VIDEHA · PARALLEL LITERARY MOVEMENT

A PARALLEL HISTORY
of Mithilā & Maithilī Literature

PART II
TOMES V – IX

with Critical Appreciations of Representative Maithili Writers

GAJENDRA THAKUR

Editor, Videha eJournal

Translated from original Maithili by the author himself

VIDEHA · PARALLEL LITERARY MOVEMENT

A Parallel History of Mithilā & Maithilī Literature

PART II · TOMES V–IX

A PARALLEL HISTORY

of Mithilā & Maithilī Literature

Part II

with Critical Appreciations of Representative Maithili Writers

Translated from original Maithili by the author himself

GAJENDRA THAKUR

Editor, Videha eJournal

VIDEHA · PARALLEL LITERARY MOVEMENT

videha.co.in · ISSN 2229-547X · Delhi

Copyright & publication

A Parallel History of Mithilā & Maithilī Literature (Part 2)

with Critical Appreciations of Representative Maithili Writers

© 2027 Gajendra Thakur / Preeti Thakur. All rights reserved.

First edition: 2027

Author and Editor: Gajendra Thakur

Published by Videha (videha.co.in) · Delhi

Videha: First Maithili Fortnightly eJournal · ISSN 2229-547X

Cover design: AUM Gajendra Thakur

Typeset in EB Garamond; Devanagari set in Noto Serif Devanagari.

Editorial: editorial.staff.videha@zohomail.in Sales: sales.videha@gmail.com

The constituent works retain their original acknowledgments, citations, and rights notices.

DEDICATION

for the writers, readers, and listeners of Mithilā, who have kept the lamp of Maithilī burning through a thousand years of storms

“The Parallel is not the marginal, but the truthful, in long delay.”

Mānuṣīm iha saṃskṛtām

Contents

TOME V Treatises, Essays and Literary Criticism

Theory and applied studies · Three parts · The complete English translation · Chapters 1–111

TOME VI Maithili Narrative Theory: Principles and Practice

Theory · Critical readings · The Inner Life of Narrative · Chapters 1–216 · Concluding assessments

TOME VII Folk Lifeworlds, Language and Cultural Memory

Yoganand Jha · Lalita Jha · Kamla Chaudhary · Vrishesh Chandra Lal

TOME VIII Fiction, Social Realism and the Maithili Public Sphere

Nand Kumar Mishra "Nand" · Kumar Pawan · Ashish Anchinhar

TOME IX Theatre, Poetics and Literary Criticism

Bechan Thakur · Kunal · Parmeshwar Kapari · Virendra Mallick

Appendix Methodological Note

Detailed Contents · Tome V

Part I — Theory
Section A — Theoretical Treatises
Critical Methods and Theoretical Foundations
1. Treatises, Essays and Criticism: Critical Theory and the Criticism of Criticism
2. Pattern Poetry and Shape Poetry in Maithili
3. A Navya-Nyāya Perspective: Valid Cognition, Absence and Epistemic Validity
Genre-Specific Critical Theory
4. The Place of the Vihani Tale in Prose Literature and Its Critical Theory
5. The Place of the Short Story in Prose Literature and Its Critical Theory
6. The Place of the Novel in Prose Literature and Its Critical Theory
7. Literature for Infants, Children and Adolescents, and Its Critical Theory
8. A Theory of Translation for Maithili and the Criticism of Translated Literature
Poetry, Prosody, Drama and Performance
9. Poetry and Its Critical Theory
10. Dramatic Literature, Parallel Maithili Drama and Theatre, and the Critical Theory of Dramatic Literature
11. Maithili Haiku, Haikū, and Kshanika
12. Dohā, Rolā, and Kuṇḍaliyā
13. The Critical Theory of Maithili Prose and Poetry
14. Maithili Drama and Modern Theatre
15. Foundations of Maithili Theatre Criticism: Text, Performability and Comparative Method
16. Kunal's Dramaturgy: Folk Theatre, Classical Tradition and Modernity
17. Kuṇḍaliyā in Laldas's Mithila Ramayana and an Examination of Metre
18. Language, Metre and Poetic Beauty: Rasa, Dhvani and Vakrokti

19. The Ideological Ground: A Parallel Literary Perspective and Theatre
20. Towards a Woman-Centred Critical Theory for Maithili
21. Towards a Critical Theory of Dalit Literature for Maithili — II
Appendix — Jyotsna Phanija: An Exploration of Caste Conflict in Selected Maithili Stories
22. A Critical Theory of Dalit Literature for Maithili
23. A Parallel Grammar, Composition and Linguistics of Maithili
24. The Origin and Development of the Tirhuta Script
25. Agricultural and Fisheries Vocabulary (Based on Fieldwork)
26. Verbal Testimony, Epistemology and Linguistics
27. Maithili Wikipedia, Unicode Tirhuta–Kaithi, and Digital Maithili
Section B — Essays
28. Before Writing a Literary Work...
29. Maithili, Surjapuri and Rajbanshi
30. Folk Elements in Literature: Ballads, Dance and Drama
31. Hindi, Maithili and Literary Vocabulary
32. The Place of Maithili in the Indo-European Language Family
33. Acting Workshop
34. A Parallel World of Maithili Drama and Film
35. The Impact of Foreign Capital Investment on Languages, Including Maithili
36. Jayakant Mishra and the Maithili Dictionary
37. Administrative and Social Vocabulary Found in the Pañjī System
38. The Influence of English Literature on the Maithili Novel
39. Reflections on Words: Siddha Sarahapada, the Tibetan Script, Computers and Maithili
40. Workshop in Storytelling and Story Writing (With Special Reference to Children's Stories)
41. Why Should Readers Read My Books?
42. Weight Management: A Personal Experiment and Experience
43. Annie Ernaux and the Fictional World of Kapileshwar Raut
44. The Sharadindu Chaudhary Special Issue and Parallel Literary Discourse
45. The Premlata Mishra "Prem" Special Issue and Parallel Literary Discourse
46. The International Presentation of Maithili Literature and Parallel Literary Discourse
47. Folk Culture, Literature, Book Criticism, and the Parallel Perspective
48. The Sahitya Akademi and Maithili Literary Organisations: A Discussion
49. Parallel Literature in Maithili and the Videha Maithili Literary Movement
50. Maithili Literary Organisations, the Sahitya Akademi, and a Re-reading of Dhūrttasamāgama
51. The Sahitya Akademi Translation Award (Maithili), 2022: A Literary Debate
52. The Sahitya Akademi's Maithili Advisory Committee (2023–2028): A Discussion
53. The Mithila Student Union Special Issue: Organisation, Movement and Criticism
Language Technology and Modern Communication
54. Language and Technology: Computers, Photography, Keyboards, Maithili on the Internet, Web Writing and E-Publishing
55. The Internet and Maithili
56. Self-Image, Language Technology and Inclusive Communication
Part II — Applied Studies
1. Mayanand Mishra's Sense of History: In Relation to Prathamam Shail Putri Cha, Mantraputra, Purohit and Stri-Dhan
2. The Floods of Mithila
3. Society and Culture in the Lorik Epic
4. The Exploration of Mithila
5. The Dushan Panji (Register of Transgressions)
6. Mithila and Sanskrit
7. Migration from Mithila

8. Mithila's Pañjī System: Lineage, Marriage, Dūṣaṇa, Social Memory and Modern Reinterpretation
9. "Kusmā-Salhes": Folk Epic, Resistance and the Dramaturgy of Love
10. "Akhiyāsal": Indian Poetics, Western Literary Theory and the Parallel-History Perspective
11. "Hiāol": Indian Poetics, Western Literary Theory and the Parallel-History Perspective
12. Kedarnath Chaudhary's Novels "Chameli Rani" and "Mahur"
13. A Review of Subhashchandra Yadav's Short-Story Collection "Banait Bigadait"
14. Rajdev Mandal's Ambara
15. Munnaji's Maithili Vihani Story Collection "Pratik"
16. Sujit's "Jiddi"
17. Ramesh Narayan's "Patharak Naw" and Vinod Bihari Verma's "Balanak Bonihar O Pallavi (and Other Stories)"
18. Some New Books in Maithili
19. The Story of "Sagar Rati Deep Jaray"
20. Dr Amarendra's "Angika Bal-Sahitya" — From Folk Memory to Modern Writing for Children
21. The Critical Theory of Maithili Children's Novels
22. A Comparative Study of Thirteen Translated Books: Sanskrit-to-Maithili Translations in Indian and Western Critical Theory
23. Jagadanand Jha 'Manu's' Children's Story "Māṭik Bāsan" (Clay Vessels)
24. Why Should Readers Read My Books?
25. Sajhiyā Ropani (ed. Dr Pramod Kumar): Forty-Three Authors and Eighty-Six Bīhani Stories
26. Jagadanand Jha 'Manu's' "Māṭik Bāsan" (Clay Vessels): Original Story and Critical Commentary
27. Krishna Kumar Kashyap and Shashibala: An Introduction to Their Creative Work
28. Pandit Bal Govind "Arya"
29. Structural Instability and the Play of Meaning: A Critique of Ramesh's Kathā-Samay
30. Umesh Paswan's Mujrim: A Critical Reading of the Short-Story Collection
31. R. N. Sudhakar's Diyari: A Comprehensive Evaluation of the Short-Story Collection
32. Parmeshwar Kapari: Folk Tales, Poetry, Corpus and Theatre Criticism (both dramatic studies translated)
33. Kedarnath Chaudhary Special Issue: Stories, Personality and Literary Achievement
34. Kedarnath Chaudhary: A Re-reading of the Writer and His Novel
35. The Sahitya Akademi Awards Controversy: Yuva and Bal Awards, 2022
Part III — Literary Criticism
Poetry, Songs, Metre and the Reading of Verse
36. The Forgotten Poet: Pandit Ramji Chaudhary (1878–1952)
37. Vidyapati's Bidesiya: Piya Desantar (The Beloved in a Distant Land)
38. Vidyapati: A Refutation of Certain Widespread Misrepresentations (complete)
39. Ramdev Prasad Mandal 'Jhārūdār': Songs and the Jhārū Poetic Form
40. Ramvilas Sahu: Poems, Songs, Haiku, Senryū and Tanka
41. Umesh Mandal's Nishtuki: Poems, Haiku, Tanka and Ghazals
42. Umesh Paswan's Poetry Collection Varnit Ras
43. Ramlochan Sharan's Maithili Ramcharitmanas
44. A Multidimensional Critical Study of Booch Ji's Poetry
45. Videha: Logo, Vidyapati, Ugna, Mithila and Maithili
46. Bajjika Gīt-Saṅgīt: An Integrated Bilingual Literary Review
47. Laldas's Mithila Ramayana: Kuṇḍaliyā and Editorial Metrical Errors
48. Pattern and Concrete Poetry in Maithili
49. The Round-Necked Mahākavi Vidyāpati of the Padāvalī Before Jyotirīśvara, and the Turbaned Vidyāpati Ṭhakkura of Sanskrit and Avahaṭṭha After Jyotirīśvara
50. "No One Could Understand Me" — Ghazal Poet Om Prakash Jhā

51. Munnāji: A Ghazal Poet and Writer of Bīhani Stories

52. Ashok the Poet, Ashok the Storyteller, and Ashok the Writer of Non-fictional Prose

53. A Study of Būchjī's Poetry from Marxist, Historical, Structuralist, Magical-Realist, Postmodern, Feminist and Deconstructionist Perspectives, as Well as from Indian Aesthetics

54. Nachiketa's Play No Entry: Mā Praviśa

55. Four Postmodern Plays: Samuel Beckett's French Waiting for Godot, Harold Pinter's English The Birthday Party, Badal Sircar's Bengali Evam Indrajit, and Uday Narayan Singh "Nachiketa"'s Maithili No Entry: Mā Praviśa

56. Chhutahar, Chhutahar Ghail, or Chhuthā Ghail

57. Four English Plays—Doctor Faustus, Samson Agonistes, Murder in the Cathedral, and Strife

Detailed Contents · Tome VI

PART I
Abstract
1. Introduction: From Reviewing Stories to Examining Narrative
2. Definition, Scope, and Fundamental Propositions
3. Aesthetic Examination Derived from Indian Poetics
4. An Examination of Evidence Inspired by Navya-Nyāya
5. The Critical Adaptation of Videha's Parallel-History Perspective
6. The Full Analytical Scope of Narratology
7. Three-Tier Examination and an Integrated Critical Formula
8. Practical Procedure: Sixteen Stages
9. Rules of Evidence: Twelve Principles for the Critic
10. Application to a Constructed Illustration
11. Chapter-by-Chapter and Overall Examination of Long Novels
12. Critical Judgement: Measurement, Limits, and Re-examination
13. Conclusion: Criticism as a Verifiable and Sensitive Discipline
Appendix A: Chapter-by-Chapter Critical Assessment Form
Appendix B: Decisive Research Questions
Appendix C: Essential Glossary
Primary Works and References
PART II
Preface: How to Read the Narrative
Critical Section 1 | Original Chapter –100 — The Conch and Silver
Critical Section 2 | Original Chapter –99 — The Debate on the Establishment of the Self Critical Section 3 | Original Chapter –98 — Who Created This World?
Critical Section 4 | Original Chapter –97 — The Chintāmaṇi Jewel
Critical Section 5 | Original Chapter –96 — The Preservation of Memory
Critical Section 6 | Original Chapter –95 — The Waterlogged Manuscript
Critical Section 7 | Original Chapter –94 — The Silence of Four Mouths
Critical Section 8 | Original Chapter –93 — The Conch's Final Question
Critical Section 9 | Original Chapter –92 — The Prisoner of the Water Clock
Critical Section 10 | Original Chapter –91 — The Light of the Leatherworkers' Quarter
Critical Section 11 | Original Chapter –90 — Budhua's Water Burial
Critical Section 12 | Original Chapter –89 — The First Night, the First Flood
Critical Section 13 | Original Chapter –88 — The Accusation of Witchcraft
Critical Section 14 | Original Chapter –87 — At the Gate of the Settlement
Critical Section 15 | Original Chapter –86 — The Crocodile of Time
Critical Section 16 | Original Chapter –85 — The Āmil's Order
Critical Section 17 | Original Chapter –84 — The Silence of the Forest
Critical Section 18 | Original Chapter –83 — Sonmā, the Fisherwoman
Critical Section 19 | Original Chapter –82 — The First Kabaddi
Critical Section 20 | Original Chapter –81 — The Shadow of the Invasion
Critical Section 21 | Original Chapter –80 — The First Line of the Song
Critical Section 22 | Original Chapter –79 — The Turn of Forgiveness
Critical Section 23 | Original Chapter –78 — Outside the Genealogical Register
Critical Section 24 | Original Chapter –77 — Burhba's Silence
Critical Section 25 | Original Chapter –76 — The First Lesson on a Coconut Leaf
Critical Section 26 | Original Chapter –75 — Reason's First Rebellion
Critical Section 27 | Original Chapter –74 — The Tree's Illness
Critical Section 28 | Original Chapter –73 — Mohan's Melody

Critical Section 29 | Original Chapter −72 — Witness to a Marriage
Critical Section 30 | Original Chapter −71 — The Night of the Epidemic
Critical Section 31 | Original Chapter −70 — Planting the Channā Grove
Critical Section 32 | Original Chapter −69 — The Tale of the Elephant and the Crocodile
Critical Section 33 | Original Chapter −68 — The Court's First Hearing Date
Critical Section 34 | Original Chapter −67 — The Call from Abroad
Critical Section 35 | Original Chapter −66 — The Women's Night Assembly
Critical Section 36 | Original Chapter −65 — The Procession of Fake Ghosts
Critical Section 37 | Original Chapter −64 — Sukhdev's Revenge
Critical Section 38 | Original Chapter −63 — The First Printed Page
Critical Section 39 | Original Chapter −62 — Waiting for Relief
Critical Section 40 | Original Chapter −61 — The Comet in the Sky
Critical Section 41 | Original Chapter −60 — The Night of Fire
Critical Section 42 | Original Chapter −59 — The Second Flood
Critical Section 43 | Original Chapter −58 — The Third Calamity
Critical Section 44 | Original Chapter −57 — The Sahib's Notebook
Critical Section 45 | Original Chapter −56 — The Call for Independence
Critical Section 46 | Original Chapter −55 — The Dawn of Independence
Critical Section 47 | Original Chapter −54 — The End of Zamindari
Critical Section 48 | Original Chapter −53 — The First Electric Lamp
Critical Section 49 | Original Chapter −52 — The Call from the Border
Critical Section 50 | Original Chapter −51 — The Seeds of the Green Revolution
Critical Section 51 | Original Chapter −50 — The Darkness of the Emergency
Critical Section 52 | Original Chapter −49 — The Year of Drought
Critical Section 53 | Original Chapter −48 — The Voices of Radio and Television
Critical Section 54 | Original Chapter −47 — The Gulf Market
Critical Section 55 | Original Chapter −46 — The Test of Communal Harmony
Critical Section 56 | Original Chapter −45 — The Winds of Liberalisation
Critical Section 57 | Original Chapter −44 — The First Computer
Critical Section 58 | Original Chapter −43 — The Diminishing River
Critical Section 59 | Original Chapter −42 — The Miracle of the Handheld Phone
Critical Section 60 | Original Chapter −41 — The City's Market
Critical Section 61 | Original Chapter −40 — The Right to Information
Critical Section 62 | Original Chapter −39 — The Guarantee of Work
Critical Section 63 | Original Chapter −38 — The Internet's Web
Critical Section 64 | Original Chapter −37 — The Screen's First Shadow
Critical Section 65 | Original Chapter −36 — The First Footfall of the Unseen Fraudster
Critical Section 66 | Original Chapter −35 — The Market for Bodies Opens
Critical Section 67 | Original Chapter −34 — Ujjwal's Dream
Critical Section 68 | Original Chapter −33 — The Shadow of the Lawyer's Coat
Critical Section 69 | Original Chapter −32 — Shadows Across the Sea
Critical Section 70 | Original Chapter −31 — Satyavrat's Silence
Critical Section 71 | Original Chapter −30 — Gop Kumar's Documents
Critical Section 72 | Original Chapter −29 — Chandrapal's Dream
Critical Section 73 | Original Chapter −28 — Raghav's Code
Critical Section 74 | Original Chapter −27 — Aruni's Construction
Critical Section 75 | Original Chapter −26 — Devika's Song
Critical Section 76 | Original Chapter −25 — Meera's Privacy
Critical Section 77 | Original Chapter −24 — Nishant's Bank
Critical Section 78 | Original Chapter −23 — Nand's Birth
Critical Section 79 | Original Chapter −22 — Approaching Twelve Hundred Years
Critical Section 80 | Original Chapter −21 — Ananya's Question
Critical Section 81 | Original Chapter −20 — The First Account of the Splash

Critical Section 82 | Original Chapter −19 — Satyavrat's Decision
Critical Section 83 | Original Chapter −18 — The Meeting of Ananya and Nand
Critical Section 84 | Original Chapter −17 — The Web of the Glass Tower
Critical Section 85 | Original Chapter −16 — Batuknath's Final Turning
Critical Section 86 | Original Chapter −15 — Chandrapal's Account
Critical Section 87 | Original Chapter −14 — Construction of the Bridge
Critical Section 88 | Original Chapter −13 — Gop Kumar's Compilation
Critical Section 89 | Original Chapter −12 — The Trembling of Channa Grove
Critical Section 90 | Original Chapter −11 — Burhbā's Final Blessing
Critical Section 91 | Original Chapter −10 — The First Splash at the Bridge
Critical Section 92 | Original Chapter −9 — The Beginning of the Investigation
Critical Section 93 | Original Chapter −8 — The Evidence Comes to Light
Critical Section 94 | Original Chapter −7 — The Experience of a Half-Ghost
Critical Section 95 | Original Chapter −6 — Gop Kumar's Final Page
Critical Section 96 | Original Chapter −5 — The Exposure of the Network
Critical Section 97 | Original Chapter −4 — The Final List of Names
Critical Section 98 | Original Chapter −3 — The Completion of Twelve Hundred Years
Critical Section 99 | Original Chapter −2 — The Next Generation's Pledge
Critical Section 100 | Original Chapter −1 — The Final Witness
Critical Section 101 | Original Chapter 0 — Garh Narikela: A Brief Folk Prologue
Critical Section 102 | Original Chapter 1 — Kabaddi in Channa Grove
Critical Section 103 | Original Chapter 2 — The Village on the Right Bank
Critical Section 104 | Original Chapter 3 — The Account of the Splash
Critical Section 105 | Original Chapter 4 — Thirty Names, Three Hundred Bodies
Critical Section 106 | Original Chapter 5 — The Crocodile of Court Dates
Critical Section 107 | Original Chapter 6 — Ethics at Harvard
Critical Section 108 | Original Chapter 7 — The Price of Breath
Critical Section 109 | Original Chapter 8 — The Crocodile in the Screen
Critical Section 110 | Original Chapter 9 — The Market in Bodies
Critical Section 111 | Original Chapter 10 — Blackmail through Privacy
Critical Section 112 | Original Chapter 11 — The Black River of Money
Critical Section 113 | Original Chapter 12 — Coconut Leaves on the Dark Web
Critical Section 114 | Original Chapter 13 — The Sealed Cover
Critical Section 115 | Original Chapter 14 — The Road Home
Critical Section 116 | Original Chapter 15 — The Water of Names
Critical Section 117 | Original Chapter 16 — The Court of Channa Grove
Critical Section 118 | Original Chapter 17 — The Grief of Victory
Critical Section 119 | Original Chapter 18 — The Empty Court
Critical Section 120 | Original Chapter 19 — The Record of Names
Critical Section 121 | Original Chapter 20 — A School Against the Screen
Critical Section 122 | Original Chapter 21 — The Pledge of Privacy
Critical Section 123 | Original Chapter 22 — The Second Harvard Lecture
Critical Section 124 | Original Chapter 23 — Batuknath's Search
Critical Section 125 | Original Chapter 24 — The Novel Begins Again
Critical Section 126 | Original Chapter 25 — The Mind Left Hanging
Critical Section 127 | Original Chapter 26 — Batuknath Hariharan's Journey
Critical Section 128 | Original Chapter 27 — Chandrapal Batra's Screen
Critical Section 129 | Original Chapter 28 — Raghav Signal's Silence
Critical Section 130 | Original Chapter 29 — Lau Kin-Hung's Dream
Critical Section 131 | Original Chapter 30 — The Court within the Rogues
Critical Section 132 | Original Chapter 31 — The Work of the Defeated
Critical Section 133 | Original Chapter 32 — The Third Kabaddi
Critical Section 134 | Original Chapter 33 — The Examination of the Mind

Critical Section 135 | Original Chapter 34 — The Listening River
Critical Section 136 | Original Chapter 35 — The Threshold of the Name
Critical Section 137 | Original Chapter 36 — Home, Fear, Dream
Critical Section 138 | Original Chapter 37 — Three Pebbles
Critical Section 139 | Original Chapter 38 — The Pronunciation of Names
Critical Section 140 | Original Chapter 39 — The Peace of the Seed
Critical Section 141 | Original Chapter 40 — Letters of Dew
Critical Section 142 | Original Chapter 41 — The Boat of Names
Critical Section 143 | Original Chapter 42 — The Circle of Burden
Critical Section 144 | Original Chapter 43 — The Travelling Burden
Critical Section 145 | Original Chapter 44 — The Granddaughter's Notebook
Critical Section 146 | Original Chapter 45 — The Air Within
Critical Section 147 | Original Chapter 46 — The Darkness of Inheritance
Critical Section 148 | Original Chapter 47 — The Elephant and the Crocodile: A Narrative
Critical Section 149 | Original Chapter 48 — The Call
Critical Section 150 | Original Chapter 49 — The Record of Silence
Critical Section 151 | Original Chapter 50 — The Name after the Body
Critical Section 152 | Original Chapter 51 — The Burden of Witnessing
Critical Section 153 | Original Chapter 52 — The Next Voice
Critical Section 154 | Original Chapter 53 — Morning after the Cutting
Critical Section 155 | Original Chapter 54 — Around the Stump
Critical Section 156 | Original Chapter 55 — The Municipality's Yellow Notice
Critical Section 157 | Original Chapter 56 — The First Map of Memory
Critical Section 158 | Original Chapter 57 — Gaṅgeśa's Question
Critical Section 159 | Original Chapter 58 — The Crocodile in the Memory App
Critical Section 160 | Original Chapter 59 — Raghav Signal's New Code
Critical Section 161 | Original Chapter 60 — Satyavrat Mehta's Second Silence
Critical Section 162 | Original Chapter 61 — The First Festival of Names
Critical Section 163 | Original Chapter 62 — The Green Point
Critical Section 164 | Original Chapter 63 — The Garh Narikel Heritage Project
Inter-Sectional Conclusion: Part I, Chapters 56–63
Critical Section 165 | Original Chapter 64 — Tendering Memory
Critical Section 166 | Original Chapter 65 — Broom's Return
Critical Section 167 | Original Chapter 66 — The Harvard Research Team
Critical Section 168 | Original Chapter 67 — Meera and the Right to Look
Critical Section 169 | Original Chapter 68 — Devika versus the Memorial App
Critical Section 170 | Original Chapter 69 — The Theft of Names
Critical Section 171 | Original Chapter 70 — The Testimony of the Water-Dweller
Critical Section 172 | Original Chapter 71 — The Procession of False Ghosts
The Next Stage of the Critical Study: Original Chapters 72–91
Critical Section 173 | Original Chapter 72 — The Laughter of the Channa Tree
Critical Section 174 | Original Chapter 73 — Batuknath's Dream Court
Critical Section 175 | Original Chapter 74 — Chandrapal's First Confession
Critical Section 176 | Original Chapter 75 — Raghav: A Network Without a Signal
Critical Section 177 | Original Chapter 76 — Lau Kin-Hung's Journey to India
Critical Section 178 | Original Chapter 77 — The Crocodile at the Airport
Critical Section 179 | Original Chapter 78 — Satyavrat and Lau's Silent Dialogue
Critical Section 180 | Original Chapter 79 — Broom's Deed of Donation
Critical Section 181 | Original Chapter 80 — Hariharan's Children
Critical Section 182 | Original Chapter 81 — Batra's Incomplete Name
Critical Section 183 | Original Chapter 82 — The Elephant and Crocodile Within
Critical Section 184 | Original Chapter 83 — The Coconut-Leaf School
Critical Section 185 | Original Chapter 84 — The First Lesson: Present

Critical Section 186 | Original Chapter 85 — The Women's Night Assembly
Critical Section 187 | Original Chapter 86 — The Workers' Feet
Critical Section 188 | Original Chapter 87 — The Fast from Screens
Critical Section 189 | Original Chapter 88 — Ira's Letter to Children Abroad
Critical Section 190 | Original Chapter 89 — Satyavrat's Public Hearing
Critical Section 191 | Original Chapter 90 — The Constitution of Names
Critical Section 192 | Original Chapter 91 — The Absence of the Tricksters
Critical Section 193 | Original Chapter 92 — The Stump's Shadow
Critical Section 194 | Original Chapter 93 — The Flood Again
Critical Section 195 | Original Chapter 94 — The Return of the Crocodiles
Critical Section 196 | Original Chapter 95 — Lau Kin-Hung's Final Deal
Critical Section 197 | Original Chapter 96 — Batuknath's Belated Apology
Critical Section 198 | Original Chapter 97 — Chandrapal's Mule Account
Critical Section 199 | Original Chapter 98 — Raghav's Final Message
Critical Section 200 | Original Chapter 99 — Satyavrat Mehta's Testimony
Inter-Sectional Conclusion | Original Chapters 92–99
Critical Section 201 | Original Chapter 100 — The Elephant, the Crocodile, and a Child's Hand
Critical Section 202 | Original Chapter 101 — The Dream Invitation to a Nameless Planet
Critical Section 203 | Original Chapter 102 — Kabaddi Among Planets in a Dream
Critical Section 204 | Original Chapter 103 — Reciting Names on the Nameless Planet of the Dream
Critical Section 205 | Original Chapter 104 — Awakening: Garh Narikel Chooses Earth
Critical Section 206 | Original Chapter 105 — Earth's First Vigil
Critical Section 207 | Original Chapter 106 — The Vigil over Seeds
Critical Section 208 | Original Chapter 107 — The Theft of Seeds
Critical Section 209 | Original Chapter 108 — The Mouth of the Soil
Critical Section 210 | Original Chapter 109 — Water's Memory
Critical Section 211 | Original Chapter 110 — Fire's Testimony
Critical Section 212 | Original Chapter 111 — The Question of Air
Critical Section 213 | Original Chapter 112 — The Emptiness of the Sky
Critical Section 214 | Original Chapter 113 — The Body of Words
Critical Section 215 | Original Chapter 114 — The Soul of Meaning
Critical Section 216 | Original Chapter 115 — The Vigil over the Throat
Inter-Sectional Discussion — From Soil to the Throat
Critical Section 217 | Original Chapter 116 — The Inheritance of Silence
Critical Section 218 | Original Chapter 117 — The Debt of Memory
Critical Section 219 | Original Chapter 118 — The Right to the Body
Critical Section 220 | Original Chapter 119 — The Body of Labour
Critical Section 221 | Original Chapter 120 — The Body of Justice
Critical Section 222 | Original Chapter 121 — The Cage of Caste
Critical Section 223 | Original Chapter 122 — Gangesha's Liberation
Critical Section 224 | Original Chapter 123 — The Leaf of Tattvachintamani
Inter-Sectional Discussion — From Soil to the Leaf of Questions
Critical Section 225 | Original Chapter 124 — The Fire of Evidence
Critical Section 226 | Original Chapter 125 — The Rice of Judgment
Critical Section 227 | Original Chapter 126 — The Justice of Food
Critical Section 228 | Original Chapter 127 — Naming Hunger
Critical Section 229 | Original Chapter 128 — Naming Thirst
Critical Section 230 | Original Chapter 129 — The Oath of Salt
Critical Section 231 | Original Chapter 130 — The Justice of Taste
Critical Section 232 | Original Chapter 131 — The Shared Plate
Critical Section 233 | Original Chapter 132 — The Republic of the Kitchen

Critical Section 234 | Original Chapter 133 — The Invitation to the Videha Theatre Festival
Critical Section 235 | Original Chapter 134 — The Kabaddi Players' Dramatic Script
Critical Section 236 | Original Chapter 135 — The Staging of the Videha Theatre Festival
Critical Section 237 | Original Chapter 136 — The Silence After the Applause
Critical Section 238 | Original Chapter 137 — The Testimony of the Spectators
Critical Section 239 | Original Chapter 138 — The Procession Beyond the Stage
Critical Section 240 | Original Chapter 139 — The Road as Theatre
Critical Section 241 | Original Chapter 140 — The Moving Chaupal
Critical Section 242 | Original Chapter 141 — The Verdict of the Veranda
Critical Section 243 | Original Chapter 142 — The Darkness of the Record Room
Critical Section 244 | Original Chapter 143 — The Testimony of the Discarded Sack
Critical Section 245 | Original Chapter 144 — The Journey of Names
Critical Section 246 | Original Chapter 145 — The First Crack in Fear
Critical Section 247 | Original Chapter 146 — The Stain of the Seal
Critical Section 248 | Original Chapter 147 — The Knock at Every Door
Critical Section 249 | Original Chapter 148 — Detecting the Adulteration
Critical Section 250 | Original Chapter 149 — Mapping the Network
Critical Section 251 | Original Chapter 150 — The Shadow of the Seal
Critical Section 252 | Original Chapter 151 — The Hand that Wielded the Seal
Critical Section 253 | Original Chapter 152 — The Source of the Order
Critical Section 254 | Original Chapter 153 — The Names Behind the Signs
Critical Section 255 | Original Chapter 154 — Baba's Words
Critical Section 256 | Original Chapter 155 — The Service Accounts
Critical Section 257 | Original Chapter 156 — The Debt of Charity
Critical Section 258 | Original Chapter 157 — The Iron Chest
Critical Section 259 | Original Chapter 158 — Comparing the Consent Notebook
Critical Section 260 | Original Chapter 159 — The Consent of the Dead
Critical Section 261 | Original Chapter 160 — The Shadow of the Warehouse
Critical Section 262 | Original Chapter 161 — Captive on the Telephone
Critical Section 263 | Original Chapter 162 — The Seal of the Voice
Critical Section 264 | Original Chapter 163 — Traces of the Removed Papers
Critical Section 265 | Original Chapter 164 — The Belly of Chandrapal's Shadow
Critical Section 266 | Original Chapter 165 — The Body of the Shadow
Critical Section 267 | Original Chapter 166 — The Storehouse at Imli Ghat
Critical Section 268 | Original Chapter 167 — The Voice Across the River
Critical Section 269 | Original Chapter 168 — The Throat of the City
Critical Section 270 | Original Chapter 169 — The Door of Chandra Two
Critical Section 271 | Original Chapter 170 — The Shell of Chandra One
Critical Section 272 | Original Chapter 171 — The Invisible Court at Channa Grove
Critical Section 273 | Original Chapter 172 — Reading the Knot
Critical Section 274 | Original Chapter 173 — The Vigil over the Register
Critical Section 275 | Original Chapter 174 — The Threshold of the Invisible Court
Critical Section 276 | Original Chapter 175 — The Name of the Seal-Bearer
Critical Section 277 | Original Chapter 176 — The Darkness of the Service Ceremony
Critical Section 278 | Original Chapter 177 — Papers from House to House
Critical Section 279 | Original Chapter 178 — The Upper Room
Critical Section 280 | Original Chapter 179 — The Footprints of the Seal
Inter-sectional Discussion: From the Knots to the Footprints of the Seal
Critical Section 281 | Original Chapter 180 — The City's Accounts
Critical Section 282 | Original Chapter 181 — The Shadow of the SIM
Critical Section 283 | Original Chapter 182 — The Door of the Harihar Service Centre
Critical Section 284 | Original Chapter 183 — The Face Inside the Phone
Critical Section 285 | Original Chapter 184 — The Mask of the Voice

Critical Section 286 | Original Chapter 185 — The Master's Room
Critical Section 287 | Original Chapter 186 — Madhavesh's Real Name
Critical Section 288 | Original Chapter 187 — The Queen Inside the Hive
Inter-Sectional Discussion: From the City's Accounts to the Queen Inside the Hive
Critical Section 289 | Original Chapter 188 — Maheshwar's Seal
Critical Section 290 | Original Chapter 189 — The Iron Chest
Critical Section 291 | Original Chapter 190 — The Blue Register
Critical Section 292 | Original Chapter 191 — Dhruvesh's Chair
Critical Section 293 | Original Chapter 192 — The Voice of the Switched-Off Recorder
Critical Section 294 | Original Chapter 193 — The Face of the Voice
Critical Section 295 | Original Chapter 194 — The Summons of Breath
Critical Section 296 | Original Chapter 195 — The Frozen Account
Inter-Sectional Analysis: From Maheshwar's Seal to the Frozen Account
Critical Section 297 | Original Chapter 196 — The Meaning of Water Burial
Critical Section 298 | Original Chapter 197 — The Names That Rose
Critical Section 299 | Original Chapter 198 — The Criminal's Earth
Critical Section 300 | Original Chapter 199 — The Dawn Inside the Chest
Critical Section 301 | Original Chapter 200 — The Guardians of Names
Inter-Sectional Analysis: From the Meaning of Water Burial to the Guardians of Names
Overall Narratological Conclusion: Memory and Living Vigilance
Final Critical Chapter: How Inconsistency Becomes a Narrative Method
PART III | THE INNER LIFE OF NARRATIVE
Critical Introduction: Work, Evidence and Method
Chapter 1 — The Kitchen of the Dead
Chapter 2 — Twenty-Seven Names
Chapter 3 — Time at the Crossroads
Chapter 4 — The River's First Home
Comparative Conclusions on the First Four Chapters of the Adi Parva
Chapter 5 — Janaka's Measure
Chapter 6 — The Household Tables
Chapter 7 — The Bench of Five Generations
Chapter 8 — The Letter from Simatirtha
Chapters 5–8: Comparative Narratological Conclusions
Chapter 9 — The Blocked Drainage Channel
Chapter 10 — The Shadow of a Name
Chapter 11 — My Phone, My Conditions
Chapter 12 — The City Behind the Ghat
Adi Parva / Bala Kanda: Combined Narratological Conclusions on Chapters 9–12
Chapter 13 — The Dead Woman Who Was Summoned
Chapter 14 — The Representative's Chair
Chapter 15 — Draupadi's Question
Chapter 16 — The Silence After Vikarna
Sabha Parva / Ayodhya Kanda: A Combined Study of Chapters 13–16
Chapter 17 — Kaikeyi's Debt
Chapter 18 — Urmila's Night
Chapter 19 — Champa's Message
Chapter 20 — Premature Publication
Sabha Parva / Ayodhya Kanda: Comparative Narratological Study of Chapters 17–20
Chapter 21 — Whose Voice?
Chapter 22 — The Order Concerning the Home
Chapter 23 — Bharata's Refusal
Chapter 24 — The Outer Veranda

Sabha Parva / Ayodhya Kanda: Comprehensive Parva-wise Narratological Assessment of Chapters 13–24
Vana Parva / Aranya Kanda
Chapter 25 — An Empty Space on the Train
Chapter 26 — Guha's Riverbank
Chapter 27 — Shabari's Dawn
Chapter 28 — Hidimba's Pact
Vana Parva / Aranya Kanda: Comparative Discussion of Chapters 25–28
Chapter 29 — Child Thief
Chapter 30 — Ahalya's Voice
Chapter 31 — Ekalavya's Lesson
Chapter 32 — Now, Whose Inquiry?
Vana Parva / Aranya Kanda: Comparative Criticism of Chapters 29–32
Chapter 33 — The Lamp and the Paper
Chapter 34 — The Unseen Cause
Chapter 35 — Recognising the Gavaya
Chapter 36 — The School Outside
Vana Parva / Aranya Kanda: Overall Critical Assessment of Chapters 25–36
Chapter 37 — The Cook's Name
Chapter 38 — Brihannala's Class
Chapter 39 — The Weaver's Dues
Chapter 40 — The Laundry Register
Virata Parva / Aranya Kanda: A Combined Critical Study of Chapters 37–40
Chapter 41 — The Carpenter's Signature
Chapter 42 — The Future of Clay
Chapter 43 — The Brassworker and the Goldsmith
Chapter 44 — The Blacksmith's Tools
Virata Parva / Aranya Kanda: Comparative Criticism of Chapters 41–44
Chapter 45 — The Weaver's Consignment
Chapter 46 — Washerfolk, Dyers, and Cotton Carders
Chapter 47 — Measuring the Gate
Chapter 48 — Three Reasons for Disguise
Virata Parva / Aranya Kanda: Overall Critical Assessment of Chapters 37–48
Udyoga Parva / Kishkindha Kanda
Chapter 49 — The Price of Cooperation
Chapter 50 — Sugriva's Fear
Chapter 51 — Tara's Reckoning
Chapter 52 — Angada's Tomorrow
Udyoga Parva / Kishkindha Kanda: Combined Criticism of Chapters 49–52
Chapter 53 — Ruhani's Key
Chapter 54 — A Ritual Without a Chief
Chapter 55 — The Missing Child's Mother
Chapter 56 — Medicine Given in Charity
Udyoga Parva / Kishkindha Kanda: Combined Assessment of Chapters 53–56
Chapter 57 — Janaka and the People of the Realm
Chapter 58 — The Web of Causes
Chapter 59 — The Envoy's Conditions
Chapter 60 — The First Agreement Falls Through Udyoga Parva / Kishkindha Kanda: Comprehensive Critical Assessment of Chapters 49–60
Bhishma Parva / Sundara Kanda
Chapter 61 — Ganga's Condition
Chapter 62 — Bhishma's Vow
Chapter 63 — Amba's Time

Chapter 64 — Shikhandi's Decision
The First Four Chapters of Bhishma Parva: Comparative Critical Conclusions
Chapter 65 — The Old Hospital Wing
Chapter 66 — The Pause of Krishna and Arjuna
Chapter 67 — Seeing from Afar
Chapter 68 — A Copy of the Warning
Bhishma Parva / Sundara Kanda: Comparative Criticism of Chapters 65–68
Chapter 69 — The Meaning of Absence
Chapter 70 — Mahesh's Night
Chapter 71 — Death and Documents
Chapter 72 — Sanjaya's Distance
Bhishma Parva / Sundara Kanda: Comprehensive Critical Assessment of Chapters 61–72
Chapter 73 — The Landing at Simatirtha
Chapter 74 — Drona's Due
Chapter 75 — The Same Final Digit
Chapter 76 — After Ekalavya
Drona Parva / Sundara Kanda: Comparative Criticism of Chapters 73–76
Chapter 77 — Trijata's Message
Chapter 78 — Mandodari's Household
Chapter 79 — The Resemblance of Faces
Chapter 80 — The Weaver's Second Account
Drona Parva / Sundara Kanda: Joint Critical Assessment of Chapters 77–80
Chapter 81 — The Child's Other Place
Chapter 82 — Maithili's Pages
Chapter 83 — Sarita's Labour
Chapter 84 — The Teacher's Acknowledgment
Drona Parva / Sundara Kanda: Overall Critical Assessment of Chapters 73–84
Chapter 85 — Radha's Labour
Chapter 86 — The Original Page
Chapter 87 — Five Changed Identities
Chapter 88 — Fourteen Discrepancies
Karna Parva / Sundara Kanda: Joint Critical Assessment of Chapters 85–88
Chapter 89 — Four Alive, Four Dead
Chapter 90 — Subhadra's Conditions
Chapter 91 — A Convenient Error
Chapter 92 — The Breaking of an Accusation
Karna Parva / Sundara Kanda: Joint Critical Assessment of Chapters 89–92
Chapter 93 — The Connection Between Consignments
Chapter 94 — The Rights of the Foster Parent
Chapter 95 — The Order to Kill
Chapter 96 — Reconciling the Twenty-Seven Karna Parva / Sundara Kanda: Overall Critical Assessment of Chapters 85–96
Chapter 97 — Shalya's Loyalty
Chapter 98 — Vibhishana's Path
Chapter 99 — Kumbhakarna's Awakening
Chapter 100 — The Second Agreement
Shalya Parva / Yuddha Kanda: Joint Critical Assessment of Chapters 97–100
Chapter 101 — The Patient's Time
Chapter 102 — Layers of Repair
Chapter 103 — The Positive Argument
Chapter 104 — The Question of Power
Shalya Parva / Yuddha Kanda: Joint Critical Assessment of Chapters 101–104
Chapter 105 — Binout's Bridge

Chapter 106 — Acknowledgment in Treatment
Chapter 107 — Five Signatures
Chapter 108 — Beyond the Water Level
Shalya Parva / Yuddha Kanda: Comprehensive Joint Narratological Assessment of Chapters 97–108
Sauptika Parva / Yuddha Kanda
Chapter 109 — The Night Agreement
Chapter 110 — The Warehouse Opens
Chapter 111 — The Capacity of a Boat
Chapter 112 — Ishaan's Hand
Sauptika Parva / Yuddha Kanda: Joint Narratological Assessment of Chapters 109–112
Chapter 113 — Ashwatthama's Night
Chapter 114 — Medicine and the Breath That Remains Chapter 115 — Permission for the Image
Chapter 116 — The Old Wing
Sauptika Parva / Yuddha Kanda: Joint Narratological Assessment of Chapters 113–116
Chapter 117 — Naira's Choice
Chapter 118 — Urmila's Tired Hand
Chapter 119 — The Distance of Delay
Chapter 120 — Before Dawn
Sauptika Parva / Yuddha Kanda: Overall Critical Assessment of Chapters 109–120
Chapter 121 — Confirmation of Names
Chapter 122 — The Last Body
Chapter 123 — Gandhari's Question
Chapter 124 — Inside Mandodari
Stri Parva / Yuddha Kanda: Joint Narratological Assessment of Chapters 121–124
Chapter 125 — Kunti's Confession
Chapter 126 — The Measure of Rice
Chapter 127 — The Guilt of Survival
Chapter 128 — Champa's Treatment
Stri Parva / Yuddha Kanda: Joint Narratological Assessment of Chapters 125–128
Chapter 129 — Ruhani's List
Chapter 130 — Draupadi's Remaining Days
Chapter 131 — Sita's Fire
Chapter 132 — After the Number
Stri Parva / Yuddha Kanda: Comprehensive Joint Narratological Assessment of Chapters 121–132
Shanti Parva / Uttara Kanda
Chapter 133 — Who Will Govern?
Chapter 134 — Yudhishthira's Reluctance
Chapter 135 — Bhishma's Bed
Chapter 136 — The First Statement
Shanti Parva / Uttara Kanda: Joint Narratological Assessment of Chapters 133–136
Chapter 137 — The Old Report
Chapter 138 — Separate Categories of Responsibility
Chapter 139 — The Return of Argument
Chapter 140 — Action and Cause
Shanti Parva / Uttara Kanda: Joint Narratological Assessment of Chapters 137–140
Chapter 141 — Help and Litigation
Chapter 142 — The Source of the Medicines
Chapter 143 — The Shelter's Rules
Chapter 144 — The Question of Work
Shanti Parva / Uttara Kanda: Overall Narratological Assessment of Chapters 133–144

ANUSHASANA PARVA / UTTARA KANDA
Chapter 145 — The Ration Queue
Chapter 146 — Fakira's Pass
Chapter 147 — Sanket's Classroom
Chapter 148 — Padma's Fee
Anushasana Parva / Uttara Kanda: Joint Narratological Assessment of Chapters 145–148
Chapter 149 — Janki's Rebuttal
Chapter 150 — Face and Evidence
Chapter 151 — Shambuka's Lesson
Chapter 152 — The Debt of Clay
Anushasana Parva / Uttara Kanda: Joint Narratological Assessment of Chapters 149–152
Chapter 153 — Measuring the River
Chapter 154 — The Document of Consent
Chapter 155 — Testimony of Violence
Chapter 156 — The Exception to the Rule
Anushasana Parva / Uttara Kanda: Overall Narratological Assessment of Chapters 145–156
ASHVAMEDHA PARVA / UTTARA KANDA
Chapter 157 — The Path of the Released Horse
Chapter 158 — Arjuna's Identity
Chapter 159 — Records in Motion
Chapter 160 — Sarita's Contribution
Ashvamedha Parva / Uttara Kanda: Joint Narratological Assessment of Chapters 157–160
Chapter 161 — Maithili's Own Name
Chapter 162 — The Claim of the Knower
Chapter 163 — An Old Book, a New Preface
Chapter 164 — What Is Owed to Urmila
Ashvamedha Parva / Uttara Kanda: Joint Narratological Assessment of Chapters 161–164
Chapter 165 — The Import of a Sentence
Chapter 166 — The Weaver's Market
Chapter 167 — Measurement Without an Emperor
Chapter 168 — The Copy That Returned
Ashvamedha Parva / Uttara Kanda: Joint Narratological Assessment of Chapters 165–168
Ashvamedha Parva / Uttara Kanda: Complete Narratological Assessment of Chapters 157–168
Chapter 169 — Dhritarashtra's Hand
Chapter 170 — Gandhari's Departure
Chapter 171 — Kunti's Remaining Words
Chapter 172 — Ishaan's Room
Ashramavasika Parva / Uttara Kanda — Joint Narratological Assessment of Chapters 169–172
Chapter 173 — Maithili's Distance
Chapter 174 — Mother's Medicine
Chapter 175 — Kabir's Letter
Chapter 176 — Sarita's Dawn
Ashramavasika Parva / Uttara Kanda — Joint Narratological Assessment of Chapters 173–176
Chapter 177 — The Elder's Consent
Chapter 178 — Vidura's Path
Chapter 179 — Personal Forgiveness
Chapter 180 — Outside the Shelter
Chapter 181 — The Yadavas' Festival
Chapter 182 — The Intoxicating Day
Chapter 183 — The Memorial Contract
Chapter 184 — Ruhani's Election
ASHRAMAVASIKA PARVA / UTTARA KANDA: COMPLETE COMPARATIVE NARRATOLOGICAL ASSESSMENT OF CHAPTERS 169–180

MAUSALA PARVA / UTTARA KANDA: FIRST COMPARATIVE NARRATOLOGICAL ASSESSMENT OF CHAPTERS 181–184
Chapter 185 — Conditions of the Donation
Chapter 186 — Tara's Error
Chapter 187 — The Kitchen's Deficit
Chapter 188 — The Market for Tools
Chapter 189 — Balarama's Withdrawal
Chapter 190 — Krishna's End
Chapter 191 — Not Everything Has Broken
Chapter 192 — Fear of a New Owner
Mausala Parva / Uttara Kanda: Joint Interim Narratological Assessment of Chapters 185–188
Mausala Parva / Uttara Kanda: Comprehensive Narratological Assessment of Chapters 181–192
Mahaprasthanika Parva / Uttara Kanda
Chapter 193 — The Announcement of the Journey
Chapter 194 — Draupadi's Path
Chapter 195 — The Distance between the Brothers
Chapter 196 — Fakira's Station
Chapter 197 — The First Room
Chapter 198 — The Dead Person's Phone
Chapter 199 — A Story without a Name
Chapter 200 — The Final Examination of Words
Mahaprasthanika Parva / Uttara Kanda: Joint Narratological Assessment of Chapters 193–200
Chapter 201 — Farewell at Simatirtha
Chapter 202 — Kabir's Return
Chapter 203 — A Living Companion
Chapter 204 — Not a Mountain but a Doorway
Svargarohana Parva / Uttara Kanda
Chapter 205 — The Register of Heaven
Chapter 206 — Uttara and Parikshit
Chapter 207 — Janamejaya's Question
Chapter 208 — Listeners of Ugrashrava
Mahaprasthanika Parva / Uttara Kanda: Comprehensive Narratological Assessment of Chapters 193–204
Svargarohana Parva / Uttara Kanda: Joint Assessment of Chapters 205–208
Chapter 209 — The Recitation of Lava and Kusha
Chapter 210 — Bhamati's Fourth Sutra
Chapter 211 — Udayana's Remaining Argument
Chapter 212 — Gangesha's Classroom
Chapter 213 — Maithili's Own Voice
Chapter 214 — Naira's Empty Place
Chapter 215 — Distributed Records
Chapter 216 — Kurukshetram of the Inner Mind
Svargarohana Parva / Uttara Kanda: Overall Narratological Assessment of Chapters 205–216
The Whole Novel: A Narratological Assessment
Incongruity and Narrative Method

PART II / TOME V

Treatises, Essays and Literary Criticism

Theory and Applied Studies

Gajendra Thakur · Videha

translated from original Maithili by the author himself

Original Maithili edition: © Gajendra Thakur & Preeti Thakur, 2009, 2026. Original-edition ISBN: 978-93-344-8981-1.

PART I — THEORY

Section A — Theoretical Treatises

Critical Methods and Theoretical Foundations

1. Treatises, Essays and Criticism: Critical Theory and the Criticism of Criticism

Abstract

Should there be a theoretical purpose for the principles of criticism, and for art and literature in Maithili? The various literary genres—poetry, treatises, essays, criticism, short fiction, the novel, epistolary writing, travel memoirs, reportage, drama and one-act plays—are heard, recited, read or performed for pleasure.

Keywords: treatise · essay · critical theory · literary criticism · Maithili

Summary · Abstract

This chapter discusses "Treatises, Essays and Criticism; Critical Theory and the Criticism of Criticism." Should there be a theoretical purpose for the principles of criticism, art and literature in Maithili? The various literary genres—poetry, treatises, essays, criticism, short fiction, the novel, epistolary literature, travel memoirs, reportage, drama and one-act plays—are heard, recited, read or performed for entertainment. They may be purposeful, or may also contain purposelessness and absurdity, for amid the upheavals of life, even purposeless literature provides entertainment. In ancient times, art, literature and music were passed from one generation to another. Padapāṭha, kramapāṭha, jaṭāpāṭha, śikhāpāṭha and ghanapāṭha were systematic methods of memorisation.

Should there be a theoretical purpose for the principles of criticism, and for art and literature in Maithili? The various literary genres—poetry, treatises, essays, criticism, short fiction, the novel, epistolary writing, travel memoirs, reportage, drama and one-act plays—are heard, recited, read or performed for pleasure. They may be purposeful, but they may also embody purposelessness or absurdity; amid the upheavals of life, even literature without an apparent purpose affords pleasure. In ancient times, art, literature and music passed from one generation to another. Padapāṭha, kramapāṭha, jaṭāpāṭha, śikhāpāṭha and ghanapāṭha were systematic methods of memorisation. The Yajurveda described methods of building houses, altars and other artistic constructions; these were further elaborated in commentaries and became some of the earliest foundations of archaeology. The organisation of music lent the Sāmaveda its distinctive character. Attempts were thus made to give literature, art and music definite forms so that others might reproduce them in the same manner. In this process began the criticism of art, literature and music, or the analysis of their qualities.

Eastern and Western thinkers alike considered what purpose art, literature and music serve in society and what ethical standards should govern them. Plato argues that no art can be good, since it is all false and unreal. Yet art, music and literature may also be pursued for one's own delight: reading, listening, viewing and experiencing them can bring joy and peace of mind, though they may also disturb us. Aristotle, by contrast, regards artists as possessing knowledge and helping us to understand the world. Art is an aesthetically transformed representation of the world. Freud considers every human being mysterious; he selects literary works as a means of analysing the writer. Neo-Freudians, however, place greater emphasis upon cultural rather than biological factors. New Criticism is grounded in detailed attention to the work itself. Postmodernism, existentialism and humanism are all currents of philosophical thought. Philosophy formerly encompassed science, history, society and politics, economics, the sciences of art, and language. As the branches of science and the arts became increasingly specialised—science in particular—philosophy came to be confined, in its relation to mathematics and science, largely to mathematical logic. Philosophical enquiry moved towards induction and deduction and towards analytical methods.

Marx, who appeared to the poor of the world almost as a providential intervention, made the dialectical method the basis of his interpretation. Today's discussion or disputation, embracing both proposition and counter-proposition, had already existed within the Indian philosophical traditions, particularly the six systems, in the procedures of refutation and establishment exemplified by Mādhavācārya's Sarvadarśanasaṃgraha. Francis Fukuyama, who announced the end of history following the collapse of communist rule, subsequently retreated from that declaration. After the end of communism, it appeared that history, understood as a struggle between two ideologies, had ended with the disappearance of one of them. Fukuyama declared that this was the end of history produced by ideological conflict, and that henceforth only an ideology concerned with human welfare would advance. Later, however, he acknowledged the continued existence of many divergent ideologies within societies and among nationalities. When the Berlin Wall fell, his view had been that the disappearance of communism ended the history founded on conflict, since the world had become unipolar. He now recognises that dispossessed groups exist everywhere, and that their civilisations and histories generate conflict; history, therefore, continues.

Postmodernism too has lost momentum after its initial enthusiasm. Existentialism, humanism, progressivism, Romanticism and sociological analysis have survived by entering into synthetic methods of criticism. Psychoanalysis, on account of its scientific foundations, will continue to survive, like the dialectical method. The postmodern outlook challenges the completeness of scientific knowledge. Truth and falsehood are described according to different points of view; self-centred humour accompanies a fading distinction between good and evil. Truth may at any moment become falsehood. Thought can remain superficial; there is neither optimism nor necessarily pessimism, but a kind of wilfulness in which the same thing can be conceived in several ways. Rather than trusting the outcomes of perspective, causation, control and planning, it places greater trust in chance. Democratic and feminist positions, and symbols of ideologies such as the red flag, become objects of humour and play. Postmodernism brought forward questions concerning women and many communities pushed outside the mainstream by globalisation. It opposed ideology and universal goals but could offer no answer of its own. Similarly, Jacques Derrida's deconstruction of language demonstrated that its constituent parts depend upon numerous other foundations, without understanding which we cannot establish meaning.

The analytical philosophy of positivism examines linguistic propositions and concepts rather than things themselves. Analytical or logical positivism and existentialism arose in response to science, and ambiguities in scientific thought were thereby clarified. Phenomenology studies what is given to consciousness precisely as it is given. Experience is the observation of the facts of a particular mental act; it offers a means of viewing an object independently and in its pure form. In existentialism, the human being is nothing other than the human being: one is not separate from what one creates. Sartre says that humanity is condemned to be free. Hegel's dialectic places emphasis on judging the qualities and existence of a process through the endless interplay of analysis and synthesis. The deeper the underlying principle, the further it lies from outward form and the closer it is to reality.

Quantum theory and the uncertainty principle have also influenced modern thinking. Beneath visible reality, internal and external processes are made possible through the exchange of minute elements of force and energy. According to the principle of uncertainty, position and form must be determined by approximation. The conception of a universe with more than three dimensions and Stephen Hawking's A Brief History of Time directly challenge the existence of God; with them, even the concept of God's death comes into view. Whatever has begun will end, however long its life may be. Just as virtual reality artificially presents reality and makes consciousness identify with it, without imagining more than three dimensions we would not have reached the far side of the universe even if we had travelled at the speed of light since the Indus Valley civilisation. These scientific and philosophical propositions confront literature as challenges. A holistic or comprehensive synthesis is needed: only then can philosophy pass from the merely philosophical into the real.

Poststructuralist methodology locates linguistic meaning not in words, their fixed meanings or grammatical rules, but in the process through which meaning is produced. That meaning differs among persons and groups of every kind. There is no final relationship between language and the world, no final or uniquely determinate meaning of a word or its text. Modern and postmodern arguments concerning reality, dialogue and the exchange of ideas shaped the emergence of modernity. New Left movements arose in France, alongside tendencies such as nihilism and anarchism. These movements rested on distrust that had moved beyond modern modes of thought and their established beliefs and concepts. Concealed meanings in texts began to be interpreted in their temporal and spatial contexts, while language was treated as a game—a language-game. Postmodernism arose as a critique of power, legitimacy and their stratification.

In the computer and information revolution, a programmer creates software and places it on the World Wide Web, where the software continues to function independently of its maker, at times even performing tasks for which it was never designed. Intrusive software, such as a virus, can divert it from its course and make it destructive; an antivirus is itself software that attempts to repair the damage. When even this fails, the computer is backed up and formatted: a clean slate. Capitalism arose with the Industrial Revolution. In post-industrial society, information and communication have gained importance over production, and computers play an expanding social role. Mobile phones, credit cards and comparable devices are based on chips. Ideas of deconstruction and reconstruction point towards the restructuring of creative processes and the new ways in which consciousness is formed in the post-industrial age. It is not history itself, but traditional history, that has ended. State, class, nation, political party, society, family, morality and marriage are all being redefined. Rapid change has fragmented many institutions and deprived them of their former contexts.

An information society is one in which the creation, distribution, dissemination, use, integration and modification of information constitute important economic, political and cultural activities. Those able to participate in such a society are called digital citizens. In this post-industrial order, information technology shapes production, the economy and society. The concept is close to those of postmodern and post-industrial society. The economist Fritz Machlup introduced the concept. His idea of the knowledge industry rested on five areas: education, research and development, the media, information technology and information services. It thus reveals the social effects of technology and information. The digital divide is at once a division of knowledge, society and economic resources. It shows the need for a non-discriminatory information society in which developing countries enjoy sovereign rights over information technology. Human rights in relation to information technology include the individual's right to privacy. Scholars, human-rights activists and others have begun debating whether a society founded upon information and communication technology will strengthen or damage human rights, particularly freedom of expression, the right to information, privacy, non-discrimination, women's equality, intellectual property, political participation and freedom of association.

The confidentiality of online correspondence, cultural and linguistic diversity in internet content, media education and the technical instruments of the information society are bound up with rights and freedoms, and with society's overall development. They bear upon the universality of rights and freedoms, the differences among rights, and participation in the determination of liberty and values. They make information, knowledge and culture easier to access, turning the user into an actor within the global information society. Users thereby acquire greater freedom of expression and the ability to create new content and new social networks. This also gives rise to a need for new legal, economic and social models founded upon shared responsibility, knowledge and cooperation. The interests of children are another concern and should always take precedence over those of adults.

The modern tendency to accumulate economic, social and cultural wealth has intensified in the information society, while technology has brought a form of structural unemployment. Poverty, workers' rights and the idea of the welfare state are being pushed aside by calculations of profit and loss. Only a handful of leading actors are now wanted. Publishers, too, promote only a few authors whose books sell particularly well; the same tendency is visible in theatre, painting, cinema and other fields. Information, however, is not always beneficial. It encompasses not only art and books but also the stock market and sponsored survey reports. It reduces the distance between time and space and establishes a balance between them. The principle of human dignity shifts emphasis away from status assigned at birth towards the universal right to dignity. Movements for liberation and women's liberation have worked in this direction. After the two world wars and the challenge of fascism, the United Nations General Assembly proclaimed and adopted the Universal Declaration of Human Rights on 10 December 1948. It established a common standard for all peoples and nations, without discrimination on political, economic, cultural or religious grounds.

Yet the free use of information is limited, and people's privacy is disappearing. During a visit to India, Bill Gates was asked whether Microsoft had delayed introducing its Xbox in India for fear of piracy; he replied that Microsoft had never delayed a product for that reason. The fear of spam and piracy ought to end. The information society is the society in which we live today. Respect for democracy and human rights must continue in the information society and in the society that follows it. Freedom of expression, the right to privacy, the right to share information and the right of access to it—all of which concern the communication of information—remain threatened by the state and by the market-oriented tendencies of the information society.

The internet is a medium belonging to the people, a system through which individuals communicate with one another. It breaks down the strongholds of those who have dominated the communications media. In general, the internet has no editor. People themselves create subjects and content and disseminate what they produce. This initiates many social conversations, but it also gives circulation to antisocial material. Should such material therefore be prohibited? If software is allowed to empower a machine to impose restrictions on content, freedom of expression will suffer a serious blow.

In India, intellectual-property law grants an author's heirs the right to publish and distribute the work for sixty years after the author's death. Piracy must be restrained on the internet as well, and arrangements must ensure that the author's rights over the material remain effective in practice, not merely in principle, throughout those sixty years. Excessive reliance on patents, however, will obstruct developing countries' access to information and impede technological development. Copyright can also foster cultural development, as in the growth of music, film, comics and illustrated narratives. In a digital environment, one cannot even view material online without making a copy; accordingly, online and offline copyright are not entirely the same. Online copyright also restricts reproduction, although it is extremely easy to incorporate copied material into something else or to modify it. Names and images should not be used without their creators' permission. No one should intrude upon another person's private conversations or chats, nor make statements that create false impressions of another person.

Likewise, when employers install electronic devices to monitor their employees, their conduct should accord with the guidelines of the International Labour Organization. Unsolicited email messages and the unauthorised collection or use of medical reports also constitute violations of human rights. Internet use nevertheless remains restricted because much content and software is expensive rather than freely available. The digital divide makes differences in educational attainment more conspicuous. Since information work involves more mental than physical labour, there was a hope that gender inequality might diminish in the information society. Surveys, however, show that women's participation in information technology remains limited. Electronic libraries, Braille-enabled and audio-enabled computer screens, and comparable facilities may allow disabled and blind people to engage in e-commerce from home; yet the cost of research and its results has prevented these technologies from delivering their full benefits. Children, older people, disabled people, women, workers, migrant workers and other socially disadvantaged groups continue to experience disadvantage in the information society. As their access to information technology increases, inequality within that society can diminish.

Good literature and art do not come into being through the mere immediacy of presentation. Their foundation lies in sharply articulated human values, elements of social harmony, and principles of social belief grounded in equality and justice. We must ask whether a work conveys with sufficient force a vision of how society might advance upon those foundations. Does it free the reader's mind from its constraints? Does it encourage self-confidence and the capacity to lead others? Does it remove doubts about the formation of character and about respect for labour? Such questions should become standards by which short fiction is judged. Those who live on society's margins may accomplish things beyond the abilities of the privileged; this can become possible when the self-confidence of the marginalised grows.

How can literature burdened by a sense of inferiority promote human welfare? Within changing social, economic, political and religious relationships, the one-sidedness of representation and the uncertainties of a poet's or storyteller's personal commitments—whether to ideology, caste or religion—inevitably become visible in the writing. We must identify the sense of superiority, itself another form of inferiority, that appears in stories about favours bestowed by oppressors upon the oppressed or written out of the oppressor's guilt.

Mediocrity must be recognised. Stock phrases and the fleeting currency of breaking news, offered in the name of modernity, cannot provide ideas capable of engaging with the propositions of an age. Modernisation, democratisation, the implementation of the nation-state, administrative and legal development, greater public participation, stability, the capacity for orderly change, the dynamics of power and industrialisation all intersect. After independence, the processes of transformation and integration through which new states confront their political, social, economic and cultural problems may sometimes be mutually contradictory. Attention must also be paid to the development of community and to psychological and educational processes.

Indigenous communities such as the Satar and Gidarmara (Banjara) reflect diversity, closeness to nature, nature worship, simplicity, innocence, gratitude and differing levels of development. An individual's standing often depends on locality and caste. Certain castes possess prestige and privilege, whereas others are despised and endure difficult lives.

The Rigveda refers to twenty-one women seers: Apala, Ghosha, Shraddha, Shachi, Sarparajni, Yami, Vaivasvati, Devajamaya, Indrani, Shashvati, Romasha, Godha, Urvashi, Surya, Aditi, Nadi, Lopamudra, Vishvavara, Vak-Juhu, Sarama and Yami. To secure women's rights in the fields of women and child development, the education system must be mobilised and women's studies given a prominent place in the curriculum. The proportion of women in vocational and technical education should increase. Feminism and the women's movement have made an impact in this direction. Secular political institutions, grounded in the economic and social interests of entire communities, can promote social values free from discrimination based on religion, race or creed. If educational development precedes economic development, ordinary people will be able to participate in it. Such participation increases creative capacity and the sense of responsibility.

Science and technology have heightened the need to reconcile the gap between developed and less developed, or developing, nations with the aspiration to solve human problems—disease, ignorance and insecurity—and with the apparently unlimited expansion of hopes, possibilities and material facilities. The legal system should be used to secure justice for poor and disadvantaged groups. Civil liberty, democratic rights, freedom of thought, the creation of a capable society and freedom from constraint and oppression are fundamental values. Together with these, the press—as a link between rulers and ruled—plays a significant role in social, economic and political life. Powerful advertising agencies, however, are increasingly proving capable of shaping public opinion.

The creation of new institutions and the reform of existing ones, resistance to feudal, tribal, caste and sectarian loyalties, and the practices of democracy, liberalism, republicanism, constitutionalism, socialism and egalitarianism all remain important. Constitutional rights, regularly scheduled popular elections, popular sovereignty, the federal division of powers, the significance of public opinion, public-administrative processes and initiatives, the formation of party-interest groups, a supreme legislature, an accountable executive and an independent judiciary continue to perform their respective roles. Meanwhile, pollution and ecological imbalance are being produced by harmful changes to the physical, chemical and biological qualities of water, land and air.

Michel Foucault argues that knowledge and truth are constructed. Deleuze and Guattari contend that we desire because we are desiring-machines. Mikhail Bakhtin regards language as a social act, and his work concentrates on the novel. The Russian Formalists treat literature as a distinctive use of language. According to Jean-François Lyotard, truth and the truth of history are merely apparent. Baudrillard maintains that advertising and television have erased the distinction between reality and appearance. Both are leading thinkers of postmodernism.

Lacan's distinctive contribution is the linguistic application of Freud's method. He holds that the unconscious is structured like a language. When a child learns language, a word is taught in relation to a sign. Lacan elaborates three elements: desire, lack and the Other. Desire contains both need and demand, yet cannot be divided into these two alone. The description of the Other introduces lack and emptiness. The subject is a momentary effect of meaning, and it becomes like the Other when it is imaginary and gives rise to lack, from which desire emerges.

Three major thinkers of postcolonialism are Homi Bhabha, associated with Foucault and Lacan; Gayatri Spivak, associated with Foucault and Derrida; and Edward Said, associated with Foucault. They interpret the practices and theoretical constructions through which colonialism attributed qualities such as cunning and indolence to colonised peoples.

Raymond Williams's cultural studies demonstrate the relationship between literature and economic conditions. New Historicism compares the textuality of history with the historicity of texts. Elaine Showalter identifies psychological, biological and linguistic characteristics of women's writing. Simone de Beauvoir regards class and caste as obstacles to women's commitment to women, a position challenged by later feminist theory. Virginia Woolf considers economic independence and privacy essential to women writers, although her views have not been regarded as revolutionary. Mary Wollstonecraft advocated a revolution in women's education, with an emphasis on education in reason.

Within New Criticism, T. S. Eliot opposed the predominance of emotion in poetry and insisted upon impersonality. One responsibility of the critic is to refine public taste. Wimsatt and Beardsley argued that criticism should rest neither on the poet's intentions nor on historical study. Nor should it depend upon emotional effects on readers, since these are relative; it should be grounded in the actual verbal substance of the work. The beginnings of English criticism may be traced to Philip Sidney, who considered poetry in relation to beauty, meaning and human welfare. John Dryden reflected on moral instruction in ancient literature and its advantages and disadvantages. Samuel Johnson wrote about the comic and tragic elements in Shakespeare's plays.

Rousseau's Romanticism does not doubt the fundamental goodness of human beings, whereas classical critics are sceptical and neoclassical critics hold that human nature is corrupt but institutions can improve it. Romanticism nevertheless argues that institutions themselves are corrupt and only help corrupt people. It understands poetry as personal experience. Structuralism attacked modern positionalism, which did not question literature's position, and subsequently deprived the author of the exclusive authority to interpret the text he or she had written. Poststructuralism asserted that literature exceeds the limits within which structuralism understands it. Postmodernism is one form of poststructuralism. Poststructuralist thought also proposes that literary structures work within culture and theory in ways that exclude certain emotions and ideas resistant to continuity. Deconstruction and postmodernism emerged after poststructuralism.

Postcolonialism rejects new forms of colonialism; theories of disorder, similarly, understand failed intentions in terms of the failure to attain appropriate outcomes. Structuralism strikes at oppressive Western social arrangements and structures, and thereby gave added strength to Marxism, as in Althusser. After modernist positionalism, New Criticism, structuralism and poststructuralism came deconstruction and postmodernism, the latter also described as late capitalism by Fredric Jameson. In the eighteenth century, 'modern' signified rootlessness; at the beginning of the twentieth century, it came to suggest progressivism. After 1970, modernity assumed the form of a theory, and 'postmodern' became a technical term within which the worldly lost its former importance. Life and history up to the modern age were rendered insignificant, as though they had ended. This became a theory of the posthistorical, the postdevelopmental and the postcausal. Truth and interconnection ceased to command importance.

Magical realism inserts magical elements into real situations. Gabriel García Márquez's One Hundred Years of Solitude and Salman Rushdie's Midnight's Children are examples of such novels. Writers employ this technique to attempt a fuller understanding of reality. Joseph Conrad calls the novel history. Conrad, a Polish speaker who became a celebrated English novelist, did not speak English fluently. Roland Barthes declares that the novel is both history and a challenge to history. Barthes was a French literary theorist whose writing influenced structuralist, Marxist and poststructuralist theories of literature.

Using the visual and audiovisual media of the Western bourgeoisie, postmodernists treat inequality, injustice and dispossession as though they were merely words set against equality, attainment and justice. Poverty, which is not a major problem in the West, remains a serious problem in India today. Postmodernism stands in opposition to feminism and Marxism, and both have opposed it. Marxism supports historical analysis and has thereby renewed the strength of its own theory in relation to structuralism, poststructuralism and postmodernism. Marxism emphasises material life, but that does not make it identical with utilitarianism or the Cārvāka school, for these attend only to bodily needs. Feminist thought also opposes postmodernism's defence of the status quo: until that is overcome, the position of women cannot improve.

A devatā means the subject being expounded, not 'God', as Griffith suggests. Maharshi Patañjali's scientific statement concerning the interpretation of mantras—'yac chabda āha tad asmākaṃ pramāṇam', that which the word or phrase of the mantra says is our authority—later came to be understood, incorrectly, as meaning that the Veda alone is authoritative. Plato maintains that no art can be good because all art is false and unreal. Yet Plato's position should also be read in the context of Athens' military organisation being inferior to that of Sparta. His opposition to poetry and drama arose from the belief that memorising and repeating dialogue would draw people towards an artificial life. Aristotle does not regard poetry merely as imitation; he perceives in it philosophy and universal truth. He considers tragedy and imitation in drama to bring a release following pleasure, compassion and fear. Dialogue can take two forms, formal address and conversation, the latter containing fewer philosophical elements.

In ancient Greece, poetry was understood as a message from the divine. Aristophanes distinguishes good and bad poetry; Theophrastus distinguishes severe, excellent and grand poetry. Poetry and music are inseparable. European symphonic music, however, in which many instruments perform together in differing rhythms, brought a change in the theory. Related questions also applied to the dramatic stage. Derrida's method of deconstruction brings highly placed works and authors down and raises those placed below them. Roland Barthes writes that a work becomes significant when it separates from its maker and can be analysed independently, a process he calls the death of the author. Poststructuralism overturned structuralism's conception of a complete and well-ordered system. Saussure's theory of language—speech and writing, the language of a particular period and its historical context, the question of whether the significant entity is a work or a person, and whether significance is itself a conception—was also subjected to reversal and interrogation by Derrida's deconstruction.

Sex is a biological fact, whereas the conceptual distinctions between woman and man are social outcomes. Literature and art concerning women have been produced by men and have regarded women through a male gaze. Feminist literary theory enters into the depths of this problem. In Mithila, women's position is not uniformly so poor, yet the one-sided tendency of Maithili literature has represented the difficulties of upper-class women. Modernisation has also brought a deterioration in women's position among so-called lower castes. Furthermore, caste and religion have divided women's rights into compartments. Feminist criticism likewise argues that theories constructed by men cannot offer a complete explanation.

Liberal humanism arose in opposition to theoretical systems. It argues that, rather than submitting literature to theory, one can use ordinary judgement to determine whether a work possesses a humane vision and genuine significance. By exercising one's own intelligence, one can judge literary quality without the necessity of a formal literary theory. Yet liberal humanism itself became a theory, within which meaningful literature was produced.

A book review should avoid excessive denunciation. The critic should resist the urge to display his or her erudition: excessive criticism often turns into an exhibition of the reviewer's learning. Restraint is essential, and abusive vocabulary reveals the critic's poor upbringing. Reviewing a book without reading it is unethical. For example, writing about Dhumketu in Karmadhāraya, Taranand Viyogi states: 'His story “Namāze Śukrānā” is very important in highlighting the communal harmony established over the ages in Mithila's culture' (Karmadhāraya, p. 127). The judgement appears to have been made from the title alone. In the story, when Haji Saheb is at prayer, a parrot in a cage cries, 'Sita ... Ram ...'. Haji Saheb repeatedly strikes the parrot's cage against the mosque wall until the bird dies. Saeeda begins to weep, and the story ends. Yet, in the critic's view, this tale illustrates communal harmony!

Indian conceptions of poetry begin with the idea of art as a path to liberation, or mokṣa. Consider the posture of Nataraja, in which the rhythm of creation and destruction can be seen together. A permanent emotional disposition, deepening and ripening, becomes rasa. How many such rasas were experienced by Sita and Rama? The Valmiki Ramayana offers examples. Krishna teaches the Indian doctrine of action, yet he is also a connoisseur of aesthetic relish. The need to understand the experience of art gave rise to rasa theory, and Bharata composed the Nāṭyaśāstra. Abhinavagupta wrote a commentary on Anandavardhana's Dhvanyāloka. Bhāmaha in the sixth century, Daṇḍin in the seventh and Rudraṭa in the ninth further advanced these discussions.

Rasa theory. For Bharata, rasa arises through the effect of drama. Why does drama exist? It exists both to enact rasa and to bring rasa into being. How does rasa emerge? Through its determinants or causes (vibhāva), its consequent expressions (anubhāva), and associated transitory states (vyabhicāribhāva). The enduring emotional disposition becomes concentrated and ripens into rasa, which can be savoured. For Bhaṭṭa Lollaṭa, the permanent emotion intensifies through causes and effects until it becomes rasa. Actors experience rasa through investigation and imagination. Lollaṭa gives no comparable importance to the poet or to the listener and spectator. Śaunaka holds that the spectator must enter imaginatively into a performance to experience rasa, as one apprehends a painted horse as though it were a horse. Bhaṭṭa Nāyaka argues that rasa acts upon the spectator and that the language of the poet is distinctive. Through rasa, the soul of the listener or spectator meets the supreme soul. Its pleasure is ananda in its essential form, leading to self-realisation. Rasa theory is thus founded upon, and gives emphasis to, listeners, spectators and readers.

Dhvani theory. In the Dhvanyāloka, Anandavardhana argues that literature aims to suggest meaning indirectly or to bring meaning into being. The theory explains the structure and function of suggested meaning, rasa as aesthetic experience, and the place of figures of speech. For Anandavardhana, dhvani, or suggestion, is the soul of poetry. Although meaning emerges indirectly through suggestion, it does so in an organised form. The resulting theory concerns both meaning and symbol, and through them the experience and production of rasa. Nyāya and Mīmāṃsā opposed the theory, contending that dhvani has no independent existence: it is an effect of inference, already covered by secondary signification. Not everything, moreover, can be conveyed through words.

Sphoṭa theory. Bhartṛhari's Vākyapadīya holds that the meaning of words and sentences is conveyed through sphoṭa. Varṇa-sphoṭa pertains to phonemes, pada-sphoṭa to words and vākya-sphoṭa to sentences. Knowledge is impossible without a relationship to language. This became part of the Indian philosophical theory of knowledge. Meaning can be communicated without the simultaneous material presence of letters, words and sentences. Sphoṭa is śabda-brahman, the word-principle considered the fundamental cause of creation. Letters, words and sentences do not exist together at a single instant. The individual sounds of an uttered word do not, separately, contain the meaning of the word; they arise and pass away until the word is complete. Sphoṭa nevertheless communicates meaning even though the letters, words or sentences do not remain physically present throughout the act of reception or transmission. Each successive letter contributes to meaningfulness as the word reaches completion, just as successive words contribute to the completion of the sentence. Sāṃkhya, Nyāya, Vaiśeṣika, Mīmāṃsā and Vedānta reject sphoṭa, maintaining instead that letters and their sounds adequately constitute meaning. Jacques Derrida's French theories of deconstruction and dissemination have affinities with sphoṭa theory.

Alaṅkāra theory. Bhāmaha treats figures of speech in terms of samāsokti, a form that becomes a source of aesthetic pleasure. Daṇḍin and Udbhaṭa likewise developed the theory of ornament. Figures of speech are fundamentally of two kinds, based respectively upon sound and meaning; further classifications concern resemblance and contrast, logical and popular modes of reasoning, poetic conventions and the apprehension of hidden meanings. Mammaṭa divides sixty-one figures into seven groups: simile (upamā), metaphor (rūpaka), indirect praise (aprastuta), the illuminating or distributing figure (dīpaka), contrast (vyatireka), contradiction (virodha) and combination (samuccaya).

Aucitya theory. In the Aucityavicāracarcā, Kṣemendra regards propriety or appropriateness as a fundamental principle of literature. Where should appropriateness be observed? In individual words; sentences; the meaning of a composition; qualities; figures of speech; rasa; grammatical cases; verbs; gender; number; adjectives; prefixes; particles; time; place; lineage; observances; principles; inward qualities; intention; temperament; the selection of essential material; creative genius; circumstance; thought; names; and benedictions. The universe vibrates; it is nothing but vibration. After poetry is recited, stillness spreads—peace everywhere, peace spreading through the mind.

Translation criticism. Among the forms of creative literature, drama is the most difficult to translate, followed by poetry and then fiction. A translator of drama must recognise the dramatic background and indirect implications, while also understanding the psychology of the characters. Translating poetry demands familiarity with its genre and construction. When translating a Maithili haiku into English, for example, matching Maithili's five-seven-five pattern of letters to the English alphabet would make the translation absurd: English haiku use five-seven-five syllables, and a letter does not correspond to a syllable in English as it may in Maithili. One must attend to poetic rhythm and imagery, and relate individual sections to the poem's main body. In narrative fiction, the translator needs to understand the narrator, the characters, the sequence of events, the time and period of flashbacks, and the setting. Ramlochan Sharan's Maithili Ramcharitmanas is a translation from Awadhi into Maithili, but its dohas, chaupais and sorathas have been translated in their traditional metrical forms. Why, then, is theory necessary?

2. Pattern Poetry and Shape Poetry in Maithili

Abstract

In Maithili, for the first time: (1) pattern or repetition poetry and (2) shape or concrete poetry. Poetry written according to the metre of lines is pattern poetry. It is a verse composition in which something recurs repeatedly. The repetition need not be of sound; only the lengths of the lines are repeated.

Keywords: Maithili · pattern · poetry · shape · repetition · going · someone

In Maithili, for the first time: (1) pattern or repetition poetry and (2) shape or concrete poetry.

1

Pattern (Repetition) Poetry

Poetry composed in the metre of lines is pattern, or repetition, poetry.

What is the metre of lines?

It is a composition in verse in which some element recurs again and again. A repetition of sounds is not required; what recurs is only the length of the lines.

Example:

> Going, Going
> Going, going, I go as far as a very distant country from which I cannot return.
> Several times before, I have returned to this place.
> I understood that the road was only halfway traversed.
> When I did return,
> I set out again, bound for the distant place, > for a country so distant that I could not return.
> Anyone setting out to return would tire before reaching even half of that halfway road, > and, should they press ahead, would see the road disappearing.
> I shall leave no path behind, nor any sign by which to know it, nor surrender even a little hope.

The road beyond halfway, crossing and breaking through, and I, advancing, and the vanishing road, brought the task to its conclusion.
Now another task will begin again, with a new environment and new people.
Experiment upon experiment will bring some extraordinary outcome, or push me once more towards a faraway country.
And shall I not return again to my former country, where those frightened people of old will no longer be,
nor the old familiar trees and plants?
Evidence upon evidence of an outcome seems to have turned away from me.
The people, trees and plants of this country are all new,
with no familiar sign, no hope, and no recognisable road.

2.

Shape or Concrete Poetry

Unlike pattern or repetition poetry, shape poetry assumes a visible form. Thus, instead of the recurring line-lengths found in pattern poetry, one sees a figure. Consider, for example, the figure of a tree below.

A familiar sign of vanishing hope
I see trees on either side, travelling with the road,
the shade of trees growing dense.
My familiar sign will surely become denser, but

T
H
I
C
K
E
N
I
N
G

darkness becomes impenetrably thick.
The familiar sign of my hope disappears.

3. A Navya-Nyāya Perspective: Valid Cognition, Absence and Epistemic Validity

Abstract

This collection contains numerous propositions concerning knowledge, embodied in dramatic form, which can be examined using the conceptual resources of Navya-Nyāya. In Forty Thieves, every victory of Gonu is a victory of inference and reasoning—in other words, of valid cognition (pramā). In the confrontation between force and intelligence, the play places the operation of evidence above everything else. A line from Sukanya—'When you close your eyes, you will not see the tree, yet everything remains present'—brings a central insight of Navya-Nyāya onto the stage: the absence of knowledge of an object does not mean that the object itself is absent (non-apprehension is not absence).

Keywords: Navya-Nyāya; pramā; inference; absence; non-apprehension; epistemic validity; folk knowledge.

This collection contains numerous propositions concerning knowledge, embodied in dramatic form, which can be examined using the conceptual resources of Navya-Nyāya. In Forty Thieves, every victory of Gonu is a victory of inference and reasoning—in other words, of valid cognition (pramā). In the confrontation between force and intelligence, the play places the operation of evidence above everything else.

The line from Sukanya—'When you close your eyes, you will not see the tree, yet everything remains present'—brings a central insight of Navya-Nyāya onto the stage: the absence of knowledge of an object does not mean the absence of the object itself (non-apprehension is not absence). When there is no contact between an object and the senses, perception does not occur, but the object continues to exist. This distinction between cognition and what is cognised becomes, in the play, an ethical argument for acknowledging reality.

The argument about 'meaningfulness' in Shruvavati and the 'discrimination between milk and water' in Atiratha both raise questions about relations and the knowledge of attributes: which quality, within which relationship, is meaningful or worthy of acceptance? In this sense, Kunal's plays, beneath the appearance of entertainment, also convey an indigenous epistemology.

At a broader level, the collection as a whole raises the question of epistemic validity: the authenticity of folk knowledge and collective memory. The Salhes ballads, the Gonu cycle and the Bidapat dance are not 'unauthentic' folk narratives; they are evidence of a parallel tradition of knowledge. That is the collection's unspoken affirmation.

Genre-Specific Critical Theory

4. The Place of the Vihani Tale in Prose Literature and Its Critical Theory

Abstract

Among the many forms of prose—treatises, essays, criticism, short fiction, novels, epistolary literature, travel memoirs and reportage—stories, narratives and novels draw particularly upon imagination blended with experience. All are close to what we call khissa-pihani, the telling of tales. Stories, narratives and novels, and to a certain extent plays and one-act plays, are heard, told, read or performed for entertainment.

Keywords: vihani · tale · story · is · also · but · critical theory

I

Among the various prose genres—treatises, essays, criticism, short fiction, novels, epistolary literature, travel memoirs and reportage—stories, narratives and novels are especially grounded in imagination interwoven with experience. They are close to what we call khissa-pihani, the telling of tales. Stories, narratives and novels, and to some extent plays and one-act plays, are listened to, narrated, read or performed for entertainment. They may have a definite purpose, or they may also contain purposelessness—absurdity. Amid the bustle of life, even purposeless literature provides pleasure.

When we say vihani katha, we identify a genre that is a tale first and a vihani tale second. In English, too, works are classified by length as short stories, novelettes, novellas and novels. Across Maithili genres, word counts fluctuate more widely than in English or other European languages, although in those languages as well the length of a work varies with an author's personal preference and the demands of the subject. Likewise, the one-act play is an ekanki, while a play is a natak.

A vihani katha, then, is certainly a tale.

Your imagination, enriched by experience, urges you to say something. The material may become a humorous anecdote or a non-humorous vignette. People may tell you that you have a great gift for spinning stories and that you are quick-witted. Encouraged, you begin shaping the material in the mould of literary craft, until it becomes a vihani tale.

The greatest obstacle with a humorous anecdote is that the one you tell may travel from person to person and return to you; its originality may be lost somewhere along the way. Such anecdotes may run from a line or two to half a page or an entire page. They can be incorporated into a story or novel, but the vihani tale does not afford that sort of room. Nevertheless, as in a story or novel, where an anecdote becomes meaningful when placed in a character's mouth or connected with another incident, you may do the same in a vihani tale. Fiction emerges from narrative, and moral instruction, inspirational stories and mystical tales range from shorter to longer forms. It would also be wrong to say that none of their shorter forms can be a vihani tale.

The immediate presentation of an idea, so often found in the vihani tale, is also present in stories and novels. Yet it is not true that a work ceases to be a vihani tale merely because it lacks this immediacy. Quite the contrary: when reviewing a vihani tale, the critic ought to attend to its enduring elements rather than merely to the speed of its presentation. An excessive preference for the instantly delivered idea turns it into a non-humorous vignette. It may remain a vihani tale, but it will not be an outstanding one. Nor is it correct to argue that only a tale which gives the reader a sudden jolt qualifies as a vihani tale—or as an excellent one—and that one which fails to do so is not a vihani tale at all. An idea comes suddenly, and you jot it down lest it be forgotten: that much is fine. But before hastily turning it into a vihani tale, allow the idea to mature. Consider what might be blended into it to give it lasting substance. You might write a startling vihani tale without letting the idea mature, but the chance that it will also be an outstanding one is small. Just as there is no guarantee that a catchy song will retain its force for long, we must ask whether this form of storytelling might become the literary equivalent of Twenty20 cricket.

A novel cannot be read in a single sitting, whereas a short story can, and a vihani tale can likewise be read at one sitting. The novel permits the author a fullness of description—of setting, plot and characters—that is impossible in a short story. The latter concentrates on one aspect, or, one might say, one incident; in doing so it can offer only a broad descriptive sketch of the setting and of a person's life. The vihani tale allows no room even for such a rough sketch. It too centres on one aspect or one incident, but that aspect or incident should have such an independent attraction that the writer is tempted to present it in its own right rather than extinguish its independence by absorbing it into a short story or novel.

Thus the plot of a story will be simpler than that of a novel, while a vihani tale does not even require such a plot. Fashion an aspect or an incident within the mould of literary craft, and a complete vihani tale is ready.

A Critical Theory of the Vihani Tale

How should one review a vihani tale? An imaginative narrative shaped by experience, ranging from two lines to a page and a half or two pages (sometimes even five), is entitled to be called a vihani tale. If an entire story is narrated in full within a short space, it will no longer be called a vihani tale. But if a sequence of incidents is needed to convey a particular proposition, the sequence must be complete; its links may be somewhat longer. Hurrying to achieve an immediate effect can weaken those links. Always reversing the current and manufacturing a sudden effect has become a formula for some well-regarded writers of vihani tales. In one or two pieces it may be as attractive as an 'item song' in a film; thereafter the critic begins to notice the formula, because what was proactive becomes reactive. It cannot produce a lasting effect and suggests a want of creative ability. The finest vihani tale constructs a sequence of events and leaves readers to reach their own verdict. The form offers little space for explanation, but that does not mean everything should be said in two or four lines. If a writer calls a two- or four-line piece a vihani tale, the critic is obliged to recognise the designation; the likelihood of its being an outstanding vihani tale, however, diminishes.

The subject of a vihani tale is not confined to an incident glimpsed in passing. Its writers should also create tales for children and on moral and religious themes. At present, experiences gathered while travelling by train or bus, or while sitting at home or talking beside the fire on the veranda, are often all that enter the form. Social and economic questions can provide it with lasting subject matter, as can political issues and natural disasters. While reviewing it, critics should not produce what might be called a Puranic review: in the Shiva Purana, Shiva is supreme; in the Garuda Purana, Garuda is supreme. Criticism must not degenerate into the declaration that whatever happens to be presented is a vihani tale, however it may be written. The novelist has ample room to demonstrate the full range of creative ability; the short-story writer has less, and the vihani writer still less. Yet a broader range of subjects can meet the reader's expectations. By limiting dialogue, or placing it before the main presentation, the writer can strengthen the tale; otherwise it may turn into a one-act play or drama. A vihani tale may be absorbed into a story or novel, but for it to attain distinction as a vihani tale, humorous anecdotes should not be forced into it. Space is already limited. If dialogue and an anecdote are both crammed in, the effect will not last and the work may turn into a stunted vihani tale.

The standard of a good vihani tale is not the immediacy of its delivery, but the acuity with which it presents human values, social harmony, and social principles grounded in equality and justice. We must ask whether it communicates sharply how society might move forward on that basis; whether readers are released from mental bondage; whether they acquire the capacity to lead others and gain confidence in themselves; whether their doubts about moral development and respect for labour are resolved. All these are criteria of the vihani tale. Marginalised people may accomplish what those with privileges cannot; this will be possible only when the self-confidence of the marginalised grows. How can literature saturated with an inferiority complex contribute to human welfare? Against changing social, economic, political and religious relationships, the one-sidedness of a presentation, and the writer's personal lack of firmness—whether in ideology or in attitudes towards caste and religion —become visible in literature. We must identify the sense of superiority, itself a form of inferiority, which emerges in accounts of benefactions bestowed by an oppressor upon the oppressed or written from a feeling of guilt. Identify mediocrity. Stock phrases and passing 'breaking news' must not be passed off as modernity.

The vihani tale describes one aspect or incident, and it need not be confined to a single page. You might describe an incident in three or four pages and it would still be a vihani tale. Every story in James Joyce's Dubliners presents, through an incident, an unexpected moment of sudden understanding. Joyce's fifteen short stories occupy some two hundred pages, yet possess the defining features of Maithili vihani tales; above all, the element called 'epiphany' establishes their affinity with the form. Many longer short stories by Kahlil Gibran and Anton Chekhov may likewise be considered vihani tales. In English and European literatures, 'short story' and 'story' are sometimes used synonymously. The novel—upanyas in Bengali and Maithili, kadambari in Marathi—has a wider reach. In Maithili a work of fifty or sixty pages can already be called a novel, although in English that length falls around the upper reaches of the short story, novelette or novella. Maithili practice differs from English practice: a children's tale may continue over many nights, while a tale for adults may finish in a few minutes. In Maithili, the currently recognised limits appear to be one page for a vihani tale, three or four pages for a short story, fifteen to twenty pages for a long story, and sixty to five hundred pages for a novel. In my view, the vihani tale's permissible span needs to be extended to one to four pages.

Some of Maithili's Finest Vihani Tales

There has been a considerable qualitative change in the subject matter and vocabulary of Maithili vihani tales.

Durganand Mandal's 'Kisna Mutthi' demonstrates the need for an authentic vocabulary in the vihani tale. Just as R. K. Narayan handles English vocabulary with consummate skill, Durganand Mandal makes skilful use of Maithili words. Rampravesh Mandal similarly makes even an ordinary vihani tale extraordinary through his choice of words. Rajdev Mandal writes poetry, novels and vihani tales with equal, and consistently high, accomplishment. His reputation for balancing subject and form is well deserved. Bechan Thakur can write a vihani tale about the social utility of superstition ('Phusik Phal'). Umesh Mandal's 'Rupaiya ke Dheri' is among Maithili's finest vihani tales on women's empowerment. The vihani tales of Jagdish Prasad Mandal, Parmeshwar Kapari, Kaushal Kumar, Bhavnath Jha, Shambhu Kumar Singh, Jagadanand Jha 'Manu', Lakshmi Das and Ramlochan Thakur show the Joycean epiphany with a clarity seldom found in other Maithili practitioners. Ashish Anchinhar, Amit Mishra and Chandan Kumar Jha attest to the newer generation's changing subjects and experiments. Om Prakash Jha's 'Special Permit' and Mihir Jha's '100 Taka' will have a special place in the history of Maithili vihani tales because of the freshness and distinctiveness of their subjects. Sandeep Kumar Safi's 'Andhvishwas' takes a position opposite to Bechan Thakur's 'Phusik Phal'; the two demonstrate how writers may give their vihani tales a purpose while taking opposing positions for and against superstition. Consider Munnaji's 'Rewaj'. In village life people call a widow a witch, yet after her death they compete to cremate her in order to secure her house site. The seed planted for the vihani tale here is of a somewhat higher order. The deceased person has no son, but leaves a wife and daughter. When the dead man's brother seeks to lift the bier, the widow stops him and asks the daughter to do so. Who will support this new custom beginning today? The answer comes: the childless. Jawaharlal Kashyap's 'Hammar May Tohar May' and 'Bhagwanak Bhagya' present their subjects with remarkable originality.

The numerical and qualitative growth of the Maithili vihani tale is a cause for rejoicing.

5. The Place of the Short Story in Prose Literature and Its Critical Theory

Abstract

In Maithili a long story is sometimes also called a novel. A long story can explore certain aspects of life in some detail, but the short story does not give its author such scope. It nevertheless gives considerably more room than the vihani tale. Maithili writers now live in villages and cities, at home and abroad. The range of subjects in the present collection reflects the environments inhabited by different sections of Maithili writers.

Keywords: prose · short story · place · critical theory · Maithili

2

In Maithili a long story is sometimes also described as a novel. A long story examines certain aspects of life at length; a short story does not give its writer that much room, though it affords greater freedom than a vihani tale. Today, Maithili writers live in villages and towns, within the country and overseas. The variety of themes in the present collection represents the different environments of Maithili writers from every social stratum. Alongside the milieu of Mithila itself, the conflicts and problems of migrant Maithils call attention to the need for a distinct critical approach to the short story.

The critical theory of the short story: The Maithili short story has advanced far beyond 'Buchchi Dai' and 'Kaniya Kaki'. Old problems have taken new forms, and the contemporary Maithili short story delineates them. Feminism, postmodern absurdity, humour and satire, and a balance between subject matter and technique are shaping the form. Through a measured use of vocabulary, writers reach the roots of their subjects. Social mobility, industrialisation, and the political, social, economic and cultural difficulties of a new state after independence—its processes of change and integration—can sometimes be mutually contradictory. Psychological and educational processes matter in the development of community life. In villages of Mithila, a person's status remains tied to place and caste; in migration, these determinants may sometimes be overturned. Feminism and women's movements take different forms in Mithila and in the diaspora. The legal order ought to secure justice for poor and disadvantaged groups, but has failed to do so because justice remains insufficiently accessible. Yet political realignments, shaped by elections every five years, are doing something of this work. Marxism advocates social realism. Freud regards every person as mysterious, and reads the literary work as a means of analysing its creator; Neo-Freudianism, by contrast, places cultural rather than biological factors in the foreground.

New Criticism is grounded in detailed examination of the work. Postmodernism, existentialism and humanism are philosophical schools of thought. Philosophy formerly embraced science, history, social and political life, economics, the arts and language. As the sciences and arts developed separate specialisations, particularly in science, the mathematical and scientific aspects of philosophy narrowed towards mathematical logic. Philosophical methods of induction and deduction moved towards analytical methods. Marx, who was like a divine intervention for the world's poor, made the dialectical method the basis of his interpretation. What is now called 'discussion' or debate, involving thesis and counter-thesis, was already present in the methods of refutation and defence in Indian philosophy, particularly the six schools of thought (see Madhavacharya's Sarvadarshanasamgraha). Francis Fukuyama, who announced the end of history after the fall of communist government, has more recently stepped back from that declaration. He had assumed that with the end of Russian communism only one ideology would remain, that the conflict of ideas would cease, and therefore history itself would end. Now, however, he says that the ideologies of power and of the deprived remain different, and their conflict—and history—will continue. Postmodernism too has slowed after its initial enthusiasm. Existentialism, humanism, progressivism, Romanticism and sociological analysis have survived within synthetic modes of criticism. Psychoanalysis, because of its scientific basis, will continue to survive as the dialectical method has done.

Psychology, too, may provide the foundation of a short story. The aims of the form should change with the needs of society and the transformations occurring during its historical journey. At the same time, the story is inevitably shaped and constrained by that society's culture, through which its historical existence becomes manifest.

The postmodern perspective critiques the supposed completeness of scientific knowledge. Truth and falsehood are described from different viewpoints; there is self-centred humour, and even the distinction between good and bad may intermittently disappear. One cannot tell when truth may become falsehood. There is superficial reflection, neither optimism nor quite pessimism, and a kind of reckless caprice: the same object can be thought about in more than one way. Rather than trusting the results of reason, control and planning, this perspective relies more upon the outcomes of chance. Democratic and feminist standpoints, together with emblems such as the red flag, become subjects of playful treatment. Globalisation has brought questions concerning women and communities excluded from the mainstream to the attention of postmodernism. It has opposed ideology and universal goals without being able to offer an answer. Similarly, Jacques Derrida deconstructed language and demonstrated that its constituent parts depend upon numerous different conditions, without understanding which its meaning cannot be established. A storyteller must nevertheless believe that dialogue can be restored—a belief grounded both in reason and in experience.

Analytical philosophy, or positivism, analyses linguistic propositions and concepts rather than objects. Analytical or logical positivism and existentialism emerged in reaction to science, clarifying ambiguities in scientific thinking. Phenomenology studies what is given to consciousness as it is given. Experience is an observation of the facts of particular mental acts, a means of seeing things impartially and in their pure form. For existentialism, a human being is nothing other than what that human being makes; there is nothing separate from this creation. The human being, in Sartre's words, is condemned to be free. Through the endless interaction of analysis and synthesis, Hegelian dialectics emphasised judgements about the qualities of processes and about existence. The deeper the essence, the further it may be from outward form and the nearer to reality.

Quantum theory and the uncertainty principle have also influenced modern thought. Invisible internal and external processes are made possible by exchanges among minute elements of force and energy. Under the uncertainty principle, position and form must be determined by approximation. The notion of a universe with more than three dimensions and Stephen Hawking's A Brief History of Time are, the author argues, directly undermining the existence of God and bringing the idea of God's death into view. Just as virtual reality artificially presents reality and joins consciousness to it, without positing more than three dimensions, even a journey at the speed of light begun in the age of the Indus Valley civilisation would not have reached the edge of the universe by today. Such scientific and philosophical ideas pose challenges to the short story. A synthesis of the holistic and the whole is needed; only then can philosophy become something real rather than merely philosophical.

Poststructuralist methodology locates the meaning of language not in dictionary meanings or grammatical rules, but in the process through which meaning is produced. Meaning varies across individuals and groups. There is no final correspondence between language and the world, nor one definitive meaning of a word or its text. Modernity arose through modern and postmodern argument, reality, dialogue and exchanges of ideas. Subsequently the New Left movement appeared in France, alongside tendencies such as nihilism and anarchism. These were grounded in distrust arising outside the belief systems and assumptions of modern thought. Hidden meanings in a text came to be interpreted in their temporal and spatial contexts, and language was treated as a game—a 'language game'. Postmodernism emerged as a critique of power, legitimacy and their hierarchies.

In the computer and information revolution, a programmer creates software and places it on the World Wide Web; the software continues to function independently of its maker and may perform tasks for which it was never designed. Interfering programs such as viruses divert it from its course and make it destructive. Antivirus software may repair the damage; if it cannot, a computer's contents are backed up and the system formatted —a clean slate. Capitalism arose from the Industrial Revolution, but the postindustrial society gives increasing importance to information and communication rather than production, and the computer's social role has expanded. Mobile phones, credit cards and similar objects rely on chips. Deconstruction and reconstruction point to the reorganisation of the processes of creation through which consciousness is being reconstituted in the postindustrial age. It is not history itself but traditional history that has ended. State, class, nation, party, society, family, morality and marriage are all being redefined. As a consequence of rapid changes, many institutions have fragmented and lost their contexts.

Michel Foucault says that knowledge and truth are constructed. Deleuze and Guattari say that we desire because we are desiring-machines. Mikhail Bakhtin treats language as a social activity. The Russian Formalists regard literature as a distinctive use of language. Jean-François Lyotard maintains that truth and historical truth are only apparent. Baudrillard argues that advertising and television have erased the distinction between the real and the imaginary. Both are major thinkers of postmodernism. Lacan's distinctive contribution was the linguistic application of Freud's methods. He argues that the unconscious is structured like a language: when a child learns language, the child learns a word for a sign. Lacan carefully considers desire, lack and the Other. Desire contains both need and demand, but cannot be divided into those two terms alone. In describing the Other, errors and absences appear. The subject is a momentary effect of meaning, and becomes like the Other when it is imaginary and creates a lack from which desire arises.

Three thinkers of postcolonialism are Homi Bhabha (close to Foucault and Lacan), Gayatri Spivak (close to Foucault and Derrida), and Edward Said (close to Foucault). They interpret the work and theorisation through which earlier colonial conceptions—such as the supposed cunning or indolence of the colonised—were established. Raymond Williams's cultural studies reveal the relationship between literature and economic conditions. New Historicism compares the textuality of history with the historicity of texts. Elaine Showalter identifies psychological, biological and linguistic features of women's writing. Simone de Beauvoir sees class and caste as obstacles to women's solidarity with women, an interpretation challenged by later feminist theory. Virginia Woolf regards economic independence and privacy as essential for women writers, although her views have not been regarded as revolutionary. Mary Wollstonecraft urged a revolution in women's education and the inclusion of education in rational judgement.

Within New Criticism, Eliot opposed the dominance of personal emotion in poetry and argued for impersonality. Improving public taste is also part of a critic's task. Wimsatt and Beardsley held that criticism should not be based on the poet's intention or a historical inquiry, nor on the emotional effect upon readers, since this is relative. It should be based on the actual words of the text. The history of English criticism may be traced to Philip Sidney, who considered poetry in terms of beauty, meaning and human good. John Dryden considered moral instruction in ancient literature and its advantages and disadvantages. Samuel Johnson wrote about the comic and tragic elements of Shakespeare's drama. Rousseau's Romanticism does not doubt the essential goodness of human beings (the classical critics do, while neoclassical thinkers maintain that human nature is corrupt but institutions can improve it); at the same time, it holds that institutions are corrupt and assist only the corrupt.

Structuralism challenged modern positivism, which had left the status of literature unquestioned, and thereafter the writer lost exclusive authority over the interpretation of the text. Poststructuralism maintained that literature goes beyond what structuralism understands. Postmodernism is one form of poststructuralism. The latter argued that literary structures operate between culture and theory, while certain emotions and thoughts remain excluded and resist continuity. Deconstruction and postmodernism followed poststructuralism. Postcolonialism rejects new forms of colonial rule; the theory of disorder, similarly, views the failure of an intended aim as a reason for the absence of an appropriate outcome. Structuralism attacked oppressive Western systems and society, thereby strengthening Marxism (Althusser). After modernist positivism, New Criticism, structuralism and poststructuralism came deconstruction and postmodernism, described as the cultural logic of late capitalism (Fredric Jameson).

In the eighteenth century, 'modern' meant rootless, but by the early twentieth century it came to suggest progressivism. After 1970 the term became associated with a theoretical position, and 'postmodern' acquired a specific critical meaning in which the worldly ceased to be important. Life and history up to modernity became insignificant and were treated as finished. The theory became posthistorical, postdevelopmental and postcausal; truth and mutual connection lost their significance. In magical realism, magical objects and events are introduced into a real situation, as writers experiment in order to understand reality more adequately. Postmodern Western bourgeois culture uses audiovisual media to reduce inequality, injustice and deprivation to mere words, alongside words such as equality, attainment and justice. Poverty, which the author describes as no longer a problem in the West, remains a grave problem in India today. Postmodernism opposes feminism and Marxism, and both feminism and Marxism have resisted it. Marxism's defence of historical analysis has strengthened its theory anew in the contexts of structuralism, poststructuralism and postmodernism. Although Marxism emphasises material life, it is not thereby identical with utilitarianism or Charvaka philosophy, which attend solely to physical needs. Feminist criticism has likewise opposed postmodern complacency with the status quo: women's situation will not improve until that complacency ends. Plato: Plato holds that no art can be good because art is false and unreal. This view should also be read against the military organisation of Athens in comparison with that of Sparta.

Dialogue can occur in two ways: through a formal address or through conversation. Conversation will contain fewer philosophical elements. Derrida's deconstructive method brings down works or writers accorded high rank and raises those placed below them. Roland Barthes writes that a work becomes important when it separates from its creator and begins to be analysed independently; he calls this the death of the author.

Poststructuralism overturned structuralism's claim to completeness and coherence. Saussure's theory of language—speech and writing, the textuality of an actual moment or of its historical setting, the importance of a particular work or person, significance as a concept, language in its present time or historical context—was itself unsettled by Derrida's deconstructive approach.

Sex is a biological fact, but the concepts of woman and man are socially produced. Literature and art concerning women have largely been made by men and view women through a male gaze. Feminist literary theory probes the roots of this problem. In Mithila the position of women is not so bad, the author argues, but the one-sided tendencies of Maithili literature have highlighted the difficulties faced by women of the upper classes. Modernisation has also worsened women's position among the so-called socially lower castes. Caste and religion, moreover, have divided women's rights into fragments. Feminist criticism maintains that theories made entirely by men cannot provide a complete explanation. Simple humanism emerged in opposition to theory, yet itself became a theory; meaningful literature has been produced within it.

Excessive criticism should be avoided. Critics ought not to turn reviews into exhibitions of their learning. In the course of criticising too much, people begin to display their erudition. Restraint is essential, and abusive vocabulary betrays the critic's poor upbringing. It is unethical to review a short story without reading it. For example, in Karmadharaya, Taranand Viyogi writes of Dhumketu's story 'Namaz-e-Shukrana': 'His story "Namaz-e-Shukrana" is highly significant in delineating the communal harmony established for ages in the culture of Mithila' (Karmadharaya, p. 127). (!) Such a review appears to have been written from the title alone. In the story, while Haji Sahib is offering prayers, a parrot in a cage cries 'Sita ... Ram ...'. Haji Sahib repeatedly hurls the cage against the mosque wall until the parrot dies. Saeeda begins to weep, and the story ends. Yet, in the critic's view, the story delineates communal harmony!

Critics must also avoid excessive praise. A review should demonstrate how a story differs from others on the same subject, what gap it fills, what it contains, and how it compares with other stories dealing with that theme. Taking account of the short story's limited compass, a review ought to be about a thousand words long. It should be a review of the story, not its author. Filling it with analysis of the writer's other works does not make for good criticism; introduce those works only when they bear a direct relationship to the story at hand. Given Mithila's varied cultures and history—and especially the one-sided condition of Maithili literature—there has also been a tradition of personal attacks and attention to district and locality. Caste, religion and regionalism rarely appear explicitly in Maithili criticism, but reviewers are strongly influenced by an insistence on praising or condemning writers according to personal friendship and hostility. Ask whether a review actually illuminates the story. Is it simply commenting upon the writer or the writer's other work? A close reading will reveal whether the story was read before the review was written. The age of ornamental critical language is over. Use precise words; remove unnecessary words and lines. A review of an autobiographical short story may legitimately throw light on the author's life. Keep misogyny and mental attitudes bounded by caste or region out of short-story criticism.

In creating a short story's atmosphere, the author develops descriptions of its characters, its structure, the people and the circumstances necessary to it. A short story may also be written by taking just one of these elements. The critic should establish how a work is excellent and what it has omitted. Evaluation must not be one-sided. The reviewer should understand and explain the message concealed in it and the direction in which the author is pointing. Identify the story's main current. Do not impose your own ideology upon the work under review. Show why the story is needed in the present day, in what its importance consists, and what its principal elements are. Identify the writer's philosophy of life, the writer's view of reality, imagination and ideals, and the uncertainties within that view. Discuss the artistic features of the author's style, the ability to tell a story, the architecture of the work, and the art of joining its parts. One carpenter makes a bed that is both sturdy and beautiful; another concentrates only on strength, and a third on beauty. The same differences exist in literary art.

Why is theory necessary? Simple humanism says that instead of applying literary theory, one may use ordinary reason to determine a work's human perspective and whether it has significance. By exercising one's own intelligence one can judge its quality; no literary theory is necessary for criticism.

Some of Maithili's Finest Short Stories

Meena Jha's 'Breast Cancer' addresses a problem affecting women, and one might have expected a woman to write a story with such psychological insight on the subject. Yet no woman had written a short story on it until then. The description of the husband's state of mind after his wife's breast-cancer operation is exact. Roshan Janakpuri bears direct witness to the struggles of the deprived; Jagdish Prasad Mandal presents the same struggle in a different form, and Mahaprakash, too, communicates it through a short-story narrative. Vasant Bhagwant Sawant's Konkani story 'Rozi Roti' concerns the struggle of emotional life against the demands of livelihood. Prabhat Rai Bhatt tells a comparable story in another setting with even greater pathos. Binu Bhai is a master of analysis and clarifies the ideas associated with his subject through his vocabulary. Shambhu Kumar Singh writes about the condition of Maithili, whereas Anmol Jha, Satyanarayan Jha and Om Prakash Jha deal with village and household life, employment, and the worlds inside and outside the home.

Turning to love stories, Durganand Mandal's 'Lal Bhauji', Sujit Kumar Jha's 'Ekta Adhikar', Kailash Kumar Mishra's 'Chanda', Pankaj Kumar Priyanshu's 'Jeevank Anmol Kshan', Amit Mishra's 'Prem Nai Jahar Chhai', Kamini's 'Mayi Nahi Tutal Tara', and Rajnath Mishra's 'Masti' are straightforward love stories. Yet each differs from the others in its distinctive treatment of humour, seriousness and feudalism. Asgar Wajahat comments upon communal riots, Rajdev Mandal upon elections; Virendra Kumar Yadav, Satish Chandra Jha and Atuleshwar examine different dimensions of social problems. Umesh Mandal, Navin Thakur, Kishan Karigar, Shiv Kumar Jha and Bacheśwar Jha are opening new directions for satire. Nand Vilas Rai and Kapileshwar Raut first intermingle satire and social problems through a magic of language, and then separate them. Santosh Kumar Mishra's 'Musibat' and Ashish Anchinhar's 'Katal Katha' are instances of postmodern absurdity. Yogendra Pathak 'Viyogi' becomes entangled in the conflict between tradition and modernity ('Devavani'). In 'Ghaswali', Manoj Kumar Mandal writes about women's struggles, while Shambhunath Jha 'Vats' links those struggles with the terror of floods to tell an unforgettable story.

The breadth of subject and technique attained by the Maithili short story is a source of delight.

6. The Place of the Novel in Prose Literature and Its Critical Theory

Abstract

The beginnings of the novel: Banabhatta's Kadambari opens with a description of King Shudraka's city of Vidisha. An exceptionally beautiful Chandala girl arrives at the royal court with a learned parrot named Vaishampayana, and the parrot's story begins. In the Chandala settlement of Pakkana there are no beggars or thieves; its ruler, Vyaghradeva, himself twists rope.

Keywords: novel · is · place · are · fiction · prose · critical theory

8

The beginnings of the novel: Banabhatta's Kadambari begins with a description of Vidisha, the city of King Shudraka. An exceptionally beautiful Chandala girl brings a wise parrot named Vaishampayana into court, whereupon the parrot's tale begins. In the Chandala settlement of Pakkana there is neither beggar nor thief, and the local king, Vyaghradeva, himself twists ropes. From the name of this Sanskrit novel comes the Marathi word kadambari for a novel. Despite the bourgeois beginnings of the novel, it has attained such complexity that it provides a searching test of literary talent. Because of the genre's bourgeois origins, it was only shortly before the nineteenth century that the novel acquired a serious form, notwithstanding the earlier appearance of Cervantes's Don Quixote at the beginning of the seventeenth century. In the novel, debate and dialogue give rise to the essay; the depiction of young men and women generates romance; people and geography provide the materials for historical description; and accounts of good and bad characters come forward. At times it makes readers laugh, at others it instructs them. Marxism advocates the novel's representation of social reality. Freud considers all human beings mysterious and makes the literary work a means of analysing the author, while Neo-Freudianism emphasises cultural rather than biological factors. New Criticism is based on close and detailed consideration of the work. Alongside these elements, lived experience itself represents only one side of existence. To satisfy repressed desires, the novelist creates a world in which readers walk along the boundary between reality and imagination.

The novel and ideology: Postmodernism, existentialism and humanism are philosophical schools of thought. In earlier times philosophy encompassed science, history, society, politics, economics, aesthetics and language. As its scientific and artistic branches became specialised, particularly the sciences, the place of mathematics and science within philosophy became restricted to mathematical logic. Philosophical inquiry through induction and deduction turned towards analytical methods. Marx, who was like a divine intervention for the world's poor, based his interpretation upon the dialectical method.

The beginnings and development of the novel: In the English novel The Pilgrim's Progress, the author describes the protagonist's journey, together with its struggles and moments of enthusiasm.

Literary Vocabulary

An author's ideology should be like salt dissolved in water, not oil floating on it; I have written about this before. Yatri and Dhumketu needed the crutches of the Communist Party because, for them, leftism was a fashion, like a good scent or designer clothes. Thus Balchanma, after turning away from the Congress and the Socialist Party, seeks a solution to every problem in communism and the red flag, and Yatri supplies him with every answer in those terms. For Dhumketu's characters too, the red flag is a life-restoring herb, a Lakshman-buti. But these writers were not engaged in the communist movement beyond the level of fashion; consequently ideology floats conspicuously over their literature like oil.

Now consider the Maithili writing of Chaturanand Mishra and Jagdish Prasad Mandal. Have you found the red flag or the Communist Party mentioned anywhere in Chaturanand Mishra's novels or Jagdish Prasad Mandal's literary works? What we find instead is the genuine left-wing dialectical method and faith in life itself: ideology dissolved like salt. Is it merely a coincidence that Chaturanand Mishra wrote literature in the early part of his life, whereas Jagdish Prasad Mandal began in later life, after the last legal case against him had ended? Thakurji, the landlord of Mandal's village Berma, told my paternal cousin that Jagdish Prasad Mandal was a truthful Harishchandra and the pride of their village. This was said of a man who had led the communist movement, been jailed ten times, and fought legal cases against the landlords—with the result that today no one in Berma holds more than ten bighas of agricultural land.

Even now he rises at three in the morning, lights his small lamp and writes Maithili literature. His son has never seen him writing and does not know when he writes. Under Bhogendra Jha's leadership, Mandal had vowed that whenever he spoke he would speak only in Maithili; his son has never heard him speak another language. This is why his subject matter is fresh and his vocabulary is that of a native speaker, capable of expressing—and necessary to—the subject at hand. His people, trees, plants, flowers, fields and threshing grounds are real, rooted in the earth, not artificially excavated from some subterranean store. Writers of the new generation living outside Mithila should draw inspiration from him and learn the region's history, geography and culture before writing in Maithili. Only then can their literature acquire its own distinct character.

Pseudo-standardisation: This is the result of favouring the ideas of one particular caste-centred school, reflected in one or two Maithili books published by the Central Institute of Indian Languages (CIIL) and in a standardisation project that has continued for years without producing results.

Genuine standardisation: A standard Maithili created through extensive discussion and deliberation, grounded in the Maithili spoken by every caste in every region of Mithila.

Benipuri's Ambapali is a play in Hindi and has been included by NCERT in the school curriculum. The editors, however, have pointed out that the absence of the verb hai in expressions such as vah ja raha reflects the influence of Benipuri's local region. Respecting its historical character, the editorial board has not altered the text even though it appears in the school syllabus.

Jagdish Prasad Mandal's long story Shambhudas has appeared. Consider its second paragraph:

'Just as fallow land amid the fields and woods, untouched by plough or spade, may dry up until its trees fall and the soil grows barren, yet on that same land, through birds or through wind and water, wild fruit-bearing trees may spring up, face sun and wind, rain and stones, darkness and storm, attain their youth, and spread their chests to satisfy passing travellers with their sweet taste—so was Shambhudas born into a sharecropping peasant family on the bank of the Jamuna River.'

Is there any need to add achhi ('is') after jait ('going') or karait ('doing') here?

Theory and practice: A closer look suggests that a novelist's work attempts to carry the ideologies and viewpoints of its time. Yet particular qualities arise on their own in the passage from theory to practice. This is true of the Maithili novel as well. In Ramanand Renu's novels it is clearly visible in the technique. Lily Ray's extraordinary ability to describe the events, society and politics around her through the sharpness of her pen goes a step beyond English novels. Lalit, Yatri and Dhumketu place economic and social problems before readers without concealing their particulars. Saketanand depicts the problem of floods. Harimohan Jha brings currents of English literature into his own style and makes them apparent even in the syllabus that a male protagonist gives the heroine to study.

Chaturanan Mishra and Jagdish Prasad Mandal were practically involved in the communist movement and in party organisation. Yet after reading their novels I have no hesitation in saying that, whereas Yatri and Dhumketu need the crutch of Marxism to make their novels stand, these two novelists do not. The true meaning of Marxism can be found in their work. There is no mention of party names or ideologies, but there is a recognition of genuine dialectical materialism, a belief in the importance of life, and the use of the dialectical method. This becomes possible only when the writer undertakes a profound study of Marxism, including Das Kapital.

In most living languages, novels form a large part of literary production; in Maithili, however, comparatively few novels are written. As increasing numbers of the younger generation enter Maithili literature after studying English language and literature, Maithili writing will be able to deepen its social, economic, political and cultural insights. Kedarnath Chaudhary's Chameli Rani, Mahur, Karar, Hina, Ayna and Abara Nahitan confirm this view.

7. Literature for Infants, Children and Adolescents, and Its Critical Theory

Abstract

Children's literature broadly encompasses writing for infants younger than one year through adolescents up to eighteen years of age. For children whose learning progresses more slowly, the age categories may differ somewhat: material regarded as suitable for a typical six-year-old, for instance, may be used with such children at ten years of age …

Keywords: infants · children · adolescents · critical theory · Maithili

5

Children's literature broadly includes works intended for infants younger than one year and for adolescents up to the age of eighteen. For children whose intellectual development or learning progresses more slowly, the age groups may need to be defined differently. For example, what is considered children's literature for a typical six-year-old may be appropriate for them at the age of ten.

The Saraswati River, the great flood, the narratives of Manu and the Great Fish, the Epic of Gilgamesh, Gilgamesh's quest for the land of the living, creation stories and the development of systems of gods—all these, in relation to the Rigveda, the Avesta and other sources, may be regarded as early children's literature. The spoked chariot is described in the Vedas; according to the author, it was not then found in Western Asia or Europe. Indian divine names, crafts, narratives, the science of horses, music, linguistic elements and modes of thought began to appear in Western Asia, Egypt and Greece. In the second millennium BCE, spoked chariots, Indian divine names, currents of Indian thought, Rigvedic philosophy, horsemanship, craft technologies and ancient narratives began to move from India towards Western Asia, Crete and Greece. Much of the Rigveda, the author maintains, had been composed well before the cultures of Egypt, Sumer and Babylonia, or those of the Mitanni and Hittites, emerged in the relevant chronology. Language must have existed before the Rigveda, the oldest surviving work of Vedic Sanskrit. Oral literature such as gatha, narashamsi, stories of the gods and other narratives may have been composed in that language. The Rigveda uses terms such as gathin, gatuvid and gathapati for singers of such narratives. A celebrated story is drawn from history and the Puranas, while an invented story is imagined. Alongside Vedic narratives, Jataka tales, Aesop's fables, the Panchatantra and the Hitopadesha, folk ballads continued to circulate. Everywhere the tales of the elite coexist with folk narratives. Take the story of Salhesh: as it crosses regional boundaries, Salhesh changes from king to thief and from thief to king. Likewise, Chuharmal is considered a thief where Salhesh is a king, but is known as a king or powerful figure in places where Salhesh is called a thief.

Beyond traditional narrative and balladry, the history of modern fiction takes us to the end of the nineteenth century, when it was recognised in forms such as the short story, tale and prose fiction. Beginning with Rabindranath Tagore, this journey spread from one end of India to the other under the influence of reformist movements. Vedic narrative, if we consider it, sets out love for the nation and teaches people to live together in society. Jataka stories, along with the spread of vernacular languages, also intended to spread Buddhism. By narrating through birds and animals, they offered a conception of children's literature long before the Panchatantra and the Hitopadesha. Just as Vishnu Sharma, in narrating the Panchatantra, can become needlessly cruel towards women and Shudras, so too, in the author's view, can the Ramcharitmanas. Aesop was an enslaved man in Greece who told stories to his master's children, and these became world-famous as Aesop's fables. The fox who, unable to obtain the grapes, declares that they must be sour has become immortal in storytelling.

In the Muslim world, Rumi's Masnavi is a distinctive work of Persian literature, teaching the importance of knowledge and the advancement of the state. Not everyone who reads a story will become enlightened, but at least they can enjoy wholesome entertainment. If even one reader begins thinking in the intended direction, the story has proved its worth. And if those for whom a story was written do not read it, others capable of intervening in their circumstances may do so. But when society changes, do social values remain eternal? Should progressive stories reconstruct experience for a changing society, so that natural and social realities may be brought into alignment? Or does a changing age need stories built upon the abiding elements of tradition to lend it stability? Individual and collective interests contain a duality and can conflict; they require reconciliation and a comprehensive worldview. A story is not merely an idea hastily transcribed onto paper in ink. It is shaped by social and historical conditions. Experience must therefore be recreated through narrative, and individual consciousness can then become social and collective consciousness. The oppressor must restrain the impulse to oppress; the oppressed must speak out forcefully against it. The story must be ordered and accessible if it is to achieve this purpose, becoming practical rather than merely intellectual. The openness of Vedic narrative gave rise to dialogue, which the dogmatism of Puranic literature extinguished.

This Sun is a mediocre star among countless billions and trillions of suns. On one of the planets of this unexceptional star—Earth—we live in a town or village, holding our heads in anxiety and asking whose troubles could possibly be greater than ours. Such scientific and philosophical facts confront our storytelling as a challenge. Restoring dialogue requires conviction in the storyteller: conviction grounded in reasoning and experience. The practice of praising oneself and one's associates while disparaging others obstructs the creation of excellent children's literature. Reliance on the government, ignorance of priorities, and the desire among writers and critics to become great or make others great have taken hold at a time when the language itself is dying. There is no clear plan of action, and everyone anxiously attempts some isolated measure for Maithili. Those who do not speak Maithili themselves have in effect begun a campaign to distance their children from it. The media, cartoon channels, the educational system and large-scale migration within a single generation have all contributed. Because Maithili activists are divided among several poles, there is no effective lobby capable of building broad support. People worry more about what they or their own group will gain in return. The shortage of students of Maithili is compounded by poor marketing skills, even when a product is good. In Maithili, both good products and the ability to market them are in short supply.

Children's Literature and Its Criticism in the Maithili Context

I request writers for children to use the letters ङ (ṅa) and ञ (ña) correctly, so that children can learn more easily. Write भाङ, not भांग. In a workshop, children were observed reading छनि and कहलनि as छ नी and कहलनी respectively. Therefore use forms such as छन्हि and कहलन्हि. Careful use of conjunct consonants and ङ in Maithili writing for children will help preserve the language's distinctive character.

Use simple but authentically Maithili words, such as akadarun. Prose and verse are both important in children's literature; one might even say verse is more so. When prose stories incorporate subjects such as science and social science, they can reconcile education with entertainment. In Maithili a children's story may continue for an entire night, while a tale intended for adults can finish in minutes. There is a shortage of comics, picture stories and books on science, social studies, spirituality, physics, chemistry, biology and health in Maithili. Education is not being provided through evening schools, drawing and music. There is a particularly urgent need for Maithili teaching through distance education and the internet. Yet everyone carries a passion for Maithili in the heart, even when they oppose one another. People respect its rises and falls of intonation and distinctive linguistic features; among them are linguists who cannot themselves speak Maithili. Maithili is also important for its spiritual and cultural significance. It has an inner strength. Numerous organisations, including some casteist and communal ones, are eager for its development. Speakers of the language live not only in India and Nepal but are now spread across other countries and regions.

It is said of Shankaracharya that he gathered a river's current into his water-pot. What happened, according to this account, was that a mountain in the middle of a flooded area caused flooding on one side and drought on the other. With his disciples' help, Shankara broke through the intervening cave. When he emerged carrying his water-pot, people saw water flowing to the other side. They praised him: 'You have brought the current into your water-pot and saved us from drought and the people on the other side from floods. You carried the water's support in your pot!' Later, opportunists turned the event into a miracle. I hope writers of Maithili children's literature will likewise interpret the story of Ugana through both reason and faith.

From Gonu Jha's village, Bharaura, comes the folk narrative of the boatman-hero Prince Dulara Dayal, 'Bahura Godhin Natua Dayal'. His shrine still stands in Bharaura. Children's writers should look beyond Gonu Jha to figures such as these. Tragedy contains plot, characterisation, verbal composition, thought, scenic arrangement and song. I do not support the view that children's literature must never contain tragedy. Children must also be taught how the folk deities of lower or formerly untouchable groups themselves came to be treated as untouchable. But it must be explained in a way that enables children to recognise and honour their heritage. Mithila's folk narratives, in the author's account, are not grounded in caste hierarchy or communalism. If Muslims had not yet arrived in Mithila in Gonu Jha's time, why are stories of a Muslim revenue officer's oppression inserted into the tales of Gonu Jha?

In the computer and information revolution, a software designer makes a program and places it on the World Wide Web. The program then operates independently of its designer, sometimes performing functions for which it was never intended. Interfering programs such as viruses can divert it and render it destructive. Antivirus software may repair it; otherwise, after taking a backup, one reformats the computer—a clean slate. Children's literature is similarly a kind of software inscribed upon the child's mind, but there is no option to reformat that mind. Creation of children's literature therefore demands vigilance and care.

Children's literature should be classified and reviewed by age: infancy (0–5 years), childhood (5–12 years) and adolescence (12–18 years). Picture books are made for children under five and are read to them by parents before they begin school. As adults read, children experience the stories through images, with rapid mental development as a result. Once children start school and learn the alphabet, they begin reading these books for themselves alongside textbooks and other illustrated works. After seven they take up books with short chapters; by nine or ten, books with longer chapters; and after twelve, children's novels. Traditional folk tales and stories from history and the epics are told to children. Adventurous and inspiring biographies and ethically instructive narratives also belong to children's literature. Fairy tales, magic and songs can all contribute to meaningful writing for the young.

Criticism must therefore attend to the type of children's literature under consideration. Is it encouraging superstition? Does it help children recognise their inheritance? Will it foster a knowledge of human values? Does it succeed in teaching resistance to casteism and ideological extremism? Is the ideological balance being disturbed? Has dogmatism, deliberately or inadvertently, entered the child's healthy entertainment? Simple vocabulary, simple language and clear ideas will be the touchstones of excellence in children's literature.

Some of Maithili's Finest Works for Children

Kashyap Kamal's Babuak Sunael Khissa—including 'Sahasramukhak Deep', 'Gappak Artha', 'Jahiyasam Kal Dhelak', 'Neek Kari Ta Paigh Ke? Bejae Kari Ta Paigh Ke?', 'Parh Beta Nai Kari Okara Gun Bo Kari' and 'Akilak Mol'—along with Anil Mallik's Dadik Geet and Archana Kumar's Dadi Sa Sunal Katha ('Vidwan'), fill gaps in Maithili folk tales and songs. Shiv Kumar Jha 'Tillu' shows a profound grasp of child psychology in Taregan Dekhaiye, Dahik Thop and Khonichak Lel Sari. Durganand Mandal's story Paras is based on a real person and shows what can be accomplished through indomitable will. Vrishesh Chandra Lal's story Golba and Jagadanand Jha 'Manu's' children's novel Chonha are priceless possessions of Maithili children's literature; both display remarkable psychological insight. Vrishesh Chandra Lal also sings beautiful poems for children.

Pankaj Kumar Jha's Mae Ge Mae and Chandan Kumar Jha's two Agadam-Bagadam poems are sung with extraordinary simplicity. Both writers are engineers intimately acquainted with village culture. Sanskriti Verma, a fourth-standard student, is troubled by the burden of schoolbags, parental pressures and information technology, and expresses her feelings in writing. The children's poems of Manoj Kumar Mandal, Shiv Kumar Jha 'Tillu', Rajesh Mohan Jha 'Gunjan', Naresh Kumar Vikal, Ramakant Rai 'Rama' and Mahakant Thakur have fluency. Yet, when judged against children's mental world, Chandrashekhar Kamat surpasses them in fluency and feeling.

In Munni Kamat's Patra, a child says: 'I won't eat vegetables or bread. I don't want bread to eat. But, Mother, please let me go to study.' The same longing for education appears in Chandan Kumar Jha's Hamahu Parhabai Ab. Shambhunath Jha teaches Newton's principles in Maithili. Prabhat Rai Bhatt's Chunmun Chunmun Karait Chiriya beautifully joins feeling and language. The field also includes Devanshu Vats's Pragatik Rahasya, as well as artwork by Tunisha Priyam, Gunjan Karna, Ganesh Thakur, Anupama Priyadarshini, Shweta Jha Chaudhary and Shweta Jha (Singapore). Shweta Jha Chaudhary's Mithila paintings are incomparable.

This children's festival has brought greater clarity to Maithili literature for the young. I hope that children will continue to use it as a kind of picnic for the coming year.

8. A Theory of Translation for Maithili and the Criticism of Translated Literature

Abstract

The account of Kshemendra's Kathamanjari or Somadeva's Kathasaritsagara as translations of Gunadhya's Brihatkatha, composed in the Paishachi language, might itself be a mode of storytelling, but it certainly marks an early stage in the history of translation. That history is very old. As masterpieces in ancient languages such as Sanskrit, Avestan, Greek and Latin became difficult to understand, readers felt a need for commentaries and, later, for translations into other languages. In the ancient Mauryan empire, Emperor Ashoka disseminated his stone inscriptions, in a particular language and script, throughout the regions of his state and country. Commentaries were first written in the original language, and only later in other languages.

Keywords: translation · theory · translated · literature · criticism · Maithili

The story that Kshemendra's Kathamanjari or Somadeva's Kathasaritsagara was translated from Gunadhya's Paishachi Brihatkatha may itself belong to a storytelling tradition, but it certainly represents the beginning of a history of translation.

Translation has a very long history. When a classic work in an ancient language such as Sanskrit, Avestan, Greek or Latin began to seem difficult, the need arose to write commentaries on it and, a little later, to translate it into another language in order to understand it. The stone inscriptions of Emperor Ashoka of the ancient Mauryan empire were disseminated throughout different regions of the state and country in a particular script and language. At first commentaries were written in the original language; later they came to be written in other languages.

Principles for translation from Maithili into other languages, and from other languages into Maithili: Direct translation from Maithili into another language has so far largely been limited to Sanskrit, Bengali, Nepali, Hindi and English. Translation directly into Maithili also takes place from these five languages. Some direct translation has been done from Marathi, Malayalam and other languages, but this is negligible in quantity. Translation both into Maithili and out of Maithili frequently employs one of those five languages as an intermediary. Even among them, Sanskrit and Bengali are used comparatively little as relay languages; Hindi, Nepali and English are more common. Adaptation is somewhat different from translation: a story may be adapted for the stage, or prose turned into verse and verse into prose. Such a change of genre may take place within Maithili itself. Without a knowledge of translation theory, the adapter may distort both meaning and feeling. The problem becomes even more serious in translation into or from Maithili.

Some essential elements of good translation: When translating word for word, consider whether the underlying sense of an idiom or context is being carried over. Attend to the preservation of the words, sentences and construction of the language. If the original employs archaic words, the translated text should also favour older, authentic vocabulary. A wide knowledge of the grammar and lexical resources of both languages is essential. In the original language, Ramnath or Umesh may be addressed with an emphatically affectionate or familiar vocative. In such a case it could be appropriate to translate the address as Ramnathahun or Umeshahun, rather than an uninflected Ramnath or Umesh, although that would not be appropriate under ordinary circumstances. Correspondence is required in word, feeling, form, and the language appropriate to the place and period of the original work.

The translator must know both the source and target languages, but also the history, geography, folk tales, proverbs, rural and forest life, and urban cultures of both language regions. This becomes still more important in translation through an intermediary language. Here, the requisite knowledge of 'the history, geography, folk tales, proverbs, and rural, forest and urban cultures of both language regions' refers to the original and target language regions, not the region of the intermediary language. Sometimes a linguistic or nonlinguistic element (a cultural element) in the source has no exact equivalent in the target language. The translator may then begin to explain it at length or supply some approximate term. In such a case, it is better to explain the matter fully or clarify it in an appendix than to provide a misleading approximation. This can reduce the literary loss incurred when a text is translated from its original language through an intermediate one.

The translation of stories, poems, plays, novels, epics (narrative poems), essays, school and college textbooks, and books on computer science, sociology, social science and natural science requires particular techniques. Essays, textbooks and writing in the sciences and social sciences are in one respect easier to translate: they discuss their subjects in detail and, unlike imaginative writing—stories, poems, plays, novels and epics—usually have fewer or no complex layers of feeling and cultural inflection. Their readership, too, is arranged by class or subject. Chemical names, biological and botanical binary names, and symbols accepted by specialised international organisations should neither be changed nor translated.

Among creative genres, drama is the most difficult to translate, followed by poetry and then fiction. In drama the translator must recognise the background and indirect implications of the play and understand the psychology of its characters. In poetry it is essential to know the genre and formal structure of the poem. For example, translating a Maithili haiku into English by matching Maithili's five-seven-five pattern of letters to the number of letters in English produces an absurd result, because English haiku conventionally use a five-seven-five syllabic pattern, and the relation between letters and syllables is not the same in English as in Maithili. In this regard, Jyoti Sunit Chaudhary's translations from Maithili into English offer a model. One must consider rhythm and imagery, and relate each part of the poem to the structure of the whole. In fiction, the translator must understand the author, characters, narrative sequence, the time frame of flashbacks and the setting. Consider epic translation: Ramlochan Sharan's Maithili Ramcharitmanas translates an Awadhi work into Maithili, preserving the classical forms of doha, chaupai and soratha.

The British rulers introduced the teaching of Sanskrit by means of translation. Latin and Greek were not taught in this way. If you learn Sanskrit or another language through this method, you may become a scholar or an expert, but you will not necessarily be able to converse in it. Only by learning a language as a mother tongue will you develop conversational ability. A curriculum may introduce its culture through dictionaries, illustrative tales, history and geography.

Translation by computer: Computers are used experimentally to translate imaginative writing, essays, school and college books, and works in computer science, sociology, social science and natural science. Yet 'cold-blooded animal' can be rendered absurdly as a 'ruthless creature'. Computer translation has nevertheless succeeded in certain areas. On Wikipedia, translating a list of five hundred frequently used words and another vocabulary list of 2,600 words; in Google's translation tools, translating basic terms; and in other collaborative projects such as Mozilla Firefox, translating English technical computer terminology—these activities can make automatic Maithili translation possible with few or no errors.

9. Poetry and Its Critical Theory

Abstract

Literature has two forms: prose and poetry. Composition governed by metre is called poetry; what is not so governed is prose. Chhand (metre) is understood as a form of composition that gives pleasure. Harimohan Jha writes "A Poem's Utterance to Non-Poetry," while Gopal Ji Jha "Gopesh," in "O Cuckoo of Poetry, Had You Lived in the Present Age," declares, "I would have written it myself, and I alone would have understood it." Each thus makes his position clear.

Keywords: poetry · critical theory · Maithili

3

Literature has two forms: prose and poetry. Composition governed by metre is called poetry; what is not so governed is prose. Chhand (metre) is understood as a form of composition that gives pleasure. Harimohan Jha writes "A Poem's Utterance to Non-Poetry," while Gopal Ji Jha "Gopesh," in "O Cuckoo of Poetry, Had You Lived in the Present Age," declares, "I would have written it myself, and I alone would have understood it." Each thus makes his position clear. This must not, however, be taken to mean that new poetry today belongs to the category of prose. Even the Vedic Sāvitrī mantra, in the Gāyatrī metre, is counted as Gāyatrī because the rules permit a degree of flexibility: where syllables are deficient, one or two can be supplied in each pāda; the conjuncts involving ya and va can be separated by inserting i and u, respectively. Thus vareṇyam becomes vareṇiyam, and svaḥ becomes suvaḥ.

A critical theory of Maithili poetry: The critic must consider a poem's rhythm and imagery, and must also examine how its individual sections relate to its central body. The Maithili language and its writing system are especially well suited to contemporary new poetry and to haiku. Both syllabic (vārṇik) and quantitative (mātrik) metrical arrangements are effective in the ghazal and the rubāī. An āzād ghazal may also be written without a bahr (metre). No composition is intrinsically irrelevant; if it profoundly stirs you, how could it be without significance?

Plato argues that art cannot be good because it is untrue and unreal. His position should also be read in light of his observation of the shortcomings of the Athenian military organisation in comparison with Sparta. He opposed poetry and drama insofar as the memorisation and recitation of dialogue might attract people towards an artificial life. Aristotle, on the other hand, did not regard poetry merely as imitation; he also perceived philosophy and universal truth in it. In ancient Greece poetry was regarded as a message from the gods. Aristophanes distinguished good and bad poetry; Theophrastus recognised three kinds —severe, excellent, and grand. Poetry and music are inseparable. Yet the European symphony, in which numerous instruments may perform together in different rhythmic patterns, introduced a difference in theoretical understanding.

English literary criticism may be traced to Philip Sidney, who considered poetry in relation to beauty, meaning and human welfare. In New Criticism, Eliot opposed the predominance of emotion in poetry and urged impersonality. Romanticism, by contrast, speaks of poetry as personal experience. In the context of structuralism and poststructuralism, Barthes considers the 'death of the author' necessary to free the reader from the author's intention: the author is separated from the composition, and the reader searches for meaning independently.

In magical realism, magical elements enter real situations; through this technique writers seek to understand reality more fully. The author argues that the Western postmodern bourgeois use of audiovisual media reduces inequality, injustice and deprivation to mere words placed beside equality, possession and justice. Poverty, which in the author's account is not a problem in the West, remains a major problem in India. In this account, postmodernism stands in opposition to feminism and Marxism, and both have resisted it. Marxism, committed to historical analysis, has renewed its theory in the context of structuralism, poststructuralism and postmodernism. Although it emphasises the material world, Marxism is not thereby identical with utilitarianism or Cārvāka philosophy, which the author describes as attending only to bodily necessities. Feminist criticism likewise opposes the status-quo orientation attributed here to postmodernism, since the condition of women cannot improve so long as that condition endures.

After modernist positivism, New Criticism, structuralism and poststructuralism came deconstruction and postmodernism, associated with 'late capitalism' (Fredric Jameson). Structuralism challenged the modern positivist position, which did not question the status of literature, and subsequently deprived authors of exclusive authority to analyse the texts they themselves had written. Structuralism attacks the oppressive organisation of Western society; in this respect, Marxism gained strength (Althusser). Poststructuralism holds that literature exceeds what structuralism understands it to be. Postmodernism is one form of poststructuralism. Poststructuralism argues that literary structures operate within culture and theory, where certain feelings and ideas are excluded and contest continuity. Deconstruction and postmodernism followed poststructuralism. Postcolonialism rejects new forms of colonialism and treats the failure of particular objectives to produce appropriate outcomes in terms comparable to a theory of disorder.

Indian conceptions of poetry: Consider the idea of art directed towards mokṣa (liberation), exemplified by the posture of Naṭarāja. The rhythms of creation and destruction are both visible in it. A durable emotion (sthāyibhāva) intensifies and matures into rasa; Sītā and Rāma experienced many such rasas (see the Vālmīki Rāmāyaṇa). Kṛṣṇa is a teacher of the Indian philosophy of action, but also a connoisseur of aesthetic experience. The theory of rasa became necessary to account for the enjoyment of art, and Bharata composed the Nāṭyaśāstra. Abhinavagupta wrote a commentary on Ānandavardhana's Dhvanyāloka. Bhāmaha in the sixth century, Daṇḍin in the seventh, and Rudraṭa in the ninth carried these discussions forward.

The theory of rasa: For Bharata, rasa arises through the effect of drama. What is drama for? It both enacts rasa and brings it into being. How does rasa arise? Through its causes (vibhāvas), its consequent manifestations (anubhāvas), and accompanying or transitory states (vyabhicāribhāvas). A lasting emotional disposition deepens and matures into a rasa that we can savour. For Bhaṭṭa Lollaṭa, a lasting disposition becomes rasa through this process of cause and effect. Actors experience it through investigation and imagination. Lollaṭa does not assign comparable importance to the poet or to the listener and spectator. Śaunaka holds that the spectator must enter imaginatively into the performance to experience rasa, just as one may respond to a picture of a horse as if it were a horse. Bhaṭṭa Nāyaka maintains that the effect of rasa is experienced by the audience, and distinguishes the poet's language from ordinary language. Through rasa, the soul of the listener or spectator meets the Supreme Self. Its delight is the bliss of one's own true nature (svarūpānanda), bringing self-realisation. The theory of rasa is thus based upon, and gives particular importance to, listeners, spectators and readers.

The theory of dhvani: In the Dhvanyāloka, Ānandavardhana holds that literature's purpose is to convey meaning indirectly or to generate meaning. The theory accounts for the structure and operation of suggested meaning, the experience of beauty called rasa, and the theory of figures of speech. For Ānandavardhana, dhvani—suggestion—is the soul of poetry. Meaning comes indirectly through suggestion, yet in an organised form; questions of meaning and symbol emerge from this process. Suggestion produces the effect of rasa and brings rasa into being. Nyāya and Mīmāṃsā opposed this theory, arguing that dhvani has no independent existence, being instead an outcome of inference already included under secondary indication (lakṣaṇā), and that everything cannot be expressed through words.

The theory of sphoṭa: Bhartṛhari's Vākyapadīya maintains that the meaning of a word or sentence is communicated through sphoṭa. The phonemic, verbal and sentential forms of sphoṭa account respectively for phonemes, words and sentences. No knowledge is possible without a relationship to words; this became a part of Indian epistemology. Meaning can be communicated without the individual letters, words and sentences existing together as a single simultaneous utterance. Sphoṭa is śabdabrahman, the principle of language as ultimate reality and the primary cause of creation. Letters, words and sentences do not all remain present at the same moment. Individual sounds in a spoken word do not themselves contain the meaning of the word: they come into being and pass away before the word is completed. Meaning is nevertheless communicated in sphoṭa, even though its constituent sounds, words or sentences do not coexist at the moment of communication. As a word approaches completion, successive phonemes contribute more intelligibly to its meaning; as a sentence approaches completion, its words become intelligible in sequence. Sāṃkhya, Nyāya, Vaiśeṣika, Mīmāṃsā and Vedānta do not accept the doctrine of sphoṭa. They hold instead that letters and their sounds fully establish meaning. The author finds a resemblance between the doctrine of sphoṭa and Jacques Derrida's theories of deconstruction and dissemination.

The theory of alaṅkāra: Bhāmaha regards alaṅkāra, or poetic ornament, in terms of samāsokti—condensed or indirect expression that gives pleasure. Daṇḍin and Udbhaṭa also advanced the theory of ornaments. The principal distinction is between ornaments of sound and ornaments of sense. Further distinctions arise through similarity and opposition, reasoning and logic, everyday convention, poetic convention and the apprehension of concealed meaning. Mammaṭa classifies sixty-one ornaments into seven groups: upamā (simile or illustrative comparison), rūpaka (metaphor), aprastuta (indirect praise), dīpaka (an ornament uniting or illuminating multiple elements), vyatireka (contrast or distinction), virodha (opposition), and samuccaya (combination).

The theory of aucitya: In the Aucityavicāracarcā, Kṣemendra regards propriety or contextual aptness (aucitya) as the central element of literature. Where should such aptness be found? In words, sentences, the meaning of the composition, qualities, ornaments, rasa, grammatical case, verb, gender, number, adjective, prefix, particle, time, place, lineage, observance, philosophical principle, inner character or disposition, intention, nature, selection of essentials, imagination or genius, condition, thought, name and benediction.

The universe trembles: it is vibration itself. After a poem has been recited, tranquillity spreads—peace everywhere, and peace spreading through the mind.

Poems that praise their authors or attack others offer the blackmailing litterateur opportunities for manipulation. A critic who assesses a work on the basis of evidence can identify this tendency. Casteism and communalism inevitably make their appearance, and it is the critic's responsibility to recognise them. How can literature afflicted by an inferiority complex contribute to human welfare? The critic must recognise that, too. In Maithili literature, where the readership had dwindled almost to zero, one writer reviewed another; personal ego and blackmail had ample scope. These symptoms are still found in the poetry of the dried-up 'mainstream' (!). Attend a few poetry gatherings of that mainstream and the announcer's introductions and applause will expose the prejudices of presenters and writers: poems are written to obtain prizes through blackmail and black-market arrangements. Yet even works awarded the Booker Prize or the Nobel Prize in Literature do not all become timeless. Some are remembered, many are forgotten, and readers thereby pronounce their own judgement.

People read little poetry. Efforts to spread a language such as Sanskrit include conversational camps in which simplified Sanskrit is spoken. Stories and novels are translated from modern languages into Sanskrit, but poetry is largely excluded from the process: if no one reads poetry and a language needs special camps to sustain its spoken use, translating poems into it is treated as a wasteful expenditure of energy. The situation of Maithili has come to resemble this. If village life disappeared today, the number of speakers of the language would become very small; people would speak it only at seminars and literary meetings. One can already feel the need for Maithili pronunciation camps. The plays of caste-bound theatre make it clear that such camps would have to be organised for the dried-up 'mainstream' (!). In such circumstances, what is the need or justification for writing poetry in Maithili? The habit of emphasising that poems are written because there is not enough time makes the situation seem still more alarming.

In these circumstances, neighbourhood happenings, personal ambition, accusations and travel accounts had become the principal subject matter of that dried-up 'mainstream' (!). But why should prose not be used for these purposes? Stories are adapted into plays for performance on stage; what purpose is served by turning prose into poetry? The readers of such hastily composed verse are flattering reviewers and those mighty verse-makers who transform prose into poetry and, through their own prefaces, praise their own achievements. Who will understand the true value of poetic creation?

If personal, worldly experience does not penetrate deeply, a composition cannot become excellent poetry merely by rhyming. However abstract metaphysical reflection may be, if it does not connect with worldly life, neither unrhymed verse nor a mixture of obscure phrases and ideologies can make it moving. Human beings require food, clothing and shelter; metaphysical reflection comes thereafter. The Buddha asks whether those participating in festivities know that death is inevitable; if they do, how can they go on celebrating? In the same way, contemporary Maithili poets see the linguistic, cultural and economic ground disappearing beneath their feet, and yet close their eyes to that reality. When they then try to force national and international events and ideological positions into verse, or write about the indigenous Dalit community in a spirit of patronising benefaction, their poems lack an edge.

Poetry therefore needs excellence, and it needs a linguistic and cultural foundation. It does not need themes imported merely to perform an act of charity towards it. Nor does it need an imported sensibility offering only a fleeting, charitable glance towards the language, culture and economic foundation vanishing beneath its feet. Good poetry can be written on any subject: on the Buddha's concern for humanity's future; on giving courage to a troubled mind—otherwise people will keep attending the sermons of fraudulent holy men; or on society's linguistic, cultural and economic foundations—otherwise camps will have to be organised to teach Maithili itself.

Images must also communicate. If they do not, an entire atmosphere will have to be prepared in advance for the poet; a stage will have to be arranged for the verse, and training camps organised to explain the poet's vocabulary and ideology. Some poets have indeed been doing this. Poetry ought to contain the gentle rises and falls of Mithila's speech, the rich qualities of its working people, its ways of living and its cultural rigidity, as well as its politics, daily life, social beliefs, economic condition, morality, religion and philosophy. Without these elements poetry becomes one-sided, loses its balance, and turns into something fit merely to be framed and hung on a wall.

Composing poetry is a literary necessity. The day the people of Mithila must be taught their own language in special camps, the very existence of poetry can also be called into question. Poets must remain alert so that this day never comes; and they are alert.

The assertion of superiority in poetry—which may itself be a manifestation of inferiority—must be identified. Identify mediocrity:

stock expressions, the latest breaking news passed off in the name of modernity, writing that has no thought capable of overturning the assumptions of its age. That is why such poetry has little sharpness when it criticises international affairs, Bush and Saddam. Whether it supports or opposes a temple or mosque, or Nandigram and Lalgarh, the edge is similarly missing. The drunken 'humanist,' 'secularist,' 'leftist' and 'rightist' writes with a drowsy consciousness, fills a poem with fashionable expressions, and calls the job finished. How could criticism of America have any bite, or praise of the Left have conviction, when the poet earns a livelihood with the support of the Right?

The absence of struggle, rather than allowing creativity to mature over time, lowers its level. Everyone follows the age; it takes creative courage to go against it. Identify those comfortable, self-serving elements who call others escapists while being unable themselves to venture into depth. A relationship with history can connect one to the historical imagination. Writers weighed down by inferiority and guilt lack the incisiveness needed to overturn the present social order. The materialism of Nyāya–Vaiśeṣika and Sāṃkhya–Yoga, their affirmation of external reality and rejection of illusion, household life and the public good, works of art and literature—all these stand in relation to knowledge and insight within the self, which are undivided and involve movement, freedom and creative change.

We cannot change history or literary history. There is also the supposed 'golden age' of Mithila, reconstructed from the memories of its upper and middle classes (!), but such a golden age may have significance only for television and cinema. Liberalism, industrialisation and the achievements and failures of economic development, along with reservations and the expansion of freedoms, dispersed opposition among socially disadvantaged communities while also reducing its intensity, whether in Naxalism, Maoism or Marxism–Leninism. The bourgeoisie benefited. Its political and cultural organisations expanded and sought to reach the proletariat and include women as well. Money and material comfort broke down traditional morality. Companies acquired an independent existence, while families and individuals increasingly ran such enterprises through salaried employees.

Control over nature, observation of human behaviour, grain in return for labour and money in return for labour, employment-guarantee programmes, public-distribution shops, the shrinking of distances between countries in the search for employment, and assaults on the foundations of the family—all belong to a capitalist world economy. Change will not arrive of itself: it must be won through struggle and effort. Independent human feeling guarantees neither a good future nor a bad one. We still have choices, and the evidence of a revival of Maithili poetry is heartening. Our task is to choose whether to spread sensation or to do the work.

Criticism in the Light of Eastern and Western Critical Theories: Theory and Practice

I have selected some poems by Booch Ji for use as a workshop in the principles and practice of literary criticism.

A Study of Booch Ji's Poems from Marxist, Historical, Structuralist, Magical-Realist, Postmodernist, Feminist and Deconstructionist Perspectives, Together with Indian Aesthetics

Let us go further and see.

Jethī Kareh: In Booch Ji's poem "Jethī Kareh," the poet says that the Kareh River grows turbulent at dawn and rises even when the rainfall has been slight. The danger level is very high; why, then, does it become so restless? At the end, he suggests that it will break its embankments and unleash devastation. This is the poem's ordinary reading.

Now read it structurally. The river becomes turbulent in the morning, from which one may expect that it is not turbulent at other times. It rises in spite of light rain, although it ought not to. The glittering of its water, its circling at bends, and the consequence that it swallows the very heart of inhabited ground form a connected structure. As its sandbanks grow, the poet's patience gives way.

Step away from structuralism and consider historical analysis. For a new age, the poem acquires a new meaning: the danger mark that may have seemed exceptionally high in the poet's time no longer remains so high because of the deposits accumulated within the embankments. For a new generation the poem becomes something different from what it was for the poet. Move now from structuralism to deconstruction. A deconstructionist would say that the structuralist opposition assumes a philosophical polarity. A river rising despite light rainfall, the folly of engineers who try to imprison it in embankments, and the poet's prediction of a catastrophic breach—all these raise the question whether the poet's own polarities are permanent or temporary.

Return again to historicality. In magical-realist literature, a journey into the past brings us to the 1960s, when people were possessed by the obsession with constructing embankments—high, wide barriers that would hold back the river and supposedly bring limitless benefits to humanity. A character living in that historical moment would assign the poem a third meaning. The poet's authority would then disappear, and language would begin its own play. The meaning would be different again for a character from such literature who lived in the future: that character might not even understand what was meant by the rising danger mark on the river, but would search for the feeling of the poem.

Return to deconstruction and deconstruct further. It may eventually become entangled in its own net. Much will cease to remain, yet much will remain: rain will persist, the river will persist in changed form, and its water will still shimmer in sunlight. Turbulence and rising water will continue.

Svāgat Gān (Welcome Song): At the level of ordinary reading, the poet is welcoming everyone. Yet what can a song of celebration mean amid the pitiful cries of Mithila's uprooted soil? The bee is thirsty; the fruit trees are withering. What can a ceremonial literary gathering achieve at such a time? The poet must carry a stick along with the poem, and a thorny staff along with aesthetic enjoyment.

A note beneath the poem identifies its occasion: the welcome to guests at the Vidyapati Memorial Festival of 1984 in the village of Baidyanathpur, Rosera block, Samastipur district. This was the period when migration from Mithila was beginning. The bridge across the Ganges at Hajipur had been built, yet the model of development seemed to have failed. Faith in great embankments had collapsed. Floods devastated agriculture and farmers; industries based on local crops were absent; and no campaign for education was visible. In those circumstances the poet was entrusted with welcoming a ceremonial assembly.

A reading of "Welcome Song" through the theory of dhvani: By saying that Vidyapati, an embodiment of Śiva, the conqueror of death, has died, the poet brings both meaning and symbol before the reader. Nyāya philosophy opposed the doctrine of dhvani, but Booch Ji, a poet from Kariyan, the village of the logician Udayana, is a poet rather than a philosopher. He produces a powerful structure of suggestion: our misfortune has taken root even more deeply; what can a ceremonial assembly alone accomplish? He then asks his listeners to recite poetry but carry a stick on the shoulder: in one hand the source of rasa, in the other a thorny staff. Rich in these symbols, the poem advances coherently and welcomes its guests.

From a Marxist standpoint, the poet's task here extends beyond poetic recitation. Affirmation is joined to its negation; the old and the new, development and death, are carefully combined. Had the welcome song detached itself from its circumstances and indulged in empty exclamations of admiration, Marxist criticism would regard it as an inferior poem. The dried-up Maithili mainstream contains an abundance of such songs praising welcome ceremonies and opulence. Booch Ji instead makes the song part of a dynamic process, thereby turning it into one of Maithili's finest welcome songs.

Beṭī Banalī Pahāṛ (The Daughter Has Become a Mountain): At the level of ordinary reading, the beloved daughter has become a water-pot hanging from her father's neck—a burden. She came as though riding a flying carriage, but, abandoning Hari's Garuḍa, now demands a car. Thirty-five grams of gold have been provided, yet the expenses of the wedding night remain, and the bridegroom's party will arrive from ten villages. Electric bulbs shine everywhere, but darkness occupies the centre. Daśaratha asked for no money, nor did Rāma say anything. History may have offered Kṛṣṇa's love, but what of it? Janaka cries out in distress in the present. Fathers grip their sons by the throat; homes turn into slaughterhouses and villages into markets.

A sociological reading of "The Daughter Has Become a Mountain": This is a poem opposing the dowry system. The cherished daughter who once seemed to arrive in a flying carriage now leaves her father distraught because of the demands of dowry—a system that existed then and continues to exist.

Karuṇ Gīt (Song of Sorrow): At the level of ordinary reading, the sorrowful song of the cuckoo prompts the speaker to behold a flowering grove through tear-filled eyes. At the golden summit of valour comes the easy victory of an ocean of peace. Whenever the speaker embraces something, many crooked thorns pierce. Beauty arrives for only two moments—and departs. Love's honey becomes bitter. The night's lament dissolves into dawn.

A formalist reading of "Song of Sorrow": Consider the act of viewing a flowering forest through tear-filled eyes; the furious image of a burning cremation ground appearing on a bed of erotic love; and the victory of the ocean of peace on the golden summit of valour. The poet makes highly effective use of the unfamiliar possibilities of language, and that is where the poem's poetic quality arises. The abundance of opposing words, their unusual combinations and the figures of speech make this poem distinctive. Images such as a flower piercing like a thorn give it exceptional force from a formalist perspective.

Gāme Mon Paṛaie (It Is the Village I Remember): At the level of ordinary reading, there might not have been even a morsel of bread in the village, and the bathua greens might have lacked salt; nevertheless, in Calcutta it is the village that comes to mind. If the water of the Kareh could irrigate the fields and produce pearls, would the children still be scattered? Is it better to remain a gentleman on the Hooghly or a labouring farmer beside the Kamla? The fields along the Kamla are finer than Eden Gardens.

In Eden Gardens a husband garlands his wife; on the Kamla, a woman of Tirhut searches for dhaturā and ākon flowers for her Bhola.

A feminist reading of "It Is the Village I Remember": It is a poem about migration. The Tirhut woman searches for flowers for Bhola while Bhola is away in migration. Read existentially, Bhola himself bears responsibility for his situation, for the anxiety of living alone.

Son Dāi: In an ordinary reading, there is neither laughter nor pleasure in Son Dai's life. But why? The children depart, the young people leave, and the old and infirm follow. Why, then, does Son Dai still have faith? The answer comes later: she has forgotten her homeland and lives out her days in exile. As her age advances, how much longer can she remain in Son Dai's home?

A feminist reading of "Son Dai": A theory produced by men within a male-centred society is not necessarily appropriate for women, even if that theory claims to be a principle of poetry. For whose sake does Son Dai, forgetting her homeland, endure exile?

Akāl (Famine): In an ordinary reading of the poem, the poet binds a torch of hunger to the plough and strikes a rhythm on its blade. Drought brings famine and rising prices, so the sky over the burning village becomes red. A dance of death, as in Lanka, begins in India; this time not even Vibhīṣaṇa's house will survive, for its garland of skulls is tied with string. A mother clings to the earth with both arms. The ten-headed Rāvaṇa opens his twenty eyes and shakes his heads.

A reading of "Famine" through the theory of aucitya: This is no ordinary famine but the Great Time of Destruction: hunger is fastened to the plough as a torch, and its blade beats out a rhythm. Such a representation of famine belongs appropriately to the time and place of Mithila; that contextual aptness is the poem's aucitya. Rāvaṇa will certainly be uprooted, but Vibhīṣaṇa, too, will not survive.

Tohar Ṭhor (Your Lips): At the level of ordinary reading, the poem joins the lips reddened by betel with the beloved's lips. The beautiful woman applies the lime of speech and decorates her cheeks with red as if stained by catechu. But where is the pipe of love? Dawn's redness resembles her lips; without her, evening is distraught. If a butcher becomes her husband, the speaker will become a broken Rāhu. Nectar is scarce even in heaven; how, then, can the beloved's lips be obtained? The Sakri mill will become great when the speaker learns science from Viśvakarman, and sweetness will emerge from the mill. The beloved's lips resemble a ripe joint of sugarcane. Even in rebirth, the speaker will return as grain and prepared food to reach her. Yet despite all this, the poet says that his purpose has not been revealed through words.

A reading of "Your Lips" through alaṅkāra theory: Applying the lime of speech is an instance of indirect or displaced expression. The cheek reddened like catechu, the relation between betel-stained lips and the beloved's lips, dawn's redness resembling her lips, and her lips compared to a ripe joint of sugarcane are all similes employed by the poet. In the question 'Where is the pipe of love's yearning?' there is an opposition of images. 'Distraught in the middle of the road without you' employs metaphor.

A reading of "Your Lips" through rasa theory: 'You applied the stone-lime of speech / and coloured the cheek with catechu's blood' provides the vibhāva, or determining cause. The answering line, 'On seeing it, my heart surged,' presents the anubhāva, the manifest consequence.

A reading of "Your Lips" through sphoṭa theory: Although he lives on the soil of Kariyan, Udayana's village, this poet cannot adequately accommodate his verse within the Nyāya rejection of sphoṭa. He speaks what remains within his mind and compares the beloved's lips with an elusive thief of hearts. Booch, the poet of Udayana's village, says, 'The description of phonemes is exhausted; the intended meaning is not revealed by words.' Here meaning is communicated not by separate words but by sphoṭa, in this poem and throughout the collection. In Maithili, which the author, invoking Yehudi Menuhin, calls the world's most rhythmic and melodious language, such lyricism establishes Booch Ji as its most rhythmic poet after Vidyapati and redefines the possibilities of Maithili poetry.

Some of Maithili's Finest Poetry

In Anjani Kumar Verma 'Dauji's' "Oj ka Bhoj" (A Feast of Vigour), intimacy is described as a mirage; in "Samasyā" (The Problem), he asks how people can become joyful. In "Ātmabal" (Inner Strength), he holds that the blood of Abhimanyu begins to flow only when attachment to one's own life or the lives of others has ended. Balram Sah finds every good thing surprising, and his sleep is broken. Ravi Bhushan Pathak and Vivekanand Jha lay bare a great many matters. In "Ai Ber Chhathi Me" (At Chhath This Year), Ravi Bhushan Pathak offers a new image for the place where the sun rises: 'This time God is rising from behind the Dusadh settlement / … the sky behind the Dusadh settlement was a fierce, clear red.' Vivekanand Jha writes in "Ham" (I): 'I am the oleander fallen from your basket of flowers; / I am the thorn, the useless kuśa grass swept here by the fresh waters of the Kosi.'

On Children's Day, Satish Chandra Jha gives musical form to the suffering of little children; a comparable music and rhythm can be found in Rajesh Mohan Jha 'Gunjan' and Shiv Kumar Jha 'Tillu'. In "Bonihār" (The Labourer) and "Māṭik Lalkār" (The Challenge of the Earth), Munna Ji connects poetry with contemporary problems.

Amit Mishra, Chandan Kumar Jha, Jagadanand Jha 'Manu', Om Prakash Jha and Ashish Anchinhar all write ghazals in established bahr, exposing the ignorance of metre among earlier ghazal writers. Jagadanand Jha 'Manu' writes a sher: 'Though the rain may pour fiercely, let the clouds thunder; / the roof has burned, but has my heart not burned too?' Their ghazals possess an intensity and standard far higher than the slack compositions of their older contemporaries Rajendra Vimal and Arvind Thakur, both of whom published collections of free ghazals in 2011.

In "Sūryāst Se Pahine" (Before Sunset), Rajendra Vimal names the metres, but it is difficult to find their presence in the ghazals themselves, however carefully one searches. His practice broadly resembles Siyaram Jha 'Saras's' declaration that he wrote in a particular bahr identified as 'Gor-Bi'; Saras Ji, like Rajendra Vimal, wrote only free ghazals. These newer ghazal writers will also present a formidable challenge to the weak free ghazals of other poets associated with the Jīvan Yug period. Navin Kumar 'Asha' shows signs of progress. Kishan Karigar has moved from humour towards serious writing and is advancing in both.

For songs, one should read and sing the songs and ghazals of Chandrashekhar Kamat, Jagadish Chandra Thakur 'Anil', Dhirendra Premarshi, Jagadish Prasad Mandal, Shyamal Suman, Prakash Premi, Ramakant Rai 'Rama', Nand Vilas Rai, Bechan Thakur and Ramvilas Sahu. Jay Prakash Mandal writes: 'I registered my name even for the Asian Olympics; / blessed am I that I escaped like this Malleswari.' Satyendra Kumar Jha's short poems are fine: 'Even the cremation ground has no empty fallow land now; / on each patch of earth a body has already burned once— / every new corpse now / burns its ancestors once again along with itself.'

The awakening and natural ease of Pankaj Kumar Jha's verse show poetry's connection with society. For the finest Maithili haiku and tanka, read Vrishesh Chandra Lal. Manoj Kumar Mandal writes of a tree he planted himself that has been overtaken by autumn. The Telugu poems of Anna Varam Devender, the Dogri poems of Champa Sharma, the Bhojpuri poems of Parichay Das and the Odia poems of Ipsita Sarangi address distinct subjects. Devender's poem gives voice to a farmer just before suicide; Champa Sharma dedicates hers to a soldier. Ipsita's short philosophical poem carries densely concentrated imagery.

Mihir Jha's rubāī is among the finest in Maithili: 'How shall I hold wine in a pierced heart? / How shall I keep accounts in a distracted mind? / The love that burned was meant for seven births; / how shall I store the answer to grievances gone by?' Manoj Jha 'Mukti' writes: 'If you must flee at the very beginning, then flee.' Kapileshwar Sahu writes in "Kosi": 'They have made the homestead a pool; / even bamboo cannot sound its depth.' In "Sahās" (Courage), Indrabhushan Kumar writes: 'Suddenly a woman appeared on stage, / dark in appearance ... / fear not if I tell you all; / the audience abused her heartily ... / she did not know how to weave a web of words.' Mridula Pradhan wrote openly in the poems she composed; there is assuredly something astonishing in them. She writes of 'the temptation, through the pen, / to roam among the homes and villages / of the tender young leaves.' Kalinath Thakur's kuṇḍaliyā verses on dowry are remarkable. Nikki Priyadarshini writes of the way a woman is seen and treated—

'You are a woman': this constant refrain has not changed. Mohammad Gulhasan writes, 'Such beautiful wheat, uncle, the buffalo has grazed it all; / hurry, hurry, uncle—what an outrage!' The prose poems of Ramesh and Shanti Lakshmi Chaudhary are extraordinary. Munni Kamat writes: 'I shall dissolve somewhere; / this pen will stop; / and / words will disappear somewhere.'

The jhāṛū compositions of Ramdev Prasad Mandal 'Jharudar', Maithili's first people's poet, are spontaneous expressions of his poetic feeling. This is why people began calling him the Bhikhari Thakur of Maithili. Consider one such jhāṛū: 'Before me there was no government, / nor any constitution of religion. / Without me the world is empty; / the one who destroys me is like an animal.' Ravi Mishra Bharadwaj writes, 'Restlessness began to weep / at my eyes themselves; / people started laughing as they looked at me.' Pramod Rangeele writes, 'Look at the rhythm with which pain speaks. / Look at the nets they cast over the dead.' Rajdev Mandal, author of Ambara, described here as the finest Maithili poetry collection of the twenty-first century, writes: 'Like a working bull that strikes with its horns, / he fiercely swears ...'

'... from today, I have become a real man.' Umesh Mandal, Umesh Paswan, Anamika Raj and Sandeep Kumar Safi have a feeling for poetry, a vocabulary of their own and a reality directly lived. Poetry holds its reins in the hands of all four. Whichever direction they fly the kite of their verse in, that will become a direction for Maithili poetry; they have the capacity to carry literature, society and verse as far forward as they wish. Consider these lines from Anamika Raj's "Navkā Bāṭ" (A New Path): 'Labourer or woman! / Both remain objects to be consumed / by feudal lord or capitalist; / and / the one who consumes them / tries to prove his manhood / through a feeble act of crushing them.'

This collection of poetry contains verse, songs, prose poems, ghazals, free ghazals (without bahr), devotional ghazals, rubāī, qiṭà, hazal, nat, band, qaṣīda, haiku, tanka and waka, haibun, senryū, kuṇḍaliyā (dohā plus rolā), and jhāṛū, among other forms. Whether one considers feminist voices, Dalit discourse, Marxism, humanism or the collective presence of postmodern thought, the collection has achieved a standard in each. It will provide direction for Maithili poetry, and the benchmark it establishes for these forms will open a path to achievements beyond it.

Appendix to the Critical Theory of Poetry

Appendix I

A Critical Theory of the Maithili Ghazal: Towards a Maithili Ghazal Poetics

The ghazal's origins may be traced to Arabic literature, where arkān denoted a particular description of a stirring incident. But if the ghazal is the combination of such units, that form is a Persian contribution. From Persian the ghazal passed into Urdu and Hindi, and now into Maithili.

Mayanand Mishra called the Maithili ghazal a gīt (song). Here, however, I shall call it a ghazal and use certain terms drawn from Arabic and Persian prosody. The relevant technical vocabulary for Maithili ghazal theory thus belongs to ʿarūż (prosody).

Bahr (Metre): Arabic prosody recognises nineteen buḥūr (metres). It is unnecessary to memorise so many metres, for bahr may be understood by analogy with thāṭ and rāga-rāginī in Indian music. In place of the nineteen Arabic metres, I shall therefore explain Indian music for Maithili readers below (source: the late Rama Shray Jha 'Ram Rang'). In Devanagari and Mithilakshar, speech is written as pronounced; the short i is not an exception in Maithili. The method for counting short and long vowels in Maithili accordingly differs, and it will be explained here. Where a sher contains eight arkān (four in each of its two miṣrāʿ), the metre is called musamman; where it contains six (three in each half-line), it is musaddas. This also demonstrates once again the scientific basis for writing Maithili case suffixes joined to the words they modify: even when the case suffix is written separately, the metrical feet have to be counted as though it were attached; the suffix is not assigned an independent count.

A metre containing only one rukn is a mufrad bahr. Where it contains more than one rukn (plural: arkān), it is a murakkab bahr.

Where two arkān recur, the form is called bahr-e-shikasta.

Miṣrāʿ and sher: In a Maithili ghazal, a two-line couplet describing a particularly stirring event is called a sher. One line is a miṣrāʿ. Both lines together constitute the sher, while each separate line is a miṣrāʿ. In the opening couplet (matlaʿ), both half-lines have matching qāfiya, or rhyme.

Ūlā and sānī: The first miṣrāʿ of a sher is the ūlā; the second is the sānī. Two miṣrāʿs form the opening couplet, just as two lines form a dohā.

Arkān (rukn) and ziḥāf: Eight metrical feet (arkān, singular rukn) give rise to the nineteen buḥūr. These feet are compared here with fundamental rāgas, while the metres are likened to their developed forms. Modification of a foot is ziḥāf, as in changing vareṇyam to vareṇiyam.

Taqtīʿ (metrical scansion): A two-line couplet describing a striking event constitutes a sher, and a number of such couplets together constitute a ghazal. Taqtīʿ is the procedure for dissecting and examining its metre. By scanning the half-line, one determines the bahr to which it belongs—the musical rāga or rāginī, in the analogy employed here.

Matlaʿ (beginning) and maqtaʿ (ending): The first sher of a ghazal is its matlaʿ; the last its maqtaʿ. Both half-lines of the matlaʿ rhyme in the same manner, while the poet places a name or pen-name in the maqtaʿ. The final signature couplet is sometimes absent, something to be understood in context. The opening matlaʿ too, is sometimes missing, though a beginner in ghazal writing should include it.

Qāfiya and radīf: A fixed word or group of words following the rhyme, or associated with the word carrying the rhyme, is called the radīf. The rhyming word changes but the radīf does not. Qāfiya pertains to phonemes or metrical quantities; radīf to a word or group of words.

A sher containing two rhymes is called zū-qāfiya.

Two short syllables may also be substituted for one long syllable.

Just as qāfiya operates with syllabic sound and quantity while also involving words, so the radīf, conversely, may involve the sounds and quantities contained within a word or phrase. Thus, if the radīf in the first line is a group of words, in the second line one of those words may form part of another word: the radīf may then be present within a word bearing the qāfiya. A radīf may also occur between two rhymes. It may range from apparent absence to a single fixed word, a group of words or an entire unchanged sentence. The word bearing the qāfiya continues to vary throughout the ghazal.

From the standpoint of Maithili grammar, a ghazal with an unchanged syllabic quantity or unchanged incomplete word may be described as a ghazal without radīf, because these are fundamental properties of the qāfiya. If instead one looks for an entire unchanged word or phrase, the radīf is absent. Classical theory permits this absence without difficulty. At the beginning, however, rather than compose ghazals without radīf, the poet should employ a recurring and unchanged word, phrase or sentence—in other words, a clearly identifiable radīf.

Bahr and Music

First obtain a keyboard with at least thirty-seven keys.

Divide it into three groups of twelve keys each. Keys numbered 13 and 25 indicate both sa and sā at the transition between octaves. Each group has five black and seven white keys. The first twelve constitute the lower octave (mandra saptak), the next twelve the middle octave (madhya saptak), and the twelve at the extreme right the upper octave (tār saptak). Mark the keys from 1 to 36 with a marker. The left and right hands will proceed respectively from keys 1 and 13.

A group of twelve keys consists of five black keys and seven white keys.

For the first exercise practise only on the white keys. The first seven white keys are sa, re, ga, ma, pa, dha, and ni. The eighth white key is the higher sā, which is also the sa of the next group.

With the left hand, play sa using the ring finger, re with the middle finger, ga with the index finger, and ma with the thumb. Then pass the ring finger beneath the thumb to play pa, play dha with the middle finger and ni with the index finger, and play the upper sā with the thumb. Practise this sequence. With the right hand, begin on the first key of the group of twelve: play sa with the thumb, re with the index finger, ga with the middle finger, and ma with the ring finger. Pass the thumb under the ring finger and play pa with the thumb, dha with the index finger, ni with the middle finger, and the upper sā with the ring finger. For both hands the upper sā is the first white key of the next group of twelve. In an ascending scale it is the sā of the first group and, because it is the first key of the second group, also its sa.

The second point is that whenever you draw a sound from the keyboard, match it with the sound of your own voice: there should be no difference in pitch, however slight. Third, do not mistake the musical notes sa, re, ga, ma, pa, dha, ni, and sā for letters of Mithilakshar or Devanagari. They indicate only how high or low the notes lie in ascent and descent. Take another sound, such as ka, and practise raising and lowering its pitch according to the keyboard notes sa, re, and so on.

Of the seven notes, ṣaḍja and pañcama—that is, sa and pa—are fixed (acal); in a uniform melodic progression their positions are not raised or lowered. Sa expresses repose or a resting place, and pa expresses exhilaration. The remaining five notes are movable: they admit upward or downward alteration. Sa and pa have only their natural (śuddha) forms. An altered note may be either raised or lowered: a raised note is called tīvra, a lowered one komal. Except for ma, the movable notes are altered downwards. Thus re, ga, dha, and ni each have two forms, natural and flat (komal); ma has the natural and the sharp (tīvra) forms. Re suggests enthusiasm, ga peace, ma fear, dha sorrow, and ni a sense of command. Notes are natural when all seven occupy their assigned positions; they are then written without special signs.

When a natural note is lowered from its assigned position it is called komal. There are four such notes, marked by a horizontal sign below: रे॒, ग॒, ध॒, नि॒ (re, ga, dha, ni).

When the natural middle note is raised above its position, it is called tīvra. The sign is placed above it vertically. There is only one such note: मं (ma).

Thus there are seven natural notes—sa, re, ga, ma, pa, dha, ni—four komal notes—रे॒, ग॒, ध॒, नि॒—and one tīvra note, मं: twelve notes in all.

It follows that sa and pa are fixed, while the others may be varied or altered.

Return now to the keyboard. I specified thirty-seven keys because these provide three groups of twelve, together with the thirty-seventh and final key for the upper sā.

An octave comprises seven natural and five altered notes: twelve in all.

The twelve white and black keys to the left represent the lower octave, the central twelve the middle octave, and keys 25–36 the upper octave.

Āroh means ascent from low to high—for example, from the lower to the middle octave and from the middle to the upper octave.

A dot is written below the notes of the lower octave, no such mark is needed for the middle octave, and a dot is placed above the notes of the upper octave; thus:

स॒, र॒, ग॒, म॒, प॒, ध॒, न॒ | सा, रे, ग, म, प, ध, नि | सां, रें, गं, मं, पं, धं, निं.

Avroh is descent from the upper to the middle and from the middle to the lower octave.

Vādī svar: the note employed most frequently in a rāga.

Samvādī svar: the note employed most frequently after the vādī.

Anuvādī svar: the remaining notes, apart from the vādī and samvādī.

Varjya svar: a note that is not used in a particular rāga.

Pakaṛ: the characteristic group of notes by which a particular rāga is recognised.

The time of performance is also fixed for different rāgas and rāginīs. Pūrvāṅga rāgas are sung or played from noon until midnight, and uttarāṅga rāgas from midnight until noon.

The vādī of a pūrvāṅga rāga is one of sa, re, ga, ma, or pa; that of an uttarāṅga rāga is one of ma, pa, dha, ni, or sa. A rāga performed at sunrise or sunset is called a sandhi-prakāśa rāga.

Classification of Rāgas (Rāga-jāti)

A rāga's jāti is determined by the number of notes used in its ascending and descending scales.

There are three principal classifications: (1) sampūrṇa (seven notes), (2) ṣāḍava (six), and (3) auḍava (five), their respective standard numbers of notes being seven, six and five.

Now combine these three classifications in pairs.

What is sampūrṇa–auḍava? The first term designates the ascending and the second the descending scale. The answer is (7, 5): seven ascending notes and five descending notes. Since sampūrṇa has seven and auḍava five, their combination is (7, 5). There are accordingly nine combinations of rāga-jāti: (1) sampūrṇa–sampūrṇa (7, 7); (2) sampūrṇa–ṣāḍava (7, 6); (3) sampūrṇa–auḍava (7, 5); (4) ṣāḍava–sampūrṇa (6, 7); (5) ṣāḍava–ṣāḍava (6, 6); (6) ṣāḍava–auḍava (6, 5); (7) auḍava–sampūrṇa (5, 7); (8) auḍava–ṣāḍava (5, 6); and (9) auḍava–auḍava (5, 5).

Thāṭ

A saptak contains seven natural, four komal, and one tīvra notes, twelve in all. A particular group of seven notes from which a rāga originates is called a thāṭ or mel.

The thāṭ is the progenitor of a rāga. It has seven notes and thus belongs to the sampūrṇa classification. It contains only an ascending arrangement, never both the natural and altered forms of the same note. The thāṭs are named after different rāgas. Their seven notes occur in order, but the thāṭ itself is not intended as a melody to be sung.

There are ten thāṭs:

1. Āsāvarī — सा रे ग॒ म प ध॒ नि॒.

2. Kalyāṇ — सा रे ग मं प ध नि.

3. Kāfī — सा रे ग॒ म प ध नि॒.

4. Khamāj — सा रे ग म प ध नि̲.

5. Pūrvī — सा रे̲ ग मं प ध̲ नि.

6. Bilāval — सा रे ग म प ध नि.

7. Bhairav — सा रे̲ ग म प ध̲ नि.

8. Bhairavī — सा रे̲ ग̲ म प ध̲ नि̲.

9. Mārwā — सा रे̲ ग मं प ध नि.

10. Toṛī — सा रे̲ ग̲ मं प ध̲ नि.

Varṇa

Varṇa expresses the form and affective character of a rāga. There are four kinds.

1. Sthāyī: the recurrence of a single note again and again.

2. Avarohī: a succession of notes moving from high to low.

3. Ārohī: a succession of notes moving from low to high.

4. Sañcārī: the rhythmic combination of the three preceding movements.

Lakṣaṇa-gīt: a composition specifying the vādī, samvādī, classification, and time of performance so that the rāga's distinctive features become clear.

Sthāyī: the opening section of a song, repeated after every antarā.

Antarā: a section sung once after the sthāyī.

Alaṅkār/palṭā: the rule-governed performance of sequences of notes, in singing or on an instrument.

Ālāp: an elaborated vocal or instrumental exposition of a group of notes within a particular rāga.

Tān: the rapid vocal or instrumental execution of the notes of a rāga.

A tān moves swiftly and is sung or played at double speed.

Now consider tāl, the rhythmic cycle. According to musical tempo there are cycles such as jhaptāl (ten beats), tritāl (sixteen), ektāl (twelve), kaharvā (eight), and dādrā (six).

Kāl is the time required for singing, playing an instrument, or dancing; laya is the regular pace followed in performance. A fast laya is drut, a slow one vilambit, and one neither slow nor fast is madhya laya.

Mātrā is the unit of a tāl and is used to measure laya.

When beats are combined into groups within a tāl, each group is a vibhāg: for instance, dādrā, with groups of three beats, has two vibhāgs.

The ordered arrangement of the divisions of a tāl constitutes chhand. The first beat of the first division is the sam, marked + or ×; a division without a clap is the khālī, marked ○.

The complete formulation indicating the syllables of a tāl—its beats, divisions, claps and empty beats—is its ṭhekā.

Signs: at the point of clapping, the tāl sign and a number; sam: + or ×; khālī: ○.

S — avagraha/bikārī.

— Two bols (percussion syllables) within one beat.

— Four bols within one beat.

Two bols in a beat may be spoken as dhā-ge; four as dhā-ge-ti-ṭa.

An Introduction to Tāls

Kaharvā Tāl

Four beats, a single division, and sam on the first beat.

Dhā ginā tinak dhin.

Tīntāl / Tritāl

Sixteen beats in four divisions of four beats each. Claps fall on beats 1, 5 and 13; the khālī falls on beat 9.

Dhā dhin dhin dhin.

Dhā dhin dhin dhā.

Dhā tin tin tā.

Tā dhin dhin dhā.

Jhaptāl

Ten beats in four divisions of 2, 3, 2 and 3 beats respectively.

Sam is on beat 1, khālī on beat 6, and claps on beats 3 and 8.

Dhī nā.

Dhī dhī nā.

Tī nā.

Dhī dhī nā.

Rūpak Tāl

Seven beats in divisions of 3, 2 and 2.

The first division is empty (khālī); the following two are marked by claps.

The first beat is both sam and khālī; claps occur on beats 4 and 6.

Dhī dhā trak.

Dhī dhī.

Dhā trak.

Counting Short and Long Syllables

There are two kinds of metre: mātrik (quantitative) and vārṇik (syllabic). The Vedas employ vārṇik metres.

Consider vārṇik metre, in which syllables alone are counted. A consonant bearing a halant does not receive an independent count. A letter bearing a vowel sign such as e or u is counted as one, as is a conjunct consonant. The letters from a through ha are likewise counted singly. No syllable is given a double count in this system. Remember three principal rules:

(1) A letter with halant: 0; (2) a conjunct letter: 1; (3) each letter from a to ha: 1.

Now examine the first example:

"ई अरदराक मेघ नहि मानत रहत बरसि के" (Ī ardarāk megh nahi mānat rahat barasi ke) = 1 + 5 + 2 + 2 + 3 + 3 + 3 + 1 = 20 syllabic units (mātrās).

The second example is paścāt (पश्चात्) = 2 units. Now consider a third example.

Āb (आब) = 2 units; a fourth example is skripṭ (स्क्रिप्ट) = 2 units.

A composition governed by metre is called padya, or verse; otherwise it is gadya, prose. A chhand is a composition that gives pleasure. Yet this does not mean that modern new poetry must be classified as prose. Even the Vedic Sāvitrī–Gāyatrī mantra is reckoned in the Gāyatrī metre by a flexible, generous rule: when a line lacks the required number of syllables, one or two may be added within each pāda. The conjuncts involving ya and va may be separated by inserting i and u respectively. Thus vareṇyam becomes vareṇiyam.

Svah (स्वः) becomes suvah (सुवः).

Apart from Tamil, the scripts of southern India and those of northern, western and eastern India, including Devanagari, possess broadly similar vowel inventories and the consonant groups ka, ca, ṭa, ta, and pa, with a correspondence between writing and pronunciation. The short i in Devanagari is an exception: written before a consonant, it is pronounced after it. In Maithili, however, even this exception does not arise in the same way: achhi (अछि) is pronounced with the short i as a–i–chha; compare rāti–rāit (राति–राइत). Consider another example. Sandhi, or euphonic combination, is characteristic of Sanskrit; but does it not occur in English? "I'm going towards the end" is spoken with I'm in place of "I am going towards the end." Pāṇini established rules of sandhi on the basis of phonetics. English spelling does not ordinarily represent every spoken combination in this way, although I'm is written phonetically and the combination is used in speech. In Maithili, too, case endings are, wherever possible, both written and pronounced together with the words to which they belong.

There are two types of metre: quantitative (mātrā chhand) and syllabic (varṇa chhand).

Syllabic metres (varṇa-vṛtta) are used in the Vedas.

The principal Vedic metres are seven:

Gāyatrī, Uṣṇik, Anuṣṭubh, Bṛhatī, Paṅkti, Triṣṭubh and Jagatī. The other forms are varieties of these, designated atichhand and vichhand. Metres are identified here through syllable counts. If the required number of syllables is not attained, one or two may be added to each pāda. Conjuncts with ya or va may be separated by inserting i or u respectively. For example:

Vareṇyam = vareṇiyam.

Svah = suvah.

The vowels resulting from guṇa and vṛddhi may also be separated to complete the syllable count.

E = a + i; o = a + u; ai = a/ā + e; au = a/ā + o.

Consider the guru (heavy) and laghu (light) syllables used in prosody.

Among thirteen vowel letters, a, i, u, ṛ, and ḷ are five short vowels; ā, ī, ū, ṝ, e, ai, o, and au are eight long vowels.

When a vowel is joined to a consonant it produces a vowel-bearing syllabic character, a guṇitākṣar.

Ka is formed from k + a: क् + अ = क.

Kā is formed from k + ā: क् + आ = का.

A single vowel or a single consonant bearing a vowel constitutes one akṣara, or syllable. A bare consonant is not counted as a syllable. Thus avāk (अवाक्) contains two: a and vā.

"There is an exception for mha (म्ह) and nha (न्ह)." But this is not a rule for Maithili. It is a rule found in Hindi, and a few Maithili authors have followed Hindi in writing nahiyo (नहियो). In Maithili the preceding short vowel in combinations such as mha and nha is generally pronounced as long. Ask a child to pronounce chhani (छनि) and chhanhi (छन्हि). The chha of chhani is short, but in chhanhi it is pronounced long. Likewise the ji in jimhar (जिम्हर) is long in verse. A poet may occasionally take such a vowel as short in a particular line, which may be accepted as an exception in that line; but it is unnecessary to admit an exception into the rule merely by imitating Hindi. Those familiar with Maithili singing will understand this still better. Verse is first read and then sung. Thus, in singing "hamar svar" ("our voice"), the final ra of hamar may be lengthened, although it belongs to a different word, because the metrical reckoning proceeds through the line of verse. If the opening letter of the next line is conjunct and the last syllable of the preceding line is short, however, the short syllable will not be lengthened on that account: counting ends at the end of the line.

A long vowel is different from bikārī (ऽ, avagraha in Sanskrit, japhalā in Bengali). Even four such marks do not make a vowel long. Consider the children's song "megh ऽ ऽ ऽ ऽ ऽ ऽ ra": these remain short syllables. At the end of a metrical line a short syllable may, when necessary, be treated as long, and a long syllable as short.

The weight (vazn) of a line (miṣrā) in a ghazal, or of its words, can be established in three ways: by simply counting syllables in a simple syllabic metre; by examining both syllables and the sequence of short and long quantities in vārṇik metre; or by examining the sequence of short and long quantities in mātrik metre. Anyone with even a little knowledge of singing understands that the number of words in one line of a ghazal may differ from that in another, while the metrical weight is the same when measured by any one of these three methods. A free ghazal (āzād ghazal) is without bahr, however, so equal weight in its lines or words does not arise. In ghazals written by these three metrical methods the lines have equal weight. Much depends on the capacities of both poet and singer. For the ghazal writer, the vārṇik system is the most difficult, mātrik somewhat easier, and simple syllable counting easiest. For the singer the order is reversed: vārṇik is easiest, mātrik more difficult, simple syllabic metre harder still, and the free ghazal, without bahr, most difficult of all.

1. Every short vowel and every vowel-bearing character containing a short vowel is laghu, or light. It is marked with U above it.

2. Every long vowel and every vowel-bearing character containing a long vowel is guru, or heavy. Its sign is a short horizontal stroke (—) written above it.

3. Every syllable containing anusvāra or visarga is regarded as guru.

4. A syllable followed by a conjunct consonant or a bare consonant is counted as guru. For example, ac (अच्) and satya (सत्य): both a and sa are heavy.

Just as syllabic metre was used in the Vedas, a developed analysis of accent and pitch also existed in that period. Broadly speaking, it is divided into (1) udātta, (2) udāttatara, (3) anudātta, (4) anudāttatara, (5) svarita, (6) anudāttānurakta-svarita, and (7) pracaya. The last is described as a śruti or unstruck sound (anāhata nāda) arising without the impact of one object against another; the others are struck sounds (āhata nāda) produced through contact.

1. Udātta: a vowel such as a pronounced in the upper part of its place of articulation, such as the throat. It carries no mark.

2. Udāttatara: pronounced from a still higher position of the throat or other place of articulation.

3. Anudātta: pronounced from the lower part of the throat or corresponding place of articulation. An oblique sign is placed below it.

4. Anudāttatara: pronounced from a position very much lower in the throat or other place of articulation.

5. Svarita: a sound containing anudātta in part and udātta in part; a vertical stroke is written above it.

6. Anudāttānurakta-svarita: a form in which udātta, svarita, or both follow. It is of three kinds.

7. Pracaya: where anudātta follows svarita, the unstruck sound and the extension or tān of pracaya arise.

1. The Pūrvārcika contains, in sequence, hymns addressed to Agni, Indra, and Soma Pavamāna. There follow the Āraṇyaka section and the Mahānāmnī Ārcika. The Āgneya, Aindra, and Pāvamāna sections are also called grāmageya-gāna, while the remainder of the Pūrvārcika is known as āraṇyaka-gāna. Together these are termed prakṛti-gāna.

2. The Uttarārcika is also called vikṛti or uttara-gāna. Mantras selected from grāmageya-gāna and āraṇyaka-gāna form, respectively, the ūha-gāna and ūhya-gāna. Each form of singing is divided into sections named daśarātra, saṃvatsara, ekāha, ahīna, prāyaścitta, and kṣudra. Remembering the melodic patterns of the Pūrvārcika mantras, these patterns are used in the Uttarārcika for groups of two, three, or four mantras, called dvika, trika, and catuṣṭaka. In most such groups the first mantra derives from the Pūrvārcika, and the entire hymn is sung to its melodic pattern.

In the Uttarārcika, the ūha and ūhya performances each recite a melodic pattern three times in three ways. In Vedic ritual, the prastāva is sung by the prastotṛ; the udgītha by the udgātṛ; the pratihāra by the pratihartṛ; the upadrava again by the udgātṛ; and the nidhana by all three together. Before the prastāva, all three chant the hiṅkāra ("hiṃ, huṃ, haṃ"), and before the udgītha the udgātṛ chants oṃ. These constitute the five bhaktis or sections.

Hand gestures: (1) 1—the thumb, counted as the first finger, one barley-grain's width away; (2) 2—the thumb touching the first finger; (3) 3—the thumb touching the middle finger; (4) 4—the thumb touching the fourth finger; (5) 5—the thumb touching the fifth finger; (6) 11—the sixth, kruṣṭa, with the thumb two barley-grains away from the first finger; (7) 6—the seventh, atisvara, in the Sāmaveda; (8) 7—abhigīta, in the Ṛgveda.

Grāmageya-gāna was sung in villages and public places.

Āraṇyaka-geya-gāna was sung in forests and sacred places.

Ūha-gāna was sung at Soma sacrifices and particular religious occasions, using this method in the grāmageya-gāna associated with the Pūrvārcika. Ūhya-gāna, or esoteric song, is sung in forests and sacred places and is related to the Āraṇyaka singing of the Pūrvārcika. The Nāradīya Śikṣā specifies for sāma-gāna: seven notes, three grāmas, twenty-one mūrchanās, and forty-nine tāns.

The seven notes are sa, re, ga, ma, pa, dha, and ni; the three grāmas are middle, low and high. Seven times three gives twenty-one mūrchanās; seven notes combined with seven notes yield forty-nine tāns.

Each Ṛgvedic mantra becomes equivalent to three through two Sāman chants (parka) attributed to Gautama and one to Kāśyapa. Macdonell regards Indrāgnī, Mitrāvaruṇau, Indrāviṣṇū, and Agnīṣomau as pairs of deities; but the paired deity is here treated as a matter of reversal of qualifying terms.

Methods of Vedic Recitation

1. Saṃhitā-pāṭha: recitation in the continuous, original form.

"Agnim īḷe purohitaṃ yajñasya devam ṛtvijam, hotāraṃ ratnadhātamam" (अग्निमीळे पुरोहितं यज्ञस्य देवमृत्विजम। होतारंरत्न धातमम्।).

2. Pada-pāṭha: reading each word separately.

3. Krama-pāṭha: reading the first and second words, then the second and third, then the third and fourth, and so on.

4. Jaṭā-pāṭha: if the three words are A, B and C, the sequence is AB, BA, AB, BC, CB, BC. 5. Ghana-pāṭha: using the same example, AB, BA, ABC, CBA, ABC. Further forms are 6. Mālā, 7. Śikhā, 8. Rekhā, 9. Dhvaja, 10. Daṇḍa, and 11. Ratha. The last eight are called the aṣṭavikṛtis.

There are also six sāma-vikāras, through which material may be shortened or lengthened for singing: (1) vikāra, changing agne to ognāya; (2) viśleṣaṇa, separating a word or phrase; (3) vikarṣaṇa, stretching a vowel or giving it additional duration; (4) abhyāsa, repeating an expression; (5) virāma, breaking a word by introducing a pause (yati) in its middle; and (6) stobha, inserting a vocable suitable for melodic elaboration. The Kauthuma school adds "hāu" and "rāi"; the Rāṇāyanīya school adds "hāvu" and "rāyi".

The Vedas do not use mātrik metres; they employ varṇa-vṛtta, counted by pāda or quarter-line. The principal metre is Gāyatrī, most frequently used in the Vedas, followed by Triṣṭubh and Jagatī.

1. Gāyatrī: three pādas of eight syllables each, with a pause after the second; alternatively, six syllables in each of four divisions.

2. Triṣṭubh: four pādas of eleven syllables each.

3. Jagatī: four pādas of twelve syllables each.

4. Uṣṇik: two pādas of eight syllables each, followed by one of twelve.

5. Anuṣṭubh: four pādas of eight syllables each; it is more common in Sanskrit literature than in the Vedas.

6. Bṛhatī: two pādas of eight, followed by two of twelve and eight units respectively, described here as mātrās.

7. Paṅkti: five pādas of eight syllables, with a pause after the first two.

If the count is deficient, one or two syllables may be added or omitted in the following ways.

(a) Vareṇyam becomes vareṇiyam; svah becomes suvah.

(b) The combinations formed by guṇa and vṛddhi sandhi may be separated.

E = a + i.

O = a + u.

Ai = a/ā + e.

Au = a/ā + o.

If the requisite number is still not attained, the resulting varieties receive names such as virāṭ.

Thus, for Gāyatrī (24 syllables): Virāṭ (22), Nicṛt (23), Śuddhā (24), Bhurik (25), and Svarāṭ (26).

"Oṃ bhūr bhuvaḥ svaḥ. Tat savitur vareṇyaṃ. Bhargo devasya dhīmahi. Dhiyo yo naḥ pracodayāt." (ॐ भूर्भुवस्वः। तत् सवितुर्वरेण्यं। भर्गो देवस्य धीमहि। धियो यो नः प्रचोदयात्।)

Vedic seers call both themselves and the gods poets. The whole body of Vedic literature is the verbal embodiment of this poetic consciousness. In it, spiritual consciousness rises into the realm of divinity and takes form in language pertaining to the material world. Even in that period, however, a group recitation of hymns could be likened to the croaking of frogs—as in the Atharvaveda—suggesting an acceptance of dissenting voices in song.

Except for Devanagari, the scripts of northern Indian languages, those of Nepal, and those of southern languages apart from Tamil all use, in alphabetic form, the vowels and the consonant groups ka, ca, ṭa, ta, and pa, together with ya, ra, la, va, śa, sa, and ha. Sanskrit also has a special character for a sound here represented as gvaṅ (ग्वाङ): it is not pronounced in the Chāndogya tradition, but occurs prominently in Vājasaneyī pronunciation; compare the forms "sabhūmi" and "sabhūmīgvaṅ" in the passage. It can be short or long. Mithilakshar likewise employs at least six distinct letters for siddhir astu. Vedic Sanskrit uses udātta, anudātta, and svarita marks (क॑, क॒, क॓), while Marathi also uses ळ and the half-र sign.

Maithili uses ऽ, bikārī or avagraha, as Sanskrit does. Today typographical convenience sometimes produces द' in place of दऽ; this is evidence of a technical deficiency in the font. After the long ā vowel sign there is no need for bikārī.

Just as the Persian alphabet is called alif, be, se and the Roman alphabet A, B, C, the overall structure of the alphabet is much the same across Indian languages despite differences in script.

The alphabet comprises two kinds of sound, vowels and consonants. There are sixty-four letters: twenty-two vowels and forty-two consonants.

Consider the vowels first. A vowel is a sound whose pronunciation does not depend on the pronunciation of any other letter.

Vowels are of three kinds: hrasva (short), dīrgha (long), and pluta (prolonged). A short vowel occupies one unit of time, a long vowel two, and a prolonged vowel three.

The basic vowels are a, i, u, ṛ, and ḷ.

Grammarians before Pāṇini called them samānākṣara.

The long compound vowels are e, ai, o, and au.

Grammarians before Pāṇini called these sandhyakṣara.

Ḷ has no long form, and the compound vowels have no short forms.

The short, long (ā, ī, ū, ṝ), and prolonged (ā3, ī3, ū3, ṝ3) forms of a, i, u, and ṛ together produce twelve vowels. The short and prolonged forms of ḷ (the latter shown as ऌ३) add two. The four long compound vowels e, ai, o, and au also have prolonged forms (e3, ai3, o3, au3), adding eight: twenty-two vowels altogether.

All twenty-two have three forms of Vedic accent: udātta, anudātta, and svarita.

A vowel such as a articulated from a higher place, for instance the palate, has the property of udātta and is so called. One articulated from a lower position is anudātta. When the first part of a vowel is pronounced with udātta and the second with anudātta, it is svarita.

Vowels are further divided into nasalised (sānunāsik, as in अँ) and non-nasalised (niranunāsik, as in अ).

"Dattena nirvṛttaḥ kūpo dāttaḥ": a well built by a man named Datta on the northern bank of the Vipāṭ–Vyās is called dātta. Because it takes the affix añ, dātta has initial udātta accent; had it taken the affix aṇ, the accent would have been on the ending by virtue of the affix. The form is the same, but the accent differs. This establishes that ordinary members of the agricultural community too pronounced words with distinctions of accent.

Svarita may also be understood in another way, as a repetition of the final vowel at a higher pitch.

Turn now to consonants.

There are forty-two consonants.

क् ख् ग् घ् ङ् — k, kh, g, gh, ṅ.

च् छ् ज् झ् ञ् — c, ch, j, jh, ñ.

ट् ठ् ड् ढ् ण् — ṭ, ṭh, ḍ, ḍh, ṇ.

त् थ् द् ध् न् — t, th, d, dh, n.

प् फ् ब् भ् म् — p, ph, b, bh, m.

य् र् ल् व् — y, r, l, v.

श् ष् स् — ś, ṣ, s.

ह् — h.

Ya, va, and la can also be nasalised (यँ, वँ, लँ), as distinct from their non-nasalised forms.

Besides these, there are two further consonantal signs: anusvāra and visarjanīya, or visarga.

Both occur after vowels.

The visarjanīya is not an original letter but an alteration of s or r. It has two varieties, distinguished in sound and form: jihvāmūlīya and upadhmānīya. The former occurs only before ka and kha, the latter only before pa and pha.

Anusvāra, visarjanīya, jihvāmūlīya, and upadhmānīya are called ayogavāha.

In addition to these, there are four more sounds called yama.

कुँ खुँ गुँ घुँ (kuṃ, khuṃ, guṃ, ghuṃ), as in the examples पलिक् क्नी, चख ख्नुतः, अग् ग्निः, घ् घ्नन्ति.

A yama is the intermediate sound resembling an earlier consonant when the fifth consonant of a group follows it.

The yamas, too, are ayogavāha.

A, ā, the ka group, ha (when not conjunct), and visarjanīya are articulated in the throat.

I, ī, the ca group, ya, and śa are articulated at the palate.

Ṛ, ṝ, the ṭa group, ra, and ṣa are articulated with the tongue raised towards the roof of the mouth.

Ḷ, the ta group, la, and sa are articulated at the teeth.

U, ū, the pa group, and upadhmānīya are articulated at the lips.

Va is articulated with the lower lip assisted by the upper teeth.

E and ai are articulated at the throat and palate.

O and au are articulated at the throat and lips.

In pronouncing ya, ra, la, and va, the front and other parts of the tongue do not make complete contact with the palate or corresponding point, as with other consonants. Nor is there the friction at these points found in śa, ṣa, sa, and ha.

The letters from ka through ma are stops, or plosives, because the tongue temporarily interrupts and then releases the airflow. The consonants from ra to va are approximants (antaḥstha), and those from ṣa to ha are fricatives.

The fifth letter of every consonant group is nasal, because, while its other places of articulation remain similar, it is also articulated through the nose: the outgoing air passes through both mouth and nostrils.

Anusvāra and yama are articulated only nasally and are therefore called nāsikya: the mouth passage is closed and air escapes through the nose. Anusvāra should not be pronounced as n or m.

When we wish to speak, intention stimulates the digestive fire (jaṭharāgni). Air near the navel rises forcefully towards the head; after its flow is checked by the front or another part of the tongue and it rubs against the palate or other part of the mouth, speech sounds are generated. Vibration makes the air resonant (nādavān). If the sound reaches the mouth resonating, it is voiced (ghoṣavān); if it reaches the breath without resonance, it is unvoiced (aghoṣavān).

Sounds of the nature of breath are aghoṣa (unvoiced), while those of the nature of resonance are ghoṣavān (voiced). Sounds produced with relatively little breath are alpaprāṇa (unaspirated), and those requiring a greater release of breath are mahāprāṇa (aspirated).

In each of the ka, ca, ṭa, ta, and pa groups, the first, third, and fifth consonants are alpaprāṇa, while the second and fourth are mahāprāṇa. In those groups the first two consonants are unvoiced, and the third, fourth and fifth are voiced. Ya, ra, la, and va are unaspirated and voiced; śa, ṣa, and sa are aspirated and unvoiced; ha is aspirated and voiced. Vowels are unaspirated and can bear udātta, anudātta, or svarita accent.

Now let us write the Maithili ghazal. There are arguments in favour of poetry, anti-poetry, prose poetry and verse alike. The Maithili ghazal, therefore, must necessarily be composed in a bahr (metre), whether in simple syllabic, syllabic or quantitative metre. Just as there are the soraṭhā and the caupāī, so there is the ghazal. In Urdu an attempt was made at an unmetrical, free ghazal under the name āzād ghazal. Needless to say, it did not gain acceptance. Since AD 539, metrical ghazals have been written in Arabic, and they continue to be written today. Persian and Urdu ghazals, too, are not composed without metre. A ghazal can even make fun of God; in that respect it is liberal. But when it comes to metre it is highly uncompromising. This rigour has not diminished the ghazal in Arabic, Urdu or Persian. Correspondence of quantity and an easy flow are customary features of the ghazal and constitute its distinguishing character; otherwise it would become a nazm.

A Course in Language Editing in Maithili

2.1. Instructions on Pronunciation (the bold forms are acceptable)

In articulating the dental न (na), the tongue touches the teeth, as in नाम (nām); in articulating ण (ṇa), it touches the roof of the mouth, as in गणेश (Gaṇeś). Failure to make this contact constitutes a fault of pronunciation. In palatal श (śa) the tongue meets the palate; for ष (ṣa) it meets the roof of the mouth, and for dental स (sa) it meets the teeth. Say निशाँ, सभ and शोषण and observe the difference. In Maithili, ष is also pronounced like ख (kha), as in Vedic Sanskrit: for example, in वर्षा and दोष. At many points य is pronounced like ज, and ण like ड़: thus संयोग and गणेश may be pronounced संजोग and गड़ेस. In Maithili, व may likewise be pronounced ब, श as स, and य as ज.

Likewise, the short इ is often articulated before the consonant in Maithili, for it is written before the consonant both in Devanagari and in Mithilākṣara and, according to this rule, should be pronounced before it as well. The defective pronunciation found in Hindi, where the sign is written first but sounded later, has, through defects of education, led us to pronounce it incorrectly.

अछि — अइछ /ऐछ (pronunciation).

छथि — छइथ /छैथ (pronunciation).

पहुँचि — पहुँइच (pronunciation).

There are vowel signs for अ, आ, इ, ई, ए, ऐ, ओ, औ, अं, अः and ऋ. Yet ई, ऐ, ओ, औ, अं, अः and ऋ are often wrongly employed and pronounced as though they were conjunct letters: for instance, ऋ is pronounced rī. Similarly, using देखिऔ for देखियौ is inappropriate; conversely, देखियै is inappropriate for देखिऐ. When अ is added to the consonants from क् through ह्, the forms क through ह result. A tendency has nevertheless grown to pronounce a final consonant with a halant. Thus, when I pronounce the final ज् in मनोज, I can still hear older speakers pronounce मनोजऽ; in fact they are sounding ज with its inherent अ.

The conjunct ज्ञ comprises ज् and ञ, but is incorrectly pronounced gya. Likewise, क्ष comprises क् and ष but is pronounced cha. श्र, as in श्रमिक, is the conjunct श् + र; स्र, as in मिस्र, is स् + र. त्र is त् + र.

Audio recordings of pronunciation are available in the Videha archive at http://www.videha.co.in/. Write कैँ, सँ and पर attached to the preceding word, but write तँ and कऽ separately. When two instances of सँ occur in a construction, attach the first and separate the second. Attach टा to a numeral, but separate it elsewhere: thus छहटा, but सभ टा. For the ordinal spellings, the source gives the contrast "६अमसातम" /"छठमसातम" and rejects the second form. Use बला in घरबला, but वाली in घरवाली.

रहए — रहै; but सकैए (pronounced सकै-ए).

Sometimes, however, रहए and रहै also differ in meaning, as in: "से कम्मो जगहमे पार्किंग करबाक अभ्यास रहै ओकरा।" On inquiry it emerged that the driver, named Dhundhun, worked at the parking facility in Connaught Place: "पुछलापर पता लागल जे ढुनढुन नाम्ना ई ड्राइवर कनाट प्लेसक पार्किंगमे काज करैत रहए।"

The distinction is similar in छलै and छलए. The latter may also be pronounced छल-ए.

संयोगने — pronounced संजोगने.

कैं /कऽ.

केर /क: do not use केर in prose; it may be used in verse.

क, as in रामक: रामक, also pronounced राम के or राम कऽ.

सँ — pronounced सऽ.

Candrabindu and anusvāra: in the latter, articulation extends to the throat; this is not so with candrabindu, which can also carry a slight e-like sound. Thus रामसँ may be pronounced राम सऽ, and रामकैं as राम कऽ or राम के.

कैं, as in रामकैं, corresponds to Hindi को (राम को): राम को = रामकैं.

क, as in रामक, corresponds to Hindi का (राम का): राम का = रामक.

कऽ, as in जा कऽ, corresponds to Hindi कर (जा कर): जा कर = जा कऽ.

सँ corresponds to Hindi से (राम से): राम से = रामसँ.

The use of these four forms is undesirable: सऽ, तऽ, त and केर (in prose).

के can be used in another sense, as in के कहलक? ("Who said it?"). Its use in place of the case ending क is undesirable.

नञि, नहि, नै, नइ, नँइ, नइँ and नइं: the form given here for pronunciation and writing is नै.

Use त्व instead of त्त्व, as in महत्वपूर्ण rather than महत्त्वपूर्ण. A conjunct of three letters is appropriate only where the meaning would otherwise change. Write सम्पति, pronounced स-म्-प-इ-त, rather than सम्पत्ति, because accurate pronunciation of the latter is not easy. But write सर्वोत्तम, not सर्वोतम.

राष्ट्रिय (not राष्ट्रीय); सकैए /सकै (difference in meaning); पोछैले /पोछैलेल / पोछएलेल.

पोछैए /पोछए (difference in meaning); पोछए /पोछैओ लोकनि (written separately, without an added bikārī sign).

ओइ /ओहि; ओहिले /ओहिलेल /ओही लऽ; जएबेँ /बैसबेँ; पँचभइयाँ.

देखियौक (not देखिऔक); similarly, the inappropriate deployment of short and long vowel signs in this context.

जकाँ /जेकाँ; तँइ /तैँ; होएत /हएत; नञि /नहि /नँइ /नइँ /नै.

सौँसे /सौंसे; बड़ /बड़ी (झोराओल); गाए (not गाइ), but गाइक दूध (not गाएक दूध).

रहलेँ /पहिरतैँ; हमहीं /अहीं; सब /सभ; सबहक /सभहक.

धरि — तक ("up to"); गप — बात ("talk"); बूझब — समझब ("to understand"); बुझलौं /समझलौं /बुझलहुँ /समझलहुँ.

हमरा आर — हम सभ; आकि /आकि; सकैछ /करैछ (unnecessary in prose).

होइन /होनि; जाइन् (not जानि, as in देल जाइन्), but जानि-बूझि, where the meaning is different.

पइठ /जाइठ; आउ /जाउ /आऊ /जाऊ.

Write मे, कैँ, सँ and पर attached to the preceding word; write तँ, कऽ, धऽ and दऽ separately. When two or more case endings occur together, attach only the first, as in ऐमेसँ.

एकटा, दूटा; but कएटा.

Use bikārī at the end of a word, not unnecessarily in its middle. Do not place it after a final आ or अ, as in the examples दिअ and आ /दिय', आ', आनै.

Substituting an apostrophe for bikārī is incorrect and merely reveals a technical limitation of the font. The corresponding Sanskrit sign, ऽ, is called avagraha, and in spelling or pronunciation it can disappear (it does disappear in pronunciation). In English, however, the apostrophe also marks the possessive case; in French it occurs within words, as in raison d'être, pronounced "raison d'être." An apostrophe does not create a gap: it joins. For this reason also, its use instead of bikārī is technically inappropriate.

अइमे /एहिमे /ऐमे; जइमे /जाहिमे; एखन /अखन /अइखन; कैँ (not के); मे (without anusvāra).

भऽ; मे; दऽ; तँ (not तऽ or त); सँ (not सऽ or स); गाछतर; गाछलग; साँझखन.

जो (as in जो, "go," and करै जो, "do"); तै /तइ, as in तै दुआरे /तइमे /तइले.

जै /जइ, as in जै कारण /जइसँ /जइले.

ऐ /अइ, as in ऐ कारण /ऐसँ /अइले; but note the special use in "लालति कतेक दिनसँ कहैत रहैत अइ."

लै /लइ, as in लैसँ /लइले /लै दुआरे; लहँ /लौं.

गेलौं /लेलौं /लेलँह /गेलहुँ /लेलहुँ /लेलँ; जइ /जाहि /जै.

जहि ठाम /जाहि ठाम /जइ ठाम /जै ठाम; एहि /अहि.

अइ (acceptable at the end of a sentence) /ऐ; अइछ /अछि /ऐछ.

तइ /तहि /तै /ताहि; ओहि /ओइ; सीखि /सीख; जीवि /जीवी /जीब.

भलेहीं /भलहिं; तैं /तँइ /तँए; जाएब /जएब; लइ /लै; छइ /छै.

नहि /नै /नइ; गइ /गै; छनि /छन्हि …

When a case ending is attached to समए, the form becomes समै, as in समै पर. When standing alone, the form is हृदए; with a case ending, it becomes हृदे, as in हृदे सँ and हृदेमे.

जइ /जाहि /जै; जहि ठाम /जाहि ठाम /जइ ठाम /जै ठाम.

एहि /अहि /अइ /ऐ; अइछ /अछि /ऐछ; तइ /तहि /तै /ताहि.

ओहि /ओइ; सीखि /सीख; जीवि /जीवी /जीब; भले /भलेहीं /भलहिं.

तैं /तँइ /तँए; जाएब /जएब; लइ /लै; छइ /छै.

नहि /नै /नइ; गइ /गै; छनि /छन्हि; चुकल अछि /गेलगछि.

Writing a Maithili Ghazal

Roughly five to ten sher (couplets) will constitute a ghazal. But merely placing five or seven couplets one after another does not make a ghazal.

A few points must be borne in mind.

Just as the beginning and end of a line appear aligned when a Word document is justified, so, if the beginnings and ends of both lines of each couplet, and of all the couplets in a ghazal, correspond without any artificial justification, the lines may be said to belong to a single bahr. A series of such couplets may rightfully form part of a ghazal. In the Maithili context, this means employing the method of counting syllables in a syllabic metre:

A letter carrying a halant counts as zero; a conjunct letter counts as one; and each letter from अ to ह counts as one. On this basis, instead of the nineteen bahrs, one may use short, medium and long lines; there is no need to name them. Further, at the end of both lines of the first couplet, and at the end of the second line of every subsequent couplet, a word or group of words must recur as the radīf. Ghazals without a radīf are also possible; one may write a ghazal on a single theme, without a matlā or without a maqta (some people even begin with the maqta). These, however, are exceptions; and exceptions remain incomplete. There may be more than one matlā. Critics can disagree about which couplet is the ḥusn-e-ghazal, the finest couplet. The qāfiya normally occurs in every couplet, before the radīf. The rhyming word changes, though it can occasionally be repeated. Close attention nevertheless reveals that, for rhyme to operate, some letters at the beginning, middle or end of those words remain unchanged. In other words, rhythm is essential.

Now let us hear some ghazals.

I

Everybody's talk was murmuring, brooding over me. (23 syllabic units; radīf: गुम्हराइत, "brooding"; qāfiya phrase: हमरा पर, "over me.") [Maithili: सब सबाइत गप्प छल तकैत हमरा पर गुम्हराइत]

It came, still half-asleep, and brooded over that very person. (23 syllabic units; radīf: गुम्हराइत; qāfiya phrase: ओकरा पर.) [Maithili: आबैत छल एखौंझाइत आ सेहो ओकरे पर गुम्हराइत]

Yes, O charioteer, will it come to pass, or will the spirit remain broken and subdued? (23 syllabic units.) [Maithili: हएत हँ सारथि की रहि जाएत चुकड़िऔने ओ मोन मारि]

With face turned away, it will not speak, yet will remain brooding in the mind. (23 syllabic units; radīf: गुम्हराइत; qāfiya phrase: मोन पर.) [Maithili: बाजत नै मुँह फुलौने, रहत मुदा मोन पर गुम्हराइत]

It said just this: inwardly that person is pleased, though the mind plays its tricks. (23 syllabic units.) [Maithili: ईह कहलकै जे, मोने-मोन प्रसन्न अछि ओ मारने गबदी]

"We know it all," they say; an unfamiliar seeming keeps brooding. (23 syllabic units; radīf: गुम्हराइत; qāfiya phrase: नियारे-भास पर.) [Maithili: बुझैए सभ हमहीं बुझै छी, नियारे-भास पर गुम्हराइत]

I shall settle all accounts with you and with your father too. (23 syllabic units.) [Maithili: माने तोहूँ आ तोहर बापो हमर सार सम्बन्ध फरिछा देबौ]

What chatterers they are! Faces turned aside, they brood upon the raised platform. (23 syllabic units; radīf: गुम्हराइत; qāfiya phrase: मचान पर.) [Maithili: गप्पी छथि! मुँह घुमेने देखैए कोना मचान पर गुम्हराइत]

It is not that I fail to understand; I understand it all, but perhaps the heart speaks otherwise. (23 syllabic units.) [Maithili: बुझै सभटा छी से नै जे नै बुझै छी मुदा मोना कहैए साइत]

In the wind it mutters, as though brooding over its very self. (23 syllabic units; radīf: गुम्हराइत; qāfiya phrase: स्वयम् पर.) [Maithili: बड़बड़ाइए बाइमे, माने अछि ओ स्वयम् पर गुम्हराइत]

"Airāvat," I have come to understand: this is the first night of creation. (23 syllabic units.) [Maithili: "ऐरावत"बुझैत बुझि गेल छी ई जे सृष्टिक पहिलुके राति]

All the characters watched, brooding over one another. (23 syllabic units; radīf: गुम्हराइत; qāfiya phrase: एक-दोसरा पर.) [Maithili: सभ चरित्र रहल देखैत, एक-दोसरा पर गुम्हराइत]

Let us now turn to some more difficult questions concerning the Maithili ghazal.

These questions involve difficulty, some variety and, in the Maithili context, a certain novelty; yet they are not altogether so difficult.

As already stated, Vedic and Maithili metres are counted by syllables; the distinction between guru and laghu does not arise there. Maithil Brahmins and Karna Kayasthas have been influenced by Classical Sanskrit and Hindi. The vocabulary of communities other than Maithil Brahmins and Karna Kayasthas, however, contains many words found in Vedic Sanskrit but not in Classical Sanskrit; in the author's view, their Maithili is therefore less adulterated and more authentic. Hence the need to count metre by syllables becomes still greater.

Gāyatrī: 24 syllables; Uṣṇih: 28 syllables; Anuṣṭubh: 32 syllables.

Bṛhatī: 36 syllables; Paṅkti: 40 syllables; Triṣṭubh: 44 syllables.

Jagatī: 48 syllables.

In the Ṛgveda, to which the Śūdra poet Ailuṣa and others contributed, the metres Gāyatrī, Triṣṭubh and Jagatī occur most frequently. Let us therefore consider these three.

Gāyatrī. This occurs in four forms: two-footed, three-footed, four-footed and five-footed. In the four-footed form there are eight syllables to each foot. One can place a semicolon after one foot and a full stop after two, thereby making a Gāyatrī couplet. Let me clarify here that Gāyatrī is a metre, not a mantra. What is commonly called the Gāyatrī Mantra is the Sāvitrī mantra composed in Gāyatrī metre, and that too only if स्व is pronounced सुवः and वरेण्यम् as वरेणियम्.

Triṣṭubh. Four feet, with eleven syllables per foot. A semicolon may follow one foot and a full stop two feet, thus making a Triṣṭubh couplet.

Jagatī. Four feet, each of twelve syllables. A semicolon may follow one foot and a full stop two feet, thereby making a Jagatī couplet.

As mentioned earlier, Gāyatrī can contain one or two syllables fewer or more: from twenty-two to twenty-six syllables. Its varieties are Virāḍ Gāyatrī (22), Nicṛd Gāyatrī (23), Bhurig Gāyatrī (25) and Svarāḍ Gāyatrī (26). Thus there is scope for variation within the rules; the Maithili ghazal has not become metrically lawless. A full stop may, or may not, be placed at the end of a line of a ghazal.

I do not understand what Hindutva-isation would mean in relation to Persian poetics; nor do I understand how Hindutva could be introduced into the creation of an original ghazal. Poetry would be better kept away from the categories "Hindu" and "infidel." I have no objection, however, to the term "Maithili ghazal"; if someone calls that Hindutva-isation, the blame is not mine.

More poets and theorists of poetry have existed in Arabic and Persian than, taken together, in the rest of the world.

If I write a ghazal in Maithili, I shall write it according to prosody, and may employ Arabic-Persian prosody. But, besides that possibility, I believe the prosody of the Ṛgveda is more scientific and straightforward than the elaborate ta-gaṇa and ma-gaṇa calculations, and that it will make writing, reading and humming Maithili ghazals easier. The word "Hindu" had not even come into existence in the Vedic age; I therefore do not believe that using Vedic metre alone makes a Maithili ghazal Hindu.

When I wrote A Theory of Maithili Haiku, I also had to choose between syllabic and quantitative metre, and I chose syllabic counting. If we were to use the scripts and prosody of Japanese people following Shinto (and some Buddhists), Maithili haiku could never be written, because Japanese prosody is relative to the Japanese language and its several writing systems; religion had also entered it, as in the invocation of God in tanka/waka. The Arabic-Persian ghazal, by contrast, is secular; but its prosody is constructed for its own languages and scripts. Neither Japanese nor Arabic-Persian poetics can therefore be language-neutral.

And now let us compose ghazals.

A Gāyatrī Ghazal

Listen, see what has been done; who is this to whom? [Maithili: छै सुनि देखि कएल, छैक करासँ ककर]

What talk has been endured; who is this to whom? [Maithili: कोन गपक सहल, छैक करासँ ककर]

See what has been borne; what pain has risen? [Maithili: हे अछि देखि सहल, अछि की टीस उठल]

O, the known one was recognised; who is this to whom? [Maithili: रे चिन्हलकेँ चीन्हल, छैक करासँ ककर]

These all are companions of truth; all have changed their guise. [Maithili: ई सभ सत्यक संगी, सभ छै भेष बदलि]

Who has turned their face away; who is this to whom? [Maithili: के अछि मुँह फेरल, छैक करासँ ककर]

Look at this fleeting flash of light, like a moth. [Maithili: हे बिजुलौका देखियौ, छै उका पतङ्ग जेकाँ]

What has stunned the head; who is this to whom? [Maithili: की माथ सुन्न कएल, छैक करासँ ककर]

Fiery Maithili—will its current dry up? [Maithili: अगिनवान मैथिली, की सुखि जाएत धार]

What was said, and when; who is this to whom? [Maithili: कहैकिदनिकहल, छैक करासँ ककर]

What compromise should we make, what settlement? [Maithili: करू कोन समझौता, करू कोन निपटारा]

Who is issuing the challenge; who is this to whom? [Maithili: के ललकारि रहल, छैक करासँ ककर]

Who is raising whom, and who is bringing whom down? [Maithili: के अछि उठा रहल, अछि के झुका रहल]

Who is speaking; who is this to whom? [Maithili: के अछि बाजि रहल, छैक करासँ ककर]

Airāvat is astonished; what is he thinking? [Maithili: ऐरावत छै चकित, अछि की सोचि रहल]

This helmsman who has survived—who is this to whom? [Maithili: ई कर्णधार बँचल, छैक करासँ ककर]

A Triṣṭubh Ghazal

Look, standing beside the thief, watching the ḍaklilāmī. [Maithili: अछि चोरबा संग देखू ठाढ़, देखैत रहलि डकलिलामी]

It will no longer be endured: the calling and clamour of ḍaklilāmī. [Maithili: नहि होएत आब बरदास्त, डाक-डकौअलि डकलिलामी]

It was slipping away; will any food be found again? [Maithili: ई सुरकि रहल छल आब, नै भेटत आब फेर की खाद्य]

How did this disorder arise? The path survived, ḍaklilāmī. [Maithili: अछि कोना भेल ई असम्हार, डघर बचलि डकलिलामी]

How these restless people flutter—what is this of the road grown still? [Maithili: कोना तड़फड़िया सभ अछि, डगहर थस लेने की बात]

The father has found no peace; the river-mouth brings ḍaklilāmī. [Maithili: नञि निचेन भेल अछि बाप, ओ मुहानी आनि डकलिलामी]

Will this again become clear? What is this commotion now? [Maithili: औ बुझारति होएत फेरसँ, भेल की ई ढिंढम दरा आब]

The ḍhābu stands, with its sabeṅg; whose move is this, ḍaklilāmī? [Maithili: ई ढाबु सबेंगक अछि ठाढ़, ई ककर चालि डकलिलामी]

Calling out to the buffalo, calling again, he stands as if deaf. [Maithili: पुक्की पाड़िके रहल पुकारि, बहीर बनि भने अछि ठाढ़]

He will hear no one's plea: striking with the hammer, ḍaklilāmī. [Maithili: नहि ककरो सुनब पुकार, ई हथौड़ा मारि डकलिलामी]

Tell me, why do you still stand? The sound of Airāvat's snorting! [Maithili: कहू यौ किएक छीहू सठाढ़, ऐरावतक फोंफक अबाज]

Why stand mute, entranced by a taste of ḍaklilāmī? [Maithili: नहि किए बनल बौक ठाढ़, चिपैले सुआदि डकलिलामी]

A Jagatī Ghazal

This village made by God—when day breaks, bakaṭeṇṭ. [Maithili: भगवानक बनाओल ई गाम, जखन अछि हो भोर बकटेंट]

Otherwise, where will there be any respite; what has happened now, bakaṭeṇṭ? [Maithili: नहि तँ भेटत की कोनो विराम, अछि भेल कोना भेर बकटेंट]

Will there be no deliverance now? I have heard the same from those seeking refuge. [Maithili: औ की नहि भेटत आब हु त्राण, छी सुनल सएह सरनरिया]

How the mṛdaṅga player struck his drum: this lion-like mirahannī, bakaṭeṇṭ. [Maithili: कोना मिरदङिया देलक थाप, ई मिरहन्नी शेर बकटेंट]

Going and regretting, still regretting, finding no way ahead. [Maithili: जाए रहल पछताए रहल, नहि बाट कोनो सुझाए रहल]

This boy endures the golhatthī blows; pañcāgī bihaṭār bakaṭeṇṭ. [Maithili: अछि गोलहत्थी खाइत ई छौड़ा, पँचागिईबिहटारबकटेंट]

The fierce sun sinks, face turned down; the evening settles after its play. [Maithili: मोचण्ड बूड़ि रौद मुँहा होइत, साँझ कलक धक बैसि रहल]

Dust-covered, at every turn, they bring ganaur bakaṭeṇṭ. [Maithili: धमधूसर सभ बेर लगौरी, आनि रहल गनौर बकटेंट]

Strike, O gadāre, guiṃ-guiṃ; strike, O gadāre, puiṃ-puiṃ: the fist falls. [Maithili: गदारे गुइँ गुइँ मार गदारे, गदारे पुइँ पुइँ, मुक्का मारल]

A whole crowd of divers has set out: gatā saṅga pathār bakaṭeṇṭ. [Maithili: गताखोरक छै ई हेँज चलल, गतातसंगपथारबकटेंट]

Illness could no longer be warded off; to uncover all is to lose colour. [Maithili: बेराम पड़ब नै आउ सकल, बेपर्द करब बेदरंग भेल]

Airāvat, recognise the traders; trade in language, bakaṭeṇṭ. [Maithili: ऐरावत चीन्हि बेपारी सभकेँ, करू भाषाक व्यापार बकटेंट]

In Maithili and Sanskrit, end rhyme does not by itself create rhythm; yet it also contributes to rhythm.

From the standpoint of rhyme, certain letters at the beginning, middle and end of the words remain unchanged.

In Ved-e-Muqaddas, Ali Sardar Jafri writes of the Vedas: "Shuūr-e-insāñ ke āftāb-e-ázīm kī avvalīñ shuāéñ"—the first rays of the great sun of human consciousness.

Just as movements have arisen to exclude Sanskrit words from Tamil and Arabic words from Turkish, so in Persian there has been a movement to reject Arabic words and replace them with words of the Indo-Aryan linguistic family (compare the affinities between the ancient Persian Avesta and Vedic Sanskrit). In Maithili, too, excessive use of Hindi and Urdu vocabulary presents something like a crisis for the language's existence, particularly after the Mithilākṣara script was, in the author's expression, consigned to the funeral pyre by the Maithil Brahmin community.

Now let us turn to the Urdu ghazal. In 1893 Hali wrote Muqaddama-e-Sher-o-Shāírī as the introduction to his collection of poems. By then, the themes and form of the Urdu ghazal were almost moribund. Hali not only called for a change in subject matter, but advocated simpler forms of qāfiya and radīf. He wrote that nowadays perhaps one or two couplets were good, while the remainder of a ghazal became a collection of couplets overloaded with Persian words, thereby distracting readers from its inferior quality. The Urdu ghazal thus advanced beyond the Persian ghazal in the sphere of satire against religious orthodoxy.

Music and the Singing of Ghazals

Under thāṭ Kalyān, rāga Yaman can employ tīntāl of sixteen beats here (corresponding to the thirty-two syllables of a two-line Anuṣṭubh). In thāṭ Bilāval, rāga Bilāval uses a cycle of twelve beats; here a Gāyatrī ghazal of twenty-four syllables can be used. After syllabic counting, the singer can prolong the notes without needing to sing fewer words or finding a shortage of syllables.

These are examples for singers alone, not prescriptions for writers of Maithili ghazals.

No attention has yet been paid to uniformity of bahr in the ghazals written in Maithili: not according to Persian poetics, nor according to Indian poetics. For that reason, Maithili ghazals can at present be called only "poems resembling ghazals." In fact, a ghazal writer could establish uniform metre by spending merely half an hour on a ghazal after writing it.

Ghazal

A millennium's defeat is mine, the victory theirs; I shall not stand diminished before casteists. [Maithili: सहस्राब्दीक हारि हमर आ जीत ओकर, नै जातिवादीक सोझाँ होएब लरताङर]

Changing their disguises, the caste partisans win, O poet; I shall not become another Ailuṣa and stand diminished. [Maithili: भेष बदलि जातिपंथी जीति रहल कवि, ऐलुष नै फेर हम बनब लरताङर]

How strange is the tale of this earthly road: light has arrived and the darkness has receded. [Maithili: एहि भू मार्गक अछि तँ गप्पे विचित्र सन, प्रकाश आएल अछि भेल अन्हार निवृत्त]

The peacock-feathered water-drawer rises even now; I shall absorb Indra's cloud and not be diminished. [Maithili: मयूरपंखी पनि सोखा उगल छै एखने, इन्द्रक मेघकेँ सोंखि करब लरताङर]

Like a child, I asked today: is this the path of truth and non-violence, the path of victory? [Maithili: बनि बाल बुद्धि हम पुछने आइ छलहुँ, ई सत्य अहिंसाक पथ ई विजयक पथ]

Their chariot of falsehood wins; I shall not tremble or stand diminished again. [Maithili: जीतल जाइए असत्यक रथ हुनकर, टनकाएब नै फेर होएब लरताङर]

Day and night I travelled the road, always; it turns to ashes and another road appears. [Maithili: रस्ता चलैत छलहुँ दिन राति सदिखन, से भेल जाइत छारन नव रस्ता बनल]

I see the road shedding its old skin; I shall go forward and not be diminished. [Maithili: छी देखि रहल रस्ताक केंचुली भरि गर, गऽ जाइत आगाँ नहि होएब लरताङर]

The moment of truth arrives in the form of some calamity; the double-dealer has come, bewildered. [Maithili: अबैए ओ सत्यक क्षण कोन विपदा बनि, अछि आएल दौगल ओ सुनझाएल अछि]

I stand on the rim of the pond; I shall not cause the home to crumble, nor stand diminished. [Maithili: पोखरिक जाइठ पर भेल ठाढ़ छी हम, छछड़बाएब घर नै हैब लरताङर]

Having drunk poison, Śiva looks in every direction; the destroyer of poison moves like the wind. [Maithili: छनगा पीबि शिव देखि रहल चारू कात, विषहन्त ओ घूमि रहल बनल बसात]

Your intellect calls this trikaṭu, this Tāṇḍava; I shall not be driven into humiliation. [Maithili: तांडव ई अहाँक बुद्धि कहैए से त्रिकटु, तगबाएत करा नै होएब लरताङर]

Brother, Airāvat sways today, stamping a formidable rhythm in the mud. [Maithili: हे भाइ ऐरावत अछि आइ झूमि रहल, कदैमे करैत ओ कदम ताल विकराल]

I have seen the spindle of the woman at her spinning wheel; I shall not be dismayed or diminished. [Maithili: चरखा कत्तिनक टकुआ काटब देखल, नहि कदरियाएब खोभब लरताङर]

Ghazal

This rainy night has become a night of delight, O Kāli. [Maithili: बरसातिक ई राति बनल सुख राति हेकालि]

I shall offer the sixteen forms of worship and sacrifice my heart, O Kāli. [Maithili: करब षोडशोपचार आ रदए बलि हेकालि]

May brother Bāl Basant grow; such is the sister's hope. [Maithili: बाल बसन्त भैया बढ़थु बहिनक अछि आस]

Performing āstik rites, the brother has not even remembered her, O Kāli. [Maithili: आस्ती क करैत भैया लेल सुधियो नहि हेकालि]

Red cricket, red vermilion, red hibiscus flower— [Maithili: लाल झिंगुर, लाल सिन्दुर, लाल अड़हुल फूल]

Redder still is the sight of this land of Mithila, O Kāli. [Maithili: ताहूसँ लाल देखल ई दृश्य-देश मिथि हे कालि]

Before a dream, truth now has no worth. [Maithili: स्वप्नक सोझाँ सत्यक नै अछि आब कोनो मोल]

Wandering among ponds and thickets, I saw this everywhere, O Kāli. [Maithili: पोखड़ि झाँखड़ि सगरि घूमि ई देखलिहे कालि]

The mango has fruited; the branch is lowered, bending and bending. [Maithili: अमुआ फड़ एल दाल दी डारि लीबि-लीबिजाए]

In its humility I heard no restlessness, O Kāli. [Maithili: ओकर नम्रतामे कोनो अगुताइ सुनलिहे कालि]

Airāvat has offered, behold, this poem resembling a ghazal. [Maithili: ऐरावत गजल सन कविता देखू देलनि ई]

Behold here the dignity of Maithili, always, O Kāli. [Maithili: मैथिलीक गरिमा एहि ठाँ देखू सदति हे कालि]

Ghazal

As I passed, I saw that figure standing: a chest like a great thundercloud. [Maithili: जाइत-जाइत देखल ओ ठाढ़ आर मेघडम्बर सन छाती]

The brother's back is like the washerman's slab; his chest like a great thundercloud. [Maithili: भैयाक पीठ धोबिया पाट हुनकर मेघडम्बर सन छाती]

Famine fell again; crying aloud, the figure stood aside. [Maithili: पड़ल फेर अकाल करैत हाक्रोस छथि ओ ठाढ़ भेल कात]

The chest beats, proudly upright at the threshold: a chest like a great thundercloud. [Maithili: छाती धकधक उन्नत्त ठाढ़ि दुआर मेघडम्बर सन छाती]

I have heard this outcry; standing before them I shall offer encouragement. [Maithili: देखल ई चित्कार हम भऽ सोझाँ ठाढ़ देबै ओकरा हुतकारी]

Through the blows of crisis, boundless patience: a chest like a great thundercloud. [Maithili: संकट प्रहार मे धैर्य अपरम्पार मेघडम्बर सन छाती]

Today I saw their exhausted face, but they uttered no complaint. [Maithili: देखल हुनका आइ छन्हि मुँह क्लान्त मुदा नहि कोनो बात]

On the road of duty there is no rest: a chest like a great thundercloud. [Maithili: कर्तव्यक बिच कोनो विश्राम डगर मेघडम्बर सन छाती]

Listen, brother, disorder has overcome us; raise a cry for resolution. [Maithili: सुनू सुनू भाइ गप भेल असम्हार करू पुकार समधानि]

See what has become of humankind; rebuke it with a chest like a great thundercloud. [Maithili: भेल मानवक ई हाल करू दुत्कार मेघडम्बर सन छाती]

Airāvat saw the turning course become a weapon, a net held in the hand. [Maithili: ऐरावत देखल घुर चालि बनल हथियार ओ लेने जाल]

Even so, we stand—are we beyond the horizon?—with chests like great thunderclouds. [Maithili: छी तैयो ठाढ़ की हम क्षितिजक पार मेघडम्बर सन छाती]

Let us now examine some terminology.

