regarded as Maithil, Maithils would never take notice of my writing or do anything for me. Out of love for my language I ignored his advice and went on writing. Now I wonder whether he was right.
9. Look at the situation in Maithili today, and do something about it. Large Maithili institutions such as the Chetna Samiti celebrate Vidyapati festivals every year, spending lakhs, but they never publish even five or seven books by good writers on those occasions.
10. I am told that Vidyapati Hall is rented out. I have no objection if it brings in income. Yet when the hall is sought for Maithili work or theatre, it is not made available. If the fee is paid, anyone can rent it. Such practices should be brought to light.
11. Institutions are larger than individuals. Write about all the institutions, including the Sahitya Akademi's Maithili department.
12. Lili-ji has granted me translation rights to all her works. For the past two or three years I have been writing to seek a Hindi translation project for her Sahitya Akademi Award-winning book Marichika. I have been published with translations in the Akademi's journal Samakalin Bharatiya Sahitya for twenty-five years. Yet I was asked to provide a translation sample. If the self-important person occupying that chair did not know about me, he could have asked another Maithili writer. It was like a television channel asking Hrishikesh Mukherjee for his résumé, or, according to a recent news report, a request that Acharya Janaki Vallabh Shastri submit a biography for the Padma Shri.

13. In a spirit of humility, I sent Hindi translations of two or three of Lili-ji's stories. Even then, the matter received no consideration. After I wrote again, I was told to help obtain Lili-ji's translation rights for the Sahitya Akademi. But my concern was translation: if I am prepared to do the translation, why should the Akademi need the rights? So that it can give the work to its preferred person. No decision has yet been made, and no further letter has arrived from the Akademi. The translation is ready. Lili-ji is now very elderly. Her sole wish—and a natural one—is to see her books published in her lifetime.
14. It was I who helped bring Lili-ji's books into Hindi, yet Maithili critics see no need to record that fact, even if they acknowledge it. Fight against this.
15. I took the initiative to bring Maithili publishing to Bharatiya Jnanpith, and books by Prabhas-ji and Lili-ji appeared there. Though the credit for bringing Maithili books to Bharatiya Jnanpith belongs to me, Maithili critics see no need to record it. Fight against this as well.
Gajendra-ji, campaign against these attitudes in Maithili so that writers, including senior writers, need not suffer humiliation. If you wish, you may publish this in Videha. I shall write more on other matters. But I repeat that I blame not individuals so much as institutions and their mentality. Let people read this and ask these self-proclaimed eminent figures: why do you write about people with whom you are on good terms, but treat in this way someone with whom you have no such connections, who has continued to write quietly without entering controversies? —Vibha Rani

.....

Shri Gajendra-ji, good work. We shall continue to expect from you this discrimination between milk and water. After exposing a thief in this way, efforts should also be made to punish him. You have undertaken many commendable initiatives. Congratulations. —Manoj Pathak

.....

We should be greatful to Pankaj Parashar that he did not lay claim on the magnum opus of Kavi Vidyapati. I know him very well and his group as well. They have no love for Maithili in fact they are the moles planted by vested Hindi writers to damage maithili. Parashar and likes are the distructive lots and they are the culprits for agonising senior writers of Maithili those who dedicated their life for Maithili language and literature. I have no sympathy for him. I cant say, even, God bless them. - Chitra Mishra

.....

Taranand Viyogi (Mithila Srijan, June–July 2010, Year 1, No. 2): Some of his [Pankaj Parashar's] works were born after he had read the poetry of others. The poems are wholly his, yet some people have found occasion to call Pankaj a poet-thief. I find that, although he may be a critic who steals, he is certainly not a poet-thief. Why, then, did this happen? Because, as he absorbed others' writings into his own experience, their aura so overwhelmed him that its imprint became visible in the imagery of his poems. This is really a lack of artistic maturity, which a writer can overcome only by continuing to create.

.....

Gaurinath (Analkant), editorial in Antika, October–December 2009–January–March 2010, on the Pankaj Parashar affair: Yes, certain scheming people manage to find their way everywhere, and such people display their cunning and their art of theft here too. Yet it is no longer impossible to expose the truth about them. Gajendra Thakur of Videha recently revealed the true face of one such "young man" (Pankaj Jha, alias Pankaj Parashar).

.....

Pankaj Jha Parashar has allegedly been engaged in such activities before: publishing Harekrishna Jha's poems in Hindi without permission. The allegation is further supported, the editor says, by his publication of Vidyanand Jha's poem in a Hindi periodical without permission. (This information came from Harekrishna Jha. After it appeared in Videha, Pankaj Jha Parashar telephoned and harassed him while he was ill. Harekrishna Jha also informed me by telephone. I asked whether the information should be removed from Videha. He replied: "Leave it there; that is the truth." —Editor.) Parashar had done this several times, the editor continues, but on this occasion he published someone else's work under his own name, not even as a translation. —Editor

Ramesh

72. Debate: Pankaj Parashar's Literary Plagiarism Is a Dark Chapter in Maithili Literature

Abstract

With Videha–Sadeha 2 (2009–10), the vessel of sin associated with Pankaj Parashar's alleged literary plagiarism and cybercrime burst open. Great credit for this belongs to the periodical's editor, Shri Gajendra Thakur. No amount of praise can do justice to his alertness in detecting such offences.

Keywords: Pankaj Parashar; controversy over literary plagiarism; originality; translation; literary ethics; readers' responses; Videha–Sadeha

With Videha–Sadeha 2 (2009–10), the vessel of sin associated with Pankaj Parashar's alleged literary plagiarism and cybercrime burst open. Much credit for the exposure belongs to the magazine's editor, Shri Gajendra Thakur; his vigilance in detecting these alleged offences cannot be praised enough. Whether Videha's special issue on Maithili essays and criticism will remain bound, delayed across generations, "listening to time", for the sake of this exposure is difficult to predict.

Isolated instances of the art of literary theft have appeared before. But once an act of plagiarism was detected, the literary figure accused generally took a vow of silence, and the matter gradually cooled down.

Contrary to that tradition, however, this time the accused has proved to be an especially persistent thief, according to the essay, and has continued breaking in and stealing for the past decade. Yet Maithili writers and institutions have raised such a person in the palms of their hands, bestowed awards upon him, and soaked allegedly stolen poems in the syrup of favourable criticism.

Videha–Sadeha 2 did not merely advance allegations backed by evidence: it demonstrated its "boldness" by imposing a literary sanction on a person portrayed as ambitious and antisocial. Someone caught stealing three times in a decade may well be a "daredevil", using senior members of his own circle as rungs of a ladder to fulfil boundless and improper ambitions, only to kick the ladder away once his purposes are served. He then loses no time in descending to the lowest level of abuse on Twitter, Facebook, the Internet or in periodicals. He assumes changing names to hurl insults and busies JNU students with writing postcards praising him. He links his own name with the daughter of a distinguished Hindi writer, relishing and circulating tales of marriage or romance. Similar manoeuvring can be seen among others who chant the names of renowned Hindi writers in the hope of establishing their own literary establishments. Why, indeed, does the younger generation of Maithili writers need the crutch of eminent Hindi names so badly? This is a genuinely troubling question.

Reading Videha's "report of the inquiry" makes one's hair stand on end. After the disclosures about this supposed writer in Pahal 86 and Aarambh 23, he ought, the essay argues, to have been excluded from Maithili literary life. Instead, the Chetna Samiti honoured him. Even the discerning institution Maithil Brahman Samaj at Rahika, Madhubani, seems to have been dazzled, although it includes the celebrated writer Uday Chandra Jha "Vinod" and learned professors. Vinod-ji must surely have had a significant role in recommending the award. Despite Videha's disclosure, neither the Chetna Samiti nor the Maithil Brahman Samaj of Rahika has felt obliged to withdraw its award or take any other action; both have maintained an icy silence. Do such "inert institutions" serve Maithili literature or harm it? How can we believe that not one office-bearer or literary member of either institution had read Pahal 86 or Aarambh 23?

It is astonishing that several major Maithili writers appear to have been captivated by Pankaj Parashar's contrived poetry and imported vocabulary. The preface to Vilambit Kaek Yug Me Nibaddh needlessly lists thirty or forty foreign writers. The essay suggests that only an audacious plagiarist would do this to certify his verse as world-class. As with Douglas Kellner, evidence may perhaps be found in this volume of borrowing from the conceptual worlds or vocabularies of those poets. Who can tell what Mr Hyde will do next? People in Maithili read relatively little world literature: why would a blackmailer not exploit that fact? What, after all, is "technopolitics"—merely technical politics, is it not? Such a device can be used to secure a trip even to Pakistan by deception, to obtain the Kiran–Yatri Award, the Vaidehi–Maheshwari Singh "Mahesh" Award, and even the Akademi Award associated with Vidit-ji. It can overstep the proprieties of the nephew–uncle relationship involving Pradeep Bihari's son; it can break into Professor Arun Kamal's Naye Ilaqe Mein and claim to have "listened to time". Above all, with the aid of this technical politics, a review of Vilambit Kaek Yug... can be obtained from a literary stalwart such as Jivakant, published in a journal like Mithila Darshan (5), and thereby used to establish one's name for posterity. "Technopolitics" is Maithili literature's most successful instrument!

One may accept that the editor of Mithila Darshan did not have access in Kolkata to Aarambh 23 and Pahal 86. But it is difficult to believe that Jivakant-ji had not read them. Surely he had read Prayag Shukla's Chandrabhaga Mein Suryodaya and Narayan-ji's Maithili poem of the same title, Chandrabhaga Me Suryodaya. Why, then, did Parashar's poem, which asks innumerable questions of the sea, fail to strike him as familiar? Why did he have to lavish praise on it in his review—or why was he made to do so? Why should this not be considered a "sponsored review"? Did Jivakant find greater originality in Parashar's poem than in the poems on the sea by Prayag Shukla and Narayan-ji? Did the reviewer not even suspect the slightest "shadow" of those poems? A critic who noticed "all the heart-rending cries of civilisation" did not find literary theft uncivilised and grievously painful? The editor of Mithila Darshan probably never imagined that a critic like Jivakant-ji would find his "position false"; nor did Uday Chandra Jha "Vinod". Perhaps only Pankaj Parashar possessed that insight. The soul of the sage Parashara must be weeping in heaven, while all the lotuses born of mud confront an unbelievable reality. Three acts of theft committed by someone of the Parashara lineage must also have brought tears to the late Kiran-ji, the author of the epic Parashar.

Why did Jivakant-ji fail to take notice of literary plagiarism when, in his own view, "Maithili critics often drink stupidity and then vomit poison" (Videha–Sadeha 2, 2009–10; interview with Vinit Utpal)? Jivakant himself reviewed Parashar's collection of allegedly stolen poems and became an enthusiastic admirer of the poet whose skill in appropriation is questioned here. Why, then, should the excessive praise implicit in that review not feel like "poison-vomiting" to an attentive reader? If an "expert and habitual" literary plagiarist can manoeuvre a well-read critic like him into a "false position" and obtain both praise and prizes, is that a triumph of Maithili poetry or its misfortune?

Why was Videha–Sadeha alone in condemning this episode? Why did no other periodical do so? If Dr Ramanand Jha "Raman" denounced it on the Internet, why not in the periodical he himself edits? When the Chetna Samiti, Patna, honours such writers, how can it publish a condemnation in its own journal, especially when it has declined to withdraw the award even after the information was made available and concerned writers requested action? If Nachiketa-ji condemned the incident online and the condemnation appeared in Videha, why did neither condemnation nor information appear in Mithila Darshan? The reason, the essay argues, is plain: if a review of Parashar's poetry book by Jivakant is published, how can the journal also denounce poems allegedly plagiarised in that very book?

The ideals, decorum and ethics of literature are being torn to shreds on all sides, before the eyes of elders and teachers and, however unwittingly, through their own actions. What difference ultimately remains between the Maithil Brahman Samaj at Rahika, the Chetna Samiti at Patna, and the Sahitya Akademi in New Delhi? Why do the distinguished overseers and judges of such prestigious awards not feel it necessary to read the newer writers? How proper are their awards and critical judgements if they are made without reading, when this is claimed to be the third instance of plagiarism and the alleged facts have been published and exposed? Why should the patronage extended by revered senior writers not be regarded as patronage of poetic and journalistic plagiarism, when Aarambh, Maithil Jan, Pahal and Videha–Sadeha had already published the material? Is encouraging literary theft not a form of encouraging an intermediary clique? Is it harmful or beneficial to Maithili literature to nurture a promising young poet whose originality has already been questioned three times? Are reviews written and prizes decided by examining a book's attractive cover or the list of foreign poets named in its preface? If this is so, then perhaps, as the ironic refrain goes, "Everything is just fine, brother!"

All this seems to confirm Jivakant-ji's observation that reviewers write their reviews after drinking liquor, money or stupidity. Douglas Kellner's "Technopolitics", the essay alleges, was published as stolen work in Pahal. Now Jivakant-ji, Gyan Ranjan-ji, and other Hindi writers and editors should be asked what became of the piece associated with Noam Chomsky: where did it go, what happened to it, and under whose name was it published—Pankaj Parashar's, or the name of Pradeep Bihari-ji's son, as a translation? If this research has not yet been done, might another literary theft be exposed in the future? How many ponds should a single fish be allowed to pollute, and how often? The practice of writing abuse under the name "Uday Kant" is an old one, according to the essay, for this "Dr Great Thief". He can call someone a "reptile" (in Maithil Jan) or enter a family's affairs and spew venom. "Dr Paul Baba", possessed of all the attributes of an octopus, is supposedly so gifted in predicting theft that famous football teams keep him in their employ, so that this "infallible weapon" may be used as required during the World Cup.