Arkān: the complete metrical feet (arkān-e-sālim).

The complete metrical feet are: fa-ū-lun (U। ।); fā-i-lun (। U।); mafā-ī-lun (U। । ।); mus-taf-i-lun (। । U।); fā-i-lā-tun (। U। ।); mu-ta-fā-i-lun (UU। U।); mafā-i-la-tun (U। UU।); and maf-ū-lā-tu (। । । U). [Original scansion: फ–ऊ–लुन U। ।; फा–इ–लुन । U।; मफा–ई–लुन U। । ।; मुस–तफ–इ–लुन । । U।; फा–इ–ला–तुन । U। ।; मु–त–फा–इ–लुन UU। U।; मफा–इ–ल–तुन U। UU।; मफ–ऊ–ला–तु । । । U.]

These complete-foot components have numerous varieties.

From ten complete (sālim) arkān come nineteen bahrs, of two kinds.

The mufrad bahr is formed by repeating a rukn (metrical foot). Seven are sālim (complete) metres, which in musical terminology may be called pure. By repeating the foot two to eight times in every line, a couplet will contain a metre of four to sixteen rukns.

A four-rukn metre is murabbaʿ; a six-rukn metre is musaddas; an eight-rukn metre is musamman/mufrad (pure). There are sālim metres of eight, six and four feet.

Hazaj: eight feet—mafāīlun (U| | |), repeated four times; six feet—the same foot repeated three times; four feet—the same foot repeated twice.

Rajaz: eight feet—mustafīlun (| | U|), repeated four times; six feet—the same foot repeated three times; four feet—the same foot repeated twice.

Ramal: eight feet—fāīlātun (| U| |), repeated four times; six feet—the same foot repeated three times; four feet—the same foot repeated twice.

Wāfir: eight feet—mafāīlatun (U| UU|), repeated four times; six feet—the same foot repeated three times; four feet—the same foot repeated twice.

Kāmil: eight feet—mutafāīlun (UU| U|), repeated four times; six feet—the same foot repeated three times; four feet—the same foot repeated twice.

Mutaqārib: eight feet—faūlun (U| |), repeated four times; six feet—the same foot repeated three times; four feet—the same foot repeated twice.

Mutadārik: eight feet—fāīlun (| U|), repeated four times; six feet—the same foot repeated three times; four feet—the same foot repeated twice.

All these metres also possess numerous forms with modified or incomplete feet.

Murakkab bahr (compound metre): twelve complete (sālim) metres arise through the repeated alternation of two kinds of arkān. In the terminology of music, these may be called mixed metres. They occur in three lengths: metres of four, six, and eight rukns. These are the compound (murakkab), complete-foot (sālim) metres.

The twelve are Tawīl, Madīd, Munsariḥ, Muqtadab, Muḍāriʿ, Mujtathth, Khafīf, Basīṭ, Sarīʿ, Jadīd, Qarīb, and Mushākil.

Arkān: the modified (muẓāḥif) or incomplete metrical feet.

The modified (muẓāḥif) feet include: faīlun (UU|); mafāīlun (U| U|); faīlātun (UU| |); mafāīlu (U| | U); muftaīlun (| UU|); faūlu (U| U); mafūlu (। । U); mafūlun (। । ।); faʿlun (। ।); fā (।); faʿal (U।); faʿul (U। U); fāʿ (। U); fāʿilun (। U।); and faʿūlun (U। ।). The source gives their syllabic patterns in this order.

Muqtadab (eight modified feet): faʿūlu (U। U) – faʿilun (U।) – faʿūlu (U। U) – faʿilun (। ।). [Original metrical string: फऊलुU। UफैलुनU। फऊलुU। Uफैलुन। ।]

Muḍāriʿ (eight modified feet): mafūlu (। । U) – fāʿilātu (। U। U) – mafāʿilu (U। । U) – fāʿilun (। U।), or fāʿilān (। U। U). [Original: मफऊलु। । Uफाइलातु। U। UमफाईलुU। । Uफाइलुन। U।/फाइलान। U। U]

Mujtathth (eight modified feet): mafāʿilun (U। U।) – faʿilātun (UU। ।) – mafāʿilun (U। U।) – faʿlun (। ।), or faʿilun (UU।).

Khafīf (six modified feet): fāʿilātun (। U। ।) – mafāʿilun (U। U।) – faʿlun (। ।), or faʿilun (UU।).

Let us return once again to the instructions for Maithili pronunciation and the distinction between short and long vowels.

Just as it was explained earlier that an anusvāra or visarga makes a syllable long, the point now is that a candrabindu combined with a short vowel still constitutes a short syllable.

That is: candrabindu + short vowel = one mātrā.

Conjunct consonants: for the following combinations, the mātrās are counted in this manner:

क्ति = क् + त् + इ = ० + ० + १ = १.

क्ती = क् + त् + ई = ० + ० + २ = २.

Let us now consider the final letter of a line, or of a segment of a line.

क्ष = क् + ष = ० + १; त्र = त् + र = ० + १; ज्ञ = ज् + ञ = ० + १.

श्र = श् + र = ० + १; स्र = स् + र = ० + १; शृ = श् + ऋ = ० + १.

त्व = त् + व = ० + १; त्त्व = त् + त् + व = ० + ० + १.

Short vowel + avagraha (ऽ) = 1 + 0.

An avagraha (bikārī) should not be used after a or a long vowel: forms such as दिअऽ, आऽ, and ओऽ are erroneous. It may, however, be used after a consonant combined with the inherent a.

Short vowel + candrabindu = 1 + 0; long vowel + candrabindu = 2 + 0.

For example, हँसल = 1 + 1 + 1; साँस = 2 + 1.

For metrical counting, both the avagraha and the candrabindu have a value of zero.

जाकऽ = 2 + 1; क् = 0; क = क् + अ = 0 + 1.

A tendency has arisen in Maithili to pronounce क as क्, hence the need to mark the inherent vowel by an avagraha; no such mark is needed for a long vowel.

U denotes a short syllable.

I denotes a long syllable.

One long syllable (I) is equivalent to two short syllables (U U) in quantitative value.

Bahr-e-Mutaqārib: in every line a metrical unit of five letters is repeated four times in the following order:

UI I — a complete (sālim) metrical foot.

In Maithili, attaching case suffixes to the preceding word offers some convenience. A line may consequently contain more than four words; the sequence of short and long syllables must nevertheless remain unchanged.

Faūlun — UI I.

Faūlun | faūlun | faūlun | faūlun.

Faūlun | faūlun | faūlun | faūlun.

Example 1.

Bahr-e-Mutaqārib: 8 feet, faūlun (UI I) repeated 4 times in each line.

अनेरे धुनेरे जते कोठ केलौं

बकै तो ढ़ कै तोसुझेलौंघनेरौं

Example 2.

Bahr-e-Mutadārik: 8 feet, fāilun (। U।) repeated 4 times in each line.

बी कि गेलै तँ की जोतबैखेतमे

झी किलेतैतँ की बोल तै बेरमे

Example 3.

Bahr-e-Kāmil: 8 feet, mutafāilun (UU। U।) repeated 4 times in each line.

The person called human feels ashamed if deceived. [Maithili metrical specimen: इनसान जे कहबैत छै सकुचा कऽ छै जँ ठकैल यौ]

One who speaks out but cannot endure the response is weak. [Maithili metrical specimen: बहरा कऽ जे कहतै जँ नै सहि ते तँ छै कमजोर यौ]

Example 4.

Bahr-e-Wāfir: 8 feet, mafāilatun (U। UU।) repeated 4 times in each line.

That person comes, listens, and, if departing, sits down. [Maithili metrical specimen: अबै अछि ओ सुनै अछि ओ जँ जाइत छैबसै अछि ओ]

That person speaks and hears; if eating, pushes it away. [Maithili metrical specimen: कहै अछि जे सुनै अछि ओ जँ खाइत छैढकै अछि ओ]

Example 5.

Bahr-e-Ramal: 8 feet, fāilātun (। U। ।) repeated 4 times in each line.

झूरझा मो भेल छी से बात ने कीकाटने की

सेसमे टू सेलपेटूआर की की आर ने छी

Example 6.

Bahr-e-Rajaz: 8 feet, mustafilun (। । U।) repeated 4 times in each line.

ऐओतऽ की छैकेहनोआ की अ ते की छी अए

नै छै कएलो नै सुनै छै की करै भेटैत-ए

Example 7.

Bahr-e-Hazaj: 8 feet, mafāīlun (U। । ।) repeated 4 times in each line.

He neither comes nor listens; even while out, he understands. [Maithili metrical specimen: अबै छै नै सुनै छै नैबहीरो छै बुझै छै से]

If I am in distress, what is cut away? He understands even the passing night. [Maithili metrical specimen: नरैमे छी कटै की सेज जातो छै बुझै छै से]

1. We shall now examine the eight-foot, six-foot (the foot occurring three times), and four-foot (twice) uses of the complete arkān. These are mufrad metres: a single metrical foot is repeatedly employed.

2. There are additionally twelve compound (murakkab) metres made from complete feet. Here two kinds of feet recur in alternation, producing what may be called mixed metres in music. They have four, six, or eight feet. These twelve complete (sālim) metres are Tawīl, Madīd, Munsariḥ, Muqtadab, Muḍāriʿ, Mujtaththh, Khafīf, Basīṭ, Sarīʿ, Jadīd, Qarīb, and Mushākil.

3. A further twelve metres are produced by combining complete (sālim) and modified (muẓāḥif) feet: Makhbūn, Akhrab, Maḥdhūf, Maqṭūʿ, Maqbūḍ, Muḍmar, Marfūʿ, Maʿṣūb, Maḥdhūdh, Makfūf, Mashkūl, and Aslam.

4. Four relatively common metres constructed solely from modified feet are Muqtadab, Muḍāriʿ, Mujtaththh, and Khafīf.

Bahr-e-Mutaqārib: 6 feet, faūlun (U। ।) repeated 3 times in each line.

एकेबेरमेजेकएलौं

बड़ेभेरभेनैंसुनेलौं

Bahr-e-Mutaqārib: 4 feet, faūlun (U। ।) repeated 2 times in each line.

Standing very far away. [Maithili metrical specimen: बड़ीदूरठाढ़े]

Dancing a little distance away. [Maithili metrical specimen: कनीदूरनाचे]

Bahr-e-Mutadārik: 6 feet, fāīlun (। U।) repeated 3 times in each line.

एकरेकेलहाकेलहीं

तैं अनेरे दुर्गा भेलहीं

Bahr-e-Mutadārik: 4 feet, fāʿilun (। U।) repeated 2 times in each line.

Why should it be cut? [Maithili metrical specimen: काहिकाटीएतै]

Why should the matter be divided? [Maithili metrical specimen: बातबाँटीएतै]

Bahr-e-Hazaj: 6 feet, mafāʿīlun (U। । ।) repeated 3 times in each line.

अनेरे भऽ गेलैं ऐ लड़ै ले गै

तखैनो जे भऽ जेतै की गमैए गै

Bahr-e-Hazaj: 4 feet, mafāʿīlun (U। । ।) repeated 2 times in each line.

A little unpaid labour, illness. [Maithili metrical specimen: कनेबेगारबेमारी]

How many things shall I tell? [Maithili metrical specimen: कतेकीबातसुनाबी]

Bahr-e-Rajaz: 6 feet, mustafʿilun (। । U।) repeated 3 times in each line.

ई जेधरा देखैसँछैहेतैतँनै

ई जे घटाघूमैसँघूमैनै तँ नै

Bahr-e-Rajaz: 4 feet, mustafʿilun (। । U।) repeated 2 times in each line.

Who arrived this morning, girl? [Maithili metrical specimen: भोरेअएलैकोनगै]

Why did the telephone not come directly, girl? [Maithili metrical specimen: सोझेनएलैफोनगै]

Bahr-e-Ramal: 6 feet, fāʿilātun (। U। ।) repeated 3 times in each line.

कीगरीबोकी धनी को तैंसभैछी

कीसमी पो की कतेको जेघुमैछी

Bahr-e-Ramal: 4 feet, fāʿilātun (। U। ।) repeated 2 times in each line.

How many things happened? [Maithili metrical specimen: कीकतेकोबातभेलै]

How many kicks were received? [Maithili metrical specimen: कीजतेकोलातखेलै]

Bahr-e-Wāfir: 6 feet, mafāīlatun (U। UU।) repeated 3 times in each line.

कनेक करा कहेबइ आब तेबइ की

जते सुनबैत ते कहताबतेबइकी

Bahr-e-Wāfir: 4 feet, mafāīlatun (U। UU।) repeated 2 times in each line.

How many words lie in the heart? [Maithili metrical specimen: करेजकबातछैकतबो]

This, then, is the condition of the heart. [Maithili metrical specimen: करेजकहालईनञिहो]

Bahr-e-Kāmil: 6 feet, mutafāīlun (UU। U।) repeated 3 times in each line.

अनका कतौ कहबै कनेसुनतै कहाँ

सुनि ओबजौकरतै कनेजितबैजहाँ

Bahr-e-Kāmil: 4 feet, mutafāīlun (UU। U।) repeated 2 times in each line.

First it comes, then it listens. [Maithili metrical specimen: पहिलेअनैतखनेसुनै]

How much it says, how much it does. [Maithili metrical specimen: कहबैकतेकखनोकरै]

Bahr-e-Tawīl: faʿūlun (U। ।) – mafāʿīlun (U। । ।).

Shall I tell or listen? Yet whatever that person says... [Maithili metrical specimen: कहेबैसुनेबैकी मुदा जेकहेतै से]

Shall I hear that person as well? Yet whatever that person speaks... [Maithili metrical specimen: सुने तैउकारोकी मुदा जेबजेतै से]

Bahr-e-Madīd: fāʿilātun (। U। ।) – fāʿilun (। U।).

Speak after listening: how many things are in your mouth? [Maithili metrical specimen: सूनिबाजूमूँहमे कैकटा छै बातमे]

Understand before speaking, friend: how many blows lie in the matter? [Maithili metrical specimen: बूझि बाजू मीत यौ कैकटा छैघातमे]

Bahr-e-Munsariḥ: mustafʿilun (। । U।) – mafʿūlātu (। । । U).

की की रहै की की भेल कोनोभलाकोनो सैह

माँ माँ करी पैघो भेल सेहो जरौ सेहो जैह

Bahr-e-Muqtadab: mafʿūlātu (। । । U) – mustafʿilun (। । U।).

Raise the name of Rāma as well; awaken the name of Rāma. [Maithili metrical specimen: रामोनाम सेहोउठारामोनामसेहो जरा]

Take the name of Rāma too; utter the name of Rāma. [Maithili metrical specimen: रामोनाम मो हो लएरामोनाम बा तो करा]

Bahr-e-Muḍāriʿ: mafāʿīlun (U। । ।) – fāʿilātun (। U। ।).

अरे की छी सैह नै की अरे छी छी वैह ने छी

बिसारीकीउघारीकी अरे की की देब ने की

Bahr-e-Mujtathth: mustafʿilun (। । U।) – fāʿilātun (। U। ।).

No, Rāmā is not there; nor do I remain; neither dying nor dead. [Maithili metrical specimen: नै छै रमा नै रही मो नै छैमरा नैमरीजो]

This is not even a little dead; this is not even a little alive. [Maithili metrical specimen: नै ई कनेकोमृतो छै नै ई कनेको जि यै ओ]

Bahr-e-Khafīf: fāʿilātun (। U। ।) – mustafʿilun (। । U।) – fāʿilātun (। U। ।).

रे खरा खू फेकू तँ नै देख लेलौं

सूनिराखूबेरोतँ नै बीति गेलौं

Bahr-e-Basīṭ: mustafʿilun (। । U।) – fāʿilun (। U।).

What remained, what happened; what was there and what did not happen? [Maithili metrical specimen: की की रहै की भऽगैकी की छलै की भऽ नै]

The season passes unspoken; the song passes unsung. [Maithili metrical specimen: री तो बि तै ने कऽगैगीतोबि तै गाबि नै]

Bahr-e-Sarīʿ: mustafʿilun (। । U।) – mustafʿilun (। । U।) – mafʿūlātu (। । । U).

सेहो कने छै ने अते की के हैत

लेरोचुबै छै ने अ ते की के हैत

Bahr-e-Jadīd: fāʿilātun (। U। ।) – fāʿilātun (। U। ।) – mustafʿilun (। । U।).

लेलहँ ई बेगुणो आ भेलै भने

बेलगोईनैहरोआगेलैभने

Bahr-e-Qarīb: mafāʿīlun (U। । ।) – mafāʿīlun (U। । ।) – fāʿilātun (। U। ।).

It travels a little, yet goes nowhere along the road. [Maithili metrical specimen: चलै छै ई कने बाटो जाइ छै नै]

गतातो मे भने कोनो बाइ छै नै

Bahr-e-Mushākil: fāʿilātun (। U। ।) – mafāʿīlun (U। । ।) – mafāʿīlun (U। । ।).

Accept delight—ah, is there no share of fortune? [Maithili metrical specimen: मोद मानी अहो भागी क नै छै की]

Know anger: is an empty vow what comes to be? [Maithili metrical specimen: क्रोध जानी प्रणोखालीबनैछैकी]

Makhbūn: bahr-e-Ramal musaddas makhbūn.

Fāilātun (। U। ।) – failātun (UU। ।) – failātun (UU। ।).

खेलखेलाअसलीऐअगबेनै

मिलमिला अँखि गौरो बतहे नै

Akhrab: bahr-e-Hazaj murabbaʿ akhrab.

Mafūlu (। । U) – mafāīlun (U। । ।).

कीभेललटूबूडू

केगेलअत्तेजोडू

Maḥdhūf: bahr-e-Ramal musamman maḥdhūf.

Fāílātun (। U। ।) – fāílātun (। U। ।) – fāílātun (। U। ।) – fāílun (। U।).

एन मे नो भेल गेलौ आशआगाँबीतलौ

सूनिगेलौं नैभगेलौं नाश नारा गीत यौ

Maqṭūʿ: bahr-e-Mutadārik musaddas maqṭūʿ.

Fāílun (। U।) – fāílun (। U।) – falun (। ।).

What has become of what, sir? [Maithili metrical specimen: कीसँकीभेलछीबाबू]

What did you do with what next? [Maithili metrical specimen: कीसँकीकैलछीआगू]

Maqbūḍ: bahr-e-Mutaqārib musamman maqbūḍ (all the feet here are modified, muẓāḥif).

Faūlun (U। ।) – faūlun (U। ।) – faūlun (U। ।) – faūlu (U। U).

Ah, the affection that you spoke of! [Maithili metrical specimen: अरे रे अहाँ जे कहेलौंसिनेह]

Ah, the affection that you uttered! [Maithili metrical specimen: अरे रे अहाँ जेबजेलौंसिनेह]

Muḍmar: bahr-e-Kāmil musaddas muḍmar (the source describes the feet here as complete, sālim).

Mutafāílun (UU। U।) – mutafāílun (UU। U।) – mustafílun (। । U।).

अनठयने रहबैरहबैहरे हेरोमबै

अनठयने रहबैरहबैअरे हेघूरिऐ

Marfūʿ: bahr-e-Muqtadab musaddas marfūʿ.

Mafūlātu (। । । U) – mafūlātu (। । । U) – mafūlu (। । U).

की की रेह की की सैह निंघेस

की की रेह की की यैह निंघेस

Maʿṣūb: bahr-e-Wāfir musaddas (the source describes the feet here as complete, sālim).

Mafāīlatun (U। UU।) – mafāīlatun (U। UU।) – mafāīlun (U। । ।).

Ah, I have brought the married woman; why so needlessly? [Maithili metrical specimen: अरे अनलौं सुहागिन यै अनेरो की]

अरे अनलौं मुहोथरि मे जनेरो की

Maḥdhūdh: bahr-e-Mutadārik musamman maḥdhūdh (all feet are modified, muẓāḥif).

Fāīlun (। U।) – fāīlun (। U।) – fāīlun (। U।) – fā (।).

Who is there? Listen, you! [Maithili metrical specimen: केरहैसूनियैईअहाँकेँ]

Who is there? Why jump, you? [Maithili metrical specimen: केरहैकूदियैईअहाँकेँ]

Makfūf: bahr-e-Hazaj musamman makfūf.

Mafāīlun (U। । ।) – mafāīlun (U। । ।) – mafāīlun (U। । ।) – mafāīlu (U। । U).

अनेरे की अनेरे कीधुनेरेकीकहेलौंहँ

अनेरे की अनेरे कीधुनेरेकीकहेलौंहँ

Mashkūl: bahr-e-Ramal musamman mashkūl.

Fāīlātun (। U। ।) – fāīlātun (। U। ।) – fāīlātun (। U। ।) – mafūlu (। । U).

सूनि सुन्झा केलियै ने कोन पा पीछोड़ाइ

सूनि सुन्झा केलियै ने कोन पा पीछोड़ाइ

Aslam: bahr-e-Mutaqārib musaddas aslam.

Faūlun (U। ।) – faūlun (U। ।) – faa̐l (U।).

Oh, why, oh, why—you! [Maithili metrical specimen: अरेकीअरेकीअहाँ]

Oh, why, oh, why—you! [Maithili metrical specimen: अरेकीअरेकीअहाँ]

Bahr-e-Muqtadab, modified form (eight modified feet): faūlu (U। U) – faílun (U।) – faūlu (U। U) – faílun (। ।). [Original sequence: बहरेमुक्तजब (मुजाहिफरूप) (अपूर्णाक्षरीआठरुक्न): फऊलुU। UफैलुनU। फऊलुU। Uफैलुन। ।]

How many words, how many truths? [Maithili metrical specimen: कतेकगपोकतेकसप्पो]

How often does that happen? [Maithili metrical specimen: कतेकमिलैरहैतछैओ]

Bahr-e-Muḍāri‘, modified form (eight modified feet): mafūlu (। । U) – fāílātu (। U। U) – mafāīlu (U। । U) – fāílun (। U।), or fāílān (। U। U). [Original sequence: बहरेमज़ारे (मुजाहिफरूप) (अपूर्णाक्षरीआठरुक्न): मफऊलु। । Uफाइलातु। U। UमफाईलुU। । Uफाइलुन। U।/फाइलान। U। U]

ने छैक नैइनामकतेकोनछानिगै

ने छैक नैनकाम कतेकोनकानिगै

Bahr-e-Mujtathth, modified form (eight modified feet): mafāílun (U। U।) – faílātun (UU। ।) – mafāílun (U। U।) – faılun (। ।), or faílun (UU।).

Even if it is done well, perhaps good may come. [Maithili metrical specimen: भने भले करतै की भने भलेभेटौ]

How much fire may remain? How much may one see? [Maithili metrical specimen: कतेक तेज रतै ई कतेक ने देखौ]

Bahr-e-Khafif, modified form (six modified feet): fāílātun (। U। ।) – mafāílun (U। U।) – faılun (। ।), or faílun (UU।).

I have seen it, at times sold from the wall. [Maithili metrical specimen: देख लेलौं दिवारसँ बेचै कखनो]

बेख देखै गछारसँ हे तैनिक ओ

A ghazal should convey some message, emotional expression, philosophy of life, beauty, or the beauty of love and separation. Its effects should arise spontaneously, rather than through an obvious contrivance. Thus, like other verse or poetry, a ghazal ought to be spoken or uttered, not merely written. What one writes, in a different sense, is a picture: in Mithila painting, the artist is called a likhiyā, one who writes or paints the picture; Sanskrit likewise has ahaṃ citraṃ likhāmi—"I paint a picture." The subject matter of the ghazal is distinct. A devotional hymn written according to the technical rules of ghazal prosody does not thereby become a ghazal. In Arabic, indeed, the word ghazal denotes conversation with a woman. Beyond love and separation, beyond failure to attain love, beyond social scandal and even after love has been deemed illicit, the ghazal draws upon the aesthetic savour of love. It may be love between God and a devotee, physical or spiritual love, Rādhā's love or Mīrā's. Nor need love be reciprocated. When emotion surges forth, the ghazal poet must transform its momentary intensity into an experience that is real and lasting; only then can a fine ghazal be composed.

Rubāʿī.

In the quatrain called rubāī, the first, second, and fourth lines rhyme, and each line has twenty or twenty-one mātrās.

Keep the line length of a rubāī at twenty or twenty-one mātrās. Every line begins in one of two ways: (1) long–long–long (mafūlu, ⏑ – – U, as given in the source), or (2) long–long–short (mafūlun, ⏑ – – –, as given in the source).

Persian rubāī prescribes the subsequent sequence of short and long syllables as well. For Maithili, however, one may choose any twenty- or twenty-one-mātrā metre beginning with either of these two patterns. The essential conditions remain the twenty- or twenty-one-mātrā line and the specified opening sequence.

The lines of one rubāī may nevertheless employ more than one metre or rhythmic movement. It is also possible to rhyme all four lines.

Another quatrain in which the first, second, and fourth lines rhyme, but whose lines do not have twenty or twenty-one mātrās, is not a rubāī.

In Maithili, however, such a composition may fall under the definition of qiṭa if it begins with two long syllables, while the remaining metre is simple syllabic, regulated syllabic, or quantitative. A qiṭa must open with long–long; thereafter, one may compose the couplet in any of these three systems. At a minimum, the second and fourth lines must rhyme.

The fourth line of the rubāī quatrain should carry the emotional culmination.

A Rubāʿī

In the dark black clouds, something is being brought. [Maithili metrical specimen: कारीअनहारमेघ, आनैहोइए]

Somewhere, sandy earth is being eaten away. [Maithili metrical specimen: कत्तौबलुआमाटि, खानैहोइए]

Seeing the burning earth, the clouds surge. [Maithili metrical specimen: दाहीजरतीदेखि, हिलोरै-एमेघ]

A firefly flares and departs, as though alive. [Maithili metrical specimen: भगजोगनीभकरार, जानैहोइए]

Correspondences between Bahr and Chhand

A ghazal must be composed in some bahr (metre). Even in a syllabic metre, account can be taken of short and long syllables; this distinction subsequently came to be observed in Sanskrit quantitative-syllabic metres derived from Vedic prosody. For example:

"I remain gazing towards this cloud." [Maithili: तकैत रहैत छी ऐ मेघ दिस] तकैत (short + long + long): three syllables.

रहैत (short + long + short): three syllables.

छी (long): one syllable.

ऐ (long): one syllable.

मेघ (long + short): two syllables.

दिस (short + short): two syllables.

In quantitative (mātrik) metres, groups of two, three, four, five, and six mātrās (dvikal, trikal, catuṣkal, pañcakal, and ṣaṭkal) may be formed from as few as one syllable (one long) to as many as six syllables (six short).

A dvikal has two mātrās: either one long syllable or two short ones.

A trikal has three mātrās, arranged as short + long, long + short, or short + short + short.

A catuṣkal has four mātrās, a pañcakal five, and a ṣaṭkal six.

There are eight kinds of three-syllable units in regulated syllabic metre. They can be memorised through the formula "yamātārājasalagām."

The number of feet and the placement of rhyme, caesura (yati), and end-rhyme (antyānuprāsa) may then be determined on a syllabic or quantitative basis, allowing variation in the pattern.

In varṇa metre, a group of three syllables is called a gaṇa. There are eight such groups:

Ya-gaṇa: U|| .

Ra-gaṇa: |U| .

Ta-gaṇa: ||U .

Bha-gaṇa: |U U .

Ja-gaṇa: U|U .

Sa-gaṇa: U U| .

Ma-gaṇa: ||| .

Na-gaṇa: U U U .

In addition to these eight there are two further single-syllable units, ga and la.

Ga: one isolated long syllable (|).

La: one isolated short syllable (U).

A mnemonic for remembering all eight gaṇas is:

yamātārājabhānasalagām [यमाताराजभानसलगम्].

Now divide the mnemonic into its components:

yamātā — U|| = ya-gaṇa.

mātārā — ||| = ma-gaṇa.

tārāja — ||U = ta-gaṇa.

rājabhā — |U| = ra-gaṇa.

jabhāna — U|U = ja-gaṇa.

bhānasa — |U U = bha-gaṇa.

nasala — U U U = na-gaṇa.

salagām — U U⏑ = sa-gaṇa.

Correspondences between Bahr and Sanskrit Metre

Bahr-e-Mutaqārib: eight feet; faʿūlun (U⏑ –) repeated four times.

The Sanskrit varṇa-vṛtta Bhujaṅgaprayāta: the ya-gaṇa (U⏑ –) occurs four times in each line, giving twelve syllables. The first, fourth, seventh, and tenth syllables are short; all others are long. A caesura follows the sixth and final syllables.

Bahr-e-Mutaqārib: four feet; faʿūlun (U⏑ –) repeated twice.

The Sanskrit varṇa-vṛtta Somarājī: ya-gaṇa (U⏑ –) occurs twice, giving six syllables. The first and fourth are short and the remaining syllables long. A caesura follows the second and final syllables.

Quantitative form: twenty mātrās per line. The first, sixth, eleventh, and sixteenth mātrās are short.

Bahr-e-Mutadārik: eight feet; fāʿilun (– U⏑) repeated four times.

The Sanskrit varṇa-vṛtta Sragviṇī: the ra-gaṇa (– U⏑) occurs four times, giving twelve syllables. The second, fifth, eighth, and eleventh are short, and all others long. A caesura follows the sixth and final syllables.

Quantitative form: twenty mātrās per line. The third, eighth, thirteenth, and eighteenth mātrās are short.

Maḥdhūf: bahr-e-Ramal musamman maḥdhūf, consisting of fāʿilātun (– U⏑ –) three times followed by fāʿilun (– U⏑).

The quantitative metre Gītikā: twenty-six mātrās in each line. The third, tenth, seventeenth, and twenty-fourth are short.

Gītikā as a varṇa-vṛtta: a twenty-syllable pattern consisting of one sa-gaṇa, two ja-gaṇas, one bha-gaṇa, one ra-gaṇa, one sa-gaṇa, one la-gaṇa, and one ga-gaṇa. The third, fifth, eighth, tenth, thirteenth, fifteenth, eighteenth, and twentieth syllables are long; the rest short. Caesurae follow the fifth, twelfth, and final syllables.

Maḥdhūdh: bahr-e-Mutadārik musamman maḥdhūdh (all feet are modified): fāʿilun (– U⏑) three times followed by fā (–).

The Sanskrit varṇa-vṛtta Bālā: ten syllables per line; ra-gaṇa (ı U ı) three times, followed by one long syllable.

Quantitative form: seventeen mātrās per line. The third, eighth, and thirteenth mātrās are short, and the final unit is one long syllable, or alternatively two short syllables (U U).

The Early Forms of the Maithili Ghazal

"Even now, there remains inscribed upon my mind a remark by the respected Maithili critic Shri Ramanand Jha 'Raman'. He dismissed the present-day Maithili song and ghazal altogether, describing them as instruments of fame on the stage and monetary gain (see Mithila Mihir, February 1983). … What right does any critic have to make such an irresponsible statement? Is it because freedom of speech is a fundamental right under the Indian Constitution?" (Siyaram Jha "Saras", Deepotsav, 18 October 1990; preface to Lokved aa Lal Qila.)

In another preface to Lokved aa Lal Qila, Viyogi writes: "Even though it is based on the rules of prosody, the ghazal allows its poet the freedom to depart from the rules of calculation." (!)

Devshankar Naveen writes: "… Then came Dr Ramdev Jha's article. Among the absurdities of that essay were two things, one of them being that he began prescribing a count of mātrās for the lines of a ghazal, as though they were lines of metrical verse …"

Before the ghazals begin in Lokved aa Lal Qila, there is an essay; these prefatory writings offer no positive comment on the Maithili ghazal. They do, however, deliver a series of blows, as though a critic could be compelled, under threat of a stick, to declare: "These are Maithili ghazals —ghazals and nothing else."

It is true that a ghazal may be composed in several ways, in numerous bahrs and metres. But freedom from the rules of counting exists neither in quantitative metre nor in syllabic metre.

In the early composition of haiku in English, the correspondence between syllables and written letters could not be maintained: the 5/7/5 syllables could contain more letters than the Japanese pattern. I therefore advised that Maithili haiku should employ simple syllabic metre, without distinguishing short from long syllables. Sanskrit has seventeen-syllable metrical forms comprising seventeen syllabic units, such as Śikhariṇī, Vaṃśapatrapatitam, Mandākrāntā, Hariṇī, Hāriṇī, Naradattakam, Kokilakam and Ābhārākrāntā. Accordingly, I adopted seventeen counted units in a 5/7/5 arrangement for Maithili haiku. Mihir Jha, Ira Mallick, Umesh Mandal, Ramvilas Sahu and others are now using this practice.

With the rubāī, my advice was different: simple syllabic metre is not possible because its opening must be long–long–long or long–long–short. One must therefore use either a syllabic metre that observes the short–long sequence or a quantitative metre. In a rubāī quatrain, at least the first, second and fourth lines must rhyme, and a line should contain twenty or twenty-one mātrās. Since the four lines can be written in four different bahrs or metres, there is no need to narrow the rules further; what must be decided, however, is that the method of counting—syllabic or quantitative—should remain the same throughout the four lines.

For the ghazal, by contrast, one may use regulated syllabic, simple syllabic or quantitative metre; one must not mix two different systems within a single ghazal. You may call an unmetrical composition a ghazal—silencing the critic, as it were, with a stick in your hand—but it will not thereby become a ghazal. At an Urdu or Persian mushāīra, you would not even be admitted with it. Now that young ghazal poets such as Roshan Jha, Praveen Chaudhary "Prateek" and Ashish Anchinhar can revise their ghazals into simple syllabic metre after a single comment on the internet, why can the ghazal poets of the Lal Qila school not do the same? Mayanand Mishra continued the erroneous tradition under the name geetal, while Gangesh Gunjan perpetuated it by calling his work "something like a ghazal in Maithili". If Ajit Azad and other younger poets subsequently write ghazals without metre or bahr, I regard it as the adverse influence of Mayanand Mishra, Gangesh Gunjan and the non-ghazal poets of the Lal Qila school.

Lokved aa Lal Qila

Following the self-congratulatory prefaces, this collection presents ghazals by Kalanand Bhatt, Taranand Viyogi, Dr Devshankar Naveen, Narendra, Dr Mahendra, Ramesh, Ramchaitanya "Dheeraj", Ram Bharos Kapari "Bhramar", Rabindranath Thakur, Vibhuti Anand, Siyaram Jha "Saras" and Somdev.

Kalanand Bhatt

> "At dawn, we shall cause another, newer sun to rise." [Maithili: भोर आ नब हम दोसरउगायब सुरुज]
>
> "We shall build anew; we shall create a sun." [Maithili: करब नूतन निर्माण हम बनायब सुरुज]

By simple syllabic counting, the first line has seventeen units and the second eighteen. When even this elementary count differs, there is no need to go to the trouble of examining short and long syllables.

By quantitative counting, the first line has twenty-one mātrās and the second also twenty-one. Since the totals agree, let us examine the sequence of short and long syllables. The first line runs: long–short–long–short–short–short–short–long–short–short–short–long–short–short–short–short–short. Here two consecutive short syllables may be replaced by one long syllable, as we shall see in the second line. The second runs: short–short–short–long–short–short–short–long–short–short–short–short–long–short–short–short–short–short. But after the letter shown in bold in the original discussion, the sequence breaks down.

Taranand Viyogi

> "When pain crosses its limit, fire is born." [Maithili: दर्दजँहदकेँटपलजाए तँ आगिजनमै अछि]
>
> "When snow turns into embers, fire is born." [Maithili: बर्फअंगारबनलजाए तँ आगिजनमै अछि]

According to simple syllabic counting, the first line has nineteen units, the second eighteen. Since their counts differ even at this level, the labour of analysing short and long syllables is unnecessary.

By quantitative counting, both lines contain twenty-five mātrās. We may therefore proceed to the distribution of short and long syllables. In the first line the sequence is: long (before a conjunct consonant)–short–short–short–short–long–short–short–short–long–long–short–long–short–short–short–long–short–short. Two consecutive short syllables may be replaced by a long one, as can be tested against the second line. The latter, however, begins long (before a conjunct consonant)–short–long–long, and the sequence breaks at this point.

Devshankar Naveen

> "We shall arrest the wheel of time, here, between these very eyes." [Maithili: अँटालेबसमय-चक्र, सहजहिएहिआँखिबीच]
>
> "For the sake of a new dawn, we shall resolve upon revolution." [Maithili: नबकाप्रभातलेल, क्रान्तिकोनोठानिलेब]

In simple syllabic metre the first line contains nineteen units and the second sixteen. Since the elementary counts do not agree, there is no need to spend further effort on the short–long distribution.

By quantitative calculation both lines contain twenty-five mātrās. Let us therefore examine the syllabic succession. The first line has short–long–long–short–short–short–short–long–short–short–short–short–long–short–long–short–long–short. Two successive short syllables may stand in place of one long syllable, a possibility to be compared with the second line. But in that second line, after short–short–long, the order breaks down at the letter shown in bold in the source.

Narendra

"Come out, dressed up and adorned." [Maithili: निकलूतँसजिकऽसजाकेँ]

"Beating the utensils, making them ring." [Maithili: बासनलीठोकिबजाकेँ]

Simple syllabic counting gives ten units in the first line and nine in the second. Since even these totals differ, there is no need to examine short and long syllables.

In quantitative metre the first line has thirteen mātrās and the second fourteen. Because the quantitative totals themselves disagree, further examination of short and long syllables is unnecessary.

Dr Mahendra

"A human being goes on, always, in order to keep moving." [Maithili: चलैछआदमी सदिखन चलैत रहबा लए]

"A human being lives on, always, in order to endure suffering." [Maithili: जीबैछआदमी सदिखनकलेससहबालए]

Simple syllabic counting gives eighteen units for each of these lines. But the second line of the third sher has only sixteen. In quantitative counting, moreover, the two lines cited above contain twenty-four and twenty-five units respectively.

Ramesh

"Whenever the sighing breath of the monsoon is felt—" [Maithili: जखन-जखनसाओनकओहासपड़ैए]

"Within my chest, the longing of the ghazal burns." [Maithili: हमर छातीमे गजलक लहास बरैए]

By simple syllabic counting, both lines contain sixteen units. But the first line of the second sher contains fifteen. In quantitative counting, too, the cited lines each have twenty-two mātrās. Yet the distribution of short and long syllables fails as early as the second word.

The same defects can be observed among the other ghazal writers in the collection.

In addition, some books—including Surendranath's Ghazal Hamar Hathiyar Thik ("The Ghazal Is My Weapon"), Siyaram Jha "Saras"'s

Thode Aagi Thode Pani ("A Little Fire, a Little Water"), Ramesh's Nagpheni ("Prickly Pear") and Taranand Viyogi's Apan Yuddhak Sakshya ("Testimony of One's Own War")—have been brought, as though with a stick in hand, into the post-Jayakant Mishra edition of the Sahitya Akademi's Survey of Maithili Literature as collections of ghazals. Some may find their way into the next edition of that literary history! Poems by Arvind Thakur are likewise appearing in periodicals under the designation "ghazal", extending the same tradition.

If these compositions are not ghazals, they are nonetheless verse, and they certainly deserve consideration as such. In this context, consider Rabindranath Thakur's Lekhni Ek Rang Anek ("One Pen, Many Colours"). The book appeared as a Maithili ghazal collection twenty-five years ago. His compositions, like those of Somdev and Bhramar, do not satisfy the definition espoused by the Lal Qila school. Even if they are not ghazals, their place in Maithili literature as poetry is secure. The same, however, cannot be said of the other purported collections of ghazals mentioned above.

> "One metre, one flute, one tune—for those who wish to hear." [Maithili: एकछन्द, एकबाँसुरी, एकधुनसुनयबालेऽ]
>
> "Here, take this ghazal, to hum today." [Maithili: लियौईएकगजल, आईगुनगुनयबालेऽ]

(Rabindranath Thakur, Lekhni Ek Rang Anek.)

The first misfortune of the Maithili ghazal appeared when the ghazal came to be associated exclusively with the Muslim religion, while that religion and its literature were treated as untouchable. The beginnings of the ghazal predate the coming of Islam; moreover, there are numerous similarities between the Avesta and Vedic Sanskrit. The second misfortune was Mayanand Mishra's declaration that ghazals could not be written in Maithili. Although his intention was different, others began presenting his statement in just that sense, especially because he himself composed ghazal-like poems under the name geetal. Then the online forum Anchinhar Akhar emerged in Maithili, and with it came many poets composing ghazals in proper bahr, that is, metre. The greatest misfortune, however, was that certain so-called Maithili shāírs rejected Ramdev Jha's arguments concerning bahr (see Devshankar Naveen's essay in Lokved aa Lal Qila). If we consider the contemporary scene, we can broadly distinguish two currents, which I have called two ages: the "Jeevan Age" and the "Anchinhar Age". Let us examine them in turn.

1. The Jeevan Age. I begin this age with Jeevan Jha, who is regarded as the father of the modern Maithili ghazal, although he wrote relatively few ghazals. After him came Mayanand, Indu and Rabindranath Thakur, Saras, Ramesh, Narendra, Rajendra Vimal, Dhirendra Premarshi, Roshan Janakpuri, Arvind Thakur, Surendranath, Taranand Viyogi and others who wrote ghazals. A great many compositions by Ramlochan Thakur are also ghazals, although he himself arranged them like poems and songs; some nonetheless belong in the ghazal category. The chief characteristic of the ghazal in this "Jeevan Age" was its being be-bahr— without metre. Indeed, what place can bahr have when Surendranath himself becomes entangled in the intricacies of qāfiya, or rhyme? The age has other characteristics as well. If its disposition must be expressed in a single line, it would be: "It is a ghazal, this is a ghazal, and only this is a ghazal."

2. The Anchinhar Age. Let us now turn to the "Anchinhar Age". It began with the creation of Anchinhar Akhar (http://anchinharakharkolkata.blogspot.com), the first Maithili blog devoted to ghazals and sher-o-shāīrī on the internet. After this forum, Anchinhar Akhar, I have named the period the "Anchinhar Age". Some of its characteristics are as follows.

Defining ghazal terminology and determining bahr. The credit belongs to Anchinhar Akhar*, which commissioned me to write* Maithili Ghazalshastra. This became the first treatise to examine the ghazal in terms of the particular linguistic features of Maithili. Subsequently, Ashish Anchinhar reinforced that tradition through Ghazalak Sankshipt Parichay* ("A Brief Introduction to the Ghazal"). It is a result of this work that the new generation of ghazal poets is composing within metre.

Training. Anchinhar Akhar established a tradition of instruction in the ghazal. From it emerged poets such as Sunil Kumar Jha, Deepnarayan "Vidyarthi", Roshan Jha, Praveen Chaudhary "Prateek", Tripurari Kumar Sharma, Vikas Jha "Ranjan", Sadre Alam Gauhar, Om Prakash Jha, Mihir Jha and Umesh Mandal.

The primacy of Maithili in the ghazal. Before the Anchinhar Age, ghazals were saturated with Urdu and Hindi vocabulary, and there was a prevailing belief that a ghazal could not be composed without such words. Anchinhar Akhar demolished this fallacy and publicly demonstrated the use of wholly Maithili vocabulary in the ghazal.

An award for ghazals. For the first time in Maithili literary history, Anchinhar Akhar announced a separate award for the ghazal. Its name was the "Ghazal Kamala–Kosi–Bagmati–Mahananda Award".

These four achievements yielded a final and most significant result: a rebuttal to the claim attributed to Mayanand Mishra that ghazals governed by bahr could not be composed in Maithili. Alongside simple syllabic, regulated syllabic and quantitative metres, Anchinhar Akhar offered rules and examples for writing Maithili ghazals in Persian and Urdu bahrs, employing authentic Maithili vocabulary.

The ghazal, rubāĭ, qiṭ́a, haiku, senryū, tanka, haibun, kuṇḍaliyā, dohā and rolā are all established literary forms. By "established" I mean that the techniques of composition have become settled in the languages in which these forms were originally developed. If one ignores the rules of haiku, merely renaming the result a kṣaṇikā or brief lyric will not cure its defects as a haiku. We consider bringing the ghazal, rubāĭ or qiṭ́a from another language into Maithili precisely because it represents an extraordinary achievement in its original language, and because we hope that a Maithili inflection will produce another kind of excellence. The same applies to haiku, senryū, tanka and haibun. What matters, therefore, is importing a form with care, particularly when its theoretical foundations are already strong. Why should we import it haphazardly, sit idle for a hundred years, and wait for some separate theory of its Maithili character to emerge? In that time, we might develop an entirely new literary form instead.

It is true that, through transliteration alone, the rules of the Urdu ghazal can become the rules of a ghazal written in Hindi script. Even there, differences in spelling require the formulation of many subsidiary rules for qāfiya. Maithili, however, is a distinctly different language, so those rhyme rules cannot simply be imported. In the counting of syllables and mātrās for bahr, Hindi and Urdu may themselves occasionally require special rules because of variations in the spelling of particular words; such provisions cannot simply be transplanted into Maithili either. Does that mean we should abandon the rules governing qāfiya and the quantitative or syllabic counting of bahr altogether? Or relax them so completely that they become meaningless? Would the poet who uses a proper bahr and correct qāfiya then be branded a fundamentalist, or would it be the opponent of these conventions who deserves that description? If a composition without qāfiya and bahr is not called a ghazal, does that make it worthless? It is not a ghazal—or it may be called a ghazal of the Jeevan Age—but it remains a song or poem. Mere correctness of qāfiya and bahr certainly does not make a ghazal excellent, though it increases the likelihood of excellence many times over. Conversely, if a ghazal-like composition happens to be metrically sound but employs an incorrect qāfiya, is that alone proof of excellence? I would say instead that such a work may still be excellent, although its likelihood of achieving excellence is considerably diminished.

The ghazal, rubāĭ, qiṭ́a, haiku, senryū, tanka, haibun, kuṇḍaliyā, dohā and rolā are all rule-bound forms. What service is rendered to a language by converting them into non-poetry, prose poems or songs, when non-poetry, prose poetry and song are already established categories in their own right? A short poem may be a kṣaṇikā; it is not necessarily a haiku. No particular difficulty arose in adapting the rules of kuṇḍaliyā, dohā and rolā to Maithili, because those rules could be imported directly. But for the ghazal, rubāī, qiṭà, haiku, senryū, tanka and haibun, the methods of counting syllables and mātrās cannot be carried straight over from Japanese or Urdu-Persian. Japanese writing, after all, is not alphabet-based; how, then, could one import its counting method unchanged? There is another way. Japanese also has Western-style and syllable-based representations of writing. Their syllabic representation can be compared with the counting system of Sanskrit syllabic metre, and this comparison has been used for haiku, senryū and tanka. Similarly, rules appropriate to the Maithili language were developed on a systematic basis for the ghazal, qiṭà and rubāī, allowing these forms to retain their original characteristics after entering Maithili. The subsequent quantitative and qualitative growth in Maithili ghazals and in their authors is there for the world to see.

The wazn, or metrical weight, of a line (miṣra) or its words can be determined in three ways: in simple syllabic metre, by counting syllabic units; in regulated syllabic metre, by counting the units together with their sequence of short and long values; and in quantitative metre, by attending to the short–long pattern and its mātrās. Anyone with some knowledge of singing understands that the number of words in one line of a ghazal may differ from the number in another, while the metrical weight must agree when measured by the chosen method. An independent, unmetrical (āzād, be-bahr) ghazal, on the other hand, offers no guarantee of equal weight across its words or lines. Ghazals composed in any of the three metrical systems preserve that equality. Much depends on the abilities of both the poet and the singer. For the poet, regulated syllabic metre is the most difficult, quantitative metre somewhat easier, and simple syllabic metre the easiest. For the singer, the order is reversed in part: regulated syllabic metre is easiest, quantitative metre harder, simple syllabic metre harder still, and the unmetrical āzād ghazal the most difficult of all.

Appendix 2

A Critical Theory of the Maithili Haiku, Haiku and Short Lyric

Haiku Rule 1

Now consider the first example.

Haiku Rule 2

Haiku Rule 3

Haiku Rule 4

Haiku Rule 5

Haiku Rule 6

A Haibun of Mine

"On foot, I crossed—" [Maithili: पएरे पार]

"the Kamala's current;" [Maithili: केने कमला धार,]

"today it is vast." [Maithili: आइ विशाल]

Maithili haiku. Sanskrit has seventeen-syllable metres such as Śikhariṇī, Pṛthvī, Vaṃśapatrapatitam, Mandākrāntā, Hariṇī, Hāriṇī, Naradattakam, Kokilakam and Ābhārākrāntā. These are all syllabic metres in which each line consists of seventeen counted units. Hence the seventeen syllables of the 5/7/5 sequence should be represented by seventeen syllabic units in Maithili haiku.

In Japan, the invocation of a deity in a tanka or waka prayer was arranged as 5/7/5/7/7. The senryū does not employ kireji and ranges beyond nature or the moon into humour and satire; nevertheless, its pattern, like that of haiku, consists of 5/7/5 syllables. Japanese syllables and Indian syllabic metres are comparable, so 5/7/5 syllables are treated as 5/7/5 counted units. Sanskrit seventeen-syllable metres include Śikhariṇī, Vaṃśapatrapatitam, Mandākrāntā, Hariṇī, Hāriṇī, Naradattakam, Kokilakam and Ābhārākrāntā. I have therefore adopted seventeen counted units for seventeen syllables, approaching the Japanese onji. A kireji is a word or marker at which a second thought begins; kigo is a season-related word. In Japanese, a kireji may occur in the middle or at the end of a line, including at the end of the third line when it carries the reader back to the beginning. Haiku joins two images of nature, and an accompanying form combining illustration and decoration, haiga, has also developed. The Japanese 5/7/5/7/7 tanka or waka, once used to invoke a deity, was later divided into a 5/7/5 section and a 7/7 section written by two different poets, taking a new form called renga. The collaborative practice of a single group later developed into renku. Haibun is a travel account combining brief descriptive prose and haiku verse. Bashō, a Japanese Buddhist monk and haiku poet, is identified here as the originator of haibun, through which he described his travels in Japan. To preserve the essential character of haibun, I would set an upper limit of five prose paragraphs and an equivalent number of haiku, with a lower limit of one paragraph and one haiku. The haiku comes at the end of the prose paragraph as its culmination.

Note. The senryū does not use kireji, and its concerns extend beyond nature and the moon to humour and satire. Its formal arrangement, however, remains 5/7/5 syllables, like haiku. Japanese syllables are comparable with Indian syllabic metre; thus the 5/7/5 syllables are taken as 5/7/5 counted units. Among the seventeen-syllable Sanskrit metres with seventeen counted units are Śikhariṇī, Vaṃśapatrapatitam, Mandākrāntā, Hariṇī, Hāriṇī, Naradattakam, Kokilakam and Ābhārākrāntā. Accordingly, I have taken seventeen syllables to correspond to seventeen counted units, close to the Japanese onji. Kireji means a word or marker from which another thought begins, while kigo denotes a word associated with a season. The kireji appears in the middle or at the end of a Japanese line, including at the close of the third line when it returns the reader to the opening. As haiku combines two natural images, it is also associated with the illustrated art form haiga. The Japanese tanka or waka invocation was structured 5/7/5/7/7; later, two authors wrote the 5/7/5 and 7/7 portions separately, producing renga. This collaborative form was subsequently established as renku. A haibun combines descriptive prose with haiku (5/7/5) or tanka/waka (5/7/5/7/7). All these forms are available in a competitive creative environment on Videha's Facebook group and the Maithili Haiku blog.

Bashō was a Japanese Buddhist monk and haiku poet. Accounts of journeys through Japan and images of Mount Fuji recur frequently in his poetry.

Some of Bashō's haiku are presented here.

Haiku by Bashō

1. "By the banana tree / a sign of what I detest / a smiling leper."
2. "Even a horse / catches my eye / on this snowy morning."
3. "Another year has passed / a traveller's shade above my head / straw sandals on my feet."
4. "Come, let us go now / to enjoy the snow, before / I lag behind and fall."
5. "At the first chill of winter / even a monkey longs / for a little straw coat."
6. "The breeze from Mount Fuji / I carried in my fan / a gift for the people of Edo."

7. Bashō's final poem, composed while he lay on his deathbed: "Fallen ill in the midst of a journey / my dreams wander, grown dull / around a meadow of dry grass." (Free rendering and interpretation by Preeti Thakur.)

Appendix 3

Dohā, Rolā, Kuṇḍaliyā and the Principles of Metre

Dohā

The dohā is a quantitative metre. It has two lines and four sections (caraṇas). The first section contains thirteen mātrās, the second eleven, the third thirteen and the fourth eleven. The first and third sections must not begin with a jagaṇa (short–long–short, U|U), while the second and fourth must end with a long syllable followed by a short one.

Rolā

The rolā is also a quantitative metre. It comprises four lines and eight sections. The first section has eleven mātrās, the second thirteen, the third eleven, the fourth thirteen, and the same alternating pattern continues: the fifth has eleven and the sixth thirteen. The first section of every line ends either long–short or short–short–short. The second section of every line ends with any of the following: four short syllables; two long syllables; long–short–short (the bhagaṇa, |UU); or short–short–long (the sagaṇa, UU|). A rolā should not begin with short–long–short.

Kuṇḍaliyā

The kuṇḍaliyā is a linking or combination of dohā and rolā. First compose a dohā. Then repeat the final section of the dohā—the section of eleven mātrās—as the first section of the rolā, and continue with the rolā. One must ensure that the first word of the first section of the dohā and the final word of the last section of the rolā are identical. In other words, the kuṇḍaliyā begins and ends with the same word. Its fourth and fifth sections are also identical.

On Metre

Quantitative Counting

क् + अ = क (k + short a = ka).

क् + आ = का (k + long ā = kā).

क्ति = क् + त् + इ = ० + ० + १ = १.

क्ती = क् + त् + ई = ० + ० + २ = २.

क्ष = क् + ष = ० + १.

त्र = त् + र = ० + १.

ज्ञ = ज् + ञ = ० + १.

श्र = श् + र = ० + १.

स्र = स् + र = ० + १.

शृ = श् + ऋ = ० + १.

त्व = त् + व = ० + १.

त्त्व = त् + त् + व = ० + ० + १.

Short vowel + avagraha (ऽ) = १ + ०.

Short vowel + candrabindu (ॅ) = १ + ०.

Long vowel + candrabindu (ॅ) = २ + ०.

For example, हँसल = १ + १ + १.

साँस = २ + १.

जा कऽ = २ + १.

क् = ०.

क = क् + अ = ० + १.

U is the symbol for a short syllable.

I is the symbol for a long syllable.

One long syllable (I) is equivalent in quantity to two short syllables (U U).

Syllabic Counting

1. A letter bearing a halant (virāma) = 0.

2. A conjunct consonant = 1.

3. Each letter from अ to ह = 1.

Now consider the first example.

ई अरदराक मेघ नहि मानत रहत बरसि के = 1 + 5 + 2 + 2 + 3 + 3 + 3 + 1 = 20 mātrās ("These clouds of Ārdrā will not be deterred; they will go on raining").

Now consider the second example.

पश्चात् = 2 mātrās ("afterwards").

Now consider the third example.

आब = 2 mātrās ("now").

Now consider the fourth example.

स्क्रिप्ट = 2 mātrās ("script").

The seven principal Vedic metres are Gāyatrī, Uṣṇik, Anuṣṭubh, Bṛhatī, Paṅkti, Triṣṭubh and Jagatī. The other forms are their variants, including aticchandas and vicchandas. A metre is identified through its syllables. If the prescribed syllable count is not met, one or two syllables may be added to each pāda. The conjuncts with ya and va may be separated by inserting i and u, respectively. For instance:

वरेण्यम् = वरेणियम् (vareṇyam = vareṇiyam).

स्वः = सुवः (svaḥ = suvaḥ).

The syllable count can also be completed by splitting forms produced through guṇa and vṛddhi vowel changes.

ए = अ + इ (e = a + i).

ओ = अ + उ (o = a + u).

ऐ = अ/आ + ए (ai = a/ā + e).

औ = अ/आ + ओ (au = a/ā + o).

Simple syllabic metre does not take account of the distinction between short and long syllables. Regulated syllabic metre, however, can observe this distinction, for it began to be taken into consideration in later developments from Vedic syllabic metre. Consider the following example:

"I keep looking towards this cloud." [Maithili: तकैत रहैत छी ऐ मेघ दिस] तकैत (takait): short + long + long; three syllabic units.

रहैत (rahait): short + long + short; three syllabic units.

छी (chhī): long; one syllabic unit.

ऐ (ai): long; one syllabic unit.

मेघ (megh): long + short; two syllabic units.

दिस (diś): short + short; two syllabic units.

In quantitative metre, the divisions known as dvikal, trikal, catuṣkal, pañcakal and ṣaṭkal may comprise anywhere from one syllabic unit (a single long syllable) to six units (six short syllables).

A dvikal contains a total of two mātrās: one long syllable or two short ones.

A trikal contains three mātrās, in any of three arrangements: short + long, long + short, or short + short + short.

A catuṣkal has four mātrās, a pañcakal five and a ṣaṭkal six.

In regulated syllabic metre there are eight types of three-syllable groups; they can be memorised through the mnemonic "यमाताराजसलगम्" (yamātārājasalagam).

The number of pādas, the placement of pauses (yati) and the provision of end-rhyme can be determined through syllabic or quantitative principles, allowing the poet to introduce variety in the sequence.

In syllabic metre, a group of three syllables is called a gaṇa. There are eight such groups:

Yagaṇa — UII (short–long–long).

Ragaṇa — IUI (long–short–long).

Tagaṇa — ||U (long–long–short).

Bhagaṇa — |UU (long–short–short).

Jagaṇa — U|U (short–long–short).

Sagaṇa — UU| (short–short–long).

Magaṇa — ||| (long–long–long).

Nagaṇa — UUU (short–short–short).

Besides these eight, there are two further units: ga and la.

The ga-gaṇa consists of a single long syllable (|).

The la-gaṇa consists of a single short syllable (U).

One mnemonic for remembering all eight groups is:

यमाताराजभानसलगम् (yamātārājabhānasalagam).

Let us divide this mnemonic into its components:

यमाता (yamātā) — U|| = yagaṇa.

मातारा (mātārā) — ||| = magaṇa.

ताराज (tārāja) — ||U = tagaṇa.

राजभा (rājabhā) — |U| = ragaṇa.

जभान (jabhāna) — U|U = jagaṇa.

भानस (bhānasa) — |UU = bhagaṇa.

नसल (nasala) — UUU = nagaṇa.

सलगम् (salagam) — UU| = sagaṇa.

10. Dramatic Literature, Parallel Maithili Drama and Theatre, and the Critical Theory of Dramatic Literature

Abstract

Ramkhelawan Mandal came from Katghatra village in Shivajinagar Block, Samastipur district; Bindeshwar Mandal was associated with him. People still remember the rising Maithili chorus and the song, "Mother, O mother, buy me a gun, for I shall become a soldier, mother." This troupe staged verse-dramas such as Reshma–Chuhar, Sheet–Basant, Alha–Udal, and Natua Dayal.

Keywords: drama · parallel tradition · plays · theatre · literary criticism · Maithili

4

A Parallel World of Maithili Theatre

Ramkhelawan Mandal came from Katghatra village in Shivajinagar Block, Samastipur district; Bindeshwar Mandal was associated with him. People still remember the rising Maithili chorus and the song, "Mother, O mother, buy me a gun, for I shall become a soldier, mother." The troupe presented verse-dramas including Reshma–Chuhar, Sheet–Basant, Alha–Udal, and Natua Dayal. The Piya Desantar (Maithili Bidesiya) troupe came from Purnia to places including Supaul, Saharsa, and Samastipur. The short play Hasan–Husan was also performed. The Ramraksha Chaudhary Natya Kala Parishad of Gayghat village, Kariyan Panchayat, post office Baidyanathpur, Samastipur district, took its production of Vidyapati as far as Gorakhpur. Its other productions included Laungiya Merchai, Vidyapati, Chinik Laddu, and Basat.

The performative element predominated in Ankiya Nat. Kirtaniya was in one sense a musical form, yet acting was central to it too. An Ankiya play began with the beating of the mridanga.

Every literary genre may be understood in two modes, lokadharmi and natyadharmi: the former relates to the everyday or vernacular, the latter to the classical or codified mode of expression. The vernacular mode is not simply "a play performed in a village," as some mistakenly assume; it signifies an avoidance of artificiality. Nor is it correct to suppose that village drama must necessarily be inferior. In lokadharmi performance, natural behaviour and ordinary human action predominate, bodily gestures are unadorned, and the cast, whether women or men, can be very large. In natyadharmi performance, speech may be expressed inwardly, through signs, or as an offstage voice. Dance, exceptional modes of dialogue, music set to rāgas, and divine figures alongside ordinary characters belong to it. Inanimate things and animals may speak; an actor may perform double or triple roles; and music may intensify the emotional force of joy or grief.

Vedic narratives, the Jātaka stories, Aesop's fables, the Panchatantra, and the Hitopadesha developed alongside living traditions of popular balladry. Everywhere, the stories of privileged classes have existed beside folk narratives. Words such as shithir, dulabh, and indar in the Rigveda testify to the literary adoption of speech from the people. Although early forms can be traced from Ashokan inscriptions to the thirteenth century CE, the Prakrit languages discussed here in their more specific literary sense served, from approximately the first through the sixth centuries CE, two purposes. First, in Sanskrit literary drama, Shauraseni, Maharashtri, and Magadhi were used for common people and female characters; Vararuchi adds Paishachi as a fourth Prakrit. Examples occur in Kalidasa's Abhijnanashakuntalam and Malavikagnimitram, Shudraka's Mrichchhakatikam, Shriharsha's Ratnavali, Bhavabhuti's Uttararāmacarita, and Vishakhadatta's Mudrarakshasa. Second, these Prakrits subsequently became independent literary languages. They, too, were confined by grammatical rules and acquired increasingly ornate usages, while people turned to Apabhramsha and Avahattha; evidence also survives of Apabhramsha being used alongside Prakrit. Broadly, Shauraseni was employed in prose, Maharashtri in verse, and Magadhi–Ardhamagadhi in religious literature. Women and jesters in drama spoke Shauraseni but sang verse in Maharashtri, while characters designated by the hierarchy of the time as belonging to lower social orders spoke Magadhi.

Maithili Dramatic Literature and Its Critical Theory

Children and adults learn through drama, seeking to understand people and their surroundings. Plays once associated with temple festivals or royal palaces acquired an independent existence; drama also came to be employed in teaching other subjects. This made the participation of specialists from other fields necessary. Drama is both an autonomous subject and a means of application. The relationship between traditional and professional theatre, exemplary productions, stage design, and the performance of actual plays will together constitute a history of theatre. Before that can happen, however, an elementary knowledge of theatre and the habit of reading plays must be cultivated. As one reads, the work should also be analysed from the standpoint of stage management and acting. Engagement with drama and theatre can help children and adults become responsible, economically self-reliant, and active citizens.

The Natyashastra traces the origin of drama to the festival of Indra's banner. It identifies two dramatic subjects or representations: (1) the Churning of the Ocean of Nectar and (2) Shiva's Burning of Tripura.

Bharata had approximately ten forms of dramatic representation—the dasharupaka—incorporating dance, music, and acting; beyond these ten forms there were songs intended to be heard.

In the fifth century BCE, Panini mentioned Shilalin and Krishashva, who had compiled the Natasutras. Nata signifies an actor and ranga a theatre or stage. Bharata, Shilalin, and Krishashva are also given as synonymous designations associated with the nata.

Maithili drama, hitherto more strongly connected with dance and music and only marginally with painting and handicrafts, is now, through interventions by parallel theatre, establishing relations with physics, biology, history, geography, and literature. Those efforts should be strengthened.

Jyotirishwar's Dhurttasamagama, Vidyapati's Gorakshavijaya, Kirtaniya plays, Ankiya Nat, Munshi Raghunandan Das's Mithila Natak, Jeevan Jha's Sundar Sanyog, Ishanath Jha's Chinik Laddu, Govind Jha's Basat, Manipadma's Tesar Kaniya, Nachiketa's Nayakak Nam Jeevan and Ek Chhal Raja, Shreesh Ji's Purushartha, Sudhanshu Shekhar Chaudhary's Bhafait Chahak Jingi, Rambharos Kapari 'Bhramar' 's Mahishasur Murdabad, Gangesh Gunjan's Budhibadhiya, and Nachiketa's No Entry: Ma Pravish: from the absurdity of Jyotirishwar's Dhurttasamagama to the postmodern absurdity of No Entry: Ma Pravish, a circle in the history of Maithili drama has been completed.

Among the characteristics of postmodernism are the emergence of several identities from a single individual; the inability to arrive at an event's complete meaning; and the uncertainty of when truth may become falsehood. Superficial thinking and a proliferation of such characters appear in postmodernism. There is neither optimism nor, properly speaking, pessimism. What remains is a kind of madness: the recognition that a thing can be thought of in many different ways. Faith is placed less in outcomes determined by causes, control, and planning than in those produced by chance. Republican and feminist perspectives, the red flag, and other ideological symbols become objects of playful ridicule; hence feminism and Marxism have opposed the postmodern outlook. Judgements of good and bad repeatedly lose their certainty. Everyone lives behind a mask.

A comparative study of Indian and Western dramatic theory demonstrates how much human thought may have in common despite geographical distance. Indian dramaturgy rests principally on Bharata's Natyashastra and Dhananjaya's Dasharupaka; Aristotle's Poetics is the authoritative text of Western dramatic theory. Bharata describes drama in terms of the imitation of action and emotion, while Dhananjaya defines it as the imitation of a condition or state. In Indian poetics, imitation belongs to the actor's work, not the poet's. In the Western account, imitation is the poet's activity, while the actor receives little or no discussion. Aristotle gives special weight to plot. Tragedy comprises, besides plot, character, diction, thought, spectacle, and song. Bharata calls the plot associated with the hero the principal or adhikarika plot and the narrative that helps it the subsidiary or prasangika plot. Not every play, however, needs a subsidiary plot. In the postmodern No Entry: Ma Pravish, there is neither a conventionally principal nor a subsidiary plot: the protagonist is not an accepted or universal hero. No character is simply weak; all respond and rebound according to time and circumstance. In relation to its subject matter, a plot may be prakhyata (well known), utpadya (invented), or mishra (mixed). The first draws on history and the Puranas, the second on invention, and the third combines the two. Aristotle divides plots into simple and complex and relates narrative material to legend, invention, and history. His tragic character is distinguished and noble, a mixture of good and evil. Bharata calls a hero given to dance and music dhiralalita, one of peaceful disposition dhiraprashanta, one of heroic or warrior-like disposition dhirodatta, and a jealous or arrogant hero dhiroddhata. Indian theory describes five stages of action: beginning (arambha), effort (prayatna), prospect of attainment (praptyasha), certainty of attainment (niyatapti), and fruition (phalagama). At the stage of praptyasha, disappointment about the result may arise; at niyatapti, hope returns. Western dramatic theory speaks of exposition, development of the action, climax, denouement, and final outcome: the first three complicate the action and the last two resolve it. The five arthaprakritis, or plot-elements, are seed (bija), drop (bindu), banner (pataka), episode (prakari), and action or result (karya); pataka and prakari belong to subordinate narratives. The mature form of the seed is the completed action. Aristotle speaks of beginning, middle, and end. Consider now the sandhis, or dramatic junctures: mukha joins the seed with the beginning; pratimukha joins the drop with effort; garbha joins the banner with the prospect of attainment; vimarsha joins the episode with certainty of attainment; and nirvahana joins fruition with the completed action. Western theory seeks unity of place, time, and action. Abhinavagupta holds that a single act should not encompass more than a day's action, nor should two acts contain events extending beyond a year. Dryden opposed the three unities and defended the greater freedom of Shakespeare's plays.

Indian theorists defended the visual or performative character of drama, whereas Plato and Aristotle opposed it. In the sixteenth century, Ludovico Castelvetro defended the importance of performance; Ditetart also defended the visual aspect, while Dryden is said to defend the reading of plays. Dacier defended both readability and visibility. Abhinavagupta likewise held that rasa is fully savoured after enactment, although reading can also yield an experience of rasa. Western stage practice is described as realistic and Indian theatrical practice as symbolic. Thus in Abhijnanashakuntalam, Kalidasa writes iti sharasandhanam natayati —"he acts as if fitting an arrow to the bow." Samuel Johnson wrote about comic and tragic elements in Shakespeare. Plato maintained that art cannot be good because it is false and unreal. His view should also be considered in the context of Athens' military weaknesses relative to Sparta. He opposed poetry and drama on the ground that memorising and repeating dialogue might attract people towards an artificial life. Aristotle, by contrast, does not see poetry as imitation alone: it also contains philosophy and universal truth. He associates tragedy and imitation with a release following pleasure, pity, and fear. Dialogue may take the form of an address or of conversation; conversation will contain less philosophical matter. In ancient Greece, poetry was understood as a message from the gods. Aristophanes distinguished good and bad poetry, while Theophrastus identified harsh, excellent, and grand kinds. Poetry and music are inseparable; European symphonies, in which many instruments play together in differing rhythms, introduced theoretical differences. Such matters also apply to the theatrical stage. A play must combine emotionally charged dialogue and action. Jeevan Jha is remembered in Maithili dramatic literature for the innovations he introduced in subject matter and craft, and for his effective combination of Sanskrit and Parsi elements.

Postmodernism. At many points it rejects the rationality and objectivity associated with modernity and criticises the supposed completeness of scientific knowledge. What we see need not be true; it may be a dream. Each person narrates truth and falsehood from a particular perspective. Postmodernism is often self-centred and humorous, while the distinction between good and bad repeatedly dissolves. People live behind masks, the complete meaning of events eludes them, and there is no certainty about when truth may become untruth. Postmodern theatre is crowded with superficial thought and such characters; it is neither optimistic nor wholly pessimistic. What persists is a kind of madness and the conviction that one thing admits many interpretations. Outcomes are attributed less to causal design, control, and planning than to chance. Republican and feminist viewpoints, the red flag, and other ideological signs appear as objects of symbolic humour. Spectators recognise themselves in the many problems raised within the plot. The conflicts in these plays are the conflicts that people confront repeatedly in their own lives.

Bharata's Natyashastra

The Sangeet Natak Akademi organised its first National Theatre Festival in 1956, opening with Kalidasa's Sanskrit Abhijnanashakuntalam, presented by the Goa Brahman Sabha. Stage settings and costumes should be studied with reference to the period in which a play is set. Several celebrated Parsi-theatre productions, including Inder Sabha, Alam Ara, and Khonne Nahak (based on Shakespeare's Hamlet), were also made into films.

There are two kinds of drama, lokadharmi and natyadharmi: the former is vernacular, the latter a classical mode of expression. Natyadharmi practice is founded upon lokadharmi. Refine the vernacular mode, and it becomes the classical mode.

Lokadharmi has two varieties: chittavrttyarpika, concerned with inner happiness and sorrow, and bahyavastvanukarini, imitating external objects such as ponds and lotus pools. Natyadharmi likewise has two varieties: kaishiki shobha, displaying bodily grace and the splendour of song, dance, and music; and amshopajivani, the symbolic presentation of the Pushpaka aerial chariot, hills, forests, and the like. Acting as a whole is divided into angika (bodily), vachika (verbal), sattvika (expressing inward feeling), and aharya (costume, stage setting, and other visible means). Angika employs the body, face, and gestures; vachika employs the speech of gods, kings, non-Aryan figures, animals, and birds. The sattvika modes include stambha (immobility under joy, fear, or sorrow); sveda (sweating or associated expressions, such as clutching the head to suppress an overwhelming feeling); romancha (horripilation); svarabhanga (a broken or heavy voice, with tears in the eyes); vepathu (trembling); vaivarnya (pallor); ashru (tears falling repeatedly); and pralaya (collapse or a state represented by lying as a corpse). Aharya includes pusta (stage constructions of elephants, tigers, mountains, and similar objects), alankara (dress and ornaments), angarachana (colour, moustaches, costume, and hair), and sanjiva (the representation of living beings—snakes without legs, two-legged humans and birds, and four-legged animals). Two further forms are samanya abhinaya (general acting, discussed in Chapter 22 of the Natyashastra) and chitrabhinaya (pictorial acting, also attributed here to Chapter 22). After the fourfold classification, general acting is described as a synthesis of bodily, verbal, and emotional acting, with sattvika predominating. Pictorial acting is associated with angika: bodily movements evoke the image of mountains, ponds, birds, and other objects. For the staging and direction of plays, Kalidasa's Abhijnanashakuntalam is essential reading. Stage directions such as rathavegam nirupya ("indicating the speed of the chariot"), suta pashyainam vyapadyamanam ("charioteer, see him being struck down"), iti sharasandhanam natayati ("acts the fitting of an arrow"), vrikshasechanam rupayati ("represents watering a tree"), kalasham avarjayati ("tilts or empties a water-pot"), mukham asyah samunnamayitum icchati ("wishes to raise her face"), Shakuntala pariharati natyena ("Shakuntala resists by acting"), and natyena prasadhayatah ("they adorn her through acting") mean that these actions are suggested through performance rather than literally carried out. In the last example, Anasuya and Priyamvada mime the adornment of their friend Shakuntala, either because the cosmetics are unavailable or because the scene cannot accommodate the time required. Similarly, the other directions call for miming irrigation, the emptying of the pot, fast travel by chariot, drawing the bow, seeing the threatened deer, Dushyanta's attempt to lift Shakuntala's face, and her response in resisting him.

Bharata's stage. Its elements include a rear curtain; the nepathya or backstage dressing room; entrance and exit doors; special curtains concealing these entrances and exits; the vedika, a platform in the middle of the stage for the musicians; the rangashirsha, an area towards the rear; the mattavarani, spaces for acting near the two front corners; and the rangapitha, the principal performance area at the front.

Evaluating acting: theatrical criticism. In Chapter 27 Bharata identifies success as the aim of performance: a staging should achieve its full effect. When an audience exclaims, "Yes!", "Bravo!", or "What a tragic ending!", its members are sahridaya, responsive spectators in Bharata's terminology, participating imaginatively in the playwright's and the characters' experience. Dramatic competitions were held, and adjudicators awarded prizes. Bharata established criteria for assigning positive and negative marks. Faults of acting and performance include: (1) lack of concentration; (2) speaking another character's dialogue; (3) a personality unsuited to the role; (4) failures of memory; (5) assuming a manner inconsistent with one's part; (6) dropping a prop or object; (7) stumbling in speech; (8) grammatical and other errors; (9) inadequate execution; (10) musical errors; (11) faults in verbal delivery; (12) lack of foresight; (13) inadequate materials; (14) deficient make-up; (15) a playwright's or director's insertion of a passage from another play; and (16) language that is neither simple nor clear. Judges must represent different fields and remain impartial. They should assess the whole effect of a play, its continuity, the relative proportions of its qualities, and the representation of feeling. The stage manager—the sutradhara—and the assistant, the pariparshvaka, must understand all aspects of drama. The leading actress should be skilled in music and acting; the leading actor or hero brings the performance to success through his abilities. Actors should be cast according to their physical and verbal characteristics: a person of small stature might be assigned the part of a valiant speaker, a thin and frail person the role of a servant, and an accomplished talker that of a jester. The director of the musical ensemble, the taurika, must command every aspect of music in order to direct the instrumentalists or kushilavas.

Maithili drama. Much has been said about the continuity between ancient and modern Maithili and other theatrical traditions. The fact remains, however, that nowhere in India or Nepal is there a theatrical space or a scheme of dramatic representation preserved exactly as described in Bharata's Natyashastra. Its restoration is a formidable task, but parallel theatre has attempted it. A shortened production of Kalidasa's drama prepared without adequate knowledge can generate serious controversy. Maithili theatre has the possibility of staging uparupakas through an understanding of folk theatre based on the Natyashastra. The Videha Theatre Festival of 2012, directed by Bechan Thakur, was an attempt in this direction.

Towards a Critical Theory of Maithili Drama and Theatre

Prose narratives are classified by their length as short-short stories, stories, and novels. In that context, the verse transformation of a novel—or, in some instances, of drama—may be called an epic. If one goes back to the Rigvedic tradition, an epic should be called a gita-prabandha, a composition in song. The exchanges between Lakshmana and Parashurama, Manthara and Kaikeyi, or Ravana and Angada offer engaging verse resembling dramatic dialogue. Stories, tales, narratives, novels, and, to a degree, plays and one-act plays are listened to, recited, read, or performed for entertainment. They may have a purpose, or they may contain purposelessness and absurdity: even apparently purposeless literature affords enjoyment amid the bustle of life.

A one-act play is an ekanki; a play in the broader sense is a natak. By reducing the scope for dialogue or placing dialogue before the dramatic presentation, a short-short story or story may be made more forceful; otherwise it can turn into a one-act or full-length play. For Bharata, a drama produces rasa through its effect. What is a drama for? For the performance of rasa, and also for its production. How does rasa arise? Through its determinants (vibhava), its consequent expressions (anubhava), and the accompanying or transitory states (vyabhichari bhava). A durable emotion (sthayi-bhava), intensified and brought to maturity, becomes rasa, which we can savour.

From a translator's standpoint, drama is the most difficult form of creative literature, followed by poetry and then narrative fiction. In a play one must identify the background and implicit meanings, while also understanding the psychology of the characters. Kalidasa's Sanskrit plays employed Apabhramsha alongside Sanskrit for characters outside the elite; the language of the Charyapadas was likewise an Apabhramsha mixed with Magadhi.

There is an urgent need to ensure that casteist expressions are not employed in Maithili drama and theatre to insult anyone. Old folktales or narratives can be made appropriate to a new context only when the playwright has the necessary ability. Drama and theatre could become instruments for overcoming caste divisions and producing harmony, but how can they do so unless people see the productions? This requires talented playwrights and directors capable of presenting complex issues intelligibly. Neither the subject alone nor entertainment alone is a measure of excellence. Maithili has already experienced the consequences of the games played by casteist theatre in the name of entertainment. A balance must be struck among the problem, its resolution, entertainment, and artistic form.

Modern Maithili Drama: Theatre Organisations and Directors

Dhurttasamagama. Written by Jyotirishwar Thakur in the thirteenth century, this work survives in Sanskrit and Maithili. Maithili songs are incorporated even into Jyotirishwar's Sanskrit* Dhurttasamagama. It belongs to the genre of prahasana*, or farce. Most Maithili plays and dramatic pieces of the period drew on the lives of Krishna or his descendants, often using abduction or* svayamvara as their narrative basis. The principal figures of Dhurttasamagama*, by contrast, are an ascetic and his disciple. Every character is a rogue of the highest order, making the title —"A Gathering of Rogues"—entirely appropriate. As the farce is also related to music, its inclusion of Maithili songs is fitting. The main characters are the* sutradhara*, an actress, the graduate disciple (Snataka), Vishwanagar, Mritangara, Suratpriya, Anangasenā, Asajjati Mishra, Bandhuvanchaka, Mulanashaka, and a townsman. The stage manager first praises the Karnata ruler Narasimhadeva, and then Jyotirishwar himself. There is an essentially modern absurdity in the play, and its flexibility gives it the character of folk theatre. Vishwanagar is celibate for want of a woman. He and his disciple Snataka visit the house of Mritangara Thakur in search of alms, but are turned away on the pretext of ritual impurity following a death or birth. They then go to Suratpriya's house. A quarrel breaks out between the master and the disciple over a courtesan named Anangasenā. They take her to Asajjati Mishra, a lecher who regards gambling and sexual pleasure as the essence of the world. "Who is the plaintiff and who the defendant?" asks Mishra. Snataka replies: "I am the plaintiff for presenting the complaint, and the ascetic is the defendant because he will pay the fee." Vishwanagar offers Snataka's bundle of cannabis as his payment. The jester whispers into Asajjati Mishra's ear, praising Anangasenā's sexuality. Asajjati Mishra places Anangasenā between the two rivals and pronounces judgement in his own favour. The jester then whispers to her: "This ascetic is poor, Snataka is a wastrel, and Mishra is a fool. Stay with me instead." Looking around at all four, Anangasenā exclaims, "This truly has become a gathering of rogues!" Vishwanagar and Snataka once more head towards Suratpriya's house. Meanwhile, Mulanashaka the barber asks Anangasenā for a year's earnings or payment. She sends him to Asajjati Mishra. Assuming that Mishra is Anangasenā's husband, Mulanashaka accepts cannabis as his fee, binds him, and gives him such a violent massage that he faints. Believing him dead, the barber runs away. The jester arrives, unties Mishra, and asks, "I have saved your life; is there anything else you would like me to do?" Asajjati replies: "Through deception I have consumed an entire country; through roguery I obtained this beloved woman, and I have also gained an obedient disciple like you. Nothing could please me more. Still, may happiness and peace prevail everywhere."

Gorakshavijaya, by Vidyapati Thakur.* Before this play—with the exception of Dhurttasamagama*—dramas centred on Krishna were customary. In this respect* Gorakshavijaya* may also be called a revolutionary play. Its plot is constructed around Gorakhnath, the yogi associated with the Nath or Goraksha order. Gorakhnath's teacher Matsyendranath has abandoned yoga, become king of Kadalipur, and given himself over to pleasure with eighteen queens. A gatekeeper prevents Goraksha and Kananipada from entering. The minister orders a proclamation that no yogi is to be admitted anywhere, and the queens are instructed to keep the king enchanted. Goraksha and Kananipada disguise themselves as performers and present a captivating dance before the king. Meanwhile, the king's only son, Bodhnath, dies while playing. The king suspects the performers and orders them killed. They restore the child to life. When the king asks who they are, they remind him of everything concerning his former life: he is a yogi, not a man of sensual indulgence. The characters include Mahamati, the king's minister, and Mahadevi, Matsyendranath's senior queen. Matsyendranath, king of Kadalipur, had been a yogi in his previous life. At the end, he declares: "May every disciple be like Goraksha, and every woman like Mahadevi."

Jeevan Jha

Jeevan Jha wrote four plays: Sundar Sanyog (1904), Maithili Sattak (1906), Narmada Sagar Sattak (1906), and Samavati Punarjanma (1908). Several performances of these plays took place before 1920 at the Samaveda School in Kashi; Sundar Sanyog was also published there. Other performances of Sundar Sanyog include the following. In 1974, during Durga Puja, it was staged on the premises of Lakshminarayan High School at Malimodtar, near the Hasanpur sugar mill, directed by Shri Kalikant Jha "Booch"; the chief guest was Shri Fazlur Rahman Hashmi. The organisers included Devnandan Pathak, chief engineer, and Akeshnandan Pathak, an auditor also called Tika Babu, and the inauguration was by Udit Rai, the mukhiya. It was performed in 1976 at Kariyan, Samastipur, under the direction of Kamdev Pathak. In 1981 it was staged at Pandit Tola, Tabhka, near Dalsinghsarai, coordinated by Dr Umendra Jha "Vimal", a former pro-vice-chancellor of Kameshwar Singh Sanskrit University. Mahamahopadhyaya Chitradhar Mishra, officiant at the Shankar temple within Darbhanga Fort, whose pupils included Mahamahopadhyaya Umesh Mishra and Mahamahopadhyaya Ganganath Jha. Another performance is recorded in 1983 at Mau Bajitpur, near Vidyapatinagar.

These plays by Jeevan Jha, imbued with elements of the Sanskrit tradition and Parsi theatre, were performed at many other places as well.

It is propaganda by casteist theatre to claim that Malangiya Ji's organisation would give these plays their first performance; these plays had already been staged repeatedly before Malangiya Ji was born. There is concern that the organisation's rewriting of Sundar Sanyog might itself make the work casteist by combining what he describes as Malangiya's supposedly invented raar-speaking Maithili, Brahminical-feudal Maithili, and a corrupted Hindi of the "khaderan ki madar" or "bujhta hai ki nahin" variety. This false claim about a premiere is being circulated to secure government funding for Malangiya's theatre.

Ishanath Jha

Ugana. These plays are staged on Mahashivaratri at the Gaurishankar shrine in Jamthuri. Vidyapati was a devotee of Shiva. To hear his songs of devotion, or* nachari*, Mahadeva entered his house in the guise of a servant named Ugana. Once, when Vidyapati was travelling with Ugana, he became thirsty. Ugana drew water from the Ganga flowing through his matted hair and gave it to Vidyapati. Recognising the taste of Ganga water and seeing Ugana's wet hair, Vidyapati understood everything. Ugana revealed his true form but warned him not to tell anyone or he would vanish. Parvati then devised a stratagem. Vidyapati's wife sent Ugana to fetch* bel* leaves and, when he was late, raised a broom against him. Vidyapati disclosed the secret, and Ugana disappeared.

Chinik Laddu (Sugar Laddus). After the death of Sudhakant and Premkant's father, their maternal uncle Dharmanand looks after them as a trustee. When the brothers grow capable of managing their affairs, he hands responsibility to Sudhakant and leaves. Sudhakant's clerk Batua Das, aided by Premkant's wife Chandika and the maid Chhulahi, engineers a partition of the estate. Sudhakant even gives his own share to Premkant. He, his wife Sushila, and their son Sukumar are expelled from the house.

Sudhakant dies of tuberculosis. Association with Batua Das also impoverishes Premkant. Dharmanand, who has no children, bequeaths his estate to Sukumar. Premkant and Batua Das attempt to murder Sukumar by sending him a gift of sugar laddus mixed with poison. Instead, Batua Das dies from them, and the plot is exposed.

Uday Narayan Singh "Nachiketa"

Nayakak Nam Jeevan (The Hero's Name Is Life). Naval is a man of new ideas; Shaktiray is wealthy and depraved. Shaktiray accuses his associate Vinay of theft and arranges the kidnapping and rape of Vinay's daughter. Vinay takes his own life. Naval and his friends Prakash and Deepak reveal the truth. The young woman Naval loves dies by suicide as a consequence of the assault, and Naval suffers a mental breakdown.

Ek Chhal Raja (Once There Was a King). A king, Abhiman Kumar Dev, wastes his days on alcohol and courtesans. He has only one daughter, Mohini, whose marriage cannot take place because of financial hardship. The play proceeds through the roles of the clerk Biranchi, the servant Chatur Lal, and the king's religiously observant wife. Mohini and a teacher named Shubhankar fall in love.

No Entry: Ma Pravish. This postmodern drama returns, in its absurdity, to Jyotirishwar's* Dhurttasamagama*. The dead arrive at what appears to be the gate of heaven or hell and recount their stories. Eventually it is revealed that Chitragupta and Dharmaraja are impostors, and the gate is locked: "No Entry."

Govind Jha

*Basat. Krishnakant refuses to marry Pushpa, the young woman selected by his father; he wants an educated wife and falls in love with Lily. His father leaves home. Pushpa also leaves and devotes herself to women's awakening. Unable to find his father, Krishnakant abandons Lily and attempts to die beneath a train. People from an ashram save him. At the ashram he meets his father and Pushpa, while Lily, who has also lost her mental balance, arrives there.

Sudhanshu Shekhar Chaudhary

Bhafait Chahak Jingi (Life in Steaming Tea). Mahesh is unemployed and opens a tea stall; he is also a poet. Chandrama, the wife of the engineer Umanath, sees him at the stall. When Mahesh is called away to recite poetry, Chandrama begins selling tea. Umanath becomes angry. Mahesh's friend Sarita, the wife of an Indian Administrative Service officer, arrives.

*Letait Anchar. Dinanath's only daughter, Mamata, has been abandoned by her husband on account of her father's poverty. Later, when Dinanath attempts to secure a dowry at the wedding of his son Modnath, the son restrains him.

II. Maithili Haiku, Haikū, and Kshanika

Abstract

Haiku is a Japanese poetic form concerned with beauty and feeling. It was established as an independent poetic form in Japan by the poet Matsuo Bashō (1644–1694). Its composition demands profound experience. Bashō is said to have declared that a person who writes three to five haiku in a lifetime is a haiku poet, while one who writes ten is a great poet.

Keywords: haiku · haikū · kshanika · critical theory · Maithili

Haiku is a Japanese poetic form concerned with beauty and feeling. It was established as an independent poetic form in Japan by the poet Matsuo Bashō (1644–1694). Its composition demands profound experience. Bashō is said to have declared that a person who writes three to five haiku in a lifetime is a haiku poet, while one who writes ten is a great poet. In India, Rabindranath Tagore was the first to make literal translations of two haiku by Bashō, after returning from Japan in 1919.

The Maithili language and the Indian script systems derived from Sanskrit are exceptionally suitable for haiku. With the exception of Tamil, the scripts of southern India and of northern, western, and eastern India, including Devanagari, share a pattern of vowels and the five consonantal series—ka, cha, ṭa, ta, and pa—in which pronunciation follows spelling. The short vowel i appears to be an exception in Devanagari: it is written before the consonant but pronounced after it. In Maithili, however, even this is no exception: अछि (achhi) is pronounced as a followed by a short i and chh, or a-i-chh. Take another example: राति (rāti) may be separated as rā-i-ta. This proves that Maithili is the best language for haiku. Consider another illustration. Is sandhi a peculiarity of Sanskrit? Does English have no such joining of sounds? What, then, is "I'm going towards the end," when written as "I am going towards the end"? Panini formulated the rules of sandhi on the basis of phonetics. In English, the joining is not consistently reflected in conventional writing—although "I am" may be rendered phonetically as "I'm"—but it occurs in speech. In Maithili, too, case-endings are, wherever possible, written and pronounced together with their words.

In Japan, invocatory tanka or waka prayers followed a 5–7–5–7–7 pattern. Later, two authors composed the 5–7–5 and 7–7 portions separately, producing a new form called renga. Courtly renga assumed a solemn air; a less solemn variety belonged to the mercantile classes. Bashō composed the latter. A renga began with a hokku, while haikai could designate another of its verses. Masaoka Shiki proclaimed the end of renga in the early nineteenth century and consolidated hokku and haikai into the form called haiku. Bashō, however, had already given that form an independent identity.

Haiku Rule 1

Write a haiku in seventeen syllabic units. It is written in three lines, arranged 5–7–5. Count the syllabic units as in varnika chhand, or syllabic metre.

In counting syllabic metre, reckon a conjunct consonant as one unit. Do not count a halant, a supplementary vowel mark or bikari, or the vowel signs for i, ā, and the like separately.

Literature has two modes, prose and verse. A composition governed by metre is verse; otherwise it is prose. Chhand, or metre, denotes a composition that gives pleasure.

There are two kinds of metre: quantitative (matrika) and syllabic (varnika). The Vedas employ syllabic metres.

Consider syllabic metre. Only the number of syllabic units is counted. A consonant marked with halant is not separately counted. A syllable with the signs for e, u, or other vowels counts as one, just as a conjunct consonant does. Letters from a through ha likewise count as one each. No unit is given a double value. Remember principally three points:

1. A consonant with halant: 0. 2. A conjunct syllable: 1. 3. Each letter from a to ha: 1.

Now examine the first example:

ई अरदराक मेघ नहि मानत रहत बरसि के — "These clouds of Ardra will not stop raining"; count: 1 + 5 + 2 + 2 + 3 + 3 + 1 = 17 units.

Now the second example: पश्चात् (pashchāt) = 2 units. Consider a third example:

आब (āb, "now") = 2 units. And the fourth: स्क्रिप्ट (script) = 2 units.

Haiku Rule 2

Satire is not the subject of haiku; its subject is the season. In Japan, the form employed for satire and human frailty is called senryū, and it has neither the grammatical cutting pause, kireji, nor the seasonal word, kigo.

Haiku Rule 3

In Japanese haiku a kireji, or grammatical cutting pause, is placed after the first five or the second seven sound units.

Haiku Rule 4

Japanese has no such distinction of gender and number. It is therefore appropriate to maintain the same number-form in Maithili as well.

Haiku Rule 5

In Japanese, the 5–7–5 sound units may be presented in a single line. In Maithili, however, use three lines for the three sound-groups of 5, 7, and 5. In recitation, apart from the kireji pause—marked here by a semicolon—it is appropriate to read the poem in a single breath.

Haiku Rule 6

A haibun is a travel account combining brief descriptive prose with haiku verse. Bashō, a Japanese Buddhist monk and haiku poet, is presented as its initiator; he recorded his travels through Japan in haibun. Let us set an upper limit of five paragraphs and as many haiku, so that the spirit of haibun may be preserved. A lower limit of one prose paragraph and one haiku is naturally possible. The haiku comes at the close of the prose paragraph as its culminating moment.

A Haibun of My Own

Ahead is the combined railway and road bridge at Jhanjharpur. The year is 1987. The waters of the Kamala–Balan surge and roar: a scene of flooding. I return towards the embankment. Before me, at one point, water bursts forth with a turbulent noise. Then the stream begins cutting away the earth at that place. The flow grows stronger; the flood comes. I turn back towards the village. Supplies are being dropped from a helicopter. Where floodwater has spread, very little dry, raised ground remains on which to drop supplies. Crowds gather at those few places. At the sight of the helicopter there is a commotion. An accident is feared. The helicopter does not drop food there. It moves farther on and drops supplies where, in ordinary times, lack of water brings drought but where the flood has now provided irrigation. Here there is no fear of an accident. I saw all this with my own eyes, in 1987.

Once crossed on foot—
the current of the Kamala, immense today.

English haiku by Mrs Jyoti Jha Chaudhary, accompanied by my Maithili translations.

(1) Illusion of eye
Colourful appearance of Rainbow in the sky
An illusion of the eye— (आँखिक भ्रम)

a many-coloured appearance, (आभास वर्णमय) rainbow in the sky. (पनिसोखा द्यौ)

(2) Rainbow declares
Beginning of bright days and End of rainy ones
The rainbow— (पनिसोखाक)

bright days are coming; (शुभ्र दिन आबह)

the rains depart. (खिचाहनि जा)

(3) Filled with smoky fog
The wood seems to be burning
Thou' it is winter
Smoky mist— (धुँआ कुहेस)

as though the wood were burning; (जेना जड़ैत काठ)

it is winter. (अछि ई जाड़)

(4) The words sound so sweet imitated by parrots
Like baby babbles
Sweetly resonant— (गुञ्ज मधुर) parrots imitating, (सुग्गाक अभिनय)

a child's lisping voice. (तोतराइत स्वर)

(5) The sky is bright
The wind has cleared the clouds
Some still needs force
The sky is bright— (अकाश श्वेत)

the wind drives away the clouds; (वायु टारैत मेघ)

a little more force. (कनेक बल)

12. Dohā, Rolā, and Kuṇḍaliyā

Abstract

Kuṇḍalī. "Chhattā ghurchhā pallausā, darkness fell in daylight. When the day had passed, I returned home; time had become terrifying. Time had become terrifying; every limb shudders. Who will hear the question? Speech summons the wild uproar. Airavata is distressed; where has the voice disappeared? Returning in the form of Time, it enters the midst of the whirling hive." A dohā contains two lines and four metrical segments: the first has 13 mātrās, the second 11, the third 13, and the fourth 11.

Keywords: dohā · rolā · kuṇḍaliyā · critical theory · Maithili

Kuṇḍalī

छत्ता घुरछा पल्लौसँ, भेल दिने अन्हार।

दिन बितलापर घर घुरी, काल भेल विकराल॥

काल भेल विकराल, पोरे-पोर सिहरैए।

सुनत केओ सवाल, बोल बगहा लगबैए।

ऐरावत बेहाल, बोल कतऽ भेल निपत्ता।

घुरियाए बनि काल, पैसि बिच घोरन छत्ता।

"The whirling chhattā and pallau darkened the day. / When the day ended, I returned home; Time turned dreadful. / Time turned dreadful; each limb trembles. / Who will hear the question? The voice brings a wild tumult. / Airavata is distraught; where has the voice gone? / Time circles back, entering the swirling chhattā."

Dohā

The dohā is a quantitative metre. It has two lines and four segments. The first segment contains 13 mātrās, the second 11, the third 13, and the fourth 11. The first and third segments must not begin with a jagaṇa (U ⏑ U), and the second and fourth segments end with a long syllable followed by a short one.

Rolā

The rolā is also a quantitative metre. It consists of four lines and eight segments. The first segment has 11 mātrās, the second 13, the third 11, the fourth 13, the fifth 11, and the sixth 13; the pattern continues in alternation through the eighth. The first segment of each line ends in long–short, or in three short syllables. The second segment of each line ends in four short syllables, two long syllables, a long followed by two shorts (bhagaṇa: ⏑ U U), or two shorts followed by a long (sagaṇa: U U ।). Do not begin a rolā with short–long–short.

Kuṇḍaliyā

The kuṇḍaliyā is a coupling or mixture of dohā and rolā. First compose a dohā. Then repeat its final segment—the segment with ११ mātrās—as the opening segment of a rolā, and continue with the rest of the rolā. Take care that the opening word of the first segment of the dohā is the same as the final word of the concluding segment of the rolā. Thus the first and last words of a kuṇḍaliyā are identical. Its fourth and fifth segments are identical too.

On Metre

Literature has two forms, prose and verse. A composition bound by metre is verse; otherwise it is prose. Chhand, or metre, signifies a composition that provides pleasure.

Metres are of two kinds: quantitative (matrika) and syllabic (varnika).

Quantitative Counting

Let us consider the pronunciation conventions of Maithili and the distinction between short and long syllables.

Become acquainted with the guru and laghu syllables used in classical prosody.

Of the thirteen vowel letters, a, i, u, ṛ, and ḷ are short, while ā, ī, ū, ṝ, e, ai, o, and au are long.

When these vowel letters are joined with consonants, they form syllabic combinations called guṇitāksharas.

क् + अ = क (k + a = ka).

क् + आ = का (k + ā = kā).

One independent vowel or one such consonant–vowel combination is called an akshara, a syllabic unit. A bare consonant is not reckoned as an akshara. Thus अवाक् (avāk) contains two syllabic units, अ and वा.

1. All short vowels and syllables containing a short vowel are called laghu, or light. Their symbol is U, written above the syllable.

2. All long vowels and syllables containing a long vowel are called guru, or heavy; their symbol is a short horizontal stroke (—) above the syllable.

3. All syllables containing anusvāra or visarga are counted as heavy.

4. A syllable followed by a conjunct consonant or a consonant without its own vowel is counted as heavy, as in अच् (ach) and सत्य (satya). In these examples the अ and स are both heavy.

Just as a syllable bearing anusvāra or visarga is said to become long, the combination of a short vowel with chandrabindu is now treated as short.

That is: chandrabindu + short vowel = 1 mātrā.

The quantities in conjunct syllables are counted as follows:

क्ति = क् + त् + इ = 0 + 0 + 1 = 1.

क्ती = क् + त् + ई = 0 + 0 + 2 = 2.

क्ष = क् + ष = 0 + 1.

त्र = त् + र = 0 + 1.

ज्ञ = ज् + ञ = 0 + 1.

श्र = श् + र = 0 + 1.

स्र = स् + र = 0 + 1.

शृ = श् + ऋ = 0 + 1.

त्व = त् + व = 0 + 1.

त्त्व = त् + त् + व = 0 + 0 + 1.

Short vowel + ऽ (bikari) = 1 + 0.

The supplementary bikari sign should not be placed after an independent a or a long vowel: forms such as दिअऽ, आऽ, and ओऽ are faulty. The sign may, however, be placed after a consonant combined with the inherent a.

Short vowel + chandrabindu = 1 + 0.

Long vowel + chandrabindu = 2 + 0.

For example, हँसल (hāsal, "laughed") = 1 + 1 + 1.

साँस (sās, "breath") = 2 + 1.

Bikari and chandrabindu count as zero additional mātrās.

जा कऽ ("having gone") = 2 + 1.

क् = 0.

क = क् + अ = 0 + 1.

Because Maithili has developed a tendency to pronounce क as the bare consonant क्, the supplementary bikari sign became necessary. No such sign is needed for long vowels.

U denotes a short syllable.

I denotes a long syllable.

One long syllable (I) = two short units (U + U).

Syllabic Counting

Count a conjunct syllable as one; do not count the halant, bikari, or the vowel signs for i, ā, and the like separately. In syllabic metre only the number of syllabic units is counted. A consonant with halant does not count independently. A syllable bearing the signs for e, u, and other vowels counts as one, just as a conjunct syllable does. Every letter from a through ha counts as one. No syllable is assigned a double count. Keep the following three points in mind:

1. Consonant with halant = 0.

2. Conjunct syllable = 1.

3. Every syllable from a to ha = 1.

Consider the first example:

ई अरदराक मेघ नहि मानत रहत बरसि के ("These clouds of Ardra will not stop raining") = 1 + 5 + 2 + 2 + 3 + 3 + 1 = 17 syllabic units.

Now the second example:

पश्चात् (pashchāt) = 2 units.

Now the third example:

आब (āb, "now") = 2 units.

Now the fourth example:

स्क्रिप्ट (script) = 2 units.

The seven principal Vedic metres are Gāyatrī, Uṣṇih, Anuṣṭubh, Bṛhatī, Paṅkti, Triṣṭubh, and Jagatī. The others are their variants, including atichhand and vichchhand. A metre is identified by its syllabic units. If the prescribed number is incomplete, one or two syllables may be added in each pāda. The conjuncts containing ya and va may be separated by adding i and u, respectively, as follows:

Conjuncts involving ya and va may be separated by inserting i and u, respectively. For example:

वरेण्यम् (vareṇyam) → वरेणियम् (vareṇiyam).

स्वः (svaḥ) → सुवः (suvaḥ).

The requisite number of syllables may also be attained by separating guṇa and vṛddhi vowels.

ए = अ + इ (e = a + i).

ओ = अ + उ (o = a + u).

ऐ = अ/आ + ए (ai = a/ā + e).

औ = अ/आ + ओ (au = a/ā + o).

In simple syllabic metre the short–long distinction is disregarded. It may nevertheless be applied within syllabic metre, since later Vedic syllabic verse came to take that distinction into account. Consider the following example:

तकैत रहैत छी ऐ मेघ दिस — "I keep looking towards these clouds."

तकैत (takait): short + long + long; number of syllables = 3.

रहैत (rahait): short + long + short; number of syllables = 3.

छी (chhī): long; number of syllables = 1.

ऐ (ai): long; number of syllables = 1.

मेघ (megh): long + short; number of syllables = 2.

दिस (dis): short + short; number of syllables = 2.

In quantitative metre, the categories dvikala, trikala, chatushkala, panchakala, and shatkala can comprise anything from one syllable (a single long one) to six syllables (six short ones).

Dvikala contains two mātrās: either one long syllable or two short syllables.

Trikala contains three mātrās, in any of three sequences: short + long, long + short, or short + short + short.

Chatushkala totals four mātrās, panchakala five, and shatkala six.

Syllabic metre employs eight kinds of groups of three syllables each, which can be memorised by the formula यमाताराजसलगम् (yamātārājasalagam).

The number of feet, the positions of the caesurae (yati), the requirement of end-rhyme, and the arrangement of syllables can now be chosen on a syllabic or quantitative basis; this allows the poet to introduce variety.

In syllabic metre a group of three syllables is called a gaṇa. There are eight such groups:

Yagaṇa: U | |

Ragaṇa: | U |

Tagaṇa: | | U

Bhagaṇa: | U U

Jagaṇa: U | U

Sagaṇa: U U |

Magaṇa: | | |

Nagaṇa: U U U

Besides these eight, there are two more single-unit gaṇas, ga and la.

Ga-gaṇa: a single long syllable, |.

La-gaṇa: a single short syllable, U.

One mnemonic formula for remembering all eight gaṇas is:

यमाताराजभानसलगम् (yamātārājabhānasalagam).

Let us now divide this formula:

यमाता (yamātā): U । । = yagaṇa.

मातारा (mātārā): । । । = magaṇa.

ताराज (tārāja): । । U = tagaṇa.

राजभा (rājabhā): । U । = ragaṇa.

जभान (jabhāna): U । U = jagaṇa.

भानस (bhānasa): । U U = bhagaṇa.

नसल (nasala): U U U = nagaṇa.

सलगम् (salagam): U U । = sagaṇa.

13. The Critical Theory of Maithili Prose and Poetry

Abstract

When the printing press first appeared, it was characterised as belonging to the bourgeois class. The novel, too, emerged with the arrival of printing and was accordingly regarded as bourgeois literature; gradually, however, that assumption disappeared. Literature on the Internet will certainly remain a complement to printed literature. Those who do not wish to read on a computer screen will print the text and read it. Pothi.com and other websites and publishers also offer print-on-demand services. For Maithili, the regularity of publication made possible by the Internet, the removal of distribution difficulties, negligible cost, and the overcoming of geographical distance have proved a blessing.

Keywords: prose · poetry · literary criticism · critical theory · Maithili

A Critical Theory for Maithili

The Future of Maithili on the Internet

When the printing press first appeared, it was characterised as belonging to the bourgeois class. The novel, too, arrived with printing and was therefore considered bourgeois literature, but that view gradually disappeared. Literature on the Internet will certainly remain a complement to printed literature. Those who do not read on a computer screen will print the material and read it. Pothi.com and other websites and publishers are also providing print-on-demand facilities.

For Maithili, the regularity of publication through the Internet, the removal of distribution problems, publication at no cost, and the abolition of geographical distance have proved a blessing.

The Internet transmits information instantly, but the possibilities of misuse are greater than those of use, particularly the practice of changing names, posting comments through different Internet service providers, and engaging in blackmail. There are ways of exposing such practices, but they too result in a waste of energy.

Introduction to the Participants

Fiction: Members of the educated middle class who have studied Maithili as a language or mother tongue from the ninth standard through undergraduate and postgraduate education retain an affection for it. The arrival of Maithili on the Internet has also reawakened affection for the mother tongue. Maithili books, including textbooks published by government institutions, have not been readily obtainable. The Internet has intervened in this difficulty, though only to a limited extent. As a consequence of these conditions, an inferiority complex has entered the minds of Maithili writers—a superiority complex, too, is a form of inferiority complex—and literature has begun to be erected on factional support. Literary discussion based on controversies, charges, and countercharges has begun. Husbands and wives, people of the same district or locality, and fathers and sons have started constructing an atmosphere in favour of their own sides. In other words, stories and poems are being written for prizes through blackmailing and black-marketing. Yet even literature that has won the Booker Prize or the Nobel Prize in Literature does not necessarily remain timeless: people remember many works, but many others are forgotten, and readers arrive at their own evaluations. In Maithili, however, generations pass without an adequate readership, while husbands and wives, fathers and sons, people from the same districts and localities, and, now, factions formed by fiction writers and poets judge literature on the basis of such blackmailing. Because the Internet's intervention has remained limited, good literature, creative literature, and literature beneficial to society have neither come adequately into view nor been sufficiently created. Whom will you encourage: the poets and fiction writers who keep themselves in the news by generating controversies and practising blackmail, or the humanist poets and fiction writers who live amid dust and hardship? Only when you make that choice will you be able to breathe life into a Maithili literature that has come to appear futile.

Poetry: People read little poetry. Efforts are being made to disseminate a language such as Sanskrit; simple Sanskrit is used in conversational workshops. Works of fiction and novels are translated from modern languages into Sanskrit, but poetry remains outside this process. The reason is that hardly anyone reads poetry, and translating poetry into a language that needs instructional camps for its survival is considered an unproductive expenditure of energy. The position of Maithili has become somewhat similar: if its villages were to disappear today, the number of people speaking the language would become very small. People would speak Maithili only at seminars and gatherings. The need for workshops on Maithili pronunciation is already being felt. Under these circumstances, what is the need or justification for writing poetry in Maithili? When a poet stresses that poems are written for want of time, the situation appears still more alarming. Events in the neighbourhood, personal ambitions, accusations, and travel accounts have thus become the subject matter of Maithili poetry. But why not use prose for such things? Stories are adapted into drama for the theatre; for what purpose, then, is prose turned into poetry? The readers of these poems, written under the pressure of insufficient time, are critics engaged in factional manoeuvring and the self-proclaimed great poets who transform prose into verse and, through their own prefaces, supply favourable reviews of their own poems. Who will understand the worth of poetic creation? Personal, worldly experience that fails to penetrate deeply cannot become great poetry, even when it rhymes. Otherworldly reflection, however abstract, cannot move us if it remains unconnected with worldly life, however much free verse, factional support, or ideological backing it possesses. Human beings need food, clothing, and shelter, and only thereafter otherworldly reflection. The Buddha asks whether everyone participating in these festivities knows that death is inevitable; if they do, how can they continue celebrating? In the same way, when modern Maithili poets see the linguistic, cultural, and economic foundations of their lives disappearing from under their feet, yet close their eyes and refuse to acknowledge the truth, the ideologies of national and international events which they wish to thrust into their poems lose their force. Their writing intended as a favour to the indigenous Dalit community, and their desire to bestow benefits upon it, lack sharpness. Yet when Rajdev Mandal writes poetry—

> ...
> Drop by drop, the blood falls, > and the earth is bathed in it.
> A bird asks itself
> this one question:
> Will our kind survive
> this dark and heavy night that approaches ...?

—we are shaken. What is the 'kind' of the poet's poetic being, and what is the kind to which the bird belongs? What need has this poem of factional manoeuvring or a self-absorbed preface? What faction or ideological support does this sensibility require? Poetry, then, needs excellence. It needs a linguistic and cultural foundation. It does not need merely imported subject matter brought in as an act of condescension; nor does it need imported sensibility that makes only a superficial, patronising attempt to recover a vanishing language, culture, and economic foundation. Good poetry can be written on any subject. It can address the Buddha's concern for humanity's future and lend support to unsettled minds; otherwise people will continue attending the sermons of fraudulent holy men. It can address the linguistic, cultural, and economic foundations of society; otherwise camps will have to be organised to teach Maithili itself. The communicability of imagery is essential as well. Otherwise an atmosphere will have to be prepared for a poet in advance, a stage arranged for his poetry, and training camps held to explain his vocabulary and ideology—and poets have indeed been doing precisely these things. The gentle rises and falls of Mithila's language, the manifold capacities of its proletarian classes, and also the rigidity of local ways of life and culture, politics, daily routines, social conventions, economic conditions, morality, religion, and philosophy should enter its literature. Without them literature will become one-sided, lose its balance, and end up fit only to be framed and hung upon a wall. Writing poetry is a literary compulsion. The day it becomes necessary to organise camps to teach the people of Mithila their own Maithili language, the existence of poetry itself may be called into question. Poets must remain alert so that day never comes.

Essential Elements of Maithili Criticism

We must consider the essential elements involved in the criticism of Maithili stories and poems.

Identify new problems that have emerged in a changed environment.

Identify attempts to connect personal experience with public life.

Determine whether a work has structural coherence; identify literature used for blackmail through the tendency to insert controversial material and forcibly plant ideological symbols within a work.

Writers who employ literature as blackmail may use stories and poems for personal self-praise and attacks on others. An evaluation based on facts, however, will expose this tendency.

How can literature afflicted with an inferiority complex promote the public good?

Trace one-sided representation against the background of changing social, economic, political, and religious relationships.

The instability in a writer's personal life, whether in commitment to an ideology or to caste and religion, reveals itself in literature. Such writing, even after repeated revision and expansion, cannot escape its original defect. Casteism and communalism reappear. These tendencies must be identified.

Distinguish gossip from criticism. Its chief characteristics are as follows:

"Someone once asked him—I hear he wanted to do this ..." and similar remarks. Then there are assertions that neither readers nor critics can understand the writer's work, although some supposed essential truth about him is known to the speaker. This writer is someone's son, so he writes well—or badly. He holds a particular post, therefore his writing is good—or bad. He has money and owns a hotel, so he cannot be a writer; the other distributes leaflets and is a journalist, so he is a great writer. He comes from Saharsa or Supaul, so he writes well—or badly; the other is from the Sot region of Darbhanga, or is a Brahmin or a Kayastha, so his writing must be good—or bad.

The one-line verdict: "I oppose this work," or "I support it." "He is a good person to me, so he writes well." "He belongs to my caste, or will benefit me in the future, so his writing is marvellous." "If I praise him, he will praise me." All these tendencies must be identified.

Identify prejudice or hatred directed towards someone in the course of evaluation, and the practice of delivering a verdict before understanding the whole matter.

In Maithili literature, where the number of readers is virtually zero, one writer reviews another, leaving ample scope for personal ego and blackmail. Attend a few literary gatherings of poets and fiction writers: the announcer's introductions and the applause will reveal the prejudices of both the announcer and the writers. Gaurinath writes that, even in Hindi, collections are presented under labels such as "Premchand, Mohan Rakesh and the writer from Uttarakhand", as though that Uttarakhand writer stood in the same category as Premchand and Mohan Rakesh. In Maithili, too, we hear "Kulanand Mishra, Harekrishna Jha, and this writer"; "Yatri, Rajkamal, and that one"; or "Rajkamal, Lalit, and this one", as though these alone were the poets and fiction writers who mattered. The biased double standards involved in these assertions are readily apparent. Read widely—Maithili literature on both sides of the India–Nepal border. During that reading, identify the works and writers you consider good, and those supposedly established authors or works you consider poor. Identify the inconsistencies as well, without fear. Courage is essential to end the dominance of blackmailers and of writers who form factions around stories and poems. In the absence of readers, they have propped up Maithili literature through group patronage and created an artificial literary atmosphere.

12. Freedom and reservation: Both are subjects of noisy polemic. The exploiting classes argue that independence was superficial, voting is fraudulent, and reservation rests on discrimination. Yet independence produced the vote, and every five years elections give rise to numerous new configurations of social change that benefit exploited groups. Granting the same rights to people occupying unequal social positions cannot, by itself, produce equality. The exploiting classes will then say that hierarchies are also emerging within reserved categories. But those are not hierarchies established on the basis of caste, and they are less severe than those of earlier times. Why should the Shudra sage Kavasha Ailusha, seer of Vedic hymns, or the woman Apala, likewise a seer of Vedic hymns, have remained on the margins? Older social arrangements imposed rankings within castes; the genealogical panji system ranked Karna Kayasthas and Maithil Brahmins internally; wealth and influence shaped further hierarchies, assigning people higher or lower positions. Contemporary arrangements still preserve, as signs of absurdity, practices based on support for child marriage, opposition to widow remarriage, and genealogical registers. Society becomes self-centred and abandons its language and culture because its affection for them has, since childhood, been little more than symbolic. Education remains unequal even now, but the difference from the earlier situation is as great as that between earth and sky. A person can study, enter the highest levels of society, and require neither a genealogy register nor any other support. Such a person may rise from a village panchayat to membership of Parliament. One may undertake contracting work or operate buses and tempos. If someone now says, "I could not study, and so I could not become a district collector," others respond, "Then how did so-and-so's son manage to become one?"

13. Patronising representation: Identify the feeling of superiority— itself a form of inferiority complex—in poems or stories written about the oppressed by their oppressors, either as an act of benevolence towards them or under the pressure of guilt.

14. Identify mediocrity: Catchphrases and the latest breaking news are presented in the name of modernity. Such writing offers no thinking capable of overturning the axioms of an age, and therefore criticism of international events—Bush and Saddam, for instance—lacks force. Whether such writers support or oppose a temple or mosque, Nandigram or Lalgarh, their work remains equally blunt. Their views on humanism, secularism, the Left and the Right, after drinking themselves into a stupor, sound half-asleep. They insert the vocabulary of the times and declare a poem or story finished. How can criticism of America have bite, or support for the Left carry conviction, when the writer's livelihood depends upon help from the Right? The absence of struggle diminishes creativity over time instead of increasing it. Everyone moves with the age; to move against its current requires the strength of creativity. Identify these convenience-seeking figures who call others escapists but cannot themselves penetrate beneath the surface. Contact with history may link a writer to a historical consciousness. An author burdened by inferiority and guilt cannot write with the force required to challenge prevailing social arrangements. The realism of Nyaya-Vaisheshika and Samkhya-Yoga, the reality of the external world and resistance to illusion, household life, and the public good must be considered. Works of art and literature rest on the indivisible knowledge and wisdom within the self: movement, freedom, and creative transformation. We cannot alter history or literary history, and yet the golden age of Mithila is reconstructed out of upper- and middle-class memories. Such memories may possess relevance only for television and cinema. Liberalism: the success and failure of industrialisation and its economic development. Freedom and reservation gave wider expression to the protest of socially disadvantaged groups, while also diminishing its intensity, whether in Naxalism, Maoism, or Marxism–Leninism. That benefited the bourgeoisie. Bourgeois political and cultural organisations expanded, attempting to reach the proletariat and include women. Money and convenience broke down traditional morality. The company established an independent identity, and families and individuals began running such enterprises through salaried employees. Control over nature and observation of human behaviour; food for work and money in exchange for work; employment-guarantee programmes and public-distribution shops. Travel within and beyond national borders for work made distances smaller and struck at the foundations of family life. Within the capitalist world economy, change does not come of its own accord but through struggle and effort. Independent human sensibility guarantees neither a good future nor a bad one. We have choices, and the signs now appearing of a revival of Maithili literature are not insignificant. We must decide which alternative to pursue: creating sensations or doing the work.

15. In India, following the political revolution, the aim was to bring about industrial and social revolutions; in developed countries, social revolutions had taken place before industrial revolutions. That is why we had to face difficult circumstances. Alongside social customs, modes of thinking, perspectives, and their development, there are questions of nutrition, health, sanitation, medicine, education, rising life expectancy, and declining mortality. Modernisation, democratisation, the implementation of the nation-state concept, administrative and legal development, increasing public participation, stability and the capacity for orderly change, the dynamics of power, and industrialisation all belong to this inquiry.

16. The division of society into rich and poor: the size and standing of the two classes, and the distance separating them.

17. Following independence, the new state faced political, social, economic, and cultural problems; the processes of change and integration were sometimes mutually contradictory. Anthropological, ethnic, religious, and linguistic loyalties; primary and smaller affiliations; local, caste-based, religious, and linguistic commitments: these must be considered, as must the development of community life and psychological and educational processes.

18. Indigenous communities: Groups such as the Satar and Gidarmara reflect diversity and differing levels of development. Closeness to nature, nature worship, simplicity, innocence, and gratitude; the sun, social and religious festivals, worship of the sun, moon, trees, and mountains, praise of the earth, and belief in bodies of water and the constellations are all part of their world. Janaka, the author suggests, derives from jana (vish, the people); such beliefs also exist among the inhabitants of Mithila.

19. A person's social standing is determined by location and caste. Certain castes enjoy prestige and privilege; others face contempt and difficult lives. Scheduled Castes: 1,100 in the first governmental list; Backward Castes: 3,743 according to the Mandal Commission; total: 4,843. The varna system is not a religious requirement but a social custom that has no present use. It may be exploited as a divisive force by a foreign mentality or a rigidly entrenched one.

20. Women and child development: Women's rights require an active educational system, the inclusion of women's studies in curricula, and an increase in women's participation in vocational and technical education. Women must have a place in dynamic management and development processes. Their participation in the independence movement, environmental and anti-dowry movements, and the struggle for economic equality must be recognised. Nurseries, childcare homes, balwadis, and anganwadis are needed for the children of working women. Competition brings low wages, adverse working conditions, and a socially and culturally undervalued position.

21. Women's emancipation and the women's movement.

22. Secularism: Political institutions should rest on the economic and social interests of the entire community, without distinctions of religion, race, or sect. Divisions between individuals or groups on grounds of religious belief or social origin must be rejected. Every community should exercise power in a spirit of responsibility and duty—that is, distributive justice. There should be no discrimination on religious grounds, and the state must not be controlled by religion.

23. Tagore's aestheticism; Gandhi's moralism; Aurobindo Ghose's mystical spiritual philosophy; and Vivekananda's practical Vedanta.

24. If development is educational before it is economic, ordinary people can participate in it. This enhances creative capacity and develops a sense of responsibility within community and national life.

25. Science and technology, and the differences between developed and underdeveloped nations: the aspiration to solve human problems, disease, ignorance, and insecurity, and the hope and foundation for the limitless expansion of facilities. In this way individual and national capacities increase.

26. The legal system should be used to deliver justice to the poor and disadvantaged. Village justice councils, or nyaya panchayats, should be revived.

27. Civil liberties: Human democratic rights, freedom of thought, and the creation of a capable society free from restrictions and pressure, together with protection against the suppression of rights.

28. The press: It connects rulers and the ruled and plays a role in social, economic, and political life. Powerful advertising agencies, however, now shape public opinion. The press should safeguard stability and act as a sentinel and protector of democracy. Industrialists own newspapers and governments direct administration, placing press freedom at risk. The danger is especially acute for countries such as Nepal and India.

29. The creation of new institutions or the reform of existing ones, in opposition to feudal, tribal, caste-based, and sectarian loyalties: democracy, liberalism, republicanism, constitutionalism, socialism, egalitarianism, constitutional rights, regular popular elections, popular sovereignty, federal division of powers, the importance of public opinion, public-administration processes and initiatives, the consolidation of party interests, a supreme legislature, an accountable executive, and an independent judiciary.

30. Water, land, air, and the sky: pollution and ecological imbalance caused by harmful changes in their physical, chemical, and biological properties.

31. Art: Must it possess a theoretical purpose? Art is a form of social sensibility and human activity; it is an aesthetic presentation of the world. The art of beauty is related to utility, and the philosophy of artistic perfection to schools of thought.

32. Emotional atmosphere: An aesthetic contemplation of truth and of artistic activity, of the beautiful, the concrete, and the abstract. Nature and distinctively artistic states may be powerful, sorrowful, or comic; the human experience of beauty cannot exist without experience itself. Here emerges a way of looking at the aesthetic transformation of society.

33. Mental activity: The human being is a thinking creature, experiencing both mental and physical reality: body and brain, the day's work and the night's dreams.

34. Contradiction or deceptive appearance; ambiguity; theoretical advantage.

35. Kant's philosophy: Throw a fishing net with openings two inches wide into a pond and you will catch no fish smaller than two inches. Would you then conclude that there are no smaller fish in the pond? The finer the critic's net, the better.

36. Literature for children and adolescents: Children and young readers who encounter Maithili literature will return to the language later, once their studies and employment are settled. Why should those who did not study Maithili at school or college, and never read Maithili children's literature, develop an affection for it? If you do not seek them out, they will not seek the language out either.

37. Sagar Rati Deep Jaray and Maithili criticism: Wars have social, economic, political, and immediate causes. Memorise only the immediate ones, and pronounce everything else wholly bad—the economic situation was bad, the social situation was bad, and so on. But apply that explanation to the French Revolution and it fails: at that time French peasants were economically better off than their English counterparts, which helped make revolution and resistance possible in France. Criticism of Sagar Rati Deep Jaray* is conducted in much the same manner: "The craftsmanship is good, the subject matter is good …"

38. Dalit literature: Apart from Mahendra Narayan Ram, Bilat Paswan Vihangam, and a few others, Dalit writers and Dalit literature in Maithili are virtually absent.

39. Khesari (grass pea), Magh, mangoes and the autumn season, the comet, Mor Par; the dates of Ashadh and other months only two pages apart in a novel by Yatri; Mohan Bharadwaj; Kumar Pawan.

On page 1 of Mor Par, the heads of rice stand erect in one line and elsewhere droop under their weight, while a dense, richly green carpet of grass pea stretches for miles—an image of the latter's final stage. But grass pea appears only after Aghan, after the paddy harvest; its earlier sprouting would precede that final stage by still more time.

Yatri Samagra, page 220: the aunt's death anniversary fell on Jeth Shukla Chaturdashi. The earlier anniversary … Page 222: "How could I go even for a single day to act as the ritual performer, on Ashadh Krishna Tritiya—the first …"

In his review of Balchanma, Mohan Bharadwaj writes that someone asked Yatri Ji about writing a second part of Balchanma, and Yatri supposedly replied that by now Balchanma must have become a dhodhi. Who was this person who questioned Yatri—a fictitious question-and-answer exchange? Anyone who has read Balchanma knows that Balchanma was beaten and killed. Why would Yatri tell an imaginary questioner that the dead Balchanma would have become a dhodhi?

Kumar Pawan's Paith is among the finest Maithili stories; nevertheless its ending, with a quarrel between two brothers and so forth, could have been directed towards a different objective—for example, exploitation.

Art: Must It Have a Theoretical Purpose?

The various literary forms—poetry, treatises, essays, criticism, short fiction, novels, epistolary literature, travel memoirs, reportage, drama, and one-act plays—are heard, recited, read, or performed for entertainment. They may have a purpose, or they may embrace purposelessness and absurdity: amid life's upheavals, literature without a declared purpose can also entertain.

In ancient times, art, literature, and music were transmitted from one generation to the next. Padapāṭha, kramapāṭha, jaṭāpāṭha, śikhāpāṭha, and ghanapāṭha were systematic methods of memorisation. The Yajurveda described ways of constructing houses, sacrificial altars, and other works of art; the commentaries developed these descriptions further, providing a very early foundation for archaeology. Its method of music gave the Sāmaveda its distinctive character. There were thus efforts to establish systems for literature, art, and music, so that other people could reproduce them in the same manner. In this process, criticism of art, literature, and music—or the analysis of their qualities—began. Eastern and Western thinkers also offered views on the social purposes of art, literature, and music and the ethical standards they ought to follow. Plato holds that no art can be good because all art is false and unreal.

Yet art, music, and literature may also be created for one's own delight. Reading, hearing, seeing, or experiencing them may give pleasure and mental peace, while at other moments they may provoke agitation. Aristotle, however, argues that artists possess knowledge and help us to understand the world.

In Rigveda 1.115.2, the image of the rising sun at dawn is that of a young man following a beautiful woman. In Rigveda 1.124.11, the reddish glow of sunrise, the retreating darkness, and the fire in the hearth are described through the image of a village maiden releasing a red cow to graze. Atharvaveda 4.15.6 describes a collective cry or slogan. Yajurveda 40.16 describes the solar disc as a golden vessel covering the sun. Yajurveda 17.38–41 depicts a divine army going into battle accompanied by instruments, while 17.49 describes the rustling sound of armour. Rigveda 1.164.2 and Yāska 4.27 describe the year and the wheel. Bṛhadāraṇyaka Upaniṣad 2.2.3 describes the source of soma juice, while 2.2.4 refers to the seven sages at its banks as the eyes, ears, and so forth. In Atharvaveda 10.2.31 the body is called Ayodhya; in the Bhagavad Gītā 5.13 it is called a city.

Through the utterance of words and the creation of art, the object to be apprehended comes into being. Its justification is established through words and sounds, form, rasa, rāga, metre, and figures of speech.

Art is the aesthetic presentation of the world. The art of beauty exists in relation to utility; the philosophy of artistic perfection stands in relation to schools of thought. Emotional atmosphere involves an aesthetic contemplation of truth and artistic action, the beautiful in both concrete and abstract form.

Mental activity: a human being thinks and experiences both mental and physical reality. Contradiction or deceptive appearance entails ambiguity. Marxism champions the social realism of the novel.

Freud regards every human being as mysterious. He selects literary works for the analysis of their authors, whereas neo-Freudian thought places greater emphasis on cultural than on biological elements.

New Criticism is based on a detailed examination of the work.

Postmodernism, existentialism, and humanism are philosophical currents. Earlier, philosophy included science, history, society and politics, economics, art, scientific inquiry, and language. Yet as the branches of science and art became increasingly specialised—science in particular—philosophy came to be confined, in relation to mathematics and science, to mathematical logic. Philosophers turned towards inductive and deductive methods of inquiry and analytical methods.

Marx, who was almost a form of divine intervention for the poor throughout the world, made the dialectical method the foundation of his explanation. Today's "discussion", or debate, which contains both a proposition and its opposition, already existed in philosophy—in particular in the six philosophical systems—as the method of refutation and defence. See Mādhavācārya's Sarvadarśanasaṃgraha.

Francis Fukuyama, who proclaimed the end of history after the fall of communist rule, later withdrew from that position. Postmodernism, too, has faltered after its initial enthusiasm.

Existentialism, humanism, progressivism, Romanticism, and sociological analysis have survived by becoming part of synthetic approaches to criticism.

Because psychoanalysis is grounded in scientific inquiry, it will survive, like the dialectical method.

Psychology may also provide the foundation of a story. The purposes of a story should accord with the needs of society, and the changes in its narrative journey should respond to changes that have occurred or are occurring in that society. At the same time, the story is itself governed by the society's culture, and its historical existence comes into view through it. Vedic narratives, for example, bring forth love for the nation and teach people to live together in society. The Jātaka tales, while disseminating the people's languages, also seek to spread Buddhism. In the Muslim world, Rumi's Masnavi, a distinctive work of Persian literature, teaches the importance of knowledge and the advancement of the state.

Contemporary fiction brings these elements together and moves towards the creation of an enlightened and humane society.

After the collapse of communism, it appeared that history—understood as the struggle between two ideologies—had come to an end because one of those ideologies had disappeared. Francis Fukuyama declared that this marked the end of history produced by ideological conflicts and that only an ideology concerned with human welfare would now move forward. But later he acknowledged that many competing ideologies continued to exist within societies and among nationalities.

The postmodern outlook questions the completeness of scientific knowledge. Truth and falsehood are described from differing perspectives; its humour can be self-centred; distinctions between good and bad repeatedly dissolve, and there is no certainty about when truth might become falsehood. Thinking may be superficial. There is neither optimism nor pessimism, only a kind of absurdity: a thing can be considered in many different ways, not just one. It puts less faith in outcomes derived from causes, control, and plans, and more faith in chance. Democratic and feminist viewpoints, red flags, and other ideological emblems may become objects of playful irony. Postmodernism brought forward the questions facing women and many communities marginalised from the mainstream by globalisation. It opposed ideology and universal goals, yet could offer no answer.

Similarly, the postmodern thinker Jacques Derrida deconstructed language and argued that its separated elements depend on numerous different foundations; without understanding those dependencies, we cannot establish its meaning.

To restore dialogue, the fiction writer must also possess faith—a faith founded both on reasoning and on experience.

The analytical philosophy of positivism examines linguistic statements and concepts rather than objects themselves.

Analytical, or logical, positivism and existentialism arose as reactions to science. In this way, the ambiguities of scientific thought were clarified.

Phenomenology studies what is given to consciousness precisely as it is given. Experience is the observation of the facts of a particular mental act. It offers a way of seeing an object without prejudice and in its pure form.

In existentialism, the human being is nothing other than the human being himself. Apart from what he creates, he is nothing; he is condemned to be free, as Sartre says.

Hegel's dialectic stresses judgements of quality and existence through the endless interrelationship of analysis and synthesis. The deeper an essential principle lies, the further it is from outward form and the closer it comes to reality.

Quantum theory and the uncertainty principle have also influenced modern thinking. Beneath visible reality, internal and external processes operate through exchanges among minute units of force and energy. Under the uncertainty principle, position and form must be determined through approximation.

The conception of a universe of more than three dimensions, and Stephen Hawking's A Brief History of Time, directly challenge the existence of God, for they also bring forward the idea of God's death. Whatever begins must end, however long its life may be.

Just as virtual reality artificially presents reality and merges consciousness with it, so, without imagining more than three dimensions, even if we had travelled at the speed of light from the time of the Indus Valley civilisation, we would still not have reached the far side of the universe today.

All these scientific and philosophical propositions have emerged as challenges before literature. A holistic, or comprehensive, synthesis is needed. Only then will this philosophy become real rather than merely philosophical.

Poststructuralist methodology locates the meaning of language not in words, their lexical meanings, or grammatical rules, but in the process through which meaning is produced. Language acquires different meanings for different people and groups. There is no final relationship between language and the world. Neither a word nor its text possesses a final or uniquely fixed meaning. Modernity emerged through the exchanges of modern and postmodern reasoning, reality, dialogue, and ideas.

Then the New Left movement arose in France, alongside such currents as catastrophism and anarchism. These were founded on distrust of the beliefs and assumptions of modern intellectual systems. Hidden meanings in texts began to be interpreted in relation to time and place, while language was turned into a medium of play—a "language game". Postmodernism emerged as a critique of power, legitimacy, and their stratification.

In the computer and information revolution, a programmer creates software and places it on the worldwide Internet, where the software continues to work independently of its maker. Sometimes it even performs tasks for which its maker never designed it. Other programs, such as viruses, interfere with its course and turn it destructive; antivirus programs are software that repair the damage. When even these do not work, a backup is taken and the computer formatted: a clean slate!

Capitalism was born of the Industrial Revolution, but in post-industrial society information and communication have become more important than production, and the computer has assumed a larger role in society. Mobile phones, credit cards, and similar objects are based on chips. The ideas of deconstruction and reconstruction reveal a restructuring of the creative process through which consciousness takes new forms in the post-industrial age. History has not ended, but traditional history has. The state, class, nation, political party, society, family, morality, and marriage are all being redefined. Under the impact of so many changes, numerous institutions have become fragmented and lost their context.

An information society, or information-based society, is one in which the creation, distribution, dissemination, use, integration, and modification of information constitute major economic, political, and cultural activities. People capable of participating in such a society are called digital citizens. In this post-industrial society, information technology determines production, the economy, and society. The idea is closely related to such concepts as postmodern society and post-industrial society. The economist Fritz Machlup proposed the concept. His account of the knowledge industry had five components: education, research and development, the media, information technology, and information services. It thus demonstrates the effects of technology and information upon society. The digital divide is also a divide in knowledge, a social division, and an economic division. It indicates the necessity of constructing a non-discriminatory information society in which developing countries enjoy sovereign rights over information technology.

The right to privacy is also involved in the relationship between human rights and information technology. Scholars, human-rights activists, and others have begun debating whether an information society based on information and communication technologies will strengthen or damage human rights, with particular reference to freedom of expression, the right to information, privacy, discrimination, equality for women, intellectual property, political participation, and freedom of association. The confidentiality of online correspondence, the cultural and linguistic diversity of Internet content, and media education are among the matters at stake. The technical instruments of the information society participate in its rights and freedoms, and contribute to society's overall development, to the universality of rights and liberties, and to the negotiation of conflicting rights, freedoms, and values. They create easier access to information, knowledge, and culture, and transform the user into an actor in the global information society. They provide greater freedom of expression than before, as well as the capacity to create new content and new social networks. This also creates a need for new legal, economic, and social models founded upon shared responsibility, knowledge, and understanding. The welfare of children is another concern; it must always take precedence over the interests of adults.

The accumulation of economic, social, and cultural wealth has intensified in the information society, while technology has produced a structural form of unemployment. Poverty, workers' rights, and the idea of the welfare state are being pushed aside before calculations of profit and loss. Only a few participants now seem to be needed. Publishers, too, promote only the authors of a few best-selling books. The same tendency is visible in theatre, painting, cinema, and other fields. Information, however, is not invariably beneficial. Its domain is not confined to art and books: it also includes the speculative market and sponsored survey reports. It reduces the distance between time and place and establishes a balance between them. The concept of human dignity shifts attention away from a social position determined by birth towards a universal right to dignity. Liberation movements, including movements for women's liberation, have worked in this direction. After the two World Wars and the challenge of fascism, the United Nations General Assembly proclaimed and adopted the Universal Declaration of Human Rights on 10 December 1948. The declaration established common standards for all peoples and nations without political, economic, cultural, or religious discrimination.

Yet the free use of information is limited, and privacy is disappearing. When Bill Gates, during a visit to India, was asked whether Microsoft's Xbox had been launched late in India for fear of piracy, he reportedly answered that Microsoft had never delayed a product because of such fear. The fear of spam and piracy must be overcome. The information society is the society in which we are now living. Democracy and human rights must continue to be respected in both the information society and the society that follows it. Freedom of expression, the right to privacy, the right to share information, and the right to access information—all associated with the communication of information—are threatened both by the state and by the market-oriented tendencies of the information society.

The Internet is a people's medium, a system that establishes communication among people. It breaks down the strongholds of those who monopolise the means of communication. Ordinarily, the Internet has no editor: people create subjects and content and communicate them themselves. This initiates numerous forms of social dialogue, but a great deal of antisocial material also appears. Should it be prohibited? If we give machines, through software, the power to prohibit content, this will be a serious blow to freedom of expression. Intellectual-property rights give rights of publication and distribution even sixty years after an author's death. Piracy must also be prohibited on the Internet, and arrangements should be made so that an author's rights in the material continue for at least twenty years after death. Excessive resort to patents, however, will obstruct developing countries' access to information and hinder technological progress. Copyright can nevertheless foster cultural development, including the development of music, film, comics, and illustrated narratives. In a digital environment, material cannot even be viewed on the Internet without making a copy; thus online and offline copyright differ to some extent. Online copyright restricts reproduction as well, although reproducing material, incorporating it into something else, or altering it is very easy. Names and images should therefore not be used without their creators' permission; other people's private conversations and chats should not be invaded; and statements that create false impressions of others should not be circulated. Likewise, an employer's electronic surveillance of employees must conform to International Labour Organization guidelines. Unsolicited emails and the unauthorised collection or use of medical reports also violate human rights.

Internet use remains restricted because much content and software are expensive rather than freely available; the digital divide makes educational disparities more visible. Since information technology relies more on intellectual than on physical labour, one might expect women's inequality to decline in an information society, but surveys show that women have comparatively little access to information technology. Electronic libraries and Braille-enabled or audio-enabled computer screens could help disabled and blind people conduct e-commerce from home. Yet the high cost of research and its results in this field has prevented the expected benefits from being realised. Children, older people, disabled people, women, workers, migrant workers, and other socially disadvantaged groups experience disadvantage even within the information society.

Good literature or art is not created merely through the immediate presentation of an idea. Its foundation must be the sharply articulated human values, social harmony, and social principles grounded in equality and justice that it embodies. We must ask whether it clearly conveys how society can advance on that basis. Does it free the reader's mind from bondage? Does it foster the strength and confidence needed to lead others? Does it dispel doubts about character formation and respect for labour? All these become standards for judging short-short fiction. People living on society's margins can accomplish things beyond the capacity of those who enjoy every advantage; that is possible only when their self-confidence is strengthened.

How can literature burdened by an inferiority complex serve the public good? In changing social, economic, political, and religious circumstances, one-sided depictions reveal the instability of a fiction writer's or poet's personal commitments, whether ideological or based on caste and religion. The sense of superiority that appears in stories written by an exploiter about the exploited, either as an act of benevolence or out of guilt, must be identified. That superiority itself is a form of inferiority complex.

Identify mediocrity: catchphrases and the latest breaking news masquerading as modernity. Such writing contains no thought capable of overturning the assumptions of an age. Modernisation, democratisation, the implementation of the nation-state concept, administrative and legal development, increased public participation, stability and the capacity for orderly change, the dynamics of power, industrialisation, and the post-independence processes of political, social, economic, and cultural change and integration within a new state may at times contradict one another. Community development and psychological and educational processes must also be considered.

Indigenous communities, such as the Satar and Gidarmara, reflect diversity and differing levels of development: closeness to nature, nature worship, simplicity, guilelessness, and gratitude. Individual standing is tied to place and caste. Some castes enjoy status and privilege; others face contempt and difficult lives.

Women and child development: women's rights, the activation of the education system, the inclusion of women's studies in curricula, and a greater proportion of women in vocational and technical education. Women's liberation and the women's movement. Secular political institutions founded on the economic and social interests of the entire community, without religious, racial, or sectarian distinctions. If development is educational before it is economic, ordinary people can participate in it. Their creativity grows and they acquire a sense of responsibility.

Science and technology, and the divide between developed and underdeveloped nations: human problems, illness, ignorance, insecurity, and the aspiration for solutions, hope, and an unlimited extension of facilities and their foundations. The legal order must be used to secure justice for the poor and disadvantaged. Civil liberties, democratic human rights, independent thought, the creation of a capable society, and freedom from restrictions and coercion. The press is a link between ruler and ruled, with a role in social, economic, and political life; influential advertising agencies, however, now also shape public opinion. The creation of new institutions or reform of existing ones, against feudal, tribal, caste-based, and sectarian loyalties; democracy, liberalism, republicanism, constitutionalism, socialism, egalitarianism, constitutional rights, elections at regular intervals, popular sovereignty, the federal division of powers, the importance of public opinion, public-administrative processes and initiatives, the aggregation of party interests, a supreme legislature, an accountable executive, and an independent judiciary. Pollution and ecological imbalance arise from harmful changes in the physical, chemical, and biological characteristics of water, land, air, and the atmosphere. Must art, then, have a theoretical purpose?

Michel Foucault: knowledge and truth are produced.

Deleuze and Guattari say that we desire because we are desiring-machines.

Mikhail Bakhtin regards language as a social activity, and his work concerns the novel.

The Russian Formalists regard literature as a distinctive use of language.

Jean-François Lyotard: truth and the truthfulness of history are only apparent. Baudrillard: advertising and television have erased the distinction between the real and the simulated. Both are major thinkers of postmodernism.

Lacan's distinctive contribution is the linguistic application of Freud's method. He argues that the unconscious is structured like a language. When a child learns language, a word is taught for a sign. Lacan clearly presents three elements: desire, lack, and the Other. Desire involves both need and demand, but cannot be broken down into those two forms alone. Lack and an absence appear in the description of the Other. The subject is a momentary effect of meaning and becomes like the Other when it is imaginary and produces a lack from which desire arises.

Three thinkers associated with postcolonialism are Homi Bhabha (close to Foucault and Lacan), Gayatri Spivak (close to Foucault and Derrida), and Edward Said (close to Foucault). They explain colonial constructions and theorising that attributed such qualities as cunning and indolence to those who had been colonised.

Raymond Williams's cultural studies demonstrate the relationship between literature and economic conditions. New Historicism compares the textuality of history with the historicity of texts.

Elaine Showalter identifies the psychological, biological, and linguistic characteristics of women's writing. Simone de Beauvoir regards class and caste as impediments to women's commitment to women, a view opposed by later feminist theory. Virginia Woolf considers economic independence and privacy essential for women writers; her position was not considered revolutionary. Mary Wollstonecraft emphasised a revolution in women's education and the teaching of reason.

New Criticism: Eliot opposed the dominance of emotion in poetry and called for its impersonality. Improving the public's taste is also a critic's task. Wimsatt and Beardsley argued that criticism should not rest on the poet's intention or historical study. Nor should it be based on the emotional effect upon the reader, since that is relative. It should rest on the actual words of the text.

The beginnings of English criticism can be traced to Philip Sidney, who considered poetry in relation to beauty, meaning, and human welfare.

John Dryden considered moral instruction in ancient literature and weighed its advantages and disadvantages.

Samuel Johnson wrote about the comic and tragic elements in Shakespeare's plays.

Rousseau's Romanticism does not doubt the goodness of human beings (classical critics do doubt it, while neoclassical critics hold that human nature is corrupted but institutions can improve it). At the same time, Romanticism maintains that institutions are corrupt and assist only corrupt people. It holds that poetry arises from personal experience.

Structuralism challenged modern positivism, which had placed no question mark over literature's given position; subsequently, the author lost the exclusive right to analyse his own written text.

Poststructuralism argues that literature exceeds what structuralism can comprehend. Postmodernism is one form of poststructuralism. It holds that structures operate among culture and theory in literature, where certain feelings and thoughts remain excluded and resist continuity. Deconstruction and postmodernism followed poststructuralism. Postcolonialism rejects new forms of colonialism, while the theory of disorder regards failed purposes as failing to secure their proper results.

Structuralism attacks repressive Western institutions and society, thereby strengthening Marxism (Althusser).

After modernist positivism, New Criticism, structuralism, and poststructuralism came deconstruction and postmodernism, which have been called the culture of late capitalism (Fredric Jameson).

In the eighteenth century, modern meant rootless; by the beginning of the twentieth century it had acquired a progressive meaning. After 1970, the word modern took on the character of a theory, and postmodern became a technical term under which the worldly ceased to be important. The life and history of the modern era were rendered insignificant and declared finished. This became a theory of the posthistorical, the postdevelopmental, and the postcausal. Truth and mutual connectedness lost their importance.

Magical realism introduces magical things into situations grounded in reality. Gabriel García Márquez's One Hundred Years of Solitude and Salman Rushdie's Midnight's Children are novels of this kind. Writers employ such experiments in an effort to understand reality more fully.

Joseph Conrad calls the novel history. Conrad, whose mother tongue was Polish, became a celebrated novelist in English, although he did not speak English fluently. Roland Barthes says that the novel is history and also opposes history. Barthes was a French literary theorist whose writings influenced structuralist, Marxist, and poststructuralist literary theory.

Postmodern Western bourgeois culture uses audiovisual media to treat inequality, injustice, and deprivation as mere words, juxtaposed with the words equality, attainment, and justice. Poverty, which is not regarded as a problem in the West, remains a major problem in India today. Postmodernism opposes feminism and Marxism, and both feminism and Marxism have opposed it. Marxism, with its commitment to historical analysis, has renewed and strengthened its theory in relation to structuralism, poststructuralism, and postmodernism. Marxism stresses the material world, yet this does not make it identical with utilitarianism or Cārvāka philosophy, because those are concerned only with physical needs. Feminist thought likewise challenges the acceptance of the status quo in postmodernism: unless that condition is ended, women's position will not improve.

A bronze statuette found in the civilisation of Mohenjo-daro suggests a posture of dance, resembling the thāṭ posture of present-day Kathak: the right hand held at an angle of forty-five degrees, the left hand resting on the left hip, and the left leg slightly bent. According to the Śāṅkhāyana Brāhmaṇa of the Rgveda, singing, instrumental music, and dance were performed together. The Aitareya Brāhmaṇa counts all three among the divine arts. In Rgveda 10.76.6, the golden radiance of dawn reminds the poet of an adorned seer. The Rgveda also mentions communal dancing (prāñco agāma nṛtaye). The Soma sacrifice called Mahāvrata describes collective dancing by female servants, numbering three to six. Śāṅkhāyana 1.11.5 says that at weddings four to eight married women were given liquor and urged to dance four times. Vedic literature also refers to the bride's singing as part of the marriage rite. At the sīmantonnayana ceremony, the husband requests a vīṇā-player to sing accompanied music in praise of the deity Soma. The Atharvaveda connects the dance of the deity Vasā with ṛc, sāman, and gāthā, describing Gandharvas as present at the Soma-drinking dance. Atharvaveda 12.1.41 describes the combined sound of song, instrumental performance, and dance. Alongside Sāma music, secular musical forms known as gāthā and nārāśaṃsī were also current in the Vedic age.

Women: the Rgveda describes twenty-one female seers, among them Apālā, Ghoṣā, Śraddhā, Śacī, Sārparājñī, Yamī, Vaivasvatī, Devajāmaya, Indrāṇī, Śaśvatī, Romaśā, Godhā, Urvaśī, Sūryā, Aditi, Nadī, Lopāmudrā, Viśvavārā, Vāk-Juhū, Saramā, and Yamī. Devatā means the subject being expounded, not 'God', as Griffith rendered it. In interpreting mantras, Maharshi Patañjali's methodological statement, "yac chabda āha tad asmākaṃ pramāṇam," means that what the word or the words of a mantra say is evidence for us. It was subsequently misinterpreted as meaning that the Veda alone is authoritative evidence.

Plato: he maintains that no art can be good because all art is false and unreal. His view should also be considered in relation to his perception of the weaknesses of Athens's military organisation compared with Sparta. He opposed poetry and drama insofar as the memorisation and recitation of dialogue might attract people towards an artificial life.

Aristotle does not regard poetry as imitation alone; he also finds philosophy and universal truth in it. He considers the tragic form of drama and its imitation a release or exhalation that comes after pleasure, pity, and fear.

Dialogue can take two forms, a formal address or ordinary conversation; conversation contains fewer philosophical elements. In ancient Greece, poetry was thought to convey a message from God. Aristophanes distinguishes good and bad poetry, while Theophrastus distinguishes severe, excellent, and magnificent poetry. Poetry and music are inseparable. The European symphony, however, in which many instruments play simultaneously in different rhythms, introduced a difference in theory. These considerations came to apply to the dramatic stage as well.

Derrida's method of deconstruction brings works and writers who have occupied high positions down, while raising those previously kept low. Roland Barthes writes that a work becomes important when it separates from its creator and can be analysed independently. He calls this the death of the author.

Poststructuralism overturned structuralism's assumption of completeness and coherent organisation. Saussure's theory of language distinguishes speaking and writing, the vocabulary of literature in its own time and historical context, the importance of the work or the person, and significance as an idea situated in language and its historical context. Derrida's deconstructive theory, however, began overturning these distinctions as well.

Sex is a biological fact, but the concept of woman and man is a social product. Literature and art concerned with women have been created by men, who view women through a male perspective. Feminist literary theory examines the roots of this problem. In the context of Mithila, women's condition has not been quite so bad; nevertheless, the one-sided tendencies of Maithili literature have presented the suffering of upper-class women. Modernisation has also brought deterioration in the position of women among castes regarded as socially lower. Another consideration is that caste and religion have divided women's rights into several portions.

Feminist criticism also argues that, because theories have largely been constructed by men, they cannot provide a complete explanation. Simple humanism arose in opposition to theory, but it too became a theory. Meaningful literature was produced under its influence.

Excessive condemnation should be avoided in book reviews. Reviewers must refrain from showing off their learning; in the course of excessive criticism, people begin displaying their erudition. Restraint is essential, and abusive language exposes the reviewer's poor upbringing. Reviewing a book without reading it is unethical. For example, in Karmadhāraya, Taranand Viyogi writes about Dhumketu: "His story 'Namāz-e-Śukrānā' is very important in delineating the communal harmony that has been established in Mithila's culture for ages" (Karmadhāraya, p. 127). (!) Such a review has evidently been written after looking at the title, for in the story, during Haji Saheb's prayers, a parrot in a cage cries "Sita ... Ram ...". Haji Saheb repeatedly dashes the cage against the mosque wall until the parrot dies. Saeeda begins to cry, and the story ends. Yet, according to the reviewer, this story illustrates communal harmony!

A reviewer must also avoid excessive praise. The review should demonstrate how the book differs from others written on the same subject, what gap it fills, what it contains, and how it compares with those other books. Depending on the length of the work, a review may extend from one thousand to two thousand words. It should review the book, not its author. Filling a review with analyses of the author's other writings does not constitute a good review; those writings should be used only when directly relevant to the book under consideration. Given Mithila's diverse history and culture—and the particularly one-sided condition of Maithili literature—personal attacks and considerations of district and locality have become part of a tradition. Caste, religion, and regional forms of Maithili enter reviews comparatively little, but reviewers are profoundly influenced by the desire to praise or disparage someone because of their district, home area, or neighbouring locality.

Ask whether a particular review actually illuminates the book, or merely comments on its author and the author's other works. Closer scrutiny will reveal whether the reviewer has read the book at all. Avoid decorative verbal display, use words precisely, and remove unnecessary words and lines. In reviewing an autobiography, one may legitimately discuss the writer's life. Move beyond comments on the book's appearance, colours, and cover photograph to the book itself. Keep out anti-woman prejudices and mentalities constrained by caste and region. Avoid pointless scrutiny of an author's name or the image on the cover.

The creation of an atmosphere in which an author tells a story is one component of the novel: this includes descriptions of its characters, the outline of the narrative, and the people and circumstances required for it. A story can be written from any one of these aspects. Drama combines emotionally charged dialogue with action. Poetry must create pictures through words and render them capable of stirring people's emotions; for this, apt suggestions that intervene in the poet's milieu, and a contribution from the science of sound, are also needed.

A reviewer must identify both what makes a work excellent and what it lacks. The evaluation must not be one-sided. The reviewer should understand and explain the message concealed in it and the direction in which the author is guiding the reader. A further question arises: how should one review a book of literary reviews? The reviewer must identify the book's central current of thought.

If a collection of criticism or essays contains many different kinds of essays and reviews and writings about numerous authors, the reviewer should determine whether the arrangement has a purpose or is purposeless.

As far as possible, a review should also discuss other books on the subject. One's ideology must not be imposed upon the book being reviewed. Explain the book's need and relevance in the present; show where its importance lies and identify its principal elements. Identify the author's philosophy of life, views of the relationship among the actual, the imaginary, and the ideal, and points of uncertainty. Discuss the artistic dimensions of the writing style, the capacity to tell a story, the design of the work, and the skill with which its different parts have been joined. One carpenter makes a bed that is both strong and beautiful; another concentrates on strength alone, while a third concentrates on beauty. Literary craftsmanship varies in the same way.

Why do we need theory? Simple humanism says that, instead of literary theory, common sense is sufficient to determine a work's humane outlook and whether it possesses significance. One can use one's own intelligence to judge the quality of writing; literary theory is not indispensable to criticism. Yet simple humanism itself became a theory.

Indian conceptions of poetry: the idea of art as a means towards liberation. Consider the posture of Naṭarāja, where the rhythms of creation and destruction are both visible. A permanent emotion becomes concentrated and ripens into rasa. How many such rasas did Sita and Rama experience? See the Vālmīki Rāmāyaṇa. Krishna is the teacher of the Indian philosophy of action, but he is also a connoisseur of aesthetic enjoyment.

The theory of rasa was needed to account for the enjoyment of art, and Bharata wrote the Nāṭyaśāstra. Abhinavagupta wrote a commentary on Ānandavardhana's Dhvanyāloka. Bhāmaha in the sixth century, Daṇḍin in the seventh, and Rudraṭa in the ninth developed these discussions further.

The Theory of Rasa

Bharata: Rasa arises from the effect of drama. What is the purpose of drama? It is both to enact rasa and to bring it into being. How does rasa emerge? From its determinants (vibhāva), its consequences or visible responses (anubhāva), and associated transitory states (vyabhicāri-bhāva). A durable emotion becomes concentrated and ripens into rasa, which we can savour.

Bhaṭṭa Lollaṭa: A permanent emotional state becomes concentrated through cause and effect and turns into rasa. Actors experience rasa through inquiry and imagination. Lollaṭa does not give importance to the poet or to the listeners and spectators.

Śaunaka: For aesthetic experience, Śaunaka considers it necessary for the spectator to enter into the performance and experience rasa, much as one appreciates a picture of a horse by apprehending it as a horse.

Bhaṭṭa Nāyaka: The effect of rasa, he argues, falls upon the spectator. He regards poetic language as distinctive. Through rasa, the soul of the listener or spectator is united with the supreme self. The bliss of rasa is the bliss of one's true nature; this brings self-realisation.

Rasa theory is founded upon the listener, spectator, and reader; it emphasises their experience.

In the context of structuralism and poststructuralism, Barthes regards the death of the author as necessary to free readers from the author's intentions: the author is separated from the work, and readers search for meaning for themselves.

The Theory of Dhvani

Ānandavardhana, in the Dhvanyāloka, holds that literature aims to communicate or create meaning indirectly. His theory explains the structure and operation of suggested meaning, rasa as an experience of beauty, and figures of speech. Ānandavardhana considers dhvani the soul of poetry. Meaning emerges indirectly through suggestion, but does so in an organised manner. From this arise two principles, meaning and symbol, and the effect of rasa is produced. Nyāya and Mīmāṃsā objected to this doctrine, arguing that dhvani has no independent existence but results from inference and is already included within secondary signification. Not everything can be described through words.

The Theory of Sphoṭa

Bhartṛhari's Vākyapadīya says that the meaning of a word or sentence is conveyed through sphoṭa. Letters emerge through varṇa-sphoṭa, words through pada-sphoṭa, and sentences through vākya-sphoṭa. No cognition is possible without a relationship to words. This became part of the Indian philosophical theory of knowledge. Meaning can be communicated without the simultaneous production of letters, words, and sentences. Sphoṭa is śabda-brahman, the word as ultimate reality and the fundamental cause of creation. Letters, words, and sentences do not exist simultaneously. The separate sounds of a spoken word do not individually contain its meaning; they are produced and disappear until the word is complete. Meaning is communicated through sphoṭa, although letters, words, and sentences are not all present at the instant at which sphoṭa is apprehended or communicated. Letters become meaningful one by one as the word reaches completion, just as words acquire significance in sequence until a sentence is complete. Sāṃkhya, Nyāya, Vaiśeṣika, Mīmāṃsā, and Vedānta reject sphoṭa: these systems hold that letters and their sounds adequately complete meaning. The deconstruction and dissemination associated with the French thinker Jacques Derrida are close to the theory of sphoṭa.

The Theory of Alaṃkāra

Bhāmaha treats alaṃkāra as compressed expression (samāsokti) that produces delight. Daṇḍin and Udbhaṭa also developed the theory of ornamentation. Broadly, there are two kinds of ornament: those based on words and those based on meaning. Further classifications rest upon resemblance and contrast, logic and justice, popular conventions, poetic conventions, and the perception of concealed meaning. Mammaṭa arranges sixty-one figures of speech in seven groups: upamā (simile), rūpaka (metaphor), aprastuta (indirect praise), dīpaka (distributed ornamentation), vyatireka (the demonstration of difference), virodha (opposition), and samuccaya (combination).

The Theory of Aucitya

In the Aucityavicāracarcā, Kṣemendra regards propriety as the principal element of literature. Where must such appropriateness be found? In words, sentences, the meaning of a composition, qualities, figures of speech, rasa, case relations, verbs, gender, number, adjectives, prefixes, particles, time, country, lineage, vows, fundamental principles, sattva or inward qualities, intention, temperament, the gathering of essentials, genius, condition, thought, names, and benedictions.

This universe trembles; it is nothing but vibration. After a poem has been recited, peace spreads—peace everywhere—and peace enters the mind.

Fiction and short-short fiction differ from the English-language short story and from the categories used in Maithili. Here, a story shorter than one page is laghukathā; a longer narrative of four or five to fifteen or twenty pages is a story or long story. The novel begins at roughly fifty or sixty pages.

Maithili-serving institutions founded principally upon Maithil Brahmins and Karna Kayasthas organise Vidyapati festivals, establish associations, and distribute prizes. Participation by those outside these two groups is limited, although it is now growing, which is a welcome sign for Maithili. The number of writers and readers belonging to other communities has also increased. In the modern information society, the media and the educational system have intervened in ways that resemble an assault upon Maithili language and Mithila culture. Fortunately, television channels such as Mithila, and Nepal's Kantipur FM, Janaki FM, and Radio Mithila have resisted that assault to a limited extent. The production of children's literature has grown as well. The Internet, too, has intervened in Maithili literature, though in a one-sided manner.

Discussion: A comparative study of Indian and Western dramatic theory reveals how much human thought can have in common despite geographical distance. Indian dramaturgy rests principally on Bharata's Nāṭyaśāstra and Dhanañjaya's Daśarūpaka; the authoritative Western work is Aristotle's Poetics.

Bharata describes drama as an imitation of action and of emotion, while Dhanañjaya defines it as the imitation of a condition or situation. In Indian literary theory, imitation is the work of the actor, not of the poet. In the West, imitation is regarded as the poet's task, and the actor receives no comparable discussion.

Aristotle places particular emphasis on plot. Tragedy comprises plot, characterisation, diction, thought, spectacle and song. Bharata distinguishes the ādhikārika plot, which concerns the protagonist, from the prāsaṅgika or subsidiary story that assists it. Not every play, however, must have a subsidiary plot. In No Entry: Mā Praviśa, neither a conventional principal plot nor a subsidiary one can be identified, since there is no universally acknowledged protagonist. The character who seizes a street ruffian by the collar soon recedes into the background. The ruffian before whom a thief stands submissively subsequently emerges to discourse on the philosophy that nothing new ever happens. Yama, before whom everyone trembles, finds his own authority diminished in the presence of Nibha. The beggar-woman laughs as his divine appearance is stripped away, while Ramani Mohan and Nibha eventually abuse both him and Chitragupta. The leftist and the actor fare much the same way. None of the characters is simply weak; each rebounds in response to time and circumstance.

From the standpoint of the source of the action, the story may be prakhyāta (well known), utpādya (invented), or miśra (mixed). The first is taken from history or the Purāṇas, the second is imagined, and the third combines both. In No Entry: Mā Praviśa, the possibility that the action is mixed disappears altogether when Chitragupta and Yama remove their false disguises and, as the beggar-woman laughs, Bhṛṅgī says that she too is a performer like themselves. Names such as Yama and Chitragupta do not, by themselves, make a story historical or Purāṇic: the action here is wholly invented. Aristotle divides plots into simple and complex. Because unexpected happenings flow so naturally into the action, this play may, by that classification, be called a work with a simple plot. Aristotle also relates narrative material to fable, invention and history; on those terms the play belongs to the imaginative category. The characters of Aristotelian tragedy are distinguished and noble, combining good and evil. In No Entry: Mā Praviśa, too, good and evil are mixed in every character. Nibha is of high birth, yet she becomes intimate with Ramani Mohan, who dies after being beaten following a rape. The beggar-woman is Anasuya, a Mithila painter. Yet the two gentlemen, the street ruffian and the four soldiers appear without such moral stains. Bharata calls the lover of dance and music dhīralalita, the tranquil figure dhīrapraśānta, the one with a warrior's disposition dhīrodātta, and the jealous person dhīroddhata. The street ruffian and the two gentlemen are great lovers of music; Ramani Mohan is jealous at the sight of lovers. The soldiers are calm yet have the qualities appropriate to warriors, and thus are both dhīrodātta and dhīrapraśānta. But such divisions cannot be applied consistently to No Entry: Mā Praviśa.

Indian theory describes five stages of action: beginning, effort, hope of attainment, certainty of attainment, and achievement of the result. At the stage of hope, despair about obtaining the desired outcome intervenes; at the stage of certainty, hope returns. Western theory describes an opening, development of action, climax, falling action and final outcome. Entanglement develops in the first three stages and is resolved in the final two.

The five constituents through which action develops are bīja (seed), bindu (connecting point), patākā (extended subsidiary plot), prakarī (episodic subsidiary incident), and kārya (the completed action). The seed of No Entry: Mā Praviśa is a contradiction in the world after death: an insurance agent reaches it without dying. Yama and Chitragupta turn out to be make-up artists. Through successive connecting points, characters rise and fall in importance. Patākā and prakarī belong to subsidiary narratives and are absent here. The mature form of the seed is kārya, but in this play the action ends in a sit-in protest. Aristotle calls the corresponding components beginning, middle and end. Consider now the sandhis, or dramatic junctures: mukha-sandhi joins the seed to the beginning; pratimukha-sandhi joins the connecting point to effort; garbha-sandhi joins the subsidiary plot to hope of attainment; vimarśa-sandhi joins the subsidiary incident to certainty of attainment; and nirvahaṇa-sandhi joins fulfilment of the result to the completed action. In No Entry: Mā Praviśa, only mukha, pratimukha and nirvahaṇa are present; the other two junctures are absent.

Western theory seeks unity of place, time and action. In No Entry: Mā Praviśa, the place remains the same, time proceeds continuously, and the action consists in the desire to gain admission through a gate. The events depicted in this two-hour play occupy two hours; the action, too, is single. Abhinavagupta maintains that one act should not contain more than one day's action, and that two acts should not contain events extending beyond a year. The division into kallolas in No Entry: Mā Praviśa arises from actions occurring at specified times and the delay before a fresh action begins. Dryden, however, opposed the three unities and defended the freedom of Shakespeare's plays. No such difficulty arises here. Conversations among the characters—which may also be called flashbacks —effectively show how each of them died.

In India the visual and performative nature of drama was upheld, whereas Aristotle and Plato opposed it. In the sixteenth century, however, Lodovico Castelvetro defended spectacle. Dittetart, too, supported the visual aspect, while Dryden upheld the readability of plays. Dacier supported both reading and performance. Abhinavagupta had likewise said that the full enjoyment of rasa comes after a work has been acted, although reading can also yield that enjoyment. At the beginning of the first kallola of No Entry: Mā Praviśa, it becomes clear that primacy has been given to performance. Western theatrical convention tends towards realistic representation; the Indian stage uses suggestion and symbol. Thus in Kālidāsa's Abhijñānaśākuntalam the stage direction says, iti śarasaṃdhānaṃ nāṭayati—'he acts the fitting of an arrow'. No Entry: Mā Praviśa adopts the Indian convention: the invisible wall at heaven's entrance is made intelligible through the conversations and acting of those who have died. The performative element was prominent in Aṅkiyā Nāṭ, too. The Kīrtaniyā tradition was musical, yet acting was central there also; an Aṅkiyā performance began with the playing of the mṛdaṅga. No Entry: Mā Praviśa connects itself to Maithili tradition while offering a new perspective on history, mythology and the cycles of contemporary life, and a fresh insight with which to think about them.

The dramatic succession runs through Jyotirīśvara's Dhūrtasamāgama, Vidyāpati's Gorakṣavijaya, Kīrtaniyā theatre, Aṅkiyā Nāṭ, Munshi Raghunandan Das's Mithilā Nāṭak, Jīvan Jha's Sundar Saṃyog, Īśnāth Jha's Chīnīk Laḍḍū, Govind Jha's Basāt, Maṇipadma's Tesar Kaniyā, Nachiketa's Nāyakak Nām Jīvan, Ek Chal Rājā, Shrishji's Puruṣārtha, Sudhanshu Shekhar Chaudhary's Bhapāit Chāhak Jingī, Mahendra Malangia's Kāṭhak Lok, Ram Bharos Kapari 'Bhramar's Mahiṣāsur Murdābād, and Gangesh Gunjan's Budhibadhiyā. In extending this tradition, Nachiketa's No Entry: Mā Praviśa repeatedly rejects the rationality and presumed objectivity of modernity. Yama even tells the leftist that what he sees is not necessarily true; it might be a dream. The play questions the completeness of scientific knowledge. Truth and falsehood are described from each person's point of view. The thief has his own argument, while the leftist says that a thief cannot become a leader, yet when a leader takes to stealing the thief's profession is threatened. The play displays self-centred humour, while distinctions between good and bad repeatedly dissolve. Even Yama and Chitragupta live behind masks. Alongside these postmodern traits, multiple and different characters emerge from the same person, as in the case of the high-born woman. No event yields a complete meaning, and one never knows when truth will turn into falsehood. The play seems crowded with the superficial thought and characters of postmodernity. There is certainly no optimism, but neither is there pessimism: what remains is a kind of madness. Nothing can be considered in only one way; several ways of thinking coexist. Instead of faith in consequences arising from causes, control and plans, the play shows greater faith in outcomes produced by coincidence. Democratic and feminist perspectives, the red flag, and other ideological symbols are objects of laughter and playful mockery.

Thus No Entry: Mā Praviśa presents a postmodern outlook in which readers encounter various problems raised within the dramatic action. The contradiction displayed at its end does not astonish a reader of the postmodern age, for that reader confronts similar contradictions every day.

Review of a Short-Story Collection

In most of the stories in Subhash Chandra Yadav's collection Banait Bigarait (Making and Unmaking), one finds that the narrative advances with a theme rather than merely telling an anecdote, and ends as soon as its work has been accomplished. Its second distinguishing quality is its language. The language of Balchanma is the autobiographical speech of that novel's central character, whereas here the language belongs to the storyteller himself; in that sense, it acquires a distinctive form. On the one hand, Yadav's stories resist the convention by which storytelling becomes a didactic tale, maintain the theme within a limited compass, and attend to a thoroughly indigenous linguistic craft. These combined qualities will give one section of readers immense pleasure. On the other hand, readers who have not yet moved beyond anecdotal tales will not be disappointed by the collection; rather, it will refine their taste.

Some questions of linguistic standardisation arise, for example the forms 'ऐछ', 'अछि' and 'अ इ छ'. These needed attention when standardisation was taking place. One might, for instance, write 'जाति रही' instead of 'जाइत रही', then formulate a rule for pronouncing 'जाति' as 'जा इ त'; the issue of 'ऐछ' and 'अछि' is similar. It is rather late now. The author himself points towards a solution through his usage in Kaniyā-Putarā, yet reverts to another form in his other stories. This makes the need to settle on a standard form all the clearer. If one writes 'छै', that is acceptable; if one writes 'छैक', a pronunciation rule must establish that the final 'क' is silent. The need is for an early and generally accepted settlement. People today do not have a lifetime to argue whether one should write 'य' or 'ए'. Follow phonetic principles, or frame explicit rules of pronunciation. Writing 'नञि' for 'नहि' can be understood, but among 'नइँ' (Antikā), 'नइं' (NBT), and 'नँइ' (Saketanand, Kālarātriśca Dāruṇā), Saketanand's usage is more appropriate according to phonetics. If this is doubted, consult a phonetics laboratory. (An audio file of the scientific and standard Maithili alphabet is available for listening to or downloading through the Videha Audio link in the Videha archive, http://www.videha.co.in/.)

An important feature of Banait Bigarait is therefore Yadav's particular phonetic writing practice, which can advance the debate on standardisation.

The journey of the story extends through Vedic narratives, Jātaka tales, Aesop's fables, the Pañcatantra and the Hitopadeśa, alongside the continuing folk ballads. Folk narrative exists everywhere beside the stories of the elite.

The prospect of failure is greater for a short story than for a novel, epic or extended narrative, because a novel resembles a 'soap opera' that proceeds for months or years, each episode ending at some point of suspense. A novel of seventy episodes can sustain hope through sixty-nine of them that the story will take a turn; even if nothing changes by the end, all the earlier episodes are hits and only the final episode is a flop. A short story grants no such allowance. It is a work of one episode: if it is good, it is very good; otherwise, it is simply bad.

Moving beyond narrative and ballad, the history of the modern short story begins in the late nineteenth century. Its forms came to be described as the very short story, the story, and fiction, though the distinctions among the three have also been explained at unnecessary length. Beginning with Rabindranath Tagore, this journey advanced across India as a consequence of reformist movements. Bezbarua in Assamese, Fakir Mohan Senapati in Odia, Apparao in Telugu, and Kedarnath Banerjee in Bengali all appeared, sometimes in support of women and sometimes against the usurers of society. In Nepali, Suryakant Gyaawali wrote 'Devīko Bali' against the practice of animal sacrifice during Dussehra. Some stories opposed barriers of caste and wealth to love; others explored the condition of Dalit society and religious superstition. Nor did these stories invariably end happily.

Ideologies and literature: postmodernism, existentialism and humanism are all philosophical schools of thought. Earlier, philosophy included science, history, society and politics, economics, the arts and language. As the branches of science and the arts, particularly science, acquired specialisation, philosophy moved towards mathematics, mathematical logic, and analytical methods of induction and deduction. Marx, who was like a divine intervention for the poor throughout the world, made the dialectical method the basis of his interpretation. What we now call 'discussion' or debate, bringing both sides of an argument together, was already present in the method of refutation and defence of philosophical positions, especially in the six systems of Indian philosophy (see Mādhavācārya's Sarvadarśanasaṃgraha).

Francis Fukuyama, who proclaimed the end of history after the fall of communist government, later withdrew from that position. Postmodernism, too, has faltered after its initial enthusiasm. Existentialism, humanism, progressivism, Romanticism and sociological analysis have all survived by becoming part of synthetic approaches to criticism. Psychoanalysis, grounded in scientific inquiry, will survive like the dialectical method.

What is a modern short story? What should it be like? Does it have a purpose, or ought it to have one? And how can that purpose be determined?

Psychology can also provide a foundation for a story. Its purpose should change with society's needs, and the changing journey of storytelling should correspond to changes occurring in society. Yet the story is, at the same time, inevitably conditioned by the culture of that society, through which its historical existence becomes visible.

If we speak of Vedic narratives, they bring out love for the nation and teach people to live together in society. The Jātaka tales seek not only the spread of popular language but also the dissemination of Buddhism. The tales of the Muslim world include Rumi's Masnavi, a distinguished work of Persian literature that teaches the importance of knowledge and the advancement of the state. Stories today encompass these purposes and move towards the creation of an enlightened and humane (!) society. Where that is not the case, it ought to become part of their purpose. Only then can the analysis and criticism of a story become a compelling necessity for the reader.

After communist rule ended and the Berlin Wall fell, Francis Fukuyama declared that history, created by clashes among ideologies, had reached its end and that only an ideology working for human welfare would advance. Later he retreated from that judgment, saying that many different ideologies continued to survive within societies and between national identities. Similarly, the postmodern thinker Jacques Derrida deconstructed language to show that its divided parts rest on numerous different foundations, and that we cannot establish meaning without understanding them.

Like psychoanalysis and dialectics, the analyses of Fukuyama and Derrida will remain enduring models for criticism through processes of synthesis.

Subhash Chandra Yadav's Short-Story Collection Banait Bigarait: Yadav belongs to the generation of storytellers after independence. Through fiction he gives form to life. He endows stories with both craft and substance, making them meaningful. It is only natural that his stories should reveal the struggle of ordinary people for existence. Perhaps Badariya, in his story 'Kāṭhak Banal Lok', written several decades ago, was laughing by coincidence. The characters in the present collection have comparable peculiarities. In a hospital one character wakes after crying himself to sleep and begins crying again; another has fallen in love. Some possess business sense, while a character like Harivansh does harm in return for a good deed because of a system fault.

For Whom Should We Write—or Tell—Stories? Ideologies of Fiction

Those about whom we write will not read what we write. Will reading stories make people enlightened? There is no shortage of people who swear by the Gītā and then tell lies. Does the importance of a story written with such a criterion in mind thereby diminish?

Even if everyone does not become enlightened, they can at least enjoy wholesome entertainment. If just one person reads a story and begins to think in that direction, the story has demonstrated its value. Even if those for whom the story was written do not read it, people who are able to intervene in their circumstances will do so. As long as that possibility remains, stories of this kind will continue to be written.

If society changes, will social values remain eternal? Should progressive fiction reconstruct experience for a changing society, bringing natural and social realities into adjustment with one another? Or does a changing age need stories based on the enduring, essential elements of tradition, so that it may acquire stability? There is a duality between individual and social interests, and the two often oppose one another. They must be brought into relation. A world-view is essential. Fiction is not merely a thought produced and transferred haphazardly from ink to paper; it is directed by social and historical conditions.

Should a story, then, be idealistic, naturalistic or realistic? Should it instead be humanistic, socialistic or a sensory realism that accords importance to experience? Or should it be purposive? This last outlook includes utilitarianism, experimentalism, pragmatism, causalism, instrumentalism and consequentialism. It is the most modern perspective. Self-expression is part of human nature, but it is restricted by social rules and affected by circumstances.

A story should therefore be fashioned through a reconstruction of experience. Individual consciousness will then become social and collective consciousness. The exploiter will have to curb his own tendencies, and the exploited will have to resist them openly.

Freedom—social change. Only then will the story communicate; it will become a means of dialogue. Only then can fiction become a weapon for society, a source of strength.

If the storyteller preaches, he merely transfers knowledge, and that is no longer what is needed. When the storyteller begins a dialogue, an atmosphere of liberation becomes possible, and readers who participate in that dialogue are freed from inertia.

The story must be sequential and accessible to achieve this purpose. It must become practical rather than merely intellectual. The openness of the narratives of Vedic literature gave rise to dialogue, which the rigidity of Purāṇic literature subsequently destroyed.

Restoring dialogue requires confidence in the storyteller—confidence based on argument and on experience—and Subhash Chandra Yadav possesses both. The analytical philosophy of positivism examines linguistic statements and concepts rather than objects. This is visible throughout Yadav's stories. Analytical or logical positivism and existentialism emerged as reactions to science; in this process, ambiguous scientific ideas were clarified.

Phenomenology studies what is given to consciousness precisely as it is given. Experience is the observation of the facts of particular mental acts, a means of seeing things disinterestedly and in their purity. In existentialism, the human being alone is the human being; one is nothing apart from what one creates and is condemned to be free, as Sartre says. Through Hegelian dialectics, emphasis falls on judging the nature and existence of processes through the endless interrelation of analysis and synthesis. The deeper the essential element, the further it is from external form and the closer to reality.

Quantum theory and the uncertainty principle have also influenced modern thinking. Behind visible reality, inner and outer processes become possible through exchanges among minute particles of force and energy. Under the principle of uncertainty, position and form must be determined approximately.

Imagining a world with more than three dimensions, together with Stephen Hawking's A Brief History of Time, directly undermines the existence of God, for it also brings the notion of God's death to the fore: the existence of the ruler of the universe is now endangered. In a perspective shaped by the death of God and the end of history, how long will Maithili fiction go on merely telling tales? How long will it remain absorbed in analysing the short-short story, the very short story, the story and fiction under their separate names?

Just as virtual reality presents reality artificially and fuses consciousness with it, so, unless we conceive more than three dimensions, we could begin travelling at the speed of light from the age of the Indus Valley civilisation and still not have crossed the universe today. This sun is one ordinary star —one mediocre star—among billions upon billions of others. We live on one of its planets, Earth, in some town or village, sitting with our hands on our heads in anxiety and asking whose problem could be greater than our own. These scientific and philosophical facts confront our fiction as challenges.

A holistic synthesis, a coordination of totality, will be necessary! Only then will philosophy move from the merely philosophical to the real.

Poststructuralist methodology derives linguistic meaning not simply from words, their meanings, or the rules of grammar, but from the process through which meaning is produced. It assumes different meanings for different individuals and groups. There is no final relation between language and the world; neither words nor their texts possess a final or single, uniquely fixed meaning.

Modernity arose from modern and postmodern arguments, reality, dialogue and exchanges of ideas. But then New Left movements appeared in France, alongside ideologies such as nihilism and anarchism. These arose from distrust of the beliefs and assumptions of the modern system of thought.

Hidden meanings in texts began to be interpreted in relation to time and place; language came to be treated as a game—a language game. Postmodernism emerged as a critique of power, legitimacy and the hierarchies of both.

In the computer and information revolution, a software developer creates a program and places it on the World Wide Web. The program continues working independently of its maker, sometimes doing things for which its maker did not design it. Other interfering programs, such as viruses, divert it and turn it destructive. An antivirus program is also software, designed to correct the problem; if even that cannot set matters right, the computer is backed up and formatted—a clean slate!

Capitalism was born with the Industrial Revolution. Now, in post-industrial society, the importance of information and communication has increased relative to production, and the role of the computer in society has expanded. Mobile phones, credit cards and similar objects are chip-based. During this year's (2008) Kosi floods, Analkantji was trapped in his village, struggling to obtain food, yet he was able to book an air-conditioned train ticket with a credit card. What better example could one require of information and computers in Mithila's society?

Deconstruction and reconstruction indicate a remaking of the processes by which thought is composed, as consciousness takes new forms in the post-industrial age. History itself has not ended, but traditional history has. The state, class, nation, political party, society, family, morality and marriage are all being redefined. Many institutions have become fragmented and lost their contexts as a result of rapid change.

In this setting, let us take a close look at the history of the Maithili story. Ramdev Jha regarded Jaldhar Jha's 'Vilakṣaṇ Dāmpatya' (Maithil Hit Sādhan, Jaipur, 1906) as the beginning of the modern Maithili short story. Then came Pulkit Mishra's 'Mohinī Mohan' (1907–08), Janseidan's 'Tārāk Vaidhavya' (Mithilā Mihir, 1917), Shrikrishna Thakur's Chandraprabhā, Tulapati Singh's Madanrāj Charit, Kali Kumar Das's Adalāk Badlā and Kāminīk Jīvan, Shyamanand Jha's Akiñchan, Shri Ballabh Jha's Vilāsitā, Harinandan Thakur 'Saroj's Īśvarīya Rakṣā, Shardanand Thakur 'Vinay's Tārā, Shyam Sundar Jha 'Madhup's Pratijñā-Patra, Vaidyanath Mishra 'Vidyasindhu's Gapp-Sappak Kharihān, and Prabodh Narayan Singh's Bīchal Phūl. This journey was carried forward by Harimohan Jha's stories and Yatri's novellas; Rajkamal Chaudhary, Lalit, Ramdev Jha, Balram, Prabhas Kumar Chaudhary, Dhumketu, Rajmohan Jha, Saketanand, Vibhuti Anand, Sundar Jha 'Shastri', Dhirendra, Rajendra Kishore, Revati Raman Lal, Rajendra Vimal, Rambhadra, Ashok, Shivshankar Srinivas, Pradip Bihari, Ramesh, Maneshwar Manuj, Shyam Darihare, Kumar Pawan, Anmol Jha, Mithilesh Kumar Jha, Harishchandra Jha, Upadhyay Bhushan, Ram Bharos Kapari 'Bhramar', Bhuvaneshwar Pathey, Badri Narayan Verma, Ayodhyanath Chaudhary, R. N. Sudhakar, Jitendra Jeet, Surendra Labh, Jaynarayan Jha 'Jigyasu', Shyam Sundar 'Shashi', Ramesh Ranjan, Dhirendra Premarshi, Parmeshwar Kapari, Taranand Viyogi, Nagendra Kumar, Amarnath, Devshankar Navin, Analkant, Shridharam, Nita Jha, Vibha Rani, Ushakiran Khan, Susmita Pathak, Shephalika Verma, Jyotsna Chandram and Lalpari Devi.

Is there no good fiction in Maithili? No good drama? Does Maithili have no grammar? Where is the grammatical analysis of forms such as panisoh and panigar, or of anal and pāvak? Yet Dinbandhu Jha's book on verbal forms contains 1,025 such indigenous forms, and Ramanath Jha's Mithilābhāṣāprakāś contains an authentic Maithili grammar. With these two reference books, the construction of a standard language and grammar is entirely possible. What happens instead is rather like writing, in an analysis of the First Battle of Panipat, that the battle was fought between Panipat and Babur. Dhirendra has described Rambhadra as the greatest Maithili short-story writer, but how many of his stories have actually been analysed so far? These questions had to be raised in relation to Nachiketa's drama, the work of Mahendra Malangia—the Shakespeare of Maithili—and the course of storytelling represented by Rambhadra and Subhash Chandra Yadav.

At a time when the central problem of Maithili is its expulsion from household after household, people who have tried their hand at Hindi without attaining recognition turn to Maithili stories and poems, become editors and critics, and weigh down the literary atmosphere with their ambitions. Marxism, feminism and secularism are thrust repeatedly into stories and poems, and these labels then serve to determine standards; ideology becomes a fence sheltering mediocrity. Those engaged in exploiting and discouraging the poor and people of lower castes seek refuge in Marxism; those who have insulted women take refuge in feminism, the demand for a Mithila state, and associations; and communalists take refuge in secularism. Communalists have also been seen among feminists, opponents of women among Marxists, and many such combinations within literary factions and establishments. One group praises Rajkamal, another Yatri or Dhumketu, another Sumanji, while advancing themselves under the cover of deciding which side these writers supposedly represent. 'Yatri's Pāro and the stories of Rajkamal and Dhumketu have still not been accepted'—such absurd pronouncements are made. Some editors produce collections of supposedly controversial stories, create the controversy themselves and use it for self-promotion. Competition confined largely to writing by Maithil Brahmins and Karna Kayasthas has unsettled these poets and storytellers; after leaving Hindi for Maithili, they perform these manoeuvres with such speed that one wonders when they will notice Maithili's principal problem. Do they believe that writing in Maithili after Hindi will win them immediate acceptance? If Maithili writers suffer such illusions and such a lack of confidence in the communicative power of their mother tongue (!), what pretence are we sustaining by entrusting the language's future to them? At seminars I am astonished to see such combative, Sahitya Akademi award-winning storytellers, editors and critics speaking with their own sons, daughters and wives not in Maithili but in Hindi (English usually being beyond their abilities). When there were twenty people writing in Maithili and five reading it, what controversy could have arisen? Having read the individual works of Rajkamal and Yatri, I can say that their Maithili writing is gentle in tone. Under such circumstances, why introduce the claim that 'this poem contained a controversy' or 'that story contained one', and then polish one's reputation by arguing for it? Next come pronouncements about the 'first novelist after Yatri' and the 'first poet after Rajkamal'; now pairs of poets and storytellers appear, devoted to one another and promoting their mutual ideological faction. Maithili's chief problem is that the language is dying under the weight of the competing ambitions of this limited and fiercely combative group. Poets and storytellers have turned Maithili into a career, excluded it from their homes, and made it an object of seminars. Where, then, are the readers, and what is this talk of controversy? Where are the stories and poems that will help create a Maithili-speaking environment for children and encourage people of every caste to love the language? How many science stories, and how much literature and poetry for children and adolescents, are these careerist writers producing? What efforts are being made to bring such work into every home? In an atmosphere of printing a hundred or two hundred copies of a book, arranging its reviews, publishing in journals of a hundred or two hundred copies, making folders of photocopies to keep at home, and manipulating prizes and syllabus selections, my hope has come to rest with readers and writers outside the Maithil Brahmin–Karna Kayastha circle.

Those who could not manage their own households sit surrounded by language awards and busy themselves with creating a Mithila state. How they would govern a state, and in which language they would speak in its legislature when they came to receive an award there, I do not know.

People who do not speak Maithili at home have become writers and poets, equally at home in Hindi and Maithili; they think and write in Hindi, then translate the result and call it original Maithili writing! They call this Maithili fiction and poetry!

They shamelessly receive prizes for translations into Maithili from Marathi, Urdu, Tamil and Kannada. Ask them what vaṇakkam means: they cannot tell you. They do not know alif, be, se; they cannot speak in Marathi even with a child. They escape having their shortcomings exposed in Maithili because they have their own work printed and reviewed, while there are no readers. The absence of readers benefits them. And when jury members and advisory boards come forward to promote themselves through these prizes, the weakness of confidence among this small circle of competitors becomes plain. Sarang Kumar is there, and Balram has begun to be discussed once again as a storyteller. What of those writers whose children did not enter literature? Who will discuss them and present their case? While alive, everyone promotes his own position; but after death? These truths about Maithili literature must be brought into the open. Even with their eyes closed, people continue searching for a solution.

Becoming a Marxist or a feminist, turning even that into a trade, and making up for one's own inadequate literary stature in this fashion have become weapons for writers of little talent within a restricted competition. Why would anyone who respects Marx feel compelled to announce, 'I am a Marxist critic' or 'I am a Marxist writer'? But what can one say about those who trade in Marx? A trade has likewise developed around Suman, Rajkamal, Yatri, Manipadma, Dhumketu and others, and the reason is clear enough. National surveys show that those unable to secure admission to other subjects end up studying Sanskrit, Hindi, Maithili and other literatures in college; the same people enter journalism. Such devotees of literature, impoverished in talent, have acquired a taste for it: will Maithili's future be safe in their hands? Yet alongside this reality, the road ahead awaits us. A generation of genuine workers for Maithili, storytellers and readers ready to go among the dust and dirt, writing literature for children and women and dedicating their energies simply to keeping Maithili alive, will certainly emerge.

The lack of firmness in the personal life of a storyteller or poet—whether towards an ideology, caste or religion—shows itself in the literature. Such writing may be revised and expanded time and again without escaping its fundamental fault. There is scope for literary blackmailers to use stories and poems for personal self-praise and attacks on others. Premshankar Singh, however, identifies this tendency through evidence-based evaluation. He identifies the casteism and communalism that enter the work; he also asks how literature afflicted by an inferiority complex can contribute to the common good. In Maithili literature, where the number of readers is virtually nil, one writer reviews another; personal ego and blackmail have ample scope. Attend a few conferences of poets and fiction writers: the announcer's introductions and the applause will reveal the prejudices of the announcer and the writers. In this context, this collection offers a new perspective. It maps one-sided presentations against changing social, economic, political and religious equations and distinguishes critical appraisal from mere gossip and talk.

Stratification within castes, disputes between castes, polygamy, child marriage and the bikauā system of marriage: there was not even a symbolic movement against child marriage or in favour of widow remarriage. The Śūdra poet Ailūṣa composed Vedic hymns, and society once possessed such strength that Alexander met fierce resistance from the confederation of the Śūdras. In Mithila, too, when its artisans and the people considered to occupy society's lower levels were strong, the name Janaka was derived from jana, 'the people'. There then emerged the chain of Simraungarh, Pajebagarh, Balirajpur Fort, Asurgarh Fort, Jaynagar Fort, Nandangarh, Katragarh, Naulagarh, Mangalgarh, Kichakgarh, Benugarh and Varijangarh as expressions of Mithila's architectural culture. These fortresses were in keeping with the name Mithila, a land that could crush its enemies. Buddhist caves and images of Tārā, among others, also reveal other forms of artisanal art. But as orthodoxy increased, Mithila was left with virtually no achievement in architecture. Economic conditions deteriorated until people were going without an evening meal. Migration checked starvation, but at a price. Similarly, scholars such as Maitreyī disappeared for a millennium because of caste rigidity, both differentiation within caste and divisions between castes. Education declined so far that, although four of the six philosophical systems arose from Mithila, today entire villages are full of people who have not passed the matriculation examination.

The proletarian culture of the Maithils is passing through a revolutionary upheaval. Migration can be a good thing; but when, within one generation, village after village has been emptied, it becomes a curse for the culture concerned. Twenty per cent of Maithil culture lies in Nepal and eighty per cent in India. Migration has produced economic, social, political and cultural crises here.

Among the various prose genres—treatises, essays, criticism, stories and fiction, novels, epistolary literature, travel memoirs, reportage and others—stories, narratives and novels rest particularly on imagination blended with experience. They are closely related to what we call khissā-pihānī, the telling of tales. Stories, narratives and novels, and to some extent plays and one-act plays, are heard, told, read or performed for entertainment. They may have a purpose, or they may embrace purposelessness—absurdity—for even literature without an explicit purpose can entertain amid life's ceaseless rush.

The name laghukathā designates a genre that is, first and foremost, a story, and only then a short-short story. The short-short story, short story, longer story, novel, play and one-act play all rest on imagination enriched by experience. English, too, makes distinctions according to length—short story, novelette, novella and novel—which can be used respectively for laghukathā, kathā, dīrgha kathā and upanyās. The word counts of all these genres fluctuate more in Maithili than in English and other European languages, although in those languages too there is variation according to each writer's taste and the requirements of the subject. Similarly, the one-act play corresponds to ekāṅkī, and the full play to nāṭak.

A short-short story is, therefore, a story all the same.

Your imagination, mingled with experience, urges you to say something. What you have to say may take the form of a humorous miniature or a non-humorous miniature. People may tell you that you have an inexhaustible stock of anecdotes, that you are quick-witted. Emboldened by this, you shape that material in the mould of literary craft and make it into a short-short story.

The main difficulty with a humorous miniature is that the joke you tell will circulate and eventually come back to you: somewhere along the way its originality is lost. Such a miniature may range from a line or two to half a page or a page. It can be incorporated into a story or novel, but the short-short story does not allow it the same space. Yet what one does in a story or novel—placing the miniature in a character's mouth, or connecting it with another incident so that it acquires meaning—can also be done in a short-short story. Fiction grows out of narrative; moral tales, inspirational stories and mystical tales also exist in forms ranging from brief to extended. It is not the case that their shorter forms cannot be short-short stories.

The rapid presentation of a thought often seen in the short-short story is also found in stories and novels. But the absence of an instantly presented thought does not disqualify a work from being a short-short story. Quite the contrary: when examining one, a critic should attend to its enduring elements, not merely its speed of presentation. Too great an inclination towards the instant thought turns it into a non-humorous miniature: it may still be a short-short story, but it will not be a distinguished one. The claim that a short-short story must strike the reader with a jolt in order to qualify as a story, or as a great story, is mistaken. It is perfectly reasonable to jot down a sudden thought lest it be forgotten. But before hastily making it into a short-short story, allow the idea to mature. Consider what might be combined with it so that it acquires an enduring quality. One may, of course, write a jolting short-short story without allowing the idea to mature, but its chances of becoming an outstanding work are slight. A flashy song does not necessarily retain its effect for long; similarly, we must ask whether this form of storytelling is becoming a kind of Twenty20 cricket.

A novel cannot be read in a single sitting, whereas a short story can. In one sitting, several short-short stories can be read. The novelist can describe setting, plot and character with a fullness unavailable to the short-story writer. A short story focuses on one aspect—or, one might say, one event —and in doing so can offer no more than a broad descriptive sketch of the setting and a person's life. A short-short story does not even permit this broad sketch; it provides too little room for it. Yet it too is centred on a single aspect or event. That aspect or event should be one that continually tempts the author to write it as an independent work, rather than destroy its independence by making it part of a story or novel.

The plot of a story will therefore be simpler than the plot of a novel; for a short-short story, even such a plot is not essential. Mould the description of an aspect or event through literary craft, and a complete short-short story is ready.

The Critical Theory of the Short-Short Story

How should a short-short story be reviewed? An imaginative narrative mixed with experience, extending from a line or two to a page and a half or two pages (and sometimes even five pages), may properly be called a laghukathā. If an entire story is told completely within such a small form, however, it will no longer be called a short-short story. Where a sequence of events is required to convey the substance, the sequence must be complete, even if its links grow somewhat longer. Haste to produce an instant effect may weaken the sequence. Reversing the current at every turn and bringing in a sudden effect have become a formula for certain celebrated short-short-story writers. In one or two pieces, this may seem attractive, like an 'item song' in a film; thereafter, the critic notices the device, because it becomes reactive rather than proactive. It produces no lasting effect and reveals a limitation in the writer's talent. The best short-short story builds a sequence of events and leaves judgment to the reader. It has no room for prolonged explanation, but that does not mean the matter must be disposed of in two or four lines. If an author calls such a two- or four-line piece a short-short story, the critic must accept that classification, although the likelihood of its being an outstanding short-short story diminishes.

The subjects of the short-short story need not be confined to fleeting incidents from everyday life. Writers should also compose short-short stories for children, for moral education and on religious subjects. At present, much of the material comes only from travelling by train or bus or from conversations around the fire on the veranda at home. Social and economic problems could provide enduring subjects; political questions and natural disasters could also be addressed. A critic should not evaluate the genre as though it were the Purāṇic habit of saying that Śiva is supreme in the Śiva Purāṇa and Garuḍa in the Garuḍa Purāṇa. That is, one must not assume that whatever happens to be written automatically constitutes a short-short story. The novel gives a writer ample room to display the full range of talent; the short story offers less, and the short-short story less still. But by enlarging the range of subjects, writers can meet readers' demands. Stories and short-short stories can be strengthened by keeping dialogue to a minimum or placing it before an exposition; otherwise, they risk becoming one-act plays or full plays. A short-short story may be included in a story or novel, but inserting a humorous miniature into the short-short story ought to be avoided from the critical point of view. Space is already scarce, and if conversation and a joke are pushed into it as well, its effect will not endure.

A good short-short story will be judged not by the speed of its presentation but by the human values sharply expressed within it, its elements of social harmony, and the principles of social life founded upon equality and justice. We must ask whether it conveys, with equal sharpness, how society can advance on that basis. Does it free readers' minds from constraints? Does it endow them with the strength of character and self-confidence to lead others? Does it dispel doubts concerning moral development and respect for labour? All these will be standards of the short-short story. People on society's margins can achieve things beyond the power of the privileged, but only when their self-confidence is strengthened. How can literature burdened with an inferiority complex serve the common good? One-sided representations must be identified against the changing equations of society, economics, politics and religion. The instability of the storyteller's or poet's personal life, whether in relation to ideology or caste and religion, becomes visible in the work. One must also recognise the feeling of superiority—another form of inferiority—that arises when exploiters write about their benefactions towards the exploited, or write out of guilt. Identify mediocrity: clichés and the passing 'breaking news' of the day presented in the name of modernity. Such writing cannot give us the ideas required to understand an age. Modernisation, democratisation, implementation of the nation-state, administrative and legal development, increased public participation, stability and the capacity for orderly change, the dynamics of power, industrialisation, the political, social, economic and cultural problems of new states after independence, and processes of change and integration are sometimes mutually contradictory. There are also the development of community, and psychological and educational processes.

Adivasi groups such as the Satar and Gidarmara reflect diversity and differing levels of development: closeness to nature, nature worship, simplicity, guilelessness and gratitude. A person's standing is based on place and caste. Some castes enjoy status and privilege; others face contempt and hard lives. In the development of women and children, attention must be given to women's rights, to activating the education system, to women's studies in the curriculum and to raising women's participation in vocational and technical education. There are women's liberation and women's movements. Secular political institutions ought to rest upon the economic and social interests of the entire community, without distinctions of religion, race or sect. If educational development precedes economic development, ordinary people can participate in the latter; their creative capacity grows, and they acquire a sense of responsibility.

Science and technology, the gulf between developed and undeveloped countries, and the human problems arising from that gulf—disease, ignorance and insecurity—raise questions of solutions, aspirations, hope, and the boundless expansion and foundations of material facilities. Law and order should be employed to deliver justice to poor and disadvantaged people. Civil liberties, democratic human rights, independent thought, the creation of a capable society, and freedom from restrictions and coercion must be defended. The press, as a link between rulers and ruled, has a role in social, economic and political life; powerful advertising agencies, however, now influence public opinion. New institutions must be established, or existing ones reformed, against feudal, tribal, caste and sectarian loyalties: democracy, liberalism, republicanism, constitutionalism, socialism, egalitarianism, constitutional rights, regular popular elections, popular sovereignty, federal division of powers, the importance of public opinion, public-administrative processes and initiatives, the organisation of party interests, a supreme legislature, a responsible executive and an independent judiciary all belong here. Harmful changes in the physical, chemical and biological qualities of water, earth, air and the sky produce pollution and ecological imbalance.

Art: ought it to have any theoretical purpose? Art is an aestheticised presentation of the world. The art of beauty stands alongside utility; a philosophy of life and a tradition may be bound up with the ideal of artistic completeness. The emotional atmosphere involves the aesthetic perception of truth and artistic activity, the beautiful and the concrete, the abstract. Mental activity belongs to human beings as thinking creatures who experience both the mental and the material. Contradiction, false appearance and obscurity must also be considered. Marxism advocates the social realism of the novel. Freud considers every human being mysterious; he chooses literary works as material through which to analyse their writers. Neo-Freudians, in contrast, give priority to cultural rather than biological elements. New Criticism is based upon close and detailed attention to the work. Postmodernism, existentialism and humanism are philosophical schools. Philosophy earlier included science, history, society and politics, economics, the arts and language. As scientific and artistic fields became specialised, particularly science, philosophy moved towards mathematics, mathematical logic, and analytical methods of induction and deduction. Marx, like a divine intervention on behalf of the world's poor, made dialectics the basis of his interpretation. The contemporary 'discussion', a debate embracing both sides, already existed in the Indian philosophical practice of refutation and defence, especially in the six schools (see Mādhavācārya's Sarvadarśanasaṃgraha).

Francis Fukuyama, who had declared the end of history after the collapse of communist rule, subsequently retreated from the declaration. Postmodernism, too, has faltered after its initial enthusiasm. Existentialism, humanism, progressivism, Romanticism and sociological analysis survive within synthetic methods of criticism. Psychoanalysis, because of its basis in scientific inquiry, will survive like the dialectical method. Psychology may also be the foundation of a story. Its purpose should follow society's needs, and the changes in the journey of fiction should correspond to changes that have occurred and are occurring in society. At the same time, fiction is necessarily governed by the culture of that society, and its historical existence comes to light within the story. Vedic narratives express love of country and teach people to live together.

Jātaka stories aim to disseminate Buddhism alongside popular language. Among the stories of the Muslim world, Rumi's Masnavi, a distinguished work of Persian literature, teaches the importance of knowledge and the advancement of the state. Contemporary fiction gathers all these concerns and moves towards building an enlightened and humane society. Fukuyama announced that history created by the struggle of competing ideologies had ended, leaving only ideologies for human welfare to advance; yet he later conceded that many distinct ideologies survive within societies and among national identities.

The postmodern outlook criticises the claim that scientific knowledge is complete. It depicts truth and falsehood from different points of view; it employs self-centred humour and repeatedly dissolves distinctions between good and evil. One never knows when truth may turn into falsehood. Superficial thought is present, with neither optimism nor pessimism, but an apparent madness: things can be thought about in several ways rather than one. There is less faith in outcomes arising from causes, control and planning than in outcomes arising from coincidence. Democratic and feminist standpoints, the red flag and other ideological signs become objects of ironic laughter. Through globalisation, postmodernity brought to attention questions concerning women and communities excluded from the mainstream. It opposed ideology and universal goals but could offer no answer. Similarly, Jacques Derrida deconstructed language to demonstrate that its fragments depend upon many different foundations and that meaning cannot be understood without them.

To restore dialogue, a storyteller needs confidence grounded in reasoning and experience. Analytical positivism examines linguistic statements and concepts rather than objects. Analytical or logical positivism and existentialism arose as reactions to science and helped clarify the ambiguity of scientific thought. Phenomenology studies what is given to consciousness as given. Experience is observation of the facts of particular mental acts, a way of examining objects without bias and in their purity. In existentialism, the human being alone is the human being; one is nothing apart from what one creates and is condemned to freedom, as Sartre maintains. Hegelian dialectics emphasises judgments of the nature and existence of processes through the endless interrelation of analysis and synthesis. The deeper the essential principle, the further it stands from outer form and the nearer to reality. Quantum theory and the uncertainty principle have influenced modern thought. Invisible inner and outer processes depend upon exchanges of tiny units of force and energy. Under uncertainty, position and form must be estimated rather than known exactly. The conception of a universe of more than three dimensions, and Stephen Hawking's A Brief History of Time, directly undermine the existence of God, for the concept of God's death thereby comes to the fore. Just as virtual reality artificially presents reality and brings consciousness into union with it, so, without conceiving more than three dimensions, even travelling at light speed from the time of the Indus Valley civilisation would not have carried us beyond the universe today. These philosophical and scientific facts confront the short-short story as challenges. A holistic synthesis, a coordination of the whole, is required! Only then does philosophy become real rather than merely philosophical.

Poststructuralist methodology locates meaning not in words, their assigned senses or grammatical rules alone, but in the process through which meaning is made. It takes different meanings for different people and groups. There is no final relation between language and the world; no word or text has one final or uniquely determined meaning. Modernity arose from arguments about modern and postmodern reason, reality, dialogue and exchanges of thought. New Left movements then appeared in France, alongside nihilist and anarchist movements, all emerging out of distrust in the concepts and convictions of modern modes of thought. The hidden meanings of texts began to be explained in their temporal and spatial contexts, and language became a game—a language game. Postmodernism appeared as a critique of power, legitimacy and their hierarchies.

In the computer and information revolution, a maker creates software and places it on the World Wide Web, where it continues to function independently, sometimes performing tasks that were not designed for it. Other programs, such as viruses, interfere, divert it and make it destructive. Antivirus software can correct the damage; if even that fails, the computer is backed up and reformatted—a clean slate! Capitalism arose from the Industrial Revolution; now, in post-industrial society, information and communication have grown in importance relative to production, and computers assume a greater role in social life. Mobile phones, credit cards and similar objects rely on chips. Deconstruction and reconstruction indicate a reorganisation of thought and creation as consciousness assumes new forms in the post-industrial age. History has not ended, but traditional history has: the state, class, nation, party, society, family, morality and marriage are all being redefined. In the wake of rapid changes, many institutions have fragmented and lost their contexts.

A short-short story describes one aspect or event, and it need not be written on a single page. You can describe that event over three or four pages and it will still remain a short-short story. All the stories in James Joyce's Dubliners portray the sudden recognition of something through a particular event. Joyce's collection of fifteen stories runs to two hundred pages and possesses all the characteristics of the Maithili short-short story. Similarly, many stories by Khalil Gibran and Anton Chekhov remain short-short stories despite being relatively long. In English and European literature, 'short story' and 'story' are sometimes used synonymously. The novel—called upanyās in Bengali and Maithili, and kādambarī in Marathi —has a much greater scope. In Maithili, a work of fifty or sixty pages may already be regarded as a novel, although this length lies at the upper boundary of the English short story, novelette and novella. But Maithili differs from English. A children's tale may continue for several nights, while an adult's story may end in minutes. It has now become apparent that, in Maithili, the short-short story occupies one page, the story three or four pages, the longer story fifteen to twenty pages, and the novel sixty to five hundred pages. I believe the permitted length of the short-short story should be extended to one to four pages.

Shardanagar

A dancer performs between two scenes of a Durga Puja play.

'Ḍhoḍhāī of Shardanagar gives ten rupees, wholeheartedly, from deep within his heart,' says the dancer Rukhsana.

'She's from Banaras, mate.'

'Oh, come on! They bring her from Muzaffarpur and then pretend she's from Banaras ...'

'But tell me, what village is this Shardanagar?'

'Don't you understand? The well-to-do people of Patti Tola built their own neighbourhood on the other side of the road and called it Lakshmipur, as if to say: we are not part of Patti Tola. Don't you know of the quarrel between Lakshmi and Saraswati? They brought that quarrel of the gods into the open. Patti Tola is the village of poor people, all of them cattle-herders. But through that divine quarrel the village was renamed Shardanagar, after Saraswati.'

'Come on. At least they are giving the dancer some money on that pretext.'

14. Maithili Drama and Modern Theatre

Abstract

The Nāṭyaśāstra states that drama originated in the festival of Indra's banner. The history of Maithili drama and theatre begins with Jyotirishwar's Dhūrtasamāgama and the Aṅkiyā Nāṭ. Modern theatre began in Calcutta around 1850 in British clubs, but outsiders were not admitted to those venues.

Keywords: Drama · Modernity · Theatre · Critical Theory · Maithili

The Nāṭyaśāstra states that drama originated in the festival of Indra's banner.

The history of Maithili drama and theatre begins with Jyotirishwar's Dhūrtasamāgama and the Aṅkiyā Nāṭ.

Modern theatre began in Calcutta around 1850 in British clubs, but outsiders were not admitted to those venues.

Historical Background

Performance was the dominant element in Aṅkiyā Nāṭ as well. The Kīrtaniyā tradition was in one sense musical, yet acting was predominant there too. An Aṅkiyā performance began with the playing of the mṛdaṅga.

Classical Foundations

The bronze figurine recovered from the civilisation of Mohenjo-daro suggests a dancing posture resembling the ṭhāṭ position of present-day Kathak: the right arm forming an angle of forty-five degrees, the left hand resting at the left hip, and the left leg slightly bent. The Śāṅkhāyana Brāhmaṇa of the Ṛgveda describes the combined use of song, instrumental music and dance; the Aitareya Brāhmaṇa counts all three among the divine crafts. In Ṛgveda 10.76.6, the golden radiance of Uṣas reminds the poet of an adorned seer. The Ṛgveda also mentions folk dancing (prāñco agāma nṛtaye). A collective dance by female servants—three to six of them—is described in the Soma sacrifice known as the Mahāvrata. Śāṅkhāyana 1.11.5 describes four to eight married women being given surā at a wedding and encouraged to dance four times. Vedic literature refers to the bride's singing as part of the wedding rites. During the sīmantonnayana ceremony, the husband requests a vīṇā player to perform a song with instrumental accompaniment in praise of Soma. The Atharvaveda associates the dance of the deity named Vasā with Ṛc, Sāman and gāthā, and describes Gandharvas taking part in this Soma-drinking dance. Atharvaveda 12.1.41 describes the collective sound of singing, instrumental music and dancing. Alongside Sāman music, secular narrative-song traditions called gāthā and nārāśaṃsī were also current in the Vedic period. Ṛgveda 1.115.2 compares the rising sun at dawn to a young man following a beautiful woman. Ṛgveda 1.124.11 describes the red glow of daybreak, the retreating darkness and the fire in the hearth, with the image of a young village woman letting a red cow out to graze. Atharvaveda 4.15.6 refers to a collective cry. Yajurveda 40.16 describes the solar disc as a golden vessel covering the sun. Yajurveda 17.38–41 depicts the divine army going into battle accompanied by instruments, while 17.49 evokes the rustling sound of armour. Ṛgveda 1.164.2 and Yāska 4.27 describe the year and the wheel. Bṛhadāraṇyaka Upaniṣad 2.2.3 describes the source of Soma juice; 2.2.4 refers to seven sages on its banks as the eyes, ears and other organs. In Atharvaveda 10.2.31 the body is called Ayodhyā, and in Bhagavad Gītā 5.13 it is called a city.

Drama in the Yajurveda: The Yajurveda contains certain technical terms, such as sūta, śailūṣa and citrakāriṇī, suggesting that the idea of a theatre pavilion may already have existed.

Thinkers of both East and West have offered their views on the social purpose of art, literature and music and the ethical standards by which they ought to be judged. Plato argues that art cannot be good, because it is false and unreal. Yet art, music and literature may also exist for one's own delight: reading, hearing, seeing and experiencing them can give pleasure and peace of mind, and at other times can disturb and agitate us. Aristotle, by contrast, holds that artists possess knowledge and help us understand the world. Once words are uttered and works of art made, the object of understanding comes into existence. Its propriety is established through words and sounds, form, rasa, melody, metre and ornamentation.

Drama, previously performed at temple festivals and in royal palaces, then acquired an independent existence; its uses and applications also extended to the teaching of other subjects.

Bharata's Nāṭyaśāstra

Dramatic Presentation and Acting

Kālidāsa's Abhijñānaśākuntalam is essential reading for a stage director. Its stage directions include ratha-vegaṃ nirūpya, sūta paśyainaṃ vyāpādyamānaṃ, iti śarasaṃdhānam nāṭayati, vṛkṣa-secanaṃ rūpayati, kalaśam avarjayati, mukham asyāḥ samunnamayitum icchati, Śakuntalā pariharati nāṭyena and nāṭyena prasādhayataḥ. These things are accomplished not literally but by acting. In nāṭyena prasādhayataḥ, Anasūyā and Priyaṃvadā mime adorning their friend Śakuntalā through gestures, either because the necessary objects are unavailable or because there is insufficient time. Likewise, vṛkṣa-secanaṃ rūpayati indicates miming the watering of a tree; kalaśam avarjayati directs the actor to imagine emptying a vessel; ratha-vegaṃ nirūpya signifies acting out a swift chariot journey; iti śarasaṃdhānam nāṭayati signifies the action of fitting an arrow to a bow; sūta paśyainaṃ vyāpādyamānaṃ instructs the charioteer to observe the deer being brought down; mukham asyāḥ samunnamayitum icchati expresses Duṣyanta's wish to raise Śakuntalā's face; and Śakuntalā pariharati nāṭyena directs Śakuntalā to mime resisting Duṣyanta's attempt. A study of Indian and Western dramatic theory reveals striking similarities in human thought despite geographical distances. Indian dramaturgy is grounded chiefly in Bharata's Nāṭyaśāstra and Dhanañjaya's Daśarūpaka; the authoritative Western text is Aristotle's Poetics. Bharata calls drama kṛtānusāra and bhāvānukāra, while Dhanañjaya defines it as an imitation of a condition or state. In Indian literary theory, imitation is the actor's activity, not the poet's. In the Western account it is the poet's activity, while the actor receives no corresponding discussion. Aristotle places particular emphasis on plot. Tragedy consists of plot together with characterisation, diction, thought, spectacle and song. Bharata calls the plot concerning the hero ādhikārika, and the supporting plot prāsaṅgika; not every drama, however, requires a subsidiary plot. Western stagecraft is realistic, while Indian stagecraft is symbolic. Kālidāsa, for example, writes in Abhijñānaśākuntalam: iti śarasaṃdhānaṃ nāṭayati—the actor mimes setting the arrow. According to Bharata, dramatic effect gives rise to rasa. What is drama for? It is for enacting rasa and also for producing it. How does rasa emerge? Through its causes (vibhāva), its manifestations (anubhāva) and accompanying, transitory emotional states (vyabhicāribhāva). The durable emotion (sthāyibhāva) becomes concentrated and ripens into rasa, whose flavour we can savour.

After the Buddhist Caryāgīti came King Nānyadeva's Sarasvatīhṛdayālaṅkāra; tradition then places Vidyāpati and the musician Jayat in the court of Śiva Siṃha. In Vidyāpati's Puruṣaparīkṣā stories, a man's love of art and music is regarded as important as his puruṣārtha. Śubhaṅkara Ṭhākura's Śrīhastamuktāvalī is also regarded as a work of Mithila, though some scholars, on the evidence of surviving manuscripts, consider it to have been composed in Assam. The work offers an extensive account of hand movements associated with acting. The Ā'īn-i Akbarī mentions Vidyāpati's nacārī songs.

At the Videha Theatre Festival in 2012, Ulkāmukha, written by Gajendra Thakur and directed by Bechan Thakur, was staged with a conception of theatre based on Bharata's Nāṭyaśāstra. It was the first such attempt in Maithili. The production used an all-women cast, with female performers playing the male roles as well. The stage design, based on the Nāṭyaśāstra, was drawn by Mrs S. S. Janaki. A comparable attempt had been made in Sanskrit theatre in Chennai.

A Parallel World of Maithili Drama

Ramkhelawan Mandar was from Katghara village, Shivajinagar block, Samastipur district. Bindeshwar Mandal also worked with him. People still remember the opening Maithili chorus and the line: "Mother, oh mother, buy me a gun, for I shall become a soldier, mother." The troupe performed verse-dramas such as Reshma-Chūhaṛ, Śīt-Basant, Ālhā-Ūdal and Naṭuā Dayāl.

The Maithili Bidesiyā—Piā Desāntar troupe came from Saharsa, Supaul and Purnia.

A dramatic piece called Hāsan-Husan was also performed.

The Ramraksha Chaudhary Dramatic Arts Council, of Gayghat village, Kariyan panchayat, post office Vaidyanathpur, Samastipur district, took its production of Vidyāpati as far as Gorakhpur. Other plays performed by this troupe were Lauṅgiyā Mercāi, Vidyāpati, Cīnīk Laḍḍū and Basāt.

Efforts should also be made to document and honour this parallel world of Maithili drama.

Theatre and Stage Organisations

Bhaṅgimā, Patna; Cetanā Samiti, Patna; Jamghaṭ, Madhubani; Mithila Vikas Parishad, Kolkata; Akhil Bharatiya Mithila Sangh, Kolkata; Mithila Kala Kendra, Kolkata; Maithili Rangmanch, Kolkata; Kurmi-Kshatriya Scholarship Fund, Kolkata; All India Maithil Sangh, Kolkata; Karna Goshthi: Jayant Lokmanch, Kolkata; Mithila Seva Sansthan, Kolkata; Mithi Yatrik, Kolkata; Vaidehi Kala Manch, Kolkata; Kokil Manch, Kolkata; Mithila Kalyan Parishad, Rishra, Kolkata (primarily directed by Mr Dayanath Jha since 1982; at present Mr Ranjit Kumar Jha directs it, and on 8 January 2012 he directed the staging of Upanayanak Bhoj, written by Tantranath Jha); Jhankar, Kolkata; Mithila Seva Samiti, Belur, Kolkata; Uday Path, Kolkata; Mithila Natya Parishad (MINAP), Janakpur; Ramanand Yuva Club, Janakpurdham; Yuva Natya Kala Parishad (YUNAP), Parwaha, Dhanusha; Akriti (Upendra Bhagat Nagvanshi), Janakpur; Rang Vatika, Nepal; Chabutara; Shiromani Maithili Yuva Club, Ganguli; Bhairab; Maithili Sanskritik Yuva Club, Bauharba; Shri Saraswati Sanskritik Natya Kala Parishad, Tilathi village (Saptari, Nepal); Arunoday Natya Manch, Rajbiraj; Saraswati Natya Kala Parishad, Menhath, Madhubani; Maithili Lok Rang (Mailorang), Delhi; Mithilangan, Delhi. At Pajuaridih hamlet in Madhubani, the Shri Krishna Natya Samiti has continued staging Maithili plays under the direction of Shri Krishnachandra Jha Rasik, Shivnath Jha and Ganga Jha. Also: Sanskritik Manch, Lohianagar, Patna; Chitragupta Sanskritik Kendra, Janakpur; Gardanibagh Kala Samiti, Patna; Mithilakshar, Jamshedpur; Maithili Kala Manch, Bokaro; Ugna Vidyapati Parishad, Begusarai; Mithila Sanskritik

Parishad, Bokaro Steel City; Bhanu Kala Kendra, Biratnagar; Aangan, Patna; Navtarang, Begusarai; Bharatiya Rangmanch, Darbhanga; Bhadrakali Natya Parishad, Koilakh; Mithila Anubhuti, Darbhanga; the theatre festival of the Videha International e-Journal; and Nav Jyoti Dramatic Club, Laukahi (which staged Brahmasthan and Ugna in 1992 with Shambhu Shankar and others).

Directors: Kalikant Jha "Booch"; Kamdev Pathak; Shri Kamal Narayan Karna (Cīnīk Laḍḍū, by Ishanath Jha; Cāripahar, originally in Bengali by Kiran Maitra and translated into Maithili by Nirasan Labh); Shri Shrikant Mandal (Chandragupta, originally in Bengali by D. L. Roy, translated into Maithili by Babu Saheb Chaudhary; Pāthey, by Gunanath Jha; Nāyakak Nām Jīvan, by Nachiketa); Shri Vishnu Chatterjee and Shri Shrikant Mandal (Niṣkalaṅk, by Janardan Jha); Prabir Mukhopadhyay; Veena Roy; Mohan Chaudhary; Babu Ram Singh; Gopal Das; Kunal; Ravi Dev; Dayanath Jha; Trilochan Jha; Shambhunath Mishra; Kashi Jha; Ashok Jha; Ganga Jha; Ganesh Prasad Sinha; Navin Chandra Mishra; Janardan Roy; Shri Krishnachandra Jha Rasik; Shivnath Jha; Rabindranath Thakur; Akhileshwar; Sachchidanand; Ramesh Rajhans; Modnath Jha; Vibhuti Anand; Javed Akhtar Khan; Kaushal Kishore Das; Prashant Kant; Arvind Ranjan Das; Manoj Manu; Rohini Raman Jha; Bhavnath Jha; Umakant Jha; Lallan Prasad Thakur; Raghunath Jha Kiran; Mahendra Malangia; Kumar Shailendra; Vineet Jha; Kishore Kumar Jha; Kumar Gagan; Vinod Kumar Jha; K. Ajay; Chhatranand Singh Jha; Neelam Chaudhary; Kajal; Manoj Kumar Pathak; Ashnarayan Mishra; Shri Shrinarayan Jha; Pramila Jha; Tanuja Shankar; Keshav Nandan; Brahmanand Jha; Sanjeev Tamanna; Kislay Krishna; Prakash Jha; Munnaji; Sanjay Kumar Chaudhary; Kamal Mohan Chunnu; Anshuman Satyaketu; Shyam Bhaskar; Prem Kumar; Sangam Kumar Thakur; L. R. M. Rajan; Bhaskaranand Jha; Ashutosh Kumar Mishra; Anand Kumar Jha; Manoj Manuj; Sanjeev Mishra; Swati Singh; Swarnim; Ashutosh Yadav Abhigya; Ashok Ashk; Dilip Vats; Tarun Prabhat; Madhav Anand; Narendra Mishra; Bharat Bhushan Jha; Kishore Keshav; Bechan Thakur; Upendra Bhagat Nagvanshi; Anil Chandra Jha; Anshuman Satyaketu; Anand Kumar Jha; Hemnarayan Sahu; Ramkrishna Mandal Chhotu; Dhirendra Kumar; Utpal Jha; Abhishek K. Narayan; Chandrika Prasad.

Plays and Playwrights

Dhūrtasamāgama was composed by Jyotirishwar Thakur in the thirteenth century. He incorporated Maithili songs into this work, which belongs to the category of farce. Most early Maithili plays and dramatic pieces were based on the lives of Krishna and his descendants or on stories of abduction and svayaṃvara. In Dhūrtasamāgama, however, the central characters are a mendicant and his disciple. Every character is a rogue outdoing the others in roguery; hence the title, The Assembly of Rogues, is entirely apt. A farce is also called a kind of musical performance, making the inclusion of Maithili songs particularly appropriate. The principal characters are the Sūtradhāra, the actress, Snātaka, Viśvanagara, Mṛtāṅgāra, Suratpriyā, Anaṅgasenā, Asajjātimiśra, Bandhuvañcaka, Mūlanāśaka and a citizen. The Sūtradhāra praises the Karnata sovereign Narasiṃhadeva, followed by praise of Jyotirishwar. The play contains a kind of absurdity that is thoroughly modern, and its flexibility makes it a work of folk theatre. Viśvanagara is a celibate because he has no woman. When he and his disciple Snātaka go to Mṛtāṅgāra Thakur's house to beg, the excuse of ritual impurity is offered. Viśvanagara and Snātaka next visit Suratpriyā's house for alms. Then the teacher and disciple quarrel violently over a courtesan named Anaṅgasenā. They take her to Asajjātimiśra, who proves to be a libertine himself. ... Miśra proves to be a libertine. ... He regards the management of gambling and sexual intercourse as the two essentials of worldly life. Asajjātimiśra asks who is the plaintiff and who the defendant. Snātaka replies: "I am the plaintiff because I shall state the accusation, and the ascetic is the defendant because he must pay the fee." Viśvanagara offers Snātaka's bundle of cannabis as payment. The jester whispers praise of Anaṅgasenā's sexual charms into Asajjātimiśra's ear. Placing Anaṅgasenā between the disputants, Miśra delivers judgment in his own favour. Meanwhile the jester tells Anaṅgasenā privately: "The ascetic is poor, Snātaka is a vagabond, and this Miśra is a fool; therefore stay with me." Looking around at all four, Anaṅgasenā exclaims that this has indeed become an assembly of rogues.

Viśvanagara and Snātaka set off once again towards Suratpriyā's house. Meanwhile a barber named Mūlanāśaka asks Anaṅgasenā for a year's payment for his services. She sends him to Asajjātimiśra. Mūlanāśaka assumes Miśra to be Anaṅgasenā's bridegroom. Taking the cannabis as his fee, he forces Miśra down, binds him and massages him so vigorously that he faints. Thinking him dead, the barber flees. The jester arrives, unties him and asks: "I have saved your life; if there is anything else you would like me to do, tell me." Asajjātimiśra answers: "Through deceit I devoured the entire country, through roguery I obtained this beloved woman, and I have also found an obedient disciple like you. Nothing dearer remains for me. Nevertheless, I wish for happiness and peace everywhere."

Jeevan Jha

The plays written by Jeevan Jha include Sundar Saṃyog (1904), Maithili Saṭṭak (1906), Narmadā Sāgar Saṭṭak (1906) and Sāmavatī Punarjanma (1908).

All four had been performed repeatedly at the Samaveda School in Kashi before 1920, and Sundar Saṃyog was also published there.

Some Other Productions of Sundar Saṃyog

1974: On the premises of Lakshminarayan High School at Mali Mortar, beside the Hasanpur sugar mill, during Durga Puja. Director: Shri Kalikant Jha "Booch"; chief guest: Shri Fazlur Rahman Hasmi. The organisers were Devnandan Pathak, Chief Engineer, and Keshnandan Pathak ("Auditor Tika Babu"); the inauguration was by village head Udit Rai.

1976: Kariyan, Samastipur. Director: Kamdev Pathak.

1981: Pandit Tola, Tabhka, near Dalsinghsarai. Conveners: Dr Umendra Jha "Vimal", former Pro-Vice-Chancellor of K. S. Sanskrit University, and Mahamahopadhyaya Chitradhar Mishra, the officiant at the Shiva temple inside Darbhanga Fort, whose pupils included Mahamahopadhyaya Umesh Mishra and Mahamahopadhyaya Ganganath Jha.

1983: Mau Bajitpur, near Vidyapatinagar.

These plays, rich in features of the Sanskrit tradition and Parsi theatre, were performed in various other places as well.

Ishanath Jha

Ugnā: These plays are performed on Mahashivaratri at Gaurishankar Sthan, Jamthuri. Vidyapati is a devotee of Shiva. Wishing to hear his devotional nacārī songs, Shiva comes to Vidyapati's home as a servant named Ugna. On one occasion Vidyapati is travelling with Ugna and becomes thirsty. Ugna draws water from the Ganga held in his matted hair and gives it to Vidyapati. But Vidyapati recognises the taste of Ganga water and, seeing Ugna's wet hair, understands everything. Ugna appears in his true form. He warns Vidyapati not to tell anyone or he will disappear. Parvati then contrives a situation: Vidyapati's wife sends Ugna to fetch bel leaves, and when he is late she raises a broom against him. Vidyapati discloses the secret, and Ugna vanishes. Cīnīk Laḍḍū: Sudhakant and Premkant's father dies, and their maternal uncle Dharmanand looks after them as a trustee. Once they are capable of managing their affairs, he hands responsibility to Sudhakant and returns home. Sudhakant's clerk Batua Das, assisted by Premkant's wife Chandika and a maid named Chhulahi, arranges a division of the property; Sudhakant gives even his own share to Premkant. Sudhakant, his wife Sushila and their son Sukumar are driven out. Tuberculosis kills Sudhakant. The company of Batua Das reduces Premkant to poverty as well. The childless uncle Dharmanand bequeaths his property to Sukumar. Premkant and Batua Das try to kill Sukumar by giving him sugar laḍḍūs mixed with poison as a gift, but Batua Das himself dies from them and the plot is exposed.

Udaynarayan Singh "Nachiketa"

Nāyakak Nām Jīvan: Naval is a thinker of new ideas. Shaktirai is rich and corrupt; he accuses his associate Vinay of theft and has Vinay's daughter abducted and raped. Vinay takes his own life. Naval and his friends Prakash and Deepak uncover the whole conspiracy. Naval's beloved dies by suicide following the rape, and Naval becomes mentally deranged. Ek Chhal Rājā: A king named Abhiman Kumar Dev has squandered his days on drink and courtesans. He has only one daughter, Mohini, whose marriage cannot take place for want of money. The drama proceeds through the characters of the clerk Viranchi, the servant Chatur Lal and the king's religiously observant wife. Mohini and her teacher Shubhankar fall in love. No Entry: Mā Praviśa: A postmodern drama whose absurdity recalls Jyotirishwar's Dhūrtasamāgama. The dead arrive at the gates of heaven or hell and tell their stories. It eventually emerges that Chitragupta and Dharmaraj are impostors and the gate is locked: no entry.

Govind Jha

Basāt: Krishnakant refuses to marry Pushpa, the young woman chosen by his father. He wishes to marry an educated woman and loves Lily. His father leaves home. Pushpa, too, leaves her home and devotes herself to women's awakening. Krishnakant fails to locate his father, abandons Lily, and intends to die beneath a train. People from an ashram save him, and there he meets his father and Pushpa. Lily also arrives, in a state of mental distress.

Gunanath Jha

He edited and managed the Maithili theatre periodical Lok Manch and pioneered modern drama in Maithili. His plays Kaniyā-Putarā, Pāthey, Madhuyāminī, Sātam Caritra, Śeṣa Nañi, Ājuk Lok and Jai Maithili have been staged repeatedly. Bāṅglā Ekāṅkī Nāṭya-Saṅgraha is a collection of twenty-four plays by twenty-four Bengali playwrights, compiled and edited by Ajit Kumar Ghosh and translated from Bengali into Maithili by Shri Gunanath Jha.

Kaniyā-Putarā: This is Gunanath Jha's first full-length play, suitable for a revolving stage that accommodates many scenes. The narrative concerns the kāṭar marriage custom. Its consequences lead the principal male and female characters into psychological disturbance, and the play presents an accurate portrayal and analysis of their mental states.

Madhuyāminī: A one-act play with two characters: the man supports the joint-family system, while the woman opposes it. A harmonious victory goes to the advocate of the joint family. It was published in the Maithili theatre journal Lok Manch.

Pāthey: Written in the form of a one-act play, it nonetheless possesses all the characteristics of a full-length work. Distressed by Mithila's decline, the protagonist decides to make his village the centre of his work. His relatives oppose him, but eventually his wife joins him. The language is sweet and flowing.

Lāl-Bujhakkar: A one-act play. People of the lower and lower-middle classes, devastated by floods and droughts, are compelled to migrate for a livelihood both before and after Independence. Orphaned Lal-Bujhakkar leaves his wife at her parental home and his childless paternal uncle and aunt behind, and migrates to a city.

Sātam Caritra: A one-act play about the absence of women performers on the Maithili stage. Rehearsal ends while everyone is still waiting for the actress who is to play the seventh character. It appeared in the Maithili theatre journal Lok Manch.

Śeṣa Nañi: A full-length modern social drama. After the parents' deaths, the elder brother behaves as a father towards the younger one. The younger brother finds employment but, caught in changing social circumstances, acts in unimaginable ways and mistreats his elder brother. The elder brother nevertheless takes a courageous step to save his dying wife's life.

Ājuk Lok: A full-length play concerning lower-middle-class unemployment and the burden of marriage responsibilities.

Jai Maithili: A full-length play whose subject is Mithila's linguistic and cultural problems.

Mahākavi Vidyāpati: A new interpretation of Vidyapati.

Mahendra Malangia

Ek Kamal Norme: Mala urges her husband Rajesh to take a second wife in order to have children, but he refuses. Her mother-in-law conspires with an astrologer to take obscene photographs of the unconscious Mala with another man and shows them to Rajesh. Rajesh expels Mala from home and marries the astrologer's daughter. Mala takes her own life. Juāyal Kankanī: Jibu blames his aunt for the suicides of his parents, but later discovers that Baiju sexually violated his sister. Revenge and remorse follow. Okarā Āṅganak Bārahamāsā: An account of the lives of labourers through the twelve months of the year. Chutahar / Chutahar Ghail / Chutahā Ghail.

Chutahā Ghail is the title of a recent play by Mahendra Malangia. He has written a ten-page preface to this short play.

Let us first examine the preface. He is aggrieved that Ramanand Jha "Raman" suggested that Chutahar Ghail should simply be called Chutahar. He therefore raises three points. First:

"What you write in books,

I have seen with my own eyes."

Second, a lament by Yatri Ji:

"I remain to one side, like a ghail chutahar;

Alas, how deeply unfortunate I am!"

He adds: what use to the widow in that poem or to Kabutari Devi in this play are Shiva's Māheśvara Sūtras and Pāṇini's ten verbal tenses and moods (Pāṇini having set out twelve lakāras for Vedic Sanskrit and ten for classical Sanskrit—well, let that pass)?

Third, he likens his position to that of Copernicus: why should what people say matter when ordinary villagers do indeed say Chutahar Ghail?

But all three arguments turn against Malangia himself. "Seen with one's own eyes" and actual popular usage show that the word spoken is simply chutahar. Can a chutahar be placed upon a ghailchī? Water is poured over the vegetable patch from a loiṭ; according to Malangia's logic, it should then be called a "loiṭ ghail." Ghail, surāhī, kohā, taulā, chutahar, loiṭ, khāpaṛi, kuṛnī, kurwāṛ, kosiyā, sarbā and sobarnā are all distinct objects with different names. Accepting the suggestion of Phoolchandra Mishra "Raman" (who perhaps proposed Chutahā Ghail jokingly—and if not, it is a new word in a new language), Malangia changed Chutahar Ghail to Chutahā Ghail. This shows that he had realised his mistake; but rather than appear diminished by accepting Ramanand Jha "Raman"'s observation, he planted his own flag. Later Ramanand Jha "Raman" urged Chetana Samiti to publish the book, and because the Samiti would give him only twenty-five copies, Malangia published it through his own organisation. What concern are all these matters of the reader's? Now consider Yatri Ji. He also had Hindi readers in mind and sometimes did not remember which poem was in Hindi, which in Maithili and which in both. Thus he wrote chutahar ghail. We may also see the explanation in his desire to make the rhyme work. And now Copernicus: even if Yatri Ji or Malangia wrote ghail chutahar, chutahar ghail or chutahā ghail, would native speakers of Maithili begin calling a chutahar by any of those composite names? Thus Copernicus, too, stands against Malangia.

Malangia has not used the story of Copernicus accurately. He seems to be confusing Copernicus with Galileo. The Copernican theory had the support of the pope, and Copernicus dedicated a forty-page manuscript concerning his heliocentric theory to Pope Paul III. In any event, Malangia's unfamiliarity with science, and his habit of linking scientific theory with legend, will not surprise the reader after seeing the ignorance of genuine folktales displayed in this very preface.

Ali Baba and the Forty Thieves: Everyone knows this is a medieval Arab folktale associated with The Arabian Nights (the Thousand and One Nights). There is debate as to whether it was inserted into that collection at a later stage, but no dispute, the author argues, over its status as a medieval Arab folktale. The many things Malangia says about Balban's atrocities and the like from a communal perspective reveal only a superficial attachment to folklore. The shallow understanding of Mithila Tattva Vimarśa or Ramanath Jha's genealogical registers has long since been corrected, and these matters are recorded in written form in our pañjī books. Gonu Jha lived three hundred years before Vidyapati, yet Malangia proceeds on the basis of fifty-year-old gossip. He knows that Gonu has been called Dhūrtācārya ("preceptor of rogues"), but he does not know that Gonu was also called Mahāmahopādhyāya. Muslims were not even living in Mithila in Gonu Jha's time, so where could a "tax-collector's beard" of that kind come from? Transform the popular word chutahar into chutahā ghail, turn the familiar beard of a tax collector into the beard of a tahsildar, declare a Muslim to be an oppressor on communal grounds, and write such a preface that Ramanand Jha "Raman" and others will be afraid to review it. The Satnami rebellion, beginning with a conflict between a foot soldier and a Satnami (a progressive sect established by Dalit and backward communities), opposed Aurangzeb's policies and included the burning of a mosque. But Gonu Jha's tax collector was not a Muslim; the folktale contains no such claim. If a communally minded storyteller forces an ideology into the story and falsifies it in writing, how is Maithili folklore responsible? This is what happens when folktales are not collected through fieldwork.

Mahendra Narayan Ram writes that folktales recognise no caste distinctions. How, however, would Malangia accept that? A bhagatā also unfailingly appears in his story. The real reason this character becomes integral to Malangia's play is the playwright's inherited assumption of caste superiority. The play consists of seventeen scenes, each approximately two and a half pages long. Through the fifteenth scene he follows his old method of making upper-caste audiences laugh at the supposed speech of lower castes (a language of his own invention), and producing counterfeit comedy through the bhagatā's corrupt Hindi. He attempts to make the story purposeful only from the sixteenth scene onward; by then he has lost his hold on it. At a time when even Sanskrit productions no longer necessarily use Prakrit or another language in this manner, Malangia's invocation of Bharata out of context reveals his unfamiliarity with Sanskrit and suggests that his acquaintance with the Nāṭyaśāstra comes through secondary works written in Hindi.