The title of his first story, read at the Saharsa story gathering, was Ham Pagal Nahi Chhi ("I Am Not Mad"). Why he needed to make such a declaration is now becoming clear. At the time Avinash and Pankaj Parashar's maternal uncle had declared the story, in their comments, a "turning point" in Maithili fiction. Today that "turning point" has indeed proved to be a turning point in a sense, because the word "not" seems to have disappeared from its title with his alleged third act of theft. When his first alleged plagiarism, of Arun Kamal's poem Naye Ilaqe Mein, was condemned in a resolution, all the Saharsa writers except the "maternal uncle" and Dr Mahendra signed it and sent it to Aarambh. Today those who refused to sign are forced to look furtively to the left and right. That is the consequence of double characters and double standards. Avinash is exposed, the writer argues, when he writes in Videha–Sadeha 2: "I shall not make this public." What is the need to convey information secretly? Fear of damaging relations with Pankaj Parashar, or anxiety over some "technopolitics"?

Readers' messages in Videha–Sadeha 2 expose the positions of several literary figures. Rajiv Kumar Verma, Shridharam, Sunil Mallick, Shyamanand Choudhary, Gangesh Gunjan, P. K. Choudhary, Subhash Chandra Yadav, Shambhu Kumar Singh, Vijaydev Jha, Bhalchandra Jha, Ajit Mishra, K. N. Jha, Prof. Nachiketa, Buddhinath Mishra, Shiv Kumar Jha, Prakash Chandra Jha, Kamini, Manoj Pathak and others forthrightly condemned the matter in strong language, whereas the veiled and guarded words of Avinash, Dr Ramanand Jha "Raman" and Vibha Rani arouse surprise. It is reassuring, however, that the readers' forceful expressions of feeling are not troubled by the muffled voices of writers.

Vibha Rani, for her part, has produced an extraordinary response. This was not the place to enumerate a hundred problems confronting Maithili language and literature. It is like doing one thing at the wrong time—ploughing at the time for harvesting and singing wedding songs during Shiva's marriage. Someone repeatedly reveals his misconduct, and she regards exposing him as a waste of time, even finding the exposure distressing. The degree of self-praise and inferiority expressed in her response can be appreciated if she rereads her own letter calmly. Because the same thing happens in Hindi, should it be excused in Maithili? Must every action in Maithili now be taken only after seeking Hindi's permission? How can Vibha Rani call Jyotsna Chandram "Jyotsna Milan"? How can she claim to have been neglected? She is invited to literary programmes, receives honours and awards, and is read and discussed by readers. Do upper-caste writers, too, not complain about the absence of criticism in Maithili? The condition of reviewing and criticism is equally difficult for writers of every caste. If there is a caste distinction here, it is that Brahmin critics, from the perspective of reservation, have reviewed somewhat more writing by authors of supposedly lower castes, and generally favourably.

If a writer succumbs to despair because of the uneven state of literary criticism, what becomes of commitment to writing? Vibha-ji seems unaware that, after the writers she names, women such as Kamini, Nutan Chandra Jha, Vandana Jha and Mala Jha have entered Maithili literature with their own distinctive force. She has read neither Kamini's poetry collection nor Ijoriyak Angaithi Mor. Who ever stopped her from following her teacher's advice and writing in Hindi? Indeed, she has written in Hindi. The impulse of the mother tongue is unique. I have no objection to striking at Maithili's inert institutions and reviewers, though the monetary rewards here are negligible. Vibha-ji has certainly received social recognition. Society contains conscious as well as inert people. Maithili literature and the society of Mithila expect much from her; she needs to rise above inferiority and self-glorification and work. She is capable of it. She should avoid the race for credit. Otherwise, what distinction will remain between a Sahitya Akademi representative, a bankrupt jury, and a capable Maithili writer? The direction in which Vibha Rani is drifting worries and pains me. She is a powerful writer who has produced strong work. Sooner or later reviewers will be compelled to take up their pens. Why should any writer lose heart because critics have neglected their duty?

There is nothing improper in a writer responding meaningfully to allegations of repeated literary plagiarism by Pankaj Parashar. A commitment to literary values ought to be central to the writer's vocation, along with the "boldness" needed to show it in public. Literature contains an abundance of declarations about what "ought" to be done. Silence in literature and society on grave matters of this kind encourages such acts, deepens an oppressive inertia and brings disrepute upon language and letters. So long as reviews are being written of Parashar's allegedly plagiarised poetry, who will review Vibha Rani's original writing? Who will consider it necessary? Surely Vibha Rani will not commission reviews of herself. A capable writer's conduct has standards of its own. Literary theft should therefore be condemned collectively.

Some readers' views on Ramesh's essay, "Debate: Pankaj Parashar's Literary Plagiarism Is a Dark Chapter in Maithili Literature":

SHIV KUMAR JHA TILLOO, JAMSHEDPUR, said …

Thanks to Ramesh-ji. It is good to see the courage to speak the truth emerging in Mithila. People can do anything for sham popularity. I no longer even feel inclined to discuss Pankaj Parashar; however much he is condemned, it will be too little. But, Ramesh Babu, while you all condemn him, some people say "May Pankaj-ji live for ages." I too wish him a long life, but the wish for long life should not be reserved for Pankaj Parashar alone: "May all be happy." Ramesh Babu, may your pen keep moving without interruption.

Rama Jha said …

A woman who is my friend received from this man, Pankaj Parashar, a message so disgusting that I cannot reproduce it here. Publishing one's own work in another language while calling it an original is not necessarily theft, but it should be identified as translated by the author, whether from the Maithili original into another language such as Hindi or from another language such as Hindi into Maithili.

Ashish Anchinhar said …

As for the Parashar affair, no amount of condemnation is sufficient. But Ramesh Bhai, in which language should Vibha Rani be reviewed—in Hindi or in Maithili? In my view, to publish the same work in two or three languages, each time claiming it is an original, is also plagiarism. Attention should be paid to that as well.

Language, Dictionaries, Translation and Digital Culture

73. Cybercrime and How to Detect It

Abstract

Those engaged in intrigue in Maithili have begun entering the Internet. Previously they resorted to blackmail through letters and SMS messages. Now even someone with elementary computer knowledge can use email, and the tendency has increased …

Keywords: Internet; crime; detection; methods; criticism; Maithili

People engaged in intrigue within Maithili circles have begun to enter the Internet. Previously they practised blackmail by letter and SMS. Now that even people with elementary computer knowledge can use email, this tendency has increased.

Abstract · Summary

This chapter presents a language-and-technology study of "Cybercrime and How to Detect It". Its central concerns are the Internet, crime, detection and methods. Drawing on the examples, quotations and arguments available in the original material, it examines digital media, language technology, publishing and communication, allowing the reader to understand both the critical structure of the subject and its broader context.

Types of Internet Crime

Abusive and discouraging emails: Under altered names, people send emails and post comments, causing their targets mental distress. Sometimes the victim leaves the Internet, and everyday creative work suffers. Some even bid farewell to Maithili. Someone may place links to pornographic websites on your blog or site; another may flee after posting abuse in email, online conversation or a comment box. Someone else may copy and paste the labour of months or years in a few seconds and publish it under their own name. Many people have also reproached me for making years of my work freely available online. Yet I recall a statement by Bill Gates. Asked whether Microsoft had delayed introducing its Xbox product in India for fear of piracy, he said that Microsoft had never postponed a product's market launch for that reason. The Videha archive is becoming richer every day; cybercrime has not diminished that growth.

Threatening emails: A blackmailer uses these messages to intimidate the victim. Because the sender's identity is concealed, the recipient begins suspecting all kinds of people. The blackmailer derives satisfaction from displaying a fragmented personality.

Emails spreading viruses: A link or attachment arrives in an email, and before you have even knowingly clicked or opened it, the computer seems to have stopped working. Messages of this sort may also reach a mobile phone when Bluetooth is switched on.

Fake mail: A message from one source is disguised so that it appears to have been sent from another person's email address. A blackmailer thereby tries to provoke a quarrel between you and someone else. Do not delete such mail, and do not reply to it either.

The next stage—financial loss: The interruption of creative activity may not cause immediate financial loss, but at the next stage a blackmailer may ask for your credit-card number, password or bank-account number. The email may appear to concern an income-tax refund or to convey the moving appeal of a famine victim in Sudan. Never answer such messages; place the email in the spam folder, and keep copies as evidence. The ordinary procedure for detecting the offender is described in the next point.

How to detect the offender: Install a hit counter on your website so that visits acquire timestamps. Compare these with the timestamps of comments to help identify the culprit. Use computer commands to inspect the full email header and obtain information about time and place. The alleged sender's address and telephone number, including an extension, may sometimes be inferred from this information. Do not destroy or alter any such email.

Controlling possible harm from Internet use: Such emails create difficulties for users. People become upset; some even cancel their Internet connections. But when an abusive message arrives, remain in control of yourself and do not fall into depression. Continue using the constructive side of the Internet. If you have logged in to a website, log out promptly.

74. The Information Society, the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and the Indian Constitution

Abstract

An information society is one in which the creation, distribution, circulation, use, integration and modification of information are important economic, political and cultural activities. Those able to participate in this society are called digital citizens. In this post-industrial society, information technology shapes production, the economy and social life.

Keywords: information society; universal; human rights; declaration; Indian Constitution; criticism

An information society is a society in which the creation, distribution, dissemination, use, integration and modification of information constitute important economic, political and cultural activities. Those capable of participating in it are called digital citizens. In such a post-industrial society, information technology determines production, economic organisation and social life. The concept is closely related to postmodern society and post-industrial society. The economist Fritz Machlup formulated an account of the knowledge industry based on five components: education; research and development; media; information technology; and information services. The effect of technology and information on society becomes evident here. This is the society in which we now live.

Abstract · Summary

This chapter presents dramatic criticism on "The Information Society, the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and the Indian Constitution". Its central concerns are the information society, universality, human rights and the Declaration. On the basis of examples, quotations and arguments in the original material, it examines dramatic texts, character arrangement, stage structure and cultural context, enabling readers to understand both the critical structure of the subject and its larger setting.

Following the two world wars and the challenge of fascism, the United Nations General Assembly proclaimed and adopted the Universal Declaration of Human Rights on 10 December 1948. It laid down common standards for all peoples and nations without discrimination on political, economic, cultural or religious grounds.

The first United Nations World Summit on the Information Society was held in two phases: at Geneva, Switzerland, from 10 to 12 December 2003, and at Tunis, Tunisia, from 16 to 18 November 2005. The relationship between human rights and information technology was recognised there.

The following provisions of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights bear upon the information society. (Maithili translation of the Declaration by Dr Ramanand Jha "Raman".)

Article 12

No person shall be subjected to arbitrary interference with their privacy, family, home or correspondence, nor to attacks upon their honour and reputation. Everyone has the right to legal protection against such interference or attacks.

Article 18

Everyone has the right to freedom of thought, conscience and religion. This includes the freedom to change one's religion or belief and, alone or in community with others, publicly or privately, to manifest that religion or belief through teaching, practice, worship and observance.

Article 19

Everyone has the right to freedom of opinion and expression, including freedom to hold opinions without interference and to seek, receive and impart information and ideas through any medium and regardless of frontiers.

Article 27

1. Everyone has the right freely to participate in the cultural life of the community, to enjoy the arts, and to share in scientific advancement and its benefits.

2. Everyone has the right to the protection of the moral and material interests arising from any scientific, literary or artistic work of which that person is the creator.

Article 21
1. Everyone has the right to take part in the government of their country, directly or through freely chosen representatives.
2. Everyone has the right to equal access to public service in their country.
3. The will of the people shall be the basis of governmental authority. That will shall be expressed in periodic and genuine elections held by universal and equal suffrage, by secret vote or an equivalent free voting procedure.

The digital divide reveals divisions of knowledge, society and economy. It demonstrates the need to construct a nondiscriminatory information society in which developing countries retain sovereign rights in relation to information technology.

The relationship between human rights and information technology also embraces the individual's right to privacy. Scholars, human-rights activists and others have begun debating whether the information society will strengthen or damage human rights in matters of freedom of expression, the right to information, privacy, freedom from discrimination, gender equality, intellectual property, political participation, association, and information and communication technologies.

The right to confidentiality in online correspondence, cultural and linguistic diversity in Internet content, and media education are also implicated. The technical instruments of the information society benefit from its rights and freedoms, and participate in society's comprehensive development and in the definition of universal rights and freedoms, their mutual differences, and the values attached to them.

This creates conditions for easier access to information, knowledge and culture, turning the user into an actor in the global information society. Users gain greater freedom of expression than before and the capacity to produce new content and new social networks. There is consequently a felt need for new legal, economic and social models based on shared responsibilities, knowledge and understanding. Children's interests constitute another concern and should always take precedence over those of adults.

The tendency to accumulate economic, social and cultural wealth in modern society has intensified in the information society, while technology has brought about a kind of structural unemployment.

Poverty, workers' rights and the ideal of the welfare state are being left behind amid calculations of profit and loss. Today only a few actors are wanted; publishers, too, promote only the authors of a few best-selling books. The same is visible in theatre, painting, cinema and other fields. Information is not invariably beneficial. It encompasses not only art and books but also the stock market and commissioned survey reports. It reduces the distance between time and place and establishes a certain balance between them.

The notion of human dignity shifts emphasis away from a person's birth-based social position and towards the right to dignity. Emancipatory movements, including women's liberation, are efforts in that direction.

Free use of information remains restricted, while people's privacy is disappearing. When Bill Gates was asked during a visit to India whether Microsoft had delayed launching the Xbox there because of piracy, he reportedly answered that Microsoft had never delayed a product out of fear of piracy. Fear of spam and piracy should be overcome.

The information society is the society in which we live. Democracy and respect for human rights must continue in the information society and the society that follows it. Freedom of expression, the right to privacy, the right to share information and the right of access to information—all connected with the circulation of information—face threats from the state and from the market-oriented tendencies of the information society.

The Internet is the people's medium: a system that enables dialogue among people. It breaks down the strongholds of the entrenched gatekeepers of mass communication.

The Internet does not usually have editors. Individuals create their own topics and content and communicate them themselves. This initiates many social conversations; nevertheless, a great deal of antisocial content also appears. Should it be banned? If software is given the authority to make machines prohibit content, it will be a serious blow to freedom of expression.

Intellectual-property rights, the text observes, protect publication and distribution for sixty years after an author's death. Piracy must also be prohibited on the Internet, and arrangements should preserve authors' rights in their material for at least twenty years after death. Yet excessive use of patents will obstruct developing countries' access to information and hinder technological development.

Copyright can also encourage cultural development in music, film and comics. In a digital environment one cannot even view Internet content without making a copy, so there is only a limited difference between offline and online copyright. Online copyright also restricts copying, although it is extremely easy to incorporate copied material into other objects or modify it. Therefore names and images should not be used without their creators' permission; other people's private conversations and chats should not be interfered with; and statements that falsely prejudice the public against another person should not be made. Similarly, when an employer uses electronic devices to monitor employees, that monitoring ought to conform to International Labour Organization guidelines. Unsolicited email messages and the unauthorised collection or use of medical reports also violate human rights.

Internet use nevertheless remains restricted, because much content and software is expensive and unavailable free of charge. The digital divide makes inequalities in education still more conspicuous. Because mental rather than physical labour plays a larger role here, one might hope that gender inequality would diminish in the information society. Surveys, however, show that women have less access to information technology.

Electronic libraries, Braille-enabled or audio-enabled computer screens, and other electronic-library resources can help people with disabilities, including blind people, undertake e-commerce from home. Yet the research and its resulting technologies remain so costly that their benefits have not been as great as they might have been.

Children, older people, people with disabilities, women, workers, migrant workers and other socially disadvantaged groups continue to experience disadvantage in the information society.

The right to share in scientific progress and its benefits also entitles each person to protection of the moral and material interests arising from scientific, literary or artistic works of their own creation. Accordingly, in an information society respectful of human rights, the production of content through information and broadcasting technology, and the regulation of copyright and intellectual property, should be arranged so that the provisions of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights are honoured, not disregarded.

Article 27 [Article 51(a) of the Indian Constitution, as cited in the original]

75. Indian Dalit Literature: Maithili Translation, Criticism and Aesthetics

Abstract

Poetry • Fiction • Translation • Critical Theory • Rasa Perspective • Parallel Literary Tradition. Boyi Bhimanna (1920–2001) was a pillar of Telugu Dalit literature. His poetry is not simply an expression of individual suffering; it is also a record of collective historical consciousness.

Keywords: Indian · Dalit · Translation · Aesthetics · Literary Criticism · Maithili

Abstract

This chapter examines "Indian Dalit Literature: Maithili Translation, Criticism and Aesthetics". Poetry • Fiction • Translation • Critical Theory • Rasa Perspective • Parallel Literary Tradition. Boyi Bhimanna (1920–2001) was a pillar of Telugu Dalit literature. His poetry is not merely an expression of personal pain but a record of collective historical consciousness. The two poems under discussion—Gudiselu Kalipotunnayi and Na Varasatvapu Hakkulu—represent distinct yet connected aspects of his poetic world: the vicious circle of religious violence and a rereading of mythological history. Their most striking formal feature is their question-and-answer structure. The poem repeatedly asks itself: "Whose hut is this?

Poetry • Fiction • Translation • Critical Theory • Rasa Perspective • Parallel Literary Tradition

Consolidated edition — All criticism, theoretical discussions, literary texts and appendices collected in the original document are presented in a single editorial sequence. Repeated material has been consolidated only where repetition was verified; the original meaning and material have been preserved.

Subject Guide
1. Telugu Dalit poetry and Dalit women's poetry
2. Gujarati and Odia Dalit poetry
3. Telugu Dalit short fiction and novels
4. Integrated criticism of translation and rasa theory
5. A theory of criticism for original and translated Dalit literature in Maithili
6. Vidyapati, Bidesiya and appendices on the parallel literary tradition
7. Bibliography

Criticism of Dalit Poetry: Two Poems by Boyi Bhimanna

Burning Huts and My Hereditary Rights

Preliminary Observations

Boyi Bhimanna (1920–2001) was a pillar of Telugu Dalit literature. His poetry is not merely an expression of personal pain but a document of collective historical consciousness. The two poems considered here—Gudiselu Kalipotunnayi and Na Varasatvapu Hakkulu—present two different yet interconnected dimensions of his poetic world: on the one hand, the vicious circle of religious violence; on the other, a rereading of mythological history.

1. Poetic Form and Structure

Burning Huts

The poem's most striking formal feature is its question-and-answer structure. It repeatedly asks itself questions—"Whose huts are these?" and "Where do they keep springing up from?"—and then answers them; yet each answer becomes another question. This structure recalls the Socratic method, in which a sequence of questions uncovers truth. Here, however, truth lies not in a philosophical conclusion but in a bitter social reality.

Repetition—"are burning", "keep springing up"—creates an incantatory effect. Anaphora, the repetition of a word at the beginning of successive lines, and epistrophe, repetition at the ends of lines, bring the poem close to oral traditions and folk song. This suggests that Bhimanna embeds Dalit oral-cultural traditions within written poetry.

My Hereditary Rights

The structure of this poem is more fragmented and narrative. It leaps from one mythological episode to another—Vashishtha, Arundhati, Matsyagandhi, Vyasa—as though a troubled reader of history were hurriedly turning its pages. This fragmentation is no accident: it represents a Dalit consciousness of history in which memory has not remained whole but has been stolen and scattered.

The final lines move like long, laboured breaths—"Only to cast it away with pride! / Only to breathe with full dignity!" The ending is a declaration of victory, but not a moment of exuberant triumph; it conveys instead a solemn and profound experience of liberation.

2. Language and Metaphor

The Metaphor of the Hut

The central image of Burning Huts—the hut that burns and repeatedly rises again—is exceptionally layered. At one level it clearly evokes caste violence: the history of collective attacks on Dalits, of their dwellings being destroyed and set ablaze. At another, it makes ironic use of the Hindu philosophy of rebirth. The poet asks: if the doctrine of rebirth is true, why must this same Dalit be burned again and again? Rebirth was supposed to be a path towards liberation; for Dalits it becomes an endless vicious circle.

This accords with the analysis in Frantz Fanon's The Wretched of the Earth, a philosophical work of anti-colonial revolution, which shows how colonial and racial systems ensnare the oppressed in cycles of violence until the victims themselves begin to regard the cycle as normal—until "the inhabitants of these huts discover their secret."

The Metaphor of Digging Up the Graveyard

In My Hereditary Rights, the image of digging up a graveyard is extraordinarily complex. Ordinarily, such an act is associated with death and ill omen. Here the poet reverses its meaning: digging becomes an act of recovery. To excavate what was buried—the Vedic identity and historical rights of Dalits—and bring it to the surface becomes a revolutionary undertaking.

One hears here an echo of Walter Benjamin's "Theses on the Philosophy of History", the philosophical essay that demands a view of history from the perspective of the oppressed rather than the victors. Benjamin argues that history is customarily written from the victors' standpoint, and that the revolutionary task is to revive "dangerous memory". Bhimanna does precisely this: he excavates the dangerous memory buried by Brahmanical historiography.

3. A Counter-Mythological Reading

My Hereditary Rights belongs to an important tradition in Dalit literature: reading mythological narratives against the grain. B. R. Ambedkar established this mode of inquiry in Riddles in Hinduism and Who Were the Shudras? Bhimanna similarly puts the entire Mahabharata–Ramayana–Vedic tradition under interrogation.

The poem's central argument is that great figures of the Vedic-Aryan tradition—Vashishtha, Matsyagandhi and Vyasa—were in fact of casteless or Dalit origin. Brahmanical history, however, turned them into "Aryans", while excluding their actual descendants, the Dalits. The poem thus exposes a historical irony.

The perspective of Subaltern Studies, a scholarly tradition that places marginalised people's histories and voices at the centre, is relevant here. In "Can the Subaltern Speak?", Gayatri Chakravorty Spivak asks whether a Dalit woman can appear in history through her own voice. Bhimanna's poem offers an answer: it makes the subaltern speak. It gives Matsyagandhi, Amba and Ambalika—women who functioned merely as objects in the Mahabharata—a capacity for self-determination: "If she had slapped him and broken his teeth …" Such counterfactual imagination, the rereading of history by asking what might have happened had events taken another course, restores subaltern agency.

4. The Dalit-Woman Dimension

Both poems, and especially My Hereditary Rights, clearly articulate an intersectional Dalit-feminist perspective, analysing the simultaneous oppression of caste and gender. Arundhati, Matsyagandhi, Amba and Ambalika are women subjected to caste-based and gender-based exploitation together. The poem presents them not only as victims but as possible rebels.

Kimberlé Crenshaw's theory of intersectionality, which explains how the oppressions of caste, gender and class operate together rather than separately, is directly applicable here. That Bhimanna, a Dalit male poet, writes from this intersectional standpoint attests to the breadth of his poetic vision.

5. Dalit Aesthetics

Critics of Dalit literature, including Sharankumar Limbale, in Towards an Aesthetic of Dalit Literature, and Omprakash Valmiki, have repeatedly emphasised that Dalit literature cannot be measured exclusively by the standards of Western poetics. In Dalit poetry:

Anger is an aesthetic category, not a fault. Political directness is not an artistic weakness but an ethical necessity. Individual and collective experience become inseparable: the "I" invariably stands for a social "we".

Both of Bhimanna's poems exemplify this aesthetic. The anger in Burning Huts is not empty rhetorical display; it is an authentic moral emotion. The erudition of My Hereditary Rights—its mythological references and historical consciousness—is not a mere exhibition of learning but a cultural project of self-respect.

6. The Challenges of Translation

The Maithili versions of these poems, themselves made from English translations, involve a double process of translation: Telugu → English → Maithili. Some poetic loss is inevitable. For example:

The Telugu word gudiselu, rendered in the discussion as "huts/homes", carries a doubleness, the sense of a home being set alight. The Maithili term khopṛī, as used in the source's discussion, is said to retain much of that ambiguity.

Yet some of the emotional intensity of Na Varasatvapu Hakkulu—in which equal stress falls upon "my" (na) and "rights" (hakkulu)—is attenuated in the Maithili title Hamar Paitṛk Adhikār ("My Hereditary Rights").

Even within the limits of this double translation, the poems' essential poetic force has entered Maithili. The power of Bhimanna's thought cannot be diminished by the linguistic medium through which it travels.

Conclusion

These two poems by Boyi Bhimanna stand at a level of Dalit literature where poetic technique and political philosophy become one. Burning Huts presents the cyclical character of religious violence as an enigmatic question; My Hereditary Rights rereads history against the grain and declares the restoration of Dalit identity.

Taken together, the poems formulate an entire Dalit philosophy: question, remember, reclaim and ultimately breathe freely, with pride. They are not simply poems but documents of a struggle between civilisational orders.

Criticism of Dalit Women's Poetry: Four Poems by J. Subhadra

Gleaning, Landa, The Edge of a Sari, and Avva

Preliminary Observations

J. Subhadra has a distinctive voice in Telugu Dalit women's poetry. Whereas Boyi Bhimanna rereads Dalit identity through the historical and mythological dimensions of experience, Subhadra brings the body, labour and household objects—hide, earthen pots and the edge of a sari—to the centre of poetry. Taken together, her four poems offer a comprehensive picture of Dalit women's lives: from field to home, labour to motherhood, hunger to dignity.

1. Poetic Form and Structure

Gleaning

The poem takes the form of an inventory of labour. Tasks follow one another from dawn to night—sweeping, plastering the floor, carrying water, clearing away dung—without pause or connective transition. This catalogue is no accident: it represents the breathless continuity of a Dalit woman's life. Walt Whitman also makes use of catalogues of labour in Song of Myself, but there the list signifies freedom; here it signifies bondage.

The final question—"How will this bonded life ever end?"—gathers the weight of the entire poem into a single slender thread. It is not a rhetorical question but a real question that has received no answer.

Landa

The structure of this poem is a process narrative: it follows the entire work of soaking, cleaning and softening hides. Such technical precision is unusual in poetry. The pulp of the golden-shower tree and tamarind seeds record forms of indigenous knowledge that Subhadra incorporates into the poem. In this sense, the poem is also an ethnographic document.

At the end—"To make creaking shoes and drums— / On those drums they beat out sweet rhythms"—lies a bitter irony. The hide that a woman processes under repellent conditions becomes the drum on which her husband plays "sweet rhythms". Subhadra reveals the unequal relationship between labour and art, suffering and beauty.

The Edge of a Sari

This is the longest and most complex of the four poems. Its structure rests on an extended metaphor: the edge of a sari is a single object continually taking on new forms—a bed, an umbrella, a bag, a cushion, a protector, a mother. This succession of transformations reflects the many roles of a Dalit woman, who is simultaneously a worker, mother, wife, beggar and resilient fighter.

The closing lines—"This is not a cloth standing guard over my breast"—negate the title itself. This is a performative contradiction: what the title asserts, the poem denies. The result is a dialectical tension. In what sense is the sari's edge not a guardian? The poet leaves that question open.

Avva

This poem has the most lyrical and elegiac structure of the four. The repeated word "Avva", Telugu for "mother", becomes an invocation, as though a goddess were being summoned during a ritual. But this is a goddess of domestic labour, not a goddess seated upon a golden throne.

Its succession of images is remarkably dense: the sun lost in the carpet of the sky, grains of rice in an empty storeroom, the beat of a torn drum. These are all metaphors of deprivation and displacement.

2. The Central Metaphor: A Poetics of Objects

Subhadra's most important poetic achievement is to make ordinary objects the centres of poems: the landa (a vessel used in processing hides), the water pot, the sari's edge, the hoe and the sickle.

Western poetics has a distinguished tradition of the object poem; Rainer Maria Rilke's New Poems provides outstanding examples. Rilke's objects, however, are aesthetic objects—an image of Apollo, a panther. Subhadra's are objects of labour, things associated with what society calls repellent, foul-smelling, dirty and degrading work.

A new Dalit poetics of objects emerges here: to render the labour, knowledge and identity of Dalit women visible through material things. What society refuses to see—the curing of hides or the gleaning of grains from the earth—the poet places at the centre of literature.

3. Body Politics and Material Reality

An extraordinary passage in Landa declares: "Even if my intestines come out through my mouth, / Even if I faint from the insects and the stench, / I must endure this fate of curing hides!"