Does Malangia mean that a play which is good to read cannot be stageworthy, or that one written for performance cannot make good reading? That is what his Sanskrit quotation seems to imply. If a drama does not stir its reader, how is a director to decide to stage it? And what exactly are its theatrical qualities? Seventeen scenes of two and a half pages each, casteist language insulting the so-called lower classes, the bhagatā's Hindi catchphrase "bujhtā hai ki nahī?" ("Do you understand or not?"), and the "slapstick humour" produced by their combination? Anyone who opposes this and proposes a parallel Maithili theatre is then dismissed as someone who insists upon the readable aspect of drama, while the traditionalist casteist is presented as the defender of its theatrical aspect. Would Malangia's caste-based sentence patterns be acceptable in a twenty-first-century Sanskrit, Hindi or other modern Indian-language drama (apart from Maithili)? If not, why are irrelevant statements from eighteen-hundred-year-old Sanskrit drama repeatedly used as a shield for this vocabulary by a playwright who has not read Bharata's original Sanskrit Nāṭyaśāstra? Does carrying a basket on one's head and a child under one's arm necessarily identify someone as lower-class? In Okarā Āṅganak Bārahamāsā he calls this class rāṛ. Decades later, he has at least improved enough to call them the "lower class"; that change is welcome, but very little for so long a period. How did the bābājī enter the story, how did cannabis enter it, and what connection does that have with the trees in the orchard? How could Malangia have inserted his caste-based sentence structures and corrupt-Hindi constructions without introducing the contrived ideas of the bhagatā and the lower class? He tries very cleverly to conceal this fact and therefore cannot move beyond mediocrity. He wants to make the dramatic story purposeful but cannot achieve the requisite artistic power.

Sudhanshu Shekhar Chaudhary

Bhaphāit Cāhak Jingī: Mahesh is unemployed and opens a tea shop; he is also a poet. Chandrama, wife of the engineer Umanath, sees at the shop that Mahesh has been called away for a poetry recital and begins selling the tea herself. Umanath becomes angry. Mahesh's friend Sarita, who is married to an IAS officer, arrives. Leṭāit Āčar: Dinanath's only daughter Mamta is abandoned by her husband because of the kāṭar custom. But when Dinanath tries to take dowry at the marriage of his son Modnath, the son stops him.

Jagdish Prasad Mandal

Mithilāk Beṭī, Act One: Employees strike against rising prices. Among the causes of inflation are the preference for salaried jobs and the decline of agriculture. Landed wealth diminishes, and the complications of gifts and dowry increase. There is ostentation at weddings, misuse of money, and the artist's contempt for material wealth. A college girl learning song and dance runs away with a cornet player. Pickpocketing flourishes amid disorder. Government officers are forbidden to speak. Kidnapping increases, with varied motives involving not merely money but people's very lives. The moral decline of government officials, an incident involving a spoon, and the growth of insecurity as the administrative apparatus weakens all appear. Caste and sectarianism contribute to social disintegration until even honour and reputation are endangered. Influenced by cinema, sports and recreation, a new generation is abandoning lineage, family custom and conduct and blindly imitating outside fashions. The values of a collapsing feudal order leave their mark. Wells and ponds become places where women quarrel. Sita symbolises the strength of the women of Mithila. Dowry destroys caste distinctions; riches destroy codes of conduct, while litigation and mutual conflict draw society into their grip. Young men lack self-confidence; women show immense patience; the condition of the child-widow reveals society's impact upon the individual. Even the worth of an educated and capable girl is nullified before dowry. Women's importance has in any case been diminished by the male-dominated system, and ornaments and jewellery can also be harmful. A new enthusiasm is needed among the women of the younger generation, along with the ability to learn new kinds of work. Act Two: A feudal addiction—bhāṅg—also affects the young. People shirk labour, refuse hard work and rely on fate. Money breaks families apart. Conflict between father and son; marriage of boys and girls through coercion or persuasion; fraud in land transactions, including forced dealings and duplicate registrations. Earnings from bribery confer prestige; even parents wish their sons to take bribes. Opposition to salaried employment; various kinds of oppression of women in a patriarchal system; education creates further problems as well. Act Three: The harmful effects of multinational corporations on agriculture and the shortage of domestic production. Society splits into supporters and opponents of dowry, into defenders of tradition and a newly awakened opposition to it. Society is fragmented into factions. A new human being, new technology, new thinking and new work emerge. Multinational influence has harmful consequences for the family, society, art and culture. Changing the system will change society. Act Four: Wealth changes attitudes and may inaugurate a new society. Ramvilas, a craftsman, values the human being and thereby challenges dowry. People from Mithila have long travelled to Bengal, Assam, Nepal and Dhaka to harvest paddy and jute. Contradictions within education must be overcome. Act Five: An ideal marriage, and the awakening of a new consciousness capable of changing the social system.

Compromise: The collapse of agriculture and peasant life under feudal society; the reorganisation of agriculture as capital under a new capitalist order; the deteriorating condition of the village as intellectuals and labourers migrate; and a philosophy of reconciliation and coordination.

Jhameliyā Biāh: Various external influences affecting the marriage rites of Mithila; the disputes and complications born of these influences; and a detailed examination of the controversies produced by marriage procedures.

Birāṅganā: Rural life becoming market-oriented; capitalist exploitation made possible by cheap labour; the plunder of labour forcing villagers into lives worse than those of animals; and people ready to perform the most degrading acts for money.

Tāmak Tamghail: The fragmentation of families, customary practices and family relationships as feudal society collapses, together with the disintegration of the family's economic base.

Satmāe: Relationships are not in themselves defective; the defects lie in human behaviour and thought. The play examines these matters and presents an ideal version of the stepmother.

Kalyāṇī: A portrayal of women's awakening and vigilance against injustices committed in broad daylight, drawing attention to fundamental problems and to the enormous price that may have to be paid to resolve them.

Samjhautā: An account of the basic problems arising from the breakdown of agrarian culture as agriculture is transformed into capital; it explains the importance and necessity of considered compromise as a way of addressing those problems.

Anand Kumar Jha

Ṭāṭak Mol: A play based on the kāṭar custom. Garibnath and Sumitra, longing for a son, have five daughters. Much of their farmland is sold to pay for the eldest daughter's wedding. Only twelve kaṭṭhās of land remain for the second daughter's marriage. Their daughter Prabha attends college and loves her sister's brother-in-law Prabhakar; a young, much-desired brother tends buffaloes.

Kalah: Akash is unemployed. His stepmother Sumitra torments the elder son for the sake of her own son Rajiv. An innocent child is born …

Badalait Samāj: Ghooran Ji, who has blood cancer, arranges the marriage of his ailing son, though he himself does not know that his son Avadhesh is suffering from blood cancer. Avadhesh, the son of village head Bhajendra, dies. At the end the play imagines the remarriage of the widow Shobha to a virtuous young man named Vijendra.

Dhadhāit Navkī Kaniyāk Lahās: Shikha attempts suicide over a few pieces of jewellery.

Haṭhāt Parivartan: A patriotic play.

Gajendra Thakur

Ulkāmukha: Its first production was directed by Bechan Thakur. This work of magical realism exposes a conspiracy in history, with a stage conception drawn from Bharata's Nāṭyaśāstra. Its characters include Ācārya Vyāghra, Ācārya Siṃha, Ācārya Śarabha, the disciples Sāhī, Khikhir, Naṛhiyā and Bijjī. The characters change between the first and fourth kallolas; in a second form beginning with the fifth kallola, four women characters are added: Rudramati (Madhav's mother), Sohago (Gangadhar's mother), Ananda (Gangadhar's sister), and Medha (the daughter of the general Harikar). The play concerns the love of Gangesh and Vallabha. Yet after the first two acts, the third and fourth become examples of magical realism. Udayan, Dina, Bhadri, Ācārya Vyāghra, Ācārya Siṃha, Ācārya Śarabha, and the disciples Sāhī, Khikhir, Naṛhiyā and Bijjī appear before us, and the enactment of a conspiracy in history begins. But at the end of the fourth kallola, the bhagatā reveals a secret to his disciple—a secret that will be remembered even after it has been forgotten. ... Become Ulkāmukha ... From the fifth kallola, reality replaces suggestion and truth replaces imagination. From the first through the fourth kallola, cubes marked with chessboard designs will stand on stage; from the fifth, these signs of the past and imagination will be replaced by spheres symbolising reality. Many commentaries on Gangesh's Tattvacintāmaṇi are available, and he is known as Gangesh, the author of Tattvacintāmaṇi; yet his poetry has become Ulkāmukha!

Saṅkarṣaṇ: A character who is considered clever, devious and cunning in his village begins to lose his intelligence on the journey to Delhi and, once there, regards himself as a fool. A folktale about a dog from Haryana, India, is also woven into the work.

Bhaʹ Jāeb Chū: A children's crossroads or street play, part of a campaign to popularise environmental awareness and science through street theatre.

Bechan Thakur

Beṭīk Apamān and Chhīnardevi: Both plays, dealing with female foeticide, women's rights and superstition, take Maithili theatre in a new direction.

Adhikār: The story of the real-life Manzoor, who exposed irregularities in the Indira Awas housing scheme through the Right to Information Act and travelled by rickshaw from Jhanjharpur to Delhi.

Viśvāsghāt: Large compensation payments are made for land acquired for a national highway, and family relationships are sacrificed in attempts to seize the money.

15. Foundations of Maithili Theatre Criticism: Text, Performability and Comparative Method

Abstract

This chapter establishes a critical method that treats drama not merely as a written text but as a composite art of acting, audience, stage structure, folk memory and performance practice. Its application to a collection of plays offers a working model for the comparative use of Indian poetics, Western theatre thought, Chinese aesthetics and Israeli performance studies. The aim is not to impose an external theory but to disclose the layers of meaning operating within dramatic texts from different critical angles.

Keywords: Maithili drama; theatre; performability; comparative criticism; folk theatre; performance studies

Kunal's Kusmā-Salhes and Six Other Plays is a collection of contemporary Maithili drama oriented towards the stage in both its underlying content and its formal design. A critical examination must therefore move beyond the written text to bring acting, performability, audience interaction, music, movement, empty space and the history of performance into focus.

The critical method adopted in this book places four comparative orientations on a single analytical plane: Indian dramaturgy and poetics; Western dramatic thought; Chinese dramatic aesthetics; and Israeli performance studies. They are employed not to demonstrate that these traditions are identical but to distinguish different levels of dramaturgical skill, acting imagery, narrative structure, social meaning and audience experience.

On the Indian side, rasa, the distinction between lokadharmī and nāṭyadharmī, dhvani, vakrokti, character types and epistemological reasoning become the principal critical tools. On the Western side, concepts such as mimesis, recognition, the alienation effect, metatheatre, the carnivalesque, existentialism, memory and women's agency help us read dramatic action and its social meanings.

Chinese aesthetic perspectives open another approach to structure, the relation between emptiness and fullness, character categories, emotional atmosphere, loyalty, question and answer, and forms of change. Israeli theatre studies are used to consider the representational character of performance, language revival, sacred texts, memory, testimony and cultural self-identification.

The fundamental rule of this method is that theory must not be imposed upon the work. Instead, the questions raised by a play's scenes, dialogue, stage practices and structure should determine the role of theory as a means of investigation. Comparative criticism then ceases to be a display of external names and becomes a disciplined process of opening up the dramatic text's internal structures of meaning.

16. Kunal's Dramaturgy: Folk Theatre, Classical Tradition and Modernity

Abstract

The most distinctive feature of Kunal's theatrical language is its deliberate synthesis of three traditions. On one hand he uses the devices of classical Sanskrit drama—the pūrvaraṅga, sūtradhāra and actress, and an invocation resembling the nāndī; on another, the elements of Mithila's folk theatre (nāch)—the samājī (chorus), the clown Vipṭā, the parrot-narrator, collective song and dance, direct address to the audience, and an open or layered stage …

Keywords: Folk theatre; Nāṭyaśāstra; modern theatre; Brecht; performability; multiple roles

The most distinctive feature of Kunal's theatrical language is its deliberate synthesis of three traditions. First, he adopts the devices of classical Sanskrit drama: the preliminary performance (pūrvaraṅga), the sūtradhāra and actress, and a benedictory invocation resembling the nāndī. Second, he places at the centre the elements of Mithila's folk theatre (nāch): the samājī (chorus), the clown Vipṭā, the parrot-narrator, collective singing and dancing, direct address to the audience, and an open or layered stage. Third, there are the self-referential devices and techniques of "alienation" associated with modern theatre.

On this final point, the Western theory of theatre provides a relevant comparison. Brecht's "epic theatre" and its Verfremdungseffekt or alienation effect—through which spectators are repeatedly reminded that they are watching a play—emerge as natural parts of folk form in Kunal's theatre. The bard's account, the relinquishing of roles and the debate over an alternative ending in Cālis Cor; Vipṭā's repeated interruption, "Move the cart forward!", in Bidāpat; and the metanarrative utterances of Hiraman and Vipṭā in Kusmā-Salhes all continually break the "fourth wall". Significantly, what Brecht introduced in the West as an avant-garde experiment was always inherent in Mithila's nāch. Kunal brings precisely this indigenous modernity into view.

Kunal's attention to performability is extraordinary. At the end of Cālis Cor, he writes that the play has three versions—forty-five minutes, sixty minutes and one hour—and that a fourth version, a thirteen-episode dhvani-nāṭya (radio-drama) series, has also been broadcast. He further proposes that one actor may play multiple characters. Such information shows that these plays were written with the practical demands of theatre in mind: they are genuinely performable scripts, not merely imagined possibilities of performance.

17. Kuṇḍaliyā in Laldas's Mithila Ramayana and an Examination of Metre

Abstract

Kuṇḍaliyā in Laldas's Mithila Ramayana, and the disruption of its metre through an editor's or proofreader's lack of knowledge. Laldas's Ramayana is composed in the caupāī form: approximately ninety-five per cent of it consists of caupāī, while the remainder employs the rūpamālā metre and gītikā. Here, however, I discuss the kuṇḍaliyā, which occurs only sparingly but has impressed me deeply.

Keywords: Laldas; Mithila Ramayana; kuṇḍaliyā; metre; critical examination; short vowel.

Kuṇḍaliyā in Laldas's Mithila Ramayana and the Metrical Disruption Caused by an Editor's or Proofreader's Ignorance

1

Laldas's Ramayana was composed in caupāī. Understand that ninety-five per cent of it is in caupāī, while the remaining portions employ the rūpamālā metre and gītikā.

I am, however, concerned here with the kuṇḍaliyā. Although the form appears only rarely, it has made a profound impression upon me. Its character resembles that of the rubāʿī; read Omar Khayyam's rubāʿīyāt and you will begin to love the kuṇḍaliyā.

What is a kuṇḍaliyā? To understand it, you must first understand the dohā and the rolā. In Laldas's Mithila Ramayana, you will find both rolā and dohā in addition to kuṇḍaliyā. The kuṇḍaliyā is their combination.

Dohā

The dohā is a quantitative metre. It consists of two lines and four segments. The first segment contains thirteen mātrās, the second eleven, the third thirteen and the fourth eleven. Neither the first nor the third segment should begin with the jagaṇa (U — U), and the second and fourth segments end in a long syllable followed by a short syllable.

Rolā

The rolā is also a quantitative metre. It has four lines and eight segments. The first segment contains eleven mātrās, the second thirteen, the third eleven, the fourth thirteen, the fifth eleven and the sixth thirteen. The end of the first segment of every line consists of a long–short sequence or three short syllables. The second segment of each line ends in four short syllables, two long syllables, long–short–short (bhagaṇa, — U U), or short–short–long (sagaṇa, U U —). Do not begin a rolā with a short–long–short sequence.

Kuṇḍaliyā

The kuṇḍaliyā is the intertwining, or combination, of dohā and rolā. Compose a dohā; then take its final segment, of eleven mātrās, and make it the first segment of the rolā by repeating it, before appending the remaining rolā. Take care that the first word of the opening segment of the dohā and the last word of the final segment of the rolā are identical. The first and last words of the kuṇḍaliyā are the same. Its fourth and fifth segments are also identical.

2

Let us now turn directly to the end of the Sundara Kāṇḍa of the Mithila Ramayana, where four kuṇḍaliyās are to be found.

Kuṇḍaliyā–Dohā (Maithili Academy Edition)

Raghunayaka, abode of compassion, looked upon the humble Vibhishana.
रघुनायक करुणायतन देखि विभीषण दीन।

He gave the token of kingship; let your mind remain absorbed in his feet.
देल प्रमाणहिं राज्य पद तनि पद रहु मन लीन॥

Let your mind remain absorbed in his feet: he protects the poor and the lowly.
तनि पद रहु मन लीन हीन दीनक प्रतिपालक।

Compassionate to those who seek refuge, he dispels Laldas's sorrow.
शरणागत वत्सल दयाल लालक दुख घालक॥

The guardians of the worlds, Death and Time, fear the sight of his keen arrows.
लोकपाल यम काल डरथि लखि जनिक सुसायक।

He who frees all worlds from sorrow is the mighty Lord Raghunayaka. (1)
सकल लोक निश्शोक करथि से विभु रघुनायक॥१॥

The tale of Raghupati destroys sin; merely hearing it drives away grief.
अधनाशिनी रघुपति कथा, सुनितहि हो दुख दूर।

The Lord remains gracious to them, fulfilling their heart's desires.
तनिपर प्रभु अनुकूल रहि, करथि मनोरथ पूर॥

He fulfils their desires and always protects them from cruel people.
करथि मनोरथ पूर क्रूर सौं सदा बचाबथि।

He increases their wealth, kindred, victory, splendour, fortune and happiness.
धन जन विजय विभूति जूति सुख तनिक बढ़ाबथि॥

He saves them from lust and the like, and grants undying devotion.
काम आदि सौं बचथि भक्ति पाबथि अविनाशिनि।

The sin-destroying Ganga removes all their sins and suffering. (2)
पापताप सभ तनिक हरथि गंगा अघयाशिनी॥२॥

O mind, like a moon-loving cakora, why keep tasting the fierce embers of sensual life?
चितचकोर की चाख नित, विषय विषम अंगार।

Better to worship Sita and Rama: make the nectar of their names your food.
सीतारामक भजन भल, कर फल अमिय अहार॥

Make nectar your food, casting off the burden of worldly existence.
कर फल अमिय अहार भार संसारक छोड़ी।

Devotees break the bonds of becoming and attain the supreme station of Brahman.
लेल सकल पद ब्रह्म भक्त भव बन्धन तोड़ी॥

Even the fallen may find a path, and wherever they dwell may find fitting happiness.
पतितहुँ काँ गति जतय ततय रहि लहु सुख समुचित।

Know what truly serves your good; shun the improper attractions of worldly life. (3)
हित निश्चित निज जानु अपर भव विषयक अनुचित॥३॥

O bird of the mind, how long must you suffer in the cage of worldly existence?
मन विहङ्ग कति दुख सहह भवपिंजर मे आबि।

O Lal, if you wish for happiness, take refuge in the tree of the Lord's feet.
गहह लाल जौं सुख चहय श्रीपद तरुवर पाबि॥

Having found that tree of the Lord's feet, sing the story of Rama every day.
श्रीपद तरुवर पाबि गाबि रहु रामकथा नित।

There is no other means so suited to welfare and deliverance.
नहि तेहि सौं अछि अपर युक्ति कल्याण त्राण हित॥

How many sinners have crossed the ocean of becoming without lingering a moment?
कत पातकि भव सिन्धु तरल नहि रहल एक क्षण।

Sing Hari's story again and again, gathering your mind into one as best you can. (4)
गाबि गाबि हरि कथा यथा मति लाबि एक मन॥४॥

The text reproduced above is taken from the Maithili Academy's edition.

3

Quantitative Scansion

Let us consider Maithili pronunciation rules and the distinction between short and long vowels.

Acquaint yourself with the prosodic categories called guru and laghu in the śāstras.

Among the thirteen vowel signs, अ, इ, उ, ऋ and ऌ are short, while आ, ई, ऊ, ॠ, ए, ऐ, ओ and औ are long. When a vowel is joined to a consonant, a guṇitākṣara, or syllabic consonant-vowel unit, is produced: क् + अ = क; क् + आ = का. One vowel or one such consonant-vowel unit constitutes an akṣara. An isolated consonant is not counted as an akṣara. Thus in the word अवाक् there are two akṣaras: अ and वा. (1) Every short vowel, and every consonant-vowel unit containing one, is laghu; its sign is U, written above it. (2) Every long vowel, and every unit containing a long vowel, is guru, represented by a short horizontal mark above it. (3) Every akṣara with anusvāra or visarga is counted as guru. (4) When a conjunct consonant, or a consonant alone, follows an akṣara, that preceding akṣara counts as guru; for example, in अच् and सत्य, अ and स respectively are guru.

Just as an akṣara with anusvāra or visarga is counted as long, a short vowel with candrabindu is counted as short.

That is, candrabindu + short vowel = one mātrā.

Conjunct consonants: here the mātrās are to be counted as follows:

क्ति = क् + त् + इ = 0 + 0 + 1 = 1.

क्ती = क् + त् + ई = 0 + 0 + 2 = 2.

क्ष = क् + ष = 0 + 1.

त्र = त् + र = 0 + 1.

ज्ञ = ज् + ञ = ० + १.

श्र = श् + र = ० + १.

स्र = स् + र = ० + १.

शृ = श् + ऋ = ० + १.

त्व = त् + व = ० + १.

त्त्व = त् + त् + व = ० + ० + १.

Short vowel + ऽ = १ + ०.

The bikārī sign is not used after अ or a long vowel: दिअऽ, आऽ and ओऽ, for example, are faulty usages. It can, however, be placed after a consonant combined with अ.

Short vowel + candrabindu = १ + ०.
Long vowel + candrabindu = २ + ०.
For example, हँसल = १ + १ + १.

साँस = २ + १.

The bikārī mark and candrabindu each have a count of zero.
जा कऽ = २ + १.

क् = ०.

क = क् + अ = ० + १.

Because a tendency has developed in Maithili to read क as क्, the bikārī sign has become necessary. No such need arises with long vowels.
U — sign of a short syllable.
। — sign of a long syllable.

One long syllable (।) equals two short syllables (U).

4

Metrical Disruption

Let us now examine all four kuṇḍaliyās in Laldas's Mithila Ramayana. You will plainly encounter metrical disruption. The poet Laldas himself could not have broken the metre. These are clearly not merely typing mistakes. They may therefore be the work of an editor or proofreader at the Maithili Academy who, unfamiliar with quantitative scansion, disturbed the metre in an attempt to standardise spelling. Ramdev Jha, however, asserted that no metrical disruption occurs in the Sahitya Akademi edition of Laldas's Ramayana, which he edited. In his reply to the accusation that he had altered the original text, he argued that those making the accusation appeared unfamiliar with quantitative scansion. He maintained that his departures from the source text were intended to correct metrical disruption. In other words, if Laldas wrote in the kuṇḍaliyā metre, an editor should at least know that merely placing the heading 'kuṇḍaliyā' over a poem is insufficient. In Ramdev Jha's view, the Sahitya Akademi edition of Laldas's Ramayana should be treated as the definitive text. Let us now examine that edition.

Laldas's Kuṇḍaliyās, Edited by Ramdev Jha (Sahitya Akademi)

Kuṇḍaliyā–Dohā

Raghunayaka, abode of compassion, looked upon the humble Vibhishana.
रघुनायक करुणायतन देखि विभीषण दीन।

He gave the token of kingship; let your mind remain absorbed in his feet.
देल प्रमाणहिं राज्य पद तनि पद रहु मन लीन॥

Let your mind remain absorbed in his feet: he protects the poor and the lowly.
तनि पद रहु मन लीन हीन दीनक प्रतिपालक।

Compassionate to those who seek refuge, he dispels Laldas's sorrow.
शरणागत वत्सल दयाल लालक दुख घालक॥

The guardians of the worlds, Death and Time, fear the sight of his keen arrows.
लोकपाल यम काल डरथि लखि जनिक सुसायक।

He who frees all worlds from sorrow is the mighty Lord Raghunayaka. (1)
सकल लोक निश्शोक करथि से विभु रघुनायक॥१॥

The tale of Raghupati destroys sin; merely hearing it drives away grief.
अधनाशिनी रघुपति कथा, सुनितहि हो दुख दूर।

The Lord remains gracious to them, fulfilling their heart's desires.
तनिपर प्रभु अनुकूल रहि, करथि मनोरथ पूर॥

He fulfils their desires and always protects them from cruel people.
करथि मनोरथ पूर क्रूर सौं सदा बचाबथि।

He increases their wealth, kindred, victory, splendour, fortune and happiness.
धन जन विजय विभूति जूति सुख तनिक बढ़ाबथि॥

He saves them from lust and the like, and grants undying devotion.
काम आदि सौं बचथि भक्ति पाबथि अविनाशिनि।

The sin-destroying Ganga removes all their sins and suffering. (2)
पापताप सभ तनिक हरथि गंगा अघनाशिनी॥२॥

O mind, like a moon-loving cakora, why keep tasting the fierce embers of sensual life?
चितचकोर की चाख नित, विषय विषम अंगार।

Better to worship Sita and Rama: make the nectar of their names your food.
सीतारामक भजन भल, कर फल अमिय अहार॥

Make nectar your food, casting off the burden of worldly existence.
कर फल अमिय अहार भार संसारक छोड़ी।

Devotees break the bonds of becoming and attain the supreme station of Brahman.
लेल सकल पद ब्रह्म भक्त भव बन्धन तोड़ी॥

Even the fallen may find a path, and wherever they dwell may find fitting happiness.
पतितहुँ काँ गति जतय ततय रहि लहु सुख समुचित।

Know what truly serves your good; shun the improper attractions of worldly life. (3)
हित निश्चित निज जानु अपर भव विषयक अनुचित॥३॥

O bird of the mind, how long must you suffer in the cage of worldly existence?
मन विहङ्ग कति दुख सहह भवपिंजर मे आबि।

O Lal, if you wish for happiness, take refuge in the tree of the Lord's feet.
गहह लाल जौं सुख चहय श्रीपद तरुवर पाबि॥

Having found that tree of the Lord's feet, sing the story of Rama every day.
श्रीपद तरुवर पाबि गाबि रहु रामकथा नित।

There is no other means so suited to welfare and deliverance.
नहि तेहि सौं अछि अपर युक्ति कल्याण त्राण हित॥

How many sinners have crossed the ocean of becoming without lingering a moment?
कत पातकि भव सिन्धु तरल नहि रहल एक क्षण।

Sing Hari's story again and again, gathering your mind into one as best you can. (4)
गाबि गाबि हरि कथा यथा मति लाबि एक मन॥४॥

There is, in fact, little substantial difference between the Maithili Academy's text and this edition. Only case endings and a couple of words have been joined together at some places and separated at others. The last word of the second kuṇḍaliyā has been changed from अघयाशिनी (aghayāśinī) to अघनाशिनी (aghanāśinī).

Gokarna in Karnataka lies beside the Gangavali and Adhanashini streams, and 'पापताप सभ तनिक हरथि गंगा' refers to a Ganga that removes sins; therefore the use of 'अधनाशिनी' (adhanāśinī) is appropriate, not 'अघनासिनी' (aghanāsinī), which is probably a typing error.

Although the claim to have corrected the metrical irregularities has not been substantiated, I find the Sahitya Akademi text preferable to the Maithili Academy text because an attempt has been made to use words appropriately.

18. Language, Metre and Poetic Beauty: Rasa, Dhvani and Vakrokti

Abstract

This chapter examines the dramatic functions of folk idiom, Sanskrit-derived mythological diction, songs, Vidyapati's lyric verses, double meaning, dhvani and vakrokti in Kunal's plays. Language here is not decoration; it is an active theatrical means of constructing character, setting, memory and emotional register.

Keywords: Maithili language; metre; rasa; dhvani; vakrokti; Vidyapati; dramatic poetry.

Kunal's language is not uniform but multilayered. In the trilogy of folk plays, he uses distinctly rural Maithili idioms, heavily alliterative rhymes and song forms, with folk expressions of hāsya (the comic) and śṛṅgāra (the erotic or romantic) predominating. In the quartet of love plays, he adopts a comparatively Sanskritised, classical and cultivated Maithili appropriate to an āśrama setting and mythological dignity. His sensitivity to character and milieu is clearly reflected in this linguistic artistry.

From the perspective of vakrokti, the folk plays bring verbal obliqueness—Kuntaka's sense of the term—to its highest pitch. The chieftain's turban (saradārīk mureṭhā), Kusma's lahaṭhī (shackles versus bangles), cumāon versus śrāddha, and the epithet 'supreme rogue' (dhūrta-śiromaṇi) generate dramatic energy through double meanings and puns. From the standpoint of dhvani, the ending of Bidāpat (life within the pada, or lyric) and the repeated love refrain of Kusmā-Salhes rise above direct denotation into suggested meaning: tranquillity resonates beneath pathos, while spirituality sounds above erotic love.

Kunal's deployment of Vidyapati's lyrics is a deliberate poetic strategy. It is not simply ornamentation but an effort to turn Mithila's poetic memory into a living component of theatre. In Bidāpat, he creates a dramatic interpretation of Vidyapati's lyrics; in Sukanyā, a lyric of spring becomes an instrument for creating atmosphere. Thus the traditions of lyric poetry and drama merge into one another.

19. The Ideological Ground: A Parallel Literary Perspective and Theatre

Abstract

This chapter considers the presence of folk performers, marginalised communities, women's agency and cultural synthesis in Kunal's dramatic practice from the perspective of parallel literature. The ideological orientation of his theatre appears not as slogans but as a socially engaged rereading enacted through stories, characters, folk forms and theatrical practice.

Keywords: parallel literature; folk theatre; subaltern; women's agency; cultural synthesis; Mithila.

The importance of this collection emerges particularly clearly from the perspective of the Videha parallel-literature movement. Whereas institutional literary histories have generally privileged elite-centred, printed and supposedly 'refined' traditions, Kunal grounds his entire dramatic undertaking in folk theatre and oral narrative. In his dedication he brings to the centre of literary history the unnamed performers of nāch whose names have never been recorded.

The clearest expression of this perspective is his portrayal in Kusmā-Salhes of the Dusadh (Dalit) folk-deity hero as a people's hero and a symbol of fearlessness and freedom. This establishes a subaltern voice upon the stage. In Bidāpat, the great poet Vidyapati is brought down from the pedestal of an institutional icon and made a living protagonist of folk theatre. In the quartet of love plays, mythological heroines—Śruvāvatī, Sukanyā, Śvetā and Suprabhā—are reread as women capable of acting and determining their own lives. These are different dimensions of the same parallel-historical perspective.

Resistance on three levels—caste (Dalit and subaltern), gender (women's agency), and culture (Hindu–Muslim synthesis)—operates simultaneously in these plays. Nowhere, however, does it assume the form of sloganeering; instead it is absorbed into the natural movement of folk forms. This is evidence of Kunal's ideological maturity.

Part II

Applied Theatre Criticism

Society, Identity and Cultural Criticism

20. Towards a Woman-Centred Critical Theory for Maithili (Including Queer Feminism): With Reference to Kamini's A Woman Divided into Fragments and Shanti Lakshmi Chaudhary's Lesbian Continuum

Abstract

A woman-centred critical theory for Maithili, including queer feminism, with reference to Kamini's A Woman Divided into Fragments and Shanti Lakshmi Chaudhary's Lesbian Continuum: (1) a review of Kamini's poetry collection A Woman Divided into Fragments; and (2) an evaluation of Shanti Lakshmi Chaudhary's Lesbian Continuum and a comparative analysis with Kamini.

Keywords: women; centred; critical theory; queer; feminism; including; reference; Kamini.

Towards a Woman-Centred Critical Theory for Maithili (Including Queer Feminism)

With Reference to Kamini's A Woman Divided into Fragments and Shanti Lakshmi Chaudhary's Lesbian Continuum

1. A Woman Divided into Fragments: A Review of Kamini's Poetry Collection. 2. Shanti Lakshmi Chaudhary's Lesbian Continuum: Review and Comparative Analysis with Kamini.

1

A Woman Divided into Fragments: A Review of Kamini's Poetry Collection

Introduction: The Profound Meaning of the Title

Kamini's collection of poems A Woman Divided into Fragments (2017) is an important document of feminist consciousness in modern Maithili poetry. Its very title is a powerful poetic statement: how a woman's existence is progressively fragmented in a patriarchal society; how, divided among her different roles—as wife, mother, daughter, sister and daughter-in-law—she loses her original identity. This fragmentation is psychological as well as social.

A Woman Divided into Fragments (Title Poem)

This is the collection's central poem, presenting the tragedy of the fragmentation of a woman's existence:

> 'Along with a woman's body / now her womb and her milk / are also being sold. / A woman returns having sold / even her motherly love, / who knows out of what necessity.'

Principal Features:

The many dimensions of fragmentation: the poem speaks not merely of bodily division but also of mental and emotional disintegration.

Representation of inner struggle: how a woman loses her original self amid her various roles.

> The compassionate voice: 'She was not / so hard before, / or have we made her so?' These lines also establish society's responsibility.

Tears

This poem symbolises a woman's silent suffering:

> 'Whenever tears / fall from a woman's eyes, / they are not merely / a few drops of water; / they stand / against injustice and oppression.'

Literary Qualities:

Symbolism: tears are not simply tears; they signify rebellion.

Social commentary: men's lack of sensitivity ('She was not / so hard before').

> Interrogative intensity: 'How did the power / to shake things disappear?'

What an Irony!

A forceful satire on the paradoxes of women's education:

> 'He who hides his face / in a woman's sari-end, / he who exploits / a woman's body, / he who cannot live / without a woman— / that same man calls / a woman's dignity and honour / into question.'

Poetic Craft:

Use of alliteration: 'मुँह छुपबैत' (mūh chupabait), 'कुलटा अछि' (kulṭā achi), and 'नरकक खान अछि' (narakak khān achi).

Parallel structure: the repetition of three questioning lines.

Biting satire: a severe critique of men's double standards.

The Inner Mind

A poem offering a profound psychoanalytic exploration of love:

> 'If you love / a woman, / do so not in the darkness / of night, / but in the light / of day.'

Distinctive Qualities:

Ethical clarity: love should be open, not concealed.

Social responsibility: a love answerable before society.

Emotional depth: the true meaning of intimacy.

Brahmavākya

A sharp criticism of patriarchal religious structures:

'Sakina Khatun / is very sad today; / time and again / her eyes fill with tears.'

Principal Elements:

Historical reference: the story of Sakina Khatun.

Religious criticism: the hypocrisy of the man who has 'a house full of children and family'.

Feminist discourse: the exploitation of women in the name of religion.

Punarnavā

A powerful poem of self-reconstruction:

'Today I offered / sesame and kuśa grass / in your name; / I bathed and returned / from midstream. / From today, you have become / the past for me.'

Poetic Features:

Use of metaphor: sesame and kuśa grass, the flowing current, and symbols of womanhood.

Declaration of self-respect: the rejection of male-centred identity.

Beauty of diction: the use of a folk tradition involving sesame and kuśa grass.

The Trial by Fire

A contemporary rereading of Sita's ordeal by fire in the Ramayana:

'Why should a woman / suffer the punishment / for a man's mistake? / Why must Sita alone / undergo the trial by fire / again and again— / the customs and rules / of society?'

Important Aspects:

Mythological reinterpretation: questioning Sita's trial by fire.

The demand for gender justice: why was the man not subjected to a trial by fire?

Social criticism: opposition to double standards.

A Woman's Destiny

A philosophical consideration of the social destiny of women:

'By returning once again / into the womb of the earth, / you did not do well, Sita; / you closed it off / for ever and ever.'

Philosophical Depth:

Questioning fatalism: is a woman's destiny predetermined or imposed by society?

Mythological reference: Sita's return into the earth.

Compassion and rebellion: an effective presentation of mingled emotions.

Two Fistfuls of Paddy

A moving portrayal of economic exploitation:

> 'My heart finds comfort: / this grove of mango saplings / was planted by my own father; / this is the house / built by my father.'

Principal Features:

The question of economic rights: women's rights to property.

Emotional intensity: memories of ancestral property.

Social realism: criticism of the custom of kanyādān, the ritual 'giving away' of a daughter.

A Woman's Patience

A powerful depiction of the limits of endurance:

> 'Is being a woman / a small thing? / It is no small or great matter, / and so— / and so a woman must pay / the penalty / for being a woman.'

Literary Qualities:

Ironic expression: 'must pay the penalty'.

Logical progression: the gradual development of an argument.

Emotional intensity: the breaking point of patience.

Another Krishna

A depiction of the complexity of modern relationships:

> 'Madhava! How did you forget / that I am your very Radha, / whom you once / called your own?'

Principal Elements:

Mythological parallel: Radha and Krishna in a contemporary context.

The irony of love: the pain of abandonment.

> Interrogative intensity: 'This Vaṃśīvaṭa, / this Vrindavan— / today all are silent.'

Kanyādān Means Bathing in the Ganga

A forceful rejection of the custom of kanyādān:

> 'Kanyādān is still performed / among us today: / Father, holding barley and kuśa grass / in his hand, / places his daughter's hand / in another man's hand.'

Distinctive Qualities:

Redefining tradition: is kanyādān to be equated with bathing in the Ganga?

Criticism of patriarchy: the objectification of the daughter.

Declaration of self-respect: 'If I had done it, what would I have done?'

".

Sesame and Rice

A symbolic poem of women's freedom:

Mother would never let her daughter eat sesame and rice during the Tila Sankranti festival. She would distribute it throughout the neighbourhood, saying that a daughter's life was burdensome enough already; why make her indebted by feeding her sesame?

Poetic Craft:

Use of folk tradition: the symbol of sesame and rice.

Social commentary: the denial of women's rights.

Symbolism: sesame and rice as an emblem of women's freedom.
".

I Am Not a Purchased Slave

A manifesto rejecting servitude:

> 'Mother will spend her whole life / beside Father, / as his bonded labourer.'

Principal Features:

Declaration of self-respect: 'I am not a purchased slave.'

Generational difference: the mother's sacrifice against the daughter's rebellion.

The aspiration for social change: the dream of a new age.

...

Uts

The conflict between memory and the present:

> 'I am not merely your wife / I am something more / such as someone's mother / someone's sister / someone's daughter.'

Literary features:

Multidimensional identity: the diverse roles of a woman.

Self-exploration: 'What I am saying.'

Emotional complexity: the conflict between memory and the present.
"

Muffler

A portrayal of the ironies of urban life:

> 'Today I bought a muffler / today I saw a muffler / and then I remembered.'

Principal elements:

" Criticism of materialism: the emptiness of urban life.

The significance of memory: the sweetness of village life.

Comparative analysis: city versus village.

“

Man, Woman's Creation

A philosophical consideration of relations between women and men:

> 'Whenever sweat falls / from a man's forehead / a woman will wipe it / with the end of her sari.'

Philosophical depth:

A philosophy of coexistence: the mutual dependence of women and men.

The power of tenderness: the significance of a woman's affection.

The demand for equality: 'For man / is woman's creation.'

Draupadi–1

A contemporary rereading of Draupadi from the Mahabharata:

> 'Draupadi! Into how many fragments / must your feelings have been divided / on that day / when they were split into fragments ...'

Literary merits:

Mythic reinterpretation: a modern perspective on Draupadi.

Questioning polyandry: five husbands = fragmentation.

The crisis of female identity: a divided existence.

Draupadi–2

The contemporary relevance of Draupadi's disrobing:

> 'Draupadi! I feel uneasy / bearing the weight of your unbound hair.'

Principal features:

The symbolism of disrobing: the exploitation of women in modern times.

The absence of Krishna: the absence of a protector.

The need for inner strength: the resolve to fight for oneself.

The Heirloom Sari

An incisive critique of social conventions:

> 'Yashoda Ji's “that” / government officer / every day, as soon as he opens his eyes.'

Distinctive merits:

A satirical tone: 'Yashoda Ji's.'

The exposure of social hypocrisy: religious pretence.

Resistance to traditions hostile to women: control even after death.

Without a Relationship

A portrayal of the hollowness of modern relationships:

> 'The rose you gave me / has withered / even its leaves have dried / its fragrance had vanished long before.'

Literary features:

Symbolism: the rose = love.

A portrayal of decay: the death of a relationship.
Emotional emptiness: 'has withered.'

The Speed of Time

A poignant presentation of time's cruelty:

'Forgive me, Mother / at this fourth stage of life / when you need me.'

Principal elements:

Generational conflict: the mother's old age.
Social responsibility: neglect within the family.
Compassion and helplessness: 'illness and old age.'

How Deeply I Miss My Home

An emotional expression of the pain of migration:

'Somewhere here / was my home / which can no longer be seen.'

Poetic beauty:

Nostalgia: the memory of home.
The pain of displacement: a life lived away from home.
The significance of intimacy: home = belonging.

The Abandoned Woman

A philosophical consideration of the cruelty of fate:

'Why is it always / the woman who is abandoned / why is the man never abandoned?'

Distinctive merits:

The question of gender inequality:

Why is it the woman who is abandoned?
Philosophical depth: fate versus society.
An interrogative impulse: a succession of pointed questions.

This Is Not Right, Noble One

A bold attempt to reread the Ramayana:

'Abandonment in love / is not right, noble one / you were known as ...'

Principal features:

Reassessment of a mythological character: criticism of Rama.
A feminist perspective: taking Sita's side.
Bold questioning: redefining maryada, the bounds of righteous conduct.

I Shall Fight

A powerful affirmation of inner strength:

'I shall fight / to the very end / for as long as life remains.'

Literary merits:

A resolve to struggle: a lifelong fight.
An assertion of self-confidence: a woman.

An inspiring voice: hope for the future.

Chandai

A beautiful use of the folk tradition:

> 'When Chandai became anxious / on her first journey to her husband's home ...'

Distinctive merits:

The influence of folk poetry: Chandai's story.

Social reality: conflicts within the family.

Emotional beauty: memory and the present.

Has Such a Thing Ever Happened?

An aspiration for social change:

> 'O God! Punamiya will not survive / this time.'

Principal elements:

Rejection of rebirth: 'This life is much ...'

A compassionate voice: the depth of suffering.

Spiritual questioning: a complaint addressed to God.

Neglected

The psychological effects of neglect:

> 'Some things become bound / to life in such a way / that those very things become paramount.'

Literary features:

Subtle psychological analysis: the effects of neglect.

Emotional depth: 'My elder sister gave me my name.'

Self-exploration: the search for one's identity.

Gita

A poetic presentation of a philosophy of life:

> 'Crushed beneath a mountain / of responsibilities is Gita / with four daughters, all four of them girls.'

Principal features:

Social responsibility: the burden borne by a woman.

A compassionate portrayal: a mountain of responsibilities.

A Life Torn to Shreds

A poignant portrayal of life's disintegration:

> 'The first time / I placed my hand / in your hand.'

Literary merits:

The conflict between memory and the present: the memory of love.

The pain of disintegration: 'a life torn to shreds.'

Emotional intensity: the karuna rasa, or aesthetic mood of pathos.

Even After All This

Resistance to social convention:

'When the sweat from her forehead / falls down to her feet / who knows where a woman can go?'

Distinctive merits:

Recognition of labour: neglect of women's work.

Gender inequality: male privilege.

Incisive questioning: 'any story.'

Silence

A philosophical consideration of the power of silence:

'Your love / is not a rose petal / nor is it a thorn of the bagur plant.'

Philosophical depth:

The significance of silence: love beyond words.

The expression of subtle feelings: 'loving me.'

Symbolism: silence = profound love.

Broken Strings

The ironies of modern life:

'Like inflation, illness and unemployment / for me ...'

Principal elements:

Social reality: the burden of rising prices.

Economic crisis: unemployment.

A compassionate portrayal: the struggle of life.

Paro

A powerful declaration of women's independence:

'Paro is grown up now / she makes her own decisions / for herself.'

Literary features:

The right to self-determination: independent decisions.

Social transformation: the arrival of a new age.

An optimistic voice: the dream of the future.

Carefree Laughter

A beautiful portrayal of motherhood:

'Like a lotus flower / Prachi bursts into laughter.'

Poetic beauty:

Nature imagery: the simile of the lotus.

The joy of motherhood: bursting into laughter.

Tender feeling: the expression of affection.

Woman and the Buddha

The question of spiritual equality:

'Better one sorrow / than these hundred sorrows / it would have been better / had I become a Buddha.'

Philosophical depth:

The spiritual quest: the longing for liberation.
The gender question: why should a woman not become a Buddha?
A demand for equality: spiritual rights.

From Beginning to End

A philosophical consideration of the cycle of life:

'Like the roots of the banyan and peepal / I have not spread so far ...'

Principal features:

The symbol of nature: the roots of banyan and peepal trees.
Self-exploration: the search for existence.
Philosophical questioning: the meaning of life.

Resistance

A powerful declaration of rebellion:

'Like a blue celestial sheet / spread across / my entire existence ...'

Literary merits:

The resolve to resist: opposition to exploitation.
An assertion of inner strength: 'What am I to do?'
An optimistic voice: faith in the future.

Mother

A poignant portrayal of motherhood:

'How wonderful it would be / if mothers / never grew old.'

Principal elements:

A mother's sacrifice: lifelong self-denial.
The depth of compassion: a portrayal of intimacy.
Social commentary: the neglect of mothers.

Hypocrisy

An incisive critique of religious hypocrisy:

'Sarcastically chanting / "A woman's character and a man's destiny ..."'

Distinctive merits:

Religious criticism: a rereading of scripture.
Exposing misogynistic thinking: unmasking hypocrisy.
A satirical tone: intense indignation.

Liberation

A poetic expression of the longing for liberation:

'With great devotion / Punita has performed / her father's shraddha rites.'

Literary features:

Religious redefinition: women's rights.

Social change: breaking with tradition.

An assertion of self-confidence: the path to liberation.

Of What Use Is Such Valour?

A redefinition of purushartha, human endeavour or manly virtue:

'O grandsire Bhishma of society / how long will you remain silent?'

Principal elements:

Questioning purushartha: what use is such valour?

Criticism of social neglect: why this silence?

The demand for gender equality: equal rights.

From Poison to More Poison

A psychological analysis of life's poison:

'O, one who has been scorched! / It is by this name / that you are known ...'

Literary merits:

Psychological depth: the effect of poison.

Self-exploration: a crisis of identity.

Philosophical questioning: the meaning of life.

Existence

A philosophical consideration of existence:

'However hard you try to erase it / my existence will not be erased.'

Philosophical depth:

Existential thought: an independent existence.

An assertion of inner strength: an indelible presence.

A rebellious voice: opposition to exploitation.

The Laughter of Tuberoses

An outstanding example of poetic beauty:

'When I close my eyes / I cannot see anything anywhere.'

Poetic beauty:

Nature imagery: the symbolism of the tuberose.

The expression of subtle feeling: laughter in darkness.

An element of mystery: profound meaning.

The Weapon of Trust

A philosophical consideration of the significance of trust:

'Here, too, / there is no relationship / between a man's words and the man.'

Principal features:

A crisis of trust: a man's promises.

Social reality: the dominance of falsehood.

A compassionate voice: betrayal of trust.

The Relationship Between Flower and Branch

A philosophical analysis of relationships:

'The flower asks the branch / between you and me ...'

Philosophical depth:

The nature of a relationship: the symbols of flower and branch.

Mutual dependence: coexistence.

The philosophy of nature: the truth of life.

Midstream

A poignant portrayal of life's struggle:

'Today / the sixteenth year of marriage / is passing.'

Literary merits:

The cruelty of time: counting the years.

A portrayal of isolation: the pain of loneliness.

Karuna rasa: profound suffering.

The Unborn–1

A poignant portrayal of an unborn child:

'Sobbing in little gasps / Devaki is weeping ...'

Principal elements:

The pain of motherhood: the killing of an unborn child.

Social reality: female foeticide.

A compassionate portrayal: a moving expression.

The Unborn–2

A strong protest against female foeticide:

'O my father / if upon your forehead ...'

Distinctive merits:

Social criticism: opposition to the preference for sons.

Exposing patriarchy: gender discrimination.

Logical progression: arguments developed step by step.

The Bazaar of Women's Bodies

An incisive criticism of the objectification of women:

'This society / will have to change.'

Literary features:

Opposition to objectification: the trade in women's bodies.
A demand for social transformation: the need for revolutionary change.
Intense indignation: a satirical voice.

Honour

A powerful declaration of self-respect:

'Just as we plant / holy basil in a flowerpot ...'

Principal features:

The importance of self-respect: safeguarding personal dignity.
Social reality: the tension between honour and humiliation.
Symbolism: the worship of holy basil.

Overall Evaluation

A Woman Divided into Fragments: A Multidimensional Critical Analysis

Introduction: The Need for an Interdisciplinary Perspective

Kamini's poetry collection Khand-Khand Me Bantait Stri (A Woman Divided into Fragments, 2017) is not merely a literary work; it is a complex network of epistemological, socio-political, and aesthetic questions. Four principal analytical frameworks are necessary for a proper evaluation of this work:

1. Gangesha's Navya-Nyaya philosophy: an epistemological foundation and the theory of valid means of knowledge.

2. The Videha parallel-history framework: its place in the Maithili literary tradition.

3. Indian aesthetics: theories of rasa, dhvani, vakrokti, and aucitya.

4. Western and Chinese theories: feminism, postcolonialism, and Taoist philosophy.

Section 1: An Evaluation through Gangesha's Navya-Nyāya Philosophy

1.1 Gangesha's Tattvacintāmaṇi and the Epistemology of Poetry

The development of the theory of the means of valid knowledge (pramāṇa) in Gangesha Upadhyaya's (1325 CE) Tattvacintāmaṇi is highly relevant to the analysis of the structure of poetic knowledge. According to Gangesha, there are four means of valid knowledge:

1.1.1 Perception (pratyakṣa pramāṇa)

Gangesha's definition: "इन्द्रियार्थसन्निकर्षोत्पन्नं ज्ञानम् अव्यपदेश्यं व्यवसायात्मकं प्रत्यक्षम्" (knowledge arising from contact between a sense organ and its object, inexpressible through words and determinate, is perception).

Kamini's poetry presents knowledge arising from direct experience:

In the poem 'Two Fistfuls of Paddy':

My heart finds comfort.

These are the young rice shoots planted by my own father.

This is not merely memory; it is immediate, direct experience. According to Gangesha, there is a distinction between indeterminate perception (nirvikalpaka, without conceptual determination) and determinate perception (savikalpaka, with conceptual determination). Kamini's poetry presents determinate perception, in which sensory experience, joined with dispositions and memories, gives rise to poetic knowledge.

1.1.2 Inference (anumāna pramāṇa)

Gangesha's principle of invariable concomitance (vyāpti): "व्याप्तिर्हि अविनाभावः साध्यसाधनयोः" (pervasion is the inseparable connection between what is to be proved and the means of proving it).

In the poem 'Trial by Fire':

Why must a woman bear the punishment for a man's mistake?
Why must Sita undergo a trial by fire again and again?

This constitutes a structure of inferential reasoning:

Reason (hetu): Sita repeatedly underwent trial by fire.

Pervasion (vyāpti): wherever a male-dominated society exists, women are exploited.

Locus (pakṣa): Mithila society.

Probandum (sādhya): patriarchal exploitation.

According to Gangesha's five-membered syllogism (pañcāvayava-nyāya):

1. Proposition (pratijñā): women are exploited.

2. Reason (hetu): because Sita underwent a trial by fire.

3. Example (udāharaṇa): wherever patriarchy exists, women are exploited (as in Draupadi's disrobing).

4. Application (upanaya): patriarchy exists in Mithila.

5. Conclusion (nigamana): therefore, women are exploited in Mithila.

1.1.3 Analogy (upamāna pramāṇa)

Gangesha's theory of analogy: "तत्त्वज्ञानम् उपमानं साधारणधर्मकथनात्" (knowledge of the object through a statement of a shared characteristic).

In the poem 'Man, Woman's Creation':

Whenever sweat falls
from a man's forehead, a woman will wipe it with the end of her sari.

This is an analogy based on partial similarity. The relationship between woman and man ought to rest on complementarity, not exploitation. This is an excellent example of Gangesha's consideration of similarity and dissimilarity (sādharmya–vaidharmya-vicāra).

1.1.4 Testimony (śabda pramāṇa)

Gangesha's principle of the trustworthy utterance: "आप्तवचनं शब्दः" (the words of a reliable authority constitute verbal testimony).

Kamini's poetry questions both popular sayings and religious scripture:

In the poem 'Hypocrisy':

"त्रिया चरित्रम्पुरुषस्य भाग्यम्" ('A woman's character and a man's destiny ...').

Chanting with sarcasm, a whole palmful

of vermilion spots.

This amounts to a refutation of scriptural verbal testimony. According to Gangesha, trustworthiness is necessary for the validity of testimony. Kamini raises the question: is this scriptural saying trustworthy? Does it communicate true knowledge?

1.2 Gangesha's Theory of Indeterminate Perception and Women's Identity

According to Gangesha's theory of indeterminate perception, the first stage of knowledge is free from concepts. Similarly, a woman's initial experience of her own identity should not be defined by men; it should be self-determined.

In the poem 'This Is Not Right, Noble One':

Abandonment in love

is not right, noble one;

you were called the supreme exemplar of righteous conduct.

This refutes a male-defined conception of maryādā, or righteous conduct. In Gangesha's terminology, it is erroneous cognition (asat-khyāti): Sita's self-validity is denied and a Rama-defined 'purity' is imposed upon her.

1.3 Gangesha's Means of Cognising Pervasion and the Logical Structure of Poetry

Gangesha offers three means of apprehending vyāpti, or pervasion:

1. Anvaya (positive concomitance).
2. Vyatireka (negative concomitance).
3. Anvaya–vyatireka (the combined method).

In the poem 'The Abandoned Woman':

Why is it always

the woman who is abandoned?

Why is the man never the abandoned one?

This is reasoning by the method of difference (vyatireka):

Positive concomitance (anvaya): wherever there is a woman, there is abandonment.

Negative concomitance (vyatireka): wherever there is a man, abandonment is absent.

Conclusion: the situation is gender-specific, not universal.

1.4 Gangesha's Theory of Error (khyāti-vāda) and Poetic Truth

According to Gangesha's theory of cognition contrary to reality (viparīta-khyāti-vāda), error consists in superimposing one object upon another.

In the title poem 'A Woman Divided into Fragments':

Together with a woman's body,

there are now being sold
her womb and her milk as well.

Society's deluded knowledge does not see a woman in the wholeness of her existence; instead it imposes upon her a set of fragmented roles:

Mother = womb and milk.
Wife = body and service.
Daughter = burden and gift in marriage.

This is erroneous cognition (asat-khyāti): the fragmentation of a woman's unified being is a false superimposition.

1.5 Gangesha's Theory of Absence and the Absence of Women

Gangesha recognises four kinds of absence:

1. Prāg-abhāva (prior non-existence).
2. Pradhvaṃsa-abhāva (posterior non-existence).
3. Atyanta-abhāva (absolute non-existence).
4. Anyonyābhāva (mutual non-existence).

In the poem 'I Am Not a Purchased Slave':

Mother will spend her whole life beside Father,
as his bonded labourer.

This is a rejection of absolute non-existence: the perpetual absence of women's freedom cannot be accepted. The modern woman brings prior non-existence to an end: freedom that did not exist before now exists.

1.6 Gangesha's Principle of Non-Apprehension as Evidence and Poetic Silence

According to Gangesha's theory of non-apprehension as a proof of absence, knowledge may also be possible in the absence of an effective means of proof.

In the poem 'Silence':

Not a rose petal
is your love,
nor a thorn of the bagur plant.

This is the evidentiary force of silence. What has not been said may also be known through non-apprehension. In Gangesha's words, "योग्य-अनुपलब्धिःअभाव-प्रतीतेः कारणम्"—the appropriate non-apprehension of a thing is the cause of cognition of its absence.

Section 2: The Videha Parallel-History Framework

2.1 The Character and Objectives of the Videha Movement

The Videha e-journal (since 2000) has sought to establish a parallel history of Maithili literature, offering an alternative to the institutional canon of the Sahitya Akademi.

The fundamental principles of Videha's parallel history are:

1. Democratic literary creation: publication without institutional approval.
2. Representation across social groups: Dalit, women's and Adivasi voices.
3. A counter-canon: a system of recognition parallel to that of the Sahitya Akademi.
4. Digital inclusiveness: dissemination free of physical boundaries.

2.2 Kamini as a Representative of the Videha Tradition

Kamini's poetry collection embodies the central characteristics of the Videha tradition:

2.2.1 Resistance to Institutions and an Independent Voice

In the poem "Hypocrisy":

> "Triyā charitram puruṣasya bhāgyam"
> Chanted with irony.

This is a repudiation of religious and institutional knowledge. The Videha tradition questions the authority of scripture, just as Kamini resists a religion defined by men.

2.2.2 Representation of Subaltern Voices

Videha answers Gayatri Spivak's question, "Can the Subaltern Speak?" (1988), with "yes." Kamini's poems bear witness to voices from the margins.

In the poem "Two Fistfuls of Paddy":

> I have nothing here,
> no house,
> no courtyard,
> no fields or threshing ground.

This is the voice of the economically subaltern woman, dispossessed of property. Videha gives such a voice institutional recognition.

2.2.3 Re-reading Myth: The Videha Method

The Videha tradition offers alternative readings of Mithila's myths. Whereas the Sahitya Akademi celebrates Vedic and Purāṇic myths, Videha reinterprets them.

In the poem "Trial by Fire":

> Why must a woman suffer punishment for a man's mistake?

Why must Sita undergo the trial by fire again and again?

This is a Videha re-reading of the Sita myth. In the Sahitya Akademi canon Sita is a "devoted wife"; in the Videha reading she is a symbol of the oppressed.

2.3 The Four Pillars of Videha Historiography

Gajendra Thakur's "A Parallel History of Mithila & Maithili Literature" (an ongoing project) proposes four methods:

2.3.1 The Indian aesthetics of rasa, dhvani and vakrokti.

2.3.2 Western theories of criticism.

2.3.3 The epistemology of Navya-Nyāya.

2.3.4 The Videha parallel-history framework.

Kamini's poetry exemplifies all four pillars:

In the poem "Draupadi–1":

Rasa: karuṇa, or pathos (Draupadi's fragmented existence).

Western criticism: a feminist re-reading (criticism of polyandry).

Navya-Nyāya: inferential proof (five husbands = fragmentation).

Videha: an alternative interpretation of myth.

2.4 Videha versus the Sahitya Akademi: A Dialectical Relationship

The Sahitya Akademi canon:

Recognition: state-supported awards.

Publication: printed books, limited circulation.

Language: refined, classical Maithili.

Subject matter: traditional, nationalist and religious.

The Videha parallel canon:

Recognition: popular support, Videha honours, special issues and documentation in parallel history.

Publication: digital, with global circulation.

Language: people's Maithili, the spoken language.

Subject matter: contemporary concerns, feminism and Dalit consciousness.

Kamini's poetry is an exemplary instance of the Videha tradition:

In the poem "The Momentum of Time":

Forgive me, Mother,
in this fourth stage of life.

This is colloquial Maithili, presenting the contemporary reality of an ageing mother's neglect. The Sahitya Akademi neglects such "ordinary" subjects; Videha places them at the centre.

2.5 Videha's Democratic Aesthetics

The Videha tradition establishes a democratic aesthetics in which:

1. Reader = critic: the monopoly of the institutional critic is broken.

2. Writer = publisher: the intermediary disappears.

3. Local = global: the worldwide dissemination of Maithili.

Kamini's poetry is accessible to all: neither a flood of Sanskrit vocabulary nor obscure symbols. This is an aesthetics of the people.

2.6 Videha and Women's Writing: A Historical Perspective

Women's writing has always remained on the margins of Maithili literary history:

The Vidyapati era (before Jyotirishwar): no major woman poet.

The modern era (twentieth century): Lily Ray and Shephalika Verma—limited recognition.

The Videha era (since 2000): a central position.

In the parallel canon, women's writing became mainstream.

"A Woman Divided into Fragments" is a milestone of the Videha era: for the first time women's experience became a central subject of poetry.

2.7 Videha's Archival Method

Videha follows a rigorous archival method in constructing a parallel history:

1. Record the publication date of every work.

2. Collect biographical information about its author.

3. Preserve readers' responses.

4. Cross-reference the relationships among poets and their poems.

Kamini's poetry has been preserved in the Videha archive. Such archival rigour makes source material available to future literary historians.

Section 3: Indian Aesthetics—Rasa, Dhvani, Vakrokti and Aucitya

3.1 Rasa Theory (The Theory of Aesthetic Relish)

Bharata's Nāṭyaśāstra (200 BCE–200 CE) and Ānandavardhana's Dhvanyāloka (ninth century) form the basis of rasa theory.

3.1.1 The Nine Rasas and Kamini's Poetry

Bharata's rasa-sūtra: "विभावानुभावव्यभिचारिसंयोगाद्रसनिष्पत्तिः" [Rasa arises from the conjunction of determinants, consequents and transitory states.] Karuṇa rasa predominates in Kamini's poetry, although other rasas are also present.

3.1.1.1 Karuṇa Rasa (Pathos)

In the poem "A Life Torn to Shreds":

When, for the first time, you had taken
my hand into your own,
it was a pleasant feeling that came over me.
I had felt ...

The stable emotion (sthāyī-bhāva): grief. The determinants (vibhāva): a memory of love and present separation. The consequents (anubhāva): tears and deep sighs (implied). The transitory emotions (vyabhicārī-bhāva): recollection, disenchantment and remorse.

Ācārya Mammaṭa states in the Kāvyaprakāśa (eleventh century): "रसो वा काव्यात्मा"—rasa is the soul of poetry. Kamini's poetry is imbued with rasa; it is not merely a dry account of emotions.

3.1.1.2 Raudra Rasa (Fury)

In the poem "I Am Not a Purchased Slave":

Mother will remain her whole life
beside Father,
as his bonded labourer.
(But the daughter declares:)
I am not a purchased slave.

The stable emotion: anger. The determinant: indignation at seeing the mother's servitude. The consequent: a declaration of resistance in a firm voice. The transitory emotions: fierceness, resentment and agitation.

3.1.1.3 Vīra Rasa (The Heroic)

In the poem "I Shall Fight":

I shall fight
to the very end,
as long as life remains ...

The stable emotion: enthusiasm. The determinant: structures of exploitation. The consequent: a declaration of resolve. The transitory emotions: patience, pride and determination.

3.1.2 Rasa-Sādhāraṇīkaraṇa (The Universalisation of Emotion)

Ācārya Abhinavagupta (tenth century) proposed the theory of sādhāraṇīkaraṇa, whereby a personal emotion becomes universal.

In the poem "Midstream":

Today, of our marriage,
the sixteenth year is passing.
You are in that house,
and I am in this house.

This becomes not merely one woman's experience but that of married women as a whole. The supporting figure (ālambana), the heroine, gives rise to aesthetic excitation, and the reader savours rasa: this is sādhāraṇīkaraṇa.

3.2 Dhvani Theory (The Theory of Suggestion)

Ācārya Ānandavardhana's Dhvanyāloka (ninth century) regards dhvani, or suggestion, as the soul of poetry.

3.2.1 Three Varieties of Dhvani

According to Ānandavardhana:

1. Vastu-dhvani (suggestion of a fact).
2. Alaṃkāra-dhvani (suggestion of a figure of speech).
3. Rasa-dhvani (suggestion of an emotion).

3.2.1.1 Vastu-Dhvani

In the poem "Another Krishna":

Madhava! How could you forget?
Am I your Radha, whom you once called your own?

The explicit meaning (vācyārtha): the heroine asks a question. The suggested meaning (vyaṅgyārtha): the Krishna–Radha myth is repeated in modern relationships—men perpetually abandon women.

3.2.1.2 Rasa-Dhvani

In the poem "Silence":

Not a rose petal
is your love,
nor a thorn of the bagur plant
is your love.
Like a dormant volcano,
it is unmoving;
it is still.

The explicit meaning: love is free of outward display. The suggested meaning (rasa-dhvani): a profound and tranquil love (śānta rasa), beyond words.

Ācārya Mammaṭa states: "काव्यं यशसेऽर्थकृते व्यवहारविदे शिवेतरक्षतये सद्यः परिनिर्वृतये कान्तासम्मिततयोपदेशयुजे"—poetry serves not only fame but also supreme delight or fulfilment (nirvṛti). The power of suggestion brings that supreme delight.

3.2.2 Dhvani versus Abhidhā and Lakṣaṇā

Sanskrit poetics identifies three powers of words:

1. Abhidhā (denotation): primary meaning.
2. Lakṣaṇā (indication): secondary meaning.
3. Vyañjanā (suggestion): resonant or suggested meaning.

In the poem "Chandai":

> When Chandai departed > for her husband's home for the first time ...

Abhidhā: Chandai is going to her husband's household. Lakṣaṇā: the apprehension of a new bride. Vyañjanā (dhvani): fear of a woman's displacement within the patriarchal family structure.

Ānandavardhana states: "यत्र वाचकः शब्दः वाच्यादर्थादन्यं व्यङ्क्ते तत्र व्यञ्जनेत्याख्या"—when a word expresses a meaning beyond its primary sense, that is called vyañjanā. Kamini's poetry is predominantly suggestive.

3.3 Vakrokti Theory (The Theory of Oblique Expression)

Ācārya Kuntaka (tenth century), in Vakroktijīvita, identifies six varieties of vakrokti.

3.3.1 Varṇa-Vinyāsa Vakrokti (Phonetic Obliquity)

In the poem "Tears":

> Whenever a tear falls
> from a woman's eyes ...

The use of the word nor ("tear") carries the sound of everyday Maithili. Using aśru instead would lessen its emotional gravity. This is varṇa-vinyāsa vakrokti.

3.3.2 Pratyaya-Vakrokti (Morphological Obliquity)

The very title "A Woman Divided into Fragments" constitutes an oblique expression:

Ordinary expression: "a divided woman."

Oblique expression: "being divided into fragments"—present tense and continuity.

The suffix in baṇṭait ("being divided") indicates an ongoing process: this is not a one-time occurrence but continuing exploitation.

3.3.3 Vākya-Vakrokti (Sentential Obliquity)

In the poem "What an Irony This Is":

> The one who hides his face in a woman's veil,
> the one who exploits a woman's body,
> the one who cannot live without a woman—> the very same person questions > her honour and dignity.

This is obliquity through indirect expression: an interrogative sentence structure. Instead of making a direct statement, three parallel clauses create mounting intensity.

3.3.4 Prakaraṇa-Vakrokti (Contextual Obliquity)

In the poem "Trial by Fire":

In the context of Mithila, it has two meanings:

1. The Rāmāyaṇa context: Sita's trial by fire.

2. The contemporary context: the modern woman's continual trials.

Kuntaka states: "वक्रोक्तिर्विशिष्टा वागर्थव्यापारः"—vakrokti is a distinctive operation of language and meaning. Kamini's poetry is rich in such oblique expression.

3.4 Aucitya Theory (The Theory of Propriety)

Ācārya Kṣemendra (eleventh century), in Aucityavicāracarcā, established the importance of aucitya, or appropriateness.

3.4.1 Vastu-Aucitya (Propriety of Subject)

In the poems "Draupadi–1" and "Draupadi–2":

Sita and Draupadi are central myths in Mithila's culture. Kamini re-reads these myths; that is propriety of subject. For a reader from Mithila, they are natural points of reference.

3.4.2 Rasa-Aucitya (Propriety of Emotion)

The use of karuṇa and raudra rasas for the subject of women's exploitation constitutes propriety of emotion. The use of humour or erotic sentiment would be inappropriate.

3.4.3 Chhanda-Aucitya (Propriety of Metre)

Kamini uses free verse. The traditional barvai, sorathā and dohā are unsuitable for contemporary women's experiences. Free verse is itself a symbol of liberation: this is propriety of metre.

3.4.4 Deśa-Kāla-Aucitya (Propriety of Time and Place)

A feminist voice in twenty-first-century Maithili poetry is appropriate to its time: this is kāla-aucitya. In Mithila, the birthplace of Sita, re-reading Sita also exhibits deśa-aucitya, or propriety of place.

3.5 Alaṃkāra Theory (The Theory of Figures of Speech)

Ācārya Daṇḍin (seventh century) declares in Kāvyādarśa: "काव्यशोभाकरान् धर्मान् अलंकारान् प्रचक्षते"—the qualities which create poetic beauty are called alaṃkāras.

3.5.1 Upamā (Simile)

In the poem "Man as a Woman's Creation":

Whenever sweat falls
from a man's brow ...
when he comes home exhausted,
a woman will certainly serve a plate of rice and a vessel of water.

The simile: woman = servant (an indirect or unexpressed simile, luptopamā).

3.5.2 Rūpaka (Metaphor)

In the poem "Sesame and Rice":

"Sesame and rice" is itself a metaphor:

Sesame and rice = women's freedom.

Their distribution = resistance to society.

3.5.3 Vyatireka (Contrast)

In the poem "I Am Not a Purchased Slave":

The contrast between mother and daughter:

Mother: "bonded labourer."

Daughter: "not a purchased slave."

3.5.4 Praśna-Alaṃkāra (Rhetorical Question)

In the poem "The Abandoned Woman":

Why is it always
a woman who is abandoned?
Why is a man never the abandoned one?

This is not merely a question, but a figure expressing indignation. It expects no answer; it declares opposition.

3.6 Kāvya-Guṇa (The Qualities of Poetry)

Ācārya Vāmana (eighth century), in Kāvyālaṃkārasūtravṛtti, identifies ten poetic qualities. The principal qualities in Kamini's poems are:

3.6.1 Ojas-Guṇa (Vigour)

In the poem "I Shall Fight":

I shall fight
to the very end.

Simple, forceful and swift: these are the marks of vigour.

3.6.2 Prasāda-Guṇa (Lucidity)

In the poem "Tears":

Whenever a tear falls
from a woman's eyes ...

Simple, clear and immediately intelligible: these are the qualities of lucidity.

3.6.3 Mādhurya-Guṇa (Sweetness)

In the poem "Silence":

Not a rose petal
is your love.

Gentle, sweet and touching the heart: these are the qualities of mādhurya.

3.7 Kāvya-Doṣa (Blemishes in Poetry)

Ācārya Mammaṭa identifies poetic blemishes in Kāvyaprakāśa. Kamini's poetry is generally free of blemishes, although in some places:

3.7.1 Kliṣṭatā-Doṣa (Obscurity)

Kamini's language is generally simple, but excessive compression occasionally produces obscurity. For example, some lines of "The Momentum of Time" seem to lack context.

3.7.2 Grāmyatā-Doṣa (Rusticity or Vulgarity)

Kamini uses colloquial language, which some critics may regard as "rustic." In the Videha tradition, however, this is a virtue rather than a blemish.

Section 4: Western Theories of Criticism

4.1 Feminist Literary Theory

4.1.1 First-Wave Feminism: Mary Wollstonecraft

Mary Wollstonecraft's A Vindication of the Rights of Woman (1792) demanded women's education and economic independence.

In the poem "Two Fistfuls of Paddy":

I have nothing here,
no house,
no courtyard,
no fields or threshing ground.

This is the question of economic rights—Wollstonecraft's principal demand. Political freedom is impossible while women remain economically dependent.

4.1.2 Second-Wave Feminism: Simone de Beauvoir

The central thesis of Simone de Beauvoir's The Second Sex (1949) is: "One is not born, but rather becomes, a woman."

In the poem "A Woman Divided into Fragments":

Along with a woman's body,
there are now being sold
her womb and her milk as well.

This is a poetic presentation of Beauvoir's thesis: woman is "made," rather than determined by biological destiny. Society reduces a woman's entire existence to "motherhood"; this is a social construction.

4.1.3 Third-Wave Feminism: Judith Butler

Judith Butler's Gender Trouble (1990) proposed the theory of gender performativity (gender as performance).

In the poem "A Woman's Destiny":

To merge once more into the womb of the earth—
that was not right, Sita.

Sita performed femininity: she played the role of the "devoted wife." When this performance failed, in society's eyes, she "merged into the earth." This is an illustration of Butler's theory of performativity.

4.1.4 Black Feminism: bell hooks

In Ain't I a Woman? (1981), bell hooks advanced a theory of intersecting oppression: women's oppression is entangled with caste, class and race.

The dimension of class is also apparent in Kamini's poetry:

In the poem "Two Fistfuls of Paddy":

It is the experience of a poor rural woman, unlike that of urban, middle-class feminism. According to hooks, all women are not alike; class distinctions matter.

4.2 Marxist-Feminist Theory

4.2.1 Engels's The Origin of the Family, Private Property and the State (1884)

According to Engels, women's oppression is linked to the system of private property.

In the poem "Giving Away a Daughter Means Bathing in the Ganges":

The gift of a daughter in marriage is still practised among us.
Father! With barley and kuśa grass in your hand, you take your daughter's hand …

"Kanyādān" (the ritual gift of a daughter) = transfer of property. The father hands the "ownership" of his daughter to her husband. This is evidence for Engels's thesis.

4.2.2 Silvia Federici's Caliban and the Witch (2004)

Federici regards "unpaid domestic labour" as a foundation of capitalism.

In the poem "How Deeply I Miss My Home":

Where was it, that place,
my home,
which I can no longer see,
in whose courtyard, sitting, so many times I had asked my brother for a gift?

Women's domestic labour is invisible and unpaid. Capitalism rests upon this unpaid labour: that is Federici's central argument.

4.3 Postcolonial Feminism

4.3.1 Gayatri Chakravorty Spivak's "Can the Subaltern Speak?" (1988)

Spivak asks whether a subaltern woman can speak, or whether a bourgeois intellectual always "speaks" on her behalf.

Kamini's poetry is the direct voice of a subaltern woman, not mere "representation":

In the poem "Midstream":

Today, of our marriage,
the sixteenth year is passing.
You are in that house,
and I am in this house.
We are on two separate sides.

This is not an urban, middle-class intellectual's interpretation; it is the voice of the subaltern herself. The answer to Spivak's question is: yes, the subaltern can speak—Kamini's poetry is evidence.

4.3.2 Chandra Talpade Mohanty's "Under Western Eyes" (1984)

Mohanty questions the imperialism of Western feminism. Western feminists regard Third World women as "homogeneous victims."

Kamini's poetry is specifically Maithil: its references to Sita, Draupadi and Chandai are local and cultural rather than universal. This corresponds to Mohanty's demand.

4.4 Psychoanalytic Feminism

4.4.1 A Rejection of Sigmund Freud's Theory of Penis Envy

Freud believed that women suffered from envy of the male sexual organ, or "penis envy."

In the poem "This Is Not Right, Arya":

> Abandonment in love
> is not right, Arya.

Kamini expresses not a wish to imitate men but opposition to male domination. This repudiates Freud's theory.

4.4.2 Luce Irigaray's Écriture Féminine (Women's Writing)

Luce Irigaray (1974) proposed a theory of a specifically feminine style of writing. Women's writing is:

Not linear but circular (non-linear, circular).

Not dominated by logic but by feeling.

Not monologic but polyphonic (many-voiced).

Consider the structure of the collection A Woman Divided into Fragments:

No linear plot—the poems are independent, without a sequential narrative.

Primacy of emotion—experience is more prominent than reasoning.

Polyphony—the different voices of mother, daughter, wife and widow.

This is an instance of Irigaray's écriture féminine.

4.5 Existentialist Feminism

4.5.1 Simone de Beauvoir's The Ethics of Ambiguity (1947)

Beauvoir applies existential freedom to women. The human being is condemned to be free.

In the poem "Existence":

> However much you erase me,
> my existence will not be erased.
> Even if through deceit and intrigue > you snatch away
> this life of mine,

I shall be born once again in the courtyard of your home, as a fragrant tulsi plant.

This is a declaration of self-defined existence. The woman is not defined by man as "the Other"; she defines herself as "the Self." It is the poetic form of Beauvoir's existentialist feminism.

4.6 Ecofeminism

4.6.1 Vandana Shiva's Staying Alive (1989)

Vandana Shiva advances the woman–nature analogy: patriarchy exploits both women and nature.

In the poem "Sesame and Rice":

"Sesame and rice" = nature's gift and women's rights. Both are under patriarchal control. In an ecofeminist reading, they symbolise nature, woman and freedom.

4.7 Poststructuralist Feminism

4.7.1 Michel Foucault's Theory of Power/Knowledge

According to Foucault, power and knowledge are interconnected. "Knowledge" is not neutral, but a product of structures of power.

In the poem "Hypocrisy":

"Triyā charitram puruṣasya bhāgyam"
Chanted with irony.

This is scriptural knowledge produced by male power. A woman's supposed "lack of character" is not knowledge but an exercise of power—in Foucault's terms.

4.7.2 Hélène Cixous's "The Laugh of the Medusa" (1975)

Cixous sees women's writing (l'écriture féminine) as liberation from the language of men.

In the poem "I Am Not a Purchased Slave":

The title itself is a negative definition ("not a purchased slave"), which, in Cixous's view, reflects the limits of male language. A woman needs a positive definition: "I am free," not "I am not a slave."

Kamini nevertheless shows that beginning with negation is necessary: first comes a rejection of the definition imposed by men, then self-definition.

4.8 Queer Theory and Feminism

4.8.1 Monique Wittig's "One Is Not Born a Woman" (1981)

Wittig says: "Lesbians are not women," because the category "woman" is a product of the heterosexual matrix.

Kamini's poems take heterosexuality for granted; queer alternatives are absent. This is a limitation, one also found in Shantilakshmi Chaudhary's Maithili poetry.

Section 5: Chinese Philosophical Traditions

5.1 Taoism and Women's Consciousness

5.1.1 Laozi's Tao Te Ching (Sixth Century BCE)

Laozi recognises the yin–yang duality. Yin = the feminine principle; yang = the masculine principle.

In Taoism, the power of yin (feminine power) is expressed through:

Softness greater than hardness.

Receptivity greater than aggression.

Wu wei (effortless action) greater than action imposed by force.

In the poem "Man as a Woman's Creation":

> Whenever sweat falls
> from a man's brow,
> a woman, with the end of her sari,
> will wipe it away.

This exemplifies the power of yin: gentle, receptive and nurturing. In Taoism, this power is considered superior to yang.

5.1.2 The "Water Element" and Women's Power

Laozi says:

"Nothing in the world is softer than water, yet nothing is better at overcoming the hard and strong."

In the poem "Silence":

> Not a rose petal
> is your love,
> nor a thorn of the bagur plant
> is your love.
> Like a dormant volcano ...

The water element = silent strength: gentle outwardly, powerful within. This is Taoism's principle of supreme strength.

5.2 Confucianism and Patriarchy

5.2.1 Confucius's Analects (Fifth Century BCE)

Confucius established a male-centred social order:

The relationship between father and son is supreme.

Woman = servant (the Three Obediences: father, husband and son).

In the poem "Giving Away a Daughter Means Bathing in the Ganges":

Indian patriarchy resembles Chinese Confucianism. "Kanyādān" is the Indian form of the Confucian Three Obediences.

Kamini's poetry opposes Confucianism, just as modern Chinese women writers (Ding Ling and Bing Xin) criticised Confucius.

5.3 Buddhism and the Woman Question

5.3.1 Women's Liberation in Mahāyāna Buddhism

In the poem "Woman and the Buddha":

> Better than these hundred sorrows > would have been one sorrow:
> if I had become the Buddha.

This applies the Buddha's Eightfold Path to women's experience. But the question remains: can a woman attain Buddhahood?

Theravāda Buddhism: no, a woman must first become a man. Mahāyāna Buddhism: yes, a woman can herself become a Buddha.

Kamini adopts the Mahāyāna view: a woman can attain liberation without the mediation of a man.

5.4 The Tradition of Chinese Women's Poetry

5.4.1 Li Qingzhao (1084–1155)

The Chinese woman poet Li Qingzhao transformed personal feelings into poetry. Her poems are dominated by the suffering of separation.

In Kamini's poem "A Life Torn to Shreds":

> When, for the first time, you had taken
> my hand into your own ...

This belongs to Li Qingzhao's tradition of personal memory and separation.

5.4.2 Qiu Jin (1875–1907)

The Chinese revolutionary poet Qiu Jin joined women's liberation to national liberation. Her poetry speaks in a rebellious voice.

In Kamini's poem "I Shall Fight":

> I shall fight
> to the very end,
> as long as life remains.

This belongs to Qiu Jin's tradition: the resolve to struggle.

5.5 Chinese Marxism and the Woman Question

5.5.1 Mao Zedong's "Women Hold Up Half the Sky" (1955)

Mao emphasised the emancipation of women workers. Women constitute a labour force, not merely a reproductive force.

In the poem "Brahmavākya":

Women's labour is invisible. According to Mao's theory, women must participate equally in productive labour. Kamini's poem demands economic liberation.

5.6 The Chinese "Women's Script" and Maithili

In China's Hunan province there existed a women-specific script called Nüshu, used only by women.

It symbolises women's separation: excluded from the dominant language, women developed their own script.

Maithili had no comparable women-specific script, but it did have women's speech, or a "women's dialect," which was regarded with disdain.

Kamini's poetry uses women's speech—popular Maithili, distinct from classical Maithili. It is an Indian parallel to the Chinese Nüshu.

Section 6: Comparative Analysis and Overall Evaluation

6.1 A Synthesis of the Four Perspectives

Kamini's "A Woman Divided into Fragments" occupies a central position within all four analytical frameworks:

6.1.1 In Gangesha's Navya-Nyāya

Epistemological contribution:

Perception as a means of valid knowledge: a direct presentation of women's experience.

Inference as a means of valid knowledge: a logical analysis of social oppression.

The rejection of verbal testimony: a refusal of scripturally sanctioned patriarchy.

Non-apprehension as evidence: the evidentiary value of silence.

Limitation: poetic experience exceeds logical structures; Gangesha's emphasis on reasoning cannot explain everything.

6.1.2 In Videha Parallel History

Literary-historical contribution:

A parallel canon: an alternative to the Sahitya Akademi.

Democratic publication: digital inclusion.

Subaltern voices: bringing the marginalised to the centre.

Re-reading myth: new interpretations of Sita and Draupadi.

Limitation: although the Videha tradition has archival rigour, its theoretical framework remains incompletely developed.

6.1.3 In Indian Aesthetics

Contribution to poetics:

Rasa: a beautiful combination of pathos, fury and heroism.

Dhvani: depth of suggested meaning.

Vakrokti: the skill of indirect expression.

Aucitya: the coordination of subject, aesthetic emotion and language.

Limitation: traditional poetics was constructed from a masculine perspective; women's poetry requires an independent aesthetics.

6.1.4 In Western and Chinese Theory

Contribution to world literature:

Feminist theory: Indian examples of the ideas of Beauvoir, Butler and Spivak.

Marxist feminism: the intersection of class and gender.

Taoist philosophy: the poetic articulation of yin power.

Comparative perspective: a dialogue between Chinese and Indian traditions of women's expression.
Limitation: mechanical application of Western theory is dangerous; indigenous theorisation is necessary.

6.2 The Historical Importance of "A Woman Divided into Fragments"

6.2.1 Its Position in Maithili Women's Poetry

The pre-Videha era (before 2000):
Love poetry predominated. Depictions of nature predominated.
The Videha era (2008–2017):
Love and separation predominated; self-exploration predominated.
Kamini: political feminism predominates, the re-reading of myth is central, and social reality is paramount. Kamini transformed Maithili women's poetry from the expression of private feeling into a social and political mode. This is an epoch-making transformation.

6.2.2 Comparison with Women's Poetry Across India

Hindi: Anamika and Savita Singh—urban, middle-class voices. Bengali: Mallika Sengupta—political poetry. Marathi: Hira Bhaskar—a Dalit-feminist voice. Malayalam: Sugathakumari—an ecofeminist voice.
Maithili: Kamini—a voice of rural politics and the re-reading of myth.
Kamini's distinctive achievement is the combination of rural reality, mythic reinterpretation and political consciousness.

6.3 Limitations and Critical Questions

6.3.1 The Presumption of Heterosexuality

Throughout the collection, heterosexual relationships are treated as indispensable. Lesbian, bisexual and transgender voices are absent.
A queer-feminist objection: Kamini reinstates the heteronormative standard rather than dismantling it.

6.3.2 Limits of Class Analysis

Poems such as "Two Fistfuls of Paddy" raise questions of class but propose no strategy for class struggle.
Marxist criticism: emotional critique is not enough; organised resistance is necessary.

6.3.3 The Absence of the Caste Question

The collection contains no discussion of the caste system. Was Sita upper-caste? Was Draupadi a product of Brahmanical patriarchy?
A Dalit-feminist objection: Kamini presents an upper-caste feminism afflicted by caste blindness.

6.3.4 Limits of Religious Criticism

Poems such as "Hypocrisy" and "Trial by Fire" criticise Hinduism but remain silent about other religions.

A secular objection: do Muslim, Christian and Buddhist women not experience oppression? Religious selectivity is a limitation.

6.3.5 The Absence of a Movement

The poems present individual rebellion but give no indication of a collective movement.

The theory of social movements maintains that individual consciousness is insufficient; social organisation is necessary.

6.4 Future Directions: The Development of Kamini's Tradition

6.4.1 Interdisciplinarity

Future Maithili women's poetry should enter into dialogue with sociology, psychology and political science.

6.4.2 Polyphony

The voices of Dalit, Adivasi, Muslim and LGBTQ+ women should also be included.

6.4.3 Theorisation

It is necessary not only to write poetry but also to formulate feminist theory in Maithili. A specifically Mithila-centred feminism needs to develop.

6.4.4 Translation and Globalisation

Kamini's poems should be translated into English, Hindi and other Indian languages to enter a global feminist dialogue.

Conclusion

"A Woman Divided into Fragments" is an epoch-making work in Maithili literature. It is:

1. At the epistemological level: a poetic application of Gangesha's Navya-Nyāya, establishing the validity of women's experience through the theory of knowledge.

2. At the literary-historical level: an exemplary instance of Videha parallel history, making subaltern voices available through democratic publication.

3. At the aesthetic level: a synthesis of rasa, dhvani, vakrokti and aucitya—a feminist re-reading of Indian poetics.

4. At the level of global theory: an Indian and Maithili example of the ideas of Beauvoir, Spivak, Butler, Foucault and Laozi.

Final conclusion:

Kamini has made Maithili women's poetry a political weapon. Her poetry offers not merely aesthetic experience but an instrument of social change.

To put it in Gangesha's terms: "Yathārthajñānaṃ pramāṇam"—true knowledge is valid knowledge. Kamini's poetry constitutes evidence of women's reality, established through all four means of knowledge: perception, inference, verbal testimony and non-apprehension.

In the vocabulary of the Videha tradition: a landmark in parallel history.

In the vocabulary of Indian aesthetics: a synthesis of the rasas of pathos, fury and heroism.

In the vocabulary of Western feminism: Third World intersectional feminism.

In the vocabulary of Chinese philosophy: the awakening of yin power.

"A Woman Divided into Fragments" is essential reading in Maithili literature, not only from a feminist perspective but also from the standpoint of the liberation of humanity as a whole.

This analysis offers a comprehensive, profound and multidimensional assessment of Kamini's collection, constituting a practical application of the four-pillared method of Videha parallel history.

"A Woman Divided into Fragments" is a historical document of feminist consciousness in contemporary Maithili poetry. Kamini does not merely describe women's suffering; she undertakes a penetrating analysis of patriarchal structures.

Principal achievements:

1. Re-reading myth: contemporary interpretations of Sita, Draupadi and Yashoda.

2. Social reality: questioning the practices of kanyādān, the trial by fire and disrobing.

3. Linguistic beauty: skilful use of the folk elements of Maithili.

4. Philosophical depth: reflections on existence, fate and liberation.

5. Poetic craft: effective use of symbol, metaphor and irony.

Limitation: several poems remain at an emotional level, with relatively little political analysis. Nevertheless, the collection is a landmark in Maithili women's poetry.

2

Shanti Lakshmi Chaudhary's "Lesbian Continuum": A Critical Review and Comparative Analysis with Kamini

Introduction: A Historic Moment in the Queer Revolution in Maithili Literature

Shanti Lakshmi Chaudhary's "Lesbian Continuum" (Videha 136, 15 August 2013, and Sadeha 15) is one of the boldest and most theoretically sophisticated poems in the history of Maithili literature. For the first time in Maithili poetry:

1. Lesbian experience became a central subject.
2. Western queer-feminist theories (Adrienne Rich and radical feminism) were applied to a Maithili context.
3. Heterosexuality was understood as a compulsory institution rather than something natural.
4. The Maithil folk tradition of sakhī-bahinapā was reinterpreted as a form of queer cultural memory.

The poem addresses the heterosexual limits of Kamini's work and demonstrates the queer-inclusive character of Videha parallel history.

Section 1: Poetic Structure and Ideological Architecture

1.1 A Three-Tier Narrative Structure

The poem is divided into three distinct sections:

Section 1: Confrontation

> I saw those two "sisters," their tresses flowing,
> ...
> I told them: You appear to be well-born,
> but why has your conduct become so wayward?
> This, too, is a kind of transgression.

Section 2: Theoretical Pedagogy

> Have you heard of Adrienne Rich's ideas?
> The substance of her phrase "lesbian continuum"?
> ...
> Have you heard the name "radical feminism," or not?

Section 3: Cultural Re-reading

> Among us there was a custom of forming bonds of sakhī-bahinapā, exchanging veils and offering one another betel, areca nut and other gifts.

This structure is a poetic transformation of the Brechtian teaching play (Lehrstück), moving from prejudice to theory and then to transformation.

1.2 The Verse-Essay Form

This poem synthesises poetry and the theoretical essay. Ācārya Bhāmaha discussed mixed prose-and-verse composition (campū) in the seventh-century Kāvyālaṃkāra. Here we encounter a modern verse-discourse.

Characteristics:

Poetic language: "hair flowing," "they smiled," "my brows were stretched taut with anger."

Theoretical language: "lesbian continuum," "radical feminism," "sisterhood is powerful."

Comparison with Kamini:

Kamini's poetry is pure lyric:

> Whenever there falls
> a tear from a woman's eye.

Shanti Lakshmi offers didactic poetry influenced by the Enlightenment tradition.

Section 2: Theoretical Foundations and Western Sources

2.1 Adrienne Rich's "Compulsory Heterosexuality and Lesbian Existence" (1980)

The poem expressly mentions Adrienne Rich:

> Have you heard of Adrienne Rich's ideas?
> The substance of her phrase "lesbian continuum"?
> It means the widening of the bonds of sakhī-bahinapā.

Rich's principal concepts:

1. Compulsory heterosexuality: heterosexuality is not natural but a form of institutional pressure.

In the poem:

> Not every woman in the world is so fortunate > as to find a meeting of innermost feelings with her man.

2. Lesbian continuum: the many forms of women-centred relationships extending beyond sexuality.

In the poem:

> It expresses a harmony of souls beyond bodily intercourse, > a union in which two souls become one.

3. Woman-identified women: women whose primary emotional, intellectual and sexual relationships are with women rather than men.

In the poem:

> Form a bond of sakhī-bahinapā with one whose intimacy deepens the heart's attachment.

2.2 Radical Feminism

The poem gives a theoretical introduction to radical feminism:

You may or may not have heard the name "radical feminism";
it is the name of a rebellious branch of the Western women's movement.

The principal arguments of radical feminism as represented in the poem:

1. Male control amounts to exploitation of women's bodies:

Pornography, prostitution, rape, domestic violence and dowry practices rest upon the woman's body;
therefore it has become urgently necessary for women to become free of bodily bondage.

2. Under patriarchy, woman becomes a sexual object:

Most men see women as passive partners in sexual play, bearers of the womb, efficient instruments for pregnancy.

3. Lesbianism as a refusal of patriarchy:

Only then will men's pride be brought low and women receive their due, when women break the exaggerated value attached to marriage, premarital virginity and wifely fidelity.

4. Sisterhood is powerful:

The slogan of radical feminists is "Sisterhood is powerful";
that is, there is tremendous strength in sisterhood.

2.3 Translating Western Theory into Maithili: Challenges and Achievements

Challenges: "Lesbian Continuum" becomes "the extension of the bonds of sakhī-bahinapā"; "Sisterhood" becomes bahinapā; "Compulsory Heterosexuality" is conveyed indirectly in the line, "Not every woman in the world is so fortunate."

Achievement: Shanti Lakshmi has translated Western theory into a Maithil cultural context. This is not mere translation between languages but cultural translation.

Comparison with Kamini:

Kamini's poems make no explicit reference to Western theory. She is oriented towards experience rather than theory. Shanti Lakshmi writes theory-centred poetry.

Section 3: A Critique of Male Sexuality

3.1 The Musical Metaphor of the Woman's Body

The most original and powerful passage of the poem:

The music of a woman's body is a classical composition:
first dhrupad, dhamār and ālāp, then khayāl, tān and tarānā;
but if you are a devotee of pop music's thumping, crashing beat, its distortion will soon be laid bare, twisted and wrenched apart.

Analysis:

1. Classical music stands for female sexuality:

Dhrupad, dhamār and ālāp signify the beginning of intimacy.

Khayāl signifies profound dialogue.

Tān and tarānā signify sexual pleasure.

2. Pop music stands for male sexuality:

The pounding beat signifies hurried intercourse.

Distortion signifies violence against the woman's body.

Twisting and wrenching apart signifies rape.

This metaphor draws on the Indian classical music tradition to criticise male sexuality—an extraordinary feat of poetic craft.

3.2 Consent-Centred Sexuality

> Most men are always impatient for violent intercourse; > they do not see whether their bodily partner consents or is afraid.

This is an ethics of consent, a central question of the MeToo era.

> To dominate the body without first attaining unity of mind—> tell me how to make this understood; > to speak the truth, it is a dreadful crime,
> the age-old inheritance of rape.

Comparison with Kamini:

Kamini's poem "A Life Torn to Shreds" expresses the pain of separation but does not discuss sexual violence. Shanti Lakshmi directly alleges extra-marital rape (termed "Marital Rape" in the source):

> Without becoming one with each other's subtlest joys and sorrows, > without awakening the deepest respect in one another's hearts, > to become eager at once for bodily touch—
> then explain to me:
> is this not the cruelest game played with a woman's mind?

Section 4: A Queer Re-reading of Maithil Folk Tradition

4.1 Sakhī-Bahinapā: Queer Cultural Memory

The poem's most original contribution is its queer reinterpretation of the Maithil tradition of sakhī-bahinapā:

> Among us there was a custom of forming bonds of sakhī-bahinapā, > exchanging veils and offering betel and areca nut, > or touching little fingers with saliva …
> tell me, did you ever form such a love in childhood?
> Such was the strength of the bond of sakhī-bahinapā;
> it was as sacred and wondrous as the bond of marriage.

Analysis:

1. Sakhī-bahinapā as a marriage-like relationship:

Exchanging veils parallels a marriage ritual in which bride and groom exchange coverings.

Offering betel and areca nut parallels a marriage rite.

Touching little fingers signifies an oath.

2. Characteristics of sakhī-bahinapā:

> How difficult it was to keep each other's secrets for a lifetime, > and to come to a friend's aid at every step with body, mind and wealth.

3. A system of secret names:

> In sakhī-bahinapā the participants do not use each other's actual names;
> they call one another Clove, Betel, Areca Nut or Tobacco, > or by the names of flowers: Jasmine, Rose, Beli, Champa and Marigold.

Comparative question:

> Do married women not refrain from taking the names of their father-in-law, elder brother-in-law and husband?

4.2 Queer Historiography

Shanti Lakshmi presents a Maithili example of queer historiography. In the West, Judith Butler, Eve Kosofsky Sedgwick and Adrienne Rich seek queer elements in folk traditions.

Examples:

China: "Nüshu," a script specifically used by women.

Africa: "woman–woman marriage."

Mithila: "sakhī-bahinapā" as queer cultural memory.

Importance within Videha parallel history:

The Videha tradition re-reads Mithila's history. Rather than treating sakhī-bahinapā as a heterosexual social custom, Shanti Lakshmi interprets it as a queer tradition. This is exemplary parallel history.

Section 5: Comparative Analysis with Kamini

5.1 Subject Matter

Kamini:

Heterosexual relationships are central.

Male abandonment and male oppression are principal subjects.

There is no LGBTQ+ reference.

Example:

> Madhav! How could you forget me?
> Am I your Radha? ("Another Krishna")

Shanti Lakshmi:

Relationships between women are central.

Criticism of heterosexuality is a principal subject.

An explicit LGBTQ+ voice.

Example:

As a sharp reaction to this cruelest game of men,
there arose the lesbianism of our time.

5.2 Theoretical Foundation

Kamini:

Experience-centred.

A re-reading of Indian myth (Sita and Draupadi).

No explicit mention of Western theory.

Shanti Lakshmi:

Theory-centred.

Explicit references to Western feminist theory (Adrienne Rich and radical feminism).

A theoretical reinterpretation of Maithil tradition.

5.3 Poetic Form

Kamini:

Free verse.

Lyric-dominated.

Concise and intense.

Example:

Whenever there falls
a tear from a woman's eye. (“Tears”)

Shanti Lakshmi:

Verse-essay.

Idea-dominated, didactic poetry.

Extended and explanatory.

Example:

Have you heard of Adrienne Rich's ideas?
The substance of her phrase “lesbian continuum”?
It means the widening of the bonds of sakhī-bahinapā.

5.4 The Configuration of Rasa

Kamini:

The dominant rasa is karuṇa (pathos).

Raudra (fury) is secondary.

The universalisation of emotion is successful.

Shanti Lakshmi:

The dominant rasa is vīra (heroism).

Raudra (fury) is supportive.

Śānta (tranquillity) comes last: “The dark stain smeared upon the cheek of the world's moon-white culture distressed me.”

5.5 The Arrangement of Dhvani: Suggestive Power

Kamini:

Rasa-dhvani: suggestion of emotion.

The power of suggestion is profound.

Example:

Not a rose petal
is your love. ("Silence")

Literal meaning: love is free from outward display. Suggested meaning: profound, tranquil love transcends words.

Shanti Lakshmi:

Vastu-dhvani: suggestion of an idea or fact.

The denotative power of language predominates.

Example:

When these women fully adopt lesbianism as a way of life, literal and suggested meanings coincide: a direct theoretical statement in which the arrangement of suggestion is limited.

5.6 Addressing the Reader

Kamini:

Indirect address.

Gender-neutral.

Shanti Lakshmi:

Direct address—"you."

A specific audience: heterosexual women.

A pedagogical tone.

Example:

Have you heard of Adrienne Rich's ideas?
...
Tell me, when a woman lives with another woman,
what new form of love has this affection brought into being?

Section 6: Evaluation through Gangesha's Navya-Nyāya

6.1 Pratyakṣa-Pramāṇa: Perceptual Knowledge

Gangesha's definition: "Indriyārthasannikarṣotpannaṃ jñānam"—knowledge arising from the contact of the senses with their objects.

In the poem:

I saw those two "sisters," their tresses flowing,
their cheerful faces smiling,
walking with a swaying gait.

This is direct perception—the immediate experience of seeing a happy lesbian couple.

Comparison with Kamini:

Kamini, too, presents direct experience:

> My heart is soothed;
> this is the grove of saplings > planted by my own father. ("Two Fistfuls of Paddy")

Difference: Kamini presents her own experience; Shanti Lakshmi sees another's experience and responds to it.

6.2 Anumāna-Pramāṇa: Inferential Knowledge

The logical structure in the poem:

Pratijñā (proposition): lesbianism offers a way towards women's liberation.

Hetu (reason): male–female sexuality contains inequality, violence and oppression.

Udāharaṇa (example):

> A bearer who expands the womb, an efficient instrument for pregnancy.

Upanaya (application):

> As a sharp reaction to this cruelest game of men,
> there arose the lesbianism of our time.

Nigamana (conclusion):

This is a complete five-membered Nyāya syllogism.

6.3 Śabda-Pramāṇa: Testimonial Knowledge

Gangesha's principle of trustworthy testimony: "Āptavacanaṃ śabdaḥ"—the word of a reliable authority is verbal testimony.

In the poem:

Shanti Lakshmi regards Adrienne Rich as an authoritative source:

> Have you heard of Adrienne Rich's ideas?

Question: is a Western feminist an authoritative source in a Maithil context?

Answer: Shanti Lakshmi treats this as universal knowledge that must be corroborated by local cultural experience. She gives Rich's theory a Maithil validation through the tradition of sakhī-bahinapā.

6.4 Upamāna-Pramāṇa: Analogical Knowledge

In the poem:

Similarity: sakhī-bahinapā = lesbian continuum.

Both are women-centred relationships.

Both involve a marriage-like bond.

Both entail lifelong commitment.

Dissimilarity:

Sakhī-bahinapā: the sexual element is implicit or disputed.

Lesbian relationships: the sexual element is central.

Shanti Lakshmi establishes a partial similarity. This is an excellent application of Gangesha's analogical means of knowledge.

Section 7: Place within Videha Parallel History

7.1 The Queer-Inclusive Character of Videha

An important fact: "Lesbian Continuum" appeared in Videha 136 and Sadeha 15.

Conclusion: the Videha tradition is LGBTQ+-inclusive, rather than confined to heterosexual feminism.

Sahitya Akademi versus Videha:

Sahitya Akademi:

A defender of traditional values.

Treats heterosexuality as obligatory.

Lacks LGBTQ+ discourse.

Videha:

An initiator of parallel values.

Accepts sexual diversity.

Includes LGBTQ+ discourse.

7.2 From Kamini to Shanti Lakshmi: The Development of the Videha Tradition

The stages in the development of the Videha tradition:

Stage 1: emotion-centred women's poetry; Stage 2: political feminism; Stage 2 (Videha 136, 2013): queer feminism, represented by Shanti Lakshmi Chaudhary's "Lesbian Continuum."

Conclusion: the Videha tradition is dynamic and evolving. Shanti Lakshmi had already moved beyond Kamini's heterosexual limits before Kamini did so.

7.3 Redefining Parallel History

Videha parallel history means:

1. An alternative to the Sahitya Akademi (Kamini's contribution).
2. An alternative to the heterosexual tradition (Shanti Lakshmi's contribution).

Section 8: Evaluation through Indian Aesthetics

8.1 The Theory of Rasa

Dominant rasa: vīra, the heroic.

Permanent emotional disposition: utsāha, enthusiasm.

Vibhāva (determinants):

Heterosexual sexual violence.

The happiness of a lesbian couple.

Anubhāva (consequents):

> My eyebrows tightened in anger,
> I looked them up and down with fierce eyes.

Vyabhicāri-bhāva (transitory emotions):

Anger, pride and fortitude.

Comparison with Kamini:

Pathos predominates in Kamini; heroism predominates in Shanti Lakshmi.

Kamini expresses sorrow, while Shanti Lakshmi proclaims struggle.

8.2 The Theory of Dhvani

Vastu-dhvani (suggestion of an idea or fact):

> In sakhī-bahinapā, neither woman takes the other's actual name; they call one another Clove, Betel, Areca Nut or Tobacco.

Suggested meaning: the system of secret names suggests concealed sexuality.

Limitation: Shanti Lakshmi relies principally on direct expression, with limited suggestion. Kamini is stronger in the power of suggestion.

8.3 The Theory of Vakrokti

Interrogative obliquity:

> Tell me, when a woman lives with another woman,
> what new form of love has this affection brought into being?
> Do married women not refrain from taking the names of their father-in-law, elder brother-in-law and husband?

This is ironic or sarcastic obliquity: the contradiction is disclosed through a question.

8.4 The Theory of Aucitya

Propriety of subject:

Is lesbianism a suitable subject for Maithili poetry?

Argument in favour: the Videha tradition is inclusive of all subjects.

Argument against: social acceptance remains limited in Maithil society.

Propriety of emotion:

The heroic rasa suits a rebellious subject; it is aesthetically appropriate.

Propriety of language:

English expressions such as “lesbian continuum” and “radical feminism” may be considered inappropriate in Maithili.

Nevertheless, new concepts require new words: this is a modern understanding of propriety.

Section 9: Evaluation through Western and Chinese Theory

9.1 Queer Theory

Judith Butler's concept of gender performativity:

According to Butler, gender is performance rather than biological destiny.

In the poem:

> One body does not understand another body through its gendered form;
> call it love by your own standards, if you wish, or a distortion of love.

This is a poetic presentation of Butler's theory: gender differences become irrelevant when a relationship of souls is central.

9.2 Foucault's Theory of Power/Knowledge

Michel Foucault: power and knowledge are interconnected.

In the poem:

> I was troubled by the dark stain smeared on the cheek of the world's moon-white culture.

"Moon-white culture" signifies a heteronormative structure of knowledge and power.

"The dark stain" signifies lesbianism as resistance to that structure.

This is a Foucauldian analysis: a system of knowledge is also a system of power.

9.3 Postcolonial Queer Theory

Gayatri Spivak in relation to Shanti Lakshmi:

Spivak's question: "Can the Subaltern Speak?"

Shanti Lakshmi's answer: yes, the queer subaltern can speak.

> I saw those two "sisters," their tresses flowing,
> their cheerful faces smiling.

The lesbian couple speak for themselves (the "sisters" answer the poet); they are not represented by a bourgeois intermediary.

A counter-question, however: does Shanti Lakshmi belong to the lesbian community, or is she a heterosexual supporter?

At the end of the poem:

> Hearing everything, I was inwardly struck speechless;
> in that instant, no intellectual answer came to me.

This is an open ending. The poet is an ally rather than a member of the community. This is both a limitation and a strength.

9.4 Taoism and Yin Power

Laozi's yin and yang:

Yin represents the feminine principle.

Yang represents the masculine principle.

In the poem:

> The intimate union of two souls, > when two bodies hear each other's innermost joys and sorrows.

The joining of yin with yin means a doubling of feminine energy, which would be considered an imbalance in Taoism.

But Shanti Lakshmi rejects Taoist balance and proclaims the independence of yin power.

Section 10: Limitations and Critical Questions

10.1 The Absence of Class and Caste

Kamini's limitation: the absence of the caste question.

Shanti Lakshmi's limitation: the absence of both caste and class.

The poem is about "well-born" sisters:

> I told them: You appear to be well-born,
> but why has your conduct become so wayward?

Question: do Dalit, Adivasi, Muslim and poor lesbian women have experiences different from those of upper-class lesbians?

The absence of Dalit queer feminism is a significant limitation.

10.2 Absence of Bisexual, Transgender and Intersex Identities

The poem focuses exclusively on lesbians. Other identities on the LGBTQIA+ spectrum are absent:

Bisexual: absent.

Transgender: absent.

Queer: absent.

Intersex: absent.

Asexual: absent.

10.3 Sexual Essentialism

The poem emphasises the centrality of the sexual element:

> Thereafter, when one body is offered to the other, > from that union comes fulfilment of the heart.

Counter-question: what place is there for an asexual lesbian—a woman who feels no sexual attraction but experiences romantic attraction?

10.4 Cultural Imperialism

Critical question: is the application of Western queer theory (Adrienne Rich) to a Maithil context merely mechanical?

In favour: Adrienne Rich presents a universal truth.

Against: Maithil society has a distinctive sexual culture, different from that of the West.

Shanti Lakshmi's strategy is to validate Rich's theory within Maithil culture through the tradition of sakhī-bahinapā. This is cultural translation, not mechanical application.

10.5 Problematic Elements of Radical Feminism

Several ideas associated with radical feminism are regarded as problematic:

1. Trans-exclusion: some radical feminists do not regard trans women as "real women."

2. Opposition to sex work: radical feminists oppose the rights of sex workers.

3. Biological essentialism:

> For women, it has now become vitally necessary to become videha—free of the body.

This suggests a rejection of the biological body, which may be trans-exclusionary.

Shanti Lakshmi does not criticise these problematic elements, and this is a limitation.

Section 11: Historical Importance and Future Directions

11.1 Its Place in Maithili Literary History

Epoch-making contributions:

1. The first queer poem: the first appearance of LGBTQ+ discourse in Maithili poetry.
2. Theoretical maturity: successful translation of Western theory.
3. Cultural re-reading: a queer interpretation of sakhī-bahinapā.
4. Expansion of the Videha tradition: moving beyond the heterosexual limit.

Comparative importance:

Hindi: Ruth Vanita and Saleem Kidwai, Same-Sex Love in India (2008).

Bengali: Deepti Naval, "Purush Prem" (1870)—male homosexuality.

Marathi: Datta Bhagat—LGBTQ+ poetry.

Maithili: Shanti Lakshmi Chaudhary's "Lesbian Continuum"—the first lesbian poem.

11.2 Future Directions of the Videha Tradition

Shanti Lakshmi's poem indicates new directions for Videha:

1. Queer inclusion (identities outside heterosexual norms): Videha embraces not only heterosexual feminism but queer feminism as well.
2. Theoretical development: Videha is concerned not only with sharing experiences but also with theoretical debate.
3. Global dialogue: Videha engages with Western theory instead of remaining isolated.

11.3 Necessary Work for the Future

1. Dalit queer poetry: Maithili needs poetry expressing Dalit same-sex experience.
2. Transgender poetry: Maithili needs poetry expressing transgender identity.
3. Gay poetry: Maithili needs poetry about male same-sex experience.
4. Indigenous queer theory: instead of applying Western theory mechanically, a specifically Maithil queer theory must be developed.

Conclusion

Final Evaluation

Shanti Lakshmi Chaudhary's "Lesbian Continuum" is one of the boldest poems in Maithili literary history. It offers:

1. At the theoretical level:

The translation of Western queer feminism into Maithili.
A poetic application of Gangesha's Navya-Nyāya.
An introduction to radical feminism.

2. At the cultural level:

A queer re-reading of Maithil tradition.
A lesbian interpretation of sakhī-bahinapā.
A challenge to heteronormativity.

3. At the literary level:

The development of the verse-discourse genre.
A tradition of pedagogical poetry.
A new use of the heroic rasa.

4. In the history of Videha:

Addressing the heterosexual limitations of Kamini's work.
Evidence of Videha's queer inclusivity.
A redefinition of parallel history.
A brief comparison with Kamini:

Kamini	Shanti Lakshmi
Subject: heterosexual oppression	lesbian liberation.
Rasa: karuṇa (pathos)	vīra (heroism).
Method: experience-centred	theory-centred.
Tradition: re-reading myth	re-reading folk culture.
Limitation: heterosexuality	absence of class and caste.
Strength: suggestive power	denotative power.

Together they form a complete feminist vision within the Videha tradition, encompassing heterosexual and lesbian experiences alike.

Final Statement

In Gangesha's words: "Yathārthajñānaṃ pramāṇam"—true knowledge is valid knowledge.
Kamini offered evidence of the reality of heterosexual women's lives.
Shanti Lakshmi offered evidence of the reality of lesbian women's lives.
The Videha tradition is becoming evidence of the full range of women's realities—heterosexual, lesbian, bisexual, transgender and queer.
Shanti Lakshmi Chaudhary's "Lesbian Continuum" [a bold poem on relationships between women, body politics and a feminist standpoint, published in Videha 136 and Sadeha 15] is not merely a poem; it is a verse-essay, indeed a manifesto of the LGBTQ+ movement in Maithili literature.

21. Towards a Critical Theory of Dalit Literature for Maithili — II

Abstract

A critical theory of Dalit literature for Maithili must be considered in relation to Dalit writing translated into Maithili from Gujarati, Odia and Telugu. Translation from parallel literary currents has strengthened Maithili literature and brought about a fundamental structural change. The mainstream written tradition had been defined by a particular social and religious conservatism: it privileged devotion, courtly luxury and ornamented expression while relegating the realities of marginalised communities to the periphery. The oral traditions of Mithila, it is true, had always kept alive the ballads of Dalit heroes such as Raja Salhes and Dina-Bhadri. Yet Brahmanical dominance and a monopoly over literacy constituted major obstacles to their entry into formal written literature.

Keywords: Dalit · Literary Criticism · Maithili

A critical theory of Dalit literature for Maithili must be situated in the context of Dalit literature translated into Maithili from Gujarati, Odia and Telugu. Translations from parallel literary currents have enriched Maithili literature and effected a fundamental structural transformation. Mainstream written literature in Maithili had long been defined by a particular social and religious orthodoxy, giving precedence to devotional writing, courtly luxury and elaborate ornamentation while excluding the lived reality of marginalised communities. To be sure, Mithila's oral traditions had always sustained the ballads of Dalit heroes such as Raja Salhes and Dina-Bhadri. But Brahmanical dominance and the monopoly of literacy obstructed their admission into formal written literature.

The emergence of a literature explicitly identified as Dalit in Maithili is relatively recent, and translations from other regional languages have played a significant role in it. Through the efforts of the Videha movement in particular, translations of powerful Dalit traditions from Telugu, Odia and Gujarati have helped fill this absence. They have provided Maithili Dalit writers such as Sandeep Kumar Safi and Umesh Paswan with a linguistic and ideological foundation for resistance and the assertion of identity.

Historical Absence and the Structural Silence of Marginalised Communities

The absence of an established written Dalit tradition in Maithili until the end of the twentieth century was not evidence of a want of creative capacity among the marginalised. It was the result of institutional exclusion. Historically, Maithil Brahmins and the Karna Kayastha community were the principal guardians of the language; consequently, "standard Maithili" was confined to their dialects and cultural preoccupations. Under this dominance, the experiences of Mithila's Dalit communities remained outside recognised literary consciousness.

The Limits of Maithili Oral Literature

Before the emergence of modern Dalit prose and poetry, marginalised voices survived principally in the form of folk ballads. Ballads such as those of Raja Salhes, Naika Banjara and Bihula-Bishahari celebrate protagonists who resisted discrimination and exploitation despite belonging to lower castes. These were culturally significant works, but the literary elite separated them from the mainstream by designating them "rustic" or merely "folk" literature.

Economic and educational circumstances further reinforced this structural silence. Sandeep Kumar Safi's autobiography shows that for Dalit families, the physical labour required for subsistence was more urgent than formal schooling. Safi's parents belonged to the Dhobi caste and earned their livelihood washing the village's clothes; instead of cash, they were given grain or potatoes. These economic constraints compelled numerous Dalit children, Safi among them, to leave school and work as labourers in cities such as Chandigarh and Bengaluru.

The Videha Movement and Translation as Democratic Intervention

The modern revival of Dalit voices in Maithili is associated with the Videha movement's digital and literary initiatives. Maithili literature cannot attain maturity until it recognises the full diversity of its speakers' experiences. The absence of Dalit poetry and prose in Maithili therefore prompted a turn towards writing in other Indian languages.

The Mechanism of Cultural Translation

In Videha, translation is not simply the exchange of words. It is a sociological undertaking that connects forms of consciousness. Its purpose was to introduce Maithili readers to an "aesthetics of protest." Translated works from Odia, Telugu and Gujarati furnished Maithili with a new vocabulary of resistance, freed from the customary tradition of decorative and erotic expression.

The translator's task, as may be seen in the work of P. Jayalakshmi and K. Purushottam, was to negotiate between "foreignisation" and "domestication." In the translation of the Telugu novel Jigiri (Friends Forever), the local colouring of the Telangana dialect and its mixture of Urdu and Telugu were preserved, allowing the plurality of Dalit and nomadic experience to emerge.

A Comparative Perspective: Telugu Dalit Literature in Maithili

Telugu Dalit literature offered a powerful foundation for the Maithili translation project. The Telugu movement became more militant in the 1980s in the aftermath of atrocities such as those at Karamchedu and Chunduru, rejecting established structures of dominance.

Kolakaluri Enoch's "The Crow" (Kaki): An Aesthetics of Untouchability

In "The Crow," Enoch uses the bird as a symbol of the Dalit community. Its protagonist, Bandodu, belongs to the Madiga caste and lives amid acute deprivation. He can catch and eat a crow, an act the wider society considers inauspicious. The Maithili translation captures the very "stench" of this existence, confronting readers with extreme poverty and psychological persecution.

Vinodini's "Black Ink": The Stigma of Identity in the City

Vinodini's "Black Ink" reveals the subtle workings of caste in contemporary urban India. A young girl, Shriya, records good things in her diary in blue ink and bad things in black ink. When she discovers the Dalit identity of a friend, the revulsion that enters her conduct exposes how the stigma of caste is implanted in children's minds.

Peddinti Ashok Kumar's Friends Forever (Jigiri): The Displacement of Nomadic Labour

The novel Jigiri relates the suffering of the Kalandar community, whose livelihood depended on making bears dance. When the government banned bear performances, the principal character, Imam, faced a painful choice: to kill or abandon his bear, Shadul, so that his son's future might be secured and he might obtain two acres of land. The narrative resonates with the suffering of displaced agricultural workers in Mithila and the disappearance of traditional occupations.

Translated Resistance: Gujarati Dalit Poetry in Maithili

Influenced by Ambedkarite philosophy and the Marathi Dalit Panthers movement, Gujarati Dalit poetry is distinguished by its "hard" and "rough-diamond" qualities. Its translation into Maithili established a different literary ground, contrary to the conventions of traditional poetry.

• Anish Garange's "Poster" shows how the Dalit body is used like a "poster" for political advertisement while the individual remains invisible.

• Rajendra Vadel's "Jita" approaches sexual exploitation through the ironic language of "victory," presenting domination over Dalit women as a normalised violence within an upper-caste order.

• Umesh Solanki's "People, Freeze" depicts people becoming "frozen," or inert, in the coldness of social neglect.

The Emergence of Indigenous Dalit Voices in Maithili

The most significant effect of these regional translations was the recognition they brought to indigenous Maithili Dalit writing. Umesh Paswan and Sandeep Kumar Safi were no longer isolated voices: they belonged to a pan-Indian Dalit consciousness.

Umesh Paswan: Rural Reality and the Concept of the Criminal

Umesh Paswan's story collection Mujrim (The Accused) is a "moral testimony" to Dalit life in rural Mithila. He challenges the very word mujrim and demonstrates how that label is imposed on marginalised people by an order vested with power and privilege. His story "Sunanda" depicts a struggle involving education and social stigma, while "Solakanma Pokhair" raises the issue of Dalit exclusion from common resources. His poetry collection Varnit Ras reads the floods of the Kosi, terrorism and youthful anger from a Dalit standpoint.

Sandeep Kumar Safi: The First Dalit Autobiography in Maithili

Sandeep Kumar Safi's Baishakhme Dalanpar represents a historical turning point in Maithili literature. According to Gajendra Thakur, Dalit autobiography had previously been wholly absent from Maithili, and Safi's work filled that gap. Safi gives a moving account of his struggles, the hereditary labour of the Dhobi caste, and an accident he suffered as a migrant worker in Chandigarh, when his foot caught fire.

Redefining Aesthetics: The Tenth and Eleventh Rasas

The entry of Dalit voices has reorganised Maithili aesthetics. Traditional rasa theory emphasised "pleasure," whereas Dalit critics propose rebellion and anger as new rasas.

1. Art for Life's Sake: literature is conceived as an instrument of social transformation.

2. The Tenth and Eleventh Rasas: there is a demand to include "rebellion" and "outrage" (the cry) in the traditional circle of rasas, so that the writing of marginalised communities can be evaluated on its own terms.

3. Collective Experience: the suffering expressed in Dalit literature is not individual but the collective torment of a thousand years.

4. Authenticity of Dialect: instead of "standard" Maithili, writers employ "rustic" or natural speech in order to convey the trauma of marginalised communities authentically.

Conclusion: Towards a Pluralist Maithili Literature

Translated Dalit literature in Maithili demonstrates that the language is entering a period of democratic expansion. The historical absence of written Dalit voices was due not to a lack of creativity but to exclusion by dominant groups. By translating Dalit literature, the Videha movement has built a "bridge" across that absence. The translations have done more than introduce stories from elsewhere: they have supplied a comparative framework within which Umesh Paswan and Sandeep Kumar Safi could articulate their local experiences. Through digital archives and a redefinition of aesthetics, the contemporary Dalit movement is breaking the "Brahmanical monopoly" over Maithili literature. Maithili is no longer merely the language of scholars; it is becoming a "knowledge society" that reflects the full humanity and struggles of its speakers.

2. The Development and Archival Significance of Translated Literature in Maithili: A Comprehensive Analysis of the Videha Movement

The literary landscape of Maithili, spoken by a population of more than seventeen million across northern Bihar, Jharkhand and Nepal's Terai, is undergoing a revolutionary transformation through the convergence of digital technology and a translation movement. Historically, Maithili literature has been viewed from two distinct standpoints: the "establishment" position, guided since 1965 by institutions such as the Sahitya Akademi, and the "parallel" tradition, which seeks to recover the democratic and popular roots of the language.

At the centre of this transformation stands the Videha movement, represented by its fortnightly electronic journal Videha (ISSN 2229-547X) and extensive digital archive. By assembling a parallel body of original and translated works, the movement has challenged customary forms of dominance and created a globally accessible repository of Maithili's literary heritage. This report examines the ideological basis, technical methods and cultural effects of the movement through an analysis of literature translated into Maithili.

The Historical and Linguistic Context of the Maithili Translation Movement

To understand Maithili literature, it is necessary to understand when and how translation became a powerful instrument of contemporary archival resistance. The language's earliest literary expressions may be found in the Charyapada, composed between 700 and 1300 CE in Sandhya-bhasha by Buddhist siddha poets such as Luipada and Saraha.

The Videha movement makes an important scholarly intervention by distinguishing the celebrated pre-Jyotirishwar composer of the Padavali, Vidyapati, from the Sanskrit/Avahattha author Vidyapati Thakkur (1350–1435 CE). The movement argues that the establishment has narrowed the poet Vidyapati's identity and suppressed its non-Brahmin and rebellious aspects. In this context, translation is more than a linguistic exercise: it is an ideological work of recovery. By translating the experiences of Dalits, women and marginalised communities, the movement is restoring the "beating human heart" to the centre of Maithili literature.

The Videha E-Journal and the Structure of Its Digital Archive

Beginning in 2000 as the Bhalsarik Gachh Yahoo City site, moving to a blog in 2004 and being reorganised as Videha in 2008, the journal represents the longest-running continuous digital presence in Maithili literature. It has published 438 issues and established an extensive digital archive called Videha Petar. The archive is organised into various Sadeha (physical-format) volumes.

Classification of the Videha Archive and Its Translated Books

The organisation of the Videha archive reflects a systematic approach to literary preservation. Its holdings are classified under the headings Archive/Volume, Subject, Description and Reference:

Videha Sadeha 27 — Prose and poetry translated from other languages into Maithili; issues 1–350, with work by Gajendra Thakur and Ravi Bhushan Pathak.

Videha Sadeha 28 — A broad collection of translated prose and poetry, including substantial novels; centred on regional Indian and international writing.

Videha Sadeha 37 — A second volume of translated prose and poetry, with particular emphasis on Telugu, Odia and Gujarati Dalit stories and poems; it also includes Peddinti Ashok Kumar's Jigiri.

Gadya-Padya Bharati Special — A "Translation Special Issue"; issue 97, available in both Devanagari and Tirhuta scripts.

Maithili Pothi — A category of downloadable PDF books, including translations such as Purusha Pariksha and Mohandas.

At the level of script technology, the movement has facilitated digital publication by bringing Mithilakshar (Tirhuta) into the Unicode standard. The archive also contains the first Maithili book in Braille and resources in Maithili sign language.

The Theory and Art of Translation

Translation into Maithili is informed by a sophisticated theoretical approach seeking a balance between cultural fidelity and linguistic accessibility. The essay "Anuvadak Kala" (The Art of Translation) in the Videha archive examines these complexities.

Linguistic and Stylistic Methods

The idea of "tone" is important in Maithili translation. Gajendra Thakur and other translators employ the following strategies:

1. Dynamic Equivalence: the source message is translated so that its effect reaches the Maithili reader's heart.

2. Domestication versus Foreignisation: some texts are adapted to Mithila's rural environment, while others preserve the distinguishing features of the source culture.

3. Paratextual Bridging: footnotes and glossaries explain culturally specific expressions such as pua and panchali.

4. Collaborative Translation: language specialists and creative writers cooperate to capture geographical nuances and ritual practices.

A Case in Social History: The Translation of Jigiri

An important undertaking in the Videha archive is the Maithili translation of Peddinti Ashok Kumar's Telugu novel Jigiri under the title Sada Lel Mitra (Friends Forever). The novel recounts the social history of the Kalandar community, whose members made their living by making bears dance and working as snake charmers. After the Wildlife Protection Act, the community faced an existential crisis. The Maithili translation presents its suffering through regional idioms and rural speech with considerable force.

Regional and International Dimensions

• Pakhalo (Konkani): translated by Dr Shambhu Kumar Singh, this novel by Tukaram Rama Shet addresses Goa's struggle for liberation and the social identities of children of mixed ancestry.

• Chhinnamasta (Hindi): the translation of Prabha Khaitan's novel brings urban feminism and psychological realism into the Maithili archive.

• Bertolt Brecht (German): translations of Brecht's plays introduced theoretical concepts such as "alienation" into Maithili theatre.

• The Qur'an: the translation of the opening chapter, al-Fatiha, reflects Mithila's plural social reality.

The Influence of Jagdish Prasad Mandal

The emergence of Jagdish Prasad Mandal through Videha was a decisive turning point for Maithili fiction. His novel Pangu (recipient of the 2021 Sahitya Akademi Award) and short story "Bisandh" present rural conflict and the realities of the Musahar community without embellishment. English translations of his writings by Thakur, such as Struggles of Life, have carried the movement's ethical voice to a worldwide readership.

Conclusion

The translated literature of the Videha movement constitutes one of modern India's most ambitious linguistic and archival enterprises. Through translation, the "parallel history" movement revises the establishment narrative and safeguards a democratic lineage extending from the Charyapada to contemporary Dalit consciousness. Through its dedication to the digital archive and the art of translation, Videha seeks to ensure that the "soul of Mithila" remains alive and accessible to the world.

[References: Prabhas Kumar Chaudhary's "Indradhanush," Ashok's "Pratilom," and Ramesh's "Kailas Mandal's Philips Radio."]

From the perspectives of Dalit literary criticism, Indian criticism, Western criticism, Gangesha's Navya-Nyāya, and the Videha Parallel-History Framework

Introduction

In the modern period of Maithili literature, the revolutionary change in the form and purpose of fiction is generally traced to the emergence of social realism and Dalit consciousness. Prabhas Kumar Chaudhary's "Indradhanush," Ashok's "Pratilom" and Ramesh's "Kailas Mandal's Philips Radio" are not merely three stories; they constitute an extended account of Mithila's changing socioeconomic landscape, class conflict and the struggle for Dalit identity.[1] When these works are studied in the light of Indian and Western literary criticism, Gangesha Upadhyaya's Navya-Nyāya, and the Videha Parallel-History Framework, they reveal concealed layers of literature that elite discourse often overlooks. Fiction has moved beyond Mithila's traditional haveli culture and the khabas institution to reach Sutta, Munra and Kailas, who struggle for the rights due to their labour.

Three works are particularly important to a critical theory of Dalit literature in Maithili's modern fictional tradition: Prabhas Kumar Chaudhary's "Indradhanush," Ashok's "Pratilom," and Ramesh's "Kailas Mandal's Philips Radio." All three are living documents of economic exploitation in rural Mithila, the injuries inflicted by caste, the cruelty of feudal power, and the resistance of humiliated humanity. The present study examines these works through five distinct critical frameworks:

(1) Dalit literary criticism, which places caste oppression, untouchability and Dalit resistance at the centre;

(2) Indian literary criticism, in the light of rasa theory, dhvani, vakrokti, alaṃkāra and the classical tradition of poetics;

(3) Western literary criticism, from the perspectives of Marxism, postcolonialism, structuralism, feminism and New Historicism;

(4) Gangesha Upadhyaya's Navya-Nyāya, using the philosophical instruments of pramāṇa (means of knowledge), inference, vyāpti (invariable concomitance) and verbal cognition;

(5) the Videha Parallel-History Framework, based on Mithila's history, popular memory, cultural identity and alternative narratives.

Section I: Introductions to the Stories and Textual Analysis

1.1 Prabhas Kumar Chaudhary's "Indradhanush" (Rainbow)

(Published in November 1983)

"Indradhanush" is an activist story in Maithili that portrays the awakening of the people against the feudal order in a rural setting in Mithila. Its central character is Anil, a politically conscious young organiser. His associates are Saroj and Mahesh. Opposing them are Kashi Chaudhary (the village landlord and feudal power-holder), Nami Babu (head of the village council), Sutta (a broker), and Munra (a peasant leader).

The story unfolds as follows. Government money is plundered by contractors and the mukhiya in the name of constructing village roads, schools and other public works. To awaken public consciousness, Anil and his group organise a village meeting. It takes place at Kashi Chaudhary's doorstep. Despite resistance from the feudal class, the people come together. In the end there is a lathi-charge, gunfire and repression, but the people's morale is not broken.

The rainbow metaphor is exceptionally profound: just as a rainbow, or panisokha, appears after rain, public consciousness rises after oppression.

1.2 "Pratilom" (Inversion)

"Pratilom" is a dense, multilayered story set in a Brahmin haveli on the occasion of a shraddha ceremony. With great acuity, it lays bare the subtlest cruelties of the caste order, from untouchability to the ostentation of ritual tradition.

Arjun, the central character, is a modern, educated young man who has come to his bauā (elder brother). Budha Malik (Pandit Ganeshwar Jha), the owner of the haveli, represents the old order. Kapileshwar Jha is the principal organiser of the spectacle surrounding the goat. Pradeep, the son, opposes tradition but remains helpless. Manju Buchchi symbolises the oppression of women.

The title "Pratilom" is highly meaningful. It signifies inversion or a reversed order. Those who stand "above" in society are morally "below": priests, landlords and Brahmins themselves refute their supposed superiority through their conduct.

1.3 "Kailas Mandal's Philips Radio"

(Published in Katha-Samvad, Darbhanga, 7 July 1990)

This story revolves around Kailas Mandal, a man of the lower social stratum (identified as Shudra), who is left economically and socially defenceless by his father's untimely death. He had gone from his village to Punjab; now he returns carrying a Philips radio.

Bauā Jha, the Brahmin owner of the haveli, and Surinder and Gajinder, his two strongmen, are the story's antagonists. The Philips radio, symbolising modernity, progress and a new aspiration, ultimately falls victim to a caste conspiracy.

The ending is deeply moving. Bauā Jha, Surinder and Gajinder humiliate Kaila and seize his radio. Yet Kaila's mother—illiterate, elderly and impoverished—stands beside her son at every step. In the final scene, she strikes the radio with a samdhāni. She reasons that if the radio is handed over to someone else, she will suffer dāntī-chanrā; better to break it outright.

Section II: From the Perspective of Dalit Literary Criticism

Dalit Literary Criticism of Maithili Fiction and the Discourse of Identity

The foundation of Dalit criticism in Maithili is not sympathy but svānubhūti—experience lived from within—and resistance. According to its principles, literature should strike at the roots of the caste-based and feudal order and advocate an egalitarian society. In all three stories, Dalits and other marginalised people appear not merely as individual characters but as an awakened class.

2.1 The Theoretical Foundations of Dalit Literary Criticism

Grounded in the intellectual tradition of Dr B. R. Ambedkar, Dalit criticism asks: How authentic is the portrayal of Dalit life in literature? Who is writing, and for whom? How far does such writing contribute to Dalit emancipation? This criticism exposes the internal structures of caste and challenges Brahmanical supremacy in literature.

2.2 Dalit Consciousness in "Indradhanush"

Dalit life in "Indradhanush" is portrayed concretely and analysed in economic terms. Agricultural labourers, Dhanuk Toli and Musahar Toli—these local designations make clear the physical segregation of Dalit communities. The storyteller sharply delineates the socioeconomic gulf between the two classes in the village.

From the standpoint of Dalit criticism, the significant feature of the story is that Dalits are shown not only as victims but as agents of active resistance. When Kashi Chaudhary's armed retainers advance with their lathis, Munra and his companions still do not flee. This "politics of resistance" is a central concern of Dalit literature.

There is nevertheless a limitation: the author tends to reduce caste oppression to a question of class. Dalit critics regard this "class reductionism" as problematic. Caste is not merely a by-product of class exploitation; it possesses a logic of its own.

The Voice of Dalit Resistance in "Indradhanush"

The form of Dalit awakening visible in Ashok's story "Indradhanush" reflects the political consciousness of the 1980s. Characters such as Sutta, Munra and Yadu no longer bow before the "master"; instead, they demand their boni, or wages. From the perspective of Dalit criticism, Sutta's revolt here is directed against the feudal arrogance personified by Kashi Chaudhary. When Sutta says, "We are of the low caste because we earn our bread by working, while those who sit idle and eat are of the high caste," he asserts the dignity of labour. This consciousness draws upon the principle of Dalit criticism that challenges caste superiority on the grounds of labour.

2.3 Untouchability and Brahmanism in "Pratilom"

"Pratilom" is an especially pertinent story for Dalit criticism. Its portrayal of untouchability is remarkably subtle. In a scene involving drinking water at a shraddha feast, the words "Will you take water? Will you drink water, master? Do you want water?" seem to form a small question, yet encompass the full cruelty of the Hindu caste order.

Arjun's helplessness despite his protest raises a central question for Dalit criticism: can an educated Dalit, or a person opposed to caste, attain freedom entirely on his own? Arjun wishes to resist, but he stands alone before the system.

The suggestiveness of the name "Pratilom" is important from the Dalit standpoint: those considered "high" in the caste system are in fact morally low, while those labelled "Shudra" or "untouchable" are superior in human dignity. This is a literary expression of Ambedkarite thought.

Structural Exploitation in "Pratilom"

The depiction of the khabas institution in Ashok's "Pratilom" is a serious subject for research in Dalit criticism. The khabas, once regarded as the haveli's "property," now wants to change his jīh (tongue). For Dalit criticism, "changing one's tongue" is not merely a bodily act but a declaration of linguistic and cultural independence.

2.4 Economic and Caste Exploitation in "Kailas Mandal's Philips Radio"

This story brings into focus a particular dimension of Dalit criticism: the confrontation between an object of modernity (the radio) and traditional casteism. The Philips radio is more than a mechanical device. For Kaila and his mother, it embodies the dream of participating in a shared culture. When it is seized, more than a possession is taken away: a person belonging to a lower caste is deprived of the right to participate in the modern world.

Bauā Jha and his strongmen combine caste hatred with economic plunder. Dalit criticism reads the debt trap of 500 rupees imposed on Kaila and the seizure of the radio as a modern form of agrarian servitude.

Structural Exploitation in "Kailas Mandal's Philips Radio"

In "Kailas Mandal's Philips Radio," Kailas (Kaila) returns from Punjab with his earnings, but the village's feudal order entangles him in its net again. The radio symbolises modernity. Yet when he is forced back into harbāhī (bonded agricultural labour), the cruel irony of a "song of freedom" playing on that same radio emerges as a central note of Dalit discourse.

Section III: From the Perspective of Indian Literary Criticism

Indian Literary Criticism: Rasa and Aucitya

In Indian poetics, the realisation of rasa produces an enduring emotional disposition in the reader's heart. The experience of karuṇa-rasa, or pathos, in "Kailas Mandal's Philips Radio" fills the reader with indignation against the social system. According to the doctrine of aucitya (propriety), every element of a literary work should be balanced. Yet, through the portrayal of anaucitya (impropriety or social injustice), the storytellers expose society's true face. According to dhvani theory, the very title "Indradhanush" carries a suggested meaning: it evokes the ineffectual colours of politics and their transience.

3.1 Rasa Theory and the Emotional Ground of the Stories

The theory of rasa, originating in Acharya Bharata's Nāṭyaśāstra, applies to prose fiction as well. The dominant rasas in these three stories are as follows:

"Indradhanush": vīra-rasa (the heroic enthusiasm of popular struggle), karuṇa-rasa (the depiction of poverty), and raudra-rasa (anger against feudal repression).

"Pratilom": bībhatsa-rasa (the repellent portrayal of untouchability), karuṇa-rasa (Arjun's helplessness), and humour and satire directed at the ostentation of the shraddha ritual.

The Videha Framework: Story, Expression and Effect

Component of the framework	Expression in the story	Effect
Subaltern consciousness	Revolt by Suttā and Munarā	Decline of traditional power
People's history	Discussion of the khabās (hereditary domestic-service) genealogy	Recovery of the histories of disadvantaged groups
Realist depiction	Bomb attacks and violence in the village	End of the myth of romantic Mithila
Philosophical analysis	Logical application of Navya-Nyāya	Greater intellectual seriousness in literature

"Kailas Mandal's Philips Radio": predominantly karuṇa-rasa; śānta-rasa (the forbearance of Kaila's mother at the end); and intense anger and the emotion of separation.

3.2 The Theory of Dhvani: In the Light of Anandavardhana

According to dhvani theory, the power of suggestion (vyañjanā-śakti) is supreme in poetry. These stories employ suggestion with considerable skill.

The name "Indradhanush" carries symbolic suggestion. A rainbow has seven colours; likewise, the discussion identifies seven caste communities in Mithila's society: Brahmins, Kayasthas, Yadavs, Dhanuks, Musahars, Khatbes and Amats (Amatyas). Just as the seven colours combine to create a beautiful and luminous spectacle, popular consciousness dreams of attaining such unity.

In grammar as well as philosophy, pratilom denotes a prohibited or reversed order. The title suggests a society that has inverted its natural moral order—justice, equality and love—and has consequently itself become pratilom.

In "Kailas Mandal's Philips Radio," the radio suggests modernity and the dream of moving between classes. Even the Western brand name "Philips" suggests that so-called global modernity remains beyond the reach of Dalits.

3.3 Vakrokti and Satire: The Tradition of Acharya Kuntaka

In the light of Kuntaka's Vakroktijīvita, all three stories make skilful use of vakrokti, or oblique expression.

In "Pratilom," the conversation about taking water during the shraddha ceremony—"Will you take water? Will you drink water, master?"—is a question whose very simplicity is oblique. Ostensibly it concerns water; in meaning, it concerns caste purity and pollution. This brief exchange suggests the entire philosophy of the Hindu caste order.

When Munra says in "Indradhanush," "Forgive me, sir," the apparently deferential phrase is in reality an ironic act of resistance. He has not been broken within; under pressure from circumstances, he is merely uttering the conventional words of submission.

3.4 The Folk-Tale Tradition and the Style of Maithili Fiction

All three stories bear the deep influence of Mithila's folk-narrative tradition. Their forms of dialogue, their selection of symbols and their vivid depiction of rural settings derive from Maithili folk literature. Just as Vidyapati's Padavali combines erotic love and devotion, these stories combine social reality with human compassion.

Section IV: From the Perspective of Western Literary Criticism

A Study in the Light of Indian and Western Critical Theory

When this triad of Maithili stories is examined against Indian theories such as rasa, dhvani and vakrokti, and Western approaches such as Marxism, deconstruction and existentialism, the philosophical depth contained within them becomes clear.

Western Literary Criticism: Marxism and Deconstruction

In Western criticism, Marxism explains class struggle. In "Indradhanush," the conflict between the inhabitants of the Dalit hamlet and the village's landowning class is a conflict between the Marxist proletariat and bourgeoisie. From the standpoint of deconstruction, "Pratilom" breaks apart the established master–servant binary. The influence of existentialism can be discerned in "Kailas Mandal's Philips Radio," where Kaila struggles for his own existence but is turned into an object by the prevailing system.

4.1 Marxist Literary Criticism

Gramsci's concept of cultural hegemony makes the interpretation of "Indradhanush" particularly clear. In the village, Kashi Chaudhary is not merely all-powerful economically; he possesses cultural power as well. Meetings take place at his doorway, people seek his blessings, and his words are accorded legitimacy. This is cultural hegemony.

From the standpoint of Lukács's realism, the depiction of social reality in all three stories is highly credible and historically concrete. The Brahmin landlord's doorway, the agricultural labourers' hamlet, the helplessness of a young man returning from Punjab—all are literary expressions of Mithila's historical reality in the 1980s and 1990s.

4.2 Postcolonial Literary Criticism

In the light of Frantz Fanon's ideas in The Wretched of the Earth, "Kailas Mandal's Philips Radio" portrays a colonised mind. Kaila travels to Punjab but does not become estranged from his community. He brings back a radio, an object of modernity, yet his social position remains unchanged.

Under Gayatri Spivak's concept of the subaltern—the powerless groups at society's margins—the subaltern speaks in each of the three stories. Arjun's mother, known as Gamwali, in "Pratilom"; the women of the Dhanuk hamlet in "Indradhanush"; and Kaila's mother in the Philips-radio story are all subaltern figures whose voices are seldom heard in the mainstream. The storytellers nevertheless give them a voice. Even so, Spivak's question remains valid: can those who are oppressed speak in their own voice? Can the Subaltern Speak?

4.3 Structuralism and Poststructuralism

On the basis of Saussurean linguistics, the pairs "master" and "labourer," "pandit" and "Shudra," and "haveli" and "hamlet" constitute binary oppositions upon which the narrative structures of all three stories depend.

From the standpoint of Derridean deconstruction, the title "Pratilom" dismantles its traditional binary opposition. The distinction between "high" and "low" loses its meaning when those held to be "high" behave in morally "low" ways.

4.4 Feminist Literary Criticism

In the light of Simone de Beauvoir's The Second Sex, the female characters in all three stories are deeply significant but occupy a secondary position. In "Pratilom," Gamwali and Manju Buchchi both live, in their different circumstances, under patriarchal restrictions. Kaila's mother in the Philips-radio story is the most patient and morally steadfast character, yet her agency is limited.

The near absence of female characters from "Indradhanush" also raises a critical question: are women treated as naturally excluded from narratives of popular struggle?

4.5 New Historicism

Stephen Greenblatt's New Historicism situates literature within historical processes. "Indradhanush" was written in November 1983, a period of upheaval in Indian politics. Against the background of the Bihar movement, Naxalism and the closing years of Indira Gandhi's rule, its narrative of popular struggle is the product of a particular historical moment.

"Kailas Mandal's Philips Radio" was written in 1990, when the Khalistan movement in Punjab, the Mandal Commission controversy and the beginnings of economic liberalisation were part of the political landscape. Kaila's journey to Punjab and the symbolism of the radio therefore possess a concrete historical context.

Three Stories: Publication Context and Social Problems

Story	Date of publication / reading	Geographical setting	Social problem
Indradhanush (Rainbow)	November 1983	Rural Mithila	Caste violence; vote-bank politics
Pratilom (Against the Grain)	Modern period	Mansion and Dalit settlement	Khabās service tradition; struggle for identity
Kailas Mandal's Philips Radio	July 1990	From Punjab to the village	Debt trap; the grotesque side of modernity

Section V: From the Perspective of Gangesha Upadhyaya's Navya-Nyāya

5.1 A General Introduction to Navya-Nyāya

Gangesha Upadhyaya's Tattvacintāmaṇi (he was active around 1320 CE, in the early fourteenth century) is among Mithila's most influential philosophical works. It gives Nyāya philosophy a rigorous logical foundation. The four principal instruments of knowledge considered here are:

(1) Pratyakṣa: knowledge obtained through direct perception.

(2) Anumāna: inference based on vyāpti, or an invariable, universal relation.

(3) Upamāna: knowledge obtained through comparison.

(4) Śabda: knowledge obtained from the words of a trustworthy speaker.

5.2 Literary Evidence as Perceptual Testimony

The epistemic instrument of pratyakṣa, or direct perception, can be applied to literary criticism in this way: what the storyteller has seen and experienced is presented as perceptual evidence. In "Indradhanush," the statement "Even lathis have made their way into the houses of this village" constitutes direct social testimony.

In "Pratilom," the procedure of offering and drinking water at the śrāddha feast, and each scene seen through Arjun's eyes, form a narrative movement from the indeterminate perception (nirvikalpaka pratyakṣa) of Navya-Nyāya to determinate perception (savikalpaka pratyakṣa).

5.3 Inference as a Means of Knowledge and the Relation of Vyāpti

Four Approaches to Dalit Literary Criticism

Critical perspective	Principal theory	Application to the stories
Indian poetics	Rasa, dhvani and aucitya	Depiction of feudal irony and compassion
Western criticism	Marxism and deconstruction	Class struggle and the dismantling of entrenched power
Dalit criticism	Lived experience and resistance	Opposition to the khabās tradition and defence of identity
Navya-Nyāya	Perception, inference and delimiters	Exposure of social argument and artifice

Inference is of the greatest importance in Navya-Nyāya. Vyāpti, universal concomitance—as in the proposition "Where there is smoke, there is fire"—forms the basis of this method of reasoning.

"Indradhanush" establishes such a relation on the social plane: "Wherever there is a feudal order, there is exploitation." Each episode in the story demonstrates this relation: the embezzlement of panchayat funds, dishonesty over roads and thoroughfares, and the denial of minimum wages to agricultural labourers.

In "Pratilom," the concomitant relation is: "Wherever there is Brahmanical ostentation, there is the degradation of human beings." The old master, Kapileshwar Jha and other characters demonstrate this relation through the Navya-Nyāya triad of pakṣa (subject), sādhya (that which is to be established) and hetu (reason).

5.4 Upādhi (Limiting Condition) and Social Justice

In Navya-Nyāya, upādhi, a limiting condition or qualifier, is an important concept that restricts or refines the scope of a relation of vyāpti. In Kailas Mandal's story, caste functions as an upādhi defining the extent and form of exploitation.

This philosophical analysis yields an important conclusion: in all three stories, social reality appears as a logically ordered system, structurally determined. On the literary plane, it reflects the Navya-Nyāya logic of jñātatā (knownness) and ajñātatā (unknownness).

5.5 Śabda-pramāṇa and Testimony from the People

Śabda-pramāṇa—knowledge derived from the word of a trustworthy authority—is the voice of the people in these stories. In "Indradhanush," Anil addresses a public meeting, and his words become authoritative testimony for the assembly. In "Pratilom," Pradip's questions and answers constitute a Navya-Nyāya dialogue founded upon verbal testimony.

Gangesha's Navya-Nyāya and Narrative Analysis

The Navya-Nyāya of Gangesha Upadhyaya, one of Mithila's intellectual glories, is not merely a philosophy; it is a subtle instrument of reasoning that can be used in literary analysis. Its epistemology considers perception, inference, comparison and verbal testimony as means of valid knowledge.

The Conflict Between Perception and Appearance

According to Gangesha, perception arises through the senses. In "Indradhanush," when the protagonist comes to the village, a misapprehension accompanies his direct perception of it. He believes that the village is as it was before, but this apparent perception breaks down when he hears about bombs and lathis. The Navya-Nyāya defect of overextension (ativyāpti) becomes evident here: the traditional definition of village peace now encompasses a world encircled by violence.

Avacchedaka and Counterpositiveness: Kailas's Radio

The Navya-Nyāya concepts of avacchedaka (delimitor) and pratiyogitā (counterpositiveness) are subtle. In "Kailas Mandal's Philips Radio," the radio is the delimitor of modernity for Kailas; for Baua Jha, however, the same radio provides the basis for the counterpositiveness of Kailas's "debt."

When Kaila smashes the radio with a peg, he establishes abhāva (absence): the absence of the radio signifies the symbolic ending of the humiliation and debt associated with it.

Inference and Vyāpti: The Logic of "Pratilom"

Arjun's reasoning in "Pratilom" belongs to the process of inference. He wishes to look like Baua because his assumed universal relation is that a person with red lips and a clean appearance is a "master." Yet society's cruel upādhi, its limiting condition, consigns him once again to the category of khabās, the hereditary servant.

Section VI: From the Perspective of the Videha Parallel-History Framework

6.1 The Videha Parallel-History Framework: An Introduction

In the philosophy of Mithila's history, "Videha Parallel History" is an innovative critical instrument. The framework rests on the assumption that, apart from the histories of the state, government and mainstream historical narratives, Mithila has a parallel history in which popular memory, Dalit experience, women's narratives and the truths of neglected communities are preserved.

The word "Videha" (an ancient name associated with Janakpur and Mithila) also carries the sense "beyond the body" or "beyond the physical." This parallel history preserves those truths that were never entered into government documents or official histories.

The Videha Parallel-History Framework: A New Discourse

The Videha Parallel-History Framework advanced by Gajendra Thakur challenges the established history of Maithili literature and institutes a parallel discourse. It makes room, above all, for voices neglected by the Darbhanga Raj and other institutional structures.

Subaltern History and Maithili Fiction

According to the Videha framework, Mithila's real history is not confined to accounts of royal courts; rather, it survives in nārāśaṃsī, narratives of people's lives and character. "Indradhanush," attributed here to Ashok, portrays the history of a village's Dalit hamlets, suppressed beneath the political rainbow. In "Pratilom," the lineage of the khabās family, from Manshi Mandar to Arjun, forms part of this same parallel history, removed from the main current of historical writing.

Principal Propositions of the Videha Framework and Their Narrative Application

1. Deconstruction of the canon: challenging established literary standards. Centring the struggle of a Dalit character in "Kailas Mandal's Philips Radio" is an achievement of this framework. 2. Linguistic autonomy: the Videha framework values forms of Maithili widespread among ordinary people. In all three stories, the language, idioms and village speech of everyday life contribute to the democratisation of literature. 3. Documentary realism: the Videha framework treats a story as a social document. "Indradhanush" is a serious record of the political and social condition of a village in 1983.

Narrative Character Analysis and Social Structure

The choice of characters and their conduct in all three stories reveal society's changing values.

Characters in "Indradhanush": Struggle and Illusion

Anil: a middle-class young man who fears the changes taking place in the village but is ready to struggle.

Sutta: a symbol of Dalit revolt, no longer prepared to bow down.

Satinath Jha: a figure of political intervention who makes use of Dalit awakening for electoral votes.

Characters in "Pratilom": From Servitude to Revolt

Arjun: a fourteen-year-old boy born into the khabās tradition but possessed of a strong sense of personal identity.

Gamwali (Arjun's mother): a symbol of traditional helplessness, compelled by poverty to remain connected with the haveli.

Jabhira: a representative of a younger Dalit generation that now challenges its master by figuratively seizing him by the tongue.

Characters in "Philips Radio": Sacrifices of Modernity

Kailas (Kaila): a hopeful young man who has seen the world outside but becomes entangled in the feudal mechanisms of his village.

Baua Jha: the cruel face of feudal exploitation, practising oppression while speaking sweetly.

Surinder and Gajinder: the landlord's strongmen and conspirators, who exploit others under a pretence of friendship.

The Linguistic and Formal Beauty of Maithili Fiction

In these Maithili stories, form and language are not merely means of communication; they constitute a discourse in themselves.

The language of "Indradhanush": Prabhas Kumar Chaudhary employs a descriptive mode. Short utterances such as "Even bombs have reached us now" intensify the tension in the village.

The language of "Pratilom": Ashok employs a psychological mode. Arjun's thought—"My lips have turned red ... do I look like Baua now, or not?"— expresses both his internalised sense of inferiority and his desire to escape it.

The language of "Philips Radio": satire and irony abound. A "song of freedom" on the radio, juxtaposed with Kaila's harbāhī (bonded agricultural labour), is a contradiction that demonstrates the artistic power of Maithili fiction.

Statistical References and Historical Periods

The periods in which these stories were written matter to the development of Maithili fiction. "Indradhanush" belongs to 1983, when violence and caste polarisation were increasing in rural Bihar politics. "Kailas Mandal's Philips Radio" belongs to 1990, when globalisation and growing contact with the outside world were changing the village economy.

6.2 Mithila's Historical Context

Mithila's history has three layers: (a) political history—kings, zamindars and feudal lords; (b) cultural history—Vidyapati, Gangesha and heroes of folk ballads; and (c) social history—the caste system, relations over land and Mithila Brahmanism. Literature, too, has been written in three corresponding ways.

The Videha Parallel-History Framework asks: where is the "fourth dimension" in Maithili literature? Where is the history written with Musahars, Dhanuks, Yadavs, Kurmis, Tatmas, Dusadhs (Dudhvanshis) and Amatyas at its centre?

6.3 "Indradhanush" and Mithila's Agrarian History

Read through the Videha Parallel-History Framework, "Indradhanush" ceases to be merely a story and becomes a literary record of the land movements in Mithila during the 1970s and 1980s.

It was written in the period of Mithila's land-reform movements, the slogan "The land belongs to the tiller," and Naxalite influence. Kashi Chaudhary is not merely a fictional character; he is a historical representative of Mithila's contemporary feudal system.

Within the Videha framework, the story forms a chapter of Mithila's parallel history, unrecorded in official gazetteers but living in popular memory.

6.4 "Pratilom" and the History of Mithila Brahmanism

The history of Brahmanism in Mithila is long and complex. The Mithila Brahmin pañjī, or genealogical register, regulates marriage relations on the basis of caste and is perhaps one of the most intricate caste-based bureaucracies in the world.

In "Pratilom," the śrāddha ceremony of Pandit Ganeshwar Jha is, in effect, a live documentary record of this historical Brahmanical order. Lutan Mandar, Tholai Mandar and Raudi Mandar represent the lineage-based social structure of Mithila at the time.

From the standpoint of Videha parallel history, Arjun's resistance is a literary echo of Mithila's internal reform movements. Whether one considers the progressive movement of Mithila Vidyapith or organisations struggling for social justice, these struggles belong to the historical record; "Pratilom" preserves them in the form of a story.

6.5 "Kailas Mandal's Philips Radio": The History of Migrant Workers

One of the most important chapters of Mithila's modern history is the history of migrant labour. Hundreds of thousands of people travelled from Bihar and Mithila to Punjab, Delhi and Mumbai. The history of this internal migration is largely absent from mainstream historiography.

"Kailas Mandal's Philips Radio" is an invaluable document of that parallel history. Kaila went to Punjab, worked there with Bhaggu Mallah, earned money and bought a radio. This is not merely an individual story; it symbolises the collective experience of migrant workers from Mithila.

Within the Videha framework, the story becomes a chapter in "the parallel history of Mithila's migrant workers"—a history that lives neither in official statistics nor in academic research papers, but in literature itself.

Section VII: Comparative Analysis and Synthesis

7.1 The Interrelationship of the Three Stories

A deep relationship connects the three stories: they present three different dimensions of the same society in Mithila.

"Indradhanush"—the political dimension: popular struggle, organisation and opposition to feudalism.

"Pratilom"—the religious and cultural dimension: śrāddha, the veneration of caste and the ostentation of tradition.

"Kailas Mandal's Philips Radio"—the economic and individual dimension: migration, aspiration and caste oppression.

Taken together, the three provide a three-dimensional portrayal of contemporary life in Mithila.

7.2 Diversity of Style and Language

The linguistic styles of the three stories differ. "Indradhanush" uses colloquial Maithili, collective dialogue and slogans—the language of the people. "Pratilom" employs a comparatively literary, Sanskrit-influenced Maithili, which also reflects the speech of its Brahmin characters. "Kailas Mandal's Philips Radio" mixes Maithili and Hindi, capturing the linguistic reality of contact between town and countryside.

7.3 A Synthesis of the Five Frameworks

All five frameworks approach the same truth from five directions. Dalit criticism says that caste oppression is primary. Indian poetics says that rasa, dhvani and alaṅkāra create the stories' literary beauty. Western criticism says that class, caste, gender and history are interwoven. Navya-Nyāya says: demonstrate through reasoning that exploitation is a systemic reality, not an arbitrary occurrence. The Videha framework says that Mithila possesses its own distinctive history, preserved in these literary works.

Epilogue

"Indradhanush," "Pratilom" and "Kailas Mandal's Philips Radio" are three golden strands of Maithili literature, rising in a moment from "literature" into "history," and from "history" into "philosophy." Examined through all five critical frameworks, they reveal the following:

(1) The question of human dignity is paramount in these stories, whether the person concerned is Dalit, a woman or a labourer of the poorer classes.

(2) Mithila's distinctive social and cultural setting lends these stories universality. They are not Mithila's alone; they are stories of every corner of Indian society in which human beings are crushed within the triangle of caste, class and gender.

(3) These stories form a bridge between literary excellence and social commitment. This is not "art for art's sake" but "art for life's sake."

(4) Viewed through the Videha Parallel-History Framework, all three stories write the history of Mithila that official historiography has been unable to write.

Finally, Gangesha Upadhyaya's Navya-Nyāya contains the concept of siddhi, achievement through valid knowledge. The siddhi attained by reading, reflecting upon and analysing these three stories is this: caste, class and the degradation of human beings constitute a system that is logically, historically and morally unjust, and literature is the most powerful form of resistance to it.

Conclusion: The Future of Maithili Fiction and the Parallel Tradition

These stories by Prabhas Kumar Chaudhary, Ashok and Ramesh take Maithili literature beyond an elitist enclosure and bring it into contact with the realities of ordinary people. The political realism of "Indradhanush," the struggle for identity in "Pratilom," and the economic irony of "Philips Radio" together create a parallel history of Mithila. When the stories are analysed using the logical methods of Gangesha Upadhyaya's Navya-Nyāya, literature is no longer merely an object of sentiment; it becomes an intellectual discourse. The Videha framework gives this discourse a systematic foundation, integrating Dalit thought, class consciousness and the contradictions of modernity. This development in Maithili fiction looks towards a future "rainbow" (panisokhā) whose colours do not fade, and in which every "Kaila" and "Arjun" has the full right to preserve his own "Philips radio" and his identity. Through these stories, Maithili literature advances alongside global discussions of the subaltern.

References

Indian Works

Bharata Muni — Nāṭyaśāstra

Ānandavardhana — Dhvanyāloka

Kuntaka — Vakroktijīvita

Gangesha Upadhyaya — Tattvacintāmaṇi

Ambedkar, Dr B. R. — Jāti kā Vināśa (Annihilation of Caste)

Ambedkar, Dr B. R. — Annihilation of Caste

Western Works

Marx, Karl — Capital (Vol. I)

Gramsci, Antonio — Prison Notebooks

Lukács, Georg — The Historical Novel

Fanon, Frantz — The Wretched of the Earth

Spivak, Gayatri — Can the Subaltern Speak?

de Beauvoir, Simone — The Second Sex

Derrida, Jacques — Of Grammatology

Saussure, Ferdinand de — Course in General Linguistics

Greenblatt, Stephen — Renaissance Self-Fashioning

APPENDIX 2

Jyotsna Phanija — An Exploration of Caste Conflict in Selected Maithili Stories

[Prabhas Kumar Chaudhary's "Indradhanush" ("The Rainbow"), Ashok Kumar Jha's "Pratilom" ("Anticurrent"), and Ramesh Jha's "Kailas Mandal's Philips Radio," in Contemporary Maithili Short Stories. Edited by Murari Madhusudan Thakur. New Delhi: Sahitya Akademi, 2005.]

(Muse India, November–December 2019, Issue 88)

Jyotsna Phanija

Dr Jyotsna Phanija, from the quiet village of Kaikaluru in Andhra Pradesh, is a profound testament to the power of the written word against the silence imposed by circumstance. She is Assistant Professor of English at ARSD College, University of Delhi. In 2016, at the young age of twenty-five, she earned her PhD from the English and Foreign Languages University (EFLU), Hyderabad. Dr Phanija's work constitutes a subtle exploration of communities pushed to the margins. Her research makes its way through the tremors of postcolonial literature, particularly examining the intersection of gender and "madness," which she treats not as a medical deficiency but as a rebellious form of resistance. This voice of resurgence is present throughout her varied literary portfolio:

Poetry and translation: From her first poetry collection, Ceramic Evening (2016), to her delicate translations of Telugu poetry in Crimson Lamp (2015) and Stoned Song (2019), she bridges linguistic and emotional distances.

Editorial vision: With Nivedita N., she edited The World I Write In (2016), an important anthology that places the voices of visually impaired writers at its centre.

A multidimensional reach: Her creative gifts extend to fiction, academic articles and essays, often composed in the spare moments of her life as a singer. She embodies the confluence of tributaries of caste, gender and disability. Dr Phanija's identity is situated at a complex crossroads. In a world where the combination of being a woman, visually impaired and of a lower caste frequently produces a systemic lack of resources, she does not merely endure; she speaks out. Her life and writing resist silence, transforming the difficulties of her intersectional reality into a courageous, poetic cry.

An Exploration of Caste Conflict in Selected Maithili Stories

Caste divides people into privileged and underprivileged classes, creating distinctions of superiority and inferiority. These form two separate worlds that can never become one; for a very long time they have governed the human capacity to think and reflect. Literature gives voice to the pain of being subjected to caste oppression, to the terror and violence arising from caste difference, and to the "infection of caste" that afflicts humanity. Some Maithili stories translated into English embody caste oppression in metaphorical terms. Set in rural surroundings, they depict the condition of being subjected to caste oppression and present gender and caste as a "double oppression," expressing suffering and anguish through poetic images. They bring into relief caste conflicts generated by physical location and by economic, political and cultural concerns, as well as the violence that pervades them as a symbol of existence.

To speak of caste is a complex undertaking, for it is difficult to delineate pain and suffering while fearlessly portraying the inequalities of contemporary society. As Sharmila Rege writes, writing about caste can sometimes seem tantamount to betraying the nation. In her words, "Even in the postcolonial period, public and political expression of caste was regarded as a backward-looking ideology that slowed the momentum of class struggle and was also considered a betrayal of the nation" (Rege 39). To write about caste is to shatter the illusion of the justice or virtue of Indian civilisation.

The selected stories — Prabhas Kumar Chaudhary's "The Rainbow," Ashok Kumar Jha's "Anticurrent," and Ramesh Jha's "Kailas Mandal's Philips Radio" — investigate caste conflict in the context of an unrestrained civilisation, or a society divided by caste. All three share a perspective: they recognise caste as class while also dividing thinkers who regard caste as equivalent to class. In a postcolonial register, class and caste alternately torment the inhabitants. The abolition of caste difference may be recorded on paper, but the class consciousness that sustains the presence of caste continues to prey upon those who suffer. These stories show how members of a particular group are denied freedom, how their childhood is stolen, how their sense of self-acceptance is called into question, and how they attempt to struggle against an unjust social system.

1. An Analysis of Prabhas Kumar Chaudhary's Story "The Rainbow" (Indradhanush)

Prabhas Kumar Chaudhary's "The Rainbow," translated by Rajanand Jha, exemplifies the complete transformation of a village affected by caste conflict. The story foregrounds the declining social identity of the upper caste, while the narrator is still engaged in unlearning the practices of caste superiority and high-and-low distinctions. He is adjusting to a new order in which his status as "high" is being challenged.

The narrator, who lives away from his village, returns to comfort his mother. She lives alone in the village and feels unsafe because of the continuous quarrels between upper and lower castes. This situation threatens the peace that once prevailed there. Although the title "The Rainbow" (Indradhanush) symbolises beauty and joy, it actually points towards social unrest.

The narrator's mother knows nothing of politics. She is neutral towards the caste situation but is concerned about the danger facing the village's future. The narrator, on the other hand, is prepared to distance himself from upper-caste dominance. But Anil, a relative of the narrator and a prominent young upper-caste man, is unwilling to accept equality in society. He tries to subdue lower-caste people through violence. Anil firmly believes that "a classless society can never be attained; it is only an illusion."

Is Anil speaking the truth? Is a classless society merely imaginary? Other elements in the story lend support to this harsh reality. The village's division between rulers and ruled, masters and labourers, together with each group's attempt to establish its self-respect, exposes the many layers of caste conflict.

There is also a third group: wealthy landlords, moneylenders and counterfeit social reformers who exploit caste conflict for their own interests. Finally, there is a fourth group, consisting of innocent villagers of both castes who bear the blows of this system. The story makes tangible the multidimensional and complex nature of caste conflict, within which humanity is continually crushed.

The story depicts a change in which upper-caste people struggle to accept the reality that one human being cannot be held in another's possession like property. The narrator recalls, for instance, that the villagers can no longer address him as "master." In its refined form, the story announces the end of the "master–slave" relationship between upper and lower castes.

Alongside this portrayal, the story speaks of the false mantle of equality worn by the wealthy. Pseudo-communists such as Mahakant Jha and Bhutta Jha seek to teach labourers the lessons of equality. They incite labourers against their employers. Their purpose is not to help the poor but to establish themselves as social reformers, contest elections and win popular support. As a result of their scheme, labourers stop working in Saroj Bhaiya's fields for three months. When Saroj repeatedly summons the wife of his labourer Parbodhan to his house to collect her wages, a movement begins.

Caste is an unscientific method of division that prevents the full participation of the whole of society. The village depicted in this story is a microcosm of the nation, where the political struggle over caste generates a seemingly endless psychological conflict for the individual. The upper-caste villagers are stunned by the "rebellious" conduct of the lower castes. They feel that the supreme position they once enjoyed will now remain only a fairy tale. Saroj believes that the lower castes have become independent because the upper castes lack unity among themselves. His inherited upper-caste attitudes compel him to feel superior and to assert a master's rights over those of lower castes.

The story discusses a political struggle in which calculating members of the lower castes take improper advantage of the suffering of their own people and use it for economic gain. Sutta Khatbe and Munra are blamed for spreading violence in the village and bringing hardship to the poor. Sutta Khatbe, of the Khatbe-Dhanuk community, takes a thick stick in his hand and intimidates Kashi Chaudhary. Displaying his full anger, he warns Kashi Babu that if he refuses to pay their wages, the consequences will be grave. The sequence seems theatrical because it shows only Kashi Babu's momentary defeat. On the following day, Sutta's father apologises to Kashi Babu, revealing that the older generation still believes in upper-caste supremacy.

At a deeper level, this incident also foregrounds the persecution of innocent people. The upper-caste villagers become violent in their anger. Sutta comes carrying a stick and tells his father to stop pleading before Anil. In his rage, he questions the upper-caste people: "I will go on abusing the Brahmins." Striking out with his stick, he asks, "We earn by the sweat of our brows, so we have become a low caste, while these lepers, who sit around doing nothing, have become a high caste?" (Chaudhary 153). His question asserts the right to equal respect for his labour.

The story takes a violent turn when a crowd mobilised by Anil attempts to seize Sutta, but he escapes. The crowd catches Sutta's father, Yadua, and beats him. Munra threatens Kashi Babu and demands that Yadua be released from the crowd. They let Yadua go, but when they cannot find Munra they attack his wife and tear her sari. Munra remains hidden inside the house. In this situation Munra's wife becomes the actual victim, while her husband remains safely concealed. Likewise, the elderly Yadua suffers the violence generated by caste conflict, while his son escapes.

Lower-caste people then begin to attack the upper castes. "Poor, helpless Vishwanath Mishra, who was sitting in his courtyard, was picked up and flung away like a frog. As Pandit Musahar Jha returned from the temple with a basket of flowers in his hand, he was thrown to the ground" (Chaudhary 153). This political struggle victimises innocent people and leaves them powerless. The shrewd members of both groups play their caste politics in safety, abandoning innocent villagers to their suffering. Nami Babu, a village moneylender, pretends to remain neutral in this situation, a posture that is still extremely dangerous for the village's future.

Cunning upper-caste people play upon the fears of lower-caste villagers so that they can become known as reformers, like Satinath Jha. Satinath Jha, a widower and member of the Lok Dal, feigns liberalism and manipulates caste politics for personal advantage. The narrator, a conscientious observer, is appalled by these divisions. He asks, "What is all this? A resurgence of Dalits? Caste conflict and class struggle? For whose sake? Why are these so-called leaders poisoning the social fabric in the name of caste to create their vote banks?" (Chaudhary 155). Caste has become a weapon in the hands of vote-seekers. By speaking of caste in these lines and exposing the true faces of politicians, pseudo-communists, the rich, the calculating and powerful, and those who safely play the game of neutrality, Chaudhary appears to see democracy as little more than a dream.

The story criticises the harassment of the poor caused by caste conflict, as the daughter-in-law of Vaishampavalli bitterly comments upon her situation:

Sutta drives a rickshaw in the town, and Munra goes from village to village working as a mason. They have no worries. They have left us here in the middle of it all and are enjoying themselves. We have nothing to eat. Our children are hungry! You people show us no pity. You have dismissed us from household work. Our cattle will die without fodder. They graze on this embankment because we are forbidden to graze them in the fields and orchards. They will certainly die. All this is happening because of Sutta and Munra. (Chaudhary 161)

Likewise, caste conflict creates tension among the upper-caste middle class because they require labourers for their agricultural work. Munna Babu, belonging to the upper middle class, sums up the entire conflict in these words:

Kashi Babu now has his bread buttered on both sides. He will certainly make plenty of money out of this. Nami Babu is already on his side. As for Munra and Sutta, he will summon them tomorrow and shake hands with them. They are from his own neighbourhood. The rest of us villagers will be made fools of. Kashi has no concern for his fields and farmland. Your land will lie fallow while he enjoys himself. (Chaudhary 159)

Thus this rainbow is a restless rainbow, furnished with cruel wings and covering the entire sky, in a world where politicians are mechanising the national interest. The story raises the question whether freedom is real or merely an illusion, for innocent people belonging to neither camp are being deprived of their livelihoods. Playing hide-and-seek between the concepts of caste and class, the story strikes at the roots of the caste system.

2. An Analysis of Ashok's Story "Anticurrent" (Pratilom)

Ashok Kumar Jha's short story "Anticurrent," translated by Sanjeev Kumar Chaudhary, presents caste conflict and a stolen childhood. Arjun, Dhanmanti's fourteen-year-old son, has inherited from his mother a sense of submission to the upper castes, because people from his own community ridicule him. Yet this is also a time of resurgence, when movements against upper-caste domination are gathering force. Arjun is willing to accept the leftovers of his former employer's household, although members of his caste tell him that they should no longer take leftover food from the upper castes. "The women barbers no longer accept leftover food. People of their caste forbid them to work in the mansion as male and female barbers; they regard it as humiliating" (Jha 239). As in the struggle depicted through hunger and starvation in "The Rainbow," Arjun and his helpless mother work against the wishes of their own caste community in order to satisfy their hunger. When Arjun goes to his former master Pandit Ganeshwar Jha's shraddha ceremony, where large quantities of delicious food will be served, he is mocked by people of his own caste. Their ridicule torments his innocent mind.

The story offers a striking example of economic conflict: while Baua Jha's family and numerous relatives enjoy their meals and waste great quantities of food, Arjun's household does not have even a pinch of sugar with which to make tea. Arjun's exhausted body longs for a cup of tea in the bitter winter cold, but his circumstances prevent him from having one. His mother cannot give him tea because there is no sugar in the house. He is repeatedly sent to the mansion for various tasks, and he struggles for a mere cup of tea. This desperate situation depicts hunger in all its cruelty.

Food habits constitute another distinction dividing people by caste. The story portrays changes from one dietary practice to another in an ironic manner. Arjun's father, Lutan Marar, had given up eating meat. He had accepted a kanthi, a devotional necklace, from an ascetic. His former master and mistress were angry with him, but he remained a vegetarian. Dhanmanti connects his premature death with his change of dietary practice. Because vegetarian food is treated as a marker of a particular caste and its identity, Lutan Marar is criticised for attempting to change his original way of life.

The story foregrounds the way people are compelled to endure injustice in the name of tradition. In praising his employer, Arjun imitates Baua Jha's ideas. Through this process of admiration he loses his own sense of self. One example occurs when Arjun insists that everyone should wash their hands after drinking tea, continually offering the guests a water vessel for that purpose. Those present criticise him for behaving like a pandit, like a member of the upper caste. The imitation of others is itself one reason why the caste order continues for so long. Admiration produces self-hatred and lowers one's estimate of one's own identity. The story identifies the psychological struggle in which Arjun and his mother are entangled in a complex form of self-disgust: every small act of imitating their masters or adopting their habits gives them a temporary status as members of the accepted group. Although Dhanmanti criticises Lutan Marar for changing his diet, she is herself fascinated by her son's upper-class habits. This inability to accept oneself psychologically fragments her. Another reason for Arjun's enslavement is his fear of his master. As a young boy he thinks of his life, his mother's helplessness, his family and their need for food. He is a troubled child who needs the warmth of affection rather than orders, and praise for the little tasks he performs. As a disadvantaged child on many levels, Arjun's stolen childhood is a failure of the nation.

The story reaches a significant turning point when Baua Jha's arrogance is challenged by Jawahar, a boy whom Arjun has brought to work at the shraddha ceremony for a wage of twenty rupees. An excess of lime in the betel leaf cuts Arjun's tongue, and Jawahar tells Baua Jha to replace it. Baua Jha's high-caste status, his ability to read sacred scriptures and his longstanding faith in purity are all challenged. "...This Jawahara, this tiny little boy, is challenging me. He is asking me to change Arjun's tongue! As if it were some nut or bolt" (Jha 255). Baua Jha knows that replacing Arjun's tongue is impossible, and he is filled with intolerable rage. Arjun's cut tongue is a metaphor for the fractured identity he has been forced to endure. His father is gone, his childhood is lost and his self-respect has been taken away. He cannot establish solidarity with members of his caste, nor can he continue serving the employer who personifies the entire oppression carried out in the name of caste. Yet the challenge to Baua Jha also suggests the hope of attaining equality in such circumstances.

The story is set in a village where people are forced to believe in the supremacy of learning. Because opportunities for education are confined to the upper castes, lower-caste people are continually silenced in the name of knowledge. The story describes in detail how Ganeshwar Jha's personality is marked by chanting the shraddha mantras, music, serving many kinds of food, slaughtering goats, discussing politics, linguistics and literature, expounding the Vedas, Upanishads, karma and death, debating purity and impurity, and quoting Sanskrit verses — but not by any thought of humanity, equality or justice. It presents a conflict between Baua Jha, a learned Shrotriya Brahmin, and Jawahar of the working class, who can do what many villagers never dared even to imagine. This story is a severe criticism of the caste system imposed upon society in the name of purity.

Ashok Kumar Jha's intervention in exploring caste conflict in the context of religion poses a major challenge to every proposition that equates religion with a way of life.

Even in modern times, caste remains an unbroken structure of Indian social life, as Velassery and Patra observe:

"...Caste is described as both an illusion and an imagination. It is an illusion because it is a mental construction of the society in which we live; it is an imagination because it has opened the way to various kinds of intellectual stimulation, generating various forms of mental delusion in India. Although caste can be accorded no intellectual validity or scientific recognition, as a form of social stratification it retains political and social legitimacy even in this age of modernity" (Velassery and Patra 1).

3. Ramesh's Short Story "Kailas Mandal's Philips Radio"

Ramesh Jha's short story "Kailas Mandal's Philips Radio," translated by Bhairatweshwar Jha, indicates how caste is an illusion, an unscientific theory devised to silence people, or an imagination that challenges reality. The story portrays the intersection of caste hierarchy and village politics. Kailas is a gentle young man and an affectionate son, but "...for the mansion and the people of the Brahmin quarter, who considered him a 'Shudra,' he was a rebellious backward-caste man" (Ramesh Jha 300). Kailas is unwilling to accept caste customs. Like Arjun in "Anticurrent," Kailas has lost his childhood; hunger has spread its wings over his family, and he goes to Punjab in search of work. His father died in a flood of the Kamala River while gathering the remaining sweet potatoes from a field. Kailas's suffering began with his father's death. Villagers call him "Kaila," a distorted form of his name, marking his disfigured identity. His master at the mansion, Baua Jha, could not tolerate Kailas working elsewhere. Baua Jha believes that Kailas's mother sent him far away and waits for a chance to take revenge on her. The story begins when Kailas returns from Punjab and his mother is overjoyed. Baua Jha becomes angry when Kailas does not return to work at the mansion. He is troubled by the fear of losing his dominance. "He has earned a few rupees and now Punjab's air has got into him, has it? Only yesterday he sat at the doorway waiting for rice-water and leftover food, saying, 'Master, don't give this to the cattle; give it to me,' and now that her son has come home, she..." (Ramesh Jha 304). Baua Jha expects Kailas and his mother to submit to him. When that expectation is challenged, he devises new ways of instilling fear in them.

Kailas brings a radio from Punjab to make his mother happy, and it becomes an image of his newly acquired freedom. Baua Jha sees no worth in his independence or self-respect and attempts to humiliate him again. He instructs Gajendar and Surendar to deceive Kailas. They succeed in forcing him to take a loan that he cannot repay. Kailas falls back into a state of bondage and once more tries to go to Punjab for work. But Baua Jha threatens the villagers that anyone lending Kailas money must be prepared for the consequences. Kailas again becomes a ploughman in Baua Jha's fields. The story exposes a grave situation in which many adverse experiences remain unspoken, fear is produced among villagers, and upper-caste status remains unquestioned. Criticising the rise of the backward classes, Baua Jha says, "The government has certainly spoiled them with so much propaganda; there is no doubt about it. Otherwise how could Kaila, whose household is still considered impure, eat breakfast made of sifted flour?" (Ramesh Jha 304). Fearful that a classless society might emerge, he spreads fear among others. The classless society becomes an illusion because people like Baua Jha employ many methods to crush the idea. Baua Jha uses his money and physical power to confront two innocent people, rendering institutions such as the Harijan police station or a special court for backward classes seemingly ineffective. Baua Jha locks the new ideas that Kailas has brought from Punjab inside a cage.

Listening to the radio becomes a new sign of freedom in the life of Kailas's mother. She soon learns to tune in to the Darbhanga radio station and listens to folk songs. What Kailas brought into his mother's life was the possibility of transforming the world of her dreams into reality. She becomes attached to the radio, recalls the course of her entire life and acquires a new "self." When Kailas cannot repay the debt, the radio is seized, and her newly found personality is broken apart. Her heart breaks because her sense of freedom had been only temporary. Yet the story leaves a question at its end: who finally wins — the wealthy man's domineering conduct or the loving son's concern for his mother? When Kailas sees his mother coming into the field, he imagines the pain she will suffer when the radio passes into Baua Jha's possession. In Baua Jha's field, Kailas smashes the radio with his ploughman's staff. By destroying it, he saves his mother from grief and also makes Baua Jha understand that his identity can never be destroyed. Once the radio no longer belongs to him, he feels no attachment to it. He knows his mother is still attached to it. Philosophically, his act of breaking that attachment to an object marks his resistance to an unequal society.

These stories may be understood as reflections on the threats to equality. They are concerned with the national interest. All three are situated in villages, emphasising the interconnections between caste practices and rural life. While the narrator of "The Rainbow" remains neutral towards the caste system and does not resist the injustice happening before his eyes, Jawahar in "Anticurrent" relinquishes his fear of the upper castes and challenges them; and in "Kailas Mandal's Philips Radio," even after being defeated by Baua Jha, Kailas carries out his considered plan as a symbol of his resistance. Whereas "The Rainbow" presents a political setting and the oppression of members of both groups, "Anticurrent" and "Kailas Mandal's Philips Radio" depict the personal struggles of lower-caste individuals. Where collective violence characterises "The Rainbow," the other two stories expose violence created through speech, intimidation and the silencing of others. Enriched by mixed imagery and aspiring towards a new society, these stories sustain the mysterious and elusive character of Maithili literature.

Works Cited

Chaudhary, Prabhas Kumar. "The Rainbow." Translated by Rajanand Jha. Contemporary Maithili Short Stories. Edited by Murari Madhusudan Thakur. New Delhi: Sahitya Akademi, 2005. Print.

Jha, Ashok Kumar. "Anticurrent." Translated by Sanjeev Kumar Chaudhary. Contemporary Maithili Short Stories. Edited by Murari Madhusudan Thakur. New Delhi: Sahitya Akademi, 2005. Print.

Jha, Ramesh. "Kailash Mandal's Philips Radio." Translated by Bhairatweshwar Jha. Contemporary Maithili Short Stories. Edited by Murari Madhusudan Thakur. New Delhi: Sahitya Akademi, 2005. Print.

Rege, Sharmila. Writing Caste/Writing Gender: Narrating Dalit Women's Testimonies. New Delhi: Zubaan Books, 2013. E-book.

Velassery, Sebastian, and Reena Patra. Caste Identities and the Ideology of Exclusion: A Post-Script on the Humanization of Indian Social Life. California: Brown Walker Press, 2018. Print.

22. A Critical Theory of Dalit Literature for Maithili

Abstract

A critical theory of Dalit literature for Maithili, considered in the context of Gujarati, Odia and Telugu Dalit literature translated into Maithili. Translation from a parallel literary tradition has strengthened Maithili literature and brought about a fundamental structural change. Mainstream written literature in Maithili had been defined by a particular socio-religious conservatism, which privileged devotional writing, courtly luxury and ornamented expression while marginalising the realities of disadvantaged communities.

Keywords: Dalit · literary criticism · translation · doing · Videha · in Maithili · of literature

Abstract

A Critical Theory of Dalit Literature for Maithili

In the Context of Gujarati, Odia and Telugu Dalit Literature Translated into Maithili

Translations from a parallel literary tradition have strengthened Maithili literature and introduced a fundamental structural change. Mainstream written literature in Maithili had long been shaped by a particular socio-religious conservatism that gave priority to devotion, the pleasures of the court and ornate expression, while relegating the realities of marginalised communities to the periphery. Although Mithila's oral traditions had always kept alive the ballads of Dalit heroes such as Raja Salhes and Dina-Bhadri, Brahmanical dominance and the monopoly over literacy presented major obstacles to incorporating these traditions into formal written literature. The emergence of a specifically designated Dalit literature in Maithili is a relatively recent development, and translations from other regional languages have played an important role in it.

A Critical Theory of Dalit Literature for Maithili

In the Context of Gujarati, Odia and Telugu Dalit Literature Translated into Maithili

Translations from a parallel literary tradition have strengthened Maithili literature and brought about a fundamental structural transformation. Mainstream Maithili writing had been defined by a particular socio-religious conservatism that favoured devotion, courtly luxury and ornamental expression while pushing aside the realities of disadvantaged communities.

Although Mithila's oral tradition has always preserved folk ballads about Dalit heroes such as Raja Salhes and Dina-Bhadri, Brahmanical dominance and the monopoly over literacy posed major barriers to their entry into formal written literature. The advent of a dedicated Dalit literature in Maithili is comparatively recent, and translation from other regional languages has played a significant part in it. In particular, the efforts of the Videha movement have introduced powerful Dalit traditions from Telugu, Odia and Gujarati and helped fill a void in Maithili. They have given Maithili Dalit writers such as Sandeep Kumar Safi and Umesh Paswan a linguistic and ideological foundation for resistance and self-identity.

Historical Absence and the Structural Silence of Marginalised Communities

Until the end of the twentieth century, the absence of an organised written Dalit tradition in Maithili resulted not from any deficiency of creativity among the marginalised but from institutional exclusion. Historically, Maithil Brahmins and the Karna Kayastha community served as the principal custodians of the language; consequently, 'standard Maithili' was largely confined to their speech and cultural concerns. As a result of this dominance, the experiences of Mithila's Dalit communities were kept outside the sphere of literary consciousness.

The Limits of Maithili Oral Literature

Before modern Dalit prose and poetry emerged, the voices of the marginalised survived chiefly in folk ballads. Narratives concerning Raja Salhes, Naika Banjara and Bihula-Bishahari celebrate heroes who, despite belonging to lower castes, fought discrimination and exploitation. These traditions were culturally significant, but literary elites excluded them from the literary mainstream by dismissing them as 'rustic' or merely 'folk'.

Economic and educational conditions reinforced this structural silence. Sandeep Kumar Safi's autobiography shows that, for a Dalit family, manual labour for survival could be a more urgent necessity than education. Safi's parents belonged to the washerman caste and earned their livelihood by washing villagers' clothes, receiving grain or potatoes rather than cash. Such economic compulsion forced many Dalit children, including Safi, to leave school and migrate to cities such as Chandigarh or Bengaluru to work as labourers.

The Videha Movement and Translation as Democratic Intervention

The modern re-emergence of a Dalit voice in Maithili is linked to the digital and literary initiatives of the Videha movement. Maithili literature cannot mature until it acknowledges the full range of its linguistic experience. The absence of Dalit prose and poetry in Maithili therefore prompted a turn towards the literatures of other Indian languages.

The Mechanics of Cultural Translation

Within Videha, translation is not merely the substitution of words but a sociological act that connects forms of consciousness. Its purpose was to acquaint Maithili readers with an 'aesthetics of protest'. Works translated from Odia, Telugu and Gujarati supplied Maithili with a new vocabulary of resistance, free of the traditionally ornate and eroticised literary inheritance.

As the work of translators such as P. Jayalakshmi and K. Purushotham demonstrates, their task was to negotiate a balance between 'foreignisation' and 'domestication'. In translating the Telugu novel Jigiri (Friends Forever), the local flavour of Telangana's regional dialect and its Urdu–Telugu mixture was preserved so that the plurality of Dalit and nomadic experience could emerge distinctly.

A Comparative Perspective: Telugu Dalit Literature in Maithili

Telugu Dalit literature provided a powerful foundation for the Maithili translation project. The Telugu movement, which grew more militant after atrocities such as Karamchedu and Chundur in the 1980s, rejects traditional structures of domination.

Kolakaluri Enoch's 'Crow' (Kaki): An Aesthetics of Untouchability

In 'Crow', Enoch uses the crow as a symbol of the Dalit community. The protagonist, Bandodu, belongs to the Madiga caste and lives in acute deprivation. He can capture and eat a crow, a bird that society regards as inauspicious. The Maithili translation captures the very 'stench' of this existence and confronts the reader with extreme poverty and psychological torment.

Vinodini's 'Black Ink': The Stigma of Identity in the City

Vinodini's 'Black Ink' reveals the subtle workings of caste in modern urban India. A young girl, Shriya, records good things in her diary in blue ink and bad things in black. When she discovers that her friend is Dalit, the disgust that enters her behaviour demonstrates how caste stigma has already become lodged in a child's mind.

Pedditi Ashok Kumar's 'Friends Forever' (Jigiri): The Displacement of Nomadic Labour

The novel Jigiri recounts the suffering of the Kalandar community, which traditionally made a living by performing with dancing bears. When the government prohibited bear performances, the central character, Imam, was forced to choose whether to kill or abandon his bear, Shadul, in order to secure his son's future and obtain two acres of land. The story resonates with the suffering of displaced agricultural labourers in Mithila and the reality of traditional occupations disappearing.

Translated Resistance: Gujarati Dalit Poetry in Maithili

Influenced by Ambedkarite philosophy and the Marathi Dalit Panther movement, Gujarati Dalit poetry is known for its 'hard' and 'unpolished' character, a rough diamond. Its translation into Maithili created a literary terrain opposed to conventional poetic practice.

— Anish Garange's 'Poster': The poem shows how the Dalit body is used like a 'poster' for political advertising, while the individual remains invisible.

— Rajendra Vadel's 'Jeeta': Sexual exploitation is presented through the ironic word 'victory', portraying domination over Dalit women as a normalised violence within an upper-caste order.

— Umesh Solanki's 'People, Freeze': The poem depicts people becoming 'frozen' or inert in the coldness of social neglect.

The Emergence of Indigenous Maithili Dalit Voices

The most significant effect of these regional translations has been to confer recognition upon indigenous Dalit writing in Maithili. Umesh Paswan and Sandeep Kumar Safi are no longer isolated voices but part of a pan-Indian Dalit consciousness.

Umesh Paswan: Rural Reality and the Idea of the 'Criminal'

Umesh Paswan's story collection Mujrim ('Criminal') constitutes a form of 'moral testimony' to Dalit life in rural Mithila. He challenges the word 'criminal', showing how this designation is imposed upon the marginalised by structures of power and privilege. His story 'Sunanda' dramatises the struggle over education and social stigma, while 'Solkanma Pokhair' raises the question of Dalit exclusion from community resources. His poetry collection Varnit Ras examines Kosi floods, terrorism and the anger of youth from a Dalit perspective.

Sandeep Kumar Safi: Maithili's First Dalit Autobiography

Sandeep Kumar Safi's Baishakh Me Dalan Par marks a historical turning point in Maithili literature. According to Gajendra Thakur, Dalit autobiography had previously been entirely absent from Maithili, and this work fills that absence. Safi movingly describes his struggle, the hereditary labour of the washerman caste, and an accident in Chandigarh while working as a migrant labourer, when his leg caught fire.

Redefining Aesthetics: The Tenth and Eleventh Rasas

The arrival of Dalit voices has reconfigured Maithili aesthetics. Traditional rasa theory emphasised 'bliss', but Dalit critics propose rebellion and indignation as new rasas.

1. Art for Life's Sake: Literature is regarded as an instrument of social transformation.

2. The Tenth and Eleventh Rasas: There is a demand to add 'rebellion' and 'indignation' (a cry) to the traditional circle of rasas, so that writing by marginalised communities can be evaluated adequately.

3. Collective Experience: The suffering in Dalit literature is not merely individual; it is the collective anguish of a thousand years.

4. Authenticity of Speech: Instead of 'standard' Maithili, supposedly 'rustic' or naturally spoken language is employed to express the wounds inflicted upon marginalised communities authentically.

Conclusion: Towards a Pluralist Maithili Literature

Dalit literature translated into Maithili demonstrates that the language is entering a phase of democratic expansion. The historical absence of written Dalit voices was not the consequence of any lack of creativity but the result of exclusion by dominant groups. Through its translations of Dalit literature, the Videha movement has acted as a 'bridge' across that void.

These translations did not merely introduce stories from elsewhere. They supplied a comparative framework within which Umesh Paswan and Sandeep Kumar Safi could articulate their local experiences. Through digital archives and a redefinition of aesthetics, the contemporary Dalit movement is breaking the 'Brahmanical monopoly' over Maithili literature. Maithili is becoming not merely a language of the learned but a 'knowledge society' reflecting the full humanity and struggle embodied in its linguistic life.

2

The Development and Archival Significance of Translated Literature in Maithili: A Comprehensive Analysis of the Videha Movement

The literary landscape of Maithili, spoken by a large population of more than seventeen million people across northern Bihar, Jharkhand and Nepal's Terai, is undergoing a revolutionary transformation through the conjunction of digital technology and the translation movement. Historically, Maithili literature has been viewed from two distinct perspectives: the 'establishment' side, directed since 1965 by eminent institutions such as the Sahitya Akademi, and the 'parallel' tradition, which seeks to reclaim the language's democratic and popular roots. At the centre of this transformation stands the Videha movement, represented by the fortnightly e-journal Videha (ISSN 2229-547X) and its extensive digital archive. By assembling a parallel collection of original and translated works, the movement has challenged traditional dominance and established a global repository for Maithili's literary heritage. This report examines translated literature in Maithili while considering the movement's ideological foundations, technological methods and cultural consequences.

The Historical and Linguistic Context of the Maithili Translation Movement

To understand Maithili literature, one must understand when and how translation became an effective instrument of contemporary archival resistance. The language's earliest literary expression is found in the Charyapadas, composed in sandhya-bhasha between 700 and 1300 CE by Buddhist Siddha poets such as Luipada and Saraha. In an important scholarly intervention, the Videha movement distinguishes the celebrated composer of lyric sequences before Jyotirishwar, Vidyapati, from the Sanskrit and Avahatta writer Vidyapati Thakkur (1350–1435 CE). The movement argues that the establishment has restricted the poet Vidyapati's identity and suppressed his non-Brahmin and rebellious dimensions. In this context, translation is not simply linguistic practice but an ideological act of recovery. By translating the experiences of Dalits, women and communities pushed to the margins, the movement is restoring the 'beating human heart' to the centre of Maithili literature.

The Videha E-Journal and the Structure of the Digital Archive

Beginning in 2000 as Bhalsarik Gachh on Yahoo City, becoming a blog in 2004 and being reorganised as Videha in 2008, this journal represents one of the oldest continuous digital presences in Maithili literature. The journal has published 438 issues and has created a large digital archive called Videha Petar. The archive is organised into several 'Sadeh' (physical-format) volumes.

Classification of the Videha Archive and Translated Books

The architecture of the Videha archive demonstrates a systematic approach to literary preservation.

Archive/Volume — Subject — Description/Reference

Videha Sadeh 27 — Prose and poetry translated into Maithili from other languages — Issues 1–350; writings by Gajendra Thakur and Ravi Bhushan Pathak.

Videha Sadeh 28 — An extensive collection of translated prose and verse, including substantial novels — Focused on regional Indian and international writing.

Videha Sadeh 37 — A further volume of translated prose and poetry — Special emphasis on Telugu, Odia and Gujarati Dalit stories and verse; also includes Pedditi Ashok Kumar's Jigiri.

Gadya-Padya Bharati — Special translation issue — Issue 97; available in both Devanagari and Tirhuta scripts.

Maithili Books — A category of downloadable PDF books — Includes translations such as Purush Pariksha and Mohandas.

At the level of script, the movement facilitated digital publishing by bringing Mithilakshar (Tirhuta) into the Unicode standard. The archive also provides the first Maithili book in Braille and resources in Maithili sign language.

The Theory and Art of Translation

Translation into Maithili is informed by a sophisticated theoretical approach balancing cultural fidelity against linguistic accessibility. The Videha archive's essay 'The Art of Translation' explores this complexity.

Linguistic and Stylistic Methods

The concept of 'tone' is important in Maithili translation. Gajendra Thakur and other translators employ the following strategies:

1. Dynamic Equivalence: An effective translation communicates the impact of the source message to the heart of a Maithili reader.

2. Domestication versus Foreignisation: Certain works are adapted to the rural environment of Mithila (domestication), while in others the distinctive features of the source culture are preserved.

3. Paratextual Bridging: Footnotes and glossaries are used to explain cultural terms such as pua and panchali.

4. Collaborative Translation: Linguistic specialists and creative writers work together to capture geographical nuances and ritual practices.

A Case in Social History: The Translation of Jigiri

One of the Videha archive's significant projects is the Maithili translation, under the title Sada Lel Mitra (Friends Forever), of Pedditi Ashok Kumar's Telugu novel Jigiri. The novel is a social history of the Kalandar community, which earned a living through bear-dancing and snake-charming. After the introduction of wildlife protection legislation, the community faced an existential crisis. The Maithili translation presents its suffering with particular force through regional idioms and rural speech.

Regional and International Dimensions

— Pakhlo (Konkani): Translated by Dr Shambhu Kumar Singh, Tukaram Rama Shet's novel addresses the liberation struggle in Goa and the social identity of children of mixed ancestry.

— Chhinnamasta (Hindi): The translation of Prabha Khaitan's novel gives urban feminism and psychological realism a place in the Maithili archive.

— Bertolt Brecht (German): Translations of Brecht's plays introduced theoretical concepts such as 'alienation' into Maithili theatre.

— The Quran: A translation of the opening chapter, al-Fatiha, reflects Mithila's pluralist reality.

The Influence of Jagdish Prasad Mandal

The arrival of Jagdish Prasad Mandal through Videha was a decisive turning point for Maithili fiction. His novel Pangu (recipient of the 2021 Sahitya Akademi Award) and his short story 'Bisandh' portray rural struggles and the realities of the Musahar community without embellishment. Thakur's English translations of his writings, such as Struggles of Life, have carried the movement's moral voice to a global audience.

Conclusion

The translated literature of the Videha movement is among the most ambitious linguistic and archival projects in modern India. Through translation, the 'parallel history' movement corrects the establishment's narrative and preserves a line of democratic inheritance from the roots of the Charyapadas to contemporary Dalit consciousness. Through its commitment to this digital archive and the art of translation, Videha works to ensure that the 'soul of Mithila' remains alive and accessible to the world.

Linguistics, Grammar, Script and Vocabulary

23. A Parallel Grammar, Composition and Linguistics of Maithili

Abstract

A Parallel Grammar, Composition and Linguistics of Maithili (Including Thethi-Angika and Bajjika) — Gajendra Thakur. An integrated, extended critical research review. Grammar · Composition · Linguistics · Indian · Western · Israeli · Chinese · Tibetan · Japanese · Videha Parallel Perspective. Original work: Gajendra Thakur · Editor: Videha · ISSN 2229-547X.

Keywords: Maithili · parallel · grammar · composition · linguistics · critical theory · Maithili

A Parallel Grammar, Composition and Linguistics of Maithili (Including Thethi-Angika and Bajjika) — Gajendra Thakur: An Integrated, Extended Critical Research Review

Including Thethi-Angika and Bajjika

An Integrated, Extended Critical Research Review

Grammar · Composition · Linguistics · Indian · Western · Israeli · Chinese · Tibetan · Japanese · Videha Parallel Perspective

Original work: Gajendra Thakur · Editor: Videha · ISSN 2229-547X

A consolidated review of all four volumes, Chapters 1–926, appendices, evidentiary apparatus and bibliography

Review Method and Scope

This review takes the complete structure of the original book as its foundation. The work is divided into four main volumes: the grammar and composition of Thethi-Angika; the grammar and composition of Bajjika; Maithili grammar and composition; and the linguistics of Thethi-Angika, Bajjika and Maithili. The third volume extends from Chapters 21 to 693, and the fourth from Chapters 694 to 926. A consolidated bibliography appears at the end. The review examines each of these levels separately before arriving at an integrated conclusion.

Whenever the original book's assertions, examples, chapter arrangement and methodology are discussed, they are treated as belonging to the original work. Indian, Western, Israeli, Chinese, Tibetan and Japanese theories are employed as external comparative criteria; no claim is made that all these theories are necessarily expounded in the book itself. The expression 'Videha Parallel Criticism' is used to bring together the book's own parallel method—examining a single question across three languages, comparable data, source-supported assertions, fieldwork, corpora, reproducibility and editorial integrity—into an integrated critical form. It must not be taken as the name of an independently established external school.

The principal criteria for evaluating grammar are descriptive adequacy, morphological structure, syntax, meaning, usage, standardisation and linguistic diversity. For evaluating composition they are the organisation of subject matter, readership, style, rasa, dhvani, vakrokti, aucitya, argumentation, discourse, genre and editing. For evaluating linguistics they are evidence, reproducibility, fieldwork, acoustic measurement, corpora, sociolinguistics, historical comparison, typology and digital preservation.

Overall Assessment

This is not merely a book of 'grammar', but an ambitious attempt to bring together language teaching, compositional skills, editing, linguistic research, corpora, fieldwork, digital publication and the parallel study of three closely related linguistic traditions. Its true strength, therefore, is not simply 'breadth' but the connection between levels: it establishes a continuous pathway of study from words to sentences, sentences to discourse, discourse to society, society to history, and history to digital documentation.

A second distinctive feature is the presentation of Thethi-Angika and Bajjika not merely as appendages to Maithili, but as linguistic units possessing their own grammars, composition, standard and regional forms, exercises, vocabularies and linguistic descriptions. This structure matters for linguistic status and recognition. In a scholarly edition, however, claims concerning language status, genetic classification, regional boundaries, standard forms, phoneme inventories and history would require clearer indications of source level, number of speakers, place, date and type of evidence.

A third strength is the extraordinary extent of the composition sections. Essay, story, dialogue, letter, news, summary, translation, argument, review, speech, editorial, academic writing, style, meaning, pronunciation, editing, proofreading, page design and publication checks are all presented as practical skills. Here the book goes far beyond conventional school grammar.

The chief editorial difficulty is repetition and the overlap between levels. Thethi-Angika's first twenty chapters are followed by another extensive practical reference work; Bajjika's fourteen parts and appendices are followed by a further five-part practical presentation; Maithili's foundation in Chapters 21–43 is followed by the enormous extension through Chapters 44–693; and the linguistics section offers separate sequences on comparable topics for all three languages, then a combined sequence, then a parallel research workbook. All this material is useful; nevertheless, readers would have a lighter burden if a future edition used clear cross-references to distinguish first introductions, repetitions and advanced developments.

Extended Introduction and a Supplementary Outline of Seven Critical Perspectives

Introduction: The Purpose of the Book and Its Review

The book under review is no ordinary grammar. It is a large, four-volume compilation of approximately one hundred thousand words, bringing three closely related languages of the Magadhan group—Thethi-Angika, Bajjika and Maithili—under one roof and examining their grammar, art of composition and linguistics from a parallel perspective. Volume One presents Thethi-Angika grammar and composition (Chapters 1–20), based on the standard grammar by Dr Amarendra and Dr Abha Purve. Volume Two covers Bajjika grammar, a dictionary, and collections of idioms and proverbs. Volume Three offers an extended Maithili grammar and treatment of composition (Chapters 21–693). Volume Four (Chapters 694–926) places the linguistics of all three languages—from phonetics to typology, sociolinguistics, psycholinguistics and computational linguistics—within a shared research framework. A consolidated bibliography concludes the work.

A book of this kind cannot be assessed by merely counting merits and defects. Since its purposes span multiple traditions, its evaluation must also employ multiple traditions of criticism. Accordingly, I have taken seven perspectives as my basis: Indian, Western, Israeli, Chinese, Tibetan, Japanese and Videha Parallel. First, I shall offer a descriptive and evaluative examination of each volume, leaving no part aside; then I shall consider the book through all seven theoretical perspectives; finally, I shall discuss its strengths and limitations as a whole and its possible future directions.

The tone of this review will be respectful yet impartial. Wherever the book fulfils its declared aims, that achievement will be acknowledged plainly; wherever its structure, repetition or balance of evidence raises questions, those questions will be stated without hesitation. The duty of good criticism is not praise but judgment supported by evidence.

Review Method: A Brief Introduction to Seven Perspectives

A short introduction to the seven perspectives through which the book will be examined follows, so that readers can understand the framework of the subsequent discussion from the outset.

The Book's Structure, Experimental Outlook and Preliminary Evaluation

The present research review offers an exceptionally thorough, comprehensive and extended analysis of A Parallel Grammar, Composition and Linguistics of Maithili. This is not merely a conventional compendium of grammatical rules: it is a complete, authoritative and pioneering document of the sociolinguistic, typological and historical development of Maithili, Thethi-Angika and Bajjika. Alongside structural analysis, the report examines intricate questions in linguistics through universal principles of Indian, Western, Israeli, Chinese, Tibetan, Japanese and Videha Parallel criticism. Written from a specialist perspective, it omits no volume and considers each linguistic possibility in detail.

Principal Subject, Structure and Experimental Outlook of the Book

The book rejects the traditional method of memorising grammatical rules and instead stresses 'functional distribution' and laboratory-based study. It presents a parallel examination of the grammar and composition of Maithili, Thethi-Angika and Bajjika, and is divided principally into four volumes and numerous extended chapters.

Volume 1 (Thethi-Angika: Grammar and Composition): Chapters 1–20 provide a detailed account of language, sounds, word forms, sentence structure and the art of composition. Emphasis falls on practical usage, and regional forms are preserved alongside standard forms.

Volume 2 (Bajjika: Grammar and Composition): This volume analyses grammatical rules and usage through a structure built around appendices.

Volume 3 (Maithili: Grammar and Composition): Chapters 21–693 provide a complete treatment of standard Maithili grammar, morphology, phonology and syntax.

Volume 4 (Linguistics: Thethi-Angika, Bajjika and Maithili): Chapters 694–926 present experimental frameworks for modern branches of linguistics, including typology, psycholinguistics, dialectometry, historical linguistics and sociolinguistics.

The book's most distinctive feature is that every theory is accompanied by a 'source-backed example bank' and laboratory exercises. The inclusion in

Chapters 888–908 of advanced topics such as language attitudes, standardisation, sound change, grammaticalisation and bilingual word recognition demonstrates that the book is based upon international research standards.

Seven Perspectives for the Critical Examination of Language

Critical tradition	Principal standards applied in this perspective
Indian	Pāṇinian economy of grammatical rules; phonetic precision of Prātiśākhya and Śikṣā; Bhartṛhari's sphoṭa and indivisibility of the sentence; Mīmāṃsā's authority of verbal testimony; the definitional rigour of Navya-Nyāya; and the compositional perspectives of rasa, dhvani and vakrokti.
Western	Saussure's langue/parole and synchronic/diachronic distinction; Bloomfieldian descriptivism; Chomskyan structure; Greenberg's typological universals; Hallidayan functionalism; corpus and contrastive analysis; and the theory of pedagogical grammar.
Israeli	Ghil'ad Zuckermann's revival linguistics and theory of hybrid languages; the language-standardisation model of the Academy of the Hebrew Language; and revitalisation of dead or endangered languages.
Chinese	The philological tradition of Xiǎoxué (小學) and Shuōwén Jiězì; the first modern grammar model of Mǎshì Wéntōng; and analysis of classifiers (量詞) and topic-prominent syntax.
Tibetan	Thonmi Sambhota's Sumchupa and codification of the script; zhe-sa (ཞེ་ས), the register of respect; ergative case marking; and standardisation through Buddhist translation.
Japanese	Kokugogaku (国語学); Tokieda's language-process theory; the keigo (敬語) system of respect; the lexical strata of wago, kango and gairaigo; and topic–comment structure.
Videha parallel perspective	Counter-canon; democratic language rights; recovery of suppressed, folk, women's and Dalit voices; a parallel-history framework; and decentralisation of institutional authority.

Part I — Seven Criteria of Theory

1. The Indian Perspective: From Pāṇini to Poetics

The first criterion of the Indian grammatical tradition is 'morphological precision'. The Pāṇinian tradition approaches the interrelationships among sounds, roots, affixes, transformations and rules in a highly organised way. From this perspective, the book's chapters on word formation, prefixes and suffixes, participial derivatives, compounds, cases, verbal forms and morphophonology move in an appropriate direction. Yet the Pāṇinian criterion does not mean simply imposing Sanskrit categories. The fundamental question is how the actual morphological behaviour of Maithili, Thethi-Angika and Bajjika may be expressed through a minimum number of clear and testable rules. When the advanced sections of the book insist upon seeking data, exceptions, regional forms and counterexamples, they approach Pāṇinian subtlety in its modern sense.

Patañjali's tradition of commentary establishes a dialogue between the application of rules, current usage and cultivated speech. Judged by this criterion, the book's policy on 'standard versus regional forms' is useful but must be applied with care. Rather than merely declaring a form 'incorrect', its social domain, register, speaker group and written or spoken context should be specified. This orientation is already present in the book's sociolinguistic sections; the same sensitivity should be maintained consistently in its introductory grammatical chapters.

Bhartṛhari's view of the sentence does not regard meaning as a mere addition of individual words. The book's extended discussion of sentences, expectancy, semantic compatibility, syntactic connectedness, word order, subordinate clauses, information structure, context and discourse can be read fruitfully through this broader understanding of sentential meaning. In particular, sentence types from Chapter 161 onward, clauses from Chapter 204, meaning from Chapter 436, and semantics, pragmatics and discourse from Chapter 878 form a journey 'from words to sentential meaning'.

Four criteria from Indian poetics are especially useful for the composition sections: rasa, the experiential effect of a work; dhvani, the suggested meaning beyond its explicit sense; vakrokti, a distinctive inflection of expression; and aucitya, the appropriateness of subject, character, occasion, language and style. The book teaches metre and figures of speech separately. Yet if the advanced composition chapters linked rasa, dhvani, vakrokti and aucitya to actual examples of stories, dialogue, essays, criticism, speeches and editorials, literary theory could become an integral element of practical writing.

2. The Western Perspective: Structure, Function, Usage and Evidence

The first important criterion of modern Western linguistics is descriptiveness. Saussure's structural perspective locates the value of a linguistic unit in its relations to other units; the Bloomfieldian tradition emphasises the concrete description of distribution and form; the Chomskyan tradition raises questions about the internal structure of sentences, dependencies and generative rules; and Halliday emphasises function, text and social meaning. All four kinds of question appear at different levels of the book: word classes and morphology; word order and clauses; information structure; register, readership and purpose.

Labov's sociolinguistic perspective is especially relevant here because regional forms, standardisation, speaker identity and variation are important in both Thethi-Angika and Bajjika. The spirit of the advanced chapters—'variation is itself data'—accords with this tradition. A future edition would strengthen its social explanations by indicating speakers' ages, locations, education, register, medium and context alongside each variant.

The pragmatics of Austin and Grice distinguishes a sentence's literal meaning from the social action performed by speaking it. Discussions of commands, requests, respect, questions, indications, particles, forms of address, speaker–listener relationships and indirect utterances can be particularly enriched by this perspective. Thethi-Angika's listener-sensitive verbal forms and Maithili's levels of honorification illustrate cases in which tables of tense and person alone are insufficient: social action and participation must also be examined.

Greenbergian typology and modern cross-linguistic comparison are natural extensions of the book's parallel sections. Yet it would be inappropriate to assume that 'one language equals one fixed type'. Features such as word order, case markers, auxiliary verbs, classifiers, plurals and honorification may have different values. Chapters 814–826 are among the book's strongest sections in advancing this precise form of parallel methodology.

3. The Israeli Perspective: Polysystems, Norms and Transfer

In the context of Israeli literary studies, two particularly useful approaches are the polysystem theory associated with the Tel Aviv scholar Even-Zohar and Gideon Toury's descriptive translation studies. The polysystem perspective does not regard literature and linguistic forms as isolated, singular units, but as part of a network of mutually competing and cooperating systems. This outlook is useful for discussing contact among Maithili, Thethi-Angika, Bajjika, Hindi, Sanskrit, Urdu and English—particularly lexical borrowing, standardisation, technical vocabulary, translation and changes of style.

Toury's perspective on 'norms' asks which forms a real speech community regards as acceptable, prestigious, formal, informal or regional. When the book chooses one principal written form and classifies others as regional, it is making not only a grammatical decision but a decision about social norms. Each act of standardisation consequently requires evidence: published usage, speaker interviews, geographical distribution, teaching traditions or institutional practice.

In the book's later chapters on translation and structural transfer, the Israeli descriptive perspective is especially valuable. The naturalness of the target language, its generic traditions, readers' expectations and local stylistic norms must be distinguished from the structure of the source language. Comparison with English is useful in this sense, but English structure should not be treated as the ultimate standard.

4. The Chinese Perspective: Systematic Grammar, Speech and Compositional Design

Three distinct criteria can be drawn from Chinese traditions. First, early modern grammatical enterprises such as Ma Jianzhong's Mashi Wentong demonstrate that traditional linguistic material can be organised through new analytical methods, but that uncritically imposing external categories entails risks. Measured against this criterion, the book's parallel comparisons with English are useful only when they clarify the indigenous structures of Maithili, Thethi-Angika and Bajjika, not when they force those languages into an English mould.

Second, the tradition represented by Yuen Ren Chao's extensive descriptions of spoken Chinese places living speech, tone, sentence patterns, particles, context and usage at the centre of inquiry. The book's emphasis on fieldwork, natural texts, recordings, interviews, folk narratives, digital messages and corpora is highly compatible with this outlook. Its scientific value would increase if the introductory grammar chapters also included samples of spoken usage, audio recordings and information about speakers alongside written forms.

Third, the tradition of Liu Xie's Wenxin Diaolong views feeling, arrangement, genre, verbal force, ornament and coherence of the complete work as interrelated dimensions of composition. From this perspective, the greatest merit of the book's composition sections is that they do not merely instruct the learner to 'write an essay'; they integrate delimitation of the subject, a central proposition, paragraph coherence, argument, evidence, editing, style and readership. More systematic exercises in emotion, rhythm, imagery and suggested meaning could be added to this framework for literary composition.

5. The Tibetan Perspective: Relational Grammar and the Transmission of Knowledge

The Tibetan grammatical tradition developed through a dialogue between the reception of Sanskrit grammar and indigenous analysis. Discussions of traditional texts such as Sum-cu-pa and Rtags-kyi-'jug-pa frequently concern particles, case-like relationships, syntactic functions and correct usage. From this perspective, the book's analyses of postpositions, particles, cases, address, honorification, sentence relationships and linking forms are of particular importance.

The Tibetan example offers another significant critical lesson: the adoption of an external grammatical tradition of high prestige should not entail reshaping the structure of a local language. The book employs Sanskrit-derived terms such as noun, pronoun, case, compound, participial derivative and figure of speech. These are convenient for teaching, but a modern analysis must make clear which categories belong to inherited pedagogical conventions and which are established by direct linguistic evidence.

From the standpoint of transmitting knowledge, the attempts to develop common technical terminology, interlinear explanation, transliteration and bilingual vocabulary across the three languages are commendable. They can become not simply word lists but instruments for carrying a linguistic knowledge tradition to succeeding generations, researchers and digital media.

6. The Japanese Perspective: Particles, Relationships, Process and Textual Practice

In Japanese grammar, the teniwoha tradition has long accorded importance to particles and syntactic relations in poetry and prose alike. Motoori Norinaga's analyses of particle relations and relational notions such as kakari-musubi show how even a small particle can alter a sentence's information structure, emphasis and relationships. A more detailed study of the particles, postpositions, interrogative particles, emphatic forms and modes of address found in Maithili, Thethi-Angika and Bajjika becomes possible through this perspective.

Tokieda Motoki's language-process perspective can be understood as treating language not merely as a finished object, but as an act of expression occurring between speaker and listener. Thethi-Angika's listener-sensitive verbs, Maithili's levels of respect, Bajjika's forms of address, dialogue composition and the chapters on discourse have particular significance here. Grammar must not ask only 'Who said it?' It must also ask 'To whom, in what relationship, in what circumstances, and in what form was it said?' All four questions belong within grammar.

Japanese traditions also offer a lesson for composition: fine distinctions in particles, pauses, ordering and indirectness alter the reader's experience. The book's chapters on style, rhythm, sentence length, information structure, punctuation and editing could turn this sensitivity into systematic exercises.

7. The Videha Parallel Perspective: The Book's Own Critical Method

The book's most original possibility lies in the word 'parallel'. Parallel study means not treating the three languages as distorted versions of one another or as rungs on a hierarchy, but as independent linguistic systems that answer the same research questions. The method in Chapter 814—comparability, source-supported assertions, minimum parallel samples and research ethics—and that of Chapter 825—the same questions across all three languages, semantic elicitation, judgments of naturalness and control of translation effects—together provide the foundation of this approach.

Ten criteria may be proposed for Videha Parallel criticism: (1) equal status for all three languages; (2) a shared research question; (3) comparable but locally natural data; (4) a source for every example; (5) metadata on speaker, place, time and genre; (6) separate marking of standard and regional forms; (7) explicit levels of disagreement or uncertainty; (8) verification through corpora, recordings and fieldwork; (9) control of translator or researcher influence; and (10) preservation of facts and authorial intentions in editing.

Judged by these criteria, the opening sections of the book are strong as teaching materials. Yet the rigorous evidentiary methods developed in its advanced sections should also be brought back to bear upon the introductory grammar tables and linguistic claims. The most important editorial task for a future edition would be this 'retrospective verification'.

An Extended Theoretical Supplement on Seven Traditions

Theoretical Criticism in the Light of Seven Traditions

The book will now be examined from the seven perspectives proposed at the beginning. In each subsection, the foundational principles of the tradition will first be stated briefly, followed by a dialogue with particular features of the book—showing both where the book meets that tradition's criteria and where further possibilities remain.

The Indian Critical Tradition

Indian reflection on language is among the oldest and most subtle intellectual traditions in the world. Five of its pillars are relevant to the evaluation of this book: Pāṇinian grammar; the phonetics of the Prātiśākhyas and Śikṣā texts; Bhartṛhari's Vākyapadīya (sphoṭa and the indivisibility of the sentence); the Mīmāṃsā doctrine of the validity of verbal testimony; and Navya-Nyāya's scrutiny of definitions. To these must be added the compositional perspectives of rasa, dhvani and vakrokti.

The Pāṇinian perspective: The spirit of Pāṇini's Aṣṭādhyāyī lies in economy (lāghava) and fidelity to rules: the derivation of the maximum number of forms from a minimum number of sūtras. The book under review stands at the opposite pole. It is a work of expansion (vistara), not economy. This is not a fault, but a difference of purpose: the Aṣṭādhyāyī addresses the accomplished grammarian, whereas this book is intended for general instruction. Nevertheless, a Pāṇinian virtue is evident. The book approaches the derivation of forms through suffixes, as in its summaries of personal verb endings and its treatment of nominal cases and postpositions. This is a modern pedagogical transformation of Pāṇini's distinction between stem and suffix (prakṛti and pratyaya). Where the Aṣṭādhyāyī derives forms through the logic of internal and external operations (antaraṅga–bahiraṅga) and general rule and exception (utsarga–apavāda), this book proceeds through tables and examples. Both seek the same end: the systematic presentation of rules.

The Prātiśākhya–Śikṣā perspective: Indian phonetics—its distinctions of place, articulatory effort and instrument, its udātta, anudātta and svarita accents, and its treatment of continuous recitation and sandhi—constitutes the world's earliest scientific examination of speech sounds. The book's chapters on sounds, including places of articulation, aspirated and unaspirated consonants, nasalisation, apinihiti and abhiśruti, inherit this tradition. Their distinctive quality is the connection they establish between Prātiśākhya classification and modern phonetics: the International Phonetic Alphabet (IPA), voice onset time (VOT), spectrograms and minimal pairs. Its attention to Maithili-specific phonological processes such as apinihiti and abhiśruti demonstrates that it has not abandoned the indigenous phonetic tradition.

The Bhartṛhari perspective: The theory of sphoṭa in the Vākyapadīya holds that the actual bearer of meaning is not an assemblage of separate phonemes, but the indivisible sentence-sphoṭa: meaning manifests itself in a whole. Seen in this light, the strongest parts of the book are those that move beyond the analysis of separate constituents towards the wholeness of the sentence and discourse. These include its treatment of information structure, 'the centre of what is being said', and pronoun omission in discourse contexts. Maithili's multidimensional verb agreement is itself a living illustration of Bhartṛhari's view that the sentence is an indivisible unit: the verb form expresses not merely the properties of a single word, but the structure of social relationships throughout the sentence.

The Mīmāṃsā and Navya-Nyāya perspectives: Mīmāṃsā treats verbal testimony as intrinsically valid and recognises authoritative utterance and perception among the sources of knowledge. The book's tripartite classification—'supported by a source text / descriptive tendency / hypothesis'—is a modern counterpart to Mīmāṃsā–Nyāya's discrimination of evidence. It asks which statement rests on observed data, which on an authoritative statement or source note, and which is only a provisional inference or hypothesis. Judged by Navya-Nyāya's insistence on rigorous definitions—free from under-extension, over-extension and impossibility—the book's terminological glossary and fivefold distinction between 'form / function / meaning / usage / distribution' are sound. These five levels prevent the reader from making the overgeneralisation that words looking alike must perform the same function. The author's command of the Navya-Nyāya tradition of Gaṅgeśa is thus indirectly productive here.

The perspectives of rasa, dhvani and vakrokti: These are instruments of literary criticism and cannot be applied directly to a grammar book. Their seeds are nevertheless present in its section on the art of composition, which discusses poetic language, metre, figures of speech and 'effective sentences'. Its chapter on figures of speech reaches distinctions between verbal and semantic figures and the four components of simile. It does not, however, offer an extensive discussion of dhvani theory—suggested or manifested meaning. That is natural: this is a pedagogical grammar, not a treatise on poetics. A future connection between the composition section and a dhvani- and vakrokti-centred method of criticism drawn from the Videha tradition would give it greater literary depth.

The Western Critical Tradition

The framework of modern linguistics, which the book itself adopts, is Western in origin. The dialogue with this tradition is therefore the most direct.

The Saussurean perspective: Three of Ferdinand de Saussure's fundamental distinctions—langue and parole, the arbitrariness of the sign, and synchronic and diachronic study—are explicitly accepted in the book. In its introduction it states, 'The sign is arbitrary … therefore Maithili gāch, Bajjika gāch/peṛ and Angika gāch are equally valid.' This is a thoroughly Saussurean position. On that basis the book gives linguistic substance to the egalitarian principle that 'no language is inferior'. It also respects the synchronic–diachronic distinction by treating most matters synchronically and reserving historical and comparative study for a separate section.

The Bloomfieldian perspective: The maxim of American descriptivism, associated with Leonard Bloomfield, is to describe rather than pass judgment, and to establish morphemes and phonemes through distribution. The descriptive tone of the book and its use of minimal pairs to establish phonemic distinctions are unmistakably Bloomfieldian. Its recognition of 'distribution' as a separate level within 'form / function / meaning / usage / distribution' is a direct adaptation of the Bloomfieldian distributional method.

The Chomskyan perspective: The tests of generative grammar are a set of rules able to generate grammatical sentences and exclude ungrammatical ones—generativity—and an account of innate linguistic competence. The book is principally descriptive and pedagogical; it therefore does not formulate a full system of generative rules. Nevertheless, its syntax chapters introduce the concepts of constituency, dependency, valency and argument structure in a form suitable for teaching. The absence of fully formalised Chomskyan rewrite rules and trees is not a deficiency in this context. It is a decision consonant with the book's purpose.

The Greenbergian typological perspective: Joseph Greenberg's word-order universals associate subject–object–verb (SOV) languages with postpositions and head-final structures. By identifying all three languages as SOV, postpositional and head-final, the book directly examines Greenbergian correlations. Its separate chapters on word-order typology, case alignment, agreement typology, and head versus dependent marking provide supporting evidence. This situates the work within the worldwide map of linguistic typology.

Hallidayan functionalism and the corpus perspective: M. A. K. Halliday's systemic functional linguistics (SFL) understands language as a network of choices for making meaning and places register and discourse at its centre. The book's chapters on register, code-switching, diglossia, cohesion and coherence, and conversation analysis are functionalist in orientation. It does more than accept corpus linguistics. By prescribing minimum corpus procedures such as 'three speakers × twenty words' and 'twenty minutes of conversation', it offers an unusual methodological contribution to the study of languages in the Bihari subgroup.

Contrastive analysis and pedagogical grammar: Contrastive linguistics attempts to predict errors by identifying structural differences between a speaker's first language and the language being learned. By repeatedly including chapters on 'structural comparison with English' and on 'avoiding Hindi influence', the book makes contrastive method a teaching instrument. This is its most original application of a Western framework. There is, however, a limitation: the contrastive hypothesis has been partly revised in modern second-language acquisition theory, since not every error arises from interference between languages. The pedagogical side would be more balanced if the book incorporated contemporary error analysis and interlanguage theory.

The Israeli Critical Tradition

Modern Israeli linguistic thought is the theoretical consequence of a unique experiment: the revival of Hebrew, which had become almost extinct as a spoken language. Three ideas from that tradition have particular relevance to this book.

The Zuckermann perspective (revival linguistics): Ghil'ad Zuckermann argues that a 'revived' language never returns in an original, entirely pure form. It is necessarily a hybrid, marked by the first languages of those who revive it. This perspective has revolutionary relevance to the Videha project. Maithili, Angika and Bajjika are not dead, but they are endangered and overshadowed by Hindi. The book's repeated injunctions—'avoid Hindi influence' and 'pure Thethi is free from the stain of Hindi'—occupy the opposite pole from Zuckermann's awareness of linguistic hybridity. Where Zuckermann says that hybridity is inevitable and must be accepted, the book advocates 'purification'. This tension is among the most interesting questions in the review, and it is not a simple, one-sided fault. Language planning has two legitimate goals: purism and the documentation of actual usage. The book pursues both—purification in its grammatical sections and description of living usage in its linguistic sections. But a Zuckermannian question remains. If forms labelled a 'stain of Hindi' have been part of a speech community's living practice for decades, are they impurities or expressions of natural linguistic development? An explicit theoretical answer in a later edition—why purify, how far, and within what limits—would strengthen the work.

The Hebrew Academy perspective (a model of standardisation): Modern Hebrew was standardised through a central institution, the Academy of the Hebrew Language, which makes decisions on the formation of words, orthography and terminology. The book's insistence on a style sheet, a terminological glossary and 'one principal term for one concept' parallels this institutional model. Videha is effectively acting as an informal language academy. The Hebrew experience suggests that standardisation succeeds only when prescription also obtains acceptance from the community. The book's accessibility to learners and its extensive exercises are therefore essential to that acceptance.

The relexicalisation perspective: Hebrew revival gave old words new meanings as part of a process of renewal. The terminology developed in this book—for example, rendering English linguistic terms by Sanskrit-derived Maithili forms such as svana-vijñāna (phonetics), svanima-vijñāna (phonemics), rūpa-vijñāna (morphology) and prayoga-vijñāna (pragmatics)—is a comparable process of relexicalisation. This Sanskrit-based vocabulary equips Maithili for modern intellectual discourse and constitutes a successful adaptation of the Israeli model.

The Chinese Critical Tradition

Chinese thought on language follows two streams: an ancient indigenous tradition of xiǎoxué and lexicography, and a modern, Western-influenced tradition represented by the Mashi Wentong model. Both are relevant to the book.

The xiǎoxué and Shuowen perspective (lexicography): In the Chinese tradition of 小學 (xiǎoxué, 'minor learning'), particularly in the 說文解字 (Shuowen Jiezi), it was central to arrange words according to form, sound and meaning. The book's extensive lexicographic appendices—a Bajjika–Hindi dictionary, a terminological dictionary and a glossary—belong to a comparable lexicon-centred tradition. Chinese experience teaches that dictionaries are not merely appendices: they are fundamental to language preservation. The book has absorbed this principle.

The Mashi Wentong perspective (the first-grammar model): In 1898 Ma Jianzhong (馬建忠) produced the Mashi Wentong (馬氏文通), the first systematic Chinese grammar, by applying Western, especially Latin, grammatical categories to Chinese. Both its success and the criticisms levelled against it are instructive. It brought Chinese into the discourse of modern grammar, but Latin categories did not always fit the language's own character. The book under review occupies a comparable historical moment for Angika, Bajjika and Maithili: in some respects this is their 'Mashi Wentong moment'. Yet it recognises the danger inherent in Ma's approach. It repeatedly warns that 'technical terms should be instruments of analysis, not moulds imposed upon the language'. Western categories are thus treated as tools to be tested rather than schemes to be forced upon the evidence. This is a mature and self-critical version of the Mashi Wentong model.

The classifier and topic-prominence perspectives: Two major contributions of Chinese linguistics—the extensive analysis of classifiers (量詞, measure words) and the Li–Thompson distinction between topic-prominent and subject-prominent languages—apply directly to this book. Classifier systems are alive in all three languages: Maithili ṭā/goṭā, Bajjika go and Angika go. The book gives them a separate chapter, an entirely appropriate choice from a Chinese perspective, since classifier systems are a typological feature shared by South and East Asian languages. This connects all three languages to the worldwide distribution of classifier languages, including Chinese. The chapter on 'the centre of what is being said / information structure' likewise suggests that the topic has a special place in the word order of these languages. Further use of Chinese topic–comment analysis would be a productive direction for future work.

The Tibetan Critical Tradition

The Tibetan linguistic tradition is a remarkable example of conscious, state-sponsored creation of a script and grammar, and it enters into a profound dialogue with the book under review.

The Thonmi Sambhoṭa perspective (codifying a script): According to the tradition discussed here, Thonmi Sambhoṭa created the Tibetan script and its first grammars, the Sumcupa and Tagkijugpa, in the seventh century—a deliberate programme of language engineering from above. The Videha project, and particularly this book's appendix on Tirhuta script and its discussion of Unicode preservation, are modern echoes of that tradition. A script is not merely an instrument of writing but a symbol of cultural and political self-determination. Just as Thonmi furnished Tibetan with a distinct script founded upon the Indian Brahmi tradition, the book reconnects Maithili with its own Tirhuta script, offering Devanagari–Tirhuta character tables and practical routes towards Unicode preservation. This is an important civilisational step.

The zhe sa perspective (honorific register): One of Tibetan's most distinctive features is zhe sa (ཞེ་ས), a developed honorific register employing different words and verb forms for ordinary and respectful reference. This is precisely an area in which the three languages discussed here are distinctive among the world's languages. Maithili's multidimensional agreement—'देखलिऐ' as against 'देखलियनि'—Bajjika's use of तूँ/rāuā to convey degrees of respect, and Angika's contrast of inī/hinī/hunī belong to a related family of phenomena and are, in some respects, even more complex. The book's detailed treatment of honorification is entirely justified from a Tibetan perspective. A grammar that relegates honorific systems to a secondary place in such languages would miss something essential to them. This book does not.

The ergative and translation-standardisation perspectives: Tibetan is a language with ergative–absolutive alignment, and during the Buddhist translation era its terminology was systematically standardised from Sanskrit, as exemplified by the Mahāvyutpatti lexicon. When the book gives chapters to case marking, alignment and differential marking, it raises precisely the typological questions needed to understand Tibetan-type systems. Differential object marking ('कँ') and the absence of a subject marker in certain Maithili and related constructions ('subjects without ne') are living questions of alignment typology. The book takes their study as far as a typological coding sheet. The Tibetan experience of standardising translated terminology teaches the importance of terminological stability —one term for one meaning—as the foundation of a durable textual tradition. The book deliberately pursues that aim through 'terminological consistency'.

The Japanese Critical Tradition

Japanese kokugogaku (国語学, the study of the national language) combines indigenous and modern linguistics, Western methods and Japanese-specific structures. Three of its concepts are relevant here.

The Tokieda perspective (the language-process theory): Tokieda Motoki's (時枝誠記) gengo-katei-setsu treats language not as a static object but as a living process of the speaker. In particular, it distinguishes shi (concept-centred, objective words) from ji (speaker-oriented words expressing feeling, such as particles and honorific forms). This view enters into a profound dialogue with the book's treatment of particles, forms of respect and 'the centre of what is being said'. Honorific suffixes and sentence-final particles in Maithili, Bajjika and Angika—for example, Bajjika nī and Maithili affective particles—illustrate Tokieda's category of ji. They do not primarily designate objects; they indicate the speaker's social and emotional position. If the book explicitly classified such forms as speaker-centred in Tokieda's sense, its account of honorification would become more theoretically developed.

The keigo perspective (honorific system): Japanese keigo (敬語) is among the world's most systematic systems of respectful language, distinguishing sonkeigo (respectful language), kenjōgo (humble language) and teineigo (polite language). From the perspective of keigo, one of the book's greatest contributions becomes clear. It does not limit honorification in the three languages to a simple opposition between 'तूँ' and 'अहाँ'. It presents multiple levels—ordinary, respectful and highly respectful—and, in Maithili, a triangular honorific relationship involving subject and object. The complexity recalls keigo. Japanese experience also shows how difficult honorific systems are to teach. Consequently, the book's many honorific-centred exercises, including elicitation across 'ten social situations × three speakers', are pedagogically appropriate.

The wago, kango and gairaigo, and topic–comment perspectives: The stratification of Japanese vocabulary into wago (native words), kango (Chinese-derived vocabulary, comparable to learned tatsama words) and gairaigo (Western loanwords) parallels the South Asian distinction between tadbhava, tatsama and borrowings. The book's classification of words by origin—tatsama, tadbhava, indigenous and foreign—is the Indian form of this stratified approach, and the Japanese experience situates it globally. The well-known Japanese contrast between the topic particle wa (は) and the subject particle ga (が) likewise provides a strong comparative model for the book's account of information structure. A full application of this model remains an opportunity for the future.

The Videha Parallel Critical Tradition

Finally, we come to the perspective native to the book itself: the critical tradition of the Videha parallel literary movement. This is a counter-canonical perspective that challenges the centralisation of literary and linguistic authority, restores suppressed folk, women's and Dalit voices to history, and uses a parallel-history framework to construct alternatives to institutional narratives.

Seen from within this tradition, the book's deepest meaning becomes apparent. First, 'parallel' has two meanings here. On the one hand it denotes linguistic parallelism or contrastive comparison; on the other, the parallel canon associated with the Videha movement. By placing three neglected people's languages—Angika, Bajjika and Maithili—on the same platform, according them equal dignity and examining them with the same method, the book makes a democratic declaration of linguistic equality. Saussure's argument that 'no language is inferior' provides its theoretical basis; Videha supplies its political impetus. To place Maithili alongside Angika and Bajjika, rather than above them, is itself a counter-canonical act that rejects a hierarchy of languages.

Second, the book's policy of giving priority to indigenous and folk forms over Hindi-influenced urban forms is a direct application of Videha's commitment to recovering suppressed popular voices. Where institutional standardisation commonly elevates urban elite varieties into 'standards', the book places rural and popular forms at the centre of its evidence and reverses the direction of standardisation. This is a methodological signature of Videha parallel history.

Third, the book's dictionary of Bajjika proverbs, references to Angika oral narratives and documentation of idioms are part of Videha's recovery of folk knowledge. Here, however, the Videha perspective calls for an internal criticism of its own. If the movement is committed to women's voices, then its recording of patriarchal proverbs about women should be accompanied by a critical framework that reflects that commitment. This is not an accusation against the book but a suggestion intended to preserve the internal consistency of the Videha position.

Fourth, the book's 'zero-fabrication policy'—no invented forms, and every assertion supported by a source or explicitly identified as a hypothesis—resolves the apparent tension between authenticity and institutional authority within the Videha movement. The movement rejects institutional authority, but not evidential validity. On the contrary, it makes evidence the foundation of a new claim to legitimacy. This is what prevents the book from becoming unscientific even as it constructs a counter-canon. It is the most mature achievement of Videha criticism: a counter-canon that does not abandon evidence.

An Extended Supplementary Discussion of Typology, Navya-Nyāya and Universal Literary Theory

Linguistic Typology and Western and Indian Grammatical Theory

Chapter 706 of the book makes a parallel comparison of Maithili, Thethi-Angika, Bajjika and English under the heading of linguistic typology. By the standards of world linguistics, this comparison establishes that the three related languages represent a distinctive subdivision, of Magadhan descent, within the Indo-Aryan language family.

Yogendra P. Yadava's Government-and-Binding Theory and Hierarchy

At the level of syntax, the book draws upon the research of the distinguished linguist Yogendra P. Yadava. Yadava applied Noam Chomsky's Government-and-Binding (GB) theory to Maithili sentence structure. Verb agreement in Maithili and its related languages is more complex than in any other Indo-Aryan language in the world. Besides the subject, an object, an indirect object or even certain 'prominent internal possessors' (PIPs) outside the immediate sentence may govern the form of a verb.

Yadava's analysis makes clear that this elaborate agreement is not an arbitrary set of grammatical rules, but rests upon two major sociolinguistic principles of Maithil society. First, the principle of social hierarchy, or 'face', marks a person's rank, dignity and the respect due to them. Second, the principle of social solidarity, or empathy, translates the psychological relationship between speaker and hearer—closeness or distance—into verbal suffixes.

Allocutive Agreement and Portmanteau Forms

In the light of the Western Minimalist Program and the theory of the Left Periphery, Preeti Kumari's research demonstrates a complementarity between allocutive agreement and object agreement in Maithili, particularly the Darbhanga variety.

When a speaker marks respect for the addressee on the verb—allocutivity—the effect is realised in FinP (the Finiteness Phrase), or the c-head. When the Fin head undertakes 'upward Agree' for the hearer, it cannot simultaneously undertake 'downward Agree' to indicate respect towards the object. This portmanteau honorific agreement shows that the social hierarchy of the Maithili–Bajjika family reaches the highest points—the 'treetops'—of the syntactic tree.