This immediate realism of the body's interior—the naming of internal organs, reactions to smell and physical fainting—is characteristic of a tendency in Dalit literature that Gopal Guru terms "intense embodied experience". In upper-caste literature, the body is generally idealised or abstracted. In Dalit literature, the body is tangible, suffering and at work, without apologetic sanitisation.

The body appears differently in The Edge of a Sari: sweat, tears and menstrual blood are bodily fluids that a Brahmanical system of purity and pollution labels "impure". Subhadra accepts them without embarrassment within poetry, thus refuting the myth of purity.

Julia Kristeva's theory of abjection is pertinent here. According to Kristeva, society regards as abject those substances that cross the body's boundaries: blood, excrement and decay. By making these abjected substances the subject of her poetry, Subhadra rejects social abjection itself.

4. Intersecting Oppressions: Caste, Gender and Class

In all four poems caste, gender and class appear together, and their interaction is never separable.

In Gleaning: the necessity of working in a landlord's house (class and caste), being "beaten with a rough implement" (caste violence), and the placing of this entire burden upon a woman (gender).

In Avva: "she is scorched in the furnace of her father's anger" (domestic violence and gender), while "moneylenders and landlords have kept her away from the plough" (caste and class). Both forms of oppression operate within the same woman's life.

Kimberlé Crenshaw's theory of intersectionality is given almost literal embodiment here. The Dalit woman represents neither Dalits alone nor women alone; hers is a third position, with experiences distinct from, and more complex than, either category taken separately.

In this connection, Sharmila Rege advances the idea of a "Dalit feminist standpoint": the Dalit woman's perspective carries a particular epistemological privilege because she experiences oppression at its deepest intersections. Subhadra's poems are written from that standpoint.

5. Motherhood and Deprivation: A Special Reading of Avva

Avva offers an extraordinary rereading of the poetry of motherhood. In Hindi and Sanskrit literature, the mother usually signifies sacrifice, gentleness and nurture—Yashoda and Kaushalya are familiar exemplars. Subhadra's Avva is fundamentally different.

She is a mother who cannot sing lullabies because she is at work; a mother whose hands are hard and soiled because she is always in the fields; a mother who cannot lull a child to sleep in her lap because she is bonded to a landlord.

This echoes Adrienne Rich's Of Woman Born, which examines motherhood at two levels: institution and experience. For Subhadra's Avva, institutional motherhood—the expectation of love and affection—and lived motherhood —the work of survival and feeding—exist together, but the former is always subordinate to the latter. Survival comes before tenderness: this is the Dalit mother's tragedy.

6. Folk Aesthetics and Indigenous Knowledge

The particular uses of golden-shower pulp and tamarind in Landa, the reference to Maisamma Devi in The Edge of a Sari, and the songs of transplanting, separation and threshing in Avva constitute a poetic archive of Dalit folk traditions.

In After Amnesia, Ganesh Devy argues that Indian literary criticism has consistently placed the sanctioned traditions of Sanskrit, Urdu and English at its centre while treating Dalit and Adivasi oral traditions as "non-literary". Subhadra's poems reject this exclusion. They elevate Dalit folk knowledge, oral traditions and regional botanical knowledge to the highest ground of poetry.

7. The Edge of a Sari and the Question of Jayaprabha

An important footnote at the end of the poem refers to the Telugu feminist poet Jayaprabha's "Burn the Edge of the Sari". Jayaprabha treats the sari's edge as a symbol of patriarchy and calls for it to be burned.

Subhadra clearly disagrees with this upper-caste feminist perspective. For her Avva, the sari's edge is neither a patriarchal emblem nor an enemy of freedom. It is an instrument of survival—a bed, shelter, bag and mother. To burn it would be to destroy the one possession she has.

This dialogue within feminism is profoundly important. In Sister Outsider, Audre Lorde writes: "The master's tools will never dismantle the master's house." Here, however, the issue becomes: which feminism, and whose feminism? From a Dalit woman's standpoint, upper-caste feminist symbolism can be blind to class and caste. Subhadra challenges that blindness firmly, though without rhetorical aggression.

8. Language and the Context of Maithili Translation

These poems have travelled through three linguistic stages: Telugu → English → Maithili. Some crucial cultural contexts have survived that journey:

"Landa" has been kept as a Telugu word, an appropriate decision. Translating it into Maithili would have been difficult and could have diminished the force of the original technical and cultural term.

"Avva" has been retained rather than replaced with the Maithili word for "mother", thereby preserving its Telugu cultural specificity.

Yet the Telugu title "Kongu Na Boche Meeda Kavalunde Bontapeggadu" (The Edge of a Sari) loses some of its bodily immediacy in Maithili. In Telugu, boche (breast/chest) and kavalunde (keeping watch) carry a bodily and political tension that becomes relatively literal in the Maithili expression "the cloth standing guard over the breast".

Conclusion

Taken together, J. Subhadra's four poems create an epic of Dalit women's lives —fragmented yet whole. From labour to motherhood, from body to history, from the edge of a sari to the struggles of an entire civilisation.

Their poetic achievement lies in the fact that they do not merely complain: they bear witness. Simone Weil considered the distinction between justice and compassion significant. Complaint comes from the sufferer; testimony comes from the witness. Subhadra becomes the witness to her own life, and her poetry consequently ceases to be merely a private cry of anguish and becomes a historical document.

The final line—"They never reached the limits of the places through which my Avva wandered"—is an epitaph for the entire collection: language, history and civilisation together have failed to map the whole geography of a Dalit woman's life.

Criticism of Dalit Women's Poetry (Continued): Comparative and Synthetic Study

9. The Two Poets Together: A Poetic Dialogue between Bhimanna and Subhadra

When the two parts of this critical study—Bhimanna's five poems and Subhadra's four—are read together, a dialectical dialogue emerges, revealing the complexity within Dalit literature itself.

A Difference of Perspective

Bhimanna looks from above: history, myth, philosophy, the long pressure of civilisation. His poetic camera adopts a wide-angle view. Subhadra looks from within: the body, objects, labour, home and mother. Hers is a close-up perspective.

Bhimanna's My Hereditary Rights excavates the histories of Vyasa and Vashishtha: a macro-history. Subhadra's Avva depicts one day in the labouring life of an unnamed mother: a micro-history. Yet these are two aspects of the same truth—historical dispossession and everyday exploitation, two sides of one coin.

Together, their collections bridge Carlo Ginzburg's microhistory and Marxist macrohistory, connecting the minute particulars of individual life to the epic of social structures.

The Difference between Questioning and Testimony

Bhimanna asks: "How do these huts keep springing up again and again?" and "How long will this vicious circle continue?" His mode is interrogative.

Subhadra testifies: "When my husband applies lime to the hide with his own hands"; "I do not remember ever clinging tightly to Avva's waist." Her poetic mode is evidentiary.

In Western literary theory, testimony became a distinct mode particularly through literature of the Holocaust—Elie Wiesel and Primo Levi. In Testimony: Crises of Witnessing, Shoshana Felman and Dori Laub show that testimony is not merely factual reporting; it is an ethical act in which the sufferer transforms experience into witness. In this sense, every poem by Subhadra constitutes testimony.

10. Images of Nature in Dalit Poetry: A Rereading

In upper-caste Hindi and Sanskrit poetry, nature generally provides a domain of aesthetic experience: in Kalidasa's Meghaduta, it is the background to the yaksha's separation; in Chhayavad, it becomes a projection of the self. Nature in this tradition is romanticised.

Subhadra's images of nature are fundamentally different:

In Avva, "the sun rising before the cock's cry burns in Avva's eyes": sunrise signifies not poetic beauty but the beginning of labour. The sun does not awaken the mother; it scorches her.

In The Edge of a Sari, "in the rain the sari's edge becomes an umbrella of golden-shower blossoms": the golden-shower flower might be an object of beauty for an upper-caste poet; here it represents practical shelter.

In Gleaning, dust, cracks in stones and soil are the landscapes in which Dalit women work—landscapes the Chhayavadi poet never saw.

In this way, Subhadra dismantles the pastoral-romantic ideology that regards the countryside as a haven of peace. In The Country and the City, Raymond Williams shows how pastoral romanticism functions as a class ideology that renders labour invisible. Subhadra's poems make that invisible labour visible.

11. Silence and Absence in Poetry

In the work of both poets, what remains unsaid is no less important than what is spoken.

In Bhimanna's Burning Huts, the killer is never named: "religion" is an abstract force. This strategic anonymity is a form of literary diplomacy. When the killer is a system rather than an individual, naming a person is unnecessary, for the system remains unchanged by that name.

In Subhadra's Avva, the mother's voice is absent. She sings, but we do not hear her song; she speaks, but we do not know her words. The silence symbolises the historical absence of Dalit women, who were never treated as subjects and agents in history, only as objects.

Jacques Derrida's notion of the trace suggests that meaning resides not only in presence but also in the marks of absence. The silences in Subhadra's poetry—Avva's unheard lullabies and unrecorded words—are traces in which Dalit women's history is inscribed.

12. Anger, Grief and Dignity: Three Emotional Registers

Across these nine poems—five by Bhimanna and four by Subhadra—three principal emotional registers appear:

Anger, in Bhimanna's Burning Huts and My Hereditary Rights. This is philosophical anger: cultural rather than merely personal.

Grief, in Subhadra's Avva and Gleaning. It is collective grief for the lost lives of an entire generation.

Dignity, in the closing lines of The Edge of a Sari and the final declaration of My Hereditary Rights. This is dignity that has been won—not bestowed through pity, but asserted as a right.

In the Poetics, Aristotle discusses catharsis, a purgation of emotion. In Dalit poetry, however, catharsis has a different character. It is not intended to cleanse the spectator's emotions; it calls for the moral cleansing of society. Ambedkar said: "I measure the progress of a community by the degree of progress which women have achieved." Judged by this standard, these poems put society on trial and find it wanting.

13. The Maithili Literary Tradition and the Relevance of Dalit Poetry

The translation of these Telugu Dalit poems into Maithili through the magazine Videha is a literary and cultural project whose significance goes beyond translation as a technical achievement.

The Dalit voice has historically occupied a marginal position in Maithili literature. The canon of Maithili writing recognised by the Sahitya Akademi has generally been centred on Brahmin and Kayastha writers, from Vidyapati into the modern period. Following the movement for a parallel stream of Maithili literature, it became possible to situate the "Bidesiya" in Vidyapati's songs in a period prior to Jyotirishwar. [Appendix 1: A Theory of Criticism for Original and Translated Dalit Prose and Verse in Maithili; Appendix 2: A Critical Evaluation of Vidyapati's Bidesiya; Appendix 3: Vidyapati, the Earliest Poet of Maithili (Before Jyotirishwar)—Gajendra Thakur; Appendix 4: Vidyapati's Bidesiya—Pia Desantar—A Parallel World of Maithili Drama Beyond Bidapat Dance.] In this context, translating Telugu Dalit women's poetry into Maithili constitutes an intervention within the established literary tradition.

These translations tell Maithili readers that the realities of Dalit women are not confined to the Telugu-speaking world: they are equally present in Mithila. To recognise geographic specificity (the Telugu context) and social universality (the oppression of Dalit women) simultaneously is the most consequential literary-political decision of this translation project.

The poems are living evidence of the vision represented by Videha's parallel literary movement: a vision reaching beyond the accepted canon, rich in folk traditions and inclusive of Dalit women's voices.

14. Final Synthesis: Towards a New Poetics

Together, these nine poems by Bhimanna and Subhadra establish fundamental principles of Dalit poetics, principles substantially different from those of Western and upper-caste Indian aesthetics:

First, democracy of poetic subject matter. Curing hides, gleaning grain from the earth and the edge of an old sari are as worthy of poetry as the yaksha's separation in Meghaduta or Shraddha in Kamayani.

Second, the ethical acceptance of emotion. Anger, disgust and grief are treated as incomplete in certain readings of rasa theory, which place shanta rasa highest. In Dalit poetry, anger is ethically necessary.

Third, the inseparability of politics and beauty. "Art for art's sake" is meaningless in Dalit poetry. A poem is a social act: testimony, accusation and a call to liberation at once.

Fourth, respect for local knowledge. Golden-shower blossoms, tamarind, Maisamma Devi and the landa belong to a Dalit epistemology older than, and at times superior to, book learning.

Fifth, the body as political ground. The Dalit woman's body—which burns, tires, decays and weeps—is the terrain on which caste, class and gender operate simultaneously. Making that body visible in poetry is a political act.

Closing Reflections

In "The Transformation of Silence into Language and Action", Audre Lorde writes that silence will not save us: "Your silence will not protect you." Boyi Bhimanna and J. Subhadra both break that silence: Bhimanna the silence of history, Subhadra the silence of everyday life.

Their voices travel from one language to another, from Telugu into Maithili. Translation here is not simply linguistic transfer; it is an act of solidarity in which one Dalit community hears, recognises and keeps alive the voice of another in its own language.

In this sense, these nine poems by Bhimanna and Subhadra are not merely translations added to Maithili literature. They sow the seeds of a new poetic tradition.

Criticism of Dalit Women's Poetry: Two Poems by Challapalli Swaroopa Rani

Mankenapuvvu and Hands Turned to Earth

Preliminary Remarks

Challapalli Swaroopa Rani is a distinctive voice in Telugu Dalit women's poetry, bringing a new dimension to the poetic tradition of Bhimanna and Subhadra. Whereas Bhimanna works on the historical and mythological plane, and Subhadra on that of objects, labour and motherhood, Swaroopa Rani occupies a third space: she centres the transformation of individual consciousness. Her poetry begins with "I" and ends with "I"—but the "I" at the two ends of the journey is not the same.

1. Poetic Form and Structure

Mankenapuvvu

The poem has a three-tiered narrative structure. At the first level, its opening establishes a central metaphor: a blue bird caught in a thorny thicket. At the second and longest level there is an anaphoric sequence—the poetic technique of repeatedly opening with the same word—built on "when ... then", repeated six times. At the third level, the poem abruptly turns: "But when my endurance is exhausted", and culminates in an explosive declaration.

This three-tiered structure resembles the dialectical pattern of thesis, antithesis and synthesis (proposition, negation and reconciliation). Yet it differs from Hegelian dialectics in a crucial respect: the synthesis here is no compromise; it is rebellion.