A Typological Comparison with English

Typological feature	Maithili, Thethi-Angika and Bajjika	English (for Western comparison)
Basic word order	Subject–Object–Verb (SOV)	Subject–Verb–Object (SVO)
Adpositions	Postpositions, following the noun	Prepositions, preceding the noun
Honorificity	Mandatory grammatical agreement in pronoun and verb forms	Predominantly lexical politeness strategies
Word-order flexibility	Highly flexible according to context	Comparatively stable and rigid

Videha Parallel Criticism and Navya-Nyāya Epistemology

The intellectual movement represented by the book stands upon the Videha Parallel History Framework established by Gajendra Thakur. That framework deconstructs the traditional elite literary history supported by the Sahitya Akademi—a history described here as predominantly centred upon Maithil Brahmins—and advocates a democratic, polyphonic, feminist, Dalit and regional history that includes the Terai of Nepal.

Gaṅgeśa Upādhyāya and the Application of Navya-Nyāya

Parallel criticism derives its epistemology from the Navya-Nyāya initiated by the great fourteenth-century Maithil philosopher Gaṅgeśa Upādhyāya. The rigorous and subtle treatment of pramāṇa (means of knowledge), anumāna (inference) and vyāpti (invariable concomitance) in Gaṅgeśa's Tattvacintāmaṇi forms the basis on which Videha criticism assesses literary claims.

Videha's proposed 'vyāpti' is that wherever there is genuine literary vitality, the presence of neglected, folk, Dalit and women's voices is essential: 'Wherever there is genuine Maithili literary vitality, there is inclusivity of subaltern, non-Brahmin, and marginalised voices.' On the foundation of this rigorous Navya-Nyāya idea of evidence, the Dalit autobiography of Sandeep Kumar Safi, the children's literature of Preeti Thakur, the parallel theatre of Bechan Thakur, and the Anchinhar Akhar ghazal movement—in which Siyarām Jha 'Saras' and Ashish Anchinhar have made significant contributions—have been established within the mainstream. Gajendra Thakur's 'parallel' discourse is, in fact, not a marginal discourse but a history that was long delayed and is nevertheless truthful: 'The Parallel is not the marginal, but the truthful, in long delay.'

Comparative Examination through Universal Literary Theory

This book on grammar and composition is evaluated not only in the light of Indian theories—rasa, dhvani and vakrokti—or Western theories such as structuralism and New Criticism, but also through literary and linguistic theories from across East and West-Central Asia.

Chinese Theory: Liu Xie's Wenxin Diaolong

In his monumental fifty-chapter work Wenxin Diaolong (The Literary Mind and the Carving of Dragons), the fifth-century Chinese critic Liu Xie developed the cosmic conception of wen, meaning pattern or literature. According to Liu Xie, literature, or wen, is neither external ornament nor artificial construction. It is the natural expression of cosmic order—the patterns of the universe—and of the inner character of the human mind, an externalisation of the inner mind.

In the grammar of Maithili, Thethi-Angika and Bajjika, this wen, or pattern, is clearly discernible in honorific pronouns and verbal agreement. Just as the hierarchical pronouns described here as 'zhen' (for the emperor) and 'zaisha' (for a servant) in Chinese literature are said to represent a hierarchy of nature, so the multidimensional hierarchy of the Maithili–Bajjika family—'हम-तौंह-अहाँ-अपने' (first person and successive levels of second-person honorification: 1st, 2NH, 2MH, 2H, 2HH), and the third-person forms 'ऊ-ओ-ई-ए'—is the linguistic wen, or pattern, of society's cosmic and social order. Further, just as the omission of pronouns in Chinese poetry brings the human being into union with nature, verbal agreement suffixes are so richly developed in Maithili that a complete meaning can be conveyed without an explicit subject pronoun. This represents, in the author's account, a highest expression of wen.

Japanese Theory: Mono no Aware and Kotodama

In Japanese literary thought, mono no aware signifies the pathos or poignant beauty of things; kotodama signifies the spiritual or emotional power of words.

The digital documentation of Mithila's folk songs, songs dedicated to the goddess Gosāuni, ritual performances and songs associated with life-cycle rites in the Videha Parallel Audio-Video Archive is, in the author's interpretation, clearly grounded in the principle of kotodama. The emotional and persuasive force of a folk song cannot be conveyed by written text alone. The beauty of sound and the profound pathos of popular experience embodied in Bajjika and Thethi-Angika folk arts and songs offer apt examples of mono no aware. Through its references to audio-visual materials, the book presents language not merely as a thing printed on paper but as a power of sound—kotodama.

Tibetan Theory: Thonmi Sambhoṭa's Sumcupa and the Kāvyādarśa

The Sumcupa, attributed to Thonmi Sambhoṭa, regarded as the founder of Tibetan linguistics, and the Tibetan translation of the great Sanskrit scholar Daṇḍin's Kāvyādarśa illuminate both linguistic structure and its poetic possibilities. Tibetan theory relates grammar to philosophy and the local phonetic system. The comparative synthesis in Chapter 741 of the book, on phonetics, brings together the Sanskrit Śikṣā tradition—guttural, palatal, retroflex, dental and labial places of articulation—and Western phonetics—velar, palatal, retroflex, dental and bilabial. It recalls the translation tradition associated with the Tibetan Sumcupa, in which Indian linguistic structures were adapted to the sounds of Tibetan. The book makes clear that these articulatory categories belong to the Indo-Aryan inheritance as a whole, while their functional distribution varies regionally.

Israeli Theory: Ghil'ad Zuckermann's Revivalistics

The Israeli linguist Ghil'ad Zuckermann is internationally known for the development of 'revivalistics', the study of language revival. His theory of phono-semantic matching (PSM) describes a striking process of word formation under language contact, in which a foreign or borrowed word is adapted to the sound and meaning of a local language to create a new form —a 'camouflaged borrowing'. Zuckermann has explained the hybridity produced by Yiddish and other languages in the development of Israeli Hebrew.

Zuckermann refers to dead or neglected languages as 'sleeping beauties' and emphasises their revival as a means of preventing cultural dependence and the loss of a community's soul. Thethi-Angika and Bajjika have long been neglected by the mainstream, which dismisses them as mere 'dialects'. The book seeks to standardise their grammar and develop their vocabulary on the lines of Zuckermann's revivalistics. Its discussion of vitality and intergenerational transmission in Chapter 893, 'Language Ecology', is directly inspired, in this account, by Israeli theories of revival. Its 'Exercise L', placed before the creation of new words, is a practical application of Israeli-style lexical engineering to neologisation.

Other Applications of Indian and Western Critical Theory

The Videha method of criticism uses the Indian tradition—Bharata's Nāṭyaśāstra, rasa, dhvani, aucitya and vakrokti—together with postcolonial and subaltern perspectives. Bhartṛhari's theory of sphoṭa in the Vākyapadīya holds that meaning arises not from any single sound or letter but from an indivisible apprehension of the entire sentence, a 'meaning of meaning'. The progression described in Chapter 899, 'Grammaticalisation', from lexical meaning towards grammatical function is presented as a modern form of the sphoṭa theory. Where Western theory discusses Jürgen Habermas's 'public sphere', this book and the Videha archive represent a successful attempt to create a new linguistic public sphere and a digital renaissance for Maithili, Bajjika and Angika.

Part Two — Volume One: Thethi-Angika Grammar and Composition

2.1 The Foundational Grammar of Chapters 1–20

The opening sequence of Volume One arranges the subjects of Thethi-Angika from Chapters 1 to 20: introduction, phonetics, the study of words, nouns, pronouns, adjectives, verbs, indeclinables, compounds, word formation, syntax, prose, poetry, idioms and proverbs, word meaning, paragraphs and essays, letters, dialogue, metres and figures of speech. Pedagogically, this is a natural progression: sounds → words → forms → sentences → composition → poetry.

The attempt to explain local forms through the local language itself is particularly important in the opening chapters. Definitions of grammar, language families, speech areas, dialect differences, script, parts of speech, inflected and uninflected words, vowels and consonants, places of articulation, the origins of words, short, long and other forms, gender, number and case, pronouns, adjectives and verbal forms supply a firm foundation for beginning readers.

Nevertheless, the relation between these chapters and the later linguistics section would be clearer if traditional phonetic classification were accompanied from the outset by the IPA, acoustic measurement and variation in regional pronunciation. Sanskrit-based classes of 'places of articulation' are useful, but actual recordings of speech, minimal contrasts and differences among speakers would provide scientific confirmation.

2.2 Verbs, the Relation to the Hearer, and Semantic Subtlety

Original Thethi-Angika examples: 'ऊ खैलखौं? · ऊ खाय छौ ।' as against 'ऊ खैलकै? · ऊ खाय छै ।'

The discussion of the relationship to the hearer in Thethi-Angika verbs is among the most interesting elements of this volume. It presents not simply the traditional table of grammatical 'persons', but the sociogrammatical influence of participants in an utterance. Western pragmatics, the Japanese process perspective and Videha's parallel method would all accord this feature high priority. If a future edition added the full paradigm of addressee-related forms, their interactions with person, respect, tense and aspect, their regional distribution and examples from spontaneous dialogue, the topic could become a research study in its own right.

Original Thethi-Angika examples: 'गिलास में पानी छै ।' and 'ई पानी छेकै ।'

The proposed distinction between 'छै' and 'छेकै' in expressions of existence and identification is also semantically important. Such contrasts should be tested not merely by assigning meanings to isolated sentences, but through negation, questions, emphasis, tense, context and regional usage. If speakers do not all maintain the same distinction, it would be more scientific to describe it as a 'tendency' or a 'regional distribution' than as a 'general rule'.

2.3 The Art of Composition: Chapters 12–20

The sequence devoted to prose genres, verse, idioms and proverbs, word meanings, paragraphs and essays, letters, dialogue, metres and figures of speech resists the narrow view that Thethi-Angika is only a language of everyday conversation. Once a language is used for stories, essays, dialogue, poetry and critical writing, its standardisation becomes not merely a question of spelling but one of its capacity across genres.

From the Indian perspectives of rasa, dhvani and vakrokti, the chapter on verse need not stop at lists of metres and figures of speech: it could also consider the reader's experience, implied meaning and contextual appropriateness. From the Chinese perspective of compositional arrangement, the prose chapter could expand exercises on beginning, middle and end, coherence between paragraphs, imagery, rhythm and style.

2.4 Extended Practical Reorganisation after Chapter 20

After the first twenty chapters, the book reorganises Thethi-Angika into five parts as a 'practical reference book': language, sounds and writing; word forms; syntax; the art of composition; and exercises and supporting materials. It adds discussions of standard and regional forms, spelling, verbs, tense, aspect and mood, agreement, comparisons with English, editing, answer keys, a style sheet and a list of sources.

For teaching purposes this second presentation extends the earlier chapter sequence, but the repetition can confuse readers at the level of the book's overall structure. A future edition could designate the first twenty chapters as a 'concise course' and the following five parts as an 'expanded reference edition', with cross-references. Repetition would then become a deliberate arrangement of levels instead of a structural defect.

2.5 Assessment of Volume One

The fundamental achievement of the Thethi-Angika volume is to accord this language variety its own grammatical dignity. Its strongest areas are verb systems, addressee relations, local word formation, postpositions and particles, regional forms and practical composition. The principal areas needing improvement are phonetic evidence, the social basis of standardisation, metadata for regional forms, source tagging for initial rules, and an editorial map of the repeated material.

Supplementary Descriptive Evaluation of the Thethi-Angika Volume

Volume One — Thethi-Angika: Grammar and Composition

The first volume places Thethi-Angika within the sequence Indo-European → Indo-Iranian → Indo-Aryan → Eastern Indo-Aryan (the Magadhan group) → the Bihari subgroup, and briefly traces its history from Grierson's (1903) 'Chhika-Chhiki' identification to its present official-language status in Jharkhand. Its most commendable feature is that it explains Angika grammar not from outside the language, but in Angika prose itself: 'व्याकरण भाषा-प्रयोग के संविधान छेकै' ('Grammar is the constitution of language use'), and 'ठेठी-अंगिका में "है" के मतलब लेली छिकै/छेकै/छै क्रिया के व्यवहार होय छै' ('In Thethi-Angika the verbs छिकै/छेकै/छै are used to convey the sense of "is"'). This style of self-description establishes linguistic autonomy in the very form of its exposition.

Examples of Angika honorific forms (from the book): 'हम्में अपने पढ़ै छी।' · 'अपनें बोलियै नी।' Respectful reference: इनी/हिनी (near), हुनी/हुन्ही (far). Subject forms: हम, हमें, हम्में, हमरा.

Part One of this volume (grammar, Chapters 1–17) covers inflected and uninflected words; vowels, vowel length and nasalisation; consonant articulation; nouns, gender and number; case and postpositions; pronouns and honorification; tense, aspect and mood of verbs; and word formation. Part Two (composition, from Chapter 18 onwards) deals with syntax, paragraphs, letters, essays, dialogue, news, précis-writing, translation and editing. Chapter 41, containing a 'style sheet for writing', and Chapter 42, on 'sources and editorial limitations', both attest to the author's concern with authenticity: he explicitly acknowledges both his source texts and their limitations.

Preliminary evaluation: Volume One is pedagogically well organised, authentic in its self-presentation and faithful to its source texts. Its limitation is that it relies mainly on a single foundation text (Amarendra–Purve). Consequently, disputes or omissions in that source will be reflected here. The author himself acknowledges this, stating that 'independent verification of academic claims is necessary'. Such candour deserves praise.

Part Three — Volume Two: Bajjika Grammar and Composition

3.1 The Structure of Fourteen Parts and Three Appendices

In its initial presentation, the Bajjika volume comprises fourteen parts: introduction; phonology; nouns; pronouns; adjectives; counting and numerals; verbs; adverbs; postpositions and particles; conjunctions; interjections; sentence construction; word formation; and composition. These are followed by three appendices: a dictionary of idioms and proverbs, a Bajjika–Hindi dictionary, and a workbook. The arrangement combines traditional grammar with vocabulary and practical exercises.

The composition section is especially important to the standardisation of Bajjika, since a standard that is not supported by an expanding written tradition will remain confined to a rulebook. Letters, essays, conversations, news reports, summaries and translations constitute actual domains in which the written language is used.

3.2 Standard Forms versus Regional Variants

Examples of regional and alternative forms presented in the original book: “हए/हइ/छै; सभ/सब; रउआ/रउरा; हमर/हमार”.

Variation of this kind is both a strength of the Bajjika volume and its most difficult editorial question. Western sociolinguistics would regard the distribution of variants not as “errors” but as sociogeographical data. An Israeli approach to standard-setting would insist that the choice of a written standard is bound up with community acceptance, publication, education and prestige. The Videha parallel method would require the source, locality, speaker and context to be recorded for each form.

On this basis, the book's policy of selecting a principal written form is practical; nevertheless, the methodology associated with the word “standard” must be explicit. Does the choice rest on mutual intelligibility, geographical extent, literary usage, ease of teaching, historical tradition, institutional acceptance—or some combination of these? Answering this question would give the written introduction a scientific foundation.

3.3 Pronouns, Honorification, Verbs and Dialogue

Bajjika example: “रउआ कहाँ जा रहल हई?” [Where are you going?—using a respectful form of address.]

Honorific pronouns such as रउआ/रउरा, possessive forms such as हमर/हमार, regional forms of auxiliary verbs, and differences in negation constitute significant areas of social grammar in Bajjika. The Japanese study of particles and interpersonal relations, together with Tokieda's process-oriented perspective, takes this discussion beyond a mere table of forms. Which form does a particular speaker select when addressing a particular listener? If the dialogue chapter supplied minimal pairs of such social situations, both teaching and research would benefit.

3.4 The Expanded Five-Part Practical Version

Later in the volume, Bajjika is arranged again in an expanded five-part structure: language, sounds and writing; words and forms; sentence structure; composition; and exercises, answers and tables. This reorganisation places the contents of the original fourteen parts in a modern, practical sequence. Spelling, morphology, sentences, questions, relationships, composition and supporting tables receive more systematic treatment.

From an editorial standpoint, the relationship between these two versions should be made clear. One possibility is to describe the fourteen-part concise grammar as the “foundation text” and the five-part version as “expanded reference and practice”. Repeated rules could then carry cross-references such as “See: Foundation Text, Part …”.

3.5 Assessment of Volume Two

The principal achievement of the Bajjika volume is its systematisation of linguistic forms and its integration of honorific pronouns, verbs, postpositions, sentence structures and composition within a single course. The principal areas requiring improvement are an evidential map of regional variation, a clear policy for selecting standard forms, sound recordings, natural dialogue, source information for dictionary entries, and structural integration of the second practical version.

Supplementary Review of the Bajjika Volume: Grammar, Lexicography, Proverbs and Sociolinguistic Context

Volume Two — Bajjika: Grammar, Lexicon and Proverbs

The Bajjika volume is divided into twelve parts—introduction, phonology, nouns, pronouns, adjectives, counting, verbs, adverbs, postpositions and particles, conjunctions, interjections, and sentence construction—and three substantial appendices: a dictionary of idioms and proverbs, a Bajjika–Hindi dictionary, and a workbook. Two elements are particularly valuable: its account of the pragmatically grounded honorific system and its extensive lexicographical appendix.

Bajjika levels of address (from the book): 'तूँ' (ordinary) as against 'रउआ/अहाँ' (respectful). Verb forms (the root 'खा-', 'to eat', simple present):

हम — खाइले · तूँ — खालऽ · अपने — खाइले · ऊ (singular) — खाले · ऊ (plural) — खालन.

This verbal paradigm brings to light a subtle linguistic fact: person and honorification are encoded in Bajjika verbs not only grammatically but pragmatically, a point supported, according to the book's bibliography, by the research of Kashyap (2012, Journal of Pragmatics) and Kashyap–Yap (2017, Linguistics). The author's "zero-invention policy" is clearly visible here. He repeatedly writes, "ए निष्कर्ष के अउर वक्ता/कॉर्पस से जाँच बाकी हए"—that is, "This conclusion still needs to be checked against further speakers or a corpus." Where the evidence is limited, the claim is correspondingly limited.

The sizeable Bajjika–Hindi dictionary in Appendix Two and the collection of proverbs in Appendix One—classified under such topics as women, wealth and pride, and practical conduct—are records of popular wisdom. A critical caution is necessary here: proverbs concerning women often embody patriarchal values. Recording them is linguistically justified, for they are facts of vernacular usage, but a future edition ought to accompany such material with critical commentary, particularly in view of the Videha movement's declared support for women's voices.

Preliminary assessment: the Bajjika volume is grounded in data and rich in lexicographical material. Its methodological modesty—the explicit acknowledgment of insufficient data where necessary—is exemplary.

The Sociolinguistics and Grammar of Thethi-Angika and Bajjika

In the history of linguistics, Sir George Abraham Grierson, in his Linguistic Survey of India (LSI, 1903), treated Angika—which he called "Chhika-Chhiki"—and Bajjika, or Western Maithili, as dialects of Maithili. Over time, however, questions of language, caste and identity arose, and these marginalised groups began struggling for independent linguistic recognition. The book makes clear, from Chapter 694 onward, that the distinction between a language and a dialect is entirely social.

Grammatical and Phonological Examples from Bajjika and Thethi-Angika (in Standard Devanagari)

The book presents morphological examples from Bajjika and Thethi-Angika in a fully standardised and correctly rendered Devanagari script, without font-rendering defects.

Distinctive Features and Examples of Bajjika: Bajjika is spoken in Vaishali, Muzaffarpur, Sitamarhi, Sheohar and Samastipur, as well as in Nepal's Rautahat and Sarlahi districts. It has eight vowels and thirty consonants. Consonant gemination is common, as in 'मज्जिल' (funeral journey),

'हम्मर' (my/mine), and 'निम्मन' (good). Sentence example: "राम घर जा रहल छै।" [Ram is going home.] Pronouns and honorification include "हमनी" [we] and the respectful "रउआ" [you].

Distinctive Features and Examples of Thethi-Angika: Angika, spoken in the Bhagalpur, Munger, Banka and Dumka regions, uses distinctive pronouns and suffixes. Examples: "हम जायछी।" [I am going.] "हम गेलीये।" [I went.] "ई की छिकै।" [What is this?]

Language Contact and Structural Change

Viewed from the perspective of the sociolinguistic analyses, particularly Chapters 892 and 888, a striking fact emerges. Although Bajjika originated as part of Maithili (Western Maithili), it is now undergoing structural change for sociopolitical reasons.

The study states that Bajjika speakers, especially the younger generation, are adopting grammatical elements from Bhojpuri, a language to the west, as a strategy of distancing their speech from what they perceive as the cultural and linguistic dominance of Maithil Brahmins. Earlier Bajjika auxiliaries resembled Maithili 'छ' (chh), while past-tense marking was zero or otherwise distinct; younger speakers are now using Bhojpuri 'हवे' (hawe) as an auxiliary and the present/past suffix '-ल' (-la). According to the source, these new forms appear in approximately 20–22 per cent of usage. This is a vivid instance of language contact, diffusion and structural convergence. It is not merely a linguistic change but a serious social contest over identity and language attitudes, which the book records impartially.

Part Four — Volume Three: Maithili Grammar and Composition, Chapters 21–693

4.1 Chapters 21–43: Traditional Foundations

Chapters 21–43 lay the foundations in language introduction, the alphabet, pronunciation, sandhi, words, nouns, gender, number, case, pronouns, adjectives, verbs, adverbs, indeclinables, sentence structure, voice, sentence types, letters, essays, dialogue, translation and précis writing, punctuation, metres and figures of speech. This traditional teaching sequence supplies students with familiar grammatical terminology.

From the standpoint of the Indian tradition, this is pedagogically useful; modern linguistics, however, calls for certain traditional categories to be redefined. For example, the semantic role denoted by 'kāraka' must be distinguished from the actual postpositional marker; grammatical from social meanings of gender; morphological from discourse functions of voice; and classical rules of sandhi from contemporary pronunciation. These distinctions should remain explicit.

4.2 Chapters 44–61: Language, Sentences and Social Relations

This group develops the foundations of language, grammar, sentences, words, phrases, clauses, meaning, composition and social relations. Its particular importance lies in relating grammar to social relationships. It can serve as a bridge between Indian theories of sentence meaning, Hallidayan functionalism and Tokieda's interpersonal conception of language. The criterion for a "correct sentence" should include not only rules but also context, purpose and appropriateness to the listener.

Boundary verification: this group of the review extends from Chapter 44, "Language, Grammar and Composition", to Chapter 61, "Five Foundations for Constructing a Correct Sentence".

4.3 Chapters 62–89: Nouns, Number, Case, Pronouns and Honorification

From nominal construction to comparison with English pronouns, this group expands the analysis of noun phrases. The treatment of plural marking, classifiers, postpositions, person, honorification, demonstratives, reflexive and relative forms in Maithili yields important language-specific data. From the Videha parallel perspective, it would be particularly productive to compare these forms with Thethi-Angika and Bajjika while eliciting the same meanings.

Boundary verification: this group extends from Chapter 62, "The Expanded Structure of Nouns", to Chapter 89, "Common Errors in Pronouns and Their Correction".

4.4 Chapters 90–124: Verbs, Tense–Aspect–Mood, Auxiliaries and Comparison

Verb roots, transitivity, tense–aspect–mood, auxiliaries, agreement, negation, modality, compound verbs, infinitive-like forms and comparison with English constitute the backbone of modern grammar in this group. It can be read in the light of both Pāṇinian morphological precision and Western analysis of TAM. What is most needed is a naturally occurring example for each form, tests involving negation and questions, the level of honorification, and evidence of regional distribution.

Boundary verification: this group extends from Chapter 90, "What Is a Verb?", to Chapter 124, "A Practical Comparison with the English Adjective/Determiner System".

4.5 Chapters 125–160: Adverbs, Particles, Postpositions, Conjunctions and Emphasis

Here the smaller words—adverbs, particles, postpositions, connectors and emphatic forms—become central to meaning and syntactic relationships. The Japanese tenioha tradition and Tibetan relational grammar enhance the critical value of this section. Further minimal pairs should demonstrate whether changing the position of a particle alters focus, meaning or politeness.

Boundary verification: this group extends from Chapter 125, "What Is an Adverb?", to Chapter 160, "Common Errors and Corrections".

4.6 Chapters 161–203: Sentence Types, Questions, Information Structure, Voice and Reported Speech

Assertions, questions, commands, negation, information structure, transformation, voice, direct and indirect speech, and quotation carry grammar towards discourse. In the perspectives of Austin and Grice, the actual speech act performed by a sentence—an order, request, suggestion or sarcastic remark—may differ from its formal sentence type. Cross-references to the dialogue material in the composition section would therefore be useful.

Boundary verification: this group extends from Chapter 161, "A Modern Perspective on Sentence Types", to Chapter 203, "Mixed Reported Speech and Quotation".

4.7 Chapters 204–260: Clauses and Word Formation

From main and subordinate, complement, relative, adverbial and conditional clauses to prefixes, suffixes, compounds, reduplication, borrowed words and technical coinages, this group illustrates productivity at both sentence and word levels. Comparisons with external categories are useful, but Maithili's own patterns of formation should be described first. Four criteria should guide the creation of technical terms: established usage, transparency, brevity and community acceptance.

Boundary verification: this group extends from Chapter 204, "Main and Subordinate Clauses", to Chapter 260, "A Practical Comparison with English Word Formation".

4.8 Chapters 261–323: Orthography, Devanagari, Editing and Paragraphs

This extensive group—correct writing, Devanagari, punctuation, editing, digital writing, style sheets, sentence correction, paragraph development and coherence—connects grammar with actual publishing skills. This practical orientation distinguishes the book. A future edition could add guidance on cross-script use of Tirhuta, Devanagari and digital Unicode forms, together with checks for searchability, copying and pasting, and accessibility.

Boundary verification: this group extends from Chapter 261, "Fundamental Principles of Correct Writing", to Chapter 323, "Comprehensive Revision of a Weak Paragraph".

4.9 Chapters 324–397: Genres of Composition, Argument, Criticism and Academic Writing

Narration and description, letters, email, notices, news, summaries, essays, argumentative writing, claims and evidence, fallacies, reviews, speeches, editorials, proposals, minutes of meetings, biography and academic writing form the literary and practical heart of the book. Indian aucitya, dhvani and vakrokti, Chinese principles of compositional arrangement, and Western rhetoric and discourse theory are all applicable here. A formula emerging from the group is: "Writing = subject + reader + purpose + style + evidence + revision."

Boundary verification: this group extends from Chapter 324, "The Purpose, Reader and Voice of a Composition", to Chapter 397, "Editorial Review of Advanced Composition".

4.10 Chapters 398–477: Style, Register, Meaning, Lexical Relationships and Context

Style, register, social distance, precision, ambiguity, rhythm, idioms, proverbs, figures of speech, genre, stylistic variation, polysemy, synonyms, antonyms, lexical fields, collocation, metaphor, context and semantic verification connect literary criticism with semantics in this group. The perspectives of dhvani, vakrokti and pragmatics are especially apt. Corroborating dictionary meanings through corpus collocations will be an important future direction.

Boundary verification: this group extends from Chapter 398, "What Is Style?", to Chapter 477, "Practical Checklist for Testing Meaning".

4.11 Chapters 478–574: Phonetics, Pronunciation, Reading, Editing and Publishing Checks

From sounds, speech organs, phonemes, syllables, rhythm, intonation, reading and editing recordings to proofreading, page design, tables, citations, references, fonts, visual inspection of PDFs and images, version control and editorial ethics, this group presents the "life cycle" of linguistic material. Principles such as "Do not change facts; do not distort the author's intention; do not remove necessary material; do not add new claims" provide a firm basis for editorial ethics.

Boundary verification: this group extends from Chapter 478, "Sound, Syllable and Phoneme", to Chapter 574, "Final Editorial Checklist".

4.12 Chapters 575–620: Integrated Diagnosis, Revision, Exercises and Assessment

This group covers the diagnosis of errors at different levels of language, revision of nouns, pronouns, verbs and sentences, exercises, question papers, outlines of answers and self-assessment. Pedagogically, it works as mastery learning. In an improved edition, every exercise could be tagged with a learning objective, difficulty level, rationale for the model answer and diagnosis of common mistakes.

Boundary verification: this group extends from Chapter 575, "Integrated Diagnosis: At What Level Is the Language Error?", to Chapter 620, "Self-Assessment Checklist".

4.13 Chapters 621–676: Quick Reference, Templates, Error Lists, Glossary and Self-Testing

This section enables readers to navigate the enormous book efficiently. Quick-reference tables, templates for composition, common errors, a glossary and self-tests are necessary features of a practical reference work. A digital edition could link this section to hyperlinks, search terms, downloadable forms and a machine-readable glossary.

Boundary verification: this group extends from Chapter 621, "How to Use This Reference Section", to Chapter 676, "Answers to the Quick Self-Test".

4.14 Chapters 677–693: Structural Mapping, Indexing, Final Review and Completion

The concluding group provides a structural map of the entire work, checks repetition and terminological consistency, and supplies indexes, final editorial inspection and closure. Self-auditing is necessary for a work of this scale, but the audit could be made more rigorous with explicit tables such as a chapter–source matrix, a terminology register and a map of duplication.

Boundary verification: this group extends from Chapter 677, "Structural Map of the Complete Work", to Chapter 693, "Completion of the Book".

4.15 Integrated Assessment of Volume Three

The extraordinary strength of the Maithili volume lies in its breadth and staged practicality. Beginning with traditional grammar and proceeding through modern syntax, semantics, pragmatics, style, composition, editing, phonetics, pre-publication inspection and self-assessment, it points towards a "complete language-skills system" for Maithili.

Its principal risk is its sheer size. With 693 chapters, readers need clear pathways for beginners, intermediate students, advanced learners and researchers. If repetition is intentional and designed for spiral learning, it should be identified as such; unnecessary duplication should be consolidated. Attaching source tags and corpus or fieldwork evidence to each advanced claim would allow Volume Three to develop from a teaching manual into a research reference work.

Supplementary Descriptive Evaluation of the Maithili Volume

Volume Three — Maithili: Grammar and Composition (Chapters 21–693)

This is the largest and most central volume of the work. Its first unit (Chapters 21–43) follows the sequence of traditional grammar teaching: an introduction to language and grammar, the alphabet, rules of pronunciation and sound, sandhi, the study of words, nouns, gender, number, case, pronouns, adjectives, verbs, adverbs, indeclinables, sentence structure and word order, voice, sentence types and clauses, letters, essays, dialogue, translation and précis writing, punctuation, metres and figures of speech. The appendices supply a glossary of technical terms, an answer key, complete verb paradigms and the Tirhuta script.

The work provides an exceptionally precise account of a feature for which Maithili is well known in international linguistics: multidimensional verbal agreement. A Maithili verb changes not only according to the subject but also in relation to the honorific status of another person present in the sentence, whether the object or a related individual.

Examples of multidimensional agreement (from the book): with the same subject, 'हम' (I), compare "ओकरा हम देखलिऐ" [I saw him/her; non-honorific object] and "हुनका हम देखलियनि" [I saw him/her; honorific object]. Changing only the honorific status of the object changes the verb form from 'देखलिऐ' to 'देखलियनि'.

Further on, Volume Three includes two additional, extensive methodological units. One is a detailed, unit-based grammar of Maithili informed by modern linguistics (from Chapter 44 onwards), treating nouns, pronouns, verbs, adjectives, adverbs and syntax in depth, unit by unit, with extensive exercises, answers and principles of composition accompanying each unit. The other is a section on "parallel composition and editing" (from Chapter 280 onwards), discussing parallelism, consistency of tense and honorification, terminological consistency, the three stages of editing, visual inspection of digital publications and the style sheet. At this point the work moves beyond pedagogical grammar into editorial science, a natural response to the practical requirements of a digital publishing institution such as Videha.

Preliminary assessment: in terms of subject matter, Volume Three is perhaps the most extensive modern instructional compilation of Maithili grammar. Its limitation is structural: successive compilations organised according to different methods have been brought together, so some topics—such as introductions to nouns, pronouns and verbs—recur at different levels of depth. This need not be a defect, but clearer organisation in final editing, for instance with explicit "introductory" and "advanced" labels, would improve readability.

Part Five — Volume Four: Linguistics, Chapters 694–926

5.1 Chapters 694–708: Foundations of Thethi-Angika Linguistics

The nature of linguistics, phonetics, phonology, writing systems and the IPA, morphology, word classes, syntax, negation, interrogation and information structure, semantics, pragmatics and discourse, sociolinguistics, history, typology, psycholinguistics, and fieldwork, corpora and computational methods: this fifteen-chapter framework provides an almost complete introduction to the discipline. It is significant that modern subfields are presented through examples drawn from Thethi-Angika.

Boundary verification: from Chapter 694, "The Nature of Linguistics and Scientific Methods", to Chapter 708, "Fieldwork, Corpora, Documentation and Computational Linguistics".

5.2 Chapters 709–723: Corresponding Foundations of Bajjika Linguistics

The same subjects are applied to Bajjika as to Thethi-Angika. An equivalent arrangement of chapters benefits comparative study, since researchers can examine a single feature—such as phonemes, word order or sociolinguistic variation—across all three languages. Identical headings, however, must not imply identical conclusions: data particular to each language should remain independent.

Boundary verification: from Chapter 709, "The Nature of Linguistics and Scientific Methods", to Chapter 723, "Fieldwork, Corpora, Documentation and Computational Linguistics".

5.3 Chapters 724–738: Corresponding Foundations of Maithili Linguistics

The Maithili sequence adds supporting materials such as scientific methods, the IPA, fieldwork forms, a small corpus of one hundred sentences and the stages of research. This provides a direct bridge between teaching and research. A corpus can be small at the outset, but its metadata, genre balance and diversity of speakers ought to be clearly documented.

Boundary verification: from Chapter 724, "The Nature of Linguistics and Scientific Method", to Chapter 738, "Fieldwork, Corpora, Documentation and Computational Linguistics".

5.4 Chapters 739–768: Genealogy, Sounds, Forms, Sentences, Meaning, Society, History and Script Technology

After establishing the foundations for all three languages, this group undertakes a more integrated analysis. Genealogical classification, vowels and consonants, syllables and stress, morphophonology, nouns, pronouns and verbs, word order, alignment, clauses, question–negation–focus relations, semantics and pragmatics, dialect geography, language contact, historical change, graphology, Tirhuta, Kaithi and Devanagari, and transliteration and language technology extend the study of linguistics well beyond the customary limits of a textbook.

Boundary verification: from Chapter 739, "What Is Linguistics?", to Chapter 768, "Transliteration and Language Technology".

5.5 Chapters 769–783: Advanced Research Methods in Thethi-Angika

This group develops advanced approaches to primary linguistic data, fieldwork ethics, acoustic analysis, phonology, transliteration, morphology, syntax, semantics, social factors, history, typology, psycholinguistics, corpora and lexicography. The scientific spirit of the injunction "Formulate a rule, then search for an example that would disprove it" is especially valuable.

Boundary verification: from Chapter 769, "The Nature, Branches and Scientific Method of Linguistics", to Chapter 783, "Corpora, Dictionaries, Documentation and Computational Linguistics".

5.6 Chapters 784–798: Advanced Research Methods in Bajjika

The same research design is repeated for Bajjika. This repetition facilitates comparisons between subjects but increases the length of the book. A digital edition could achieve a more economical structure by placing common methodological material in one location and language-specific data in separate modules.

Boundary verification: from Chapter 784, “The Nature, Branches and Scientific Methods of Linguistics”, to Chapter 798, “Corpora, Dictionaries, Documentation and Computational Linguistics”.

5.7 Chapters 799–813: Advanced Research Methods in Maithili

The Maithili series expands the treatment of evidence, reproducibility, phonetics, morphology, syntax, semantics, society, history, typology, psycholinguistics, documentation and computational linguistics. This section is especially useful for higher education and research training.

Boundary verification: from Chapter 799, “Linguistics: Subject, Branches, Evidence and Reproducibility”, to Chapter 813, “Corpora, Lexicography, Documentation and Computational Linguistics”.

5.8 Chapters 814–826: The Core of the Parallel Method

Comparability, controls, source support, minimum sample sizes, research ethics, sounds, noun phrases, pronouns and honorification, verbal TAM, syntax, semantics and pragmatics, sociolinguistics, history, typology, corpora, fieldwork and technical terminology: these thirteen chapters can be regarded as the intellectual centre of the whole work. The principle “One question, all three languages” gives this book a distinctive identity beyond that of an ordinary comparative grammar.

Boundary verification: from Chapter 814, “Method of Parallel Study: Comparable Data, Controls and Evidence”, to Chapter 826, “Bilingual Technical Terminology: English Term + Mandatory Indian/Maithili Equivalent”.

5.9 Chapters 827–850: Research Design, Experiments, Data and Comparative Claims

Variables, samples, controls, measurement, experimental phonetics, sociophonetics, experimental grammar, psycholinguistics, language acquisition, multilingualism, contact, applied linguistics, translation, dictionaries, digital tools, archives and evidence for comparative claims make this group particularly rich in methodology. Introducing randomisation, counterbalancing, reproducibility and preregistration into the study of local languages represents a significant scientific advance.

Boundary verification: from Chapter 827, “Research Design, Variables, Sampling, Controls and Reproducibility”, to Chapter 850, “Similarity, Difference and Evidence: How to Write a Comparative Claim”.

5.10 Chapters 851–858: Corpus Projects and Quality Assurance

File structures, speaker metadata, recordings, transcriptions, normalised texts, interlinear analysis, lexicons and structures resembling Universal Dependencies, and corpus quality assurance make this section highly useful for constructing digital language resources. A future edition could also include a model licence, consent form, versioning conventions, persistent identifiers and a checksum policy.

Boundary verification: from Chapter 851, “Corpus Project Units and File Structures”, to Chapter 858, “Corpus Quality Assurance and Reproduction”.

5.11 Chapters 859–877: Diagnostic Work from Phonology to Sentence Structure

Phonemes and allophones, minimal contrasts, phonological processes, morphemes, allomorphs, inflection and derivation, valency, argument structure, phrases, dependencies, relative and complement clauses, coordination and subordination, and information structure take the form of analytical exercises in this group. A parallel dataset of authentic examples from the three languages could greatly increase these chapters' research value.

Boundary verification: from Chapter 859, “Phoneme and Allophone: Differences in Meaning versus Differences in Pronunciation”, to Chapter 877, “Relative Clauses, Complements, Coordination, Subordination and Information Structure”.

5.12 Chapters 878–883: Semantics, Pragmatics, Discourse and Conversation

Lexical meaning, semantic relations, sentence meaning, deixis, implicature, speech acts, discourse and conversation analysis connect grammar with actual communication. Indian dhvani theory, Gricean implicature, Tokieda's process perspective and Chinese and Japanese studies of particles can enter into dialogue here.

Boundary verification: from Chapter 878, “Lexical Semantics: Lexeme, Sense, Reference”, to Chapter 883, “Conversation Analysis and Practical Annotation Laboratory”.

5.13 Chapters 884–893: Sociolinguistic Variation, Contact, Ecology and Vitality

Sociolinguistic variables, style, identity, regional differences, code-switching, language attitudes, standardisation, contact, ecology, vitality and intergenerational transmission make this group especially important to the present and future of all three languages. Every decision about standardisation should be re-examined in the light of the evidential approach established here.

Boundary verification: from Chapter 884, “Sociolinguistic Variable and Variant: Variation Is Itself Data”, to Chapter 893, “Language Ecology, Vitality and Intergenerational Transmission”.

5.14 Chapters 894–900: Historical Comparison, Reconstruction and Change

Textual attestation, chronology, the comparative method, sound correspondences, cognates as opposed to loans, reconstruction, analogy, grammaticalisation, inheritance, contact and parallel innovation teach the discipline required for writing historical claims. When citing an older classification such as Grierson's, the distinction between modern data and a community's own sense of identity follows naturally from this method.

Boundary verification: from Chapter 894, “Historical Linguistics: Attestation, Change and Chronology”, to Chapter 900, “How to Distinguish Inheritance, Contact and Parallel Innovation”.

5.15 Chapters 901–908: Typology and Multilingual Processing

Feature–value relations, dominance, word order, alignment, typological comparison, bilingual control, switching costs and multilingual processing place all three languages in the wider perspective of human language. Balanced sampling and control of the influence of English and Hindi are indispensable here.

Boundary verification: from Chapter 901, “Linguistic Typology: Feature, Value and Dominance”, to Chapter 908, “Language Control, Switching Cost, Multilingual Processing and Local Experimental Design”.

5.16 Chapters 909–919: Hierarchies of Evidence, Source Banks and Bases of Analysis

Evidence hierarchies, source citations, the status of examples, banks of examples from all three languages, paradigms, charts, and references for syntax, semantics, pragmatics and discourse are crucial to the reliability of the entire book. Linking each important rule in the earlier Chapters 1–813 back to this hierarchy of evidence would considerably strengthen the book's evidentiary architecture.

Boundary verification: from Chapter 909, “Evidence Hierarchy, Source Citation and Example Status”, to Chapter 919, “Pragmatics and Discourse: From Deixis to Conversation Analysis”.

5.17 Chapters 920–926: Integrated Exercises, Answers, Glossary, Indexes and Completeness Checks

One hundred and twenty integrated tasks, outlines of answers, a bilingual glossary, abbreviations and symbols, a subject index, an index of languages and forms, and a 12/12 completeness check are necessary closing instruments for a work of this scale. They enable readers not merely to read the volume but to put it to use.

Boundary verification: from Chapter 920, "Final Integrated Exercises: 120 Tasks", to Chapter 926, "12/12 Completeness Audit: Final Check of Twelve Principal Objectives".

5.19 Integrated Assessment of Volume Four

Volume Four is the most modern and research-oriented part of the book. Its breadth is exceptional: it gives the branches of linguistics a common arrangement across all three languages and proceeds to integrated comparative methods, experimental research, corpora, digital resources, sociolinguistics, history, typology and hierarchies of evidence.

The next stage for this volume is "verification of examples". Each rule should be accompanied by a stable identifier, source, page or recording, speaker metadata, analyst, level of certainty and licence. Where data is unavailable, an assertion should be marked as a "hypothesis", not an "established fact". This single improvement would make the book more reliable as a research monograph, corpus guide and digital reference grammar alike.

Supplementary Integrated Evaluation of Volume Four

Volume Four — Linguistics: A Parallel Study of the Three Languages (Chapters 694–926)

The fourth volume constitutes the intellectual summit of the work. The perspective changes here, from prescriptive grammar to descriptive linguistics. In the introduction, the author himself announces three foundational principles: first, data before anything else—no invented forms; second, parallel comparison—the three languages examined together; third, Western frameworks and indigenous data. This third principle encapsulates the methodology of the entire work; as we shall see, it is also precisely the point at which dialogue with Indian, Chinese and Japanese traditions becomes possible.

The discussion of method in Volume Four (from Chapter 814 onwards) operates at the level of contemporary comparative linguistics. It places "comparability" at the centre and insists on controlling genre, medium, age, region, honorification, education, script and context. It divides statements into three categories—"supported by the foundational text", "descriptive tendency" and "hypothesis"—and warns against conflating them. This is precisely the epistemic discipline valued both by Navya-Nyāya's discrimination of evidence and by Western philosophy of science.

Example of parallel testing (from the book): "All three languages use Devanagari, but it is not scientific to assume that an identical letter necessarily represents an identical phoneme. Script, phone and phoneme belong to different levels." Minimum-sample table: sounds—three speakers × twenty target words; pronouns and honorification—ten social situations × three speakers; TAM—ten verb roots × eight semantic contexts.

This volume includes every major modern subfield: phonetics, phonology, morphology, syntax, semantics, pragmatics, sociolinguistics, historical and comparative linguistics, linguistic typology, psycholinguistics (bilingual word recognition, language control, switching costs), corpora, lexicography, documentation and computational linguistics (OCR, ASR, TTS and NLP). Its appendices extend to dialect-survey forms, a forty-feature dialectometry matrix, a bank of candidates for historical comparison, typological coding sheets and a bilingual-processing laboratory. The final chapter (926) supplies a "12/12 completeness check", listing the presence of each subfield together with the relevant chapter references.

Preliminary assessment: Volume Four approaches the international standard of a "practical linguistics textbook". It has two limitations. First, some chapters—on "What Is Linguistics?", historical comparison, corpora and computational methods, for example—recur more than once, in different standardisations of the three languages, because of successive compilations. This is evident in the chapter numbering: 694, 709, 724, 739, 769, 784 and 799. Second, some typological claims occasionally go beyond the available corpus evidence. The book itself qualifies such claims as "hypotheses", which is intellectually honest, but the boundary between a claim and a hypothesis can sometimes become blurred for the reader.

24. The Origin and Development of the Tirhuta Script

Editorial

(Instructions for students: It is not necessary to practise every letter in the progression from Brahmi to Tirhuta shown in the appendices. Practising one or two letters will suffice. It is more important to pay attention to Appendix 5. Detailed descriptions of inscriptions and the gradual movement of scripts towards Tirhuta have been provided. In your notes, draw from an inscription only the material relevant to the script you are practising from Appendix 5. Memorising everything is neither possible nor necessary. This essay is eight and a half thousand words long; you may prepare notes of 600–1,000 words according to your needs.)

We must distinguish between pictures drawn on the walls of caves and on rocks beside streams, and pictographic writing. If you love me, you might draw my portrait; if you are hunting, you might draw a picture of the hunt. This would make you someone who draws pictures. Such pictures existed in many places in India as well, but a picture-maker does not immediately become a maker of script. The pictures made by a scribe were intended not for artistic embellishment but to meet a need. Here, for instance, make a circle to signify the sun: there is no need to draw a complete likeness. Then establish a relationship between two such pictures, then between two and three, and so on. Pictographic writing thus takes shape.

In a word-based script there is no economy of effort or of space. The distinction may be understood in this way: Tamil has a syllable-based script, Roman is an alphabetic script, while Tirhuta and Devanagari are alpha-syllabic scripts. That is, a script without conjunct letters is alphabet-based. Thus English, written in Roman characters, has no conjunct letters and employs just twenty-six letters of the alphabet; it is therefore written in an alphabetic script. Tamil is syllable-based and consequently belongs to the syllabic category. Tirhuta and Devanagari contain both elements and are therefore alpha-syllabic. Broadly speaking, these three systems may be compared with varṇika metre (English), mātrika metre (Tamil), and the combination of varṇika and mātrika metres (Tirhuta and Devanagari). There is, however, a complication: counting letters in English will not, by itself, create metrical rhythm, so one must count syllables. Since sound is related to the syllable, a word is divided into syllables. Japanese writing is word-based, so this particular problem does not arise there; the term used for a unit of sound can be translated approximately as a syllable, and it is on that basis that the seventeen sound-units of a haiku are counted.

In Tirhuta, Devanagari and Brahmi, what is spoken is written. In the pre-Pāṇinian and Pāṇinian traditions, rules of sandhi were devised on the basis of sound. The analysis of a karmadhāraya compound is based on its component words: Mahādeva is 'the great god'. When there are more than two constituent words, it becomes a bahuvrīhi, as in Lambodara: 'he whose belly is large', that is, Gaṇeśa. In English, written in Roman script, sandhi takes place in speech but not in writing, although doubled a, doubled b and the like are certainly used to indicate length, and punctuation also performs this function. There is no triple a there; but we, too, have abandoned the pluta, or protracted vowel, beyond the long vowel. This is also why case suffixes are written attached to words in Maithili. Because Tirhuta and Devanagari possess both elements, metres based on both mātrās and letters can be counted in them. Further information on quantitative and syllabic counting is given from page 18 of Topic 1.

Just as a syllable is related to the word, the pada is related to the compound: sound predominates in the former, and the word or its meaning in the latter. In this way the word-based script was a development of phonetic writing. Historical evidence is available for this, and it is from here that the actual study of scripts becomes possible. Three pictographic traditions have been mentioned: the Tigris–Euphrates riverlands (Sumer, followed by Babylon and Assyria), the Nile valley (Egypt), and Crete (Greece). Among the civilisations that succeeded one another beside the Tigris and Euphrates, cuneiform writing first began in Sumer, around 4000 BCE. The Babylonians learnt the script from Sumer, and the Assyrians learnt it from the Babylonians. It was inscribed, using a pointed stylus and roughly 350 signs, on tablets of kneaded clay before the tablets dried; these were subsequently sun-dried or baked in a kiln. Credit for deciphering it in modern times is given to the Englishman Henry Rawlinson. By its third stage it had become word-based.

In Egypt, hieroglyphic writing—in its hieroglyphic, hieratic and demotic forms—was contemporary with cuneiform. It had twenty-four signs, all consonants. There were no vowels, which caused considerable difficulty and ambiguity; to remedy this, additional special signs and pictures were employed. Writing was done with red ink on sheets of papyrus; the word 'paper' is derived from that papyrus. Both cuneiform and hieroglyphic writing proceeded from right to left. Contemporary Chinese writing, by contrast, proceeded from top to bottom. At first there was one sign for a word, but later a word came to be used for an idea. Chinese writing has no alphabet and contains 40,000 signs. The Elamites initially used their own native linear and picture-rich signs, but later adopted cuneiform, employing 113 signs, more than eighty of which were word-based.

The purely alphabet-based writing that developed in Syria–Cyprus and Palestine, and subsequently the script invented in Minoan civilisation, also bore the influence of word-based writing. Two forms of word-based writing once existed in China; their use came to an end there, but the practice continues in Japan, as discussed briefly above.

This may also be called an alphabet or a letter-based script. In other scripts, the number of signs had grown so large that it became impossible for a child to learn them all. The reason for the development of this kind of writing was economy of effort. A single script could now be used to write several languages.

The cuneiform of Mesopotamia, beside the Tigris and Euphrates—first in Sumer, then Babylon, and afterwards Assyria—never became an alphabet. Evidence exists of a relationship between this script and the Semitic languages. It could develop from pictorial to ideographic and then to phonetic writing. Even as a phonetic script, however, it could satisfy the requirements of nouns, pronouns, verbs and adverbs only through certain modifications. It then became word-based, and at that point its development ceased.

At a later stage the followers of Zarathustra in Mesopotamia made their script predominantly consonantal; it could be called a semi-alphabet. Its tendency towards artificial construction, however, increased, and linguists have also discerned such a tendency in Brahmi.

Crete likewise moved beyond picture-rich line drawings to create a script with 135 signs, based on ideas as well as sounds. Its writing proceeded both from left to right and from right to left.

A sculpture of the second century found at Nagarjunakonda depicts a scene in the court of King Śuddhodana: three soothsayers are interpreting a dream of Queen Māyā, the mother of the Buddha. Below them sits a scribe recording the interpretation. This is the oldest pictorial evidence yet available of the art of writing in India. There are, of course, older forms of evidence, including Harappan civilisation and Aśoka's inscriptions. Numerous inscriptions have also been found between the periods of Harappan culture and Aśoka, among them the Sohgaura copperplate, the Piprahwa Buddhist mound inscription, the stone inscriptions of Mahasthan and Barli, and the Bhattiprolu inscription.

The first use of writing in India occurred in the Harappan civilisation, although its script has not yet been deciphered. Its inscriptions are short; the longest contains twenty-six signs. Evidence of a signboard at the entrance to the settlement of Dholavira, in Gujarat, has been found: it contains nine signs.

Brahmi is written from left to right, and Kharoshthi from right to left. Both, however, developed on the basis of the Indian alphabetic system. Aśoka's inscriptions occur in both Brahmi and Kharoshthi, the latter at Mansehra and Shahbazgarhi. The English scholar James Prinsep succeeded in deciphering Brahmi in 1837 CE. Credit for deciphering Kharoshthi is jointly given to Colonel Masson and James Prinsep. Aśoka's name is written in these inscriptions as Piyadassi, and in some as Asoka, the Pali–Prakrit form of Aśoka. Aśoka's inscriptions also refer to scribes.

The Nārada Smṛti calls script the supreme eye and records that Brahmā created it.

The Bṛhaspati Smṛti states that memory begins to fail after six months, and that Brahmā therefore created letters written on leaves.

The script was called Brāhmī; this designation had been accepted by grammarians before Pāṇini. But the form Brāhmī was considered incorrect according to Pāṇinian grammar, and so the name became Brahmi. Pāṇini's Aṣṭādhyāyī and Amarasiṃha's Amarakośa discuss lipi and libi. In the Nirukta, Yāska, a grammarian before Pāṇini, names numerous earlier and contemporary grammarians. The existence of metres based on counting letters, and the presence of grammarians, indirectly suggest the existence of an art of writing. Three thousand years ago, between the Jhelum and Chenab rivers, in Gandhāra—where the Yusufzai Pathans now live—there was the confederated state of Dakṣa. In that region the Kabul River comes from the west to meet the Indus. Pāṇini was born four miles north of that confluence, in a small village belonging to his maternal grandmother; the village was then called Śalātura. The Chinese traveller Xuanzang (Yuan Chwang) mentioned the learned Brahmin grammarian of this village in the seventh century. Thus a tradition was maintained both before and after him.

The Jain Bhagavatī Sūtra offers a salutation to this Brahmi script.

The Pañcaviṃśa Brāhmaṇa mentions a minimum sacrificial gift of twelve kṛṣṇalas and a maximum of 393,016 kṛṣṇalas of gold.

Kauṭilya's Arthaśāstra directs that training in letters and numbers should begin after the cūḍākarman ceremony. It discusses the king's correspondence with his council of ministers and the transmission of coded messages by spies. The Arthaśāstra says that scribes should be skilled in writing rapidly, should write clearly, and should also be capable of reading a written document.

The Buddhist Suttanta mentions the game of akkharikā, a contest in which letters are formed in the air. Buddhist monks are prohibited from taking part in this game, but the Vinaya Piṭaka allows them to learn the art of writing. The Kaṭāha Jātaka speaks of deception by means of a forged letter, while in the Mahāsutasoma Jātaka a teacher at Taxila writes to a former student. The Kaṇha Jātaka uses akkhara, the Pali–Prakrit form of 'letter'. The Mahāvagga refers to instruction in numerals and words, while the Kaṭāha Jātaka mentions the smooth writing-board on which writing was taught. The Lalitavistara describes the Buddha's school of letters, his teacher Viśvāmitra, a sandalwood writing-board and a golden stylus. It describes sixty-four scripts, including, according to political boundaries, those of Aṅga, Magadha and Vaṅga; but instead of a script of Videha, it records the script of Eastern Videha. The reason given is that the Vajji had taken possession of Videha, and the scripts of Vajji and Videha together were known as the Videha script. Ajātaśatru conquered the Vajji in the third century and incorporated them politically into Magadha, but they preserved their cultural identity. The Lalitavistara is a work of the third century; therefore, alongside the Magadha script, it describes the script of Eastern Videha. This tendency became more firmly established later in the Gupta-period province of Tīrabhukti (Tirhut), and the Eastern Videha script acquired the name Tirhuta. The Lalitavistara also describes the young Siddhārtha's training in the alphabet and the arrangement of the lustre and ornamentation of alphabetic letters, which are features of the Brahmi script.

There are remarkable similarities between the northern Semitic alphabet and Brahmi: aleph and अ, beth and ब्, gimel and ग, daleth and द, he and ह, waw and व, zayin and ज, heth and घ, teth and थ, yodh and य, kaph and क, lamedh and ल, mem and म, nun and न, samekh and स, ayin and ए, pe and प, sadhe and च, and qoph and ख. These similarities indicate how the human mind can work alike even across great distances. Bühler was misled into believing that Brahmi had imitated the northern Semitic script. This was the period in which Harappa and Mohenjo-daro were also regarded as outposts of Mesopotamia, until excavations elsewhere in India revealed the indigenous character of Harappan culture (Hermann Kulke and Dietmar Rothermund, A History of India, 2004, p. 19). Yet on page 54 they remain under the misconception that Kharoshthi developed from Aramaic, then the official script of Persia. Aramaic has only twenty-two letters, lacks a complete representation of vowels, does not distinguish short and long vowels, and has no vowel-mātrās; it is therefore unsuitable for Indian languages. Kharoshthi has all these features, together with differentiating signs for the guṇa and vṛddhi grades of vowels. It was as capable as Brahmi of recording Prakrit inscriptions. Merely being written from right to left does not make it foreign. Kharoshthi proceeds from right to left, but its alphabet is Indian. Some scholars detect Persian influence because of its direction of writing; the fact remains that Brahmi and Kharoshthi employed the same alphabet.

In music, the seven notes of Indian sa-re-ga-ma and the seven notes of the Western octave—the word 'octave' merely indicating that the sequence recommences with the eighth—show that, whatever the language, the human ear is the same. Braille and the International Phonetic Alphabet likewise provide evidence of a broadly common communication of sound and mind (Braille); see the appendix. At first some scholars considered Kharoshthi a foreign script and called it Bactro-Pali or Ariano-Pali. Cunningham called it Gandhari. But the testimony of the Lalitavistara and the Chinese encyclopaedia Fa-wang-shu-lin was decisive, and the name given there, Kharoshthi, became generally accepted. Chinese testimony attributes the creation of Brahmi to Brahmā, and the creation of Kharoshthi to the Brahmin teacher Kharoṣṭha. After the third century, inscriptions began to be written in Sanskrit, and the use of Prakrit ceased. Both Brahmi and Kharoshthi could serve Prakrit; but for Sanskrit, with its elaborate and complex words, compounds, inflections and sandhi, only Brahmi could do so. Once the use of Kharoshthi came to an end, scripts descended from Brahmi began to be used even for the languages derived from Prakrit.

Besides Brahmi, the Lalitavistara mentions sixty-three other scripts. Throughout Europe, apart from Greece and the Russian Commonwealth, where different scripts are used, the Roman script is employed. Thus Europe today has only three scripts. If Russia is removed from Europe, the situation is comparable to that of India. In India, almost every province has a different script, yet—Tamil apart—the handling of the alpha-syllabic system of letters and conjunct letters is broadly similar in all of them. The reason is simply the late arrival of the printing press.

Brahmi possessed a standard form, as Aśoka's inscriptions demonstrate. In his fourteenth rock edict, Aśoka says that the merits and defects of the lettering are the responsibility of the scribe. This explains the uniformity of the letters and their shapes in Aśoka's inscriptions and also establishes that Brahmi had acquired a standard form by his reign. Whatever differences occur arise from region, individual scribal handwriting, and the variety of writing implements. Judged by present-day standards, even the irregularities introduced by ancient implements when engraving uneven stones, caves and the like strengthen the case for the existence of standard Brahmi. Punctuation did not exist in Sanskrit, and the same tradition continued in Prakrit. Brahmi scribes therefore did not regard grammatical punctuation marks as necessary.

The characteristics of the Kuṭila script inspired several names: the 'acute-angled alphabet' (Bühler, Indian Palaeography, p. 68); the 'nail-headed alphabet' (Tod, Annals of Rajasthan, p. 700); and the Indian designation Siddhamātṛkā, in use in Kashmir and Varanasi (al-Biruni, India, p. 173, Sachau). The Deval inscription uses the term kuṭilākṣaraṇī. Ādityasena's Afsad stone inscription calls it vikaṭākṣaraṇī. The Vikramāṅkadevacarita mentions Kāyasthas accomplished in the Kuṭila script.

James Prinsep, who deciphered Aśoka's inscriptions in 1837 CE, recommended the name Kuṭila script (Journal of the Asiatic Society of Bengal, Part V, p. 778).

What caused the development of Kuṭila? First, the use of reed pens and ink, together with new implements and new applications of older ones, created a desire for ornamental inscriptional writing. A preference for cursive handwriting also contributed. The upper parts of letters became hood-like because the ink spread, and tails and lower strokes became more pronounced. Ornamentation gradually gave the characters rounded and smooth forms. It was because of such ornamentation that the script acquired the name Siddhamātṛkā.

Inscriptions in the Kuṭila script have been found on a clay lamp-stand with seven lamps at Kauśāmbī (reminiscent of the Buddhist seven-syllabled cipher of the Mauryan period, associated with a well-known mantra); Yaśodharman's inscription at Mandsaur; Īśānavarman's Haraha stone inscription; Sarvavarman's Asirgarh seal inscription; Anantavarman's Barabar and Nagarjuni cave inscriptions; Īśvaravarman's Jaunpur stone inscription; the inscription on the image at Shahpur; the Mandagiri inscription; the Devavarnark pillar inscription of Jīvitagupta II; Harṣavardhana's Madhuban and Banskhera copperplate inscriptions; and Harṣavardhana's Sonipat seal inscription.

The Limbu language and others were written in the Kirat script. These scripts are written from left to right, but the coded characters of Rañjanā script are written from top to bottom. Nandinagari, a form of Nagari, was used principally in the central Deccan and southern India; Sanskrit manuscripts of Madhvācārya's philosophy of dualism are written in Nandinagari.

Following the model of writing, sign language for deaf people was devised in the eighteenth century CE (Common Era) by Charles-Michel de l'Épée of France in a school for deaf pupils. It is a form of writing created not on paper but in the air, in the surrounding space. Louis Braille of France invented the Braille script for blind people in the nineteenth century. In the twentieth century, Raghunath Murmu invented the Ol Chiki script for the Santali language.

The principal inscriptions of the eastern variety of Brahmi include the Prayag praśasti of Samudragupta, composed by Hariṣeṇa and inscribed on Aśoka's pillar; the Udayagiri cave inscription of Chandragupta II;

Skandagupta's Kahaum pillar inscription; and the Garhwa inscriptions of Chandragupta II and Kumaragupta I.

In tracing the Tirhuta script, we shall move from the northern and southern divisions to northern India, and then from northern India towards the northeast. The distinction between the scripts of northern and southern India can be discerned in the letter म. The distinction between the eastern and western varieties within northern India can be observed in श, ष, ल and ह.

In the eastern variety of Gupta-period inscriptions, the left limb of ल slopes straight downwards (as, for example, in the separate inscription at Jaugada). The base of ष was made round, and its middle sign became garland-like. The base sign of ह was pushed aside, and its curved portion was joined to the vertical stroke.

Although Skandagupta's Bhitari pillar inscription is located in eastern India, it employs the western variety of northern Indian writing. Perhaps the artisan came from the west. Another consideration is that the boundary between the eastern and western varieties of northern Brahmi kept changing. The Rāṣṭrakūṭas, Gurjara-Pratīhāras and Pālas struggled for control of Kanauj approximately between 750 and 1200 CE. Whenever the Gurjara-Pratīhāras prevailed in these alternating wars, the work of western scribes and artists extended eastwards. Similarly, whenever the Pālas gained the upper hand, eastern artisans found employment farther west. Western Brahmi developed into Nagari, while eastern Brahmi developed into Tirhuta, Assamese, Bengali and Odia. The western limit of the eastern variety was set by the Pāla kingdom, Magadha, and Videha together with Vajji. By the tenth century, the eastern limit of Nagari had become Banaras, and Nagari had diverged completely from eastern Brahmi.

Consider Mithila's Karṇāṭa dynasty. In Jyotiriśvara Ṭhākura's Varṇaratnākara, Harasiṃhadeva appears as a nāyaka or king. Born in 1294 CE, he ascended the throne in 1307. After defeat by Ghiyāth al-Dīn Tughlaq in 1324–25, he fled to Nepal. Before that defeat, however, he had tried to establish the Pañjī-prabandha, or genealogical registration system, among Brahmins, Kāyasthas and Kṣatriyas of Mithila. The formally appointed founders were Guṇākara Jha for Maithil Brahmins, Śaṅkaradatta for Karṇa Kāyasthas, and Vijayadatta for Kṣatriyas. Harasiṃhadeva was a descendant of Nānyadeva. In 1326 CE the scholars of Mithila decided to initiate the existing form of the Pañjī-prabandha.

Although Harasiṃhadeva had already left Mithila by then, he was symbolically acknowledged as its founder.

Brahmi thus developed into northern and southern varieties. The northern variety split further into eastern and western forms, and by approximately the tenth century the eastern script had become entirely distinct from the western one. The area of the eastern script came to comprise Magadha, Aṅga and Tirhut. Nagari, the western form of Brahmi, had been confined to the region west of Prayag until the fall of the Gupta empire, but by the eighth century it had reached Varanasi. In the twelfth century both western and eastern types were used in Magadha south of the Ganges. Farther east than Magadha, however, only the eastern type survived south of the Ganges; in Tirhut to the north of the river, likewise, only the eastern type remained. After the Muslim invasions, the western type spread throughout Magadha; but until the fourteenth century the eastern script had not altogether ceased to be used there, as the Mahabodhi Temple at Gaya exemplifies.

The writing of the Pañjī registers began in 1326 CE, and from that time until the twentieth century they continued to be written in Tirhuta without change. The same form ultimately became the basis of the font. (See, on Google Books, the Videha Archive's 11,000 palm-leaf and basah-paper Pañjī records, covering the period from the beginning to the twentieth century; by the end of the twentieth century even the Pañjī began to be written in Devanagari.) The dividing line in Tirhuta's origin and development is therefore 1326 CE, when its definitive form was established. Variations between better and poorer handwriting among the genealogical registrars may be treated simply as different designs of the Tirhuta font.

After Maithili was included in the Eighth Schedule, the central government permitted only Devanagari for Maithili in Union Public Service Commission examinations and official business. Earlier, Sanskrit was written in Devanagari, Tirhuta, Bengali, Tamil and other scripts; now the government has ordered Sanskrit to be written only in Devanagari. In Bihar, Jharkhand and elsewhere, however, one may still symbolically write Maithili in either Devanagari or Tirhuta for school and college examinations and in examinations of the Bihar Public Service Commission. For Union Public Service Commission examinations and other central-government purposes, the government has prescribed Devanagari for Sanskrit, Hindi, Maithili, Marathi, Konkani, Dogri, Bodo and Nepali; Ol Chiki or Devanagari for Santali; Arabic or Devanagari for Sindhi; Persian script for Urdu and Kashmiri; and Bengali script for Manipuri and Bengali. Assamese, Gujarati, Kannada, Malayalam, Odia, Tamil and Telugu are to be written in their respective eponymous scripts, and Punjabi in Gurmukhi.

Let us now return to the development of Tirhuta. Until the fall of the Gupta Empire, the western limit of the eastern variety of the script lay around the region of Prayag; by the eighth century this variety had reached Kashi. From the twelfth to the fourteenth century the eastern variety remained in use in Magadha; thereafter only Nagari was current in that region. In the fourteenth century, the writing of the genealogical registers (panji) began in 1326. Following the Muslim invasions, the development of Tirhuta came to a complete standstill, and the script remained, until the twentieth century, essentially in the form it had assumed at that time.

The north-eastern variety possesses certain distinctive features. A new form of "ख" (kha) is encountered. In an inscription at Bodh Gaya the base of "ख" has a triangular shape. In the post-Ashokan, or later Mauryan, period, the letter "च" (ca) has two curling forms on either side of a vertical stroke; but the two curves are unequal, one small and the other large, and therefore do not make a circle. In the inscriptions on the railings surrounding the Mahabodhi Temple, along the path of circumambulation of the Buddha, "य" (ya) and "ज" (ja) are of the northern Indian variety, while "ल" (la) is sinuous. The inscription on the detached stone at Jaugada, however, is written in an extremely sinuous manner, a characteristic that becomes more pronounced in the eastern variety of early Gupta inscriptions (fourth–fifth centuries). The sinuous form of "ह" (ha) found at Jaugada is also seen subsequently in the eastern variety.

Dasharatha's Nagarjuni cave inscription belongs to the north-eastern variety; the same characteristic subsequently appears in inscriptions on the pillars of the circumambulatory railing at the Mahabodhi Temple.

The sinuous "ल" of the Nagarjuni cave inscription deserves attention. Its "श" (śa) resembles the form in the Kalsi inscription and is an antecedent of the curled eastern "श" of the fourth and fifth centuries. "स" (sa) is also altered: its upper pointed projection becomes longer and bends slightly, taking the appearance of a second stroke.

Inscriptions discovered at Sarnath (from the first century BCE to the first century CE)

The eastern form of the northern Indian variety of Brahmi is found on the stone placed beneath the Mahabodhi tree at Bodh Gaya. The vertical stroke of "प" (pa) has become shorter; the triangular lower part of "म"

(ma) resembles the pre-Kushan form. "श" is angular, and its horizontal stroke does not touch the vertical line on the left. A sinuous "ह" appears on the Bodhisattva image at Sahet-Mahet, while an angular "ह" occurs elsewhere. The rear part of "स" is broad. "य" is sometimes written as a subscript and has three prongs.

The eastern variety is clearly recognisable in "ल", "ह", "ष" (ṣa) and "स". The principal inscriptions of this period are Samudragupta's Prayag pillar panegyric; Chandragupta II's Udayagiri cave inscription; the broken Garhwa inscriptions of Chandragupta II and Kumaragupta I; Kumaragupta I's Dhanaidaha grant; Kumaragupta I's Man Kunwar inscription; Skandagupta's Bihar pillar inscription; the inscription on the image of Bhimavarman at Kosam; and Skandagupta's Kauham pillar inscription.

How are the differences between varieties of script to be identified?

The artistic differences between the northern and southern Indian varieties, including Nagari, can be recognised by looking at the letter "म". Within northern India, the differences between the eastern and western varieties can be identified by examining "ष", "ल" and "ह".

— "य" with three prongs;

— a tendency towards right angles at the base of "घ", "प", "फ", "ष" and "स", together with the absence, in these characters, of the rightward tail or extension that developed in the western variety.

"आ" (ā): in the second curve, a semicolon-like opening or separation is joined to the lower part of the right-hand limb.

"उ" (u): the horizontal line at the base changed into a curve and grew longer. It remained in this form until the tenth century, when it eventually developed into its final form.

"ख" (kha): the base of the character formed a triangle; this subsequently became a straight line and then curved. One side of the triangle turned into a semicircle, while the other lengthened and touched both arcs of the circle.

"ग" (ga): curvature in the baseline had begun to appear in the eastern variety from the early Gupta period. In the sixth-century inscription of Yashodharman, the baseline turns towards the left and becomes oblique on the right, making an acute angle with the vertical stroke on the right.

"ज" (ja): the horizontal shape of the lower portion had been distinct in the eastern variety since the early Gupta period. Now a pronounced curve appeared in the vertical line as well. The new middle horizontal stroke curved as much as the lower baseline. A V-shaped element was added at the right end of the upper horizontal stroke.

"घ" (gha): the curve of its baseline had begun to appear in the eastern variety during the early Gupta period. It now came to resemble the three-pronged "य".

"ण" (ṇa): the baseline became oblique, forming an acute angle on the right side of the lower part, while the pointed projection on the left grew longer.

"भ" (bha): the distinction between "भ" and "ह्" disappeared; this had already happened in the western variety.

"म" (ma): the acute angle became still sharper, with the result that the right-hand limb extended downwards.

"य" (ya): two forms are found. The first is two-pronged, with an acute angle in its lower portion. In the second, the acute angle is less distinct, but the right-hand limb extends farther downwards.

"व" (va): a change similar to the formation of the triangular base of "ख" is visible here. Both sides of the triangle become curved and the third becomes longer. A V-shaped form appears above the letter.

"ह" (ha): the right-hand limb develops a curve and the pointed projection lengthens; a somewhat slanting V-shaped figure appears at the top, while the hitherto horizontal baseline becomes slightly oblique.

Throughout the Afsad inscription, the dental "स" is used.

"श" (śa) occurs in three forms. The first is the ancient form, whose upper portion is rounded. The later form lacks a stalk. An intermediate form has a stalk-like element, but this touches the acute angle below instead of joining the vertical stroke on the right.

After Dharmapala, Tirhut remained under Devapala. Thereafter, however, the Gurjara-Pratihara emperor wrested Tirhut away during the reigns of Vigrahapala I and Narayanapala.

"च" (ca): the curvature increased.

"ज" (ja): in the older form, the middle horizontal line bends slightly downwards, while the lower horizontal line ends in a small curve.

"ट/ठ" (ṭa/ṭha): the right-hand limb is not visible.

"भ" (bha): bent downwards.

"ष" (ṣa): the upper line became oblique.

"स" (sa): the baseline became horizontal again, while the upper line bent downwards.

"अ/आ" (a/ā): these possess the fully developed Tirhuta form. Even the short line that meets the semicolon-like notch on the right vertical stroke bends downwards.

"त" (ta): this has changed. An upper line and a vertical line meet at right angles, while a curve has been added to the left of the vertical line, as in Nagari.

The characteristics of the eastern variety are visible here: "च" has grown thinner; "ज" has become sinuous; "थ" (tha) appears to be an early form of the Tirhuta letter; "म" has a hook or loop; in "श", the hook joins the vertical stroke; and in "ष" the upper line slopes downwards. This grant thus presents a mixed form combining eastern and western features.

Some scripts that have not yet been deciphered

(1) The Harappan script.

(3) The Shankha script: its characters resemble conch shells, which accounts for its name. It too was used principally for names and signatures. (Among the three inscriptions found on the Ashokan pillar at Kolhua in Muzaffarpur—the Basarh pillar—some characters belong to the Shankha script.)

(4) A script resembling Brahmi, found on terracotta seals from Chandraketugarh and Tamluk in eastern India.

Some letters acquired their Tirhuta forms earlier, while others did so somewhat later. Certain letters do not occur at all in some inscriptions. Appendix 5 shows the successive stages through which the Tirhuta forms developed. Kaithi, Tibetan and Devanagari likewise reached their present forms through processes of this kind, as shown in the appendix. Some scholars discuss how, after Harshavardhana's time, his minister Arjuna of Tirhut became king of Kannauj and harassed Tibetan Buddhist travellers, and how Tibet, in retaliation, occupied Tirhut. Modern scholars have expressed doubts about this account. Tibetan political domination is doubtful, but the following evidence reveals the cultural presence of Tibetan Vajrayana in Mithila. There are representations of the Buddhist goddess Tara at Wari in Samastipur and at the Ugratara Temple in Mahishi, Saharsa. Musaharniya Dih is a high mound near Pastan village, three kilometres west of Andhratharhi. Remains of a Buddhist-period single-cell chamber, Buddhist images, coins, fragments of vessels and traces of habitation are found there. A similar Buddhist-period single-cell chamber occurs at the Nahar Bhagwatipur Bhuvaneshwari Temple in Madhubani; it was probably a place of meditation for Buddhist monks. The Buddhist siddha Sarahapada writes: "सिद्धिरत्थु मइ पढमे पढिअउ, मण्ड पिबन्तों बिसरउ एमइउ।" He refers both to siddhirastu and to the notion that drinking māṇḍ—rice-water—dulls the intellect. From this the author finds evidence that the Buddhist Sarahapada was a Maithil. In the portrait of him obtained from Tibet, the description below his picture is written in Tibetan script.

The Andhratharhi inscription (Shridharadas's Andhratharhi inscription) in Madhubani; the inscription on the Buddha image at Korthu; the inscription on the Vishnu image at Ladho; the twelfth-century Tirhuta inscription on stone at Simraungarh; the nineteenth-century Brahmapura stone inscription, which displays an exemplary form of Tirhuta; Gaurishankar Sthan between the villages of Jamthari and Hainthi Bali in Madhubani district, where an image combining Gauri and Shankara bears a Pala-dynasty inscription in Mithilakshara; and the Tirhuta inscription of the period of Maharaja Madhav Singh, who established the Shiva shrine at Bideshwar near Lohna Road railway station in Madhubani district—all provide evidence. At Mandar Hill in Banka there is a seventh-century inscription in Tirhuta from the Gupta period. According to a Puranic narrative, Mandar was used to churn the ocean. Nearby, at Bounsi, are two images of Vasupujya Nath, the twelfth Jain Tirthankara. The larger image is of red stone, while the other is of bronze, with two footprints in front of it. Vasupujya Nath, the twelfth Jain Tirthankara, was born in Champanagar and attained nirvana here. The Basaiti inscription, near Srinagar in Purnia (Araria district), describes the reign of Rani Indravati, the first woman ruler of Mithila. Madaneshwar Mishra based his novel Ek Chhalih Maharani (There Once Was a Queen) on this inscription. The Baisi-Basaiti Tirhuta copperplate at Araria records Rani Indravati (1784–1802), who initiated food-for-work and other welfare schemes. Inscribed in Mithilakshara, it has been fastened above a temple, painted black, and made to look like a stone inscription.

In an article published in 2019, Jalaj Kumar Tiwari and S. Krishnamurthy describe the following Tirhuta inscriptions, which, according to them, had not previously appeared in any book. An inscription in Tirhuta script and Sanskrit was found on a Buddha image at Chechar village (Vaishali), dated to the ninth century. An inscription in Tirhuta script and Sanskrit on a Tara image from Jagatpur Baruary (Supaul), now kept in the Saharsa Museum, dates from the tenth century. Another inscription in Tirhuta and Sanskrit on a Tara image comes from Dabhai Cha (Vaishali), also dated to the tenth century. The inscription on a Vishnu image at Piprauliya in Darbhanga is in Tirhuta and Sanskrit (tenth century). An inscription from Bhachchhi village, near Baheri in Darbhanga district—not Bhachchhi in Madhubani—uses Tirhuta and Sanskrit and dates to the tenth–eleventh century. The stone inscription at Kandaha (Saharsa) was written by the Brahmin Vanshadhar at the command of King Narasimhadeva of the Oinwar period (fifteenth-century Tirhuta script; Sanskrit language). An inscription on an image of Manasa at Bhairavsthan, Muzaffarpur, is in Tirhuta and Sanskrit (fifteenth century). An inscription on a Buddha image from Korthu, Darbhanga, is in Tirhuta and Sanskrit (tenth century). The authors also discuss a first-century Brahmi pillar inscription from Pakhauli village in Vaishali district. Three inscriptions were subsequently carved on the Ashokan pillar found at Kolhua, Muzaffarpur. Two are dated to the seventh century and are in Nagari script and Sanskrit; the third is dated to the fifth century and is in Brahmi script and Sanskrit. Some letters in the three inscriptions on the Ashokan pillar at Kolhua—the Basarh pillar—also belong to the Shankha script and have not yet been deciphered. (Jalaj Kumar Tiwari and S. Krishnamurthy, Mithila Bharati, vol. 6, nos. 1–4, 2019.)

We can thus trace the evolution of Tirhuta through the following sequence: the Mauryas in the third century BCE; the Shungas in the second and first centuries BCE; the Shakas and Kushanas from the first to the third century; the Guptas from the fourth to the sixth century; Siddhamatrika from the seventh to the ninth century; and Tirhuta thereafter. Contributions from Tantra and the influence of Tibetan script gave Tirhuta an ornamental character. In Mithilakshar ka Udbhav aur Vikas (The Origin and Development of Mithilakshara), Rajeshwar Jha could not detach himself from certain old suppositions. For instance, he could not clarify the claim that the script was used as Brahmi by grammarians before Panini, that its form was corrupted in Panini's grammar, and that from that point its name became Brahmi. He insists instead that the name Brahmi arose because the script was used by Brahmins. His proposition that Brāhmī—which he writes as Brahmī—emerged from the Vaidehī script is also misleading. In Mithila, small inscriptions in the Shankha script have been found, as mentioned above. Like the Harappan script, these have not been deciphered, while inscriptions in Brahmi have also been found. Consequently his assertion that people came directly from Harappa to Videha with Videgha Mathava, as described in the Shatapatha Brahmana, and introduced the Vaidehi script here, is not acceptable. The practice found elsewhere in India—writing longer inscriptions in Brahmi but using the Shankha script for names and signatures—is also found in Mithila. Rajeshwar Jha has likewise exaggerated the influence of Tantric doctrine on the Tirhuta script. Tantra did have an influence, in part directly and in part through Tibetan script, but its effect was to ornament Tirhuta. His statement that the writing method given in the Shabdakalpadruma can be used only for Mithilakshara (Tirhuta) and not for Bengali is similarly misleading. Bengali, Mithilakshara, Tibetan and Devanagari all derive from Brahmi. To understand this, one may consider the wide variety of Roman-script fonts: one may resemble Arabic, another may be cursive, yet the texts are convertible from one font to another. The method described in the Shabdakalpadruma was applicable not only to Tirhuta but also to Bengali. With the advent of printing, Roman letters largely dispensed with ligatures; in the same way Bengali abandoned many conjunct characters. Rajeshwar Jha erred in associating this newer printed form with the method given in the Shabdakalpadruma. He is also mistaken about the Kharoshthi script. Kharoshthi was written from right to left, but it was entirely an Indian script, possessing the same vowels and consonants, including the series beginning ka, ca, ṭa, ta, and pa. Because it had fewer signs than Brahmi, when inscriptions began to be written in Sanskrit rather than Prakrit, Kharoshthi became unsuitable for writing the compound-heavy inscriptions of Sanskrit and disappeared. No Indian script subsequently developed from it.

The development of the modern Tirhuta form can be followed through Narayanapala's Bhagalpur copperplate grant, Shrichandra's Rampal grant, Mahipala I's Bangarh grant, Bhojavarman's Belwa grant, and Lakshmanasena's Tarpan Nidhi grant, reaching its culmination in the Vishnupurana written by Pakshadhar Mishra and the genealogical registers of Maithil Brahmins and Karna Kayasthas preserved from 1326 CE onward. Minor differences caused by the individual hands of scribes disappeared with the arrival of printing. Ramlochan Sharan (1889–1971) began publishing Maithili in Tirhuta. Later, computer fonts brought greater uniformity; this became possible through the use of Devanagari Unicode (Mangal), Bengali Unicode (Vrinda), and subsequently Tirhuta Unicode as bases. Letterpress printing presented difficulties, requiring certain shapes to be abandoned. It was sometimes argued that learning this printed Tirhuta would not enable a reader to decipher manuscripts. With computer fonts, different fonts built upon the same underlying encoding can represent different handwriting styles and can be converted into one another. It has therefore become possible to accommodate all the varieties appearing after 1326, including conjunct letters: these were not changes in the script itself, but different styles of writing.

Comparative Study: Maithili and the Neighbouring Indo-Aryan and Austroasiatic Languages

Phonology, morphological patterns and original-language comparative evidence

The vowel pronounced as “a” in Maithili is pronounced as “ā” in Assamese. The Assamese vowel “a” has no corresponding pronunciation in Maithili.

Assamese “ca” and “cha” are pronounced like the Maithili “sa”. Assamese “ja”, “jha”, and “ya” are pronounced like Maithili “ja”; in many Maithili contexts, too, “ya” is pronounced like “ja”.

In Assamese, both retroflex and dental consonants are pronounced as alveolar sounds.

For ṭa, ṭha, ḍa, ḍha, ṇa, ta, tha, da, dha, and na, there is no difference of pronunciation: all are pronounced as alveolars.

Śa, ṣa, and sa are all pronounced like “sa”. In Maithili, “ṣa” is sometimes pronounced like “kha”, whereas “śa” and “sa” are generally both pronounced like “sa”.

When śa, ṣa, and sa appear with “ra” or between two vowels, Assamese also has a third manner of pronunciation without a precise counterpart in Maithili.

In Assamese, a word ending in a conjunct consonant is pronounced with a final inherent vowel. The letter “ña” is pronounced like “na”.

Maithili–Assamese Vocabulary

The forms in both columns are preserved in the original languages to make the linguistic comparison verifiable.

Maithili	Assamese
ऐ (अइ)	एइ
चाह	साह
हमर	मोर
कनियाँ	परिवार
परिवार	संसार
बहीन	मनी
जलखै/जलपान	जलपान

Maithili	Assamese
दही	दोइ
नारिकेलक लड्डू (लड़ू)	नारिकलर लारू
सुआद (सोआद)	सोआद
नीक (भल)	भाल
बेस (बड्ड)	बेस
खाउ	खाओक
लिअ	लओक
जाउ	जाओक
करू	करक
अपने	आपुनि
करबाक/करू (करक)	करक
जएबाक (जाउ)	जाओक
अहाँ	आहा
धानक	धानर
दिअ	दियक
दे	दे
बाड़ीमे	बाड़ीत
औषध	औसध
नेबू (नेबो)	नेमु
कथा (गप)	कथा
एक बेर	एबार
दुइ	दुइ
चारि	सारि
मते (अनुसारे)	मते
लगाति	लगत
खेनाइ	खा
तूँ (पुरातन-तोइ)	तोइ
आइ-काल्हि	आजिकालि

Maithili	Assamese
करह	कर्अ
कतऽ	कोत
नहि (नइँ)	नाइ
चाहक पात	साह पात
बाँस	बाँह
नोकसान	लोकसान
बौस्तु	बस्तु
आनौं (आनी)	आनौं
करौं (करी)	करौं
लिखौं (लिखू)	लिखौं
एक बेर	एबार
आबह	आह
टाका-पाइ (पइसा)	टका-पइसा
के	कोन
परिवार	परियाल
छौरा	लोरा
रखलौं	राखिसों
◌ृाति	राति
बजे	बजात
प्रायः	प्राय
भाराक घर	भाराघर
डेढ़ हजार	डेर हेजार
बेसी	बेसि
पचास	पसास
हाथी	हाँती
हरिण	हरिणा
पोखरि	पुखुरि

Assamese adds the particle -he to emphasise a word. The suffix -janī marks the feminine and -jan marks the masculine.

Assamese uses three kinds of plural marking: -lok with pronouns such as tumi, teõ, and āpuni; -bor with nouns carrying a familiar or depreciative sense; and -hāt with pronouns such as toi, si, ei, and tāi and with certain relational nouns.

Assamese Singular and Plural

The forms in both columns are preserved in the original languages to make the linguistic comparison verifiable.

Singular	Plural
तुमि	तोमालोक
आपुनि	आपोनालोक
तेओ	तेओंलोक
तइ	तहँत
सि	सिहँत
एइ	एइहँत
ताइ	ताइहँत/सिहँत
लोरा	लोराबोर
किताप	कितापबोर
घर	घरबोर

For “this” or “this one”, Assamese uses ei; for “that” or “that one”, sei. For “will be necessary”, it uses lāgib.

In Assamese questions, -no is attached to the word receiving emphasis. Adding -owā to a verbal root creates an adjective denoting the past.

Adding -ā to a root produces a verbal noun.

To form the passive in Assamese, -ā is added to a verbal root, followed by -hay or -jāy.

Like Maithili, Assamese changes the form of the verb according to tense.

Maithili and Bengali

Maithili–Bengali Vocabulary

The forms in both columns are preserved in the original languages to make the linguistic comparison verifiable.

Maithili	Bengali
अपने	आपनि
नै (नहि)	नय
छी	आछि/छि
काज	काज
इनार	इनार
करै (करैत) छी	कोरेछि
गेल छलौं (छलहुँ)	गियेछिलाम
बाजू नै	बोलबेन ना
रान्हल	रान्ना
की	कि
संगे	शंगे
चाह	चा
दू टा	दुटो
ई सब	एशब
सिंघाड़ा	शिङाड़ा
कोन	कोन
हाथ	हात
अखन	ऐखोन
पाँचटा	पाँचटा
अच्छा	आच्छा
छथि	आछेन
छी	आछि
हुअय	आछो
करू	कोरून
चाही	चाइ
खोलै छी	खुलछि
कोनो	कोनो

Bengali “a” is pronounced like “o”, as in Odia.

As in Maithili, there is no consistent short–long distinction in the pronunciations of i/ī and u/ū. The vowel ai is pronounced as a+i in Maithili, but as o+ī in Bengali. Bengali au is pronounced as o+u.

Bengali pronounces “na” and “ṇa” alike. In Maithili, “ṇa” is sometimes pronounced as “ṛa”; for example, Gaṇeś becomes Gaṛes.

The letters va and ba alike are pronounced as “ba”, as they often are in Maithili.

Maithili writes and pronounces the month Āśvin as Āsin, whereas Bengali writes Āśvin but pronounces it Āśśin.

Thus:

Bengali: Written and Spoken Forms (I)

The forms in both columns are preserved in the original languages to make the linguistic comparison verifiable.

Bengali spelling	Bengali pronunciation
अन्वेषण	अन्नेशन
श्वास	शाश
उच्छ्वास	उच्छास
अक्षर	अक्खोर
पद्म	पद्दो
विस्मय	बिश्शय
उज्जवल	उज्जल

Bengali also has the following differences between spelling and speech:

Bengali: Written and Spoken Forms (II)

The forms in both columns are preserved in the original languages to make the linguistic comparison verifiable.

Bengali spelling	Bengali pronunciation
संस्हा	शंस्था
स्हान	स्थान
सुस्ह्	शुस्थो
असुस्ह्	अशुस्थो

In Bengali the particle -to is attached to a word for special emphasis.

A noun or pronoun referring to a previously identified object takes -ṭā or -ṭi in the singular, and -gulo or -guli in the plural.

Numerals may take the suffixes -ṭā, -ṭi, -ṭe, or -ṭo, but not -gulo or -guli.

Relational or genitive forms are used with expressions equivalent to “with” and “for”, as follows:

Cāyer śaṅge — with tea.

Āmār śaṅge — with me.

Āmār jonye — for me.

In Bengali, the oblique form of a pronoun takes -der to form a relational or possessive form.

Āmā → āmāder — my / our.

Āpanā → āpanāder — yours (respectful).

Tomā → tomāder — yours (familiar).

Enā → enāder — theirs / his or her (honorific, according to context).

The particle -nā is placed after a present-tense imperative for emphasis.

Maithili dekhu ne corresponds to Bengali dekhun nā (“do look”).

Maithili uses gemination plus the vowel e to stress a word, as in kamme and ekke. Bengali attains a comparable effect with -i, as in kami.

The negative of Maithili achi (“is”) is nahi achi; the negative of Bengali āche is simply nei.

In the imperfective tense, a vowel-final root takes -cch after its oblique form, whereas a consonant-final root takes -ch. A personal ending is then added after the tense marker.

Maithili–Bengali Verbal and Lexical Forms

The forms in both columns are preserved in the original languages to make the linguistic comparison verifiable.

Maithili	Bengali
हम अबै छी	আমি ফিরিছি
हम जाइ छी	আমি জাচ্ছি
ओ सब आबै छथि	উনি ফিরছেন
अहाँ जाइ छी	আপনি জাচ্ছেন
तूँ आबै छँ	তুমি ফিরছো

Maithili	Bengali
तूँ जाइ छैं	तुमि जाच्छो
ओ सब अबैत छथि	तिनि फिरछेन
ओ सब जाइ छथि	तिनि जाच्छेन
ओ आबै छथि	शे फिरछे
ओ जाइ छथि	शे जाच्छे
अहाँ अबैत छी	आपनि फिरछेन
अहाँ करैत छी	आपनि कोरछेन

Bengali has a kind of non-finite verb formed by adding -te to the oblique form of a verbal root.

Karay me — korte (kor + te), “to do”.

Jāy me — jete (jā + te), “to go”.

Ābay me — āśte (āś + te), “to come”.

Like Maithili, Bengali uses o, ār, and ebaṁ to join words and clauses; Maithili also uses ebaṁ / evam. Bengali o can additionally mean “with”.

Hamhū́— āmi o (“I too”).

The ordinary present-tense form is made by adding a personal suffix to the verbal root.

Kar + i = kori.

Kar + en = karen.

Kar + o = karo.

Kar + iś = koriś.

Kar + e = kare.

Maithili and Bhojpuri

In Bhojpuri:

Bhojpuri Sound Correspondences

The forms in both columns are preserved in the original languages to make the linguistic comparison verifiable.

Replaced form	Bhojpuri form
ण	न
ल	र

Replaced form	Bhojpuri form
ष	ख
श	स

Bhojpuri uses companion or paired words of four kinds: antonymic, synonymous, alliterative, and pairs conveying a special sense.

Antonymic companion words

Bhojpuri Antonymic Companion Words

The forms in both columns are preserved in the original languages to make the linguistic comparison verifiable.

Word	Antonymic companion
हकासल	पियासल
लरम	गरम
रकम	पताई
साँप	गोजर

Synonymous companion words

Bhojpuri Synonymous Companion Words

The forms in both columns are preserved in the original languages to make the linguistic comparison verifiable.

Word	Synonymous companion
लकड़ी	काठी
कनिया	बहरिया
पुरखा	पुरनिया
किन	बेसाह
बिआ	बाल
नेग	चार

Alliterative companion words

Bhojpuri Alliterative Companion Words

The forms in both columns are preserved in the original languages to make the linguistic comparison verifiable.

Word	Alliterative companion
अखोर	बखोर
हरवा	हथियार
बोहनी	बट्टा
पर	पाहुन
चासा	बासा
चिरई	चुरुंग

Companion words with special meanings

Bhojpuri Companion Words with Special Meanings

The forms in both columns are preserved in the original languages to make the linguistic comparison verifiable.

Word	Special-sense companion
सेवा	खरचा
अह	जह
तगड़	बगड़
अकट	बहेर
आउँज	गाउँज

Some Bhojpuri prefixes

ni-: nidardī (“merciless”).

ku-: kuanna (“bad grain/food”).

adh-: adhamaru (“half-dead”).

Some Bhojpuri suffixes

-ākā / -ait: ḍākā → ḍakait (“dacoit”).

-hār: cūṛī → cūṛīhār (“bangle-maker/seller”).

-hār: lakṛī → lakṛīhār (“one associated with firewood”).

-har: mus → musahar (the community name).

bāp → bahar.

māmā → mamahar.

Bhojpuri: adjectives derived from nouns

Kātik → katikā.

-āin: dhuā́ → dhuāĩn (“smoky”).

Bhojpuri: nouns derived from adjectives

Piyar → piarī.

-aī: thethar → thetharaī.

-autī: būṛh → būṛhautī (“old age”).

Bhojpuri: nouns derived from nouns

-aī: larikā → larikāī (“childhood”).

Bhojpuri: adjectives derived from adjectives

Lāl → lalchahū́

-authā: pahil → pahilauthā (“first-born”).

Feminine suffixes

-āin: Misir → Misarāin.

-ānī: devar → devarānī (“the wife of a younger brother-in-law”).

Number in Bhojpuri

Laikā (singular) → laikan (plural).

Hāthī (singular) → hāthin / hāthiyan (plural).

Maithili–Bhojpuri Forms

The forms in both columns are preserved in the original languages to make the linguistic comparison verifiable.

Maithili	Bhojpuri
छथि	तारी
खाइत अछि	खाता
खुजैत अछि	खुलता
नहि खेलाइत छथि	खेलत नइखन
नहि अछि	नइखे
नहि जयताह	ना जइहन
नहि खयताह	ना खइहन
जाइ छी	जातार
पढ़ैत छी	पढ़ तानी

Maithili	Bhojpuri
खाइ छथि	खा तारन
अहाँ	रउआ

Bhojpuri itself has regional variants, including bā, bāṭe, bīyā, baṛvẽ, baṭe, and bānī.

Maithili and Magahi

Bhuvaneshwar Sharma's Magahi dictionary omits certain letters and conjuncts, including ṇa, śa, ṣa, ṛ, ḷ, kṣa, tra, and jña. As in Maithili, Magahi often pronounces va as ba and ya as ja.

Magahi likewise traces its origins to the Nāth literature of the eighty-four Siddhas and the Nāth tradition. Its verbs may have one fewer ā vowel-mātrā, as illustrated below:

Maithili–Magahi Forms (I)

The forms in both columns are preserved in the original languages to make the linguistic comparison verifiable.

Maithili	Magahi
एनाइ	अनई
गेनाइ	गनई
धोनाइ	धोनई

Magahi proverbs and sayings

"Adrā gel, tīn gelan, san, sāṭhī, kapās": without rain during the Ārdrā constellation, cultivation of san, sāṭhī rice and cotton fails.

"Ochā ke prīt bālū ke bhīt": friendship with an ignoble person is as short-lived as a wall of sand.

"Btāt deval": to provide subsistence or expenses.

"Siharī phaṭal": one's savings or resources were exhausted.

"Hahās kayal": to burn with envy when another person advances.

"Tulā rāśi ke bhel": to become very angry.

"Kanyā rāśi ke bhel": to become incapable of doing work.

"Orhan deval": to make a complaint.

"Pīṛhā deval": to show respect.

"Khopasan deval": to reproach or accuse.

Dr Ramnaresh Mishra "Hans" calls Magahi the developed form of the speech of Magadha. Assamese, Bengali, Odia, Maithili, Bhojpuri and other languages also developed from Magadhi Prakrit.

Magahi uses la and ṛa in place of ra, and ra and ṛa in place of la. It also forms words with the prefix nir-, as in niraith (from aith / niraith).

Magahi folk epics and ballads

Ālhā, Sorṭhī Vrajbhār, Lorakāin, Resmā–Cuharmal, Sāraṅgā–Sadāvṛj, Chatrī–Ghughuliyā, Kũvar Vijayī, Rājā Bharatharī, Gopīcand, Sobhā˜ Nāyak, Satī Bihulā, Neṭuā Dayāl Siṅgh, Rājā Ḍholan Siṅgh, Mān Gujariyā, Māmā–Bhaginā, Vikram, Kardab-līlā, Bañjārā, Hirnī–Birnī, Sahles, Nūnācār, Rājā Harican, Bābā Cintāman, Baktour, Bihulā–Vishaharī, and Bābā Lakhandar Bihulā–Viṣadhar.

Magahi folk drama, dramatic songs and dances

Kīrtan, jātrā, Karmā Bhaiyā Dūj, Jītiyā (a heroine goes angrily to her parental home; farm workers stage this drama after planting rice).

Phāgū, Caitā, Sāvanī, Bārahmāsā, and Ropnī.

The dramatic songs of the Dūdhvaṃśī (Dusadh), Sāfī (Dhobi), Candra-vaṃśī (Kahar), and Koiri communities.

Women's and caste-linked performances: Domkac, Bīchāmār, Culhārin, Sītā–Mītā, Gedurī.

Ojha–Ḍāin.

Sāmā–Cākevā, Bagulā–Bagulī, Jāṭ–Jāṭin, and Sās–Putoh.

Sagbecnī, Machlī Becnī, Jīrābun, and Dahī Becnī.

Dance, Neṭuā–Kasbin, and puppet theatre.

Let us now consider some Maithili forms and their Magahi equivalents.

Maithili–Magahi Forms (II)

The forms in both columns are preserved in the original languages to make the linguistic comparison verifiable.

Maithili	Magahi
खेलेलौं (खेलेलहुँ)	खेलली
हएत	होत
अछि	हे
छथि	हथ/हथुन

Maithili	Magahi
छी	ही
जायत	जइतो
एता	अतथुन
भेटत	मिलतो

Forms used in Magahi

Around Patna one hears forms such as māraluk (mārbau), which change further south into forms such as hathin and chathin.

Maithili and Santali

Maithili–Santali Comparative Vocabulary

The forms in both columns are preserved in the original languages to make the linguistic comparison verifiable.

Maithili	Santali
पिता	बा
बाबी (बा)	नुनुगो (बुडीगो)
बाबा	गोड़म्बा
नमस्ते	जोहारगी
भेल	हुयेना
उसरि कऽ (जल्दी)	उसारा
अछि	काना/गिया
छी	काना
आर	आर
सँ	ते
एखन लगाइत	एहोबोक् लगीत
देखाउ	उदुगमे
विलम्ब	बिलम्ब
दिऔ	मे/में
करू	मा/कामीयमे
नहि	आलोम
बनू	बिनाक्आ

Maithili	Santali
बुरबक (बोका)	बोका
आउ	हजुक्मे
ध्यान	ध्यान
दाँत सभ	डाटा
लगा लिअ	लगाव ताम
सत्त	सरी
खबरि	खोबोर
हमरा	इञ
खराप	बड़ीच्
मोन	मोने
लगा कऽ	लगाव
काज	कातेक
कैं	दो
घास	घास
आनू	अगुकुम
अहाँ सँ	आमसांव
जरूर	जरूड़
थोर	थोड़ा
पंखा	पंखा
बिजली	बिजली
लैम्प	लैम्प
कागत-पेंसिल	कागज-पेंसिल
मना	मना
मामिला	मामला
समय	समय
धन	धन
मेहनति	मेहनत
अहाँ	आम

Maithili	Santali
कुकुड़ (पु.)	सीता
कुकुड़ (स्त्री.)	सीता इंगा
पिल्ला (कुकुड़क बच्चा)	सीता होपोन
बाछी	बछी
बेंग	रोटे
पनही (जुत्ता)	पनाही
करैल	कारला
घर (दलान)	दुलान
मचान	मचान
कड़छु	कड़छु
पटिया	पटया
चालनि	चलनी
सलाइ-काठी	सलाई कठी
सूत	सुतम
थारी-बाटी	थरी-बटी
लोटा	लोटा
बोरा	बोरा
गहूम	गुहुम
दही	दाही
थुथुन	थुथना
गाहकि (गहकी)	गहकी
अखबार	खोबोर कागज
हरियर	हरयड़
खर्चा	खर्चा
साफ करब	साफा
बीछब	बाछाव
बनायब	बिनाव
नव करब	नावा

Maithili	Santali
नेहोरा करब	नेहोर
जिरायब (विश्राम करब)	जिराव
थरथरी	थारथाराक्
आछी करब (छीकब)	अछीम
साटब	साटाव

For the optional Maithili paper in the Bihar Public Service Commission (BPSC) civil-service examination:

Maithili and Hindi

Maithili–Hindi Vocabulary

The forms in both columns are preserved in the original languages to make the linguistic comparison verifiable.

Maithili	Hindi
हमरा सभक	हमारा
हमर	मेरा
ओकर	उसका
ई	यह
ओ	वह
ई सब	ये
ओ सब	वे
अछि	है
छी	हूँ
देखनाइ	देखना
जीनाइ	जीना
गेनाइ	जाना
पीनाइ	पीना
छूनाइ	छूना
सुतनाइ	सोना
पढ़नाइ	पढ़ना
जाउ	जाइए

Maithili	Hindi
जो	जा
राम गेल	राम गया
सीता गेलि	सीता गई
आननाइ	लाना
बजनाइ	बोलना
बिसरनाइ	भूलना
छह	हो
लिखैत अछि	लिखता है
लिखि रहल अछि	लिख रहा है
जायत	जाएगा
अयताह	आएंगे
राम जाइत अछि	राम जाता है
सीता जाइत अछि	सीता जाती है
सीता जाइत छथि	सीता जाती हैं
राम खेनाइ खेलक	राम ने खाना खाया
राम सोहारी खेलक	राम ने रोटी खाई
तोँ ई काज केने छह	तूने यह काम किया है
राम फिल्म देखने छल	राम ने फिल्म देखी थी
राम फिल्म देखने छला	राम जी (आदर) ने फिल्म देखी थी
राम पाठ समाप्त कऽ लेने होयत	राम ने पाठ समाप्त कर लिया होगा
राम पाठ समाप्त कऽ लेने हेता	राम जी (आदर) ने पाठ समाप्त कर लिया होगा
राम सीताकेँ देखलक	राम ने सीता को देखा
राम सीताकेँ देखलनि	राम जी (आदर) ने सीता को देखा

The tables show that Hindi marks the agent with ne, whereas Maithili has no corresponding marker in these examples. For the object, Hindi uses ko and Maithili uses kẽ.

Illustrations of Hindi and Maithili Number and Case

The forms in both columns are preserved in the original languages to make the linguistic comparison verifiable.

Hindi	Maithili	Illustrative lexical form	Illustrative lexical form	Illustrative example
मैथिली	सेब	एकटा सेब	दूटा सेब	दूटा सेबमे
हिन्दी	सिपाही	एक सिपाही	दो सिपाही	दो सिपाहियों ने
मैथिली	सिपाही	एकटा सिपाही	दूटा सिपाही	दूटा सिपाही
हिन्दी	साधु	एक साधु	दो साधु	दो साधुओं को
मैथिली	साधु	एकटा साधु	दूटा साधु	दुनू साधुकेँ
हिन्दी	चमगादड़	एक चमगादड़	दो चमगादड़	दोनों चमगादड़ों पर
मैथिली	बादुर	एकटा बादुर	दूटा बादुर	दुनू बादुर पर
हिन्दी	चिड़िया	एक चिड़िया	दो चिड़िया	दो चिड़ियाओं
मैथिली	चिड़ै	एकटा चिड़ै	दूटा चिड़ै	दुनू चिड़ै

These examples show that Hindi plural inflection changes the form of the word, whereas in Maithili it does not. In a few feminine verbal forms Maithili changes like Hindi (geli); more often, however (jāit achi, chathi), it does not. In honorific sentences, Hindi leaves the verb unchanged in the cited comparison, while Maithili distinguishes dekhlak from dekhlani. Hindi changes forms in the feminine plural, unlike Maithili.

Maithili and Hindi Case Particles

The forms in both columns are preserved in the original languages to make the linguistic comparison verifiable.

Case / case particle (Maithili)	Case / case particle (Hindi)
राम	राम ने
रामकेँ	राम को
गेन्दसँ, लाठीसँ, लाठी द्वारा	गेन्द से, लाठी द्वारा
रामकेँ, रामकलेल, राम हेतु	राम को, राम के लिये, राम हेतु
गाछसँ (विलगाव)	पेड़ से
रामक घर, रामक पोथी, सीताक राम	राम का घर, राम की किताब, सीता के राम

Case / case particle (Maithili)	Case / case particle (Hindi)
घर पर, खोतामे	घर पर, घोसला में

Maithili and Odia

The following special observations clarify relations between Maithili and Odia.

Where Maithili uses the written vowel ī, Odia uses ie, though their pronunciations correspond; the difference is chiefly orthographic.

Maithili tū̃jāh corresponds to Odia tū jā; Maithili tū̃jo to Odia tume jāa; and respectful Maithili ahā̃jāū to Odia āpaṇa jāāntu.

Maithili achi ("is") is also achi in Odia.

The old Maithili possessive mor, found in Vidyāpati's phrase piā mor bālak, survives in Odia prose.

Odia nāhĩ / nāī stands for Maithili nahi. Comparable pronunciations occur in Maithili, and its magazine Antikā also prints naĩ. Odia āpaṇa is comparable to Maithili apne / ahā̃.

Odia chi corresponds to Maithili chī.

Odia keũ, kāli, and piilā correspond respectively to Maithili kon, kālhi, and pīlak.

Odia śuṇiluni corresponds to Maithili nai sunalani; the negative particle ni is added at the end in Odia.

Odia -ku corresponds to Maithili -kẽ: Rāmkẽ becomes Rāmku.

The word del ("gave") is the same in both languages.

Where Maithili speaks of rice being sijh ("cooked"), Odia uses sijhāpāṇi for boiling water. Maithili haet corresponds to Odia heb, and nai haet to hebani, where ni makes the negative.

Odia āgaru, karibāku, paṛib, dekhich, kete, and jete correspond to Maithili agrim / agārī, karābay, paṛat, dekhne chah, katek / katte, and jatek / jatte.

Odia se corresponds to Maithili o ("that one"). Maithili se, as in se kahalak, has a somewhat different use, broadly an adverbial sense such as "differently".

Maithili–Odia Vocabulary

The forms in both columns are preserved in the original languages to make the linguistic comparison verifiable.

Maithili	Odia
जाइ छै	जाउछि
एकटा (गोटे)	गोटे
बुलब/बुलनाइ	बुलिबा
दूटा	दिटा
कोन ठाम(कोन ठाँ)	केउँठि
जाइ छी	जाउछि
देखै छी	देखिछि
आउर के	आउ किए
आबैले छथिन्ह	आसिछन्ति
मरि गेल	मरिगला
जाइ छै	जाइछि
जेबै	जिबे
जायब	जिबि
छलै (छलय)	थिला
जैठाम (जइठाम, जइठाँ)	जेउँठि
दरमाहा	दरमा
गेल	गले
बैसा कय	बसेइदइ
करायब	करेइबा
तोहर	तांकर
लागैछै	लागुछि
करबै	करिबेनि
से काज	से काम
करि लेता	करिनेब
किछु	किछि
दऽ देबै	देइदेबि
तऽ (तँ)	त
दिआयल जायत	दिआजिब

Maithili	Odia
भौजी/भाउज	भाउज
जलखै	जळखिआ
आउर (आओर)	आउ
चाह	चा

Odia pronunciation also differs. Its inherent vowel a is often sounded like o: Maithili samar is pronounced somoro in Odia. This affects consonants followed by the inherent vowel. Maithili Manoj may be said Manoj, but Odia has Monojo.

The pairs i/ī and u/ū are pronounced similarly in Maithili and Odia.

The vowels ai and au are articulated as a+i and a+ū, respectively, in Odia as in Maithili.

Maithili ṛ is pronounced like rī, while Odia gives ru: Sanskrit kṛpa is read krīp in Maithili and krupo in Odia.

Both languages sound va as ba; Maithili has "ba", while Odia adds its inherent "o" sound.

In foreign loanwords, however, Odia may pronounce a final consonant without adding the inherent vowel o.

Some instances of ya are pronounced as ja in both languages: Maithili yam is jam and Odia pronounces it jomo.

When ḍa or ḍha occurs at the beginning of a word, the dot beneath the character is omitted in both languages.

Of the fifth nasals in the five consonant classes (ṅa, ña, ṇa, na, ma), both languages ordinarily permit only na and ma at the beginning of a word.

Maithili pronounces kṣa as kcha; Odia uses kha or khya.

Like Marathi, Odia retains Sanskrit ḷa, which is no longer found in Maithili.

Both languages pronounce jña as gya.

The conjunct tsa is pronounced tas in Maithili, but as s + ca in Odia.

25. Agricultural and Fisheries Vocabulary (Based on Fieldwork)

Abstract

A bhaurī jāl is used for catching small fish. A bhirkhā is lifted by hand and thrown. It is made with thread and iron weights, each weighing 25 grams, with a total weight ranging from approximately 2½ to 5 kilograms.

Keywords: agriculture · fisheries · vocabulary · fieldwork · critical theory · Maithili

Fish are also caught with a fishing line and hook (vaṃśī).

For small fish, a bhaurī jāl is used.

A bhirkhā is raised by hand and thrown. Thread and iron weights are used in it; the weights are approximately 25 grams each, amounting to a total of about 2½ to 5 kilograms. An antā jāl is small and is set along the bank at night.

A koṭhī jāl is large and incorporates bamboo.

A bisārī jāl is used at night. Because the fish would be disturbed and scatter by day, stakes are set at night and the fish are caught then.

A caṭṭī jāl is made of plastic and comes in large and small sizes. It is used in the daytime, during both Āṣāḍh and Sāvan, and is lifted after five to ten minutes.

There is a thick-thread parachute net; a current net made from a combination of thread and nylon; and a large hāṭā net made of thread.

Small fish can escape from the parachute net.

Large fish are caught with a large hook and line, a large caṭṭī jāl, or a large thread net (mahājāl).

Both large and small fish are caught using a bamboo jaṅghā. It is fastened with coconut-fibre and nylon cord to a structure standing four hand-lengths high.

Fish are also caught with a rod made from a slender bamboo strip.

Fish are also caught by arranging 100 to 200 bundles of jute stalks together.

A hāṭā jāl is made of thread and may extend for as much as a kilometre.

A cāĉ is made of kahrā bamboo. Fish are caught by enclosing a stream or a flooded channel. The water is stirred and a ḍagarī is placed; the cāĉ is enclosed with a fahaṛā.

Kinds of fish

Ḍāṛā fish (ḍerkā fish), mūṅhā, poṭhī, lattā (piā fish), gaṛaī, palvā, ṭeṅgaṛā, siṅghī, māg̃uṛ, capṛā, painā, revā, gaṛhī, uranthā, mohul, buārī, bāmī, baghār, celvā, kaual, gorrā, saul, bhaurā, kajāl, kalbaus, cittal, bhoi, kattī, bhaukuṛī, silon, rehū, mirkā, bilāskap, silver carp, China māg̃ur, kabaī and China kabaī.

Darbā: small and slender, two to three inches long; black along the back and white at the sides.

Gaṛaī: black.

Copṛā: broad, black and dull-coloured.

Palvā: spines on both sides and on the back; yellowish-white in colour; also has barbels.

Ṭeṅgaṛā: a large fish, also with three spines and barbels around the mouth.

Siṅghī: slender, with two spines on either side; red, or red mixed with light black.

Maṅgurī: thick-bodied and relatively expensive; also has two spines; red and slightly black.

Painā: white, with a spine on its back.

Revā: white; weighing from a quarter to half a kilogram.

Ḍaṛhī: white, with a spine on the back.

Uranthā: white, with a spine on the back and a downward bend beneath.

Bhālu: a long mouth; whitish or yellowish in colour; a spine above and a spine near the navel (as described for fish generally).

Boālī: a wide mouth; up to 20 kilograms in weight; white, with a spine on the back and fins on both sides (as with fish generally).

Bāmī: long-bodied, living in holes; the mouth projects forwards and is round; it is long like a needle, with a spine on the back and two near the navel.

Baghār: found in sizes ranging from about a quarter-kilogram to a quintal; blackish-brown or yellowish; one spine on the back and two on the sides; a broad tail, flattened mouth and considerable breadth.

Celvā: white and without spines; fins on both sides for movement; a particularly swift fish.

Kaual: white, with a long mouth.

Gorrā: barbels resembling a moustache and beard, spines, and a forward part that bends.

Saul: red and yellow, elongated, weighing two, three or five kilograms.

Bhaurā (gajāl), saul, and spotted varieties: large, weighing 20, 25 or even 40 kilograms; with round white, green and black markings.

Kalbaus: light black in colour.

Andājī fish

Cittal: very broad; 20–25 kilograms in weight, and two to three feet across.

Silon: domesticated or pond-reared, weighing three to four kilograms.

Rohu: yellowish or slightly white, with a spine on the back.

Mirkā: pale reddish-white.

Silver carp: pond-reared.

China māg̃ur: brought in from outside (reared); spines on both sides.

China kabaī: reared and brought in from outside; spines at various places along the back.

Kabaī: spines near the gills and along the back.

Ceṅgā fish: like kabaī, it can travel a considerable distance even on dry ground.

Now, some other aquatic creatures:

Saũs (dolphin): eats fish in the water, does not harm people, plays with people, and makes a whistling sound.

Ghariyāl: found in the Ganges near Kursela; a long snout, measuring one to one and a half hand-lengths; finger-like teeth; reddish colouring; and a long tail, with a length of three hand-lengths.

Bõch: described as having a human-like colour and appearance, black in colour, with hair on its head; it catches hold of hair and pulls a person under water.

And now, agricultural vocabulary:

A pair of oxen / the plough (har).

Īś: joined to the plough and tied to the pālo.

Lagnā.

Pālo: placed on the shoulders.

Two kanail pieces on either side of the pālo prevent the oxen from moving this way and that.

A cord about one to one and a quarter feet long is tied away from the kanail. The cord is tied to the samail, a short piece of wood or bamboo about three-quarters of a foot long.

The peṭār below the īś prevents the īś from coming loose, while permitting upward and downward movement.

The plough has a puṭṭhī; below it a separate phallī of about two feet is fitted into the puṭṭhī and breaks up the soil.

Parhat (lagnā): the ploughman rests his hand on this. A grip or handle (muṭhiyā), measuring three feet / six inches, is fixed into the lagnā.

Nādhā: a rope four to five feet long connecting the pālo to the īś by tying them together.

Two maiḍor ropes, each ten to eleven feet long, are tied to the caukī and to the oxen; the ploughman uses this arrangement to work the caukī.

Caukī: a bamboo or wooden board six to seven feet long. The ploughman stands on it while working it. He holds a jhūr, jvolī or stick to drive the oxen.

For wheat, the land is ploughed three inches deep, making four or five furrows.

For maize, a depth of four to five inches is required.

Seed: for an acre (100 decimals), two man of wheat seed or ten kilograms of maize seed.

Fertiliser: at sowing time, the stated application per acre of wheat is 20 kilograms of DAP, 5 kilograms of potash, 5 kilograms of urea and 5 kilograms of zinc.

In maize cultivation, when the plants reach one and a half to two feet, soil is heaped around them. Two rows are set two feet apart. Two quintals of fertiliser are stated to be applied per acre: 100 kilograms of DAP, 50 kilograms of urea, 20 kilograms of sulphic fertiliser, 120 kilograms of potash and 10 kilograms of zinc. During irrigation, fertiliser is applied, earth is heaped up and the field irrigated again. After irrigation, one quintal of urea per acre is applied.

Now, varieties of vegetables:

Siṅghiyā karelā: large bitter gourd; high-break /plain variety.

Choṭkī karelā: small bitter gourd; hajariyā /julmī.

Safed karelā: white bitter gourd; paṭniā (najlī, of medium stem length).

Watermelon:

Nāmdhārī: tasty; red inside, whitish or mottled outside (green and white).

Maiko: slightly black.

Pahujā: darker than Maiko.

Rājdhānī: black-coloured.

Mahārājā: large and small, black-coloured.

Sainī and Sugardībī: black-coloured.

Nāth: lightly mottled (white and green).

Gaṅgāsāgar: clear white, like a pumpkin.

Soraiyyā: mottled.

Cucumber:

Julmī: small.

Hybrid.

Maiko: long, green and yellow.

Mahārājā: a cucumber variety.

Khetībārī: green, not very long, thicker at the back and narrower at the front.

26. Verbal Testimony, Epistemology and Linguistics

Abstract

The Grammarians; Verbal Testimony (Nyāya): Epistemology and Metaphysics; the Linguist Ramavatar Yadav. According to the grammarians, Śabda-Brahman, or Sphoṭa, is the ultimate reality, and Śabda-Brahman is also the cause of the creation of this universe. Śabda-Brahman has neither beginning nor end; it is present everywhere, is capable of acting of its own accord, and witnesses every event. When the soul realises its unity with this Śabda-Brahman, it is liberated.

Keywords: Word · Pramāṇa · Knowledge · Epistemology · Language · Science · Grammar

Editorial

The Grammarians; Verbal Testimony (Nyāya): Epistemology and Metaphysics; the Linguist Ramavatar Yadav

According to the grammarians, Śabda-Brahman, or Sphoṭa, is the ultimate reality, and Śabda-Brahman is also the cause of the creation of this universe. Śabda-Brahman has neither beginning nor end; it is present everywhere, is capable of acting of its own accord, and witnesses every event. When the soul realises its unity with this Śabda-Brahman, it is liberated.

Śabda-Brahman is a theory of sound, which becomes divided into two parts, word and object, although these two proceed in parallel. Speech is divided into four stages: (1) parā, (2) paśyantī, (3) madhyamā and (4) vaikharī. In the parā state, power and its possessor are completely identical. Time enters at the paśyantī stage, the source of all words and objects. Paśyantī is praṇava (ॐ), also called pratibhā. Paśyantī is the source of all words, and pratibhā of all meanings; yet the two are one, distinguished only for purposes of reasoning. At the madhyamā stage the distinction between word and object can be recognised, and an order among words becomes apparent, although sound is still confined to the mind. At the vaikharī stage words make objects intelligible and are articulated through the throat, teeth, palate, tongue and other organs. In the beginning Śabda-Brahman exists as sat, comprising cit, ānanda, knowledge, desire and action, as well as the power of freedom and time. Then sat wishes to divide itself with the aid of time, and cit and ānanda emerge separately. Knowledge proceeds from cit, and desire from ānanda. Sat thus becomes paśyantī in six modes: sat, cit, ānanda, knowledge, desire and action. In paśyantī, word and object remain exceedingly subtle, intermingled with one another. In madhyamā they become distinguishable, but have not yet been produced. In vaikharī, however, word and object arise in two distinct streams.

What is the smallest unit of language: the phoneme or letter, the word, or the sentence? Mīmāṃsakas regard the phoneme as the unit of language, Naiyāyikas the word, and the grammarians the sentence.

Gaṅgeśa Upādhyāya's Tattvacintāmaṇi is divided into four parts: (1) perception (direct apprehension); (2) inference; (3) comparison (analogy or resemblance); and (4) word (verbal testimony). These four parts examine the four means of obtaining valid knowledge. Experience is acquired through perception, inference, comparison and verbal testimony. Gaṅgeśa gave comparison its proper place within Nyāya as a method of discovering the meaning of words.

An attempt was therefore made to bind and regulate this language through grammar. Mīmāṃsakas hold that the relation between a word and its meaning has existed from beginningless time: it is not externally created and remains independent. Early Mīmāṃsakas believed in the Vedas but not in God. Buddhists regard language, including the language of the Vedas, as a human imaginative construction, a vikalpa. Jacques Derrida provides a bridge between the Buddhists and the Mīmāṃsakas. He locates the beginning of language in the art of writing, thereby moving away from Nāgārjuna and closer to Bhartṛhari's grammatical thought. Nevertheless, like the Buddhists, Derrida opposes the idealisation of language and favours a subject-oriented approach.

A Comparative Study of Traditional Grammar and Modern Linguistics — Jian Li and Qingming Li [School of Humanities and Foreign Languages, Xi'an University of Technology, Shaanxi, Xi'an, China] [International Conference on Education, Management, Commerce and Society (EMCS 2015), pp. 287–291]

Traditional Grammar

As the oldest form of grammar, traditional grammar is said to have originated in the fifteenth century BCE, with Plato and Aristotle in Greece and the Sanskrit scholar Pāṇini in India. Various Roman and early Christian writers also contributed to traditional grammar, but traditional grammarians began writing most influentially in the eighteenth century, when English came to be treated seriously as a language in its own right rather than merely another vernacular. The characteristics of traditional grammar may be described as follows. First, one of its chief features is that it is generally based on meaning. According to traditional grammar, a sentence is a group of words expressing a complete thought. Traditional grammar commonly begins with meaning and proceeds in analysis from meaning to form. From the standpoint of language teaching, it does not provide a systematic description of linguistic phenomena. It usually describes language at the surface level, often analysing individual sentences in isolation rather than at the level of discourse. Sometimes even that level of description is absent. Consequently, it gives the teacher no satisfactory account of the language being taught and the learner no adequate description of the language to be learnt. Traditional grammar generally describes written language without examining spoken language. It also confuses written with spoken forms, although, as we know, the spoken system differs to some extent from the written one. Thus it cannot provide students with the system required for oral communication. Traditional grammar assigns a prominent place to morphology and syntax, while its treatment of lexis and phonology is often inadequate. Despite these shortcomings, traditional grammar remains highly valuable for language teaching and school grammar. Many still regard it as a practical, elegant and time-honoured means of teaching people what they need to know about a language.

Modern Linguistics

Modern linguistics begins with the Swiss linguist Ferdinand de Saussure (1857–1913), often called the 'father of modern linguistics' and described as a master of the discipline whose work made it 'modern' (Culler 1976: 7). Modern linguistics is the science of linguistic study. According to its approach, language is a system, and grammar is a systematic description of a particular language, whether written or spoken. Grammar can also mean a distributional analysis of surface-structure elements according to distributional criteria. Modern grammar also takes phonetic and semantic components into account. In general, it is evaluated in terms of present applicability, simplicity, completeness, clarity and freedom from contradiction. Modern grammatical approaches include descriptive grammar, structural grammar, functional grammar, transformational-generative grammar (case grammar), and many others.

Descriptive Grammar: Descriptive grammar explains how a language is actually spoken and written, rather than prescribing how it should be spoken or written. It holds that speech is the primary form of language and that spoken and written language differ. Fries was a distinguished grammarian, and his American English Grammar is a well-known work. He divides words into two categories, content words and function words, rather than the ten separate parts of speech of traditional grammar. Content words are words which undergo inflection and possess lexical meanings, such as nouns, verbs and adjectives. Function words play significant roles in constructing structures, determining relations, forming subordinate connections, functioning as auxiliaries and expressing emphasis.

Structural Grammar: Structural grammar differs fundamentally from traditional grammar. Rather than concentrating on individual words, their assumed meanings, or their parts-of-speech functions within a sentence, it investigates groups of structures—sounds, forms, word groups and phrases—and the progression from smaller to larger units. Structural grammar also examines meaning, although some of its early advocates attempted to disregard it; its emphasis falls on syntactic patterns rather than isolated lexical meanings. It therefore analyses the meanings conveyed by the patterns that morphemes and words form together: plural formations, modifier–verb or modifier–adjective relations, subject–predicate relations, and the like.

In addition to its general emphasis on morphology and syntax, structural grammar developed three particularly useful analytical techniques: test frames, immediate-constituent analysis and sentence formulas. Test frames have proved especially helpful for teaching grammar in schools.

The disadvantages of structural grammar are as follows:

It offers an incomplete account of a language's grammatical system and does not supply the rules required to generate an unlimited series of grammatical constructions.

It places excessive weight on morphological and morphophonemic rules, while paying little attention to semantic relations, much as traditional grammar does.

It describes the surface structure of sentences and gives inadequate or mistaken accounts of many deeper generalisations.

Structural grammar offers a criterion for determining whether a sentence is grammatical and the degree of its grammaticality, but does not explain matters sufficiently to guarantee clear understanding and correct use. Learners may consequently make errors.

Its treatment does not include meaning; yet without attention to meaning, no grammatical analysis can be useful.

It also fails to provide a satisfactory basis for two other important areas: compositional analysis and translation in applied linguistics.

Transformational-Generative Grammar: Transformational-generative grammar, or TG grammar, was developed by Noam Chomsky. It emerged in 1957, inaugurating a revolution in linguistics. According to some linguists, TG grammar synthesises the contributions of traditional and structural grammar. From structural grammar, Chomsky reworked immediate-constituent analysis (ICA) as the first stage of his grammar. Yet he proceeded much further, satisfying the demand for precision through successive stages of formalisation: classical theory, standard theory, extended theory and revised extended theory.

In the first stage, represented by Syntactic Structures, the concern is with the infinite set of sentences generated by context-free structures and the formation of basic transformational rules. In the second stage, represented by Aspects of the Theory of Syntax, the original syntactic theory is enlarged into a general theory of grammar that incorporates phonology and semantics. Deep structure provides the syntactic base, while surface structure concerns phenomena such as sounds, word order and thematic patterning. In the extended-theory stage attention shifts from individual grammars to universal grammar. All transformational rules are reduced to a single rule, and a universal formulation of constraints is developed. The advantages of TG grammar are therefore these. First, it genuinely brings syntax, phonology, the lexicon and semantics together, thus providing an integrated conception of language. Its system is more precise and more complete than other grammatical models. Second, it offers a more economical and systematic account of language: a system of rules capable of generating infinitely many grammatical sentences. Unlike traditional grammar, the rules stated by TG grammar are both explicit and formally defined. Third, it demonstrates considerable powers of generalisation. It can make clear underlying structures and regularities that traditional and structural grammarians have neglected. Fourth, it recognises linguistic universals across languages and allows analysis at the level of deep structure. Structural grammar assumes that every language possesses an individual structure. TG grammar, on the contrary, recognises common general forms and kinds of rules in the description of all languages. This concerns formal universals. It also proposes common categories and deep structures, relating to substantive universals. Finally, TG grammar can identify grammaticality and degrees of grammaticality, which are indispensable to evaluation, testing and error analysis.

Functional Grammar: Functional grammar was developed by M. A. K. Halliday. In the 1950s it was called systemic grammar. In functional grammar, meaning is understood as what a speaker wants a listener to understand: the meaning of a sentence is identified with its function. Functional grammar studies the available choices of meaning and relevant words. One important implication of the functional approach to language is its concern with context. Functional grammar takes context into account and thereby brings linguistics towards sociology. It systematically studies relevant features of culture and society that constitute the contexts in which language is used. According to functional grammar, words may be divided into open and closed sets. The open set comprises nouns, verbs, adjectives and adverbs—lexical or content words. Functional grammar treats groups and phrases as two distinct concepts: a group is an expansion of a word, whereas a phrase is a contraction of a clause. Here 'phrase' refers particularly to the prepositional phrase (PP). Functional grammar also uses structural and functional labels. Structural labels identify the structural nature of elements; functional labels identify their syntactic functions within clauses.

Differences between Modern Linguistics and Traditional Grammar

Linguistics Is Descriptive, Not Prescriptive: Most modern linguistics is descriptive, since it attempts to explain what people actually say, rather than what they ought to say. It describes language in all its aspects without laying down rules of 'correctness'. This contrasts with linguistic study in previous centuries, which was largely prescriptive. Traditional grammar told people how to use language. Teachers should not regard themselves as guardians charged with preserving it. They should prefer to be observers and recorders of facts rather than judges. They hold that everything occurring in natural speech—hesitation, incomplete utterances, misunderstanding and so forth—should form part of their analysis. They recognise that fashion may make one variety of speech appear socially more acceptable than another. But this should not persuade them that a socially approved variety must replace every other variety, or that old words are invariably better than new ones, or the reverse. They regard changes in language and its use as natural and continuous processes rather than things to be feared. Language change should be observed and described. This does not mean that language has no rules: plainly it does, for otherwise we could not understand one another. On the other hand, no individual rule or expression necessarily remains in force for ever.

Linguistics Gives Priority to Spoken Language, Not Written Language: In the past grammarians placed greater emphasis on the written word, partly because writing is permanent. Before the invention of sound recording, fleeting utterances were difficult to study. Traditional classical education was partly responsible as well. People insisted that language conform to the usage of the 'best writers' of classical times; those writers existed for them only in written form.

Yet, if we consider the history of human speech and the experience of individual speakers, spoken language is the primary linguistic fact, while writing is its more or less imperfect reflection. We learn to understand speech before we learn to read, and to speak before we learn to write. We hear more language than we read, and speak more than we write. Spoken language is generally more flexible than written language. It leads linguistic development, while writing follows at varying intervals.

Spoken language is considered primary for several reasons. Historically, speech precedes writing: it existed long before writing systems appeared. Even today many fully developed languages have no writing system. In individual development, children invariably learn to speak before they learn to write. Blind children face no particular difficulty in learning to speak, whereas deaf children encounter considerable difficulties. This indicates that the visual channel is not as important to language acquisition as the auditory channel.

This does not deny the importance of writing, which has advantages unavailable to speech. First, writing allows a message to travel across space. The human voice is effective only within earshot, whereas a written message may be sent and received across vast distances. Second, writing allows a message to travel through time. Spoken words 'die', but a written message may survive far beyond its moment of production, passing from generation to generation and from one culture to another. Third, spoken messages are liable to distortion, whether unintentionally through misunderstanding or otherwise. A written message, by contrast, remains the same whether read a thousand years later or ten thousand miles away.

Spoken utterances share many characteristics with written sentences, but they also exhibit substantial differences. Linguists therefore believe that spoken and written forms belong to different systems, although the systems may overlap. They should be analysed separately: speech first, writing afterwards.

Linguistics Differs from Traditional Grammar in Not Forcing Languages into a Latin-Based Framework: Many traditional textbooks of the past unquestionably assumed that Latin provided a universal framework into which every language would fit. Countless schoolchildren were confused by pointless efforts to force English into an alien pattern. For example, the phrase 'for John' is sometimes described as being in the 'dative case'. This is plainly incorrect, since English does not possess a Latin-type case system. Elsewhere the influence of the Latin model is subtler and therefore more misleading. Many people wrongly regard certain Latin categories as 'natural'. Thus it is commonly assumed that Latin's distinction between past, present and future tenses is indispensable. Yet languages are often encountered which do not have three neatly differentiated tenses. In some languages it is more important to indicate the duration or character of an action—whether it is a single event or a continuing one—than to locate the action in time.

Moreover, judgments about certain constructions often originate in Latin. People frequently argue, for instance, that 'good English' avoids the split infinitive [a split infinitive places an adverb or adverbial phrase between 'to' and the infinitive], as in 'to humbly apologize', where 'humbly' is said to split 'to apologize'. The claim that a split infinitive is wrong rests on Latin. Purists insist that because a Latin infinitive is a single word, its English counterpart should be kept as close to a single word as possible. For a linguist, judging one language by the standards of another is inconceivable. Linguists reject the assumption that one language can supply an adequate framework for all others. They are seeking a universal framework, but one based on features shared by most of the languages used by humanity.

— Jian Li and Qingming Li

Standard Pronunciation and Writing Conventions for Nepal's Maithili-Language Textbooks, Based on the Maithili Grammar of Ramavatar Yadav

Pronunciation and Writing in Maithili

1. The Fifth Consonants and Anusvāra: The fifth consonants of the five classes are ङ, ञ, ण, न and म. Under the Sanskrit rule, a consonant class is preceded by its own fifth, or nasal, member. For example:

अङ्क (the letter ङ् is used because the following consonant belongs to the क class).

पञ्च (the letter ञ् is used because the following consonant belongs to the च class).

खण्ड (the letter ण् is used because the following consonant belongs to the ट class).

सन्धि (the letter न् is used because the following consonant belongs to the त class).

खम्भ (the letter म् is used because the following consonant belongs to the प class).

The practice described above is less common in Maithili. In most positions an anusvāra is used instead of the fifth consonant: अंक, पंच, खंड, संधि, खंभ and so forth. The grammarian Pandit Govind Jha holds that anusvāra should be written before consonants of the क, च and ट classes, but the fifth consonant itself should be written before the त and प classes: अंक, चंचल, अंडा, अन्त and कम्पन. Modern writers influenced by Hindi do not, however, follow this rule. They write अंत and कंपन even where अन्त and कम्पन would be expected.

The newer method is certainly convenient in some respects, because it saves time and space. Yet in handwriting or print the tiny dot of the anusvāra is sometimes indistinct, and this can seriously change the meaning. The use of anusvāra also carries a comparable risk of mispronunciation. It is therefore appropriate to use the fifth consonants for the classes from क to प. The use of anusvāra with letters from य to ज्ञ, on the other hand, appears uncontroversial.

2. ढ and ढ़: The pronunciation of ढ़ resembles 'र् ह'. Accordingly, ढ़ should be written only where that sound is pronounced; elsewhere ढ should be used. For example:

ढ = ढाकी, ढेकी, ढीठ, ढेउआ, ढङ्ग, ढेरी, ढाकनि, ढाठ, and so forth.

ढ़ = पढ़ाइ, बढ़ब, गढ़ब, मढ़ब, बुढ़बा, साँढ़, गाढ़, रीढ़, चाँढ़, सीढ़ी, पीढ़ी, and so forth.

These words show that ढ generally occurs at the beginning of a word, while ढ़ occurs in the middle or at the end. The same rule applies to ड and ड़.

3. व and ब: In Maithili, व is pronounced as ब, but should not therefore be written as ब. For example, the spoken forms बैद्यनाथ, बिद्या, नब, देबता, बिष्णु, बंश and बन्दना should be written respectively as वैद्यनाथ, विद्या, नव, देवता, विष्णु, वंश and वन्दना. Generally the sound of व is represented in pronunciation by ओ, as in ओकील and ओजह.

4. य and ज: In some places य is pronounced like ज, but it should not be written as ज. Words pronounced यज्ञ, जदि, जमुना, जुग, जाबत, जोगी, जदु and जम should be written, respectively, as यज्ञ, यदि, यमुना, युग, याबत, योगी, यदु and यम.

5. ए and य: Both ए and य occur in Maithili spelling.

Older spelling: कएल, जाए, होएत, माए, भाए, गाए, etc.

Newer spelling: कयल, जाय, होयत, माय, भाय, गाय, etc.

At the beginning of a word, ए is generally used: एहि, एना, एकर, एहन, etc. The forms यहि, यना, यकर and यहन should not be substituted for them. Nevertheless, among certain Maithili-speaking communities, including Tharus, an initial ए is pronounced as य.

In using ए and य, this book follows the older convention, which is considered more appropriate. Neither choice offers any particular advantage in ease of writing or presents any special difficulty. Moreover, ordinary Maithili pronunciation is closer to ए than to य. In particular, the occasional spelling of कएल and हएब as कैल and हैब further supports the suitability of ए.

6. हि, हु, and the E- and O-Vowel Signs: In the older Maithili writing tradition, हि and हु are attached to words to add emphasis: हुनकहि, अपनहु, ओकरहु, तत्कालहि, चोट्टहि, आनहु, etc. In modern writing, however, the ए vowel sign is often substituted for हि and the ओ vowel sign for हु: हुनके, अपनो, तत्काले, चोट्टे, आनो, etc.

7. ष and ख: In Maithili, ष is most often pronounced as ख: षडचन्त्र (खड़यन्त्र), षोडशी (खोड़शी), षट्कोण (खटकोण), वृषेश (वृखेश), सन्तोष (सन्तोख), and so on.

8. Elision of Sounds: Sounds disappear from words in the following circumstances:

(a) In the verbal suffix अय, य or ए is elided, and the preceding अ is lengthened in pronunciation. An apostrophe or the elision sign (ऽ) is then placed after it. For example:

Full forms: पढ़ए (पढ़य) गेलाह, कए (कय) लेल, उठए (उठय) पड़तौक.

Contracted forms: पढ़' गेलाह, क' लेल, उठ' पड़तौक.

Also: पढ़ऽ गेलाह, कऽ लेल, उठऽ पड़तौक.

(b) In the anterior participial suffix आय (आए), य (or ए) is elided, but no elision mark is inserted. For example:

Full forms: खाए (य) गेल, पठाय (ए) देब, नहाए (य) अएलाह.

Contracted forms: खा गेल, पठा देब, नहा अएलाह.

(c) The feminine suffix इक loses its sound in verbs, nouns and adjectives alike. For example:

Full form: दोसरि मालिनि चलि गेलि.

Contracted form: दोसर मालिन चलि गेल.

(d) The final त of a present participle is elided. For example:

Full forms: पढ़ैत अछि, बजैत अछि, गबैत अछि.

Contracted forms: पढ़ै अछि, बजै अछि, गबै अछि.

(e) The endings इक, उक, ऐक and हीक are elided in verb forms. For example:

Full forms: छियौक, छियैक, छहीक, छौक, छैक, अबितैक, होइक.

Contracted forms: छियौ, छियै, छही, छौ, छै, अबितै, होइ.

(f) The verbal suffixes न्ह and हु, and the aspirate ह, are elided. For example:

Full forms: छन्हि, कहलन्हि, कहलहुँ, गेलह, नहि.

Contracted forms: छनि, कहलनि, कहलौं, गेलऽ, नइ, नञि, नै.

9. Transposition of Sounds: Certain vowel sounds shift away from their original positions. This applies particularly to the short vowels इ and उ. When either appears in the middle or at the end of a word that has become assimilated into Maithili, its sound moves one syllable forward: शनि (शइन), पानि (पाइन), दालि (दाइल), माटि (माइट), काछु (काउछ), मासु (माउस), etc. This rule does not apply to tatsama words preserved from Sanskrit: रश्मि cannot be pronounced रइश्म, nor सुधांशु as सुधाउंस.

10. Use of Halant (्): Maithili generally has no need for the halant (्), since the final अ sound of a word is not pronounced. But words taken unchanged from Sanskrit (tatsama words) employ the halant. In this textbook, words have ordinarily been written without the halant in accordance with Maithili rules; it has been retained at a few places where grammatical explanation makes it indispensable. The orthography adopted here combines the simpler and more appropriate elements of both older and newer Maithili practice. It has been arranged to save time and space and to simplify handwriting and technical production. Today, even native Maithili speakers often have to learn about Maithili through another language; this circumstance has led the authors to give attention to convenience and consistency in writing. At the same time, the authors are conscious that the essential characteristics of Maithili must not be suppressed. The distinguished linguist Dr Ramavatar Yadav says that the search for simplicity must never reach the point where a language's distinctive features are overshadowed. We have tried to carry this principle fully into practice.

The spelling conventions of this book differ in some respects from those of the Class 9 textbook. Continued study, investigation and analysis have brought about these corrective differences. In future revisions of other textbooks, too, we shall endeavour to achieve complete consistency in the spelling conventions of Maithili textbooks.

Class 10: Maithili Writing and Revision. Mahendra Malangia / Dhirendra Premarshi. Coordination: Ganesh Prasad Bhattarai.

Publisher: Ministry of Education and Sports, Curriculum Development Centre, Sanothimi, Bhaktapur.

All rights reserved: Curriculum Development Centre and Janak Education Materials Centre, Sanothimi, Bhaktapur.

First edition: Baisakh 2058 (2002 CE).

Contributors: Shiv Prasad Satyal, Jagannath Awa, Gorakh Bahadur Singh, Ganesh Prasad Bhattarai, Dr Ramavatar Yadav, Dr Rajendra Vimal, Dr Ramdayal Rakesh, Dharmendra Vihval, Rupa Dhiru, Neeraj Karna, and Ramesh Ranjan.

Language editing: Neeraj Karna and Rupa Jha.

Maithili Writing Conventions Prescribed by the Maithili Academy, Patna

1. Words that have been written with a particular spelling from the ancient period of Maithili literature to the present should generally continue to be written in that spelling. For example:

Acceptable forms

एखन

ठाम

जकर, तकर

तनिकर

अछि

Unacceptable forms

अखन, अखनि, एखेन, अखनी

ठिमा, ठिना, ठमा

जेकर, तेकर

तिनकर. (Also acceptable as an alternative.)

ऐछ, अहि, ए.

2. The following three sets of alternatives may all be adopted: भऽ गेल, भय गेल or भए गेल; जा रहल अछि, जाय रहल अछि or जाए रहल अछि; कर' गेलाह, करय गेलाह or करए गेलाह.

3. In place of the older Maithili sound न्ह, न may also be written, as in कहलनि or कहलन्हि.

4. ऐ and औ should be written where the intended pronunciation is clearly similar to अइ and अउ: देखैत, छलैक, बौआ, छौक, etc.

5. The following Maithili words are to be used in these forms: जैह, सैह, इएह, ओऐह, लैह and दैह.

6. Omission of a short final इ is generally unacceptable. Thus the acceptable forms are देखि आबह and मालिनि गेलि (for a human subject).

7. Independent short ए or य should be retained in quotations from older Maithili; in modern usage either ए or य may be used: कयल or कएल, अयलाह or अएलाह, जाय or जाए, etc.

8. The य sound that arises naturally between two vowels in pronunciation may optionally be represented in writing: धीआ, अढ़ैआ, बिआह, or धीया, अढ़ैया, बियाह.

9. Where possible, a nasalised independent vowel should be represented by ञ or by the nasalised vowel itself: मैञा, कनिञा, किरतनिञा, or मैआँ, कनिआँ, किरतनिआँ.

10. The following case-ending forms are acceptable: हाथकेँ, हाथसँ, हाथेँ, हाथक, हाथमे. An anusvāra in मे must be avoided altogether. केर may be retained as an alternative to क.

11. After an anterior verb form, कय or कए may be added as alternative indeclinables: देखि कय or देखि कए.

12. Instead of माँग, भाँग and similar forms, write माङ, भाङ, etc.

13. Half-forms of न and म should not be replaced by anusvāra. For the convenience of printing, however, the half-forms ङ, ञ and ण may also be replaced by anusvāra: अङ्क or अंक, अञ्चल or अंचल, कण्ठ or कंठ.

14. The halant should normally be retained, but the inherent अ should be used when a case ending is attached: श्रीमान्, but श्रीमानक.

15. Every simple case marker should be joined to its word, not separated from it. With compound case expressions, separate writing is permissible, as in घर परक.

16. Nasalisation should be expressed by candrabindu. For printing convenience, however, anusvāra may replace candrabindu on complicated vowel signs: हिं in place of हिँ.

17. A full stop should be marked by the vertical stroke (।).

18. Compound words should be written together or connected by a hyphen, not written separately.

19. The elision mark (ऽ) should not be used in लिअ and दिअ.

20. Numerals should be written in Devanagari form.

21. New signs should be devised for certain sounds. Until these are available, the sounds may continue to be represented by अय/आय/अए/आए/आओ/अओ, as before, or by ऐ or औ.

Signed: Govind Jha, 11 August 1976; Shrikant Thakur, 11 August 1976; Surendra Jha 'Suman', 11 August 1976.

Jian Li and Qingming Li write:

Most modern linguistics is descriptive, since it seeks to describe what people actually say, not what they ought to say. It describes language in all its aspects without imposing rules of 'correctness'. This contrasts with the linguistic study of previous centuries, which was largely prescriptive. Traditional grammar told people how to use language.

But by dividing forms into 'acceptable' and 'unacceptable', Govind Jha, Shrikant Thakur and Surendra Jha 'Suman' pronounce judgments of correctness and incorrectness. Ramavatar Yadav, too, appears in places in A Reference Grammar of Maithili to make judgments on the basis of standard usage and related criteria.

A Reference Grammar of Maithili

On page 12 of this book, Ramavatar Yadav observes that the nasal pronunciation of certain words is a characteristic of so-called Standard Maithili, also called the Brahmin dialect of Maithili. On page 376, he records having previously seen some uneducated or semi-educated young Brahmins address older members of 'lower' castes as 'तौ'; by 1996, however, this was no longer tolerated.

Subhash Chandra Yadav writes: Maithili grammarians constructed grammatical frameworks modelled on Sanskrit and Hindi. They did not consider the distinctive characteristics and differences of Dalit Maithili worthy of examination. Dr Ramavatar Yadav is the only linguist who has given the matter some attention. ... On one occasion, a programme took place at the Anugrah Narayan Sinha Institute of Social Studies in Patna, organised by the Central Institute of Indian Languages, Mysore. The programme's central concern was the development of Maithili. Several speakers presented their views on how this development should proceed. Dr Meghan Prasad also spoke. His speech did not employ as many honorific forms as the assembled scholars expected. The result was that, in the middle of his address, he was subjected to extremely rude laughter on account of his supposed linguistic lapse. The spectacle disturbed me, and I immediately protested against this kind of linguistic intolerance. [Pachpaniya Maithili, by Subhash Chandra Yadav; collected in Gulo: Kala aa Bhasha, 2022.]

Subhash Chandra Yadav writes, 'Dr Ramavatar Yadav is the only linguist who has given the matter some attention.' This is true, because he has indeed given it some attention. But that attention is not sufficient.

In A Reference Grammar of Maithili, Chapter 1 surveys a hundred years of Maithili grammar; Chapter 2 discusses the sound system and script; Chapter 3 nouns; Chapter 4 pronouns; Chapter 5 adjectives; Chapter 6 verbs; Chapter 7 adverbs; Chapter 8 main and subordinate clause types; and Chapter 9 the syntax and semantics of simple and complex sentences.

Fries writes that prescriptive and scholarly grammars belong to the 'pre-scientific era'. By applying two methods of structural linguistics—distributional analysis and substitution—the traditional eight parts of speech can be dispensed with. [Ch. Fries, The Structure of English, London, 1959.]

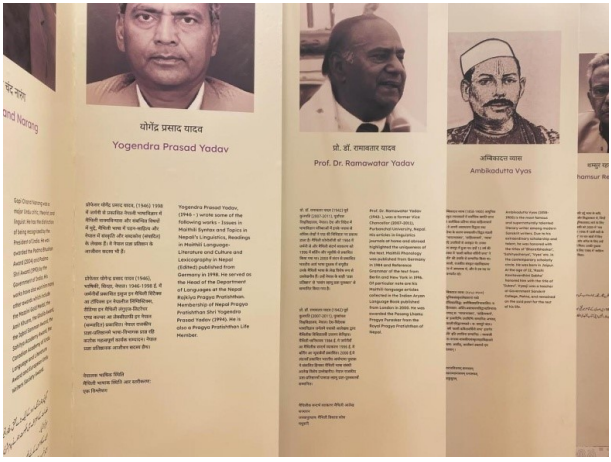
N. M. Rayevska writes: C. Fries divides words into four 'form classes', indicated by numbers, and fifteen groups of 'function words', indicated by letters. The four major parts of an utterance—noun, verb, adjective and adverb—established through substitution procedures in the material recorded by Fries, are given no names other than numbers: Class 1, Class 2, Class 3 and Class 4. The four classes correspond approximately to what most grammarians call nouns and pronouns, verbs, adjectives and adverbs, although C. Fries explicitly cautions readers against attempting to translate his statements into the old grammatical terms they find in textbooks. The groups of function words comprise not only prepositions and conjunctions, but also certain particular words which more traditional grammarians would classify as specific kinds of pronouns, adverbs and verbs.

[N. M. Rayevska, Modern English Grammar, http://web.krao.kg/2_inostran/english/3.pdf]

A Maithili grammar should examine both what people actually say (descriptive rules) and what they are told they ought to say (prescriptive rules). Modern Maithili grammar should include both. The study of formal and informal language (as found, respectively, in such contexts as novels and research essays), regional and socio-economic distinctions, and the status of prescriptive rules belongs to sociolinguistics.

Ramavatar Yadav has presented a structural account of spoken Maithili in his grammar.

At the 2024 New Delhi World Book Fair, life-size posters of Ramavatar Yadav and Yogendra Prasad Yadav in the Language Pavilion.



Gaṅgeśa Upādhyāya's Tattvacintāmaṇi

Gaṅgeśa Upādhyāya's Tattvacintāmaṇi is divided into four books: (1) Perception (direct apprehension), (2) Inference, (3) Comparison (the recognition of resemblance), and (4) Verbal Testimony (oral testimony). These four books examine the four means of obtaining valid knowledge.

Book One

Perception

Gaṅgeśa's Invocation: This book opens with an invocation to the three-formed Śiva. It therefore begins with a discussion of invocation itself. It is believed that invoking God at the start of an undertaking ensures its completion.

Objection: That an invocation causes the completion of an undertaking cannot be established through positive or negative concomitance, since undertakings have also been completed without any invocation.

Reply to the objection: This is because the invocation was, or may have been, performed in an earlier birth.

Objection: No, this is circular reasoning. Moreover, the empirically observable causes by which an undertaking is completed establish that an invocation is unnecessary.

Reply to the objection: The proof that invocation causes the completion of an undertaking involves an inference in two stages. First, invocation is not condemned by cultivated people; on the contrary, they too begin their undertakings with an invocation. It may then be inferred that the completion of the undertaking is its result, because that result is regularly desired and no other result is available.

Objection: This argument will not hold, because it is already known that an undertaking may be completed in the absence of invocation. No reasoning can establish the alleged causal connection.

Reply to the objection: To support the argument that invocation brings an undertaking to completion, we appeal to a Vedic injunction. Yet no such Vedic statement can be found. We may therefore infer that such invocations were instituted, and continue to be performed, by cultivated people.

Prayer may be performed through the body (as in a gesture of reverence), through speech (singing), and through the mind (meditation). Yet someone without belief in God may also accomplish a task: must such a person have offered an invocation or prayer in a previous birth? And when an undertaking remains unfinished despite an invocation, are we to say that the ordinary invocation failed to remove numerous obstacles?

It was with reasoning of this kind that this work began, seven or eight hundred years ago!

(References: Karl H. Potter, Encyclopedia of Indian Philosophies, 1993; Satish Chandra Vidyabhusana, A History of Indian Logic, 1921.)

Stephen H. Phillips writes:

Genealogical records maintained in Mithila, known as pañjī registers, indicate that he had a wife, three sons and one daughter. One of his sons was Vardhamāna, the celebrated author on Nyāya. Gaṅgeśa evidently attained renown during his lifetime and was called 'Jagad-guru', a designation approximately equivalent, within the academic institutions of his time, to 'distinguished university professor'.

The genealogical records preserved in Mithila indicate that Gaṅgeśa had a wife, three sons and a daughter. One son was the celebrated Nyāya writer Vardhamāna. Gaṅgeśa had already acquired considerable distinction in his lifetime; he was called 'Jagadguru', an appellation that may be understood, in relation to the educational institutions of that period, as broadly comparable to 'distinguished university professor'.

[Stephen Phillips, 'Gangesa', The Stanford Encyclopedia of Philosophy, Summer 2020 Edition, Edward N. Zalta (ed.), https://plato.stanford.edu/archives/sum2020/entries/gangesa/]

Gaṅgeśa was not only a Jagadguru but also a Paramaguru. Apart from him, the title Paramaguru was bestowed only later upon the younger Vācaspati, who succeeded the elder Vācaspati.

The injustice which, in the original author's view, Ramanath Jha and Udayanath Jha 'Ashok' did to Gaṅgeśa occurred in the twentieth and twenty-first centuries; the author believes that its harmful consequences reached even Naiyāyikas such as Stephen Phillips. The text notes that Stephen Phillips was the first scholar to produce a complete English translation of all four books of the Tattvacintāmaṇi [Jewel of Reflection on the Truth about Epistemology: A Complete and Annotated Translation of the Tattva-cinta-mani, Bloomsbury Academic, 2020]. Apart from him, by 2021 V. P. Bhatta had completed translations of three of the four books—Perception, Inference and Verbal Testimony—while Comparison remained [Word: The Sabdakhanda of Tattvacintamani, 2005; Perception: The Pratyaksa Khanda of the Tattvacintamani, 2012; Inference: The Anumana Khanda of the Tattva Chintamani, 2021; Eastern Book Linkers, Delhi].

The 'Honour Killing' of Gaṅgeśa Upādhyāya: First Ramanath Jha, Then Udayanath Jha 'Ashok'—Why Is a Parallel History of Mithila and Maithili Literature More Urgently Needed Today?

On seeing a monograph on Gaṅgeśa Upādhyāya written by Udayanath Jha 'Ashok' and published under the copyright of the Sahitya Akademi, the original author hoped that a writer who had received the Bhasha Samman would do justice to Gaṅgeśa. In his assessment, however, neither truth nor research is adequately represented in the monograph.

The original author read it chapter by chapter, hoping that the writer might courageously present the available evidence concerning Gaṅgeśa's ancestry, family and pañjī records. He alleges, however, that Udayanath Jha 'Ashok', like Ramanath Jha, hesitates over the question of Gaṅgeśa's origins and descendants. According to the original critique, despite material having become available after 2009, the 2016 monograph obscured the issue and ultimately did little more than repeat facts published by Dinesh Chandra Bhattacharya in 1958.

The original author alleges that the Sahitya Akademi in Delhi is hypocritically perpetuating the suppression, attributed to Professor Ramanath Jha, of Gaṅgeśa Upādhyāya's social and genealogical identity.

The original author offers Ramanath Jha's conservative attitude to the pañjī registers as an example. According to the source text, he knew that the registers contained evidence of inter-caste marriages, yet the 'Dūṣaṇa Pañjī' was kept concealed; the author states that the material was made public in 2009. The source maintains that the Navya-Nyāya philosopher Gaṅgeśa Upādhyāya married a woman of the leatherworker community (carmakāriṇī) and was born five years after his father's death. In this connection the author refers to his own Pañjī Prabandha, Volumes I–II (http://videha.co.in/pothi.htm), and Dinesh Chandra Bhattacharya's History of Navya-Nyaya in Mithila (1958).

In a passage cited from Dinesh Chandra Bhattacharya's 1958 work, there is a supposition that Gaṅgeśa's family was socially 'low' and subsequently disappeared. The author considers that supposition entirely false. The writer quoted in the passage says that the information was obtained from Professor R. Jha. [1958, Chapter III, pp. 96–99.]

For immediate reference, the following passage is presented from my Pañjī Prabandha (Parts I and II):

Maharaja Harasiṃhadeva belonged to Mithila's Karnata dynasty. In Jyotirīśvara Thakur's Varṇa-ratnākara, Harasiṃhadeva appears as a hero or a king. He was born in 1294 CE and ascended the throne in 1307. After his defeat by Ghiyasuddin Tughlaq in 1324–25, he fled to Nepal. He was the official founder of Mithila's system of genealogical registers for Brahmins, Kayasthas and Kshatriyas. Gunakara Jha was initially appointed for Maithil Brahmins, Shankaradatta for Karna Kayasthas, and Vijayadatta for Kshatriyas. At Harasiṃhadeva's initiative—and Harasiṃhadeva was a descendant of Nanyadeva, who had established the Karnata dynasty in Śaka 1009—'nandaida śūnyaṃ śaśi śāka varṣe' (Śaka 1019) ... the scholars of Mithila decided in Śaka 1248, corresponding to 1326 CE, to institute the present form of the pañjī system. Subsequently, in 1760 CE, a few intellectually self-indulgent people obtained an order from the ruler of Mithila, Maharaja Madhav Singh, to have the genealogists compile branch books in their present form. Thereafter, in the registers (sometimes described under Śaka 1600, or 1678 CE, but in fact, according to the text, after Madhav Singh, around 1800 CE), a new Brahmin subcaste called Śrotriya arose in Mithila.

On the basis of what he regards as authentic pañjī records, the original author concludes that the Śrotriya subcaste took shape around 1800 CE. Anshuman Pandey writes in his research that Gajendra Thakur of New Delhi supplied him with digital copies of the genealogical records of Maithil Brahmins. Families of hereditary genealogists preserve these records across generations and often regard them as 'intellectual property', thereby restricting researchers' access. Pandey writes that in 2007 he received a complete digital collection of the registers from Gajendra Thakur. [Anshuman Pandey, Recasting the Brahmin in Medieval Mithila: Origins of Caste Identity among the Maithil Brahmins of North Bihar, PhD dissertation, University of Michigan, 2014.]

The source text further states that these pañjī manuscripts were uploaded in 2009 to Videha Pothi—www.videha.co.in—and Google Books.

The original article states that the so-called Maharajas of Darbhanga were zamindars under Cornwallis's Permanent Settlement; there were many such zamindars in British India, but not in Nepal. The appendix to Pañjī Prabandha, Volumes I–II, contains a copy of an order of genealogically based social elevation, which the author interprets as evidence of status being conferred in place of cash. On this basis he argues that, before 1800 CE, the Śrotriyas did not exist as a separate subcaste in British India, and that no such subcaste exists even today among Maithil Brahmins in the Nepalese part of Mithila. Formerly, 'Śrotriya' denoted a follower of a particular tradition of learning; according to the author it continues to be used in that sense in Nepal.

The original pañjī references are given below:

Dūṣaṇa Pañjī—The Black Record

49.

Pañjī Record: Documentary Genealogical Transcription

Original titles and documentary spellings are retained as bibliographic and archival data.

१८८२	चर्मकारिणी	माण्डर	वभनियाम	छादन
तत्त्वचिंतामणि कारकगंगेश	छादनगंगेशक	नाँई	रत्नाकरक-मातृक (अज्ञात)	गंगेश
	वल्लभा	भवाइ	माहेश्वर
			जीवे

21//10. From Chhadan: Jagadguru Gaṅgeśa, the author of the Tattvacintāmaṇi. [Original entry: '२१//१० छादनसँ तत्व चिन्तामणि कारक जगद्गुरु गंगेश']

From Chhadan: the author of the Tattvacintāmaṇi. [Original entry: 'छादनसँ तत्व चिन्तामणि कारक']

Gaṅgeśa's beloved wife was a woman of the leatherworker community (carmakāriṇī); five years after his father's death, Gaṅgeśa, the author of the Tattvacintāmaṇi, was born. The record states that he was the child of Medhā, a woman of that community. [Original entry: 'गंगेशक वल्लभा चर्मकारिणी पितृ परोक्षे पञ्च वर्ष व्यतीते तत्व चिन्तामणि कारक गंगेशोत्पत्ति- चर्मकारिणी मेधाक सन्तानक लागिमे छलन्हि']

From Chhadan: the author of the Tattvacintāmaṇi, 'mōmō' Gaṅgeśa. [Original entry: 'छादन सँ तत्व चिन्तामणि कारक मॅामॅा गंगेश']

'A record concerning Gaṅgeśa, author of the Tattvacintāmaṇi, marked "M. M. Pā.", is available in an ancient pañjī.' [Original entry: 'तत्व चिन्तामणि कारक म. म. पा. गंगेशक विषयक लेख प्राचीन पञ्जीसँ उपलब्ध'.]

'An ancient record, somewhere, states that Gaṅgeśa was born five years after his father's death.' [Original: 'पितृ परोक्षे पंच वर्ष व्यतीते गंगेशोत्पत्तिः इति प्राचीन लेखनीयः कुत्रापि'.]

Devanand Pañjī 39-2: from Chhadan, Jagadguru Guru Gaṅgeśa; a son, Jayāditya, from Vabhaniyām, son of Sādhukar's wife. [Original entry: 'देवानन्द पञ्जी ३९-२ छादनसँ जगदगुरू गुंरू गंगेश सुताय वभनियामसँ जयादित्य सुत साधुकर पत्नी'.]

Devanand Pañjī 339-3: Jagadguru Gaṅgeśa; son Supan; a daughter in the Bhandarisam line of Harāditya; a son from Gorā Jajiwāl, Jīve's wife; and a son, Sandagahi Bhaveśvara. Elsewhere, at this point, Supan's brother Hariśarmā is mentioned, sometimes with the village Jajiwāl. [Original entry: 'देवानन्द पञ्जी ३३९-३ जगदगुरू गंगेश सुत सुपन दौ भण्डारिसमसँ हरादित्य दौ. । । पुत्र सुताच गोरा जजिवाल सँ जीवे पत्नी ए सुत सन्दगहि भवेश्वर। अत्रस्थाने सुपनभ्रातृ हरिशर्म्म दारिति क्वचित् जजिवाल ग्राम'.]

Devanand Pañjī 30=5: from Chhadan, the author of a treatise, M. M. Pā. Vardhamāna; a son from Khandwalā, Viśvanātha, son of Śivanātha's wife; Gaṅgeśa—M. M. Vardhamāna / Supan / Hariśarmā. [Original entry: 'देवानन्द पञ्जी ३०=५ छादनसँ उपायकारक म. म. पा. वर्द्धमान सुताच खण्डवलासँ विश्वनाथ सुत शिवनाथ पत्नी गंगेश-म. म. वर्द्धमान/सुपन/हरिशर्म्म'.]

Gaṅgeśa, the author of the Tattvacintāmaṇi, wrote a work whose extent the original author metaphorically equates with twelve thousand books. Returning to the pañjī references, he states that Gaṅgeśa, the author of the Tattvacintāmaṇi, was born five years after his father's death and married a woman of the leatherworker community. He therefore asks why Ramanath Jha concealed this from Dinesh Chandra Bhattacharya. Gaṅgeśa's son Vardhamāna calls him 'sukavi-kairava-kānana-induḥ'—the moon to the grove of water lilies that are good poets. The original author connects the present unavailability of Gaṅgeśa's poems with a wider history of literary and social suppression. The narrative then turns to Vāsudeva of Bengal and Pakṣadhara Miśra of Mithila. Vāsudeva came to Mithila, passed the śalākā examination and obtained the title 'Sārvabhauma'. He memorised Gaṅgeśa's Tattvacintāmaṇi and the verses of Udayana's Nyāyakusumāñjali because teachers in Mithila would not permit students to write down and copy the texts. Vāsudeva's disciple Raghunātha Śiromaṇi defeated his teacher Pakṣadhara Miśra in a scholastic debate and obtained the right of certification; Vāsudeva and Raghunātha established the Navya-Nyāya tradition at Navadvīpa. The original article considers Pakṣadhara Miśra a contemporary of Vidyāpati—distinguishing this Vidyāpati from the poet of the Padāvalī—and states that he wrote in Sanskrit and Avahaṭṭa. After Raghunātha Śiromaṇi, fewer students came from Bengal to study in Mithila. According to the pañjī records, Gaṅgeśa received both supreme titles, 'Paramaguru' and 'Jagadguru'; the second person said to have received 'Paramaguru' was Vācaspati Miśra II. The original author interprets the disappearance of Navya-Nyāya from Mithila through a metaphor of nature's revenge for the 'honour killing' of Gaṅgeśa and his family.

[The English translation of Gajendra Thakur's Maithili story 'Śabdaśāstram'—'The Science of Words', based on what he describes as the authentic pañjī records of Gaṅgeśa Upādhyāya—was published in Indian Literature, Vol. 58, No. 2 (280), March/April 2014, pp. 78–93, Sahitya Akademi.]

27. Maithili Wikipedia, Unicode Tirhuta–Kaithi, and Digital Maithili

Abstract

Maithili Wikipedia; Unicode Tirhuta and Kaithi; Maithili in Google Translate, Twitter, and Amazon Alexa; Anshuman Pandey's contribution to the Tirhuta (Mithilakshara) and Kaithi Unicode fonts; and the contributions of Rajesh Ranjan, Amir E. Aharoni (Israel), Runa Bhattacharya, and Muzammil to Maithili Wikipedia, documented through Facebook and email correspondence. Anshuman Pandey and the Tirhuta (Mithilakshara) and Kaithi Unicode fonts; Rajesh Ranjan, Amir (Israel), Runa Bhattacharya, and Muzammil and Maithili Wikipedia. Maithili Wikipedia, Unicode Tirhuta and Kaithi, Maithili in Google Translate, Twitter, and Amazon Alexa: the correspondence in Part One should have made the whole matter clear.

Keywords: Wikipedia · Unicode · Tirhuta · Kaithi · digital · Rajesh · font

Abstract

Maithili Wikipedia; Unicode Tirhuta and Kaithi; Maithili in Google Translate, Twitter, and Amazon Alexa; Anshuman Pandey's contribution to the Tirhuta (Mithilakshara) and Kaithi Unicode fonts; and the contributions of Rajesh Ranjan, Amir E. Aharoni (Israel), Runa Bhattacharya, and Muzammil to Maithili Wikipedia, documented through Facebook and email correspondence. Anshuman Pandey and the Tirhuta (Mithilakshara) and Kaithi Unicode fonts; Rajesh Ranjan, Amir (Israel), Runa Bhattacharya, and Muzammil and Maithili Wikipedia. Maithili Wikipedia, Unicode Tirhuta and Kaithi, Maithili in Google Translate, Twitter, and Amazon Alexa: the correspondence in Part One should have made the whole matter clear. The screenshots provided there are described below. Part One, Subsection One: Anshuman Pandey and the Tirhuta (Mithilakshara) and Kaithi Unicode fonts. We shall begin with Part One, Subsection One.

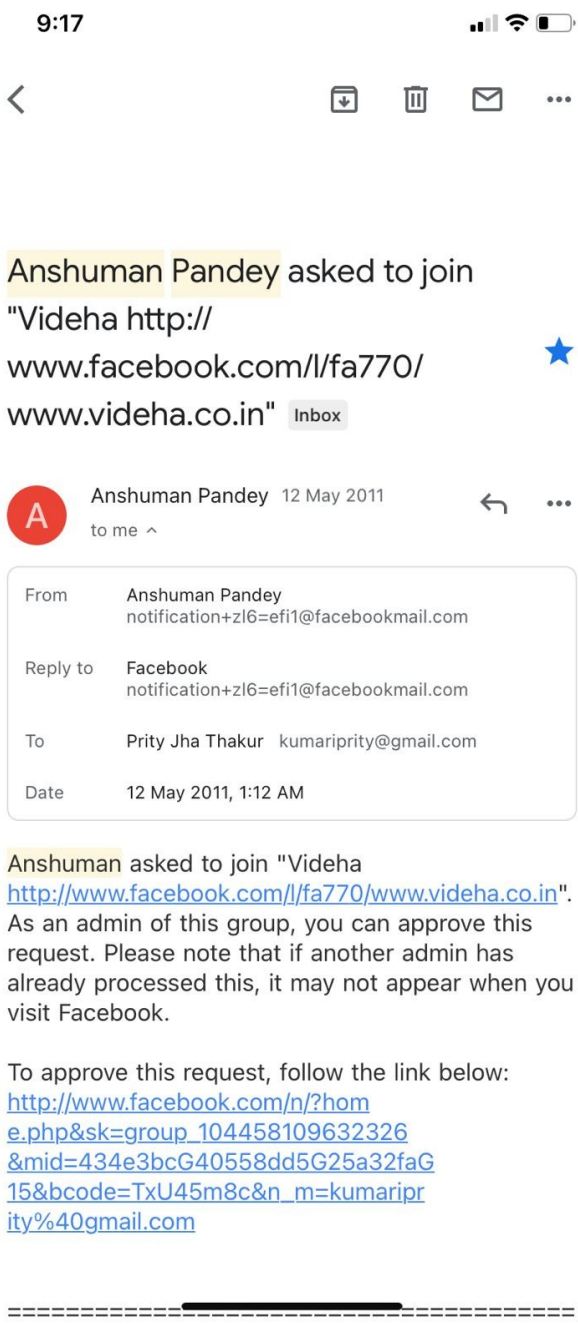
Maithili Wikipedia, Unicode Tirhuta and Kaithi, Maithili in Google Translate, Twitter, and Amazon Alexa

Part One

Anshuman Pandey's contribution to the Tirhuta (Mithilakshara) and Kaithi Unicode fonts; contributions by Rajesh Ranjan, Amir E. Aharoni (Israel), Runa Bhattacharya, and Muzammil to Maithili Wikipedia (Facebook and email correspondence)

Part One, Subsection One

Anshuman Pandey and the Tirhuta (Mithilakshara) and Kaithi Unicode fonts



9:17

Anshuman Pandey asked to join "Videha http://www.facebook.com/l/fa770/www.videha.co.in" Inbox

Anshuman Pandey 12 May 2011
to me

From	Anshuman Pandey notification+zl6=efi1@facebookmail.com
Reply to	Facebook notification+zl6=efi1@facebookmail.com
To	Prity Jha Thakur kumariprity@gmail.com
Date	12 May 2011, 1:12 AM

Anshuman asked to join "Videha http://www.facebook.com/l/fa770/www.videha.co.in". As an admin of this group, you can approve this request. Please note that if another admin has already processed this, it may not appear when you visit Facebook.

To approve this request, follow the link below:
http://www.facebook.com/n/?home.php&sk=group_104458109632326&mid=434e3bcG40558dd5G25a32faG15&bcode=TxU45m8c&n_m=kumariprity%40gmail.com

==========

9:13
[Videha www.videha.co.in]
Update: The proposal to encode
Tirhuta in Unicode...
Inbox
Anshuman Pandey 17 May 2011
to me
From Anshuman Pandey
notification+zl6=efi1@facebookmail.com
Reply to Reply to comment
g+41tiz5k000000hum6s5001a7p3ikk0900110z e5g2ti1s93o@groups.facebook.com
To
Prity Jha Thakur kumariprity@gmail.com
Date
17 May 2011, 10:25 PM
Anshuman Pandey posted in Videha www.videha.co.in Anshuman Pandey 17 May 22:25
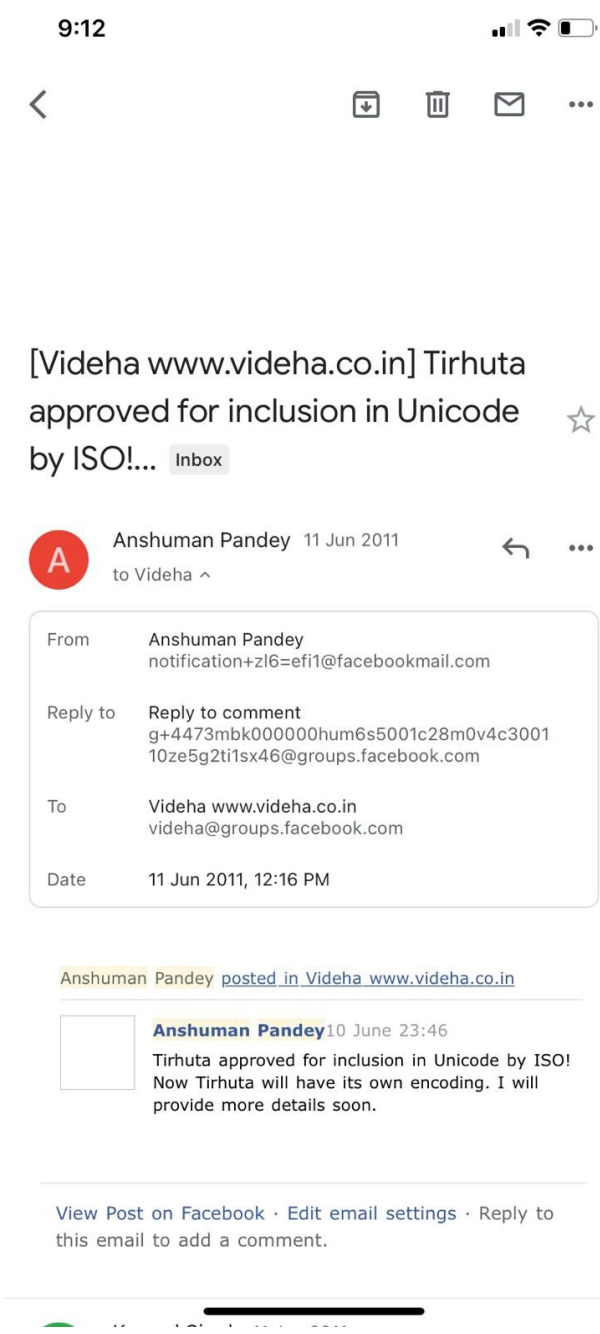
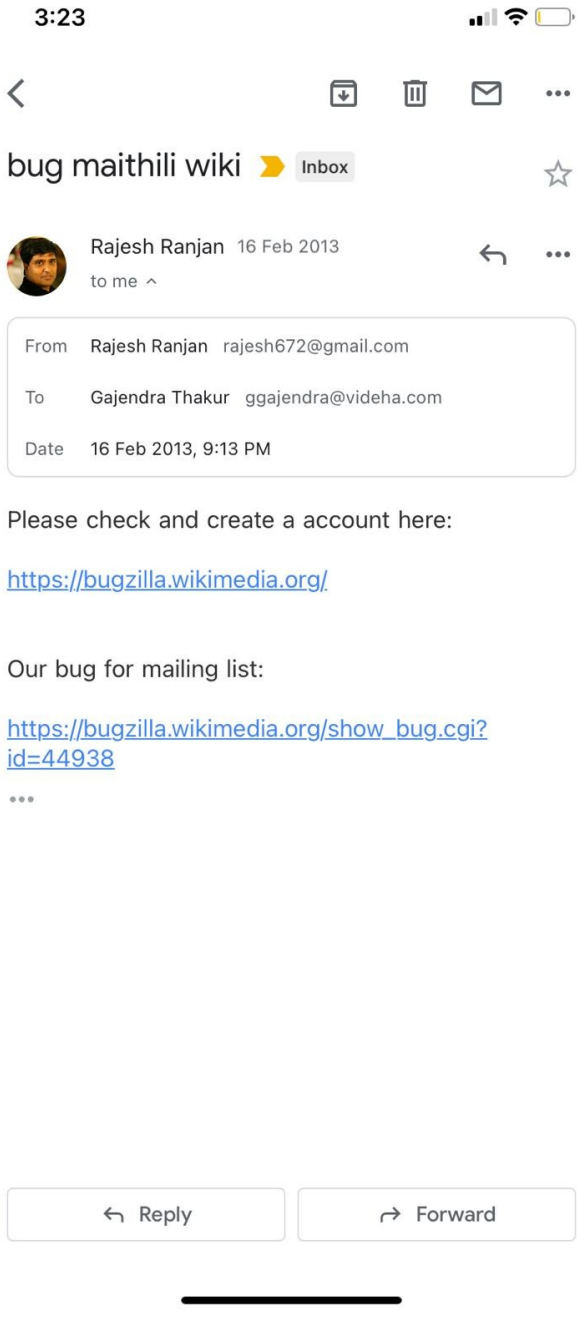
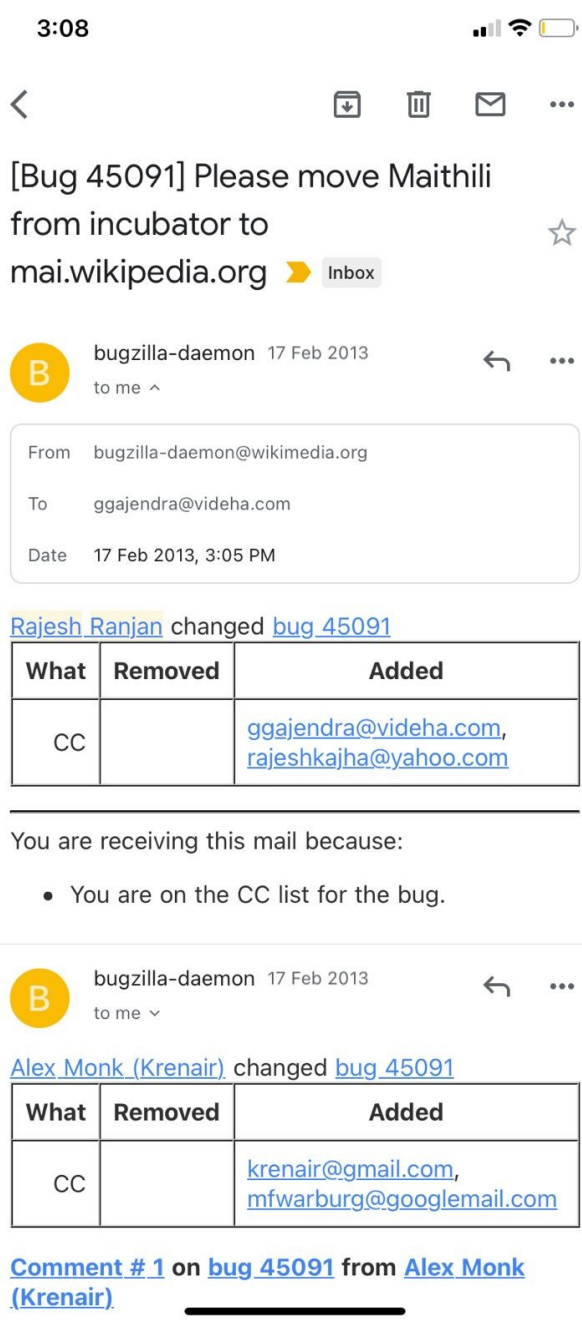
Update: The proposal to encode Tirhuta in Unicode was reviewed and accepted by the Unicode Technical Committee. Now the proposal will be reviewed by the ISO technical group JTC2/SC2/WG2. If ISO approves the script, then Tirhuta will be officially placed in the queue for inclusion in a future version of Unicode.
http://std.dkuug.dk/JTC1/SC2/WG2/docs/n4035.pdf
std.dkuug.dk
View Post on Facebook · Edit email settings · Reply to this email to add a comment.



Part One, Subsection Two

Contributions of Rajesh Ranjan, Amir (Israel), Runa Bhattacharya, and Muzammil to Maithili Wikipedia





3:08

[Bug 45091] Please move Maithili from incubator to mai.wikipedia.org Inbox bugzilla-daemon 17 Feb 2013

to me

From bugzilla-daemon@wikimedia.org
To ggajendra@videha.com
Date 17 Feb 2013, 3:05 PM

Rajesh Ranjan changed bug 45091

What	Removed	Added
CC		ggajendra@videha.com, rajeshkajha@yahoo.com

You are receiving this mail because:

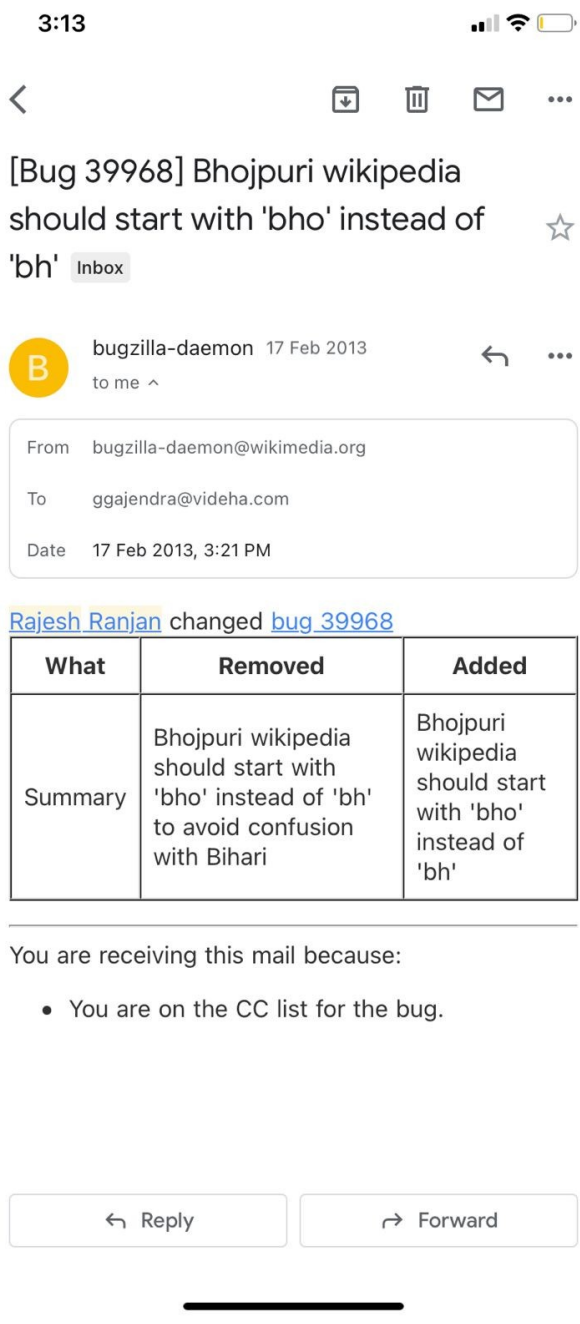
- You are on the CC list for the bug.

bugzilla-daemon 17 Feb 2013
to me

Alex Monk (Krenair) changed bug 45091

What	Removed	Added
CC		krenair@gmail.com, mfwarburg@googlemail.com

Comment # 1 on bug 45091 from Alex Monk (Krenair)



3:13
[Bug 39968] Bhojpuri wikipedia should start with 'bho' instead of 'bh' Inbox
B
bugzilla-daemon 17 Feb 2013
to me
From bugzilla-daemon@wikimedia.org
To ggajendra@videha.com
Date 17 Feb 2013, 3:21 PM
Rajesh Ranjan changed bug 39968
What
Removed Added
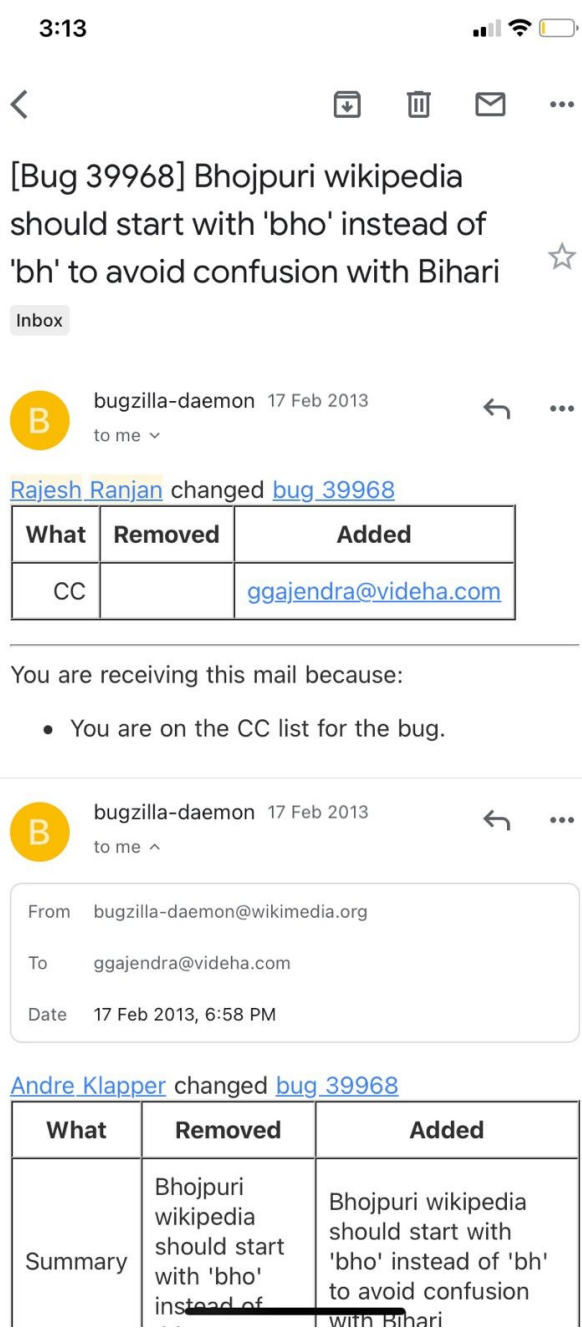
Summary
Bhojpuri wikipedia should start with 'bho' instead of 'bh' to avoid confusion with Bihari
Bhojpuri wikipedia should start with 'bho' instead of 'bh'
You are receiving this mail because:
You are on the CC list for the bug.
Reply
Forward



3:13

[Bug 39968] Bhojpuri wikipedia should start with 'bho' instead of 'bh' to avoid confusion with Bihari

Inbox

B bugzilla-daemon 17 Feb 2013
to me

Rajesh Ranjan changed bug 39968

What	Removed	Added
CC		ggajendra@videha.com

You are receiving this mail because:

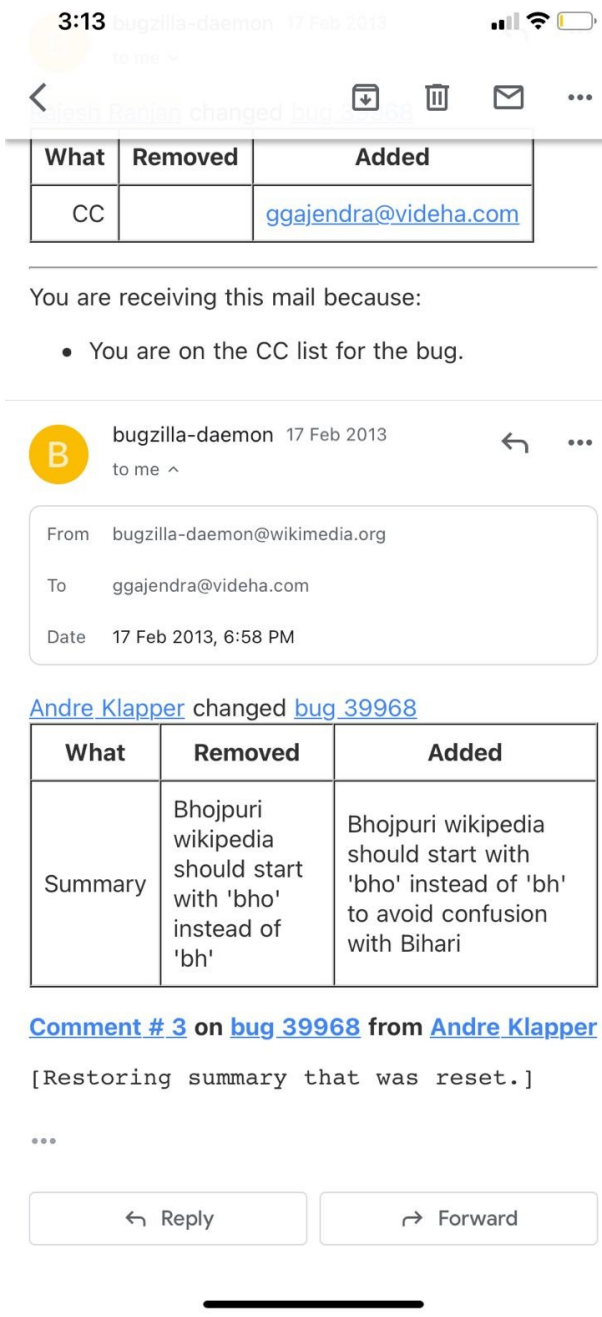
- You are on the CC list for the bug.

B bugzilla-daemon 17 Feb 2013
to me

From bugzilla-daemon@wikimedia.org
To ggajendra@videha.com
Date 17 Feb 2013, 6:58 PM

Andre Klapper changed bug 39968

What	Removed	Added
Summary	Bhojpuri wikipedia should start with 'bho' instead of [redacted] with Bihari	Bhojpuri wikipedia should start with 'bho' instead of 'bh' to avoid confusion



3:13

What	Removed	Added
CC		ggajendra@videha.com

You are receiving this mail because:

- You are on the CC list for the bug.

bugzilla-daemon 17 Feb 2013
to me

From bugzilla-daemon@wikimedia.org
To ggajendra@videha.com
Date 17 Feb 2013, 6:58 PM

Andre Klapper changed bug 39968

What	Removed	Added
Summary	Bhojpuri wikipedia should start with 'bho' instead of 'bh'	Bhojpuri wikipedia should start with 'bho' instead of 'bh' to avoid confusion with Bihari

Comment # 3 on bug 39968 from Andre Klapper

[Restoring summary that was reset.]

Reply Forward

Comment # 1 on bug 45091 from Alex Monk (Krenair)

https://meta.wikimedia.org/wiki/Requests_for_new_languages/Wikipedia_Maithili

•••

B bugzilla-daemon 17 Feb 2013
to me

From	bugzilla-daemon@wikimedia.org
To	ggajendra@videha.com
Date	17 Feb 2013, 7:03 PM

MF-Warburg changed bug 45091

What	Removed	Added
Status	UNCONFIRMED	RESOLVED
Resolution	---	INVALID

Comment # 2 on bug 45091 from MF-Warburg

```
marking as invalid: The creation of this wiki was not approved by the language committee.

[It would also currently have no chance because of a lack of activity in the test-project. Please address any questions on the page on Meta]
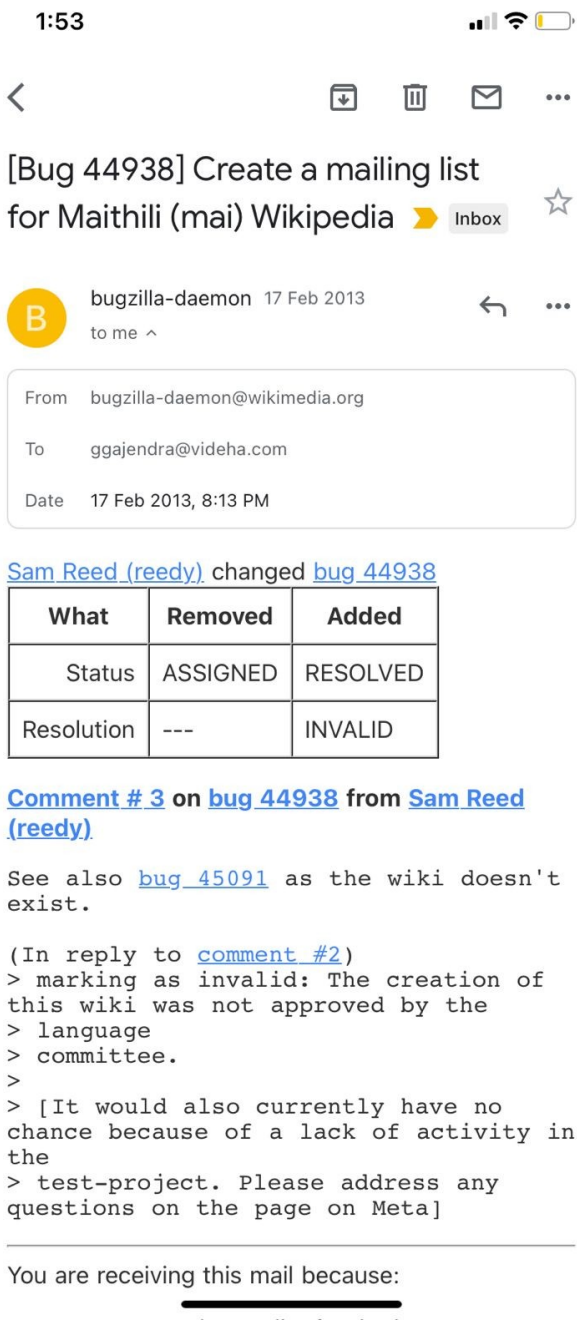
```

•••

bugzilla-daemon [redacted]



1:53

[Bug 44938] Create a mailing list for Maithili (mai) Wikipedia Inbox bugzilla-daemon 17 Feb 2013

to me

From bugzilla-daemon@wikimedia.org
To ggajendra@videha.com
Date 17 Feb 2013, 8:13 PM

Sam Reed (reedy) changed bug 44938

What	Removed	Added
Status	ASSIGNED	RESOLVED
Resolution	---	INVALID

Comment # 3 on bug 44938 from Sam Reed (reedy)

```
See also bug 45091 as the wiki doesn't exist.

(In reply to comment #2) > marking as invalid: The creation of this wiki was not approved by the > language > committee.
>
> [It would also currently have no chance because of a lack of activity in the > test-project. Please address any questions on the page on Meta]
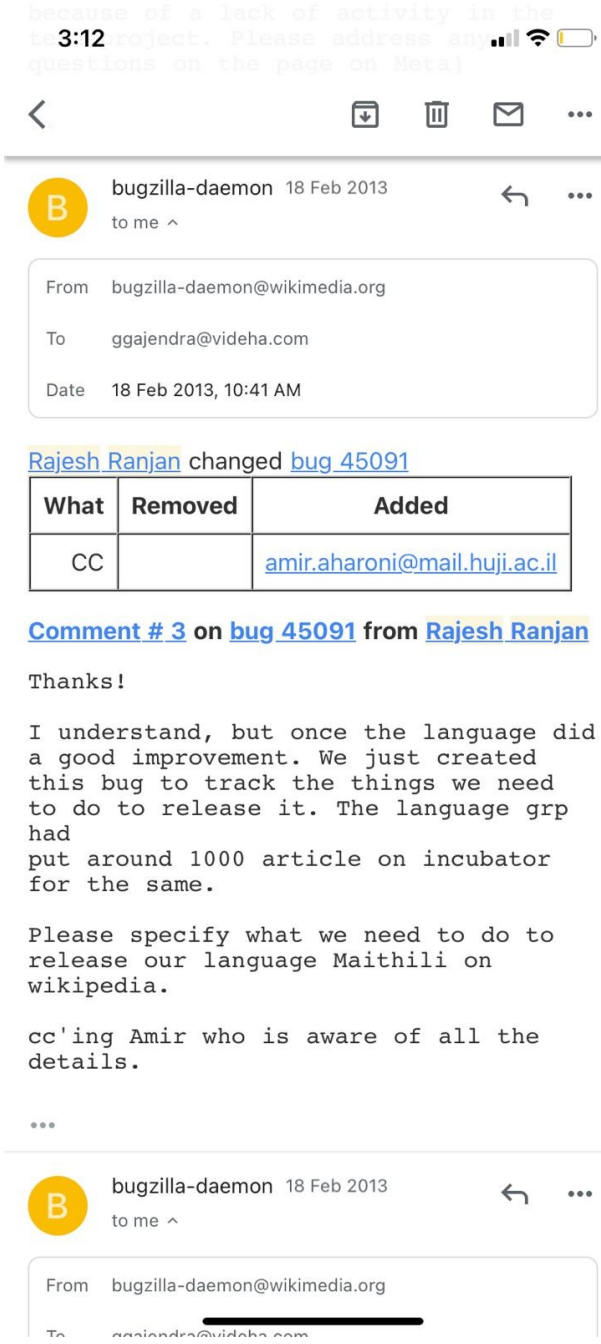
```

You are receiving this mail because:



3:12

bugzilla-daemon 18 Feb 2013
to me

From bugzilla-daemon@wikimedia.org
To ggajendra@videha.com
Date 18 Feb 2013, 10:41 AM

Rajesh Ranjan changed bug 45091

What	Removed	Added
CC		amir.aharoni@mail.huji.ac.il

Comment # 3 on bug 45091 from Rajesh Ranjan

```
Thanks!

I understand, but once the language did a good improvement. We just created this bug to track the things we need to do to release it. The language grp had put around 1000 article on incubator for the same.

Please specify what we need to do to release our language Maithili on wikipedia.

cc'ing Amir who is aware of all the details.
```

bugzilla-daemon 18 Feb 2013
to me

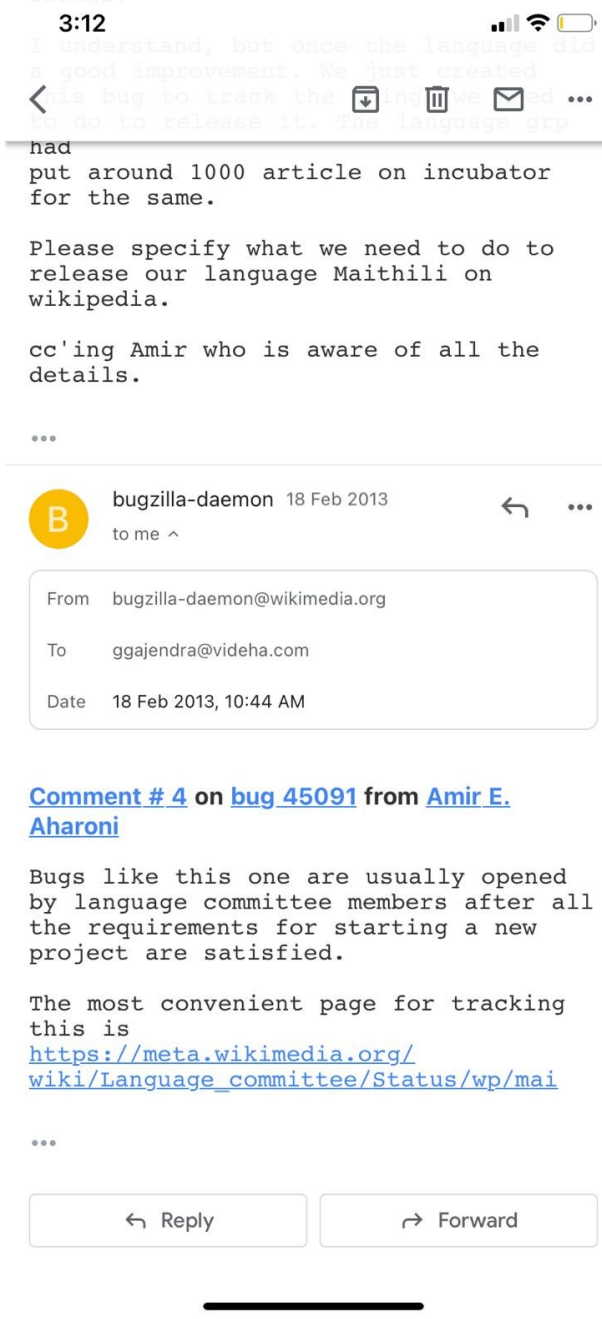
From bugzilla-daemon@wikimedia.org



3:12

had put around 1000 article on incubator for the same.

Please specify what we need to do to release our language Maithili on wikipedia.

cc'ing Amir who is aware of all the details.

•••

B bugzilla-daemon 18 Feb 2013
to me

From bugzilla-daemon@wikimedia.org
To ggajendra@videha.com
Date 18 Feb 2013, 10:44 AM

Comment # 4 on bug 45091 from Amir E. Aharoni

Bugs like this one are usually opened by language committee members after all the requirements for starting a new project are satisfied.

The most convenient page for tracking this is https://meta.wikimedia.org/wiki/Language_committee/Status/wp/mai

•••

Reply Forward

You are receiving this mail because:

- You are on the CC list for the bug.

B bugzilla-daemon 18 Feb 2013
to me

Comment # 4 on bug 44938 from Rajesh Ranjan

```
Amir, I put here a request for mailing list only after the consultation with you. Please check and let me know what makes my request invalid.
```

...

B bugzilla-daemon 24 Sep 2014
to me

Muzammil changed bug 44938

What	Removed	Added
CC		mba_hyd@rediffmail.com

Comment # 5 on bug 44938 from Muzammil

```
There is need to re-examine the refusal:
1) Activity level has increased - 16 active users and about 60 overall users.
2) Likelihood of the Wikipedia in the near future (see:
http://blog.wikimedia.org/2014/09/08/a-focused-approach-for-maithili-
wikipedia/)
3) Growing social media activity for the Wikipedia:
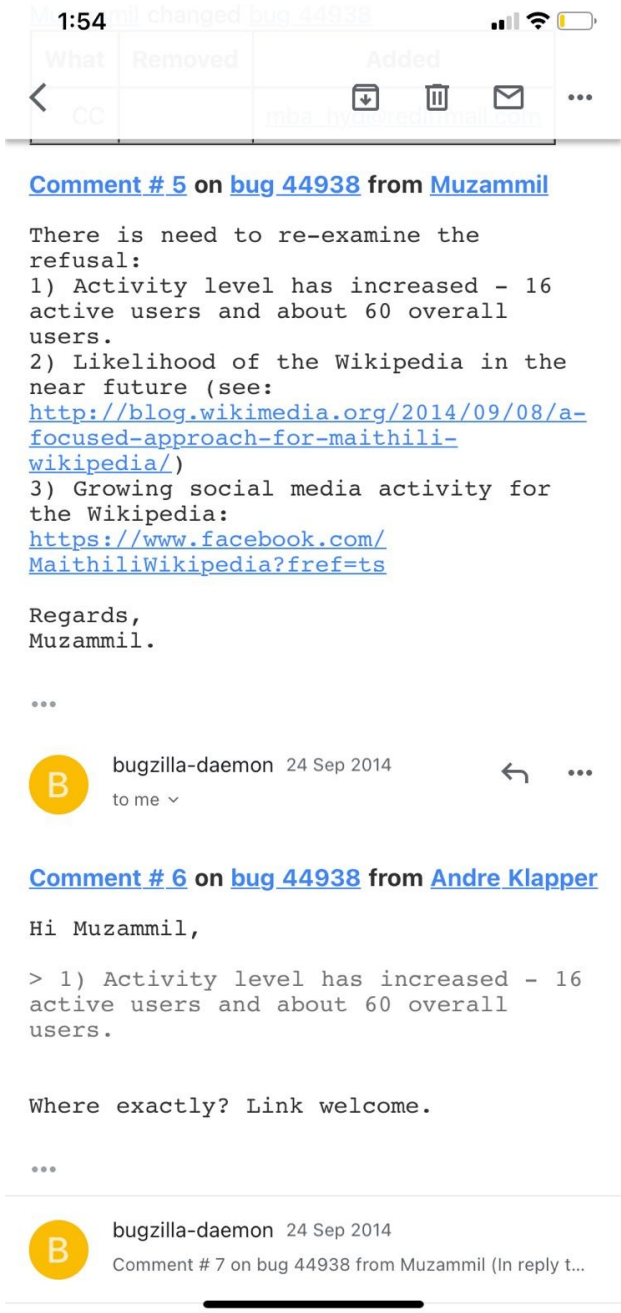
https://www.facebook.com/
MaithiliWikipedia?fref=ts
```



1:54
Comment # 5 on bug 44938 from Muzammil
There is need to re-examine the refusal:
1) Activity level has increased - 16 active users and about 60 overall users.
2) Likelihood of the Wikipedia in the near future (see: http://blog.wikimedia.org/2014/09/08/a-focused-approach-for-maithili-wikipedia/)
3) Growing social media activity for the Wikipedia: https://www.facebook.com/MaithiliWikipedia?fref=ts Regards,
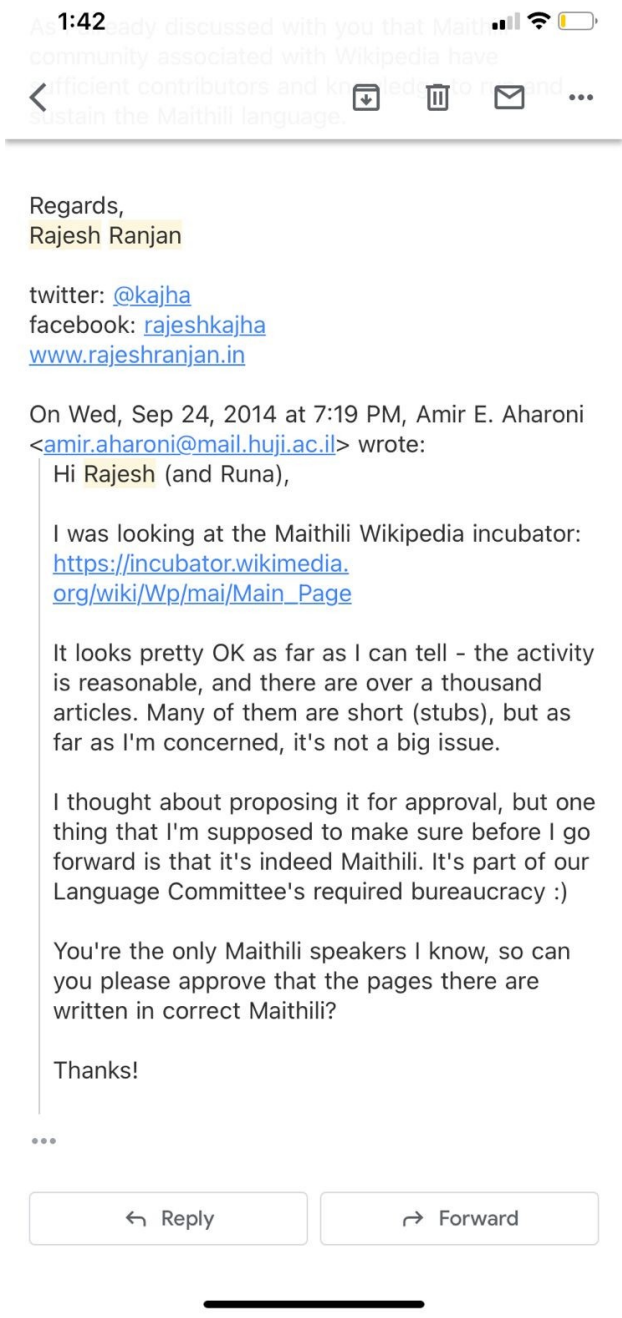
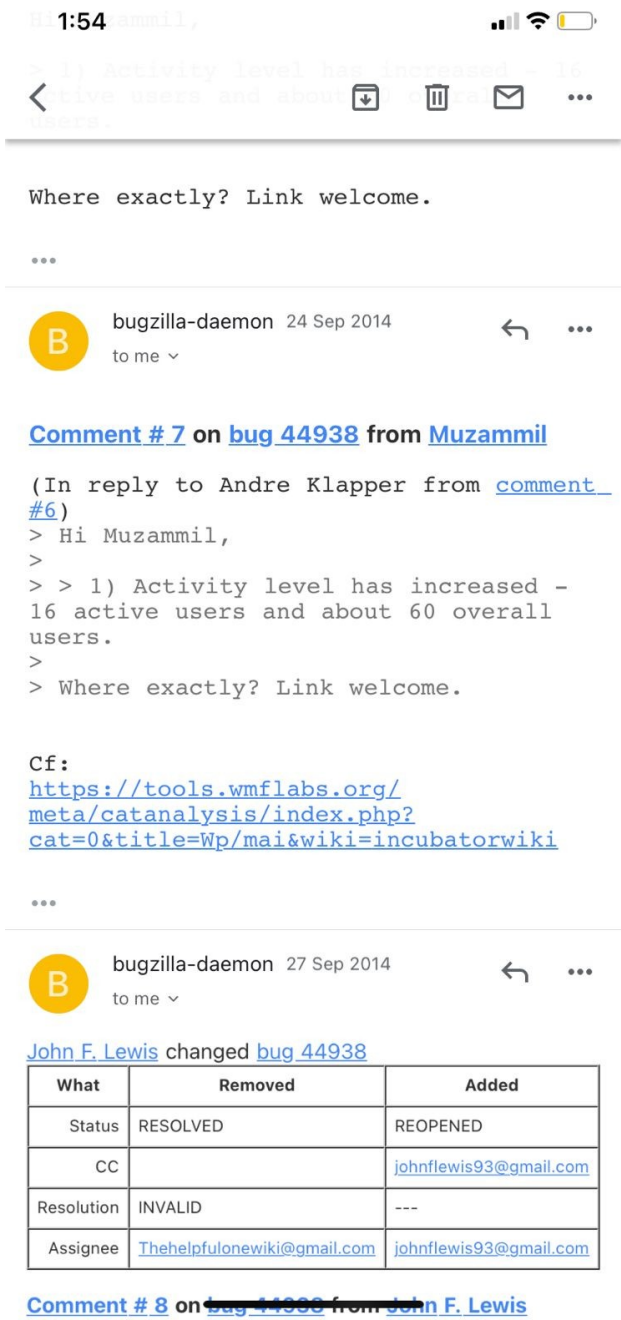
Muzammil.
bugzilla-daemon 24 Sep 2014
to me
Comment # 6 on bug 44938 from Andre Klapper
Hi Muzammil,
> 1) Activity level has increased - 16 active users and about 60 overall users.
Where exactly? Link welcome.
bugzilla-daemon 24 Sep 2014
Comment # 7 on bug 44938 from Muzammil (In reply t...



1:42
Regards,
Rajesh Ranjan
twitter: @kajha
facebook: rajeshkajha
www.rajeshranjan.in
On Wed, Sep 24, 2014 at 7:19 PM, Amir E. Aharoni <amir.aharoni@mail.huji.ac.il> wrote:
Hi Rajesh (and Runa),
I was looking at the Maithili Wikipedia incubator: https://incubator.wikimedia.org/wiki/Wp/mai/Main_Page
It looks pretty OK as far as I can tell - the activity is reasonable, and there are over a thousand articles. Many of them are short (stubs), but as far as I'm concerned, it's not a big issue.
I thought about proposing it for approval, but one thing that I'm supposed to make sure before I go forward is that it's indeed Maithili. It's part of our Language Committee's required bureaucracy :)
You're the only Maithili speakers I know, so can you please approve that the pages there are written in correct Maithili?
Thanks!
Reply
Forward



1:54

Where exactly? Link welcome.

bugzilla-daemon 24 Sep 2014
to me

Comment # 7 on bug 44938 from Muzammil

(In reply to Andre Klapper from comment #6)
> Hi Muzammil,
>
> > 1) Activity level has increased - 16 active users and about 60 overall users.
>
> Where exactly? Link welcome.

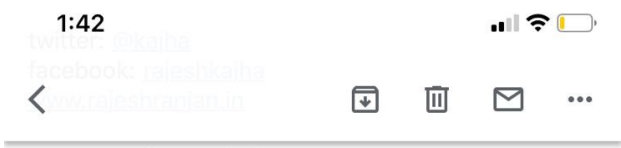
Cf:
https://tools.wmflabs.org/meta/catanalysis/index.php?cat=0&title=Wp/mai&wiki=incubatorwiki

bugzilla-daemon 27 Sep 2014
to me

John F. Lewis changed bug 44938

What	Removed	Added
Status	RESOLVED	REOPENED
CC		johnflewis93@gmail.com
Resolution	INVALID	---
Assignee	Thehelpfulonewiki@gmail.com	johnflewis93@gmail.com

Comment # 8 on [redacted] from John F. Lewis



---------- Forwarded message ----------
From: Rajesh Ranjan <rajesh672@gmail.com>
Date: Thu, Sep 25, 2014 at 8:06 AM
Subject: Re: Mathitili Wikipedia
To: "Amir E. Aharoni" <amir.aharoni@mail.huji.ac.il>
Cc: Runa Bhattacharjee
<rbhattacharjee@wikimedia.org>

Hi Amir,

Thanks!

This is Maithili.

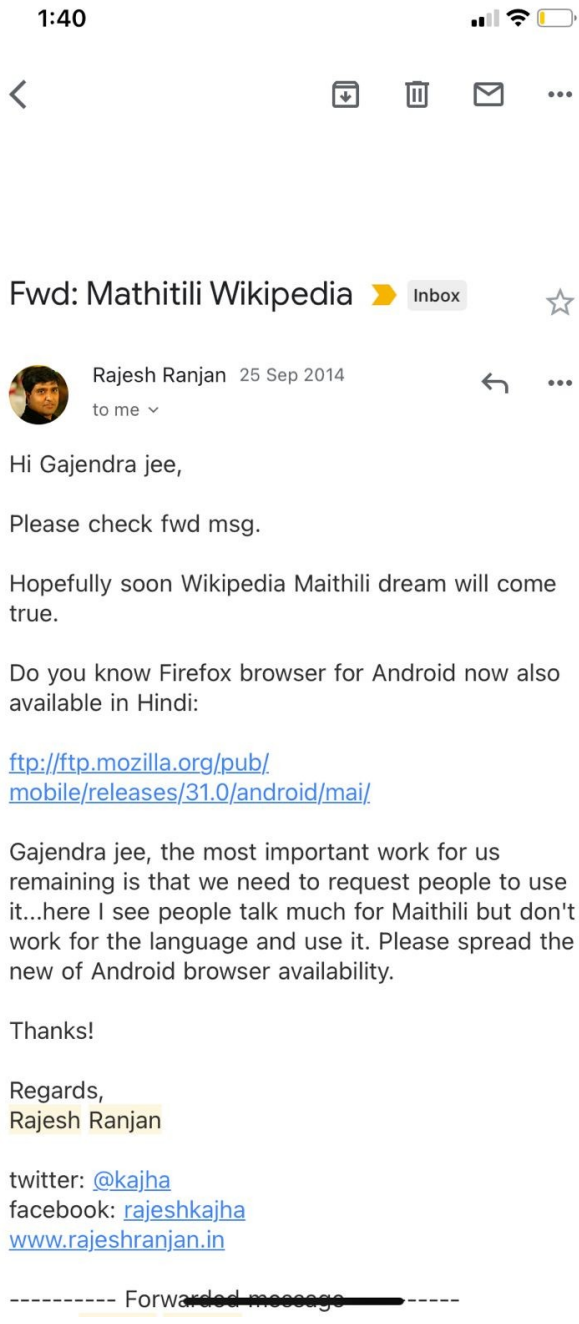
As I already discussed with you that Maithili community associated with Wikipedia have sufficient contributors and knowledge to run and sustain the Maithili language.

Regards,
Rajesh Ranjan

twitter: @kajha
facebook: rajeshkajha
www.rajeshranjan.in

On Wed, Sep 24, 2014 at 7:19 PM, Amir E. Aharoni <amir.aharoni@mail.huji.ac.il> wrote:

> Hi Rajesh (and Runa),
>
> I was looking at the Maithili Wikipedia incubator: https://incubator.wikimedia.org/wiki/Wp/mai/Main_Page
>
> It looks pretty OK as far as I can tell - the activity is reasonable, and there are over a thousand articles. Many of them are short (stubs), but as



1:40

Fwd: Mathitili Wikipedia Inbox

Rajesh Ranjan 25 Sep 2014
to me

Hi Gajendra jee,

Please check fwd msg.

Hopefully soon Wikipedia Maithili dream will come true.

Do you know Firefox browser for Android now also available in Hindi:

ftp://ftp.mozilla.org/pub/mobile/releases/31.0/android/mai/

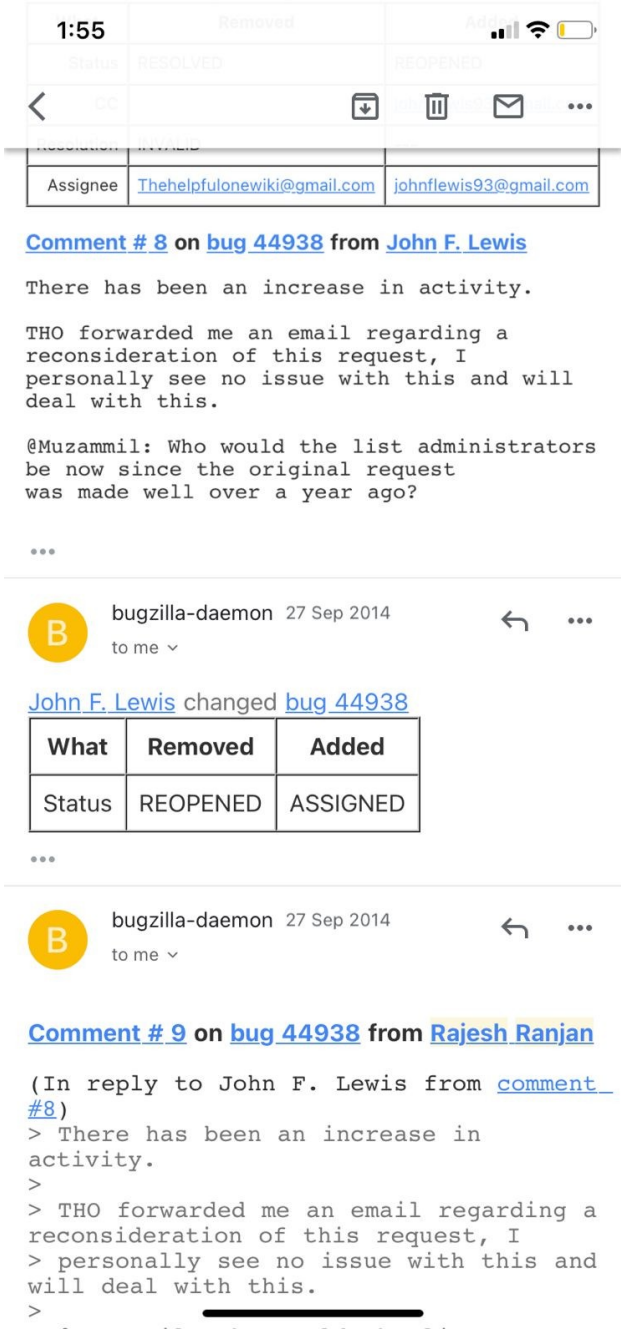
Gajendra jee, the most important work for us remaining is that we need to request people to use it...here I see people talk much for Maithili but don't work for the language and use it. Please spread the new of Android browser availability.

Thanks!

Regards,
Rajesh Ranjan

twitter: @kajha
facebook: rajeshkajha
www.rajeshranjan.in

---------- Forwarded message ----------



1:55
Assignee
Thehelpfulonewiki@gmail.com
johnflewis93@gmail.com
Comment # 8 on bug 44938 from John F. Lewis
There has been an increase in activity.
THO forwarded me an email regarding a reconsideration of this request, I personally see no issue with this and will deal with this.
@Muzammil: Who would the list administrators be now since the original request was made well over a year ago?
bugzilla-daemon 27 Sep 2014
to me
John F. Lewis changed bug 44938
What Removed Added
Status REOPENED ASSIGNED
bugzilla-daemon 27 Sep 2014
to me
Comment # 9 on bug 44938 from Rajesh Ranjan
(In reply to John F. Lewis from comment #8)
> There has been an increase in activity.
>
> THO forwarded me an email regarding a reconsideration of this request, I > personally see no issue with this and will deal with this.
>

Comment # 10 on bug 44938 from Muzammil

(In reply to John F. Lewis from comment #8)
> There has been an increase in activity.
>
> THO forwarded me an email regarding a reconsideration of this request, I > personally see no issue with this and will deal with this.
>
> @Muzammil: Who would the list administrators be now since the original > request was made well over a year ago?

I think you can add me also an administrator for the list. I will discuss with Biplab to see if he too is interested as he is very active on the incubator project.

...

B bugzilla-daemon 28 Sep 2014
to me

बिप्लब आनन्द changed bug 44938

What	Removed	Added
CC		biplabanand@gmail.com

Comment # 11 on bug 44938 from बिप्लब आनन्द

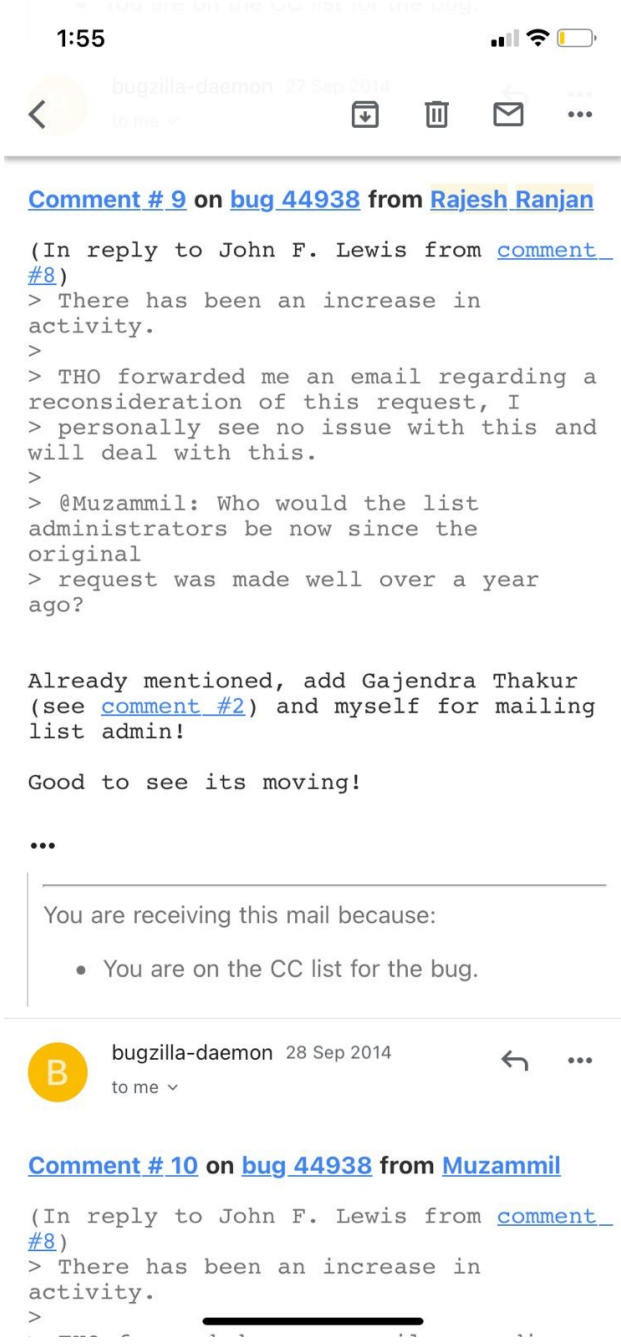
Thanks @Muzammil .....
ok add me too for the admin



1:55

bugzilla-daemon 27 Sep 2014
to me

Comment # 9 on bug 44938 from Rajesh Ranjan

(In reply to John F. Lewis from comment #8)
> There has been an increase in activity.
>
> THO forwarded me an email regarding a reconsideration of this request, I > personally see no issue with this and will deal with this.
>
> @Muzammil: Who would the list administrators be now since the original > request was made well over a year ago?

Already mentioned, add Gajendra Thakur (see comment #2) and myself for mailing list admin!

Good to see its moving!

•••

You are receiving this mail because:

- You are on the CC list for the bug.

B bugzilla-daemon 28 Sep 2014
to me

Comment # 10 on bug 44938 from Muzammil

(In reply to John F. Lewis from comment #8)
> There has been an increase in activity.
>

1:56

बिप्लब आनन्द changed bug 44938

What	Removed	Added
CC		biplabanand@gmail.com

Comment # 11 on bug 44938 from बिप्लब आनन्द

```
Thanks @Muzammil .....
ok add me too for the admin

--We are very close,let make it happen-
-- Jai Mithila Jay Maithil------
```

bugzilla-daemon 6 Oct 2014

to me

From bugzilla-daemon@wikimedia.org

To ggajendra@videha.com

Date 6 Oct 2014, 1:25 AM

John F. Lewis changed bug 44938

What	Removed	Added
Status	ASSIGNED	RESOLVED
Resolution	---	FIXED

Comment # 12 on bug 44938 from John F. Lewis

```
Created. Setting list admins and sending the password to all shortly.
```

Part Two

The correspondence in Part One should already have made everything clear. The screenshots presented there are described as follows.

Part One, Subsection One: Anshuman Pandey and the Tirhuta (Mithilakshara) and Kaithi Unicode fonts

Let us first turn to Part One, Subsection One. Its screenshots are described below.

Anshuman Pandey had submitted proposals for Unicode fonts for Tirhuta (Mithilakshara) and Kaithi. He submitted a proposal for the Mithilakshara (Tirhuta) font on 30 September 2009 and a revised proposal on 5 May 2011; both acknowledged the contribution of Videha. On 12 May 2011, Anshuman Pandey joined Videha's Facebook group, https://www.facebook.com/groups/videha. On 17 May he informed the Videha Facebook group that the Unicode Technical Committee had approved the proposal and forwarded it to ISO. On 10 June he also posted there the news of ISO's approval of Tirhuta Unicode; in Indian Standard Time it was already 11 June. These fonts have now been made and are available for download at the links below.

Download Tirhuta and Kaithi fonts — Google's Noto Fonts project / C-DAC

Download the Unicode Tirhuta font

Mithila Uni

Kaithi

Part One, Subsection Two: Contributions of Rajesh Ranjan, Amir E. Aharoni (Israel), Runa Bhattacharya, and Muzammil to Maithili Wikipedia

We now turn to Part One, Subsection Two. Its screenshots are described below.

I have written repeatedly in Videha about Rajesh Ranjan and Sangeeta Kumari, contributors to the Fedora Project and Mozilla. Their names also appear in my English–Maithili Computer Dictionary. At my request, Rajesh Ranjan also spoke with Amir of Israel about Maithili Wikipedia at a Wikipedia summit.

Work had begun on this project even before 2008; a detailed account appears in Part Three. The matter passed through discussions of Bhojpuri and "Bihari" before arriving at Maithili. Work on MediaWiki and its translation programme then began, and more than one thousand articles were submitted. Rajesh Ranjan passed on to me whatever the Wikipedia

Language Committee asked him to undertake. Let me state here that one hundred per cent of those thousand articles in the Maithili Wikipedia Incubator—that is, its draft stage—were contributed by Videha. Some further contributions came later. Even when Maithili Wikipedia went live from the Incubator, ninety-nine per cent of its articles were from Videha, and even now ninety-five per cent of the articles there are, in the author's account, owing to Videha. On 18 February 2013, Amir E. Aharoni (Israel) acknowledged that the project's work was complete, since members of the Language Committee create this kind of bug report only then. I had been added to Bugzilla on 17 February 2013; however, because activity was extremely low, the Language Committee did not give its approval. Rajesh Ranjan protested. Through Videha and social media I too appealed to various ISPs to increase activity, but I regret to report that contributions from non-Videha members remained zero. Nevertheless, the number of active users rose to sixteen and the total number of users to sixty (see the screenshot of 24 September 2014). When we count Maithili speakers in the tens of millions, does this number not disappoint you?

On 24 September 2014, Amir E. Aharoni (Israel) informed Rajesh Ranjan and Runa Bhattacharya that there were more than one thousand articles, that activity was reasonably satisfactory, and that he knew no Maithili speaker apart from Rajesh Ranjan. He therefore asked them to confirm whether all these articles were indeed in Maithili; if so, he would put forward a proposal for approval. On the same date, Rajesh Ranjan told Amir E. Aharoni that all the more than one thousand articles were indeed written in Maithili.

On 25 September 2014, Rajesh Ranjan forwarded all the messages to me and said that the dream of Maithili Wikipedia was now about to be realised. Today it astonishes me to see people who made no contribution jumping about, while Rajesh Ranjan and Runa Bhattacharya remain silent despite having done so much. Maithili is indeed a fortunate language! In the same email, Rajesh Ranjan wrote that the fundamental question was why people deliver grand speeches in the name of Maithili yet neither work for it nor use it. Muzammil, too, became involved from the Wikipedia side. Rajesh Ranjan telephoned to ask me to become an administrator, although he knew that I keep away from the malady of power, and that this avoidance is not confined to the Sahitya Akademi. Instead, I suggested Biplab Anand: he was young and from Nepal and might therefore act impartially, as Wikipedia requires—although where does one find such impartiality in Maithili affairs? On 27 September 2014, Rajesh Ranjan recommended Biplab Anand, and the recommendation was accepted: Biplab Anand became an administrator of Maithili Wikipedia on 28 September 2014. I feel that both his spelling and his commitment need improvement; he is hardworking, however, and I wish him well.

Part Three

1

[Editorial: Videha, Issue 85, 1 July 2011 (Year 4, Month 43, Issue 85)]

Notice: Anshuman Pandey's applications to encode both Kaithi and Mithilakshara in the Universal Character Set (Unicode) were accepted. This allowed work to proceed on the base fonts for both scripts. The base font for Mithilakshara was named "Tirhuta," just as "Mangal" is used for Devanagari and "Vrinda" for Bengali. The third revised application for Mithilakshara describes Videha's contribution in detail: "Figure 11: Excerpt from a Maithili e-journal published as PDF (from Videha 2011: 22; Videha: A fortnightly Maithili e-journal. Issue 80 (April 15, 2011), Gajendra Thakur [ed]. http://www.videha.co.in/." In his acknowledgements, Anshuman Pandey states that Gajendra Thakur of New Delhi met him, corresponded extensively about Maithili, furnished valuable specimens of Maithili manuscripts, printed books, and other records, and gave feedback on the requirements for encoding Maithili in the UCS.

Notice 2. Google Maithili: Google Language Tools

http: //www.google.com/transconsole/giyl/chooseProject

Contribute to Google Translate. When revising an edit, explain in English, in the field for the reason, that there is no language named "Bihari." Translate at this link after signing in with a Google account.

http://www.google.com/transconsole/giyl/chooseActivity...

Keep checking this link for the availability of Maithili: http://www.google.co.in/language_tools? hl=en

Notice 3. Maithili Wikipedia

Members of Videha have translated 2,600 MediaWiki messages from English into Maithili. Now visit http://translatewiki.net/wiki/Special: Translate...; in the Group dropdown, select and translate the untranslated messages. If you are not a Wikipedia translator, request permission to translate into Maithili at http://translatewiki.net/wiki/Project: Translator. Before doing so, log in at the top right (or create an account if you do not have one), select Maithili as your language in Preferences, click the link to your user account, and create your user page. You should receive permission to translate after a while. Then begin translating.

In Videha's third issue (1 February 2008), I had announced: "Wikipedia had articles about Maithili, but no articles in Maithili, because a Maithili Wikipedia had not yet been approved. I have been working on this for a long time and am pleased to report that on 27 January 2008 approval was granted to begin a wiki for the Maithili language. Full approval of the project, however, will come only if at least five people from different places work regularly as editors." Now, after more than three years, with all the preliminary requirements for Maithili Wikipedia fulfilled, Wikipedia's Language Committee has understood that Maithili is not a language to be described simply as "Bihari" and requires a Wikipedia of its own. Gerard M. of Wikipedia writes (http://ultimategerardm.blogspot.com/.../bihari-wikipedia...).

"This information about Maithili and its relation to the Bihari group of languages was provided by Umesh Mandal. Umesh is working on the localisation of Maithili on Wikipedia. ... The Language Committee is trying to understand whether Maithili can be placed within the Bihari language group. ... But Umesh's reply has now made it absolutely clear that the answer is 'no'."

In an article entitled "Maithili aur Hindi" in the Hindi monthly Patal, edited by Ramdayal Pandey, Ramvilas Sharma had attempted to present Maithili as a dialect of Hindi. Yatri Ji opposed this in a Hindi article when he was forty-three years old (Aryavarta, 14/21 February 1954); Rajmohan Jha's Maithili translation of that article appeared in the second issue of Arambh. Umesh Mandal's successful intervention is especially significant in another respect: he is only thirty years old. When Maithils working in computer science are to be found from Hyderabad and Bangalore to Seattle, what does it reveal that this objection or correction came not from them but from a young admirer of Maithili living in a remote area of Mithila?

Through fieldwork, Umesh Mandal has also digitised, in audio and video form, songs sung by people of every caste and religion in Mithila; these are available in the Videha archive.

The following five sites belong to the Maithili Wiki project. Help take the project forward.

http: //translatewiki. net/wiki/Project: Translator http://meta.wikimedia.org/.../Requests.../Wikipedia_Maithili

http://translatewiki.net/wiki/Special: Translate...

http: //incubator. wikimedia. org/wiki/Wp/mai

http: //translatewiki. net/wiki/MediaWiki: Mainpage/mai

2

Videha seminars: On 6–7 and 13–14 December 2008; on 5–6 and 12–13 December 2009; on 4–5 and 11–12 December 2010; and, in the final discussions, on 17–18 and 24–25 December 2011, discussions and practical laboratory demonstrations were held at Nirmali, Supaul district, concerning Google Translator Toolkit and Google Language Tools for Maithili, approval of applications to encode both Kaithi and Mithilakshara in the Universal Character Set (Unicode), and Maithili Wikipedia. Many relevant specialists attended. Some articles and creative writings were subsequently received by post and email. A brief account follows.

Google Translator Toolkit now accepts Maithili as both a source and a target language. See http://support.google.com/translate/toolkit/bin/answer.py...

And: http://translate.google.com/toolkit/list? hl=en...

Following Videha's objections, Google acknowledged, according to the author, that no language called "Bihari" exists. "Maithili Wikipedia" had already been established through Videha, and Wikipedia had earlier accepted the same point regarding the name "Bihari."

Google Maithili: Google Language Tools

Here, under languages in English, select "Bihari" and contribute to Google Translate. When changing your edits, explain in English in the reason field that there is no language named "Bihari." Translate using this link after logging in with your Google account.

[Update: Another success for Videha — the Google search engine is now in Maithili.

Another success for Videha — the Google search engine is now in Maithili. Earlier Google had treated it as the Bihari language; following Videha's objections, however, Google accepted that the Maithili language should have a separate search engine. Wikipedia, the author writes, had already accepted this following Videha's objections. The link is https://www.google.com/webhp? hl=bh. [Google had launched a search engine under the name "Bihari," although there is no distinct language by that name. Someone had translated "Bihari" as Angika, and the search engine consequently appeared under Angika. Then Vinit Utpal of Videha wrote the letter reproduced above. Volunteers from Videha undertook almost the entire translation, and appeals were also made to others, but contributions from outside were zero. The few contributions that did arrive in Roman letters were corrected. Google is now displaying the search engine in Maithili, although much work still remains.]

See the discussion at a Videha seminar on this subject:
http://esamaad.blogspot.in/2012/01/blog-post_08.html

But this is only the beginning.

After the translation is complete, Maithili will appear here:

http://www.google.com/language_tools? hl=bh

http://www.google.com/language_tools

VINIT UTPAL'S LETTER

Google launched a search engine under the name "Bihari," although there is no separate language called Bihari. Someone translated the name "Bihari" as Angika; consequently the search engine appeared as Google Angika. Vinit Utpal of Videha then wrote the letter mentioned above. Nearly all the translation was carried out voluntarily by Videha; appeals were also made to others, but outside contributions remained zero. A few people who did contribute used Roman script, and their contributions were corrected. The search engine is now displayed in Maithili, but much work remains to be done.

Vikas Thakore commented on your photograph.

Vikas wrote: "https://www.google.com/webhp? hl=bh"

Sir, Google Maithili has existed at this link since 2004 ...

So what is the point of this sudden ... celebration (or whatever)?

Gajendra Thakur: Read the article about the Translate option — http://esamaad.blogspot.in/2012/01/blog-post_08.html

Vikas Thakore commented on your photograph.

Vikas wrote: "Yes ... thank you."

"I apologise for troubling you unnecessarily."

After translation is completed, Maithili will appear here: http://www.google.com/language_tools? hl=bh

After translation is completed, Maithili will appear here. Previously "Bihari" appeared here; clicking it brought up Maithili.

http://www.google.com/language_tools

Update: 28 March 2012.]

[Notice: Anshuman Pandey's applications to encode Kaithi and Mithilakshara in the Universal Character Set (Unicode) were accepted. The process of creating base fonts for both scripts consequently moved forward. The base font for Mithilakshara was named "Tirhuta," as "Mangal" is used for Devanagari and "Vrinda" for Bengali. The third revised application for Mithilakshara gave a detailed account of Videha's contribution: "Figure 11: Excerpt from a Maithili e-journal published as PDF (from Videha 2011: 22;

Videha: A fortnightly Maithili e-journal. Issue 80 (April 15, 2011), Gajendra Thakur [ed]. http://www.videha.co.in/." Anshuman Pandey's acknowledgement states that Gajendra Thakur of New Delhi met him, corresponded extensively with him about Maithili, provided valuable specimens of Maithili manuscripts, printed books and other records, and gave feedback concerning the need to encode Maithili in the UCS.]