In the six repetitions of "when ... then", it is worth noting that each "then" voices a desire for self-negation: to sink like a seed, to close the nose, to shrink into a fist, to pour lead, to bury the head. These five distinct images of self-denial together produce an accumulation of suffering (the weight of many pains gathered into one). It is precisely the intensity of this accumulated suffering, however, that makes the final eruption credible.

Hands Turned to Earth

The poem follows a chronology—from dawn to dusk, from youth to decay. But this chronology is not simply linear: it is spiral-shaped, moving round and round, ascending and descending. The same day recurs, the same year recurs, the same life recurs. This repetitive spiral generates a profound nihilism (a feeling that life has no meaning): no change, no end.

Compared with Subhadra's Avva, both are poems of mothers and both describe labour; but Avva adopts the daughter's point of view, whereas Hands Turned to Earth adopts the perspective of a third-person witness. The distinction matters: here Swaroopa Rani regards the mother not through affection alone but through the eyes of justice.

2. Central Metaphors: Bird, Flower and Earth

The Blue Bird and the Silk-Cotton Flower

The two principal images in Mankenapuvvu—the blue bird trapped in a thorny thicket and the red silk-cotton flower blossoming at the end—trace a chromatic journey, an emotional progression through colour. Blue, the bird's colour, symbolises sadness, bondage and an unfulfilled longing for the sky. Red, the flower's colour, symbolises rebellion, blood and vital energy.

The silk-cotton flower (semar) carries a distinctive resonance in Telugu-Andhra culture: it blossoms on a thorn-bearing tree, and in winter, when the leaves have fallen, its brilliant red flowers stand out alone. It is a cultural emblem of flowering under adversity. Swaroopa Rani transforms this indigenous symbolism into a metaphor for Dalit women's consciousness.

The phoenix of Western poetry—the legendary bird reborn after burning—offers a parallel, but the phoenix is reduced to ash and then rises. Swaroopa Rani's protagonist is not incinerated: she flowers among the thorns themselves. The distinction is significant. Liberation for a Dalit woman comes not through destruction but through transformation.

Hands Turned to Earth

The titular metaphor of Hands Turned to Earth has several dimensions. "Hands turned to earth"—hands driven into the soil through labour—is a literal description. Yet the phrase also contains both becoming earth (the devaluation of human personhood) and being made from earth (an elemental identity).

In Gleaning, Subhadra searches the earth for grains. In Hands Turned to Earth, Swaroopa Rani watches the woman herself dissolve into earth. This intensification is important: when labour becomes so relentless that labourer and soil merge, objectification—the treatment of a person as an object—has reached its extreme.

In the Economic and Philosophic Manuscripts, Marx describes alienated labour, in which workers become estranged from their work, their humanity and nature. Swaroopa Rani's "hands turned to earth" are the bodily emblem of this estrangement.

3. An Analysis of the "When … Then" Sequence

The sixfold "when … then" sequence of Mankenapuvvu supplies a taxonomy of oppression—a list of its different levels. Each "when" introduces a different dimension:

First, control over domestic aesthetics: not to wear kohl or a forehead mark. This is the most intimate level, control over one's own body.

Second, spatial control: the "stinking village"—the physical enclosure of the Dalit settlement.

Third, educational exclusion: caste-based rejection at the threshold of higher education.

Fourth, stigmatisation through reservations: "I come through the quota"—making affirmative-action provisions a weapon of humiliation.

Fifth, sexual objectification (treating a woman merely as an object of pleasure): not fit for marriage, only for sexual desire.

Together these five levels reveal the Dalit woman's encirclement on all sides—home, village, education, work and marriage. The realism of this enclosure accords with Patricia Hill Collins's concept of the matrix of domination, which understands oppression not as a single force but as interlocking systems.

Especially important is the reference to the stigma surrounding reservations, absent from the poetry of Bhimanna and Subhadra. Swaroopa Rani encompasses contemporary Dalit experience: even after entering education and public employment, the Dalit woman continues to be branded a "quota beneficiary". It is a newer form of twenty-first-century oppression, preserving old hierarchies in a new vocabulary.

4. The Politics of the Body: Two Different Paths

The body is present in both poems, but follows two different paths.

In Mankenapuvvu, the body is the site of capacity and rebellion. "I shall burst into flower", "I shall flow forth": the body that was caught in thorns until the end finally gains the power of self-determination, the right to decide for itself.

In Hands Turned to Earth, the body is the site of exhaustion and consumption. "She who once shone like a marigold / grows pale as a branch of withered leaves": this body is ruined by the double consumption of labour and patriarchy.

The two paths suggest a generational difference. The "I" of Mankenapuvvu may be an educated, aware and rebellious Dalit woman of a new generation; the "she" of Hands Turned to Earth may be an uneducated, uncomprehending and exhausted Dalit woman of an older one. Both are products of the same system, but they differ in consciousness.

In The Wretched of the Earth, Frantz Fanon identifies two levels of colonised consciousness: one that has internalised the system and another that has begun to reject it. Swaroopa Rani presents both modes of consciousness in a single collection, through two poems.

5. The Figure of the Husband: A Comparison

The husband appears in both poems, but in different forms.

In Mankenapuvvu—"At home, male control slaps one cheek"—the husband is a nameless force, an equal participant in the caste system. Neither name nor face: only power.

In Hands Turned to Earth—"the husband is ready to drink her sweat like liquor" and "at dusk she endures blows from her husband's hands and feet"—the husband is a tangible oppressor, present in daily life.

This contrast matters in literary and political terms. In the first poem patriarchy is structural, a system; in the second it is interpersonal, a relation between two individuals. Both are true, and together they create a fuller portrait of patriarchy: it is at once an institution and a person.

In Feminist Theory: From Margin to Center, bell hooks argues that feminist movements sometimes see patriarchy only as a structure and give too little weight to violence by individual men—or reverse the mistake. Together, Swaroopa Rani's poems reject this false binary.

6. Final Images: Two Opposed Endings

Mankenapuvvu ends in triumph:

"I shall blossom like the mankenapuvvu! / I shall flow like a stream, / crossing the forest of affliction."

The conclusion gives readers emotional catharsis (the release or purification of feeling after suffering): the experience of victory after pain. But this catharsis is not cheaply earned. It follows the entire poem's accumulated suffering, and therefore carries exceptional weight.

Hands Turned to Earth ends tragically:

"Along life's stony, barren road— / carrying the cross of hunger."

The word "cross" is crucial. It borrows from Christian symbolism: Jesus carrying the cross. Here, however, it is secularised. The Dalit woman continues to carry her cross without any assurance of redemption or resurrection. It is a crucifixion without resurrection—an image still crueller than its Christian antecedent.

In The Myth of Sisyphus, Albert Camus describes the philosophy of absurdity (life has no predetermined meaning): Sisyphus pushes his rock uphill over and over, only to see it fall again. Camus writes that one must imagine Sisyphus happy. But this existential solution is not available to Swaroopa Rani's protagonist, because Camus's Sisyphus is an abstract philosophical figure whereas her protagonist is historical, material and embodied.

7. Comparing Swaroopa Rani with Subhadra: Similarities and Differences

Both poets make Dalit women's lives the subject of poetry, but their poetics differ in several important respects:

Pace: Subhadra's poetry moves slowly and meditatively, giving full attention to each object and each moment. Swaroopa Rani's verse is rapid and impassioned, as though a dam were breaking.

Perspective: Subhadra bears witness from within the life she describes. Swaroopa Rani is an internal witness in Mankenapuvvu but an empathetic external witness in Hands Turned to Earth, observing another woman's life.

Resolution: Subhadra's The Edge of a Sari has an unresolved, open ending. Swaroopa Rani's Mankenapuvvu offers a clear resolution—rebellion and flowering. In this sense Swaroopa Rani is more manifesto-like: her poetry contains an element of political declaration.

8. Distinctive Features of Language and Style

One noteworthy feature of Mankenapuvvu is its relative lack of particularised sensory detail. The poem works primarily on emotional and conceptual levels rather than through concrete sensations. It differs here from Subhadra's verse, with its fleshy golden-shower pods, tamarind seeds and vessel cushions, all tangible and perceptible to the senses.

In Hands Turned to Earth, however, sensory abundance is present: "mud up to the knees", "entrails dancing violently in the belly", "the music of Brahmin utensils". Swaroopa Rani therefore commands both modes of expression and selects between them according to context.

"The music of Brahmin utensils"—calling the sound of washing dishes "music"—is bitter irony. Upper-class aesthetics hears music in the violin and sitar; for a Dalit woman, the first "music" of dawn is the clatter of brass vessels. This overturning of aesthetic values demonstrates Swaroopa Rani's poetic intelligence.

9. All Three Poets: An Integrated View

At this third stage of the critical study, viewing Bhimanna, Subhadra and Swaroopa Rani together reveals a triangular structure within Telugu Dalit poetry:

Bhimanna—the poet of history and philosophy—questions the historical and mythological foundations of caste at the broadest level.

Subhadra—the poet of labour and objects—renders visible at the micro level the concrete facts of daily life, one object and one act of labour at a time.

Swaroopa Rani—the poet of consciousness and transformation—works at an intermediate level between history and everyday experience, capturing individual consciousness, the inward experience of oppression and the transformation of that consciousness.

Together the three encompass Dalit women's experience from outside to inside, from history to the present, and from suffering to rebellion.

Conclusion

These two poems by Challapalli Swaroopa Rani—Mankenapuvvu and Hands Turned to Earth—offer a striking expression of the conflict between hope and despair in Dalit women's poetry. Mankenapuvvu declares: I shall flower, despite the thorns. Hands Turned to Earth replies: without structural change, such flowering cannot happen.

Taken together, the poems form a complete political message: individual revolt is possible and necessary, but until structures change, the protagonist of Hands Turned to Earth will be born again and again and will die again and again carrying her cross.

This double truth—the possibility of individual liberation and the necessity of collective liberation—is Swaroopa Rani's greatest poetic achievement.

Criticism of Dalit Women's Poetry: Three Poems by Darishe Shashinirmala

I Am the One Who Lost Everything; I Am Draping Myself in Menstrual Cloth; A Dalit Woman

Preliminary Remarks

Darishe Shashinirmala is among the fiercest and most confrontational voices in Telugu Dalit women's poetry. Going beyond Bhimanna's historical-philosophical analysis, Subhadra's poetry of labour and objects, and Swaroopa Rani's transformation of individual consciousness, Shashinirmala occupies an entirely different poetic terrain. She fights on three fronts at once: against upper-caste men, against Dalit men, and against upper-caste women. In this threefold struggle, her poetry establishes a political position exceptional within the Telugu Dalit poetic tradition.

1. Poetic Form and Structure

I Am the One Who Lost Everything

The poem takes the form of dialogue—a poetic representation of direct speech between two parties—but an extraordinary dialogue in which the other side never answers. “You”, an upper-caste woman, are the poem's sole addressee. The poet speaks to her but does not await a reply, because that reply is impossible.

This one-sided dialogue, in which only one party speaks, is a distinctive poetic device. It differs from the soliloquy of Shakespearean drama, which reveals an internal conflict. This is not a soliloquy but an unheard dialogue. The poet speaks and the other party does not listen. The structural deafness reveals the true nature of upper-caste women's feminism.

The last five lines take the form of questions—“Will you step down one step?”, “Will we walk on the same footpath?” These are not merely rhetorical questions but a real test. The poet compels the upper-caste woman to make a concrete choice.

I Am Draping Myself in Menstrual Cloth

This poem's structure is the most intricate and multilayered of the three. It is at once a personal cry of anguish, a political manifesto and a historical document. It operates on three levels:

First, personal bodily experience: menstruation, sweat and humiliation at the well. Second, sociopolitical analysis: the media, police, courts and caste violence. Third, historical evidence: the names of actual victims—Alisamma, Muthavva and Mahadevamma.

These three levels become inseparable in the poem: the personal, the social and the historical speak in a single breath. In this threefold unity lies the source of Shashinirmala's poetic power.

A Dalit Woman

The poem is structured as an ever-expanding inventory of accusations. Each line adds a further humiliation, a further exploitation, until the catalogue threatens to crush the reader beneath its weight. Then comes a sudden reversal: "Now I am opening my mouth and eyes." It converts the accumulated weight of the entire poem into revolt.

Structurally, this reverses the classical sonnet tradition. A sonnet ordinarily introduces a problem and then moves towards a resolution. Here the presentation of the problem is so prolonged and intense that it becomes the poem's principal body, while resolution appears explosively in no more than two lines.

2. The Politics of the Titles

In all three poems, the title is itself a political statement.

"I Am the One Who Lost Everything" contains ironic self-accusation: the speaker appears to blame herself, but ironically. She says, Yes, I have lost—but who is responsible for this loss? The title offers no answer; it interrogates the reader.

"I Am Draping Myself in Menstrual Cloth": the term "menstrual" is deeply stigmatised within the Hindu-Brahmanical system of purity and pollution. Making it the title is an intentional provocation, designed to discomfort the hearer. To drape this cloth over the "false arguments" and "cunning" of the very society that despises it is an act of poetic retribution.

"A Dalit Woman" is the simplest title, and for that reason the most powerful. "A", the indefinite singular, says that this is not the story of one particular person but of all Dalit women. The title is personal and universal at once.

3. A Critique of Upper-Caste Women's Feminism: I Am the One Who Lost Everything

This poem exhibits a rare kind of poetic courage in Telugu—and indeed Indian—Dalit literature: it addresses an upper-caste woman directly and questions her feminist claims.

Its central episode is this: an upper-caste woman, perhaps the poet's employer or neighbour, says to her husband, "You fool!", apparently speaking up for the Dalit woman. Yet this same supposedly feminist upper-caste woman does not restrain her own daughter's aggression, regards the Dalit woman as a "subordinate", and ultimately offers to "advocate" for her only when the Dalit woman herself has "clenched her fist".