Notice 2. Google Maithili: Google Language Tools

Notice 3. Maithili Wikipedia

http: //translatewiki. net/wiki/Project: Translator

http: //incubator. wikimedia. org/wiki/Wp/mai

TIRHUTA UNICODE

See Anshuman Pandey's final Unicode Mithilakshara application, dated 5 May 2011, at http://std.dkuug.dk/JTC1/SC2/WG2/docs/n4035.pdf. On page 23, the Tirhuta edition of Videha's eightieth issue is included as "Figure 11: Excerpt from a Maithili e-journal published as PDF (from Videha 2011: 22)." The references on page 12 include Videha: A fortnightly Maithili e-journal, Issue 80 (15 April 2011), Gajendra Thakur [ed.], http://www.videha.co.in/. On the same page appears an acknowledgement of the Videha editor's contribution:

"Gajendra Thakur of New Delhi graciously met with me and corresponded at length about Maithili; he supplied valuable specimens of Maithili manuscripts, printed books and other records, and provided feedback on the need to encode Maithili in the UCS."

Distribution of a leaflet about Unicode at the Sahitya Akademi story symposium (Gajendra Thakur; update of 31 March 2012)

Dr Ramanand Jha Raman distributed a leaflet on Unicode at a Sahitya Akademi story symposium. To me it demonstrated only that its author had no understanding of Unicode and lacked even the elementary knowledge required for the creation of either Western or Unicode fonts. The leaflet nevertheless has value for anyone wishing to learn how a prejudiced, partisan history of Maithili literature is written. Earlier, the Chetana Samiti had discussed its supposed contribution to Unicode in its souvenir! When Anshuman Pandey, who applied for Tirhuta Unicode encoding, travelled to Patna, I had told him that Shiv Kumar Thakur had a bookshop at Vidyapati Bhavan, where he could buy Maithili books. For two or three days, however, both the shop and the committee were closed, so he had to return. Later, someone there told him that he kept coming every day, but that the committee would remain closed for at least another fourteen or fifteen days because two groups had quarrelled. This was his experience, and yet the committee's souvenir recounts the contribution it allegedly made to Unicode! When he asked for Govind Jha's address, a certain "scholar" (!) dismissed the matter, saying, in effect, "What would he be able to tell you?", and refused to provide the address. It was finally obtained from elsewhere.

3

[https://esamaad.blogspot.com/2012/01/blog-post_08.html?fbclid=IwAR20AS6in4rK00uC1CK1sX2dM7ivqI_CuF8KFNAbIN7NH12-pTuPKlkdMsE] Samadiya, 8 January 2012

Google Translator Toolkit now provides for Maithili as both a source and a target language. See http://support.google.com/translate/toolkit/bin/answer.py?hl=en&answer=147837

And: http:// translate.google.com/toolkit/list? hl=en#translations/active

After Videha's objections, Google accepted, according to the author, that there is no language named "Bihari." "Maithili Wikipedia" had already been established by Videha, and Wikipedia had previously accepted the same point concerning "Bihari."

Google Maithili: Google Language Tools

http: //www.google.com/transconsole/giyl/chooseActivity?project=gws&langcode=bh

Keep checking http://www.google.co.in/language_tools? hl=en for Maithili's availability.

[Update: Another success for Videha — the Google search engine is now in Maithili.
Another success for Videha — the Google search engine is now in Maithili. Google had earlier regarded it as the Bihari language, but after Videha objected, Google agreed that Maithili should have its own search engine. Wikipedia had already accepted this after Videha's objection. Here is the link: https://www.google.com/webhp? hl=bh. [Google had started a search engine named "Bihari," though no language by that name exists as a separate language. Someone translated "Bihari" as Angika, and the search engine appeared in Angika. Vinit Utpal of Videha then wrote the letter mentioned above. Videha volunteers did almost all the translation, and others were invited to participate, but contributions from outside were zero. The few who did contribute wrote in Roman script, which had to be corrected. Google is now displaying the search engine in Maithili, but much work still remains.]

See the Videha seminar discussion at http://esamaad.blogspot.in/2012/01/blog-post_08.html.
But this is only a beginning.
After the translation is complete, Maithili will appear here:

http://www.google.com/language_tools? hl=bh

http://www.google.com/language_tools

VINIT UTPAL'S LETTER

Google launched a search engine under the name "Bihari," although there is no separate language named Bihari. Someone translated "Bihari" as Angika and the search engine consequently appeared in Angika. Vinit Utpal of Videha then wrote the above-mentioned letter. Almost all the translation was done voluntarily by Videha, and appeals were made to others, but outside contributions remained zero. The few contributions received in Roman letters were corrected. Google is now presenting the search engine in Maithili, but much work remains.

Vikas Thakore commented on your photograph.
Vikas wrote: "https://www.google.com/webhp? hl=bh
Sir, Google Maithili has existed at this link since 2004 ...
Then why this sudden ... celebration (or whatever)?"
Gajendra Thakur: Read the article about the Translate option:
http://esamaad.blogspot.in/2012/01/blog-post_08.html
Vikas Thakore commented on your photograph.
Vikas wrote: "Yes ... thank you.
I apologise for troubling you unnecessarily."

http://www.google.com/language_tools

Update: 28 March 2012.]

[Notice 1. Anshuman Pandey's application to encode both Kaithi and Mithilakshara in the Universal Character Set (Unicode) has been approved. The process of preparing Unicode fonts for both scripts has entered the queue; when their turn comes, work on their base fonts will begin. The base font for Mithilakshara will be named Tirhuta (just as the base font for Devanagari is Mangal and that for Bengali is Vrinda). The proposal for the Mithilakshara font was revised a third time. The second and third submissions discussed Videha's contribution in detail, for example: "Figure 11: Excerpt from a Maithili e-journal published as PDF (from Videha 2011: 22; Videha: A fortnightly Maithili e-journal. Issue 80 (April 15, 2011), Gajendra Thakur [ed]. http://www.videha.co.in/." Anshuman Pandey also wrote: "Gajendra Thakur of New Delhi graciously met with me and corresponded at length about Maithili, offered valuable specimens of Maithili manuscripts, printed books, and other records, and provided feedback regarding requirements for the encoding of Maithili in the UCS."

Notice 2. Google Maithili: Google Language Tools —
http://www.google.com/transconsole/giyl/chooseProject
Contribute to Google Translate. When changing an edit, write in English, as the reason, that there is no language called "Bihari." Translate at this link after logging in through a Google account.
http://www.google.com/transconsole/giyl/chooseActivity?project=gws&langcode=bh
To check whether Maithili is available, keep visiting http://www.google.co.in/language_tools? hl=en.

Notice 3. Maithili Wikipedia —
Videha members have already translated 2,600 MediaWiki messages from English into Maithili. Now use http://translatewiki.net/wiki/Special: Translate? task=untranslated&group=core-mostused&limit=2000&language=mai, go to Group, and select untranslated messages from the dropdown menu. If you are not a Wikipedia translator, request permission to translate into Maithili at http://translatewiki.net/wiki/Project: Translator. First log in at the top right (or create an account), select Maithili in Preferences, click the link to your user account, and create your user page. After some time you should receive permission; then begin translating.
http://translatewiki.net/wiki/Project: Translator
http://meta.wikimedia.org/wiki/Requests_for_new_languages/Wikipedia_Maithili
http://translatewiki.net/wiki/Special: Translate?
task=untranslated&group=core-mostused&limit=2000&language=mai
http://incubator.wikimedia.org/wiki/Wp/mai
http://translatewiki.net/wiki/MediaWiki: Mainpage/mai

In Videha's third issue (1 February 2008), I had reported: "Wikipedia had articles about Maithili but no articles in Maithili, since a Maithili Wikipedia had not yet been approved. I had long been engaged in this effort, and am glad to announce that on 27 January 2008 permission was granted to begin a wiki for the Maithili language. Final approval, however, will come only if at least five people from different places regularly work as its editors." More than three years have now passed. All the preliminary requirements for Maithili Wikipedia have been fulfilled, and Wikipedia's Language Committee has understood that Maithili is not a language merely to be labelled "Bihari," and that it needs a separate Wikipedia.

Gerard M. of Wikipedia writes (http://ultimategerardm.blogspot.com/2011/05/bihari-wikipedia-is-actually-written-in.html):
"This information about Maithili and its relation to the Bihari languages was provided by Umesh Mandal. Umesh has been working on the Maithili localisation project on Wikipedia. ... The Language Committee was trying to ascertain whether Maithili could be placed within the Bihari language group. ... But Umesh's reply now makes it clear that the answer is 'no'."

Ramvilas Sharma wrote an article, "Maithili aur Hindi," in the Hindi monthly Patal, edited by Ramdayal Pandey, attempting to present Maithili as a dialect of Hindi. Yatri Ji opposed this in his own Hindi article at the age of forty-three (Aryavarta, 14/21 February 1954). Rajmohan Jha's Maithili translation appeared in the second issue of Arambh. Umesh Mandal's successful intervention has an additional distinction: he is only thirty. At a time when Maithils are employed in computer science from Hyderabad and Bangalore to Seattle, what does it indicate that this objection and correction came not from them, but from a young devotee of Maithili in a remote part of Mithila?

Umesh Mandal has also undertaken fieldwork to digitise, in audio and video, songs sung by members of every caste and religious community in Mithila. These recordings are available in the Videha archive.

TIRHUTA UNICODE
See Anshuman Pandey's final Unicode Mithilakshara application (5 May 2011): http://std.dkuug.dk/JTC1/SC2/WG2/docs/n4035.pdf. Page 23 includes an excerpt from the Tirhuta edition of Videha's eightieth issue as "Figure 11: Excerpt from a Maithili e-journal published as PDF (from Videha 2011: 22)." The references on page 12 include Videha: A fortnightly Maithili e-journal, Issue 80 (15 April 2011), Gajendra Thakur [ed.], http://www.videha.co.in/. On page 12 the editor's contribution is also acknowledged: "Gajendra Thakur of New Delhi graciously met with me and corresponded at length about Maithili, offered valuable specimens of Maithili manuscripts, printed books, and other records, and provided feedback regarding requirements for the encoding of Maithili in the UCS."]

Distribution of a leaflet on Unicode at a Sahitya Akademi story symposium (Gajendra Thakur; update of 31 March 2012)

Twitter in Maithili: Please visit http://translate.twttr.com/welcome, go to the bottom of the page, choose "Don't see your language? ... feedback," and submit a request for Maithili. Explain why Twitter is needed in Maithili, then send the feedback. Broad participation is requested.

Part Four

After Maithili on "Wikipedia," Maithili is now also on "Google Translate" ... the next goal is "Amazon Alexa"

Google Translate
Google Translate link: https://translate.google.com/?sl=en&tl=mai&op=translate Contribute to strengthening Maithili in Google Translate: https://translate.google.com/about/contribute/Earlier materials:
Wikipedia — 1 February 2008: https://books.google.co.in/books?id=VC-BD5Ad6z4C&lpg=PA1&pg=PA1#v=onepage&q&f=false (Maithili in Devanagari); https://books.google.co.in/books?id=cTezCU59bJwC&lpg=PP1&pg=PP1#v=onepage&q&f=false (Maithili in Tirhuta); https://books.google.co.in/books?id=3zKudz6wAO8C&lpg=PP1&pg=PP1#v=onepage&q&f=false (Maithili in Braille).
Google Translate — link dated 23 June 2011: https://www.facebook.com/groups/videha/permalink/138489416229195/
Videha members applied for a separate Maithili translation tool in Google Translation Tool, instead of the designation "Bihari." Contributors were urged to sign in with Google accounts and to explain in English, when giving reasons for edits, that "Bihari" is not a separate language. Earlier working links: http://www.google.com/transconsole/giyl/chooseProject and http://www.google.com/transconsole/giyl/chooseActivity?project=gws&langcode=bh (now closed).

Maithili Wikipedia links: Videha (journal): https://mai.wikipedia.org/s/kgv; Maithili Language in the World of the Internet: https://mai.wikipedia.org/s/s6h; Bhalsari Tree: https://mai.wikipedia.org/s/ipm; Videha: https://mai.wikipedia.org/s/ie1; Videha Facebook Edition: https://mai.wikipedia.org/s/iu1; Videha Honour: https://mai.wikipedia.org/s/jc2; Videha Archive: https://mai.wikipedia.org/s/jc0; Videha Mithila Ratna: https://mai.wikipedia.org/s/jc3; Videha's Search for Mithila: https://mai.wikipedia.org/s/jc4; Videha Information–Contact–Research: https://mai.wikipedia.org/s/jc5; Shruti Prakashan: https://mai.wikipedia.org/s/iu7; Anchinhar Akhar: https://mai.wikipedia.org/s/ion; Maithili Ghazal: https://mai.wikipedia.org/s/idz; Maithili Children's Ghazal: https://mai.wikipedia.org/s/iex; Maithili Devotional Ghazal: https://mai.wikipedia.org/s/ifi; other contribution links:

http://translatewiki.net/wiki/Project: Translator;
http://meta.wikimedia.org/wiki/Requests_for_new_languages/Wikipedia_Maithili; http://translatewiki.net/wiki/Special: Translate?task=untranslated&group=core-mostused&limit=2000&language=mai

http: //incubator. wikimedia. org/wiki/Wp/mai

The final five websites belong to the Maithili Wiki project. Visit these links and help advance the project. (Links closed.)

Amazon Alexa in Maithili (coming soon ...)

The good news concerning Maithili Wikipedia that was communicated to readers in Videha's third issue (1 February 2008) had yielded a happy outcome a few years earlier.

The favourable result of the initiative concerning Maithili on Google Translate, announced on Videha's Facebook page in 2011, came on 11 May 2022.

Maithili on Amazon Alexa, too, will begin soon.

(Links and screenshots are provided below.)

https://books.google.co.in/books? id=VC-BD5Ad6z4C&lpg=PA1&pg=PA2#v=onepage&q&f=false https://www.facebook.com/groups/videha/permalink/1384894162291 95/

9:25

Videha 'विदेह' प्रथम मैथिली पाक्षिक ई पत्रिका १ फरबरी २००८ (वर्ष 1 मास 2 अंक 3)

विदेह साप्ताहिक पत्रिका Videha Maithili Fortnightly e Magazine विदेह विदेह

Videha विदेह http://www.videha.co.in/ [redacted] सम्पादक/प्रकाशक

विकीपीडिया पर मैथिली पर लेख तँ छल मुदा मैथिलीमे लेख नहि छल,कारण मैथिलीक विकीपीडियाक स्वीकृति नहि भेटल छल। हम बहुत दिनसँ एहिमे लागल रही,आ' सूचि करैत हर्षित छी जे 27.01.2008 कँ भाषाकेँ विकी शुरू करबाक हेतु स्वीकृति भेटल छैक, मुदा एहि हेतु कमसँ कम पाँच गोटे,विभिन्न जगहसँ एकर एडिटरक रूपमे नियमित रूपेँ कार्य करथि तखने योजनाकेँ पूर्ण स्वीकृति भेटतैक। नीचाँ लिखल लिंक पर जाय एडिट कय एहि प्रोजेक्टमे अहाँ सभ सहयोग करब, से आशा अछि। पहिला अंकमे देवनागरी कोना लिखू ,एहि पर हम लेख लिखने रही। इंगलिश कीबोर्ड पर ओहि तरहेँ लिखने विकीमे सेहो मैथिली लिखि सकैत छी। एम. गेराडक माध्यमसँ श्री अंशुमन पाण्डेयक, जिनकर मैथिलीक युनीकोडमे स्थानक आवेदन लंबित अछि, अनुरोध भेटल छल, ओ' सूचना मँगबानिह जाहि सँ स्पष्ट रूपसँ बंगला लिपि आ' मैथिली लिपिक मध्य अंतर ज्ञात भय सकय।ई सूचना हम एम. गेराडक माध्यमसँ हुनका पठा देलियनि, कारण पाण्डेयजी ईमेल एड्रेस हमरा नहि अछि। विकीमे पूर्ण स्वीकृतिक हेतु एहि लिंक सभ पर राखल प्रोजेक्टकेँ आँगा बढ़ाऊ।

http://meta.wikimedia.org/wiki/Requests_for_new_languages/Wikipedia_Maithili

http://incubator.wikimedia.org/wiki/Wp/mai

http://translatewiki.net/wiki/MediaWiki:Mainpage/mai

http://translatewiki.net/wiki/Special:Translate?task=untranslated&group=core-mostused&limit=2000&language=mai

अपनेक प्रतिक्रिया आ' रचनाक प्रतीक्षा अछि।

नई दिल्ली धीरेन्द्र

01.02.2008

© सर्वाधिकार लेखकाधीन आ' उचित लेखकक नाम नहि अछि उचित संपादकाधीन।

विदेह (पाक्षिक) संपादक-चन्देश्वर ठाकुर। एतय प्रकाशित रचना सभक कॉपीराइट लेखक लोकनिक लगमे रहलनि, मात्र एकर प्रथम प्रकाशनक अधिकार एहि ई-पत्रिकाकेँ छैक। रचनाकार अपन मौलिक आ, अप्रकाशित रचना सभ(जकर मौलिकताक संपूर्ण उत्तरदायित्व लेखकमात्रक गछ छनि) ggajendra@yahoo.co.in वाकिं ggajendra@videha.co.in कँ मेल अटैचमेण्टक रूपमे .doc,.docx, .txt किंवा .pdf फॉर्मेटमे पठाय सकैत छथिरचनाक संग रचनाकार अपन संक्षिप्त परिचय(बायोडाटा) आ' अपन स्कैन कएल मेल फोटो पठेबाहु, से आशा करैत छी। रचनाक संग ई घोषणा रहब-जे ई रचना मौलिक अछि आ' पहिल प्रकाशनक हेतु विदेह(पाक्षिक)-ई-पत्रिकाकेँ देल जा रहल अछि। मेल प्राप्त होयबाक बाद यथासंभव शीघ्रातिशीघ्र (सात दिनमे) एकर प्रकाशनक अंकक सूचना देल जायत।

2

Digitized by Google

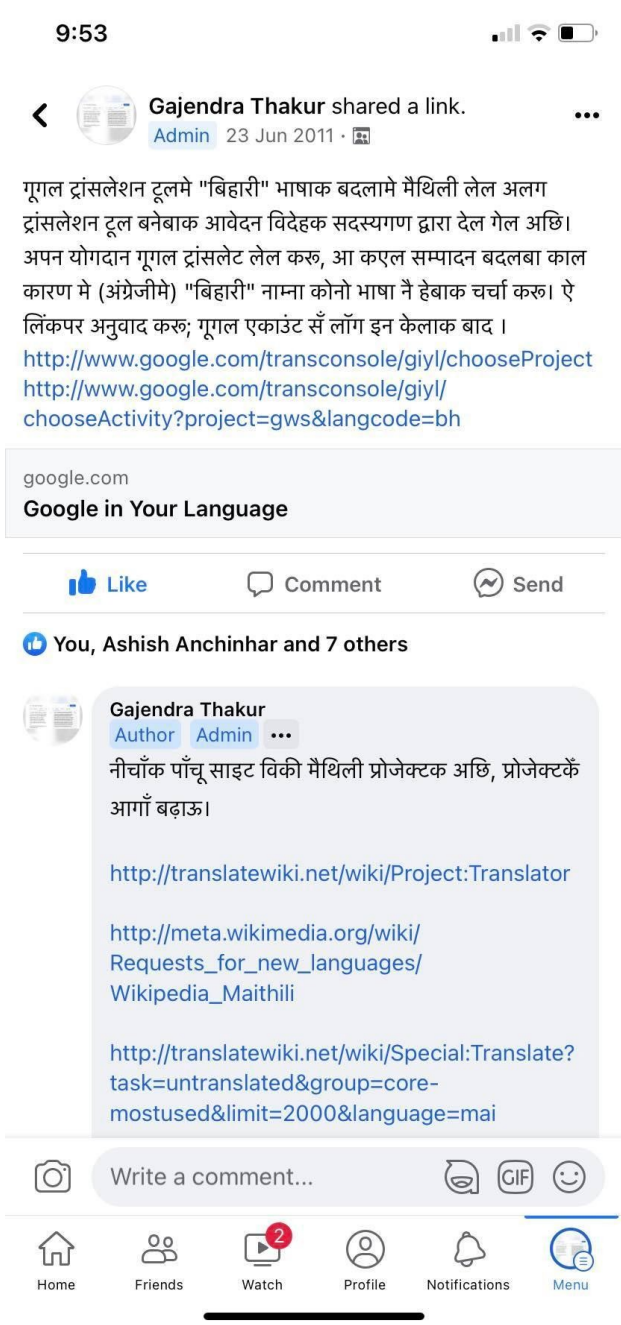
Videha 'विदेह' प्रथम मैथिली पाक्षिक ई पत्रिका १ फरबरी २००८ (वर्ष 1 मास 2 अंक 3)

विदेह साप्ताहिक पत्रिका Videha Maithili Fortnightly e Magazine विदेह विदेह

Videha विदेह http://www.videha.co.in/ [redacted] सम्पादक/प्रकाशक

1. शोध लेख.

books.googleusercontent.com



9:53
Gajendra Thakur shared a link.
Admin 23 Jun 2011 ·
गूगल ट्रांसलेशन टूलमे "बिहारी" भाषाक बदलामे मैथिली लेल अलग ट्रांसलेशन टूल बनेबाक आवेदन विदेहक सदस्यगण द्वारा देल गेल अछि। अपन योगदान गूगल ट्रांसलेट लेल करू, आ कएल सम्पादन बदलबा काल कारण मे (अंग्रेजीमे) "बिहारी" नाम्ना कोनो भाषा नै हेबाक चर्चा करू। ऐ लिंकपर अनुवाद करू; गूगल एकाउंट सँ लॉग इन केलाक बाद ।
http://www.google.com/transconsole/giyl/chooseProject
http://www.google.com/transconsole/giyl/chooseActivity?project=gws&langcode=bh google.com
Google in Your Language
Like
Comment
Send
You, Ashish Anchinhar and 7 others
Gajendra Thakur
Author Admin
नीचाँक पाँचू साइट विकी मैथिली प्रोजेक्टक अछि, प्रोजेक्टकेँ आगाँ बढ़ाऊ।
http://translatewiki.net/wiki/Project:Translator
http://meta.wikimedia.org/wiki/Requests_for_new_languages/Wikipedia_Maithili
http://translatewiki.net/wiki/Special:Translate?task=untranslated&group=core-mostused&limit=2000&language=mai
Write a comment...
GIF
Home
Friends
Watch
Profile
Notifications
Menu

At that time the Videha editorial board comprised the following members. Associate Editor: Umesh Mandal. Assistant Editors: Shiv Kumar Jha and Munnaji (Manoj Kumar Karna). Language Editing: Nagendra Kumar Jha and genealogist Vidyanand Jha. Art Editing: Vanita Kumari and Rashmi Rekha Sinha. Research and Investigation Editors: Dr Jaya Verma and Dr Rajiv Kumar Verma. Drama, Theatre and Cinema Editor: Bechan Thakur. Information, Liaison and News Editors: Poonam Mandal and Priyanka Jha. Translation Department Editor: Vinit Utpal. It is clear that Vinit Utpal, the Translation Department Editor (now Assistant Professor at IIMC Jammu), made a particularly important contribution. Ashish Anchinhar, although not formally on the editorial board, did no less work than any editor. Maithili's readers also contributed according to their abilities.

https://books.google.co.in/books?id=zmIugpjpOKYC&lpg=PA1&pg=PA600#v=onepage&q&f=false https://books.google.co.in/books? id=-U04e5FfnTEC&lpg=PA1&pg=PA405#v=onepage&q&f=false

Google Translate needs to be strengthened further. Accordingly, we are taking forward the next task:
https://translate.google.com/about/contribute/

Watch the Google Translate programme.

https://youtu.be/nP-nMZpLM1A
Google Translate: from 04:45 to 06:25; at 06:00, twenty-four new languages.

For a detailed account, watch this keynote to learn how the aim of organising the world's information and making it universally accessible and useful is being pursued. Version with American Sign Language (ASL) interpretation: https://youtu.be/PeUXBvRExic. Timeline — 0:00 opening film; 1:47 introduction, Sundar Pichai; 6:21 knowledge; 15:45 knowledge and search; 27:15 Skin Tone Equity; 32:00 computing; 33:08 Assistant; 43:34 computing — AI Test Kitchen; 53:08 safety with Google; 1:04:38 safer search; 1:11:20 Android begins; 1:25:32 Android — Better Together; 1:45:45 Wear OS and Tablet; 1:31:22 hardware begins; 1:33:22 Pixel Phone and Buds; 1:45:44 Ambient and Beyond the Phone; 1:54:32 Augmented Reality and conclusion.

SECTION B — ESSAYS

28. Before Writing a Literary Work...

Abstract

A composition arranged in metre is called verse; otherwise it is prose. Chhand, or metre, signifies a composition that affords delight. This does not mean, however, that contemporary new poetry must be classified as prose. Even the Vedic Sāvitrī-Gāyatrī mantra is counted as Gāyatrī metre under flexible or liberal rules. This will be discussed below: for example, when the required syllables are not present, one or two syllables may be supplied in each pāda, or metrical quarter.

Keywords: composition · before writing · critical theory · Maithili

Literature has two forms, prose and verse. A composition arranged in metre is verse; otherwise it is prose. Chhand means a composition that gives delight. One should not infer from this that the new poetry of our time belongs to prose, for the Vedic Sāvitrī-Gāyatrī mantra itself is reckoned as Gāyatrī metre under flexible or liberal rules. This will be discussed later: if the required syllables are incomplete, one or two are added to each pāda. Conjuncts containing ya and va are separated by inserting i and u respectively, as in the following examples:

वरेण्यम् = वरेणियम्

स्वः = सुवः.

For modern poetry, as well as for haiku, kṣaṇikā and haikū, Maithili and the Indian writing systems derived from Sanskrit are particularly suitable. Apart from Tamil, the scripts of southern India and the north-western and eastern regions, including Devanagari, have corresponding vowel and consonant arrangements—the ka, ca, ṭa, ta and pa groups—in which what is written is pronounced. Short i in Devanagari, however, is an exception: its sign is written before the consonant, though pronounced after it. In Maithili, we may conclude, even this exception does not apply. Thus अछि is pronounced with the short a and i in relation to ch, or as a-i-ch; similarly, राति is read rā-i-ta. The conclusion, therefore, is that Maithili is an especially suitable language for haiku. Consider another example. Sandhi is characteristic of Sanskrit, but is English devoid of sandhi? What, then, is the spoken sequence “I'm going towards the end”? It is written “I am going towards the end.” Pāṇini formulated sandhi rules on the basis of phonetics. In written English, those rules are not followed as they are in Sanskrit, although “I am” becomes “I'm” phonetically and such joining occurs in speech. In Maithili too, case particles are, wherever possible, written and pronounced attached to the word.

Metres are of two kinds: mātrā-based metres and syllabic, or varṇa-based, metres.

The Vedas employ syllabic metres, not mātrā-based metres.

In a varṇic metre only the number of varṇas, or syllabic units, is counted. A consonant marked with the halant is not counted separately. A syllable bearing e, u or another vowel sign is counted as one, as is a conjunct consonant. Each character from अ to ह् likewise receives a count of one; no varṇa or syllabic unit has a value greater than one. Keep three general principles in mind:

1. A halant-marked consonant: 0.

2. A conjunct character: 1.

3. Each character from अ through ह: 1.

Now consider the first example:

ई अरदराक मेघ नहि मानत रहत बरसि के = 1 + 5 + 2 + 2 + 3 + 3 + 1 = 17.

Now consider a second example:

पश्चात् = 2.

Now consider a third example:

आब = 2.

Now consider a fourth example:

स्क्रिप्ट = 2.

There are seven principal Vedic metres:

Gāyatrī, Uṣṇik, Anuṣṭubh, Bṛhatī, Paṅkti, Triṣṭubh and Jagatī. The remaining forms are their variations, including atichhand and vichhand. Here metres are identified by syllables. If the syllable count is deficient, one or two syllables may be added to each pāda. Conjuncts containing ya and va are separated by the addition of i and u respectively, as follows:

वरेण्यम् = वरेणियम्.

स्वः = सुवः.

The syllable count may also be completed by separating the products of guṇa and vṛddhi.

ए = अ + इ.

ओ = अ + उ.

ऐ = अ/आ + ए.

औ = अ/आ + ओ.

We should now become acquainted with the concepts of guru and laghu as employed in the science of prosody, or Chhandaḥśāstra.

Among the thirteen vowels, अ, इ, उ, ऋ and ऌ are identified as the five short vowels, while आ, ई, ऊ, ॠ, ए, ऐ, ओ and औ are listed as the eight long vowels.

When these vowels are joined to consonants they produce modified consonantal syllables, termed guṇitākṣara.

क् + अ = क.

क् + आ = का.

A vowel unit or one such modified consonantal unit is called an akṣara, or syllable. A bare consonant is not itself treated as a syllable. Thus अवाक् contains two syllables, अ and वा.

1. All short vowels, and consonantal syllables bearing short vowels, are laghu (light). They are indicated by U written above the unit.

2. All long vowels, and consonantal syllables bearing long vowels, are guru (heavy). They are indicated by a short horizontal stroke above the unit.

3. Every syllable containing anusvāra or visarga is considered guru.

4. A syllable followed by a conjunct consonant or a bare consonant is regarded as guru. For example, in अच् and सत्य, the अ and स respectively are heavy.

5. Just as varṇic metres were used in the Vedas, the study of vocal accent had also developed in that period. In broad outline the accents are classified as: (1) udātta, (2) udāttatara, (3) anudātta, (4) anudāttatara, (5) svarita, (6) anudāttānurakta-svarita and (7) pracaya. The last is described as a form of śruti or unstruck sound (anāhata nāda), arising without the collision of objects, whereas the others are struck sounds (āhata nāda), produced by contact.

1. Udātta: vowels such as a pronounced in the upper part of the throat or other articulatory positions; no mark is assigned. 2. Udāttatara: pronounced still higher in the throat and associated positions. 3. Anudātta: pronounced in the lower region of those positions, with an oblique sign beneath. 4. Anudāttatara: pronounced from an exceptionally low position. 5. Svarita: an accent combining an anudātta portion with an udātta portion, represented by a vertical stroke above. 6. Anudāttānurakta-svarita: a form in which udātta, svarita or both follow; it has three varieties. 7. Pracaya: where an anudātta follows a svarita, there arises a sustained, unstruck resonance, or pracaya.

1. The Pūrvārcika contains, in sequence, chants addressed to Agni, Indra and Soma Pavamāna. There follow the Āraṇyaka Kāṇḍa and the Mahānāmnī Ārcika. The Āgneya, Aindra and Pāvamāna sections are also called Grāmageya-gāna, while the remaining part of the Pūrvārcika is called Āraṇyaka-gāna. Collectively these constitute Prakṛti-gāna. 2. The Uttarārcika is also called Vikṛti or Uttara-gāna. Mantras selected from Grāmageya-gāna and Āraṇyaka-gāna become, respectively, Ūha-gāna and Ūhya-gāna. Each collection is further divided into Daśarātra, Saṃvatsara, Ekāha, Ahīna, Prāyaścitta and Kṣudra sections. Melodies remembered from the Pūrvārcika are applied in the Uttarārcika to groupings of two, three or four mantras (dvika, trika and catuṣṭaka). In most such groupings the first mantra comes from the Pūrvārcika, and its melody serves for the entire hymn or grouped sequence.

The Uttarārcika, Ūha-gāna and Ūhya-gāna render each melody three times and in three ways. In Vedic ritual the prastāva is sung by the prastotṛ; the udgītha by the udgātṛ; the pratihāra by the pratihartṛ; the upadrava again by the udgātṛ; and the nidhana jointly by all three. Before the prastāva, the three chant the hiṃkāra—hiṃ, huṃ, haṃ—and the udgātṛ chants Oṃ before the udgītha. These are the five bhaktis, or divisions.

Hand gestures: 1.1. The thumb (first digit) held a distance of one barley-grain away. 2.2. The thumb touching the first finger. 3.3. The thumb touching the middle finger. 4.4. The thumb touching the fourth finger. 5.5. The thumb touching the fifth finger. 6.11. The sixth, kruṣṭa: the thumb two barley-grains from the first finger. 7.6. The seventh, atisvara, of the Sāmaveda. 8.7. Abhigīta of the Ṛgveda.

Grāmageya singing was performed in villages and public places. Āraṇyaka-gāna was performed in forests and sacred places.

Ūha-gāna was used in Soma sacrifices and special religious observances, drawing upon the Grāmageya chants associated with the Pūrvārcika. Ūhya-gāna, or Rahasya-gāna, was sung in forests and sacred places and was associated with the Āraṇyaka chants of the Pūrvārcika. The Nāradiya Śikṣā gives the following figures for Sāma singing: 1. svara, 7; grāma, 3; mūrcchanā, 21; tāna, 49.

The seven notes are sa, re, ga, ma, pa, dha and ni, and the three grāmas are madhya, manda and tīvra. Seven times three yields twenty-one mūrcchanās; combinations of the seven notes yield seven times seven, or forty-nine tānas.

Every Ṛgvedic mantra is treated as equivalent to three mantras on account of Gautama's two Sāma chants (parka) and Kāśyapa's one Sāma chant (parka). Macdonell treats Indrāgnī, Mitrāvaruṇau, Indrāviṣṇū and Agnīṣomau as paired deities. Yet the paired deity is understood in terms of a reversal of qualifying terms.

Vedic recitation:

1. Saṃhitā-pāṭha is recitation in its continuous, unbroken form.

अग्निमीळे पुरोहितं यज्ञस्यदेवमृत्विजम। होतारंरत्न धातमम्।

2. Pada-pāṭha: each word is read separately.

3. Krama-pāṭha: the first word is read with the second, then the second with the third, the third with the fourth, and so on.

4. Jaṭā-pāṭha: if the three words are a, b and c, the sequence is ab, ba, ab, bc, cb, bc. 5. Ghana-pāṭha: according to the example supplied here, the sequence is ab, ba, abc, cba, abc. 6. Mālā; 7. Śikhā; 8. Rekhā; 9. Dhvaja; 10. Daṇḍa; 11. Ratha. The last eight methods are known collectively as the aṣṭavikṛtis.

There are also six transformations of Sāma singing, permitting shortening or lengthening in the interests of melody. 1. Vikāra: changing agne to ognāya. 2. Viśleṣaṇa: separating a word or constituent. 3. Vikarṣaṇa: drawing out a note or pronouncing it for a greater number of beats. 4. Abhyāsa: repetition. 5. Virāma: breaking a word by introducing a pause (yati) within it. 6. Stobha: adding an expression suitable for melodic elaboration. The Kauthuma branch adds "hāu" and "rāi," whereas the Rāṇāyanīya branch adds "hāvu" and "rāyi."

The Vedas employ varṇic metres rather than mātrā-based metres, counting by pāda or metrical quarter. Gāyatrī is the principal and most frequently used metre, followed by Triṣṭubh and Jagatī.

1. Gāyatrī: three pādas of eight syllables each, with a pause after the second pāda; alternatively, six syllables in a pāda.

2. Triṣṭubh: four pādas of eleven syllables each.

3. Jagatī: four pādas of twelve syllables each.

4. Uṣṇik: two pādas of eight syllables followed by one of twelve.

5. Anuṣṭubh: four pādas of eight syllables each; it is used more frequently in Sanskrit literature than in the Vedas.

6. Bṛhatī: two pādas of eight, followed by two pādas of twelve and eight units respectively.

7. Paṅkti: five pādas of eight syllables each, with a pause after the first two.

If the syllable count is incomplete, one or two syllables can be added or subtracted in the following ways:

(a) वरेण्यम् becomes वरेणियम्; स्वः becomes सुवः.

(b) Guṇa and vṛddhi sandhi may be resolved into their components.

ए = अ + इ.

ओ = अ + उ.

ऐ = अ/आ + ए.

औ = अ/आ + ओ.

If this still does not complete the count, the resulting forms receive other designations, such as Virāṭ.

For example, within the Gāyatrī group (24 syllables): Virāṭ (22), Nicṛt (23), Śuddhā (24), Bhurik (25) and Svarāṭ (26).

ॐ भूर्भुवस्वः। तत् सवितुर्वरेण्यं। भर्गो देवस्य धीमहि। धियो यो नः प्रचोदयात्।

The Vedic seers call themselves poets, and they also call the deities poets. The entire corpus of Vedic literature is a verbal embodiment of this poetic consciousness. There spiritual awareness rises to the plane of the divine and is given expression in the language of material existence.

We now turn to the vocabularies of Jyotirishwar, Vidyapati, Chatur Chaturbhuj and Badrinath Jha, with the aim of improving the reader's skill in writing.

1. The Vocabulary of Kaviśekhara Jyotirishwar

गोण्ठि — boatman or fisher-boatman

कबार — vegetable vendor

पटनिआ — boatman

लबाल — a garrulous or loose-tongued person

लौजिह — one whose tongue is eager with desire; greedy

पेटकट — one whose stomach has been cut, or who cuts into another's livelihood

नाकट — a person with a cut-off nose

बएर — jujube fruit

बाबुर — the babul tree

खुसा — dry, withered

चुसा — something to be sucked

फरुही — puffed or parched rice

करहर — the edible rhizome of the water lily

मलैचा — chilli pepper

बोबलि — an edible tuber, also known as ghechuli

बाँसी — a flute

हुलुक — the hudukka, a musical instrument

जोहारि — a greeting or salutation

तोरह — weigh it

बराबह — set it apart, separating it into pieces

खुटी — an ear ornament worn by women on the upper part of the ear

सिङ्कली — a chain

चुलि — a bangle

त्रिका — an ornament worn along the parting of the hair

खञ्जरीट — the khanjan or wagtail bird

साँकर — sugar; also identified as a red cane

बिरनी — a braid or knot of hair

कम्बु — a conch shell

पञ्ज — a lotus

राउत — a military officer

राजशिष्ट — a courtier of the king

पुरपति — the head of a town or city

साधि — a wealthy merchant

गन्धवणिक — a perfume seller dealing in musk and other fragrances

बेलवार — a border guard

राजपुत्र — an official bearing the title rājaputra

द्वारिक — the official who authorises entry into the royal court

पनिहार — a gatekeeper

अगहरा — a person who performs duties on receiving an agrahāra grant

रौतपति/राजपुत्रपति — the chief of the rauts

सन्धिविग्रहिक — a minister responsible for foreign affairs

महामहत्तक — the minister responsible for defence

प्रतिबलकरणाध्यक्ष — the department concerned with spying on enemy forces

स्थानान्तरिक — an officer responsible for arrangements during the king's travels

नैबन्धिक — a writer or recorder of documents

वार्तिक — a collector of secret intelligence; vārtika and mahāvārtika are high titles in the genealogical register

आक्षपटलिक — an official of the gambling house

खड्गग्राह — a sword-bearing guard protecting the king

प्रमत्त्वार — an official charged with restraining mad persons

बिश्वास — the king's trusted personal attendant

अग्रजाणिक — the security party marching ahead of the king on a journey

गूढ पुरुष — a secret agent

प्रणिधि — a secret agent

वार्तिक — a spy

सूपकार — a cook

सूपकारपति — the chief cook

सम्बाहक — an attendant to the cook

बलिष्ठ — a physically powerful bodyguard, or baithā

श्रोत्रिय — a scholar of the Vedas

आध्यायिक — a student or scholar

मौहूर्तिक — an astrologer

आम्नायिक — an adviser on warfare belonging to Vedic or Tantric learning

चूड़ामणि — the art or science of divination

पँचरुखी काँच — a prism, described as five-faced glass

महथ — a high military rank; also mahathā, mehtā or mahto

मुदहथ — the person entrusted with the king's seal

महसाहनि — a supply officer

महसुआर — the chief cook

महल — mahar, a prosperous cattle-keeper, as in Nanda Mahar

सेजवार — the keeper of the royal bed or sleeping arrangements

पनहरि — a bearer of betel

राजवल्लभ — a courtier

भण्डारी — a storehouse or treasury officer

कलबार — a merchant

चोरगाहा — a person who waves the ceremonial yak-tail fan

सुखासन — a comfortable chair

चौपाड़ि — an outer room, veranda or teaching hall

अँचरा — a shoulder cloth or gamchhā

समरहर — body massage

विदान — physical exercise, said to have thirty-six forms

तमारु — a copper water vessel

पनिगह — a vessel for pouring or casting out water

तमकुण्ड — a deep copper vessel

अप्यायक — satisfying or refreshing

फेना — a sweet preparation made with boiled sugar

जेञोनार — a feast

स्वर्गदुर्लभ — betel leaf, called a delight rare even in heaven

दण्डिया — the portion above the staff or pole

भृङ्गार — a golden pitcher

आरहल — began or commenced

किटाएल — became angry

नियोगी — a kind of faqir or mendicant

बुसक — of husk or chaff

धुनि — an open fire or hearth

संकोच — becoming smaller; contraction

अपगत — unnoticed

सम्भार — expansion or spreading

कौशिक — an owl

गोमायु — a jackal

नओबति — a watch or guard party

चतुःसम — a liquid used for plastering an interior surface

माठ — a kind of khājā confection

उनच — a sheet or cloth spread out as bedding

दर्दुर — a frog

झिकरुआ — a cricket or chirping insect

निविल — very dense or thick

काकोल — a black crow

कोल — a pig

शिवा — a female jackal

फेत्कार — barking

प्रसारी — motionless clouds

अखलु — it appears or seems

अखउलि — said earlier

वारिभक्त — cooked rice left overnight in water

सौहित्य — satiety or satisfaction

उपचय — increase or growth

पाण्डुरता — whiteness, as when clouds turn from dark to white in autumn

प्रसन्नता — clearness or purity

सफरी — the poṭhī fish

तरङ्ग — restlessness or movement

शालि — rice plants bowed with grain-filled ears

मरुआ — a flowering shrub of the tulsi type

विशेषकच्छेद — painting designs with musk on the forehead and cheeks

दर्शनविधि — colouring the teeth and lips

वसनविधि — dyeing cloth

वर्णिकाविधि — painting pictures

शेखरयोजन — arranging or tying the hair in a bun

पत्रभङ्ग — applying musk designs or paste to the body

गन्धयुक्ति — preparing scented oils and perfumes

पानककरनी — preparing sherbet

पट्टिकावान — weaving a mat

तर्कुकर्म — craftwork with sīkī grass

आकरज्ञान — knowledge of the earth; geology

अक्षरमुष्टिका — communicating letters and meanings through finger signs

दोहदकरण — inducing a tree to flower during scarcity by artificial treatment

छलितयोग — a particular form of yoga

रसवाद — chemical science or alchemy

दुकूल — fabric used for a veil or head covering

क्षौम — cloth made from flax fibre

कौशेय — tussar silk made from an insect cocoon

कमरूबाल — a person from Kāmarūpa

बङ्गाल — a person from Bengal

गुञ्जर — a Gurjar

कठिबाल — a person from Kathiawar

बरहथी — twelve cubits long

बैङ्गना — of the colour of a brinjal or aubergine

पञ्चहर — a palace divided into five sections

पञ्चसम — a powder of five fragrant substances

प्रदीपकलस — an auspicious lamp placed in a pot and shielded from the wind

षेमा — a temporary encampment of the king and his army

वारिगह — an elephant or horse stable

एकचोइ/दोचोइ — a tent with one or two principal poles

मण्डबा — a wedding pavilion or temporary canopy

कपलघड़ — a house or shelter made of cloth

बरागन — a term explained as bairāgan, with Soma, Ravi and others named as examples

चेष्टसार — a gambling hall

सहिआर — an umpire

खेलबार — the proprietor of a gambling house

दण्डसाह — a witness to a penalty or judicial punishment

कात — a stake in winning or losing; also lustre

उपनय — bringing near

भुजङ्ग — a messenger or gossip who carries tales

घल — a crowd or cluster

अगिरानि — an advance-guard unit

सेनगाह — a commander of the army

रजाएस — a royal order

घोल — a horse

पाएन — a ring or loop for resting the foot

पलानि — tightening a saddled horse's equipment

थलबार — a groom who tends horses in a stable

पाग — a turban or headcloth

सरमोजा — a cap or knitted head covering

गान्ती — a knot or tie

बाग — a whip

साङ्कल — a chain or connecting link

डाम्भ — a tender green coconut

फरेन्द — a segment or slice

कोन्ते — a spear

लउली — a staff or stick

जाठी — a staff or pole of the kind called phaṛāṭhī

कोन्तिआ — a spearman

धमसा — a large kettle-drum

महुअरि — a wind instrument played by blowing

अनायत — helpless or deaf,

षतबार — a guard or sentry

बाइति — the sound of a musical instrument

टाप — the impact or beat of a horse's hoof

मुहरव — a sound made with the mouth

पलानि — tightly fastened

करुअक — did or performed

सर्वांवसर — an open or general royal audience

वेकल्हेण्टे — a waist or lower back

पाट — silken

धलि — a dhariyā or kappā cloth

पाझि — a bird

टोपर — a cap-shaped cover

सइचान — a falcon or hawk

पितशाल — a kind of tree identified as pīrā sāṅkhu

सरल — a fragrant coniferous tree or incense wood called saraṛ

सिम्बलि — the silk-cotton tree

सिंसप — the shisham tree

सहोल — the sal tree

पाउलि — a tree known locally as pāṅḍari

बंझि — barren or sterile

गिरिछ — a bear

गुआ — areca nut or betel nut

नरङ्ग — an orange

नमेरु — a rudrākṣa seed

बउर — the bakul or mālsarī tree

छोलङ्ग — a dried date

जुड़ — cool or refreshing

एला — cardamom

सुखमेला — small cardamom

मधुकर — the medicinal plant śatāvarī

कम्पूर कदली — a fragrant variety of banana, kapūr-kadalī

कपिञ्जल — a partridge

धारागृह — a bathing chamber with fountains or showers

स्थेय — one who does not flee

परम्परीण — handed down through generations

पुरुष — a guard or soldier

कार — black

काबर — mottled or spotted

चलक — a pale or white colour, called charak

गोल — fair or light-coloured

कइल — tawny or light brown

पाण्डर — pale or whitish

शीकरविक्षेप — spraying a fountain or scattering fine droplets

गण्डूष — a mouthful of water used for rinsing

नाकजलबुद्बुद — blowing air through the nose into water to make bubbles

पिण्ड — a stool or small seat

पारी — an enclosure or surrounding hedge

साटि — a peg or post

चुत — a mango

पस्रवण — a spring or source of water

पहाल — a mountain

डोङ्कल — a hill

चुली — a summit or peak

कोइआर — the kovidāra tree

सैम्ब — the silk-cotton tree

सीसमु — the shisham tree

साङ्कु — the sal tree

समि — a tree also known as śani or sainī

सहोल — the sāhoṛ tree

पञोकठ — lotus wood

सभर — the sambar deer, also called aṣṭāpada deer

कुटुम्बिनी — a bird known as khīrī

कठहरिआ — a woodpecker

पेच — an owl

स्रुच — a wooden ladle or ritual spoon

पञ्चामृत — the five nectars: curd, milk, clarified butter, honey and sugar

पञ्चकषाय — a powder of five fragrant substances applied to the body

चषाल — the rounded cap at the top of a sacrificial post

उदूखल — a mortar

चमस — a bowl

संभृति — materials or provisions

सप्तधान्य — seven grains: barley, wheat, sesame, kāun, sām, chīna and nīvāra

आषाढ़दण्ड — a staff made of palāśa wood

तरुत्वच — tree bark used as clothing

वृक्षी — a seat upon which a sage sits

दारुपात्र — a wooden vessel or trough

करण्डक — a basket

बह्आरि — a daughter-in-law

बिदान — a wrestling trick or stance

उभरि — leaping upwards; a wrestling manoeuvre

अवधा — a downward-facing position; a wrestling manoeuvre

विद्यावन्ति — a female dancer

सोताक ककना — a marriage necklace or maṅgalasūtra

सिङ्कली — a chain

शाख — a conch-shell bangle

खुन्ती — an ornament worn on the upper ear

चूलि — a bangle

तृका — an ornament worn in the parting of the hair

दशजुधि — the daśauṃhī, a person who announces to the king the passing of time; now associated with a bard

समहथ — simultaneously striking musical instruments with the hands to produce a unified sound

मण्डल — a circular movement of the hands and feet that carries the performer from one posture to another

अङ्गहार — gracefully placing the limbs in their proper positions

भाल — a stove or hearth called bhūjābālā

ओबारी — a cooking pot

शिवा — a female jackal

भीम — terrifying

उल्कामुख — a variety of jackal said to emit flames from its mouth

जन्ताक — a hand-operated grinding mill

चुञ्ची — a breast

पसार — a shop

पेचा — an owl

षीषील — a small creature called khikhīṛ

नेउर — a mongoose

अपर्यन्त — without limit; boundless

पाट — a silk garment

कापल — cloth

सकलात — a carpet

दुसुखासन — a comfortable bed

लचसूचिका — a bedcover woven on nine needles

परिकर-नायक — the leader of an entourage or group

वर्हि — kuśa grass

समिध — fuel wood for a ritual fire

दृषद — a stone

लाज — popped or parched rice

इष्टाङ्गना — the woman intended to become one's wife

सुरती — originally something from Surat; now a term for chewing tobacco from Surat

जातीफल — nutmeg

सूक्ष्मेला — small cardamom

गुलत्वक — cinnamon bark

पत्रक — bay leaf

पिर्प्पली — long pepper

कटुकी ओ दुलाह — two medicinal herbs, identified as kaṭukī and dulāh/dulār kāṇṭ

मूल्य परिच्छेद — bargaining over or settling the price

निष्क्रय — exchange or barter

कर्षक्रय — buying a gold coin

अङ्कपरिस्थिति — keeping accounts

हरण-भरण — receiving and delivering goods

व्यवच्छेद — making a settlement or deciding a dispute

नष्टकाक — a black crow

सलभ — a moth or flying insect

ग्रहिल — one who clings or is attached

सद्विचक्षण — a discerning and learned person

वपा — a mound of earth shaped like a crowd or heap

खोल — a pit or hollow

हस्तकाण्ड — a long pole

गुणकाण्ड — a pole used for measurement

वत्सदन्त — shaped like a calf's tooth

भल्ल नख — resembling a bear's claw

तृपर्व — having three joints or segments

सप्तपर्व — having seven joints or segments

आलीढ़ — the ālīḍha stance: standing with the right knee raised and the left knee lowered and planted

प्रत्यालीढ़ — pratyālīḍha: the reverse of the ālīḍha stance

समपाद — samapāda: standing with both knees aligned in a straight line

बिशाख — viśākha: standing with both legs spread apart

स्थानक — a standing posture

असन — a spear

गोकर्ण — a short spear

मुकुल — an arrow shaped like a flower bud

डाण्ड — an oar, or a wooden vessel for bailing water

चाड, चडक — a group or fleet of boats

जुज्झार — a warrior or fighting infantryman

गणक — a mathematician

तारावि्द् — one who determines direction by observing the stars

गुणवृक्ष — a ship's mast

सेकपात्र — a wooden vessel used for bailing water from a boat

वोहित — a fleet of ships

बिआरी — an evening meal

चोरगाहि — a woman who carries or waves a ceremonial yak-tail fan

पटा — a small low stool

बधा — wooden sandals with pegs are called kharāūṃ; with straps they are called badhā

तमारु — a copper plate

बटइ — a quail

तेरिआ — a three-posted arrangement; also a buffalo that has calved twice,

लेबारी — stalks and straw

अधतेरह — half less than thirteen, that is, twelve and a half

अँचओलनि — washed the hands and face

देवरूपा — a kind of silver

2. Vidyapati's Vocabulary

मृगमद — musk

वासर — day

रैन — night

लिधुर — blood

पुर नटी — an accomplished urban actress or dancing woman

अवतरु — descend; become incarnate

कनक भूधर — Mount Sumeru

चन्द्रिका चय — a mass of moonlight

निपातिनि — she who destroys

भक्त भयापनोदन — she who dispels the fears of devotees

दुरित हारिणि — she who removes the burden of misfortune

दुर्गमारि — a formidable enemy

विमर्द — destroyed

गाहिनी — she who wanders

सायक — an arrow

सुकर — beautiful

पिसित — raw flesh

पारणा — satisfaction; fulfilment

रभसे — she who gladdens

कृशानु — fire

चुम्ब्यमान — is kissing

परिच्युति — destroys

आड़ — red

भागि — curved

गोए — in concealment; having hidden

सुधाए — nectar; ambrosia

कुशेशय — the hundred-petalled lotus

अधबोली — an unfinished utterance

खनेखन — from moment to moment

उचिक — in astonishment

आरति — pain; distress

अनानि — ignorant

दन्द — quarrel

हेरैत — looking; seeing

मनसिज — Kāmadeva, the god of love

गौरव — weight; gravity

खीन — weakened; emaciated

अओके — belonging to another

लहु — small; light

परगास — light; illumination

सुरत विहार — amorous play

नवरङ्ग — orange (the fruit)

सन्तापलि — causing suffering

बाङ्क — bent; curved

पसाह — adornment; toilet preparations

भीति — out of fear

तिष — sharp; keen

सिझल — accomplished; brought to completion

कोरि — the fruit of the jujube tree

ससन — wind; air

धनि — the heroine

अम्बर — clothing; a garment

रेह — a line

रङ्ग — delight

अलका — an unguent; an application

मसि — ink

समरा — dark-complexioned

कचोरा — a bowl

पहू — lord; master

ससधर — the moon

मनोभव — Kāmadeva, the god of love

सउदामिनी — lightning

करिनि — a female elephant

वयन — face

परिमल — fragrance

तनरुचि — the fair complexion of the body

अरुझायल — entangled

बिलास-कानन — a pleasure-garden

निविल — dense; thick

विहि — fate; providence

निज — one's own

विद्रुम दले — on a petal of the mausari plant

तिहुअन — the three worlds

मल्ल — a wrestler

हाटक — gold

थम्भ — a pillar

चिकुर-निकर — a mass of hair; a tress

विचरित — contrary to the prescribed rule

कवरी — a tress of hair

चामरि — the yak from which a fly-whisk is made

सम्भसि — conversation; speaking together

न जासि — cannot be done

हुतासे — fire

मो — I; me

पीहलि — covered over

पीहित — covered; concealed

कुहुकि — a sorceress; a woman of illusion

जुड़ायब — to cool; to make cool

दहइ — to burn

अवनत — bent downward

बारल — prevented; warded off

धाओल — ran forward

पसाहिम — adornment

फुलग — a thrill; horripilation

बलाअ — a bracelet; a ring-shaped ornament

पेखलि — saw

बेढ़लि — enveloped; wrapped around

थीर — steady; motionless

पुछसि — you ask

परस — touch

झुरए — grows restless

अम्बुद — a rain-cloud

धन्दा — doubt

पुतलि — an image; an idol

इन्दु — the moon

महि — the earth

माझ — the middle

खिन — weakened; thin

मधु — flower nectar

उपेखि — having disregarded; with neglect

तरुअर — a tree

लेख — mention; reference

परिहरि — having abandoned

तोरिए — yours

पाछिलि — of the past; belonging to what came before

सनि — like; resembling

अछलिहुँ — I was

छाजत — will shine; will appear splendid

घोसिनी — a cowherd woman

बथु — an object; a thing

अरतल — attached; enamoured

रव — noise; commotion

राहि — Rādhā

तापिनि — a flame

बयने — speech; utterance

धरनि — the earth

इथि — of this

जोतिअ — astrology

मुरछइ — fainting; loss of consciousness

आइति — subjection; dependence

महते — from the elephant-driver

नव — bends down

एहो — this too; this

बटमारी — robbery on the road

तुलाएल — increased; augmented

पसार — a shop

पढ़ओंक — the first sale of the day

कुंगयाँ — an ignorant rustic (from a bad village)

आजि — I shall apply it; I shall put it on आग — a limb; a part of the body

गोए — having concealed

इन्दुमुखी — moon-faced

तहु — from that too

परिहरिहह — I shall abandon it

सेचान — a hawk; a falcon

भामि-भामि — wandering about

विरडा — a cat

सुरते — amorous play

काहिअ अवधारि — speaks with firm conviction

अन्तर नारी — a woman's heart

रोखए — anger

गंजए — humiliation; reproach

रंजए — gladdens; pleases

साह — he; that person

तरासे — out of fear

परुष — hard; harsh

सोस — dry; desiccated

चेतन — capable

आथि — is

दूषलि — sorrow; distress

निमाल — the remnants of a ritual offering

अंसुक — clothing

वाँलभु — beloved

नठल — destroyed

परबोध — awakening; enlightenment

पांगुर — a toe

खिति — the earth

गीभ — the neck

अनुसए — repentance; remorse

अनुरञ्जब — I shall be able to manage it

विरमाने — a resting-place

एहो पय — on that too

जार — having burned

नखत — a star; a constellation

जुगुतिहि — by reasoning

दोहाए — an oath

रङ्ग — affection; love

गरुअ — heavier; more serious

पिसुन — a talebearer; slanderer

अरुझओहल — entangled

कञोनकँ — upon whom?

बारि — having saved; protecting

फुलधालि — having put on flowers

कैतवे — through deceit

अह — day

सपजत — सपरज

वथु — an object; a thing

मोन्ति — a pearl

धम्मिल — a tress of hair

धोएल — established; set in place

अङ्गिरि — to accept; to acknowledge

पुनिमाँ — the full moon

विभिनावए — can separate

आनन — face

तिमिशरि — an enemy of darkness

चालक — one who impels; an inspirer

बम — vomiting; spewing forth

भीभ — भआवोन

ओल — the end

कवल — a morsel

सरूप — truth

निसिअर — a creature of the night

भुअङ्गम — a snake

उजोर — light

झाप — to sink; to submerge

मेंदुर — dense; thick

मुदिर — a cloud

पाउस — the rainy season

निसा — night

निबिल — dense; impenetrable

निचोल — a sari

जामिक — a watchman; guard

थैरेज — steadiness; stability

थोइआ — having placed; having set down

रजनि — night

सिरहि — in beauty; in splendour

असिलाइ — became faded

वालँभू — husband; lord

मुसए — in order to steal

छैलरि — of a deceiver

अरथित — through supplication

जड़ाइअ — make it cool

विरत रस — whose taste has disappeared

अचेतन — a fool

कके — why?

लाघव — disrespect

चिटि-गुड़े — an ant and jaggery

चुपड़लि — interest (on a loan)

लओले लोथे — even after making an excuse

झाल — dry; withered

दरनि — a crack; fissure

असेखि — without remainder; entire असहति — intolerance

तत्न — a system; a tantra

भाझहि — in the middle

खीनी — weakened; emaciated

झपावह — may be covering

परिरम्भि — having embraced

फुजलि — opened

घोषसि — a proclamation; a declaration

नखर — a fingernail

पाँच पाँच गुन दस गुन चौगुन आठ दुगुन — five times five, times ten, times four, times eight, times two: 5 × 5 × 10 × 4 × 8 × 2 = 16,000

नखर — a fingernail

छाँद — beauty; splendour

हिया — the heart

सदय — helpful; a helper

कानुक — of Kānha (Krishna)

निरसाओल — made devoid of flavour or relish

सखिता — attested; made a witness

करवाल — a sword

काँढ़ — comes out; emerges

कार — black

उजागरि — white; bright

परिपन्तिहि — the adversary; the opponent

पयगन्ड — mature; grown-up

मधुमखिका — a honeybee

उधारल — rescued; delivered

लागर — endowed with; equipped

पुरहर — the auspicious ceremonial pitcher used at weddings

मन्दाकिनी — water of the Ganges

केसु — the palāśa or flame-of-the-forest flower

विथुरलहु — spread out

भिति — a wall

पौञनाल — the stalk of a lotus

रात — red

ऐपन — aripan, a ceremonial floor design

हथोदक — water poured upon or offered by the hands

विधु — weariness from travelling

कनए-केआ — champak and banana; kanak and kadalī

जैतुक — dowry

डिठि — sight; vision

तुलइलिहुँ — quickly

अनुबन्ध — attaching; joining

बोल छ़ड़ — one who speaks falsely

मज्जि — having bathed; having immersed oneself

विथरओ — may spread; may extend

पाड़रि — rose; pāṭalī

भोपति — for me

वाउलि — mad; crazed

विधुन्तुद — Rāhu

सेरी — a person seeking refuge

परभृतक — the cuckoo

मतँ — a mantra; incantation

कि रहसि बोरि — are you speaking in jest?

बालहि तोरि — your beloved woman

भर बादर — filled with clouds

झम्पि — forcefully, again and again

सघने खर — fierce and dense harshness

डाहुकि — loudly

थेघा — having propped up; supported

पख — side; faction

पिआजे — the beloved

पङ्का — an application; a paste

तथुहु — in that too

दर — unprecedented; extraordinary

अपद — without cause

साती — intense anguish

अवथाजे — condition; state

पसाइल — spread out

रासे — anger

बालभु — the beloved

अएत — subject to; under another's control

सपूने — complete; entire

दिगन्तर — in a distant country

अरुझाए — entangled

आधिन — subordinate; dependent

पललि — happened; occurred

खेजोब — forgiveness

जल आजुरि — a libation of water

सुसेरा — a beautiful refuge

गोए — having concealed

सम्भ्रम — sudden; unexpected

कराडहार — a boatman's handhold or support used while crossing the Yamuna

लहु-लहु आखरे — short, short syllables

तामरस — a lotus

घनसार — camphor

वेपथु — trembling; a tremor

मसृण — smooth

सुदति — a woman with beautiful teeth

सुति — hearing; sacred revelation (śruti)

जति — as much as; however many घमिअ — is blown upon

आनइति — being under another's control

दीब — an oath

बड़इ — very much; many

देव देयासिनि — a woman who performs ritual blowing and exorcism

जटिला — a harsh-tempered woman

फुकरि — screaming; crying out

बहुरि — a daughter-in-law

अङ्गा — a mark; a sign

बेसर — a nose ornament

यन्त्रिया — a player of the vīṇā

यन्त्र — the vīṇā

फोटा — a mark on the forehead; a ṭīkā

समत — agreed; accepted

मौलि — on the head

मुसरँ — a pestle

जेमाओव — food; a meal

नवइते — descending

पडिचाँ — a mat

माड़व — a wedding pavilion

उगारल — to surround and seize

आँजल — collyrium; eye-black

डाढ़ल — burned; scorched

गौह — a hollow; cave

बिलुविअ — may be distributed

मउल — a crown

डाढ़ति — will burn

श्मश्रु — the beard (facial hair, not a food item)

अधँगँ — half of the body; one's other half

गरुअ — more; greater

अभरन — clothing to be worn

बड़ाव — praise

तौ — nevertheless

निसाकर — the moon

सरिस — like; similar

तांतल — heated; burning hot

सैकत — sand

हब — will be

निधुवन — sexual intercourse

आरा — another; other

कहाओसि — is called; is made to say

राजमराल — a royal swan

3. Vocabulary of Rasamaya Poet Chatur Chaturbhuj

Rasamaya poet Chatur Chaturbhuj was a poet of Vidyapati's period. Only seventeen of his poems survive, yet those seventeen compositions are sufficient to make his literary fame imperishable.

विहि — the creator; the ordainer of fate

सजानि — a young woman

तनु — age; the body

आँतर — the inside; within

गोए — to conceal; to hide

वेकत — expressed; manifest

गेहा — a place

परि — in the manner of; by way of विरहानल — the fire of separation

काँती — radiance; beauty

धमित — heated; made to glow

निरूपए — examines; observes

परिहर — neglect; disregard

अचिरहिँ — in a short while

वामे — adverse; contrary

निअ — one's own

मलयज — sandalwood

सयानि — a heroine consumed by the sorrow of separation

धनि — the fortunate or beloved heroine

हेरसि — looks at; gazes

हरषि — having rejoiced

परिहरि — having removed; having erased

नखत — the stars

मधुरि-दल — both lips

मनसिज — Kāmadeva, the god of love

अवनत — bending down

हुतासन — flame; fire

4. Vocabulary of Badrinath Jha

मिलिन — a honeybee; a bumblebee

रसाल — a mango tree; sugarcane

अतन्द्र — alert; vigilant; wakeful

खद्योत — a firefly

दुर्वार — difficult; hard to withstand

यति — a restriction; as many times as अचलसेतु — the inscription of unseen fate

विपिन — a forest

तरणि — a boat

अवाम — the right-hand side

गरुड़केतु — Viṣṇu

बौड़ि — deranged; frenzied

तुषार — cool; cold

ब्रह्मर्षिसुत — Kaśyapa, the son of a Brahmin sage

वारुणी — the western direction

कश्यप — a sage; also, a drinker of liquor

प्रतीची — the western direction

कुलाय — a nest

साँझ — samādhi, or a conjunction/assemblage

जीव-अभिदान — a name given to a living being

कमान — a bow

विधु — the moon

हय — a little; somewhat

नमि — obeisance; salutation

नीराजन — the ārati performed in the morning

मानर — the mṛdaṅga drum

काहल — a particular musical instrument

चतुविध — the four kinds: bodily, verbal, psychophysical, and costuming/stage appearance

उडुगण — the multitude of stars

दैवज्ञ — an astrologer

पाटल — red

पाटल — spread out; pervaded

अविद्या — ignorance

अधित्यका — land on the top of a mountain

कुशण्डिका — ritual cleansing of the sacrificial altar and related acts

मेधा — a retentive, discerning intellect

सम्भार — materials; requisites

कज्जल — black; collyrium

भूयसी — a particular kind of ritual gift to a priest

दीठि — sight; vision

नृपदार — a queen

परिचार — attendance; care; service

फुलहरा — the koṛhilā shrub

राजीव — a lotus

मुदवारि — tears of joy

तृष — thirst; craving

पाञ्चजन्य — a conch shell

जगत्ताताक — Viṣṇu, father of the world

प्रत्यभिवादन — a return salutation

जूटिका — a tuft of hair on the crown

गोए — concealed; hidden

गुरु-सन्तोख — the honorarium or offering given to a teacher

अवसित — completed; finished

श्रुतिवेध — ear piercing

प्रभाक — brilliance; talent

गुरु-शुद्धि — the ritual purification of Bṛhaspati (Jupiter)

औड़ि — a special form of insistence

शिविका — a palanquin

पूर्वाङ्ग-कृत्य — preliminary rites, including worship of the Mother Goddesses

अदम्भ — without pretence; guileless

वैजयन्त — Indra's palace

कौशेय वसन — silk clothing

भक्ष्य चतुर्विध — four classes of food: what is eaten or chewed, such as rice; what is consumed, such as puffed grain; what is licked, such as chutney; and what is sucked, such as mango

नीवार — the grain called oiri

अनुताप — remorse; repentance

बद्धकर — miserly; tight-fisted

विमति — detachment; disinclination

वैमत्य — difference of opinion

प्रसाद — gladness; satisfaction

अनुरोध — preference; liking

आर्य — excellent; noble

जाचल — tested; examined

सुभगप्रक्रिय — good repute; good conduct

अचलेश — a ruler of the earth

बिहान — daybreak; dawn

पट्टपटसार — fine silk cloth

विभूतिवत — splendour; prosperity

एकतान — one-pointed concentration

वनी — one who has entered the forest-dweller stage of life

और्ध्वदैहिक — śrāddha rites performed for the deceased for their welfare in the next world

भोज-ओज — miserliness

चञ्चरीक — a bumblebee

सोहल — adorned; made beautiful

छान — a stain; blemish

अदक्षिण — adverse; unfavourable

इन्दीवर — a blue lotus

कीर — a parrot

अकानल — heard

पोषक-द्वेषक — an enemy of the crow that nourishes or feeds

श्मश्रु — beard and moustache

शैवाल-लतिका — a creeper of the semar tree

कुण्डलित — coiled; wrapped around

कर्णिकार — the kanail flower

ग्रीवा — the neck

इन्द्रायुध — Indra's thunderbolt

तमाल-साल — the sākhū tree

शम्पा — a flash of lightning

सहकार — a mango

वकुलमुकुल — the bud of the bhālsarī (bakul) tree

पखान — stone

दमनक — the donā flower

अंसयुगल — both shoulders

अश्मसार — iron

मणिबन्ध — the wrist

अबलासव — opposition; resistance

दुहिण — Brahmā

जम्भरिपु — Indra, the foe of Jambha

ऊरु — the thigh

आरत — opposition

नीरज — not produced in water; free from dust; opposition

इलातनय — Purūravas, the son of Ilā

सुरवैद्ययुगल — the twin Aśvin physicians of the gods

क्षितिहरिहम — the lord of the earth

परपुष्ट — a cuckoo; in an alternative sense, a well-nourished courtesan

मधुप — a bee; a drinker of liquor

आतङ्करङ्क — fearless

काव्यक — pertaining to a parrot

मधुभरि — until springtime

सुरभिमग — the road or path of Kāmadhenu, the wish-fulfilling cow

अनीति — free from excessive rain and the like

शिक्षालोक — the light of learning

तास्रव — a loud sound

जनपद — one's own country or region

साभिनिवेश — with insistence; earnestly

धारणा-ध्याण — concentration (dhāraṇā) and meditation (dhyāna), the sixth and seventh limbs of eightfold yoga

प्रकृति — nature; disposition; subjects or people

पीयूष-यूष — the essence of nectar

मार्तण्ड — the sun

सत्वक — the quality of sattva

सौम्य — the planet Mercury

वाक्पति — Bṛhaspati (Jupiter)

रवि-कल्प — resembling the sun

याचना-परायण — one devoted to begging; a supplicant

अभियोगी — one who makes an accusation

कैरवामोद — the fragrance of a night-blooming water lily; the enemy's delight

अनुदार — subordinate to a woman

पुत्रेष्टिक — the rite or sacrifice for obtaining a son

एकावली — a necklace of pearls

मत्सरिता — envy of another's good fortune

लालनसुहिता — satisfied or favourably disposed through affection

परिणाह — growth; enlargement

प्रमत्त — heedless; intoxicated; mad

बालवशामे — a young female elephant

आविल — muddy; turbid

अर्धचन्द्र — a half-moon; also a slap delivered with the curved hand

शिखिकलाप — a peacock's tail feathers; also, something uneven or irregular

बलाहक — a cloud

सरणी — the sky

जड़भाव — coldness; the condition of being water

मेचक — dark blue

द्विरद — an elephant

धम्मिल्ल — a knot or coil of hair

विलक्ष — ashamed; embarrassed

पथिक-चक्र — the circle or group of cakravāka birds

काली — black in colour

तारा — the pupil of the eye

काली — Kālī, the first of the Mahāvidyās

तारा — Tārā, the second Mahāvidyā

चतुश्रुति — the fourfold śruti or Vedic knowledge; Brahmā as its reciter

श्रुति — the ear; hearing

विश्रुति — accomplishment; success

छीजक — the act of being wasted or destroyed

कलकण्ठी — a cuckoo

तप्त-तपनीय — gold

चिवुक — the chin

परिस्फुर — restless; flickering

लेखा — reckoning; calculation

जूझल — fought

महायति — exceedingly vast

आहित — placed; established

स्तूप — a heap of earth

लिकुचक — belonging to the baṛhar fruit/tree

श्रीफल-मद — the pride of the bilva fruit

गर्त — a pit; hole

कुलाल — a potter

नाभिभव — Brahmā, born from the navel

शारदा — the invisible Sarasvatī river (Śāradā in an unseen form)

त्रिदिवस सारिणी — the Ganges

वली — the three folds on the abdomen

बली — strong; powerful

पाटच्चर — a thief

केहरि — a lion

नितम्बक — of the middle section of a mountain

विधिओजक — of splendour or majesty

कृष-नीच — growing progressively thinner towards the lower end (said of the leg)

वेत्र-दण्ड — a golden ceremonial staff of authority

हंसक — an anklet

दश-शशधर — the ten moon-like fingernails

लाजें बीतल — contracted or withdrawn through shame

अनृत-दूषण-कृपाणी — a knife that destroys false accusations or blemishes

कथाऽवशेष — what remains to be said

हर्ष-नृत्त — dancing in joy; the expressive movement of the limbs

सभीक — frightened; afraid

सागर-परिपन्थी — one who vies with the ocean

सम्पुटित — folded; contracted

विगेय — blameworthy

विजीहीर्षा — the desire to stroll or take pleasure

दलतर — beneath the leaves

अतिसुकवि-ऊह — beyond even a fine poet's conjecture or reasoning

कुवलय-रम्भा-समान — a Rambhā-like beauty of the entire earth

देवाङ्गनीय — pertaining to a celestial damsel

रास — a circular dance

श्यामा — the priyangu plant

व्यामोहक — bewitching; entrancing

काल — Yama, the god of death

कृतयुग — the Satya Yuga

रण-एकतान — one who is invariably victorious in battle

नृपति-पताकिनीक — of the king's army

विकटप्रतीक — of fearsome appearance

पुण्डरीक — a tiger

दिनेन्दु-दीन — pale like the moon in daylight

सर्वसहाक — of the earth, which bears all things

लीन — subsumed in cosmic dissolution

विलीन — dissolved; vanished

गोए — kept; retained

तदनुसार — subsequently; afterwards

विदग्धताक — of refinement and aesthetic sensibility

गरुअ — large; great

भूरमाक — of Lakṣmī of the earth

शर्म — happiness; comfort

दलितपांशु — sinless; innocent

भवितव्यवश्य — subject to destiny

अननुरूप — unsuited; adverse

प्रणिधानलीन — absorbed in meditation

द्विजदत्त — given by an accomplished Brahmin

दत्त-प्रदत्त — given by Dattātreya

उदेष — search; inquiry

स्वरति — love for oneself or one's own subject

धैर्य-कदर्य — impatient; lacking fortitude

चरमदशाक — of the final stage, death

अवगाह — agitation; stirring

ओज — strength; brilliance

यशस्य — productive of renown

अलेश — guileless; without deceit

विजिगीषा — the desire for victory

पुटपाक — a preparation cooked after enclosing the substance between two earthen vessels

हयग्रीव — the demon Hayagrīva, slain by Viṣṇu

अनन्त — endless; without end

व्यपाय — complete; fulfilled

भङ्ग — defeat

सङ्गर — battle; war

तनु — soft; delicate

आश्रित-दुर्ग — a worshipper of Durgā

दुर्ग — Durgā, difficult of approach and served by demons

सर्वसहा — the earth that bears everything; endurance; the all-enduring earth

मनु — a mantra

शिव — auspicious; benevolent

कूर्च — the syllable hrīṃ (ह्रीं)

शिखिजाया — the exclamation svāhā

आखर — the syllables: "ह्रीं गौरि! रुद्रदयिते! योगेश्वरी। हूँ फट स्वाहा"

अन्वर्थाख्य — one whose name accords with the meaning; aptly named

सिद्धि — attainment; accomplishment; perfection

ब्राह्मण — the Brahmin feast in the five-part puraścaraṇa rite: tarpaṇa, mārjana, feeding Brahmins, and nṛsoma

वैन्य — King Pṛthu

फलक — a shield

शिशुमार — a river dolphin (soṃs)

धन-शाद — mud; mire

क्षेपणी — the implement called karuār

पटमण्डप — a tent

यादस्स्वन — the sounds of aquatic creatures

पूत — pure; sanctified

द्विरदकाँ — to the elephant

दानजल — the rut fluid of an elephant

मन-अवसाद — grief; sorrow

भव्य — auspicious; beautiful

आयुधराजि — flashing lightning

चैत्य — a well-known or prominent building

दुर्ग — a fortress

सुचतुष्पश — a four-way crossroads

अहम्पूविका — a competitive rush to be first: “I first! No, I first!”

पवि — Indra's thunderbolt

अर्थ — purpose; intention

प्रभूत — abundant; plentiful

लाघव — swiftness; speed

दनुज-तनुज — born in the body

अर्भ — a child

सुरसरणी — the sky

शारिका — a myna bird

मेकल — the mountain from which the Narmadā river rises

परिपाटी — tradition; established practice

उत्कोच — a bribe

वितान — extension; expanse

प्रकोष्ठ — the wrist

अङ्गुरीय — a ring

केतन — a banner; flag

निर्मम — without possessive attachment

उदिखर — risen; emerged

दीधिति — moonlight

दक्षिण — equally attached to several persons; also, right-hand or southern

मत्सरी — envious; jealous

विनिपातोन्मुख — inclined towards downfall

मधु-सञ्जँ — by name

नृपदारक — the king's daughter

प्रमोद-निबन्धन — a cause of delight

वन्दी — a prisoner

पुरुषार्थ चतुष्टय — the four aims of human life: dharma, wealth, desire and liberation

दीधिति-माली — the sun

नरनाथ — the retinue

औरस-सुत — a son born to a man by his lawful wife

चक्रधर — Nārāyaṇa, the bearer of the discus

ईषत्कर — easy to accomplish

कुलिशायुधसँ — from Indra, the wielder of the thunderbolt

प्रमा-सालित — enlarged or strengthened by true knowledge

उक्ति-प्रगल्भ — mature and confident in speech

शमन — Yama, the god of death

विधेय — a duty; something that ought to be done

दुर्विपाक — an evil consequence

सङ्कल्प-कल्पना — the fashioning of mental acts through intention and imagination

स्तम्भित — immobilised; made inert

सकल-करण-परिवारक — of the whole group of sense organs

भव-झरिणी — the river of worldly existence

शशिकान्त — the moonstone gem

रजनिकर — through beauty or radiance

निष्कपट — with sincere liking and affection

द्रुत — swift; rapid

विद्रुत — melted

मानसिक — of mental transgression or misconduct

उन्मिषित — expanded; increased

प्रकृतिस्थ — conscious; in possession of awareness

कालासुर — the demon Kālaketu

अमान — immeasurable; limitless

अमानव — supernatural; beyond the human

कुरङ्गित — leaping like a deer

विक्रम — an unusual order, or one in which the sequence has been disrupted

पञ्चानन — a lion

आरभटी — ostentatious or flamboyant conduct

दुरभिसन्धि — a malicious design

कान्दिशीक — one who flees in fear

अनाथ — a widow

धृष्ट — mature; grown

निकृष्ट — base; inferior; small

उपरोधन — fortitude

अनारम्भ — not beginning; refraining from commencement

भानुमान — the sun

कृकलाश — a chameleon

सन्नाह — preparation for battle

मधु-मधुरिमार्ह — as sweet as grapes; of an exceedingly sweet flavour

सर्वज्ञम्मन्य — one who considers oneself omniscient

वीरमानी — one who considers oneself a hero

नृशंस — cruel; ruthless in speech

अपलापपरा — intent on kicking

प्राथमिक — for the first time; initial

प्रकार — of a wall

अज — a he-goat

कुरङ्ग — a deer

गवय — the nilgai, an antelope resembling cattle

शार्दूल — a tiger

साम्हर — an animal resembling a deer

भूतनाथ — Mahādeva (Śiva)

प्रमथराजि — a multitude of gaṇas or attendants

शृङ्गी — having horns

जटी — wearing matted locks

वारणरद — having tusks like those of an elephant

पुच्छी — a tail

कृत्तिपटी — wearing a tiger skin

चत्वर — a rock; stone slab

भीरुभीमा — terrifying to the timid

पटल — covered over

जन्य — war; battle

राजन्य — a Kṣatriya

भिन्दिपाल — a weapon that hurls a pellet like the ḍhelmāsu implement

तोमर — a weapon resembling a churning rod

कृपाण — a sword

परशु — an axe

असि धेनु — a short sword or knife

भुशुण्डी — a fire-based weapon

परिध — a hammer

दनुजभुवन — the netherworld

जलद-छाया — the shade of clouds; similarly, something unstable or transient

मृत्युशक्ति-उत्क्रान्तिदा — Death possesses a power called utkrāntidā, by which it causes the departure of a living being

वृन्दारक-वृन्दक — a company of gods

निजचमू — one's own army

पताल — the seven nether regions: Atala, Vitala, Sutala, Talātala, Mahātala, Rasātala and Pātāla

सन्देश — a message; communication

त्रिदिवहुँ — even in heaven

प्रत्यूष — early morning; dawn

दानव-भोगिनी — an ordinary woman attached to a king

अभ्यास — yogic practice

क्लेश — the five afflictions: ignorance, egoity, attachment, aversion and clinging to life

जनि — birth

भोगभू — the place or ground of enjoyment

भुजगभुवन — the netherworld of serpents

नाक — heaven

सहस्रार — the thousand-petalled lotus-shaped energy centre at the top of the head

निर्मन्तु — innocent; guiltless

फेरि — turned around; rotated

फेरि — again

अन्तराय — an obstacle; impediment

याचकपटलीकल्प — like a crowd of supplicants

रहस्योद्भेदसँ — through the disclosure of a secret love

लोकपति — a king; ruler

मध्यमलोक — the middle world; the mortal realm

अधोभुवन — the lower world; the netherworld

नररिक्त — devoid of human beings

तूर्ण — rapidly; quickly

उद्देश — utterance; pronunciation

उपेन्द्र — Lord Vāmana, an incarnation of Viṣṇu

कन्याक — of Devayānī, the daughter of Śukra

अर्थना — entreaty; request

सपरिकर — with family and attendants

पुरुषसूक्त — the Puruṣasūkta, the sixteen Vedic stanzas beginning “ओँ सहस्रशीर्षा”

दुइ — two, identified as Nārāyaṇa and Turvasu (in the description of one's two fathers)

प्रतिग्रह — acceptance of a gift

लाजहोम — the ritual offering known as lājahoma

लाजहोममे — the offering of parched grain in the lājahoma ritual

प्रणयकोपक — anger or sulking arising from love

अपसारण-गति — a means of removal

परमाणु — one-sixth of a mote visible in a sunbeam

द्वयणुक — two atoms

पूगीफल — a betel nut

व्यङ्गयवचन — a statement conveying an implied or sarcastic meaning

दिवसचतुष्टय — four days

गानचातुरी-विवरण — the publication of an account of skill in singing

कान-सुधारस-वितरण — the gift or distribution of nectar-like sweetness to the ears

चारिमशुचि — adorned with beauty

पाँकल — caught in the mud

निमीलित — closed; contracted

कीलित — bound; afflicted

मदन-रुजा — the disease or suffering of love

निर्वापि — to pacify; to bring peace

समाजित — worshipped; honoured

उद्भेद — development; emergence

चलदल — a peepal tree

मन्मथ-घर्षण — boldness or audacity in the friction of love

कल्पकल्प — resembling a cosmic aeon (kalpa)

आशा — a direction; point of the compass

विदग्ध — distressed; also, a connoisseur of love and art

सुरतवितान — the arts and activities of erotic play

वितानल — expanded; made extensive

संभोग — the first aspect of śṛṅgāra, erotic dalliance or union

विप्रलम्भ — the later aspect of śṛṅgāra, separation from the beloved

अवसित — finished; concluded

विधुर — bereft; separated (as in "dīpaka-vidhu-vidhura")

अनवम — faultless; without blemish

विरस — indifferent; detached; disinclined

पञ्चयज्ञ — the five daily sacrifices: Brahmayajña (studying and teaching the Vedas), Pitṛyajña (offerings to the ancestors and daily śrāddha), Devayajña (fire oblation), Bhūtayajña (the offering to living beings known as vaiśvadeva-bali), and Nṛpajña (hospitality to guests)

पर्व — a festival

आन्तरिक — the inner faculty or mind (antaḥkaraṇa)

मञ्जूषा — a box; chest

भूमिनेता — ruler of the earth

जरती — an elderly woman

वैजयन्त — of Indra's palace adorned by Indrāṇī

पति-परिचार — service to one's husband or lord

मन्त्र — reflection; deliberation

कान्त — beloved; dear

श्लाघापरायण — eager to praise

धव — an attack; charge

मधुपा — a woman who drinks liquor

भूरि — much; abundant

सर्वसहासमेत — together with the all-enduring earth, which bears every sorrow

कासर — a water buffalo

हिण्डोर — a swing

शैलूष-कुहना — the illusion or trickery of an actor

Alongside these, read Harimohan Jha, Yatri, Dhumketu, Saketanand, Ramabhadra, Dhirendra, Kapari, Malangia, Nachiketa, Kulanand Mishra, Rajkamal, Rajmohan Jha, Subhash Chandra Yadav, Premshankar Singh, Ramanand Jha "Raman", Mohan Bharadwaj, Ramanath Jha, Jivakant, Prabhas Kumar Choudhary, Lily Ray, Ilarani Singh and Ramlochan Thakur. Study thoroughly Dinbandhu Jha's Dhaturup and Ramanath Jha's Mithilabhasha Prakash, as well as the textbooks for Classes Nine and Ten in India and Nepal. If you can also read and write Mithilakshar fluently, you will be able to connect yourself to the Maithili literary tradition and move beyond mediocrity. Read Maithili periodicals and translated literature too. You should also study the history of Videha, Mithila, Tirabhukti and Tirhut, and the works and lives of eminent men and women. Once this preparation is complete, the literature that emerges from your pen will have a distinctive flavour.

29. Maithili, Surjapuri and Rajbanshi

Abstract

Maithili–Surjapuri–Rajbanshi. Babu may never have recognised the political ground on which he stood while he remained in the party to which Ram had once introduced him. Although he was described as an influential leader in the party, he was never presented as a leader of the backward classes. Yet Babu, more adept at political manoeuvring than at establishing a political base, rose so considerably in the eyes of the opposition immediately after his expulsion that it installed him in the state's seat of leadership reserved for the backward classes. In Surjapuri (in the Kishanganj region and elsewhere on the Indian side), this would be written or spoken as follows: "बाबूक अपना यहार राजनीतिक जमीनेर अहसास उस दलात रहले नी होबे।"

Keywords: Surjapuri · Rajbanshi · critical theory · Maithili

Maithili–Surjapuri–Rajbanshi

Maithili

Babu may never have become conscious of the political ground on which he stood, even while belonging to the party with which Ram had once brought him into association. Though called an influential leader within that party, Babu was never presented as a leader of the backward classes. But Babu, more skilful at political combinations than at establishing a political base, came so prominently into the opposition party's view as soon as he was expelled that it installed him, on its own behalf, in the position of leader of the backward classes in the state.

In Surjapuri (spoken in Kishanganj and adjoining areas on the Indian side), it would be written or spoken thus:

"बाबूक अपना यहार राजनीतिक जमीनेर अहसास उस दलात रहले नी होबे। जहाक कोईखुन वहाय रामेर संगे सीचे छीले। दलात एक कद्दावर नेता कहा जनवार बाबू कोईखुन पिछ्वाड़ नेतार लखा पेश नी करील। लेकिन राजनीतिक से बेसी जोड़तोड़ोत माहिर बाबू दलार से निकलाते ही प्रतिपक्षी-दलाड़ नजरोत हिरंगदी चढ़ील कि वहाय पाटी अपनार बीती से प्रदेशोत पिछड़ार नेतार गद्दीत विरजमान करील।"

English rendering of the Surjapuri passage: Babu may not have realised his own political position while he remained in the party where he had once been with Ram. Although he was spoken of as a formidable leader there, Babu was never presented as a backward-class leader. Yet Babu, more accomplished in political manoeuvring than in political groundwork, came so prominently to the attention of the opposition immediately after leaving the party that it appointed him, on its own behalf, to the seat of backward-class leadership in the state.

In Rajbanshi (Surjapuri is called the Rajbanshi language on the Nepal side, in Jhapa, Sarnamati, Chakamaki, Mechi, Tadhnduwa and other localities; there is only a slight difference between Rajbanshi and Surjapuri), it would be written or spoken as follows:

"बाबूर अपनार इर राजनीतिक जमीनेर ऐहसास उखान दल त रहते हुए भी नी होल, जइर कोधोय उम्हा रामेर संगे छिले। दलात एक कद्दावर नेता कहवार बाबूर कोधोय पिछड़ा नेतार लाखा पेश नी करे। माने राजनीतिक जमीनत भेल्ला जोड़तोड़ माहिर बाबू दल से निकलाले ही प्रतिपक्षी-दलार नजर एनंतिंज चढ़िल कि अम्हा पार्टीत अपनार तरफ से प्रदेशत छट जातिर नेतारक गद्धी पर बठाइ दिल।"

English rendering of the Rajbanshi passage: Babu did not realise his own political standing even while remaining in that party, with which Ram had once been associated with him. Although he was called a strong leader in the party, Babu was never put forward as a backward-class leader. Rather than cultivating a political base, Babu was skilled at making political combinations; once he left the party, he rose so high in the eyes of the opposition that the party installed him, on its own behalf, in the state's leadership seat for the smaller or backward castes.

Surjapuri: In India, this language is spoken village by village by members of the Rajbanshi (Mahadalit) caste in Kishanganj, Purnia and other parts of Bihar. Among Muslims in Kishanganj, the landowning caste is called Khotta and the service caste Kulhiya. The Kulhiya community also speaks Surjapuri. Rajbanshis and members of other castes living around the Kulhiyas speak Surjapuri. It is a mixture of Maithili and Bengali. Some people also call the language of the Bahe Bengalis of Cooch Behar in Bengal and the Rajbanshi language of Nepal Surjapuri. Others believe that Surjapuri emerged from a mixture of the language of people from Bangladesh with the regional language. In a single village of Purnia or Kishanganj, Kulhiyas and Rajbanshis speak Surjapuri, Santhals speak Santhali, Banjaras speak the Banjara language, while all the remaining people speak Maithili. If these regions are incorporated into a Mithila state, their inhabitants will have to be guaranteed the development of their respective languages. Has the thinking of the campaigners for a Mithila state reached that far?

30. Folk Elements in Literature: Ballads, Dance and Drama

Abstract

The bronze figurine recovered from the civilisation of Mohenjo-daro suggests a dance posture resembling the thāṭ pose of contemporary Kathak: the right arm making an angle of forty-five degrees, the left hand resting on the left hip, and the left leg slightly bent. The Śāṅkhāyana Brāhmaṇa of the Rigveda describes the combined use of song, instrumental music and dance; the Aitareya Brāhmaṇa counts all three among the divine arts. In Rigveda 10.76.6, the golden radiance of Uṣas reminds the poet of an adorned seer.

Keywords: folk elements in literature · ballads · dance · drama · critical theory · Maithili

Historical Accounts of Folk Ballads, Dance and Music

The bronze figurine recovered from the civilisation of Mohenjo-daro suggests a dance posture resembling the thāṭ pose of contemporary Kathak: the right arm making an angle of forty-five degrees, the left hand resting on the left hip, and the left leg slightly bent. The Śāṅkhāyana Brāhmaṇa of the Rigveda describes the combined use of song, instrumental music and dance; the Aitareya Brāhmaṇa includes all three among divine arts. In Rigveda 10.76.6, the golden radiance of Uṣas reminds the poet of an adorned seer. The Rigveda also mentions folk dancing (prāñco agāma nṛtaye). The Mahāvrata Soma sacrifice describes a group dance by three to six female servants. Śāṅkhāyana 1.11.5 describes four to eight married women being given liquor at a wedding and encouraged to dance four times. Vedic literature mentions the wife singing during wedding rituals. At the sīmantonnayana ceremony, the husband requests a vīṇā player to perform a song accompanied by instruments in honour of the god Soma. The Atharvaveda associates the dance of the deity Vasā with ṛc, sāman and gāthā, and describes Gandharvas participating in this dance, which involved drinking Soma. Atharvaveda 12.1.41 describes the combined sound of song, instruments and dance. During the Vedic period, alongside Sāman music, there were also secular forms of ballad-music called gāthā and nārāśaṃsī.

Elements of the folk ballad: because its language is transmitted orally, its form remains dynamic. Dating it likewise depends on conjecture.

Ballads are performed at fairs, weekly markets, in the homes of prominent people and in public places. Beyond members of the caste to which the folk deity belongs, listeners from other castes are also present.

The creator and the audience have a direct relationship. The element of listening gives rise to spontaneous embellishment of the narrative. Yet many literary features—such as cantos, regulated metre, dramatic junctures and indications of the subject—are absent. The organisation of the material is not tightly structured. There are scattered references to abuse and liquor-drinking.

The place occupied by thieves in rural society and their depiction, references to local gods and goddesses, and expressions of caste identity all occur. The ballad-singer is an improvising poet: working from a framework, the singer alters the performance at will. An invocation of God at the beginning and occasional requests for divine forgiveness during the performance serve to steady the singer's capacity to perform.

In performances lasting more than an hour, smoking the hookah or chilam, drinking liquor and describing the surroundings appear within the singing. The Lorik Manuār ballad is performed before an audience, whereas the story of Salhes is performed before the deity who is worshipped.

Divine power assists the hero in battle.

The hero, too, uses abusive language.

Names and other elements are borrowed from epic characters and incidents, such as gambling in the Mahabharata.

Conclusion: literary forms are of two kinds, lokadharmī and nāṭyadharmī. The former is associated with the vernacular and rural, the latter with classical modes of expression. Rural here signifies a disregard for artificiality; through ignorance, however, some take lokadharmī to mean a play staged in a village. In lokadharmī performance, the natural enactment of character and ordinary human action predominate; physical expression is simple, and the number of characters, women as well as men, is very large. In nāṭyadharmī performance, speech may occur inwardly, through gesture, or as a voice from the sky; dance is incorporated; the language is distinctive; music is organised through rāgas; and divine characters appear alongside ordinary ones. Inanimate objects and animals may begin to speak, a performer may play double or triple roles, and the emotional intensity of happiness or sorrow is heightened by music.

Vedic narratives, the Jātaka tales, Aesop's Fables, the Panchatantra and the Hitopadeśa have all existed alongside folk ballads. Everywhere, ballads have persisted beside the stories of the elite.

31. Hindi, Maithili and Literary Vocabulary

Abstract

Hindi has expanded its geographical reach without correspondingly expanding its vocabulary, and there is therefore no question of fearing Hindi. Hindi imperialism has taken the place of English imperialism, and the debate about its propensity to bring down smaller languages cannot be stopped on Hindi Day. All the indigenous languages of Latin and South America disappeared, and Spanish and Portuguese took their place.

Keywords: Hindi · literary vocabulary · critical theory · Maithili

Hindi has expanded its geographical reach without expanding its vocabulary to the same degree; there is therefore no question of fearing Hindi. Hindi imperialism has taken the place of English imperialism, and on Hindi Day one cannot suppress debate over its tendency to bring down the smaller languages. All the indigenous languages of Latin and South America disappeared, and Spanish and Portuguese took their place. Spain destroyed Aztec civilisation and erased its distinguishing signs; subsequently, as an act of contrition, Mexico named the stadium built to host the football World Cup the Aztec Stadium.

Denmark has a very extensive dictionary, apparently comprising more than twenty-three volumes. Immigrants often fail the Danish-language examination conducted for citizenship. A woman who had married a Dane, whose child had become a Danish citizen, said that the language paper was extremely difficult—even Danes would fail it. Having a small population or territory has not harmed the Danish vocabulary.

The fundamental concern of literature is its subject matter. But if writers themselves suffer from a scarcity of words, what can they communicate, and how can they clarify their material? Maithili will end up in the same condition as Hindi literature. The acceptability of a vocabulary should be determined by the words spoken in the villages of native speakers, not by the vocabulary of migrants estranged from the culture. The acceptability of a vocabulary should be determined by what native speakers say in their villages. If instead one makes the speech of culturally uprooted migrants the foundation, good literature will appear to have been excavated from the ground, while the literature praised by critics operating through literary cliques will seem natural.

The discipline of classical rules is for the writer, not the reader. If a writer composes ghazals, rolās, dohās and kuṇḍaliyās on their proper classical foundations, readers will enjoy them. If the writer shies away from effort, literary readership will diminish. Even the method of breaking the strictures of the śāstra is contained within the śāstra itself. Judged through rigid classical rules, the Sāvitrī mantra does not conform to the Gāyatrī metre; yet we count it as Gāyatrī because svaḥ is made suvaḥ to complete the metrical count.

Mazhar Imam of Darbhanga received the Sahitya Akademi Award for Urdu for Pichhle Mausam Ka Phool. The collection contains fifty-five ghazals in bahr and three free ghazals without bahr. Readers remember him for his ghazals; it does not matter to them whether a ghazal they liked was in metre or not. They liked it. Is it then mere coincidence that the ghazals they liked happened to be in bahr? Urdu literature remembers Mazhar Imam as the figure who established the free ghazal.

A writer's ideology should be like salt dissolved in water, not oil floating on water; I have written about this before. Yatri and Dhumketu needed the support of the Communist Party because the Left was a fashion for them, like a "good scent" or "designer wear". Thus Balchanma, after turning away from the Congress and Socialist parties, looks to the Communists and the red flag for the solution to every problem; Yatri supplies him with every solution there. For Dhumketu's characters, too, the red flag is a kind of Lakṣmaṇa-būṭī, a life-restoring herb. But these writers were not connected with the Communist movement except as a fashion, and their ideology consequently spreads over their literature like oil. Now consider the Maithili literature of Chaturanand Mishra and Jagdish Prasad Mandal. Have you seen the red flag or the Communist Party mentioned anywhere in Chaturanand Mishra's novels or Jagdish Prasad Mandal's writing? What one encounters here is the genuinely leftist dialectical method and a faith in life: ideology dissolved like salt. Is it merely a coincidence that Chaturanand Mishra writes at the beginning of his life and Jagdish Prasad Mandal in its later years, after the last legal case was over?
The landlord Thakurji of Berma, Jagdish Prasad Mandal's village, told my paternal cousin that Jagdish Prasad Mandal was as truthful as Harishchandra and was the pride of the village. This was despite the fact that Mandal had led the Communist movement, had been imprisoned ten times and had fought legal cases against these very people. One consequence is that today nobody in Berma has a holding larger than ten bighas. Even now Mandal lives in a thatched house. He gets up at three in the morning, lights a small oil lamp and writes Maithili literature; his son has never seen him writing and does not know when he writes. Under Bhogendra Jha's leadership he had taken a vow that whenever he spoke, he would speak in Maithili. His son has therefore never heard him speak any language other than Maithili.
This is why his subject matter is new, and why his vocabulary is that of a native speaker, adequate and essential for clarifying that subject matter. His people, trees, leaves and flowers, fields and threshing grounds are real, grounded in lived experience, not excavated from below the earth. Inspired by him, new writers living away from Mithila should learn Mithila's history, geography and culture before writing in Maithili; only then can their writing become distinctive. Read Radhakrishna Choudhary's History of Mithila and Jagdish Prasad Mandal's Village Life at https://sites.google.com/a/videha.com/videha-pothi/; for Maithili vocabulary see http://videha.co.in/new_page_13.htm.

The opinions of people like Thakurji of Berma matter more to me than those of writers and critics engaged in clique-making. It is no longer hidden from anyone how the literature of imported vocabulary has diminished Maithili's readership, whereas authentic vocabulary has raised the level of Maithili literature and increased its readers.

J. M. Coetzee, twice awarded the Booker Prize for fiction and awarded the Nobel Prize in Literature, once observed in relation to language that writing in English within a bilingual Afrikaans-and-English environment presented many problems of communication for him. In response, he translated extensively from Afrikaans into English. One can only hope that Maithili Sahitya Akademi Award winners—and certain aspirants to that award—who call themselves writers and are damaging the literary environment by holding on to both Maithili and Hindi will learn something from J. M. Coetzee.

In America there is an English "high-frequency" list of 350 words and a "basic word list" of 3,500 words for high-school students, which, as they advance to college and graduate school (where postgraduate study is called graduate school), roughly doubles for students outside language faculties. A student of literature or a writer is expected to command ten times as much. In Hindi, apart from exceptional regional works, poets and novelists compose literature—poetry and fiction—using a vocabulary of 2,000 words belonging to the eighth-grade level. Some Maithili writers want to import this basic 2,000-word list into Maithili and remain confined to it, while the signs of the Japanese writing system run to 500.

Taranand's casteism is of another kind. He writes: "Here a planned campaign is under way to heap a mountain of rubbish on the frail body of Maithili. An army of sweepers will be required to clean it. That is quite right. First it will be said that Maithili is the language of Brahmins; next it will be said that Maithili is the language of sweepers." At https://sites.google.com/a/videha.com/videha-audio/ there are audio recordings of people belonging to various castes of Mithila, and at https://sites.google.com/a/videha.com/videha-video/ there are video recordings, including recordings of Dom-Mallik people—whom Viyogi calls sweepers and whose language and community he despises—made available through the courtesy of Shri Umesh Mandal. The manner in which Mahendra Malangia's Kāṭhak Lok and Okar Āṅgank Bārahmāsā began what I regard as hatred and propaganda against an allegedly distinct Dalit Maithili invented by Malangia has been carried forward by Taranand Viyogi. These audio and video recordings have decisively put an end to that hatred and propaganda, and the world can hear and see that Maithili does not differ on a caste basis in the way alleged. Viyogi puts his energies to negative uses, because his perspective and ideology lack clarity; he therefore cannot bear criticism from others. His comment on a Videha editorial was answered by Avinash (now Avinash Das) on his Facebook wall.

Responding to that same editorial, Gangesh Gunjan wrote that the assertion by the young Subhash Chandra—"Five years ago Gangesh Gunjan said in Kamani Auditorium that he writes in Hindi, but the Maithili people gave him an award"—was untrue. Gunjan said that he had never made such a statement. Subhash Chandra did not reply, so Gunjan's account must be accepted. Dr Dhanakar Thakur was also distressed by criticism of the Sahitya Akademi and sent several emails to Shri Umesh Mandal, co-editor of Videha. He does not support the genuinely standardised language of Jagdish Prasad Mandal and Umesh Mandal.
When Umesh Mandal initiated a debate on linguistics, he declared himself a doctor and did not take part in the debate. Apart from the emails, he and many others were heard at Sagar Rati Deep Jaray in Hazaribagh saying: "Do not write this way; write like Ashok, Shrinivas and the others; read first and then write like them"—assuming that those writers write without reading.
Benipuri's drama Ambapali is in Hindi, and NCERT included it in the school syllabus. The editors said that the absence of the verb "hai", as in "vah jā rahā", resulted from Benipuri's regional background. Respecting the play's historical character, the editorial board therefore did not edit it even though it was part of the school curriculum. Yet when Umesh Mandal, Jagdish Prasad Mandal or Ram Vilas Sahu writes "ओ जाइत", "ओ खाइत", experts at Sagar Rati, unfamiliar with linguistics, offer advice that would make a fundamental feature of Maithili secondary. Benipuri's Hindi, influenced by Maithili, escapes the NCERT editor's intervention in the name of Maithili, but casteism within Maithili is determined not to spare comparable usage in Maithili itself.
That casteist mentality will severely affect the outcome of the CIIL translation mission as well, because translation workshops are being conducted on the basis of pseudo-standardisation. Until the supposedly established or award-winning writers of Maithili recognise genuine standardisation, their standing before the extraordinary, even "monstrous", talent described above—in both subject matter and language—will remain diminished.

1. A casteist mentality means treating a deed as good simply because someone of one's own inherited caste did it; anyone may have such a mentality.

Pseudo-standardisation: the result of promoting the ideas of a particular casteist school; CIIL has published a book or two in Maithili, while its standardisation project has continued for years without producing a result.

Genuine standardisation: standard Maithili developed through intensive discussion of the Maithili spoken by people of all castes in every region of Mithila. Examples appear in the writings of Bechan Thakur, Jagdish Prasad Mandal and others at https://sites.google.com/a/videha.com/videha-pothi/. Fieldwork is available at https://sites.google.com/a/videha.com/videha-audio/: forty-six audio files on rites, folk songs and customary songs from all castes and religions of Mithila, courtesy of Umesh Mandal; and at https://sites.google.com/a/videha.com/videha-video/.

The video collection contains forty-four files on rites, folk songs and customary songs from all castes and religions of Mithila (courtesy of Umesh Mandal), while a synthesis based on the views of 2,000 readers is available at http://www.videha.co.in/new_page_13.htm. The audio and video files constitute a final blow to the supposedly separate Maithili termed "शोल्कन्हक" that, in my view, was propagated or invented in Mahendra Malangia's Kāṭhak Lok and Okar Āṅgank Bārahmāsā.

"Monstrous talent": on one side stands the unread world of Brahminical Maithili writers, and on the other the widely read world of Jagdish Prasad Mandal, Rajdev Mandal and Bechan Thakur. Brahminical Maithili writers might call the latter "monstrous talent" in a disparaging sense; in my view, it signals the beginning of the former's defeat.

2. Dhanakarji held the opinion—indeed, made the decision—that "रामनाथहुँ" should be used instead of "रामनाथोक"! The complete debate between Umesh Mandal and Dhanakar Thakur appeared in the editorial of the eighty-fourth issue of Videha.

3. The new issue of Videha contains Jagdish Prasad Mandal's long story Shambhudas. Consider its second paragraph:
"जहिना बाध-बोनक ओहन परती जइपर कहियो हर-कोदारि नै चलल सुखि-सुखि गाछ-विरिछ खसि उसर भऽ जाइत, ओइ परतीपर या तँ चिड़ै-चुनमुनीक माध्यमसँ वा हवा-पानिक माध्यमसँ अनेरूआ फूल-फड़क गाछ जनमि रौद-वसात, पानि-पाथर, अन्हर-विहाड़ि सहि अपन जुआनी पाबि छाती खोलि बाट-बटोहीकेँ अपन मीठ सुआदसँ तृप्ति करैत तहिना जमुना नदीक तटपर शंभूदासक जन्म बटाइ-किसान परिवारमे भेलनि।"
Just as a patch of uncultivated land amid fields and woodland, untouched by plough or hoe, becomes barren when its trees dry up and fall, yet later gives birth to wild flowering and fruiting trees through birds or wind and water, trees that endure sun, rain, water, stones and storm, reach maturity and offer their sweet fruit to passers-by, so Shambhudas was born into a sharecropping family on the bank of the Jamuna River.

Is it necessary here to insert "अछि" after "जाइत" and "करैत"?

4. A few reflections: four commentaries in this context on news, events and publications concerning Maithili.

The initial effort of CIIL's translation mission consists of workshops of writers belonging to the unread world of Maithili literature. It is concerned neither with readers nor with the literature of writers who are genuinely read. Its outcome will therefore be the same as that of the Sahitya Akademi. Amarji writes that books published by the Sahitya Akademi are rotting in warehouses.

32. The Place of Maithili in the Indo-European Language Family

Abstract

The genealogical classification of languages rests on historical foundations: the history of a language, its descent from another language, its form and structure—in other words, its grammatical organisation—and its semantic elements are all considered. Just as a person or group imagines an ancestral founder and constructs a family tree from that person to the present, the historian of language proposes earlier and ancestral languages on the basis of ancient, medieval and modern periods.

Keywords: Indo-European · language family · place of Maithili · critical theory · Maithili

The genealogical classification of languages rests on historical foundations: the history of a language, its descent from another language, its form and structure—in other words, its grammatical organisation—and its semantic elements are all considered. Just as a person or group imagines an ancestral founder and constructs a family tree from that person to the present, the historian of language proposes earlier and ancestral languages on the basis of ancient, medieval and modern periods. The concepts of daughter languages and sister languages likewise arise in the history of language.

The Place of Maithili in the Indo-European Language Family

Languages are related to one another through geography, vocabulary, grammar and sound. There are, however, exceptions. Avestan, English and German, though geographically distant from Maithili, belong to the same family, whereas Arabic and Tamil, despite their relative geographical proximity, belong to different families.

Nor can we demonstrate that two languages belong to the same family merely because they contain borrowed foreign vocabulary. Similarity in the meanings of lexical roots or in sound also cannot place two language families in a single group—for example, Sanskrit jālma and Arabic ẓālim exhibit a lexical resemblance, while the Maithili miyāũ and Mandarin Chinese miāo (“cat”) show a resemblance in sound.

Phonetic resemblance, too, can be misleading. For instance, Maithili frequently uses ड़, ढ़ and the candrabindu, whereas these three sounds do not occur in Sanskrit.

Even on geographical grounds, the designation “Indo-European language” is not entirely appropriate, for the Indo-European family is not present throughout India and other language families also exist there. In Europe as well, the Caucasian and other language families do not belong to the Indo-European family.

Similarity of grammar offers the strongest basis for placing two languages within one family.

Indo-European languages originally make extensive use of suffixes: words are formed by adding suffixes to roots. They have three grammatical genders—masculine, feminine and neuter—and three numbers—singular, dual and plural. Most languages now have only singular and plural. Indo-European languages also possess two categories of verbal form: ātmanepada, in which the result of an action accrues to the agent, and parasmaipada, in which it accrues to someone else. Compounding, broadly speaking, is another characteristic of Indo-European languages.

The Indo-European family has two divisions. The original Indo-European word for a hundred, "क्मतोम", is pronounced in two ways: Sanskrit śatam and Latin centum. On this basis, the group close to Sanskrit includes Avestan (both the name of a language and of a text; the Zend-Avesta is its commentary), Persian, Maithili, Russian and others. The centum group includes languages close to Latin, such as Greek, German, French and Italian.

The śatam group includes Indo-Iranian (or Indo-Aryan), Balto-Slavic, Armenian and Illyrian language groups.

The Rigveda is the earliest text within the Indo-Aryan or Indo-Iranian language group. The Avesta, the sacred text of Zoroastrianism dating from the Vedic period, is written in Avestan. The chief Iranian languages include Avestan, Old Persian, Pahlavi, Pashto, Balochi and Kurdish. The Indian Aryan group includes Vedic Sanskrit, Classical Sanskrit, Pali (early Prakrit, from 500 BCE to 100 BCE), Prakrit (Middle Prakrit, from 100 BCE to 500 CE), Apabhraṃśa (500–900 CE), Avahaṭṭa (900–1100 CE), and thereafter Maithili, Bengali, Odia, Assamese and other languages derived from Māgadhī Prakrit (from 1100 CE).

Genealogical Classification of the World's Languages

(a) Eurasia; (b) Africa; (c) the Pacific region; (d) the Americas.

(a) Eurasia: (i) Indo-European, (ii) Dravidian, (iii) Burushaski, (iv) Caucasian, (v) Ural-Altaic, (vi) Chinese, (vii) Japanese-Korean, (viii) Hyperborean, (ix) Basque and (x) Semitic-Hamitic—the latter also occurring in Africa.

(i) Indo-European: (1) Indo-Aryan, (2) Balto-Slavic, (3) Armenian, (4) Illyrian, (5) Greek, (6) Celtic, (7) Germanic, (8) Italic, (9) Hittite and (10) Tocharian.

(1) Indo-Aryan: (a) Indian Aryan languages and (b) Iranian.

(a) Indian Aryan Languages

(A) Ancient Indian Aryan languages (2500–500 BCE).

(B) Medieval Indian Aryan languages (500 BCE–1000 CE).

(C) Modern Indian Aryan languages (1000 CE to the present).

(A) Ancient Indian Aryan languages (2500–500 BCE): Vedic Sanskrit and Classical Sanskrit (Valmiki's "मानुषिमिह संस्कृताम्"—both Sanskrit and the language of human beings).

(B) Medieval Indian Aryan languages (500 BCE–1000 CE): first Prakrit (Pali); second Prakrit (literary Prakrit—Śaurasenī, Mahārāṣṭrī, Māgadhī, Ardhamāgadhī, Paiśācī, Brācaḍa and Khas); third Prakrit (Apabhraṃśa, first mentioned by Vyāḍi and Patañjali).

(C) Modern Indian Aryan languages (1000 CE to the present): (a) from Śaurasenī: Kharī Bolī, Brajbhāṣā, Bāṅgarū, Kannaujī, Bundelī, Mārwāṛī, Jaipurī, Mālvī, Mewātī and Gujarātī; (b) from Mahārāṣṭrī: Marāṭhī, Konkani, Nāgpurī and Barārī; (c) from Māgadhī: Bhojpurī, Magahī, Bengali, Odia, Assamese and Maithili; (d) from Ardhamāgadhī: Avadhī, Baghelī and Chhattīsgaṛhī; (e) from Paiśācī: Lahndā; (f) from Brācaḍa: Sindhī and Panjābī; and (g) from Khas: the Pahari languages. These lines of development are thus traced.

In the Sundarakāṇḍa, Vālmīki has Hanuman speak of his knowledge of both Sanskrit and the human language through the expression "मानुषिमिह संस्कृताम्." Jyotirishwar asks, "And what kind of bard is he? One who knows the essential character of all six languages—Sanskrit, Prakrit, Avahaṭṭa, Paiśācī, Śaurasenī and Māgadhī." Jyotirishwar also discusses seven "sub-languages." Prakrit had several forms, of which Māgadhī Prakrit contributed to the development of Maithili and the other languages of eastern India. Jain religious texts were written in Ardhamāgadhī, and Buddhist religious texts in Pali. In Kālidāsa's Sanskrit plays, Apabhraṃśa, besides Sanskrit, was employed for characters outside the elite, while the language of the Caryāpada was also an Apabhraṃśa mixed with Māgadhī. The other modern Indo-Aryan languages, including Maithili, also appear to have developed from the second Prakrit. In a later period, Apabhraṃśa took the form of Avahaṭṭa in eastern India. Features characteristic of Maithili—its words ending in vowels, its complex verbal forms without distinctions of gender, and the outlines of its pronominal and genitive forms—had already begun to appear in Avahaṭṭa. This is why Avahaṭṭa (Avahaṭṭha) is called "Maithil Apabhraṃśa" in the historical classification of language families, and its development from Māgadhī Prakrit can also be observed. Although close to Maithili, Avahaṭṭa is also close to Śaurasenī Prakrit and Apabhraṃśa; nevertheless, through its use of indigenous words it displays many grammatical changes from Apabhraṃśa. Vidyapati's Kīrtilatā is in Avahaṭṭa, whereas the Caryā songs and Varṇaratnākara, though earlier than Kīrtilatā, are in Old Maithili and are also close to Avahaṭṭa. Dāmodara Paṇḍit's Ukti-Vyakti-Prakaraṇa likewise precedes Kīrtilatā, but represents Old Awadhi and Old Kosali and is close to Avahaṭṭa. Broadly speaking, Maithili's position within the Indo-European language family emerges through the historical sequence Sanskrit, Pali, Prakrit, Apabhraṃśa and Avahaṭṭa.

At the origin of Maithili—or of any language—we must establish the emergence of sounds from the human mouth and the association of those sounds with objects, persons or ideas. Birds, small creatures, cattle and even a person unable to speak can produce sounds; but those sounds do not acquire such meanings and therefore do not constitute a language.

In Paris in 1866, the organisation called "La Société de Linguistique" excluded "the origin of language and the formation of the languages of the world" from the business of its governing body, because discussion of the subject, being based on conjecture, was considered remote from a scientific approach.

A sequence can be traced from Vedic Sanskrit to Classical Sanskrit, and thence to Pali, Prakrit, Apabhraṃśa, Avahaṭṭa and Maithili. But Vedic Sanskrit must have existed before the Rigveda, its oldest surviving text. Much oral literature—gāthās, nārāśaṃsīs, tales of deities and narratives—may have been composed in it. For singers of such gāthās, the Rigveda uses words such as "gāthin," "gātuvid" and "gāthapati." Whether Vedic Sanskrit came into existence by divine agency, or arose in order to extend communication beyond bodily and verbal signs, remains a matter of conjecture. Changes in speech sounds, words, grammatical units, sentences and meanings led from Vedic to Classical Sanskrit, and subsequently to Pali, Prakrit, Apabhraṃśa, Avahaṭṭa and Maithili. By incorporating vocabulary from different regions of India, Pāṇini enriched Classical Sanskrit to such an extent that numerous linguistic forms could emerge from it. Regional varieties of Prakrit and Apabhraṃśa arose across these geographical areas, and from them developed the modern Indo-Aryan languages of today.

Maithili belongs to the Indo-European language family. Approximately forty per cent of the world's population falls within this family. It is the largest language family, and the richest as well. Broadly, it has two divisions: first, the Aryan languages of Europe; and second, the Indo-Iranian branch. The Indo-Iranian Aryan languages include Iranian, Dardic and Indo-Aryan. Dardic includes Kashmiri and the languages to the east and south of the Pamir plateau. The origin and development of Maithili must be sought within Indo-Aryan.

The origin of language is itself a matter of conjecture. Many years pass between a language's beginning, its use, and the composition of literature in it; only then does its form become stable. The earliest text of Vedic Sanskrit is the Rigveda; of Classical Sanskrit, Vālmīki's Rāmāyaṇa; of Pali, the Buddhist Tripiṭaka; of Prakrit, Vimalasūri's Paumacariu; and of Apabhraṃśa, Yogīndra's Paramātmaprakāśa. Early Maithili literature includes Siddha literature, Buddhist songs and Jyotirishwar's Varṇaratnākara. The Siddha Saraha (Sarhapāda), dated 700–780, wrote: "सिद्धिरत्थु मइ पढमे पढिअउ, मण्ड पिबन्तौ बिसरउ एमइउ." In Mithila, the beginning of learning the alphabet is marked by "siddhirastu" (drawing the hook of Gaṇeśa). There is a belief in Mithila that drinking the starchy water from boiled rice weakens memory. Another example reads: "बलद बियायल गबैया बाँझे"—the bull has calved and the cow is barren.

Medieval Maithili literature includes Vidyapati's Maithili writings and, after him, the works of Chatur Chaturbhuj, Śaṅkaradeva and various Malla kings, the kīrtaniyā and aṅkiyā plays, and works down to Manbodh. Modern Maithili literature begins with Chanda Jha.

The geographical domain of the Aryan languages in ancient India, and their subsequent spread into other regions, can be determined from the rivers described in the Rigveda, the oldest text of Vedic Sanskrit. The Rigvedic Aryans inhabited the region called "Sapta Sindhava," the land of seven rivers: Vitastā, Aśkinī, Paruṣṇī, Śatudru, Vipāśā, Krumu and Gomatī. The first five flowed in Punjab and the remaining two in Afghanistan. All seven were tributaries of the Sindhu, the most important river of the Rigvedic period. The Sarasvatī is described in the Rigveda as the "mother of rivers." The Yamunā is mentioned twice and the Gaṅgā once. The hymn of praise to rivers in the Rigveda's tenth maṇḍala praises the Sindhu and the Sapta-Saindhava region. Five peoples lived then, known as the Pūru, Anu, Druhyu, Yadu and Turvaśa. The Krivi and Tṛtsu were also present. The Pūru and the most powerful Bharata tribe later joined to form the Kuru tribe. In the Battle of the Ten Kings, the Bharata tribe defeated a confederation of five Aryan and five non-Aryan tribes. Vasiṣṭha was priest to the Bharatas; Viśvāmitra served the confederation of the five Aryan and five non-Aryan (dasyu) tribes. The fourteenth-century BCE inscription of a Hittite ruler at Boğazköy in Asia Minor mentions kings such as Indra, Daśaratha and Artatama, and deities including Indra, Varuṇa and the Nāsatyas. The Vajasaneyi recension of the Yajurveda, the Kauthuma recension of the Sāmaveda, and the Chāndogya Āraṇyaka and Upaniṣad of the Sāmaveda underlie the vertical division of Mithila's Brahmins into Vajasaneyi and Chāndogya traditions, which continues to this day. Videha is mentioned in the Yajurveda, and a Vedic Janaka in the Rigveda (Sīradhvaja Janaka, Sītā's father, came later).

The "king of Videha" in the Rigvedic period was Nami Sāpya. The Rigveda relates that, while performing a sacrifice, he ascended bodily to heaven. He sided with Indra against the asura Namuci, and Indra saved him. Videgha Māthava of the Śatapatha Brāhmaṇa and Nimi of the Purāṇas both have Gautama as their priest; therefore they are the same person, and the kingdom of Videha begins here. Māthava's priest Gautama introduced the Mitravinda sacrifice, and it was re-established by Yājñavalkya in the time of Mahājanaka II. Near Gautama's hermitage, Nimi founded Jayanta and Mithi—also remembered as Mithilā—built the city of Mithila. Nimi's Jayantapura was at present-day Janakpur; the site of Mithi's city of Mithila has not yet been established, though it is presumed to have been near Janakpur. Sīradhvaja Janaka was Sītā's father, and from this point a strong tradition of the kings of Mithila becomes visible. Kṛti Janaka was in the eighteenth generation after Sīradhvaja. Kṛti was the son of Hiraṇyanābha, while Janaka was the son of Bahulāśva. Yājñavalkya was Hiraṇyanābha's pupil and received instruction in yoga from him. Karāla Janaka attempted to violate a Brahmin maiden's chastity, and the Janaka dynasty came to an end (see Aśvaghoṣa's Buddhacarita and Kauṭilya's Arthaśāstra). The Arthaśāstra also discusses the downfall of Karāla Janaka (Book I, Chapter 6, on mastery of the senses and abandonment of the six enemies):
"तद्विरुद्धवृत्तिरवश्येन्द्रियश्चातुरन्तोऽपि राजा सद्यो विनश्यति—यथा दाण्डक्यो नाम भोजः कामाद् ब्राह्मण कन्यायमभिमन्यमानः सबन्धराष्ट्रो विननाश करालश्च वैदेहः, ..."

In the period of Vedic Sanskrit, the Aryans had moved from Sapta Sindhava to Videha. They had already come into contact with the non-Aryans (dasyus), and words were exchanged between their languages. This exchange is visible in the Yajurveda and later in the Atharvaveda. The speech of both the non-Aryans (dasyus) and the vrātyas (groups that had become Aryan from a non-Aryan background) mingled with that of the Aryans of the Sapta-Saindhava region. With the arrival of eastern and other regional influences, Vedic Sanskrit changed into Classical Sanskrit. By the time of the Nirukta, Vedic vocabulary had already become difficult and debate about its derivations had begun. Pāṇini's language was formed by absorbing words from the dasyu and vrātya languages of the eastern, southern, western and northern regions. This refined language subsequently became known among people as Sanskrit. Just as Pāṇini called Classical Sanskrit "bhāṣā," so Yāska and Pāṇini called Vedic Sanskrit "chandas." It is this "chandas" that was called "Zend" in the commentary on the Avestan language.

Sanskrit, Prakrit, Avahaṭṭa, Maithili

1. Sanskrit

Apart from differences of script, the languages of northern India, Nepal and southern India (except Tamil) use a comparable alphabetic arrangement of vowels and the consonant series ka, ca, ṭa, ta, pa, followed by ya, ra, la, va, śa, sa and ha. Sanskrit also possesses an additional sound, gvāṅ, which is not pronounced in the Chāndogya tradition but is extensively used in the Vājasaneyī tradition: for example, Chāndogya "सभूमि" as against Vājasaneyī "सभूमीग्वंङ." Both short and long forms occur. In Mithilākṣara, at least six forms of a character are used for siddhirastu. Vedic Sanskrit uses the udātta, anudātta and svarita accents (respectively क॑, क॒ and क॑े); Marathi also uses ळ and the half-ऱ. In Maithili, the sign ऽ (avagraha, or bikārī) is used as in Sanskrit. Nowadays, to suit the available typing facilities, forms such as द' are also used instead of दऽ; this practice, however, indicates a technical deficiency in that font. The sign is not necessary after the long ā.

Just as Persian has alif, be, se and Roman letters are called A, B, C, the alphabets of Indian languages are broadly similar despite differences in their scripts.

The sounds of the alphabet are of two kinds, vowels and consonants. There are sixty-four sounds: twenty-two vowels and forty-two consonants.

A vowel is defined as a sound whose pronunciation does not depend upon the pronunciation of another sound.

Vowels are of three kinds: short (hrasva), long (dīrgha) and protracted (pluta). A short vowel takes one unit of time to pronounce, a long vowel two and a protracted vowel three.

The basic vowels are अ इ उ ऋ ऌ.

Grammarians before Pāṇini called them samānākṣara.

The long compound vowels are ए ऐ ओ औ.

Grammarians before Pāṇini called them sandhyakṣara.

The vowel ऌ has no long form, while the compound vowels have no short forms.

The short, long (आ, ई, ऊ, ॠ) and protracted (आ३, ई३, ऊ३, ॠ३) forms of अ, इ, उ and ऋ amount to twelve sounds. ऌ has two forms, short and protracted (ऌ३), adding two; and the four long compound vowels ए, ऐ, ओ and औ also have protracted forms (ए३, ऐ३, ओ३, औ३), adding eight. Thus there are twenty-two vowels in all.

Each of these twenty-two vowels has three Vedic accentual forms: udātta, anudātta and svarita.

Sounds such as अ, produced at a higher point—for example, the palate—possess the quality of udātta and are therefore called udātta.

Vowels produced at a lower point are anudātta. A vowel such as अ, whose first portion is pronounced with udātta and whose second with anudātta, is svarita.

Vowels have two further varieties: nasalised, such as अँ, and non-nasalised, such as अ.

"दत्तेन निर्वृत्तः कूपो दात्तः": a well built by a man named Datta on the northern bank of the Vipāṭ or Vyāsa river was called Dātta. With the affix añ, dātta bears the initial udātta; with the affix aṇ, the accent would fall on the suffix and the final syllable would be udātta. The form remains the same, but the accent differs. This establishes that even ordinary cultivators pronounced words with tonal accents.

Another way to understand svarita is as a repetition of the final vowel at a more intense pitch.

We now turn to consonants.

There are forty-two consonants:

क् ख् ग् घ् ङ्
च् छ् ज् झ् ञ्
ट् ठ् ड् ढ् ण्
त् थ् द् ध् न्
प् फ् ब् भ् म्
य् र् ल् व्
श् ष् स्
ह्

The sounds य्, व् and ल् may also be nasalised (यँ, वँ, लँ) or non-nasalised.

There are two further consonantal sounds: anusvāra and visarjanīya or visarga.

Both are employed after vowels.

Visarjanīya is not a basic sound but a modification of स् or र्. According to certain phonetic and formal distinctions, it has two kinds, jihvāmūlīya and upadhmānīya. The first occurs only before क and ख, and the second only before प and फ.

Anusvāra, visarjanīya, jihvāmūlīya and upadhmānīya are called ayogavāha.

Apart from the sounds above, four further sounds are known as yama: कुँ खुँ गुँ घुँ (as in the forms पलिक् क्नी, चख ख्नुतः, अग् ग्निः and घ् घ्नन्ति).

A yama is an intervening sound resembling the preceding sound when the fifth consonant of a series follows it.
The yama sounds are also ayogavāha.
अ and आ, the ka group, uncombined ह्, and visarjanīya are pronounced in the throat.
इ and ई, the ca group, य and श are pronounced at the palate.
ऋ and ॠ, the ṭa group, र and ष are pronounced at the cerebral or retroflex point.
ऌ, the ta group, ल and स are pronounced at the teeth.
उ and ऊ, the pa group and upadhmānīya are pronounced at the lips.
व is pronounced with the lower lip assisted by the upper teeth.
ए and ऐ are pronounced at the throat and palate.
ओ and औ are pronounced at the throat and lips.
In pronouncing य, र, ल and व, the tip and other parts of the tongue do not make complete contact with the palate and other places of articulation as they do with other consonants. Nor do they produce friction against the palate and other articulatory points as श्, ष्, स् and ह् do.
The letters from क to म are stops or plosives: the air stream is obstructed by the tongue and then released. The sounds from र to व are semivowels, and those from ष to ह are fricatives.
The fifth sound in each consonantal group is nasal, because although its other articulatory positions remain the same, it is pronounced through the nose as well: air passes through both nose and mouth.
Anusvāra and yama are pronounced only through the nose and are called nāsikya, because the mouth remains closed while air escapes through the nose. One must not pronounce न् or म् in place of anusvāra.
When we wish to speak, intention stimulates the jaṭharāgni, the internal fire. Air near the navel rises forcefully towards the head, is obstructed by the tip and other parts of the tongue, and then rubs against the palate and other parts of the mouth, producing speech sounds. Vibrating air acquires resonance; when it reaches the mouth with this resonance, the sound is ghoṣavān (voiced). When it passes without resonance as breath, it is aghoṣavān (voiceless).
Sounds characterised by breath are aghoṣa, while those characterised by resonance are ghoṣavān. Sounds produced with less breath are alpaprāṇa (unaspirated); those produced with a greater outflow of breath are mahāprāṇa (aspirated).
In each of the ka, ca, ṭa, ta and pa series, the first, third and fifth sounds are alpaprāṇa, while the second and fourth are mahāprāṇa. The first and second are aghoṣa, while the third, fourth and fifth are ghoṣavān. The sounds य, र, ल and व are voiced and unaspirated; श, ष and स are voiceless and aspirated; ह is voiced and aspirated. Vowels are unaspirated and may bear udātta, anudātta or svarita accent.

A composition governed by metre is called verse; otherwise it is prose. Chandas, or metre, denotes a composition that gives pleasure. This does not mean, however, that modern new poetry belongs to the category of prose. Even the Sāvitrī-Gāyatrī mantra of the Vedas is classified under Gāyatrī metre according to more flexible or liberal rules. These will be discussed below: where the required syllables are lacking, one or two syllables may be added to each pāda, and conjuncts containing य and व may be separated by inserting इ and उ respectively. Thus वरेण्यम् becomes वरेणियम्.

स्वः = सुवः.

For contemporary new poetry, including haiku, kṣaṇikā and haikū, Maithili and the Indian script system derived from Sanskrit are particularly suitable. Except Tamil, all the southern scripts and the scripts of northern, western and eastern India, including Devanagari, share the same arrangement of vowels and the ka, ca, ṭa, ta, pa consonants, in which what is written is what is pronounced. The short इ in Devanagari, however, is an exception: it is written before the consonant but pronounced after it. In Maithili, even this exception does not arise. Thus "अछि" is pronounced as अ + short इ + छ, or अ + इ + छ. Take another example: "राति"—रा + इ + त. This establishes Maithili as the best language for haiku. Consider another example. Sandhi is a characteristic of Sanskrit; but is there no sandhi in English? What, then, is "आइम गोइङ टूवाड्र्सदएन्ड"? It is written "आइ एम गोइङ टूवाड्र्स द एन्ड" ("I am going towards the end"). Pāṇini formulated rules of sandhi on phonetic principles. In written English, however, sandhi is not observed in this way: "I am" may be written phonetically as "I'm," but the joining of sounds takes place in speech. In Maithili, too, case markers are, wherever possible, written and pronounced attached to the word.

Metres are of two kinds: quantitative metres, based on mātrās, and syllabic metres, based on varṇas.

The Vedas employ syllabic metres rather than quantitative metres.

In syllabic metres, only the number of sounds or syllables is counted. A letter bearing a halant is not counted separately. A syllable bearing the signs of ए, उ and similar vowels is counted as one, as is a conjunct consonant. The letters from अ to ह are also each counted as one. No letter or syllable receives a value greater than one. Remember three points in particular:

1. A letter bearing a halant: 0.

2. A conjunct letter: 1.

3. Each letter from अ to ह: 1.

Consider the first example:

ई अरदराक मेघ नहि मानत रहत बरसि के = १+५ +२+२+३+३+३+१ = २०.

Now consider the second example:

पश्चात् = २.

Now the third example:

आब = २.

Now the fourth example:

स्क्रिप्ट = २.

There are seven principal Vedic metres:

Gāyatrī, Uṣṇik, Anuṣṭubh, Bṛhatī, Paṅkti, Triṣṭubh and Jagatī. All the others are their variations, including atichandas and vichandas. Here, metre is identified through syllables. Where the syllabic count falls short, one or two syllables may be added to each pāda. Conjuncts containing य and व may be separated by inserting इ and उ respectively. For example:

वरेण्यम् = वरेणियम्.

स्वः = सुवः.

The syllabic count can also be completed by separating the sounds involved in guṇa and vṛddhi.

ए = अ + इ.

ओ = अ + उ.

ऐ = अ/आ + ए.

औ = अ/आ + ओ.

Consider the categories guru and laghu used in the science of prosody.

Among the thirteen vowel signs, five—अ, इ, उ, ऋ and ऌ—are short, while eight—आ, ई, ऊ, ॠ, ए, ऐ, ओ and औ—are long.

When these vowel sounds are joined to consonants, they form guṇitākṣara, or modified syllabic characters.

क् + अ = क.

क् + आ = का.

One vowel or one guṇitākṣara is called a syllable (akṣara). A bare consonant is not regarded as a syllable; thus the word "अवाक्" contains two syllables, अ and वा.

1. All short vowels and modified syllables containing a short vowel are regarded as laghu (light). They are marked with a U placed above them.

2. All long vowels and modified syllables containing a long vowel are regarded as guru (heavy). Their sign is a short horizontal stroke placed above.

3. All syllables bearing anusvāra or visarga are regarded as guru.

4. When a syllable is followed by a conjunct consonant or a bare consonant, that syllable is regarded as guru. For example, in "अच्" and "सत्य," both अ and स are guru.

5. Just as syllabic metres or vṛttas were employed in the Vedas, so too—

A comprehensive consideration of vocal accent is also found from that period. Broadly, it is divided into seven types: (1) udātta, (2) udāttatara, (3) anudātta, (4) anudāttatara, (5) svarita, (6) anudāttānurakta-svarita, and (7) pracaya (a heard, unstruck sound—anāhata nāda—arising without contact with any object; the others are struck sounds, āhata nāda, produced when objects strike one another).

Vedic Recitation

3. Jagatī: four pādas of twelve syllables each.

ए = अ + इ.

ओ = अ + उ.

ऐ = अ/आ + ए.

औ = अ/आ + ओ.

The Grammar of Vedic Sanskrit (Chandas) and Classical Sanskrit (Bhāṣā)

In both Vedic and Classical Sanskrit, nouns, pronouns and adjectives have three grammatical genders—masculine, feminine and neuter—and three numbers—singular, dual and plural. The grammatical genders do not necessarily indicate biological sex: dārā is masculine, kalatra neuter and bhāryā feminine, although all three signify a wife. Likewise, īśvaraḥ is masculine, brahma neuter and citiḥ feminine. Nouns, pronouns and adjectives also have eight cases (vibhaktis). Verbal roots are divided into ten classes and have three types of forms: parasmaipada (the result accrues to another), ātmanepada (the result accrues to oneself) and ubhayapada (both). There are three voices or modes of expression—kartṛ, karma and bhāva—and twelve lakāras: laṭ, liṭ, laṅ, luṅ, luṭ, lṛṭ, loṭ, vidhiliṅ, āśīrliṅ, lṛṅ, leṭ and leṅ. The last two, leṭ and leṅ, do not occur in Classical Sanskrit (bhāṣā).

Sanskrit distinguishes three grammatical persons: prathama (corresponding to the third person in other languages), madhyama (second person) and uttama (first person). There is mutual agreement of grammatical features between subject and predicate, agent and verb, the qualified noun and its qualifier, and noun and pronoun.

Vedic Sanskrit possessed both melodic and stress accents, whereas Classical Sanskrit retained only stress accent. The Vedic pronunciation of udātta, anudātta and svarita (compare the ascending, descending and level movements of musical theory) disappeared from Classical pronunciation.

In Vedic metres, the syllables are counted within each quarter-verse, called a pāda. Metre also has gati (rhythmic movement) and yati (pause). A short vowel is laghu; when followed by a conjunct consonant, a short vowel becomes guru.

Prefixes: In Classical Sanskrit, a prefix stands before the verb. In Vedic Sanskrit it may stand before the verb, after it, separately, or even at some distance. Moreover, once a prefix has been used with a verb in a Vedic mantra, the prefix alone may appear later in the mantra while still referring to that prefixed verb.

Compounds: Vedic Sanskrit sometimes differs in its treatment of compounds. For example, when a word follows aṣṭa, the form becomes aṣṭā, as in aṣṭāpadī. In a copulative compound of pitṛ and mātṛ, both take long आ and undergo guṇa: pitarāmātarā.

The leṭ lakāra: The leṭ form is not used in Classical Sanskrit but is found in Vedic Sanskrit, as in bhavāti and patāti, corresponding to the Classical bhavati and patati.

Vedic and Classical Sanskrit are not two different languages; rather, Classical Sanskrit is a simpler form of Vedic Sanskrit. Vedic Sanskrit has a wider range of forms and features than Classical Sanskrit (with the exception that the luṭ and lṛṭ forms are used less frequently in Vedic Sanskrit).

The language of the Saṃhitās, Brāhmaṇa texts, Āraṇyakas and Upaniṣads is called Vedic Sanskrit; the Sanskrit of subsequent periods is called Classical Sanskrit.

In both forms of Sanskrit, verbal roots, words and meanings are generally the same.

Both have three genders, three numbers and three grammatical persons.

In both, almost all words are derived from roots; conventional, non-derivable words are very few.

Compounds occur in both, though they are employed more extensively in Classical Sanskrit.

The metres in both are also broadly alike.

The division of verbal roots into classes is likewise the same in both.

The ṇic and san suffixes are found in both.

Words are formed in the same way in both.

The sup, tiṅ, kṛt and taddhita forms and affixes are alike in both.

In neither form does a change in word order necessarily alter the meaning. Both possess sandhi, case relations and inflectional endings.

But there are differences:

Classical Sanskrit does not use the upadhmānīya and jihvāmūlīya sounds, employing visarga in their place.

Vedic Sanskrit has the sounds ळ and ळ्ह, which Classical Sanskrit lacks.

In Vedic Sanskrit, ड between two vowels becomes ळ and ढ becomes ळ्ह. This does not occur in Classical Sanskrit.

The short and long forms of gvāṅ are absent from Classical Sanskrit. In the Yajurveda, anusvāra before ह, श, ष, स or र becomes gvāṅ.

The udātta, anudātta and svarita accents are not distinctly pronounced in Classical Sanskrit.

The leṭ lakāra is used in Vedic Sanskrit but not in Classical Sanskrit.

In Vedic Sanskrit a prefix may be separated from the root, whereas in Classical Sanskrit it occurs together with it.

Vedic Sanskrit employs some fifteen kṛt affixes in the domain of tumun, including se, sen, ase and adhyai, whereas Classical Sanskrit employs only the tum affix.

The rules of sandhi are flexible in Vedic Sanskrit but strict in Classical Sanskrit.

The meanings of numerous Vedic words changed in Classical Sanskrit. Thus asura meant a powerful being in Vedic Sanskrit, but came to signify a demon in Classical Sanskrit.

The verbal forms also differ in Vedic Sanskrit; a final vowel may be lengthened, as in चक्र—चक्रा. Reduplication may be absent, as when दाति occurs in place of ददाति. Sometimes an ātmanepada root is used in place of a parasmaipada root, or the reverse; and an infix (vikaraṇa) associated with another verbal class may sometimes occur in place of śap.

Vedic Sanskrit has a greater variety of nominal forms, verbal forms and affixes.

The optional variations of tense, person, number and gender in Vedic Sanskrit have largely disappeared from Classical Sanskrit.

Vedic roots such as अच्, अम्, जिन्व् and पिन्व् are not used in Classical Sanskrit.

The comparative and superlative suffixes tara and tama are used in Vedic Sanskrit in a manner resembling nouns, but in Classical Sanskrit in a manner resembling adjectives.

For metrical purposes, Vedic Sanskrit may write स्वर् as सुवर्, and दर्शत as दरशत. This practice is not found in Classical Sanskrit.

In Vedic Sanskrit, when a word ends in "आन्" and is followed by the vowels अ, इ or उ, न् disappears and anusvāra appears after long आ. Thus महान् इन्द्रः = महा इन्द्रः. This does not occur in Classical Sanskrit.

Vedic Sanskrit: Verbal Forms

For the second-person plural parasmaipada in the laṭ lakāra, four endings occur: थ, त, थन and तन. Thus from वद् come वदथ, वदथन, वदत and वदतन.

For the first-person plural parasmaipada in the laṭ lakāra, two endings are used: मस् (मः) and मसि. Thus नाशयामः—नाशयामसि; इमः—इमसि; स्मः—स्मसि.

In the second-person singular parasmaipada of the loṭ lakāra, there are two endings, हि and धि, as in श्रुणुहि and श्रुणुधि.

In the second-person plural ātmanepada of the loṭ lakāra, two endings occur, ध्वम् and ध्वात्, as in वारयध्वम् and वारयध्वात्.

"छन्दसि लुङ् लङ् लिटः": In Vedic Sanskrit, luṅ, laṅ and liṭ forms may be employed with the meanings of loṭ and laṭ. For example, आगमत् (Vedic luṅ) = आगच्छतु (loṭ); अवृणीत (Vedic laṅ) = वृणीते (laṭ); and ममार (Vedic liṭ) = म्रियते (laṭ).

Vedic Sanskrit: Nominal Forms

[In संस्कृत, सं = स् + म is correct; pronouncing सं as स् + न is incorrect.]

Vedic Sanskrit has a greater variety of nominal forms than Classical Sanskrit. For example, with the masculine a-stem देवः, the nominative, accusative and vocative dual may be either देवा or देवौ in Vedic Sanskrit, but only देवौ in Classical Sanskrit. In the nominative and vocative plural, Vedic Sanskrit has देवासः and देवाः, whereas Classical Sanskrit has only देवाः. In the instrumental singular, Vedic Sanskrit has both देवा and देवेन, but Classical Sanskrit only देवेन. In the instrumental plural, Vedic Sanskrit has देवेभिः and देवैः, but Classical Sanskrit has देवैः.

Similarly, the masculine and feminine forms of words ending in ऋ are generally the same in Vedic and Classical Sanskrit, except that in the nominative, accusative and vocative dual two forms occur. Thus दातृः दातारा and दातारौ; पितृः पितरा and पितरौ; मातृः मातरा and मातरौ.

अस्मद्: nominative dual—Vedic वाम्, आवम्; Classical आवाम्. Dative singular—Vedic मह्य, मह्यम्; Classical मह्यम्. Ablative dual—Vedic आवत्, आवाभ्याम्; Classical आवाभ्याम्. Locative plural—Vedic अस्मे, अस्मासु; Classical अस्मासु.

Metre

In the eight chapters of the prosodic treatise of Piṅgala, Vedic metres are described up to the seventh sūtra of the fourth chapter; the subsequent portion describes Classical metres.

Vedic metres count syllables; there the distinction between laghu and guru is not considered. In the Rigveda, Triṣṭubh is used most frequently, followed by Gāyatrī and then Jagatī.

Triṣṭubh: forty-four syllables, arranged in four pādas of eleven syllables each.

Gāyatrī: twenty-four syllables. It may consist of two, three, four or five pādas. The most popular form has three pādas of eight syllables each, with a pause after the second pāda. The form with twenty-three syllables is called nicṛd Gāyatrī; that with twenty-two, virāḍ Gāyatrī; with twenty-five, bhurig Gāyatrī; and with twenty-six, svarāḍ Gāyatrī. When each pāda is short by one syllable, the form is called pādanicṛd Gāyatrī.

Jagatī: forty-eight syllables, in four pādas of twelve syllables each.

Recitation

There are several methods of memorising Vedic Sanskrit.

Saṃhitā-pāṭha: the original mantra is recited with sandhi and its proper accent.

Pada-pāṭha: the words of the mantra are recited separately.

Krama-pāṭha: successive pairs of words are recited in order.

Jaṭā-pāṭha: forward 1–2, reverse 2–1, then forward 1–2.

Śikhā-pāṭha: the following word, modified in jaṭā-pāṭha, is joined to form śikhā-pāṭha.

Ghana-pāṭha: the reversed words, released from the śikhā sequence, are recited again.

Vedic Sanskrit discusses sacrifice and spiritual subjects; Classical Sanskrit also takes up worldly themes.

2. Prakrit

Whether Prakrit preceded Sanskrit or came after it may be debated, because such words as शिथिर, दूलभ and इन्दर in the Rigveda furnish evidence of the literary adaptation of popular speech. Although instances of Prakrit usage can be found from Aśoka's inscriptions down to the thirteenth century CE, the Prakrits discussed here in the technical sense served as literary languages from approximately the first to the sixth century CE in two ways. First, Śaurasenī, Māhārāṣṭrī and Māgadhī were used for ordinary people and female characters in Sanskrit drama—Vararuci also adds Paiśācī as a fourth Prakrit. Examples include Kālidāsa's Abhijñānaśākuntalam and Mālavikāgnimitram, Śūdraka's Mṛcchakaṭikam, Śrīharṣa's Ratnāvalī, Bhavabhūti's Uttararāmacaritam and Viśākhadatta's Mudrārākṣasa. Second, literature subsequently began to be composed independently in these Prakrit languages. These Prakrits, too, were then bound by grammatical rules and became ornamented literary languages; people began using Apabhraṃśa and Avahaṭṭa, although evidence also exists that Apabhraṃśa was used alongside Prakrit.

Among Aśoka's inscriptions, those at Shāhbāzgaṛhī and Mānsehrā represent the north-western regional forms of popular speech; Kālsī represents the central region; Dhauli and Jaugaḍa represent the eastern region; and Girnār represents the south-western region. Rājaśekhara calls Prakrit sweet and Sanskrit harsh. Vidyāpati later says, "देसिल बयना सभ जन मिट्ठा"—vernacular speech is sweet to everyone.

The earliest Prakrit is called Pali, in which Aśoka's inscriptions, the Mahāvaṃsa and the Jātakas were written. Middle Prakrit comprises the literary Prakrits. Later Prakrit includes Apabhraṃśa and Avahaṭṭa.

Broadly speaking, Śaurasenī was used for prose, Māhārāṣṭrī for poetry, and Māgadhī and Ardhamāgadhī for religious literature. In plays, women and jesters spoke Śaurasenī but recited verse in Māhārāṣṭrī; characters conventionally assigned a lower social rank spoke Māgadhī.

In Prakrit, the sup and tiṅ endings become fused with verbal roots.

In Prakrit, conjugational patterns were reduced to one or two types, as in the bhvādi class, while nominal declensions were reduced to three or four types, as with a-stem words. In other words, both sets of forms diminished in number. This created ambiguity of meaning, which case markers helped to resolve.

The dative, dual number, laṅ, liṭ and luṅ forms, and ātmanepada forms disappeared. The nominative and accusative plural came to have the same form. Sound changes occurred: ऋ, ऐ, औ, य, श, ष and visarga disappeared, with the exception that Māgadhī has य and श but not स.

Word-final consonants disappeared. After a short vowel no more than two consonants can remain, and after a long vowel no more than one.

2. Prakrit

In Prakrit, the sup and tiṅ endings become fused with verbal roots.

न changes to ण, य to ज, and श and ष to स.

In a compound, the initial letter of the second member is dropped, but such deletion does not occur if the form belongs to a verbal root. Thus आर्यपुत्र = अज्जउत्त, but आगतम् = आगदं.

The initial letter of an unaccented indeclinable is dropped; for example, च = अ.

The भ of the verbal root भू changes to ह; for example, भवति = होइ.

क changes to ख, and प to फ: पनस = फणस; क्रीड् = केल.

In a shift of place of articulation, a dental sound becomes palatal; for example, त् = च्.

Medial य disappears. Medial क, ग, च, ज, त and द also disappear, apart from certain exceptions; प, ब and व sometimes disappear as well. Examples: प्रिय = पिअ; लोक = लोअ; अनुराग = अणुराअ; प्रचुर = पउर; भोजन = भोअण; रसातल = रसाअल; हृदय = हिअअ; रूप = रूअ; विबुध = विउह; वियोग = विओअ.

Medial क, त and प become ग, द and ब respectively. ख, घ, थ, घ, फ and भ become ह. Examples: नायकः = णाअगु; आगतः = आगदो; दीप = दीब = दीव; मुख = मुह; सखी = सही; मेघ = मेह; लघुक = लहुअ; यूथ = जूह; रुधिर = रुहिर; वधू = वहू; शाफर = साहर; अभिनव = अहिणव.

Sometimes a medial consonant is doubled; for example, एक = एक्क.

Medial ट and ठ become ड and ढ respectively; for example, कुटुम्ब = कुडुम्ब and पठन = पढण.

Medial प and ब become व; for example, दीप = दीव and शबर = सवर.

ड, त and द become ल; for example, क्रीडा = कीला, सातवाहन = सालवाहण and दोहद = दोहल.

म becomes व; for example, ग्राम = गाँव.

A final stop consonant disappears. A word-final nasal does not take an anusvāra. The ending अः changes to ओ or disappears.

In general, only one consonant occurs at the beginning of a word, and no more than two consonants occur medially; the latter may appear as geminated forms such as क्क or क्ख.

Consonants follow this order of relative strength. First come the members of the क, च, ट, त and प series, from क, the strongest, towards भ, progressively weaker, excluding the fifth consonant of each series—that is, excluding ङ, ञ, ण, न and म. Next come those fifth consonants of the क, च, ट, त and प series. Finally come ल, स, व, य and र. If two consonants are equal in strength, the later consonant prevails; otherwise the stronger consonant prevails. Thus उत्पल = उप्पल; खड्ग = खग्ग; अग्नि = अग्गि. When the fifth consonant of one of these series meets another consonant of its own series, the fifth remains unchanged; otherwise it becomes anusvāra. Thus क्रौञ्च = कोञ्च and दिङ्मुख = दिंमुह.

When ज्ञ occurs at the beginning of the second member of a compound, it becomes ज्ज: मनोज्ञ = मणोज्ज.

When श, ष or स follows a consonant of the क, च, ट, त or प series, the combination becomes च्छ; for example, अप्सरा = अच्छरा and मत्सर = मच्छर.

क्ष becomes क्ख; for example, दक्षिण = दक्खिण.

In Śaurasenī, क्ष becomes क्ख; in Māgadhī it becomes च्छ. Thus कुक्षि = कुक्खि in Śaurasenī and कुच्छि in Māgadhī.

The vowels ऋ and ऌ are absent from Prakrit. ऋ changes in several ways: (a) to रि, as in ऋषि = रिसि; (b) to अ, as in कृत = कद; (c) to इ, as in दृष्टि = दिट्ठि; and (d) to उ, as in पृच्छति = पुच्छदि.

ऐ and औ change to ए; for example, कौमुदी = कोमुदी.

A short vowel occurs before a conjunct consonant.

उ changes to अ or ओ; for example, मुकुल = मउल and पुस्तक = पोत्थअ.

ऊ changes to ओ; for example, मूल्य = मोल्ल.

ए changes to इ; for example, एतेन = एदिणा.

ओ changes to उ; for example, अन्योन्य = अण्णुण्ण.

Anusvāra + अपि becomes पि, and anusvāra + इति becomes ति. खलु becomes ख.

य् changes to इ; for example, कथयतु = कधेतु.

Final consonants disappear in Prakrit. Consonantal sandhi is largely absent.

In vowel sandhi, too, no sandhi takes place even when a medial sound has disappeared.

The dual number disappeared from nominal declension. Dative forms merged with the genitive. Words ending in consonants disappeared.

Verbal conjugation changed more extensively than nominal declension. Consonant-final verbal roots disappeared. Roots came to follow a single pattern of conjugation; the dual disappeared, and the diversity of forms diminished. Ātmanepada forms largely disappeared, as did liṭ, liṅ and luṅ forms. Participial suffixes came into use for expressing the past. Of the verbal classes, all except the bhvādi and curādi classes disappeared.

In Śaurasenī, द्य, र्ज् and र्य् become ज्ज्.

Śaurasenī and Māhārāṣṭrī differ in the treatment of Sanskrit medial त: in Śaurasenī it becomes द, but in Māhārāṣṭrī it disappears. Thus Sanskrit जानाति = Śaurasenī जाणादि = Māhārāṣṭrī जाणाइ.

Sanskrit medial थ becomes ध in Śaurasenī but ह in Māhārāṣṭrī: Sanskrit अथ = Śaurasenī अध = Māhārāṣṭrī अह.

When ज्ञ occurs at the beginning of the second member of a compound, it becomes ञ्ञ in Māgadhī.

In Māgadhī, श, ष and स all become श; र becomes ल; and ज becomes य. The nominative singular of a-stem words takes ए. Thus दरिद्र = दलिद्द.

In Māgadhī, ज becomes य.

In Māgadhī, द्य, र्ज् and र्य् become य्य.

In Māgadhī, ण्य, न्य, ज्ञ and ञ्ज become ञ्ञ.

In Māgadhī, medial च्छ becomes श्च.

In Māgadhī, ष्क becomes स्क or श्क, ष्ट becomes स्ट or श्ट, ष्प becomes स्प, and ष्फ becomes स्फ.

In Māgadhī, र्थ becomes स्त.

The optative (vidhiliṅ) remained current in the Jain Prakrits—Ardhamāgadhī and Jain Māhārāṣṭrī—but largely disappeared from the other Prakrits.

Sanskrit तुम् becomes दुं in Śaurasenī and also in Māgadhī, but उं in Māhārāṣṭrī.

Besides Śaurasenī, Māgadhī and Māhārāṣṭrī, Paiśācī Prakrit is also mentioned. Guṇāḍhya's Bṛhatkathā was written in this Prakrit, but is no longer independently extant; it survives here and there in references and quotations. Paiśācī was a Prakrit of north-western India. According to the literature preserved in quotations, its characteristics were these: ण became न; र became ल; ल became र; voiced consonants became voiceless; intervocalic ल became ळ; intervocalic ष became श or स; ज्ञ became न्य; and ण्य became ज्ज. It possessed both ātmanepada and parasmaipada forms.

A Prakrit Dhammapada has been recovered from Khotan in the north-west, written from right to left in the Kharoṣṭhī script; it uses all three sibilants, श, ष and स.

Broadly speaking, Prakrit displays a process of simplification in nominal and verbal forms, alongside consonant doubling, retroflexion, devoicing and voicing. The use of participles in place of finite tense forms also increased.

Prakrit and Pali

Did Vedic Sanskrit emerge from Prakrit, or Prakrit from Vedic Sanskrit? The popular narratives called nārāśaṃsī in the Vedas demonstrate that both traditions continued in parallel for a long time. Each influenced the other. Consider the Rigveda: what does the use of दूलभ for दुर्लभ (Rigveda 4.9.8) establish? What does पश्चा for पश्चात् (Atharvaveda 10.4.10) establish? And what does प्रतिसंहाय for प्रतिसन्धाय in the Gopatha Brāhmaṇa (2.4) establish? In Vedic times Sanskrit was not called "Sanskrit" as the name of a language. What we now call Prakrit acquired that form of identification, in relation to literary composition, after Pali.

Bharata discusses seven Prakrits in the Nāṭyaśāstra, while Vararuci discusses four.

Although Mahāvīra's teachings were expressed in Ardhamāgadhī Prakrit and the Buddha's in Māgadhī Prakrit, both were fundamentally languages of the people.

When people from different regions assembled, however, the Buddha instructed them to learn his teachings in their respective regional languages: "अनुजानामि भिक्खवे, सकायनिरुत्तियाबुद्धवचनं परियापुणितं"—that is, "Monks, I permit you to learn the Buddha's words in your own languages." Māgadhī, the language of the people, remained the principal element in the Buddha's teachings, but elements of other languages were also mixed into it; that language became Pali.

In Pali

The sounds ऋ, ऌ, ऐ, औ and अः do not occur, and अं is regarded as a consonant rather than a vowel.

The palatal श and retroflex ष do not occur either; only the dental स is present.

The Sanskrit consonant ळ occurs.

The Sanskrit conjunct consonants क्ष, त्र and ज्ञ do not occur.

ऋ changes to अ, इ, अ or इ, and इ or उ. वृ changes to रु.

ऌ changes to उ.

ऐ changes to इ or ए.

औ changes to उ or ओ.

Lengthening of a Sanskrit short vowel: सिंहः = सीहो.

Shortening of a Sanskrit long vowel: मुनीन्द्रः = मुनिन्दो.

Assimilation to a neighbouring vowel: निषण्णः = निसिन्नो.

Stress: मध्यमः = मज्झिमो.

Expansion: जयति = जेति.

Loss of a vowel: इति = ति.

ङ and ढ are also absent from Pali. स or छ is used for palatal श and retroflex ष; ळ is used for ङ and ल्ह for ढ.

क changes to य, as in लौकिकः = लोकियो, or to व, as in शुकः = सुवो.

Reordering also occurs: मशकः = मकसोः and करेणुः = कणेरु.

A consonant of the क series changes to one of the च series: कुन्दः = चुन्दो.

A consonant of the त series changes to one of the ट series: प्रथमः = पठमो.

ख undergoes fricativisation and becomes ह: प्रखरः = पहरो.

क becomes voiced ग: मूकः = मूगो.

ग becomes voiceless क: तडागम् = तळाकं.

झ loses aspiration and becomes ज: झल्लिका = जल्लिका.

प becomes aspirated फ: परश्ः = फरसु.

Consonants also disappear: पविसिष्यामि = पविस्सामि.

A weak conjunct consonant disappears: क्षत्रियः = खत्तियो.

ध्वजः = धजो.

Now observe the tendency towards simplification: गर्हा = गरहा; रत्नम् = रतनं.

Pali has three types of sandhi: vowel sandhi, consonant sandhi and anusvāra (niggahīta) sandhi.

Vowel sandhi: when one vowel is followed by another, either the preceding vowel or the following vowel may disappear; alternatively, neither disappears.

Consonant sandhi: when a consonant follows a short or long vowel, that vowel respectively becomes long or short.

Niggahīta sandhi: anusvāra (niggahīta) is inserted in some places and disappears in others. Examples: त + खणे = तंखणे; सं + रागो = सारागो.

Pali has only two numbers, singular and plural, and the case forms are listed as पठमा, दुतिया, ततिया, चतुत्थी, पञ्चमी, छट्ठी, सत्तमी and आलपन. Between 500 and 800 verbal roots are assigned to nine classes, with eight lakāras; āśīrliṅ and luṭ do not occur.

Compounds in Pali are formed in the same manner as in Sanskrit.

In Prakrit

The fundamental point, however, is that not every Prakrit word has a Sanskrit equivalent.

Literary Prakrit exists in several varieties.

In Paiśācī Prakrit, त is used for ट and ळ for ल.

In Ardhamāgadhī Prakrit, an independent medial क changes to ग, त or य. Between two vowels, प changes to व.

In Śaurasenī Prakrit, an independent त between two vowels changes to द, and थ changes to ह or ध.

In Māgadhī Prakrit, ल is used in place of र; य्य or ज्ज in place of य; and श in place of स and ष.

Prakrit has neither short nor long ऋ or ऌ, nor ऐ or औ. ण takes the place of न.

ऋ changes to अ, आ, ई, उ or रि.

ऌ changes to इलि.

ऐ changes to ए.

औ changes to उ.

Intervocalic क, ग, च, ज, त, द, य and व disappear, as in लोक = लोअ and लावण्य = लाअण्ण.

ख becomes ह: शाखा = शाहा.

An initial य becomes ज: यम = जम.

श and ष become स; क्ष becomes ख, छ or झ; ज्ञ becomes ण; त्व becomes च; थ्व becomes छ; द्व becomes ज; and ध्व becomes झ.

Sandhi follows the Sanskrit pattern. There are two numbers, singular and plural, and seven cases. As in Sanskrit, roots are divided into ten classes, but the forms of the tudādi class disappear. The past and future each have a single form.

Compounds in Prakrit are formed as in Sanskrit.

3. Avahaṭṭa

As Apabhraṃśa approached its final phase, Avahaṭṭa remained in use as a literary language from approximately the eleventh to the fourteenth century. Because of its proximity to Maithili it was also called "Maithil Apabhraṃśa," and it continued to be recognised as a variety of Apabhraṃśa.

Vidyapati himself calls the language of his Kīrtilatā and Kīrtipatākā Avahaṭṭa. Earlier, however, Paharāja had used this designation for a language in the Pāuakoso. Addahamāṇa refers to Avahaṭṭa in his Sandesarāsaka, as does Vaṃśīdhara in his commentary on the Prākṛta Paiṅgalam. Jyotirishwar writes in the Varṇaratnākara: "And what kind of bard? One acquainted with the substance of all six languages—Sanskrit, Prakrit, Avahaṭṭa, Paiśācī, Śaurasenī, and Māgadhī." In its later phase, Apabhraṃśa assumed the form of Avahaṭṭa in eastern India. Characteristics of Maithili—words generally ending in vowels, complex verbal forms (though without gender distinctions in these forms), and genitive forms of pronouns—were already beginning to appear in outline in Avahaṭṭa. In Vidyapati's Avahaṭṭa particularly, one encounters the i- and o-vowel spellings characteristic of Maithili, and the use of the fifth nasal consonants of the ka, ca, ṭa, ta, and pa series in place of anusvāra. Yet sometimes his Avahaṭṭa seems to be pure Maithili, while at other times it employs a larger vocabulary drawn from Prakrit, Persian, Gujarati-Saurashtri, Awadhi, and Kosali. This may explain how his Avahaṭṭa could become a language of broad, transregional reach—"viśva-kutūhalī," in Rājaśekhara's expression. Two Devanagari manuscripts were discovered in separate places, at Stambhatirtha in Gujarat and in the village of Asni in Fatehpur district, Uttar Pradesh; a manuscript in Mithilakshar was found in Nepal. In the historical family classification of languages, Avahaṭṭa is termed "Maithil Apabhraṃśa" for these reasons, and its development from Māgadhī Prakrit is also discernible. Maithili's position can broadly be traced through the historical sequence Sanskrit, Pali, Prakrit, Apabhraṃśa, and Avahaṭṭa. Although Avahaṭṭa is close to Maithili, it is also close to Śaurasenī Prakrit-Apabhraṃśa; its use of indigenous vocabulary, however, reveals many grammatical changes from Apabhraṃśa. Vidyapati's Kīrtilatā is written in Avahaṭṭa, but the Caryā songs and Varṇaratnākara, although earlier than Kīrtilatā, belong to Old Maithili and are also close to Avahaṭṭa. Dāmodara Paṇḍit's Ukti-Vyakti-Prakaraṇa likewise predates Kīrtilatā but provides models of Old Awadhi and Old Kosali and is close to Avahaṭṭa. It is also true that Vidyapati uses several varieties of Avahaṭṭa in Kīrtilatā and Kīrtipatākā. At first, the term was used as a synonym for Apabhraṃśa. Gradually, as the language shed the distinguishing characteristics of Apabhraṃśa and began to provide a basis for the grammatical features of modern Indian languages, especially Maithili, it acquired a distinct identity as Avahaṭṭa. Its principal grammatical characteristics are vowel combinations; compensatory lengthening; distinctive consonantal features; morphology relating to gender and number; uninflected forms; case-postpositions and case-endings; pronouns, adjectives, and pronominal adjectives; verbs, participles, imperatives, anterior verbal forms, compound verbs, and adverbs; features of vocabulary; stress on the preceding vowel; changes in vowel nasalisation and a tendency towards apparently unmotivated nasalisation; sequences of several vowels; loss of syllables; the use of root forms in place of postpositions; the abundance of pronouns; the development of verbal forms; and sentence construction.

Avahaṭṭa contains a substantial body of literature associated with Jainism, showing Śaurasenī influence. Its principal regions were Mānyakheṭa, Gujarat, Bengal, and Mithila. People associated with Jainism were concentrated particularly in Mānyakheṭa. Vajjālagga, a collection of aphoristic verses compiled by the Śvetāmbara monk Jayavallabha, shows the influence of Avahaṭṭa. Among related writings are Bharateśvara Bāhubalī Rāsa by Śālibhadra Sūri; Pañca Pāṇḍava Carita by another Śālibhadra Sūri; Sthūlibhadra Rāsa; Nemināth Phāgu by Jayaśekhara Sūri; and Solaha Kāraṇa Rāsa by Sakalakīrti. The oral poetic traditions also include the literature of the Buddhist siddhas, Ḍāk, Dharmamaṅgala poetry, Śūnyapurāṇa, Māṇikcandra Rājār Gān, and Lorikāin. After Avahaṭṭa, through Brajabuli, Rai Ramananda, Shankaradeva, and Chaitanyadeva reached the people by means of vernacular language. Avahaṭṭa influenced both Brajabuli and Maithili. The twelfth-century Ḍākārṇava was composed in Nepal, in the Mithilakshar script and the Avahaṭṭa language. Works were composed in Avahaṭṭa during the Karnata and Oinwar dynasties in Mithila. Its use had already begun in siddha literature, the Buddhist Dohākośa and Caryā songs, and Jyotirishwar's Varṇaratnākara. Forms of Avahaṭṭa also occur in Muniram Singh's Pāhuḍa Dohā and texts of Buddhist Vajrayāna. Dāmodara Paṇḍit's Ukti-Vyakti-Prakaraṇa, a book for teaching Sanskrit, was composed in Avahaṭṭa. In the first half of the twelfth century, Addahamāṇa composed Sandesarāsaka, whose author himself identifies its language as Avahaṭṭa. The commentator on Prākṛta Paiṅgalam—a compilation on prosody whose compiler is unknown—also calls the language of that work Avahaṭṭa. Vidyapati's Kīrtilatā and Kīrtipatākā were likewise composed in Avahaṭṭa.

The grammatical distinction between Avahaṭṭa and Apabhraṃśa, and Avahaṭṭa's closeness to Maithili: its long compound vowels are ए, ऐ, ओ, and औ; scholars before Pāṇini called them sandhyakṣara. Sanskrit ऐ and औ became the sounds अइ and अउ, respectively, from which further vowels emerged. In languages following Sanskrit, especially medieval languages, the successive use of two or three vowels produced unusual features in both sound and writing. Modern languages needed to restore an earlier condition through greater use of consonants and tatsama vocabulary, so that pronunciation and writing might become easier. Vowels began to combine at the ends of verbs and in other grammatical positions. ऐ and औ became characteristic of Avahaṭṭa, as in टुट्टै = टूटै, गुण्णइ = गुणै, पइ = पै, रहइ = रहै, करउ = करौ, चअउर = चौरा, दुण्णउ = दूणौ, तउ = तौ, and आअउ = आऔ.

The sound ऋ began to be realised in three forms: र् + अ, र् + इ, and र् + उ. The middle form, रि (र् + इ), gradually became established. Thus अमृत = अमिअ, in which मृ becomes मि.

There were further changes among vowels. Lengthening of an initial vowel appears natural, as in आँचल = आँचर. The final आ of feminine words began to disappear, as in भिक्षा = भीख. Sandhi and elision increased in words containing successive vowels, as in धरित्री = धरती and उपआस = उपास.

The Apabhraṃśa अंधआर became अंधार through sandhi.

कज्ज became काज through lengthening; अंचल became आँचर through nasalisation.

Consonants largely remained the same, but ण became less frequent and ञ more frequent; the two new consonants ड़ and ढ़ emerged. क्ष = क् + ष began to change into ष्ख. Alternation also developed between न and ल, as in नहिअ = लहिअ; even today both लोर and नोर are spoken in Maithili.

Nouns ending in उ remained, but अ, आ, इ, ई, ऊ, ऐ, and ओ also began to occur as noun endings. The tendency to form plurals by adding न्हि at the end increased, as in युवराजन्हि. The dual disappeared and the plural took its place; सव्वउं (सभ) also began to be used for this purpose.

Adjectives began to change their forms according to gender, and forms with omitted case-endings or without inflection became more common. Examples of changing adjectival forms are अइस, एत्ते, कतहु, पहिल, and चारु.

Alongside case-endings, forms such as सन, सउं, क, माझ, केर, and लागि began to be used.

Case-endings diminished in western Avahaṭṭa, but in eastern Avahaṭṭa the endings ए and हि performed a wide variety of grammatical functions.

Subject pronouns came to include हौ, तोञ, and सो; possessive or relational forms included मोञ, तुम्ह, and तिसु.

Verbal forms such as करउँ, करसि, and करथि came into use. Participial and related forms included पढ़न्ता, चलु, उपजु, गेल, भेल, कहल, मारल, चलल, करहुं, कहसि, जाहि, and पावथि.

Compound tenses, such as आवत्त हुअ, began to be used.

In the eastern future-tense formation, व was used; in the western formation, ह.

Adverbs such as जनु, नहु, बिनु, and अबस came into use.

Stress fell on the preceding vowel, as in अक्खर = आखर.

The number of pronouns increased.

As verbal forms developed, the use of participles in the present tense increased.

Word order within the sentence now became more firmly determined: broadly, the subject came first, followed by the object, with the verb at the end.

Compound tense constructions also began to appear.

A strong tendency towards lengthening the vowel of a word's first syllable is found in Avahaṭṭa; the final आ of feminine words began to disappear. Nasalised words increased in number. Nouns retained two numbers, but singular forms also came to be employed for plurals. Most nominal stems ended in vowels, including अ. Postpositions began to replace inflectional endings. For the ablative, हुंते and सउँ came into use, and for the locative, माँझ and उप्परि. At times a candrabindu alone served to express both the ablative and the locative. The ending हिं likewise served several cases, while ए came to express the accusative, instrumental, and locative. A comparable simplification of nouns occurred among pronouns. Verbal formation became simpler through more frequent use of participles and the growth of compound verbs. The past tense also came to be formed with ल and the future with व, as in थाकल and पढ़ब, forms subsequently adopted in Maithili.

Stress on the preceding vowel and compensatory vowel lengthening are principal characteristics of Avahaṭṭa. The Apabhraṃśa words अक्खर, ठक्कुर, and नच्चइ became आखर, ठाकुर, and नाचइ, respectively. Changes in the nasalisation of vowels altered the older rules. Previously, anusvāra was absent before stop consonants; the fifth letters of the क, च, ट, त, and प series were employed in conjuncts instead. Anusvāra was used exceptionally before the consonants from य to ह. In addition to stress on the preceding vowel and compensatory lengthening, anusvāra began to occur with stress on the vowel before a conjunct consonant, as in ऊसास /आंग /आँकुस / आँचर /काँट /लाँघि /पाँच /चाँद /आँगन /.

Respectively,

these replaced उस्सास /अंग /अंकुस /अंचल /कण्टक /लघ् /पंच /चन्द्र / अंगण /. Alongside compensatory vowel lengthening, the length or weight of anusvāra was reduced, and the tendency towards apparently unmotivated nasalisation found in modern Maithili began, as in कज्ज = काँज, कच्चु: = काँच, भग्ग = भाँग, and ओष्ठ = ओंदिम.

Loss of syllables: contraction or elision produced अन्धकार = अन्हार, देवकुल = देउर, देवगृह = देवहा, कोट्टशीर्ष = कोसीस, उपवास = उपास, उत्तिष्ठ = उँट, सहकार = सहार, स्वर्णकार = सोनार, सुन्नाअर = सुन्नार, and सहयार = साहार.

Increased use of postpositions: postpositions inherited from Apabhraṃśa became still more frequent during the Avahaṭṭa period. For example:

Nominative (agent): एन्ने.

Instrumental: सन, सउं.

Dative: लागि, लग्गि, लागे, प्रति, कारण.

Ablative: सओ, हुत, हुते, हुंति, सिउ.

Genitive: केर, कर, के, करेउ, कइ, क.

Locative: माझ, ऊपर, माँझ, भीतर, माहि.

Proliferation of pronouns: Kīrtilatā uses जेन्ने; elsewhere one finds forms such as मोर, मेरहु, तोरा, तोहार, तोहर, and तोरा. Relative pronouns included जओन, जेन्ने, जस, जसु, and जे; interrogatives included केहु and कोए; indefinites, कोइ and केहु; and reflexives, अपन, अपनेहु, and निअ.

The development of verb forms through participles: participial usage increased, including the use of past participles for the present, sometimes also in their full forms.

Present participial forms included पढ़न्ता, कहन्ता, and आवन्ता; future forms included करहुं and करिहि; and past participial forms included चलु and लागु.

The modern ending ता developed from अन्त, whose use increased. Compound verbs began to appear, such as forming खाइले by adding ले; पार came into use to indicate capacity, while चाह and लागु served to indicate the beginning of an action.

4. Maithili

In the historical classification of language families, Avahaṭṭa is called "Maithil Apabhraṃśa" for these reasons, and its development from Māgadhī Prakrit can also be observed. Although close to Maithili, Avahaṭṭa is also related to Śaurasenī Prakrit-Apabhraṃśa; because of its indigenous vocabulary, however, it displays many grammatical changes from Apabhraṃśa. Vidyapati's Kīrtilatā is in Avahaṭṭa, but the Caryā songs and Varṇaratnākara, although earlier than Kīrtilatā, are in Old Maithili and also close to Avahaṭṭa. Within the Indo-European family, the position of Maithili may be traced, broadly speaking, through the historical succession Sanskrit, Pali, Prakrit, Apabhraṃśa, and Avahaṭṭa.

Sounds: to pronounce dental न, the tongue should touch the teeth, as in नाम; to pronounce retroflex ण, it should touch the roof of the mouth in the retroflex region, as in गणेश. Failure to do so constitutes a pronunciation error. For palatal श the tongue touches the palate, for ष the retroflex region, and for dental स the teeth. Try pronouncing निशाँ, सभ, and शोषण. In Maithili, ष is also pronounced like ख, as in Vedic Sanskrit, for example in वर्षा and दोष. In many contexts य is pronounced like ज and ण like ड़; thus संयोग and गणेश may be pronounced संजोग and गड़ेस. Maithili also pronounces व as ब, श as स, and य as ज.

Similarly, the short इ in Maithili is often pronounced before the consonant, because in both Devanagari and Mithilakshar its sign is written before that consonant and ought also to be pronounced before it. Hindi, by contrast, is said to pronounce it incorrectly: although written before the letter, the vowel is spoken after it. Through the influence of that system of education, we too are adopting the same defective pronunciation.

पानि – पाइन – पैन.

अछि – अ इ छ – ऐछ.

छथि – छ इ थ – छैथ.

पहुँचि – प हुँ इ च.

The question then arises: what is wrong with writing छैथ for छथि? The difficulty is that in many parts of Mithila people also say छथि, छथी, पानि, पानी, पहुँचि, and पहुँची. Writing पानि, रहथि, and पहुँचि therefore represents all the regions.

There are vowel signs for अ, आ, इ, ई, ए, ऐ, ओ, औ, अं, अः, and ऋ. Yet ई, ऐ, ओ, औ, अं, अः, and ऋ are incorrectly used and pronounced as conjunct sounds: for example, pronouncing ऋ as री. Similarly, देखिऔ is inappropriate in place of देखियौ, while देखिये is inappropriate in place of देखिऐ. The inherent अ combines with consonants from क् to ह् to form क through ह. A tendency has nevertheless grown to pronounce the endings of words as if they carried a halant. When we pronounce the final ज् in मनोज, however, older speakers can still be heard saying मनोजऽ: they are actually pronouncing ज् with its inherent अ, that is, ज.

The conjunct ज्ञ consists of ज् and ञ, but it is incorrectly pronounced ग्य. Likewise, क्ष is composed of क् and ष, yet is pronounced छ. The combination of श् and र makes श्र (as in श्रमिक), whereas स् and र make स्र (as in मिस्र). त्र is त + र.

Write कैं, सँ, and पर joined to the preceding word, but keep तँ, के, and कऽ separate. Where सँ occurs twice, attach the first and separate the second. Attach टा immediately after numerals, but separate it elsewhere: thus छहटा, but सभ टा. Write ६अ म and सातम, not छठम and सातम. Use बला in घरबला, but वाली in घरवाली.

रहए – रहै; but सकैए (pronounced सकै-ए).

Sometimes, however, रहए and रहै also differ in meaning. For example, "He had experience of parking in that very place." On inquiry it emerged that the driver, named Dhundhun, used to work in a parking area at Connaught Place.

The same applies to छलै and छलए. The latter can also be pronounced छल-ए.

संयोगने – pronounced संजोगने.

कैं /के /कऽ.

केर – क (do not use केर).

क, as in रामक: write रामक; it can also be pronounced राम के or राम कऽ.

सँ – सऽ.

Candrabindu and anusvāra: anusvāra involves articulation as far back as the throat, whereas candrabindu does not. Candrabindu is also pronounced with a slight e-like element, as in रामसँ (pronounced राम सऽ) and रामकैं (also pronounced राम कऽ or राम के).

कैं, as in रामकैं, corresponds to Hindi को: राम को = रामकैं.

क, as in रामक, corresponds to Hindi का: राम का = रामक.

कऽ, as in जा कऽ, corresponds to Hindi कर: जा कर = जा कऽ.

सँ corresponds to Hindi से: राम से = रामसँ.

Use of सऽ, तऽ, त, and केर is undesirable.

के may have another meaning, as in के कहलक? ("Who said it?").

नञि, नहि, नै, नइ, नँइ, and नइँ are all pronounced नै.

अ sometimes becomes ओ, as in मन = मोन and वन = बोन (rounded articulation).

अ sometimes becomes आ, as in फंदा = फान and चन्द्र = चान (stress).

घर = घऽर (pronunciation; stress).

बुद्ध = बुद्धऽ (pronunciation; stress).

घमसान = घमऽसान (the short vowel before the long vowel is distinctly pronounced; stress).

When आ precedes इ, the resulting pronunciation is ऐ, as in पानि = पैन. Yet पानी and पानि are pronounced in different regions, so the spellings पानि and आगि remain appropriate.

आ sometimes becomes अ, as in काका = कक्का.

इ sometimes becomes ओ, as in रिवाज = रेबाज.

ऋ sometimes becomes इ, ई, or ऊ, as in कृष्ण = किसुन, पृष्ठ = पीठ, and वृद्ध = बूढ.

At the end of a word, इ is written instead of ई.

ऋ sometimes becomes अ, as in वृषभ = बसहा and अहृदी = अहदी.

उ sometimes becomes ओ, as in दुकान = दोकान.

ऊ sometimes becomes ओ, as in मूल्य = मोल.

अए sometimes becomes ए, as in कएलनि = केलनि.

ऐ sometimes becomes अइ or अए, as in भैया = भइया and पैर = पएर.

आ + ओ sometimes becomes औ, as in गमाओल = गमौल.

क sometimes becomes ख or ग, as in पुष्करि = पोखरि and भक्त = भगत.

ष, when at the beginning or end of a word, sometimes becomes ख, as in षष्ठी = खष्ठी and भेष-भूषा = भेख-भूखा.

क्ष sometimes becomes ख, as in क्षीर = खीर.

ज्ञ sometimes becomes ग, as in यज्ञ = जाग.

ग sometimes becomes घ, as in गर्ग = घाघ.

त्य sometimes becomes च, as in सत्य = साँच.

त्स्य sometimes becomes छ, as in मत्स्य = माँछ.

Initial य sometimes becomes ज, as in यम = जम.

द्य sometimes becomes ज, as in विद्युत = बिजुली.

ध्य sometimes becomes झ, as in वंध्या = बाँझ.

त sometimes becomes ट, as in कर्तन = काटब.

न्थ sometimes becomes ठ, as in ग्रन्थि = गेंठ.

द sometimes becomes ड, as in दण्ड = डाँट.

त sometimes disappears, as in जाइत = जाइ.

स्त sometimes becomes थ, as in प्रस्तर = पाथर.

द sometimes becomes ड, as in दाह = डाह.

Final ध sometimes becomes दह, as in गधा = गदहा.

ल sometimes becomes न, and न sometimes becomes ल, as in नोर = लोर.

प sometimes becomes फ, as in पाश = फाँस.

फ sometimes becomes प and ह, as in बेवकूफ = बेकूफ.

ब sometimes becomes म, as in शैबाल = सेमार.

म्भ sometimes becomes म, as in खम्भा = खमहा.

म्ब sometimes becomes म, as in कम्बल = कम्मल.

ल sometimes becomes र, as in हल = हर.

व sometimes becomes भ, as in वाष्प = भाप.

Final ह sometimes disappears, as in गेलाह = गेला.

Use त्व instead of त्त्व, as in महत्वपूर्ण (not महत्त्वपूर्ण). A three-letter conjunct is justified only where it changes meaning. Write सम्पति, pronounced स म्प इ त, rather than सम्पत्ति, because the latter is difficult to pronounce correctly; but write सर्वोत्तम, not सर्वोतम.

Attach मे, कैं, सँ, and पर to the preceding word; write तँ, कऽ, धऽ, and दऽ separately. Where two or more case markers occur together, attach only the first.

एकटा, दूटा; but कैक टा.

Use the bikārī sign only at the end of a word, not unnecessarily in the middle. Do not use it after a final आ or after final अ, as in दिअ and आ.

Replacing the bikārī sign (ऽ, known in Sanskrit as avagraha and in Bengali as japhalā) with an apostrophe is inappropriate and merely signals a technical deficiency in the font. The Sanskrit form of bikārī is called avagraha. It may disappear in spelling as well as pronunciation, and in pronunciation it does disappear. Yet the apostrophe in English marks the possessive case, while in French expressions such as raison d'être it joins rather than separates sounds: the expression is pronounced approximately "raison detre." Thus replacing bikārī with an apostrophe is technically inappropriate as well.

In Maithili quantitative stress, a stressed short vowel becomes long. If a word contains a long vowel, stress falls upon it; if there is no long vowel, stress falls on the penultimate vowel. Where two long vowels occur consecutively, the penultimate long vowel bears the stress: पा'नि, ओसा'रा. Emphatic stress also occurs when particular emphasis is given to an utterance, as in अपन = अप्पन. All vowels preceding the stressed vowel become short.

Distinctive Features of Maithili Pronunciation and Writing

1. The fifth consonants and anusvāra: the fifth consonants of the five series are ङ, ञ, ण, न, and म. According to the Sanskrit system, the fifth consonant of the relevant series appears before the corresponding consonant. For example:

अङ्क (ङ् occurs because the following consonant belongs to the क series).

पञ्च (ञ् occurs because the following consonant belongs to the च series).

खण्ड (ण् occurs because the following consonant belongs to the ट series).

सन्धि (न् occurs because the following consonant belongs to the त series).

खम्भ (म् occurs because the following consonant belongs to the प series).

The above practice is less frequently observed in Maithili. Anusvāra is used in place of the fifth consonant in most positions: अंक, पंच, खंड, संधि, खंभ, and so on. The grammarian Pandit Govind Jha maintains that anusvāra should be written before the क, च, and ट series, while the fifth consonants themselves should be written before the त and प series; thus अंक, चंचल, अंडा, अन्त, and कम्पन. Modern writers influenced by Hindi, however, do not accept this distinction; they also write अंत and कंपन instead of अन्त and कम्पन.

The newer practice is certainly convenient, since it saves time and space. Yet when the tiny dot of anusvāra is unclear in handwriting or print, the meaning can sometimes be distorted. Its use also raises the possibility of errors in pronunciation. It is therefore appropriate to use the fifth consonants of the relevant series with consonants from क through the प series. There appears to be no dispute about the use of anusvāra with letters from य through ज्ञ.

2. ढ and ढ़: ढ़ is pronounced approximately like "र् ह." Accordingly, ढ़ should be written only where that pronunciation occurs; elsewhere ढ should be written. For example:

ढ: ढाकी, ढेकी, ढीठ, ढेउआ, ढङ्ग, ढेरी, ढाकनि, ढाठ, and so on.

ढ़: पढ़ाइ, बढ़ब, गढ़ब, मढ़ब, बुढ़बा, साँढ़, गाढ़, रीढ़, चाँढ़, सीढ़ी, पीढ़ी, and so on.

These words show that ढ generally occurs at the beginning of a word, while ढ़ appears in the middle or at the end. The same principle applies to ड and ड़.

3. व and ब: in Maithili the letter व is pronounced ब, but it should not therefore be written as ब. The pronunciations बैद्यनाथ, बिद्या, नब, देबता, बिष्णु, बंश, and बन्दना should respectively be written वैद्यनाथ, विद्या, नव, देवता, विष्णु, वंश, and वन्दना. Generally, ओ is used to convey the sound of व, as in ओकील and ओजह.

4. य and ज: in some places य is pronounced like ज, but should not be written ज. Words pronounced यज्ञ, जदि, जमुना, जुग, जाबत, जोगी, जदु, and जम should respectively be written यज्ञ, यदि, यमुना, युग, यावत, योगी, यदु, and यम.

5. ए and य: both ए and य are used in Maithili spelling.

Older spellings: कएल, जाए, होएत, माए, भाए, गाए, and so on.

Newer spellings: कयल, जाय, होयत, माय, भाय, गाय, and so on.

At the beginning of a word, ए normally occurs, as in एहि, एना, एकर, and एहन. These should not be replaced with यहि, यना, यकर, or यहन.

Nevertheless, certain Maithili-speaking communities, including some Tharu groups, pronounce initial ए as य.

For the use of ए and य, it is considered appropriate in this book to follow the older convention. Neither is intrinsically easier or harder to write; the pronunciation of Maithili speakers in general is closer to ए than to य. The occasional writing of words such as कएल and हएब as कैल and हैब further supports the suitability of ए.

6. हि and हु, and e- and o-vowel endings: in the older Maithili writing tradition, हि or हु is added to a word for emphasis, as in हुनकहि, अपनहु, ओकरहु, तत्कालहि, चोट्टहि, and आनहु. Modern usage, however, often substitutes an e-ending for हि and an o-ending for हु: हुनके, अपनो, तत्काले, चोट्टे, आनो, and so on.

7. ष and ख: in Maithili, ष is usually pronounced ख, as in षड्यन्त्र (खड़यन्त्र), षोडशी (खोड़शी), षट्कोण (खटकोण), वृषेश (वृखेश), and सन्तोष (सन्तोख).

8. Loss of sounds: a sound disappears from a word under the following conditions.

(a) The य or ए of the verbal suffix अय is lost. The preceding अ is lengthened in pronunciation, and a mark of elision, or bikārī (’ / ऽ), is placed after it. For example:

Full forms: पढ़ए (पढ़य) गेलाह; कए (कय) लेल; उठए (उठय) पड़तौक.

Contracted forms: पढ़’ गेलाह; कऽ लेल; उठ’ पड़तौक.

Also written: पढ़ऽ गेलाह; कऽ लेल; उठऽ पड़तौक.

(b) The य (ए) of the anterior participial suffix आय (आए) disappears, but no bikārī mark is added. For example:

Full forms: खाए (य) गेल; पठाय (ए) देब; नहाए (य) अएलाह.

Contracted forms: खा गेल; पठा देब; नहा अएलाह.

(c) The sound इ of the feminine suffix इ is lost in verbs, nouns, and adjectives alike. For example:

Full form: दोसरि मालिनि चलि गेलि.

Contracted form: दोसर मालिन चलि गेल.

(d) The final त of a present participle disappears. For example:

Full forms: पढ़ैत अछि; बजैत अछि; गबैत अछि.

Contracted forms: पढ़ै अछि; बजै अछि; गबै अछि.

(e) The endings इक, उक, ऐक, and हीक disappear from verbal forms. For example:

Full forms: छियौक; छियैक; छहीक; छौक; छैक; अबितैक; होइक.

Contracted forms: छियौ; छियै; छही; छौ; छै; अबितै; होइ.

(f) The verbal suffixes न्ह, हु, and the ह sound disappear. For example:

Full forms: छन्हि; कहलन्हि; कहलहुँ; गेलह; नहि.

Contracted forms: छनि; कहलनि; कहलौं; गेलऽ; नइ; नञि; नै.

9. Transposition of sounds: certain vowel sounds shift from one position to another, particularly the short इ and उ. When these vowels occur in the middle or at the end of a word that has undergone Maithilisation, their sound moves forward by one letter: शनि (शइन), पानि (पाइन), दालि (दाइल), माटि (माइट), काछु (काउछ), मासु (माउस), and so on. This rule does not apply to tatsama words: रश्मि cannot be pronounced रइश्म, nor सुधांशु as सुधाउंस.

10. Use of halant (्): generally, Maithili has little need for the halant because the inherent final अ is not pronounced. In tatsama words taken into Maithili unchanged from Sanskrit, however, the halant is used.

11. Words current in Maithili literature from ancient times to the present are generally written in their established spellings. Examples of acceptable forms, followed by unacceptable forms, are:

Acceptable: एखन; ठाम; जकर, तकर; तनिकर; अछि.

Unacceptable: अखन, अखनि, एखेन, अखनी; ठिमा, ठिना, ठमा; जेकर, तेकर; तिनकर (acceptable as an alternative); ऐछ, अहि, ए.

12. The following three sets of forms may be adopted as alternatives: भऽ गेल /भय गेल /भए गेल; जा रहल अछि /जाय रहल अछि /जाए रहल अछि; कर' गेलाह /करय गेलाह /करए गेलाह.

13. न may be written instead of the न्ह sound of Old Maithili: कहलनि or कहलन्हि.

14. ऐ and औ are written where the pronunciation is distinctly like अइ and अउ, as in देखैत, छलैक, बौआ, and छौक.

15. The following Maithili words are to be used in these forms: जैह, सैह, इएह, ओऐह, लैह, and दैह.

16. Omission of इ in a word ending in short इ is generally unacceptable: acceptable forms include देखि आबह and मालिनि गेलि (in reference to persons).

17. The independent short ए or य in quotations from Old Maithili is retained as in the original, but in modern usage either ए or य may be used: कयल /कएल, अयलाह /अएलाह, जाय /जाए.

18. The य sound that arises spontaneously between two vowels in pronunciation may optionally be represented in writing: धीआ /धीया, अढ़ैआ /अढ़ैया, विआह /बियाह.

19. The independent nasalised vowel may, wherever possible, be represented by ञ or by a nasalised vowel: मैञा /मैआँ, कनिञा /कनिआँ, किरतनिञा /किरतनिआँ.

20. Acceptable case forms are हाथकेँ, हाथसँ, हाथेँ, हाथक, and हाथमे. Anusvāra is to be wholly avoided in मे. केर may be retained as an alternative to कऽ.

21. The indeclinables कय or कए may optionally follow an anterior verbal form, as in देखि कय or देखि कए.

22. माङ and भाङ may be written in place of माँग and भाँग, and so on.

23. Anusvāra is not written in place of half न or half म; for ease of printing it may, however, replace half ङ, ञ, or ण: अङ्क /अंक, अञ्चल /अंचल, कण्ठ /कंठ.

24. The halant mark is normally used, but the अ-ending is employed with an inflectional suffix: श्रीमान्, but श्रीमानक.

25. All single case markers are attached to the word, not separated from it. In compound inflections they are written separately, as in घर परक.

26. Nasalisation is indicated by candrabindu, but for ease of printing, anusvāra may be substituted where the vowel sign is difficult, as in हिं instead of हिँ.

27. The full stop is represented by the danda (।).

28. Compounds are written together or joined by a hyphen, never as separate words.

29. The bikārī (ऽ)—called avagraha in Sanskrit and japhalā in Bengali—is not used in लिअ and दिअ.

30. Numerals are written in Devanagari forms.

31. New symbols should be devised for certain sounds. Until they are created, these two sounds may continue to be expressed as अय /आय /अए /आए /आओ /अओ, or by ऐ or औ.

Distinctive Features of Maithili Grammar: Maithili has continued to change through the eras of the Buddhist siddha masters, the Karnata and Oinwar dynasties, the Malla dynasty, medieval Maithili, and the so-called standard of modern Maithili, with its eastern, western, northern, and southern variations. Maithili grammar incorporates the characteristics of all these phases.

All Maithili words end in vowels, and the sounds अ, the rounded अ, ए, य, ऐ, यै, ओ, and औ are distinctly pronounced. The genitive employs सँ, क, and केर (the last occurring more often in poetry). Nominal forms are fewer and simpler: the plural can be made by adding सभ, for instance. Verb-root forms, however, are more numerous. The verb changes according to respectful and non-respectful address. In Maithili, verbal forms are determined by the subject and also by another noun or pronoun in the sentence related to the subject. Verbs change according to grammatical person. The suffix ब forms not only the future tense but also verbal nouns. The use of ल in participial forms such as कहल and गेल is a distinctive feature of Maithili.

Stress may fall on different syllables within Maithili words. Case-inflected forms do not ordinarily produce an oblique stem, as in गामक; the genitive provides an exception, as in साँझ–साँझुक. Oblique forms also occur among verbal nouns.

Nouns: a name or nominal expression has three degrees—small, large, and larger still—illustrated by मनोज्, मनोज, and मनोजबा.

Gender: the system of gender is simple. Inanimate nouns have become masculine. A noun does not change its form according to gender, but an adjective or verb may do so.

Number: nouns do not change their forms according to number; number is expressed by adding words such as लोकनि or रास. हम is singular and हमसभ plural.

Inflectional endings: instrumental -ए-, as in काजे; locative -आँ-हि-, as in परुकाँ and चोट्टहि.

Cases: nominative—unmarked; accusative—केँ; instrumental—सँ; dative —लए; ablative—सँ; genitive—क, or केर (in poetry); locative—मे.

Pronouns, first person: हम, हमे.

Second person: तूँ, तौं, अहाँ, अपने, ई.

Third-person and other pronominal forms: ताहि, तकरा, तकर, हुनका, हुनि, ओकरा, हुनकर, ओकर, हिनका, एकर, हिनकर, जाहि, जकरा, जकर, के, की, ककरा, अपन, कोन, किछु, केदन, केहनदन, कोनादन, एतबा, कतबा, ततबा, ततेक.

Adverbs: एतए, कहाँ, कखन, जखन, जाबे, ताबे, आबे, आब, जहिआ, तहिआ, कहिआ, जेना, तेना, एम्हर, ओम्हर, जेम्हर, तेम्हर, भर (as in दक्षिणभर). Temporal forms include आइ, काल्हि, परसू, लगले, परुकाँ; locative forms include आगाँ and पाछाँ; manner expressions include भने and कने-मने; conjunctions include मुदा and आर; vocatives include रौ and हौ; connective expressions include ईह and छी; and emphatic particles include -ए. There are also forms such as नहि and भरिसक, among various other adverbs and particles.

Prefixes: अ, अन, अध, अब, दु, नि, भरि, कम, ब, बद, बे, सर.

Suffixes: अक्कड़, अंत, इल, आइन, आइ, आउ, आकू, आन, आना, आप, आयत, आर, इन, बाह, आरि, आरी, आहु, औन, इअल, इआ, ई, गर, ऐत, ओड़, ओला, औटी, औती, ओना, औबिल, क, त, औत, आइ, बान, म, बला, हार, हा, ई, कार, बाह, आनी, खाना, खोर, गरी, ची, बाज.

Adjectives: these change according to respect and gender. सिलेबी, गोल, and चर्की are used of cows and oxen, and an adjective may therefore identify the animal being described. Compare पढ़ल (masculine) and पढ़लि (feminine), or मझिला छौड़ा and माँझिल भाइ (respectful form).

Verbs: Maithili verbs do not distinguish number, but they do distinguish grammatical person, and their form also changes to express respect. Finite verbs do not mark gender, whereas participles do change according to gender. The verb changes in relation to the case or participant involved. Thus the verbal form itself can disclose whether the subject is respected, which grammatical person the object belongs to, and whether that object is respected. There are four verbal types: dying oneself—मरब (मरैत अछि); killing—मारब (मारैत अछि); causing someone else to kill—मरबाएब (मरबैत अछि); and arranging for someone to be killed through another person—मरबबैत अछि.

Verbal roots: Dinbandhu Jha collected approximately 1,225 Maithili roots, only somewhat fewer than the 2,000 roots in Pāṇini's inventory. These 1,225 roots alone are sufficient to sustain the independent existence of the Maithili language. Some examples follow.

छक—to be defeated without resistance in another activity: रूपलाल फुल तोड़बामे सोनेलालसँ छकलाह—Rup Lal was beaten by Sone Lal in picking flowers.

ठक—to cheat or deceive: ठक बुड़िबककेँ ठकैत अछि—a cheat misleads a foolish person in order to take away his belongings.

डक—to diffuse a powerful characteristic smell: हौगु डकैत अछि—asafoetida spreads its pungent odour.

ढक—to praise oneself extravagantly and falsely: जयलाल ढकैत छथि—Jaylal speaks in exaggerated, untruthful praise of himself.

बक—to talk excessively about things not worth hearing: जयलाल बकैत छथि—Jaylal says many things that are not worth listening to.

मक—to gambol or run about joyfully, especially of an animal: बाछा मकैत अछि—the calf runs playfully from one side to another.

In the Sundarakāṇḍa, Vālmīki uses the expression "mānuṣīm iha saṃskṛtām," making Hanuman speak of his knowledge of both Sanskrit and the human language. Jyotirishwar writes in the Varṇaratnākara: "And what kind of bard? One acquainted with the substance of all six languages —Sanskrit, Prakrit, Avahaṭṭa, Paiśācī, Śaurasenī, and Māgadhī." Jyotirishwar also discusses seven "sub-languages." There were several varieties of Prakrit. Māgadhī Prakrit contributed to the development of Maithili and other languages of eastern India. Jain religious texts were written in Ardhamāgadhī, while Buddhist religious texts were written in Pali. Kālidāsa's Sanskrit plays employed Apabhraṃśa in addition to Sanskrit for characters outside the elite, while the language of the Caryāpada was also Apabhraṃśa mixed with Māgadhī. It is also apparent that Maithili and other modern Indo-Aryan languages developed from other Prakrit varieties. In its later phase, Apabhraṃśa took the form of Avahaṭṭa in eastern India. The outlines of features characteristic of Maithili—vowel-final words, complicated verbal inflection (without gender distinctions), and the genitive forms of pronouns—had already begun to be visible in Avahaṭṭa.

33. Acting Workshop

Abstract

[Acting Workshop (for Theatre and Film): A Prelude to the Videha Theatre (and Film) Festival, 2012.] This article is based on forty lectures, translated into Sanskrit, which I delivered over three months to trainee teachers selected for primary schools in Odisha at the Sri Aurobindo Ashram. I learned more from them than I taught them.

Keywords: acting · workshop · literary criticism · Maithili

[Acting Workshop (for Theatre and Film): A Prelude to the Videha Theatre (and Film) Festival, 2012]

(This article is based on forty lectures, translated into Sanskrit, which I delivered over three months to trainee teachers selected for primary schools in Odisha at the Sri Aurobindo Ashram. I learned more from them than I taught them. They now teach in remote parts of Odisha. This article is dedicated to them.—Gajendra Thakur)

1

2

What is acting? Children spread their things around and remain engaged in one activity or another. My daughter makes imaginary tea and offers it to me. I pretend to sip it, little by little. Then she brings real soup. I am working and, without even turning my face, pretend to sip the tea; but my daughter says, "This is real." My illusion is broken, and I return to the real world.

Children learn through drama and attempt to understand people and their surroundings.

Drama performed at temple festivals and in royal palaces subsequently acquired an independent existence, and its application to teaching other subjects also began. The participation of specialists from those subjects became necessary. Drama is both an independent subject and a means of practical application. Traditional theatre will become part of theatrical history through its connection with professional drama, through exemplary performances and stage decoration, and through the actual staging of plays. Before that, however, students must acquire elementary theatrical knowledge and develop the habit of reading plays. While reading, they must also analyse plays from the perspectives of stage management and acting.

Information about political, social and cultural developments must be supplied in relation to the production concerned. Alongside Bharata's Nāṭyaśāstra, familiarity with the plays of Kālidāsa, Bhāsa and Śūdraka is essential.

Those associated with theatre should know and have experience of both the Little Tradition and the Great Tradition.

If children engage with drama and theatre, they will become responsible citizens, economically self-reliant and active participants in civic life.

2

Chaitanya Mahaprabhu used the vīthī form of performance, combining music and dance within the jātrā tradition, to spread his message.

The Nāṭyaśāstra states that drama originated in the festival of Indra's banner. It associates two kinds of dramatic presentation with (1) the Churning of the Ocean of Nectar and (2) Śiva's Burning of Tripura. Bharata knew approximately ten such types of dramatic scenes or representations—the daśarūpaka—in which dance, music and acting were included; in addition to these ten forms, there were songs intended for listening.

In the fifth century BCE, Pāṇini mentions Śilālin and Kṛśāśva, who had compiled the Naṭasūtras. Naṭa means an actor and raṅga means a stage. Bharata, Śilālin and Kṛśāśva are also used as corresponding names for the actor.

Maithili drama, which until now has been connected principally with dance and music and only marginally with painting and handicrafts, should also be brought into contact with physics, biology, history, geography and literature.

3

Teach children how to hold and operate different tools, how to grease them and keep them safe. Teach them how to clean a house, the difference between a clean and a disorderly home, and which things need frequent cleaning and which do not. Dolls can be made from wire, torn or old fabric, broken bangles and ornaments, old saris, cotton and similar materials; faces, eyes and other features can be represented using these. Use plastic for the skin of the body, or apply layers of colour to fabric. Make hair from wool and similar materials; to represent heroes and warriors, use wooden swords and large shoes; then teach the making of labourer dolls and other figures. The aim is to construct characters of every kind.

Teach, through imaginary action, how to tether cattle, milk them, avoid being kicked, set curd, churn lassi, and coordinate the eyes and hands. Introduce games such as kariyā jhummari and others.

Teach the making of paper boats and aeroplanes and the drawing of pictures. Theatre is a means of understanding written material and comprehending a subject.

Acting: walking itself takes many forms. Teach children and adult actors to walk hurriedly; to walk while lifting a load or a spade; to move with enthusiasm or in sorrow; to walk wearily, stumbling with exhaustion; to limp; to follow the crowd like sheep; to march shouting slogans; and to walk with two or three companions. Touch: touching hot or cold things, hard or soft objects, and then responding to them. There is also a need to display fear, attachment, tamas, modesty, the refusal to act, stubbornness, sadness and laughter, from a giggle to a laugh with the mouth closed; to look with happiness or surprise; and to react to different kinds of scenes. Attend to the activities of markets, schools, homes and assemblies; memory, vocabulary, concentration, personality, ability, ideology, self-respect, desire, bodily confidence and enthusiasm; discussions of women and men, psychology, poetry, prose, songs, stories and riddles; and their memorisation and recitation. Give children experience of bodily movement, dance, music, hand gestures and group exercise, and of imaginary situations such as a gust of wind entering a room, a window opening, or something falling upon the head. Make them experience surroundings, motion, form, size and shape. Practise playing personalities different from their own; the relationship between sound and image and their simultaneous repetition; staging both real and imaginary situations; conversation on a subject; topics from books, newspapers and documentary films; and topical issues. Forced memorisation is wrong, whereas remembering by repeated listening is good. For games, divide children into two teams and have them act; one group may pretend to sleep while another wakes it by imitating a nāṛhiyā or a crow. Practise the collective recitation of verses and similar exercises.

In workshops, if someone finds a task difficult, ask another person to help. When someone offers a suggestion, discuss it together and think collectively. Allocate work according to ability, and praise those who perform it well. Teach courteous and truthful speech. Teach participants to wait their turn before speaking, follow the director's instructions, share materials and use them cooperatively. Develop an awareness of duty and assign responsibilities. Encourage participation in collective work and other social conduct. Teach conversation and acting through observation and listening, through imitation, through repetition, and through praise and encouragement. Maintain an atmosphere of pleasure and amusement.

Avoid long lectures: examples, practice and encouragement work better than speeches. Avoid punishment and comparisons between children. Do not diminish any child in another child's eyes. Arrange meetings with people outside the group. Celebrate festivals together and go on outings together. Show affection, smile, nod in encouragement, pat a child on the back, and praise the child to the parents; but do not praise the child repeatedly in the child's own presence. Do not lure children with chocolate and similar rewards, and never promise something that cannot be delivered. Do not explain the reasons for a mistake to a child under five: at that age the required understanding has not developed. Discourage mistakes by speech, gesture, voice and facial expression. If necessary, a minor punishment may be given to a child over five, but never strike or humiliate the child or complain about the child. Develop habits of making decisions; help children experience the pleasure of participation; teach healthy competition and self-reliance. Explain matters of temperament, the art of conversation, interpersonal relations, and respect for public property. Teach environmental responsibility, the importance of not hurting others' feelings, and the art of asking questions. Explain what a hero in life should be like, describe the power of inner strength, teach children to understand their village, and help them understand the complexities of religion, politics and caste.

Essential elements for an acting-workshop curriculum:

Analysis of physical and acting abilities; knowledge of anatomy; distinctions among kinds of drama from a sociological perspective; the relation between theatrical production and the means of livelihood, and its effects; relations between theatrical forms and the study of the social, economic, cultural and political environment; development of the arts of learning and understanding; the formulation of a concept, its comprehension and its performance; exercises in movement and speech for acting; and efforts to make theatre part of culture. Introduce historical periods and their drama, and recreate those periods onstage. For this, introduce their history and geography as well as their social, cultural, political and economic conditions. Observing professional theatre gives insight into work carried out behind the stage. Study stage design and costume appropriate to each historical period. Recordings and performances of plays from different periods should be viewed, and photographs, paintings and other information concerning those times collected. Many documentaries can be watched at the Sangeet Natak Akademi in Delhi, where many compact discs are also available for purchase.

4

Modern theatre in Kolkata began around 1850 in British clubs, although outsiders were not admitted. Vidyāsundar, a Bengali story of two lovers, was staged on the basis of jātrā. Bhāratendu also wrote on the basis of rāslīlā. Viṣṇudās Bhāve's Sītā Svayaṃvara (1843), in Marathi, was an experiment based on the yakṣagāna of Karnataka. Habib Tanvir worked with the poet Nazir in Agra Bazar and with Śūdraka's Sanskrit play Mṛcchakaṭika in Hindi. Other figures include Shambhu Mitra, B. V. Karanth, K. N. Panikkar and Ratan Thiyam. Thiyam's Chakravyūha, based on the story of Abhimanyu, employed song and dance; some people understood it as ballet. Panikkar and Karanth experimented with voice and speech; Karanth also used ālāp. In 1956 the Sangeet Natak Akademi organised its first National Theatre Festival, which opened with Kālidāsa's Sanskrit Abhijñānaśākuntalam performed by the Goa Brahmin Sabha. Panikkar staged Bhāsa's Madhyamavyāyoga in Sanskrit, while Thiyam staged Bhāsa's Urubhangam in Manipuri, with actors entering and leaving slowly in a dance-like style.

Vijay Tendulkar's Ghashiram Kotwal, based on Nana Phadnavis and other corrupt Brahmins of Pune and presented in a traditional style drawing upon daśāvatāra, and Shantata! Court Chalu Aahe; Girish Karnad's Hayavadana, drawing upon the Kathāsaritsāgara and yakṣagāna; Mohan Rakesh's Āṣāṛh kā Ek Din; Shambhu Mitra's productions of Rabindranath Tagore and Ibsen (A Doll's House); and Utpal Dutt's Kallol (the sound of waves)—all advanced modern theatre.

5

Parsi theatre: This theatre arose among Mumbai's economically prosperous Parsi community and is called a hybrid, or mixed, theatrical form. It began in 1853 and flourished until about 1940. The advent of cinema brought about its demise, as people connected with it moved into filmmaking. Some celebrated Parsi theatrical works, including Inder Sabha, Alam Ara and Khoonne Nahak (based on Shakespeare's Hamlet), were also adapted into films.

Subject matter: Parsi plays drew upon epics and Purāṇas, and their themes were historical and social. Each time the curtain fell, a short comic piece was performed. Parsi theatre was staged both in India and abroad. Excitement and mystery were central to it. Painted curtains were used, and the curtain fell when some mystery was introduced. At an audience's request a scene or song could be repeated: the curtain would rise again for the reprise. Raja Ravi Varma and Parsi theatre influenced each other. Ravi Varma's paintings influenced theatrical costumes and stage decoration, while he in turn drew inspiration for his subjects from scenes of Parsi theatre.

6

Bharata's Nāṭyaśāstra:

Drama has two forms, lokadharmī and nāṭyadharmī. Lokadharmī is the ordinary or naturalistic manner, while nāṭyadharmī is the classical mode of expression. The ordinary manner rejects artificiality, although some, through ignorance, imagine that the term refers to plays staged in villages. Lokadharmī emphasises acting according to natural behaviour, the actions of ordinary people, simple bodily expression, and numerous characters, women as well as men. Nāṭyadharmī includes inward speech, speech through gestures, disembodied voices and the like, as well as dance, unusual verbal expression, music in rāgas, and divine characters in addition to ordinary ones. Even inanimate objects or animals may begin to speak; one performer may play two or three roles; and the emotional intensity of happiness and sorrow may be heightened through music.

Lokadharma is the foundation of nāṭyadharma. Refine lokadharmī and it becomes nāṭyadharmī.

Lokadharmī has two types: cittavṛttyarpikā, the representation of inward happiness and sorrow, and bāhyavastvanukāriṇī, the imitation of external things such as a pond or a lotus-filled lake. Nāṭyadharmī likewise has two types: kaiśikī śobhā, which displays the body through elegance, song, dance and music, and aṃśopajīvanī, the symbolic representation of things such as the Puṣpaka aircraft, mountains or forests.

Acting in its entirety comprises āṅgika (through the body), vācika (through speech), sāttvika (through inward emotion) and āhārya (through costumes, staging, decorative objects and imagined visual effects). Āṅgika abhinaya operates through the body, face and gesture; vācika abhinaya through the languages of gods, kings, non-Aryans, animals and birds. The sāttvika expressions comprise stambha (immobility arising from joy, fear or grief); sveda (sweating, or gestures such as scratching the head in suppressing the emotion of immobility); romāñca (bodily horripilation arising from an inward state); svarabhaṅga (breaking or heaviness of the voice, tears welling in the eyes); vepathu (bodily trembling); vaivarṇya (the face turning pale); aśru (tears falling in drops, repeatedly or otherwise); and pralaya (a swoon, represented, for example, through the corpse pose). Āhārya is accomplished through pusta (placing figures such as elephants, tigers or mountains onstage), alaṃkāra (costume and ornaments), aṅgaracanā (colouring, moustaches, dress and hair) and sañjīva (presenting living creatures: legless snakes, two-legged human beings and birds, and four-legged animals).

There are two further modes of acting: sāmānya and citrābhinaya (both discussed in Chapter 22 of the Nāṭyaśāstra). After the fourfold classification, sāmānya abhinaya is described as a coordinated form of āṅgika, vācika and sāttvika expression, in which the sāttvika element predominates. Citrābhinaya is related to āṅgika: through bodily movements one forms images to enact mountains, ponds, birds and other things.

The staging of drama and acting: Kālidāsa's Abhijñānaśākuntalam is essential reading for a theatrical director. Its stage directions include "ratha vegaṃ nirūpya," "sūta paśyainaṃ vyāpādyamānaṃ," "iti śarasaṃdhānam nāṭayati," "vṛkṣa secanam rūpayati," "kalaśam avarjayati," "mukham asyāḥ samunnamayitum icchati," "Śakuntalā pariharati nāṭyena" and "nāṭyena prasādhayataḥ." These actions are performed by acting, not by doing the things themselves. In "nāṭyena prasādhayataḥ," Anasūyā and Priyaṃvadā use gestures to adorn their friend Śakuntalā, whether because the required cosmetics are unavailable or because there is too little time. "Vṛkṣa secanam rūpayati" directs an actor to simulate watering a tree; "kalaśam avarjayati" indicates the imaginary emptying of a pitcher; "ratha vegaṃ nirūpya" represents a swiftly moving chariot; "iti śarasaṃdhānam nāṭayati" indicates the drawing of an arrow to the bow; "sūta paśyainaṃ vyāpādyamānaṃ" directs the representation of a deer being struck down; "mukham asyāḥ samunnamayitum icchati" indicates Duṣyanta's desire to lift Śakuntalā's face; and "Śakuntalā pariharati nāṭyena" directs the enactment of her resistance to his attempt.

Bharata's stage includes a rear curtain; the nepathya, understood as a make-up room; doors for entrances and exits; a special curtain concealing the entrances and exits; the vedikā, erected in the middle of the stage for the instrumental ensemble; the raṅgaśīrṣa, a rear stage area; the mattavāraṇī, the two front corners used for acting; and the raṅgapīṭha, the main performance space at the front.

Evaluation of acting: In Chapter 27 Bharata identifies success as the aim: the performance must be crowned with success. An audience member who exclaims "Yes!", "Wonderful!", or "What a tragic ending!" is a sahṛdaya, in Bharata's terminology, becoming one with the playwright and the characters.

Theatrical competitions were held, and judges distributed prizes there.

Bharata lays down criteria by which judges are to award positive and negative marks:

1. Lack of concentration; 2. Speaking another character's dialogue; 3. Failing to embody the character's personality; 4. Failure of memory; 5.

Departing from one's assigned role and assuming another; 6. Dropping an object or prop; 7. Stumbling over words; 8. Grammatical or other errors; 9. Deficiencies in execution; 10. Defects in music; 11. Defects in speech; 12. Lack of foresight; 13. Deficiencies in materials; 14. Deficiencies in make-up; 15. The insertion by the playwright or director of material from another play; and 16. Failure to make the language of the play simple and clear. These are faults of acting and production.

Judges should be drawn from different fields and be impartial. They should consider the total effect of the play, its continuity, the proportions among its various qualities, and the representation of feeling.

The stage manager, or sūtradhāra, and the assistant, or pāripārśvaka, should know every aspect of drama. The principal actress should be proficient in music and theatre. The principal actor, or hero, makes a play successful through his ability. Cast the naṭa, or performer, according to the role: someone of short stature may suit a boastful warrior; a thin person, a servant; and someone adept at argument or quarrelling, a bipaṭā. Choose actors for characters in this way. The head of the musical ensemble, the taurika, should know all aspects of music and be able to direct the instrumentalists, or kuśīlavas.

7

Maithili drama: Many lectures have discussed the continuity of Maithili and other dramatic traditions from ancient to modern times. The truth, however, is that the stage and dramatic representation described in Bharata's Nāṭyaśāstra are no longer available in that form in any part of India or Nepal. Restoring them is certainly a formidable task, but it is not true that no efforts have been made. An uninformed abridgment of Kālidāsa's plays creates grave controversy. Maithili theatre has the possibility of presenting the subsidiary dramatic forms, the uparūpakas, by interpreting folk theatre in accordance with the Nāṭyaśāstra. The Videha Theatre (and Film) Festival of 2012 is an attempt in this direction.

34. A Parallel World of Maithili Drama and Film

Abstract

Ramkhelawan Mandar came from Katghara village, Shivajinagar block, Samastipur district. Bindeshwar Mandal worked alongside him. People still remember the rising Maithili chorus: "Mother, dear Mother, get me a gun, for I shall become a soldier, Mother."

Keywords: drama · film · parallel · world · literary criticism · Maithili

1

A Parallel World of Maithili Drama

Ramkhelawan Mandar came from Katghara village, Shivajinagar block, Samastipur district. Bindeshwar Mandal worked alongside him. People still remember the rising Maithili chorus: "Mother, dear Mother, get me a gun, for I shall become a soldier, Mother." This troupe performed verse-dramas such as Reshma-Chuhar, Sheet-Basant, Alha-Udal and Natua Dayal.

The Maithili-Bidesiya troupe performing Pia Desantar came from the Saharsa–Supaul–Purnia region.

The short play Hasan-Husan was also performed.

The Ramraksha Chaudhary Natya Kala Parishad, based in Gayaghat village, Karian panchayat, Vaidyanathpur post office, Samastipur district, took its production of Vidyapati as far as Gorakhpur. Other plays presented by this troupe included Laungia Merchai, Vidyapati, Chinik Laddu and Basat.

Efforts must also be made to document and honour this parallel world of Maithili drama.

2

A Parallel World of Maithili Film

Maithili Parallel Cinema:

Mai Ke Mamta, from Dhadkan Media House Pvt. Ltd., Mirchaiya, Siraha, Nepal: presentation by Nandlal Mahato; cinematography by M. Samir; producer Kamal Yadav; writer-director Jitendra Sahayogi.

Artists in Maithili cinema: Abadhesh Kumar Giri, Priyanka Sharma, Rajkumar Mahato, Nirmala Mahato, Anjani Mandal, Nandan Thakur, Dharmendra Sah, Jitendra Thakur, Rita Sahayogi, Nirmala Mahato, Surja Mahato, Pravin Thakur, Dinesh Yadav, Dinesh Thakur, Prem Kumar

Singh, Prem Kumar Mahato, Anil Kumar Mahato, Gyanendra Kumar Mahato, Sanjay Mahato, Dashrath Mahato, Birendra Mahato, Champa Devi, Madhu Devi Mahato, Pushpa Karna, Gulzar Yadav, Ranju Mahato, Indu Sah, Manoj Kumar Singh, Ram Kumar Sah, Ganesh Mahato, Arun Chaudhary, Anil Kumar Sah, Pawan Yadav, Hemlal Yadav, Satya Narayan Mahato, Ganga Mahato, Bharosi Mahato, Baiju Bawra, Akhleshwar Mahato, Dhruv Kumar Mahato, Anil Kumar Das, Vinod Mahato, Santosh Sah, Vipul Sah, Pradeep Sah, Roshan Kumar Ghimire, Manchan Mahato, Jagdish Yadav, Bindeshwar Yadav, Devindra Yadav, Brahmadev Mahato, Indu Mallik, Uttam Mahato, Siyasharan Mahato, Radha Kumari, Saraswati Kumari, Krishna Kumari Mahato, Akash Kumar Mahato, Shivam Chaudhary and Ashish Kumar Mahato.

Special mentions: Rita Kumari Karna, Mithlesh Yadav, Pramod Sah, Rina Yadav, Rekha Mahato, Gyanendra Kumar Mahato, M. Samir, Anil Kumar Mahato, Suresh Yadav, V. P. Udasi, Suresh Mandal, Ramshubhag Mahato, Dev Kumar Mahato, Ramdev Pandit, Anjani Mandal, Mahesh Kushwaha, Birendra Kabirpanthi, Kumar Kushe, Babu Ram Mahato, Dharmendra Sah, Anil Kumar Mahato, Upendra Narayan Mahato, Pawan Mallik, Nandan Thakur and Diwakar Thakuri.

Lyricist: Jitendra Sahayogi.

Music directors: Gurudev Kamat, Kamal Mandal and Vishwanath Jha.

Singers: Gurudev Kamat, Rama Mandal, Harishankar Chaudhary, Vishwanath Jha, Sarmila Mahato and Madhu Gurung.

The Maithili film Prit Ke Baji:

A film by G. P. Gupta.

Director: Surya Sah.

Editor: Jitu Singh.

Cinematography: Kundan Kumar Pappu.

Producer: Jivach Prasad Gupta.

Co-producer: Rajkumar Gupta.

Story, subject matter and songs: Shyam Paswan.

Music: Shailendra V. K.

Singers: Jivach, Rajkumar, Sunita and Prabha.

Dance: Ram Thakur and Ajay Thakur.

Action choreography: Kailash Mandal.

The auspicious inauguration of the Maithili feature film I Love Janakpur, being made under the banner of Memory Mithila Films Pvt. Ltd., is to take place today, the twenty-fifth day of the month of Shrawan. All journalists, performers, literary figures and lovers of Maithili art are requested to attend at the appointed time and lend dignity to the occasion.

Story and direction:

Nirajan Mehta (Manjit).

Producers:

Pradip Raj and Kamal Mandal.

Music:

Kamal Mandal.

Lyrics: Vineet Thakur.

Venue: Madhesh Media House.

Time: 1 p.m., Shrawan 25.

Hanuman Sthan, Anamnagar,

Kathmandu.

A charity screening of the Maithili film Mai Ke Mamta at the Kantipur Hall, Sitapaila, Kathmandu.

Writer and director of Mai Ke Mamta: Jitendra Sahayogi.

35. The Impact of Foreign Capital Investment on Languages, Including Maithili

Abstract

Foreign direct investment in India takes place through partnerships with firms from other countries or by purchasing their assets or shares. Investors undertake SWOT analysis and assess their capacity to enter a market by producing at lower cost and greater speed through various methods. The country in which foreign capital will be invested depends on a number of factors.

Keywords: foreign · capital · investment · language · impact · literary criticism · Maithili

Foreign direct investment in India takes place through partnerships with firms from other countries or by purchasing their assets or shares. Investors undertake SWOT analysis and assess their capacity to enter a market by producing at lower cost and greater speed through various methods. The country in which foreign capital will be invested depends on a number of factors. China will attract more foreign capital than India because India has numerous democratic procedures that raise the cost of production. The point may be understood by comparing Japan and Switzerland, which have attracted less foreign capital than Spain. By the same comparison, Nepal will receive proportionately more investment than India. If we examine the prospects for foreign capital in Maithili and other languages, Maithili will attract proportionately more investment than Nepali or Hindi. And, so far as foreign capital is concerned, the future of Maithili in Nepal seems brighter than that of Maithili in India.

Foreign capital, however, is not merely the theoretical outcome of management or economics described above. Political stability and social crisis both confront us here. India's enormous licence fees, which have contributed to Maithili's poor condition in information technology, do not exist in Nepal; consequently Maithili is in a better position on Nepalese radio and television. Yet political instability sometimes obstructs investment in Nepal. Likewise, the social base of Maithili in Nepal is extensive, whereas its base in India is not comparable. This is a negative factor for investment in Maithili in India.

As stated above, before making any foreign capital investment, the investor will conduct a SWOT analysis.

SWOT analysis in the context of Maithili:

Maithili's SWOT analysis—Strength, Weakness, Opportunity and Threat. (My teacher, Chamu Krishna Shastri, has made a very substantial contribution to my understanding of this subject.)

Management studies include a subject called SWOT analysis. Let us examine Maithili against this criterion.

S—Strength: power, capacity, force.

People have a fire in their hearts for Maithili, even when they oppose one another. There is respect for the rise and fall of its intonation and its linguistic distinctiveness; this respect extends even to linguists who do not speak Maithili. The language also possesses spiritual and cultural importance. It has an internal strength. Numerous organisations, including some casteist and communal organisations, are eager to promote its development. Those who know Maithili live not only in India and Nepal but are now dispersed across other countries and regions.

W—Weakness: deficiency, frailty, foolishness.

The culture of praise, which also involves denigrating others, belongs here: it is a form of self-praise.

Mutual flattery belongs here as well. There is dependence on government and an ignorance of priorities; when the language is dying, poets and critics have devoted their lives to becoming, or creating, "great poets." There is an evident absence of a clear plan of action, and everyone is anxious to do something, anything, for Maithili, and proceeds accordingly. A virtual campaign has arisen in which people themselves do not speak Maithili and keep their children away from it; the media, cartoons and the educational system, together with extensive migration within a single generation, have contributed to this. Because Maithili activists are divided into several poles, there is a lack of supportive lobbying. People worry more about the advantage to themselves and their own circle than about what will benefit Maithili. There are too few students of Maithili. Even an excellent product requires marketing skills. In Maithili there is a shortage of excellent products, and marketing skills are lacking as well.

O—Opportunity: possibility, opening, occasion.

There is little writing on specialised subjects; the language relies largely upon stories and poetry. Maithili lacks comics, illustrated narratives, and books on science, social science, spirituality, physics, chemistry, biology and health. Palm-leaf manuscripts are not being published with the aid of computers. Student energies are scarcely used. Teaching is not being conducted through evening schools, painting or music. There is a great need for Maithili instruction through distance education and the Internet. Translation into Maithili, books on contemporary subjects, and the publication of unpublished palm-leaf manuscripts are necessary. Primary education through Maithili is needed. For migrant Maithils, courses in reading, writing and editing the language are necessary.

T—Threat: danger, potential calamity.

Despair, a sense of inferiority, exclusion from education, the absence of Maithili as a medium of instruction in traditional schools, the scarcity of learned scholars, neglect of palm-leaf manuscripts and their sale abroad, weakening of the language, cultural contamination and the consequent contamination of language, separation from the mainstream and confinement of the language to only two castes, declining levels of knowledge among teachers, and political opposition to Maithili for selfish ends: these are the dangers confronting us.

All the points described above belong within an action plan informed by management science. What is required is work, not speeches. For conversation in Maithili, education through Maithili, and the creation of a new and comprehensive literature, everyone must act with a single direction, a common standard and a united effort. A shortage of funds arises when we continue waiting for government assistance. Rely instead on public support: the shortage is not of donors, but of people willing to receive and organise donations.

According to UNESCO, India is the world's sixth-largest book publisher, producing books in twenty-five recognised languages, including English. In the publication of books in English, India ranks third after the United States and Great Britain. Yet, among the twenty-four major languages, UNESCO considers only eighteen important for book publication, and Maithili is not among those eighteen. According to the Federation of Indian Publishers, India has approximately 16,000 publishers producing around 70,000 books a year. Of these, 21,000 books appear in English, and still more are printed in Hindi. As literacy improves in India, the number of book readers will also rise. In Nepal, books are published principally in Nepali. In both India and Nepal, the publication of Maithili books lags behind in quality as well as quantity.

Cooperation between foreign investors and government institutions: Let us move beyond the publishing industry to other means of disseminating information, such as television, radio and online language tools. Foreign investors can assist us in producing documentaries, entertainment and linguistic tools. If the government works for the recognised languages without making the market its sole concern, particularly with an eye to Maithili and the other five languages, the cultural decline observable in market-driven information technology need not affect Maithili in the same way. Arabic suffers no shortage of funds, yet why is it dying, despite its use in government, mosques and education? Besides Lebanon, Jordan and Egypt, Saudi Arabia and other Gulf countries protect it. Money, however, has become a source of trouble. Sheikhs return from studies abroad speaking a mixed Arabic, which has become fashionable. A vast difference has developed between the Arabic of the Qur'an and the educational language of the present day, "Modern Standard Arabic" (MSA). This Modern Standard Arabic has separated from spoken Arabic and serves largely as a common link among Arab countries, so that their people may understand one another. Yet it is precisely this Modern Standard Arabic that appears in audiovisual and print media, though it is no one's mother tongue and is learned through the study of grammar. If governments help foreign investors dub entertaining programmes into Maithili, the programmes of cartoon channels and television serials could be broadcast in Maithili whether or not they attract advertising. Once that wheel begins to turn, Maithili will revive. And the wheel will turn only when Brahmins, Kayasthas and other upper-caste Maithils of Madhubani, Darbhanga, Saharsa and Supaul allow the language to revive, suspend their negative energies, and cooperate with, rather than obstruct, all the social groups now becoming associated with Maithili. Only when this proletarian class, endowed with formidable, even demonic talent, forms a dedicated collective effort to protect Maithili will the language survive.

Major foreign investors: HarperCollins, Penguin, Oxford University Press, Macmillan, Random House, Picador, Hachette, Routledge and Howard Business Publishing have invested in the language sector through their branches or Indian partners. But their investment has largely been confined to English. Apart from Penguin Hindi, foreign investment in Indian languages has been almost negligible since foreign companies entered India's publishing industry. The reason is clear. Publishers in Indian languages depend upon government purchases and, outside government procurement, concentrate on printing textbooks. Foreign investors do not determine their policies on the basis of government purchases and textbook production. For Maithili this might have been a blessing. But even if we anticipate a future rise in literacy, it seems almost impossible, given Maithili's marginal position in the present education system, to expect newly literate people to read Maithili. There is no realistic prospect either of government-library purchases or of textbook publication in Maithili. The number of readers must therefore be increased on the Internet, and readers who were never able to study Maithili in the government education system will initially need to be offered free downloads. Through translation from Maithili into English and Sanskrit, and through these languages into others, books marginalised by governmental and institutional award systems must be brought forward so that foreign investors can encounter the excellence of Maithili literature. At the same time, a dedicated collective effort must secure the teaching of Maithili not only in government schools but in private schools as well. Instead of trading accusations—Kayasthas blaming Brahmins and Brahmins blaming Kayasthas, or people from Madhubani, Saharsa, Madhepura, Samastipur, Begusarai and Purnia blaming one another for Maithili's plight—we must act in one direction, at one level and with one concerted effort. The public must be brought into the movement. Instead of preoccupying ourselves with making awards, we must devote ourselves to recognising writers of the people, leaders of the people, and sellers who can reach the people.

Leave foreign investment aside. Even when an Indian publisher wished to enter this field, or the government purchasing machinery wished to buy a Maithili book, or a voluntary organisation wished to select Maithili books for translation, the leading figures of Maithili literature who became advisers supplied misleading lists. Numerous Mithilakshar manuscripts were taken abroad, and many people created endless disputes. As a result, everyone fled—outsiders as well as those who had come to serve Maithili. Government purchases were not made on the basis of quality but on recommendations, influence and numerous other factors. How can we approach foreign investors while carrying all these negative features?

The indirect impact of foreign investment on Maithili: A reduction in the number of Maithili speakers and a decline in Maithili vocabulary are considered indirect effects of foreign investment. In fact, however, these developments have resulted more from the uncontrolled growth of large cities in India and Nepal and the expansion of small towns through land transactions without an independent economic base. The amount of migration that Maithili speakers have undergone in one generation has occurred over three or four generations among other communities—Tamil- or Bengali-speaking communities, for example. Migration abroad has brought language loss among speakers of other languages too, but it has not entailed the loss of culture, either among those communities or among Maithili speakers. In Delhi, it has become proverbial that members of other communities begin speaking Punjabi after five years in the city and that women in their households start observing Karva Chauth, while Maithili speakers neither learn Punjabi nor adopt Karva Chauth. But if you do not speak Maithili with your wife and never let your child even visit the ancestral village, the child will certainly stop speaking Maithili. Foreign investment in Hindi and English cartoon channels has endangered not only Maithili but Punjabi as well. Yet this is a phase, and it will end within twenty years. Families that stop speaking Maithili during those twenty years cannot be brought directly back to it. Because of their cultural closeness, however, they will continue to support and respect Maithili projects, translations, audiovisual productions and communication initiatives. This will indirectly prove a blessing for Maithili. A period of renaissance is taking place now, and it will recur twenty years later. Maithili will emerge alive from the struggle and become stronger.

What foreign investors gain from investment in Maithili: Foreign investors also undertake welfare work. They must be made aware of Maithili's special qualities. The late world-renowned violinist Yehudi Menuhin described Maithili as the most rhythmic and melodious language in the world after hearing Vidyapati's music on the BBC, a statement also quoted by Uday Prakash. Some foreign investors make investments on the basis of UNESCO's language policies. Such welfare-oriented investment is not based on profit, government procurement or advertising. If educational books and entertainment- and health-related films and documentaries are produced in Maithili through internationally certified non-governmental organisations and distributed through gram-panchayat schools in Maithili-speaking areas, the sense of inferiority among Maithili speakers will diminish, and an economic revolution will accompany the linguistic revolution.

36. Jayakant Mishra and the Maithili Dictionary

Abstract

Jayakant Mishra (1922–2009), a pioneer of Maithili, died at seven in the evening on 3 February 2009. Dr Jayakant Mishra, a distinguished scholar of Maithili literature, retired in 1982 as Professor and Head of the Department of English and Modern European Languages at the University of Allahabad. He subsequently served as Dean of Languages and Social Sciences at Chitrakoot Gramodaya University.

Keywords: Jayakant · Mishra · Dictionary · Critical Theory · Maithili

Abstract · Abstract

This chapter presents a fieldwork-based study of folk culture concerning "Jayakant Mishra and the Maithili Dictionary". Jayakant, Mishra, Maithili, dictionaries and words emerge as its principal concerns. Through examples, quotations and arguments in the original materials, it compares fieldwork, oral sources and written texts, allowing readers to grasp both the critical structure of the subject and its wider context.

Jayakant Mishra (1922–2009), a pioneer of Maithili, died at seven in the evening on 3 February 2009. Dr Jayakant Mishra, a distinguished scholar of Maithili literature, retired in 1982 as Professor and Head of the Department of English and Modern European Languages at the University of Allahabad. He subsequently served as Dean of Languages and Social Sciences at Chitrakoot Gramodaya University. The late Mishra was president of the All-India Maithili Sahitya Samiti, Allahabad; honorary secretary and editor of the Ganganath Research Institute, Allahabad; convener of the management department of the Hindi Sahitya Sammelan, Prayag; and Maithili representative and language editor for the Sahitya Akademi, New Delhi. His books included A History of Maithili Literature, Folk Literature of Mithila, critical editions of the Kīrtaniyā dramas, Lectures on Thomas Hardy, Lectures on Four Poets, and The Complex Style in English Poetry. Only two volumes of his extensive Maithili dictionary could be published. In them, Maithili words appeared not only in Devanagari but also in Mithilakshar and phonetic Roman transcription. Both volumes will remain an inspiration to lexicographers of Maithili. On the basis of the Videha database, the sixteen-volume Maithili–English dictionary compiled by Gajendra Thakur, Nagendra Kumar Jha and the genealogist Vidyanand Jha—which gives words and meanings in Mithilakshar, international phonetic Roman script and Devanagari—has been dedicated to Jayakant Mishra, Dinbandhu Jha–Govind Jha, Bhavnath Mishra–Matinath Mishra 'Matang', and Yugal Kishore Mishra.

Dictionary-making began late in Maithili. The first serious effort consisted of the 1,125 verbal-root forms included in Dinbandhu Jha's Mithilā Bhāṣā Vidyotana (1946), followed by his compiled Mithilābhāṣākoṣaḥ dictionary (1952). Earlier, the first volume of Bhavnath Mishra's Mithilā Śabda Prakāśa had appeared in 1914. It was, however, very brief and might be described as a glossary rather than a dictionary.

Alice Irwin Davis's Basic Colloquial Maithili: A Maithili–Nepali–English Vocabulary (1984) is also extremely concise. The Maithili Academy's Maithili Dictionary (1993; Yugal Kishore Mishra was the original compiler) was the first project to appear on a truly ambitious scale. Yet, amid the names of the convener, editor, executive editor, editorial subcommittee and so forth, Mishra's name appears only in an intermediate position as 'original compiler'.

Meanwhile, the first volume of Jayakant Mishra's Comprehensive Maithili Dictionary appeared in 1973 and its second in 1995. Together these volumes could cover words beginning with the vowels from a to au and only the first page of words beginning with ka. With Jayakant Babu's death, publication of the succeeding volumes is no longer possible.

Bhavnath Mishra's son, Matinath Mishra 'Matang', published Maithili Śabda Kalpadruma in 1998. After Yugal Kishore Mishra's dictionary for the Maithili Academy, Patna, this was the second dictionary to appear with an enormous lexical collection. The first volume of Bhavnath Mishra's Mithilā Śabda Prakāśa is also reproduced at its beginning.

Dinbandhu Jha's son Govind Jha published the Maithili–English Dictionary (Kalyani Kosh, 1999). Like Jayakant Babu's dictionary, it was bilingual, supplying English meanings alongside Maithili words. In 2007 Umesh Chandra Jha's concise four-language dictionary (Maithili, Sanskrit, Hindi and English) also appeared.

In addition to these works, Sajha Prakashan of Nepal has proposed a comprehensive Maithili dictionary.

Dictionaries Based on English-Language Lexical Databases

Apart from historically important English dictionaries, three contemporary works deserve mention for their scientific principles and their reliance on databases or computerised corpora of written and spoken material—newspapers and magazines, books, oral conversation, language used in radio and television programmes, and manuscripts:

1. Oxford Advanced Learner's Dictionary (from its first edition in 1948 to the seventh edition, listed here as 1995);

2. Longman Dictionary of Contemporary English (from its first edition in 1978 to the fifth edition in 2009); and

3. Collins COBUILD Advanced Learner's English Dictionary (from its first edition in 1995 to the sixth edition in 2008).

The Microsoft Encarta Dictionary, available on CD and online, also provides audio recordings of pronunciation; CD editions of the Oxford Advanced Learner's Dictionary and other dictionaries likewise supply such recordings.