This lays bare the double standard of a feminism that speaks for Dalit women but in practice sustains caste hierarchy. In Sister Outsider, Audre Lorde critiques the racial blindness of white feminism and argues that claims of solidarity among women are hollow unless differences of class and caste are acknowledged. Shashinirmala's poem gives this principle concrete form in the Indian reality of caste.

In her discussion of Brahmanical patriarchy (which reveals caste and gender to be two wings of a single system), Uma Chakravarti argues that upper-caste women in India are simultaneously victims of patriarchy by virtue of gender and beneficiaries of caste hierarchy by virtue of caste. Shashinirmala's poem exposes this contradiction without theoretical disguise, in its naked reality.

"As long as there is only man or only woman, there is no problem": this line is the philosophical essence of the poem. When identity remains one-dimensional—gender alone or caste alone—compromise is possible. But when the Dalit woman insists upon her multidimensional identity of caste, gender and class, the struggle over lines of exclusion begins.

4. Body, Purity and Resistance: I Am Draping Myself in Menstrual Cloth

The central metaphor of the poem—the menstrual cloth—performs several poetic functions simultaneously.

The Demolition of the Myth of Purity

Under the Hindu varna-ashrama system, a menstruating woman is deemed impure. To "drape" oneself in that cloth, to cover oneself with it, reverses the relation: to cast this "impure" cloth over the falsehoods of the society that calls a woman impure because of it is to turn impurity itself into a weapon.

Julia Kristeva's theory of abjection is pertinent once again: society recoils from what transgresses bodily boundaries—blood, bodily discharge, excrement—and maintains social hierarchies through that recoil. Shashinirmala transforms the abject into a political weapon.

Historical Evidence

At the poem's end, the references to Alisamma, Muthavva and Mahadevamma —women who, as the poem relates, were stripped and paraded by upper-caste men—provide an historical anchor, tying the poetry to concrete events. The poem is no longer merely an individual lyrical outpouring: it becomes a vessel of collective memory.

Walter Benjamin's concept of dangerous memory deserves recalling here; in this instance the memory is more dangerous still, for these are not abstract historical facts but the names of actual women.

Institutional Failure

"Neither the police baton / nor the gaze of the court / has anything to do with my flayed skin": these lines explicitly expose the state's bias towards caste. Police and courts, conventionally symbols of impartial justice, appear here as indifferent or hostile institutions in the life of a Dalit woman.

Michel Foucault's account of power and knowledge—which shows how institutions of justice, medicine and other fields are not neutral but instruments of relations of power—takes poetic shape here. Shashinirmala presents this philosophical insight in the language of verse without recourse to technical theoretical terminology.

5. Threefold Oppression: A Dalit Woman

A Dalit Woman is among the most politically complex poems of Telugu Dalit literature because it confronts three oppressors at the same time.

Its first part, from the opening to "my body's strength drips away drop by drop", describes oppression by upper-caste men.

Its second part, beginning "Why? / Our own Dalit people ...", invokes oppression by Dalit men: "They make me into a clothesline for drying their clothes", "to keep me as a post and peg for their skulls".

Its third part, beginning "Why? / Our own womenfolk ...", invokes oppression by upper-caste women: "They make me the border of their upper-caste sari."

Acknowledging this threefold oppression is an exceptionally bold act within Dalit women's poetry. To acknowledge oppression by Dalit men has long been taboo within the politics of Dalit solidarity. Shashinirmala breaks that taboo.

Babasaheb Ambedkar stated that Dalit women occupy the most pitiable position among Dalits: excluded from wider society because of caste, from the Dalit community because of gender, and from upper-caste women through class. Shashinirmala's poem offers poetic testimony to that insight.

Sharmila Rege's Dalit-feminist standpoint—the argument that Dalit women's perspectives carry an epistemological privilege because they live at the deepest intersection of oppression—becomes poetry here. "A Dalit Woman" speaks precisely where the three systems of oppression meet.

6. Metaphorical Analysis: The Politics of the Body

Across all three poems, bodily metaphors are extraordinarily intense and varied.

In I Am the One Who Lost Everything, "They plucked and tore at me like thorns and grass until they made me a chicken" is a metaphor of animalisation, the reduction of a human being to an animal. The "chicken" is the creature plucked without resistance.

In I Am Draping Myself in Menstrual Cloth, "My mouth, /which constantly pours out sweat, /knows what it means to live invisibly": here the mouth is the site both of expression and of suppression. To sweat is to labour, and labour ought to make a person visible; yet society renders the Dalit woman invisible.

In A Dalit Woman, "They urinate into my joined hands" is the rawest, most degrading image. Hands joined in supplication traditionally signify reverence; to urinate into them is the utmost desecration of the sacred. Shashinirmala does not temper the image poetically, because the reality itself is without restraint.

Frantz Fanon's concept of the colonised body—the insight that colonialism assaults the body first, humiliating and controlling it in order to break the spirit—applies to all three poems.

7. Language and Style: A Poetics of Ferocity

Shashinirmala's language is fiercer, more direct and more confrontational than that of the preceding poets. This ferocity has both literary and political significance.

Subhadra's language bears contemplative witness: she observes and makes visible. Swaroopa Rani's language is an impassioned declaration: she speaks through the rupture. Shashinirmala's is direct accusation: she names, points her finger and looks her addressee in the eye.

"They put a halter through my nose and make me perform": a halter belongs to an animal, not a person. The metaphor directly names the politics of animalisation, the social process by which a Dalit woman is reduced from human being to beast.

"They make me a buffalo to be milked": casting the exploitation of labour as the milking of livestock joins in one image Marx's extraction of surplus value (the appropriation by owners of value created by labourers) and caste exploitation.

8. Comparison with Earlier Poets: An Integrated Poetic Genealogy

The five poets studied in this series—Bhimanna, Subhadra, Swaroopa Rani and Shashinirmala—together form a comprehensive poetic genealogy of Telugu Dalit verse:

Bhimanna—a rereading of history and mythology; a wide-angle perspective; the restoration of Dalit identity.

Subhadra—labour, objects and motherhood; a close-up perspective; the poetic documentation of everyday life.

Swaroopa Rani—the transformation of individual consciousness; an intermediate perspective between the individual and social; the dialectic of hope and despair.

Shashinirmala—a threefold struggle; a confrontational perspective; the exposure of contradictions within feminism.

Together these four poets trace a dialectical journey: beginning in history (Bhimanna), descending into everyday life (Subhadra), awakening personal consciousness (Swaroopa Rani), and finally confronting oppression from every direction (Shashinirmala).

Conclusion

Shashinirmala's three poems carry Dalit women's poetry into new political territory. Without verbal restraint or diplomacy, they say what is hardest to say: Dalit men's oppression, the hypocrisy of upper-caste feminism and the caste bias of state institutions.

In this poetry, beauty lies in anger, form in ferocity, and philosophy in concrete bodily realities. It is a culmination of that Dalit-feminist poetics which draws strength from the intellectual traditions of Sharan Kumar Limbale, Omprakash Valmiki and Ambedkar.

The last line—"Let us see what wonders they perform"—poses a challenge. The Dalit woman is no longer a spectator but a questioner. The question is addressed to society, feminism and the Dalit movement alike; answering it is the work not of literature alone but of history.

Criticism of Dalit Women's Poetry: A Poem by M. Gauri

Henna-Stained Hands

Preliminary Remarks

M. Gauri is an entirely distinctive voice within Telugu Dalit women's poetry. While Shashinirmala writes the poetry of threefold struggle, Subhadra creates a poetry of labour and objects, and Bhimanna rereads mythology, Gauri adopts a strategy different from them all: she overturns mythological narrative and speaks directly to Krishna. The dialogue becomes a poetic declaration of selfhood by a Dalit woman working with hides.

The poetic complexity, counter-mythological reading, formal accomplishment and political daring concentrated in this one poem place it among the most outstanding works of Telugu Dalit verse.

1. Poetic Form and Structure

The Structure of Direct Address

The poem is written in the second person—speaking directly to "you"—and the "you" is Lord Krishna himself. This is an exceptionally bold poetic decision. Addressing Krishna has a long history in Indian poetry—in Mirabai, Surdas and Jayadeva—but in those texts the speaker is a devotee and the relationship is one of Krishna's superiority and the worshipper's humility.

Gauri reverses that hierarchy. She addresses Krishna not as a worshipper but as a challenger. "Can you look at it without fainting?", "Can you kiss my blood-smeared hands?" These are not questions of devotion but tests.

A Three-Part Poetic Arc

The poem is divided into three clearly defined movements:

The first movement, from "My lane is made of flesh and blood" to "a game of piercing a sturdy bull straight through", establishes the world of work: the daily labour of a woman who works with hides.

The second movement, from "You, heroic Krishna!" to "behind the curtain of hide and skin?", stages a counter-mythological dialogue. It questions three images of Krishna: destroyer of demonic illusion, lover of cowherd girls and flute player.

The third movement, from "My lane is no longer suitable for domesticated puppies" to the end, is the Dalit woman's declaration of herself, reclaiming her labour, body and dignity.

These three arcs constitute a dialectical structure of thesis, antithesis and synthesis (proposition, negation and reconciliation). But the synthesis here is not a middle way: it is rebellious self-affirmation.

2. Counter-Mythological Reading: The Rejection of Three Images of Krishna

Within a single poem, Gauri successively addresses three mythological versions of Krishna and sets the reality of Dalit women's lives against each of them.

First Image: Krishna, Destroyer of Demonic Illusion

"You, heroic Krishna! / Who destroyed the demoness by suckling at her breast": the reference is to the killing of Putana. In the Puranic story Krishna kills Putana, who offers him poisoned milk; the act symbolises divine heroism.

Gauri challenges that "heroism": "I shall show you two strips of flesh and a vessel of blood. / Can you look at them without fainting?" The labour a woman who works with hides performs daily—handling flesh and blood—is more real and more courageous than Krishna's supposed "heroism". The comparison of mythological heroism with the everyday labour of Dalits is bitter and devastatingly truthful.

Second Image: Krishna, Lover of the Cowherd Girls

"You who deceitfully stole the clothes of the cowherd girls": this alludes to the episode of the stolen garments, regarded in the devotional tradition as divine play, or lila.

Gauri reads this "divine play" through the lens of sexual exploitation, then challenges Krishna: "Can you steal my heart, / which I have kept safe / behind the curtain of hide and skin?" The heart is safeguarded behind a "curtain of hide and skin", an extraordinarily complex metaphor. Hide and skin stand for the occupational identity of a Dalit woman working with leather, an identity society considers "impure". The very "impure" identity becomes protective armour against Krishna's intrigues of love.

Third Image: Krishna, Player of the Flute

"You who sent messages of desire through the flute, / can you read the message of love I have written on the threshold with my tender fingers?" Krishna's flute represents divine love in devotional poetry. Here, however, the Dalit woman's love message, written on the threshold, is more tangible, more real and more human.

The "threshold", or doorway, is a symbol of boundary. The Dalit woman writes on the threshold: neither inside an upper-caste household nor outside it. Love written on the threshold is marginal love, the experience of the social periphery.

Gauri presents more dramatically, as poetic dialogue, the tradition of counter-mythological reading developed by Bhimanna, who reverses the premises of Puranic narrative to interpret it from a Dalit perspective.

3. The Multilayered Meaning of the Title

"Henna-Stained Hands" is a profoundly double-edged title.

In the first sense, henna is a symbol of wedding festivities in Indian culture: adornment, good fortune and love. "Henna-stained hands" are hands immersed in celebration.

In the second sense, the "henna" within the poem is actually blood. "Can you kiss my blood-smeared hands, / with no henna applied?" Here blood equals henna. The blood on the hands of the leather-working Dalit woman is the henna of labour, not of marriage.

Such an inversion of symbolism—turning an auspicious sign into a sign of labour's reality—is an excellent example of Dalit aesthetics. In upper-caste culture, henna signifies beauty and celebration. For a Dalit woman working with hides, it signifies blood and toil. Gauri gathers both senses into one word.

4. The Metaphor of Hide and Skin: Reclaiming Dalit Identity

The poem's most powerful movement is its final section, in which hide and skin, considered "impure" by society, become the central metaphor of reclamation:

"When my hide is washed with golden-shower blossom, / wiping away the stains of your fingers— / it becomes a drum, / resounding with pure music."

Three transformations unfold in these lines:

First, the marks of Krishna's fingers—of the Krishna who stole the cowherd girls' garments and played the flute—are inscribed on the hide. In other words, the claims of upper-caste culture have left their imprint on the Dalit body.

Second, when the hide is washed with golden-shower blossom (which Subhadra also uses in Landa), the marks are erased. Indigenous knowledge removes the imprint of upper-caste cultural claims.

Third, the cleansed hide becomes a drum that resounds with pure music. This is crucial: the very hide that society regards as "impure" in the leather worker's hands produces "pure music" when made into a drum.

It is a complete demolition of the purity-pollution myth, achieved not through argument but through metaphor. The drum also appeared in Swaroopa Rani's Landa, where it symbolised the husband's labour. Here the drum symbolises the Dalit woman's identity: her very body, once condemned as "impure", becomes a source of music.

Julia Kristeva's theory of abjection, in which society marks bodily fluids and animal flesh as "abject" and "impure" and thereby maintains social hierarchy, receives a poetic reply. Gauri transforms the "abject" into the "beautiful" and the "impure" into "pure music".

5. The Metaphor of Play and the Meaning of Courage

The poem opens with an invitation: "Won't you come and play with me?" It sounds like an innocent child's invitation, but immediately it becomes clear that the game involves piercing an actual bull.

"Not that coward's game of bullocks in a procession; / I shall show you a game of courage." The lines establish a hierarchy of acts. Dressing up and parading castrated bullocks in religious processions is called a "coward's game". The Dalit leather-working woman's task—piercing a robust bull—is called real courage.

In Indian folk tradition, jallikattu, the contest involving bulls, is a display of bravery. Gauri turns that folk tradition into a metaphor for Dalit women's labour and challenges upper-caste definitions of cultural heroism: true courage resides not in religious processions but in daily work.

6. "An Unbowed Spine": A Poetic Declaration of Dalit Dignity

"Come, / if you can, / I shall teach you how to select bones— / I shall show you an unbowed spine."

These lines contain the philosophical and political essence of the poem.