The excellence of a dictionary should be judged by the collection of words it contains. First, the reader must find the word being sought. This cannot happen unless the dictionary is up to date, based on fieldwork—covering every region of Mithila and new usages among migrant Maithils—and inclusive of emerging fields, such as the Internet, science, the arts, commerce, computing and contemporary developments. Scholarship must be joined to technology in choosing the subject matter. Sports and play, informal conversation, written literature and oral literature must all be included. The definition of each word is equally important: the selected word demands an analysis of such linguistic precision that no context or shade of meaning is lost. In this connection, Dinbandhu Jha's 1,125 verbal-root forms deserve attention. If these were further enlarged and revised to approximately 2,000 fundamental words, Maithili speakers lacking a firm command of their language could understand the meanings and contexts of the entries in a Maithili dictionary of 50,000–100,000 words.

The meanings of words should be arranged from their most frequent to their less frequent senses. Oral pronunciation and actual usage must also receive attention. Readers should be told which words are common and which are used only occasionally. Proverbs, too, should be illustrated with examples wherever appropriate.

Alongside an entry, it is essential to record compounds, compound expressions formed from proverbs, derivatives of a word, synonyms and antonyms. The association of a word or idiom with other words, and its use in the same or a closely related sense, must likewise be demonstrated.

Grammatical discussion should be provided at suitable places, indicating both similarities and differences. Changes in a word's meaning according to its use in a sentence must be shown.

Illustrations are also necessary to explain entries in a dictionary. A modern scientific dictionary must record variations in pronunciation.

The contextual uses of idioms and proverbs must be given. For example, a Brahmin may say, 'Ten Brahmins, ten stomachs; ten rāṛ, one stomach,' whereas someone on what is called the lower rung of the caste hierarchy may say, 'Ten Brahmins, one stomach; ten rāṛ, ten stomachs.' Such competing usages should be recorded wherever they exist.

Words must be shown in sentences. Giving only a few words as their meaning leads to numerous incorrect usages. This can be corrected by showing the entry within a complete sentence. Examples can even be taken from poetry, where complete sentences are also employed.

Software dictionaries should be developed so that a dictionary can be presented on CD or the Internet, with phonetic and spoken examples.

Phonetic transcription: the International Phonetic Alphabet (IPA) is the most widely used system of phonetic transcription, and its use is necessary in bilingual and multilingual dictionaries.

Jayakant Mishra and the Maithili Dictionary

In the personal statement prefacing the first volume of his Maithili dictionary, Jayakant Mishra writes that Dr Subhadra Jha—whom he regards as Maithili's foremost linguist and who was formerly librarian of Varanaseya Sanskrit University—showed as much reluctance to assume the responsibility of chief editor of the dictionary as he had displayed in 1965 when Maithili was being recognised as India's seventeenth literary language at the Sahitya Akademi. Mishra drew on Subhadra Jha's The Formation of the Maithili Language (1958) for notes on the etymology of Maithili words, as Suniti Kumar Chatterji observes in his introduction to the first volume. Jayakant Mishra's dictionary established a benchmark for many other reasons as well, including the following.

1. Assembly of contemporary lexical material. Sources included Dinbandhu Jha's Mithilābhāṣā Śabdakośa; Badrinath Jha's Maithili–Sanskrit Dictionary; Sir George A. Grierson's Bihar Peasant Life and Maithili dictionary in the Maithili Chrestomathy (1882); Dr Subhadra Jha's material from Sarvananda's commentary on the Amarakośa; Mahamahopadhyaya Dr Umesh Mishra; the vocabularies of Ruchipati, Jagaddhara and Vidyapati; words extracted from the Caryāgīti edited by N. N. Vasu; from the Varṇaratnākara edited by Suniti Kumar Chatterji and Babuaji Mishra; from Vidyapati's poems edited by Khagendranath Mitra and Majumdar; from Kṛṣṇajanma edited by Sir George Grierson; and proverb collections edited by Surendra Jha 'Suman', Riddhinath Jha and Rameshwar Jha.

2. Published books and published manuscripts as references. These included Jyotirishwar's Maithili Dhūrtasamāgama (1324), Vidyapati's Gorakṣavijaya (1415), Kanharam's Gaurī Svayaṃvara (1842), and works by Lochan, Govinddas, Chanda Jha, Harshanath Jha, Laldas, Harimohan Jha, Suman, Yatri and others.

3. Periodicals with long publication histories. Mithila Mihir, Mithila Mod and Vaidehi were used as sources.

4. An audio corpus. Spoken and dialect forms of words were collected with tape recorders, and agricultural and boatmen's vocabularies were gathered.

Vocabulary relating to paddy, mangoes, original villages and genealogical registers was nevertheless omitted.

5. First attestations. The earliest recorded use of a word was determined from the corpus and documented in the dictionary. Shri Shashinath Chaudhary of Mishra Tola contributed to this work.

6. Type and transcription. The dictionary used Tirhuta type prepared by the Rajaram Type Foundry Press, Katghar, Allahabad, under the guidance of Mahamahopadhyaya Dr Umesh Mishra. Roman phonetic transcription was also used to clarify pronunciation.

7. Scholarly assistance. Dr Sir Ganganath Jha, Dr Amarnath Jha and Mahamahopadhyaya Dr Umesh Mishra helped gather books and periodicals for the dictionary. Professor Harimohan Jha, Babu Lakshmipati Singh, Professor Buddhidhari Singh Ramakar, Professor Surendra Jha 'Suman' and Kanchinath Jha 'Kiran' served as unpaid advisers. The assistant editors were Raghavacharya Shastri, Dr Umakant Tiwari, Jaygovind Mishra, Professor Sushil Chandra Chaudhary, Jiveshwar Jha, Yashodhar Jha, Dr Kishorenath Jha and Professor Rudrakant Mishra.

8. Grammatical analysis. Meanings were divided into numbered senses such as 1 and 2, according to usage. The entries provided grammatical information, including obsolete words and poetic uses; etymology for indigenous and borrowed words; comparisons, antonyms and synonyms where appropriate; and corpus-derived example sentences containing the word being defined.

Dinbandhu Jha's Dhātupāṭha in Mithilā Bhāṣā Vidyotana gives excellent semantic derivations. For example, '(10) ḍik—to hold or contain more': 'This place is deep, so water has ḍikal here'—that is, more water has been contained there. The forty-three tables in the two volumes of Mithilā Bhāṣā Vidyotana set out Maithili etymologies in detail. The introduction to Dinbandhu Jha's Mithilā Bhāṣā Koṣa likewise discusses the formation, pronunciation, grammatical gender and grammar of many words. In the dictionary proper, though not for every entry, most words are accompanied by their component analysis, grammatical features and meanings. Variants of words and differences in meaning caused by their association with verbs or other words are also indicated here and there.

Yugal Kishore Mishra's dictionary for the Maithili Academy, Patna, provides a word, then its grammatical characteristics and meaning. Alice Irwin Davis's Basic Colloquial Maithili: A Maithili–Nepali–English Vocabulary (1984) uses only Roman and phonetic Roman letters. It gives Maithili words, grammatical characteristics, and their meanings in Nepali and English. After several structural notes, Nepali and English indexes allow meanings to be retrieved from Nepali into Maithili and from English into Maithili.

In Bhavnath Mishra's Mithilā Śabda Prakāśa, the word appears in Maithili, followed by its Hindi and Sanskrit meanings, grammatical gender, and finally Sanskrit evidence. Matinath Mishra 'Matang's' Maithili Śabda Kalpadruma gives the Maithili word, its grammatical features and meaning, and then identifies whether it is Maithili, indigenous, tatsama or tadbhava.

Along with an introductory analysis of structure and pronunciation, the appendices to Govind Jha's Kalyani Kosh: A Maithili–English Dictionary contain tables of verbal suffixes, nominal suffixes and units; solar months and lunar mansions; lunar months; different calendrical eras; weights and measures, linear measures and square measures; currency; and miscellaneous counting systems. The dictionary itself gives the Maithili headword in Devanagari, its Roman phonetic transcription, its grammatical characteristics and its meanings in Maithili and English. Alternative senses and contexts are given in some places. Umesh Chandra Jha's four-language dictionary lists a Maithili word with its Sanskrit, Hindi and English equivalents. In C-DAC's software-based Maithili–English and English–Maithili dictionary, entering a Maithili word produces its English meaning, while entering an English word produces its Maithili equivalent.

The Maithili–English and English–Maithili dictionaries prepared by Gajendra Thakur, Nagendra Kumar Jha and the genealogist Vidyanand Jha draw on the Videha corpus. They are available in print and online (http://www.videha.co.in/) and are continuously expanded. They include Internet, computing and scientific terminology along with other modern subjects. In the present Maithili–English dictionary, the Maithili headword is given in the International Phonetic Alphabet, followed by transliteration into Devanagari and Mithilakshar, and then its meaning in the IPA, Devanagari and Mithilakshar, with an English meaning and grammatical particulars at the end. The English–Maithili dictionary based on the Videha corpus gives an English word and its grammatical particulars, then its meaning in the IPA, Devanagari and Mithilakshar, and finally its meaning in English.

After the complete database has appeared in print, a second edition is planned in which definitions will be arranged from their most frequent to least frequent meanings. It will also include compound words, compound expressions based on proverbs, derivatives, synonyms and antonyms, grammatical discussion showing both similarity and difference in the words associated with idioms, illustrative pictures, contextual uses of idioms and proverbs, and example sentences drawn from the Videha corpus. A software dictionary on CD, containing phonetic recordings, is also planned. Audio pronunciation files are already available to download or hear online in the archive at http://www.videha.co.in/.

Jayakant Mishra and the Maithili Dictionary: An Assessment

A dictionary is not written so much as collected. When a subject is new, however, new words have to be coined with reference to the oral and literary traditions, and loanwords must sometimes be accepted. The dictionary's immediate objective may be collection, but, whether its editor wishes it or not, it advances the process of standardisation and influences everyday usage. The editor's responsibility therefore increases.

In this respect, Jayakant Mishra's dictionary is in no way inferior to a modern dictionary. Indeed, it goes one step further by providing corpus-based sentences to determine meanings, supported by references from ancient Maithili (from the eighth century to 1324, including the Caryāpada and Jyotirishwar); the earlier medieval period (1324–1500, including Vidyapati); the medieval period (1500–1860, including Lochan and Govinddas); and modern Maithili (1860–1960, including Chanda Jha and Harimohan Jha).

Jayakant Mishra's Maithili Dictionary and the scholarship surrounding Jayakant Mishra and Maithili lexicography can thus complement one another—provided the work he began is carried forward and completed.

37. Administrative and Social Vocabulary Found in the Pañjī System

Abstract

The account below presents certain administrative and social terms collected through the examination of 11,000 JPG images of palm-leaf genealogical registers (pañjī), as described below …

Keywords: Pañjī · Genealogical Administration · Administrative Vocabulary · Social Vocabulary · Critical Studies

Abstract · Abstract

This chapter presents a narrative-literary critical study of "Administrative and Social Vocabulary Found in the Pañjī System". The genealogical administration, its available administrative and social vocabulary, and the terminology itself are central concerns. On the basis of examples, quotations and arguments in the source material, it examines narrative content, characters, structure, language and social meaning so that readers may understand both the critical organisation of the subject and its broader setting.

The following administrative and social vocabulary was collected by examining 11,000 JPG images of palm-leaf genealogical registers (pañjī).

Administrative, scholarly and social designations recorded in the genealogical registers include sāndhivigrahika (an officer concerned with treaties and disputes), dharmādhyakṣa (religious or judicial overseer), caturvedādhyāyī (scholar of the four Vedas), yājñika (ritual officiant), pārṇāgārika, vārtika, mahāmāttaka, bhāṇḍāgārika (treasury officer), sthānāntarika, rājavallabha, raula, khaṇatarī, kāpani, phūlahara, purohita, kulakṣetropāryaka, āvasthika, kaṇṭakoddhārakāraka, jyotirvid (astronomer or astrologer), padāṅkita, paṇḍitarāja, upāyakāraka and ekāntarika. Further entries designate persons as vaidika (Vedic scholar), vaiyākaraṇa (grammarian), āgamācārya (teacher of the Āgamas), tarka-pañcānana, kavi, kavirāja, kaviśekhara, kavikeśarī, kavīndra, kavimaṇi, mīmāṃsaka (scholar of Mīmāṃsā), naiyāyika (logician), devāgārika, dharma-adhikaraṇika (judicial or religious court functionary), naivandhika, and mudrāhastaka (seal-holder). Among those identified in association with these titles are Vishvambhar, Purandar, Gonu Jha, Ghanashyam, Ganapati Mishra, Pitambar, Kulapati, Chaturbhuj, Madhav, Vireshwar, Bhagirath, Dhananath, Jivapati, Krishnadev, Baldev, Kaladhar, Nityanand, Badrinath, Chandradatt, Amritnath, Buddhinnath, Devnath, Radhnath, Dinbandhu, Matinath, Harshanath, Brajgopal, Jaygopal, Chintamani, Padmanabh, Gangadas, Ratidev, Yadunath, Bhupat, Yashodhar, Vidyapati, Bhanudatt, Janardana, Durgadhar, Udayakant, Jayadatt, Narasimha, Gadadhar, Gunishwar and Lakshmipati. The entries often give a village or ancestral origin, the father–son relationship, scholarly title, and an abbreviated reference number. The full source transcription, preserving its duplicates, variant spellings, abbreviations, names and numerical references, follows:

Archival Register — Original Transcription

सांधिविग्रहिक, धर्माध्यक्षक, चतुर्वेदाध्यायी, याज्ञिक, पार्णागारिक, वार्तिक, महामत्तक, भाण्डागारिक, स्थानान्तरिक, राजवल्लभराजवल्लभ, स्थानान्तरिक, राउल, खनतरी, कापनि, फूलहर, सन्धि बिग्रहिक, पुरोहित, कुल छेत्रोपार्यक, आवस्थिक, कन्टकोद्धार्कारक, ज्योतिविर्वद, पदांकित, पण्डित राज पदांकित, उपाय कारक, एकान्तरिक, माण्डर सँ वैदिक विश्वम्भर, सिहौली माण्डरसँ पुरन्दर सुत वैदिक गोनू झा, नर वलि. सँ घनश्याम सुत वैदिक गणपति मिश्र, खौआलसँ कमल सुत म. गुणाकर वैदिक पिताम्बर, सिंहौलि माण्डरसँ वैदिक विश्वम्भर सुत म. कुलपति म. चतुर्भुज, दरिहरासँ रघुनाथ सुत म. माधव वैदिक विरेश्वर, दरिहरासँ म. माधव सुत वैदिक भगीरथ, दरिहरासँ कीर्तिनाथ

सुत वैदिक धननाथ, दरिहरासँ रामसुत वैदिक भगीरथ, सकराढ़ीसँ नकटू सुत वैदिक चन्दरक्त, माण्डर सँ वै. अच्छपति सुत वैदिक जीवपति, सोदरपुरसँ वैदिक होरी, दरिहरा सँ राम द्दौ० विभाकर सुतौ वैदिक विश्वम्भर, सकराढ़ीसकराढ़ी सँ हरिश्वर द्दौ० वैदिक: विश्वम्भर, माण्डर सँ वैदिक विश्वम्भर, कमल सुतो कृष्णदेव महो गुणाकरौ (१०९//०४) वैदिक (१०९/०४) पीताम्बरा:, माण्डरसँ माण्डरसँ भैरव द्दौ० वैदिक विधूप्र०, वैदिक युदनाथ:, वैदिकवैदिक विरेश्वर, वैदिकवैदिक भगीरथ, वैदिक विश्नाथ, वैदिक घननाथ, वैदिक चन्द्रदत्त, दरिहरा सँ वैदिक जीवनाथ, वैदिक अच्छपति, वैदिकवैदिक बलदेव, दरिहरा सँ वैदिक जीवनाथ दौहित्र दौ, वैदिकवैदिक कलाघर, दरिहरा सँ राम सुत वैदिक भगीरथ दौ, वैदिक राजा महो गोशाई, वैदिक मुकुन्द, बेचू सुतो वैयाकरण धरनीघर वैदिक वनखण्डीकौ, वैदिक नित्यानन्द, वैदिक सोनी, वैदिक बद्रीनाथ, वैदिकवैदिक विधु, हरिअम सँ मुक्तिनाथ द्दौ०वैदिक तुलानन्द, वैदिक चन्द्रदत्त प्रेमदत्त, सोदरपुरसोदरपुर सँ चित्रधर द्दौ० वैदिक धननाथ, वैदिकवैदिक अमोदयानाथ, वैदिक हेमागंद, वैदिक गणपति वैदिक कुलपतिको, बैदिक गुणपति सुता आँखी वैदिक कलाघर, अपरा वैदिक कुलमणि, वैदिकवैदिक आदिनाथ, वैदिक कुलपति, ज्यो., वैयाकरणवैयाकरण भैरवदत्तौ, वैयाकरण अमृतनाथ बुद्धिनाथ देवनाथ, वैयाकरण राम:, वैयाकरणवैयाकरण राधनाथ, वैयाकरण परमेश्वर, सरिसबसरिसब सँ झोटह द्दौ०वैयाकरण नन्दीपति, वैयाकरण गौरीशंकर, वैयाकरणवैयाकरण रज्जे, खण्डबला सँ भगीरथ द्दौ. महा वैयाकरण दिनबन्धु सुता वैया. जीवनाथ, वैयाकरणवैयाकरण मतिनाथ, सकुरीपाली सँ वैयाकरण श्रीदत्त सुत वै. मनभरन दौ, वैयाकरण रूपनाथ, वैयाकरणवैयाकरण मतिनाथा:, कविकवि हेमनाथ सुता वैयाकरण महिनाथ, वैयाकरण रामनाथ उँमानाथ:, वैयाकरणवैयाकरण खुशिहाल, वैयाकरण भवानीदत्त देवीदत्ता, वैयाकरण हेमनाथ दौ, वैयाकरण हरिनाथा:, वैयाकरणवैयाकरण ऋद्धि, छक्कनछक्कन वैयाकरण, महो चण्डेश्वर सुतो वैयाकरण (२७६//०७) शिवेश्वर:, खौआल सँ वैयाकरण मोदनाथ दौ, वैयाकरण (२०१/०४) मोदनाथ, वैयाकरण गोपाला:, वैयाकरणवैयाकरण मेघनादौ, वैयाकरण चंलल:, वैयाकरण ईश्वरीदत्त सुतो, वैयाकरणवैयाकरण हर्षनाथ दौ, वैयाकरण (०४/०६) ब्रजगोपाल जयगोपाल वैयाकरण प्राध्यापक (Calcutta university Maithily Deptt.) खूद्दीका महिषी पाली सँ दिनानाथ सुत शक्तिनाथ दौ, वैयाकरणवैयाकरण महावीर, वैयाकरण हरिनारायणा, वैयाकरण नन्दीपति, वैयाकरण एकनाथ, कुजौली सँ गंगादत दौ वैयाकरण रघुनाथ, हरिअम सँ

तुलसीदत्त द्वौ वैयाकरण खुद्दी, अपरावैयाकरण सुता वैयाकरण भैये सुग्गे, वैयाकरण चिन्तामनि, देयाम सँ वैयाकरण मधुकर, पिताम्बर सुतो वैयाकरण पद्मनाम, वैयाकरणवैयाकरण रवूदीका, हरिअम सँ हिंगु द्वौ वैदिक सोनी सुता वैदिक कुलमणि वैदिक वंशमणि कमलमणि परशमणि (२८०/०१) हर्षमणिका: दरिहरा सँ वैदिक जीवनाथ दौ, पाली सँ श्रीनाथ द्वौ पुरन्दर सुतो वैदिक गोनू वैदिक हेमाङ्गदो, वैदिक घनश्याम, खौआलसँ काशीपति द्वौ वैदिक घनश्ययाम (१६०/०५) सुतो वैदिक गणपति वैदिक ब., वैदिक गणपति सुता ऑखी वैदिक कलाधर (२६८/०९) रकनी कविभानु वैदिक, वैदिक केशव, वैदिक गोशाइका:, वैदिकवैदिक गोशाँई, सरिसब सँ चतुर्भूज द्वौ० वैदिक गिरधारी, आदिनाथा: ब., माण्डरसँ वैदिक विश्वम्भर, आगमाचार्यक म० म० उपा० (९६//०४) देवनाथ, आगमाचार्यक देवनाथ, एकहरा सँ आगमाचार्यक महो मुकुन्द, कन्टकोद्धार्कारक म०म० मधुसूदन, तर्क पञ्चानन म० म० उपा० गोपीनाथ, विरेश्वर कविशेखर इति प्रसिद्ध, कटाइ सँ कवि केशरी म०म० भीम, माण्डर सँ कविराज शुभंकर, वलियास सँ कविशेखर पदांकित चन्द्रनाथ, सोदरपुरसोदरपुर सँ ढाका कवि महामहो गणपति, कुजौली सँ महो कृष्ण दाशसुत कवि गंगादाश, करमहा सँ कविन्द्र पदांकित रति देव, दरिहरा सँ कविराज विसव, करमहा सँ कविन्द्र पदांकित रतिदेव, टकवाल सँ कविराज लक्ष्मीपाणि, पाली सँ कविशेखर पदांकित यदुनाथ, विस्फी सँ कवि भूपति पदांकित सोमेश्वर, माण्डर सँ कविशेखर पदांकित महो यशोधर, जगति सँ महामहोकवि रत्न पदां. होरे, पाली सँ घौघे सुत कविराज कृष्णपति, वलियास सँ कविशेखर पदांकित चन्द्रनाथ, वलियास सँ कवि मणि पदांकित पशुपति, गंगोली सँ कविराज गयन, ए सुतो महामहो विद्यापति गंगोली सँ मानकुढ वासी कविराज गणेश्वर, सोदरपुरसँ कविराज महो भानुदत्त, सोदरपुरसोदरपुर सँ कवि जयराम, तपोवन सँ कवि धनेश्वर, अलय सँ शान्तिकरणीक रूद, नरवाल सँ शान्तिकरणीक मधुकर, कलिगाम सँ शान्तिकरणीक भोगीश्वर, माण्डरसँ शान्तिकरणीक पाँखू, दानाधिकारी मोदी हल्लेश्वर, जगतिसँ मिमांशक म. म. मिरुस, (मिमांशक) हरि देवधरापत्य-सिंघिया, मिश्रा (मिमांशक) सुधाधरपत्य उसरौली, मिश्र (मिमांशक) लाखू भूड़ी गणेश्वर-परमगढ, मिमांशक विभू, मिमांशक माधव, भवेश्वर सुता मिमांशक रूद, नोने सुता मिमांशक मिसरू, राम सुतो मिमांशक योगदत्त:, मिमांशक मेघानाथ, मिमांशक मणि, मिमांशक जयदेव, मिमांशक धरनी, मिमांशक योगदत्त:, करमहा सँ मिमांशक योगदत्त, जगतिसँ मिमांशक म. म. मिरुस, जनार्दन सुत

नैयायिक दुर्गाधर, नैयायिक महौ दुर्गाधर, षट्शास्त्री नैयायिक दर्शनशास्त्रज्ञ उदयकान्तो, दिघो सँ देवागारिक बाटे, दिघो सँ देवागारिक बटेश्वर, पार्णागारिक विरेश्वर, दिघोयसँ पार्णागारिक जानू दत्त, पार्णा गारिक स्थितिदत्त, धर्माधिकरणिक जानुदत्त, पबौली सँ धर्माधिकरणिक रूद, गंगोली सँ धर्माधिकरणिक जान्हव, धर्माधिकरणिक महामहो नरहरि, धर्माधिकरणिक गदाधर, सुरगन सँ धर्माधिकरणिक भास्कर, करिअमसँ म.म. धर्माधिकरणिक मरथ, खौआलसँ शर्म्मा धर्माधिकरणिक म.म. उ.हरिशर्म्मा, दिघोयसँ जयदत्त सुत धर्माधिकरणिक भट्टजीवे, धर्माधिकरणिक म.म. (२३/०१०) नरसिंह, धर्माधिकरणिक महोमहोपाध्याय गदाधर, धर्माधिकरणिक वाटू, नैवंधिक-नैवंधिक वीरेश्वर, नैवंधिकधीरेश्वर, मुद्राहस्तक गुणीश्व, सुत म.म. आभो एसुत, मुद्राहस्तक कुल छेत्रोपार्यक राउल, गढ़बेलउँच सँ मुद्राहस्तक गुणीश्वर, मुद्राहस्तक लक्षपति, मुद्राहस्तक लक्ष्मीदत्त

Archival Register — Roman Transliteration

sāṃdhivigrahika, dharmādhyakṣaka, caturvedādhyāyī, yājñika, pārṇāgārika, vārtika, mahāmattaka, bhāṇḍāgārika, sthānāntarika, rājavallabharājavallabha, sthānāntarika, rāula, khanatarī, kāpani, phūlahara, sandhi bigrahika, purohita, kula chetropāryaka, āvasthika, kaṇṭakoddhārkāraka, jyotivirvada, padāṃkita, paṇḍita rāja padāṃkita, upāya kāraka, ekāntarika, māṇḍara saṁ vaidika viśvambhara, sihaulī māṇḍarasaṁ purandara suta vaidika gonū jhā, nara vali. saṁ ghanaśyāma suta vaidika gaṇapati miśra, khauālasaṁ kamala suta ma. guṇākara vaidika pitāmbara, siṃhauli māṇḍarasaṁ vaidika viśvambhara suta ma. kulapati ma. caturbhuja, dariharāsaṁ raghunātha suta ma. mādhava vaidika vireśvara, dariharāsaṁ ma. mādhava suta vaidika bhagīratha, dariharāsaṁ kīrtinātha suta vaidika dhananātha, dariharāsaṁ rāmasuta vaidika bhagīratha, sakarāḍhīsaṁ nakaṭū suta vaidika candarakta, māṇḍara saṁ vai. acchapati suta vaidika jīvapati, sodarapurasaṁ vaidika horī, dariharā saṁ rāma ddauo vibhākara sutau vaidika viśvambhara, sakarāḍhīsakarāḍhī saṁ hariśvara ddauo vaidika: viśvambhara, māṇḍara saṁ vaidika viśvambhara, kamala suto kṛṣṇadeva maho guṇākarau (109//04) vaidika (109/04) pītāmbarā:, māṇḍarasaṁ māṇḍarasaṁ bhairava ddauo vaidika vidhūprao, vaidika yudanātha:, vaidikavaidika vireśvara, vaidikavaidika bhagīratha, vaidika viśnātha, vaidika ghananātha, vaidika candradatta, dariharā saṁ vaidika jīvanātha, vaidika acchapati, vaidikavaidika baladeva, dariharā saṁ vaidika jīvanātha dauhitra dau, vaidikavaidika kalāghara, dariharā saṁ rāma suta vaidika bhagīratha dau, vaidika rājā maho gośāī, vaidika mukunda, becū suto vaiyākaraṇa dharanīghara vaidika vanakhaṇḍīkau, vaidika nityānanda, vaidika sonī, vaidika badrīnātha, vaidikavaidika vidhu, hariama saṁ muktinātha ddauovaidika tulānanda, vaidika candradatta premadatta, sodarapurasodarapura saṁ citradhara ddauo vaidika dhananātha, vaidikavaidika amodayānātha, vaidika hemāgaṃda, vaidika gaṇapati vaidika kulapatiko, baidika guṇapati sutā āṁkhī vaidika kalāghara, aparā vaidika kulamaṇi, vaidikavaidika ādinātha, vaidika kulapati, jyo., vaiyākaraṇavaiyākaraṇa bhairavadattau, vaiyākaraṇa amṛtanātha buddhinātha devanātha, vaiyākaraṇa rāma:, vaiyākaraṇavaiyākaraṇa rādhanātha, vaiyākaraṇa parameśvara, sarisabasarisaba saṁ jhoṭaha ddauovaiyākaraṇa nandīpati, vaiyākaraṇa gaurīśaṃkara, vaiyākaraṇavaiyākaraṇa rajje, khaṇḍabalā saṁ bhagīratha ddau. mahā vaiyākaraṇa dinabandhu sutā vaiyā. jīvanātha, vaiyākaraṇavaiyākaraṇa matinātha, sakurīpālī saṁ vaiyākaraṇa śrīdatta suta vai. manabharana dau, vaiyākaraṇa rūpanātha, vaiyākaraṇavaiyākaraṇa matināthā:, kavikavi hemanātha sutā vaiyākaraṇa mahinātha, vaiyākaraṇa rāmanātha umāmānātha:, vaiyākaraṇavaiyākaraṇa khuśihāla, vaiyākaraṇa bhavānīdatta devīdattā, vaiyākaraṇa hemanātha dau, vaiyākaraṇa harināthā:, vaiyākaraṇavaiyākaraṇa ṛddhi, chakkanachakkana vaiyākaraṇa, maho caṇḍeśvara suto vaiyākaraṇa (276//07) śiveśvara:, khauāla saṁ vaiyākaraṇa modanātha dau, vaiyākaraṇa (201/04) modanātha, vaiyākaraṇa gopālā:, vaiyākaraṇavaiyākaraṇa meghanādau, vaiyākaraṇa caṃlala:, vaiyākaraṇa īśvarīdatta suto, vaiyākaraṇavaiyākaraṇa harṣanātha dau, vaiyākaraṇa (04/06) brajagopāla jayagopāla vaiyākaraṇa prādhyāpaka (Calcutta university Maithily Deptt.) khūddīkā mahiṣī pālī saṁ dināntha suta śaktinātha dau, vaiyākaraṇavaiyākaraṇa mahāvīra, vaiyākaraṇa harinārāyaṇā, vaiyākaraṇa nandīpati, vaiyākaraṇa ekanātha, kujaulī saṁ gaṃgādata dau vaiyākaraṇa raghunātha, hariama saṁ tulasīdatta ddau vaiyākaraṇa khuddī, aparāvaiyākaraṇa sutā vaiyākaraṇa bhaiye sugge, vaiyākaraṇa cintāmani, deyāma saṁ vaiyākaraṇa madhukara, pitāmbara suto vaiyākaraṇa padmanāma, vaiyākaraṇavaiyākaraṇa ravūdīkā, hariama saṁ hiṃgu ddau vaidika sonī sutā vaidika kulamaṇi vaidika vaṃśamaṇi kamalamaṇi paraśamaṇi (280/01) harṣamaṇikā: dariharā saṁ vaidika jīvanātha dau, pālī saṁ śrīnātha ddau purandara suto vaidika gonū vaidika hemāḍgado, vaidika ghanaśyāma, khauālasaṁ kāśīpati ddau vaidika ghanaśyayāma (160/05) suto vaidika gaṇapati vaidika ba., vaidika gaṇapati sutā ŏṃkhī vaidika kalādhara (268/09) rakanī kavibhānu vaidika, vaidika keśava, vaidika gośāikā:, vaidikavaidika gośāmī, sarisaba saṁ caturbhūja ddauo vaidika giradhārī, ādināthā: ba., māṇḍarasaṁ vaidika viśvammara, āgamācāryaka mao mao upāo (96//04) devanātha, āgamācāryaka devanātha, ekaharā saṁ āgamācāryaka maho mukunda, kaṇṭakoddhārkāraka maōmaō madhusūdana, tarka patrcānana mao mao upāo gopīnātha, vireśvara kaviśekhara iti prasidva, kaṭāi saṁ kavi keśarī maōmaō bhīma, māṇḍara saṁ kavirāja śubhaṃkara, valiyāsa saṁ kaviśekhara padāṃkita candranātha, sodarapurasodarapura saṁ ḍhākā kavi mahāmaho gaṇapati, kujaulī saṁ maho kṛṣṇa dāśasuta kavi gaṃgādāśa, karamahā saṁ kavindra padāṃkita rati deva, dariharā saṁ kavirāja visava, karamahā saṁ kavindra padāṃkita ratideva, ṭakavāla saṁ kavirāja lakṣmīpāṇi, pālī saṁ kaviśekhara padāṃkita yadunātha, visphī saṁ kavi bhūpati padāṃkita someśvara, māṇḍara saṁ kaviśekhara padāṃkita maho yaśodhara, jagati saṁ mahāmahokavi ratna padāṃ. hore, pālī saṁ ghaughe suta kavirāja kṛṣṇapati, valiyāsa saṁ kaviśekhara padāṃkita candranātha, valiyāsa saṁ kavi maṇi padāṃkita paśupati, gaṃgolī saṁ kavirāja gayana, e suto mahāmaho vidyāpati gaṃgolī saṁ mānakuḍha vāsī kavirāja gaṇeśvara, sodarapurasaṁ kavirāja maho bhānudatta, sodarapurasodarapura saṁ kavi jayarāma, tapovana saṁ kavi dhaneśvara, alaya saṁ śāntikaraṇīka rūda, naravāla saṁ śāntikaraṇīka madhukara, kaligāma saṁ śāntikaraṇīka bhogīśvara, māṇḍarasaṁ śāntikaraṇīka pāṁkhū, dānādhikārī modī halleśvara, jagatisaṁ mimāṃśaka ma. ma. mirusa, (mimāṃśaka) hari devadharāpatya-siṃghiyā, miśrā (mimāṃśaka) sudhādharapatya usaraulī, miśra (mimāṃśaka) lākhū bhūḍī gaṇeśvara-paramagaḍha, mimāṃśaka vibhū, mimāṃśaka mādhava, bhaveśvara sutā mimāṃśaka rūda, none sutā mimāṃśaka misarū, rāma suto mimāṃśaka yogadatta:, mimāṃśaka meghānātha, mimāṃśaka maṇi, mimāṃśaka jayadeva, mimāṃśaka dharanī, mimāṃśaka yogadatta:, karamahā saṁ mimāṃśaka yogadatta, jagatisaṁ mimāṃśaka ma. ma. mirusa, janārdana suta naiyāyika durgāghara, naiyāyika mahau durgādhara, ṣaṭśāstrī naiyāyika darśanaśāstrajña udayakānto, digho saṁ devāgārika bāṭe, digho saṁ devāgārika baṭeśvara, pārṇāgārika vireśvara, dighoyasaṁ pārṇāgārika jānū datta, pārṇā gārika sthitidatta, dharmādhikaraṇika jānudatta, pabaulī saṁ dharmādhikaraṇika rūda, gaṃgolī saṁ dharmādhikaraṇika jānhava, dharmādhikaraṇika mahāmaho narahari, dharmādhikaraṇika gadādhara, suragana saṁ dharmādhikaraṇika bhāskara, kariamasaṁ ma. ma. dharmādhikaraṇika maratha, khauālasaṁ śarmmā dharmādhikaraṇika ma. ma. u. hariśarmmā, dighoyasaṁ jayadatta suta dharmādhikaraṇika bhaṭṭajīve, dharmādhikaraṇika ma. ma. (23/010) narasiṃha, dharmādhikaraṇika mahomahopādhyāya gadāghara, dharmādhikaraṇika vāṭū, naivaṃdhika-naivaṃdhika vīreśvara, naivaṃdhikadhīreśvara, mudrāhastaka guṇīśva, suta ma. ma. ābho esuta, mudrāhastaka kula chetropāryaka rāula, gaḍhabelaumca saṁ mudrāhastaka guṇīśvara, mudrāhastaka lakṣapati, mudrāhastaka lakṣmīdatta

The scientist Aryabhata, 476–550.

An entry concerning Aryabhata in the pañjī reads, with its recorded numerical reference (27) (34/08): a genealogical sequence beginning with Mahipati and Pitambar, then Damu, Trinayan Bhatta, Aryabhata, Udayabhatta, Vijayabhatta, Sulochan Bhatta (Sunayan Bhatta), Bhatta, Dharmajati Mishra, Dharajati Mishra, Brahmajari Mishra, Tripurajati Mishra, Vidhujati Mishra, Ajay Singh, Vijay Singh, Adivaraha, Mahavaraha, Duryodhan Singh and Sodhar Jaysingh; it ends by describing the learned Narasimha as accomplished in the great science of arms. The palm leaf is indistinct, and the name may also be read Adibhatta. In Aryabhata's own writings the only relevant statement is that he is expounding knowledge at Kusumapura (Patna). Most manuscripts of Aryabhata's Āryabhaṭīya have been found in Kerala. Nevertheless, the chronological coincidence connects the pañjī's Adibhatta/Aryabhata with the author of the Āryabhaṭīya.

Genealogical Entry — Original Transcription

पञ्जीमे आर्यभट्टक विवरण- (२७) (३४/०८) महिपतिय: मंगरौनी माण्डैर सै पीताम्ब र सुत दामू दौ माण्ड्र सै वीजी त्रिनयनभट्ट: ए सुतो आर्यभट्ट: ए सुतो उदयभट्ट: ए सुतो विजयभट्ट ए सुतो सुलोचनभट (सुनयनभट्ट) ए सुतो भट्ट ए सुतो धर्मजटीमिश्र ए सुतो धाराजटी मिश्र ए सुतोब्रह्मजरी मिश्र ए सुतो त्रिपुरजटी मिश्र ए सुत विघुजटी मिश्र ए सुतो अजयसिंह: ए सुतो विजयसिंह: ए सुतो ए सुतो आदिवराह: ए सुतो महोवराह: ए सुतो दुर्योधन सिंह: ए सुतो सोढ़र जयसिंहर्काचार्यास्त्रस महास्त्र विद्या पारङगत महामहोपाध्या य: नरसिंह: । । तालपत्र अस्पष्ट अछि आ आदिभट्ट: सेहो पढ़ल जा सकैए, आर्यभट्टक अपन रचनामे मात्र एतबे चर्चा भेटैत अछि जे ओ कुसुमपुर (पटना) मे ज्ञानक वर्णन कऽ रहल छथि, अर्यभट्टक आर्यभटीयक अधिकांश पाण्डुलिपि केरलमे भेटल अछि। मुदा कालक समानता पञ्जीक आदिभट्ट/ आर्यभट्ट कैं आर्यभटीयक आर्यभटसँ मेल करबैत अछि।

Genealogical Entry — Roman Transliteration

pañjīme āryabhaṭṭaka vivaraṇa- (27) (34/08) mahipatiya: maṃgaraunī māṇḍaira sai pītāmba ra suta dāmū dau māṇḍra sai vījī trinayanabhaṭṭa: e suto āryabhaṭṭa: e suto udayabhaṭṭa: e suto vijayabhaṭṭa e suto sulocanabhaṭa (sunayanabhaṭṭa) e suto bhaṭṭa e suto dharmajaṭīmiśra e suto dhārājaṭī miśra e sutobrahmajarī miśra e suto tripurajaṭī miśra e suta vighujaṭī miśra e suto ajayasiṃha: e suto vijayasiṃha: e suto e suto ādivarāha: e suto mahovarāha: e suto duryodhana siṃha: e suto soḍhara jayasiṃharkācāryāstrasa mahāstra vidyā pāraṅagata mahāmahopādhyā ya: narasiṃha: . . tālapatra aspaṣṭa achi ā ādibhaṭṭaḥ seho paḍhala jā sakaie, āryabhaṭṭaka apana racanāme mātra etabe carcā bheṭaita achi je o kusumapura (paṭanā) me jñānaka varṇana ka' rahala chathi, aryabhaṭṭaka āryabhaṭīyaka adhikāṃśa pāṇḍulipi keralame bheṭala achi. mudā kālaka samānatā pañjīka ādibhaṭṭa/ āryabhaṭṭa kem̐ āryabhaṭīyaka āryabhaṭasam̐ mela karabaita achi.

Mahamahopadhyaya Gonu Jha, 1050–1150

The registers describe Gonu Jha of Sonkariyam, Karamhe, as ‘Mahamahopadhyaya Dhurtaraja Gonu’. A calculation by generations (the Sonkariyam–Karamhe line of Gonu is now in its twenty-fourth generation) places his birth after Aryabhata (the Mandar–Kashyap line is in its thirty-ninth generation) and before Vidyapati (the Bisfi–Kashyap line is in its fourteenth generation), at about 1050 CE. Multiplying the generations in this manner by forty yields approximately 476 CE for Aryabhata and approximately 1350 CE for the Sanskrit–Avahaṭṭa poet Vidyapati Thakur, dates that agree with accepted history in the author’s account. A prince of Bharaura was Gonu Jha’s fellow villager; the boatman-hero of the folktale ‘Bahura Godhin Natua Dayal’ also belongs to this place. His shrine remains in Bharaura.

Maharaja Harisinghdev. He belonged to the Karnata dynasty of Mithila. In Jyotirishwar Thakur’s Varṇaratnākara, Harisinghdev figures as a patron or king. He was born in 1294 and ascended the throne in 1307. After defeat by Ghiyasuddin Tughlaq in 1324–25, he fled to Nepal. He is regarded as the formal founder of the pañjī system among Mithila’s Brahmins, Kayasthas and Kshatriyas. Gunakar Jha was first appointed for the Maithil Brahmins, Shankardatt for the Karna Kayasthas and Vijaydatt for the Kshatriyas. Under the inspiration of Harisinghdev, a descendant of Nanyadev, who, according to the cited chronogram ‘nandaida śūnyaṃ śaśi śāka varṣe’, founded the Karnata line in the year identified here as Shaka 1019, the scholars of Mithila resolved in Shaka 1248, or 1326 CE, to initiate the present form of pañjī administration. Later, a few intellectually self-indulgent persons secured an order from Maharaja Madhav Singh of Mithila in 1760 to have genealogists prepare branch books (śākhā-pustaka). After this, a new Brahmin subcaste called ‘Shrotriya’ emerged in Mithila, supposedly in a period sometimes described in the registers as Shaka 1600 (1678 CE), but actually, the author argues, around 1800, after Madhav Singh.

Minister Ganeshwar. A minister of the Karnata ruler Harisinghdev of Mithila. Sugatisopāna describes Mithila’s constitutional history.

Maharaja Nanyadev. Founder of the Karnata dynasty of Mithila in 1097 CE; he died in 1147. Malladev was the son of its founder Nanyadev. The Gandhavariya Rajputs of Mithila regard Malladev as their founding ancestor.

Maldwar. The five-pravara Naruar family of the Vatsa gotra from Karamhe: Raja Ramlochan Chaudhary of Maldwar, approximately 2,500 years earlier; Raja Durga Prasad Chaudhary.

Raja Buddhinath Chaudhary (Maldwar)—Kumar Vaidyanath Chaudhary.

Chhatrnath Chaudhary (Durgaganj)—Tanknath Chaudhary—Karmanath / Sheshnath / Rudranath.

Ek Chhali Maharani—Dr Madaneshwar Mishra.

Surgane Lauam: Parashara gotra.

The original village of Lauam lay between Basaithi and Purnia; it no longer exists.

The Shandilya-gotra line with its ancestral origin at Tilai-bar.

Baneli village—Agaru Rai; his son-in-law Pranpati of the Surgane–Lauam ancestral line; his son Samar Jha.

Approximately 1575–1625 (around the sixteenth century): he purchased a zamindari from the Delhi Sultanate, became Samar Chaudhary and later took the title Maharaja.

Two branches of Lauam:

Maharaja Krishnadev (Pahsara–Basaithi);

Maharaja Bhagirath of Sauria (between Katihar and Sonaili). One place was called Dandkhora, where criminals were punished by the Sauria branch.

Five generations later, the Pahsara–Basaithi succession runs Krishnadev—Devnarayan—Vir Narayan—Ramchandra Narayan (described by John Buchanan in the Purnia Gazetteer as the 'King of Purnia')—Indranarayan (who had no children). Queen Indravati (a name acquired in her marital household; her original name was Lilavati) died on 15 November 1803, at midday, in Purnia. For the expenses of the śrāddha, 5,000 rupees were received from the Purnia judge against a demand for 15,670 rupees, according to proceedings dated 29 November 1803 before the Board of Revenue at Fort William. Raja Rajendranarayan and Raja Mahendranarayan of the Sauria line were contemporaries of Indranarayan. Maharaja Indranarayan died in 1776; Queen Indravati ruled for the following twenty-seven years.

The Baneli estate: Ramnagar, Srinagar, Garh-Baneli, Sultanganj and Champanagar.

The Shyama temple; a stipend for studying Sanskrit in Banaras; Queen Chandravati of Koilakh (daughter-in-law of Raja Padmanand Singh and wife of Kumar Chandranand Singh)—Ramnagar.

Visheshwar Jha came from Baigani Nawada to Pahsara for employment. His son was Diwan Devanand, followed by Param-anand, a mansabdar of the Chaturdhari line. Through his evening gāyatrī observance he gradually came to acknowledge Samar Singh of Baneli. Dular Chaudhary, later styled Singh of the Baneli estate, is called 'Chaudhary' by Buchanan and 'Singh' only once.

In 1680–1700, the Darbhanga estate and the battle of Kandarpi Ghat: Raja Narendra Singh stood between the Delhi Sultanate and the people. Accused of Brahmin-killing on the banks of the Bagmati at Samastipur, Narendra Singh was opposed by the Bari Brahmins, who were settled by the descendants of Maharaja Samar Singh of the Surgane–Lauam line of Purnia, specifically Maharaja Narnarayan of Pahsara–Basaithi east of the Kosi, from Forbesganj to Dandkhora in Katihar. They later returned to Darbhanga in the time of Madhav Singh.

The Baneli estate paid salaries to Khuddi Jha and Parameshwar Jha in the time of Ashutosh Mukherjee.

An honorific panegyric to the Darbhanga rulers occurs in the pañjī: 'vividha-virudāvalī-virājamāna mānonnatamāna pratijñā-pada … paraśurāma … nṛparāja mahograpratāpa mithilāṅkāra mahārājādhirāja Mādhava Siṃha Bahādura Kāmeśvara Siṃha.'

Lakshmipati Mishra, the nine-lakh holder of Dhakjari and a Shandilya-gotra member of the Kodariye line, received a pañjī. He gave Rameshwar Singh a contribution of one and a half lakh rupees. The Chaudharys of Pindaruch, including Nityanand Chaudhary, also obtained genealogical registers.

Gunakar Jha. A contemporary of Harisinghdev in 1326 CE, from Tatail village. Ten generations later the family was in Kakraur, Madhubani district: Raghudev Jha—Anand Jha—Devanand, known as Chhoti Jha (a contemporary of Darbhanga's Madhav Singh and his order for the branch books, placed here around 1650)—Mitranand, known as Jhonti Jha—Gopinath Jha, known as Horil Jha—Harkhanand, known as Harkhi Jha. Then comes a Dinkar note from 159 years earlier, recording a birth at Rasadh near Banmankhi, Purnia: Bholanath, known as Bhikhiya Jha—Modanand Jha—the genealogist Vidyanand Jha, known as Mohanji. Their ancestral origin is Padua (Pandua), Mahindrapur; the gotra is Kashyap, with three pravaras.

'Khan'—the Kujilwar–Ullu ancestral line, Katyayana gotra.

Uteṛh. Before a marriage siddhānta is drawn up, the rights or eligibility of the bridegroom's and bride's families are examined, initially on the basis of their mūla, or ancestral line. Gotra and pravara are also examined to ensure that a marriage does not take place within the same gotra. The gotra can usually be determined from the mūla, although exceptions exist. For example, Brahmpura includes seven gotras, among them Kashyap, Gautam, Vatsa and Vasishtha; in Karamha the Gaul branch is Shandilya, while the others belong to the Vatsa gotra. Marriage between the two Karamha branches is therefore possible.

Chanda Jha—Mandar Rajoura.

'Rāmo 'vetti nalo 'vetti vetti rājā purūravā.'

'Alarkasya dhanaṃ prāpya nānyadevo nṛpo bhaviṣyati.'

Nanyadev arrived on horseback, tired and thirsty. He tied his horse beneath a tree and began cutting fodder for it. A cobra appeared with its hood raised and something written upon it, but Nanyadev could not read the language of Mithila. Kameshwar Thakur, who lived in that village, read it out and told him that he was to be King Nanyadev of Mithila.

Harisinghdev handed the kingdom over in writing to Chandeswar, a descendant of Kameshwar Thakur, and fled. Soldiers pursued Chandeswar. He threw water upon one man, who remained standing where he was; he flung water at another, who became blind. Hence the name Andhara Tharhi.

From Varṣakṛtya: 'When Bihula came, she spread it out;

when Sama departed, she folded it away.'

Rules concerning rights in the genealogical registers: the Dhaka poet, a grandson of Ayachi Mishra, received a jagir in Dhaka. A debate took place between the Tantric Halli Jha and Shiv Kumar Shastri. By means of the Tantric technique called pratyāhāra-vāk, Halli rendered Shiv Kumar Shastri speechless.

Taskar Keshav. The Mangrauni–Naraune–Sulhani line of the Parashara gotra and Khagnath Jha of the Mandar–Sihaul ancestral line, Kashyap gotra, lived at Jamsam. A girl was selected in marriage for Maharaja Lakshmishwar Singh. A pond was excavated and a temple built in the village, for how could a king worship in someone else's temple? Keshav Jha took the girl back to the village. While a dhoti was being dyed, a man who came to investigate was seized and made to officiate at the giving away of the bride. What could the king do thereafter? He summoned the genealogist and had the epithet Taskar ('thief') prefixed to Keshav's name. Khagnath Jha's and Shrikant Jha's records show that, had the Shrotriya Taskar Keshav married there, he would have retained the Shrotriya rank. The pañjī and water both flow downwards; the former first rank across the western bank no longer exists.

There are forty-three ancestral lines (mūla) in the Shandilya gotra, forty in Vatsa, twenty-seven in Kashyap, seven in Savarna, five in Katyayana, seven in Parashara, five in Bharadwaj, and three in Garga.

When the Sun occupies Leo, from 16 August to 16 September, the sunlight is at its fiercest for drying anything.

The Mandar-line book written by Pandit Raghudev Jha bears dates from the last decade of the seventeenth century and the first decade of the eighteenth. The branch book written by his grandson, Pandit Devanand Jha, known as Chhoti, dates from 1760–1776. The records are on palm leaves.

Pandit Bhikhiya Jha's branch book was written by Pandit Domai Mishra of the Hariamb ancestral line, resident at Koilakh. The branch book associated with Pandit Harshanand Jha was written by Pandit Mitranand Jha, known as Jhonti. Other branch books include the one associated with Pandit Jhulanand Jha (brother of Bhikhiya Jha), and that of Pandit Modanand Jha, which incorporates material associated with his maternal uncle Pandit Lutan Jha and his maternal cousin Pandit Nirsu Jha; these were written at Saurath between 1925 and 1935. These branch books contain gotra-pañjī, describing gotras and ancestral lines; patra-pañjī, giving descendants and ancestral villages and thereby revealing changes of residence; and dūṣaṇa-pañjī, recording alleged defects within a lineage, which can also serve as evidence against orthodoxy. The volumes also disclose the titles in use during their respective periods.

Technical vocabulary. Before recording a lineage, the pañjī gives its ancestral line or mūla, followed by the name of the individual. This is followed by a reference to the man's male offspring, written as sutaḥ, sutau or sutāḥ. Where a man has no sons but has a daughter, the entry may use sutā or sutāś ca. After sutaḥ, sutau or sutā appears the name of the child, then the ancestral village and line of the child's maternal grandfather. In some instances the original village is not recorded. Later in the book the mūla may be given only through an initial and a dot, without the word saṃ ('from'), because a reader progressing through the records will already recognise the line. In particular cases the father-in-law's name is preceded by the name of his father or even his grandfather. After the father-in-law's name the abbreviation dau. appears: it indicates that the person whose name carries dau. is the daughter's son, or dauhitra, of the person appearing before the name that follows sutaḥ, sutau or sutā; in other words, that earlier person is the maternal grandfather of the child or children indicated. Thereafter the father-in-law is identified with his mūla, and the word dauhitra appears after the name, abbreviated ddau. One must also understand that a branch book does not have a separate subject index: subject references are integrated with its genealogical contents.

38. The Influence of English Literature on the Maithili Novel

Abstract

The beginnings of the novel. Bana Bhatta's Kādambarī opens with a description of King Shudraka's city of Vidisha. An exceedingly beautiful girl of the Chandala community comes to court with a learned parrot named Vaishampayana, and the parrot's story begins. In the Chandala settlement of Pakkana there are neither beggars nor thieves; even its king, Vyaghradev, makes rope with his own hands.

Keywords: Novel · English Literature · Influence · Literary Criticism · Maithili

Abstract · Abstract

This chapter offers a study in dramatic criticism on "The Influence of English Literature on the Maithili Novel". Maithili novels and the influence of English literature are its central subjects. Using examples, quotations and arguments in the original material, it examines dramatic texts, character organisation, stage structure and cultural contexts, so that readers may understand both the critical structure of the topic and its wider setting.

The beginnings of the novel. Bana Bhatta's Kādambarī begins with a description of King Shudraka's city of Vidisha. An exceedingly beautiful Chandala girl arrives at court with a learned parrot named Vaishampayana, and the parrot's story begins. In the Chandala settlement of Pakkana there are neither beggars nor thieves; even its king, Vyaghradev, plaits rope himself. Because of the title of this Sanskrit novel, the novel is called kādambarī in Marathi. Despite the bourgeois beginnings of the novel, the genre is sufficiently complex to put a writer's talent to a thorough test. Precisely because of its bourgeois origins, although Cervantes's Don Quixote had appeared at the beginning of the seventeenth century, the novel acquired a serious form only shortly before the nineteenth century. Debate, dispute and dialogue within a novel generate the essay; the characters of young men and women bring in romantic narrative; people and geography supply historical description; and then the stories of good and bad characters emerge. At times the novel makes the reader laugh, and at others it instructs. Marxism advocates the representation of social reality in the novel. Freud regards every human being as mysterious. He selects the literary work for an analysis of its author, while neo-Freudian thought emphasises cultural rather than biological factors. New Criticism rests upon close attention to the work itself. Life experience, too, is one-sided, and within this situation the author creates a world to satisfy suppressed desires, in which the reader moves along the boundary between reality and imagination.

Theories of the English novel. Postmodernism, existentialism and humanism are all philosophical tendencies. In earlier times philosophy encompassed science, history, society and politics, economics, aesthetics and the study of language. As the branches of science and the arts became specialised—science in particular—the relation of philosophy to mathematics and science narrowed toward mathematical logic. Philosophical methods of induction and deduction developed in the direction of analytic method. Marx, who seemed like a divine intervention for the poor throughout the world, made dialectics the basis of his explanation.

Origins and development of the English novel. In The Pilgrim's Progress, the author narrates the journey of the principal character and the struggles and moments of enthusiasm encountered along that journey.

In Robinson Crusoe, Daniel Defoe describes his protagonist's adventurous sea voyage.

Samuel Richardson's Pamela gave the English novel a more clearly defined generic form.

Aphra Behn's Oroonoko has a Black enslaved man as its protagonist, while her Love-Letters Between a Nobleman and His Sister recounts an aristocratic love story.

In Tom Jones, Henry Fielding criticises feudalism and portrays the distortions of society.

In The Portrait of a Lady, Henry James subordinates life to artistic presentation.

In Clarissa, Richardson descends into the layers of human psychology.

The characters in Joseph Conrad's The Shadow-Line reflect on the one-sidedness of their attitudes towards society and life.

The characters in D. H. Lawrence's Lady Chatterley's Lover blame the civilisation produced by culture for human distortion.

Rudyard Kipling's Kim seeks a justification for European imperialism, treating European civilisation as superior.

E. M. Forster's A Passage to India, by contrast, explores the relationship between rulers and the ruled.

Origins and development of the Maithili novel. Harimohan Jha's Kanyādāna and Dvirāgamana bring many features of Mithila's social order into view. In a mode reminiscent of the modern English novel, they portray women's education and uncritical Westernisation through humour.

Yatri's Balchanma takes the form of the autobiographical testimony of Balchanma, a member of the Yadav community. Economic problems form its central subject. The narrative follows his development from a domestic attendant to a man who gives his life for peasants' rights. Yatri Ji clearly inclined towards the Communist Party rather than the Congress and other parties. In contrast to the economic preoccupations of Balchanma, Pāro seeks a social objective. After some time, readers may regard this novel as pure fiction, because the next generation will hardly believe that such a cruel social order could ever have existed among human beings. Its importance will then increase, for it carries the responsibility of preserving those institutions as a historical record. Yet when Yatri Ji wrote about these problems they were living realities, and the novel intervened meaningfully in them.

Ramanand Renu's Dūdh-Phūl places a neglected section of society in the foreground and gives it an artistic presentation.

Lalit's Pṛthvīputra likewise brings society's neglected people into view. The novel also points to the economic problems of peasant life.

Lili Ray's Paṭākṣepa narrates the rise of left-wing class struggle and its subsequent suppression. It offers a model of the writer's immediate engagement with the problems of the country.

Dhumketu's Moṛ Par likewise recounts social and economic difficulties from a left-wing perspective, using flashback.

Saketanand's Sarvasvānta is a narrative of floods, government policies and relief operations.

Jagdish Prasad Mandal's Maulāil Gāchak Phūl concerns the village, migration away from the village, and solutions for restoring life to a decaying social order.

Chaturanan Mishra's Kalā attacks a decayed social system through its heroine, Kaladai.

Shefalika Verma's Nāgphāṃs moves across English soil. Will the current and the frontier ever meet in this life? Will some miracle take place?

In conclusion. If we look closely, it appears that English novelists attempt to carry the doctrines and perspectives of their age into their works. Yet, in moving from theory to practice, certain distinctive qualities arise of their own accord. The same holds for the Maithili novel. Whether we read Ramanand Renu or Shefalika Verma, the point is clearly visible in the technique. The sharpness with which Lili Ray's pen describes the events, society and politics around her is remarkable: it goes a step beyond the English novels. Lalit, Yatri and Dhumketu confront economic and social problems, concealing none of the relevant facts. Saketanand confronts the problem of floods. In his distinctive style, Harimohan Jha lets the current of English literature flow through his writing, even bringing it into the syllabus that his hero prescribes for the heroine's education.

Chaturanan Mishra and Jagdish Prasad Mandal have practical connections with the Communist movement, including party-level activity. Yet after reading both their novels, I have no hesitation in saying that, while Yatri and Dhumketu seem to prop up their novels with the crutch of Marxism, these two novelists feel no such need. The true meaning of Marxism can be found in their writings. They do not mention a political party or name an ideology, but the real substance of dialectical materialism is recognisable there: faith in the importance of life and the use of a dialectical method. This is possible only when a writer has studied Marxism profoundly, including Das Kapital.

The future of the Maithili novel. In every living language the novel is the genre in which the greatest number of works are written, yet in Maithili novels are produced least frequently. As the number of younger writers entering Maithili literature after studying English education and literature increases, Maithili literature will be able to develop its social, economic, political and cultural insight. Veena Thakur's Bhāratī, Asha Mishra's Ucāṭ, and Kedarnath Chaudhary's Camelī Rānī, Māhur and Karār confirm this perspective.

39. Reflections on Words: Siddha Sarahapada, the Tibetan Script, Computers and Maithili

Abstract

Apart from Devanagari, the scripts of the languages of northern India, Nepal and the south (with the exception of Tamil) employ alphabets comprising vowels and the consonantal groups ka, ca, ṭa, ta and pa, together with ya, ra, la, va, śa, sa and ha. Sanskrit has a further sign for gvāṅ: the Chāndogya tradition does not pronounce it, whereas the Vājasaneyī tradition makes extensive use of it—for example, where the former says सभूमि, the latter says सभूमीग्वंङ्. It occurs in both short and long forms. Mithilākṣara also uses at least six distinct forms for the expression siddhir astu.

Keywords: words · reflection · Siddha · Sarahapada · Tibetan · script · computers · critical theory

Apart from Devanagari, the scripts of the languages of northern India, Nepal and the south (with the exception of Tamil) employ alphabets comprising vowels and the consonantal groups ka, ca, ṭa, ta and pa, together with ya, ra, la, va, śa, sa and ha. Sanskrit has another letter for gvāṅ: the Chāndogya tradition does not pronounce it, whereas the Vājasaneyī tradition uses it freely—for example, Chāndogya will say सभूमि, while Vājasaneyī will say सभूमीग्वंङ्. It has both short and long forms. At least six different signs are employed for siddhir astu in Mithilākṣara. Vedic Sanskrit uses udātta, anudātta and svarita accents (respectively क॑, क॒ and क॑े); Marathi also uses ळ and the half-form ऴ. Maithili uses ऽ (bikārī, or avagraha) as Sanskrit does. Nowadays, for ease of typing, one also sees द' in place of दऽ, but this is evidence of a technical deficiency in the font concerned. An avagraha is not, however, needed after the ā-vowel sign.

Just as Persian has alif, be and se, and the Roman alphabet has A, B and C, the alphabets of Indian languages are, broadly speaking, similar in their arrangement despite differences of script.

Letters are of two kinds, vowels and consonants. Their total number is sixty-four: twenty-two vowels and forty-two consonants.

Let us begin with the vowels. A vowel is a sound that can be pronounced without relying upon the pronunciation of another letter.

Vowels have three varieties: short (hrasva), long (dīrgha) and protracted (pluta). A short vowel takes one mātrā of time to pronounce, a long vowel takes two, and a protracted vowel takes three.

The fundamental vowels are: अ इ उ ऋ ऌ.

Pre-Pāṇinian teachers called these samānākṣara.

The long compound vowels are: ए ऐ ओ औ.

Pre-Pāṇinian teachers called these sandhyakṣara.

The vowel ऌ has no long form, and the compound vowels have no short forms.

The short, long (आ ई ऊ ॠ) and protracted (आ३ ई३ ऊ३ ॠ३) forms of अ इ उ ऋ together make twelve letters. ऌ has two varieties, short and protracted (ऌ३), making two more. ए ऐ ओ औ are four long compound vowels, each with a protracted form (ए३ ऐ३ ओ३ औ३); these make another eight. The total is therefore twenty-two vowels.

All twenty-two vowels have three Vedic accentual forms: udātta, anudātta and svarita.

The a-class sounds articulated from a higher position, such as the palate, possess the quality of udātta and are therefore so called.

Sounds produced from a lower position are anudātta; when the first part of an a-class vowel is pronounced with udātta and its second part with anudātta, the result is svarita.

Vowels are also divided into nasalised, as in अँ, and non-nasalised, as in अ.

"Dattena nirvṛttaḥ kūpo dāttaḥ": a well constructed by a man named Datta on the northern bank of the Vipāṭ–Vyāsa is here called dātta. Because it takes the suffix añ, dātta has the initial udātta accent; if it had taken the suffix aṇ, the accent would have fallen at the end, upon the suffix. Although the visible word-form does not change, its accent does. This establishes that ordinary agricultural communities too pronounced words with their proper accents.

Svarita may also be understood in another way: the final vowel is sounded again with heightened pitch.

We now turn to consonants.

There are forty-two consonants.

क् ख् ग् घ् ङ्

च् छ् ज् झ् ञ्

ट् ठ् ड् ढ् ण्

त् थ् द् ध् न्

प् फ् ब् भ् म्

य् र् ल् व्

श् ष् स्

ह्

य्, व् and ल् also occur in nasalised forms—यँ, वँ, लँ—as well as in non-nasalised forms.

In addition there are two further consonantal signs: anusvāra and visarjanīya, or visarga.

Both occur after vowels.

Visarjanīya is not an independent original letter but a modification of स् or र्. With differences of sound and form, it has two varieties, jihvāmūlīya and upadhmānīya. The former occurs only before क and ख; the latter only before प and फ.

Anusvāra, visarjanīya, jihvāmūlīya and upadhmānīya are called ayogavāha.

Beyond these letters, there are four further sounds called yama.

कुँ खुँ गुँ घुँ (as in पलिक् क्नी, चख ख्नुतः, अग् ग्निः and घ् घ्नन्ति).

When a fifth consonant of a class follows, the intervening sound resembling the preceding consonant is called yama.

Yama too belongs to the ayogavāha class.

अ, आ, the ka-class, uncombined ह and visarjanīya are articulated in the throat.

इ, ई, the ca-class, य and श are articulated at the palate.

ऋ, ॠ, the ṭa-class, र and ष are articulated at the roof of the mouth (mūrdhan).

ऌ, the ta-class, ल and स are articulated with the teeth.

उ, ऊ, the pa-class and upadhmānīya are articulated with the lips.

व is articulated with the upper teeth and the lower lip.

ए and ऐ are articulated in the throat and at the palate.

ओ and औ are articulated in the throat and with the lips.

In pronouncing य, र, ल and व, the tip and other parts of the tongue do not make complete contact with the palate and other articulatory locations as they do for other consonants. Nor do these sounds involve the friction at the palate and other places that occurs with श्, ष्, स् and ह्.

The letters from क to म are stops (or plosives: the tip of the tongue blocks and then releases the airflow); those from र to व are approximants (antaḥstha), and those from ष to ह are fricatives.

The fifth member of each consonantal class is called nasal because, while its other place of articulation remains the same, it is also produced through the nose: air passes out through both nose and mouth.

Anusvāra and yama are pronounced only through the nose and are accordingly called nāsikya: the oral passage remains closed and the air escapes through the nasal passage. Anusvāra should not be pronounced as न् or म्.

When we desire to speak, intention stimulates the digestive fire (jaṭharāgni). Air near the navel rises forcefully towards the head; after being checked by the tip and other parts of the tongue, it rubs against the palate and other parts of the mouth, and letters are produced. Through vibration the air acquires resonance (nāda), and when this resonant air reaches the mouth the sound is called voiced (ghoṣavān). When it reaches the breath without resonance, it is called unvoiced (aghoṣavān).

Letters whose nature is that of breath are “unvoiced” (aghoṣa), while those whose nature is resonance are “voiced” (ghoṣavān). Sounds produced with little breath are alpaprāṇa (unaspirated); those produced with an abundance of breath are mahāprāṇa (aspirated).

In each of the ka, ca, ṭa, ta and pa classes, the first, third and fifth members are alpaprāṇa; the second and fourth are mahāprāṇa. Likewise, the first and second members are unvoiced, while the third, fourth and fifth are voiced. य, र, ल and व are voiced and unaspirated. श, ष and स are unvoiced and aspirated; ह is voiced and aspirated. Vowels are unaspirated and may carry udātta, anudātta or svarita accent.

Journey to Sikkim (Travelogue)

Siddha Sarahapada and the Tibetan Script: When I placed a photograph of Siddha Sarahapada in the design of Radhakrishna Chaudhary's book, my attention was drawn almost involuntarily to the Tibetan writing beneath it—a script quite different from Chinese and bearing affinities with Sikkim's Lepcha and Limbu (Subba language). Sikkim's Chogyal kings were Buddhists. They and their descendants are called Sikkimese, such as the Demjongpa; they speak the Bhutia language. But when Bhutia speakers came to the royal court from Bhutan, Tibet and elsewhere, a distinction arose between "Sikkimese" and "Bhutia" to differentiate the two communities. Broadly speaking, if you ask people in Sikkim, they will call all these non-Nepali languages, including Tibetan, "Bhutia."

In Gangtok, Bharat Subba says he is a pure Nepali and that the Subba language (Limbu) has its own script. He saw his grandfather reading it, but does not himself know the language. Lepcha, however, has a distinct language and script of its own.

Dinesh Kharka is a Nepali Brahmin. He says that in Sikkim there is no restriction on studying Nepali, Bhutia or Lepcha. The Lepchas are the indigenous people of the region. Learning Bhutia makes it easier to find employment in the tourism department. He also says that the Nepali spoken in Nepal differs from that spoken here. We say laṛkā–laṛkī for boy and girl, whereas in Nepal the words are bābū and nānī. Kānchhā and kānchhī refer to the youngest boy and girl (the youngest bābū and nānī) in a household. Urgen Bhutia's mother is Nepali, so he does not know Bhutia very well. He lives not in Sikkim but in Darjeeling, in West Bengal, where the educational system is ill-disposed towards languages other than Bengali and Nepali. It is like Bihar's education system, which is intolerant of languages other than Hindi; thus Bhutia may be regarded as virtually extinguished there. Sikkim, by contrast, is liberal in this respect.

At first Chhiring tells me that he speaks Bhutia, which he calls Tibetan. Later, on the road to Lachung in North Sikkim, he stops somewhere to eat. A woman there says that she is Tibetan. A lama who has come from Dehradun is staying with her, and he teaches me the Tibetan script. Lachen lies beside Lachung. On seeing a yak, Chhiring now explains the actual distinction. Sheep-herders are called dongpa, he says. People from Lachung take the surname Lachungpa; he himself is from neighbouring Lachen and is therefore called Chhiring Lachenpa. Not all Lachungpas are dongpas, but most dongpas bear the surname Lachungpa. The Dengjongpas live in Gangtok and engage in trade. Tok means "on a height," as in the place called Ganesh Tok. He says the languages of the Lachenpas and Lachungpas differ from Bhutia. They are Buddhists. The difference between Lachungpa and Lachenpa speech is one of shortened and lengthened forms. The road beyond Lachung goes as far as Zero, where trees and vegetation disappear and oxygen becomes scarce; yet snow may be seen there until May and early June. Along the roads and near the monasteries one sees prayer wheels inscribed with mantras in Tibetan. On the way to a monastery, a child monk prevents us from turning a prayer wheel, explaining that it should be turned on the return journey, and then only clockwise. Along the roads one finds 108 flags bearing mantras in Tibetan. When all of them are white, they have been raised by relatives in memory of someone who has died; when they are of different colours, they have been flown for the pacification of planetary influences. Chhiring says that the wind cannot bring a flag down while the mantra written on it remains legible; only when it has become soiled and faded can the wind carry it away.

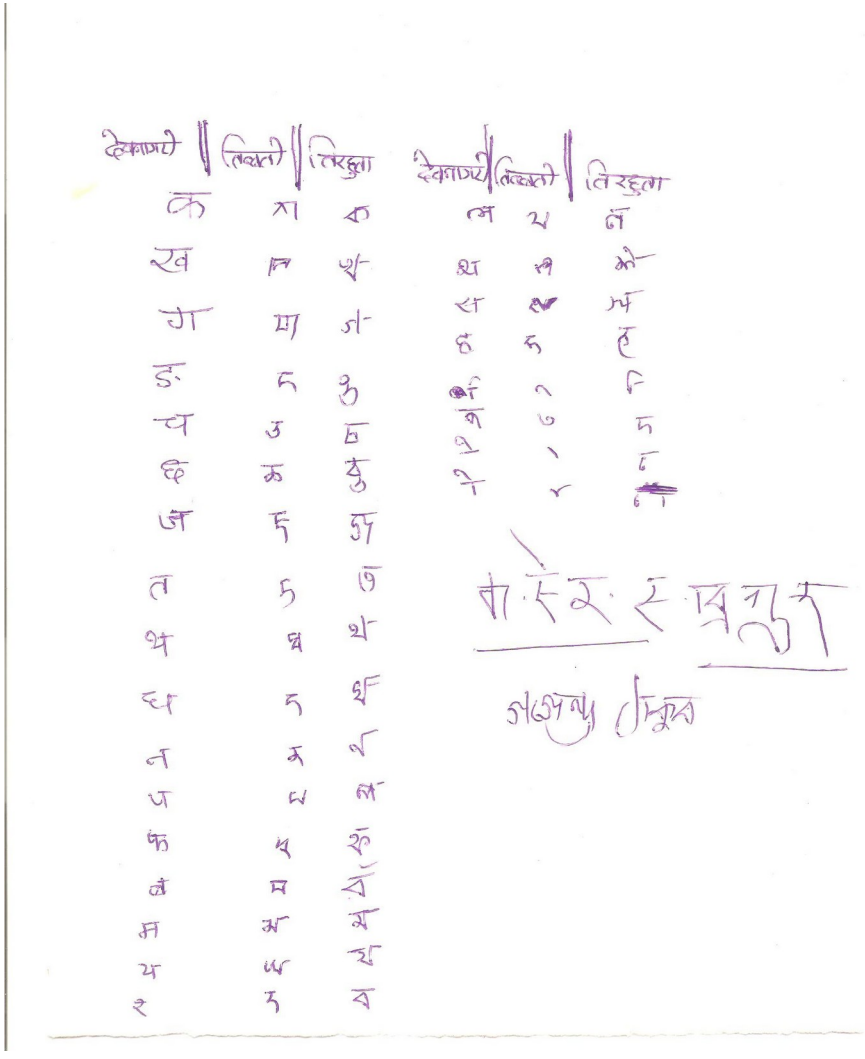
At Tsangu Lake on the way to Nathu La ("the pass of the listening ears"), in eastern Sikkim, I meet Pradeep Tamang with a yak. His village lies behind the mountain. He says that Tibetan and Bhutia are different languages, though they also share similarities. Nathu La is at an altitude of fourteen thousand feet, and the pass has been used for trade between India and Tibet since ancient times. Here, as at Zero, one feels the shortage of oxygen. Tibetan traders still bring silk through this pass to the covered market at Sherathang village and take biscuits and Dalda back in exchange.

In Gangtok, Dinesh Tamang says he is a Nepali Buddhist, though he was born in Bengal. He believes the demand for Gorkhaland will not be accepted, because accepting it would also entail accepting demands for separate provinces in the Kantapuri (Kamatapuri) area of Jalpaiguri and in Cooch Behar. He regards the languages of both places as distinct from Bengali, calling them "Bāyā Bengali" (Bāhe Bengali). He also maintained that, besides their language, Bāhe Bengalis differ physically from Bengalis; indeed, he said, if the truth be told, these Bāhe Bengalis were the original Bengalis.

The accompanying illustration shows the method of learning the Tibetan script.



Computers and Maithili

Google Translator Toolkit has now given Maithili a place both as a source language and as a target language. See: http: //support.google.com/translate/toolkit/bin/answer.py?hl=en&answer=147837

And: http: //translate.google.com/toolkit/list?hl=en#translations/active

Following Videha's objection, Google has accepted that there is no language called "Bihari." Videha had already established "Wikipedia Maithili," and Wikipedia had likewise accepted earlier that no such language as "Bihari" exists.

Google Maithili: Google Language Tool—

http: //www.google.com/transconsole/giyl/chooseProject

Contribute to Google Translate, and when revising an existing translation explain in the "reason" field (in English) that there is no language called "Bihari." Translate at the following link after logging in through a Google account.

http: //www.google.com/transconsole/giyl/chooseActivity?project=gws&langcode=bh

Keep checking this link for the availability of Maithili: http: //www.google.co.in/language_tools?hl=en

[Notice 1. The applications submitted by Anshuman Pandey to encode both Kaithi and Mithilākṣara in the Universal Character Set (Unicode) have been approved. The process of creating Unicode fonts for the two scripts has now entered the queue; when their turn comes, work on the basic fonts will begin. The basic font for Mithilākṣara will be named Tirhuta (just as the basic Devanagari font is called Mangal and the basic Bengali font Vrinda). The Mithilākṣara application was submitted in a third revised version. Both the second and third submissions discussed Videha's contribution in detail, as follows: "Figure 11: Excerpt from a Maithili e-journal published as PDF (from Videha 2011: 22; Videha: A fortnightly Maithili e-journal. Issue 80 (April 15, 2011), Gajendra Thakur [ed]. http: //www.videha.co.in/." "Gajendra Thakur of New Delhi graciously met with me and corresponded at length about Maithili, offered valuable specimens of Maithili manuscripts, printed books, and other records, and provided feedback regarding requirements for the encoding of Maithili in the UCS."—Anshuman Pandey.]

Notice 2. Google Maithili: Google Language Tool—

Notice 3. Wikipedia Maithili

Videha members have translated 2,600 MediaWiki messages from English into Maithili. Now go to http: //translatewiki.net/wiki/Special:Translate?task=untranslated&group=core-mostused&limit=2000&language=mai and use the Group drop-down menu to translate untranslated messages. If you are not yet a Wikipedia translator, request permission to translate into Maithili at http: //translatewiki.net/wiki/Project:Translator. Before doing so, log in at the upper right (or create an account if you have none), select Maithili as your language in Preferences, click the link to your user account and create your user page. After some time you will receive permission to translate. You can then begin translating.

http: //translatewiki.net/wiki/Project:Translator

http:
//meta.wikimedia.org/wiki/Requests_for_new_languages/Wikipedia_Maithili

http: //translatewiki.net/wiki/Special:Translate?task=untranslated&group=core-mostused&limit=2000&language=mai

http: //incubator.wikimedia.org/wiki/Wp/mai

http: //translatewiki.net/wiki/MediaWiki:Mainpage/mai

In Videha's third issue (1 February 2008), I had announced: "There were articles about Maithili on Wikipedia, but none written in Maithili, because Maithili Wikipedia had not yet been approved. I had been working on this for a long time, and I am pleased to announce that on 27 January 2008 permission was granted to start a wiki for the (Maithili) language. Yet at least five people from different places must work regularly as its editors before the project can receive final approval." More than three years have now passed and all the preliminary requirements for Maithili Wikipedia have been fulfilled. Wikipedia's Language Committee has now understood that Maithili is not a language "known by the name Bihari," and that a separate Wikipedia is needed for it. Gerard M. of Wikipedia writes (http: //ultimategerardm.blogspot.com/2011/05/bihari-wikipedia-is-actually-written-in.html):

"This information about Maithili and its relationship to the Bihari language group was provided by Umesh Mandal. Umesh is working on the localisation project for Maithili on Wikipedia ... The Language Committee is trying to determine whether Maithili can be placed under the Bihari language group ... But Umesh's answer has now made it entirely clear that the answer is 'no'."

When Ramvilas Sharma attempted to treat Maithili as a dialect of Hindi in his essay "Maithili aur Hindi," published in the Hindi monthly Pāṭal, edited by Ramdayal Pandey, Yatri Ji opposed him in an article in Hindi. Yatri was then forty-three years old (Āryāvarta, 14/21 February 1954). Rajmohan Jha's Maithili translation of that article appeared in the second issue of Ārambh. Umesh Mandal's successful intervention has an added distinction because he is still only thirty. What does it reveal that, although Maithils work in computer science in Hyderabad, Bangalore and as far away as Seattle, this protest or correction was made not by them but by a young lover of Maithili living in a remote part of Mithila?

Through fieldwork, Umesh Mandal has also digitised audio and video recordings of songs sung by people of every caste and religion in Mithila; these are available in the Videha archive.

Hindi has problems of its own. The language originally spoken in the bazaar (the Urdu bazaar) became Urdu when written in the Persian script, and Hindi when written in Devanagari. Historical references to Hindi therefore appeared later; looked at in this way, Hindi had not even a scrap of land of its own. But if we move forward from Vedic Sanskrit, and Hindi refuses to recognise Braj, Awadhi or Maithili as part of its older inheritance, what would constitute its early literature? Hence one cannot prevent Vidyapati, Mirabai, Kabir and Tulsidas from being taught within the history of Hindi's older literature; nor is there any need for an uproar when Vidyapati is called a Hindi poet. Maithili will survive only if it is strong in its own home. Hindi-speaking scholars acknowledge Vidyapati as a Maithili poet. Braj and Awadhi, which were literary languages before Hindi, have become dialects of Hindi, and literary creation in them has now ceased.

Maithili speakers will not let their language die. Authentic writers emerging from among native speakers will safeguard Maithili's independent existence through their authentic Maithili. The fear comes instead from the class that writes in pursuit of prizes while avoiding the language's culture and genuine vocabulary, that remains distant from ordinary people and their culture, yet has seized control of the official literary establishment.

TIRHUTA UNICODE

See the final UNICODE Mithilakshara Application (May 5, 2011) by Sh. Anshuman Pandey http: //std.dkuug.dk/JTC1/SC2/WG2/docs/n4035.pdf at Page 23 the Videha 80th issue (Tirhuta version) is attached "Figure 11: Excerpt from a Maithili e-journal published as PDF (from Videha 2011: 22" and at Page 12 Videha is included in References: Videha: A fortnightly Maithili e-journal. Issue 80 (April 15, 2011), Gajendra Thakur [ed]. http: //www.videha.co.in/. The role of Videha's editor is acknowledged on Page 12: "Gajendra Thakur of New Delhi graciously met with me and corresponded at length about Maithili, offered valuable specimens of Maithili manuscripts, printed books, and other records, and provided feedback regarding requirements for the encoding of Maithili in the UCS."]

Top of Form

40. Workshop in Storytelling and Story Writing (With Special Reference to Children's Stories)

Abstract

Maithili has a very old tradition of storytelling, especially the telling of children's stories to the young. Folk ballads performed night after night or throughout the day; shorter versions adapted to children's minds; grandmothers' tales combining prose and verse and extending over one or several nights; and other folktales told by grandmothers, mothers, grandfathers and fathers are its diverse forms, which have captivated the boys and girls of Mithila.

Keywords: storytelling · reading · writing · workshop · children · children's stories · special reference

1

Maithili has a very old tradition of storytelling, especially storytelling for young children. Folk ballads performed night after night or throughout the day; shorter versions adapted to children's minds; grandmothers' tales combining prose and verse and extending over one or several nights; and other folktales told by grandmothers, mothers, grandfathers and fathers are its various forms, which have captivated the children of Mithila. In contrast, knowledge of the stories associated with Saptā-Ḍorā, Madhushrāvani and Bihulā has largely been confined to girls. Even when they live in the same household, very few boys dare take part in these storytelling sessions for fear of being labelled maugiyāhā (effeminate).

Songs, proverbs and games also occur within the telling of stories. Children themselves recite and sing the stories of their games while continuing to play; no grandmother may enter, and no father or grandfather can intrude upon the boys' and girls' games.

2

Despite such a rich tradition of storytelling, why has Maithili children's fiction failed, or why is it still failing? Except for Lili Ray, I do not hesitate to say that Maithili children's literature patronised by the Sahitya Akademi—whether through publication or awards—scarcely exists as children's literature at all. If you lack talent, translate; but sponsored translations are of such a standard that even a child's father cannot get through a single paragraph without grimacing at the language.

3

The Sahitya Akademi published an anthology of children's stories drawn from twenty-four languages. Maithili too has its quota, so how could the children's stories of Ramdev Jha and his son fail to appear? When a drama anthology is due, a play is promptly produced on the same pattern. Lili Ray's story, however, is beautiful. Such practices bring Maithili into disrepute: the world comes to think that Maithili storytellers do not even understand what a children's story is.

The eighty-second Sagar Rāti will be devoted to children's stories. In that context, this workshop in storytelling and story writing for children is being initiated.

4

Jagadanand Jha "Manu" brought Chonhā to the Videha Children's Festival. Grounded in child psychology, this novel is almost a textbook for writers of children's fiction: it demonstrates how a story should be carried forward and brought to an end, and the originality of its plot distinguishes it. The Videha Children's Festival is available at the following link:

https: //sites.google.com/a/videha.com/videha-pothi/

5

Children's stories should be written so that they give pleasure both when read and when heard. They should resemble closet drama, which is not intended for staging but for reading alone or for reading aloud and listening in the company of a few others.

Simple ideas, a simple vocabulary and simple language are the keys to excellent writing for children.

The Rigveda's account of the great flood, Manu and the great fish; its descriptions of the Saraswati River and of wheeled chariots—all these anticipate the forms of early children's tales, as does the story of Gilgamesh in the Avesta. Even before the Rigveda there was an oral literature of gāthās and nārāśaṃsīs, and for that reason the Rigveda uses terms such as gāthāpati and gāthin.

Long before the Pañcatantra and its partial rewriting as the Hitopadeśa, the Jātaka stories told tales for children through birds, animals and other creatures, although one purpose of the Jātakas was the propagation of Buddhism. Similarly, while telling stories for children, the Pañcatantra introduced prejudices against women and Śūdras; hence the need to rewrite it was felt. Rigvedic narratives gave rise to dialogue, which the Purāṇic tales brought to an end. The latter therefore need to be rewritten in accordance with the present age.

6

What should the modern children's story be like?

It should contain the beneficial elements disseminated by modern science, together with environmental awareness. In other words, it should be oriented towards practice rather than mere intellectualism.

To combine entertainment with knowledge in children's stories, we need fiction informed by science and the social sciences. Children must understand their heritage; folktales, fairy tales and magical stories may therefore be told, but they must be written or rewritten so that they do not encourage superstition.

Part II

Applied Studies

Critical examinations of stories, poetry, novels, drama, folk ballads, history, philosophy, the pañjī genealogical system, children's literature, translation, and contemporary linguistic and cultural works.

41. Why Should Readers Read My Books?

Abstract

First of all, one may have heard that a work is good—but how is one to obtain the book? Earlier, sending books to Nepal cost about as much in postage as sending them within India. Now postage costs more than the book or magazine itself, and books are no longer sent to Nepal. If I am in New Jersey, and Maithili books and magazines are hardly available even in Madhubani and Darbhanga, where are they to be found in Uganda, the United States or Australia?

Keywords: readers · books · reading · poetry · literary reception

Why Should Readers Read My Books?

I would therefore tell you that all my writings are available on the Internet at http://www.videha.co.in/new_page_90.htm. This is a declaration that geographical boundaries have ended; there is no limit of stock to restrict availability either.

I shall now describe my books under the following divisions:

Original writings

Verse (poems, lyrical compositions and long poems, ghazals, and poems and ghazals for children)

Prose (stories, novels, criticism, essays, treatises, plays, editorials and children's literature)

Translations

Prose—my translations of general fiction and children's literature

Verse—my translations of poetry

Let us begin with verse. Uday Narayan Singh quoted some of my poems, which appealed to him. I reproduce his assessment below:

"Several lines may well become inscribed upon the reader's mind, such as:

> 'A wall of crumbling emotions,
> A pillar of frailty stands upright;
> The storehouse of desires is full.
> There it stands as a symbol—
> The temple of Himalayan wood kept in the house, or
> The tulsi plant placed on the veranda—
> Merely a symbol of fellow feeling.'

Or consider these lines:

'Listening to the spectacle of emptiness,
The canvas of nature,
The painting of a roaring sea,
The words of the figures in a painting of dark caverns:
No one will see this picture of mine in the dark,
Yet surely someone will hear the voice of the figure's longing.'

The influence of many cultures—not only of Mithila, but of India more widely—can be discerned in his stories and poems. This widens the field of active creative writing in Maithili, bringing forward fresh images, sounds and narratives.

What Mandākinī is the poet seeking when he says:

'The Mandākinī that was in the sky

I saw today upon the earth...'

His extensive travels clearly leave their mark upon his writing. Another distinction is plain: Gajendra Thakur the lexicographer and Gajendra Thakur the creative writer are different figures, even different personalities. In the former one encounters the editor and the technologically engaged individual; at the moment of creation, however, all of that disappears.

Many of the works contain not merely rounded narratives but political commentary as well, and he does not hesitate to offer it. Consider the many great warriors of Kurukshetra: each was accomplished and renowned within his own domain—one in commanding several akṣauhiṇīs of soldiers, another in archery, and so on. All knew the distinction between dharma and adharma, yet each seemed helpless before impending disaster. Similar circumstances appear in narrative and interpretation in our own time. This may be called the distinctive strength of the meta-text. Otherwise why would he write:

Watching the country's people being overtaken,
Awake at a noon filled with spells and incantations,
A dream steeped in murmuring thought
Becomes the fastest runner of all,
The fleetest wrestler in the arena;
The panting master's voice shatters its solitude,
Its sleep on a night painted black;
The succession of sleep and dreams breaks, returns, and breaks again,
...
It would be equally appropriate to read this meta-text as an experiment, as a distillation of the constellation of the Seven Sages, or as a modern epic divided into seven kāṇḍas."

Rajdev Mandal writes:

"Seated at the game board of the millennium, you are watching life's play. Through profound exploration you create image after image and become immersed in that exhilaration.

'A scene beside the boundless sea,
The heart filled with exhilaration...'

The poet within you summons an image of the sun and says:

'The sun's rays spread everywhere;
How many mysteries vanished;
The mist of darkness grew fearful—
But what is this...?'

I had the welcome opportunity of reading some haiku in the collection—something to vary the taste. Your poems bring the fragrance of Mithila into our minds:

'I remember the paddy fields,
The cicadas and the kachaurī,
The gleaned sheaves of harvested rice,
The red fireworks bought with the money
Earned from the grains gathered there,
Known as the red stick,
And the game of seven paths...'

Living away from home brings memories of the village and family. These lines express the pain of separation in a new rhythm:

'I do not know whether I shall return,
Or die and be worn away here,
And vanish...'

The satire is plainly visible in these lines:

'No delay in striking with the stick,
Nor much sorrow when it is only a heifer;
Yet you are the one who must be worshipped...'

The attempt to contain the problems caused by floods within brief lines—to hold an ocean in a pitcher—is evident here:

'Here and there the embankment had been cut;
Rain fell from above;
All the paddy and rice stored in the wall-side bins,
The fallen partitions, became the prey of water...'

The poems abound in fresh images:

'Like a thousand floods, monstrous,

The tangle of unfolding events;
My breath swelled and faltered;
I sprang up in alarm...'

You did not merely spring up in alarm; you awoke into awareness, with new images and sounds and a new vision. Who knows how far you will go, or where your destination lies?

'In the churning of the world,
Something new will now come forth...
We shall seek the path of the path itself...
The journey has now become long...'"

All these poems may be found in my book Sahasrābdīk Chaupaṛ Par (On the Game Board of the Millennium).

I now present two poems from my book Sahasrajit.

The Evil Eye Falls Upon Him

Mother says
That the evil eye falls upon him.
She looks at her son and thinks how handsome he is today;
By evening a shadow falls across his face.
Indeed! Whose son could be like mine?
Yet even as she thinks it, the evil eye may fall upon him.
He begins a task,
So many tasks all at once,
And remembers nothing else until they are done.
If someone says, "How wonderful your son is,"
Mother's heart suddenly misses a beat;
Her heart begins to sink.
What is he doing?
What beauty do they see in him?
And yet Mother goes on saying
That the evil eye falls upon him,
Upon my son at the slightest word.
The young wife tells her mother-in-law,
"Mother, your son is not one to be frightened;
No wicked eye can harm your son."
But on Saturdays Mother burns mustard seeds and chillies.
"If he starts sneezing, we shall know no evil eye has fallen on him;
And if he does not sneeze, the evil eye has caught him."
When he does not sneeze for a while, Mother grows anxious:
"Just see how the evil eye catches my son over the smallest thing...
The evil eye catches him... over every little thing..."

Just then the son sneezes: the smoke has reached his nose.
A smile comes over Mother's face.
She adds a little more mustard seed and chilli to the fire...
"Didn't I tell you, Mother, no wicked eye can harm your son?"

Kaṭihārī

I

There is a biting chill in the wind.
This cold will enter the very bones.
The body, after the post-mortem,
Lies upon seven thick slabs; soon it will burn.
The cow-dung cakes Sumanji brought for the fire
Have been placed underneath.
He plunges into the icy water,
Takes flame from the fire of the cow-dung cakes,
To give the body its final passage, its proper rites,
And consigns it to the fire,
With grass, wood and ghee.
Everyone will go back,
Crossing and touching iron, stone, fire and water,
Leaving behind the mother with a child of a month and a half in her arms;
All return to their homes.
It is dawn, after the final night of the first decade of the twenty-first century,
But there is no difference.
Set aside changes of clothing and male domination;
Look at the condition of women.
More savage than this freezing wind,
It enters the bones.
Not beside the Kamala, but beside the Yamuna,
A thousand miles from the village,
The white garments of Khararkhawālī Kākī blur together.
The very same story as sixty years ago,
The very same society;
Only the clothing has changed,
Only the river's course has changed.
That body upon the seven slabs—
The flames devour it, crackling and roaring.
A family must be made anew;
Thirty years later we shall see the outcome.
Until then this cold will remain embedded in the bones,

Colder by far than the chill of this wind.

2

Gopīchandan, gaṅgauṭ, a garland, fresh white garments;
A tulsi leaf, a piece of gold and Ganges water in the mouth;
Kuśa grass spread on the ground near the tulsi plant,
The head turned northward:
The body after the post-mortem.
Sumanji too puts on fresh white garments,
The sacred thread and an upper cloth; with water from a new earthen vessel,
Facing east, he recites mantras with the kuśa grass,
And sprinkles the deceased with that water.
Holding a torch in his left hand, he lights it from the cow-dung fire.
After circling the dead three times,
Fire is offered to the mouth:
Cotton, wood, ghee, incense, camphor and sandalwood.
The dead is clad in a dove-like white.
Each person places five pieces of wood.
When the body has become a lump of flesh like the burnt remains of a dove,
They take the seven ritual sticks, circle seven times,
And cut the torch into seven or six pieces with a kurharī,
Severing the seven bonds;
The seven satkaṭhiyā sticks are thrown into the fire.
With children and elders sent ahead,
They hurry away, shielding their heels,
To bathe;
An offering of sesame and water is made with the ritual vessel.
Without drying their bodies,
They return to the courtyard of the deceased.
At the threshold they touch, in order, iron, stone, fire and water,
Then go back into their homes.

Manikant Das wrote, “Tvam Chāham Cha” (“You and I”); I liked it very much.

My Ghazals

Om Prakash Jha writes:

“Although all those who compose children's ghazals are capable of doing so, and are producing excellent work, I think it appropriate in this connection to mention a children's ghazal by Gajendra Thakur. Its opening couplet is:

'Leave the bride-and-groom dolls; bring Barbie;
If she is pink, you may call her Barbie.'

Read the whole ghazal. By mentioning the traditional dolls, it certainly entertains children; at the same time, it offers a poignant reflection on people sacrificed upon the altar of contemporary market culture."

He writes of this composition:

A Children's Ghazal

Leave the bride-and-groom dolls; bring Barbie;
If she is pink, then recognise Barbie.
Those daityas who wander from forest to forest—
Imagine Barbie returned with the vanasaptā.
Morning arrives in the village bearing seven colours;
The fairy lives there—listen to the village, Barbie.
The children will be freed of their shivering;
Forget the tears that filled your eyes, Barbie.
Travel everywhere, through water, sky and earth;
Affix wings to your forehead ornament; listen, Barbie.
Play and leap about with the dhamma doll;
Bring dreams and sleep into the night, Barbie.
Put this doll to bed, and go to sleep yourself;
Mount Airāvata and sing of the day, Barbie.

Original Maithili text

कनियाँ पुतरा छोड़ू आनू बार्बी
जँ रंग गुलाबी छै तँ जानू बार्बी
बोने-बोने फिरैए जे दैता सभ
वनसप्तो लऽ घूरलि मानू बार्बी
सात रंग लऽ भोर भेले गाममे
परी रहैए गाम अकानू बार्बी
कननी दूर हेतै बच्चा सभमे
भरल आँखि बिसरी ठानू बार्बी
पानि अकास धरती जा-जा घूमी
पंख लगा टिकुली अकानू बार्बी
धम्म गुड़िया संग खेलू कूदू
राति सपनाउ निन्न आनू बार्बी
सुता दियौ ऐ गुड़ियाकेँ आ सुतू
चढ़ि ऐरावत दिन गानू बार्बी

This is included in my ghazal collection Dhāṅgi Bāṭ Banebāk Dām Agūbār Pene Chhaṅ, of roughly a hundred pages: the ghazals occupy forty pages and a study of Maithili ghazal poetics occupies sixty.

I reproduce the book's title ghazal here:

A wayfarer on love's bitter, difficult path since time immemorial,
Carried an aged, overwhelming love in both hands;
When pure fingers touch its back,
A fluttering pain spreads through the unfeeling throat;
That guileless love, innocent and unblemished,
Was a drawn bow meant to wound the lover;
It knew no difference between acts and duties,
Nor did it ever conceal the burning talk of love;
Airāvata is no battered creature of the road—you are upon the road;
I have received the payment in advance for making my own way.

Original Maithili text

अकत तीत प्रेमक जे पथिक अदौकालसँ
धतालबूढ़ प्रेमकेँ बोहेलक दुनू हाथजँ
निर्मल आंगुरसँ छूबै जे ओकर पुठपुरी
फरफैसी पसारै निदरदी अगिलकण्ठ जँ
निमरजना प्रेम जे छलै धपोधप निश्छल
बिदोरै लेल प्रेमीकेँ छलै ओ कड़ेकमान तँ
अकरतब कर्तव्यमे भेद नै बुझलकै जे
जराउ प्रेमक गप्प नै कहियो नुकेलकै जँ
खञ्जखूहर ऐरावत नै बाटक छेँ बाटमे
धांगि बाट बनेबाक दाम अगूबार पेने छेँ

In an interview Munna Ji asked me a question. The interview is available on page 415 of Videha: Sadeha, no. 33; I reproduce an excerpt:

Munna Ji: Despite all this work, there has still been no assessment of you—either of your personality or your writing. Does that affect you?

Gajendra Thakur: No, I do not agree with that. The emails and letters I have received, readers' letters of appreciation, the success of my plan for preserving manuscripts, and my research in linguistics have all given me satisfaction. How could bad people also speak well of you? Nor would I want them to. In Maithili, as in other languages, a full assessment of both personality and literary achievement takes place only after death.

'My mind has become as pure as the waters of the Ganges;
The Lord follows me, calling "Kabir, Kabir."' (Kabir)

(The mind has grown as pure as Ganges water, and God follows behind, calling out Kabir's name.—Kabir)

Airāvata is no battered creature of the road—you are upon the road;
I have received payment in advance for making my own way.

(Others are paid after completing their work; I have been paid beforehand.)

Jagadanand Jha ‘Manu’: “This observation by Gajendra Thakur is entirely correct: ‘The more a person can become a child, the better the children's ghazals that person will compose.’”

Chandan Kumar Jha: “Gajendra Ji not only strengthened the grammar of the ghazal through his writing; he also gave the world of the Maithili ghazal two invaluable metrical forms—the simple syllabic bahr and the simple quantitative bahr. These have helped many newcomers and learners like me to write ghazals, and have enriched the Maithili ghazal in an unprecedented way.”

Ashish Anchinhar writes:

“Recently, however, Gajendra Thakur successfully composed a ghazal in bahr-e-mutaqārib, and it therefore deserves discussion. The syllabic bahr used in Maithili was also identified by Gajendra Thakur, and almost every new ghazal writer now follows it.”

The ghazal is reproduced below.

Bahr-e-Mutaqārib

Bahr-e-mutaqārib: eight rukns; the foot faʿūlun (U ׀ ׀), repeated four times.

You take me for a gambler without cause;
What is the point of this strange way of living without cause?
I raised the outcry and sang away my sorrow;
Why do you make a spectacle of it, like a showman, without cause?
Whatever new covering is put in place wears away;
No one returns to set it right, without cause.
Fasting at home and hopeless outside,
In famine and distress, helpless without cause.
You go forward in hope, bearing the palanquin;
Yet the funeral pyre approaches—think of it, without cause.

Original Maithili text

अहाँ बूझि लै छी जुआरी अनेरे
जिबै कोन बैबे नियारी अनेरे
हहारो उठेलौं उदासी गबेलौं
सिहाबै किए छी मदारी अनेरे
जतेको नबारी छबारी बुरैए
घुरेबै कियो नै सुतारी अनेरे
घरोमे उपासे बहारो निरासे

दहारे अकाले नचारी अनेरे
चलै छी खटोली उठा ऐ भरोसे
भसाठी अबैए विचारी अनेरे

And here are a few couplets from the same collection. If, as you approach the end, any of them makes you pause, please be sure to let me know at the email address below.

A bird flies and the wind blows without purpose through this blue sky;
When the Airāvata of the mind takes flight, how shall I hold it?
What I have seen and known has arrived even today;
The protecting lamp is being extinguished.
What can I tell whom—and who will believe me?
Meaning is abundant in every depth.
I do not turn a deaf ear to you; why speak so?
Hate me, if that is what fills your heart.
A thick line of worry upon the forehead;
What was small has now grown enormous.
Amid the spreading fire of longing,
I said that greatness had become its distinguishing sign.
Today's conversation will come to an end;
The morning wind has become fierce.
Ask everyone; leave no one out.
Why was the new dawn held back?
The wind rose with a quiet sob;
The strength of the inner mind will truly change things.
My love is like a fish without water, turned upside down;
Having found love, what labour will they undertake?
The claim to sharpness became counterfeit knowledge;
Every moment the barking cuts through the laughter.
The performer, dressed for adversity, laughs;
You too have seen what I have seen.
I have bathed at the ghāṭ of fear;
And so I shall endure oppression from every direction.
Airāvata sees light, the wild flood, and famine;
I see this eclipsed sun exhausted and bewildered.
People talk much of the moon's radiance;
The kherhā of this slanting light said so.
I shall walk by the field boundaries and reach there;
It stands in the middle of the road; I cannot stop it.
And I saw a round fragment of cloud falling in the sky;
I looked eagerly towards the fields: joy climbed the mountain.
Go where you will; even the small bird fled in the moonlight;

The dark night, and life grown tangled and overgrown.
However much moonlight there may be, night remains everywhere;
Even by day there is an eclipse, and darkness spreads all around.
Cast away the thoughts of the mind in a sweep;
When things cleared, they became unmanageable.
A crocodile has come into our neighbourhood;
A burial in water has become a business.
Airāvata is not the elephant in the elephant–crocodile struggle;
A new understanding has arisen between the two.
My eyes are closing; tell me, what shall I do?
I cannot understand; anger is rising—what shall I do?
Here the rice crop has turned into empty husks,
And green fire is blazing—tell me, what shall I do?
A moment of seeing, touching and experiencing:
These lines will not become history.
With a house built beside the embankment, I wait for the road;
Do not lose your way and linger—what is that to me?
The flowing current of falsehood had stopped;
When it reversed its course, it burned again and again.
How many days have passed listening for the sting's approaching blow?
That same returning presence altered, passed by, and went away.
Even Lachchhan learnt his father's obstinacy;
Forgetting right and wrong, he became just like him.
I could not fathom the kherhā of the night-watch and the constellations;
I could not unravel the kherhā in the morning's lines.
The little bird has been ensnared like this;
They say this hunter is a great well-wisher.
After waking from sleep I saw a cruel dream and a beautiful life;
How could I believe anyone who says that nothing ever changes?
They say that today they will mix a little lump into the tears;
If he comes having drunk bhāṅg, the emotions too will become intoxicated.
What permanent colour can I paint with, one that will never fade?
Even the colours of the mind fade; come, let us return.
At daybreak the sadness flies away;
The drizzle that has scattered its drops is you.
How often have I fashioned this spinning expanse?
We await the way of escape and call ourselves the sun.
Seeing it, I understood the stages of formation;
As a figure takes shape, you become visible.
What has been left, not even one thing for the solitary person?

I wake in the dark and begin counting.
The beloved has gone far away to another land;
No one returns, and I no longer seek that hope.
Who will write down a new form of yourself when you utter it?
Who will send the broad north–south road flowing then?
The palms will always feel the biting cold;
If you were to hunger for it, how would you find its flavour?
If fortune weeps somewhere upon the flight from home,
When will Gajendra's heart understand and be consoled?
Whoever saw the banyan tree said, "This is Vrindavan itself";
With the courtyard in disarray, perhaps it is better now to leave it deserted.
The one no one asks about anywhere is invited to Saurath;
There is no love in the moon's course—perhaps it is better now to forget.
An elephant is heavy upon its own feet, as an ant is upon its own;
Airāvata, bound in the chains of love, ought not to stumble.
The habit of enduring suffering has taken hold;
The knot that forms begins to look beautiful.
Like a fish I grow restless, wondering when I shall be caught in the net;
If I am caught and find deliverance, who will see with those eager eyes?
I did not understand how the matter had grown so large;
Today I saw him drifting away.
How much he used to demand of me, again and again;
Now he leaves without taking what had accumulated.
His cry of anguish could hear my silence;
He is leaving without hearing me speak.

Now let us turn to some of my haiku, senryū, tanka and haibun.

Like the vihani tale, these literary forms are not generally regarded as serious. But if the compositions below, taken from my book Sahasrajit, strike you as serious, I shall consider my work successful.

I

Nature's Anger

With kuśa grass, sesame and water, कुश तिल जलसँ

becoming a widow—
विधवा बनि
what distinguishes her from a married woman?
सधवा की विभेद
With dūb grass, unbroken rice and water. (Tanka / waka)
दूबि अक्षत जल (टनका / वाका)

From the oleander, करबीरसँ
houses, trees and mountains घर गाछ पहाड़ are encircled. (Haiku)
घेरल अछि (हाइकू)

The forest people:
बनैया लोक
the watercourse by the house घरक पनिबह
does not depart. (Senryū)
बिदति नहि (शेनर्यू)

Pull up the wild roots and eat them; bring nature into your home, plant a flower garden, and hang a photograph of the mountains on the wall. Then you become a lover of nature. Carry the village into the city—through painting, artistry and ingenuity.

We are playing खेलाइ हम
at kariyā-jhummari;
करियाझुम्मरिमे
beneath us, the sky.
नीचाँ अकास

Where can one find a single-track road now? Even a four-lane road is considered too narrow: six lanes, eight lanes. The sky is stained, the green of the trees is stained, the mind itself is stained. But the roads and houses are as sleek and polished as photographs. Let us write with pictures.

Today the outline of a house:
घरक खाका आइ
I am bewildered.
छी जङलाह
(Haibun)

2

1.

In search of nature,
तागि प्रकृति
I crossed over to look for it—ताकैले भेलौं पार
a withered leaf.
सुखल पात
(Haiku)

2.

These flowers and fruits,
ई फूल फल
as one climbs farther on,
चढ़ैत जाइ आगाँ
grow fewer.
कम होइए
I turn and look again:
उनटि देखी फेर
less nearby, more at a distance.
लगमे कम दूरे बेशी
(Tanka / waka)

3.

They have shed their colour—
रंग छाड़ल mountains and trees—पहाड़ आर गाछ
but life remains.
मुदा जीवन
(Senryū)

4.

So many dazzling colours! Nature—the flowers, leaves, roads and sky—shines more brightly than a child's picture book. And beyond all these is the snow: a desert in its own right, with snow in place of sand, without oxygen, flowers or leaves. Yet look at its grandeur. The road along which I came did not shine so brightly. When I stood close to that landscape I could not fully apprehend its beauty. Someone looking from far away might have admired me too; amidst nature, I myself would have become part of nature. But from this summit the landscape appears so beautiful.

It has become a tree,
गाछ भेल छै
a solitary child;
असगरुआ बौआ
it has become a leaf,
पात भेल छै
a plaything of nature.
खिलौना प्रकृतिक
Beholding the summit,
शिखर देखि

Yet now that I have reached this summit, I feel the journey was in vain. Seen from below, it looked so beautiful; now, from its height, that same village seems more beautiful. Only when I see the village landscape from the summit can I compare the two: summit from village, village from summit. But desire keeps calling me onward. Now I shall cross to the other side of the peak and look at the people and their society there. From a distance the villages on both sides appear equally lovely, lying below; but will the summit seem as beautiful from the village beyond as it did from the village on this side?

Do not stand still.
नै ठाढ़ होउ
Come, let us go back.
चलू चली घुरैले
I am a trader,
बनिजार छी
among the people,
लोकक बीचमे छी
coming and going.
जाइत घुरैत छी

(Haibun)

3

It lies scattered / this trailing mat of reeds / gather it and eat.
चतरल छै/ लतरल टाट ई/ झोरा कऽ खाउ

This lightning-like flash / spreads as a root's veins / spread outward.
ई बिजलौका/ जड़िक शिरा सन/ पसरैए

Bursting from the root / it crackles / across the horizons / spreading everywhere / until it covers all.
जड़िसँ फूटि /ई कड़कड़ाइत/ दिग दिगन्त/ पसरत सगरे/ करत आच्छादित

There is no reason / to surrender; and victory / calls for no pride.
कारण नै छै/ हारि लेल, विजय/ लेल नै गर्व

People of the netherworld / ships in the sky / the world turned upside down / worlds and the universe / all thoughts and arguments.
लोक पताली/ जहाज अकासमे / उनटि गेल / विश्व लोक ब्रह्माण्ड / बात विचार सभ

A world of water / upon the ocean floor / astonishing colours.
जल दुनियाँ/ समुद्र तलपर/ अद्भुत रंग

Without turmeric / Chanakya's poisonous / poison-maiden.
बिनु हरदि/ चाणक्यक बिखाहि / विषकन्या ओ

Without turmeric / she became venomous / the poison-maiden / who had been brought up / without turmeric.
बिनु हरदि/ बनलि बिखाहि ओ / विषकन्या जे/ पालित भेल छलि/ बिनु हरदिक जे

Turmeric has qualities upon qualities. When you catch cold, put clarified butter and turmeric in milk, close your eyes and drink it down. If you are injured, mix lime with turmeric and apply the paste. Without turmeric, neither dal nor khichri looks yellow: the khichri would look insipid and the dal strangely coloured. The plant looks somewhat like a vaijayantī flower, but it grows in a cultivated plot, not on the embankment of a pond as the vaijayantī does. Turmeric plant / concealing in its root / its virtues. (Haibun)

4

Hope has come: / the rainbow has risen / let us move ahead. (Haiku)
आसक अछि/ पनिसोखा उगल/ चलू बढ़ै छी (हाइकू)

Deliverance has come; / the rainbow has risen; / let us set to work; / step outside the house; / a road has appeared. (Tanka)
भेल उबेर/ उगल पनिसोखा/ काज करै छी/ बहराइ घरसँ/ बाट भेटल अछि (टनका)

This rainbow / has risen in the sky, / higher and higher! (Senryū)
पनिसोखा ई/ उगल अकासमे/ उपरे ऊपर! (शेनर्यू)

Ah, deliverance will come now: the rainbow has appeared, the path has opened. The labourer sets out to trade, the farmer lifts the seedlings for transplanting, and I too depart on some work that is no work at all—along an endless road, for work that might be worthwhile, towards a directionless, halted crossroads.

Waiting for the road,
बाट तकैत
we look up to the sky;
ताकी अकास दिस
a curious delusion,
विचित्र भ्रम
as though this rainbow
जेना ई पनिसोखा
would rise and open the way.
उगि खोलत बाट

Then I shall look again, seek my equal, and go on walking until the rain begins. But if I say that I shall keep walking until the rain, is that not a kind of flight? The rainbow has risen, the road has opened, and I am watching the road for the rain that is yet to come.

Seven-coloured सतरंगिया
is this hope;
अछि ई आस
hope arises, उगैए आस
the sky is about to sink—
डुबबाले अकास
it has become terror.
बनि गेल संत्रास

(Haibun consisting of two prose passages and two tanka)

Now, some kuṇḍaliyā, again from my book Sahasrajit.

Kuṇḍaliyā

I

Distinguish truth from falsehood; harbour no resentment.
सत असत मे भेद करू, राखू नै किछु रोख
Do not waver even a little before what destiny has written.
ततमत नै करू कनियो, जे छै होनी लेख
Whatever destiny has written—how might that turn out well?
जे छै होनी लेख, हुए से नीक निकेना
Truth will triumph if you do not persist in wrongdoing.
सत्यक जीत हएत, जँ करबै अकसतिकस ने

Let fear of falsehood fall; break the fear within the heart.
डर संग असत केर, डर ढाहू मध्य हृदयक
Airāvata understands: such is the truth of what is false.
ऐरावतक बुझैत, यएह छी असत्यक सत

2

The whirling swarm under the umbrella's fringe turned day to darkness.
छत्ता घुरछा पल्लौसँ, भेल दिने अन्हार।
Returning home at day's end, I found time had become terrible.
दिन बितलापर घर घुरी, काल भेल विकराल॥
Time had become terrible; every limb shuddered.
काल भेल विकराल, पोरे-पोर सिहरैए।
Who would hear a question? Words were being raised like an alarm.
सुनत केओ सवाल, बोल बगहा लगबैए।
Airāvata was distraught: where had the words disappeared?
ऐरावत बेहाल, बोल कतऽ भेल निपत्ता।
Whirling in like death itself, they entered the dense swarm beneath the canopy.
घुरियाए बनि काल, पैसि बिच घोरन छत्ता। ।

3

If victory comes without pride, know that this is good.
विजय बिन गर्व हएत जँ, बुझू तखन ई नीक
Do not panic in defeat; understand this, my friend.
हारि भेने घबराउ नै, बात बुझू ई मीत
Understand this, my friend, even if a quarrel arises.
बात बुझू ई मीत, हुअए जँ एक झमेला
Accept defeat and move forward; do not stir up another dispute.
हारि मानि बढ़ि जाउ, करू ने फेर बखेरा
Where work has brought contentment, that alone is good.
भेल काज प्रसन्न जतऽ, नीक अछि टा सएह
Understand, O Airāvata's mind, and behold defeat and victory.
मोन ऐरावत बुझि, देखि ली हारि-विजय

4

Let your words be good; speak after you have understood the matter.
बोल वचन हुअए नीक, बूझि बाजी जँ बात
Sometimes it is better to remain silent when a great snare lies ahead.
गुम्म रहनाइए ठीक, हुए जँ नमहर जाल

When a great snare lies ahead, it will swallow you in a single gulp.
हुए जँ नमहर जाल, लेत ओ लप दऽ भीतर
Speech will turn into an uproar if its moment is not right.
हल्ला बनि जाएत, नै अछि जँ बेर उचित पर
Listen to me: words are priceless.
सुनू हमर ई बात, बात होइए अनमोल
Airāvata says as he goes: do not speak words as hollow as the oal tuber.
ऐरावत कहि जाय, कहू नै ओल सन बोल

Now read the Flag Song of Mithila, from Sahasrābdīk Chaupaṛpar.

The Flag Song of Mithila

Mithila's flag shall fly throughout the world.
मिथिलाक ध्वज फहरायत जगतमे,
I have seen Mother angered, adorned and defiled;
माँ रूषलि, भूषलि, दूषलि, देखल हम,
I am restless, and my mind is in turmoil.
अकुलाइत छी, भँसियाइत अछि मन।
I come from the land of learning, industry and work;
छी विद्याक उद्योगक कर्मभूमि सँ, your descendants will rise and return again, पछाड़ि आयत सन्तति अहाँक पुनि,
with intelligence, resourcefulness and courage;
बुद्धि, चातुर्यक आ शौर्यक करसँ,
do not doubt their victory.
विजयक प्रति करू अहँ शंका जुनि।
Even if the Maithili language has grown faint of breath, मैथिली छथि अल्पप्राण भेल जौ,
I shall make my entreaty in the language of conjunct sounds;
सन्ध्यक्षर बाजि करब हम न्योरा, from the touch of my letters shall arise the explosion of speech; वर्ण स्फोटक बनत स्पर्शसँ हमर, your flag shall not fall, O Mother Mithila.
ध्वज खसत नहि हे मातु मिथिला।

(Using vocabulary from Vidyapati)

Now learn the calls of animals and birds through this children's song, from Bāṅk Baṅaurā.

The ox is threshing, isn't he?
बड़द करैए दाउन ने यौ
Elephant—agatt, pichhū, thāit, māil biri!
हाथी अगत्त, पिछू, थाइत, माइल बिरि
Hirr-hirr, piggy, come home with us.
हिर्र-हिर्र सुग्गर चलू संग घर घुरि
Tī-tī—the pigeon has flown above.
ती-ती परबा उड़ि गेल ऊपर
Lih-lih, goat, eat your grass!
लिह लिह बकरी घास तूँ खो
The ox is threshing, isn't he?
बड़द करैए दाउन ने यौ
Atū, the hen; kut-kut, the doggie.
अतू कुकुड़ कुत-कुत डॉगी
Kitty, pisū-pisū—will you come?
कैटी पिसू-पिसू आएत की?
Hearing chehai-chehai, the dove ran away;
चेहै-चेहै सुनि पारा दौगल,
we ran off the road and waited.
भागी छोड़ि बाट हम ताकी
Arr, goat, eat your grass!
अर्र बकरी घास तूँ खो
The ox is threshing, isn't he?
बड़द करैए दाउन ने यौ
Do not provoke him by calling ḍhehai-ḍhehai;
ढेहै-ढेहै कऽ नहि खौंझाबू
the bull will come into the threshing ground!
साँढ़ आओत खरिहानमे यौ
Come over here—re he, haure hau!
आव ठामे रे हे, हौरे हौ
The ox is threshing, isn't he?
बड़द करैए दाउन ने यौ

Now, the vihani tale

If the only things you have read under the name of the vihani tale are little humorous sketches, you may not take the genre seriously. Read a vihani tale from Galpa-Guccha. Read it more than once if necessary; I am confident that, as with haiku and haibun, you will begin to take this form seriously too.

Polygamy and a Hijra

"Poor woman, she has died," the villagers said when So-and-so Babu's third wife died.

"So-and-so Babu has cut his third wife's throat," said one man.

"You are quite right. When his first wife had no child, he married a second time. But when the second had no child either, he ought to have understood, shouldn't he?" said another.

"Yes, and instead he kept telling his third wife that God had denied him children because he did not care for his nephews. Imagine that!" said a third.

"That wretched hijra!" said the fourth, bringing the gathering to an end.

Yet this grand conference of four men was unanimous on one point: his first two marriages had been entirely proper.

My Novels

Shiv Kumar Jha "Tillu" writes in his essay "The Depiction of Dalit Characters in Maithili Novels":

"In Gajendra Thakur's Sahasrabāṛhani, an Indigenous person brings a medicinal root for asthma, and the fact that the root is no longer found in the forest a few years later indicates the depletion of the woods. His Sahasraśīrṣā, meanwhile, provides a detailed account of almost all the Dalit castes of Mithila. Although it contains only three houses, the washermen's settlement has become a separate hamlet. Clothes belonging to Marwaris from as far away as Jhanjharpur are cleaned here. The Mahiswar Brahmins who strut into wedding processions, shaking their belvatam and whistling, are not wearing their own clothes. They are wearing borrowed garments belonging to wealthy Marwaris. The Rajak washermen hire these clothes to them for two days. Budhan and Domi Safi are washermen. Domi Safi is now Domi Das, because he follows the Kabir Panth. There is another settlement, the leatherworkers' hamlet, home to Mukdev Ram and Kapildev Ram. Formerly it lay outside the village, beyond the bamboo grove. Now all the bamboo has been cut down and uprooted, and the expanding habitation has reached the leatherworkers' settlement. Homesteads and brick kilns continue to appear on every side. Their assistance is expected in everything from beating the drum to blowing the horn. When cattle die, the household remains ritually impure until they carry away the carcass. Bhola Paswan and Mukesh Paswan are Dusadhs, related to Gena Hazari through the latter's younger family branch. This is the same Gena Hazari who saw a cow come to give milk upon a blade of kuśa at Kusheshwar Sthan and began excavating there. The image of Mahadeva kept sinking deeper; Mahadeva, established by Sita's son Kusha, was discovered by Gena Hazari."

"Mukesh Paswan's daughter Malti is a bank officer, and his son-in-law Mathuranand is principal of a DPS school. They live in a farmhouse near Vasant Kunj. Bhola Paswan and Mukesh Paswan continue to live in the village."

"During the famine of 1967, when every pond and depression had dried up except the Dakahi pond, the Prime Minister visited, and people showed how Musahars dug out edible roots there and ate them. Umesh, son of the leatherworker Mukdev Ram, has also set up his tools beside that open-air saloon, though he lives in Kishangarh. Besides mending sandals and shoes, he has learned to make duplicate keys. If you have a key, the copy costs fifteen rupees; if the key is lost, a replacement costs one hundred; if he must visit your home, the extra charge is two hundred. Raghuvir, son of Bichkun Sadai of the Musahar community, has learned to drive. He drives for a businessman in Vasant Kunj and lives in Kishangarh. Shrimant, son of Baudha Mallik of the Dom settlement, has a sector-maintenance contract. He employs two hundred people who collect household rubbish from the flats every morning and clean the roads and parking spaces early in the day. Some of them, particularly people from Nepal, also clean residents' windowpanes for two hundred rupees a month and work as newspaper hawkers. Bichkun Sadai, a Musahar, lives in Kishangarh, but in a house of his own."

Durganand Mandal writes:

"The affection of Shri Gajendra Thakur, editor of Videha, awakened creative energy within me. Many words that were not used in Maithili literature were dismissed as merely rustic. But when I read Thakur's Kurukshetram Antarmanak and came to know those words, my confidence grew stronger still."

Rajendra Kumar Pradhan writes:

"Shri Gajendra Thakur's novel Sahasrabāṛhani bears witness to numerous political and bureaucratic upheavals. His Sahasraśīrṣā is a remarkably successful attempt to disseminate political consciousness through the songs of Mohan, a Dalit singer, from Indian independence to the Right to Information. Running through it all are the politics of the village and of floods, extending from the village to Delhi."

In the novel-trilogy set in the fictional yet recognisably Mithila village of Garh Narikel, the novel following Sahasraśīrṣā is also being published serially online in Videha.

Jagdish Prasad Mandal writes: “The minute geographical descriptions of village life in Sahasrabāṛhani astonished me.”

Umesh Mandal writes:

“Every letter of Gajendra Thakur's Sahasrabāṛhani resonates with feeling. Its profoundly moving representation is rich in images of sensitivity and a coherent sense of economic life. It presents the agitated sorrow of Nand, a dutiful and honest man who fulfils his social responsibilities alongside the obligations of family life.”

Sahasrabāṛhani (novel)

Sahasraśīrṣā (novel)

Short Stories

Read “Sar-Samaj” and “Banvir” in Galpa-Guccha (a collection of vihani tales and short stories).

Read “Siddha Mahavir,” “Shabdashastram,” “Delhi,” and “Taskar” in Shabdashastram (a collection of short stories).

Yoganand Jha writes:

“Kurukshetram Antarmanak is a collection of Gajendra Thakur's writings in different literary genres. Its seventh volume brings together twenty-three children's stories. Most of them concern the folk heroes of Mithila, although about half a dozen may be called children's folktales, even though their language is wholly classical in character. This is an important example of ongoing work in the collection of folktales for children.”

Subhash Chandra Yadav writes:

“Gajendra Thakur is an extraordinary person, endowed with a keen intellect and tremendous energy. The reach of his talent is very wide. He has devoted himself wholeheartedly to the advancement of language, literature and society. He is multilingual; that quality is reflected in his dictionary-making, his translations between numerous languages, and his research of many kinds. He founded Videha, the first Maithili e-journal. Videha has given Maithili a global platform. For the preservation and development of Maithil culture, he has built an exceptional archive that continues to grow. Published in seven volumes, Kurukshetram Antarmanak is a garden of Gajendra Thakur's creative writing and critical thought. No literary genre has escaped him. His many-coloured literary world is lucid and dedicated to the public good. In children's literature, the refinement and achievement of his art are unparalleled."

And now, Jagdish Prasad Mandal: A Biography (Videha: Sadeha 35, pp. 1105–1250).

o

The year 1947...

The tricolour flag of independent India was flying.

But the Communist Party held that India had not yet become independent.

True independence was still to come...

A village in Mithila...

A child was born there, in that very year...

In that independent—or not yet independent—India...

The father's death... poverty... lawsuits...

In the struggle for the dispossessed, he encountered the prison of an independent—or still unfree—India...

Today in Berma nobody possesses a holding larger than five or ten bighas...

In that village, the self-reliant culture of farming still survives...

There the exclusive dominance of Brahmanism over priestly practice came to an end...

And after the struggles had ended, his writing ushered a renaissance into Maithili literature...

Jagdish Prasad Mandal: A Biography... by Gajendra Thakur.

My Play

Ulkmukh

Ulkmukh (a play)

—The love between Gangesha and Vallabha is the theme of this play. But after the first two acts, the third and fourth change course: Udayana, Dina, Bhadri, Acharya Vyaghra, Acharya Singh, Acharya Sarabh, the disciples Sahi, Khikhir, Narhiya and Bijji appear before us. The enactment of a conspiracy within history begins. Yet at the close of the fourth scene, Bhakta tells his disciple a secret... one that will return to memory even after it has been forgotten... becoming Ulkmukh...

—From the fifth scene onward there is reality in place of suggestion, truth in place of imagination...

—From the first through the fourth scene, cubical objects arranged in a chessboard pattern will stand on the stage; from the fifth onward, spheres signifying reality will take the place of those signs of past time and imagination.

—A great many commentaries exist on Gangesha's Tattvacintāmaṇi; Gangesha is called the author of Tattvacintāmaṇi. But his poem has become Ulkmukh!

Maithili drama...

is led into a new age of theatre...

Ulkmukh...

staged at the Videha Theatre Festival, 2012...

under the direction of Bechan Thakur...

with a stage conception in accordance with Bharata's Nāṭyaśāstra...

Maithili Critical Theory, A Theory of Translation for Maithili, and Maithili Ghazal Theory

Atuleshwar writes: "A letter from Gajendra Thakur appeared in Hemani, asking whether it was not a conspiracy that, at gatherings such as Sagar Rati Deep Jaray—which has now become more a meeting for irrelevant talk than a forum for stories—people do not discuss what is weak in a story or what new elements it contains, but instead talk, in the Ramanathi manner, while going about eating and socialising."

Mayanand Mishra wrote: "I object to the criticism of my novel Stridhan in Kurukshetram Antarmanak..." Is it right to treat literary criticism as personal opposition?

Maithili Critical Theory

(For theory)

Maithili Critical Theory (Videha: Sadeha 35, pp. 1322–1416)

(For application)

An Examination of Booch Ji's Poetry from Marxist, Historical, Structuralist, Magical-Realist, Postmodern, Feminist and Deconstructionist Perspectives, alongside a Study from the Perspective of Indian Aesthetics

Videha: Sadeha 33, pp. 201–206)

A Theory of Translation for Maithili

A Theory of Translation for Maithili (Videha: Sadeha 30, pp. 131–135)

Maithili Ghazal Theory

Maithili Ghazal Theory (Videha: Sadeha 35, pp. 1251–1321)

Vidyapati's Bidesiya

Videha: Sadeha 33, pp. 192–198

For Candidates Preparing for Competitive Examinations

NTA-UGC / UPSC / BPSC: Maithili Optional — Gajendra Thakur

[The Place of Maithili in the Indo-European Language Family / The Origin and Development of Maithili: Sanskrit, Prakrit, Avahaṭṭa and Maithili]

(Criticism: Various Literary Genres of the Modern Period / Testing Candidates' Critical Ability)

(Criticism of Different Literary Genres of the Modern Period / Assessment of Candidates' Critical Ability)

(Badrinath Jha's Vocabulary and the Agricultural and Fisheries Vocabulary of Mithila)

(Value Addition — Paper I: Society and Culture in the Lorik Ballad)

(Value Addition — Paper II: Vidyapati)

(Value Addition — Paper II: Samples of Poetry Criticism)

(Value Addition — Paper I: Folk Ballads, Dance, Drama and Music)

(Value Addition — Paper II: Yatri)

(Value Addition — Paper II: The Maithili Ramayana)

(Value Addition — Paper II: The Maithili Novel)

(Value Addition — Paper I: Reflections on Words)

(The Origin and Development of the Tirhuta Script)

Appendices 1–2–3; Appendices 4–5

(The Relationship between Maithili and Other Eastern Languages: Bengali, Assamese and Odia [UPSC Syllabus, Paper I, Section A, Item 5])

[Maithili and Hindi / Bengali / Bhojpuri / Magahi / Santali — for the Maithili Optional Subject in the Bihar Public Service Commission (BPSC) Civil Services Examination]

NTA_UGC_NET_MAITHILI_01 — Gajendra Thakur

NTA_UGC_NET_MAITHILI_02 — Gajendra Thakur

TEST SERIES-1 — Gajendra Thakur

TEST SERIES-2 — Gajendra Thakur

GS (Preliminary)

TOPIC 1 — Gajendra Thakur

My Translated Literature

My emphasis has been chiefly on translating from other languages into Maithili, although I have also translated from Maithili into English. I have had two purposes. First, such translation enriches Maithili. Second, if we do not read the literature of our own and other languages, why should anyone else read ours? The first link below is for general readers; it contains a story and some poems translated into Maithili. The second link is to thirty-five illustrated books for children, deliberately produced in bilingual editions (Maithili–English).

1

Translated Literature (from Other Languages) — Gajendra Thakur

Videha: Sadeha 27 (Prose and poetry translated from other languages by Gajendra Thakur and Ravi Bhushan Pathak, from issues 1–350)

2

Children's Literature (Translation; Bilingual Maithili–English) — Gajendra Thakur

Titles in Translation: Children's Literature (Original Bibliographic Titles)

Original titles and documentary spellings are retained as bibliographic and archival data.

टोस्ट	बड़ीटा! कनियेटा!	एतऽ हम सभ रहै छी	भारतोल्लक राजकुमारी	भारतोल्लक राजकुमारी (बिनु शब्दक)
वुयो	कच-कच कचाक	चुन्नू-मुन्नूक नहेनाइ	नेना जे बैलूनसँ डेराइत छल	अद्भुत फिबोनाची अंक-शृंखला
हारू	अखन नै, अखन नै!	जन्मदिनक उत्सव भोज	मोट राजा पातर-दुब्बड़ कुकुड़	बचिया जे अपन हँसी नै रोकि सकैत छलि
अंग्रेजी	हम सूंघि सकै छी	छोट लाल-टुहटुह डोरी	करू नीक, भोगू नीक	ई सभटा बिलाड़िक दोख अछि!
चोभा आम!	हमर टोलक बाट	जखन इकड़ू स्कूल गेल	माछी फेर आउ टाटा!	अमाचीक जुलुम मशीन सभ
टिंग टोंग	पाउ-म्याऊ-वाह	कुकुड़क एकटा दिन	हमरा नीक लगैए	रीताक नव-स्कूलमे पहिल दिन

टोस्ट	बड़ीटा! कनियेटा!	एतऽ हम सभ रहै छी	भारतोल्लक राजकुमारी	भारतोल्लक राजकुमारी (बिनु शब्दक)
कनी हँसियौ ने!	लाल बरसाती	भूत-प्रेतक नाट्यशाला	आउ पएर गानी	कतऽ अछि ई अंक ५?

Munnaji: “For how long will you maintain your firm resolve to remain at the same wicket, despite abuse and insults, in order to prevent Maithili journalism from drifting away from its purpose—or in pursuit of truth?”

Gajendra Thakur: “In the dedication of Kurukshetram Antarmanak I wrote:”

> I had watched my father hold to truth in steadfast equanimity; > पिताक सत्यकेँ लिबैत देखने रही स्थितप्रज्ञतामे > only then did I understand that > तहिये बुझने रही जे
> there would be no renunciation;
> त्याग नहि कएल होएत
> this is the path of one who refuses to yield.
> रस्ता ई अछि जे जिदियाहवला।

Many people in my village wept when they read these lines. They understand their meaning. But all I can tell you is that the future will decide.

42. Weight Management: A Personal Experiment and Experience

Abstract

This story begins in 2000, in the latter part of that year, when I weighed not 100 kilograms but 78–80 kilograms. I was then on leave for more than a year after a road accident in suspicious circumstances. Returning from government duty, before the beginning of the new millennium, I fractured my thighbone in two places. On the night of the accident, after my blood pressure fell to 60/40, the doctor declared an oxygen emergency at two in the morning.

Keywords: management · personal · experiment · experience · also · kilogram · I was

Weight Management: A Personal Experiment and Experience

This story begins in 2000, in the latter part of that year, when I weighed not 100 kilograms but 78–80 kilograms. I was then on leave for more than a year after a road accident in suspicious circumstances. Returning from government duty, before the beginning of the new millennium, I fractured my thighbone in two places. On the night of the accident, after my blood pressure fell to 60/40, the doctor declared an oxygen emergency at two in the morning. Other frightening complications followed, including a diagnosis of ARDS and fifteen days on a ventilator. There were three operations within a year; another year and a half passed before I could progress from crutches to a walking stick. Then came 15 August, which was also Raksha Bandhan that year, and on that day I began driving again.

During that period, my weight rose from 80 to 100 kilograms: I ate fish and rice, slept, and undertook almost no physical labour. That excess weight stayed with me for the next eighteen years. I should add that I now weigh 80 kilograms again. There is a story behind the loss. I was transferred for six months to another department for some essential work. All my colleagues and subordinates there belonged to a paramilitary force. I could not even run a hundred metres, while they urged me to run so that I might lose weight. One day, when my turn came, I told them that within three months I would bring my weight down to 80 kilograms again. I had a solid basis for making that promise.

Over the preceding eighteen years I had tried all sorts of methods, including giving up breakfast and living during the day on cucumbers alone, yet I had almost entirely failed to lose weight. So where did this sudden confidence about losing it in three months come from? What was the secret? I now had an example before me. My son is six feet three inches tall and, according to the age–height–weight requirements of the NDA, had to reduce his weight from 100 to 67 kilograms. You will have understood that he too weighed 100 kilograms. I was convinced he would fail. He did fail to reach 67 kilograms, but he brought his weight down to 71 kilograms. That was a tremendous shock for me. I learned some of his secrets, and within three months my weight was 80 kilograms. Here I am sharing those very secrets.

The Secret Revealed

For three months I went through the entire day on water and black coffee alone, without milk or sugar. In the evening, following a modified keto diet, I ate only during a one-hour window, between eight and nine at night, and took no carbohydrates, rice, or chikkas-sohāri flatbread. I had decided that I would eat fats—chicken, fish, and paneer—and, among fruits, only watermelon. After a month I weighed 86 kilograms.

The Next Shock

Be prepared for another shock. The road was not so easy. My weight loss stopped, and that plateau lasted a whole month. Yet my target had been three months. It is relatively easy for the body to shed water and the like; that is why the journey down to 86 kilograms is relatively easy. After that, the stubborn elements of the body must be reduced, and only then does the difficult road begin. Two months after starting the modified keto diet, my weight began to fall again. I should also say that throughout this period I ran for an hour before the evening meal. The distance increased from 100 metres to two kilometres. My park is rather like a hill, so by the measure of your park it would amount to three kilometres. I live on the second floor. Previously, if I left something in the car on a Friday, I would wait until Monday to collect it, because climbing to the second floor left me breathless. Now I go up and down four times a day.

The Scientific Basis

During this period I also heard of deaths associated with keto. Those with comorbidities must therefore consult a doctor.

In this connection I wish to share two pieces of advice I have heard from eminent doctors. The first was from Dr Sarin, director of ILBS. I heard him say on television that after the age of fifty one should eat only one meal a day to keep the liver healthy. He also said that he had no stake in the coffee industry, but that drinking black coffee without milk or sugar, however often, was good for the liver. He even recommended eating ghee (!), saying that it benefits the good bacteria residing in the liver.

I also heard a doctor on All India Radio FM, whose name I cannot remember, speak about keto. He said that when carbohydrates are not eaten during a keto diet, the body draws energy from its fat, and that fatty-liver problems consequently disappear. He advised patients with comorbidities to undertake the diet only with medical guidance and said that keto dieting should not continue for more than three months.

Nowadays

Even now I drink black coffee without milk or sugar several times a day. Apart from water I neither eat nor drink anything during the day. I play badminton for an hour daily and even defeat boys twenty years younger than I am. At night I eat rice with ghee, roti, fish, and other foods.

Once a week I also have a cheat day, when I drink tea or coffee with milk and sugar and eat such things as pizza. As I said earlier, I reached 80 kilograms two years ago, and that weight remains unchanged today.

43. Annie Ernaux and the Fictional World of Kapileshwar Raut

Abstract

The Swedish Academy has announced this year's Nobel Prize in Literature for eighty-two-year-old Annie Ernaux. Before that, in a tweet, the Academy recalled Rabindranath Tagore. "A butterfly counts not months but moments, and has time enough." Ernaux initially wrote autobiographical novels but soon came to write memoirs, and memoirs alone.

Keywords: Ernaux · Kapileshwar · Raut · fictional world · goes · self · discussion

1

The Swedish Academy has announced this year's Nobel Prize in Literature for eighty-two-year-old Annie Ernaux. Before that, in a tweet, the Academy recalled Rabindranath Tagore.

"A butterfly counts not months but moments, and has time enough."

Annie Ernaux began by writing autobiographical novels, but soon turned exclusively to memoirs.

This year, too, after a long interval, a Nobel Prize in science was awarded once again for research that imitates nature.

2

Gajendra Thakur on Five Stories by Kapileshwar Raut

Five Stories — Kapileshwar Raut

Snakebite; a local game that takes the life of a young boy; old agricultural practices and the need for innovation; feasts for holy men; the language of birds and animals; the little and the great traditions; caste, class, and power; a woman's perspective; the rich and the poor—all are present, but there is no trace of despair. There is fearless discussion of epic narratives and religious sects. The language and vocabulary used to express all this are exceptionally precise, and difficult to translate, because this world finds its full expression in Maithili.

The bite of a snake; a local game in which a boy loses his life; traditional agricultural practices and the need for innovation; feasts for ascetics; the language of animals and birds; little and great traditions; caste, class, and power; feminist inquiry; rich and poor—and nowhere a sign of despair. There is fearless engagement with epic stories and religious communities, expressed through a command of language and a precision of vocabulary that make translation difficult, for only in Maithili can all these things be written with such natural ease...

Welcome to the mysterious world of parallel Maithili literature. We are reading five stories by Kapileshwar Raut, all five selected by the author himself as his finest.

Welcome to the mysterious world of parallel Maithili literature. Here you are reading five stories by Kapileshwar Raut which the author himself considers his best.

"Kumari Bhojan" begins in a festive atmosphere. During the ten days of Durga Puja, people collect a special kind of smooth clay from which they make earthen images of Mahadeva and clay lamps. Siyawati's husband died of snakebite, leaving her a widow. After three daughters she had a son, much younger than his sisters. The expense of marrying off her daughters drove her into debt. From this account of a life, the story opens a discussion of the actual significance of folktales and mythic narrative: it also asks how a collective effort made the killing of Mahishasura possible.

"Kumari Bhojan" opens amid festivities. Over the ten days of Durga Puja, people bring a particular kind of smooth clay to fashion earthen Mahadevas and lamps. Siyawati's husband died after being bitten by a snake, and she was widowed. Her son was born after three daughters and was therefore much younger than his sisters. The heavy costs of the daughters' marriages plunged her into debt. After these particulars, the discussion turns towards what the narrative tradition truly signifies, examining how collective action culminated in the slaying of Mahishasura.

In "Tharthari," another kind of discussion begins between a landlord and those who till his fields on a bitterly cold winter night. The scene is an open field, where the landlord has come to see how the cultivation is proceeding.

In "Tharthari," on a shivering winter night, a discussion unfolds between the landlord and the cultivators. The scene is an open field to which the landlord has come to inspect the agricultural work.

"Barka Khira" explores in depth the relationship between traditional and modern agricultural knowledge. A boy who once wandered about crying "ihait, ihait" to summon a male animal for the breeding of cows or buffaloes later becomes an agricultural scientist.

"Barka Khira" opens up the profound relationship between inherited and modern knowledge in farming. The boy who used to go about calling "ihait, ihait"—a cry to summon a male animal to breed with a cow or buffalo—grows up to become an agricultural scientist.

"Punarnava" may bring to mind the Tamil Nadu sport of Jallikattu. At the Jur Shital festival, a man dies during a contest pitting human beings against one another, and Basuni becomes a widow. When the women begin making their own decisions, the story raises questions of women's rights and autonomy.

Reading "Punarnava" may remind one of Jallikattu in Tamil Nadu. At the Jur Shital festival, a man is killed in a contest between people, leaving Basuni widowed. As the women begin to decide for themselves, many questions open up for the reader seeking a theory of feminist discourse.

Finally, "Bhumhur Aag" again offers the flavour of local culture. Caste hierarchy is unmistakable. Chetan Das belongs to the Musahar community; after coming into contact with an ascetic of the Keot caste, he becomes an ascetic himself. He goes to invite Ajab Das, an accomplished singer of devotional songs, to a grand feast of ascetics, but Ajab Das imposes conditions. Vivek Kumar says that all this is a consequence of social hierarchy; when dealing with people considered lower than themselves, he or Chetan Das might perhaps have imposed similar conditions.

Finally, "Bhumahur Aag" offers a particularly dense taste of local culture. The layers of caste hierarchy are clearly visible. Chetan Das is from the Musahar community. He meets an ascetic of the Kevat caste and becomes an ascetic himself. He goes to invite Ajab Das, skilled in singing bhajans, to a great feast of holy men, but Ajab Das sets certain conditions. Vivek Kumar considers these expressions of social stratification: when confronted with people ranked below themselves, Chetan Das—or he himself—might well have imposed similar conditions.

44. The Sharadindu Chaudhary Special Issue and Parallel Literary Discourse

Abstract

This issue is devoted to Sharadindu Chaudhary. Readers have remarked on social media that Videha's special issues on living writers and artists have become more important than the honours and awards of the Sahitya Akademi, Lalit Kala Akademi, and Sangeet Natak Akademi. Gajendra Thakur's observations on five stories by Ram Vilas Sahu.

Keywords: Sharadindu · Chaudhary · special issue · parallel · discourse · English · translation

Abstract

This issue is devoted to Sharadindu Chaudhary. On social media, readers have expressed the view that Videha's special issues on living writers and artists have become more important than honours and awards conferred by the Sahitya Akademi, Lalit Kala Akademi, and Sangeet Natak Akademi. My thanks to all contributors and readers.

Editorial for the New Issue

1

2

Gajendra Thakur on Five Stories by Ram Vilas Sahu

Parallel Literature and the Videha Maithili Literary Movement

Parallel Literature and the Videha Maithili Literary Movement

1

The Book of Bihari Literature (edited by Abhay K.)

This book contains five translations from Maithili into English by Vidyanand Jha. Nagarjun—Yatri in Maithili—and Usha Kiran Khan are placed in the Hindi section, although both have received Sahitya Akademi awards in the Maithili category. Vibha Rani and Rajkamal Chaudhary appear in the Maithili section, although both have also written in Hindi.

The book contains five Maithili-to-English translations by Vidyanand Jha. Nagarjun (Yatri in Maithili) and Usha Kiran Khan are assigned to the Hindi category, even though both received Sahitya Akademi awards in the Maithili category. Vibha Rani and Rajkamal Chaudhary are assigned to the Maithili category, though both also wrote in Hindi.

The book was edited by Abhay K., whose study of Sanskrit extended to school level. Nevertheless, he claims to have translated the Arthaśāstra directly from Sanskrit into English. On the basis of his Sanskrit training, the reviewer assesses the translation's strengths and weaknesses and suspects that an intermediate language may have been used. If that is so, acknowledging the intermediary source is a necessary principle of translation ethics.

The book has been edited by Abhay K., who studied Sanskrit up to high school. Yet he claims to have translated the Arthaśāstra directly from its Sanskrit original into English. I am proficient in Sanskrit; judging by the quality of the translation, I suspect an intermediate language was used between the Sanskrit text and its English rendering. Acknowledging the source is an ethical obligation.

In the reviewer's judgment, Vidyanand Jha's translations fall below the required standard. One example concerns the difficulty of finding an appropriate English equivalent for "olak sannā," and many other such cases are cited. The reviewer offers suggestions: begin with Rajnath Mishra's A Bird's Eye View on Mithila, which explains many local terms in English; then consult Umesh Mandal's illustrated dictionary in the Videha archive (www.videha.co.in), which also provides photographs of Mithila's plants, animals, and occupations. Videha's A Parallel History of Maithili Literature supplies examples of Maithili stories translated into English. What the translator presents as "exotic," the reviewer argues, is an organic element of Maithili itself, even if the representation of Maithili literature twenty years ago was different. The selection recalls Contemporary Maithili Short Stories, edited by Murari Madhusudan Thakur (Sahitya Akademi, 2005); the reviewer suspects that the same tendency, even the residue of an older selection, shaped it. Invoking Rip Van Winkle, he argues that the translator has failed to register the transformation of Maithili literature over two decades.

Vidyanand Jha's translations are below the expected standard. For example, he seems not to know how "olak sannā" might be rendered in English; there are many such instances. I have some suggestions for him. First read Rajnath Mishra's A Bird's Eye View on Mithila; it includes explanations of many of the terms for which he could not find English equivalents. Next consult Umesh Mandal's illustrated dictionary in the Videha archive (www.videha.co.in), which includes actual pictures of Mithila's plants, animals, and groups of skills. In A Parallel History of Maithili Literature (Videha, www.videha.co.in) one can also find sample English translations of Maithili stories. Thus the material that Vidyanand Jha presents as foreign or marvellous is in fact part of the elementary substance of life in the Maithili language—although two decades ago this might not have been evident in representative presentations of Maithili literature. His choice of stories reminds me of Contemporary Maithili Short Stories, an English translation collection edited by Murari Madhusudan Thakur (Sahitya Akademi, 2005). The stories seem like leftovers from that kind of selection. Rip Van Winkle awoke after two decades, but Vidyanand Jha is still asleep and has not seen the changes that have taken place during those years.

If these translations are compared with the accomplished English translations of Latin American literature originally written in Spanish, the differences in quality and approach to translation become unmistakable.

Compare the translations in this selection with English translations of Latin American literature in Spanish, and the difference becomes obvious.

In the original reviewer's view, such selections are generally not governed by standards of literary excellence. He places this kind of HarperCollins publication among quickly assembled selections for hotel or airport readers. The book was announced on 22 March 2022; he therefore comments that a short interval of six or seven months made reliance on older material more likely than a genuinely new selection.

But such selections are not known for literary excellence. HarperCollins publishes selections of this kind for readers in five-star hotels and airport waiting rooms. The publisher announced the book on 22 March 2022, so within six or seven months one was more likely to receive old material than new.

2

The Bride: Lalit Kumar's English translation of Harimohan Jha's (1908–1984) Maithili classic Kanyadan. The translator is an assistant professor in the Department of English, Deen Dayal Upadhyaya College, University of Delhi.

The Bride: The Maithili Classic Kanyadan—an English translation of Harimohan Jha's (1908–1984) Maithili classic Kanyadan by Lalit Kumar, Assistant Professor, Department of English, Deen Dayal Upadhyaya College, University of Delhi.

I have pre-ordered the book. I will review it after it arrives in my Kindle account on 1 December 2022.

I have already ordered the book. After it reaches my Kindle account on 1 December 2022, I will comment on it.

3

Bharti's Cat: Yogendra Pathak Viyogi's English translation of Brajkishore Verma "Manipadma"'s original Maithili novel Bhartik Bilari; available on Amazon Kindle.

Bharti's Cat—Yogendra Pathak Viyogi's English translation of Brajkishore Verma "Manipadma"'s original Maithili novel Bharatka Bilari (available on Amazon Kindle).

Yogendra Pathak Viyogi has done noteworthy work. The translation appears to carry the spirit of the original language with it.

Yogendra Pathak Viyogi has done excellent work. The original language's spirit appears secure in the translation.

Folktales of Mithila and Gonu Jha of Mithila: Tales of Wit and Humour are both works by Yogendra Pathak Viyogi, available on Amazon Kindle.

Folktales of Mithila and Gonu Jha of Mithila: Tales of Wit and Humour—both books by Yogendra Pathak Viyogi, both available on Amazon Kindle.

4

Ram Vilas Sahu's Short Stories

Now enter the engaging world of parallel literature.

In "Kamatiya Haveli," the storyteller interprets oral history. The havelis were really outposts or centres. In Mithila, landlords who received rights under Cornwallis's Permanent Settlement were, in some places, styled Maharajadhiraj and the like. A whole chain of revenue collection stretched across Mithila, and outposts were established in different places for supervising agriculture and collecting rent. Madina Didi explains the significance of this history to Janki. Alongside it, the finer details of village life are depicted in a language that may seem unfamiliar to someone who has not read Maithili literature for twenty years.

In "Kamatiya Haveli," the storyteller interprets oral history. The havelis were in reality only outposts or centres. In Mithila, the landlords who received the Permanent Settlement under Cornwallis were called "Maharajadhiraj" and other such titles. In fact, the chain of rent collectors spread across the whole of Mithila; they established centres to oversee cultivation and collect revenue. Madina Didi explains this to Janki. Amid all these episodes, the subtle colours of village life emerge in a language that may seem strange or unfamiliar to someone who has not read Maithili literature for two decades.

The second story, "Dudhbechani," recounts Rita's sacrifice: she donates all her land and property to establish a school and a cowshed.

The second story, "Dudhbechani," is the story of Rita's sacrifice: she gives away her entire land and property to build a school and a cowshed.

"The Joy of Heaven" recounts in fine detail the story of Bauku Sada's family, displaced by flooding. The family belongs to the Musahar community; the original commentary also criticises insulting stereotypes directed against such communities.

"The Joy of Heaven" tells in fine detail the story of Bauku Sada's family, driven from their home by floods. They belong to the Musahar community, whom some writers—once part-time agricultural labourers themselves—have derisively described as "rat-eaters."

"Ghusa Ghar" refers to corruption in the Indira Awas housing scheme.

"Ghoos Ghar" refers to the corruption prevailing in the Indira Awas housing scheme.

"Shikshak Mahat" weaves together a village devastated by flooding, the migration that follows, the importance of education, and the narrow mentality of the elite.

"Shikshak Mahat" binds into a single narrative thread a village ruined by floods, the consequent migration, the importance of education, and the narrow-mindedness of the elite.

3

True Stories and Sayings from Village to Village

Under this heading is a true story from Rudrapur village in Madhubani district, one that still lives on the lips of its inhabitants.

(Source and narrator: Shri Shrimohan Chaudhary, village of Rudrapur.)

"Manganiya's Mother's Oil" (Karu Oil)—a proverbial saying current among people of every caste in Rudrapur.

Manganiya was of the Guar caste. The incident took place in Rudrapur, Madhubani, eighty or ninety years ago, when a bhari (ten grams) of gold cost fifty rupees. Manganiya was still a child, extremely hardworking and frugal. By the time he grew up he had bought ten bighas of land through his own labour. He rose at three or four in the morning and finished all his work; when he set off to work as a ploughman, people would ask him where he was going. He would answer, "Master, I'm going there to rest for three or four hours." He called ploughing "resting"—after all, what great rush was there in ploughing?

Ghatak Thakur, father of Julum Thakur, was a shopkeeper, a Brahmin by caste.

Early one morning Manganiya's mother went to Ghatak Thakur's shop and began to complain.

"Hey, how much oil did you give me for two paisa? I offered a little of it to Jitwahan, rubbed some on the child's (Manganiya's) feet, and fried some tarua for a guest. And in the night the cap of the bottle was left open, so the Bongmarna hen drank it up, making that bhubhūā-bhubhūā sound. How much oil did you give me for two paisa that all these things could be done with it in a single day?"

A Proverb

"The one with the greatest goitre is the great elder sister."

45. The Premlata Mishra "Prem" Special Issue and Parallel Literary Discourse

Abstract

This issue is devoted to Premlata Mishra "Prem." The editorial on the subject became rather lengthy, so it is presented separately. On social media, readers have expressed the view that Videha's special issues have become more important than the honours and awards of the Sahitya Akademi, Lalit Kala Akademi, and Sangeet Natak Akademi.

Keywords: Premlata · Mishra · Prem · special issue · parallel · discourse · literature

Editorial

1

This issue is devoted to Premlata Mishra "Prem." The editorial on the subject became rather lengthy, so it is presented separately. On social media, readers have expressed the view that Videha's special issues have become more important than the honours and awards conferred by the Sahitya Akademi, Lalit Kala Akademi, and Sangeet Natak Akademi. My thanks to all the contributors and readers.

2

Gajendra Thakur on Five Stories by Umesh Mandal

Parallel Literature

A reference to parallel literature is found in the Vedas, where "Naraśaṃsī" is mentioned as a form of parallel literature.

The Vedas, too, offer an indication of parallel literature, mentioning "Naraśaṃsī" as a form of it.

The need for parallel literature in Maithili arose because public and private academies were continually intervening in literature and literary dignity. These included the Maithili-Bhojpuri Academy in Delhi, the Maithili Academy in Patna, the Sahitya Akademi in Delhi, and the Nepal Academy —all government institutions. Beyond these academies, the so-called literary organisations enjoying Sahitya Akademi recognition became important vehicles for asserting control over the entire public space of Maithili literature. Financial support to these bodies and other narrowly based organisations produced a form of representation in Maithili's name that was mediocre and did not represent the broader literary society.

The need for parallel literature in Maithili became acute when official and private academies repeatedly attacked literature and identity: the Maithili-Bhojpuri Academy in Delhi, the Maithili Academy in Patna, the Sahitya Akademi in Delhi, and the Nepal Academy are all government institutions. In addition to these academies, the so-called literary associations accredited by the Sahitya Akademi continued to exert pressure on Maithili literature and its dignity. This was a chief means of keeping the language's literary field under their control. The financial support received by these bodies and other narrow organisations sustained an image of representation in Maithili's name that was average, restricted, and out of keeping with the real diversity of society.

The Videha Maithili Literary Movement and a Parallel History of Maithili Literature

Consequently, an effort began to document those segments of society, experiences, and voices that had been absent, neglected, or left without representation. Writing rich in vocabulary and direct experience became a transformative intervention in the literature and art of Maithili-speaking society. An insistence on excellence displaced mediocrity, and speakers of Maithili experienced their mother tongue's actual possibilities in a new way. The attempt to write a parallel history of Maithili literature arose against this background: so-called mainstream literature of middling quality, sustained by public or private grants and possessing only a limited readership and reception, continued to be presented by academies as representative literature. Literary magazines such as Muse India (www.museindia.com) were also used to reinforce that representation, while official radio and television stations continued to project this restricted image of Maithili literature.

Umesh Mandal is a storyteller of the parallel tradition. His language is rich in vocabulary, a quality essential for expressing the intended thought and subject matter accurately.

Umesh Mandal belongs to the parallel literary tradition. His language is rich in words, an essential quality for presenting the intended idea and narrative effectively.

He himself considers five of his stories his finest; all five are mentioned below, and the original texts are also presented alongside them.

2. "A Sikki-Mauni Basket Before a Child's Understanding" (for those who see culture solely in the craft of the sikki-mauni).

2. "A Sikki-Mauni Basket Before a Child's Understanding" (those who confine their understanding of culture to the craft of the sikki-mauni alone).

3. "Gruel and Rice in Life, Milk and Rice in Death...!" (humiliation while living, glorification after death).

5. "All Fourteen Guardians" (the fourteen protectors).

"At the Level of Work" (an assessment based on actual work).

The central character tries to write a new story for an occasional, all-night storytelling gathering of Maithili writers. In the process, he makes a plan, then changes its timing and shape. Through the exercise, his experiences and encounters re-emerge within the story.

The central character tries to write a new story for the periodic storytelling gatherings of Maithili writers that continue throughout the night. He plans it, then changes its sequence; meanwhile, his experiences, encounters, and episodes from life take shape as a narrative.

"A Sikki-Mauni Basket Before a Child's Understanding" (those who see their culture only in the sikki-mauni craft).

Here too the central character describes certain kinds of people: some are adept only at talking, while others actually work and are capable.

"Gruel and Rice in Life, Milk and Rice in Death...!" (disregard during life, glorification after death).

"Gruel and Rice in Life, Milk and Rice in Death...!" (humiliation while living, glorification after death).

At a tea shop, people discuss whether a feast after someone's death can be justified. Eventually the question becomes one of the neglect and mistreatment of people during their lives.

At the tea shop, discussion turns to free benefits offered by the government. One argument is that such benefits can make people idle; but the same reasoning is applied to the effortless possession of ancestral property.

The next discussion centres on benefits provided free by the government. The argument is that these may make people indolent, but an equivalent question arises over the easy inheritance of family wealth.

The discussion moves to seasonal unemployment. In a town, a person can live by a single skill, whereas in a village many skills are needed to earn a livelihood; one alone is insufficient.

Seasonal unemployment is then discussed. A single skill may support a livelihood in the city, but in the village several skills are required; one skill is not enough.

46. The International Presentation of Maithili Literature and Parallel Literary Discourse

Abstract

The Diorama International Film Festival is scheduled to take place from 30 November to 4 December. Venue: Instituto Cervantes, Hanuman Mandir Road, Connaught Place, New Delhi. https://www.diorama.in/https://watch.diorama.in/story-market/
https://watch.diorama.in/story/the-science-of-words/
DIORAMA 2022 PRESENTS
Title: The Science of Words—three Maithili stories translated into English by the author himself.

Keywords: Literature · International · Presentation · Parallel · Discourse · Poetry · Necessity

Editorial for the New Issue

1

First Time for Maithili

The Diorama International Film Festival is to be held from 30 November to 4 December at Instituto Cervantes, Hanuman Mandir Road, Connaught Place, New Delhi.
https://www.diorama.in/https://watch.diorama.in/story-market/
https://watch.diorama.in/story/the-science-of-words/
DIORAMA 2022 PRESENTS
Title: The Science of Words—three Maithili stories translated into English by the author himself.
About the author: Gajendra Thakur is the editor of Videha.
Synopsis: The Sun generally occupies the fifth sign of the zodiac from 16 August to 16 September. This is considered an appropriate time for drying things, for the Sun's intense light and heat reach the Earth during this period. During the period of the fifth sign, palm leaves are dried in the sunshine. This forms part of Milu's father's annual conservation plan, through which life is to be breathed into the palm-leaf manuscripts once again.

Access procedure: After pressing the 'Register' button above and making payment, a confirmation email arrives and access to the platform is activated. Use the registered email address to log in; the system sends an OTP to that address. If you cannot log in despite having registered, check the registered email for extra spaces or characters, allow time for the activation of a newly purchased pass, or contact the support team at festival (at) diorama.in.

The Diorama International Film Festival is to be held from 30 November to 4 December at Instituto Cervantes, Hanuman Mandir Road, Connaught Place, New Delhi. https://www.diorama.in/ https://watch.diorama.in/story-market/ https://watch.diorama.in/story/the-science-of-words/ The title presented at DIORAMA 2022 is The Science of Words (three Maithili stories translated into English by the author himself). About the author: Gajendra Thakur edits Videha. Synopsis: The Sun generally remains in the fifth sign of the zodiac between 16 August and 16 September. When something needs drying, the Sun's strongest light and heat fall upon the Earth during this period. In this fifth-sign period, Milu's father places palm leaves in the sunlight as part of his yearly preservation plan—as though attempting to fill these leaves with life once more. Procedure: Step 1—press the 'Register' button above and pay; upon completion of payment, a confirmation email will arrive and access to the platform will be provided within an hour. Step 2—enter, for login, the same registered email address that you supplied during registration. Step 3—the system will send an OTP to that registered address; enter the correct OTP to gain access to all the content. Step 4—if you still cannot enter the website after registering, (a) use your registered email address without additional spaces or characters; (b) if you have only recently bought a pass, allow at least sixty minutes for activation; (c) contact the support team at festival (at) diorama.in.

Gajendra Thakur's Commentary on Rajdev Mandal

Parallel Literature in Maithili and the Videha Maithili Literary Movement

Parallel Literature in Maithili and the Videha Maithili Literary Movement

T. K. Oommen writes in the chapter 'Linguistic Diversity' in Sociology (1988), p. 291, National Law School of India University/Bar Council of India Trust: 'The Maithili region is dominated economically and culturally by Brahmins; if a separate Maithili state comes into existence, they may readily establish themselves as the political elite as well. This would not be to the advantage or liking of other castes—those traditionally influential as well as those presently emerging. Consequently, although these groups belong to the Maithili-speaking community, they may oppose a separate Maithili state. Such opposition adversely affects the development of numerous languages.'

T. K. Oommen further writes: 'Even after a language has been declared separate from Hindi, it may continue to be regarded as a dialect of Hindi. For example, both Grierson, who conducted the classic Linguistic Survey of India, and S. K. Chatterjee, a leading national scholar of linguistics, made it clear that Maithili was an independent language; yet it continued to be treated as a dialect of Hindi.' (Ibid., p. 293.)

A reference to parallel literature may be found in the Vedas, where 'Narāśaṃsī' is mentioned as a form of parallel literature.

An indication of parallel literature may also be found in the Vedas, where 'Narāśaṃsī' is referred to as a form of parallel literature.

The need for parallel literature in Maithili arose from the continued intervention of public and private academies in literature and literary dignity: the Maithili-Bhojpuri Academy in Delhi, the Maithili Academy in Patna, the Sahitya Akademi in Delhi, and Nepal's Prajñā Pratiṣṭhān, all government institutions. Besides these academies, the so-called literary organisations receiving recognition from the Sahitya Akademi became instruments for asserting control over Maithili literature's public space. Financial support received by these bodies and by other narrow organisations produced, in Maithili's name, a mode of representation that, in the original author's judgment, was mediocre and did not represent the wider literary community.

The necessity for parallel literature in Maithili arose from the continuous assaults upon literature and identity by governmental and private academies, including the Maithili-Bhojpuri Academy of Delhi, the Maithili Academy of Patna, the Sahitya Akademi of Delhi, and the Prajñā Pratiṣṭhān of Nepal; these are all governmental institutions. In addition to these academies, so-called literary associations recognised by the Sahitya Akademi continued to exert pressure upon Maithili literature and its dignity and became a principal means of keeping the language's literary field under their control. Financial assistance to these bodies and other narrow organisations continued to construct, in the name of Maithili, a representative image that was average and inconsistent with the actual diversity of society.

The Videha Maithili Literary Movement and a Parallel History of Maithili Literature

For this reason, the recording of those sections of society that had been absent, neglected, and left without representation began. Enriched by a substantial vocabulary and direct experience, this writing intervened transformatively in the literature and art of Maithili-speaking society. The insistence on excellence took the place of mediocrity, and native speakers experienced the real potential of Maithili. The effort to write a parallel history of Maithili literature arose because supposedly mainstream, mediocre literature, sustained by private and government institutions—literature with a limited actual readership and limited acceptance within Maithili-speaking society—continued to be presented by the academies as representative literature. Journals such as Muse India (www.museindia.com) were also employed for this restricted form of representation, while government radio and television stations continued to project the same mediocre image of Maithili literature.

Rajdev Mandal—Poet and Novelist

'Unceasingly Flowing Tears'—a Maithili poem by Shri Rajdev Mandal, from the poetry collection Ambarā.

'Continuously Falling Tears'—a poem by Rajdev Mandal from his poetry collection Ambarā.

tears like a river always keep flowing and in the waters of those tears people plunge
some feel cold and some feel hot some say wow!
and some feel bad.
but my blind-and-deaf companion
does not care,
his tears go on flowing all the time but after a while his tears ceased to flow perhaps the store of his tears is now exhausted or is she storing it!?

Verse is not the most popular literary genre among the general public, although some readers appreciate it seriously. Those engaged in popularising a language such as Sanskrit employ simple Sanskrit prose and translate short stories and novels from other Indian languages into accessible Sanskrit. In such circumstances, poetry is translated less frequently because its readership is extremely small. Where so few people speak a language that camps must be organised to teach its spoken form, translating poetry may be considered a less useful deployment of resources: this is the question raised by the original commentary.

Verse is not a popular genre, although some readers value it. Volunteers engaged in popularising a language like Sanskrit employ simple Sanskrit prose. Stories and novels from other Indian languages are translated into simple Sanskrit; poetry generally is not, because its readership is very small. When the number of speakers of a language becomes so small that camps must be held to teach people how to speak it, the translation of verse into that language may be regarded as a misuse of resources.

The situation of Maithili is growing serious. If we imagine a state of affairs in which no villages remain, the number of Maithili speakers could become almost zero. People would speak Maithili only at seminars and meetings. Even now, instruction in pronunciation and the enrichment of vocabulary seem necessary even for Maithili writers and singers.

What, then, is the purpose of writing verse in this language? What need does it meet? Some people write poetry because they lack time, since other genres demand more of it. When this becomes the reason offered for writing poetry, the situation is still more serious.

In these circumstances, an incident in the neighbourhood, a personal ambition, a dig at another person, or a travel account—all become subjects for verse. But why not use prose for such subjects? A story can be adapted into a play for performance; but what purpose is served by turning prose into poetry?

For those acquainted with what is called the desiccated mainstream of Maithili literature, the answer is clear and simple. The readers of such transformed verse are generally restricted to critics within the same faction. Poets proclaimed great write their own praise, interpreting the call for self-reliance in this way: why depend on someone else? They attach long prose introductions to their poetry collections and themselves declare their poetry great and epoch-making.

Who will understand the worth of creating verse? Unless personal worldly experience sinks into the deepest reaches of the mind, rhythmic expression alone will not make great poetry. However abstract spiritual or otherworldly thought may be, it cannot captivate readers unless it connects with earthly life and becomes relevant—whether or not it possesses metre, belongs to a factional ideology, or borrows ideological crutches. Human beings need food, clothing, and shelter first; spiritual reflection and other needs follow. The Buddha asked people engrossed in a celebration: if death is inevitable and you know it, how can you celebrate so unconcernedly? Similarly, contemporary Maithili poets see the linguistic, cultural, and economic ground slipping from under their feet, yet instead of recognising that reality they attempt to insert various 'isms' into national and international events. They produce literature from a position of supposed guardianship over marginalised classes and indigenous peoples, wanting to become their saviours. Such literature therefore fails to acquire a sharp impact.

> With drops of blood falling,
> the earth has become newly bathed.
> The bird then asks
> Asks from its heart
> in the dense and terrible darkness of the night approaching, > will my species survive?

...Then this enters my blood, and the blood begins to flow faster. Does this question concern the species of poetry to which the poet belongs, or the species of that bird? Understanding such a poem requires neither the endorsement of a partisan critic nor a self-absorbed preface, a literary clique, or the crutches of an ideology.

...Then that experience enters the blood and quickens its flow. Is this the species of the poet's poetry, or that of the bird? Such a poem needs neither a factional critic's approval nor a self-congratulatory introduction—neither a cartel nor ideological crutches.

Excellence is therefore indispensable to poetry. Its foundation should be language and culture. There is no need to import a plot or subject from outside as an act of charity towards poetry. Neither are artificially imported emotions needed—particularly when language and culture are disappearing and the regional economy is weakening; such imports remain merely superficial discoveries.

A good poem may be written on any subject—the Buddha's concerns, humanity's future, solace for the heart, language, culture, or the economy. Otherwise, people will have to take refuge with sham preachers, and the day may come when camps have to be organised to teach Maithili. Images, too, must transform naturally; otherwise it will be necessary to manufacture an artificial environment for the poet, a separate stage for poetry, a contrived vocabulary, and training camps for ideology. People would have to be trained in that artificial system. The poets of the supposedly desiccated mainstream seem occupied with precisely this undertaking.

The rhythm, rise, and fall of the Maithili language; the cultural and professional skills of a working society filled with self-confidence; the strength of a cooperative way of life; cultural conventions, politics, everyday conduct, social values, ethics, economic conditions, and adaptation within a flood-affected economy; religion and philosophy—all these should constitute subjects of Maithili poetry. Without this breadth, poetry will become one-sided, grow crooked and take root in its distortion, and finally remain no more than a dead object fit to be hung in a frame.

The making of poetry is a necessity—the hunger for literary creation, satisfied through the act of creating. The time to question the need for writing poetry and the purposes of different poetic forms may be when the people of Mithila begin attending camps to learn Maithili; only then might we discuss the futility of writing poetry in the language. But the poet must remain alert so that such a day never arrives. Rajdev Mandal exemplifies this vigilance; hence his collection Ambarā became one of the finest collections of its genre during the first decade of the twenty-first century. Vasundharā is the next step. The excellence of Rajdev Mandal's verse is grounded in language and culture. He needs neither imported subjects nor imported emotions. His imagery finds expression through a rich vocabulary. For Rajdev Mandal, poetry is not merely an option but a creative hunger and a necessity of literary existence: emotion moves into rhythm and becomes poetry.

'I Shall Stay with You'—from Ambarā

Crying, calling
My throat dried
The lips dried
As if I was thirsty
The corpses all around
Are laughing at me
no one is listening to my voice
Where has went
My society
it was necessary to break
The conservatism
Turning of direction
For the future
you are all great yourselves leave quarrelling behind and move forward no obstacle will be able to stop this I have committed no great crime respected ones, come here
Do not get angry

now I shall break no rule
now I shall trouble none of you
Keep your kingdom
I want neither the ceremonial turban nor the throne now I shall not change my colours
I shall live peacefully with you all.

Rajdev Mandal—Storyteller

Nāgārjun-Yātrī's Pāro—leaving aside the separate question of whether it was originally written in Maithili or translated into Maithili by the author himself from Hindi—presents a direct picture of the declining culture of the Maithil Brahmin society of its time. It depicts the social and cultural condition of that period. Rajdev Mandal's novel Hamar Ṭol is an account of direct experience, written from within Mithila's Dhanuk community and set in the particular social and cultural circumstances of that community. The author encompasses belief, unreasoning conventions, social reform, love, hatred, hope, and despair. After Lalit, a void becomes visible. The so-called mainstream Maithili writers became trapped in the labyrinth of their chosen subjects; darkness enveloped the literary landscape, and the way out seemed difficult. The original criticism considers Hamar Ṭol an important intervention in this void.

Nāgārjun-Yātrī's Pāro—setting aside whether it was originally written in Maithili or translated by its author himself from Hindi—gives direct experience of the declining culture of Maithil Brahmin society in its own time. It portrays that period's social and cultural situation. Rajdev Mandal's novel Hamar Ṭol offers a direct account of the life of the Dhanuk caste of Mithila in its particular social and cultural conditions. The writer includes belief—sometimes irrational—social reform, love, hatred, hope, and despair. A void emerged after Lalit. The so-called mainstream Maithili writers were trapped in the maze of their chosen subjects; darkness settled over the literary scene, and finding a way out seemed difficult, while progress appeared almost impossible.

Rajdev Mandal's Hamar Ṭol corrects, through firsthand experience, the secondhand account offered by Lalit in Pṛthvīputra; as a result, the parallel current carries the main literary current forward with it and renders it relevant.

As a realist, the storyteller seems almost compelled to make the ending tragic. He refuses to see certain struggles, or cannot see them, or perhaps no one can; nevertheless, he certainly describes those struggles.

A fight broke out between the crow and the myna. No one saw the fight; only the tree saw it. The tree saw much else, too, yet remained silent.

A fight began between a crow and a myna. No one witnessed it; only the tree did. The tree saw much more, but even then remained silent.'

The complexity and entanglement of this silence could be presented with refinement through the direct experience of an unseen event rather than through an indirect account. For this reason, the novel has established a place for itself in the history of Maithili literature.

Rajdev Mandal regards the following five stories as his finest:

Rajdev Mandal considers the following five stories his best:

Avāk (Speechless)

Bechuā's Sweater

The Ghost of the Election and Rakhbār (The Watchman).

The first story, 'Rusal Bauā' (The Sulking Boy), was written for the eighty-second Sagar Rāti Dīp Jaray. This is an all-night story-reading programme held every three months in Mithila's villages, in which storytellers read their new, unpublished stories and other writers offer critical evaluations; it runs from evening until dawn. On that occasion it was decided that only stories for children would be read, and the event took place in my village. Rajdev Mandal's story was assigned to Nārāyaṇī for review. Narayanji remarked that the story recalled Premchand's celebrated 'Īdgāh'. Phekan's son is angry; he wants new clothes and will not go to the Durga Puja fair without them. Amit, the son of Dhirendra Babu, has new clothes. Dhirendra Babu is prosperous and Phekan is poor, but Phekan's son surpasses Amit in every sphere, whether study or play. Phekan and his wife discuss the matter; she accuses Phekan of failing even in his responsibility towards their son. The boy overhears them and finally consoles his father.

The first story, 'Rusal Bauā', was written for the eighty-second Sagar Rāti Dīp Jaray, an all-night gathering for reading stories, held every three months in Mithila's villages, where storytellers present new and unpublished work. Other writers comment critically on the stories read, and the programme continues from dusk until morning. This time it was decided to read only children's stories; the gathering was held in my village. Rajdev Mandal's story was assigned to Nārāyaṇī for review. Narayanji said that it reminded him of Premchand's famous 'Īdgāh'. The plot unfolds thus: Phekan's son is sulking. He wants new clothes or else he will not attend the Durga Puja fair. Amit, Dhirendra Babu's son, has new clothes. Dhirendra Babu is wealthy, Phekan poor; yet in study and play alike Phekan's son is ahead of Amit. Phekan talks with his wife, who accuses him of failing to fulfil even his duty towards the boy. The son hears everything and ultimately comforts his father.

'Avāk' opens with several humorous moments. Jitu arrives at his in-laws' house, where his brother-in-law introduces him to a friend. This man appears to be associated with a band of dacoits and had once saved Jitu's life.

'Bechuā's Sweater' raises the questions of bonded labour and poverty, while hinting at caste-based thinking within the police force. The boy who works in a tea stall is a child labourer. The story also shows the corruption deeply entrenched in the police system.

'The Ghost of the Election' comments on elections and democracy. The central character relates a sequence of events, and at the end it becomes clear that all of it was a dream. This narrative device is exceptionally effective.

'Rakhbār' tells the story of Musba, a village watchman. His son hands a spear to his wife—Musba's daughter-in-law—and says that if Musba quarrels, she should pierce his body with it. Musba, feared as a terror outside, is kept under control inside his home. The subsequent wordplay leads to an episode concerning Sumanā, who resists when Musba attempts to behave obscenely towards her.

All these stories contain words and incidents absent from mainstream literature. The pulse of life amid poverty, sadness, and the cultural tools of everyday existence—such narratives were seldom heard in this form before the arrival of storytellers of the parallel tradition.

Issue 88 of Muse India (November–December 2019), http://museindia.com/Home/PastIssue, presents Maithili literature in an extremely weak form. It nevertheless claims to provide a representative review of Maithili literature, whereas it represents only what has been called the 'desiccated main drain', in accordance with the outlook of the Sahitya Akademi in Delhi. It is hoped that Muse India will improve its presentation and publish an independent issue devoted to the parallel tradition of Maithili literature.

47. Folk Culture, Literature, Book Criticism, and the Parallel Perspective

Abstract

The Rgveda had the Hotṛ priest, the Sāmaveda the Udgātṛ, the Yajurveda the Adhvaryu, and the Atharvaveda the Brahman; together with their assistants there were altogether seventeen kinds of priest during the Vedic period. How, then, has the Brahmin now become the sole priest? In Odisha, the title 'Hota' still exists; there, Brahmins belonging to the Ṛgvedic, Sāmavedic, and Yajurvedic traditions do not establish marital relations with the Atharvavedic Brahmins of what is called the violent (!) Pippalāda Saṃhitā.

Keywords: Culture · Work · Criticism · Parallel · Perspective · Also · Doing

Editorial for the New Issue

1

The Ṛgveda had its Hotṛ priest, the Sāmaveda its Udgātṛ, the Yajurveda its Adhvaryu, and the Atharvaveda its Brahman. With their assisting priests there were altogether seventeen kinds of Vedic priest. How is it that now there is only one Brahmin priest? Even today the title 'Hota' survives in Odisha, where Ṛgvedic, Sāmavedic, and Yajurvedic Brahmins do not intermarry with the Atharvavedic Brahmins of the supposedly violent (!) Pippalāda Saṃhitā. In southern India, priests from several tribal communities became Brahmins. For the worship of Kālībandī, or for bhagait and phulhāsi rites, a priest comes; that person can be a non-Brahmin or a Brahmin. Someone speaking without fieldwork will ask how a Brahmin can serve a gahbar shrine or perform as a bhagat. But in the village of Rudrapur (via Tulapatganj, Madhubani district) a Brahmin bhagait performs service at the gahbar. Among the Satar (Santhal) community spread across Mithila, a Murmu pandit rhythmically recites an invocation from a text said to date from the Indus Valley civilisation; members of that community can tell you about it. Dalit discourse repeatedly discusses the killing of Śambūka in the Uttarakāṇḍa of the Vālmīki Rāmāyaṇa: because Śambūka practised austerities, a complaint was made lest he rise in status, and Lord Rama killed him to resolve that complaint. In the course of telling stories in Puruṣaparīkṣā, Vidyapati is made to pronounce an authorial judgment that Rajput women are immoral. Both cases resemble the alleged Atharvavedic statement that anyone may seize the hand of a Śūdra's wife and take her away without consent. You will find this statement on social media and the internet; search the original Atharvaveda as long as you like and you will find no reference. Whoever makes the allegation incites trouble and disappears without providing a citation. You are left bewildered: the burden of proof falls not upon the accuser but upon you. Your energy is wasted, although the internet eventually makes correction possible and the text is not corrupted. Let us first return to Puruṣaparīkṣā. Would Vidyapati, the court poet writing in Sanskrit and Avahaṭṭa, have had the audacity to write such a thing about women belonging to his royal patron's caste? If a later copyist with a corrupted mind altered the text in accordance with his own feelings, today's commentator and translator ought to explain the matter in a note. Did Rama kill Śambūka, or did a malicious copyist who raised an accusation against Śambūka kill him? Now consider the Atharvaveda. It says: 'O woman, I am the Sāmaveda and you are the Ṛgveda; O bride, I take your hand for prosperity.' Moreover, the Atharvaveda and Sāṃkhya are associated with the Vrātya tradition. The Vrātyas, who had not recited the Gāyatrī mantra for three generations, were accordingly regarded as forest dwellers, moving through forests and wildernesses. There was also a rite resembling what is now called 'ghar vāpasī', the Vrātyastoma, intended to bring the Vrātyas of the parallel stream back. Elsewhere they are described as physically and sexually violent or given to intoxication, but the Atharvaveda portrays them as yogis. Other accounts depict them as guardians of truth and physicians devoted to Śiva. Yet even Atharvavedic Brahmins were called violent. Corrupt copyists introduced interpolations into the Vedas as well, which linguists are now detecting. In interpreting mantras, Maharshi Patañjali offered the scientific maxim 'yac chabda āha tad asmākaṃ pramāṇam': what the word or expression of the mantra says is evidence for us. How this later came to mean that the Veda alone is authoritative evidence, I do not know. Vedic literature contained work useful to ordinary people and not bound to a particular side. 'Fill all Brahmins, Kṣatriyas, Vaiśyas, and Śūdras with radiance, and fill me with that same radiance'—this is found in the Yajurveda.

Sita arrives and wants to cross the Kamala river, but the boatman says that he wants a reward—and what reward but Sita's sister-in-law? Sita replies, 'I have given her; enjoy her for ages upon ages.' Sita's parental home is Mithila: would a boatman not even exchange this much teasing with her? These lines are sung by the Dūdhvaṃśī community of Mithila; I heard them from Korail and Budhan's mother.

The Gidarmārā have their own language, you know. People call them Gidarmārā and Magahiyā Dom, but they call themselves Banjara and their speech the Banjara language. Try calling them Gidarmārā to their faces: they will quarrel with you. Banjaras believe that the world is governed by good and evil.

Settlements of destitute beggars have appeared in towns, and these neighbourhoods have no caste distinctions. Near Simra, at Sukhent, there is a large tented settlement of Banjaras: it is built and dispersed, built and dispersed. Satar communities live to the east and south of Madhepur, south of Duālak, in Karharā and Ṭaṛhiyā. These Santhals are skilled with the bow and arrow.

Writing about the Maithili folktale 'Ekṭā Cinmā Kheliyau Rao Bhaiyā', Subhash Chandra Yadav says: 'The Manusmṛti says that quietly plucking someone's flower does not constitute theft; similarly, eating a single grain belonging to someone else is no crime. This is the tale's inner voice. The story establishes the proposition that every life has equal value. The helpless and the poor also have the right to live. There should be a space for them, too, in this world.' The Manusmṛti is so tolerant at one point, and its vocabulary is so close to modern legal terminology that it seems to have no legal gap whatsoever; yet cruel statements, too, have been inserted into it.

In translations of the Vedas into foreign languages, the names of the ṛṣis have been removed, though they may still be found in the originals. Among the seers of Vedic hymns are women and Śūdra sages as well; who, then, inserted compositions against women and Śūdras? Why should a Śūdra sage such as Kavaṣa Ailūṣa, a seer of Vedic verses, or a woman such as Apālā, also a Vedic seer, be made to stand at the margins? In the Vedas, however, three things appear with each hymn number: ṛṣi, deity, and metre. We call the ṛṣi a seer, but efforts were made to misuse even this designation. The Vedic sages call themselves poets, and they call the deities poets as well. All Vedic literature is the verbal embodiment of this poetic consciousness. Spiritual awareness there is elevated to divine consciousness and expressed in language concerning the physical world. Indeed, even at that time those who recited verses together over the course of the year were compared in the Atharvaveda to croaking frogs welcoming Parjanya. This suggests that the possibility of a dissenting voice in song was acknowledged; the Ṛgveda also has a frog hymn. Patañjali's scientific maxim in mantra interpretation, 'yac chabda āha tad asmākaṃ pramāṇam', means that what the words or expressions of a mantra say is authoritative for us. How did this come to mean that the Veda alone is authoritative? I do not know. For me the mantra has its ṛṣi and its deity; both are poets, authors of the hymn, and this is my evidence. Janaka organised a philosophical disputation with a thousand cows as the prize. Yājñavalkya was about to depart with the cows when Gārgī's questioning began. She pressed him with further questions based on his replies. Yājñavalkya warned her not to ask so many questions that her head might split into pieces. Yet Gārgī still asked: 'Under whose dominion are time and duration?' Yājñavalkya replied: 'Under that of the Imperishable.'

Even today, the editor of a journal issued by Chetna Samiti, a so-called literary association recognised by the Sahitya Akademi, makes additions and omissions in articles under the influence of Brahmanical conventions. In 'Pachpaniyā Maithili', Subhash Chandra Yadav writes about this editor: 'Dr Ramanand Jha "Raman" noted in his notebook: "A Brahmin says, I am a Srotriya; a Solhakan says, I am a Brahmin. What should I say I am?" The contempt expressed for Solhakans in this note is nothing other than a linguistic expression of caste animosity and hatred.' I have continued to raise this same objection to such vocabulary in Mahendra Malangia's plays, but his caste-oriented theatre is intoxicated by something and is unconcerned with the feelings of others. When, moreover, a gentleman writing a Maithili essay on Lorik in a twentieth-century Sahitya Akademi book says that Lorik rose against the atrocities perpetrated by Śūdras upon Brahmins, and we have already seen the condition of Ramanand Jha 'Raman' and Malangia, why blame their intellectual ancestor Tulsidas, writing during Akbar's reign? Just as Vishnu Sharma, while narrating tales in the Pañcatantra, suddenly becomes cruel towards women and Śūdras without reason, so too does the Rāmcaritmānas. The stories of the Pañcatantra are excellent, yet Vishnu Sharma turns upon women and Śūdras. Narayana Pandit therefore rewrote the same tales under the title Hitopadeśa, a much more practical work. Will Ramanand Jha 'Raman' and Mahendra Malangia apologise and rewrite their compositions? Will the translator of Puruṣaparīkṣā insert a note at the appropriate place explaining that Vidyapati, writing in Sanskrit and Avahaṭṭa and praised by the king, would hardly have had the audacity to misrepresent the character of Rajput women, and that the passage is the work of a caste-prejudiced copyist? Narayana Pandit, moreover, writes in the Hitopadeśa:

आहार निद्रा भय मैथुनं च सामान्यमेतत् पशुभिर्नराणाम्।
धर्मो हि तेषामधिको विशेषः धर्मेण हीनाः पशुभिः समानाः ॥

Food, sleep, fear, and sexual intercourse are common to human beings and animals alike. The distinguishing quality of human beings is dharma; without it they are no different from animals.

2

The internet has become cyberspace.

But there are dangers there too: viruses, spam, malware, spyware, Trojan horses, and worms.

A virus is like Raktabīja: from one program it produces another, although it too is itself a program. System, stealth, file, and polymorphic viruses are among its types.

A worm is also a virus-like program that spreads through networks.

A Trojan horse is exceedingly cunning: it seems that it will do one thing but instead does quite another. Spyware is an agent of espionage, spying on individuals or organisations. Malware is a collective term for all these—viruses, worms, spyware, and Trojan horses—which damage computers connected to a network. Spam is the mass of unsolicited emails sent to unknown people to persuade them to buy or sell something fraudulent.

Antivirus software restrains such threats. A firewall is the wall of a fortress that keeps hackers or crackers from attacking or taking control of your computer or network.

Finally comes our ethical hacker—the match for all the hackers and crackers—who, for your benefit, tries to break through your antivirus software and firewall. If the attempt succeeds, the ethical hacker strengthens them through better programming and attacks again. Think of it as a mock drill.

Create an image of yourself that good people can love—an image of competence and hard work.

Yet as time passes and we advance, the image many of us hold of ourselves begins to deteriorate. This happens when we pay attention to what others think or say about us. They may supply pretended knowledge, or at times real knowledge, or simply information, but can they give us our own self-image or our abilities? No; more often they do the opposite. Parents and teachers sometimes become involved in this unknowingly, as do friends, society, and relatives. 'This one is more or less attractive; that child's mathematics is better or worse than another's; befriend the clever child or avoid the foolish one; it is because of that person that we won or lost.' Their actions and words do these things, but only when you lend them your ears and your attention.

Success that is truly success—success achieved without compromise—will increase your self-confidence. Failure will discourage you only when it is genuinely failure. How much literature Jacques Derrida's deconstruction brought from below to above, and how much it brought down from above!

Is it success, or is it really success, to steal in the name of creative literature and then obtain awards and money from the disciplinary institutions described by Michel Foucault? And is the lifelong steadfastness of someone gentle yet firm, like Subhash Chandra Yadav, and the price paid for it, success or failure?

Therefore maintain your confidence and keep your discipline unwavering. Continue to increase your abilities every day; if a day passes without any increase in your competence, consider that day wasted. Cultivate equanimity and self-confidence. If you possess these qualities, you belong to the parallel current: you are welcome.

Rise early in the morning and do household work as well: this will make you responsible and self-reliant. Do not be ashamed to ask for help when a difficulty arises, and help others with their difficulties. It is hard to stand before a powerful enemy; courage, a clear understanding of right and wrong, and truth are needed for it. Never lay down your arms against injustice. Shouting alone will make no one listen; demonstrate through action. Weeping and lamentation will achieve nothing: act, and practise what you preach.

There is much that is false on the internet too. Neither create nor spread fake news, and protect yourself against cybercriminals.

Do not frighten or mistreat those weaker or younger than yourself. If anyone behaves in this way towards you, lodge a complaint.

Like the Jaipur Foot (an artificial limb) and the smokeless stove, parallel literature too is being pursued through invention and selfless work, without greed for money or prizes, so that we may build a better society and carry it forward.

Everyone possesses some skill, such as the skill of playing the pipahī, a wind instrument. If you doubt it, try blowing into one yourself. It takes years of training. The same is true of folk dance and performance, and of knowledge connected with wood and clay. Respect these arts.

Welcome only the development that does not destroy the environment. Plant ten trees for every tree you cut down.

Are you afraid to undertake a task alone, even the smallest task? Yet companionship and support will not always be available.

Forget the past, whether it has been good or bad.

Some friends and organisations make you unhappy, provoke anger, and discourage you. The time has come to bid them farewell. Good days are still to come; how long can bad times endure? The lessons learned in adversity have lasting value and help us avoid repeating our mistakes. It is also necessary to pause amid work and reflect, and to visit one's village, relatives, and friends.

Be prepared to see the rainbow after the rain. There can be magic every day; it happens when you help at least one person each day. Keep writing down and collecting your thoughts. Never skip breakfast; sleep seven or eight hours, and eat food that is good for your body. If the mind remains restless, meditate, paint, read, talk with a friend, travel, or dance to music.

Life is priceless: respect every moment. Work hard without complaint, even—and all the more—when your efforts bring failure. Take one step each day towards the dream you have seen, towards your goal. If this gives you joy, you belong to the parallel current: you are welcome.

A harsh laugh that does not reach the eyes, used to conceal anger, reveals no happiness. It is not the laughter that follows a humorous anecdote, nor the smile with which one makes another person a friend and assures them that one poses no threat. We should help the elderly and the ill, and assist people and countries affected by war and natural disasters; such assistance will never be meaningless. You should have a clear objective before you, and attain it through diligence and devotion. Learn to speak up against those who inflict injustice and suffering, and be grateful to those who serve humanity selflessly. We should attend to persons with disabilities and remain sensitive to their needs. Beyond disability, people possess many qualities: we should recognise those qualities and support them in securing their rights. According to the World Health Organization, fifteen per cent of the world's population has a disability. The first Indian census of persons with disabilities was undertaken in 2001 and recorded only 2.1 per cent; that figure is not credible. There will always be pressure upon you to resemble your colleagues and friends. Do not yield to it. Develop your own personality.

It is not good to lose your life for the sake of a joke or an amusement.

Chemicals used in fields pollute the environment. Produce grown with organic materials and without chemical substances is healthier and tastier.

People with little self-respect need the approval of others in order to feel good. This applies to those who post on Facebook and count the 'likes'. A number of incidents have occurred in which people taking selfies fell into ravines or from roofs and died. Of course, selfies can also be used for a worthwhile purpose, such as a selfie with one's daughter.

Understand the value of time. Useless committees and meetings, especially reactionary organisations, can waste a great deal of it. If you cannot arrive at the appointed hour, do not forget to apologise. Money has driven us away from nature. The Indigenous Abenaki people of Canada, who live on their reserved land at Odanak, have created beautiful sayings about the environment: 'Only when the last tree is cut, every stream poisoned, and every fish killed will you understand that you cannot eat money.'

Live simply, so that the environment is not harmed, and remain connected with nature.

Live in harmony with one another—not only with people but also with cattle, birds, all living creatures, nature, and the rivers.

And if you do this, you belong to the parallel current: you are welcome.

No one is perfect, but everyone can try to become better. We should strive to remain truthful, honest, and compassionate. Everyone should work to keep this world a good place in which to live.

We should read widely and keep learning new things.

3

Parallel Literature in Maithili and the Videha Maithili Literary Movement

Pseudocriticism in Maithili and the Case of Kamalanand Jha

In the original author's view, the title of Kamalanand Jha's book Maithili Novel: Time, Society and Questions (2021) creates a misleading impression. He regards it as a collection of supposedly critical essays on a few selected writers from a particular caste. He attacks this 263-page book with sharp satire, suggesting that it will be confined to a few library-bound hardback copies. As a corrective example he cites Gulo, a novel by the non-caste-aligned writer Subhash Chandra Yadav, which Kamalanand Jha, in the author's opinion, disposes of in two lines without having read it. Those two lines are quoted below. The critic urges readers to read Gulo first; it is said to be available in the Videha archive with Subhash Chandra Yadav's permission at http://videha.co.in/pothi.htm.

'The novel's weakness is the author's political prejudice. Partisanship towards a particular political position does not do justice to a literary work.'

The original reviewer responds that in a novel where politics is not even remotely the subject, the question of 'political prejudice' or 'partisanship towards a particular political position' does not arise. He finds political commitments in the writing of Dhūmketu and Yātrī, but argues that Subhash Chandra Yadav's Voṭ (2022)—also said to be available with the author's permission in the Videha archive at http://videha.co.in/pothi.htm—avoids one-sided political insistence through its narrative technique, although its subject is political. The critic also mentions his own Nit Naval Subhash Chandra Yadav, said to be available at the same address. The original essay then alleges that Kamalanand Jha writes like a political party's spokesperson and is affected by caste prejudice and a Brahmanical outlook. It also questions the propriety of an assignment for translation work granted by the Sahitya Akademi. The author links these allegations to the concern for social justice in the parallel literary current. One basis for describing Kamalanand Jha as a 'pseudo-critic' is a statement attributed to him: after a journey of almost a century, Gaurinath is credited with writing a dignified novel about the dreams, struggles, and ironies of inter-caste marriage. The original reviewer asks why such credit overlooks Sushil's Gambālī (1982), whose opening explicitly supports widow remarriage and inter-caste marriage and which is said to be available in the Videha archive. The essay uses this dispute to reread Sushil's literary world. It next calls Dinesh Kumar Mishra's Dui Pāṭan Ke Bīc Meṃ a historical biography of the Kosi river, citing his other books on rivers:

Bandinī Mahānandā, Bāgmatī Kī Sadgati!, Nā Ghāṭ Nā Ghar, Kamalā Nadī, Bhutahī Nadī..., The Kamla River and People on Collision Course, Bhutahi Balan—Story of a Ghost River and Engineering Witchcraft, and Refugees of the Kosi Embankments. The original essay makes a serious allegation that Pankaj Jha Parashar committed literary plagiarism, paragraph by paragraph, from Dinesh Kumar Mishra's writings, and alleges that Kamalanand Jha endorsed this activity as 'research'. The author supplies screenshots comparing the Hindi original with the Maithili passages. Dinesh Kumar Mishra's education—Civil Engineering at IIT Kharagpur (1968) and an M.Tech in Structural Engineering (1970)—is mentioned to underline his expertise in river studies. The original essay connects this controversy to social justice and critical accountability in the parallel literary tradition.

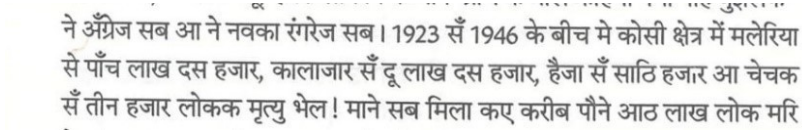
All of Dinesh Kumar Mishra's books are now said to be available in the Videha archive with his permission:

http://videha.co.in/pothi.htm

An incident involving Bill Gates is recalled here. Asked whether the introduction of the Xbox in India had been delayed out of fear of piracy, he is quoted as saying that Microsoft did not postpone product launches because of such fears. Using this as a metaphor, the original author declares that the Videha archive (http://www.videha.co.in/archive.htm) will continue to be enriched despite risks. The presence of one or two rotten fish in a pond does not make every fish rotten; the 'fishermen' of the parallel current have continued, and will continue, to remove the rotten ones.

A Final Challenge to Factional Pseudoliterary Criticism in Maithili

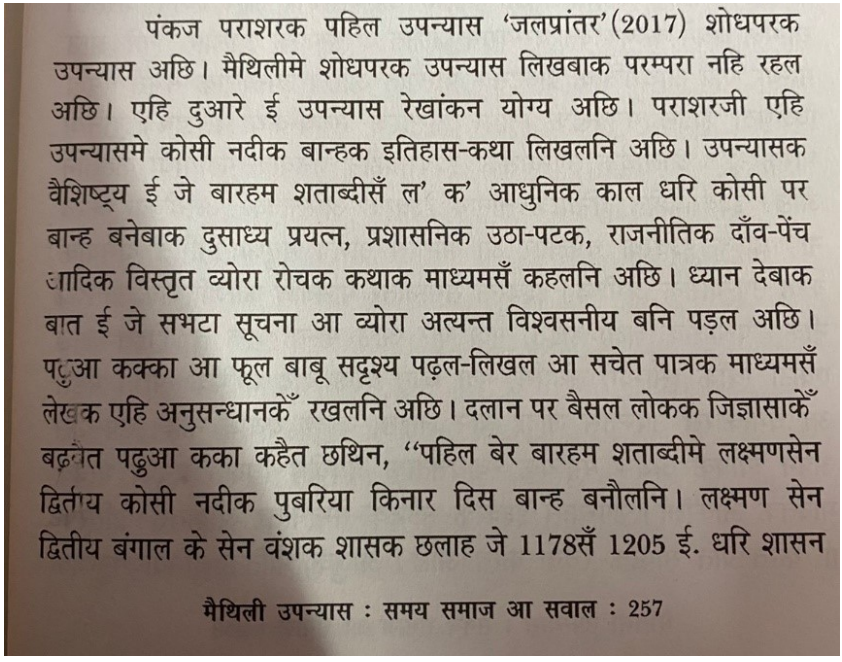
Dinesh Kumar Mishra's original Dui Pāṭan Ke Bīc Meṃ... (2006) states that between 1923 and 1946, 510,000 people died of malaria in the Kosi region, 210,000 of kala-azar, 60,000 of cholera, and 3,000 of smallpox—a total of 783,000. The original essay then places beside this an extract from Pankaj Jha Parashar's Jalprāntar (2017, p. 103), makes a direct comparison, and advances an allegation of literary plagiarism.



ने अँग्रेज सब आ ने नवका रंगरेज सब। 1923 सँ 1946 के बीच मे कोसी क्षेत्र में मलेरिया
से पाँच लाख दस हजार, कालाजार सँ दू लाख दस हजार, हैजा सँ साठि हजार आ चेचक
सँ तीन हजार लोकक मृत्यु भेल! माने सब मिला कए करीब पौने आठ लाख लोक मरि

English translation of visible documentary excerpt: Visible excerpt: '...Neither the British nor the new British. Between 1923 and 1946, in the Kosi region, 510,000 people died of malaria, 210,000 of kala-azar, 60,000 of cholera, and 3,000 of smallpox: altogether nearly eight hundred thousand people died...'

An original passage in Dinesh Kumar Mishra's Dui Pāṭan Ke Bīc Meṃ... (2006) states that in the twelfth century, King Lakshman II built an embankment on the Kosi river in Bihar, for which the people conferred upon him the title 'Vīr' and called the embankment 'Vīr Bāndh'. Remains of it are said to be visible about five kilometres south of Bhimnagar in Supaul district. Dr Francis Buchanan (1810–11) conjectured that it was possibly the outer defensive wall of a fort, because it stretched for roughly thirty-two kilometres along the western bank from the Tilyuga to the confluence with the Dhaus river. Dr W. W. Hunter (1877) disagreed. Citing local accounts, he concluded that it was not a fort wall, but could not establish its true purpose. The general belief was that the embankment may have been built to prevent the Kosi from flowing westwards and that construction had stopped abruptly. After this passage the original essay quotes passages from Kamalanand Jha's Maithili Novel, Time, Society and Questions (pp. 257–58) to compare what it describes as Pankaj Jha Parashar's plagiarised material.



पंकज पराशरक पहिल उपन्यास 'जलप्रांतर' (2017) शोधपरक उपन्यास अछि। मैथिलीमे शोधपरक उपन्यास लिखबाक परम्परा नहि रहल अछि। एहि दुआरे ई उपन्यास रेखांकन योग्य अछि। पराशरजी एहि उपन्यासमे कोसी नदीक बान्हक इतिहास-कथा लिखलनि अछि। उपन्यासक वैशिष्ट्य ई जे बारहम शताब्दीसँ ल' क' आधुनिक काल धरि कोसी पर बान्ह बनेबाक दुसाध्य प्रयत्न, प्रशासनिक उठा-पटक, राजनीतिक दाँव-पेंच आदिक विस्तृत व्योरा रोचक कथाक माध्यमसँ कहलनि अछि। ध्यान देबाक बात ई जे सभटा सूचना आ व्योरा अत्यन्त विश्वसनीय बनि पड़ल अछि। पढुआ कक्का आ फूल बाबू सदृश्य पढ़ल-लिखल आ सचेत पात्रक माध्यमसँ लेखक एहि अनुसन्धानकेँ रखलनि अछि। दलान पर बैसल लोकक जिज्ञासाकेँ बढ़बैत पढुआ कका कहैत छथिन, "पहिल बेर बारहम शताब्दीमे लक्ष्मणसेन द्वितीय कोसी नदीक पुबरिया किनार दिस बान्ह बनौलनि। लक्ष्मण सेन द्वितीय बंगाल के सेन वंशक शासक छलाह जे 1178सँ 1205 ई. धरि शासन

मैथिली उपन्यास : समय समाज आ सवाल : 257

English translation of visible documentary excerpt: Visible excerpt from Maithili Novel: Time, Society and Questions, p. 257: 'Pankaj Parashar's first novel, Jalprāntar (2017), is a research-based novel. There has been no tradition of writing research-based novels in Maithili, and the work is therefore worthy of notice. In this novel Parashar recounts the historical story of the Kosi river's embankments. Its distinctive feature is that he tells, through an engaging narrative, the detailed history of the daring attempts to construct embankments from the twelfth century to modern times, together with administrative upheavals and political manoeuvres. Notably, the whole body of information and detail seems highly credible. The author presents his research through educated and perceptive characters such as Paḍuā Kakkā and Phul Babu. Arousing the curiosity of people seated in the courtyard, Paḍuā Kakkā says: The first embankment on the Kosi's eastern bank was built in the twelfth century by Lakshman Sen II. Lakshman Sen II was a ruler of Bengal's Sena dynasty, who reigned from 1178 to 1205 CE...'

कयने छलाह। एहि बान्हक अवशेष अहाँ एखनो भीमनगरसँ दू कोस
पश्चिममे देखि सकैत छी। एकटा पश्चिमी विद्वान फ्रांसिस बुकाननकेँ
अनुमान रहनि, जे ई बान्ह सम्भवतः कोनो किलाकेँ रक्षा हेतु बनाओल गेल
होयत। मुदा बुकानन के मतसँ डब्ल्यू. डब्ल्यू. हंटर सहमत नहि भेलखिन।
ओ साफ कहलनि जे कोसीक किनार पर बान्ह एहि दुआरे बनाओल गेल
होयत जे नदी पश्चिम दिस नहि बहय लागय।" एहि तरहेँ बान्हक मादे

English translation of visible documentary excerpt: Continuation of the visible excerpt: '...completed it. The remains of this embankment can still be seen about two kos west of Bhimnagar. The Western scholar Francis Buchanan conjectured that this embankment may have been constructed to protect a fort. I, however, cannot agree with Buchanan's view. He himself said quite plainly that the embankment built on the Kosi's bank was such that the river would not flow westward. In this way the embankment...'

The original essay presents an excerpt from Pankaj Jha Parashar's Jalprāntar (2017, p. 31) for comparison with Dinesh Kumar Mishra's original writing.

पढ़ुआ कका पछिला गप कें आगाँ बढ़बैत कहलखिन, 'फूल बाबू, कोसी नदीक बेसिन प्राचीन काल सँ मनुक्खक निवास लेल उपयुक्त स्थान रहल अछि। बारहम-तेरहम सदी मे भारत मे जखन कइक टा नदी सुखा गेल, तँ ओहि ठामक पशुचारक समाजक लोक एतय आबि कए बसलाह। तहिये सँ बढ़ैत जनसंख्या आ कोसी नदीक बदलैत प्रवाहक मध्य टकराहटि होमय लागल। नदीक अनियंत्रित धारा कें लोक बाढ़ि बूझय लागल। पहिल बेर बारहम शताब्दी मे लक्ष्मणसेन द्वितीय कोसी नदीक पुबरिया किनार दिस बान्ह बनौलनि। लक्ष्मणसेन द्वितीय बंगाल के सेन वंशक शासक छलाह, जे 1178 सँ 1205 ईस्वी धरि शासन कयनें छलाह। एहि बान्हक अवशेष अहाँ एखनो भीमनगर सँ दू कोस पश्चिम मे देखि सकैत छी। एकटा पश्चिमी विद्वान फ्रांसिस बुकानन के अनुमान रहनि, जे ई बान्ह संभवत: कोनो किला के रक्षा हेतु बनाओल गेल होयत। मुदा बुकानन के मत सँ डब्लू. डब्लू. हंटर सहमत नहि भेलखिन। ओ साफ कहलखिन, जे कोसीक किनार पर बान्ह एहि दुआरे बनाओल गेल होयत, जे नदी पच्छिम दिस नहि बह' लागय।' पढ़ुआ कका सँ मुँहजबानी एतेक रास ऐतिहासिक तथ्य सुनियो कए फूल बाबू सहमति मे मूड़ी नहि डोलेलखिन। जाहि सँ ओतय बैसल लोक सबहक उत्सुकता और बढ़ि गेलनि, जे गप मे एहेन कोन तथ्य रहि गेलै जे फूल बाबू संतुष्ट नहि भेलखिन? लोक कें बुझेलनि जे फूल बाबू शास्त्रार्थ के अखड़हा पर माटि फेकि रहल छथिन। पढ़ुआ कका कें आइ जोड़ीदार भेटि गेलनि!

जलप्रांतर / 31

English translation of visible documentary excerpt: Visible excerpt from Jalprāntar, p. 31: 'Increasing the curiosity of those seated in the courtyard, Paḍuā Kakkā said: Phul Babu, the Kosi river had long been a suitable dwelling place for human beings in ancient times. In the twelfth and thirteenth centuries, when several rivers dried up in India, people left their traditional pastoral society and began cultivating land. As the population grew, encroachment upon the Kosi's shifting course increased. People began to suffer from the river's uncontrolled current. Lakshman Sen II built an embankment on the eastern bank of the Kosi for the first time in the twelfth century. Lakshman Sen II was a ruler of Bengal's Sena dynasty, who ruled from 1178 to 1205 CE. The remains of this embankment can still be seen about two kos west of Bhimnagar. The Western scholar Francis Buchanan conjectured that this embankment was perhaps built to defend a fort. But I do not agree with Buchanan. He said explicitly that the embankment on the Kosi's bank was built so that the river would not flow westward. Paḍuā Kakkā then asked: Phul Babu, have you ever heard such a historical fact? Phul Babu shook his head in agreement. The people there turned over in their minds the remarkable history that had lain buried in the village. Those who understood nothing struck the ground with a stick in the style of Phul Babu's followers. Paḍuā Kakkā's eyes shone brightly.'

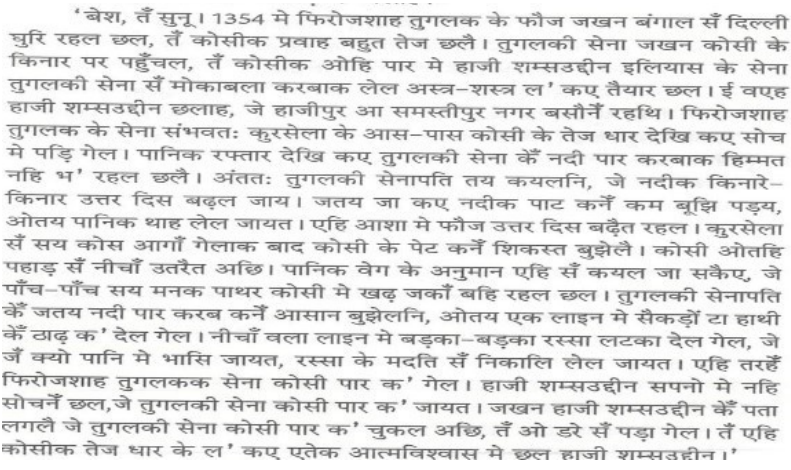
In Dinesh Kumar Mishra's Dui Pāṭan Ke Bīc Meṃ... (2006), an incident involving Firoz Shah Tughlaq's army on its return from Bengal to Delhi is recounted to convey the Kosi's formidable power. According to the account, when the Sultan's army reached the Kosi, the forces of Haji Shamsuddin Ilyas stood ready for battle on the opposite bank. This was the same Shamsuddin who is said to have founded the towns of Hajipur and Samastipur. Firoz's army became stranded on the banks of the Kosi near Kursela; the force of the river prevented further movement. Eventually it was decided to travel upstream to the north and search for a place where the river could be crossed. The army travelled about a hundred kos upstream and attempted the crossing around Jiyāran, where the river descends from the hills to the plains. The river was narrower there, but its current was so powerful that stones weighing five hundred maunds were described as floating away like blades of grass. Lines of elephants were stationed on both sides of the crossing and ropes suspended below them so that soldiers swept away by the water could be rescued. Shamsuddin had not believed that the Sultan's army could cross the Kosi; when he heard that it had done so, he withdrew.

The original essay presents an excerpt from Pankaj Jha Parashar's Jalprāntar (2017, p. 105) for comparison with Dinesh Kumar Mishra's account given above.



'बेश, तँ सुनू। 1354 मे फिरोजशाह तुगलक के फौज जखन बंगाल सँ दिल्ली घुरि रहल छल, तँ कोसीक प्रवाह बहुत तेज छलै। तुगलकी सेना जखन कोसी के किनार पर पहुँचल, तँ कोसीक ओहि पार मे हाजी शम्सउद्दीन इलियास के सेना तुगलकी सेना सँ मोकाबला करबाक लेल अस्त्र-शस्त्र ल' कए तैयार छल। ई वएह हाजी शम्सउद्दीन छलाह, जे हाजीपुर आ समस्तीपुर नगर बसौनैं रहथि। फिरोजशाह तुगलक के सेना संभवतः कुरसेला के आस-पास कोसी के तेज धार देखि कए सोच मे पड़ि गेल। पानिक रफ्तार देखि कए तुगलकी सेना कैं नदी पार करबाक हिम्मत नहि भ' रहल छलै। अंततः तुगलकी सेनापति तय कयलनि, जे नदीक किनारे-किनार उत्तर दिस बढ़ल जाय। जतय जा कए नदीक पाट कनैं कम बूझि पड़य, ओतय पानिक थाह लेल जायत। एहि आशा मे फौज उत्तर दिस बढ़ैत रहल। कुरसेला सँ सय कोस आगाँ गेलाक बाद कोसी के पेट कनैं शिकस्त बुझेलै। कोसी ओतहि पहाड़ सँ नीचाँ उतरैत अछि। पानिक वेग के अनुमान एहि सँ कयल जा सकैए, जे पाँच-पाँच सय मनक पाथर कोसी मे खढ़ जकाँ बहि रहल छल। तुगलकी सेनापति कैं जतय नदी पार करब कनैं आसान बुझेलनि, ओतय एक लाइन मे सैकड़ों टा हाथी कैं ठाढ़ क' देल गेल। नीचाँ वला लाइन मे बड़का-बड़का रस्सा लटका देल गेल, जे जँ क्यो पानि मे भासि जायत, रस्सा के मदति सँ निकालि लेल जायत। एहि तरहेँ फिरोजशाह तुगलकक सेना कोसी पार क' गेल। हाजी शम्सउद्दीन सपनो मे नहि सोचनैं छल,जे तुगलकी सेना कोसी पार क' जायत। जखन हाजी शम्सउद्दीन कैं पता लगलै जे तुगलकी सेना कोसी पार क' चुकल अछि, तँ ओ डरे सँ पड़ा गेल। तँ एहि कोसीक तेज धार के ल' कए एतेक आत्मविश्वास मे छल हाजी शम्सउद्दीन।'

English translation of visible documentary excerpt: Visible excerpt relating to the Kosi crossing: '...Well, Sattu! In 1354, Firoz Shah Tughlaq's army, returning to Delhi after winning Bengal, reached the Kosi river. On the opposite bank of the Kosi, the forces of Haji Shamsuddin Ilyas stood ready for battle. The great river halted the Sultan's army near Kursela. Haji Shamsuddin, who founded Hajipur and Samastipur, had placed his forces there. The soldiers were anxious and searched for a place to cross. The army went a hundred kos upstream, reaching the region near Jiyāran, where the mountain river enters the plains. Even there the current was extremely powerful. Stones weighing five hundred maunds were swept along in the current like grass. To carry the army across, lines of elephants were placed on both banks and ropes suspended to rescue soldiers who might be swept away. When Shamsuddin heard that Firoz Shah's forces had succeeded in crossing the Kosi, he withdrew.'

(Further screenshots will shortly be updated at this link: http://www.videha.co.in/investigation.htm)

4

My Commentary on Five Short Stories by Narayan Yadav

Five Short Stories by Shri Narayan Yadav

Shri Narayan Yadav regards the following five short stories as his best:

Navkī Putohū (The New Daughter-in-Law)

Sāmpradāyik Sadbhāv (Communal Harmony)

Kanyāk Jingī (A Girl's Life)

Hṛday Parivartan (A Change of Heart)

Gāmak Ektā (Village Unity)

The strength of 'Navkī Putohū' lies in its depiction of rural life—how every member of a family contributes to earning a livelihood. But as soon as Anand's wife arrives as the new daughter-in-law, domestic harmony begins to break down. Sulekha comes from a prosperous family and fails to understand the difficulties faced by her mother-in-law Radha. Later, Radha's younger son Suresh marries and his educated wife Roshni enters the household; with her arrival the situation gradually becomes more orderly.

'Sāmpradāyik Sadbhāv' tells of the friendship between Rahman and Prakash, which creates a climate of harmony between two communities as the narrative progresses. Its simple and balanced treatment of a sensitive subject also permits it to be read as literature for children.

'Kanyāk Jingī' is the story of Kusum and the central character. After a long interval the protagonist returns to the village and meets a widow, who identifies herself as Kusum.

'Hṛday Parivartan' tells the story of a mother and son. After her husband's death, the mother goes to Patna with her son. Seeing the deep respect that former students retain for his father, the son regrets his own conduct.

'Gāmak Ektā' depicts the life of a village distressed by floods, incorporating the episode of Mala's childbirth. The entire village works together to reinforce a ring embankment and later takes Mala to hospital.

At certain points in these stories, opposition to marriages within the same caste is called regressive; in 'Navkī Putohū', although the two parties belong to the same caste, hatred is expressed towards inter-caste marriage. Nevertheless, Narayan Yadav's real strength is the subtle depiction of the life around him. The gentle presentation of communal harmony, collective life, and the unity of village and family obscures the other limitations.

5

A debate is under way over Sanju Das's paintings. Some consider them obscene, while others regard them as an expression of artistic freedom. Videha appeals for typed articles from both sides. The articles should be based on facts, not personal attachment or enmity. Articles may also be sent to editorial. staff. videha@gmail. com.

48. The Sahitya Akademi and Maithili Literary Organisations: A Discussion

Abstract

The Sahitya Akademi in Delhi, acting through an entirely secret process, removed two Maithili associations (the so-called Maithili literary associations in the Akademi's terminology) from its list and added three further non-literary associations. This is being seen as the beginning of the last rites—'Rām nām sat'—of the desiccating mainstream of Maithili literature. Of the previous list, recognition of associations numbered 1 and 6 was withdrawn, while entries numbered 5, 6, and 7 in the list below were added.

Keywords: Akademi · Literary · Organisation · Discussion · Literary · Current · Association

1

Maithili Literary Associations of the Sahitya Akademi, Delhi

Through an entirely secret procedure, the Sahitya Akademi removed two Maithili associations (the so-called Maithili literary associations, in the Akademi's terms) from its list and added three more non-literary associations. This is being regarded as the commencement of the 'Rām nām sat'—the funeral chant—of the desiccating mainstream of Maithili literature.

Previous list:

1. The Secretary, All India Maithili Sahitya Samiti, Tirbhukti, 1/1B, Sir P. C. Banerjee Road, Allahabad-211 002;

2. The General Secretary, Akhil Bharatiya Maithili Sahitya Parishad, C/o Dr. Ganapati Mishra, Lalbag, Darbhanga-846 004;

3. The Secretary, Chetna Samity, Vidyapati Bhawan, Vidyapati Marg, Patna-800 001;

4. The Secretary, Mithila Sanskritik Parishad, 6 B, Kailash Saha Lane, Kolkata-700 007;

5. The Secretary, Vidyapati Seva Sansthan, Mithila Bhavan Parishar, Darbhanga-846 004;

6. The Secretary, Centre for the Study of Indian Traditions, Tantrabati Geeta Bhavan; Ranti House, Ranti, Madhubani-847 211

Of these, recognition of associations numbered 1 and 6 was withdrawn, while those numbered 5, 6, and 7 in the following list were added. Gain: 3 − 2 = 1. Loss: 'the beginning of the last rites of the desiccating mainstream of Maithili literature.'

(1) The General Secretary, Akhil Bharatiya Maithili Sahitya Parishad, Professors' Colony, Digahi West Opp. of Primary School, Darbhanga-846 004, (Bihar)

2) The Secretary, Chetna Samiti, Vidhya Pati Bhavan, Vidyapati Marg, Patna-800 001 (Bihar)

3) The Secretary, Mithila Sanskritik Parishad, 6B, Kailash Saha Lane, Kolkata-700 007, (West Bengal)

4) The Secretary, Vidhya Pati Sewa Sansthan, Mithila Bhavan Parishar, Darbhanga-846 004, (Bihar)

5) The Secretary, Anand, Samajik Sanskritik Sahityik Manch, Rajkumarganj (Mirzapur Chowk), Darbhanga-846 004, (Bihar)

6) The General Secretary, Mithila Sanskritik Parishad, Roseberi 5032, Sahara Garden City, Adityapur-2 Jamshedpur-831 014, (Jharkhand)

7) The General Secretary, Akhil Bharatiya Mithila Sangh, G-6, Hans Bhavan, Wing 2 I. T. O., Bahadurshah Zafar Marg, New Delhi-110 002, (Delhi)

Now examine these bodies carefully. From the first to the last, they are connected with former chairs of the Sahitya Akademi's Maithili Advisory Committee. Whatever else they may be, they certainly are not literary associations. In Bengali there are still only two literary associations, but in Maithili every former chair of the Akademi's advisory committee went on declaring an organisation of his own so as to capture a position.

All this misconduct is being documented in my English book A Parallel History of Maithili Literature.

2

Introduction to the Commentary on Varṇa Prakaraṇa

At a seminar organised by Mailorang in Delhi, the late Mohan Bhardwaj once addressed a grammarian of the mainstream: 'Why is there not a grammar of Maithili? Are we not worthy of having a grammar of our own in Maithili?'

But the mainstream considers its duty discharged by patching together Hindi and Sanskrit grammars and making amendments such as 'the pronoun ham is plural in Hindi but singular in Maithili'. Against such patchwork grammar, Govindacharyaji of the parallel current produced an authentic grammar; his travels, like those of Pāṇini, made it possible.

In Sanskrit, for example, both the southern Indian word nīr and the northern Indian word jal are used for water. If, when teaching spoken Sanskrit, you teach a South Indian 'aham nīraṃ pibāmi' and a North Indian 'aham jalaṃ pibāmi', would you not be considered a good teacher?

Govindacharya—Pandit Bal Govind 'Arya', the noted Govind Yadav—has written Varṇa Prakaraṇa Bhāṣya-Bhūmikā (Maithili Grammar), which will also benefit schoolteachers.

3

Shri Jagdish Prasad Mandal's novel Paṅgu received the Sahitya Akademi's principal award in 2021. The novel was published electronically in nine instalments in the Videha e-journal in 2018 and was subsequently collected in Videha-Sadeha 21. The book is now also available in the Videha archive.

49. Parallel Literature in Maithili and the Videha Maithili Literary Movement

Abstract

Parallel Literature in Maithili and the Videha Maithili Literary Movement. The Bride: Lalit Kumar's English translation of Harimohan Jha's (1908–1984) Maithili classic Kanyadan (Lalit Kumar, Assistant Professor, Department of English, Deen Dayal Upadhyaya College, University of Delhi), published by Harper Perennial, HarperCollins Publishers. The Bride: The Maithili Classic Kanyadan—an English translation of Harimohan Jha's (1908–1984) Kanyadan by Lalit Kumar (Assistant Professor, Department of English, Deen Dayal Upadhyaya College, University of Delhi); Harper Perennial (HarperCollins Publishers).

Keywords: Maithili · Parallel · Videha · Movement · Doing · Author's · Writing

Abstract

Parallel Literature in Maithili and the Videha Maithili Literary Movement. The Bride: Lalit Kumar's English translation of the Maithili classic Kanyadan by Harimohan Jha (1908–1984), Assistant Professor, Department of English, Deen Dayal Upadhyaya College, University of Delhi; Harper Perennial, HarperCollins Publishers. The Bride: The Maithili Classic Kanyadan—an English translation of Harimohan Jha's (1908–1984) Kanyadan by Lalit Kumar (Assistant Professor, Department of English, Deen Dayal Upadhyaya College, University of Delhi); Harper Perennial (HarperCollins Publishers). The book was scheduled to reach my Kindle account on 1 December 2022, but the date was postponed, and it finally arrived in my account on 14 December 2022.

Editorial for the New Issue

1

Parallel Literature in Maithili and the Videha Maithili Literary Movement

Parallel Literature in Maithili and the Videha Maithili Literary Movement

The Bride: Lalit Kumar's English translation of Harimohan Jha's (1908–1984) Maithili classic Kanyadan (Assistant Professor, Department of English, Deen Dayal Upadhyaya College, University of Delhi), Harper Perennial, HarperCollins Publishers.

The Bride: The Maithili Classic Kanyadan—an English translation of Harimohan Jha's (1908–1984) Kanyadan by Lalit Kumar (Assistant Professor, Department of English, Deen Dayal Upadhyaya College, University of Delhi); Harper Perennial (HarperCollins Publishers).

I had preordered the book. It was scheduled to reach my Kindle account on 1 December 2022, but the delivery was postponed, and it finally reached my account on 14 December 2022.

I had already ordered the book. Its delivery to my Kindle account was scheduled for 1 December 2022, but delivery was delayed, and the book finally reached my account on 14 December 2022.

In 1965, when the Sahitya Akademi (India's national academy of letters) recognised Maithili, the late Ramanath Jha wrote that his Maithili language had now been saved (Ramanath Jha, "The Present Problem of Maithili").

When Maithili received recognition from the Sahitya Akademi (India's national academy of letters) in 1965, the late Ramanath Jha said that the Maithili language had now been saved (Ramanath Jha, "The Present Problem of Maithili").

Harish Trivedi has made a similar error. In his foreword, he writes that Maithili is the language closest to Hindi and was effectively an integral part of Hindi until it received constitutional recognition as a separate language in 1993. This statement is quoted in that form in the text under discussion.

Harish Trivedi has made the same mistake. In his introduction he writes: "Hindi, to which Maithili is closest (and of which it was virtually a part until its recognition as a separate language by the Constitution in 1993) ...."

Harish Trivedi refers to the inclusion of Maithili in the Eighth Schedule of the Constitution of India. The argument presented here is that the year should be 2003, not 1993. In my view, Maithili was a separate language in 2003, in 1993 and in 1965; it possessed an independent tradition even in the time of Vidyapati before Jyotirishwar. I argue further that certain conservative elements, including Ramanath Jha and Shardanand Jha, used the institutional recognition accorded by the Sahitya Akademi and the Constitution in their own way, to the detriment of Harimohan Jha's literary contribution. In my judgment, Khattar Kaka's Tarang, Pranamya Devata, Rangshala and Charchari were all worthy of the Sahitya Akademi Award for Maithili from its inception in 1966. The essay sharply disagrees with the choice of a philosophical treatise for the 1966 award and records that no award was made for Maithili in 1967.

Harish Trivedi is referring to the inclusion of Maithili in the Eighth Schedule of the Constitution of India. Here the date should be 2003 rather than 1993. Moreover, Maithili was a distinct language in 2003, in 1993 and in 1965, and it was so even in the age of Vidyapati before Jyotirishwar. On the other hand, recognition by the Sahitya Akademi and the Constitution strengthened the hands of Ramanath Jha, Shardanand Jha—whose names I mention here for particular reasons—and other conservative elements who continued to mislead and discourage Harimohan Jha. His Khattar Kaka's Tarang, Pranamya Devata, Rangshala and Charchari all deserved the Sahitya Akademi Award, which began for Maithili in 1966. Yet in 1966 the award went to a work of philosophy which, in my judgment, would oblige anyone who studied it to understand Indian philosophy to forget or discard a great deal before learning the subject afresh from a new book. No award was made for Maithili in 1967.

As an example of Ramanath Jha's conservative attitude towards the genealogical registers, I refer to the pañjī. Lalit Kumar, in my view, appears to have been influenced by the same tradition, even though he acknowledges other writers as the sources of his information. The essay alleges that Ramanath Jha knew of evidence of inter-caste marriages in the pañjī but did not make the Dūṣaṇa Pañjī public; it states that this register was published on Google Books in 2009. According to the account, the Navya-Nyāya philosopher Gangesha Upadhyaya married a woman described as a carmakāriṇī and was born five years after his father's death. The discussion refers to my Pañjī Prabandh, Volumes I and II, and to Dinesh Chandra Bhattacharya's History of Navya-Nyaya in Mithila.

Ramanath Jha's conservatism in relation to the pañjī becomes clear from an example. In my view, Lalit Kumar is following in his footsteps while attributing his own lack of knowledge to other authors. My charge is that Ramanath Jha was casteist, conservative and confused. He knew of inter-caste marriages recorded in the genealogical registers, yet kept the Dūṣaṇa Pañjī confidential. This register was made available on Google Books in 2009. According to my account, the great Navya-Nyāya philosopher Gangesha Upadhyaya married a carmakāriṇī, and he was born five years after the death of his father. See Panji Books, Volumes I–II, http://videha.co.in/pothi.htm. Dinesh Chandra Bhattacharya writes in History of Navya-Nyaya in Mithila:

The quoted statement makes a claim about the social standing of Gangesha's family and the disappearance of his lineage. I consider that claim entirely false. Bhattacharya states that he obtained this information from Professor R. Jha. On that basis, the essay criticises Ramanath Jha's outlook as casteist, conservative and confused, and rejects both the claim that recognition by the Sahitya Akademi "saved" Maithili and the notion that institutional recognition first established Maithili as a separate language.

"The family, regarded as low in social standing, has now disappeared from Mithila; Gangesha's family has been completely neglected, and we are not even expected to know his father's name." I regard this statement as wholly false. Bhattacharya goes on to say that he received this information from Professor R. Jha. I ask: how could such a casteist, conservative and confused outlook have favoured an award for Harimohan Jha? Thus Professor R. Jha's assertion that recognition by the Sahitya Akademi saved the Maithili language is, in my judgment, wrong, as is Harish Trivedi's assertion.

In my view, the young translator Lalit Kumar has been influenced by conservative elements whose attitude does an injustice to Harimohan Jha's contribution. The essay states that, after recognition by the Sahitya Akademi, Harimohan Jha considerably reduced his writing in Maithili, and that in 1985, after his death, he received the Sahitya Akademi Award for his autobiography. I do not regard this belated honour as adequate.

Lalit Kumar is young, but in my view certain conservative elements are using him—the very elements who continued to mislead and discourage Harimohan Jha. Following recognition by the Sahitya Akademi, Harimohan Jha gave up writing in Maithili; in 1985, after his death, he received the Sahitya Akademi Award for his autobiography. I attach no particular significance to that belated honour.

Lalit Kumar writes that Yoganand Jha's Bhalmanush (1944) and Shardanand Jha's Jaybar (1946) attack the decisive social divisions governing marriage. I regard Bhalmanush as an epoch-making work but Jaybar as reactionary. In support of this judgment, the essay cites Radhakrishna Chaudhary's A Survey of Maithili Literature, which describes Bhalmanush as a novel concerned with the social problems of marriage and Jaybar as a second-rate response to it, of slight literary value.

Lalit Kumar writes: "Yoganand Jha's Bhalmanush (1944) and Shardanand Jha's Jaybar (1946) attack decisive social divisions within marriage." In my judgment, Yoganand Jha's Bhalmanush (1944) was certainly a pioneering novel, whereas Shardanand Jha's was reactionary. Professor Radhakrishna Chaudhary writes: "Yoganand Jha's Bhalmanush deals chiefly with the social problems connected with marriage. In reply to this novel, Shardanand Jha wrote a second-rate novel of little literary value entitled Jaybar." (Radhakrishna Chaudhary, A Survey of Maithili Literature.)

For his information concerning the pañjī, Lalit Kumar cites Mahamahopadhyaya Parmeshwar Jha's Mithila Tattva-Vimarsha. This essay cites Radhakrishna Chaudhary's assessment in A Survey of Maithili Literature: Mithila Tattva-Vimarsha is a history of Mithila in Maithili prose, based principally on tradition; Mukund Jha Bakshi's Mithilabhashamaya Itihas describes the dynasties of Mithila. Both are important to the development of modern Maithili prose, but Chaudhary considers them unreliable as historical accounts.

Lalit Kumar treats Mahamahopadhyaya Parmeshwar Jha's Mithila Tattva-Vimarsha as the source of his ignorance about the pañjī. Professor Radhakrishna Chaudhary writes: "Mahamahopadhyaya Parmeshwar Jha's Mithila Tattva-Vimarsha is a history of Mithila in Maithili prose, based chiefly upon tradition. Mahamahopadhyaya Mukund Jha Bakshi's Mithilabhashamaya Itihas gives an account of the dynasties. Both works are important from the standpoint of modern Maithili prose but are not reliable from the historical standpoint." (Radhakrishna Chaudhary, A Survey of Maithili Literature.)

For immediate reference, the following passage from my Pañjī Prabandh (Parts I and II) is reproduced:

For ready reference, I reproduce below the following passage from my Pañjī Prabandh (Parts I and II):

Maharaja Harisinghdev belonged to the Karnata dynasty of Mithila. In Jyotirishwar Thakur's Varṇa-Ratnākara, Harisinghdev was the patron or king. He was born in AD 1294 and ascended the throne in 1307. After his defeat by Ghiyasuddin Tughlaq in 1324–25, he fled to Nepal. He was the official founder of Mithila's pañjī system for Brahmins, Kayasthas and Kshatriyas. Gunakar Jha was initially appointed for the Maithil Brahmins, Shankardatta for the Karna Kayasthas, and Vijayadatta for the Kshatriyas. At Harisinghdev's instigation—Harisinghdev being a descendant of Nanyadeva, who had established the Karnata dynasty in Shaka 1009—"nandaida śūnyaṃ śaśi śāka varṣe" (Shaka 1019) ... the scholars of Mithila decided in Shaka 1248, corresponding to AD 1326, to inaugurate the present form of the pañjī system. Subsequently, a few intellectually self-indulgent men secured an order in AD 1760 from Maharaja Madhav Singh of Mithila to have the genealogists compile branch registers. After that, a new Brahmin sub-caste called Śrotriya emerged in Mithila within the pañjī system (sometimes dated to Shaka 1600, that is AD 1678, but in fact after Madhav Singh, around AD 1800).

On the basis of authentic pañjī records, this account concludes that the Śrotriya sub-caste emerged in approximately AD 1800.

The conclusion drawn from authentic pañjī records is that the Śrotriya sub-caste developed around AD 1800.

In his research, Anshuman Pandey writes that Gajendra Thakur of New Delhi provided him with digitised copies of the genealogical records of the Maithil Brahmins. Families of pañjīkāras have preserved these records from generation to generation and often regard them as intellectual property, limiting access by outside researchers. Pandey states that in 2007 he received the complete digitised collection of pañjī records from Gajendra Thakur. Reference: Anshuman Pandey, "Recasting the Brahmin in Medieval Mithila: Origins of Caste Identity among the Maithil Brahmins of North Bihar," PhD dissertation, University of Michigan, 2014. According to this account, the pañjī manuscripts were later uploaded to Google Books in 2009.

Anshuman Pandey writes: "Gajendra Thakur of New Delhi provided me with digitised copies of the genealogical records of the Maithil Brahmins. Families of pañjīkāras who have preserved these records across generations are often reluctant to let others inspect them; for these families the records constitute a form of 'intellectual property'. I was fortunate to receive the complete digitised set of pañjī records from Gajendra Thakur in 2007." (Anshuman Pandey, Recasting the Brahmin in Medieval Mithila: Origins of Caste Identity among the Maithil Brahmins of North Bihar, PhD dissertation, University of Michigan, 2014.) The pañjī manuscripts were later uploaded to Google Books in 2009.

The essay states that the so-called Maharajas of Darbhanga were zamindars under Cornwallis's Permanent Settlement; there were numerous such landlords in British India but not in Nepal. The appendices to Pañjī Prabandh, Volumes I and II, are said to contain copies of orders of genealogically based elevation in social rank, which the author takes as evidence of advancement in exchange for money. On this basis I argue that before AD 1800 there was no separate Śrotriya sub-caste in British India and that none exists among the Maithil Brahmins of the Nepali part of Mithila even today. Formerly Śrotriya designated an adherent of a particular educational tradition, and, according to the author, the term is still used in that sense in Nepal.

In my view, the so-called Maharajas of Darbhanga were zamindars under Cornwallis's Permanent Settlement. There were many such landlords in British India, but none in Nepal. The appendices to Pañjī Prabandh, Volumes I–II, contain copies of orders of promotion in social rank based on genealogical registers—evidence, I argue, of elevation purchased for money. On this basis I conclude that before AD 1800 there was no sub-caste known as Śrotriya in British India; there is still no such sub-caste among the Maithil Brahmins in Nepal's Mithila. Earlier the term Śrotriya meant a follower of a particular educational tradition, and it continues to be used in that sense in Nepal.

In my judgment, Lalit Kumar attempts to establish a preconceived position by writing that "Harimohan chose a middle path in his reformist programme." He supports the claim by pointing to Harimohan's recognition of the importance of local traditions, language, script, educational practices and moral values. I find the argument absurd, since support for these things does not automatically make them conservative values.

Lalit Kumar writes further: "Harimohan chose a middle path in his reformist programme." In support he says that Harimohan "recognised the importance of local traditions, language, script, educational methods and moral values." I consider this argument ridiculous, because it implies that all these values are, by their very nature, conservative.

(All the books mentioned are available as free PDFs at http://videha.co.in/pothi.htm.)

(Free PDF editions of all the books mentioned are available at http://videha.co.in/pothi.htm.)

(To be continued.)

2

My Comments on Five Short-Short Stories by Acharya Ramanand Mandal

Five Short-Short Stories by Acharya Ramanand Mandal

Acharya Ramanand Mandal considers the following five short-short stories to be his finest:

Acharya Ramanand Mandal regards the following five short-short stories as his best:

1. Muṃhphaṭpan (Outspokenness)

2. Sharab ā Shabab (Liquor and Youthful Beauty)

3. Mahāyajña (The Great Sacrificial Rite)

4. Harbāh (The Ploughman), and

5. Jhapan (The Veil).

Acharya Ramanand Mandal is a retired headmaster and social thinker. He writes in the pure Maithili spoken in the Sitamarhi region.

Acharya Ramanand Mandal is a retired headmaster and social thinker. He writes in the pure Maithili spoken in Sitamarhi, the region associated with the birthplace of Goddess Sita.

The first story centres on a stern officer whose candour earns him both admiration and hatred. Precisely because he speaks plainly, he is falsely implicated. The vigilance department fabricates a case and has the witnesses sign the proceedings. When the case finally comes to a hearing almost ten years later, the witnesses withdraw their testimony. The officer is declared innocent, but his life has already been ruined. The story comments not only on the working methods of law-enforcement institutions but also on the slowness of the judicial system.

The first story concerns a stern officer admired by some and hated by others for his frankness. Because of that very frankness, he is falsely implicated in a case. The vigilance department manufactures allegations and secures witnesses' signatures on the proceedings. Ten years later, when the case comes to trial, the witnesses retract their earlier statements. The officer is acquitted, but by then his life has been destroyed. This story is an indictment not only of the functioning of law-enforcement agencies but also of our sluggish judicial system.

The second short-short story depicts the moral decline of a bank employee who was initially both a good man and an accomplished mathematician.

The second story portrays the moral deterioration of a bank employee who, at the outset, is both a decent person and a skilled mathematician.

The third story takes the Gayatri Mahayajña as its setting. Questions of caste intervene, but the story discovers a ray of hope everywhere, and within every human being.

The third story centres on a Gayatri Mahayajña. Caste enters the narrative, yet the possibility of hope is found in every place and in every person.

Of the five, I regard the fourth story as the best. The author exposes how a system of bonded labour continued in the name of tradition. Towards the end, a new generation challenges that system. Education becomes an enabling factor, a force that makes change possible. According to the original commentary, this tradition had not previously been discussed in this manner in Maithili literature.

In my judgment, the fourth is the finest of the five stories. The writer reveals layer by layer how bonded labour was perpetuated under the name of tradition. Towards the conclusion, the younger generation challenges that tradition. Education becomes an instrument of change, and its significance is made clear. In my view, the subject had not previously received this kind of treatment in Maithili literature.

The fifth short-short story raises several issues, from mismatched marriages to the life of a widow. In my assessment it requires further refinement.

The fifth story raises many questions, ranging from unequal marriages to widowhood. In my opinion, the story needs revision.

Acharya Ramanand Mandal's strengths lie in his vocabulary and in his intimate knowledge of both the good and the harmful traditions of society. Greater prominence should be given to these strengths. Abrupt endings do not leave readers wholly satisfied. I hope that, drawing on his gifts, he will reveal every aspect of his subject in its entirety; to do so, he must allow his characters sufficient time to develop.

Acharya Ramanand Mandal's great strength is his rich vocabulary and his deep familiarity with society's good and bad traditions. He should, I believe, place greater emphasis upon that strength. The sudden conclusion of a story does not fully satisfy the reader. He should use his strongest qualities to portray every dimension of his subject completely, and that will be possible only when the characters are given enough time to develop.

50. Maithili Literary Organisations, the Sahitya Akademi, and a Re-reading of Dhūrttasamāgama

Abstract

By granting recognition to seven non-literary Maithili associations, the Sahitya Akademi has done what is now becoming apparent: it has brought mainstream Maithili literature to ruin. Prem Mohan Mishra's advisory committee included, besides writers whom Videha had banned as alleged literary thieves, many other people of the same kind, who now serve on Ashok Avichal's advisory committee. Such people can easily be blackmailed because they have not reached these positions through merit.

Keywords: Literary · Organisation · Akademi · Re-reading of Dhūrttasamāgama · Asajjāti · Droṇa

Editorial for the New Issue

1

By recognising seven non-literary associations in Maithili, the Sahitya Akademi has done something whose consequences are now becoming evident: it has ruined mainstream Maithili literature. Prem Mohan Mishra's advisory committee included, apart from writers barred by Videha as alleged literary plagiarists, many other worthies who now sit on Ashok Avichal's advisory committee. Such people easily become victims of blackmail, for merit is not how they reach these positions. They are then handed assignments for seminars, translations, monographs and the like —works which, according to Amarji, nobody reads and which rot in the Sahitya Akademi's warehouses. In this way they make a little money and acquire an impressive curriculum vitae, from which, as Vidyanand Jha says, all manner of conclusions can be drawn, regardless of the quality of the work itself. Ashok Avichal and these seven non-literary associations have put forward a name: Dr Ajay Kumar Jha. He is the very mirror image of Ashok Avichal and the other mainstream writers. Yet mainstream circles have raised an outcry, saying that nobody knows him and that he is Ashok Avichal's sister's son. But those same people obtained translation assignments through influence, depriving writers of the parallel stream of their due, and Dr Ajay Kumar Jha has obtained an assignment in the very same manner. Ashok Avichal is from Rahua, and Dr Ajay Kumar Jha from Umri; whether they are uncle and nephew or related through maternal and paternal aunts is of little consequence to the parallel stream. I have already said that such people become vulnerable to blackmail, and Dr Ajay Kumar Jha's blackmail has now begun. He is making a list of the mainstream writers who abused him on social media and has begun meeting them. If you read the story that follows, this may even seem appropriate: those writers will remain desperate for money, awards and fuller CVs, and they will leave you alone.

There was once a princess, the princess of an island of fairies, exceptionally capable and sharp-witted. A demon tormented the fairies of that island. They went to the princess and begged her to protect them. She said, "The next time the demon comes, send for me." When he came, the princess stood before him. Abandoning the other fairies, the demon pursued her. She led him to the southern part of the island, where gold lay everywhere. At the sight of it, the demon forgot the princess and began digging for gold. She returned and told the fairies, "You may now live without fear. Until his dying day he will go on digging for gold and will never trouble you again."

A play has also been written about the Sahitya Akademi's Maithili Advisory Committee. Its name is Dhūrttasamāgama (The Assembly of Rogues). Jyotirishwar wrote it in the thirteenth century; he had an inkling of events that would unfold eight or nine hundred years later. That is why he is such a great dramatist! Read the following synopsis and identify its characters. If you recognise them, write to editorial.staff.videha@gmail.com. (Jyotirishwar has taken an author's liberty with the names of the places and characters.)

Dhūrttasamāgama was composed by Jyotirishwar Thakur in the thirteenth century and survives in Sanskrit and Maithili. Even the Sanskrit Dhūrttasamāgama includes songs in Maithili. The play belongs to the genre of prahasana, or farce. Most Maithili plays and dramatic pieces had drawn on the life of Krishna or his descendants, especially stories of abduction and svayaṃvara. Dhūrttasamāgama, however, has an ascetic and his disciple as its principal characters. Every character in it is a rogue of the first order; hence the title is entirely appropriate. Farce is also associated with music, so the inclusion of Maithili songs is wholly fitting. Its main characters are the Sūtradhāra, the Actress, the Graduate, Vishvanagar, Mritangara, Suratpriya, Anangasenā, Asajjāti Mishra, Bandhuvanchak, Mūlanāshak and the Citizen. The Sūtradhāra praises Narsinghdev, the jewel of the Karnata dynasty, and Jyotirishwar is then praised. The play contains a kind of absurdity that is strikingly modern; its flexibility makes it akin to folk theatre. Vishvanagar is celibate for want of a woman. Accompanied by his disciple, the Graduate, he goes begging to the house of Mritangara Thakur, where the household pleads ritual impurity. Vishvanagar then goes with his disciple to Suratpriya's house. Next, guru and disciple quarrel violently over a prostitute named Anangasenā. Together with Anangasenā they go to Asajjāti Mishra, a libertine who considers gambling and sexual intercourse the only two things of value in the world. Asajjāti Mishra asks,

"Who is the plaintiff, and who is the defendant?" The Graduate replies, "I am the plaintiff, for I must state the complaint; the ascetic is the defendant, since he must pay the fee." Vishvanagar offers the Graduate's bundle of cannabis as his fee. The jester whispers a description of Anangasenā's sexual attractions into Asajjāti Mishra's ear. Having placed Anangasenā between the two disputants, Asajjāti Mishra decides the case in his own favour. Meanwhile the jester whispers into Anangasenā's ear: "The ascetic is poor, the Graduate is a vagabond, and Mishra is a fool, so stay with me." Anangasenā looks in every direction and exclaims, "This has truly become an assembly of rogues!" Vishvanagar and the Graduate again set off towards Suratpriya's house. Meanwhile Mūlanāshak, the barber, demands a year's wages from Anangasenā. She sends him to Asajjāti Mishra. Mūlanāshak takes Asajjāti Mishra for Anangasenā's husband. Receiving cannabis as his fee, he lays Mishra down, ties him up and massages him so fiercely that Mishra loses consciousness. Believing him dead, the barber runs away. The jester arrives, unties Mishra and asks, "I have saved your life. Is there any other service you would like me to perform?" Asajjāti replies, "Through fraud I have consumed the whole country; through roguery I have won this beloved woman; and I have obtained an obedient disciple like you. Nothing more could please me. Nevertheless, I wish happiness and peace everywhere."

Like Jyotirishwar, I too have written about such shamelessness in my story "The Village of Mahisbar Brahmins": "For if you ask them the reason, they will tell you that these people are shameless, because at birth somebody spits on their backsides … so that not a trace of shame remains in any part of their bodies."

2

Three Droṇas, Including, for the First Time, a Woman Droṇa

The Sahitya Akademi's Maithili section appointed three Droṇācāryas to cut off Ekalavya's thumb. For the first time in world history, a woman Droṇa too was appointed to carry out this abhorrent task. All three discharged their duty with the dedication of executioners in Tihar Jail. An executioner is not to blame: the government pays him to carry out an execution. The fault lies with these Droṇas and with the Sahitya Akademi's Maithili Advisory Committee, whose members are appointed through the seven so-called literary associations. Recognition of all seven associations should be withdrawn immediately. The Maithili section should operate like the English section, which has no literary association at all but functions perfectly well.

And do you not wish to know who these Droṇas are, and who Ekalavya is?

The Droṇas: Dr Devkant Jha, Dr Mantreshwar Jha and Dr Shefalika Verma.

Ekalavya: Rajdev Mandal.

The Droṇas may say that Rajdev Mandal's book never reached them, so how could they be blamed? Yet all three could have submitted a dissenting note; they could have refused. Moreover, they are symbols of the entire Maithili section of the Sahitya Akademi. A fuller response will appear in Videha's forthcoming special issue on literary corruption.

Videha invites contributions on the following subjects for its "Special Issue on Literary Corruption". Articles may be emailed to editorial.staff.videha@gmail.com.

1. Literature, the arts and government academies:

(a) Politics of awards;

(b) Undemocratic procedures for entering government academies;

(c) Power blocs and the functioning of academies;

(d) Working methods of parallel power structures that emerge from a merely ostensible opposition to state power;

(e) The role of money in academy awards: myth or reality.

2. Private literary institutions and the politics of awards.

3. Corruption in publishing and its effect on writers.

4. Spurious Maithili writers' organisations and the conduct of their office-bearers.

5. Forms of literary corruption in Maithili departments of schools and colleges:

(a) Curricula;

(b) Teaching and learning;

(c) Appointments.

6. Literary journalism, reviewing, the stage, garlands, microphones and the spectacle of book launches.

7. Selection of writers' birth and death centenaries, calendar-driven commemoration and the politics behind them.

8. Discrimination against, and various forms of exploitation of, Dalits and women writers.

9. Any other subject.

51. The Sahitya Akademi Translation Award (Maithili), 2022: A Literary Debate

Abstract

The question of the Sahitya Akademi Translation Award (Maithili), 2022. There were three jury members: Dr Savita Jha Soni, Dr Mitranath Jha and Mrs Nirja Renu. First let me tell you that the Sahitya Akademi assigns translation work only to Brahminists, depriving writers of the parallel stream of their rightful opportunities. Two members of the jury decided to award the prize to Ratneshwar Mishra; the third took offence.

Keywords: Akademi · Translation · Award · 2022 · Context · Literary · Debate

Editorial for the New Issue

1

The Sahitya Akademi Translation Award (Maithili), 2022

There were three jury members: Dr Savita Jha Soni, Dr Mitranath Jha and Mrs Nirja Renu. First I must tell you that the Sahitya Akademi gives translation assignments only to Brahminists, thereby depriving writers of the parallel stream of their due. Two jury members decided to confer the award upon Ratneshwar Mishra; the third became displeased. What was the need for this drama? Ratneshwar Mishra has no real connection with translation or literature. In his day he ran a successful coaching business in history, and his study notes sold well. He will not undertake another translation now; the purpose for which he did this one has been fulfilled. The Sahitya Akademi's Maithili Advisory Committee consists entirely of thieves and tricksters. The Akademi might as well declare thievery and trickery the minimum qualification for membership, since these are the very people who are admitted without any such declaration. We can expect nothing of them. But, sir, the prizewinner's shamelessness is extraordinary, and the speech he makes when accepting the award will be one to frame.

2

The 111th Sagar Rati Deep Jaray Held at Rahua Sangram

Dr Ashok Avichal, chair of the Sahitya Akademi's Maithili Advisory Committee, successfully organised the 111th Sagar Rati Deep Jaray in his personal capacity on Saturday, 31 December 2022, in the auditorium of Adinath Madhusudan Paras Mani Sanskrit College at Rahua Sangram. Thirty-three new stories were read, and Maithili fiction writers commented on them. Seventeen books in different genres were also released. This gathering is held every three months, four times a year: in March, June, September and December.

Some mainstream writers informed me, on condition of anonymity, that Ashok Avichal and the seven non-literary associations had proposed Dr Ajay Kumar Jha for Sahitya Akademi membership. He is said to be Ashok Avichal's nephew (or, according to some, a relative through the maternal or paternal aunt's side). For that reason, mainstream fiction writers boycotted the 111th Sagar Rati Deep Jaray. When asked why Vibhuti Anand, Hirendra Kumar Jha, Daman Kumar Jha and Ashok Kumar Mehta nevertheless attended, the informants explained that the four had reached an agreement with Ashok Avichal: he would describe the event as the 112th Sagar Rati Deep Jaray. He did not do so in any invitation, however, and merely wrote the words "Sequence 112" in small letters at the top of the banner. At Hirendra Kumar Jha's instigation, therefore, Vibhuti Anand, who was presiding, together with Daman Kumar Jha and Ashok Kumar Mehta, ate and drank and departed after two or three hours. Writers of the parallel stream, by contrast, remained at the gathering until morning and made it a success. Let it be made clear that Hirendra Kumar Jha had done something similar before, as recorded in Videha: at the 89th Sagar Rati Deep Jaray, Auraha (Laukahi), 15 May 2013, convened by Umesh Paswan, he boycotted the gathering when it was not numbered 90, and Ashok Kumar Mehta also boycotted it at his instigation. Hirendra Kumar Jha is also adept at loose talk; if someone who has accompanied him wanders even slightly away, he pours out torrents of venom about that person. It should further be explained that, before writers of the parallel stream began attending Sagar Rati Deep Jaray, when Hirendra Kumar Jha and his circle dominated it, participants ate, drank and went to sleep, leaving the reader of a story awake alone. Ashish Anchinhar refused to read a story in protest, but this was omitted from the news issued by the mainstream the next morning. All this is documented in my book Prabandh–Nibandh–Samalochana, Part 2, available at http://videha.co.in/pothi.htm. For the past ten years, the Sahitya Akademi has been trying to take over Sagar Rati Deep Jaray, the one forum of the parallel stream. It was unanimously decided that the 112th gathering would take place on the last Saturday of March 2023 at Sahuria (Andhratharhi), the ancestral village of Shri Ramchandra Ray, under his convenorship. Hirendra Kumar Jha continued what I call his blackmail with undiminished zeal when, on 2 January 2023, he telephoned Ramchandra Ray and made what I regard as a malicious Brahminist demand that the next gathering be numbered 113 rather than 112, even attempting to intimidate him, so that the Sahitya Akademi's event might somehow be recognised as a Sagar Rati Deep Jaray gathering. On 5 January 2023 he backed down. The Sahitya Akademi must be paying him for the work he has done towards this end for ten years; if it has not, it will do so in future. Everything will be disclosed in Videha's forthcoming special issue on literary corruption.

It should be made clear in this connection that Ashok Avichal organised the gathering entirely in his personal capacity. Ten years ago, a Sahitya Akademi meeting in Delhi was held during the year marking Tagore's 150th birth anniversary. The Akademi described it as its own event in its annual report and financial accounts, recorded expenditure on it, and obtained the auditor's approval—expenditure that may properly have belonged under a programme devoted to Tagore, not under Sagar Rati Deep Jaray. For ten years, award- and assignment-hungry Brahminist members of the mainstream have striven to have that event recognised as part of Sagar Rati Deep Jaray. They have failed once again.

The following stories were read at the Rahua Sangram gathering: 1. Dr Vibhuti Anand, "Āsthā, Viśvās ā Paramparā" (Faith, Belief and Tradition); 2. Ravi Bhushan Kumar, "Bhojak Bahiṣkār" (Boycott of the Feast); 3. Manab Anish Mandal, "Satyak Bhrūṇ Hatyā" (The Killing of Truth in the Womb); 4. Ritik Mandal, "Gelaũ Ta Ham Gelaũ" (If I Went, Then I Went); 5. Pandit Shiv Kumar Mishra, "Vasudhā Kāhū Ko Na Hoy"; 6. Umesh Mandal, "Appan Jimmā" (One's Own Responsibility); 7. Acharya Ramanand Mandal, "Bāl Vairāgī" (The Child Ascetic); 8. Radhakant Mandal, "Bhumahur Āgi ā Alhuā"; 9. Jholi Paswan, "Kārī Nāg" (The Black Cobra); 10. Narayan Yadav, "Kaniyāk Jīvan" (The Bride's Life); 11. Kapileshwar Raut, "Chepharī"; 12. Jagdish Prasad Mandal, "Kumharak Batiyā" (The Potter's Words); 13. Amit Mishra, "Adhalāhak Pariṇām Adhalāhe" (Evil Begets Evil); 14. Baidyanathi Ram, "Hamhīṃ Dhanīk Chhī" (I Am the Wealthy One); 15. Harishchandra Jha, "Nirīkṣaṇ" (Inspection); 16. Pritam Kumar Nishad, "Buṛhārī Bhrūṇak Hatyā"; 17. Shravan Kumar Mandal, "Prem Vivāh" (Love Marriage); 18. Ramsevak Thakur, "Sāt Pūt Rāmkeṃ"; 19. Ramkrishna Pararthi, "Āṛi"; 20. Durgesh Mandal, "Dvandva" (Conflict); 21. Laldev Kamat, "Madhumāchhī" (The Honeybee); 22. Shardanand Singh, "Jāvat Soṅkhā Ke Nāv Hoyato Tāvat"; 23. Arvind Prasad, "Neṅgarū ā Maṅgarū"; 24. Ashok Avichal, "Manuā Nāchay Mor"; 25. Narayan Jha, "Rājnītimeṃ Rājnīti" (Politics within Politics); 26. Umesh Narayan Karna, "Māy" (Mother); 27. Durganand Mandal, "Sapnā" (Dream); 28. Ram Vilas Sahu, "Nīk Karab Ta Bejāe Kie Haet?" (Why Would Doing Good Be Wrong?); 29. Nand Vilas Ray, "Raṅgal Naṛhiyā"; 30. Ramchandra Ray, "Tohīṃ Jitaleṃ Hamhīṃ Hāralauṃ" (You Won; I Lost); 31. Rameshwar Prasad Mandal, "Hamaro Bahin Achhi" (I Too Have a Sister); 32. Vinay Mohan Jagdish, "Chhaṭṭhū"; and 33. Ramesh Kumar Sharma, "Saṅgharṣ" (Struggle).

The following books were released at the gathering: 1. Sāhityakārak Vivek (short-story collection), Jagdish Prasad Mandal; 2. Nab Banak Nab Phal (short-story collection), Jagdish Prasad Mandal; 3. Suchitā (novel), Jagdish Prasad Mandal; 4. Pratikār Ekhan Bāṅkī Achhi (poetry collection), Ramkrishna Pararthi; 5. Asal Pūjā (short-story collection), Nand Vilas Ray; 6. Saṃyog (short-story collection), Rabindra Narayan Mishra; 7. Lajkoṭar (novel), Rabindra Narayan Mishra; 8. Ieh Thik Jīvan (memoir), Rabindra Narayan Mishra; 9. Rāṣṭra Mandir (novel), Rabindra Narayan Mishra; 10. Mātṛbhūmi (novel), Rabindra Narayan Mishra; 11. Sīmāk Ohi Pār (novel), Rabindra Narayan Mishra; 12. Nit Naval Subhash Chandra Yadav, Gajendra Thakur; 13. Maithili Samīkṣāśāstra (criticism), Gajendra Thakur; 14. Rajdeo Mandal Maithili Writer, Gajendra Thakur; 15. Subhadra Kumari Chauhan (essay), Dr Ashok Avichal; 16. Jetae Ne Jāe Kavi Otae Jāe Anubhavī (collection of thought-provoking prose passages), Dr Umesh Mandal; 17. Jagdish Prasad Mandalak Kāvya Saṅgrah (research analysis), Dr Umesh Mandal.

Subhash Chandra Yadav sent a message congratulating the parallel stream on the success of the ıı1th Sagar Rati Deep Jaray and expressing regret that he could not attend. The release of Nit Naval Subhash Chandra Yadav aroused exceptional enthusiasm: those present repeatedly asked for copies, and orders began arriving by telephone from distant Delhi and other places on the very day of the launch.

The Storytelling Journey of Sagar Rati Deep Jaray, from the First to the ıı1th Gathering

1. Muzaffarpur — 21.01.1990; Prabhas Kumar Chaudhary.

2. Deorh — 29.04.1990; Jivakant.

3. Darbhanga — 07.07.1990; Dr Bhimnath Jha, Pradip Maithili Putra, Vijaykant Thakur.

4. Patna — 03.11.1990; Govind Jha, Damankant Jha.

5. Begusarai — 13.01.1991; Pradip Bihari.

6. Katihar — 22.04.1991; Ashok.

7. Nawani — 21.07.1991; Mohan Bharadwaj.

8. Sakri — 22.10.1991; Professor Sureshwar Jha, Dr Ram Babu.

9. Nehra — 11.10.1992; A. C. Deepak.

10. Biratnagar — 14.04.1992; Jitendra Jit.

11. Varanasi — 18.07.1992; Prabhas Kumar Chaudhary.

12. Patna — 19.10.1992; Rajmohan Jha.

13. Supaul–1 — 18.10.1993; Kedar Kanan.

14. Bokaro — 24.04.1993; Buddhinath Jha.

15. Paitghat — 10.07.1993; Dr Ramanand Jha ‘Raman’.

16. Janakpur — 09.10.1994; Ramesh Ranjan.
17. Isahpur — 06.02.1994; Dr Arvind Kumar ‘Akku’.
18. Sarhad — 23.04.1994; Amiya Kumar Jha.
19. Jhanjharpur — 09.07.1994; Shyamanand Chaudhary.
20. Ghoghardihā — 22.10.1994; Dr Narayanji.
21. Bahera — 21.01.1995; Kamlesh Jha.
22. Supaul (Darbhanga) — 08.04.1995; Kamlesh Jha.
23. Kathmandu — 23.09.1995; Dhirendra Premarshi.
24. Rajbiraj — 24.01.1996; Ramnarayan Dev.
25. Kolkata (Silver Jubilee) — 28.12.1996; Prabhas Kumar Chaudhary.
26. Mahishi — 13.04.1997; Dr Taranand Viyogi; sponsored by Ramesh.
27. Tarauni — 20.06.1997; Shobhakant.
28. Patna — 18.07.1997; Prabhas Kumar Chaudhary.
29. Begusarai — 13.09.1997; Pradip Bihari.
30. Khajauli — 04.04.1998; Pradip Bihari.
31. Saharsa — 18.07.1998; Ramesh.
32. Patna — 10.10.1998; Shyam Darihare.
33. Balain; Nagdah — 08.01.1999; Padam Sambhav.
34. Bhawanipur — 10.04.1999; Dr Jishnu Dutt Mishra.
35. Madhubani — 24.07.1999; Siyaram Jha ‘Saras’, Dr Kuldhari Singh.
36. Andauli — 20.10.1999; Kamlesh Jha.
37. Janakpur — 25.03.2000; Ramesh Ranjan.
38. Kathmandu — 25.06.2000; Dhirendra Premarshi.
39. Dhanbad — 21.10.2000; Shyam Darihare and Ramchandra Laldas.
40. Bittho — 21.01.2001; Dr Akku, Professor Vidyanand Jha.
41. Hatni (Ghoghardihā) — 19.05.2001; Professor Yoganand Jha / Ajit Kumar Azad.
42. Bokaro — 25.08.2001; Girijanand Jha ‘Ardhanarishwar’, Mithila Sahitya Parishad.
43. Patna (Kiran Jayanti) — 01.12.2001; Ashok, Chetna Samiti, Patna.
44. Ranchi — 13.04.2002; Kumar Manish Arvind.
45. Bhagalpur — 24.08.2002; Dhirendra Mohan Jha.
46. Patna (Vidyapati Bhavan) — 16.11.2002; Ajit Kumar Azad.
47. Kolkata — 22.01.2003; Karna Goshthi, Kolkata.
48. Khutauna — 07.06.2003; Dr Mahendra Narayan Ram.
49. Benipur — 20.09.2003; Kamlesh Jha.

50. Darbhanga — 21.02.2004; Dr Ashok Kumar Mehta.

51. Jamshedpur — 10.07.2004; Dr Ravindra Kumar Chaudhary.

52. Ranchi — 02.10.2004; Vivekanand Thakur.

53. Deoghar — 08.01.2005; Shyam Darihare and Avinash.

54. Begusarai — 09.04.2005; Pradip Bihari.

55. Purnia — 20.06.2005; Ramesh.

56. Patna — 03.11.2005; Ajit Kumar Azad.

57. Janakpur (Nepal) — 12.08.2006; Ramesh Ranjan.

58. Jaynagar — 02.12.2006; Narayan Yadav.

59. Begusarai — 10.02.2007; Pradip Bihari.

60. Saharsa — 21.07.2007; Kislay Krishna.

61. Supaul–2 — 01.12.2007; Arvind Thakur.

62. Jamshedpur — 03.05.2008; Dr Ravindra Kumar Chaudhary.

63. Ranchi — 19.07.2008; Kumar Manish Arvind.

64. Rahua Sangram (Madhubani) — 08.11.2008; Dr Ashok Avichal.

65. Patna (Katha Ganga–3) — 21.02.2009; Ajit Kumar Azad / Chetna Samiti.

66. Madhubani — 30.05.2009; Dilip Kumar Jha.

67. Samastipur — 05.09.2009; Ramakant Ray ‘Rama’.

68. Supaul–3 — 05.12.2009; Arvind Thakur.

69. Janakpur — 03.04.2010; Rajaram Singh ‘Rathore’.

70. Kabilpur (Darbhanga) — 12.06.2010; Dr Yoganand Jha.

71. Berma (Jhanjharpur) — 02.10.2010; Jagdish Prasad Mandal and local literature enthusiasts.

72. Supaul — 04.12.2010; Arvind Thakur.

73. Mahishi (Katha Rajkamal) — 05.03.2011; Vijay Mahapatra.

74. Hazaribagh — 10.09.2011; Shyam Darihare.

75. Patna (Diamond Jubilee) — 10.12.2011; Ashok and Kamalmohan ‘Chunnu’.

76. Chennai — 14.07.2012; Vibha Rani.

77. Darbhanga (Kiran Jayanti) — 01.12.2012; Arvind Thakur.

78. Ghanshyampur — 09.03.2013; Kamlesh Jha.

79. Auraha (Laukahi) — 15.05.2013; Umesh Paswan.

80. Nirmali (Supaul) — 30.11.2013; Umesh Mandal and local literature enthusiasts.

81. Deoghar (Bijli Kothi, Bampas Town) — 22.03.2014; Om Prakash Jha.

82. Mehath (Jhanjharpur; Katha Bauddha Siddha Mehathpa) — 31.05.2014; Gajendra Thakur.

83. Sakhua–Bhaptiahi — 30.08.2014; Nand Vilas Ray / Fagulal Sahu / Suraj Narayan Ray ‘Suman’.

84. Berma (Madhubani) — 20.12.2014; Shiv Kumar Mishra and local literature enthusiasts.

85. Bhagalpur (Shyam Kunj, Dwarikapuri) — 04.04.2015; Om Prakash Jha.

86. Laksena (Madhubani) — 20.06.2015; Rajdev Mandal ‘Raman’, Satyadev ‘Suman’.

87. Nirmali (Supaul) — 19.09.2015; Umesh Mandal and local literature enthusiasts.

88. Dakhram Middle School (Benipur) — 30.01.2016; Kamlesh Jha, Amar Nath Jha.

89. Laukahi — 26.03.2016; Umesh Paswan and Prem Kumar Sahu.

90. Lakshminiya (Madhubani) — 18.06.2016; Ram Vilas Sahu and local literature enthusiasts.

91. Godhanpur (Madhubani) — 24.09.2016; Durganand Mandal.

92. Nawani (Madhubani) — 31.12.2016; Ajay Kumar Das ‘Pintu’.

93. Ratansara (Ghoghardihā) — 25.03.2017; Rajdev Mandal and local literature enthusiasts.

94. Laufa (Madhepur) — 24.06.2017; Dr Yogendra Pathak Viyogi and local enthusiasts.

95. Jalsain Dumra (Madhubani) — 09.09.2017; Narayan Yadav.

96. Dhabouli (Laukahi) — 16.12.2017; Radhakant Mandal.

97. Berma (Lakhnaur) — 24.03.2018; Kapileshwar Raut and Berma villagers.

98. Simra (Jhanjharpur) — 16.06.2018; Dr Shiv Kumar Prasad.

99. Murhaddi (Barki Tol) — 22.09.2018; Professor Pritam Nishad.

100. Nirmali (Terapanth Bhavan) — 22.12.2018; Umesh Mandal, Navratna Vengani, Manish Jalan.

101. Jhitki (Madhubani) — 30.03.2019; Bharat Bhushan Jha.

102. Majhaura (Madhubani) — 29.06.2019; Jai Prakash Mandal, Alok Kumar.

103. Rampur (Madhubani) — 28.09.2019; Umesh Narayan Karna ‘Kalpa Kavi’.

104. Valam Nagar–Mahdeva (Laukahi) — 14.12.2019; Prem Kumar Sahu, Umesh Paswan.

105. Darbhanga (Sitayan Auditorium) — 13.02.2021; Kamlesh Jha.

106. Hatni (Ghoghardihā, Madhubani) — 25.09.2021; Laldev Kamat.

107. Belha (Phulparas; in memory of Jivakant) — 25.12.2021; Umesh Mandal, Engineer Shailendra Mandal.

108. Madhura (Madhubani) — 26.03.2022; Dr Shreeshankar Jha.

109. Nanaur (Madhubani) — 25.06.2022; Pradip Pushp.

110. Sonvarsha (Laukahi) — 24.09.2022; Achchhelal Shastri and local literature enthusiasts.

111. Rahua Sangram (Madhubani) — 31.12.2022.

The 112th Sagar Rati Deep Jaray will be held on the last Saturday of March 2023 in the ancestral village of Sahuria (Andhratharhi), under the convenorship of Shri Ramchandra Ray.

जय मैथिली.! जय साहित्य.!! आजुक जीवन आजुक साहित्य.!!!

हकार! हकार!! हकार!!!

भरि राति चलएबला मैथिली साहित्यक प्रसिद्ध
'सगर राति दीप जरय'क आगामी
आयोजन

कथा समन्वय

मे

अपने समस्त मैथिली साहित्य प्रेमीगणक उपस्थिति प्राथनीय अछि..

स्थान : आदिनाथ मधुसूदन पारस मणि संस्कृत महाविद्यालय, रहुआ संग्राम (मधुबनी)

दिनांक : 31 दिसम्बर 2022 (शनिदिन)

समय : 6 बजे साँझसँ 6 बजे भिनसर धरि

पोथी लोकार्पण

1.	साहित्यकारक विवेक (कथा संग्रह)	:	जगदीश प्रसाद मण्डल
2.	नब बनक नब फल (कथा संग्रह)	:	जगदीश प्रसाद मण्डल
3.	सुचिता (उपन्यास)	:	जगदीश प्रसाद मण्डल
4.	प्रतिकार एखन बाँकी अछि (काव्य संग्रह)	:	रामकृष्ण परार्थी
5.	असल पूजा (कथा संग्रह)	:	नन्द विलास राय
6.	संयोग (कथा संग्रह)	:	रबीन्द्र नारायण मिश्र
7.	लजकोटर (उपन्यास)	:	रबीन्द्र नारायण मिश्र
8.	इएह थिक जीवन (संस्मरण)	:	रबीन्द्र नारायण मिश्र
9.	राष्ट्र मंदिर (उपन्यास)	:	रबीन्द्र नारायण मिश्र
10.	मातृभूमि (उपन्यास)	:	रबीन्द्र नारायण मिश्र
11.	सीमाक ओहि पार (उपन्यास)	:	रबीन्द्र नारायण मिश्र
12.	नित नवल सुभाष चन्द्र यादव	:	गजेन्द्र ठाकुर
13.	मैथिली समीक्षाशास्त्र (आलोचना)	:	गजेन्द्र ठाकुर
14.	Rajdeo Mandal Maithili Writer	:	Gajendra Thakur
15.	सुभद्रा कुमारी चौहान (विनिबन्ध)	:	अशोक अविचल
16.	जेतए ने जाए कवि ओतए जाए अनुभवी	:	उमेश मण्डल
17.	जगदीश प्रसाद मण्डलक काव्य संग्रह	:	उमेश मण्डल

सम्पर्क-
विनयमोहन जगदीश, 9661406271
नारायण झा, 9534530451

निवेदक-
अशोक अविचल
9006056324

जय मैथिली.! जय साहित्य.!! आजुक जीवन आजुक साहित्य.!!!

हकार! हकार!! हकार!!!

भरि राति चलएबला मैथिली साहित्यक प्रसिद्ध
'सगर राति दीप जरय'क आगामी
आयोजन

कथा समन्वय

मे

अपने समस्त मैथिली साहित्य प्रेमीगणक उपस्थिति प्राथनीय अछि..

स्थान : आदिनाथ मधुसूदन पारस मणि संस्कृत महाविद्यालय, रहुआ संग्राम (मधुबनी)

दिनांक : 31 दिसम्बर 2022 (शनिदिन)

समय : 6 बजे साँझसँ 6 बजे भिनसर धरि

पोथी लोकार्पण

1.	साहित्यकारक विवेक (कथा संग्रह)	:	जगदीश प्रसाद मण्डल
2.	नब बनक नब फल (कथा संग्रह)	:	जगदीश प्रसाद मण्डल
3.	सुचिता (उपन्यास)	:	जगदीश प्रसाद मण्डल
4.	हमर मीठ बैना (मुक्तक संग्रह)	:	नूतन झा
5.	असल पूजा (कथा संग्रह)	:	नन्द विलास राय
6.	प्रतिकार एखन बाँकी अछि (काव्य संग्रह)	:	रामकृष्ण परार्थी
7.	संयोग (कथा संग्रह)	:	रबीन्द्र नारायण मिश्र
8.	इएह थिक जीवन (संस्मरण)	:	रबीन्द्र नारायण मिश्र
9.	राष्ट्र मंदिर (उपन्यास)	:	रबीन्द्र नारायण मिश्र
10.	नित नवल सुभाष चन्द्र यादव	:	गजेन्द्र ठाकुर
11.	मैथिली समीक्षाशास्त्र (आलोचना)	:	गजेन्द्र ठाकुर
12.	Rajdeo Mandal Maithili Writer	:	Gajendra Thakur
13.	सुभद्रा कुमारी चौहान (विनिबन्ध)	:	अशोक अविचल
14.	जेतए ने जाए कवि ओतए जाए अनुभवी	:	उमेश मण्डल
15.	जगदीश प्रसाद मण्डलक काव्य संग्रह	:	उमेश मण्डल

सम्पर्क-
विनयमोहन जगदीश, 9661406271
नारायण झा, 9534530451

निवेदक-
अशोक अविचल
9006056324

जय मैथिली.! जय साहित्य.!! आजुक जीवन आजुक साहित्य.!!!

भरि राति चलएबला मैथिली साहित्यक प्रसिद्ध

सगर राति दीप जरय

केर

110म कथागोष्ठीमे

अपने समस्त मैथिली साहित्य प्रेमीगण सादर आमंत्रित छी

स्थान : मध्य विद्यालय, झहुरी मेला परिसर, सोनवर्षा (लौकही)

दिनांक : 24 सितम्बर 2022

समय : 6 बजे साँझसँ 6 बजे भिनसर धरि

कार्यक्रम : दीप प्रज्ज्वलन, स्वागत, पोथी लोकार्पण, कथा पाठ, समीक्षा, आलोचना, धन्यवाद ज्ञापन, समापन, विदाइ... ।

उद्घाटन :

श्री विनोद कुमार साह, अध्यक्ष, शिक्षा समिति, जिला परिषद्, मधुबनी

श्री रंधीर गोइत, पूर्व मुखिया, झहुरी पंचायत

श्री जगदीश प्रसाद मण्डल, प्रसिद्ध साहित्यकार

डॉ. जय शंकर पाठक, प्रधानाचार्य, श्री युगेश्वर महन्थ पाठक संस्कृत महाविद्यालय , मंसापुर

पोथी लोकार्पण

1. जीवन दान (कथा संग्रह) : जगदीश प्रसाद मण्डल
2. अप्पन साती (कथा संग्रह) : जगदीश प्रसाद मण्डल
3. नढ़िया भुकैए हमर घराड़ीपर (गजल संग्रह) : जगदानन्द झा 'मनु'
4. पंगु (अनुदित उपन्यास) : रामेश्वर प्रसाद मण्डल
5. अभ्यन्तर (विचारोत्तेजक गद्यांश संकलन) : डॉ. उमेश मण्डल
6. जगदीश प्रसाद मण्डलक काव्य संसार (अनुसन्धान विश्लेषण) : डॉ. उमेश मण्डल

व्यवस्थापक-
समस्त ग्रामवासी
सोनवर्षा-धोबियाही

संयोजक-
अच्छेलाल शास्त्री
(कविजी)

3

On Kamalanand Jha

The title of Kamalanand Jha's book Maithili Novels: Time, Society and Questions (2021) is misleading. It is a compilation of supposedly critical essays, produced within a syndicate, on a handful of upper-caste novelists.

This 263-page hardbound volume can be sold only to libraries, where it will decay. I bought it from Amazon for four hundred and five rupees, but it contains not even five paise worth of material.

A correction is required here. Without having read Gulo, a novel by the non-upper-caste writer Subhash Chandra Yadav, he disposed of it in two lines. I reproduce those two lines for your amusement. You may already have read Gulo; if not, read it first, for the experience will then be still more entertaining. With Subhash Chandra Yadav's permission, Gulo is available in the Videha archive at http://videha.co.in/pothi.htm.

> "The weakness of the novel is the author's political prejudice. Partisanship towards a particular politics cannot do justice to a literary work."

In a novel in which politics is nowhere to be found, there can be no question of "political prejudice" or "partisanship towards a particular politics". Dhoomketu and Yatri employed the bogey of political prejudice and political allegiance. Subhash Chandra Yadav's Bhot, published in 2022 and also available with his permission in the Videha archive at http://videha.co.in/pothi.htm, does concern politics. Even there, however, the author's Bhagta style has no need of the bogey of political bias or partisanship. Read my book Nit Naval Subhash Chandra Yadav, available at http://videha.co.in/pothi.htm.

Kamalanand Jha's Brahminical caste prejudice against Subhash Chandra Yadav, expressed without reading the novel, is an alarm bell. The parallel stream is alert to the manner in which Kamalanand Jha, wearing the mask of the Left to advance Brahminism, wishes to sacrifice social justice. In his résumé he proudly records a Sahitya Akademi Maithili translation assignment obtained by taking away the rights of non-upper-caste and parallel-stream writers. It came to him not through merit but through his caste-marking surname and conduct of this kind. For people like him, Maithili is one line in a résumé; for the parallel stream, it is a question of life and death.

Dinesh Kumar Mishra's Dui Patan Ke Beech Mein is a historical autobiography of the Kosi River. He has written historical accounts of other rivers of Mithila as well: Bandini Mahananda; Bagmati Ki Sadgati!; Dui Patan Ke Beech Mein... (Kosi Nadi Ki Kahani); Na Ghat Na Ghar; Bagawat Par Majboor Mithila Ki Kamla Nadi; Bhutahi Nadi Aur Takniki Jhaad-Phook; The Kamla River and People on Collision Course; Bhutahi Balan: Story of a Ghost River and Engineering Witchcraft; and Refugees of the Kosi Embankments. Pankaj Kumar Jha Parashar, a member of the Sahitya Akademi's Maithili Advisory Committee, translated this work paragraph by paragraph into Maithili and published it as a novel under his own name. A pseudo-critic calls this plagiarist's work "research"! That research belongs to Dinesh Kumar Mishra. He earned a B.Tech. in civil engineering from IIT Kharagpur in 1968 and an M.Tech. in structural engineering in 1970; he is qualified for such research. When someone cannot obtain admission in the discipline of his choice, he sometimes settles, exhausted, for Hindi; otherwise Kamalanand Jha would have understood that this was the work of a civil engineer. Screenshots of the Hindi and Maithili texts are attached. Dinesh Kumar Mishra is not from Mithila, yet he has written the stories of its rivers. We are grateful to him: the people of Mithila can never repay the debt. The incident once again shows the ingratitude of mainstream writers greedy for awards and money. Ten or twelve years ago, this writer had found another rescuer in Taranand Viyogi, who explained that, under the influence of other works, he inadvertently brought other people's material into his own writing—or something of that kind. Now he has sought Kamalanand Jha's shelter, but to no avail.

All the books of Dinesh Kumar Mishra are now available in the Videha archive with his permission:

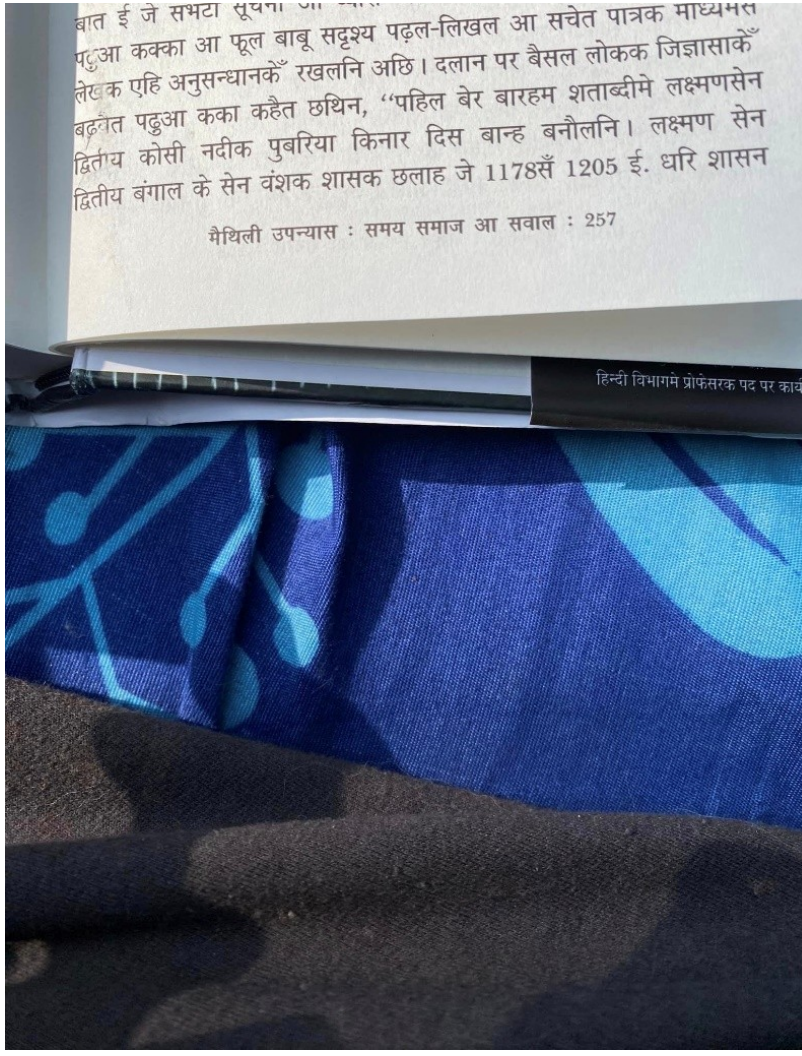
http://videha.co.in/pothi.htm

Let me recall something. When Bill Gates was asked whether Microsoft was delaying the launch of the Xbox in India because it feared piracy, he replied that Microsoft had never delayed any product for fear of piracy. Thus, despite the risks involved, we shall continue to enrich the Videha archive. In the parallel stream, a rotten fish does not make every fish in the pond rotten. The fisherfolk here have been removing the rotten fish one by one, and they will continue to do so.

To clear Kamalanand Jha's mind and vision, I recommend two books to him: first, Sushil's novel Gamwali (1982), and second, my Dooshan Panji: The Black Book. Both are available at http://videha.co.in/pothi.htm. When my review of Sushil begins, I shall offer there a lesson intended for Kamalanand Jha.

I shall keep an eye on this pseudo-critic, Kamalanand Jha.

(To be continued in the next issue ...)

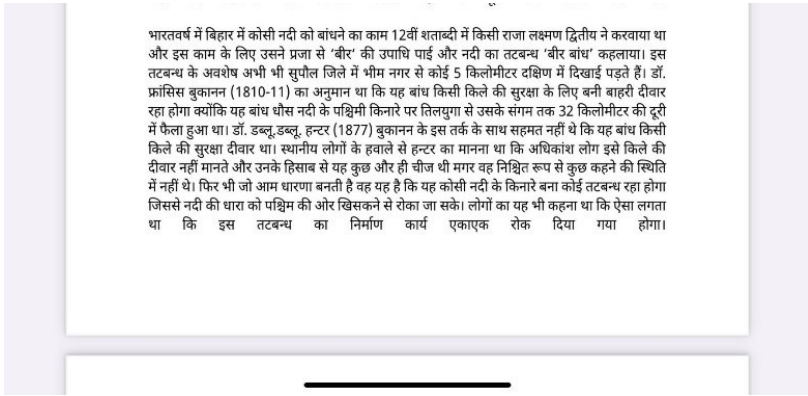


बात ई जे सभटा सूचना आ
पढुआ कक्का आ फूल बाबू सदृश्य पढ़ल-लिखल आ सचेत पात्रक माध्यमसँ
लेखक एहि अनुसन्धानकेँ रखलनि अछि। दलान पर बैसल लोकक जिज्ञासाकेँ
बढ़बैत पढुआ कका कहैत छथिन, "पहिल बेर बारहम शताब्दीमे लक्ष्मणसेन
द्वितीय कोसी नदीक पुबरिया किनार दिस बान्ह बनौलनि। लक्ष्मण सेन
द्वितीय बंगाल के सेन वंशक शासक छलाह जे 1178सँ 1205 ई. धरि शासन

मैथिली उपन्यास : समय समाज आ सवाल : 257

हिन्दी विभागमे प्रोफेसरक पद पर कार्यरत

कयने छलाह। एहि बान्हक अवशेष अहाँ एखनो भीमनगरसँ ८ कोस
पश्चिममे देखि सकैत छी। एकटा पश्चिमी विद्वान फ्रांसिस बुकानन्क
अनुमान रहनि, जे ई बान्ह सम्भवतः कोनो किलाकेँ रक्षा हेतु बनाओल गेल
होयत। मुदा बुकानन के मतसँ डब्ल्यू. डब्ल्यू. हंटर सहमत नहि भेलाह।
ओ साफ कहलनि जे कोसीक किनार पर बान्ह एहि दुआरे बनाओल गेल
होयत जे नदी पश्चिम दिस नहि बहय लागय।" एहि तरहेँ बान्हक महं
बहुत रास शेष अवशेष [illegible] अधिक ज्ञानात्मक उपयोग पराश्



भारतवर्ष में बिहार में कोसी नदी को बांधने का काम 12वीं शताब्दी में किसी राजा लक्ष्मण द्वितीय ने करवाया था और इस काम के लिए उसने प्रजा से 'बीर' की उपाधि पाई और नदी का तटबन्ध 'बीर बांध' कहलाया। इस तटबन्ध के अवशेष अभी भी सुपौल जिले में भीम नगर से कोई 5 किलोमीटर दक्षिण में दिखाई पड़ते हैं। डॉ. फ्रांसिस बुकानन (1810-11) का अनुमान था कि यह बांध किसी किले की सुरक्षा के लिए बनी बाहरी दीवार रहा होगा क्योंकि यह बांध घौस नदी के पश्चिमी किनारे पर तिलयुगा से उसके संगम तक 32 किलोमीटर की दूरी में फैला हुआ था। डॉ. डब्लू.डब्लू. हन्टर (1877) बुकानन के इस तर्क के साथ सहमत नहीं थे कि यह बांध किसी किले की सुरक्षा दीवार था। स्थानीय लोगों के हवाले से हन्टर का मानना था कि अधिकांश लोग इसे किले की दीवार नहीं मानते और उनके हिसाब से यह कुछ और ही चीज थी मगर वह निश्चित रूप से कुछ कहने की स्थिति में नहीं थे। फिर भी जो आम धारणा बनती है वह यह है कि यह कोसी नदी के किनारे बना कोई तटबन्ध रहा होगा जिससे नदी की धारा को पश्चिम की ओर खिसकने से रोका जा सके। लोगों का यह भी कहना था कि ऐसा लगता था कि इस तटबन्ध का निर्माण कार्य एकाएक रोक दिया गया होगा।

4

Just as Jyotirishwar treated this shamelessness in Dhurttasamagama, I too have discussed it in my story Mahisbar Brahmank Gam: "If you ask them the reason, they will say that all these people are shameless, because when they are born someone spits on their behinds … so that no shame remains anywhere in their bodies."

5

Videha invites articles for its "Special Issue on Literary Corruption" at editorial.staff.videha@gmail.com on the following subjects:
1. Literature, the arts and government academies:
(a) The politics of awards;
(b) Undemocratic procedures for entry into government academies;
(c) Power groups and the working methods of academies;
(d) The operations of temporary parallel power structures arising from a sham opposition to state power;
(e) The money factor in academy awards: myth or reality?
2. Private literary institutions and the politics of awards.
3. Corruption in the publishing world and its effects on writers.
4. Pseudo-organisations of Maithili writers and the conduct of their office-bearers.
5. Forms of literary corruption in Maithili departments of schools and colleges:
(a) Curricula;
(b) Teaching and learning;
(c) Appointments.
6. Literary journalism, reviews, public platforms, garlands, microphones and the theatrics of book launches.
7. The selection of birth and death centenaries of authors, calendar-centred commemorations and the politics behind them.
8. Discrimination against Dalits and women writers, and the various forms of their exploitation.

9. Any other relevant subject.

—Gajendra Thakur, Editor, Videha; WhatsApp: +91 9560960721; http://videha.co.in/; ISSN 2229-547X.

6

You may now ask how the parallel stream responded. It does not indulge in whining. The answer lies in my three books released on 31 December 2022 at the 111th Sagar Rati Deep Jaray—the very gathering which, for the past ten years, the Sahitya Akademi has been trying to swallow up. I invite comments on all three books at editorial.staff.videha@gmail.com. The first two contain critiques of the literature of Rajdev Mandal and Subhash Chandra Yadav, undertaken according to the principles set out in my third book, Maithili Samikshashastra (Maithili Critical Theory).

Links to all three books are given below.

Rajdev Mandal—A Maithili Writer (now including Appendices I and II)

Nit Naval Subhash Chandra Yadav

Nit Naval Subhash Chandra Yadav (in Mithilakshar)

Maithili Critical Theory

Maithili Critical Theory (in Tirhuta)

Read also this attack on Kamalanand Jha's Brahminism:

Dooshan Panji: The Black Book

Dooshan Panji: The Black Book (in Mithilakshar)

7

Parallel Literature in Maithili and the Videha Maithili Literary Movement

Parallel Literature in Maithili and the Videha Maithili Literary Movement

Five Short-Short Stories by Shri Jagdish Prasad Mandal

Shri Jagdish Prasad Mandal regards the following five short-short stories as his best:

Shri Jagdish Prasad Mandal considers the following five stories to be his finest:

Priya Kaj (Bhari Man Kaj)

Chali Gel Asha (Ayal Asha Chali Gel)

Jivandan (The Gift of Life)

On My Behalf (Appan Sati)

In "Sancharan", the philosophical reflections of Jibach Kaka on life are portrayed in all their richness, while the realities of the material world enter from time to time. There is detailed treatment of floods and embankments; the hopes of hydroelectric power raised by the Kosi River Project and the disappointment when those hopes went unfulfilled; irrigation facilities for farmers; the arrival of chemical fertilisers; the obstruction caused by the project to the natural flow of smaller rivers; memories of the village's old mango orchards; and rain-fed cultivation. After reaching the age of fifty, Jibach Kaka withdraws from household life in a spirit of detachment and entrusts responsibility to his two sons.

"Sancharan": Jibach Kaka's philosophical reflections on life appear in their full range, with material existence naturally entering at intervals. Floods and embankments; the hope of electricity from the Kosi River Project and the subsequent disappointment when it failed to materialise; irrigation for cultivators; the introduction of chemical fertilisers; the obstruction of smaller rivers by the project; memories of old village mango groves; and cultivation dependent on rainfall are all described in detail. After fifty, Jibach Kaka renounces the life of a householder and hands its responsibilities to his two sons.

"Bhari Man Kaj" is the story of Gyanchan. He is weighed down by the burdens of life, but Sumitlal tells him a story, and his heart grows lighter.

"Ayal Asha Chali Gel": The people of Rudrapur village are preparing for a pilgrimage to Rameswaram. A discussion takes place between Hiralal and Motilal.

"Jivan Dan": Sumant and his wife discuss life after the earthquake. All three houses had been destroyed in the earthquake the previous week.

"Appan Sati": At the centre of this story is the life of a village pulsing around the shops at a crossroads. The people, their priorities and their small disputes and altercations all come into view.

Shri Jagdish Prasad Mandal is known for Maithili stories that relate the problems of the people of Mithila directly to their possible solutions. The solution is found among the people themselves, and the character who discovers it assumes the leading role in the story; such characters are always present. His fiction is known less for opposing migration than for opposing the act of fleeing from life. Yet the five stories selected here are ones he regards as expressions of his philosophical thought. In them too, the priority is the people and their lives. Through Jibach Kaka the writer tells us that his life was magnificent. Magnificence does not lie in money but in the way life is lived. It is not shown through the life of a landlord but through that of ordinary people—those who suffer drought, floods and the adverse environmental consequences of new ideas of development, yet preserve their dignity.

Before and After the Arrival of Jagdish Prasad Mandal: The Landscape of Maithili Literature

Writing about the Bengal famine of 1942–43, Amartya Sen observes that millions died—approximately 1.5 million, according to the Famine Enquiry Commission—yet the tragedy did not reach his own loved ones. Likewise, Mithila suffered a devastating famine in 1967. When the then prime minister, Indira Gandhi, visited the region, she was shown members of the Musahar community surviving by eating bisarah: the roots of the lotus and other plants.

Yet it was not until 2009, more than forty years after the event, that Shri Jagdish Prasad Mandal wrote about this tragedy. In the author's view, the reason for the delay is clear. A one-sided tendency had left the course of Maithili literature distorted and disfigured. Writers of the so-called mainstream had no direct experience of a calamity on this scale and were therefore unable to write about it.

The arrival of Jagdish Prasad Mandal on the literary scene was like the beginning of both a renaissance and a reform movement in Maithili literature. A brilliant new age began. In the author's view, Mandal deserves credit for dispelling the darkness, correcting the ugliness and one-sided direction of the literary landscape, filling its gaps, and straightening its crooked course.

Jagdish Prasad Mandal is an artist. He presents facts in such an extraordinary manner that the reader becomes wholly absorbed.

He possesses the capacity to give facts direction and purpose. Through this ability he has affected the definition and character of Maithili literature so profoundly that its history may be divided into two eras: before Jagdish Prasad Mandal and after Jagdish Prasad Mandal.

His facts are gathered from every stratum of society. They do not enter his prose as ornamental embellishments but emerge in its natural flow.

It seems as though a powerful tide has shaken the banks of the so-called principal channel of Maithili literature—a channel that dries up completely but regains its shape during the rainy season.

As though a great tide had unsettled the banks of the so-called mainstream channel of Maithili literature: a channel that almost dies in a drought, only to regain its form when the rains return.

His words do not lament. His writing does not retreat from responsibility. However many hardships his characters endure, they do not surrender hope, blame a lack of resources, or give themselves over to despair; they continue to advance with determination.

He respects the ways of life and contributions of every stratum of society—an exceptional quality. This is effective because there is no discrepancy between what he says and what he does; the dignity of his personal and social life lends his writing credibility. The concordance between what he thinks, what he does, and what he writes makes his literature truthful.

The rhythmic rises and falls of the Maithili language attracted even the great Yehudi Menuhin. In a BBC programme, he described it as one of the sweetest languages, saying that when he heard it his whole body swayed to its rhythm. Jagdish Prasad Mandal uses the inflections of this rhythmic language to express the interdependence of society and culture.

This change holds the possibility of a revolution not only in literature but also in the economic sphere.

SHAMBHUDAS

Jagdish Prasad Mandal plants an image of Barham Baba in the reader's mind. He shows that the devotees and Barham Baba himself are both pleased. He depicts the transformation of "Shambhua" (a disrespectful form of address) into "Shambhu" (a respectful form), and then shows Shambhudas becoming Darbaridas.

Jagdish Prasad Mandal establishes an image of "Barham Baba" in the reader's mind. He depicts both the devotees and Barham Baba as content. "Shambhua"—a contemptuous form of address—gradually becomes "Shambhu"—a respectful form; and then Shambhudas is seen turning into Darbaridas.

The collapse of Mithila's institutions and the reduction of Shambhudas to rubble are presented almost as evidence that cultivated arts are perishing in Mithila. Yet the protagonists of Mandal's other stories, such as Bhaitak Lava and Bisrah, do not collapse. Why, then, is Shambhudas becoming Darbaridas? Is this merely a loss of power, or is the writer Jagdish Prasad Mandal himself changing? Is he weary? Is he being defeated?

Viewed closely, Shambhudas is in no way inferior to the heroes and heroines of Bhaitak Lava or Bisrah. Why, then, is he losing? Should he not be victorious? Why does the writer push him towards defeat? Within the world of his characters, the writer is like God; why, then, has he constructed circumstances in which Shambhudas finds himself losing?

Jagdish Prasad Mandal's characters are not artificial. For that very reason they do not invariably win on every economic front.

Jagdish Prasad Mandal's characters are not artificial; it is therefore not necessary that they should always prevail on every front of economic life.

On the economic front, work is accomplished by the hands and by labour. Culture, however—including literature—is like exceedingly delicate craftsmanship. The characters of this story become entangled in that intricate craft.

When Mandal's other characters found themselves compelled to fight on the economic front, they fought with their full strength and won. To serve art, however, Shambhudas had to leave—unlike the characters of Bisrah.

For this reason Shambhudas had to become a court artist. Economically, it was thankless work that offered no return; yet in changing times, surviving in that form seemed the only way to preserve the actual existence of art.

Even here, however, in a condition that may be considered defeat—and which was a defeat in economic terms—Shambhudas raises the flag of rebellion.

He decides not to marry, abandoning the possibility of family life. Shambhudas did not become Darbaridas merely to survive economically. He is no utilitarian; he had to compromise for the survival of art. His decision not to marry becomes a form of atonement for that compromise.

If art becomes "Darbaridas", the parallel tradition will collapse. Shambhudas's defeat would be Mithila's defeat; not only Jagdish Prasad Mandal but all Mithila would lose in that defeat.

BAJANTA-BUJHANTA

This is a collection of bīj-kathā, or seed-stories.

The title seed-story, "Bajanta-Bujhanta", concerns a parrot that is itself bajanta-bujhanta. Such symbolism is found more frequently in this collection of seed-stories than in the writer's other stories.

The title vihani story, "Bajanta-Bujhanta", concerns a parrot that is itself bajanta-bujhanta. This collection of vihani stories employs such symbols more extensively than the writer's other fiction.

In "Chaukidari", a working woman is seen labouring even in the eighth month of pregnancy, with a rope tied around her waist and abdomen.

The author dedicates "Patar" to Manoj Kumar Karna "Munnaji", a prominent practitioner of the vihani story, and offers a symbol: "Our condition is like a dark room, with snakes on all sides." The symbol carries the vihani story forward. A co-father-in-law says, "Well, you have even become someone who can understand the language of crows."

TAREGAN

This book contains neither complex plots nor difficult symbols, for it was written to instil good values in children.

There are few complex plots or convoluted symbols in this book, for the simple reason that its purpose is to cultivate good values among children.

Yet here the entire story itself becomes a symbol. When Subhas Chandra Bose's father tells him that merely sleeping on the ground is not enough, the words leave a deep impression upon his mind. What he subsequently did for India is well known. Satya Vidya Bharadwaj says, "Knowledge is greater than heaven."

The collection is important not only as children's literature; it also widens the horizons of the vihani story.

The poem "Chalu Uchitpur" imagines a place called Uchitpur, where everyone has the same body language and manner of dress. In that country there is no distinction between fire and water.

In the poem "Chalu Uchitpur", Uchitpur is a place where everyone's bodily gestures and clothing are alike. In that land there is not even any distinction between fire and water.

"A Full Moon Like a Moonless Night" says much about a distorted, "misshapen form".

"Yar Yau" is a song of tragedy. It describes all that the flood has carried away—not merely possessions, but morale and even the sense of one's own existence.

He dedicates the song to Shri Rajnandan Lal Das's "Yug-Yug", which depicts the condition of someone caught in a spider's web, with every door closed.

The song is dedicated to Shri Rajnandan Lal Das's "Yug-Yug", which portrays how every door closes upon a person trapped in a spider's web.

The entire collection of songs is dedicated to Professor Uday Narayan Singh "Nachiketa". Every song in the volume is rhythmic.

Baba failed to comprehend the malevolence of barren trees. He ploughed, hoed, and planted trees; later those very trees became abodes of departed souls. They do not touch the earth but reach towards the sky by their topmost shoots.

Baba did not recognise the deception of the barren trees. He ploughed his field, prepared the soil, and planted the trees. Later those trees became dwelling places of the spirits of the dead, as though they no longer touched the ground but reached heaven by their uppermost tips.

"Haluk Kaj" describes the technical refinements of tools used in labour, which make the work easier. It also conveys the satisfaction an artist or craftsperson experiences when the work is done, while portraying how a world filled with sympathy comes into being.

Whether it is the syrup-like psychological plane of "Patta Chhimi" or an episode such as "The Tall Boy Is Guilty", the writer brings forward novel and distinctive forms of Maithili verse. This gives "Rait-Din" a different voice.

We hear someone singing a nachari, swaying body and voice in perfect rhythm; a nachari is a Maithili song associated with Lord Shiva. Both the spiritual and the supernatural find a place here. On one side is union or creation, on the other dissolution; change becomes a mere game.

We hear someone singing a nachari—a Maithili song to Lord Shiva—with body and voice moving together in full rhythm. There is room for both the spiritual and the supernatural. One force unites or creates, another disintegrates; change seems no more than a game.

The poet is exceedingly careful in choosing words and themes. Mystery, despondency, answers, questions, and hope repeatedly arrive and depart.

In "Ghare-Ghare", every house is bright with lamps, yet the entire village lies in darkness.

In "Ghare-Ghare", every house glows with a lamp, but the whole village is submerged in darkness.

"Kaushal-Jakhain" explains why the land became barren and how a village sunk in darkness came to such a pitiable condition.

SARITA

Here Jagdish Prasad Mandal's verse raises questions without cease—question after question.

Here the poetry of Jagdish Prasad Mandal continually raises questions; it goes on questioning.

His poetry expresses a painful awareness of fact and continues to ask questions until a conclusion is reached.

If we compare his poetry with his prose, we find more pessimism in the verse than in the hope-filled prose. The brevity of the poem does not afford him sufficient room to analyse a question at length and search for an answer. Consequently he keeps asking questions—questions that prod the reader to seek solutions independently.

Compared with his hopeful prose, his verse contains more pessimism. The shorter poetic form leaves little room to analyse questions and find answers. The poet therefore raises question after question, stirring readers to seek the solutions for themselves.

Such verse is an interesting and novel experiment in Maithili literature.

A Survey of Some Other Books by Jagdish Prasad Mandal

Ulba Chaur*: collection of short stories, Shruti Publication, New Rajendra Nagar, New Delhi, 2013.

This collection contains thirteen short stories. Each portrays the vicissitudes of life, investigates the causes of problems, and offers solutions from a modern standpoint.

Ardhangini*: collection of short stories, Shruti Publication, New Rajendra Nagar, New Delhi, 2013.

This collection contains twenty short stories. The writer vividly portrays the hardships of salaried people and contrasts them with the comparatively cheerful lives of cultivators. At the same time, he directly confronts the false beliefs prevalent among villagers and other social problems, proposing solutions. He also mentions traditional caste-based occupations and raises questions about their historical usefulness and necessity in the ordered life of the village.

Satbhaiya Pokhair*: collection of short stories, Shruti Publication, New Rajendra Nagar, New Delhi, 2013.

Four editions of this book have been published so far.

Bhakmor*: collection of short stories, Shruti Publication, New Rajendra Nagar, New Delhi, 2013.

The collection contains nine short stories. “Ojhari” and other stories, situated in the years following 1947, examine the erosion of democratic values and the deformation of public institutions.

Nai Dharaiye*: novel, Shruti Publication, New Rajendra Nagar, New Delhi, 2013.

This novel is an attempt to discharge the obligation of literary creation, to which the writer has remained committed. Through a dynamic representation of life, it reflects the face of society.

Krantiyog*: collection of short stories, Pallavi Prakashan, Nirmali, Supaul, Bihar, 2017.

The collection contains six stories. It effectively depicts how the building of highways, connecting roads, and houses raised on high foundations has aggravated drainage problems, damaged the environment, and intensified the resulting danger of floods. Ponds, wells, and orchards are diminishing in number and area; consequently thorny vegetation spreads and crops are damaged.

Subhimani Jingi*: collection of short stories, Pallavi Prakashan, Nirmali, Supaul, Bihar, 2018.

The writer vividly depicts questions concerning the third gender. The adolescent Shyama is neither male nor female; therefore some people, including the mother, decide to hand the child over to the kinnar community. The father, however, stands by Shyama and resolves to impart all the skills needed for a life of dignity. He cites the example of Shiva as Ardhanarishvara, and of Krishna, who takes the form of Shivani and enters a group of women. Seeing the father's firm resolve, the mother also comes to support him.

The writer has addressed the question of the third gender, a subject rarely discussed in this way in Maithili literature. Shyama is, first of all, a child; this is beyond dispute. Shyama has a right to a dignified life and must be given the necessary skills. The brothers and sisters reason with their mother; after hearing the stories of Shiva and Krishna, she regrets that she was not taught them earlier. Especially in rural society, the life of third-gender people is presented from a new perspective. Other stories in the collection open up different social questions: "Babak Bag-Bagiya" examines monasteries and renunciation; "Kukurpan" considers village dispute resolution; and "Herayal Jingi", through the village of Kamalpur, proposes new approaches to development since independence, caste, and the defective model of development.

Subhimani Jingi ("A Dignified Life", 2018) is a collection of eight short stories. The second story, also entitled "Subhimani Jingi", gives the book its title. The book was written between 23 January and 9 March 2018 and published by Pallavi Prakashan, Nirmali. Maithili has a quarterly, all-night short-story reading gathering, Sagar Rati Deep Jaray, held at different locations. Its ninety-seventh gathering took place on 24 March 2018 in the village of Berma, under the convenorship of the writer Shri Kapileshwar Raut; this is also Jagdish Prasad Mandal's village. The book was launched on that occasion.

All eight stories vividly portray the continuing changes in the lives of village people.

The eight stories in the book are as follows:

1. "Kekra Lel Kelau": written on 23 January 2018.

2. "Subhimani Jingi": written on 28 January 2018.

3. "Babak Bag-Bagiya": written on 3 February 2018.

4. "Ab-Tab": written on 7 February 2018.

5. "Agilah": written on 11 February 2018.

6. "Kukurpan": written on 28 February 2018.

7. "Herayal Jingi": written on 5 March 2018.

8. "Asha Par Paani Phir Gel": written on 9 March 2018.

1. "Kekra Lel Kelau"

This short story begins with a conversation among people seated around a fire on a winter's day. Bhogilal Bhai is an Ayurvedic physician, yet he cannot keep himself in good health. His family, too, has come apart: apart from his wife, its members have migrated to the towns. The conversation ranges over the many changes in the village's natural and social environment—changes to which some people have been unable to adjust.

2. "Subhimani Jingi"

The writer addresses the question of the third gender, a topic rarely treated in this manner in Maithili literature. Shyama is, first and foremost, a child. Shyama has a right to a dignified life and should receive the skills needed to live it. The siblings reason with their mother. After hearing stories about Shiva and Krishna, she regrets that she had never previously been taught them. The story offers a new perspective on third-gender lives, particularly within rural society.

3. "Babak Bag-Bagiya"

This short story centres on the monastery and the question of renunciation. Govardhan Das was a poor child whose parents died during his childhood. He later succeeds Mahant Gokul Das. Through his story, the writer reaches deep into rural life, presenting aspects of village existence seldom seen. Memories of Baba were bound up with the garden, but for want of proper care those gardens are now being destroyed.

4. "Ab-Tab"

Using the vegetables and ingredients served at village feasts, the writer raises questions about development's effects on rural life.

5. "Agilah"

Pakshadhar's uncle returns to the village after retirement. Munilal is a cousin or relative of his, and Munilal's daughter is a widow. Munilal and his daughter Savitri are the characters through whom Pakshadhar hopes to advance his programme of reform.

6. "Kukurpan"

The subject of "Kukurpan" is the method of resolving disputes in the village. A resolution is possible only through a person suited to that responsibility.

7. "Herayal Jingi"

Through the example of Kamalpur village, "Herayal Jingi" raises questions about rural development since independence, viewing caste and the defective development model from a new perspective.

8. "Asha Par Paani Phir Gel"

Lalit is an educated farmer. He begins cultivating sunflowers. Through Lalit's experiment, the writer finds scope to explore farmers' actual problems, natural calamities, and other practical difficulties.

Dekhl Din*: collection of short stories, Pallavi Prakashan, Nirmali, Supaul, Bihar, 2018.

The title story compares a family that has lived in the village for three generations with another whose second generation migrated to the city, and establishes the superiority of the first family's way of life.

Gapak Piyahul Lok*: collection of short stories, Pallavi Prakashan, Nirmali, Supaul, Bihar, 2018.

The collection contains thirteen short stories. The title story depicts a social structure carried forward from the Permanent Settlement and the age of landlordism. Resources were concentrated in the hands of a few, and in independent India the tendency continued in various forms. People began seizing land and litigation increased. The title story concerns such a lawsuit involving Dinbandhu Kaka and thirty-five people; on the day judgment is to be delivered, a bus accident occurs.

Lahsan*: novel, Pallavi Prakashan, Nirmali, Supaul, Bihar, 2018.

"Lahsan" tells the story of a rural man disillusioned with urban life, where social and personal morality seems meaningless. The novel vividly portrays village and city life; from the standpoint of ordinary people of the economically disadvantaged classes, urban life holds no particular attraction. The plot revolves around personal turmoil, but the novel's real strength lies in its extensive portrayal of town and village through the eyes of those on the lower rungs of the economic order.

Rahe Joker Pariwar*: collection of short stories, Pallavi Prakashan, Nirmali, Supaul, Bihar, 2020.

Loss of livelihood is a principal reason for migration from Mithila. Migrants, however, also include prosperous people seeking an easier life. Nearly thirty years earlier, Shantinath, though well-off, left Chainpur for "Shanti Niketan" in search of peace. The villagers subsequently met him, but he expressed no regret. Unlike the writer's other books, this work uses the migration of materially comfortable people in search of peace to compare and depict the inner contradictions of Mithila's social life.

Gamak Jingi*: collection of short stories, Shruti Publication, New Rajendra Nagar, New Delhi, 2009.

This short-story collection contains nineteen stories. The writer received the Tagore Literary Award (Sahitya Akademi) for this book. Each story portrays the harshness of rural life. People must bend before natural calamities, yet the characters repeatedly rise again, refusing either to surrender or to migrate.

Maulayal Gachhak Phool*: novel, Shruti Publication, New Rajendra Nagar, New Delhi, 2009.

This is the writer's first novel and centres on the problem of migration from villages. The novelist imagines revitalising a decaying system so that migration may be stopped.

Utthan-Patan*: novel, Shruti Publication, New Rajendra Nagar, New Delhi, 2009.

Even a profoundly indolent person may make progress if he desires economic advancement. Shyamanand introduces technology into agriculture. To prevent the fragmentation of the village and migration, unity is essential; the narrative stresses this proposition.

Jingik Jeet*: novel, Shruti Publication, New Rajendra Nagar, New Delhi, 2009.

Many works centred on village life give undue prominence to negative forces. The writer seeks to bring an end to the despair produced by such negative portrayals.

Mithilak Beti*: play, Shruti Publication, New Rajendra Nagar, New Delhi, 2009.

This play raises questions about the pitiable lives of daughters in Mithila's villages. Discrimination takes many forms; the writer selects the distorted relationships a woman may encounter after marriage. Their fundamental cause is shown to lie in the unequal treatment accorded to sons and daughters from the day of birth.

Taregan*: collection of inspirational stories, Shruti Publication, New Delhi, 2010.

This is a book of children's literature containing 111 inspirational seed-stories; it also incorporates the essential substance of some outstanding works of world literature selected for young readers.

Jeevan-Maran*: novel, Shruti Publication, New Rajendra Nagar, New Delhi, 2010.

The writer's spiritual perspective comes to the foreground in this work; the meaning of earthly existence is viewed from the perspective of the afterlife.

.

Jeevan Sangharsh*: novel, Shruti Publication, New Rajendra Nagar, New Delhi, 2010.

The writer compares two villages, Banspura and Sisauni. In his account, Banspura is less developed and Sisauni relatively more developed; this conception of development emerges both from the villagers' experience and from the writer's perspective. Sisauni has a middle school and holds public Durga worship and a fair; Banspura has none of these facilities, although a privately organised twenty-four-hour kirtan and occasional communal feasts take place there. Barharba is depicted as more developed than either: it has a high school and more public events. The discussion then turns to Katharba, which has not only a high school but also a hospital and organises numerous public programmes.

Bajanta-Bujhanta*: collection of seed-stories, Shruti Publication, New Rajendra Nagar, New Delhi, 2013.

This collection contains sixty-eight seed-stories woven around various social questions. The principal concerns are the changes and upheavals taking place at both personal and social levels within villages.

Pseudo-Criticism in Maithili and the Question of Kamalanand Jha

Kamalanand Jha's Brahminical caste prejudice against Subhash Chandra Yadav, expressed without reading his work, is an alarm bell. The parallel stream is alert to the manner in which Kamalanand Jha clings to the pretence of the Left in order to advance Brahminism, and seeks to sacrifice social justice in the process. In his biographical note he proudly mentions a Sahitya Akademi Maithili translation assignment obtained, I maintain, by taking away the rights of a non-upper-caste writer and of people in the parallel stream. The assignment, I contend, came to him not through merit but through his caste title and such activities. For people like him, Maithili is a line on a curriculum vitae; for the parallel stream, it is a question of life and death.

Why have I called Kamalanand Jha a pseudo-critic? Because he is one. He writes: "Almost a hundred years after the Maithili novel began its journey, the credit for writing a dignified novel on the dreams, struggles and ironies of inter-caste marriage among Maithils goes to Gaurinath." Has Kamalanand Jha therefore deprived Sushil of this credit? Is this the height of the arrogance of his Brahminical upbringing—the belief that "I can elevate whom I wish and bring down whom I wish"—or evidence of his lack of study? Come, let me take you away from Kamalanand Jha's self-interested world, away from deceit and pretence, into the innocent, magical literary world of Sushil. Welcome to Sushil's literary world. Here is his Gamwali (1982), now available in the Videha archive at http://videha.co.in/pothi.htm. Before the novel itself begins, Sushil writes on its very first line: "In support of widow remarriage and inter-caste marriage." Then the novel begins. Gamwali dies, and a dispute immediately arises: who will perform her funeral rites—the Brahmin community or the Yadav community?

Dinesh Kumar Mishra's Dui Patan Ke Beech Mein is a historical autobiography of the Kosi River. He has also written historical autobiographies of other rivers of Mithila: Bandini Mahananda; Bagmati Ki Sadgati!; Dui Patan Ke Beech Mein... (Kosi Nadi Ki Kahani); Na Ghat Na Ghar; Bagavat Par Majbur Mithila Ki Kamla Nadi; Bhutahi Nadi Aur Takniki Jhar-Phunk; The Kamla River and People on Collision Course; Bhutahi Balan: Story of a Ghost River and Engineering Witchcraft; and Refugees of the Kosi Embankments. Pankaj Jha Parashar, a member of the Sahitya Akademi's Maithili Advisory Board, translated these books into Maithili paragraph by paragraph and published a novel in his own name; the pseudo-critic Kamalanand Jha calls this plagiarising novelist's work "research"! Let me make clear that both this plagiarising novelist and this pseudo-critic work in the Hindi Department of Aligarh Muslim University. This research belongs to Dinesh Kumar Mishra, who obtained his B.Tech. in Civil Engineering from IIT Kharagpur in 1968 and his M.Tech. in Structural Engineering in 1970, and is qualified to undertake it. When people fail to gain admission to any subject, they eventually enrol in Hindi in resignation; otherwise Kamalanand Jha would understand that such research could be the work of a civil engineer—perhaps he understands it already. Screenshots of the Hindi original and the Maithili text are appended below.

Dinesh Kumar Mishra is not from Mithila, yet he has written the stories of all its rivers. We are grateful to him, and the people of Mithila can never fully repay their debt to him. The award- and money-hungry people of the mainstream, however, will repay gratitude with ingratitude: this has been demonstrated again. Some ten or twelve years ago, this same writer was defended by Taranand Viyogi, who wrote something to the effect that, influenced by poetry, he unconsciously borrowed material from another person's work. Now he has sought Kamalanand Jha's protection, but to his misfortune! The parallel stream is vigilant against Kamalanand Jha's practice of sheltering under the Left while seeking to advance Brahminism and sacrifice social justice. Landowners became communists to escape land-ceiling laws; now others seek refuge in the Left to protect Brahminism. People of this kind have greatly damaged communism.

All of Dinesh Kumar Mishra's books are now available in the Videha archive with his permission:
http://videha.co.in/pothi.htm
Let me recall something here. When Bill Gates was asked whether he was delaying the Xbox's launch in India out of fear of piracy, he replied that Microsoft had never postponed a product because of piracy. Thus, despite such risks, we shall continue enriching the Videha collection. In the parallel stream, a rotten fish does not cause every fish in the pond to rot: the fisherfolk here have removed rotten fish one by one and will continue to do so.

The Final Assault on Syndicated Criticism

Original passage by Dinesh Kumar Mishra (Dui Patan Ke Beech Mein…, 2006): “It is worth noting that between 1923 and 1946, the Kosi region recorded 510,000 deaths from malaria, 210,000 from kala-azar, 60,000 from cholera, and 3,000 from smallpox—a total of 783,000 deaths.”
The plagiarist Pankaj Jha Parashar (member of the Sahitya Akademi's Maithili Advisory Board), Jalprantar (2017), p. 103:

ने अँग्रेज सब आ ने नवका रंगरेज सब। 1923 सँ 1946 के बीच मे कोसी क्षेत्र में मलेरिया
से पाँच लाख दस हजार, कालाजार सँ दू लाख दस हजार, हैजा सँ साठि हजार आ चेचक
सँ तीन हजार लोकक मृत्यु भेल! माने सब मिला कए करीब पौने आठ लाख लोक मरि

English translation of reproduced extract:

“Between 1923 and 1946, 510,000 people died of malaria in the Kosi region, 210,000 of kala-azar, 60,000 of cholera, and 3,000 of smallpox. Taken together, nearly 775,000 people died.”

Original passage by Dinesh Kumar Mishra (Dui Patan Ke Beech Mein…, 2006): “In India, the work of embanking the Kosi River in Bihar was undertaken in the twelfth century by a certain King Lakshman II. For this work his subjects conferred on him the title ‘Bir’, and the river embankment became known as the ‘Bir Bandh’. Remains of this embankment can still be seen about five kilometres south of Bhim Nagar in Supaul district. Dr Francis Buchanan (1810–11) conjectured that the embankment had been an outer wall built to protect a fort, since it extended for thirty-two kilometres along the western bank of the Dhaus River, as far as its confluence with the Tilyuga. Dr W. W. Hunter (1877) disagreed with Buchanan's argument that the embankment was a fortification wall. Reporting local opinion, Hunter said that most people did not regard it as the wall of a fort; they considered it something else, although he was not in a position to say precisely what. Nevertheless, the general impression is that it was an embankment along the Kosi River designed to prevent the river's course from shifting westward. People also said that the construction of this embankment appeared to have been halted abruptly.”

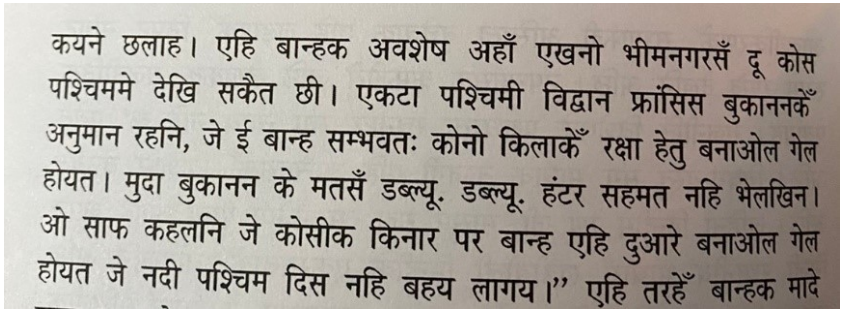
The pseudo-critic Kamalanand Jha praises the plagiarising novelist. See the passage by Pankaj Jha Parashar quoted by Kamalanand Jha in Maithili Upanyas, Samay, Samaj Aa Sawal, pp. 257–58:

पंकज पराशरक पहिल उपन्यास 'जलप्रांतर'(2017) शोधपरक उपन्यास अछि। मैथिलीमे शोधपरक उपन्यास लिखबाक परम्परा नहि रहल अछि। एहि दुआरे ई उपन्यास रेखांकन योग्य अछि। पराशरजी एहि उपन्यासमे कोसी नदीक बान्हक इतिहास-कथा लिखलनि अछि। उपन्यासक वैशिष्ट्य ई जे बारहम शताब्दीसँ ल' क' आधुनिक काल धरि कोसी पर बान्ह बनेबाक दुसाध्य प्रयत्न, प्रशासनिक उठा-पटक, राजनीतिक दाँव-पेंच आदिक विस्तृत व्योरा रोचक कथाक माध्यमसँ कहलनि अछि। ध्यान देबाक बात ई जे सभटा सूचना आ व्योरा अत्यन्त विश्वसनीय बनि पड़ल अछि। पढुआ कक्का आ फूल बाबू सदृश्य पढ़ल-लिखल आ सचेत पात्रक माध्यमसँ लेखक एहि अनुसन्धानकेँ रखलनि अछि। दलान पर बैसल लोकक जिज्ञासाकेँ बढ़बैत पढुआ कका कहैत छथिन, "पहिल बेर बारहम शताब्दीमे लक्ष्मणसेन द्वितीय कोसी नदीक पुबरिया किनार दिस बान्ह बनौलनि। लक्ष्मण सेन द्वितीय बंगाल के सेन वंशक शासक छलाह जे 1178सँ 1205 ई. धरि शासन

मैथिली उपन्यास : समय समाज आ सवाल : 257

English translation of reproduced extract:

"Pankaj Parashar's first novel, Jalprantar (2017), is a research-based novel. There has been no tradition of writing research-based novels in Maithili; for that reason this novel deserves particular attention. In it Parashar tells the history of the embankments along the Kosi River. The novel's special feature is that it presents, through an engaging narrative, detailed accounts of the arduous efforts to build embankments on the Kosi from the twelfth century to modern times, administrative upheavals, political manoeuvring, and much else. What should be noted is that the entire body of information and detail appears extremely credible. Through educated and perceptive characters such as Parhua Kaka and Phool Babu, the writer has incorporated this research into the work. As the people seated in the courtyard become increasingly curious, Parhua Kaka says: 'For the first time, in the twelfth century, Lakshman Sen II built an embankment along the eastern bank of the Kosi. Lakshman Sen II was a ruler of Bengal's Sena dynasty, who ruled from AD 1178 to 1205…'"



कयने छलाह। एहि बान्हक अवशेष अहाँ एखनो भीमनगरसँ दू कोस पश्चिममे देखि सकैत छी। एकटा पश्चिमी विद्वान फ्रांसिस बुकाननकेँ अनुमान रहनि, जे ई बान्ह सम्भवतः कोनो किलाकेँ रक्षा हेतु बनाओल गेल होयत। मुदा बुकानन के मतसँ डब्ल्यू. डब्ल्यू. हंटर सहमत नहि भेलखिन। ओ साफ कहलनि जे कोसीक किनार पर बान्ह एहि दुआरे बनाओल गेल होयत जे नदी पश्चिम दिस नहि बहय लागय।" एहि तरहेँ बान्हक मादे

English translation of reproduced extract:

"'…He ruled during those years. You can still see the remains of this embankment about two kos west of Bhimnagar. A Western scholar, Francis Buchanan, supposed that it may have been built to protect a fort. But W. W. Hunter did not agree with Buchanan. He said plainly that the embankment along the Kosi was probably built to keep the river from flowing westward.' In this way the account continues…"

The plagiarist Pankaj Jha Parashar (member of the Sahitya Akademi's Maithili Advisory Board), Jalprantar (2017), p. 31:

पढ़ुआ कका पछिला गप कें आगाँ बढ़बैत कहलखिन, 'फूल बाबू, कोसी नदीक बेसिन प्राचीन काल सँ मनुक्खक निवास लेल उपयुक्त स्थान रहल अछि। बारहम-तेरहम सदी मे भारत मे जखन कइक टा नदी सुखा गेल, तँ ओहि ठामक पशुचारक समाजक लोक एतय आबि कए बसलाह। तहिये सँ बढ़ैत जनसंख्या आ कोसी नदीक बदलैत प्रवाहक मध्य टकराहटि होमय लागल। नदीक अनियंत्रित धारा कें लोक बाढ़ि बूझय लागल। पहिल बेर बारहम शताब्दी मे लक्ष्मणसेन द्वितीय कोसी नदीक पुबरिया किनार दिस बान्ह बनौलनि। लक्ष्मणसेन द्वितीय बंगाल के सेन वंशक शासक छलाह, जे 1178 सँ 1205 ईस्वी धरि शासन कयनें छलाह। एहि बान्हक अवशेष अहाँ एखनो भीमनगर सँ दू कोस पश्चिम मे देखि सकैत छी। एकटा पश्चिमी विद्वान फ्रांसिस बुकानन के अनुमान रहनि, जे ई बान्ह संभवत: कोनो किला के रक्षा हेतु बनाओल गेल होयत। मुदा बुकानन के मत सँ डब्लू. डब्लू. हंटर सहमत नहि भेलखिन। ओ साफ कहलखिन, जे कोसीक किनार पर बान्ह एहि दुआरे बनाओल गेल होयत, जे नदी पच्छिम दिस नहि बह' लागय।' पढ़ुआ कका सँ मुँहजबानी एतेक रास ऐतिहासिक तथ्य सुनियो कए फूल बाबू सहमति मे मूड़ी नहि डोलेलखिन। जाहि सँ ओतय बैसल लोक सबहक उत्सुकता और बढ़ि गेलनि, जे गप मे एहेन कोन तथ्य रहि गेलै जे फूल बाबू संतुष्ट नहि भेलखिन ? लोक कें बुझेलनि जे फूल बाबू शास्त्रार्थ के अखड़हा पर माटि फेकि रहल छथिन। पढ़ुआ कका कें आइ जोड़ीदार भेटि गेलनि!

जलप्रांतर / 31

English translation of reproduced extract:

"Padua Kaka takes the matter further, saying: 'Phool Babu, in ancient times there were suitable places for human settlement along the Kosi River. In the twelfth and thirteenth centuries, as many rivers in India dried up, many pastoral people began to migrate. With the growing population, people came into conflict with the changing course of the Kosi. The uncontrolled current began to submerge people. It was in the twelfth century that Lakshman Sen II first built an embankment along the Kosi's eastern bank. Lakshman Sen II was a ruler of Bengal's Sena dynasty and ruled from 1178 to 1205. Remains of the embankment can still be seen about two kos west of Bhimnagar. A Western scholar, Francis Buchanan, conjectured that this embankment may have been constructed to protect a fort. But W. W. Hunter did not agree with Buchanan. He stated plainly that the embankment must have been made along the Kosi so that the river would not flow westward.' Hearing Padua Kaka, I found a great many historical facts, but I could not entirely agree with Phool Babu. The people there grew more curious about matters not found in the village; why did Phool Babu not seem satisfied? People forgot that Phool Babu had flung aside the newspaper in anger. Padua Kaka was making his point forcefully!"

Original passage by Dinesh Kumar Mishra (Dui Patan Ke Beech Mein…, 2006): "A glimpse of the terrifying force of the Kosi's current is found in the account of Firoz Shah Tughlaq's army returning to Delhi from Bengal in 1354. It is said that when the Sultan's troops reached the bank of the Kosi, they saw the army of Haji Shamsuddin Ilyas drawn up for battle on the opposite bank. This was the Haji Shamsuddin who founded the towns of Hajipur and Samastipur. Firoz's soldiers appear to have stood perplexed on the bank of the Kosi somewhere near Kursela. The river's speed prevented them from moving forward. It was eventually decided to proceed northwards along the river and test the depth of the water wherever a crossing appeared possible. The Sultan's army went nearly a hundred kos upstream and crossed the river near Jiyaran, at the point where the river descended from the mountains into the plains. Although the channel was narrower there, the current was so strong that heavy stones weighing five hundred man apiece were carried along like straws. At the place where a crossing seemed possible, the Sultan arranged rows of elephants on both sides, with ropes hanging down from the downstream row so that anyone swept away might be rescued by grasping them. Shamsuddin had never imagined the Sultan's forces would cross the Kosi. When he learnt that they had succeeded, he fled."

The plagiarist Pankaj Jha Parashar (member of the Sahitya Akademi's Maithili Advisory Board), Jalprantar (2017), p. 105:

'बेश, तँ सुनू। 1354 मे फिरोजशाह तुगलक के फौज जखन बंगाल सँ दिल्ली घुरि रहल छल, तँ कोसीक प्रवाह बहुत तेज छलै। तुगलकी सेना जखन कोसी के किनार पर पहुँचल, तँ कोसीक ओहि पार मे हाजी शम्सउद्दीन इलियास के सेना तुगलकी सेना सँ मोकाबला करबाक लेल अस्त्र–शस्त्र ल' कए तैयार छल। ई वएह हाजी शम्सउद्दीन छलाह, जे हाजीपुर आ समस्तीपुर नगर बसौने रहथि। फिरोजशाह तुगलक के सेना संभवतः कुरसेला के आस–पास कोसी के तेज धार देखि कए सोच मे पड़ि गेल। पानिक रफ्तार देखि कए तुगलकी सेना कें नदी पार करबाक हिम्मत नहि भ' रहल छलै। अंततः तुगलकी सेनापति तय कयलनि, जे नदीक किनारे–किनार उत्तर दिस बढ़ल जाय। जतय जा कए नदीक पाट कनें कम बूझि पड़य, ओतय पानिक थाह लेल जायत। एहि आशा मे फौज उत्तर दिस बढ़ैत रहल। कुरसेला सँ सय कोस आगाँ गेलाक बाद कोसी के पेट कनें शिकस्त बुझेलै। कोसी ओतहि पहाड़ सँ नीचाँ उतरैत अछि। पानिक वेग के अनुमान एहि सँ कयल जा सकैए, जे पाँच–पाँच सय मनक पाथर कोसी मे खढ़ जकाँ बहि रहल छल। तुगलकी सेनापति कें जतय नदी पार करब कनें आसान बुझेलनि, ओतय एक लाइन मे सैकड़ों टा हाथी कें ठाढ़ क' देल गेल। नीचाँ वला लाइन मे बड़का–बड़का रस्सा लटका देल गेल, जे जँ क्यो पानि मे भासि जायत, रस्सा के मदति सँ निकालि लेल जायत। एहि तरहें फिरोजशाह तुगलकक सेना कोसी पार क' गेल। हाजी शम्सउद्दीन सपनो मे नहि सोचनें छल,जे तुगलकी सेना कोसी पार क' जायत। जखन हाजी शम्सउद्दीन कें पता लगलै जे तुगलकी सेना कोसी पार क' चुकल अछि, तँ ओ डरे सँ पड़ा गेल। तँ एहि कोसीक तेज धार के ल' कए एतेक आत्मविश्वास मे छल हाजी शम्सउद्दीन।'

English translation of reproduced extract:

"'Very well, listen. In 1354, when Firoz Shah Tughlaq's army was returning from Bengal to Delhi, it encountered the frightening force of the Kosi. On reaching the riverbank, the soldiers found Haji Shamsuddin Ilyas's army standing ready to fight on the far side. He was the Haji Shamsuddin who established Hajipur and Samastipur. Firoz Shah's army stood bewildered somewhere near Kursela, for the Kosi's current prevented them from advancing. They decided to march north along the river and look for a place where they might cross. After proceeding roughly a hundred kos, they reached Jiyaran, near the point where the river leaves the mountains for the plains. The channel was narrower, but the current was so fierce that stones weighing five hundred man were swept away like blades of grass. To enable a crossing, the Sultan stationed lines of elephants on both sides and hung ropes from the downstream line so that anyone swept away might be rescued. Haji Shamsuddin had never imagined that the Sultan's army could cross the Kosi; when he learned that it had crossed, he fled.'"

52. The Sahitya Akademi's Maithili Advisory Committee (2023–2028): A Discussion

Abstract

Of the ten members of the renowned Maithili Advisory Committee of the Sahitya Akademi in Delhi (2023–2028), six are Brahmins and one is a neo-Brahminist. Not a single non-upper-caste writer from the parallel literary stream has been included, although these writers have devoted their lives to Maithili for the past fifteen years despite limited financial resources. Nachiketa Ji's advisory committee is an elite body. It will work for the elites among both forward and backward communities; those who are marginalised within literature will remain marginalised, and those who have kept Rajdev Mandal Ji's writings at bay will continue to do so.

Keywords: Akademi · advisory · committee · 2023 · 2028 · discussion · women

Abstract

Of the ten members of the renowned Maithili Advisory Committee of the Sahitya Akademi in Delhi (2023–2028), six are Brahmins and one is a neo-Brahminist. Not a single non-upper-caste writer from the parallel stream has been included, although such writers have devoted their lives to Maithili for the past fifteen years despite limited financial resources. Nachiketa Ji's advisory committee is an elite body. It will work for elites among both forward and backward communities; those who are marginalised within literature will remain marginalised, and those who have kept Rajdev Mandal Ji's writings at bay will continue doing so. This is an alarm bell for the writers of the parallel stream: they will have to work at twice their previous pace.

I

Of the ten members of the renowned Maithili Advisory Committee of the Sahitya Akademi in Delhi (2023–2028), six are Brahmins and one is a neo-Brahminist. Not a single non-upper-caste writer from the parallel stream has been included, although such writers have devoted their lives to Maithili for the past fifteen years despite limited financial resources. Nachiketa Ji's advisory committee is an elite body. It will work for elites among both forward and backward communities; those who are marginalised within literature will remain marginalised, and those who have kept Rajdev Mandal Ji's writings at bay will continue doing so. This is an alarm bell for the writers of the parallel stream: they will have to work at twice their previous pace.

List: Ushakiran Khan, Subhash Chandra Yadav, Pramod Kumar Jha, Devshankar Naveen, Taranand Viyogi, Vidyanand Jha, Raman Kumar Singh, Ajay Jha, Veena Thakur, Nachiketa.

2

The Appreciation and Criticism of Art: Theoretical Considerations

1

The Dancing Girl (!) or the Figure of a Woman (2500 BCE)

The earliest works of art found in India are the objects recovered from the Indus Valley civilisation.

The so-called Dancing Girl (!) or figure of a woman, cast in bronze, was found at Mohenjo-daro. The artist is unknown, but the work represents the artistic accomplishment of Mohenjo-daro at its finest. Roughly four inches high, two inches wide and one inch thick, it is now housed in the Indus Valley Civilisation Gallery of the National Museum, New Delhi.

(Courtesy: Joe Ravi, Wikimedia, CC BY-SA 3.0)

To appreciate this work of art, let us now consider what qualities make it outstanding.

1. It represents a slender, thinly built woman.

2. The woman is standing, her left hand on her left thigh and her right hand at her waist, towards the back.

3. Her eyes are large.

4. Her hair is curly.

5. Her nose is flattened.

6. The woman is nude; only a necklace around her neck and bangles on her arms are visible. She has twenty-four bangles on her left arm but only four on her right.

7. Her combed hair is tied in a bun at the back.

8. Her head is tilted backwards.

9. Her arms appear comparatively long.

This is a representation of a woman: why, then, has it been called a dancing girl? Do you find even a single feature in it identifying the woman as a dancer? The National Museum and history books describe it as a dancing girl. This, I contend, is a consequence of a male-centred mentality, in which even a woman writer such as Romila Thapar—who is a historian rather than an art historian—has become entangled. Such misunderstandings arise despite the study of art history and archaeology.

2

The Dark-Complexioned Princess in the Frescoes of Ajanta (200 BCE–480 CE)

A mural in one of the Ajanta caves—among the oldest examples of painting—portrays an exceptionally beautiful, dark-complexioned princess wearing ornaments, including ornaments in her hair.

3

Khajuraho (950–1050 CE)

[Khārjura (scorpion, Sanskrit vṛścika): an apsarā reveals her thigh, upon which a scorpion is depicted; the name Khajuraho is said here to derive from this.]

Romila Thapar describes the artwork here as escapist art. Even Jayadeva's thirteenth-century Gīta Govinda appears new to Romila. Art historians and archaeologists disagree with her view. The art historian Devangana

Desai argues that the yoni and liṅga were present in non-Aryan civilisations, while Vātsyāyana's Kāmasūtra and Kālidāsa's Kumārasambhava long predate Khajuraho and the Gīta Govinda. She explains that the scorpion is compared to the poison of sexual craving, and that this is the conception represented on the apsarā's thigh.

53. The Mithila Student Union Special Issue: Organisation, Movement and Criticism

Abstract

Despite the so-called literary figures and so-called literary associations of Maithili and Mithila—armed, as it were, with eighty hands apiece and supported by the Sahitya Akademi—and despite the self-proclaimed Mithila leaders and organisations claiming international stature, we decided to publish a special issue devoted to the Mithila Student Union. Our purpose was to identify the difference between activities undertaken merely to create a record and work that genuinely constitutes action. The chief activity of the allegedly caste-bound organisations of Mithila and Maithili, including caste-bound Maithili theatre organisations, is to place garlands around people, publish magazines and commemorative volumes, and conduct similar exercises that merely build a record. Such activities carry no importance in Videha's view.

Keywords: Mithila · Student · Union · special issue · organisation · movement · criticism

Abstract

Despite the so-called literary figures and so-called literary associations of Maithili and Mithila—armed, as it were, with eighty hands apiece and supported by the Sahitya Akademi—and despite the self-proclaimed Mithila leaders and organisations claiming international stature, we decided to publish a special issue devoted to the Mithila Student Union. Our purpose was to identify the difference between activities undertaken merely to create a record and work that genuinely constitutes action. The chief activity of the allegedly caste-bound organisations of Mithila and Maithili, including caste-bound Maithili theatre organisations, is to place garlands around people, publish magazines and commemorative volumes, and conduct similar exercises that merely build a record. Such activities carry no importance in Videha's view. You may add "international" or even "universal" to your organisation's name; that will make no difference to Videha.

Editorial

Despite the so-called literary figures and so-called literary associations of Maithili and Mithila—armed, as it were, with eighty hands apiece and supported by the Sahitya Akademi—and despite the self-proclaimed Mithila leaders and organisations claiming international stature, we decided to publish a special issue devoted to the Mithila Student Union. Our purpose was to identify the difference between activities undertaken merely to create a record and work that genuinely constitutes action. The chief activity of the allegedly caste-bound organisations of Mithila and Maithili, including caste-bound Maithili theatre organisations, is to place garlands around people, publish magazines and commemorative volumes, and conduct similar exercises that merely build a record. Such activities carry no importance in Videha's view. You may add "international" or even "universal" to your organisation's name; that will make no difference to Videha, since these organisations are increasing caste-based rigidity: they are pocket organisations.

A special issue of Videha is not a commemorative volume of praise. Many contributions to the Mithila Student Union special issue also contain numerous criticisms of the Union. Perhaps the organisation (MSU) will make some improvements in light of these criticisms, for it is an organisation, not a pocket organisation; of that there is no doubt.

Language Technology and Modern Communication

54. Language and Technology (Computers, Photography, Keyboards and Typing Techniques), Maithili on the Internet, Writing on the World Wide Web and E-Publishing

Abstract

Google and WordPress offer many ready-made templates for creating blogs, along with apparently unlimited data storage for writing, messages and comments and free web hosting. These blog-building services are user-centred and provide facilities for straightforward writing. But if you wish to construct and manage a website based on Structured Query Language (SQL), this essay will be useful to you.

Keywords: language · technology · computer · photography · keyboard · typing · techniques

Google and WordPress offer many ready-made templates for creating blogs, along with apparently unlimited data storage for writing, messages and comments and free web hosting. These blog-building services are user-centred and provide facilities for straightforward writing. But if you wish to construct and manage a website based on Structured Query Language (SQL), this essay will be useful to you. First I shall explain the procedure for writing Mithilakshar and Devanagari in Unicode and discuss how such writing can be made readable on the internet. Thereafter I shall discuss in detail the methods of constructing websites.

How to Type Devanagari Using a Roman Keyboard

First go to www.bhashaindia.com and download Hindi IME Version 5. Install the program on your computer. Then open Control Panel and select Regional and Language Options; click the Languages tab. Check whether "Install files for complex script and right-to-left languages" has been selected. If not, select it and follow the computer's instructions. Then go again to the Languages tab and click Details. Click Add, choose Hindi as the language and HINDI INDIC IME 1 [V.5.1] as the keyboard, and select Apply. Restart the computer. Now open a Word document. Press the left Alt and Shift keys together; an H will appear as the keyboard indicator. Alternatively, click the language indicator below and select Hindi. The available keyboard choices include Hindi transliteration, Remington, InScript and other layouts. Select a layout and begin typing.

With the transliteration keyboard, to type राम you must type "raama". To produce क्, with its halant, press "k" and click the left mouse button; otherwise, pressing the space bar or Enter will cause the halant to disappear.

Wikipedia had an article about Maithili but no articles written in Maithili, since a Maithili Wikipedia had not yet received approval. I had been working on this for a long time, and permission to begin a wiki in the Maithili language was obtained on 27 October 2008. I had translated many English computer terms during the localisation of terminology, and this increased both my interest and my involvement in the work.

Another software tool for typing in Devanagari is available at http://www.baraha.com/BarahaIME.htm. Its distinctive feature is a Sanskrit keyboard, something not available in other software tools. It provides udātta, anudātta, svarita and certain other Sanskrit characters, although it does not provide such forms as svastika, gvāṅ and añjī. After typing स, the forms सं, सॅ, से and सऽ can be made by pressing Shift with 3, 2, 4 and 7 respectively.

To write the Tirhuta script, visit the following link:

http://www.tirhutalipi.4t.com/

For this, however, download and copy the Preeti font available through that link and place both items in C:/Windows/Fonts on the hard-disk drive. The font used here is ASCII-based. Kruti Dev and Shusha are of the same kind. They were useful earlier, but search engines now search Unicode UTF-8 text, and Devanagari written using ASCII fonts cannot be found by such searches. Windows includes the Mangal typeface, which uses Unicode, and Devanagari written with it can be searched. An application for the Unicode encoding of Mithilakshar, submitted by Anshuman Pandey, is pending. I too contributed to it at the request of Professor Deborah Anderson of the University of California, Berkeley, Project Leader of the Script Encoding Initiative in the Department of Linguistics, UC Berkeley.

Now a few points about Unicode and websites.

To read a file, the required font must be installed on the computer. Otherwise, the simplest solution is to convert an article written in a word processor—a Word document—into a PDF file. This has both advantages and disadvantages. The advantage is that the PDF can be read in whatever typeface or script it has been written, without the problem of installing fonts. The disadvantage is that if you select "Save as Text", the English will be saved, but the Devanagari may be saved in a form that cannot be read. Another problem sometimes arises when a document typed in the Unicode Mangal font is converted into PDF using Adobe Acrobat: घ with a halant and sometimes ज appear as unreadable rectangular boxes. In that case, open the entire file, select everything, choose "Universal Unicode MS" from the font drop-down menu, and then select Adobe Acrobat as the printer under Print. The file will then be converted into PDF.

A direct method of converting Microsoft Word to PDF is to choose File and then Print, select Acrobat Distiller as the printer and issue the print command. Sometimes, however, no PDF document is produced. In that case, select Acrobat Distiller, open Properties, and select Adobe PDF Settings. There you will find the option "Do not send fonts to Distiller" checked; uncheck it. Exit the settings and issue the print command. A PDF document will now be created. With PDF splitting and merging software—for example, the freeware PDF Helper or SAM—you can easily join and divide PDF files.

Before constructing a website, consider a few essential matters. There are five kinds of internet browsers, on which the others are based. First install all five on your computer:

1. Opera; 2. Mozilla; 3. Microsoft's Internet Explorer (which will already be there); 4. Google Chrome; and 5. Apple's Safari (formerly available only for Macintosh, but now also for Windows). Whenever you upload a webpage —or even before uploading it—make sure to open and examine it in all these browsers.

Baraha IME has made a distinctive contribution to Devanagari typing. It enables the writing of Sanskrit udātta, anudātta and svarita accents, modifications, Devanagari numerals and some musical notation. It includes notation for the lower octave, and for sharp and flat notes (tīvra and komal). The vowels ऋ, ॠ, ऌ, ॡ, ऍ and ऎ, as well as joining after अ and the sign ~ with a halant, are available. Anudātta क̱, udātta क॑ and svarita के are also provided. It works with Windows Vista and, because it uses Unicode fonts, the result is readable on the internet.

The alphabet runs from अ to ह. Although क्ष, त्र and ज्ञ are conjunct letters, from childhood we have been taught the alphabet as extending from अ to ज्ञ. श्र, too, is a conjunct like क्ष, त्र and ज्ञ. For this reason we pronounce ज्ञ as though it were a combination of ग and य, but that is wrong: it is a combination of ज and ञ. We pronounce ऋ as "ri", and we pronounce ऌ as a combination of ल, र and ई. Yet ऋ and ऌ are independent vowels, not conjunct letters. The Videha archive provides the pronunciation of every letter from अ to ज्ञ in recognition of the need for accurate pronunciation. The use of the international form of Indian numerals has become customary in Devanagari. Article 343(1) of the Indian Constitution stipulates that the form of numerals used for the official purposes of the Union shall be the international form of Indian numerals. The President, however, may also authorise the Devanagari form of numerals.

Download the TBIL Converter from http://www.bhashaindia.com. To convert from another font to Mangal, select a .doc document, choose Hindi as the input language and the relevant font as the ASCII font. For the output, select Hindi as the language and Unicode Mangal as the font. Browse for the file and select it. If you have Office 2007 and the Word document has a .docx extension, rename the extension .doc; the document will then appear in Browse. If you do not have Office 2007, renaming it will serve no purpose. Now click Convert: a new file will be created in the Unicode Mangal font. If your Word document contains a mixture of Unicode and ASCII fonts, select the ASCII font approximately, or the one used most frequently. Click Convert and it will be converted into Unicode Mangal.

Website Construction

First purchase a domain name from a reputable online organisation. For example, visit Rediff.com and click Rediff Hosting. Go to "Book Your Domain" and check whether the name you want is available. You can buy a suitable domain name for your website online with a credit card. It is inexpensive, costing at most ten dollars a year. Then go to the web-hosting link. Obtain hosting space of 100 MB for five or ten years. A MySQL service comes free with it, but that requires working with Linux, which may be somewhat difficult or technical; therefore you may purchase a Microsoft SQL service for a little extra money. You will then have a 20 MB SQL database and 80 MB of space for the site—a total of 100 MB—which is sufficient. More space can be arranged without charge, as will be discussed later. Once you have obtained the Microsoft SQL service, you can upload your Microsoft Excel file and use it by building an interface on your website.

Now let us consider the procedure for creating a website.

Microsoft FrontPage comes with Office XP. It is also available separately with Office 2003.

Run the ready-made Website Wizard in FrontPage. A website of approximately five pages will be created. By right-clicking on the left side, you can increase the number of pages. You can also choose a ready-made design of your liking from the themes at the top. Using the Photo element, you can turn any webpage into a photo gallery and arrange photographs in three, four, five or six columns. Double-click on that page to import photographs from your computer and type descriptions with a Unicode typewriter. When saving the page, you can choose a JPEG image quality from 1 to 100. The larger the file, the more space it will occupy. After choosing the "Children" setting for the links on the left and at the bottom, information on all the website's pages will appear there. If there are many pages, you can create a sequence of pages within a page. Your website is now saved on your computer under My Documents/My Web.

Use the Preview option to examine the actual appearance of your website in the five browsers described above. After making the necessary changes in FrontPage, upload the site to your server. For this, visit FileZilla.com, which provides free software. Choose Client rather than Server and install the program on your computer. Then enter your username and password and upload the entire website to the server's root folder at ftp.yourdomainname. The website will then appear on the internet at its designated address.

Upload your database to the server by means of software such as EMS SQL Manager, and obtain any specialised information required by speaking to your service provider by telephone. Once all the material has been uploaded, do not forget to place your username and password in the HTML code of the interface page created on your website.

To add music to a page, import a music file from your computer onto that page. At present, however, music on a website made with FrontPage plays only in Opera and Internet Explorer.

Now a few remarks about page stylesheets.

If you wish to keep the entire website's design in one colour scheme, create a .css stylesheet for all the pages and place the design in one folder. It may also include music that plays in the background. The advantage is that the design need not be loaded anew whenever each page is opened: only the initial loading of the design and music takes time. The only additional time spent on another page is that required for the text, photographs and other content on it. The website thus becomes lighter and opens faster.

Now let us learn about RSS feeds.

The website has been built; now it must also be publicised. RSS is the abbreviation of "Really Simple Syndication". Create one or more .xml files and upload them to your server. These then serve, in a sense, as a map of the website. Whenever a change occurs, the feed reader or aggregator is notified that new content has appeared. The feed contains summaries of major events, articles and other material, together with links. Clicking a link yields more detailed information. By supplying the address of an .xml page under Add Gadget/Feed in a blog, you can display updates for five to twenty new items (respectively on Google and WordPress blogs). RSS has other uses: notifying subscribers by email through FeedBurner, displaying a headline animator on a website or blog, emailing a link to desired material to a friend, and reading through a browser or a feed/news reader.

Next submit your website to Google, Yahoo Search, Live Search and Ask.com under "Submit Your Site" so that these search engines can find it. The web address of an .xml file makes it easier for these engines to find the material, providing free publicity for your site. An .xml file does not replace an .htm file; it helps feed aggregators and search engines discover new material. When you change your website, amend the original .xml file and upload it to your server; the feed aggregators and search engines will do the rest. Your internet browser can also refresh the website page if you select the feed option, since at times the browser displays older internet content from temporary files stored on the computer. For this, however, a code must be inserted on every page.

Now a few words about the 404 error page. If someone enters the address of a photograph or link that used to exist on your website but no longer does, the browser displays a 404 error. Obtain the configuration details from your service provider and create an error page to match your website's stylesheet. It should contain a personal message such as "The material you are looking for is no longer available" and links to other pages of the site. But take care to include code on that page preventing search engines from indexing it.

You can place the girgit.chitthajagat.in or Google Translate gadget on your website so that Maithili material can be converted into other scripts or languages with a single click.

Promote the site by creating your own blog or group. For online comment submissions, obtain the .NET facility from your service provider, so that the server can send readers' comments to your email address. You can increase readership by registering your feed with feed aggregators.

Comment submissions can also be obtained from TypePad.com, a paid blogging service; it charges for blogs but not for creating a profile, and provides both code and facilities for comment forms on blogs and websites. You can choose how many comments appear on a page, allow conversations in response to comments, and select comment-moderation options.

For your website's archive, Google Sites and WordPress provide 10 GB and 3 GB of free space respectively. Upload files there but place links to them on your own site. This helps you control your budget.

If you do not like your blog's URL, a customised URL is available for ten dollars annually, though this brings no additional facilities beyond those of the blog itself. If your budget is very small, however, use this option.

If you already have a full website, you can upload a discussion forum and similar facilities to one of its pages by FTP, and incorporate a blog into the site. Under Publishing in Blogger, both the ten-dollar-a-year URL facility and FTP upload are available.

Now let us discuss favicons. To display your logo beside the browser address, create an image of the logo in .ico format and upload it, specifying its location in the stylesheet. If you obtain the ten-dollar-a-year customised URL through Google under Blogger's Publishing section, the Google favicon will appear. In WordPress, however, you can use your own favicon both on an ordinary blog and on a blog with a customised domain name.

You can also publicise your e-journal through email signatures, MySpace, Facebook, Orkut, Twitter, YouTube, Picasa, Yahoo Groups and Google Groups, as well as RSS feeds and a headline animator, which can also be placed in an email signature.

Use Google Analytics and Webmaster Tools as well. Add the Analytics tracking code to every page so that you can learn each day who visited the website, where they came from and how they arrived. Verify the website through Webmaster Tools and submit the .xml file.

If you want a photograph or link on a page to open in another tab or browser window, select Target Frame/New Window—Blank.

When a PDF is saved as text, the Devanagari is sometimes not saved as Unicode—or as any readable text at all. If you copy text from a PDF and paste it into Uninagari, the Devanagari appears. An ASCII converter can also convert PDF text into Unicode, though the formatting is lost.

Among font converters, the SIL Converter is a free software tool that does not destroy the formatting.

C-DAC Pune also provides tools and fonts, but no particular benefit is apparent; instead, numerous problems arise, such as "द् ध" and "ग् र" appearing in place of द्ध and ग्र respectively.

An online Unicode typewriter is available on the Videha e-journal website, http://www.videha.co.in/. If you encounter particular difficulties or want an offline version, you can email me at ggajendra@videha.com to request it or ask further questions.

55. The Internet and Maithili

Abstract

The aim of electronic publishing on the internet should be to establish a forum that creates a medium between writer and reader, available from anywhere twenty-four hours a day, seven days a week. Publication should be regular, bringing an end to distribution difficulties and geographical distance. As a further consequence of the revolution in information technology, it should also provide a forum for a new generation of readers and writers alongside the older ones.

Keywords: internet · critical theory · Maithili

Background

The aim of electronic publishing on the internet should be to establish a forum that creates a medium between writer and reader, available from anywhere twenty-four hours a day, seven days a week. Publication should be regular, bringing an end to distribution difficulties and geographical distance. As a further consequence of the revolution in information technology, it should also provide a forum for a new generation of readers and writers alongside the older ones. I began bringing Maithili onto the internet in 2000, through Yahoo GeoCities in 2000–2001, but all those sites were deleted when Yahoo discontinued the service. "Bhalsarik Gachh", created on 5 July 2004 and still available at http://www.videha.com/2004/07/bhalsarik-gachh.html, remains as an early manifestation of Maithili's presence on the internet. Initially, websites used ASCII fonts such as Kruti Dev and Shusha. They were useful then, but search engines now search Unicode UTF-8, and Devanagari typed in ASCII fonts is not searchable. Windows includes the Unicode Mangal font, and Devanagari written in it can be searched. The application for the Unicode form of Mithilakshar, submitted by Anshuman Pandey, remains pending. I too contributed at the request of Professor Deborah Anderson of UC Berkeley, Project Leader of the Script Encoding Initiative, Department of Linguistics. At first both readers and writers were few, but as Unicode-based search engines were developed by Google, Live and Ask.com, the number of Maithili readers and writers on the internet grew.

Maithili and the Internet

Here one finds everything: literature, news, Maithili audio, Maithili video, Mithila painting and electronic Maithili books.

Creating a Website in Maithili

First buy a domain name from a reputable online organisation. For example, visit Rediff.com and click Rediff Hosting. Choose "Book Your Domain" and check whether your preferred name is available. You can buy a suitable domain name for your website online by credit card. It is inexpensive: its maximum price is ten dollars a year. Then follow the link for web-hosting services. Obtain 100 MB of hosting space for five or ten years. MySQL comes free with it, but that requires working on Linux, which may be somewhat difficult or technical, so you can obtain Microsoft SQL for an additional fee. You will then have a 20 MB SQL database and 80 MB of website space, making 100 MB in all, which is sufficient. Having obtained Microsoft SQL, you can upload a Microsoft Excel file there and use it through an interface you create on the website. An online, SQL-based searchable dictionary also exists—the Videha Dictionary. For this, the database is uploaded to the server by software such as EMS SQL Manager, and an interface is provided on a website page.

Now let us consider how to create the website. Microsoft FrontPage comes with Office XP and is also available separately with Office 2003. Run the ready-made Website Wizard in FrontPage; it will create a website of about five pages. By right-clicking on the left, you can increase the number of pages. You may choose a ready-made design from the themes above. Using the Photo element, you can convert a webpage into a photo gallery and arrange pictures in three, four, five or six columns.

Google and WordPress offer many ready-made templates for creating blogs, with apparently unlimited data storage for writing, messages and comments and free hosting. These blog-building services are user-centred and provide facilities for straightforward writing.

Advantages and Disadvantages

The internet enables the rapid transmission of information, but its misuse may be even more likely than its proper use—particularly comments posted under assumed names through different internet service providers and attempts at blackmail. There are methods of exposing such activities, but pursuing them also wastes energy. Where internet speeds are low or access is expensive, material can be collected in PDF form. Readers can download the files, save them on their computers and read them when convenient. A computer must have the necessary font to read a file; otherwise, the simplest course is to convert a word-processed article into PDF. This has both benefits and drawbacks. The benefit is that a PDF can be read without the difficulty of installing fonts, regardless of the typeface or script in which it was written. The drawback is that if "Save as Text" is used, English may be saved correctly while Devanagari becomes unreadable.

The internet has proved a blessing for Maithils living away from their homeland. It is remarkable how children and women, and readers and writers from communities other than Maithil Brahmins and Karna Kayasthas, have joined this Maithili activity.

Here, too, work is being done against the slow poisoning inflicted upon Maithili. There will be no compromise in Maithili's name: genuine Maithili readers, not self-serving coteries. These are not magazines without readers, locked in quarrels born of personal ambition, dying themselves while killing Maithili. Of course, caste-based quarrels and abusive language have also been observed on some Maithili blogs, and their perpetrators are people driven by personal ambition. Literary works published electronically on the internet receive the affection and online comments of thousands upon thousands of readers. National surveys show that those who fail to obtain admission to other subjects are the ones who study Sanskrit, Hindi, Maithili and other literatures in colleges; the same people also enter journalism. Such talent-poor devotees of literature have developed a taste for it: can the future of Maithili safely rest in their hands? The internet has intervened in a situation in which Maithili was dying from the rival ambitions of a narrow group of competitors—formidable competitors, indeed! There is an abundance of science fiction, stories and poems for children and adolescents. The gentle rises and falls of Mithila's language, the many-sided abilities of its proletarian classes, along with the region's rigidities of custom and culture, politics, everyday life, social beliefs, economic conditions, ethics, religion and philosophy—all are present here. Unedited compositions posted on blogs disprove the notion that only Maithil Brahmins can write good Maithili. Writers and readers other than Maithil Brahmins and Karna Kayasthas provide a model before Maithil readers and writers, showing that their objections were not mistaken: Maithili had been written incorrectly. Maithili literature is thus saved from becoming one-sided. The movement from the internet to print is also simple, because the publisher receives ready-made material and saves expense.

The Future of Maithili on the Internet

When the printing press first arrived, it was labelled the property of the bourgeois class. The novel, too, arose with the press and was regarded as bourgeois literature, but gradually that notion disappeared. Internet literature will likewise remain a complement to printed literature. Those who do not wish to read on a computer screen will read the text in print.

Print-on-demand facilities are also provided by Pothi.com and other websites and publishers.

For Maithili, the regularity of publication made possible by the internet, the elimination of distribution difficulties, virtually zero cost and the overcoming of geographical distance have proved a blessing.

56. Self-Image, Language Technology and Inclusive Communication

Abstract

Fashion an image of yourself that good people can love—an image of someone capable and diligent. Yet as we move forward and time passes, the inner image of many among us begins to deteriorate. This happens when we pay attention to what other people think or say about us. They may offer their pretended knowledge, or at times even genuine knowledge—information, one might say. But can they give us our own self-image or ability? No; more often they do the opposite.

Keywords: self · language · technology · inclusive · communication · also · signs

Editorial for the New Issue

Fashion an image of yourself that good people can love—an image of someone capable and diligent.

Is receiving awards and payment a measure of success? And is a lifetime of standing firm, like Subhash Chandra Yadav and Sushil, and paying the price for it a success or a failure?

The internet, too, is full of dangers. Neither manufacture nor spread fake news, and protect yourself from online criminals.

Do not intimidate or harass those younger or weaker than yourself. If someone does this to you, lodge a complaint against them.

Welcome only that development which does not destroy the environment. Plant ten times as many trees as you cut down.

Working alone can be frightening—even on the smallest task. Yet companionship and support will not always be available: neither people nor assistance can always be at your side.

Forget the past, whether it was good or bad.

It is not good to lose one's life for the sake of laughter and joking.

Chemical substances used in fields pollute the environment. Crops grown with organic inputs, without chemicals, are healthier and tastier.

Live simply, in a way that does not harm the environment; remain connected to nature.

Live in fellowship with one another—not with human beings alone, but with livestock, birds, all creatures, nature and streams.

And if this is how you live, understand that you belong to the parallel stream. You are welcome.

We should all read widely and keep learning new things.

Maithili Sign Language (Devanagari / Mithilakshar / Kaithi / Newari)

Maithili Sign Script (Sign Language)

Maithili sign script is a sign language for deaf and speech-impaired people.

American Sign Language (ASL) developed in the United States and British Sign Language (BSL) in Britain; both are used in many places around the world. ASL chiefly uses one hand, whereas BSL frequently uses both hands.

Sign scripts have also been developed in India and Nepal.

The sign language of India is called Indian Sign Language (ISL). The Indian Sign Language Research and Training Centre (http://www.islrtc.nic.in/) works on its development, standardisation and teaching. The ISL dictionary and some NCERT books in sign language are available through this link: https://www.youtube.com/@islrtcnewdelhi4069/playlists.

For Devanagari, which is based on the ka–ca–ṭa–ta–pa consonant classes, Ramesh M. Kagalkar (http://rameshkagalkar.appspot.com) developed a system in Marathi, while the Nepal National Federation of the Deaf & Hard of Hearing (NFDH) did so in Nepali. At the Empower Conference 2021, Amal Jude Ashwin, Sunil Kumar Kopparapu and V. Srinivasa Chakravarthy presented their conception for Tamil and other Indic scripts.

Schools for deaf and speech-impaired pupils generally teach something close to American Sign Language, but Indic scripts can be represented more effectively through British Sign Language. Maithili sign script (in Devanagari, Mithilakshar, Kaithi and Newari—all four based on the ka–ca–ṭa–ta–pa consonant classes) is based on British Sign Language (BSL) and uses both hands.

Sign-Language Videos

Sign script cannot be learned from books alone. NCERT has released sign-language videos in twenty-two languages. Links for Maithili, Nepali, Marathi and Tamil appear below; links for all the remaining languages are supplied at the end of this book.

Maithili: https://youtu.be/J03T3E20JRM

Nepali: https://youtu.be/9_A3EK_fV24

Marathi: https://youtu.be/93BVVsJVUks

Tamil: https://youtu.be/6ecBHlL_Hu4

These videos have the following features:

1. They also contain sound, and are therefore useful not only to deaf and speech-impaired viewers but also to other people, including those with visual disabilities.

2. The videos use sign script in conjunction with the audio.

3. Transcripts also appear in the videos, with Hindi and English translations alongside the language concerned. At https://ncert.nic.in/bs-2021.php, PDF files for all twenty-two languages are also available. Besides Hindi and English translations, the text in each language's own script is given in Devanagari and Roman transcription.

Sign-Language Dictionary

The sign-language dictionary is available at http://www.islrtc.nic.in/.

RESOURCES:

ISL project of the Indian Sign Language Research and Training Centre: http://www.islrtc.nic.in/

ISLRTC YouTube channel—ISL dictionary and selected NCERT books: https://www.youtube.com/@islrtcnewdelhi4069/playlists

Ramesh M. Kagalkar: http://rameshkagalkar.appspot.com

Nepal National Federation of the Deaf & Hard of Hearing (NFDH)

Empowering persons with speech and hearing disabilities through a unified finger-spelling method for Indic scripts—https://empower2021.iiitb.ac.in/paper2021/. Authors: (1) Amal Jude Ashwin F., Bhupat & Jyoti Mehta School of Biosciences, Department of Biotechnology, IIT Madras, India; (2) Sunil Kumar Kopparapu, TCS Research, Tata Consultancy Services Limited, India; (3) V. Srinivasa Chakravarthy, Bhupat & Jyoti Mehta School of Biosciences, Department of Biotechnology, IIT Madras, India.

Sign-language videos in twenty-two languages:
https://www.youtube.com/@videha_ejournal (courtesy: Bhasha Sangam—https://ncert.nic.in/bs-2021.php)

Maithili: https://youtu.be/J03T3E20JRM

Nepali: https://youtu.be/9_A3EK_fV24

Marathi: https://youtu.be/93BVVsJVUks

Konkani: https://youtu.be/gTjPY_ebTfU

Gujarati: https://youtu.be/kEVuF08mYuM

Sanskrit: https://youtu.be/IU60_0NSckQ

Bangla: https://youtu.be/JTr0w8vVTtA

Assamese: https://youtu.be/MpX9d-NI7dg

Odia: https://youtu.be/XROIdeGqnXk

Santali: https://youtu.be/3lxtfz3_R-c

Hindi: https://youtu.be/2PoOrwsnY88

Urdu: https://youtu.be/6UWTq5Z9U2c

Punjabi: https://youtu.be/gWw4IQFCZ2w

Dogri: https://youtu.be/DPKtPI9qJbY

Kashmiri: https://youtu.be/vIVr4E5H-6c

Bodo: https://youtu.be/DhRLfc-uWLA

Sindhi: https://youtu.be/SJAmLreMz4s

Tamil: https://youtu.be/6ecBHlL_Hu4

Malayalam: https://youtu.be/nW9e5eO6a_E

Kannada: https://youtu.be/U0SdbM9Qs1w

Telugu: https://youtu.be/_Gz1Sudph3Q

Manipuri: https://youtu.be/WBHcO-wShJk

2

ॾ

Keyman Tirhuta / Vedic Sanskrit Keyboard for Windows / Mac OS / Linux Ubuntu-Wasta / Linux Debian / Android / Apple iPhone–iPad / Web

ॐ द्यौ. षान्ठिवन्ठेविऋ॑ षान्ठिः

ॐ द्यौः शान्तिरन्तरिक्ष ग्वंग शान्तिः

I.

FOR WINDOWS DESKTOP

For Windows, go to: https://keyman.com/windows/download.php

OR

To search for a Tirhuta keyboard, go to: https://keyman.com/keyboards?q=tirhuta

If you are comfortable with the Remington/Inscript keyboard, download the "Tirhuta" keyboard from https://downloads.keyman.com/windows/stable/16.0.138/keyman-setup.tirhuta.exe?_ga=2.26983796.856782072.1678802904-87949676.1676042074. It uses the "Mithila Uni" font. If you prefer phonetic typing, download the "Malar Tirhuta" keyboard from https://downloads.keyman.com/windows/stable/16.0.138/keyman-setup.malar_tirhuta.exe?_ga=2.26983796.856782072.1678802904-87949676.1676042074. It uses the "Noto Sans Tirhuta" font.

For a Vedic Sanskrit phonetic keyboard: https://downloads.keyman.com/windows/stable/16.0.138/keyman-setup.itrans_devanagari_sanskrit_vedic.exe?_ga=2.267216455.856782072.1678802904-87949676.1676042074

II.

FOR APPLE MAC OS

For a Mac, go to https://keyman.com/mac/download.php and download the software.

III.

FOR LINUX DESKTOP

For Linux: https://keyman.com/linux/download.php

IV.

FOR ANDROID PHONES

On an Android phone, open the Google Play Store and download the Keyman app; details: https://keyman.com/android/

V.

FOR APPLE iPHONE / iPAD (iOS)

On your phone or tablet, open the Apple App Store and download the Keyman app; details: https://keyman.com/iphone-and-ipad/

VI.

FOR AN ONLINE WEB TYPEWRITER

Go to: https://keymanweb.com/

VIDEHA: The First Fortnightly Maithili E-Journal · ISSN 2229-547X

http://videha.co.in/

I

Ramchandra Ray, Known as Ramu Sir, and His Collection of Short and Long Stories, Sapna Sakar

In the story "Tohī Jitlē, Hamhī Hāralaũ" ("You Won, I Lost") from Sapna Sakar, the collection of short and long stories by Ramchandra Ray, popularly known as Ramu Sir, we encounter people of the so-called upper castes and other castes living together. Naveen's parents intend to complete the kaubala-pati transaction from his first salary; then an inter-caste love story unfolds. As often happens in a love affair, an abduction complaint is filed here too. But Nunu Bhaiya eventually agrees. It will not take anyone long to recognise the autobiographical element in Sapna Sakar. There is also a new way of removing a ceremonial garland worn around the neck, and a pledge by eleven young men against ritualism and death-feasts. The collection encompasses a woman's life cast aside, mental illness and much else. The woman dismissed as mad was not mad at all. In her parental home she had been considered fortunate; after marriage, however...

The finest stories in the collection, however, are the long stories "Nirvāsit Jīvan" ("Exiled Life") and "Budhni Māik Bethā" ("Budhni Mother's Pain").

In "Budhni Māik Bethā", the presence of women at the panchayat meeting is heartening; at the same time, the description does not omit Budhni Mother's dilapidated house built under the Indira Awas scheme. There is suspense: Budhni Mother is about to reveal the name. Charan Babu rebukes her: how could she remain alive after committing such a sin? The young men should burn her alive. Budhni begins: "My respects to all the panchas!" If I am lying, may lightning strike my body, may my limbs fail me. Does this recall Sita entering the earth? During the flood the embankment broke. She survived by washing the householders' pots and utensils for wages, but even that work was denied her. Yet, on her way here, she had seen Jagat... Without carrying out any inquiry, the panchas declare that Jagat had made her an illegitimate mother and leave. In the face of Jagat's influence, hardly anyone dares speak. Late at night the mother and daughter, at the urging of three young men, set out for the police station, but Jagat's influence reaches even there. Yet still... The police, however, belong to no one—not even their own father. Some young men provide a ray of hope. Budhni Mother will give birth to the child. She does not understand DNA, but she knows that there is some sort of test and that the test will prove Jagat to be the father.

"Nirvāsit Jīvan" is also an accomplished long story. Its first distinctive feature is its use of human irony, which the storyteller captures so well. A theft in Bharamwali's house! Had the thief's own cleverness been stolen? Bharamwali Bhabhi, however, understands that this is no theft: someone is deliberately making trouble for her. On hearing this, Bhutkun Bhai becomes impatient to hear her story.

A second distinguishing feature of this long story is its close observation and recording of everyday human life. Bhutkun can go there on the pretext of discussing earthwork, but Bhabhi's house has no front verandah; how could he walk straight into the courtyard? Bhabhi blushes to see men relieving themselves along the edge of the open fields, although the men themselves feel no embarrassment. But what if a woman were to do the same? There is the sting of a male-dominated society. Yet women have now advanced in education, and the government has granted them half the reservations.

The third distinctive feature is the author's wealth of vocabulary, indispensable to recording the life of Bharamwali Bhabhi.

"Nirvāsit Jīvan" and "Budhni Māik Bethā" possess a novelistic breadth, and in Ramu Sir I see a future novelist for Maithili.

2

The 112th Sagar Rati Deep Jaray Held at Sahuria–Navtoli

The 112th Sagar Rati Deep Jaray literary gathering devoted to short fiction was held on Saturday, 25 March 2023, at the Abhinav Shiksha Niketan campus in Sahuria–Navtoli, within Shiva Panchayat near Andhrabazar in Madhubani district. The event was convened by the well-known storyteller Shri Ramchandra Ray, also known as Ramu Sir. It was inaugurated through the joint lighting of the ceremonial lamp by Dr Rampreet Paswan, former Minister of the Public Health Engineering Department of the Bihar Government; Dr Kamalkant Jha and Shri Jagdish Prasad Mandal, recipients of Sahitya Akademi awards for 2020 and 2021 respectively; Dr Dhanakar Thakur, President of the International Maithili Literary Council; Shri Arvind Prasad, Secretary of the Progressive Writers' Association, Madhubani; Shri Brahmanand Prasad, advocate of the Delhi High Court; and senior writer Shri Ramshreshtha Diwana. The guests seated on the dais were honoured with garlands and new garments, and Shri Ramchandra Ray, who conducted the inaugural session, took the programme forward. First, Sushri Shashiprabha and Sushri Chanda Kumari presented a welcome song. Thereafter I (Umesh Mandal), in my welcome address, briefly introduced this journey of storytelling undertaken by Sagar Rati Deep Jaray. I said that among the many forums dedicated to the development of Maithili literature, this alone is a platform that places no restriction on anyone's attendance. For the development of Maithili fiction, Sagar Rati Deep Jaray is regarded as a workshop for storytellers and critics. As the inaugural session continued, ten books across different genres were released. A distinguished presidium was then constituted for the storytelling session, bringing to the dais Sahityashri Pritam Kumar Nishad, Shri Ram Vilas Sahu, Dr Shiv Kumar Prasad, Professor Rameshwar Prasad Mandal, Shri Kapileshwar Raut, Shri Umesh Narayan Karn and Pandit Shiv Kumar Mishra. Shri Narayan Yadav, Shri Durganand Mandal, Shri Baijnathi Ram and Shri Nand Vilas Ray were also invited to conduct the all-night session. Along with honouring everyone, each storyteller and critic was presented with a new garment and flower garland. Across successive rounds, thirty-four stories were read and, as in previous gatherings, the readings were followed by critical commentary. At six in the morning, the lamp and the register were handed over to the next convenor, Shri Narayan Yadav. On receiving them, Yadav announced that the next lamp of Sagar Rati Deep Jaray would be lit in the village of Nahri (Khutauna) on the last Saturday of June.

Details of the books released and stories read on the occasion follow.

Books released: 1. Sapna Sakar (short-story collection)—Shri Ramchandra Ray (Ramu Sir); 2. Upayan (poetry collection)—Shri Rajkishor Mishra; 3. Jagdish Prasad Mandal: Ek Jivani (biography)—Shri Rameshwar Prasad Mandal; 4. Nachi Rahal Chhali Vasudha (novel)—Shri Rabindra Narayan Mishra; 5. Antardhvani (story anthology)—Dr Umesh Mandal; 6. Jagdish P. Mandal Maithili Writer—Shri Gajendra Thakur; 7. Sehanta Sehante Rahi Gel (short-story collection)—Shri Jagdish Prasad Mandal; 8. Sunayana Beti (novel)—Shri Jagdish Prasad Mandal; 9. Mithila Saput Dr Gurmaita—Dr Kamalkant Jha; 10. Mobilek Lila (personal essays)—Dr Kamalkant Jha.

Story Readings

1. Ghatait–Barhait Chanda Mama—Divya Chandra; 2. Gobar Bichhni—Narayan Yadav; 3. Ghi Ketay Herael Ta Dalime—Nand Vilas Ray; 4. Bahuguni Roti—Janak Lal Mandal; 5. Dekhalapar Dekhab—Pallavi Mandal; 6. Time Pass—Dhanakar Thakur; 7. Parhab Kena—Ravibhushan Kumar; 8. Madhumachhi a Machhi—Ram Vilas Sahu; 9. Mobile School—Chandra Mohan Acharya; 10. Kahbi Phel—Kamalkant Jha; 11. Burkawali —Umesh Narayan Karn; 12. Charim Katha—Manab Anish Mandal; 13. Chakbidor—Rameshwar Prasad Mandal; 14. Dinosaur Hebas Banchau—Arvind Prasad; 15. Premak Rishta—Durganand Mandal; 16. Parchhanhi—Jholi Paswan; 17. Purana Sweater—Ritik Kumar; 18. Asal Chor Ke—Dr Veena Prasad; 19. Sahodar—Kumar Sunil Narayan; 20. Maik Mamta—Jagdish Mandal; 21. Televisionak Musalman—Ram Naresh Yadav; 22. Sanesak Gachh—Radhakant Mandal; 23. Appan Aasa—Pritam Kumar Nishad; 24. Gobar Karhni—Kapileshwar Raut; 25. Das Varshak Bad—Umesh Mandal; 26. Sthanak Mahatva—Shiv Kumar Mishra; 27. Aamak

Khetime Gayak Yogdan—Bechan Thakur; 28. Bhagwan Bhukhale Na Rakhay Chhathi—Gauri Shankar Sah; 29. Kanphuski—Santosh Kumar Ray; 30. Parishramak Phal—Parmanand Kumar Ray; 31. Babujiak Arman —Satyanarayan Vyas; 32. Dalit Majdur—Baijnathi Ram; 33. Shortcut Rasta —Jagdish Prasad Mandal; 34. Nashamukta Gam—Ramchandra Ray (Ramu Sir).

The Storytelling Journey of Sagar Rati Deep Jaray: From the First to the 112th Gathering

1. Muzaffarpur — 21.01.1990; Prabhas Kumar Chaudhary.

2. Deorh — 29.04.1990; Jivakant.

3. Darbhanga — 07.07.1990; Dr Bhimnath Jha, Pradip Maithili Putra, Vijaykant Thakur.

4. Patna — 03.11.1990; Govind Jha, Damankant Jha.

5. Begusarai — 13.01.1991; Pradip Bihari.

6. Katihar — 22.04.1991; Ashok.

7. Nawani — 21.07.1991; Mohan Bharadwaj.

8. Sakri — 22.10.1991; Professor Sureshwar Jha, Dr Ram Babu.

9. Nehra — 11.10.1992; A. C. Deepak.

10. Biratnagar — 14.04.1992; Jitendra Jit.

11. Varanasi — 18.07.1992; Prabhas Kumar Chaudhary.

12. Patna — 19.10.1992; Rajmohan Jha.

13. Supaul–1 — 18.10.1993; Kedar Kanan.

14. Bokaro — 24.04.1993; Buddhinath Jha.

15. Paitghat — 10.07.1993; Dr Ramanand Jha ‘Raman’.

16. Janakpur — 09.10.1994; Ramesh Ranjan.

17. Isahpur — 06.02.1994; Dr Arvind Kumar ‘Akku’.

18. Sarhad — 23.04.1994; Amiya Kumar Jha.

19. Jhanjharpur — 09.07.1994; Shyamanand Chaudhary.

20. Ghoghardihā — 22.10.1994; Dr Narayanji.

21. Bahera — 21.01.1995; Kamlesh Jha.

22. Supaul (Darbhanga) — 08.04.1995; Kamlesh Jha.

23. Kathmandu — 23.09.1995; Dhirendra Premarshi.

24. Rajbiraj — 24.01.1996; Ramnarayan Dev.

25. Kolkata (Silver Jubilee) — 28.12.1996; Prabhas Kumar Chaudhary.

26. Mahishi — 13.04.1997; Dr Taranand Viyogi; sponsored by Ramesh.

27. Tarauni — 20.06.1997; Shobhakant.

28. Patna — 18.07.1997; Prabhas Kumar Chaudhary.
29. Begusarai — 13.09.1997; Pradip Bihari.
30. Khajauli — 04.04.1998; Pradip Bihari.
31. Saharsa — 18.07.1998; Ramesh.
32. Patna — 10.10.1998; Shyam Darihare.
33. Balain; Nagdah — 08.01.1999; Padam Sambhav.
34. Bhawanipur — 10.04.1999; Dr Jishnu Dutt Mishra.
35. Madhubani — 24.07.1999; Siyaram Jha 'Saras', Dr Kuldhari Singh.
36. Andauli — 20.10.1999; Kamlesh Jha.
37. Janakpur — 25.03.2000; Ramesh Ranjan.
38. Kathmandu — 25.06.2000; Dhirendra Premarshi.
39. Dhanbad — 21.10.2000; Shyam Darihare and Ramchandra Laldas.
40. Bittho — 21.01.2001; Dr Akku, Professor Vidyanand Jha.
41. Hatni (Ghoghardihā) — 19.05.2001; Professor Yoganand Jha / Ajit Kumar Azad.
42. Bokaro — 25.08.2001; Girijanand Jha 'Ardhanarishwar', Mithila Sahitya Parishad.
43. Patna (Kiran Jayanti) — 01.12.2001; Ashok, Chetna Samiti, Patna.
44. Ranchi — 13.04.2002; Kumar Manish Arvind.
45. Bhagalpur — 24.08.2002; Dhirendra Mohan Jha.
46. Patna (Vidyapati Bhavan) — 16.11.2002; Ajit Kumar Azad.
47. Kolkata — 22.01.2003; Karna Goshthi, Kolkata.
48. Khutauna — 07.06.2003; Dr Mahendra Narayan Ram.
49. Benipur — 20.09.2003; Kamlesh Jha.
50. Darbhanga — 21.02.2004; Dr Ashok Kumar Mehta.
51. Jamshedpur — 10.07.2004; Dr Ravindra Kumar Chaudhary.
52. Ranchi — 02.10.2004; Vivekanand Thakur.
53. Deoghar — 08.01.2005; Shyam Darihare and Avinash.
54. Begusarai — 09.04.2005; Pradip Bihari.
55. Purnia — 20.06.2005; Ramesh.
56. Patna — 03.11.2005; Ajit Kumar Azad.
57. Janakpur (Nepal) — 12.08.2006; Ramesh Ranjan.
58. Jaynagar — 02.12.2006; Narayan Yadav.
59. Begusarai — 10.02.2007; Pradip Bihari.
60. Saharsa — 21.07.2007; Kislay Krishna.
61. Supaul–2 — 01.12.2007; Arvind Thakur.

62. Jamshedpur — 03.05.2008; Dr Ravindra Kumar Chaudhary.

63. Ranchi — 19.07.2008; Kumar Manish Arvind.

64. Rahua Sangram (Madhubani) — 08.11.2008; Dr Ashok Avichal.

65. Patna (Katha Ganga–3) — 21.02.2009; Ajit Kumar Azad / Chetna Samiti.

66. Madhubani — 30.05.2009; Dilip Kumar Jha.

67. Samastipur — 05.09.2009; Ramakant Ray 'Rama'.

68. Supaul–3 — 05.12.2009; Arvind Thakur.

69. Janakpur — 03.04.2010; Rajaram Singh 'Rathore'.

70. Kabilpur (Darbhanga) — 12.06.2010; Dr Yoganand Jha.

71. Berma (Jhanjharpur) — 02.10.2010; Jagdish Prasad Mandal and local literature enthusiasts.

72. Supaul — 04.12.2010; Arvind Thakur.

73. Mahishi (Katha Rajkamal) — 05.03.2011; Vijay Mahapatra.

74. Hazaribagh — 10.09.2011; Shyam Darihare.

75. Patna (Diamond Jubilee) — 10.12.2011; Ashok and Kamalmohan 'Chunnu'.

76. Chennai — 14.07.2012; Vibha Rani.

77. Darbhanga (Kiran Jayanti) — 01.12.2012; Arvind Thakur.

78. Ghanshyampur — 09.03.2013; Kamlesh Jha.

79. Auraha (Laukahi) — 15.05.2013; Umesh Paswan.

80. Nirmali (Supaul) — 30.11.2013; Umesh Mandal and local literature enthusiasts.

81. Deoghar (Bijli Kothi, Bampas Town) — 22.03.2014; Om Prakash Jha.

82. Mehath (Jhanjharpur; Katha Bauddha Siddha Mehathpa) — 31.05.2014; Gajendra Thakur.

83. Sakhua–Bhaptiahi — 30.08.2014; Nand Vilas Ray / Fagulal Sahu / Suraj Narayan Ray 'Suman'.

84. Berma (Madhubani) — 20.12.2014; Shiv Kumar Mishra and local literature enthusiasts.

85. Bhagalpur (Shyam Kunj, Dwarikapuri) — 04.04.2015; Om Prakash Jha.

86. Laksena (Madhubani) — 20.06.2015; Rajdev Mandal 'Raman', Satyadev 'Suman'.

87. Nirmali (Supaul) — 19.09.2015; Umesh Mandal and local literature enthusiasts.

88. Dakhram Middle School (Benipur) — 30.01.2016; Kamlesh Jha, Amar Nath Jha.

89. Laukahi — 26.03.2016; Umesh Paswan and Prem Kumar Sahu.

90. Lakshminiya (Madhubani) — 18.06.2016; Ram Vilas Sahu and local literature enthusiasts.

91. Godhanpur (Madhubani) — 24.09.2016; Durganand Mandal.

92. Nawani (Madhubani) — 31.12.2016; Ajay Kumar Das ‘Pintu’.

93. Ratansara (Ghoghardihā) — 25.03.2017; Rajdev Mandal and local literature enthusiasts.

94. Laufa (Madhepur) — 24.06.2017; Dr Yogendra Pathak Viyogi and local enthusiasts.

95. Jalsain Dumra (Madhubani) — 09.09.2017; Narayan Yadav.

96. Dhabouli (Laukahi) — 16.12.2017; Radhakant Mandal.

97. Berma (Lakhnaur) — 24.03.2018; Kapileshwar Raut and Berma villagers.

98. Simra (Jhanjharpur) — 16.06.2018; Dr Shiv Kumar Prasad.

99. Murhaddi (Barki Tol) — 22.09.2018; Professor Pritam Nishad.

100. Nirmali (Terapanth Bhavan) — 22.12.2018; Umesh Mandal, Navratna Vengani, Manish Jalan.

101. Jhitki (Madhubani) — 30.03.2019; Bharat Bhushan Jha.

102. Majhaura (Madhubani) — 29.06.2019; Jai Prakash Mandal, Alok Kumar.

103. Rampur (Madhubani) — 28.09.2019; Umesh Narayan Karna ‘Kalpa Kavi’.

104. Valam Nagar–Mahdeva (Laukahi) — 14.12.2019; Prem Kumar Sahu, Umesh Paswan.

105. Darbhanga (Sitayan Auditorium) — 13.02.2021; Kamlesh Jha.

106. Hatni (Ghoghardihā, Madhubani) — 25.09.2021; Laldev Kamat.

107. Belha (Phulparas; in memory of Jivakant) — 25.12.2021; Umesh Mandal, Engineer Shailendra Mandal.

108. Madhura (Madhubani) — 26.03.2022; Dr Shreeshankar Jha.

109. Nanaur (Madhubani) — 25.06.2022; Pradip Pushp.

110. Sonvarsha (Laukahi) — 24.09.2022; Achchhelal Shastri and local literature enthusiasts.

111. Rahua Sangram (Madhubani) — 31.12.2022; Ashok Avichal.

112. Sahuria (Andhratharhi) — 25.03.2023; Ramchandra Ray.

The 113th Sagar Rati Deep Jaray is scheduled for the last Saturday of June 2023, to be convened by Shri Narayan Yadav in Nahri village (Khutauna).

The 111th Sagar Rati Deep Jaray Held at Rahua Sangram

PART II — APPLIED STUDIES

Section C — Applied Criticism

Folklore, History and Culture

1. Mayanand Mishra's Sense of History: In Relation to Prathamam Shail Putri Cha, Mantraputra, Purohit and Stri-Dhan

Abstract

This essay does not, as far as possible, revisit the narrative design and literary analysis already undertaken for Mayanandji's four books—Stri-Dhan, Purohit, Mantraputra and Prathamam Shail Putri Cha—but instead examines them exclusively from the perspective of historical consciousness. The essay reviews a historical journey completed by the author over roughly two decades through these four historical novels.

Keywords: Mayanand · Mishra · historical consciousness · Prathamam · Shail · Putri · Mantraputra

This essay does not, as far as possible, revisit the narrative design and literary analysis already undertaken for Mayanandji's four books—Stri-Dhan, Purohit, Mantraputra and Prathamam Shail Putri Cha—but instead considers them only in relation to historical consciousness.

This essay examines the historical journey completed by the author over nearly two decades, as represented in Mayanandji's four historical novels: (1) Prathamam Shail Putri Cha, (2) Mantraputra, (3) Purohit and (4) Stri-Dhan. Of these works, Mantraputra is in Maithili and the other three novels are in Hindi. Nevertheless, to understand the journey as a whole, maintain the continuity of the sequence and complete the criticism, it was essential to use all four books.

In chronological terms, Prathamam Shail Putri Cha comes first, taking as its historical basis the period before 1500 BCE. Mantraputra is based on the history of 1500–1200 BCE. These periods precede the Bharata war. Purohit covers 1200–1000 BCE, which may be described as the age of Brahmana literature. Stri-Dhan is set in Mithila in the age of the Sutras and Smritis.

The works were not, however, composed in this order. Mantraputra in Maithili was written first, in November 1986. Prathamam Shail Putri Cha followed two years later, and in it Mayanandji outlined the plan for all four books, though in the context of Hindi. Subsequently all the books appeared in Hindi. Mantraputra was published in Hindi, and partly on that account the third book, Purohit, appeared rather late, in 1999. Stri-Dhan, the final book in the series, was published in 2007.

The preface to Prathamam Shail Putri Cha is called Kavach ("Armour"). The preface to Mantraputra is called Richalok and is placed at the end of the book: as this was the author's first historical work, placing the preface at the end sustained its mystery and suspense. The preface to Purohit is called Viniyog; before it stands the Durvakshat mantra, described here as the first patriotic song of India and of the world. In Mithila, this is used as a mantra of blessing. Its arguments for and against will be discussed in detail later.

The preface to Stri-Dhan is titled Lekhak Prishthabhumi ("The Author's Background"), an entirely appropriate designation because it provides the novel's historical background.

I have examined Mayanand's historical consciousness on the basis of shruti, tradition, reasoning and linguistics. This approach seeks to avoid Indian historiography constructed from the remnants of Western scholarly interpretations, and attempts to prevent the slightest influence of Central Asia or Europe upon the critical assessment.

1. Prathamam Shail Putri Cha—After the preface entitled Kavach ("Armour"), the book is divided into seventeen parts: (1) Agnā; (2) Agna–Shailā; (3) Shailā–Karālī; (4) Karālī–Mahesh; (5) Mahesh–Pārvatī; (6) Ganesh; (7) Harkisan; (8) Kisan; (9) Harappā: Moan Village; (10) The Auspicious Beginning of Ganesh; (11) Kishn; (12) Mahājan; (13) Maṇḍal; (14) Kishn Maṇḍal; (15) Maṇḍal: Maṇḍalī; (16) The Fall: Purandar; and (17) Epilogue: Migration.

1. Agnā—The novel opens in 2000 BCE with a description of people living in caves. Bā is the strongest man in a group; an ancestral Bā was strong too. Bā is the father of numerous children. The ancestral Bā had discovered two stones, one small and the other large. Am was called the dalāgrā, or leader of the band. Bā was also the name of a foul-smelling animal. Hands acquired increasing importance as people drew farther away from the trees. They knew from their ancestors that snakes were not to be killed and eaten. The first ancient deity was the tree; the second was the serpent deity, and the third the river deity. Bā had been having children with Ambā. A new axe and a new cutting implement were discovered. When the wild beasts were seen fleeing at the sight of "ah, āh, ag, agg," people gained knowledge of it. The women increased their numbers. The first woman received the name Agnā. Her male companion was Agg. Agnā became the dalāgrā, and under her leadership the group moved northwards. The author then states that the earth came into being some two billion years ago and regards this as entirely correct. A ritual formula reads, "ब्राह्मणे द्वितीये परार्धे श्री स्वेतवाराह कल्पे वैवस्वत मन्वंतरे अष्ठाविंशतितमे कलियुगे प्रथम चरणे." On calculating from this, the age of the earth is found to be 1,972,949,032 years. The radioactive method, too, is said to yield the same answer. In Europe, until the seventeenth century, the age of the earth was held to be 4,000 years. Iranian scholars placed the creation of the earth 1,200 years in the past. From a scientific standpoint, both views appear ridiculous.

The second part begins with Agnā–Shailā, set in 10,000 BCE. In it Mayanand Mishra depicts the beginnings of language. The relationship between sign language and sound is brought out particularly well. The transition from a wandering to a settled way of life is also shown. Thereafter begins the chapter Shailā–Karālī, set 7,500 years ago. Cattle-keeping is discussed, and the number of cows has increased considerably. Everyone is a herdsman, wearing animal skins and carrying a stone weapon at the waist. There are sheep, goats and pigs, as well as some other domesticated animals. Grass ropes, tridents and the serpent deity are mentioned. Bā's name now becomes Ojā, while the dalāgrā is named Shailā Karālī. As the number of animals rises, cattle theft also begins. Meetings begin to be held under the peepal tree. Karālī receives the name Ambā.

In the chapter Karālī–Mahesh, the beginning of agriculture is depicted in 5000 BCE. Mahesh is sowing seed. There is mention of roasting barley before eating it. Watercourses now begin to be given names. The consumption of the meat of domesticated animals becomes absolutely forbidden within Mahesh's clan. Ojā remains seated at the site of the liṅga.

Then the chapter Mahesh–Pārvatī begins, four to five thousand years ago. Rice cultivation has commenced. When Pārvatī arrives, red earth is applied to her forehead according to the prevailing custom. Her son is named Ganesh. Before this, the parentage of children was not disclosed.

Ganesh—This chapter begins four thousand years ago. It introduces discussions of relations between men and women and the emergence of the paternal clan. The practice of obtaining and consuming salt begins; the clan that brings salt is named Nonī. Barley and wheat cultivation commence, as does the milking of cattle. The domestication of elephants begins, and exchange by barter also makes its appearance. The offering of water and leaves to the phallic deity begins. Barley is now pounded and ground to powder. Wheat is crushed, soaked in water and cooked over a fire. A separate group is engaged in keeping birds. Funeral rites and mourning for the dead begin. Writing, too, makes its appearance.

Har—The chapter is set at the beginning of 3500 BCE. Trade in salt and the making of well-designed boats begin. The pailī is conceived as an instrument of measurement. The plough begins to be used together with oxen. Wells are dug, and settlements begin to spread sideways as well as lengthwise. Houses are also constructed. People of dark, fair and copper-coloured complexions continue to arrive in succession.

The chapter Harkisan begins 3,400 years ago. With agricultural development, the inclination towards permanent settlement grows, and the form of the family gradually becomes clearer. Agricultural development also heightens the need to expand trade. Woollen clothing, grinding mills, houses with walls, and enclosures around wells begin to be made.

The chapter Kisan begins in 3300 BCE. The sale of labour commences. Agriculture develops rapidly with the advent of irrigation. Greater geographical knowledge promotes trade. The use of ornaments grows.

The chapter Harappā: Mohan Village is set 3,200 years ago. A settlement of woodworkers is cited as an example of the selling of labour. Ornamentation becomes increasingly common. Alongside necklaces of beads, the potter's wheel appears. Class divisions begin to emerge in society.

The chapter The Auspicious Beginning of Ganesh starts in 3100 BCE. The author speaks of Harappā being built by people arriving from the south. Mohenjo-daro, Lothal and Chanhudaro develop as commercial centres. The script, the kaṭahī cart and the art of sculpture are invented, and markets begin to assemble for barter. The author discusses the Mesopotamian flood and the coming of Sumerians and Asuras.

The chapter Kishn begins in 3000 BCE. Overseas trade commences. Copper is discovered. Agricultural slavery also begins. Raised mounds are constructed for protection against floods.

The chapter Mahājan begins in 2800 BCE. Towns arise for the purposes of commerce. Canals are built for irrigation. The beam balance is invented as a matter of necessity. Arrangements for lighting are devised.

The chapter Maṇḍal concerns 2600 BCE. Institutions and the marriage system begin to take shape, and sailing boats are made for long-distance journeys.

The chapter Kishn Maṇḍal begins in the period of 2400 BCE. It discusses a lack of rainfall, together with the fear among the people occasioned by reports that the Aryans are advancing eastwards.

The chapter Maṇḍal: Maṇḍalī begins in 2200 BCE. In view of both the arrival of the Aryans and the absence of rain, Lothal begins to develop as an alternative centre.

The Fall: Purandar—The period of this chapter begins in 2000 BCE. Mayanandji ends his first book, Prathamam Shail Putri Cha, with an account of an Aryan king breaking down the fortified cities and destroying the great centre of Harappā. The novel is written on the basis of such theories as the Aryans' calling Harappā Hariyūpiyā and their arrival from outside India, and it claims the status of a historical novel. Its historical narrative extends from 20,000 BCE to 1800 BCE. Yet judged in the light of original historical thinking and new research, many of its propositions do not appear sound.

The narrative beginning with Agnā had inspired great expectations. In the first chapter the author writes that the earth originated approximately two billion years ago, which he considers entirely correct. A ritual formula states, "ब्राह्मणे द्वितीये परार्धे श्री स्वेतवाराह कल्पे वैवस्वत मन्वंतरे अष्टाविंशतितमे कलियुगे प्रथम चरणे"; by calculating on this basis, the earth's age is obtained as 1,972,949,032 years. The radioactive method, too, is said to give the same answer. It is estimated that 1.67 parts of uranium change into lead over 100,000,000 years. Different stones and rocks contain different proportions of lead. Calculations of this kind indicate that radioactive substances existed 1,500,000,000 years ago; on this reasoning no rock could be more than 2,000,000,000 years old. Until the seventeenth century, Europe continued to accept an age of 4,000 years for the earth. Iranian scholars placed its creation 1,200 years ago. The author dismisses such Western research in the first chapter, but by the time he reaches the end he himself falls under the influence of a Western prejudice of the same kind—the notion, for example, that the Aryans called Harappā Hariyūpiyā. He could not free himself from the leavings of Western scholarship and subject the Śruti tradition to the test of reason. Consequently, Prathamam Shail Putri Cha fails to construct its historical narrative convincingly as literature on the following grounds:

Archaeological, linguistic and literary evidence supports the view that the Aryans were indigenous to India. The Aryan language family was named by Max Müller, and the Dravidian family by the missionary Robert Caldwell. The theory of an Aryan invasion emerged from a footnote in Griffith's translation of the Rigveda. Since these names were first assigned by foreign scholars, they must have had purposes of their own.

The Saraswati River; the great flood; the stories of Manu and the great fish; the Epic of Gilgamesh; Gilgamesh's search for the land of the living; accounts of creation; and the evolution of the pantheon—all these, when analysed as forms of social development, provide evidence that the Aryans were native to India.

The Rigveda contains a preponderance of feminine plural forms, preserving a memory of a matriarchal social order.

Voiced and aspirated sounds are characteristic of Rigvedic and Indian-language phonology; they are not found in the same form in either

Iranian or European languages. The civilisation between the Saraswati and Sindhu rivers was the civilisation of the Aryans. The Bharatas, Purus and other tribal groups dwelling on the banks of the Saraswati jointly composed the Rigveda. After a flood in the Saraswati, this civilisation moved from the Saraswat region to Kuru-Panchala and the Brahmarshi region, or Madhyadesha. The Bharatas then lost their importance in history. It is also possible that, after this flood, descendants of the Aryan people founded the cities of Mohenjo-daro and Harappā. Of the 800 sites of Harappan civilisation, more than 530 lay on the banks of the vanished Saraswati. These centres depended very little upon the course of the Sindhu, and their decline began when the flow of water in the Saraswati diminished.

First, a flood in the Saraswati brought about an Aryan migration after the composition of the Rigveda and Yajurveda. Then a decrease in the Saraswati's waters caused a second large migration, before the composition of the Atharvaveda. Spoked chariots are described in the Vedas; they were present neither in West Asia nor in Europe. Indian divine names, crafts, stories, knowledge of horses, music, linguistic elements and modes of thought begin to appear in West Asia, Egypt and Greece. In the second millennium BCE, spoked chariots, Indian divine names, the rivers of India, Rigvedic philosophical ideas, horsemanship, craftsmanship, technology and ancient narratives spread from India towards West Asia and Crete–Greece. In chronological terms, most of the maṇḍalas of the Rigveda had been composed well before the civilisations of Egypt, Sumer–Babylonia, and the Mitanni and Hittites.

The second work in Mayanandji's series is Mantraputra. It presents a philosophy of life grounded in the Rigvedic world.

The Rigveda is divided into ten maṇḍalas (and also into eight aṣṭakas). Mayanand Mishra likewise divides Mantraputra into ten maṇḍalas, following the Rigvedic arrangement. The book's introduction is called Richalok, and it is placed at the end, after the tenth maṇḍala.

In the First Maṇḍala, there is mention of Ṛjiśvā, daughter of Kākṣenī, as well as Shāshvatī, daughter of Ṛturvit. It describes the removal or banishment of a king by the people's assembly and committee, and the election of another king. There is also mention of eyes becoming dark instead of blue, and of this change being attributed to a particular kind of marriage. Repeated disturbances by the dark-complexioned people from the banks of the Vitastā are described, together with the process of intermingling bloodlines on the banks of the Suvāstu. Discussion begins about whether cow sacrifice should be prohibited. Slaves are also mentioned. The fall of Hariyūpiyā and the devastation of its different towns are narrated, followed by Balbūtha's efforts to reorganise the commercial system of the non-Aryans after its destruction.

In the Second Maṇḍala, the committee deposes a king because he did not undertake a war for cattle, even after cows had been stolen. The consecration of kings increasingly comes to determine succession, and hereditary custom becomes established. Earlier, only after the committee's decision would someone seek support and take up the royal sceptre. The cattle had been abducted by the Anāsa Dasyus. On the banks of the Suvāstu, Krumu, Vitastā and Akkhanī, the study of Śruti and the conduct of war proceed side by side, and the same people perform the duties of Brahmins, Kshatriyas and Vaishyas. On the Saraswati, however, matters take another course: separate villages of seers begin to emerge. All the Anāsa Dasyus are enslaved, and Aryans begin to have children by slave women. The sons of slave women are permitted to build houses in the villages, but the Anāsa Dasyus themselves are not. The narrative says that Aryans wore garments of animal hide, and learned the use of cotton clothing and salt through contact with the Anāsa Dasyus. Both commodities remain under the latter's control. There is also a discussion of compiling the Nighaṇṭu: contact with non-Aryans causes the Aryans to forget their own vocabulary, creating a need to collect it. Gandharva marriage is mentioned as well.

Third Maṇḍala

There is a discussion of the Agniṣṭoma sacrifice and of the sacrifice of goats and buffaloes.

It is said that the great seers enjoyed meat and rice, although bread prepared from wheat, rather than rice, was still more commonly eaten.

Fourth Maṇḍala

The royal consecration sacrifice is discussed, with Ariṣṭanemi acting as the Brahmā, or presiding priest. The grāmaṇī, chariot-maker, smith, charioteer and military commander also participate in the sacrifice.

"In the most ancient age, creation was entirely covered with water!" It is difficult to understand how Mayanand Mishra introduces this idea into the Rigvedic period.

Fifth Maṇḍala

There are accounts of competitions in horsemanship and of a colourful theatrical performance by Anāsa slaves. The king approves its inclusion in the consecration ceremony, and opposition to that decision is also described. Discussion takes place about whether the king should seek the vidatha's permission to grant slaves independent rights of cultivation.

Sixth Maṇḍala

The Mahāvairājī sacrifice is mentioned. Entire Dasyu villages are said to have been enslaved, and their inhabitants are permitted to rear cattle and perform Paṇi-related commercial work. In the episode involving Nagnajit, Brahmins are described as those who chant mantras, Kshatriyas as those who wage battles for cattle, while those who give greater attention to the development of agriculture are the viś—the ordinary people. Mayanandji, however, adds the term Vaishya here as well.

Seventh Maṇḍala

It is only at this stage that the invasion by barbarous white Aryans is mentioned. Like one group of foreign specialists, Mayanandji seems to have recognised the Paiśācī invasion only much later, and then made its people another branch of the Aryans. There is renewed mention of the Aryans burning Hariyūpiyā to the ground. Mohenjo-daro is said first to have been abandoned through terror and then to have been destroyed by an earthquake. Mayanandji now appears confused. Reduced rainfall is also mentioned.

Eighth Maṇḍala

There is mention of villages of seers and indications of male and female slaves within the household. The keeping of bulls is also suggested. The mantra-sons are described as moving into village settlements and becoming members of the viś, or Vaishyas. But as the account advances, Mayanandji becomes increasingly entangled. It is said that before the departure from the shores of the Caspian Sea, Dyaus and Tvaṣṭrī had become minor deities. Brahmins and Kshatriyas are described as not yet having been divided, with everyone free to undertake any occupation. The war between gods and Asuras, the battle on the banks of the Helmand, and the rearing of animals are discussed. Subsequently, the occupations of Brahmins and Kshatriyas begin to diverge. There is then mention of mantra-seeing seers beginning to put the names of deities and their own names into the mantras. As the number of mantras increases, systematic study of Śruti is said to begin.

Ninth Maṇḍala

Markets begin to be organised for exchanging goods. The market has a pottery section, where enslaved artisans display their wares, as well as a section for textiles. Goods made of clay, ivory, copper and shells are mentioned, together with objects for children's amusement, such as figures of elephants and bulls. Salt, grain, timber and blankets are also sold.

Tenth Maṇḍala

The Nāga people are informed of the arrival of white people—the barbarous white Aryans. The Nāgas are said to call their leader a king, and to have moved, in an earlier period, by crawling or creeping towards the Yamuna, displacing the people already living there. The dark people's wooden forts are mentioned, and they too, along with the Nāgas, are called Anāsa. The former, however, are tall, whereas the Nāgas are somewhat shorter. In this maṇḍala references to Shudras and to the Ganga river appear alongside those to slaves. There are signs of cooperation among Aryans, slaves and Shudras.

The introduction entitled Richalok is written at the end. Mantraputra, founded on propositions such as Indra's renouncing the title Asura after the war between gods and Asuras, the movements of the Hittites and Mitanni, and the eastward advance of the Aryans, fails to satisfy all the criteria of historicity.

Had Mayanand Mishra maintained a literary writer's perspective and avoided the gossip disseminated by a section of Western historians, he might have rejected the theory of an Aryan invasion. The Saraswati appears in all the maṇḍalas of the Rigveda in its vast and delightful form. The civilisation of the Sindhu or Saraswati river valley began to end or decline when the Saraswati dried up. The Atharvaveda, too, presents the Saraswati as full of water. The Rigveda does not mention a great flood, whereas the Atharvaveda contains indications in that direction. When the people of Bharata travelled westward, they carried the story of the flood with them. Following the flood, the Bharatas moved eastwards from the Saraswat region towards Kuru-Panchala and the Brahmarshi region.

Had the Saraswati survived, matters would have been different. But the dried-up Saraswati became a dividing line, and for those who advocated the Aryan-invasion theory, crossing that vanished river became impossible.

Even the study of the Indus script has not proved possible without the assistance of Brahmi.

The suspicion that the Aryans came as invaders from the northwest and broke down the forts of the indigenous inhabitants was first expressed in a footnote to Griffith's translation of the Rigveda. The people who lived in those forts were more civilised. In 1947 Wheeler advanced the theory that the region of the newly partitioned Pakistan had been the centre of civilisation and that the Aryan invaders were foreigners. Earlier, the Indian scholar Ramprasad Chanda had already said that the inhabitants of these cities were the Paṇis of the Rigveda. Marshall, however, had proposed in 1931 that the Aryans entered India around 2000 BCE, by which time

Harappā and Mohenjo-daro had already been destroyed. In 1934 Gordon Childe suggested that the Aryans might have been invaders. In 1938 Mackay rejected an invasion of Mohenjo-daro, arguing that it could not be established on the basis of a few skeletons. In 1964 Dales wrote an essay, "The Mythical Massacre of Mohenjo-Daro," ridiculing the story of an invasion. Wheeler then retreated somewhat in 1966, but instead of Mackay's tribal groups he placed the whole responsibility for invasion on the foreign Aryans. He now began to say that an Aryan invasion could not be proved, but that what could not be established was not thereby impossible. Stuart Piggott continued to share Wheeler's prejudice until 1962, describing the Aryans as having arrived from Mitanni. Norman Brown, too, was doubtful about the cultural relationship between the Punjab and the rest of India. Emeneau, the American specialist in Sanskrit and Dravidian languages, wrote that the Indus Valley had never been culturally linked with the rest of India in that way, and that the Aryans who arrived there were closer to Iranian civilisation.

Pargiter, however, demonstrated from the literary tradition in 1922 that there was no evidence of an Aryan invasion of India. He argued that the Aryans had travelled westwards from India and that literary evidence for this movement was available. Langdon likewise held that the Aryans were among India's earliest inhabitants and used an Aryan language and script. Scholars such as Bridget and Raymond Allchin and Colin Renfrew have examined prejudices in the interpretation of ancient Indian history.

Mitanni rulers worshipped Mitra, Varuṇa, Indra and the Nāsatyas. Vedic deities were also worshipped in the Hittite kingdom. Albright and Lambdin likewise acknowledged that an Indo-Aryan language was spoken in southwest Asia two thousand years ago and that its numeral words were Indian.

These people were Indians who travelled outside India after the composition of the Rigveda. Feminine plural forms and the distinctive character of Rigvedic deities are not found elsewhere. The scarcity of Indian goddesses in the Indo-European pantheon is an indication of the later European patriarchal order following the earlier matriarchal order in India.

Now consider the Sumerian flood, which is placed in 3100 BCE. The Indian Kali era is reckoned from 3102 BCE. Therefore the entire Rigveda had been composed before that date.

At the end of the book, in Richalok, Mayanandji writes, among other things, that Indra relinquished the title Asura after the conflict between gods and Asuras. Some Western scholars also seek to diminish the philosophical significance of the Rigveda by saying that the divine pantheon was fully developed in Greece, whereas Rigvedic society was nomadic and thus possessed no developed pantheon. They also claim that the Rigveda was composed by Western invaders who wandered on horseback. Rigvedic poets knew both early collective ownership and clan society based on blood relationships, but had themselves moved beyond them and begun to establish an order based on individual and family property. Property was centred on men and the family was patriarchal. Yet they had not forgotten the matriarchal order, for they worship and remember the goddesses of the waters in the plural as "āpaḥ mātaraḥ," and likewise always invoke and worship the Maruts collectively as a gaṇa.

Engels then says that the transition from matriarchy to patriarchy in Greece was the greatest revolution of ancient times. That revolution had already taken place in the Rigvedic period. As labour becomes specialised, the role of the gotra in production diminishes while that of the family increases. The sequential development of gaṇa, gotra, kula and family arises from the organisation of collectively owned land. The Rigveda mentions potters, carpenters, blacksmiths and metalwork. In ancient Iran, the form ahura was used as the counterpart of asura, and the Iranians worshipped it. But the influence of the Indian people who worshipped Asuras was confined to Iran and spread no farther. In India the Asuras are wicked, whereas in Iran the devas are wicked. The dignity of the Asura is present throughout the Rigveda: there is no maṇḍala in which one deity or another is not called an Asura. Yet there are also Asuras opposed to the gods, and Indra is invoked to destroy such "adevâḥ asurâḥ," godless Asuras. Like Indra, Agni destroys Asuras, while Indra and Bṛhaspati themselves are both Asuras. Asura was a title of the deities. Alongside gods and Asuras, the Rigveda also presents Asuras as a separate class: Asuras breathed, but the gods did not. The Asuras are more ancient than the gods; thus Varuṇa, as an Asura, is king of both the gods and human beings.

A Paiśācī complexion or skin was never regarded with such delight in India. Even so, advocates of the Aryan-invasion theory should consider this fact by way of example: South Indian Brahmins, Kashmiri Brahmins and Brahmins of Nepal differ not only in skin colour but also in physical appearance. This shows that they were local populations incorporated into the caste order in their respective forms. For such differences of appearance and complexion cannot, on anthropological and scientific grounds, emerge within five hundred or a thousand years. Neither the Europeans living in South America and Africa nor the people described as Negroes and Red Indians living in America, Africa and Europe have changed in complexion within five hundred years. Such differences arise through residence over hundreds of thousands of years, with inhabitants of hot regions becoming dark and those of cold regions fair.

Purohit

Purohit, written in Hindi, is the third volume in the series. It opens with the Dūrvākṣata invocation, which Mayanand Mishra also, for convenience, calls a benediction.

Purohit begins with the Dūrvākṣata benedictory mantra. This is verse 22 of Chapter 22 of the Śukla Yajurveda, extending from "Oṃ ā brahman..." to "naḥ kalpatām." In Mithila the following is also recited at the end of the mantra: "Oṃ mantrārthāḥ siddhayaḥ santu manorathāḥ. Śatrūṇāṃ buddhinaśo'stu mitrāṇām udayas tava. Oṃ dīrghāyur bhava. Oṃ saubhāgyavatī bhava." With the addition of these four pādas, the mantra assumes the form of a blessing.

The Yajurvedic mantra 22.22 is recited throughout India in the manner of a patriotic song.

The Dūrvākṣata Mantra (Śukla Yajurveda, Chapter 22, Verse 22)

आ ब्रह्मन्नित्यस्य प्रजापतिर्ऋषिः। लिंभोक्ता देवताः। स्वराड्उत्कृतिश्छन्दः। षड्जः स्वरः॥

For the mantra beginning "Ā Brahman," Prajāpati is named as the seer; "लिंभोक्ता" is given as the deity; Svarāḍ-Utkṛti as the metre; and Ṣaḍja as the musical note.

आ ब्रह्मन् ब्राह्मणो ब्रह्मवर्चसी जायतामा राष्ट्रे राजन्यः
शुरेऽइषव्योऽतिव्याधी महारथो जायतां दोग्ध्री धेनुर्वोढानड्वानाशुः सप्तिः
पुरन्धिर्योवा जिष्णू रथेष्ठाः सभेयो युवास्य यजमानस्य वीरो जायतां
निकामे-निकामे नः पर्जन्यो वर्षतु फलवत्यो नऽओषधयः पच्यन्तां योगेक्षमो
नः कल्पताम् ॥२२॥

O Brahman, may there arise in the nation a Brahmin radiant with sacred learning, and a courageous ruler, skilled with arrows, capable of overcoming enemies, a mighty chariot-warrior. May there be a milk-giving cow, a burden-bearing ox, a swift horse, a capable woman, victorious chariot-fighters, and an eloquent young hero in the patron's assembly. May Parjanya bring rain whenever we need it; may the plants and healing herbs bear fruit and ripen; and may our well-being and security be assured.

मन्त्रार्थाः सिद्धयः सन्तु पूर्णाः सन्तु मनोरथाः। शत्रूणां बुद्धिनाशोऽस्तु मित्राणामुदयस्तव।

May the purposes of the mantras be fulfilled; may wishes be fully realised. May the intelligence of enemies be destroyed and may your friends prosper.

ॐ दीर्घायुर्भव। ॐ सौभाग्यवती भव।

Oṃ: May you live long. Oṃ: May you be blessed with good fortune.

O Lord, may capable and all-knowing students be born in our country, and soldiers who can destroy the enemy. May the cows of our land yield abundant milk, the oxen be able to carry heavy loads, and the horses run swiftly. May women be capable of leading towns and cities, and young people speak forcefully in assemblies and show the capacity for leadership. May rain fall in our country whenever it is needed, and may medicinal plants and herbs continue to ripen. In this way, may we prosper in every respect. May the intelligence of enemies be destroyed and friends rise to prosperity.

The mantra describes what human beings ought to desire.

It contains the figure of speech known as vācaka-luptopamālaṅkāra, a simile in which the explicit comparative expression is omitted.

Anvaya—Word-by-Word Interpretation

ब्रह्मन् — Brahman, endowed with learning and other virtues.

राष्ट्रे — in the country.

ब्रह्मवर्चसी — possessing the radiance of sacred learning.

आ जायतां — may be born; may arise.

राजन्यः — king.

शुरेऽ — fearless.

इषव्यो — skilled in shooting arrows.

ऽतिव्याधी — one who overcomes or defeats the enemy.

महारथो — a mighty hero commanding a great chariot.

दोग्ध्रीं — fulfilling the desire for milk; giving milk abundantly.

धेनुर्वोढानड्वानाशुः — धेनुः cow or speech; वोढानड्वाः a large, burden-bearing ox; नाशुः /आशुः: swift.

सप्तिः — horse.

पुरंन्धिर्योवा — पुरंन्धिः a woman capable of conducting affairs; र्योवाः woman.

जिष्णू — one who conquers enemies.

रथेष्ठाः — firmly stationed in a chariot.

सभेयो — in an excellent assembly.

युवास्य — youthful; like a young man.

यजमानस्य — in the kingdom of the king.

वीरो — a hero who defeats enemies.

निकामे-निकामे — in undertakings pursued with firm resolve.

नः — our; of us all.

पर्जन्यो — rain-cloud.

वर्षतु — may it rain.

फलवत्यो — fruitful; bearing excellent fruit.

ओषधयः — medicinal herbs.

पच्यन्तां — may they ripen.

योगेक्षमो — the safeguarding of what has been acquired, and the attainment of what has not yet been acquired.

नः — for us all.

कल्पताम् — may it be made possible; may it prove sufficient.

Griffith's translation: O Brahman, may there be in our kingdom Brahmins of sound religious learning; brave rulers, archers, milk-giving cows, swift-running animals, and enterprising women. May Parjanya grant rain when needed; may fruit-bearing trees ripen; may we obtain and preserve our prosperity.

There follows the author's preface, which in Purohit is entitled Viniyoga. Purohit is based on the society of the period of the Śatapatha Brāhmaṇa.

The Viniyoga discusses the dating of the Early and Later Vedic ages, the age of the Mahābhārata, and related periods. It also considers the emergence of the ideas of renunciation and liberation, the composition of Sūtra literature, the Āraṇyakas, the Upaniṣads, and the Brāhmaṇa texts. There is discussion of the beginnings of the doctrine of status by birth in place of status by action, the emergence of the word Śūdra, the growth of towns, the use of punch-marked coins, the strengthening of industry, and the use of iron. Mayanandji then writes that the Battle of the Ten Kings took place in 1800 BCE, and that a combined group of Bharatas and Kuśikas–Kassites crossed the Beas from the banks of the Saraswati, passing through the Ilāvṛta mountain region, and established the monarchies of Kosala and Mithila even before the culture of Kuru-Pañcāla had developed.

Purohit is divided into thirteen cantos and ends with an epilogue. The first canto opens in the city of Kāmpilya in Southern Pañcāla. Smoke rising at dusk from the cattle sheds of Atharvaṇapallī is described. The narrative moves forward through Medhā and Kuśabindu. At the hermitage of the seer Gālava, pupils are first made to memorise the Ṛgveda; instruction in agriculture is given only subsequently.

The second canto describes the insult offered to a Brahmin by the foolish son of King Pravāhaṇa Jaibāli, and distinguishes between the first category, the śrotriya Brahmin, and the second, the priestly Brahmin.

In the third canto, the priestly class decides to withdraw from officiating after Ācārya Cākrāyaṇa is insulted. The consequent disruption of the people's daily agnihotra rites, and of agricultural and commercial work undertaken without consultation of auspicious dates, is described.

The fourth canto introduces the Vyāsa narrative and the Bhārata war. Here Mayanandji follows a Western perspective. Mayanand Mishra makes the casual assertion that the Jaya poem was given the form of the narrative of the Bhārata war.

In the fifth canto, Vaiśyas are described as abandoning the upanayana initiation, whereas both sons and daughters among Kṣatriyas still undergo it. Vaiśya girls are increasingly excluded from education, while Brahmin girls receive instruction from their fathers in addition to what is provided at the gurukula. Brahmins have little time left after their priestly duties.

The sixth canto discusses the refusal of Brahmin priests to recognise the Atharvaveda.

The seventh canto describes instruction in Atharvavedic rites at Atharvaṇapallī and the refusal of first-rank Brahmins to visit that settlement.

The eighth canto describes chariot-racing, horsemanship, wrestling, swordplay, target-shooting, and extraordinary forms of mimicry at the Indra festival, including performances by the inhabitants of Vyāsapallī. At Vyāsapallī, the vrātya Karuṣa recounts the tale of the Bhārata war. The account also states that, long before that war, the mixed peoples of the Bharatas, Tritsus, Kivis and Sṛñjayas in Āryāvarta proudly called themselves Sūdras, in memory of the Sumerian Ziusudra, and that the designation Śūdra derived from this usage.

The ninth canto discusses the distinction introduced when weavers began giving garments intended for women a distinctive border; previously there had been no such distinction. It also describes differences between Atharvan and sacrificial Brahmins.

The tenth canto speaks of the worship of Śiśnadeva by non-Aryans and the Atharvan priests' ignorance of that practice. It is said that alphabetic writing is used in Vyāsapallī, while in Ācārya Gālava's hermitage of oral learning nothing may be seen beyond numerical notation.

In the eleventh canto, although discussion of daṇḍanīti—the principles of punishment and government—is prohibited in Gālava's hermitage, it takes place at the request of councillors from Southern Pañcāla. King Śilājita is said to offer the royal office to the chief priest.

The twelfth canto states that after the Bhārata war the custom of niyoga lost acceptance and ceased. It also discusses the assimilation of Śiśnadeva into Śivadeva.

The thirteenth canto describes the coronation celebrations of King Kraivya. In the Dūrvākṣata mantra,

"ॐ मंत्रार्था सिद्धयः संतु मनोरथाः। शत्रूणां बुद्धिनाशोऽस्तु मित्राणामुदयस्तव" and the blessing "dīrghāyur bhava" are combined with Śukla Yajurveda 22.22. The account describes singing it while holding dūrvā grass and unhusked rice, with particular attention to rhythm, tempo, and pauses. Mayanandji also provides a translation inspired by Griffith's:

May there arise throughout the world, everywhere, Brahmins whose brilliance in learning establishes its supremacy, and patron kingdoms possessing brave, healthy, mighty chariot-warriors skilled in archery. May there be cows yielding ever more milk, powerful bulls, spirited horses, beautiful and virtuous young women, and heroic sons eager for victory. Whenever we wish, may Parjanya bring rain; may vegetation flourish, medicinal plants bear fruit, and every living creature be content in the security of its well-being. May the king live a hundred years.

For the coronation of King Kraivya, the mantra is recited while holding akṣata, aravā rice, vrīhi grain, and blades of dūrvā grass. At its conclusion these are scattered over the king; curd is then taken from a small pot and used to place a tilaka on his forehead. Mayanandji writes in this passage that the mantra known in Mithila as Dūrvākṣata was composed by Yājñavalkya for the Vājasaneyi Saṃhitā. He adds that it subsequently came to be used in Mithila as a benediction for a boy at his upanayana and for bride and groom at their wedding.

Purohit concludes with an epilogue. It describes the Aryanisation of non-Aryan villages along the road to Kāśī and the performance of the vrātyastoma sacrifice. It discusses the Śiśnadevas, the story of Śunaḥśepa, the beginning of the tradition of telling the Bhārata narrative, and the aversion towards Aryan religion among the people of Magadha.

Mayanandji seems to follow Western scholars even in addressing the problems of the Mahābhārata. Professor Weber was the first to advance the theory that there was a Jaya Saṃhitā of 8,800 verses and that the original epic contained only the four books of war—Bhīṣma, Droṇa, Karṇa, and Śalya—among its eighteen books. He based this theory on a single verse:

अष्टौश्लोक सहस्राणि… अहं वेद्मि शुको वेत्ति सञ्जयो वेत्ति वा न वा

"Eight thousand verses … I know them; Śuka knows them; whether Sañjaya knows them or not …"

Sañjaya, Vyāsa and Śuka were each able to remember only 8,800 verses of the Bhārata. That means the Bhārata was so extensive that no one of them could memorise it in its entirety; from this perspective the work written by Vyāsa could never have contained fewer than 26,400 verses. The term Jaya Saṃhitā was used for both the Bhārata and the Mahābhārata. The books of war—the four of the eighteen books devoted to Bhīṣma, Droṇa, Karṇa, and Śalya—are so closely bound to the other books that the succeeding book cannot be understood without reading what precedes it. The war of the Iliad lasted ten years, but the Iliad confines itself to the siege of Troy. The Mahābhārata, by contrast, begins long before the causes that led to its eighteen-day war. The Bhīṣma Parva is the sixth book, the Droṇa Parva the seventh, the Karṇa Parva the eighth, and the Śalya Parva the ninth. Nine further books follow them.

The Mahābhārata was recited at many sittings, and it was therefore natural for passages already heard to be recalled repeatedly. To infer from these repetitions that they are interpolations would be absurd. Western scholars similarly consider the Gītā an interpolation, because in approaching Indian culture, literature, and art with a foreign mentality they commit errors. Foreign scholars find it difficult to accept that the Mahābhārata, although so ancient, is so vast that the Iliad seems insignificant beside it. Weber's false interpretation of a single verse thus gave rise to the notion of the Jaya Saṃhitā. Without justification, the development of the epic was represented as passing through three stages: Jaya Saṃhitā, Bhārata, and Mahābhārata. Even in its smallest form, the Mahābhārata contained no fewer than 24,600 verses, and the designation Jaya Saṃhitā referred collectively to the Bhārata and the Mahābhārata.

Strīdhan

This book is the final link in Mayanand Mishra's exploration of historical consciousness. Following the prehistoric Prathamam Śailaputrī Ca, the Rigvedic Mantraputra, and the later-Vedic Purohit, this Hindi novel is situated in the age of the Sūtras and Smṛtis. It is set in Mithila. The book begins with Mayanandji's preface, entitled Pṛṣṭhabhūmi ("Background") in this volume. After considering the chronology of the Rāmāyaṇa and Mahābhārata, he speaks of the Śatapatha Brāhmaṇa as the historians' sole documentary evidence.

Mithila's earliest name was Videha, first mentioned in the Śatapatha Brāhmaṇa. Mayanandji says that the book offers a detailed description of the movements of trading caravans, or sārthas.

The work has two chapters, First and Second, followed by an epilogue. The first chapter contains nine sessions, numbered one to nine; the second contains eight cantos, numbered one to eight.

First Chapter

First Session

There is an account of Sṛñjaya's begging for alms as a form of religious repentance and of his observance of a severe vow continuously for six months because he had abandoned his wife.

The expression "द्वितीय वर" (dvitīya vara) is also discussed.

Second Session

Karāla Janaka, the eldest son of King Bahulāśva Janaka, ascends the throne in accordance with the hereditary traditions of the ruling dynasty.

Third Session

Here we see a conflict between the old and the new. At one point Vāruṇī says that since her revered father duly performed her upanayana, and in her period of brahmacarya she received instruction in the Śruti according to ancient custom, she now wishes, as a respectable young woman, to choose her own husband and marry him.

Fourth Session

There are murmurs of rebellion against Karāla Janaka. The just and public-spirited welfare measures taken during the reigns of Kṛti Janaka and Bahulāśva Janaka are recalled, as is Mithila's territorial expansion from the time of Sīradhvaja Janaka. At his death, Bahulāśva warned his son Karāla not to neglect or insult the revered Ācārya Vareṇya of the Agrāmātya division. Yet in time Karāla Janaka did just that. Ācārya Vareṇya and his group migrated from Mithila.

Fifth Session

The formalities of respectful greeting, blessing, and inquiries after well-being are described, and women's property, or strīdhan, enters the conversation. There is also the account that Vaiśālī had for a time been under Kosala and was under Mithila during the Bhārata war. King Karāla Janaka is said to have broken the customary exemption from taxation for five springs after forestland had been brought under cultivation.

Sixth Session

The people of Pañcāla are said to regard Vāsudeva Kṛṣṇa, leader of the Andhakas and Vṛṣṇis, as the hero of the Jaya poem. The Western scholars' discarded intellectual fare concerning the Jaya and Bhārata poems has still not departed from Mayanandji's mind. Once again he repeats the false claim that the sage Vaiśampāyana added numerous verses to Vyāsa's Jaya poem and transformed it into the extensive Bhārata. Kṛṣṇa Dvaipāyana Vyāsa is identified as the author of Jaya. The same point is repeated as though it were some extraordinary discovery.

There is further discussion of the development of divinity and of the sudden drying-up of the Saraswati River.

The beginning of image worship of Saraswati and the Mother Goddess is also discussed.

Seventh Session

Saraswati is made into a Mother Goddess, and the worship of an imagined image of her is described. The custom in Mithila of a wife not uttering her husband's name is also mentioned.

Eighth Session

The king's tyranny has reached its height. Apūrvā is compelled to renounce domestic life and relinquish her strīdhan as well.

Ninth Session

More than a hundred village headmen assemble in conference.

There is discussion of the five-spring tax exemption and of the possible migration of forest-dwellers and Śūdras if it is withdrawn. After Sīradhvaja Janaka, the ritual seizure of cows had survived merely as a custom following coronation. Karāla, however, is described as refusing to return the cattle belonging to his clansman Śoṇabhadra. Karāla also dismisses the chief priest during his reign. A young medical practitioner, the student Kṛtārtha, is summoned to treat the princess; Vāruṇī, the princess's friend and the daughter of Ācārya Kṛta, is summoned too. She goes with the younger student, but Karāla forcibly closes the door of his chamber and contracts a gāndharva marriage with her. A popular rebellion breaks out, and the king escapes on horseback. With this, the ninth and final session of the first chapter comes to an end.

Second Chapter

First Canto

The Sita River is mentioned. Varuṇa asks Vāruṇī to accompany the sārthavāha caravan merchants to the Aṅga region. He also says that the work of Aryanising Aṅga is still incomplete.

Second Canto

Third Canto

In Aṅga, it is said, aravā rice is not made directly from paddy. Rather, paddy is first boiled and dried, then pounded in a ḍhekī, and the resulting grain is called rice, whereas vrīhi is called paddy. The older class of merchant-guild leaders, the twice-born Vaiśyas, and the newer, non-twice-born Vaiśyas are also discussed.

Fourth Canto

The repeated references to Aryanisation demonstrate the influence of Western scholarship upon Mayanandji. Both "Aryan" and "Dravidian," I contend, were terms introduced in India by Westerners for their own vested interests. The development of Kosala and Videha, and the entire history of the evolution of divinity, are presented here. Mithila's familiar dish of curd and flattened rice is also mentioned.

Fifth Canto

Eating a single meal during the day and drinking milk at night were customs in both Mithila and Pañcāla. There were minor differences in ways of life between the so-called Aryans and the local inhabitants, and Mayanandji calls the bridging of these differences "Aryanisation"!

Sixth Canto

The houses of Aṅga are described as standing apart from one another, rather than close together as in the Aryan villages. Their inhabitants wear short garments and animal skins. The suggestion of human sacrifice among forest peoples and the exchange of language with expelled forest-dwellers are, in my view, further ideas that Mayanandji has absorbed under Western influence.

There is discussion of establishing marketplaces, from which towns might later develop.

Seventh Canto

Parboiled rice is said to be more digestible and is therefore prescribed as suitable food for the sick. The need for artisans is discussed: blacksmiths to make iron ploughshares, carpenters for ploughs, and potters for vessels and utensils, together with the provision of residential land and food for them.

Eighth Canto

Once agriculture produces a surplus, people can exchange grain for other goods, and bullock carts can transport these goods. There is also an account of the bhūdevas arranging a sacrifice lasting one month. During the teaching of language, Brāhmaṇagāma becomes Bābhanagāma and Vanagrāma becomes Vanagāma through changes in pronunciation. Returning after teaching the language, Vāruṇī is attacked with an arrow and subsequently dies.

Epilogue

By the arrival of the second spring, the establishment of a republican form of government in Mithila has become secure. Vaiśālī and Mithila begin discussions aimed at joining in a republican association. In the capital at Sitagrāma, Mithila's earlier eastward territorial expansion is recalled. Between the capital Sitagrāma and Jitagrāma in eastern Mithila stood a vast forest. It was cleared and removed through the combined efforts of Brāhmaṇagrāma and Trigrāma.

A point concerning linguistics: certain distinctive Prakrit words, sounds, suffixes, and sentence constructions are found in Rigvedic hymns. Pāṇini established Sanskrit as a standard language, freed from regional particularities. In Karnataka, water is called nīru, while in northern India it is called jal; both forms, according to this discussion, are found in Sanskrit. In creating a language free from regional peculiarities, Pāṇini did not disregard any region. Instead, he drew upon the vocabularies of all regions and eliminated differences of pronunciation. Many Prakrit words were adopted into Sanskrit after phonetic modification, and this subsequently gave rise to the belief that the Prakrit words were tadbhavas, or derivative forms. This is why Sanskrit itself does not appear to possess tadbhava vocabulary. Similarly, Apabhraṃśa and Prakrit were languages of people who travelled throughout the country.

The development of the pantheon in India is linked to ideas concerning water. As long as the universe remains unmanifest, it is darkness and space; when it becomes manifest, it takes the form of water. Both space and water are elements in Indian thought. Mayanandji's depiction of the development of image worship is a simplification. The method of linguistic dissemination that he portrays in Strīdhan is likewise an excessive simplification.

The continuity of tradition through listening and oral recitation is evident in literature; in the Mahābhārata this can be seen repeatedly in many places. It is therefore not possible to declare several of its books interpolations merely on that account. An examination of the Vedic Prātiśākhyas would show that such an oral tradition was not possible in the presence of an established writing tradition; by the time of the Mahābhārata, however, the injunctions had become more rigid. The Mahābhārata states:

वेदविक्रयिणश्चैव वेदानांचैवदूषकः।

"Those who sell the Vedas and those who corrupt the Vedas ..."

वेदानांलेखकश्चैव तेवै निरयगामिनः॥

"... and those who write down the Vedas—all such people go to hell."

(Those who sell the Vedas, misinterpret them, or write them down are all destined for hell.)

The Karāla Episode: The Arthaśāstra describes Karāla Janaka's misdeeds as follows:

(१.६ विनयाधिकारिके प्रथमाधिकरणे षडोऽध्यायः इन्द्रियजये अरिषड्वर्गत्याग): तद्विरुद्धवृत्तिरवश्येन्द्रियश्चातुरन्तोऽपि राजा सद्यो विनश्यति- यथा
दाण्डक्यो नाम भोजः कामाद् ब्राह्मण कन्यायमभिमन्यमानः सबन्धराष्ट्रोविननाश करालश्च वैदेहः,...।

(Arthaśāstra 1.6, on the conquest of the senses and abandonment of the six inner enemies): A king who acts contrary to this discipline, unable to restrain his senses, is destroyed at once even if he rules the four quarters. Thus Daṇḍakya Bhoja, driven by desire for a Brahmin girl, perished along with his relatives and kingdom; likewise Karāla of Videha ...

The Jayamaṅgala commentary of the monk Prabhamati adds that while Karāla was looking towards a crowd at the Yogeśvara pilgrimage site, he noticed a beautiful Brahmin woman and forcibly took her to his kingdom. The Brahmin went to Karāla's capital and, weeping in anger, asked why the earth did not split open in a land ruled by such a wicked king. The earth opened, and Karāla sank into it and died with his family.

The abduction of a Brahmin woman as the cause of Karāla's downfall is mentioned in Aśvaghoṣa's Buddhacarita as well as in Kauṭilya's Arthaśāstra. The Dīpavaṃsa, however, describes Karāla Janaka's son and grandson as kings after him. The Brāhmaṇa texts represent Videha as a monarchy, whereas Buddhist texts describe it as a republic in which the king is chosen by a council; this difference of perspective explains the disagreement.

Thus Mayanand Mishra's historical journey has introduced a great many assertions that cannot be supported by reasoning.

Supplementary Discussion

I have reviewed Mayanand's historical consciousness on the basis of śruti, tradition, reasoning, and linguistics. The review seeks to avoid a mode of writing Indian history built out of the leftovers of Western scholars' intellectual feast, and to prevent the perspective of Central Asia and Europe from exerting even the slightest influence upon the assessment.

1. Agnā. The novel begins in 2000 BCE. It opens with an account of human beings living in caves. Bā is the strongest man in one group. An ancestral Bā, too, was powerful—the father of so many children. The ancestral Bā had invented a smaller stone and a larger one. The group leader was called am. Bā was also the name of an animal with a terrible smell. The importance of the hand increased, as did the distance between human beings and trees. From their ancestors, they knew that snakes were not to be killed and eaten. The ancient divinities were, first, the tree; second, the serpent; and third, the river. Bā had been fathering children by Ambā. A new axe and a new spinning implement were invented. People discovered that wild animals fled on hearing the sounds “aḥ,” “āḥ,” “ag,” and “agg.” The women bore children and enlarged the population. The first woman to receive an individual name was Agnā. Her male companion was Agg. Agnā became the leader of the group, and under her leadership it moved northward. The author then writes that the earth originated approximately two billion years ago, which he considers entirely correct. At one point in ritual usage one finds the formulation "ब्राह्मणे द्वितीये परार्धे श्री स्वेतवाराह कल्पे वैवस्वत मन्वंतरे अष्ठाविंशतितमे कलियुगे प्रथम चरणे"; a calculation based on this produces an age of 1,97,29,49,032 years for the earth. The radioactive method, he maintains, yields the same answer. Until the seventeenth century in Europe, the earth was considered four thousand years old; Iranian scholars placed its origin twelve hundred years in the past. Both views appear ridiculous when judged scientifically.

The second part begins with "Agnā–Śailā," dated 10,000 BCE. Here Mayanand Mishra depicts the beginnings of language, portraying particularly well the connection between the language of signs and sound. He also depicts the passage from a mobile to a settled life. The next chapter, "Śailā–Karālī," begins 7,500 years ago. It discusses cattle-rearing and the considerable increase in the number of cows. Everyone was a herdsman, wearing animal skins and carrying stone weapons at the waist. There were sheep, goats, pigs, and several other domesticated species. Grass ropes, the trident, and the serpent-deity are mentioned. Bā now comes to be called Ojā, while the group leader is named Śailā Karālī. As livestock increased, the theft of livestock also began. Meetings started taking place beneath the peepal tree. Karālī acquired the name Ambā.

The chapter "Maheṣ–Pārvatī" then begins, four to five thousand years ago. Rice cultivation commenced. When Pārvatī arrived, red earth was placed upon her forehead in accordance with local custom. Her son was named Gaṇeṣ. Previously children were not individually identified in this manner.

"Gaṇeṣ" begins four thousand years ago. It introduces changes in relations between women and men, and the beginnings of a patrilineal order. The procurement and consumption of salt commenced; the group that brought salt came to be called Nonī. The cultivation of barley and wheat and the milking of cows also began. So did the domestication of elephants and exchange through barter. People began offering water and leaves to the phallic deity. Barley was pounded and ground into meal; wheat was crushed, mixed with water, and cooked over fire. One distinct group kept birds. Funeral rites and lamentation for the dead began, as did writing.

"Har" is presented as beginning in 3500 BCE. Salt trading and the construction of better-shaped boats began. The unit called pailī was conceived for measurement. The plough began to be used together with bullocks. People started digging wells, spreading their settlements horizontally as well as lengthwise, and building houses. Groups of people with dark, fair, and copper-coloured complexions arrived at different times.

"Harkisan" begins 3,400 years ago. With agricultural development, the tendency towards permanent residence grew, and the structure of the family became clearer. Expanding agriculture increased the need for commerce. Woollen clothing, grinding mills, houses with walls, and well-enclosures began to be made.

The "Kisan" chapter begins in 3300 BCE. The sale of labour began. Agricultural development gathered momentum with the beginnings of irrigation. Geographical knowledge encouraged commerce, and the practice of wearing ornaments became more widespread.

"Harappā: Mohangāv" is set 3,200 years ago. A group working in wood is offered as an example of the sale of labour. Ornamentation became more prevalent. Bead necklaces and the potter's wheel appear, and class divisions begin to emerge in society.

"Gaṇeṣak Śrīgaṇeṣ" begins in 3100 BCE. The author discusses the building of Harappā by people arriving from the southern region. Mohenjo-daro, Lothal, and Chanhudaro developed into commercial centres. Writing, the cart with a wooden framework, and sculptural art were invented, while markets for barter began to be held. The Mesopotamian flood and the arrival of Sumerians and Asuras are also discussed.

"Kishn" begins in 3000 BCE. Foreign trade commenced, copper was discovered, and agricultural slavery also began. Raised mounds were constructed as protection against floods.

"Kishn Maṇḍal" begins in the period of 2400 BCE. The chapter discusses a shortage of rain and the fear created among the people by reports of Aryan movement eastward.

"Maṇḍal: Maṇḍalī" begins in 2200 BCE. In response both to the arrival of Aryans and to inadequate rainfall, Lothal began to develop as an alternative centre.

"Decline: Purandara" opens in 2000 BCE. With an account of an Aryan king destroying fortified settlements and the great centre of Harappā, Mayanandji concludes his first book, Prathamam Śailaputrī Ca. Constructed on theories that Aryans called Harappā Hariyūpiyā and that they came from outside, among others, this novel claims the status of a historical novel. It discusses a historical narrative extending from 20,000 BCE to 1800 BCE. Yet much of it does not appear convincing when considered in relation to independent historical thought and newer research.

The narrative that began with Agnā had inspired considerable hope. In the first chapter the author writes that the earth originated approximately two billion years ago and treats this as entirely correct. A ritual formulation reads "ब्राह्मणे द्वितीये परार्धे श्री स्वेतवाराह कल्पे वैवस्वत मन्वंतरे अष्टाविंशतितमे कलियुगे प्रथम चरणे"; a calculation on its basis produces 1,97,29,49,032 years as the earth's age. The radioactive method, he writes, also produces the same answer. It is estimated, in the argument presented here, that 1.67 parts of uranium change into lead over 10,00,00,000 years. The quantity of lead differs among rocks and rock formations. Such calculation is then taken to show the existence of radioactive substances 1,50,00,00,000 years ago; by this reckoning, no rock can be older than 2,00,00,00,000 years. Up to the seventeenth century Europe considered the earth four thousand years old, while Iranian scholars placed its origin twelve hundred years ago. In his first chapter the novelist rejects such Western scholarship, but by the end he has fallen under the influence of the Western prejudice expressed in the claim that the Aryans called Harappā Hariyūpiyā. He could not escape the leftovers of Western scholars' feast and subject the tradition of śruti to rational scrutiny. Thus, on the following grounds, Prathamam Śailaputrī Ca failed to give its historical narrative a satisfactory literary form:

> Archaeological, linguistic, and literary evidence, I argue, supports the view that Aryans were indigenous to India. Max Müller named the Aryan language family, while the missionary Robert Caldwell named the Dravidian family. The theory of an Aryan invasion arose from a footnote in Griffith's translation of the Rigveda. These labels were originally supplied by foreign scholars, who may have had purposes of their own.
>
> Voiced aspirates are characteristic of Rigvedic and Indian-language phonetics, not of Iranian or European languages. The civilisation between the Saraswatī and Sindhu rivers was, in this interpretation, Aryan civilisation. The Bharatas, Purus, and other groups living beside the Saraswatī composed the Rigveda. After a catastrophic flood on the Saraswatī, that civilisation moved away from the Saraswat region to Kuru-Pañcāla and Brahmarṣi-deśa, or Madhyadeśa. The Bharatas then lost their historical prominence. It is also possible, the argument suggests, that descendants of the Aryan people built the cities of Mohenjo-daro and Harappā after this inundation. Of the eight hundred Harappan sites, more than 530 lay along the course of the vanished Saraswatī. These centres depended comparatively little on the Sindhu, and their decline began when water flow in the Saraswatī diminished.

The first maṇḍala discusses Ṛjiśvā, daughter of Kākṣasenī, and Śāśvatī, daughter of Ṛturvit. It mentions a king's removal or exile by the people's assembly and committee, and the election of another king. It also discusses a change in eye colour from blue to dark, attributed to particular marriage practices; continual disturbances by groups called Kṛṣṇa along the Vitastā; and the mingling of blood on the Suvāstu. The possibility of prohibiting the gomedha, or bovine sacrifice, began to be debated. Slaves are mentioned. Following the fall of Hariyūpiyā and the abandonment of its towns, Balbūtha is said to have reorganised the devastated commercial arrangements of the non-Aryans.

The Mahāvairājī sacrifice is mentioned, as is the enslavement of an entire dasyu village, whose people could nevertheless undertake animal husbandry and trade as paṇis. In connection with Nagnajit, the author speaks of Brahmins who chanted mantras, Kṣatriyas who fought gaviṣṭi battles, and the viś, the ordinary people concerned principally with agricultural development. Here, however, Mayanandji also inserts the term "Vaiśya."

Only now does the narrative introduce the invasion of the "barbarian white Aryans." Apparently, like a section of foreign specialists, Mayanandji recognised what he calls this demonic assault only belatedly, and then made its perpetrators another branch of the Aryans. Once again we are told that Aryans burnt and destroyed Hariyūpiyā. Mohenjo-daro was abandoned through terror and then destroyed still further by an earthquake. Mayanandji seems confused at this point. A decline in rainfall is also mentioned.

The village of sages, Ṛṣigrāma, is described. There are indications of male and female slaves within households and of bull-rearing. The mantra-son's move to a village and his becoming viś or Vaiśya are also discussed. But as the narrative goes on, Mayanandji becomes increasingly entangled. Before the departure from the shores of the Caspian Sea, Dyaus and Tvaṣṭrī are said to have become subordinate divinities. A stage without divisions between Brahmin and Kṣatriya is described, when everyone was free to undertake any occupation. The Deva–Asura conflict, fighting on the banks of the Helmand, and pastoralism are discussed. Subsequently, Brahmin and Kṣatriya occupations began to diverge. Later, mantra-seeing sages began placing their own names and those of the gods in their hymns. The growing number of mantras led to the systematic practice of oral recitation and memorisation.

At the end appears a preface entitled "Ṛcāloka." Mantraputra, constructed around propositions that Indra abandoned the title Asura after the Deva–Asura conflict, that the Hittites and Mitanni moved, and that Aryans advanced eastward, fails to meet every criterion of historical authenticity.

The first suggestion that Aryan invaders came from the northwest and demolished the fortifications of an indigenous population, whose fortified inhabitants were more civilised, appeared in a footnote to Griffith's translation of the Rigveda. In 1947 Wheeler propounded the theory that the territory of partitioned Pakistan had been the centre of civilisation and that the Aryan attackers were foreigners. Earlier, the Indian scholar Ram Prasad Chanda had said that the people inhabiting these cities were the paṇis of the Rigveda. Marshall, however, had proposed in 1931 that Aryans entered India in 2000 BCE, by which time Harappā and Mohenjo-daro had already been destroyed. In 1934 Gordon Childe suggested that Aryans might possibly have been invaders. In 1938 Mackay rejected an invasion of Mohenjo-daro, since a handful of skeletons could not establish it. In 1964 Dales wrote "The Mythical Massacre at Mohenjo-daro," ridiculing the invasion legend. Wheeler subsequently retreated somewhat in 1966 but transferred the whole responsibility for an invasion from Mackay's tribal groups to Aryans from outside. He now said that an Aryan invasion could not be proved; nevertheless, it was not impossible merely because it could not be demonstrated. Stuart Piggott maintained this prejudice alongside Wheeler up to 1962. Piggott said that the Aryans had come from the Mitanni. Norman Brown also doubted the cultural relationship between Punjab and the rest of India. Emeneau, the American specialist in Sanskrit and Dravidian languages, wrote that the Indus Valley had never been culturally connected with the rest of India in quite that way, and that the Aryans who arrived there were closer to Iranian civilisation.

Engels, at this point, says that in Greece the transition from matriarchy to patriarchy was the greatest revolution of antiquity. This revolution, the discussion contends, had already taken place in the Rigvedic age. With the specialisation of labour, the role of the gotra in production diminished and that of the family increased. The successive development of gaṇa, gotra, kula, and household was related to the organisation of land held collectively. The Rigveda mentions potters, carpenters, blacksmiths, and metalworking. Ancient Iranian used ahura as the counterpart of asura. The Iranians worshipped Ahura, but the influence of Indian Asura-worshippers remained confined to Iran and did not spread further. In India the Asuras became evil, whereas in Iran the daēvas became evil. Throughout the Rigveda, however, the Asura possesses dignity: there is no maṇḍala in which one deity or another is not called Asura. Other Asuras opposed the gods, and Indra was invoked to destroy these adevās asurās, godless Asuras. Like Indra, Agni destroyed Asuras, although both Indra and Bṛhaspati themselves bore the title Asura. Asura was an epithet of divinity. Yet the Rigveda also treated Asuras as a separate class in relation to the Devas: Asuras breathed, whereas Devas did not. Asuras were older than Devas; hence Varuṇa, an Asura, was king of both gods and humans.

O Lord, may capable and all-knowing students arise in our land, and soldiers able to destroy the enemy. May our cows give abundant milk, our bullocks be able to bear heavy loads, and our horses run swiftly. May women be capable of leading our towns, and young people of giving vigorous speeches and exercising leadership in the assembly. May rain fall in our country when it is needed, and medicinal plants and herbs always reach maturity. Thus may every kind of welfare be ours. May the enemy's intelligence be destroyed and our friends prosper.

The passage contains the figure of speech vācaka-luptopamālaṅkāra, a simile in which the explicit marker of comparison is absent.

धे॒नुर्वो॑ढा॑न॒ड्वान्॒आ॒शुः धे॒नु-गौ वा वाणी र्वो॑ढा॑न॒ड्वा-पैघ बड़द न्॒आ॒शुः-आ॒शुः-त्वरित

Dhenu means cow (or speech); anaḍvān denotes a great bullock; āśu means swift. The original accent-marked forms and explanatory wording are retained above.

स॒प्ति॒ः-घोड़ा

Saptīḥ—horse.

Griffith's translation: "O Brahman, may the Brahmins of my realm be learned in sacred knowledge, the Kṣatriyas heroic and skilled in archery; may there be milch cows, swift-running animals, and enterprising women. May Parjanya send rain when needed, may fruit-bearing trees ripen, and may we acquire and preserve prosperity."

In the section on ritual application (viniyoga), there is discussion of how to date the early and later Vedic ages and the period of the Mahābhārata. The introduction of renunciation and the idea of mokṣa, the composition of Sūtra literature, Āraṇyakas, Upaniṣads, and Brāhmaṇa texts are addressed. So are the beginning of the theory of status by birth instead of action (janmanā rather than karmaṇā), the appearance of the term Śūdra, the consolidation of towns, punch-marked coinage, industry, and the use of iron. Mayanandji then writes that the Battle of the Ten Kings took place in 1800 BCE, that a combined group of Bharatas and Kuśika–Kassites crossed the Beas from the Saraswatī, traversed the mountainous Ilāvṛta region, and had established the monarchy of Kosala and Mithila before the development of Kuru–Pañcāla culture.

Purohit is divided into thirteen cantos and ends with an epilogue. Its first canto opens in Kāmpilya, the city of southern Pañcāla. The smoke rising at dusk from the cattle-shed of Atharvaṇapallī is described. The story advances through Medhā and Kuśabindu. At the hermitage of the sage Gālava, pupils first memorise the Rigveda and only subsequently receive agricultural instruction.

In the fifth canto, Vaiśyas are said to have abandoned the upanayana initiation, while both Kṣatriya sons and daughters still underwent it. Vaiśya girls were being deprived of education, whereas Brahmin girls studied with their fathers as well as in a gurukula. The priestly work of Brahmins left them little spare time.

In the eighth canto, the Indra festival includes chariot races, riding competitions, wrestling, swordsmanship, target-shooting, and extraordinary mimicry, including performances by the people of Vyāsapallī. There a vrātya named Karuṣ narrates the story of the Bhārata war. The account claims that long before that war, a mixed population of Bharatas, Tṛtsus, Kivis, and Sṛñjayas in Āryāvarta began calling themselves Śūdras, in proud remembrance of the Sumerian Ziusudra, even before the emergence of the monarchies of Kosala and Mithila and the culture of Kuru–Pañcāla.

The text describes a blessing that combines “ॐ मंत्रार्था सिद्धयः संतु मनोरथाः। शत्रूणां बुद्धिनाशोऽस्तु मित्राणामुदयस्तव” (“Oṃ, may the intentions of the mantra and cherished wishes be fulfilled; may the intelligence of your enemies perish and your friends prosper”) and dīrghāyur bhava (“May you live long”) with the mantra of the White Yajurveda, 22.22. Sacred dūrvā grass and unbroken rice grains (akṣata) are used, and the verses are sung with specific rhythm, movement, and pauses. Mayanandji also gives a translation inspired by Griffith's rendering.

अष्टौश्लोक सहस्राणि..... अहं वेद्मि शुको वेत्ति सञ्जयो वेत्ति वा न वा

“Eight thousand verses … I know, Śuka knows, and Sañjaya may or may not know.”

Sañjaya, Vyāsa, and Śuka, it is said, each remembered only 8,800 verses of the Bhārata. This means the Bhārata was so extensive that no single one of them could remember it in its entirety; on that reading the work composed by Vyāsa could never have contained fewer than 26,400 verses. The Jaya Saṃhitā is used as a name both for the Bhārata and for the Mahābhārata. The war books—four of the eighteen books, namely the Bhīṣma, Droṇa, Karṇa, and Śalya Parvans—are so closely connected with the other books that without reading the preceding books one cannot understand what follows. The war of the Iliad lasted ten years, yet the poem concerns itself only with the siege of Troy. The Mahābhārata, by contrast, begins much earlier with the causes of its eighteen-day war. The Bhīṣma Parvan is the sixth book, Droṇa the seventh, Karṇa the eighth, and Śalya the ninth; nine further books follow.

This work is the final link in Mayanand Babu's conception of history. After the prehistoric Prathamam Śailaputrī Ca, the Rigvedic Mantraputra, and the later-Vedic Purohit, comes a work situated in the age of Sūtra and Smṛti literature. Written in Hindi, the novel concerns Mithila. It opens with a preface by Mayanandji entitled "Background" (Pṛṣṭhabhūmi). After calculating the dates of the Rāmāyaṇa and Mahābhārata, he discusses the Śatapatha Brāhmaṇa as what he calls the historians' sole evidence.

There are descriptions of formal obeisance, blessings, and enquiries after well-being, while the topic of women's property (strīdhan) arises in conversation. It is also said that Vaiśālī was under Kosala for a time, but came under Mithila during the Bhārata war. King Karāla Janaka is described as overturning the convention that newly reclaimed forest land should remain free of taxation for five years.

The Pañcāla people are said to regard Vāsudeva Kṛṣṇa, the Andhaka–Vṛṣṇi leader, as the hero of the Jaya poem. Mayanandji cannot free his mind from what I consider the Western leftovers concerning Jaya and Bhārata: the false assertion recurs that the sage Vaiśampāyana added numerous verses to Vyāsa's Jaya to make the massive Bhārata. Kṛṣṇa Dvaipāyana Vyāsa is named as the author of Jaya, and the claim is repeated as though it possessed special evidentiary force.

The king's tyranny reaches its height. Apūrvā is compelled to renounce household life and relinquish her strīdhan as well.

The exemption from tax for five springs and the possible consequent migration of forest-dwellers and Śūdras are discussed. After Sīradhvaja Janaka, cattle-raiding is said to have become merely a ceremonial custom following a royal consecration. Karāla, however, does not return the cattle of his fellow-clansman Śoṇabhadra. He removes the chief priest from his position. A young doctor, the student Kṛtārtha, is summoned to treat the princess. With him comes Vāruṇī, the princess's companion and the daughter of the teacher Kṛtaka. She travels with her younger brother, the young student, but Karāla forcibly shuts his chamber and performs what he calls a gāndharva marriage with her. The first chapter's ninth and final section concludes with popular rebellion and the king fleeing on horseback.

Archers accompanied the trade caravan, bringing their dogs, and ordinary people travelled with the caravan as well. Varuṇa and Vāruṇī departed with them towards Aṅga, whose capital is named Campā and placed north of the Ganges.

The repeated references to "Aryanisation" show the influence of Western scholars upon Mayanandji. Both "Aryan" and "Dravidian," I argue, were terms brought into India by Westerners for their own vested interests. The text presents the expansion of Kosala and Videha and the entire history of the development of divinity. Mithila's familiar dahi–cūṛā, curd and flattened rice, is also mentioned.

Following agricultural production, people can exchange grain for other goods, and bullock carts can transport merchandise. The bhūdevas, or Brahmins, arrange a sacrifice lasting a month. In the course of language teaching, Brāhmaṇagāma becomes Bābhanagāma and Vanagrāma becomes Vanagāma by phonetic change. While returning from teaching the language, Vāruṇī is struck by an arrow and subsequently dies.

By the second spring the republican form of government in Mithila is securely established. Vaiśālī and Mithila begin discussions towards association in a republican framework. In the capital, Sitagrāma, Mithila's eastward expansion is discussed. A great forest lies between Sitagrāma and Jitagrāma in eastern Mithila, and the people of Brāhmaṇagrāma and Trigrāma jointly burn and clear it.

The development of the divine order in India is connected with ideas about water. As long as the world remains unmanifest, it is dark and is space; once manifest, it takes the form of water. Both space and water are elements of Indian thought. Mayanandji's depiction of image worship is an oversimplification, as is the method of linguistic dissemination represented in Strīdhan.

Literature preserves traditions through listening and oral transmission; this can be observed repeatedly in the Mahābhārata. One cannot, therefore, simply declare a number of its books interpolations on this ground. A study of the Vedic Prātiśākhyas would reveal that such a state of affairs was impossible alongside a written tradition; by the time of the Mahābhārata, however, rigidity had increased. The Mahābhārata gives the following description:

(१.६ विनयाधिकारिके प्रथमाधिकरणे षडोऽध्यायः इन्द्रियजये अरिषड्वर्गत्यागः): तद्विरुद्धवृत्तिरवश्येन्द्रियश्चातुरन्तोऽपि राजा सद्यो विनश्यति- यथा

("In the first book, chapter six, on discipline, conquest of the senses, and renunciation of the six inner enemies: even a king ruling the four quarters is quickly destroyed when he acts against these principles and cannot control his senses; as in the following example—")

दाण्डक्यो नाम भोजः कामाद् ब्राह्मण कन्यायमभिमन्यमानः सबन्धराष्ट्रोविननाश करालश्च वैदेहः,... ।

("The Bhoja named Daṇḍakya, through lustful aggression towards a Brahmin girl, perished together with his kin and kingdom; and so did Karāla of Videha ...")

In his Jayamaṅgalā commentary, the monk Prabhamati adds that Karāla, looking towards a crowd at the Yogeśvara pilgrimage site, saw a beautiful Brahmin woman and forcibly carried her off to his kingdom. The Brahmin went to Karāla's capital and, weeping and enraged, cried out, "Why does the earth not split open in a place where such a wicked king lives?" The earth split, and Karāla sank into it and died along with his family.

2. The Floods of Mithila

Abstract

The land of Mithila has long struggled against the devastation caused by floods. Around Kuśeśvarasthān, land remains submerged during the rainy season even without a river flood. Earlier this whole region was fertile; stagnant water began to accumulate there with the unchecked construction of embankments in India.

Keywords: Mithila · Floods · Critical Studies · Maithili

The land of Mithila has long struggled against the devastation caused by floods. Around Kuśeśvarasthān, land remains submerged during the rains even without a flood. This condition, however, dates from after 1978–79. Previously the entire region was fertile; stagnant water began accumulating with the uncontrolled construction of embankments in India. Yet one almost never hears news of flooding in this area. When reports do appear, they merely repeat the misleading claim that the accumulated water was released from Nepal. The people around Kuśeśvarasthān have learned the art of confronting this new calamity. I remember being advised to visit Mahīṣī's Ugratārā shrine from Kuśeśvarasthān during the floods because, I was told, travel by boat is easier then. In the dry season boats cannot pass through the pits and shallow hollows, and the less said about the roads the better. The cropping pattern has changed; through makeshift fish-rearing and other adaptations, this region has been forced to learn an entire way of surviving.

Whether the havoc wrought by Queen Kauśikī in 2008 will put an end to that disinformation remains to be seen!

Let us first ask who controls the two barrages on the Koshi and Gandak rivers in Nepal. Their control rests with the Water Resources Department of the Bihar government, and Bihar's engineers manage them. Decisions about releasing water are in the hands of that department. Nepal would have the authority to release water if dams or barrages were built on its other rivers. Yet even after more than fifty years, no agreement between the two countries has made such construction possible. Why?

The contemporary sequence of events. The Bhimnagar Barrage on the Koshi lies at Kusaha, Nepal. The barrage was built in 1958 with an estimated life of thirty years, which expired in 1988. Why could the two countries reach no agreement? Sand accumulating between the barrage structures is normally removed every year. Without this removal the bed level rises, and the embankments must then be raised year after year. Why was this work not begun on time that year? Then the rains arrived. On 18 August a breach two metres wide appeared in the Koshi embankment. I witnessed the flood of 1987. Near the Jhanjharpur embankment the water struck with such force that it overflowed at one place, and before my eyes I saw a breach of one metre spread into a gap stretching kilometres. By 27–28 August 2008 the breach at Bhimnagar had reached two kilometres. The Koshi consequently abandoned its main channel and took a new course, devastating the Nepalese and Bihari parts of Mithila alike. NASA images dated 8 and 24 August 2008 showed a separation of 200 kilometres between the new and old courses of Kauśikī. The Bhimnagar Barrage had, in effect, become a barrage on a tributary channel of the Koshi.

A national disaster. When a disaster strikes a state, that state requests assistance from the central government. A team of central ministers visits the affected state and submits its report; another ministerial team considers that report and decides whether the calamity is a national disaster. While Bihar's politicians were busy blaming one another, forgetting their failures of fifty years, Prime Minister Manmohan Singh visited and declared it a national disaster. The reason was that it was a Level-3 disaster, beyond the capacity of the state alone—whether in financial resources or the ability to organise relief. Assistance was then being provided from the National Calamity Contingency Fund, and the waiver of farmers' loans was also possible.

What is to be done? The calamity at Kuśeśvarasthān comes every year, and everyone seems simply to have forgotten it. What, then, should be done now? Why could work like the Damodar Valley and Mayurakshi projects not be undertaken on the Koshi, Kamla, Bhutahi Balan, Gandak, Burhi Gandak, and Bagmati rivers? Why has Visvesvaraya's Vrindavan Dam succeeded? For how long shall we deceive the public by blaming the Nepal government? The only solution, I argue, is to use heavy machinery to demolish and remove the earthen embankments built on the Kamla–Balan and similar rivers and to replace unlined canals with properly constructed lined canals. There must be discussions with Nepal's government and a prompt settlement. Until then, short-term measures should be undertaken: remove sand deposited within the embankments before the rains; repair the embankments in advance instead of waiting for the monsoon; and keep political ambition out of all this work. Several new embankments would be needed to force the Koshi back into its former course, and these could never provide a lasting solution.

The Kamla River

Benefits and losses from canals. There is the problem of unlined canals, compounded by fundamental defects in design. One example will suffice to show how casually projects have been built. The principal western canal drawn from the Kamla runs from Jaynagar towards Umraon, from east to west. The land, however, slopes from north to south. What happens, or must happen, during the rains? The canal turns into an embankment, trapping water to its north. Whether this canal-cum-embankment irrigates anyone's fields or not, crops on its northern side are certain to be submerged every year. A canal's route is changed so that some influential gentleman's land should not fall within it!

An embankment was built along the Kamla between Jaynagar and Jhanjharpur in 1960, and with it began the destruction of the entire region. I have already described what happened beyond Jhanjharpur in my account of Kuśeśvar. The stories of Madhepur, Ghanshyampur, and Singhia are no different. As sand accumulated between the two Kamla–Balan embankments, everything was devastated within twenty years of their construction. The Kamla joined the Balan near Pipraghat in 1954 when a large obstruction of driftwood from the Himalayan river blocked its route. Now its water level can rise by more than two metres in ten hours. From 1965 onward, sand accumulated so heavily between the embankments that people began demanding both their height be raised and, alternatively, that they be demolished.

The Koshi. Water reaches the Koshi from Mount Everest, Kanchenjunga, the Gaurishankar summit, and the Makalu range. In Nepal the Saptakoshi system comprises the Indravati, Sunkoshi (Bhote Koshi), Tama Koshi, Likhu Koshi, Dudh Koshi, Arun Koshi, and Tamor Koshi.

Of these, the Indravati, Sunkoshi, Tama Koshi, Likhu Koshi, and Dudh Koshi unite to form the Sunkoshi, which flows broadly west to east, although its tributaries flow broadly north to south. These five streams bring water from the Gaurishankar summit and the Makalu range.

The Arun Koshi draws its water from the Mount Everest (Sagarmatha) region and flows approximately north to south.

The Tamor Koshi flows broadly east to west, receiving water from the Kanchenjunga range.

The three branches—the Sunkoshi, Arun Koshi, and Tamor Koshi—meet at Triveni in Dhankuta district to become the Saptakoshi. Ten kilometres downstream lies Chatra, where the Mahakoshi, Saptakoshi, or Koshi descends onto the plains. After flowing roughly fifty kilometres southward through Nepal, the Koshi enters India near Hanumannagar–Bhimnagar. It turns a little towards the southwest, then towards the southeast and from west to east, and joins the Ganges near Kursela after a course of approximately 130 kilometres within India. The Bagmati and Kamla also join the Koshi around the meeting area of Saharsa, Darbhanga, and Purnia districts.

The first embankment on the Koshi was the Vīr Bāndh, built by Lakshman II in the twelfth century; its remains can still be found south of Bhimnagar.

Construction of the barrage near Bhimnagar was accompanied by the Eastern Koshi Embankment and the Eastern Koshi Canal.

In 1966 the Kunwar Sen Commission proposed a Dagmara Barrage twenty-three kilometres downstream of Bhimnagar to control the Koshi, but the plan became mired in controversy and politics. It offered two benefits: it could replace the Bhimnagar Barrage when the latter's service life ended, and it could develop inland water transport from Uttar Pradesh to Assam, greatly benefiting north Bihar. Yet the central irrigation minister, Dr K. L. Rao, did not allocate money for constructing it. The Western Koshi Canal was introduced instead, slowly and haphazardly; work on it was still continuing.

Nothing effective could be done for the Koshi. When proposals were made, they were rejected. The time in which the work should have been completed passed in dispute. A cheaper plan was approved in place of the Dagmara Barrage, but that plan too was still awaiting completion!

Visvesvaraya comes to mind. Dams were constructed on the Musi and Esi rivers, eighty-two miles from Hyderabad, and a subsidiary channel of the Musi was built six and a half miles from the city. Embankments were also raised along both banks inside the city. Visvesvaraya proposed that the Krishnaraja Sagar Dam be built to a height of 130 feet, and the Mysore state sent the plan to the British authorities. Viceroy Hardinge reduced the permitted height to eighty feet. Visvesvaraya compensated by widening the dam's lower section. A flood then intervened. He employed additional labour, appointed doctors for workers afflicted by malaria and other diseases, installed Washington lamps for working at night, and supervised the work personally to make up for the time lost. Such was his patriotism that he did not import cement. Instead the dam was built using surkhi, a mixture made from sand, calcium-bearing material, stone, and powdered fired bricks. A two-level canal system had already been constructed before the dam itself.

Delhi is still far away! In addition to the Prime Minister's and Chief Minister's disaster relief funds, Delhi residents can contribute to the funds of voluntary organisations.

But the long-term task is to exert pressure upon the central government in Delhi on the following points.

1. Why should schools and colleges not close during the flood season instead of having a summer vacation? What makes such a decision difficult? Neither the CBSE nor the ICSE—nor even the Bihar Board—has managed to do this. If people in Delhi persuade the CBSE and ICSE to implement this change, the Bihar Board may follow out of sheer embarrassment.

2. Begin the Dagmara Barrage project in India, since the Bhimnagar Barrage has exceeded its designed service life. Funding should be obtained from the railway and road ministries as well, because a railway and road can—and should—be built across it.

3. While the barrage is being constructed, build lined canals in accordance with the natural slope of the land.

4. Demolish and remove the earthen embankments, make permanent embankments motorable, and plant sufficient trees on both sides.

5. As Bihar's road projects have begun to look like a dream coming true, remove every obstruction and begin work on all these measures on a war footing.

Only by forming a lobby in Delhi and exerting pressure on the central government and its ministries over these points can Bihar fashion a new image. Only then will the embankment undertaking begun in the twelfth century finally be completed, and the rivers be transformed into servants of humanity.

3. Society and Culture in the Lorik Epic

Abstract

The Lorik epic mentions neither a historically famous king nor the dates of Lorik's birth or marriage. Because its language has been preserved orally, its form remains fluid. Its dating is therefore based on conjecture.

Keywords: Lorik · Epic · Society · Culture · Critical Studies · Maithili

The Lorik epic mentions neither a historically famous king nor the dates of Lorik's birth or marriage. Because the medium of its language is oral, its form is continually changing, and attempts at dating are founded on conjecture. Lorik was born in the village of Gaurā, while the region of his exploits stretches from Punjab to Nepal and Bengal. His wife's ancestral village is Agaurī, said to stand beside the Son River.

Lorik's marriages. His first marriage was to Māǰarī of Agaurī; his second was to Canmā, who bore a son named Canraitā. He married a third time, to the sorceress Jamunī Baniyāin of Hardīgaṛh, by whom he had a son named Bosārakh.

Lorik's brother Sāṽarū, too, was a hero, but he was killed by the Kol king Devasiyā. Lorik was subsequently wounded in battle, and at the Bohā cattle station his son Bhorik defeated Devasiyā. In old age Lorik entered the fire in a final act of self-immolation.

The Lorik narrative. It includes the birth of Sābaur and Lorik's incarnation; the marriage of Sāṽarū; the birth of Māǰair; Lorik's marriage to Māǰair and his battles with King Maulāgat and Niramaliyā; the wedding of Sāṽarū and Satiyā; the conflict between Jhimlī and Lorik; the marriage of Canainiyā and Śivahar; and Lorik's battle with Beṇṭhā Camār. It recounts the love of Lorik and Canmā, their departure for Hardīgaṛh, and his conflicts with King Raṇpāl and Mahipat. Lorik and Canmā live in Hardīgaṛh; Lorik fights Gajbhimlā, attacks Neurpur, and fights Harebā–Barebā. Sāṽarū dies in the war against the Kol people. Lorik arrives at the Bohā cattle station, attacks Pīprīgaṛh, and fights Devasiyā; Lorik then departs this world and Bhorik assumes leadership. The first battle of Pīprī was fought alongside Sāṽarū, and the second alongside Lorik. Thereafter Lorik goes to Kāśī, where he dies.

The Religious, Social, and Political Aspects of the Lorik Manuār Epic

Lorik emerges without a known lineage-name or gotra. The Yadav community honours its revered Lorik through chāṙ pūjā, worshipping him as a folk divinity and venerating him as a people's hero.

A Maithili version of the Lorikāyan occurs in the collection of the archaeologist Alexander Cunningham. The Quarterly Journal of the Mythic Society, volume 5, pages 122–135, discusses the Lorikāyan of Bhagalpur. In Cunningham's travel account in the Archaeological Survey Report, volume 16 (1883), pages 27–28, Lorik and two neighbouring kings, Seuhar or Sarikkā, are described as inhabitants of the village of Gaurā.

John Hunter submitted a report on Lorik in the Bhagalpur Gazetteer, pages 48–50.

The Lorik epic is known as Lorikāyan, Lorikī, and Lorik Maniār. In Mithila it is celebrated under the title Lorik Maniār.

Lorik's grandson—his son's son—was named Indal. The Maithili Lorik Maniār discusses Lorik's marriage, the search for a bride for him, and his subsequent battle against King Sahdev in considerable detail.

The Mahuarī section describes the selection of a horse for visiting Gajbhīmal's wrestling ground and Lorik's killing of Gajbhīmal by repeatedly throwing him to the ground.

Lorik kills Harbā–Barbā.

The epic begins with sumiran, an invocation of remembrance, and bandhan, a song of homage.

Invocation (sumiran): "इनती करै छी दुरुगा मिनती तोहार।"
"I plead with you, Durgā; my supplication is to you."

Song of homage (bandhan): "आ-दुरुगा गइ पुरुब खण्ड हे गइ"
"Ah, Durgā went towards the eastern region, O she went."

Thereafter:

1. The Marriage Section; 2. The Mahuarī Section; 3. The War Section.

Maṇipadmā's division is as follows: 1. The Birth Section; 2. The Satī Māǰarī Section; 3. The Canain Section; 4. The Battle Section; 5. The Sāvar Section; 6. The Bājil Section; 7. The Reconciliation Section; and 8. The Bhairavī Section, obtained from Nepal.

—Buṛhkūvā Raut of Gaurā village used to make strips or splints from palm-tree trunks. He could carry five to seven hundred wrestlers on his back and walk fourteen kos before returning. Yet he had no household or property to speak of. He had two sons, Lorik Maniār and Sāod Sardār.

—Sevācan Raut, headman of Agaurī, wore a dhoti eighty yards long and a turban fifty-two yards long. He had a horse called Tetaliyā. His daughter Māǰarī played suptī–maunī with seven hundred companions. To arrange her marriage, Sevācan went to Buṛhkūvā's house and challenged Lorik at the wrestling ground. Sevācan could rub his palms with fifty-six man of earth, but Lorik tossed him up like a small play-ball, caught him like a larger ball, and tucked him under his arm.

On the wedding day King Ugrā Pamār tried to seize Buṛhkūvā, who cut off the neck of the wrestler Bhakulā. The marriage took place. King Ugrā Pamār summoned Sanikā and Manikā, but Lorik beheaded both of them. When Lorik was travelling around Gaurā, King Sahdev of Hardī attacked him. Lorik defeated Sahdev, carried his daughter Canāi to Mahīcan's courtyard, and married her. King Mahuarī then imprisoned Mahīcan, but released him out of fear of Lorik. He nevertheless sent Gajbhīmal, commander of the Silhaṭ wrestling ground; Lorik severed his head, after which friendship was established with the king. Together they fought King Harbā–Barbā. Harbā–Barbā fled but sent the wrestler Dhuthrā. Lorik gouged out his right eye and cut out his tongue. Harbā–Barbā attacked again and fled; then came his nephew, Prince Anār. Lorik beheaded Anār and flung his head before Harbā–Barbā's queen Padmā. Harbā–Barbā attacked once more. On the battlefield of Dihulī, Lorik cut off the head of Harbā–Barbā, ruler of Hāvīgaṛh, and hurled it into the inner apartments of the royal palace. Lorik fought thirty-six battles. He was also attentive to the development of agriculture. One account tells how the occupation of another people's land displaced numerous birds, animals, and insects, which then went to Indra.

—An expansion of the power of those now placed near the bottom of the social hierarchy, and of women, in both spiritual and worldly senses.

—Conflicts between castes at different levels of the social hierarchy. Lorik destroys wicked characters belonging to castes now described as "lower." His devotion to the Goddess is said to be the cause of his victories.

But Lorik's enemies also include Mochanī and Gajbhīmal, who occupy supposedly higher places on the social ladder, while his friends include Rajal, placed among the supposedly lower castes.

He frees the Brahmin woman Duhbī–Suhbī and the Kṣatriya Gāĝe from the grip of King Harbā.

Ughrā Pāvār, Harbā–Barbā, Sonikā, Manikā, Baṇṭhā, Kolhamkaṛā, and Karṇā are kings or characters assigned to supposedly lower positions in the caste hierarchy. There is worship of the Mother Goddess; Indra's wife arrives disguised as Durgā, and Lorik, thinking her his own wife, touches her and suffers distress. Lorik is reunited with Māĵarī, and the journey to Kāśī follows.