"Selecting bones", the professional work of a Dalit woman working with hides, becomes an act of transmitting knowledge. She wants to teach Krishna. The teacher is the Dalit woman, the pupil is Krishna: a complete reversal of hierarchy.

"An unbowed spine" carries two meanings. Literally, the backbone of an animal, straight and not bent; figuratively, the Dalit woman's self-respect, which has not bowed.

Babasaheb Ambedkar said: "Life should be great rather than long." Gauri's Dalit woman is not merely long-lived: she is unconquerable.

7. "No Sin": The Rejection of Religious Morality

"It is no sin of water turned to mud; / it is no sin of the 'criminal' hide."

The quotation marks around "criminal hide" are significant. A society that calls hide "criminal" thereby reveals the falsity of its own morality. Gauri rejects that morality outright.

Brahmanical religious texts regard the work of a leather worker as sinful, a consequence of actions in a previous birth. Gauri directly denies this doctrine of karmic retribution: "It is no sin." Those two words—"no sin"—constitute a poetic manifesto against the entire moral and economic system of Brahmanism.

There is an echo here of Friedrich Nietzsche's revaluation of morality, which argues that prevailing moral codes are not truths but rules constructed to serve those in power. Yet Gauri reaches this conclusion not by reading Nietzsche's philosophy but through lived reality.

8. Water as Metaphor: A New Definition of Purity

"When water turns into vapour, becoming a dark cloud to shower drops of lightning, / then the purity of the lane becomes transparent."

Physical science and poetic metaphor merge in these lines. As water becomes vapour it turns invisible; it then becomes cloud and releases lightning, assuming the form of power.

The lane of the Dalit woman, deemed "impure" by society, reveals its holiness as "transparent", that is, manifest, when this transformation occurs. Transparency means the disclosure of truth.

The metaphor offers a poetic rendering of the Hegelian dialectic, in which conflict among opposing elements gives birth to a new truth. Yet here it is not abstract philosophy but the concrete reality of soil and water.

9. Comparison with Bhimanna: Two Forms of Counter-Mythological Reading

Both Bhimanna's My Hereditary Rights and Gauri's Henna-Stained Hands undertake a rereading of mythology. Their strategies, however, differ:

Bhimanna offers a historical argument about the Puranas: Vyasa, Vashishtha and Matsyagandhi were actually of Dalit origin, and this historical truth must be brought into view. His method is a scholarly rereading.

Gauri stages dramatic dialogue with mythology: she addresses Krishna directly, challenges him and invites him into her lane. Her strategy is poetic confrontation.

Together they present the full spectrum of counter-mythological readings within Dalit verse: an assault through argument and an assault through dialogue.

10. Affinity with Subhadra's Landa: The Symbol of the Drum

As noted above, both Subhadra's Landa and Gauri's Henna-Stained Hands use the symbol of the drum, but in different contexts.

In Landa, "To make creaking shoes and drums— / he beats out sweet rhythms on the drum": the drum represents the husband's craft. The woman's labour is transformed into the husband's art, carrying the bitterness of alienated labour.

In Henna-Stained Hands, the drum is a symbol of the Dalit woman's own identity. Her body, labour and skin are the source of pure music. Here there is no alienation from labour, but a celebration of it.

These different uses of the drum demonstrate the polyphony of a single symbol in Dalit women's poetry.

Conclusion

M. Gauri's Henna-Stained Hands is a landmark of Telugu Dalit poetry. Within this one poem:

Myth and modernity unite: Krishna and the Dalit leather-working woman stand in the same place.

Form and politics unite: the beauty of metaphor and social accusation are spoken in one breath.

The individual and collective unite: the voice of one woman becomes the voice of the entire Dalit leather-working community.

Finally, "it becomes a drum, / resounding with pure music". Gauri declares that the Dalit woman's body, labour and identity, all of which society calls "impure", are in fact the source of the purest music. This is not merely a poetic metaphor: it is an entire vision of civilisation.

Criticism of Dalit Women's Poetry: A Poem by Madduri Vijayashri

Alisamma's Curse

Preliminary Remarks

Madduri Vijayashri's Alisamma's Curse is an exceptional achievement in Telugu Dalit women's poetry. In this brief poem, of approximately thirty lines, such complexity of form, such concentration of history and mythology, and such political daring are brought together that it occupies a distinctive place in its genre.

Three historical moments coexist in the poem: the time of the Ramayana (the cutting of Shurpanakha's nose), contemporary history (the incident involving Alisamma) and the present (the ongoing crisis of Dalit women). This unity of three temporalities creates an extraordinary compression of poetic time.

1. Poetic Form and Structure

The Opening Premonition

The first three lines—"You may find this astonishing, / you may find this ridiculous, / you may find this deeply revolting"—form an anaphoric sequence anticipating three different responses from readers.

The construction is carefully calculated. The poet knows that three kinds of reader will approach her poem: those who find it remarkable (liberals), those who laugh (mockers) and those who recoil in disgust (reactionaries). Addressing all three at once, she declares, "But now I am a new question." Whatever the reaction, the poem's existence remains unshaken.

The Structure of Self-Identification

The poem's middle section is a progressive self-introduction, moving from the negative towards the affirmative:

First, what she does not have: she cannot sit in a reserved seat; she has no honorific title.

Second, what she does have: sorrow, being tossed about, being prey to lust.

Third, naming herself: "I am Alisamma." At this line the poem enters another register.

The movement is from negative definition to self-assertion, ultimately culminating in the proclamation of a curse.

The Final Eruption

The closing movement—"You animals! / I curse you all"—marks a sudden change of voice. A poem that has proceeded in a measured, analytical tone abruptly becomes a furious roar. This is a poetic earthquake.

2. Alisamma: Historical Person and Poetic Symbol

Alisamma was mentioned in Shashinirmala's I Am Draping Myself in Menstrual Cloth, but there she remained one name among others. Here Vijayashri makes Alisamma the speaker: she speaks for herself.

Alisamma is presented as an actual historical person, a Dalit woman from Andhra Pradesh who was publicly stripped and paraded by upper-caste men. The incident came to symbolise the oppression of Dalit women.

By making this historical person the poetic narrator, Vijayashri accomplishes two things simultaneously:

First, she transforms Alisamma from object into subject, from the person spoken about into the speaking agent. In historical accounts she was a victim whose story others told. Here she speaks herself.

Second, she makes Alisamma universal. In "I am Alisamma", the "I" is not simply one individual but all Dalit women.

Vijayashri thus offers an answer to Gayatri Chakravorty Spivak's question, "Can the Subaltern Speak?"—can the subaltern enter history in her own voice? Yes, in this poem: Alisamma speaks.

3. Mythological-Historical Parallel: Shurpanakha and Alisamma

The poem's boldest decision is to link the cutting of Shurpanakha's nose and Alisamma's public stripping in a single passage:

"Once my ears and nose were cut off at Lord Rama's command. / And now, more recently, / I became suffering without cause in the hands of the police."

This parallel carries several layers of meaning:

First, in both incidents the perpetrators are men, and the victims are Dalit or socially excluded women. Shurpanakha belongs to the rakshasa lineage, the "other" placed outside the mainstream; Alisamma belongs to a Dalit community, likewise treated as society's "other".

Second, state power is implicated in both. On Rama's order Lakshmana cuts the nose; Alisamma suffers at the hands of the police. The religious state of the Ramayana and the modern state perform the same function.

Third, Shurpanakha's desire was treated as a crime in the Ramayana because she wished to marry Rama or Lakshmana. Alisamma's very existence was treated as a crime. In both cases, a woman's desire or presence becomes the pretext for oppression.

Fourth, "Lord Rama": the word "Lord" is ironic. The "Lord", a deity and protector, orders violence against a woman. The line rejects morality based on religious authority.

The poem carries further the counter-mythological tradition of Bhimanna, who reread the figures of the Mahabharata. Bhimanna reinterpreted history;

Vijayashri joins history to the present in order to show that nothing has changed.

4. The Philosophy of the "New Question"

"But now I am a new question" is a profoundly significant line.

In traditional philosophy, questioning is a means and the answer is the aim. In the Socratic method, questions lead towards truth. Vijayashri, however, declares: I myself am the question.

It is an existential declaration. The Dalit woman is not an answer but a question addressed to society, the system and history. As long as she lives, the question cannot be closed.

Simone de Beauvoir's account of woman as the "Other" in The Second Sex—always defined in relation to man—becomes more complex when caste enters the picture. The Dalit woman is not merely the Other but a question demanding an answer.

5. The Poetic and Political Significance of the "Curse"

The word "curse" in both the title and final declaration is exceptionally multilayered.

The Curse in Religious Tradition

In Hindu religious tradition, the curses of sages are regarded as extraordinarily powerful. The curses of Brahma and Durvasa, for example, are irrevocable. The right to pronounce curses has traditionally belonged to upper-caste men.

Vijayashri transfers the authority to curse into the hands of a Dalit woman. This reverses the hierarchy: the one who once received curses now delivers one.

The Substance of the Curse

"I curse you all to turn into human beings— /breaking and twisting off your tails and pointed teeth."

The curse is extraordinary. Ordinarily a curse threatens destruction: die, turn to ash, become an animal. Vijayashri's curse demands transformation: become human.

There is profound philosophical irony here. The oppressors—police, upper castes, those who behave like beasts—are in truth animals. Cursing them to become human is the ultimate satire.

There is an echo of Frantz Fanon's anti-colonial philosophy, in which the coloniser or oppressor has actually lost his humanity: the victim is more human than the oppressor. Vijayashri transforms this argument into a poetic curse.

6. The Absence of an Honorific Title

"When I am called or shouted at, /no respectful title can be placed before or after my name."

These lines disclose the relationship between language and social identity. In Indian society, designations placed before or after a name—"Mrs", "Dr", "Late", caste-identifying surnames—are markers of social recognition.

When the Dalit woman speaks or cries out, she has no socially acknowledged name: no "Mrs" (marital respectability), no caste surname (assigning her a place in society), no professional title.

The linguist Pierre Bourdieu's concept of linguistic capital, which explains how language reflects relations of social power, applies here. The authority to name is itself a social power. The emptiness before and after the Dalit woman's name symbolises her absence from recognised society.

7. The Metaphor of the Reserved Seat

"Although it is empty, / I cannot sit in the seat reserved for women."

This is an exceptionally precise poetic representation of contemporary Dalit women's experience. In buses, trains and offices, a seat marked "reserved for women" should in principle be available to every woman. In practice, the Dalit woman cannot occupy it because upper-caste women or men object.

The metaphor reveals the distance between law and lived reality. The Indian Constitution guarantees equality, but socially the guarantee resembles an empty seat: present yet inaccessible.

Swaroopa Rani's stigmatisation of reservations—humiliation for having entered through a quota—and Vijayashri's inaccessible reserved seat together illustrate the contradiction between Dalit women's constitutional rights and social realities.

8. "A Wick in the Eye of the Court"

"I am Alisamma, / who lit a wick in the eye that is the court."

This metaphor possesses extraordinary poetic density.

The image of the "eye that is the court" recalls the blindfolded goddess of justice, Justitia, in Western iconography, signifying impartiality. In the Indian context, however, courts have often favoured dominant castes and classes.

Lighting a lamp's wick ordinarily spreads illumination. Lighting a wick inside an eye is an act of torture. For the Dalit woman, going to court—an act that should secure justice—becomes an experience of torment.

Hope and irony coexist in this metaphor. Alisamma went to bring light into the court, but the wick burned in that "eye", and kept burning.

9. "Even as a Woman and a Dalit, I Am Still Alive"

This line could serve as the defining statement of Dalit women's poetry.

"Even": a single word encompasses the entire history of oppression. Oppression as a woman; oppression as a Dalit; both together. "Even" means in spite of all of these.

Survival becomes a political act. Paul Gilroy considers "living, laughing, loving" a form of cultural resistance to oppression. In this sense Vijayashri's "I am still alive" means that survival itself is rebellion.

10. All Five Poets: A Final Synthesis

Across this critical series we have examined five Telugu Dalit poets—Bhimanna, Subhadra, Swaroopa Rani, Shashinirmala, Gauri and Vijayashri. Together they construct a whole universe of Dalit women's poetry:

Bhimanna—the mirror of history: overturning the received history of mythology.

Subhadra—the mirror of labour: poetry of the objects of everyday life.

Swaroopa Rani—the mirror of consciousness: the journey of individual transformation.

Shashinirmala—the mirror of struggle: threefold struggle against threefold oppression.

Gauri—the mirror of identity: transforming a supposedly "impure" identity into pure music.

Vijayashri—the mirror of justice: making the victim of history a speaking subject and turning the curse into a weapon.

These six mirrors together produce a comprehensive reflection of Dalit women's existence.

Conclusion

Madduri Vijayashri's Alisamma's Curse represents the culminating poetic moment of this entire series on Telugu Dalit poetry.

In this poem:

History speaks: Alisamma, once treated as an object, becomes the narrator.

Myth is dismantled: Rama's "lordship" and the police's "authority" are brought together in a single passage.

Language rebels: the "curse", formerly the privilege of the upper castes, becomes a Dalit woman's weapon.

A philosophy is born: staying alive is revolt; becoming a question is power.

The final words—"breaking and twisting off your tails and pointed teeth"—are a demand made of the future. Until oppressors relinquish their beastliness, the curse will remain active. The demand is addressed to society, the system and history alike.

And that question—"But now I am a new question"—is the final, unanswered and most powerful voice of this entire sequence of Telugu Dalit poetry.

Gujarati Dalit Poetry [Translated from Gujarati into English by Hemang Desai; from English into Maithili by Gajendra Thakur.

“Poster,” by Anish Garange;

“Sexual Intercourse,” by Rajendra Vadel ‘Jita’;

“Let the People Freeze” and “The Broomstick's Reproaches,” by Umesh Solanki.

Gujarati Dalit Poetry: A Critical Study of Four Poems

Anish Garange, Rajendra Vadel ‘Jita’, and Umesh Solanki

Preliminary Observations

The Gujarati Dalit poems presented in this collection, following the Telugu tradition, express Dalit experience on a different linguistic and cultural terrain. Where the woman-centred Dalit voice was prominent in the Telugu poems, the male Dalit voice is more central here; nevertheless, in Vadel's “Sexual Intercourse” the reality of Dalit women reappears.

The three poets—Garange, Vadel and Solanki—adopt three different poetic strategies: Garange employs urban realism, the concrete, sensuously apprehensible reality of city life; Vadel presents testimony concerning sexual politics; and Solanki uses the metaphor of freezing and satire directed against Gandhian ideology. Together, they construct a comprehensive urban-political portrait of Gujarati Dalit poetry.

1. Anish Garange: “Poster”

Poetic Form and Structure

“Poster” is composed in a circular structure, in which the opening line becomes the final line. “These posters with rough faces are like my mirror”: the poem begins and ends with this statement. Its circularity symbolically expresses the seemingly endless cycle of Dalit existence, from which there is no exit.

The lines between these two points—cinema banners, advertisements, condolence meetings, toilets, rallies, railway stations, rickshaws and missing-person posters—are fragments of city life. In structural terms, this is collage poetry: a mode of creating meaning by bringing apparently disconnected fragments together.

The Multiple Meanings of the Poster Metaphor

The word “poster” carries several meanings in the poem.

First, a poster is temporary. It is pasted up one day and peeled away the next morning. In society's eyes, Dalit existence is likewise treated as temporary and replaceable.

Second, a poster is public: everyone sees it, but no one pays attention. The Dalit individual is similarly visible and yet invisible.

Third, posters take many forms—cinema notices, advertisements, political rallies and missing-person notices. The Dalit individual, too, is put to different uses by different social institutions.

The "mirror" is the poem's most significant metaphor. That a poster should be the Dalit's "mirror" is an irony. A mirror supposedly gives an authentic reflection, whereas a poster is a distorted, humiliated image designed for a particular purpose. In other words, the "mirror" society holds before the Dalit is a false one.

Jacques Lacan's mirror stage, in which the child recognises its reflection and forms a sense of "I", applies here in a negative sense. The "mirror" (the poster) seen by the Dalit individual contains a distorted self-image imposed by society.

Urban Realism

"You urinate on me in 'pay-and-use' toilets": this line is strikingly direct. The pay-and-use toilet, a concrete location in urban life, becomes a metaphor for social humiliation. One must pay to enter the toilet, but urinating upon a Dalit costs nothing.

"I am a ball of wastepaper": this is self-objectification, the treatment of oneself as an object, yet it arises not from self-hatred but from the acknowledgement of social reality. The poem says: this is how society sees me.

"Khaman-khadi", a Gujarati food, marks a particular cultural geography. A "face smeared with khaman-khadi" suggests the middle-class, upper-caste image of Gujarati culture—khaman-dhokla has become an emblematic Gujarati food—being applied to a Dalit face in a humiliating, satirical fashion.

Walter Benjamin's account of urban experience, in which the modern city absorbs the human being into an assemblage of objects, becomes more complex in the Dalit urban experience: the city does not merely anonymise; it also marks people with caste stigma.

2. Rajendra Vadel 'Jita': "Sexual Intercourse"

Poetic Form: Testimony on Sexual Politics

"Sexual Intercourse" is the Gujarati counterpart to Shashinirmala's sexually political voice in the Telugu Dalit poetry series, but with an important difference: here the speaker is male, and the poem analyses sexual relations between upper-caste men and Dalit women.

This is an exceptionally bold poetic decision. Sexual relations are usually considered private matters; Vadel makes them the subject of political analysis.

The "Stinking" Body

"Your body stank of your ancestors who crushed Dalit women": this is a deeply complex line.

"Stinking": ordinarily Dalit castes are called "impure" and "foul-smelling". Vadel reverses this stigma of pollution: it is the upper-caste body that stinks of a history of the rape of Dalit women.

"Your ancestors": the phrase is crucial. This is no individual sin; it is historical exploitation continued across generations. The acts of those ancestors are physically present in the upper-caste man's body.

In this line Vadel offers a poetic representation of epigenetics—the scientific discussion of how ancestral experiences may affect the biology of descendants —and also of Fanon's conception of the colonised body, in which the history of violence is inscribed upon the body.

The Final Declaration: "Bharat" and "Bharati"

"If our intercourse produces a son, / name him 'Bharat'; / if a daughter, 'Bharati'."

These are the poem's most explosive lines. Several levels of meaning converge here.

On the first level, "Bharat" and "Bharati" are names of national identity, emblems of the nation. Calling the child of a Dalit woman and an upper-caste man "Bharat" exposes what the poet presents as the actual history of nation-making: the Indian nation is the product of this history of caste and sexual violence.

On the second level, the nationalist image of "Mother India" imagines the mother as upper-caste and pure. Vadel suggests that the real "Mother India" is the Dalit woman, upon whose body the nation's history has been written.

On the third level, the conditional phrases "if a son" and "if a daughter" formulate a demand upon the future: acknowledge this truth.

In Annihilation of Caste, B. R. Ambedkar argues that the persistence of caste depends on endogamy, marriage within one's caste. Vadel's poem turns this argument around: annihilating caste begins not only with marriage but with acknowledging the history of caste violence.

3. Umesh Solanki: "Let the People Freeze"

Poetic Form: An Extended Metaphor of Freezing

"Let the People Freeze" rests upon a single extended metaphor, the development of one central image throughout the poem. "To freeze", a simple physical action, becomes an intricate political metaphor.

The structure is anaphoric: the repeated phrase "let it freeze" gives the poem an incantatory quality. But this incantation belongs not to devotion, but to revolution.

The Political Philosophy of "Freezing"

Solanki's desired "freezing" is not a demand for stasis against change; rather, it seeks transformation through a stoppage of ordinary motion.

"Let the tea freeze in the kettle": tea symbolises motion and heat, made and consumed daily. For it to freeze means the suspension of everyday normality.

"Let soft fingers turn into dead marine rock at the mere touch of money": money and soft fingers form a metaphor for capitalist exploitation of labour. The fingers that touch money become lifeless stone: capital petrifies the human being.

"To disperse this thick blanket of fog": fog represents ignorance, illusion and falsehood. The social confusion that makes Dalit oppression seem normal can be removed only by freezing—by a radical interruption.

Solanki's freezing enters into poetic dialogue with Marx's conception of congealed labour, according to which capital is accumulated labour appropriated by its owner. If labour "freezes", that is, if workers strike, the system sustained by their labour begins to collapse.

4. Umesh Solanki: "The Broomstick's Reproaches"

Poetic Form: Satirical Address

"The Broomstick's Reproaches" directly addresses Gandhi. This mode resembles Gauri's "Henna-Stained Hands", addressed to Krishna, and Vijayashri's "Alisamma's Curse", addressed to the oppressor.

But the address in this poem is distinctive: it directly expresses anger and disappointment towards Gandhi, presented as the "Mahatma" and supposed benefactor of Dalits.

A Poetic Representation of the Gandhi–Ambedkar Conflict

The dispute between Gandhi and Ambedkar was one of modern Indian history's most consequential political and philosophical debates. Gandhi's use of "Harijan" was associated with reforming the position of Dalits within the Hindu social order; Ambedkar rejected the foundations of that order.

Solanki brings this historical disagreement into poetry.

"Your khadi wears out very quickly": khadi symbolises Gandhi—swadeshi, simplicity and nationalism. Its wearing out exposes the hollowness of the symbol. Gandhian ideals, the poem suggests, have not proved durable in Dalit lives.

"You must certainly detest a life imprisoned in a frame on the wall": Gandhi's portrait hangs framed in government offices, schools and homes. The frame signifies institutionalisation: Gandhi is turned into a museum object, so that his actual ideas cease to affect society.

"For whom are you smiling?" This is a sharply directed question. Gandhi smiles in his portrait, but the Dalit community on whose behalf he claimed to work has little reason to smile. For whom, then, is that smile intended?

The "Broomstick's Reproaches"

The title "The Broomstick's Reproaches" has several meanings. The kharara, or broom, is an emblem of Gandhi's cleanliness movement. Yet the broom handle is what remains after the broom has worn away.

The poem shows those remnants—the people left behind after the cleanliness campaign: "In the hidden lanes of the city, the rubbish of broom handles— / they mutter / and groan."

This muttering and groaning gives voice to the suffering of Dalit sanitation workers left outside Gandhi's programme of "cleanliness".

July 2009: Historical Context

A contextual note at the poem's end refers to the July 2009 illicit-liquor tragedy in Ahmedabad, in which, according to the text, many of those who died after drinking adulterated alcohol were Dalit labourers.

Gandhi opposed alcohol. Gujarat is a prohibition state, associated with Gandhi's ideals. Yet in this supposedly "Gandhian" state, Dalit labourers die from adulterated liquor.

"Gandhi, / I pour liquor over your head": this is an exceedingly fierce line. To pour alcohol—one of Gandhi's greatest prohibitions—over his head is an act of total repudiation.

"Damn you, / may a bag of liquor land on your skull": this is a curse, like Vijayashri's "Alisamma's Curse". Here, however, the curse is more satirical: liquor, which Gandhi rejected, is visited upon Gandhi himself.

Ambedkar's criticism of Gandhi—that Gandhi pursued politics in the name of Dalits without fundamentally changing caste structures—takes poetic form in Solanki's work.

5. Comparative Analysis: Telugu and Gujarati

Comparing these Gujarati poems with the Telugu tradition reveals important similarities and differences.

Urban orientation: Telugu Dalit poetry is often linked to rural and agricultural realities—fields, paddy, landlords. The Gujarati poems concentrate on the city—railway stations, rickshaws, toilets and advertisements. This reveals the geographical diversity of Dalit experience.

Male voices: Women poets predominated in the Telugu series. All three poets in this Gujarati selection are men. Their work brings out regional differences in the Dalit movement.

The Gandhi question: Gandhi is rarely mentioned in the Telugu poems; in the Gujarati Dalit poems, written in Gandhi's home region, the Gandhi–Ambedkar debate is central. Local history enters poetry.

Poetic language: Indigenous images (amaltas, partridge, the goddess Maisamma) abound in the Telugu poems. The Gujarati poems favour civic and modern objects—posters, advertisements and pay-and-use toilets.

6. A Special Note on the Translation Chain

These poems travelled through Gujarati → English → Maithili. There is a notable difference from the Telugu poems: the latter were translated into English by Purushottam K., whereas Hemang Desai translated the Gujarati poems into English.

Hemang Desai is himself a scholar of Gujarati Dalit literature. His work is thus an insider's translation, undertaken by a member of the culture from which the texts are translated. This allows culturally specific references, such as "khaman-khadi" and "kharara", to be translated with greater authenticity.

Conclusion

Together, these four Gujarati Dalit poems offer a comprehensive picture of Dalit urban experience.

Garange's "Poster": a poem of the invisibility and distorted visibility of Dalit existence.

Vadel's "Sexual Intercourse": a poem linking the history of caste-sexual violence to nation-making.

Solanki's "Let the People Freeze": a poem of radical stoppage, strike and the paralysis of a system.

Solanki's "The Broomstick's Reproaches": a poem of the contradiction between Gandhianism and Dalit reality.

Together, the four poems become a poetic manifesto: the modern Indian state —its symbols (Gandhi, the national flag and the Constitution) and institutions (police, courts and media)—has failed to secure justice for Dalit existence.

As long as that failure continues, Dalit poetry—in Telugu, Gujarati and Maithili—will go on questioning, bearing witness and pronouncing its curses.

Odia Dalit Poetry by Basudev Sunani; translated from Odia into English by Sailen Routray; from English into Maithili by Gajendra Thakur.

Odia Dalit Poetry: A Critical Study of Two Poems by Basudev Sunani

"There Is Still Much Left to Happen", "Address", and "Sadananda"

Preliminary Observations

Basudev Sunani is a distinctive and complex voice in Odia Dalit poetry. Unlike the Telugu and Gujarati poems, whose central modes were often direct political declaration or testimony to individual suffering, Sunani's poetry expresses Dalit experience through mystical and philosophical dimensions. His poetic language is densely metaphorical: drops, seeds, fish, egrets and the sea become images of nature and the cosmos through which the invisibility and struggle of Dalit identity are articulated.

The collection contains three related poetic sections—"There Is Still Much Left to Happen", "Address", and "Sadananda". Together, they offer a three-dimensional argument: the warning of existence, the invisibility of existence, and the innocence and irony of existence.

1. Poetic Form and Structure

"There Is Still Much Left to Happen"

Two refrain lines recur in this poem: "And yet I do not know why I feel / that only at the corner / something remains hanging, swaying." They appear at the beginning and again in the middle. Their recurrence creates a sustained feeling of uncertainty, as though something were unfinished, as though an explosion were still to come.

The structure is built upon contrasting pairs: "the sound of a bell" versus "the explosion of a drum"; "gathering sticks and leaves" versus "the destruction of a house"; "Panchajanya" versus "the smallest response". These pairs reveal the tension between the two poles of Dalit identity: invisibility and eruption.

"Address"

This poem is structured as a fragmented self-portrait. "I am still here …" occurs three times, in three distinct forms.

First, an elderly woman carrying lights in a wedding procession. Second, a sick old man begging before a temple. Third, a sleeping child lying in the cold on a platform.

These are three generations of Dalit existence—old woman, grown man and child—all living within the same invisibility.

"And yet you want my address! / How strange!" This astonished irony—the poet is surprised that someone asks for an address when his existence is everywhere—is the emotional centre of the entire poem.

"Sadananda"

The structure of this poem is a dramatic monologue: an actual person, Sadananda, who has come to receive a prize at a farmers' fair, sees the sea. This straightforward realist arrangement differs from the preceding two poems.

Yet a profound political question lies within this simplicity: "Why should there not be drought in my region / when all the water is held hostage by the sea?"

2. "Panchajanya" and "Vajra": Dalit Uses of Mythological Metaphor

"I know that no voice here / is less than 'Panchajanya'. / The smallest response / roars like a thunderbolt."

Panchajanya, Krishna's conch, announces the beginning of the Mahabharata war. The image compares the Dalit voice with Krishna's conch.