—The epic is performed at fairs, markets, homes of prominent people, and public places, so its listeners are not confined to the Yadav community. Creator and audience have a direct relationship. The performance is intended to be heard; the story may receive spontaneous embellishment. Yet the formal literary features one might expect—organisation into cantos, metrical composition, dramatic junctures and their subsidiary elements, and a scheme for presenting the subject—are absent or irregular. The narrative is not tightly organised. Abuse occurs in the performance, and drinking is described here and there. Theft and the position of thieves in rural life are depicted. Local gods and goddesses are mentioned, and the epic functions as a symbol of caste identity. The epic singer is an extempore poet: he has a basic framework but sings it in his own manner, not by memorising every word. Invocations at the beginning and occasional appeals to God for forgiveness help him sustain his capacity to perform. During a performance lasting more than an hour, the hookah or chillum, the consumption of liquor, and descriptions of the surrounding environment may enter the singing. The singer may be illiterate yet possess a store of knowledge greater than that of a literate person. In Lorik Maniār, the number of listeners and their absorption and concentration affect the storyteller's performance, since he narrates directly before them. In this sense external influences bear more strongly upon him than upon the storyteller of Salhes, whose epic is recited before his chosen deity rather than before an audience.

Although the essential plot of the epic remains broadly the same, the mode of performance is distinctive because of the particular society, activities, and social conventions involved.

War, gambling, love, and marriage are cultural elements of the great epics. Gambling is a mental battle, and people themselves can become stakes, as in the Mahābhārata and the Lorikāyan.

The Goddess Durgā helps the hero in battle. Canain leaves Śivdhar and elopes with Lorik. Lorik gambles with Mahpatiyā of the Dusadh caste and loses Canain as a stake. She protests. Jewellery and ornaments are then staked; with sexually provocative gestures Canain distracts Mahpatiyā, allowing Lorik to win. Lorik cuts off Mahpatiyā's head. Even after her husband has behaved improperly, the wife offers him counsel.

Lorik's Incarnation and the Supernatural

In anger as in love, abusive speech belongs to the unrestricted cultural character of the poetry. Nature has not been hidden away; the hero himself uses abuse.

The worship of Śiva and Śakti, the borrowing of names and other elements from the great epics, reveal the openness and tolerance of the singer of Lorik Maniār. His powers of performance and range of knowledge prevent me from calling him unlettered in the deeper sense.

Religious beliefs, the hero's character, and social custom are presented as a living cultural order. Most of the attributes of epic poetry—rasa, metre, poetic qualities, ornamentation, attention to cantos, prevailing religious values, cultural comprehensiveness, and the singer's creative power—can be found here.

To change the testimony gathered through fieldwork on folk-epic singing and dancing—for example, by removing abuse—according to one's own cultural moral standards is unforgivable. The researcher must place himself within that society while keeping the purpose of the study in view. Neither wording nor sentence construction should be altered. The epic concerns the protection of women and the village, the destruction of wrongdoers, and support for herders and cultivators.

Lorik's companions include Baṇṭhā Camār, Vārū the watchman (Paswan), Rajal the washerman, and his brother Sāvar.

The Salhes epic belongs to the Tarai region. There are many more descriptions of forests and wild animals, with wildlife assisting Salhes; hunting and sacrifice are also depicted. Clay horses are placed at places of Salhes worship, but not in the Lorikāyan tradition.

Lorik Maniār contains more supernatural and mysterious episodes but almost no wild animals in forest settings. Lorik is an incarnate hero, yet he is not worshipped through an established formal ritual.

The crow Bājil sets fire to Kolhamkaṛā's stronghold with a half-burnt cow-dung cake.

—Udhra–Pāvār's elephant, Kajjal Giri.

—Lorik's horse, Kaṭrā.

—The commander Barbā's horse, Barchebā.

—Bājil the crow.

Yet in the Lorik Maniār epic these are not wild animals: they are domesticated and cared for.

Lorik's actual Hardīgaṛh and his celebrated field of action, I argue, are at Hardīsthān in Saharsa district, because the name Durgāsthān is associated with Hardī east of Supaul. With this Hardī are associated Mahīcandra Sahu, King Mahbair, Neurpur (Nauhatta), Gājerīpur (Gauripur), Kherdahā (Khairā stream), Rahuā–Candrāyan–Mainā village, Bairāghāṭ, the Tilābe stream, Bairā grove, and Mahbairiyā village. The similarity between the anklets recovered from the epic site at Bairāghāṭ and those found in excavations west of Hardī High School is offered as evidence of this connection.

A noticeboard of the Railways at Supaul station states: "Five kilometres east of here, at Hardī Durgāsthān, may be seen the historic sites associated with Goddess Durgā and the heroic Lorik."

Near Nauhatta there is a sage-associated site and a Pali-language inscription from the Pala period. Haridrāgaṛh extended over fourteen kos. The thirteenth-century Varṇaratnākara mentions Lorik; in its second kallola it also refers to the Lorik dance. Formerly this was a dance performance; today it is an epic recitation.

Neurī is a village thirteen kilometres east of Biraul subdivision in Darbhanga, where there is an old fort said to be connected with King Lorik.

4. The Exploration of Mithila

Abstract

This article presents a concise account drawn from more than a decade of my travels through Mithila. The contribution of local residents and guides at these places has been beyond description. Sometimes even the drivers of hired vehicles proved to be excellent guides.—Gajendra Thakur

1. Gauri–Shankar Sthan. Located between the villages of Jamthari and Hainthi Bali in Madhubani district, the site is particularly notable for a composite image of Gauri and Shankar and a Pala-dynasty inscription written on it in Mithilakshar.

Keywords: Mithila · exploration · criticism · Maithili

This article presents a concise account drawn from more than a decade of my travels through Mithila. The contribution of local residents and guides at these places has been beyond description. Sometimes even the drivers of hired vehicles proved to be excellent guides.—Gajendra Thakur

1. Gauri–Shankar Sthan. Situated between Jamthari and Hainthi Bali villages in Madhubani district, this place is particularly noteworthy for its composite image of Gauri and Shankar and the Pala-period inscription on it in the Mithilakshar script. Among ancient sites, it is exceptional in having been fully developed through the cooperation of enthusiastic local villagers. The bustle and festivities here during Shivaratri are worth seeing. The site lies two to three kilometres north of Bideshwar Sthan.

2. Bhith–Bhagwanpur Inscription. An inscription connected with Malladeva, son of King Nanyadeva, is found here. The site lies within Madhepur police-station jurisdiction in Madhubani district.

3. Hulas Patti. Near Jageshwar Sthan, within Phulparas police-station jurisdiction in Madhubani district, lies the village of Hulas Patti, where there is a black-stone image of Lord Vishnu.

4. Piprahi. All four arms of the Vishnu image in Piprahi village, within Laukaha police-station jurisdiction, have been broken.

5. Madhuban. At Madhuban village in Nepal, ten kilometres north of Piprahi, there is an image of four-armed Vishnu.

6. The Local Vachaspati Museum at Andhratharhi. The magnificent image of a yakshini from Gaud village is housed here.

7. Kamaladitya Sthan. The Vishnu temple at Kamaladitya Sthan, near Andhratharhi village, was established by Shridhar Das, minister of the Karnata king Nanyadeva.

8. Rakhbari. A Vishnu image kept beneath a tree in Rakhbari village, Jhanjharpur subdivision, was fashioned in the Gandhara style.

9. Pajebagarh, Banahi Tola. A Buddha image was once found here, but its present whereabouts are unknown. This site too is near Rakhbari village.

10. Musaharniya Dih. Three kilometres west of Andhratharhi, near Pastan village, is a high mound. It contains a single-chamber structure assigned to the Buddhist period, Buddhist images, coins, fragments of pottery and remains of Pajeba.

11. Bhagirathpur. An inscription in Bhagirathpur village near Pandaul provides information about the administration of Ramabhadradeva and Lakshminath, the last two rulers of the Oinwar dynasty.

12. Akaur. At Akaur village, twenty kilometres to the west and north of Madhubani, is a high mound with images dating to the Buddhist period.

13. Balirajpur Fort. Balirajpur village is five kilometres east of Babubarhi block in Madhubani district. To its south are the remains of an ancient fort, four kilometres long and one kilometre wide, enclosed by walls ten feet thick.

14. Asurgarh Fort. Mithila's second fort, near Mahadev Math on the bank of the Tilyuga watercourse at the northeastern boundary of Madhubani district, extends over fifty acres.

15. Jaynagar Fort. Mithila's third fort stands on the India–Nepal border, near ancient Jaipur and present-day Jaynagar. A copperplate inscription obtained from Panchobh village near Darbhanga mentions Jaipur.

16. Nandangarh. This fort lies twelve miles northwest of Bettiah. There are fifteen high mounds arranged in three rows.

17. Lauriya–Nandangarh. Located north of Nandangarh, this site contains an Ashokan pillar and a Buddhist stupa.

18. Dekuligarh. Three kilometres east of Sheohar district, beside the highway, are the remains of two forts, surrounded by moats.

19. Katragarh. At Katra village in Muzaffarpur stands a vast fort, with moats dug on all four sides, as at Dekuligarh.

20. Naulagarh. This fort, covering 350 acres, lies twenty-five kilometres north of Begusarai.

21. Mangalgarh. In Begusarai district, within Bariyarpur police-station jurisdiction, a high mound rises amid Kanwar Lake. This fort is located there.

22. Alauligarh. Near Alauli village, fifteen kilometres north of Khagaria, is a fort spread over one hundred acres.

23. Kichakgarh. In Purnia district, ten kilometres north of Dengraghat, this fort is situated east of the Mahananda River.

24. Benugarh. This fort stands on the bank of the Kawal watercourse within Tedhagachh police-station jurisdiction.

25. Varijangarh. Six kilometres south of Bahadurganj, this fort lies beside the Lonsawari watercourse.

26. Gautam Tirtha. Near Brahmpur village, six kilometres west of Kamtaul station, is a sacred tank known as Gautam Kund.

27. Halavarta. Sitamarhi town, thirty-five kilometres southwest of Janakpur, has the Halveshwar Shiva temple and Janaki temple. One and a half kilometres away, in the Pundarik area, is Sitakund. According to the tradition associated with Halavarta, Janaka found Sita while ploughing the field. Fairs are held here on Ram Navami (the ninth day of the bright fortnight of Chaitra) and Janaki Navami (the ninth day of the bright fortnight of Vaishakh).

28. Phulhar. At Phulhar village, within Harlakhi police-station jurisdiction in Madhubani district, lay Janaka's flower garden, where Sita used to gather flowers.

29. Janakpur. The Mithila-mahatmya section of the Brihad-Vishnu Purana describes the Janakpur region. In the seventeenth century, the saint Sur Kishore found two magnificent images of Rama and Janaki in the Sarayu River at Ayodhya and installed them in the Janaki temple at Janakpur. The present temple was built in 1911 through the patronage of the queen of Tikamgarh. The Yamuni, Gerukha and Dudhavati watercourses surround the town. Fairs are held on Ram Navami (Chaitra, bright-fortnight ninth), Janaki Navami (Vaishakh, bright-fortnight ninth) and Vivah Panchami (Agahan, bright-fortnight fifth).

30. Dhanusha. At Dhanusha Sthan, fifteen kilometres north of Janakpur, a bow-shaped fragment lies beneath a peepal tree. According to local tradition it is the bow broken by Rama. To its east flows the Banganga, said to have been brought forth by an arrow shot by Lakshmana.

31. Sugga. Near Jaleshwar Shivdham, close to Janakpur, Sugga village contains the hermitage of Shukadeva. Shukadeva came to Mithila to receive instruction from Janaka and was accommodated here.

32. Singheshwar. The Singheshwar Shiva pilgrimage site lies near Gauripur village, five kilometres from Madhepura.

33. Kapileshwar. The shrine of Mahadeva, established by the sage Kapila, is six kilometres west of Madhubani.

34. Kusheshwar. Northeast of Samastipur, sixty kilometres southeast of Laheriasarai and twenty-five kilometres west of Saharsa, this is a celebrated Shiva pilgrimage site. It also contains a bird sanctuary where, from November to March, many birds may readily be seen: white and black gaibar, lalsar, dighauchh, mail, nakta, gairi, gagan, silli, adhani, harial, chaha, karan and ratba. The local bird names are retained as recorded.

35. Simardah. This Shiva temple is near Thalwara station, beside Shivsinghpur village, founded by Shiv Singh.

36. Somnath. Somdev Mahadev is worshipped near the Sabhagachhi in Saurath village, Madhubani district.

37. Madneshwar. The Madneshwar Shiva shrine stands four kilometres east of Andhratharhi in Madhubani district.

38. Kundagram. Some thirty-two kilometres northeast of Hajipur, near Basadh–Vaishali and Vasokund, and two kilometres northeast of a fortified mound, lies Kundagram, where the twenty-fourth Jain tirthankara Mahavira is said to have been born. The site contains relics or ashes attributed to the Buddha, the Abhishek Pushkarini (the tank in which kings bathed before coronation), an Ashokan pillar and an assembly building (Raja Vishal's fort).

39. Chandeshwar. Near Hardi village at Jhanjharpur is the Chandeshwar Shiva shrine, established by Chandeshwar Thakur.

40. Bideshwar. This Shiva pilgrimage site near Lohna Road station in Madhubani district was established by Maharaja Madhav Singh. There is also an inscription from that period in the Mithilakshar script.

41. Shilanath. Shilanath Mahadev is worshipped on the bank of the Kamla watercourse near Jaynagar.

42. Ugranath. A shivalinga of Ugna Mahadev stands at Bhawanipur village near Pandaul station, south of Madhubani. When Vidyapati felt thirsty, Mahadev in the form of Ugna drew Ganga water from his matted hair and gave it to the poet to drink. At Vidyapati's insistence, Ugna revealed his true form as Shiva here.

43. Uchchaith Chhinnamastika Bhagavati. At Uchchaith, sixteen kilometres northeast of Kamtaul station, Kalidasa worshipped the Goddess. The original image of the Goddess is headless.

44. Ugratara. At Mahishi, the birthplace of Mandana Mishra, Ugratara is Mandana's family goddess.

45. Bhadrakalika. The Bhadrakalika temple is at Koilakh village in Madhubani district.

46. Chamunda. Near Katragarh in Muzaffarpur district, on the bank of the Lakshmana or Lakhandei watercourse, Durga slew Chanda and Munda. The temple stands at that place.

47. Parsa Sun Temple. A magnificent image of Surya, four and a half feet high, has been found in Parsa village, five kilometres east of Sangram near Jhanjharpur.

48. Bisfi. Bisfi village is within Benipatti police-station jurisdiction in Madhubani district, six kilometres east of Kamtaul railway station and four kilometres west of Kapileshwar Sthan. This is Vidyapati's birthplace; a memorial to the poet stands here.

49. Mandar Mountain. At this site in Banka there is a seventh-century Gupta-period inscription in Mithilakshar. Mandar was used, according to tradition, to churn the ocean. Nearby, at Bounsi, are two images of Vasupujya Nath, the twelfth Jain tirthankara. The larger image is of red stone; the other is bronze, with two footprints before it. Vasupujya Nath was born in Champanagar and attained nirvana here.

50. Vikramashila. The ancient university was situated in the Bhagalpur region. At Antichak village in Bhagalpur district stands the Buddhist university founded by King Dharmapala. Accommodation was built for 108 teachers as well as students arriving from elsewhere.

51. The Twenty Siddha Pithas of Mithila

1. Girija Sthan (Phulhar, Madhubani); 2. Durga Sthan (Uchchaith, Madhubani); 3. Raheshwari (Dokhar, Madhubani); 4. Bhuvaneshwari Sthan (Bhagwatipur, Madhubani); 5. Bhadrakalika (Koilakh, Madhubani); 6. Chamunda Sthan (Pachahi, Madhubani); 7. Sonamai (Janakpur, Nepal); 8. Yoganidra (Janakpur, Nepal); 9. Kalika Sthan (Janakpur Sthan); 10. Rajeshwari Devi (Janakpur, Nepal); 11. Chhinnamasta Devi (Ujan, Madhubani); 12. Banadurga (Khararakh, Madhubani); 13. Siddheshwari Devi (Sarisav, Madhubani); 14. Devi Sthan (Andhratharhi, Madhubani); 15. Kankali Devi (on the India–Nepal border and at Rambagh Place, Darbhanga); 16. Ugratara (Mahishi, Saharsa); 17. Katyayani Devi (Badlaghat, Saharsa); 18. Puran Devi (Purnia); 19. Kali Sthan (Darbhanga); 20. Jaimangala Sthan (Munger).

52. The Fifteen Stations of the Janakpur Pilgrimage Circuit and Their Principal Deities: 1. Hanumannagar—Hanuman; 2. Kalyaneshwar—Shivalinga; 3. Girija Sthan—Shakti; 4. Matihani—Vishnu temple; 5. Jaleshwar—Shivalinga; 6. Manai—the sage Mandav; 7. Dhruv Kund—Dhruva temple; 8. Kanchan Van—no temple, only beautiful scenery; 9.

Parvat—five hills; 10. Dhanusha—a piece of Shiva's bow; 11. Satokhari—the seven tanks of the Seven Sages; 12. Harushaha—Vimalaganga; 13. Karuna—no temple, only beautiful scenery; 14. Bisaul—Vishvamitra temple; 15. Janakpur. "Mithilādayaś ca madhyante ripavo iti Mithilā nagarī": Mithila is the city where enemies are crushed—an explanation attributed here to Panini.

53. Chainpur, Saharsa. This village has Mithila's only Nilkanth temple, as well as a magnificent Kali temple dating from an early period. Mahashivaratri and Kali Puja are celebrated with great enthusiasm at Chainpur.

54. Dharhara, Banmankhi, Purnia. There is a shrine of the Narasimha incarnation. A large, cave-like hollow gives forth a resonant "goṅ-goṅ" sound for a long time when something is thrown into it. The shrine has now been developed considerably, with an image and temple of Lord Narasimha.

55. Neuri. Thirteen kilometres west of Biraul block in Darbhanga is a fort believed to have belonged to Lorik.

56. Darbhanga Catholic Church. Established in 1891, this church was damaged by the earthquake of 1897. It is also known as Holy Rosary Church.

57. St Francis of Assisi Church is in Muzaffarpur.

58. Bhikha Salami Mazar. This shrine stands on the bank of Ganga Sagar pond in Darbhanga.

59. Darbhanga Tower Mosque is a magnificent mosque and religious place for adherents of Islam.

60. Makhdum Baba's Mazar. Situated between Lalit Narayan Mithila University and Kameshwar Singh Sanskrit University in Darbhanga, this shrine is sacred to both Hindu and Muslim devotees.

61. Champanagar. West of Bhagalpur, and now adjoining the town, Champanagar is a sacred place for Jains. Mahavira spent three rainy-season retreats here. There are two Jain temples dedicated to Vasupujya Nath, the twelfth Jain tirthankara.

62. Basaiti Inscription. This Mithilakshar inscription near Srinagar in Purnia district describes the reign of Queen Indravati, the first woman ruler of Mithila. Madneshwar Mishra based his novel Ek Chhalih Maharani (There Was a Queen) on it.

Baisi–Basaiti, Araria: a Mithilakshar stone inscription of Queen Indravati (1784–1802), who initiated food-for-work and other welfare activities. The inscription is engraved on black stone fixed above a temple and reads as follows:

Devanagari transcription of the Mithilakshar inscription at the Shiva temple in Basaiti (Araria), Bihar.

वंशे सभा समाने सुरगन बिदिते भू सूरस्यावतिर्ना।
राजाभूतकृष्णदेवोनृपति समरसिंहा मिधस्यात्मजातः॥
यस्मिन् राज्याभिषेकं फलयितु मिवतद्भक्तितुष्टोमहेशः।
कैलाशाद् भूगतेद्योप्यधिन सततरा वैद्यनाथेन नाम्नाः॥
तस्य तनुजः सुकृतिनृपवरौ विश्वनाथ राजा भूत।
विरनारायण राजस्तस्याप्यासीद सुतस्य॥
नरनारायण राजो नरपति कुल मौलि भूषणम् पुनः।
अर्थिनकल्पद्रूमदूव सुरगन वंसावतंसोत्भूत॥२॥
तस्मादि वैरिकुल सूदन रामचन्द्र नारायणो नरपतिस्तनयो वभूक।
संमोदिता दश दिशो निज कीर्ति चन्द्र ज्योतिस्नेहाभिरार्थ निवहः
सुरिवतश्चयेण॥३।।
यद्दानवारि परिवर्द्धित वारि राशि सक्तान्त कीर्ति विमलेन्दु मरिचिकाभिः।
प्रोद्योतिता दशदिशः सतनुज इन्द्रनारायणोस्य कुलभूषण राजराजः॥४॥
तेनच सत्कुल जाता तनया मनबोध शझणिः कृतिनः।
परिणीता बन्धु यत्नैस्त्रिलोचननाद्रि पुत्रीव॥५॥
यस्या प्रतापतरणावुदितेऽपिचिते
चिन्तारजविन्द वनमालभते विकासम
सौहृदय हृदय मकरन्द च उद्यन
तत्रैव यद् गुणगणा मधुपन्ति योगात्॥६॥
यज्ञेवर्देव गणो द्विजाति निवहः सस्तायनत्यादरैः।
ददानैपूर्णः मनोरथोऽर्थपरन सन्तितिनिः सज्जना॥७॥
गर्ज्जद वैरि मदान्धवारण चपश्चञ्चःपेतापांकुरौ।
वंस्याः सर्वदृशेकृतागुण चमेर्मस्याश्च भूमीतनं॥८॥
श्री श्री इन्दुमति सतीमतिमती देवी महाराज्ञिका
जाता मैथिल माण्डराऽमिछ्कुलात् मोधोसरी जानयाः।
दानै कल्पलता मधः कृतवती श्री विष्णु सेवा परा
पातिव्रत्य परायणाच सततं गंगेर सम्पारणी॥९॥
शाकेन्दु नवचन्द्र शैलधरणी संलक्षित फाल्गुने
मासि श्रेष्ठतरे सिताहनि शितेपक्षे द्वितीयायां तिथौ।
भूदेवैर्वर वैदिकेर्म्मठमयं निर्भारय सच्चिनिमिः
तत्रे सेन्दुमति सुरस्य विधित्र प्राण प्रतिष्ठाव्यधात्॥१०॥
सोदरपुर सम्भव राजानुकम्पापजिवनिकृतिनः।
श्री शुभनायस्य कृतिमिदं विज्ञेक्षं सन्नन्तताम्॥११॥
(Images of the places described above are available at the following link: http: //www.videha.co.in/favorite.htm.)

5. The Dushan Panji (Register of Transgressions)

Abstract

A single scanned PDF of the Dushan Panji. My book on the genealogical registers also provided for the separate purchase of a DVD containing JPG images of 11,000 palm leaves. I even distributed that DVD at Sagar Rati Deep Jaray in Kabilpur. Yet the Dushan Panji contained in it provoked so many disputes and village adjudications. So many people abused me face to face and over the telephone. Even now many seethe inwardly at the mention of it in the panji and begin to pant with rage in conversation, as if they would drink blood.

Keywords: Dushan · Panji · criticism · Maithili

A single scanned PDF of the Dushan Panji. My book on the genealogical registers also provided for the separate purchase of a DVD containing JPG images of 11,000 palm leaves. I even distributed that DVD at Sagar Rati Deep Jaray in Kabilpur. Yet the Dushan Panji contained in it provoked so many disputes and village adjudications. So many people abused me face to face and over the telephone. Even now many seethe inwardly at the mention of it in the panji and begin to pant with rage in conversation, as if they would drink blood.

This Dushan Panji contained written records of marriages between Brahmins and people of other castes, particularly Dalits, and between Brahmins and Muslims, as well as remarriages after a husband's death. It was not possible for me to alter those records. In my book on the panjis, they were transliterated word for word from Mithilakshar into Devanagari. I am providing links to the original registers written on palm leaves and on basaha leaves, as well as other panji links. Nobody can say that there is even the smallest error in them. One may find here the account of Gangesha's birth five years after his father's death and, later, his marriage to a woman of the Chamar community. This is the very Gangesha regarded as the founder of Navya Nyaya. His marriage to Ananda, a Chamar woman, is also recorded here; it furnished the basis for my love story Shabdashastram.

Dushan Panji—original writing in Mithilakshar, single PDF of palm-leaf manuscripts—https: //docs. google. com/a/videha. com/viewer? a=v&pid=sites&srcid=dmlkZWhhLmNvbXx2aWRlaGEtcG90aGl8Z3g6ZjFiNTA5NGI2YTVlNGEx

Modanand Jha branch register—http: //videha123. files. wordpress. com/2011/09/modanand_jha_shakha_panji. pdf

Mandar–Marare Kashyap, ancient register—http: //videha123. files. wordpress. com/2011/09/mandar_marare_kashyap_prachin_complete. pdf

Ancient register (laminated)—http: //videha123. files. wordpress. com/2011/09/laminatedpanji. pdf

Uterh Panji—http: //videha123. files. wordpress. com/2011/09/panji_7_uterh_panji. pdf

Panichobhe, Birpur—https: //sites. google. com/a/videha. com/videha-pothi/Home/Panichobhe_Birpur. pdf? attredirects=0

Darbhanga Raj orders, Uterh and related records—https: //sites. google. com/a/videha. com/videha-pothi/Home/DARBHANGA_RAJ_ORDER_PANJI_PACHHBARI_ORDER_UTEDH. pdf? attredirects=0

Chhoti Jha book directory—http: //videha123. files. wordpress. com/2011/09/panji_directory_chotijha_shakha_pustak. pdf

Patra Panji—http: //videha123. files. wordpress. com/2011/09/patra_panji. pdf

Mulgram Panji—http: //videha123. files. wordpress. com/2011/09/panji_8_moolgram_panji. pdf

Mulgram Panji, arranged by pargana—http: //videha123. files. wordpress. com/2011/09/panji_9_moolgram_parganawise_panji. pdf

Original Panji, volume 2—http: //videha123. files. wordpress. com/2011/09/moolpanji_2. pdf

Original Panji, volume 3—http: //videha123. files. wordpress. com/2011/09/mool_panji_3. pdf

Original Panji, volume 4—http: //videha123. files. wordpress. com/2011/09/mool_panji_4. pdf

Original Panji, volume 5—http: //videha123. files. wordpress. com/2011/09/mool_panji_5. pdf

Original Panji, volume 6—http: //videha123. files. wordpress. com/2011/09/moolpanji_6. pdf

Original Panji, volume 7—http: //videha123. files. wordpress. com/2011/09/prachin_panji_last. pdf

Panji book—http: //www.box.net/shared/yx4b9r4kab

Two books had appeared: Mithila ki Sanskritik Lokchitrakala (Mithila's Cultural Folk Painting), 1962, by the painter Shri Lakshminath Jha; and Genome Mapping: Mithilak Panji Prabandh, 450 AD to 2009 AD, 2009, by Gajendra Thakur, Nagendra Kumar Jha and the genealogist Vidyanand Jha. The panji book is available at http: //www.box.net/shared/yx4b9r4kab, and images of register leaves are available at https: //sites.google.com/a/videha.com/videha-pothi/. Now two people have taken portions of these books, passed them off under their own names and had them published; others have helped them do so. Sushila Jha published a translation of Mithila ki Sanskritik Lokchitrakala under her own name as Aripan (2008), even scanning and appropriating the photographs. The Central Institute of Indian Languages, Mysore, provided a publication grant, as the book itself states. Dr Yoganath Jha recently had Genome Mapping: Mithilak Panji Prabandh, 450 AD to 2009 AD published under his own name as Panji-Prabandh (Vansh Parichay—First Part) (2010). He was assisted by the Shrotriya community organisation Maharaja Kameshwar Singh Sanskritik Vikas Manch. How could that Shrotriya organisation object to the alleged appropriation of a book by Shri Lakshminath Jha, himself a Shrotriya? Look at the scanned pages above. Even the old thief Pankaj Parashar (http: //www.box.net/shared/75xgdy37dr), I say, would be ashamed to see these people.

Histories of Maithili journalism do not mention Desil Bayna, published from Kolkata by Ramlochan Thakur. An exception is Radhakrishna Chaudhary's A Survey of Maithili Literature, which does mention the Kolkata Desil Bayna. A periodical of that name appeared in 1982, and seventy of its pages have been scanned into a single PDF in the Videha archive. There readers will find many remarkable writings and works by different authors.

See: Desil Bayna—https: //docs. google. com/a/videha. com/viewer? a=v&pid=sites&srcid=dmlkZWhhLmNvbXx2aWRlaGEtcG9oaGl8Z3g6Njc3YmM2NmI4ODBkMzRmNQ

6. Mithila and Sanskrit

Abstract

Mithila and Sanskrit: The Relevance of Kameshwar Singh Sanskrit University. Mithila's relationship with Sanskrit is very old. Four of the six philosophical systems originated here.

Keywords: Mithila · Sanskrit · criticism · Maithili

Mithila and Sanskrit: The Relevance of Kameshwar Singh Sanskrit University

Mithila's relationship with Sanskrit is very old. Four of the six philosophical systems originated here. Two Vedic branches, Vajasaneyi and Chhandogya, still exist there, but only in name. In Mithila one meets many people who first become acquainted with the names Vajasaneyi and Chhandogya only at the time of marriage. In the middle of the night it is discovered that the bridegroom belongs to the Chhandogya branch, and a commotion arises among the women: "Now there will have to be two weddings; it will take a very long time." We have forgotten that Vajasaneyi and Chhandogya are branches of the Shukla Yajurveda and the Samaveda respectively. On a visit undertaken in connection with official work—

—I went to the Indira Gandhi National Centre for the Arts and had an opportunity to see a DVD on the Vedas. Vedic branches remain alive even today in Odisha, Maharashtra, Kerala, Karnataka and Tamil Nadu. In our own region, although the branches still nominally exist, people are ignorant both of their names and of their meaning.

Kavikulaguru Kalidas Sanskrit University was established at Ramtek, Maharashtra, through the efforts of Prime Minister Narasimha Rao. Within a short period, this university began conducting Sanskrit conversation camps throughout Maharashtra, year after year. It has published children's books in twenty-three volumes, although its buildings are still under construction.

Kameshwar Singh Sanskrit University, Darbhanga, rescued many works of Sanskrit–Maithili poetry. But its contribution has now dwindled, it seems, to publishing one annual almanac; even the calculations used for that university's panchang have become controversial.

From this issue onward, however, I have begun documenting the creative work the university once accomplished.

More than twenty years have passed since the university published critical editions of plays combining Sanskrit, Prakrit and desil bayna, the vernacular tongue. Because of this mixture of languages, these plays are counted as works of both Sanskrit and Maithili literature. The songs expressing emotional intensity were composed in the soft, melodious language of Mithila. The first text edited and published by the university was Jyotirishwar Thakur's Dhurttasamagama.

Dhurttasamagama was composed by Jyotirishwar Thakur in the thirteenth century. He included Maithili songs in it. It belongs to the genre of prahasana, the farcical play. Most plays and short dramas in Maithili were based on the lives of Shri Krishna or his descendants, and on narratives of abduction or swayamvara. In Dhurttasamagama, however, a holy man and his disciple are the principal characters. Every character is more of a rogue than the last. Hence its title, "A Gathering of Rogues", is thoroughly appropriate. A prahasana is also called a musical farce, and the inclusion of Maithili songs is entirely fitting. Its principal characters are the stage manager, the actress, Snatak, Vishvanagar, Mritangar, Suratpriya, Anangsena, Asajjati Mishra, Bandhuvanchak, Mulnashak and Nagarik. The stage manager begins by praising the Karnata sovereign Narasimhadeva; he then sings the praises of Jyotirishwar. There is an element of absurdity in the play that feels distinctly modern. Its flexibility and elasticity make it a form of folk theatre.

In the absence of a woman, Vishvanagar lives as a celibate. He goes begging with his disciple Snatak to the house of Mritangar Thakur, only to be turned away on the pretext of ritual impurity following a death or birth. Vishvanagar and Snatak then go to Suratpriya's house for alms. A quarrel breaks out between master and pupil over a courtesan named Anangsena. They next go with Anangsena to Asajjati Mishra, only to discover that Mishra himself is a libertine ...

Mishra turns out to be a libertine ... He believes that gambling and sexual intercourse are the two essential things in the world. Asajjati Mishra asks who is the complainant and who the defendant. Snatak replies, "I am the complainant, because I have brought the charge; the ascetic is the defendant, because he must pay the fee." Vishvanagar offers Snatak's bundle of cannabis as his fee. The clown whispers praises of Anangsena's sexual charms in Asajjati Mishra's ear. Keeping Anangsena between the two claimants, Mishra gives judgment in his own favour. Meanwhile, the clown tells Anangsena in her ear, "This ascetic is poor, Snatak is a wanderer, and Mishra is a fool; stay with me instead." Anangsena looks around at all four men and exclaims, "This really has become a gathering of rogues!"

Vishvanagar and Snatak once again head towards Suratpriya's house.

Meanwhile Mulnashak the barber demands a year's earnings from Anangsena. She sends him to Asajjati Mishra. Taking Mishra to be Anangsena's bridegroom, Mulnashak accepts cannabis as his fee, ties Mishra up and massages him so vigorously that he loses consciousness. Thinking Mishra dead, the barber flees.

The clown arrives, unties Mishra and asks, "I have saved your life. Tell me if there is anything else you would like me to do." Asajjati answers, "I have consumed the wealth of the whole land by deceit, obtained this beloved through roguery, and acquired an obedient disciple like you. Nothing more could please me now. Nevertheless, I wish peace and happiness everywhere."

The Position of Sanskrit in Mithila

The following institutions in the Mithila region have applied for affiliation to Kavikulaguru Kalidas Sanskrit University at Ramtek. Just as disorganisation within the Bihar School Examination Board caused the number of schools affiliated to the Central Board of Secondary Education to increase, so the disorder at Darbhanga's Sanskrit university has compelled good institutions to look outside the region for affiliation.

1. J. N. B. Sanskrit Vidyalaya, Bihar; Post Lagma (R. B. Pur), via Lohna Road, District Darbhanga.

2. Laxmiharikant Sanskrit Primary and Secondary School, Post Jhanjharpur Bazar, District Madhubani.

3. Ajitkumar Mehta Sanskrit Shikshan Sansthan, Post Ladora, District Samastipur.

4. Dr Mandanmishra Sanskrit Mahavidyalaya, Post Sanjat, District Begusarai.

5. Saraswati Adarsha Sanskrit Mahavidyalaya, Begusarai.

6. Dr R. M. Adarsha Sanskrit Mahavidyalaya, Post Office Malighat, Muzaffarpur.

In addition, the Rashtriya Sanskrit Sansthan, New Delhi, has kept the following institutions functioning by providing grants.

1. J. N. B. Adarsh Sanskrit Mahavidyalaya, Post Office Lagma, via Lohna Road, District Darbhanga.

2. Laxmi Devi Saraf Adarsh Sanskrit Mahavidyalaya, Kali Rekha, District Deoghar.

3. Rajkumari Ganesh Sharma Sanskrit Vidyapeetha, Kolahnta Patori, District Darbhanga.

4. Ramji Mehta Adarsh Sanskrit Mahavidyalaya, Malighat, Muzaffarpur.

Among these, the institution at Lagma sought affiliation to Kavikulaguru Kalidas Sanskrit University because the Darbhanga university has no such programme at all.

Dr Ramprakash Sharma's history of Mithila, written in Hindi, was also published thirty years ago. Today the university has neither its own website nor any distance-education programme.

The second play published by Kameshwar Singh Sanskrit University is the great poet Vidyapati's Gorakshavijaya. Earlier, plays based on Krishna predominated. In this sense Gorakshavijaya can be called a revolutionary drama.

The plot of this drama is organised around the story of the yogi Gorakhnath, founder of the Nath or Gorakh tradition. His guru Matsyendranath has abandoned yoga and, as king of Kadalipur, indulges in sensual pleasures with eighteen queens. The gatekeeper prevents Gorakh and Kananipad from entering. The minister also has a drum beaten to proclaim that no yogi is to be admitted anywhere, and the queens are told to keep the king enchanted. Gorakh and Kananipad disguise themselves as dancers and perform an entrancing dance before the king. Meanwhile the king's only son, Baudhanath, dies while playing. The king suspects the dancers and orders their execution; but they bring the child back to life. When the king asks who they are, Gorakh recounts everything about the king's earlier birth and tells him: “You are a yogi, not a pleasure-seeker.”

The characters also include Mahamati, the king's minister, and Mahadevi, Matsyendranath's senior queen. Matsyendranath is king of Kadalipur and a yogi in his previous birth. At the end he says, “May everyone have a disciple like Gorakh and may all women be like Mahadevi.” Kameshwar Singh Darbhanga Sanskrit University used to publish the quarterly Sanskrit journal Vishvamanisha. It was published from 1975 to 1994, but publication has been suspended for fourteen years. Besides the Hindi history of Mithila, seven volumes of traditional Maithili plays were published, comprising sixteen dramas composed between AD 1300 and 1900. Pandit Shashinath Jha translated into Sanskrit Vatavaran, a Maithili play by Pandit Govind Jha, and the university published it. The university also published Smriti-Sahasri, by Buddhi Dhari Singh “Ramakar”, described as the first Maithili epic devoted to the life of a twentieth-century scholar and spiritual practitioner. A book entitled Rupaka Samuchchayah contains four dramatic works. Its fourth Sanskrit drama, Dhurttavidambana Prahasanam by Mahamahopadhyaya Amareshwar, is accompanied by a Maithili translation. Rajanitisarah by Mahamahopadhyaya Bhavnath Upadhyaya has likewise been supplied with a Maithili translation.

At present, the university seems to have confined its activities to preparing an almanac once a year.

7. Migration from Mithila

Abstract

The arrival of outsiders in Mithila and the migration of people from Mithila to distant lands have both been continuing processes. Contemporary migration, however, has become particularly acute because the exodus of the past thirty years has emptied Mithila's villages. The construction of the Mahatma Gandhi Setu near Patna in 1981 and the lines of deluxe coaches between Patna and Darbhanga facilitated the departure of large crowds of Mithila's inhabitants. Failure by successive governments in the political, economic, educational, social and cultural spheres certainly provided one foundation for this migration. The thirty years following independence also drew a line of separation between Mithila in Bihar and the Maithili-speaking region of Nepal.

Keywords: migration from Mithila · criticism · Maithili

The arrival of outsiders in Mithila and the migration of people from Mithila to distant lands have both been continuing processes. Contemporary migration, however, has become particularly acute because the exodus of the past thirty years has emptied Mithila's villages.

The construction of the Mahatma Gandhi Setu near Patna in 1981 and the lines of deluxe coaches between Patna and Darbhanga facilitated the departure of large crowds of Mithila's inhabitants. Failure by successive governments in the political, economic, educational, social and cultural spheres certainly provided one foundation for this migration. The thirty years following independence also drew a line of separation between Mithila in Bihar and the Maithili-speaking region of Nepal. The Kamla embankment built in 1960 and the still-unfinished Koshi project shattered the economic foundations of rural Mithila.

There is another fundamental difference between migration in ancient times and migration today. From ancient times, Maithil Brahmins and Karna Kayasthas of Mithila travelled to display their learning, to study and teach, and to earn their livelihoods at the courts of other kings. People of castes other than Maithil Brahmins and Karna Kayasthas travelled to distant lands for trade, employment as bodyguards and similar work. In ancient times Morang, and later Bhadohi, became centres where the labour of Mithila's agricultural workers was bought. Morang itself falls within the Mithila region of Nepal, but going there came to be called migration because its rulers were now non-Maithil Gorkhas.

Different Forms of Migration. Migration is part of a historical process. It also depends on the country in which geographical circumstances have placed your own region. Thus, although Morang was close, it later became less popular with the inhabitants of Indian Mithila: its location in a different country made migration there unsuitable for a variety of reasons. After independence Kolkata was the nearest metropolitan centre, and many people migrated there. But when narrow political and economic policies ruined Bengal's industries and diminished its importance as a centre of education, Mumbai and Delhi became the new destinations. Agricultural labourers now go not to Bhadohi and Morang but to Punjab, Haryana and western Uttar Pradesh, while traders arriving from outside have filled Mithila. Jagdish Prasad Mandal's literature fully reveals how the mistaken economic policies of the Darbhanga Raj enabled people from Ara and Chhapra to become owners of land and estates. In 1936–37 people from Bhojpur and Buxar also fled Burma and arrived in Purnia and Araria. Hari Babu of Dumraon had settled them in Burma; after Burma was separated from India, they came as refugees to this region. One finds many Burma Tolas in these areas. These migrants, too, acquired a foothold in regional agriculture and commerce. Migration into Mithila also followed the creation of Bangladesh in 1971: Hindus from there arrived in Kishanganj, followed later by Muslims who settled in Purnia and Kishanganj. This inward migration, running counter to the outward exodus, affected Mithila's speech and many other aspects of life. As caste- and religion-based marriages among Muslims, Rajputs and Bhumihars increasingly took place beyond Mithila's geographical boundaries, differences in speech and expression became visible as well.

Is Migration Good or Bad? Migration, both outward and inward, cannot be stopped by any means. But the severe movement of people within a single generation has produced an acute problem: the migration and erosion of indigenous Maithil speech and expression. It brought deliverance from the starvation caused by floods and famines, yet it also brought a cultural famine. Pressure on the villages declined. People formerly unable to obtain land for sharecropping can now secure it. Conversely, educational centres within Mithila have been almost completely eliminated, while outside traders have taken command of the local economic market. Vast road projects, information technology, television, newspapers and magazines have become so concentrated in the hands of capital that they are beyond the means of local traders. When outside capitalists have entered the region's seats in the Rajya Sabha and Legislative Council, what more remains to be said?

A Remedy for Migration. Mere lamentation about migration will achieve nothing. Just as the Israeli diaspora has proved a source of strength for Israel, the Maithil diaspora too can become a source of strength for Mithila, supporting its language, culture, literature and economy. Alongside the demand for a Mithila state, intermediate demands must also be pressed: Maithili should be the medium of primary education in the Maithili-speaking areas of Bihar; there should be a Maithili radio station; licence fees for Maithili television channels should be reduced; and Maithili newspapers and magazines should receive government advertisements. A separate state will come when it comes. If even two or three of the preceding demands are met, that will be an achievement. Only when awareness grows among the people will they be able to think seriously about the economic, educational and political condition of a Mithila state and join the movement for it.

8. Mithila's Pañjī System: Lineage, Marriage, Dūṣaṇa, Social Memory and Modern Reinterpretation

Abstract

Lineage, marriage, dūṣaṇa, social memory and modern reinterpretation: an integrated investigation of lineage memories said to extend from CE 450 to 2009, the ancient pañjīs, the nagarām registers, the Dūṣaṇa Pañjī and genome mapping. Monolingual Maithili · without superscript references · source disagreements made explicit · extended bibliography · audit of coverage of all twenty sources (20/20).

Keywords: Mithila · pañjī · record system · lineage · marriage · dūṣaṇa · social memory.

Abstract

This chapter discusses "Mithila's Pañjī System: Lineage, Marriage, Dūṣaṇa, Social Memory and Modern Reinterpretation." It presents an integrated study of genealogical memory said to extend from CE 450 to 2009, ancient pañjīs, nagarām, the Dūṣaṇa Pañjī and genome mapping. It is written in monolingual Maithili, without superscript citations, with source disagreements identified, an extensive bibliography and a 20/20 source-coverage audit. Mithila's pañjī system is extraordinary among India's genealogical traditions. Available reports describe it variously as a "human database," a "social technology," "lineage memory," a "judicial instrument of marriage eligibility," "genome mapping" and a "counter-archive." Each term reveals a different facet.

An Integrated Research Essay

Mithila's Pañjī System

Lineage, Marriage, Dūṣaṇa, Social Memory and Modern Reinterpretation

An integrated study of lineage memories said to extend from CE 450 to 2009, the ancient pañjīs, nagarām, the Dūṣaṇa Pañjī and genome mapping.

Form of the essay: A logical integration of twenty research reports, analyses, question-and-answer collections and studies of the pañjī, removing repetition while preserving distinctive facts, examples, divergences of opinion, social history and critical objections.

Editorial Framework

Monolingual Maithili · no superscripts · explicit acknowledgement of conflicting sources · extended bibliography · audit of all twenty sources (20/20).

Central point: To call the pañjī system merely a genealogy is to grasp only half its meaning. It is simultaneously a means of verifying marriage eligibility, a village-based social map, a record of scholarly titles and occupational change, a testimony to women's indirect presence, a document of both the discipline and transgressions of the caste order, and a system of memory extending from handwritten manuscripts to digital archives.

Introduction: The Many Forms of a Living Archive

Mithila's pañjī system is an exceptional form among India's genealogical traditions. Available reports describe it variously as a "human database," a "social technology," "lineage memory," a "judicial instrument of eligibility for marriage," "genome mapping," and even a "counter-archive." Each designation illuminates a different aspect. Individuals do not enter the pañjī merely along a father–son line: it may also record their gotra, pravara, mūla, village of origin, branch, maternal connections, marital relationships, honorifics, occupation, changes of residence, royal or academic distinction and, in many cases, a social "blemish." Thus a pañjī becomes at once a genealogy, a social geography, a record of marriage rules, a history of occupations and a text of cultural memory.

The integrated body of sources includes general accounts of the pañjī system; interpretations of the Dūṣaṇa Pañjī's ninety-seven tables; the opening sections of the ancient pañjī; pages 66–347 of Volume I and pages 348–690 of Volume II; various blocks of the nagarām pañjī; the Pañjikā–Nagarāmī; a volume entitled "Genome Mapping"; research reports; comparative theories of genealogy; and an extensive question-and-answer collection. Certain reports repeat the same facts in different language, under different theoretical frameworks or with differing claims. Repetitions have been removed in this integrated study, but incompatible claims have not been discarded: they are identified explicitly as differences between sources.

A Caution on Reading the Sources

Differences between sources and levels of evidence: Some reports claim an "unbroken" genealogical memory from CE 450 to 2009, whereas the density of surviving material at the level of specific manuscripts is much greater for medieval and especially late-medieval and modern periods. There are also chronological discrepancies between the dates assigned to Harisinghdev's rule and the account of institutionalisation in Śaka 1248/CE 1326. Statements concerning "genomes" or "chromosomes" are interpretative analogies made by the source authors, not scientifically established equivalences in modern genetics. The essay therefore presents such statements as claims, analogies or traditional interpretations, not as demonstrated scientific facts.

1. Mithila: Geography, Intellectual Traditions and the Social Ground of the Pañjī

The sources identify Mithila by historical names such as Videha, Tirabhukti, Tirhut and Mithilanchal. Its cultural extent is described as stretching from the Himalayas in the north to the Ganges in the south, and from the Gandak in the west to the Mahananda in the east. Modern political boundaries do not diminish this cultural geography. The pañjīs repeatedly attest connections with Darbhanga, Madhubani, Sitamarhi, Muzaffarpur, Saharsa, Supaul, Purnia, Katihar, Araria, Champaran, and the Bhagalpur–Munger region of northern Bihar, as well as Nepal's Terai and the areas around Janakpur and Kathmandu.

Mithila's scholarly tradition has been associated with institutions teaching Nyāya, Vaiśeṣika, Mīmāṃsā, Vedānta, grammar, astrology and Dharmaśāstra. The pañjī reports do not separate this intellectual tradition from hereditary lineages. Titles such as Mahāmahopādhyāya, Naiyāyika, Vaiyākaraṇa, Jyotirvid, Paṇḍitarāja, Sāhityācārya, Vaidika and Ācārya are recorded beside personal names in genealogical entries. In later periods, the same lines begin to include lawyers, judges, professors, engineers, IAS and IPS officers, DIGs, MA and PhD holders, university vice-chancellors, income-tax officers and other modern appointments. This continuity makes the pañjī not simply a remnant of an old society but an archive of a changing one.

An important social conclusion of the reports is that the name of a village in the pañjī is not merely an address. The mūlagrāma, or ancestral village, becomes a social "coordinate." When a family leaves its original village for another settlement, city or country, both its origin and its new residence must be remembered; otherwise the calculation of marital relationships may fail. Thus Mandar, Sodarpur, Karmaha, Darihara, Khaual, Sarisab, Pali, Belaunch, Jajiwal, Pandua, Pabauli, Saurath, Mahishi, Loa–Sugaon, Rajgram, Simraongarh, Katihar, Kolkata and places in Nepal all come within a single network of records.

2. From Group Records to the Pañjī System: A History of Institutionalisation

An earlier form of the pañjī tradition is discussed under the name samūha-lekhya, or collective record. Drawing on a statement in Kumārila Bhaṭṭa's Tantravārttika, the reports say that distinguished or ritually observant families preserved written accounts of their grandfathers' and great-grandfathers' lines, virtues and defects, and eligibility for marriage. It would be inappropriate to regard this reference as direct evidence of the institutional inauguration of the pañjī system. It does, however, show that the idea of family-based lineage memory and written genealogical lists existed long before the medieval period.

Accounts of the transition in the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries are associated with Harinath Upadhyay. Different versions of the story survive. In one, the scholar Harinath Upadhyay, lacking complete genealogical knowledge, married within a prohibited degree of close kinship. In a more elaborate version, his wife was accused of a relationship with the Dusadh community; her hand was burned during an ordeal by fire. The scholar Lakhima's explanation then revealed that the wife was not adulterous: rather, the husband himself was involved in a Dharmaśāstric predicament because of marriage to a prohibited relative. The account of a second examination suggests that the central problem was understood less as a moral failing than as an absence of genealogical knowledge.

The sources disagree about the historicity, date and details of this episode, but the reports emphasise one point: the keeping of lineage memory moved beyond reliance on individual families and became a professional, written and institutional practice. Śaka 1248, corresponding to CE 1326, is given as its traditional date of institutionalisation. The order is associated with Maharaja Harisinghdev; some reports, however, place the end of his rule around CE 1324, producing a chronological conflict. It is therefore safer here to call 1326 the traditionally accepted date of the system's institutionalisation, rather than an indisputable modern historical fact establishing every detail of the narrative.

Gunakar Jha is named as the principal genealogist for Brahmin pañjīs, Shankardatta as the official responsible for Karna Kayastha records, and Vijayadatta as the person entrusted with Kshatriya pañjīs, particularly those of the Gandhawariya Rajputs. Some reports refer to a "Vishvachakra conference" or an extensive survey of lineages in the Jamsam/Pandaul region. Surveyors or regional collectors sought genealogical information from elderly members of families, compared it with other families' records and established each lineage's mūla, founding male ancestor (bījī puruṣa) and branch. The process illuminates the transition from oral recollection to cross-verified written records.

Some reports give particular prominence to the learned Lakhima, also called Thakurain Lakhima. They portray her as a formidable scholar of Dharmaśāstra, a daughter of Rati Mishra, and an intellectual associated with the Nyāya and Dharmaśāstra traditions. The account demonstrates the presence of women in the intellectual world, although the chief genealogical structure remained centred on male descent.

2a. An Expanded Tradition of Institutionalisation: Assemblies, Women Scholars and Social Rites

Several reports present the institutionalisation narrative in greater detail. According to them, an assembly of learned people called the "Vishvachakra Conference" convened in the Jamsam/Pandaul region to formulate a royal plan for collecting village-by-village information about lineages, gotras, pravaras, mūlas, places of migration and marriages. Some sources date this meeting to 1327, whereas institutionalisation is dated to Śaka 1248, or CE 1326. The one-year discrepancy could reflect different stages of the order, survey and conference; nevertheless, independent verification of the original royal document remains necessary.

The expanded tradition accords special importance to the woman scholar Thakurain Lakhima. She is represented as an accomplished scholar of Dharmaśāstra who understood the genealogical complexities of Harinath Upadhyay's predicament. In some versions, the learned assembly failed to resolve the problem following the ordeal by fire; Lakhima then unravelled the lines of kinship and identified the prohibited relationship. The story can be read at three levels: possible historical event, folk memory, and symbol of institutionalisation. Without contemporary primary evidence, her role is best described as "an account preserved within the pañjī tradition."

Vājasaneyī and Chāndogya

One report distinguishes two principal groups of Maithil Brahmins by Vedic ritual tradition: the Vājasaneyīs, associated with the Mādhyandina branch of the Śukla Yajurveda, and the Chāndogyas, associated with the Kauthuma branch of the Sāmaveda. It also records certain differences in initiation and marriage rites. The four stages given for Vājasaneyī initiation are cūḍākaraṇa, upanayana, vedārambha and samāvartana; the Chāndogya list comprises nāmakaraṇa, cūḍākaraṇa, upanayana and samāvartana. The Vājasaneyī marriage procedure is described as one continuous ceremony, while the Chāndogya procedure has two parts, "pre-marriage" and "post-marriage," the latter being performed at night after the sighting of Arundhatī. These ritual distinctions belong to the social background of marriage rather than to the essential genealogical structure of the pañjī. Practice can vary by region, family and period.

The Wider Classification of Pañcagauḍa and Pañcadrāviḍa

The source report places Maithil Brahmins within the northern Indian "Pañcagauḍa" grouping—Utkala, Kānyakubja, Gauḍa, Maithila and Sārasvata—and gives the traditional "Pañcadrāviḍa" list south of the Vindhyas: Karṇāṭa, Gurjara, Tailaṅga, Drāviḍa and Mahārāṣṭrīya. This broader, post-Purāṇic social classification represents a level of identity distinct from the local gotra–mūla arrangements of the pañjī. It should be understood as a historical Brahmanical self-classification, not as an immutable category in modern ethnic or linguistic science.

3. Types of Pañjī: A System of Multiple Registers

Different reports divide the pañjīs into seven types. Spellings and descriptions of their functions vary slightly; the integrated classification is as follows:

Mūla pañjī — the foundational register of original lineages, ancestral villages, founding male ancestors and primary identities.

Śākhā pañjī — the branches arising from a mūla, new places of residence, social subgroups and, in some periods, special sections such as upaṭīpa or nagarām.

Gotra pañjī — classification of gotras, pravaras and ancient mūlas.

Patra pañjī — a living register of descendants, new generations and the formation of marital links.

Dūṣaṇa pañjī — a record of lineage "degradation," marriages contrary to rules, unknown maternal descent, inter-caste or inter-religious relationships, social disputes or marks of alleged blemish.

Uṭeḍh/uteḍh pañjī — the pre-marital checking of ancestors through an extensive map of the maternal and paternal lines.

Asvajanya-patra/siddhānta-patra — a certificate establishing the absence of prohibited blood relationships and a formal ruling on eligibility for marriage.

Some sources describe an especially careful preservation of women's names in the asvajanya-patra pañjī, citing instances from the Rasaḍh–Araria region. Other sources emphasise the scarcity of women's names in the principal registers. Both observations can be true: the main patrilineal series often identifies women by relational formulas such as "the daughter of so-and-so's son from such-and-such a village," while special registers, marital checks or exceptional entries may record a woman's name, occupation or achievements.

The Pañjī as a "Relational" Archive

The analogy with a modern database recurs throughout the sources. A person's name provides the primary identity in an entry; the father, mūla, village, maternal village, dau/ddau relationship, references to branches, page numbers and other volume codes function as interlinked references. Codes such as "B 41/8," "U. Pra. 270/5" and "270/2" work rather like paper hyperlinks. The analogy is useful, but the pañjī was not a modern database: its structure depended upon terse written formulas, expert memory and consultation between several manuscripts.

4. Gotra, Pravara, Mūla, Ancestral Village and Founding Male Ancestor

Four levels constitute the basic identities involved in reading the pañjī: gotra, pravara, mūla and ancestral village. The gotra is the broad patrilineal tradition associated with a sage. Pravara is the ritual identity of a group of Vedic seers. Mūla is a historical branch or lineage unit within a gotra. The mūlagrāma is the geographical place associated with the bījī puruṣa, or earliest known male ancestor. When a family settled elsewhere, its new settlement was appended as a branch or place of residence.

The reports list twenty gotras: Śāṇḍilya, Vatsa, Sāvarṇa, Kāśyapa, Parāśara, Bhāradvāja, Kātyāyana, Garga, Kauśika, Ālambukākṣa, Kṛṣṇātreya, Gautama, Maudgalya, Vasiṣṭha, Kauṇḍinya, Upamanyu, Kapila, Viṣṇuvṛddhi, Tāṇḍi and Jātūkarṇa. The number of gotras actually represented may be smaller in a particular volume: one numerical account of an ancient pañjī volume, for instance, identifies seventeen active gotras. This need not be a contradiction; it can reflect the difference between actual representation in one volume and the full conventional list.

The lists of pravaras distinguish groups of three and five seers. The sources particularly cite the Vatsa and Sāvarṇa gotras: although the gotras are different, their pravara seers are regarded as identical, so traditional marriage checks prohibit a union between the two. This example shows that the pañjī system does not stop at asking whether the gotras are different; it also considers identity of pravara.

The total number of mūlas is given as 167. The "principal" mūlas were initially numbered at thirty-four, but later counted as thirty-five after the Khanam branch of the Phanandaha mūla was included; several reports repeat this account. A traditional division places these thirty-five among the Āyanta Śreṣṭha, Prajāyanta or second-tier, and middle-tier mūlas. Their spellings differ between reports: Khaḍaure/Khaḍaurai, Khaual/Khauar, Budhbāḍ/Budhwāl, Madār, Darihar, Ghusaut, Tisaut, Karmaha, Naraun, Babhaniyā, Hariam, Sarisab, Sodarpur, Gangolī, Pabaulī, Kujaulī, Ale, Pālī, Sakarāḍhī, Viśe, Phanandaha, Uchit, Pandua, Kataī, Tilāī, Dīgh, Belaunch, Ekahar, Pānichhobh, Baliyās, Jajiwāl, Takwāl and others. Such variations in spelling are themselves evidence of the passage between oral and written forms of genealogical memory.

Mūla Is Not Merely a Geographical "Address"

Several mūlas may belong to a single gotra. Seventy-four branches are mentioned in connection with the Kāśyapa gotra; branches such as Garh and Mangrauni are linked to an ancient point of origin at Mandar. The bījī puruṣa is the earliest known male ancestor of such a sub-branch. Here a mūla is not a biological DNA marker but an archival and social identity. This distinction is essential when comparisons are made with modern genetic genealogy.

5. Uṭeḍh, Thirty-Two Ancestors and Sixteen Chhaṭṭhīs: The Arithmetic of Marriage Verification

At the time of a marriage, the pañjīkār would construct a detailed ancestral map of the prospective bride and bridegroom, called in the sources uṭeḍh, uteḍh or uṭheḍhā. Reports describe this as an arrangement encompassing thirty-two ancestral mūlas or forebears. Several accounts relate the number thirty-two to the thirty-two ancestors reached by looking back five generations; others speak of sixteen on the paternal side and sixteen on the maternal side. The practical purpose of the traditional formula is the same: to identify prohibited repetitions of close blood relationships between the two prospective spouses.

Within uṭeḍh, the "sixteen chhaṭṭhīs" form a specialised check. The question-and-answer sources enumerate its kinship points at length: the paternal grandfather's paternal grandfather, the paternal grandfather's maternal grandfather, the paternal grandmother's paternal and maternal grandfathers, the maternal grandfather's paternal and maternal grandfathers, the maternal grandmother's paternal and maternal grandfathers, together with the higher ancestral connections of these branches. In essence, sixteen specific sixth-position ancestors of the bride are compared with the groom's ancestral chart.

The traditional Dharmaśāstric formula refers to excluding five generations on the maternal side and seven on the paternal side. Some pañjī reports say that after the influence of Mahāmahopādhyāya Mahesh Thakur, the practical paternal limit was treated as six generations, making marriage permissible in the seventh. Other reports describe a rule of five maternal plus seven paternal generations for Śrotriyas, and five maternal plus six paternal generations for registered lineages or descendants. The question-and-answer source calls this distinction by status a later social construction and argues that the original Dharmaśāstric rule should apply equally to all. The integrated conclusion is that both the "5/7" ideal and the "5/6" practical modification occur in the source tradition; one cannot silently substitute one for the other.

Principal Prohibitions Governing Marriage Eligibility

The sources give differing lists of four, five or seven rules. As assembled here, the main prohibitions are:

No marriage within the same gotra;

No marriage between those sharing the same pravara;

No marriage within prohibited maternal sapiṇḍa relationships;

No marriage within prohibited paternal sapiṇḍa relationships;

A special prohibition involving kāṭhmāmā, the offspring of the stepmother's brother;

In some interpretations, exclusion of the close descendants of the immediate paternal and maternal grandfathers;

In some social rules, objections to marrying a younger child before an older one, or to marrying the full sister of a wife who is still living.

After completing these checks, the pañjīkār would issue a siddhānta or asvajanya-patra. The siddhānta was understood not simply as an astrologically auspicious time but as certification of genealogical eligibility. "Eligibility" here asks whether the proposed marriage is recognised under the traditional rules of the archive.

A caution concerning genetics: Some reports seek to equate the sixteen chhaṭṭhīs, gotra–pravara and sapiṇḍa rules with "ancient genome mapping" or "chromosome testing." The social purpose of checking "blood distance" is certainly comparable in one respect to modern genetic counselling, but gotra, mūla and pravara are not modern DNA markers. The prohibitions based on the pañjī relied on social and genealogical information; modern genetics relies on biological testing, population data and molecular evidence. The comparison is an analogy, not an identical science.

5a. A Detailed Map of the Sixteen Chhaṭṭhīs and a Practical Example

An extensive source table unpacks the sixteen chhaṭṭhīs as pathways of kinship. Terminology may vary in the records of different pañjīkārs, but the integrated pattern is as follows:

The paternal grandfather of the bride's senior paternal great-great-grandfather;

The father-in-law of that senior paternal ancestor;

The father of the maternal grandfather of the paternal great-grandfather;

The father-in-law of that maternal grandfather;

A senior ancestor on the paternal side of the paternal grandmother;

The maternal grandfather of the bride's father's maternal grandfather;

A senior ancestor on the maternal side of the paternal grandmother;

The maternal grandfather of the paternal grandmother's maternal grandfather;

A senior ancestor on the paternal side of the maternal grandfather;

The maternal grandfather of the maternal great-grandfather;

A senior ancestor on the maternal side of the maternal grandfather;

The maternal grandfather of the maternal grandfather's maternal grandfather;

A senior ancestor on the paternal side of the maternal grandmother;

The maternal grandfather of the maternal grandmother's paternal grandfather;

A senior ancestor on the maternal side of the maternal grandmother;

The maternal grandfather of the maternal grandmother's maternal grandfather.

The list looks simple on paper, but each point requires cross-references between different mūlas, villages and many generations. Some question-and-answer sources define the "maternal side" very strictly: the maternal limit should apply only to relationships arising from the bride's own mother's biological line; female ancestors who entered the paternal line by marriage should not automatically be classified as maternal kin.

Marriage Verification for Shashinath Jha's Daughter

A detailed example constructs the uṭeḍh for a proposed marriage between the daughter of Shashinath Jha of the Karmaha–Behat lineage and a groom residing at Vittho who was likewise connected to Karmaha–Behat. The bride's maternal line was linked with Narayandatta Thakur of Khandbala–Bhaur; the groom's paternal line with Gopinanda Jha of Darihara–Ratauli and others. In the sixteen-chhaṭṭhī comparison, the bride's fourteenth chhaṭṭhī—Kaushilyananda Mishra of Sodarpur–Digaundh—also occurred within the groom's prohibited paternal range. According to the source, this overlap caused the pañjīkār to refuse to issue the siddhānta-patra. The significance of the case is that the "chhaṭṭhī" was not an abstract list, but an operative algorithm for deciding marriage eligibility.

Some question-and-answer texts identify a "maternal exception": when the matching chhaṭṭhī occurs solely on the groom's maternal side and is sufficiently remote to fall outside the prohibited five generations, the marriage may be possible. The practical application of this rule requires corroboration from the traditions of different pañjīkārs.

6. Pañjīkārs: Professionals of Memory and Guardians of Archives

A pañjīkār was not merely a "clerk" who read genealogies. His responsibilities included reading old manuscripts, matching references between branches, constructing uṭeḍhs, determining marriage eligibility, adding information about new births and marriages, consulting records in social disputes and safeguarding the manuscripts themselves. Several reports refer to 185 pañjīs or pañjīkār families. The figure depends on the source, but indicates the breadth of this occupational distribution.

Manuscripts were written in the Mithilākṣara or Tirhutā script on palm leaves, birch bark or other bark, and later handmade paper. Instructions in some accounts describe protection from water, oil and loose or unsuitable bindings; controlled annual exposure to sunlight; wooden covers; tying cords in a knot resembling the brahmagranthi; and the use of plant-based inks. Some reports mention a custom of drying the manuscripts in the sun when the sun occupied Leo, approximately August–September. Such instructions should be read as local historical knowledge of archival care, not as substitutes for modern conservation science.

The sources are stern about the ethics of pañjīkārs. They criticise decisions made from private recollection or arbitrary rules without consulting records, excessive fees, fabricated pedigrees and transactions intended to raise social standing. One sentiment quoted in the reports is that the "pañjīkār is a guardian of culture, not a businessman who merely collects fees." This self-criticism matters because the system recognises its own susceptibility to corruption.

6a. Training of Pañjīkārs, the Dhaut Examination and Sabhāgāchhī

Some modern reports describe a tradition, under the patronage of the Darbhanga Raj, in which becoming a pañjīkār required approximately ten years of study and a rigorous test called the dhaut-parīkṣā. Scholars who passed received royal recognition; after the end of royal administration, the profession became more concentrated in hereditary families. This is the source's account. Independent archival examination of the institutional history would be useful, but the complexity of the original texts makes clear that pañjīkārs required far more expertise than ordinary clerical skills.

The reports describe public marriage-assembly venues called sabhāgāchhī at which genealogies were checked; one source claims there were fourteen royal or traditional sites. Families, pañjīkārs and scholars assembled in mango groves and open grounds, and a siddhānta-patra was issued after genealogical scrutiny. The Saurath Assembly is the best-known modern form of this tradition. A sabhāgāchhī was not merely a marketplace in which brides and grooms were sought: it was a forum for public verification of genealogical records, scholarly exchange and social regulation.

6b. Division of Pañjīkārs' Responsibilities and Community-Specific Verification

In the account of Harisinghdev, Gunakar Jha is said to have been appointed principal genealogist for Brahmins, Shankardatta for Karna Kayasthas, and Vijayadatta for Kshatriyas or Gandhawariya Rajputs. The question-and-answer source suggests that Gunakar Jha was chosen because of his earlier learning and regional surveys. The existence of different pañjīkārs for different communities does not necessarily mean that their rules were entirely identical. Even if the fundamental aim of genealogy was shared, gotra, family status, marital conventions and archival forms could differ by community. The surviving record for non-Brahmin pañjīs is described as less secure. The achievements of the available Maithil Brahmin pañjīs should therefore not be mistaken for an equivalent archival record of every caste and community in Mithila.

7. Mithilākṣara, Kaithī–Devanagari and Digital Conversion

Old pañjīs were preserved in the Mithilākṣara or Tirhutā script. Later printed and digitised editions use Devanagari, sometimes Devanagari influenced by Kaithī, or present equivalent material in two columns. Reports on the ancient pañjī, Volume I, and on pages 66–347 both state that the columns convey the same genealogical information: one retains a form closer to the traditional script, while the other offers a more legible Devanagari version.

The decline of knowledge of the script is regarded as a major crisis for the pañjī tradition. As fewer experts can read the manuscripts, families lose the ability to verify their records independently. Digital images, Devanagari transliteration, searchable text, village lists, gotra–mūla indexes and cross-references are proposed as responses. Evidence of digital initiatives after 2000, scanning and publication by 2007–2009, and internal authorial dates such as 2008 indicates a conscious transition from manuscript and paper to digital media.

The sources discuss thousands of images, DVD archives, online publication and printed volumes bearing the title “Genome Mapping.” The advantages of public access are evident: the preservation of lineage memory, easier research and access for migrant communities. There are risks as well: data severed from context, private family information, erroneous automated readings, faulty transliteration from the original script and information detached from the pañjīkār's oral expertise. Sound digitisation should therefore preserve high-quality images, original page numbers, script layers, editorial revision histories, controlled vocabularies, alternative spellings of village names and the pañjīkār's explanations together.

8. Social Categories: Śrotriya, Yogya, Registered Lineages, Vaṃśadhara and Jayawāra

A system of social ranking gradually became attached to the pañjī's original purpose of marriage verification. The reports name categories such as Śrotriya, Yogya, Pañjībaddha/Vaṃśaja, Vaṃśadhara and Jayawāra. Śrotriya denotes a group associated with advanced Vedic learning, ritual discipline and prestigious marital connections; Yogya, a high but subordinate category; Pañjībaddha, a lineage formally recorded in the register; Vaṃśadhara, in some accounts, a branch that has descended from a higher category; and Jayawāra, a designation for families with incomplete records or outside formal ranking. Local names such as soit, jog and bhalmānuṣ appear in some reports.

The sources claim that the earliest pañjī was primarily a means of authenticating lineages, and that rigid social subdivisions of "high" and "low" developed later. They discuss the growth of branch pañjīs, stricter rankings and a prestige-based marriage market during the eighteenth-century reign of Maharaja Madhav Singh. The saying "The pañjī and water flow downwards" came to symbolise the supposed progressive decline in standing when high-ranking families married into lower-ranked ones. The reports also say that the first and second subcategories of the highest Śrotriya grouping disappeared through such processes.

Payments for Higher Rank and Social Distortion

The questions and answers and the reports contain accusations of issuing orders or certificates that "upgraded" genealogical rank in return for money, pressure placed upon pañjīkārs and the buying and selling of social prestige. These allegations cannot be treated as a final finding of fact on the strength of this material alone, but they are recurrent in the collection. The principal point is that the sources themselves recognise the potential influence of wealth and social capital upon a system established to verify genealogical claims.

Some reports also associate the ranking system with multiple marriages by men of high status, the bikauā practice, child marriage, dowry and widespread widowhood. They discuss reform attempts in the late nineteenth century, particularly the Sadar Committee of 1876, pledges by pañjīkārs and the wider community, and a claimed tally of 2,289 marriages monitored between 1876 and 1878. These figures should be used as claims made by the sources; independent archival verification remains a subject for future research.

8a. Five Social Tiers of Mūlas, Chaugolā and Pachhabaripār

Some sources classify mūla groups into three principal tiers of prestige—Āyanta Śreṣṭha, Prajāyanta/Varanta and Madhyama. A longer report also presents a five-tier classification associated with Raghudev Jha: Āyanta, Varanta, Madhyama, Adhama and Adhamādhama. The five-tier list is a historical record of social evaluation, not a statement of modern human worth or biological quality. In its source form, it reads:

Āyanta: Khaḍaurai, Khaual, Budhwāl, Madār, Darihara, Ghusaut, Tisaut, Naraun, Karmaha, Babhaniyā, Hariam, Sarisab, Sodarperiyā.

Varanta: Gangolīvar, Pabaulīvar, Kujaulīvar, Alevar, Bahidvār, Sakarāḍhīvar, Pālīvar.

Madhyama: Dīghve, Belaunche, Ekaharai, Pānichhobhe, Baliyāse, Jajiwālai, Takwālai, Pandua, Sakun.

Adhama: Phanandahvar, Dasautīvar, Alariye, Kodariye, Koṭhue, Mahue, Basāvanai.

Adhamādhama: Surganai, Laguḍḍahai, Dahībhaṭāvar, Satalakhai, Uchitivar, Visāivar, Jalaivar.

Spelling varies from report to report; the list above represents a Maithili rendering of the source's phonetic forms. Establishing whether a particular mūla moved between social tiers at different times would require a chronological study of the branch registers.

The Śrotriya "Chaugolā"

One report mentions eight chaugolā or ritual levels within the Śrotriya grouping and describes a system of thirty-two registers. Its surviving sample table shows families in the first three levels. The first includes Bharathiyar Jha of Darihara–Ratauli, Bhadai Jha of Pabauli–Badhiyam, Babhan Jha of Sodarpur–Raiyam and Pitambar Jha of Sarisab–Jonki. The second includes Raghuni Jha of Karmaha–Anal, Narayan Jha of Budhwal–Dumra, Debai Jha of Sakaradhi–Parhat and Gangadhar Jha of Khandbala–Bhaur. The third includes Babu Mishra of Sodarpur–Sarisab, Balbhadra Thakur of Khandbala–Bhaur, Tisaut Jha of Tisaut–Kua and Ramdev Mishra of Sodarpur–Raiyam. The reports do not supply the complete list of all eight levels, so only the information available is retained here.

The Fifteen Grades of Pachhabaripār

A source associates Maharaja Rameshwar Singh's arrangement of 1929 with fifteen social grades of pachhabaripār, a total of 153 registers, and the prestige designation laukika. Examples are: first grade, Narpati Jha

(Sakaradhi–Hardi), Madhav Mishra (Sodarpur–Rohar), Gonu Mishra (Sodarpur–Katka) and Bhaiyan Jha (Budhwal–Dumra); second, Padum Jha, Shrikant Jha and Madhupati Mishra; third, Gahananand Jha; fourth, Chhitri Jha; fifth, Harinarayan Thakur and Sukhai Jha; sixth, Taraiwalla Chaudhary; seventh, Badni Jha; eighth, Bodhkrishna Jha; ninth, Ratikar Jha; tenth, Damodar Jha; eleventh, Manikant Jha; twelfth, Nakat Jha; thirteenth, Ghanshyam Jha; fourteenth, Ghansiram Chaudhary; and fifteenth, Chatur Thakur.

The question-and-answer source interprets this classification with sharply critical attention. It argues that social prestige overwhelmed the pañjī's original purpose of protecting marriages, allegations emerged of advancing rank through royal orders and financial transactions, and laukika became a currency of social standing. Independent archival verification of these accusations is necessary; nevertheless, this self-criticism repeatedly emerges within the source material.

9. Dūṣaṇa Pañjī: The Tradition of Recording, Not Erasing, Violations of Rules

The Dūṣaṇa Pañjī is the most complex and uncomfortable document in the pañjī system. The terms dūṣaṇa ("blemish") and kṣaraṇa ("deterioration") designate departures from an accepted lineage norm as judged by social convention. Remarkably, a system designed to prevent marriages contrary to its rules does not destroy the record of their violation; it enters those violations in its register. The sources regard precisely this paradox as the intellectual importance of the Dūṣaṇa Pañjī.

An analysis of ninety-seven tables classifies many types of entry: relations involving men or women of the leatherworking community (charmakāra/charmakāriṇī); relationships with Yavana or Muslim women; descendants of devadāsīs; children of widows; relations involving a teacher's wife; women labelled path-patitā ("fallen on the road"); inter-caste marriages; unknown descent or maternal ancestry; unidentified families arriving from western regions; contested connections with Paramabrahmin or Mahāpātra families; branches moving into or out of prestigious social categories; and entries in which the partner's community is not identified but is labelled simply "inter-caste" or "unknown."

Some reports cite cases of full social reintegration after six generations. In the case involving Devdhar, Chamaru and Gangadhar, the descendants of a disapproved marriage are depicted as marrying into recognised mūlas such as Sarisab, Sakaradhi, Panichhobh, Darihara, Pali and Narwal in succeeding generations, eventually recovering a secure position within the community. It is therefore inadequate to call the Dūṣaṇa Pañjī merely a "black book": it chronicles both social exclusion and readmission.

Entries Concerning Muslim/Yavana Women, Devadāsīs and Widows

A Yavana woman named Daulatjahan appears as a maternal ancestor in two tables. She is identified as Dagara's mother and linked with the Nadam/Gangoli–Khaual network. Other entries include one called "Champo Yavana." These examples suggest that boundaries between religious communities were not always as absolute in lived relationships as normative prescriptions imply: such connections occurred and were preserved in the records.

The devadāsī entries are described as a group covering tables 16–21. The mothers of Harihar, "Vidyapati," Lakhu and others are recorded as devadāsīs. One should not automatically assume that the person called "Vidyapati" here is the famous poet of the same name; names recur frequently in the pañjī. Children of widows occur in tables 28 and 94. An expression such as vārtinī vidhavā may suggest the woman's social or economic activity, but the determination of its meaning requires caution.

Entries concerning marriage to a "teacher's wife," a woman described as path-patitā, an unknown maternal family and inter-caste relationships show that pañjīkārs did not entirely erase inconvenient facts. The language is unquestionably saturated with caste-based value judgments; from a contemporary standpoint, the category of "blemish" demands critical rereading. For historians, however, this very evaluative language reveals structures of social power.

9a. Claims about Health-Related "Defects" in the Dūṣaṇa Pañjī

One extensive report claims that the Dūṣaṇa Pañjī contains genealogical notes about certain health or bodily conditions, as well as departures from social marriage rules. It lists categories such as apasmārī (history of epilepsy or convulsions), unmādī (described as prolonged mental disturbance) and ākuñjī (a grouping described as encompassing blindness, deafness, congenital lameness and other bodily differences). The boundaries of these categories cannot be established without a page-specific critical edition of the original Dūṣaṇa Pañjī.

The discovery of such records would have historical importance because it would suggest that families attended to the recurrence of health characteristics over generations. It would nonetheless be wrong to call this "ancient medical genomics" or to equate it with modern genetics and the study of hereditary disease. Epilepsy, mental illnesses, blindness and mobility impairments can have genetic and non-genetic causes; the pañjī contained no clinical testing. Its health-related notes should be read as historical social and medical observations.

Further Examples of Dūṣaṇa and Reintegration

A source enumerates "unapproved" or "unknown" marriages among several branches and their subsequent status: an unidentified-caste woman in the Devsharma branch of Pali; an unidentified woman in the Govind branch of Budhwal; an unidentified woman in the Shrinath branch of Sarisab; a marriage of this kind followed by middle-tier status in the Bhim branch of Darihara; a division of branches in the Shrihari branch of Sodarpur; reintegration after several generations in the Vasudev branch of Hariam; monitoring through the maternal line in the Madhukar branch of Panichhobh; "purification" after the sixth generation in the Bhavnath branch of Sarisab; the Yavana woman Daulatjahan in the Dagara branch of Gangoli; a relationship between the Surpati branch of Khandbala–Bhaur and Sohago, daughter of a Koch Rajbanshi king of Assam; Medha, identified as a woman of the leatherworking community, in the Govind branch of Sodarpur; and a relationship with the Hadi community in the Hadini branch. The vocabulary of this list reflects the social judgments of the period represented by the source. The integrated essay preserves it as evidence of historical classification, not as a valid modern evaluation of these relationships.

10. The Gangesha Upadhyaya Episode: Genealogy, Philosophy and Controversy

The strongest claim in the reports on the Dūṣaṇa Pañjī concerns Gangesha Upadhyaya, the founder of Navya-Nyāya. Citing tables 49–51, entries 188/2, 189/1 and 189/2, and references to the Mūla Pañjī, a report states that Gangesha's wife Vallabha came from the Charmakāriṇī community. Some readings quote an old marginal note saying that Gangesha was born five years after his father's death. The reports also discuss his son Vardhamana, Supan/Harisharma, and subsequent genealogical links involving Gora, Bhaveshwara and others.

On the basis of this archival material, the reports allege that some twentieth-century scholars suppressed information concerning Gangesha's family background or the Dūṣaṇa Pañjī. The names appearing in the controversy include Dineshchandra Bhattacharya, author of a history of Navya-Nyāya, information supplied by Ramanath Jha, and Udayanath Jha "Ashok." The responsibility of the present integrated essay is to preserve the accusations as accusations in the source reports. Without an independent examination of the archival evidence, it would be inappropriate to deliver a final historical judgment that anyone engaged in deliberate suppression.

Gangesha's Tattvacintāmaṇi is a foundational text of the Navya-Nyāya tradition. The report connects his titles of Jagadguru and Paramaguru with the scholarship of Vardhamana, the spread of Navya-Nyāya from Mithila towards Navadvipa, Vasudeva's studies, Pakshadhara Mishra, Raghunatha Shiromani and related matters. Two histories meet within this account: the intellectual history of a philosophical text and the social history of its author's family.

The source also mentions publication of a Maithili story entitled Śabdaśāstram and its English translation, drawing on this material. This demonstrates that genealogical records can themselves become literary sources. When the pañjī preserves an unexpected social fact, a modern author can shape it into fiction, criticism or alternative history.

10a. Fine Distinctions between Source Readings in the Gangesha Episode

Copies of the Dūṣaṇa Pañjī files and the reports based upon them are not entirely consistent. One principal report records Gangesha's Vallabha as a charmakāriṇī in table 49, entry 188/2; table 50, entry 189/1 separately records the lengthy lineage of another woman, Medha Charmakāriṇī. A later report identifies Medha as Gangesha's mother, but a close reading of the relevant Dūṣaṇa Pañjī text does not regard this identification as decisive. The integrated conclusion of the present work, based on the reading of entry 188/2, is explicit: Gangesha was born five years after the death of his father, and he married Vallabha Charmakāriṇī. The later, conflicting interpretation concerning Medha is retained only as a source's view, not as a settled biographical fact.

An entry numbered 339/3 in the Devananda Pañjī gives a multigenerational sequence involving Supan/Harisharma, his son Haraditya, daughter Gora and connections with Jajiwal/Sandagahi; entry 30/5 records a Khandbala connection involving Vardhamana's daughter. The reports present such material as evidence inconsistent with claims that Gangesha's lineage "immediately ended." Allegations against twentieth-century scholars of "suppressing information" appear in the reports; reaching a historical judgment on them would require examining original correspondence, editions, available records and the chronology of publication.

10b. Source Claims Concerning Aryabhata, Chaitanya and Other Famous Figures

One detailed report claims to connect Aryabhata's family line with Trinayan Bhatta, the founding male ancestor of the Mandar–Mangrauni branch, and supplies a fifteen-generation sequence: Trinayan Bhatta, Udaybhatta, Vijaybhatta, Sulochan, Bhatta, Dharma-jati Mishra, Dhara-jati Mishra, Brahmaraj Mishra, Tripurajati Mishra, Vidhujati Mishra, Ajay Singh, Vijay Singh, Adivaraha, Mahavaraha, Duryodhan Singh and Mahāmahopādhyāya Narasimha. The report associates this sequence with Aryabhata's family background, but accepting such an identification without independent examination of names, dates and contemporary external evidence would be unsafe. This essay preserves it only as a genealogical claim of the source report.

The same report claims a spiritual or scholarly connection with Chaitanya Mahaprabhu through Rampati Upadhyaya of the Vatsa gotra and Karmaha–Tarauni branch, also called Vishnupuri or Paramanandapuri. It is essential to distinguish "biological descent" from a "teacher–disciple lineage." Even if the pañjī supplies Rampati Upadhyaya's family, it does not thereby establish Chaitanya's blood ancestry. At most, it provides a line of inquiry into contacts between the wider bhakti movement and scholars of Mithila.

The same rule should govern entries associated with famous names—Aryabhata, Vidyapati, Jyotirishwar, Gangesha and Ganganath: similarity of names is an initial clue, not proof of identity.

II. Women, Maternal Descent and the Silences of the Pañjī

The pañjī is fundamentally patrilineal in structure. Its principal sequence of names proceeds from father to son, while gotra and mūla also depend on paternal identity. At first glance, therefore, women appear almost absent. Yet the actual arithmetic of marriage verification cannot operate without women. The dau/ddau designation, maternal village, maternal grandfather's side, the five maternal sapiṇḍa generations and the sixteen chhaṭṭhīs all make maternal connections indispensable to the archive. A woman's name may remain unwritten, but without her genealogical position no decision on marriage eligibility is possible.

This paradox may be described as "structural presence and nominal absence." The bride's father's name, her maternal village, the mūla of her maternal grandfather and the ancestral lines of her grandmothers were necessary for verifying marriage; information about women's relations therefore forms a central link in the network. The male-centred style of the main text suppresses their visibility. The Dūṣaṇa Pañjī, asvajanya-patras, marriage colophons, branches referring to a second wife as aparā and modern occupational entries open cracks in this silence.

Some sources claim that the names of women were systematically recorded in special asvajanya-patras associated with the Rasaḍh–Araria region. Modern nagarām pañjīs contain such expressions as "wife Anita" and "first IAS daughter." By contrast, many women in the principal genealogical lines remain "the daughter from such-and-such village." Taken together, these forms of evidence do not mean that the pañjī was a "feminist" archive, nor that women were entirely absent from it. The appropriate conclusion is that marriage regulation led the pañjī to retain data on maternal descent, while social prestige and naming practices remained centred upon men.

Women's Bodies as Social Boundaries in the Dūṣaṇa Pañjī

Women identified as charmakāriṇī, Yavana, devadāsī, widow, a teacher's wife, path-patitā or of unknown lineage recur among the Dūṣaṇa Pañjī's categories; many entries make the woman's social condition the vehicle of a genealogical "blemish." The language is itself a record of the caste-based, patriarchal morality of its time. Yet historians must also recognise something equally important: women whom the principal, laudatory genealogy might have omitted survived in the archive precisely because of the supposed "blemish," either by name or by recorded connection. In modern research, the archive's stigmatising category can therefore be turned into a source for the social history of marginalised people.

Marriage, Widowhood and Polygamy

Reports on social ranking, demand for high-status bridegrooms and bikauā polygamy demonstrate the pañjī system's indirect consequences for women's lives. Colophons record four, five, six or more marriages by certain men; in extreme examples, some reports mention as many as twelve. The history involved is not merely one of male prestige, but also of the widowhood of many women, child marriage, financial transactions and inequality within families. Reform initiatives such as the Sadar Committee were therefore not external incidents in the history of the pañjī: they were responses to its social consequences.

12. The Ancient Pañjī, Volume I: Pages 1–65 — Foundations of Genealogical Grammar

The first sixty-five pages of Volume I of the Ancient Pañjī provide a primary text for understanding the "grammar" of the pañjī. Its opening formula, "atha patra pañjī likhyate" ("now the genealogical register is written"), establishes the formal character of the record. Personal names, fathers, sons, mūlas, villages, dau designations, alternative names, scholarly titles and maternal-lineage cycles are compressed into brief formulae. According to the report's count, this part records at least 122 named villages, 17 active gotras, more than 55 maternal-lineage cycles, approximately 47 Mahāmahopādhyāyas and thousands of individuals. The figure of "approximately five thousand persons" is an estimate in the source report; an independent recount of the original would be useful.

Halāyudha of Gaṅgaulī: A Historical Point of Reference

Among the notable genealogical sequences in the first volume, Halāyudha of Gaṅgaulī occupies an important position. The report considers the possibility that he was the scholar Halāyudha associated with the reign of Ballāla Sena of Bengal, placing the chronology approximately in the latter part of the twelfth century. Names such as Vīra, Nārāyaṇa and Śūlapāṇi occur among his descendants. Sibling-order signs such as "05/04" show that the pañjī recorded not only direct descent but also a person's position among brothers. The problem of identical names among historical individuals arises here as well. Identification must therefore be tested against gotra, mūla, village, generation and contemporary context.

Mahāmahopādhyāyas and the Geography of Knowledge

The source report particularly emphasises the concentration of scholars bearing the title Mahāmahopādhyāya in the Khauāl–Sarisab–Khaṇḍbalā region. Distinctions in grammar, Nyāya, astrology, Vedic studies and Dharmaśāstra are entered alongside family genealogies. A lineage associated with a scholar named Narasiṃha is claimed to demonstrate the continuation of scholarship over eighteen generations. This makes the pañjī an alternative source for intellectual history: it preserves traces of family-based traditions of learning that fall outside university records and official lists.

Royal Offices and Administration

Offices such as that of Devāditya, described as a "śāntivigrahika," together with royal honours, religious jurisdictions, treasurial and court-related titles, show that the pañjī is not merely a list of Brahmanical ritual specialists. The relationship between government administration and scholarly families also becomes part of genealogy. Such titles make it possible to reconstruct elements of the political order, royal patronage and the role of educated groups at particular historical moments.

Unusual Entries

The entry for Kāmadeva, a student of all four Vedas, in association with "Ḍom Ṭekarī" reveals the complexities of social boundaries and occupational or community designations. A title such as "Ayācī" points to an ascetic ideal of not soliciting gifts. Remarks concerning "tegachhiyā" or an attenuated branch are especially significant: in these instances the pañjī itself acknowledges that information about a branch had become incomplete or that memory had been broken. The register is therefore not an omniscient, error-free database. It also records the loss of knowledge.

Maternal-Lineage Cycles

References to more than fifty-five maternal-lineage cycles associated with names such as Śrīdhara, Sore, Gaṅgādhara and Baidyanātha reveal the density of the marriage network. Parallel to the main patrilineal sequence, recurring circles of maternal connections link a family to many villages and mūlas. The geography of the pañjī is, in effect, the geography of marriage.

The Colophon of 1856 CE

An important colophon gives the date Śaka 1778, the third day of the dark fortnight of Śrāvaṇa—approximately 1856 CE. A scribe or copyist named Rāmānanda of Paṇḍuā, a reference to Gaṇeśa, son of Lakṣmīdhara, and a note on copying establish that older genealogical material continued to be recopied and preserved in the nineteenth century. The date at which a manuscript was written and the date at which a lineage recorded within it began are therefore different matters.

12a. Ṣaḍyantrī Scholars, the Vaśaiṭhī Inscription and Rajput Clans: Additional Evidentiary Leads

A detailed report explains "ṣaḍyantrī" as denoting a tradition of scholars proficient in six śāstras or philosophical systems, and lists thirteen names: Mahāmahopādhyāya Godhī Śarmā, Mādhava Śarmā, Ādya Mādhava Śarmā, Śaṅkara Śarmā, Yajñapati Śarmā, Paraśurāma Śarmā, Vāmadeva Śarmā, Pītāmbara Śarmā Vidyānidhi, Gokulanātha Śarmā of Phanandah, Jagannātha Śarmā of Phanandah, Vaṃśadhara Śarmā of Rājanpurā–Dariharā, Raghunātha Śarmā of Phanandah, and Upādhyāya Datta/Viṣṇudatta Śarmā Paramānandapurī. The available source supplies this list; the particular scholarly works and dates associated with each name still require comparison with independent textual evidence.

The same report claims that a temple inscription in the Vaśaiṭhī/Araria region contains an account of seven generations of Queen Indravatī of the Suragan–Loām royal family corresponding to the pañjī genealogy. If the original inscription or a reliable transcription is available, it could furnish an excellent example of independent external verification of a genealogical record. The present integrated essay retains the claim as a research lead; without inspecting the inscription directly, it does not treat the correspondence as conclusively confirmed.

The report's assertion that the Varṇaratnākara mentions sixty-two Rajput clans also points towards the broader society of Mithila. Comparative research is needed into the archival traditions of Kṣatriyas, Karṇa Kāyasthas, Rajputs and other communities beyond the Brahmin-centred material presently available in the pañjī studies.

13. Expansion of Volume I: Pages 66–347 — The Karmahā Centre, the Nepal Corridor and Contemporary Marriages

Across pages 66–347, the pañjī abruptly ceases to look like a static "ancient" document: it emerges as a living register. The name Karmahā occurs approximately 292 times in the source count, signalling a geographical shift from the Maṇḍar-centred landscape of the earlier part. Rataulī–Dariharā–Khauāl, Taraunī, Dumrā, Gaṅgorā, Kanhaulī, Mahiṣī, Lohanā, Jagaur, Jhanjhārpur and numerous places near Nepal form new networks.

The Rataulī–Dariharā–Karmahā Triangle

The Rataulī–Dariharā subgroup and the Karmahā–Khauāl connections reveal a north-eastern extension of centres of learning and marriage. A list of villages is not simply a map: the more frequently a village appears as a maternal village, ancestral village, present residence or marital connection, the greater its social "centrality." In this sense, the pañjī becomes a fine-grained social map of medieval Mithila.

"Avalamba–Sarasvatī–Dāṅkita" and New Scholarly Titles

The source report identifies a rare title, "Avalamba–Sarasvatī–Dāṅkita Mahāmahopādhyāya," associated with Baṭeśa Puruṣottama, son of Hariśvara. Paradoxical epithets such as "Sarvajña Garīb," Vedic sub-branches, designations such as pāṃ/pañca associated with scholarly families, and the prefix Ṭhākur reveal multiple strata of naming culture. A title in the pañjī is not merely an ornament: it becomes a historical label for a family's intellectual occupation and standing.

The Integration of Mahārāja Mādhava Siṃha

The entry for Mahārāja Mādhava Siṃha, with his extended titulature, places the royal family within the ordinary dau formulas and marriage network. The king's genealogy is not segregated into a special "royal appendix" outside the rules of the pañjī; like other families, it is incorporated into the lines of relationship. This reveals an interdependence between royal legitimacy and Brahmanical genealogical records. Separate entries for Mādhava Siṃha's sons extend this integration.

Traces of Mughal Administration

The designation "cāturmāsika mansabdār hazārī" attached to Rāmānanda Chaudharī Maṇikānandana exemplifies the entrance of Mughal administrative vocabulary into local genealogies. Read alongside later titles such as "Rāy," "Rājā" and "Mahārājā," the pañjī becomes a nominal record of changes in political authority.

Bhauālvāsī: Migration towards Nepal

An entry reading "Bhauālvāsī" is interpreted as indicating a migrant branch associated with the Kathmandu Valley or Bhauāl in Nepal. The network of Simarāvāṛ, Maliṅgiyā–Kujolī and frontier villages captures historical movement between Mithila and Nepal at the level of genealogical records. Long before the formation of modern national borders, families commonly moved for marriage, education and service.

Marriages in 2003–2004: An Extraordinary Compression of Time

The most striking feature of this part is its dated modern marriage colophons: 1 December 2003, 9 December 2003, 15 December 2003, 20 January 2004, 21 December 2004, and others. The source report counts more than twenty-four such entries. Their appearance within ancient genealogical sequences demonstrates that the pañjī was not "dead" history but a legal and social instrument being continually updated. A medieval scholar, an eighteenth-century king and a twenty-first-century marriage can occupy the same page—a phenomenon the report describes as "temporal compression."

A Caution concerning the Name "Poet Vidyāpati"

A later entry explicitly contains the words "kavi Vidyāpati." Yet names recur frequently in the pañjī; finding the name Vidyāpati alone does not establish identity with the celebrated Maithili poet Vidyāpati Ṭhākur. Correct identification requires agreement on mūla, village, father, generation, date and related branch. The importance of this example lies in the methodological discipline it teaches regarding personal identification.

14. Volume II: Pages 348–690 — The Pañjī Encounters Modern India

On pages 348–690 of Volume II, the centre of gravity shifts again. According to the source count, Sodarpur appears approximately 853 times, Maṇḍar 621 times and Karmahā 580 times. The frequency of a village name is not simply a population measure; it combines marriage ties, prominent families and references to branches. In this volume, the pañjī readily incorporates the administration of colonial and independent India, universities, marriages abroad, modern degrees and professions.

From Mādhava Siṃha to Kāmeśvara Siṃha

The genealogy of the Darbhanga Raj develops from Mādhava Siṃha to Kāmeśvara Siṃha as an extended royal sequence. The source report draws attention to the imperial distinction "K.C.I.E." and an academic indication such as "Litt." in Kāmeśvara Siṃha's entry. The older "Mahārājādhirāja" and newer colonial honours converge in a single person's labels. At the level of nomenclature, this is a compressed history of political change.

Interreligious Marriage in Sweden and Intercaste Marriage

Entries recording an "interreligious marriage" in Sweden and, separately, an "intercaste marriage" are striking examples of the pañjī system's modern adaptation. Significantly, the genealogical sequence does not end after such marriages. A note is added in parentheses or as an annotation, and descendants continue to be entered. This resembles a modern echo of the older logic of the Dūṣaṇa Pañjī: a departure from the norm or a new social event does not terminate the archive but becomes new information within it.

Abhinava-Sarasvatī and the Modern University

Traditional scholarly titles such as "Abhinava-Sarasvatī" continue to survive, while a professor or grammarian in the Maithili department of Calcutta University, modern educated professionals, government officers and advocates enter the pañjī alongside them. Mahiṣī emerges as a subsidiary centre of learning. The report reads its longstanding philosophical reputation in relation to the memory of Maṇḍana Miśra, although particular claims of genealogical identity require independent verification.

The Rāy Families: From Mughal to British Administration

The title "Rāy" is said to occur approximately fifty-three times in this volume. From a Mughal-era revenue or administrative distinction into the colonial period, the same title continues to mark a family's social identity. The pañjī reveals the "longue durée" of political history within names: rulers change, but local markers of prestige survive through reinterpretation.

The Poets Jīvakarṇa and "Madhurakavi" Māghava

Explicit literary designations such as poet Jīvakarṇa and "Madhurakavi Māghava" make the pañjī a supplementary source for the literary history of Maithili. These entries cannot, by themselves, establish a catalogue of works. They do, however, provide a basis for investigating the social identity of a "poet," the relevant village and family, marriage ties and possible chronology.

The Expansion of Marriage Colophons

Volume II discusses approximately forty-one dated marriage colophons, ranging from the later nineteenth century to September 2004. Some men are recorded as having married four to six times. The social significance is not merely that the register is "rich in data": these entries supply material for studying polygamy, widowhood, remarriage, family strategies and the stratified marriage market.

Urban Markers

Combined designations of residence such as "Rājā Rāmlocana (Katihar)," "Kolkata (Pālī)" and "Sanhavāsī Karmahā" transform the supposedly fixed meaning of the ancestral village. A family retains its attachment to its mūla while settling in a city for reasons of occupation or politics. The pañjī thus points towards the need to distinguish "ancestral origin" from "residence," a particularly important distinction when constructing a modern digital database.

15. Upaṭīpa and the "Genome Pañjī": Short Treatises on Descent

Sources entitled "Pañjī-Prabandha," "Upaṭīpa" or "Uṭipa" continually unfold genealogies into fine branches. Viewed in isolation, a short entry may look like a heap of names. Once its signs of relationship are joined together, it becomes a network connecting many families through marriages, maternal villages, offices, migration, teaching and royal service.

A Patrilineal Backbone, a Bilateral Marriage Network

The principal lineage is a father-to-son sequence, but at every "dau" or "ddau" the maternal family enters the record. It is therefore incomplete to describe the pañjī as a "purely patrilineal genealogy." Its genealogical backbone is patrilineal; its marriage network is bilateral. In contemporary network analysis, a person can be represented as a node, the father–son line as one kind of relationship, and marriage and the maternal village as other kinds of relationship.

The Khaṇḍbalā Siṃha Family: A Social Bridge

Some reports discuss the Khaṇḍbalā Siṃha family as a non-Brahmin social bridge, describing it in some places as resembling Bhūmihārs and elsewhere as resembling Kāyasthas. The terminology is not consistent across the sources, so no definite caste identification can be made without rereading the original pañjī. Nevertheless, one point is clear: the pañjī network is not merely a practical picture of a closed endogamous circle. It also contains records of external marital relationships in particular periods and families.

The Loām–Sugaunā Rāy Family

In the Loām–Sugaunā section, references to Chandra Nārāyaṇa Rāy, Rājā Devanārāyaṇa and later generations in modern administrative service demonstrate long-term social mobility. The modern IAS officer Naresh Chandra appears at one end of this sequence in the source. Here the pañjī traces occupational change from a locally prominent family into the modern all-India administrative services.

The Kṣatriya/Ṭhākur Families of Bhaur–Rājgrām

The Ṭhākur/Kṣatriya families of Bhaur–Rājgrām, including Kṛṣṇa Siṃha, open an associated archival world beyond the principal Brahmin-centred pañjī tradition. Narratives of early institutionalisation describe Guṇākara Jhā as a genealogist for Brahmins, Śaṅkaradatta for Karṇa Kāyasthas, and Vijayadatta for Kṣatriyas or the Gandhavāriyā group. Modern surviving material is uneven; the sources express concern that some non-Brahmin genealogical traditions have diminished or disappeared.

Navya-Nyāya and Educated Lineages

The title "Naiyāyika," the distinction Mahāmahopādhyāya, identifications such as "Sir Gaṅgānātha," Ācārya Rāmnātha, M.A., Ph.D., and Professor Tantranātha make the pañjī a social map of intellectual traditions. The identification of "Sir Gaṅgānātha" with Gaṅgānātha Jhā is considered possible, but when an original entry supplies insufficient particulars, the equation should remain a possibility rather than a conclusion.

The Internal Date of 9 July 2008

A colophon dated in the month of Āṣāḍha, on Wednesday, 9 July 2008, marks the period of digital editing. Such dates clarify the different layers of a source: the genealogical matter may be centuries old, the manuscript copy nineteenth- or twentieth-century, and the digital edition twenty-first-century. A critical edition must keep metadata for these three periods separate.

The Use of the Word "Genome"

With a title such as "Genome Mapping, 450–2009 CE," the textual project gives the pañjī's extensive genealogical information a modern metaphor. The metaphor has considerable force: long-term family networks, marriage distances, population history and patterns of migration can all be mapped. Its limit is equally clear: the pañjī contains no biological samples, DNA sequences, chromosome tests or statistical genetic validation. "Genome" in this project should therefore be understood as a metaphor or aspiration for cultural-genealogical mapping, not as a direct claim to modern molecular genomics.

16. Nagarām, Volume III: The Entry of Modern Professions into Village Groups

The Nagarām pañjī is organised into village-based sections. Each block begins with a formula such as "Nagarām" or "grāmārambha" ("beginning of the village"), an invocation of a deity, and then names of persons, sut/sutā relations, villages, dau/ddau designations and reciprocal codes. Because of this organisation, the whole text can be read as a social map.

The Unstable Spellings of Village Names

The same village appears on different pages under phonetic, Sanskritised or scribe-specific spellings. The source report estimates some sixty to eighty variant forms requiring normalisation. A digital edition should not impose one "standard name" by erasing the original wording. The original spelling, standard modern form, district or block, and geographical identification should be stored in separate fields.

Sandahpur–Siśpur: Formal and Familiar Names

In the early blocks, a formal name for an individual or a village is found alongside "pra." or a familiar local name, such as Āṅkhī or Naharā. This double-name system preserves the reality of identification in an oral society. Without both the documentary name and the household or village name, personal identification may be incomplete.

Khāṅguṛ–Padahiyā: "Yantrajña"

The designation "yantrajña" in block 33 is interpreted as an early sign of modern engineering or technical occupations. Amid traditional Mahāmahopādhyāyas, astrologers and grammarians, a profession involving the knowledge of machines demonstrates that the pañjī continued to register occupational change.

Kanhaulī–Maṅgraunī: A Judge, an IAS Officer and a Communist Member of Parliament

Within the single network of relations in block 122 appear Justice Amarnātha, Professor Trilokanātha, IAS, references to a Communist MP or the CPI(M), and traditional connections to a grammarian's family by marriage. The modern state, left-wing politics and classical scholarship are present in the same familial network. Here the pañjī does not take a political position; it records relationships.

Raiyām–Rājahaṛā: University Families

In block 148, the Mahāmahopādhyāya tradition is joined by a former vice-chancellor of Allahabad University, Dr Umeśa, Professor Jayakānta, a historian of Maithili literature, Professor Kṛṣṇakānta, a geologist, and others, forming a dense cluster of educated people. The genealogical inheritance of learning changes its form here, moving from classical scholarly titles towards modern university specialisations.

Rohar–Bhavānīpur: Political Lineages

The family of Chaudharī Baccū and its regional political influence in block 183 show that modern democratic politics, too, has become part of genealogical memory. Suffixes such as "Kiśora," "Nārāyaṇa" and "Indra" in the names reveal generational preferences in naming.

Three Periods of Occupation

The Nagarām report views the long-term transformation of occupational titles in three broad periods. The first comprises Vedic learning, Nyāya, grammar, astrology, Dharmaśāstra and the Mahāmahopādhyāya title. The second comprises colonial law, advocates, judicial posts, revenue administration, railways and technical services. The third comprises professors, scientists, engineers, physicians, IAS and IPS officers, Members of Parliament and judges in independent India. This progression should not be treated as a set of rigid chronological boundaries, but as a useful indication of social and occupational change.

A Chronology of Naming Practices

The sources describe an early predominance of Śiva-associated names ending in "Nātha," "Īśvara" and "Śaṅkara"; the popularity of "Nārāyaṇa" and "Kṛṣṇa" in the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries; "Chandra," "Mohan," "Bahādur" and "Rāy" in the colonial period; and the increasing occurrence of "Kumār" and shorter modern names in the twentieth century. These linguistic data make the pañjī a rare long-term repository for onomastics.

Migration

Families spread from the Madhubani–Darbhanga centre towards Purnia–Banailī, Muzaffarpur, Bhagalpur–Munger, Saharsa–Supaul, Champaran, the Nepal Tarai, Kathmandu, and later metropolitan and national administrative centres. The ancestral village remains an identifying point, but residence and occupation change. The pañjī is thus not only a narrative of "fixed caste"; it is also a narrative of mobile populations and migration.

17. Pañjikā–Nagarāmī, Blocks 226–352: Familiar Names, Degrees and Occupational Lineages

In this section of Nagarāmī, genealogy becomes a miniature encyclopaedia of modern social history. Alongside personal names, the entries increasingly mention household names, professions, degrees, universities, courts, government employment and even the professional achievements of daughters. The traditional formula is not abandoned; new fields of information are added within it.

The Branches of Maṅgaunī, Hāṭī and Samaulī

Block 226 follows the Devakīnandana line from Maṅgaunī to Madarī; blocks 226–227 the Vaṃśamaṇi sub-branch; block 228 the lines of brothers; and blocks 230–232 the Hāṭī–Satalakhā/Vilakhinad connections, all in successive compact formulae. The entry for Chānurā Jhā Haridāsa Jhā shows the coexistence of familiar and formal names. The importance of this material lies not only in "great personalities," but in the continuous recombination of smaller branches.

Samaulī: The Cultural Diversity of Names

Block 238 records Pradyumna's sons Rājīvalocana, Kamala and Ghoghana; block 244 includes Nīlāmbara, Mahīpati and Upe, alongside popular names such as Sanāphūl, Phekana and Choṭā. Long Sanskritic names, devotional names, names derived from flowers or nature, nicknames and shortened household names occur within the same family. The pañjī records a living culture of names, not merely their "standard" linguistic forms.

Balirājpur–Choptā: Education and Engineering

Block 253 contains the family of Buvuājī/Jayakṛṣṇa: Kumārjī, Amarnātha, Pītāmbara/Naval Kiśora, Jagadīśa and Satyanārāyaṇa; and, among Naval Kiśora's sons, Professor Śyāmānanda, engineer Manoj Kumār and Subodh Kumār, forming a clear sequence of modern occupational change. In block 254, "Sāhityācārya Professor Dr Viśvambhara Miśra 'Vāgīśa'" combines in one identity the traditional distinction Sāhityācārya, the modern university titles "professor" and "doctor," and a literary pen name.

Indicators of Dates and Degrees

A formula such as "1934, third M.A." is a chronological marker of the moment when a modern university degree came to be regarded as a detail worth preserving in genealogy. Double M.A. degrees, engineers, pleaders or advocates, income-tax service and commissions now become a new language of family prestige. The older Mahāmahopādhyāya title does not vanish; newer degrees grow alongside it.

Advocate Families and the Legal Profession

The family of advocate Brajamohana in block 307—with Narendramohana, M.S., a principal, a law faculty and other lawyers—reveals the intergenerational expansion of legal professions under colonial and postcolonial conditions. The pañjī makes possible close study of how occupational capital persists or changes across generations.

The Explicit Identification of a Maithili Writer

Block 316 expressly records Dr Professor Vedanātha as a "writer in the Maithili language." This is especially significant for literary history: a person's creative identity has itself entered the family register. Such an entry could provide a model for verifying the identities of other poets and authors.

An IPS–IAS Family and a Daughter

In blocks 345–346, entries for Mahāvīra, IPS and DIG, and his sons Arun/Amit, IAS, display the prestige of the modern all-India services. Particularly noteworthy is the reference to the "first IAS daughter," an exceptional moment in which a woman's professional achievement is recorded in the genealogical text. The exception itself shows that professional identification of women was not the ordinary rule; yet, as social values changed, the criteria governing archival selection could change as well.

A "Jury" Member of the Calcutta High Court

Block 347 mentions "Pāṭaka Bauna" as a member of a jury of the Calcutta High Court, leaving a trace of local social history under the colonial judicial system. Such brief indications of office in the pañjī may provide leads for locating formal government records.

The Deep Lineage of Hariam

Block 352 brings together the five sons of Paśupati, all with names ending in "-pati," prestigious maternal connections such as Sarisab and Belaunch, and an extensive generational sequence. Such an entry connects three fields at once: naming conventions, marital prestige and the expansion of genealogical branches.

18. Nagarām, Blocks 359–466: From Invocations of Deities to Royal Houses and Modern Officials

Almost every block in this section consists of an invocation of a deity, the word "grāmārambha," genealogical formulae and reciprocal codes. The source report interprets the abundance of Śiva or Śaiva names in the openings as possible indicators of family deities or local religious memory. This interpretation is plausible; however, before treating each divine name as necessarily referring to a family deity, the underlying tradition and local evidence must be examined.

Vicāṛhī–Kuā and Parahaṭ–Chānpurā

The Vicāṛhī–Kuā group in blocks 359–362 shows the underlying structure of many generations, maternal relationships and changes of village. In blocks 363–367, the Parahaṭ–Chānpurā sequence joins religious, scholarly and royal prestige within one genealogical network through distinctions such as Mahāmahopādhyāya Khageśa, "Rājā Vidyānidhi Hṛdayanidhi," and Dhīrendra, a performer of four-part ritual sacrifice.

Maṅgaurī–Khojpur: Dense Scholarly Families

Blocks 370–376 contain an extensive sequence of scholars centred on the ascetic Upādhyāya Rāmabhadra: Paṇḍitarāja, Mahāmahopādhyāya Madhusūdana, Mahāmahopādhyāyas Baidyanātha and Pītāmbara, Umānanda, Mahāmahopādhyāya Vāgīśa and others. This is the social history of a "family of learning." Scholarship may be not only individual talent but a collective ecology of teaching culture, books, teachers, marriage networks and patronage.

Pilakhavāṛ–Maṅgaurī and Alay–Lagmā

Blocks 379–382 continue the branch of Mahāmahopādhyāya Vāgīśa. In the Alay–Lagmā corridor in blocks 383–387, the concentration of names ending in "Datta" forms a distinctive subgroup for onomastic study. Naming patterns within a family can be informal supplementary clues to genealogical identification, but names alone cannot establish a relationship of descent.

The Baiganī–Baṃsī Royal Family

In blocks 388–395, the Baiganī/Baṃsī royal line, connections with Banailī/Rāmgaṛh, Rājā Kīrtyānanda Siṃha Bahādur and musical distinctions open a history of modern royal and cultural patronage. The royal household is joined to the pañjī through marriage relationships, making the register a genealogical source for local political history.

Paramgaṛh–Piṇḍāruc and the Chaudharī Families

In blocks 392–398, the Chaudharī families, modern names containing "Kumār" or "Chandra," and regional prestige illustrate a transitional form of social change. This is neither wholly the era of classical scholarly titles nor an exclusively modern world of professional identities; the two are intermingled.

Jagatpur–Oin: The Simraungarh Royal Line

Blocks 402–406 supply an extended eulogistic sequence for the royal line associated with Oin/Oinhā. The report notes names such as Rājā-Paṇḍit Kāmeśvara, Rājā Bhogīśvara, Mahāmahattaka Kusumeśvara and Mahārājādhirāja Bhaveśvara/Bhavasiṃha, as well as an ancient date, Śaka 768—approximately 846 CE. Such very early dates must be used with extreme caution. They matter as claims within the pañjī tradition, but cannot be accepted as definitive historical facts without independent scrutiny through epigraphy, contemporary inscriptions and texts, and the chronology of genealogical generations.

Nahas–Khauāl: From Scholars to IAS and IPS Officers

In blocks 420–428, families of astrologers and classical scholars are connected to later members of the modern administrative services. This transition illustrates the long-term value of the pañjī: the "occupation of knowledge" changes within a lineage, while social capital flows into new institutions—universities, courts and the bureaucracy.

Chānpurā, Sukhait–Pilakhavāṛ and Peripheral Groups

The social group of Chānpurā in blocks 429–434, the line of Mahāmahopādhyāya Nenā at Sukhait–Pilakhavāṛ in blocks 447–450, philosophical names such as "Jñānī" and "Dhyānī," and the Parahaṭ, Satalakhā, Munger, Lohanā, Rohar and Supaul/Nepal-border areas in blocks 451–466 extend the central geography of the pañjī. For this section, the source report estimates eight to twelve generations on average, in some cases fifteen to eighteen, more than three thousand individuals and over two hundred villages. These are estimates based on the report; they can be checked through digital counting.

The Frequency of Maternal Villages

In this selected portion, the source report identifies high frequencies for Sodarpur, Darbharā, Pālī, Belaunch, Khauāl, Karmahā, Jajivāl, Sarisab, Pabausal, Maṇḍar and Ekahar, among others. If machine-assisted verification against the original pages confirms these frequencies, they may provide a firm basis for identifying the "central villages" in the marriage network.

19. Purnia and the Social Geography of Eastern Mithila

A separate report links the discussion of the pañjī with the local histories of Purnia, Asaṅgā, Śrīpur, Havelī, Dharampur and eastern Mithila. It would be a mistake to dismiss this material as a mere repetition of the principal genealogical theory, for it preserves the memory of particular villages, temples, scholars, freedom fighters and local families.

Jahānpur and the Installation of an Image in 1708 CE

In the account of Jahānpur, the installation of an image in 1708 CE supplies a chronological marker for local religious history. Together with names such as Puṇyānanda Jhā, Girānanda Ṭhākur and Rāsmohana Jhā, this event establishes a thread of cultural continuity for the village. If the original architectural evidence or an inscription survives, the pañjī and local tradition could corroborate one another.

Memories of the Independence Movement

References to families of freedom fighters in the villages of eastern Mithila connect modern political history with the social memory preserved by the pañjī. This material warrants comparison with official lists of freedom fighters, district gazetteers and oral history. The pañjī views events from the perspective of families; state archives view public positions and events. Reading both together produces a fuller account.

Viṣṇupur, Guṇānanda–Tīrthānanda and University Connections

The families associated with Viṣṇupur, Guṇānanda and Tīrthānanda, and genealogical references to a vice-chancellor of Mithila University reveal the regional social foundations of modern higher education. The history of a university is not merely the story of an institution's founding; long traditions of teaching within local scholarly families may form part of its background.

Nāśirā, Jyotirīśvara Ṭhākur and Other Scholarly Memories

A source claim connecting the Nāśirā/Naśirā region with the name of Jyotirīśvara Ṭhākur is of interest to literary historians. The historical identity of Jyotirīśvara, author of the Varṇaratnākara, is independently attested; a specific equivalence between his lineage and a pañjī entry, however, requires detailed examination of the original genealogical record, chronology and village references. This integrated essay retains the connection as a research lead, not as a proven line of descent.

Dharampur, Suragan Loām and Sarmast Alī Khān

In the local histories of Dharampur and Suragan Loām, names such as Sarmast Alī Khān, Rāghava Siṃha, scholars of Rasāṛh and the scholarly families of Dhamdāhā create a broader social picture of interactions across religious communities and political authority. If pañjī-centred studies of Mithila remain confined to Brahmin families alone, a substantial part of this shared regional history will be lost.

20. The Language of the Pañjī: Formula, Grammar and Onomastics

The pañjī is not written in continuous prose. Its principal strength lies in a compressed, formulaic grammar. Markers such as "so-and-so sut," "sutau," "sutā," "from such-and-such village such-and-such dau," "ddau," "aparā," "mūla," "pra." and "nī" indicate types of relationship in remarkably few words. Learning to read the pañjī is therefore rather like learning to decode a modern system of abbreviations.

Sut, Sutau and Sutā

"Sut" may denote one son, "sutau" two sons or the dual number, while "sutā" may refer to a daughter or a particular context of offspring; usage can vary from manuscript to manuscript. When reading the original script, the distinction between grammatical number and scribal abbreviation must be checked. In automated text processing, reducing all three forms to a single category, "son," could corrupt relational data.

Dau/Ddau: Codes for Maternal Relationships

"Dau" is generally interpreted as an abbreviated indication of a dauhitra or maternal connection; "ddau" points to a doubled maternal reference or a cross-link at another level. Some reports translate these forms differently, as "maternal uncle–nephew" or "daughter's son." Rather than imposing a single English equivalent, a digital glossary should record context-dependent relationship types.

"Pra." and Double Names

"Pra." has been read as a commonly used name, a familiar nickname, or in some places as an abbreviation for "first." When several meanings are possible for the same abbreviation, a critical edition should preserve the original sign and supply an editorial note. Familiar names in Samaulī and Nagarām show that household names were practical instruments of personal identification.

Sanskrit, Maithili, Persian and English Influences

The older formulae are strongly Sanskritic, with titles such as rājā, upādhyāya, Mahāmahopādhyāya, jyotiṣī, vaiyākaraṇa and śāntivigrahika. Medieval and Mughal strata introduce Persianate administrative words such as Rāy, mansabdār, hazārī and Chaudharī. The colonial period brings terms for advocate, pleader, jury, university and degree; the modern period adds engineer, professor, physician, scientist and administrator. Loanwords within personal designations are living evidence of changing social institutions.

The History of Place Names

An older spelling of a village may differ from its modern revenue-record name: "Maṅgraunī" in one place and "Maṅgaurī" in another; "Sodarpur" and "Sodarpurā"; "Khauāl" and "Khauār"; "Darihar" and "Dariharā." Sound change, local pronunciation, scribal habits and transliteration into Devanagari all contribute to these variations. For linguists, the pañjī is a long-term repository of place names.

Seven Types of Names

The Nagarāmī report broadly groups names into seven tendencies: deity-derived names; Sanskritic literary or philosophical names; Vaiṣṇava or Śaiva devotional names; Persian-influenced administrative names; folk or household names; compound names of the colonial and modern periods; and names accompanied by professions or titles. These are not rigid categories, but they provide a useful framework for studying the long-term transformation of thousands of names.

21. The Pañjī as an Institution of Social Memory, Power and Knowledge

A genealogy does not merely answer the question, "Who was whose father?" It makes social decisions about whose memory will be publicly preserved, whose name will be recorded alongside a prestigious title, whose relationship will be entered as a "dūṣaṇa," and whose line will remain incomplete. In this sense, the pañjī is an instrument of both memory and power.

Pañjīkārs as "Professionals of Memory"

The expertise of the pañjīkār arose at the intersection of written registers, oral tradition and social attestation. A family might remember seven or ten generations of its ancestors; without professional custodians of memory, however, it would have been difficult to retain the interlocking marriage connections of hundreds of villages, their pravaras, mūlas, dūṣaṇas and references to collateral branches. The pañjīkār thus became a specialist in the social memory of the community.

Written Memory Does Not Supplant Oral Tradition

The pañjī's abbreviated formulae themselves show that the written text is not self-sufficient. The pañjīkār orally explained the significance of abbreviations, village bynames, references to collateral branches and page citations. Written and oral transmission should therefore be seen not as adversaries but as interdependent practices. The greatest risk of digital conversion is that this body of oral interpretation may disappear.

An Instrument of Social Stratification

The categories Śrotriya, Yogya, Pañjībaddha, Vaṃśadhara and Jayavāra; higher and intermediate mūlas; collateral-branch registers; and marriage certifications could all confer formal recognition on social prestige. Where genealogical scrutiny determined eligibility for marriage, the register became a gatekeeper to social life. This structure may be examined through Louis Dumont's analysis of caste hierarchy, Max Weber's status groups, Pierre Bourdieu's cultural and social capital, or Michel Foucault's relationship between knowledge and power. Theories, however, must not be imposed upon the source.

The Dūṣaṇa Pañjī as "Counter-Memory"

The principal pañjī records the accepted succession of prestigious lineages; the Dūṣaṇa Pañjī records violations of rules, prohibited relationships, marginalised castes and communities, widows, devadāsīs, unknown maternal lines and social disputes. In this sense, the Dūṣaṇa Pañjī is a shadow archive of the principal register's memory. A detail omitted from a prestigious family genealogy might survive in the register of "transgressions."

The Loss of Knowledge: The "Tegachhiyā Problem"

For certain branches, the pañjī itself acknowledges the loss of information. This recognition of its own limits complicates the archive's reliability: it makes no claim to omniscience, but preserves formulaic information insofar as that information is known. A modern database should likewise recognise "unknown" as a legitimate data value. Inserting conjectural names to fill gaps would be a violation of archival integrity.

22. Comparative Genealogy: A Dialogue with Other Traditions of the World

The source reports compare the pañjī with Chinese zupu clan genealogies, Jewish yichus, European heraldry and royal genealogies, Māori whakapapa, Rajput lineage registers and modern religious genealogical collections. Such comparison is productive only when it accounts for differences as well as similarities.

Chinese clan genealogies are often revised at fixed intervals by patrilineal descent groups; the pañjī was more closely associated with professional genealogists and an institutional system of marriage verification. Jewish yichus concerns religious status and marriage eligibility, but does not necessarily require the elaborate local cross-referencing of village, mūla and dau found in the pañjī. European heraldic and aristocratic genealogies primarily concern the nobility, whereas Mithila's pañjī encompasses an extensive network of families within a particular religious and professional community. The Rajput traditions of the Cāraṇs and Bhāṭs furnish some of the closest South Asian comparisons, although their structures of written cross-reference differ.

What Distinguishes the Pañjī

The distinctive character of the pañjī does not lie in exaggerated claims that it is the "oldest" or "most scientific" system. Its demonstrable characteristics are long-term, multigenerational records; professional genealogists; a direct social role in premarital verification; multidimensional identities based on gotra, pravara, mūla and maternal village; a separate register of dūṣaṇa; village-based cross-referencing; and evidence of continued updating into modern times. The comparative study of this particular combination is genuinely important.

A Methodological Resemblance to Navya-Nyāya

Some sources identify a cultural resemblance between the formulaic character of the pañjī and the analytical language of Navya-Nyāya. No direct historical causal relationship has been established. Nonetheless, in Mithila's intellectual environment, both traditions display an inclination towards fine classification, technical terms for relationships, exceptions, evidence and adjudication. The ideal that a pañjīkār's decision should rest on the actual register, prior attestation and the matching of relationships invites comparison with philosophical reflection on pramāṇa, or valid evidence.

23. The Pañjī and Its Modern Crisis: From Living Institution to Endangered Archive

In the twenty-first century, the pañjī faces two contrary developments. Digital images, search technologies, Devanagari transliteration and public access have become more feasible than ever before. Yet the traditional profession of the pañjīkār, the ability to read Mithilākṣara, the physical condition of the volumes and the practical use of genealogical verification in marriage are weakening. Technological preservation is advancing even as the social uses of the institution are changing.

The Declining Use of Pañjī Verification in Marriage

One modern report estimates that approximately one-fifth of marriages take place without consulting the pañjī. No independent regional survey substantiates this percentage; it must therefore be treated solely as a source estimate. Nevertheless, the broader trend is credible: education, urbanisation, inter-caste and interreligious marriages, love marriages, migration and matrimonial websites have diminished the pañjīkār's formerly indispensable role.

The Economic Insecurity of Pañjīkārs

If a family uses a pañjīkār's services only a few times a year, it becomes difficult to sustain the expertise as a full-time profession. Younger generations seek other occupations. The ability to read the registers may then vanish with elderly pañjīkārs as a form of embodied personal capital. Preservation means more than scanning: it also requires recording specialists as they read aloud, pronounce names, explain abbreviations, identify villages and recount the oral histories of disputed branches.

Physical Deterioration

Humidity, termites, insects, acidic paper, excessive exposure to sunlight, water, oil, dust and repeated handling damage the volumes. Older local methods of preservation deserve respect; nevertheless, present-day collections require controlled archival temperature and humidity, acid-free enclosures, pest management, high-resolution imaging and disaster backups. The original volumes must remain protected even after digitisation. A digital copy is not a substitute for the original but a surrogate for consultation.

Privacy and Ethics

Modern pañjīs contain information about living persons, marriages, inter-caste relationships, so-called "transgressions," occupations and possibly personal disputes. Releasing all such data without restriction on the open internet would raise ethical concerns. Public historical documents and sensitive family details concerning living individuals require different access policies. Caste-based derogatory labels in the Dūṣaṇa Pañjī may be retained for critical analysis of the original source, but it would be inappropriate to reuse them to stigmatise living people.

24. Digital Reconstruction: Making the Pañjī Searchable Without Losing Its Meaning

Photographs of pages alone are insufficient for digitising the pañjī. A satisfactory digital edition requires five layers: the original image, diplomatic transliteration, normalised text, relational data and editorial annotation. The layers should be linked to one another, but the original text must never be overwritten.

24.1 The Original Image

Every page should be preserved as a high-resolution colour image, with a scale and colour reference, in the original volume-and-page sequence. Filenames should be based on permanent identification numbers. If a page is scanned again, the earlier image should not be deleted; its version history should be retained.

24.2 Transliteration

Transliteration from Mithilākṣara into Devanagari should remain faithful to the letters of the original. Uncertain characters, erased passages, marginalia, abbreviations, corrections and rewritten text should be recorded with distinct marks. Conjectural readings must not be presented as certain.

24.3 Normalisation

Standard forms may be added to make village names, personal names, titles and dates searchable, but the original spellings must be retained alongside them. For example, the standard modern identification of "Maṅgraunī/Maṅgaurī" should occupy one field and the original reading another. The same applies to "Khauāl/Khauār," "Sodarpur/Sodarpurā" and similar variants.

24.4 Relational Data

Every person should have a persistent identifier. Father; mother, if known; sons and daughters; spouse or spouses; maternal kin; gotra; pravara; mūla; original village; village of residence; occupation; titles; source page; branch code; and date of marriage should all occupy separate fields. The relationship type expressed by "dau/ddau" must remain linked to the original wording. Where its meaning is disputed, "uncertain" should be an admissible value.

24.5 Levels of Evidence

Every conclusion may be assigned an evidentiary category: directly attested in the original manuscript; present in a later copy; found in a printed edition; explained orally by a pañjīkār; conjectured in a modern report; or independently confirmed by an external historical source. Without this distinction, a digital database would create the misleading impression that all recorded statements possess equal factual standing.

Maps of Relationships and Places

A digital pañjī should be a network, not merely a family tree. One person may be connected through multiple marriages, maternal relationships, bynames, migrations and branch references. A network visualisation should therefore accompany the genealogical tree. Linking historical village names to modern coordinates could make it possible to map marriages and migrations across time. Where a geographic identification is conjectural, its uncertainty must be stated clearly.

The Limits of Machine Reading

Automated character recognition may still produce errors when applied to Mithilākṣara manuscripts. Abbreviations, old handwriting, stains, broken characters, conjunct letters and village names are especially vulnerable to misreading. The machine should be an assistant, not the final editor. Every significant relationship should be published only after human verification.

Digital principle: the original image is the basis for verification; transliteration is a bridge to the reader; normalisation is an aid to searching; relational data supply the structure for analysis; and annotation is an honest record of uncertainty.

25. Critical Limits of the Pañjī as Historical Evidence

The pañjī is extraordinarily valuable, but value is not the same as infallibility. Enthusiastic claims in the sources must be distinguished from the evidentiary standing of the archive itself.

450–2009 CE: Caution Concerning the Word "Continuous"

The project title describes genealogical memory extending from 450 to 2009 CE. Some reports seek to trace lineages back to the fifth through ninth centuries through Āryabhaṭa, ancient scholars or early royal dynasties. Yet surviving copies, written volumes and modern editions may belong to considerably later periods. "450–2009" should be understood as the chronological scope claimed by the project; it would not yet be justified to regard it as proof of uninterrupted, contemporary documentation for every year or every generation.

1326 CE and the Chronology of Harisiṃhadeva

Several sources give Śaka 1248, equivalent to 1326 CE, as the date of institutionalisation. Other historical chronologies place the end of Harisiṃhadeva's rule at approximately 1324 CE. The discrepancy may concern the reading of the Śaka date, its conversion to the Common Era, the date of a royal order, a later tradition or the identification of a particular person. The consolidated study marks this inconsistency as it stands, without declaring one version "correct" in the absence of an original dated document.

The Number of Gotras

The complete traditional list gives twenty gotras, whereas a count for one particular volume of the ancient pañjī identifies seventeen gotras in active use. This may be a difference in sample coverage. Some sources also give different counts of mūlas within individual gotras, including Bharadvāja, Garga and Parāśara. It would be appropriate to establish definitive numbers only after preparing a comprehensive index of the original digital text.

167 Mūlas, of Which 34 or 35 Are Principal

The figures of 167 mūlas in all and thirty-four principal mūlas—or thirty-five when the Khānāma branch of Phanandaha is included—recur in the sources. But the historical criteria, periods, regions and politics of classification that determined what counted as "principal" require critical investigation. Social prestige must not be represented as natural or biological superiority.

Five/Seven versus Five/Six

The distinction between the dharmaśāstric rules of sapiṇḍa kinship and the practical modifications applied by pañjīkārs has been discussed above. One report gives different limits for Śrotriya and Pañjībaddha groups; another gives identical dharmaśāstric limits for everyone. Encoding a single, eternal rule in a digital rule engine would erase historical variation. Different versions of a rule, their periods and the groups to which they applied need distinct metadata.

Claims Concerning Genomes and Chromosomes

Some reports present precise figures resembling modern genetic claims: percentages of "shared DNA," Y-chromosomal exogamy, or the purported disappearance of harmful alleles by the fifth or seventh generation. Without scientific testing in contemporary population genetics, such claims cannot be accepted. The pañjī's marriage-distance rules certainly constitute a social means of avoiding close kinship; to equate them point for point with particular molecular-genetic thresholds would be an exaggeration.

The Coincidence of Famous Names

Names such as "Vidyāpati," "Gaṅgeśa," "Gaṅgānātha," "Jyotirīśvara" and "Āryabhaṭa" resemble those of celebrated historical figures. The repetition of names within genealogies is common. Identification requires agreement among the father's name, mūla, village, generation, period and title, together with external corroboration. A name match alone is not evidence.

The Bias of Sources Organised by Social Category

The pañjī was principally an institution of particular caste and lineage groups; it cannot by itself supply a demographic history of all Mithila. The Dūṣaṇa Pañjī preserves the names of some marginalised groups, but the perspective of the main genealogies is predominantly that of upper-caste men. A comprehensive social history of Mithila must also draw on farmers, Dalits, Adivasis, Muslims, women, artisans, merchants and other castes and communities, together with state records, folk literature, inscriptions, land documents and oral histories.

26. The Pañjī as a Literary Form: Brief Sentences, a Vast World

At first, it may seem strange to call the pañjī literature. There is no plot, no developed characterisation and no descriptive scene. Yet when thousands of compressed statements are read together, they create an immense collective narrative of time, marriage, migration, royal power, knowledge, prestige, decline, reintegration, nicknames, occupations and memory.

The Poetics of the Formula

"So-and-so's son," "dau from such-and-such a family," "aparā," "pra.," "grāmārambha": the language is remarkably spare. Its principle of "few syllables, many meanings" obliges the reader to fill the gaps. One woman has no recorded name, only the name of her village; a king receives an exceptionally long title; a scholar's name is followed by "Ayācī"; a branch is marked "extinct." The unequal distribution of detail discloses the society's hierarchy of values.

The Stories in Bynames

"Sarvajña Garīb," "Āṅkhī," "Naharā," "Vāgīśa" and "Ayācī": such names are miniature narratives in themselves. When formal genealogy makes room for names used in ordinary life, the austerity of the archive acquires a human dimension. A household name, scholarly honorific, royal distinction or occupational title may constitute an entire line of a person's social "character."

The Editing of Time

A copyist's date of 1856, a marriage in 2003, an edition dated 2008 and ancient royal dynasties coexist in the pañjī. From a literary standpoint, it is a multitemporal text: new lives continued to be inscribed on old pages. To erase this coexistence of times in a modern edition and manufacture a "clean chronology" would distort the nature of the source.

"Śabdaśāstram" and Fiction Drawn from the Pañjī

The Maithili story "Śabdaśāstram," based on the genealogical controversy surrounding Gaṅgeśa, demonstrates how archives can inspire modern imaginative literature. Archival fact and fiction are distinct genres.

Literature may use imagination to explore historical gaps, but research writing must preserve a clear boundary between invention and evidence.

27. Consolidated Conclusion: The Pañjī as a Living Culture of Social Data

The importance of Mithila's pañjī system lies not simply in its antiquity but, more fundamentally, in its structure. Gotra, pravara, mūla, ancestral village, bījī puruṣa, uṭeṛha, maternal village, dau/ddau, branches, dūṣaṇa, marriage colophons, occupational titles and village codes together form a multilayered social memory.

This memory regulated marriage and constituted social ranks. It preserved relationships between royal authority and scholarly families, registered migrations and changes in names and language, saved some marginal relationships from oblivion—even when it marked them as "dūṣaṇa"—and traced the transformation of families into the modern worlds of universities and bureaucracy.

Critical examination of the pañjī is equally essential. Caste hierarchies, the absence of women's personal names, the stigmatising language of "dūṣaṇa," possible interventions of wealth and status, exaggerated identifications with famous names, the scientific limitations of genomic metaphors, conflicting dates and incomplete branches are all elements of its study, not obstacles to it. Critical reading does not diminish the pañjī; it makes it more reliable as a historical source.

In the digital age, the most useful prospect is a resource that brings together images of the original Mithilākṣara manuscripts, Devanagari transliterations, normalised village and personal names, a relational database, the oral knowledge of pañjīkārs, privacy policies and critical annotations. Such a project would help people trace ancestry, but it could also establish a long-term foundation for the social history, linguistics, onomastics, migration studies, political history, intellectual traditions, women's studies and digital humanities of Mithila.

Final principle: the pañjī should be regarded neither as an infallible science nor merely as a caste-bound relic. It is a historical social technology in which memory, rules, power, family, geography and knowledge have been inscribed alongside one another for centuries.

Bibliography

Primary Texts and Archives

Dūṣaṇa Pañjī. Collection of original manuscripts in Mithilākṣara, including palm-leaf, bark and paper copies and a collection of digitised images. Public digital release, 2009.

Devānanda Pañjī. Register of Maithil Brahmin genealogies; source reports cite, among others, entries 30/5, 39/2 and 339/3.

Gajendra Thakur, ed. Pañjī-Prabandha, Volumes I–II, and the related volumes of Prācīna Pañjī and Nagarām. Digital and printed editions in the publishing tradition of Videha Prakashan/Shruti Prakashan.

Gajendra Thakur, Nagendra Kumar Jha and Vidyanand Jha. Genome Mapping (450–2009 CE): The Pañjī-Prabandha of Mithila. Edited volumes; the source collection mentions a 2012 edition.

Mūlagrāma Pañjī, Volumes I–VII; Prācīna Pañjī; and the Mohanānanda Jhā Branch Pañjī. Principal and collateral-branch records of the pañjī tradition.

Kumārila Bhaṭṭa. Tantravārttika. An early source for references concerning collective written records (samūha-lekhya).

Manusmṛti. Dharmaśāstric prescriptions concerning sapiṇḍa kinship, marriage and descent.

Yājñavalkyasmṛti. A dharmaśāstric foundation for rules relating to sapiṇḍa kinship and marriage.

Vālmīki Rāmāyaṇa. Cited for the proclamation of family descent and lineage at the time of marriage.

Ṛgveda Saṃhitā. Cited in connection with progeny, descent and immortality.

Bṛhadbrahmapurāṇa. Cited concerning continuity of lineage through descendants.

Jyotirīśvara Ṭhākur. Varṇaratnākara. A major text for the cultural history of Mithila in the Karṇāṭa period.

History, Philosophy, Genealogy and Social Studies

Dinesh Chandra Bhattacharya. A History of Navya-Nyāya in Mithila. 1958. A study of Gaṅgeśa Upādhyāya and the Navya-Nyāya tradition.

Anshuman Pandey. The Reorganisation of Brahmin Identity in Medieval Mithila: The Origins of Caste Identity among Maithil Brahmins of North Bihar. Doctoral dissertation, University of Michigan, 2014.

Stephen Phillips. The Jewel of Reflection on the Truth about Epistemology in the Tattvacintāmaṇi: A Fully Annotated Translation. Bloomsbury Academic, 2020.

V. P. Bhatta. English translations of the sections on testimony, perception, inference, inference of God and comparison in the Tattvacintāmaṇi. Four volumes, Eastern Book Linkers, Delhi, 2005–2025.

G. P. Murdock. Social Structure. 1949. A comparative study of kinship.

W. H. R. Rivers. Kinship and Social Organisation. 1914.

Louis Henry. Ancient Genevan Families. 1956. A study of historical demography and family reconstitution.

E. A. Wrigley, ed. An Introduction to English Historical Demography. 1966.

Françoise Zonabend. An Anthropological Perspective on Family and Kinship. 1986.

Louis Dumont. Homo Hierarchicus: The Caste System and Its Implications. University of Chicago Press, 1970.

Erving Goffman. Stigma: Notes on the Management of Spoiled Identity. 1963.

Maurice Halbwachs. On Collective Memory. University of Chicago Press, 1992.

Paul Connerton. How Societies Remember. Cambridge University Press, 1989.

Marcel Mauss. The Gift: An Essay. 1925.

Robert K. Merton. The Sociology of Science. University of Chicago Press, 1973.

Pierre Nora, ed. Les Lieux de mémoire (Sites of Memory). Three volumes, Gallimard, 1984–1992.

Claude Lévi-Strauss. The Elementary Structures of Kinship. A comparative theory of marriage alliance and kinship.

Gajendra Thakur. “Śabdaśāstram.” A Maithili short story; an English translation titled “The Science of Words” was published in a literary journal in 2014.

Source Audit and Consolidation Report

Audit Method

All twenty Word files in the ZIP archive were extracted separately and their texts examined, including paragraphs and table cells. The initial source collection contained approximately 125,814 words (with some variation according to the method of word segmentation). The same theories, lists of gotras, marriage rules, types of pañjī, historical narratives and digital projects recurred across the separate reports. In consolidation, equivalent repetitions were retained only once, but every file's distinctive facts, examples, controversies, places, persons, volumes, blocks and points of criticism were integrated under the appropriate themes.

The original files contained a total of 548 superscript runs, primarily reference numbers in the question-and-answer material and in Reports 01–03. The consolidated essay was prepared as a new document; consequently, the superscripts were removed and book references placed in standard form in the bibliography. Unrelated statements about the work process, concluding formulae and editorial instructions unconnected with the article's subject, found in the original reports, were not retained in the final article.

Coverage List for the Twenty Source Files

No.	Source File	Approx. Source Words	Principal Locations in Consolidated Essay	Coverage Note
1	0 — Initial Discussion of the Pañjī	3,188	§§2–10, 23–25	Original history of the pañjī, marriage rules, social categories and digital questions; distinctive facts retained and repetitions removed.
2	00 — Dūṣaṇa Pañjī	6,074	§§9–11	Ninety-seven dūṣaṇa tables, the Gaṅgeśa episode, women and the margins, readmission; process-related statements removed.
3	01 — Study of the Genealogical Theory of the Dūṣaṇa Pañjī	4,167	§§3–10, 21–25	Seven pañjīs, thirty-two ancestors, gotra and pravara, comparative theory, the dūṣaṇa counter-archive and epistemology.
4	02 — Research Report on the Dūṣaṇa Pañjī	4,527	§§9–11, 21–22; Bibliography	Anthropology, caste mobility, Gaṅgeśa's lineage, memory and stigma, and primary and secondary references.
5	1.0 — Study of Pañjī Genealogical Theory	4,681	§§2–8, 21–25	Theory of descent, mūla and bījī puruṣa, uṭeṛha, professional pañjīkārs, social stratification and modern crises.
6	1.1.1 — Research Report on Prācīna Pañjī, Volume I	4,008	§12	Pages 1–65: Halāyudha, scholarly sequences, 122 villages, maternal-line cycles and the 1856 colophon.

No.	Source File	Approx. Source Words	Principal Locations in Consolidated Essay	Coverage Note
7	1.1.2 — Research Report on Pañjī Volume I, Pages 66–347	4,977	§13	Karmahā, Rataulī–Dariharā, Avalamba–Sarasvatī, Mādhava Siṃha, Nepal and marriages in 2003–04.
8	1.1.3 — Research Report on Pañjī Volume II, Pages 348–690	4,601	§14	The Sodarpur centre, royal lineages, K.C.I.E., a marriage in Sweden, universities, poets and modernity.
9	1.2.1 — Classical Report on Genome and Pañjī-Prabandha	4,724	§§15, 21–25	Supplementary notes, social networks, patrilines and maternal ties, genomic metaphors and modern transformation.
10	1.2.2 — Report on the Genomic Discussion of Mithila's Pañjī	5,820	§§15, 19, 23–25	Loām–Sugaunā, Bhaur–Rājgrām, educated lineages, a date in 2008 and social critique; unrelated process statements removed.
11	1.3.1 — Analysis of the Nagarām Pañjī	5,831	§16	Blocks 1–225: household names, technicians, judges, IAS officers, members of parliament, occupations, migration and onomastics.
12	1.3.2 — Analytical Report on the Pañjikā-Nagarāmī	5,956	§17	Blocks 226–352: Samaulī, Balirājpur, Vāgīśa, lawyers, authors, daughters in IPS/IAS and jury service.
13	1.3.3 — Analysis of Pañjī-Prabandha	4,973	§18	Blocks 359–466: scholarly groups, dynasties, Oin/Simraungarh, names, occupations, geography and cross-references.
14	2.0 — Study of Pañjī Genealogical Theory	5,687	§§4–8, 20–25	Data layers, documentary evidence, demography, social law, computational genealogy and limitations.
15	2.1 — Research Report on Pañjī-Prabandha	4,242	§§21–25	Social memory, alliance theory, stratification, cross-references, global comparisons and the stakes of digitisation.
16	Question-and-Answer Collection	24,125	Throughout §§2–25	Distinctive rules from extensive questions and answers, twenty gotras, sixteen chhaṭṭhīs, social disputes, reform and modern interpretations; repetitions consolidated.
17	Report 01	4,089	§§1–8, 25	Mithila's geography, Pāla and Karṇāṭa backgrounds, the Harinātha/Lakhimā narrative, gotra–mūla tables and social categories.
18	Report 02	9,285	§§2–25	Extensive repetition of earlier reports, along with suppression/dūṣaṇa, theory and tables; unique details included and repetitions removed.
19	Report 03	3,784	§§19, 23–25	Purnia and eastern Mithila, Jahānpur in 1708, local scholars and memories of independence, the pañjīkār crisis

No.	Source File	Approx. Source Words	Principal Locations in Consolidated Essay	Coverage Note and preservation.
20	Report 2	11,075	§§3–8, 20–25	Pañjī theory in the form of a teaching guide: twenty gotras, 167 mūlas, marriage rules and initial sample tables; repetitions consolidated.

Thematic Cross-Check

Origins of the pañjī, collective written records (samūha-lekhya), institutionalisation and the Harinātha–Lakhimā narrative: incorporated.

Guṇākara Jhā, Śaṅkaradatta, Vijayadatta and the institution of the pañjīkār: incorporated.

The seven types of pañjī: incorporated.

Twenty gotras, pravaras, 167 mūlas, 34 or 35 principal mūlas and bījī puruṣas: incorporated.

Thirty-two ancestors, sixteen chhaṭṭhīs, the five/seven and five/six controversies, and the Kāṭhamāmā and related rules: incorporated.

Śrotriya/Yogya/Pañjībaddha/Vaṃśadhara/Jayavāra, branch registers, social demotion or advancement, bikauā and reform committees: incorporated.

Mithilākṣara, manuscript conservation, copying and digital editions: incorporated.

Ninety-seven tables in the Dūṣaṇa Pañjī; references to a leatherworker woman, Yavana, devadāsī, widow, the guru's wife, a woman described as fallen by the roadside, unknown lineage and readmission: incorporated.

The controversy concerning Gaṅgeśa Upādhyāya and allegations of the suppression of scholarship: incorporated as source claims.

Women's structural presence and absence of personal names, particular women's names, and daughters in modern professions: incorporated.

Prācīna Pañjī, Volume I, pages 1–65: principal villages, Halāyudha, scholars, offices, maternal-line cycles and colophons: incorporated.

Pages 66–347: Karmahā, Rataulī–Dariharā, Avalamba–Sarasvatī, Mādhava Siṃha, mansabdārs, Nepal and marriages in 2003–04: incorporated.

Pages 348–690: Sodarpur, royal lineages, colonial honours, a marriage in Sweden or an inter-caste marriage, universities, poets and occupations: incorporated.

Genome and supplementary-note volumes: Loām–Sugaunā, Bhaur–Rājgrām, Khaṇḍbalā, Nyāya scholars and a date in 2008: incorporated.

Nagarām 1–225: Sandahpur, Khāṅguṛ, Kanhaulī, Raiyām, Rohaṛ, occupations, names and migration: incorporated.

Nagarāmī 226–352: Samaulī, Balirājpur, modern academic degrees, lawyers, writers, daughters serving in the IPS or IAS, and women's achievements: incorporated.

Nagarām 359–466: Vicāṛhī, Parahaṭ, Maṅgaurī, Pilakhavāṛ, Baiganī, the Oin royal dynasty, Nahas, Chānpurā and outlying villages: incorporated.

Purnia and eastern Mithila, local temples, scholars and memories of the freedom struggle: incorporated.

Formulaic pañjī language, dual names, occupational honorifics, onomastics and place names: incorporated.

Social memory, power, comparative genealogy and Navya-Nyāya epistemology: incorporated.

Modern crisis, physical preservation, economic insecurity, privacy and the digital data model: incorporated.

Conflicts among sources and dates, numbers of gotras and mūlas, genomic claims, identification of famous figures and source biases: explicitly incorporated into the critical examination.

9. "Kusmā-Salhes": Folk Epic, Resistance and the Dramaturgy of Love

Abstract

This study of the title play "Kusmā-Salhes" centres on Salhes-Nāch, the folk epic, the cultural memory of marginalised communities, the heroine Kusmā's self-determination, political resistance, the plurality of rasas, and the wider human significance of love. Its comparative criticism considers the play's folk sources, epic scale, subaltern consciousness and theatrical imagery in relation to one another.

Keywords: Kusmā-Salhes; Salhes-Nāch; folk epic; resistance; subaltern; love; folk memory

1. Introduction, Narrative Structure and Historical-Cultural Context

Kunal's third and most extensive play, "Kusmā-Salhes," occupies the central place in the collection. At approximately seventy pages, it is the collection's focal point artistically, ideologically and culturally. It is based on the epic of "Rājā Salhes," the folk-deity and hero of Mithila's Dusadh community, and on the tradition of folk theatre derived from that epic, "Salhes-Nāch."

The narrative encompasses a vast geography: Mahisauthā, Morang, Bāghgaṛh, Revā-Dāh, Bhot/Tibet, Samadāgaṛh, Pakaṛiyā, Gaṛh-Tareganā and Rangīlāgaṛh. These place names create a geopolitical world extending across India, Nepal and Tibet. The dramatis personae are equally epic in scale: the hero Salhes, the heroine Kusmā (a woman of the Mālin community), Hīrāman (the parrot-narrator), Vipṭā (the clown), Ṭhankā (a tiger), Bankā (a bear), Kunṭā (a forest-dweller), the goddess Durgā, and numerous kings, armies and enemies.

The play has five principal dramatic movements: (1) the preliminary performance, comprising a syncretic invocation (sumiran) and a metatheatrical introduction by Vipṭā and Hīrāman; (2) the introduction of Kusmā and her discipline of inner purification; (3) Salhes's valour, the first meeting and Durgā's blessing; (4) the invasion from Bhot, conspiracy and imprisonment; and (5) the proclamation of an independent consciousness, victory through popular solidarity, and the concluding declaration of the principle of love.

2. Indian Theories of Drama

2.1 Salhes-Nāch: The Independent Aesthetics of Folk Theatre

Bharata Muni's Nāṭyaśāstra formulates a theory of drama from within the Sanskrit tradition. Mithila's "Salhes-Nāch," however, is an autonomous folk-theatrical tradition with its own performance grammar. Its constituent elements include the collective singing of the samājī (serving as a chorus); the sumiran, a folk-theatrical auspicious invocation that calls upon Hindu, Muslim and tribal deities together; Vipṭā's function as clown; Hīrāman the parrot's role as narrator; and acclamations before Salhes enters. These are the folk theatre's own dramatic conventions and ritual-performance elements.

Kunal adopts this entire folk grammar with authenticity: purification, sequence, song and forms of address all remain consonant with the folk tradition. In this sense, the play is not an elite theatre's imitation of folk drama but a literary re-presentation of folk theatre. It is essential to recognise the distinction.

2.2 A Festival of Rasa: A Multicoloured Affective Structure

According to the Sanskrit poetics tradition, an accomplished dramatic work should possess one dominant rasa, in whose service the other rasas function as auxiliaries. The complexity of "Kusmā-Salhes" lies in its having not a single dominant rasa but a veritable festival of rasas.

Śṛṅgāra (the love of Kusmā and Salhes, a folk counterpart of Rādhā and Kṛṣṇa: "He is Kisan Gosāin, and you are Rādhārānī"); vīra (Salhes's martial prowess and compassion for a defeated enemy: "It is improper to pursue an army that has been defeated and is fleeing"); adbhuta (the extraordinary presence of Ṭhankā, Bankā and Hīrāman, and the manifestation of Durgā); karuṇa (an impossible love—Salhes is married, Kusmā is a Mālin woman, and caste boundaries obstruct their union); bhakti (worship of Durgā and the reconciliation of all religions in the sumiran); and bībhatsa/bhayānaka (Sūchong's conspiracy and the cruelties of imprisonment).

Bharata admits a synthesis of rasas in which aṅgī-rasa (the dominant rasa) and aṅga-rasa (the subsidiary rasa) produce a complex aesthetic experience. In this play, śṛṅgāra and vīra become, in turn, the dominant rasa, while Durgā's declaration brings the two into complementary relation: "Having joined with Kusmā, now move among the hearts of the people; devote your life solely to their happiness." Love (śṛṅgāra) itself thus becomes the source of inspiration for heroic duty.

2.3 Subaltern Aesthetics: A Challenge to the Canon

The hero of Sanskrit dramatic theory generally comes from a royal-sage or divine lineage. The Dusadh hero finds no place in that tradition. Kunal's most daring dramatic decision is to place the epic of a subaltern community—one subordinated within the social hierarchy—at the centre of an "epic drama."

Within Maithili poetic tradition, on one side stands the Rādhā-Kṛṣṇa love-poetry tradition of the pre-Jyotirīśvara lyricist Vidyāpati; on the other is the courtly and literary tradition of Vidyāpati Ṭhakkur, the Sanskrit-Avahaṭṭa writer of the Śivasiṃha era. It would not be appropriate to treat these two as a single person or as a single line of sources. Kunal chooses a different path: Kusmā as "Radhiyā," a folk form of Rādhā, and Salhes as "Kisan Gosāin," a folk form of Kṛṣṇa. This symbolic substitution is a dramatic declaration that the love story of the Dusadh folk tradition is equivalent to the Maithili literary mainstream—and indeed lies at its roots.

2.4 Kusmā's Inner Purification: An Indigenous Yogic Discipline

The dialogue between Hīrāman and Kusmā in the second scene contains a remarkable sequence of inner purification: a folk transformation of yogic discipline. "Sweep out your home … sweep away envy, pride, hatred, greed and attachment … I plastered it with the water of compassion … I made it fragrant with the sandalwood of affection." This is not a physical exercise but an emotional journey towards inward purification. In the Indian philosophical tradition, particularly in the traditions of bhakti, "purification of the heart" (citta-viśuddhi) is understood as a precondition for the attainment of love.

Kunal presents this philosophy of devotion against a humorous background. Hīrāman first demands a reward—gold, a diamond necklace, a silver bowl—and only then offers guidance. The playfulness of folk expression makes the philosophy of devotion not "simplistic" but "alive."

3. Western Theories of Drama

3.1 Gramsci: Subaltern History and the Organic Intellectual

In his Prison Notebooks, the Italian Marxist thinker Antonio Gramsci (1891–1937) presented the history of subaltern—subordinated and deprived—groups as an alternative to dominant historiography. By an "organic intellectual," Gramsci meant a person who brings the cultural expression of their own community into a higher literary or intellectual sphere.

From this perspective, Kunal is an organic intellectual of Maithili theatre. He takes the Dusadh epic of Salhes, formerly kept alive within the restricted communal performance tradition of Salhes-Nāch, and brings it onto the modern stage of Vidyāpati Bhavan. This cultural translation is a political act in Gramsci's sense: a subaltern voice enters a mainstream cultural space.

From a Gramscian perspective, Salhes's prison speech is the most significant moment: "My life may be in your grasp, Emperor, but my thoughts and feelings cannot be bound." This declaration is a folk-theatrical version of the strategy of resistance to "cultural hegemony" described by Gramsci.

3.2 Magical Realism: The Theatrical Presence of a Folk Worldview

The writer Gabriel García Márquez (1927–2014), described here as British–Colombian, and the Indian–British writer Salman Rushdie (born 1947) employed "magical realism" in their fiction: the wondrous or supernatural becomes a natural component of reality, without occasioning any special surprise or explanation.

In this play, Ṭhankā the tiger and Bankā the bear are Salhes's conversational companions; Hīrāman the parrot carries messages between heaven and the mortal world; and Durgā appears in person to bless the folk hero. These are natural elements of the Dusadh folk worldview, not "miracles." In the terms of magical-realist theory, it would be more exact to describe these elements not as "magical" but as "folk-cosmological real."

One important principle associated here with Rushdie is that magical realism becomes effective when the writer accepts that "magic" as real, rather than superimposing it as a decorative device from outside. Kunal's play possesses this authenticity: Ṭhankā, Bankā, Hīrāman and Durgā are indispensable to the story's structure, not ornaments.

3.3 Brecht: Lehrstück (the Teaching Play) and Popular Politics

In his theory of the Lehrstück, or teaching play, Brecht maintained that theatre can convey a clear political and ethical message. Through the samājī and through Hīrāman and Viṭṭā, this play offers numerous "moments of instruction": Salhes's "mantra for a life free from fear," and Durgā's command to "move among the hearts of the people and dedicate one's life to their welfare."

Kunal nevertheless differs from Brecht on an important point: Brecht sought distance from emotional identification, whereas Kunal regards love and public service as two sides of the same coin. The intellectual and political instruction of the Lehrstück is immersed here in the feeling of śṛṅgāra and the rasa of devotion. This is a kind of "emotional epic theatre" that extends beyond the Brechtian category.

3.4 Homi Bhabha: Cultural Identity and Resistance

In The Location of Culture, the Indian–British postcolonial thinker Homi Bhabha (born 1949) introduced concepts such as the "third space" and cultural hybridity, through which colonised groups appropriate colonial discourse and disrupt it from within.

Sūchong's conspiracy in this play—the plan to separate Salhes from Kusmā—is a colonial strategy. He knows that Kusmā's "affection and knowledge" are sources of Salhes's strength. Once Kusmā has been separated from him, Salhes will be weakened. This is the "erasure of cultural identity" discussed here in relation to Bhabha, a practice adopted by colonial rule. Salhes recognises the plan and declares that feelings and ideas cannot be imprisoned.

4. Chinese Theories of Drama

4.1 Yi: Righteous Conduct and Military Ethics

In the Chinese ethical and philosophical tradition, yi (righteousness or duty) is a central value. In the Confucian tradition it means fulfilling one's duty in the proper manner, even when doing so is difficult. Guan Yu (Guan Di), one of the best-known heroes of Chinese folk theatre and epic, was renowned for his conduct in accordance with yi; he showed respect even to defeated enemies.

Precisely such conduct in accordance with yi appears in Salhes: "It would be wrong to pursue an army that has been defeated and is fleeing." This is not merely diplomatic expediency, but a principle of ethical military conduct supported by both Indian kṣatriya-dharma and the Chinese tradition of yi. Like Guan Yu, Salhes also becomes a folk deity for his people—not on the battlefield, but in their hearts.

4.2 Hualian: Dramatic Character Types and Colour Symbolism

In classical Chinese theatre (jingju, or Beijing opera), the hualian, or "painted face," is a distinctive role type in which facial colours indicate a character's moral disposition: red signifies courage and loyalty (Guan Yu); blue or green, formidable strength; white, villainy or cunning; and black, power and justice.

This symbolic system can be mapped onto the cast of "Kusmā-Salhes": Salhes = red hualian (courage and loyalty); Sūchong = white hualian (deviousness and conspiracy); Chūhaṛmall = blue (military strength); Kusmā = "tān" (a female role, yet a powerful one, the "forest goddess"); Hīrāman and Vipṭā = "chou" (clowns); Durgā = "umen" (divine appearance, shénmíng). This classification reveals a universal dramatic logic in the arrangement of the play's characters.

4.3 Tianming: The Mandate of Heaven and the Hero's Duty

In the Chinese political and philosophical tradition, tianming, or the "Mandate of Heaven," is an important concept. A ruler who serves the welfare of the people possesses tianming; one who corrupts or harms them loses it.

Durgā's blessing in the play corresponds to tianming: the goddess commands Salhes "to dedicate his life solely to the happiness of the people." This heavenly command legitimises Salhes's power to rule. By contrast, Sūchong—expansionist, greedy and oppressive towards his subjects—lacks tianming. In Kunal's play, this ethical and political philosophy ultimately declares Salhes "victorious," not through armed force but through the moral power of the people.

4.4 Minjian: The Theatricalisation of Folk Heroes

Chinese theatre history has a long tradition of bringing folk heroes to the stage, represented by "Miao-zhi-ying-zhong-zhuan" (Temple Hero Legends), which has made folk deities the protagonists of drama. The relation of this play to Salhes-Nāch follows a similar trajectory: a folk deity first becomes a hero of folk theatre and subsequently of literary theatre.

In the Chinese tradition, this transition—from folk or temple performance to literary theatre—runs parallel to the journey from the popular legend of Guan Yu through Romance of the Three Kingdoms and then to dramatic adaptation. The comparable passage of the Salhes epic—Salhes-Nāch to "Kusmā-Salhes" (Kunal, 2006)—expresses a cultural life cycle.

5. Israeli Theories of Drama

5.1 Eli Rozik: Theatrical Iconicity and Animal Characters

Eli Rozik's theory of theatrical iconicity is subjected to an extraordinary test in this play: the iconic representation of animal characters. Ṭhankā (a tiger), Bankā (a bear) and Hīrāman (a parrot) are represented on stage by actors' bodies. According to Rozik's theory, these characters are "icons": what they depict is a fictional animal existence, rather than a representation of the actor's own body.

More importantly, Rozik maintained that theatre can cross the boundary between human and animal because the icon is free from the limits of literal reality. The presence of Ṭhankā, Bankā and Hīrāman constitutes an "animistic iconography" of the Dusadh folk worldview, in which humans, animals and spirits possess equal standing within the same dramatic universe. This is "transgressive iconicity": iconicity that crosses boundaries.

5.2 A Parallel with Mizrahi Theatre: Reviving a Culturally Marginalised Tradition

In Israeli theatre, the "Mizrahi" cultural tradition, associated with Jews of Middle Eastern and North African origin, was long marginalised by dominant "Ashkenazi" cultural norms associated with European Jews. The Mizrahi theatre movement (from the 1970s to the present) is a movement to bring this marginalised heritage—including Sephardi music, piyyutim and zemirot—into the mainstream.

In its Maithili setting, Kunal's "Kusmā-Salhes" may be regarded as a comparable movement. The Dusadh folk tradition of Salhes-Nāch has been marginal to Maithili's cultural hierarchy, in which Vidyāpati, Chandā Jhā and the elite poetic tradition have held sway. By taking this marginalised tradition to Vidyāpati Bhavan, an important institutional centre of Maithili culture, Kunal makes a cultural and political claim.

5.3 Hannah Arendt: Natality and Public Action

In The Human Condition, the German–American political philosopher Hannah Arendt (1906–1975) introduced the concept of "natality": every political action is a new beginning, a kind of "birth." Such an action becomes immortal in the public realm because it has witnesses.

Salhes's prison declaration—"Salhes may not remain, but a people filled with the mantra of a fearless life will remain"—is a "political action" in Arendt's sense. The declaration is made in Sūchong's prison, before Sūchong himself as witness; through that witnessing it becomes "immortal," a dramatic moment of "natality." Through this scene, Kunal transforms Salhes from a folk deity into a "political actor."

5.4 Shimon Levy: The Syncretic Sumiran and "Sacred Theatre"

In his theory of the "Theatre of the Sacred," Shimon Levy argued that, when communal religious values are re-presented on stage, theatre becomes a secular transformation of religious ritual.

The sumiran of the play's preliminary performance presents a particular test of Shimon Levy's theory. It is not merely a Hindu religious invocation: it also includes the Muslim pīr "Mīrā-Sultān," a deity of the western direction. "Parinām, namaste, ādāb, good evening, salām"—these greetings to the audience cross, in a single breath, the boundaries of religion, language, class and nation-state. From Levy's perspective, this is a theatre of the "radical sacred," rejecting divisive identities and imagining an inclusive community.

6. A Fourfold Synthesis

As the title play of the collection, "Kusmā-Salhes" is both its most fertile and its most challenging work for critical examination through the four theatrical traditions. Its many dimensions cannot be encompassed by any single critical perspective.

The Indian perspective: the autonomous folk-theatrical grammar of Salhes-Nāch; a festival of rasas (śṛṅgāra + vīra + bhakti + adbhuta); the dramatic manifestation of subaltern aesthetics; and Durgā's blessing as a declaration of the inseparability of love, knowledge and public service.

The Western perspective: Gramsci's organic intellectual; an authentic folk version of magical realism; Brechtian "emotional epic theatre"; and Bhabha's account of cultural identity and resistance.

The Chinese perspective: Guan Yu-like ethics of yi; hualian character classification; tianming as the heavenly mandate represented by Durgā; and the minjian tradition of dramatising folk heroes.

The Israeli perspective: Rozik's transgressive animistic iconicity; the cultural parallel with Mizrahi theatre; Arendt's natality (the prison declaration as a political birth); and Levy's radically sacred sumiran.

The shared conclusion of all four traditions is that the play performs an act of "cultural justice." It brings the Dusadh hero Salhes to the centre of the Maithili literary stage, makes folk theatre the basis of literary drama, and declares love and service to the people to be indivisible. These three accomplishments together establish the play, by the criteria of Indian, Western, Chinese and Israeli theatrical thought, as both "excellent" and "necessary."

The final refrain that completes the play—"Love is truth, love is fragrance, the feeling of love is eternal; as a flower is without nectar, so what is life without love?"—reaches back through all these interpretations. The words constitute a declaration of the spirit of the entire collection.

Supplementary Analysis of the Social and Folk Narrative

The play "Kusmā-Salhes" is based on the story of Rājā Salhes, one of the most cherished folk heroes in Mithila's Dalit consciousness, especially among the Dusadh and Paswan communities. Kunal connects the folk elements of traditional Salhes-Nāch with the ideological discourse of modern theatre.

In Mithila, Salhes is established not merely as a valiant warrior but as a defender of disadvantaged groups against feudal oppression. When feudal kings and upper-class elements abducted and raped Dalit brides, Salhes formed his forest army, drawing on forest-dwelling communities, and brought that practice to an end. In the play, Anang Kusmā (Daunā Mālin), a nun of the Mahāyāna branch of Buddhism, appears as Salhes's beloved and intellectual companion. Her portrayal offers a remarkable dramatic example of social harmony and love across caste boundaries.

Salhes and Kusmā together destroy the deceitful tantric Chakranāth, who, in the name of superstition, practised the "Nāgadāsī" custom, causing two virgin girls to be killed each year by making them suckle venomous snakes. The play is an epic narrative of Dalit identity, scientific consciousness and a folk hero's social resistance.

10. “Akhiyāsal”: Indian Poetics, Western Literary Theory and the Parallel-History Perspective

Abstract

“Akhiyāsal”: An Extended Critical Appreciation through Indian Poetics, Western Literary Theory and the Videha Parallel-History Perspective. Introduction: The Work, Its Author and the Point of Departure for Criticism. Dr Ramanand Jha ‘Raman’’s Akhiyāsal is a collection of critical essays reassessing the history of Maithili literature, the development of fiction, early novels, forgotten literary workers, national consciousness, lyric poetry, journalism, column-writing and the social concerns of modern fiction.

Keywords: Akhiyāsal · Indian · poetics · Western · theory · parallel · history

Abstract

“Akhiyāsal”: An Extended Critical Appreciation through Indian Poetics, Western Literary Theory and the Videha Parallel-History Perspective. Introduction: The Work, Its Author and the Point of Departure for Criticism. Dr Ramanand Jha ‘Raman’’s Akhiyāsal is a collection of critical essays reassessing the history of Maithili literature, the development of fiction, early novels, forgotten literary workers, national consciousness, lyric poetry, journalism, column-writing and the social concerns of modern fiction.
 The collection was published by the Central Institute of Indian Languages, Mysore, in 1995 and contains twenty-five independent critical essays. They originally appeared in periodicals such as Mithilā Mihir, Mithilāmod, Bhākhā, Maithilī Academy Patrikā, Basāt, Hālchāl and Maithilī Prakāś, and in the souvenir of the All India Maithili Sahitya Sammelan.

“Akhiyāsal”: An Extended Critical Appreciation through Indian Poetics, Western Literary Theory and the Videha Parallel-History Perspective

— Gajendra Thakur

Introduction: The Work, Its Author and the Point of Departure for Criticism

Dr Ramanand Jha ‘Raman’’s Akhiyāsal is a collection of critical essays reassessing the history of Maithili literature, the development of fiction, early novels, forgotten literary workers, national consciousness, lyric poetry, journalism, column-writing and the social concerns of modern fiction. The collection was published by the Central Institute of Indian Languages, Mysore, in 1995 and contains twenty-five independent critical essays. These essays first appeared in periodicals such as Mithilā Mihir, Mithilāmod, Bhākhā, Maithilī Academy Patrikā, Basāt, Hālchāl and Maithilī Prakāś, and in the souvenir of the All India Maithili Sahitya Sammelan. This is therefore not a work conceived and written as a single planned undertaking, but a gathering of nearly two decades of journalistic and critical labour, from 1972 to 1989. It cannot be adequately evaluated without recognising this composite character.

The book begins by attempting to establish Pandit Shrikrishna Thakur and Chandraprabhā within the traditions of early Maithili fiction and the short-story collection, and ends with the contemporary fiction writer Prabhas Kumar Chaudhary. Thus its twenty-five essays encompass roughly two centuries, from the earliest Maithili storyteller to a contemporary practitioner. This breadth makes Akhiyāsal not merely a work of criticism but a foundation stone for a kind of parallel literary history. It is also the source both of the work's greatest originality and of its most serious limitations.

The book does not simply eulogise the established great men of literature. Its fundamental questions are these: who has been made memorable in the history of Maithili literature and who forgotten? Which work has been called the 'first'? Which manuscript never reached readers? What roles have institutions, journals, editors, publishers, centres of migration and social power played in the formation of literary recognition? The book's central purpose is unmistakable: to bring to light the early and neglected writers of Maithili prose and verse whom mainstream literary history has forgotten or for whom source material has remained 'unavailable'.

Rather than tracing a single linear history, Akhiyāsal's twenty-five chapters open up several parallel currents:

the search for early Maithili stories and novels;

the restoration to recognition of forgotten writers;

the freedom struggle and the awakening of consciousness about the mother tongue; genre-based examination of fiction, song, humorous prose, columns and journalism;

the experiences of women, the poor, farmers, unemployed young people and oppressed groups;

the political ironies of the post-Independence period;

social transition, existential crisis and moral decline.

In this sense Akhiyāsal is not merely criticism; it is an important undertaking in the archival recovery of Maithili literature and the writing of a parallel history.

The present evaluation employs three critical paradigms together: (a) Indian poetics—rasa, dhvani, vakrokti, aucitya, rīti, alaṅkāra, sādhāraṇīkaraṇa and lokamaṅgala; (b) Western literary theory—historicism and New Historicism, Marxist sociological criticism, Formalism, feminist criticism, postcolonial criticism, existentialist and psychoanalytic perspectives, reader-response theory, the deconstructionist retrieval of marginal voices and the politics of the canon; and (c) the parallel-history paradigm of the Videha Parallel Literary Movement, together with the epistemology of Navya-Nyāya originating in Gaṅgeśa Upādhyāya. The third paradigm declares the restoration of endangered, marginalised and undocumented writers to be its aim, in opposition to mainstream canon formation; it uses the Navya-Nyāya concepts of hetvābhāsa, fallacious reasoning, and śabda-pramāṇa, verbal testimony, to expose ideological deception embedded in literature. From this third standpoint Akhiyāsal is a pioneering precursor, a proto-text: the work Ramanand Jha undertook through individual labour in the 1970s and 1980s receives an institutional, archival and democratic extension in the Videha movement.

This review is organised in two parts. The first examines the distinctive qualities, achievements and theoretical significance of each chapter; the second is devoted entirely to limitations, weaknesses and methodological difficulties.

Critical Paradigms

The Perspective of Indian Literary Theory

Rasa — The book's chapters examine karuṇa (pathos), vīra (heroism), hāsya (humour), śṛṅgāra (love), bhakti (devotion) and raudra (fury). Hunger and the disintegration of the family in Rāmeśvar evoke karuṇa rasa; Dvijvar's nationalist poetry arouses vīra and raudra; Harimohan Jha's humorous prose creates a field for laughter and satire; Harilata's devotional songs carry a current of bhakti and sweet devotional feeling; and the songs of R. C. and Mohan offer experiences of love, nature and emotional tenderness.

Dhvani — Behind the explicit narratives of many works lie implicit social meanings. Hunger is not merely a lack of food but an injustice embedded in economic structures. Marriage is not merely a domestic rite; it is an arena in which women's social position and caste standing are negotiated. Language is not merely a means of communication; it is a symbol of cultural freedom.

Vakrokti — Yatri's columns, Harimohan Jha's humorous prose, Shyamanand Jha's satire, the stories of Lalit and Dhirendra, and R. C.'s political poetry generate meaning through oblique expression, irony, satire and symbol.

Aucitya — Raman repeatedly asks whether there is propriety or congruence among a work's theme, characters, language, style, historical period and genre. Is it appropriate to call a story a novel, a humorous anecdote a short story, a translation an original work, or an influence a translation? These are all questions of aucitya.

Sādhāraṇīkaraṇa — The hunger, unemployment, marital suffering or cultural distress of one person acquires literary value when it becomes the experience of an entire community or age. In his examination of Dhirendra's stories, the critic explicitly shows how personal experience acquires a social context when it becomes an expression of the social mind.

Lokamaṅgala — Akhiyāsal's criticism does not separate literature from society. Service to the mother tongue, women's education, opposition to caste discrimination, the dignity of labour, the rights of the poor and national independence become important criteria of literary evaluation.

Foundations in Western Literary Theory

The formalist perspective — Plot, character construction, dialogue, atmosphere, narrative pace, symbol, repetition, lyricism and generic structure can be examined from a formalist standpoint.

The New Historicist perspective — Each work is read in relation to the powers and institutions of its time, language politics, the freedom movement, social reform, feudalism and economic change.

The Marxist perspective — Hunger, poverty, labour, feudal exploitation, policing and administration, capital, elections, unemployment and class divisions are fundamental questions in many chapters.

The feminist perspective — Nirdai Sāsu, Sumati and Chandragrahaṇ, Harilata's devotional songs, and the discussions of the stories of Kumar Ganganand Singh and Lalit raise questions concerning women's education, marriage, the body, desire, domestic labour, widowhood and social control.

The postcolonial perspective — The pressure of Hindi and English on Maithili, neglect of the mother tongue, the politics of spreading Devanagari, the rights of local languages and literatures, and linguistic plurality within nationalism are all subjects of postcolonial debate.

The existentialist and psychoanalytic perspectives — The discussions of stories by Lalit and Dhirendra analyse meaninglessness, loneliness, unemployment, the unbearable burden of responsibility, sexual desire, self-alienation and social incongruity.

The reader-response perspective — Chapters on Harimohan Jha's humorous prose and Yatri's column-writing attend to reading communities, the dialogic nature of periodicals, the popularity of humour and the shaping of readers' tastes.

The Videha Parallel-History Perspective and Navya-Nyāya Epistemology

The central principle of Videha's parallel history is that literary history is not solely the history of government recognition, awards, universities and celebrated authors. The following have an equal claim to a place in that history:

rare manuscripts;

books that have not circulated;

local journals and periodicals;

writers from rural communities;

workers in the service of their mother tongue;

forgotten editors;

poets writing under conditions of economic hardship;

the silence of female characters;

the suffering of farmers and labourers;

linguistic subordination;

cultural relations between Mithila and its diaspora.

The history of Maithili literature has always been a field of ideological conflict. On one side stands a 'mainstream tradition' centred on classical balance, institutional approval, Brahminical elitism and a polished presentation of the past. On the other stands the 'Videha parallel tradition', connected with the living pulse of the people, resistance by the oppressed and dispossessed, and realistic representation. According to the Navya-Nyāya theory of śabda-pramāṇa, truth is fractured wherever evidence is suppressed—as when the Dūṣaṇa Pañjī is concealed. Analysis of hetvābhāsa brings to light logical faults and ideological deception within literature. The principal achievement of Akhiyāsal is that it makes visible again numerous footprints buried beside the main road of Maithili literary history.

Part One: Achievements of Individual Chapters and Their Critical Appreciation

1. Maithili's First Storyteller, Pandit Shrikrishna Thakur, and Chandraprabhā

The collection's first essay is, in a sense, the germinal chapter of the entire work. It revises prevailing assumptions about the starting point of Maithili prose fiction. Ramanand Jha establishes the search for the 'first' as a critical undertaking: 'to investigate which servant of Maithili first set out upon the path of the development of fiction'. This declaration serves as the methodological manifesto for the whole collection.

Pandit Shrikrishna Thakur was born in 1750 into the Khaṇḍavalā lineage. He was the son of Pandit Maheshwar Thakur of Sarvasima and died in 1822. Among his principal works are Mithilā Tīrthaprakāś, Nārī Dharmaprakāś, Śūdra Vivāha Paddhati, Vaitaraṇīdānam, Śuddha Nirṇaya and Śivapūjā Pradīpikā. To establish him as Maithili's first storyteller and Chandraprabhā as its first work of fiction, the critic draws upon genealogies, dates, the teacher–disciple tradition and corrective evidence, including a clarification of Jayakant Mishra's mistaken designation of the work as Chandrabhāgā. This correction from Chandrabhāgā to Chandraprabhā reveals the archival care at the heart of the criticism.

The author establishes Chandraprabhā as an example of nineteenth-century Maithili prose and an early collection of stories. The manuscript was deteriorated, only parts of the work survived, and it was published in 1939, many years after its author's death. Its structure rests on a dialogue between teacher and disciple, and on the movement from one story into another. Through dialogues between teacher and female disciple, moral maxims are upheld; the writing provides an outstanding example of an older prose style. In this respect it is connected to the Pañcatantra, Vidyapati's Puruṣa-Parīkṣā and the Sanskrit tradition of narrative and subsidiary tale—a distinctly classical understanding of literary continuity. The stories are instructive, event-driven and directed towards moral conclusions.

Judged by the Indian principle of aucitya, the work's importance lies not in the complexity of its plots but in its historical role in early Maithili prose. From a Western standpoint, this is an inquiry into origins, central to historicist criticism. From the Videha parallel-history standpoint, the chapter is particularly important: the critic himself emphasises the 'unavailability' of Chandraprabhā and incorporates the labour of preserving a rare manuscript, editing it and publishing it into literary history. Restoring marginalised, undocumented and lost texts is the essential principle of parallel history, and Ramanand Jha gives it an early articulation here.

2. Pandit Jivach Mishra, Maithili's First Novelist, and Rāmeśvar

The author regards Rāmeśvar, published in 1916 by Mithila Printing Works, Madhubani, as Maithili's first original novel. Pandit Jivach Mishra was born in 1863. His father's untimely death disrupted his education, yet he undertook serious study of Sanskrit, Maithili, Hindi and Urdu. The discussion presents his life, literary inspiration and commitment to his mother tongue at length. His resistance to the expansionist dominance of Hindi and opposition to the hereditary leadership of the Maithil Mahasabha constitute a living record of the colonial-era struggle for linguistic identity.

At the novel's centre are hunger, the ostentation of śrāddha rites, indebtedness, police and administrative oppression, false accusations, imprisonment, family disintegration and the social origins of crime. Rameshwar borrows money to perform his father's śrāddha, is forced to sell his home and property, and ultimately becomes a bandit after suffering police persecution; his wife Parvati attempts suicide by jumping into the Kamala River. Rameshwar is not a criminal by birth: economic compulsion, feudal power and administrative deceit push him onto the path of crime. From a Marxist perspective, his criminality is in fact the outcome of class exploitation. Karuṇa rasa begins in the novel's opening scene: dogs fall upon food thrown away after the śrāddha, while hungry children look on from a distance. According to the critic, the dialogue is simple and natural, while the creation of atmosphere is effective.

From a Marxist–New Historicist perspective, this is one of the finest essays in the book. The critic interprets Rāmeśvar not merely as an aesthetic object but as a text of resistance standing against structures of power: the Darbhanga Raj, the Maithil Mahasabha and the Hindi Sahitya Parishad. Jivach Mishra's fearlessness and his ‘exposure of the intrigues of the literary establishment’ correspond remarkably with New Historicism's analysis of power and discourse. In the Videha parallel-history perspective, Rāmeśvar records not the history of a royal court but that of a starving rural family. This searing realism is a golden summit of Maithili prose.

3. Rasbihari Lal Das and the Novel Sumati

Sumati (1918) is an early attempt to establish the genre of the modern novel in Maithili. The author foregrounds Rasbihari Lal Das's sense of the scarcity of literature, his connection with Mithilā Darpaṇ and his resolve to provide a novel in his mother tongue. The novel's principal concern is how wasteful expenditure, dowry and the desire for ostentatious display ruin families, and how an educated woman, Sumati, uses her intelligence to save a household on the verge of collapse. The episode of a marriage arrangement involving Sahelola Babu and Manorath Labh, borrowing to entertain the wedding party and the eventual destruction of the family's entire property offer vivid examples of social realism. On arriving at her marital home, Sumati sells her jewellery to free the family from debt and thereby establishes a model for society.

The chapter also incorporates the judgments of earlier literary historians. Jayakant Mishra considers the plotting, characterisation and narrative technique immature, while accepting that the subject is appropriate for the Maithili novel. Radhakrishna Chaudhary calls it the first successful attempt to write a modern Maithili novel. A particular strength of this essay lies in its sensitivity to intertextuality. Jivach Mishra had considered the use of Hindi verse in Sumati ‘an indication of the inability of the Maithili language and its poet’; Ramanand Jha recovers this contemporary critical exchange. It is precisely this criticism of criticism that gives the essay theoretical depth. From the Indian principle of aucitya, the introduction of Hindi poetry into Maithili prose breaches linguistic propriety. Ramanand Jha acknowledges this flaw as ‘stylistic looseness’, but gives precedence to the period's impulse towards social awakening and judges the work important. The balance between admitting defects and defending historical and social importance signals the critic's maturity.

The chapter distinguishes historical importance from artistic achievement by using the criterion of aucitya. A work may be the ‘first’, but that fact alone cannot make it artistically complete. From the standpoint of Videha parallel history, Sumati documents a transition in genre: an uncertain but significant step by Maithili prose from the ethical tale towards the modern social novel.

4. Janardan Jha ‘Jansidan’ and Nirdai Sāsu

This chapter brings marriage arrangements, go-betweens, the bride's family, relations between mother-in-law and daughter-in-law, and the domestic oppression of women to the centre of literary discussion. Jansidan's (1872–1951) Nirdai Sāsu was serialised in Mithilā Mihir in 1914. Its plot draws on social circumstances, and its portrayal is so natural that events seem to unfold before the reader. The work offers a moving depiction of the silent woman Sharada, who endures persecution by her mother-in-law Anuprani and sister-in-law; it demonstrates the hostility to women's education and patriarchal cruelty of the society of that time. Astrologer Chintamani Jha's decision to educate Sharada, the unconventional giving of his daughter in marriage, and Anuprani's opposition express a conflict between older and newer values, which the critic terms ‘the outcome of an intense social consciousness’.

In examining Jansidan's Śaśikalā, Kaliyugī Sannyāsī and other works, the critic skilfully presents disagreements over genre: Harimohan Jha called Nirdai Sāsu a ‘farce’, while others called it a ‘novel’. One major achievement is that Ramanand Jha himself revises his initial doubts about the forcefulness of Jansidan's personality on the basis of an analysis of the available writing: in the light of his socially reformist consciousness, that personality emerges as forceful. This self-correcting critical method testifies to the intellectual integrity of the work.

From a feminist standpoint, the story reveals the complex forms of domestic power. Women are persecuted not only by men but also by other women who have internalised patriarchal conventions. The mother-in-law, herself a product of the system, becomes its representative in oppressing the daughter-in-law. The helplessness of the newly married woman is the source of karuṇa rasa. Read through the theory of dhvani, the festivities of marriage carry an underlying hard history of the bride's economic valuation, the family's prestige and patriarchal control. From a Marxist standpoint, the work can be read as a call to resistance against a system that ‘divides Mithila's society into compartments and exploits it’; it is an excellent literary expression of class consciousness and social contradiction.

5. Pandit Janardan Jha: A Forgotten Worker for Literature

In this short essay, among the book's most important from a theoretical standpoint, Ramanand Jha supplies the conceptual basis for his entire critical project: the principle of ‘two categories of literary figures’. Writers of the first order, such as Vidyapati, become so dominant that they overshadow writers of the second order, whom people eventually forget. An image of the enormous waters of the Ganga and Kosi rivers, alongside the local importance of smaller streams linking village to village, makes the argument unforgettable. The actual river of history receives its water not only from great currents but also from modest tributaries; Pandit Janardan Jha represents one of those unseen streams.

The author's argument is that the main current of literature is formed not solely by celebrated writers but by the sustained labour of numerous local and ‘second-rank’ literary workers. Because Pandit Janardan Jha's writings became rare, his name all but disappeared from history. His short epic Jānakī Pariṇaya depicts famine, Janakpur, Sita's birth, the breaking of the bow and marriage rites. Its linguistic simplicity, originality and cultural detail make it useful evidence for literary history.

This principle bears a remarkable resemblance to Western accounts of canon formation and the literary economy. Ramanand Jha argues that the absence of publishing opportunities, irregular periodicals and limited public access have deprived many writers of visibility. This is the central proposition of the Videha parallel-history paradigm. Indeed, the whole essay can be regarded as a manifesto anticipating the Videha movement.

6. Pandit Trilochan Jha of Bettiah: A Forgotten Devotee of the Mother Tongue

Trilochan Jha (1878–1938) appears as a translator, poet, storyteller and narrative writer, biographer, essayist, social worker and institutional founder. He possessed extraordinary organisational ability; the essay brings to light the institutional history of the Subodhinī Sabhā and the Maithili movement. Through praise of the motherland and songs of the past, he sought to awaken a dormant Maithil society. Lines of his such as 'Caṇḍi tohar Mithilā deś' infused public consciousness with energy. He also translated the Bhagavad Gita into Maithili verse under the title Śrīmadbhagavadgītādarś, a mark of his vigorous scholarly outlook.

A comprehensive evaluation is difficult because his writings lie scattered through different magazines: the critic repeatedly concedes that 'very little material is available'. The surviving work nevertheless attests to his profound devotion to the mother tongue and its literature. He regarded language and literature as foundations of social advancement. He challenged the indolence, self-absorption and cultural indifference of Maithil society and encouraged a sense of collective responsibility for recovering Mithila's standing. From a postcolonial perspective, service to the mother tongue extends political freedom: self-rule without linguistic freedom is incomplete. Here the acknowledgement of scant evidence makes visible the essential crisis of parallel historiography—archival poverty.

7. Yadunath Jha 'Yaduvar': A Pioneer Poet of National Consciousness

Through Mithilā Gītāñjali (1923), Yaduvar (1888–1935) established the consciousness of the national freedom struggle in Maithili poetry. His verse combines the voices of Mithila, Maithili and Indian nationalism. He broke with older conventions, inaugurated writing on national concerns and was the first to free Maithili poetry from the bonds of musical rāga. His Maithilī Sāhitya Digdarśan is regarded as Maithili's first research-based essay, offering an overview of its literature.

In naming Yaduvar 'a pioneer of national consciousness', Ramanand Jha advances a specific proposition: 'Yaduvar's writing initiated a strong tradition of national and nation-building literature by wiping away the religious coating from the tendency to engage with one's time and place that had begun with Kavishwar Chanda Jha.' The image of 'wiping away the religious coating' conveys a delicate historical awareness of the secularisation of literary tendency and provides an excellent example of New Historicist attention to changing dispositions.

He calls upon educated Maithils to awaken from indifference towards their mother tongue, inertia and subordination to outside languages. The vīra rasa of his poetry is not confined to the battlefield: it is the heroism of a linguistic and cultural struggle. To write in one's mother tongue, publish literature and awaken Maithil society was, for him, national service. From a postcolonial perspective, Yaduvar sees feelings of linguistic inferiority as the product of a colonial mentality. In Videha parallel history, his poetry is a record of a movement for linguistic freedom running alongside political mobilisation.

8. Chhedi Jha 'Dvijvar': The Poet-Freedom Fighter

This chapter refutes the common accusation that Maithili writers stood apart from national consciousness. Dvijvar was born in 1893 in Bangaon, Saharsa. He was not merely a writer of patriotic poetry: responding to Gandhi's call, he resigned from government service, joined the struggle for independence and was imprisoned four times. Comparing Yaduvar and Dvijvar, the critic draws a fine distinction: because Yaduvar remained in government service, his activity was confined to literature, whereas Dvijvar resigned his post and worked in both politics and literature. To call the union of 'creative talent and the capacity for agitation in a single individual' a 'rare event' affirms the inseparability of literary art and action, consonant with the idea of committed literature.

Swadeshi, the spinning wheel, economic independence and village life form the foundation of his nationalism. Poems such as Carakhā Caumāsā clearly echo the Swadeshi movement. For him the nation is no abstract power but the combined life of villages and homes, rivers, fields, people and nature. His poem Chūtahar strikes against untouchability and feudal cruelty: 'For what sin have I become untouchable? The clay is one; the potter is the same.' This line forcefully attacks social inequality, giving the excluded a discernible voice in his poetry. The conjunction of karuṇa and raudra with vīra rasa elevates the poems above mere propagandistic verse. In Videha parallel history, Dvijvar breaks down the artificial division between literary creation and political action.

9. The Sensibility of Kumar Ganganand Singh's Stories

Kumar Ganganand Singh's career in fiction extends over a long period, from 1924 to 1965. Stories such as Manuṣyak Mol, Vivāh, Bihāṛi, Paṇḍitputra, Pañc Parameśvar and Āmak Gāchī raise questions of social reform, harmful marriage customs, untouchability, education and village life. Manuṣyak Mol depicts the heartrending reality of a child widow's suicide. Bihāṛi expresses a consciousness of emancipation from untouchability: oppressed people refuse to perform unpaid labour for the local gentlemen and go on strike. The author locates Singh's importance as a storyteller in his choice of plots not from Purāṇas or religious scriptures but from his contemporary society. Breaking with the didactic tradition of the subsidiary tale and attacking the living deformities of society is his achievement.

In this essay Ramanand Jha sets out a sequence linking 'experience, expression, truth and communication': 'In the expression of experience there is a communication of truth, and in the communication of truth the reality of life and one's surroundings finds expression.' The word vyañjanā, suggestion or evocation, recalls Ānandavardhana's theory of dhvani: literature's significance lies not simply in its literal meaning but in what is suggested beyond it. The criterion of being 'validated by the passage of time' likewise accords with the idea of enduring value. In resolving a dispute over the authorship of Manuṣyak Mol and Vivāh—Jayakant Mishra and Shreesh had attributed them to Bhol—Ramanand Jha offers a sociological reading of language use. In Bihāṛi, the Hindi-influenced speech of Raudi and Kamati suggests the 'influence of other languages on the uneducated'. This is a fine critical recognition of linguistic realism.

The portrayal of female characters, child marriage, widowhood and domestic persecution produces karuṇa rasa. The language of the stories is simple, accessible to ordinary people and humorous. In a short story such as Āmak Gāchī, the absence of unnecessary elaboration and a mysterious ending bring the work close to the modern short story.

10. The Vaishnavism of the Poet Harilata

The distinctive feature of this essay is Ramanand Jha's recovery of the literary practice of a woman writer, the poet Harilata (Modavati, born 1903)—an early indication of the gender-oriented recovery pursued by Videha parallel history. Her life story—marriage at the age of only four, widowhood in youth and her husband's mental derangement, a time when 'reading was forbidden to women' and she nevertheless 'learnt her letters in secret from her mother-in-law and others'—is a narrative of struggle for female identity.

Her Bhajanamālikā (1937) is an outstanding example of Vaishnava devotion to the personal, manifest deity. Ramanand Jha shows, from the standpoint of the poetics of devotion, that Harilata's 'worship of the manifest form because the formless is unattainable' accords with Vaishnava tradition. The child Krishna rocking in a cradle, toddling in the courtyard and grazing cows in Vrindavan is portrayed with 'sweetness to the ear and abundance of rasa'. Her songs contain the six elements of devotion—ānukūlya-saṅkalpa, the resolve to do what pleases God; prātikūlya-varjana, the rejection of what opposes divine will; rakṣaṇa-viśvāsa, trust in divine protection; goptṛtva-varaṇa, the acceptance of God as guardian; ātmanikṣepa, self-surrender; and kārpaṇya, humility—as well as mādhurya rasa. She transformed the unbearable pain of child widowhood into the sweetness of Krishna devotion. This is a classical discussion of the rasas of devotion and parental affection.

11. The Themes of Poet Shyamanand Jha

The author reads Shyamanand Jha's poetry in four categories—national, social, cultural and practical—and presents him as a 'poet conscious of his age'. The poet's anger is not personal; it arises from the political subjugation, economic inequality, linguistic humiliation and social apathy of his time. Behind an outburst such as 'Jari jāy jeṃ jajāte karite paṭāy kī ho' lies the pitiful condition of his immediate environment. The poems sharply satirise the feudal class's indifference to political, social and cultural decline in the Gandhian period, epitomised by the attitude 'Whoever becomes king, what difference does it make to us?'

His poetry calls for India's independence, the protection of Maithili, economic equality, social awakening and cultural regeneration. Satirising the upper classes for their blind devotion to English and Hindi, he writes of people abandoning their own adornments and clothing, hiding their ears at the mention of Vidyapati and rolling about in enthusiasm for 'hats and neckties'. This is a declaration against cultural enslavement. The line 'For service to the country it is difficult to produce even a small coin … yet they become generous when a coin is to be taken' is a finely pointed irony, an example of the obliqueness of expression in Kuntaka's theory of vakrokti. From a rasa perspective it combines pathos and heroism with disgust towards feudal conduct. From a Marxist standpoint it is direct literary criticism of the concentration of wealth and class inequality. His depiction of poverty, clothing, food, shelter and family responsibilities testifies to his social vision.

In Maithil Sandeś and Maithilī Gīt-Candrikā, love of country is joined to folk culture. His practical songs encompass sohar birth songs, naming rites, initiation, marriage, the bridal chamber, samdāun farewell songs and other life-cycle rituals, creating a poetic archive of popular life. The combination of love, humour, devotion and folk customs broadens the range of his poetic subjects.

12. Babu Lakshmipati Singh and Maithili Journalism

In this essay Ramanand Jha crosses the boundaries of literary criticism and enters the history of journalism. He treats Lakshmipati Singh (1907–1972) as a writer, editor, publisher, cultural worker and founding figure in Maithili journalism—'not confined to a single genre, nor to a single language'. Singh devoted throughout his life to his mother tongue the impulse towards literary creation he had received as a disciple of Pandit Shrikrishna Thakur, and worked ceaselessly to connect migrant Maithils with Mithila.

His contribution was by no means confined to his own writing. Editing and publishing rare works, encouraging authors and building a reading public through magazines helped develop a Maithili public sphere. He advocated freeing Maithili journalism from political and economic servitude so that it could become self-reliant. He made clear that Maithili periodicals ought not to be a literary monopoly: they should also convey news and matters of public concern. The essay's final portion offers a far-sighted analysis of the future of Maithili newspapers. Without advertising, correspondent networks, editorial policy and a base of readers, Maithils themselves would remain compelled to depend on newspapers in other languages. This media-sociological insight was ahead of its time.

From a reader-response perspective, journalism establishes a living dialogue between writer and reader. In Videha parallel history, editors are not incidental figures on the margins of literature but makers of memory and readership.

13. The Lyric Poetry of Kavichudamani Madhup

The analysis of Kashikant Mishra 'Madhup''s lyric poetry is the collection's most sustained essay in the theory of rasa. 'A song rests upon emotion; its impact upon the heart is immediate, and it sets the strings of affective disposition vibrating.' This account is a Maithili restatement of Bharata's production of rasa and Abhinavagupta's savour of aesthetic emotion. The notion of poetic practice that 'awakens nāda-brahman' is connected to the Indian philosophy of sound. Citing Manipadma's description of Madhup as one who can polish a worn half-rupee into gold and then a diamond, and as a voice sounding in the tradition of 'Vidyapati and Mira', Ramanand Jha gives him a place at the summit of the lyric tradition.

Madhup's world of song combines love, devotion, domestic life, ideals of womanhood, social education and cultural rites. A song is not merely something to read: it is to be memorised, sung and experienced communally. This assessment of the 'indispensability of song in folk life'—in courtyards, on verandahs, in fields and threshing grounds, in bridal chambers and at the Simaria ghat—is an excellent application of Bhaṭṭanāyaka's principle of sādhāraṇīkaraṇa. At a time when Maithil youth were infatuated with the melodies of film songs, Madhup wrote Maithili songs to cinematic tunes to save the language from disappearance. From Videha's parallel-history standpoint, this was a democratic, grassroots attempt to keep the language of the people alive. He also rendered the narrative of festivals such as Vaṭ-Sāvitrī into song, removing their dryness, making the story accessible to women and children, and placing Maithili on the tongues of ordinary people. This demonstrates the social usefulness of song.

From the standpoint of rasa, Madhup's songs combine devotion, the love of separation and compassion. In terms of dhvani, they implicitly sustain women's social roles, the moral discipline of the family and the preservation of folk tradition within an ideal of domestic life.

14. Madhup and the Tradition of Bhaṭṭikāvya

This essay is among the book's boldest theoretical chapters, exploring the relationship between Sanskrit's pedagogic poetic tradition and Maithili poetry. In Bhaṭṭikāvya, narrative serves not only aesthetic enjoyment but also the teaching of grammar, figures of speech, metre and language. A modern Maithili version of this instructional tradition is discerned in Madhup's poetry. From the standpoint of Indian poetics, the union of knowledge and pleasure is the chapter's central principle. If poetry becomes nothing but instruction, it loses rasa; if it becomes nothing but entertainment, its educational purpose disappears. Madhup's achievement lies in reconciling these competing demands.

Taking the composition of Kobar-Gīt as his point of departure, Ramanand Jha poses a fearless question: 'Why is poetry written?' He offers a plain answer: 'fame' and 'material reward'; no poet stands entirely outside these two conditions. This assertion challenges purist idealism about literature by revealing its material and economic foundations, a distinctly Marxist insight into the sociology of literature. The circumstances are these: under pressure from Kumar Ganganand Singh and Rajpandit Baldev Mishra, Madhup was obliged to write a 'bridal-chamber song' for Maharaja Kameshwar Singh so that a school's grant would not be lost. Calling this song 'a sign of the compulsions of its age', Ramanand Jha confronts a difficult ethical and aesthetic question: why does a poet write against his own spirit? He concedes that Madhup's 'poetic power was so intense that even an uncongenial subject could acquire a divine and moving quality'. This is an honest discussion of the tension between purpose and talent. From a Videha parallel-history standpoint, the chapter situates Sanskrit and Maithili not in a master–servant relationship but as traditions engaged in dialogue.

15. The Fictional World of Kanchinath Jha 'Kiran'

Ramanand Jha regards Kiran (1906–1989) as a representative short-story writer of the transitional period of the third decade, turning away from the imaginative world associated with Vidyapati towards the reality of desil vayna, the speech of the people. His fictional world (Chandragrahan, Dharmaratnakar and Samajak Chitra) addresses social inequality, caste, labour, religious obscurantism, power, women and the moral struggles of human beings. The critic discovers in these writings a critical light that pierces the darker layers of society. Chandragrahan exposes licentious conduct and fraud carried out under cover of superstition concerning a natural phenomenon; Dharmaratnakar lays bare the anguish of oppressed tenants such as Ram Kisan and the hypocrisy of the gentleman styled Dharmaratnakar Babu Saheb.

Images of 'naked children shivering in the winter cold', 'young women desperately seeking to cover their modesty', and 'the country's future running about to find the money for school fees' communicate the pathos of realist writing with particular intensity. From the standpoint of reader-response theory, Ramanand Jha's subtle recognition of the moment of rupture in Kiran's stories—when 'in setting hopes upon the contrivance of imagination, one's connection with reality is lost'—also reveals an awareness of the Formalist concept of defamiliarisation.

From a Marxist standpoint, Kiran exposes the gulf between the privileged and working classes; from a Dalit standpoint, the Brahmanical determination of social standing comes under question; and from a feminist standpoint, women's lives become not simply examples of a domestic ideal but a sphere of independent social experience. Kiran's fiction is concerned with the public good, but it does not merely preach: the contradictions of his characters, irony and social dissonance give the stories life. Within Videha's parallel history, Kiran reveals inequality within Mithila instead of offering an encomium to Mithila.

16. The Women Characters of Chandragrahan in the Light of the Maithili Novel

This is the collection's most modern chapter in critical orientation, studying the changing forms of female characterisation in the Maithili novel. From Rajani and Sushama in Kiran's Chandragrahan (1932) to the women of Rupa (1988), Ramanand Jha analyses a line of development against the historical background of social reform movements: 'As reformist and movement-based consciousness became more pronounced in the social environment, its influence continued to be felt in the construction of characters in novels.' This is a compelling New Historicist reading of the dialectical relationship between literature and society.

Under the influence of social reform, education and modern consciousness, the women in Chandragrahan leave behind conventional silence and acquire new personalities. Women's inner desires, love, separation, bodily awareness, decisions and social responsibilities become active elements of the narrative; a parallel arrangement of the surroundings and the heroine's interior condition creates psychological depth. From a feminist perspective, this is the collection's most progressive essay. Ramanand Jha exposes the hypocrisy of the learned class, whose 'entire body of instruction is meant for other people', and which would deny education even to women abducted amid the bustle of fairs. To discern the 'aggressiveness of the creator's personality' in the making of characters is a form of expressionist criticism. The attempt to regard women not merely as embodiments of sacrifice or guardians of the family, but as human beings with desires and ideas of their own, is significant.

17. Professor Harimohan Jha and His Charchari

Charchari, by Harimohan Jha (1908–1984), Maithili's most popular writer of humour and satire, is not a book belonging to a single genre. Its contents include stories, one-act plays, shadow plays, letters, conversations on the veranda, conversations by the pond, farces and cultural essays. The use of charchari, a mixed vegetable preparation, as a metaphor for this diversity of genres is a clever reading of the title. Ramanand Jha identifies these works neither as conventional stories nor as essays but as instances of an independent genre of conversational prose, gapp. Harimohan Jha's literary world—including Charchari, Khattar Kakak Tarang and Pranamya Devata—established this genre in Maithili. Through humour, satire and oblique expression, he attacked hollow scholarship, orthodoxy and social hypocrisy. From the viewpoint of rasa theory, a piece such as 'Panch Patra' is a fine instance of the pathetic sentiment, presenting with poignancy the changing emotional relationship between husband and wife and the consciousness of an age. The farce 'Relak Jhagra' humorously portrays a family unsettled by the winds of modern education.

Harimohan Jha's greatest achievement was the creation of an extensive Maithili readership. He gave literary form to the Maithil community's disposition towards humour and attracted readers to literature. Indian hasya-rasa and Western approaches to satire converge in these works; the hybrid genre of gapp bridges oral popular narration, classical wit and modern printed literature.

At the same time, this essay is among the collection's most openly dissenting assessments. Ramanand Jha fearlessly identifies a limitation of a canonical author such as Harimohan Jha: 'After reading most of his compositions, there is no blossoming of thought, no intellectual churning; one is merely tickled, and once the laughter has passed, its effect vanishes.' This anticipates the courage of Videha's alternative paradigm in reassessing canon-centred judgement: popularity is not necessarily synonymous with literary excellence.

18. The Column Writing of the Poet Yatri

By establishing the columns of Yatri (Nagarjun) as a literary form, Ramanand Jha brings out the intimate relationship between Maithili journalism and literature. The early periodicals aimed to serve the mother tongue and to remedy social abuses; readers' columns opened an intellectual exchange among writers, editors and readers. In columns such as 'Yatra Tatra Sarvatra', 'Yatkinchit' and 'Chintan-Anuchintan', Yatri commented on the immediate concerns of politics, society, economics, language and culture. The essay also traces his development of satirical figures such as 'Choa-Kaka'. That 'not even the smallest occurrence should remain beyond the boundary of Yatri's keen vision' acknowledges the satirist's all-encompassing gaze.

Through his columns Yatri sharply criticised the ruling class's verbal sophistry, the economic neglect of the Mithila region and linguistic imperialism. Even while respecting Hindi as a language of communication, he opposed taking away the rights of Maithili and other languages in its name. The columns' language is pointed, satirical, conversational and character-centred. As an enlargement of the range of genres, this essay turns literary history towards newspaper prose and identifies a new model of political satire and social thought in Maithili prose.

19. The Poet R. C.

R. C. Prasad Singh (born in 1911) wrote in both Maithili and Hindi, but his principal identity in Maithili is that of a lyric poet. Through Shephalika, Matik Dip, Pujak Phul and Suryamukhi, his poetic journey extends from nationalism, nature and love to social consciousness and popular rights. His early songs speak of national unity, independence, sacrifice and India's composite culture: he calls for the construction of a new age and for India's millions to be bound together in unity. In his later poems the exploitation of Mithila, language rights, floods, political corruption and popular anger become increasingly vocal.

From a Formalist standpoint, R. C.'s distinguishing qualities are lyricism, imagery, alliteration, sensory perception and a gentle flow of feeling. This essay is particularly strong in its account of sensory experience: taste and fragrance in night-flowering jasmine and blossoms, touch in the breeze, and a fusion of taste, scent and sound in a stream of perfume. The analysis of mingled sensory impressions is a refined instrument of modern Western poetry criticism; from an Indian perspective, it belongs to the discussion of guna and riti, especially the quality of sweetness, and of figures of speech. The movement from Shephalika to Suryamukhi traces a poet's development from personal aesthetic sensibility towards social consciousness.

20. Upendra Thakur ‘Mohan’ and His Poetry

One of the collection's most extensive essays is devoted to Mohan, the enduring lyricist of ‘Ayal Vasant’. Songs such as ‘Ayal Vasant’ were memorised from generation to generation, making poetry a living communal memory beyond the classroom. Ramanand Jha here adopts an autobiographical mode: his recollection of hearing the song in Shriramchandra Babu's class during his student days, and of Mohan's ceaseless industry in the office of Mihir, lends the criticism the intimacy of a memoir. Mohan's poetic world brings together memory, nature, springtime, lyricism and the struggle of life.

Mohan's love for the mother tongue—expressed in such lines as ‘The mistress of the household gropes in darkness: shall we light a lamp in the temple?’ and ‘Do not invite the village; invite Belahi’—reveals a sharply felt linguistic identity. The question ‘When Maithili is endangered, reduced to a brinjal in a winnowing basket, what is nationality? What is patriotism?’ brings the relationship between language and national identity into dispute.

Mohan's life was shaped by financial deprivation, the struggle for education, migration, unemployment and labour in a printing press. His poetry is consequently not merely about the sweetness of nature, but about an effort to preserve beauty within a working life. In Videha's parallel history, a printing-house proofreader too is a maker of literary history: rather than merely correcting other people's books, he safeguards the linguistic forms, spelling and literary culture of his time.

21. Upendranath Jha ‘Vyas’: A Purist Writer of Short Fiction

Upendranath Jha ‘Vyas’ (born in 1917) advocated a pure, indigenous and natural form of Maithili. Discussing Vidambana and Bhajana Bhajale, Ramanand Jha raises the theoretical question of quantity versus quality: ‘If, despite writing basketful after basketful, a writer cannot establish any value in life … that writer is declared irrelevant even within his lifetime.’ This is a Formalist, quality-centred assessment. The test by which Vyas's stories remain ‘not stale but freshly made’—their enduring freshness—accords with a conception of lasting literary value.

His stories are distinguished by their use of language, social satire, moral irony and the living dialogue of village life. Purism for him was not simply the selection of words, but cultural resistance: amid the influence of other languages, conserving Maithili's own syntax, idiom, pronunciation and emotional terrain meant conserving the mother tongue's identity. In Formalist terms, the language of his fiction helps construct the social position and mentality of its characters; in postcolonial terms, his insistence on linguistic purity symbolises self-respect.

22. Pandit Rajeshwar Jha: Personality and Achievement

Rajeshwar Jha (1922–1977) was exceptionally active as a researcher, playwright, short-story writer, editor, publisher and founder of institutions. His writings are divided into three categories: research, historical-mythological writing and creative literature. His scholarly works include Mithilaksharak Udbhav O Vikas, Maithili Sahityak Adikal and Avahattak Udbhav O Vikas. In assessing him, Ramanand Jha makes a serious methodological declaration: 'It is first necessary to understand a writer's personality; without understanding that personality, it is impossible to penetrate the layers of his work.' This is an explicit case for biographical criticism. Despite poverty, Rajeshwar Babu published books every year and encouraged others to write. Ramanand Jha values this inspirational work more highly than his literary output, remarking that, 'On the balance, the weight of his personality would prove greater.' This evaluation of an institution-builder anticipates the institution-centred perspective of the Videha movement.

The chapter is distinguished by its refusal to stop at praise. The critic regards several of Rajeshwar Jha's conclusions—including his periodisation of literary history, his dating of the beginnings of Maithili literature to a millennium before the Common Era, and his claims concerning Avahattha—as lacking adequate evidence. Judged by standards of propriety and historical method, this is one of Akhiyasal's most balanced critical studies: it is possible simultaneously to respect an individual's labour and subject his conclusions to rigorous scrutiny.

23. Transitional Lives in the Social Settings of Lalit's Stories

Ramanand Jha reads Lalit's fiction as a literary record of the disillusionment that followed Independence, a transition between pre-Independence hopes and subsequent disappointment: 'The ray of hope turned into despair; the bough broke and fell.' Electoral trickery during the first elections, blind self-interest, the naked dance of money, caste and casteism, counterfeit leaders, impoverished voters and corrupt development projects become the realities of his social setting. This is a strong example of Marxist-realist criticism, treating literature as a changing reflection of national and political reality.

From a Marxist perspective, a story such as 'Pratinidhi' exposes the conflict between the privileged ruling class and the poor who lack rights; an educated young man who once despised physical labour eventually acknowledges its value. 'Ladai' analyses divided consciousness, the intellectual outlook of two generations and their sense of responsibility. Stories including ‘Ramjani’, ‘Mrityunjay’, ‘Overload’ and ‘Du Chitra’ address the breakdown of tradition, the crisis of employment, religious hypocrisy, bodily needs, the burden of existence and the remnants of feudal attitudes.

24. The Social Context of Dhirendra's Stories

The chapter opens with a theoretical account of social context and contains one of Ramanand Jha's most sophisticated propositions: ‘Sociality is a shape hammered out upon the anvil of society; the anvil is the conflict between the individual mind and the social mind.’ This dialectic of individual and collective mentality is an intellectual high point of the book, formed at the intersection of Marxist dialectics and psychoanalytic criticism. Personal experience becomes social when it awakens the reader's dormant experiences and comes to represent a collective consciousness. The ability of a writer's experience ‘to become society's experience, to become society's mirror’ is an exceptionally clear Maithili formulation of the theory of art as reflection.

Dhirendra's stories portray educated unemployment, patronage, corrupt recruitment, the devaluation of truth, the appropriation of the poor person's labour and class exploitation. The symbols in ‘Manukh Bikait’ (‘People for Sale’) and ‘Gidh’ (‘Vulture’) express the commodification of humanity and the strong preying on the weak in modern society. In a Marxist reading, the vulture becomes a figure for capital and power consuming the bodies of workers. Through the process of sadharanikarana, the private suffering of an unemployed young man becomes the anguish of millions of young people. The critic's treatment of ‘eyes filling with tears’ as both a common element and a device of craft is a subtle Formalist observation, although he himself admits uncertainty over the boundary between sentimentality and technique.

25. Prabhas's Journey as a Short-Story Writer

The collection's last and longest essay concerns Prabhas Kumar Chaudhary (born in 1941). Here Ramanand Jha undertakes a broad study of influences, analysing the effects of Sanskrit, English and Bengali literature on Maithili fiction. This methodological application of comparative literature lifts the book from historical description to the level of theoretical comparison.

Treating Prabhas's two-decade career as a gradual journey, the critic examines changes in the writer's understanding of life, social consciousness and mode of narration. He traces a course from the storyteller's ‘setting out from home and moving about the village to an eventual condition of emotional detachment and a consciousness of inactivity’. Economic deprivation, society's selfishness, neglect of the poor and the inhumanity of the supposedly respectable classes become central subjects. Prabhas's stories move from individual experience towards broader social structures: characters initially appear to be victims of their circumstances but gradually begin to recognise the structures of exploitation. This developmental account of an author's consciousness demonstrates the critic's mature perspective. Ending the collection with this contemporary storyteller completes the movement from the 'first' to the 'present'. In Videha's parallel-history perspective, Prabhas's fiction records not history's triumphant proclamations but the everyday defeats, struggles and attempts at self-preservation of neglected human beings.

The Second Half: Chapter-by-Chapter Limitations, Contradictions and Incompleteness

The second half of this evaluation is devoted entirely to the limitations, weaknesses and methodological difficulties of Akhiyasal. Such critical severity does not diminish the work; it is a necessary part of taking its historical importance seriously. Only after unsparing examination of the limitations of a pioneering book can its successors establish their own direction.

1. Limitations of the Chapter on Shrikrishna Thakur and Chandraprabha

The argument for recognising Chandraprabha as the first short-story collection is important, but the surviving manuscript is incomplete. Without the full text, the dates of composition, variant readings and the author's final version, the designation 'first' must be awarded cautiously. The chapter emphasises historical significance more than close individual analysis of the stories' plots, characters, narrators, ordering of time and linguistic structures. Resemblances to the Sanskrit tradition of didactic tales are identified, but the distinctions among similarity, influence, adaptation and originality are not always maintained. From the Videha perspective, one might add that the fictional world of Chandraprabha developed largely under the shadow of Sanskrit texts; it lacks realist portrayals of grassroots popular life and the deprived classes, while the dominance of moral instruction obstructs the realisation of rasa. The prestige of being early should not obscure a work's artistic limitations.

2. Limitations of the Chapter on Jivach Mishra and Rameshwar

The chapter makes a strong case for Rameshwar as the first original novel, but establishing priority would require systematic comparison with contemporary publication lists, advertisements, manuscripts and other possible novels. Explaining Rameshwar's criminality through social compulsion is reasonable; yet his moral responsibility for distrusting his wife, his violent disposition and his active participation in robbery receives too little scrutiny. His reunion with his son and change of character at the end are exceptionally abrupt. Without a gradual process of psychological transformation, the resolution appears melodramatic. One may also argue from a Marxist standpoint that the novelist ultimately converts class struggle into moral idealism through Rameshwar's change of heart, extinguishing revolutionary possibilities with the waters of reformism. The woman character Parvati suffers, but her independent perspective remains limited.

3. Limitations of the Chapter on Sumati

The chapter engages with earlier critics, but offers insufficient direct analysis of Sumati's complete plot, character structure, viewpoint and use of language. There is a tension between its historical importance and its designation as a 'successful modern novel': when the plot is disorganised, characters indistinct and presentation immature, the criteria for 'success' must be made explicit. From a feminist perspective, a serious problem lies in presenting the sole purpose of Sumati's education as rescuing her declining marital household and freeing the family from debt. The woman possesses no independent agency or aspiration; she remains confined to the role of saviour of a patriarchal family. Repeated interventions by the narrator in the guise of an 'appropriate speaker' interrupt the novel's structural autonomy, a phenomenon Jaikant Mishra calls 'immature craft'. The essayistic language, crowded with Tulsidas's chaupais, constitutes a poetic defect. A concern with social reform is not in itself proof of artistic superiority: the mode of presentation, complexity of character and internal necessity are equally important, however significant the subject matter.

4. Limitations of the Chapter on Nirdayi Sasu

The story raises the problem of women's oppression, but presenting the mother-in-law simply as a 'cruel' villain may reduce the larger structure of patriarchy to an individual's harshness. What social pressures, economic fears, marriage arrangements and notions of prestige have themselves shaped the mother-in-law? These questions are not sufficiently explored. The daughter-in-law is made an object of pity, while her resistance, will, solidarity with other women and possibilities of an alternative life remain underdeveloped. The heroine Sharda is almost silent throughout; here the troubling question posed by subaltern studies—'Can the subaltern speak?'—is fully relevant. Flat and one-dimensional characterisation is also a limitation from a structuralist point of view. To represent a woman only as a victim is itself a limitation of feminist representation.

5. Limitations of the Chapter on the Forgotten Literary Worker Janardan Jha

The chapter's archival purpose is commendable, but its account of a life, based on limited materials, relies on inference in several places. Although the cultural details of Janaki Parinay are discussed, its metre, language, figures of speech, narrative pace and characterisation receive too little sustained consideration. The enthusiasm to restore a forgotten writer to recognition occasionally pushes the work's actual artistic limitations into the background. Giving someone a place in history is not the same as assigning that person high literary value.

6. Limitations of the Chapter on Trilochan Jha

The critic himself acknowledges that materials relating to Trilochan Jha are scant and scattered. Consequently, the chapter becomes more a reconstruction of biography than a work-centred criticism. Love of the mother tongue, organisational activity and social service are amply praised, but the particular writer's style, linguistic choices, command of genres and contradictions of thought remain indistinct. The call to recover Mithila's ancient greatness sometimes moves towards romantic nostalgia: an appeal to emotional unity that obscures divisions of caste and class is liable to be impracticable. The criticism of caste inequality, women's exclusion and social orthodoxy was as necessary as the invocation of ancient glory.

7. Limitations of the Chapter on Yaduvar

Greater weight is given to Yaduvar's nationalist and linguistic consciousness than to poetic form, metre, suggestion, imagery, oblique expression and individual voice. Poetry devoted to awakening the mother tongue may at times turn declarative and didactic. In a line such as ‘Jai Jai Jayati Maithil Jati’, literal denotation predominates and suggested meaning is limited; the chapter does not clearly distinguish propaganda from poetry. The ‘Maithil’ community is treated as homogeneous, with scant attention to differences of caste, class, gender and region. It is questionable to suppose that linguistic identity is experienced in precisely the same way by all Maithils. The lack of a concrete critique of Mithila's feudal order amid excessive idealism is another weakness.

8. Limitations of the Chapter on Dwijavar

The active life of this poet and freedom fighter is undoubtedly important, but the heroism of his biography overshadows an independent criticism of the verse. Political activity does not of itself establish poetic excellence; closer analysis of language, metre, symbols, ideological complexity and artistic durability was required. Nationalism is treated as an unquestioned value of public welfare, though nationhood itself can contain inequalities of class, caste, religion and gender. The swadeshi movement and spinning wheel have social meaning, but their relationship to modern economic structures is not critically examined. Chhuthar speaks of the oppressed, yet remains within the sphere of Gandhian reform rather than revolutionary consciousness, and metrical constraint sometimes diminishes its representation of reality.

9. Limitations of the Chapter on Kumar Ganganand Singh

The critic himself demonstrates that many of the storyteller's works are driven by a predetermined aim: first a moral conclusion is fixed, then characters and events are added to illustrate it. The story becomes an example instead of communicating life's natural complexity. In several stories, extended spans of time, unnecessary turns, excessive elaboration of events and complete resolutions at the end weaken their effects. Ramanand Jha also acknowledges that the narrative threads of 'Vivah' and 'Bihari' spread beyond control. Despite a commitment to social reform, the abolition of caste comes to a halt halfway: stories opposed to untouchability do not bring Dalit characters to full social equality, while reform in 'Bihari' ultimately depends on the benevolence of the upper class. From the standpoint of Navya-Nyaya, 'Panch Parmeshwar' exhibits a contradictory reason: while advocating reform, it also instructs the village council that 'the amusements and pleasures of feudal lords and landlords should not be disturbed'. Thus it speaks of reform while defending the comfort of exploiters. There are also few women characters.

10. Limitations of the Chapter on Harilata

The limitation of this essay is that the critic attributes Harilata's suffering in widowhood merely to 'turning towards God', overlooking its potential for social criticism. A powerful feminist reading was possible: her struggle to learn letters secretly against child marriage, widowhood and the denial of education to women. Instead, the discussion largely confines itself to Vaishnava devotion. Psychoanalytic criticism might further ask whether devotion here became a means of escaping social reality, transforming material suffering into spiritual mysticism and postponing the question of social rights. The essay does not bring into view the tension between these two possible readings: a classical enjoyment of devotional rasa and an overlooked potential for social resistance.

11. Limitations of the Chapter on Shyamanand Jha

The chapter bears the title 'The Subject Matter of Poetry', and the critic expressly says he examines content rather than the artistic dimension. As a result, metre, images, suggestion, syntax, figures and style do not receive adequate evaluation. The vision of cultural revival idealises 'Aryan culture', without substantially raising questions of caste, women's rights or social exclusion within that culture. Foreign influence or the use of Devanagari is sometimes portrayed as a conspiracy, though changes in language also have complex social, printing-related and educational causes. Satire occasionally hardens into personal anger and slogans, weakening the suggestive power of poetry.

12. Limitations of the Chapter on Lakshmipati Singh and Journalism

This chapter is more an affectionate remembrance of a personality than an institutional history of journalism. There is little factual information about a periodical's circulation, financial base, subscribers, distribution, editorial policy or readers' responses. The roles of women readers, rural subscribers, printers, distributors and contributing writers remain unclear. The boundary between journalism and literary editing also needed to be sharper: news, opinion, literature, institutional announcements and social campaigns each required analysis of their distinct operations. Moreover, although the critic recognises that Maithili journalism stands on 'crutches', his explanation stresses economic distress more than intellectual emptiness or an absence of courage to question those in power.

13. Limitations of the Chapter on Madhup's Song-Literature

The chapter emphasises the social and cultural usefulness of Madhup's songs, but pays insufficient detailed attention to their tunes, metrical measures, rhythms, singing traditions and performance contexts. The images of womanhood built around Savitri, wifely devotion and domestic ideals may reinforce patriarchy. Women's learning and moral strength are praised, but questions of self-determination, desire and alternative lives remain limited. The popularity of a song and its literary endurance are different standards: being learnt by heart is an important sign of poetic value, but not the only proof.

14. Limitations of the Chapter on the Bhattikavya Tradition

The relationship between Sanskrit Bhattikavya and Madhup's verse is intriguing, but more explicit evidence is required concerning direct textual similarity, imitation, transformation and independent development. Seeing instructional poetry as a continuous tradition may flatten the differences among historical periods, languages and communities of readers. The task of teaching grammar or figures of speech may sometimes restrict poetry's freedom to realise rasa, and the chapter does not test this tension rigorously enough. The most serious issue concerns the doctrine of appropriateness (auchitya). To justify writing 'contrary to one's own spirit' on the ground that 'society is greater than the individual' leaves unanswered a fundamental violation of emotional appropriateness. What is the aesthetic standing of writing produced under pressure of practical ends? The theoretical answer is unclear. Under the strictest standard of Videha epistemology, the court-sponsored 'Kobar Git' testifies to the writer's subjection to royal patronage. When a poet of the people's language is compelled to praise royalty, both epistemic courage and the authority of verbal testimony suffer—although Ramanand Jha's sympathetic interpretation as a 'compulsion of the age' also acknowledges the historical complexity of this episode.

15. Limitations of the Chapter on Kiran's Fictional World

Praise of Kiran's social progressivism sometimes displaces formal analysis of his stories. Plots, narrators, viewpoints, temporal structures, silences and symbols required fuller study. Uniformly applying Marxist or reformist conclusions to every story can diminish internal contradiction, ambiguity and multiplicity of meaning. From what social position is Kiran's 'Maithil perspective' constructed? Do Brahmins, Dalits, women, farmers and townspeople all see things alike? These questions are rarely asked. In Navya-Nyaya terms, the reasoning in Chandragrahan may contain the fallacy of an inconstant reason (savyabhichara hetvabhasa): to refute superstition, it resorts to a melodramatic and communally coloured argument involving 'abduction by someone of another religion'. If there had been no abduction, would the superstition surrounding bathing in the Ganges have become justified? This looseness of reasoning weakens the story's progressive purpose.

16. Limitations of the Chapter on the Women Characters of Chandragrahan

The novelty of the women characters is recognised, yet they are often evaluated according to traditional standards of sacrifice, chastity, love and family duty. Female desire and bodily consciousness are discussed, but the questions of women's economic independence, property rights, education, labour and participation in public life remain limited. A clear distinction was needed between the male gaze of the narrator and a female character's own voice: making a woman speak through an author is not equivalent to a woman's autonomous self-narration.

17. Limitations of the Chapter on Charchari

The argument for recognising gapp as an independent genre is imaginative, but its necessary features, boundaries, structure and differences from story, essay and farce are not systematically determined. Harimohan Jha's humour sometimes turns into ridicule of characters rather than a subtle examination of social deformities. Where its targets are principally vulnerable people, villagers, women or orthodox figures, the edge of satire against power may be blunted. From a Marxist perspective it is also argued that he attacks society's upper surface—ritual practice and pedantry—without striking at its feudal economic foundations; laughter alone cannot heal society's serious wounds. Ramanand Jha himself quotes earlier critics, Professor Jaidev Mishra and Dr Jaikant Mishra, who held that Harimohan Babu demolished old values but failed to establish any new, constructive values for living. This raises the question of an intellectual void, and the related danger that an excessive zeal to find faults can damage elevated cultural values without proposing alternatives.

18. Limitations of the Chapter on Yatri's Columns

Columns address events of their own moment, and many references grow obscure with the passage of time. Without complete issues of the journals, relevant news and readers' reactions, their meanings may remain incomplete. Yatri's sharp first-person voice makes the columns lively, but personal judgement, satire or anger can sometimes dominate analysis. The form of column-writing also imposes limitations: it may not move beyond immediate reactions to provide a long-term theoretical alternative. All three columns ran for relatively short periods, making it difficult to trace a sustained developmental history of Yatri's thinking in this form. Critical editing and chronological publication of the surviving material are necessary.

19. Limitations of the Chapter on R. C.

R. C.'s extensive poetic career is brought under the principal headings of nationalism, love for Mithila, social consciousness and lyricism, though a subtler analysis of intellectual change across its successive phases was possible. The early nationalist poems can be declarative. At times the noise of fervent nationalism suppresses the finer realities of internal class struggle and marginalised communities in Mithila, drawing the verse towards propaganda. Descriptions of Mithila's natural beauty are idealised, even though floods, poverty and migration were equally present realities. The influence of Chhayavad and mysticism is mentioned, but there is little comparative study of how R. C. transforms these influences into specifically Maithili experience.

20. Limitations of the Chapter on Mohan

The chapter is full of the intimacy of recollection. This makes the personality vivid but reduces critical distance. There is considerable description of hardship, poverty and generosity, but relatively little systematic examination of the poetry collections, textual variants, metre, imagery, language and development of ideas. The popularity of ‘Ayal Vasant' cannot represent an entire poetic personality. Consideration of lesser-known, weaker or more reflective poems would have yielded a more balanced evaluation.

21. Limitations of the Chapter on Upendranath Jha 'Vyas'

Linguistic purism can serve the mother tongue's dignity, but in its rigid form it may reject linguistic mixture, neologisms, urban experience and changing speech. A language changes alongside a living society: not every foreign word is impure, nor every old word pure. Who determines the standard of purity? This question must be asked. While the storyteller's command of language is praised, the limitations of plot, character, psychology and social vision receive less equal attention. Language is a major component of fiction, not its sole component. A critical contradiction also arises here: Ramanand Jha considers it a virtue that Vyas's stories are 'not particularly influenced by contemporary life' and remain 'unaffected by the distortions of a changing age', while elsewhere —in his discussions of Ganganand Singh, Chandragrahan, Lalit and Dhirendra—he treats sensitivity to reality and involvement with the social environment as supreme values. This clearly reveals instability in his evaluative criteria, to be examined more fully in the later discussion of methodological limitations.

22. Limitations of the Chapter on Rajeshwar Jha

This chapter is already highly critical, but its refutational tone sometimes becomes unduly severe. Greater consideration could have been given to the researcher's historical circumstances, available sources and methodological limitations of his time. The shortcomings of his unsupported conclusions are shown, but no complete alternative scheme of periodisation or Avahattha's development is offered. After the account of personality and work, the catalogue of errors is extensive, while there is little close reading of his better scholarship, useful compilations or successful plays. Criticism should restore valuable elements, not merely express disagreement. In addition, emotion born of personal attachment in the account of Rajeshwar Jha's death affects critical distance.

23. Limitations of the Chapter on Lalit's Stories

The chapter gathers together many social, political, existential, sexual and religious questions. The resulting breadth sometimes pushes the specific form and beauty of individual stories into the background. To explain sexual desire as a biological need, liberated from religious and moral restraints, can be one-sided: desire is also connected with power, consent, gender inequality and emotional relationships. Stories are treated as direct documents of their age, yet literature is not a replica of reality. It is a form created through selection, imagination, symbol and narrative perspective. The thoughts of the author and those of a character must be distinguished.

24. Limitations of the Chapter on Dhirendra's Stories

The theoretical proposition concerning social context is significant, but restricting each story to class exploitation, unemployment and social injustice can diminish its psychological, linguistic and symbolic dimensions. The symbol of the 'vulture' is effective, yet a single fixed class meaning is emphasised in place of its many possible meanings. More analysis was required of language, dialogue, silence, the narrator's distance, the uncertainty of endings and the reader's participation. The social relevance of a subject is not automatically proof of artistic accomplishment.

25. Limitations of the Chapter on Prabhas's Journey in Fiction

The word 'journey' suggests progressive development, but not every writer's creation advances in a straight line from an early phase towards maturity; a later work is not necessarily better than an earlier one. Biography and social environment are treated as the main causes of the development of fiction, while literary influences, editorial policies of periodicals, readership, experiments in genre and self-criticism are less clearly explored. Determining Prabhas's entire fictional outlook on the basis of selected stories may yield only a limited conclusion. Unpublished, rare and less successful stories are also necessary for a comprehensive evaluation.

Methodological Difficulties: A Detailed Examination of the Work's Overall Limitations

Limitation 1: Inconsistency of Compilation and the Absence of Structural Unity

The work's first and most fundamental limitation lies in the circumstances of its composition. These twenty-five essays were written independently between 1972 and 1989, for different journals, on different occasions, and with different readerships in mind. Their assembly into a 'book' produces an underlying inconsistency. Some essays centre on individuals (Trilochan Jha and Rajeshwar Jha), some on particular works (Sumati and the female characters in Chandragrahan), some on a genre (column writing), and others on a literary tendency (Yaduvar and Dwijvar). No single theoretical framework binds the essays together. The reader must consequently negotiate continual shifts of context. From a formalist standpoint, this is structural looseness: the book lacks a logically developing sequence of ascent and descent. The chapter order appears broadly to follow the chronology of the writers' births, but even this ordering is inconsistent. Without any stated rationale, some essays are extremely short and others very long. The introduction, statement of method, and conclusion expected of an organised monograph are missing. Each essay simply ends with the source and date of its original publication, exposing the collection's assembled character. The chapters are unequal in extent, method, and critical depth.

Limitation 2: Repeated Admissions of 'Unavailability' — A Foundational Weakness in the Criticism

The book's gravest methodological difficulty is that, in almost every early essay, the critic himself acknowledges the 'unavailability' of the primary work. On Chandraprabha, he states that an adequate study and analysis could not be undertaken, principally because the text was unavailable. On Trilochan Jha, he notes that very little material is available; on Yaduvar, that comparatively little research has been done to date; and on the forgotten Janardan Jha, that compositions once published in journals are no longer readily accessible.

A profound contradiction follows. If the critic did not have access to the primary work, on what grounds could he assess its aesthetic qualities? In many places the criticism depends, in effect, upon secondary sources: Jayakant Mishra's history of Maithili literature, Karunakant Jha's research dissertation, or quotations supplied by other critics. Ramanand Jha himself observes that, for most subsequent critics, the limits of the material available to them are those of Jayakant Mishra's history. Yet that charge applies, at least in part, to his own practice. From the standpoint of text-centred criticism, this is a fundamental weakness: criticism without the text.

From the standpoint of Videha's parallel-history paradigm, the limitation is especially instructive. The first duty of a parallel history is archival preservation and the provision of access to texts: without making original works widely available in digital or printed form, their reassessment is impossible. Ramanand Jha repeatedly points to this necessity, suggesting that further light will be shed when the works become generally accessible. But he cannot himself complete that archival task; in the pre-digital period it would have been virtually impossible through individual effort alone. It is precisely this archival gap that the Videha movement seeks to address through its e-journal, book collections, and the documentation of genealogical registers. Thus Akhiyāsal's greatest limitation is also the source of its greatest historical significance: it names a gap whose closure becomes the responsibility of later generations.

Limitation 3: Unstable Standards of Value and Internal Contradictions

From a rigorous theoretical standpoint, the work's most troubling defect is the instability of its evaluative standards. A quality regarded by Ramanand Jha as paramount in one essay may be praised in its opposite form in another:

(a) In his discussions of Ganganand Singh, the female characters of Chandragrahan, Lalit, and Dhirendra, he treats sensitivity to contemporary realities, engagement with the social environment, and the representation of the life of the age as supreme values. Yet he praises Vyas's fiction precisely because it is not especially influenced by contemporary life and remains unaffected by the distortions of a changed age. This is a direct contradiction: engagement with reality is sometimes a virtue, and sometimes its absence is a virtue.

(b) Harimohan Jha's humour is assigned a lower value because it does not stimulate reflection, whereas Madhup's songs are valued highly for their immediate effect upon the heart and the pleasure they afford. Yet songs, too, often depend not upon intellectual deliberation but upon emotional immediacy. Immediate effect is thus sometimes a merit (in song) and sometimes a fault (in humour).

(c) An expedient, self-contradictory composition such as a kobar song is defended on the ground that society is greater than the individual. But judged in the light of Kshemendra's conception of propriety (aucitya), writing contrary to one's own inner convictions violates the fundamental propriety of feeling. Here the critic does not establish theoretical clarity.

This instability arises because Ramanand Jha does not adopt a single, explicitly defined theoretical commitment. Depending on the occasion, his approach is impressionistic, sociological, biographical, or formalist. Such methodological eclecticism offers flexibility on the one hand, but on the other renders evaluation unpredictable and inconsistent.

Limitation 4: Insufficient Theoretical Inquiry — The Absence of a Systematic Critical Vocabulary

Although such concepts of Indian poetics as rasa, dhvani, suggestion (vyañjanā), and propriety (aucitya) are implicitly present in Ramanand Jha's criticism, he nowhere uses these classical models as clearly articulated theoretical instruments. Terms such as ‘suggested’, ‘communication’, and ‘based on feeling’ do occur, but the names of Ānandavardhana, Abhinavagupta, Kuntaka, Kshemendra, and Bhaṭṭanāyaka, together with systematic applications of their theories, are absent. Nor is there any sustained invocation or considered use of Western literary theory. This creates an ambivalent situation. Theoretical economy makes the criticism readable, communicative, and accessible to the general journal reader, an advantage consonant with the essays' original periodical setting. At the same time, however, it deprives the work of academic depth. The criticism is descriptive and evaluative but less consistently theoretical and analytical. The strong theoretical foundation required to give a parallel literary history lasting legitimacy remains underdeveloped.

Limitation 5: A Restricted Perspective — Male-Centred and Caste-Centred Selection

From sociological and postcolonial perspectives, a serious limitation of the work is the narrowness of its social outlook. Twenty-four of the twenty-five essays are devoted to male authors; only one is devoted to a woman writer, Harilata. Even there, the discussion of Harilata is largely confined to Vaishnava devotion. Women appear chiefly as characters or sources of inspiration, and much less frequently as independent authors, editors, and critics. An autonomous literary history of women writers remains insufficiently developed.

Likewise, almost all the authors examined belong to a particular social stratum. Dalit, most-backward, minority, and folk-tradition creators in Mithila, including the anonymous makers of oral literature and singing and performance traditions, are largely absent from this parallel history. Questions of caste and class arise, but the voices of Dalit communities speaking for themselves receive little space. The limitation is partly historical, for the surviving archives of the period were predominantly produced by upper castes. Nevertheless, measured against the democratic inclusiveness of the full Videha parallel-history paradigm, Akhiyāsal remains incomplete. Parallel history means more than recovering forgotten upper-caste writers; it calls for the restoration of the entire margin, including Dalit, female, folk, and oral traditions. In this wider sense Ramanand Jha's project is a beginning, not a completed undertaking.

Limitation 6: Textual Authenticity and Editorial Errors

The authenticity of the verse and prose passages cited in the book remains uncertain. Since the critic himself acknowledges that many works were scattered among journals or unavailable, comparison of quoted passages with their original texts was often impossible. Their accuracy could be further compromised in later editing and printing; the available copy also contains inconsistent spelling and typographical errors. Dependable parallel history requires the disciplines of textual criticism and critical editing, which are understandably absent from this pioneering work. Claims such as ‘first’ and ‘original’ demand especially rigorous textual collation, manuscript research, and publication history. Where conclusions rest on limited materials, conjecture must not take the place of evidence.

Limitation 7: Excessive Praise Born of Personal Affection and a Lack of Critical Distance

In a number of essays, particularly those concerning Lakshmipati Singh, Mohan, and Rajeshwar Jha, the critic's personal closeness to the subject turns literary criticism into the equivalent of an affectionate memorial tribute. His recollections of Mohan, the emotional portrayal of Lakshmipati Singh's smiling face, and the grief expressed over Rajeshwar Jha's death are moving. Nevertheless, such intimacy can compromise critical distance. From an objective critical standpoint this is a bias towards praise that affects the impartiality of judgement. The courage to criticise displayed in the essay on Harimohan Jha is not consistently present throughout the collection. At times biography outweighs examination of the work, while thematic content overshadows beauty of form.

Limitation 8: The Incomplete Theorisation of the Parallel-History Paradigm

